Earl v. Campbell, No. 20-35217, 2021 WL 2206335, at *1–2 (9th Cir. June 1, 2021) (not reported) ("Salyers argues that in 2016, clearly established law prohibited shooting the driver of a slow-moving car that Officer Campbell could have side-stepped. To the contrary, even a slow-moving car not pointed directly at an officer can pose a threat justifying deadly force. Wilkinson v. Torres involved such a threat notwithstanding the suspect car's slow speed and path of travel away from the officers. 610 F.3d 546, 551–52 (9th Cir. 2010). Our court found deadly force reasonable because the driver had ignored commands and 'attempted to accelerate within close quarters of two officers on foot.'. . Even if the officers were 'out of harm's way' in hindsight, 'the critical inquiry is what [the shooting officer] perceived' at the time. . . Officer Campbell believed he was in imminent danger when Salyers, ignoring police commands, turned the car's wheels toward him and accelerated in close quarters. In such circumstances, the reasonableness of deadly force is not beyond debate. . . Salyers directs our attention to similar but non-controlling cases. Where an officer deliberately approaches a car traveling away from him, our court has questioned whether he could reasonably perceive a threat to his safety. [collecting cases] But no controlling authority has placed deadly force off limits where an officer on foot perceives a car accelerating in his direction—which is what Officer Campbell saw here. At most, Salyers has shown that the instant case lies between cases like Monzon and Wilkinson, on the one hand, and cases like Orn and Adams, on the other. Because none of them 'squarely governs' here, Officer Campbell's conduct fell within the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,' which entitles him to qualified immunity. . . Salyers also argues that in 2016, clearly established law prohibited Officer Campbell's 'subsequent gunshots' even if his initial gunshots were objectively reasonable. In about two seconds, Officer Campbell fired a total of eight shots in a single series without pause. In the absence of a controlling authority, we ask whether 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' prohibits Officer Campbell's conduct here. . . Salyers lacks a robust consensus to support her position. Cases where an officer shoots, pauses, and shoots again are distinguishable because the officer had time to assess whether the threat subsided. . . Similarly, courts may doubt that an officer reasonably perceives a threat where he pursues a car to continue shooting after it passes. . . And cases where every shot was fired from safety do not tell us when it is excessive to keep shooting. . . Officer Campbell fired continuously without pause, and did not deliberately move toward the danger after it passed him. In contrast to the out-of-circuit cases, the record here does not justify the inference that Officer Campbell must have realized he had neutralized the threat and stopped shooting earlier than two seconds. Even Salyers's expert testified that an average officer could shoot twice in just the time it takes to realize a threat has subsided and to decide to stop shooting. The instant case is the kind of 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' scenario in which officers must make 'split-second judgments.'. . For this reason, we have rejected the notion that 'officers must justify every shot' where deadly force is justified and do so here. . . No robust consensus of authorities dictates otherwise.")

Tabares v. City of Huntington Beach, 988 F.3d 1119, 1125-26, 1130-31 (9th Cir. 2021) [Note that appeal here involved only the state law negligence claim; Plaintiff did not appeal order granting summary judgment to defendants on federal claim] ("Under California law, the officer's pre-shooting decisions can render his behavior unreasonable under the totality of the circumstances, even if his use of deadly force at the moment of shooting might be reasonable in isolation. See, e.g., Mendez v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 897 F.3d 1067, 1082–83 (9th Cir. 2018); Grudt v. City of Los Angeles, 2 Cal.3d 575, 86 Cal.Rptr. 465, 468 P.2d 825, 831 (1970). Federal law, however, generally focuses on the tactical conduct at the time of shooting, see Scott v. Henrich, 39 F.3d 912, 914 (9th Cir. 1994), though a prior constitutional violation may proximately cause a later excessive use of force, Mendez, 897 F.3d at 1076–82. Thus, California negligence law regarding the use of deadly force overall is '"broader than federal Fourth Amendment law."'. . California courts do generally use '[t]he same consideration' as federal law in assessing an officer's tactical conduct at the time of shooting as part of the totality of the circumstances. . . California courts consider 'the severity of the crime at issue, whether the plaintiff posed a reasonable threat to the safety of the officer or others, and whether the plaintiff was actively resisting detention or attempting to escape.'. . Under federal law, deadly force can be 'reasonable only if "the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others."'. . 'Other relevant factors include the availability of less intrusive alternatives to the force employed, whether proper warnings were given and whether it should have been apparent to officers that the person they used force against was emotionally disturbed.'. . 'Even when an emotionally disturbed individual is "acting out" and inviting officers to use deadly force to subdue him, the governmental interest in using such force is diminished by the fact that the officers are confronted ... with a mentally ill individual.'. . .We appreciate and respect the great challenges that law enforcement and first responders face daily in selflessly carrying out their duties. We do not judge Officer Esparza's behavior 'with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . Indeed, we acknowledge the severe stress that can result from situations where an officer may feel his safety is at risk. Ultimately, we do not 'hold that a reasonable jury must find in favor of the plaintiff[ ] on this record, only that it could.'. . We merely reiterate that under California's broad formulation of negligence, Ms. Tabares's negligence claim survives summary judgment.")

Villanueva v. California, 986 F.3d 1158, 1170-72 (9th Cir. 2021) ("Use of deadly force to stop a recklessly speeding vehicle during a car chase is . . . ordinarily reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . But this case does not involve a shooting during a high-speed chase. It is undisputed that Villanueva slowed to below the speed limit on Pritchard and came to a stop on MacArthur before performing the three-point turn. Even under the Officers' view of the facts, 'the truck was moving forward at a speed of up to five miles an hour' when they shot at it. We have consistently found use of deadly force to stop a slow-moving vehicle unreasonable when the officers could have easily stepped out of the vehicle's path to avoid danger. . . In contrast, we have found use of deadly force against a stopped or slow-moving vehicle reasonable only when the driver was trying to evade arrest in an aggressive manner involving attempted or actual acceleration of the vehicle. . . The key question, then, is whether Villanueva accelerated or attempted to accelerate toward the Officers before the Officers shot at the Silverado and its occupants. . . The Officers claim Villanueva was driving 'recklessly' during the three-point turn, to the point that he hit a car behind him, and that he faced their direction and hit the gas before shots were fired. But witness testimony suggests that Villanueva's three-point turn was controlled, that he did not crash into another car, and that he never accelerated toward the police vehicle or the Officers. Orozco attested that Villanueva was driving below the speed limit while making the turn, and that Orozco did not feel the Silverado collide with another vehicle behind it. He also attested that the Silverado was not moving directly toward the police vehicle at the time of the shooting, and that he did not see either officer 'in the path of the truck' at any point before or during the shooting. Witness Lino Mendez testified that he did not hear the Silverado collide with another vehicle, the engine rev, or the tires screech, and that he was very confident that the Silverado did not accelerate toward the police vehicle. Witness Abel Orozco (no relation) testified that the turn 'wasn't fast' and that he 'didn't hear no revving or no burning tires or anything like that.' Witness Thomas Hinkle, Jr., testified that the Silverado tried to make a U-turn at a very slow" speed' and was not rushing. He never heard the engine rev and did not see the Silverado accelerate forward toward the police sedan. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, then, the three-point-turn was performed cautiously, the truck—which was 15 to 20 feet away from the Officers—was not aimed directly at Sergeant Cleveland and was moving very slowly and not accelerating when the Officers began shooting. In these circumstances, a reasonable jury could conclude that the Officers used excessive force, because they 'lacked an objectively reasonable basis to fear for [their] own safety, as [they] could simply have stepped back [or to the side] to avoid being injured.'. .Because excessive use of force is a highly fact-specific inquiry, even when we determine excessive force was used, 'police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.'. . Leading cases, such as Graham and Garner, 'are cast at a high level of generality' and provide clearly established law only for the most 'obvious' cases. . . However, '[p]recedent involving similar facts can help move a case beyond the otherwise "hazy border between excessive and acceptable force" and thereby provide an officer notice that a specific use of force is unlawful.'. . Because at the summary judgment stage we find that the car was slow-moving and the Officers could have simply moved away to avoid injury, their use of deadly force was clearly established as unreasonable as of 1996 by Acosta[.] . . . The facts here, when taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, are similarly 'not fairly distinguishable from those in Acosta.'. . As in Acosta, Villanueva's vehicle was at a stop shortly before the shooting. In both cases, no officer was standing directly in front of the vehicle. Villanueva, like the driver in Acosta, did not accelerate toward the police car or the Officers before the Officers opened fire. . . In light of Acosta, all reasonable officers would know it is impermissible to shoot at a slow-moving car when he could 'simply step[ ] to the side' to avoid danger.") Phelps for the Estate of Phelps v. Carlson, No. 20-35179, 2020 WL 6375414 (9th Cir. Oct. 30, 2020) (not reported) ("Even if a reasonable jury could conclude that Defendants fired too quickly and, thereby, used lethal force unjustifiably, no clearly established law gave Defendants notice that what they did violated Phelps's Fourth Amendment right against excessive force. On May 24, 2016, the date of the shooting, clearly established law did not put every reasonable officer on notice that it was unreasonable to shoot a suspect fleeing from a violent crime after that suspect stopped at a dark dead end and then displayed a 'shiny object' in his hand, even if that object turned out to be a cell phone.") Monzon v. City of Murrieta, 978 F.3d 1150, 1156-62 (9th Cir. 2020) ("[B]efore considering whether the constitutional violation alleged by plaintiffs is 'clearly established,' we begin by determining whether the officers actually violated a constitutional right based on the record and plaintiffs' alleged facts. . . If we conclude that no constitutional right was violated, then no further analysis is required. Only if we conclude that the officers did violate a constitutional right would we then need to proceed to the second step of the inquiry to decide if the constitutional right 'was clearly established at the time of [the officers'] alleged misconduct.'. .We are mindful that we must view the disputed evidence in favor of plaintiffs, and we do so. We accept that Monzon raised his hands in the air when ordered to do so by Zeltner (even though the van was indisputably moving and turning at that time). Likewise, we assume that Zeltner was up to 15 feet away from the van and was not in its direct path at the time he opened fire. And we accept that none of the officers gave a deadly force warning. On the other hand, we are also required to view the facts as an officer would have encountered them on the night in question, not as an ex post facto critic dissecting every potential variance under a magnifying glass. . . We thus cannot ignore that Monzon rebuffed Zeltner's initial attempt to perform a traffic stop and drove away at speeds of up to 100 mph, endangering the pursuing officers and the general public. We must also consider how Monzon recklessly exited and reentered the freeway, drove through stop signs and red lights, and steered the van near and toward officers (who were on foot) on the dark, dead-end street. Monzon drove near Zeltner, headed toward Mikowski and Williams, and then turned to where the van struck Mikowski's cruiser, pushing the cruiser into Williams. The officers fired at various times between when the van neared Zeltner up until and shortly after the van struck Mikowski's car. We conclude that the officers' use of deadly force was reasonable under Garner and Graham. First, the severity of the crime weighs in favor of the use of force. Monzon led officers on a dangerous high-speed chase at night, and he refused to stop the van at the behest of officers even after coming to the end of a street. Second, Monzon posed an immediate threat to the safety of the officers when he ignored commands to stop the van and drove near, toward, and amongst the officers on foot. These actions also demonstrate that Monzon was actively resisting arrest and attempting to evade arrest by flight. Third, Monzon's driving endangered the officers and left them with only seconds to consider less severe alternatives. Judges and lawyers viewing an event like this in hindsight from the comfort of their armchairs are often tempted to dissect, evaluate, and second-guess the officers' actions piecemeal. That would be a serious mistake. . . Cherry-picking specific facts in hindsight is not at all reflective of how this event transpired in real life. It all happened in less time than it took to type this sentence, before daylight, in a very dynamic and chaotic environment, where officers were forced to make split-second decisions about a driver who deliberately turned his car around and drove it toward and between them. The officers were faced with a reckless driver who had already endangered their lives and the lives of the public with a high-speed chase, had broken traffic laws, ignored commands to stop his vehicle, and steered and accelerated his van toward them in close quarters on an unlit street. Although we must read the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, we do not—indeed, we cannot—dissect the record in a way that ignores the totality of the dynamic and quickly changing circumstances Monzon created by deliberately turning his car around and driving it toward and between five officers. Finally, we take note that the officers did not provide a deadly force warning. But this fact is not determinative. The urgency of this chaotic situation made a deadly force warning impractical because the van went from a standstill to crashing into a cruiser at over 17 mph in 4.5 seconds. And assuming that Monzon put his hands up in the air, we cannot look at that fact in isolation and ignore the quickly changing situation. The uncontested fact that Monzon was still driving and turning his car toward the officers while allegedly raising his hands in surrender (after having just hit a fence post and finishing a high-speed chase) must also be taken into account. In that circumstance, it was objectively reasonable for the officers to believe that whatever else Monzon was doing, he was not surrendering. A reasonable officer in the position of Zeltner, Mikowski, Williams, Montez, or Bradley would have probable cause to believe that Monzon posed an immediate threat to the safety of one or more of the other officers or himself as Monzon drove his car toward and among the five officers. . . .The use of deadly force here, although tragic, was not unreasonable. . . Monzon endangered the general public by fleeing from officers at speeds up to 100 mph and breaking several traffic laws along the way. Then he drove to the end of a road and threatened the lives of officers on foot by accelerating the van among them, like in Wilkinson. The officers acted reasonably in using deadly force to end the grave risk that Monzon posed to the officers near the van. While Plumhoff instructs us that Monzon's reckless, high-speed driving posed a severe threat to public safety that may itself have justified the use of deadly force, we need not reach that issue because here the use of deadly force was reasonable to protect the officers whose lives were threatened by the accelerating van. . . .Because none of the officers violated a constitutional right, 'we need not reach the question of whether that right was clearly established.'. . But even if the officers' use of deadly force was not reasonable on the uncontested facts of this case (it is), the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis would still compel affirmance because the officers did not violate a clearly established right.") Adame v. Gruver, 819 F. App'x 526, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) ("Unlike the officer in Gonzalez, Officer Gruver faced an immediate threat of serious bodily injury or worse based on his compromised position at the moment Adame pulled away. . . . Because the officer in Gonzalez was securely in the vehicle when it began to pull away, the only danger to him came from the speed of the vehicle, which our court regarded as a disputed fact. . . Here, in sharp contrast, Officer Gruver was partially inside and partially outside the vehicle when Adame pulled away. Regardless of the speed of the vehicle (the issue in Gonzalez), Officer Gruver thus faced a serious risk of bodily injury based on the possibility that he would fall out of the moving car and be run over by Adame's car. . . In addition, unlike the officer in Gonzalez, Officer Gruver did not have 10 seconds to ponder his course of action while sitting securely, albeit unwillingly, inside a slow-moving vehicle. Instead, immediately after Officer Gruver leaned into the vehicle, Adame began to drive away, with both officers yelling at him to stop and Officer Gruver hanging partially outside the vehicle with his right foot bouncing awkwardly along the street. It was in this dangerous and rapidly evolving situation that Officer Gruver fatally shot Adame. Officer Gruver was thus faced with a

'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' situation where he had a 'split-second' to decide upon an appropriate course of action. . . . Although the district court here correctly concluded that Gonzalez depended almost entirely on whether the vehicle there was rapidly accelerating, it erred in not heeding the explicit reminder in Gonzalez that courts must recognize 'the importance of considering all the facts in excessive force cases.'. . The Gonzalez court distinguished Wilkinson because in Gonzalez, the officer 'was not on foot next to a vehicle that might run him over at any moment should it have accelerated,' and the defendants in Gonzalez 'presented no evidence of anyone else in danger.'. . The fact that Officer Gruver faced harm because he was partially outside an accelerating vehicle is a crucial fact that distinguishes this case from Gonzalez. . . . Neither Gonzalez nor Wilkinson 'squarely governs' the unusual predicament faced by Officer Gruver. . . Given the unusual circumstances Officer Gruver faced, his split-second decision to shoot Adame, even if it violated Adame's constitutional rights, still entitles him to qualified immunity. . . . As Officer Gruver's decision to use lethal force was, at most, a reasonable misapprehension of Gonzalez, he is entitled to qualified immunity.") Adame v. Gruver, 819 F. App'x 526, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) (Schroeder, J., dissenting) ("The district court got this right. There was no danger. Decedent Derek Adame had been asleep in a parked compact Nissan Sentra when Officer Gruver approached, gun drawn, telling Adame to keep his hands up. Adame, who was unarmed, initially complied, but then reached with one hand towards the starter and started the car. Gruver then put one leg inside the small car, and at the moment the car began to move, Gruver shot Adame in the head without warning, killing him instantly. The weight of Adame's falling body caused the car to accelerate and run into a truck parked on the street. The district court followed our decision with facts closest to this one. Gonzalez v. City of Anaheim, 747 F.3d 789 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc). There, the officer was in the car when the suspect started the engine and began to drive. . . There was a material conflict in the evidence as to whether the car began to move fast. . . We held that if the car had gained speed quickly, the officer was in danger and the shooting justified. If the car was moving slowly, the killing was not justified. . . In this case the car was barely moving, if at all. Officer Gruver was not yet in the car. If there is one principle that is clearly established in this circuit it is that deadly force is justified only by an imminent threat of serious harm. . . Here, when the officer shot, there was none. The car had just started to slowly move, and the door was open for Officer Gruver to step out. Officer Gruver had witnessed no dangerous conduct on the part of Adame, which distinguishes this case from Wilkinson v. Torres, 610 F.3d 546 (9th Cir. 2010). In Wilkinson, we held that use of lethal force was reasonable. There, following a high speed chase, the decedent attempted to accelerate towards an officer, and the only reason he was unable to do so was because his wheels were stuck in mud. . . At the time the officer shot the decedent, the officer believed another officer had already been run over by the decedent's vehicle. . . This case was briefed to us on the theory that Officer Gruver was in immediate danger because he had one leg in the car when the engine started and was left 'dangling' as the vehicle began to move. That might have been the case had the vehicle in question been a semi-trailer truck. But this was a Nissan Sentra. The majority seemingly ignores this fact. 'Dangling' is an impossibility when the car sits only a foot or so off the ground. The district court therefore was correct when it denied Officer Gruver qualified immunity, because the situation created no imminent danger to the officer or to anyone else. The majority seems to have a different situation in mind and I therefore must respectfully dissent.")

Smith v. City of Stockton, 818 F. App'x 697, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) ("We affirm the denial of qualified immunity to Officer Michael Perez ('Perez') for his shooting of Smith. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Smith, he had raised both hands in surrender and announced that he was unarmed when Perez fired. Officer Perez's initial suspicion that Smith was engaged in a carjacking does not justify his use of deadly force after Smith had surrendered. . . . Although Officer Perez maintains that Smith's right hand was out of sight, such a factual dispute is for the jury to decide. Thus, the district court did not err in permitting this claim to proceed to trial. We likewise affirm the denial of qualified immunity to Detective Robin Harrison ('Harrison') for her shooting of Smith. At the time of the shooting, viewing the fact in the light most favorable to Smith, Smith had attempted to surrender to the officers and did not pose a serious threat. Detective Harrison initially recognized this and holstered her gun but joined in the shooting once Officer Perez opened fire. Taking Smith's account of the incident as true, Detective Harrison violated clearly established law in shooting Smith.")

Martinez v. City of Pittsburg, 809 F. App'x 439, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) ("[T]he integral participant rule 'extends liability to those actors who were integral participants in the constitutional violation, even if they did not directly engage in the unconstitutional conduct themselves.'. . In evaluating whether each officer violated Mr. Martinez's Fourth Amendment rights, the officer's actions should not be viewed in a vacuum. Here, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Appellees, the district court determined that '[a]ll the officers named in this suit were actively involved in the struggle to restrain Martinez' and that 'each of the named officers struck, tased, or otherwise attempted to restrain Martinez during the confrontation.' The facts thus support the conclusion that each officer had 'some fundamental involvement in the conduct that allegedly caused the violation.'. .Construing the facts in Appellees' favor, clearly established law put each officer on notice that his actions made him an integral participant in the use of excessive force against Mr. Martinez. See Tuuamalemalo v. Greene, 946 F.3d 471, 477 (9th Cir. 2019) ("it was clearly established [before January 25, 2014] that the use of a chokehold on a non-resisting, restrained person violates the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on the use of excessive force"); Blankenhorn, 485 F.3d at 481 n.12 (denying qualified immunity to officer helping to handcuff the plaintiff because the handcuffing, although not excessively forceful in itself, "was instrumental in the officers' gaining control of [him], which culminated in" excessive force); Drummond v. City of Anaheim, 343 F.3d 1052, 1059 (9th Cir. 2003) ("squeezing the breath from a compliant, prone, and handcuffed individual despite his pleas for air involves a degree of force that is greater than reasonable").

Orn v. City of Tacoma, 949 F.3d 1167, 1175-81 (9th Cir. 2020) ("Clark does not dispute that an officer who fires into the side or rear of a vehicle moving away from him lacks an objectively reasonable basis for claiming that he did so out of fear for his own safety. He instead urges us to analyze the lawfulness of his actions under his version of events, in which he stood in the path of

Orn's vehicle as it accelerated toward him, causing him to fear for his life. As noted at the outset, we cannot analyze the case through that lens because Clark's version of events conflicts with the facts construed in the light most favorable to Orn. Most fundamentally, Orn's testimony provides an account of the shooting in which Clark was never at risk of being struck by Orn's vehicle. . . .Clark claims that he feared for the safety of Officer Rose because Orn had just attempted to run Clark over and thus might have been inclined to assault Officer Rose as well. . . But if a jury rejects Clark's account of the shooting and concludes that Clark was never at risk of being struck by Orn's vehicle, nothing else Orn had done suggested that he posed a threat to the safety of Officer Rose. Orn was driving at a slow speed in a non-reckless manner as he maneuvered around Clark's SUV, and although his vehicle clipped Clark's SUV and Officer Butts's patrol car as he maneuvered between them, the contact was slight and clearly accidental. . . In addition, at every juncture earlier in the evening, Orn had deliberately driven his vehicle away from nearby officers. Taking this view of the facts, a reasonable jury could conclude that Clark had no basis for believing that Orn's vehicle posed a threat to Officer Rose. . . . Clark has not argued that his use of deadly force was justified on the theory that permitting Orn to escape could have posed a threat to the safety of the general public. Nor is there any basis in the record for making such an argument. A fleeing suspect's escape can pose a threat to the public when police have probable cause to believe that the suspect has committed a violent crime, . . . but neither of the offenses for which Orn was wanted involved any sort of violence. Such a threat can also exist when the suspect has driven in a manner that puts the lives of pedestrians or other motorists at risk, as by leading officers on a high-speed chase. . . In such cases, officers have an interest in terminating the suspect's flight because the flight itself poses a threat of serious physical harm to others. But to warrant the use of deadly force, a motorist's prior interactions with police must have demonstrated that 'he either was willing to injure an officer that got in the way of escape or was willing to persist in extremely reckless behavior that threatened the lives of all those around.'. . A reasonable jury could conclude that Orn did not engage in any such conduct here, and that Clark therefore had no basis for believing that Orn would pose a threat of serious physical harm to the general public if permitted to escape. . . .We turn next to the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, which asks whether Orn's right to be free from the use of excessive force was clearly established at the time of the shooting. In making that determination, we are mindful of the Supreme Court's repeated admonition not to define the right at issue at a high level of generality. . . . In an 'obvious case,' the general standards established in Garner and Graham can suffice to put an officer on notice that his conduct is unlawful. . . But usually uncertainty will remain as to whether the particular set of facts confronting an officer satisfies those standards. . . When that is the case, an officer will be 'entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue.'. . .By the time of the shooting in October 2011, at least seven circuits had held that an officer lacks an objectively reasonable basis for believing that his own safety is at risk when firing into the side or rear of a vehicle moving away from him. [collecting cases] In the end, this is not a case in which the legality of the officer's conduct falls within the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'. . When the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to Orn, as they must be at this point in the litigation, Clark had 'fair and clear warning of what the Constitution requires.'. . What Clark most forcefully contests is whether his alternative account of the shooting should be accepted as true. Factual disputes of that order must be resolved by a jury, not by a court adjudicating a motion for summary judgment.")

Hernandez v. City of Huntington Beach, 798 F. App'x 85. __ (9th Cir. 2019) ("Even assuming the stick was sharp and that Schiltz's conduct on the field had caused fright, a jury could find that Defendants violated the Fourth Amendment by shooting Schiltz when, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Schiltz was sitting or kneeling and was too far away from bystanders and Defendants to immediately hurt them with the stick he was brandishing. . . .But at the time of the shooting, it was not clearly established that Defendants violated the Constitution by shooting Schiltz when he was holding a sharp stick in a threatening manner several feet away from bystanders. Defendants shot Schiltz after he had disobeyed Jackson's orders, and had moved toward people on the soccer field while bloody, creating a situation that eyewitnesses later described as frightening, especially in light of the fact that children were present. Our decision in S.B., which was issued after the shooting in this case occurred, concluded that it was not clearly established that conduct similar to Defendants' violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Without any other case that could have put Defendants on notice that their use of force was excessive, we follow S.B. and hold that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hernandez v. City of Huntington Beach, 798 F. App'x 85, __ (9th Cir. 2019) (Schroeder, J., dissenting in part) ("I respectfully dissent from my colleagues' decision affirming the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the officers on the federal claims. The law has been clearly established for decades that deadly force is justified only when an individual poses 'an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others.'. . It is equally well established that force is not justified when there is no such threat[.] . . . These principles are undisputed. The pertinent facts are clear. There was no deadly weapon. . . Schiltz was armed at most with a pointed stick, and was at least five feet from any bystander. The most that can be said is that the decedent frightened bystanders. His conduct did not rise to the level of an immediate threat. The officers, in my view, should not be granted immunity on the theory that we do not yet have a decision saying the obvious.")

Silva v. Chung, 740 F. App'x 883, ___ (9th Cir. 2018) ("Officer Chung's use of his Taser violated clearly established law. In Bryan v. MacPherson, this court, sitting en banc, held that one deployment of the Taser X26 in dart-mode against a belligerent individual who was unarmed, non-threatening, and apprehended for a minor traffic violation, was excessive. . . Here, Haleck was met with even greater Taser force, and was not belligerent. . . . Officers Chung, Critchlow, and Kardash used pepper spray numerous times on Haleck. Appellants concede that a warning did not precede each deployment of pepper spray. Officer Kardash testified he pepper sprayed Haleck two to three times, Officer Critchlow testified he pepper sprayed Haleck four to five times, and Officer Chung testified he pepper sprayed Haleck two to three times. Pepper spray is regarded as an 'intermediate force' that presents a significant intrusion upon an individual's liberty interests. . . Under our case law, a reasonable officer would be on notice in 2015 'that police officers employ excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment when they use pepper spray upon an individual who is engaged in the commission of a non-violent misdemeanor and who is disobeying a police officer's order but otherwise poses no threat to the officer or others.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Appellees, considering the number of times Haleck was pepper-sprayed, the three Graham factors, the availability of alternative means for executing arrest, and Haleck's vulnerable mental state, there is a factual issue for the jury whether Appellants' use of force violated both the Fourth Amendment and clearly established law.")

Losee v. City of Chico, 738 F. App'x 398, ___ (9th Cir. 2018) ("Viewed in the light most favorable to Losee, there is a disputed question of fact as to whether Sergeant Zuschin had an objectively reasonable fear of serious physical harm to himself or others when firing his four shots at the Honda. Sergeant Zuschin was the first officer to fire his weapon. Although it is not clear which, if any, of Sergeant Zuschin's shots struck Sharpe in the head, on appellant's version of the facts, Sergeant Zuschin was not in immediate danger of being struck when he fired his first two shots because he could have avoided the Honda as it slowly backed away from the utility pole. . . Nor was there an immediate threat of physical harm when Sergeant Zuschin fired his last two shots at the Honda, through the back window, as it began to pull forward in a direction away from him and the other officers positioned behind him.")

Vos v. City of Newport Beach, 892 F.3d 1024, 1032-36 (9th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 2613 (2019) ("Here, the facts are such that a reasonable jury could conclude that Vos was not an immediate threat to the officers. The officers had surrounded the front door to the 7-Eleven, had established positions behind cover of their police vehicles, and outnumbered Vos eight to one. The officers saw that Vos had something in his hand as he charged them, but they did not believe he had a gun, and the officers had less-lethal methods available to stop Vos from charging. Even though only eight seconds passed between when Vos emerged from the back room and when he was shot, construing the facts as they are presented by the Parents and depicted in the video footage, a reasonable jury could conclude that Vos did not pose an immediate threat such that the use of deadly force was warranted. . . .While a Fourth Amendment violation cannot be established 'based merely on bad tactics that result in a deadly confrontation that could have been avoided,'. . . the events leading up to the shooting, including the officers tactics, are encompassed in the facts and circumstances for the reasonableness analysis[.] . . .Because the district court concluded that no constitutional violation occurred, it did not reach the question of whether the law was clearly established. . . On this record, we conclude that the individual officers are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . Here, officers confronted a reportedly erratic individual that took refuge in a 7-Eleven, cut someone with scissors, asked officers to shoot him, simulated having a firearm, and ultimately charged at officers with something in his upraised hand. The relevant inquiry is whether existing precedent placed the conclusion that officers acted unreasonably in these circumstances 'beyond debate.'. . It did not. . . Because Vos acted aggressively, the law was not established by either Deorle or Bryan. . . Rather, as discussed above, the most analogous case is likely Lal, which was decided two months before the events that took place here. . . . Accordingly, the defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the § 1983 claims and the district court's grant of summary judgment as to the individual officers is affirmed on that ground.")

Vos v. City of Newport Beach, 892 F.3d 1024, 1042-43 (9th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 2613 (2019) (Bea, J., dissenting in part) ("It is possible that other means could have brought down Vos without this tragic loss of life. But a reasonable officer could have believed that the alternate means would not have done the job without the risk that Vos stab one of them. The officers had two seconds to make these calculations before deciding to deploy force to stop the charging man. Neither should this case turn on Vos's mental illness. While we may consider whether a person is emotionally disturbed in determining what level of force is reasonable, we have never ruled that police are obligated to put themselves in danger so long as the person threatening them is mentally ill. . . . . But that is exactly what the majority does here. . . . [T]he majority . . . creates a per se rule that in all circumstances the governmental interest in deadly force is diminished where the subject is mentally ill. While in some circumstances that may be true, in circumstances such as our case—where a mentally ill person charged at officers while wielding a metal weapon above his head—it is not. To hold otherwise would be to render meaningless the language in Bryan that we will not 'create two tracks of excessive force analysis, one for the mentally ill and one for serious criminals.'. . The majority states 'the fact that Vos was acting out and had invited the officers to use deadly force on him is sufficient under our precedent for a reasonable jury to conclude that the government's interest in using deadly force on Vos was diminished.'. . By the majority's logic, so long as an extremely dangerous person 'acts out' or otherwise evinces mental illness, an officer's interest in self-defense is somehow diminished. The majority's position is simply untenable either as a matter of precedent or logic. . . .Because I think the officers reacted reasonably to the threat they faced, I respectfully dissent in part and would affirm the decision of the district court.")

Felarca v. Birgeneau, 891 F.3d 809, 822-23 (9th Cir. 2018) ("[E]ven assuming, without deciding, that subordinate officers used excessive force against each plaintiff, we conclude that plaintiffs Felarca, Mulholland, Lynch, Tombolesi, and Chung have not met their required burden to show the law was clearly established at the time that the officers' baton strikes violated their constitutional rights. . . .We define the law at issue here as follows: whether an officer violates clearly established law when, after several warnings to disperse have been given, the officer uses baton strikes on a plaintiff's torso or extremities for the purpose of moving a crowd actively obstructing the officer from carrying out lawful orders in a challenging environment. To meet their burden, plaintiffs must generally identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Plaintiffs have identified no such case. They devote scant argument to the second step and fail to address it at all as to these claims. Although the same cases supporting the first step may also support the second step, they do not do so here. For the reasons discussed in Part III.A, supra, plaintiffs' reliance on Young and Headwaters does not convince us that every reasonable officer would have concluded that the case law existing at the time of the force alleged here clearly established that such force was excessive.")

Felarca v. Birgeneau, 891 F.3d 809, 823 (9th Cir. 2018) (Watford, J., concurring) ("I join all but section III of the court's opinion. In my view, the officers used excessive force when they struck plaintiffs with batons solely for the purpose of dispersing the crowd. The level of force used here was intermediate, not minimal, and neither plaintiffs nor the other protestors posed a threat to the safety of the officers (or anyone else) that could justify the use of intermediate force. . . Yes, plaintiffs were engaged in a mild form of 'active resistance,' in the sense that they, along with other protestors, locked arms and refused commands to let the officers reach the tents. But the protestors were otherwise peaceful, and the university's interest in overcoming their resistance was insubstantial. There was no urgent need to remove a handful of tents from campus. The tents weren't harming anyone; they weren't even blocking access to campus facilities. The university administrators just wanted to avoid the spectacle of having the tents remain overnight. That desire isn't weighty enough to justify the serious risk of injury posed by striking students with metal batons. Nonetheless, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because the law at the time they acted did not clearly establish the illegality of their conduct. I would rule for the defendants on the direct force claims solely on that basis.")

Zion v. County of Orange, 874 F.3d 1072, 1075-76 (9th Cir. 2017) ("Plaintiff doesn't challenge Higgins's initial nine-round volley, but does challenge the second volley (fired at close range while Zion was lying on the ground) and the head-stomping. By the time of the second volley, Higgins had shot at Zion nine times at relatively close range and Zion had dropped to the ground. In the video, Zion appears to have been wounded and is making no threatening gestures. . . While Higgins couldn't be sure that Zion wasn't bluffing or only temporarily subdued, Zion was lying on the ground and so was not in a position where he could easily harm anyone or flee. A reasonable jury could find that Zion was no longer an immediate threat, and that Higgins should have held his fire unless and until Zion showed signs of danger or flight. Or, a jury could find that the second round of bullets was justified, but not the head-stomping. Defendants argue that Higgins's continued use of deadly force was reasonable because Zion was still moving. They quote Plumhoff v. Rickard: '[I]f police officers are justified in firing at a suspect in order to end a severe threat to public safety, the officers need not stop shooting until the threat has ended.'. . But terminating a threat doesn't necessarily mean terminating the suspect. If the suspect is on the ground and appears wounded, he may no longer pose a threat; a reasonable officer would reassess the situation rather than continue shooting. . . This is particularly true when the suspect wields a knife rather than a firearm. . . In our case, a jury could reasonably conclude that Higgins could have sufficiently protected himself and others after Zion fell by pointing his gun at Zion and pulling the trigger only if Zion attempted to flee or attack. . . . If a jury determines that Zion no longer posed an immediate threat, any deadly force Higgins used after that time violated long-settled Fourth Amendment law. We have cases holding that the use of deadly force against a non-threatening suspect is unreasonable. See, e.g., Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 11–12 (1985); Harris v. Roderick, 126 F.3d 1189, 1201 (9th Cir. 1997). We've also held that continued force against a suspect who has been brought to the ground can violate the Fourth Amendment. . . .If a jury were to find that Higgins shot and/or stomped on Zion's head after Zion no longer posed an immediate threat, Higgins would have been 'on notice that his conduct would be clearly unlawful.'. . Defendants therefore aren't entitled to qualified immunity.")

Petersen v. Lewis Cty., 697 F. App'x 490 (9th Cir. 2017) (on remand from Supreme Court for reconsideration in light of White v. Pauly) ("We consider this case on remand from the Supreme Court and affirm. The district court erred by finding that there were material factual disputes regarding whether McKnight's use of deadly force was reasonable. The record reflects that Petersen refused to heed McKnight's commands and started to charge McKnight. At the time he used force, McKnight knew that a person matching Petersen's description was in the area and might be armed with a knife. Given these facts, McKnight's actions were reasonable; he did not act with excessive force in violation of Petersen's constitutional rights. Even if McKnight had acted unreasonably, Petersen failed to identify any clearly established law putting McKnight on notice that, under these facts, his conduct was unlawful. See White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552 (2017) (per curiam) (reiterating "the longstanding principle that 'clearly established law' should not be defined 'at a high level of generality' " (citations omitted)). The district court therefore correctly granted qualified immunity to McKnight on the excessive force claim.)

Woodward v. City of Tucson, 870 F.3d 1154, 1161-62 (9th Cir. 2017) ("The district court, in denying qualified immunity to Defendants as to the seizure of and use of force on Duncklee, relied on its previous conclusion that the warrantless entry violated Duncklee's constitutional rights and, thus, everything that occurred thereafter was part of that initial violation. Citing the provocation theory from Alexander, the court remarked that Plaintiff's ' "excessive force claim turns on the force the officers used in entering the [apartment],"'. . . and concluded that 'it was clearly established as a matter of law that drawing their guns and letting themselves into the apartment violated a constitutional right to be free from excessive force.'. . .However, in County of Los Angeles v. Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539 (2017), decided after the district court's opinion in this case, the Supreme Court abrogated Billington and the provocation theory. The Supreme Court concluded that the provocation theory was incompatible with established federal excessive force jurisprudence and held that an earlier 'Fourth Amendment violation cannot transform a later, reasonable use of force into an unreasonable seizure.'. . The Court recognized that the provocation theory conflated distinct Fourth Amendment violations and held that the objective reasonableness of each search or seizure must be analyzed separately. . . In light of Mendez, the district court erred in relying on the provocation theory. . . .We shall begin with the second prong: was it 'clearly established' under the undisputed facts of this case that Defendants should not have used deadly force on Duncklee? These facts, as summarized in declarations made by Meyer and Soeder, are that upon opening the bedroom door with guns drawn, Duncklee immediately advanced towards the officers, yelling or growling, with a two-foot length of broken hockey stick raised in a threatening manner. The apartment was small and cluttered, making it difficult for the officers to retreat. Before firing, Officer Meyer yelled 'police, stop' at Duncklee. We conclude that reasonable officers in Defendants' positions would not have known that shooting Duncklee violated a clearly established right. Indeed, the case law makes clear that the use of deadly force can be acceptable in such a situation.")

Holloway v. Horn, 701 F. App'x 608, 609-10 (9th Cir. 2017) ("Under California law, Holloway could have violated the statute either by attempting to deter Officer Horn from pursuing him 'by means of ... threat,' or by resisting him 'by the use of force or violence,' Cal. Penal Code § 69(a), when he removed a gun from his pants and threw it over the fence, even if he never pointed it at Officer Horn. Under California law, the mere brandishing of a weapon in the open may be 'threat[ening]' or 'violen[t].' Displaying a weapon, even if only momentarily, before throwing it over a fence, could plausibly be intimidating to an officer in pursuit. . . . Even if Officer Horn were correct that a conviction under § 69 required that Holloway point his gun at Horn, that would not change the outcome of this case. Taking the remaining facts in the light most favorable to Holloway, he threw his gun over the fence before Officer Horn shot him. Holloway suffered immediate paralysis upon being shot, yet when other officers arrived, they found his gun on the other side of a tall wooden fence about ten feet away. Plaintiff had been shot in the back, including directly in his spinal cord, supporting the inference that he was not pointing a firearm at Officer Horn at the time that Horn opened fire. This is sufficient to deny qualified immunity, even under the strict requirement of White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 551 (2017) (per curiam), that a case exists that places the constitutional issue 'beyond debate.' In Curnow v. Ridgecrest Police, 952 F.2d 321, 322, 325 (9th Cir. 1991), we denied qualified immunity to officers because, at the time they opened fire, the victim was not pointing his gun at the officers and was not facing them. Curnow was recently cited with approval in a case denying qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. See Newmaker v. City of Fortuna, 842 F.3d 1108, 1116-17 (9th Cir. 2016). Moreover, Holloway alleges that Officer Horn shot him several times when he was on the ground after he had thrown the gun over the fence. Shooting an unarmed, injured person who is unmoving and bleeding profusely while lying on the ground would in itself be sufficient to defeat qualified immunity.")

Van Bui v. City and County of San Francisco, 699 F. App'x 614, ___ (9th Cir. 2017) ("It was clearly established as of December 2010 that officers 'may not kill suspects who do not pose an immediate threat to their safety or to the safety of others simply because they are armed,' including in some circumstances in which the suspect has 'committed a violent crime in the immediate past.'. . . Even where a suspect was holding a rifle, a weapon more imminently dangerous than the X-Acto knife at issue here, we held that it was unreasonable to shoot a suspect who did not point the weapon at the officers and was not facing the officers at the time they used deadly force. . . It was likewise well established that, 'whenever practicable, a warning must be given before deadly force is employed,'. . . and that a suspect's mental illness weighs against the use of deadly force, see Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272, 1283 (9th Cir. 2001). It thus would have been clear to a reasonable officer in 2010 that it was unreasonable to shoot without adequate warning a mentally ill suspect walking slowly with an X-Acto knife who at no point threatened the officers with the knife and who was turning away from the officers at the time he was shot.")

Davis v. United States, 854 F.3d 594, 599, 601 (9th Cir. 2017) ("Davis argues that Conley violated the Fourth Amendment because his detention of her was unreasonably prolonged and degrading, particularly given that she is elderly, her clothing was urine-soaked, the detention took place in a public parking lot, and the moon rock paperweight had already been seized. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Davis, we agree. . . .Considering these facts in the light most favorable to Davis, as well as the facts Conley knew at the time of the detention, the district court correctly concluded that Davis has raised genuine issues of material fact as to whether Conley's detention of Davis was unreasonably prolonged and degrading under Foxworth, and that Conley was not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.")

Ames v. King County, Washington, 846 F.3d 340, 349-51 (9th Cir. 2017) ("On balance, we conclude the government interests at stake—here, Briganti's urgent need for life-saving emergency medical care and the need to protect the first responders and other motorists from potential harm—outweighed any intrusion on Ames's Fourth Amendment rights. We think Deputy Volpe's use of force in this case was reasonable in response to the totality of the circumstances. She needed to make a split-second decision during rapidly evolving circumstances to disable Ames. Deputy Volpe did not know whether Ames had access to a weapon in the truck. Ames refused Deputy Volpe's commands, resisted being pulled from her truck, and (whether or not by choice) was not submitting to being handcuffed. Even were we to conclude Deputy Volpe was mistaken in the judgments she made as to the amount of force required, as a matter of law her actions did not rise to the level of plain incompetence or a knowing violation of clearly established law regarding police actions in response to this serious medical emergency. . . Accordingly, Deputy Volpe is entitled to qualified immunity from Ames's excessive force claim. . . .Deputy Volpe's use of force while discharging her community caretaking function was objectively reasonable in light of the unfolding emergency with which she was faced. As the lone law enforcement officer on the scene, responsible for assuring the safety of Briganti, Ames, the first responders, and other motorists, Deputy Volpe needed to act quickly to disable the clearly panicked mother from leaving with her gravely ill son and enable the aid crew immediately to treat Briganti. The level of force Deputy Volpe employed to remove Ames from the truck and apply handcuffs did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation under these circumstances. Likewise, Deputies Sawtelle and Christian did not violate Ames's Fourth Amendment rights when they searched her truck in an attempt to find the medications Briganti had ingested in his overdose. The deputies' actions were reasonable under the emergency doctrine and they are entitled to qualified immunity from suit.")

Fletes v. City of San Diego, 687 F. App'x 640 (9th Cir. 2017) ("The district court did not err in dismissing Fletes's Fourth Amendment claim, because Fletes was not seized. . . The officers unequivocally testified that the driver of the car—and not Fletes—was the intended object of their shots, and there is no evidence in the record to the contrary. Moreover, even if the officers had seized Fletes, the officers' use of force was 'objectively reasonable' under the circumstances.")

Vasquez-Brenes v. Las Vegas MPD, No. 14-16939, 2016 WL 6648698, at *1–2 & n.1 (9th Cir. Nov. 10, 2016) (not reported) ("Vasquez-Brenes argues that Miller's conduct violated the clearly established federal law set forth in Curnow v. Ridgecrest Police, 952 F.2d 321 (9th Cir. 1991). But that case involved an officer's use of deadly force on a fleeing armed suspect. Id. at 325. This case involves the use of deadly force on a large man wielding a blunt object who continued to advance on Miller after repeated warnings and after being tased twice and shot twice with beanbag rounds. Curnow thus is plainly distinguishable, and no other case cited by Vasquez-Brenes provides the specific guidance required by the Supreme Court. See Saucier, 533 U.S. at 201. Thus, even assuming that Miller's conduct violated Brenes's constitutional rights, it did not violate clearly established law. . . . Nor do the cases cited by the dissent place the 'constitutional question beyond debate.'. . In A.K.H. v. City of Tustin, an officer fatally shot an unarmed suspect as he was removing his hand from his sweatshirt pocket. . . . In Glenn v. Washington County, officers fatally shot an intoxicated man who held a pocketknife to his own neck while threatening to commit suicide. . . . These cases address whether the defendant officer reasonably believed deadly force 'was necessary to protect himself or others from death or serious bodily harm.'. . But we have assumed arguendo that Miller's use of deadly force violated Brenes's constitutional rights. The jury's resolution of an issue of disputed fact under these circumstances is only material if Miller's conduct violates clearly established law under Brenes's version of events, but not under Miller's version. Even if we resolve all factual disputes in Brenes's favor, neither Vasquez-Brenes nor the dissent have cited authority showing that Miller's conduct violated clearly established law.")

Vasquez-Brenes v. Las Vegas MPD, No. 14-16939, 2016 WL 6648698, at *1–2 & n.1 (9th Cir. Nov. 10, 2016) (not reported) (Callahan, J., concurring) ("I fully concur in the memorandum disposition. I write separately only to state that I also find that, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Brenes, Officer Miller's conduct did not violate a constitutional right. See Gonzalez v. City of Anaheim, 747 F.3d 789, 793 (9th Cir.) (deadly force reasonable if officer has probable cause to believe suspect poses significant threat of death or serious physical injury), cert. denied sub nom. Wyatt v. F.E.V., 135 S. Ct. 676 (2014).")

Vasquez-Brenes v. Las Vegas MPD, No. 14-16939, 2016 WL 6648698, at *1–2 & n.1 (9th Cir. Nov. 10, 2016) (not reported) (Owens, J., dissenting) ("On the morning of November 15, 2010, Anthony Brenes walked around a parking lot with a cane and at one point threw a rock. Less than three minutes after police arrived to ensure public safety, Brenes was dead. Whether bean bag rounds and taser jolts failed to stop his walking is, in my view, irrelevant. What matters – and what a jury should decide – is if the officer reasonably believed that deadly force was needed to save his own life. . . There are too many unanswered questions to take this question away from the jury.")

C.B. v. City of Sonora, 769 F.3d 1005, 1029-31 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) (majority opinion denying qualified immunity on excessive force claim) ("C.B. also argues that the officers used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment when, upon removing him from school grounds, they handcuffed C.B. for twenty-five to thirty minutes. . . . We have not yet considered whether Graham or T.L.O. applies to law enforcement officers' use of force against a student in a school setting, and we do not resolve that question today. But we believe that Preschooler II, Gray, and Shade could have led a reasonable officer to conclude that T.L.O. governs police use of force in response to school-related incidents as well. In no event, however, do we think that an officer could have reasonably believed that T.L.O. governs police use of force once a student is in police custody and outside the confines of the school setting, as C.B. was throughout the commute to his uncle's place of business. Ultimately, in our view, whether T.L.O. or Graham governed Chief McIntosh's and Officer Prock's actions at any given moment is of little consequence. Chief McIntosh's and Officer Prock's use of handcuffs on a calm, compliant, but nonresponsive 11–year–old child was unreasonable under either standard. . . .At the time of the incident, the law was also clearly established that, at a minimum, police use of force in response to school-related incidents had to be reasonable in light of the circumstances and not excessively intrusive. . . And the law was clearly established that, as a general matter, police use of force must be carefully calibrated to respond to the particulars of a case, including the wrongdoing at issue, the safety threat posed by the suspect, and the risk of flight. . . Although these general standards 'cannot always, alone, provide fair notice to every reasonable law enforcement officer that his or her conduct is unconstitutional,'. . . 'in an obvious case, these standards can "clearly establish" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'. .Applying handcuffs to C.B., and keeping him handcuffed for the approximately thirty minutes it took to drive to his uncle's business, was an obvious violation of these standards. It is beyond dispute that handcuffing a small, calm child who is surrounded by numerous adults, who complies with all of the officers' instructions, and who is, by an officer's own account, unlikely to flee, was completely unnecessary and excessively intrusive. . . .In sum, we hold that Chief McIntosh and Officer Prock are not entitled to qualified immunity for handcuffing C.B.")

C.B. v. City of Sonora, 769 F.3d 1005, 1023-24, 1026-29 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) (Paez, J., joined by Silverman, J., dissenting from the majority's holding that Chief McIntosh and Officer Prock are entitled to qualified immunity on C.B.'s Fourth Amendment seizure claim) ("T.L.O. is distinguishable from this case in a critical respect: T.L.O. involved the conduct of school administrators, not law enforcement officers. . . We have not yet decided whether T.L.O.'s reasonableness standard or, instead, traditional Fourth Amendment rules apply to law enforcement searches and seizures in school settings, and there is no need to do so today. At the time of the incident, at least two of our sister circuits had held that T.L.O.'s reasonableness standard governs law enforcement conduct concerning school-related incidents in school settings. . . Consequently, at the time of this incident, an officer could have reasonably believed that T.L.O. governed law enforcement searches and seizures on school grounds for school-related purposes. Nonetheless, applying T.L.O.'s reasonableness standard does not aid Chief McIntosh and Officer Prock. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to C.B., . . . the officers knew only the following when they decided to handcuff C.B. and remove him from school grounds: (1) the school had reported an 'out of control' juvenile; (2) C.B. was a 'runner'—whatever that may mean—who had not taken some unknown medication; (3) C.B. sat quietly looking at the ground and never made any movements the whole time police were present; (4) C.B. was unresponsive in the three and a half minutes during which Officer Prock tried to engage with him; and (5) Coach Sinclair wanted C.B. removed from the school grounds. The officers acted reasonably at the outset by seeking to engage with C.B. to investigate the dispatch that they had received about an 'out of control' minor. What they found, though, was a quiet but nonresponsive child. During the entire time police were present, the child did nothing threatening or disobedient. . . . When viewed in relation to these circumstances, the officers' decision to seize C.B. and remove him from school grounds was not reasonable. . . .In sum, taking the evidence in the light most favorable to C.B., a reasonable jury could conclude that Chief McIntosh and Officer Prock violated C.B.'s Fourth Amendment rights when they seized him and took him into custody. . . We next consider whether it was clearly established on September 28, 2009, that removing C.B. from school grounds was a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . .At the time of C.B.'s seizure, the law was clearly established that, at a minimum, police seizures at the behest of school officials had to be reasonable in light of the circumstances and not excessively intrusive. . . .The removal from school grounds of a compliant and calm 11–year–old child—a decision that was made sans any police investigation, without any knowledge of disobedience, and after only minutes on the scene—is an obvious violation of the constitutional principle that the nature of the seizure of a schoolchild must be justified by the circumstances. Even without on-point case law, it is beyond dispute that police officers cannot seize a schoolchild who they do not know to have committed any wrongdoing, who does not appear to pose any threat to himself or others, and who engages in no act of resistance the entire time the officers are present. . . Chief McIntosh and Officer Prock do not argue that T.L.O. justified seizing C.B. In fact, they argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity only because they reasonably, even if mistakenly, believed they had 'reasonable cause'. . .to take C.B. into custody pursuant to California Welfare & Institutions Code sections 601(a) and 625(a). An officer who reasonably but mistakenly believes that his actions are warranted under state law may be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In sum, the officers knew of no defiant act by C .B.; any belief that C.B. was beyond the school's control was not reasonable because it lacked any basis in fact. Moreover, even assuming it was reasonable to believe that C.B. had earlier defied a school official by refusing medicine and running, it was apparent that C.B. had not run off school grounds and was, instead, sitting calmly in the school playground. Such a singular instance of disobedience does not even come close to satisfying the statutory requirement that the minor be 'beyond the control' of his custodian. . . . Chief McIntosh and Officer Prock argue that their belief that sections 601(a) and 625(a) applied in this instance was reasonable because Coach Sinclair allegedly told Chief McIntosh that C.B. was 'out of control,' 'would run off campus,' and was 'yelling and cussing.'. . Whatever the merits of the argument that a reasonable officer might have believed that sections 601(a) and 625(a) justified taking a child into custody in light of these additional facts, that is not the scenario presented here. Neither Coach Sinclair nor C.B.—the other witnesses present during this purported exchange—recalls Coach Sinclair making these statements. Although it is possible that C.B.'s and Coach Sinclair's recollections are incomplete, when taking the facts in the light most favorable to C.B., . . . it must be assumed that it is Chief McIntosh's account that is inaccurate. . .Based on the foregoing, Chief McIntosh and Officer Prock are not, in my view, entitled to qualified immunity with respect to C.B.'s unlawful seizure claim.")

C.B. v. City of Sonora, 769 F.3d 1005, 1033-38 & n.5 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) (M. Smith, J, concurring in part, and dissenting in part, with whom O'Scannlain, Tallman, and Bybee, JJ., join in full, and with whom Kozinski, C.J., and Graber and Gould, JJ., join as to Part I, which is the opinion of the court)("A majority of the en banc court agrees that Chief McIntosh and Officer Prock (the officers) are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to C.B.'s unlawful seizure claim. A reasonable officer would not have known that taking a child in C.B.'s situation into temporary custody was unreasonable, and therefore unconstitutional. However, I respectfully dissent from the majority's conclusion denying the officers qualified immunity with respect to C.B.'s excessive force claim. In my view, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on both of C.B.'s Fourth Amendment claims because the constitutional rights at issue in this case were neither clearly established nor 'obvious' at the time C.B. was taken into temporary custody. . . .Our court. . . has been singled out and chastised by the Supreme Court for our propensity to improperly find 'clearly established' rights. Specifically, the Court has mandated that 'courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not ... define clearly established law at a high level of generality.' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2084 (2011) (emphasis added) (internal citation omitted). Despite the Court's clear instruction that we not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality,' the majority's hurried discussion of the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis does just that. . . . I respectfully disagree with the majority's characterization of these facts as an 'obvious violation' of C.B.'s constitutional rights, and with its conclusion that this case is not therefore subject to the Court's admonitions against defining 'clearly established law' in overly general terms. . . .[T]he facts of this case, even when viewed in the light most favorable to C.B., . . . do not come close to constituting an 'obvious' violation of a 'clearly establish[ed]' right. . . . Assuming New Jersey v. T.L.O.'s reasonableness standard applies, as my colleagues do, C.B. cannot show that a reasonable officer would have understood that taking him into temporary custody was unreasonable, and therefore unconstitutional. . . .A reasonable officer in this situation, faced with a juvenile who (a) was reportedly a 'runner,' (b) was 'out of control,' (c) ignored the officer's questions, and (d) had not taken his medication, would not have known that taking such a juvenile into temporary custody in order to transport him safely to his uncle was an 'obvious' violation of his constitutional rights. . . .I respectfully disagree with the majority's conclusion that the scope of C.B.'s right to be free from excessive force was clearly established. . . . [A]ssuming without deciding that Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 396 (1989), controls in this situation, handcuffing C.B. was clearly reasonable when balanced against the need to ensure C.B.'s safety by preventing him from fleeing or injuring himself. . . . Additionally, it was not clearly established that keeping a juvenile in C.B.'s situation handcuffed for approximately thirty minutes while the officers transported him to his uncle was unconstitutional. A reasonable officer could have believed that it was permissible to keep C.B. handcuffed to ensure his safety in light of the fact that C.B. could have hurt himself in the car, or attempted to flee while the officer was removing the handcuffs before placing C.B. in the car. Moreover, handcuffing C.B. to prevent flight comports with standard police procedure. . . .Although handcuffing a juvenile is not a matter to be taken lightly, neither is the juvenile's safety. . . . Under the majority's new rule, officers are now damned if they do, and damned if they don't, when dealing with schoolchildren who are known runners. Because this case is not an 'obvious' one where general standards clearly establish C.B.'s rights, a reasonable officer would not have known that handcuffing C.B. to safely take him into temporary custody violated his constitutional rights. . . . The Supreme Court's recent case law illustrates the substantial protection that qualified immunity affords police officers. Although each case is decided based on its specific facts, the reality is that the Supreme Court in the recent past has rarely denied qualified immunity to police officers. As one scholar has observed, before the recent reversal of a grant of qualified immunity in Tolan, 134 S.Ct. 1861, the Court had not ruled against a police officer in a qualified immunity case since Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551 (2004), decided nearly a decade earlier. See Will Baude, Tolan v. Cotton—when should the Supreme Court interfere in 'factbound' cases?, The Washington Post, The Volokh Conspiracy (May 7, 2014, 9:40AM), http: // www.washingtonpost.com/news/volokhconspiracy/wp/2014/05/07/ tolan-v-cotton-when-should-t he-supreme-court-interfere-in-factbound-cases/ ?tid=pm_ national_pop (last visited September 22, 2014).")

C.B. v. City of Sonora, 769 F.3d 1005, 1038-40 (9th Cir. 2014) (Gould, J., with whom Kozinski, C.J., and Graber, J., join, concurring in part in Judge Paez's opinion and concurring in part in Judge M. Smith's opinion) ("I join Parts I, II.A, II.B, II.C.2, and II.D of Judge Paez's opinion, concerning the factual background, rejection of the challenges to jury instructions and to evidentiary rulings, and the conclusions that Chief McIntosh and Officer Prock used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment when, in removing C.B. from school grounds, they handcuffed him for 25 to 30 minutes and that they are not entitled to qualified immunity for handcuffing C.B. I join in Part I of Judge M. Smith's opinion, concerning the unlawful seizure claim, concluding that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity as to the seizure of C.B. . . .When a school official makes a determination that it is necessary to remove a student from campus to maintain order, protect that student or others, or otherwise to prevent the destruction of the 'proper educational environment,'. . . in my view a reasonable officer could have believed that he or she was entitled to rely on that judgment. On the issue of excessive force by handcuffing: Police officers may reasonably believe that the Fourth Amendment permits them to give deference to a school official's request that a student be removed from campus. But that reasonable belief in deference does not extend to the level of force that they may use to accomplish the removal. . . The officers violated the Fourth Amendment by handcuffing C.B., and they are not protected from C.B.'s excessive force claim by qualified immunity. None of the reasons motivating the Supreme Court's decision in T.L.O. bears on police officers' use of force. Neither the need for compliance with school rules, nor the close relationship between teachers and students, nor the importance of maintaining the educational environment has any connection with the amount of force permissibly used by officers in carrying out an otherwise reasonable request from school officials. . . .The Supreme Court's jurisprudence has firmly established that the force police officers apply must be reasonable. Under the totality of the circumstances, it was not reasonable to handcuff a small and docile 11–year–old child. The Supreme Court's law requiring that a reasonable level of force be used against the citizenry is crystal clear and well established.")

C.B. v. City of Sonora, 769 F.3d 1005, 1040-42, 1045-47 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) (Berzon, J., with whom Thomas, J., joins, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in Judge Paez's opinion, with one exception: as to C.B.'s unlawful seizure claim, I concur in the result reached by Judge Paez but would reach that result via different reasoning. As to the seizure issue, the reliance on New Jersey v. T.L.O, 469 U.S. 325 (1985), in the three other opinions in this case is, in my view, entirely beside the point. The police officer defendants have consistently maintained that they seized C.B. because they had reasonable cause to believe he was a child covered by California Welfare and Institutions Code section 601(a). But section 601(a) does not cover C.B.'s circumstance, nor could a reasonable police officer have thought it did. As the defendants have never suggested that they could, or did, seize C.B. to enforce the school's own rules and disciplinary needs, we should be reviewing their actual defense, not manufacturing one for them. . . We are reviewing a judgment entered after a jury trial. Over the course of that trial, the police officers repeatedly explained that they took C.B. into custody pursuant to the Welfare and Institutions Code. . . .Simply put, the police officers are defending against C.B.'s allegations on the ground that they behaved as law enforcement officers, not school administrators or officials, when they arrested C.B. pursuant to their asserted statutory authority to do so. The officers do not purport to have been enforcing school disciplinary policies as agents of the school. We should not be evaluating the officers' seizure of C.B. by recourse to a justification that they neither offer as authority for their conduct nor endorse. . . The officers' sole contention, then, is that they had cause to take C.B. into custody because he was 'beyond the control of" his 'custodian' under section 601(a). They had no such cause for two reasons: (1) the school is not C.B.'s custodian, and (2) he was not 'beyond the control' of his parents, guardian, or custodian. . . . In sum, section 601(a) has not been applied to include and does not include a single act of defiance of school officials. The officers simply had no cause to take C.B. into custody under this provision. . . Nor does qualified immunity insulate the officers from C.B.'s Fourth Amendment claims. . . . By 2008, the law was clearly established that the constitution requires police officers to have some legal cause to take children into custody. . . .In short, there was no cause, probable, reasonable, or otherwise, to take C.B. into temporary custody under section 601, and no reasonable officer could have believed otherwise.")

Gonzalez v. City of Anaheim, 747 F.3d 789, 794-97 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) ("The key issue in this case is whether a reasonable jury would necessarily find that Wyatt perceived an immediate threat of death or serious physical injury at the time he shot Gonzalez in the head. . . That requires us to consider exactly what was happening when the shot was fired. . . . The dispute in this case concerns the relevant set of facts, in particular whether the minivan had violently accelerated and was moving at a high rate of speed. That remains a question of fact for the jury, as to which we must draw all inferences in favor of the nonmoving party at the summary judgment stage. . . . [T]he existence of an immediate threat to safety in this case is based on the sudden acceleration and speed of the van. Gonzalez's action could not have presented a threat sufficient to justify the use of deadly force unless it caused the car to move in a way that immediately threatened the safety of the officers or the public. The defendants did not argue that such a threat was posed if the minivan was actually going only 3 to 7 miles per hour. They argued that '[t]he undisputed evidence is that decedent was speeding down the street going approximately 40 to 50 MPH with Officer Wyatt trapped inside the van.' If that were true, we agree that summary judgment in favor of defendants would be appropriate, as the primary dissenting opinion contends. There was a genuine dispute about that fact, however, based on Wyatt's own testimony. This case is about the standard for summary judgment, not whether law enforcement officers face danger and are permitted to use deadly force when faced with an immediate threat to safety. . . . Similarly, a jury could find that Wyatt reasonably perceived a threat, but not one that justified the immediate use of deadly force. As noted above, the jury may consider the availability of other methods to subdue a suspect. Wyatt had a police baton, pepper spray, and a taser. He could have used any of them, or he could have shot Gonzalez in a nonlethal area of the body to try to stop him from driving further. Instead, he used his gun and intentionally shot Gonzalez in the head. If the jury found that the car was moving slowly at the time, it could also find that other alternatives could have been used and that the use of deadly force was unreasonable. . .A jury could also find that Wyatt failed to give a warning before he shot Gonzalez in the head. The absence of a warning does not necessarily mean that Wyatt's use of deadly force was unreasonable. . . A rational jury may find, however, that if the car was moving at an average speed of 3 to 7 miles per hour, a warning was practicable and the failure to give one might weigh against reasonableness. . . We do not hold that a reasonable jury must find in favor of the plaintiffs on this record, only that it could. The jury could also reasonably find, to the contrary, that the minivan was moving dangerously fast and that Wyatt reasonably perceived an immediate threat to his safety sufficient to support the use of deadly force. Other factors identified in Graham would support a verdict in favor of the defendants here, as well. By the time Wyatt pulled the trigger, the crimes at issue were relatively severe and Gonzalez was plainly resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight. . . But based on the record before us, we cannot say that a verdict in favor of the defendants on the claim for excessive force is the only conclusion that a reasonable jury could reach.")

Gonzalez v. City of Anaheim, 747 F.3d 789, 798-801, 809-12 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) (Trott, J., with whom Kozinski, C.J., and Tallman and Bea, JJ., join dissenting in part and concurring in part) ("The issue here is different from our usual two-part fare in Fourth Amendment excessive force litigation. Officers Wyatt and Ellis do not request qualified immunity under prong two of the Saucier v. Katz, Pearson v. Callahan test on the ground that what they did had not been clearly established to be a violation of the excessive force prohibition of the Fourth Amendment. When questioned during oral argument why his clients were not asking for qualified immunity, counsel pointed out that the summary judgment threshold issue under either approach—which we call 'prong one' in judicial short form—is the same, i.e., whether '[t]aken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, do the facts alleged show the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right?'. . . If not, the question of immunity becomes moot. . . Focusing on prong one, these officers maintain that the law covering their actions was established twenty five years ago; and pursuant to that established law, what they did shortly after midnight on September 25, 2009, was objectively reasonable and therefore constitutional. The Supreme Court law they relied on as to their encounter with Gonzalez is this: when faced with a suspect who is resisting arrest and attempting to evade apprehension by flight from serious crimes under circumstances that pose an immediate threat to their safety or the safety of others, police officers may use deadly force to protect themselves and the public at large. . . .The threshold question at the summary judgment stage of whether or not an officer's actions were objectively reasonable under the Fourth Amendment is 'a pure question of law,' not a question of fact reserved for a jury. . . Included in this 'pure question of law' is whether a suspect's actions have risen to a level warranting deadly force. . . In handing down this ruling, the Scott Court explicitly rejected Justice Stevens's dissenting view that the objective reasonableness of an officer's actions should always be a question for the jury. . . The status of this threshold issue as 'a pure question of law' makes it all the more important that what we say about it can be relied upon by those who must act accordingly in the field. Fair warning is sine qua non of a rule when it applies to officers who must react quickly in tense situations. . . . In summary starting with the three Graham factors, I conclude that the facts in the record compel one conclusion, and only one conclusion a jury could reach: Officer Wyatt's use of deadly force to stop Gonzalez's behavior was objectively reasonable. First, Officer Wyatt was 'confronted with a serious crime,' indeed multiple crimes. Second, Gonzalez posed 'an immediate threat' to Officer Wyatt's safety and to the safety of others. Third, Gonzalez was 'actively resisting arrest' and attempting to evade arrest by flight. I cannot envision any scenario wherein this case might survive a motion for judgment as a matter of law pursuant to Rule 50(a)(B). . . .The 'factual dispute' my colleagues in the majority see as 'material' is the speed Gonzalez was driving when Officer Wyatt shot him. Because the only summary judgment disputes that matter are those that are 'material,' I disagree. The actual or the estimated speed of the van at the moment of the shooting is not material. Neither is the 'average speed' of an accelerating vehicle in flight from the police. What is material is that Gonzalez suddenly accelerated his van away from the traffic stop with Officer Wyatt trapped inside and traveled for a block before it crashed. Who cares how fast the van was going? Gonzalez's representatives admit that Gonzalez unexpectedly tried to flee without warning, and that when Officer Wyatt tried to stop him, Gonzalez physically fought him off. I do not comprehend how this constellation of facts fails to demonstrate a real threat of impending harm to Officer Wyatt, as well as to members of the public. In an unconvincing attempt to make this dispute over speed 'material,' the majority unwittingly engages in exactly the type of rear-view-mirror microanalysis the Supreme Court has told us to eschew. The majority has converted Officer Wyatt's precarious ten-second episode in Gonzalez's van into an ex post facto exercise in calculus, the world of the derivative and the integral. They impose a new duty on police officers: when you are in a zone of immediate danger involving a moving vehicle in which you are being kidnaped, you must calculate the speed of the vehicle as you try to turn off the ignition and to disengage the gearshift. Then, you must refrain from using deadly force until the vehicle speeds up to a point where a crash will surely threaten your life (or have the presence of mind to try something else). At that point, the use of deadly force too late will not only disable the driver, but probably you, too. And let us not forget, the majority thinks it would be nice if you would give one more warning before you shoot. . . .Next, we get to the majority's should-have-shot-the-gun-out-of-his-hand suggestion, which comes from Hollywood westerns, certainly not from the streets of our cities. . . .The majority says Officer Wyatt could have used a baton, pepper spray, or maybe a Taser. The record does not contain a shred of evidence that such methods would have been effective—to the contrary. To speculate that such methods would have safely ended the chase disregards the officers' escalating reasonable use of nonlethal force against Gonzalez, hitting him with their fists, trying to put him in a carotid hold, and striking him with a flashlight, but nothing worked. Officer Wyatt warned him that he would be shot if he continued to display dangerous behavior, but even a threat of that magnitude did not register. Officer Wyatt ordered him to stop the van. Verbal commands and warnings had no effect. Under these circumstances, giving him another warning was neither feasible nor required, nor would it have caused Gonzalez to stop. He was determined, albeit foolishly, to try to escape."). [footnotes omitted]

Gonzalez v. City of Anaheim, 747 F.3d 789, 814 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) (Kozinski, CJ., with whom Trott, Tallman and Bea, JJ., join, dissenting) ("It's undisputed that, at the time he fired the fatal shot, Officer Wyatt was trapped inside a moving vehicle driven by a man who had resisted the verbal commands, physical restraints, lethal threats and bodily force of two uniformed officers. How fast the van was moving and how far it had traveled are beside the point. What matters is that Officer Wyatt was prisoner in a vehicle controlled by someone who had already committed several dangerous felonies. No sane officer in Wyatt's situation would have acted any differently, and no reasonable jury will hold him liable. The only thing this remand will accomplish is to give plaintiffs a bludgeon with which to extort a hefty settlement. The Supreme Court should foil the plan with a swift summary reversal.")

Lal v. California, 746 F.3d 1112, 1117, 1118 (9th Cir. 2014) ("Plaintiffs admit that Lal was holding a football-sized rock over his head when he continued to advance toward Officers Newman and Otterby, who shot him when he was about a yard away. In light of Lal's prior actions—the high speed chase, hitting himself with a stone, throwing rocks at the officers—the officers reasonably believed that Lal would heave the rock at them. Indeed, Plaintiffs do not really argue otherwise. Instead, they argue that the officers should have retreated or that they somehow should have defused the situation before Lal started advancing. These contentions are not factually or legally persuasive. The confrontation was in a ditch alongside a freeway, and the officers could hardly allow Lal to proceed on foot onto the freeway. Nor could they have allowed Lal to remain in his truck and reenter the freeway, for Lal's wish to commit suicide would have endangered the lives of others, as well as his own. Indeed, the officers were exploring alternate methods of dealing with Lal, attempting to continue the engagement with Lal until the K–9 unit arrived. But Lal forced the issue by advancing on the officers. By the time that Lal, contrary to the officer's commands, advanced to within seven or eight feet of the officers, thereby creating a reasonable fear of imminent serious physical harm, spraying Lal with pepper spray would not have stopped Lal from hurling the rock at the officers. The fact that Lal was intent on 'suicide by cop' did not mean that the officers had to endanger their own lives by allowing Lal to continue in his dangerous course of conduct. . . . Together, Scott and Reynolds prevent a plaintiff from avoiding summary judgment by simply producing an expert's report that an officer's conduct leading up to a deadly confrontation was imprudent, inappropriate, or even reckless. Rather, the court must decide as a matter of law 'whether a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was justified.'. .In the case at bar, there is no suggestion that the officers intentionally provoked Lal. Rather, the totality of the circumstances shows that they were patient. They allowed Lal to lead them on a 45–minute high-speed chase, during which they tried to talk him into surrendering, and when he got out of the truck, they were willing to give him time to cool off. Instead, it was Lal who forced the confrontation. Thus, even assuming that it might have been possible for the officers to have given Lal a wider berth, under our opinion in Billington, there is no requirement that such an alternative be explored. A police officer's immunity does not become less if his assailant is motivated to commit 'suicide by cop.'")

George v. Morris, 736 F.3d 829, 835-39 (9th Cir. 2013) (amended opinion, denying reh'g and reh'g en banc) ("Because this inquiry, under Scott v. Henrich and its progeny, concerns genuineness—namely 'the question whether there is enough evidence in the record for a jury to conclude that certain facts are true'—we may not decide at this interlocutory stage if the district court properly performed it. . .The dissent, however, would have us effectively cast off the interlocutory-review framework. . . It tells us we may do so under the banner of Scott v. Harris, a case in which not a single Justice of the Supreme Court 'discussed the limits of the collateral order doctrine in qualified immunity cases' or even cited the Court's prior authorities on the subject. . . Even accepting for the sake of argument, though, that Scott v. Harris is meant to establish an exception to the rules for interlocutory review, the dissent does not fit within that case's terms either. It points to no videotape, audio recording, or similarly dispositive evidence that 'blatantly contradict[s]' or 'utterly discredit[s]' Carol's side of the story. . .Our decision not to assume Scott v. Harris implicitly abrogated a line of precedent also accords with the Supreme Court's later guidance. In a more recent section 1983 case, the Court reaffirmed that 'immediate appeal from the denial of summary judgment on a qualified immunity plea is available when the appeal presents a "purely legal issue."' [citing Ortiz v. Jordan] Thus, in this appeal, we are confined to the question of 'whether the defendant[s] would be entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law, assuming all factual disputes are resolved, and all reasonable inferences are drawn, in plaintiff's favor.'. . .The deputies' appeal touches on two questions of qualified immunity. First, the deputies claim the shooting did not violate the Constitution. Second, they assert that even if Donald's Fourth Amendment rights were violated, they did not violate law clearly established at the time they acted. . . Usually we can start with the second prong of qualified immunity if we think it advantageous. . . Here, though, we are not satisfied that the deputies have adequately pursued that argument. . . .We need not definitely decide, however, whether they waived the argument at the district court. On appeal, the deputies have not advanced an argument as to why the law is not clearly established that takes the facts in the light most favorable to Carol. . . . As to whether the deputies violated the Fourth Amendment, two Supreme Court decisions chart the general terrain.[discussing Graham and Garner]. . . . In Glenn v. Washington County, we found that in a 911 scenario without flight or an alleged crime, the officers' decision to shoot an individual holding a pocket knife, 'which he did not brandish at anyone,' violated the Constitution. . . Reviewing Long and Scott, we explained that the fact that the 'suspect was armed with a deadly weapon' does not render the officers' response per se reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . This is not to say that the Fourth Amendment always requires officers to delay their fire until a suspect turns his weapon on them. If the person is armed—or reasonably suspected of being armed—a furtive movement, harrowing gesture, or serious verbal threat might create an immediate threat. On this interlocutory appeal, though, we can neither credit the deputies' testimony that Donald turned and pointed his gun at them, nor assume that he took other actions that would have been objectively threatening. Given that version of events, a reasonable fact-finder could conclude that the deputies' use of force was constitutionally excessive. Contrary to the dissent's charge, we are clear-eyed about the potentially volatile and dangerous situation these deputies confronted. Yet, we cannot say they assuredly stayed within constitutional bounds without knowing '[w]hat happened at the rear of the George residence during the [four minutes between when] Mr. George walked out into the open on his patio and the fatal shot.'. . That is, indeed, 'the core issue in this case.'. . . Today's holding should be unsurprising. If the deputies indeed shot the sixty-four-year-old decedent without objective provocation while he used his walker, with his gun trained on the ground, then a reasonable jury could determine that they violated the Fourth Amendment.")

Johnson v. Bay Area Rapid Transit Dist., 724 F.3d 1159, 1170, 1180 (9th Cir. 2013) ("We construe the facts, overwhelming or otherwise, in Grant's father's favor and ask whether the district court properly denied Mehserle immunity on the basis of those facts. As recounted above, before the district court was evidence that: Grant struggled with Mehserle and Pirone because they were preventing him from breathing; Grant was adequately subdued before Mehserle shot him; Pirone was surprised by Mehserle's command that he stand back (because Pirone thought Grant was adequately subdued); and Grant's hands were behind his back when Mehserle shot him. . . In light of these and other facts, which Mehserle disputes, the district court concluded that 'there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Mehserle's actions were required by a legitimate law enforcement purpose....' We do not disturb that conclusion, Johnson, 515 U.S. at 314, and agree that given the factual dispute before it, which must be resolved by a jury, the district court could not have properly granted Mehserle qualified immunity. Accordingly, and correctly, it did not. . . . Our society vests law enforcement officers with the authority to carry and use weapons and tactics that may injure, sometimes fatally, people they suspect of committing crimes. Officers are given a degree of responsibility concomitant with that grave authority, with the expectation that they will exercise it discerningly. Because of that expectation, the doctrine of qualified immunity dictates that courts will not substitute their judgment for the officers' own in evaluating the officers' reactions to novel and dangerous situations. But none of that means we abandon our expectation that the police will discharge their duties professionally and responsibly. Bearing that expectation in mind, we are presented with the plaintiffs' account of facts in which one officer, Pirone, responded to a call regarding a misdemeanor scrape on a train—which concluded before he arrived—by pulling a weapon [Taser] on a group of men who were standing around talking. Pirone sought to intimidate the group, which he assumed may have been responsible for the fight. Pirone then sought out two of the men who walked away from him by pacing the platform and screaming profanities in his search for them. The men were all handcuffed and held overnight—but never charged with a crime—after another officer, Mehserle, shot and killed one among them. It is possible that a jury will conclude, after weighing all the facts, that the officers committed no constitutional wrongs. But our task at this stage in the litigation is not to attempt to weigh the facts and resolve the issues definitively in favor of one party or another. It is instead to construe the facts in the manner most favorable to the plaintiffs, who have a right to their day in court, and then ask if our solicitude of the judgment of law enforcement in this case requires us to shield the officers from further participation in this lawsuit. . . Construing the facts in the plaintiffs' favor, we agree largely with the district court that the officers should stand trial for the constitutional violations of which they are accused.")

Barnard v. Theobald, 721 F.3d 1069, 1076 (9th Cir. 2013) ("Here, the jury found—by special interrogatory—that all of the Officers in this case used an unreasonable amount of force against Charles. . . . At bottom, the Officers claim that if Charles was actually resisting, or if the Officers could have reasonably believed that he was resisting, then the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . The Officers are simply mistaken in their understanding of the law. Resistance, or the reasonable perception of resistance, does not entitle police officers to use any amount of force to restrain a suspect. . . . Here, the jury concluded that the amount of force used by the Officers was unreasonable, even in light of their mistaken belief that Charles was resisting.")

Furnace v. Sullivan, 705 F.3d 1021, 1027-30 (9th Cir. 2013) ("Prison regulations are drafted to further institutional safety and other prudential considerations, rather than being drawn to perfectly trace the contours of prisoners' constitutional rights. Accordingly, they are not wholly descriptive of the extent of those rights. However, in Hope, for example, the Supreme Court looked to rules promulgated by the Alabama Department of Corrections to aid it in determining whether a prison guard was on notice of constitutional limitations on the use of force. . . Here, OP 29 bears directly on the situation that the officers confronted, and is therefore relevant to determining whether the officers could have thought their conduct was reasonable and lawful. . . . [W]e conclude that it is not clear that the application of force was required under Furnace's version of the facts because Morales could have, as SVSP's OP 29 prescribes, simply ordered Furnace to remove his fingers from the food port rather than immediately discharging pepper spray on him. OP 29 directs correctional officers to 'issue a warning that chemical agents will be used' likely because 'the threat of the use of mace, except in a few instances, brings about compliance and in most instances, avoids any necessity of physical force.'. . . The officers are entitled to qualified immunity for 'reasonable, but mistaken, beliefs as to the facts establishing the existence of ... exigent circumstances,'. . . and the district court granted qualified immunity on summary judgment largely on this premise. However, Furnace's resting his fingers on the port appears less threatening than the situation described by OP 29, where an inmate "refuses to relinquish control of the food port, despite the warning." We therefore disagree with the district court's conclusion that Furnace's actions, as he describes them, were reasonably perceived as an exigency that justified deviation from OP 29 and justified discharging pepper spray at Furnace without warning. . . .Applying the Hudson factors to the facts as Furnace alleges them, we find that a significant amount of force was employed without significant provocation from Furnace or warning from the officers. We therefore conclude that qualified immunity was inappropriately granted at the summary judgment phase of this litigation. . . . We caution that we do not mean to suggest that any and every deviation from prison policy automatically jeopardizes a correctional officer's entitlement to qualified immunity. . . . However, barring urgency or exigent circumstances, that important interest is less compelling when the appropriate response to a situation has been prescribed by the prison's own written policies.")

Marquez v. City of Phoenix, 693 F.3d 1167, 1175, 1176 n.8 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Here the relevant factors favor a finding that this use of force was reasonable. Once Roper and Guliano traversed Ronald's barricade, they were greeted by a blood-spattered room, an injured adult, and a child in evident distress. This alone was cause to believe that at least one serious crime had occurred. As a result, this case is easily distinguished from the only instance in which we have found the use of an electronic control device to be unreasonable-where officers deployed the device in 'probe mode' against two unarmed women, who had committed (at most) minor infractions and who were not actively resisting arrest. Mattos, 661 F.3d at 445. It also renders inapposite those cases in which police are summoned to protect mentally disturbed individuals from themselves. See, e.g., Drummond, 343 F.3d at 1058. . . . [A]lthough the officers used significant force in this case, it was justified by the considerable government interests at stake. . . . Because we conclude that there was no constitutional violation here, we need not reach the district court's alternative conclusion that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because any violation of the Fourth Amendment was not clearly established at the time of the incident. . . We do note, however, our recent discussion in Mattos. As that case makes clear, as late as 2006 there was no case law even suggesting—let alone clearly establishing—that the use of an electronic control device on an individual suspected of domestic violence who was actively resisting arrest violated the Constitution. . . While this incident occurred several months later, there were no intervening legal developments, which would have placed any possible violation that occurred in this case 'beyond debate.'. . See generally Cockrell v. City of Cincinnati, 2012 U.S.App. Lexis 3787, *11 (6th Cir.2012) (unpublished) (collecting cases and concluding that as of 2009 courts had granted qualified immunity whenever "plaintiffs [were] tased while actively resisting arrest by physically struggling with, threatening, or disobeying officers").

Marquez v. City of Phoenix, 693 F.3d 1167, 1180 (9th Cir. 2012) (Schroeder, J., dissenting in part) ("I agree with the majority that TASER adequately warned that repeated shocks in stressful situations could lead to death. I therefore disagree with the majority's holding that the force was not deadly. Because there was no established law on the point at the time of Ronald's death, however, I concur in the result on the federal claim discussed in Part III of the majority opinion. The officers were entitled to qualified immunity. See Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 452 (9th Cir.2011) (en banc).")

Nelson v. City of Davis, 685 F.3d 867, 884-87 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Defendants correctly note that there is no binding precedent that has specifically addressed the use of pepperball projectiles. As we have previously held, however, '[a]n officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the ground[ ] that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury.'. . Pepperball projectiles, while a relatively new means of applying both pepper spray and concussive force to the target, merely combine two types of force that we have already recognized as unreasonable when aimed at individuals who pose no threat and have committed, at most, minor offenses. . . In the cases in which we have held that the unreasonable application of a new form of force was not clearly established, our holdings were premised on the fact that these particular methods represented novel means of applying pain. [collecting cases] Although the pepperball projectile is a relatively new mechanism by which a combination of concussive impact and chemical irritants can be applied to individuals by law enforcement, the type of pain inflicted is the same or greater than that caused by weapons that this court has already recognized constitute excessive force when applied individually under similar circumstances. Thus, just as our prior cases provided notice to all reasonable officers that targeting Nelson and his group with a projectile weapon with concussive force that could cause serious physical injury or targeting them with pepper spray was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment, our precedents make it equally clear that utilizing a weapon against Nelson's group that combined both of these forms of force amounted to a constitutional violation. . . . In light of our holding in Deorle, a reasonable officer would have known that firing projectiles, including pepperballs, in the direction of individuals suspected of, at most, minor crimes, who posed no threat to the officers or others, and who engaged in only passive resistance, was unreasonable. . . . Under the factual circumstances present in this case, a reasonable officer would have been on notice that both the firing of a projectile that risked causing serious harm, in the direction of non-threatening individuals who had committed at most minor misdemeanors, and the release of pepper spray in the area occupied by those individuals, would constitute unreasonable force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The defendants contend that a consideration of the larger context in which the force was used compels a different conclusion. They are correct that the context of the officers' actions must be considered, and indeed in reaching our conclusion, we have taken into account the particular circumstances in which the use of force occurred on Picnic Day at U.C. Davis. We must nonetheless conclude that the unreasonableness of their conduct would have been known to any reasonable officers. Although the officers used force against Nelson and his group during their attempt to disperse a crowd, there was no exigency motivating the officers' actions and they were aware at the time of the shooting that they were using force that might lead to serious injury against non-threatening individuals who had committed no serious crime. . . . We hold that a reasonable officer should have known that the firing of the pepperball gun towards Nelson and his friends, given the minimal governmental interests at stake, was in violation of Nelson's clearly established Fourth Amendment right, even when that force was applied in the larger context of crowd dispersal.")

Glenn v. Washington County, 673 F.3d 864, 872, 877-80 (9th Cir. 2011) (denying reh'g en banc and amending prior opinion) ("Although Graham does not specifically identify as a relevant factor whether the suspect poses a threat to himself, we assume that the officers could have used some reasonable level of force to try to prevent Lukus from taking a suicidal act. But we are aware of no published cases holding it reasonable to use a significant amount of force to try to stop someone from attempting suicide. Indeed, it would be odd to permit officers to use force capable of causing serious injury or death in an effort to prevent the possibility that an individual might attempt to harm only himself. We do not rule out that in some circumstances some force might be warranted to prevent suicide, but in cases like this one the 'solution; could be worse than the problem. On the facts presented here, viewed favorably to the plaintiff, the officers' use of force was not undisputably reasonable. The district court also held that the officers were justified in shooting Lukus with the beanbag gun because he posed an immediate threat to officers and bystanders. In coming to this conclusion, the district court relied primarily on Lukus' possession of a knife. Although there is no question this is an important consideration, it too is not dispositive. Rather, courts must consider 'the totality of the facts and circumstances in the particular case'; otherwise, that a person was armed would always end the inquiry. . . . The district court cited several reasons the defendants offered for their decision to use a beanbag shotgun rather than a taser, such as that Lukus' position and distance relative to the officers would have made firing the taser difficult. But there was conflicting evidence on these points, so on summary judgment we must assume that a taser would have been a feasible option. Although a jury could ultimately disagree that the officers were in optimal taser range or that use of a taser was otherwise feasible or preferable, these are disputed questions of fact. . . . Balancing these various considerations, we hold that the district court erred in granting summary judgment on the constitutionality of the officers' use of force. We recognize that the officers have offered evidence that could support a verdict in their favor. A jury could view the facts as the district court did, and likewise reach the conclusion that the officers' use of force was reasonable. But on summary judgment, the district court is not permitted to act as a factfinder. The circumstances of this case can be viewed in various ways, and a jury should have the opportunity to assess the reasonableness of the force used after hearing all the evidence. . . .As the district court recognized, "the officers' decision to employ the beanbag gun is critical to the resolution of" the reasonableness of the lethal force as well '[b]ecause the use of less-lethal force precipitated the use of deadly force.'. . . Because there is a triable issue of whether shooting Lukus with the beanbag shotgun was itself excessive force, under Billington there is also a question regarding the subsequent use of deadly force. Even assuming, as the district court concluded, that deadly force was a reasonable response to Lukus' movement toward the house, a jury could find that the beanbag shots provoked Lukus' movement and thereby precipitated the use of lethal force. If jurors conclude that the provocation–the use of the beanbag shotgun–was an independent Fourth Amendment violation, the officers 'may be held liable for [their] otherwise defensive use of deadly force.'. . Even if the jury determines that the use of 'less-lethal' force was justifiable, however, the question still remains whether escalating so quickly to deadly force was warranted. The critical issue is whether Lukus posed an immediate safety risk to others. . . . Even before the final beanbag round was fired, the officers began firing a total of 11 shots at Lukus, eight of which struck him, causing him to bleed to death on his grandmother's porch within minutes. . . . As with the use of beanbags, there are material questions of fact about Lukus' and the officers' actions that preclude a conclusion that the officers' rapid resort to deadly force was reasonable as a matter of law. Again, the disputed facts and inferences could support a verdict for either party, and the jury must resolve these factual disputes. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's summary judgment on the use of lethal force.")

Young v. County of Los Angeles, 655 F.3d 1156, 1160, 1162, 1163, 1165-68 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Both pepper spray and baton blows are forms of force capable of inflicting significant pain and causing serious injury. As such, both are regarded as 'intermediate force' that, while less severe than deadly force, nonetheless present a significant intrusion upon an individual's liberty interests. . . . In pepper spraying Young and striking at him multiple times with a baton while landing at least two blows, Wells used a significant amount of two forms of intermediate force known to cause serious pain and to lead in some cases to serious physiological consequences. Whatever such force is ultimately labeled, there is no question that its use against an individual is a sufficiently serious intrusion upon liberty that it must be justified by a commensurately serious state interest. . . .When, as here, a suspect's disobedience of a police officer takes the form of passive noncompliance that creates a minimal disturbance and indicates no threat, immediate or otherwise, to the officer or others, it will not, without more, give rise to a governmental interest in the use of significant force. Because neither of Young's suspected offenses indicated that he posed a danger to Wells or the public such that there would be a heightened interest in the use of force to subdue him, the 'severity of the crime at issue' weighs against a finding that the government had an interest in the use of significant force. . . .Having determined that the force allegedly used against Young was significant and that the governmental interest in the use of that force minimal, we conclude that, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Young, the force used by Wells was excessive in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Our conclusion comports with the logical notion that it is rarely necessary, if ever, for a police officer to employ substantial force without warning against an individual who is suspected only of minor offenses, is not resisting arrest, and, most important, does not pose any apparent threat to officer or public safety. . . . The legal principles that dictate our conclusion that the force involved was excessive were clearly established and indeed, long-standing, prior to 2007, the time of the use of force at issue in this case. . . .The principle that it is unreasonable to use significant force against a suspect who was suspected of a minor crime, posed no apparent threat to officer safety, and could be found not to have resisted arrest, was thus well-established in 2001, years before the events at issue in this case. Just as in Blankenhorn, these well-established principles of Fourth Amendment law sufficed to put Wells on notice that the force used was excessive–that to pepper spray an individual and strike him with a baton for disobeying a traffic officer's order to get back in his car (and sitting instead on the curb eating his broccoli) constituted a violation of the Fourth Amendment.")

Torres v. City of Madera, 648 F.3d 1119, 1124, 1127-30 (9th Cir. 2011) ("The question that confronts us now is whether Officer Noriega's conduct in mistakenly applying deadly force to Everardo was objectively unreasonable under the totality of the circumstances. . . . [I]f Officer Noriega knew or should have known that the weapon she held was a Glock rather than a Taser, and thus had been aware that she was about to discharge deadly force on an unarmed, non-fleeing arrestee who did not pose a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to others, then her application of that force was unreasonable. . . . Taking into account all the facts and circumstances facing Officer Noriega at the time of the mistaken shooting, a reasonable jury could find that her mistake was unreasonable because her own prior incidents of weapon confusion put her on notice of the risk of repetition, her daily practice drawing weapons at her sergeant's instruction equipped her with the training to avoid such incidents, and the non-exigent circumstances surrounding Everardo's deadly shooting did not warrant such hasty conduct heightening the risk of weapon error. . . . [I]f a jury were to find Officer Noriega's mistaken belief that she was holding her Taser rather than her Glock unreasonable, her use of force in this situation was excessive and violated Everardo's Fourth Amendment rights. Because there remain material factual issues in dispute on which a jury could make such a finding, the Torres Family has properly alleged the violation of a constitutional right, and summary judgment based on failure to do so was improper. . . . While the constitutional violation prong concerns the reasonableness of the officer's mistake of fact, the clearly established prong concerns the reasonableness of the officer's mistake of law. . . . Thus, for purposes of determining whether Officer Noriega is entitled to qualified immunity under Saucier's second prong, we assume she 'correctly perceived all of the relevant facts' and ask whether an officer could have reasonably believed at the time that the force actually used was lawful under the circumstances. . . . [This is a case where the suspect was already arrested, handcuffed, and in the back seat of a patrol car. There is no suggestion that Everardo was armed, that he was fleeing, or that he posed a threat to any officers or anyone else. While locating the outer contours of the Fourth Amendment may at times be a murky business, few things in our case law are as clearly established as the principle that an officer may not 'seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead' in the absence of 'probable cause to believe that the [fleeing] suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.'. . Officer Noriega applied deadly force to an unarmed, nondangerous suspect, and there could be no reasonable mistake that this use of force was proscribed by law. . . . Jensen and Wilkins are materially indistinguishable from this case for purposes of qualified immunity. Although those two cases involved mistakes of identity, whereas here we deal with a mistake of weapon, we have never required a prior case 'on all fours prohibiting that particular manifestation of unconstitutional conduct' to find a right 'clearly established.'. . . Were we to require such granular specificity under the second Saucier prong, we would effectively wrench of all meaning the Supreme Court's admonition that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . While the test of whether a right is 'clearly established' must not be so broad that the important shield of qualified immunity is rendered meaningless, . . . nor can it be so narrow that the immunity is transformed from one 'qualified' in nature to one absolute. . . . While a jury might ultimately find Officer Noriega's mistake of weapon to have been reasonable, it was inappropriate for the district court to reach this conclusion in the face of material disputes of fact. At this stage of the proceeding, Officer Noriega has not shown an entitlement to qualified immunity, and summary judgment was therefore improperly granted.")

Torres v. City of Madera, 648 F.3d 1119, 1130 (9th Cir. 2011) (Siler, J., concurring) ("I concur in the majority opinion herein. However, because I was on the original panel in the Fourth Circuit in Henry v. Purnell, 619 F.3d 323 (4th Cir.2010), vacated and superceded by Henry v. Purnell, __ F.3d __, 2011 WL 2725816 (4th Cir. July 14, 2011) (en banc), I should explain why I agreed in Henry that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity, but the officer in this case does not have that protection. . . . In my opinion, unlike the case law in the Fourth Circuit at the time of the conduct in Henry, the law in effect in the Ninth Circuit in this case was clearly established by Wilkins v. City of Oakland, 350 F.3d 949, 955 (9th Cir.2003), and Jensen v. City of Oxnard, 145 F.3d 1078, 1086 (9th Cir.1998). In both Wilkins and Jensen, it was a situation in which one officer shot another thinking the officer who was shot was someone else. Thus, both were situations in which the officer had a mistake of fact, thinking the victim was a criminal offender. Moreover, in the case at bar, the person who was killed, Torres, was already secured and in the police cruiser. In contrast, the circumstances were that Henry was not in custody but was being pursued on foot by Officer Purnell, who had an arrest warrant for Henry. The majority in Henry (en banc) found clearly established law from Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 3, 105 S.Ct. 1694, 85 L.Ed.2d 1 (1985), that an officer who shoots a fleeing suspect violates the suspect's Fourth Amendment rights if there was no probable cause to believe that the suspect posed a significant threat of death or physical injury to the officer or others. Id. Moreover, the majority in this case at bar suggests that Garner was the clearly established law at the time of the conduct in our case. I am not prepared to go that far, and I think we need not do so, because the precedent from Wilkins and Jensen clearly established the federal law for the Ninth Circuit to be followed in this case.")

Liberal v. Estrada, 632 F.3d 1064, 1078-82 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Because we hold that Officer Estrada's mistake of fact was not reasonable, he is not entitled to qualified immunity. Officer Estrada asks us to conclude that it is a reasonable mistake to believe that windows that are rolled down and that cannot be viewed at all are in fact rolled up and tinted. This we cannot do. . . . Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, we must assume that Officer Estrada could not have seen Plaintiff's front car windows at all and that, indeed, the two made eye contact through the open windows. That being so, it would not be reasonable for Officer Estrada to believe that he had seen illegally tinted front windows. The officer-defendants also argue that Officer Estrada had reasonable suspicion to stop and detain Plaintiff because the officer reasonably believed that Plaintiff was trying to avoid him by making several turns and then parking next to a dumpster in a darkened alley. . . .[E]ven if Officer Estrada reasonably suspected that Plaintiff was avoiding him, such noncooperation, without more, does not support a suspicion that Plaintiff was engaged in criminal activity. We therefore affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Officer Estrada for the initial traffic stop. . . . In this case, the use of force against Plaintiff occurred after he had complied with Officer Estrada's requests for his driver's license and registration. . . .There was no evidence to suggest that Plaintiff was either armed or dangerous. Construing the facts in favor of Plaintiff, the use of force was not reasonable and violated clearly established constitutional law. Therefore, Officers Estrada and Keegan are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Just because the required analysis in this case involves a fact-intensive determination of reasonableness, rather than application of a bright-line rule, does not mean that there are no situations in which clearly established constitutional violations can occur. The legal test for deciding whether the length of a detention was unreasonable in violation of the Fourth Amendment was clearly established at the time that the officers detained Plaintiff, and we apply it here. . . . In this case, Officer Estrada had checked Plaintiff's license with dispatch 36 seconds after the stop. . . . Plaintiff contends that he was detained not as part of an investigative stop, but for an 'attitude adjustment.' The facts, seen in the light most favorable to him, support that conclusion. . . . Prolonging a detention merely to engage in an 'exaggerated display[ ] of authority' is unreasonable and unconstitutional. . . . We therefore hold that an objectively reasonable officer responding to the scene of Plaintiff's detention would have known that its duration of 45 minutes without probable cause, during which the officers were not diligently pursuing their investigation was an unlawful detention of unreasonable duration in violation of clearly established Fourth Amendment law.")

Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805, 825-33 (9th Cir. 2010) (superseding opinon and denial of reh'g en banc) ("We, along with our sister circuits, have held that tasers and stun guns fall into the category of non-lethal force. . . Non-lethal, however, is not synonymous with non-excessive; all force–lethal and non-lethal–must be justified by the need for the specific level of force employed. . . Nor is 'non-lethal' a monolithic category of force. A blast of pepper spray and blows from a

baton are not necessarily constitutionally equivalent levels of force simply because both are classified as non-lethal. Rather than relying on broad characterizations, we must evaluate the nature of the specific force employed in a specific factual situation. . . . .We recognize the important role controlled electric devices like the Taser X26 can play in law enforcement. The ability to defuse a dangerous situation from a distance can obviate the need for more severe, or even deadly, force and thus can help protect police officers, bystanders, and suspects alike. We hold only that the X26 and similar devices when used in dart-mode constitute an intermediate, significant level of force that must be justified by the governmental interest involved. . . . Officer MacPherson relies heavily on the Eleventh Circuit opinion in Draper v. Reynolds, 369 F.3d 1270 (11th Cir.2004), which addressed the use of a taser during the arrest of an aggressive, argumentative individual. Although we do not adopt Draper as the law of this circuit, the present case is clearly distinguishable from the one before the Eleventh Circuit. . . . [T]he officer in Draper was confronting a belligerent, argumentative individual who was angrily pacing within feet of his position. Officer MacPherson, by contrast, was confronted with a half naked, unarmed, stationary, apparently disturbed individual shouting gibberish at a distance of approximately twenty feet. The only similarity to the factual circumstances in Draper is that both Draper and Bryan were stopped for a traffic violation, were loud, and were tasered by the police. . . . [T]here was no substantial government interest in using significant force to effect Bryan's arrest for these misdemeanor violations that even the State of California has determined are minor. . . . Officer MacPherson now argues that use of the taser was justified because he believed Bryan may have been mentally ill and thus subject to detention. To the contrary: if Officer MacPherson believed Bryan was mentally disturbed he should have made greater effort to take control of the situation through less intrusive means. . . . Thus, whether Officer MacPherson believed that Bryan had committed a variety of nonviolent misdemeanors or that Bryan was mentally ill, this Graham factor does not support the deployment of an intermediate level of force. . . . [W]e have held that police are 'required to consider A[w]hat other tactics if any were available" to effect the arrest.' Headwaters, 240 F.3d at 1204 (quoting Chew, 27 F.3d at 1443). . . . We do not challenge the settled principle that police officers need not employ the 'least intrusive' degree of force possible. . . . We merely recognize the equally settled principle that officers must consider less intrusive methods of effecting the arrest and that the presence of feasible alternatives is a factor to include in our analysis. . . . [W]hile by no means dispositive, that Officer MacPherson did not provide a warning before deploying the X26 and apparently did not consider less intrusive means of effecting Bryan's arrest factor significantly into our Graham analysis. . . . We thus conclude that the intermediate level of force employed by Officer MacPherson against Bryan was excessive in light of the governmental interests at stake. Bryan never attempted to flee. He was clearly unarmed and was standing, without advancing in any direction, next to his vehicle. Officer MacPherson was standing approximately twenty feet away observing Bryan's stationary, bizarre tantrum with his X26 drawn and charged. Consequently, the objective facts reveal a tense, but static, situation with Officer MacPherson ready to respond to any developments while awaiting back-up. Bryan was neither a flight risk, a dangerous felon, nor an immediate threat. Therefore, there was simply 'no immediate need to subdue [Bryan]' before Officer MacPherson's fellow officers arrived or less-invasive means were attempted. . . Officer MacPherson's desire to quickly and decisively end an unusual and tense situation is understandable. His chosen method for doing so violated Bryan's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. . . .All of the factors articulated in Graham–along with our recent applications of Graham in Deorle and Headwaters–placed Officer MacPherson on fair notice that an intermediate level of force was unjustified. . . . However, as of July 24, 2005, there was no Supreme Court decision or decision of our court addressing whether the use of a taser, such as the Taser X26, in dart mode constituted an intermediate level of force. Indeed, before that date, the only statement we had made regarding tasers in a published opinion was that they were among the 'variety of non-lethal "pain compliance" weapons used by police forces.'. . And, as the Eighth Circuit has noted, '[t]he Taser is a relatively new implement of force, and case law related to the Taser is developing.' Brown v. City of Golden Valley, 574 F.3d 491, 498 n. 5 (8th Cir.2009). Two other panels have recently, in cases involving different circumstances, concluded that the law regarding tasers is not sufficiently clearly established to warrant denying officers qualified immunity. Mattos v. Agarano, 590 F.3d 1082, 1089-90 (9th Cir.2010); Brooks v. City of Seattle, 599 F.3d 1018, 1031 n.18 (9th Cir.2010). Based on these recent statements regarding the use of tasers, and the dearth of prior authority, we must conclude that a reasonable officer in Officer MacPherson's position could have made a reasonable mistake of law regarding the constitutionality of the taser use in the circumstances Officer MacPherson confronted in July 2005. Accordingly, Officer MacPherson is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Byrd v. Maricopa County Sheriff's Dept, 629 F.3d 1125, 1146, 1147 (9th Cir. 2011) ("This litany of cases over the last thirty years has a recurring theme: cross-gender strip searches in the absence of an emergency violate an inmate's right under the Fourth Amendment to be free from unreasonable searches. Because the cross-gender nature of the search is a critical factor in the strip searches discussed in these cases, we cannot agree with our dissenting colleagues that the gender of the officer conducting the search is irrelevant. . . Interestingly, Maricopa County never challenged the precept that cross-gender strip searches are constitutionally infirm in the absence of an emergency. Rather, it painstakingly attempted to establish that the cross-gender search Byrd underwent was not a strip search. Indeed, Maricopa County's policy prohibits cross-gender strip searches. The admission implicit in Maricopa County's determined effort to avoid having the search characterized as a strip search, coupled with the nearly universal opprobrium expressed in the cases addressing cross-gender strip searches, reflects the extreme degree of unreasonableness presented by the facts of this case. . . In this case, the indignity of the non-emergency strip search conducted by an unidentified female cadet was compounded by the fact that there were onlookers, at least one of whom videotaped the humiliating event. For these reasons, we conclude that the cross-gender strip search, as conducted in this case, was unreasonable.")

Wilkinson v. Torres, 610 F.3d 546, 551-53 (9th Cir. 2010) ("Here, Torres did not violate a constitutional right. Even construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, a reasonable officer in Torres' position had probable cause to believe that Wilkinson posed an immediate threat to the safety of Key and himself. . . When he fired the shots, Torres was standing in a slippery yard with a minivan accelerating around him. The driver of the minivan had failed to yield to police sirens as well as to direct commands to put his hands up and to stop the vehicle. . . The minivan was accelerating, its tires were spinning, mud was flying up, and a fellow officer was nearby either lying fallen on the ground or standing but disoriented. The situation had quickly turned from one involving a crashed vehicle to one in which the driver of a moving vehicle, ignoring police commands, attempted to accelerate within close quarters of two officers on foot. In this 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' situation, a reasonable officer had probable cause to believe that the threat to safety justified the use of deadly force. . . . Because we conclude as a matter of law that deadly force was authorized to protect a fellow officer from harm, it makes no difference in this case whether Torres fired seven rounds or eleven. . . . Because we conclude that Torres did not violate a constitutional right, we need not reach the question of whether that right was clearly established.")

Wilkinson v. Torres, 610 F.3d 546, 555, 556 (9th Cir. 2010) (Marshall, District Court Judge, dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent on the ground that the majority today decides as a matter of law what I believe is a question of fact properly reserved for the jury. The reasonableness of an officer's use of excessive force pursuant to the Fourth Amendment is a fact-intensive inquiry for the jury, which if raised on summary judgment, must be evaluated in the light most favorable to the victim. . . Similarly, where the same disputed facts also give rise to both a Fourth Amendment claim and a Fourteenth Amendment 'purpose to harm' claim, material and triable issues of fact exist as to both. . . . I find we lack jurisdiction to review Torres's appeal that he is entitled to qualified immunity because there are material issues of fact in dispute. . . .If I were to accept jurisdiction of this case, I would nonetheless affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment.")

Espinosa v. City and County of San Francisco, 598 F.3d 528, 538, 539 (9th Cir. 2010) ("Where a police officer 'intentionally or recklessly provokes a violent confrontation, if the provocation is an independent Fourth Amendment violation, he may be held liable for his otherwise defensive use of deadly force.' Billington v. Smith, 292 F.3d 1177, 1189 (9th Cir.2002). If an officer intentionally or recklessly violates a suspect's constitutional rights, then the violation may be a provocation creating a situation in which force was necessary and such force would have been legal but for the initial violation. . .In this case, the district court did not err in finding that there are genuine issues of fact regarding whether the officers intentionally or recklessly provoked a confrontation with Sullivan. Evidence strongly suggests that the initial entry into the apartment by Officer Morgado violated Sullivan's Fourth Amendment rights. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, there is evidence that the illegal entry created a situation which led to the shooting and required the officers to use force that might have otherwise been reasonable. . . . Based on the foregoing, the district court properly denied the summary judgment motion regarding qualified immunity because defendants failed to show as a matter of law that they did not violate Sullivan's Fourth Amendment rights.").

Torres v. City of Madera, 524 F.3d 1053, 1054-57 & n.5 (9th Cir. 2008) ("In this interlocutory appeal, we face an issue remarkably similar on its facts to that faced by the Fourth Circuit in Henry v. Purnell, 501 F.3d 374 (4th Cir.2007). There, a deputy sheriff, intending to deploy a Taser device holstered near his firearm, instead drew and fired his service weapon, wounding a suspect fleeing arrest. Here, Madera City Police Officer Marcy Noriega . . . made the same mistake with even more tragic consequences: she shot and killed Everardo Torres ("Everardo"), an arrestee sitting handcuffed in the back of a patrol car. We conclude that Everardo was seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, and further conclude, as did our sister circuit, that the officer's mistake is governed by Fourth Amendment reasonableness analysis. . . . Madera argues that Everardo was not 'seized' by the firing of the Glock because the Glock was not a 'means intentionally applied,' Brower, 489 U.S. at 597. However, the Ninth Circuit employs a 'continuing seizure' rule, which provides that 'once a seizure has occurred, it continues throughout the time the arrestee is in the custody of the arresting officers.' . . Because Everardo was handcuffed and placed in the back of the patrol car, where he remained when Officer Noriega fired, Everardo remained 'in the custody of the arresting officers,' and the officers' conduct continued to be governed by the Fourth Amendment. Even though Everardo was 'seized' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, Officer Noriega can only be liable under Section 1983 if her conduct was unreasonable. . . .There is no question that Officer Noriega intended to draw her Taser but mistakenly drew her Glock. Faced with almost precisely the same situation–an officer's mistake in drawing his Glock when he intended to draw his Taser–the Fourth Circuit concluded that the relevant inquiry was whether the officer's mistake in using the Glock rather than the Taser was objectively unreasonable. . . . We agree that this is the appropriate inquiry. The Supreme Court has applied a reasonableness analysis to honest mistakes of fact in a variety of situations. . . Although Everardo was already 'seized' at the time of the shooting, it is Officer Noriega's mistaken use of her Glock–not the preceding acts of placing Everardo under arrest and handcuffing him–that the district court must examine for reasonableness. This is in keeping with our 'continuing seizure' cases, where our focus is on the aspect of the seizure the plaintiff alleges is 'unreasonable.' . . . Henry concluded, and we agree, that five factors were relevant to the reasonableness determination: (1) the nature of the training the officer had received to prevent incidents like this from happening; (2) whether the officer acted in accordance with that training; (3) whether following that training would have alerted the officer that he was holding a handgun; (4) whether the defendant's conduct heightened the officer's sense of danger; and (5) whether the defendant's conduct caused the officer to act with undue haste and inconsistently with that training. . . While these factors are relevant to the determination of whether Officer Noriega acted reasonably, we also stress that 'the calculus of reasonableness must embody allowance for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments.' . . Since the parties did not brief the issue of whether Officer Noriega's mistake was a reasonable one, the factual record is insufficiently developed for this court to make this determination, and we remand to the district court to determine in the first instance whether Noriega's conduct was unreasonable under Graham, 490 U.S. at 396-97, and to otherwise proceed with the matter. . . . Because we cannot resolve the reasonableness inquiry here, we cannot resolve whether Officer Noriega's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment–a question whose resolution is condition precedent to the qualified immunity determination. . . Of course, should the district court conclude that Officer Noriega acted unreasonably, Officer Noriega may nevertheless be entitled to qualified immunity if the objective unreasonableness of her conduct in the course of Everardo's seizure was not clearly established.").

Gregory v. County of Maui, 523 F.3d 1103, 1108, 1109 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Drummond is distinguishable from this case, even accepting that the officers here should have recognized that Gregory was 'emotionally distraught.' Unlike the police in Drummond, the officers here did not immediately use force upon encountering Gregory, but rather first attempted verbally to coax him into dropping the pen. Moreover, the officers had reason to believe that Gregory posed a threat to them, because he refused their requests, acted in an aggressive manner, and had already assaulted Finazzo. Further, Gregory had committed an underlying offense, a trespass. . . Finally, unlike Drummond, Gregory resisted the officers throughout the encounter, and the officers in this case ceased using force once Gregory was handcuffed. . . . Thus, even though 'the governmental interest in using such force is diminished by the fact that the officers [were] confronted ... with a mentally ill individual,' the undisputed facts show that the officers in this case reasonably used the minimal force necessary to disarm and to restrain Gregory, and that they ceased such force once the threat was neutralized.").

Lehman v. Robinson, 228 F. App'x 697, 699, 700 (9th Cir. 2007) ("Construed in the light most favorable to Lehman, the facts alleged are that defendant officers Robinson and Tygard shot and killed Lehman as he sat in his car, with all the tires shot out, surrounded by at least ten armed police officers and numerous police vehicles. Other officers on the scene had instructed all present to hold their fire, and defendants knew Lehman was not armed with a gun. Defendant Tygard testified that he knew Lehman did not have a gun, but only a pocket knife. Another officer present described the knife as 'a little folding knife.'. . . When viewed in the light most favorable to Lehman, the record suggests that Lehman had no readily available avenue of escape and was contained. Lehman was not suspected or accused of any crime. . . . When told to drop his knife and get back in his pickup truck, Lehman partially obeyed, by reentering the vehicle, but not dropping the knife. . . . At the point of the shooting, Lehman had been pepper sprayed and tasered, and at least partially subdued. The area had also been cleared of pedestrians. . . . In light of all of the facts, construed in the light most favorable to Lehman, when defendants shot and killed Lehman the situation did not require lethal force as confirmed by the testimony of multiple officers on the scene. Therefore, we conclude that defendants' use of force against Lehman was unreasonable and violated his Fourth Amendment right to be free of lethal force unless others' lives and safety are under immediate threat. In accordance with the second step of the Saucier framework, we consider whether the Fourth Amendment right prohibiting the use of deadly force except when the lives and safety of others are seriously imperiled was clearly established in 2002 when defendants shot and killed Lehman. . . . The cases cited by the defendant officers are all distinguishable in this respect. Unlike the suspect in Smith v. Freland, 954 F.2d 343, 344 (6th Cir.1992), who led police on a chase at speeds in excess of ninety miles per hour and who police believed may have been armed with a gun, Lehman could not travel anywhere quickly, as any reasonable officer could tell from the state of Lehman's completely flattened tires, and the officers had engaged in sufficient verbal negotiations to discern Lehman was armed only with a small knife. The district court distinguished in detail Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 125 S.Ct. 596, 160 L.Ed.2d 583 (2004), another case on which defendants rely; we agree with the district court's analysis and do not repeat it here. The district court's denial of qualified immunity to defendants

Robinson and Tygard is AFFIRMED."), cert. granted, 128 S. Ct. 1219 (2008) (judgment vacated and remanded in light of Scott v. Harris), aff'd on remand by Lehman v. Robinson, No. 05-15636, 2009 WL 2952165 (9th Cir. Sept. 16, 2009) ("("Because the video does not clearly contradict the version of events recounted by the plaintiffs, and for the reasons stated in our prior memorandum disposition, . . . the district court's denial of Robinson and Tygard's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity is AFFIRMED.").

Long v. City and County of Honolulu, 511 F.3d 901, 906, 907 (9th Cir. 2007) ("We hold that Officer Sterling's conduct meets the objective reasonableness standard. Prior to taking the fatal shot, Sterling had observed Long's agitated behavior, heard him threaten to shoot the police, observed him carrying a .22 caliber rifle, and knew that he had previously shot at a car full of people and wounded two people therein earlier that night. Under these circumstances, when fellow officers radioed that Long was yelling threats at them and then radioed that Long was shooting at them, Sterling had probable cause to believe that Long posed an immediate danger to these officers. In the exigent circumstances of the night, Sterling acted in an objectively reasonable manner. We are mindful that we must be wary of self-serving accounts by police officers when the only non-police eyewitness is dead. . . We note, however, that here, unlike the situation in Scott, we have the benefit of multiple eye witnesses and a CAD report that fairly accurately recorded the SWAT team's activities on the night of Long's death. Ms. Long's claims of factual error in the police accounts do not change our analysis. From the perspective of a reasonable officer in Sterling's position, it is immaterial whether Marini and Cannella jumped into the ditch at 4:47 or 4:52 a.m. Though a closer question, whether Long actually fired his rifle at these officers is also immaterial. It is enough that Sterling heard the radio transmission and observed Long point the rifle in the officers' direction. Accordingly, we hold that Officer Sterling did not violate Long's Fourth Amendment rights and that he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Tekle ex rel Tekle v. United States, 511 F.3d 839, 850 (9th Cir. 2007) (amended opinion on reh'g) ("The totality of the circumstances supports the conclusion that not only was Tekle's detention unreasonable, but a reasonable officer would have known that an eleven-year-old child who was unarmed, barefoot, vastly outnumbered, and was not resisting arrest or attempting to flee should not have been kept in handcuffs for fifteen to twenty additional minutes.").

Wakefield v. City of Escondido, 2007 WL 2141457, at *1 (9th Cir. July 26, 2007) ("[W]hen viewed in the light most favorable to Wakefield, evidence at trial showed that Parker repeatedly and without warning deployed taser shots against an unarmed individual who was partially restrained, who had committed no serious offense, who was in the throes of a claustrophobic attack, and who pleaded with Parker not to shoot him. . . Under those facts, 'closely analogous pre-existing case law' is not required to put Parker on notice that his conduct was unlawful.")

Blankenhorn v. City of Orange, 485 F.3d 463, 481 (9th Cir. 2007) ("In assessing the state of the law at the time of Blankenhorn's arrest, we need look no further than Graham's holding that force is only justified when there is a need for force. We conclude that this clear principle would have put a prudent officer on notice that gang-tackling without first attempting a less violent means of arresting a relatively calm trespass suspect–especially one who had been cooperative in the past and was at the moment not actively resisting arrest–was a violation of that person's Fourth Amendment rights. This same principle would also adequately put a reasonable officer on notice that punching Blankenhorn to free his arms when, in fact, he was not manipulating his arms in an attempt to avoid being handcuffed, was also a Fourth Amendment violation. Finally, we hold that no reasonable officer would have believed that hobble restraints on his wrists and ankles, in addition to handcuffs, were necessary to maintain control of him and prevent possible danger to passersby. Therefore, we conclude that the state of the law was 'clearly established' at the time of Blankenhorn's arrest and gave the arresting officers sufficiently fair notice that their conduct could have been unconstitutional.").

Winterrowd v. Nelson, 480 F.3d 1181, 1186 (9th Cir. 2007) ("An officer may not use force solely because a suspect tells him he is incapable of complying with a request during the course of an ordinary pat-down. The officers here admit that they could have patted Winterrowd down without forcing his arm behind his back. They have shown no justification for pushing him onto the hood of the police car and yanking his arm. While the officers tell a different story, we must accept Winterrowd's version of the event. Because the facts, if resolved in Winterrowd's favor, would show the officers violated his clearly established constitutional rights, the district court did not err in denying the motion for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity.").

Davis v. City of Las Vegas, 478 F.3d 1048, 1057 (9th Cir. 2007) ("Any reasonable officer in Officer Miller's position would have known, in light of the Graham factors discussed supra and our case law interpreting them, that swinging a handcuffed man into a wall head-first multiple times and then punching him in the face while he lay face-down on the ground, and breaking his neck as a result, was unnecessary and excessive.").

Adams v. Speers, 473 F.3d 989, 993, 994 (9th Cir. 2007) ("Reviewing de novo the district court's denial, we find its judgment impeccable. On the facts presented by the Adamses and the disciplinary report of the CHP itself, a jury could find Speers to be an officer off on a mission of his own creation, abandoning his assignment, picking up a buddy for no apparent reason except the excitement of the chase, barging in ahead of the police already engaged in pursuit, once attempting to use force against Alan and twice doing so, creating each time a serious hazard for himself as well as Alan, and finally stepping out of his patrol car and, without warning and without the need to defend himself or the other officers, killing Alan. Shooting of this sort was established as unconstitutional by Tennessee v. Garner, supra, almost twenty years ago. See Vaughan v. Cox, 343 F.3d 1323 (11th Cir.2003), on remand from 536 U.S. 953 (2002). No officer acting reasonably in these circumstances could have believed that he could use deadly force to apprehend Alan. . . . Accepting the Adamses' facts as true, this case falls within the obvious: the absence of warning and the lack of danger to the shooter or others distinguish the case from Cole, Smith, and Brosseau. On these facts, Officer Speers was not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Harveston v. Cunningham, 216 F. App'x 682, 685 (9th Cir. 2007) (not published) ("When Officer Cunningham sprayed Harveston, Harveston was already handcuffed, and even under Officer Cunningham's account, Harveston was merely trying to roll over and stand up. Viewed in the light most favorable to Harveston, these facts could suggest the use of pepper spray was objectively unreasonable in violation of Harveston's constitutional rights. However, we find that the right was not clearly established at the time of this incident. . . Despite the fact that Harveston was handcuffed, he was not completely subdued, and he continued to resist the officers until Officer Cunningham finally used the pepper spray. Under these circumstances, a reasonable officer could conclude that the use of the pepper spray was lawful, and Harveston fails to identify persuasive authority to the contrary. Thus, because the right was not clearly established, Officer Cunningham is entitled to qualified immunity and summary judgment was proper on the excessive force claim for use of the pepper spray.").

Randall v. Williamson, No. 05-35112, 2006 WL 3390397, at * 1 (9th Cir. Nov. 22, 2006) (unpublished) ("Under Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), deadly force violates the Fourth Amendment where 'the suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others.' . . If the van had come to a complete stop, as plaintiff contends, there was no cause to believe that Vent was a danger to Williamson or to anyone else when Williamson shot him. Unlike the plaintiff in Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194 (2004) (per curiam), Vent was not suspected of a crime of violence. At the time Williamson fired, the officer knew only that Vent was suspected of traffic violations and had failed to pull over when ordered to do so earlier that evening. . . And, assuming that Vent had stopped the van, he was not attempting to flee the scene–unlike the suspect in Brosseau. Perhaps the record at trial will reveal more, in which case Williamson may renew his claim of qualified immunity. But at this stage of the proceedings, defendant has shown insufficient undisputed facts to justify the use of deadly force under Garner. We take seriously the Court's statement in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 205 (2001), that a material factual dispute should not always defeat summary judgment in qualified immunity cases. What the Court was saying, though, is that even if there is a disputed issue of material fact, summary judgment may nonetheless be appropriate on qualified immunity grounds–if the facts, taken in a light most favorable to the injured party, do not show a constitutional violation. Saucier says nothing to suggest that we can affirm summary judgment where there are material disputed facts, and where the injured party's version of those facts show a rights violation that would be clear to a reasonable officer.")

Randall v. Williamson, No. 05-35112, 2006 WL 3390397, at *3, *5 (9th Cir. Nov. 22, 2006) (unpublished) (Tallman, J., dissenting) ("Neither Supreme Court nor circuit precedent would have put a reasonable officer in Officer Williamson's position on notice that using deadly force to stop Vent from committing further dangerous crimes would violate Vent's Fourth Amendment rights. We must view what happened from the objective perspective of a reasonable police officer facing the specific uncontested events that took place on the afternoon of October 29, 2000. . .First, Vent erratically tore through the streets of Fairbanks as he fled from several officers, including Officer Williamson who chased Vent earlier in the pursuit, in what became almost an hour-long chase. He recklessly wove through traffic, sped through busy parking lots full of Sunday shoppers, and ran at least seven red lights and three stop signs. Then, Vent drove through two rows of stopped cars, scraping at least one on the way, to avoid stopping at Officer Williamson's solitary road block, despite Officer Williamson's obvious demands that he do so. That he endangered other citizens and pursuing officers by his behavior cannot seriously be questioned. And, finally, Vent employed his van as a deadly weapon when he assaulted and struck Officer Williamson on his shins with the van because the officer would not retreat from discharging his duty to arrest the felon. . . . In sum, Officer Williamson reasonably believed Vent posed a significant threat of great bodily injury or harm to himself and others, and no case with the requisite level of specificity establishes otherwise. The law permits an officer to employ deadly force to preserve public safety. See Brosseau, 543 U.S. at 197-98. Accordingly, I would AFFIRM the district court's order granting qualified immunity to Officer Williamson.").

Motley v. Parks, 432 F.3d 1072, 1083, 1085, 1088 (9th Cir. 2005) (en banc) ("The touchstone of the Fourth Amendment is reasonableness. Aside from that well-settled principle, though, the law concerning what level of suspicion officers had to have before conducting a parole search–if any–was in 'disarray' when appellees searched Motley's apartment. . . . Of course, the lack of a Supreme Court decision does not prevent a finding that a right is clearly established. Naturally, our decisions relating to the legality of searches of probationers and parolees are binding on law enforcement officers in this circuit. But our caselaw provides no clearer a picture of what was constitutionally required when the officers searched Motley's apartment. . . . Against that backdrop, we simply cannot say that the contours of when officers could conduct parole-related searches was 'sufficiently clear' so that appellees understood that their warrantless and suspicionless search of Motley's apartment violated her rights. . . . In summary, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity for their search of Motley's apartment because, first, they had probable cause to believe that parolee Jamerson was living there; and second, it was not clearly established that a particularized suspicion of wrong doing on Jamerson's part was required as a prerequisite to the search of his residence.")

Motley v. Parks, 432 F.3d 1072, 1089 (9th Cir. 2005) (en banc) ("In this case, as in McDonald, none of the factors justifying the use of force toward Juan exists. While it may have been reasonable for Kading to have drawn his firearm during the initial sweep of a known gang member's house, his keeping the weapon trained on the infant, as he was alleged to have done, falls outside the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard. Motley has stated a constitutional violation. . .Having determined that Motley's factual allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation, we turn our attention to evaluating whether the law was clearly established such that a reasonable officer would have known that the conduct was unlawful. To be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes, the contours of the asserted right must be 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Motley, the conduct engaged in by Officer Kading was objectively unreasonable given the absence of danger posed by Juan to Kading or any of the other officers at the scene. The use of any force was unwarranted under these circumstances. Any reasonable officer should have known that holding an infant at gunpoint constituted excessive force. 'Although there is no prior case prohibiting the use of this specific type of force in precisely the circumstances here involved, that is insufficient to entitle [Officer Kading] to qualified immunity: notwithstanding the absence of direct precedent, the law may be, as it was here, clearly established.'").

Moreno v. Baca, 431 F.3d 633, 642 (9th Cir. 2005) ("Appellants' first assertion–that the parole search condition stripped Moreno of 'a normal scope of Fourth Amendment protection'–does not justify the suspicionless search and seizure. While Moreno's parole status may have rendered it unclear what level of suspicion was required to conduct such a warrantless search, if Appellants had known of the parole condition at the time of the search and seizure, it is uncontested that this fact was unknown to Appellants at the time of their actions and was not a fact on which Appellants relied. Because the Deputies did not know of Moreno's parole status and his outstanding arrest warrant at the time they searched and seized him, those circumstances cannot justify their conduct. At the time of the incident in this case, it was clearly established that the facts upon which the reasonableness of a search or seizure depends, whether it be an outstanding arrest warrant, a parole condition, or any other fact, must be known to the officer at the time the search or seizure is conducted. . . Appellants' other argument–that the officers reasonably believed that the facts known to them constituted 'reasonable suspicion'–is also unpersuasive. It was well-established at the time of Moreno's detention that nervousness in a high crime area, without more, did not create reasonable suspicion to detain an individual.")

Blanford v. Sacramento County, 406 F.3d 1110, 1119 (9th Cir. 2005) ("In sum, Blanford was armed with a dangerous weapon, was told to stop and drop it, was warned that he would be shot if he didn't comply, appeared to flaunt the deputies' commands by raising the sword and grunting, refused to let go of the sword, and was intent upon trying to get inside a private residence or its backyard with the sword in hand. The tragedy is that he persisted even after he admitted seeing the deputies and hearing them order him to drop the sword, resulting in a terrible injury. However, that this happened does not make the deputies' actions objectively unreasonable, or unconstitutional. . . It follows that the deputies are entitled to qualified immunity. Even if we have misjudged the constitutional issue, neither Supreme Court nor circuit precedent in existence as of November 13, 2000 would have put a reasonable officer in the deputies' position on notice that using deadly force in the particular circumstances would violate his Fourth Amendment rights. While they certainly would have known from Garner and Graham that shooting Blanford required probable cause (supported by objectively reasonable facts) to believe that he posed a threat of serious physical harm to themselves or to others, the deputies would not have found fair warning in Garner, Graham, or any other Supreme Court or circuit precedent at the time that they could not use deadly force to prevent someone with an edged sword, which they had repeatedly commanded him to drop and whom they had repeatedly warned would otherwise be shot, from accessing a private residence where they or people in the house or yard might be seriously harmed. In this they may have been mistaken, but reasonably so.").

Blanford v. Sacramento County, 406 F.3d 1110, 1120 (9th Cir. 2005) (Noonan, J., dissenting) ("Having examined the objective circumstances that Graham directs us to, I find no crime, no immediate threat to the officers, no resistance to arrest, and a pathetic if possible attempt to evade arrest. The court says that the case is 'difficult.' It is indeed difficult to say that a reasonable officer would not have known that he violated Matthew Blanford's constitutional right to life and constitutional right to be free of police violence when the officer gunned him down at short range. Let me add one further circumstance mentioned in Garner that might justify the use of lethal force: probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or physical injury to the officer or others. As glossed by Graham, the significant threat must also be immediate. The officers have not been able to name a single human being who was significantly or immediately threatened by Matthew Blanford. What the officers have supplied is speculation: someone might have been in the house, although no one answered the door; someone might have been in a neighbor's backyard if Blanford could have gotten there; Blanford might have entered the house through the garage, although no one knows whether the garage opened into the house. Not only is there no evidence that any human person was in significant or immediate danger. The officers knew that Blanford had been walking the streets for some time without harming or endangering anyone. They also knew that a bizarre sword-carrier had been seen before in the neighborhood and had disappeared into it without harm or threat to anyone. So why did they need to use deadly force to restrain Blanford at his parents' doorstep? If imagined persons and imagined emergencies constitute reason to shoot, no community is safe from officers too quickly frustrated and angered by being ignored. The case is one that demands judgment by the citizens of Sacramento County assembled as a jury, not immunity for the injury-inflicting police.")

San Jose Charter of the Hells Angels Motorcycle Club v. City of San Jose, 402 F.3d 962, 977, 978 & n. 17 (9th Cir.2005) ("While the governmental interest of safety might have provided a sound justification for the intrusion had the officers been surprised by the presence of the dogs, the same reasoning is less convincing given the undisputed fact that the officers knew about the dogs a week before they served the search warrants. The officers had substantial time to develop strategies for immobilizing the dogs. They knew or should reasonably have known that the Fourth Amendment requires officers to avoid intruding more than is necessary to enforce a search warrant. . . As the district court explained, the officers 'created an entry plan designed to bring them into proximity of the dogs without providing themselves with any non-lethal means for controlling the dogs. The officers, in effect, left themselves without any option but to kill the dogs in the event they–quite predictably– attempted to guard the home from invasion.' Having determined that the officers violated the plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights for purposes of the first step in the qualified immunity analysis, the second step asks whether the constitutional right was clearly established. As the Supreme Court has cautioned, it is not enough that there is a generally established proposition that excessive use of force is unlawful. . . '[T]he right that the official is alleged to have violated must have been 'clearly established' in a more particularized, and hence more relevant, sense: The contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . However, 'it is not necessary that the alleged acts have been previously held unconstitutional, as long as the unlawfulness [of defendant's actions] was apparent in light of pre-existing law.' . . . Both parties concede that the ultimate question is whether the state of the law at the time was clear enough to provide reasonable officers with sufficient notice that their conduct was unlawful. Prior to the events at issue in this case, we had held that unnecessary destruction of property in the course of executing a warrant is unconstitutional. . . We also had held that the killing of a person's dog constitutes an unconstitutional destruction of property absent a sufficiently compelling public interest. . . We also had recognized that in assessing reasonableness under the Fourth Amendment an appropriate factor is whether the officer considered alternatives before undertaking intrusive activity implicating constitutional concerns. . . These cases should have alerted any reasonable officer that the Fourth Amendment forbids the killing of a person's dog, or the destruction of a person's property, when that destruction is unnecessary–i.e., when less intrusive, or less destructive, alternatives exist. A reasonable o fficer should have known that to create a plan to enter the perimeter of a person's property, knowing all the while about the presence of dogs on the property, without considering a method for subduing the dogs besides killing them, would violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . Finally, this case is not the kind where the officer was reacting to a sudden unexpected situation, where the officers were confronted with exigent circumstances. The Fourth Amendment allows officers to use a certain amount of force because they are 'often forced to make split-second judgments–in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving....' . . . In this case, however, the SJPOs were given a week to plan the entry. Other than the officers' interest in preserving evidence, the officers were not presented with exigent circumstances that necessitated killing the dogs. Accordingly, the failure to develop any realistic non-lethal plan for dealing with the dogs is simply not the type of reasonable mistake in judgment to which a court should give deference in determining whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The police officers' opportunity to plan ahead distinguishes this case from the recent Supreme Court decision, Brousseau v. Haugen,. . . In this case, there was no element of surprise coloring the officers' judgment.").

Watts v. McKinney, 394 F.3d 710, 711, 712 (9th Cir. 2005) ("A lawyer must be zealous on behalf of his client. But zeal needs to be tempered by commonsense. The Supreme Court in Hudson proscribed the use of force for the malicious and sadistic purpose of causing harm. Watts' declaration, describing the vengeful acts of a frustrated investigator, identifies the unconstitutional purpose and deeds. To suppose that any reasonable person, let alone a trained prison officer, would not know that kicking a helpless prisoner's genitals was cruel and unusual conduct is beyond belief. The Supreme Court did not need to create a catalogue of all the acts by which cruel and sadistic purpose to harm another would be manifest; but if it had, such act would be near the top of the list. The case must go to trial.").

Mondragon v. City of Fremont, No. 18-CV-01605-NC, 2020 WL 5106928, at *7, *9 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 31, 2020) ("[I]n Monzon the shooting immediately followed an erratic, high-speed (100 mph) car chase and took place at almost 2:00 in the morning on an unlit street. . . Each of these factors increased the threat that Monzon posed to both officers and the public. Here, the shooting occurred in the middle of the day in an apartment parking lot with no attendant car chase. Second, in Monzon the incident flowed from the decedent's unexpected flight from an officer who attempted to pull him over on the road. . . Here, the incident flowed from the Task Force's arrest operation wherein officers intentionally orchestrated and initiated contact with Tiger based on surveillance information. Finally, and in the Court's view most significantly, the officers in Monzon were unaware of the presence of a passenger in the back of Monzon's van. . . Here, the officers all knew that three other teens, two girls and one boy, were in the BMW with Tiger. These differences prevent the Ninth Circuit's holding in Monzon from disposing of the question of reasonableness in this case. Defendants also cite to Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U.S. 765 (2014) and Wilkinson v. Torres, 610 F.3d 546 (9th Cir. 2010). In Plumhoff, the Court held that defendant officers acted reasonably when they shot and killed a driver in an effort to terminate a dangerous high-speed car chase. . . Here, no dangerous high-speed car chase precipitated the shooting: instead, the incident was brought about by the Task Force's own operational plan. In Wilkinson, the Court held that defendant officers acted reasonably when they shot and killed a driver who accelerated a stolen van within close quarters of two officers on foot, causing one officer to fall to the ground and to appear to have been run over. . . Here, under Plaintiff's version of the facts, no officer was apparently hit by the BMW. Additionally, here, the officers knew that three other teens were in the BMW where in Wilkinson no passengers were injured. . . . Here, the Court finds that the facts as Plaintiff presents them could show an unreasonable seizure by the defendants. Defendants attempted to arrest a dangerous felon despite the known presence of three teenagers in his vehicle, and then shot into the vehicle (including at its side and back) seven times while it drove past their van, failing to stop the driver but instead hitting and killing Elena Mondragon in the passenger seat. Under these facts, a reasonable jury could find that the officers lacked probable cause to believe that Tiger posed a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to anyone. . . Therefore, a jury could find that their use of force was not reasonable. . . . [T]he Court finds that Elena Mondragon's right not to be shot by officers through the side and back of a vehicle that was neither moving rapidly nor moving in the direction of any officers or bystanders was clearly established at the time of the incident. The Court determines that qualified immunity is not established at this stage of the case. The motion for summary judgment as to the plaintiff's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims are hereby DENIED.")

Estate of Montanez v. City of Indio, No. 517CV00130ODWSHK, 2018 WL 1989533, at *12 (C.D. Cal. Apr. 25, 2018) ("Turning to the force used by Officer Cordova, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the state law as of August 20, 2016, when the shooting occurred, gave Officer Cordova fair warning that his use of deadly force was unconstitutional. Therefore, Defendants' argument that Officer Cordova is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim at the summary judgment phase fails. As described above, a jury could reasonably conclude that (1) both Officers knew or had reason to know that Montanez was mentally ill, (2) Montanez at most committed the misdemeanor of exhibiting a potentially deadly weapon, and (3) Cordova could have used less intrusive force given that Cordova and Fowler outnumbered Montanez, and Montanez was elderly and significantly smaller than Cordova. In Estate of Lopez v. Gelhaus, 871 F.3d 998 (9th Cir. 2017), the Ninth Circuit determined that the case law as of 2013 clearly established that an officer's use of deadly force against an armed individual who was not pointing a weapon at the officer violated the Fourth Amendment. The Gelhaus court cites George v. Morris, 736 F.3d 829 (9th Cir. 2013), where police officers responded to the 911 call of the decedent's wife, who could be heard exclaiming that her husband had a gun. . . The husband, sixty-four years old, with terminal brain cancer, was using a walker when he moved onto his balcony in view of the officers. . . He was holding a gun in his left hand with the barrel pointing down. . . The officers identified themselves and instructed him to show his hands. . . At this point, an officer testified that the husband 'turn[ed] straight east and raise[d] [the gun]' and 'point[ed] it directly at [him],' prompting him to fire. . . However, there was reliable evidence to support the plaintiff's version of the event, so the court assumed the husband did not take any other actions that would have been objectively threatening and held that 'a reasonable fact-finder could conclude the deputies' use of force was constitutionally excessive.'. . Here, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Officer Cordova used lethal force against Montanez, who was mentally ill, barefoot, seventy-one years old, of slight build, and holding a pair of scissors that were not pointed directly toward Cordova. The Court finds that Defendants have not met the burden of proving the absence of a clearly established right under these circumstances. Therefore, considering the law at the time set forth in George and Gelhaus, the Court cannot find that Officer Cordova is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Estate of Price v. Roseburg Police Dep't, No. 6:15-CV-01114-JR, 2017 WL 4287197 (D. Or. Sept. 27, 2017) ("City defendants' arguments concerning qualified immunity focus exclusively on whether 'the law ... in the Ninth Circuit was unsettled as to what circumstances constituted excessive use of a Taser.'. . Contrary to city defendants' assertion, Taser-specific case law is not necessary to resolve whether the right at issue was clearly established. . . Likewise, a court may 'look to whatever decisional law is available' – including 'decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts' and 'unpublished decisions'– in determining whether qualified immunity attaches. . . . In sum, the Court finds that no reasonable jury could conclude that Walton's or Cordell's actions were objectively reasonable based on the totality of the circumstances. The Court recognizes that Walton and Cordell were required to make difficult judgments. Nevertheless, once Price was permanently down, Walton tased him an additional thirteen times – and Cordell tased Price twice and pepper sprayed him at least once – despite the fact that Price was unarmed, non-violent, had committed no serious crime, offered no active resistance, and posed no tangible threat to anyone, save perhaps to himself. The degree of force used, at least after Walton's second tase, was excessive. . . . The Court finds it was clearly established by 2013 that conduct analogous to Walton's or Cordell's was unconstitutional. . . . In fact, it was well-settled long before the underlying events transpired that officers cannot use intermediate force against a non-threatening individual simply for failing to comply with police commands.")

Abuka v. City of El Cajon, No. 17-CV-00089-BAS-NLS, 2017 WL 3671512, at *4–5 (S.D. Cal. Aug. 25, 2017) ("The fact that an officer's conduct, leading up to a deadly confrontation, was imprudent, inappropriate, or even reckless is not sufficient to avoid dismissal where the officer's conduct at the time of the shooting does not otherwise shock the conscience. . . Moreover, looking at pre-shooting tactics does risk 'the sort of hindsight bias the Supreme Court has forbidden.'. .

Furthermore, the Court recognizes that in Mendez, the Supreme Court rejected the Ninth Circuit's 'provocation rule' that an officer may be liable for an otherwise reasonable use of force where the officer intentionally or recklessly provoked the violent confrontation by an act that was itself an independent Fourth Amendment violation. . . Nonetheless, as discussed above, whether Officer Gonsalves acted with a purpose to harm unrelated to any law enforcement objective will be a key factual analysis in this case. His pre-shooting conduct may be relevant to support a claim that Officer Gonsalves was not acting to fulfill a law enforcement objective, but instead was trying to teach the suspect a lesson, bullying him, attempting to get even with him, or intending to harm, terrorize, or kill him. . . Therefore, the Court DENIES the Motion to Strike while noting that the fact that Officer Gonsalves may have acted negligently will be insufficient on its own to support the alleged constitutional violation.")

K.J.P. v. County of San Diego, No. 3:15-CV-2692-H-MDD, 2017 WL 3537740, at *3 (S.D. Cal. Aug. 17, 2017) ("The Supreme Court recently reversed the Ninth Circuit's provocation rule. County of Los Angeles, Calif. v. Mendez, 137 S.Ct. 1539, 1546-47 (2017). In doing so, however, the Court did not say that provocation was irrelevant, only that it should be considered as part of the 'totality of the circumstances.'. . Thus, a triable question of fact remains as to whether Phounsy was provoked still defeats summary judgment. . . . Plaintiffs argue that Phounsy was mentally ill at the time of the incident, as a result of being unable to sleep for multiple days. . . Furthermore, when Deputies Krull and Collins arrived on scene, a jury could find that there was no need to immediately subdue Phounsy[.] . . . Given the disputed facts, the Court declines to find qualified immunity at this time.")

Estate of Simpson v. Yellowstone Cty., 229 F.Supp.3d 1192, 1207-08 (D. Mont. 2017) ("Unlike law enforcement in Mullenix, Garner, Kisela, and Plumhoff, Rudolph and Robinson were not confronted with the hazy border between excessive force and force appropriate to effect Simpson's arrest, because they had no legal basis for arrest. Indeed, Rudolph and Robinson did not even have probable cause to arrest Simpson. Simpson was not suspected of committing a felony or any violent crime, he had not led the deputies on a high speed chase, the deputies did not think he was armed, and he was not driving dangerously. Instead, Rudolph and Robinson merely suspected the Explorer that Simpson was driving was stolen. They knew the color, and had identified the number of doors. But even then, they admittedly were not sure whether it was the right car or one that just looked like the stolen Explorer. And, they had no idea who was driving the car. So, as Simpson was driving back toward them on White Buffalo Road, all Rudolph and Robinson had was reasonable suspicion that the vehicle was stolen. As a result, 40 years of law provided them with the authority only to conduct a Terry stop in order to determine whether criminal activity was afoot. . . To that end, the deputies admitted that they attempted to stop Simpson to determine whether the vehicle he was driving had been stolen. . . What makes this case quite distinct from all of the cases relied upon by the parties is Rudolph and Robinson never attempted a proper stop. They immediately used deadly force. Knowing that Simpson had 'no way out,' they parked the patrol car in the middle of the road and did not turn on the patrol car's overhead lights which would have given Simpson advance notice of the deputies' presence. . . Then, without discussing any less deadly alternative for stopping Simpson, they loaded their weapons, stepped onto a snow covered road with those weapons aimed, shouted at a man inside a moving car with its windows up, gave no warning they would shoot, allowed him four seconds to try to stop under these highly questionable circumstances on a snowy road, and then shot him. And all this where the video demonstrates that they did not have cause to believe Simpson posed a threat to them. Even without the benefit of pre-existing court decisions, any reasonable officer would recognize that using deadly force to effect a Terry stop violates clearly established law. Regardless, the deputies had the benefit of long-standing case law. According to established Ninth Circuit law, in a typical Terry stop where an officer has no reason to suspect danger, it is a Fourth Amendment violation for an officer to employ aggressive tactics such as drawing a weapon, forcing a suspect to lie prone on the ground, and using handcuffs. . . Such tactics transform the Terry stop into an arrest. . . In fact, the Ninth Circuit has long recognized that '[w]here there is no need for force, any force used is constitutionally unreasonable.'. .That law is dispositive here. If it is well-established that officers may not so much as use handcuffs or draw a weapon to effectuate a Terry stop, it is axiomatic that they may not use deadly force to do so. When law enforcement illegally attempts an arrest, the 'countervailing government interest' required by Graham is absent. No level of force is justified in such circumstances. Given the clarity of Ninth Circuit law on the use of force in Terry stops, every reasonable officer would have known that the deputies' conduct violated the Fourth Amendment in light of the specific context of this case. Thus, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the Estate, Rudolph and Robinson are not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.") Greer v. City of Hayward, 229 F.Supp.3d 1091, 1103-07 (N.D. Cal. 2017) ("A recent case from the Eastern District of California (which the parties inexplicably failed to cite) analyzed a similar factual scenario in which the detainee, who was clearly under the influence, 'was restrained and prone on the ground for approximately eight to ten minutes with four officers applying body-weight pressure to his back.' Garlick v. Cty. of Kern, 167 F. Supp. 3d 1117, 1155 (2016). The court noted that '[p]revailing precedent in the Ninth Circuit is that law enforcement officers' use of body weight to restrain a "prone and handcuffed individual [ ] in an agitated state" can cause suffocation "under the weight of restraining officers," therefore, such conduct may be considered deadly force.' Id. (citing Drummond ex rel. Drummond v. City of Anaheim, 343 F.3d 1052, 1056–67 (9th Cir. 2003)). 'Known as "compression asphyxia," prone and handcuffed individuals in an agitated state have suffocated under the weight of restraining officers.' Id. (citation omitted). . . . Under Drummond, and viewing the facts in a light most favorable to plaintiff, the nature and quality of the force used here could constitute lethal force. . . . The appropriate inquiry is 'whether it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibited the officer's conduct in the situation [he] confronted.' Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 309 (2015). Greer cites to Drummond to support his position that 'fact patterns such as the one presented here—where officers use excessive force against a suspect in a prone position, resulting in asphyxia... do not shield officers from liability under qualified immunity.'. . The Garlick court agreed. . . Several unpublished Ninth Circuit decisions also support plaintiff's position. [citing cases] Accordingly, Drummond created clearly established law on a particularized level sufficient to give fair and clear warning to officers. . .

BART and Tougas contend that officers are entitled to 'breathing room regarding use of force,' that they 'need not retreat or desist,' and have a 'right to self-defense.'. . That may be, but clearly established law indicates that the officers' use of prolonged pressure while Greer lay on the ground in a prone position was substantially likely to cause death or serious injury, and such force may not have been reasonable under the circumstances. A jury may agree with Tougas's view of the evidence, but given the disputed facts and the clearly established law, I cannot find that Tougas is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.")

Moore v. City of Berkeley, No. C14-00669 CRB, 2016 WL 6024530, at *4-6 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 14, 2016) ("Dr. Spitz's opinion that Moore died due to compression of her diaphragm that strained an already-enlarged heart has sufficient support in the record. Even though he did not say specifically what materials he reviewed, Dr. Spitz discusses the coroner's report in considerable detail. . . That report provides the officers' account of what happened. . . More importantly, the officers' deposition testimony does not establish, as a matter of law, that 'they did not use any significant body weight on or near' Moore's diaphragm. . . The whole point of independent medical analysis – whether from the coroner, Dr. Spitz, or another qualified expert – is to test whether the officers' account can be believed. And it matters all the more in cases pitting the word of the police against the silence of the dead. This is such a case. Officer Smith arrested Hayes and took him away just before the struggle started. . . Officer Brown ordered Sterling, Moore's purported caretaker, out of the apartment shortly afterwards. . . Only the involved officers saw what happened from then on. So, without body camera footage, the Court must rely on medical analysis and officer testimony alone. Faced with this conflicting evidence, a reasonable jury could find that Moore died because of the struggle. Nonetheless, the officers may still prevail on summary judgment if they can show either (1) that the force they used was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment despite its heartbreaking consequences, or (2) that no clearly established law informed a reasonable officer that it violated Moore's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .[L]ike Deorle, the officers had a diminished interest in using force because they confronted, not someone who had committed a serious crime, but someone who was mentally ill. . . That said, Moore continued to lash out and kick throughout the struggle, which can have significant consequences. . . That does not warrant using a gun, but it does warrant restraining Moore's limbs in the way the officers did here. Finally, officers may use 'physical coercion' when taking someone into custody. . . That is especially true when a person resists arrest. Plaintiff maintains that, rather than resisting arrest, Moore was 'bucking for air.'. . But that could only have been true later in the struggle. The moment the officers tried to arrest her, Moore yanked two officers to the floor, kicked, and screamed. . . So even if Moore started bucking for air at some point, nothing in the record suggests how the officers could have discerned when thrashing against arrest became bucking for air. And though Moore's weight suggested a higher risk of health problems, the officers had little choice but to restrain her once the struggle started. That being so, the force used – though fatal when combined with an enlarged heart – was reasonable based on what the officers could know at the time. The Court therefore GRANTS summary judgment on Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim. . . .Even if the force used had violated Moore's Fourth Amendment rights, qualified immunity would shield the officers from liability. To overcome this defense, clearly established law must have placed the constitutional question 'beyond debate.'. . . Put another way, the 'violative nature of particular conduct' must be clearly established when the alleged constitutional violation happened. . . Here, it was not. Plaintiff argues that Drummond v. City of Anaheim, 343 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2003), made clear that the officers' conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. . . But Drummond was a very different case. There, the officers allegedly 'crushed Drummond against the ground' and pressed 'their weight on his neck and torso.'. . And they continued to do so even though Drummond made 'repeated cries for air' and offered 'no resistance.'. . Here, by contrast, there is no hint of neck trauma. . . Moore also continued to thrash and kick until the moment the officers managed to apply an ankle restraint. . . She did not cry out for air. And when Moore relented, the officers relented. . . So even if Moore did not cry out because she could not, this is not a case where officers continued to use force despite having every reason to know that the person was compliant and desperate for air. . . Instead, this case resembles Luchtel v. Hagemann, 623 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 2010), which held it was reasonable to restrain a woman who 'did everything she could to keep the officers from handcuffing her,' including thrashing and kicking, because 'she was afraid the officers were trying to kill her.'. . The officers pinned Luchtel to the ground but, perhaps because she did not have a heart condition, she survived. . .At bottom, this case falls too close to Luchtel and too far from Drummond. Qualified immunity therefore applies to Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim.")

Jackson v. Cty. of San Bernardino, 191 F. Supp. 3d 1100, 1114-15 (C.D. Cal. 2016) ("[T]he use of a Taser XREP round on a person who is elevated 10-15 feet off the ground may no longer be a 'less-than-lethal' use of force—it may be lethal. . . .There are no facts which would justify the use of lethal force against Jackson at the time Bannes allegedly deployed the Taser dart if Jackson was in an elevated position. Significantly, Bannes does not contend that use of lethal force was reasonable—only non-lethal. Viewing the facts in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, the Court does not find that Bannes' use of force as a matter of law was reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. . . .The Ninth Circuit has held that training officers received from their own police department alerting officers to the risk of serious injury or death with regards to a specific type of force used under certain circumstances is 'fair warning' that the force is unreasonable under those circumstances. Drummond ex rel. Drummond v. City of Anaheim, 343 F.3d 1052, 1062 (9th Cir.2003). SBSD officers are explicitly trained that they cannot deploy the Taser XREP round or the bean bag round at an individual who is in an elevated position because it can cause the individual to fall and the muscle incapacitation effects of the Taser XREP round can prevent the individual from bracing his or her fall. . . Thus, Bannes was trained that use of a Taser XREP round on an elevated individual is likely to cause serious bodily injury or death. In the Ninth Circuit, it is settled that in order to use lethal force, a reasonable officer under the same circumstances must believe himself or others face a threat of serious physical harm. . . As stated above, Bannes has not established undisputed facts which demonstrate he or others faced a serious threat of serious physical harm. Accordingly, viewing the facts in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, Bannes had more than fair warning that use of a Taser dart on an elevated person is likely to cause risk of serious bodily injury or death and that the use lethal force is unreasonable. Bannes has therefore not established that he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Brawley v. Punt, 186 F.Supp.3d 1102, 1107-15 (D. Mont. 2016) ("The outcome of this case seems inevitable given the status of the Supreme Court's qualified immunity jurisprudence in vehicular flight cases. But it shouldn't be. The jury of any given community in our federal system plays a significant constitutional role. When violence occurs, whether prosecuted by the state or claimed as a violation of the constitutional prohibition against the use of excessive force, the community should have a role. Part of that role is structural. Part of that role is based on the principle of transparency. Part of that role is based on a community's judgment of the propriety and extent of force that is justifiable. When lethal force is employed by the police it should not be immunized by a judge who is confronted with an argument about qualified immunity, unless, and only unless, the law is unclear. It defies common sense and logic to reduce the level of generality in this analysis to a level of specificity that randomly occurs. Such a view means the conduct of officers using deadly force to kill another human being, a citizen, is never subject to the transparency of a public trial where the objective reasonableness of the deadly use of force is measured by a properly instructed jury. . . Instead, 'I was in fear for my life,' and 'I was concerned about my fellow officers,' becomes a rote post hoc incantation. The core question is whether any community wants to immunize police officers who kill a person whenever there is an escape attempt of a fleeing vehicle. Surely the cases from our Supreme Court cannot be so broadly viewed, and yet, that seems the case. While circuit courts have generally held that the immediacy of the danger posed by a fleeing driver raises factual questions, see, e.g., Gonzalez v. City of Anaheim, 747 F.3d 789, 796-97 (9th Cir. 2014); Adams v. Speers, 473 F.3d 989, 993-94 (9th Cir. 2007); Foster v. Patrick, 806 F.3d 883, 888-89 (6th Cir. 2015); Lytle, 560 F.3d at 412-18, the Supreme Court has never found the use of deadly force in connection with a car chase to violate the Fourth Amendment, let alone to be a basis for denying qualified immunity, see Mullenix v. Luna, ___U.S.___, 136 S. Ct. 305, 310 (2015) (per curiam) (collecting cases). It is under this conflicting framework that this case must be resolved. . . .There is discretion to decide the order in which to address this two-prong test. . . When the facts are construed in favor of the plaintiff, the circumstances here give rise to a constitutional violation. On the other hand, because the law may not be clearly established, Officer Punt could be entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . .Here, Officer Punt gives the rote recitation of Agarano as justification for his use of force: fear for his own safety and fear for the safety of others. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a jury could find that Officer Punt s use of deadly force was not reasonable under the circumstances. There are three videos where in my view raise serious issues of fact about not only what happened but also whether the 'fear of personal safety' argument would be convincing to a jury in Billings, Montana. . . . Several cases from other circuits with facts similar to this case also provide useful guidance. [court discusses number of cases] With these cases in mind, the question here is whether Brawley posed a threat to Officer Punt. Construing the facts in the plaintiff's favor insofar as they are consistent with the video footage, . . . a jury could conclude that he did not. Officer Punt did not start firing his weapon until after the cruiser hit him. Punt ran toward the cruiser while it was reversing in an arc, made contact with the driver's side of the cruiser and hood, and then slid off the front of the cruiser. After he was on the ground, the cruiser continued to reverse away from him along its arced path. Punt then got up and approached the cruiser on foot during the cruiser's forward acceleration apparently in a direction where he was not in the zone of danger where he might be hit by the accelerating cruiser. At the point he fired, the cruiser was no longer facing him, but parallel to him as the first and fatal shot went through the passenger window into Brawley's side. Officer Punt then continued to shoot at the right side and rear of the cruiser as it accelerated down the street. . . .While it may have been objectively reasonable for Officer Punt to shoot at one point, reasonableness changes with the circumstances. . . .Construing the facts in the plaintiff's favor, a jury could find even if there was a sufficient risk to Officer Punt at the time the cruiser initially hit him, there was no immediate risk to Officer Punt's safety at the time the shots were fired. . . The next question is whether Brawley posed an immediate threat to others. Here, a jury could conclude, as the courts determined in Foster, Smith, and Lytle, that he did not or that if he did, Officer Punt's response was not reasonable under the circumstances. . . . Some courts have found that the use of deadly force is reasonable where it followed a prolonged, highspeed chase. [collecting cases] Nevertheless, a jury should be allowed to assess the nature of the short chase here, the fact that Brawley hit both Officer Punt in a glancing blow and reversed into a tree in his attempt to flee, the severity of the escape involved, and all the other circumstances in the case, . . . including the fact that there were no bystanders in the immediate path of the vehicle as it accelerated forward . . . . While a fully marked and fully equipped police cruiser has a greater potential for causing harm, see Long v. Slaton, 508 F.3d 576, 582-83 (11th Cir. 2007) (collecting cases on unlawful uses of a stolen police cruiser), that fact alone does not justify the use of deadly force, Smith, 430 F.3d at 774-75; Foster, 806 F.3d at 887. There is no indication that Brawley was going to use the cruiser for anything other than escape or that Brawley knew about the weapons or attempted to use or gain access to either of them. . . Considering the circumstances of this case in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a jury could conclude that Brawley was not an immediate threat to Officer Punt or others at the time he was shot and killed. Even if a jury determined that he posed a threat, it could find that Officer Punt's response to that threat was unreasonable. . . .Whether a right is clearly established is based on the specific context of a case. . . The Supreme Court has always found that an officer is entitled to qualified immunity in a shooting involving a fleeing vehicle. . . The Supreme Court always holds that the law in such cases was not clearly established. Brosseau, 543 U.S. at 200 (applying the law in 1999); Plumhoff, 134 S. Ct. at 2024 (again in 2004); Mullenix, 136 S. Ct. at 312 (and again in 2010). As a result, the law would only be clearly established for the purposes of this case (1) if the facts were so markedly different from those three cases as to make it distinguishable or (2) a significant change in the law occurred between 2010 and 2013. . . Neither is the case here. While I believe our Ninth Circuit law on qualified immunity is the better approach, I see no way around the view of the Supreme Court. The circumstances of this case are comparable to Brosseau, Plumhoff, and Mullenix. . . .Here, Officer Punt confronted a potentially armed, recently-arrested individual set on escaping who was involved in a previous prolonged standoff with law enforcement. The relevant inquiry is whether existing precedent places the conclusion that Officer Punt acted unreasonably in these circumstances 'beyond debate.'. . While Foster, Smith, and Lytle come close, none of the precedent squarely governs" the facts here. Mullenix, 136 S. Ct. at 309. Under Mullenix, given Brawley's conduct, it would be difficult to say that only someone 'plainly incompetent' who 'knowingly violates the law' would have acted as Officer Punt did. . . Consequently, while I disagree, Officer Punt is entitled to qualified immunity even if he was mistaken as the level of force reasonable under the circumstances. . . .Mullenix gives great cause for consternation. It provides no guidance on the constitutionality of similar conduct in future cases but instead stands for the proposition that a suspect fleeing in a car always poses some sort of threat and that, due to the nature of that threat, it is not clearly established—and likely never will be—that deadly force cannot be used against that suspect. It seems to do what Lytle was concerned Scott may be interpreted to do, i.e. declare 'open season' on fleeing motorists. . . While couched as a discussion on whether the law was 'clearly established,' Mullenix may have the practical effect of eviscerating the Fourth Amendment reasonableness analysis beyond all usefulness in the car-chase context. Moreover, it is vexing that the applicable law in this all-too-common scenario remains 'unclear' despite at least four Supreme Court decisions and over thirty circuit court decisions addressing the use of deadly force in vehicular flight situations. However, because the law of the Supreme Court on the use of deadly force in such circumstances compels the conclusion that the law was not clearly established specifically in the context of this case, Officer Punt is entitled to qualified immunity. A far better resolution is to let a jury decide if the fleeing suspect is fair game for the use of deadly force.")

Estate of Sauceda v. City of N. Las Vegas, No. 211CV02116GMNNJK, 2015 WL 7737338, at *4, *8 (D. Nev. Dec. 1, 2015) ("Judge Gordon withheld judgment on Plaintiffs' excessive force claim under a provocation theory as well as Plaintiffs' related state law claims for intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress, assault and battery, and negligence. Judge Gordon explained that if, in taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Officer Pollard's conduct leading up to the shooting constituted a separate violation of constitutional rights, then Defendants' request for summary judgment on these claims must be denied. . . Specifically, Judge Gordon requested additional briefing on whether Officer Pollard's warrantless search of the covered porch with his gun drawn and without announcing himself as an officer constituted a constitutional violation that provoked the deadly confrontation. . . Having reviewed the parties' supplemental briefs on this issue, the Court finds that there is at least a genuine issue of material facts concerning whether Officer Pollard's actions leading up to the shooting constituted a constitutional violation. Therefore, Defendant are denied summary judgment on the remaining claims. To establish liability for the shooting under a provocation theory, Plaintiffs must show (1) Pollard's conduct leading up to the confrontation recklessly or intentionally provoked the confrontation, and (2) Pollard's reckless or intentional conduct constituted an independent Fourth Amendment violation. . . .Prior to Officer Pollard's search, the Ninth Circuit held that a misdemeanor offense 'rarely, if ever,' would justify a warrantless entry into a home. . . . Here, Officer Pollard was chasing individuals he believed may have committed the misdemeanor offense of discharging firearms within city limits. Accordingly, it was clearly established at the time of his pursuit that his actions would only be constitutional in the case of rare exigent circumstances. Defendants' argument in favor of qualified immunity relies almost entirely on the Supreme Court's recent holding in Stanton v. Sims, 134 S. Ct. 3 (2013). . . . Unlike the officer in Stanton, however, Officer Pollard—when viewing the facts in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs—did not actually witness a crime, was not wearing an identifiable uniform, did not arrive in a marked police car, and did not identify himself as an officer. Moreover, instead of merely kicking open a gate, Officer Pollard quietly approached and then, when asked to identify himself, suddenly charged onto private property late at night with his gun drawn and began chasing several fleeing individuals onto a covered porch. Given the unreasonableness of these actions, even if the exigent circumstances here—namely, suspecting that some of the pursued individuals may have previously committed the misdemeanor of discharging a firearm and might escape arrest—fell within those 'rarest cases' where the pursuit was constitutional, the Court finds that no officer could have reasonably believed that the manner in which Officer Pollard acted immediately prior to and during the pursuit was constitutional. . . The officers could not have reasonably relied on the exigency of pursuing the fleeing suspects in order to justify their otherwise unconstitutional search when that exigency was itself created by their own unreasonable actions in stealthily approaching and rushing onto the Saucedas' property with guns drawn and without identifying themselves. . . Accordingly, regardless of whether an officer could reasonably believe that pursuit of the suspected misdemeanants onto a porch was constitutional, because no officer could reasonably believe that the manner of Officer Pollard's search here was reasonable, Defendants have failed to show they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Estate of Sauceda ex rel. Sauceda v. City of N. Las Vegas, No. 211-CV-02116-APG-NJK, 2015 WL 871611, at *5-6 (D. Nev. Mar. 2, 2015) ("Even if Pollard's use of deadly force was reasonable at the moment of the shooting, he may still be liable under a provocation theory. 'Officers may be held liable for an otherwise lawful defensive use of deadly force when they intentionally or recklessly provoke a violent confrontation by actions that rise to the level of an independent Fourth Amendment violation.' Sheehan v. City & Cnty. of S.F., 743 F.3d 1211, 1216 (9th Cir.) cert. granted sub nom. City & Cnty. of S.F., Cal. v. Sheehan, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 702, 190 L.Ed.2d 434 (2014); see also Billington v. Smith, 292 F.3d 1177, 1189 (9th Cir.2002). Thus, to establish liability for the shooting under a provocation theory, plaintiffs must show (1) Pollard's conduct leading up to the confrontation recklessly or intentionally provoked the confrontation, and (2) Pollard's reckless or intentional conduct constituted an independent Fourth Amendment violation. . . .There is no evidence Pollard intentionally provoked the confrontation with Sauceda. But viewing all reasonable disputes of fact in plaintiffs' favor, there is a triable issue as to whether Pollard's warrantless entry onto the covered porch, with his gun drawn, was reckless. The officers were responding to misdemeanor celebratory gunfire, and Pollard admits that when he approached Sauceda's home he did not see any weapons and he did not otherwise feel threatened. . . In the dark, Pollard's fatigue-style uniform did not readily identify him as a police officer, and the officers were driving an unmarked pickup truck. Viewing witness testimony in plaintiffs' favor, Pollard drew his weapon, chased after people, entered Sauceda's covered porch without a warrant and without announcing himself as a police officer, and pointed his weapon at people. A reasonable jury could find Pollard acted recklessly. As to whether this conduct constituted an independent constitutional violation, the parties do not adequately address this question. . . .Because neither party has adequately briefed whether this conduct violates one or more constitutional rights, I will direct the parties to submit supplemental briefs on this issue. Additionally, although Billington clearly established the provocation doctrine long before this incident, because the parties have not adequately briefed whether Pollard's conduct constituted an independent constitutional violation that provoked the confrontation, they also have not adequately briefed whether any rights violations were clearly established at the time of the incident. . . . While Garner informs the inquiry, it does not sufficiently address the facts of this case. Defendants likewise do not address whether, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, Pollard's conduct in drawing his weapon and chasing after potential misdemeanants onto a tarp-covered porch and then aiming his weapon at them without announcing he is a police officer violates clearly established rights. I therefore will direct the parties to also brief the issue of whether, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, it was clearly established at the time of the incident that Pollard committed an independent Fourth Amendment violation that provoked the deadly confrontation with Sauceda.")

McKay v. City of Hayward, 949 F.Supp. 971, 984, 985, 989 (N.D. Cal. 2013) ("In sum, two circuits have held that warnings are required before deploying a police dog. Three others have concluded that a prior warning is not dispositive of the reasonableness of seizing an individual with a police dog, and thus there is no clearly established right to be warned. District courts applying this precedent have been similarly split, depending on the circumstances of the seizure. The Court concludes that the law is not clearly established to put the individual officers here on notice that failing to give a warning before entering Mr. Porter's backyard was unlawful. The Ninth Circuit's consideration of verbal warnings as just one factor of many in its analyses of the reasonableness of such seizures supports this conclusion. Because the law was not clearly established, it was not clear to Officer Cox that his actions were unlawful. Nor could it have been clear to Officers Purnell and Miller that they had a duty to intervene and stop Cox's deployment of Nicky. . . . Whether the conduct of the officers was reasonable, however, is disputed. Construing the facts in favor of plaintiffs, a jury may infer that the City was deliberately indifferent in continuing to deploy Cox and Nicky in spite of Nicky's having bitten bystanders in the past. Accordingly, the Court DENIES summary judgment on plaintiffs' § 1983 excessive force claim against the City.")

Lucas v. City of Visalia, No. 1:09–CV–1015 AWI JLT, 2013 WL 1915854, *14, *15 (E.D. Cal. May 8, 2013) ("The facts of this case are different from Mattos, as explained above. The basis for the taser application was not due to active resistence to an arrest. The basis was that Lucas posed an immediate threat. As discussed above, when viewed in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, only Lucas's angry and intoxicated state supports the use of force. No crimes (or at best non-violent misdemeanors) were at issue, there was a less severe force option available, Esparza's conduct appears the more culpable, Lucas was not evading or resisting arrest, and, most importantly, Lucas was not an immediate threat to anyone. To be sure, the law regarding taser use is developing. However, the facts of excessive force in this case are clearer than in Mattos. The Fourth Amendment jurisprudence was sufficiently clear in 2008 for an officer to know that it is improper to use any force on an individual who is in his own home, who is not posing an immediate threat to officers or to others, who is not being investigated for criminal activity, and who is not evading or resisting arrest. . . Because the evidence indicates that no force was justified at the time of the first taser application, and the facts of this case are distinguishable from Draper, Brooks, and Mattos. The Court finds that a reasonable officer would know that using a taser against Lucas would violate his Fourth Amendment rights. Qualified immunity for the first taser application will be denied. . . .Qualified immunity for the second taser application is not as straightforward as the analysis under the first taser application. Lucas's resistence is similar to Mrs. Brooks's resistence. As described above, the officers were attempting to effectuate an arrest. . . When the officers attempted to remove Brooks from her car, she stiffened her body and grabbed the steering wheel in order to remain in her car. . . In this case, Lucas kept his hands under his stomach, despite commands to move his hands and O'Rafferty's physical efforts to move Lucas's hands. Although the type of resistence in Brooks is similar to this case, the officers in Brooks had probable cause to arrest Mrs. Brooks for failing to sign the citation. . . In this case, the officers have not argued that they had probable cause to arrest Lucas for any offense, nor have they explained when probable cause to arrest Lucas may have developed. . . . If probable cause to arrest developed before the second taser application, then the Court would grant Esparza and O'Rafferty qualified immunity under Brooks. If probable cause developed after the second taser application, then Brooks would be distinguishable. In the absence of argument from the officers on the existence of probable cause at the time of the second taser application, the Court will not hold that probable cause to arrest existed. Without probable cause to arrest at the time of the second taser application, Lucas's resistence has not been shown to be sufficiently similar to Brooks in order to justify qualified immunity. For the same reasons that qualified immunity was inappropriate for the first taser application, qualified immunity is inappropriate for second taser application.") [See also Lucas v. City of Visalia, 2013 WL 3733506 (E.D. Cal. July 16, 2013) ("[T]he Court cannot hold that probable cause to arrest Lucas under Penal Code § 415(2) existed prior to the second tasing. Without probable cause to arrest, there was no justification or reason for the officers to demand that Lucas roll over and be handcuffed, nor was there reason or justification for Esparza to use the taser on Lucas to get him to comply. The absence of probable cause distinguishes this case from Brooks, and Lucas's conduct was not sufficiently similar to Mrs. Mattos's conduct. Given the evidence presented, the Court cannot grant qualified immunity on the basis of Mattos v. Aragano.")]

Wise v. Kootenai County, No. 2:11–cv–00472–CWD, 2013 WL 1789716, *8, *9 (D. Idaho Apr. 25, 2013) ("[T]he Court finds that, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, a reasonable jury could conclude that the multiple applications of the taser in drive-stun mode after Plaintiff was rendered incapacitated by Deputy Dunkin's use of the taser in dart mode was unreasonable under the totality of the circumstances, i.e., it was excessive for the purposes of the Fourth Amendment. . . .Having concluded that Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged disputed facts supporting a constitutional violation, the next step in the qualified immunity analysis is whether the constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the conduct. At this step, the Court asks whether the contours of the right at issue were '"sufficiently clear" that every "reasonable official would have understood that what he was doing violates that right."'. . Defendants argue that, assuming the Court finds a constitutional violation, the 'Deputies are still entitled to qualified immunity as it would not have been clear to any reasonable officer on October 19, 2009, that the use of a taser in the situation they confronted was unconstitutional.'. . On this point, Plaintiff provides no assistance to the Court. . . . The Court also specifically asked Plaintiff's counsel at the hearing whether any case existed establishing the alleged constitutional violation. Plaintiff's counsel stated that he was not aware of any such case. Applying the applicable case law to the facts of this case, the Court concludes that, as of October 19, 2009, a reasonable officer would not have known that the use of a taser in the situation confronted by Deputies McAvoy and Dunkin was unconstitutional. The Deputies are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Williams v. City of Merced, No. 1:10–cv–01999–MJS, 2013 WL 498854, *15, *16 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 7, 2013) ("As discussed above, use of a taser in drive stun mode is a less than an intermediate level of force. Tasers are designed to cause temporary immobilization, most often in order to secure handcuffs. . . The Ninth Circuit and this Court recently, after the events in this case, held that the law regarding tasers was not sufficiently and clearly enough established to warrant denying officers qualified immunity under the facts of those respective cases. . . Here, Plaintiff was at least minimally resistive to being placed under arrest. A reasonable officer in Defendant Pinnegar's position could have believed that Plaintiff's conduct presented some threat, however minimal, to the safety of Defendant or other officers. Given the state of the case law on September 11, 2009, the Court concludes that it was not clearly established that a reasonable officer in Defendant Pinnegar's position would know that the use of hands-on force and a taser was unconstitutional.")

Al-Kidd v. Gonzales, No. 1:05–cv–093–EJL–MHW, 2012 WL 4470776, *6, *7, *10, *11 (D. Idaho Sept. 27, 2012) ("The parties do not appear to question the law on qualified immunity as stated in the Report. (Dkt. 336 at 18–19.) What is in question on this objection is the Magistrate Judge's application of the facts of this case to that law on the Franks claim. Here, however, once it is determined that a Franks violation occurred, qualified immunity does not apply. See Mendocino Envtl. Ctr. v. Mendocino Cnty., 192 F.3d 1283, 1295 (9th Cir.1999); Harvey v. Estes, 65 F.3d 784, 788–89 (9th Cir.1995) (In order to defeat qualified immunity, a plaintiff must "establish both a substantial showing of the deliberate falsity or reckless disregard of the truth of the statements in the affidavit and the materiality of those statements to the ultimate determination of probable cause."); see also (Dkt. 336 at 21.) Because the Plaintiff established both prongs of the Franks claim against Agent Gneckow, the Court concludes Agent Gneckow is not entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, the objection is denied. . . . Based on its own de novo review of the record in this case, this Court concludes that Agent Mace's conduct was objectively reasonable in this case such that he is entitled to qualified immunity. The fact that Agent Mace stated later that he did not know the legal standard does not preclude qualified immunity. Again, Agent Mace had no independent knowledge of the falsity of the statements and/or the material omissions in the warrant application and affidavit. Thus, Agent Mace's reliance on the materials provided was reasonable given his limited role and knowledge of the facts and circumstances of the investigation. Moreover, as the Court has determined above, the warrant contains an indicia of probable cause such that given what Agent Mace knew at the time, his reliance upon the information provided by other law enforcement officers was reasonable as was his belief that the warrant application supported a finding of probable cause. Agent Mace is precisely the kind of individual for which qualified immunity is meant to protect; one who acted in an objectively reasonable manner in presenting a warrant application and affidavit which, based on what he knew at the time, appeared to be supported by probable cause. . . .The fact that the warrant was later determined to be lacking does not open Agent Mace up to liability where his actions were objectively reasonable. . . The facts in this case evidence that Agent Mace acted reasonably and is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hulstedt v. City of Scottsdale, 884 F.Supp.2d 972, 999, 1002-04 (D. Ariz. 2012) ("The Ninth Circuit has written that summary judgment is rare in cases of police misconduct, because 'police misconduct cases almost always turn on a jury's credibility determinations.' Santos v. Gates, 287 F.3d 846, 853 (9th Cir.2002) (emphasis added). This case is an exception to that general caution. Almost everything the officers heard was recorded and transcribed, and the shooting itself was recorded on video. The officers fired at an unarmed man who was walking away from them. Although he had issued threats against D.H. earlier, nothing he did after walking outside would suggest to a reasonable officer that he was placing D.H. in imminent danger of suffering any more harm than falling to the ground. By shooting David, the officers caused the very harm that a reasonable officer could believe that David posed to D.H. Considering 'the totality of the facts and circumstances in the particular case,' no reasonable officer could have believed that shooting David without warning, while he calmly walked back towards his house with D.H. over his head, was a proper means of protecting D.H.'s safety. . . .The question at issue is whether it was clearly established, before November 7, 2008, that before using force officers had to consider whether that force could harm parties other than the intended targets. As discussed below, cases from the Ninth Circuit and elsewhere had clearly established this principle at this time. Indeed, it is difficult to see how the Graham test could fail to include consideration of harm to third parties. If Sgt. Slavin and Sgt. Dorer were not required to consider D.H.'s safety in any way when they were using force against David precisely to protect D.H., and if deadly force were indeed justified, they could have used force that would have killed D.H. (or others) and not violated the Fourth Amendment. Such a result does not square with the reasonableness requirement of Graham. . . . The Ninth Circuit's holding that the officer violated Brosseau's Fourth Amendment rights remains good law and served to clearly establish, for the purposes of qualified immunity, that similar shootings violate the Fourth Amendment. The officer had stated that part of the reason she shot the man was to protect pedestrians in front of the jeep. The officer stated that she was '"aware of the background exposure," but she nonetheless believed she had a safe shot because she thought the bullet would be stopped by the Jeep's engine block before reaching the bystanders.'. . The Ninth Circuit found that the threat posed by the man did not justify using deadly force. In doing so, it acknowledged that harm to bystanders was part of the calculus, noting that the officer did not fire again 'because she thought the risk [of hitting a bystander] became too great as [the driver] began to drive away.' . . Other district courts in the Ninth Circuit have held that it was clearly established prior to 2008 that Graham requires consideration of whether the use of force may cause harm to those who are not targets of the force. Although these cases were decided after 2008, they involved incidents occurring prior to 2008, and therefore demonstrate that other district courts have determined that the principle was clearly established in the Ninth Circuit prior to this incident.")

James v. City of Seattle, No. C10–1612JLR, 2011 WL 6150567, at *8-*9 (W.D. Wash. Dec. 12, 2011) ("Mr. James was in the midst of operating a vehicle with two passengers at the time he was tasered. The risk of injury from tasering a driver in control of a moving vehicle–not not only to the driver, but also to the passengers, the officers, and other persons in the area–is something that a police officer trained in the use of a taser should foresee. . . Indeed, Mr. James has asserted that he lost control of the vehicle as result of the tasing, and that this placed everyone in the vehicle, as well as the officers at the scene, at risk of injury. In light of the factors above, and viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. James, the court concludes that the evidence supports more than one reasonable inference and that a reasonable jury could find a Fourth Amendment violation. . . .Having determined that a reasonable jury could conclude that Mr. James's constitutional rights were violated by Officer House's use of his taser, the court must next consider whether Officer House nevertheless is entitled to qualified immunity because the constitutional violation described above was not '"sufficiently clear" that every "reasonable official would have understood that what he [was] doing violate[d] that right."'. . . Given the lack of clarity in the case authority concerning the level of force employed when a taser is deployed in dart form prior to the Ninth Circuit's ruling in Bryan, the court finds that Officer House is still entitled to qualified immunity.")

Quyen Kim Dang v. City of Garden Grove, No. SACV 10-00338 DOC (MLGx), 2011 WL 3419609, at *9 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 2, 2011) ("Prior to September 3, 2008, no Supreme Court or Ninth Circuit decision had discussed the constitutionality of Tasers. In 2010, the Ninth Circuit issued its decision in Bryan, holding that the use of a Taser in a closely analogous factual situation violated the Constitution. If the events at issue in this case had taken place after the publication of the Bryan decision, there is no doubt that the officers' claim of qualified immunity would fail. The lack of on-point case law discussing this issue prior to September 3, 2008, however, makes the qualified immunity question a much closer call. Indeed, the Ninth Circuit in Bryan granted the police officers qualified immunity precisely because the state of the law surrounding Taser use was acknowledged to be murky as of the date of the violation. Although the events in this case took place nearly three years after the incident in Bryan, little binding, on point case law was issued between 2005 and September 3, 2008. Given this lack of clarity, the Court declines to find that a per se proscription against Taser use in situations like the one at hand was clearly established as of the date of the violation. Accordingly, a reasonable officer in Karschamroon's shoes could have believed that the use of the Taser was permissible. By contrast, given the evidence suggesting that Officer Gendreau was aware that Andy, at the time of the tasering, faced an increased risk of cardiac arrest from the application of the Taser, the qualified immunity doctrine does not shield Officer Gendreau from liability. Although the Court cannot locate prior binding case law discussing a scenario where an officer used a Taser on a mentally ill, non-combative subject stopped for a minor violation, in spite of a known risk that the subject could suffer cardiac arrest, the Court finds that this action was so 'patently violative' of Andy's constitutional rights that no specific guidance from the court was needed to put a reasonable officer on notice that such conduct is forbidden.")

Ciampi v. City of Palo Alto, No. 09-CV-02655-LHK, 2011 WL 1793349, at *17 (N.D. Cal. May 11, 2011) ("The Court agrees with Defendants. . . that they are entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim. It is only recently that the Ninth Circuit has definitively determined the level of force associated with Tasers deployed in dart mode. . . For this reason, in its recent Taser decisions, the Ninth Circuit has uniformly found that the law surrounding tasers was not clearly established and concluded that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. [citing Bryan, Mattos, Brooks] However, these cases involved conduct that occurred between 2004 and 2006, whereas here the conduct occurred on March 15, 2008. . .The Ninth Circuit's decision in Mattos establishes that the law regarding Tasers was not clearly established as of August 23, 2006, at least for cases in which the conduct alleged was not 'so patently violative of [the plaintiff's] constitutional rights that reasonable officials would know without guidance from the courts that the action was unconstitutional.'. . Based on its review of district court decisions within this Circuit, the Court finds that by March 2008, it was clearly established that use of a Taser upon a suspect who had already been subdued and arrested was objectively unreasonable and constituted excessive force. . . In other circumstances, however, the case law was much less clear. There are relatively few decisions that address Taser use in detail, and those that do vary in their assessment of the quantum of force involved and reasonableness of applying that force to subdue an unrestrained suspect. . . In Bryan, the Ninth Circuit granted qualified immunity in a case where the officer shot his Taser, without warning, at an 'unarmed, stationary individual, facing away from an officer at a distance of fifteen to twenty-five feet' who had been stopped for not wearing his seatbelt. . . In this case, although Plaintiff was similarly unarmed and stopped based on suspicion of a non-violent misdemeanor, he was located much closer to the officers and was given some warning that he would be shot with a Taser if he did not comply with the officers' orders. The Court has not found that the law regarding Tasers was significantly clarified between 2005, when the conduct in Bryan occurred, and March 15, 2008, when the incident at issue in this case occurred. Bryan thus appears to compel a finding of qualified immunity in this case. Accordingly, although the Court finds that triable issues of fact exist regarding the reasonableness of deploying a Taser in dart mode against Plaintiff, the Court concludes that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Azevedo v. City of Fresno, No. 1:09-CV-375 AWI DLB, 2011 WL 284637, at *9, *10, *15 (E.D. Cal. Jan. 25, 2011) ("[T]he use of a taser in dart mode is an intermediate and significant quantum of force. Given the nature of the use of force, something more than nonviolent misdemeanors must be at play to justify its use. While Azevedo was clearly in flight when Carr deployed the taser, the Court cannot say as a matter of law that Azevedo's flight made use of the taser reasonable. The misdemeanors involved were all non-violent, and the evidence indicates that Azevedo did not pose an immediate threat to the officers. Importantly, Azevedo and Carr were running at full speed on the street. It was understood that the taser would immobilize Azevedo. It should have also been understood that uncontrolled falls are an inherent risk associated with tasers. The potential for injury from an uncontrolled fall is increased if a full speed foot race over concrete is occurring. In the absence of an immediate threat posed by Azevedo, a reasonable jury could conclude that the nature of the force and the risk of injury were too great relative to the offenses at issue. . . Summary judgment on the issue of whether Carr violated Azevedo's Fourth Amendment rights will be denied. . . . Having found that Azevedo's version of the facts prohibits summary judgment on whether the Fourth Amendment was violated, the Court will proceed to determine whether Carr is entitled to qualified immunity. The use of force at issue occurred on November 7, 2007. After reviewing the cases cited by the parties, the Court concludes that, as of November 7, 2007, the law was not so clearly established that a reasonable officer in Carr's position would know that use of the taser on Azevedo was unconstitutional. . . . Given the crimes at issue, the active flight and evasion of Azevedo following a question regarding weapons, Carr's fatigue, and the sparse yet developing state of the law on November 7, 2007, the Court concludes that the law regarding taser use was not clearly established such that a reasonable officer in Carr's position would know that use of the taser on Azevedo was improper.")

Villegas v. City of Colton, No. 5:09-cv-00644-DEW, 2010 WL 5252721, at *4 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 9, 2010) ("In Marquez v. City of Phoenix, 2010 WL 3342000 (D.Ariz.Aug.25, 2010), the court examined the state of the law regarding taser applications in deterrnining whether a police officer who used a taser in late July, 2007 was liable for a § 1983 excessive force claim. The court in Marquez pointed out that it was not until Bryan v. McPherson, 590 F.3d 767, in 2009 that the Ninth Circuit announced what level of force use of a taser in dart mode constitituted. . . The alleged tortious actions in the case at hand occurred in November 2006, half a year before the events in Marquez. As Marquez makes clear, the law regarding the use of tasers was not clearly established in July 2007. As such, it could not have been clearly established in November 2006. Defendants, then, are entitled to qualified immunity from Villegas's claim for unreasonable and unnecessary use of physical force. Villegas's first claim for relief is dismissed with prejudice.")

Snauer v. City of Springfield, No. 09-cv-6049, 2010 WL 4875784, at *5, *6 (D. Or. Nov. 23, 2010) ("Here, Sether was trained in the use of a taser and knew well that a tasered suspect becomes temporarily paralyzed. The type of taser used by Sether deploys dart probes which cause neuromuscular incapacitation, which is different from a stun gun mode which is designed to effect pain compliance. . . . The police are expressly warned by the manufacturer that: 'Taser-induced strong muscle contractions usually render a suspect temporarily unable to control his or her psychomotor movements. This may result in secondary injuries such as those due to falls. This loss of control, or inability to catch oneself, can in some circumstances increase the risk(s) of serious injury or death ... [P]ersons at higher risk include: those located at elevated or unstable platforms (e.g., trees, roofs, ladders, ledges, cranes, loading docks).'. . It is undisputed that Sether was trained not to Taser a suspect where the suspect may fall from a significant height. Although the parties quibble over what is meant by 'significant,' it is obvious that the greater the height, the greater the danger. I note that the height of a loading dock, used as an example by Taser in its manual as a height creating a higher risk of serious injury or death, is approximately four feet. It does not take a panel of judges to alert a reasonable police officer that causing a paralyzed man to tumble head first onto the ground from a platform six to seven feet above the ground 'creates a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily injury.'. . I find it illuminating that in the Springfield training material, the instructions specify that volunteers who subject themselves to tasering are to be placed on mats and assisted by two spotters who are instructed to grab hold to support the volunteer both before and during exposure. . . One cannot imagine a training exercise in which a volunteer stands atop a six foot high platform and is tasered without the help of spotters. A law enforcement agency would never subject an officer or other volunteer to such a training exercise–notwithstanding the lack of any case law on the subject– because they already know such would inevitably result in serious bodily injury and even death. In short, the police do not need judges to explain the obvious to them before they can be held accountable for an unreasonable or excessive use of force. As explained by plaintiff's expert, Josh Foster, a former Texas police officer and trainer on the use of Tasers: Anyone trained to operate and carry a TASER in the field should, by TASER International standards, clearly understand that the application of the TASER to a suspect who is high off the ground would be considered a deadly force application in that the potential result of the particular use of force could cause serious bodily injury or even death. The defendant does not dispute that the circumstances presented here did not justify the use of deadly force. Thus, even accepting at face value that Sether had probable cause to arrest Snauer for multiple misdemeanors, such does not justify the use of force creating a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury, and no reasonable officer would have failed to understand that deadly force was unlawful under these circumstances. . . Accordingly, defendant Sether's motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity should be denied.")

Garcia v. City of Imperial, No. 08cv2357 BTM(PCL), 2010 WL 3834020, at *11 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 28, 2010) ("Before Bryan was decided, it was unclear whether use of a Taser X26 in dart mode constituted an intermediate level of force or something less. Furthermore, as of 2007, neither the Ninth Circuit nor the Supreme Court had decided an excessive force case involving the use of a taser. Therefore, the Court simply cannot say that a reasonable officer would have known that use of a taser in the situation confronting Heredia was unlawful. Indeed, the use of force in this case is more understandable than the use of force in Bryan. In Bryan, Bryan was standing in one place and was twenty to twenty-five feet away from the officer. No other civilians were close by. In contrast, in this case, Plaintiff jumped over a wall into a backyard while running away from the police, failed to comply with an officer's command to stop and get on the ground, walked away from the officer, and attempted to open a window to a home that could have been occupied. Heredia's conduct was not objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law at that time.")

Haflich v. McLeod, No. CV 09-161-M-DWM-JCL, 2010 WL 3613980, at *9, *10 (D. Mont. Aug. 2, 2010) ("As a general proposition, the decisional law applicable to the use of a taser is developing and, as of November 23, 2007, was 'not sufficiently clearly established to warrant denying officers qualified immunity.'. . McLeod's position, however, misses the mark as to the proper identification of the particular clearly established right at issue in this case. A court's conclusion as to the applicable legal standard that is clearly established need not always be based on 'closely analogous case law' decisions. . . .In a case of an obvious violation of a constitutional right, a broad and general statement of the right can be sufficient, by itself, to 'clearly establish' the right. . . Although the law regarding the use of a taser is not clearly established as McLeod asserts, the clearly established right at issue in this case is not uniquely defined by or tied to the use of a taser, irrespective of the other circumstances surrounding McLeod's use of the taser. . . . Again, under the circumstance of this case construed in Haflich's favor, Haflich was handcuffed and seat belted in the rear seat of McLeod's patrol car at the time McLeod tasered him without warning. No reasonable officer confronting these circumstances–where the need for force is nonexistent–could reasonably have concluded his conduct was constitutionally permitted. . . Thus, prior to November 23, 2007, it was clearly established that where a police officer has physical control over a suspect, and there is no need for any further force, then the use of force is clearly unconstitutional.")

Williams v. Kitsap County, No. 08-05430-RBL, 2008 WL 5156319, at *5 (W.D. Wash. Dec. 8, 2008) ("In this case, like in Doerle, the suspect's erratic behavior indicated that he may be emotionally disturbed, and there was little effort on behalf of the officers to "talk him down." The deputies testified that they yelled at Williams to drop his machete, but they did not testify that they warned him that they would shoot if he did not comply. Most importantly, Williams did not pose a threat of death or serious bodily injury to the deputies, as the Court in Garner requires, if he was not holding the machete before he was shot. Defendants cite Blanford v. Sacramento County, 406 F.3d 1110 (9th Cir.2005), in support of their argument that even if the deputies violated the Fourth Amendment, it was not clearly established that the deputies' use of deadly force was unconstitutional. In that case, the court held that the police officers, who shot a suspect armed with a sword, were entitled to qualified immunity. . . . This case, however, is distinguishable from Blanford because there is a question of fact as to whether Williams was actually armed at the moment the deputies opened fire. Additionally, unlike in Blanford, there is no evidence in this case that the deputies warned Williams that they would shoot if him if he did not drop his machete, and there is evidence that he stood still, or nearly still, before he was shot.").

Kaady v. City of Sandy, No. CV. 06-1269-PK, 2008 WL 5111101, at *21 (D. Ore. Nov. 26, 2008) ("After reviewing the case law, I conclude that, as of September 2005 when Bergin used his Taser on Kaady, police officers had reasonable notice that they may not use a Taser against an individual suspect who does not pose a threat and has merely failed to comply with commands. I therefore deny Bergin's motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' First Claim for Relief, which alleges that the Taser constituted excessive force. On the other hand, because Willard used his Taser after Kaady posed a threat, I find that Willard is entitled to qualified immunity. I . . . grant Willard's motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's First Claim for Relief.").

Neal-Lomax ex rel. Lomax v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Dept., 574 F.Supp.2d 1170, 1187 (D.Nev. 2008) ("Even if a genuine issue of fact remained that Rader violated Lomax's rights by using the Taser on Lomax five times in quick succession while Lomax was on the gurney, Rader's belief that he used an appropriate amount of force was reasonable. Rader was faced with a resisting individual who would not obey commands, who was struggling against all forms of restraint, and who needed prompt medical care. His use of the Taser was effective in gaining momentary compliance and assisting the housing security officers and medical personnel in making progress in restraining Lomax. Efforts at using lesser means of force, such as verbal commands and physical restraining of his limbs by the security officers, were insufficient to gain control over Lomax to permit medical personnel to assist him. Plaintiffs point to no clearly established law that multiple Taser applications in short succession on a struggling suspect constitute excessive force such that a reasonable officer in Rader's position would know Rader's conduct was unlawful. Although Plaintiffs point to Rader's alleged failure to conform to departmental policy and his training, Rader's conduct was not directly contrary to his training and LVMPD policy such that a reasonable officer would know his conduct was not only contrary to policy and training, but also unconstitutional.").

Hayes v. Wickert, No. C06-5402RJB, 2006 WL 3373051, at 4-6 (W.D. Wash. Nov. 20, 2006) ("The severity of the crimes at issue here weighs against holding that shooting Plaintiff was reasonable. The undisputed facts indicate that Plaintiff violated various traffic laws: he ran a stop sign, was speeding, was driving without his lights at night in an apparently unpopulated area, and was driving into the oncoming lanes to avoid having to take curves, as well as the felony of eluding a police officer. The next factor to consider in determining whether an officer's use of force was reasonable is examining whether the suspect posed an 'immediate threat to the safety' to Officer Wickert or others. Officer Wickert argues that he opened fire because he felt Plaintiff was attempting to hit him when he backed the car up after losing control on the gravel road. However, there are issues of fact as to whether Officer Wickert's safety was threatened. In the Plaintiff's version of events, he had already backed the car up before Officer Wickert arrived at the gravel road. Because the Court must 'take the facts in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury,' Saucier at 201, Officer Wickert is unable, for the purposes of this motion, to establish that his use of force was reasonable because he feared serious injury or death. Officer Wickert also argues that his use of force was reasonable because he feared for the safety of others based on Plaintiff's speeding, driving without lights at night, and his driving into oncoming lanes of traffic (reckless driving). Considering all the facts and circumstances, Officer Wickert is unable, for the purposes of this motion, to establish that his use of force was reasonable because he feared an 'immediate threat' to the safety of others. Graham at 396. The record is silent on whether there were any people nearby. The record does indicate that these events took place at night. Officer Wickert points to Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194 (2004) in support of his position that his use of force was reasonable because he was concerned about the safety of others. . . In Brosseau, the Supreme Court affirmed this Court's judgment, and found that a police officer was entitled to qualified immunity because prior case law did not 'clearly establish' that the police officer's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. Id. at 201. However, at this stage in the inquiry the Court is examining whether a constitutional violation occurred, not whether the violated right was clearly established. The Supreme Court did not address the first factor under Saucier, whether Haugen's constitutional rights had been violated, in that case. In any event, the factual setting in Brosseau was different then in the instant case. There, police were called to neighborhood during day to respond to a fight between Haugen and two other men at Haugen's mother's house. Id. at 196. When the police arrived Haugen fled. Id. After a search, Haugen ran back to his mother's front yard and jumped into a Jeep, parked in the driveway, which was facing an occupied car, also parked in the driveway. Id., at 196. There was another occupied vehicle parked behind the car. Id. An officer ran up to the Jeep, pulled her gun and ordered Haugen out of the vehicle. Id. The police officer broke the driver's side window and tried, but failed, to get the keys. Id. As the Jeep started, or shortly after it began to move, the officer jumped back and to the left and fired on shot at Haugen. Id. at 196- 197. The officer there explained that she shot Haugen because she was 'fearful for the other officers on foot who she believed were in the immediate area, for the occupied vehicles in Haugen's path, and for any other citizens who might be in the area.' Id. at 197. Here, unlike in Brosseau, there is no evidence that there were other people in the area, much less that there was an 'immediate' threat to their safety. Accordingly, this factor, at this stage in the case, weighs against a finding that Officer Wickert's use of force was reasonable here. At least, there are material issues of fact. The final factor in considering whether Officer Wickert's use of force was reasonable is a consideration of whether the suspect was 'actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.' Graham at 396. Here, viewing the facts in a light most favorable to the Plaintiff, Plaintiff was not actively resisting arrest. He was attempting to evade arrest, and he alleges that Officer Wickert's shot entered his shoulder as he was accelerating away. This factor also weighs against a finding that Officer Wickert's use of deadly force reasonable. . . . The next step under Saucier in determining if Officer Wickert is protected by qualified immunity, is to ascertain if Plaintiff's constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the injury. . . . Under the circumstances alleged, a reasonable officer would have had fair notice that shooting an individual suspected of violating traffic laws and eluding police was unlawful. There are issues of fact as to when Plaintiff began backing his car, and if Plaintiff version of events is believed, Officer Wickert jumped out of his patrol car and immediately began firing shots. Under those circumstances, Officer Wickert could not reasonably have believed his safety was endangered, and would have fair notice that shooting Plaintiff was unlawful. Moreover, unlike in Brosseau, or the other cases cited by Officer Wickert, the record does not contain evidence that there were others in the area who's safety was immediately threatened. A reasonable officer, under the facts alleged by Plaintiff, would have reasonable fair notice that shooting the Plaintiff here was unlawful.") Hunt v. County of Whitman, No. CS-03-119-FVS, 2006 WL 2096068, at *6, *7 (E.D. Wash. July 26, 2006) ("Even though a jury question exists with respect to whether the deputies violated the Fourth Amendment by opening fire, they are entitled to qualified immunity unless Mr. Hunt's right to be free from deadly force was clearly established on December 7, 2000. . . .The plaintiff characterizes this as a case in which the deputies shot an emotionally distraught man who, although armed, had not committed a serious crime prior to their arrival, was not attempting to flee, and who had turned his back toward the deputies whom he allegedly was threatening. . . .Significantly, the plaintiff has failed to cite a single case, much less a case decided before December 7, 2000, in which a law enforcement officer has been held to violate the Fourth Amendment by shooting an armed man who is aware of the officer's presence, who is capable of shooting the officer, who has ignored repeated instructions to put his firearm down, and who has given credible indications that he is contemplating a violent resolution of the standoff. As a result, it would not have been clear to a reasonable law enforcement officer that it was unlawful to shoot Chester Hunt even assuming he did not verbally threaten the officers or point his handgun at them as he stood in the bed of the pickup. Rather, this is a situation in which, even if the plaintiff's account is correct, the officers' decision to shoot fell within the hazy border between ' "excessive and acceptable force."'").

Tungwarara v. United States, 400 F.Supp.2d 1213, 1220, 1221 (N.D. Cal. 2005) ("The Court therefore concludes that some level of suspicion is required under the Fourth Amendment to conduct strip searches of non-admitted aliens. . . Indeed, this Court concludes that this right is now clearly established in light of the reasoning employed by the Ninth Circuit in Wong, which applies analogously to the right to be free from non-routine searches absent some level of suspicion. . . . The more difficult issue is whether Tungwarara's Fourth Amendment right to be free from a strip search absent suspicion that she was concealing weapons or contraband was clearly established in 2002. As the court in Wong recognized, prior to its decision in that case the law was unsettled regarding the extent to which non-admitted aliens enjoyed substantive constitutional rights. . . . The strip search here was an unwarranted and painful affront to Plaintiff's privacy and dignity, and this Court has concluded that it was unconstitutional. At the same time, the pat-down search here did not constitute the kind of 'gross physical abuse,' 'reckless indifference to safety,' or 'torture' that was more clearly forbidden by the case law as of 2002. . . This is not a case where the official's actions were so egregious that the Court can conclude that Tungwarara's right was clearly established absent clearly applicable contemporaneous decisional law. [citing Brosseau]. . . . Accordingly, although this Court concludes that a non-invasive strip search of a non-admitted adult alien at the border without any suspicion of any kind is unconstitutional, the Court cannot conclude that this right was clearly established at the time of the incident. If the same search had occurred later after the Ninth Circuit's decision in Wong, or had been more invasive or abusive at the time, the Plaintiff's 'clearly established' rights would likely have been violated. On the uncontested facts of the search here, however, Ludwigs is entitled to qualified immunity.").

McCartor v. City of Kent, No. C05-0032Z, 2005 WL 2600421, at *9, *10 (W.D. Wash. Oct. 12, 2005) ("Given a possible constitutional violation, the next inquiry is whether Mr. McCartor's constitutional right to be free of the use of deadly force under the circumstances was 'clearly established' at the time of the incident. The short answer is 'no.' Plaintiffs argue that Mr. McCartor's flight in the car is analogous to the burglar's flight on foot in Garner, the United States Supreme Court case in which the Court held that it is unlawful to use deadly force on an apparently unarmed suspected felon. . . .The case before the Court, however, involves a suspect who was 'armed'–with his vehicle. Even Plaintiffs admit, albeit in a different part of their case, that a car can be a deadly weapon. . . Not only was Mr. McCartor armed, but also he demonstrated a repeated willingness to use his car to thwart the police's efforts to arrest him and to endanger Officer Buck's safety. These differences between the facts of the case before the Court and the Garner case precludes the use of Garner as binding precedent to show that Mr. McCartor's right to be free of Officer Gagner's use of deadly force was 'clearly established' at the time of the incident. At oral argument, Plaintiffs argued that Officer Gagner should have been on notice that his conduct was unlawful because of the Sixth Circuit case of Fisher v. City of Memphis, 234 F.3d 312 (6th Cir.2000). In that case, a police officer shot at a vehicle that was driving towards him, injuring the passenger of the vehicle. . . The Sixth Circuit affirmed the District Court's judgment upholding a jury verdict finding the officer liable for the passenger's injuries. . . Although the jury must have found the officer's shooting to be 'objectively unreasonable' in order to find him liable, the case law does not explain the jury's rationale (nor could it have explained it). . .Without any Fourth Amendment analysis, and because of the different fact patterns of the cases, Fisher cannot be said to have 'clearly established' the unreasonableness of Officer Gagner's use of deadly force. . .Plaintiffs have failed to locate a single case, binding or otherwise, holding that it is unlawful to use deadly force against a suspect who threatens the safety of others and who refuses to yield to police officers despite the officers' repeated attempts to stop him through the use of non-deadly force.").

Logan v. City of Pullman, 392 F.Supp.2d 1246, 1265-68 (E.D. Wash. 2005) ("Neither party can point the Court to controlling case law in the United States Supreme Court or this Circuit dealing with the use of pepper spray under the circumstances confronted by the Defendant Officers. However, the parties point the Court to a handful of relevant cases, which certainly define some of the acceptable limits of the use of pepper spray. . . . In light of the existing law, the Court determines it would be clear to a reasonable officer that the use of O.C. must be preceded by a warning when the officer's safety is not threatened and the officer is not trying to overcome resistance to arrest. Further, in light of LaLonde and Headwaters, a reasonable officer would know he has an obligation to render assistance after using O.C. and alleviate the symptoms of those individuals who were affected by the O.C. If the facts alleged by Plaintiffs are proven, the Defendant Officers used O.C. in a situation where a reasonable officer would have known it was clearly unlawful and did not render the necessary assistance they were obligated to provide under the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, the Defendant Officers are denied qualified immunity with respect to Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claims. . . . In conclusion, under the second prong of the Saucier analysis, the Court determines the law was clearly established such that a reasonable officer would know (1) his refusal to assist and calm individuals who were suffering from affects of O.C.; (2) taking efforts to keep individuals inside a building where O.C. was sprayed; and (3) preventing others from helping those individuals harmed by the O.C. would result in a violation of the individuals' Fourteenth Amendment rights. Accordingly, the Defendant Officers are not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the Plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment claims.") Escobedo v. City of Redwood City, No. C 03-3204-MJJ, 2005 WL 226158, at *9 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 28, 2005) (not reported) ("Neither Defendants nor Plaintiffs cite cases to support their respective positions regarding whether a reasonable police officer would know that the officers' specific conduct here–the continued use of nunchucks after initial use proved ineffective, the use of nunchucks on an already-handcuffed detainee, and the officers' full weight on the already handcuffed and prone suspect's back and neck–violated Escobedo's clearly-established Fourth Amendment right regarding excessive force. However, the Court's review of excessive force cases in which specific aspects of conduct were assessed under Saucier reveals that a reasonable officer would have known that these actions, if they occurred as claimed by Plaintiffs, were constitutionally excessive. For example, in Drummond, the Ninth Circuit found that a reasonable officer would have 'fair warning' that the pressure applied to the detainee in that case–two officers leaning their weight on the detainee's neck and torso for a substantial period of time–was unconstitutional. The instant case is distinguishable from the facts of Drummond in that the officers claim not to have been specifically aware that Escobedo was having trouble breathing and in that Escobedo was struggling with the officers fairly fiercely. However, neither of those distinctions alter the Court's conclusion here. First, the evidence indicates that Escobedo was screaming for help; whether or not he specifically said he could not breathe is not particularly significant in light of the force exerted by the officers. Second, although Escobedo was struggling with the officers, he was face-down, being held by six police officers, and handcuffed. The officers' continued pressure on his back (and possibly his neck) and their continued use of nunchucks in these circumstances, if true, was excessive and a reasonable officer would have known that. The Billington case cited by Defendants is distinguishable on its facts because the detainee in question physically attacked the officer and tried to turn the officer's gun on him. . . Escobedo did not pose that type of threat to the six police officers on top of him, particularly after he was handcuffed. The defendant officers are not entitled to qualified immunity here.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Cox v. Wilson, 971 F.3d 1159, 1169-73 (10th Cir. 2020) (amended on denial of reh'g en banc) ("Cox argues that the district court erred in failing to instruct the jury that in determining the reasonableness of Wilson's use of force, it could consider whether Wilson's own reckless conduct unreasonably created the need to use such force. . . .There is some Supreme Court authority supporting the district court's view of the law. In City & County of San Francisco, California v. Sheehan, the Court stated that a plaintiff could not 'establish a Fourth Amendment violation based merely on bad tactics that result[ed] in a deadly confrontation that could have been avoided.'. . Two years later, County of Los Angeles, California v. Mendez rejected the Ninth Circuit's 'provocation' rule, which had 'permit[ted] an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment where an officer intentionally or recklessly provokes a violent confrontation, if the provocation is an independent Fourth Amendment violation.'. . But Mendez made clear that it was not deciding the validity of the proposition of law stated in the sentence omitted from the instruction by the district court in this case. A footnote to the opinion states that the Court was declining to address the view that assessing the reasonableness of the use of force requires 'taking into account unreasonable police conduct prior to the use of force that foreseeably created the need to use it.'. . And after both Sheehan and Mendez we held in Pauly v. White that '[t]he reasonableness of the use of force depends not only on whether the officers were in danger at the precise moment that they used force, but also on whether the officers' own reckless or deliberate conduct during the seizure unreasonably created the need to use such force.'. . Nevertheless, the district court did not commit any error by declining to include the sentence in the instruction. A party is not entitled to a jury instruction just because it correctly states a proposition of law. It must be supported by the evidence at trial. . . . In this case, including the sentence omitted by the court would have denied Wilson the qualified immunity to which he was entitled. . . . Here, qualified immunity did not completely protect Wilson from Cox's claim. Cox was certainly entitled to an instruction on the unreasonable use of force. The jury could have inferred from the testimony of Officer Klaus and

of Ms. Kincaid that, contrary to Wilson's testimony, Cox had not made any attempt to drive his vehicle at Wilson when Wilson shot him, that Cox did not pose a threat of imminent danger to Wilson after Wilson exited his vehicle, and that therefore Wilson's use of deadly force against Cox was unreasonable. But the jury found otherwise. And, in light of the doctrine of qualified immunity, it would have been contrary to law for the jury to hold Wilson liable based on his conduct before the time of the shooting. Therefore, it would have been improper to give the jury an instruction that would have allowed it to do so. We explain. The sentence omitted from the instruction said: 'Defendant Don Wilson's own conduct prior to the shooting can be a part of your determination of reasonableness, but only if his own reckless or deliberate conduct during the seizure unreasonably created the need to use such force.'. . Cox sought the instruction to allow him to base liability on his claim that, even if Wilson was in imminent danger when he shot Cox, the only reason Wilson was exposed to danger was that he unreasonably exited his police vehicle and approached Cox's pickup. At trial Cox called as an expert witness a person with excellent credentials who testified that Wilson's recklessness created the danger leading to the shooting. The expert opined that Wilson should not have left his car to approach Cox because of the danger to Wilson once he was on foot on the Interstate and in a vulnerable position between his patrol car and Cox's vehicle. He said that Wilson should have remained in his vehicle and attempted to deescalate the situation, perhaps waiting for support from additional officers. And he said that once Wilson stepped onto the Interstate, he should have moved to a position of safety at the rear of his vehicle. Perhaps it would have been safer for Wilson to remain in his vehicle. But there were other considerations at play. Cox had ignored repeated warnings from Wilson to turn off his car's engine. Wilson reasonably believed that if Cox could continue to drive on the Interstate, he would present a profound danger to other motorists. Although Cox was temporarily boxed in, there was no reason for Wilson to believe that this situation would persist for any substantial amount of time; Kincaid did not turn off her engine and had not spoken with Wilson or otherwise informed him that she intended to remain stopped in front of Cox indefinitely. If Kincaid moved forward, Cox could have continued his dangerous driving, which, according to both Wilson and Kincaid, he appeared intent on doing. And both Wilson and Kincaid testified that Cox was repeatedly reaching down for something, which they assumed was a firearm. If Cox was to be prevented from further dangerous driving, the most reasonable thing for Wilson to do may have been to expose himself to danger in order to disable Cox from driving. More importantly, even if the jury was persuaded by the expert's trial testimony that Wilson had acted unreasonably in leaving his vehicle, qualified immunity protected Wilson from liability on that score. As Wilson frames the issue, the question on appeal is whether there is:

a controlling case finding a Fourth Amendment violation due to the officer's recklessly causing the need to use deadly force, where after participating in a high speed and dangerous chase of a suspect, the officer exited his vehicle during a temporary stop in traffic to confront the driver with a show of deadly force?

. . . Cox has not presented, nor are we aware of, any opinion by the Supreme Court or this court, or, for that matter, any other court, holding that an officer in similar circumstances acted unreasonably. It would have been error for the district court to instruct the jury that it could find Wilson liable on a ground for which he was protected by qualified immunity. A recent decision of this court provides a compelling illustration of the scope of qualified immunity where the issue was the same as in this case—allegedly unreasonable police conduct leading to the use of deadly force. [Court discusses Pauly v. White] . . . . Pauly illustrates the strength of the protection provided by qualified immunity. Unlike Wilson's decision to leave his vehicle to try to disable Cox's vehicle, the impropriety of the alleged actions by the officers before the shooting in Pauly would be apparent to most laypersons. Yet the Pauly officers were protected by qualified immunity because of the absence of clearly established law prohibiting their conduct. So too here.") Reavis for the Estate of Coale v. Frost, 967 F.3d 978, 988-95 (10th Cir. 2020) ("In evaluating whether the suspect poses an immediate threat when deadly force is employed, the court must consider the totality of the circumstances. That is, the question of whether there is no threat, an immediate deadly threat, or that the threat has passed, at the time deadly force is employed must be evaluated based on what a reasonable officer would have perceived under the totality of the circumstances. . . . Here, the district court properly assessed whether a jury could conclude Deputy Frost was no longer in danger when he fired shots into Mr. Coale's fleeing truck. While the district court focused its analysis on whether Deputy Frost was in danger at the precise moment that he used force against Mr. Coale, it did so in the context of the totality of the circumstances. . . The district court considered the events leading up to the shooting and found that Deputy Frost had 'moved or jumped out of the way of Mr. Coale's vehicle when it started moving in his direction.'. . And 'Defendant Frost did not fire his weapon until the front of the vehicle and Mr. Coale himself had passed him – all of the bullets were behind and to the side of Mr. Coale.'. . The district court also found that Deputy Frost and Mr. Coale 'were essentially alone on a dirt road, meaning that there were no other officers or bystanders to be concerned about the vehicle's path.'. . Taking all of these facts into consideration, the district court concluded that a reasonable jury could find that 'there was no immediate danger to other officers or civilians and the only risk at the moment the gun was fired was that created by Mr. Coale fleeing from the stop.'. .On these facts, and under the totality of the circumstances, the district court also properly rejected Deputy Frost's argument that he is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law because a reasonable officer in his position would have believed there was a threat of serious physical harm, even if there was no actual immediate threat when he pulled the trigger. The dissent contends, 'Neither Frost nor a reasonable officer could be expected to figure out instantaneously the suspect's next moves when the suspect had just tried to run him over.'. . But this contention ignores the facts found by the district court and the factual inferences that we must draw from those facts in favor of the Estate as the non-moving party. . . Importantly, Deputy Frost 'moved or jumped out of the way of Mr. Coale's vehicle when it started moving in his direction,' . . . and Deputy Frost raised his gun to fire '[a]bout the time [Mr. Coale's] side mirror passed by [him].'. . From these facts, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Deputy Frost's position would have perceived that Mr. Coale's vehicle had passed him, and he was no longer in any immediate danger from an oncoming vehicle when he raised his gun to fire. A reasonable officer in Deputy Frost's position would have also perceived that Mr. Coale's vehicle did not pose any immediate danger to anyone else as they were alone on a dirt road. Given that all the shots Deputy Frost fired were 'from behind and to the side' of Mr.

Coale's vehicle, . . . we further conclude that even in the short time it took Deputy Frost to raise his weapon and line up his shot, a reasonable officer would have perceived he was shooting at the back and side of a fleeing—not an oncoming—vehicle. . . Thus, a reasonable officer in Deputy Frost's position would have known when he raised his weapon and fired that there was no immediate threat of harm to himself or others such that 'the general dangers posed by [Mr. Coale's] reckless driving' were insufficient to justify the use of deadly force. . . Nonetheless, Deputy Frost contends he is entitled to qualified immunity under our decision in Clark v. Bowcutt, 675 F. App'x 799 (10th Cir. 2017) (unpublished). But Clark is easily distinguished. There, the officer was standing directly in front of an oncoming vehicle. . . Rather than move out of the way, the officer stood his ground and shot the driver through the vehicle's windshield. . . We held the officer's use of force was objectively reasonable because the officer was standing directly in the path of the oncoming car, inches from its bumper, when he used force to avoid being hit. . . In contrast, Deputy Frost's use of force was not to avoid being hit by Mr. Coale; the district court found that Deputy Frost had moved out of the truck's path and the vehicle had passed when Deputy Frost fired at the back and side of the truck, killing Mr. Coale. The other decisions Deputy Frost cites are similarly inapposite because the officers in those cases were in the path of an oncoming vehicle when they used deadly force. . . .In sum, on the facts that the jury could find, an objectively reasonable officer would not have feared for his life when Deputy Frost fired at Mr. Coale, the district court correctly denied summary judgment on whether Deputy Frost violated Mr. Coale's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . . The Estate must also demonstrate that the constitutional right 'was clearly established at the time [Deputy Frost shot Mr. Coale], such that "every reasonable official would have understood" that such conduct constituted a violation of that right.'. . . [T]he Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . 'Nevertheless, our analysis is not a scavenger hunt for prior cases with precisely the same facts, and a prior case need not be exactly parallel to the conduct here for the officials to have been on notice of clearly established law.'. . . It is clearly established that an officer may use deadly force when 'threatened by a weapon (which may include a vehicle attempting to run over an officer).' . . And our decisions have held that an officer's use of deadly force is objectively reasonable when the officer shoots at a vehicle coming directly toward the officer or toward other persons. . .But these cases do not answer the question before us—whether it is objectively reasonable for an officer to use deadly force to stop a fleeing vehicle when an objectively reasonable officer in Deputy Frost's position could have perceived that any threat posed by Mr. Coale's truck had abated before he fired. To answer that question, we turn to the Supreme Court's decision in Tennessee v. Garner, . . .which addressed a Tennessee statute permitting an officer to 'use all the necessary means to effect the arrest' of a fleeing suspect. . . Garner clearly established that when a 'suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others, the harm resulting from failing to apprehend him does not justify the use of deadly force to do so.'. . In other words, it is clearly established that an officer cannot use deadly force once a threat has abated. . . . As in Cordova, our analysis relies in part on the district court's conclusion that a reasonable jury could find that Mr. Coale's fleeing vehicle did not pose any immediate danger to Deputy Frost or others at the time of the shooting. So from Cordova's application of Garner's general principle to facts similar to those here, it was clearly established at the time Deputy Frost shot and killed Mr.

Coale that when an officer uses deadly force to stop a fleeing vehicle, he must do so based on an immediate threat to himself or a threat to others. And use of deadly force is clearly unreasonable when (1) the only threat is one posed by reckless driving and (2) the immediacy of the threat to the officer is a disputed fact that a reasonable jury could resolve against the officer. . . . Construing the facts, as the district court found them, in the light most favorable to the Estate, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Deputy Frost's position would have known when he raised his weapon and fired that there was no immediate threat of harm to himself or others. Accordingly, the focus of our analysis here is whether it was clearly established that an officer may not use deadly force to stop a fleeing vehicle when a reasonable officer would have perceived he was in no immediate danger at the time he fired. Given our decision in Cordova, it would be clear to every officer that the use of deadly force to stop a fleeing vehicle is unreasonable unless there is an immediate threat of harm to himself or others. Thus, it would also be clear to every reasonable officer—who would have perceived any threat posed by Mr. Coale's truck had abated—that the use of deadly force to stop Mr. Coale's truck was unreasonable. Accordingly, the district court correctly concluded that Deputy Frost had fair notice that opening fire at a fleeing vehicle that no longer posed a threat to himself or others was unlawful.") Reavis for the Estate of Coale v. Frost, 967 F.3d 978, 995-1003(10th Cir. 2020) (Briscoe, J., dissenting) ("I assume without deciding that Frost's actions (under the version of the facts a reasonable jury could find when read in the light most favorable to Coale) violated the Fourth Amendment. After careful review of applicable precedent, however, I cannot agree that every reasonable officer in Frost's position would have known that the law governing those actions was clearly established. This is especially true given recent Supreme Court rulings which have emphasized that 'clearly established law' requires prior precedent which 'squarely addresses' the specific circumstances confronting officers when they deploy force. Here, taking into account ambiguities in our case law, not every reasonable officer standing in Frost's shoes would have known it was illegal to fire as Coale's truck pulled close to him and passed. . . . The majority places a significant amount of weight on Tennessee v. Garner, . . . citing the case for the proposition that 'when a suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others, the harm resulting from failing to apprehend him does not justify the use of deadly force to do so.'. . But decisions like Garner 'lay out excessive-force principles at only a general level.'. . Stated differently, when an excessive force claim is in play, cases like Garner 'do not by themselves create clearly established law outside "an obvious case."'. . As we remarked in Estate of Smart v. City of Wichita, 951 F.3d 1161 (10th Cir. 2020), 'the Supreme Court has repeatedly chastised courts for relying in such a manner on its broad statement of the law in Garner.'. .We can presume that every reasonable officer is aware of general Fourth Amendment principles, but Supreme Court precedent requires at least one prior decision which 'squarely governs' the facts at hand. . . . Cordova was decided before the Supreme Court issued a number of decisions clarifying the 'clearly established' prong of the test for qualified immunity, including Plumhoff, . . . City & Cty. of San Francisco, . . . Mullenix, . . . White, . . . Kisela, . . . and City of Escondido[.] . . .That this court would focus on the 'precise moment' of the shooting to deny immunity would not necessarily have been clear under our case law to every reasonable officer. We have said that analyzing the precise moment of lethal force (and whether an officer recklessly created the need to use such force) is at most 'a specific application of'—not a substitute for—'the "totality of the circumstances" approach inherent in the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard.'. . . Although the 'precise moment' principle generally traces back to Sevier, the panel in that case ultimately dismissed the matter for lack of jurisdiction. . . We have continued to use the phrase in other decisions, often in the process of granting (rather than denying) immunity. [collecting cases] . . . . [W]hile the majority acknowledges the importance of the totality of the circumstances, today's ruling essentially rests on a single presumed fact. Over and over, the majority touts the possibility that a jury could conclude there was no threat of harm to Frost at the moment he fired, as shown by (inter alia) the deadly bullet coming from the back. . .Under binding Supreme Court precedent, that analysis is far too cramped. All of the circumstances matter. . . And as summarized above, there are at least ten other facts demonstrating that even if Frost made a mistake, not every reasonable officer would have known that our case law prohibited the use of his firearm in the specific circumstances he faced. Those facts come directly from the district court's opinion. . . In light of numerous excessive force cases from the Supreme Court which serve as our guide in addressing qualified immunity, I vote to reverse the denial of Frost's summary judgment motion. I therefore respectfully dissent.")

Myers v. Brewer, 773 F. App'x 1032, ____ (10th Cir. 2019) ("The circumstances here, as alleged in the complaint, are sufficient to indicate a Fourth Amendment violation. There was no crime at issue, and although the police received a call that Mr. Myers was in front of a bar with a shotgun, there are no allegations that he was prohibited from possessing a shotgun in public. Nor did he pose an immediate threat to the officers or anyone else—the officers did not arrive on scene for some forty-one minutes, and there are no allegations that Mr. Myers threatened anyone in the interim. . . Indeed, the complaint avers that he went home, put away his gun, and took his dog for a walk. . . . [T]here are no allegations that Mr. Myers was actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest. Rather, the complaint alleges that he was shot as he 'stood in the yard, with empty hands at his sides.'. . According to the complaint, he 'did not threaten the officers, brandish a weapon, or attempt to escape.'. . These allegations state a constitutional violation and satisfy the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. We turn to whether the law was clearly established. The Supreme Court has repeatedly admonished 'courts not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . . Undersheriff Brewer shot Mr. Myers from a distance of six to eight feet with a beanbag round fired from a 12-gauge shotgun. Although Mr. Myers had been in front of a bar with a shotgun some forty-one minutes earlier, when Undersheriff Brewer confronted him he had committed no crime, possessed no weapon, and immediately complied with the order to come out of the shed. He neither resisted arrest nor attempted to flee, though he did fail to put his hands up and get on the ground within the eight seconds of being ordered to do so before Undersheriff Brewer fired the beanbag. We have held it is clearly established that an officer uses excessive force when he executes a forceful takedown of a subject who at most was a misdemeanant, but otherwise posed no threat and did not resist arrest or flee. . . .We think Zuchel, Tenorio, and Morris clearly established that the use of force under the circumstances confronted by Undersheriff Brewer here was not objectively reasonable. Accordingly, we affirm the denial of qualified immunity.")

Lee v. Tucker, 904 F.3d 1145, 1149-50 (10th Cir. 2018) ([W]e lack jurisdiction to review the defendants' arguments, adopted by the dissent, that Lee posed an immediate threat and that he actively resisted arrest or attempted to flee. In this case, the district court 'conclude[d] that these disputed facts are indeed material, and it is for the jury to decide whether Mr. Lee resisted.' Consideration of challenges to this conclusion would 'require [us to] second-guess[ ] the district court's determinations of evidence sufficiency' and would accordingly exceed our interlocutory jurisdiction. . . We therefore dismiss the appeal as to these issues. . . . We do, however, have jurisdiction to review whether the facts as the district court found them would constitute a legal violation. . . . Cavanaugh establishes that the use of a Taser without warning on a non-resisting misdemeanant violates the Fourth Amendment's excessive force protections. Under the facts articulated by the district court, defendants violated Cavanaugh's dictate by repeatedly applying a Taser without warning, despite the fact that Lee was not resisting the officers and had not been advised that he was being detained. Although defendants seek to argue that Lee was in fact resisting their efforts to arrest him, we have no jurisdiction to review the district court's evidentiary conclusions.")

Lee v. Tucker, 904 F.3d 1145, 1151, 1158-59 (10th Cir. 2018) (Phillips, J., dissenting) ("I would conclude that the four deputy sheriffs did not act with excessive force under the Fourth Amendment, and, accordingly, that they violated no clearly established law. For this dissent, I focus on the majority's analysis of the clearly-established-law prong of qualified immunity. . . . I cannot see how Cavanaugh squarely governs Lee's case. Unlike the officer in Cavanaugh, the deputies here were locked in a physical struggle with Lee and had exhausted other efforts to handcuff him before Deputy Tucker used a Taser. Unlike the unsuspecting Ms. Cavanaugh, Lee had every reason to believe that the longer he succeeded in resisting the handcuffing, the more likely a deputy would use a Taser. Unlike what happened to Ms. Cavanaugh, Lee's body was not penetrated by fired prongs that left him limp and subject to a brain injury upon falling and hitting concrete steps. The more appropriate case in guiding our decision on the clearly-established-law prong is Aldaba v. Pickens (Aldaba II), 844 F.3d 870 (10th Cir. 2016). . . . Though a year earlier we ruled that the officers had violated Mr. Aldaba's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights, . . . we reversed ourselves on our initial clearly-established-law ruling after the Supreme Court vacated that judgment and remanded for our consideration in light of Mullenix. . . The second time around, we rejected the argument that Cavanaugh had provided the necessary clearly established law to overcome qualified immunity. . . If Cavanaugh cannot provide clearly established law sufficient to rule that Tasering a disturbed hospital patient is not excessive force, I don't see how the majority can reach a different result for Deputy Tucker's Tasering Lee during a physical struggle after other efforts to subdue Lee for handcuffing him failed. Though Aldaba II was decided two years after Lee's arrest, it surveyed all preceding cases in concluding that no precedent clearly established that all but plainly incompetent officers, or officers knowingly violating the law, would act with excessive force under the Fourth Amendment in Tasering a disturbed hospital patient. The same conclusion should apply for the deputies here in their Tasering

Clark v. Colbert, 895 F.3d 1258, 1264 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he fact that Clark was experiencing a psychotic episode cannot itself prevent summary judgment. Clark's illness factors into our analysis only as one circumstance in the totality. And though we have held police officers can incur liability for 'reckless' conduct that begets a deadly confrontation, see Allen v. Muskogee, 119 F.3d 837, 841 (10th Cir. 1997), that is not what happened here. No reasonable juror could find the officers' use of pepperballs to be a reckless provocation. . . At best, the officers wrongly predicted how Clark would react to the pepperballs. To say they should have known the plan would create a need to shoot Clark is to indulge in the very sort of hindsight revision the law forbids. . . This analysis compels affirmance of the district court's Fourth Amendment ruling. For Sheriff Colbert to be liable in any capacity for a violation of Clark's constitutional rights, Clark must show his constitutional rights were, in fact, violated. . . He has failed to produce sufficient evidence of that fact. The officers in this case confronted an armed and irate suspect who had already attacked his own brother. When he refused to submit to arrest, the officers preferenced nonlethal means of arrest over more dramatic and violent options. No reasonable juror could find the use of pepperballs objectively unreasonable in violation of the Fourth Amendment.")

Redmond v. Crowther, 882 F.3d 927, 939 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[A]lthough Whitley repeats the Eighth Amendment's general framework, the Supreme Court recently reminded us that it is a 'longstanding principle that clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality.' White, 137 S. Ct. at 552. General legal standards therefore rarely clearly establish rights. . . They only do so in 'an obvious case.'. . That is, a case in which the 'contours of a right are sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . This is no such case. Indeed, White is instructive. In that case, the Supreme Court reversed our circuit's conclusion that a right was clearly established. . . Our circuit erred, the Court explained, by relying on cases which laid out 'excessive-force principles at only a general level' to clearly establish the right, rather than 'identify[ing] a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances' violated that right. . . Redmond asks us to repeat this same mistake. Nor do the most factually similar cases from our circuit clearly establish that inadvertent exposure to gas violates the Eighth Amendment. To the contrary, in Gargan, a non-precedential unpublished decision, we held spraying an unarmed prisoner secured in his segregation cell with pepper spray did not violate the Eighth Amendment. . . And in DeSpain, we held it would violate the Eighth Amendment to 'indiscriminately' spray a prison tier with pepper spray as a practical joke. . . Neither case clearly establishes that it violates the Eighth Amendment to use CS gas to secure an uncooperative prisoner and, in doing so, inadvertently expose other prisoners to the gas. In sum, Nicholes and Powell are entitled to qualified immunity on the claim they violated the Eighth Amendment by exposing the prisoners to CS gas. Redmond cannot establish that the officers violated the Eighth Amendment and, even assuming they did, the right would not be clearly established.")

Farrell v. Montoya, 878 F.3d 933, 937-39 10th Cir. 2017) ("The application of controlling precedent to our case is straightforward. The Farrells were fleeing when Montoya fired his gun at their vehicle. Like the defendants in Hodari D and Brooks, they were not seized because, in fleeing, they were not submitting to the officers. Because they were not seized when Montoya fired his gun, there can be no excessive-force claim. . . Therefore, no reasonable jury could 'find facts supporting a violation of a constitutional right,' and the Farrells cannot overcome Montoya's qualified-immunity defense. . . . The Farrells also argue that they submitted to DeTavis when they pulled over (twice) before Montoya arrived, creating a seizure that continued at least until Montoya fired his gun. But neither this court, nor any court of which we are aware, has adopted the concept of an ongoing seizure. . . under which once a person is seized, the seizure is deemed to continue even after the individual takes flight. . . .In short, when Montoya fired at the van, the Farrells were fleeing. Though they had been seized moments before, that seizure ended when they no longer submitted to the officers' authority. And Montoya's shots themselves did not effect a seizure because the van continued its departure. The Farrells' alleged intent to submit when they could reach a police station was irrelevant because their conduct—the flight from the officers—did not manifest submission. As there was no seizure, there could be no unreasonable seizure, even if Montoya was using deadly force. The Farrells' claims against Montoya fail for lack of any violation of the Fourth Amendment.")

Harte v. Bd. of Commissioners of Cty. of Johnson, Kansas, 864 F.3d 1154, 1193-94 (10th Cir. 2017) (Phillips, J., joined by Moritz, J., in majority of panel on this issue) ("[T]hough I find it unreasonable to send seven deputies dressed in bulletproof vests, one displaying an assault rifle and the rest displaying pistols, to execute a warrant for a suspected small-time marijuana grow against a family with no criminal history, I can't say that every reasonable official would necessarily know that this conduct amounts to excessive force. . . The cases that the Hartes cite don't persuade me otherwise. Therefore, I would affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the deputies.") [See also Harte v. Bd. of Commissioners of Cty. of Johnson, Kansas, 940 F.3d 498 (10th Cir. 2019) (appeal from district court after remand)]

Estate of Redd by and through Redd v. Love, 848 F.3d 899, 911 (10th Cir. 2017) (In case brought by estate of arrestee, who committed suicide after he was arrested for illegally trafficking in Native American artifacts, the court concluded that "even interpreting the facts most favorably to the Estate, we see no constitutional violation. Agent Love's conduct—deploying twenty-two agents wearing soft body armor and carrying firearms in compliance with agency policy—was not objectively unreasonable under the circumstances. With this in mind, we of course also agree with the district court's conclusion that the Fourth Amendment right at issue in this case wasn't clearly established. Thus, we conclude that Agent Love was entitled to qualified immunity.")

Carabajal v. City of Cheyenne, Wyoming, 847 F.3d 1203, 1210-13 (10th Cir. 2017) ("Even if Officer Thornton's conduct constituted excessive force under the Fourth Amendment, it was not clearly established at the time of the shooting that Officer Thornton's conduct was unlawful. Typically, a preexisting Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision, or the weight of authority from other circuits, must make it apparent to a reasonable officer that the nature of his conduct is unlawful. . . Such precedent must have put the question of the reasonableness of the officer's conduct 'beyond debate.'. .As discussed above, this court in Thomas determined that an officer was entitled to qualified immunity in a situation involving suspects fleeing at relatively low speeds, given the threat of serious physical harm posed by a car moving in the officer's direction. . . The existence of this decision alone seems to foreclose Mr. Carabajal's argument that the unlawfulness of Officer Thornton's conduct was clearly established, and the cases upon which Mr. Carabajal relies do not alter that conclusion. Mr. Carabajal argues that the Supreme Court's decision in Mullenix v. Luna suggests that qualified immunity is more limited in cases where the driver travels at a low speed. But even accepting this inference as accurate, it suffices to say that an implication cannot put the unlawfulness of certain conduct beyond debate. We also question whether Officer Thornton's conduct at issue here was any more troubling than that of the officer who was granted qualified immunity in Mullenix. From an overpass 20 feet above I-27, that officer fired six shots at a fleeing vehicle traveling 85 miles per hour, inadvertently killing the driver, all in an effort to disable the vehicle. . .Mr. Carabajal also relies on three decisions from other circuits to contend that Officer Thornton was on fair notice of the unconstitutional nature of his conduct. . . Such cases, however, are too factually distinct to speak clearly to the situation Officer Thornton confronted. While Mr. Carabajal's cases involved disputes of material fact as to the position of the police officer relative to the vehicle at issue and therefore the threat posed to the officer, the video evidence here clearly shows Officer Thornton was positioned in the path of Mr. Carabajal's vehicle as it lurched forward. Even if these cases were not factually distinguishable, they are insufficient to demonstrate that the weight of authority makes it apparent that Officer Thornton's conduct was unreasonable, particularly in light of our decision in Thomas and the Eleventh Circuit's decision in Robinson v. Arrugueta, 415 F.3d 1252 (11th Cir. 2005). In Robinson, the court held that it was reasonable for an officer to use deadly force to stop a slow-moving vehicle advancing in his direction, and that clearly established law did not indicate otherwise. . .We emphasize, however, that our holding is not a blanket rule that a police officer is entitled to qualified immunity whenever he or she uses deadly force against the driver of a vehicle that is moving in the direction of the officer or other individuals. The determination of qualified immunity remains heavily dependent on the claim in light of the unique circumstances of each case. As discussed above, we conclude this particular claim warrants qualified immunity. . . . [I]n Plumhoff v. Rickard, . . . the Court noted the disagreement among federal appellate courts as to whether an automobile passenger is seized when an officer uses deadly force against the driver of the vehicle. . . Some circuits have interpreted the intent requirement in Brower to mean that the officer must have had the objective intent to stop a particular individual, while other circuits have interpreted it to require the objective intent to act in such a way that causes the intended result — a stop — regardless of the target. Compare, e.g., Landol-Rivera v. Cruz Cosme, 906 F.2d 791, 794–96 (1st Cir. 1990) (holding that a passenger who was accidentally shot by a police officer did not have a Fourth Amendment claim because the officer's intent was to shoot the fleeing driver, not the passenger), with, e.g., Vaughan v. Cox, 343 F.3d 1323, 1328–29 (11th Cir. 2003) (holding that a passenger who was accidentally shot was subjected to a Fourth Amendment seizure because the officer fired his weapon to stop the car). In Childress v. City of Arapaho, this court held that two hostages who were passengers in a vehicle being pursued by the police were not seized when police fired shots at the vehicle, inadvertently wounding the hostages. . . Plaintiffs maintain that Childress is distinguishable because it involved the police attempting to deliver hostages from a dangerous situation. However, we need not address whether our holding in Childress extends to passengers like V.M.C. We may affirm the district court's judgment as to this claim on any ground supported by record. . . Plaintiffs are not pursuing a municipal liability claim based on any seizure of V.M.C. . . . As to the individual liability of Officer Thornton, we note that he raised the defense of qualified immunity in his answer, . . . and pursued it by motion after this claim was dismissed. . . We conclude that, even if Plaintiffs pled a plausible unreasonable seizure claim as to V.M.C., Officer Thornton would be entitled to qualified immunity. This is so because Plaintiffs cannot demonstrate that the law was clearly established that a seizure of V.M.C. occurred in these circumstances. . .We are comfortable deciding this legal issue on qualified immunity given Plaintiffs' critique of the law contained in their opening brief:

The Tenth Circuit has yet to address whether the Fourth Amendment protects an automobile passenger seized during the use of deadly force against the driver. Other circuit courts of appeals are divided on the issue. The Supreme Court noted the split in the Circuits in Plumhoff, but specifically 'express[ed] no view on this question.' However, the Plumhoff Court hinted at a way forward, noting that in a previous case, County of Sacramento v. Lewis, the Court held that a passenger 'could recover under a substantive due process theory only if the officer had a purpose to cause harm unrelated to the legitimate object of the arrest.'

. . . We doubt Plaintiffs have the factual predicate for what they perceive as a hint. Regardless, a hint as to what the law may be cannot substitute for clearly established law. . . As Plaintiffs unequivocally acknowledge, the law simply is not clearly established.")

Clark v. Bowcutt, 675 F. App'x 799, 805-10 (10th Cir. 2017) ("We elect to focus on the first prong—viz., whether the defendant committed a constitutional violation—and it proves dispositive. . . .Ms. Clark limits her claim to the argument that deadly force was unconstitutionally used when Deputy Bowcutt 'deliberately stepped in front of Burkinshaw's vehicle as it was moving forward and remained in front of the vehicle despite opportunities to move aside' before shooting Mr. Burkinshaw. . . Ms. Clark also argues that the pursuit leading up to the shooting did not create an imminent threat of harm and therefore did not justify the use of deadly force. Deputy Bowcutt, on the other hand, contends that his use of deadly force was justified because he reasonably perceived that Mr. Burkinshaw's operation of the Volkswagen posed an immediate threat of death. We recognize that this case presents a unique set of facts and circumstances. In accordance with Supreme Court precedent instructing us to review the reasonableness of Deputy Bowcutt's actions by 'balanc[ing] the nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against the importance of the governmental interests alleged to justify the intrusion,'. . . we will consider the three non-exclusive factors set forth in Graham, 490 U.S. at 396, and the four factors articulated in Estate of Larsen, 511 F.3d at 1260, to shed light on whether a constitutional violation occurred. Ms. Clark does not dispute that the third Graham factor, 'whether [the suspect] is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight,' . . . favors Deputy Bowcutt. Specifically, Ms. Clark concedes that Mr. Burkinshaw 'was attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . Therefore, we need only consider whether the first and second Graham factors support her claim. . . .The second Graham factor, 'whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others,'. . . more clearly favors Deputy Bowcutt and proves crucial to the outcome here. We reach this conclusion after first considering whether Deputy Bowcutt 'could have reasonably perceived he was in danger at the precise moment that he used force and whether his own reckless or deliberate conduct (as opposed to mere negligence) unreasonably created a need to use force.'. . Deputy Bowcutt argues that his use of deadly force was justified because he reasonably perceived that Mr. Burkinshaw's operation of the Volkswagen posed an immediate threat of death. Acknowledging that the dashboard camera video does not capture the entire episode in this case, it is nevertheless readily apparent to us from examining the video that Mr. Burkinshaw posed an immediate threat to Deputy Bowcutt's safety. Mr. Burkinshaw continued to drive his Volkswagen forward as Deputy Bowcutt stepped backwards; his vehicle's bumper was just inches away from Deputy Bowcutt. Despite Deputy Bowcutt's orders to stop, Mr. Burkinshaw did not. Deputy Bowcutt had mere seconds to react. We conclude that a reasonable officer in Deputy Bowcutt's position 'would have feared for his life,'. . and his actions in firing at Mr. Burkinshaw were reasonable. Even if he was mistaken as to the imminence of the threat to his safety, it is axiomatic that '[a]n officer may be found to have acted reasonably even if he has a mistaken belief.'. . . If a reasonable officer in Deputy Bowcutt's position 'would have feared for his life,' then the 'urgency of terminating the chase would increase and the balance would tip in the officer['s] favor.'. . .Ms. Clark also makes much of the purported recklessness of Deputy Bowcutt's conduct in stepping in front of Mr. Burkinshaw's Volkswagen. Similarly, the district court concluded that '[i]f Bowcutt could have reasonably moved out of the way, his decision to step in front of the car and remain there when it became apparent Burkinshaw was not going to stop may be found by a jury to have been reckless and to have unnecessarily created the need to use deadly force.'. . However, '[t]his is tantamount to the proposition that a citizen has a Fourth Amendment right to be free of police actions contributing to the use of deadly force by the citizen.'. . . That proposition is unsupported by our precedent. . . . Moreover, our inquiry on excessive force must focus on whether 'the officer was in danger in the moment of the threat.'. . And '[m]ere negligent actions precipitating a confrontation would not ... be actionable under § 1983[.]'. . . We would be hard-pressed to label Deputy Bowcutt's conduct negligent, much less reckless. Deputy Bowcutt's act of stepping in front of the Volkswagen did not unreasonably create the need to use force; the totality of the circumstances shows that his actions were reasonable. . . . Accordingly, with the totality of the factual circumstances in mind, the Estate of Larsen factors—viewed alongside the variables that Graham specifically identifies—powerfully support Deputy Bowcutt's position that his use of deadly force was reasonable.") Aldaba v. Pickens, 844 F.3d 870, 871-74 & n.1, 877-80 (10th Cir. 2016) (on remand from Supreme Court) ("After the Supreme Court granted certiorari in Pickens v. Aldaba, 136 S. Ct. 479 (2015) (mem.), it vacated our judgment and remanded 'for further consideration in light of Mullenix v. Luna, 577 U.S. ----, 136 S. Ct. 305 ... (2015) (per curiam).' Having further considered our earlier opinion, we now hold that the three law-enforcement officers are entitled to qualified immunity because they did not violate clearly established law. We do not decide whether they acted with excessive force. Hence we reverse the district court's judgment and remand with instructions to grant summary judgment in favor of the three law-enforcement officers. . . .The Mullenix Court rejected the rationale that the Fifth Circuit used to deny Trooper Mullenix qualified immunity. Specifically, the Supreme Court rejected the Fifth Circuit's using as clearly established law a general rule that 'a police officer may not "use deadly force against a fleeing felon who does not pose a sufficient threat of harm to the officer or others."'. . It harked back to Brosseau, where it had rejected as 'mistaken' the Ninth Circuit's use of an equally general test for excessive force taken from Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), namely, that 'deadly force is only permissible where the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.'. . In repeating the proper rule for what qualifies as clearly established law, the Mullenix Court quoted its earlier cases. . . .We summarize by noting that the Mullenix Court rejected the Fifth Circuit's analysis applying Trooper Mullenix's acts against a general legal rule—that is, 'a police officer may not "use deadly force against a fleeing felon who does not pose a sufficient threat of harm to the officer or others"'—to meet the requirement of clearly established law. . . Instead, though not requiring a case directly on point,[1] the Court looked to see if any case would make it clear to every reasonable official that Trooper Mullenix's actions would amount to excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. [fn.1 The Estate relies heavily on Hope v. Pelzer, . . . which pronounced that law is clearly established if it gives officials 'fair notice' or 'fair warning' that 'his conduct deprived his victim of a constitutional right.' To show clearly established law, the Hope Court did not require earlier cases with 'fundamentally similar' facts, noting that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . This calls to mind our sliding-scale approach measuring the egregiousness of conduct. . . But the Supreme Court has vacated our opinion here and remanded for us to reconsider our opinion in view of Mullenix, which reversed the Fifth Circuit after finding that the cases it relied on were 'simply too factually distinct to speak clearly to the specific circumstances here.'. . We also note that the majority opinion in Mullenix does not cite Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002). As can happen over time, the Supreme Court might be emphasizing different portions of its earlier decisions. In this regard, we note Justice Thomas's dissent in Hope, where he complains that the Court ignored Malley v. Briggs's pronouncement that qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . In any event, the Supreme Court told us to apply Mullenix, so we do.] The Court found no case doing so. . . In this regard, it cited key facts distinguishing Trooper Mullenix's case from earlier ones—'when Mullenix fired, he reasonably understood Leija to be a fugitive fleeing arrest, at speeds over 100 miles per hour, who was armed and possibly intoxicated, who had threatened to kill any officer he saw if the police did not abandon their pursuit, and who was racing towards [another officer's] position.'. . The Mullenix Court concluded that none of its precedents 'squarely governed' this situation. The precedents did not establish 'beyond debate' that Mullenix had acted with excessive force. . . The Mullenix Court required more than an excessive-force finding insufficiently backed by existing precedent (choosing not to address whether the Fifth Circuit's excessive-force finding was correct). . . .We erred in a somewhat different way by relying on excessive-force cases markedly different from this one. Although we cited Graham v. Conner, 490 U.S. 386 (1989) to lead off our clearly-established-law discussion, we did not just repeat its general rule and conclude that the officers' conduct had violated it. Instead, we turned to our circuit's sliding-scale approach measuring degrees of egregiousness in affirming the denial of qualified immunity. . . We also relied on several cases resolving excessive-force claims. But none of those cases remotely involved a situation as here: three law-enforcement officers responding to a distress call from medical providers seeking help in controlling a disruptive, disoriented medical patient so they could provide him life-saving medical treatment. . . 'A clearly established right is one that is "sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right."'. . . Although plaintiffs can overcome a qualified-immunity defense without a favorable case directly on point, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question "beyond debate."'. . 'The dispositive question is "whether the violative nature of the particular conduct is clearly established."'. . In the Fourth Amendment context, 'the result depends very much on the facts of each case,' and the precedents must 'squarely govern' the present case. . . . Under these rules, the Estate cannot show that the officers violated clearly established law. As mentioned, the Estate's offered cases differ too much from this one, so reading them would not apprise every objectively reasonable officer that restraining Leija for medical treatment, as here, would amount to excessive force (and, again, we do not decide whether the officers acted with excessive force). The vast differences between the Estate's primary cases and this one are best seen by examining them individually. [Court discusses Casey, Cavanaugh, and Cruz] None of these three cases would advise 'every reasonable official' that Tasering Leija to hasten life-saving care would amount to excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. Here, the three law-enforcement officers were not arresting Leija. Instead, they were assisting his medical providers, who needed to control him so they could provide emergency care. Leija was beyond reason and if allowed to leave the hospital would face death—so said his doctor. Unlike the officers in the three cases above, the law-enforcement officers here tried to calm Leija and Tasered him only after their other efforts had failed. Undoubtedly, they faced a difficult situation, and no nearby medical provider advised against using the Taser. We have found no case presenting a similar situation. We certainly cannot say that every reasonable officer would know that the Fourth Amendment condemned using a Taser to avoid a full-out physical confrontation with a patient whose life depended on immediate treatment. No case renders a Fourth Amendment violation 'beyond debate.'. . .Finally, the Estate relies on a line of cases in which plaintiffs alleged that law-enforcement officers had used excessive force against persons suffering from mental illness or diminished capacity. As with the above cases, these cases did not involve medical providers standing nearby while officers used a Taser to subdue a person temporarily out of his mind and needing life-assisting medical treatment. Instead, these additional cases involve force used to detain persons for non-medical reasons. With this key difference in mind, we cannot say that clearly established law informed the officers that their actions would violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . As with the Estate's other cases, none of these additional cases would inform the three officers 'beyond debate' that their actions would be excessive force. Again, the officers here were acting to restrain Leija so that his medical providers—standing by observing—could administer life-saving care. The three officers' conduct is nothing like that exhibited in the cited cases. Certainly, none of those cases squarely governs this one. And nothing suggests that the three law-enforcement officers were plainly incompetent or knowingly violated the law. . . Accordingly, we remand this case with instructions that the district court grant summary judgment in favor of the three officers based on qualified immunity.")

A.M. v. Holmes, 830 F.3d 1123, 1153 n.17 (10th Cir. 2016) ("As we noted supra in Part II, in conducting a clearly-established-law analysis, this circuit uses a sliding-scale approach that demands less specificity in the clearly established law the more egregious the conduct that effects the constitutional violation. In other words, the latter (i.e., the egregiousness of the conduct) is in inverse relationship with the former (i.e., the specificity of the clearly established law). Under such an approach, we do not gainsay that, under certain circumstances where the excessive force is of a particularly egregious nature (e.g., an incredibly reckless taking of a human life by a law-enforcement officer), Graham or little more may qualify as the clearly established law that defeats a qualified-immunity defense. See Pauly v. White, 814 F.3d 1060, 1075 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Thus, when an officer's violation of the Fourth Amendment is particularly clear from Graham itself, we do not require a second decision with greater specificity to clearly establish the law." (quoting Casey, 509 F.3d at 1284)), pet. for cert. filed (U.S. July 11, 2016) (No. 16–67); see also Browder v. City of Albuquerque, 787 F.3d 1076, 1083 (10th Cir. 2015) (noting that hardly any caselaw specificity was necessary in our clearly-established-law inquiry because the appeal involved a deadly motor-vehicle accident where the officer was "speeding on [his] own business"). It would border on the fatuous, however, for A.M. to suggest that Officer Acosta's treatment of F.M.—notably, his handcuffing of him—constitutes one of those rare instances of egregious conduct where Graham, alone, would be a sufficient source of clearly established law.")

Davis v. Clifford, 825 F.3d 1131, 1137 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Looking at other circuits, this case is closely akin to Deville v. Mercantel, 567 F.3d 156 (5th Cir. 2009), which held that the law was clearly established that officers used excessive force in executing a minor traffic stop by breaking the driver's-side window, roughly extracting the driver from the car, and tightly handcuffing her, causing severe nerve damage, when she passively resisted arrest. . . Because all of the Graham factors are in Davis' favor, 'a reasonable officer would know based on his training that the force used was not justified.'. . Thus, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Davis, we conclude she has met her burden to demonstrate that the law was clearly established that the officers used excessive force. Thus, Clifford and Fahlsing are not entitled to qualified immunity and we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to these two officers.")

Perea v. Baca, 817 F.3d 1198, 1202-05 (10th Cir. 2016) ("We first determine whether the officers' repeated tasering of Perea after he had been subdued constitutes a violation of the Fourth Amendment right to be free of excessive force. Holding that it does, we then consider whether it was clearly established, at the time of the violation, that such conduct was unconstitutional. Because it is clear from this circuit's precedent that using disproportionate force, in this case a taser, against a subdued misdemeanant is a violation of the Fourth Amendment, we affirm the denial of qualified immunity. . . .The officers tasered Perea once in 'probe mode' and nine times in 'stun mode' within the span of two minutes, continuing after Perea had been effectively subdued. Even if Perea initially posed a threat to the officers that justified tasering him, the justification disappeared when Perea was under the officers' control. It is not reasonable for an officer to repeatedly use a taser against a subdued arrestee they know to be mentally ill, whose crime is minor, and who poses no threat to the officers or others . . . Because the officers repeated use of the taser cannot be described as reasonable, at least after the point Perea was subdued, the third Graham factor weighs against the officers. Viewing the facts as stated by the district court in the light most favorable to Appellees, Jaramillo and Baca's actions were objectively unreasonable. Perea was tackled to the ground for—at most—a traffic infraction. He posed no threat to the officers or others until the officers initiated the arrest. The officers then tasered him repeatedly despite not explaining what they were doing or why they were attempting to subdue him. Most egregiously, they continued tasering Perea after he was effectively subdued and brought under the officers' control. The repeated use of the taser against a subdued offender is clearly unreasonable and constitutes excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. . . Having concluded that the officers' conduct violated the Fourth Amendment, we next address whether—at the time of the events of this case—it was clearly established that the officers' actions constituted excessive force. It is clearly established that specific conduct violates a constitutional right when Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court precedent would make it clear to every reasonable officer that such conduct is prohibited. . . .[O]ur precedent is clear that continued use of force after an individual has been subdued is a violation of the Fourth Amendment. We must accordingly conclude that continuing to taser Perea, a subdued misdemeanant, violated clearly established law.")

Tenorio v. Pitzer, 802 F.3d 1160, 1164-65 (10th Cir. 2015) ("[T]he district court ruled that the record supports some potential jury findings that would establish Tenorio's claim—in particular, that Tenorio 'did not "refuse" to drop the knife because he was not given sufficient time to comply' with Pitzer's order; that Tenorio made no hostile motions toward the officers but was merely 'holding a small kitchen knife loosely by his thigh and ... made no threatening gestures toward anyone.'; that Tenorio was shot 'before he was within striking distance of [Pitzer]; and that, for all Pitzer knew, Tenorio had threatened only himself and was not acting or speaking hostilely at the time of the shooting.'. . . As previously noted, we cannot second guess the district court's assessment of the evidence on this interlocutory appeal; and we are comfortable that the evidence, viewed in this light, suffices for Tenorio's claims. In fact, our precedents compel this result. Our decision in Zuchel v. City & County of Denver, 997 F.2d 730, 735–37 (10th Cir.1993), as construed in Walker v. City of Orem, 451 F.3d 1139, 1160 (10th Cir.2006), sets forth the clearly established law that resolves this case.")

Tenorio v. Pitzer, 802 F.3d 1160, 1166-67, 1170 (10th Cir. 2015) (Phillips, J., dissenting) ("I would reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment for Officer Pitzer based upon qualified immunity. I see no violation of Russell Tenorio's constitutional rights, let alone one clearly established in our law. . . .As I read the majority opinion, it refuses qualified immunity to any law-enforcement officer who shoots a knife-wielding suspect unless that person 'charges' the officer and aggressively motions toward the officer with the knife. . . The majority believes this result is compelled by this single sentence taken from Walker v. City of Orem, 451 F.3d 1139, 1160 (10th Cir .2006):

> It was specifically established [in Zuchel v. City & Cty. of Denver, 997 F.2d 730, 735–36 (10th Cir.1993) (Zuchel II)] that where an officer had reason to believe that a suspect was only holding a knife, not a gun, and the suspect was not charging the officer and had made no slicing or stabbing motions toward him, that it was unreasonable for the officer to use deadly force against the suspect.

I disagree with the majority that Walker so dramatically shrunk—or intended to shrink—our analytical framework applied in Zuchel II until now. Rather than narrowing a robust totality-of-circumstances inquiry to two meager factors, I believe Walker simply recognized the importance of those factors as part of evaluating qualified immunity. . . . In short, I believe the majority has derailed our qualified-immunity analysis from its previously sensible course, and rerouted it away from Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit precedent. Its quick knockout punch to qualified immunity absent charging, slashing, and stabbing precludes officers from firing shots even when a knife-wielding man gets within, or extremely close to, stabbing range so long as he gets there by walking (not charging) and has positioned his knife for a quick thrust (without the fanfare of menacingly waving it before striking).")

King v. Hill, 615 F. App'x 470, 477, 479 (10th Cir. 2015) ("The Supreme Court said in Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), that '[a] police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead.'. . . Garner, which involved a fleeing suspect rather than a defiant and threatening one, does not alone clearly establish the law applicable to the circumstances of this case. But it supplies a foundational principle concerning the limits on the use of deadly force against unarmed suspects. . . .We conclude that, taken together, Garner, Zuchel, Zia, and Walker clearly establish that a reasonable officer in Deputy Hill's circumstances would have understood that shooting Mr. King was unconstitutional deadly force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The district court therefore correctly denied Deputy Hill's motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity.")

Fancher v. Barrientos, 723 F.3d 1191, 1201(10th Cir. 2013) ("According to the factual scenario upon which the district court based its rejection of Barrientos's claim to qualified immunity, which this court lacks the authority to review, Barrientos fired six shots into a suspect who was 'no longer able to control the vehicle, to escape, or to fire a long gun, and thus, may no longer have presented a danger to the public, Deputy Barrientos, or other responding officers.'. . Prior to shooting Dominguez, Barrientos 'stepped back, felt safer, and noticed Mr. Dominguez slump.'. . This allowed him 'enough time ... to recognize and react to the changed circumstances and cease firing his gun.'. . Under these circumstances, we have no trouble concluding Barrientos lacked probable cause to believe Dominguez posed a threat of serious harm to Barrientos or others at the time he fired shots two through seven. . . We further have no trouble concluding a reasonable officer in Barrientos's position would have known that firing shots two through seven was unlawful. . . Accordingly, the district court, in evaluating Barrientos's assertion of qualified immunity, did not err in concluding Barrientos violated clearly established law when he fired shots two through seven.")

Wilson v. City of Lafayette, No. 11–1403, 2013 WL 518558, *2-*6 (10th Cir. Feb. 13, 2013) (not published) ("To demonstrate the infringement of a clearly established right, a plaintiff must direct this court 'to cases from the Supreme Court, the Tenth Circuit, or the weight of authority from other circuits.'. . This isn't to say a plaintiff must always identify a case on point. Sometimes even a 'general constitutional rule that has already been established can apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . . In all events, however, it remains necessary for the plaintiff to demonstrate that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he' did violated the law. . . Turning first to the published cases from this and other circuits and the Supreme Court, none would have clearly alerted a reasonable officer in August 2006 that the conduct at issue in this case amounted to constitutionally excessive force. To the contrary, as the Sixth Circuit held after conducting an exhaustive survey of relevant cases from across the country, 'prior to May 2007 (and for several years after), no case in any circuit held that officers used excessive force by tasing suspects who were actively resisting arrest, even though many of them ... were suspected of innocuous crimes, posed little risk of escape and had not yet physically harmed anybody.' Hagans v. Franklin Cnty. Sheriff's Office, 695 F.3d 505, 511 (6th Cir.2012). . . . [T]here is no dispute Mr. Wilson was fleeing or that his actions in reaching for his pocket, especially after being warned not to do so, could lead a reasonable officer to worry he might have a lethal weapon and was prepared to use it. Whether the tasing in our case amounted to the use of 'deadly force' subject to heightened scrutiny, moreover, the law did not say in 2006, nor do the Wilsons suggest otherwise. Given all this, we cannot say the case law the Wilsons cite, even if it predated the incident at issue, would go so far as to clearly establish a Fourth Amendment violation in this case. Were we to slide down the scale further still, away from cases altogether and toward more general constitutional principles, we would still be unable to say Officer Harris should have known his conduct was constitutionally excessive. . . . To win damages, the Wilsons must show the force the officer used under the rapidly evolving circumstances he faced was clearly excessive as of 2006. And this the Wilsons fail to do: they identify no authority or general legal principle suggesting the use of the taser in this case was clearly excessive in light of Officer Harris's legitimate self-defense interest. . . .Without case law to support their cause or any clear lesson to be drawn from the Graham factors, the Wilsons and dissent seek to make much of the fact that Officer Harris 'intentionally' or at least 'recklessly' aimed the taser at Mr. Wilson's 'head.'. . But under long settled Fourth Amendment law, our analysis may not be informed by the officer's subjective intent or motives in deploying that force. . . . Given all this, we simply cannot share the dissent and Wilsons' confidence that the officer's testimony is worthy of no credence and he ' "intentionally" shot Wilson in the head in the same way [he] "intentionally" [chose] to use a taser to stop the defendant instead of tackling him.'. . . Given the direction we have from the Supreme Court and this court's precedent, and in light of the state of the law as of 2006, we cannot say the district court erred in its decision to grant qualified immunity.")

Wilson v. City of Lafayette, No. 11–1403, 2013 WL 518558, *6, *11-*13 (10th Cir. Feb. 13, 2013) (not published) (Briscoe, C.J., concurring in part in the result, and dissenting) ("I respectfully concur in part, and dissent in part. The majority fails to give sufficient weight to the fact that the taser used by Officer Harris on August 4, 2006, had a targeting function, that Officer Harris fired at Ryan Wilson from only ten to fifteen feet away, and that the training manual specifically warned officers against aiming at the head or throat unless necessary. . . . Even if Ryan Wilson's conduct here was more culpable than in the taser cases cited by the majority, an intentional or reckless taser shot to the head seems to merit an even higher burden for a government actor to justify his use of force. . . . Because there is no evidence that tasing Ryan Wilson in the body would not have sufficed, tasing him in the head, if intentional or reckless, was an unreasonable use of force in affecting the arrest. Thus, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, Harris violated Ryan Wilson's Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure. . . .As alleged, Officer Harris's conduct was sufficiently egregious that the lack of perfectly analogous taser cases at the time of Ryan Wilson's death should not shield Harris from suit. . . . If a jury were to conclude that Harris intentionally or recklessly shot Ryan Wilson in the head with the taser, his conduct would be egregious. . . . And a reasonable officer would know that aiming or recklessly tasing Ryan Wilson in the head under the circumstances presented was unconstitutional.")

Wilson v. City of Lafayette, No. 11–1403, 2013 WL 518558, *14-*17 (10th Cir. Feb. 13, 2013) (not published) (Matheson, J., concurring) ("Construing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Wilsons, Officer Harris was 10 to 15 feet away from Ryan Wilson when he tasered him in the head. Despite the countervailing circumstances—including Ryan Wilson's felony conduct, fleeing arrest and ignoring law enforcement commands, and reaching for his pocket—the Graham factors point to excessive force, as Chief Judge Briscoe concludes. The clearly established law element of qualified immunity, however, is closer for me. Because the Wilsons bear the burden of proving that element, Lynch v. Barnett, 703 F.3d 1153, 2013 WL 49713, at *3 (10th Cir.2013), I concur in the result reached by Judge Gorsuch in affirming Officer Harris's qualified immunity. I add a few comments on the clearly established law issue. . . .[A] clearly established constitutional violation exists if there is a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point or the clear weight of authority from other courts establishes the law as the plaintiffs contend. . . No such case law is available here. Second, if the officer's conduct was 'obviously egregious,' a clearly established constitutional violation may exist even if there are no cases specifically on point. . . .Officer Harris's conduct in this case—tasing a resisting, fleeing, and potentially threatening felony suspect in the head in violation of safety protocol—while excessive, does not seem to reach the level of egregiousness of the foregoing examples. Third, a violation may be clearly established based on general constitutional principles. . . Courts have found police conduct to violate clearly established law absent case law on point and without labeling the behavior egregious if the Graham factors tilt so clearly in favor of the plaintiff that any reasonable officer would have been on notice that the force used was unlawful. . . .In addition, cases published after the incident can establish that the law was not clearly established at the time of the incident. . . .The level of force in the present case was greater than that applied in the two cases in Mattos, which did not involve taser shots to the head, but the seriousness of Mr. Wilson's suspected crime was also greater than that of the crime in Mattos. The taser shot to the head in this case constituted more force than a single taser shock. In this way, it may be considered analogous to the repeated taser use in Orem. However, the risk at the time Officer Harris fired his taser was also greater than the risk faced by the officer in Orem; the Orem suspect was physically restrained, while Mr. Wilson was actively resisting arrest, fleeing, and reaching for his pocket. In short, although I believe the Graham analysis establishes a constitutional violation in this case, whether it is so one-sided as to make the violation clearly established absent case law on point is less clear.")

Kaufman v. Higgs, 697 F.3d 1297, 1304 (10th Cir. 2012) ("In sum: the Defendants have never contended that their encounter with Mr. Kaufman was other than consensual; the law was well established that a citizen has no obligation to answer an officer's questions during a consensual encounter; and the Colorado Supreme Court had made it clear that the Colorado obstruction statute is not violated by mere verbal opposition to an officer's questioning, thus making it beyond dispute Mr. Kaufman's conduct did not violate the statute. It follows that the Defendants could not have reasonably thought that they were justified in arresting Plaintiff and their motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity should have been denied. We should reverse the judgment of the district court and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Morris v. Noe, 672 F.3d 1185, 1196-98 (10th Cir. 2012) ("Because the existence of excessive force is a fact-specific inquiry, . . . 'there will almost never be a previously published opinion involving exactly the same circumstances.' . . Thus, we have adopted a sliding scale: 'The more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.'. . In fact, we do not always require case law on point. '[W]hen an officer's violation of the Fourth Amendment is particularly clear from Graham itself, we do not require a second decision with greater specificity to clearly establish the law.'. . .The district court discussed, and Plaintiff cites, a number of cases involving police tackles or takedowns. Most of these cases are of limited usefulness, however, because the facts are dissimilar to this case. Several cases found excessive force based on abusive conduct subsequent to the takedown. . . . Ultimately, however, we may conclude a constitutional right was clearly established, even in the absence of similar prior cases, if the force is clearly unjustified based on the Graham factors. . . . Graham establishes that force is least justified against nonviolent misdemeanants who do not flee or actively resist arrest. . . . Noe had reason to believe Morris was, at most, a misdemeanant. But Morris posed no threat to Noe or others, nor did he resist or flee. Thus, based on the facts assumed by the district court, Morris's right to be free from a forceful takedown was clearly established under Graham. Defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity on either of Plaintiff's claims.")

Romero v. Story, 672 F.3d 880, 889-91 (10th Cir. 2012) ("The Supreme Court has told us that when law enforcement officers knock on a door without a search warrant and the occupant makes the decision to open the door and speak to the officers, the occupant 'may refuse to answer any questions at any time.'. . This holding is unremarkable and certainly not novel. If the officers want to force a suspect to speak, they must have reasonable suspicion or probable cause. The Constitution mandates no less. Because we hold Defendants lacked reasonable suspicion to detain Plaintiff for the vandalism, Defendants lacked probable cause to arrest Plaintiff for flight or evasion under N.M. Stat. Ann. § 30–22–1(B), thereby violating Plaintiff's constitutional right to be free from unlawful arrest. . . Even though we hold Plaintiff has alleged a constitutional violation for unlawful arrest, Plaintiff still must show Defendants violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . .Having determined the district court properly denied Defendants qualified immunity as to Plaintiff's unlawful arrest claim, we must now move to Plaintiff's excessive force claim. The district court did not decide the excessive force claim. Instead, the court interpreted our precedent to hold that the outcome of an excessive force claim depends on the outcome of an unlawful arrest claim. . . . But this was a misreading of our case law. We have held that where, as here, a case involves 'claims of both unlawful arrest and excessive force arising from a single encounter,' the district court must 'consider both the justification the officers had for the arrest and the degree of force they used to effect it.'. . In Cortez, we emphasized the inquiries regarding unlawful arrest and excessive force are 'separate and independent, though the evidence may overlap.'. . In application, a plaintiff may argue law enforcement officers unlawfully arrested him. If the plaintiff successfully proves his case, 'he is entitled to damages for the unlawful arrest, which includes damages resulting from any force reasonably employed in effecting the arrest.'. . If the plaintiff also alleges excessive force, the district court must conduct a separate and independent inquiry regardless of whether the plaintiff's unlawful arrest claim is successful. . . And if the district court concludes the arrest was unlawful, the court may not automatically find any force used in effecting the unlawful arrest to be excessive. Instead, the district court must then analyze the excessive force inquiry under the assumption the arrest was lawful. . . . Plaintiff argues we should find excessive force and deny qualified immunity on that claim rather than remand to the district court for an independent examination of Plaintiff's excessive force claim. . . . Because the district court did not even evaluate whether the force was excessive, we vacate the denial of qualified immunity as to Plaintiff's excessive force claim and remand to the district court to evaluate the excessive force claim separate and independent from the unlawful arrest claim.")

White v. Martin, 425 F. App'x 736, 2011 WL 2210098, at *7-*9 (10th Cir. 2011) ("Even when conduct is unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment, the defendant may still have a qualified immunity defense on whether there was a violation of a clearly established constitutional right at the time of the incident. . . . .[A] factually identical case is not required, but 'it must still be apparent to a reasonable officer in light of pre-existing law that his conduct was unlawful.'. . .[T]he video evidence allows inferences in favor of Mr. White that he was choked when not resisting, was not a threat, was not attempting to flee, and was seeking assistance from the other trooper. Once these inferences are made, and taking into account the other evidence, the violation of Mr. White's Fourth Amendment right against excessive force is clearly established for purposes of denying the summary judgment motion. Whether these inferences will hold up following additional discovery or at trial will be determined in further proceedings in the district court.")

Cavanaugh v. Woods Cross City, 625 F.3d 661, 666, 667 (10th Cir. 2010) ("[T]he qualified immunity analysis involves more than 'a scavenger hunt for prior cases with precisely the same facts.'. . . In this case, we need not engage in the extended inquiry of deciding whether there is a prior case decided at the appropriate level of certainty. In Casey, we faced very similar factual circumstances: a police officer used her Taser against a non-violent misdemeanant who appeared to pose no threat and who was given no warning or chance to comply with the officer's demands.

Casey, 509 F.3d at 1281-82. There we held that the officer's actions violated the Fourth Amendment, and that the law was clearly established as of August 25, 2003, the date on which the incident occurred. . . Of course, we are bound by prior Tenth Circuit precedent. Following Casey's holding that the law was clearly established as of August 25, 2003, it was clearly established on December 8, 2006 that Officer Davis could not use his Taser on a nonviolent misdemeanant who did not pose a threat and was not resisting or evading arrest without first giving a warning. The district court therefore properly denied qualified immunity.")

Thomas v. Durastanti, 607 F.3d 655, 671 (10th Cir. 2010) ("Given Mr. Thomas's version of the events and what the record establishes, we have addressed the legal question of whether the force was excessive. See Scott, 550 U.S. at 381 n.8. We cannot say that the use of deadly force in these circumstances was objectively unreasonable; courts have little difficulty in concluding that an officer's reasonable perception that a vehicle may be used as a weapon may allow for the use of deadly force. . . . The fact that flight from a traffic stop may have precipitated these events does not make the vehicle any less dangerous. . . In these close confines, Agent Durastanti's actions (even if mistaken) were within the range of reasonableness allowed law enforcement agents under the excessive force and qualified immunity doctrines.")

Thomas v. Durastanti, 607 F.3d 655, 671-74 (10th Cir. 2010) (Ebel, J. dissenting) ("Thomas' claim was two-fold: 1) Durastanti used excessive force when, although in no immediate danger, he deliberately stepped in front of the Lincoln and began firing into it in an effort to stop the Lincoln's flight. And 2) even if the use of deadly force was reasonable at the moment Durastanti first fired into the Lincoln, his own reckless or deliberate conduct in approaching the Lincoln with his gun drawn, while wearing plain clothes, having just gotten out of an unmarked Ford Explorer, and never identifying himself as a law enforcement officer, precipitated the later need to use deadly force by creating circumstances in which the Lincoln's driver, Almario Smith, reasonably believed he was about to be robbed or assaulted. We need address only Thomas' first theory in order to affirm the denial of qualified immunity. In defense of Thomas' allegation that Durastanti, not being in any immediate danger, deliberately stepped into the Lincoln's path and began shooting in order to stop the Lincoln's flight, Durastanti asserts, to the contrary, that he was rushing around the back of his Explorer to check on his partner and in doing so found himself confronted by the Lincoln accelerating towards him as it headed out of the parking lot. Being only a car's length away from the Lincoln and unable to get out of its way, Durastanti feared for his life and therefore shot at the Lincoln in self defense. Confronted with these divergent stories, the district court held that factual disputes material to this claim precluded entering summary judgment for Durastanti based upon qualified immunity, specifically determining that '[t]he actions of all the individuals involved in this incident are in dispute.'. . We do not have jurisdiction, in this interlocutory appeal, to consider the propriety of the district court's determination that there remain disputed issues of material fact. . . Nonetheless, the majority concludes we can ignore these factual disputes because they are either not genuine or not material to Thomas' claim. I am not persuaded. . . . The majority . . . errs in relying on Scott to disregard a genuine factual dispute regarding the speed of the Lincoln when Durastanti shot into the car. Moreover, the majority does not even address the district court's determination that there were genuine disputes regarding the facts most material to Thomas' claim, how Durastanti got in front of the Lincoln and where he was when he first shot into that car. We do not have jurisdiction to review that determination. . . And the district court did not err in determining that a reasonable jury could find that Durastanti acted unreasonably in light of the facts as Thomas has alleged them and as a reasonable officer in Durastanti's position would have perceived them. I would, therefore, affirm the district court's decision to deny Durastanti qualified immunity.")

Zia Trust Co. ex rel. Causey v. Montoya, 597 F.3d 1150, 1154, 1155 (10th Cir. 2010) ("Turning to the case at hand, we cannot say, viewing the record in a light most favorable to the plaintiffs, that Officer Montoya acted reasonably. First, according to Glen Causey's testimony, Officer Montoya exited his vehicle with his weapon already drawn and proceeded to a position in front of Megan's van without identifying himself as a police officer or, indeed, saying anything at all. It is unclear, at least under the plaintiffs' alleged facts, whether Megan even knew that Office Montoya was a police officer. Second, although the tires of the van were pointed toward Officer Montoya, the plaintiffs allege–and there is some support in the record–that it was obviously stuck on a retaining wall and that the van jumped forward less than a foot, if at all, when Megan revved the engine. Additionally, given the lighting conditions, whether or not Officer Montoya could even see the direction the tires were pointing is a material fact that has been hotly disputed. Third, according to Officer Flores's testimony, Officer Montoya may have been standing up to fifteen feet away from the van at the time of the shooting. Although we have never laid down a per se rule regarding distance, we cannot say that a van fifteen feet away, which according to the plaintiffs was clearly stuck on a pile of rocks, gave Officer Montoya probable cause to believe that there was a threat of serious physical harm to himself or others. Finally, although Officer Montoya testified in his deposition that he saw Megan change gears and that he could see in Megan's face what he intended, as stated above, how close Officer Montoya was and what exactly he could see is disputed. Accordingly, reading the record in the light favorable to the plaintiffs, it is not clear that Megan manifested an intent to harm Officer Montoya or anyone else at the scene. Our analysis of course only accounts for the plaintiffs' version of events, a version which a jury may later reject. However, under this version we agree with the district court that the plaintiffs have met their burden of showing a constitutional violation. Having determined the existence of a constitutional violation for purposes of summary judgment, we must now consider whether the law was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . Viewing the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, we have already determined that Officer Montoya did not have 'probable cause to believe that there was a serious threat of serious physical harm' to himself or others. . . As such, Officer Montoya violated clearly established law when he used deadly force against Megan Causey.").

Fisher v. City of Las Cruces, 584 F.3d 888, 901 (10th Cir. 2009) ("It is long established law of this and other circuits that a triable claim of excessive force exists where a jury could reasonably conclude that the officer handled a cooperating arrestee in a manner that the officer knew posed a serious risk of exacerbating the arrestee's injuries, which were themselves known to the officer.").

Green v. Post, 574 F.3d 1294, 1304, 1309, 1310 (10th Cir. 2009) ("[E]ven were we to conclude that the Greens can establish a constitutional violation under the middle-level standard, we would conclude that Deputy Post is entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established at the time of the incident. While it may have been clearly established that an officer can be liable if the plaintiffs show that he intended to harm the plaintiffs in the context of a high-speed pursuit, it was not clearly established what specific standard applied to the particular facts of this case–i.e., where the officer was engaged in a high-speed non-emergency response to a call to locate and arrest a suspected gas thief. We illustrate this uncertainty in the law by surveying Supreme Court, Tenth Circuit and other circuits' case law as of June 2006. [surveying cases] Our recitation of these cases from various circuits, many of which involve high-speed police pursuits, is not intended to suggest that the case before us fits into the category of a high-speed police pursuit. Indeed, our review of the cases indicates that there are no clear categories of cases into which we can neatly fit a particular situation. Rather, there are many permutations on the theme of police pursuits; while most involve high speeds, there are many variables, including whether the officer is responding to an emergency or not, whether he or she is directly pursuing a fleeing suspect or not, and, significantly under Lewis and cases interpreting it, whether the officer has time for actual deliberation. The conundrum presented by this last factor–whether the officer has time to deliberate–is what appears to have led some courts to simply declare that all high-speed police pursuits are evaluated under an intent-to-harm standard, 'regardless of whether the chase conditions arguably afforded pursuing officers time to deliberate.'. . It accordingly appears to us that, as of June 2006, there was no general consensus of cases that would have led Deputy Post to know that his conduct in speeding through an intersection on a yellow light, in pursuit of a reported gas thief but not responding to an 'emergency,' without his lights and siren on, would violate the substantive due process rights of Green, absent an intent or purpose to harm Green. And, there is clearly no evidence that Post had any such malicious intent or purpose. While Post was, by his own admission, not faced with an emergency call, that circumstance does not clarify the standard of liability in this circuit; it merely suggests that there may have been more opportunity for Post to deliberate, and arguably the public interest served by his response was slightly less. . . But, while a few circuits have held that officers involved in all high-speed pursuits are subject to an intent-to-harm standard of culpability, this circuit has not so held, and we have not provided any clear guidance on when an officer responding to a non-emergency police call–more particularly, a rapid response to such a call–does and/or does not have time to deliberate. In sum, we cannot say that the law was clearly established in June 2006, such that a reasonable officer in Deputy Post's situation would have known that his conduct was a violation of Green's constitutional rights.)

Buck v. City of Albuquerque, 549 F.3d 1269, 1290, 1291 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Having determined that the Excessive Force Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged a constitutional violation, we now turn to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, asking whether existing case law gave the defendants fair warning that their conduct violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . The law is clearly established either if courts have previously ruled that materially similar conduct was unconstitutional, or if 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law

Weigel v. Broad, 544 F.3d 1143, 1153, 1154 (10th Cir. 2008) ("The district court compared the facts of Cruz, where the decedent was hog-tied, to the facts of this case and concluded there was no clearly established law prohibiting the troopers' actions because of the dissimilarity between the factual scenarios. . . . Although we held there was not clearly established law prohibiting the officers' actions at the time they encountered Mr. Cruz, we also made clear that similar future conduct was prohibited. Specifically, we stated, 'officers may not apply th[e hog-tie] technique when an individual's diminished capacity is apparent.'. . . The district court believed that the type of restraint used in Cruz was sufficiently different from that employed on Mr. Weigel that Cruz did not clearly establish the unconstitutionality of defendants' alleged actions. But our analysis in this case of the constitutionality of the restraint of Mr. Weigel does not require us to compare the facts of Cruz to the allegations here. It is based on more general principles. The Fourth Amendment prohibits unreasonable seizures. We do not think it requires a court decision with identical facts to establish clearly that it is unreasonable to use deadly force when the force is totally unnecessary to restrain a suspect or to protect officers, the public, or the suspect himself. . . . If Cruz had not been handed down, perhaps Wyoming troopers would not have received training on positional asphyxia and would be uninformed about the danger. But the reasonableness of an officer's actions must be assessed in light of the officer's training. The defendants' training informed them that the force they used upon Mr. Weigel produced a substantial risk of death. Because it is clearly established law that deadly force cannot be used when it is unnecessary to restrain a suspect or secure the safety of officers, the public, or the suspect himself, the defendants' unnecessary use of deadly force violated clearly established law.").

Weigel v. Broad, 544 F.3d 1143, 1170, 1171 (10th Cir. 2008) (O'Brien, J., dissenting) ("No Supreme Court case is directly on point and the only relevant opinion from this circuit is Cruz. However, by its express terms Cruz applies only to hog-tying individuals with apparent diminished capacity. . .A hog-tie is a restraint technique whereby a person's hands are cuffed behind his back, his feet are bound together, drawn up behind his back and attached to the handcuffs. It results in his ankles being bound to his handcuffed wrists behind his back with twelve inches or less of separation. . . A similar technique is referred to as hobbling. . . The only difference between the two techniques is the distance between ankles and handcuffed wrists; a separation of twelve inches or less is a hog-tie, a greater distance is a hobble. . . . In Cruz we expressly did not forbid all hog-ties let alone the less restrictive hobble. Our discussion would lead any reader to think the distinction significant and the reach of the decision limited. It gives no warning that it should be read expansively to address lesser forms of positional restraint. This is not a hog-tie case; it is not even a hobble case. No attempt was made to pull Weigel's ankles behind him in any way, let alone tie them to his handcuffed wrists. The majority relies on Hope for the proposition that a prior case need not address the very action in question in order to clearly establish the law. . . . To be useful to officers in the field (or in a fight) the warning imparted must be crisp and clear; specific and simple. A 'spotted dog' case provides that warning, generalized musings do not. Three judges have carefully read, even parsed, the language of Cruz. With the luxury of time and the benefit of briefing and argument from counsel, we take away dramatically different views of its holding. The troopers did not have that luxury, yet even in the aftermath of a desperate fight they knew hog-tying was prohibited and did not do it or anything like it. To expect them to have coaxed from Cruz anything akin to the majority's holding is contrived.").

Vondrak v. City of Las Cruces, 535 F.3d 1198, 1207 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Admittedly, this is a close case. McCants' only factual basis for conducting the field sobriety tests was Vondrak's admission to drinking one beer several hours earlier, and the specificity of Vondrak's statement makes it less suspicious than in many of the cases cited above. Nevertheless, given that Vondrak admitted consuming alcohol, McCants had the reasonable suspicion necessary to perform the field sobriety tests–or, at the very least, the arguable reasonable suspicion entitling her to qualified immunity.").

Vondrak v. City of Las Cruces, 535 F.3d 1198, 1208, 1209 (10th Cir. 2008) ("The district court correctly concluded that McCants and Krause were not entitled to qualified immunity on Vondrak's excessive force claim for unduly tight handcuffing. Although the officers claim to have been unaware that Vondrak's handcuffs were tight, Vondrak has presented evidence that the officers 'ignored [his] timely complaints (or [were] otherwise made aware) that the handcuffs were too tight.'").

Fogarty v. Gallegos, 523 F.3d 1147, 1158, 1159 (10th Cir. 2008) ("The defendants' arguments that the police had probable cause to arrest Fogarty rest only on characterizations of the protest in general, and not on evidence of Fogarty's individual actions. The Fourth Amendment plainly requires probable cause to arrest Fogarty as an individual, not as a member of a large basket containing a few bad eggs. In other words, that Fogarty was a participant in an antiwar protest where some individuals may have broken the law is not enough to justify his arrest. . . . Under Fogarty's version of events–that he was peacefully drumming a samba at a reasonable volume–well-settled constitutional and state-law precedent would have put reasonable officers on notice that they lacked probable cause to effectuate an arrest. . . . We underscore that these conclusions regarding probable cause are compelled by our constrained jurisdiction and our view of the facts in the light most favorable to Fogarty. Most of the deposed officers denied even witnessing Fogarty's arrest, and none admitted to physically arresting him. Their depositions therefore contain little that might contradict Fogarty's account of his own behavior. If defendants demonstrate at trial that the arresting officers had objective reason, even if mistaken, for believing that Fogarty's drumming tended to disturb the peace by increasing the potential for violence or public alarm as defined by the New Mexico courts, they may well be entitled to qualified immunity . But on the record before us, we cannot at this juncture reach such a conclusion as a matter of law.").

Fogarty v. Gallegos, 523 F.3d 1147, 1161, 1162 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Although the general factors outlined in Graham are insufficiently specific to render every novel use of excessive force unreasonable, '[w]e cannot find qualified immunity wherever we have a new fact pattern.'. . Thus, our circuit uses a sliding scale to determine when law is clearly established. . . Under this approach, '[t]he more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.'. . Relevant here, 'Graham establishes that force is least justified against nonviolent misdemeanants who do not flee or actively resist arrest.'. . With respect to the use of pepper balls and tear gas, we acknowledge that our precedential opinions have not directly addressed the Fourth Amendment implications of what defendants call 'less lethal' munitions. Nevertheless, a reasonable officer would have been on notice that the Graham inquiry applies to the use of these methods just as with any other type of pain-inflicting compliance technique. We find it persuasive that, in prior cases, we have assumed that the use of mace and pepper spray could constitute excessive force. [citing cases] Considering that under Fogarty's version of events each of the Graham factors lines up in his favor, this case is not so close that our precedents would fail to portend the constitutional unreasonableness of defendants' alleged actions. We likewise conclude that it would be apparent to a reasonable officer that the use of force adequate to tear a tendon is unreasonable against a fully restrained arrestee. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Fogarty, we conclude that defendants cannot avail themselves of qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.").

Chidester v. Utah County, No. 06-4255, 2008 WL 635361, at *10 (10th Cir. Mar. 6, 2008) ("While we have determined it was objectively unreasonable for Deputy Parker to tackle Mr. Chidester given Deputy Parker already had a weapon aimed at him, we note the extreme exigency of the situation. The situation is unlike other cases where the suspect person was already identified and then under the officer's total physical control for the purpose of preventing him or her from fleeing, using a weapon, or otherwise becoming a threat. We have not found a case, nor have plaintiffs directed us to one, that would put Deputy Parker on notice his split-second decision to tackle Mr. Chidester under the circumstances presented was clearly unlawful. Thus, we cannot say it was unreasonable for Deputy Parker to mistakenly believe the law allowed a greater level of force for the purpose of obtaining the requisite safety needed during the exigent circumstance presented.").

Casey v. City of Federal Heights, 509 F.3d 1278, 1284-86 (10th Cir. 2007) ("In 1992, we held that Graham itself was enough to constitute clearly established law in an excessive force case. Mick, 76 F.3d at 1135. More recently, however, the Supreme Court has held that Graham's 'general proposition ... is not enough' to turn all uses of excessive force into violations of clearly established law. . . . In other words, the fact that it is clear that any unreasonable use of force is unconstitutional does not mean that it is always clear which uses of force are unreasonable. 'Ordinarily,' we say that for a rule to be clearly established 'there must be a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.' . . However, because excessive force jurisprudence requires an all-things-considered inquiry with 'careful attention to the facts and circumstances of each particular case,' Graham, 490 U .S. at 396, there will almost never be a previously published opinion involving exactly the same circumstances. We cannot find qualified immunity wherever we have a new fact pattern. . . . We have therefore adopted a sliding scale to determine when law is clearly established. 'The more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.' . . . We have located no case in which a citizen peacefully attempting to return to the courthouse with a file he should not have removed has had his shirt torn, and then been tackled, Tasered, knocked to the ground by a bevy of police officers, beaten, and Tasered again, all without warning or explanation. But we need not have decided a case involving similar facts to say that no reasonable officer could believe that he was entitled to behave as Officer Sweet allegedly did. Graham establishes that force is least justified against nonviolent misdemeanants who do not flee or actively resist arrest. . . . Officer Lor gave Mr. Casey no opportunity to comply with her wishes before firing her Taser. While we do not rule out the possibility that there might be circumstances in which the use of a Taser against a nonviolent offender is appropriate, we think a reasonable jury could decide that Officer Lor was not entitled under these circumstances to shoot first and ask questions later. Cases in our Circuit and others that have considered the reasonable use of Tasers confirm this conclusion. . . . We have located no published decision in which an officer's use of a Taser has been upheld in circumstances this troubling. Officer Lor testified that the policy of the Federal Heights police department is that a Taser can appropriately be used to 'control' a target. . . However, it is excessive to use a Taser to control a target without having any reason to believe that a lesser amount of force–or a verbal command–could not exact compliance. Because a reasonable jury could find that Officer Lor lacked any such reason, she is not entitled to summary judgment on the constitutional violation. . . . On the summary judgment record–which of course may be disputed at trial–Officer Lor's use of the Taser was without any legitimate justification in light of Graham. We do not know of any circuit that has upheld the use of a Taser immediately and without warning against a misdemeanant like Mr. Casey. Therefore, Officer Lor is not entitled to qualified immunity from this excessive force suit.").

Walker v. City of Orem, 451 F.3d 1139, 1150, 1151 (10th Cir. 2006) ("In sum, based on the facts recited in plaintiffs' complaint, the lengthy detention alleged in this case was unreasonable and was not justified by either the need for investigation of a crime or control of a crime scene. Having concluded that plaintiffs have adequately alleged a violation of their Fourth Amendment rights, we turn to whether the legal rule protecting those rights allegedly violated by defendants was 'clearly established' at the time of the events in question. . . . While there were certainly some suggestions in the law prior to Lidster that the interrogation of witnesses was subject to Fourth Amendment constraints at least as stringent as those involving detention of suspects, we have found no pertinent Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision prior to the events in question, and no clearly established weight of authority from other courts, that would have made the unlawfulness of the officers' conduct apparent to them. In sum, '[t]he contours of the right [were not] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he [was] doing violate[d] that right.' [citing Brosseau]").

Walker v. City of Orem, 451 F.3d 1139, 1160 (10th Cir. 2006) ("We conclude that plaintiff's version of the facts presented on summary judgment support a claim of a violation of David Walker's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. Plaintiff's version of events suggests that Officer Peterson acted precipitously in shooting David, who posed a danger only to himself. The crimes at issue (theft of the vehicle, eluding the officers) were not particularly severe. David did not pose an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others. He had made no threats and was not advancing on anyone with the small knife. He was holding the knife to his own wrist. While Officer Peterson stated that he believed David was pointing a gun at him, this belief was not reasonable, if plaintiff's version of events is accepted, and she is given the benefit of every reasonable inference. The angle of David's hands and the amount of light on the scene should have permitted Officer Peterson to ascertain that he was not holding a gun in a shooting stance. Finally, David was not actively resisting arrest, and there was no need to use deadly force to prevent him from fleeing and possibly harming others. The right to be free from excessive force was well established in this circuit at the time of the events in question. . . It was specifically established that where an officer had reason to believe that a suspect was only holding a knife, not a gun, and the suspect was not charging the officer and had made no slicing or stabbing motions toward him, that it was unreasonable for the officer to use deadly force against the suspect. [citing Zuchel] Plaintiff's version of the facts therefore shows the violation of a clearly-established constitutional right. We must therefore affirm the district court's order denying qualified immunity to Officer Peterson. . . Much of what has already been said about the circumstances surrounding Officer Peterson's actions also applies to Officer Clayton's conduct. At the time he fired at David, Officer Clayton was behind the cover of his vehicle, fifty-eight feet away from David. David was not advancing on him and had not threatened him in any way, other than allegedly pointing his hands in Officer Clayton's direction in what Officer Clayton interpreted as a 'classic shooting stance.' Officer Clayton had not seen a gun in David's hands. Whether he reasonably believed from the shots he heard, and the fact that Officer Peterson had ducked behind the Subaru, and the position of David's body and hands, that he or others were in danger from David, is a factual question that remains to be resolved. When reviewing the denial of a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, we are not only required to accept plaintiff's version of events; we are also required to draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving party. . . We conclude that, given all reasonable inferences, plaintiff's version of the facts shows the violation of a constitutional right. That right is also clearly established. We must therefore affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Officer Clayton.") Fuerschbach v. Southwest Airlines Co., 439 F.3d 1197, 1204, 1205, 1206 n.4 (10th Cir. 2006) ("No court has ruled that an otherwise unreasonable seizure becomes reasonable when the officers intend it as a prank. We will not do so here. When law enforcement officers acting under color of state law seize non-consenting private citizens, they must act in furtherance of legitimate law enforcement interests and on the basis of sufficient facts. . . . Fuerschbach's allegations, if true, establish that Hoppe and Martinez seized her without any legitimate justification. Therefore, Fuerschbach's Fourth Amendment claim survives the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . Because Fuerschbach's allegations demonstrate that the officers violated clearly established constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known, her claims clear the second hurdle of the qualified immunity analysis as well. . . . We conclude that it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in Hoppe and Martinez's shoes that seizing a private citizen without any legitimate basis was unlawful. Nor would an officer's perception of the seizure as a prank have made the legal standard less clear. . . .[T]he officers are not entitled to qualified immunity simply because no previous court has rejected a prank exception to the Fourth Amendment.").

Blossom v. Yarbrough, 429 F.3d 963, 968 (10th Cir. 2005) (granting qualified immunity on first prong; "This case is readily distinguishable from Carr upon which the district court relied. In that case, the plaintiff relied on testimony that the officers fired eleven shots at the suspect after he had dropped a piece of concrete that the officers claimed was a possible weapon. All eleven shots struck the decedent in the back! . . . The court in Carr, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, determined that there was some evidence the officers shot an unarmed man who was not advancing on them. . . In this case, the evidence indicates uncertainty in the mind of Deputy Yarbrough as to whether Mr. Pickup was armed. Mr. Pickup advanced on Yarbrough in what reasonably appears to be an effort to get his weapon. Under these circumstances, Mr. Pickup posed an immediate threat to the safety of the officer, and the use of deadly force, while tragic, was reasonable.")

Jones v. Hunt, 410 F.3d 1221, 1229-31 (10th Cir. 2005) ("Without doubt, it was clearly established by January 2003 that a seizure must be reasonable. . . In Terry, decided in 1968, the Court instituted the rule that, at minimum, a seizure must be 'justified at its inception' and 'reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place.' . . . It was also clearly established by the date of the seizure that the Fourth Amendment's strictures apply to social workers. . . Indeed, in 1994 we applied the Terry standard to a social worker's seizure of a child at a public school. . . Our conclusion is based on clearly and narrowly articulated Fourth Amendment principles. . . . In Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. __ (2004), the Supreme Court considered how factually related existing precedent must be to an alleged violation to render a rule of law 'clearly established.' The Court concluded that the standard established in Graham. . . was 'cast at a high level of generality' and therefore did not clearly establish a Fourth Amendment violation. . . The tests enunciated in Hill and Terry are far more specific than the general standard set forth in Graham. Furthermore, the Court's recent qualified immunity jurisprudence does not allow public officials such as Haberman, who are alleged to have committed blatant Fourth Amendment violations, to obtain immunity from suit. The Brosseau Court acknowledged that even with regard to highly general standards, 'in an obvious case, these standards can "clearly establish" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'. . Implicit in the Court's reasoning is the recognition that officials committing outrageous, yet sui generis, constitutional violations ought not to shield their behavior behind qualified immunity simply because another official has not previously had the audacity to commit a similar transgression. We conclude that the Fourth Amendment violation as alleged in this case is both obvious and outrageous, and that 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . A social worker who lacks any legitimate justification for seizing a child, but nonetheless seizes the child and demands, in direct contravention of a court order, that she enter the custody of her abusive father, would clearly know that his conduct is unconstitutional.").

Jurado v. Tritschler, No. 16-CV-2849-RM-NRN, 2020 WL 209857, at *3–4 (D. Colo. Jan. 14, 2020) ("Plaintiff apparently contends he was not a bystander but, rather, a passenger whom Defendant Tritschler considered a threat during the entire time. Thus, Plaintiff asserts, it strains credibility that he was no longer deemed a threat when the F-150 started moving, raising a genuine of issue of material fact as to Defendant Tritschler's intent. The Court disagrees. The record establishes there is insufficient evidence to create a material factual dispute regarding Defendant Tritschler's intent. The evidence is undisputed that the driver was moving the F-150 and gunning the vehicle into reverse with other officers in the line of danger. Based on such facts, a reasonable jury could not conclude that Defendant Tritschler intended to shoot Plaintiff (even if he was not a bystander) rather than to shoot the driver to stop the F-150. Plaintiff's argument to the contrary is not evidence and insufficient to create a triable issue of fact. Accordingly, on this basis, no seizure occurred; therefore, Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights were not violated. . . . Defendant Tritschler contends that even assuming, arguendo, Plaintiff was subject to a seizure under the Fourth Amendment, the law was not clearly established at the time of the incident. Plaintiff also fails to address this argument. For this reason alone, his claim may be dismissed. Regardless, the Court agrees with Defendant Tritschler. Defendant Tritschler cites to a number of cases in addition to Childress, albeit from other Circuits, which support his argument that Plaintiff was not seized. Further, the Court's research revealed an additional relevant case – Carabajal. [Court discusses Carabajal and Plumhoff] [T]he Court finds Plaintiff cannot demonstrate the law was clearly established that a seizure of him occurred under the circumstances here. Accordingly, Defendant Tritschler is entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Ortiz on behalf of L.J. v. Mora, No. 118CV00713JCHKRS, 2019 WL 6717184, at *7, *9-11 (D.N.M. Dec. 10, 2019) ("Deputy Mora and Defendants claim that Mora's use of force against Jim—shooting him seven times after the Dodge came to a standstill—was objectively reasonable because Padilla had just led officers on a lengthy, dangerous flight and when Mora shot the car Padilla was revving the engine with Gaitan standing in the car's direct path of travel. Plaintiff contends that Mora shot the Dodge only after the truck had clearly become disabled behind two police cars and no longer posed a threat. The Court concludes that the differing accounts present a genuine question of fact and that, at this stage, Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence from which the trier of fact could find the existence of a constitutional violation. . . . Plaintiff's evidence sufficiently distinguishes this case from those cases where officers stood directly in a fleeing vehicle's path with mere seconds to react. . . . Although it is a close call, there are genuine issues of material fact about whether an objectively reasonable officer would have perceived that the chase was ongoing and that officers were imperiled, and therefore a jury could conclude that Deputy Mora's firing at the Dodge was objectively unreasonable. . . . Despite this conclusion, Mora is entitled to summary judgment on the ground that he did not violate clearly established law. . . .It appears that Plaintiff cites to the Supreme Court's decision in Tennessee v. Garner. . . to show that the law was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . . However, the Plaintiff describes the right at too general a level. The 'clearly established' inquiry 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . .Plaintiff has not cited, and the Court has not found, caselaw establishing that an officer may not shoot a driver who dangerously flees from police and who, once momentarily apprehended, revs his engine at an officer positioned behind patrol cars that are in the fleeing vehicle's projected path. If anything, Supreme Court precedent indicates the opposite. The Supreme Court's 2014 decision in Plumhoff v. Rickard establishes that as of November 2017, the date of the events in question, it was not clearly established that an officer must refrain from using deadly force to terminate a dangerous chase where the driver continues to push down on the car's accelerator even though the car may have come to a temporary stop.")

Hernandez v. Parker, No. 217CV01218KRSGJF, 2018 WL 6441030, at *3–6 (D.N.M. Dec. 7, 2018) ("Under Lewis, the question is whether Sheriff Parker terminated Hernandez's 'freedom of movement through means intentionally applied.' In Scott v. Harris, the Supreme Court explained a botched PIT maneuver satisfied this standard. . . Drawing all reasonable inferences in the Estate's favor, Sheriff Parker attempted a PIT maneuver whereby his truck bumped the Lincoln to end the pursuit. Lopez described the end of the pursuit in that manner, and two witnesses testified that that Sheriff Parker bumped or pushed Hernandez's car with his patrol vehicle. Taking the Estate's contention that the bumping was intentional and designed to end the chase, that bumping action by Sheriff Parker amounts to a seizure of Hernandez under the Fourth Amendment. Hernandez's status a passenger, and arguably not the object of Sheriff Parker's use of force, does not change the analysis. While the Tenth Circuit has not spoken directly to this issue, . . . the Supreme Court held in Brendlin v. California, that a traffic stop seizes both the driver and any passenger. . . The Third Circuit has extended Brendlin's logic to a passenger in a police-pursuit scenario that ended when a police officer fired into the fleeing car. Davenport v. Borough of Homestead, 870 F.3d 273, 279 (3d Cir. 2017). Although the court identified a circuit split as to whether a passenger is seized along with a driver, the court observed that 'those circuits that have suggested otherwise reached their decisions on this issue before the Supreme Court decided Brendlin[.]'. . . In line with Brendlin and Davenport, the Court concludes that the Fourth Amendment applies to the Estate's federal claims. . . . It is hard to see how Scott's holding does not dictate the outcome in this case. Here, upon arrival at the motel and exiting his truck, Sheriff Parker observed Lopez and Hernandez in Hernandez's vehicle. It appeared that Hernandez was reaching for something while Lopez started the Lincoln. Although Sheriff Parker was dressed in a hoodie, Lieutenant Sanchez was in full uniform as the two stood on either side of the town car. Sheriff Parker and Lieutenant Sanchez drew their guns, but Lopez backed up and maneuvered around Sheriff Parker's pickup, striking Sheriff Parker in the process, a felony under New Mexico law. . . Sheriff Parker, of course, pursued Lopez, at this point a fleeing suspect. It is true Sheriff Parker's duty vehicle was unmarked, but it was equipped with internal lights and sirens, which Sheriff Parker says he engaged. Lopez concedes he heard the siren. Nonetheless, Lopez did not stop, and a chase ensued that reached speeds of over 100 miles per hour. Lopez drove through residential neighborhoods, near schools and a university, and nearly collided with another vehicle, and ran stop signs. The pursuit terminated when Sheriff Parker employed a PIT or similar maneuver. Sheriff Parker's truck struck the Lincoln sending the Lincoln into the ditch and culminating in Hernandez's death. As in Scott, Lopez was the catalyst of entire chain of events. Viewed objectively, from Sheriff Parker's perspective, Lopez battered a police officer, intentionally placed himself, Hernandez, and the public in danger by fleeing and not stopping in response to sirens and lights, nearly colliding with a car, and running stop signs. As in Scott, it was reasonable to end the pursuit and the danger it posed by bumping the back of the sedan. Although Hernandez died, her rights under the Fourth Amendment were not violated. The Estate argues that Lopez thought he was being mugged because Sheriff Parker was in a hoodie. What Lopez thought, however is irrelevant to the governing, objective standard of reasonableness. . . Even if it was initially unclear to Lopez, Lieutenant Sanchez was in full uniform and Lopez concedes he heard the siren from Sheriff Parker's unmarked police truck. Lopez also made comments subsequent to the incident that he fled from the motel because he wanted to protect Hernandez from being charged for possession of drugs, which suggests he knew that Sheriff Parker was a law enforcement officer when he fled. . . The Estate also suggests Sheriff Parker had a duty to retreat from 'harm's way' but instead stood in front of the Lincoln where he could be hit. Putting aside the underlying assumption that Sheriff Parker would have had to know that Lopez would drive into him, Sheriff Parker's position directly in front of the car Lopez was driving is of no constitutional significance. The Estate points to no case law, and the Court could not find any, requiring Sheriff Parker to move out of the way. The Estate also insists Sheriff Parker did not know that Lopez intended to injure others and 'the Sheriff's own investigator [determined] bumping Mr. Lopez off the road was an inappropriate use of deadly force because of the circumstances surrounding the possible charges or crime committed didn't warrant deadly force.'. . The Fourth Amendment, however, does not require Sheriff Parker to divine Lopez's intentions at all. Instead, Sheriff Parker was required to examine the totality of the circumstances and use force that was objectively reasonable. It is undisputed that Lopez nearly struck another driver during the pursuit, drove at very high rates of speed in residential areas and near schools and a university, and ran stop signs. Protecting the public from further harm featured prominently in the Supreme Court's determination that the officer's PIT-like maneuver in Scott was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . .The Estate's underlying assumption that Sheriff Parker should have simply stopped chasing Lopez and thereby ended the threat to Lopez, Hernandez, and the public does not withstand scrutiny. As the Supreme Court explained in Scott, 'there would have been no way to convey convincingly to [Lopez] that the chase was off, and that he was free to go.'. . . Additionally, requiring Sheriff Parker to capitulate would create obvious, 'perverse incentives' that a 'fleeing motorist would know that escape is within his grasp, if only he accelerates to 90 miles per hour, crosses the double-yellow line a few times, and runs a few red lights.'. . As did the Supreme Court in Scott, the Court here rejects the Estate's implication that Sheriff Parker was required to stop the chase and give up.")

Felts v. Bd. of County Commissioners, No. 13-CV-1094 MCA/SCY, 2017 WL 4480118, at *1-2 & n.2 (D.N.M. Oct. 6, 2017) ("Defendants argue that Plaintiff cannot rely on 'pre-shooting conduct' or the theory that Officers Hill and Martin recklessly created the situation that resulted in the deadly use of force . . ., relying on two recent United States Supreme Court decisions. [Sheehan and Mendez] Relying on these cases, 'Defendants seek to exclude any and all evidence, documentary or testimonial, regarding the events that precede the encounter with Plaintiff which resulted in the shooting, which seeks to question the officers' judgment or to speculate that if only the officer had taken different actions, the shooting would not have occurred.'. . Defendants' request is not justified by Sheehan or Mendez. In Mendez, the Court stated, by footnote, that it was declining to address an argument on which it did not grant certiorari: whether, under Graham's totality of the circumstances test, the jury may 'tak[e] into account unreasonable police conduct prior to the use of force that foreseeably created the need to use it.'. . This Court agrees with the analysis of Magistrate Judge Wormuth in Johnson v. City of Roswell, Civ. No. 15-1071 GBW/CG, 2017 WL 4083568, *7 n.5 (D.N.M. Sept. 13, 2017), that, '[g]iven the Supreme Court's explicit statement [in the Mendez footnote] that it was not addressing the broader relevance of pre-shooting conduct, the Tenth Circuit's precedents on the matter remain controlling.' The controlling Tenth Circuit precedent, is that '[t]he reasonableness of Defendants' actions depends both on whether the officers were in danger at the precise moment that they used force and on whether Defendants' own reckless or deliberate conduct during the seizure unreasonably created the need to use such force.' Sevier v. City of Lawrence, Kan., 60 F.3d 695, 699 (10th Cir. 1995). Given that Tenth Circuit law has not been overturned, the law as set forth by the Court in its Memorandum Opinion and Order of September 23, 2016 remains controlling and the Court will apply this law to the case. . . .The Court recognizes that, to the extent the Supreme Court is drawing a distinction between 'unreasonable police conduct prior to the use of force that foreseeably created the need to use [force]' in Mendez. . . and 'bad tactics that result in a deadly confrontation that could have been avoided' in Sheehan, . . .this distinction is not well-defined. To the extent necessary, the Court harmonizes Sheehan and Mendez by recognizing a difference between 'unreasonable police conduct,' Mendez, which results in constitutionally unreasonable use of force under the totality of the circumstances, and 'bad tactics,' Sheehan, despite an otherwise reasonable use of force.[2] [fn 2: It is important to note that this case is factually distinct from Sheehan and Mendez because, in both of those cases, a lower court had ruled that the actual use of force was reasonable, and the plaintiff was attempting to establish liability based on a separate purported constitutional violation or bad tactic. . . In this case, the issue of whether the use of force was reasonable must be determined by the jury.] The Court must allow evidence pertaining to the 'totality of the circumstances.'. . Accordingly, this Court does not read Sheehan or Mendez to preclude the jury from considering what the officers knew or should have known leading up to the moment of the use of force in deciding whether the use of force was reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. In this case, the jury must be aware of the pre-shooting conduct, under the totality of the circumstances test, in order to determine whether, at the moment of the shooting, the use of force was reasonable and whether Officer Hill had probable cause to believe that Plaintiff presented a threat of serious physical harm to Hill or another person.")

Estate of Redd v. Love, 62 F. Supp. 3d 1268, 1277-78 (D. Utah 2014) ("Here, since the Graham factors weigh so heavily in favor of finding a violation of Dr. Redd's constitutional protection against excessive force, it is evident that sending so many heavily armed agents to arrest Dr. Redd and search his home violated the Fourth Amendment. In light of the clarity and force of the Graham analysis here, the court concludes that Agent Love knew or should have known, even absent a more factually similar case on point, that his decision to deploy over 80 heavily armed agents in such a raid, and to call more to the scene after agents had already secured Dr. Redd, his family, and his home, would constitute excessive force under the circumstances. When viewing the factual allegations in a light most favorable to Dr. Redd, the court concludes that Dr. Redd has raised sufficient factual allegations to support a finding that Agent Love's conduct violated a clearly established right.")

Cardall v. Thompson, No. 2:10–cv–305 CW, 2012 WL 90417, at *7 (D. Utah Jan. 11, 2012) ("[I]f disputed facts are taken in Anna's favor, the Graham factors almost universally weighed against taser deployment and the tasing was without lawful justification. Heeding the Tenth Circuit's recent warning that generalized principles should not be excessively relied upon to support a qualified immunity analysis, however, this court will undertake a more fact-specific inquiry. . . The court did not identify a Tenth Circuit case, or case from any jurisdiction, involving the tasing of a mentally ill individual who was confused and reluctant to obey officers' commands to get down on the ground. The Tenth Circuit, however, has held that 'it was clearly established on December 8, 2006 that [an officer] could not use his Taser on a nonviolent misdemeanant who did not pose a threat and was not resisting or evading arrest without first giving a warning.'. . It is true that, unlike the plaintiff in Cavanaugh, Brian Cardall was given an opportunity to comply with police demands before being tased. Taking the facts in favor of Anna, however, Brian was a nonthreatening misdemeanant who was not resisting arrest and had no warning he might be tased. Authority from other jurisdictions concords. [collecting cases] Brian was tased although he was not guilty of any serious crime or attempting to flee. If all factual disputes are resolved in favor of Anna, Brian was not a threat to the officers who impatiently tased him when, in his confusion, he was slow to comply with their demands. Tenth Circuit case law, as well as authority from other jurisdictions, explicitly holds that tasings under similar circumstances violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law.")

Asten v. City of Boulder, No. 08-cv-00845-PAB, 2009 WL 2766723, at *13 (D. Colo. Aug. 26, 2009) ("[U]nder the Tenth Circuit's 'sliding scale' regarding clearly established law, although identical facts cannot be found in the case law, general constitutional doctrine combined with the nature of the facts–the unforewarned tasing of a mentally unstable woman in her own home–lead the Court to conclude that the law at issue was clearly established at the time Officer Frenzen used his taser to seize Ms. Asten.").

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Tillis on behalf of Wuenschel v. Brown, 12 F.4th 1291, 1299-1302 (11th Cir. 2021) ("We are not persuaded by the plaintiffs' arguments that Officer Brown was indisputably out of harm's way. For the purposes of summary judgment, we accept the undisputed evidence that Officer Brown was positioned in the 'V' between his police vehicle and its open driver's door and that, as it turned out, the Pontiac drove straight back. Viewing that evidence in the plaintiffs' favor, it was not unreasonable for Officer Brown to conclude at the time he fired the shots that the Pontiac posed a serious danger. When an officer is on foot and standing in close proximity to a suspect's moving vehicle, he need not be directly in the vehicle's path to fear reasonably for his life. It is 'obvious,' in this circumstance, that the suspect could quickly turn his steering wheel and swerve toward the officer. . . . That the Pontiac avoided hitting Officer Brown or the door he was behind is not dispositive because we do not evaluate the totality of the circumstances with 'the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . . When the Pontiac started backing up, Officer Brown had no way of knowing whether it would continue in a straight line or swerve toward him. . . . The dissent argues against a straw man when it asserts that '[d]riving recklessly to evade arrest is not enough to justify shooting the driver.'. . Officer Brown did not fire his gun because Redwine was driving the Pontiac recklessly; he fired because the Pontiac started backing up while he was behind it. When a fleeing suspect drives his vehicle toward an officer who is standing only a few feet away, it is reasonable for the officer to believe that his life is in danger. . . . Officer Brown reasonably continued to use deadly force when he fired the second round of shots six seconds later. 'A police officer is entitled to continue his use of force until a suspect thought to be armed is fully secured.'. . . Nor is he required to wait for a car that has just stopped to begin moving again in his direction. . . A reasonable officer who had nearly been struck by a suspect's moving vehicle could perceive that the vehicle, with its engine still running and its headlights still shining as it faced him, remained a dangerous weapon that continued to pose a threat until the driver was fully secured. The district court erred in concluding that no reasonable officer would have thought that the Pontiac posed an imminent threat of serious physical harm when Officer Brown fired the second round of shots. . . . Officer Brown, having just engaged in a high-speed chase in the middle of the night, found himself staring into the headlights of a vehicle that had seconds ago backed up without warning and passed within only a few feet of him. Because the headlights were shining in his eyes, he could not see whether the driver was disabled or was about to shift into forward, step on the gas, and run over him. A reasonable officer in his shoes could have concluded, in the few seconds that he had to decide, that his life was still in danger. So Officer Brown was entitled to continue using deadly force. The dissent argues that the second round of shots was not justified because Officer Brown 'unnecessarily ... placed himself in a dangerous position' by 'advanc[ing] toward the car like [he] did.'. . Respectfully, what was Officer Brown supposed to do instead? As a police officer, he had a duty to protect his community, even at the risk of his own life. And that duty required him to arrest the driver of the Pontiac who had led officers on a high-speed chase. The dissent is wrong to imply that Officer Brown 'manufacture[d]' the danger to which he was exposed. . . Courage in the line of duty should be commended, not condemned. It certainly should not subject an officer to liability for damages. . . . Because Officer Brown acted reasonably in firing both the first and second rounds of shots, he did not violate the Fourth Amendment, and he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Tillis on behalf of Wuenschel v. Brown, 12 F.4th 1291, 1302, 1309-12 (11th Cir. 2021) (Jill Pryor, J., dissenting) ("When unarmed occupants of a vehicle who are not suspected of a dangerous crime flee police, the Fourth Amendment ordinarily prohibits the use of deadly force to stop them. The majority opinion concludes that a police officer was justified in shooting three unarmed teenagers who took a family member's car on a joy ride. As they fled from police and attempted to evade arrest, they posed no serious threat to any person. The majority opinion's conclusion, which holds that no Fourth Amendment violation occurred, is based on a grave misreading of our precedent. I fear the majority opinion may be read to justify the use of deadly force any time when, after a suspect flees the police in a vehicle, an officer approaches on foot. Because this would result in an unprecedented expansion of law enforcement officers' permissible use of deadly force, I dissent. . . . When we view the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, we can reach only one conclusion: that a reasonable officer in Brown's position would not have believed he was in immediate danger of being struck by the Pontiac if he did not shoot the driver. Neither Christian's driving prior to the crash, nor his attempt to evade arrest by reversing past Brown, nor Brown's location close to the side of the car turned the car into a weapon. Under our precedent, then, Brown's decision to fire the first series of 11 shots into the Pontiac was objectively unreasonable.The notion that the Pontiac posed a threat to Brown is even more farfetched when it comes to the second round of shots. The Pontiac was much farther away from Brown when it stopped on the other side of the road. The car had just backed slowly past Brown in a straight line and come to a gentle stop. The driver had not tried to hit him. Hannah can be heard clearly on the dash cam recording screaming that she had been shot and pleading for Brown to stop shooting. Yet Brown was reloading while facing the front of the car and walking toward it. . . . Applying the Garner test to the totality of the circumstances, an objectively reasonable officer in Brown's position would not have believed that use of deadly force was necessary. The evidence viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs shows that Brown was not in the Pontiac's path and Christian had not used or threatened to use the Pontiac as a weapon. Absent weaponization—such as driving a car directly at an officer or another person—an officer's use of deadly force is unreasonable, even if it follows a high-speed car chase. . . . Brown's decision to shoot into the Pontiac violated Hunter's, Hannah's, and Christian's Fourth Amendment rights. But for plaintiffs to overcome the bar of qualified immunity, Brown's conduct must also have violated clearly established law. There is no question that it did. The same cases that should lead us to conclude Brown violated the teenagers' constitutional rights also clearly established the applicable law. On the night of the shooting, our precedent clearly established that when a driver 'd[oes] not use or d[oes] not threaten to use his car as a weapon,' an officer may not use deadly force to stop him. . . It was also clearly established that leading police on a high-speed chase in and of itself does not justify the use of deadly force. Instead, a driver must pose a threat of serious physical harm to the officer or another before the use of deadly force is justified. . . Because Brown could not have had an objectively reasonable belief that the Pontiac posed a threat of serious physical harm to himself or others, he violated the teens' clearly established rights when he fired into the car. I would reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity on the first series of shots and uphold its denial of qualified immunity on the second series of shots. . . . I want to highlight that the majority opinion is not just incorrect in this case but also has the potential to excuse the unconstitutional use of force by police in the future. The majority opinion justifies Brown's use of force by pointing to Christian's high-speed driving during the chase and Brown's proximity to the Pontiac as it reversed. I fear that the majority opinion sanctions the use of deadly force when after a car chase an officer on foot approaches a vehicle and the driver attempts to flee, even if the officer is not in the vehicle's path and has no probable cause to believe the driver will use the vehicle as a weapon. . . Time and again—for good reason—our precedent has rejected the rationale the majority opinion adopts today. I dissent.")

Robinson v. Rankin, 815 F. App'x 330, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) ("[T]he district court determined that Easterwood was entitled to qualified immunity because each of the six shots he fired was justified. We cannot reach the same conclusion about the third and fourth bullets that Easterwood fired. The officer admitted that he was specifically targeting Robinson, the passenger, when he fired those rounds. And while he claims that Robinson was reaching for a gun at that time, that contention is disputed. So we must assume for summary-judgment purposes that the version more favorable to Robinson's representative in this litigation, Robinson, Sr., is correct, and that Easterwood targeted and shot at an unarmed, non-threatening passenger. We have little trouble concluding that, under that fact pattern, the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage. . . . Even if we were to agree with Easterwood that Brown did not know exactly what was unfolding in his car, we could not conclude from this record that Robinson was, at the moment Brown looked away, reaching for a weapon. There is no evidence to support that beyond Easterwood's version of the story, and as we have noted, Brown's recollection contradicts Easterwood's. We will not assume the jury's role and simply credit Easterwood's story over the rest of the evidence; rather, on summary judgment, we are required to assume facts in the light most favorable to Robinson, Sr. . . . This case features two police officers who have provided their accounts of a key moment during an altercation. Another participant in the events at issue has provided a different, conflicting version of what happened. Each account is plausible, but at least one is false. We offer no opinion as to which one that may be. That is the jury's purview, not ours. Instead, we must assume for these purposes that Brown's account is the accurate one, as it presents facts more favorable to Robinson, Sr. For that reason, we must assume that Robinson was unarmed and was not reaching for a firearm at the time Easterwood shot him. . . . Easterwood had probable cause to believe that Brown posed a threat of serious physical harm and reasonably concluded that deadly force was necessary. . . And while some dispute remains about precisely when the officers activated the Malibu's sirens and blue lights, it is clear from Brown's own account that the lights were on by the time he tried to drive away. So the first and second shots that Easterwood fired were reasonable under our jurisprudence. . . We likewise conclude that Easterwood did not act unreasonably under our precedent when he fired the final set of shots—the fifth and sixth rounds. Easterwood shot at the Mazda as the car drove away from him because he believed that it continued to present a danger to him or to others. We have never held that an officer is unjustified in shooting at a vehicle that is being used as a weapon simply because the officer is no longer in the vehicle's path. To the contrary, we have held that deadly force may be permissible where an officer'"perceive[s] that [the driver is] attempting to escape and could potentially endanger more lives.'. . . That leaves us with the second set of shots that Easterwood fired—the third and fourth rounds. Unlike the first and final sets, these shots were not targeted at Brown or at the vehicle. Rather, Easterwood himself stated that he was aiming at Robinson when he fired these shots. And as we have noted, when we analyze these shots, we must assume that Robinson was unarmed at the time and was neither reaching for a weapon nor otherwise, himself, presenting a threat to the officers or the public. We once again are not writing on a clean slate, as the Supreme Court has already held that the use of deadly force against an unarmed, non-threatening suspect is constitutionally unreasonable. . . .We have little trouble concluding, under these circumstances, that Easterwood's shots directly at Robinson were likewise not reasonable. True, Robinson was in a car that someone else was trying to use as a weapon. But in this scenario, Robinson himself never presented a threat to the officers or anyone else. He was not in control of the car, he was unarmed, and he presented no other threat. Nor would killing Robinson stop the car that did present the threat. The logic behind our 'consistently up[holding]' the use of lethal force against a suspect using a vehicle as a weapon against officers or civilians is obvious: a car is a powerful machine that can easily maim or kill a human being. By incapacitating or killing the driver, the officer has a better chance of escaping injury and reducing the harm that the driver might cause. . . .This rationale obviously does not logically extend to targeting a passenger. Even if Easterwood had been successful and hit Robinson—and it seems that he may have been. . .—the threat from Brown and the vehicle would remain. An unarmed passenger does not control a driver who is using a car as a weapon; indeed, the driver can harm an officer or the public even with a dead or wounded passenger in the car. Based on this record, we must conclude that Easterwood violated Robinson's Fourth Amendment rights when Easterwood deliberately shot at Robinson even though Robinson was unarmed and presented no threat. . . .Having determined that Easterwood violated the Fourth Amendment by targeting and shooting at an unarmed passenger, we now consider whether the right to be free from such an excessive use of force was clearly established as of August 22, 2012. We conclude that it was. . . . [O]ur precedent provides us with a case 'materially similar' to this one. . . In Vaughan, we rejected a bid for qualified immunity where an officer opened fire at the driver and passenger of a stolen vehicle during a highway chase. . . Though the driver was speeding and dragging items that had fallen off the truck's trailer, we concluded that it was not clear that the officer had probable cause to believe the suspects posed a danger to others because there were open questions as to whether the driver had lost control of the car and whether the road ahead was clear of other motorists. . . Our holding in Vaughan would have put a reasonable officer on notice that the police cannot use deadly force against a suspect who is in a car but is not using that car as a deadly weapon and where the suspect does not otherwise pose a risk to the officers or to the public. Applying that principle here, by August 22, 2012, it was clearly established in this Circuit that Easterwood's conduct would have violated the Fourth Amendment. Easterwood may still argue at trial that he fired at Robinson because Robinson was reaching for a gun. If the jury accepts that version of the event, the qualified-immunity analysis would change. . . But on this record, and assuming facts in the light most favorable to Robinson, Sr., we cannot conclude that Easterwood is entitled to qualified immunity for purposely aiming and firing at Robinson.")

L.T. by Snorton v. Owens, 808 F. App'x 814, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) ("Construing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, we can rule out that Cole was in the path of the Maserati when Owens opened fire. Cole testified that he was beside the car when he heard the first gunshot and did not know why Owens shot. We also know that Owens was not in immediate personal danger when he fired at the Maserati, which had passed him. And there were no other officers in the immediate path of the car at the time of the shooting. As to whether Cole was beside or behind the car when Owens opened fire, we will assume without deciding that a reasonable jury could conclude that neither Owens nor Cole was in imminent danger of being hit near the southwest corner when Owens shot and killed Thomas. . . .After careful review of the evidence and relevant case law, we conclude that Owens did not violate Thomas's constitutional rights, and that, even assuming he did, the unlawfulness of his conduct was not clearly established. . . . With regard to the use of deadly force against an individual who was driving a car, our cases 'have ... consistently upheld an officer's use of force and granted qualified immunity in cases where the decedent used or threatened to use his car as a weapon to endanger officers or civilians immediately preceding the officer's use of deadly force.'. . .The essential inquiry in this case is whether a reasonable officer in Owens's position could have believed that Thomas posed an immediate threat of serious physical harm to police officers or others at the time of the shooting. . . 'In other words, would [Thomas] have appeared to reasonable police officers to have been gravely dangerous?'. . . Viewing the evidence in favor of the Plaintiffs, we conclude that, despite the tragic outcome in this case, the answer is yes under our precedent. . . . Based on the conduct depicted in the video, the officers had probable cause to believe that Thomas committed aggravated assault. . . While Plaintiffs contend that Thomas objectively took steps to avoid the officers—and we agree that Thomas did not swerve at any of the officers or attempt to strike their cruisers—we do not accept Plaintiffs' version of events as to the matters clearly depicted in the video evidence. . . And here, as we have explained, the video plainly depicts Thomas, from a stopped position accelerating directly towards officers in his path. Although no deadly force was used at that time, it clearly would have been justified. . . . Owens's use of deadly force occurred less than one minute later, while Thomas was still dangerously speeding in the Maserati around the Goodyear facility. So this factor supports the reasonableness of Owens's actions. Second, Thomas actively resisted the officers and evaded arrest by refusing to comply with repeated commands at gunpoint to stop and exit the car and by driving the Maserati to avoid multiple officers who were chasing him on foot. So, this factor, too, weighs in favor of Owens. . . Third, at the time of the shooting, probable cause existed to believe that Thomas posed an ongoing threat of serious physical harm to officers on the scene. Plaintiffs stress that, under their version of facts, no officer was in the immediate path of the vehicle at the time of the shooting. But 'the threat of danger to be assessed is not just the threat to officers at the moment, but also to the officers and other persons if the chase went on.'. . .[A]ssuming Cole and Owens were outside of immediate danger at the time of the shooting, there were still at least three officers running around on foot. . . . Because Thomas had not shown any signs of giving up the chase, the danger posed to the officers, and arguably others on the premises, still existed when Owens fired at Thomas. While no officer was in the immediate path of the Maserati at the time of the shooting, the danger was sufficiently immediate under our caselaw to make the use of deadly force reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. Under these circumstances, the officers did not have to wait for Thomas to actually hit someone to take action. . . . Based on the chaotic and quickly unfolding circumstances in the Goodyear parking lot, we cannot say it was unreasonable for Owens to use deadly force. . . Even assuming Thomas's constitutional rights were violated, Owens would be entitled to qualified immunity because the unlawfulness of Owens's conduct was not clearly established at the time of the shooting. . . . [I]n this case, the video clearly shows that the Maserati was used to endanger the officers less than a minute before deadly force was used. In other words, the officers here, unlike the officers in Vaughan, had 'probable cause to believe that [the driver] had committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm.'. . And as Vaughan recognized, 'the risk presented by [the officer's] allowing [the suspects'] flight to continue is starkly different' where such probable cause exists. . . Moreover, Thomas was not simply fleeing but evading officers in such a way that he was repeatedly coming into physical proximity with them. So Vaughan does not clearly establish the unlawfulness of the use of deadly force in this case. . . . In sum, Plaintiffs have not shown that clearly established law put Owens on notice that his conduct was unlawful. Owens is therefore entitled to qualified immunity even assuming he violated Thomas's constitutional rights.") Vicente-Abad v. Sonnenberg, 803 F. App'x 1008, ____ (11th Cir. 2020) ("Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Vicente-Abad, we agree with the district court—Officer Sonnenberg is not entitled to qualified immunity. Officer Sonnenberg used constitutionally unreasonable force when he opened fire on a vehicle approaching him at a jogging pace from 60 feet away, angled so as to pass him by—not on a trajectory to collide with him. For one thing, the Graham factors do not support so severe an application of force here. At the time of the shooting, Officer Sonnenberg had no reason to believe that any serious crime had been committed. At most, he had witnessed a violation of a speed limit, although taking the facts in the light most favorable to Vicente-Abad, he was mistaken even as to that violation. Additionally, Officer Sonnenberg could not have reasonably believed that his life was in danger; although he was nearly in the path of an oncoming car, it was moving slowly and was far enough away to give him plenty of time to react. Indeed, the sedan ultimately passed Officer Sonnenberg by without striking him. He had time enough not only to get out of the way, but to fire ten rounds in the process. And finally, while it does appear that the driver of the sedan was attempting to evade the police, the officers had not informed the occupants that they were under arrest or being detained. The officers had not even used the lights or sirens on their patrol vehicle to pull the sedan over. Instead, they followed the car, shined a spotlight on it, and approached on foot without giving any instructions to its occupants. Perhaps more importantly, the Garner factors that we have singled out for evaluating applications of deadly force weigh heavily against Officer Sonnenberg. As already explained, Officer Sonnenberg had no reason to believe that anyone was in danger, nor that anyone in the car had committed a crime that posed a risk of serious physical harm. As a result, while he may have believed that deadly force was necessary to prevent escape, preventing escape was not an important enough goal in the circumstances for a reasonable officer to believe that deadly force was justified. In addition, Officer Sonnenberg had time to warn the occupants of the car that he would employ deadly force, but he opened fire without issuing a warning. After weighing these factors, it is clear that Officer Sonnenberg violated Vicente-Abad's constitutional rights by employing deadly force unreasonably. Moreover, because the unreasonableness of the shooting is apparent in light of the Graham factors and still more obvious in light of the Garner factors, Vicente-Abad's right not to be fired on in this situation was clearly established at the time.")

Hunter v. City of Leeds, 941 F.3d 1265, 1278-81 (11th Cir. 2019) ("In this case, Hunter claims that the officers violated his clearly established Fourth Amendment right not to be subjected to excessive force. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Hunter and drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor, we find that there is a genuine factual dispute as to whether Kirk unconstitutionally subjected Hunter to excessive force in violation of clearly established law, but there is no dispute that the other officers did not. . . .[W]e find that, on the version of events outlined above, Kirk did not violate Hunter's Fourth Amendment rights when he fired his first round of shots at Hunter. . . . It is axiomatic that when an officer is threatened with deadly force, he may respond with deadly force to protect himself. . . . Therefore, at least on the facts as accepted at the summary judgment stage, Kirk did not violate Hunter's Fourth Amendment rights when he fired his first three shots at Hunter. . . . However, while the use of deadly force may initially be justified, the level of force that is reasonable may change during the course of a police encounter. . . . Accepting the evidence in the light most favorable to Hunter, a reasonable jury could find that Hunter no longer posed a threat of serious physical harm to Kirk when Kirk fired his second round of shots at Hunter. After Kirk fired his first three shots, Hunter recoiled back into his vehicle. Then, apparently in compliance with Kirk's commands to drop his weapon, Hunter dropped his gun through the opening in the car door. Kirk then, without further warning, fired seven more shots at Hunter, . . . who was now unarmed. Although Kirk initially may have had reason to believe that Hunter was armed and posed a danger to Kirk and the other officers, that belief would no longer be reasonable—and his actions no longer justified under either § 13A–3–23(a)(1) or § 13A–3–27(b)—once Hunter dropped his gun. . . Hunter was not actively resisting arrest, nor attempting to charge or otherwise threaten Kirk. Kirk's firing of seven additional shots against a suspect who (accepting Hunter's version of events) had dropped his weapon and was apparently no longer resisting was disproportionate to the danger Kirk faced. Nor would a 'risk of flight' justify Kirk's use of deadly force. Although Hunter initially fled the Marlee Villa Apartments, at the time of the shooting he was parked in the carport behind his house and sitting in the passenger seat of his car. Moreover, by this time Kirk was also aware that at least three other officers had pursued Hunter to his residence, including Jackson, who was present on the scene. No reasonable officer under these circumstances would believe that Hunter posed such a serious risk of escape that it was necessary to use deadly force, given that Hunter was no longer actively fleeing and was surrounded by at least four police officers. On these facts, a reasonable jury could find that Kirk's continued use of deadly force was no longer proportionate to the danger presented, and thus his second round of shots constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Moreover, that Kirk's continued firing on Hunter constituted excessive force was clearly established at the time of the shooting in December 2013. In 1985, the Supreme Court held that an officer may not use deadly force on a suspect who is unarmed and poses no immediate threat to law enforcement officers at the scene. See Garner, 471 U.S. at 11, 105 S. Ct. at 1701. Since then, we have held that using deadly force without warning on an unarmed, non-resisting suspect who poses no danger is excessive. . . . The use of deadly force against a suspect who, though initially dangerous, has been disarmed or otherwise become non-dangerous, is conduct that lies 'so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct [is] readily apparent.'. . As in Salvato, Kirk had 'fair warning' that the continued use of deadly force against a suspect who, despite having initially threatened Kirk with deadly force, was now unarmed, out of striking distance, and no longer resisting, violated the Fourth Amendment. Therefore, we conclude that it was clearly established in December 2013 that Kirk's continued firing at a suspect who no longer presented an immediate risk of serious harm or flight, because he had relinquished his weapon (as ordered), constituted excessive force.")

Davis on behalf of the Estate of Stewart v. Edwards, 779 F. App'x 691, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("The district court assumed for purposes of its summary judgment order that Edwards did not actually see Stewart holding a gun prior to discharging his weapon. This fact alone, however, is not dispositive of the claim. The record in this case demonstrates that Edwards knew Stewart to be mentally unbalanced, was reported to be armed, and was behaving in an erratic and potentially dangerous manner. The record also clearly demonstrates that upon seeing Edwards, Stewart fled. When Stewart stopped running, Edwards did not see a gun. Thus, Edwards reasonably could have concluded that the gun was concealed on Stewart's person. The record also demonstrates that when Edwards ordered Stewart to show his hands and turn around, Stewart did not comply. Further, the videotape shows that when Edwards asked Stewart where the pistol was, Stewart did not respond; instead, Stewart reached his right hand behind his back into his waistband. At that point, Edwards pointed his weapon at Stewart and ordered him to show his hands. Rather than comply with this order, Stewart kept his right hand behind his back and refused to show his hands. On this record, where Edwards had significant personal knowledge of Stewart's history with violence, as well as of his mental unpredictability, we agree with the district court's finding that at this point, whether Edwards saw the gun or not, he had probable cause to believe that Stewart posed a danger to himself and to the officers on the scene. The relevant inquiry is whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that shooting Stewart under these circumstances would have been a violation of his Fourth Amendment right. Edwards was in a precarious position that necessitated an immediate decision. He was not required to wait any longer before using deadly force. . . . Notwithstanding the tragic nature of the shooting, we conclude that it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that the shooting was unreasonable under the circumstances. Edwards had to act quickly to subdue an unstable and potentially dangerous suspect. . . Thus, because we conclude from the record that Edwards's conduct did not violate Stewart's clearly established constitutional rights, Edwards is entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiff's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim.")

Huebner v. Bradshaw, 935 F.3d 1183, 1191 (11th Cir. 2019) ("We have long and repeatedly recognized that when making a custodial arrest, 'some use of force ... is necessary and altogether lawful.'. . The force used 'must be reasonably proportionate to the need, which we measure by 'the severity of the crime, the danger to the officer, and the risk of flight.'. . Even though Huebner exhibited no meaningful flight risk, and even though her crime was relatively minor, the force employed by McDonough here wasn't remotely unusual or disproportionate. Officers routinely pull arrestees' arms behind their backs, and we have repeatedly held that painful handcuffing alone doesn't constitute excessive force. [citing cases] McDonough employed a common handcuffing technique, and he attempted (to no avail) to tell Huebner how to get more comfortable in the patrol car. The force that McDonough used in arresting Huebner was not constitutionally excessive.")

Wilson v. Parker, 746 F. App'x 860, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("Parker was faced with a difficult choice. He could either shoot an apparently intoxicated or mentally ill man, or he could stand aside and risk a fellow officer being seriously harmed or killed. Even if the situation could have been handled better—a proposition that is by no means certain—'we are mindful that officers make split-second decisions in tough and tense situations,' and '[w]e are "loath to second-guess decisions made by police officers in the field."'. . Viewing the facts from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, we conclude Parker did not violate Wilson's Fourth Amendment rights. Accordingly, Parker was entitled to summary judgment with respect to the excessive force claim.")

Manners v. Cannella, 891 F.3d 959, 969-75 (11th Cir. 2018) ("[F]or purposes of granting qualified immunity to law enforcement officers, it is enough that there is 'arguable probable cause' for a warrantless custodial arrest. . . .The district court found probable cause to arrest Manners for running a stop sign. Even taking (as we must) Manners's version of the facts to be true—that he did obey the stop sign—the district court determined that Cannella's observation could have been mistaken, but a mistaken though reasonable belief could support probable cause. We cannot agree that this resolves the question. Even assuming there would have been probable cause to arrest Manners if he ran the stop sign or if Cannella reasonably but mistakenly believed Manners had done so, on this record, there is an undeniable and material factual dispute that precludes summary judgment. Officer Cannella consistently said that Manners failed to stop at the sign. . . . Conversely, Manners consistently said that he stopped as required, indeed, he asserted that he came to a 'complete stop.' The street was in some state of darkness. On this record, a reasonable factfinder could find that Cannella neither saw nor reasonably thought he saw Manners run a stop sign. In the face of a direct factual dispute, summary judgment is inappropriate. . . The district court was not free to resolve a material factual dispute between Manners and Cannella.. . . .There was, however, both arguable and actual probable cause to arrest Manners for fleeing or attempting to elude a law enforcement officer. . . .To be entitled to qualified immunity on the three § 1983 claims, the officers needed only arguable probable cause. . . A reasonable officer in Cannella's shoes, and cognizant of the facts known to Cannella, could have believed that Manners had committed the offense of fleeing or attempting to elude a law enforcement officer. It does not alter our evaluation simply because the period of time was short so long as Manners could reasonably and safely have complied with the officer's direction but did not do so. . . .Manners says he 'feared for his life' because he was a black male alone with a law enforcement officer on an empty, dark residential street in the middle of the night, and he 'had no reasonable means of avoiding the danger except by driving to [a] safe, well-lit area.' . . . A general distrust of all police officers is not enough to establish the real, imminent, and impending nature of the danger requirement. Nor is there any showing on this record that either Officer Cannella or the Hollywood police department posed a direct, real, imminent, and impending danger. Nor, finally, was there any reason for Officer Cannella to know why Manners did not comply with his demand to stop until Manners reached a well-lit gas station. And even if some exigency existed, Cannella had no reason to know of any perceived necessity. Again, probable cause is based on the facts known to the law enforcement officer. . . .Because we have determined that there was probable cause for the arrest, the officers had the right to use some quantum of force to arrest Manners. Manners claims that a clearly established constitutional violation occurred even if the arrest was lawful because the officers used unnecessary and gratuitous force when they punched and tased him. But law enforcement officers conducting a lawful arrest have the right to take reasonable physical steps to place a suspect under arrest. . . .Of the Graham factors, the most relevant one here is resisting arrest. From the video recording, it is abundantly clear that Manners refused to be handcuffed beginning with Cannella's first efforts and continuing throughout a struggle with many officers who attempted to subdue him for at least three full minutes. . . . The videotape establishes, as we've repeated, that Manners thwarted Cannella's efforts to handcuff him for quite some time. The force necessary to handcuff Manners was not excessive under any clearly established precedent. Nor was the use of tasers by Cannella and Sabillon unconstitutionally excessive. The use of a taser 'beyond [the arrestee's] complete physical capitulation' repeatedly in a short period where an arrestee was mostly cooperative and made no attempt to flee would be excessive. . . Here, however, the taser was used to restrain, subdue, and handcuff Manners, whose resistance was evident from the outset. It is also clear from the video that the use of the taser, and indeed any force employed by the police, ended once Manners was subdued. He was never tased 'beyond his complete physical capitulation.' In short, we agree with the district court's determination that the force used by the officers was not constitutionally excessive, and that no controlling case law suggested otherwise.") Beckman on behalf of Campbell v. Hamilton, No. 17-12407, 2018 WL 1907151, at *3–5 (11th Cir. Apr. 23, 2018) (not reported) ("Plaintiff argues that Deputy Hamilton acted unreasonably by not announcing himself and by taking Campbell by surprise. First, in the light of Campbell's erratic and violent conduct and his intoxicated state, an objectively reasonable officer could have concluded it was necessary -- for officer safety -- to approach Campbell cautiously and without being seen or heard. We have recognized that '[s]hock and surprise may be proper and useful tools in avoiding unnecessary injury to everyone involved when dealing with potentially violent suspects.'. . In the light of the circumstances, that Campbell may have been surprised by Deputy Hamilton's presence at Campbell's house does not render the use of deadly force unreasonable, particularly given that Campbell immediately got a gun. Further, even if the officers failed to declare themselves verbally, that both Deputies Hamilton and Brown were in full uniform when they stepped into view from behind Campbell's home is undisputed. In the light of all the surrounding circumstances -- including the officers' dress and that, upon the officers' arrival, Campbell acted by turning and retreating to the porch -- an objectively reasonable officer in Deputy Hamilton's position could have believed that Campbell was in fact aware of the officers' presence.

. . In support of her contention that Campbell was shot while still unaware of the officers' presence, Plaintiff also relies on Campbell's utterance about being 'startled,' 'scared,' or 'surprised.' Campbell's utterance, however, is not inconsistent with Deputy Hamilton's testimony and creates no genuine issue of fact about whether Campbell saw the officers before he was shot. Besides, whether Campbell was meaningfully aware of the police before he was shot is not by itself critically important in this case, considering all the circumstances. In the light of the rapidly evolving circumstances -- only 2 to 4 seconds having elapsed from when Deputies Hamilton and Brown stepped out from around the house to when Campbell was shot -- we cannot say it was constitutionally unreasonable for Deputy Hamilton to use deadly force without first identifying himself verbally or issuing a verbal warning that deadly force would be used. . . Plaintiff also contends that Deputy Hamilton's use of deadly force was unreasonable given that Campbell's gun was not aimed at Deputy Hamilton when Campbell was shot. Plaintiff does not dispute, however, that Campbell was holding a gun when he was shot -- a gun that Deputy Hamilton says Campbell retrieved immediately after Deputies Hamilton and Brown stepped into view. Given that Campbell had been actively shooting at the Whitaker home (a home with people in and around it) moments before, had expressly threatened to kill people, and had again armed himself, an objective officer under the circumstances could have believed reasonably that Campbell posed a threat of imminent danger even if Campbell's gun was not already aimed at Deputy Hamilton. . . .The reasonableness of force used is not judged 'with 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . In this case, because an objective policeman in Deputy Hamilton's place could have believed reasonably that Campbell (who was armed) was aiming -- or in the process of aiming -- a gun toward him, Deputy Hamilton is entitled to qualified immunity even if mistaken. . . In the light of the circumstances, Deputy Hamilton's use of deadly force was reasonable in the Fourth Amendment sense: no constitutional violation. . . In addition, we conclude separately that the law was not clearly established at the time of the shooting in 2013 that Deputy Hamilton's act (given the circumstances) violated federal law. . . Deputy Hamilton is personally entitled to immunity.") Shaw v. City of Selma, 884 F.3d 1093, 1099–101 (11th Cir. 2018) ("The estate contends that summary judgment should not have been granted because there is a genuine issue of material fact about whether Shaw had raised the hatchet in his hand when Williams shot him. And if he hadn't, the estate argues that no officer reasonably could have believed that Shaw posed an immediate threat to Williams or others. Given the light in which we must view the evidence at this stage of the proceeding, we assume that the factual premise of that syllogism is correct: that Shaw did not raise the hatchet he was holding. But the legal premise—that no reasonable officer could have feared serious injury or death unless the hatchet-holding hand was raised up at the time—is wrong. The reasonableness of the shooting depends on the totality of the circumstances. . . Shaw was mentally ill and dangerous. Williams had been warned moments before that Shaw 'would fight [him] in a minute.' And Shaw had been reported for threatening customers with a knife at the same Church's Chicken only a few days before. On this occasion Shaw presented a clear danger. He was an armed and noncompliant suspect who had ignored more than two dozen orders to drop the hatchet. At the time he was shot, Shaw was advancing on Williams with hatchet in hand. He was close to him—within a few feet—and was getting closer still, yelling at Williams to 'Shoot it!'

Shaw could have raised the hatchet in another second or two and struck Williams with it. Whether the hatchet was at Shaw's side, behind his back, or above his head doesn't change that fact. Given those circumstances, a reasonable officer could have believed that Shaw posed a threat of serious physical injury or death at that moment. . . A reasonable officer could have also concluded, as Williams apparently did, that the law did not require him to wait until the hatchet was being swung toward him before firing in self-defense. . . .The shooting of a mentally ill man was tragic, as such shootings always are, but tragedy does not equate with unreasonableness.")

Spencer v. City of Orlando, 725 F. App'x 928, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("To be clear, the officers were not required to wait until Marquis successfully restarted the car and drove toward them before they defended themselves. In Long, again dealing with a similar use of deadly force, this Court held that '[e]ven if we accept that the threat posed by [the suspect] to [the officer] was not immediate in that the cruiser was not moving toward [the officer] when shots were fired, the law does not require officers in a tense and dangerous situation to wait until the moment a suspect uses a deadly weapon to act to stop the suspect.'. . Similarly, it was not unreasonable for the officers here to fire before Marquis—who was by all accounts trying to restart the Hyundai—moved the car toward them.")

Wells for Chambers v. Talton, 695 F. App'x 439, 445 (11th Cir. 2017) ('When he made the decision to shoot, Deputy Glidden had probable cause to believe that Chambers was the burglar, that he was armed with a .45 caliber pistol, and that he posed a threat to officers and the public. Thus, Deputy Glidden had to make a 'split second judgment' in a situation that was rapidly unfolding. A reasonable officer in Deputy Glidden's position could have believed that deadly force was necessary to prevent the decedent's escape and avert a threat of harm to others. Deputy Glidden resorted to deadly force after his verbal commands and physical altercation did not subdue the decedent. Under the evidence in the record at the time of summary judgment, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, we conclude that the district court properly determined that the use of deadly force did not violate Chambers' Fourth Amendment rights. Accordingly, we hold the district court properly granted qualified immunity to Deputy Glidden.")

Knight through Kerr v. Miami-Dade County, 856 F.3d 795, 813-15 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Knight and Cure next contest the exclusion of the Miami-Dade Police Department's pursuit policy. . . The plaintiffs wanted to introduce evidence and testimony at trial that the officers allegedly violated the pursuit policy; the trial court decided to exclude this evidence due to its attenuation from the circumstances preceding the use of force at issue in the case. The trial court excluded this evidence due, in part, to the risk that it would confuse the jurors by leading them to believe that they could find liability based on a violation of the pursuit policy rather than on a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Notably, the plaintiffs do not argue that the officers' alleged violation of the pursuit policy was itself a Fourth Amendment violation. They argue instead that the officers' decision to pursue the Cadillac created a situation that required the use of deadly force. However, many police departments have internal procedures that are more restrictive of conduct than what is otherwise permitted under state and federal law, and the Supreme Court has observed that a violation of these policies 'does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted.' City & Cty. of San Francisco, Ca. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1777 (2015). Thus, the plaintiffs 'cannot establish a Fourth Amendment violation based merely on bad tactics that result in a deadly confrontation that could have been avoided.'. . Indeed, 'so long as a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was justified,' a plaintiff cannot succeed 'by simply producing an expert's report that an officer's conduct leading up to a deadly confrontation was imprudent, inappropriate, or even reckless.'. . The risk of confusing the jury on this point was not insubstantial, and the court did not abuse its considerable discretion by trying to mitigate that risk. Moreover, the probative value found in this evidence was decreased measurably because it concerned events that were temporally separated from the actual use of force. As we have said, '[i]n determining whether the officers in this case are entitled to qualified immunity, we analyze the precise circumstances immediately preceding [the victim's] being shot' rather than more-attenuated events that occurred before and after the shooting. . . It was within the trial court's discretion to conclude that an alleged violation of the pursuit policy fell outside of this window. After Officers Robinson and Mendez began following the Cadillac, the cars drove for approximately six-tenths of a mile before coming to a stop at the dead end. Cure testified that after the cars stopped, approximately two minutes passed between the moment the officers exited their car and the moment that the first shot was fired; during those two minutes, the officers were issuing commands and asking the occupants to exit the Cadillac with their hands up. The trial court carefully considered the temporal separation between any claimed pursuit-policy violation and the moment that shots were fired, and it concluded that the relevant violations were only those that occurred after the cars stopped. This was a careful, fact-bound decision. We cannot say that it amounted to an abuse of discretion. . . . To the extent that the plaintiffs suggest that the pursuit itself constituted a separate Fourth Amendment violation, they have provided no evidence suggesting that the officers' pursuit independently violated clearly established law. . .'The plaintiffs have again offered no cases from the United States Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the Florida Supreme Court, and thus they cannot show that a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct was violating clearly established law.") Davidson v. City of Opelika, 675 F. App'x 955, 957-60 (11th Cir. 2017) ("The video evidence in this case is conclusive. Although we do view the facts and draw reasonable inferences in Davidson's favor, the Supreme Court has instructed us that when there is a reliable video recording of disputed events, we are to view facts 'in the light depicted by the video[ ].' Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 381 (2007). Here, that video proves that a reasonable officer in Hancock's position would fear for his life because of the unique way in which Davidson extended his wallet in his clasped hands. . . . [T]he second factor—whether Davidson posed an immediate threat to Hancock—decides this case. . . . The district court determined that Davidson presented such a threat because '[a]fter reaching behind himself in a motion akin to upholstering [sic] a weapon, Davidson stood clutching a black object with both hands, pointing towards Officer Hancock as though he was preparing to shoot.'. . The positions of the object and Davidson's hands—established by the video—are key. To be clear, Davidson exiting his vehicle, reaching behind himself, and holding an unidentified object would not have been sufficient to make Hancock's use of deadly force reasonable under the circumstances. But the unusual position of the dark object in Davidson's outstretched and clasped hands would have led a reasonable officer to believe that Davidson was pointing a gun at him. For that reason, we concur with the district court that Davidson objectively posed a grave and immediate threat to Hancock. . . .With all facts, as supported by video evidence, viewed in a light favorable to Davidson, Hancock's use of force was objectively reasonable. In so holding, we do not want to understate the suffering Davidson endured as the result of Hancock's disastrous mistake. But the positions of Davidson's wallet and hands the moment before the shooting mean that mistake did not violate Davidson's constitutional rights.")

Williams v. Deal, 659 F. App'x 580, 596, 600-01 & n.16 (11th Cir. 2016) (per curiam) ("The plaintiff points us to a line of cases from the Ninth Circuit generally holding that 'where an officer intentionally or recklessly provokes a violent confrontation, if the provocation is an independent Fourth Amendment violation, he may be held liable for his otherwise defensive use of deadly force."' Billington v. Smith, 292 F.3d 1177, 1189 (9th Cir. 2002). The district court declined to rule on whether this initial contact was a separate constitutional violation, instead considering the incident as a whole. . . But the plaintiff asserted as much below and on appeal. So we address it here. Even if we applied the Ninth Circuit's rule, the plaintiff's second theory fails because there was no unconstitutional provocation. . . .[W]e conclude that the initial use of force—Officer Deal grabbing and attempting to push Mr. Williams back into the car—was not excessive under the circumstances. Perhaps this wasn't the wisest course of action. Maybe it was a bad idea. But '[w]e do not sit in judgment to determine whether an officer made the best or a good or even a bad decision in the manner of carrying out an arrest.'. . Even under the cases the plaintiff relies on from a sister circuit, action that complies with the Fourth Amendment 'is not rendered unreasonable because it provokes a violent reaction.' City & Cnty. of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1777 & n.4 (2015) (discussing those cases but declining to endorse or reject them). . . . The plaintiff's final theory is that the shooting itself was an unconstitutional use of excessive force given the totality of circumstances. The Supreme Court's decision in Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), guides the Fourth Amendment reasonableness analysis where a police officer uses deadly force. . . Under Garner, the use of deadly force is 'more likely reasonable if: the suspect poses an immediate threat of serious physical harm to officers or others; the suspect committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious harm, such that his being at large represents an inherent risk to the general public; and the officers either issued a warning or could not feasibly have done so before using deadly force.' Penley, 605 F.3d at 850. '[O]nce we have determined the relevant set of facts and drawn all inferences in favor of the nonmoving party to the extent supportable by the record' the reasonableness of a use of deadly force 'is a pure question of law.' Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 381 n.8 (2007). . . . We recognize that there is a difference of opinion about this. See Scott, 550 U.S. at 390 (Stevens, J., dissenting) (reasoning that '[d]epending on the circumstances ... the question of the reasonableness of the officer's actions should be decided by a jury'); see also Dan M. Kahan, David A. Hoffman, and Donald Braman, Whose Eyes Are You Going to Believe? Scott v. Harris and the Perils of Cognitive Illiberalism, 122 Harv. L. Rev. 837, 843 (2009). But the opinion that matters is the Supreme Court's opinion. Recognizing that there's room to judge underlying facts differently, we have tried to confront any 'unconscious priors' in deciding this case. See Richard A. Posner, Divergent Paths: The Academy and the Judiciary 17 (2016). . . .In two respects, we part company with the district court's analysis of the third factor—the feasibility of issuing a warning. First, the order says 'whether it was feasible for Deal to have issued a warning prior to firing is also an integral one of fact for jury determination.' That's not so. As part of the reasonableness inquiry, a determination whether it was feasible to issue a warning is a legal conclusion drawn from facts. . . Here there's no genuine dispute of material fact about what happened, only the legal significance of what happened. Second, the order overemphasizes the significance of a verbal warning. '[A] mechanical application of these factors ... is not appropriate.'. . Garner isn't 'a magical on/off switch that triggers rigid preconditions whenever an officer's actions constitute deadly force.'. . The fact that Mr. Williams was unarmed at the time of the gunshot doesn't change this result. Mr. Williams was actively and violently resisting a lawful seizure. There had been a struggle at close quarters. Punches had been thrown and landed. Even if Mr. Williams didn't succeed in partly removing the gun from the holster, a reasonable officer would have perceived that Mr. Williams was attempting to gain control of the gun when he kept advancing. 'Under the circumstances a reasonable officer would perceive a substantial risk that [Mr. Williams] would seriously injure or kill him, either by beating ... him, or by taking his gun and shooting him with it.' See Billington, 292 F.3d at 1185; see also DeLuna v. City of Rockford, 447 F.3d 1008, 1013 (7th Cir. 2006) (an officer "need not wait until there is a physical struggle for control of his weapon before a situation presents an imminent danger of serious physical injury"); Blossom v. Yarbrough, 429 F.3d 963, 968 (10th Cir. 2005) (holding that deadly force was lawful because the suspect was advancing on the officer in what appeared to be an effort to get his weapon). In these circumstances, a police officer needn't risk his life on the chance that the advancing suspect has or will suddenly develop peaceful intentions. . .We conclude that this use of deadly force was objectively reasonable under all of the circumstances. In keeping with the standard of review, we have reviewed the record looking for some evidence which contradicts the police officer's account of the incident in a way that makes a difference. We've found none. The plaintiff hasn't shown that Officer Deal violated the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, he is entitled to judgment from the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment excessive-force claim.")

Clemons v. Knight, 662 F. App'x 725, 728 (11th Cir. 2016) ("The deputies' use of deadly force did not violate Mitchell's and Gilmer's constitutional rights under the Fourth Amendment. In the light of Mitchell's evasive behavior and Sasse's presence near the front of Mitchell's jeep, both deputies reasonably feared that Mitchell's use of the jeep created an imminent danger of serious injury to Sasse. . . The deputies were entitled to fire their guns to protect Sasse. . . Because the officers were justified in responding to the danger created by the jeep with deadly force, the deputies were immune from liability for Gilmer's injuries and for Mitchell's death.")

Nigro v. Carrasquillo, 663 F. App'x 894, 896-97 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Both parties, and the district court, relied on our decision in Vinyard v. Wilson, 311 F.3d 1340 (11th Cir. 2002). There, where officers pepper sprayed the plaintiff while she was sitting in the back of a patrol car, we held that the Graham factors weighed in the plaintiff's favor. Critically, however, we noted in that case that the plaintiff was not resisting arrest or attempting to flee. . .We recognized in Vinyard, that '[c]ourts have consistently concluded that using pepper spray is reasonable, [ ] where the plaintiff was either resisting arrest or refusing police requests.'. . We stated that 'pepper spray is generally of limited intrusiveness, and it is designed to disable a suspect without causing permanent physical injury.'. . And we further acknowledged that 'pepper spray is a very reasonable alternative to escalating a physical struggle with an arrestee.'. . Officer Carrasquillo's use of pepper spray did not constitute excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Officer Carrasquillo applied two short bursts of pepper spray in response to Ms. Nigro's violently kicking the patrol car door and resisting arrest. The use of minimal force associated with a couple of two-second bursts of pepper spray was reasonable force to prevent Ms. Nigro from further damaging government property, injuring herself, or harming the officers. First, we have explained—albeit under different facts—that '[p]epper spray is a specially noninvasive weapon and may be one very safe and effective method of handling a violent suspect who may cause further harm to himself or others.'. . Here Ms. Nigro, who has been detained pursuant to Florida's Baker Act, was acting violently inside the patrol car. Second, in Vinyard we said in dicta that the use of pepper spray to subdue an arrestee who was acting violently in a patrol car is not excessive force. . . That dicta is persuasive, and we follow it in this case.")

Smith v. LePage, 834 F.3d 1285, 1295-97 (11th Cir. 2016) ("The officers tried to get Mr. Smith to cooperate for two to three minutes before deploying the taser. Although the crimes Mr. Smith was suspected of were mere misdemeanors, a reasonable officer on the scene could have believed that Mr. Smith posed a danger to himself or others and was actively resisting arrest. In these circumstances, our precedent dictates that the officers' single taser discharge on Mr. Smith during the first tasering was reasonable. Leading up to the second tasering, Mr. Smith was barricaded in his bathroom and repeatedly disobeyed the officers' commands to come out. When he eventually did start coming out of the bathroom, he moved toward the exit rather than immediately surrendering. There is a material dispute over whether Mr. Smith was armed at the time. Viewing the evidence and all factual inferences in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, we must assume for purposes of summary judgment that Mr. Smith no longer had the knife at the time. Even so, our precedent does not necessarily require that a noncompliant suspect be armed to justify the use of a nonlethal taser. . . In this tense situation, we cannot say that the officers' single use of a taser on Mr. Smith was unreasonable. . . . As is often true in qualified immunity cases, there are different accounts of what happened here. The plaintiffs say that Mr. Smith dropped the kitchen knife on the staircase when he was tased the first time and did not pick it back up. We must therefore infer that he did not have a knife while barricaded in the bathroom. The officers say, to the contrary, that Mr. Smith was visibly armed with the kitchen knife while barricaded in the bathroom, and came out of the bathroom violently slashing with it. There is material evidence in the record supporting both accounts. . . .It is not this Court's function to weigh the facts and decide the truth of the matter at summary judgment. . . Instead, where there are 'varying accounts of what happened,' the proper standard requires us to adopt the account most favorable to the non-movants. . . Applying that standard here, we accept for purposes of summary judgment that Mr. Smith was unarmed when he was barricaded inside the bathroom and when he exited. . . .With the facts properly framed, we turn to whether these facts can support a clearly established constitutional violation. First, the use of deadly force in this circumstance was a constitutional violation. The officers did not have probable cause to believe Mr. Smith posed a threat of serious physical harm when he left his bathroom without a weapon and moved toward the only exit. . . .Second, the violated right was clearly established at the time of the shooting. . . .Garner clearly established that Mr. Smith had a right to be free from deadly force when he was not threatening the officers, was merely suspected of misdemeanor offenses, and was attempting to escape. . . .The officers had 'reasonable warning' that fatally shooting an unarmed person suspected of a misdemeanor in his own home merely because he was moving toward them was a constitutional violation. . . Thus, we affirm the District Court's denial of summary judgment on the plaintiffs' § 1983 claim against Officers Ings and LePage for shooting Mr. Smith.")

Thomas v. Moody, 653 F. App'x 667, 674-75 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Under the facts and circumstances of this case, which includes video evidence, we cannot say that Officer Moody violated Thomas's' constitutional rights by using objectively unreasonable force. As in Pace, Robinson, and McCullough, Thomas's aggressive and dangerous driving threatened serious harm to other citizens and the officers as he drove through four stop signs, almost hitting one car, and as he drove through the parking lot. That threat escalated when Thomas rammed into a parked car as the officers closed in. Indeed, the Plaintiff admits that, even though the Explorer was stationary for a moment (as most, a few seconds), Thomas never turned off the engine, never attempted to exit the Explorer, and never raised his hands. . . . Even if the Plaintiff did establish that a federal constitutional violation occurred, which she did not, that federal law was not clearly established at the time that Thomas used his car as a dangerous weapon. We cannot say that Officer Moody had fair warning that his conduct was unlawful in the dangerous situation he confronted. . . If anything, the prevailing law in this Circuit at the time of Thomas's death affirmatively provided that Officer Moody's actions were objectively reasonable. . .In sum, Officer Moody's use of deadly force did not violate Thomas's constitutional rights. Moreover, on June 28, 2012, it was not clearly established that Officer Moody was prohibited from using deadly force against Thomas under the circumstances of this case. Because Moody violated no constitutional right, let alone a clearly established one, we conclude that he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ayers v. Harrison, 650 F. App'x 709, 715 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Here Officer Harrison had even less cause than the officers in Gilmere and Lundgren to believe that Rev. Ayers presented an imminent risk of harm. First, Officer Harrison and his colleagues concededly had no probable cause to believe that Rev. Ayers was involved with drugs or was armed or dangerous. Second, Gilmere demonstrates that, even in cases where a suspect engages in a struggle, police officers are still required to properly assess whether the suspect is a genuine threat based on the information available to them at the time. Officer Harrison did no such thing. Without notice, Officer Harrison approached Rev. Ayers in an unmarked SUV which partially blocked the path of Rev. Ayers' car. Officer Harrison, who was not in uniform, then drew his weapon, without first identifying himself as a law enforcement officer. Instead of evaluating whether Rev. Ayers was a true threat—or was simply scared of being robbed—when he put his car in reverse and backed up, Officer Harrison fired his weapon without warning or provocation. Gilmere and Lundgren provided Officer Harrison with sufficient notice that his use of deadly force was unconstitutional.")

Boynton v. City of Tallahassee, 650 F. App'x 654, 660-61(11th Cir. 2016) ("Norton emphasizes that the police department's use of force policy allows officers to use a 'stun gun' on suspects who exhibit 'active physical resistance,' which is defined to include 'bracing or tensing.' Two things about that. First, that policy does not guide our analysis — the Fourth Amendment does. Second, we do not suggest that 'tensing' will never justify the use of a stun gun or taser under any circumstances. We hold only that from the evidence in the record a jury could find Norton's use of a taser on Boynton nine times was unreasonable under the circumstances. Norton contends that he is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity, which protects government officials acting within their discretionary authority unless they violate a 'clearly established' right. . . The parties agree that Norton was acting within his discretionary authority. To decide whether a right is 'clearly established,' we consider whether, based on the law applicable at the time of the alleged violation, it would have been 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . When this incident occurred in 2010, it would have been. In 2009 this Court considered the reasonableness of an officer's repeated use of a taser on an individual who was not accused of any crime; who did not pose an immediate threat to the officer or others; who was not belligerent or aggressive; and who was not trying to flee or evade arrest. . . The officer in Oliver deployed her taser 'at least eight and as many as eleven or twelve times,' even after the individual was 'immobilized,' 'limp,' and 'writhing in pain.'. .Under those circumstances, we held that the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity because the force used was 'so plainly unnecessary and disproportionate that no reasonable officer could have thought that [it] was legal.'. . In light of Oliver, a reasonable officer in Norton's position would have known that repeatedly tasing Boynton, who was not argumentative, aggressive, or mobile, was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. Norton is not entitled to qualified immunity on Boynton's excessive force claim at this time.")

Singletary v. Vargas, 804 F.3d 1174, 1182-85 (11th Cir. 2015) ("Because we, the district court, and the parties agree on the governing legal principles, the question before us then becomes whether the district court's construction of the evidence in the record was accurate. Having carefully reviewed that evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, we disagree with the district court and conclude that a reasonable officer would have reasonably perceived that he was in imminent danger of being run over by Lechner's car. Thus, the officer's firing of his gun in an effort to stop the car did not constitute excessive force. . . . Given the video evidence, Plaintiff's testimony cannot call into question Defendant's assertion that he was in the path of Lechner's car when the latter accelerated toward him, thereby causing Defendant to reasonably fear for his life. . . . In short, taking the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, we conclude that this evidence demonstrates that Lechner's car began accelerating toward Defendant as he stood in front of it and that his use of deadly force to stop what appeared to be an imminent threat to his life was not excessive. That being so, Defendant did not violate the Constitution when he responded with deadly force. . . . Even assuming a constitutional violation, Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity unless Plaintiff can show that his Fourth Amendment rights were 'clearly established' at the time of the shooting. . . .As explained above, it is well established that an officer may constitutionally use deadly force when his life is threatened by a car that is being used as a deadly weapon. . . The district court thus acknowledged that Defendant would be entitled to qualified immunity if he reasonably believed Lechner was trying to run him over with the car and thus feared for his safety. The court nevertheless denied qualified immunity because it discounted undisputed video evidence showing that Defendant was in the path of the car when it accelerated and that he fired just as—or a split second after—Lechner hit the brakes. Properly accounting for this evidence, our case law did not put Defendant on notice that his use of deadly force violated any clearly established rights.")

Murphy v. Demings, 626 F. App'x 836, 840-41 (11th Cir. 2015) (per curiam) ("We also conclude that, under the circumstances, Deputy Caron's act of shooting Plaintiff was not outside the range of reasonable conduct. Deputy Caron was confronted with an armed robbery suspect who was fleeing police, and who had already hit two police cars without stopping and had engaged in a high-speed chase. When Plaintiff made a sudden movement toward his waistband, an objective officer in Deputy Caron's situation could have believed reasonably that Plaintiff was reaching for a gun and that Plaintiff posed an imminent threat of serious physical injury to the officers and to others. Faced with a 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' situation, Deputy Caron made a split-second decision to fire his gun in an attempt to disarm or incapacitate Plaintiff. Given the circumstances, we cannot say that Deputy Caron's decision was unreasonable in the Fourth Amendment sense. Although Plaintiff was running away from Deputy Caron when he was shot and had not threatened definitely the officers with a gun, 'the law does not require officers in tense and dangerous situations to wait until the moment a suspect uses a deadly weapon to act to stop the suspect.'. .We also reject Plaintiff's contention that Deputy Caron acted unreasonably by failing to warn Plaintiff about the potential use of deadly force. Although a warning is one factor that weighs in favor of reasonableness, . . . the Supreme Court has stressed that 'Garner did not establish a magical on/off switch that triggers rigid preconditions whenever an officer's actions constitute "deadly force."'. .Instead, reasonableness is determined based on all the facts and circumstances of each individual case. . .Under the facts and circumstances of this case, Deputy Caron's use of deadly force was not outside the range of reasonable conduct under the Fourth Amendment. An objectively reasonable officer possessing the same knowledge as Deputy Caron could have believed that the use of deadly force against Plaintiff was justified, to prevent serious injury to the officers and to bystanders. And we are highly confident that Deputy Caron—given the circumstances—violated no clearly-established constitutional right of which a reasonable person would have known. As a matter of law, Deputy Caron is entitled to summary judgment.")

Salvato v. Miley, 790 F.3d 1286, 1294-95 (11th Cir. 2015) ("Because the standard for excessive force is clearly established and our precedents and those of the Supreme Court make clear that firing without first warning on a retreating, apparently unarmed suspect is excessive, Miley had 'fair warning,'. . . that her actions were unconstitutional. . . .Miley does not contest that Brown's use of force was unreasonable. . . .Because the record, viewed in the light most favorable to Salvato, establishes that Miley was 'in a position to intervene,'. . . but failed to do so, the district court did not err when it denied her qualified immunity.")

Cook v. Peters, 604 F. App'x 663, 667-68 (10th Cir. 2015) ("[C]ase law with similar facts is not always required in excessive force cases. Rather, a plaintiff can establish that his right was clearly established if application of the Graham factors alone would put a reasonable officer on notice that his actions were unconstitutional. . . Because Mr. Peters' actions were clearly unconstitutional based on the Graham factors, Mr. Cook was not required to present case law with similar facts.")

Alday v. Groover, 601 F. App'x 775, 777-78 (11th Cir. 2015) ("Alday has cited no case with materially similar facts from the Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the Supreme Court of Georgia which might have given Groover fair warning that his actions were unconstitutional, nor has our research revealed such a case. Thus Alday can surmount the qualified immunity hurdle only if Groover's conduct was 'so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that [Groover] had to know he was violating the Constitution even without case law on point.'. . However, we have the benefit of some guidance from Buckley v. Haddock, 292 F. App'x 791 (11th Cir.2008), where this Court granted qualified immunity to an officer using a Taser to gain the compliance of a handcuffed suspect. There, a handcuffed, uncooperative plaintiff refused an officer's order to move from the ground to the patrol car. . . The officer applied the Taser a total of three times to the uncompliant, but otherwise sedate, plaintiff. . . Two judges of this court concluded that the first two taser shocks did not violate the Constitution. . . While the unpublished Buckley opinion is not binding precedent and certainly does not establish that the use of taser shock on a handcuffed plaintiff to bring compliance is constitutional, the clear views of those two judges of this court are relevant to the issue of whether the lesser conduct in the instant case violated clearly established constitutional law. . .For this reason, Groover is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Willis v. Mock, 600 F. App'x 679, 684-85 (11th Cir. 2015) ("The use of deadly force can be constitutionally reasonable where a driver 'intentionally placed himself and the public in danger by unlawfully engaging in the reckless, high-speed flight' from law enforcement. . . That is the case here. This is true whether or not Willis knew that he was being chased by multiple officers from multiple jurisdictions across multiple counties. The fact is Willis's riding put himself and the public at risk or loss of life or property. And because the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness inquiry is conducted from the officers' perspective, not Willis's, . . . it is irrelevant whether he decided to barrel through the roadblock and continue his headlong flight because he reasonably believed that the officers were going to fire their weapons at him. In sum, we conclude that Captain James and Sergeant Turner's conduct did not violate Willis's Fourth Amendment rights and, therefore, the district court's grant of summary judgment as to them will be affirmed.")

Quiles v. City of Tampa Police Dep't, 596 F. App'x 816, 820-21 (11th Cir. 2015) ("Given the teaching of the post–1985 development of the law (all that matters is reasonableness), the district court's focus on our opinion in Acoff is misplaced. In Acoff—decided only a few months after Garner was decided—we treated Garner as having established a 'standard for defining the reasonable use of deadly force to seize a person.'. . We described the Garner standard as containing three distinct elements, one of which was the issuance of a warning when feasible. . . In explaining why a directed verdict for defendant was improper in that case, we relied on a number of things, including our reasoning that '[t]he jury was certainly entitled to conclude that a warning was feasible and this alone would have established a violation of the legal standard.'. . But, in the light of the Supreme Court's later clarification in Scott of the Garner legal standard, we now know and had published precedents by 2011 that an officer's failure to issue a seemingly feasible warning—at least, to a person appearing to be armed—does not, in and of itself, render automatically unreasonable the use of deadly force. . . . Given the facts and circumstances of this case, Officer Savitt's use of deadly force was not outside the range of reasonable conduct under the Fourth Amendment. He faced what was reasonably perceived as a grave danger. An objectively reasonable officer possessing the same knowledge as Officer Savitt could have believed that the use of deadly force against Quiles was justified, to prevent serious injury to the officers and to bystanders. The Constitution was not violated. Moreover, given the circumstances and the train of precedents, we are even more confident that Officer Savitt, in 2011, violated no clearly-established constitutional right of which a reasonable person would have known; as a matter of law, he personally is entitled to immunity.")

Montero v. Nandlal, 597 F. App'x 1021, 1025-26 (11th Cir. 2014)) ("Montero did initially resist being arrested, and he arguably posed some threat to Nandlal and Blackman once the struggle began. However, Nandlal had no reason to believe that Montero was armed, and we must assume, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, that he was not reaching for either deputy's gun at any time during the confrontation. Crucially, there is evidence to support Plaintiff's assertion that, at the time Nandlal decided to shoot Montero, the latter was on his back, subdued and immobilized, with Deputy Blackman standing over him. Montero's resistance had therefore ended, and any physical threat he presented had been neutralized when the shooting occurred. . .Thus, seemingly having ended at the time of the shooting, Montero's earlier resistance does not, taken by itself, legitimize Deputy Nandlal's later decision to shoot him. . . . Nandlal is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity unless Plaintiff can show that Montero's Fourth Amendment rights were 'clearly established' at the time of the shooting. . . To be clearly established, the contours of a right must be 'sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it.'. . Fair warning is most commonly provided by materially similar precedent from the Supreme Court, this Court, or the highest state court in which the case has arisen. . . However, a judicial precedent with identical facts is not essential for the law to be clearly established. . . .We set forth the factors relevant to deciding whether an officer's use of deadly force was reasonable in several cases that pre-date April 9, 2010. . . None of those factors indicate that it would be reasonable to shoot—four times, in rapid succession and without any warning-an unarmed suspect who is subdued, immobilized, and lying on his back with another officer standing over him. We also observed, in several cases pre-dating April 9, 2010, that an officer may constitutionally use deadly force against a suspect whom the officer reasonably believes (1) 'poses a threat of serious physical harm to the officer or others' or (2) has 'committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm.'. . . Based on the assumed facts, these cases likewise make it obvious that Nandlal violated Montero's Fourth Amendment rights by using deadly force against him. The only crime that Nandlal suspected Montero of committing was misdemeanor disorderly intoxication, which did not involve or threaten the infliction of physical harm. Nor was there any basis upon which Nandlal could otherwise reasonably perceive Montero, who was unarmed, immobilized, and lying beneath Deputy Blackman, as posing a threat of serious physical harm. . . In short, Nandlal had 'fair warning' on April 9, 2010 that his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. Of course, a jury might well find that Nandlal reasonably perceived Montero to be a serious threat because he was not in fact subdued at the time of the shooting or because at some point during the struggle he had reached for Nandlal's gun belt. But assuming Plaintiff's version of the facts to be correct, as we must do in reviewing a defendant's motion for summary judgment, existing case law provided sufficient warning to alert Nandlal to the fact that shooting Montero, under these circumstances, would violate the latter's Fourth Amendment rights. Accordingly, qualified immunity for Deputy Nandlal is not warranted on these facts.")

Bussey-Morice v. Gomez, 587 F. App'x 621, 627-28, 630-31 (11th Cir. 2014) [Bussey I] ("Because we find that the alleged illegality of Gomez and Hewatt's behavior was not clearly established at the time of their actions, we need not decide whether a constitutional violation took place. . . .Here, even viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Bussey–Morice, we find that it was not clearly established at the time of the incident, under either method, that Gomez and Hewatt's conduct violated Bussey's right to be free from excessive force. First, we agree with the district court that no decision from the United States Supreme Court, this Court, or the Florida Supreme Court has clearly established that an officer's repeated use of a Taser constitutes excessive force under circumstances identical to these. Consequently, Bussey–Morice must demonstrate that this case presents one of those rare circumstances in which, as a matter of obvious clarity, Gomez and Hewatt's actions violated the Fourth Amendment. We find that she cannot. . . .On this record, despite the tragic nature of Bussey's death, we simply cannot conclude that clearly established law precluded Gomez and Hewatt from using their Tasers in the manner used here. Rather, we find the circumstances of this case to be more akin to the facts of Hoyt v. Cooks, 672 F.3d 972 (11th Cir.2012), a case in which we determined that police officers were entitled to qualified immunity on excessive-force claims in a situation where they repeatedly used their Tasers in an attempt to subdue a mentally unstable arrestee. . . .Ultimately, we find that the facts here do not present behavior that, under the difficult circumstances present in the hospital's emergency-room lobby on December 19, 2009, was so egregious that it should have been obvious to Gomez and Hewatt that they were violating Bussey's clearly established right when they tased Bussey. Rather, because they were faced with an aggressive, psychotic, non-compliant individual in a hospital, where others could have been injured, Gomez and Hewatt reasonably could have believed that, in deploying their Tasers multiple times, their actions were lawful.")

Saunders v. Duke, 766 F. 3d 1262, 1269 (11th Cir. 2014) ("The district court's grant of qualified immunity was based on the assumption that, by lifting his head, Mr. Saunders was being uncooperative or was resisting. That assumption, however, does not read the allegations of the complaint in the light most favorable to Mr. Saunders. First, the complaint can fairly be read to allege that Mr. Saunders kept his face off the pavement the whole time he was on the ground (which was for a 'long period'), and did not just lift it up all of a sudden in defiance of contrary commands. Second, Mr. Saunders specifically alleged that, once he was handcuffed and on the ground, he did not resist and did not do anything to threaten the agents or anyone else. But even if the complaint could be read to allege that Mr. Saunders disobeyed an order by lifting his head off the hot pavement, that minor transgression does not mean that the force allegedly used was a constitutionally permissible response, or that the agents are entitled to qualified immunity. . .The agents did not, by Mr. Saunders' account, merely exert some pressure to guide his head downward. Instead, they 'slammed' his head against the pavement with 'extreme force,' and, not surprisingly, this resulted in significant injuries to Mr. Saunders. The human skull is a relatively hearty vessel for the brain, but it will generally not fare well in a contest with hardened cement.")

Harper v. Davis, 571 F. App'x 906, 912-14 (11th Cir. 2014) ("[A] reasonable officer might question whether 'any danger had passed' when defendants tasered Harper. Unlike the Lee plaintiff—who did nothing wrong but to tap her horn—Harper had reportedly beaten his wife, pointed a gun at his nephew, fired rounds into the ceiling, threatened suicide, and fled armed into the woods before the police arrived. . . Furthermore, Harper stood in a tree just above Perkins (a position of tactical advantage) when defendants spotted him. Finally, as defendants hollered at Harper to show his hands and descend, Perkins shouted, 'He's got the fuckin' gun in the tree with him.' In this chaotic moment-with the suspect cornered but loose and an unsecured rifle somewhere nearby-a reasonable officer might use a 'degree of physical coercion' bordering on deadly force to make an arrest and ensure the safety of his fellows. . . At least Harper was not 'fully secured' such that force was 'unnecessary to any legitimate law enforcement purpose.'. . .On summary judgment, the trial court quoted our decision at the motion-to-dismiss stage to show that tasering Harper was unreasonable. . . In that opinion we found—based on scarce evidence in the complaint—that Harper '(1) was at least four feet up in a tree with his hands raised, (2) posed no threat to [the officers'] safety or the safety of others, (3) had no chance, and did not attempt, to flee, and (4) merely put his hands in the air in compliance with the instructions of at least one officer.'. . We concluded that tasering a suspect so situated obviously violated the Fourth Amendment. . .Harper would have us make the same finding now, but we refuse to do so. First, in our previous opinion, we had no occasion to consider the initial Graham factor, the crimes leading to Harper's arrest . . . . After discovery we know, however, that defendants were told Harper overdrank, beat his wife, fired a rifle in his home, threatened suicide, then fled with his weapon into the woods. Harper's crimes were indeed so worrisome that Gourley, Davis, and the other officers donned bulletproof vests before tracking. We doubt a reasonable officer would find it 'readily apparent' that defendants' force was excessive under the circumstances. . . Discovery evidence also leads us to reconsider another Graham factor: whether a reasonable officer would think Harper made no attempt to escape arrest. . . On this score, the trial court highlighted that Harper tried to surrender but could not raise his hands and descend the tree at the same time. . .Yet this analysis misses an important point. In qualified immunity cases, we ask not whether the suspect intended to surrender, but rather whether a reasonable officer on the scene would think the suspect was surrendering. . . One must remember that Gourley and Davis found Harper in a tree. This initial position betokened flight, not gentle surrender. . . And while we concede that the officers' twofold commands made compliance difficult, we disagree that defendants behaved unreasonably under the circumstances. To arrest their suspect, the officers had to coax Harper from the tree; to ensure the suspect did not shoot them, the officers needed Harper to show his hands. We cannot hold in hindsight that defendants' commands were improper or that it was readily apparent that tasering Harper was unwarranted. . . Finally, we disagree that a reasonable officer would think Harper posed no 'immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others.'. . In finding that Harper posed no danger to defendants, the trial court noted that Harper's 'hands were raised and empty' when the officers deployed their Tasers, and Harper 'had abandoned the gun far enough away that he would have had to move away from his current perch to access it.'. . But once again, this analysis views the evidence from Harper's perspective, not an officer's. Even if Harper were entirely unable to harm defendants—whether because his rifle was out of reach, because he was trying to show his hands, or because he planned to surrender—a reasonable officer in defendants' shoes would have thought Harper was dangerous. Before the search, Gourley and Davis learned that Harper was drunk and had a gun. Then, in the tense seconds after the officers found their suspect in the tree, and as Harper fumbled to show his hands and come down, Perkins exclaimed, 'He's got the fuckin' gun in the tree with him.' Gourley tasered Harper immediately, and Davis followed suit just seconds after. Even drawing reasonable inferences in Harper's favor, we cannot say it was obviously clear that defendants' acted excessively to neutralize the perceived threat. To echo our holding in Carr v. Tatangelo, a 'reasonable but mistaken belief that probable cause exists for using [significant] force is not actionable under § 1983.'. . In sum, Harper failed to show that defendants infringed his clearly established constitutional rights. Thus we grant Gourley and Davis qualified immunity without directly assessing the constitutionality of their conduct. By so holding, we do not wish to belittle the personal tragedy Harper suffered on that late spring night. No doubt losing one's mobility and one's family in a single stroke inflicts wounds beyond repair. Even so, we cannot hold defendants liable for conduct that the law did not clearly prohibit. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court is reversed, and the case is remanded with instructions that judgment be entered for Gourley and Davis.")

Morton v. Kirkwood, 707 F.3d 1276, 1283, 1285, 1286 (11th Cir. 2013) ("Like Garner, . . . Vaughan gave fair warning that the use of deadly force against a non-resisting suspect who posed no danger violates a suspect's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. While the facts of neither Vaughan nor Garner exactly match the facts here, Morton presented less of a safety and flight risk than the driver in Vaughan or the suspect in Garner. The truck in Vaughan was speeding on a highway; Morton's car was parked. In Vaughan, the driver refused to stop when the police ordered him to do so; Morton immediately raised his hands when he heard Officer Kirkwood shout. In Vaughan, the driver was suspected of car theft; Morton was suspected of no crime. And in Garner a criminal suspect sought to flee, whereas Morton did not flee and was not suspected of a crime. '[I]n the light of pre-existing law,' here Garner and Vaughan, 'the unlawfulness' of Kirkwood's alleged actions was 'apparent,' and so qualified immunity does not apply. . . .In short, if Morton's version of events is accurate, a reasonable officer on the scene with knowledge of the attendant facts would not have shot Morton, hitting him with seven bullets, while he sat stationary in his car with his hands up. This alleged conduct violated Morton's Fourth Amendment rights. And clearly established law gave Kirkwood fair warning that the use of deadly force under these circumstances would be unconstitutional.")

Terrell v. Smith, 668 F.3d 1244, 1255, 1256, 1258 (11th Cir. 2012) ("The reasoning of our cases in this area readily spells the outcome in this one. Officer Smith was forced to make a split-second decision concerning whether the use of lethal force was necessary. Beyond himself, two other people were within a few feet of the moving vehicle as these rapidly unfolding and uncontrolled events transpired. "Even if in hindsight the facts show that [the officer] perhaps could have escaped unharmed," Robinson, 415 F.3d at 1256, an objectively reasonable law enforcement officer could well have perceived that the moving vehicle was being used as a deadly weapon, especially after the driver had been repeatedly ordered to stop. In short, Smith was attempting to make an arrest that he had the legal right to make while standing in a position where he was legally entitled to be. Zylstra refused to heed Smith's commands to stop the vehicle and turned the car 'in a dangerous and aggressive manner which provided the officers with probable cause to believe that [Zylstra] ... posed a threat of serious physical harm or death to the officers, or other passersby, especially in light of the speed with which the incident unfolded.'. . The use of lethal force was objectively reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . In this case we could end our analysis with our holding that Officer Smith did not violate Zylstra's Fourth Amendment rights. Nevertheless, we turn to the second question anyway: whether the law was clearly established and fairly placed Officer Smith on notice that his conduct was clearly unlawful under the peculiar circumstances of the case. We do so in order to make a complete record in the face of this tragic shooting, and we hold that the plaintiffs have failed to carry their burden on this prong as well. . . . In short, the clearly established law as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court, this Court, and the Florida Supreme Court would not have given Officer Smith fair notice that his actions would violate the Fourth Amendment. The fact-specific precedent of this Court suggested precisely the opposite, and neither a broader clearly established principle nor the words of the Fourth Amendment alone provided sufficient guidance. The second qualified immunity prong, therefore, also resolves in the officer's favor.")

Edwards v. Shanley, 666 F.3d 1289, 1295, 1296, 1298 (11th Cir. 2012) ("That Officer Shanley reasonably decided to use the dog in the first instance does not mean, however, that the use of the dog was reasonable for the duration of the attack. Rather, the Graham factors compel the conclusion that Officer Shanley used unreasonable force when he subjected Edwards to five to seven minutes of dog attack, while Edwards was pleading to surrender and Officer Shanley was in a position to immediately effect Edwards's arrest. Critical to this determination is the fact that, in subjecting Edwards to the dog attack, Officer Shanley increased the force applied at the same time the threat presented by Edwards decreased. To be sure, the seriousness of Edwards's fleeing Officer Lovett had not changed, and thus under the first Graham factor we accept that Officer Shanley had some reason to approach Edwards with concerns for his own safety. But insofar as fleeing from the police raises doubt about the danger an individual poses, Edwards mitigated that doubt by laying prone with his hands exposed and begging to surrender. As a result, the second and third Graham factors weigh in favor of Edwards's argument that extraordinary force was not necessary or appropriate for the entire duration of the dog attack. Indeed, evaluating Officer Shanley's conduct at the time of the prolonged attack makes its unreasonableness plain. Because Edwards was begging to surrender, and because Officer Shanley could safely give effect to that surrender, the further infliction of pain was gratuitous and sadistic. This the Constitution does not tolerate. . . . Quite simply, after we held in Priester that it was unconstitutional to subject a compliant suspect to the 'eternity' of two minutes of dog attack, . . . it is plain that it is also unconstitutional to subject a similarly compliant suspect to a longer attack of five to seven minutes, especially where that suspect is pleading for surrender. Indeed, this case is in many regards easier than Priester, because while the same factors weigh against the need for extraordinary force—'[t]here was no confusion. Plaintiff did not pose a threat of bodily harm to the officers or to anyone else. And, he was not attempting to flee or to resist arrest.' Priester, 208 F.3d at 927—Officer Shanley used greater force than did the officers arresting Priester. The record thus presents 'a concrete factual context so as to make it obvious to a reasonable government actor that his actions violate federal law.'. . As a result, Officer Shanley cannot claim qualified immunity on the grounds that he did not know he was violating Edwards's constitutional rights. In sum, we hold that clearly established federal law prohibits the police from subjecting a compliant subject who is attempting to surrender to a lengthy dog attack.")

Fils v. City of Aventura, 647 F.3d 1272, 1290-92 (11th Cir. 2011) ("[T]he facts we must accept show that Maurice was not violent. He did not disobey orders. He did not resist arrest. And he posed no risk to the Defendants or anyone else at the club. Therefore, Bergert's and Williams's tasing violated Maurice's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Our circuit uses two methods to determine whether a reasonable officer would know that his conduct is unconstitutional. The first method looks at the relevant case law at the time of the violation. . . . The second method looks not at case law, but at the officer's conduct, and inquires whether that conduct 'lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to [the officer], notwithstanding the lack of fact-specific case law.'. . .Under either method, Bergert and Williams should have known that their conduct violated Maurice's Fourth Amendment rights. Maurice was tased even though he committed at most a minor offense; he did not resist arrest; he did not threaten anyone; and he did not disobey any instructions (for none were given). These facts are sufficiently similar to the facts of Priester and Vinyard that these Defendants were on notice that their conduct violated Maurice's rights. . . . .While these cases are not identical to Maurice's case, they need not be 'materially similar'; the precedent need only provide the Defendants with 'fair warning.'. .These cases do just that. Even if these cases did not exist, the Defendants' conduct would fall under the narrow 'obvious clarity' exception described above. The facts as we must accept them show that Maurice showed no hostility to the Defendants, did not disobey any orders, and did not make any menacing gestures. Assuming these facts, no reasonable officer could ever believe that it was appropriate to shoot his taser probes into Maurice and shock him. This line is not hazy, and Bergert's and Williams's actions were clearly wrong.")

Sanders v. City of Dothan, 409 F. App'x 285, 290 (11th Cir. 2011) ("Plaintiff argues that because Sanders was handcuffed and in the back of the police car, Eggleston violated a clearly established constitutional right by tasering him. However, none of the ways of defeating qualified immunity apply here. There is no case law with facts indistinguishable from the present case clearly establishing a constitutional right not to be tasered in these circumstances. Plaintiff does not dispute that Eggleston tasered Sanders in furtherance of the legitimate law-enforcement activity of searching for contraband in Sanders' mouth to prevent him from possibly destroying it by swallowing the contraband. It is not clearly established that a police officer is prohibited from momentarily tasering an uncooperative handcuffed arrestee who–after multiple warnings–refuses to comply with that justifiable law-enforcement objective. This law-enforcement conduct is not so clearly in violation of constitutional rights that qualified immunity can be denied without a decision on point. Because the right that Plaintiff alleged that Eggleston violated is not clearly established, Eggleston is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim of excessive force.")

Jean-Baptiste v. Gutierrez, 627 F.3d 816, 822 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Officer Gutierrez reasonably responded with deadly force, and he was not required to interrupt a volley of bullets until he knew that Jean-Baptiste had been disarmed. Officer Gutierrez faced more than a possibility of harm. Officer Gutierrez was confronted by a suspect of a dangerous crime who was lying in wait and holding a gun. Until Officer Gutierrez verified that Jean-Baptiste was disarmed, Officer Gutierrez had 'no reason to trust that [Jean-Baptiste] would not suddenly attempt to do him harm.'. .The district court found that Officer Gutierrez acted 'maliciously and sadistically,' but any 'subjective beliefs regarding the circumstances [were] irrelevant to the qualified immunity inquiry.'. . The decision about qualified immunity turns on the objective reasonableness of the use of force. . . . The district court erred in denying Officer Gutierrez's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. There is no dispute that Officer Gutierrez acted within his discretionary authority when he used deadly force to secure Jean-Baptiste, and Jean-Baptiste failed to prove that Officer Gutierrez was not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Brown v. City of Huntsville, Ala., 608 F.3d 724, 739, 740 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Given the facts in the light most favorable to Brown, the district court improperly granted summary judgment to Defendant Norris on Brown's excessive force claim. Under Brown's version, Norris's actions in effecting the arrest constitute excessive force. Each Graham factor supports Brown. First, Brown was not arrested for a serious crime. Second, Brown did not pose a threat to anyone's safety. Third, under Brown's account of the facts, she was cooperative, was not resisting arrest, and was not attempting to flee. She complied with Defendant Norris's requests and attempted to get out of the vehicle but was delayed by the door locks, which she clearly communicated to Norris. Brown then had actually opened the door and was getting out when Norris pushed her back in the car and sprayed her. Norris's subjective beliefs are not relevant. What we consider instead is what an objectively reasonable officer in Norris's situation would have believed, taking as true Brown's testimony. Given that Brown had submitted to Norris's authority, was getting out of the car to be arrested, and posed no threat, Norris's conduct in pushing her back into the car, gratuitously using pepper spray, and then slamming her to the pavement, was excessive force that violated Brown's constitutional rights. . . Furthermore, an objectively reasonable police officer would have known it was unlawful to use pepper spray and other force against an arrestee who was suspected only of a minor offense (playing music too loud), was not threatening the officer or the public, was not attempting to flee, and who had communicated her willingness to be arrested. Although the law permits some use of force in any arrest for even minor offenses, the law was clearly established in 2005 that Defendant Norris's combined gratuitous use of pepper spray and other force against Brown in this minor offense context violated the Constitution.").

Powell v. Haddock, No. 09-14944, 2010 WL 476706, at *1, *2 (11th Cir. Feb. 12, 2010) (not published) ("Under the facts portrayed by Powell, there was no arguable probable cause to arrest her, and certainly no justification for deploying a taser. Deputy Rackard argues that he had arguable probable cause to arrest Powell for resisting an officer without violence once she failed to follow his instructions, but there was no instruction given that Powell failed to obey and her words alone did not rise to the level of resisting an officer. . . As to Deputy Rackard's use of his taser, Powell had simply taken steps away from Deputy Stone before Deputy Rackard deployed his taser the first time, and Powell was on the ground and unable to resist when Deputy Rackard tasered her a second time. There was no evidence that Powell's 'behavior was violent, aggressive, and prolonged' or that she was a 'danger to herself and others.' Mann v. Taser Intern, Inc., 588 F.3d 1291, 1306 (11th Cir.2009) (holding that use of a taser constituted reasonable force when methamphetamine user's behavior was violent and extended). Rather, it was clearly established, at the time of Powell's arrest, that such force cannot constitutionally be used against a non-threatening suspect when the alleged crime of the suspect is a minor offense. [citing Vinyard v. Wilson] For these reasons, the district court's denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity is AFFIRMED.").

Sanchez v. Hialeah Police Dept., No. 09-11821, 2009 WL 4829872, at *4 (11th Cir. Dec. 16, 2009) (not published) ("In sum, a jury could reasonably conclude that Officer Del Nodal's use of the ASP constituted excessive force under the circumstances alleged by Sanchez, because he was arrested for a minor, non-violent crime, he did not pose a serious threat to anyone's safety, he did not attempt to escape, he was no longer resisting at the time he was beaten, he was not given an opportunity to comply with the officers' instructions to get on the ground, and he suffered serious head injuries. Accordingly, the district court correctly determined that Officer Del Nodal violated Sanchez's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. We further conclude that Officer Del Nodal's alleged use of excessive force violated a clearly established right at the time of the incident in June 2003. [citing cases] [O]ur case law clearly established before June 2003 that, under the circumstances alleged by Sanchez, Officer Del Nodal's conduct constituted excessive force. For this reason, the district court correctly declined to grant Officer Del Nodal qualified immunity, and we therefore need not determine whether Officer Del Nodal's 'conduct [was] so egregious that a constitutional right was clearly violated, even in the total absence of case law.'. . We likewise conclude that Officer Garrido is not entitled to qualified immunity from Sanchez's claim that Officer Garrido, despite being in clear view and restrainable range, failed to intervene and stop Officer Del Nodal's use of excessive force. . . . According to Sanchez, Officer Garrido was in close proximity to Officer Del Nodal on the same side of the car when Officer Del Nodal began beating Sanchez with the ASP. Thus, under the facts alleged by Sanchez, Officer Garrido could be held liable for failing to intervene and stop Officer Del Nodal's use of excessive force. Moreover, an officer's duty to intervene in this regard was clearly established in this Circuit well before June 2003.").

Oliver v. Fiorino, 586 F.3d 898, 907, 908 (11th Cir. 2009) ("Quite simply, though the initial use of force (a single Taser shock) may have been justified, the repeated tasering of Oliver into and beyond his complete physical capitulation was grossly disproportionate to any threat posed and unreasonable under the circumstances. On this summary judgment record, Oliver has established a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . .No decision from the United States Supreme Court, or from this Court, or from the Florida Supreme Court, has clearly established that an officer's repeated use of a Taser constituted excessive force under circumstances like these. Indeed, neither the United States Supreme Court nor the Florida Supreme Court has even addressed the use of Tasers in an excessive force inquiry, and this Court has only squarely done so in one published decision, Draper v. Reynolds, 369 F.3d at 1270, which, as we have said, is not directly on all fours with this case. The question then boils down to this: whether it would be clear to every reasonable officer, even in the absence of case law, that the force used-repeatedly tasering Oliver over a two-minute period without warning-was excessive under the circumstances. We agree with the district court's determination that the force employed was so utterly disproportionate to the level of force reasonably necessary that any reasonable officer would have recognized that his actions were unlawful. The need for force was exceedingly limited. Again, Oliver was not accused of or suspected of any crime, let alone a violent one; he did not act belligerently or aggressively; he complied with most of the officers' directions; and he made no effort to flee. Tasering the plaintiff at least eight and as many as eleven or twelve times over a two-minute span without attempting to arrest or otherwise subdue the plaintiff-including tasering Oliver while he was writhing in pain on the hot pavement and after he had gone limp and immobilized-was so plainly unnecessary and disproportionate that no reasonable officer could have thought that this amount of force was legal under the circumstances. When measured against these facts, the officers violated a clearly established right.").

Howell v. Sheriff of Palm Beach County, No. 09-10940, 2009 WL 3296681, at *5, *6 (11th Cir. Oct. 15, 2009) ("Courts have consistently concluded that using pepper spray is excessive force in cases where the crime is a minor infraction, the arrestee surrenders, is secured, and is not acting violently, and there is no threat to the officers or anyone else. Courts have consistently concluded that using pepper spray is reasonable, however, where the plaintiff was either resisting arrest or refusing police requests, such as requests to enter a patrol car or go to the hospital. Furthermore, as a means of imposing force, pepper spray is generally of limited intrusiveness, and it is designed to disable a suspect without causing permanent physical injury. Indeed, pepper spray is a very reasonable alternative to escalating a physical struggle with an arrestee. . . . In the present case, the crime involved was a minor infraction–violation of a noise ordinance. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, Howell responded to Dougan's confrontational tone with an equally brash one, but he was not acting in a physically aggressive manner. No one contends that Howell displayed a weapon at that point, touched Dougan, or even made a move toward him. The fact that Dougan allowed Howell to be taken into the house after spraying him with pepper spray does suggest that Dougan was not attempting to subdue Howell, to stop him from resisting arrest, or to prevent him from fleeing. Dougan told Howell to turn the music down but did not require Howell to physically submit to police authority or even request that he do so. Under the circumstances, Vinyard provided 'materially similar facts or facts that gave a reasonable police officer in [Deputy Dougan's] situation fair and clear warning that the conduct here, especially the use of pepper spray, violated the Constitution.' . . Although the use of pepper spray is often 'a very reasonable alternative to escalating a physical struggle with an arrestee,'. . . the district court did not err in concluding that there was a genuine issue of material fact about whether that use of force was excessive under the particular facts the plaintiffs alleged in this case. Therefore, at this point in the proceedings, Dougan is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Whittier v. Kobayashi, 581 F.3d 1304, 1308, 1309 (11th Cir. 2009)("In the context of qualified immunity, this Court has stated 'the issue is not whether reasonable suspicion existed in fact, but whether the officer had Aarguable" reasonable suspicion.'. . In other words, we analyze whether a reasonable officer could have had reasonable suspicion that exigent circumstances, such as a threat of violence and/or destruction of evidence, existed to justify the no-knock entry. . . .In this case, we conclude Kobayashi is entitled to qualified immunity because a reasonable officer could have had reasonable suspicion that knocking and announcing his presence would have been dangerous under the circumstances facing the SWAT team. . .Those circumstances included serving a search warrant on the home of a suspected drug dealer (Diotaiuto), who had ready access to firearms and occupied the premises when the SWAT team arrived to serve the warrant. . . . The fact that the operational plan called for a knock and announce prior to entry does not alter our analysis. Even assuming the operational plan, which was prepared prior to the service of the warrant, speaks for what Kobayashi actually believed as he stood outside the Whittier/Diotaiuto residence, Kobayashi's subjective beliefs regarding the circumstances are irrelevant to the qualified immunity inquiry.").

Estate of Garczynski v. Bradshaw, 573 F.3d 1158, 1169, 1171 (11th Cir. 2009) ("In contrast to Montoute, Garczynski had not yet fired his gun and was not attempting to escape. As in Montoute, however, the officers did not have control over Garczynski and there was nothing to prevent him from shooting at the officers in an instant. . .The officers could reasonably believe that the weapon was loaded, as it actually was, given Garczynski's expressed intent to commit suicide. As in Montoute, Garczynski repeatedly disobeyed the officers' orders, first to show his hands and then to drop his gun. These factors, even assuming that Garczynski never pointed the gun at the officers, provided a sufficient basis for the officers reasonably to believe that Garczynski posed an immediate risk of serious harm to them. . . . The officers' use of force in dealing with an armed and potentially suicidal individual was objectively reasonable in this case. Finding no constitutional violation, we agree with the district court that the individual officers were entitled

Crenshaw v. Lister, 556 F.3d 1283, 1291-93 (11th Cir. 2009) ("Before analyzing the threshold issue of whether Lister violated Crenshaw's constitutional right to be free from excessive force, it is first necessary to determine the operative facts surrounding the canine incident. . . . Under Crenshaw's version of the incident, as determined above, Crenshaw has not shown that Lister violated his constitutional right to be free from excessive force. This is so because, under the circumstances, it was objectively reasonable for Lister to use a canine to locate and apprehend Crenshaw. Crenshaw was suspected of having committed one, and perhaps two, armed robberies, which can be characterized as a serious crime. He actively fled from the police–first in his vehicle, and then by foot after crashing his vehicle into a marked patrol car–and attempted to hide in a densely wooded area. And because Crenshaw was suspected of armed robbery and was a fugitive from the police, Lister had every reason to believe that Crenshaw was armed and dangerous. Thus, all three factors identified by the Supreme Court in Graham weigh heavily against Crenshaw. . . . While it would have been objectively unreasonable for Lister to allow the canine to continue attacking Crenshaw after he was secured, . . . Crenshaw does not allege that this occurred. Thus, under Crenshaw's version of the facts, there is no indication that Lister's use of the canine involved greater force than necessary or was in any way 'malicious' or 'sadistic.'").

Lloyd v. Van Tassell, 2009 WL 179622, at *3 (11th Cir. Jan. 27, 2009) ("The aforementioned evidence was material to the extent it supports a finding of excessive force. Although Lloyd's arrest involved a serious crime and a potentially dangerous situation for the deputies, Lloyd presented evidence that the application of force was objectively unreasonable because it came after he already was subdued and handcuffed, and he did not resist. Accordingly, we conclude that the district court erred in granting summary judgment to Card on the merits of this claim. In addition, we conclude that the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to Card on this claim. Although Card's alleged action involved a discretionary function because making an arrest is part of a deputy's duties, it would amount to a constitutional violation because it tended to establish an objectively unreasonable amount of force, as discussed above. In addition, the alleged circumstances surrounding the use of force and our prior case-law make clear that this alleged use of force violated Lloyd's clearly established rights. Thus, the district court erred in finding that Card was entitled to qualified immunity and summary judgment on Lloyd's excessive force claim.")

Galvez v. Bruce, 552 F.3d 1238, 1244, 1245 (11th Cir. 2008) ("Galvez does not contend that any federal statute or constitutional provision is specific enough to clearly establish that Bruce's conduct was unlawful. Thus, Galvez must demonstrate that caselaw existing at the time of Bruce's actions either establishes a broad, applicable principle of law or has materially similar facts such that it would put Bruce on notice that his actions were unlawful. Galvez argues that Slicker v. Jackson, 215 F.3d 1225 (11th Cir.2000), and Lee v. Ferraro, 284 F.3d 1188 (11th Cir.2002), are materially similar cases to his and that these cases establish and apply the principle that fully secured arrestees cannot be subjected to force like that inflicted on him by Bruce. . . . As discussed above, under Galvez's version of the facts, he was a fully-secured, cooperative, misdemeanor arrestee at the time Bruce slammed him into the wall. . . .Under these circumstances, we agree with Galvez that our decisions in Slicker and Lee should have put Bruce on notice that he would be violating Galvez's constitutional rights by repeatedly slamming Galvez's body into the corner of a concrete wall with force sufficient to break his ribs and cause a leaking aneurysm. The lesson of Slicker and Lee is that qualified immunity is not available to officers who subject arrestees to significant force after 'the arrest ha[s] been fully effected, the arrestee completely secured, and all danger vitiated.'. . . Under Galvez's version of the facts, Bruce should have considered his use of force similar to that in Slicker and Lee. Given the state of the law in 2004, it should have been clear to Bruce that repeatedly slamming a fully secured and compliant Galvez against the corner of a concrete wall, with force sufficient to break Galvez's ribs and cause a leaking aneurysm, was unlawful.").

Shepard v. Davis, 300 F. App'x 832, 841, 842 (11th Cir. 2008) ("[O]n August 5, 2002, the preexisting case law from the Supreme Court, this circuit, and the Supreme Court of Florida clearly established that (1) in the absence of consent or exigent circumstances, a warrantless arrest made within a suspect's home is unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment; and (2) a person does not consent to being pushed back into his home and arrested in his living room by merely opening the front door in response to a knock and announcement by law enforcement officers, especially when that person immediately asks if the officers have a warrant. Applying this clearly-established law to the facts of this case, a reasonable officer would have had 'fair and clear warning' that he could not go to a suspect's home, knock on his front door, wait for him to answer, and without hearing anything else besides, 'May I help you ... I am Dwayne Shepard,' or 'Do you have a warrant,' grab the suspect's arm, push him six feet into his living room, and arrest him on his couch, all without a warrant of any kind. At this juncture, there is nothing in Shepard's amended complaint that places him in the threshold or inside the doorway. Simply put, Shepard's arrest was not a 'threshold' arrest. Accordingly, because Officer Budnick violated Shepard's clearly-established Fourth Amendment rights by arresting Shepard in his home without a warrant, consent, or exigent circumstances, we find that he is not entitled to qualified immunity on Shepard's unlawful arrest claim. . . . This case is entirely different from McClish. According to Shepard, he was arrested six feet inside of his house. McClish, on the other hand, was pulled outside of his house, where he then was arrested. . . As the aforementioned cases make clear, and McClish reaffirmed, at the time of Shepard's arrest, the law was clearly established that a warrantless arrest could not be made within the home absent consent or exigent circumstances. Officer Budnick had fair warning that his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment, and he therefore is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Buckley v. Haddock, 292 F. App'x 791, 798, 799 (11th Cir. 2008) ("Plaintiff resisted arrest. Given this circumstance in the context of all the other facts, Deputy Rackard's gradual use of force, culminating with his repeated (but limited) use of a taser, to move Plaintiff to the patrol car was not unconstitutionally excessive. In addition, even if Plaintiff could establish that some of the deputy's use of force violated the Fourth Amendment, the deputy still would be entitled to qualified immunity because the applicable law at the time did not clearly establish that the deputy's conduct–given the circumstances–was unconstitutional.").

Buckley v. Haddock, 292 F. App'x 791, 799-806 (11th Cir. 2008) (Martin, J. dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent from the judgment in this case. I write to express my view that the Fourth Amendment forbids an officer from discharging repeated bursts of electricity into an already handcuffed misdemeanant–who is sitting still beside a rural road and unwilling to move–simply to goad him into standing up. I also conclude that at the time of the incident, Deputy Rackard was on fair notice that his conduct was unconstitutional. Not only did Deputy Rackard unnecessarily discharge his taser gun against Mr. Buckley three times, but each time he did so, he repeatedly prodded Mr. Buckley's body with the stun gun's live electrodes–inflicting additional pain and leaving Mr. Buckley with sixteen burn scars. Because our law clearly establishes such conduct as unconstitutional, I would affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity and allow this action to proceed. . . . This is not a case about whether an officer may use a taser gun to subdue an unruly or dangerous individual. . . . Rather, the question in the case is whether a taser gun may be used repeatedly against a peaceful individual as a pain-compliance device–that is, as an electric prod–to force him to comply with an order to move. . . . Like the district court below, I conclude that the repeated and sustained use of the taser gun for the sole purpose of coercing Mr. Buckley to move was unreasonable under the circumstances and thus violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Although the Eleventh Circuit has not spoken in terms of 'pain compliance,' at the very least, the Fourth Amendment prohibits the infliction of gratuitous pain and injury as a means to coerce compliance. . . . I would also find, under the second prong of Saucier, that the law was clearly established at the time of the incident that Deputy Rackard's conduct was unconstitutional. Whatever the debatability of employing a single, controlled electric shock against a non-compliant individual to coerce him into movement, in this case Deputy Rackard repeatedly prodded Mr. Buckley's body which maximized the level of pain he experienced. In light of the repeated and continuous nature of the force used against Mr. Buckley, the substantial pain and bodily injury that resulted, and the absence of any arguable justification, I have no difficulty in concluding that no particularized preexisting case law was necessary for it to be clearly established that Deputy Rackard's conduct was unconstitutional. Deputy Rackard's use of force was so grossly disproportionate to the need for force that no reasonable officer would have believed such conduct was legal.").

Chaney v. City of Orlando, 291 F. App'x 238, 243, 244 (11th Cir. 2008) ("In a claim of excessive force, there are two ways to show that the law clearly established that the particular amount of force used was excessive. . . The first of those ways is to show that, in a materially similar factual situation, the law has held that the officer's conduct was unlawful. . . Where the case law is not materially similar, we look to the second way and consider whether other case law has provided sufficient notice to 'every' reasonable officer that such force is unlawful. . . .Chaney is unable to show that Cute's conduct violated any clearly established right. There was no evidence at trial indicating that Cute's conduct of physically grabbing Chaney, pulling him out of his car, throwing him to the pavement, handcuffing him, using his Taser on Chaney's back, or putting his foot on Chaney's head was so obviously wrong that he would have known that it was unlawful and Chaney has cited no case law that would have provided Cute with such notice. There was no Eleventh Circuit case law at the time of the incident which would have provided Cute with notice that use of a Taser constituted unreasonable or excessive force, . . . or notice that the use of force was unlawful to prevent Chaney from communicating with what Cute perceived to be a hostile crowd. . . . . The facts in this case also foreclose it from the narrow exception to qualified immunity available if the plaintiff can show that the officer's conduct was so outrageous as to be unconstitutional 'even without caselaw on point.'. . Trial testimony clearly indicated that, as an officer of the Orlando Police Department, Cute was allowed, in the face of passive resistance, to use a Taser and, in the face of active resistance, higher levels of force to gain compliance from a suspect. . . Based on the lack of sufficient evidence supporting the jury verdict regarding excessive force, and the sufficient evidence supporting Cute's entitlement to qualified immunity, the district court correctly granted Cute judgment as a matter of law on the use of force claim.").

Sharp v. Fisher, 532 F.3d 1180, 1184 (11th Cir. 2008) ("Applying Scott to the facts of this case, we conclude that Fisher's conduct in attempting the PIT maneuver to the Sharp vehicle was reasonable. When Fisher acted, he knew Sharp was fleeing from law enforcement officials, she was traveling at a high rate of speed, law enforcement officials had chased her at least 20 miles, the high speed chase had crossed state lines, numerous law enforcement officials from multiple jurisdictions had been involved in the chase, she had failed to respond to blue lights and sirens and had given no indication of stopping the pursuit or slowing down, there were several civilian vehicles on the Interstate during the pursuit, and she was driving erratically. It was Katie Sharp who intentionally placed herself, her passenger, and the public in danger by engaging in the high speed chase and fleeing from the officers which ultimately produced the choice between two evils that Fisher confronted. . . We conclude that the car chase Katie Sharp initiated posed a substantial and immediate risk of serious physical injury to others; no reasonable jury could conclude otherwise. Fisher's attempt to terminate the chase through the use of the PIT maneuver was objectively reasonable. Therefore, no Fourth Amendment violation occurred, and Fisher is entitled to summary judgment.").

Moretta v. Abbott, No. 07-10795, 2008 WL 2229757, at *1-*2 (11th Cir. June 2, 2008) ("The complaint filed on behalf of Allen, a minor, alleged that the two officers shot Allen with a taser gun causing 50,000 volts of electricity to enter the body of Allen, a 6-year old, 53-pound child. Allen convulsed violently and vomited as his body was shocked with the 50,000 volts. The officers handcuffed Allen as he vomited. The complaint also alleged that the tasering caused severe, significant and permanent injury to Allen, including extreme mental and physical suffering and loss of bodily function, and has resulted in large doctors and hospital bills. . . . [T]he district court concluded that the reasonable inferences from the complaint were that: '[F]rom the moment the police officers arrived on the scene, through the time the officers deployed a taser into Allen's body and handcuffed him, Allen posed no threat to anyone's safety, including himself.'. . On these alleged facts and in this Rule 12(b)(6) posture, we agree with the district court that plaintiffs have alleged excessive force that violated the constitutional rights of Allen, . . . and we agree with the district court that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity because their conduct violated the clearly established rights of Allen. Even in the absence of factually similar case law, an officer can have fair warning that his conduct is unconstitutional when the constitutional violation is obvious, sometimes referred to as 'obvious clarity' cases. . . We conclude that, at the time of this incident in August of 2003, every reasonable officer would have known that the taser force used under these circumstances was unlawful. The conduct at issue here lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits, that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to an official in the shoes of these officers.").

Reese v. Herbert, 527 F.3d 1253, 1274 (11th Cir. 2008) ("It is beyond question that the law was 'clearly established' so as to give the defendants fair warning that their actions in such circumstances violated Reese's Fourth Amendment rights. No particularized, preexisting case law was needed to inform them that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity where his conduct goes 'so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that [he knows that he is] violating the Constitution.' . . Reese's version of the facts demonstrates a beating that 'falls within "the core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits": a severe beating of a restrained, non-resisting suspect.'. . Accordingly, defendants are not entitled to summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity.").

Hadley v. Gutierrez, 526 F.3d 1324, 1333, 1334 (11th Cir. 2008) ("We hold that a handcuffed, non-resisting defendant's right to be free from excessive force was clearly established in February 2002. In Lee, 284 F.3d 1188, we concluded that slamming a non-resisting criminal suspect's head onto hood of a car constituted excessive force. Along those same lines, we proclaimed in Skrtich, 280 F.3d at 1303, that '[b]y 1998, our precedent clearly established that government officials may not use gratuitous force against a prisoner who has been already subdued....' Applying 'the excessive force standard would inevitably lead every reasonable officer ... to conclude that the force' used here–punching a non-resisting criminal suspect for no apparent reason other than malice–is not protected by our constitution.").

Nicarry v. Cannaday, 260 F. App'x 166, 170 (11th Cir. 2007) ("The evidence, even viewed in the light most favorable to Nicarry, shows that Cannaday's use of force was objectively reasonable because Cannaday had probable cause to believe that Nicarry posed a threat of serious physical harm to Cannaday and his fellow officers on the scene. Nicarry led police on a night-time motor vehicle pursuit and then a foot chase through a quiet residential neighborhood. During the chase, Nicarry refused to pull over and had fled from officers, first in his van and then on foot. Cannaday and the other officers found Nicarry hiding in a dark shed in the backyard of a residence. As the officers arrived, they formed a rough semi-circle between ten and fifteen feet from the shed door. Nicarry was commanded to come out of the shed, but did not do so. Within seconds of being commanded a second time to come out of the shed, Nicarry, a very large man, charged from the shed at full speed while holding a screwdriver and ran in the general direction of at least some of the officers. Nicarry admitted not only that he was running full speed, but that he leapt off a lawnmower as he charged out. Although Cannaday had his gun drawn, he did not fire until he saw the metal object in Nicarry's hand and heard someone call out a warning about a screwdriver. We stress that, even under Nicarry's version of events, the entire episode after the second command lasted only a few seconds and only a few feet separated Nicarry and the officers who were trying to apprehend him. Given the split-second, rapidly escalating nature of the situation, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Cannaday's shoes could have perceived that Nicarry posed an immediate threat of serious physical harm to himself and his fellow officers. Specifically, it was reasonable, under the circumstances of Nicarry's earlier flight in his van and on foot and his refusal to come out of the shed when first ordered to do so, to believe that Nicarry intended to evade capture and flee and to use the screwdriver as a weapon against any of the officers clustered around the shed that got in his way.")

Long v. Slaton, 508 F.3d. 576, 584, 585 (11th Cir. 2007) ("To demonstrate that the law at the time clearly established that Defendants' conduct would violate the Constitution, Plaintiffs might point to either (1) earlier case law from the Supreme Court, this Court, or the highest court of the pertinent state that is materially similar to the current case and therefore provided clear notice of the violation or (2) general rules of law from a federal constitutional or statutory provision or earlier case law that applied with 'obvious clarity' to the circumstances, establishing clearly the unlawfulness of Defendants' conduct. . . And 'where the applicable legal standard is a highly general one, such as Areasonableness," preexisting case law that has applied general law to specific circumstances will almost always be necessary to draw a line that is capable of giving fair and clear notice that an official's conduct will violate federal law.' Thomas v. Roberts, 323 F.3d 950, 954 (11th Cir.2003). Plaintiffs have failed to cite controlling and materially similar case law that would establish that Deputy Slaton's use of deadly force was clearly unlawful. Plaintiffs cite Vaughan, 343 F.3d 1323, as a materially similar case. But it is factually too different. We do not read Vaughan as capable of putting every objectively reasonable officer on notice that deadly force could not be used in the circumstances presented in this case. In Vaughan, this Court concluded that an officer used unreasonable force when he, without warning, discharged his firearm at suspects fleeing in a stolen truck. . . The present case has, at least, three additional facts not present in Vaughan and that an objectively reasonable police officer could believe 'might make a difference' for whether the conduct in the present instance would violate federal law. . . In this case, unlike Vaughan, the fleeing driver was in an unstable frame of mind, had taken possession of a marked police cruiser, and had been warned that deadly force would be used if he did not leave the cruiser. Therefore, we believe that the situation in Vaughan is too different from this case to cause every objectively reasonable officer to know that the use of deadly force in the circumstances of this case must violate federal law. Plaintiffs also attempt to rely on Garner, 105 S.Ct. 1694, as having clearly established broad principles that cover the contours of this case with obvious clarity. As the Supreme Court recently pointed out, however, '[w]hatever Garner said about the factors that might have justified shooting the suspect in that case, such Apreconditions" have scant applicability to this case, which has vastly different facts.'. . [citing Scott v. Harris] . . . . Simply put, the Supreme Court's decision in Garner–which does not involve a fleeing motor vehicle–offered little insight on whether an officer, consistently with the Fourth Amendment, may use deadly force to stop a man who has stolen a police cruiser and has been given clear warnings about the use of deadly force. Garner does not apply to the circumstances of this case with obvious clarity.Nor does this case present otherwise an obvious violation of Long's rights under the Fourth Amendment. We do not believe that every objectively reasonable officer in Deputy Slaton's position must have known that firing his weapon at the police cruiser under these circumstances would be an unconstitutional application of force. Results in these kinds of cases– involving reasonableness and balancing–are extremely fact dependent; at worst, Deputy Slaton's acts fell within the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.' . . Therefore, because preexisting law did not provide fair warning that shooting at Long in this situation would violate federal law, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Long v. Slaton, 508 F.3d. 576, 586 (11th Cir. 2007) (Forrester, J., sitting by designation, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I respectfully dissent from the opinion of the majority in the action against Deputy Slaton. To the recitation of the facts by the majority, I would add that Deputy Slaton had dealt with the deceased before without any major problem and that the shooting occurred in a fairly rural area several miles from Florence, Alabama. As I understand the law, the use of deadly force is reasonable only where there is a serious threat of imminent or immediate physical harm to the officer or others. . . I can find no arguable probable cause for such a belief in this case. To be sure, with the deceased in possession of a patrol car, the outcome of these events is uncertain, but the possibility that a nonviolent fleeing felon will later pose a threat of physical harm to others is remote and highly speculative. I do not believe that this officer is entitled to qualified immunity either. Vaughan provides notice that seizing a fleeing felon in a vehicle by shooting him is unreasonable. Although there are differences between that case and this, Vaughan is not 'fairly distinguishable.'. . In Vaughan, the truck was northbound on I-85 between Newnan and Atlanta traveling at speeds exceeding eighty miles per hour. At one point it rammed a police vehicle which was attempting a rolling roadblock. These facts present circumstances more fraught with immediate threat than those in the instant case, and this court determined that a jury could find that the officers in Vaughan violated the suspect's Fourth Amendment rights and were not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Dukes v. Miami-Dade County, 232 F. App'x 907, 2007 WL 1373176, at *4 & n.8 (11th Cir. May 10, 2007) ("Here, the pleadings sufficiently alleged a constitutional violation that is clearly established. . . . The recent Supreme Court case Scott v. Harris does not undermine our conclusion. . . . As noted above, the Plaintiffs' Original Complaint alleged that Defendant Goldberg shot Dukes after Dukes began to drive away from the blockade. In the Amended Complaint, the Plaintiffs alleged that Defendant Goldberg shot Dukes before the Plaintiffs' car began to move after being boxed in. Although the Original Complaint alleges facts that are more likely to justify the use of deadly force than the Amended Complaint, the differences in allegations do not effect [sic] the outcome of our analysis here.").

Walker v. City of Riviera Beach, 212 F. App'x 835, 2006 WL 3772005, at *2 (11th Cir. Dec. 22, 2006) ("The district court ruled that summary judgment could not be granted in favor of Officer Patterson on the basis of qualified immunity because 'genuine issues of material fact' existed as to whether Officer Patterson's conduct was unconstitutional. This application of the summary judgment standard was mistaken because–in resolving qualified immunity issues–a 'material issue of fact' never exists. 'When conducting a qualified immunity analysis, district courts must take the facts in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury.' Robinson v. Arrugueta, 415 F.3d 1252, 1257 (11th Cir.2005). Consideration of the record in this light eliminates all issues of fact.").

Walker v. City of Riviera Beach, 212 F. App'x 835, 2006 WL 3772005, at *3 (11th Cir. Dec. 22, 2006) ("We have no 'controlling and materially similar case' declaring Officer Patterson's strike to Walker's head with the gun unconstitutional. But we accept that Officer Patterson's supposed conduct is obviously unconstitutional, notwithstanding the lack of precedent. Officer Patterson first pursued Walker for speeding, and Walker did not immediately pull over when Officer Patterson flashed his lights and shouted for Walker to yield. Walker eventually pulled into a parking lot, and Officer Patterson approached the vehicle on foot with gun drawn. Walker turned off the car and did not resist arrest or attempt to flee again. Nevertheless, Officer Patterson unnecessarily 'slammed' his pistol into Walker's head. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Walker, 'no particularized preexisting case law was necessary for it to be clearly established that what [Officer Patterson] did violated [Walker's] constitutional right to be free from the excessive use of force.'. . Such an unwarranted pistol whip lies at the core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits.").

Gray ex rel Alexander v. Bostic, 458 F.3d 1295, 1306, 1307 (11th Cir. 2006) ("Gray does not cite and we cannot locate a case addressing before today when it may be reasonable to use handcuffs in an investigatory stop absent a safety rationale. Thus, no factually similar pre-existing case law put Deputy Bostic on notice that his use of handcuffs to discipline Gray was objectively unreasonable for Fourth Amendment purposes. However, our inquiry does not end here. Even in the absence of factually similar case law, an official can have fair warning that his conduct is unconstitutional when the constitutional violation is obvious, sometimes referred to as 'obvious clarity' cases. . . . We. . . conclude that Deputy Bostic's conduct in handcuffing Gray, a compliant, nine-year-old girl for the sole purpose of punishing her was an obvious violation of Gray's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Every reasonable officer would have known that handcuffing a compliant nine-year-old child for purely punitive purposes is unreasonable. We emphasize that the Court is not saying that the use of handcuffs during an investigatory stop of a nine-year-old child is always unreasonable, but just unreasonable under the particular facts of this case.").

Baltimore v. City of Albany, Georgia, No. 02-00125 CV-WLS-1-1, 2006 WL 1582044, at 5-7 (11th Cir. June 9, 2006) (not published) ("The Supreme Court reasoned in Brosseau that if an officer has probable cause to believe that a suspect 'poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others, it is not constitutionally unreasonable to prevent escape by using deadly force,' and therefore the officer is immune from suit for using deadly force. . . . Notably, there is a dearth of case law in this circuit to support the proposition that the use of a flashlight to strike an arrestee over the head necessarily constitutes deadly force. . . . Nonetheless, in the cases that have specifically addressed the issue, there appears to be agreement that striking a suspect in the head with a heavy flashlight or other blunt instrument at least poses a 'substantial risk of serious bodily injury,' if not death. We adopt this conclusion and find that such action constitutes deadly force under our definition of that term.. . .Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Baltimore, we conclude that it was not objectively reasonable for Officer Long to strike Baltimore on the head with a heavy flashlight, apparently knocking him to the ground and causing a serious wound. . . . The next inquiry under Saucier is whether, at the moment Long acted, 'every objectively reasonable police officer would have realized the act[ ] violated already clearly established federal law.' . . . Although Garner and Graham are themselves too general to provide the 'clearly established law' that would have given Officer Long 'fair warning' that his conduct would violate Baltimore's constitutional rights, . . . we find that this case is 'obvious' enough for the standards set forth in Garner and Graham to provide the necessary 'particularized' guidance for reasonable officers. . . . Even under the chaotic circumstances of the moment, the fact remains that four officers were engaged in arresting Baltimore for violating a city ordinance. Although a hostile crowd tried to abort the arrest, there is no indication that Baltimore was going to escape the grasp of the officers. Reasonable officers in Long's situation would not have violently struck a misdemeanor suspect, who was being subdued by several officers, in the head with a blunt object to effectuate an arrest for violating the city's open container ordinance. This is a case where a 'general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law ... appl[ied] with obvious clarity' to Long's conduct, as use of force that could cause death or serious harm to effectuate a misdemeanor arrest was excessive under these circumstances.")

Troupe v. Sarasota County, 419 F.3d 1160, 1168, 1169 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Here, the SWAT Team surrounded the Oldsmobile, and Hart was disobeying their clear orders to put his hands up and surrender. The Oldsmobile suddenly moved forward and backward and the Officers had to make split-second decisions of whether they could escape before anyone suffered serious injury. In their briefing earlier, they were told that Hart was dangerous and had tried to escape from police before and would likely be carrying a weapon. Additionally, the three officers surrounding Hart's car, and a fourth in the yard all separately concluded that deadly force was needed and appropriate to stop Hart, but they did not shoot because they did not have a clear shot and were worried about a cross-fire situation. Bauer was directly in Hart's path as the Oldsmobile accelerated toward him. He had only 3-5 seconds to assess the situation before shooting. Even if in hindsight the facts show that the SWAT Team could have escaped unharmed, a reasonable officer could have perceived that Hart posed a threat of serious physical harm. In Brosseau . . . the Supreme Court held that it was objectively reasonable for Officer Brosseau to use deadly force against a suspect in an attempt to prevent the suspect's escape and potential harm to others. In Brosseau, like the present case, the Officer fired through the driver's side window and the bullet entered the driver's back. . . Here, Gooding and Bauer perceived that Hart was attempting to escape and could potentially endanger more lives and thus, Bauer shot through the driver's side window and hit Hart in the back. Because the Brosseau Court held that it is constitutionally reasonable for an officer to use deadly force when a suspect is threatening to escape and cause harm to others, and because of the similarities of these two cases, [footnote distinguishing Harris v. Coweta County, 406 F.3d 1307 (11th Cir.2005)] the district court did not err in finding that the officers' conduct did not violate a constitutional right and that Gooding and Bauer were entitled to qualified immunity. . . Finally, because our inquiry ends at the first step, we need not determine whether the law was clearly established at the time of the incident.").

Robinson v. Arrugueta, 415 F.3d 1252, 1256 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Here, Arrugueta was standing in a narrow space between the two vehicles, Walters was disobeying Arrugueta's orders to put his hands up, the Escort was suddenly moving forward and Arrugueta had to make a split-second decision of whether he could escape before he got crushed. At the most, Arrugueta had only 2.72 seconds to react to what he perceived as a threat of serious physical harm from Walters. . . . Even if in hindsight the facts show that Arrugueta perhaps could have escaped unharmed, we conclude that a reasonable officer could have perceived that Walters was using the Escort as a deadly weapon. Arrugueta had probable cause to believe that Walters posed a threat of serious physical harm. In the case of Brosseau v. Haugen, . . . the Supreme Court held that it was objectively reasonable for Officer Brosseau to use deadly force against a suspect in an attempt to prevent the suspect's escape and potential harm to others. Here, Arrugueta perceived that Walters was attempting to crush him and endanger his life. Because it is constitutionally reasonable for an officer to use deadly force when a suspect is threatening escape and possible harm to others, it is also constitutionally reasonable for an officer to use deadly force when he has probable cause to believe that his own life is in peril. . . Thus, we conclude that Arrugueta is entitled to qualified immunity under the first step of the Saucier analysis. . . . Even though our inquiry ends at the first step of the analysis, we note that the district court was correct in finding that, under the second step, the law was not clearly established, and thus, Arrugueta is entitled to qualified immunity under this step as well.").

Evans v. Stephens, 407 F.3d 1272, 1279-83 (11th Cir. 2005) (en banc) ("[T]his case provides no opportunity to decide the question of when jailers–for security and safety purposes–may lawfully conduct strip searches of persons about to become inmates in the general jail population. This case raises no questions about the necessities of jail administration. . . This case involves a different kind of search altogether: a post-arrest investigatory strip search by the police looking for evidence (and not weapons). Officer Stephens–who was not a jailer–testified (without contradiction from others) that he strip-searched Plaintiffs because he (as the arresting officer) believed them to be in possession of illegal drugs: the search was part of a criminal investigation looking for evidence. Never has the Supreme Court explicitly addressed the standard applied to determine if a post-arrest investigatory strip search (away from the complicated context of the nation's borders) violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . [W]e are confident that an officer must have at least a reasonable suspicion that the strip search is necessary for evidentiary reasons. . . Perhaps the actual standard is higher than reasonable suspicion, especially where, as here, the search includes touching genitalia and penetrating anuses. But because Officer Stephens–in the light of the supposed facts–did not meet even the minimum possible standard of reasonable suspicion, we need not decide if the actual standard is something even higher to decide whether Officer Stephens failed to comply with the Constitution. . . . We also conclude the manner in which Officer Stephens conducted the strip search violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. . . . [T]he totality of the circumstances–for example, the physical force, anal penetration, unsanitariness of the process, terrifying language, and lack of privacy–collectively establish a constitutional violation, especially when the search was being made in the absence of exigent circumstances requiring the kind of immediate action that might make otherwise questionable police conduct, at least arguably, reasonable. . . . A post-arrest investigatory strip search did not obviously violate the Fourth Amendment on its face in 1999. In addition, in 1999, no applicable cases provided a police officer with fair notice that he must have, at least, a reasonable suspicion to conduct a post-arrest investigatory strip search of an adult and with fair notice that the facts before Officer Stephens were insufficient to make his suspicion reasonable for the search. . . The law was not settled for what standard applied to post-arrest investigatory strip searches, and Supreme Court precedent was very deferential to post-arrest investigations. . . Justice v. Peachtree City, 961 F.2d 188, 192-93 (11th Cir.1992), could not squarely govern this case: it addressed a strip search of a juvenile arrested for minor offenses (loitering and truancy), and it acknowledged that unique concerns arise with strip searching youngsters. See generally, Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. __, 125 S.Ct. 596, 160 L.Ed.2d 583 (2004). And United States v. Boyce, 351 F.3d 1102, 1109 (11th Cir.2003), was decided four years after the incident in question. So, Officer Stephens is protected by qualified immunity insofar as the claim is one for conducting a strip search at all. Qualified immunity, however, does not shield Stephens from Plaintiffs' separate claim that the manner of the strip search violated their rights under the Fourth Amendment. No preexisting case law established this violation or made it obviously clear. Justice and Bell were the only applicable cases to address strip searches, and they could not squarely govern this case. Both were materially different from this case, and both upheld strip searches. But the text of the Fourth Amendment prohibits 'unreasonable' searches. Seldom does a general standard such as 'to act reasonably' put officers on notice that certain conduct will violate federal law given the precise circumstances before them: Fourth Amendment law is intensely fact specific. But we conclude the supposed facts of this case take the manner of the searches well beyond the 'hazy border' that sometimes separates lawful conduct from unlawful conduct. See generally, Priester v. City of Riviera Beach, 208 F.3d 919, 926 (11th Cir.2000). The violation was obvious. Every objectively reasonable officer would have known that, when conducting a strip search, it is unreasonable to do so in the manner demonstrated by the sum of the facts alleged by Plaintiffs. The totality of the facts alleged here made this violation–on the day of the search–clear from the terms of the Constitution itself: No objectively reasonable policeman could have believed that the degrading and forceful manner of this strip search (especially in the light of the complete lack of circumstances that might have called for immediate action to conduct a search without the time for cool and calm thought about how to proceed) was 'reasonable' in the constitutional sense.").

Evans v. Stephens, 407 F.3d 1272, 1296, 1297 (11th Cir. 2005) (en banc) (Barkett, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("[T]he law was clearly established through Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757, 86 S.Ct. 1826, 16 L.Ed.2d 908 (1966), and United States v. Himmelwright, 551 F.2d 991 (5th Cir.1977), that the initiation of a strip search without reasonable suspicion was unconstitutional. Thus, Stephens was not entitled to qualified immunity for either the initiation of the search or the manner in which it was conducted. . . . If, before 1999, the Fourth Amendment imposed a reasonable suspicion requirement on border strip searches, where authority to search is less constrained than it is in an ordinary domestic search incident to arrest, it is unquestionable that at least the same degree of suspicion was required to conduct the strip searches in this case. Schmerber and Himmelwright clearly established before 1999 that reasonable suspicion was required to conduct an investigatory strip search. Based on the facts of this case, no reasonable officer could have believed that a strip search was justified simply because the arrestees were nervous when stopped by the police and claimed to be lost.").

Mercado v. City of Orlando, 407 F.3d 1152, 1158-61 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Even though Padilla violated Mercado's constitutional rights, he could still be afforded qualified immunity provided that Mercado's rights were not clearly established at the time of the incident. Mercado can demonstrate that his right was clearly established in a number of ways. First, he can show that a materially similar case has already been decided, giving notice to the police. . .He could also show that a broader, clearly established principle should control the novel facts in this situation. . . . Finally, he could show that this case fits within the exception of conduct which so obviously violates that constitution that prior case law is unnecessary. . .To make this showing, Mercado must point to law as interpreted by the Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the Supreme Court of Florida. . . . Mercado, however, can point to no controlling case law from the Supreme Court or this Circuit dealing with the Sage Launcher. Although there are some cases dealing with 'less lethal' weapons, such as pepper spray, none of them is 'materially similar' to the facts in this case or 'truly compels' the conclusion that Mercado had a right established under federal law. . . If there is no case law directly on point, '[g]eneral statements of the law contained within the Constitution, statute, or caselaw may sometimes provide Afair warning" of unlawful conduct.' . . These principles may give notice to officers, provided that the decisions clearly apply to the situation at hand. The 'reasoning, though not the holding' of prior cases can also send 'the same message to reasonable officers' in novel factual situations. . . The general principle of law must be specific enough to give the officers notice of the clearly established right. Indeed, the principle that officers may not use excessive force to apprehend a suspect is too broad a concept to give officers notice of unacceptable conduct. . . Mercado, however, relies on the principle that deadly force cannot be employed in a situation that requires less-than-lethal force. . . Because the Fourth Amendment protects citizens from. 'unreasonable' seizures, the use of deadly force must be reasonable under the circumstances. . . Using deadly force in a situation that clearly would not justify its use is unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. Under Florida law, 'deadly force' means any 'force that is likely to cause death or great bodily harm,' but does not include 'the discharge of a firearm by a law enforcement officer or correctional officer during and within the scope of his or her official duties which is loaded with a Aless lethal munition."' . . . 'Less-lethal munition' is, in turn, defined as 'a projectile that is designed to stun, temporarily incapacitate, or cause temporary discomfort to a person without penetrating the person's body.'. . According to Orlando policies, the Sage Launcher is defined as a 'less lethal' munition; however, they also recognize that some uses of the weapon should only be employed in deadly force situations. Shooting a suspect in the head is specifically forbidden unless the situation requires deadly force. As noted above, for the purposes of summary judgment, we must assume that Padilla intended to shoot Mercado in the head based on Mercado's injuries and the proven accuracy of Padilla's weapon. Because shooting a subject in the head with a Sage Launcher employs force 'likely to cause death or great bodily harm,' this action can be considered 'deadly force.' Both Padilla and Rouse were aware that police policy forbade them from utilizing this magnitude of force under the facts at bar. Because this situation was clearly not a deadly force situation, and because the officers utilized deadly force to subdue Mercado, they violated the clearly established principle that deadly force cannot be used in non-deadly situations. Furthermore, this is one of the cases that lie 'so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of case law.' . . The facts in this case are also 'so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that [the official] had to know he was violating the Constitution even without caselaw on point.' . . We have repeatedly held that police officers cannot use force that is 'wholly unnecessary to any legitimate law enforcement purpose.' . . Officer Padilla should not have needed case law to know that by intentionally shooting Mercado in the head, he was violating Mercado's Fourth Amendment rights. When the officers entered the apartment, they found Mercado crying on the floor of his kitchen with a loose cord around his neck and a kitchen knife placed up to, but not poking into, his chest. From a distance of about six feet away, Padilla twice shouted for Mercado to drop his knife, and then discharged the Sage Launcher, hitting Mercado in the head from short range. Assuming that Padilla was aiming at Mercado's head intentionally, his use of force was clearly excessive.").

Purcell ex rel. Estate of Morgan v. Toombs County, 400 F.3d 1313, 1324 n.25 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Unlike Hope, the preexisting case law here varied enough from the material facts of this case that a reasonable jailer could believe that the factual differences could make the situation at this Jail lawful even when circumstances in the earlier cases were determined to be unlawful under federal law: the precedents do not 'squarely govern' the case here.[citing Brosseau]").

Mitchell v. City of Mobile, Alabama, No. CV 15-0360-CG-C, 2017 WL 1740364, at *15–16 (S.D. Ala. May 3, 2017) ("Plaintiff urges the Court to consider this event, which falls outside the moment deadly force was used, in its Fourth Amendment 'reasonableness' evaluation. . . The Court declines to consider this event for three reasons. First, Plaintiff's complaint limits her federal claim to Chandler's and Wilson's use of 'excessive, unreasonable, and unnecessary deadly force.'. . Because Wilson's actions prior to the use of deadly force are not made the basis of the constitutional claim, Plaintiff cannot rely on them now to rescue that claim. Second, § 1983 protects plaintiffs from constitutional violations, not state law violations or, as Plaintiff asserts, violations of departmental policies. . . . Moreover, a recent Supreme Court decision torpedoes Plaintiff's argument. The plaintiff in City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765 (2015), supported her Fourth Amendment claim with expert testimony that the defendant law enforcement officers 'fell short of their training by not using practices designed to minimize the risk of violence when dealing with the mentally ill.'. . The Supreme Court canvased the caselaw and concluded that 'the officers' failure to accommodate [the plaintiff's] illness [did not] violat[e] clearly established law.'. . The Court then rejected the plaintiff's reliance on her expert's opinion: 'Even if an officer acts contrary to her training, however, ... that does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted.'. . Therefore, it cannot be said that Wilson's choice in initially approaching Mitchell, assuming she violated proper municipal procedure, renders any future actions per se unreasonable. Third, assuming Wilson failed to follow the procedure in question, MO-2011-03, her actions constituting such failure occurred outside of the relevant timeframe upon which the Court makes its 'reasonableness' determination. . . .[O]fficers presented with the choice to use or not use force are faced with making a split-second decision. Whether that decision is reasonable should be based on the totality of circumstances in that moment. . . Thus, evaluating what Wilson may have done when she initially approached Mitchell deviates from this premise.")

Small v. Glynn Cnty., Ga., 77 F.Supp.3d 1271, 1275-81 (S.D. Ga. 2014) ("The United States Supreme Court recently re-emphasized that at the summary judgment stage, the judge's function is 'not to weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter but to determine whether there is a genuine issue for trial.'[citing Tolan] As the high Court stressed, 'Our qualified-immunity cases illustrate the importance of drawing inferences in favor of the nonmovant, even when, [as in Tolan], a court decides only the clearly-established prong of the standard.'. . With that recent pronouncement in mind, the Court has taken due care to credit contradicting evidence in favor of the Plaintiffs and draw evidentiary inferences in favor of the Plaintiffs as the nonmoving party. In order to view the facts from the perspective of the Plaintiffs' best case, as must be done at this stage, the following facts are taken from the evidence-supported portions of the Plaintiffs' own submissions, the video evidence of the incident, and the unrefuted facts submitted in connection with the summary judgment motions. To the extent any facts are in dispute, they are viewed in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs. Where competing inferences are possible, based on the evidence, the Court accepts the inference that favors the Plaintiffs. . . . [E]ven when reviewing any disputed issues of fact in favor of the Plaintiffs, Sasser and Smith did not violate Small's Fourth Amendment rights. Furthermore, the law at the time of the incident did not clearly establish and place the officers on notice that their actions would be unlawful. To the contrary, as discussed below, the Eleventh Circuit cases most factually similar to the present hold that no Fourth Amendment violation occurred. . . .Here, even viewing the Plaintiffs' facts at their best, the evidence shows that Sasser and Simpson had an objectively reasonable belief that Small posed a threat of serious physical harm to themselves and to others. . . . By the time deadly force was used, Small had committed more than multiple counts of reckless driving; she had struck a police car and drove in such a way that reasonable officers in her path would perceive aggravated assault had occurred. Under the circumstances, it was reasonable to perceive that Small had used her car as a deadly weapon. By revving the engine and advancing forward, the threat she posed to Simpson and Sasser was reasonably perceived as serious and immediate. The final Lee factor—she sought to evade or resist arrest—persisted until she was shot.")

Chambers v. U.S., No. 5:11–CV–420–OC–10TBS, 2013 WL 4080118, *5, *10, *11 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 13, 2013) ("In summary, at the time of the events involved in this case, July 20, 2008, there were only two cognizable Eleventh Circuit decisions involving use of a taser device in making an arrest of a non-compliant free person—that is, cases governed by the Fourth Amendment—and both had found such use to be reasonable, not unconstitutional. To be sure, each of those cases involved a single use of the taser whereas this case presents multiple tasings, but that difference is of little consequence in either stage of a qualified immunity analysis in which the ultimate focus is upon conduct that the law condemns, not so much on conduct that the Constitution allows. The Court might well conclude the analysis at this point, therefore, by simply declaring that Crain's use of the taser (at least up to the time that Chambers was handcuffed) was not objectively unreasonable or, even if it was, that Crain is entitled to qualified immunity for those acts because the law was not clearly established to that effect at the time. There would still be an issue, however, concerning Chambers' claim that he was unnecessarily tased after he was handcuffed and no longer posed a physical threat or risk of flight. Later cases should be examined to determine whether such abuse—taking Chambers' testimony that it occurred—constituted: (1) objectively unreasonable force in violation of the Constitution; and, if so (2) whether the violation was one of such 'obvious clarity'that the law should be deemed to have been clearly established even in the absence of comparable decisions as of July 20, 2008. . . . In all of the excessive force cases involving tasers decided by the circuit since late 2008, qualified immunity has been denied on five occasions. Powell v. Haddock, 366 F. App'x 29 (11th Cir. Feb. 12, 2010); Oliver, 586 F.3d 898; Fils, 647 F.3d 1272; Harper v. Perkins, 459 F. App'x 822 (11th Cir. Feb. 29, 2012); and Thompson v. Mostert, 489 F. App'x 396 (11th Cir. Sept. 12, 2012). On the other hand, qualified immunity has been granted in seven cases. Chaney, 291 F. App'x 238; Buckley v. Haddock, 292 F. App'x 791 (11th Cir. Sept. 9, 2008); German v. Sosa, 399 F. App'x 554 (11th Cir. Oct. 12, 2010); Floyd v. Corder, 426 F. App'x 790 (11th Cir. May 12, 2011); Hoyt v. Cooks, 672 F.3d 972 (11th Cir.2012); McQueen, 506 F. App'x 909; and Brown v.. Calicchio, 510 F. App'x 822 (11th Cir. Feb. 25, 2013). . . .The most appropriate basis on which to compare the two groups of taser cases is the way in which the Court of Appeals has applied the three prong test of Graham v. Connor in all of them. The difference between the two sets of cases on that basis is clear, consistent and conspicuous. In all of the examples in which qualified immunity has been denied, the offense or purported offense justifying an arrest was minor or non-existent, the subject who was tased posed no immediate threat to the officers or others, and the subject was compliant, not resisting or attempting to evade arrest by flight. The use of a taser device in those circumstances has been universally treated by the court of appeals as excessive or objectively unreasonable in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Additionally, in those cases, the court has consistently found that the 'clearly established' law condemning such conduct (for purposes of qualified immunity analysis) has been met either by the prior decisions in Priester and Vinyard, . . . or by the 'obvious clarity' exception to the general requirement of materially similar precedent. Conversely, in all of the cases in which qualified immunity has been granted, while the underlying offense justifying arrest is not uniformly serious, the cases are universally characterized by violent or non-compliant belligerent behavior on the part of the subject, posing a clear threat to the safety of the officer if he or she had proceeded to engage in hand-to-hand combat in an effort to secure the subject by handcuffing without the incapacitating aid of the taser. . . .Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Chambers, the Court concludes that partial summary judgment should be granted with respect to any claim of Chambers for liability or damages based upon any tasings or other force used against his person up to the time that he was handcuffed. There is no genuine issue of material fact that Chambers was, up to that point in time, aggressively and physically resisting being handcuffed incident to arrest. To the extent there are differences in the factual accounts of the witnesses and parties concerning the details of the encounter between Chambers and Officer Crain, the Court finds those differences to be immaterial. . . . Here, there can be no genuine dispute that Chambers physically resisted Crain's attempt to complete an arrest by handcuffing him. Chambers has admitted that he refused to kneel and be handcuffed on Crain's command, and his continuing resistance is established by the indisputable fact that two disinterested strangers found it necessary to physically intervene in aid of Crain whom they perceived to be fighting a losing battle. . . .In summary, there was no objectively unreasonable use of force by Crain—and no violation of the Fourth Amendment—up to the time that Chambers was brought under physical control and handcuffed. Or, alternatively, if there was a constitutional violation during that phase of the engagement, Crain would be, and is, entitled to qualified immunity with respect to that part of the Bivins claim because the applicable law was not clearly established that use of the taser was constitutionally prohibited in the factual circumstances Crain was confronting. . .On the other hand, there are material issues of fact with respect to the tasings, if any, that occurred after Chambers was handcuffed; and the law is, and was, clearly established as of 2008 that the 'gratuitous' use of force against an already restrained and non-resisting arrestee is excessive. As we have held on numerous occasions, the gratuitous use of force when a criminal suspect is restrained and not resisting arrest constitutes excessive force. The motion for summary judgment (Doc. 31) will be, and is DENIED with respect to the events that occurred after Chambers was restrained by handcuffing. With respect to trial of the Bivins claim before a jury, the Court's intent will be to use special interrogatories to obtain a jury verdict with respect to the disputed issues of critical historical fact. The Court will then apply the law to those facts in accord with the procedure prescribed by the Court of Appeals in Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1317 (11th Cir.2002).")

Estate of Breedlove v. Leone, No. 6:11–cv–2027–Orl–31TBS, 2013 WL 1703551, *13 (M.D. Fla. Apr. 19, 2013) ("Police officers have a difficult job and often have to make split-second decisions to defend themselves or protect others from harm. Qualified immunity grants the police a large degree of protection from suit when acting within their discretionary authority, but this discretion is not unbounded. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, the conduct at issue here is more akin to an execution than an attempt to arrest an unarmed suspect. The qualified immunity bar is not set that low.")

Steen v. City of Pensacola, 809 F.Supp.2d 1342, 1349-56 (N.D. Fla. Aug. 22, 2011) ("The issue of whether Chief Mathis has supervisory liability is necessarily dependent on there being an underlying Section 1983 violation in the first instance. Thus, if the underlying Section 1983 claim fails, a fortiori, so does the supervisory liability claim against Chief Mathis. . . . Therefore, the relevant question is whether Officer Ard's use of his taser on the facts of this case was a violation of Steen's constitutional rights and, if so, whether the right was 'clearly established' on October 3, 2009. . . . As the Eleventh Circuit recently noted: 'A "taser" is a non-deadly weapon.' Fils v.

City of Aventura, __ F.3d __, 2011 WL 3241618, at *1 n. 2 (11th Cir. July 28, 2011). . . Although it is true (as the plaintiff has observed) that tasing someone who is on a bicycle while driving alongside him in a vehicle may carry with it the possibility of serious injury or even death (e.g., if the tasing is followed by an impact with the vehicle), that outcome by no means a 'virtual certainty' as it was in both Garner and Vaughan. . . The fact that Steen died (while unfortunate) does not convert the use of non-deadly force into deadly force. Consequently, the 'deadly force' test does not apply, and the question is whether the force used was reasonable under the three-factor Graham analysis. . . . Although the danger caused by Steen fleeing on his bicycle may not be the same as that caused by the speeding motorist in Harris, there was a serious threat to the safety of others caused by his flight and Officer's Ard's pursuit. Thus, the second Graham factor must be evaluated as both favorable and unfavorable to the plaintiff. However, even if the first two Graham factors – no serious crime, and no immediate threat –weighed entirely for the plaintiff, I cannot ignore that Steen was fleeing the scene and disregarding Officer Ard's repeated orders to 'stop the bike.'. . . The factual record in this case has not yet been fleshed out, and I am only considering the plaintiff's allegations in the complaint and the facts as seen in the attached video. Based only on those limited facts, I cannot say that the single use of a taser on the fleeing, albeit non-violent, Steen was an unconstitutional use of excessive force. Ultimately, however, I do not need to make that decision. I will simply assume arguendo that there was a constitutional violation and proceed to the second step of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . The Supreme Court '[does] not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, __ U.S. __, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2083, 179 L.Ed.2d 1149 (2011). In determining if existing case law provided an officer with fair warning that a specific use of force was unlawful 'beyond debate,' the Eleventh Circuit has made clear that it '[does] not expect public officials to sort out the law of every jurisdiction in the country.'. . The plaintiff has not identified – and my research has not revealed – a case from the United States Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the Florida Supreme Court, 'stak[ing] out a bright line' and holding that it is excessive force for a police officer in a vehicle to tase someone who is fleeing on a bicycle. . . The cases cited by the plaintiff either do not involve a fleeing suspect (the third Graham factor used to analyze reasonableness), . . . and/or they are otherwise 'fairly distinguishable.'. . . [T]o the extent that the plaintiff contends there is a 'controlling case' that clearly established on October 3, 2009, that Officer Ard's use of force was unconstitutional, I find that each cited case is readily distinguishable. . . I will now turn to the second method of determining whether Officer Ard had 'fair warning' that his conduct was unlawful. The second method – for 'obvious clarity' cases – is a 'narrow exception to the normal rule that only case law and specific factual scenarios can establish a violation.'. . . The plaintiff contends that in this case 'we are dealing with an officer that [sic] intentionally deployed his Taser from the window of his speeding patrol car at an individual riding on another vehicle (a bicycle), from a distance of no more than eight (8) feet while both vehicles were underway.' These conditions, the plaintiff further contends, 'presented an abnormally high likelihood of serious injury or death to Mr. Steen.' Relying primarily on Garner, Vaughan, and Oliver, supra, the plaintiff insists that the purported excessive force in this case was clearly established under the 'obvious clarity' standard. I do not agree. As previously discussed, Garner and Vaughan are plainly distinguishable. To paraphrase the Supreme Court in

Harris, supra, tasing a person riding a bicycle 'is, in fact, not much like a policeman's shooting a gun so as to hit a person' and thus does not pose the same 'near certainty of death posed by, say, shooting a fleeing felon in the back of the head, or pulling alongside a fleeing motorist's car [traveling 80 + mph on an interstate highway] and shooting the motorist.'. . While it was obvious and apparent in those cases that the force being used was 'virtually certain' to result in death, that is simply not the case here. . . . Because it can scarcely be claimed that 'every objectively reasonable government official' in Officer Ard's position would have known that tasing a suspect who was fleeing on his bicycle violated clearly established federal law, this case is not one of 'obvious clarity.'. . . A taser is generally recognized as having many useful and lawful applications for law enforcement purposes. It is not a deadly weapon, as the Eleventh Circuit recently noted in Fils, supra. Accordingly, I must conclude that, as of that date, it was not clearly established to 'every objectively reasonable government official' (and thus, there was no 'fair warning') that discharging a single taser shock to a suspect attempting to flee on a bicycle was unconstitutional.Therefore, Chief Mathis is entitled to qualified immunity on the supervisory liability claim.")

Reed v. Barnett, No. 09-0200-WS-N, 2011 WL 5376300, at *6-*8 (S.D. Ala. Dec. 22, 2010) ("The Eleventh Circuit has several times determined that the use of a taser did not constitute excessive force, but none of these cases involved facts like those presented by the plaintiff here. . . .As under the plaintiff's version of facts here, no serious crime was suspected and neither a danger to the officer nor a risk of flight was presented. . . Applying the relevant factors to the version of the facts supported by the evidence that is most favorable to the plaintiff, Barnett employed unconstitutionally excessive force. . . . The plaintiff cites ten Eleventh Circuit cases to show that Barnett's conduct violated clearly established law, but none meets his burden. . . . To the doubtful extent that Hadley could be read as automatically invalidating any use of force against a suspect who, though not yet handcuffed, is not actively resisting, it postdates the incident at issue and thus was not binding on Barnett. In sum, it was not clearly established on March 14, 2008 that the force Barnett employed, under the circumstances he encountered, violated the Fourth Amendment. He is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Borton v. City of Dothan, No. 1:08-CV-654-WKW [WO], 2010 WL 3328361, at *12 (M.D. Ala. Aug. 24, 2010) ("Three unprovoked tasings on a mentally disturbed patient, who is not under arrest and who has been secured face down on a gurney with handcuffs and Posey restraints, amount to excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. On these facts, no particularized preexisting case law is needed for it to be clearly established that Officer Schulmerich's tasing of Ms. Borton violated her Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force.")

Franks v. Devane, No. 1:06-CV-173 (WLS), 2008 WL 794814, at * 4 (M.D. Ga. Mar. 21, 2008) ("As with the Plaintiff in Besher[s], Plaintiff in the case at bar intentionally endangered himself and the public. The chase by the officers involved county, city, and state patrol officers. It spanned two counties and 14 miles. Plaintiff was clocked on more than one occasion doing more than 120 mph. He had passed numerous vehicles over the double yellow line and driven in the wrong lane of traffic. There is some evidence that Plaintiff even taunted his pursuers by stopping and waiting for them to catch up. By the time, officers determined to set up a roadblock, Devane had determined that the chase may eventually lead into a highly congested school zone. Based on the facts and the controlling case law, if Devane's actions were intentional, they were objectively reasonable under the circumstances.")

Mancha v. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 2007 WL 3144012, at *6(N.D.Ga. Oct. 24, 2007) ("Nothing about my decision today should reflect the view that immigration officials are authorized to stop and interrogate drivers on the road simply because they happen to be driving near a caravan of immigration officials. Here, based on these specific facts, there was an objective basis for a brief and limited stop. The officers are entitled to qualified immunity. Their actions did not violate the Fourth Amendment, let alone clearly established law, as they had 'arguable reasonable suspicion' to conduct a limited stop. . . There was no obvious and flagrant violation of Morales's Fourth Amendment rights. The Defendant should prevail on his claim of qualified immunity.")

Scheuerman v. City of Huntsville, AL, 499 F.Supp.2d 1205, 1220 (N.D.Ala July 23, 2007) ("This is not a case where a uniformed officer uses potentially deadly force by crashing into the driver to prevent harm to others, after activating his blue lights and siren, and chasing a car whose driver is fleeing and driving recklessly in the dead of night. See Scott v. Harris , 127 S.Ct. 1769 (2007).This is not a case where a uniformed officer, attempting to apprehend a drug trafficker, identifies himself and uses deadly force in self-defense of a moving car. See Robinson v. Arrugueta, 415 F.3d 1252 (11th Cir.2005).This is not a case where a uniformed officer uses deadly force on a suspected felon after he avoids an investigatory pat-down, flees in a car, and engages in a highspeed reckless chase with multiple police cars in tow, and refuses to get out of his car once it had been blocked on three sides and told by police to exit his vehicle. See Pace v. Capobianco, 283 F.3d 1275 (11th Cir.2002).Instead, this is a case in which an off-duty investigator, who was not in uniform, exited his unmarked vehicle to confront an individual, and drew his weapon when there was no reasonable suspicion that a crime had even been committed. It is undisputed that plaintiff did not see Weaber exit his vehicle, and was not aware that Weaber was walking toward plaintiff's automobile, until Weaber's arm, with his hand holding a gun, appeared through his front window. Viewing the totality of the circumstances, it was not objectively reasonable for Weaber to use deadly force on the plaintiff. . . . The parties agree that the encounter at issue lasted only three to five seconds. Under these peculiar circumstances, the court finds it was objectively unreasonable for Weaber to approach plaintiff's vehicle unannounced, grab onto plaintiff's car as it was being placed in reverse, and then start shooting plaintiff's midsection to make plaintiff stop."), aff'd, 2008 WL 656080 (11th Cir. Mar. 12, 2008).

Stephens v. City of Butler, Ala, 2007 WL 1834898, at *11, *12 (S.D. Ala. June 23, 2007) ("The instant case presents an issue closer to Vinyard than to Draper, in that the plaintiff was under more control of the three officers than the plaintiff in Draper. Nonetheless, even if the court were to accept that a single application of the taser would have been appropriate under Draper, the issue before the court is the repeated use–at least four separate trigger pulls by Lovette followed by one use by Jackson–of a taser in such an instance. The repeated use of a taser on an unarmed arrestee who had made no effort to escape, no movement that could be deemed an attack or threat to any officer, who was in custody, in the jail, and was surrounded by three officers, would be objectively unreasonable and excessive, particularly where the use of force was over something as minor as being verbally unruly and refusing to don jail garb. This determination applies with equal force to defendant Jackson, who applied his taser to the plaintiff after defendant Lovette had already repeatedly done so. The plaintiff's facts support a reasonable inference that Jackson simply 'piled on' with full knowledge of the facts as stated above. . . . [T]he state of the law at the time of the incident at issue gave defendants Lovette and Jackson fair warning that the repeated use of tasers on a non-violent arrestee in circumstances similar to those presented in this case was excessive.")

Harrell v. Campbell, 482 F.Supp.2d 1368, 1372 & n.4, 1373 (N.D. Fla. 2007) ("Brosseau, Robinson, and Troupe do not undermine the conclusion that, under Vaughan, Deputy Goodman is not entitled to summary judgment. The distinction is the risk of serious physical harm; there was a greater risk in Brosseau, Robinson, and Troupe than in Vaughan, and a greater risk in Vaughan than in the case at bar. . . . Any argument that Vaughan did not survive Brosseau cannot succeed, at least in this court. Robinson and Troupe, which were decided after Brosseau, cited and quoted Vaughan at length without casting the slightest doubt on its continued validity. A district court in this circuit must continue to treat Vaughan as good law. And there is no reason to defer issuance of this order pending the Supreme Court's decision on review of Harris v. Coweta County, Georgia, 433 F.3d 807 (11th Cir.2005), cert. granted sub nom. Scott v. Harris, 127 S.Ct. 468, 166 L.Ed.2d 333 (Oct. 27, 2006). Any change that may result from the Supreme Court's decision in that case can be addressed in due course. . . . A juror could conclude that a reasonable officer in a modern patrol car would know that without resorting to lethal force he could thwart the escape of a known suspect driving a Volkswagen with a flat tire. And if, as the Eleventh Circuit said in Vaughan, giving a warning was feasible there, it may also have been feasible here. For these reasons, and especially in light of Vaughan, Deputy Goodman is not entitled to summary judgment."), aff'd. by Harrell v. Goodman, 250 F. App'x 284 (11th Cir. 2007).

Rauen v. City of Miami, No. 06-21182-CIV, 2007 WL 686609, at *21, *22 (S.D. Fla. Mar. 2, 2007) ("As discussed elsewhere in this Order, Defendants argued that the conduct of officers in 'herding' the Plaintiffs did not constitute a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. The undersigned has resolved this issue in favor of Plaintiffs, finding that the allegations support a claim that the officers' conduct did, in fact, result in a seizure. Nevertheless, the discussion of that issue, and the competing case law on that issue, demonstrates that the actions of the officers, and thus, the Individual Defendants' directing of those actions, did not violate 'clearly established' federal law. In addition, because it was not clear at the time of the officers' actions that those actions would result in a seizure of Plaintiffs, it cannot be said that it was clearly established that the use of force, even excessive force, in herding the Plaintiffs would result in a violation of the Fourth Amendment, which is only implicated where there is, in fact, a seizure. Each of the Individual Defendants is thus entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Counts Eight, Ten, Twelve, and Fourteen of the TAC. . . . While the parties agree that a cause of action for failure to intervene to prevent Fourth Amendment violations does exist, the Individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on these claims because, again, the law was not clearly established that the officers' conduct in herding the Plaintiffs and using force against them implicated the Fourth Amendment. In other words, at the time that the skirmish line was allegedly herding the Plaintiffs, the Individual Defendants were not aware that any seizure was occurring and, thus, were not aware that the Fourth Amendment was (allegedly) being violated. It cannot be said, therefore, that the law was 'clearly established' that the Individual Defendants' failure to intervene to prevent the officers' actions would result in a violation of Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights. Each of the Individual Defendants is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Counts Sixteen, Eighteen, and Twenty of the TAC.").

N.A. by and through Ainsworth v. Inabinett, No. 2:05-CV-740-B, 2006 WL 297222, at *7, *8 (M.D. Ala. Feb. 7, 2006) ("Having found that Deputy Inabinett violated N.A.'s Fourth Amendment right to be free from a gratuitous, unprovoked beating with fists followed by a taser gun assault–absent any provocation, resistance, legitimate law enforcement or other reasonably necessary purpose–the court addresses the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry: was this constitutional right clearly established at the time of the deputy's encounter with N.A.? . . . . Defendant Inabinett is correct that 'the Plaintiffs have not cited ... any case containing materially similar facts' and plaintiffs' counsel conceded at oral argument that he can not identify such a case. However, the court concurs with Plaintiff that the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on excessive force is sufficiently clear so that no reasonable officer would believe it appropriate to make an unprovoked physical assault–consisting of beating with his fists and then firing a taser gun weapon–on a reportedly suicidal minor who was then not engaged in any criminal activity or other resistance which made reasonably necessary the use of any force at all. The Eleventh Circuit has found obvious clarity in the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against excessive force sufficiently to deny qualified immunity to officers using more than de minimis force against offenders or suspects after they have been restrained sufficiently to cease the acts which triggered the need for force at the outset. . . Thus, on facts alleging no need for force at all, fair notice surely derives from the same source.").

Fitch v. Scott, No. 2:03-CV-465-FTM29DNF, 2005 WL 1925028, at *7 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 10, 2005) (not reported) ("Taking the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, an objectively reasonable officer in Deputy Edwards' position could not have believed that he was entitled to use deadly force. While Deputy Edwards argues that plaintiffs have not identified any case law on point, this is not dispositive under the facts of this case. Officers have been on notice since 1985 that deadly force would be justified only by a reasonable belief that they or the public were in imminent danger. . . . It is hardly surprising after Garner that there are few reported assertions that shooting a suspect who is surrendering is not excessive. Indeed, the Eleventh Circuit and others circuits have noted that even pepper spraying an arrestee who is surrendering constitutes excessive force. . . The Court finds that under plaintiffs' version of the facts an objectively reasonable officer in Deputy Edwards' position could not have reasonably believed that he was entitled to shoot Fitch at the time he did so.").

Maiorano v. Santiago, No. 6:05CV107ORL-19KRS, 2005 WL 1200882, at *8 (M.D. Fla. May 19, 2005) (not reported) ("The Court's research reveals no case with facts materially similar to the case at hand. Considering Plaintiff's allegations, no factually particularized, preexisting case law was necessary for it to be obvious to an objectively reasonable officer facing Santiago's situation that his conduct violated Plaintiff's right to be free from the use of excessive force. In other words based on the bare allegations of the Amended Complaint, it cannot be said that an objectively reasonable officer could believe that it would be reasonable to use a taser against Plaintiff, without advance warning or a verbal command to desist, because of Plaintiff's action of engaging in an unspecified type of physical altercation with another student.").

Reed v. City of Lavonia, 390 F.Supp.2d 1347, 1362, 1363 (M.D. Ga. 2005) ("In this case, even though Reed was not handcuffed, the facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to him, show that Reed was not attempting to flee, was not offering any resistance, and was not belligerent or uncooperative and that he attempted to comply with the officers commands. If these facts are true, existing case law served as a clear and fair warning to Defendants Masionet and Carlisle that the use of force in such circumstances would violate an arrestee's Fourth Amendment rights. Even assuming that existing case law did not provide Defendants with clear and fair notice that their acts, as alleged by Plaintiff, would violate Reed's Fourth Amendment right to be free of excessive force during arrest, the Court further finds that such decisional law is not necessarily required in this case. As stated above, materially similar case law is not necessary if the officers' alleged conduct lies 'so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent ... notwithstanding the lack of case law.'. . Here, as discussed above, Reed was allegedly passive, compliant and cooperative when Officers Masionet and Carlisle arrived on scene, sprayed him with pepper spray, physically attacked him, and began beating him with the baton. He was not intoxicated, did not possess (or appear to possess) a weapon, and made no attempt to flee or resist arrest. According to Reed, he surrendered to the officers' authority when they arrived and made every attempt to comply with the officers' commands. Even when Reed was on the ground, as the officers commanded, Masionet continued to beat him as Carlisle held him in a choke-hold, restricting his airflow and restraining his movement. In these circumstances, 'no particularized preexisting case law was necessary for it to be clearly established that what [Defendants Masionet and Carlisle allegedly] did violated [Reed's] constitutional right to be free from excessive force.'").

IX. AVAILABILITY & SCOPE OF REVIEW RE INTERLOCUTORY APPEALS

Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 530 (1985) (denial of qualified immunity, to the extent that it turns on an issue of law, is an appealable "final decision"). The Court noted, id. at 528:

> An appellate court reviewing the denial of ... immunity need not consider the correctness of the plaintiff's version of the facts, nor even determine whether the plaintiff's allegations actually state a claim. All it need determine is a question of law: whether the legal norms allegedly violated by the defendant were clearly established at the time of the challenged actions or, in cases where the district court has denied summary judgment ... on the ground that even under the defendant's version of the facts the defendant's conduct violated clearly established law, whether the law clearly proscribed the actions the defendant claims he took.

Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S. Ct. 2012, 2019, 2020 (2014) ("The District Court order in this case is nothing like the order in Johnson. Petitioners do not claim that other officers were responsible for shooting Rickard; rather, they contend that their conduct did not violate the Fourth Amendment and, in any event, did not violate clearly established law. Thus, they raise legal issues; these issues are quite different from any purely factual issues that the trial court might confront if the case were tried; deciding legal issues of this sort is a core responsibility of appellate courts, and requiring appellate courts to decide such issues is not an undue burden. The District Court order here is not materially distinguishable from the District Court order in Scott v. Harris, and in that case we expressed no doubts about the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals under § 1291. Accordingly, here, as in Scott, we hold that the Court of Appeals properly exercised jurisdiction, and we therefore turn to the merits.")

Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1946, 1947 (2009) ("[R]espondent contends the Court of Appeals had jurisdiction to determine whether his complaint avers a clearly established constitutional violation but that it lacked jurisdiction to pass on the sufficiency of his pleadings. Our opinions, however, make clear that appellate jurisdiction is not so strictly confined. . . . Though determining whether there is a genuine issue of material fact at summary judgment is a question of law, it is a legal question that sits near the law-fact divide. Or as we said in Johnson, it is a 'fact-related' legal inquiry. . . To conduct it, a court of appeals may be required to consult a 'vast pretrial record, with numerous conflicting affidavits, depositions, and other discovery materials.'. . That process generally involves matters more within a district court's ken and may replicate inefficiently questions that will arise on appeal following final judgment. . . Finding those concerns predominant, Johnson held that the collateral orders that are 'final' under Mitchell turn on 'abstract,' rather than 'fact-based,' issues of law. . . The concerns that animated the decision in Johnson are absent when an appellate court considers the disposition of a motion to dismiss a complaint for insufficient pleadings. True, the categories of 'fact-based' and 'abstract' legal questions used to guide the Court's decision in Johnson are not well defined. Here, however, the order denying petitioners' motion to dismiss falls well within the latter class. Reviewing that order, the Court of Appeals considered only the allegations contained within the four corners of respondent's complaint; resort to a 'vast pretrial record' on petitioners' motion to dismiss was unnecessary. . .And determining whether respondent's complaint has the 'heft' to state a claim is a task well within an appellate court's core competency. . . Evaluating the sufficiency of a complaint is not a 'fact-based' question of law, so the problem the Court sought to avoid in Johnson is not implicated here. The District Court's order denying petitioners' motion to dismiss is a final decision under the collateral-order doctrine over which the Court of Appeals had, and this Court has, jurisdiction.")

Behrens v. Pelletier, 516 U.S. 299, 312, 313 (1996) ("Denial of summary judgment often includes a determination that there are controverted issues of material fact, . . . and Johnson surely does not mean that every denial of summary judgment is nonappealable. Johnson held, simply, that determinations of evidentiary sufficiency at summary judgment are not immediately appealable merely because they happen to arise in a qualified-immunity case; if what is at issue in the sufficiency determination is nothing more than whether the evidence could support a finding that particular conduct occurred, the question decided is not truly 'separable' from the plaintiff's claim, and hence there is no 'final decision' under Cohen and Mitchell. [cite omitted] Johnson reaffirmed that summary-judgment determinations are appealable when they resolve a dispute concerning an 'abstract issu[e] of law' relating to qualified immunity . . , typically, the issue whether the federal right allegedly infringed was 'clearly established[.] [cites omitted] Here the District Court's denial of petitioner's summary-judgment motion necessarily determined that certain conduct attributed to petitioner (which was controverted) constituted a violation of clearly established law. Johnson permits petitioner to claim on appeal that all of the conduct which the District Court deemed sufficiently supported for purposes of summary judgment met the Harlow standard of 'objective legal reasonableness.' This argument was presented by petitioner in the trial court, and there is no apparent impediment to its being raised on appeal. And while the District Court, in denying petitioner's summary-judgment motion, did not identify the particular charged conduct that it deemed adequately supported, Johnson recognizes that under such circumstances 'a court of appeals may have to undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.'").

Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304, 319, 320 (1995) ("[W]e hold that a defendant, entitled to invoke a qualified-immunity defense, may not appeal a district court's summary judgment order insofar as that order determines whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a 'genuine' issue of fact for trial.").

Swint v. Chambers County Commission, 514 U.S. 35, 51 (1995) ("The Eleventh Circuit's authority immediately to review the District Court's denial of the individual police officer defendants' summary judgment motions did not include authority to review at once the unrelated question of the County Commission's liability. The District Court's preliminary ruling regarding the County did not qualify as a 'collateral order,' and there is no 'pendent party' appellate jurisdiction of the kind the Eleventh Circuit purported to exercise.").

NOTE: In Johnson v. Fankell, 520 U.S. 911 (1997), the Court held, in a unanimous opinion, that defendants have no federal right to an interlocutory appeal from a denial of qualified immunity in state court. In response to petitioners' argument that the Idaho rules were interfering with their federal rights, the Court noted:

> While it is true that the defense has its source in a federal statute (§ 1983), the ultimate purpose of qualified immunity is to protect the state and its officials from overenforcement of federal rights. The Idaho Supreme Court's application of the State's procedural rules in this context is thus less an interference with federal interests than a judgment about how best to balance the competing state interests of limiting interlocutory appeals and providing state officials with immediate review of the merits of their defense.

Id. at 919, 920. In response to petitioners' further argument that the Idaho rule did not sufficiently protect their right to prevail before trial, the Court explained:

> In evaluating this contention, it is important to focus on the precise source and scope of the federal right at issue. The right to have the trial court rule on the merits of the qualified immunity defense presumably has its source in § 1983, but the right to immediate appellate review of that ruling in a federal case has its source in ' 1291. The former right is fully protected by Idaho. The latter right, however, is a federal procedural right that simply does not apply in a nonfederal forum.

D.C. CIRCUIT

Feld v. Feld, 688 F.3d 779, 781-783, (D.C. Cir. 2012) ("It is true that we are powerless to review a challenge to the legal sufficiency of evidence that was rejected at summary judgment and not brought again in a Rule 50 motion. . . But the Supreme Court has left open the question whether the same rule applies to preserving 'purely legal' arguments that were rejected at summary judgment. . . At least six circuits have said it does not. [collecting cases] We agree. . . .At least two circuits have taken the opposite approach and require a Rule 50 motion to preserve for appeal any issue first raised in a motion for summary judgment. [citing cases from First Circuit and Fourth Circuit and noting that Fifth and Eighth Circuits have not settled on position] . . . .We conclude that we have jurisdiction to hear Karen's legal argument because we hold a Rule 50 motion is not required to preserve for appeal a purely legal claim rejected at summary judgment.")

Moore v. Hartman, 644 F.3d 415, 422 (D.C. Cir. 2011), cert. granted, vacated and remanded in light of Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088 (2012) ("The Postal Inspectors first challenge the sufficiency of the evidentiary basis for the district court's determination that 'there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the government lacked probable cause to prosecute [Moore],' Moore VI, 730 F.Supp.2d at 175. This is precisely the sort of determination, however, that the Supreme Court held in Johnson is not immediately appealable. . . . Under Johnson, we lack jurisdiction at this stage of the proceeding to review the court's fact-based determination because it is not a 'final decision[ ]' within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1291.")

International Action Center v. United States, 365 F.3d 20, 24 (D.C. Cir. 2004) ("[T]he fact that the qualified immunity claim is not ripe for appeal with respect to the active participation claims should not prevent the MPD supervisors from obtaining prompt review of the denial of qualified immunity as to the inaction claims. . . A contrary approach would lead to what the Supreme Court has termed the 'intolerable" result that A[i]f the district court rules erroneously, the qualified-immunity right not to be subjected to pretrial proceedings will be eliminated, so long as the plaintiff has alleged (with or without evidence to back it up) violation of one "clearly established" right.'").

Farmer v. Moritsugu, 163 F.3d 610, 613, 614 (D.C. Cir. 1998) ("[T]he Supreme Court has distinguished between appeals raising 'abstract' legal issues–i.e., 'whether the facts alleged ... support a claim of violation of clearly established law,'. . . and appeals challenging evidentiary sufficiency–i.e., whether the summary judgment record raises genuine issues of fact for trial. [citing Johnson v. Jones] As we see it, this precedent draws a critical line between appeals of the 'I cannot, as a matter of law, be held liable' variety and appeals of the 'I did not, as a matter of fact, do it' variety. The former is permitted, notwithstanding the absence of a final judgment in the case. . . ; the latter, however, is not. . . . Moritsugu has effectively conceded the facts as alleged by Farmer, contesting instead whether those facts could support a conclusion that he violated Farmer's constitutional rights.").

FIRST CIRCUIT

Norton v. Rodrigues, 955 F.3d 176, 184, 187 (1st Cir. 2020) ("The crucial distinction between appealable and nonappealable summary judgment orders denying qualified immunity is this: '[p]urely legal rulings implicating qualified immunity are normally reviewable on an interlocutory appeal,'. . . but rulings 'turn[ing] on either an issue of fact or an issue perceived by the trial court to be an issue of fact' are not. . . . Where, as here, the interlocutory challenge to a ruling denying qualified immunity invites us to 'choos[e] among conflicting facts,'. . . or 'to adopt a spin on the summary judgment record different from that taken by the district court,'. . . we lack jurisdiction to accept the invitation. . . . Because Rodrigues fails to pose the qualified immunity question 'in a manner that would permit us to conclude that "the answer to it does not depend on whose account of the facts is correct" ... we lack the authority to provide an answer.'. . We therefore conclude that Rodrigues' discontentment with the district court is not reviewable by this Court at this juncture.")

McKenney v. Mangino, 873 F.3d 75, 83-84 (1st Cir. 2017) ("[T]he defendant makes a series of factbound arguments. Most notably, the defendant repeatedly insists—contrary to the inferences drawn by the district court—that he reasonably perceived McKenney as an imminent danger at the time of the shooting, such that he was left with no real choice but to fire his weapon. In turn, he urges reversal in light of evidence that he maintains the district court either overlooked or insufficiently considered. These facts include data points such as that McKenney had ignored police commands to drop his loaded weapon, had at one time raised his gun, and was approaching the defendant (and the unarmed civilian in the defendant's cruiser) at the time he was shot. But there is a rub: the defendant's characterization of the summary judgment record collides head-on with the district court's synthesis of the facts. The defendant either ignores or gives unduly short shrift to evidence that was central to the district court's conclusion that, on the version of the facts most hospitable to the plaintiff, the defendant had 'ample opportunity to observe [McKenney's] actions and movements' before pulling the trigger and that the defendant's decision to shoot McKenney was 'unreasonably precipitous.'. . These facts include McKenney's suicidality, the slowness of his gait, the clear visibility, the fact that six minutes had elapsed since any officer had last ordered McKenney to drop his weapon, the fact that nobody had warned McKenney that deadly force would be used if he failed to follow police commands, and the six-minute gap between when McKenney raised his gun skywards and when the defendant pulled the trigger. Rather than accept arguendo that McKenney never came close to pointing his gun in the defendant's direction, the defendant devotes much sound and fury to the proposition that he reasonably perceived McKenney to be aiming his weapon at him. In short, the defendant has woven factbound arguments regarding both the immediacy of the threat posed by McKenney and the feasibility of less drastic action into the warp and woof of his challenge to the district court's qualified immunity analysis. Such an intertwining of disputed issues of fact and cherry-picked inferences, on the one hand, with principles of law, on the other hand, places these arguments beyond our jurisdictional reach on interlocutory appeal. . . To sum up, the precedents make pellucid that the most relevant factors in a lethal force case like this one are the immediacy of the danger posed by the decedent and the feasibility of remedial action. . . Taking the facts in the light most amiable to the plaintiff (as the law required it to do), the district court concluded that a rational jury could reasonably infer both that McKenney did not pose an imminent threat and that viable remedial measures had not been exhausted. The court also concluded that these facts should have been obvious to an objectively reasonable officer in the defendant's position. Although the defendant invites us to adopt a spin on the summary judgment record different from that taken by the district court, we lack jurisdiction to accept that invitation under Johnson and its progeny. . . . Accordingly, we dismiss the defendant's factbound challenges to the district court's order for lack of jurisdiction.")

Morse v. Cloutier, 869 F.3d 16, 24-26 (1st Cir. 2017) ("The bottom-line question is not — as the defendants suggest — what a reasonable officer would have known. Rather, the bottom-line question is whether a reasonable officer would have thought, given the facts known to him, that the situation he encountered presented some meaningful exigency. . . Here, the district court focused on what the officers actually knew and what they reasonably could have suspected when they reached Morse's doorstep. It concluded that '[a] reasonable juror could credit this evidence and find that there was no objective basis for the officers to believe that exigent circumstances existed.'. . In reaching this conclusion, the court applied the proper legal standard. . . . The defendants' second line of attack challenges the district court's determination that, on the summary judgment record, the exigent circumstances question is freighted with genuine disputes of material fact. . . The plaintiffs counter that this determination is factual in nature and, therefore, that we lack jurisdiction to review it in these interlocutory appeals. Because jurisdiction is both a legally and a logically antecedent question, . . . we address the plaintiffs' argument first. A defendant asserting a qualified immunity defense may obtain interlocutory review of a denial of his motion for summary judgment, even if the district court concluded that the record presented a genuine dispute of material fact, as long as he accepts as true the plaintiff's version of the facts and argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity on that version of the facts. . . The defendants insist that, for purposes of these appeals, they have accepted the plaintiffs' version of the facts and challenge only the application of the law to those facts. Here, however, the defendants say one thing and do another. The arguments that they raise on appeal attempt to contradict, in significant ways, the plaintiffs' version of the facts. . . . The short of it is that the defendants plainly rest their appeals on an alternative version of the facts, that is, a version different from that relied on by the plaintiffs. Each version has some factual support in the record and, in the last analysis, each depends on what inferences a factfinder elects to draw from among reasonable, but conflicting, alternatives. By suggesting that the district court did not choose appropriately from among these competing sets of inferences and by asking us to discount the plaintiffs' plausible rendition of the facts, the defendants are making a quintessentially factbound argument 'inextricably intertwined with whatever "purely legal" contentions' their briefs contain. . . It follows that the defendants' exigent circumstances argument entails a prototypical factual dispute, not eligible for interlocutory review.")

Filler v. Kellett, 859 F.3d 148, 154-55 (1st Cir. 2017) ("Kellett contends that 'Filler is trying to get around the rule of immunity for withholding exculpatory evidence by reframing his claim as one about giving legal advice.' Kellett's 'end-run' contention, however, is too fact-dependent for us to be able to review it at this time. Count I of the complaint alleges that Kellett 'assumed the role of legal counsel' to law enforcement officers, 'and advised them not to comply with lawful defense ... subpoenas.' But, it is not at all clear that, in advancing the assertion that Filler is merely attempting an 'end run,' Kellett is presenting a legal argument that she is entitled to absolute immunity based on the facts set forth in the complaint, rather than a factual argument that she is entitled to absolute immunity based on her distinct understanding of the facts that transpired. . . . [W]e find ourselves in a situation where Filler's claims against Kellett are 'not clearly foreclosed and ... do not clearly reveal the degree to which the conduct relied on could be considered part of the decision to prosecute or intimately associated with the judicial proceedings, rather than purely investigative or administrative.'. . In consequence, the 'the availability of the defense of absolute immunity as to these claims must await the development of facts during discovery.'. .Kellett does contend in this regard that, because the advice was given after the case against Filler was initiated, she was necessarily acting in her prosecutorial capacity and thus entitled as a matter of law to absolute immunity. But, as we have noted, the fact that a prosecutor engaged in certain activities after a prosecution had already commenced is not necessarily dispositive of the question whether absolute immunity attaches. . .A similar problem prevents us from reviewing Kellett's assertion of absolute immunity as it relates to the allegations in Count I that Kellett tampered with and withheld exculpatory evidence. . . . [E]ven if Kellett may have a basis for asserting the absolute immunity defense, she does not identify with any specificity why she is entitled to immunity with respect to the allegations in Count I that pertain to her treatment of evidence. And it is by no means clear that every allegation in Filler's complaint concerning such treatment by her occurred during the judicial rather than the investigative phase. . . . In light of the undifferentiated nature of Kellett's assertion of absolute immunity with respect to her treatment of evidence, it is unclear whether the parties' dispute over immunity with respect to the allegations in Count I concerning the treatment of potentially exculpatory evidence is a legal one about what protection the law affords a prosecutor either before or during the judicial phase, or instead a factual one about when the alleged conduct occurred. In consequence, we also lack jurisdiction to review this aspect of her absolute immunity defense in this interlocutory appeal. For, here, too, while Filler's claim against Kellett is not 'clearly foreclosed' by absolute immunity, 'the availability of the defense of absolute immunity as to these claims must await the development of facts during discovery.'")

McCue v. City of Bangor, 838 F.3d 55, 61-65 (1st Cir. 2016) ("After reviewing de novo all of the magistrate judge's determinations, the district court adopted the Recommended Decision in full. This appeal followed. The only issue before us is the pretrial denial of qualified immunity as to the plaintiff's allegation that the officers used excessive force after McCue had ceased resisting, as well as the corresponding denial of immunity under the MTCA for the state law assault claim. . . . Johnson and its progeny foreclose assertion of appellate jurisdiction over the defendants' interlocutory appeal. The magistrate judge's opinion, fully affirmed by the district court, denied summary judgment precisely '[b]ecause the record includes factual disputes regarding Plaintiff's claim that Defendants used excessive force after Mr. McCue allegedly ceased resisting.'. . In particular, the record contains facts that, when viewed most favorably to the plaintiff, could support a finding that McCue stopped resisting at some point during his encounter with the officers, and that the officers should have realized that he had stopped resisting, but that the officers 'continued to exert significant force ... no longer necessary to subdue Mr. McCue or to reduce the threat that he posed to himself or others.'. . And they continued to use such force after McCue told them that they were hurting his neck. In light of these remaining factual issues, we cannot assume jurisdiction over the defendants' interlocutory appeal. Maintaining that they do not dispute the facts for the purposes of their appeal, the defendants argue that we have appellate jurisdiction notwithstanding the district court's identification of material factual disputes. They repeatedly assert that they construe the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and that even so construed, 'the videotape evidence conclusively establishes that there is at most a timeframe of 66 seconds for which the trial court could have concluded that Mr. McCue may have stopped resisting arrest and the Defendants may have continued to apply force.' They further argue that 'this momentary continuance of force' for up to 66 seconds did not violate McCue's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure. Plaintiff disagrees and says that the record supports a finding that 4 minutes and 25 seconds is the true period involved. As a matter of law, our circuit has assumed interlocutory appellate jurisdiction where the defendant 'accepted as true all facts and inferences proffered by plaintiffs, and [where] defendants argue[d] that even on plaintiffs' best case, they [we]re entitled to immunity.' Mlodzinski, 648 F.3d at 28. Even 'a defendant who concedes arguendo the facts found to be disputed is not barred by Johnson from taking an interlocutory appeal on a legal claim that the defendant is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on facts not controverted.' . . But this avenue is not available to the defendants here because, contrary to their protests, they have not in fact accepted the version of the facts most favorable to the plaintiff. In at least four different places in their brief, the defendants stress that, construing the Car 22 video in the most plaintiff-favorable light, there was at most 66 seconds in which they might have continued to apply force after McCue had stopped resisting. The defendants appear to have arrived at this number by misconstruing a statement of fact by the magistrate judge. Explaining why Blanchard punched McCue's lower back, buttocks, or thigh region after the officers had secured both his wrists and ankles, the magistrate judge observed that Blanchard might have done so because McCue 'squeezed' Blanchard's injured hand 'extremely hard' or, alternatively, in order to 'facilitate bringing together Mr. McCue's ankles and wrists to complete the five-point restraint.'. . The defendants inaccurately characterize this observation, asserting that the magistrate judge found that Blanchard could have punched McCue because 'McCue was resisting the Defendants' efforts to put him in a five-point restraint.' Pinpointing this moment when Blanchard punched McCue as the last moment in which the magistrate judge found that McCue had resisted, the defendants count 66 seconds from that point to the point when McCue is lifted off the ground. This insistence on 66 seconds both mischaracterizes the magistrate judge's statements about the facts and fails to present those facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. First, neither reason that the magistrate judge cited to account for Blanchard's punch (to prevent McCue from squeezing his hand or to facilitate the five-point restraint) necessarily equates to resistance by McCue. At this point, McCue's wrists and ankles had already been cuffed, thus minimizing his range of movements and the danger that he posed to his own and others' safety. Simply put, there is no indication in the Recommended Decision that the hand squeeze should be construed as continued resistance, much less resistance justifying the force used. The defendants' inference as such, of course, also demonstrates their failure to accept the version of facts most favorable to the plaintiff. Second, our independent assessment of the Car 22 video, construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, discredits the defendants' 66-seconds theory. . .The video, from 2:18 to 2:22, captures McCue resisting detainment by kicking his legs, thrashing his torso, and shouting an expletive at the officers. In contrast, from 2:22 until the officers lift him off the ground at 7:08, McCue periodically growls and makes other noises but does not kick or thrash his body again. He also complains that the officers are hurting his neck, but we cannot ascertain from the video if the officers adjusted their positions in response. Viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, McCue's noises and slight movements after the 2:22 mark -- and even his squeezing of Blanchard's hand – 'may not constitute resistance at all, but rather a futile attempt to breathe while suffering from physiological distress.'. . In short, McCue's movements after 2:22 of the Car 22 video are not dispositive of whether he continued resisting. And from this perspective, there could be close to five minutes -- not 66 seconds -- during which the officers continued to exert force on a nonresisting McCue. Because the defendants have not, in fact, accepted the plaintiff's best version of the facts, we hold that there remains a genuine dispute of fact that precludes appellate jurisdiction over the denial of summary judgment. Finally, this factual dispute is material to the question on the merits. Depending on the amount of time for which the officers exerted force on McCue after he had ceased resisting, a jury could find that the officers' actions were unconstitutional under law that was clearly established in September 2012, the month of McCue's fatal encounter with the officers. The defendants argue that they should win because there was no clearly established law on this point. They are wrong. We 'adhere[ ] to a two-step approach to determine whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.' Stamps v. Town of Framingham, 813 F.3d 27, 34 (1st Cir. 2016). First, we ask whether the facts as alleged by the plaintiff make out a violation of a constitutional right. If so, we next ask whether that right was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation. . . In determining whether the law was clearly established, we 'ask "whether the legal contours of the right in question were sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would have understood that what he was doing violated the right," and then consider "whether in the particular factual context of the case, a reasonable officer would have understood that his conduct violated the right."'. . Here, we focus on the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis. This circuit has recognized that a 'First Circuit case presenting the same set of facts' is not necessary to hold that defendants 'had fair warning that given the circumstances, the force they are alleged to have used was constitutionally excessive.'. . We have also looked to the case law of sister circuits in determining whether a right was clearly established. . . Even without particular Supreme Court and First Circuit cases directly on point, it was clearly established in September 2012 that exerting significant, continued force on a person's back 'while that [person] is in a face-down prone position after being subdued and/or incapacitated constitutes excessive force.' Weigel v. Broad, 544 F.3d 1143, 1155 (10th Cir. 2008) (quoting Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893, 903 (6th Cir. 2004)). At least four circuits had announced this constitutional rule before the events in question here. . . .[A]s the abundant case law demonstrates, a jury could find that a reasonable officer would know or should have known about the dangers of exerting significant pressure on the back of a prone person, regardless of any lack of formal training. In sum, the disputed factual issue -- when McCue ceased resisting and for how long after that moment the officers continued to apply force on his back -- is material to the question of whether qualified immunity is proper.")

Morales v. Chadbourne, 793 F.3d 208, 218-19 (1st Cir. 2015) ("Donaghy contends that, even if probable cause was required, he is entitled to qualified immunity because he had probable cause when issuing the detainer against Morales, or, at the very least, the law was not clearly established in 2009 that the circumstances applicable to the issuance of the detainer did not constitute probable cause. . . .Because Donaghy's argument clearly rests on factual grounds and does not present a pure issue of law, his appeal on this ground 'must be dismissed for want of appellate jurisdiction.'")

Goguen v. Allen, 780 F.3d 437, 438, 455-58 (1st Cir. 2015) ("We conclude that the defendants' appeal must be dismissed for want of appellate jurisdiction. The defendants' arguments on appeal take issue with the district court's factual assessments and do not present a pure issue of law for this court's consideration. Consequently, following our holdings in Cady v. Walsh, 753 F.3d 348 (1st Cir.2014), and Penn v. Escorsio, 764 F.3d 102 (1st Cir.2014), we cannot entertain the defendants' appeal. . . .Our review of the defendants' briefing before this court convinces us that their arguments suffer from the same infirmities as those of the defendants in Stella, Díaz, Cady, and Penn. In their recitation of the facts and substantive arguments, the defendants repeatedly ignore evidence, and reasonable inferences therefrom, on which the magistrate judge based her conclusion that there were genuine issues of material fact concerning whether the defendants' actions were punitive and retaliatory. . . . [O]n an interlocutory appeal, we are not at liberty to reexamine a district court's determination that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to a government actor's motivation in taking specific actions. . . As our discussion here demonstrates, 'overlook[ing] this separability problem' would leave us mired in numerous factual disputes that we well may face again after trial. Under such circumstances, the collateral order doctrine does not allow, and concern for the wise use of judicial resources warns against, the exercise of appellate jurisdiction. . . The defendants have not come forward with any purely legal issues that call into question the district court's denial of their motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. Consequently, we do not have jurisdiction over the defendants' appeal. The appeal is dismissed for want of jurisdiction.")

Penn v. Escorsio, 764 F.3d 102, 105 (1st Cir. 2014) ("Defendants now appeal, steadfastly asserting qualified immunity. But Defendants' appeal relies heavily on factual arguments despite our holding that 'a district court's pretrial rejection of a qualified immunity defense is not immediately appealable to the extent that it turns on either an issue of fact or an issue perceived by the trial court to be an issue of fact.'. . In particular, Defendants concede clearly established law at the time Lalli attempted suicide dictated officers must take some reasonable measures to thwart a known, substantial risk that a pre-trial detainee will attempt suicide. But the district court found a reasonable jury could conclude Defendants 'effectively failed to take any action to forestall' this risk as to Lalli. Based on the conceded law and the district court's factual analysis, Defendants cannot show they are entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment phase of this litigation. Therefore, after winnowing away the chaff to reveal the very narrow legal question we may answer under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and the collateral order doctrine, we affirm. . . .In sum, we 'need not consider the correctness of the plaintiff's version of the facts,'. . . except, perhaps, to the extent they are 'blatantly contradicted by the record[.]'. . . But, assuming those plaintiff-friendly facts and inferences not blatantly contradicted by the record, we cannot shirk our duty to decide as a matter of law whether Defendants, on those assumed facts, violated the law and whether that law was clearly established such that Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. Before we reach this purely legal question, however, we must peel away the facade by which Defendants persistently portray as legal arguments what are in reality purely factual disputes. . . . Defendants do indeed assert (1) they did not violate Lalli's rights, or at least (2) a reasonable officer in their position would not have known he was violating Lalli's clearly established rights. But their arguments to support these assertions are entirely factual and thus not appropriate for interlocutory appeal. . . . As we recently stated in Cady, these 'fact-based challenge[s] would, of course, not defeat jurisdiction if ... advanced in the alternative. But nowhere in the defendants' brief does there appear any developed argument that the defendants are entitled to summary judgment even if the district court's conclusions about the record were correct.'. . As such, we have no basis on which to exercise jurisdiction over whether Defendants violated Lalli's clearly established rights through deliberate indifference to the risk that he would attempt suicide. . . . Ultimately, Defendants hang their hat on disagreements with how the district court weighed the evidence as to whether they in fact took any action that might have actually forestalled a substantial risk that Lalli would attempt suicide. As important as this issue may be, we do not have jurisdiction to address it on interlocutory appeal as it turns on questions of evidentiary sufficiency. . . . In sum, Defendants concede that clearly established law dictated they take some action to abate a known risk, whereas the district court found a jury could conclude Defendants took effectively no action to abate a known risk. As such, on the purely legal question of qualified immunity here, we affirm. . . . Before we close, a caveat. This opinion should not be construed as holding Defendants are totally ineligible for qualified immunity. Depending on what Defendants can prove at trial, they may indeed be entitled to raise qualified immunity as an affirmative defense. . . Rather, we simply hold that, on the clearly established law conceded by Defendants themselves and the reasonable pro-plaintiff inferences drawn by the district court below, Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment phase.") Cady v. Walsh, 753 F.3d 348, 350, 359-61(1st Cir. 2014) ("The plaintiff, noting there are material issues of fact in dispute, including conflicts in the opinions of expert witnesses, argues that there is no appellate jurisdiction under the doctrine of Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304 (1995), even if the defendants were theoretically eligible for the protections of qualified immunity. Like the district court, we bypass the question of whether qualified immunity is categorically unavailable to these defendants, because the district court's denial of immunity turned on findings that there remain disputed issues of material fact and inference. We do not have jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal under Johnson. We dismiss this appeal for want of appellate jurisdiction. . . . The magistrate judge's opinion-adopted in full by the district court-denied summary judgment on the basis of the conclusion that there are genuine issues of fact and inference on the deliberate indifference claims against these three defendants. The opinion includes separate determinations as to each defendant, makes clear what portions of the record support those determinations, and outlines at length the permissible inferences that the magistrate judge believed a reasonable juror might draw from the evidence. . .Though the defendants urge us to view this appeal as presenting a pure issue of law (whether they are entitled to qualified immunity individually as a matter of law on the facts), they nowhere develop the argument that, even drawing all the inferences as the district court concluded a jury permissibly could, they are entitled to judgment as a matter of law. . . .The defendants are correct that we have 'assumed interlocutory appellate jurisdiction where defendants have accepted as true all facts and inferences proffered by plaintiffs, and [where] defendants argue that even on plaintiffs' best case, they are entitled to immunity.'. . And we may, consistent with Johnson, exercise review even where the defendants accept the plaintiffs' version only for the sake of argument. . . However, that formulation does not confer jurisdiction in this case. The defendants' briefing before us plainly disputes both the facts identified by the magistrate judge as well as the inferences proffered by the plaintiff and deemed reasonable by the magistrate judge. With respect to each individual defendant, the defendants' briefing objects to the way the district court construed the facts and argues that the district court and magistrate judge erred in their conclusions as to what a reasonable juror could find. Those fact-based arguments are inextricably intertwined with whatever 'purely legal' contentions are contained in the defendants' briefs: were we to attempt to separate the legal from the factual in order to address only those arguments over which we might permissibly exercise jurisdiction, we simply would not know where to begin. . . It is not merely that the Statement of Facts in the defendants' brief, as in most briefs, shades the district court's determinations in a favorable manner. Such a tactic would, on its own, be insufficient to defeat jurisdiction. Rather, the defendants' brief repeatedly attacks the district court's factual conclusions, making no effort to separate fact-based arguments from 'purely legal' ones. . . .Finally, the defendants' objection to the district court's analysis of whether the constitutional rights in play were 'clearly established' also does not transform this appeal into one that turns on a pure issue of law. . . The defendants do not separate their qualified immunity arguments from their merits-based ones, and neither set of arguments concedes, even if only for the sake of argument, that the district court was correct in its determinations regarding what inferences were permissible on the summary judgment record. Because the defendants fail to pose even the qualified immunity question in a manner that would permit us to conclude that 'the answer to it does not depend upon whose account of the facts is correct,'. . . we lack the authority to provide an answer. This case fits squarely within Johnson, and we do not have jurisdiction to review it at this stage.")

Campos v. Van Ness, 711 F.3d 243, 248 & n.8 (1st Cir. 2013) ("In short, defendants-appellants have not convinced us that Campos's story is so 'blatantly contradicted by the record ... that no reasonable jury could believe it.'. . Nor have they attempted, in the alternative, to accept all of Campos's facts and inferences as true and 'argue that even on [Campos's] best case, they are entitled to immunity.'. . We therefore dismiss the appeal for lack of jurisdiction. . . . Defendants-appellants have suggested that '[w]hether the [Lincoln] was moving before or shortly after the shot was fired is immaterial for purposes of qualified immunity.' They have not, however, elaborated on that statement or explained why this case (on the facts as Campos has presented them) is analogous to the Eleventh Circuit and Supreme Court cases they cite. 'It is not enough merely to mention a possible argument in the most skeletal way, leaving the court to do counsel's work, create the ossature for the argument, and put flesh on its bones.'")

Bergeron v. Cabral, 560 F.3d 1, 6 (1st Cir. 2009) ("To recapitulate, we have jurisdiction to resolve the defendant's first ground for qualified immunity: that decommissioning does not constitute an adverse employment action, cognizable in a First Amendment retaliation suit (or, at the very least, that a reasonable public official would have believed that to be so). Conversely, we lack jurisdiction over the defendant's second theory of qualified immunity: that the record evidence is insufficient to support a finding that she acted out of political animus in decommissioning the plaintiffs. We limit our substantive discussion accordingly.")

Berube v. Conley, 506 F.3d 79, 82 (1st Cir. 2007) ("Berube contends that we lack jurisdiction to entertain this appeal from the denial of summary judgment. . . . But Johnson does not bar this appeal. Even accepting Berube's version of events, except so far as it would contradict his guilty plea, it is a question of law whether on the facts so assumed there is any violation of law. . . Thus we may consider this appeal on the basis of the facts offered or not disputed by Berube. Whether such a set of assumed facts constitutes a constitutional violation is a question of law we review de novo.").

Garnier v. Rodriguez, 506 F.3d 22, 25 (1st Cir. 2007) ("This review is limited to the issue of qualified immunity. As explained in Pedraza v. Shell Oil Co., 942 F.2d 48, 55 n. 10 (1st Cir.1991), 'when presented with an interlocutory appeal from an order denying summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity, we have so far refrained from endorsing any form of pendent appellate jurisdiction over otherwise nonappealable interlocutory orders.'. . . The denial of a motion to dismiss on statute of limitations grounds is such a nonappealable interlocutory order.")

Cruz-Gomez v. Rivera-Hernandez, 444 F.3d 29, 33 & n.5, 34 (1st Cir. 2006) ("We should point out that there does exist an exception to the Johnson rule. A denial of qualified immunity because of factual issues is still reviewable if qualified immunity is warranted on the plaintiff's version of the facts together with facts that are not disputed . . . . No such situation, however, is presented here. . . . To determine, then, whether or not we have jurisdiction to consider Rivera's qualified immunity claim, we must examine the grounds upon which the district court, in its order denying summary judgment, rejected Rivera's qualified immunity argument. The district court–after laying out the 'trifurcated inquiry' for determining whether qualified immunity is available to a particular defendant under § 1983 . . . and running through the first two prongs of the analysis–stated explicitly, with regard to the third prong, that '[b]ecause there remains a disputed factual issue as to whether Defendants' actions were motivated by Plaintiff's political affiliation, Defendants' motion for summary judgment on this ground is denied.'. . Clearly, then, the district court declined to enter summary judgment on Rivera's qualified immunity claim based on its determination that 'the pretrial record set[ ] forth a Agenuine" issue of fact for trial.'. . Accordingly, pursuant to Johnson and its progeny, the district court's decision regarding Rivera's qualified immunity claim may not be challenged through an interlocutory appeal.").

Olmeda v. Ortiz-Quinonez, 434 F.3d 62, 65 (1st Cir. 2006) ("Qualified immunity doctrine protects government officers and employees from suit on federal claims for damages where, in the circumstances, a reasonable official could have believed his conduct was lawful. . . The immunity is not merely from damages, but (with some qualifications) from having to endure a trial. So–as a court-made exception to the final judgment rule–immediate appeals are permitted from such denials. . . One wrinkle is that the Supreme Court has disallowed such an immediate appeal where the district court's denial of immunity rested upon its determination– whether right or wrong–that immunity turned on a disputed issue of material fact. . . Yet, whatever the district court's reasoning, immediate appellate review is still permitted if immunity is required as a matter of law regardless of how the factual issue is resolved. . . In the present case, there may well be disputed factual issues as to whether Olmeda suffered significant adverse employment action and, if so, whether this was motivated at least in part by hostility to her political affiliation. However, the defendants' main claim on appeal–that Olmeda's job is not constitutionally protected against political discrimination–does not require that any disputed factual issue be decided. To that extent, we have jurisdiction to consider defendants' claim to immunity, regardless of the district court's own reasons for denying the motion.").

Rivera-Jimenez v. Pierluisi, 362 F.3d 87, 95 (1st Cir. 2004) ("As to the third prong of the qualified immunity determination, '[t]he reasonableness inquiry is also a legal determination, although it may entail preliminary factual determinations if there are disputed material facts (which should be left to a jury).' . . In the instant appeal, the lower court determined that questions remained as to the issue of defendants' motive which precluded entry of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. Since 'pre-trial qualified immunity decisions are immediately appealable as collateral orders when the immunity claim presents a legal issue that can be decided without considering the correctness of the plaintiff's version of the facts,'. . . we cannot exercise jurisdiction over this part of the qualified immunity analysis. Doing so would entail making a determination of material facts.").

Camilo-Robles v. Zapata, 175 F.3d 41, 43-45, 47, 48 (1st Cir. 1999) ("In the supervisory liability context, the qualified immunity inquiry at times presents peculiar problems. Under prevailing jurisprudence, neither a finding of 'no liability' nor a finding of qualified immunity follows invariably upon a showing that the defendant-supervisor's conduct, in and of itself, failed directly to violate federally protected rights. Thus, in a subset of supervisory liability cases, courts facing the need to conduct a qualified immunity analysis have been compelled to go beyond the paradigmatic Harlow inquiry. This, in turn, has given rise to vexing questions of appellate jurisdiction. . . . When a plaintiff premises his section 1983 claim on allegations that the defendant-supervisor was a primary violator or direct participant in the rights-violating incident, the qualified immunity framework envisioned by Harlow and its progeny works quite well. In contrast, the framework engenders some confusion when applied to cases in which the defendant- supervisor is sued as a secondary or indirect violator. In such cases, liability attaches if a responsible official supervises, trains, or hires a subordinate with deliberate indifference toward the possibility that deficient performance of the task eventually may contribute to a civil rights deprivation. . . . In these 'neglect-of-risk' cases, confusion arises when qualified immunity is factored into the mix because we accept by hypothesis that the supervisor's actions have not, in themselves, infringed on any federally protected right. This means that, unlike the typical section 1983 case, we cannot concentrate the Harlow inquiry on the underlying right; if we did, the supervisor's qualified immunity would depend entirely on the reasonableness of the subordinate's actions, and such an approach would contravene the axiom that the actions of persons sued in their individual capacities under section 1983 must be assessed on their own terms. . . Such an approach also would frame the relevant inquiry in terms disquietingly close to those involved in the forbidden doctrine of respondeat superior. To resolve this enigma, courts consigned to struggle with neglect-of-risk cases generally have incorporated a review of the merits of derivative tort liability into the qualified immunity calculus. The ensuing analysis customarily centers around whether the supervisor's actions displayed deliberate indifference toward the rights of third parties and had some causal connection to the subsequent tort. . . To the extent that this methodology heightens the imbrication between merits and immunity inquiries, it is imperfect. . . . Nonetheless, we use the methodology because it is what our precedent (and that of almost every other circuit) requires for the performance of this type of supervisory liability/qualified immunity analysis. . . [B]ecause the standard qualified immunity framework fits neglect-of-risk cases awkwardly, . . . efforts to distinguish appealable pretrial denials of qualified immunity from non-appealable ones–always a Byzantine endeavor– become even more difficult. . . . Because of its focus on tort causation and culpability, the qualified immunity analysis in neglect-of-risk cases seldom, if ever, raises abstract questions of law about whether a right was clearly established. Moreover, the law is well-settled anent a supervisor's liability for the conduct of his subordinates. Thus, in interlocutory appeals from the denial of qualified immunity in this subset of cases, the jurisdictional question frequently falls into the gray area, compelling the appellate tribunal to decide whether the assertion of qualified immunity turns on the existence of genuine issues of material fact (which is how the plaintiff invariably will characterize the situation) or on a purely legal entitlement to surcease under the relevant causation and culpability standards, regardless of factual disputes (which is how the defendant invariably will characterize the situation). . . . In this instance, the state of the record, the standards for summary judgment, and the fact-intensive nature of derivative tort liability analysis all coalesce to bring this case squarely into the Johnson realm. Hence, we dismiss Zapata's appeal, without prejudice, for want of appellate jurisdiction.").

Camilo-Robles v. Hoyos, 151 F.3d 1, 8 (1st Cir. 1998) ("When the district court's order is unilluminating, the appellate court must fend for itself. Anticipating the dilemma that such an inscrutable order may pose in the qualified immunity context, the Court prophesied 'that a court of appeals may have to undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.'. . Hence, we must perform the equivalent of an archeological dig and endeavor to reconstruct the probable basis for the district court's decision.").

Berthiaume v. Caron, 142 F.3d 12, 15 (1st Cir. 1998) ("The genuine disputes insulated from immediate review under Johnson are those involving facts, such as what happened. Questions of law application–for example, whether a set of assumed facts add up to a constitutional violation–are not so insulated and are ordinarily subject to de novo review. . . This is equally true in deciding whether the assumed facts show a violation of 'clearly established' law.").

Diaz v. Martinez, 112 F.3d 1, 3-5 (1st Cir. 1997) ("Stella survives the emergence of Behrens fully intact and remains the law of this circuit. . . . Since Vazquez does not argue that the facts asserted by the plaintiffs, even if altogether true, fail to show deliberate indifference–he argues instead what his counsel termed at oral argument 'the absence of facts,' i.e., that the facts asserted by the plaintiffs are untrue, unproven, warrant a different spin, tell only a small part of the story, and are presented out of context–the district court's determination is not reviewable on an interlocutory appeal.").

Berdecia-Perez v. Zayas-Green, 111 F.3d 183, 184 & n.1 (1st Cir. 1997) ("To the extent that the appellants claim that their actions are insulated from First Amendment scrutiny as a matter of fact because their only intention was to obey the law, the record presents an issue of fact as to their intent–an issue of the type that can no longer be resolved on interlocutory appeal. . . . The lack of specific findings by the lower court, while not fatal to its ruling on summary judgment, . . . complicates the appellate task. Especially in light of the jurisdictional questions that attend the denial of summary judgment motions raising qualified immunity defenses, we urge the district courts, either by rescripts or bench decisions, to give us some indication of their reasoning.").

Hayes v. State of Rhode Island, 70 F.3d 1252 (Table), 1995 WL 714278, *1 (1st Cir. Dec. 4, 1995) (per curiam) ("[Defendant's] second argument on appeal is as follows: even if there was a clearly established constitutional right to be free from sex discrimination in the workplace, '[i]t cannot be said that Paradis' action was objectively unreasonable given the extraordinary circumstances confronting him.' Although cloaked as a purely legal issue, this argument is actually fact-based.The objective reasonableness of [defendant's] conduct . . . will necessarily turn on an issue of fact: whether the conduct was motivated by sex-based animus. . . .[W]e lack jurisdiction to consider the second issue.").

Carter v. Rhode Island, 68 F.3d 9, 13-14 (1st Cir. 1995) ("We can discern no permissible ground for treating the district court ruling – that there was a trialworthy issue of fact as to whether appellants harbored a discriminatory intent – as an immediately appealable law-based decision within the meaning of Johnson . . . . Johnson announces a jurisdictional rule – signaling a new day in the First Circuit [cite omitted] – and not one to be undone by recasting fact-based rulings denying summary judgment on qualified immunity defenses into law-based 'collateral orders' immediately appealable under Cohen . . . . The Johnson rule would be undermined – its important aims frustrated . . . were defendant officials, spurred by the prospect of delay and the leverage it occasions, permitted to contrive insubstantial 'issues of law' as grounds for interlocutory review.").

Stella v. Kelley, 63 F.3d 71, 74, 77-78 (1st Cir. 1995) ("The bottom line [after Johnson], then, is simply this: a summary judgment order which determines that the pretrial record sets forth a genuine issue of fact, as distinguished from an order that determines whether certain given facts demonstrate, under clearly established law, a violation of some federally protected right, is not reviewable on demand. In reaching this branch of its holding, the Court abrogated our earlier decision in Unwin v. Campbell. [cite omitted] Consequently, we acknowledge that Unwin and its progeny are no longer good law. . . . We lack jurisdiction to review, on an interlocutory basis, the district court's finding that there is a genuine factual dispute regarding a substantive element of the plaintiffs' constitutional claim, namely, the selectmen's actual motivation in removing the plaintiffs from office.").

Lowinger v. Broderick, 50 F.3d 61, 64 (1st Cir. 1995) ("This Court, time and again, has heeded the Supreme Court's instructions in this area and exercised jurisdiction over such appeals, including appeals from district courts that had concluded that there were genuine issues of material fact, and, on several occasions, this Court has reversed the denial of summary judgment. [cites omitted] . . . . The central question presented by this appeal is whether the district court properly concluded that the record demonstrated genuine issues of material fact regarding [defendant's] entitlement to immunity and, therefore, that [defendant] was not entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law.").

Buenrostro v. Collazo, 973 F.2d 39, 44 (1st Cir. 1992) ("Qualified immunity is... an affirmative defense, and the 'right' to have it determined in an intermediate appeal can be waived if it is not properly asserted below.").

Prokey v. Watkins, 942 F.2d 67 (1st Cir. 1991) ("...Mitchell and its progeny did not alter the traditional roles of the judge and jury in cases involving qualified immunity. In Mitchell, the Court emphasized that 'the appealable issue is a purely legal one: whether the facts alleged ...support a claim of violation of clearly established law.'[cite omitted] Once a party has obtained at the interlocutory stage the fullest review feasible on qualified immunity viewed as a 'purely legal' question, the action should proceed to trial, following a normal course.").

SECOND CIRCUIT

National Rifle Association of America v. Vullo, No. 21-636-CV, 2022 WL 4372194, at *6-7 (2d Cir. Sept. 22, 2022) ("[A] decision is not insulated from review simply because the district court declared that genuine issues of fact exist. . . 'Rather, where a district court denies a defendant qualified immunity, there is appellate jurisdiction over that defendant's interlocutory appeal if the defendant contests the existence of a dispute or the materiality as a matter of law, or contends that he is entitled to qualified immunity even under the plaintiff's version of the facts.'. . Here, Vullo certainly contests the existence of material issues of fact and contends as well that she is entitled to qualified immunity even under the NRA's version of the facts. At a minimum, we have jurisdiction to determine whether she is right. . . . We have recognized the following as 'strictly legal' questions reviewable on interlocutory appeal: (1) whether the plaintiff sufficiently pleaded the violation of a constitutional right and (2) whether, at the time of the alleged violation, the defendant's actions, as alleged by the plaintiff, violated clearly established law. . . Here, the district court concluded that 'a question of material fact exist[ed] as to whether Ms. Vullo explicitly threatened Lloyd's with DFS enforcement if the entity did not disassociate with the NRA,' . . . but Vullo has made clear in her briefs on appeal that she accepts the well-pleaded facts of the Complaint for purposes of the appeal. While she first argues that the Complaint alleges only conclusions and characterizations, which she need not accept as true, she assumes in the alternative that the Complaint alleges that she met with the Lloyd's executives and offered leniency in exchange for help advancing her policy goals and incorporates that allegation into her merits argument. Moreover, she does not dispute what she said in the Guidance Letters, the Press Release, or the Consent Decrees, or that she oversaw the investigation; the public record captures her words and actions in those respects. She thus accepts the facts as alleged, and we may consider her qualified immunity defense based on these assumed facts. Hence, we have jurisdiction over this appeal, and we turn to the merits.")

Franco v. Gunsalus, 972 F.3d 170, 174-76 (2d Cir. 2020) ("One may question whether in some circumstances a trial court's decision concerning the sufficiency of the evidence is so clearly wrong as to constitute a legal error and thus be appealable. And the Supreme Court itself may not always have given clear guidance as to this issue. . . Our court, however, has seemingly routinely followed Johnson's rule and has observed, '[t]he Supreme Court has made it clear that we lack appellate jurisdiction to decide an interlocutory appeal from a district court's denial of a claim of qualified immunity to the extent that the denial involves only a question of evidence sufficiency.'. . In the case before us, the defendant officers do not argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity on the basis of stipulated facts or on the facts that Franco alleges are true. . . Nor does this appeal on its face seem to raise a 'purely legal question.'. . Indeed, the only possible legal issue before us is whether the district court here erred as a matter of law when it concluded that a genuine dispute of material fact existed as to 'whether Defendant Gunsalus gave verbal commands to disperse prior to his arresting Plaintiff' and therefore 'whether there was probable cause for that arrest.'. .The officers attempt to shoehorn the record into one that would confer jurisdiction by arguing that Franco does not dispute that a dispersal order was given, only that he did not hear such an order. But Franco clearly did assert that no order was given. . . And the only practical way in which Franco could support that assertion and challenge whether Officer Gunsalus gave a dispersal order was to testify, as he did, that he did not hear such an order. Elijah, who was sitting in the car's front passenger seat, testified to the same effect. Furthermore, during his deposition, Franco was asked whether, while he was standing next to his friend's car, 'a police officer was walking towards you and told you to leave the area.'. . Franco responded in the negative, thereby denying that he was told to leave. Had Franco entirely failed to allege that no dispersal order was given, that would be a different matter. But the record assures us that this is not the case here. As the district court recognized, by offering evidence that no dispersal order was heard under circumstances where such an order would have been heard had one been given, Franco both asserted that no order was given and created a genuine dispute of a material fact as to whether one had, in fact, been given. As a general matter, it would make little sense to require percipient witnesses to testify not only that they did not hear a dispersal order given but also to testify (as against merely asserting) that no such order was given. Indeed, we struggle to imagine what evidence Franco could have summoned to controvert defendants' testimony that a dispersal order was given other than the testimony that neither he nor Elijah heard a dispersal order. Defendants argue that we should follow the approach employed in Muschette on Behalf of A.M. v. Gionfriddo, 910 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 2018), where the court focused on evidence demonstrating that there was a reasonable basis for the defendant officer to believe that an order was given, rather than heard. In Muschette, the parents of A.M., a 12-year-old student who is deaf and communicates primarily in American Sign Language, argued that the defendant officer used excessive force when he tased A.M. after a confrontation with a teacher at a school. . . But in that case, the plaintiffs did not dispute that the officer actually gave verbal instructions and warnings to A.M. . . .Accordingly, the district court did not err as a matter of law when it determined that plaintiffs' testimony establishes a genuine issue of material fact as to whether an order was given, and it is properly up to a jury—not a court of appeals—to determine whether to believe that testimony. . . Defendants also argue that the relevant question is the officers' perception, rather than Franco's—in other words, whether there is enough evidence that a reasonable officer would have believed that other officers gave a dispersal order in a manner that Franco would have heard. And were we to conclude that appellate jurisdiction lies, we would indeed have to consider whether the officers had 'arguable probable cause' to arrest Franco. . . This in turn would involve determining whether '(a) it was objectively reasonable for the officer[s] to believe that probable cause existed, or (b) officers of reasonable competence could disagree on whether the probable cause test was met.'. . But defendants have not argued that even if no dispersal order was given, the circumstances were such that a reasonable officer would have believed that such an order was made so that the defendants had arguable probable cause to arrest Franco. . . For all these reasons, the district court did not err by concluding that genuine issues of material fact remain to be resolved at trial. Its decision therefore is not properly appealable.")

Reyes v. Fischer, 934 F.3d 97, 105-06 (2d Cir. 2019) ("While this Court has confronted the question of administratively imposed PRS a number of times, Hassell was the first of these appeals in which a judgment had been entered awarding damages to a prisoner. . Hassell was also the first appeal that presented the question of whether PRS that is administratively imposed prior to the expiration of a determinate sentence violates due process. . . .In this case, there are unresolved factual questions as to whether the conditions of administratively imposed PRS are more onerous than those of conditional release. In Hassell, this Court found that the plaintiff had not presented any evidence that the conditions of administratively imposed PRS were in fact more onerous than the conditions of conditional release. And in this case, the defendants contend that the conditions are no more onerous. Unlike in Hassell, the parties have not yet conducted discovery with respect to the question of whether Reyes's PRS conditions were in fact more onerous than the conditions of conditional release would have been. . . The district court framed that question only as one of damages, rather than one of liability, and in that regard, the district court's order is inconsistent with Hassell, which made clear that the 'more onerous' standard is not only a question of damages, but also one of liability. . . .Whether the two forms of supervision are equivalent is a question of fact that this Court lacks jurisdiction to decide on an interlocutory appeal. . .Factual questions that are crucial to the disposition of the defendants' qualified immunity defense remain -- specifically how the conditions of Reyes's PRS compare to those that would have been imposed under conditional release. We therefore must dismiss, for lack of jurisdiction, that part of the appeal that concerns the period of time during which Reyes would have been subject to conditional release.")

Reyes v. Fischer, 934 F.3d 97, 107-10 (2d Cir. 2019) (Hall, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Unlike the majority, I would hold that we have appellate jurisdiction to decide the defendants' interlocutory appeal from the district court's determination that they are not entitled to qualified immunity. I would then affirm that determination in toto and thus return the case to the district court for further proceedings. I part company with the majority when it concludes that factual issues concerning whether the conditions of Reyes's post-release supervision ("PRS") were more onerous than the conditions to which she would have otherwise been subjected on conditional release preclude interlocutory appellate jurisdiction. . . .The wrinkle here, which causes the divergence between the majority and me, is that absent the unlawfully imposed PRS term, Reyes would still have been subjected to a term of conditional release until the November 27, 2008 expiration of her determinate sentences. The majority reads this to raise issues of material fact concerning whether the conditions of Reyes's PRS were more onerous than those of conditional release would have been. . . Relying on our decision in Hassell v. Fischer, 879 F.3d 41 (2d Cir. 2018), the majority has determined that these issues deprive us of jurisdiction to answer the qualified-immunity question because, in the majority's view, only if the conditions of PRS were harsher than those of conditional release would Reyes suffer a cognizable due process violation. . . I do not disagree that factual issues here persist. In my view, however, those issues go to whether Reyes can demonstrate damages as a result of the due process violation already inflicted, not to whether she has suffered a deprivation of due process in the first instance. 'Because the right to procedural due process is "absolute" in the sense that it does not depend upon the merits of a claimant's substantive assertions, and because of the importance to organized society that procedural due process be observed, ... the denial of due process should be actionable for nominal damages without proof of actual injury.'. . The majority sidesteps these principles by relying on language from our recent decision in Hassell, in which we addressed, among other things, these same defendants' qualified immunity for the period between Hassell's release and the expiration of his determinate sentence. To be sure, there we said that 'Hassell has made no showing that the conditions of his PRS term were in any respect more onerous than those of conditional release would have been. Without any showing of an adverse consequence during [the relevant period], Hassell has not suffered a denial of his due process rights during that period.'. . The majority reads this language as having imposed a 'more onerous' requirement on claims for deprivation of due process related to PRS imposed and enforced before the expiration of a term of imprisonment. Hassell admittedly is susceptible to the reading attributed to it by the majority. But Hassell sends mixed signals. . . .These conflicting signals do create some uncertainty as to the contours of a due process claim arising from administratively imposed PRS, uncertainty that the majority does not directly acknowledge. While the majority's holding is certainly a reasonable resolution of this uncertainty, I would not resolve the issue in this manner without facing it head on. And facing it head on, I see no support in our precedent for imposing this new requirement: Hassell does not purport to add anything new, and without a much clearer indication than it presents, I would not assume it did so. Further, because the reading the majority gives Hassell is fundamentally at odds with Hassell's reasoning and structure, I must conclude that Hassell in fact did not intend to impose any 'more onerous' requirement on PSR claims like the one at issue here. . .The admittedly persisting factual issues identified by the majority go to Reyes's ability to demonstrate damages, not to whether her claim is cognizable on appeal of a qualified-immunity challenge and not to whether we thus lack appellate jurisdiction to review that challenge. Determining that we do have jurisdiction to consider that challenge on appeal, I, would affirm in full the district court's denial of qualified immunity. Functionally, the result reached by the majority is the same here: this case will proceed. But I would ensure that a future case does not stumble needlessly, and perhaps with a more deleterious result, over this issue. I concur in part and dissent in part.")

Mara v. Rilling, 921 F.3d 48, 68 (2d Cir. 2019) ("Mara argues that this court lacks jurisdiction to review defendants' qualified immunity claim because it does not present a purely legal question in light of the material disputes of fact identified by the district court. . . He is wrong. Even in such circumstances, we have jurisdiction to review a qualified immunity claim if that review is limited to undisputed facts and plaintiff's version of any disputed facts, which are accepted for purposes of the appeal. . . Because we so limit our review here, Mara's jurisdictional challenge fails.")

Marrero for the Estate of Morales v. Cote, No. 17-4009-CV, 2019 WL 994521 (2d Cir. Mar. 1, 2019) (not reported) ("Cote presses several theories for our jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal. First, he contends that 'there exists a question of law as to whether the district court correctly applied a totality of circumstances analysis in ruling that there were disputed issues of material facts.'. . He also asserts that '[a]nother question of law presented is whether the district court established a factual basis for its legal conclusion that the other officers on [the] scene were not in danger at the time [he] acted.'. . Despite Cote's attempt to couch them as 'questions of law,' his arguments really pertain to the district court's finding that there exists a material dispute of fact, precluding a grant of qualified immunity on summary judgment. . . Accordingly, Cote's challenges are not immediately appealable and must therefore be dismissed. We likewise lack jurisdiction to entertain Cote's argument that the law was not clearly established such that he would have known his conduct violated Morales's rights. The district court concluded that Cowan ex rel. Estate of Cooper v. Breen, 352 F.3d 756 (2d Cir. 2003), clearly established that Cote's conduct, as a jury could find it to have been on the record evidence taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, would constitute excessive force under the Fourth Amendment unless 'he reasonably believed at the moment he fired at [Morales] that [Morales] posed a significant threat of death or serious physical harm' to Cote or the other officers[.] . . That question, concerning Cote's reasonable belief at the time of the shooting, is the very one with respect to which the district court found genuine disputes of material fact. Cote does not contest that this is the proper question. He argues instead that Cowan is factually distinguishable. But although Cote purports to base his argument on Morales's version of the facts, so as to allow for interlocutory review, 'his brief on appeal is replete with his own version of events.'. . For instance, Cote insists that Morales attempted to flee 'at a high rate of speed, in close proxim[ity] to Cote and other officers' and that 'Morales may have struck Officer Medina as the Honda sped away.'. . Both of these 'facts' were disputed, and even Cote was unable to testify as to the exact location of Officer Medina during the incident. We therefore lack jurisdiction to review Cote's 'clearly established' challenge. In ruling as we have, we express no opinion as to the proper resolution of the disputed facts here or whether Cote will ultimately be entitled to qualified immunity based on a jury's determination of these facts.")

Brown v. Halpin, 885 F.3d 111, 117-18 (2d Cir. 2018) ("The defendants contest the district court's interpretation of Jackler. We need not reach this question, however, because at this stage factual disputes preclude resolution of whether Halpin is entitled to qualified immunity. With regard to the first category of speech, Halpin argues that Brown was not ordered to make 'false' statements because reasonable people can disagree as to the meaning of the relevant Connecticut statutes and Yelmini, the alleged mastermind behind the fraudulent scheme, believed that the 'own occupation' standard was accurate. . . .While it may be true that Yelmini honestly believed that retirees are entitled to benefits under Connecticut law if they cannot perform their 'own occupation,' this conclusion is not evident on the face of the pleadings. The question of whether Halpin is entitled to qualified immunity is accordingly not a pure question of law that can be decided on interlocutory appeal because it depends on the resolution of a factual dispute: whether the proposed revisions to Brown's memoranda were false. We likewise find that factual disputes preclude determination at this time as to whether Brown's second category of speech, her statements to the Auditors, was protected. In order to be entitled to First Amendment protection, a public employee must show, among other factors, that he or she 'spoke as a citizen.'. . . The question of whether one was speaking pursuant to official job duties is 'largely a question of law for the court.'. . However, this legal analysis is informed by factual considerations. . . Here, although Brown alleges that speaking to the Auditors was outside of her job responsibilities, Halpin insists that Brown spoke 'with the state auditors because she was in an official position that required ... her to do so[.]' . . A factual determination on this point is accordingly 'a necessary predicate to ... whether immunity is a bar,'. . and Brown's written job responsibilities are sufficiently ambiguous that we cannot resolve this dispute at this phase of the litigation. We must thus dismiss Halpin's appeal.")

Soto v. Gaudett, 862 F.3d 148, 156-62 (2d Cir. 2017) ("For the reasons that follow, we conclude that, given the pertinent allegations in the complaint, the district court erred in failing to apply the fleeing-suspect principle to Csech and should have granted his qualified-immunity-based motion for summary judgment. With regard to Stepniewski and Robinson, we lack jurisdiction to entertain their appeals, because the district court denied their motions on the ground that there were genuine issues of material fact to be resolved before their entitlement to qualified immunity could be known, and because the record, when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, does not entitle them to qualified immunity as a matter of law. The appeals by the City and Gaudett in his official capacity--entities to which principles of qualified immunity are inapposite--are also dismissed for lack of appellate jurisdiction. . . .Thus, 'after the denial of the defendants' motions for summary judgment, "we have jurisdiction to review a denial of qualified immunity to the extent it can be resolved on stipulated facts, or on the facts that the plaintiff alleges are true, or on the facts favorable to the plaintiff that the trial judge concluded the jury might find."' 'What we may not do, after Johnson and Behrens, is entertain an interlocutory appeal in which a defendant contends that the district court committed an error of law in ruling that the plaintiff's evidence was sufficient to create a jury issue on the facts relevant to the defendant's immunity defense.'. . . There is . . . no dispute as to the fact that when Csech shot Soto with his taser, Soto was fleeing. As the district court noted, no precedent as of January 23, 2008, established that a suspect who was fleeing had a right not to be stopped by means of a taser. There being no remaining material facts to be determined with respect to the excessive force claim against Csech, the undisputed fact that Soto was fleeing when Csech tased him was therefore dispositive. Csech should have been granted summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, dismissing this claim against him. . . .In light of [the] evidence, a rational juror could find that, when Stepniewski and Robinson fired their tasers, Soto had never given any indication of possessing a weapon and was not fleeing; that Soto was on the ground, completely entangled in taser wires . . . struggling even to get into a push-up position; and that with Stepniewski and Robinson in such close proximity to Soto in those circumstances, the firing of their tasers constituted objectively unreasonable use of force. The district court's ruling that the evidence, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, was sufficient to create triable issues relevant the entitlement of Stepniewski and Robinson to qualified immunity is not immediately appealable. . . .Robinson's own statements support an inference that his cruiser struck Soto. And the revisions of that aspect of his earliest statements may cast doubt on the credibility of his assertions that his collision with Soto was accidental. The district court's ruling that the record evidence is sufficient to require a trial on these issues affecting the applicability of the accidental-contact principle is not immediately appealable.")

Gardner v. Murphy, 613 F. App'x 40, 43-44 (2d Cir. 2015) ("In resolving this appeal, we do not reach several questions as a result of the limits on our jurisdiction. First, we lack jurisdiction to review whether there is in fact a 'genuine' factual dispute regarding the extent of Gardner's deprivation of exercise or the adequacy of the defendants' proffered safety justification or of their consideration of feasible alternatives. . . Second, because we must 'disregard any disputed facts or facts that contradict [Gardner's] version of events,'. . . we do not resolve the factual disputes necessary to decide the merits of Gardner's underlying constitutional claim. As a result, we do not consider whether the defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity if there were in fact an adequate safety justification for imposing the exercise-restraint policy on Gardner. We similarly lack jurisdiction to determine Gardner's entitlement to equitable relief, which does not depend on the defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity.")

Taylor v. Rogich, 781 F.3d 647, 648-50 (2d Cir. 2015) ("This appeal comes to us in an unusual posture. The district court did not certify this appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). Rather, Rogich asserts that we have jurisdiction to hear this appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, which permits appeals from 'final decisions' of the district courts. As we have had occasion to observe, '[t]ypically, an interlocutory appeal from a district court's denial of a claim of qualified immunity is brought after the district court denies the claim at the pleading stage or upon denial of the defendant's motion for summary judgment based on the plaintiff's, or an agreed upon, version of the facts.'. . The present appeal comes to us after a trial on the issue of liability and before a determination of the issue of damages. Moreover, it challenges the denial of a motion pursuant to Rule 50 on the ground that the defendant was entitled to judgment as a matter of law in his favor because the jury was obligated to credit his version of the events, which he argues compels the conclusion that he was entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The present case differs from Britt because the defendant's appeal challenges the sufficiency of the evidence relied on by the jury. Indeed, the order from which he appeals, as we previously observed, specifically rejected his argument that 'when his version of events is credited, the Court must enter judgment as a matter of law in favor of the Defendant, Keith Rogich.' That is simply another way of arguing that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the jury's verdict. The Supreme Court has made it clear that we lack appellate jurisdiction to decide an interlocutory appeal from a district court's denial of a claim of qualified immunity to the extent that the denial involves only a question of evidence sufficiency. . . Although the issue normally arises, as in Johnson, on interlocutory appeals from summary judgment motions, we see no reason why the rule should differ in cases where the appeal is from a decision denying a Rule 50 motion for judgment as a matter of law, rendered following the liability phase of a bifurcated trial. Indeed, the burden facing a defendant at that stage, who faces only a short trial on the issue of damages in which his conduct is not directly at issue, is considerably less than that on a defendant who claims entitlement to summary judgment, which would prevent an entire trial. We note that the Seventh Circuit has held that, in some circumstances, denials of Rule 50 motions may not be appealable even when they raise solely issues of law. In Mercado v. Dart, 604 F.3d 360, 363 (7th Cir.2010) (Easterbrook, J.), after the jury returned a verdict on the issue of liability but before the presentation of evidence about damages, the defendant filed a notice of appeal for the purpose of challenging the jury's rejection of his claim of immunity. . . In the course of resolving the appeal, Judge Easterbrook wrote that, even if it involved solely an issue of law, different considerations of policy were present in such a mid-trial appeal than were present in a post-trial appeal after a jury was discharged. . . . The trial in this case was never intended to be a unitary trial which was disrupted by a mid-trial appeal on the issue of qualified immunity. The trial on liability ended on June 4, 2013. The presiding judge then invited written elaborations of the parties' positions on qualified immunity. The briefing extended through the summer and fall of 2013, and the judge decided the motion, in an extensive written opinion, on January 2, 2014. Thus, unlike the situation addressed by Judge Easterbrook, there was no oral ruling on a mid-trial motion, intended as a mere step along the way to a verdict. Any disruption of the possibility of a smooth progression to the damages phase of the trial had already occurred, quite independent of the appealability of the judge's eventual decision on the qualified immunity motion. Similarly, there was no mid-trial disruption in Britt. There, the case was tried to verdict on both the issue of liability and damages. . . The order granting a new trial, from which the appeal was taken, was entered after the jury had been discharged. . . In sum, while we have had occasion to distinguish this case from other cases that would pose a problem of a mid-trial disruption occasioned by a mid-trial appeal, we leave open the question of whether an interlocutory appeal in such a case would lie even if it were based purely on an issue of law. Because the appeal in this case is based on the sufficiency of the evidence, we hold only that such an appeal on qualified immunity grounds must be dismissed. . . Accordingly, for the reasons stated above, the appeal is DISMISSED for lack of appellate jurisdiction.")

Raspardo v. Carlone, 770 F.3d 97, 112 (2d Cir. 2014) ("The individual defendants here contend that, even when all disputed factual issues are resolved in favor of the plaintiffs, they are entitled to qualified immunity. We thus need not resolve any disputed facts or weigh the sufficiency of the evidence as prohibited by Jones, 515 U.S. at 319–20, to determine if the plaintiffs suffered actionable sexual harassment or disparate treatment. Whether the defendants' conduct, as examined by viewing the evidence presented at summary judgment in a light favorable to the plaintiffs, violated the plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment rights to equal protection (through sexual harassment or disparate treatment) is a question of law. We therefore have appellate jurisdiction

McColley v. County of Rensselaer, 740 F.3d 817, 825, 826 (2d Cir. 2014) ("A confidential informant's credibility is plainly relevant—even critical—to the probable cause determination, and thus the fact that surveillance provided no evidence or even suggestion of criminal activity should have been included in the warrant affidavit. Just as with the omission of McColley's identity, the omission of the unsuccessful surveillance altered the 'totality of the circumstances' under which the information provided by the CI should have been assessed. And just as with the omission of McColley's identity, the weight that an issuing magistrate would have given to this information is a question for the finder of fact. . . The dissent's insistence on the existence of arguable probable cause does not alter our analysis. Arguable probable cause, a doctrine imported into this Circuit's corrected affidavit jurisprudence in Escalera, . . . exists if '(a) it was objectively reasonable for the officer to believe that probable cause existed, or (b) officers of reasonable competence could disagree on whether the probable cause test was met.'. . The dissent conflates the questions of facts regarding the CI's credibility with that of whether reasonable officers could disagree as to the existence of probable cause. Questions of fact exist in this case with respect to the reliability of the CI's information regarding 396 First Street. Whether reasonable officers would disagree on whether there was probable cause is equally dependent on the questions of fact previously identified. If the CI's information regarding McColley's home was not reliable, then reasonable officers would not disagree as to the lack of probable cause. The dissent would have the doctrine of arguable probable cause swallow the entire rule of qualified immunity as well as the related limitation on our jurisdiction. This cannot be. The information omitted from the warrant application was indeed 'necessary to the finding of probable cause' because both McColley's identity and the lack of criminal activity observed at her home go directly to the 'totality of circumstances' review that underlies the assessment of probable cause based upon information provided by confidential informants. The Appellants would have this Court conclude that once information has been provided by a confidential informant who has proven reliable in the past, a warrant is necessarily supported by probable cause when based upon information from that confidential informant. This view misapprehends the 'totality of circumstances' test—in assessing whether there is probable cause based upon a confidential informant's reports, courts must look to all of the circumstances bearing upon the information's reliability. . . .In this case, McColley's identity, the fact that the CI did not report that a woman was present in the apartment . . . and the fact that attempts at independent corroboration via surveillance showed no sign of criminal activity are all omissions that bear upon the reliability of the overall information provided. While we share the concerns raised in the concurrence with respect to the particularly intrusive method of entry used in this case, . . . issues of fact underlie the weight that the issuing judge would have given the omitted information regardless of the method of entry employed. As such, this case lies outside of the jurisdiction of this Court to perform interlocutory review of the denial of summary judgment. The issue of qualified immunity, including the question of reasonableness as to the type of warrant sought and used, is not properly before us at this stage of the proceedings. . . . For all of the reasons discussed above, the appeal is dismissed for a lack of jurisdiction.")

McColley v. County of Rensselaer, 740 F.3d 817, 826, 827, 831, 832, 836, 837 (2d Cir. 2014) (Calabresi, J., concurring) ("Despite the fact that they reach opposite conclusions, my colleagues' opinions both find strong support in our Court's case law. This is because our precedents in this area are as divided as our panel. Judge Pooler would send this case to a jury, having identified a question of fact: the weight a neutral magistrate would give to evidence omitted from Investigator Michael Riley's warrant affidavit. The existence of such a fact question strips us of jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal. Judge Raggi would instead dismiss Plaintiff Ronita McColley's Fourth Amendment claim against Riley. She would do so either because an affidavit, even without the omissions, would still have established probable cause for the search of McColley's home, or, alternatively, because some reasonable people might find that such probable cause would have been established. This would, in turn, suffice to give rise to 'arguable probable cause,' which, she asserts, would result in qualified immunity for Riley. This latter scenario, in which some would and others would not find probable cause on the basis of the corrected affidavit, is, of course, precisely what Judge Pooler describes as a factual dispute about the weight of the omitted evidence. But while Judge Pooler concludes that such a dispute strips us of jurisdiction, Judge Raggi sees it as a basis for granting Riley qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . .Since a question of fact exists, I join Judge Pooler's judgment that we lack jurisdiction to hear this qualified immunity appeal. In other words: because the issue of whether a warrant for an unannounced invasion of McColley's apartment would have issued had Riley provided in his warrant affidavit all the information he had requires the resolution of factual questions, I join Judge Pooler in concluding we do not have jurisdiction, and that this case ought to be returned to the district court for a jury trial. . . . On the one hand, some of our cases do say that determining the weight a magistrate would give omitted evidence is a question of fact. And that question eludes summary judgment if, but only if, reasonable factfinders could disagree about the answer—that is, about whether probable cause would still be found. Yet, if reasonable people disagree about the existence of probable cause, then arguable probable cause has, by definition, been established under others of our cases! Since arguable probable cause exists whenever reasonable people disagree about the existence of actual probable cause, no case of this sort should ever go to a jury. Either a court will decide probable cause (one way or the other) as a matter of law, or the court will find that probable cause is open to reasonable dispute and will on that basis dismiss the case, again as a matter of law, on qualified immunity grounds. But, to continue around the circle of our cases, this, of course, conflicts with the clear holding of Velardi that doubtful cases' must be sent to a jury. . . .By identifying, as I believe I have, this conflict in our cases, I do not mean to suggest that one side, rather than the other, is the 'correct' one. It is only to say that we are dealing with two confusing, and at times confused, lines of cases. Our Court would do well to provide clarity in this area. But the task is not an easy one, and, in any event, this case does not require us—and thus does not allow us—to undertake it. We need not resolve the tension I have described because the only question this case requires us to confront—whether the particular warrant that was granted still would have issued had the affidavit been more complete—can be easily answered, I believe, under either line of our case law. . . .In light of the fact that there is conflicting evidence on whether the officers had a particularized belief—as against only the generalized conjecture that drug traffickers typically have firearms—that Sport, Stink, and Chuck were armed, there is indisputably a question of fact on an important issue. And that question precludes summary judgment and deprives us of jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal. . . .This disputed and material question of fact is enough for me to conclude that summary judgment was inappropriate under either line of this Circuit's cases and, therefore, to join Judge Pooler's holding that we have no jurisdiction over the issue of qualified immunity at this time, and that this case must return to the district court for further proceedings, and possibly proceed to trial.") McColley v. County of Rensselaer, 740 F.3d 817, 837, 838, 845-47, 851 (2d Cir. Jan. 21, 2014) (Raggi, J., dissenting) ("My colleagues Judges Pooler and Calabresi conclude, albeit for different reasons, that we lack jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal from a denial of qualified immunity. Judge Pooler thinks that certain omissions from defendant Michael Riley's affidavit in support of a search warrant for premises inhabited by plaintiff Ronita McColley raise questions of fact as to probable cause to search at all. Judge Calabresi thinks the omissions undermine authorization to conduct the search on a 'no knock' basis. I respectfully disagree with both conclusions. . . . Upon review of a corrected affidavit, I identify no material question of fact as to the existence of probable cause to search or reasonable suspicion to do so on a no-knock basis, much less any dispute as to the existence of arguable probable cause or reasonable suspicion. Accordingly, I would exercise jurisdiction and order that judgment be entered in favor of Riley on grounds of qualified immunity. . . . [O]n the totality of circumstances presented in the corrected affidavit, I conclude that probable cause to search was so plainly established as a matter of law as to admit no genuine issue of fact as to whether a judge would issue the requested warrants. . . . [E]ven if the corrected affidavit does not state probable cause as a matter of law—which I submit it does—it certainly provides 'an objective basis to support arguable probable cause.'. . Because the existence of arguable probable cause renders any factual disputes arising out of omitted information 'not material to the issue of qualified immunity,' I respectfully submit that the inability to discern what weight a judge might give the omitted information in making a probable cause determination is immaterial to qualified immunity. . . see also Velardi v. Walsh, 40 F.3d at 573 ("[P]laintiffs may not unwrap a public officer's cloak of immunity from suit simply by alleging even meritorious factual disputes relating to probable cause, when those controversies are nevertheless not material to the ultimate resolution of the immunity issue." (internal quotation marks omitted)). In the absence of a material factual dispute as to Riley's entitlement to qualified immunity on McColley's probable cause challenge, I respectfully submit that we have jurisdiction to award him summary judgment. . . . For the reasons stated in the preceding section, I think we must conclude that Riley had at least arguable reasonable suspicion to think that evidence would be destroyed and officers would be in danger if they knocked and announced their presence before entering the four apartments, including the First Street apartment, associated with the targets of the drug trafficking then under investigation. . . .In sum, based on the particularized information in the corrected affidavit detailed in this opinion, as well as our own case law, it cannot be said that Riley was 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowingly violate[d] the law' in concluding that reasonable suspicion of danger and evidence destruction supported a no-knock entry into the First Street apartment. . . To conclude, because I am convinced that the challenged search warrant is supported, as a matter of law, by both probable cause to search the First Street apartment and reasonable suspicion to do so on a no-knock basis—or at least by arguable probable cause and arguable reasonable suspicion—I respectfully dissent from the decision to dismiss this case for lack of jurisdiction. I would instead enter judgment in favor of Riley on the ground of qualified immunity.")

Stansbury v. Wertman, 721 F.3d 84, 89 (2d Cir. 2013) ("We may exercise pendent jurisdiction to decide whether Stansbury 'has alleged a constitutional violation at all' before deciding whether Wertman is shielded by qualified immunity. . . Although it is no longer required, see Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009), the probable cause inquiry may precede any inquiry into qualified immunity because there cannot be an allegation of a constitutional violation where probable cause justifies an arrest and prosecution. . . In this case, it is 'beneficial,'. . . to first address whether Wertman had probable cause, because it best serves the interests of judicial economy. . . . Thus, because the probable cause inquiry is inextricably intertwined with the immunity question, we will exercise our 'discretion[ ][to] consider otherwise nonappealable issues' based on our review of the question of qualified immunity.")

Winfield v. Trottier, 710 F.3d 49, 53, 54 (2d Cir. 2013) ("As there are no disputed facts in this case, Plaintiffs' argument is essentially that an appeals court lacks jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal that turns on a determination of reasonableness. But in other contexts, courts hold that reasonableness may be a question of law when the facts are undisputed. . . .Plaintiffs fail to cite a single case holding that an appellate court lacks jurisdiction to review a ruling on qualified immunity when the facts are undisputed.")

Clubside, Inc. v. Valentin, 468 F.3d 144, 161 (2d Cir. 2006) (as amended) ("In some instances, we have discretion to review pendent appeals by parties who are not entitled to immediate appellate review if they raise issues that are necessary to ensure meaningful review of the immediately appealable issues or are inextricably intertwined with the appealable issues. . . . Simply put, if a claim fails as to the individual defendants because there was no violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights, then it necessarily fails as to the municipality as well. Here, we have concluded that the individual board members are entitled to qualified immunity on Clubside's substantive due process claim because they did not violate Clubside's substantive due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. It is therefore not possible for Wallkill to be held liable on this claim. Exercising our pendent appellate jurisdiction, we hold that Clubside's substantive due process claim against Wallkill should be dismissed.").

Skehan v. Village of Mamaroneck, 465 F.3d 96, 112 (2d Cir. 2006) ("Thus, where a court grants summary judgment to the individual defendants based on their qualified immunity on the grounds that the defendants did not violate the plaintiffs' constitutional rights, and that ruling necessarily forecloses a finding of municipal liability, a court may exercise its pendent appellate jurisdiction and reverse the denial of the municipality's summary judgment motion, as well. . . This is such a case: our decision that plaintiffs' claim against the Board cannot proceed necessarily disposes of the claim against the Village.").

Demoret v. Zegarelli, 451 F.3d 140, 152 (2d Cir. 2006)("Where the standards for finding a violation under other statutes are the same as those for finding a constitutional violation under § 1983, and we premise a finding of qualified immunity on the fact that no individual defendant violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights, liability under statutes other than § 1983 also tends to be inextricably intertwined with the qualified immunity question. Finally, where a municipality's liability arises solely from the actions of an employee who is entitled to qualified immunity, we may, in our discretion, reach the liability of the municipality under the doctrine of pendent appellate jurisdiction.").

Holeman v. Ctiy of New London, 425 F.3d 184, 192, 193 (2d Cir. 2005) ("The question whether the police have qualified immunity for a use of deadly force is likewise governed by the standard of objective reasonableness. . . The district court held that there are genuine issues of material facts regarding whether Darrel Holeman complied with the police officers' commands and whether he possessed the silver handgun. The extent of any compliance would be immaterial if Holeman drew a handgun, however, and the district court does not point to record evidence supporting the Plaintiffs-Appellees' theory that the silver handgun was planted by the police (no such evidence jumps out). . . But we lack jurisdiction to review the district court's ruling with respect to the use of deadly force because the ruling is premised on the genuineness of a dispute about a material fact. In an interlocutory appeal of a qualified immunity claim, where the parties dispute material facts, the issue of whether there is sufficient evidence to support plaintiff's version of the material facts is within the province of the district court. . . We therefore dismiss the appeal with respect to Officer Garcia's use of deadly force. . . . As to the post-shooting use of force, the district court likewise concluded that material facts were genuinely in dispute–i.e., whether Holeman possessed the silver handgun and whether he presented a continued threat after being shot–and therefore the court denied summary judgment. We lack jurisdiction to review that ruling for the same reason we lack jurisdiction to review the denial of summary judgment on the use of deadly force. For the foregoing reasons: as to the initial traffic stop and the attempted pat-down, we direct that summary judgment be entered in favor of defendants; as to the use of deadly force and use of post-shooting deadly force, we dismiss this appeal for lack of jurisdiction.").

Sadallah v. City of Utica, 383 F.3d 34, 39 (2d Cir. 2004) ("Normally, we would not have jurisdiction to consider plaintiffs' claims against the City because only the issue of Hanna's entitlement to qualified immunity was immediately appealable. When, however, an appellate court 'has taken jurisdiction over one issue in a case, it may, in its discretion, exercise jurisdiction over an independent but related question that is inextricably intertwined with the [appealable issue] or is necessary to ensure meaningful review of that issue.' . . Here, plaintiffs' 'stigma plus' claim against the City is 'inextricably intertwined with' the issue of Hanna's qualified immunity, because plaintiffs' entire case against the City is based on precisely the same argument that we rejected in finding for Hanna on the qualified immunity issue. Accordingly, we may dispose of plaintiffs' claims against the City. Because they have not established a 'plus' sufficient to maintain a 'stigma plus' claim, plaintiffs' due process claim against the City must be dismissed.").

Loria v. Gorman, 306 F.3d 1271, 1280 (2d Cir. 2002) ("The critical issue is whether the interlocutory appeal raises purely legal issues. Once a defendant asserting qualified immunity has agreed to be bound by the plaintiff's version of the facts, the issues become purely legal and we have jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal from a denial of immunity.").

Locurto v. Safir, 264 F.3d 154, 164, 165, 170 (2d Cir. 2001) ("[E]ven when a district court rejects a qualified immunity defense due to a perceived need for further discovery, an appellate court may exercise jurisdiction to review an interlocutory appeal that questions whether–on the plaintiff's version of the facts– defendant's actions violated the plaintiff's clearly established constitutional rights as a matter of law. . . . [W]e hold that where a district court denies an initial dispositive motion on qualified immunity grounds prior to discovery, the appealability of that ruling depends not on whether the motion was denied without prejudice to its renewal following discovery, but rather on whether the ruling turns on a question of law. . . . Unlawful intent, a necessary element of plaintiffs' properly framed First Amendment retaliation claim, is an issue on which the district court found a genuine issue of material fact sufficient to defeat defendants' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. Because plaintiffs' claim turns on an issue of fact rather than on a question of law, that portion of the present interlocutory appeal pertaining to the First Amendment claim must therefore be dismissed for lack of appellate jurisdiction.").

Martinez v. Simonetti, 202 F.3d 625, 633 (2d Cir. 2000) ("While claims of immunity are 'sometimes practically intertwined with the merits,'. . . the collateral order doctrine, permitting immediate appellate review of qualified immunity issues, nonetheless requires that a distinction be made between legal-based and fact-based appeals. Here, if Officer Heinz-Faljean had argued that, even taking as true the circumstantial evidence that she was aware of plaintiff's beating, she was entitled to a finding of objective reasonableness as a matter of law, her appeal could go forward. She grounds her argument instead on the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to show her awareness of Martinez' plight. As such, she appeals 'a portion of a district court's summary judgment order that, though entered in a Aqualified immunity" case, determines only a question of Aevidence sufficiency," i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.' Accordingly, the trial court's order denying Officer Heinz-Faljean's motion for summary judgment is not a 'final order' for purposes of appellate review.").

X-Men Security, Inc. v. Pataki, 196 F.3d 56, 66, 67 (2d Cir. 1999) ("Where the district court bases its refusal to grant a qualified-immunity motion on the premise that the court is unable to, or prefers not to, determine the motion without discovery into the alleged facts, that refusal constitutes at least an implicit decision that the complaint alleges a constitutional claim on which relief can be granted. That purely legal decision does not turn on whether the plaintiff can in fact elicit any evidence to support his allegations; it thus possesses the requisite finality for immediate appealability under the collateral order doctrine. . . . A district court's perceived need for discovery does not impede immediate appellate review of the legal questions of whether there is a constitutional right at all and, if so, whether it was clearly established at the time of the alleged conduct, for until 'th[ese] threshold immunity question[s are] resolved, discovery should not be allowed.'").

Tolbert v. Queens College, 164 F.3d 132, 139 (2d Cir. 1999) ("In the present case . . . the facts as to the conduct in which appellants engaged are sharply disputed, and there is no hypothetical assumption by appellants that they engaged in the conduct that Tolbert alleges. Although appellants argue that discrimination based solely on language does not violate any clearly established constitutional rights, there is a dispute as to whether that was the extent of their conduct, and the district court found that the statements attributed to Liebman by Tolbert and Meltzer could be interpreted by a rational factfinder as reflecting a grading policy designed to give preferential treatment to certain students at least in part because of their ethnic background. Appellants do not even remotely suggest that they would be entitled to qualified immunity if, in grading the examinations, they discriminated on the basis of race or ethnicity. Rather, their premise, like that of the petitioners in Johnson, is 'we didn't do it.' . . . [T]he district court's denial of summary judgment on the basis that the evidence is sufficient to support a jury's finding that appellants engaged in the conduct described by Tolbert is not immediately appealable.").

Gubitosi v. Kapica, 154 F.3d 30, 33 (2d Cir. 1998) (per curiam) ("Here the gravamen of Kapica's qualified immunity defense (and this appeal) is that he lodged the charges against plaintiff because of her insubordination, not because of her complaints regarding police practices– and that plaintiff has offered no affirmative evidence to counter this assertion that he 'didn't do it'–that is, he 'didn't retaliate.' Having reviewed the record for allegations favorable to plaintiff that were sufficiently supported to create jury issues,. . . and having assumed those allegations to be true, we have nevertheless failed to identify 'affirmative evidence from which a jury could find' that plaintiff has carried her burden of showing that Kapica engaged in retaliation." citing Crawford-El v. Britton).

Tierney v. Davidson, 133 F.3d 189, 194 (2d Cir. 1998) ("Even where the lower court rules that material disputes of fact preclude summary judgment on qualified immunity, we may still exercise interlocutory jurisdiction if the defendant contests the existence of a dispute or the materiality thereof, or (what may be the same thing) contends that he is entitled to qualified immunity even under plaintiff's version of the facts.").

Lee v. Sandberg, 136 F.3d 94, 101 (2d Cir. 1997) ("Here, for the purposes of this appeal and in accord with Salim, the State Troopers stipulate to plaintiff's factual allegations that Mrs. Lee was not a credible informant and that the State Troopers consequently did not have actual probable cause to arrest plaintiff. Therefore, despite the district court's conclusion that Mrs. Lee's credibility presented a genuine issue of material fact, we have appellate jurisdiction to review the denial of summary judgment on the basis of these facts stipulated to by the parties.").

Martinez v. City of Schenectady, 115 F.3d 111, 114 (2d Cir. 1997) ("Here, the district court unambiguously stated that questions of fact prevented a ruling that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. The district court, however, never specified exactly what those fact questions were. Simply declaring that genuine issues of fact exist is not sufficient, in and of itself, to prevent an appeal. [citing Behrens and Salim] . . . . Thus, we have jurisdiction to determine whether, assuming that Martinez's version of the facts is correct, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Salim v. Proulx, 93 F.3d 86, 89-91 (2d Cir. 1996) ("Though it was arguable that Johnson intended to preclude an interlocutory appeal whenever a district judge denied summary judgment on the ground that a material fact was genuinely in dispute, the Court's subsequent decision in Behrens dispelled such a notion. . . . After Johnson and Behrens, several types of fact-related rulings remain appealable. The clearest example is where the defendant appeals the denial of an immunity defense on the ground that, on stipulated facts, the defense is established as a matter of law. Similarly, an appeal is available where the defendant accepts, for purposes of the appeal, the facts as alleged by the plaintiff. [citing Jemmott] Indeed, Behrens goes further and permits an appeal where a defendant contends that the immunity defense is established on those facts, alleged by the plaintiff, that the district court ruled were sufficiently supported to create jury issues. . . . Even if the district court did not identify the particular charged conduct that it deemed adequately supported, Johnson permits an appeal, though it acknowledges that a 'a court of appeals may have to undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.'. . . Thus, as long as the defendant can support an immunity defense on stipulated facts, facts accepted for purposes of the appeal, or the plaintiff's version of the facts that the district judge deemed available for jury resolution, an interlocutory appeal is available to assert that an immunity defense is established as a matter of law. . . . To summarize, whether the defendant claims that he 'didn't do it,' or that it was objectively reasonable to believe that his action did not violate clearly established law, Johnson and Behrens instruct that a denial of the immunity defense is not subject to interlocutory appeal to challenge a trial judge's rejection of a defendant's contention that the plaintiff's evidence is insufficient to create a jury issue as to either of the defendant's claims. . . . An appeal is available, however, to challenge the trial judge's rejection of the immunity defense where the defendant contends that on stipulated facts, or on the facts that the plaintiff alleges are true, or on the facts favorable to the plaintiff that the trial judge concluded the jury might find, the immunity defense is established as a matter of law because those facts show either that he 'didn't do it' or that it was objectively reasonable for him to believe that his action did not violate clearly established law. What we may not do, after Johnson and Behrens, is entertain an interlocutory appeal in which a defendant contends that the district court committed an error of law in ruling that the plaintiff's evidence was sufficient to create a jury issue on the facts relevant to the defendant's immunity defense.").

In re State Police Litigation, 88 F.3d 111, 126 (2d Cir. 1996) ("Viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs as the parties opposing summary judgment, the record more than suffices to show genuine issues of fact to be tried. . . . In light of these factual issues, the policy considerations underlying the immediate appealability of a denial of summary judgment based on a determination of legal issues, set out in Mitchell and adumbrated in Johnson v. Jones, are not served by an immediate appeal. The qualified-immunity defense asserted here depends on the resolution of defendants' factual premise that there was no listening to recorded confidential conversations; if the factfinder finds such listening, the qualified-immunity defense will be mooted, for defendants do not contend that they have immunity if there was listening; if the factfinder concludes that there was no such listening but finds in favor of plaintiffs nevertheless, the qualified-immunity defense can be determined at that point. The postponement of consideration of defendants' immunity defense until after trial does not deprive defendants of an opportunity to avoid a trial, for the nature of their defense affords them no such opportunity: recording is conceded, and the immunity defense asserted here cannot be resolved without a trial to determine, inter alia, whether there was listening, to what extent there was listening, and whether there was use. Thus, though the qualified-immunity defense is meant to protect defendant officials from going to trial, that defense as asserted here, even if upheld, can have no such effect, for an appellate opinion in favor of either party on the hypothetical legal question posed by defendants would not eliminate the need for a trial on any claim.").

Jemmott v. Coughlin, 85 F.3d 61, 66 (2d Cir. 1996) ("[D]efendants' motion seeking summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity was denied by the district court because 'plaintiff has raised questions of fact as to the defendants' actions and intent sufficient to preclude a finding' of qualified immunity at this stage. For the purpose of this appeal, however, the defendants are not contesting the sufficiency of plaintiff's proof, or the district court's ruling that disputed issues of fact require the denial of their summary judgment motion. Instead, they argue that even if plaintiff's allegations are accepted as true, no clearly established constitutional right was violated. Thus, we proceed as if the defendants had moved to dismiss plaintiff's complaint under Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to 'state a claim of violation of clearly established law.' . . . The district court's rejection of the defendants' argument is a purely legal determination that we have jurisdiction to review.").

Genas v. State of New York Dep't of Correctional Servs., 75 F.3d 825, 833 (2d Cir. 1996) ("The [district] court held that since '[p]laintiff ha[d] put forth specific, nonconclusory circumstantial evidence of retaliation sufficient to overcome the heightened evidentiary standard for qualified immunity,' defendants were not entitled to summary judgment. This ruling is not appealable under Johnson. The district court came to the correct legal conclusion that the law of retaliation is clear, and then determined that a fact issue remains as to an element of the claim on the merits. Johnson bars pretrial appellate review of such 'sufficiency of the evidence' claims. In addition, the Johnson Court explicitly extended its ruling to constitutional tort cases that, like the case before us, involve questions of intent.").

Blue v. Koren, 72 F.3d 1075, 1084 n.6 (2d Cir. 1995) ("Ordinarily, a district court's ruling that a genuine dispute of facts material to a claim of qualified immunity exists is not appealable. [citing Johnson] However, we exercise pendent jurisdiction in the instant matter because the district court's ruling in that regard is intertwined with the issue of the standard to be applied in retaliation cases and review of that ruling is necessary to a meaningful review of the appealable issue of whether the district court applied the proper standard. [citing Swint] Explication of the proper standard in the abstract is clearly far less helpful to the parties or the district court than an application of it in a concrete setting, particularly when we deal with an issue of first impression.").

Rodriguez v. Phillips, 66 F.3d 470, 476, 479 (2d Cir. 1995) ("Johnson does not disturb the rule that whether a disputed fact is material is a question of law and therefore, in the qualified immunity context, a finding of materiality is subject to prompt de novo review. . . . We now review in turn each of plaintiffs' claims to determine whether a clearly established right was violated, or whether any disputed factual issues identified by the district court are material to the resolution of defendants' qualified immunity defense. . . . In the context of the confrontation described in Rodriguez' own words, there was no clearly established First Amendment right to approach and speak to Officer Rubin. We conclude, therefore, that even if Rubin's actions were in retaliation for that exchange, the corrections officer still was entitled to qualified immunity and the district court wrongly denied his motion for summary judgment on this cause of action . . . .").

Lennon v. Miller, 66 F.3d 416, 422 (2d Cir. 1995) ("Inasmuch as the parties do not dispute the material facts and the court did not cite any such factual disputes, the question of the reasonableness of the officers' actions is the only question that could have prevented the court from ruling 'as a matter of law' on the qualified immunity defense. However, in the absence of a material factual dispute, the question of whether it was objectively reasonable for the officers to believe that they did not violate the plaintiff's rights is a purely legal determination for the court to make. [cites omitted] The determination challenged here does not concern the existence of genuine issues of fact; no party disputes the facts here. Rather, the appellants argue that the district court erred as a matter of law in failing to apply properly the qualified immunity standard. Because this case poses only a legal question about the objective reasonableness of the defendants' actions under undisputed facts, Johnson does not preclude appellate jurisdiction.").

Kaluczky v. City of White Plains, 57 F.3d 202, 207 (2d Cir. 1995) ("The Supreme Court has recently cautioned that, on an interlocutory appeal from an order rejecting a claim of qualified immunity, a claim involving a 'pendent party' is an 'unrelated question' that cannot be resolved under pendent jurisdiction. [citing Swint] However, the Court did not otherwise narrow the scope of pendent jurisdiction, and appeared to contemplate pendent appellate jurisdiction over an independent but related question that is 'inextricably intertwined' with the issue of qualified immunity or is 'necessary to ensure meaningful review' of that issue. . . The defendants ask this Court to exercise pendent jurisdiction in order to decide whether Kaluczky's status as a confidential policymaking employee bars his invocation of First Amendment rights in the circumstances presented and whether Kaluczky's six-year term of office affords him additional First Amendment protection. The immunity question turns on whether it was objectively reasonable for the defendants to believe that their conduct violated Kaluczky's clearly established constitutional rights. That question entails an inquiry into the nature and extent of the rights that Kaluczky can assert, and whether Kaluczky's entitlement is well-settled. In our view these issues are 'inextricably intertwined'. We therefore conclude that there is 'sufficient overlap in the factors relevant to the appealable and nonappealable issues to warrant our exercising plenary authority over the appeal.' [cite omitted]").

Weaver v. Brenner, 40 F.3d 527, 533, 537-38 (2d Cir. 1994) ("[I]f resolution of the qualified immunity defense hinges upon disputed factual issues, or upon mixed questions of fact and law, an immediate appeal does not lie under the collateral order doctrine. Appellate review must in that event await resolution of the factual issues at trial. The reason for this is plain: when material factual issues are present, a district court decision does not finally determine any claims of right. Whether the applicability of qualified immunity depends upon genuine issues of material fact is a legal question subject to de novo review . . . . Since we have exercised jurisdiction over an issue in this case, we may consider other nonappealable issues in our discretion, if the appealable and nonappealable issues sufficiently overlap to warrant our exercising plenary authority over the appeal.").

Whalen v. County of Fulton, 19 F.3d 828, 830 (2d Cir. 1994) ("The denial of the motion [for summary judgment] without prejudice to renewal before trial does not conclusively determine the disputed question, namely, whether the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. For this reason we need not decide whether the validity of the denial of the summary judgment motion can be determined as a matter of law because, even if the validity of the order could be decided on this record, the order lacks that element of finality necessary for an interlocutory appeal under the collateral order doctrine.").

Whalen v. County of Fulton, 19 F.3d 828, 832 (2d Cir. 1994) (Walker, J., dissenting) ("The majority ... concludes that we lack jurisdiction because the district court did not definitively resolve the question of whether defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. The practical consequence of the majority's decision is to allow the district court to resolve this question at any time as long as defendants who deserve qualified immunity will be spared a trial. I believe the majority's approach misapprehends the protection afforded by the qualified immunity doctrine. This doctrine protects immunized defendants not only from trials, but also from broad based discovery where there is no showing that defendants have violated a clearly established right . . . .").

O'Neill v. Town of Babylon, 986 F.2d 646, 649 (2d Cir. 1993) (jurisdiction to hear appeal because issue of qualified immunity can be resolved as a matter of law.).

Cartier v. Lussier, 955 F.2d 841, 844-45 (2d Cir. 1992) (if factual determination is necessary predicate to resolution of qualified immunity issue, interlocutory review is not available; whether disputed facts are material to resolving the applicability of the doctrine is a legal question . . . if, even when all facts as alleged by the nonmoving party are regarded as true, the moving party is still entitled to judgment as a matter of law, then factual disputes, however genuine, are not material, and their presence will not preclude summary judgment).

THIRD CIRCUIT

Dennis v. City of Philadelphia, 19 F.4th 279, 286-87 (3d Cir. 2021) ("The District Court's Heck ruling is not inextricably intertwined with its qualified-immunity ruling, nor is reviewing the Heck ruling necessary to ensure a meaningful review of the qualified-immunity ruling. A Heck inquiry turns on 'whether a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence.'. . By contrast, a qualified immunity inquiry turns on '(1) whether the plaintiff sufficiently alleged the violation of a constitutional right, and (2) whether the right was "clearly established" at the time of the official's conduct.'. .These inquiries are distinct and separable. In addition, the Heck issue 'is effectively reviewable on appeal.... [U]nlike immunity rights where the right is lost if the case goes to trial, an appellate court can reverse the district court after entry of a final judgment without departing from the holding or purpose of Heck.'. . Accordingly, a number of our sister Courts of Appeals have held that they lack jurisdiction to consider Heck on an interlocutory appeal from denial of qualified immunity. . . The detectives try to bring Heck within our jurisdiction by shoehorning Heck into the qualified immunity analysis. They cite Ashcroft v. Iqbal, where the Supreme Court held that 'whether a particular complaint sufficiently alleges a clearly established violation of law cannot be decided in isolation from the facts pleaded. In that sense, the sufficiency of [a] pleading is both "inextricably intertwined with," and "directly implicated by," the qualified-immunity defense.'. . The detectives essentially argue that, if Heck bars Dennis's claims, he has failed to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, and thus failed to allege sufficiently the violation of a constitutional right. The detectives' argument fails because it papers over the difference between Heck and the typical analysis under Rule 12(b)(6) that was contemplated by Iqbal. The typical analysis requires a court to measure the alleged facts against the elements of a claim. This analysis clearly and substantially overlaps with the process of determining whether a plaintiff has sufficiently alleged the violation of a constitutional right. By contrast, the Heck analysis requires a court to compare the asserted claims and requested relief with a preexisting conviction or sentence; the plaintiff must demonstrate that the prior conviction or sentence has been 'reversed on direct appeal, expunged by executive order, declared invalid by a state tribunal authorized to make such a determination, or called into question by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus.'. .This analysis involves different facts, and a different legal framework, than the process of determining whether a plaintiff has sufficiently alleged the violation of a constitutional right. For that reason, the typical analysis under Rule 12(b)(6) is inextricably intertwined with a denial of qualified immunity, but under Heck it is not. Accordingly, although we have jurisdiction in this interlocutory appeal to consider the District Court's denial of the detectives' qualified immunity defense, we do not have jurisdiction at this time to consider their arguments under Heck.")

Lozano v. New Jersey, 9 F.4th 239, 244-45 (3d Cir. 2021) ("We have never decided. . . whether we have collateral order jurisdiction over a summary judgment decision denying qualified immunity under the CRA. To answer that question, we must 'inquir[e] into the nature of the qualified immunity that New Jersey law confers.'. .If qualified immunity under the CRA provides immunity from suit, like qualified immunity under § 1983, then we have jurisdiction, but if it only provides immunity from liability, like good faith immunity under the TCA, then we must dismiss the CRA claims for lack of appellate jurisdiction. . . Section 1983 provides the better analogy. Indeed, the New Jersey Supreme Court has explained that the CRA is 'a state law analogue to Section 1983,'. . . so New Jersey courts apply qualified immunity in CRA claims by looking to 'federal case law[.]' They 'do not differentiate between [CRA and § 1983] claims' for purposes of qualified immunity. . .Thus, because qualified immunity under § 1983 'is an immunity from suit,'. . . we conclude that qualified immunity under the CRA is also an immunity from suit[.]. .We therefore have collateral order jurisdiction over summary judgment orders denying qualified immunity under the CRA insofar as they raise questions of law.")

HIRA Educational Services North America v. Augustine, 991 F.3d 180, 187-88 (3d Cir. 2021) ("Denials of immunity are immediately appealable even if the denial is 'implicit.' When a district court refuses to rule on an immunity claim 'on the premise that the court is unable, ... or prefers not to, determine the motion without discovery' then it is making 'at least an implicit decision that the complaint alleges a ... claim on which relief can be granted.'. . Such delay vitiates immunity as government officials 'otherwise entitled to immunity [are] nonetheless subjected to "the burdens of such pretrial matters as discovery."'. .Here, the District Court made two errors when it deemed the Legislators' appeals improper. First, its order acted as an implicit denial of immunity—even though it was without prejudice—because it would require the Legislators to bear the burdens of discovery and other pretrial matters. . . Second, the Legislators' immunity claims depend on questions of law and not on factual disputes that would deprive us of jurisdiction. . . The Legislators do not, for purposes of this appeal, challenge the truth of HIRA's allegations. They argue instead that even if HIRA's allegations are true they are nonetheless entitled to absolute or qualified immunity. Besides, any factual challenge by the Legislators would be doomed because this appeal arises from the District Court's denial of their motions to dismiss. As previously noted, at this stage of the litigation we accept HIRA's well-pleaded allegations as true. . . Whether HIRA alleged conduct by the Legislators that falls outside the sphere of legitimate legislative activities or that violates clearly established law is a question of law over which we have jurisdiction.")

Williams v. City of York, Pennsylvania, 967 F.3d 252, 254-55, 258-64 (3d Cir. 2020) ("When a district court denies a public official qualified immunity at summary judgment and the official appeals, the scope of our review is limited. We can review 'whether the set of facts identified by the district court is sufficient to establish a violation of a clearly established constitutional right.'. . But generally, 'we lack jurisdiction to consider whether the district court correctly identified the set of facts that the summary judgment record is sufficient to prove.'. . In recognition of that limited jurisdiction, we have announced two supervisory rules that facilitate our review and enhance the reliability of district courts' decisionmaking. First, in Forbes v. Township of Lower Merion, 313 F.3d 144 (3d Cir. 2002), we required district courts 'to specify those material facts that are and are not subject to genuine dispute and explain their materiality.'. . Second, in Grant v. City of Pittsburgh, 98 F.3d 116 (3d Cir. 1996), we required courts to 'analyze separately, and state findings with respect to, the specific conduct of each [defendant].'. . .Had the District Court followed the two supervisory rules that we emphasize today, it would have facilitated appellate review and enhanced the reliability of its decision. Because the District Court erred in concluding the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for false arrest and the excessive force Williams alleges, we will reverse. . . . Since announcing these supervisory rules, we have also recognized a narrow exception to the limits that Johnson places on our jurisdiction: 'where the trial court's determination that a fact is subject to reasonable dispute is blatantly and demonstrably false, a court of appeals may say so, even on interlocutory review.' Blaylock v. City of Phila., 504 F.3d 405, 414 (3d Cir. 2007) (emphasis added). This exception derives from the Supreme Court's decision in Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007). . . .Williams claims excessive force arising out of the Officers' conduct at the scene of her arrest and at City Hall. As we shall explain, the District Court did not comply with our supervisory rules in conducting its qualified immunity analysis, and it erred in concluding that the Officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. So we will reverse. . . . Accepting the facts the District Court identified, Seitz did not violate Williams's constitutional rights by throwing her to the ground. The parties do not dispute that officers were responding to a shots-fired call, Williams was running in close proximity to the shooting, and when Figge ordered her to get on the ground, she ran to the porch of a house and started pounding on the door instead of complying with his order. Given these facts, it was not unreasonable for Seitz to throw Williams to the ground. . . So the District Court erred in concluding Seitz was not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In this appeal, the District Court did not state whether it assumed Williams notified her arresting officers of her pain. Because this fact is plainly material, the Court's failure to state it violated the Forbes rule. Instead of remanding, though, we will exercise our authority under Johnson to 'undertake a ... review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to [Williams], likely assumed.'. .On this record, Williams cannot show her arresting officers received notice of her pain. It's true that Williams denied the Officers' statement that she 'never complained at the scene of her arrest about being in pain from handcuffs or otherwise.'. . But her only support for that denial was the dashcam footage, which she said shows she 'complain[ed] vociferously about her abuse at the hands of the police.'. . We have reviewed the video footage. . . It shows Williams complained only about her 'wedgie.' She said nothing about pain from her handcuffs. Because this evidence is insufficient for a reasonable jury to conclude that the Officers received notice of Williams's pain . . . the District Court erred in denying them qualified immunity for failing to loosen Williams's handcuffs[.] . . . Finally, Williams's allegations that certain unidentified officers put a knee to her back, tripped her, and were 'forceful and rough' in handling her cannot survive summary judgment. We reiterate that a 'plaintiff alleging that one or more officers engaged in unconstitutional conduct must establish the 'personal involvement' of each named defendant to survive summary judgment and take that defendant to trial.'. . .Jutrowski's central tenet—that 'a defendant's § 1983 liability must be predicated on his direct and personal involvement in the alleged violation'—is 'manifest in our excessive force jurisprudence.'. . Yet the District Court did not state whether Figge, Monte, or Seitz could have been one of the unidentified officers that allegedly put a knee to Williams's back, tripped her, and were 'forceful and rough' in handling her. The Court's failure to address these factual disputes violated the Forbes rule, but we will once again 'undertake a ... review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to [Williams], likely assumed.'. . . The record shows Williams cannot establish the personal involvement of any of the Officers. At summary judgment, Williams conceded she 'cannot specifically describe what each officer at the scene of her arrest did.' . . So the District Court erred in concluding that the Officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for allegedly putting a knee to Williams's back, tripping her, and being 'forceful and rough' in handling her. . . For all the reasons stated, we will reverse the District Court's denial of summary judgment as to Williams's excessive force claim insofar as it relates to the officers' conduct at the scene of her arrest. . . . For all these reasons, no reasonable juror could find the Officers failed to loosen Williams's handcuffs or twisted her arm, threw her against the wall, and threatened to break her arm. . . The District Court's contrary determination is unfounded. And because the record shows Williams cannot establish the personal involvement of any of the Officers, the Court erred in concluding they are not entitled to qualified immunity. . .Accordingly, we will reverse the District Court's order to the extent it denied summary judgment as to Williams's excessive force claim relative to the officers' conduct at City Hall. . . . This case falls in an uncertain space between Stewart and Woody. Like the officer in Stewart, Figge was in uniform and exhibited a show of authority by drawing his gun. And just as Stewart did not comply with the officer's order to put his hands on the dashboard, Williams did not comply with Figge's order to get on the ground. In fact, the parties do not dispute that she ran to the porch of a house and started pounding on the door. But if on-foot flight from a uniformed officer in a marked police vehicle was insufficient for a criminal escape conviction in Woody, it may be that probable cause did not exist here. That uncertainty in the law does not strip the officers here of qualified immunity; rather it insulates them from liability for their determination that a 'fair probability' existed that Williams committed escape. . . Accordingly, Figge and Monte are entitled to qualified immunity on Williams's claim for false arrest.")

E. D. v. Sharkey, 928 F.3d 299, 310-11 (3d Cir. 2019) (Smith, C.J., concurring) ("I join my colleagues' sound reasoning in upholding the District Court's denial of qualified immunity and dismissing the remainder of the appeal. I write separately to highlight a concern with the structure of the order under review. When summary judgment has been denied on qualified immunity grounds, we have jurisdiction to 'determine whether the facts identified by the District Court constitute a violation of a clearly established constitutional right.'. . Here, the District Court addressed the summary judgment motion by issuing an order, unaccompanied by a supporting opinion. Instead, the order included a lengthy footnote setting forth the District Court's reasoning. This 'footnote order' practice is frequently employed by our colleagues in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, and it is not my desire to interfere with a longstanding custom and practice of that district. Indeed, in my view, there is nothing inherently problematic with so-called 'footnote opinions.' In this case, however, the footnote neglects to identify a single undisputed fact, and provides only cursory discussion—without reference to the evidence of record—to support the conclusion that disputes of material fact exist. Because Appellants have raised on appeal relatively narrow legal claims that are capable of resolution without the need to closely examine the nuances of the District Court's fact-finding, I see no need to remand this matter for a more comprehensive opinion. Nonetheless, while the District Court provided just enough detail for us to render a decision in this case, it cannot be overlooked that perfunctory treatment of the factual record does not comport with the spirit of the supervisory rule that we announced in Forbes v. Township of Lower Merion, 313 F.3d 144 (3d Cir. 2002). In Forbes, we observed that providing only 'spare comments' in a qualified immunity denial 'greatly hampered' our ability to conduct meaningful appellate review. . . We therefore expressly set forth a rule applicable to all qualified immunity decisions: 'we ... require the District Courts to specify those material facts that are and are not subject to genuine dispute and explain their materiality.'. . Forbes has been the rule of our Court for well over a decade and a half, and remains so for good reason. A comprehensive and detailed summary judgment opinion, specifying those facts that are undisputed as well as those that are material and subject to genuine dispute, is vital—and often essential—to our meaningful review on appeal. I write to underscore the continued importance that our judges attach to compliance with the Forbes rule, and to discourage cursory footnote treatment of the factual record in qualified immunity decisions.")

Roth v. City of Hermitage, 709 F. App'x 733, ___ (3d Cir. 2017) ("In this case, the District Court effectively (if temporarily) denied qualified immunity because it ruled that additional factual development was needed in state court before the Court could fully resolve the merits of Roth's claim. Therefore, by implication it concluded that qualified immunity could not be granted on the current record, and that decision was immediately appealable under the collateral order doctrine. . . That is true even though the District Court's stay order does not immediately subject McGonigle to 'the personal costs and aggravations of presenting a defense.'. . The order still subjects him to the continued threat of future litigation. Accordingly, we have jurisdiction. . . The District Court was required to rule on the qualified immunity defense before dismissing without prejudice and granting a stay. We have emphasized that 'a district court must avail itself of the procedures available under the Federal Rules to facilitate an early resolution of the qualified immunity issue.'. . Or, in other words, 'the trial court must exercise its discretion in a way that protects the substance of the qualified immunity defense ... so that officials are not subjected to unnecessary and burdensome discovery or trial proceedings.'. . Because the District Court did not consider qualified immunity, McGonigle did not benefit from 'the substance of the qualified immunity defense,'. . . and remains potentially liable in a future suit. Failing to consider the qualified immunity defense before dismissing without prejudice on the merits was error because the District Court failed to resolve a 'motion asserting qualified immunity ... at the earliest possible stage in the litigation.'. . Accordingly, we will remand to allow the District Court to consider whether the claims against McGonigle should be dismissed with prejudice on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Davenport v. Borough of Homestead, 870 F.3d 273, 278 (3d Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 1263 (2018) ("Insofar as the District Court's order pertains to Schweitzer, Matakovich, and Kennedy, 'we possess jurisdiction to review whether the set of facts identified by the district court is sufficient to establish a violation of a clearly established constitutional right.'. . . However, we lack jurisdiction to review the order insofar as it pertains to Gorecki because he challenges the District Court's determination that the 'pretrial record sets forth a "genuine" issue of fact' for the jury. . . Relying on the taxicab's dash-camera footage, Gorecki argues that the District Court should have concluded that no reasonable jury could find that he discharged his firearm into Burris's vehicle after the pursuit ended. . . And Gorecki's legal challenges assume the absence of this otherwise disputed fact. Because we are unable to address the factual challenge about when Gorecki discharged his firearm at Burris's vehicle at this stage of the proceedings, we are precluded from addressing the derivative legal challenges.")

Frank C. Pollara Grp., LLC v. Ocean View Inv. Holding, LLC, 784 F.3d 177, 187-88 (3d Cir. 2015) ("In light of Ortiz, it is clear that, if an earlier dispositive argument is not renewed through motions for judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(a) and Rule 50(b), the litigant propounding the argument may not seek appellate review of a decision rejecting it, unless that argument presents a pure question of law that can be decided with reference only to undisputed facts. To the extent our decision in Pediatrix suggests otherwise, it has been overruled by Ortiz. While we are mindful that '[i]t would be unfair to ... penalize [a litigant] for failing to jump up and down or labor an objection' that is already a part of the record, . . . it is not unfair to make litigants deal with the full record. Again, '[o]nce the case proceeds to trial, the full record developed in court supersedes the record existing at the time of the summary judgment motion.' Ortiz, 562 U.S. at 184. Insofar as an issue has a factual component, the failure to raise the issue in motions for judgment as a matter of law at and after trial makes it inappropriate for an appellate court to address what should have been directed to 'the judge who saw and heard the witnesses and had the feel of the case which no appellate printed transcript can impart.'. . The failure to preserve arguments in properly filed Rule 50 motions is particularly vexing when, as is often the case, a litigant is really challenging the sufficiency of the evidence. . . Ortiz clarified that only 'neat abstract issues of law' fit the exception to the rule requiring that arguments be preserved in Rule 50 motions. . . Cases in which the facts that could render an actor answerable for his conduct are disputed or in which questions exist as to what occurred simply do not fit.")

George v. Rehiel, 738 F.3d 562, 571 (3d Cir. 2013) ("Here, . . . the district court did not specifically engage in the traditional qualified immunity analysis before denying the individual federal defendants' motions to dismiss. Rather, as noted, in its order addressing the individual federal defendants' motion for clarification, it simply said the 'defense of qualified immunity in this case may be clarified by discovery.' However, in that same order the district court held that the amended complaint stated a valid claim against each federal defendant for violation of the First and Fourth Amendments. Thus, because the district court held that the amended complaint sufficiently pled valid constitutional claims against the individual federal defendants, the practical effect of the district court's order was a denial of the defense of qualified immunity. Accordingly, we will regard that order as an appealable collateral order.")

Argueta v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 69 (3d Cir. 2011) ("Pursuant to Iqbal, our appellate jurisdiction extends beyond merely determining whether the complaint avers a clearly established constitutional violation, and we also have the power to consider the sufficiency of the complaint itself. . . '[W]hether a particular complaint sufficiently alleges a clearly established violation of law cannot be decided in isolation from the facts pleaded.'.

. Accordingly, 'the sufficiency of [a plaintiff's] pleadings is both "inextricably intertwined with" and "directly implicated by" the qualified immunity defense.'")

Griffin-El v. Beard, No. 10-2335, 2011 WL 332481, at *3 & n.2 (3d Cir. Feb. 3, 2011) ("We will . . . vacate the District Court's denial of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity and remand for the District Court to specify, in compliance with Forbes, which material facts, if any, preclude qualified immunity as to each Appellant. On remand, the District Court should ensure it analyzes separately the specific conduct of each Appellant in determining whether Griffin-El has 'adduced evidence sufficient for a factfinder to conclude that a reasonable public official would have known that his or her conduct had violated clearly established constitutional rights.'. . . We are sensitive to the burden we impose on the able District Court where, as here, a plaintiff sues a host of individuals. But each state actor is entitled to have the defense of qualified immunity considered in the context of his or her specific conduct in determining whether there is indeed a genuine dispute of fact material to the question of whether 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'")

Blaylock v. City of Philadelphia, 504 F.3d 405, 414 (3d Cir. 2007) ("In Scott, although the District Court held that Harris's conduct during the chase (other than his speeding) was a fact subject to reasonable dispute, the Supreme Court disagreed. Scott would thus appear to support the proposition that, in this interlocutory appeal, we may exercise some degree of review over the District Court's determination that the degree of resemblance between Andre and Dana's accomplice is subject to reasonable dispute. In Scott, however, the District Court was charged with determining whether the defendants' conduct was reasonable under the circumstances, and the Court had before it a videotape of undisputed authenticity depicting all of the defendant's conduct and all of the necessary context that would allow the Court to assess the reasonableness of that conduct. Moreover, as the Supreme Court held, the videotape clearly supported Scott's version of events, and 'blatantly contradicted' Harris's. Such a scenario may represent the outer limit of the principle of Johnson v. Jones–where the trial court's determination that a fact is subject to reasonable dispute is blatantly and demonstrably false, a court of appeals may say so, even on interlocutory review. Here, by contrast, we have only two police photographs, and an argument by the defendants not that the two men depicted are similar in appearance, but that one of the men depicted in the photographs must be similar in appearance to a third person whose picture we do not have. As the District Court noted, the photographs show little more than that 'both Omar and Andre Blaylock are young black men who had short hair at the time their police photographs were taken,'. . .and, other than the officers' affidavits stating that they thought they were observing Omar selling drugs with Dana, there is 'no evidence relating to the physical characteristics of [Dana's accomplice].' Moreover, as Andre's counsel noted at argument, the photographs do not depict Andre's or Omar's height, weight, or build. Thus, unlike Scott v. Harris, we do not have a situation in which 'opposing parties tell two different stories, one of which is blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it.' Even if we assume that the photographs are so similar to each other that a police officer could reasonably mistake one photograph for the other, that does not establish that no reasonable jury could find that Andre did not resemble Dana's accomplice (who is undisputedly not Omar).Because the officers make no arguments regarding the false arrest claim that do not ask us to contradict the District Court's determination of which facts are subject to genuine dispute, we will dismiss that portion of their appeal for lack of jurisdiction under Johnson v. Jones.").

Hamilton v. Leavy, 322 F.3d 776, 786 (3d Cir. 2003) ("We recently announced in Forbes v. Township of Lower Merion, 313 F.3d 144, 146 (3d Cir.2002), a supervisory rule requiring district courts to set out what facts they relied on and the legal reasoning they used to determine whether to grant a summary judgment motion for qualified immunity. We now extend this rule to require district courts to provide the same information when deciding motions for summary judgment based on absolute immunity defenses. Accordingly, we remand to the District Court in order for it to reconsider whether the defendants are entitled to quasi-judicial absolute immunity.")

Forbes v. Township of Lower Merion, 313 F.3d 144, 148, 149 (3d Cir. 2002) ("In this case, the District Court denied Salkowski's and McGowan's summary-judgment motions without identifying the set of material facts that the Court viewed as subject to genuine dispute. As a consequence, we are greatly hampered in ascertaining the scope of our jurisdiction. If the District Court had specified the material facts that, in its view, are or are not subject to genuine dispute, we could 'review whether the set of facts identified by the district court [as not subject to genuine dispute] is sufficient to establish a violation of a clearly established constitutional right,' Ziccardi, 288 F.3d at 61, but based on the District Court's spare comments in denying the defendants' summary-judgment motion, we are hard pressed to carry out our assigned function. We do not fault the District Court for not specifically identifying the genuinely disputable material facts because our prior qualified-immunity cases have not imposed the requirement. However, we find that the lack of such a specification impairs our ability to carry out our responsibilities in cases such as this. . . . We cannot hold that the District Court's denial of summary judgment constituted error here because in the absence of a clear supervisory rule, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not impose on trial courts the responsibility to accompany such an order with conclusions of law. . . We instead exercise our supervisory power to require that future dispositions of a motion in which a party pleads qualified immunity include, at minimum, an identification of relevant factual issues and an analysis of the law that justifies the ruling with respect to those issues.").

Ziccardi v. City of Philadelphia, 288 F.3d 57, 62 (3d Cir. 2002) ("In our view, Johnson clearly applies to factual disputes about intent, as well as conduct. First, we see nothing in the Johnson Court's reasoning that supports a distinction between issues of conduct and issues of intent. . . . Second, at least one passage in Johnson refers directly to questions of intent and suggests that the Court specifically contemplated that its decision would not allow interlocutory appeals regarding the sufficiency of the evidence of intent.").

Bines v. Kulaylat, 215 F.3d 381, 384 (3d Cir. 2000) ("The Supreme Court has not decided whether denial of summary judgment based on a good-faith defense can ever fall within the collateral-order doctrine. We have not, nor has any other circuit court of appeals, decided the issue.

Nevertheless, we find our course amply guided by previous decisions in which we have addressed the collateral-order doctrine. Those decisions clearly indicate that denial of summary judgment based on a good-faith defense does not permit an interlocutory appeal.").

In re Montgomery County, 215 F.3d 367, 374 (3d Cir. 2000) ("Because the District Court never explicitly addressed the Appellants' immunity claims, we must decide whether we have interlocutory jurisdiction to review an implied denial of those claims. We join the other Circuit Courts of Appeals that have addressed this issue and hold that we do. [citing cases]").

Acierno v. Cloutier, 40 F.3d 597, 609 (3d Cir. 1994) (en banc) (overruling Prisco, which had held that orders denying qualified immunity in cases seeking both damages and injunctive relief were not immediately appealable).

Kulwicki v. Dawson, 969 F.2d 1454, 1460 (3d Cir. 1992) (while recognizing that "...Courts of Appeals do not take a uniform view of appellate jurisdiction over denials of immunity[,]" court concluded that "[o]ur jurisdiction to hear immunity appeals is limited only where the district court does not address the immunity question below, or where the court does not base its decision on immunity per se....Insofar as there may be issues of material fact present in a case on appeal, we would have to look at those facts in the light most favorable to the non-moving party.").

Kulwicki, supra, 969 F.2d at 1461 n. 7 ("We note that an appeal from a denial of immunity where factual issues remain is distinct from that where the defendant official denies taking the actions at issue. Unlike a claim of official immunity, the 'I didn't do it' defense relates strictly to the merits of the plaintiff's claim, and is therefore not immediately appealable.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Campbell v. Florian, 972 F.3d 385, 392 n.6 (4th Cir. 2020) ("Deciding this appeal on the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis follows the Supreme Court's guidance in Johnson v. Jones[.] . . In Johnson, the Supreme Court held that, to the extent that the district court's order in a qualified immunity case rests on a sufficiency-of-the-evidence determination, that portion of an order lacks finality for an appeal. . . So Johnson prevents us from exercising jurisdiction 'over a claim that a plaintiff has not presented enough evidence to prove that the plaintiff's version of the events actually occurred.'. . '[B]ut we [do] have jurisdiction over a claim that there was no violation of clearly established law accepting the facts as the district court viewed them.'. . Of course, where (as here), the district court 'fails to supply the factual basis for its legal decision,' this task is more difficult for us. . . And so we must determine 'what the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, demonstrated' to 'render [our] decision on the purely legal issues.'")

Hicks v. Ferreyra, 965 F.3d 302, 312 (4th Cir. 2020) ("We emphasize at the outset what the officers are not challenging on appeal. They do not argue that 'if we take the facts as the district court [gave] them to us,'. . . then the district court erred as a legal matter when it found that the alleged conduct violated the Fourth Amendment, because the officers unreasonably extended Hicks's first stop and conducted an immediate second stop without sufficient justification. Nor do the officers take issue with the second step of the district court's qualified immunity analysis, arguing that any Fourth Amendment violation they may have committed was not 'clearly established' at the time of the incident. Instead, the officers seek review of a question that we may not consider in this interlocutory posture: whether the district court properly assessed the factual record in front of it. . . With respect to the first stop, the officers' argument centers exclusively on the district court's finding that the lack of record support for a purported 'customary protocol' supporting Hicks's lengthy detention precluded the award of summary judgment. According to the officers, the district court misconstrued the record in making that determination, improperly refusing to consider evidence of an unwritten protocol. We tend to read the district court's carefully reasoned opinion differently, but that is 'of no moment' in this posture. . . Such 'fact-related dispute[s] about the pretrial record' fall outside our limited jurisdiction.")

District of Columbia v. Trump, 959 F.3d 126, 130-32 (4th Cir. 2020) (en banc) ("A district court's actual refusal to rule on immunity is treated as a denial of immunity and is immediately appealable. In most cases in which courts have found a basis for appellate jurisdiction, the district court's refusal to rule on immunity was an explicit one, indicating that its decision was final and it would adjudicate nothing else at that point in time. An implicit refusal to rule on an immunity question can also provide a basis for appellate jurisdiction. But the implicit refusal must, like an explicit one, be clear, establishing that the ruling is the court's final determination in the matter. . . .When, however, it is clear that the district court does intend to rule on a motion asserting an immunity defense and has not unreasonably delayed in doing so, the lack of a ruling is neither an implicit nor effective denial of immunity. . . . Here, the district court neither expressly nor implicitly refused to rule on immunity. It did not make any rulings with respect to the President in his individual capacity. . . To the contrary, the district court stated in writing that it intended to rule on the President's individual capacity motion. Despite the President's suggestion, the district court's deferral did not result in a delay 'beyond reasonable limits.' Not even seven months had elapsed after the close of briefing on this question at the time the President noted this appeal. During these seven months, the district court, recognizing that the President in his individual capacity had moved to dismiss, again expressly stated in writing that it would address that motion. In these same seven months, in addition to managing all of the other cases on its docket, the district court managed the many aspects of this complex litigation against the President: the court held a second hearing on the President's motion to dismiss in his official capacity, issued a second, thorough written opinion explaining its ruling, and also issued a lengthy written opinion explaining its denial of the President's motion to certify an interlocutory appeal of the court's rulings. We cannot conclude that the court's failure to also rule on the motion at issue here during this same seven-month period evinces an unreasonable delay or a desire to needlessly prolong this litigation. . . .At oral argument, the President's counsel conceded that the asserted denial of his claim of immunity provides the only jurisdictional basis for this interlocutory appeal. Because, as we have explained, the district court did not deny the President's immunity claim, we lack jurisdiction to consider the appeal.")

District of Columbia v. Trump, 959 F.3d 126, 133-34, 137-40 (4th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (Niemeyer, J., with whom Wilkinson, Agee, Quattlebaum, and Rushing, JJ., join, dissenting) ("[W]hen the district court issued its December 3, 2018 order directing the President to participate in six months of full fact discovery despite the President's assertion of absolute immunity and his objection to that discovery based on immunity, it effectively denied the President the benefits of immunity, thus entitling him to appeal the order. And the District and Maryland's attempt to moot the appeal by dismissing the individual capacity claim in the district court after the President had filed this appeal was ineffective. Accordingly, I would deny the District and Maryland's motion to dismiss this appeal and exercise appellate jurisdiction based on the denial of immunity. Having jurisdiction, I would then remand the case to the district court with instructions to dismiss the District and Maryland's complaint for the reasons given in the dissenting opinions in In re Trump, No. 18-2486. . . .The issue thus presented is whether the district court's December 3 order directing the parties to proceed with full fact discovery on the merits over the objection of the President and in rejection of his repeated requests to address immunity amounted to an order effectively denying the President's claim of immunity. Like claims of immunity generally, the invocation of absolute immunity is a claim to 'an entitlement not to stand trial or face the other burdens of litigation.'. . 'The entitlement is an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.'. . . In this case, the immunity issue is indisputably an important one that is completely separate from the merits of the action and, when denied, effectively becomes unreviewable on appeal, thus satisfying collateral order requirements (2) and (3). But requirement (1) remains contested — whether the district court's December 3, 2018 order 'conclusively determine[d] the disputed question' of immunity. . . I conclude that the district court's December 3 order did precisely that. It was an order directing the parties to engage in full fact discovery on the merits over the objection of the President based on immunity, and therefore it was entirely inconsistent with the benefit conferred by immunity to be spared the burden of pretrial discovery. Because the order denied the President the benefits of immunity, it was subject to immediate appeal. . . . In this case, I can only conclude that the district court's conduct was deliberately calculated to avoid appellate review on the immunity question — and in view of the majority's opinion, it has succeeded in doing so. . . . Of course, if the district court believed that it needed discovery in order to rule on the President's invocation of immunity, it would have been appropriate for the court to have deferred ruling on immunity until the completion of such limited discovery. In that case, the court's deferral order would not be an appealable order. . . But in this case, neither party suggested that discovery on immunity was required, and neither party requested it. The immunity question was clearly understood to be a pure question of law that did not require further factual development. . . . In sum, after deferring consideration of immunity for some nine months, the district court ordered that the parties begin six months of fact discovery, thereby knowingly denying to the President one of the most important aspects of his asserted immunity — that he be spared the burdens of pretrial proceedings, including discovery. Accordingly, I would conclude that the December 3 order was immediately appealable.")

Gallmon v. Cooper, 801 F. App'x 112, ___ (4th Cir. 2020) ("Here, the trajectory of Gallmon's car is plainly in dispute. Gallmon alleges that '[t]here was no way for the Honda to have hit Defendant Cooper when Defendant Cooper fired the shots from the driver's side of the Honda through the driver's side window and door.'. . Cooper, on the other hand, insists that the 'danger ha[d] not passed' at this point because the 'car c[ould] still skid, slide, fish-tail or change directions.'. .What's more, contrary to Cooper's contention, the video from his dashboard camera does not indisputably support his rendition of the facts. In qualified immunity cases, courts 'usually' adopt 'the plaintiff's version of the facts' at summary judgment. . . However, when video evidence 'blatantly contradict[s]' or 'utterly discredit[s]' the plaintiff's account courts view the evidence in the light depicted by the videotape. . . After 'carefully review[ing] the video' in this case, the district court found no such contradiction and instead determined that the question of the car's trajectory was sufficiently close to send it to the jury. . . We are not prepared to disrupt that judgment. . . Because Cooper seeks to appeal from an order setting forth a genuine issue of fact for trial, we must dismiss his appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Livingston v. Kehagias, 803 F. App'x 673, ___ (4th Cir. 2020) ("[T]he officers' argument is that the district court misapprehended the summary judgment record, this time by determining that the evidence, construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, supported a finding that Livingston had never controlled the taser or used it against Kehagias. Parsing the witness statements relied on by the district court, the officers assert that the pretrial evidence, properly understood, is not enough to put into genuine dispute their version of the facts, on which Livingston had gained control of the taser and used it against Kehagias. But considering the record as a whole and viewing it favorably to the plaintiff, the district court came to a different conclusion. And in this procedural posture, we must accept the record as the district court viewed it; our limited jurisdiction does not allow us to address the officers' contention that the Estate has not brought forward sufficient evidence to create genuine disputes as to these critical facts. . . .We take a different approach to the officers' appeal regarding the use of non-deadly force to effectuate Livingston's arrest. Here, in contrast to the other claims, the officers have identified legal issues that we may review in this interlocutory posture: Whether, accepting the district court's assessment of the record and view of the facts, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law, either because they reasonably used non-deadly force and so committed no constitutional violation, or because no clearly established law put them on notice that their use of non-deadly force was constitutionally excessive. On these questions, we agree with the district court, and thus affirm its ruling denying summary judgment.")

Robinson v. Miller, 802 F. App'x 741, ___ (4th Cir. 2020) ("On appeal, the officers' primary argument is that they are entitled to qualified immunity because an objectively reasonable officer, taking into account not only the surveillance video but also the Hartwell Statement, would have believed that there was probable cause to arrest Robinson. The officers acknowledge that the district court excluded the Hartwell Statement from its probable cause analysis. But, they insist, that was in error: Properly understood, the pretrial record does not give rise to a genuine factual dispute as to whether the officers had access to the Hartwell Statement before making their respective arrests, but instead makes clear that they did. Whatever the merits of the officers' fact-based argument – and we appreciate that the record in this case is lengthy and complex – we lack the jurisdiction to address it in this interlocutory posture. . . The district court, applying the correct summary judgment standard and properly viewing the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, . . . found that the pretrial evidence – including Officer Miller's own testimony – made it 'entirely unclear' whether Miller had knowledge of the Hartwell Statement when he arrested Robinson, . . . and that the record was similarly unclear as to whether Officers Peterson and Moyer knew of the Statement prior to Robinson's second arrest[.] . . 'Whether we agree or disagree with the district court's assessment of the record evidence on that issue ... is of no moment in the context of this interlocutory appeal,'. . . in which our jurisdiction extends only to purely legal questions[.] . . . When it comes to Robinson's claims that he was arrested without probable cause, in other words, our jurisdiction is limited to one 'narrow legal question': Taking the facts 'as the district court gives them to us' and viewed in the light most favorable to Robinson as the plaintiff, are the officers entitled to qualified immunity? . . . Applying that well-established standard, the district court correctly determined that the individual defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity on the current record. It is undisputed that Officers Miller, Peterson, and Moyer all had viewed the Walmart surveillance videos by the time of the relevant arrests. But the district court concluded that no 'reasonable and prudent person' would believe that Robinson's 'appearance in the second video alone provides a basis to believe that [Robinson] was engaging in criminal activity.'. . Like the defendants, who conceded the point at oral argument on appeal, we agree. . . . Here, our holding – that the record, as construed by the district court, does not allow for an award of qualified immunity as a matter of law – resolves neither the Monell claim against the City nor the state-law claims against the individual officers, and does not otherwise fall within the Swint exceptions. . . Perhaps recognizing the difficulty here, the defendants simply do not address this jurisdictional issue. They have not argued that jurisdiction is proper under Swint, nor have they directly requested that this court exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over the Monell or state-law claims at issue. Even assuming we could take pendent appellate jurisdiction over either of those claims, moreover, 'the decision to exercise such jurisdiction is purely discretionary,'. . . and we would decline to exercise any such jurisdiction here. We therefore dismiss the defendants' appeal from the denial of summary judgment on Robinson's Monell and state-law claims.")

Al Shimari v. CACI Premier Tech., Inc., 775 F. App'x 758, 759–60 (4th Cir. 2019) (not reported), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2850 (2021) ("In this interlocutory appeal, CACI asks us to reverse the district court's order denying it derivative sovereign immunity. We dismiss because we lack jurisdiction. This conclusion follows from the reasoning of a prior en banc decision in which we dismissed CACI's interlocutory appeal from the district court's denial of similar defenses. Al Shimari v. CACI Int'l, Inc., 679 F.3d 205, 213 (4th Cir. 2012) (en banc). As relevant here, we explained that 'fully developed rulings' denying 'sovereign immunity (or derivative claims thereof) may not' be immediately appealable. . . Indeed, we have never held, and the United States government does not argue, that a denial of sovereign immunity or derivative sovereign immunity is immediately reviewable on interlocutory appeal. But even if a denial of derivative sovereign immunity may be immediately appealable, our review is barred here because there remain continuing disputes of material fact with respect to CACI's derivative sovereign immunity defenses. . . Below, the district court concluded that even if the United States were entitled to sovereign immunity, 'it is not at all clear that CACI would be extended the same immunity' due to continuing factual disputes regarding whether CACI violated the law or its contract. . . The district court also denied CACI's motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' ATS claims based on evidence showing 'material issues of fact that are in dispute,'. . . and these factual disputes are substantially related, if not identical, to the elements of CACI's derivative sovereign immunity defense. Given these continuing factual disputes, this appeal does not turn on an abstract question of law and is not properly before us.")

Al Shimari v. CACI Premier Tech., Inc., 775 F. App'x 758, 760-61 (4th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2850 (2021) ("Quattlebaum, J., concurring in judgment) ("The order appealed involves important issues with potentially far-reaching implications. Despite that, our precedent compels me to join the judgment of the Court. In Al Shimari v. CACI International, Inc., our Court, sitting en banc, determined that the only potential basis for interlocutory appeal here would be an appeal from an order on derivative sovereign immunity that involves an abstract issue of law. Al Shimari v. CACI Int'l., Inc., 679 F.3d 205, 220–22 (4th Cir. 2012) (en banc). CACI insists we have such a situation and argues plaintiffs present no evidence representatives of CACI engaged in any of the alleged improper conduct as to these plaintiffs. But from my review of the record, I cannot reach that conclusion as a matter of law. Therefore, I agree the requirements for us to exercise appellate jurisdiction for an interlocutory appeal are lacking. However, I write separately because in contrast to the majority's reading of the case, Al-Shimari explicitly held that the denial of derivative sovereign immunity may be appealable if the appeal involves an 'abstract issue of law' or a 'purely legal question.'. . We as a panel do not have the authority to alter that previous conclusion. Yet despite this disagreement, being bound by our precedent, I concur with the majority's judgment. But I do so only reluctantly. Our narrow interpretation of the collateral order doctrine in this case has taken us down a dangerous road. This proceeding has allowed discovery into sensitive military judgments and wartime activities. It has also opened the door to an order that the United States has no sovereign immunity for claims that our military activities violated international norms—whatever those are. These may seem like minor inconveniences given the conduct at issue has been uniformly condemned and because the defendant here is a private contractor. But while we have no jurisdiction to address them now, the implications from these proceedings are potentially quite significant. We will see whether this case progresses to a point where we have jurisdiction to address the important questions it raises.") Leibelson v. Cook, 761 F. App'x 196, ___ (4th Cir. 2019) ("In the present case, the district court's decision denying Cook qualified immunity rested on the court's conclusion that a reasonable juror could resolve the factual disputes and credibility determinations in favor of Leibelson, which resolution necessarily would establish a constitutional violation. The court held that Leibelson's deposition testimony and her reports made to Dr. Card constituted sufficient evidence of sexual assault to have that claim resolved by a jury. We decline Cook's invitation to convert the district court's fact-based conclusions into legal error. Leibelson's version of events is not so 'blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it.'. . Thus, because the court's conclusion that Cook was not entitled to qualified immunity was based on disputed issues of fact, our review of the district court's judgment necessarily would involve a 'factual determination over which we lack jurisdiction at this stage in the litigation.'. . Accordingly, we dismiss Cook's appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Brown v. Reinhart, 760 F. App'x 175, ___ (4th Cir. 2019) ("In Al Shimari, we determined that we lacked jurisdiction over decisions denying defendants immunity. In so doing, we pointed to the absence of a 'vast pretrial record' coupled with the fact that the issues were 'factually entrenched and far less amenable to meaningful analysis by resort merely to the plaintiffs' pleadings.'. . Consequently, we concluded that 'these appeals encompass fact-based issues of law, with the need for additional development of the record,' and dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. . . .We accept as given that immunity is absolute where it applies. . . The narrow question here is whether, based on the limited record before it, the district court's order is properly before us on appeal. We conclude that we lack jurisdiction because, as in Al Shimari, the district court's order did not conclusively determine the disputed question. Based on the limited record before it, the district court found that there were genuine issues of material fact outstanding as to whether the Defendants are entitled to the asserted immunities, and subsequently ordered that the matter proceed to discovery. In so doing, the court cited Al Shimari for the proposition that it 'is entitled to have before it a proper record ... to accurately assess any claim, including one of immunity.'. . Such an order from a district court indicating that its decision is tentative and that 'it might well change its mind after further proceedings,' is not appealable. . . Contrary to Defendants' contention, whether the asserted immunities apply in this case is not a purely legal question. Instead, the district court correctly determined that whether Defendants are immune from suit is a fact-intensive inquiry that will turn on the record as it develops at least through discovery. Here, whether the Defendants are entitled to judicial or quasi-judicial immunity depends upon the scope of conduct carried out by the Defendants in their administrative capacities and whether such conduct included the oversight and enforcement of unwritten policies. Similarly, the applicability of legislative immunity is also fact-dependent, and will require the court to determine, inter alia, whether the alleged policies bear the outward marks of public decisionmaking.'. . Such fact-based issues of law require 'development of the record, a matter 'more within a district court's ken.'. .With respect to their arguments regarding judicial and quasi-judicial immunity specifically, Defendants attempt to distinguish our holding in Al Shimari by framing the immunity inquiry here as purely legal--namely, whether the arrests and incarcerations ordered by Defendants were judicial or quasi-judicial acts. This misconstrues the complaint. Plaintiffs are not suing Defendants with respect to individual judicial determinations, e.g., denials of bond or incarceration orders. In fact, as both parties acknowledge, Plaintiffs declined to sue the individual judges who sentenced them. This case is therefore distinguishable from our decision in Nero v. Mosby, 890 F.3d 106, 114 (4th Cir. 2018), where we held that the state's attorney was entitled to immunity regarding her decision to prosecute certain police officers following the death of an individual who suffered fatal injuries while in their custody. Instead, Plaintiffs allege that Defendants, acting in their administrative capacities, oversaw and enforced policies and practices that violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. Specifically, they allege that by order of the Supreme Court of South Carolina, the Chief Justice delegated significant administrative authority to Defendants Reinhart and Adams as Chief Judge and Associate Chief Judge for Administrative Purposes of the Lexington County Summary Courts, including the responsibility to establish and oversee countywide procedures to ensure the collection of court-generated revenues, and to administer the County's Bond Court. Exercising their administrative authority to control magistrate court dockets, schedules, and hours of operation, Defendants are alleged to have excluded hearings to determine people's ability to pay fees and fines. Similarly, Defendant Koon, as chief administrator of the Detention Center, had administrative powers and responsibilities. Namely, he was responsible for providing direction and overall management for the center's day-to-day operations, which included overseeing the deputies in the warrant and civil process division who track and serve warrants. In this capacity, Defendant Koon is alleged to have exercised these administrative powers to enforce a standard operating procedure of automatically arresting indigent people on bench warrants and incarcerating them in the Detention Center unless they can pay the full amount of court fines and fees owed before booking. As the Supreme Court has held, '[a]dministrative decisions, even though they may be essential to the very functioning of the courts, have not similarly been regarded as judicial acts' entitled to absolute judicial immunity. . . Therefore, while it is true that Defendants Reinhart and Adams played a role in effectuating the alleged policies through judicial actions--e.g., ordering the unconstitutional arrests and incarceration of indigent people for failure to pay fines and fees--those specific acts are not the ones that Plaintiffs challenge as unconstitutional. The same reasoning applies to Defendant Koon, whom the Plaintiffs sue in his capacity as an administrator of the Detention Center, and not as the deputy responsible for enforcing specific warrants. . . . At the same time, we emphasize our recognition of the importance of immunity from suit. And because we lack jurisdiction over the appeal, this opinion does not address Defendants' arguments on the merits as to the asserted immunities, nor does it foreclose the possibility that Defendants may be successful in so arguing following discovery on this issue. We therefore conclude that the district court's order did not conclusively resolve the disputed question, and the court's order fails to meet the threshold requirement of the collateral order doctrine.")

Adams v. Ferguson, 884 F.3d 219, 224 (4th Cir. 2018) ("Whether Ferguson owed Mitchell a duty under state negligence law is neither 'inextricably intertwined' with the question of whether Ferguson owed Mitchell a duty under the United States Constitution, nor is it 'necessary' to resolve these state law issues to 'ensure meaningful review' of Ferguson's claimed federal constitutional immunities. We therefore lack jurisdiction to review the district court's denial of Ferguson's motion to dismiss Adams's state law claims and remand those claims to the district court.")

Ussery v. Mansfield, 786 F.3d 332, 337-38 & n.4 (4th Cir. 2015) (Johnson prohibits us from reviewing on interlocutory appeal the district court's conclusion that the record does not definitively indicate the extent of Ussery's injuries. Thus we cannot and do not review the district court's assessment of the evidence. However, in denying summary judgment, the district court necessarily held that Ussery could satisfy the Norman standard. To be sure, the court did not expressly state that Ussery could establish a violation of clearly established law under Norman. But to deny the officers' motion for summary judgment, the court had to reach that conclusion. We undoubtedly have jurisdiction to review that purely legal conclusion. . . . Our jurisdiction in cases such as this is circumscribed but critical. For the Supreme Court has made plain that qualified immunity 'is an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability' and 'is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.'. . .We note that an order denying summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity would be entirely unreviewable if the defendant officers conceded that Ussery's version of the facts would establish that the officers violated clearly established law. . . . [T]he officers in this case challenge both legal and factual conclusions of the district court, and our interlocutory jurisdiction permits review of the legal conclusions.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 390 & n.4 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Mr. Tobey was not required to cross-appeal the district court's dismissal of his Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims, as our pendent jurisdiction is limited, and should only be used in extraordinary circumstances. . . . Therefore, the district court's decision to dismiss Mr. Tobey's Fourth Amendment claim is inconsequential to this Court's finding that Mr. Tobey asserted a plausible First Amendment claim. Again, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Mr. Tobey, we find that it is unsettled whether his behavior was in fact 'disruptive' or that it was 'eminently reasonable' to effectuate an arrest based on his conduct in spite of the text of the Fourth Amendment written on his chest. . . Thus, Mr. Tobey's First Amendment claim properly survives the motion to dismiss.")

Kane v. Lewis, 483 F. App'x 816, 823 (4th Cir. 2012) ("Here, the district court denied the officers' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity with regard to Kane's knock-and-announce claim 'because a dispute of material fact exists as to whether the officers knocked and announced.'. . 'Whether we agree or disagree with the district court's assessment of the record evidence on that issue ... is of no moment in the context of this interlocutory appeal.'. . This is because 'there is no legal issue on appeal on which we could base jurisdiction.'. . Illustrative of this point is the fact that the officers present no legal questions in their opening brief, only arguments about the disputed factual questions regarding the knock-and-announce claim. As such, we must also dismiss the cross-appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Al Shimari v. CACI Intern., Inc., 679 F.3d 205, 221-23 (4th Cir. 2012) (en banc) ("Here, as in Iqbal, there is no 'vast pretrial record' to encumber our decisionmaking, . . . but the issues before us are more factually entrenched and far less amenable to meaningful analysis by resort merely to the plaintiffs' pleadings. Thus, unlike Iqbal, these appeals encompass fact-based issues of law, with the need for additional development of the record being among those 'matters more within a district court's ken.'. .Hence, insofar as an interlocutory appeal of a denial of immunity requires resolution of a purely legal question (such as whether an alleged constitutional violation was of clearly established law), or an ostensibly fact-bound issue that may be resolved as a matter of law

(such as whether facts that are undisputed or viewed in a particular light are material to the immunity calculus), we may consider and rule upon it. . . .Behrens, then, confers jurisdiction of these appeals only if the record at the dismissal stage can be construed to present a pure issue of law. We might discern such an issue if we were of the opinion, as the dissenters evidently are, that persons similarly situated to the appellants are inevitably and invariably immune from suit premised on any and all conduct occurring (1) when they are in a war zone, by virtue of (2) a contract with the government. But not even Saleh, which receives a ringing endorsement in both dissents, went that far. . . . The appellants are requesting immunity in a context that has been heretofore unexplored. These are not disputes in which facts that might be material to the ultimate issue have been conclusively identified. Moreover, those facts that may have been tentatively designated as outcome-determinative are yet subject to genuine dispute, that is, a reasonable fact-finder could conclude in favor of either the plaintiffs or the defendants. . . Because the courts' immunity rulings below turn on genuineness, we lack jurisdiction to consider them on an interlocutory appeal.")

Al Shimari v. CACI Intern., Inc., 679 F.3d 205, 224 (4th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Duncan, J., concurring) ("I respect the majority's well-reasoned opinion in this case and therefore fully concur in its conclusion that we lack jurisdiction to hear this appeal. I write separately only to express my hope that the district courts in these consolidated appeals will give due consideration to the appellant's immunity and preemption arguments—especially in light of the Supreme Court's recent opinion in Filarsky v. Delia, 132 S.Ct. 1657 (2012), as discussed in Judge Niemeyer's dissent—which are far from lacking in force.")

Al Shimari v. CACI Intern., Inc., 679 F.3d 205, 248-57 (4th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Niemeyer, J., joined by Wilkinson, J., and Shedd, J., dissenting) ("The majority today disregards controlling Supreme Court precedents and belittles the gravity of the issues presented in these cases, purporting to find comfort in its narrow application of the collateral order doctrine. Its effort is regrettably threadbare. Military contractors performing work in the Iraqi war zone under the command and control of the United States military have invoked our jurisdiction, claiming immunity from tort suits brought by foreign nationals detained as part of the war effort. As a matter of convenience, the majority ducks making a decision on this issue of greatest importance to the public interest because it feels that discovery and further district court proceedings would assist it in making a decision. But in giving that as a reason, the majority fails to follow the Supreme Court's command in Behrens v. Pelletier, 516 U.S. 299 (1996), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), that we hear such claims of immunity now, simply on the basis of the complaint. It is simply too easy to claim, as does the majority, that unresolved facts bar consideration now of the defendants' immunity claims. There are always unresolved facts. Without any explanation, the majority fails to recognize that the undisputed facts of the plaintiffs' claims alone allow a court to rule on the defendants' immunity claims as a matter of law. It would appear that only the Supreme Court can now fix our wayward course. . . .To the extent the majority is simply stating the well-established rule that a collateral order immunity appeal must present a purely legal question, there can be no debate that the appeals in the cases before us present just such a question. Mitchell, Behrens, and Iqbal establish without question that these appeals present a purely legal question because we are asked to decide whether the defendants are entitled to derivative immunity on the basis of the facts as alleged by the plaintiffs in their complaints. The possibility that a factfinder might construe these facts in favor of the defendants at a later time does not, by some heretofore unknown legal device, create a factual dispute that deprives us of jurisdiction at the motion-to-dismiss stage. As a matter of logical necessity, there can be no genuine issue of material fact when we are reviewing only the facts as alleged by the plaintiff in the complaint. The majority simply ignores Mitchell's statement that 'the appealable issue is a purely legal one: whether the facts alleged' support a claim of immunity. . .The majority's claim that it could only discern a 'pure issue of law' if it 'were of the opinion, as the dissenters evidently are, that persons similarly situated to the appellants are inevitably and invariably immune from suit,' ante, at 32–33, demonstrates the fundamental error of its approach. If the majority believes that the defendants cannot establish their claims to immunity from suit, accepting as true the facts in the complaint, then it should deny the derivative immunity defense on the merits and allow the district courts to proceed and develop a fuller factual record. Indeed, Behrens considers this very possibility, allowing the defendants to pursue a second immunity appeal after the denial of summary judgment even if they have already unsuccessfully appealed the district court's denial of their motion to dismiss. . . Surprisingly, the majority admits that we have jurisdiction to review whether 'facts that are undisputed or viewed in a particular light are material to the immunity calculus,'. . . but then mysteriously concludes that we cannot determine whether these same facts establish immunity. Thus, under the majority's novel approach to the collateral order doctrine, we have jurisdiction to review whether undisputed facts are 'material' to a question of immunity, but we have no jurisdiction to review the immunity determination itself. Such a rule finds absolutely no legal support. . . .[R]ecently, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed the need to protect those who perform government functions with immunity regardless of whether they are public employees, such as military officers, or private individuals retained to perform the same function. See Filarsky v. Delia, 132 S.Ct. 1662, 1663 (2012). . .But the majority never disputes this, nor even discusses why the allegations in the complaint present only a frivolous and unsubstantial claim to derivative immunity. Instead, it frames the dispositive question as one of finality. In so doing, the majority ignores the fundamental and well-established principle that a district court's denial of a motion to dismiss based on an immunity from suit is a final, immediately appealable collateral order. Whether discovery could help make the issue more clear or whether the district courts wanted a fuller record before ruling on the merits of immunity is irrelevant. The defendants claim entitlement to be protected from the litigation process, and the court's refusal to grant the immunity denied them that protection and was therefore an appealable decision under Mitchell, Behrens, Iqbal, Jenkins, Winfield, and McVey. It is most regrettable that the majority so readily tramples on these precedents, which clearly provide us with appellate jurisdiction at this stage of the proceedings to consider the substantial claims of immunity asserted by the defendants on the basis of the facts alleged in the complaint.")

Bellotte v. Edwards, 629 F.3d 415, 427 (4th Cir. 2011) ("The Bellottes. . . contend that because we have appellate jurisdiction over the denial of qualified immunity with respect to the no-knock entry and excessive-weapons claims, see Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 530 (1985), we should choose to exercise pendent jurisdiction over the cross-appeal. Specifically, the Bellottes contend that '[i]t would be in the interest of judicial economy to resolve all of these issues on this appeal' because '[b]oth the Police Defendants' appeal and the Plaintiffs' cross-appeal deal with the constitutionality of the search of the Bellotte residence and whether the Police Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.' This argument misses the mark. For starters, '[p]endent appellate jurisdiction is an exception of limited and narrow application driven by considerations of need, rather than of efficiency.'. . Even if this were otherwise a proper case for pendent jurisdiction, '[w]e are constrained by the language of the Supreme Court as well as our own precedent from recognizing efficiency considerations as a basis for the exercise of pendent appellate jurisdiction.'. . Instead, we have recognized that such jurisdiction is proper only when an issue 'is (1) inextricably intertwined with the decision of the lower court to deny qualified immunity or (2) consideration of the additional issue is necessary to ensure meaningful review of the qualified immunity question.'. . The Bellottes have not argued that any of the issues on cross-appeal are 'inextricably intertwined with,' or 'necessary to ensure meaningful review of,' the denials of qualified immunity below such that pendent appellate jurisdiction is now appropriate. This omission is understandable. Our review of the qualified immunity denials in no way requires an evaluation of the claims that were dismissed on summary judgment concerning the validity of the search warrant and the reasonableness of elements of the search other than the no-knock entry and use of weapons. The appeal and the cross-appeal, while sharing certain wholesale commonalities of fact (the incidents leading up to and during the search of the Bellotte residence) and law (the Fourth Amendment), nevertheless present quite distinct factual and legal issues at the retail level. . . We therefore dismiss the cross-appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

H.H. ex rel. H.F. v. Moffett, 335 F. App'x 306, 312 (4th Cir. 2009) (collecting cases from sister circuits that have found deferrals of decision on an immunity claim while discovery was conducted immediately appealable where district court had Aplainly decided. . . as a matter of law" that defendants' alleged conduct violated plaintiff's clearly established constitutional rights)

Iko v. Shreve, 535 F.3d 225, 235, 236 (4th Cir. 2008) ("We agree with Plaintiffs that the officers' appellate argument on this claim asks us to revisit a number of factual disputes. As explained in their briefs and extensively at oral argument, however, the officers also argue that the right to be free from an excessive deployment of force by pepper spray was not clearly established–a question of law that does not require us to revisit any factual disputes. We possess jurisdiction over such a legal determination. . . . Again, on appeal, the officers argue about the contours of their legal duty to address Iko's medical needs and whether existing case law clearly established that he be treated, on the facts accepted by the district court. There is, therefore, a legal question appropriate for our review at this time: whether the officers' failure to secure medical care for Iko after he was doused in pepper spray and collapsed in the medical room violated Iko's clearly established right to have his medical needs addressed.").

Ridpath v. Bd. of Governors of Marshall University, 447 F.3d 292, 305, 306 (4th Cir. 2006) ("Generally, qualified immunity must be raised in an answer or a dismissal motion. . . Moreover, where–as here– defendants raise an issue such as qualified immunity only in a reply brief, a district court is entitled to refuse to consider it at that stage of the proceedings. . . . We are not, however, precluded from considering an affirmative defense that was not properly asserted in the trial court, if the court has nonetheless chosen to address it. . . Such review is particularly appropriate if the plaintiff suffers no prejudice, and if hearing the appeal serves 'the strong public policy in economizing the use of judicial resources by avoiding relitigation.'. . Here, we cannot say that Ridpath was prejudiced by the district court's consideration of the untimely qualified immunity claims of the Board and the Administrators. Indeed, the court rejected them. Moreover, although there is no indication in the record that Ridpath was allowed to respond to these claims, it also does not appear that he sought to do so. Ridpath fully addressed the relevant qualified immunity issues in his submissions to us, and he did not initially object to our jurisdiction. In these circumstances, and in the interest of judicial economy, we will consider the merits of the qualified immunity claims of the Board and the Administrators.").

Altman v. City of High Point, 330 F.3d 194, 207 n.10 (4th Cir. 2003) ("High Point has also appealed the denial of summary judgment. Normally, High Point's appeal would be improper because the denial of summary judgment is not a final order subject to interlocutory appeal and High Point cannot defend on the basis of qualified immunity. However, our resolution of the claims against Officers Moxley and Perdue fully resolves the claims against High Point as well, since a municipality cannot be liable in the absence of a constitutional violation by one of its agents. . . For that reason, we find that the issues raised by High Point on appeal are 'inextricably intertwined' with those raised by the officers. Accordingly, we will exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over High Point's appeal and reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment as to the City.").

Lewis v. Boucher, No. 01-1584, 2002 WL 939556, at *4, *5 (4th Cir. May 9, 2002) (unpublished) ("Here, the district court explicitly stated that a reasonable jury could find that Boucher shot Lewis in the back, but it did not fully set forth the other facts it assumed to be supported by the summary judgment record when it rejected Boucher's qualified immunity defense. We have therefore undertaken the inquiry mandated by Winfield in order to identify the facts that the district court likely assumed in making its qualified immunity ruling. We conclude that, viewed in the light most favorable to Lewis, the evidence in the summary judgment record would allow a reasonable jury to conclude that Lewis was pulled over for a minor traffic violation (driving with a headlight out); that Lewis was completely unarmed; that in the moments before he was shot, Lewis kept his hands visible in compliance with Officer Boucher's request "to show [Boucher] his hands or to get down on the ground;" that Lewis did not threaten Boucher physically or verbally; and that Boucher issued no verbal warning before he shot Lewis. Along with the fact that Boucher shot Lewis in the back, these are the facts the district court likely assumed in its summary judgment ruling. They provide the factual basis for our review of the district court's legal conclusion that Boucher was not entitled to qualified immunity on Lewis's excessive force claim. Assuming this factual basis, we have no difficulty in concluding that the district court correctly denied Boucher's motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity.").

Brown v. Gilmore, 278 F.3d 362, 366 n.2 (4th Cir. 2002) ("Brown contends that the officers may not appeal the district court's denial of qualified immunity because the district court determined that there were genuine issues of material fact in dispute. . . However, this appeal does not turn on disputed facts, but, rather, presents a question of law–whether the facts taken in the light most favorable to Brown allege a constitutional violation at all. . . . And the Supreme Court only recently made clear in Saucier v. Katz, 121 S.Ct. 2151, 2156 (2001), that qualified immunity is 'an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability; and like an absolute immunity, it is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.' . . The questions of law presented in this case are thus precisely those which should be resolved at 'the earliest possible stage in litigation' if appeal under the collateral order doctrine is to serve the purposes of immunity at all.").

Gould v. Davis, 165 F.3d 265, 269 (4th Cir. 1998) ("While the district court is correct that different facts in evidence could be used to support different conclusions as to whether the officers deserve qualified immunity, this does not indicate a factual dispute, but rather, a question of law. The district court's order does not point to disputed questions of fact, but rather, disputed legal inferences that could be drawn from what is an undisputed factual record. . . . Here, there is no dispute about what information the officers had before them when they applied for and executed the no-knock warrant; the only question is whether the hypothetical "reasonable officer" would have known, given those undisputed facts, that his conduct was in violation of clearly established constitutional law. . . . .[W]e have jurisdiction to review the district court's order.").

McVey v. Stacy, 157 F.3d 271, 276 (4th Cir. 1998) ("[I]n rejecting the immunity defense 'at this early stage,' the district court necessarily subjected the commissioners to the burden of further trial procedures and discovery, perhaps unnecessarily. Its order implicitly ruled against the commissioners on the legal questions of (1) whether the plaintiff has adequately stated a claim for violation of a First Amendment right, and, if so, (2) whether the asserted constitutional right was clearly established at the time the defendants acted. . . These questions do not raise factual questions concerning the defendants' involvement, which would not be appealable under Johnson. On the contrary, they are answered with the facts of the complaint assumed to be true as a matter of law. They are therefore the very questions that Mitchell held were appealable. . . . [W]e have jurisdiction to consider whether the defendants' conduct as alleged in the complaint is, as a matter of law, protected by qualified immunity.").

Rish v. Johnson, 131 F.3d 1092, 1100-01 (4th Cir. 1997) ("In sum, the evidence supporting a conclusion that the prison officials possessed actual knowledge of a substantial risk of harm to the inmates is insufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact. And, there is no clearly established law dictating that prison officials are deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of bodily harm if they fail to provide equipment to inmates to ensure that they may follow universal precautions in performing the duties of an orderly. Thus, the district court erred in refusing to grant summary judgment to the prison officials on the basis of qualified immunity.").

Rish v. Johnson, 131 F.3d 1092, 1101 (4th Cir. 1997) (Murnaghan, J., dissenting) ("This Circuit's decision in Winfield . . . almost totally emasculated the Supreme Court's Johnson holding. In Winfield, we held that 'in determining what facts the district court "likely assumed," we must determine what the evidence actually shows when viewed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party.'. . Today's majority uses the Winfield holding to return to the precise practice that the Supreme Court overruled in Johnson–reversing a denial of summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity because the circuit court believes that 'the evidence presented was insufficient to create a triable issue of fact.'").

Ervin v. Mangum, No. 93-7129, 1997 WL 664606, at *8 (4th Cir. Oct. 27, 1997) (unpublished) (Wilkins, J., concurring in judgment) ("Johnson and Winfield acknowledged that in order to conduct the legal analysis that is properly considered on interlocutory appeal from a denial of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, a reviewing court must know the factual circumstances to which the legal standards are to be applied. . . The question arises, then, how a reviewing court is to determine the factual basis to which it should look in resolving the legal question over which it possesses jurisdiction. The Johnson Court recognized that it will often be possible for an appellate court to utilize the facts that were assumed by the district court in denying the motion for summary judgment. . . But, the Court also accepted that when the district court fails to set forth the facts on which its decision was based, 'a court of appeals may have to undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.' . . . . [The district court's] ruling falls short of providing an adequate factual basis for us to conduct a review of the officials' entitlement to qualified immunity. . . . This lack of specificity in the ruling of the district court dictates that we must conduct a review of the record to determine what the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Ervin, discloses. . . . Hence, under these circumstances it is necessary to conduct the type of analysis undertaken by the majority, and I agree with its ultimate conclusion that, viewed in the light most favorable to Ervin, the undisputed facts demonstrate that the prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity on Ervin's claims of deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm and, except for Officer Scott, to a serious medical condition.").

Gillen v. Huggins, Nos. 94-2654, 94-2655, 1997 WL 657134, *2 (4th Cir. Oct. 23, 1997) (unpublished) ("Like the district court in Winfield, the district court in this case has found that genuine issues of material fact are at issue. Were this factual finding the appellants' sole ground of contention, we would have no jurisdiction to consider it as a final decision under 28 U.S.C.A. § 1291 (West 1993). But even assuming that the resolution of those disputed facts favors the appellants, the appellees' alleged conduct must nonetheless have violated clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known. The district court's denial of appellants' motion for summary judgment necessarily indicates the court's ruling that a reasonable trier of fact, assessing the undisputed facts and construing disputed facts in favor of the non-movant, could find that the appellants violated a right of which a reasonable person would have known. . . Our consideration of that ruling provides the jurisdictional basis for this appeal.").

Winfield v. Bass, 106 F.3d 525, 529-30 (4th Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("[E]ach decision of a district court denying a governmental official's request for summary judgment based upon qualified immunity will encompass a determination that the facts are sufficiently controverted to warrant a trial and that the legal right purportedly violated was clearly established. Obviously, if a determination by a district court that genuine issues of material fact warrant trial were sufficient to prevent us from exercising jurisdiction over an appeal from an order rejecting a qualified immunity defense, we would never have jurisdiction over such appeals–a result plainly at odds with Mitchell and its progeny. [citing Behrens] Consequently, we conclude that we possess jurisdiction to consider an appeal from a decision of a district court rejecting a government official's claim of entitlement to qualified immunity to the extent that the official maintains that the official's conduct did not violate clearly established law. Alternatively, to the extent that the appealing official seeks to argue the insufficiency of the evidence to raise a genuine issue of material fact–for example, that the evidence presented was insufficient to support a conclusion that the official engaged in the particular conduct alleged–we do not possess jurisdiction under ' 1291 to consider the claim and, therefore, may not do so absent some independent jurisdictional base.").

Winfield v. Bass, 106 F.3d 525, 535 (4th Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("In sum, we conclude that when a district court fails to set forth fully the factual basis upon which its legal conclusion that a governmental official is not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, this court reviews the evidence properly before the district court for purposes of considering the summary judgment question. It then determines what the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, demonstrated. This is the factual basis that the district court 'likely assumed' in rendering its legal conclusion and is the factual basis upon which this court must render its decision on the purely legal issues presented in the appeal. Furthermore, when undisputed material facts are present that the district court did not consider in ruling on the qualified immunity issue, this court need not ignore those facts in rendering its legal decision.").

Winfield v. Bass, 106 F.3d 525, 541 (4th Cir. 1997) (en banc) (Motz, J., concurring) ("I write separately simply to note that in this case we have no occasion to reach the question of whether we are also at liberty to follow this approach when the district court has adequately set forth the facts it finds in dispute. That is, in this more usual case, do we have jurisdiction to go beyond the district court's holding and plumb the summary judgment record to make our own assessment as to what are the material facts, taken in the best light for the plaintiff, or are we limited to the facts relied upon by the district court. Behrens and Johnson would seem to hold that we must accept the facts as relied upon by the district court. However, resolution of that question must await another day.").

Elliott v. Leavitt, 105 F.3d 174, 177 (4th Cir. 1997) (Wilkinson, C.J., concurring in denial of reh'g en banc) ("Behrens' warning that appellate jurisdiction is not abolished simply because the case involves asserted factual disputes was an apparently vain attempt to preempt precisely the sort of over-reading of Johnson proposed by my dissenting colleagues. Under Behrens, we are to respect the role reserved for the trial court by Johnson, but we are not to slam the door to interlocutory appeals on the district court's mere recitation of the mantra that 'a genuine issue of fact exists.'").

Elliott v. Leavitt, 105 F.3d 174, 181, 184 (4th Cir. 1997) (Motz, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) ("In short, the district court held that there was a question of whether 'particular conduct occurred,' i.e., the court held that there was sufficient evidence to support the Elliotts' version of the story and deny summary judgment. This decision is precisely the type that Behrens and Johnson conclude is not an immediately appealable, final decision. Behrens and Johnson direct that an appellate court cannot hear appeals of district court decisions which involve a finding that particular conduct occurred, or might have occurred, unless the appellate court can 'take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed' and rule as a matter of law. [cites omitted] In this case the panel simply disagrees with the district court's reading of the facts, and impermissibly replaces its reading of the evidence for the district court's. . . . Officers Leavitt and Cheney may ultimately be held entitled to immunity. The district court may even have erred in denying them immunity at this juncture. But, unquestionably the basis for the district court's denial was its assessment that 'the evidence could support a finding that particular conduct [Archie had no gun] occurred.' . . . Equally clearly, the basis for the majority's decision to reverse is its assessment that the same evidence could not 'support a finding' that this 'particular conduct occurred.' . . . Behrens and Johnson forbid an appellate court from making this reassessment on interlocutory appeal.").

Jackson v. Long, 102 F.3d 722, 727 (4th Cir. 1996) ("The Johnson principle is limited to the circumstance where the dispute on appeal is whether a factual dispute was created. If, however, resolution of the factual dispute is immaterial to whether immunity should be afforded, the underlying legal question about whether immunity is to be afforded remains and may be appealed under Mitchell as a collateral order. . . . The facts which are relevant for determining whether Sheriff Long has immunity must be taken from the viewpoint of Sheriff Long at the time he terminated the jailers and not of an independent factfinder looking later in hindsight at whether the assault actually occurred or whether Sheriff Long proved to be right in his decisions. No factual question was raised about whether Sheriff Long reasonably believed that sufficient facts existed to initiate an investigation or that he could, as a matter of state law, dismiss Jackson and Penland as at-will employees.").

Bonner v. Anderson, 81 F.3d 472, 476 (4th Cir. 1996) ("Application of the qualified immunity defense requires a court to answer two questions: (1) whether the constitutional right allegedly violated was clearly established, and (2) whether genuine issues of material fact exist regarding the officer's conduct. . . The first inquiry presents a purely legal issue; the second calls for factual determinations. . . . The difficulty with [Defendant's] position at this stage of the proceedings pertains to the second element of qualified immunity. The disputes centering on whether the police announced their presence and, more importantly, whether someone opened and quickly shut the door to the Mealey house are genuine issues of material fact. . . . In accordance with the precept of Johnson, . . . we dismiss [Defendant's] appeal.").

Buonocore v. Harris, 65 F.3d 347, 361 n.9 (4th Cir. 1995)("The Jones Court made it clear that appellate jurisdiction over the question of whether a defendant violated clearly established rights of which a reasonable person would have known should not be regarded as a basis for exercising pendent jurisdiction over fact-related qualified immunity questions.").

Finelli v. Tabb, 67 F.3d 67, 70 (4th Cir. 1995) ("Here . . . the deputies insist that Johnson is inapplicable because, as a matter of law, undisputed material facts objectively show that they acted reasonably without excessive force under the circumstances that confronted them. The deputies' argument is predicated on the belief that appellate courts should comb the record to determine de novo whether the facts are undisputed and whether any genuine issues of material fact exist. But this exercise is what Johnson precludes. It is the course we followed in Turner v. Dammon, 848 F.2d 440, 444 (4th Cir.1988), which the Court rejected in Johnson . . . . As Johnson explains, the district court's denial of qualified immunity because of its conclusion that a genuine issue of material fact exists for trial is not immediately appealable.").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Harris v. Clay County, Mississippi, No. 21-60456, 2022 WL 3646129, at *3-4 (5th Cir. Aug. 24, 2022) ("We . . . have repeatedly refused to treat summary judgment denials involving municipalities or officers sued in their official capacities as appealable collateral orders. . . Nor do we have pendent party jurisdiction over Clay County. Defendants assume that if Clay County's liability is 'inextricably intertwined' with that of the individual officers, that provides 'support [for] pendent appellate jurisdiction.' But this court has never permitted—and has indeed rejected—pendent party (as opposed to pendent claim) interlocutory jurisdiction. [collecting cases] Other circuits do sometimes exercise pendent party jurisdiction over orders involving municipalities when individuals with qualified immunity also appeal, . . . but we do not. Bryan Lammon, Municipal Piggybacking in Qualified-Immunity Appeals, 126 PA. ST. L. REV. 123, 141 (2021) ("[T]he Fifth Circuit [ ] appears to have rejected [municipal piggybacking].... I could not find any Fifth Circuit decisions to the contrary."). Often the practical difference in these approaches will be negligible. If, for example, we rule in an interlocutory appeal of a defendant with qualified immunity that there is no underlying constitutional violation, then it should be perfunctory on remand for the district court to enter an order applying that ruling to the benefit of a municipality. . . But our rule against pendent party interlocutory jurisdiction has a greater impact in this case: It means we cannot consider the forced medication claim that survived only against Clay County. And, of course, it means that we do not have interlocutory jurisdiction to decide whether any constitutional violation for detaining Harris is attributable to the county.")

Poole v. City of Shreveport, 13 F.4th 420, 423-26 (5th Cir. 2021) ("[T]here is an important limit on our interlocutory review—a limit that this appeal largely turns on. With one exception discussed below, we cannot question the district court's assessment of 'whether there is enough evidence in the record for a jury to conclude that certain facts are true.'. . We only review whether the factual disputes identified by the district court are material to the denial of qualified immunity—that is, whether the factual disputes viewed in favor of the plaintiff make out a violation of clearly established law. . . The district court denied qualified immunity after finding three factual disputes a jury must resolve:
1. Whether Briceno warned Poole before firing;
2. Whether Poole was turned away from Briceno during the shooting; and
3. Whether Briceno could see that Poole's hands were empty.
Once it determined that a jury could find that Briceno shot Poole in the back, without warning and knowing his hands were empty, the district court readily concluded that such conduct would violate clearly established law. Given the manifest unreasonableness of shooting an individual the officer can see is unarmed and not aggressive, Briceno understandably tries to push back on these findings. But his argument that the district court should have accepted his account of the incident runs up against our inability at this stage to review the existence of fact disputes. . . . If a jury views the disputed facts in favor of the plaintiff—concluding that Briceno shot Poole, without warning, seeing that he was empty-handed and turning away from the officer—then Briceno violated Poole's clearly established right to be free from unreasonable seizure.")

Cunningham v. Castloo, 983 F.3d 185, 190 (5th Cir. 2020) ("In determining materiality, we take Cunningham's version of the facts as true and view those facts through the lens of qualified immunity. . . If Sheriff Castloo would still be entitled to qualified immunity under this view of the facts, then any disputed facts are not material, the district court's denial of summary judgment was improper, and we must reverse. . . These precepts are clear, though perhaps less so to Cunningham. She contends that we lack jurisdiction because the district court said that it found genuine disputes of material fact. Not so. The mere fact that the district court said that, in its view, material factual disputes preclude summary judgment does not deprive us of interlocutory appellate jurisdiction. . . We may of course decide whether the factual disputes the district court said were material are in fact material.")

Amador v. Vasquez, 961 F.3d 721, 728-31 (5th Cir. 2020), on pet. for rehearing ("[T]he district court found three genuine disputes of material fact that barred qualified immunity because resolving those facts in Plaintiffs' favor led the court to conclude that shooting Flores was objectively unreasonable. The district court found the relevant, genuine disputes of material fact to be: (1) 'whether Flores did open the door or did look inside to see the keys in the ignition or see the weapon that was inside the SUV'; (2) whether Flores tried to activate the taser against the officers; and (3) what occurred in the moments before the deputies shot Flores. Considering the totality of the circumstances, focusing on the act that led the officers to discharge their weapons, and without reviewing the district court's decision that genuine factual disputes exist, . . . we conclude that the genuine issues of material fact identified by the district court are material, and this case should proceed to trial. Relying on their version of the facts, yet purportedly relying on the video, the officers argue that they reasonably believed that Flores posed a threat of serious harm to the officers or to others. . . According to the officers, Flores 'opened the front passenger door of the Tahoe Patrol vehicle of Deputy Vasquez, [sic] said vehicle had the keys in the ignition and an AR-15 inside the vehicle.' They further contend that Flores 'picked up Deputy Vasquez' [sic] taser from the street and attempted to activate it against Deputy [sic] Vasquez and Sanchez but was unsuccessful.' Most significantly, the officers assert that 'Deputies Vasquez and Sanchez were in imminent fear of death or serious bodily injury by the actions of Gilbert Flores at the time of the fatal shots.'. . However, Plaintiffs assert that at the time Flores was shot, Flores was not next to the patrol car, Flores had 'raised both of his hands directly above his head with the knife "palmed" in his left hand' and 'raised his hands in apparent surrender, stood still, his hands were not moving, his feet were not moving, he was not moving or advancing toward the Deputies and no family members of [sic] neighbors were outside or in the vicinity.' Collectively, these factual disputes are material to resolving whether the officers reasonably believed that Flores posed a threat of serious harm at the time of the shooting. Construing the facts in Plaintiffs' favor, the district court found that a 'reasonable officer would have concluded that Flores, who was stationary for several seconds and put his hands in the air while remaining otherwise motionless, was no longer resisting and had signaled surrender.' We agree. Flores had a knife, not a gun; was several feet away from the officers, the house, and the vehicle; had his hands in the air in a surrender position; and stood stationary in the officers' line of sight. Under these facts taken in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, we conclude that the district court correctly identified material factual disputes as to whether the officers violated Flores's Fourth Amendment rights. Accordingly, we must address the second question of the analysis. . . . The second question in the qualified immunity analysis is whether clearly established law prohibited the officers from shooting Flores in these circumstances. . . Again, the answer is yes. . . . A reasonable officer would have understood that using deadly force on a man holding a knife, but standing nearly thirty feet from the deputies, motionless, and with his hands in the air for several seconds, would violate the Fourth Amendment. The officers argue that they were justified in using deadly force because Flores posed an immediate threat at several instances before their ultimate use of deadly force. However, 'an exercise of force that is reasonable at one moment can become unreasonable in the next if the justification for the use of the force has ceased.'. . To say otherwise would grant officers '"an ongoing license to kill an otherwise unthreatening suspect"' who was threatening earlier. . . .We find that if a jury accepts Plaintiffs' version of the facts as true, particularly as to what occurred in the moments before the deputies shot Flores, the jury could conclude that the officers violated Flores's clearly established right to be free from excessive force. See Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 447, as revised (5th Cir. Aug. 21, 2019) (en banc) ("We conclude that it will be for a jury, and not judges, to resolve the competing factual narratives as detailed in the district court opinion and the record as to the ... excessive-force claim."). Accordingly, there are factual disputes that must be resolved to make the qualified immunity determination, disputes that are material, and we lack jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal. . . .Because there are genuine issues of material fact that preclude summary judgment, we lack jurisdiction to review this appeal and DISMISS.")

Romero v. Brown, 937 F.3d 514, 520-22 (5th Cir. 2019) ("A balancing test is difficult terrain for a party having to prove a clear violation of the law. . . . Defeating immunity for a family integrity claim thus 'hinges, in large part, upon the degree of fit between the facts of this case' and our prior opinions. . . . That fit is lacking here. Two features of this case are absent from any of our child removal cases finding a substantive due process violation: a pending investigation into domestic violence and a removal lasting only one day. . . . Although the state's taking children for any amount of time is a serious encroachment on a parent's fundamental right, the one-day removal of Romero's children is a much less substantial interference with the right to control a child's upbringing than these far lengthier removals. . . . Combine that with the role of a child welfare officer who had a pending investigation into domestic violence, and there is not a similar case finding substantive due process liability. As a result, qualified immunity protects Brown from the substantive due process claim. . . .[F]or the qualified immunity analysis, unlike the fuzzy continuum that governs substantive due process in this area, there are bright lines when it comes to the procedural safeguards. The rule is this: A child cannot be removed 'without a court order or exigent circumstances.'. . This is the same standard that governs a child's Fourth Amendment claim for being removed from the family. . . . It is thus clearly established that a court order or exigency is the predeprivation process that is due when social workers remove a child.")

Waller v. Hanlon, 922 F.3d 590, 598-99 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Despite the general rule, the plaintiffs argue that we do not have jurisdiction to review the district court's order denying the defendants' motions for a judgment on the pleadings because, in denying those motions, the district court determined that 'genuine issues of material fact' precluded dismissal. This argument confuses the procedural posture of this case. In hearing an appeal from an order denying summary judgment on qualified-immunity grounds, we have jurisdiction to 'review the materiality of any factual disputes, but not their genuineness.'. . But this appeal comes to us on the defendants' motions for judgment on the pleadings, not summary judgment. In reviewing the defendants' motions for judgment on the pleadings, the district court did not (and could not) consider whether the evidence created a genuine factual dispute. . . We possess—and routinely exercise—jurisdiction to review a district court's determination at the pleadings stage that a plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to overcome a qualified-immunity defense. . . Accordingly, we have jurisdiction to review the district court's rulings on the defendants' qualified-immunity defenses to the plaintiffs' § 1983 claims. Whether we have jurisdiction to review the portion of the district court's order addressing the plaintiffs' state-law declaratory-judgment claims is a separate question. As the plaintiffs point out, the defendants do not assert immunity from these claims—nor could they because qualified immunity applies only to claims for money damages. . . We thus agree with the plaintiffs that, normally, the denial of a motion to dismiss a declaratory-judgment claim is not immediately appealable. But we may exercise pendent jurisdiction over interlocutory orders when, inter alia, 'addressing the pendent claim will further the purpose of officer-immunities by helping the officer avoid trial' or 'the claims involve precisely the same facts and elements.'. . Both situations are present here. It would undermine the purpose of qualified immunity if the defendants here were subject to trial on the declaratory-judgment claims despite immunity from the § 1983 claims. . . Further, the plaintiffs identify no differences between the facts or elements needed to prove their declaratory-judgment claims and those needed to prove their § 1983 claims. Accordingly, we have jurisdiction to review the district court's rulings on the plaintiffs' declaratory-judgment claims. . . . We first consider whether the plaintiffs allege sufficient facts to overcome Hoeppner's qualified-immunity defense to their excessive-force claim. The parties appear to agree that that Hoeppner did not violate Waller's rights if Waller was holding the gun at the time he was shot but did violate Waller's clearly established rights if Waller was not holding the gun. Neither party makes an argument under the second prong of the qualified-immunity test. Thus, only the first prong is at issue here, and the sole question is whether the plaintiffs' pleadings plausibly allege that Waller was unarmed when Hoeppner shot him. We conclude the plaintiffs' claim is plausible based on the specific and detailed factual allegations they advance in support of their theory of events.")

Ramirez v. Escajeda, 921 F.3d 497, 499-501 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Government officials are often entitled to qualified immunity ("QI") from liability for civil damages for performing their discretionary duties. . . And when a district court denies QI, we may immediately review the denial. . . But 'we have jurisdiction only to decide whether the district court erred in concluding as a matter of law that officials are not entitled to [QI] on a given set of facts.'. . We may not 'review the simple denial of a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim.'. . Because the defendant here has abandoned the former and presses only the latter, we dismiss the appeal. . . .Though Escajeda styles this appeal as a challenge to the denial of QI, he makes no attempt to show that, taking well-pleaded facts as true, he did not violate Daniel's clearly-established constitutional rights. . . By presenting but failing to brief it, Escajeda has abandoned the issue whether the district court erred in denying QI. . . And Escajeda raises no other issue that we may consider in this limited appeal. His sole contention is that the district court erred in denying the motion to dismiss because the Ramirezes have not pleaded 'a claim [to] relief that is plausible on its face.'. . He attacks the credibility of the facts pleaded, averring that 'there were no witnesses present during the incident,' so '[t]he Plaintiffs have no idea what [he] saw, heard, felt, or thought.' He concludes by urging us to 'determine whether the Plaintiffs [sic] allegations move across the line from possible to plausible based entirely on supposition and make-believe.' That is 'merely an attack on the district court's denial of his motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim.'. . We lack jurisdiction to consider that challenge at this early facet of the proceedings. . . Escajeda insists that in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, . . . the Court rejected the idea that a reviewing court lacks jurisdiction to consider the sufficiency of the pleadings in an interlocutory appeal from the denial of QI. He misses the mark. We may review 'whether the facts pleaded establish' 'a violation of clearly-established law.'. . That is a legal issue fully within our jurisdiction on interlocutory appeal. But Iqbal does not allow us to question the credibility of the facts pleaded, which is what Escajeda asks us to do. Iqbal, instead, tells us to 'assume the[ ] veracity' of 'well-pleaded factual allegations' and 'determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief.'. .The appeal is DISMISSED for want of jurisdiction.")

Dean v. Phatak, 911 F.3d 286, 290 (5th Cir. 2018) ("In the absence of an identification of summary judgment evidence relied upon, we cannot affirm the denial of qualified immunity, and, in deference to the district court, we decline to search the record further. That effort must be undertaken by the district court in the first instance—mindful that unless a rational juror could find that Phatak intentionally misstated his finding, he is entitled to qualified immunity. Negligence, even gross negligence, is not sufficient. We vacate and remand for the district court to reconsider Phatak's motion for summary judgment, setting out its determination as to whether there is a genuine dispute as to material facts. The district court should cite summary judgment evidence—the depositions, documents, affidavits or declarations, stipulations, admissions, or other materials in the record—upon which the dispute rests. If the record fails of facts upon which a reasonable jury could conclude that Phatak intentionally fabricated the report, the district court should grant Phatak's motion for summary judgment.")

Dean v. Phatak, 911 F.3d 286, 290, 294-95, 297 (5th Cir. 2018) (Graves, J., dissenting) ("I disagree with the majority's decision to vacate and remand for the district court to reconsider Phatak's motion for summary judgment. The record here overwhelmingly supports the district court's denial of summary judgment. Because I would conclude that the district court did not err, and I would dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, I respectfully dissent. . . . Essentially, Phatak's argument that his conduct was not objectively unreasonable rests on factual determinations. Contrary to controlling authority set out herein, Phatak disputes that the facts should be viewed in the light most favorable to Dean. Instead, Phatak would have the court view the facts in the light most favorable to him and rely on Waters' unproven theory and contradictory statements or evidence unsupported by the record. The majority adopts Phatak's argument by erroneously failing to take the facts in the light most favorable to Dean and by reviewing the district court's finding that a genuine factual dispute exists in violation of clearly established law. . . Further, the majority concludes that the district court's failure to 'issue a determination confined to the summary judgment evidence with relevant citations to that evidence' requires remand. But the district court repeatedly cited to the summary judgment evidence and complied with controlling authority from this court. Specifically, the majority takes issue with the district court's citation to allegations in the pleadings in portions of its analysis. However, in the pages of the district court's order preceding those references, the district court explains the facts it relied on and cites to relevant portions of the record. . . . Citing Brown v Miller, 519 F.3d 231, 237 (5th Cir. 2008), the district court concluded that Dean had presented enough evidence that 'a reasonable juror could conclude that Phatak performed his autopsy report in a manner that was tantamount to falsification of evidence.' The district court further acknowledged the facts presented by Dean that Phatak violated his Fourth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights and concluded that the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Dean, presented a genuine question of material fact. The court then determined that, as of 2007 and based on authority set out herein, a reasonable medical examiner would have understood that intentional fabrication of evidence violated a defendant's rights. Phatak unsuccessfully attempts to distinguish Brown on the basis that it involved a motion to dismiss and the Fourteenth Amendment. That Brown involved a motion to dismiss is of no consequence here because it is cited for clearly establishing the right. Moreover, Phatak acknowledges in his reply brief that the right is clearly established if the evidence supports the allegation. Also, Dean indeed has a Fourteenth Amendment claim. Accordingly, for the reasons stated herein, I conclude that the record and the applicable authority support the district court's denial of summary judgment. Further, I conclude that it is unnecessary to remand for the district court to reconsider Phatak's motion for summary judgment. The district court has already thoroughly considered the motion and sufficiently explained its findings, all of which are supported by the record. Thus, I respectfully dissent.")

Trevino v. Trujillo, 756 F. App'x 355, ___ (5th Cir. 2018) ("The factual disputes over what happened in the moments leading to Rodriguez's death are material to the question of whether Trujillo's actions violated a constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the events in question. . . Given the constraints on our review at this interlocutory stage, and viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Rodriguez was a suspect in a minor theft, had not tried to harm Trujillo, and was reaching only for the gearshift; nothing indicated he was armed or reaching for a weapon. A jury could thus find that Trujillo could not reasonably perceive an immediate threat. . . '[O]fficers are prohibited from using deadly force against a suspect where the officers reasonably perceive no immediate threat.' Cole v. Carson, 905 F.3d 334, 344 (5th Cir. 2018). That is the precise factual issue found to be in genuine dispute here: did the officer reasonably perceive an immediate threat? Because the disputed facts are material, we lack jurisdiction over Trujillo's appeal.")

Trevino v. Trujillo, 756 F. App'x 355, ___ (5th Cir. 2018) ("Erod, J., dissenting) ("While the majority opinion correctly sets out the relevant facts, I do not agree that the fact dispute identified by the district court is material. I would reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment. As the majority opinion observes, we must accept the district court's finding that genuine factual disputes exist. . . Our review on appeal is limited to assessing the materiality of those fact issues. . . Here, the district court found that a genuine fact dispute exists as to what occurred in the few seconds before Trujillo shot Rodriguez: Trujillo contends that Rodriguez reached for an object in the center console, while Plaintiffs insist that Rodriguez reached only for the gearshift. . . Thus, the parties do not dispute that Rodriguez was reaching for something—the heart of their disagreement is what he was reaching for. The district court determined that this fact issue was material to the qualified immunity inquiry and therefore precluded summary judgment, and the majority agrees. It is at this point that I depart from the majority's analysis. The question on appeal is whether a reasonable officer under the totality of the circumstances could have believed that Rodriguez was reaching for a weapon and therefore reasonably perceived an immediate threat. In several prior cases, this court has found no material fact issue to preclude a finding of qualified immunity when the shooting officer could not see the suspect's hands and the suspect moved his hands while they were out of the officer's line of sight. See, e.g., Manis v. Lawson, 585 F.3d 839, 842, 844–45 (5th Cir. 2009) (suspect ignored officers' instructions and reached under seat of vehicle); Ontiveros v. City of Rosenberg, Tex., 564 F.3d 379, 381, 384 (5th Cir. 2009) (suspect reached into boot in dimly lit mobile home); Reese v. Anderson, 926 F.2d 494, 496, 500–01 (5th Cir. 1991) (suspect in vehicle repeatedly lowered his hand behind car door and reached down). Manis also involved an interlocutory appeal from a denial of summary judgment, and the court there observed that while other factual disputes existed, whether the suspect had reached under the seat of his vehicle was the 'only fact material to whether [the officer] was justified in using deadly force.'. . Because the parties did not dispute that the suspect reached for something, and because the suspect's reaching under the seat after disobeying officers' orders 'led [the officer] to discharge his weapon,' there were no disputed facts material to the plaintiffs' excessive force claim. . . Even viewing the facts of this case in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Manis dictates the outcome. Here, the district court found that while Trujillo was standing next to Rodriguez's vehicle and attempting to question him, Rodriguez 'quickly grabbed and pulled the driver's side door closed.' Even if, as Plaintiffs contend, Rodriguez was attempting to flee, this was an act of noncompliance with Trujillo's authority. Next, under Plaintiffs' version of the facts, Rodriguez reached down to shift the vehicle into drive. Thus, as in Manis, the parties do not dispute that Rodriguez reached for something after disregarding Trujillo's orders, and these facts led Trujillo to discharge his weapon. Accordingly, under Manis and our other prior decisions, the fact dispute regarding what Rodriguez was reaching for is not material to the summary judgment inquiry. Trujillo could have reasonably believed Rodriguez was reaching for a weapon. . . and therefore reasonably perceived an immediate threat. Because I believe precedent compels that conclusion here, I must dissent.")

Perniciaro v. Lea, 901 F.3d 241, 251 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Although we lack jurisdiction to consider 'whether there is enough evidence in the record for a jury to conclude that certain facts are true,' we do have jurisdiction 'to decide whether the district court erred in concluding as a matter of law that officials are not entitled to qualified immunity on a given set of facts.'. . Accordingly, we have jurisdiction to review whether—taking Perniciaro's summary judgment evidence as true—defendants' 'course of conduct [is] objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law.'. . Within that narrow universe, our review is de novo.")

Washington v. Salazar, 747 F. App'x 211, ___ (5th Cir. 2018) ("In short, we 'consider only whether the district court erred in assessing the legal significance of the conduct that the district court deemed sufficiently supported for purposes of summary judgment.'. . 'Where the district court has identified a factual dispute, we ask whether the officer is entitled to summary judgment even assuming the accuracy of the plaintiff's version of the facts.'. . .Salazar attempts to circumvent this court's limited jurisdiction by arguing that his actions were objectively reasonable, yet his argument is not a purely legal one. In fact, his argument depends largely on his own version of the facts, which Washington genuinely contests. This is exactly the kind of thing that precludes summary judgment. . . . We have explained that in denying qualified immunity at the summary-judgment stage, 'the district court can be thought of as making two distinct determinations, even if only implicitly.'. . First, that 'a certain course of conduct would, as a matter of law, be objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law.'. . Second, that 'a genuine issue of fact exists regarding whether the defendant(s) did, in fact, engage in such conduct.'. . We lack jurisdiction to 'review the district court's decision that a genuine factual dispute exists.'. . So the only proper issue for this appeal is whether, under Washington's version of the facts, it was objectively reasonable for Salazar to believe probable cause existed. It wasn't. Under Washington's version of the facts, all he did was walk down the street with a shotgun at his side, pointed at the ground, and speak to valets on the sidewalk. There is no indication Washington carried his shotgun in a threatening way. And it is not unlawful to openly carry a firearm in Texas, aside from the enumerated proscriptions in the Penal Code. . . Accepting Washington's version of the facts as true, it would have been objectively unreasonable for Salazar to believe probable cause existed for any alleged offense. We agree with the district court: 'evidence is conflicting whether Washington was physically on licensed premises, and whether Salazar was ever so advised.' These outstanding fact issues are material, meaning they could affect the case's outcome. . . Accordingly, we lack jurisdiction over Salazar's appeal.")

Escobar v. Montee, 895 F.3d 387, 392-93 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Pendent appellate jurisdiction may be proper where (1) the court will decide some issue in the properly brought interlocutory appeal that necessarily disposes of the pendent claim . . . (2) addressing the pendent claim will further the purpose of officer-immunities by helping the officer avoid trial. . . (3) the pendent claim would be otherwise unreviewable. . . or (4) the claims involve precisely the same facts and elements. . . Escobar's cross-appeal does not fit any of those categories. Deciding Montee's appeal will not necessarily dispose of Escobar's cross-appeal, as evidenced by the disposition in the district court. Nor would addressing Escobar's first-bite claim further the purposes of QI by helping Montee avoid trial. And Escobar's claim is reviewable through the normal course of appellate review. Finally, as explained above, the first-bite claim and continued-bite claim do not involve precisely the same facts in such a way as to be 'inextricably intertwined.' Indeed, the claims 'were treated separately by the district court,' and differences in facts include whether Montee gave warnings before releasing Bullet and whether the knife remained within grabbing distance once dropped. . . Because Congress has provided 'statutory instructions ... to control the timing of appellate proceedings,'. . . we must be cautious about creating 'ad hoc appellate jurisdictional rules.'. . This is not the 'rare and unique' case to warrant such an ad hoc exception to the normal course of review. . . Accordingly, we dismiss the cross-appeal for want of jurisdiction.")

Lempar v. Collier, No. 16-20731, 2018 WL 654367, at *1 (5th Cir. Jan. 31, 2018) (not reported) ("We cannot question a district court's view that factual disputes exist, and those disputes must be conceded in the plaintiff's favor. . . Breaking it down, this analysis requires the following steps: (1) identifying the issues on which a genuine dispute exists; (2) viewing those disputed facts in favor of the plaintiff as the summary judgment posture requires, Lytle, 560 F.3d at 409; and (3) determining whether those facts show a violation of clearly established law that overcomes a qualified immunity defense, Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 243–44 (2009). Only this third phase is subject to our interlocutory review. That poses a problem in cases like this in which the district court denied qualified immunity but did not specify the disputed factual issues it found. Although we can scour the record and try to determine the disputed issues on which the district court based its ruling, . . .that already difficult task is complicated here by the number of defendants. A denial of qualified immunity must identify factual disputes tied to a particular defendant that overcome the immunity defense. . . We have thus remanded cases in which the district court did not tie the existence of disputed issues to each defendant. . .That is the proper course here given the number of defendants and the conclusory district court ruling.")

Emesowum v. Cruz, No. 17-20245, 2018 WL 385389, at *1 (5th Cir. Jan. 11, 2018) (not reported) ("[A]lthough we may review whether a fact issue is material to the qualified immunity analysis, we lack jurisdiction to consider whether a factual dispute is genuine. . . In its order denying summary judgment, the district court held that 'the evidence creates a disputed fact issue concerning [the officers'] entitlement to qualified immunity.' But the court declined to specify what facts create the issue. When the district court denies a motion based on qualified immunity 'simply because "fact issues" remain, this Court has two choices. We can either scour the record or determine what facts the plaintiff may be able to prove at trial and proceed to resolve the legal issues, or remand so that the trial court can clarify the order.'. . In this case, it is unclear from the record what facts the district court identified as disputed. We therefore conclude that a limited remand is the 'more efficient alternative' here.")

Winfrey v. Pikett, 872 F.3d 640, 644 (5th Cir. 2017) ("[W]e hold that this Court lacks jurisdiction over Pikett's interlocutory appeal. Pikett, 'despite giving lip service to the correct legal standard, ... does not take the facts in a light most favorable to [Megan].'. . The parties dispute whether: (1) Megan admitted that she was in Burr's home roughly two weeks before Burr's murder; and (2) the scent lineups were properly conducted and thus informed investigators, prosecutors, and the jury that Megan was in direct contact with Burr's clothes shortly before his murder or merely that Megan had been in Burr's home at some point in time. Megan contends that she never admitted that she had been in Burr's home two weeks before the murder, and she says the scent lineups 'falsely informed the investigators, prosecutors, and jury that [she] had been in direct contact with Burr's clothing, shortly before his murder.' Pikett, however, contends that Megan admitted that she was in Burr's home roughly two weeks before his murder, and he says the scent lineups merely prove that Megan had been in Burr's home at some point in time. In short, Pikett's argument hinges on these factual disputes being resolved in his favor. So his appeal boils down to a challenge of the genuineness, not the materiality, of factual disputes because he does not 'contend[ ] that "taking all [Megan]'s factual allegations as true[,] no violation of a clearly established right was shown."'. . We have no jurisdiction over such a challenge.")

Hamilton v. Kindred, 845 F.3d 659, 663-64 (5th Cir. 2017) ("At the time of the incident, it was clearly established in the Fifth Circuit that an officer could be liable as a bystander in a case involving excessive force if he knew a constitutional violation was taking place and had a reasonable opportunity to prevent the harm. . . The district court found that 'there [was] a serious dispute as to the material facts' regarding each element of bystander liability. We lack jurisdiction to review the district court's determination that a genuine factual dispute exists. . . Because we find that excessive force applies in this case and disputes of material fact remain, Kindred's appeal is DISMISSED.")

Guerra v. Bellino, 703 F. App'x 312, 315-17 (5th Cir. 2017) (per curiam) ("The plaintiffs argue we have no jurisdiction because the district court's order and Bellino's brief focus exclusively on issues of fact. We are not stripped of jurisdiction simply because the district court determined that genuine issues of fact exist. . . We may review the district court's determination 'that those disputed issues are material to the issue of qualified immunity.'. . The materiality of factual disputes is a question of law and is thus reviewable. . . . The plaintiffs assert that the video here is not determinative because it does not show Guerra 'attacking' Bellino. This assertion misapprehends the qualified-immunity standard, though. Qualified immunity requires that Bellino reasonably believed Guerra posed a threat of serious harm. . . We have viewed the video. Though grainy, the video shows that Bellino's detainee suddenly turned and charged toward him in the dark from less than a car's length away. The plaintiffs even concede that the video shows Guerra 'moving quickly' toward Bellino. Also, toward the end of the video, Meline states, 'The guy just charged the cop, and he shot him.' In light of these filmed facts, which are undisputed, the factual issues identified by the district court are immaterial.")

Guerra v. Bellino, 703 F. App'x 312, 318-19 (5th Cir. 2017)) (per curiam) (Graves, J., dissenting) ("The majority disregards two well-established principles in the doctrine of qualified immunity. First, when reviewing a denial of a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, our jurisdiction is limited; it extends only to 'the materiality of any factual disputes, but not their genuineness.'. . Second, 'we must view the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff.'. . Overreaching our jurisdictional mandate, the majority resolves factual disputes to hold that Sergeant Bellino's fatal shooting of Guerra was objectively reasonable. To do so, the majority concludes that 'Bellino's credibility is immaterial' because of 'irrefutable proof' in the form of a dark, grainy eyewitness video. I respectfully dissent. The majority concludes that, because the eyewitness video shows one indistinct figure (Guerra) 'move rapidly in [the] direction' of another indistinct figure (Bellino), a reasonable officer, with 'mere seconds to determine how to respond to this visibly agitated detainee,' would have been justified in using deadly force. The eyewitness video is only dispositive if it 'utterly discredit[s]' Guerra's 'version of events' so that 'no reasonable jury could have believed him.'. . It does not. At most, the video is inconclusive regarding whether Guerra was rushing at Bellino or instead was fleeing from him, albeit at an angle, and posed no reasonable threat. . . The district court correctly deemed the video inconclusive. Its finding is consistent with eyewitness testimony by Meline, who filmed the encounter and who stated: '[F]rom where I was standing, I couldn't tell if [Guerra ran] directly at [Bellino] or if he was angled a bit and he was trying to run past him.' But relying solely on the grainy video, the majority posits that any factual issues identified by the district court are entirely immaterial, including whether Guerra's flight path was at an angle from Bellino. This conclusion contradicts Supreme Court precedent. As the Court explained, '[w]here the suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others, the harm resulting from failing to apprehend him does not justify the use of deadly force to do so.'. . Here, the nonmoving parties have proffered evidence that Guerra was unarmed, nonthreatening, and was shot dead while attempting to flee the scene. The medical examiner's report, which found '[n]o evidence of close range firing,' supports their version of the facts. The video evidence here does not utterly discredit the nonmovants' version of the facts. . . On these disputed issues of material fact, we lack jurisdiction to review.")

Cooper v. Brown, 844 F.3d 517, 526 n.12 (5th Cir. 2016) ("Some courts have used the doctrine of 'pendent appellate jurisdiction' to review partial-summary-judgment orders alongside orders denying QI. . .This court, however, has held that '[p]endent appellate jurisdiction should be exercised only in 'rare and unique' circumstances,' where the non-final claim is 'inextricably intertwined' with the QI inquiry. . . We generally have resisted efforts to bootstrap non-final claims into QI appeals. . . Because there are no 'rare and unique' circumstances here, we decline to exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction.")

Hinojosa v. Livingston, 807 F.3d 657, 664-68, 671-72, 675 (5th Cir. 2015) ("[T]o determine whether we have jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal, we must determine whether the district court's order complied with our precedent for issuing such orders. . . First, the district court must determine 'that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity.'. . . When reviewing a complaint that meets this standard, the district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling and order limited discovery if 'the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts."'. . Such a discovery order must be 'narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.'. . .We first ask whether the complaint pleads facts that, if true, would permit the inference that Defendants are liable under § 1983 for an Eighth Amendment violation and would overcome their qualified immunity defense. We conclude that it does. . . .Here, the complaint alleges an Eighth Amendment violation. The complaint alleges that Defendants subjected Hinojosa to dangerous heat conditions in conscious disregard of the serious risk that the heat posed for prisoners who, like Hinojosa, suffered from certain medical conditions, took certain medications, and had recently been transferred from air-conditioned jails to non-climate-controlled facilities. . . . Prison officials cannot escape liability in a conditions-of-confinement case like this one by arguing that, while they allegedly were aware of and consciously disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm to a discrete class of vulnerable inmates, they were not aware that the particular inmate involved in the case belonged to that class. . . . In sum, then, the complaint adequately alleges an Eighth Amendment violation based on Hinojosa's conditions of confinement. . . . Having determined that the complaint's factual allegations, if true, would establish Defendants' liability for an Eighth Amendment violation and overcome a qualified immunity defense, we next ask whether further clarification of the facts was necessary for the district court to rule on the qualified immunity defense. We easily conclude that it was. When reviewing a well-pleaded complaint and a defendant's motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity, a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling and order limited discovery when 'the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts."'. . In other words, a district court may elect the defer-and-discover approach 'when the defendant's immunity claim turns at least partially on a factual question' that must be answered before a ruling can issue. . . Here, the district court held that it was unable to rule on Defendants' qualified immunity claim because factual development was needed as to their 'knowledge, actions, omissions and/or policies in regards to TDCJ prison operations in times of extreme heat.'. . .The factual questions of what Defendants knew, when they knew it, and whether they investigated and considered possible remedial measures, are undoubtedly necessary to answer before determining whether Defendants acted reasonably in light of clearly established law. Of course, as detailed above, Defendants' knowledge is central to the deliberate indifference element of Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment claim.

However, their knowledge is also highly relevant to qualified immunity, because it bears heavily on the reasonableness of their actions. . . . The reasonableness analysis must be different from the deliberate-indifference analysis, because '[o]therwise, a successful claim of qualified immunity in this context would require defendants to demonstrate that they prevail on the merits, thus rendering qualified immunity an empty doctrine.'. . 'In light of these complexities, we have observed that "[a]dditional facts ... are particularly important when evaluating the [reasonableness] prong of the qualified immunity test."'. . That holds true in this case. The district court did not err in determining that factual development was needed to rule on Defendants' qualified immunity defense. . . Our foregoing discussion establishes that the district court was empowered to defer its qualified immunity ruling and issue a discovery order. However, the breadth of the ordered discovery is critically important. Qualified immunity is immunity not only from judgment, but also from suit . . . . We therefore must determine whether the discovery that the district court ordered was "narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim." Id. (quoting Lion Boulos, 834 F.2d at 507–08). While this presents a somewhat close question, we conclude that the district court's discovery order was appropriately tailored. . . . Because, as set forth above, the district court's order complies with our precedent, we DISMISS this interlocutory appeal for want of jurisdiction. We express no opinion on how the district court should rule on Defendants' qualified immunity defense.")

Carroll v. Ellington, 800 F.3d 154, 167-68 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Because interlocutory appeal on qualified-immunity grounds would protect the right of public officials not to undergo a second trial erroneously, we agree with the Second Circuit that we have interlocutory appellate jurisdiction over the purely legal aspect of whether the officers in this case were entitled to qualified immunity. We also reject the Carrolls' argument that this interlocutory appeal was untimely filed and therefore waived because the deputies did not file an interlocutory appeal from the district court's pretrial summary-judgment ruling. In this case, the deputies have consistently asserted, and therefore have not waived, the defense of qualified immunity. They timely filed an interlocutory appeal from the district court's denial of their Rule 50 motions soon after the district court ruled. Therefore, we have interlocutory appellate jurisdiction. . Our jurisdiction to review this collateral order is limited. We have jurisdiction to review only the 'purely legal question whether a given course of conduct would be objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law.'")

Brauner v. Coody, 793 F.3d 493, 497 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Neither remand nor dismissal is necessary here. 'The mere existence of some factual dispute is not enough to defeat this court's jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal: If the disputed facts are not material to this legal question, "the denial of summary judgment is [immediately] reviewable as a question of law."'. . As will be seen, the facts in the record before us are either undisputed or not material.")

Webb v. Livingston, 618 F. App'x 201, 206-07, 209-11 (5th Cir. 2015) ("If the complaint alleges facts sufficient to overcome the defense of qualified immunity, and the district court is 'unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts,' then it may allow discovery 'narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.'. . When a district court complies with this procedure, this court lacks jurisdiction to review the interlocutory order. . . However, the court does have jurisdiction if the district court: (1) fails to find that the complaint overcomes the defendant's qualified immunity defense; (2) refuses to rule on the qualified immunity defense; or (3) issues a discovery order that is not narrowly tailored to uncover facts relevant only to the issue of qualified immunity. . . Our jurisdiction over this appeal hinges on the first and third inquiries, that is, whether the district court properly found that the complaint overcame Appellants' qualified immunity defense and whether the district court's discovery order was narrowly tailored to uncover facts relevant to the defense. . . We review a district court's decision to defer ruling on a motion to dismiss and its discovery order for abuse of discretion. . . . By containing facts, which, if true, demonstrate that Appellants violated the decedents' clearly established Eighth Amendment right to be free from extreme heat, Appellees' allegations are sufficient to overcome Appellants' qualified immunity defense. . . Because the district court properly conducted this threshold inquiry, it was within its discretion to determine whether limited discovery was necessary to rule on Appellants' entitlement to the immunity defense. . . . A district court's discovery order is neither avoidable nor overly broad, and therefore not immediately appealable, when: (1) the defendant's entitlement to immunity turns at least partially on a factual question; (2) the district court is unable to rule on the immunity defense without clarification of these facts; and (3) the discovery order is narrowly tailored to uncover only the facts necessary to rule on the immunity defense. . .Applying the first factor, the district court properly concluded that Appellants' entitlement to qualified immunity turned at least partially on an issue of fact. To determine whether Appellants are entitled to qualified immunity, the district court must evaluate whether Appellants acted with deliberate indifference by subjectively disregarding a known risk, Farmer, 511 U.S. at 834, and whether the Appellants actions were objectively reasonable despite the alleged deliberate indifference. . . Appellants' subjective knowledge is a question of fact, . . . which this court has recognized is 'peculiarly within the knowledge' and possession of Appellants. . . Therefore, the district court did not err in concluding that Appellants' immunity defense, which required an inquiry into Appellants' alleged deliberate indifference, turned in part on an issue of fact. Moving to the second factor, the district court was within its discretion in concluding that it was unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts. To rule on the immunity defense, the district court must assess 'whether the official's conduct would have been objectively reasonable at the time of the incident.'. . This determination is complicated when, as here, the deliberate indifference standard must be reconciled with the second prong's objective reasonableness standard. . . .[T]he district court did not err in concluding that further factual clarification was necessary to resolve the immunity issue. . .Finally, under the third factor, the limited discovery is narrowly tailored. The ordered discovery seeks to reveal what Appellants knew, when they knew it, and what actions (or inactions) they took in light of this knowledge. Moreover, the district court was careful to prevent discovery that pertained to the merits of Appellees' underlying claims, and excluded discovery relevant to other heat-related litigation. Consequently, the district court's discovery order is narrowly tailored to uncover only the facts necessary to rule on the immunity defense. Because the immunity defense turns on an issue of fact, the district court concluded that it could not determine Appellants' entitlement to the defense without discovery, and discovery was limited to the issue of qualified immunity, the district court did not abuse its discretion. . . Accordingly, this court lacks jurisdiction to review the district court's discovery order.")

Fuentes v. Riggle, 611 F. App'x 183, 190-91 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Riggle attempts to circumvent our jurisdictional limitations by arguing that whether a reasonable jury could return a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs is a 'question of law.' Yet summary judgment—and all of its facets—is always a question of law. The final judgment rule, however, places limits on which questions of law are subject to interlocutory review. Were we to accept Riggle's argument, the distinction drawn in our cases between questions of genuineness and questions of materiality would be obliterated. We would be left conducting a plenary, de novo review of the district court's decision on the summary judgment motion. Riggle's argument therefore fails. Nevertheless, we must pause for a moment to consider Riggle's argument predicated on Scott v. Harris. In Scott v. Harris, the Supreme Court heard an appeal from a denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds and held that the district court erred in accepting the plaintiff's version of facts as correct when an undisputed video recording of the car chase at issue existed. . . . Considering an appeal from the district court's denial of summary judgment, the Supreme Court noted that while the norm at summary judgment is to adopt 'the plaintiff's version of the facts,' the situation is altered where there is 'a videotape capturing the events in question.'. . The Court concluded that '[w]hen opposing parties tell two different stories, one of which is blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it, a court should not adopt that version of the facts for purposes of ruling on a motion for summary judgment.'. . . Jurisdictionally speaking, Scott is problematic, as deciding whose version of the facts must be accepted falls squarely within the realm of a dispute as to genuineness. Scott could be interpreted one of two ways. First, Scott may merely indicate that, if (and only if) there is a dispute of the materiality of a factual issue, the court need not evaluate the materiality issue while accepting an account of the facts plainly discredited by undisputed documentary evidence. Under such an interpretation, we would lack jurisdiction over an argument that there is no genuine dispute because of the existence of a videotape without an accompanying contention that the factual dispute is immaterial. Alternatively, Scott may stand as an exception to the general rule, that the genuineness of a fact dispute cannot be reviewed, where there is undisputed documentary evidence that contradicts a plaintiff's factual account. . . . The second interpretation is problematic, as it would extrapolate a significant, and nebulous, exception to the general rule in Johnson from an opinion (Scott) that never addresses jurisdiction. Yet we need not pass on whether or to what extent such an exception exists, as Scott is plainly inapplicable here. . . .There is no undisputed, contemporaneous recording of the disputed events here, as there was in Scott, or its equivalent. As such, Scott, and any exception it may portend from the normal jurisdictional limits in an appeal from a denial of a motion for summary judgment, does not apply. Riggle has no doubt marshalled evidence that tends to undermine Juan Fuentes's account of Victor Fuentes's death. His arguments that such evidence precludes the existence of a genuine dispute of fact for purposes of Rule 56(a) are, however, not cognizable in an interlocutory appeal.")

are nonfinal and therefore not immediately appealable. . . However, we have repeatedly held that a district court's order that declines or refuses to rule on a motion to dismiss based on a government officer's defense of qualified immunity is an immediately appealable order. Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645 (5th Cir.2012); Wicks v. Miss. State Emp't Servs., 41 F.3d 991 (5th Cir.1995); Helton v. Clements, 787 F.2d 1016 (5th Cir.1986). That is because such an order is tantamount to an order denying the defendants qualified immunity. . . . '[T]his court has established a careful procedure under which a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.'. . As we explained in Wicks, a district court must first find 'that the plaintiffs pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity.'. . 'Thus, a plaintiff seeking to overcome qualified immunity must plead specific facts that both allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the harm he has alleged and that defeat a qualified immunity defense with equal specificity.'. . 'After the district court finds a plaintiff has so pleaded, if the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts," it may issue a discovery order "narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim."'. . . 'This court lacks jurisdiction to review interlocutory orders in qualified immunity cases complying with these requirements.'. . 'But we may review the order under the collateral order doctrine when a district court fails to find first that the plaintiffs complaint overcomes a defendant's qualified immunity defense, Wicks, 41 F.3d at 994–95; when the court refuses to rule on a qualified immunity defense, Helton, 787 F.2d at 1017; or when the court's discovery order exceeds the requisite "narrowly tailored" scope, Lion Boulos, 834 F.2d at 507–08.'. .The defendants argue that we have jurisdiction and that the district court's order should be vacated because the district court did not follow the careful procedure set forth in Backe, Wicks, Helton, and Lion Boulos. We agree. The district court did not explicitly rule on the defendants' qualified-immunity defense other than to note that the plaintiffs 'set out the reasons [they] felt that qualified immunity did not apply,' that the defendants 'have not contradicted those allegations,' and that accordingly, whether the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity 'is certainly contested.' The district court failed to make an initial determination that the plaintiffs' allegations, if true, would defeat qualified immunity, falling short of the finding required by Backe and Wicks; and unlike the court in Lion Boulos, the district court did not identify any questions of fact it needed to resolve before it would be able to determine whether the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. . . Because we conclude that the district court did not fulfill its duty under either step of the framework just described, 'for materially the same reasons,' we both have jurisdiction to review the district court's discovery order and we must vacate it.") Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 647-49 (5th Cir. 2012) ("Appellants moved to dismiss based on qualified immunity under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), arguing that Appellees failed to plead specifically a City policy causing a deprivation of constitutional rights, facts plausibly demonstrating their deliberate indifference to Appellees' constitutional rights, and facts plausibly demonstrating that Appellants ratified or authorized any unconstitutional conduct. The district court refused to rule on Appellants' threshold qualified immunity defense, concluding that '[a]lthough qualified immunity might become a relevant defense to liability once the facts are known, it is too early to make that determination now.' It denied Appellants' motion to dismiss pending general discovery. . . LeBlanc and Wiley appeal, contending that the district court abused its discretion by failing to rule on their immunity claim before permitting general discovery. Additionally, LeBlanc and Wiley argue that Appellees' constitutional claims fail for lack of plausibility in the first place, or for failure to articulate facts which plausibly overcome their qualified immunity defenses. . . . One of the most salient benefits of qualified immunity is protection from pretrial discovery, which is costly, time-consuming, and intrusive, Helton v. Clements, 787 F.2d 1016, 1017 (5th Cir.1986). Consequently, this court has established a careful procedure under which a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense. As we explained in Wicks, supra, a district court must first find 'that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity.'. . Thus, a plaintiff seeking to overcome qualified immunity must plead specific facts that both allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the harm he has alleged and that defeat a qualified immunity defense with equal specificity. After the district court finds a plaintiff has so pled, if the court remains 'unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts,' it may issue a discovery order 'narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.' Lion Boulos, 834 F.2d at 507–08. This court lacks jurisdiction to review interlocutory orders in qualified immunity cases complying with these requirements. See, e.g., Edwards v. Cass Cnty., Tex., 919 F.2d 273, 275–76 (5th Cir.1990). But we may review the order under the collateral order doctrine when a district court fails to find first that the plaintiff's complaint overcomes a defendant's qualified immunity defense, Wicks, 41 F.3d at 994–95; when the court refuses to rule on a qualified immunity defense, Helton, 787 F.2d at 1017; or when the court's discovery order exceeds the requisite 'narrowly tailored' scope, Lion Boulos, 834 F.2d at 507–08. For materially the same reasons, we both have jurisdiction to review and must vacate the district court's order here. The court stated that it was 'premature to address the defendant's assertions of qualified immunity before discovery has taken place,' but as the Supreme Court has noted, that is precisely the point of qualified immunity: to protect public officials from expensive, intrusive discovery until and unless the requisite showing overcoming immunity is made. Even if we liberally interpret the district court's order as making the requisite finding that Appellees pled facts overcoming qualified immunity, the district court was permitted to authorize only discovery narrowly tailored to rule on Appellants' immunity claims. An order that simultaneously withholds ruling on a qualified immunity defense while failing to constrain discovery to develop claimed immunity is by definition not narrowly tailored. The district court doubly abused its discretion by (apparently) refusing to rule on LeBlanc's and Wiley's motions to dismiss and by failing to limit discovery to facts necessary to rule on their qualified immunity defense. . . . For these reasons, this court has appellate jurisdiction over the district court's order whose effect denied these officials the benefits of orderly handling of their qualified immunity defense. We must vacate and remand, and we instruct the court to follow the procedures outlined in Lion Boulos, Helton, and Wicks.") Fulton v. Caraway, No. 10-30213, 2010 WL 4386748, at *1, *2 (5th Cir. Nov. 4, 2010) (not reported) ("Because the denial of the motion for a Rule 7(a) reply is not a final judgment, we must address whether this court has jurisdiction to hear the appeal. . . We have jurisdiction to determine our jurisdiction. . . We requested that the parties brief the question of whether the 'order denying the motion ... is appealable at this stage of the litigation pursuant to [Fed.R.Civ.P.] 54(b), or the collateral order doctrine, or whether there exists some other basis of appellate jurisdiction.' The Kenner Appellants argue that we have jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and the Cohen collateral order doctrine. . . . They contend that permitting an interlocutory appeal of the district court's denial of their motion for a Rule 7(a) reply vindicates the Harlow v. Fitzgerald qualified immunity doctrine . . . by ensuring that the issue of qualified immunity will be decided at the earliest possible time. The district court's denial of their motion, they continue, will subject them to discovery, a burden of litigation from which qualified immunity should protect them. . . They conclude that the order 'clearly and finally resolved an important issue separate from the merits of the lawsuit.' We disagree with the Kenner Appellants' conclusion. The Supreme Court has held that even under the required narrow reading of the appealable collateral order doctrine, government officials are permitted to appeal decisions in which the district court denies them qualified immunity. . . The rationale for permitting such appeals is that qualified immunity is a defense not only from liability, but also from the burdens of litigation. . . When a district court order denying qualified immunity 'turns on an issue of law,' the order conclusively determines that the defendant must bear the burdens of discovery, a decision which is 'conceptually distinct from the merits of the plaintiff's claim' and 'would prove effectively unreviewable on appeal from a final judgment.'. . . We unquestionably would have jurisdiction over an appeal of a denial of a motion to dismiss a § 1983 claim on a defense of qualified immunity. . . But this case presents a different situation: the Kenner Appellants appeal from a non-dispositive motion. The Supreme Court requires that a collateral order fulfill three stringent conditions to be appealable: it must conclusively determine the disputed question, resolve an important issue completely separate from the merits of the action, and be effectively unreviewable on appeal from a final judgment. . . The denial of the motion for a Rule 7(a) Schultea reply does not fulfill the first requirement–the order did not conclusively determine the disputed question. The district court's order does not contain a ruling on whether the facts alleged would overcome qualified immunity, only that they were detailed enough to allow the court to rule on any subsequent dispositive motion. We are unwilling to expand the collateral order doctrine this far. We do not have jurisdiction over this appeal; it is therefore DISMISSED.")

Sanchez v. Fraley, No. 09-50821, 2010 WL 1752123, at *5, *6 (5th Cir. Apr. 30, 2010) (not reported) ("Our circuit has not yet addressed whether Scott carves out an exception, and we need not do so today. If such an exception does exist, then it does not apply on these facts. The district court was presented with a quintessential fact issue–the officers' deposition testimony differed in a material respect from Chavez's deposition testimony. . . This case is thus a far cry from Scott, where a videotape blatantly and demonstrably contradicted Harris's version of events. To the extent that the officers are challenging Chavez's credibility and personal knowledge, . . this is similarly inappropriate for determination on summary judgment. . . . For the foregoing reasons, we DENY Sanchez's motion to dismiss the appeal, and we AFFIRM the district court's order denying summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.").

Morgan v. Hubert, 335 F. App'x 466, 2009 WL 1884605, at *4 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009) ("We are of the opinion that placing Morgan, a prisoner in protective custody at the time, on the field with the general prison population created an objective and substantial risk to his safety. . . .The question of what Hubert subjectively knew is a question of fact. . . Hence, we lack jurisdiction to consider it on the merits. . . As such, the only issue here is whether Morgan alleged sufficient facts to state a plausible case against Hubert individually, including the requisite subjective knowledge.") [remanding for limited discovery of facts going to issue of qualified immunity; See Morgan v. Hubert, 459 F. App'x 321 (5th Cir. 2012) (holding that because warden was not deliberately indifferent, warden was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim.]

Meza v. Livingston, 537 F.3d 364, 366, 367 (5th Cir. 2008) ("A district court's failure to rule on a summary judgment motion while awaiting a magistrate judge's report and recommendation on that motion is . . . unreviewable. Here, although the initial briefing on the summary judgment motion was completed as of May 11, 2007, the magistrate ordered additional briefing, and Defendants appealed before the district court could receive the magistrate's report. . . . Defendants urge that '[a]lthough this Court has not issued any further published opinions [after Helton] recognizing other instances where the refusal or failure to rule resulted in an immediately appealable order under the collateral order doctrine,' other circuits have. In those cases, the district court either refused to rule, failed to explain its reasons for delaying a ruling on qualified immunity until trial, or 'extend' Helton to the facts of this case, as none of these circumstances apply here.").

Flores v. City of Palacios, 381 F.3d 391, 401, 402 (5th Cir. 2004) ("Kalina next argues that a reasonable police officer would not have been on notice in 2002 that firing a single gunshot at a suspect's car would constitute a use of deadly force. Kalina was on notice, however, that using force 'carrying with it a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily harm' is 'deadly force.'. . He was also on notice that deadly force would only be justified by a reasonable belief that he or the public was in imminent danger. . . The only thing he did not know for sure was whether shooting at Flores's car in the way that he did carried with it a substantial risk of death or serious bodily harm. The flaw in Kalina's argument is that this last question is one of fact, not one of law. The district court found that he used deadly force, thereby assuming, as a factual matter, that Kalina created a substantial risk of death or serious bodily harm when he shot Flores's car. On an interlocutory appeal of this nature, we cannot review whether that factual question is genuine, and it is obviously material. . . We therefore accept the district court's factual assumption for summary judgment that Kalina reasonably should have known that his action caused a substantial risk of death or serious bodily harm.").

Castillo v. City of Weslaco, 369 F.3d 504, 506, 507 (5th Cir. 2004) ("The Supreme Court has recognized that the second step of the Harlow test is different at the summary judgment stage than it is when the defendant asserts qualified immunity after the initial pleadings. [citing Behrens] 'At the earlier stage, it is the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized....' . . . On summary judgment, 'the plaintiff can no longer rest on the pleadings' and the court must look 'to the evidence before it (in the light most favorable to the plaintiff) in conducting the Harlow inquiry.' . . . Consequently, the court must highlight evidence that, if interpreted in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, identifies conduct by the defendant that violated clearly established law. . . By outlining this factual scenario the court does not make a determination that the alleged conduct occurred. Rather, it concludes that there is evidence in the record that, when interpreted in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, establishes conduct by the defendant that violated clearly established law. . . Ordinarily the district court in denying the summary judgment motion will outline 'the factual scenario it believes emerges from viewing the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable' to the plaintiff. . . It will also highlight the evidence in the record supporting its conclusions, and it will determine whether the defendant's conduct, as outlined in the factual scenario, was 'objectively reasonable' in light of the relevant clearly established law. . . In cases where the district court failed to outline the relevant factual scenario and the evidence in the record establishing the relevant conduct, the Supreme Court has authorized 'the court of appeals [to] undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.'. . We, however, have determined that there is another option in these situations. In certain cases, rather than combing through the record ourselves and concluding what factual scenario the district court likely assumed in applying the Harlow test, we will remand to the district court so that it can outline the factual scenario it assumed in making its decision. . . Although we are not required to make such a remand, in some cases it may provide a 'more efficient alternative.' . . In this case, the district court did not outline the factual scenario it assumed in construing the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable to the Officers. In fact, it appears that it rested its ruling solely on the allegations made by the Officers in their Third Amended Complaint. This would be improper in light of the Supreme Court's instructions in Behrens. Considering it is not clear that the district court assumed a factual scenario supported by summary judgment evidence in applying the Harlow test, and if it did, what that factual scenario is, the more 'efficient alternative' in this case is to remand to the district court for it to outline the factual scenario it assumed in making its decision."), appeal after remand, 2004 WL 2294769 (5th Cir. Oct. 13, 2004).

Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 347, 348 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc) ("The standard of review that we apply in an interlocutory appeal asserting qualified immunity differs from the standard employed in most appeals of summary judgment rulings. Ordinarily, we would review the district court's denial of summary judgment de novo, applying the same standard as the district court. . .The district court, of course, applies the standard of Rule 56, according to which summary judgment is proper if there is no genuine issue of material fact and the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. . . On appeal, we would ordinarily apply that same Rule 56 standard, and we would reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment if we concluded that the district court found a genuine factual dispute when, on our own review of the record, no such genuine dispute exists. But, as explained above, in an interlocutory appeal we lack the power to review the district court's decision that a genuine factual dispute exists. Therefore, we do not apply the standard of Rule 56 but instead consider only whether the district court erred in assessing the legal significance of the conduct that the district court deemed sufficiently supported for purposes of summary judgment. . . Where factual disputes exist in an interlocutory appeal asserting qualified immunity, we accept the plaintiffs' version of the facts as true.")

Reyes v. City of Richmond, 287 F.3d 346, 350, 351 (5th Cir. 2002) ("To determine whether a denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity is immediately appealable, this Court looks at the legal argument advanced. When a district court denies summary judgment on the basis that genuine issues of material fact exist, it has made two distinct legal conclusions: that there are 'genuine' issues of fact in dispute, and that these issues are 'material.' This Court may not review a conclusion that issues of fact are genuine, . . . but we can review a district court's conclusion that an issue of law is material. [citing Bazan] An officer challenges materiality when he contends that 'taking all the plaintiff's factual allegations as true no violation of a clearly established right was shown.' [citing Cantu]").

Gonzales v. Dallas County, 249 F.3d 406, 411-13 (5th Cir. 2001) ("The jurisdictional question, then, is whether the record reflects undisputed facts upon which we may make a determination of the legal question before us: whether a reasonable public official could have believed, in the light of clearly established law, that the specific conduct of discharging Gonzales did not violate his constitutional rights. . . .[U]nder the qualified immunity analysis, the question is whether it would have been objectively reasonable for an officer to conclude that terminating Gonzales's employment did not violate his rights under the First Amendment because his November 1997 altercation with the shoplifter would have caused his termination notwithstanding that he had testified against Castillo before the grand jury. . . . In the light of the record before us, we hold that a reasonable public official would have believed that the decision to terminate Gonzales's employment would not 'violate clearly established ... constitutional rights' because the same employment action would have been taken even if Gonzales had not testified against Castillo before the grand jury.").

Bazan v. Hildago County, 246 F.3d 481, 491-93 (5th Cir. 2001) ("In short, in stating that 'a jury has to decide if this is the way this occurred', the district judge concluded that the Trooper's credibility was at issue and thus that a real–genuine –dispute existed as to material facts– what occurred in the field, when deadly force was employed. . . . We emphasize the narrow factual situation which this case addresses– one in which the sole surviving witness to the central events is the defendant himself, an interested witness. Obviously, summary judgment vel non for a case of this type turns on the summary judgment record. And, based on this summary judgment record, the district court concluded genuine issues exist as to material facts. Again, that genuineness conclusion is not reviewable on interlocutory appeal from a summary judgment denial of qualified immunity; only issues of law are. . . For the foregoing reasons, because the district court concluded that the events that occurred in the field are genuinely disputed, in the light of both the Trooper's being the sole surviving witness and the evidence regarding events at the vehicle, and because these factual issues control the outcome of the case (are material), we lack jurisdiction to consider the propriety of the summary judgment denial.") (emphasis in original).

Thompson v. Upshur County, 245 F.3d 447, 456 (5th Cir. 2001) ("Ideally, the district court's order denying summary judgment based on qualified immunity explains what facts the plaintiff may be able to prove at trial, i.e. what particular facts the court assumed in denying summary judgment urged on the basis of qualified immunity. This facilitates appellate review by allowing this Court to focus on the aforementioned purely legal issues. When, as is true to some extent here, the court below fails to do this and, instead, denies the motion simply because 'fact issues' remain, this Court has two choices. We can either scour the record and determine what facts the plaintiff may be able to prove at trial and proceed to resolve the legal issues, or remand so that the trial court can clarify the order.").

Domino v. Texas Dep't of Criminal Justice, 239 F.3d 752, 754 (5th Cir. 2001) ("Reddy argues that even when the disputed facts are viewed in Domino's favor, Reddy was not deliberately indifferent to Domino's serious medical needs and therefore did not violate Domino's constitutional rights. We agree with Reddy that this court has jurisdiction over this appeal to decide that legal issue when the disputed facts are viewed in Domino's favor.").

Wagner v. Bay City, 227 F.3d 316, 320 (5th Cir. 2000) ("In deciding an interlocutory appeal of a denial of qualified immunity, we can review the materiality of any factual disputes, but not their genuineness. . . So, we review the complaint and record to determine whether, assuming that all of Wagner's factual assertions are true, those facts are materially sufficient to establish that defendants acted in an objectively unreasonable manner. Even where, as here, the district court has determined that there are genuine disputes raised by the evidence, we assume plaintiff's version of the facts is true, then determine whether those facts suffice for a claim of excessive force under these circumstances. Moreover, in light of the fact that the district court did not specifically identify those factual issues as to which it believed genuine disputes remained, we conduct an analysis of the record to determine what issues of fact the district court likely considered genuine. This ensures that the defendants' right to an immediate appeal will not be defeated because of the district court's failure to articulate its reasons for denying summary judgment. . . It follows that we do have jurisdiction to review the denial of summary judgment on all of these claims.").

Steadman v. Texas Rangers, 179 F.3d 360, 369 (5th Cir. 1999) (Emilio M. Garza, J., specially concurring) ("I concur, but write separately to elaborate on the majority's statement that '[e]ven the existence of disputed issues of material fact does not preclude review where the district court's actions were based in law.' . . The statement simply stands for the proposition that we can consider an unsuccessful summary judgment motion that asserts qualified immunity when the defendant takes the genuine issues of material facts off the table by accepting the plaintiff's version of the facts and thereby leaves us with nothing to review but legal issues.").

Lemoine v. New Horizons Ranch and Center, Inc., 174 F.3d 629, 634 (5th Cir. 1999) ("The crux of appellants' argument is that even if the district court correctly identified the factual issues above, such factual findings are immaterial because these failures show nothing more than mere negligence. As plaintiff must prove more than negligence to state a constitutional violation, say the appellants, plaintiff cannot make out a legal claim and the district court erred in denying their motions for summary judgment. As the appellants' claim is a legal one, we have appellate jurisdiction over it and proceed accordingly.").

Reyes v. Sazan, 168 F.3d 158, 161 (5th Cir. 1999) ("The Supreme Court since Schultea has attempted to clarify the jurisdiction of the courts of appeal to review a denial of qualified immunity. At present, the rule of jurisdiction comes to this: Legal conclusions are immediately appealable, but not the sufficiency of the evidence to support the denial. . . .The appellate court can consider the materiality of disputed issues of fact, but not contentions that there are factual disputes. . . The Supreme Court's refinement of qualified immunity jurisdiction has only made the more important Schultea's emphasis upon the reply as a tool of the trial court insisting on particularity in pleading. Indeed, the Court's vigorous adherence to the distinction between fact and law–or genuine issues and material issues–underscores the strength of the Schultea approach. Whether the complaint is insufficiently particular, and thus a reply to the defense of qualified immunity is needed, is a question of law. Similarly, we can examine afresh whether a reply is 'tailored to the assertion of qualified immunity and fairly engage[s] its allegations,' Schultea, 47 F.3d at 1433, a look that does not require reviewing the record to determine if the reply's factual assertions are true.").

Meyer v. Austin Independent School District, 161 F.3d 271, 274 (5th Cir. 1998) ("We cannot consider a claim 'that the district court erroneously concluded that a genuine issue of fact exists.'. . Therefore, in the instant case, we could not reexamine the plaintiffs' affidavits and determine that these affidavits did not present sufficient evidence that the administrators failed to give them a chance to tell their side of the story. . . At the same time, we can consider a claim 'that a material issue of fact exists,' . . . i.e. that the legal conclusion the district court drew was incorrect. Thus, for example, we would have jurisdiction to hold that meetings with parents always provide adequate due process for children, or to hold that the law does not require school officials to give students a chance to tell their side of the story.").

White v. Balderama, 161 F.3d 913, 914 (5th Cir. 1998) (per curiam) ("The district court's supplemental order reveals that it found that genuine factual issues remained as to which of the three bullets fired by Balderama actually struck and injured White, what direction White's car was heading in when he failed to observe Balderama's order to stop, and whether Balderama acted reasonably in continuing to shoot at White's vehicle after the first shot. Balderama asserts, however, that '[i]t is an indisputed historical fact that the first shot, fired while the vehicle was approaching Officer Balderama at a sixty (60) degree angle, entered the driver's side door and struck plaintiff in the right thigh.' Based on this statement, Balderama argues on appeal that this initial shot was 'beyond reproach,' an action for which he is 'demonstrably entitled to immunity,' and that the second and third shots are irrelevant to the legal issue of objective reasonableness because they did not injure White. He does not contend that his actions would have been objectively reasonable no matter which bullet struck White. His argument thus hinges on portions of his statement of facts that differ from the facts assumed by the district court. Balderama's appeal is therefore effectively a challenge to the genuineness of the factual issues, and we lack jurisdiction to consider it. . . Accordingly, we therefore DISMISS Balderama's appeal for lack of jurisdiction.").

Hayter v. City of Mount Vernon, 154 F.3d 269, 273 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Hayter's appeal falls squarely within the Supreme Court's description of claims that Johnson permits a public official to pursue on interlocutory appeal. The actions and conduct of the parties involved were not the subject of the material issue of genuine fact which the magistrate found precluded summary judgment. Instead, the disputed question was whether or not the defendants' conduct, i.e., their actions based on their belief that the substance they found in Hayter's car was marijuana, was reasonable. As such, the magistrate's ruling is precisely the type that the Supreme Court noted was appealable; therefore, this Court has jurisdiction to hear this appeal.").

White v. Balderama, 153 F.3d 237, 240-42 (5th Cir. 1998) ("The Supreme Court's recent jurisprudence on interlocutory appeals from denials of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity indicates that we possess jurisdiction to hear an interlocutory appeal challenging the materiality of the fact issues that led the district court to deny summary judgment but that we lack jurisdiction to hear interlocutory appeals challenging the genuineness of those fact issues. . . . We further observed in Colston that the specificity of the district court's order denying summary judgment dramatically affects the ease with which we can apply the Johnson/Behrens rule . . . . The district court's conclusion that genuine issues of material fact preclude a conclusive determination that Balderama did not violate clearly established law may have been predicated upon any number of potential factual issues, but the court did not specify what factual issues led it to this conclusion. Thus, we are unable to determine whether Balderama's statement in his appellate brief of the facts viewed in the light most favorable to White comports with the district court's conception of the facts viewed in the light most favorable to White, and thus whether Balderama is making a reviewable materiality challenge or an unreviewable genuineness challenge on appeal. . . . In Johnson and Behrens, the Supreme Court indicated that, in order to deal with the problem created by a lack of specificity in a district court's order denying summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, we have the authority to '"undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed."'. . . However, we conclude that a more efficient alternative exists for making this determination in this case: a limited remand to the district court for the purpose of allowing it to articulate specifically what factual scenario it believes emerges from viewing the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable to White.").

Colston v. Barnhart, 146 F.3d 282, 284-86 (5th Cir. 1998) (denying application for reh'g en banc) ("We believe that the key to understanding Johnson and Behrens rests on the recognition that when a district court denies a motion for summary judgment on the ground that 'genuine issues of material fact remain,' the court has made two distinct legal conclusions. First, the court has concluded that the issues of fact in question are genuine, i.e., the evidence is sufficient to permit a reasonable factfinder to return a verdict for the nonmoving party. . . . Second, the court has concluded that the issues of fact are material, i.e., resolution of the issues might affect the outcome of the suit under governing law. Johnson makes clear that an appellate court may not review a district court's determination that the issues of fact in question are genuine. . . . Behrens, on the other hand, makes clear that an appellate court is free to review a district court's determination that the issues of fact in question are material. . . . In this case the district court's statement was not sufficiently specific. This lack of specificity required us to undertake a review of the record to determine whether we had jurisdiction over Barnhart's appeal. As our majority opinion reflects, we conducted this review, and because we determined that Barnhart's version of the facts mirrored the version of the facts that we determined the district court likely assumed, we concluded that Barnhart was properly challenging the materiality of the factual issues the district court believed in dispute and that we therefore possessed jurisdiction over his appeal. On the merits, we concluded that Barnhart was entitled to qualified immunity.")

Colston v. Barnhart, 146 F.3d 282, 286, 288, 292-94 (5th Cir. 1998) (DeMoss, J., dissenting from order denying reh'g en banc) ("This case presents serious issues concerning our appellate jurisdiction in cases involving the denial of summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity. I express the following views in the hopes that they may help to attract the Supreme Court's attention to the increasingly complex panorama of doctrine and dissent that has evolved as the courts of appeals have struggled to reconcile the holdings of Johnson and Behrens. . . . The error of the panel opinion's approach is evident. Neither Johnson nor Behrens contemplates a 'cumbersome review of the record' for the threshold purpose of determining whether there is appellate jurisdiction. It is, rather, only a suggestion for how to proceed on determining whether the plaintiff alleged a violation of then-clearly-established law after appellate jurisdiction has already been determined. . . . The majority's approach is mistaken not only because it misreads Behrens, but more fundamentally because it results in the core substantive issue in a case being reviewed as a collateral order. . . . [T]he panel majority erred in determining that our Court had interlocutory jurisdiction to address the merits of the ultimate factual dispute as to whether under all of the circumstances Trooper Barnhart's use of deadly force by shooting Colston twice in the back was or was not excessive. The "cumbersome review of the record" contemplated by Johnson and Behrens is conducted for the limited purpose of establishing a set of facts (sufficiently supported by the evidence for the purposes of summary judgment) that are then used to answer the abstract legal question of whether the plaintiff has alleged a violation of clearly-established law. Behrens authorizes nothing more. . . . The panel majority's use of the genuineness-or-materiality distinction is simply not a useful theory of appealability. The trouble is that the analysis makes every denial of summary judgment appealable. Such an interpretation of Behrens entirely swallows the rule in Johnson . . . .").

Wren v. Towe, 130 F.3d 1154, 1157-58 (5th Cir. 1997) ("[T]he existence of disputed issues of material fact does not necessarily preclude review of the case. . . . Many of the facts relating to the availability of qualified immunity are in dispute, but this alone does not prevent summary judgment. A district court's denial of summary judgment is not immune from interlocutory appeal simply because the denial rested on the fact that a dispute over material issues of fact exists.

. . To foreclose appeal, the disputed facts must be central to and not severable from the matter of qualified immunity. . . In this case, we feel that we have jurisdiction based on the undisputed facts, even if we assume the resolution of disputed facts in the Wrens' favor.").

Colston v. Barnhart, 130 F.3d 96, 98, 99 (5th Cir. 1997) ("The district court's determination that fact issues were presented that precluded summary judgment does not necessarily deny us jurisdiction over this appeal. . . We can determine as a matter of law whether Barnhart is entitled to qualified immunity after accepting all of Colston's factual allegations as true. . . We therefore have interlocutory jurisdiction to determine the legal issue of whether Barnhart's conduct was objectively reasonable.").

Colston v. Barnhart, 130 F.3d 96, 102 (5th Cir. 1997) (DeMoss, J., dissenting) ("The majority attempts to establish appellate jurisdiction by assuming away the disputed issues of material fact found by the district court. Specifically, the majority purports to accept Colston's factual allegations as true. It then turns to the question of the objective reasonableness inquiry, which our Court has acknowledged to be a question of law that may be decided by a judge in the absence of any dispute over material facts. . . But the majority then goes astray, drawing inferences in the wrong direction and viewing the record in the light most favorable to Barnhart. In light of the district court's conclusion that the objective reasonableness of Barnhart's actions could not be determined at summary judgment because of the unsettled state of the record–a conclusion based solely on the district court's evaluation of 'evidence sufficiency' –our Court has no appellate jurisdiction to review that judgment.").

Hart v. O'Brien, 127 F.3d 424, 436 (5th Cir. 1997) ("[T]he district court determined that there were sufficient uncontested facts to establish that the officers engaged in the conduct in question, but that there were insufficient uncontested facts to decide whether the officials enjoyed immunity as a matter of law. Hence, the officials may argue on interlocutory appeal (as they do here) that, contrary to the district court's judgment, enough uncontested facts exist to determine that they are immune as a matter of law and that, on the basis of these facts, they are immune. . . Accordingly, under Mitchell, Johnson, and Behrens, we have jurisdiction over the officials' interlocutory appeal of the district court's denial of summary judgment on the grounds of immunity . . . .").

Hart v. O'Brien, 127 F.3d 424, 455-56 (5th Cir. 1997) (Benavides, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Under the collateral order doctrine, a defendant may argue on interlocutory appeal that even if the disputed facts are viewed in the plaintiff's favor, the remaining undisputed facts demonstrate that the plaintiff's constitutional rights were not violated or that the defendant's conduct was objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law. . . This is because the question for interlocutory review–the existence of immunity–is a purely legal question that is separable from the merits of a plaintiff's claim. . . The majority, however, relies on the presence of undisputed facts to justify its interlocutory review of Hart's compliance with her burden of production, an issue that the Supreme Court has found to be inextricably intertwined with, rather than separate from, the merits of her claims. . . Thus, the existence of undisputed evidence pertaining to the district court's finding of a genuine issue of material fact does not transform that determination into one that is immediately appealable under the collateral order doctrine.").

Coleman v. Houston Independent School District, 113 F.3d 528, 531 (5th Cir. 1997) ("[Defendant] does not challenge the sufficiency of the evidence underlying Coleman's allegations of discrimination. Instead, taking as given the facts assumed by the district court, [Defendant] claims that she is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law, because those assumed facts do not constitute a violation of clearly established federal law. Therefore, under the rule of Jones and Behrens, we may exercise appellate jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal, for in doing so we do not decide the sufficiency of the evidence, nor do we decide disputed factual contentions.").

Nerren v. Livingston Police Dep't, 86 F.3d 469, 472 (5th Cir. 1996) ("In the wake of Behrens, the Johnson modification (if any) on appellate review applies only when 'what is at issue in the sufficiency determination is nothing more than whether the evidence could support a finding that particular conduct occurred.' Thus, we cannot review the 'evidence sufficiency issue' (i.e., whether the nonmovant presented sufficient summary judgment evidence to create a dispute of fact). But we retain interlocutory jurisdiction to 'take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment' and determine whether these facts state a claim under clearly established law.").

Doe v. Hillsboro Independent School District, 81 F.3d 1395, 1401 (5th Cir. 1996) ("Unlike Johnson, which was reviewed at the summary judgment-level, the instant case involves the complaint-level denial of a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). In the Rule 12(b)(6) context, there can never be a genuine-issue- of-fact-based denial of qualified immunity, as we must assume that the plaintiff's factual allegations are true. Thus, denials of motions to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity are always 'purely legal' denials. Accordingly, under Mitchell and Johnson, we have interlocutory jurisdiction to determine whether Jane has stated a claim under § 1983. And, if so, whether it is immune to dismissal at this stage on grounds of qualified immunity."), opinion vacated on other grounds on reh'g en banc, 113 F.3d 1412 (5th Cir. 1997) (en banc).

Cantu v. Rocha, 77 F.3d 795, 803 (5th Cir. 1996) ("In the wake of Behrens, it is clear that Johnson's limitation on appellate review applies only when 'what is at issue in the sufficiency determination is nothing more than whether the evidence could support a finding that particular conduct occurred.'[citing Behrens] . . . . What was disputed and decided by the district court in the case now before us was whether the conduct as alleged violated a clearly established statutory or constitutional right of which a reasonable person would have known. This is precisely the variety of order that Johnson distinguishes as being separable from the merits and appealable on interlocutory appeal.").

Morin v. Caire, 77 F.3d 116, 119-20 (5th Cir. 1996) ("Although the immunity exception does not apply to the decision to deny the plaintiffs' state law claims, we also may have jurisdiction to review that decision. In the interest of judicial economy, this court may exercise its discretion to consider under pendant appellate jurisdiction claims that are closely related to the issue properly before us. Although we generally exercise this power with caution, it is appropriate for us to do so in this situation, for if we were to refuse to exercise jurisdiction over the state law claims, our refusal would defeat the principal purpose of allowing an appeal of immunity issues before a government employee is forced to go to trial.").

McGee v. Brown, No. 94-16827, 1995 WL 451094, *1 (5th Cir. July 28, 1995) (not published) ("Johnson makes clear that where an unresolved issue of fact remains regarding a defendant's intent, a circuit court lacks jurisdiction to hear an appeal of a district court's denial of a qualified immunity claim.").

Hale v. Townley, 45 F.3d 914, 918 (5th Cir. 1995) ("If disputed factual issues material to qualified immunity are present, the district court's denial of summary judgment . . . on the basis of qualified immunity is not appealable.").

Mangieri v. Clifton, 29 F.3d 1012, 1015-16 (5th Cir. 1994) ("We have jurisdiction to review a summary judgment denial of qualified immunity only to the extent that 'it turns on an issue of law.' . . . Because the district court determined that a question of fact exists regarding the reasonableness of the probable cause to arrest determination, Mangieri contends that we lack jurisdiction to hear this appeal. We do not agree. We recently determined that a district court errs in 'holding that the objective reasonableness prong of the qualified immunity standard is generally a factual question for the jury.' Lampkin v. City of Nacogdoches, 7 F.3d 430, 435 (5th Cir.1993). Following the Supreme Court's decision in Hunter v. Bryant,. . . we held that in evaluating a claim of qualified immunity, the district court is to make a determination of the objective reasonableness of the official's act as a matter of law. Lampkin, 7 F.3d at 434-35. Our interpretation of Hunter does not preclude the possibility that a disputed question of fact might still eliminate our jurisdiction to hear an appeal of a denial of summary judgment . . . . A denial of summary judgment based on a material factual dispute would still be appropriate if there are 'underlying historical facts in dispute that are material to the resolution of the questions whether the defendants acted in an objectively reasonable manner.' [citing Lampkin] The parties in Lampkin disputed whether force was used against the plaintiffs, the amount of time the plaintiffs were detained, and whether any reason existed to detain the plaintiffs. We concluded that this court would be unable to make the determination of the objective reasonableness of the officer's activities 'without settling on a coherent view of what happened in the first place.'. . .In this case, however, there is general agreement as to the factual events that gave rise to this lawsuit. Mangieri was using a bullhorn at full volume when the officers, responding to a disturbance call, witnessed the disturbance for themselves and then proceeded to arrest Mangieri without first admonishing him to stop. The only material factual dispute revolves around the reasonableness of the officer's decision to arrest Mangieri without first issuing a warning. Motions for summary judgment based on qualified immunity are, in the normal course of events, to be resolved as a matter of law. [citing Hunter] Because the historical factual background of this case is not in controversy, the district court erred in refusing to consider the motion for summary judgment because of the disputed issue of the reasonableness of the police officer's decision to arrest Mangieri.").

Samaad v. City of Dallas, 940 F.2d 925, 942 (5th Cir. 1991) ("Assuming arguendo that the denial of qualified immunity ultimately turned on an issue of fact [defendant's intent], the only reason that is so is that the court erroneously decided an issue of law, i.e., whether the complaint stated a constitutional cause of action at all. Accordingly, the district court's denial of summary judgment, at an analytically prior stage, did turn on an issue of law. . . . Therefore we have jurisdiction over the appeal. . . .").

Leghart v. Hauk, 25 F. Supp.2d 748, 753 (W.D. Tex. 1998) ("In light of the Fifth Circuit's recent opinion in White v. Balderama, ... regarding the problematic nature of reviewing district court denials of summary judgment in the qualified immunity context, the Court sets forth the following factual scenario upon which it relies and which precludes it from entering summary judgment in favor of Hauk on the basis of qualified immunity.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Meadows v. City of Walker, 46 F.4th 416, 421-24 (6th Cir. 2022) ("On interlocutory appeal, we are bound by the district court's determinations about genuine disputes of fact, even if the panel would reach a different conclusion reviewing the facts de novo. . . . Moreover, 'a defendant may not challenge the inferences the district court draws from those facts, as that too is a prohibited fact-based appeal.'. . We are therefore bound by the district court's determination that a reasonable jury could conclude that Dumond and Wietfeldt did not perceive Meadows as refusing to comply or resisting arrest. There is an exception to that rule when the district court's determinations about genuine disputes of fact are 'blatantly contradicted by the record,'. . . but the exception does not apply here. A careful review of the dash-camera footage supports each of the district court's determinations about genuine disputes of fact. . . .[O]ur precedent clearly establishes that taking Meadows to the ground, beating him, and fracturing his wrist when he did not actively resist arrest constitutes excessive force. It has been clearly established for several years in the Sixth Circuit that an officer cannot use injurious physical force to subdue a suspect that is not actively resisting arrest. . . . The officers argue in response that their conduct falls in a 'gray area' because they did not know whether Meadows was complying with their commands. The officers contend that, as a result, they are entitled to the benefit of the doubt and should receive qualified immunity. The argument appears to conflate ambiguity about the facts in this case for purposes of whether there is a genuine issue of material fact, on the one hand, with ambiguity from the officers' perspective about what the victim was up to, on the other. To be sure, when the facts confronting an officer leave ambiguity about whether the officer's actions violate a constitutional right, the officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . But an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity when the facts are disputed, but a reasonable jury could find a set of facts that, if proven at trial, would show that an officer's actions violated a clearly established right. . . In other words, in this case, if from the officers' perspective Meadows could be seen as possibly engaged in active resistance, then qualified immunity would presumably be warranted, and this would be true even if the officer was not entirely sure. But if the jury could reasonably conclude that from the officers' perspective Meadows could not be seen as possibly engaged in active resistance, then qualified immunity would not be warranted. The latter is clearly what the district court concluded, and that conclusion is supported by the dash-camera footage. On such facts, as discussed above, our precedent clearly establishes that an officer may not use injurious physical force to subdue a suspect that is not actively resisting arrest.")

Meadows v. City of Walker, 46 F.4th 416, 424-28, 431 (6th Cir. 2022) (Nalbandian, J., dissenting) ("The objective reasonableness of the officer's conduct is a legal conclusion that courts decide. . . . While Graham laid the foundation for the reasonableness inquiry, it stopped short of explaining whether judge or jury makes that determination. . . True, the multi-factor totality-of-the-circumstances language resembles common-law negligence. And at common law, a jury generally evaluates whether a person's conduct meets the standard of reasonable care. . . But in Scott, the Supreme Court clarified the inquiry in excessive-force cases involving a denial of qualified immunity. . . . The majority's decision to proceed with the reasonableness inquiry didn't go unnoticed. Indeed, Justice Stevens in dissent argued that the jury should be the one to evaluate the officers' reasonableness. . . But the majority explicitly rejected that view, responding that 'at the summary judgment stage ... once we have determined the relevant set of facts and drawn all inferences in favor of the nonmoving party to the extent supportable by the record,' the reasonableness inquiry is a 'pure question of law.'. .Thus, in Scott, the Supreme Court assessed reasonableness de novo by weighing the underlying considerations (balancing the use of force with the level of threat) de novo as well. . . Of course, it did so after determining the historical facts and drawing inferences in the nonmoving party's favor that the video evidence supported. This fact-finding and inference-drawing is the work of district courts, and, with a few limited exceptions, we don't disturb that work on appellate review. . . To be clear, all of this foundation is well-established and uncontroversial. . . . Like the threat posed by a suspect, Graham also mentioned that courts should consider whether a suspect is resisting arrest. . . So we also review that consideration de novo. . . .Turning to the case before us, the district court denied qualified immunity for Officers Dumond and Wietfeldt because it found that a reasonable jury could conclude that Meadows was not actively resisting arrest. And if Meadows was not resisting arrest, the court continued, it was excessive force for the officers to take him to the ground. But whether Meadows was resisting arrest is not a question for the jury, but a mixed question that courts resolve and that we review as part of our reasonableness inquiry. And in reviewing the video, the level of Meadows's resistance is either active resistance or, at a minimum, in a grey area between active resistance and non-resistance. As a result, the officers' use of force was objectively reasonable. But even if it weren't, I don't think our caselaw provided enough notice to the officers that they used excessive force. . . . . The district court is correct that the standard is objective reasonableness, and that video evidence helps courts determine reasonableness. But unless the parties dispute historical facts, the court erred in believing that question is one for a jury. So let's examine the factual disputes the district court found. For starters, the district court pointed to no historical facts that the parties dispute. Everything 'in dispute' was an inference the district court made from clear video evidence about what a jury could find. But since this is an interlocutory appeal, the majority feels bound by the district court's determination that a reasonable jury could conclude the officers didn't perceive Meadows as resisting arrest since 'a defendant may not challenge the inferences the district court draws from those facts, as that too is a prohibited fact-based appeal.'. . . That said, the majority recognizes that an exception exists (but doesn't apply here) when the district court's determinations are 'blatantly contradicted by the record.'. . Putting that exception aside, we've recognized, regardless, that when video captures all the material facts, we review the facts as depicted by the video. . . And as mentioned above, we have clear video evidence of what happened here. So even if the video doesn't 'blatantly contradict' the district court's inferences, it does capture everything material and thus obviates any deference to the district court's inferences. Deferring to the district court's inferences is especially problematic when it comes to the level of Meadows's resistance because that's a determination that we make de novo. . . Take Officer Dumond's confusing instructions. The district court found that Meadows was 'trying to be respectful, trying to comply, and [wa]s confused about how to do it.'. . But this conclusion is based on the video. True, asking Meadows to stick his hand out the window and then open his car door was not the clearest way to convey the instructions. But after Meadows put his hand back in the car for the first time and was admonished for it, Officer Dumond instructs Meadows to open the door from the outside and not to put his hands back in the vehicle. As seen from the video, Meadows violates that instruction. The district court inferred from that same video that Meadows was trying to comply and lamented: 'What's the citizen to do?'. . In doing so, the district court contradicted Graham. Remember, the reasonableness of the use of force 'must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. .So what if the district court had considered Officer Dumond's perspective? You have a suspect who committed a 'moderate[ly] sever[e]' crime, . . . and who reached back into his vehicle after a clear instruction not to. And while Meadows may have been confused, so too was Officer Dumond. After all, Meadows told Officer Dumond his car was unlocked. . . With these facts, which were clear from the video, Officer Dumond's decision to take Meadows to the ground and end the stop as quickly as possible was reasonable. . . .Even if Officers Dumond and Wietfeldt violated Meadows's constitutional rights (and I don't think they did), there is no case that clearly establishes the unlawfulness of the officers' specific conduct at the time of the traffic stop. . .The district court erred in denying summary judgment to the officers. It left mixed questions for the jury to answer and drew inferences in Meadows's favor that found no support from the video. But above all, it did not find a case that would have provided notice to Officers Dumond and Wietfeldt that the force used to arrest Meadows was unlawful. For these reasons, I respectfully dissent.")

Slayton v. City of River Rouge, Michigan, No. 21-1278, 2022 WL 1044040, at *6–7 (6th Cir. Apr. 7, 2022) (Readler, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (not reported) ("By one interpretation, Johnson's limits on our jurisdiction over 'fact-based' questions could swallow Mitchell's holding that qualified immunity appeals fall within the collateral order doctrine. 'Facts,' after all, 'are crucial to every case.'. . So giving Johnson a sweeping reading would extinguish our jurisdiction any time facts begin to bleed into the appellant's legal argument.

. . That is why the Supreme Court, in the years since Johnson, has limited its scope to only those qualified immunity denials that involve 'purely factual issues.'. . Issues of that ilk relate to 'what occurred[ ] or why an action was taken or omitted.'. . Fairly read, then, Johnson stands for an important, but limited, principle: '[a]n officer may not appeal the denial of a qualified immunity ruling solely on the ground that the plaintiff's record-supported facts are wrong.' Barry v. O'Grady, 895 F.3d 440, 446 (6th Cir. 2018) (Sutton, J., dissenting). In other words, so long as some aspect of an officer's appeal goes beyond the limited argument at issue in Johnson (i.e., whether and how certain events occurred) and addresses the district court's legal error in assessing the plaintiff's evidence at summary judgment, that part of the appeal is fair game for us to resolve. . . This appeal squarely presents a legal question: whether Slayton has 'created a question of fact' by relying on only inadmissible evidence. . . Otis's central argument is that Slayton's testimony identifying Otis is 'speculative conjecture' beyond Slayton's 'personal knowledge.'. . Because speculative testimony is inadmissible, . . . Otis argues at length that 'there is no admissible evidence that [he] had any involvement in the application of force ... toward Slayton[.]' . . The argument, it bears emphasizing, is premised on black letter law that a party cannot defeat summary judgment with inadmissible evidence . . . such as 'conclusory allegations, speculation, and unsubstantiated assertions[.]'. . And unlike the officers in Johnson, Otis is not suggesting that Slayton is lying (although he may think that). Instead, Otis argues the opposite: if we take Slayton's deposition testimony at face value, it is simply too speculative to be admissible for purposes of summary judgment. Even before the Supreme Court's narrowing of Johnson, we had long held that questions of evidence admissibility raise pure legal questions, questions that are within our jurisdiction over interlocutory appeals from qualified immunity denials. . . . [W]e have jurisdiction to review whether a summary judgment ruling was based on inadmissible speculative evidence. The majority opinion, I acknowledge, sees things differently. It reads our cases as viewing Johnson to be the rule and Mitchell the exception. . . .To be fair, Otis's briefing clouds the nature of his appeal by also making a sufficiency argument. . . And I agree with the majority opinion that, to the extent Otis's arguments on this point venture into the ilk of 'I didn't do it' à la the officers in Johnson, we lack jurisdiction to review them. . . But simply because Otis made one argument for which we lack jurisdiction does not mean we lack jurisdiction as to all of them. . . Why throw out the entire bushel, in other words, for one bad apple? In the end, Otis's appeal seems to raise two distinct questions: (1) can Slayton survive summary judgment by relying on inadmissible evidence and (2) if admissible, is Slayton's evidence enough to create a dispute of fact. The second question strikes me as merely a sufficiency challenge. Yet the first, a legal one, is one we can answer. And the answer is rather straightforward. Slayton's testimony is not inadmissible speculation. Slayton has presented more evidence than just his guess that Otis was involved in his beating. In his deposition, he stated that he 'believed' Otis and one other officer kicked him, identifying Otis by his skin color, other physical attributes, and location near Slayton's head as the kicking occurred. That assertion, in my view, is a lay opinion derived from facts within Slayton's personal knowledge. . . . On the merits, then, I would affirm the district court.")

Yatsko v. Graziolli, No. 20-3574, 2021 WL 5772527, at *4 (6th Cir. Dec. 6, 2021) (not reported) ("The Supreme Court has allowed a prevailing party to appeal in limited situations, but that exception does not apply here. In Camreta v. Greene, the Court held that it had jurisdiction over the officials' appeal despite the fact that the officials prevailed in the lower court and were granted qualified immunity. In that case, however, the Court emphasized that the 'statute governing this Court's jurisdiction authorizes us to adjudicate a case in this posture.'. . There is no analogous statute that applies here, and in Camreta the Court explicitly declined to decide whether an appellate court 'can entertain an appeal from a party who has prevailed on immunity grounds.'. .We have already rejected the application of the Camreta exception to an officer's cross-appeal when the officer was granted qualified immunity. See Wheeler v. City of Lansing, 660 F.3d 931, 933 (6th Cir. 2011). In Wheeler, the officer wanted to appeal the district court's finding that the officer committed a constitutional violation, but this court held it did not have jurisdiction to do so. . . We emphasized that '[t]here is generally no appellate jurisdiction when the appellant does not seek a change in the relief ordered by the judgment appealed from.'. . Since the city prevailed below, we do not have jurisdiction over the city's appeal of the judgment in its favor.") Gillispie v. Miami Township, Ohio, 18 F.4th 909, 916-19 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Because the scope of the defendant's appeal is so circumscribed, 'we "need look no further than the district court's opinion," and "we often may be able merely to adopt the district court's recitation of facts and inferences."'. . This court simply 'defer[s] to the district court's determinations of fact.'. . 'And beyond those determinations, "a defendant may not challenge the inferences that the district court draws from those facts, as that too is a prohibited fact-based appeal."'. . Two exceptions to these general rules exist, neither of which applies in this case. 'First, we may overlook a factual disagreement if a defendant, despite disputing a plaintiff's version of the story, is "willing to concede the most favorable view of the facts to the plaintiff for purposes of the appeal."'. . As explained below, Moore refuses to do so here. 'And second, in exceptional circumstances, we may decide an appeal challenging the district court's factual determination if that determination is "blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it."'. . Far from the situation Scott contemplated, in which a video recording in the record 'utterly discredited' the plaintiff's narrative, . . . the record contradicts neither Gillispie's version nor the district court's various factual determinations in this case, much less blatantly so. 'We have consistently enforced Johnson's jurisdictional bar in cases in which the defendant's qualified immunity appeal is based solely on his or her disagreement with the plaintiff's facts.'. . . Moore consistently ignores our repeated instruction that 'to bring an interlocutory appeal of a qualified immunity ruling, the defendant must be willing to concede the plaintiff's version of the facts for purposes of the appeal.'. . . This repeated refusal to accept Gillispie's version of the facts is fatal to Moore's appeal. The factual disputes he raises in his briefing serve as the sole bases for his arguments about clearly established law, and he continued with that approach at oral argument. . . These disputes are 'crucial' to Moore's contentions, . . . which assert that because the district court erred in finding certain facts, the law was not clearly established. Moore effectively says that 'the resolution of these factual issues is needed to resolve the legal issue'—which, as we have recognized, strips jurisdiction entirely. . . These disputes are not minor, and Moore's insistence that the district court's thorough opinion is blatantly and demonstrably false is unavailing. . . We conclude that Moore's failure to comply with the basic requirements of an appeal from a denial of qualified immunity means that we do not have jurisdiction over his appeal. . . Moore's appeal is troubling not only because it violates the core jurisdictional rules governing this context, but also because it implicates the reasons those rules exist in the first place. Johnson was published more than 26 years ago, and litigants have been on notice for more than two decades that fact-intensive claims of entitlement to qualified immunity 'can consume inordinate amounts of appellate time.'. . Such claims stymie the proper development of a case that should be based on the 'comparative expertise of trial and appellate courts.'. . . Here, 'there is clearly a factual dispute at the heart of the qualified immunity issue.'. . Moore has 'contradicted [Gillispie's] version of the facts at every turn.'. . We acknowledged not long after Johnson that 'defendants sometimes attempt simply to protract the litigation and manipulate the fact-law distinction ... to create the appearance of jurisdiction.'. . That is particularly concerning here because this case presents the exact scenario against which the Johnson Court warned: a voluminous record, a trial court's able factfinding, and a subsequent appeal looming should this case proceed to trial and Gillispie prevail. It has been clear for decades to litigants that this litigation strategy is improper. An appeal choosing to take this tack anyway delays the administration of our justice system and is a waste of judicial resources.")

Gillispie v. Miami Township, Ohio, 18 F.4th 909, 919-22 (6th Cir. 2021) (Bush, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I agree that Moore devotes a sizable majority of his argument to nonreviewable factual challenges. But we have a duty to 'excise the prohibited fact-based challenge[s] so as to establish jurisdiction' over his legal arguments. . . Following that approach and affirming the denial of qualified immunity here would have given the parties and the district court 'clear direction as to what was at stake and what law should control the jury trial at prongs one and two of the qualified immunity inquiry.'. . 'And in a future appeal, the law of the case would establish the contours of what the jury could permissibly decide.'. . Instead, the parties will return to the district court with nothing gained, and over a year lost. The majority opinion appears to recognize what is lost by dismissing the entire appeal on jurisdictional grounds. In a footnote, it offers a hypothetical rejection of Moore's legal arguments. . . But if we lack jurisdiction, we cannot reach those questions. . . . The approach I suggest spares the parties this uncertainty about the law governing this case. . . Binding authority demands that we exercise our proper jurisdiction over Moore's legal challenges. 'Doing otherwise is a disservice to the Court and the parties.'. . So for the reasons above, I concur in the majority's dismissal of Moore's purely factual challenges, but I respectfully dissent from its refusal to resolve his legal challenges.")

Williams v. Maurer, 9 F.4th 416, 427-30 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Defendants . . . argue that we have jurisdiction over the district court's resolution of the false arrest claim under the qualified immunity exception to § 1291. According to Defendants, they raised the defense of qualified immunity in their response to Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment, and they should not be 'punished' for failing to move for summary judgment on the false arrest claim because, after they decided that factual disputes would have precluded a grant of summary judgment, they complied with their ethical obligation to not file frivolous motions. . . For three reasons, Defendants' argument fails. First, a review of Defendants' response to Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment shows that they did not assert the defense of qualified immunity in their response to this claim. . . Second, even if they had done so, the 'mere assertion of a claim of qualified immunity, without being raised by defendants in a motion for summary judgment or a motion to dismiss, is' not 'enough to support appellate jurisdiction.'. . This is so because the consequence of the district court's grant of summary judgment to Williams on his false arrest claim is that the claim is no longer being litigated. Although there is not yet a final judgment, the continuing proceedings below will not force Defendants to face any 'burdens of litigation' from this claim, and they will also not have 'to stand trial' on the claim. . . Finally, it is not a punishment to comply with 'the general rule, that a party is entitled to a single appeal, to be deferred until final judgment has been entered, in which claims of district court error at any stage of the litigation may be ventilated.'. . Thus, under § 1291, this Court lacks jurisdiction to consider the false arrest claim. Defendants alternatively argue that under the doctrine of pendent appellate jurisdiction this Court should exercise jurisdiction to consider the false arrest claim. . . . According to Defendants, 'the issue of probable cause is inextricably intertwined with the issue of the unlawful entry' because '[i]f it was reasonable to believe there were exigent circumstances to enter the apartment, it was reasonable to conclude that Williams needed to be restrained as a suspect upon entry.'. .However, Defendants misunderstand what it means for appeals to be 'inextricably intertwined.'. . Appeals are not 'inextricably intertwined' merely because they 'overlap in some respects.'. . Rather, '[w]e have interpreted "inextricably intertwined" to mean coterminous with, or subsumed in, the claim before the court on interlocutory appeal.'. . . Contrary to Defendants' assertion, 'resolution of [Defendants'] interlocutory appeal of the [unlawful entry] issue does not necessarily resolve the [Defendants'] interlocutory appeal of the' false arrest issue. . . As will be explained below, resolution of the unlawful entry claim turns on whether Defendants had 'an objectively reasonable basis for believing that an occupant [was] seriously injured or imminently threatened with such injury.'. . But whether Defendants had probable cause to arrest Williams depends on whether, at the time of the arrest, 'the facts and circumstances within [their] knowledge [were] sufficient to inform "a prudent person, or one of reasonable caution," that [Williams] "ha[d] committed, [was] committing, or [was] about to commit an offense."'. . In other words, even if we were to hold that Defendants reasonably believed that someone within Apartment 103 needed emergency aid, once inside, Defendants still had to have probable cause to believe that Williams committed a crime. So if the scene within the home demonstrated that Defendants were mistaken about the existence of an emergency, that Williams was the victim of the events giving rise to the emergency, or that the emergency did not give rise to criminal liability, Defendants would lack probable cause to arrest Williams even if they were allowed to enter the apartment. . . Therefore, Williams' false arrest claim is not 'subsumed in' Plaintiffs' unlawful entry claim, and, accordingly, it would be inappropriate for us to exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction in this case. . . Because we lack jurisdiction over Defendants' appeal from the district court's grant of summary judgment to Williams on his false arrest claim, we review only the district court's denial of summary judgment to Defendants on Plaintiffs' unlawful entry claim and Mitchell's excessive force claim.") Himmelreich v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 5 F.4th 653, 659-63 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor this court (nor any other circuit, as far as we can tell) has considered whether an order denying summary judgment and allowing a new Bivens damages action to proceed is a collateral order subject to immediate appeal. Defendants in Bivens actions will likely include a claim of qualified immunity in their motion for summary judgment. Faced with this question of first impression, where the defendant has failed to raise a timely defense of qualified immunity, we hold that an interlocutory appeal from a district court order allowing a Bivens damages action to proceed does not come within the confines of the collateral order doctrine. . . . In Hartman, Wilkie, and Iqbal, the appellate courts already had jurisdiction over the appeals challenging the district courts' denial of qualified immunity. Similarly, in Bistrian, the defendants asserted a defense of qualified immunity in their motion for summary judgment, and the district court denied the request for qualified immunity, concluding that the inmate had stated a cognizable Bivens damages action for First Amendment retaliation. . . True, the Supreme Court in Hartman, Wilkie, and Iqbal, and the Third Circuit in Bistrian, did not reach the merits of the district court's denial of qualified immunity. In each case, however, the court anchored its appellate jurisdiction in the defendants' appeal of the district court's denial of qualified immunity. Where a defendant has not appealed the denial of qualified immunity, the appellate court does not have jurisdiction under the collateral order doctrine to address an underlying claim. For instance, in Vanderklok, the Third Circuit concluded that it had appellate jurisdiction to review whether the plaintiff had a First Amendment right to be free from retaliation by TSA employees because the district court had denied qualified immunity on that claim, but the court concluded that it did not have appellate jurisdiction to review the district court's denial of summary judgment as to the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment malicious-prosecution claim because the defendants had not sought qualified immunity on this claim. . . As the Third Circuit wrote in Vanderklok, '[t]he fact that [defendant] was denied summary judgment on the merits of th[e] Fourth Amendment claim rather than on qualified immunity grounds deprives us of jurisdiction on interlocutory appeal, and we have no discretion to overlook that.'. .Here, for some unexplained reason, Fitzgerald did not raise qualified immunity as a defense in her motion for summary judgment. Instead, Fitzgerald's sole argument in her motion for summary judgment as to Himmelreich's claim against her was that he had not established a cognizable Bivens remedy for First Amendment retaliation. Thus, there is no qualified-immunity argument here that the question of whether to recognize a Bivens damages action could 'directly implicate.'Seemingly recognizing that the predicate denial of qualified immunity is absent in this appeal, Fitzgerald changes tack and argues that in these cases discussed above the Court 'implicitly recognized that its collateral-order jurisdiction ... renders these orders [allowing Bivens claims to proceed], like outright denials of qualified immunity, appealable in their own right.'. . Contrary to the government's position, Himmelreich suggests that the Supreme Court's decisions in Hartman, Wilkie, and Iqbal are an exercise of pendent appellate jurisdiction that bootstraps ancillary questions onto preexisting appellate jurisdiction over decisions denying qualified immunity. . . But the Court did not mention pendent appellate jurisdiction in these cases. Whatever the basis for the Supreme Court in recognizing appellate jurisdiction over matters directly implicated by the denial of qualified immunity, in each case there was a predicate denial of qualified immunity. Here, there is no predicate denial of qualified immunity, and thus, Fitzgerald's argument fails. . . .[W]e conclude that the collateral order doctrine does not permit immediate review of a district-court order denying summary judgment to a defendant facing a Bivens First Amendment retaliation claim, absent the jurisdictional hook of an appeal of a denial of qualified immunity. We thus do not reach the merits of Fitzgerald's challenge to the district court's order recognizing a Bivens remedy for First Amendment retaliation. Fitzgerald lost her motion for summary judgment, and we will not permit her to bypass the final-decision requirement of 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and seek immediate interlocutory appeal.")

Kidis v. Reid, 976 F.3d 708, 719-20 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Because qualified immunity is a defense from trial, we afford a government official the right to take an interlocutory appeal to contest the denial of qualified immunity at summary judgment. Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 530 (1985). One who foregoes that right, however, has not forever forfeited his ability to further raise the issue. . . But the mechanics of preserving the defense are somewhat less clear. Ortiz held that a defendant forfeits appellate review of a sufficiency-of-the-evidence-based qualified immunity defense when he fails to raise the issue through a Rule 50 motion. . . At the same time, Ortiz expressly left open the question of whether this procedural requirement applies only to a defendant's evidence-based arguments, or also applies to a defendant who, like Moran, raises a 'purely legal' challenge regarding qualified immunity. . . The answer to that open question could have consequences for Moran, who did not file a Rule 50 motion here. Assuming the issue is live, Moran's argument nonetheless fails. As the record before the jury reflected, when Moran discovered Kidis, Kidis was shirtless, shoeless, intoxicated, badly scratched, and on the ground, face down and with his hands out, having tired from a lengthy flight from the police. At that point, it was visually obvious that Kidis was not a threat or a flight risk. And while it was conceivable that Moran would need to apply some force to arrest Kidis safely, there was no conceivable need for Moran to knee strike, choke, and punch Kidis once Moran was on top of Kidis while Kidis was making no effort to resist arrest. Once Moran had physical control over the surrendering and unresisting Kidis, Moran's subsequent aggression violated Kidis's clearly established right to be free from excessive force.")

Estate of Matthews v. City of Dearborn, Michigan, 826 F. App'x 543, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("Because Hampton's legal arguments depend on factual disputes and credibility determinations, and Hampton has failed to concede the most favorable view of the facts to Matthews for purposes of the appeal, . . . or to show that any of these disputes are blatantly contradicted by the evidence, . . . we lack jurisdiction over this appeal.")

Estate of Matthews v. City of Dearborn, Michigan, 826 F. App'x 543, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Readler, J., concurring in the judgment) ("As the majority opinion correctly concludes, Officer Hampton is not entitled to qualified immunity. In reaching that conclusion, however, we should be careful in parsing factual and legal arguments. To be sure, purely factual challenges to the district court's findings are foreclosed on interlocutory review, except when the record blatantly contradicts a plaintiff's factual account. . . But simply because a party raises the factual aspects of a case does not automatically doom the appeal on jurisdictional grounds. Every advocate, after all, colors their case with their factual perspectives to some degree, reminding the reader that there are two sides to a story, even if, for legal argument's sake, a party ultimately must accept the other side's. . . Nor is it uncommon for a party to plead alternative arguments, perhaps one turning on facts, and another, should the fact-based argument fail, on law. . . And in the qualified immunity setting, the appellate courthouse doors remain open to that legal argument. . . Although Hampton disagrees with the district court's finding that Matthews was underneath Hampton at the time of the shooting, he expressly acknowledges his willingness to accept that factual conclusion for purposes of appeal. . . With that concession, Hampton argues that the district court erred as a legal matter by holding that his actions constituted excessive force in violation of clearly established Fourth Amendment precedent. We should answer that identifiable legal question, rather than dismissing Hampton's appeal entirely because it also has a factual dimension. That said, Hampton's legal argument lacks merit. Whether Hampton's use of deadly force was excessive turns on whether he had 'probable cause to believe that the suspect pose[d] a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'. . Hampton justifies his conduct by contending that Matthews was reaching for the gun when Hampton fired his weapon, buttressing that point with the legal argument that in a deadly force case, a plaintiff cannot create a question of fact by asserting only speculative arguments as to why an officer's testimony is not believable[.] . . That argument may have some legal force. Cf. Romo v. Largen, 723 F.3d 670, 678 (6th Cir. 2013) (Sutton, J., concurring) (arguing that Johnson does not mean that parties who claim qualified immunity must accept a district court's inferences from the facts). But even if Hampton has fairly characterized the legal standard, his claim nevertheless fails to meet it. With the factual uncertainties at play here, the district court did not err as a matter of law in concluding that there remained a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the plaintiff was trying to obtain the officer's gun. In these circumstances, in other words, the jury could find excessive force.")

Marvaso v. Sanchez, 971 F.3d 599, 604-05 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Reddy Sr. was not a public official either at the time of Plaintiffs' alleged constitutional injury or at present. Instead, as he explains in his motion to dismiss, he retired as the Wayne-Westland Fire Chief in 1998. Accordingly, although he is still subject to § 1983 liability, he is not entitled to qualified immunity from suit. See, e.g., Vector Research, Inc. v. Howard & Howard Attorneys P.C., 76 F.3d 692, 698 (6th Cir. 1996) ("[A] party who is not a public official may be liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and yet not be entitled to qualified immunity because, if not a public official, the reason for affording qualified immunity does not exist." (citing Wyatt v. Cole, 504 U.S. 158 (1992))). Because the exception for qualified immunity appeals does not apply and no other basis for appellate jurisdiction exists, . . . we dismiss Reddy Sr.'s appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Marvaso v. Sanchez, 971 F.3d 599, 615 (6th Cir. 2020) (Nalbandian, J., dissenting) ("I agree that [Reddy Sr.] is not entitled to qualified immunity because he is not a public official, even though he qualifies as a state actor for § 1983 liability. . . That said, the district court still erred in denying his motion to dismiss because Plaintiffs fail to adequately plead a § 1983 conspiracy claim against him for the same reasons they fail to adequately plead the same claim against Adams and Reddy, Jr. . . . The majority concludes that we don't have jurisdiction over his appeal because qualified immunity isn't involved. . . But 'whether a particular complaint sufficiently alleges a clearly established violation of law ... is both "inextricably intertwined with," and "directly implicated by," the qualified-immunity defense,' so we have pendent jurisdiction over challenges to the sufficiency of the pleadings. . . The majority acknowledges this and says: 'Two claims are "inextricably intertwined" if deciding one necessarily decides the other.'. . Because resolution of Adams and Reddy, Jr.'s appeal also resolves Reddy, Sr.'s, we have jurisdiction over both. . . The standard to survive a motion to dismiss is admittedly a low bar. But that doesn't mean courts must bend over backwards to save a plaintiff's meritless claims. Yet that's what the majority does here. I respectfully dissent.")

Ouza v. City of Dearborn Heights, Michigan, 969 F.3d 265, 277-78 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Defendants attempt to turn the Johnson rule on its head in the present case by arguing that we are bound by the district court's findings of fact even where the district court improperly construed those facts against Plaintiff, the non-moving party. Defendants ask us to decide the purely legal question of whether red marks alone—without allegations of swelling, bruising, or numbness—can ever be enough to make out a viable excessive force claim based on tight handcuffing under the Fourth Amendment. But we do not need to decide whether red marks alone are sufficient to make out an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment because Plaintiff's version of the facts includes more than red marks: she demonstrated red marks and carpal tunnel syndrome (including numbness and tingling) resulting from the tight handcuffing. To the extent that the district court failed to take those facts into account or construed them in Defendant's favor, it applied the wrong standard at the summary judgment stage. . . At bottom, Defendants' argument mischaracterizes the district court's ruling and misunderstands the Johnson rule. While this Court does not have jurisdiction to consider determinations of evidence sufficiency under Johnson (i.e., whether or not the plaintiff's allegations set forth a genuine issue for trial), we do have jurisdiction to review whether the district court properly adopted the plaintiff's version of the facts in assessing qualified immunity (i.e., whether it applied the correct summary judgment standard). Indeed, the precise scope of our appellate jurisdiction on interlocutory appeal from a denial of qualified immunity is whether 'the plaintiff's version of facts demonstrates a violation of clearly established rights.'. . In the present case, Plaintiff's version of the facts includes evidence of red marks and carpal tunnel syndrome. We have jurisdiction to review whether that version of the facts sets forth a violation of a clearly established right.")

Sevy v. Barach, No. 19-2038, 2020 WL 3564660, at *8-10 (6th Cir. July 1, 2020) (not reported) (Readler, J., concurring in part and in the judgment) ("Agreeing fully with the majority opinion's resolution of Anthony Sevy's First Amendment claim, I write separately to address Officer Philip Barach's challenge to Sevy's Fourth Amendment claim. Unlike the majority opinion, I would reach the merits of that challenge. In characterizing our interlocutory jurisdiction over the denial of qualified immunity, we sometimes say our mandate is to review law, but not facts. . . Consider an appeal challenging the legal determination that the plaintiff's facts demonstrate a violation of a clearly established constitutional right, meaning the defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . These legal conclusions are the bread and butter of our interlocutory qualified immunity jurisdiction, and they are reviewable in the ordinary course. . . .

In reality, however, most arguments in this setting include features of both law and fact. Take, for instance, a case in which a district court draws factual inferences in denying on legal grounds at summary judgment a claim for qualified immunity. What part of that decision is eligible for interlocutory review? We have sometimes said that any factual inferences are insulated from review, Romo v. Largen, 723 F.3d 670, 673–74 (6th Cir. 2015), yet we have acknowledged that this approach may be at odds with Supreme Court precedent. See DiLuzio v. Village of Yorkville, 796 F.3d 604, 609 (6th Cir. 2015) (acknowledging but declining to decide whether Romo is inconsistent with Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U.S. 765, 777 (2014)); see also Romo, 723 F.3d at 678 (Sutton, J., concurring) (construing Supreme Court precedent to permit interlocutory review of a district court's factual inferences). And we have routinely performed at least a perfunctory review of those factual inferences at summary judgment to ensure they are not 'blatantly contradicted by the record' such that 'no reasonable jury could believe [them].'. . Otherwise, we risk working from a fictitious version of events in assessing a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity. . . Equally true, even in cases where there are genuine disputes over material facts, we do not dismiss the appeal on jurisdictional grounds merely because the defendant made some factual arguments or used aspects of her own factual account in mounting a legal argument for qualified immunity. . . Doing otherwise is a disservice to the Court and the parties. After all, more expansive jurisdiction maximizes qualified immunity protections for officials acting in good faith. It further guides and develops the law surrounding the constitutional questions before us. And it focuses future proceedings by identifying the controlling law and key disputes for trial. . . All of this is to say that, at the very least, we must be careful on interlocutory appeal to separate reviewable arguments from non-reviewable ones. . . Yet to my eye, the majority opinion has not followed this sound approach. Deeming all of Barach's Fourth Amendment arguments as turning on purely factual disputes, the majority opinion concludes that we do not have jurisdiction over any of Barach's challenges to the district court's denial of qualified immunity. . . . Barach contends that he employed reasonable force in arresting Sevy, as measured by Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), even on Sevy's version of events. That bread-and-butter legal argument is one we should entertain. . .The majority opinion nonetheless denies jurisdiction over that claim because factual disputes are 'crucial' to Barach's appeal. . . Facts, of course, are crucial to every case. How crucial depends on context. Sometimes they are crucial because they are outcome-determinative. That was the case in Johnson. Where a defendant concedes that adopting the plaintiff's version of the facts demonstrates the violation of a clearly established constitutional right, the Court is left essentially with a factual dispute, making the facts crucial to the outcome. . . But in other cases, the facts are important, perhaps even crucial in a sense, yet leave for the Court a legal issue appropriate for interlocutory resolution. Consider that in nearly every qualified immunity appeal, the parties tell different stories. And each party's view of the facts often bleeds into her portrayal of the law. We in turn are left to resolve whether a clearly established constitutional violation occurred based upon the plaintiff's account of the facts, something the defendant rarely if ever concedes. If this run-of-the-mill scenario constitutes a 'crucial' factual dispute that extinguishes our interlocutory jurisdiction, the Johnson exception would quickly become the general rule. Rather than dismissing Barach's appeal for lack of jurisdiction, we should undertake the traditional qualified immunity analysis. Accepting Adams's instruction to determine whether a factual dispute is 'crucial,' we should ask whether the plaintiff's version of events establishes the violation of a clearly established constitutional right, another way of asking whether accepting the plaintiff's version of events is outcome-determinative (or 'crucial'). If the defendant maintains that adopting the plaintiff's view of events is not outcome-determinative, as Barach does here, a 'pure question of law' remains for resolution. . . I would therefore reach the merits of Barach's Graham argument. . . . All told, assuming the truth of Sevy's record-supported account, Sevy was not actively resisting the officers. It follows that a reasonable jury could find that Barach violated Sevy's clearly established Fourth Amendment right not to be subjected to a takedown maneuver while offering no resistance to an attempted arrest. . . Sevy deserves the chance to make his case to a jury. . . e whether Sevy's account is correct. But it is our place, indeed our duty, to measure that account against the applicable legal standard. I would thus resolve Barach's appeal rather than dismiss it for purported jurisdictional defects.")

Franklin v. City of Southfield, Michigan, 808 F. App'x 366, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("In this case, both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis hinge on disputes of material fact that are not conceded and that remain unresolved by the video. If, in fact, Roeske's gesture was for Franklin to walk forward, a jury may find that, from the perspective of a reasonable officer, it was not objectively reasonable to tase him. Whether Franklin complied with instructions is also a dispute of material fact, as is whether Roeske issued accompanying verbal instructions. Furthermore, we must assess the objective reasonableness of each taser deployment separately. . . And there remains a question of fact as to whether Franklin's actions after he was dropped by the first taser were sufficient to make the second and third use of the taser objectively reasonable. Additional factual clarity is also needed before we can assess whether Roeske violated clearly established law, as it is axiomatic (as it was in 2013) that tasing a person who complies with police instructions—or who is not resisting arrest—violates the Fourth Amendment. . . Because the resolution of facts in dispute is necessary to resolve either prong of the qualified immunity inquiry as a matter of law, we do not have jurisdiction to hear this appeal.")

Banas v. Hagbom, 806 F. App'x 439, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("[W]hen a defendant argues both his factual perspective and legal questions, we can disregard his factual contentions and only decide the legal issues. . . Yet if the defendant only argues factual questions, we lack jurisdiction. . .And besides ignoring a defendant's factual argument to assess his legal argument, we may also exercise jurisdiction over a case when the parties dispute the material facts if the plaintiff's version of the facts is 'blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it.'. . In this circuit, a video, or audio recording may suffice to 'blatantly contradict' the plaintiff's facts. . . And, of course, if the facts are undisputed, we may evaluate the case in light of clearly established law. We lack jurisdiction to hear Hagbom's appeal because he only argues factual questions. Banas claims he did not resist Hagbom while on the ground. He said in his deposition that he could not put his arms behind his back because Hagbom was sitting on top of him at the time. Alternatively, Hagbom tries to explain why Banas was, in fact, resisting him on the ground after the body-slam. Hagbom construes his argument as conceding Banas's facts, but then Hagbom points to the parts of Banas's deposition and the Michigan Court of Appeals opinion that suggest Banas did resist while on the ground. So Hagbom ignores the fact that Banas says he did not resist while lying face down. Hagbom argues purely factual questions by saying that even viewing Banas's facts as Banas alleged, Banas still resisted. In so arguing, Hagbom seeks to convince us of his set of facts. He hasn't conceded Banas's allegations at all. Even so, we could ignore Hagbom's factual assertions that Banas resisted him and only decide the legal questions of qualified immunity that Hagbom presents. But Hagbom does not argue 'the legal issue of whether there was a violation of a clearly established constitutional right.'. . Hagbom cited the general propositions for qualified immunity and mentioned that Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), presents factors for assessing reasonable force. Yet rather than explain why he did not violate any of Banas's constitutional rights or why the violation of the right was not clearly established, Hagbom then only focuses his argument on why we should determine that Banas in fact resisted. Hagbom has only given us factual contentions. So we lack jurisdiction to hear his appeal.")

Adams v. Blount County, Tennessee, 946 F.3d 940, 948-51 (6th Cir. 2020) ("There are two narrow circumstances in which an interlocutory appeal record may contain some dispute of fact. First, we may overlook a factual disagreement if a defendant, despite disputing a plaintiff's version of the story, is 'willing to concede the most favorable view of the facts to the plaintiff for purposes of the appeal.'. . And second, in exceptional circumstances, we may decide an appeal challenging the district court's factual determination if that determination is 'blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it.'. .In determining the scope of our jurisdiction, we 'separate an appellant's reviewable challenges from its unreviewable.'. . We may still review 'pure question[s] of law, despite the defendants' failure to concede the plaintiff's version of the facts[.]'. . In doing so, we 'ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts and nonetheless resolve the legal issue, obviating the need to dismiss the entire appeal for lack of jurisdiction.'. . We therefore defer to the district court's determinations of fact. . . And beyond those determinations, 'a defendant may not challenge the inferences that the district court draws from those facts, as that too is a prohibited fact-based appeal.'. . As a result, we 'need look no further than the district court's opinion,' and 'we often may be able merely to adopt the district court's recitation of facts and inferences.'. . We find the district court's opinion is this case to be well-reasoned and supported by the record, and therefore only briefly address the various arguments raised by Burns. . . .When raising his legal argument, however, Burns fails to concede the most favorable view of the facts to Plaintiffs and instead relies solely on his version of the facts, as addressed above. In Phelps v. Coy, we explained that we have jurisdiction to disregard defendants' attempts to dispute plaintiffs' facts only in cases where 'the legal issues are discrete from the factual disputes.'. . Similarly, in Beard v. Whitmore Lake School District, we held that interlocutory jurisdiction over appeals from denials of qualified immunity involving disputed facts only exists where 'some minor factual issues are in dispute' and 'it does not appear that the resolution of [such] factual issues is needed to resolve the legal issue' also presented. . . In such circumstances, we must 'separate an appealed order's reviewable determination (that a given set of facts violates clearly established law) from its unreviewable determination (that an issue of fact is 'genuine').'. . If, however, disputed factual issues are 'crucial to' a defendant's interlocutory qualified immunity appeal, we may not simply ignore such disputes; we remain

'obliged to dismiss [the appeal] for lack of jurisdiction.'. . The facts Burns disputes are 'crucial to' his qualified immunity appeal. Burns continues to insist on appeal that he did not use deadly force, to define his 'slam' as an action in which he 'pushed' Edwards's body 'out' and 'down' while they both were falling, and to argue that Edwards had fled when he attempted to place him in the SUV. The district court found that these issues are genuinely disputed and material to determining whether Burns exercised excessive force. As explained above, there is enough record evidence demonstrating that these findings of fact and inferences are not blatantly and demonstrably false. Moreover, these factual disputes are neither 'minor[,]'. . . nor 'immaterial to the legal issues raised by the appeal[.]'. . Rather, they serve as the basis for Burns's legal argument that he did not use excessive force and that his actions were objectively reasonable. . . . Because genuine issues of material fact regarding Defendant Burns's qualified immunity claim exist, and because the arguments raised by Burns concerning the denial of qualified immunity rely on disputed facts, this court is without jurisdiction and the case must be dismissed.")

Bey v. Falk, 946 F.3d 304, 320-21 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Here, in addition to finding a lack of reasonable suspicion, the district court determined that 'McKinley's explanation for why he started following the minivan in the first place,' his failure to 'stop the minivan once they learned of the "no record" plates,' and McKinley's suggestion that he 'did not know the race of Plaintiff and his friends prior to the Canton Walmart' created a genuine issue of material fact with respect to McKinley's intent. These factual disputes, and the inferences that may be drawn therefrom, are beyond our jurisdiction on appeal. DiLuzio, 796 F.3d at 609. Indeed, we have held that the 'limitation on our appellate jurisdiction applies with particular force to evidence sufficiency questions related to a [person's] intent, such as whether a [person] acted with a discriminatory purpose.'. . As a result, we lack jurisdiction to consider McKinley's challenge to Bey's equal protection claim.")

Bey v. Falk, 946 F.3d 304, 327-29 (6th Cir. 2019) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("The majority concludes that all of the Defendants except for McKinley are entitled to qualified immunity, and even then, only begrudgingly finds that McKinley has to face trial thanks to a jurisdictional technicality. . . . As the majority correctly notes, this Court's role is even more limited on an interlocutory appeal from the denial of qualified immunity. Unlike in other summary judgment appeals—which come to this Court when a district judge grants summary judgment and thus ends a case in its entirety—we cannot consider whether the evidence is sufficient to present a genuine issue for trial. . . Similarly, 'a defendant may not challenge the inferences the district court draws from th[e] facts, as that ... is a prohibited fact-based appeal.'. .While the majority cites these principles in dismissing McKinley's appeal, it takes a complete about-face when it comes to Eisenbeis, McAteer, and Falk. The majority presents no legal authority showing the difference between McKinley's claim of qualified immunity and the claims of the other officers in this case, and instead focuses on the factual inferences that can be drawn from the record. And in doing so, the majority impermissibly views the facts in the light most favorable to the officers, characterizing their involvement as 'limited and based almost entirely on the direction of others' and concluding that this somehow negates any inference of discriminatory purpose. . . Looking instead at the facts in the light most favorable to Bey, a jury could easily find that McKinley initiated surveillance of Bey and his friends because of the color of their skin. A jury could also find that the SOU officers engaged in prolonged surveillance of Bey and his friends because of their race. And a jury could find that race-based assumptions of criminality clouded the lens through which the officers perceived the information they gained through their investigative surveillance, preventing them from appreciating the obvious truth crystallizing before them: that Bey and his friends were not criminals engaged in illicit activity, but rather law-abiding citizens simply shopping for space heaters on a cold winter evening.")

Batson v. Hoover, 788 F. App'x 1017, ____ (6th Cir. 2019) ("[W]hen, as here, the defendant only challenges the denial of qualified immunity on the basis that the plaintiff has not shown the defendant's individual involvement with the alleged constitutional violation, we limit our review to the particular issue of involvement and do not delve into an analysis of whether a violation of an established constitutional right occurred. . . Also, although Kennamer does not dispute that the use of force alleged by Batson was excessive, Kennamer maintains that he cannot be held liable under a failure-to-intervene theory because there is only speculation as to what occurred during the escort. Therefore, we consider first whether Batson has provided sufficient record evidence so that a reasonable jury could find that Kennamer was involved in the alleged constitutional violations that occurred when Batson was taken to solitary confinement, and second, whether Batson has provided sufficient evidence so that a jury could find that Kennamer could be liable for failing to intervene to prevent the unconstitutional conduct.")

Bullman v. City of Detroit, Michigan, 787 F. App'x 290, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("To the extent that Officer Bray challenges the district court's factual determination that the pit bulls were not acting aggressively at the time of the narcotics raid, his arguments are beyond the scope of our appellate jurisdiction. . . However, we do have appellate jurisdiction over the question of whether, taking the facts assumed by the district court as given, the pit bulls posed an imminent threat to the officers as a matter of law. . . Our appellate jurisdiction is not undermined by the relatedness of the two issues. Rather, '[w]hen legal and factual issues are confused or entwined, "we must separate an appealed order's reviewable determination ... from its unreviewable determination"' and issue a decision on the reviewable determination. . . Taking the facts assumed by the district court as given, Officer Bray's shootings of Blanca and Junior were not reasonable under the Fourth Amendment, and thus did not warrant qualified immunity. Shooting a dog is reasonable when, 'given all of the circumstances and viewed from the perspective of a reasonable officer at the scene, the [dogs] posed imminent threats to the officers.'. . . Although Brown was decided after the narcotics raid at Castro's home took place, the Brown panel determined that it was clearly established as of 2013 that 'unreasonably shooting [the] dogs [of the target of a narcotics raid] would constitute the "seizure" of an "effect" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.'. . .Officer Bray is not entitled to qualified immunity for the shooting of Blanca, the unlicensed pit bull, on the alternative theory that Blanca's unlicensed status made the shooting reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. Officer Bray argues that his killing of Blanca was reasonable because she was unlicensed and therefore 'contraband' under the Fourth Amendment. We rejected that same argument in Smith v. City of Detroit, Michigan, 751 F. App'x 691, 697 (6th Cir. 2018), but we need not reach it here because there is no evidence that Officer Bray had probable cause to believe Blanca was unlicensed at the time of the shooting.")

Coffey v. Carroll, 933 F.3d 577, 583-84 (6th Cir. 2019) ("[W]e must ask at the outset, is this appeal one of law, which we can hear now, or one of fact, which, save for a narrow band of cases, we cannot? At times, the officers' arguments take aim at the factual record. For example, they argue their conduct was justified because Coffey resisted arrest, a fact Coffey contests. As Coffey's version of the events is not blatantly contradicted by the record, these fact-based arguments are not appropriate for our interlocutory resolution. But other arguments present 'a series of strictly legal questions.'. . For instance, does Coffey's unlawful-entry claim fail because the officers entered Coffey's home while in hot pursuit? . . . Is the evidence supporting Coffey's excessive-force claim inadmissible because it is not based on personal knowledge? . . . And does Coffey's malicious-prosecution claim fail because he did not show that the officers influenced or participated in the decision to prosecute him? . . . We will, however, entertain the officers' arguments only to the extent they challenge the district court's legal determinations. We 'must ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts' as read by the district court.")

Campbell v. Mack, 777 F. App'x 122, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("We lack jurisdiction to resolve disputed factual issues in the context of this interlocutory appeal; this appeal is therefore subject to outright dismissal for lack of jurisdiction. We, nevertheless, will disentangle Mack's impermissible arguments involving disputed material facts from the purely legal issues to determine whether, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Campbell, the district court properly denied Mack qualified immunity on Campbell's constitutional claims. . . .When faced with an interlocutory appeal challenging the denial of qualified immunity, we may review 'the district court's legal determination that the defendant's actions violated a constitutional right or that the right was clearly established.' Flake, 814 F.3d at 812. We may also review 'a legal aspect of the district court's factual determinations, such as whether the district court properly assessed the incontrovertible record evidence,'. . . or whether the district court's factual findings are 'blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it[.]'. . But we may not review challenges to the plaintiff's account of 'what actually occurred or why an action was taken[,]' the district court's acceptance of the plaintiff's proffered facts, or the inferences drawn by the district court from the plaintiff's facts. . . Because these issues involve factual, not legal, disputes, we lack jurisdiction to consider them in the context of an interlocutory appeal. . . . When a defendant improperly argues disputed factual issues in the context of an interlocutory appeal, we may dismiss the appeal for lack of jurisdiction. . . However, rather than dismiss the appeal outright, we may alternatively 'discard the fact-based or "evidence sufficiency" portion of [the defendant's] arguments—that is, any challenge to the district court's view of the facts or its associated inferences—and exercise the jurisdiction we do have to reconsider the district court's legal determinations based on the plaintiffs' version of the facts and the inferences as articulated by the district court.'. . . In arguing that the district court improperly denied his motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, Mack relies on his preferred version of many of these facts, which the district court explicitly found were disputed. . . .Because Mack failed to accept Campbell's version of the facts, we could simply dismiss his appeal outright for lack of jurisdiction. . . However, because this case presents important legal questions notwithstanding Mack's improper factual arguments, we will proceed to decide the purely legal issue of whether, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Campbell, the district court properly denied Mack qualified immunity on Campbell's constitutional claims.")

Saunders v. Cuyahoga Metropolitan Housing Authority, No. 18-3119, 2019 WL 1777223, at *3-4, *6 (6th Cir. Apr. 23, 2019) (not reported) ("Saunders initially raises a jurisdictional challenge to Officer Ali's appeal. He points out that Officer Ali's brief recites at length facts that flatly contradict Saunders's version of events and argues that Officer Ali's appeal must be dismissed because he failed to concede the most favorable view of the facts for purposes of this appeal. 'Language in our earlier decisions interpreting Johnson [v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304 (1995)] suggests that where, as here, the appellant fails to concede the facts as alleged by the appellee, this court is completely deprived of jurisdiction over the appellant's interlocutory appeal.'. . However, our later cases rejected that approach. . .This court will ignore the defendant's failure to accept the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and resolve the legal issue. . . In any event, Officer Ali clarified in his Reply Brief 'that the Court can and should accept the Plaintiff's record-supported allegations as true to the extent that they are properly supported by competent evidence in the record,' but he is also requesting that we 'take into account certain admissions made by Saunders at his deposition and to consider other evidence in the record that was not disputed or contradicted by Plaintiff's deposition or affidavit' as well as the video evidence. . . This approach is supported by our caselaw. . . Accordingly, we have jurisdiction to consider the legal issue whether Officer Ali is entitled to qualified immunity, considering the disputed evidence in the light most favorable to Saunders as well as the video evidence and other undisputed evidence. . . .Because each of the three Graham factors weighs in favor of Saunders, Officer Ali's use of force was objectively unreasonable. . . . Consistent with our analysis above, a reasonable jury could also find that Officer Ali violated Saunders's clearly established right to be free from excessive force when he tased or pepper sprayed Saunders while Saunders was not resisting arrest. . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity.")

Clemons v. Couch, 768 F. App'x 432, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("Unlike the defendants in Plumhoff, Couch does not dispute the district court's finding that punching someone in response to an insult is a violation of clearly established law. . . Rather, he argues that the district court failed to appreciate that Napier said Couch 'may have' felt like he was in danger from Clemons. But that testimony merely acknowledges a dispute of fact: Did Couch feel like he was in danger or not? Because Couch argues that the district court did not properly consider the facts and does not raise any questions of law, we do not have jurisdiction over the appeal from the denial of qualified immunity for the claim of excessive force.") contrast, for example, to our jurisdiction in a qualified-immunity appeal involving Fourth Amendment excessive force. In those cases, we can review whether a certain set of facts amounts to excessive force as a matter of law. . . But here we cannot review whether Liogghio's facts amount to unconstitutional retaliation—because our precedents say that the two contested elements of this type of claim—adverse action and causation—are questions of fact. . . That leaves the question whether the putative violation of Liogghio's First Amendment rights would have been clear to a reasonable official in Whittaker's factual position. Courts have long recognized that a public employer may not retaliate against an employee for her political activity. . . Thus, under the district court's determination of the facts, a reasonable officer in Whittaker's position would have known that he was violating Liogghio's constitutional rights. Hence we must affirm the denial of qualified immunity.") Kalvitz v. City of Cleveland, 763 F. App'x 490, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("There is no question that the officers improperly challenge Kalvitz's factual allegations in their appeal. But our limited jurisdiction does not require dismissing every appeal that raises such factual disputes. When possible, we must 'separate an appellant's reviewable challenges from its unreviewable.'. Often, the legal and factual issues in an appeal are 'confused or entwined.'. . And in those cases, 'we can "ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts and nonetheless resolve the legal issue, obviating the need to dismiss the entire appeal for lack of jurisdiction."'. . That is possible here, where the officers argue that, 'taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the District Court erred in denying the individual Defendants qualified immunity.'. . We can answer that legal question while ignoring the officers' attempts at obfuscating the factual record below. . . Turning to the merits, the officers seek refuge under qualified immunity—but only if we first deny their argument that they acted as private citizens during the altercation. That seems to have it backwards in a case where our jurisdiction only exists because of the qualified-immunity claim. So we begin with that issue. . . Qualified immunity shields public officials from suit under § 1983 unless their conduct violated clearly established constitutional rights. . . To overcome it, a plaintiff must demonstrate two things. First, that the official violated his constitutional rights. And second, that the violation was 'clearly established at the time.'. . The effect of this two-pronged approach is that qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. .No person could reasonably debate whether the officers violated Kalvitz's clearly established constitutional rights if his version of the facts turns out true. The Fourth Amendment allows officers to use 'reasonable' force when seizing an individual. . . Figuring out whether the force crossed the constitutional line requires an objective analysis 'in light of the facts and circumstances confronting' the officer. . . Only objectively unreasonable force violates the Fourth Amendment. To that end, officers cannot use heightened levels of force against an individual who is not resisting and poses no threat. . . That kind of 'gratuitous force' lasting 'beyond the point at which any threat could have been reasonably perceived' violates the Fourth Amendment. . . And once someone has been restrained with handcuffs, the need for force is near 'nonexistent.'. . Kalvitz says he was lying on the ground, not fighting back, when Kinas and Randolph 'beat, struck, and kicked' him. And then after they handcuffed Kalvitz, all three officers threw him against a concrete wall and onto the ground. It remains to be seen whether a jury believes his account of the events. But assuming the allegations are true, which we must, no one could dispute that the all three officers violated his constitutional rights. . . . The officers also argue that the district court should be reversed because they were off duty that night, not acting as public officials. To prevail on his § 1983 claim, Kalvitz must prove that the officers were acting under color of state law. . . As private citizens, they say, they cannot be liable under § 1983. This issue is unrelated to qualified immunity, so Kalvitz argues that we lack jurisdiction to address it. But we have previously held that, so long as the court has jurisdiction over the qualified-immunity appeal, our pendant jurisdiction extends to issues related to the plaintiff's 'prima facie § 1983 claim.'. . Because we have jurisdiction over the qualified-immunity issue, we can also review whether the officers were acting under color of state law—an element of the § 1983 claim. . . That being said, the officers' argument lacks merit. As the district court correctly explained, whether an official's conduct amounts to state action under § 1983 boils down to whether it is 'fairly attributable' to the state. . . . The critical question is 'whether the actor intends to act in an official capacity or to exercise official responsibilities pursuant to state law.'. . And to answer that question, courts look at multiple factors, including how the officer was dressed, whether he was on duty, whether he displayed his badge, whether he announced himself as an officer, and whether he arrested or attempted to arrest anyone. . .Plenty of factual disputes stand in the way of summary judgment for the officers. Kalvitz alleges that Kinas and Randolph announced themselves as officers, took over the situation, handcuffed him, and placed him under arrest. Follmer joined in at some point and helped transport the handcuffed Kalvitz outside. Kalvitz also claims that all three defendants wore holsters and Follmer and Kinas wore their badges. These facts tend to establish that they responded in their official capacity, not as private citizens. . . Outside of a few conclusory allegations, the officers provide no reason to conclude otherwise. The gist of their argument seems to be that they were not at the Lounge on official business and never 'completed a formal arrest of Kalvitz.'. . Yet even the cases the officers cite hold that such formalities do not control the analysis. . . If the officers wore their badges, announced themselves as police, and used their handcuffs to restrain and transport Kalvitz, that satisfies the state-action requirement under § 1983. Of course, whether those facts turn out to be true is for the jury to sort out. . . For now, we can simply affirm the district court's decision and send this question back down for trial. . . . We certainly are troubled by the decision-making of appellants' counsel in this case. The officers made only a minimal effort in their brief to discuss the real issue for appeal, which is whether they violated Kalvitz's clearly established rights by beating, kicking, and striking him on the ground and then throwing him into a wall after being handcuffed. And when pressed at oral argument, counsel retreated and suggested that their position on that issue—the entire basis for filing an interlocutory appeal—might be wrong. Yet not all poor advocacy should be sanctioned. Counsel for the officers made missteps, but this case stands in contrast with the kind of frivolous appeals we have sanctioned before. Kalvitz points to McDonald as an example of a sanctionable qualified-immunity appeal. But McDonald differs from this case in a significant way. There, the defendant filed an interlocutory appeal based only on 'his own version of the facts and the inferences that he would draw from them.'. . We sanctioned the defendants because they 'argued the facts and evidence, in complete disregard of the law ... thus ensuring that they had no chance of success.'. . We cannot say the officers here went that far. They did argue, for example, that 'any force alleged by Kalvitz was reasonably necessary'—a clear attempt, however misguided, at making the appropriate qualified-immunity argument. . . . And not to be overlooked, that is precisely the argument we instructed the officers to make when we denied Kalvitz's motion to dismiss. Although they improperly introduced some factual disputes into their brief, they did not—like the defendants in McDonald—advance an entirely different version of the facts. That means something, particularly in an appeal where we already rejected a motion to dismiss. So we deny the request for sanctions.")

Jacobs v. Alam, 915 F.3d 1028, 1040-41 (6th Cir. 2019) (" '[W]hether the use of deadly force at a particular moment is reasonable depends primarily on objective assessment of the danger a suspect poses at that moment. The assessment must be made from the perspective of a reasonable officer in the defendant's position.'. . But just because we must look at the circumstances through the eyes of a reasonable officer does not mean, as defendants suggest, that we must accept the officers' subjective view of the facts when making this assessment. Given the interlocutory nature of this appeal, rather, we must conduct the reasonable officer analysis using the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiff. . .This overlay largely strips us of jurisdiction to consider Kimbrough's and Alam's appeals. Jacobs unequivocally denied taking actions consistent with presenting a reasonable officer with a threat of serious physical harm to himself or others—he went up the stairs shouting 'who the f- - - went into my house,' opened the dining room door, saw Kimbrough, and simultaneously spun to retreat, began to reach for his holstered gun, and was shot. At no time did Jacobs hold the gun, rack' the gun, point the gun, or fire the gun. Our caselaw is replete with instances in which we have denied officers qualified immunity when the facts suggest—at least taking them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff—that the suspect did not pose a serious threat to the officer.")

Bunkley v. City of Detroit, Michigan, 902 F.3d 552, 559-61 (6th Cir. 2018) ("[O]n an interlocutory appeal from the denial of qualified immunity, we may decide a challenge to the district court's legal determination that the defendant's actions violated a constitutional right or that the right was clearly established. . . We may also decide a challenge to a legal aspect of the court's factual determinations, such as whether the court properly assessed the incontrovertible record evidence. . . And we may decide, as a legal question, a challenge to the court's factual determination insofar as the challenge contests that determination as 'blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it.'. . We may not, however, decide a challenge to the district court's determination of ' "evidence sufficiency," i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. . . Therefore, putting these 'mays' and 'may nots' together into a single jurisdictional rule: we may not decide a challenge aimed solely at the district court's determination of the record-supported evidence, but we may decide a challenge with any legal aspect to it, no matter that it might encroach on the district court's fact-based determinations. . .It is true that, following Johnson, we readily cited the district court's finding of contested facts to dismiss such interlocutory appeals for lack of jurisdiction. But after Plumhoff, we adopted a different approach in which we instead excise the prohibited fact-based challenge so as to establish jurisdiction. . . Under this approach, when legal and factual challenges are confused or entwined, 'we must separate an appealed order's reviewable determination (that a given set of facts violates clearly established law) from its unreviewable determination (that an issue of fact is 'genuine')." . . We likewise separate an appellant's reviewable challenges from its unreviewable. . . That is, we must 'ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts and nonetheless resolve the legal issue, obviating the need to dismiss the entire appeal for lack of jurisdiction.' . . By ignoring the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts, we follow the same path as did the district court—considering the sufficiency of the plaintiff's proffered evidence, drawing all reasonable inferences in the plaintiff's favor—and, ideally, we would need look no further than the district court's opinion for the pertinent facts and inferences. DiLuzio, 796 F.3d at 611. Sometimes, we can simply adopt the district court's recitation of facts and inferences. See Johnson, 515 U.S. at 319, 115 S.Ct. 2151. Of course, in briefing or arguing for reversal on legal grounds, the defendant-appellant may—indeed, for some arguments, must—point to some other of the plaintiff's proffered evidence, or some incontrovertible record evidence, to support that argument. . . Alternatively, or correspondingly, the plaintiff-appellee may point to additional record evidence in support of its position, or to bolster the district court's determination. Thus, while we need not engage in a plenary review of the record, neither are we limited to only the facts, evidence, or inferences that the district court has stated expressly. . . Rather, we must make the legal determination of whether the defendant violated a clearly established right, based on those now (for this purpose) undisputed record facts, i.e., once we have determined the relevant set of facts and drawn all inferences in favor of the nonmoving party to the extent supportable by the record.' . . Moreover, our respect for the district court's factual determinations is such that, if the district court has cited no facts or evidence (e.g., has 'simply den[ied the] summary judgment motion[ ] without indicating [its] reasons for doing so'), we 'may have to undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court ... likely assumed.' . . . It bears mention, however, that, in determining the relevant set of facts for the purpose of deciding an interlocutory appeal, we do not ourselves make any findings of fact or inferences for purposes of any subsequent proceedings.") Stillwagon v. City of Delaware, Ohio, 747 F. App'x 361, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("We note that, on appeal, defendants at times argue for different facts than those contemplated by the district court. Defendants now frame the underlying issue as whether Stillwagon hit Mattingly in the head. But Stillwagon was prosecuted for shooting Mattingly in the head and his § 1983 claims arose from defendants' affirmative efforts to create a false narrative of events by fabricating evidence, filing false reports, and making misleading omissions in an effort to 'prove' that Stillwagon shot Mattingly in the head, even though no such shooting occurred. We decline to address this factual discrepancy, as an interlocutory appeal of a denial of qualified immunity based on evidentiary disputes is not permitted. . . The appealable issue is, whether the facts as asserted by Stillwagon (i.e., malicious prosecution for shooting Mattingly in the head) violated clearly established law. Our holding addresses this legal issue, not any factual dispute raised for the first time by defendants on appeal. . . . Based on what a reasonable officer could have known as set forth above, we affirm the district court's holding that, when viewing the evidence most favorably toward Stillwagon, a jury could reasonably conclude that officers lacked probable cause to arrest Stillwagon for felonious assault and that the evidence produced by Stillwagon, viewed in the light most favorable to him, shows that he was falsely arrested.")

Hansen v. Aper, 746 F. App'x 511, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("Hansen argues that this court does not have jurisdiction over Aper's appeal because the district court denied summary judgment based on its conclusion that genuine issues of material fact existed. In contrast, Aper argues that this case does raise a 'pure issue of law'—whether the facts Hansen plead are sufficient to deny Aper qualified immunity. Aper claims that the current state of the law is 'ambiguous' and insufficient to put a law enforcement officer in Aper's position on notice that his actions were unlawful. He further argues that we should reevaluate the legal standard we apply to § 1983 handcuffing cases and require that Hansen produce more evidence to prove that he suffered an injury caused by the handcuffs. Insofar as Aper claims that the law did not put him on notice that his actions were illegal, we have jurisdiction over this appeal because whether law is 'clearly established' is a legal issue. . . But our jurisdiction does not extend to Aper's other argument, which is that Hansen failed to produce sufficient evidence proving an injury causally related to the handcuffing. . . . Therefore, we dismiss for lack of jurisdiction Aper's claim that Hansen did not produce sufficient evidence of injury.")

Barry v. O'Grady, 895 F.3d 440, 443-44 (6th Cir. 2018) ("We have . . . recognized two narrow exceptions to the rule prohibiting fact-based interlocutory appeals. First, '[i]n exceptional circumstances, an appellate court may overrule a district court's determination that a factual dispute exists where evidence in the record establishes that the determination is "blatantly and demonstrably false."'. . And second, we may overlook a factual disagreement if the defendant, despite disputing the plaintiff's version of the story, is 'willing to concede the most favorable view of the facts to the plaintiff for purposes of the appeal.'. . Put another way, if the issues on appeal are 'purely legal' and if 'this court can ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts and nonetheless resolve the legal issue,' 'then there is an issue over which this court has jurisdiction.'. . But to the extent that the defendant's argument 'rel[ies] on [his] own disputed version of the facts,' we have no jurisdiction to hear the appeal. . . The upshot is that, in most appeals of denials of qualified immunity, we must defer to the district court's determinations of fact. Beyond determinations of fact, '[w]e have also held that a defendant may not challenge the inferences that the district court draws from those facts, as that too is a prohibited fact-based appeal.' DiLuzio v. Vill. of Yorkville, 796 F.3d 604, 609 (6th Cir. 2015). Indeed, 'ideally we need look no further than the district court's opinion,' and 'we often may be able merely to adopt the district court's recitation of facts and inferences,'. . . as we have done here. That well-settled standard is dispositive in this case. Given that the district court's decision turned on its determination that disputed issues of material fact remain, we may exercise jurisdiction only if O'Grady can satisfy one of the two narrow exceptions to Johnson. As an initial matter, O'Grady does not attempt to argue that any of the district court's factual conclusions were 'blatantly and demonstrably false.'. . To be sure, O'Grady's argument on appeal is based almost exclusively on disagreements with the district court's factual determinations and inferences. After all, his brief starts with a 24–page recitation of the facts, in which he uses facts in the record—as well as facts not in the record—to draw inferences in his favor. But he does not explain why any of the district court's conclusions were blatantly and demonstrably false; he merely disagrees with them. That is insufficient to give us jurisdiction. . . . [W]e would have jurisdiction if O'Grady argued that he wins even when we view the facts—as we must—in a light favorable to Barry. He does not. Instead, O'Grady applies his own factual conclusions and inferences to both of Barry's surviving claims. Throughout his argument on the First Amendment claim, O'Grady outlines the correct legal standard but then simply draws his own favorable inferences or ignores the district court's inferences in favor of Barry.")

Barry v. O'Grady, 895 F.3d 440, 445-49 (6th Cir. 2018) (Sutton, J., dissenting) ("Teresa Barry has given us plenty of good reasons to deny qualified immunity to Judge James O'Grady on the ground that a material dispute of fact clouds what happened in this case and precludes summary judgment. Rather than accept those reasons and rather than provide useful law-of-the-case precedent for the upcoming trial and any appeal from that trial, the court dismisses the appeal on the ground that we lack subject matter jurisdiction to review the fact inferences drawn by the district court under Johnson v. Jones. . . . This approach gives Johnson v. Jones a bad name, cannot be reconciled with Supreme Court precedent, and makes little sense. If appellate courts have no jurisdiction to review the inferences drawn by a district court judge in resolving a claim of qualified immunity at summary judgment, how are they supposed to apply de novo review to the district court's decision, as Supreme Court decisions since Johnson do? See, e.g., Plumhoff v. Rickard, —— U.S. ——, 134 S.Ct. 2012, 188 L.Ed.2d 1056 (2014); Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 127 S.Ct. 1769, 167 L.Ed.2d 686 (2007). I respectfully dissent. . . . Johnson establishes an important principle—but a limited principle. An officer may not appeal the denial of a qualified immunity ruling solely on the ground that the plaintiff's record-supported facts are wrong. In the rare case in which that is all the officer does—saying in effect only that the plaintiff is lying—an appellate court should dismiss the appeal for lack of jurisdiction. Otherwise, we have jurisdiction to decide—on de novo review—whether, after reading the factual record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the officer should win as a matter of law on the first or second prong of qualified immunity. That's all there is to it. Each of our too-many-to-count additional glosses on Johnson is needlessly complicated, inconsistent with later Supreme Court cases, contradicts our duty to apply fresh review to a district court's summary judgment decision, and ultimately is hurtful to the party it is designed to help: the plaintiff. The key gloss used today (and not for the first time) is to transform Johnson into a rule about what the district court did, as opposed to what the defendant officer did. No longer is the subject-matter-jurisdiction question about what the officer does, namely raise a legal question about whether the plaintiff's record evidence creates a material issue of fact for trial. It is a subject-matter-jurisdiction question about what the district court did, namely drew 'inferences' that have become a forbidden source of appeal because in our circuit 'that too is a prohibited fact-based appeal.' DiLuzio v. Vill. of Yorkville, 796 F.3d 604, 609 (6th Cir. 2015). Consider the defendant official's appellate stance today to see how far we have come in transforming Johnson. The defendant recounts Barry's story about the raunchy November conversation. . . He notes that Barry thought he grew 'hostile' to her after the female attorney came to speak to him and describes the evidence to which she points to support that allegation. . . And he recounts the harsh language and inappropriate comments that Barry alleges he made. . . I have little doubt that the defendant will challenge the veracity of those allegations at trial, as he is entitled to do. But at this stage, he has accepted the statements and done what every appellant has been allowed to do since the creation of Civil Rule 56: raise a legal challenge about whether, even accepting those facts and the inferences from those facts, he should win as a matter of law. Even on Barry's version of the facts, the defendant thinks his conduct was not severe enough to create a hostile work environment that violated her clearly established rights. . . That is a legal question—two legal questions really. And the defendant is permitted to take an interlocutory appeal to argue that the evidence, even when viewed in Barry's favor, could not prove that he retaliated against her in violation of her clearly established rights under the First Amendment. . . Yet the court refuses to decide whether the district court drew the proper inferences when it denied Barry qualified immunity. . . Instead, it dismisses the appeal for lack of jurisdiction. . . It escapes me how this approach can be consistent with the responsibilities assigned to us in reviewing a summary judgment decision. Namely: Are the facts, when read in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, 'sufficient as a matter of law to state a triable question under each legal element essential to liability[?]' Walton v. Powell, 821 F.3d 1204, 1209 (10th Cir. 2016) (Gorsuch, J.) (rejecting the broad view of Johnson adopted by several of our cases). Answering that law-bound question is 'a core responsibility of appellate courts.'. . .Instead of following the examples of Scott and Plumhoff, some panels of our court have buried the two cases in exceptions. One exception: Johnson does not apply to cases where all genuinely disputed facts are caught on video. See, e.g., Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 639 (6th Cir. 2015). But that wasn't so in Plumhoff, and at any rate this innovation has no support in the Civil Rules or case law. The other exception: Johnson does not apply if the record evidence, whether videotaped or not, 'blatantly contradict[s]' the inferences that the district court drew. . . But just because the Court identified a district court's obvious error in evaluating the evidence as a sufficient condition for jurisdiction doesn't mean it's a necessary one. A rule that applies based on the medium of evidence or based on whether the district court's inferences are really wrong, not just conventionally wrong, is not a rule—and as standards go it is a terribly confusing way to decide something as essential as the subject matter jurisdiction of the court. Indeed, because this approach implicates a matter of subject matter jurisdiction, we may never look the other way. The arguments may not be forfeited or waived, requiring us to initiate this ineffable task in every summary judgment appeal involving qualified immunity—whether the lawyers press it or not. If any doubt remains about the oddity of our approach to Johnson, the Supreme Court's approach to interlocutory appeals at the motion-to-dismiss stage should dispel it. At that stage, we accept the complaint's allegations as true and review whether the district court's pro-plaintiff inferences are 'plausible.'. . That is analogous to what we should do at the summary judgment stage. How strange to say that we have subject matter jurisdiction to overturn the inferences that the district court drew when reviewing one type of interlocutory appeal (motion to dismiss) but that we lack jurisdiction to overturn those same inferences when reviewing another type of interlocutory appeal (summary judgment). We stand alone in pushing Johnson so aggressively. Most circuits, true enough, have some decisions wrestling with the reach of Johnson. And most of them have some opinions going both ways. See Romo v. Largen, 723 F.3d 670, 686 (6th Cir. 2013) (Sutton, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (listing cases). But none seem to invoke Johnson as often as we do. A database search reveals that our published and unpublished opinions have cited Johnson seventy-one times since the Court decided Plumhoff in 2014, when one might have thought the Supreme Court rejected the full-flowering form of Johnson. The Tenth Circuit comes in a distant second with twenty-nine citations. The First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, Eleventh, and D.C. Circuits have cited the case between zero and seventeen times. The long and the short of it is that we are spending a lot of time doing something that no one else seems to be doing. Making matters worse, our broad reading invites a host of inefficiencies and complications. How exactly does an appellate court decide what the district court inferred? Should we defer only to the inferences that the district court explicitly drew? See Lewis v. Tripp, 604 F.3d 1221, 1226 (10th Cir. 2010). I doubt it. District courts are busy and will not parse out every inference they make in every denial of summary judgment. Subject matter jurisdiction should not turn on whether a district court happened to say 'I infer' on one day but not another. Should we instead scrutinize the record to figure out what inferences we think the district court drew or it implied? I doubt that as well. It weds the already difficult task of record review with the guess work implicit in any attempt to divine what the district court was thinking when it denied summary judgment. Keep in mind that these innovations replace something we know how to do and have been doing for years: determine whether the defendant officer, after reading all reasonable inferences in the record in favor of the plaintiff, should win as a matter of law or whether a material triable issue of fact requires a jury trial. I know how to do one of these tasks but have little idea how to do the other. Oddly enough, all of this can be evaded by the clever attorney who makes sure to raise a prong-two qualified immunity argument—which to date remains a legal question subject to interlocutory review. Then he or she can use pendent jurisdiction over the rest of the appeal, as the two are invariably 'inextricably intertwined.'. .Last but not least, our approach to Johnson hurts the parties it means to help. Just ask Teresa Barry. Had we reached the merits of her claim, we might have affirmed the district court's denial of qualified immunity on the ground that a material fact dispute remained. That might have given Barry and the trial judge clear direction as to what was at stake and what law should control the jury trial at prongs one and two of the qualified immunity inquiry. And in a future appeal, the law of the case would establish the contours of what the jury could permissibly decide. Instead, Barry returns to the district court empty-handed. In the final analysis, our gloss on Johnson fails to respect Supreme Court precedent, ignores the de novo standard of review applicable in reviewing summary judgment decisions, can be sidestepped at ease, and hurts the people it is designed to help. The court seeing things differently, I respectfully dissent.") Wheatt v. City of East Cleveland, 741 F. App'x 302, 304–05 (6th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 457 (2018) ("The plaintiffs argue that because the underlying judgments are neither final orders nor appealable collateral orders, inasmuch as the City Defendants did not assert qualified immunity in the district court, we have no jurisdiction. The City Defendants reply that they 'are appealing the district court's finding that they had waived the affirmative defense of qualified immunity.'. . The district court, noting that it 'does not lightly find waiver in this instance,' explained that 'in fully briefing their motion to dismiss, their summary judgment motion, and their opposition to [the] [p]laintiffs' motion for summary judgment, the City Defendants did not mention immunity.'. . As a factual finding, this is uncontested—the City Defendants do not claim that they raised qualified immunity in any of these motions, nor could they. They instead rely on their answer to the complaint, in which they included the affirmative defense of immunity 'under all doctrines,' and contend that that alone is sufficient to inject qualified immunity into the district court's opinion and judgment, and preserve it for interlocutory appeal here. That is an unusual proposition, to say the least. We recognize that the district court used the word 'waiver,' whereas this is more appropriately a 'forfeiture' analysis. . . Therefore, we analyze this as forfeiture. In arguing for summary judgment in the district court, the City Defendants did not assert qualified immunity expressly or even implicitly. Consequently, they never challenged the plaintiffs to respond to a qualified-immunity claim; they did not compel the district court to decide the merits of a qualified-immunity dispute; and they did not preserve any substantive qualified-immunity question or error for appeal. That is forfeiture. The City Defendants point out that pursuant to Henricks v. Pickaway Correctional Institution, 782 F.3d 744, 749 (6th Cir. 2015), we have held that appellate panels have jurisdiction to hear interlocutory appeals on the question of whether a defendant forfeited qualified immunity. . . True enough. But here the defendants have so clearly and unmistakably forfeited any claim to qualified immunity that there is nothing further to decide and this appeal is frivolous, as the district court has already held. . . Consequently, we must DENY the plaintiffs' motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction and AFFIRM the judgment of the district court because it was correct.") Mathis & Sons, Inc. v. Commonwealth of Kentucky Transportation Cabinet, 738 F. App'x 866, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("The defendants' fourth claim is that 'there [wa]s no "clearly established" law so as to put a reasonable public official on notice that the conduct in question here would be constitutionally violative.' . . Basically, the defendants' argument is that they were duty bound to pursue their legitimate concerns that Mathis & Sons was not actually eligible for DBE [Disadvantaged Business Enterprise] status and they had no way of knowing that doing so would violate the Constitution. On the one hand, this is an improper fact-based challenge to the district court's finding that Mathis & Sons produced sufficient evidence that a jury could find that the 'concerns' were a fabricated and implausible rationalization for racial discrimination. On interlocutory appeal from the denial of qualified immunity, as here, we lack jurisdiction to 'decide an appeal challenging the district court's determination of "evidence sufficiency."' DiLuzio v. Vill. of Yorkville, 796 F.3d 604, 609 (6th Cir. 2015) (quoting Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304, 313 (1995)).On the other hand, this is a purely legal challenge—over which we have jurisdiction, see id. at 608-11—in which the defendants are claiming that the law did not clearly proscribe their specific conduct. We may review this based on Mathis & Son's proffered evidence and the inferences the district court drew from that evidence, see id. at 609 (explaining that 'a defendant may not challenge the inferences the district court draws from those facts, as that too is a prohibited fact-based appeal'), namely, that the alleged 'concerns' were actually a fabrication used as cover for the violation of Mathis & Sons' rights, concocted by these defendants, who 'were motivated by discriminatory intent or purpose,' Mathis & Sons, 2017 WL 3045125 at *10. The defendants argue that, even so, Mathis & Sons has failed to identify any precedent directly on point to demonstrate that this conduct was contrary to 'clearly established law,' as is required under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . .The question here. . . is whether the established law forbidding racial discrimination would 'apply with obvious clarity' to the defendants' acts, if "motivated by discriminatory intent or purpose" and intended to harm Mathis & Sons' business. That is, would a KYTC employee of ordinary common sense know, without need for specific instruction from a federal court, that fabricating alleged concerns and falsifying Reed Hampton's recommendation, due to racial animus, would violate Mathis & Son's rights? We are confident that he or she would know.")

Williams v. Godby, 732 F. App'x 418, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("We have also explained that the defendant-appellant may not challenge the inferences the district court draws from those facts, as that too is a prohibited fact-based appeal. See Romo v. Largen, 723 F.3d 670, 674–75 (6th Cir. 2013). . . . [B]ecause we defer to the district court's factual assessments, ideally we need look no further than the district court's opinion for the facts and inferences cited expressly therein. . . That is, we can often merely adopt the district court's recitation of facts and inferences. . . And we find it appropriate to do so here, given Officer Godby's arguments and Williams's counterarguments. Thus, in deciding this appeal, we adopt the district court's articulated facts and inferences. It bears mention, however, that, in adopting or accepting the district court's factual determinations for the purpose of deciding this interlocutory appeal, we are not ourselves making any findings of fact or inferences for purposes of any subsequent proceedings.")

Pelton v. Perdue, 731 F. App'x 419, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("Often appellants in this context intertwine appropriate legal challenges with inappropriate factual challenges. When that happens, we can 'ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute facts and nonetheless resolve the legal issue.' Estate of Carter v. City of Detroit, 408 F.3d 305, 310 (6th Cir. 2005). As a practical matter, this means that we defer to the district court's findings of fact and ideally need not look further than the district court's opinion for the facts adopted by the court. Of course the defendant-appellant is also permitted to point elsewhere in the record to evidence presented by the plaintiff or some incontrovertible record evidence. DiLuzio, 796 F.3d at 611 (citing Scott, 550 U.S. at 380, 127 S.Ct. 1769). The plaintiff-appellee is likewise entitled to point to additional record evidence in support of the district court's denial of summary judgment. . . The lodestar of this inquiry is this: 'we must make the legal determination of whether the defendant violated a clearly established right, based on ... "the relevant set of facts and draw[ing] all inferences in favor of the nonmoving party to the extent supportable by the record.'. . . Where the district court does not make clear which facts were relied upon, we 'may have to undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court ... likely assumed.'. . .[T]he officers' arguments from the record ask this court to adopt their interpretation of the record evidence, which is exactly the kind of fact-based argument that is precluded by our jurisprudence on this kind of appeal. . . Therefore, because the officers do not otherwise claim that the district court improperly assessed uncontroverted record evidence or made a factual determination blatantly contradicted by the record, . . . we review their claims in light of the record as presented in the Joint Statement of Facts, drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Pelton.")

Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 756-58 (6th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 567 (2018) ("The district court inferred from this evidence that each of the officers may have been aware of the contextual facts indicating Richardson's need for medical treatment because he was struggling to breathe while in a prone position. And 'a defendant may not challenge the inferences the district court draws from th[e] facts, as that ... is a prohibited fact-based appeal.' DiLuzio v. Vill. of Yorkville, 796 F.3d 604, 609 (6th Cir. 2015). Because the district court's finding of a genuine issue of material fact as to defendants' 'knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm' is premised on Richardson's continuous complaints about his inability to breathe, its qualified immunity inquiry was sufficiently individualized, even if it referred to 'those on the scene' and the 'individual' defendants rather than list each officer by name. . . Defendants' argument provides no basis for relief. . . . We are precluded from deciding an interlocutory appeal premised on a challenge either to the inferences a district court draws from its record-supported factual determinations or to ' "evidence sufficiency," i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. . Defendants do not accept the district court's conclusion that there was sufficient evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact. For example, defendants contend the district court failed to 'factor into [its] analysis that medical staff was on the scene throughout' and 'the undisputed evidence is that corrections officers were holding Richardson so the medical personnel could assess and treat him.' Yet the district court pointed to specific facts about the medical staff response, and underscored that defendants may have refused a medic's and a nurse's request to reposition Richardson to allow for a proper medical assessment. Defendants also do not accept the district court's finding that the plaintiff presented evidence that 'Richardson continually told those on the scene that he could not breathe.' Instead, they inappropriately argue that the evidence is insufficient to support that conclusion because not every officer testified to hearing Richardson's complaints or to being present when the complaints were made. We have noted that 'the deliberate indifference threshold is higher for correctional officers where ... an inmate is receiving medical treatment[.]'. . But our reasoning is premised on non-medical prison officials reasonably relying on or deferring to medical staff expertise, and it is sharply disputed whether and to what extent defendants did so here. . . .'When the legal arguments advanced rely entirely on a defendant's own disputed version of the facts, the appeal boils down to issues of fact and credibility determinations that we cannot make.'. . Because defendants' medical-personnel argument turns on such determinations, we cannot consider it on interlocutory appeal.")

Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 760 (6th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 567 (2018) ("[D]efendant Sheriff Plummer appeals from the district court's denial of summary judgment on plaintiff's § 1983 claims brought against him in his official capacity. . . That is not an independently appealable 'final decision' under 28 U.S.C. § 1291. . . Accordingly, we may exercise our pendent appellate jurisdiction over Sheriff Plummer's appeal only if his motion for summary judgment is 'inextricably intertwined with the qualified immunity analysis properly before the Court.'. . In other words, only 'when the appellate resolution of the collateral appeal necessarily resolves the pendent claim as well.'. .That is not the case here. The officers' appeal of the qualified immunity issues is not 'inextricably intertwined' with Sheriff Plummer's appeal because their 'liability turns on whether the force they used to restrain [Richardson] violated his clearly established constitutional rights,' while municipal liability turns on separate questions of the jail's training and supervision obligations and practices as well as its policies and customs. . . Because pendent jurisdiction is inapplicable, we cannot consider Sheriff Plummer's interlocutory appeal.")

Sanders v. Jones, 728 F. App'x 563, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("Taking Sanders's facts 'at their best,'. . . Jones's statement permits an inference that Jones knew or strongly suspected from viewing the video that the person who sold the confidential informant the drugs was not Sanders, or at least, did not look like Sanders. Because Jones contests this critical factual issue, there is no legal question for us to review at this juncture. Indeed, the district court found that 'Jones himself acknowledged upon a closer inspection of the footage that it was not Sanders who participated in the drug deal. Thus, the question becomes whether Defendant "acted with something akin to deliberate indifference in failing to ascertain that [the plaintiff] ... was not the person wanted."'. . The district court thus found that Jones's deposition testimony regarding the screenshot of the video raised a 'genuine' issue as to whether Jones recklessly misidentified Sanders as the person who sold drugs to the confidential informant. . . In other words, a summary judgment order that determines 'only a question of "evidence sufficiency," i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial' is not appealable. . . It does not appear that the district court's determination was 'blatantly and demonstrably false' such that we could ignore it and retain jurisdiction, because neither the screenshot nor the video are in the record. . . The district court will have to factor this problem of missing evidence into its calculus when resolving this case on remand.")

Enoch v. Hogan, 728 F. App'x 448, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("Because 'there cannot be any disputed questions of fact' in our review of this Rule 12(c) motion and, at this stage, 'our review solely involves applying principles of law to a given and assumed set of facts,' this case falls outside the parameters of Johnson, and we may properly exercise jurisdiction. Barnes v. Winchell, 105 F.3d 1111, 1114 (6th Cir. 1997). We therefore turn to the substance of Defendants' qualified immunity arguments.")

Barton v. City of Lincoln Park, 726 F.3d 361, 367-68 (6th Cir. 2018) ("A pendent appellate claim is 'inextricably intertwined' with a properly reviewable claim on collateral appeal 'only if ... appellate resolution of the collateral appeal necessarily resolves the pendent claim as well.'. . Though the exercise of pendent jurisdiction is a matter of discretion, 'the "inextricably intertwined" requirement is not meant to be loosely applied .... Rather [it] is satisfied only if the resolution of the properly appealable issue "necessarily and unavoidably" decides the non-appealable issue.'. . While the district court's mention of the Monell claims in addressing Officer Behrik's qualified-immunity defense is curious, it does not inextricably intertwine the two issues. Although we agree that Officer Behrik is entitled to qualified immunity, that determination turns solely on Officer Behrik's duty to intervene on any alleged force, rather than any training or policy. The City's liability hinges on its failure to train and supervise the officers. This court has previously recognized that an officer's appealable claim and a city's non-appealable claim are inextricably intertwined where 'the finding of nonexistence of a constitutional claim for immunity purposes necessarily decides[s] the whole case not only in favor of the officer, but also in favor of the city ....'. . . Thus, Officer Behrik's challenge to the denial of qualified immunity is not 'inextricably intertwined' with the district court's summary-judgment ruling on the City's Monell liability. Moreover, the claims against the remaining officers were not before the district court. Those claims of excessive force will continue. Because resolution of Officer Behrik's interlocutory appeal does not necessarily determine the City's training and supervision obligations, we do not have jurisdiction to consider the City's municipal-liability appeal.")

McGaw v. Sevier County, Tennessee, 715 F.App'x 495, 498-99 (6th Cir. 2017) ("It is true that, in narrow circumstances, a court of appeals may review the denial of a motion for summary judgment through the court's pendent jurisdiction, but Sevier County's appeal does not qualify for this exception. A court hearing an appeal may in its discretion exercise pendent jurisdiction 'where the appealable and non-appealable issues are "inextricably intertwined," meaning that "the appealable issue at hand cannot be resolved without addressing the nonappealable collateral issue."'. . Thus, where the question of a municipality's liability is coterminous with a determination of an officer's qualified immunity, a court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over the former claim in the course of an appeal of the latter. . .Here, however, this court lacks jurisdiction over Sevier County's claim because the county's liability is not foreclosed by our determination that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. The district court denied the county's motion for summary judgment because it held that there were genuine issues of material fact as to whether the county had properly trained its officers to recognize inmates' medical needs. The fact that these officers did not act with deliberate indifference because they reasonably relied on Nurse Sims's diagnosis of McGaw's needs does not resolve the disputes over whether the county's training procedures were adequate or appropriate as a whole. Lack of training could conceivably have affected Nurse Sims's action, and that would not at all intertwine with the officers' immunity claims. Without such intertwining, pendent appellate jurisdiction is lacking, and it is not appropriate for us to exercise it here. For these reasons, the judgment of the district court is reversed with respect to the officer defendants, and Sevier County's appeal is dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.")

Bays v. Montmorency Cty., 874 F.3d 264, 270-71 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Our decision to affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity does not necessarily decide the question whether the district court erred in granting summary judgment to the County on the failure-to-train claim. That the Bays have a cognizable claim against Sigler by no means shows that they have a cognizable claim against the County. That Sigler may have shown deliberate indifference to Shane's medical needs does not show that the County failed to train its employees in this area or had a policy designed to violate such rights. . . Mattox v. City of Forest Park does not change our minds. . . The district court in that case denied the officer and the city summary judgment in a § 1983 suit. We overturned the district court's summary judgment against the officer after finding that he had not violated any constitutional right and thus deserved qualified immunity. . . Because a municipality cannot be held liable if none of its officers violated a constitutional right, our qualified immunity decision necessarily subverted the district court's summary judgment against the city. That meant the city's appeal was inextricably intertwined with the qualified immunity appeal, which in turn meant we could exercise pendent jurisdiction over it. . . The Bays' claim differs materially. Our review of Sigler's qualified immunity claim does not necessarily decide whether the Bays produced enough evidence to save their claim against the County. It could be that the district court correctly held that the Bays failed to carry their burden. Or it could be that the district court erred and the County is liable. The question remains open for appeal after the district court renders final judgment in the case. For these reasons, we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Donna Sigler and dismiss the Bays' appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Thibault v. Wierszewski, 695 F. App'x 891, 904 (6th Cir. 2017) ("In short, viewing the evidence in the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff—as we must—it becomes clear that the facts underlying Wierszewski's determination that he had probable cause to arrest Thibault are in dispute. Moreover, those disputes are neither minor nor immaterial. Consequently, the district court properly denied summary judgment to Wierszewski on his asserted claim of qualified immunity.")

Thibault v. Wierszewski, 695 F. App'x 891, 904-05 (6th Cir. 2017) (Sutton, J., dissenting) ("As I read Johnson, as our court's cases read Johnson, and as the Supreme Court itself has read Johnson, it deprives us of jurisdiction over an appeal from denial of qualified immunity only when the defendant's argument boils down to an attack on the plaintiff's evidence-supported version of the facts. . . But when a defendant challenges the reasonableness of inferences the district court drew from the plaintiff's account of the facts, we must hear the appeal. See Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 380–81 (2007). That's especially true when an inference implicates a mixed question of law and fact, as it typically will in a qualified immunity case. Today's case illustrates the problems with a broad reading of Johnson. Like the defendant in Scott, Wierszewski argues that the district court drew an untenable inference from the video evidence: that Thibault's performance on the sobriety tests showed he was not driving while intoxicated. According to Wierszewski, that untenable inference gave rise to an untenable legal conclusion: that Wierszewski was not entitled to qualified immunity because he unreasonably concluded he had probable cause to arrest Thibault. On Wierszewski's view, the undisputed facts in the case—most notably, Thibault's difficulty maintaining his balance during several of the tests—establish that he had a reasonable basis for the arrest even if we resolve all other factual disputes in Thibault's favor. The Supreme Court recently made clear that deciding legal claims of this sort is 'a core responsibility of appellate courts' that Johnson does not limit. Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S. Ct. 2012, 2019 (2014). Yet today the court finds itself without jurisdiction, and thereby strips Wierszewski of immunity from suit (and his right to an interlocutory appeal, Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 530 (1985)) without considering his legal argument on the merits. For these reasons, I respectfully dissent.")

Harmon v. Hamilton County, Ohio, 675 F. App'x 532, 538-43 (6th Cir. 2017) ("In determining the scope of our jurisdiction, we must 'separate an appellant's reviewable challenges from its unreviewable.'. . In earlier decisions, we held a challenge was unreviewable where the appellant failed to 'overlook any factual dispute and to concede an interpretation of the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff's case.'. . In recent decisions, however, we clarified that we may still decide appeals that contain a 'pure question of law, despite the defendants' failure to concede the plaintiff's version of the facts for purposes of the interlocutory appeal.'. . In those cases, we can 'ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts and nonetheless resolve the legal issue, obviating the need to dismiss the entire appeal for lack of jurisdiction.'. . Thus, a defendant's failure to concede the plaintiff's version of the facts is not fatal so long as there is a pure question of law that we may review. . . In ascertaining which facts are disputed or not, 'ideally we need look no further than the district court's opinion for the facts and inferences cited expressly therein.'. . . Thus, we must determine whether Defendants have raised prohibited fact-based challenges, and if they have, whether they have also raised pure questions of law over which we may exercise jurisdiction. . . .We conclude that Defendants rely on disputed facts at every point in their argument on appeal, divesting this court of appellate jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' excessive force claim. . . . All in all, we have no appellate jurisdiction over these fact-based challenges. Nor do Defendants raise any legal question for us to review, such as whether, based on Plaintiffs' version of the facts, "the district court's legal determination that ... [Defendants'] actions violated a constitutional right or that the right was clearly established." See DiLuzio, 796 F.3d at 609. Therefore, we dismiss Defendants' excessive force interlocutory appeal for lack of appellate jurisdiction. . . .It is true that this court has taken seemingly inconsistent views as to whether the existence of probable cause is a question of fact or law. . .We need not try to resolve these inconsistencies today. Instead, we conclude that there are factual questions underlying the probable-cause determination—separate and apart from the issue of whether probable cause is either legal or factual in nature—that preclude our ability to exercise jurisdiction over the false-arrest claim.")

Thompson v. City of Lebanon, 831 F.3d 366, 372-77 (6th Cir. 2016) (Stranch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in the majority's conclusion that we lack jurisdiction to review the defendants' evidence-based arguments and respectfully dissent from the conclusion that we have jurisdiction to review other issues. Our cases that define the limits of interlocutory appellate jurisdiction over denials of qualified immunity involving factual disputes—Phelps v. Coy, 286 F.3d 295 (6th Cir. 2002), Beard v. Whitmore Lake School District, 402 F.3d 598 (6th Cir. 2005), Estate of Carter v. City of Detroit, 408 F.3d 305 (6th Cir. 2005), and McKenna v. City of Royal Oak, 469 F.3d 559 (6th Cir. 2006)—show that we lack jurisdiction over any aspect of this case. I dissent not because I dispute the outcome proposed by the majority but because I believe we must honor the limitations—set by Congress, the Supreme Court, and our own precedent—that govern interlocutory jurisdiction. . . .In the instant case, Officers McKinley and McDannald continue to insist on appeal that McKinley fired his weapon accidentally and that the officers' accounts of the events preceding Thompson's death are truthful, despite the district court's finding that both issues are genuinely disputed and its recognition that the credibility of each officer is in question. With respect to the first dispute, answering the factual question of whether or not Officer McKinley intended to use his weapon is a necessary prerequisite to making a legal determination about whether McKinley seized Thompson for Fourth Amendment purposes. . . Similarly, knowing the particular facts and circumstances that confronted the officers in the moment they killed Thompson is essential to determining whether or not the officers' actions were objectively reasonable as a matter of law. . . With respect to the record evidence on summary judgment, the district court found that submitted video evidence from McKinley's dashboard camera is ambiguous, that 'there are conflicting assessments by the parties' expert witnesses as to what occurred during the shooting[,]' that a third officer's 'statements suggest a different series of events than what was reported by McKinley and McDannald,' and that 'numerous inconsistencies in McKinley and McDannald's accounts call their narratives into doubt, in addition to other significant reasons that a jury might question their credibility.'. . These factual disputes are neither 'minor[,]'. . . nor 'immaterial to the legal issues raised by the appeal,'. . . . Rather, they are the basis of the legal arguments that McKinley and McDannald present to this panel: that no Fourth Amendment seizure took place and that neither McKinley's nor McDannald's actions were objectively unreasonable. Because the officers' factual assertions are crucial to their claims, I would hold that governing precedent obliges us to dismiss this case for lack of jurisdiction and return it to the district court for the trial judge to undertake the core function of trial courts—supervise trial proceedings before the jury assigned to hear this case.")

Rolen v. City of Cleveland, 657 F. App'x 353 (6th Cir. 2016) ("We have previously noted that merely stating that one has conceded the facts is insufficient to establish jurisdiction. . . We remind defendants who wish to bring interlocutory appeals based on qualified immunity that 'a defendant will have a solid jurisdictional position if the defendant claims that the plaintiff cannot show a violation of the clearly established law even assuming everything alleged is true.'. . Law enforcement officers may interact with individuals during a consensual encounter 'without any objective level of suspicion.'. . When officers wish to engage in a non-consensual encounter, it rises to the level of an investigative detention. . . The Fourth Amendment allows an officer to conduct an investigatory stop of an individual if they have reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. . . To conduct a protective frisk of an individual, an officer must further believe 'that the individual whose suspicious behavior he is investigating at close range is armed and presently dangerous to the officer or others.'. . Whether a Terry frisk is constitutional depends on the validity of the initial Terry stop. Officers must have reasonable suspicion to conduct a close-proximity investigation before they are entitled to conduct a protective frisk. . . . On appeal, Craska only argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity for frisking Ficker and not for the stop itself. . . Because he has not set forth a basis for constitutional authority to conduct an investigatory stop of Ficker, Craska cannot demonstrate that he was entitled to conduct a protective frisk. Since our analysis of this issue is not conditioned on any disputed facts, we have jurisdiction and deny Craska qualified immunity. . . .The facts the parties disagree about directly implicate the considerations surrounding a deadly force claim. Thus, we lack jurisdiction over this issue, as it is not our place to resolve these factual disputes.")

Williams v. Morgan, 652 F. App'x 365, 375 (6th Cir. 2016) (Stranch, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I agree with much of the reasoning and the outcome of the majority opinion. I write separately to address how we have jurisdiction over this case in light of the final judgment rule, reflected in 28 U.S.C. § 1291, and its function of protecting the role of trial courts and the efficiency of the appellate system. Specifically, my point concerns our jurisdiction over interlocutory appeals from denials of qualified immunity that involve factual disputes. We have long recognized that we have jurisdiction to review neat legal questions on interlocutory appeal. . . . Relying on our precedent in two prior cases—Phelps v. Coy, 286 F.3d 295 (6th Cir. 2002), and Beard v. Whitmore Lake School District, 402 F.3d 598 (6th Cir. 2005)—Estate of Carter noted that 'this court can ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts and nonetheless resolve the legal issue, obviating the need to dismiss the entire appeal for lack of jurisdiction.'. . Phelps and Beard provide both the authority for and the parameters governing this proposition. Phelps explains that we have jurisdiction to disregard defendants' attempts to dispute plaintiffs' facts only in cases where 'the legal issues are discrete from the factual disputes[.]'. . Beard holds that interlocutory jurisdiction over appeals from denials of qualified immunity involving disputed facts only exists where 'some minor factual issues are in dispute' and 'it does not appear that the resolution of [such] factual issues is needed to resolve the legal issues' also presented. . . If, on the other hand, disputed factual issues are 'crucial to' a defendant's interlocutory qualified immunity appeal, we remain 'obliged to dismiss it for lack of jurisdiction.'. . It is clear in the instant case that Officer Morgan disputes factual issues that are crucial to his interlocutory appeal, therefore we do not have jurisdiction over this case under the line of cases including Phelps, Beard, Estate of Carter, and McKenna. There is another limited exception to the final judgment rule, however, that is present in this case. We have recognized that the Supreme Court's opinion in Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007), created a narrow exception to the jurisdictional limitations on interlocutory appeals, allowing courts of appeal to assert interlocutory jurisdiction in qualified immunity appeals where a defendant claims that a 'trial court's determination that a fact is subject to reasonable dispute is blatantly and demonstrably false[.]'. . Because Officer Morgan has made such a claim here, I agree that this court has jurisdiction to hear his appeal, and I respectfully concur in the outcome reached by the majority.")

Zuhl v. Haskins, 652 F. App'x 358, 361-64 (6th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e may decide an appeal challenging the district court's legal determination that the defendant's actions violated a constitutional right or that the right was clearly established. . .We may also decide an appeal challenging a legal aspect of the district court's factual determinations, such as whether the district court properly assessed the incontrovertible record evidence. . . And we may decide, as a legal question, an appeal challenging the district court's factual determination insofar as the challenge contests that determination as 'blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it.'. . We may not, however, decide an appeal challenging the district court's determination of ' "evidence sufficiency," i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. . .These types of prohibited fact-based ('evidence sufficiency') appeals challenge only the plaintiff's allegations (and the district court's acceptance) of 'what [actually] occurred[ ] or why an action was taken or omitted,' Ortiz v. Jordan, 562 U.S. 180, 190 (2011), who did it, Johnson, 515 U.S. at 307, or 'nothing more than whether the evidence could support a [jury's] finding that particular conduct occurred,' Behrens v. Pelletier, 516 U.S. 299, 313 (1996). We have also explained that the defendant-appellant may not challenge the inferences the district court draws from those facts, as that too is a prohibited fact-based appeal. . . In the event that legal and factual challenges are confused or entwined, 'we must separate an appealed order's reviewable determination (that a given set of facts violates clearly established law) from its unreviewable determination (that an issue of fact is "genuine").'. . Similarly, we can separate an appellant's reviewable challenges from its unreviewable. . . That is, we can 'ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts and nonetheless resolve the legal issue, obviating the need to dismiss the entire appeal for lack of jurisdiction.'. . .In his brief on appeal, Deputy Haskins claims to be accepting Jason's version of the facts, but then flatly disputes Jason's evidence and relies on his view of the evidence to argue that his actions were objectively reasonable. . . .But rather than dismiss the appeal outright, we can instead discard the fact-based or 'evidence sufficiency' challenges and exercise the jurisdiction we do have to review the district court's legal determinations, based on the plaintiffs' version of the facts and the inferences as articulated by the district court. . . .Accepting Jason's version of the facts and the district court's inferences, as we must in deciding this interlocutory appeal as a matter of law, we conclude that the force as alleged was excessive, in violation of Jason's constitutional rights. Moreover, the right to be free of such excessive force was clearly established as of January 29, 2010, the morning at issue here.")

Zuhl v. Haskins, No. 14-2346, 2016 WL 3346071, at *5 (6th Cir. June 16, 2016) (Stranch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (not published) ("I concur in Part I and all but the final paragraph of Part II.A of the majority's opinion. I respectfully dissent, however, because our cases that define the limits of interlocutory appellate jurisdiction over denials of qualified immunity involving factual disputes—Phelps v. Coy, 286 F.3d 295 (6th Cir. 2002), Beard v. Whitmore Lake School District, 402 F.3d 598 (6th Cir. 2005), Estate of Carter v. City of Detroit, 408 F.3d 305 (6th Cir. 2005), and McKenna v. City of Royal Oak, 469 F.3d 559 (6th Cir. 2006)—show that we lack jurisdiction in this case. In Estate of Carter, we explained that if 'aside from [any] impermissible arguments regarding disputes of fact, [a] defendant [appealing a qualified immunity denial] also raises the purely legal question of whether the facts alleged ... support a claim of violation of clearly established law, then there is an issue over which this court has jurisdiction.'. . We also noted another limited area of jurisdiction with respect to interlocutory qualified immunity appeals. Relying on our precedent in Phelps and Beard, Estate of Carter noted that 'this court can ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts and nonetheless resolve the legal issue, obviating the need to dismiss the entire appeal for lack of jurisdiction.'. . Thus, Estate of Carter derives its authority and its limitations from the precedential principles articulated in Phelps and Beard. Phelps explains that we have jurisdiction to disregard defendants' attempts to dispute plaintiffs' facts only in cases where 'the legal issues are discrete from the factual disputes[.]'. . Beard provides that interlocutory jurisdiction over appeals from denials of qualified immunity involving disputed facts only exists where 'some minor factual issues are in dispute' and 'it does not appear that the resolution of [such] factual issues is needed to resolve the legal issues' also presented. . . If, on the other hand, disputed factual issues are 'crucial' to a defendant's interlocutory qualified immunity appeal, we remain 'obliged to dismiss it for lack of jurisdiction.'. . We reiterated these limitations on interlocutory jurisdiction in McKenna, distinguishing our exercise of jurisdiction in Estate of Carter and dismissing the interlocutory appeal in McKenna on the grounds that 'the officer-defendants have in fact made no legal argument for qualified immunity which can be extracted from their reliance on disputed facts.'. .In the instant case, as the majority recognizes, Haskins 'flatly disputes [Zuhl's] evidence and relies on his view of the evidence to argue that his actions were objectively reasonable.'. . Because Haskins disputes factual issues that are crucial to his interlocutory appeal, I would hold that we lack jurisdiction over this case and are obliged to dismiss under our precedent.")

Richko v. Wayne Cty., Mich., 819 F.3d 907, 921-22 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Because Cameron's appeal on the basis of qualified immunity is not coterminous with the issue of Wayne County's municipal liability, we lack pendent jurisdiction over the County. Our conclusion is bolstered by the Supreme Court's holding in Swint. There, the Court reversed the Eleventh Circuit's exercise of pendent jurisdiction, which was based on the theory of judicial economy, over a county commission's appeal from the denial of summary judgment. . . The Court held that the question of the county commission's liability was not 'inextricably intertwined' with the individual defendants' immunity from suit because the claim against the commission focused on whether one of the individual defendants qualified as a county policymaker, whereas the individual defendants' claims were based on whether they had violated clearly established law. . . Here, Wayne County's potential liability is based on its alleged de facto policy of not reviewing an inmate's mental-health records in the MH–WIN system. This issue is not inextricably intertwined with the decision to deny summary judgment to Cameron based on qualified immunity, and a review of the former issue is not necessary to ensure a meaningful review of the latter. We therefore decline to exercise pendent jurisdiction over Wayne County's interlocutory appeal.")

McDonald v. Flake, 814 F.3d 804, 815-17 (6th Cir. 2016) ("[S]ince we have already determined that the rights the plaintiffs are claiming here were clearly established at the time of the incident, we must now decide whether Officer Flake's conduct, on these facts, violated those rights. We conclude that it did. On these facts, Officer Flake led a group of alcohol-impaired officers in an attack on the unsuspecting plaintiffs, in violation of Turner, 119 F.3d at 429; inflicted excessive force on these subdued plaintiffs during this police encounter and seizure, in violation of Chappell, 585 F.3d at 908; and ultimately arrested these battered plaintiffs without probable cause, in violation of Everson, 556 F.3d at 500. On this evidence, a jury could reasonably find for the plaintiffs. Under this analysis, the decision is obvious. We AFFIRM the district court's denial of Officer Flake's motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . As demonstrated in the foregoing section, the appealable issue here (whether Officer Flake's conduct violated plaintiffs' clearly established rights) is readily resolved without consideration of the existence or contours of the alleged policy or custom that underlies the claim of municipal liability. Moreover, the City's core argument on the merits of its appeal demonstrates fully the independence or unrelatedness of these issues: the City insists that the plaintiffs cannot prove municipal liability even if they prove that Officer Flake violated their rights as alleged. Consequently, we may not extend pendent appellate jurisdiction to this issue. . .As the plaintiffs point out, Officer Flake's appeal was solely a fact-based challenge to the plaintiffs' evidence and the district court's findings, which was both contrary to settled law and in flagrant disregard of the district court's direct admonition that Flake must accept the plaintiffs' version of the facts in order to raise a justiciable appeal. Despite his protests in his response filing, Flake cannot overcome this problem. His appeal was 'obviously without merit.' The City claims to base its right to appeal on pendent appellate jurisdiction but, even acknowledging the controlling law (i.e., that the appealable issue must necessarily depend on the outcome of the pendent issue, otherwise referred to as being 'inextricably intertwined'), the City made no such argument. In fact, the City's argument demonstrated that the issues were not interdependent. In its response to the motion, the City asserts that the appeals are interdependent because we could make a fact determination that Officer Flake did not drink any alcohol (despite the plaintiffs' evidence and the district court's ruling), which would then allow both defendant-appellants to prevail. But that theory is untenable here. Rather, at this stage of the proceedings, there was no reasonable claim of pendent appellate jurisdiction. This appeal was 'obviously without merit.' The unmistakable futility of these appeals is compelling. . . This gross futility and the defendants' disregard for the warning necessarily influences our view of whether the defendants intended 'delay, harassment, or other improper purposes,' Bridgeport Music, 714 F.3d at 944. In suggesting that the true purpose was delay, the plaintiffs point out that Officer Flake engaged in over two years of discovery before filing his motion for qualified immunity and then filed the appeal only days before trial was scheduled to begin. The City filed its appeal after that and only after the district court had denied its motion to continue trial to a later date. The district court itself expressed that it was 'disturbed' and 'troubled' by this timing, suggesting that it suspected the defendants of improper gamesmanship. The defendants respond, correctly, that they filed their appeals within days of the district court's order denying their motions. In Yates, 941 F.2d at 448, we warned that, 'unfortunately,' defendants could employ these interlocutory appeals from the denial of qualified immunity 'for the sole purpose of delaying trial,' 'often to the disadvantage of the plaintiff.' Specifically, when 'disappointed by the denial of a continuance, [such defendants] may help themselves to a postponement by lodging a notice of appeal.'. . By design, or merely as a result, '[d]efendants may defeat just claims by making [the] suit unbearably expensive or indefinitely putting off the trial.'. . Here, the defendants argued the facts and evidence, in complete disregard of the law and the district court's warnings, thus ensuring that they had no chance of success but nonetheless obtaining the postponement of trial that the district court had denied them, while also causing the plaintiffs unnecessary effort and expense in responding to them. . .This was also a waste of judicial resources. . . Because these appeals were so clearly futile and apparently prosecuted for improper purposes, we conclude that sanctions are warranted. . . Therefore, pursuant to our authority under Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 38, we hereby sanction Officer Flake in the amount of $1500. We further sanction the City in the amount of $1500. These sanctions are to offset some of the plaintiffs' appellate attorney's fees and costs, to compensate the plaintiffs, in part, for defending this frivolous appeal.")

See also Howlett v. City of Warren, Michigan, 852 F. App'x 899, ___ (6th Cir. 2021) ("Defendants' appeal was frivolous. This determination is informed by our decision in McDonald

v. Flake, 814 F.3d 804 (6th Cir. 2016). That case also involved a fact-based challenge to a district court's denial of qualified immunity. . . Similarly, the defendant municipality there, the City of Memphis, Tennessee, appealed the denial of summary judgment on the plaintiffs' Monell claim without making any serious argument that appellate jurisdiction was proper. . . We found the appeal in McDonald 'obviously without merit.'. .McDonald also strongly suggests that Rule 38 sanctions may be appropriate in this case. . . . McDonald is indistinguishable from the case at hand, except that Defendants ignored our order explaining they may not pursue factual disputes on interlocutory appeal, rather than the district court's. . . . Accordingly, it is ordered that appeal No. 19-2460 is DISMISSED for lack of appellate jurisdiction. However, we retain jurisdiction to consider whether sanctions are appropriate under Rule 38.").

Brown v. Chapman, 814 F.3d 436, 446-47 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Unlike a denial of summary judgment on qualified-immunity grounds, a denial of summary judgment on municipal-liability grounds does not fall under the collateral-order doctrine. Although the doctrine's first two requirements would be satisfied—the denial is conclusive and review of it would not affect any other issue in the case—the City would not be able to satisfy the third requirement because this court could review the question of municipal liability after the district court rendered a final judgment. . . Nor can we exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over the City's appeal. On an interlocutory appeal, when a municipality's right to summary judgment is 'inextricably intertwined' with a qualified-immunity analysis, a court may exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over the municipality's appeal. . . . Plaintiff's claim against the officers turns on whether they knew of and disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm to Brown's health and safety; plaintiff's claim against the City is based on a theory of ratification by failure to investigate. Although the two overlap, plaintiff's claim against the officers does not necessarily resolve her claim against the City. Indeed, a finding that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity would not foreclose a finding that the City was liable here. If, for example, 'the [City] ratified [the officers'] misconduct which, though unconstitutional, was not in violation of clearly-established law,' a court could find the officers immune but the City liable. . . Accordingly, we conclude that the City's right to summary judgment is not 'inextricably intertwined' here with the qualified-immunity analysis and therefore dismiss the City of Cleveland's appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Morabito v. Holmes, 628 F. App'x 353, 356 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Plaintiff contends that Defendants' appeal raises factual issues that we may not resolve in an interlocutory appeal. However, Defendants' ultimate claim, that they are entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiff has failed to present evidence of excessive force sufficient to raise a material issue of fact, is a reviewable question of law. In addition, the facts surrounding the denial of medical care claim are not in dispute, and therefore denial of qualified immunity on that claim is a pure question of law. Under Ohio law, our jurisdiction over an interlocutory order denying statutory immunity turns on whether the statute is one that provides immunity from liability (not reviewable) or one that provides immunity from suit (reviewable). Sabo v. City of Mentor, 657 F.3d 332, 336 (6th Cir.2011) (citing Chesher v. Neyer, 477 F.3d 784, 793 (6th Cir.2007)). 'Ohio's immunity statutes were revised in 2003 to provide immunity from suit.' Id .; see also Ohio Rev.Code § 2744.02(C). Therefore, the district court's denial of immunity under Ohio Rev.Code § 2744 is reviewable.")

Kindl v. City of Berkley, 798 F.3d 391, 398-403 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants' principal arguments regarding qualified immunity reduce merely to a factual contention that Plaintiff cannot prove that they should have known of, much less that they were in fact aware of, Kindl's serious medical need. We lack jurisdiction to consider these arguments. . . Defendants also attempt rather incredibly to argue that Kindl did not have a serious medical need. This, too, is a factual dispute that does not qualify as a pure question of law sufficient to create appellate jurisdiction at this stage of the proceedings. . . . Defendants first argue that the video of Kindl's time in cell one conclusively establishes that she did not act in a way that would have alerted the two officers to her need for medical treatment. We need not decide whether a video with such frequent lapses as the one in this case may even qualify as the sort of irrefutable evidence that would come within the Scott exception because, upon our review, even with its imperfections, the video reflects that Kindl sought the attention of the officers after experiencing a seizure, that she urinated on herself, that she fell off the bench, and that she experienced additional seizures before her death. Moreover, the video does not conclusively establish, as Defendants claim, that she never again sought help after the 8 p.m. conversation—to the contrary, it shows her apparently calling out on at least one occasion, and at other points the video footage would be consistent with her speaking. . . .We are in no better a position than the district court—or more to the point, a jury—to determine whether based on Kindl's statements, convulsions, alleged moans, requests for attention, and appearance, Defendants subjectively understood the gravity of her situation. The ultimate 'inference' regarding Defendants' knowledge depends on credibility determinations as well as the composite of evidence ultimately put before a jury. Permitting interlocutory appellate review under the guise of considering only 'inferences' would thus erase the well-established boundaries protecting the function of the ultimate factfinder and deviate from binding precedent set out in Johnson and its progeny. . . .In sum, Defendants fail to identify any pure question of law that might entitle them to qualified immunity on the objective element of the deliberate indifference claim. The cases they cite in aid of their appeal do not cast into doubt the seriousness of alcohol withdrawal as a medical condition, much less overcome the existence of evidence supporting the district court's conclusion that Plaintiff met her summary judgment burden in establishing that Kindl had a serious medical need. Instead, each case cited by Defendants discusses whether the particular evidence in the record was sufficient to show that the defendants 'appreciated' the detainee's medical needs. . . Defendants' arguments in reliance on these cases, at bottom, repackage their factual dispute with regard to the subjective prong of Plaintiff's deliberate indifference claim. Because Defendants are simply making another 'impermissible argument[ ] regarding disputes of facts,'. . . we do not have jurisdiction over their appeal of the district court's denial of qualified immunity.") DiLuzio v. Vill. of Yorkville, Ohio, 796 F.3d 604, 609-12 & n.1 (6th Cir. 2015) ("[W]e may decide an appeal challenging the district court's legal determination that the defendant's actions violated a constitutional right or that the right was clearly established. . .We may also decide an appeal challenging a legal aspect of the district court's factual determinations, such as whether the district court properly assessed the incontrovertible record evidence. . . And we may decide, as a legal question, an appeal challenging the district court's factual determination insofar as the challenge contests that determination as 'blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it.'. . . We may not, however, decide an appeal challenging the district court's determination of ' "evidence sufficiency," i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. . Because such a challenge is purely fact-based, lacking any issue of law, it 'does not present a legal question in the sense in which the term was used in Mitchell,'. . . and is therefore not an appealable 'final decision' within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1291. These types of prohibited fact-based ('evidence sufficiency') appeals challenge directly the plaintiff's allegations (and the district court's acceptance) of 'what [actually] occurred[ ] or why an action was taken or omitted,' Ortiz v. Jordan, 562 U.S. 180, 190 (2011), who did it, Johnson, 515 U.S. at 307, or 'nothing more than whether the evidence could support a [jury's] finding that particular conduct occurred,' Behrens v. Pelletier, 516 U.S. 299, 313 (1996). We have also held that a defendant may not challenge the inferences the district court draws from those facts, as that too is a prohibited fact-based appeal. Romo v. Largen, 723 F.3d 670, 673–74 (6th Cir. 2013). . . . Although an argument could be made that the Supreme Court has rejected this proposition (thus implicitly overruling Romo), we decline to make such a holding. In Plumhoff, the police fatally shot a fleeing driver, the plaintiff sued claiming excessive force, and the accused officers moved for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. Estate of Allen v. City of West Memphis, No. 05–2489, 2011WL197426, *1–3 (W.D.Tenn., Jan. 20, 2011). The district court denied the motion by drawing certain inferences from the evidence. . . .On direct appeal, we affirmed and accepted those inferences, but with sparse discussion. . . . In reversing the decision, however, the Supreme Court considered the same evidence but drew the opposite inferences. . . . That is, the Court drew its own inferences from the evidence, it did not defer to the district court's inferences. But the Court did not discuss its approach to assessing the inferences and the question of deference (or jurisdictional effect) was not at issue. Moreover, those were inferences drawn from incontrovertible video evidence, not inferences drawn in the light most favorable to the plaintiff from the plaintiff's record-supported evidence, as we have here and as is the typical case. Because this latter distinction may matter and because Plumhoff offers no consideration of the issue, we decline to read Plumhoff as deciding this issue in the ordinary case. Accordingly, Romo remains the law of the Circuit. . . . As a rule, we either dismiss these fact-based ('evidence sufficiency') appeals for lack of jurisdiction or excise the prohibited challenge. . . . As a matter of practical application, this is merely to say that we may not decide a challenge directly to the district court's determination of the record-supported evidence or the inferences it has drawn therefrom, but we may decide a challenge with any legal aspect to it, no matter that it might encroach on the district court's fact-based determinations. . . . And, in the event that legal and factual challenges are confused or entwined, 'we must separate an appealed order's reviewable determination (that a given set of facts violates clearly established law) from its unreviewable determination (that an issue of fact is "genuine").'. . Similarly, we can separate an appellant's reviewable challenges from its unreviewable. . . That is, we can 'ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts and nonetheless resolve the legal issue, obviating the need to dismiss the entire appeal for lack of jurisdiction.'. . . In so doing, because we defer to the district court's factual determinations, ideally we need look no further than the district court's opinion for the facts and inferences cited expressly therein. That is, in deciding these legal challenges on interlocutory appeal from the denial of qualified immunity, we often may be able merely to adopt the district court's recitation of facts and inferences. . . Of course, in briefing or arguing for reversal on legal grounds, the defendant-appellant may—indeed, for some arguments, must—point to some other of the plaintiff's record evidence, or some incontrovertible record evidence, to support that argument. . . Alternatively, or correspondingly, the plaintiff-appellee may point to additional record evidence in support of its position, or to bolster the district court's determination. Thus, while we need not engage in a plenary review of the record, neither are we limited to only the facts, evidence, or inferences that the district court has stated expressly. . . Rather, we must make the legal determination of whether the defendant violated a clearly established right, based on those now (for this purpose) undisputed record facts, i.e., 'once we have determined the relevant set of facts and drawn all inferences in favor of the nonmoving party to the extent supportable by the record.'. . Moreover, the presumption favoring the district court's factual determinations is such that, if the district court has cited no facts or evidence (e.g., has 'simply den[ied the] summary judgment motion[ ] without indicating [its] reasons for doing so"), we "may have to undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court ... likely assumed.'. . Finally, it bears mention that, in accepting the district court's factual determinations and relying on the plaintiff's record evidence for the purpose of deciding the interlocutory appeal, we do not ourselves make any findings of fact or inference for purposes of any subsequent proceedings. . . In this appeal, the defendants proclaim that they are accepting plaintiff DiLuzio's version of the facts but, in reality, they rest each of their arguments (but for one) on their own version of the disputed facts and the inferences they would draw from them. For each of their challenges, we will discard the fact-based or 'evidence sufficiency' portion of the appeal—that is, any challenge to the district court's view of the facts or its associated inferences or, more frequently, any challenge to plaintiff DiLuzio's version of the record-supported evidence—and resolve the legal challenge based on those given facts and inferences.")

Oliver v. Greene, 613 F. App'x 455, 456-59 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Johnson v. Jones is narrow and applies only when the challenge on appeal is to an underlying decision that 'merely decided a question of evidentiary sufficiency, i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. . As we have said elsewhere, 'Plumhoff appears to cabin the reach of Johnson to "purely factual issues that the trial court might confront if the case were tried."' Roberson v. Torres, 770 F.3d 398, 403 (6th Cir.2014) (quoting Plumhoff, 134 S.Ct. at 2019). See also Family Service Ass'n ex rel. Coil v. Wells Twp., —— F.3d ——, No. 14–4020, 2015 WL 1726571, *5 (6th Cir. Apr. 16, 2015) ("[The defendant] may be wrong on the merits but that does not deny us jurisdiction to say so—or for that matter deny [the plaintiff] the benefit of a merits ruling that establishes on this record that a jury reasonably could rule for him."). Here, Greene raises two arguments on appeal, neither of which directly challenges the district court's finding of a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Oliver's actions created a threat to Greene and others. Instead, Greene argues that his evidence, including the surveillance video, so overwhelms (i.e., blatantly contradicts) Oliver's version that it renders the facts undisputed (and in his favor). . . Alternatively, Green argues that he was entitled to qualified immunity even if we accept Oliver's version, thus rendering the facts undisputed (in Oliver's favor). . .Consequently, we have jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal. . . .Greene's primary contention is that his evidence, most notably the surveillance video, renders the facts and events in question undisputed, such that the district court erred by 'accept[ing] the Plaintiff's version of events as true,'. . . and 'viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, as required on summary judgment[.]'. . . While Greene is partially correct about the value of a surveillance video, he is incorrect about the district court's analysis and whether the material facts are subject to genuine dispute here. . . . Here, Oliver contends that Greene needlessly subjected him to excessive force by taking him to the ground, choking him, and repeatedly punching him in the face. Greene replies that, initially, he was trying to restrain Oliver, an unruly inmate, and later was just defending himself. Moreover, Greene argues that his evidence, including not only the video but also certain deposition testimony and exhibits, blatantly contradict Oliver's version and therefore render 'undisputed' the events at the initiation of the altercation and prove unequivocally that Oliver initiated it. Greene also cites cases to support his contention that courts can, pursuant to Scott, rely on evidence other than video (e.g., medical records) to refute a party's version of events. Taking this last contention first, it goes too far on the present facts. Here, Greene's claim is that his other evidence (deposition testimony, affidavits, and prison records) is more credible than is Oliver (a proven liar) and, therefore, he has blatantly contradicted Oliver to the point that there is no dispute of fact as to whether Oliver started the fight. That is neither Scott's holding nor the law. Oliver urges one view, Greene's evidence supports another. That is a dispute. As for the surveillance video and this court's ability to view the facts in the light depicted by the video (such that it speaks for itself), Greene is mistaken about that as well. Greene does not argue that the district court ignored or misrepresented the events in the video. . . .Alternatively, Greene argues that he was entitled to qualified immunity even accepting Oliver's version of events. Greene bases this argument on what he sees as '[t]he undisputed facts surrounding [his] use of force'; facts that allegedly indicate force was necessary 'to protect himself' from Oliver's assaults and 'to maintain or restore order.'. . But Oliver denies that he provoked Greene and contends that Greene needlessly injured him by way of excessive force when he took him to the ground, choked him, and repeatedly punched him in the face. Under this version of the facts, Greene did subject Oliver to excessive force and, correspondingly, is not entitled to qualified immunity.") Oliver v. Greene, 613 F. App'x 455, 459-61 (6th Cir. 2015) (Karen Nelson Moore, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The majority and I agree that we have jurisdiction to decide whether the record blatantly contradicts Oliver's version of the facts. We also agree that the video and the record as a whole do not definitively show that Oliver's description of the event is incredible. We disagree, however, about whether, after concluding that the record does not blatantly conflict with Oliver's version of events, we have jurisdiction to consider Greene's claim that he is immune from suit. Binding precedent in this court compels the conclusion that we do not. We are without jurisdiction to consider interlocutory appeals contesting a denial of qualified immunity insofar as the appellant officer disputes the plaintiff's record-supported version of the facts. . . The one exception to this rule is when 'the plaintiff's version of the facts, which the district court accepted, was "so utterly discredited by the record ... that no reasonable jury could have believed him."'. . Once the court of appeals has concluded that the record does not blatantly contradict the plaintiff's version of events, however, we do not have jurisdiction to conduct a de novo review of the district court's determination that there is a genuine dispute of material fact. . . Neither the Supreme Court nor this court sitting en banc has overruled Romo, and therefore we are bound by its holding. . . The majority further contends that Greene has argued alternatively that he is entitled to qualified immunity even if the court accepts Oliver's version of the facts. True, Greene purports to raise an alternative argument in his 'Summary of Argument' that even under Oliver's facts the force Greene used was not excessive as a matter of law. . . but Greene does not actually make the argument in his brief. Greene's entire argument is premised on his own version of the facts. After reciting the standard of review and the purpose of qualified immunity, Greene immediately launches into argument about why Oliver is not to be believed. . . Greene then argues that his use of force was justified to protect himself and to maintain or restore discipline. . . But his arguments rest entirely on two critical, disputed facts: first, that Oliver struck or attempted to strike Greene three times. . . and second, that Oliver had disobeyed several orders. . . . The only authorities Greene cites in support of his argument are cases where the corrections officers' use of force was justified by self-defense. . . In sum, Greene's entire 'legal' argument rests on a finding that Oliver punched him and disobeyed orders and nothing more, and Greene does not address whether his use of force was justified if Oliver had simply pointed his finger and had followed orders. Our published cases establish that '[m]ere conclusory statements that the officers construe the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff cannot confer jurisdiction upon this Court,' Thompson v. Grida, 656 F.3d 365, 368 (6th Cir.2011), unless we can isolate legal arguments. . . Because Greene's entire legal argument rests on his version of the facts, we do not have jurisdiction to reach the alternative qualified-immunity argument. Thus, I would affirm the district court on the sole basis that the record does not blatantly contradict Oliver's version of the facts. Insofar as Greene otherwise disputes Oliver's version of the facts, Greene's appeal should be dismissed.")

Family Serv. Ass'n ex rel. Coil v. Wells Twp., 783 F.3d 600, 607 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Coil claims we should dismiss this interlocutory appeal for want of jurisdiction rather than affirm the district court's decision. See Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304 (1995). Coil takes a narrow jurisdictional requirement and tries to turn it into something it is not. Johnson applies to interlocutory appeals that solely contest the plaintiff's account of the facts. . . That is not this case. Officer Kamerer maintains that, even 'accept[ing] a review of the record in a light most favorable to [Coil],' his conduct still does not violate the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendments. . . He may be wrong on the merits but that does not deny us jurisdiction to say so—or for that matter deny Coil the benefit of a merits ruling that establishes on this record that a jury reasonably could rule for him. Appeals contesting whether the undisputed facts support reasonable suspicion or deliberate indifference do not run afoul of Johnson. See Gardenhire v. Schubert, 205 F.3d 303, 312 (6th Cir.2000) (reasonable suspicion); Williams v. Mehra, 186 F.3d 685, 690 (6th Cir.1999) (en banc) (deliberate indifference). And in this setting Johnson does not prevent appellate courts from performing their customary function of determining whether a material fact dispute precludes summary judgment. See Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S.Ct. 2012, 2019 (2014).")

Pollard v. City of Columbus, Ohio, 780 F.3d 395, 401-02 (6th Cir. 2015), cert. denied, 136 S. Ct. 217 (2015) ("Unlike in Romo, we are not presented with 'dueling accounts of what happened.'. . Pollard asserts that, at the time the officers fired, Bynum was unarmed, injured, and trapped in the Cadillac. However, the officers do not dispute that account. . . They simply maintain that, despite being unarmed, injured, and trapped, Bynum was still a threat, first, because he appeared to have a gun and, second, because they had strong reason to believe he would use the gun. Because the officers 'concede the facts in the light most favorable to [the appellee], they 'raise a pure issue of law,'. . . which this court may entertain on appeal. Thus, we deny Pollard's motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction with respect to the officer-defendants. . . . Because a municipality is not entitled to qualified immunity, Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622, 657, 100 S.Ct. 1398, 63 L.Ed.2d 673 (1980), the collateral order doctrine does not extend to summary-judgment orders on municipal-liability claims. Nevertheless, to the extent the issues raised in the City of Columbus's appeal are 'inextricably intertwined' with the officers' claims of qualified immunity, we may exercise pendent jurisdiction over the appeal. . . The deprivation of a constitutional right is a prerequisite to municipal liability under § 1983. . . Thus, there is a clear connection between the City's appeal and the officers' claims of qualified immunity. If the officers did not commit a constitutional violation, Pollard's municipal-liability claim necessarily fails because the prerequisite for municipal liability is not met. Conversely, if the officers committed a constitutional violation, the prerequisite has been met and Pollard can proceed with her claim against the City. As such, the City's appeal is 'inextricably intertwined' with the officers' appeal, and Pollard's motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction is DENIED with respect to the City.")

Brown v. Lewis, 779 F.3d 401, 411 (6th Cir. 2015) ("It is not always clear from the officers' initial brief that they accept Brown's entire version of events. For example, the officers contend that only one of them participated in handcuffing Brown, so the others could not be liable for any excessive force. The court does not have jurisdiction to review these contentions because they reflect a dispute of fact. The officers do nonetheless raise questions of law concerning the application of the Fourth Amendment to Brown's version of the facts, including the full use of force she describes. This court has jurisdiction over those questions.")

Harris v. Lasseigne, 602 F. App'x 218, 221-22 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The plaintiff has the burden of demonstrating that the defendant should not be granted qualified immunity. . . Lasseigne is entitled to qualified immunity if the court determines that his actions in shooting Craft 'did not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . The court first determines 'if the facts alleged make out a violation of a constitutional right,' and next decides 'if the right at issue was "clearly established" when the event occurred such that a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct violated it.'. . The court must answer both questions in the affirmative to deny qualified immunity. . . It was clearly established at the time of the shooting that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment if he shoots a suspect without 'probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious harm, either to the officer or to others.'. . Here, the parties agree that Craft posed no threat of serious physical harm apart from the shotgun. Thus, if Craft threw the shotgun over the fence before Lasseigne fired, Lasseigne violated Craft's Fourth Amendment rights. Harris asserts exactly that-that Craft threw the gun over the fence before the shot. Thus, under her version of the incident, Lasseigne was not entitled to qualified immunity. The district court held that a reasonable jury could accept that version; hence it denied qualified immunity to Lasseigne. On appeal, Defendant argues that the district court should not have relied on Plaintiff's version of the facts because it is 'blatantly contradicted by the record.' However, Lasseigne's arguments amount to an attempt to demonstrate that his evidence is more plausible than Plaintiff's evidence. He spends time discussing how Craft's injuries would allow him to throw the gun after he was shot. However, this does not answer the question of whether he was holding the gun when he was shot. He also argues that the video stills show Craft turning the shotgun toward the officers before it went out of view, but a review of the video stills does not make clear that Craft was doing as he claims. Also, the video stills do not answer the question at issue because the relevant events occurred off-camera. While a jury would certainly not be required to conclude from Plaintiff's evidence that Lasseigne used excessive force, the evidence relied upon by the district court was not 'so utterly discredited by the record as to be rendered a visible fiction.'. . To deny qualified immunity, the court need not conclude that the inferences drawn by the Plaintiff are the only reasonable inferences that could be drawn, but must simply find that the inferences drawn are reasonable and not blatantly contradicted. While Plaintiff's and Lasseigne's evidence contradict each other, neither renders the other 'a visible fiction.'. . Lasseigne characterizes his appeal as one dealing with purely legal issues, but his appeal does not concede the facts in a light most favorable to Plaintiff. As a result, '[w]e are left with precisely the sort of factual dispute over which this Court lacks jurisdiction.'")

Ragsdale v. Sidoti, 574 F. App'x 718 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Ragsdale claims that we should dismiss this interlocutory appeal for want of jurisdiction rather than affirm the district court's decision. . .He is correct that, generally speaking, we lack jurisdiction to hear immediate appeals from the denial of qualified immunity that solely contest the other side's account of the facts. . . But two realities give us jurisdiction here. One is our line of precedents giving us jurisdiction over these kinds of appeals if the officer claims that the claimant and district court rely on an account of the incident that is 'blatantly' contradicted by the record. Moldowan v. City of Warren, 578 F.3d 351, 370 (6th Cir.2009). That is precisely what Officer Sidoti is arguing—wrong though he ultimately may be about the merits at this stage of the case. The other is that Officer Sidoti separately makes legal arguments in his brief—that mistakes of fact and law are still entitled to qualified immunity, . . . wrong again though he may ultimately be about the merits at this stage of the case. We thus have jurisdiction over the appeal. See Chambers v. Ohio Dep't of Human Servs., 145 F.3d 793, 797 (6th Cir.1998).")

Jones v. Sandusky County, Ohio, 541 F. App'x 653, 658, 659 (6th Cir. 2013) ("Like the defendants in Chappell, defendants argue that certain facts considered by the district court, such as whether Jones had time to comply with the officers' orders, were not material and did not create a genuine issue of material fact. . . . Further, defendants object to the legal analysis the court applied to the facts not in dispute, specifically whether the court properly examined both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis set forth in Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 129 S.Ct. 808, 172

L.Ed.2d 565 (2009), and the application of this court's segmenting rules. These issues are independent of any factual disputes that are to be determined by a jury. Thus, defendants 'have identified purely legal issues that are, pursuant to the collateral order doctrine, subject to appellate jurisdiction.'. . . Accordingly, we have jurisdiction as to Mario's and Jose's appeals of the denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity. Similarly, defendant Overmyer argues that the district court improperly equated the availability of summary judgment to him with the issue of qualified immunity for defendants Mario and Jose. Because the claim against Overmyer is inextricably linked to the claims against Mario and Jose, we have jurisdiction with respect to Overmyer's appeal of the denial of summary judgment on plaintiffs' supervisory liability claim. As to plaintiffs' claims of municipal liability under § 1983, this court does not have interlocutory jurisdiction over the district court's denial of summary judgment as to Sandusky County because such an order is not immediately appealable. Qualified immunity does not protect municipalities, but shields only government officials from individual liability. . . .The court may only consider issues that are 'inextricably intertwined' with the qualified immunity analysis. . . Because we conclude that the district court properly determined that there were factual questions as to whether a constitutional violation occurred with respect to plaintiffs' claims against the individual defendants, we decline to exercise jurisdiction and dismiss Sandusky County's appeal because it is not 'inextricably intertwined' with the question of the individual defendants' right to qualified immunity.")

Younes v. Pellerito, 739 F.3d 885, 889, 890 (6th Cir. 2014) ("There is one limited exception to the requirement that a defendant seeking qualified immunity must concede the plaintiff's factual account-the plaintiff's account can be disregarded where the evidence is "'so utterly discredited by the record' as to be rendered a 'visible fiction.'". . . In Harris the plaintiff's account was totally discredited because it was contradicted by video evidence of the incident. . .Here, the officers challenge Younes's account and some statements of his witness, Kania, based on their own testimony and that of the 'independent' witness Yassine, who initially called the police. The officers' testimony of the incident is not the type of evidence in the record which 'utterly discredit[s]' Younes' version of the facts and therefore the officers must accept the plaintiff's version of the facts in order for this Court to have jurisdiction over their suit. . . . Despite claiming otherwise, the officers failed to satisfy the jurisdictional requirement to appeal a denial of qualified immunity that they must concede the most favorable view of the facts to Younes. We are left with 'precisely the sort of factual dispute over which this Court lacks jurisdiction.'")

Hidden Village, LLC v. City of Lakewood, Ohio, 734 F.3d 519, 524 (6th Cir. 2013) ("The collateral order doctrine secures our jurisdiction over George, Fitzgerald and Barrett's appeal concerning their liability under the federal civil rights statutes. All three sought, and all three were denied, qualified immunity. Because official immunity is not just a defense to liability but a defense to standing trial, a denial of immunity is a collateral order subject to immediate appeal. . . That conclusion leads to another—that we have pendent appellate jurisdiction over Lakewood's appeal. The city raised two defenses in the trial court: (1) that no statutory or constitutional violation occurred, and (2) that, if one did occur, it did not result from a municipal custom or policy. But the city wisely raises only the first defense in this appeal. Whether a violation occurred is inextricably intertwined with, indeed duplicates the first step of, the individual defendants' qualified immunity defense. . . Whether a municipal policy authorized any violation is not.")

Romo v. Largen, 723 F.3d 670, 671 (6th Cir. 2013) ("Because this is an interlocutory appeal, we are bound by the district court's finding that a genuine dispute of material fact existed as to whether Largen had observed [certain] activity, in the absence of objectively incontrovertible evidence that he had. We therefore affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity on Romo's § 1983 claim.")

Martin v. City of Broadview Heights, 712 F.3d 951, 963 (6th Cir. 2013) ("[I]n the face of a constitutional violation, we lack subject-matter jurisdiction to entertain an appeal of the municipal-liability claim because the only path to review the City's claim is foreclosed here. . . .The officers' challenge to the denial of qualified immunity is not 'inextricably intertwined' with the district court's summary-judgment ruling on the City's Monell liability. The officers' liability turns on whether the force they used to restrain Martin violated his clearly established constitutional rights. But the City's liability hinges on its failure to train and supervise the officers. Because resolution of the officers' interlocutory appeal does not necessarily determine the City's training and supervision obligations, we do not have jurisdiction to consider the City's municipal-liability appeal at this time.")

Essex v. County of Livingston, No. 11–2246, 2013 WL 1196894, *6 (6th Cir. Mar. 25, 2013) (unpublished) ("Defendants also ask this Court to review the district court's denial of their motion for summary judgment on Plaintiffs' § 1983 claim against the County. However, unlike Bezotte, the County is not entitled to an interlocutory appeal from the district court's denial of summary judgment as to it unless the issues raised in the County's appeal are 'inextricably intertwined with' or 'necessary to ensure meaningful review of' the qualified immunity inquiry. . . Despite our determination on qualified immunity, the question of whether Bezotte was deliberately indifferent in implementing policies pertaining to deputy training and supervision is not necessarily resolved; consequently, the issue of the County's potential liability is unresolved at this early stage of the litigation. It is still plausible that Bezotte could have known of a pattern of misconduct or could have anticipated Boos' conduct as a result of Bezotte's failure to provide specific training on sexual assault. Accordingly, we lack jurisdiction over the County's appeal.")

Quigley v. Tuong Vinh Thai, 707 F.3d 675, 680 (6th Cir. 2013) ("[E]ven where, as here, the defendant makes 'impermissible arguments regarding disputes of fact,' if the defendant also raises the purely legal issue of whether the plaintiff's facts show that the defendant violated clearly established law, 'then there is an issue over which this court has jurisdiction.'. . Because Thai advances this proper, purely legal argument, we have jurisdiction to resolve the legal issue and need not dismiss the entire appeal.")

Campbell v. City of Springboro, Ohio, 700 F.3d 779, 795 (6th Cir. 2012) (McKeague, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The City of Springboro . . . may be held liable for a policy of deliberate indifference to obvious inadequacies in training or supervision. Further, as the majority recognizes, the City may not assert qualified immunity in defense of a § 1983 claim. In fact, the majority uses this fact to justify its refusal to consider the City's appeal. To be sure, the denial of the City's motion for summary judgment is an interlocutory order that would not ordinarily be subject to immediate review under the collateral order doctrine. We have discretion, however, to exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over issues not independently appealable if those issues are 'inextricably intertwined' with matters properly before us. . . Considering the manifestly close relationship between plaintiffs' theories of liability against Clark, Kruithoff and the City, the exercise of pendent appellate jurisdiction over the City's appeal would certainly be appropriate in this case.")

Stefan v. Olson, No. 11–3775, 2012 WL 3799211, *5, *6 (6th Cir. Aug. 31, 2012) (not reported) ("We recognize that the jurisdictional question tethered to the law-fact distinction can pose a conundrum to litigating parties, especially upon a cursory reading of the applicable case law. It is well settled that a denial of qualified immunity is not appealable on grounds of whether the record sets forth a genuine issue of fact for trial. . . Nor can an interlocutory appeal of this nature challenge whether the evidence supports a finding that the alleged conduct actually occurred. . . Rather, '[f]or appellate jurisdiction to lie over an interlocutory appeal, a defendant seeking qualified immunity must be willing to concede the facts as alleged by the plaintiff and discuss only the legal issues raised by the case.'. . .For purposes of this appeal, McCune has properly conceded, both in her reply brief and at oral argument, that we must take the facts in the light most favorable to Stefan. . . She maintains that the conceded facts do not support the conclusion that she was 'deliberately indifferent to [Reid's] medical needs.'. . . Questions of a Defendant's specific conduct are questions of basic fact, while the question of whether those actions could meet the legal standard for deliberate indifference is a mixed question of law and fact that we review de novo as a question of law. . . Furthermore, contrary to Appellee's assertion, should factual or inferential disputes remain on appeal, this court may choose to address only the legal issues and thus avoid the need to dismiss the appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

In re AMTrust Financial Corp., 694 F.3d 741, 750, 751 & n.4 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Despite summarizing its ruling in unfortunately broad language,. . . the opinion in Ortiz was actually limited to cases where summary judgment is denied because of factual disputes. The Court brushed aside the defendants' claim that they were appealing a purely legal issue that would be preserved for appeal even without a Rule–50 motion: 'We need not address this argument, for the officials' claims of qualified immunity hardly present "purely legal" issues capable of resolution "with reference only to undisputed facts."'. . . Indeed, this court recently recognized that 'Ortiz leaves open the possibility' that such purely legal claims 'may still be considered.' Nolfi v. Ohio Ky. Oil Corp., 675 F.3d 538, 545 (6th Cir.2012); see also Fencorp, Co. v. Ohio Ky. Oil Corp., 675 F.3d 933, 940 (6th Cir.2012). . . . Another panel has read Ortiz differently, stating, in an unpublished opinion, that a party's claimed right to appeal, after trial, a summary-judgment denial on purely legal issues 'is now clearly foreclosed in light of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Ortiz v. Jordan.' Doherty v. City of Maryville, 431 F. App'x 381, 384 (6th Cir.2011). This statement was dicta, however, as the court ultimately held that the issue was indeed reviewable in the context of a Rule 50(a) motion. . . Similarly, the other cases cited in AFC's supplemental-authority letter do not appear to have applied Ortiz to bar review of purely legal issues. . . . The district court's ambiguity ruling was a pure question of law. . . Thus, under this circuit's longstanding precedent, the district court's decision 'may be appealed even in the absence of a post-judgment motion.'")

Kennedy v. City of Cincinnati, No. 11–3212, 2012 WL 1871566, at *1, *2 (6th Cir. May 23, 2012) ("This matter is a clear example of an impermissible appeal from an interlocutory denial of summary judgment. Nevertheless, Kennedy attempts to avoid dismissal by fitting his case into a possible exception acknowledged in Ortiz: that an order denying summary judgment on 'a purely legal issue' capable of resolution 'with reference only to undisputed facts' may be appealed. . . .Just as was the case in Ortiz, however, Kennedy's appeal is not of a purely legal character. In denying Kennedy's motion, the district court concluded that Kennedy had shown a constitutionally protected interest in access to the public pool. At the same time, it explicitly noted that summary judgment was inappropriate due to the 'disputed questions of fact' that remained 'as to what procedural process was afforded or available—pre-revocation and post-revocation.'. . .Kennedy counters that, notwithstanding these fact disputes, the evidence proffered to the district court on summary judgment unequivocally demonstrates that he was not afforded notice or a meaningful opportunity to be heard—even when that evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to Zucker. But Ortiz precludes precisely this type of inquiry into whether the evidence presented at the summary judgment stage merits judgment as a matter of law. 'Once [a] case proceeds to trial, the full record developed in court supersedes the record existing at the time of the summary judgment motion.'. . Thereafter, a court of appeals does not have jurisdiction over an appeal based on evidence presented prior to trial. . . and can review a claim only 'in light of the character and quality of the evidence received in court,' Ortiz, 131 S.Ct. at 889. Since Kennedy's appeal falls entirely in the former category, it is not cognizable in this Court.")

Sabo v. City of Mentor, 657 F.3d 332, 336 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Throughout his brief and oral argument before this Court, Tkach has maintained that Mr. Sabo pointed his gun in the direction of fellow police officers and civilians. Sabo heavily disputes this fact, arguing that Mr. Sabo never pointed the gun, and the district court, apparently using 'aimed' interchangeably with 'pointed,' . . . assumed the plaintiff's version of the facts. Tkach has never argued that he is entitled to qualified immunity even if Mr. Sabo did not point the gun. Tkach's only argument rests on a version of the facts that differs from the version the district court assumed. Accordingly, Tkach's appeal presents no pure legal issue for review, and we lack jurisdiction to hear it.")

Thompson v. Grida, 656 F.3d 365, 368 (6th Cir. 2011) ("The issue on appeal is not whether the officers were entitled to qualified immunity under the officers' version of the facts; the issue on appeal is whether Thompson contests that version of the facts. He does. The officers assert that Thompson disregarded commands to 'Get Back,' Mrs. Thompson engaged in loud, threatening, and confrontational behavior to Officer Shuburt, and Thompson resisted the officers and refused their commands to roll over. Thompson's pleadings and the depositions dispute these facts and instead claim that Thompson did not resist the officers and obeyed their requests. Thompson successfully disputed, before a jury, any claim that he had assaulted an officer. The officers have failed to satisfy the requirement that they concede the most favorable view of the facts to Thompson. This is precisely the sort of factual dispute over which this Court lacks jurisdiction.")

Bomar v. City of Pontiac, 643 F.3d 458, 462 (6th Cir. 2011) ("On appeal, although Main concedes that he punched and pepper-sprayed Bomar after handcuffing her, he contests the district court's determination that a genuine issue exists as to whether Bomar was under control after being handcuffed and, in doing so, deprives this court of jurisdiction.")

Huckaby v. Priest, 636 F.3d 211, 216 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Defendants here refuse to concede the facts in the light most favorable to Pierce, and fail to raise a legal issue on appeal that is separate from their interpretation of the disputed facts in a light most favorable to Defendants. . . Because we lack appellate jurisdiction over such factual issues, Defendants' failure to concede these facts precludes the award of qualified immunity. Accordingly we dismiss the officers' appeal from the denial of qualified immunity on interlocutory appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Smith v. Leis, 407 F. App'x 918, 2011 WL 463540, at *6 (6th Cir. Feb. 10, 2011) (not published)("Here, like in Everson, Skousen, Wallin, and Summers, 'the district court permitted discovery to continue before first resolving the qualified-immunity question,' which forced Defendants 'to go through a large part of the litigation process that the qualified immunity doctrine seeks to avoid.'. . As in Everson, the district court's actions here were 'even more egregious, as it did not simply let discovery continue through to the original cutoff date, but rather ordered an additional [thirty] days of discovery' on the class certification motion after the original cutoff date had passed. . . Although a district court may hold a motion for summary judgment raising claims of immunity in abeyance, it may do so only after inquiring 'whether any facts material to the plaintiff's claims are genuinely at issue' and then making a finding that those material facts are in dispute. . . No such inquiry was undertaken nor was such a finding made by the district court in this case. In light of the Supreme Court's reiteration that immunity questions should be resolved 'at the earliest possible stage in litigation,'. . . and this court's repeated directive that a district court may not avoid ruling on a motion for summary judgment raising immunity claims,. . . the district court's failure to rule on the motion for summary judgment is immediately appealable. Additionally, although this court qualified its holding in Everson by stating that the decision to hold the motion in abeyance was immediately appealable 'unless that decision is related to the proper disposition of the motion,' that exception does not apply here. . . The district court ordered discovery solely on the issue of the adequacy of the proposed class representatives and not, for example, on a conclusion that there existed a well-supported need for discovery to resolve the immunity issues raised in the motion for summary judgment resulting from a specific factual dispute. The court also denied the motion to stay in part on the basis of judicial economy, explaining that a decision on the motion for summary judgment would be res judicata as to the class representatives and not the putative class members. However, this does not otherwise trump the requirement that the district court decide the issue of immunity promptly so that Defendants are not subjected to further litigation that they sought to avoid by filing the motion. . . Similarly, although the district court noted that Fed.R.Civ.P. 23 requires that a court determine whether to certify a class action '[a]t an early practicable time after a person sues or is sued as a class representative,' this also does not mean that the court is obligated to decide a motion for class certification prior to a motion for summary judgment on immunity grounds. . . Again, permitting further litigation prior to ruling on the immunity claims directly contradicts this court's mandate that district courts may not avoid ruling on properly raised claims of immunity. . . Accordingly, we conclude that the Skousen line of cases and this court's decision in Everson are controlling, and that the district court's failure to rule on Defendants' motion for summary judgment raising claims of immunity is immediately appealable.")

Brown v. Metcalf, Nos. 08-4629, 08-4632, 08-4636, 09-3082 2010 WL 653540, at *1, *2 (6th Cir. Feb. 24, 2010) (unpublished) ("In short, while the district court denied summary judgment based upon qualified immunity, it explicitly did so, not on the legal merits of the claim, but on the fact that further discovery was necessary. In essence, then, counsel for defendants seek to appeal that portion of the district court's order granting plaintiff's motion to compel discovery based upon its conclusion that plaintiff had come forward with a sufficiently detailed Rule 56(f) affidavit to place material facts at issue. As explained below, we do not have jurisdiction to entertain such an appeal because it turns on a disputed factual issue, not on an issue of law. . . .We recognize, of course, that the district court's conclusion is by its very nature preliminary when a Rule 56(f) affidavit provides the basis for a factual dispute because it assumes that discovery will produce the evidence that the Rule 56(f) affidavit describes. In this case, the district court acknowledged this distinction and explicitly invited defendants to renew their motions after completion of discovery. At that point, an appeal to this court will lie should the district court deny these renewed motions on an issue of law. The appeals are dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.").

Chappell v. City Of Cleveland, 585 F.3d 901, 906 (6th Cir. 2009) ("[T]he district court's determination that there is a factual dispute does not necessarily preclude appellate review where, as defendants here contend, the ruling also hinges on legal errors as to whether the factual disputes (a) are genuine and (b) concern material facts. . . In Scott, the Eleventh Circuit was held to have erred by accepting the plaintiff's version of the facts as true even though that version was so conclusively contradicted by the record that no reasonable jury could believe it. . . . Defendants Habeeb and Kraynik contend that the district court committed legal error not unlike the error committed by the Eleventh Circuit in Scott. Specifically, they argue the district court erred as a matter of law (a) by treating the objective reasonableness of their use of force as a question of fact instead of a question of law; (b) by treating unsupported speculation that McCloud did not pose an imminent threat of serious harm as creating a 'genuine' dispute; and (c) by treating evidence that the detectives did not announce themselves as 'Cleveland Police' as going to a 'material' fact issue even though it was not–per the 'segmented analysis' that must be applied–part of the circumstances immediately preceding the use of deadly force. For reasons more fully developed below, we agree with defendants on the latter two points. What's most important at this stage, however, is that defendants are not 'merely quibbling with the district court's reading of the factual record,' . . . but have identified purely legal issues that are, pursuant to the collateral order doctrine, subject to appellate jurisdiction.").

Hanson v. City of Fairview Park, Ohio, 349 F. App'x 70, ___ (6th Cir. Oct. 2009) (McKeague, J., dissenting) ("In some of our previous cases, we have required the defendant to concede the plaintiff's version of the facts before we evaluated the legal issue. . . However, the Supreme Court has not required such a mechanical concession before evaluating whether a police officer acted reasonably. See Scott v. Harris , 550 U.S. 372, 378 (2007)(reversing the lower court finding that the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity because facts were in dispute). The Supreme Court has placed emphasis on whether the facts in dispute are genuine or material to the outcome of the case, rather than simply whether any factual dispute exists. . . . Thus, in cases where a factual dispute exists, our job is to evaluate the plaintiff's version of the facts to determine whether the defendant acted reasonably, and not simply to accept the district court's stated reason for denying summary judgment. . . . Because I find that Brewer has presented a purely legal issue on appeal, I would hold that this court does have jurisdiction over the appeal. In resolving Brewer's legal issue, I accept as true Mrs. Hanson's version of the facts. That is, I assume that Scott Hanson was not holding any golf clubs at the time Brewer shot him. I now turn to the legal issue of whether Brewer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Irrespective of the time at which Hanson dropped the golf clubs, his actions were sufficient to give Brewer probable cause to believe that Hanson posed a threat of immediate and severe physical harm, especially considering that this was a quickly unfolding situation in which Brewer was forced to make a split-second judgment. Accordingly, in my opinion Brewer's use of deadly force was justified even under Mrs. Hanson's version of the facts. A reasonably competent officer would not conclude that his actions were unlawful under this set of facts. The analysis could end there, with the conclusion that Brewer acted reasonably and is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. However, in the interest of thoroughness, I undertake to evaluate the second part of the test. That is, assuming that Brewer did not act reasonably, was the law clearly established? . . . . Neither the Supreme Court nor the Sixth Circuit has evaluated facts similar to these, but other circuits have, in analogous circumstances, held that an officer's use of deadly force was reasonable. Hence, in my opinion, it can not be said that Brewer violated any clearly established constitutional right.").

Moldowan v. City of Warren, 578 F.3d 351, 370 (6th Cir. 2009) ("In trying to reconcile Scott with the Supreme Court's edict in Johnson, this Court has concluded that ' "where the trial court's determination that a fact is subject to reasonable dispute is blatantly and demonstrably false, a court of appeals may say so, even on interlocutory appeal."').

Everson v. Leis, 556 F.3d 484, 491-93 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Here, we are faced with an appeal set between the Skousen line of cases and Kimble. Like Kimble and unlike the Skousen line, the district court did not deny or dismiss without prejudice Defendants' motion for summary judgment. Yet, like the Skousen line and unlike Kimble, the district court did permit additional discovery without first resolving the question of qualified immunity. The question becomes, then, whether this case is more like Kimble or more like the Skousen line. We side with the latter. The rationale for qualified immunity clearly favors jurisdiction here. Like in Skousen, Wallin, and Summers, the district court permitted discovery to continue before first resolving the qualified-immunity question. Thus, Defendants would 'be forced to go through a large part of the litigation process that the qualified immunity doctrine seeks to avoid.' . . Arguably, the district court's actions here are even more egregious, as it did not simply let discovery continue through to the original cutoff date, but rather ordered an additional ninety days of discovery, to begin more than a year past the original discovery-cutoff date. . . . If a district court can thwart interlocutory appeal by refusing to address qualified immunity through abeyance rather than dismissal, then the district court can effectively ignore this court's directive that district courts address qualified immunity promptly. . . . For these reasons, we find that a district court's decision to hold in abeyance a motion seeking qualified immunity is immediately appealable unless that decision is related to the proper disposition of the motion. . . . Thus, the district court did not have sufficient grounds under Rule 56(f) for ordering a new discovery period. Without some sound reason for refusing to rule on Defendants' motion that was related to the proper resolution of the motion (e.g., a well-supported need for discovery), the district court's refusal to rule can be appealed immediately to this court.").

Davenport v. Causey, 521 F.3d 544, 554 (6th Cir. 2008) ("We have previously held that where we evaluate whether a constitutional violation has occurred due to a proper appeal from a denial of qualified immunity, we can also evaluate the constitutional question in regard to the city because the question is the same, and therefore the appeal is 'inextricably intertwined.'. . Establishing a constitutional violation in the particular circumstance is required to maintain an action against a city for inadequate training of its police officers. . . .When evaluating Officer Causey's appeal, we determined that a constitutional violation did not occur. The city, therefore, is also entitled to summary judgment.").

Floyd v. City of Detroit, 518 F.3d 398, 411 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Where a court determines that no violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights occurred, obviously the governmental entity cannot be liable for its failure to train or for developing a custom that led to a constitutional violation. Once a violation is determined to have occurred, however, the question of municipal liability turns not simply on the actions of the individual state actors, but rather on the separate question of whether the violation may be attributed to a municipal policy or failure to train.. . That question, Bultema held, was 'not indisputably coterminous with, or subsumed in' the question of the individual defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity. . . The same result obtains here. Because a jury could find that Officers Quaine and Reynoso violated Floyd's rights, the question of the City's liability under both § 1983 and state law turns on the separate issues of its training practices and policies. Pendant jurisdiction is thus inapplicable, meaning that we lack jurisdiction to consider the City's interlocutory appeal.").

Wysong v. City of Heath, 260 F. App'x 848, 853, 854 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Neither the majority nor Justice Stevens's lone dissent in Scott mentioned Johnson v. Jones, or addressed the question of jurisdiction, but logic dictates that Scott must have modified Johnson's language about jurisdiction in order to reach the result it did. In Blaylock, the Third Circuit reconciled Scott and Johnson by saying that Scott represents 'the outer limit of the principle of Johnson v. Jones–where the trial court's determination that a fact is subject to reasonable dispute is blatantly and demonstrably false, a court of appeals may say so, even on interlocutory review.' Blaylock, 504 F.3d at 414. We agree with, and follow, the Third Circuit's view as a principled way to read Johnson and Scott together and to correct the rare 'blatan[t] and demonstrabl[e]' error without allowing Scott to swallow Johnson. Here, Wysong himself admitted in a deposition that no factual dispute exists, so we are comfortable in saying that any determination to the contrary is 'blatantly and demonstrably contradicted by the record,'. . . and that we have jurisdiction 'to say so, even on interlocutory review.' Blaylock, 504 F.3d at 414.").

Elliot v. Lator, 497 F.3d 644, 649-51 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The question is whether this mere assertion of a claim of qualified immunity , without being raised by defendants in a motion for summary judgment or a motion to dismiss, is enough to support appellate jurisdiction when that claim is denied by the district court. Put another way, is the district court's ruling in this case an 'appealable interlocutory decision' under Mitchell? We think it is not. . . . The primary procedural distinction between this case and Mitchell is that there the defendant had filed a motion for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity , whereas here the troopers failed to file any such motion, only raising the qualified immunity claim as part of their response to the Elliots' motion for summary judgment. Is this a distinction that makes a difference? We think it is. . . . Imagine, for example, that we were to exercise our jurisdiction to hear the troopers' interlocutory appeal in this case. Imagine further that we were to reverse the decision of the district court and find the troopers entitled to qualified immunity on the Elliots' unreasonable seizure claim, just as the troopers had argued in their response to the Elliots' motion for summary judgment. This would be the equivalent of our finding the troopers' affirmative defense of qualified immunity to be meritorious, and it would force the district court on remand to deny the Elliots' motion for summary judgment. However, as a response to a plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, a meritorious affirmative defense simply puts the case back into the realm of the jury, because it indicates that there exist facts which, when viewed in light most favorable to the defendant (the non-moving party), could permit the defendant to prevail at trial. Thus, without a motion or cross-motion for summary judgment from the troopers (i.e., the defendants), our ruling in their favor would most likely result in the case being sent back for a full-blown trial. Ironically, this would subject the troopers to additional trial proceedings, which is the exact opposite of what officers hope to achieve by raising the qualified immunity issue on interlocutory appeal. . . . If a defendant is genuinely interested in cutting off future trial proceedings, the logical (and proper) vehicle for this is a well-briefed motion to dismiss or for summary judgment, not an end-run interlocutory appeal.The existence of the Elliots' additional Fourth Amendment claim for excessive force reinforces this analysis. Unlike the unreasonable seizure claim, the district court denied summary judgment in favor of the Elliots with respect to this excessive force claim. . . .Still, defendants appear not to have challenged this claim, either in their response to the Elliots' motion for summary judgment or in the instant appeal. Perhaps they believe that if they are accorded qualified immunity with respect to the unreasonable seizure claim, then it should follow that they be immune from the excessive force claim as well. Not so. The two claims are related, to be sure, but they are not inseparable, nor does the outcome of one dictate the outcome of the other.").

Meals v. City of Memphis, Tenn., 493 F.3d 720, 727 (6th Cir. 2007) ("To the extent the issues raised in the City's appeal are 'inextricably intertwined' with the question of qualified immunity of Officer King, and review of those issues is necessary for meaningful review of her claim of qualified immunity , we have pendent jurisdiction over them. Should the appellee establish that Officer King committed a constitutional violation, then she may also be able to establish liability as to the City. More importantly, if we conclude that Officer King committed no constitutional violation, then the City is not liable under § 1983 on appellee's theory. Therefore, we will exercise jurisdiction over the City's appeal.").

Livermore ex rel Rohm v. Lubelan, 476 F.3d 397, 403 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Language in our earlier decisions interpreting Johnson suggests that where, as here, the appellant fails to concede the facts as alleged by the appellee, this court is completely deprived of jurisdiction over the appellant's interlocutory appeal. [citing Berryman] Subsequent cases, however, have rejected that approach and clarified that we may consider a pure question of law, despite the defendants' failure to concede the plaintiff's version of the facts for purposes of the interlocutory appeal . . . . We therefore conclude that this court has jurisdiction over defendants' interlocutory appeal to consider whether, accepting the facts as alleged by Livermore, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from Livermore's claim of excessive force.")

Lawrence v. Chabot, No. 05-1082, 05-1397, 2006 WL 1342316, at *8 & n.2 (6th Cir. May 16, 2006) (not published) ("Lawrence has failed to argue, much less provide any case law to demonstrate, that the defendants violated clearly established constitutional rights. . . There is no need to decide whether the defendants violated Lawrence's constitutional rights when Lawrence waived the issue of whether the rights were clearly established. Lawrence cannot demonstrate that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. For these reasons, we do not disturb the district court's holding that Van Aken and Armbrustmacher are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Avoiding the preliminary question of whether there was a constitutional violation does not contravene Saucier . . . . Saucier instructs lower courts to decide whether a constitutional right has been violated before deciding whether that violated right is clearly established. In this case, we do not decide on the merits whether any allegedly violated right was clearly established. We simply hold that Lawrence has waived any challenge on appeal to the defendants' qualified immunity defense by failing to make any argument that the rights violated were clearly established. Saucier does not compel courts to answer waived issues.").

Kimble v. Hoso, 439 F.3d 331, 334, 335 (6th Cir. 2006) ("The question we must answer . . . is whether the district court's delay in ruling on the defendants's motion for summary judgment qualifies as a conclusive determination of the issue of qualified immunity or some other collateral order in this case. We conclude that it does not and thus we lack jurisdiction over the defendants's appeal. The district court in this case did not make any decision on the merits or otherwise as to the defendants's motion for summary judgment. Rather, the district court merely delayed ruling on the defendants's motion in order to permit the Kimbles to respond to the summary judgment motion. While reasonable minds can differ as to whether the district judge was providing the Kimbles's counsel with unnecessary extensions, it seems to us to be reasonable that the district judge was attempting to ensure that the Kimbles's case was not erroneously dismissed solely on the grounds of their attorneys's ineptitude. Thus, nothing in the circumstances of this case suggests that the district court's decision to delay in ruling on the defendants's summary judgment motion in order to ensure that the plaintiffs filed a brief in opposition constitutes a conclusive ruling on the qualified immunity issue. The defendants point to this Court's decision in Skousen v. Brighton High School, 305 F.3d 520 (6th Cir.2002), as grounds for concluding that this Court has jurisdiction over the defendants's interlocutory appeal. The defendants's brief suggests that Skousen is a nearly identical case to the one now before this Court and thus should control our legal analysis. We read Skousen as being sufficiently distinct so as not to control here. In Skousen, the defendant filed a motion for summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity. The district court denied the defendant's motion without prejudice on the grounds that it was untimely because discovery was not yet completed. We ruled that the district court's failure to rule on the merits of the defendant's motion was legal error. Our basis for this holding was the Supreme Court's decision in Harlow . . . that stated that 'until [the] threshold immunity question is resolved, discovery should not be allowed.' Thus, in Skousen we reasoned that the district court was required to address the merits of the defendant's summary judgment motion 'prior to permitting further discovery.'. . Not permitting the defendant to appeal the district court's denial of their motion on timeliness grounds would defeat the purpose of the qualified immunity, the Skousen court reasoned. Qualified immunity is immunity from suit, not merely a defense against liability. Thus, the purpose of qualified immunity would be defeated if a defendant was required to face further stages of litigation, such as discovery, before the qualified immunity question was addressed. Thus, the Skousen court decided that where the district court's denial of a summary judgment motion defeats the essential purpose of qualified immunity, the court of appeals has jurisdiction to review an interlocutory appeal. The procedural history of this case differs from that in Skousen in two critical ways. First, while in Skousen, there was an order denying the defendant's summary judgment motion (albeit without prejudice and not on the merits), here there has been no ruling whatsoever on the defendants's motion on the merits or otherwise. Thus, unlike in Skousen, there is no order which even arguably allows this Court to conclude that, as required by the collateral order doctrine, the issue of qualified immunity has been conclusively determined. Moreover, this case differs from Skousen in that the district court did not delay ruling on the defendants's motion for the legally erroneous reason of permitting further discovery. On the contrary, the district court's earlier order made it abundantly clear that the district court was cognizant of Supreme Court's ruling in Harlow, as the district court stayed further discovery until the issue of qualified immunity was addressed. Instead, the district court merely delayed ruling on the defendants's motion based on concerns that the Kimbles's failure to oppose the motion was based on the negligence of counsel rather than their lack of a colorable claim. This type of delay, which does not require the defendants to face any additional stages of litigation, does not undercut the essential purpose of qualified immunity. Based on these critical differences, we conclude that Skousen does not support the defendants's argument that we have jurisdiction over the defendants's interlocutory appeal.").

Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766, 771, 772 & n.2 (6th Cir. 2005) ("This court has jurisdiction to hear Dunn's appeal notwithstanding his failure to concede–for purposes of this interlocutory appeal–disputed facts that are favorable to the plaintiff. It is clear that this court is without jurisdiction to review any argument that depends upon a dispute of facts. . . . Dunn's argument concerning whether there is a dispute of facts, however, is only one of the arguments presented in his brief. Dunn also argues that the district court misapplied Saucier . . . by failing to consider whether the right Dunn was alleged to have violated was clearly established. . . . If, 'aside from the impermissible arguments regarding disputes of fact, the defendant also raises 'the purely legal question of whether the facts alleged ... support a claim of violation of clearly established law,' then there is an issue over which this court has jurisdiction. Therefore, this court can ignore the defendant's attempts to dispute the facts and nonetheless resolve the legal issue, obviating the need to dismiss the entire appeal for lack of jurisdiction.' . . . After Brosseau, Dunn's argument that the district court failed to consider whether the right at issue was clearly established is greatly strengthened, and should be considered the main argument, even if not originally treated as such by Dunn.").

Howser v. Anderson, 150 F. App'x 533, 2005 WL 2673521, at *3 n.4, *6 (6th Cir. Oct. 19, 2005) ("Like Estate of Carter, this case is one of many cases where, if the right is clearly established, the conduct is objectively unreasonable. We thus choose to collapse the second and third prongs discussed in some of our cases into one prong in this case. . . . While this court has never held, and does not hold here, that a defendant bears the burden of proof on whether he or she deserves qualified immunity, we do not believe that dismissing this appeal for want of jurisdiction transfers the burden of proof to Defendant in this case. . . Here, Plaintiff has provided sufficient law that Defendant's actions, taken in a light most favorable to the Plaintiff, violated the decedent's clearly established constitutional rights. When a plaintiff makes such a showing, a defendant must either defeat that showing by distinguishing the law cited by the plaintiff, or he or she must accept that his or her case is not susceptible to dismissal on the basis of qualified immunity and proceed to a trial on the merits. . . Here, Garner itself would preclude a reasonable officer from using deadly force against an arrestee whose hands are visible, since even if the officer had reason to believe the arrestee was armed, neither he nor Mr. Webb were then in immediate danger. . . Because Defendant cannot and does not distinguish the law cited by Plaintiff, and because he never concedes the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, we lack jurisdiction over his appeal.").

Strutz v. Hall, 124 F. App'x 939, 2005 WL 451786, at *1, *2 (6th Cir. Feb. 25, 2005) (not published) ("In short, when a legal determination respecting qualified immunity requires the resolution of a disputed issue of material fact, appellate jurisdiction does not exist under Mitchell. . . Defendants raise the 'community caretaker' standard as a defense to their actions, and for the purposes of this appeal are willing to accept plaintiffs' version of the facts. In order to invoke this defense, the government action in question must be 'totally divorced from the detection, investigation, or acquisition of evidence relating to the violation of a criminal statute.'. . As the district court noted, '[u]nder this record, it must be left to the trier of fact to determine whether Defendants sought only to ensure the welfare of the children [when they administered breath tests], or whether they also sought to achieve law enforcement objectives.' . . We conclude that the resolution of this case hinges on a question of fact, not a question of law or a mixed question of law and fact. Under the circumstances of this case, it is irrelevant that defendants concede the plaintiffs' version of the facts because this appeal still turns on the same issue of fact that the district court pointed out.").

Tucker v. City of Richmond, 388 F.3d 216, 224 (6th Cir. 2004) ("The City purports to appeal the district court's denial of its motion to dismiss this claim or, in the alternative, for summary judgment. It is undisputed that the City's appeal is not appealable as a collateral order, but the City urges us to exercise pendent jurisdiction over its appeal. The exercise of pendent jurisdiction, while discretionary, is appropriate 'where the appealable and non-appealable issues are Ainextricably intertwined."'. . The City's appeal is inextricably intertwined with the individual defendants' interlocutory appeal because there can be no municipal liability under section 1983 for maintaining a policy of unconstitutionally retaliating against individuals who exercise their First Amendment rights when no such unconstitutional retaliation has actually occurred. . . In light of our holding that Tucker has suffered no unconstitutional retaliation, his claim against the City must fail.").

Derfiny v. Pontiac Osteopathic Hospital, 106 F. App'x 929, 2004 WL 1543166, at *4 (6th Cir. July 6, 2004) ("Trial courts should resolve questions of qualified immunity in the earliest possible stage of litigation because qualified immunity is immunity from suit 'rather than a mere defense to liability,' and 'it is effectively lost if the case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.'. . Nevertheless, the district court failed to address the issue of qualified immunity prior to its ruling. In fact, the reasons stated in the record upon which the district court ruled were Defendants' failure to examine Plaintiff for a five month period, and their deliberate indifference, which subsequently was the proximate cause of Plaintiff's injuries. Therefore, absent a discussion and analysis of qualified immunity, in addition to the inclusion of disputed factual issues that gave rise to the denial of Defendants' summary judgment, this matter is not properly before this court for a strictly legal review of the district court's qualified immunity determination on an interlocutory appeal. . . For these reasons, this Court will remand the matter back to the district court to determine Defendants' request for qualified immunity as a matter of law.")

Derfiny v. Pontiac Osteopathic Hospital, 106 F. App'x 929, 2004 WL 1543166, at *10(6th Cir. July 6, 2004) (Gwin, District Judge, dissenting) ("Although sympathetic to the majority's frustration with the district court's failure to provide analysis and reasoning for its denial, I find no reason and certainly no requirement that we remand. [footnote omitted] In reviewing a denial of qualified immunity, appellate courts conduct de novo review. . . Therefore, we accord no deference to the legal analysis the district court used in reaching its decision to deny the Doctors qualified immunity. Additionally, to bring the interlocutory appeal, the Doctors have had to concede all facts in the Derfiny's favor. Thus, it is irrelevant what facts the district court relied on. Further, case law makes clear that an appellate court can consider the denial of the defense of qualified immunity, to the extent the defense turns on an issue of law, regardless of whether or not the district court fully analyzed, or even explicitly considered, the defense.").

Crockett v. Cumberland College, 316 F.3d 571, 578, 579 (6th Cir. 2003) ("The City also contends that we have jurisdiction over its appeal under principles of pendent appellate jurisdiction. Citing Mattox v. City of Forest Park, the City argues that on interlocutory appeal, where a municipality's right to summary judgment is 'inextricably intertwined' with a qualified immunity analysis, a court may exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over the municipality's argument. . . While the City accurately recites the pendent appellate jurisdiction doctrine, its argument ultimately fails. Hamlin's appeal challenges the denial of qualified immunity, which turns on whether there was probable cause for the arrest of the plaintiffs, while the City argues that there was no municipal custom or policy that could form the basis for its § 1983 liability here. Although Hamlin's appeal and the City's appeal overlap in some respects, the two appeals are not 'inextricably intertwined' because resolution of Hamlin's interlocutory appeal of the probable cause issue does not necessarily resolve the City's interlocutory appeal of the municipal policy or custom requirement. For that reason, we reject the application of pendent appellate jurisdiction to the City's appeal.").

Hoover v. Radabaugh, 307 F.3d 460, 465-69 (6th Cir. 2002) ("The crux of this case is the defendants' motivation in terminating Hoover. If they fired him because of his protected speech, qualified immunity should be denied. If they terminated him because of his insubordination, the opposite is true. The district court decided that there was a question of material fact as to whether the defendants entertained impermissible motives in discharging Hoover. We must decide whether this decision as to motivation is a legal or factual one. Under Dickerson, we are first tasked with determining whether the plaintiff's facts spell out a constitutional violation, and then with determining whether that violation was of a clearly established constitutional right. We hold today that we do not have jurisdiction to review the factual determination of the district court that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether or not the defendants entertained unconstitutional motivations. [footnote omitted] Because the determination of the district court was factual and did not raise significant legal questions, we dismiss that issue for lack of jurisdiction. . . . Although we lack jurisdiction to review, on interlocutory appeal, a district court's determination that a genuine issue of fact as to the defendant's motivation remains for trial, we retain jurisdiction over the purely legal question of what constitutes a clearly established constitutional right. . . .We agree with the district court that, as a matter of pure law, the rights here are clearly established: a reasonable official would know that terminating an employee with the motivation, even in part, of quieting the plaintiff's public speech about the illegal activities of the Department violates the Constitution. Beyond that, we lack jurisdiction to review the district court's determination as to factual issues as they relate to defendants' actual motivation.").

Hoover v. Radabaugh, 307 F.3d 460, 470 (6th Cir. 2002) (Cole, J. concurring in part, dissenting in part) ("Once it admits that we lack jurisdiction over the protected speech issue, the majority should go no further in considering that argument. Instead, the majority continues to evaluate the second qualified immunity prong–whether the federal right at issue is clearly established. The majority attempts to retain jurisdiction by noting that the second qualified immunity prong involves a pure question of law over which we have interlocutory appellate jurisdiction. While that may be true, our lack of jurisdiction over the first qualified immunity prong means that there is no need for us to address the second prong, and the majority goes too far by doing so.").

Hoover v. Radabaugh, 307 F.3d 460, 470 (6th Cir. 2002)(Cole, J. concurring in part, dissenting in part) ("Here, because the city's liability depends on an issue separate from the qualified immunity analysis–whether there was a municipal policy, custom, or practice in place that chilled employees' free speech rights–the City of Circleville's argument is not inextricably intertwined with the qualified immunity analysis. Consequently, this Court lacks pendent appellate jurisdiction over that argument.").

Nuens v. City of Columbus, 303 F.3d 667, 670 (6th Cir. 2002) ("Because the District Court denied Bridges' summary judgment motion on qualified immunity grounds, our court has jurisdiction over his appeal with respect to the issue of qualified immunity. However, we are not required to confine our review to the viability of the qualified immunity defense. . . Having jurisdiction over the qualified immunity issue also entitles us to review whether Neuens put forth a prima facie § 1983 claim. . . .[W]e conclude that the district court erred in denying Bridges' motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity. If after its independent review the district court concludes that Bridges did not act under color of state law, we instruct the district court to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief may granted. Furthermore, where no action was taken under color of state law, the district court need not reach the issue of qualified immunity.").

Klein v. Long, 275 F.3d 544, 549, 550 (6th Cir. 2001) ("In this case, the district court did not explicitly deny a claim of qualified immunity. However, because the district court recognized that the defendants were presenting the affirmative defense of qualified immunity at the hearing on defendants' motion for summary judgment and because the court denied defendants' motion for reconsideration/rehearing based on qualified immunity, the district court effectively denied defendants' claim of qualified immunity. . . . The defendants in this case concede that we must view the facts as alleged by Klein. . . We therefore have jurisdiction to review the district court's denial of summary judgment to determine whether, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Klein, the defendants violated Klein's clearly established rights.").

Claybrook v. Birchwell, 274 F.3d 1098, 1103-05 (6th Cir. 2001) (appeal after remand) ("As noted above, the defendants concede that there are disputed facts in the record. The most important of these is the disparity between the testimony of the officers and that of Quintana Claybrook as to whether the first shot in the initial volley of bullets was fired by one of the officers or by Claybrook. On appeal, the officers argue that this conflict in testimony is immaterial, as precedent requires that this court 'carve up' an excessive force claim into a series of temporal components and consider only the reasonableness of defendants actions in the instant before they fired the shot that mortally wounded Claybrook. . . We believe, however, that this view too narrowly construes the relevant circuit precedent and that, instead, we must consider the reasonableness of the defendants' actions in this case from the moment the first shot was fired. . . . The defendants here are correct in their assertion that, under Boyd and Dickerson, we must analyze the events surrounding Claybrook's death in temporal segments. However, the defendants' assertion that the holdings of these cases mandate that we look only at what occurred in the moments immediately before Claybrook was fatally shot in the head too narrowly construes the cases' holdings. The 'segmenting' rules of Boyd and Dickerson divided the analysis of the use of deadly force from the analysis of possible erroneous actions taken by the officers prior to shots being fired. In Dickerson, this meant that the court found irrelevant to the claim of excessive force analysis whether the police officers had unlawfully failed to announce their presence in Dickerson's home prior to shots being fired. In Boyd, the court refrained from considering whether Boyd was, in fact, the suspect of the call to which the officers were responding and whether he had fired any shots that evening, instead limiting its analysis to the reasonableness of the officers firing at Boyd in light of their testimony that he had pointed a gun at them. In both cases, we divided prior events from those immediately preceding the use of force. Here, we note, the evening's events are not so easily divided. The defendants view those events in two segments, the first extending from the officers' decision to enter the F & J Market's parking lot and confront Claybrook through the initial firefight between the officers and Claybrook, and the second beginning when Claybrook ran around the market to hide behind the concrete steps and ending with the shots that killed him. They argue that we are concerned only with the second sequence of events and must make our determination based only upon the reasonableness of the officers firing at Claybrook after he had positioned himself behind the concrete steps and pointed a gun at the officers. The defendants contend that the reasonableness of their actions in approaching Claybrook out of uniform and in an unmarked car, demanding that he drop his weapon without identifying themselves as police officers, and opening fire on Claybrook, are irrelevant to this analysis. We simply disagree with their contention that the initial exchange of bullets should not weigh upon our analysis. Under the precedent of Dickerson and Boyd, we instead conclude that the evening's events are properly viewed in three segments: first, the officers' approach and confrontation of Claybrook; second, the initial firefight taking place in front of the market; and third, the shots fired after Claybrook's move to a position behind the concrete steps. Moreover, we conclude that all events taking place in the second and third segments are material to our analysis. Although the officers' decision to approach Claybrook in the manner that they did was in clear contravention of Metro Nashville Police Department policy regarding procedures for undercover officers, under Dickerson, any unreasonableness of their actions at that point may not weigh in consideration of the use of excessive force. . . However, the defendants contend that we should also exclude from our consideration the reasonableness of the force used in the initial firefight between the officers and Claybrook. Yet, the plaintiffs brought suit to contest all use of deadly force against their deceased father, not only the shot that took his life. Therefore, we must consider the reasonableness of force used in both the second and third segments of the evening's events. In other words, the defendants cannot ignore the fact that shots were fired at Claybrook twice on the night in question. In the first instance, Claybrook was fired upon by unidentified, non-uniformed officers whom Quintana Claybrook, and likely Royal Claybrook also, thought to be robbing the market. Regardless of whether the shots fired at Royal Claybrook were warranted after he had fled to a position behind the concrete steps and aimed his gun at the officers, this initial fire fight also constitutes deadly force used against Claybrook by the officers. Therefore, we must analyze its reasonableness to determine whether this use of force was excessive under the circumstances. . . Critical to the analysis of the reasonableness of the use of deadly force in this initial confrontation is the determination of who fired the first shot. Because this fact remains in dispute at this point in the proceedings, we conclude that we do not have jurisdiction to proceed under Johnson v. Jones.").

Frantz v. Village of Bradford, 245 F.3d 869, 877 (6th Cir. 2001) ("[W]e hold that plaintiff here cannot bring a separate constitutional claim for malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment. Thus, we deny appellant's request for qualified immunity on the grounds that plaintiff cannot bring, as a separate claim, the claim from which appellant seeks immunity. For the same reason, we dismiss this appeal. Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claims are still pending before the district court and must be addressed there, consistent with this opinion.").

Scott v. Clay County, 205 F.3d 867, 879 (6th Cir. 2000) ("[O]ur conclusion that no officer-defendant had deprived the plaintiff of any constitutional right a fortiori defeats the claim against the County as well. . . Ergo, this court, in its discretionary exercise of pendent party appellate jurisdiction over the appellant Clay County, further directs that the plaintiff's federal claims against it shall be dismissed.").

Hoard v. Sizemore, 198 F.3d 205, 221, 222 (6th Cir. 1999) ("For the purpose of considering whether, in light of its resolution of the qualified immunity issues, we can and should assert pendent appellate jurisdiction in this case, it is necessary to place the plaintiffs' claims into two categories: (1) the claims of the four plaintiffs who fall within the Branti exception and therefore fail to assert a constitutional violation, and (2) the claims of the 15 plaintiffs over which this court has no jurisdiction because there remains an issue of fact as to defendant Sizemore's motivation. The defendants' appeal as to the Branti plaintiffs presents 'the quintessential case for application of pendent jurisdiction,' calling for an 'exercise [of] our discretion to do so in the interest of judicial economy.' . . . . A city or county and its leaders may not be held liable when there has been no constitutional violation by one of the city or county's employees. . . . We therefore hold that the claims of [the] four plaintiffs against the 'pendent' defendants must be dismissed, because the plaintiffs' failure to establish a constitutional violation disposes of any liability on the part of these defendants. However, having concluded that we do not have jurisdiction to consider Sizemore's appeal of the district court's denial of his motion for summary judgment as to the final 15 plaintiffs, because there are genuine issues of material fact as to his motivation for discharging them, we cannot assert pendent appellate jurisdiction over the appeal of the remaining defendants concerning the claims of these 15 plaintiffs.").

Ellis v. Washington County and Johnson City, 198 F.3d 225, 229 (6th Cir. 1999) ("The question then comes down to this: In a qualified immunity appeal by a state official, should the court of appeals look behind a Johnson v. Jones type factual dispute to determine if the factual dispute is based only on uncorroborated hearsay that will not be admissible at trial. We would prefer to avoid these kinds of evidentiary issues when ruling on our jurisdiction to decide qualified immunity under Johnson v. Jones . . . . [T]he only factual dispute in this case arises from the rankest type of inadmissible hearsay. Based on the Sheriff's deposition, the statement to the press was unreliable and inadmissible in evidence. No exception to the hearsay rule would let it in. Nonetheless, restrained as we are by Johnson, we must dismiss Jamerson's appeal because a factual dispute remains.").

Williams v. Mehra, 186 F.3d 685, 695, 696 (6th Cir. 1999) (en banc) (Merritt, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part) ("In the panel decision in this case, the majority opinion and Judge Boggs' dissenting opinion spend most of the 35 pages of opinions arguing over the facts. The facts are complex and detailed. There are no stipulations of facts by the parties and the parties do not agree as to what the facts are. Thus it seems to me that under the authority of Johnson v. Jones this case should be dismissed for lack of appellate jurisdiction. The Court tries to get around the obvious problem of appellate jurisdiction by two little sleight-of-hand tricks. First, the court says that 'plaintiff's facts [were] admitted by defendants for purposes of this appeal,' thereby attempting to eliminate any factual issue by asserting that the defendants have conceded or in effect stipulated the facts for purposes of arguing the 'deliberate indifference' legal issue on which qualified immunity depends. The second trick used by the court is simply to find various facts against the plaintiff. For example, the court says: 'To make this case, plaintiff would need to show that the doctors actually knew that dispensing Sinequan tablets in a pill line constituted an excessive risk to Wade's health or safety. We hold that as a matter of law, plaintiff has not done this.' Thus the court says that as a matter of fact-finding the doctors did not have the requisite state of mind to meet the standard of deliberate indifference because they did not have the requisite knowledge. Plaintiff contends that the facts when taken together circumstantially prove that the doctors knew the necessary facts and thus had the requisite state of mind. Thus the first trick is to assume anyway the facts and the second trick the court employs is simply to find the facts against the plaintiff. This is not what the Supreme Court had in mind when it decided Johnson v. Jones, supra, and admonished federal appellate courts not to get involved in interlocutory appeals when the district court has found a genuine issue of fact concerning appellate jurisdiction.").

Mattox v. City of Forest Park, 183 F.3d 515, 523, 524 (6th Cir. 1999) ("If the plaintiffs have failed to state a claim for violation of a constitutional right at all, then the City of Forest Park cannot be held liable for violating that right any more than the individual defendants can. The inquiry is precisely the same in both cases, and the justification for the decision in Swint is not present here. This court has used pendent appellate jurisdiction under circumstances similar to the case sub judice in Brennan v. Township of Northville, 78 F.3d 1152 (6th Cir.1996). In Brennan, the court decided that the plaintiff had not alleged a constitutional violation, and that decision indisputably resolved the other issue appealed–the grant of summary judgment on liability to the plaintiff. . . Without alleging a constitutional violation, Brennan could not receive summary judgment on his § 1983 claim. In fact, the Brennan court remarked on the very scenario present here–the city in that case also had been adjudged liable on summary judgment for violating Brennan's constitutional rights, and the court indicated that it would have reached the city's claim as well, but for the fact that the city was not a party to the appeal and its summary judgment motion could not be reviewed. Neither Brennan nor today's decision is contrary to Swint, which left open the possibility that two determinations (one immediately appealable and one not) could be 'inextricably intertwined' and thus appropriately reviewed together.").

Berryman v. Rieger, 150 F.3d 561, 562-65 (6th Cir. 1998) ("We hold that in order for. . . an interlocutory appeal based on qualified immunity to lie, the defendant must be prepared to overlook any factual dispute and to concede an interpretation of the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff's case. Here the defendants have not so conceded the facts. The appeal should not have been filed because there is clearly a factual dispute at the heart of the qualified immunity issue, and so we dismiss this interlocutory appeal. Moreover, in light of the fact that three and a half years ago a panel of this Court sent this case, originally filed in 1992, back to the District Court pointing out in detail that there are genuine issues of material fact for trial on the constitutional tort claims at issue, . . . we impose upon the defendants double costs and attorney's fees under 28 U.S.C. § 1912 for bringing this appeal and unnecessarily protracting the litigation. . . . A defendant who is denied qualified immunity may file an interlocutory appeal with this Court only if that appeal involves the abstract or pure legal issue of whether the facts alleged by the plaintiff constitute a violation of clearly established law. . . . If the defendant does not dispute the facts alleged by the plaintiff for purposes of the appeal, 'our jurisdiction is clear.' Dickerson v. McClellan, 101 F.3d 1151, 1157 (6th Cir.1996). If, instead, the defendant disputes the plaintiff's version of the story, the defendant must nonetheless be willing to concede the most favorable view of the facts to the plaintiff for purposes of the appeal. Id. Only if the undisputed facts or the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff fail to establish a prima facie violation of clear constitutional law may we decide that the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity on an interlocutory appeal. . . . As this case illustrates, we often cannot adequately assess our jurisdiction to hear interlocutory appeals on qualified immunity until the appeal is fully briefed and argued. We have learned by experience that defendants sometimes attempt simply to protract the litigation and manipulate the fact-law distinction drawn by Mitchell, Johnson, and Behrens to create the appearance of jurisdiction. Only by testing that presentation with the fully fleshed arguments of an adversary and our skeptical questioning of counsel can we divide the legal from the factual. Given the difficult inquiry required under Mitchell, Johnson, and Behrens in all but the clearest circumstances, normally the safest course would be for the parties to address the jurisdictional issues along with the merits in their briefs and for this Court to postpone a final decision on jurisdiction until the case is argued. In the future, a defendant who wishes to file such an appeal after being denied qualified immunity should be prepared to concede the best view of the facts to the plaintiff and discuss only the legal issues raised by the case. Such a defendant will have a solid jurisdictional position if the defendant claims the plaintiff cannot show a violation of clearly established law even assuming everything alleged is true. Once a defendant's argument drifts from the purely legal into the factual realm and begins contesting what really happened, our jurisdiction ends and the case should proceed to trial. That is exactly what happened in this case. Because the defendants' appeal attempts to persuade us to believe their version of the facts, we must dismiss the appeal. Where it clearly appears, as here, that the defendant is unnecessarily protracting the litigation, the court should consider imposing double costs and attorney's fees as a deterrent.").

Chappel v. Montgomery County Fire Protection District No. 1, 131 F.3d 564, 572-73 (6th Cir. 1997) ("Where . . . what is at issue includes abstract questions of law which this court has jurisdiction to consider, it is an open question whether this court will also exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over related questions of fact. . . . [W]e fully intend to consider the defendants' legal argument that, even on the facts taken in the light most favorable to Chappel, Chappel has failed to state a claim under section 1983. This consideration, however, is far different from a reconsideration of the district court's conclusion that certain material facts are genuinely in dispute. Moreover, even if we have the discretionary authority to exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over the district court's finding regarding the sufficiency of the evidence, we decline to exercise our discretion in this case.").

Turner v. Scott, 119 F.3d 425, 428 (6th Cir. 1997) ("If we determine, as we do here, that asserted factual disputes are not material, what remains for decision is a purely legal issue. If it were otherwise a district court could always insulate its qualified immunity rulings from interlocutory review by mouthing the appropriate shibboleth. Such a result would jeopardize the immunity from suit that the qualified immunity doctrine is designed to protect.").

Turner v. Scott, 119 F.3d 425, 430-33 (6th Cir. 1997) (Cohn, District Judge, dissenting) ("In the guise of a claim of qualified immunity, defendant Scott has persuaded the majority to allow his appeal as of right from a claim that there is no genuine issue of material fact over the assertion that he stood by and allowed a fellow officer to assault plaintiff in circumstances where he could have prevented the assault. . . . The majority has conflated the principles of qualified immunity with the principles governing conventional summary judgment. The majority opinion is directly contrary to the Supreme Court's decision in Johnson v. Jones. . . . Here the district judge was dealing with rather conventional principles of § 1983 law, working in a fact-intensive environment. The district judge simply ignored the qualified immunity defense since it appeared to be a 'make-weight' argument and an afterthought. The majority is using the defense of qualified immunity to enable it, on an interlocutory appeal, to reverse the district judge's decision denying summary judgment, because the majority does not find a genuine issue over the extent of Scott's knowledge of his fellow officer's attack on plaintiff and his ability to intervene to prevent it. . . .Scott's summary judgment motion, and the district judge's denial of it, clearly and unequivocally regarded the existence of a material fact, namely whether Scott had any knowledge of the assault on plaintiff by his fellow officer. . . . The substantive question in this appeal is not, as the majority puts it, a 'neat abstract issue of law.'. . . This is certainly a 'we didn't do it' case, as Justice Breyer puts it in Johnson. . . . The suggestion that it is necessary for the Court of Appeals to always independently examine the record to determine whether there is a genuine issue of material fact to prevent a district court from "insulat[ing] its qualified immunity rulings from interlocutory review by mouthing the appropriate shibboleth" . . . is not well taken. District court judges take the same oath as do court of appeals judges, and in my experience observe the same principles of adjudication.").

Turner v. Scott, 119 F.3d 425, 429 n.3 (6th Cir. 1997) ("The dissent's conclusion that the order in question here is not immediately appealable stems, we think, from a failure to recognize the significance of the threshold inquiry. The issue on a claim of qualified immunity is not solely whether the right alleged to be violated was clearly established. Rather, as we have said, the first step in the qualified immunity analysis is to determine whether any right has been violated at all. This is the unmistakable holding of Siegert–and nothing in Johnson purports to eliminate the first step. The Siegert framework explains why Officer Scott is entitled to an immediate appeal if we conclude as a matter of law that no reasonable jury could find that Officer Scott violated any right of Mrs. Turner. The Siegert framework also explains why it was appropriate for the parties' lawyers and the district court to focus on the facts of the squad room incident, as they did at the summary judgment hearing.").

Nichols v. City of Parma, No. 96-3931, 1997 WL 289673, *2, *3 (6th Cir. May 28, 1997) (unpublished) ("The defendants have limited their appeal to the narrow question of whether they are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the plaintiffs' wrongful arrest and detention claims. . . . The difficulty we face in this case is that the district court has not identified those facts that the plaintiff has supported with sufficient evidence and that implicitly supported the court's denial of summary judgment. The Supreme Court has suggested that in this situation a circuit court may 'undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.'. . . We believe that the better procedure here is for the district to make this determination in the first instance and to provide findings and conclusions sufficiently detailed to facilitate efficient appellate review. The district court, after studying the Behrens and Johnson cases, should set out the facts that it is assuming in denying qualified immunity or conduct an evidentiary hearing on this issue in order to make findings and conclusions on the immunity issue. We therefore remand this case to the district court for further proceedings.").

Dickerson v. McClellan, 101 F.3d 1151, 1157 (6th Cir. 1996) ("[R]egardless of the district court's reasons for denying qualified immunity, we may exercise jurisdiction over the officers' appeal to the extent it raises questions of law. Since the facts regarding whether the officers violated Dickerson's Fourth Amendment rights by failing to knock and announce are undisputed, our jurisdiction is clear. On the other hand, we review the excessive force claim only to determine whether, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the officers violated Dickerson's clearly established rights. If we conclude that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law on the excessive force claim and that genuine issues of material fact exist, we are without jurisdiction to proceed.").

McCloud v. Testa, 97 F.3d 1536, 1545-46 (6th Cir. 1996) ("Our decision to exercise jurisdiction in this case is supported by Blair v. Meade . . . where the court held that it had interlocutory jurisdiction to consider the appeal of a district court's denial of qualified immunity in a patronage case, despite the fact that the district court thought there were disputed issues of motivation, because, regardless of the factual dispute, the plaintiffs did not have a valid claim under the First Amendment. . . . First, we hold we have jurisdiction to review Testa's purely legal argument that he is entitled to qualified immunity because the discharge of members of one faction of the same party by a member of another faction of the same party, where the factions are associational groups only, and have no particular ideology, is not a violation of clearly established First Amendment rights. Second, we hold that we have jurisdiction to review Testa's argument that the law was not sufficiently clear that plaintiffs' positions did not fall into the Branti exception.").

Archie v. Lanier, 95 F.3d 438, 443 (6th Cir. 1996) ("It seems clear that Swint intended to restrict discretionary appellate jurisdiction, rather than to expand it. The Court did not intend to enlarge the already narrow categories of interlocutory appeals when it stated that nonappealable questions may be addressed if they are "inextricably intertwined" with the issue that is appealable. Given the extent to which the Court engaged in a thorough explanation of the limited nature of appellate jurisdiction, the "inextricably intertwined" requirement was not meant to be loosely applied as a matter of discretion. Rather, the terms can only be understood, in the context of the opinion, to mean that pendent jurisdiction may be exercised only when the immunity issues absolutely cannot be resolved without addressing the nonappealable collateral issues.").

Noble v. Schmitt, 87 F.3d 157, 163 (6th Cir. 1996) ("Defendants' Forsyth appeal in this case presents the precise evidence sufficiency issues that the Court declined to entertain in Johnson. They argue that Noble's evidence does not prove that Schmitt forcibly medicated and restrained Noble, that Stevens formed a strategy to provoke Noble to act out, or that Defendants restricted Noble's privileges to retaliate against him for filing grievances against them. This '"we didn't do it"' argument is irrelevant to this appeal.").

Brennan v. Township of Northville, 78 F.3d 1152, 1158 (6th Cir. 1996) ("This case . . . presents a situation in which the holding on qualified immunity–that plaintiff has failed to raise a constitutional claim–has everything to do with the merits of the summary judgment in favor of plaintiff: without a constitutional claim, the judgment for Brennan simply cannot stand . . . . As this appeal presents the quintessential case for application of pendent appellate jurisdiction, we exercise our discretion to do so in the interest of judicial economy. We reverse the partial summary judgment in favor of Brennan on the issue of liability, at least as it applies to the police officer defendants. A distinct problem remains with respect to the township of Northville, however. Northville is not a party to this appeal, although the summary judgment for Brennan applies equally to it as a defendant. . . . [B]ecause Northville has not been made a party here, . . . we will not extend pendent appellate jurisdiction to the judgment against it.").

Blair v. Meade, 76 F.3d 97, 102 (6th Cir. 1996) (Ryan, J., dissenting) (district court had denied immunity on ground that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendant was motivated by plaintiffs' political affiliations when he refused to rehire them; majority of panel reversed on ground that even if plaintiffs' terminations were politically motivated, plaintiffs stated no constitutional claim. Judge Ryan thought there was no jurisdiction over the appeal. "Indisputably, in this case the district court's basis for denying the defendant's request for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity was the existence of a factual dispute as to Meade's motivation for terminating the plaintiffs. While I agree with the majority that the district court's analysis may have been misguided, that does not lead me to the conclusion that this court is entitled to take jurisdiction over the appeal in order to determine whether there is another basis on which we can resolve the case without reference to the factual dispute that was the district court's basis. Irrespective of whether the district court's opinion was a model of qualified immunity analysis, the pertinent issue is whether the decision of the district court that was appealed, is appealable. Since the basis for the denial was the existence of a disputed fact, it was not.").

Hundley v. Parker, 69 F.3d 537 (Table), No. 95-5399, 1995 WL 646500, *6 (6th Cir. Nov. 2, 1995) ("[D]efendants' appeal of the district court's denial of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity as to plaintiff's right to be protected by prison officials from violence caused by other inmates is dismissed because the district court found that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to this issue.").

Sanderfer v. Nichols, 62 F.3d 151, 153 n.2 (6th Cir. 1995) ("Although the district court in the case at bar phrased its denial of qualified immunity in terms of finding more 'than a scintilla' of evidence supporting a constitutional violation by Jansen, this order is immediately reviewable because, as discussed below, the plaintiff's version of events, regardless of the sufficiency of the supporting evidence, does not state a claim for such a violation.").

Christophel v. Kukulinsky, 61 F.3d 479, 485 (6th Cir. 1995) ("The right to appeal is limited to questions of law . . . and a defendant entitled to invoke a qualified immunity defense may not appeal the denial of a motion for summary judgment if the district court's order determines only whether the record reflects genuine issues of fact for trial.[citing Johnson] A defendant's right to appeal the denial of qualified immunity does not turn on the phrasing of the district court's order, however. Even when the district court denies summary judgment without stating its reasons for doing so, a court of appeals may decide the legal question underlying the qualified immunity defense. [cite omitted] Although the district court's denial of defendants' motion for summary judgment in this case was premised in part on the existence of fact issues, the factual dispute does not affect defendants' right to qualified immunity. The legal question squarely presented by defendants' motion was whether the facts alleged by Christophel demonstrate that defendants violated her constitutional right to procedural due process, thus negating defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity from suit.").

Bunch v. Village of New Lebanon, 57 F.3d 1069 (Table), Nos. 94-4098, 94-4141, 1995 WL 329260, *2 (6th Cir. May 31, 1995) (entertaining appeal and affirming district court's denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity and district court's conclusion that "when there are 'factual disputes surrounding a shooting such that the reasonableness of the shooting cannot be determined without determining which of competing versions of the facts are true, the reasonableness of the shooting and the applicability of the qualified immunity become questions for the jury.'" (quoting district court)).

McLaurin v. Morton, 48 F.3d 944, 949 (6th Cir. 1995) (holding denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity is immediately appealable even where other § 1983 damage claim will proceed to trial despite successful appeal).

Black v. Parke, 4 F.3d 442, 445 (6th Cir. 1993) ("Although this case is properly before us on interlocutory appeal of the qualified immunity determination, we cannot confine our review to the qualified immunity defense alone. In Carlson v. Conklin . . . we held that we first must decide whether the plaintiff has stated a section 1983 claim against the individual defendants before addressing the qualified immunity question.").

Wheatt v. City of East Cleveland, No. 1:17-CV-377, 2017 WL 6031816, at *1 n.7 (N.D. Ohio Dec. 6, 2017) ("The Court's qualified immunity decisions seek 'to shield officials from harassment, distraction, and liability when they perform their duties reasonably.'. . And Forsyth's allowing some interlocutory appeals sought to reduce distracting discovery and trials. But, Forsyth wrongly assumed that qualified immunity defenses would limit the nonfinancial burdens associated with discovery. It has not. In an exhausting study, Professor Joanna Schwartz examined over 1,100 Section 1983 cases in five representative districts, including the Northern District of Ohio. She found 'just 0.6% of cases were dismissed at the motion to dismiss stage and 2.6% were dismissed at summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds.' Joanna C. Schwartz, How Qualified Immunity Fails 127 Yale L.J. 2, 7 (2017). Important for deciding whether Forsyth's occasional grant of interlocutory appeal rights makes sense, Schwartz found that defendants almost always otherwise incurred defense and discovery costs before qualified immunity defenses become ripe. Regarding qualified immunity, 'available evidence suggests that qualified immunity is not achieving its policy objectives; the doctrine is unnecessary to protect government officials from financial liability and illsuited to shield government officials from discovery and trial in most filed cases. Qualified immunity may, in fact, increase the costs and delays associated with constitutional litigation.' . . Qualified immunity does not shield government officials from litigation headaches. And interlocutory appeals exacerbate governmental expenses. Here, this case will likely be tried in less than four days. Defendants may win. And even if defendants lose at trial, an appellate court can examine the same immunity issues, only on a more complete record. An interlocutory appeal worsens government expenses, it does not lessen them.")

Wheatt v. City of East Cleveland, No. 1:17-CV-377, 2017 WL 6031816, at *2-5 (N.D. Ohio Dec. 6, 2017) ("An appeal is frivolous when the defendant's argument for immunity refused to accept the plaintiff's version of the facts. . . When a court denies immunity because one version of disputed facts would allow a plaintiff to recover, it is because the court found that defendant's presented version of the facts was disputed, and a trial must settle these factual disputes. . .Plaintiffs argue that is what occurred here. They argue that both the City Defendants' and County Defendants' summary judgment immunity arguments refused to accept Plaintiffs' version of the facts, and so any interlocutory appeal is frivolous. The Court agrees. . . .The City Defendants solely argued that no constitutional violation occurred based on their version of the facts. Although Plaintiffs bear the burden of proving that a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity, that burden only arises if the City Defendants actually raise the defense. The Court finds that the City Defendants failed to raise qualified immunity as a defense and that the Court's denial of their summary judgment was based on a finding that material disputes of fact existed. For these reasons, the Court GRANTS Plaintiffs' motion to certify the City Defendants' interlocutory appeal as frivolous. . . . Finally, this Court recognizes that courts often allow interlocutory appeals of qualified and absolute immunity decisions. . . However, years of experience and the exhaustive empirical study described above undermines the Supreme Court's reasoning for allowing this exception to the final judgment rule. Interlocutory appeals of immunity under Forsyth sought to reduce the disruption of governmental functions and to reduce litigation expenses caused by incorrect district court decisions. . .In Mitchell v. Forsyth, the case that created this final judgment rule exception, both of these justifications supported allowing an interlocutory appeal. The Mitchell plaintiff had sued the Attorney General of the United States. The Attorney General raised immunity defenses at the start of the litigation, and before discovery. Allowing interlocutory appeal in Forsyth potentially saved both the Attorney General and the Department of Justice hundreds or thousands of hours of distraction and expense when the constitutional right was discreet. Mitchell, however, is wildly atypical. Typically civil rights lawsuits with immunity issues involve claims against relatively low-level government officers, such as a police officer with minimal supervisory authority. Law suit disruption to governmental functions is minimal. Additionally, and perhaps more importantly, few defendants raise immunity at early stages of the litigation, if they raise that defense at all. . . Because plaintiffs can plead a clearly established constitutional violation with relative ease, immunity is typically argued on summary judgment, which occurs near discovery's end. . . At that point, an interlocutory appeal saves only the distraction and expense associated with trial. These savings are minimal, however, because the Courts of Appeals affirm district courts' denials of immunity at astoundingly high rates. . . In the typical case, allowing interlocutory appeals actually increases the burden and expense of litigation both for government officers and for plaintiffs. Additional expense and burden result because an interlocutory appeal adds another round of substantive briefing for both parties, potentially oral argument before an appellate panel, and usually more than twelve months of delay while waiting for an appellate decision. All of this happens in place of a trial that (1) could have finished in less than a week, and (2) will often be conducted anyway after the interlocutory appeal. And importantly, Section 1983 defendants win many trials. These wins both vindicate the defendants and avoid the appeal's expense. In the Judiciary Act of 1789, the Founders considered and wisely adopted the final judgment rule with few exceptions. The final judgment rule is central to the efficient administration of justice and, absent important reasons, should control. This case provides an especially potent example of the imprudent nature of interlocutory appeals. Plaintiffs in this case were originally convicted in 1996, and an Ohio court overturned that conviction in 2014. In between those dates, Plaintiffs, the State of Ohio, the City of East Cleveland, the Ohio and federal courts, and numerous prosecutors, defense attorneys, and hired experts have spent an untold number of hours and dollars attempting to do justice both for these three men, and for Clifton Hudson, the victim of the crime Plaintiffs' were convicted of. An interlocutory appeal could delay this case for more than a year. Although the Defendants are all retired government officers, they are nevertheless represented by current city and state attorneys. This extra year of appellate litigation will undoubtedly consume considerable state and city resources. Moreover, no matter the outcome of the trial, an appeal will almost assuredly follow. As such, the court of appeals will likely have to address the issues in this case twice, potentially doubling the briefing, travel, and general preparation expenses of both the parties and the Sixth Circuit. . . For the preceding reasons, the Court GRANTS Plaintiffs' motions to certify Defendants' appeals as frivolous. The Court DECLINES TO STAY the trial of this matter pending appeal.")

Ohio Sept. 20, 2018) ("On November 9, 2017, the Court held that the City Defendants had waived their right to assert a qualified immunity defense. Defendants appealed, and successfully moved to stay trial proceedings during the pendency of the Sixth Circuit appeal. On July 12, 2018, the Sixth Circuit affirmed the Court's holding that the City Defendants had forfeited their claim to qualified immunity. The Sixth Circuit issued its mandate on August 6, 2018. On the same day, Plaintiffs moved the Court to set a trial date. On July 20, 2018, the City Defendants filed a petition for a writ of certiorari with the Supreme Court of the United States. This petition was docketed on August 30, 2018. Defendants did not move to stay the Sixth Circuit's mandate under Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 41(d)(2), nor have they moved the Supreme Court to stay proceedings under 28 U.S.C. § 2101(f) and Supreme Court Rule 23. . . Defendants now argue that the filing and docketing of the cert petition deprives the Court of jurisdiction to conduct a trial.
Defendants are incorrect. The issuance of a mandate 'transfer[s] jurisdiction of the case back to the District Court,' and the filing of a cert petition does not automatically stay district court proceedings. Unless the Sixth Circuit recalls its mandate, or the City Defendants obtain a stay, the Court enjoys the jurisdiction it reacquired upon issuance of the mandate to proceed to trial. . . .For the forgoing reasons, the Court GRANTS Plaintiffs' motion to set a trial date. Trial is set for November 13, 2018 at 8:00 a. m.")

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Stewardson v. Biggs, 43 F.4th 732, 734 (7th Cir. 2022) ("We have explained many times that we do not have jurisdiction to review qualified immunity denials on interlocutory appeal when the district court's decision, or the appellant's arguments, turn on disputes of material fact. . . Yet we continue to receive appeals from officers who challenge district court orders denying them qualified immunity because of disputed facts. So, we repeat: we may review district court orders denying qualified immunity on interlocutory appeal only when the appellant brings 'a purely legal argument that does not depend on disputed facts.'")

Bayon v. Berkebile, 29 F.4th 850, 855-56 (7th Cir. 2022) ("[T]here remain serious questions about the degree of resistance, if any, that Mr. Bayon displayed at the time the officers acted. . . Mr. Siler 'had refused every opportunity to surrender during the chase.'. . While Mr. Bayon failed to surrender during the car chase, the facts could support a finding that, upon exiting the vehicle, he was surrendering and reaching for his identification. The officers contend that Mr. Bayon was not subdued or under control at the time of the shooting, but as the district court correctly determined, a reasonable jury could find otherwise. The officers are not asking us to accept the 'facts assumed by the district court, supplemented as appropriate only by the undisputed evidence viewed in the light most favorable to [Mr. Bayon].'. .Instead, the officers' legal arguments are premised on their version of the facts, which the district court correctly determined were genuinely disputed. '[O]ur appellate jurisdiction is secure only if the relevant material facts are undisputed or (what amounts to the same thing) when the defendant accepts the plaintiff's version of the facts as true for now.'. . Therefore, as we have noted earlier, a party may not seek to invoke our jurisdiction when its arguments are dependent on, and inseparable from, disputed facts. . . Although the officers suggest otherwise, they 'are not asking us for review of an abstract question of law, but rather they seek a reassessment of the district court's conclusion that sufficient evidence existed for [Bayon] to go to trial.'. . Here, the parties disagree as to what exactly happened after Mr. Bayon exited the vehicle and prior to the gunshots being fired. Did Mr. Bayon pose a threat to a reasonable officer after he exited his vehicle? How immediate was the threat? Did he continue to resist arrest? These issues present the "uncertainties and unresolved material questions of fact" that must be resolved by a factfinder before liability can be assessed. . . 'These factual disputes bear on the objective reasonableness of the force used to arrest Mr. [Bayon], and therefore a trial is required before a determination can be made as to whether [the officers are] entitled to qualified immunity.'. . Because they remain unresolved at this juncture, we cannot entertain an appeal based on whether, as a matter of law, the defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity.") Lovelace v. Gibson, 21 F.4th 481, 488-89 (7th Cir. 2021) ("[O]ur limited collateral-order jurisdiction does not extend to the resolution of disputes of material fact. We recognize only one qualification to that principle, 'when the officer seeking immunity is willing to take the factual issues off the table and accept (for purposes of the qualified immunity motion) the factual account plaintiff has presented.' Estate of Davis v. Ortiz, 987 F.3d 635, 639 (7th Cir. 2021). But if we detect a 'backdoor effort to contest the facts,' we will dismiss the appeal for lack of jurisdiction. . . Put another way, 'an appellant challenging a district court's denial of qualified immunity effectively pleads himself out of court by interposing disputed factual issues in his argument.'. . . Whether there was probable cause on this record to support Curt's arrest and pretrial detention depends on how one weighs competing evidence and on whom one finds credible. But those are questions for a jury, not for us. Accordingly, we lack jurisdiction to address the officers' qualified immunity from Count II. . . Our analysis of the Fourteenth Amendment theory is different. No jurisdictional problem stands in the way of our consideration of this ground for appeal. Gibson and Keller asserted qualified immunity from Curt's Brady and evidence-fabrication theories explicitly, and the district court rejected those assertions just as explicitly. We thus have a true collateral order in hand. On appeal, Curt has conceded that his Fourteenth Amendment claim is 'not cognizable' under the current state of the law in this Circuit, see Lewis v. City of Chicago, 914 F.3d 472, 478 (7th Cir. 2019) and Kuri v. City of Chicago, 990 F.3d 573, 575 (7th Cir. 2021), but he has preserved for further review the question whether a Brady claim can be asserted by someone whose case ended in a mistrial, or someone was detained for a lengthy period in part because the prosecution failed to turn over exculpatory evidence. This concession does not implicate any dispute of material fact, and so we may entertain it now. Nothing more need be said: based on the concession, on remand the officers are entitled to qualified immunity from Count I. Only the legal theory, however, is out of the case. We do not understand Curt to be conceding any issue of fact that underlies his Fourteenth Amendment argument. If and when this case goes to trial on Count II and the other remaining claims, Curt may continue to allege that Gibson and Keller fabricated, manipulated, and withheld evidence, subject only to the ordinary relevance standards imposed by the Federal Rules of Evidence, as applied to his Fourth Amendment theory. And he may continue to argue that such conduct resulted in his detention without probable cause.")

Ferguson v. McDonough, 13 F.4th 574, 579-84 (7th Cir. 2021) ("An interlocutory order denying qualified immunity does not constitute a final decision on the defendant's right not to stand trial when the district court denies summary judgment on the ground that factual disputes exist which prevent the resolution of the qualified immunity defense, see Levan v. George, 604 F.3d 366, 369 (7th Cir. 2010)—just like the district court did here. The law is clear that such an order is not immediately appealable under the collateral order doctrine. . . . The law is also clear that an appellate court reviewing such an order may not 'reconsider the district court's determination that certain genuine issues of fact exist,' or 'make conclusions about which facts the parties ultimately might be able to establish at trial.'. . To establish appellate jurisdiction, then, the appellant must raise 'a purely legal argument that does not depend on disputed facts.'. . This means that an appellant who is challenging a district court's denial of qualified immunity 'must accept the facts and reasonable inferences favorable to the plaintiff or the facts assumed by the district court's decision.'. . Put differently, appellate jurisdiction is improper when the appellant's otherwise appealable legal argument is 'dependent upon, and inseparable from, disputed facts.'. . There is, however, one 'narrow, pragmatic exception' that allows an appellant to challenge the district court's determination that genuine issues of fact exist: when a video of the incident 'utterly discredit[s]' the district court's finding that a genuine factual dispute prevents the resolution of the defendant's qualified immunity defense on summary judgment. . . Our jurisdiction in this case therefore depends on whether the dashcam video utterly discredits the district court's finding that one view of the video supports that Ferguson was not actively resisting arrest when Officer McDonough tased him. . . . We have carefully reviewed Officer McDonough's dashcam video and have determined that this case is not like Scott and Dockery because the dashcam video of Ferguson's arrest does not utterly discredit the district court's finding that a genuine issue of fact exists as to whether Ferguson was actively resisting arrest when Officer McDonough tased him. Portions of the video are clear, but the rest is open to interpretation, as the district court found. . . . Because Officer McDonough's arguments ask us to resolve disputed issues of fact and the dashcam video does not utterly discredit the district court's findings, we lack jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal. . . . At trial, a jury may resolve disputed facts in Officer McDonough's favor, and the district court could then determine he is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. Id.; see also Taylor v. City of Milford, —— F.4th ——, ——, 2021 WL 3673235, at *9 (7th Cir. 2021) (suggesting use of special verdict form at trial to resolve factual disputes necessary to determine qualified immunity).")

Smith v. Finkley, 10 F.4th 725, 729, 735-50 (7th Cir. 2021) ("As we must, we consider this court's jurisdiction in view of Smith's claim of unreasonable use of deadly force and the officers' qualified immunity defense. That assessment, from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, evaluates whether the totality of the circumstances justified seizure by shooting. Some of those circumstances weighed in favor of the police using deadly force to seize Smith. But in the short time frame before and when the officers shot Smith, factual disputes exist about how much of a threat Smith posed and how actively he was resisting. The qualified immunity decision depends upon and cannot be separated from these disputes, which are integral to the merits of Smith's claim. Because we cannot resolve these factual disputes, we dismiss this appeal for lack of jurisdiction. . . .The line between a non-appealable factual dispute and an appealable abstract legal question is not always clear, and it has been drawn using different terms and phrases. . . . Regardless of approach, '[t]he problem' in deciding whether a qualified immunity denial is appealable 'is that a great number of orders denying qualified immunity at the pretrial stage are linked closely to the merits of the plaintiff's claim.'. . This case's facts 'fall[ ] close to the hazy line between appealable and nonappealable orders established by Johnson.'. . When deciding on which side of this line a qualified immunity appeal properly belongs, we closely examine two things. We first review the district court's decision to see if it identifies factual disputes as the reason for denying qualified immunity. And we consider the arguments (or stipulations) offered by those appealing to see if they adopt the plaintiff's facts, or instead make a 'back-door effort' to use disputed facts. . . At its root, this boundary is based on the connection, if any, between the qualified immunity defense and the disputed factual questions. Jurisdiction is not proper when 'all of the arguments made by the party seeking to invoke our jurisdiction are dependent upon, and inseparable from, disputed facts.'. .We review whether this court has jurisdiction in light of Smith's claim of unreasonable use of deadly force, and of the officers' affirmative defense of qualified immunity, both governed by well-established law. . . . At the outset, we note that both the decision and the appellate briefing contain ostensible factual disputes. Two of those—whether

Smith complied with orders before Finkley and Stahl arrived, and how Smith approached Finkley—are resolved by the body camera videos, which blatantly contradict Smith's positions. . . . On qualified immunity, the court phrased the standard as what a reasonable jury could find, rather than rendering a legal determination. Presuming that the district court meant that a genuine issue of material fact precluded summary judgment for defendants on the grounds of qualified immunity, we conclude that two closely related factual disputes formed the basis for the denial of qualified immunity: (1) how Smith moved to the ground before and as he was shot; and (2) whether Smith posed an immediate threat. . . We also examine the appellate arguments to see if they adopt the plaintiff's facts, or if they dispute the sufficiency of the evidence. . . The defendants say they do not contest the facts on appeal. As for procedure, they argue that the district court erroneously disregarded undisputed facts and substituted its own interpretation of the body camera videos. As for substance, the defendants present arguments on each prong of qualified immunity, first that neither officer's actions here amounted to a constitutional violation, and second that the constitutional right allegedly violated was not clearly established. The standard, again, to determine if appellate jurisdiction exists is whether the defendants' arguments for qualified immunity depend upon, and are inseparable from, these two factual disputes concerning Smith's movement and the level of threat he posed. . . We evaluate our jurisdiction for each of the two prongs of qualified immunity. . . .On the first prong, as to the violation of a constitutional right, the question is whether the totality of the circumstances justified the use of deadly force. . . .Critical to a reasonable officer's perspective here is what occurred as the officers were moving onto and across the roof toward Smith before shooting. This included two closely related factual disputes: (1) how Smith moved to the ground before and as he was shot; and (2) whether Smith presented an immediate threat to the defendant officers. These factual disputes impact two of the Graham factors—the threat level (including whether the suspect is armed) and the suspect's resistance, or lack thereof. . . . From the objective perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, a factual dispute exists as to what Smith appeared to be doing directly before and as shots were fired. The officers' videos do not blatantly contradict or corroborate the version of events for one side or the other, leaving this factual dispute unresolved. . . Yet this sequence is an essential part of the totality of the circumstances in evaluating whether the seizure by shooting was a constitutional violation. Finkley and Stahl point to Smith's movements as they approached him on the roof as the reason they shot, but it is an open factual dispute whether Smith appeared to be surrendering or continuing to actively resist. Each interpretation goes to the qualified immunity question, the former weakening the defense and the latter strengthening it. . . . The parties also heavily dispute whether Smith posed an immediate threat to safety while they were on the roof. This dispute is closely linked with the first factual dispute over Smith's movement before he is shot. . . .Again, a factual dispute exists as to whether, from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, Smith appeared to pose an immediate threat to their safety or the safety of others. Finkley and Stahl point to the threat Smith posed as one of the reasons they shot, and Smith denies he engaged in any 'threatening actions.'. . The videos again do not resolve this dispute. If the video is viewed as Smith surrendering, no reasonable officer would shoot in those circumstances. If viewed as not surrendering, or surrendering from Stahl's perspective but not Finkley's, then the use of force may have been justified. And each interpretation goes to the qualified immunity question, the first weakening the defense and the second strengthening it. . . On this record, we have no difficulty concluding that from the viewpoint of a reasonable officer on the scene, Smith posed a threat to officers before and as the officers moved onto the roof. Finkley and Stahl reasonably believed Smith was armed and that he was actively resisting, two of the factors in determining the objective reasonableness of the use of deadly force and thus whether a constitutional right was violated. . . Yet the foremost consideration in this evaluation is what happened on the roof. Those ten seconds—especially the last four seconds preceding and during the shooting—are the subject of vigorous factual disputes. Finkley and Stahl argue their actions were consistent with constitutional standards. To a reasonable officer in these circumstances, given what was known and perceived, Smith presented a continuing immediate threat and actively resisted, or so they contend. But the record must be viewed in a light most favorable to Smith. The videos reveal that, in the four seconds before the shooting, Smith shows his hands empty with palms out at waist height, steps toward Finkley, and after an order 25 seconds earlier to 'get on the ground,' moves down to the ground. Crucially, the immediacy of the threat that Smith presented, and his level of resistance, could have sufficiently diminished from when the officers first stepped onto the roof. From a reasonable officer's perspective, and based on the totality of the circumstances, deadly force may no longer have been warranted when the officers shot Smith. These circumstances have analogues in this court's case law. An individual surrendering to officers, or getting down to the ground so handcuffs could be put on, is a reduced threat and is putting up less resistance. . . To a reasonable officer in these circumstances, whether Smith continued to present a threat, how immediate that threat was, and whether Smith continued to resist and how much, are uncertainties and unresolved material questions of fact. . . To resolve these disputes, we would need to consider inferences from facts which the parties dispute: the pace and manner in which Smith approached Finkley; whether Smith's movements presented an immediate or diminished threat; and whether and how much Smith was resisting during the officers' final approach. Considering inferences is something 'we cannot do without going beyond our jurisdiction on this interlocutory appeal.'. . Whether the evidence was enough to constitute a threat or active resistance marks these as disputes about the sufficiency of the evidence. An appeal of the sufficiency of the evidence for the denial of qualified immunity is not eligible for interlocutory consideration. . . If we were to resolve these factual disputes, we would be evaluating the quantity and quality of proof, not ruling on an abstract legal question. . . . Before the officers' legal argument for qualified immunity can be decided, these factual disputes as to how much of a threat Smith posed and how actively he was resisting must be resolved. The disputes cannot be separated from whether a constitutional right was violated. . . . Rather, they are at the center of this case, which affects appellate jurisdiction at this interlocutory stage. . . To repeat, our evaluation of appellate jurisdiction requires us to decide if the defendants' arguments for qualified immunity depend upon, and are inseparable from, the factual disputes concerning Smith's movement and the level of threat he posed. On the second prong of qualified immunity, the question is whether the constitutional right at issue was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . .Finkley and Stahl argue they are entitled to qualified immunity because the constitutional right Smith claims was not clearly established in a particularized sense, and they were not on notice that their actions violated the Constitution. We consider whether precedent clearly establishes that deadly force in these circumstances is inappropriate in response to conduct like Smith's. This court's cases provide that on the date of these events, August 31, 2017, shooting an unarmed and surrendering suspect who was not actively resisting in the moments before shooting and who posed a diminishing threat would violate clearly established law. Deadly force is warranted only when an immediate threat of serious harm to the officers is present. . . . We return to the district court's analysis. Although the law on this right is clearly established, and not too general to govern these facts, on the metrics of 'imminent danger' and 'immediate threat of serious harm' the record viewed in the light most favorable to Smith shows factual disputes. At this point, those disputes are plain: whether, before and as Finkley and Stahl used deadly force, Smith was threatening or resisting the officers. These questions are unresolved and material to the 'clearly established law' prong. Appellate jurisdiction therefore is not proper. . . .[A]nalogous decisions show that factual disputes about a diminishing threat or reduced resistance can preclude appellate jurisdiction or a grant of qualified immunity. Just so, on facts close but not identical to those here, courts have concluded that appellate jurisdiction exists. Those decisions are distinguishable, though, in two critical ways: they involved a more combative suspect, or the suspect was holding or touching a weapon. . . .Whether the suspect is holding or touching a weapon when shot is also of great consequence in these cases. . . .This case raises close questions, and if the facts varied slightly, the outcome could be different. It can be argued that the inquiry here is purely legal and may be answered on this record. That argument goes as follows: Under its second prong, qualified immunity is not pierced unless it is sufficiently clear to a reasonable officer that in these circumstances it was not lawful to use deadly force. . . This key inquiry is a legal question. . . According to this argument, the qualified immunity decision can be made because the historical facts have not changed since August 31, 2017. If the record reveals some uncertainty as to one or the other party's responsibility—such as in the last four seconds before the shooting—any mistake by the defendant officers as to what is legally allowed is protected by qualified immunity. For this case, that argument paints with too broad a stroke. Our dissenting colleague suggests that nothing turns on the answers to the disputes about whether Smith was surrendering or how immediate a threat he presented. For the dissent, the videos circumscribe the parameters of 'historical fact.' So long as there is video evidence, the dissent reasons, the historical facts are preserved and not debatable. We disagree. Historical facts 'address[ ] questions of who did what, when or where, how or why.' . . The body camera recordings here answer the who, what, and where, but they do not fully capture the how and why. . . Here, the parties vigorously debate the how and why. Not surprisingly so—videos, or portions of them, can be viewed differently. . . . The majority here parts ways with the dissent as to how the issue in this case is characterized: what the dissent sees as a legal issue, the majority views as a factual dispute precluding appellate jurisdiction. To the majority, the body camera videos leave critical aspects of historical facts unresolved. . . .We acknowledge the split-second decisions that Finkley and Stahl had to make on the parking garage roof. . . The events and the speed at which they occurred here certainly implicates the qualified immunity defense, and the burden rests on Smith to disprove this affirmative defense. . . In the ten seconds the officers were on the roof and approached Smith—especially in the last four seconds as they moved closer to Smith—the officers had to decide whether Smith's movements were threatening and whether he continued to resist, as well as whether the use of deadly force was necessary. And to be sure, Smith put himself in this situation by not surrendering earlier. A suspect can set dangerous events in motion rendering it impossible to surrender without the risk of lawful force being used against them. . . In certain circumstances officers may have no way to ascertain a suspect's intentions without risking their own safety or the safety of others. But if the officers could conclude that a suspect is surrendering and displaying a decreasing level of threat and resistance, then the use of deadly force may no longer be justified. The events here preceding and during the shooting remain subject to interpretation, including the level of threat Smith posed and how actively he was resisting. These questions are important to and inseparable from the qualified immunity decision. The perspective of each officer also may differ—from Finkley's perspective, Smith may have presented a continued threat, but that may not be the same for Stahl. These videos are 'fairly open to varying interpretations.'. . We do not derive certainty from the video depictions of the last four seconds before Smith was shot. . .This case shows how jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal and the affirmative defense of qualified immunity can be in tension. Qualified immunity permits officers to make mistakes as to what is legally allowed. The challenge is drawing the contours of qualified immunity on interlocutory appeal while resolving only abstract legal questions and not factual disputes. Here, the jurisdictional standard prevails because the factual disputes this record presents collapse into the merits determination. Mitchell v. Forsyth does not preclude this conclusion, either. There, the Court stated that qualified immunity is 'effectively lost' if a case proceeds to trial, but that does not mean such a defense is conclusively lost. That is because there is a presumption against interlocutory jurisdiction, . . . and we are interpreting an exception to it. . . And Mitchell makes room for an exception such as here.To reach these questions would not properly reflect what the collateral order doctrine seeks to do. . . . This is not a qualified immunity case in which we review only the application of a legal standard to the antecedent facts. . . The officers here have not asked us to clear away legal uncertainty to find the answer. . . Rather, they effectively ask us to resolve what happened on August 31, 2017, at approximately 1 p.m. on the roof of the parking garage behind 2905 West Wisconsin Avenue in Milwaukee. The officers' arguments raise the critical liability question of 'who is in the right.'. . Is it the officers because Smith appeared to present a threat and was actively resisting, or Smith because he appeared to be surrendering and complying with a previous order. . . Because the record presents material factual disputes important to and inseparable from the qualified immunity analysis, we dismiss this appeal for lack of jurisdiction. . . This is not the final word on qualified immunity for this case. The district court's decision stated (somewhat imprecisely) that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. But that decision was a denial of the officers' summary judgment motion, which sought a ruling both that the use of deadly force was lawful and protected by qualified immunity. As described above, the qualified immunity determination is intertwined with factual disputes concerning threat level and surrender. So although the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, the district court's decision essentially means that the affirmative defense remains preserved for a later ruling. The existence of material factual disputes 'precludes a ruling on qualified immunity at this point.'. . And the qualified immunity defense, preserved for later determination, remains a legal decision for the district court. . .The defendant police officers here seek to appeal from a district court decision and order which found genuine and material factual disputes that cannot be separated from the officers' arguments seeking qualified immunity. . . Therefore, we DISMISS for lack of appellate jurisdiction.")

Smith v. Finkley, 10 F.4th 725, 750-58 (7th Cir. 2021) (Sykes, C.J., dissenting) ("The majority holds that under Johnson v. Jones . . . we lack jurisdiction to hear this qualified-immunity appeal. I respectfully disagree. As I have explained elsewhere, the jurisdictional limitation identified in Johnson is a narrow exception to the general rule that a pretrial order denying qualified immunity is an immediately appealable final order under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and the collateral-order doctrine. . . Johnson does not block appellate jurisdiction here. . . .Plumhoff controls here, not Johnson. The historical facts about what occurred before and during the shooting are preserved on video and are not disputed. In contrast to Johnson, Officers Finkley and Stahl admit that they, not other officers, fired the shots that injured Smith. And just like in Plumhoff, the officers argue that their use of force was a lawful response to the circumstances facing them, and even if it was not, that a reasonable officer would not have clearly understood that using deadly force in these circumstances was unconstitutional. All that remains is to apply the qualified-immunity standard to the video-recorded evidence and make a legal determination about the officers' entitlement to immunity—that is, we need answer only the question whether a reasonable officer would have clearly understood that using lethal force in this situation was unlawful. That's no less true here than it was in Plumhoff. Indeed, the district judge did just that: he reviewed the video recordings in light of the legal standards for excessive-force claims and qualified immunity and determined that the evidence 'does not show' that the officers 'perceived' or 'reasonably believed' that Smith had or was reaching for a gun when they fired the shots that injured him. . . Slightly rephrased, the judge determined that a reasonable officer faced with these circumstances would have known that using deadly force was unlawful because Smith did not pose an imminent threat of serious physical harm to others. The judge accordingly held that 'the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity.' In short, the judge addressed and decided the paradigmatic qualified-immunity question in a Fourth Amendment case of this type: At the time of the shooting, would a reasonable officer have clearly understood that the use of deadly force in this situation was unlawful? As the Supreme Court underscored in Plumhoff, 'deciding legal issues of this sort is a core responsibility of appellate courts.'. . For these reasons, Johnson does not apply. Appellate jurisdiction is secure under Mitchell and Plumhoff. . . . [T]he Graham test for excessive-force claims is itself deferential to the judgment of police officers in the field. The reasonableness of a particular use of force is 'judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight,' and 'allow[s] for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.'. . So 'in addition to the deference officers receive on the underlying constitutional claim, qualified immunity can apply in the event [that a] mistaken belief [about the use of force] was reasonable' under the circumstances. . . Accordingly, police officers get the benefit of the doubt—'a kind of double deference'—in excessive-force cases. . . The combined effect of the qualified-immunity standard and the substantive Fourth Amendment standard protects them against suits arising from reasonable mistakes of fact or law. Finally, it's important to note that under Pearson, . . . we have the discretion to skip the first step in the qualified-immunity framework and assume without deciding that a constitutional violation occurred (or that a jury might reasonably so conclude) and move directly to the second step in the analysis. Taking this approach has the virtue of focusing the court's attention on the decisive question: At the time of the challenged conduct and under the circumstances then confronting the officer, would 'every "reasonable official ... understand that what he is doing" is unlawful'? . . . The Supreme Court recently reminded us of the importance of this doctrinal flexibility: '[L]ower courts "should think hard, and then think hard again," before addressing both qualified immunity and the merits of an underlying constitutional claim.'. .Putting these principles together shows why the majority is wrong to think that the legal issue of qualified immunity cannot be decided until a jury determines whether Smith was surrendering and thus was not an imminent threat. Nothing turns on the answer to that question, not the merits of the Fourth Amendment claim and certainly not the claim of qualified immunity. The merits question—the objective reasonableness of the officers' actions—does not hinge on a finding that Smith was, or was not, surrendering. . . . The key question is whether it was objectively reasonable for the officers to interpret Smith's hand gesture and downward movement as a possible attempt to retrieve a gun from behind the air conditioner where he had been hiding. As I have explained, there's no dispute of historical fact that stands as an impediment to deciding that question; the videos from the officers' body cameras show us exactly what happened. Based on the video evidence and the information known to the officers when they arrived at the scene, the situation was unquestionably tense, dangerous, and uncertain. Officers Finkley and Stahl were forced to make a split-second threat assessment. Unlike us (or a jury, for that matter), they had to interpret what Smith was doing in real time. We can play and replay the video recording, but the officers had less than four seconds to interpret Smith's ambiguous movement toward the ground behind the air-conditioning unit. Even if the officers misjudged the threat (as we know, in hindsight, that they did), a mistake of fact can be objectively reasonable under the circumstances and thus not a Fourth Amendment violation. . . Perhaps more importantly, however, under Pearson we can skip the first step in the qualified-immunity framework and proceed directly to the second step in the analysis. Even if we assume for present purposes that the shooting was an excessive use of force (or that a reasonable jury could so conclude), the officers remain protected by qualified immunity if their mistake in judgment about the lawfulness of their conduct was reasonable under the circumstances. So the key question is this: Would every reasonable officer have recognized that using lethal force was unlawful in this specific situation? That's the core qualified-immunity inquiry, and it is a legal question for the court. But the majority does not address it, holding instead that we lack jurisdiction to review the judge's order denying the officers' claims of qualified immunity. Yet the majority also says, confusingly, that the qualified-immunity defense 'remains preserved for a later ruling.' . . How can that be? The district judge ruled unambiguously that 'the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity.'. . The court's jurisdictional dismissal leaves that ruling undisturbed. So unless the judge changes his mind, the case will proceed to trial on the merits and the officers' claims of immunity will be irretrievably lost. . .There is no jurisdictional bar, as I have explained, so we may—indeed, must—decide the qualified-immunity question. Based on my review of the uncontroverted evidence, especially the body-camera videos, I would reverse and remand for entry of judgment for the officers based on qualified immunity. . . .We know in hindsight that the officers misinterpreted Smith's gesture. He was not reaching for a gun behind the air conditioner. But their split-second mistake in judgment was not unreasonable given the high-pressure, uncertain, and dangerous situation before them. It is not possible to say that every reasonable officer would have understood that Smith was not a threat and that using deadly force was therefore unconstitutional under the Graham standard . . . . The law does not require an officer to 'take [an] apparent surrender at face value' if the circumstances leave 'uncertainties in the situation that faced him.'. . Officers Finkley and Stahl had only a second or two to decide if Smith's movement meant that he was reaching for a gun or surrendering. An error in judgment could have cost them their lives. Given the uncertainties and fraught circumstances they faced, their mistake in judgment was one that a reasonable officer might make. Qualified immunity protects officers from suits arising from their reasonable mistakes of fact and law—especially where, as here, the circumstances require a split-second threat assessment in a tense 'man with a gun' confrontation. Officers Finkley and Stahl are entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.")

Taylor v. Ways, 999 F.3d 478, 486-87 (7th Cir. 2021) ("Ernst raises both legal and factual arguments to invoke qualified immunity. The legal arguments give us jurisdiction over his appeal, but at this stage of the case, we may not consider his factual arguments. For example, Ernst argues that his actions were not the proximate cause of Taylor's termination, and he contends that he did not exert any influence on the decisions of Ways or Whittler. He also argues that the Merit Board, following a formal, adversarial hearing, terminated Taylor based on the evidence presented, independent of any racial animus on his part. Ernst acknowledges that proximate cause is generally an issue of fact, but he argues that the facts surrounding the cause of Taylor's firing are not in dispute. We read the record differently. Leaving aside the broader question whether an issue of proximate cause is ever suitable for an interlocutory appeal of a denial of qualified immunity, the facts surrounding the cause of Taylor's firing are disputed, as the district court found. We may not decide as a matter of law and in an interlocutory appeal that Ernst and his (presumed) racial animus did not influence Ways' or Whittler's recommendations or the Merit Board's decision to terminate Taylor. We thus lack jurisdiction over Ernst's causation arguments. . . Next, in a variation on the proximate cause argument, Ernst argues that none of the evidence concerning his alleged racial animus against Taylor could transform his 'reasonable' termination recommendation into an equal protection violation. This is a non-starter. The evidence of Ernst's racial slurs during the OPR investigation and just before the Merit Board hearing would allow a reasonable jury to infer that he acted out of racial animus. The district court found disputed issues of fact on whether Ernst's (presumed) racial animus caused Taylor's termination. We lack jurisdiction to consider this variation on a factual argument. . . Ernst argues that none of the evidence of his racial animus undermines his reasonable belief that Taylor committed the crimes of aggravated battery and criminal damage to property. He argues that the Holbrook memo, at most, catalogues 'subjective investigative deficiencies' that he had no constitutional duty to investigate once he had probable cause to arrest Taylor. This argument both misses the mark and falls outside our jurisdiction in this interlocutory appeal. For purposes of summary judgment, the district court assumed that Ernst had probable cause to arrest Taylor on March 9, 2011, the day after the reported shooting incident. We assume so as well. But the relevant legal question in this appeal is whether probable cause to arrest Taylor on March 9 provides Ernst a complete defense for racially discriminatory actions in the later OPR investigation of Taylor and the proceedings that led to Taylor's termination. That question is embedded in the larger issue of qualified immunity for Ernst discussed below.")

Estate of Davis v. Ortiz, 987 F.3d 635, 640-41 (7th Cir. 2021) ("Ortiz has not fully accepted the Estate's version of the facts, and so he cannot defend our appellate jurisdiction on that basis. Indeed, he comes closer to asking us to accept his version of the facts over the Estate's. He characterizes the district court and the parties as 'unequivocally agree[ing] that Deputy Ortiz did not intend to shoot Davis, but instead that [Ortiz] was focused on the driver of the vehicle.'. . That is not what the record shows. The district court specifically found that at 'no time did Ortiz state that he was aiming his weapon solely at [the driver] in such a manner as to eliminate all potential inferences otherwise.'. . And Davis maintains that Ortiz 'intended to shoot at the vehicle to stop it,' without regard to any particular occupant. Ortiz replies that these competing accounts are not 'mutually exclusive' because when Ortiz fired his gun, he '"was focused on Lara as the driver," and he intended to stop the vehicle.' Given the fact that this is a Fourth Amendment case, all this talk of intent is largely beside the point. The Supreme Court has made it clear that 'Fourth Amendment reasonableness is predominantly an objective inquiry.'. . The pertinent question is whether a jury could find that Ortiz's actions—firing repeatedly at a moving vehicle as it was leaving the parking lot—were objectively unreasonable under all the circumstances, and thus amount to a Fourth Amendment violation. There is evidence to support a finding that Ortiz was aiming at the car as a whole. As part of that effort, he discharged four bullets, one of which fatally injured Davis. At trial, Ortiz will have an opportunity to convince the jury that his actions were objectively reasonable, but we cannot resolve that question at this stage. . . Just as in Johnson, the record on summary judgment in this appeal reveals issues that must be resolved by the trier of fact. Ortiz has not raised 'a question that is significantly different from the questions underlying plaintiff's claim on the merits,'. . . ; rather, he raises the same fact-based question about the objective reasonableness of his seizure of Davis that the jury must resolve. We DISMISS the appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Campbell v. Kallas, 936 F.3d 536, 543-44 (7th Cir. 2019) ("The Supreme Court has not had occasion to decide whether an order denying qualified immunity may be immediately appealed when the suit also seeks injunctive relief. . . We have done so, however. In Scott v. Lacy, 811 F.2d 1153 (7th Cir. 1987), the plaintiff sought money damages and injunctive relief in a suit against public university officials. . . He argued that the collateral-order doctrine is inapplicable to suits seeking injunctive relief as well as damages because the case could still proceed to trial regardless of the outcome of an interlocutory appeal of a qualified-immunity ruling. . . Acknowledging a circuit split on this question, we followed the majority rule and held 'that a pending request for an injunction does not defeat jurisdiction of interlocutory appeals based on claims of immunity.'. . . Every circuit to address this question agrees. [collecting cases] The Fourth Circuit—the outlier when we decided Scott—has since reversed course. See Young v. Lynch, 846 F.2d 960 (4th Cir. 1988). As we've noted, the Supreme Court hasn't squarely re-visited the question left open in Forsyth. But in Behrens v. Pelletier, 516 U.S. 299 (1996), the Court came quite close to embracing the rule we adopted in Scott. The plaintiff there raised multiple claims, including Bivens claims against which the defendant unsuccessfully sought qualified immunity. . . The plaintiff argued that the defendant's interlocutory appeal was inappropriate because he would still 'be required to endure discovery and trial on matters separate from the claims against which immunity was asserted.'. . The Court clarified that a qualified-immunity appeal 'cannot be foreclosed by the mere addition of other claims to the suit.'. . Then, venturing beyond the specific facts of the case, the Court expressed the same concern we identified in Scott: under the plaintiff's reasoning, the qualified-immunity right not to be subjected to pretrial proceedings' or 'to trial itself [would] be eliminated, so long as the complaint seeks injunctive relief.'. . . Campbell urges us to reconsider Scott, a step that would revive a long-dormant circuit split and come close to contradicting Behrens. . . . She cites recent scholarship criticizing qualified immunity and marshals policy arguments focused on judicial resources. And she draws our attention to separate opinions by some Supreme Court justices raising questions about the doctrine. We have no authority to depart from the Supreme Court's qualified-immunity jurisprudence. And while some justices have questioned qualified immunity, those misgivings haven't stopped the Court from vigorously applying the doctrine. . . Campbell's fallback argument asks us to carve out an exception to Scott for cases involving a substantial risk of harm. But in true emergencies, a plaintiff can seek preliminary injunctive relief. . . We proceed to the merits.")

Koh v. Ustich, 933 F.3d 836, 843-44, 848 (7th Cir. 2019) ("For purposes of appeal, an appellant may take all facts and inferences in plaintiff's favor and argue 'those facts fail to show a violation of clearly established law.'. . "When the district court concludes that factual disputes prevent the resolution of a qualified immunity defense, these conclusions represent factual determinations that cannot be disturbed in a collateral order appeal,' such as this one. . . Our review is further limited in that we may not 'make conclusions about which facts the parties ultimately might be able to establish at trial, nor may [we] reconsider the district court's determination that certain genuine issues of fact exist.'. . To establish jurisdiction, appellants must present purely legal arguments, but if those arguments 'are dependent upon, and inseparable from, disputed facts,' we do not have jurisdiction to consider the appeal. . . Finally, we will 'consider[ ] only the facts that were knowable to the defendant officers.'. . .Because these appeals present factual challenges that are outside of our jurisdiction over an appeal of an order denying qualified immunity on summary judgment, we dismiss these appeals for lack of jurisdiction.")

Gant v. Hartman, 924 F.3d 445, 449-51 (7th Cir. 2019) ("There is . . a narrow, pragmatic exception allowing appellants to contest the district court's determination that material facts are genuinely disputed. In Scott v. Harris, the Supreme Court found the defendant police officer could dispute the district court's finding that a genuine factual dispute existed because a video recording of the incident 'utterly discredited' the plaintiff's testimony that he was driving carefully. . . The video recording of the plaintiff driving erratically during a high-speed chase was irrefutable evidence that he posed an actual and imminent threat to the lives' of others and that, as a matter of pure law in light of that incontestable fact, the defendant used reasonable force to stop him. . . We recently applied this reasoning in Dockery v. Blackburn, finding that the plaintiff's version of the facts was discredited by video evidence. . . The plaintiff in Dockery argued that the video of his arrest was subject to multiple interpretations and that he did not intend to resist the officers. We found, however, that the video plainly showed that Dockery was 'uncooperative and physically aggressive toward the officers and 'wildly kicked' in their direction as they attempted to handcuff him. . . Other courts applying this narrow Scott exception have stressed that it applies only in the rare case at the 'outer limit' of the principle established by Johnson. . . . While the video in Dockery demonstrated facts reaching this outer limit, it should be considered a rare case. It does not apply where the video record is subject to reasonable dispute. In this case, Officer Hartman has not satisfied any of the routes to interlocutory appellate jurisdiction under § 1291. He accepts neither the facts most favorable to the plaintiff nor the facts assumed by the district court; in fact, he has openly contested the facts throughout his briefs and oral argument. . . Officer Hartman has consistently relabeled certain facts as 'undisputed,' and he asks this court to challenge the district court's determination that material facts are genuinely disputed. Officer Hartman has asserted repeatedly that it is undisputed that Gant was not attempting to surrender. That is correct, but Gant contends that he was not resisting arrest when he was shot and that he was either attempting to comply with orders or did not have time to respond to those orders when Officer Hartman shot him in that critical second, as we described above. Officer Hartman cannot pursue an interlocutory appeal by arguing that the evidence is insufficient to support the district court's conclusion or by relabeling the disputed facts as 'undisputed.' These add up to 'a back-door effort to contest the facts.'. . Absent irrefutable evidence, we may not use an interlocutory appeal to second-guess the district court's conclusion that material facts are disputed. We have watched the videos of Gant's shooting and arrest, and we have reviewed the frame-by-frame analysis by Hartman's expert witness. Unlike the footage in Scott and Dockery, the videos in this case do not 'utterly discredit' Gant's contentions that he was trying to comply with orders or did not have time to respond to Officer Hartman's commands. The recordings show Gant standing in the doorway, his arm extended holding the door, and then his arm lowering slightly before Officer Hartman fired. All of this occurs within a single second. This is not comparable to Dockery where the plaintiff actively pushed and kicked at officers, thus 'utterly discrediting' his claim that he had not resisted arrest. Nor do the videos here provide irrefutable proof that it was reasonable for Officer Hartman to believe Gant was holding a gun when he was shot. Outside of irrefutable evidence like that in Scott and Dockery, an appellate court is not in the position to decide on interlocutory appeal what facts may eventually be established at trial by a reasonable fact-finder. . . Officer Hartman claims that he is entitled to qualified immunity because his actions did not violate Gant's constitutional rights and, even if they did, those rights were not clearly established on or before August 23, 2015. To make this argument, however, Officer Hartman asks in effect that we resolve facts that the district court treated as disputed. . . . Because Officer Hartman's appellate argument relies on disputed facts and he has not presented sufficient evidence to 'utterly discredit' the district court's findings, this court lacks jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal.") Dockery v. Blackburn, 911 F.3d 458, 464 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Whether a particular use of force was objectively reasonable 'is a legal determination rather than a pure question of fact for the jury to decide.'. . . A threshold question, however, concerns appellate jurisdiction. . . . On the jurisdictional point at least, Dockery's case is materially indistinguishable from Scott and Plumhoff. The constitutional question—whether the deployment of the Taser was a reasonable use of force under the circumstances—is an objective inquiry that turns on how a reasonable officer would have perceived the circumstances. . . In light of the video recording, which captured the entire episode, this appeal raises a pure legal question about the officers' entitlement to qualified immunity. Dockery responds that the video is subject to multiple interpretations, one of which supports his contention that he did not intend to resist the officers but simply fell because he is overweight and inflexible, and his arms had been painfully wrenched behind his back. He also maintains that he made 'no move to stand, no move to strike the officers, and no threats.' As we've explained, his intent to resist is immaterial under the objective test; we ask only how a reasonable officer would have perceived the circumstances. And Dockery's claim that he made no aggressive moves toward the officers after the first Taser shock and did not try to stand up is 'utterly discredited' by the video, . . . which clearly depicts his physical resistance to the officers' attempts to handcuff him both before and after the first Taser shock. Johnson does not preclude review.")

Williams v. Cline, 902 F.3d 643, 648-51 (7th Cir. 2018) ("A defendant invoking immunity under prong one can raise two types of arguments. First, he may argue there is insufficient evidence to support the plaintiff's version of the facts, . . .or that under defendant's version of the facts, no constitutional violation occurred. . . At bottom, these are factual arguments over which we lack interlocutory jurisdiction. . . Second, the defendant may also argue that, accepting the facts and inferences in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, no constitutional violation occurred. This is a purely legal question that we have jurisdiction to review. . .Our jurisdictional analysis under the second prong is often more straightforward. After all, 'whether the legal norms allegedly violated by the defendant were clearly established at the time of the challenged actions' is typically 'a question of law,' and thus, within our jurisdictional purview. . . Nevertheless, we would lack jurisdiction under the second prong if, for example, a defendant argued that under his version of the facts, the law was not clearly established. Such a litigation strategy would no longer be 'conceptually distinct from the merits of the plaintiff's claim.'. .The inquiry does not end there. In addition to examining the qualified immunity prongs separately, we must also consider how defendants frame their qualified immunity arguments on appeal. It is well settled that 'an appellant challenging a district court's denial of qualified immunity effectively pleads himself out of court by interposing disputed factual issues in his argument.'. . Of course, any reference to a disputed fact, however cursory, is not automatically disqualifying. . . To the contrary, 'the mere mention of disputed facts in an otherwise purely legal argument is not fatal, and we have held accordingly that jurisdiction exists where the appellant mentions factual disputes but the legal argument is not dependent on those factual disputes—i.e., where the legal and factual arguments are separable.'. .Rather, '[t]he key inquiry is whether the appellant's arguments necessarily depend upon disputed facts. If an argument is not dependent upon disputed facts, the court simply can disregard mention of the disputed facts and address the abstract issue of law.'. . A number of cases from our circuit effectively illustrate this principle. [discussing cases] Thus, if the defendant interposes disputed factual issues in his interlocutory argument, and if those disputed factual issues are material to the qualified immunity analysis, then the defendant has effectively pleaded himself out of court and we do not have jurisdiction. Applying this framework to the facts and pleadings in the instant case, we conclude that this court lacks jurisdiction to decide whether a constitutional violation occurred, that is, prong one of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . . Collectively, then, defendants' prong one arguments are intertwined with disputed facts—namely, whether the defendants were on notice that Williams had a serious medical condition. Defendants do not concede these critical disputed factual issues for purposes of prong one of qualified immunity. Nor was their cursory statement at oral argument sufficient to overcome the jurisdictional hurdle in this procedural posture. On the whole, defendants rely upon material factual disputes that are inseparable from the legal question of whether a constitutional violation occurred. Because their arguments require us to revisit these disputed factual questions, we lack jurisdiction to decide the first step of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Nevertheless, we conclude that this court has jurisdiction to answer the second question—whether the alleged constitutional right at issue was clearly established at the time of the incident. Defendants argue that, 'even assuming arguendo that appellants' actions amounted to a constitutional violation, if the law did not put them on notice that their conduct would clearly be unlawful, then they are entitled to qualified immunity.' This is a 'legal issue[ ] ... quite different from any purely factual issues that the trial court might confront if the case were tried.'. . To answer this question, we 'simply take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment for that (purely legal) reason.'. . Indeed, 'deciding legal issues of this sort is a core responsibility of appellate courts.'. . Defendants' alternative argument focuses not on which facts plaintiff can prove, but instead on whether the undisputed facts 'show a violation of clearly established law'—a purely legal question within the scope of our interlocutory appellate jurisdiction. . . Consequently, we conclude that this court has appellate jurisdiction to decide whether the constitutional right alleged by plaintiffs was clearly established at the time of Williams' death. As discussed below, however, because the district court failed to make an individualized assessment of each defendant officer's claim of qualified immunity, we must remand the case for that purpose.")

Williams v. Cline, 902 F.3d 643, 652-54 (7th Cir. 2018) (Ripple, J., dissenting) ("The majority concludes that, given the factual findings of the district court, we lack jurisdiction to consider the first prong of the qualified-immunity analysis: whether the individual officers violated Mr. Williams's constitutional rights. It concludes, however, that we have jurisdiction to consider the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis: whether those constitutional rights were clearly established. This approach, in my view, suffers from two infirmities. First, it fails to recognize that the district court's lack of a defendant-by-defendant analysis infected both prongs of its qualified-immunity analysis. Second, it interposes the two-pronged, substantive analysis of qualified-immunity claims into its consideration of jurisdiction. One of the fixed stars in this area of our work is that qualified immunity 'is an individual defense available to each individual defendant in his individual capacity.'. . Determining whether an individual officer is entitled to qualified immunity involves a two-step analysis: 1) whether the individual officer violated Mr. Williams's constitutional rights; and 2) whether those rights, 'articulated at a meaningful level of particularity,' were clearly established at the time of the incident. . . As the majority notes, '[o]ur cases demonstrate a painstaking commitment to an individualized qualified immunity analysis, especially when the facts relative to the alleged constitutional violation differ from defendant to defendant.'. . The district court failed to follow this elemental step. Although its recitation of the facts acknowledges the officers' varying encounters with Mr. Williams, its qualified-immunity analysis does not reflect an officer-by-officer approach. Instead, the court reached a blanket conclusion that the officers had violated Mr. Williams's constitutional rights and that those rights, considered abstractly, were clearly established at the time that Mr. Williams was apprehended. Counsel and this court, therefore, were left with a vague, amorphous determination. As a result, there was much confusion in the briefs and at oral argument as to whether the defendants were attempting to appeal a question of law or of fact as we, in effect, struggled to do the work of the district court. Turning to the second infirmity, I have grave reservations about our deciding the question of our own jurisdiction on the prong-by-prong basis of substantive qualified-immunity analysis. Courts do not exercise jurisdiction over 'prongs' of a substantive analysis; they exercise jurisdiction over judgments or orders of courts whose actions are subject to their review. Indeed, in deciding that the denial of qualified immunity was an immediately appealable collateral order, the Court spoke in terms of the 'claim of qualified immunity.'. .Here, we either have jurisdiction over the order of the district court denying qualified immunity or we do not. In the case of an order denying qualified immunity to an individual officer, we may consider such appeals to the extent the defendant presents an abstract issue of law: whether the actions of a defendant violated the constitutional rights of the plaintiff or whether the right violated was clearly established at the time that the defendant acted. . . Appellate review is precluded only when the district court's denial of qualified immunity is based on a factual issue that cannot be divorced from the purely legal questions related to qualified immunity. . . Even if key facts are disputed, however, appellate review still is possible when, for purposes of appeal, the defendant concedes that the plaintiff's version of the facts is correct or when the defendant accepts that there are factual disputes but takes each disputed fact in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . In short, the presence of a pure question of law as to either prong of the qualified-immunity analysis provides a basis for our jurisdiction. However, our jurisdiction over the claim of qualified immunity, once jurisdiction is secure, is not so limited. I am aware of only one published opinion from our court, Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 551-53 (7th Cir. 2017), that explicitly employs a prong-by-prong consideration of jurisdiction. . . However, Estate of Clark neither explains the rationale behind, nor the authority supporting, its use of jurisdictional terminology. No doubt, we and other courts have employed the term 'jurisdictional' in a casual manner when discussing appellate review of qualified-immunity cases. . . . As I already have noted, I agree with my colleagues that this case comes to us in an unfinished state, a condition that impeded significantly the ability of counsel to present the appeal to us and that makes careful decision-making on our part difficult. Given the state of the record, the appropriate course is to pretermit the question of appellate jurisdiction and remand the case to the district court for an individualized determination of qualified immunity for each of the defendants. . . Once we have a more fulsome analysis, we then can consider whether we have jurisdiction as to the qualified-immunity claim of each defendant and assess seriously whether a prong-by-prong approach to jurisdiction is appropriate.")

Thompson v. Cope, 900 F.3d 414, 419- 20 (7th Cir. 2018) ("In such appeals, we lack jurisdiction over factual disputes. . . We must take the facts as the district court assumed them or accept the plaintiff's version of the facts, . . but we can also look to undisputed evidence even if the district court did not consider it[.] . . If the appellant challenges the facts or inferences drawn from them, we lack jurisdiction over that challenge. . . . The district court held here that Cope acted in a law-enforcement capacity because he assisted the officers 'in effectuating Heishman's arrest, not rendering emergency medical services.'. . Assuming that the role or capacity in which paramedic Cope acted when he administered the sedative is an issue of fact, . . .we lack jurisdiction to review that finding by the district court. The appellants argue that undisputed facts require the opposite conclusion because Cope assessed Heishman, thought he was under the influence of drugs and in a state of excited delirium (which is a medical emergency), and decided independently to administer the sedative. The district court considered those facts and said that they did 'not negate the overarching fact that Medic Cope was asked by law enforcement officers to assist them in dealing with a combative, resisting arrestee.'. . The appellants repeatedly challenge the district court's inference, but in this interlocutory appeal, we cannot 'revisit the inferences that the district court found could reasonably be drawn.'. . In essence, the appellants challenge the sufficiency of the evidence. They argue that the evidence is insufficient to support the district court's conclusion that Cope helped officers arrest Heishman. That looks like 'a back-door effort to contest the facts,'. . . but we need not decide that issue definitively. We have jurisdiction to decide the appeal on a different issue of law. . . .When a district court denies summary judgment based on qualified immunity, our review of legal issues is both permitted and de novo.")

Breuder v. Bd. of Trustees of Cmty. Coll. Dist. No. 502, 888 F.3d 266, 271 (7th Cir. 2018) ("The Supreme Court has told us that interlocutory appeals complicate and delay the administration of justice, and the category of permissible appeals should not be expanded. See, e.g., Mohawk Industries, Inc. v. Carpenter, 558 U.S. 100, 130 S.Ct. 599, 175 L.Ed.2d 458 (2009). And it has thrown cold water on 'pendent appellate jurisdiction' in particular. Swint v. Chambers County Commission, 514 U.S. 35, 43–51, 115 S.Ct. 1203, 131 L.Ed.2d 60 (1995). Although Swint did not kill the doctrine—it survived in Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681, 707 n.41, 117 S.Ct. 1636, 137 L.Ed.2d 945 (1997), at least with respect to Presidents—Swint concluded that the doctrine must be strictly limited to avoid undermining the discretion that § 1292(b) gives to district judges and appellate judges. See also Microsoft Corp. v. Baker, —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 1702, 1714, 198 L.Ed.2d 132 (2017). Extending the doctrine to allow state-law claims to receive interlocutory review any time a constitutional claim permits a qualified-immunity appeal would do far too much damage to both § 1291 and § 1292(b). We decline the invitation.")

Hurt v. Wise, 880 F.3d 831, 839-42 (7th Cir. 2018) ("The defendant may accept, for purposes of the qualified immunity inquiry, the facts and reasonable inferences favorable to the opponent of immunity, and argue that those facts fail to show a violation of clearly established law. . . The defendants here have tried to take the latter approach, but they have not quite succeeded. Rather than fully accepting the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the EPD and KSP Defendants, relying on Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007), have asked us to revisit the inferences that the district court found could reasonably be drawn from Deadra's and William's recorded interrogation. That we cannot do without going beyond our jurisdiction on this interlocutory appeal. Nothing in Scott undermines this point. . . .If the question is whether someone was driving recklessly, video evidence showing a high rate of speed, use of the oncoming traffic's lane, and running red lights is plainly relevant. If instead the question is what a person meant in a videotaped interview, we are back in the land of inferences that must be taken favorably to the opponent. . . . Scott did not create a per se rule that video evidence is always subject to an appellate court's independent assessment. Indeed, nothing about video evidence justifies placing it in such a privileged position. . . And not all disputes are about what events transpired. Sometimes the availability of qualified immunity turns on the inferences that are permissible in light of the historical facts. . . Where the parties disagree about inferences, the fact that evidence is found in a video is not important—the purpose of the evidence is what matters. . . .The video evidence of William's and Deadra's interrogations does not portray the kind of uncontestable facts that were before the Court in Scott. It is no more and no less than a record of an interrogation, and so we review it just as we would have if the interviews had been audiotaped, recorded by a stenographer, or reduced to affidavits. We therefore turn to the defendants' qualified immunity motions using the facts and reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to the Hurts. We leave the final resolution of these issues to the trier of fact, should the case get that far. . . .Essentially, all of the defendants are asking us to reweigh the evidence available to the Hurts, including the filmed interrogations, and to come to an independent conclusion about the existence of arguable probable cause. That is plainly inappropriate: we do not sit to resolve disputed issues of fact, nor do we have appellate jurisdiction over those issues.")

Stinson v. Gauger, 868 F.3d 516, 522-28 (7th Cir. 2017) (en banc) ("Regarding the due process claim of fabrication of evidence, the district court concluded that 'Stinson has sufficient evidence to get to trial' and explained its conclusion that sufficient evidence in the record existed. The district court also stated that qualified immunity did not apply because the law as of 1984 and 1985 clearly established that an investigator's fabrication of evidence violated a criminal defendant's constitutional rights. As for Stinson's claim of failure to disclose pursuant to Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963), that the opinions were fabricated, the district court ruled that there was enough evidence to go to a factfinder on this claim as well. The court also stated that it was clearly established by 1984 that the withholding of information about fabricated evidence constituted a due process violation, citing among others our decision in Whitlock v. Brueggemann, 682 F.3d 567 (7th Cir. 2012). Gauger, Johnson, and Rawson appealed. A panel of our court concluded that the defendants were not entitled to absolute immunity, that we had jurisdiction to consider appeals of the denial of qualified immunity at summary judgment, and that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. We granted rehearing en banc. . . . The defendants here, invoking a qualified immunity defense, seek to appeal the district court's summary judgment order that concluded the pretrial record set forth a genuine issue of fact for trial. While Johnson might seem to end matters, we examine whether any subsequent Supreme Court decisions limit Johnson's reach. [court discusses Scott, Plumhoff, and Mullenix and finds those cases consistent with Johnson, because in each of those cases, "the Court decided a purely legal issue, not a question of evidentiary sufficiency."] If what is at issue in the sufficiency determination is whether the evidence could support a finding that particular conduct occurred, 'the question decided is not truly "separable" from the plaintiff's claim, and hence there is no "final decision" under Cohen and Mitchell.' [citing Behrens] So appeal is possible only if 'the issue appealed concern[s], not which facts the parties might be able to prove, but, rather, whether or not certain given facts show[ ] a violation of "clearly established" law.'. . Johnson's distinction between appeals of evidentiary sufficiency determinations and those of legal issues also makes practical sense, as the principle helps keep qualified immunity interlocutory appeals within reasonable bounds. Our basic question in determining whether we have jurisdiction over this appeal, then, is whether our case is one of evidentiary sufficiency or one of a question of law. Stinson maintained in this suit that Gauger, Johnson, and Rawson violated his due process right to a fair trial by: (1) fabricating the principal evidence of his guilt (the opinions that his dentition matched the bite marks on Cychosz), and (2) failing to disclose, as required by Brady, the defendants' agreement to fabricate this opinion evidence. . . .On appeal, the defendants assert that they are crediting Stinson's account and asking only for a legal determination of whether Stinson's version of the facts means they violated a clearly established constitutional right. Accepting a plaintiff's version of the facts in the summary judgment record can help allow us to consider a defendant's legal arguments in a qualified immunity appeal. . . Here, however, the premise of the defendants' assertion is not true; rather, the defendants fail to take as true Stinson's version of the facts, and they fail to do so on significant matters. . . .[D]espite their statements to the contrary, the defendants on appeal have not asked us to view the record in the light most favorable to Stinson. That means that although they try to suggest otherwise, the defendants are not asking us for review of an abstract question of law, but rather they seek a reassessment of the district court's conclusion that sufficient evidence existed for Stinson to go to trial. . . The nature of the defendants' appeals further demonstrates that they do not present the requisite abstract questions of law. Johnson and Rawson maintain they did not intentionally fabricate their opinions and so did not fail to turn over Brady material. But whether their opinions were intentionally fabricated or honestly mistaken is a question of fact, not a question of law. Johnson itself explains that we lack jurisdiction over factual questions about whether there is sufficient evidence of intent. . . . The district court concluded that the evidence in the record meant that a reasonable jury could find that Johnson and Rawson fabricated their opinions. The district court recounted that, taking the record in the light most favorable to Stinson, Johnson altered the missing tooth identification only after meeting with the detectives, after they interviewed Stinson and observed his dentition. Johnson did not have any new information before making the switch, and he has never said the change was a matter of reevaluation. The district court also stated Johnson and Rawson had to have known that Stinson was excluded from causing the bite marks because of obvious differences between Stinson's teeth and the bite mark patterns. Bowers, Stinson's expert in the current case, opined that Johnson and Rawson knowingly manipulated the bite mark evidence and Stinson's dentition to make them appear to match. Both the four-odontologist panel and Bowers found no empirical or scientific basis for finding a bite mark on Cychosz's body where Stinson has a missing tooth. They also found inexplicable Johnson's and Rawson's conclusion that Stinson's upper second molars made a bite mark because molars are located so far back in the mouth. And if Stinson's version of the facts is accepted, there was also a cover up of the switch in tooth identification, as no police report accounts for it. From all of this evidence, the district court concluded there was sufficient evidence for a factfinder to draw an inference that the defendants were lying. . . .Rarely will there be an admission of subjective intent. The intent to fabricate is a question of fact that the district court concluded could be inferred in Stinson's favor by the evidence in the record at summary judgment, and the defendants' challenge to whether that is true is the type of appeal forbidden by Johnson. Whether Gauger knew that Johnson and Rawson fabricated their opinions that the bite mark evidence matched Stinson's dentition was a related, and important, factual dispute at summary judgment. Gauger argued that because he is not a dentist, he cannot be blamed for Johnson's and Rawson's expert conclusions. The district court determined that taking the facts in Stinson's favor, 'Gauger was cognizant of Johnson's shifting view of which tooth was missing' and 'was fully aware' of the 'contents of his conversations with Johnson and what he implied in their second meeting, following his and Jackelen's interview of Stinson,' namely that Gauger implied a desired result in the expert opinions. . . But on appeal, Gauger argues that the evidence in the record does not support a conclusion that Gauger knew the dentists were producing false opinions. . . This challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence is again precluded by Johnson. We note that the district court's conclusion that circumstantial evidence might prove intentional collusion between Gauger and the two experts is the kind of finding of historical fact that implicates Johnson, not an 'abstract question of law.' Evidence in the summary judgment record supporting an inference that there was an agreement included that there was an opportunity to agree (the detectives met with Johnson after interviewing Stinson, and Johnson called Rawson), and that later experts say no competent odontologist could have possibly concluded that Stinson was the assailant. In short, the appeals here are not like Harris and Plumhoff where the facts are clear and the only question is the legal implication of those facts. Instead, the defendants' appeals fail to take all the facts and inferences in the summary judgment record in the light most favorable to Stinson, and their arguments dispute the district court's conclusions of the sufficiency of the evidence on questions of fact. With Johnson still very much controlling law, we lack jurisdiction over the defendants' qualified immunity appeals in this case.") Stinson v. Gauger, 868 F.3d 516, 529-30 (7th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (Sykes, J., joined by Bauer, Flaum, and Manion, JJ., dissenting) ("My colleagues have misread the district judge's decision and failed to recognize the limits of jurisdictional principle announced in Johnson v. Jones[.] . . To the first point, the judge's decision denying summary judgment actually contains two rulings. The judge held that (1) the evidentiary record reveals genuine factual disputes about whether certain key events occurred; and (2) the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because the evidence in the record, when construed in Robert Stinson's favor, would permit a reasonable jury to find that they violated his right to due process by fabricating evidence used to wrongly convict him, see Whitlock v. Brueggemann, 682 F.3d 567 (7th Cir. 2012), and suppressing evidence of the fabrication, see Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 (S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 1963), both of which are clearly established constitutional violations. The judge's order does not neatly separate rulings (1) and (2), which I confess makes it more difficult to correctly apply the Johnson principle. But the absence of clean lines in the judge's reasoning does not make the entire decision unreviewable. Our task is to determine whether the decision below contains a legal ruling about qualified immunity. If it does, then we may review it. Here, there's no question that the judge's decision does contain a legal ruling about qualified immunity. For the reasons explained in my opinion for the panel, Johnson does not block jurisdiction over this appeal. Stinson v. Gauger, 799 F.3d 833, 838–40 (7th Cir. 2015). . . .The lesson of this part of the Court's opinion in Johnson is that a 'mixed' qualified-immunity order is immediately reviewable, at least in part. If the district court holds that the summary-judgment record, viewed in the plaintiff's favor, shows a violation of clearly established law—that is, would permit a reasonable jury to find for the plaintiff on his constitutional claim—then the defendant may take an immediate appeal to obtain review of that determination even if the order also identifies a genuine factual dispute.") Nettles-Bey v. Williams, 819 F.3d 959, 961-62 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Appellants' brief makes it clear that they think that the district judge got the facts wrong. Their summary of argument tells us: '[T]he record is devoid of evidence to support the inference that religious discrimination led to Plaintiff's arrest and detention'. The first caption in the argument section of their brief begins: 'The district court erred in concluding that a triable fact issue existed as to whether the Defendant officers were motivated by discriminatory animus toward Moors'. From beginning to end, appellants' brief is about what the record shows and what inferences a reasonable juror could draw. That's the domain of Johnson; appellants' line of argument has nothing to do with uncertainty in federal law. Appellants' reply brief tells us that Johnson is irrelevant. They observe that whether to grant summary judgment is a question of law, at least in the sense that a district judge does not make any findings of fact (but must take matters in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion) and that a court of appeals decides without deferring to the district court's view. They add that immunity likewise is about questions of law. It follows, they believe, that they are entitled to contend in a pre-trial qualified-immunity appeal that the district judge erred in evaluating the record and that, as a matter of law, they are entitled to immediate decision in their favor. If that is right, however, then Johnson itself is wrong. The question posed by the Supreme Court for qualified-immunity appeals is whether legal uncertainty affected the primary conduct of which the defendants are accused. That's the qualified-immunity issue: Whether it is clearly established that federal law (statutory or constitutional) forbade the public employees to act as they did. Johnson holds that, when addressing this question about the propriety of the defendants' behavior, the court of appeals must accept as given the district court's reading of the record. If the district judge concludes that a reasonable jury could resolve a particular factual dispute in the plaintiff's favor, the court of appeals must address the question about legal uncertainty on that understanding. Appellants insist that Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 127 S.Ct. 1769, 167 L.Ed.2d 686 (2007), and Plumhoff v. Rickard, —— U.S. ——, 134 S.Ct. 2012, 188 L.Ed.2d 1056 (2014), modify the approach of Johnson and entitle them to contest the district court's factual understanding. Whether, and if so how far, that may be true when there is also a dispute about the nature of and uncertainty in the federal legal principles that govern the public officials' primary conduct is an interesting question, which this court may address in Stinson v. Gauger, No. 13–3343 (7th Cir. argued en banc Feb. 9, 2016). Neither Scott nor Plumhoff allows an appeal whose sole goal is to upset how the district judge understood the record. We have nothing more to say about Scott and Plumhoff, because there is no uncertainty at all about the rules of federal law that govern the question whether police may hold a person's religion against him when deciding whether to make an arrest. That they cannot has been established for a long, long time—and appellants do not argue otherwise. They do say that there is uncertainty about a different issue that they call a dispute of law: Whether standing orders to police in South Holland require an arrest for criminal trespass whenever the owner demands. This is not a dispute about federal law—and it does not concern 'law' at all. There is a factual dispute about whether Clark did demand Nettles–Bey's arrest, and a further dispute about whether officers in South Holland are obliged to honor the owner's wishes in the face of exculpatory information such as Nettles–Bey's contention that he was present at the invitation of someone he honestly (and reasonably) thought to be the owner. The chief of police himself testified by deposition that officers have discretion. These are among the issues that may be explored at the impending trial. The appeal is dismissed for want of jurisdiction.")

Allman v. Smith, 790 F.3d 762, 763 (7th Cir. 2015) ("The City invokes the doctrine of 'pendent appellate jurisdiction,' which barely survived its scathing treatment in Swint v. Chambers County Commission, 514 U.S. 35 (1995), and today allows a court of appeals to review an interlocutory order only when it is 'inextricably intertwined' with an appealable decision. . . The City maintains that its attempt to have the claims dismissed on the merits is 'inextricably intertwined' with the Mayor's attempt to be free of the risk of damages liability, but the contentions are not 'intertwined' at all, let alone 'inextricably' so. Mitchell described an immunity appeal as 'conceptually distinct from the merits'. . . , which the Court saw as an essential condition of interlocutory review. It is not only possible but also normal to resolve a's request for qualified immunity without deciding the merits of a's claim. . .The principal question in an immunity appeal is whether uncertainty in legal doctrine makes it inappropriate to award damages against a public official—that is, whether the law was 'clearly established' before the official acted. . . A general principle does not support personal liability; instead the law's application to a type of situation must be developed enough to 'place[ ] the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The question on the merits, by contrast, concerns who is in the right, not how much legal uncertainty must be cleared away to find the answer. The district judge held that factual investigation, perhaps including a trial, is necessary to determine whether the plaintiffs' rights under the First Amendment have been violated. We therefore limit the appeal to Mayor Smith's arguments about the only two plaintiffs with respect to whom the district judge denied his request for immunity: Robin Allman and Margaret Baugher.")

Chriswell v. O'Brien, 570 F. App'x 617, 617 (7th Cir. 2014) ("O'Brien has taken an interlocutory appeal to contend that he is entitled to the benefit of qualified immunity. He included this defense in his motion asking the district court to dismiss the suit against him; when denying the motion, the judge did not mention immunity. That omission raises the possibility that the judge has reserved decision on the immunity defense and, if so, the appeal would be premature. See, e.g., Khorrami v. Rolince, 539 F.3d 782 (7th Cir. 2008). But the judge did not purport to reserve decision, nor did he indicate a plan to return to the subject. Instead he denied O'Brien's motion outright. This means that we have jurisdiction, see Hanes v. Zurick, 578 F.3d 491, 493–94 (7th Cir.2009), though we are disappointed that a district judge would deny a motion to dismiss without addressing all of the defenses it presents.")

Allman v. Smith, 764 F.3d 682, 684-86 (7th Cir. 2014) ("The city claims that the doctrine of 'pendent appellate jurisdiction' allowed it to appeal. It moved in the district court to stay further proceedings in that court until we resolved its appeal. But the motion was denied. The two motions to stay (the mayor's and the city's) are the only matters before our panel, a motions panel. The mayor is entitled to a stay because he's claiming qualified immunity. But is the city entitled to a stay? Or even to ask us for a stay? Can it be considered a party to this appeal? These are the interesting questions, and the answers depend on the applicability of the doctrine of pendent appellate jurisdiction, for it is the only possible ground for the city's claim to be a party to this appeal. It is an embattled doctrine. . . . The plaintiffs' claims against the city may, as we have indicated, hinge on the outcome of the mayor's appeal. If the merits panel that will decide that appeal concludes that the mayor did not violate the plaintiffs' constitutional rights (his principal contention), then the suit against the city collapses. But if the panel concludes that although the mayor may have violated those rights they were not sufficiently well established when he did so to defeat his immunity, the plaintiffs' claims against the city will survive his (successful) appeal. That is, a finding that the mayor is immune from liability may leave the merits of the plaintiffs' claims against the city unresolved. The posture of the city's case is a compelling reason to stay the proceedings in the district court involving the city until the merits panel decides the mayor's appeal. If the panel finds that there was no constitutional violation by the mayor at all (rather than that qualified immunity saves him, but of course not the city, from being held liable to the plaintiffs), then any proceedings that had taken place in the district court regarding the plaintiffs' claim against the city will have been a waste of time. This possibility provides a compelling reason for allowing the city to appeal from the denial of the stay that it sought in the district court. The plaintiffs, in contrast, want to try their case against the city, and then, if the merits panel rejects the mayor's appeal from the denial of qualified immunity, hold a second trial, to resolve their claims against the mayor. The trial of the claims against the city has been scheduled for the fall of this year; there is no guarantee that the mayor's appeal will have been briefed, argued, and decided by the merits panel by then. There is thus no guarantee that the panel's decision will come in time to head off the trial should the merits panel decide that the mayor did not violate the plaintiffs' constitutional rights, in which event the claims against the city, being derivative, will evaporate. The prospect of two trials involving the same facts and witnesses is not an attractive one. If the district court proceedings against the city are stayed, and the merits panel decides that the mayor did not violate the plaintiffs' constitutional rights, there will be no trial. If (with the stays granted) the merits panel decides that the mayor did violate the plaintiffs' constitutional rights but is entitled to qualified immunity, there will be one trial, against the city. Finally, if the merits panel rejects the mayor's appeal, the plaintiffs can try their claims against both the mayor and the city in a single proceeding. Each of these outcomes is preferable to allowing the proceedings in the district court against the city to continue while the mayor's appeal is under consideration by this court. A further danger if the city's case isn't stayed is that of conflicting findings between our court and the district court on whether the mayor violated the constitutional rights of the two remaining plaintiffs. That would be an issue in a trial of the claim against the city, since if the answer was negative the city would be off the hook. It might also be an issue for our court in the mayor's appeal, as he will be arguing not only that he had qualified immunity from being sued by the two plaintiffs for violating their constitutional rights but also that he hadn't violated them at all, in which event immunity would be moot. The city's claimed status as a party to the mayor's appeal thus is indeed 'pendent' because of its interdependence with the mayor's appeal. In identical circumstances four other circuits have upheld pendent appellate jurisdiction. Hidden Village, LLC v. City of Lakewood, 734 F.3d 519, 523–24 (6th Cir.2013); Demoret v. Zegarelli, 451 F.3d 140, 152 (2d Cir.2006); Avalos v. City of Glenwood, 382 F.3d 792, 801–02 (8th Cir.2004); Altman v. City of High Point, 330 F.3d 194, 207 n. 10 (4th Cir.2003). None has denied it. We can't think of any reason to reject this consensus. And it is significant that the cases we just cited all postdate Swint, the case that shrunk the doctrine of pendent appellate jurisdiction to its current slim proportions. But the scope of our pendent jurisdiction of the city's claim is exceedingly narrow. The city is a party only for the purpose of being able to ask us to reverse the district court's denial of a stay of proceedings against it in that court. We have no jurisdiction over its appeal from any rulings by the district court other than that denial. It will be the business of the merits panel to decide the mayor's appeal from the denial of summary judgment regarding the two plaintiffs whom the district judge declined to dismiss. We hereby stay the district court proceedings both against the mayor and against the city.")

Huff v. Reichert, 744 F.3d 999, 1004 (7th Cir. 2014) ("In an interlocutory appeal from the district court's denial of qualified immunity at summary judgment, we have jurisdiction to consider 'only the purely legal question of whether, for purposes of [the defendant's] qualified immunity defense,' the facts asserted by the plaintiffs make out a violation of clearly established law. . . Thus, we accept the plaintiffs' (or the district court's) version of the facts and ask whether the defendant is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity. . . In addition, a defendant official 'may not appeal a district court's summary judgment order insofar as that order determines whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a "genuine" issue of material fact.'. . But summary judgment orders are appealable when they concern 'an "abstract issue of law" relating to qualified immunity,'. . . such as whether the right at issue is clearly established or whether the district court correctly decided a question of law . . . .")

Gutierrez v. Kermon, 722 F.3d 1003, 1014 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Our cases have given fair warning that an interlocutory appeal will be dismissed if the argument for qualified immunity is dependent upon disputed facts. . . . Rather than accept the district court's factual assumptions, Kermon has simply ignored or denied that a factual dispute exists and built his argument for qualified immunity on that disputed fact. . . .Here, the district court found that the issue of whether Gutierrez was swaying or walking with an unsteady gait is a genuine factual dispute in need of a jury's attention. Officer Kermon's unabashed reliance on that disputed fact in support of his plea for qualified immunity deprives us of jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal. We therefore Dismiss this appeal for want of jurisdiction.")

Whitlock v. Brueggemann, 682 F.3d 567, 574-76 (7th Cir. 2012) ("No matter how vigorously the police defendants contend that these issues are the sort of abstract legal questions we have jurisdiction to review at this stage of the litigation, they are not. They are merely a 'back-door effort to contest the facts.'. . The police defendants frame their appeal as a challenge to the sufficiency of the court's explanation but they are essentially arguing that there is no dispute of material fact and that the district court failed to appreciate this (as evidenced by its lack of citation to the record). This is no more than a 'sufficiency of the evidence' appeal that we have no jurisdiction to consider. . . The defendants are correct that the district court's opinion in this case could have been more thorough. We strongly encourage district courts to offer full, reasoned explanations of their decisions, complete with detailed citations to the record. But a district court's failure to do so, though regrettable, does not somehow transform a decision based on disputes of fact into one that contains a reviewable question of law. . . .The brevity of the district court's opinion thus raises no legal question in and of itself that permits us to exercise jurisdiction here. In each of the examples the defendants give of this court's remanding to a district court to reevaluate summary judgment, we did so not because the court's reasoning was insufficient but because the district court had made some legal error and failed to conduct a proper qualified immunity inquiry in the first place . . . Here the court has addressed the qualified immunity question, and the police defendants raise no issue with the court's analysis beyond their contention that the district court did not thoroughly discuss the facts. . . .With all of that said, our best judgment is that we lack jurisdiction to consider the police defendants' appeals because none of the issues they raise are legal questions sufficiently separable from the merits. Even if we were to address the merits of their appeal, this limited review of the record shows that there is enough admissible evidence supporting the plaintiffs' claim to create a dispute of material fact.")

Whitlock v. Brueggemann, 682 F.3d 567, 579, 580 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Under the functional line the Supreme Court drew in Buckley, a prosecutor does not enjoy absolute immunity before he has probable cause. . . .Plaintiffs have not appealed the district court's holding that McFatridge had absolute immunity for all post-probable cause conduct, and so we have nothing to say about it. In the end, we conclude just as we did in Hill that we cannot resolve the absolute immunity question for McFatridge's conduct during the first period without resolving the factual dispute over the moment when probable cause developed. If McFatridge took no action related to the investigation before that point and became involved only after he had put on his prosecutorial hat, then he will be entitled to absolute immunity. If, on the other hand, plaintiffs can prove that he fabricated evidence before probable cause arose, then absolute immunity is off the table. We conclude that we have no jurisdiction over this aspect of the appeal. . . . The focus of our case, as we have narrowed it, is exclusively on the period before probable cause supported the prosecution, when a prosecutor is unquestionably acting in an investigative role. Because there are factual issues that must be resolved before we can pinpoint that moment, it is not suitable for resolution at this time.")

immunity. . . . The district court erred by ruling that the defendants waived their qualified immunity argument as to the First Amendment retaliation claims. . . . [T]his case is readily distinguishable from the numerous precedents in this circuit upholding findings of waiver where arguments were not raised until the reply brief. . . Moreover, it is absolutely clear that the defendants' underdeveloped opening brief argument supplied adequate notice to the plaintiffs and caused them no prejudice.")

Jones v. Clark, 630 F.3d 677, 680 (7th Cir. 2011) ("The official's right to immunity turns on two questions: first, whether the facts presented, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, describe a violation of a constitutional right, and second, whether the federal right at issue was clearly established at the time that the alleged violation occurred. . . The way that the first inquiry is phrased is reminiscent of the approach to dismissals under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) or rulings on summary judgment: the reviewing court takes the record in the light most favorable to the opponent of the motion and asks whether the case can proceed. This avoids the need to resolve disputed issues of fact. The second inquiry even more obviously involves pure questions of law. The trick there is to ensure that we are evaluating the situation at the correct level of specificity. . . When the district court denies qualified immunity at summary judgment because the plaintiff's evidence, if believed by a trier of fact, would suffice to show a constitutional violation, and the court concludes that the governing rule is well established, any appeal must be limited to the legal underpinnings of the court's ruling. Behrens clarified that a district court's assertion that factual disputes preclude a defendant's claim of immunity does not itself deprive the court of appeals of jurisdiction. . . An immediate appeal on stipulated facts may still be possible, or the defendant may concede for purposes of the appeal that the plaintiff's version of the facts is correct, or he may accept the district court's view that there are factual disputes but take each disputed fact in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . In a collateral-order appeal like this one, where the defendants say that they accept the plaintiff's version of the facts, we will take them at their word and consider their legal arguments in that light. If, however, we detect a back-door effort to contest the facts, we will reject it and dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction. By the same token, an appeal from a denial of qualified immunity cannot be used as an early way to test the sufficiency of the evidence to reach the trier of fact. In such a case, where there really is no legal question, we will dismiss the appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Mercado v. Dart, 604 F.3d 360, 363, 366 (7th Cir. 2010) ("To date, the Supreme Court has treated only two kinds of orders as 'final' for the purpose of an immunity appeal: denial of a motion to dismiss the complaint and denial of a motion for summary judgment. See generally Behrens v. Pelletier, 516 U.S. 299, 305-11, 116 S.Ct. 834, 133 L.Ed.2d 773 (1996). These two orders often are the outcome of focused engagements after full briefing; each represents the end of a discrete stage in the litigation, during which the legal issue has crystallized and been resolved as a matter of law. Oral denial of a mid-trial motion under Rule 50, by contrast, is not final by that standard. It is possible to see how an order denying a motion for summary judgment can be called 'final' for some purposes even though the judge has allowed the suit to proceed; but a mid-trial ruling is not 'final' for any purpose. It is a step on the way to a verdict. And a mid-trial motion under Rule 50 does not assert a 'right not to be tried' or even a 'right to be free of costly discovery'; it asserts a right to win (that's why it is called a 'motion for judgment as a matter of law'). Discovery and trial have occurred by the time lawyers start making Rule 50 motions. A judge's oral statement allowing the trial to proceed may presage a final decision (judgment on the verdict) but is not itself a final decision. . . . This interlocutory appeal is dismissed because it is not from a 'final decision' and because it is frivolous")

Viilo v. Eyre, No. 08-1627, 2008 WL 4694917, at *4, *5 (7th Cir. Oct. 27, 2008) ("The present case easily fails the standard for appealability in the aftermath of Johnson and Behrens. The district court held that '[a] reasonable jury could find that at Eyre's order Carter shot Bubba as he was crying, sitting down, moving slowly, or headed to the backyard.' Viilo v. City of Milwaukee, 552 F.Supp.2d 826, 840 (E.D. Wis. 2008). The defendants have manifestly not based their appeal on these facts. . . . In denying rather than embracing the facts the district court held to be sufficiently well-supported to create jury issues, the defendants have pleaded themselves out of court. The appeal is therefore DISMISSED.").

Khorrami v. Rolince, 539 F.3d 782, 786-90 (7th Cir. 2008) ("The primary weakness of the Government's appeal is that the order that might have supported appellate jurisdiction over this appeal does not exist. . . . The district court . . . did not reject the qualified immunity defense. Instead, it explicitly set the claim aside to be adjudicated later . . . . Unless the district court delays so long in ruling that the delay becomes a de facto denial, a decision not to rule on a motion is just that: inaction. . . . The Government contends that qualified immunity is the right to be free from all burdens of litigation, period. That statement goes too far. . . .In the event of a brief pretrial postponement of a qualified immunity argument at the same time as the court is considering a motion under Rule 12(b)(6), the district court is the only judicial tribunal that may revisit the issue. While this will embroil the defendant official for a brief time in the litigation, there is no way to avoid these burdens altogether and at the same time conduct the litigation in a way that is fair and orderly to both parties. The fact that the Supreme Court has recognized that more than one appeal from an order denying qualified immunity is permissible . . . shows that the Court recognizes that a certain amount of pretrial activity, including the discovery necessary to prepare a motion for summary judgment (or defend against one), is inevitable. All of what we have just said may have been true before the Supreme Court decided Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (2007), the Government concedes, but, in its view, Twombly changed everything. . . . The Government suggests that perhaps a higher pleading standard is appropriate in a qualified immunity case, but the Supreme Court has squarely rejected that proposition. See Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 594-96 (1998). . . . In the end, the Government is trying to conflate its argument over pleading standards with the argument over qualified immunity. Orders denying qualified immunity (when they exist) and rulings denying Rule 12(b)(6) motions are subject to different rules for appellate jurisdiction. In the end, we have before us only an attempted appeal from a presumed denial of qualified immunity. We repeat that the lack of a ruling from the district court under these circumstances is not the functional equivalent of a denial of the motion. We also find it procedurally unacceptable to rule on the sufficiency of the complaint through the back door, using the Government's theory that a complaint that fails to allege a constitutional violation clearly enough to satisfy Twombly is all that it needs in order to appeal. Khorrami's story is plausible enough that we can conclude that he properly alleged a violation of clearly established law by someone acting under color of law. That showing, in turn, is sufficient to satisfy us that no interlocutory appeal is authorized here: there was no order denying qualified immunity, no constructive denial resulted, and the issue was not sufficiently concluded to allow for another form of interlocutory appeal. The appeal is therefore Dismissed for want of appellate jurisdiction.").

White v. Gerardot, 509 F.3d 829, 836, 837 (7th Cir. 2007) ("Sallenger and McKenna thus counsel that, where the appellant's arguments rely on disputed facts, this court has jurisdiction only if the legal arguments for qualified immunity do not depend on, or are separable from, disputed facts. Of course, this does not mean that the mere mention of disputed facts in an otherwise purely legal argument extinguishes our jurisdiction. . . Rather, the key inquiry is whether the appellant's arguments necessarily depend upon disputed facts. If an argument is not dependent upon disputed facts, the court simply can disregard mention of the disputed facts and address the abstract issue of law without running afoul of Johnson. Here, Detective Gerardot's only argument on appeal is that a reasonable officer in his shoes would not have known that using deadly force against Ford was unconstitutional because he believed that Ford had just fired shots into a large crowd, that Ford was concealing a weapon in front of his body and that Ford was going to shoot him when he turned around with his hands at waist level. Because there is an issue of material fact as to whether Ford was surrendering with his hands in the air, Detective Gerardot's argument necessarily depends on his version of the facts. Indeed, Detective Gerardot would be hard pressed to develop any purely legal argument for why he is entitled to qualified immunity if Ford had his hands in the air and was surrendering, as alleged by Ms. White and as assumed by the district court. . . Detective Gerardot's legal arguments are wholly dependent upon, and inseparable from, his reliance on disputed facts and therefore we conclude that we do not have jurisdiction to consider his appeal.").

McKinney v. Duplain, 463 F.3d 679, 693 (7th Cir. 2006) ("The district court denied Officer Duplain's motion for summary judgment based, in part, on its belief that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether McKinney had charged Officer Duplain. Although that conclusion rested on the district court's reliance on several problematic expert opinions, under the Supreme Court's holding in Johnson, this court lacks jurisdiction to review the district court's conclusion that a genuine factual dispute exists. Therefore, we must DISMISS for lack of jurisdiction.").

Leaf v. Shelnutt, 400 F.3d 1070, 1078, 1079 (7th Cir. 2005) ("A defendant may appeal the denial of qualified immunity with respect to particular claims even when he still will be required to go to trial on a matter separate from the claims for which he asserted qualified immunity. . . A plaintiff often seeks relief for a single incident on multiple theories of liability. When this occurs, the defendant does not lose his right to appeal the denial of qualified immunity as to one theory of liability even when he still will be required to go to trial on another theory. As several of our sister circuits have recognized, . . .the term 'claim' must be employed in this context in a manner that is compatible with the unique, yet firmly established, principles established by the Supreme Court with respect to the doctrine of qualified immunity. Consequently, in employing the term 'claim' when determining whether a defendant may invoke the defense of qualified immunity, we must keep in mind that qualified immunity is designed to ensure that a defendant does not stand trial unnecessarily on an allegation that lacked a reasonable grounding in established law at the time the act was committed. We also must keep in mind that the defense of qualified immunity is only effective when it is applied at a meaningful level of generality. This requirement ensures that a defendant will have to stand trial only when he could reasonably anticipate that his conduct may give rise to liability for damages. Defining 'claim' in light of these considerations quite naturally produces a different and more narrow definition of the term 'claim' than we would encounter in other contexts such as res judicata. There, in determining whether the same 'claim' arose in earlier litigation, 'claim' has become a surrogate for the term 'cause of action,' and that term has been defined in turn to include all theories of liability arising out of the same transaction or occurrence. . . Any other course would frustrate the Supreme Court's directive that an appeal of the denial of qualified immunity 'cannot be foreclosed by the mere addition of other claims to the suit.'").

Beischel v. Stone Bank School District, 362 F.3d 430, 433, 434 (7th Cir. 2004) ("The bottom line was that Beischel was granted judgment on her claim that she had been denied a property interest without due process of law. The defendants, except for Kathy Rosenheimer, were denied qualified immunity on that claim. However, the defendants won dismissal of Beischel's claim based on a denial of a liberty interest without due process of law and all of her claims under Wisconsin law. Even though there is no final judgment in the case, the defendants have appealed both the decision denying qualified immunity and the decision on the merits. We, of course, have appellate jurisdiction over the decision denying qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . And although we are ordinarily 'skittish' about the doctrine of pendent appellate jurisdiction, . . . we agree with the parties who contend that the issues on the merits are so intertwined with the appealable claim that jurisdiction exists over the entire appeal. And as it turns out, the dispositive issues in our decision today are issues on the merits rather than on qualified immunity.").

Anderson v. Cornejo, 355 F.3d 1021, 1022, 1023 (7th Cir. 2004) ("'We didn't do it' may be a good defense, but it is unrelated to immunity (a doctrine designed to protect public officials from the effects of guessing wrong in a world of legal uncertainty) and thus, Johnson held, not a proper ground of interlocutory appeal. Johnson precludes the managerial defendants from denying that the line inspectors used race and sex as selection criteria. Plaintiffs believe that, if we must assume that racial discrimination occurred on defendants' watch, and they did nothing to stop it, there could be no point to the appeal. We should just let the case proceed to trial. Recognizing the force of Johnson, the managers concede (for purpose of the appeal only) that some line inspectors at O'Hare behaved unconstitutionally, and they further concede (again arguendo) that they did not lift a finger to rectify the problem. There remains a bona fide question about legal doctrine, and thus about immunity: would reasonable persons, knowing what the managers knew (or were bound to learn), have recognized that the Constitution required them to intervene? We may address that question without transgressing Johnson, and as in Saucier may give either of two answers: first, that taking all evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs there was no requirement to act; or, second, that there is such a requirement but that a reasonable person would not have understood at the time that the law required this. Thus it is possible, consistent with Johnson, to cover the question whether the plaintiffs have a good legal theory as well as the immunity defense; but, as Johnson and Saucier hold, . . . this must be done by taking the evidence and reasonable inferences in plaintiffs' favor.")

West v. Schwebke, 333 F.3d 745, 747, 748 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Qualified immunity is available unless the rules of law on which plaintiffs rely are so clearly established that a reasonable state actor is bound to understand how they apply to the situation at hand. . . Defendants acted after Foucha had made it clear that Youngberg applies to civil detainees who have committed criminal acts. . . This leaves only the question whether defendants' use of seclusion could be justified on either security or treatment grounds–and the district judge thought this question unresolvable short of trial, given the clash of expert opinions. An interlocutory immunity appeal may not be used to present factual disputes for pretrial appellate resolution.").

Finsel v. Cruppenink, 326 F.3d 903, 904, 905 (7th Cir. 2003) ("This is but another in what seems like an ever-increasing flow of interlocutory appeals in cases where district courts deny motions for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. Although the appeal is certainly permissible, . . . it will not, even if successful, serve the primary purpose of permitting interlocutory review– sparing a government defendant the rigors of a trial. That goal will not be achieved because other parts of this case cannot be resolved, short of a settlement, without a trial. Nevertheless, despite concerns about the wisdom of this sort of piecemeal approach to cases like this we soldier on, starting with the facts viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff . . . . A).

Garvin v. Wheeler, 304 F.3d 628, 634 (7th Cir. 2002) ("We have consistently held that a cry of 'I didn't do it' does not present any distinctly legal issue or seek protection from legal uncertainty, and therefore cannot be raised in an interlocutory appeal from the denial of qualified immunity.").

Hammond v. Kunard, 148 F.3d 692, 695 (7th Cir. 1998) ("[In] a motion to dismiss, we assume that all of the facts of the complaint are true, rendering the applicability of qualified ... immunity a purely legal question over which we have jurisdiction.").

Clash v. Beatty, 77 F.3d 1045, 1046, 1048-49 (7th Cir. 1996) ("If the district court's denial of Beatty's summary judgment motion indicated that the question of whether the qualified immunity defense was available required further factual development, we have no jurisdiction to entertain this appeal under Johnson. If, on the other hand, the appeal raises only legal issues about the possible application of qualified immunity, we have jurisdiction under Behrens and Mitchell. . . . As the Behrens opinion put it . . . this is a case where what is at issue is whether the evidence could support a finding that particular conduct occurred: a shove that was objectively unreasonable in light of the harm that Clash then presented. That determination is not truly 'separable' from the plaintiff's claim. Accordingly, we dismiss this appeal.").

Rambo v. Daley, 68 F.3d 203, 207 (7th Cir. 1995) ("We simply do not have jurisdiction to review a contention of insufficient evidence on interlocutory appeal. [citing Johnson] Therefore, because the merit of the qualified immunity defense turns on the sufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence, we dismiss this portion of the appeal for want of jurisdiction.").

Jones v. Johnson, 26 F.3d 727, 728 (7th Cir. 1994) ("Defendants do not deny that if they beat plaintiff, as he believes they did, then they lack immunity. Whether they beat the plaintiff is a question that must be resolved in the district court before it may be reviewed on appeal. When asked at oral argument if they could lose the factual dispute and still prevail, defendants' lawyer answered no. In consequence, we lack appellate jurisdiction over the contention that the defendants did not commit or abet battery.), aff'd, Johnson v. Jones, 115 S. Ct. 2151 (1995).

Hill v. Shelander, 992 F.2d 714, 718 (7th Cir. 1993) (where court is ". . . unable to resolve the immunity question without resolving a disputed issue of fact," it lacks jurisdiction over the appeal of the immunity question.) Accord McDonnell v. Cournia, 990 F.2d 963, 967 (7th Cir. 1993); Marshall v. Allen, 984 F.2d 787, 792 (7th Cir. 1993).

Elliott v. Thomas, 937 F.2d 338, 342 (7th Cir. 1991) ("It would extend Mitchell well beyond its rationale to accept an appeal containing nothing but a factual issue ....Mitchell did not create a general exception to the finality doctrine for public employees. Every court that has addressed the question expressly has held that Mitchell does not authorize an appeal to argue 'we didn't do it.'").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Torres v. City of St. Louis, 39 F.4th 494, 502-05 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Appellants argue that the district court erred in denying Officers Long, Manasco, Becherer, Seper, Coats, Frigerio, Allen, and Jones qualified immunity because it was not clearly established in June 2017 that 'it is constitutionally unreasonable to use deadly force against a suspect, who during the execution of a search warrant, fires at officers and then approaches officers with a rifle shouldered and at the ready.'. . Though appellants present this argument in terms of the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity inquiry, they base their argument on facts not assumed by the district court. . . The district court found a genuine factual dispute as to whether Hammett fired the AK-47 and was armed when he was shot. Whether or not Hammett was armed when the defendant officers used deadly force against him is material to the question of whether it was clearly established that the officers could not use deadly force in this situation. 'At bottom, this is an argument about the sufficiency of the evidence, a question we lack jurisdiction to review, however inventively it is structured as an abstract legal argument.'")

Taylor v. St. Louis Community College, 2 F.4th 1124, 1127-28 (8th Cir. 2021) ("An officer 'cannot create appellate jurisdiction by using qualified immunity verbiage to cloak factual disputes as a legal issue.'. . We are required to look beyond the officer's characterization of the issue and consider whether the argument, instead of raising a legal issue, is simply a claim that 'the plaintiff offered insufficient evidence to create a material issue of fact,' which we lack jurisdiction to review. . .Caples contends that 'Taylor erratically charged Board members,' therefore, his use of force was reasonable because an objective, reasonable officer could view Taylor's behavior as threatening. The problem with this argument is that the district court never found that 'Taylor erratically charged Board members.' It instead found the video inconclusive as to Caples's conduct immediately preceding his takedown of Taylor. Specifically, the court found that, while the video showed Caples attempting to grab Taylor's sport coat, it was unclear whether Taylor was pushed or moved forward of his own volition. The court, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Taylor as it must, determined that Caples was not entitled to qualified immunity under those facts. While we have exercised jurisdiction in qualified immunity cases when the record plainly forecloses the district court's finding of a material factual dispute, . . . we find nothing in this record, including the video, that clearly contradicts the district court's factual determinations or Taylor's assertion that Caples pushed him. Taylor's concession that he took an initial step away from Caples is neither inconsistent with Taylor's version of events nor dispositive. The parties' inordinate focus on the facts pertaining to the takedown, both in the briefing and at oral argument, demonstrates that the heart of the arguments on appeal involves disputed facts. The views of the parties at the critical moments for an excessive force determination are irreconcilable. And the district court found the record on these critical moments to be inconclusive. The challenges Caples makes to the district court's conclusions regarding the sufficiency of the evidence and the genuineness of the factual disputes are conclusions that we have no jurisdiction to review. . . In order for us to reach Caples's 'legal argument' that he responded reasonably and did not violate clearly established law, we would have to exceed our jurisdiction and cast aside the district court's factual findings, analyze the factual record, and resolve genuine factual disputes against the non-moving party. This we cannot do. . . Because material factual disputes that are incapable of being resolved on this record are at the heart of Caples's arguments, we dismiss Caples's appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Watson v. Boyd, 2 F.4th 1106, 1110-14 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Whether the district court upheld 'its threshold duty to make "a thorough determination of [a law enforcement officer's] claim of qualified immunity"' is a legal question that we may review even under our limited jurisdiction. . . . [A] district court cannot deny summary judgment by merely finding that genuine issues of fact exist; those issues must also be material—that is, affecting the outcome of the suit under the applicable law. . . While Officer Boyd asks this Court to review the district court's materiality determination on the merits, we find that the district court's order failed to address materiality in a manner 'sufficient to permit meaningful appellate review of the qualified immunity decision.'. . . When, as here, the district court stops short of addressing the materiality of the genuine issues of fact, it essentially fails to carry out its 'threshold duty,' and remand for additional explanation is most appropriate. . . .When analyzing the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry—whether Officer Boyd's actions violated Watson's constitutional rights—the district court set forth in detail the parties' numerous factual disputes, and we are without jurisdiction to determine whether these disputes are genuine. . . However, the district court did not test Watson's version of the facts against the substantive law to determine whether these disputes are material. When discussing Watson's Fourth Amendment seizure claim, the district court commenced its analysis by citing case law that outlined the general legal standards for probable cause and reasonable suspicion, but it largely failed to apply this case law, or more analogous cases, to Watson's version of the facts. . . . The district court also failed to conduct the materiality inquiry by framing legal questions as factual ones. For example, on multiple occasions the district court held that genuine fact disputes existed as to whether Officer Boyd had probable cause or reasonable suspicion. However, whether probable cause or reasonable suspicion existed is a legal question that the district court must resolve, construing the genuine fact disputes in the light most favorable to the non-moving party. . . . Additionally, while the district court's Fourth Amendment excessive force analysis does not hinge on the existence of probable cause or reasonable suspicion, it nonetheless contains errors. The district court does not discuss analogous case law, nor does it explain how subjective facts, such as Watson's purpose of calling the police on his cell phone, are material to the objective qualified immunity analysis. . . Accordingly, we find that the district court failed to reach the materiality of the genuine disputes and thus failed to fulfill 'its threshold duty to "make a thorough determination"' of Officer Boyd's claim. . . . Second, Officer Boyd claims that even if the district court did not err in its first-prong analysis, the district court failed to determine whether Watson's rights were clearly established at the time of the stop. While a district court may address the prongs in any order, it 'may not deny qualified immunity without answering both questions in the plaintiff's favor.'. . As such, a district court 'should [not] deny summary judgment any time a material issue of fact remains on the [constitutional violation] claim [because to do so] could undermine the goal of qualified immunity.'. . .While the district court's 43-page order cannot be described as 'truncated,'. . . we find that this analysis is so 'scant' that we are unable to discern whether the district court applied the clearly established prong at all, much less conducted a 'thorough determination[.]' . . . Our conclusion is not predicated on the analysis's brevity alone but also on the application of incorrect legal standards. Although the district court may have been incorporating its earlier constitutional violation analysis by reference, this analysis is not pertinent to the clearly established inquiry. . . . Finally, the district court's excessive force analysis fails to identify a specific right or factually analogous cases. . . . Accordingly, because of the district court's incomplete analysis on both the constitutional violation and clearly established prongs, we can neither affirm nor reverse the denial of qualified immunity. . . .We pass no judgment on whether Officer Boyd is entitled to qualified immunity because the district court failed to undertake the necessary analysis. Accordingly, we vacate the district court's order and remand the case for a more detailed consideration and explanation of the validity, or not, of Officer Boyd's claim to qualified immunity in a manner consistent with this opinion, and we dismiss the City's appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Garang v. City of Ames, 2 F.4th 1115, 1121-23 (8th Cir. 2021) ("The record supports the conclusion that the officers had arguable probable cause to arrest Garang for the assault based on Graves's identification of Garang as one of his attackers. Although the district court determined that this was a fact in dispute, upon our review, we conclude that the district court's determination is 'blatantly contradicted by the record' and is thus within the scope of our review. . . The district court's conclusion that this fact is disputed is premised on the deposition testimony given by Graves roughly two years after the incident stating that he did not remember making an identification and the affidavit Garang submitted in opposition to defendants' summary judgment motion stating that at no time did Graves physically or verbally identify Garang as one of his attackers. However, this record evidence does not create a factual dispute. First, Graves's deposition testimony does not actually dispute that he made the identification; instead, Graves merely stated that he had no recollection of making the identification but had no reason to challenge the officers' statements that he identified Garang. . . . Second, while Garang's affidavit avers that Graves at no point identified Garang, this is inconsistent with Garang's prior deposition testimony during which he stated that he could not hear what Graves and Sergeant Congdon were speaking about at the time Graves made the identification, and thus would have been unable to conclusively state whether Graves identified him. . . .[W]e conclude that the district court's conclusion that it was disputed whether Graves identified Garang as one of his attackers is blatantly contradicted by the record. Considering the totality of the circumstances, primarily Graves's identification of Garang, coupled with Garang's behavior during the encounter—which included showing an unusual amount of interest in the officers' investigation, initially providing a name that could not be verified because it was not Garang's legal name, and attempting to leave the lobby after making contact with Officer McPherson—provided the officers with at least arguable probable cause to arrest Garang. To the extent that Garang asserts the later-obtained surveillance tape and other exculpatory evidence detracts from the officers' claim of arguable probable cause to arrest him, '[a]s probable cause is determined "at the moment the arrest was made," any later developed facts are irrelevant to the probable cause analysis for an arrest.'. . Accordingly, in the absence of a constitutional violation, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the unlawful arrest claim.")

Thurmond v. Andrews, 972 F.3d 1007, 1013 (8th Cir. 2020) ("If we had held that no constitutional violation occurred here, then Faulkner County may be correct in asserting that we would also have to conclude that the 'inextricably intertwined' claim against the County fails as a matter of law. . . But that is not our holding. Rather, we hold only that the individual jail employees are immune from suit because their actions did not violate clearly established law. This conclusion does not necessarily mean Faulkner County did not violate the rights of the plaintiffs, and so the determination of liability does not flow from the resolution of the qualified immunity issue. . . Because the determination of Faulkner County's liability does not 'flow ineluctably from a resolution of the qualified-immunity issue, the question of whether [the County] is liable for failing to train its officers is not inextricably intertwined with the matter of qualified immunity.'. . As such, we lack jurisdiction to hear the County's appeal.")

Ivey v. Audrain Cty., Missouri, 968 F.3d 845, 851 (8th Cir. 2020) ("The county maintains that we may resolve its appeal because our conclusion that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity means that the county cannot be liable. That would be correct if we had held that no constitutional violation occurred here. See Mogard v. City of Milbank, 932 F.3d 1184, 1192 (8th Cir. 2019). But that is not our holding. We hold only that the officers are immune from suit because they did not violate Ivey's clearly established rights. That does not mean that they did not violate the constitution, see Webb v. City of Maplewood, 889 F.3d 483, 487–88 (8th Cir. 2018), which would absolve the county from responsibility for their unconstitutional acts, if any. . . When the determination of the county's liability does not flow ineluctably from a resolution of the qualified-immunity issue, the question of whether it is liable for failing to train its officers is not inextricably intertwined with the matter of qualified immunity. . . So we lack jurisdiction to decide the county's appeal.")

Curtis v. Christian County, Missouri, 963 F.3d 777, 789 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Because Curtis and Bruce, in their role as Missouri deputy sheriffs, held 'policymaking positions for which political loyalty is necessary to an effective job performance,' Cole was permitted to 'take adverse employment actions against [them]' and did not violate their constitutional rights. . .The district court, therefore, erred in denying Cole qualified immunity on their wrongful-discharge claims. . .We also have pendent jurisdiction over the municipal claims against Christian County because they are 'inextricably intertwined' with the qualified immunity issue. . . Bruce and Curtis seek to hold Christian County liable under a theory that Cole was the final policymaker for Christian County. '[T]here must be an unconstitutional act by a municipal employee before a municipality can be held liable.'. . Because we hold that Cole did not violate Curtis's and Bruce's constitutional rights, Christian County is entitled to summary judgment on the claims against it.")

Mogard v. City of Milbank, 932 F.3d 1184, 1192 (8th Cir. 2019) ("This court's limited jurisdiction to review the denial of qualified immunity does not include the authority to review every issue in the summary judgment order. . . However, this court may exercise 'pendent appellate jurisdiction' over claims 'inextricably intertwined' with the qualified immunity question. . . As discussed in Section III, Mogard has not demonstrated the deprivation of a property or liberty interest. This conclusion also resolves Mogard's related claims against the City. . . This court's ruling has not, however, 'necessarily resolved' the City's liability in the retaliation claim. . . This case is remanded for further proceedings about the retaliation claim against the City.")

Thompson v. Dill, 930 F.3d 1008, 1013-15 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Since there is no dispute Gerry was unarmed when Dill shot and killed him, the critical question is this: viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, was it objectively reasonable for Dill to believe Gerry posed a threat of serious physical harm to anyone as he fled from his house? If so, then Dill is entitled to qualified immunity and thus summary judgment. If not, then the case must proceed to trial. The district court answered this question in the negative, reasoning that under the summary judgment standard it could not conclude Gerry 'reached for his waist, or otherwise behaved in a manner that would have justified the perception that [Gerry] was behaving in a threatening manner.' Dill argues this was error because, at the moment he employed deadly force, he had reason to believe Gerry was about to cause death or serious bodily injury to the officers inside the residence by reaching for a gun to shoot back into the house at the officers. Dill contends this belief was reasonable considering the totality of the circumstances, including the fact Gerry reached for his waist and turned back toward the officers inside the house. Dill may ultimately be able to show his split-second decision to shoot Gerry was objectively reasonable considering the chaotic circumstances. But we do not have jurisdiction to decide whether or not we disagree with the district court as to whether there was sufficient evidence to find a genuine issue of material fact for resolution at trial. . . That question is beyond our limited jurisdiction unless Dill can show the record plainly forecloses the district court's finding that a material factual dispute existed as to whether Gerry was acting in a threatening manner. . .Dill cannot show such a one-sided record here. It is true nothing in the record directly contradicts Dill's testimony that Gerry reached for his waistband and turned back toward the door as he exited. At the same time, there is evidence that could indicate Gerry did not act as Dill described. For example, the body-camera recording . . . taken from inside the house demonstrates that Dill shot Gerry immediately upon exiting the house. Considering this, one could question whether Gerry even had time to reach toward his waist and turn back toward the house. . . There are also photographs and an autopsy report in the record clearly showing the entry wound was on Gerry's right side, which Plaintiffs argue casts doubt on whether Gerry turned back to the house as Dill testified. . .This evidence does not necessarily mean it was unreasonable for Dill to believe Gerry posed a threat justifying his use of deadly force. But it does mean the record does not plainly foreclose the district court's finding of a factual dispute as to whether Gerry's actions just prior to the shooting were consistent with Dill's testimony. And resolution of whether the evidence is sufficient to make that dispute 'genuine' is beyond our limited jurisdiction.")

Riggs v. Gibbs, 923 F.3d 518, 523 (8th Cir. 2019) ("We conclude that we lack jurisdiction over Officers Barbour and Feagans' appeal. They claim that they are entitled to qualified immunity against any liability arising out of the warrantless search and seizure of items in Suite 201 because Riggs put forth insufficient evidence to dispute that Long represented to Officer Barbour that he had authority to open the door. They concede that the legality of the search and seizure — and thus their qualified-immunity defense — depends entirely on Long's apparent authority to open the door. The district court concluded that 'questions of material fact exist as to whether Long had plaintiff's consent to open the door and whether the police officers could have reasonably believed they had consent to search the premises.' We lack jurisdiction to consider these genuine disputes of material fact.") Berry v. Doss, 900 F.3d 1017, 1021 (8th Cir. 2018) ("[D]efendants that have been denied qualified immunity cannot create appellate jurisdiction by using qualified immunity verbiage to cloak factual disputes as a legal issue . . . This is true because we are obligated to look beyond their characterization of the issue to 'determine whether [they are] simply arguing that the plaintiff offered insufficient evidence to create a material issue of fact.'. .Here, the rehabilitation officials' arguments hinge on substantive factual disputes such as the extent and magnitude of harassment and threats experienced by Berry, the degree to which the correction officials knew of the harassment and threats, and whether (and how) they sought to protect him. For us to reach their 'legal' argument that they responded reasonably and did not violate clearly established law, we would have to cast aside the district court's factual presumptions, analyze the factual record, and resolve genuine factual disputes against the non-moving party. Such review exceeds our jurisdiction.")

Wenzel v. City of Bourbon, 899 F.3d 598, 601 (8th Cir. 2018) ("We have jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal under the collateral order doctrine. . . . When reviewing the denial of qualified immunity, we accept as true the facts that the district court found were adequately supported, as well as the facts that the district court likely assumed, to the extent they are not 'blatantly contradicted by the record.'. . We review de novo issues of law. . . Plaintiffs moved to dismiss the appeal, arguing that the district court's denial of qualified immunity was based on a disputed fact—namely, whether Storm could see Wenzel's hands. For purposes of our review, we will assume that Storm could see that Wenzel was not holding a weapon in his hands, for the record does not 'blatantly contradict' that fact. We thus deny the motion to dismiss and proceed to the legal question whether Storm's conduct violated Wenzel's clearly established federal rights.")

Thompson v. City of Monticello, Arkansas, 894 F.3d 993, 999-1000 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Singleton and Thompson each believe the video supports his version of how the incident transpired. They also disagree as to whether Thompson's behavior can be characterized as aggressive and confrontational such that a reasonable officer in Singleton's shoes would have believed he posed an immediate threat. Having reviewed the video, we note that it captures only part of the incident, and that it does not clearly show where Thompson's other hand was positioned when he turned to point at his house. But the video does not conclusively disprove Thompson's view of the incident. Singleton simply disagrees with 'the district court's conclusions regarding evidence sufficiency and the genuineness of factual disputes—conclusions that we have no jurisdiction to review.'. . And, under the district court's version of the facts, Singleton's conduct constituted a violation of Thompson's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . . Next, Singleton argues that, in December 2010, it was not clearly established that he could not tase Thompson. . . But Singleton has attempted to define Thompson's constitutional right by describing him as aggressive, confrontational, and resistant. In doing so, Singleton has construed disputed facts in his own favor, and has effectively 'asked us to examine a matter over which we lack jurisdiction, i.e., which facts [Thompson] may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. .Nevertheless, it was clearly established in December 2010 that the facts as found by the district court would give rise to a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . By December 2010, it was clearly established that intentionally tasering, without warning, an individual who has been stopped for a nonviolent misdemeanor offense and who is not resisting or fleeing arrest while his hands are visible violates that individual's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force.")

Webb v. City of Maplewood, 889 F.3d 483, 488 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Unlike the district court's denial of the City's defense of immunity, the question of whether the complaint states a claim of municipal liability cannot normally be reviewed on interlocutory appeal. . . We may review that issue only if it is 'coterminous with, or subsumed in,' the issue of the City's immunity from suit. Manning v. Cotton, 862 F.3d 663, 671 (8th Cir. 2017). The issues are not inextricably intertwined here, however, since we have determined that the district court correctly denied the City immunity without having found it necessary to decide whether the complaint sufficiently pleads the City's Monell liability. . . Since the issues are separate, we do not have jurisdiction to review whether the complaint states a claim of municipal liability, and we express no view on that question.")

Burnikel v. Fong, 886 F.3d 706, 711-12 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The officers have defined the constitutional right in terms of disputed facts viewed in their favor—that Burnikel appeared threatening, that he failed to comply with orders, and that he resisted arrest. This they are not entitled to do. The officers have, in effect, asked us to examine a matter over which we lack jurisdiction—'i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. .Assuming that Burnikel's version of the story is true—that he merely inquired about Hunemiller's well-being, that he did not threaten anyone, did not appear to threaten anyone, did not resist arrest, and did not fail to comply with the officers' commands—a reasonable officer standing in Fong's or Wessels's shoes would have understood that the amount of force they used was excessive. . . Long before Burnikel's arrest, 'this court (among others) had announced that the use of force against a suspect who was not threatening and not resisting may be unlawful,'. . . and it was clearly established in 2013 that it was unlawful to strike a nonviolent person who had committed no crime, who was not fleeing or resisting arrest, who posed little to no threat to anyone's safety, and whose only infraction was to call out to a police officer, whom he mistakenly thought was a man attacking a woman. Accordingly, a reasonable officer would have understood that purposefully dropping Burnikel face-first onto the concrete after he had been subdued and handcuffed would violate clearly established law.")

Raines v. Counseling Assocs., Inc., 883 F.3d 1071, 1075 (8th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 787 (2019) ("Whether the officers reasonably believed Raines posed a sufficient threat depends on what occurred. The district court was unable to make this determination based on the evidence presented. Having reviewed the evidence in the record, we conclude that there is a key factual question in this case about whether Raines advanced on Officer Hanson just before being shot, which is both material and disputed, that precludes us from resolving the legal issue of whether the officers' conduct constitutes a violation of clearly established law. While we have jurisdiction to determine whether conduct constitutes a violation of clearly established law, 'we lack jurisdiction to determine whether the evidence could support a finding that particular conduct occurred at all.'. . Accordingly, the court's determination on the issue of qualified immunity was not a final decision. . . .The appeal is dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.")

Estate of Walker v. Wallace, 881 F.3d 1056, 1059-60 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The district court did indeed mention that 'disputes of fact remain regarding whether Victor voluntarily consented to the inspection,' and we have said that when the appeal from the denial of qualified immunity turns on whether the plaintiff consented to a search, which is a factually intensive inquiry, we lack jurisdiction. . . We conclude nonetheless that we have jurisdiction. Wallace's briefs and oral argument make clear that he is challenging whether he violated clearly established law when he inspected the plaintiffs' house after receiving Millbrooks's signature on a consent-to-search form.

Whether certain actions violate clearly established law is the archetypal question of law that is reviewable on interlocutory appeal. . . We have said that the typical 'appealable issue is whether the federal right allegedly infringed was "clearly established."'. . This is precisely what Wallace asks us to review. The way in which the district court resolved the motion does not necessarily govern whether we have jurisdiction. . . Where the appellant does not challenge that factual disputes exist but rather whether, even if the facts are construed in a light most favorable to the appellees, he violated a clearly established right, we have jurisdiction over the interlocutory appeal.")

Franklin v. Peterson, 878 F.3d 631, 635-38 (8th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 411 (2018) ("On the claim that the officers unlawfully used deadly force against Franklin, the officers argue that the district court accepted nearly all of the facts provided by the officers as undisputed, including, importantly, that Franklin fought with the officers, gained control of a sub-machine gun, shot two of them, and then struggled with an officer over control of the firearm. According to the officers, '[n]one of this was controverted below; all of it was assumed by the district court.' In fact, according to the officers, the district court accepted all of the facts presented and focused on only two additional facts—the alleged time gap and the absence of blood on the MP5—in its denial of qualified immunity. As to these facts, the officers argue that they are either not material or are blatantly contradicted by the record. The problem with this argument, however, is that the district court did not hold that the facts relayed in its recitation were undisputed, and more importantly, we lack jurisdiction to review the factual issues that abound in this appeal. . . .At no point did the district court deem particular facts undisputed, nor did it conduct a legal analysis based upon assumed facts. What the district court did do is plainly hold that the estate's evidence raised a genuine dispute as to whether the story told by the officers is true. For example, the court held that there was at least circumstantial evidence that Franklin was not in possession of the MP5 when Officers Peterson and Meath used deadly force against him. This statement by the district court, read in context, was not a determination that this precise moment was determinative in the constitutional analysis, but rather that based on the evidence presented by the estate, the court simply could not determine whether the evidence presented supported a finding that the officers faced a threat of serious physical harm when they used deadly force. This doubt informed by the evidence of the lapse in time and the absence of blood, according to the district court, calls into dispute the officers' version of the alleged struggle. Because the relevant legal inquiry is whether the officers believed that Franklin posed a threat of serious physical harm, and there was a question as to whether the version advanced by the officers was true, the district court denied qualified immunity in this instance. As stated by the district court, "[i]ndeed, [the estate's] evidence raises fact questions regarding the sequence of events leading to the use of deadly force against Franklin, as well as the existence and nature of any threat posed by Franklin when the officers shot him.' The instant case stands in contrast to appeals from denials of qualified immunity at summary judgment where this court does conduct a qualified immunity analysis based on facts the district court assumed, or necessarily assumed, viewed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. [collecting cases] Unlike Wallace and other cases where this court exercised jurisdiction, what is at issue here are the facts themselves.

The officers here acknowledge that the material issue is whether Officers Peterson and Meath reasonably believed that Franklin posed a threat of serious bodily harm or death. To answer that question the officers argue that the primary facts relied upon by the district court to deny qualified immunity are either immaterial or blatantly contradicted by the record. Both claims involve wholly factual issues we are without jurisdiction to review. . . These officers do not argue that even if inferences are made in the estate's favor the use of deadly force was reasonable in this circumstance, but rather they argue the inferences raised by the estate from the evidence presented are not plausible—a factual dispute. . . The district court did not make any legal determinations based upon facts viewed in the light most favorable to the estate, it merely held that the factual dispute at this stage prevents such an analysis. Whether each officer reasonably believed Franklin posed a sufficient threat depends on what occurred—a determination the district court held it could not make based on the evidence presented thus far. . . The district court's basic conclusion that 'it is not clear what happened or what the parties will prove' is not appealable, as it is not a final order. . .While we have jurisdiction to determine whether conduct the district court deemed sufficiently supported for purposes of summary judgment constitutes a violation of clearly established law, we lack jurisdiction to determine whether the evidence could support a finding that particular conduct occurred at all. . . It is the latter situation we find ourselves in today. There are no facts the district court necessarily assumed that would allow us to conduct a legal analysis, or at least none advanced by the officers. . . The factual arguments made by the officers on appeal regarding materiality and sufficiency should be made to a jury and do not run to a legal issue on appeal. Accordingly, under Johnson, qualified immunity does not prevent suit here because the precise question for trial is the factual question, an issue which is inseparable from, and necessarily informs, the legal one. . . Just as in Johnson, the district court determined that the summary judgment record raised a genuine issue of fact concerning whether the officers faced a threat of bodily injury sufficient to support the use of deadly force. Thus, the court's determination was not a final decision. . . We dismiss the appeal for lack of jurisdiction.

Franklin v. Peterson, 878 F.3d 631, 638-40 (8th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 411 (2018) (Loken, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. When reviewing an interlocutory appeal from the denial of qualified immunity, we have jurisdiction to determine whether 'a given set of facts violates clearly established law.'. . In conducting this review, 'the court of appeals can simply take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment for that (purely legal) reason.'. . .In this case, it is uncontroverted that police officers cornered Walter Franklin hiding in the basement of a home he broke into while fleeing the police. Franklin refused to surrender, and a violent struggle ensued. Franklin grabbed an officer's gun and fired, wounding two officers. Officer Durand continued to struggle with Franklin and yelled, 'he's got a gun.' Officers Peterson and Meath fired their handguns, mortally wounding Franklin. . . .In my view, accepting as true the alleged seventy-second gap between the shots that wounded two officers and the shots that killed Franklin, and the lack of blood on Durand's MP5, there is no existing precedent establishing 'beyond debate' that Officers Peterson and Meath acted unreasonably in using deadly force. . . .On this record, I conclude the district court erred in failing to rely on Supreme Court and Eighth Circuit precedents demonstrating that the alleged unreasonable use of deadly force was not

Hoyland v. McMenomy, 869 F.3d 644, 651-52 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Hoyland misunderstands the legal standard. To be sure, an appellate court cannot maintain jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal when the legal reasonableness of an officer's actions turns on disputed factual questions. . . But here we have no historical facts in dispute. The events of that night were recorded on three cameras located in squad cars and Hoyland's cell phone. The question raised on appeal is whether the material facts, viewed in a light most favorable to Hoyland, show that the officers' actions were objectively reasonable given their knowledge and clearly established law. 'Our inquiry is a quintessentially legal one, and we accordingly have jurisdiction to consider defendants' appeal.'")

Ferguson v. Short, 840 F.3d 508, 511-12 (8th Cir. 2016) ("The parties dispute whether the detectives' appeal involves qualified immunity. Indeed some of the 19 points that the detectives raise on appeal involve issues unrelated to qualified immunity, which we cannot review. For example, we lack jurisdiction under Johnson to review whether 'Ferguson failed to present sufficient evidence to show he was deprived of a constitutional right or that [the detectives] reached an agreement to deprive him of his constitutional rights.' But we usually do not throw the baby out with the bathwater when an interlocutory appeal raises both reviewable qualified-immunity questions and unreviewable ones. See, e.g., White v. McKinley, 519 F.3d 806, 812–13 (8th Cir. 2008). Some of the points raised here do, at least on their surface, raise qualified-immunity issues. Ferguson is correct that the detectives cannot save their interlocutory appeal simply by framing their arguments in terms of qualified immunity. Austin v. Long, 779 F.3d 522, 524 (8th Cir. 2015). But instead of classifying the multiple points on appeal as either wheat or chaff, we resolve this case on the ground that we simply lack an order denying a motion for summary judgment on qualified-immunity grounds. The district court issued a thorough 62-page opinion resolving the motion for summary judgment, but qualified immunity made only a brief cameo appearance in one paragraph at the beginning of the opinion's discussion section. In that paragraph, the district court set out the broad principles of qualified immunity; nowhere were these principles, in this paragraph or elsewhere in the opinion, applied to the facts. The opinion reads like an ordinary summary-judgment ruling, determining if there are factual disputes and resolving legal points unrelated to qualified immunity. We are therefore unable to construe this order as one from which an interlocutory appeal can lie. Ferguson asks us simply to dismiss this appeal, arguing that the detectives failed to raise and preserve the qualified-immunity issue in the district court altogether and only now couch their appeal in terms of qualified immunity to ensure our jurisdiction. We are unwilling to go that far. References to qualified immunity are peppered throughout the detectives' suggestions in support of their motion for summary judgment. In fact, the first numbered paragraph in the detectives' two-page motion for summary judgment says, 'Summary Judgment is also appropriate on the basis of qualified immunity.' So this is not a situation where the detectives raise an argument only in an inconspicuous footnote. . . Since we conclude that the detectives raised the qualified-immunity issue on the face of the papers, we remand the case to the district court for consideration of the motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. In considering that motion, the district court of course can decide as a preliminary matter whether the detectives discussed the issue of qualified immunity in sufficient detail and with sufficient citations to undisputed record evidence to enable the district court to rule on the matter. . . If it determines that the detectives did so, the district court can then enter an explicit order and judgment on the matter one way or the other. If it determines that the detectives did not do so, the district court can proceed to resolve the case in the ordinary course and may consider any motions by the detectives as may be consistent with any scheduling orders that the district court deems applicable. We deny the motion to dismiss the appeal and remand the case to the district court.")

Mallak v. City of Baxter, 823 F.3d 441, 446-47 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Unlike in Johnson and Plumhoff, key factual questions in the present case are both material and disputed. Mallak contends that the officers' accesses of her data violated the DPPA, which prohibits the access and use of motor vehicle records 'for a purpose not permitted' under the act. . . According to Mallak, because she had no interactions with law enforcement related to these accesses of her information, the officers must have accessed her data for personal reasons unrelated to their official duties. The appellants do not dispute that accessing an individual's data to satisfy some personal interest constitutes a violation of clearly established law under the DPPA. Instead, they contend that Mallak failed to present evidence creating a factual dispute regarding whether the officers accessed her data for such an improper purpose. . . . The district court denied the defendants qualified immunity because it found that these facts gave rise to a genuine dispute regarding the officers' purposes in accessing Mallak's data, particularly as Mallak had not yet had the opportunity to take the officers' depositions in order to inquire further into the circumstances of their accesses. Under Johnson, we lack jurisdiction to reevaluate on interlocutory appeal the district court's determination that this question 'sets forth a "genuine" issue of fact for trial.'")

Thompson v. Murray, 800 F.3d 979, 983-84 (8th Cir. 2015) ("The record does not blatantly contradict the version of the facts that the district court likely assumed. . . This version of the facts has at least some support in the forensic evidence, camera footage, the opinions of Thompson's experts, and common sense. Defendants argue that the facts were undisputedly otherwise, but this argument challenges the district court's conclusions regarding evidence sufficiency and the genuineness of factual disputes-conclusions that we have no jurisdiction to review. Murray is entitled to qualified immunity unless the above-described facts demonstrate that he violated a clearly established constitutional or statutory right of which a reasonable person would have known. . . An officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing suspect unless the suspect poses an immediate and significant threat of serious injury or death to the officer or to bystanders. . . This general standard can be sufficient to clearly establish a fleeing suspect's rights in a case where they have obviously been infringed. . . Defendants argue that in a more particularized sense, 'there is no case law clearly establishing that the use of deadly force is inappropriate' against a suspect who is 'bearing down on' an officer and who is 'driving into oncoming traffic through a heavily trafficked intersection while running a red light after being chased by police and refusing to stop even when guns are aimed at him.' Although this argument is framed to pose the purely legal question whether Jermell's right to be free from the use of deadly force was clearly established, it is founded on facts not assumed by the district court—for example, that, at the time of the shooting, Jermell's vehicle was moving toward Murray, who was in an unprotected position, or toward the slowed or stopped oncoming traffic, and at a high enough speed to pose an immediate and significant risk of serious injury. At bottom, this is an argument about the sufficiency of the evidence, a question we lack jurisdiction to review, however inventively it is structured as an abstract legal argument.")

Ellison v. Lesher, 796 F.3d 910, 915-17 (8th Cir. 2015) ("Although the precise fact pattern described by the district court has not been the subject of a Supreme Court decision, officers were on fair notice that they could not enter a home simply because they perceived as mouthy a resident who told them that he wanted no help and desired to be left alone. Indeed, the officers do not argue that entry was permissible on that basis. They contend, as noted, that other facts not accepted by the district court justified their search. Limited as we are by the facts assumed in the district court's order, we affirm the denial of qualified immunity on the claim that McCrillis and Lesher unlawfully entered Ellison's residence. . . . We conclude, again, that we cannot accept the contention advanced by Lesher, because her framing of the abstract legal issue is premised on a set of facts that was not assumed by the district court. Lesher avers that Ellison charged at her and the other officers while swinging a cane. The district court, construing the evidence in the light most favorable to Ellison, thought it was 'unclear whether or not Ellison was holding his cane,' and that '[d]iscrepancies and variations in the officers' testimony make it impossible to determine what the facts and circumstances confronting Lesher were at the moment when she shot and killed Ellison.'. . We do not have jurisdiction to review whether Ellison's estate will be able to prove at trial that Lesher shot Ellison while he was empty-handed. . . We must accept for purposes of our decision that Ellison was not wielding the cane when the shooting occurred. Considering the abstract legal issue based on the facts assumed by the district court, we conclude that Lesher is not entitled to qualified immunity. If Lesher shot Ellison while he was simply standing in his apartment and holding no cane, then there were not reasonable grounds to believe that Ellison posed a serious threat of death or serious physical injury to the officers or others. Ellison's refusal of a command to lie down on the floor did not, by itself, make reasonable the use of deadly force. Ellison's right to be secure against a seizure by the use of deadly force under those circumstances was clearly established as of December 2010. Since the 1985 decision in Tennessee v. Garner, 'officers have been on notice that they may not use deadly force unless the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'. . Although the precise scenario described by the district court does not appear in a reported decision, the officers were on fair notice that the use of deadly force would not be reasonable. Lesher does not contend that a reasonable officer could have believed that it was reasonable to use deadly force merely to enforce an order that Ellison lie on the ground. Her argument is premised on a different set of facts that the district court declined to accept in resolving the motion. We therefore affirm the denial of qualified immunity on Ellison's claim against Lesher based on the use of deadly force.")

Franklin v. Young, 790 F.3d 865, 867 (8th Cir. 2015) ("Essentially, Young argues that the district court erred in finding a genuine dispute of material fact over whether he violated Franklin's Eighth Amendment rights. By challenging the district court's finding on sufficiency of the evidence, Young is 'asking us to engage in the time-consuming task of reviewing a factual controversy about intent.'. . . This is 'precisely the type of controversy that the [Supreme] Court concluded should not be subject to interlocutory appeal' because of unnecessary delay, the 'comparative expertise of trial and appellate courts, and wise use of appellate resources.'. . For these reasons, we lack jurisdiction to consider whether the pretrial record sets forth a genuine issue of material fact, and therefore this appeal is dismissed.")

Letterman v. Does, 789 F.3d 856, 861 (8th Cir. 2015) ("Appellants challenge simply whether their actions, as supported by the evidence and reasonable inferences drawn from that evidence when taken in the light most favorable to the Lettermans, constitute deliberate indifference. The Lettermans first argue the question presented goes beyond our jurisdiction. We have jurisdiction to hear the appeal only if it presents a question of law. . . The Lettermans assert Appellants are attempting to challenge a factual, rather than a legal, conclusion; we disagree. We retain jurisdiction to consider legal issues, such as the application of law to set of facts. . . In this case, we retain jurisdiction to answer Appellants' legal question: 'whether the facts [as presented on summary judgment] support a claim of violation of clearly established law.'")

New v. Denver, 787 F.3d 895, 899-902 (8th Cir. 2015) ("'When there is no dispute among the parties as to the relevant facts ... a court should always be able to determine as a matter of law whether or not an officer is eligible for qualified immunity.'. . However, if a public official's qualified immunity as well as his Fourth Amendment liability turn on genuine issues of material fact, rather than on an issue of law, we lack appellate jurisdiction because the decision denying qualified immunity is not an immediately appealable collateral order. . . New argues we lack jurisdiction in this case because the district court's ruling was based upon a genuine issue of material fact, 'whether Mr. Denver truly made an honest or objectively reasonable mistake in believing the leaves to be marijuana.' On the unique facts presented, this threshold issue requires close scrutiny. Whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity because he 'acted reasonably under settled law in the circumstances' is a question of law for the court, both before and after trial. . . Predicate facts that will defeat summary judgment based on qualified immunity 'include only the relevant circumstances and the acts of the parties themselves, and not the conclusions of others about the reasonableness of those actions.'. . .In this case the critical jurisdictional issue is whether any disputed facts are material to the question whether Sgt. Denver could reasonably have believed he had probable cause to arrest David New for unlawful possession of marijuana. The district court concluded that Sgt. Denver's 'credibility' was a disputed issue of material fact 'in the face of contrary evidence—a negative lab result and the contrary averments of Mr. New.' Here, the court's reference to credibility is logical and highlights the unusual nature of the issue. The Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized 'that an arresting officer's state of mind (except for the facts that he knows) is irrelevant to the existence of probable cause.'. . Thus, the Court has held, an arrest that is based upon sufficient probable cause does not violate the Fourth Amendment because the arresting officer did not correctly identify the law being violated, or because he made a pretextual arrest for another law enforcement purpose. . . Here, however, the existence of probable cause turned on Denver's belief that the leaves were marijuana. Qualified immunity does not protect 'the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.' Thus, whether the arrest was objectively reasonable for qualified immunity purposes requires an evaluation of the objective credibility of Sgt. Denver's conclusion that the two leaves were marijuana. Our appellate jurisdiction turns on whether there are disputed predicate facts preventing prompt determination of this issue of law. In our view, the 'contrary evidence' cited by the district court is not relevant to this issue. New's contrary opinion and the negative lab report are evidence that the two leaves were not in fact marijuana. But neither is, alone or in combination, material to the question of arguable probable cause. Because the Constitution 'does not guarantee that only the guilty will be arrested,' New's assertion that he was not in possession of marijuana 'is largely irrelevant.'. . New testified that he had only seen marijuana leaves on television, and that he only briefly saw a single finger of one leaf sticking out of the bag where Denver put the two leaves. This is not probative evidence that Denver lacked a reasonable, good faith belief that he had probable cause to arrest because he had found two leaves of marijuana in New's car. Likewise, the subsequent negative lab report does not cast material doubt on Denver's testimony that he believed the two leaves were marijuana. . . . New has failed to identify any other material fact disputes that preclude us from deciding whether Denver had arguable probable cause to arrest as a matter of law.Thus, we have jurisdiction to determine that issue. . . . On these undisputed facts, we conclude that an objectively reasonable police officer with Sgt. Denver's training and experience could have reasonably believed that the leaves he found in David New's car were marijuana, giving Denver probable cause to arrest and have the leaves tested for THC. New cites no case in which an officer was denied qualified immunity in analogous circumstances, and we have found none. More than evidence of a mistake is required to deny a public official qualified immunity from § 1983 damage liability.")

New v. Denver, 787 F.3d 895, 902-03 (8th Cir. 2015) (Gruender, J., dissenting) ("The court correctly cites Johnson v. Jones, which held that 'a defendant, entitled to invoke a qualified immunity defense, may not appeal a district court's summary judgment order insofar as that order determines whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a "genuine" issue of fact for trial.'. . But the court nonetheless reviews whether the pretrial record here sets forth a genuine issue of fact for trial. Instead, we should follow Johnson and dismiss this interlocutory appeal for lack of jurisdiction. As the court explains, New's § 1983 claim requires an evaluation of the objective credibility of Sgt. Denver's conclusion that the two leaves were marijuana. New argues that 'no reasonable officer would have concluded the leaves were marijuana.' He testified that the part of the leaf he saw did not look like marijuana 'at all'; Denver testified that the leaves were marijuana. Based on this and other evidence, the district court held that 'issues of fact remain as to whether Mr. Denver truly made an honest or objectively reasonable mistake in believing the leaves to be marijuana.' Under Johnson, we cannot review such determinations of 'evidence sufficiency.'. . Recognizing this limitation, the court finds jurisdiction by deeming New's evidence immaterial rather than 'probative' of Sgt. Denver's 'reasonable, good faith belief that he had probable cause.'. . But this is simply weighing evidence. Every fact-based summary-judgment ruling asks whether a party's evidence is sufficiently probative. That is how trial courts decide what Johnson says we cannot examine: 'which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. . As such, to accept the court's analysis undercuts Johnson significantly. And, moreover, the court's analysis contradicts our earlier holding that we cannot 'decide whether a dispute is genuine by finding certain evidence insufficiently probative.' Livers v. Schenck, 700 F.3d 340, 350–51 (8th Cir.2012); see Mader v. United States, 654 F.3d 794, 800 (8th Cir.2011) (en banc). Accepting the court's analysis also implicates Johnson's concern about increased appellate workloads. . . . When we face more complicated cases, the court's rule would have us sift through, not the hundred or so pages here, but thousands of pages, carefully sorting for nuggets of probative evidence. This is precisely what Johnson chose to forbid. I am sympathetic to the court's desire to reach the merits. . . . Our lack of jurisdiction subjects Denver to continued suit based on what seems like scant evidence. Nonetheless, when the Supreme Court decided Johnson, it was aware of the need to protect officials from erroneously permitted trials. . . The Court still held that we cannot review an order deciding 'whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a "genuine" issue of fact for trial.'. . As such, we should dismiss this appeal for lack of jurisdiction. I respectfully dissent.")

Austin v. Long, 779 F.3d 522, 524 (8th Cir. 2015) ("Here, Long argues that 'Austin did not put forth sufficient evidence to demonstrate that Long's decision to terminate his employment was motivated by any racial animus,' so the district court erred in finding a dispute of material fact over whether Long's stated reasons for firing Austin were a pretext for racial discrimination. By 'challenging the district court's finding of the sufficiency of the evidence,' Long is 'asking us to engage in the time-consuming task of reviewing a factual controversy about intent.'. . This is 'precisely the type of controversy that the [Supreme] Court concluded should not be subject to interlocutory appeal' because of unnecessary delay, the 'comparative expertise of trial and appellate courts, and wise use of appellate resources.'. . We conclude that we lack jurisdiction to consider Long's sufficiency of the evidence challenge to the district court's findings on pretext. . .To the extent that Long challenges the district court's interpretations of law, we review them de novo. . . Long is not entitled to qualified immunity if Austin establishes that Long violated his clearly established constitutional rights. . . Austin asserts that Long violated his clearly established right to be free from racial discrimination in the workplace. Austin supports this assertion by offering evidence that Long treated him differently from similarly situated coworkers, thus proving that Long's stated reasons for firing him were a pretext for racial discrimination.")

Walton v. Dawson, 752 F.3d 1109, 1116 (8th Cir. 2014) ("[I]f the parties agree on the law but disagree about the facts, there is no issue for us to decide on an interlocutory appeal. . . Applying these principles to this case, we have no jurisdiction at this juncture to decide whether 'the district court's determination of evidentiary sufficiency' was correct. . . We can, however, accept the district court's factual findings as true and decide whether those facts, as a 'purely legal issue,' involve a clearly established violation of federal law. . . Because this is what the officials' appeal asks us to do, we have jurisdiction over this case under the collateral order doctrine.")

Payne v. Britten, 749 F.3d 697, 701, 702 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Our court, therefore, has jurisdiction over interlocutory appeals arising not only from a district court's reasoned denial of qualified immunity, but also from a district court's failure or refusal to rule on qualified immunity. In the latter instance, however, our court only exercises its jurisdiction to compel the district court to decide the qualified immunity question. . . . Because the district court in the present case did not decide whether the officials are immune from Payne's suit, we have jurisdiction to order a remand. Exercising that jurisdiction, we now, as we must, remand the case for the district court to conduct the proper analysis. . . . We write further because, although we are compelled to remand, we are sympathetic with the district court in this case and understand clearly why the district court followed the seemingly reasonable, but impermissible, path that it chose. The prison officials are legally entitled to a ruling on their assertions of qualified immunity. In the present case, as with many cases, however, such a ruling would appear to be at the expense of efficiently getting to the heart of the material issue in the case. Here, that issue clearly involves a simple fact question: what is in the withheld mail (much of which is mail that only the officials have seen)? In this regard, the contents of the withheld mail appear to be contested. . . As we understand the core legal issues surrounding the allegations in this case, any analysis of the merits of the qualified immunity defense will require the district court to assess whether the regulation or policy at issue under which the mail is being held is valid and neutral and whether it addresses a legitimate penological concern. . . A qualified immunity analysis will then require the district court to conduct an independent review of the evidence to determine if the officials have demonstrated an exaggerated response to those penological concerns in relation to a particular item of mail that has been confiscated. . . .In the absence of such evidence, the district court is bound to take the plaintiff's allegations as true and presume that the mail does not, in fact, contain material that runs afoul of any neutral and valid restrictions. As such, it would seem that if the content of the mail is contested, the district court cannot grant qualified immunity to the officials in this case without first reviewing the withheld mail. Simply put, the district court appears to have correctly determined that this is a case where, ultimately and eventually, the documents will matter for the qualified immunity analysis. Nevertheless, the district court may not force public officials into subsequent stages of district court litigation without first ruling on a properly presented motion to dismiss asserting the defense of qualified immunity. Courts may ask only whether the facts as alleged plausibly state a claim and whether that claim asserts a violation of a clearly established right. . . .In summary, all parties at all times are entitled to their appropriate share of process. The defendants in this case, like any public officials, are entitled to a reasoned denial or grant of their claim of qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage, the summary judgment stage, and any other permissible stage at which a proper motion is filed. By following the path described herein, courts will ensure in all cases that public officials receive this process. . .We reverse the district court's order converting the officials' motion to dismiss into a motion for summary judgment; vacate the district court's partial denial of the officials' motion for summary judgment; and remand with instructions for the district court to decide, consistent with this opinion, whether the officials are entitled to qualified immunity on the pleadings under Rule 12(b)(6).")

Payne v. Britten, 749 F.3d 697, 704-08 (8th Cir. 2014) (Riley, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("District courts have an obligation to 'resolv[e] [qualified] immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation.'. . In Payne's case, the earliest possible stage was the

officials' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The officials appropriately based their motion on qualified immunity, invoking their entitlement to be free of the burden of further litigating Payne's claims. To rule on that motion, '[t]he district court needed to first determine whether the complaint alleged enough facts to demonstrate the violation of a clearly established statutory or constitutional right.'. . Instead of making that determination and ruling on the motion by either granting or denying qualified immunity at the pleading stage, the district court refused the officials the decision—one way or the other—to which they were entitled. On its own motion, the district court directed the officials to 'supplement the record with properly authenticated evidence to show that they were censoring and confiscating [Payne's] mail in accordance with a legitimate criminal investigation.' That sua sponte order was an abuse of discretion. The officials had a right to a qualified immunity ruling on the pleadings. . . To vindicate their right to such a ruling, the officials had no obligation to submit any 'properly authenticated evidence.' On the contrary, qualified immunity provides 'an entitlement not to ... face [such] burdens of litigation, conditioned on the resolution of the essentially legal question whether the conduct of which the plaintiff complains violated clearly established law.'. . This entitlement is so important that it may be asserted, appealed, reasserted, and again appealed at multiple stages in the same case. . . As Behrens makes clear, by refusing to decide whether Payne's 'complaint alleged enough facts to demonstrate the violation of a clearly established statutory or constitutional right,'. . . the district court deprived the officials of two definite opportunities and a third possible opportunity to avoid the cost and inconvenience of producing evidence. First, a decision by the district court on the pleadings that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity would obviously have freed the officials from the burden of ongoing litigation. Second, if the district court decided the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity, the officials could have immediately appealed that denial to our court. . . This second opportunity to challenge the sufficiency of the plaintiff's pleadings frequently proves decisive. . . Third, if our court decided the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity, the officials could have petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari—an unlikely but possible path to qualified immunity at the pleading stage. . . .Like the majority, I am 'sympathetic with the district court in this case,'. . . but for very different reasons. I am sympathetic to the difficult task any district court confronts trying to apply the complex doctrine of qualified immunity in the face of opinions which demand a ruling. . . without providing any guidance on how to reach a correct ruling. Rather than discussing the 'efficiency' of not following the law, the court's opinion should clarify how to apply this law. Having prepared some thoughts in the hope of assisting with the qualified immunity analysis, I offer the following. A determination of the qualified immunity question at a particular stage in the proceedings does not necessarily mean a grant of immunity: often, the determination entails a reasoned denial of immunity. But without a thorough qualified immunity analysis by the district court—either granting or denying immunity—'we cannot fulfill our function of review.'. . . Qualified immunity requires district courts to answer two questions. Question one: did each individual defendant official violate a constitutional or statutory right? . . . Question two: was the right clearly established when the violation occurred? . . . A district court may answer either question first. . . . What a district court cannot do is deny qualified immunity without resolving both questions in the plaintiff's favor. . . Neither is a district court permitted to decline to answer either question. . . At the pleading stage, these principles mean an individual defendant official is entitled to qualified immunity 'unless [the] plaintiff pleads facts showing (1) that the official violated a statutory or constitutional right, and (2) that the right was 'clearly established' at the time of the challenged conduct.". . At the summary judgment stage, a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity unless '(1) the facts, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, demonstrate the deprivation of a constitutional or statutory right; and (2) the right was clearly established at the time of the deprivation.'. . At the trial stage, a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity unless (1) the jury reasonably finds facts establishing that the defendant violated a constitutional or statutory right, and (2) the right was clearly established at the time the violation occurred. . .The first question develops from stage to stage: it evolves from a construction of the pleadings, to a review of the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, to a deferential consideration of facts found by a jury. The second question does not change: the question is always whether the right was clearly established. . . .To meet their burden to show the right at issue was clearly established, 'plaintiffs [must] point either to "cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident" or to "a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful."'. . Without one or the other, qualified immunity applies—regardless of whether there is a factual dispute about what occurred—because the defendant did not have 'fair and clear warning' that his conduct was unlawful. . . This is true 'whether or not the constitutional [or statutory] rule applied by the [district] court [i]s correct,' because qualified immunity applies unless the rule is 'beyond debate.'")

Burton v. Arkansas Secretary of State, 737 F.3d 1219, 1237 (8th Cir. 2013) ("In the present case, '[o]ur jurisdiction on this appeal is limited to the question of qualified immunity, but the answer to that question necessarily includes a determination whether any constitutional or statutory rights were violated in the first place.'. . .Here, 'our resolution of the qualified immunity issue' as to Burton's § 1983 race discrimination claim 'necessarily resolves' the Title VII race discrimination claim. . . Therefore, we conclude that we may exercise pendent jurisdiction over such claim. For the reasons set forth in Part II.A., supra, we hold that the district court correctly denied summary judgment to the state defendants on Burton's Title VII race discrimination claim. However, our resolution of the § 1983 retaliation claim against Chief Hedden does not 'necessarily resolve' the Title VII retaliation claim against the state defendants. We did not analyze the merits of the § 1983 retaliation claim due to Burton's failure to plead a violation of his First Amendment rights. Therefore, we decline to exercise pendent jurisdiction over the Title VII retaliation claim against the state defendants.")

Roberts v. City of Omaha, 723 F.3d 966, 975, 976 (8th Cir. 2013) ("The district court also denied summary judgment to the city, reasoning '[t]here are ... issues of fact with respect to the adequacy of the City's training.' We ordinarily only have ' "jurisdiction on interlocutory appeal ... [to resolve] the issue of qualified immunity."'. . However, we have pendent appellate jurisdiction over certain claims that are 'inextricably intertwined' with the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Roberts alleged the city deprived him of the benefits of a public service—safe and lawful police detention—because the city failed properly to train its employees under the ADA and Rehabilitation Act. As is the case for failure to train claims arising under § 1983, actions under the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act require proof of deliberate indifference. . . In Szabla, we held, where the constitutional right allegedly violated by individual officers was not clearly established at the time of the occurrence, the municipality could not be liable for failure to train because the risk of harm 'was not so obvious at the time of th[e] incident that [the municipality's] actions [could] properly be characterized as deliberate indifference.'. .Roberts can only prevail on his ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims by showing the city's deliberate indifference to his alleged right to be free from discrimination in the circumstances of this case, but the city, like the individual officers, lacked notice the officers' actions might have violated Roberts's asserted rights. See id. Our decision granting qualified immunity to the individual officers necessarily forecloses liability against the municipality on Roberts's failure to train claims as well. . . The issue of the city's liability therefore is 'inextricably intertwined' with the qualified immunity issues in this appeal. . . Having jurisdiction over this pendent appellate claim, we reverse the district court's denial of the city's motion for summary judgment on Roberts's ADA and Rehabilitation Act failure to train claims against the city.")

S.L. ex rel. Lenderman v. St. Louis Metropolitan Police Dept. Bd. of Police Com'rs, 725 F.3d 843, 854, 855 (8th Cir. 2013) ("S.L. also need not prove liability of any individual municipal employee to succeed on her deliberate indifference claim because the Board may be liable if 'the combined actions of multiple officials' created a pattern of unconstitutional conduct which could not be individually attributed to any one officer. . . Nor would a grant of qualified immunity to Harris and Isshawn–O'Quinn 'necessarily resolve[ ]' S.L.'s claim that the Board, Isom, and Harris failed to supervise Arnold, Lorthridge, and Isshawn–O'Quinn. . . To establish liability for failure to supervise, S.L. must show 'deliberate indifference [to] or tacit authorization of the offensive acts.'. . With respect to the Board and Chief of Police Isom, this issue 'requires entirely different analys[i]s' from the question of qualified immunity, Veneklase v. City of Fargo, 78 F.3d 1264, 1270 (8th Cir.1996), because it would require examination of SLMPD supervision and training policies rather than the actions of individual officers, see Tilson v. Forrest City Police Dep't, 28 F.3d 802, 812–13 (8th Cir.1994). Granting qualified immunity to Harris also would not resolve S.L.'s failure to supervise claim against him. Harris is entitled to qualified immunity if his conduct did not violate 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known,' Harlow, 457 U.S. at 818, but he may be liable for failure to supervise even without having 'personally participated in any constitutional deprivation' or 'know[ing] about any violation at the time it occurred,' Wever v. Lincoln Cnty., Neb., 388 F.3d 601, 606 (8th Cir.2004) (citation omitted). The issues raised by the municipal defendants are thus not inextricably intertwined with the question of qualified immunity, and we lack jurisdiction to consider them at this time.")

Robbins v. Becker, 715 F.3d 691, 694 (8th Cir. 2013) ("The district court must resolve immunity questions with sufficient clarity for the court of appeals effectively to exercise its interlocutory review of the legal issues surrounding the denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity. We have 'rejected attempts [by district courts] to enter truncated orders that did not provide a "thorough determination of [the defendants'] claim of qualified immunity."'. . '[R]ecogniz[ing] the importance of a thorough qualified immunity analysis,'. . . we repeatedly have remanded where the district court's 'analysis is so scant that we are unable to discern if the district court even applied both steps of the qualified immunity inquiry to all of the summary judgment claims[.]'. . .Like in Solomon, Handt, McNeese, Katosang, and O'Neil, the district court in this case failed to discuss the qualified immunity standard or otherwise demonstrate it was applying the two-step qualified immunity analysis. . . The officers 'are entitled to a thorough determination of their claim of qualified immunity.'. . .We remand to the district court for a more detailed consideration and explanation, consistent with this opinion, of the officers' claims of qualified immunity.")

Solomon v. Petray, 699 F.3d 1034, 1038, 1039 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Here, the cursory nature of the district court's denial of summary judgment requires that we remand this case for a more detailed consideration of the claims of qualified immunity. The order contains no findings of fact, viewed in the light most favorable to Solomon or otherwise. It is not even apparent from the text of the order whether the district court considered the claim of personal use of excessive force by Thomas, which Solomon raised for the first time in his brief in response to the motions for summary judgment. However, the absence of findings of fact is not the infirmity which requires us to remand the case. . . It is instead the complete absence in the order of any explicit reference to, or analysis of, Jones's and Thomas's claims of qualified immunity which leaves us unable to determine whether the district court even considered the issue of qualified immunity before denying the motions for summary judgment. We express no opinion regarding the merits of Jones's and Thomas's claims of qualified immunity. However, 'we are certain, and the case law is clear, that they are entitled to a thorough determination of their claim[s] of qualified immunity if that immunity is to mean anything at all.'")

Handt v. Lynch, 681 F.3d 939, 944, 945 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Here, as in Jones, 'we are unable to discern if the district court even applied both steps of the qualified immunity inquiry to all of the summary judgment claims.'. . In the background section of the order, the district court did an admirable job of explaining the facts of this case and construing those facts in the light most favorable to Handt. This is not, then, a situation where we are called upon to 'undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.'. . The problem here arises instead in the analysis of the qualified immunity claims. For instance, the district court repeatedly stated in the analysis that there were material issues of fact in dispute. When considering the issue of qualified immunity, however, the district court is to 'view those facts in a light most favorable to the non-moving party as long as those facts are not so "blatantly contradicted by the record ... that no reasonable jury could believe [them]."'. . Then the court should determine if those facts demonstrate a constitutional violation that is clearly established. The district court's decision, however, lacks consideration of the individual defendants' actions with respect to each of the constitutional claims. As relevant here, Handt has raised five separate claims of constitutional violations (unlawful seizure, unlawful search, denial of procedural due process, denial of substantive due process, and cruel and unusual punishment) against two sets of defendants (the intake officers and Carson). Thus, the court must analyze whether the facts pertaining to each defendant, or in this case the two sets of defendants, support Handt's claims of constitutional violations. . . .These defendants are entitled to consideration by the district court of their claims to qualified immunity as to each of the constitutional claims asserted against them. Therefore, it is necessary that we remand this matter to the district court to engage in a full qualified immunity analysis in the first instance.")

Jones v. McNeese, 675 F.3d 1158, 1162, 1163 (8th Cir. 2012) (Jones II) ("In this case, the district court's analysis on qualified immunity is no more thorough or informative than the orders we rejected in O'Neil and Katosang. Indeed, we find it difficult to discern from the order whether the district court applied either step of the qualified immunity inquiry to the claims alleged by the plaintiff(s) . . . And, the passing reference to the previous denial order does not provide more clarity because the district court did not consider summary judgment facts at that stage in the proceedings. . . Accordingly, drawing upon the reasoning in O'Neil and Katosang, we conclude the district court's analysis was far too '"abbreviated,"' '"terse,"' 'and '"not laid out step-by-step,"' undermining the mandate that requires district courts to make 'a thorough determination of [the defendant's] claim of qualified immunity.'. . The Supreme Court has recognized that because it is 'extremely helpful to a reviewing court,' a district court 'presumably will often state' 'the facts that [it] assumed when it denied summary judgment.'. . Here, the district court declined to articulate any facts. We make clear, however, that our decision to remand is not based on this failure—that is, that the lack of these facts may require us to 'undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.'. . Rather, we remand because the analysis is so scant that we are unable to discern if the district court even applied both steps of the qualified immunity inquiry to all of the summary judgment claims. And, ultimately, if qualified immunity is to mean anything at all, Dr. McNeese was entitled to a more thorough determination of his claim of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. . .Therefore, as we have previously explained, 'we can neither affirm nor reverse the denial of qualified immunity based on the cursory commentary advanced by the district court in its denial order.'. . . Accordingly, we vacate and remand this case to the district court for a more detailed consideration and explanation of the validity, or not, of the defendant's claim to qualified immunity.") [See Jones v. McNeese, 883 F.Supp.2d 897 (D. Neb. 2012) (denying qualified immunity on remand with detailed analysis), rev'd by Jones v. McNeese, 746 F.3d 887 (8th Cir. 2014) (finding plaintiff produced insufficient evidence of racial discrimination or due process violation and thus defendant was entitled to qualified immunity)]

Cooper v. Martin, 634 F.3d 477, 481, 482 (8th Cir. 2011) ("The defendants argue that this court has pendent appellate jurisdiction to dismiss the § 1983 claims against the official-capacity defendants because those claims are inextricably intertwined with the consideration of Martin's qualified immunity. See Lockridge v. Bd. of Trustees of University of Ark., 315 F.3d 1005, 1012-13 (8th Cir.2003) (en banc). 'An issue is inextricably intertwined with properly presented issues only when the appellate resolution of the collateral appeal necessarily resolves the pendent claims as well.'. . '[I]n order for municipal liability to attach, individual liability must first be found on an underlying substantive claim.'. . Martin's qualified immunity therefore is inextricably intertwined with the liability of the official-capacity defendants. Because Martin is entitled to qualified immunity, the official-capacity defendants cannot be subject to § 1983 liability.")

Doe v. Flaherty, 623 F.3d 577, 586 (8th Cir. 2010) ("In addition to our limited jurisdiction to review the denial of qualified immunity, we have jurisdiction to review 'issues of law that are closely related to the qualified immunity determination.' Henderson v. Baird, 29 F.3d 464, 467 (8th Cir.1994). We may exercise 'pendent appellate jurisdiction ... where the otherwise nonappealable decision is inextricably intertwined with the appealable decision.'. . We have held that two issues are inextricably intertwined 'when the appellate resolution of the collateral appeal necessarily resolves the pendent claim as well.'. . In this case, the resolution of the qualified immunity claim necessarily resolves the Title IX claim, and we thus have jurisdiction to review the district court's denial of the motion to dismiss on that claim."

Shannon v. Koehler, 616 F.3d 855, 865, 866 (8th Cir. 2010) ("[W]e reject the defendants' assertion that we have pendent appellate jurisdiction to review either the district court's denial of summary judgment on the Monell claims against the City and Chief Frisbie or the district court's decision on the bifurcation issue. . . . The only remotely plausible argument for exercising jurisdiction over the present defendants' pendent claims hinges on finding that those claims are 'inextricably intertwined' with Officer Koehler's qualified immunity defense. . .They are not. . . . Our decision to uphold the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Officer Koehler did not resolve whether the City and Chief Frisbie are entitled to summary judgment on the Monell claims, so those matters cannot be described as inextricably intertwined. . . . Likewise, our resolution of the qualified immunity appeal said nothing about the propriety of the district court's decision on the bifurcation issue, so those matters are not inextricably intertwined either. In short, the requirements for exercising pendent appellate jurisdiction are not met in this case because affirming the denial of qualified immunity to Officer Koehler did not resolve the pendent claims. Since we see no other source of jurisdiction to consider the pendent claims, we dismiss this appeal insofar as it challenges the district court's denial of summary judgment on the Monell claims against the City and Chief Frisbie and the district court's decision on the bifurcation issue.")

Langford v. Norris, 614 F.3d 445, 458, 459 (8th Cir. 2010) ("We can certainly review the denial of qualified immunity to the state defendants without also reviewing the denial of summary judgment to the medical defendants. The question, then, is whether the medical defendants' appeal raises a pendent claim that is inextricably intertwined with Byus's qualified immunity appeal. . . . The medical defendants contend that '[t]he issue of actual injury [presented in their appeal] is dispositive as to the claims made against ... Byus.'. . . The medical defendants get the analysis backward; resolving the collateral claim (the denial of qualified immunity) must necessarily resolve the pendent claim (what the medical defendants call the 'issue of actual injury'), not the other way around. The pendent claim that the medical defendants have identified is not coterminous with, or subsumed in, the qualified immunity claim, for holding that Byus is entitled to qualified immunity would not necessarily decide whether Langford and Hardin were actually injured by the medical defendants' alleged failure to provide efficacious treatment. . . . Consequently, we dismiss the medical defendants' appeal in its entirety.")

Petersen v. Reisch, 585 F.3d 1091, 1093 (8th Cir. 2009) ("Where, as here, the denial of a summary judgment motion based upon qualified immunity contemplates the filing of another such motion well before trial, Mitchell is not implicated. The district court expressly did not 'conclusively determine the disputed question' when it denied the motion without prejudice and ordered Petersen to amend her complaint, and Reisch and Russell to answer anew. Qualified immunity is still reviewable and is not effectively lost with the denial of the defendants' motion because Reisch and Russell may file another similar motion after Petersen amends her complaint. Unlike in Mitchell, where there were 'simply no further steps that [could] be taken in the District Court to avoid the trial the defendant maintains is barred,' the district court has essentially reset the litigation at the pleading stage. . . The district court's rulings were administrative and equitable in nature, allowing Petersen's new counsel to clarify her pleading after which Reisch and Russell may pursue their same defenses, including qualified immunity. The district court's order did not rest on any issue of law, . . .or resolve the qualified immunity question. The district court's order was therefore not final within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and Mitchell. Lacking jurisdiction, we remand the case to the district court.").

Sherbrooke v. City of Pelican Rapids, 513 F.3d 809, 813 (8th Cir. 2008) ("We do not have jurisdiction to consider 'which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial,'. . . but the city and the police officers do not bring this sort of fact-based appeal. Their contention is that even taking the facts in the light most favorable to Sherbrooke, neither the traffic stop nor the recording of Sherbrooke's statements violated Sherbrooke's clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment. This is a purely legal question over which we have jurisdiction. . . We also have jurisdiction to consider the district court's grant of partial summary judgment in favor of Sherbrooke, because it turns on the very same legal issue as the denial of qualified immunity –that is, whether the recording of Sherbrooke's conversation with his attorney violated the Fourth Amendment. . . And we have jurisdiction to consider the City's appeal of the denial of summary judgment on Sherbrooke's allegation that a municipal policy caused a violation of his constitutional rights, because the merits of the City's appeal is inextricably intertwined with the question whether the officers violated Sherbrooke's rights.").

Hinshaw v. Smith, 436 F.3d 997, 1002, 1003 (8th Cir. 2006) ("While the denial of a motion for summary judgment is generally unreviewable as an impermissible interlocutory appeal, we have limited authority under the collateral order doctrine to review the denial of a motion for summary judgment to the extent the motion is based on the right to absolute or qualified immunity, which protects a defendant from having to defend a lawsuit.. . . We therefore have jurisdiction over the individual Board members' appeals, as well as Smith's appeal to the extent those appeals challenge the district court's denial of qualified or absolute immunity on legal grounds, but not to the extent they involve questions of evidence sufficiency. . . We also have pendent jurisdiction over claims that are 'inextricably intertwined' with the qualified immunity issue, 'that is, [we have jurisdiction] when the appellate resolution of the collateral appeal necessarily resolves the pendent claim as well .' . . This pendent jurisdiction extends to the claims that Hinshaw's speech was not constitutionally protected for First Amendment purposes, as the issues 'require application of the same constitutional test, and therefore, the question concerning whether the speech is entitled to constitutional protection is 'coterminous with, or subsumed in' the qualified immunity issue.' . . We therefore have jurisdiction over the §1983 claim against LOPFI as an entity (which is not eligible for qualified immunity) and the state law wrongful termination claims to the extent disposition of those claims rests on the legal conclusion of whether Hinshaw's speech was entitled to protection. However, claims not premised on this constitutional issue-such as disputes involving causation or state law claims unrelated to Hinshaw's First Amendment rights-are not properly before the court, and we do not address them.").

Nebraska Beef, Ltd. v. Greening, 398 F.3d 1080, 1083 (8th Cir. 2005) ("The question before us, then, is whether, in light of Siegert, Johnson, and Behrens, the availability of a Bivens remedy is an issue of law that is 'closely related' to or 'inextricably intertwined' with the denial of qualified immunity. . . Although the lack of a Bivens remedy would not entitle the [defendants] to qualified immunity, . . . the issue is 'analytically antecedent to, and in a sense also pendent to, the qualified immunity issue.' . . It is a purely legal question that presents none of the judicial economy concerns addressed in Johnson. In fact, common sense tells us that addressing this potentially dispositive legal question serves the interests of judicial economy. If we remanded to the district court and the plaintiffs prevailed at trial, we would likely see the same appeal again, after the cost and time of litigating a lawsuit which, if no Bivens remedy exists, is doomed from its inception. Accordingly, we conclude that we have jurisdiction to consider the availability of a Bivens remedy.").

Wever v. Lincoln County, Nebraska, 388 F.3d 601, 605 n.5 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Carmen contends on appeal that the district court erred in interpreting Wever's complaint. Essentially, Carmen argues that the district court erred in interpreting Wever's broadly worded complaint to 'adequately set forth a Fourteenth Amendment claim against Sheriff Carmen for failure to provide Wever, a pretrial detainee, mental health care.'. . Though neither party has so argued, we lack jurisdiction to review the district court's interlocutory interpretation of Wever's complaint. This court has jurisdiction over 'final decisions' of district courts. . . The district court's decision denying Carmen's motion based on the sufficiency of the pleadings is not final–the claim goes forward. This court does have jurisdiction to hear interlocutory appeals from the denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . Jurisdiction based on the denial of qualified immunity does not extend to matters that are not 'final' unless the two are inextricably intertwined. . . The district court's construction of the complaint to adequately allege a claim is not inextricably intertwined with the district court's ruling on qualified immunity. . . We therefore lack jurisdiction to review the district court's construction of the complaint. Because we cannot review the district court's decision, we use its conclusion that Wever adequately set forth a complaint for failure to provide mental health care to a pretrial detainee in our qualified immunity analysis.").

Avalos v. City of Glenwood, 382 F.3d 792, 801 (8th Cir. 2004) ("The municipal defendants also argue that, because the claims against them are intertwined with our qualified immunity decision, we have jurisdiction to decide whether summary judgment was improperly denied. . . .We conclude our decision on Detective Wake's entitlement to qualified immunity 'necessarily resolves' the remaining claims in the municipal defendants' favor. . . . As discussed in the previous section, we conclude the plaintiffs have failed to establish a violation of their substantive due process rights. Try as they might, the plaintiffs simply have not demonstrated any of the municipal defendants' policies applied to Karl, who was not a CI. Karl, Maria, Detective Wake, and Detective Daley all stated under oath Karl was never enlisted as a CI. Indeed, the Task Force officers specifically and repeatedly instructed Karl not to get involved in the investigation. Regardless of any alleged deficiencies in the Task Force's procedures, they did not apply to Karl. Thus, the plaintiffs are unable to show either (1) a deprivation of a constitutional right or (2) a municipal custom or policy that caused such deprivation.").

Bankhead v. Knickrehm, 360 F.3d 839, 844 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Our jurisdiction on this appeal is limited to the question of qualified immunity, but the answer to that question necessarily includes a determination whether any constitutional or statutory rights were violated in the first place. . . We find no evidence in this record sufficient to support a finding that Mr. McCook selected Ms. Holmstrom for any reason other than her qualifications nor is there any evidence of substance of wrongful intent (in the sense of discrimination or retaliation) against the other two defendants. . .The complaint named the three defendants in both their individual and official capacities. Qualified immunity is a defense only against a claim in one's individual capacity. . . Suits against public employees in their official capacity are the legal equivalent of suits against the governmental entity itself. . . Ordinarily, the question of the liability of a governmental entity, or of governmental officials sued in their official capacity, would not be open on an interlocutory qualified-immunity appeal. Here, however, our ground of decision in favor of the defendants in their individual capacity–that there was not substantial evidence of illegal intent–is of course also fatal to the official-capacity suit. On a qualified-immunity appeal, if the ground of decision would, as a necessary legal consequence, inevitably require a judgment for another defendant, or for the same defendants in another capacity, the ordinarily narrow nature of our qualified-immunity jurisdiction does not prevent us from saying so. . . Accordingly, this action should be dismissed in its entirety against all three defendants in their individual and official capacities.")

Schatz v. Gierer, 346 F.3d 1157, 1160 (8th Cir. 2003) ("Although the district court's complete denial of defendants' motion to dismiss implies the denial of qualified immunity, we have held previously that such an inference is insufficient for an interlocutory appeal. . . . Because there was no determination by the district court on the qualified immunity issue raised by the motion-to-dismiss defendants, we conclude that we have no jurisdiction to review the district court's order on that issue or on the defendants' other merit-based arguments. Accordingly, we dismiss the appeal. In doing so, we reiterate that the Supreme Court repeatedly has emphasized the need to address qualified immunity at the earliest possible stage in the litigation.").

Bradford v. Huckabee, 330 F.3d 1038, 1040 (8th Cir. 2003) ("The district court dealt with (and rejected) Appellants' sovereign immunity defense against the First Amendment claim against them in their official capacities, noting that the plaintiff 'has stated a claim for civil conspiracy,' and that in 'all other respects the motion to dismiss is denied.' While we understand the parties' contention that these statements imply a denial of qualified immunity, we do not think that such an inference is sufficient for an interlocutory appeal at this point in time. . . . The district court needed to first determine whether the complaint alleged enough facts to demonstrate the violation of a clearly established statutory or constitutional right arising under the First Amendment and civil conspiracy statute. . . . The Supreme Court has emphasized that qualified immunity should be addressed as early as possible in litigation. . . Thus, we raise this jurisdictional defect sua sponte, conclude that we have no jurisdiction to hear this appeal, and remand for a proper determination of Appellants' qualified immunity.") Lockridge v. Bd. of Trustees of Univ. of Arkansas, 315 F.2d 1005, 1012, 1013 (8th Cir. 2003) ("We believe that this case presents an exceptional circumstance in which we have jurisdiction over issues that are 'inextricably intertwined' with those appealable at the interlocutory stage. An issue is 'inextricably intertwined' with properly presented issues only ' 'when the appellate resolution of the collateral appeal necessarily resolves the pendent claims as well.' . . Here, we have decided that because Mr. Lockridge was aware of the opening, did not apply, and told his supervisor that he was not going to apply for the position, Mr. Lockridge does not have an equal protection claim or a § 1981 discrimination claim against Dr. Jones individually. The same McDonnell Douglas burden-shifting analysis is applicable to all of Mr. Lockridge's discrimination claims, including his Title VII claim against the board of trustees of the university. We therefore conclude that our resolution of the qualified immunity issue in this case 'necessarily resolves' all of the other claims in favor of the defendants.").

Krein v. Norris, 309 F.3d 487, 493 (8th Cir. 2002) ("As we noted in our first panel opinion, while the Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized the importance of deciding qualified immunity issues at the earliest possible stage of litigation, not all qualified immunity issues may be decided on summary judgment. Krein v. Norris, 250 F.3d at 1188. Indeed, summary judgment is not appropriate when there is a genuine issue of material fact surrounding the question of the plaintiff's or a defendant's relevant conduct– because, under those circumstances, the court cannot determine as a matter of law what predicate facts exist in order to decide whether or not the defendant's conduct violated clearly established law. . . .[I]n the present case, to the extent defendants appeal the district court's holding that there remain genuine issues of material fact, and to the extent that they challenge the sufficiency of plaintiff's evidence to support that conclusion, [footnote omitted] we hold that we lack interlocutory appellate jurisdiction.")

Brayman v. United States, 96 F.3d 1061, 1064 (8th Cir. 1996) ("In the present case, the district court determined that material issues of fact remain concerning the three claims for which qualified immunity was denied. However, the district court did so without first expressly considering whether these claims, as alleged, support a violation of clearly established law. [citing Siegert] We conclude that we have jurisdiction to consider this question of law with regard to each claim.").

Samuels v. Meriwether, 94 F.3d 1163, 1166 (8th Cir. 1996) ("Unlike Johnson, the present case involves application of the law and does not turn on the sufficiency of the evidence. The actions of the City and its employees are not in dispute. We only need to apply legal standards to the facts as construed in favor of the non-moving party. In qualified immunity cases, we also have limited jurisdiction to reach the merits. . . We may decide claims that are "inextricably intertwined" with the district court's denial of the summary judgment motion. . . In the present case, both the qualified immunity claim and the Procedural Due Process and Fourth Amendment claims require application of the same constitutional tests. [T]he analyses of the underlying constitutional claims are subsumed in the qualified immunity issue.").

Allison v. Dep't of Corrections, 94 F.3d 494, 496 (8th Cir. 1996) ("The crux of the individual defendants' argument is that their actions were reasonable given their knowledge at the time of Allison's termination. This issue is immediately appealable upon the denial of a qualified immunity claim. . . . To the extent the individual defendants assert issues concerning what facts Allison may or may not be able to prove at trial, we lack jurisdiction to consider them. . . .").

Heidemann v. Rother, 84 F.3d 1021, 1027 (8th Cir. 1996) ("The procedural circumstances of the case before us are similar in many important respects to those which were before the Supreme Court in Behrens. In rejecting defendants' qualified immunity claim in the present case, the district court stated, without further explanation, that 'factual disputes exist in this action such that genuine issues of material fact remain for trial.' We, therefore, find it necessary to review the record and consider the legal context of plaintiffs' constitutional and statutory claims, in order to determine whether this interlocutory appeal raises abstract issues of law relating to qualified immunity over which we presently have jurisdiction. We hold that it does. Accordingly, consistent with the Supreme Court's guidance in Behrens, we now examine, as to each of plaintiffs' constitutional and statutory claims, (1) what material facts are not genuinely in dispute, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, and (2) whether, assuming such facts, defendants infringed a clearly established constitutional or statutory right.").

Erickson v. Pennington, 77 F.3d 1078, 1080 (8th Cir. 1996) ("[Defendants] devote much of their brief to challenging the credibility of Erickson's evidence. We lack jurisdiction to consider these challenges. Instead, we can decide whether the facts as Erickson presents them show a violation of clearly established law.").

Miller v. Schoenen, 75 F.3d 1305, 1308-09 (8th Cir. 1996) ("That some issues must be reviewed in a qualified-immunity appeal does not mean that we have jurisdiction to review all of the points addressed in the summary-judgment motion. Only those issues that concern what the official knew at the time the alleged deprivation occurred are properly reviewed in this type of interlocutory appeal. We have jurisdiction to review those issues because their review is necessary in order to determine whether a reasonable state actor would have known that his actions, in light of those facts, would violate the law. . . . We are thus left with the following distinction. The question of what was known to a person who might be shielded by qualified immunity is reviewable, to determine if the known facts would inform a reasonable actor that his actions violate an established legal standard–the right to speak freely, the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures, a prisoner's right to adequate medical care, for example. Conversely, if the issues relate to whether the actor actually committed the act of which he is accused, or damages, or causation, or other similar matters that the plaintiff must prove, we have no jurisdiction to review them in an interlocutory appeal of a denial of a summary-judgment motion based on qualified immunity. . . . We thus have jurisdiction to review whether sufficient evidence exists that the defendants actually knew of Miller's need for specialized care and acted reasonably in light of that knowledge, the subjective component of the claim.").

Prosser v. Ross, 70 F.3d 1005, 1006-07 (8th Cir. 1995) ("The district court denied Ross's motion for summary judgment on his qualified immunity defense because it found that 'material factual disputes on plaintiff's claims against defendant Ross' precluded it. The district court did not indicate in its order what material facts it believed were in dispute . . . . We must first determine whether this appeal is properly before us. Although some orders denying qualified immunity are appealable before trial, . . . the Supreme Court has recently indicated that our jurisdiction in such cases extends only to 'abstract issues of law.' [citing Johnson] This limitation will sometimes make it difficult to determine whether jurisdiction exists because deciding whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity requires a 'fact-intensive' inquiry. [citing Reece] Here, however, we believe that the facts required to determine whether Ross is entitled to qualified immunity are not genuinely in dispute. We therefore have jurisdiction.").

Kincade v. City of Blue Springs, 64 F.3d 567, 571 (8th Cir. 1995) ("In this case, our jurisdiction to hear the individual Appellants' qualified immunity claims is without doubt. We conclude that we have jurisdiction to hear the Appellants' claims that Kincade's August 5, 1991, speech is not constitutionally protected because the claims are 'inextricably intertwined' with their qualified immunity arguments. Both issues require application of the same constitutional test, and therefore, the question concerning whether the speech is entitled to constitutional protection is 'coterminous with, or subsumed in' the qualified immunity issue. However, we conclude that the Appellants' argument that Kincade has presented insufficient evidence to establish that his August 5, 1991, speech caused his termination is not 'inextricably intertwined' with the qualified immunity claims. This causation argument presents significantly different issues. Moreover, in another recent case a unanimous Supreme Court held that 'a defendant, entitled to invoke a qualified-immunity defense, may not appeal a district court's summary judgment order insofar as that order determines whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a 'genuine' issue of fact for trial.'

[citing Johnson] The district court here decided that there were genuine issues of fact for trial on the causation issue, and thus, we decline to address it.")

Reece v. Groose, 60 F.3d 487, 489-90 (8th Cir. 1995) ("The Supreme Court has thus delineated our jurisdiction in qualified-immunity cases. If, as in Swint, a party asks us, in an interlocutory appeal, to examine a question that is separate and distinct from the qualified-immunity issue, we must dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction. If, on the other hand, the party asserting qualified immunity asks us to examine the facts as they were known to the government official in order to determine whether clearly established law would be violated by his actions, Anderson requires that we accept jurisdiction and address their arguments. We believe this holding is consistent with the Supreme Court's latest opinion on the subject, Johnson v. Jones . . . . To be sure, the issue raised by the present appeal-whether reasonable officers would have done more to protect Reece after placing him in administrative segregation-is fact-intensive. Parts of the Supreme Court's opinion in Johnson can be read to prohibit the exercise of appellate jurisdiction over such issues on a pretrial appeal. . . . We think the safer course is to apply the root principle that denials of qualified immunity are immediately appealable, and to apply this principle even in cases where the issue of qualified immunity is itself fact-intensive.").

Sanders v. Brundage, 60 F.3d 484, 486 (8th Cir. 1995) ("If the issue on appeal is whether a certain point of law was 'clearly established,' then the denial of summary judgment is immediately appealable. . .However, if the issue on appeal is whether the pretrial evidence is sufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact, then the denial of summary judgment is not immediately appealable. [citing Johnson]").

Washington v. Wilson, 46 F.3d 39, 41 (8th Cir. 1995) ("In allowing the suit to proceed (by finding genuine issues of material fact to exist), the logical conclusion is that the district court rejected the appellants' qualified immunity arguments. But the law in this Circuit is clear. The issue must at the very least be mentioned by the district court, and preferably reasons affirming or denying qualified immunity should be articulated before this Court has jurisdiction to engage in meaningful review.").

Johnson v. Hay, 931 F.2d 456 (8th Cir. 1991)(once notice of appeal is filed as to denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, district court should not act further).

NINTH CIRCUIT

Andrews v. City of Henderson, 35 F.4th 710, 720-21 (9th Cir. 2022) ("We conclude that the City's § 1983 municipal liability is not inextricably intertwined with the detectives' claim of qualified immunity. The detectives' qualified immunity defense turns on whether they violated clearly established federal law, but the City's liability turns on whether an 'official with final policy-making authority ratified a subordinate's unconstitutional decision or action and the basis for it.'. . We need not decide the ratification issue in order to resolve whether the detectives are entitled to qualified immunity. . . Nor does our qualified immunity decision 'necessarily resolve[ ]' whether the City ratified the detectives' unconstitutional use of force. . . Accordingly, we lack pendent appellate jurisdiction over the denial of the City's motion for summary judgment on Andrews's ratification theory.")

Hyde v. City of Willcox, 23 F.4th 863, 875 (9th Cir. 2022) ("Besides the denial of a motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity, we 'may [also] exercise "pendent" appellate jurisdiction over an otherwise nonappealable ruling if the ruling is "inextricably intertwined" with a claim properly before [the Court] on interlocutory appeal.'. . This occurs when '(a) [the two issues are] so intertwined that we must decide the pendent issue in order to review the claims properly raised on interlocutory appeal, or (b) resolution of the issue properly raised on interlocutory appeal necessarily resolves the pendent issue.'. . That is the case here. As discussed, Dannels and Hadfield are entitled to qualified immunity because the complaint did not plausibly plead facts for supervisory liability. That conclusion applies equally to the City and the County because the complaint relies on the same facts. Thus, the failure to plausibly plead the existence of inadequate training sinks both claims equally.")

Young v. Hauri, No. 19-36098, 2021 WL 2206520, at *2–3 (9th Cir. June 1, 2021) (not reported) ("Defendants nonetheless argue that the right in question was not clearly established because there is no case describing these precise factual circumstances. Their argument is unpersuasive for two reasons. First, we have 'not hesitated to deny qualified immunity to officials in certain circumstances, even without a case directly on point.'. . Second, Defendants mistake the qualified immunity analysis for a Fourth Amendment search with that of a Fourth Amendment seizure when a plaintiff alleges excessive force. Only the latter requires the fact-specific balancing test from Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 109 S.Ct. 1865, 104 L.Ed.2d 443 (1989). See Kisela v. Hughes, —— U.S. ——, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1152, 200 L.Ed.2d 449 (2018) (per curiam) (holding that, under Graham, "the question whether an officer has used excessive force 'requires careful attention to the facts and circumstances of each particular case' " (citation omitted)). But searches—at least in places where society recognizes a strong interest in privacy—require more bright lines. Because police conduct searches so frequently, they need clear, easy-to-apply rules that notify all officers which searches are not permissible. See United States v. Winsor, 846 F.2d 1569, 1578 (9th Cir. 1988) (en banc) (holding that "a fact-specific case-by-case approach would plunge courts into a neverending and essentially standardless assessment of every search"). Thus, under binding precedent from this court and the Supreme Court, any reasonable officer would have known that Defendants' suspicionless and warrantless search of Katzenjammer's body, while she lay unconscious in a hospital bed, violated the Fourth Amendment. . .We therefore affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity and denial of summary judgment on Katzenjammer's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claim.")

Lawrence v. Bohanon, 847 F. App'x 516, 517 (9th Cir. 2021) (not reported), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 901 (2022) ("Here, the district court denied the Officers' motion for summary judgment because it found disputed issues of material fact. Specifically, it held that there is a dispute as to whether 'Childress was moving or had access to his pocket after being shot' during the first volley and concluded that, under Plaintiffs' version of the facts, the Officers 'continued to shoot at Childress' and deployed a K9 on him 'despite his clear incapacitation.' Lawrence v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't, 451 F. Supp. 3d 1154, 1165, 1170-71 (D. Nev. 2020). The Officers implicitly reject this understanding of the record, arguing that they are entitled to immunity because Childress was not incapacitated but, to the contrary, 'immediately attempted to stand back up' after the Officers' first volley struck him. Thus, the Officers' arguments on appeal '[boil] down to factual disputes about the record.'. . Such arguments are outside the limited scope of our jurisdiction. . . The Officers contend, however, that we may reach the merits because the video evidence 'blatantly contradict[s]' and 'discredit[s]' what the district court held was the version of the facts most favorable to Plaintiffs. . . But the video does not do so. A jury viewing it could conclude, as Plaintiffs do, that if Childress moved at all after the first volley, his movements were an involuntary response to being shot. A jury could also find that Childress was 'clearly incapacitated' when Bohanon and Walford began their second volley and when Ledogar released his dog. Scott is therefore inapposite.")

Estate of Anderson v. Marsh, 985 F.3d 726, 731-34 (9th Cir. 2021) ("We have understood Johnson to mean '[a] public official may not immediately appeal "a fact-related dispute about the pretrial record, namely, whether or not the evidence in the pretrial record was sufficient to show a genuine issue of fact for trial."'. . Our interlocutory review jurisdiction is limited to resolving a defendant's 'purely legal ... contention that [his or her] conduct "did not violate the [Constitution] and, in any event, did not violate clearly established law."'. . These cases instruct that whether jurisdiction is lacking under our court's interpretation of Johnson ultimately turns on the nature of the defendant's argument on appeal. If the defendant argues only that the evidence is insufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact, we lack jurisdiction. If the defendant's appeal raises purely legal questions, however, such as whether his alleged conduct violated clearly established law, we may review those issues. In other words, we have jurisdiction to review an issue of law determining entitlement to qualified immunity—even if the district court's summary judgment ruling also contains an evidence-sufficiency determination—but not to accede to a defendant's request that we review that evidence-sufficiency determination on appeal. Our dissenting colleague describes the Supreme Court's caselaw on the scope of interlocutory appeals in the qualified immunity context as having spawned 'persistent confusion,' and understands the prevailing rule to be different than the one we have outlined above. . . Specifically, the dissent interprets the discussion of Johnson in Plumhoff as indicating that we always have jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal from the denial of qualified immunity, with one narrow exception:

Only when officers provide disputed evidence showing that they were not present, and were in no way involved in the challenged conduct [as the defendant officers in Johnson were not], is an appellate court without jurisdiction to hear the officers' interlocutory appeal.

. . . In other words, the dissent reads Plumhoff as implicitly restricting Johnson to its facts. . . We agree with the dissent that the Supreme Court's explication of the relevant jurisdictional principles has not always been clear, and that Plumhoff contains language that supports the dissent's reading.

But there is also language in Plumhoff that suggests the Court did not read Johnson so narrowly. Plumhoff reiterated that Johnson barred an interlocutory appeal from a summary judgment order that turned on 'a question of "evidence sufficiency," i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. . The Court also emphasized the difference between 'legal issues' and 'purely factual issues that the trial court might confront if the case were tried,' explaining with approval that Johnson had held that 'forcing appellate courts to entertain [interlocutory] appeals' concerning factual determinations of 'evidence sufficiency' would 'impose an undue burden.'. . Those passages have already persuaded our court to adopt a different interpretation of the limits on interlocutory appellate jurisdiction than the dissent's. Our post-Plumhoff decisions have continued to understand Johnson as setting forth a jurisdictional rule about challenges to evidence sufficiency, without confining the rule to situations in which officers deny having been involved in the challenged conduct. . . . Applying the rule articulated in Foster, Pauluk, and Advanced Building & Fabrication, we conclude that we lack jurisdiction over this appeal because—in light of his concessions at oral argument—Marsh challenges only the district court's determination that there is a genuine factual dispute as to whether Anderson appeared to reach for a weapon before Marsh shot him. . . . In other words, rather than 'advanc[ing] an argument as to why the law is not clearly established that takes the facts in the light most favorable to [the Estate],' which we would have jurisdiction to consider, Marsh contests 'whether there is enough evidence in the record for a jury to conclude that certain facts [favorable to the Estate] are true,' which we do not have jurisdiction to resolve. . . Indeed, Marsh conceded at oral argument that he would have no claim to qualified immunity if the Estate's version of events were found to be true. Because we may not review on interlocutory appeal the question of evidence sufficiency Marsh raises, we must dismiss his appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Estate of Anderson v. Marsh, 985 F.3d 726, 735-42 (9th Cir. 2021) (W. Fletcher, J., dissenting) ("Johnson strikes again. Officer John Marsh brought an interlocutory appeal after the district court, viewing disputed evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, denied his motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The district court determined, based on plaintiff's version of the disputed evidence, that there was sufficient evidence to defeat Marsh's motion and go to trial. Relying on Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304 (1995), and its progeny, the panel majority holds that we do not have appellate jurisdiction. I respectfully dissent. I am sympathetic with the panel majority, for the law in this area is extraordinarily confused. . . . Under my reading of Johnson, a court of appeals has jurisdiction only when a district court denies a defendant's motion for summary judgment based on evidence that the defendant does not dispute. A court of appeals does not have jurisdiction when a district court denies a defendant's motion for summary judgment based on evidence it assumes to be true but that a defendant disputes. By far the majority of denials of summary judgment motions are entered in such cases. That is, the vast majority of cases are those in which the district court determines a question of 'evidentiary sufficiency,' assuming plaintiff's evidence to be true and determining whether that evidence is sufficient to defeat defendant's motion. The purpose of qualified immunity is to protect officers from having to go to trial. Qualified immunity is 'an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.'. . Johnson frustrates the purpose of qualified immunity in cases where the district court, relying on plaintiff's view of the evidence, mistakenly holds as a matter of law that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Johnson has created persistent confusion as courts of appeals, including our own, have struggled to reconcile its apparent holding with the purpose of qualified immunity. [citing cases] The confusion in our sister circuits is matched in our own circuit. In some cases, we have exercised appellate jurisdiction where genuine issues of material fact existed and the district court viewed the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. [collecting cases] In other cases, including the case now before us, we have denied appellate jurisdiction. [collecting cases] In some cases, we have tried to have it both ways. [collecting cases] We wrote in Pauluk v. Savage, 836 F.3d 1117, 1121 (9th Cir. 2016):

Because we do not have jurisdiction over a district court's determination that there are genuine issues of material fact, we cannot review [defendants'] arguments that there was insufficient evidence to show [a violation of clearly established law]. But we do have jurisdiction, construing the facts and drawing all inferences in favor of Plaintiffs, to decide whether the evidence demonstrates a violation by [defendants], and whether such violation was in contravention of federal law that was clearly established at the time.

I wrote the opinion in Pauluk and now confess error. I tried to find daylight between deciding (a) defendant's motion for summary judgment based on 'evidentiary insufficiency' (resulting in no jurisdiction), and (b) deciding that same motion after viewing disputed evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff (resulting in jurisdiction). But, as I read Johnson, there is no daylight between (a) and (b). They are different ways of saying the same thing. 'Evidentiary sufficiency' is what a court determines when it views disputed evidence in the light most favorable to the non-moving party and then decides a summary judgment motion based on the evidence so viewed. The Supreme Court has largely ignored Johnson. In the post-Johnson era, the Court initially heard interlocutory appeals without mentioning Johnson. The Court decided appeals on the merits, without addressing jurisdiction, in three cases in which two district courts and one court of appeals had denied officers' motions for summary judgment based on qualified immunity after having made determinations of 'evidentiary sufficiency.' [discussing Saucier, Brosseau v. Haugen, and Scott v. Harris] In none of these three cases, including Scott, did the Court cite, or in any way acknowledge, its holding in Johnson that there is no appellate jurisdiction in a case in which the district court decides a 'fact-related dispute,' determines a question of evidentiary sufficiency,' and denies summary judgment based on the plaintiff's version of disputed evidence. In Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U.S. 765 (2014), the Court finally acknowledged the tension between Johnson and its post-Johnson practice. . . . Johnson was different, according to the Court in Plumhoff, because the three police officers in Johnson contended that they had not been present at the beating and had been in no way involved. By contrast, the Court wrote in Plumhoff, 'Petitioners do not claim that other officers were responsible for shooting Rickard; rather, they contend that their conduct did not violate the Fourth Amendment and, in any event, did not violate clearly established law.'. . Just as in Saucier, Haugen, and Scott, the Court in Plumhoff never acknowledged Johnson's holding that there is no appellate jurisdiction when a court, relying on plaintiff's disputed evidence, determines a question of 'evidentiary sufficiency.' In the four post-Johnson cases just cited, the Supreme Court heard appeals in cases where the courts below (three district courts and one court of appeals) denied summary judgment based on plaintiff's version of disputed evidence. All four cases are inconsistent with Johnson's holding that there is no appellate jurisdiction where a court determines 'evidentiary insufficiency' based on plaintiff's version of disputed evidence. After Plumhoff, in a case where the district court has denied a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the rule now appears to be the following: When a district court relies on plaintiff's version of disputed evidence in denying the motion for summary judgment, a court of appeals may generally exercise interlocutory appellate jurisdiction. Only when officers provide disputed evidence showing that they were not present, and were in no way involved in the challenged conduct, is an appellate court without jurisdiction to hear the officers' interlocutory appeal. It is distinctly counterintuitive that this should be the remnant of Johnson that survives. Officers who present evidence that they were not even at the scene are among the officers who most deserve the protection of interlocutory appeals. But I have difficulty reading the combination of Johnson, Saucier, Haugen, Scott, and Plumhoff any other way. . . . In neither Mullenix nor Pauly did the Supreme Court refer to Johnson. The Court referred to Plumhoff in both cases, but only with respect to its holding on the merits. . . In neither case did the Court express any doubt about the appellate jurisdiction of the Fifth and Tenth Circuits. And in neither case did any of the defendant officers dispute that they were present at the scene. The case now before us does not belong in the narrow category of cases still apparently governed by Johnson. The panel majority accurately recounts the factual dispute. Viewing the disputed evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, the district court denied qualified immunity to Officer Marsh. Marsh does not dispute that he was at the scene. Indeed, he concedes that he shot Anderson. Therefore, under Plumhoff (as well as Mullenix and Pauly) we have jurisdiction to hear this appeal. I close with a plea to the Supreme Court. As is evident from this case and countless others, the Court's Johnson jurisprudence has confused courts of appeals for twenty-five years. Plumhoff is the only case in which the Supreme Court has even acknowledged the confusion. Unfortunately, Plumhoff and post-Plumhoff cases have only perpetuated it. I respectfully ask the Supreme Court to tell us clearly, in an appropriate case, whether and in what circumstances an interlocutory appeal may be taken when the district court, viewing disputed evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, has denied a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Hanson v. Shubert, 968 F.3d 1014, 1018-19 (9th Cir. 2020) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor this court. . . has addressed the situation here: the appeal of an order denying a motion to reconsider the earlier denial of qualified immunity, which had not itself been timely appealed. . . . We agree with the reasoning in Powell [10th Cir.] and Lora [2d Cir.], and today hold that we lack jurisdiction over an order denying a Rule 59(e) motion for reconsideration of a denial of qualified immunity, where we do not have jurisdiction over the appeal of the underlying order. Shubert and Gonzalez 'cannot use [their] motion for reconsideration,' filed nearly one year after the underlying order, 'to resurrect [their] right to appeal the district court's order denying [them] qualified immunity.'. . Furthermore, they have 'failed to make any showing that the order denying [their] motion to reconsider is otherwise immediately appealable.'. .Based on the foregoing, we must dismiss this appeal because we lack jurisdiction.")

Tuuamalemalo v. Greene, 946 F.3d 471, 479-85 (9th Cir. 2019) (W. Fletcher, J., concurring) ("I fully concur in the court's opinion. I write separately to address the continuing confusion over the proper standard for determining appealability of interlocutory orders denying motions for summary judgment based on qualified immunity under § 1983. . . .The most natural reading of the passages just quoted is that a court of appeals has interlocutory appellate jurisdiction over an order denying summary judgment only when a district court denies a defendant's motion for summary judgment based on the defendant's version of the facts. A court of appeals does not have jurisdiction if a plaintiff's version of the facts would defeat qualified immunity but that version of the facts is disputed. This is a very odd understanding of Mitchell, for it would rarely result in an appealable interlocutory order. Defendant police officers asserting qualified immunity rarely provide versions of the facts that would result in interlocutory orders denying their motions for summary judgment. Almost all interlocutory orders denying defendants' motions for summary judgment are based on plaintiffs' versions of the facts, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiffs. That is, almost all orders denying summary judgment to police officer defendants are entered in cases where there are disputed questions of fact. Yet, it is in precisely such cases that Johnson—under the most natural reading of the passages just quoted—tells us that courts of appeals do not have jurisdiction. The Court's decision in Johnson has created persistent confusion in the courts of appeals. On the one hand, the courts of appeals understand the purpose of Mitchell. They understand the importance of interlocutory appellate jurisdiction in cases where, in the view of the district court, plaintiff's version of the facts, construed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, would defeat qualified immunity. On the other hand, they are confronted with the language of Johnson that appears to preclude the exercise of appellate jurisdiction in exactly those cases. A sample of appellate cases reveals the analytic chaos that has resulted. [collecting cases] The Supreme Court did not at first appear to understand the problem it had created in Johnson. In several cases, it reviewed without comment court of appeals decisions in cases where the district court had denied motions for summary judgment using plaintiffs' versions of the facts, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiffs—in other words, in cases where plaintiffs' evidence was disputed. . . . In Plumhoff v. Rickard, . . . the Court finally addressed the tension between Johnson and its own post-Johnson practice. . . . Instead of explaining—or, better yet, abandoning—Johnson, the Court distinguished it. The Court wrote, 'The District Court order in this case is nothing like the order in Johnson.'. . In Johnson, the three police officers appealing the interlocutory order denying summary judgment contended that they had not been present when the beating took place and had had nothing to do with it. By contrast, the Court wrote in Plumhoff, 'Petitioners do not claim that other officers were responsible for shooting Rickard; rather, they contend that their conduct did not violate the Fourth Amendment and, in any event, did not violate clearly established law.'. .In deciding the officers' interlocutory appeal, the Court in Plumhoff accepted plaintiff's version of the facts, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . .We have recently recognized that Plumhoff has modified Johnson. . . But we have not done more than that. We have not interpreted Plumhoff as restricting Johnson to its facts. But if we are to be faithful to what the Court wrote in Plumhoff, that is what we should do. Under Plumhoff, when a district court holds in summary judgment that a plaintiff's version of the facts, construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, shows that a defendant officer has used excessive force, we generally may exercise interlocutory appellate jurisdiction under Scott. Only when an officer provides evidence in the district court showing that he or she was not present and in no way participated in or authorized the challenged conduct, and when the district court nonetheless denies the officer's motion for summary judgment because plaintiff presents evidence to the contrary, are we without jurisdiction to hear the officers' interlocutory appeal. It is distinctly counterintuitive that this should be the remnant of Johnson that survives. Officers who present evidence that they were neither present nor in any way involved in the use of allegedly excessive force, and who contend that plaintffs' evidence, though contested, construed in the light most favorable to them, does not show the contrary, are those officers who most deserve the protection of interlocutory appeals when their motion for summary judgment is denied. But I have difficulty reading the combination of Johnson and Plumhoff any other way. As to these officers, the district court's denial of summary judgment 'was not a "final decision" within the meaning of the relevant statute.'. . I hope that the Supreme Court will revisit the issue soon and will disavow Johnson entirely. But until that happens, I believe that we are, unfortunately, bound to follow what remains of Johnson.")

Ortiz v. Vizcarra, 773 F. App'x 450, ___ (9th Cir. 2019) ("On appeal, the officers rely on their version of the facts to argue that the district court erred because Monica Ortiz . . . could not prove at trial that the officers unreasonably used deadly force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The officers' argument thus fails to present the facts in the light most favorable to Ortiz, instead merely raising a 'question of "evidence sufficiency," i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. . . Accordingly, we dismiss the officers' appeal for lack of jurisdiction, without deciding at this interlocutory stage whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ortiz v. Vizcarra, 773 F. App'x 450, ___ (9th Cir. 2019) (Fernandez, J., dissenting) ("I agree with the legal principles set forth by the majority. However, the video recording of the incident shows beyond peradventure. . . that in a period no longer than forty seconds an officer tried to subdue a belligerent man in close quarters while backing away from him and tasing him three times. Still, the man managed to arm himself with a knife and come even closer to the officer, whereupon the officer shot him twice in rapid succession. Given the undeniable and indisputable facts, even if there was a Fourth Amendment violation, I do not believe that this could reasonably be seen as 'an obvious case in which any competent officer would have known that shooting [the man] ... would violate the Fourth Amendment.'. . Thus, because the officers must be entitled to qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent.")

Horton by Horton v. City of Santa Maria, 915 F.3d 592, 603-05 (9th Cir. 2019) ("When a municipal defendant's motion for summary judgment is 'inextricably intertwined' with issues presented in the individual officers' qualified immunity appeal, this court may exercise pendent party appellate jurisdiction. . . In this context, the 'inextricably intertwined' concept is a narrow one. . . . Here, appellate resolution of the collateral appeal does not 'necessarily' resolve the pendent claim, for several reasons. . . First, as we have explained, our qualified immunity determination with respect to Officer Brice rests solely on the 'clearly established' law prong; we do not reach the question of whether Officer Brice's actions gave rise to a constitutional violation. . . . [T]he district court could still conclude that Officer Brice did commit a constitutional violation under the now-applicable standard and, if the other requisites of Monell liability are met, hold the municipality liable. Second, although the district court granted summary judgment in favor of the individual defendants other than Officer Brice on the ground that there was insufficient evidence they committed a constitutional violation, the district court could reconsider those summary judgments in light of the new, purely objective standard for Fourteenth Amendment failure-to-protect claims, which we announced after the district court issued its order. . . Further, the district court's grants of summary judgment as to the individual officers other than Officer Brice were not appealable, . . .and therefore cannot be assumed to be correct. As a result, the district court could conclude that municipal constitutional violations occurred involving the actions of officers other than Officer Brice. Third, municipal defendants may be liable under § 1983 even in situations in which no individual officer is held liable for violating a plaintiff's constitutional rights. As we have previously acknowledged, constitutional deprivations may occur 'not ... as a result of actions of the individual officers, but as a result of the collective inaction' of the municipal defendant. . . Here, a reasonable jury might be able to conclude that Horton suffered a constitutional deprivation 'as a result of the collective inaction' of the Santa Maria Police Department, . . . or of officers' adherence to departmental customs or practices[.] . . . For example, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a jury might find that the Santa Maria Police Department failed to ensure compliance with its written policy of removing belts from detainees. . . . Second, a reasonable jury might find that the Police Department failed to assure proper monitoring of its security cameras. . . . We do not decide whether any of these specific acts or omissions, or any other, if proven, would give rise to a municipal constitutional violation. Rather, our inquiry into the Monell claims at this stage is purely jurisdictional. For that purpose, we conclude that our holding that Officer Brice is entitled to qualified immunity does not preclude the possibility that a constitutional violation may nonetheless have taken place, including as a result of the collective acts or omissions of Santa Maria Police Department officers. In sum, the pendent Monell claim is not inextricably intertwined with a properly reviewable collateral appeal, as our resolution of Officer Brice's appeal from the denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity does not 'necessarily' resolve Horton's Monell claim. . . We therefore have no jurisdiction to review the denial of summary judgment as to the municipal defendants at this stage of the proceedings.")

Taylor v. County of Pima, 913 F.3d 930, 934 (9th Cir. 2019) ("In an interlocutory appeal, we have appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 to consider claims of immunity from suit, but we lack such appellate jurisdiction to consider claims of immunity from liability. . . .Before us, Taylor argued that the County, by consenting to removal of the case to federal court, waived Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . .The County clarified that, in this case, it was asserting only immunity from liability. . . . The County's asserted immunity from liability can be vindicated fully after final judgment; accordingly, the collateral-order doctrine of § 1291 does not apply here.")

Taylor v. County of Pima, 913 F.3d 930, 937-39 (9th Cir. 2019) (Graber, J., concurring) ("Plaintiff Louis Taylor has asserted claims against the County under Monell v. Department of Social Services, . . . which requires proof of a policy, practice, or custom by the County. He asserts that the actions of certain government officials amounted to a practice or custom by the County. The County's sole argument on appeal is that the relevant officials were, in fact, working on behalf of the State, so the County cannot be liable. The Supreme Court has recognized the viability of that argument: if the relevant officials were working on behalf of the State, then any practice or custom was a State practice or custom, not a municipal practice or custom. McMillian v. Monroe County, 520 U.S. 781, 117 S.Ct. 1734, 138 L.Ed.2d 1 (1997). But that argument does not bear on whether the municipality has Eleventh Amendment immunity. Proof that the relevant officials did not work for the municipality defeats the plaintiff's case but by virtue of an ordinary failure to prove an element of a claim—here, the existence of a municipal policy, practice, or custom. If the defendant municipality is correct that the relevant official was a State official, then the plaintiff has failed to state a claim against the municipality. Eleventh Amendment immunity plays no role. . . . Not surprisingly, our cases, too, describe this doctrine in terms of whether the municipality was the actor, rather than in terms of sovereign immunity and the Eleventh Amendment. [collecting cases] . . . .Applying Swint, other circuit courts have held, unambiguously, that '[w]hen a county appeals asserting that a sheriff is not a county policymaker under § 1983, that presents a defense to liability issue for the county over which we do not have interlocutory jurisdiction.'. . Applying Swint's rule here, we lack jurisdiction over the County's interlocutory appeal because the County argues solely that the relevant officials were not County policymakers. Our decision in Cortez overlooked this fundamental jurisdictional defect. Cortez, like this case, was an interlocutory appeal by a county from the denial of Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . We stated, correctly, that we had jurisdiction over the denial of Eleventh Amendment immunity, but we then reached the issue whether the sheriff acted on behalf of the county or the state, incorrectly characterizing that issue as pertaining to the Eleventh Amendment. . . We did not cite Swint. Accordingly, the rule in our circuit, unlike the rule in every other circuit, is that interlocutory appeals may be taken from a district court's rejection of a municipality's argument that the relevant government officials acted on behalf of the State and not the municipality. We plainly erred in Cortez. In an appropriate case, we should undo this error in our en banc capacity.")

Foster v. City of Indio, 908 F.3d 1204, 1210-13 (9th Cir. 2018) ("To the extent the district court's order denies summary judgment on purely legal issues, however, we do have jurisdiction. As Plumhoff explained, defendants' contention that their conduct 'did not violate the Fourth Amendment and, in any event, did not violate clearly established law,' raises legal issues that are 'quite different from any purely factual issues that the trial court might confront if the case were tried.'. . Deciding such legal issues 'is a core responsibility of appellate courts, and requiring appellate courts to decide such issues is not an undue burden.'. . Therefore, we may address them on interlocutory appeal. . . . Rather than claim that an officer in Hellawell's position could have reasonably thought it was lawful to shoot a fleeing, unarmed suspect in the back, Hellawell argues that the evidence was insufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact regarding the plaintiffs' Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims. According to Hellawell, the district court erred by considering the evidence supporting plaintiffs' version of events. Hellawell argues that Vallesillo's testimony was immaterial because he was not in a position to see whether or not there was a gun and his declaration contradicted his initial statement to the police that he did not see the shots fired. . . Likewise, Hellawell argues that Perez's August 31, 2016 declaration is not entitled to weight because it contradicted his April 1, 2016 declaration. Hellawell contends that because the Perez and Vallesillo declarations contradict their earlier statements, the latter declarations are inadmissible as sham affidavits. Instead of relying on these witnesses, Hellawell argues, the court should have relied on Hellawell's testimony. Hellawell contends that his statement that he saw a gun in Foster's hand is effectively undisputed, because the witnesses' testimony that they did not see a gun in Foster's possession does not mean there was no gun. According to Hellawell, he did not violate the Fourth Amendment, let alone any clearly established law, where he reasonably believed Foster posed a threat of serious physical harm. On the Fourteenth Amendment claim, Hellawell argues that he was engaged in a fast-moving situation and fired his gun when he believed Foster was turning toward him to shoot him. Thus, according to Hellawell, because his actions undisputedly served a legitimate governmental objective of defending himself and preventing an armed suspect's escape, there was no genuine issue of material fact regarding whether he had violated plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment rights. We have previously rejected similar arguments. . . .As in George, Hellawell challenges the sufficiency of the plaintiffs' evidence; he argues that plaintiffs will not be able to prove at trial that he shot an unarmed suspect in the back without any provocation in violation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. But this sort of 'evidence sufficiency' claim does not raise a legal question. . . We may not reweigh the evidence to evaluate whether the district court properly determined there was a genuine issue of material fact, and therefore may 'neither credit [Hellawell's] testimony that [Foster] turned and pointed his gun at [Hellawell], nor assume that [Foster] took other actions that would have been objectively threatening.'. . . Therefore, under George, we lack jurisdiction to consider Hellawell's argument that we should reverse the district court's determination that there was a genuine issue of material fact regarding plaintiffs' Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims relating to Hellawell's fatal shooting of Foster.")

Hernandez v. City of San Jose, 897 F.3d 1125, 1139-40 (9th Cir. 2018) ("The Court 'interpret[s] the "inextricably intertwined" standard narrowly' and applies it in 'extremely limited' circumstances. . . 'The standard is only satisfied where the issues are (a) ... so intertwined that [the Court] must decide the pendent issue in order to review the claims properly raised on interlocutory appeal, or (b) resolution of the issue properly raised on interlocutory appeal necessarily resolves the pendent issue.'. . .Neither prong is satisfied here. First, we need not decide 'the pendent issue'—whether the Attendees have stated a § 1983 claim against the City premised on their ratification theory—in order to decide the issue 'properly raised on interlocutory appeal'—whether the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . Whether the allegations concerning Chief Garcia's public statements and his failure to discipline his officers are sufficient to constitute ratification is an issue that is not necessary for deciding whether the Officers violated the Attendees' due process rights on the night of the Rally by directing them towards violent protesters. Recognizing this, the City proceeds only under the second prong of the test, arguing 'resolution of the issue properly raised [on] appeal necessarily resolves the pendent issue.' According to the City, 'a negative answer to the question whether the employee violated the Constitution will always necessarily resolve the pendent issue of whether the municipality was liable for the violation.' While this might be true in some cases, see, e.g., Huskey, 204 F.3d at 906, the principle is inapplicable here because we have held the Officers violated the Attendees' due process rights, based on the allegations in the FAC. That may mean that the City—through Chief Garcia's ratification of his officers' conduct—is also liable under § 1983, but it does not 'necessarily resolve[ ]' the issue one way or another. . . The City's liability will turn on whether Chief Garcia 'took ... steps to reprimand or discharge the [Officers], or ... failed to admit [their] conduct was in error.'. . The Officers' liability, as discussed at length above, will turn on whether they increased the danger to the Attendees and acted with deliberate indifference to that danger. Because we must apply 'different legal standards' to whether Chief Garcia actually ratified the Officers' conduct and to whether that conduct was unconstitutional, the two issues are not 'inextricably intertwined,' and the City's appeal is not subject to pendent jurisdiction.")

Maddox v. City of Sandpoint, No. 17-35875, 2018 WL 3569028, at *1-2 (9th Cir. July 25, 2018) (not reported) ("On appeal, defendants failed to present the facts in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, and accordingly have forfeited the legal argument that, based on those facts, they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . Both in their briefing and at oral argument, defendants merely dispute the circumstances attendant to Jeanetta's encounter with the police and contend that she posed an immediate threat to the officers based on their version of the facts. But 'a defendant, entitled to invoke a qualified immunity defense, may not appeal a district court's summary judgment order insofar as that order determines whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a "genuine" issue of fact for trial.'. . And where, as here, an appellant-officer's opening brief 'lapse[s] into disputing [the plaintiffs'] version of the facts' and does 'not advance[ ] an argument as to why the law is not clearly established that takes the facts in the light most favorable to' the plaintiffs, '[w]e will not do [the] appellant[s's] work for [them], either by manufacturing [their] legal arguments, or by combing the record on [their] behalf for factual support.'. . Addressing the defendants' purely factual disputes with the district court's qualified-immunity determination is beyond the limited scope of our appellate jurisdiction. . . .Our disposition of defendants' appeal on forfeiture grounds does not prevent them from 'raising ... qualified immunity at a subsequent stage in the litigation, such as in a Rule 50 motion for judgment as a matter of law.'")

Sjurset v. Button, 810 F.3d 609, 616-17 (9th Cir. 2015) ("We have held that the Behrens rule applies in cases "where the appeal focuses on whether the defendants violated a clearly established law given the undisputed facts." Knox v. Sw. Airlines, 124 F.3d 1103, 1107 (9th Cir.1997). This is particularly important in the qualified-immunity context because "[i]mmunity ordinarily should be decided by the court long before trial." Hunter v. Bryant, 502 U.S. 224, 228, 112 S.Ct. 534, 116 L.Ed.2d 589 (1991). Sjurset correctly points out that Johnson would preclude us from determining the reasonableness of the DHS officials' actions based on the facts that remain in dispute. But Johnson is inapplicable here because this appeal is based on undisputed facts as they relate to a purely 'abstract issue of law'—that is, whether the Stayton officers violated clearly established law when they acted in reliance on the DHS officials' determination. The district court explicitly acknowledged that the facts concerning the Stayton officers' actions are not in dispute. What the district court did find in dispute—namely, the number of calls that Moller–Mata made to Sjurset and Borchers on the day before the welfare check, the nature of Borchers's drug abuse, and whether viewing the children through a window could reasonably give rise to a showing of imminent danger—do not form the basis of the Stayton officers' appeal. These disputed facts might well apply to the reasonableness of the DHS officials' protective-custody determination, but they do not apply to whether the Stayton officers violated clearly established rights of the plaintiffs by relying on the DHS officials' protective-custody determination. In addition, the district court noted that the parties all agreed that DHS, and not the Stayton officers, made the decision to take protective custody of the children. There is no dispute that the Stayton officers entered Sjurset's residence and assisted in the children's removal in reliance on that decision. Finally, no one disputes that, under Oregon law, DHS has the statutory authority to take protective custody '[w]hen [a] child's condition or surroundings reasonably appear to be such as to jeopardize the child's welfare.'. . These undisputed facts provide a sufficient basis to determine whether the Stayton officers' reliance on DHS's determination violated any clearly established right of the plaintiffs. An analysis based on these facts is therefore appropriate.")

Branscum v. San Ramon Police Dep't, 606 F. App'x 860, 862-63 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Under the doctrine of Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304 (1995) and its progeny, '[a]ny decision by the district court "that the parties' evidence presents genuine issues of material fact is categorically unreviewable on interlocutory appeal"' from the denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . In other words, '[f]or purposes of the appeal of the denial of immunity, we must "take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment for [a] (purely legal) reason."'. . We are therefore bound by the district court's determinations as to the existence of genuine disputes of fact. George rejected the argument that Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007), 'implicitly abrogated' Johnson and its progeny. . . 'Even accepting for the sake of argument, though, that Scott,' in light of Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S.Ct. 2012 (2014), was 'meant to establish an exception to the rules for interlocutory review,'. . that exception would not apply here. The various video recordings do not provide 'dispositive evidence that "blatantly contradict[s]" or "utterly discredit[s]" [Branscum's] side of the story.'. . . Rather, the video footage is, as the district court determined, susceptible to more than one interpretation. . . We nonetheless do have jurisdiction to consider the officers' qualified immunity appeal. . . Taking, 'as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment,'. . . we hold that the district court correctly denied qualified immunity.")

Chavez v. U.S., 683 F.3d 1102, 1108 (9th Cir. 2012) ("While the district court here did not address the issue of qualified immunity, the supervisory defendants raised qualified immunity as a defense in their answer to the complaint, and both their motion under Rule 12(c) and their objections to the Magistrate Judge's Report and Recommendation made frequent reference to qualified immunity. Thus, by failing to address the question of qualified immunity, the district court denied the supervisory defendants' defense sub silentio. Where an appellate court has jurisdiction to review the denial of a qualified immunity defense, it also has jurisdiction to review predominantly legal issues, such as the sufficiency of a complaint, that are 'inextricably intertwined with' and 'directly implicated by' the issue of qualified immunity. . . Accordingly, we have jurisdiction to review both whether the supervisory defendants have qualified immunity—which turns on legal issues such as whether they allegedly violated 'clearly established' rights, Behrens v. Pelletier, 516 U.S. 299, 313 (1996)—and whether the complaint adequately alleges any claim against the supervisory defendants.")

Padgett v. Wright, 587 F.3d 983, 985, 986 (9th Cir. 2009) ("Wright's interest in immediately appealing the district court's denial of qualified immunity was an interest in avoiding 'stand[ing] trial or fac[ing] the other burdens of litigation.'. . Because the trial has already occurred, there is no longer any compelling reason for us to deviate from the general rule preventing us from reviewing denials of summary judgment. . . It would be particularly inappropriate for us to hear this appeal, as it focuses entirely on the threshold question of whether a constitutional violation occurred. Wright's opening brief makes no argument as to whether he is entitled to qualified immunity even if the facts shown by the plaintiffs make out a violation of a constitutional right, as it fails to address 'whether the right at issue was "clearly established" at the time of defendant's alleged misconduct.'. . By now, however, a jury has found that Wright did violate Joseph Padgett's constitutional rights. Wright can obtain review of the final judgment by appealing it once final judgment is entered. We will not entertain a prejudgment qualified immunity appeal asking us to decide the same question a jury has already decided. We thus dismiss the appeal.").

Mueller v. Auker, 576 F.3d 979, 989, 990 (9th Cir. 2009) ("[W]e conclude that the grant of summary judgment to Eric Mueller as a matter of law on the merits of a constitutional claim, and against a defendant asserting qualified immunity, is the equivalent of a denial of such an assertion. Such denial where the district court has held that no cognizable factual disputes exist vests us with jurisdiction under the collateral order doctrine. . . . In effect, the denial in this case and the grant on the merits, even though it was not 'independent of the cause itself,' Iqbal, 556 U.S. at __, are 'inextricably intertwined,' opening the door to the doctrine of 'pendent Jurisdiction.'. . . . Likewise, [Officer] Aguilar may appeal the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the [plaintiffs] Durans on the issue of section 1983 liability. The legal issues involved in that appeal-whether Aguilar violated clearly established constitutional protections–are identical to those governing the question of Aguilar's qualified immunity. As the relevant facts are not disputed, the resolution of the qualified immunity question will also decide the question of Aguilar's liability. Delaying our consideration of the liability issue until after the trial on damages would thus serve no purpose.")

Moss v. U.S. Secret Service, 572 F.3d 962, 972-74 (9th Cir. 2009) (Moss I) ("Defendants insist that, where qualified immunity is at issue, a district court may not defer ruling on the question of whether an official's actions violated clearly established law, and that orders deferring such a ruling should therefore be immediately appealable. This court squarely rejected that argument in the context of a deferred ruling on an absolute immunity defense. [citing Miller v. Gammie, 335

F.3d 889, 894 (9th Cir.2003) (en banc)] Further, Defendants' argument is difficult to reconcile with the Supreme Court's recognition that limited discovery, tailored to the issue of qualified immunity, will sometimes be necessary before a district court can resolve a motion for summary judgment. . . But even assuming that orders deferring a ruling on qualified immunity are immediately appealable in some circumstances, those circumstances are clearly not present here. In the context of a denial of qualified immunity, the policy justification for permitting immediate appeal rests on the fact that qualified immunity is an immunity from suit, distinct from the merits of the underlying claim. . . Thus, an order clearing the way for burdensome pre-trial discovery obligations renders the denial of immunity effectively unreviewable on appeal from final judgment–immunity from suit is of no use at that late stage. . . As discussed above, the district court has yet to order any discovery or to compel the Agents to submit to depositions. Thus, to the extent that this portion of Defendants' interlocutory appeal is premised on a need to obtain appellate review before being subjected to burdensome pretrial obligations, that need has not been shown, and the appeal is premature. . . . Before the district court, Defendants firmly resisted all discovery requests and contended that their motion to dismiss ought to be considered prior to any discovery. The court, reasonably, found the argument persuasive and suggested a pretrial sequence that would permit prompt resolution of the qualified immunity motion while holding discovery in abeyance. After getting the litigation sequence they asked for, Defendants now seek an immediate appellate ruling on their summary judgment motion without allowing Plaintiffs the benefit of discovery relating to the core factual matters at issue on their defense of qualified immunity. We therefore lack jurisdiction over this portion of Defendants' appeal; accordingly, it must be dismissed.")

Maropulos v. County of Los Angeles, 560 F.3d 974, 975, 976 (9th Cir. 2009) ("[I]n the mine run of cases, we cannot undertake appellate review effectively when forced to guess what the district court did in order to determine whether we even have jurisdiction. District courts are much better situated than we are to sift through submissions of fact in order to identify those that are genuinely disputed and material, or alternatively, to isolate those that are not controverted or can be assumed as true for the purpose of deciding sufficiency to show a violation of a clearly established right. A clear statement of the basis for a decision by the district court not only facilitates appellate review, but assists the parties in evaluating whether to take an appeal in the first place. In this way, we mutually contribute to 'the just, speedy, and inexpensive' determination of disputes, as Rule 1 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure directs. Having experienced similar difficulties in determining the scope of jurisdiction to hear interlocutory appeals from the denial of qualified immunity, our colleagues on the Third Circuit now require district courts ruling on summary judgment motions based on qualified immunity where material facts are in dispute to specify which facts are in dispute and why they are material. [citing Blaylock and Forbes] We embrace the principle, and encourage all district judges within the circuit to articulate the basis upon which they deny qualified immunity and, when it is for reasons of sufficiency of the evidence to raise genuine issues of fact, to spell out the triable issues and why they preclude immunity before trial.").

Adams v. Speers, 473 F.3d 989, 990, 991 (9th Cir. 2007) ("Preliminary to statement of the facts, we note that Officer Speers can make an interlocutory appeal from the ruling on immunity only if he accepts as undisputed the facts presented by the appellees. See Jeffers v. Gomez, 267 F.3d 895, 903 (9th Cir.2001). As Speers' briefs show, he is familiar with this maxim governing such appeals, but at times his briefs lapse into disputing the Adamses' version of the facts and even into offering his own version of the facts. We regret these lapses and, as they are made by the Attorney General of the State of California defending Speers, we take this occasion to advise the Attorney General that such practice could jeopardize our jurisdiction to hear the interlocutory appeal. This exceptional remedy is available only if the issue of immunity is presented as a question of law. See Johnson v. County of Los Angeles, 340 F.3d 787, 791 n. 1 (9th Cir.2003). As an appellate court, we are in no position to adjudicate disputed facts that have not gone through the crucible of trial. Still less are we in a position to accept as true something asserted to be a fact by the appellant that has not been tested in any judicial process. The exception to the normal rule prohibiting an appeal before a trial works only if the appellant concedes the facts and seeks judgment on the law.").

Carter v. Denison, 110 F. App'x 6, 2004 WL 1895018, at *2 (9th Cir. Aug. 24, 2004) ("Since we find the officers did not use excessive force as a matter of law, there is no basis for Monell liability against the City. . .The City's Monell liability is 'inextricably intertwined' with the officers' entitlement to qualified immunity; thus we have pendent jurisdiction to address this issue as well.").

Kwai Fun Wong v. United States, 973 F.3d 952, 961, 962 (9th Cir. 2004) ("The INS officials also seek review of the district court's denial of their motion to dismiss the constitutional and RFRA claims for failure to state a claim, a decision not ordinarily subject to immediate appeal. . . Whether a complaint fails to allege legally cognizable claims is, however, 'inextricably intertwined' with the qualified immunity issue. To determine whether the INS officials are entitled to qualified immunity, we must first consider whether, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the facts alleged show the violation of a constitutional or statutory right. See Saucier, 533 U.S. at 201. Similarly, in reviewing a district court's denial of a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, we must consider whether, construing the allegations of the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, it 'appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.'. . So to determine whether the facts as alleged show that the INS officials violated a legal right (the qualified immunity inquiry), we have to determine whether the facts as alleged state a claim for violation of constitutional or statutory rights. . . We may therefore exercise pendent jurisdiction to review the district court's denial of the substantive motion to dismiss.").

Way v. County of Ventura, 348 F.3d 808, 810 (9th Cir. 2003) ("In this case, the district court decided the first [Saucier] inquiry, and the County seeks to appeal this ruling before the second is reached. By not considering the second inquiry in Saucier's analysis, however, the district court did not arrive at a final, appealable decision on the County's qualified immunity.").

Cunningham v. City of Wenatchee, 345 F.3d 802, 808, 809 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Notwithstanding the decisions of Johnson and Behrens, the courts still seem to be in somewhat disarray as to the proper rules to follow. Our job as an appellate court is not to critique the Supreme Court decisions, but to do our best to interpret them. . . .We hold in the present case the facts involved are distinguishable from those in Johnson. In following the admonition in Mitchell, we assume the facts shown by Cunningham, the nonmoving party, as being true for the purpose of deciding the abstract legal question governing qualified immunity. We also find that the allegations made by Cunningham and the proof adduced by him in the summary judgment proceeding sets apart the legal issue of qualified immunity from the merits of the case. We therefore find that this court has jurisdiction to entertain Perez's appeal from the denial of the motion of summary judgment relating to the qualified immunity defense.").

Miller v. Gammie, 335 F.3d 889, 894, 895, 899 (9th Cir. 2003) (en banc) ("This is an appeal from the deferral, pending limited discovery, of a ruling on a motion to dismiss on grounds of absolute immunity. Orders denying immunity are generally appealable. . . The district court in this case, however, did not enter an order that categorically denied the motion to dismiss on the ground of absolute immunity. Rather, it deferred ruling on [defendants'] absolute immunity claim until completion of limited discovery. The three-judge panel treated that deferral as an effective denial of the motion, and it assumed appellate jurisdiction under the collateral-order doctrine stemming from the Supreme Court's decision in Cohen . . . . The panel pointed out that the Supreme Court has held that absolute immunity, where applicable, is a protection not only from liability but also from being answerable in any way for one's actions. . . . District court orders deferring a ruling on immunity for a limited time to ascertain what relevant functions were performed generally are not appealable. This is because they are not orders that deny the claimed existence of immunity, which are interlocutorily appealable on that basis. . . Nor are they appealable under Cohen, because collateral orders are appealable only when they conclusively decide a collateral issue. . . An order deferring a ruling is not conclusive. . . . Because the order in this case was not itself immediately appealable, as the district court fully understood, we cannot review it de novo as we would on ordinary appellate review. We can, however, as we have done in past similar situations, treat the notice of appeal as a petition for a writ of mandamus and consider the issues under the factors set forth in Bauman [v. United States District Court, 557 F.2d 650, 654-55 (9th Cir.1997), which include whether the district court clearly erred.] . . . . Under the functional analysis laid out by the Supreme Court, the district court did not err when it deferred ruling on the motion to dismiss on the pleadings until the nature of the functions the defendants allegedly performed was sufficiently outlined to permit the court to apply Antoine and Kalina.").

Ganwich v. Knapp, 319 F.3d 1115, 1119 & n.6 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Forcing the defendant officers to undergo discovery, without the possibility of appeal to us, would erode any qualified immunity to the burdens of discovery the officers might possess. We hold that the district court's denial of the officers' pre-discovery qualified immunity motion was an immediately appealable final judgment. . . . We have pendent party jurisdiction over defendant Pierce County's appeal because our decision on the individual officers' qualified immunity claims necessarily will decide whether Pierce County is entitled to summary judgment on the merits of the constitutional questions.")

Cunningham v. Gates, 229 F.3d 1271, 1286 (9th Cir. 2000) ("[A] denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is not always unappealable simply because a district judge has stated that there are material issues of fact in dispute. . .An appellate court still has jurisdiction to consider defendants' assertion that the dispute of fact is not material. . . This is different from a claim that the court's findings are not supported by the record, as a claim of materiality is solely one of law, and therefore is reviewable on an interlocutory basis.").

Cunningham v. Gates, 229 F.3d 1271, 1286 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Unlike our Huskey opinion, our decision does not necessarily resolve the City's appeal by determining that plaintiffs did not demonstrate an actual injury. . . Rather, because the question of actual injury involves factual disputes outside of our scope of review, today's decision assumes plaintiffs may be able to convince a jury that they suffered constitutional injuries caused by some combination of police action and city official inaction. . . . Thus, we lack jurisdiction to review the City's appeal from the district court's denial of its summary judgment motion because this issue is not 'inextricably intertwine' with any of the issues properly before us on interlocutory appeal.").

Huskey v. City of San Jose, 204 F.3d 893, 904, 905 (9th Cir. 2000) (" Huskey's theory of the City's § 1983 liability rests solely on Gallo's allegedly unconstitutional actions and his contention that those actions are attributable to the City because Gallo was a policymaker for the Office. . . . Our conclusion that Gallo and the other individual defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because Huskey failed to allege a constitutional deprivation necessarily forecloses the possibility of the City's § 1983 liability for Gallo's actions. Based on the foregoing analysis, we conclude that this is a proper case for the exercise of pendent party appellate jurisdiction. We have recognized that pendent party appellate jurisdiction may be permissible under the 'inextricably intertwined' exception suggested by the Supreme Court in Swint. . . We hold that the 'inextricably intertwined' exception suggested in Swint applies to the City's appeal in this case. The Sixth and Tenth Circuits have both come to the same conclusion when presented with facts similar to those presented in the instant matter. See Mattox v. City of Forest Park, 183 F.3d 515, 523-24 (6th Cir.1999); Moore v. City of Wynnewood, 57 F.3d 924, 929-31 (10th Cir.1995). We are persuaded by their reasoning.").

Huskey v. City of San Jose, 204 F.3d 893, 905, 906 (9th Cir. 2000) ("We hold that the 'inextricably intertwined' exception suggested in Swint applies to the City's appeal in this case. The Sixth and Tenth Circuits have both come to the same conclusion when presented with facts similar to those presented in the instant matter. . . We are persuaded by their reasoning. . . . That the liability of the City of San Jose is inextricably intertwined with the conduct of its City Attorney under Huskey's theory of the case can be demonstrated by the following syllogism: The City would be liable to Huskey for the deprivation of his federal constitutional rights resulting from a policy or custom adopted by Gallo in her role as a city policymaker. Huskey has failed to present legally sufficient evidence that any custom or policy adopted by Gallo deprived him of his federal constitutional rights. Therefore, the City is not liable to Huskey under § 1983.").

Price v. Kramer, 200 F.3d 1237, 1244 (9th Cir. 2000) ("In the present case, the defendants did not avail themselves of their right to an interlocutory appeal of the pre-trial ruling, if indeed they had one. Having failed to take whatever timely opportunity existed, they now ask us to review the pre-trial qualified immunity order as though the subsequent trial and jury verdict had never transpired. Notably, during oral argument, defense counsel could not provide the court with a reason for their not having filed such an interlocutory appeal, aside from the fact that the time for doing so eventually elapsed. The defendants' complaint to us now–that in retrospect the officers should have been immune from suit at the time of the pretrial order–is long past due and unreviewable on this appeal.").

Mendocino Environmental Center v. Mendocino County, 192 F.3d 1283, 1297 (9th Cir. 1999) ("In deciding whether the rulings are inextricably linked, we conduct a preliminary review of the issues and consider the non-frivolous contentions of the parties, rather than first resolving the merits and then determining whether the rulings are inextricably linked. We also consider the various bases on which the issues might be resolved, but, again, do not make that determination before deciding the jurisdictional question. In this case, given that both sides rely heavily on the resolution of the conspiracy issue as dispositive of the qualified immunity question, and given that our preliminary review suggests that the conspiracy ruling could well be determinative of this appeal, we hold that the questions are inextricably intertwined and we exercise jurisdiction over the conspiracy ruling.").

Thomas v. Gomez, 143 F.3d 1246, 1248 (9th Cir. 1998) ("[A] denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is not always unappealable simply because the district court concludes that the issues of fact in dispute are material. . . Under Johnson and Behrens, an appellate court has jurisdiction to hear an interlocutory appeal where defendants assert that the district court erred in determining that the disputed facts were material. . . No such assertion is made here. On appeal the officers' sole argument is that the record does not support the district court's determination that a factual dispute exits. The officers contend that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they presented uncontroverted evidence in their motion for summary judgment that 'they did not have the intent to inflict pain on Plaintiff unnecessarily or for a malicious purpose.' The resolution of this contention turns exclusively on factual issues. Their materiality is not at issue.").

Knox v. Southwest Airlines, 124 F.3d 1103, 1107 (9th Cir. 1997) ("[W]e have jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal from the denial of qualified immunity where the appeal focuses on whether the defendants violated a clearly established law given the undisputed facts, while we do not have jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal that focuses on whether there is a genuine dispute about the underlying facts. . . . Even if disputed facts exist about what actually occurred, a defendant may still file an interlocutory appeal if the defendant's alleged conduct in any event met the standard of objective legal reasonableness under clearly established law regarding the right allegedly infringed.").

Collins v. Jordan, 102 F.3d 406, 412 (9th Cir. 1996) ("[A] denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is not always unappealable simply because a district judge has stated that there are material issues of fact in dispute. . . An appellate court still has jurisdiction to consider defendants' assertion that the dispute of fact is not material. . . Such a claim is of a different character from a claim that the court's findings are not supported by the record. The claim of lack of materiality is solely one of law, and therefore is reviewable on an interlocutory basis."), opinion amended on other grounds, 110 F.3d 1363 (9th Cir. 1997).

Chateaubriand v. Gaspard, 97 F.3d 1218, 1223-24 (9th Cir. 1996) ("The district court determined that Chateaubriand presented sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the Caucus leaders were aware of his complaints and demoted him because of them. We have no jurisdiction to review factual issues in this context. [cites omitted] The only issue before us is purely legal: whether the alleged facts support a claim of violation of clearly established law. To resolve this issue, we assume, as the district court did, that the Caucus leaders demoted Chateaubriand in retaliation for his speech.").

Cutright v. City of Phoenix, Nos. 94-15462, 94-15463, 1996 WL 84917, *2 (9th Cir. Feb. 28, 1996) (Table) ("This case is distinguishable from Johnson . . ., in which the Supreme Court held that when the district court denies summary judgment because genuine issues of material fact exist, the decision is not a "final decision" appropriate for an interlocutory appeal. Here, the district court should have made a determination as to the objective reasonableness of the officers' conduct, which is a question of law. Instead, the district court, without discussing objective reasonableness, held that a genuine issue of fact existed as to the subjective reasonableness of the officers' conduct and, accordingly, denied summary judgment. As a result, the district court failed to properly address the second prong of the qualified immunity defense. This was an error of law and, therefore, immediate appeal was appropriate.").

Armendariz v. Penman, 75 F.3d 1311, 1317-18 (9th Cir. 1996) (en banc) ("It is clear from Johnson, then, that we have jurisdiction to review the district court's decision that the defendants' alleged conduct violated clearly established law, but the collateral order doctrine does not provide appellate jurisdiction to review the district court's decision that genuine issues of material fact exist for trial. Neither we nor the Supreme Court has decided definitively whether an appellate court with jurisdiction to review a final collateral order may ever simultaneously review related rulings that are not themselves immediately appealable. . . . Even assuming, however, that such discretionary 'appellate pendant jurisdiction' exists, we would not exercise it here."), overruled on other grounds, Crown Point Development, Inc. v. City of Sun Valley, 2007 WL 3197049, at *4 (9th Cir. Nov. 1, 2007) ("[It]it is no longer possible in light of Lingle and Lewis to read Armendariz as imposing a blanket obstacle to all substantive due process challenges to land use regulation.).

Carnell v. Grimm, 74 F.3d 977, 979 (9th Cir. 1996) ("Because the defendants challenge the purely legal determination of whether the district court erred in determining that the law was clearly established, we have jurisdiction over this issue . . .However, insofar that a genuine issue of material fact exists for trial, namely whether Carnell informed the officers that she had been raped, we conclude that we do not have jurisdiction to address that issue. . . And the resolution of that disputed issue of fact impacts the question whether reasonable officers could have believed that their conduct in arresting Carnell and booking her at the police station, rather than taking her to a clinic for medical attention was lawful in light of the circumstances.").

Pellegrino v. United States, 73 F.3d 934, 938 (9th Cir. 1996) (Wallace, C.J., concurring and dissenting) ("The majority's approach would seem to deny appellate jurisdiction over appeals from denials of qualified immunity for any case with disputed facts. Because I believe the majority misunderstands Johnson, I respectfully dissent. . . . Johnson does not preclude an appellate court from reviewing whether an officer violated clearly established law under any given set of facts. . . The majority goes afield by failing to perceive the difference between determining the existence of a triable issue of fact and reviewing assumed facts. . . . Johnson requires that an appellate court must first determine what exactly it is asked to review. Do we review a given set of facts to see whether they violate clearly established law or do we review a determination of which facts present "genuine" issues? In this case, I believe it is the former.").

Mujahid v. Mindoro, No 93-17025, 1995 WL 430552, *1 (9th Cir. July 17, 1995) (not reported) ("The Supreme Court has recently held that 'a defendant, entitled to invoke a qualified- immunity defense, may not appeal a district court's summary judgment order insofar as that order determines whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a 'genuine' issue of fact for trial.' However, in Johnson, the Court also stated, '[w]hen faced with an argument that the district court mistakenly identified clearly established law, the court of appeals can simply take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment for that (purely legal) reason.' Because the defendants contend that the district court erred in determining that a clearly established right existed, we have jurisdiction over this case.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Heard v. Dulayev, 29 F.4th 1195, 1201-02 (10th Cir. 2022) ("First, the defendants' argument on appeal necessarily relies on the premise that the district court's finding—that 'Heard was never given a reasonable opportunity to surrender peacefully and comply with Officer Dulayev's bang-bang commands'—is blatantly contradicted by the record. . .The record shows that even before the 'bang-bang' commands, Dulayev had taken out his Taser and threatened to use it if Heard did not '[c]rawl out on [his] hands and knees.'. . Heard's response, 'Don't tase me,' shows he was cognizant of the Taser. . . Yet, after momentarily crawling, Heard 'rose to his feet,' and 'took about three steps in the direction of Officer Dulayev.'. . As Heard began to take these steps, Dulayev ordered Heard to 'Turn around!' and to 'Stop right there! Stop!'. . But Heard continued to take steps towards Dulayev. At this point, Heard had already gone against Dulayev's command to crawl and he knew Dulayev stood there ready with a Taser. Even after this initial command, Dulayev gave Heard additional time and warning to stop. Thus, the record clearly shows that Heard had an opportunity to surrender before he took those additional steps in the direction of Dulayev. Because this finding is blatantly contradicted by the record, we need not accept it in our analysis. . . Second, the defendants also claim that the court's finding that, as Heard was being handcuffed, Dulayev 'aggressively shoved [Heard's] face into the dirt' after jumping on him is blatantly contradicted by the record. . . . [T]he video evidence is clear that it was Enriquez who shoved Heard's face into the dirt, while Dulayev restrained Heard's arms. . . Now, as we explain in more detail below, considering whether the law was clearly established under the facts that the district court did find—and which Dulayev accepts—leaves us with a purely legal question appropriate under our limited jurisdiction: whether a police officer's use of a Taser is justified where, despite repeated warnings and orders to stop, an assault suspect continues to step toward that officer at close proximity.")

Heard v. Dulayev, 29 F.4th 1195, 1207-08 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Pendent appellate jurisdiction is a 'narrow' 'extension of [this court's] jurisdiction' and 'is generally disfavored.'. . In some cases, we may exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction where the 'pendent appellate claim can be regarded as inextricably intertwined with a properly reviewable claim on collateral appeal.'. . That is, we may consider a pendent claim 'when the appellate resolution of the collateral appeal necessarily resolves the pendent claim as well.'. . 'In cases where we ... resolve [the related] claim under the clearly-established-law prong' of the qualified immunity defense, however, 'we have repeatedly declined to exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over [the] municipal-liability' claim. . . 'This is because ... when [this court] resolve[s] an individual-capacity § 1983 claim on the clearly-established-law prong ... [the] analysis often, as a matter of law, does not turn on issues inextricably intertwined with those implicated by' a municipal liability claim 'arising out of the same facts.'. .Having resolved Dulayev's appeal under the clearly-established-law prong, this court declines to exercise its pendent appellate jurisdiction over the City's appeal. . . Indeed, the City only asserts its appeal is inextricably intertwined with Dulayev's insofar as this case could have been resolved under the constitutional-violation prong. Accordingly, Heard's motion to dismiss is granted in part, and this case is remanded to the district court for further proceedings.")

Simpson v. Little, 16 F.4th 1353, 1362, 1365 (10th Cir. 2021) ("Officer Little asks us to disregard the district court's factual determinations regarding the second Graham factor—immediacy of the threat to the officer or others—and adopt his version of events. He contends that Mr. Simpson 'had tried to run over him,' and that Mr. Simpson 'had several other paths of escape away from Defendant Little, but ... headed towards Defendant Little's position in the street.'. . Officer Little also asserts that when he began shooting, the 'SUV [was] coming towards him' and 'the vehicle [was] well in front of [him] when he decided to fire, engaged his trigger and began pulling his trigger.'. . As to each of these factual contentions, the district court found a reasonable jury could infer facts to conclude otherwise. The district court determined that a reasonable jury could determine that 'Simpson posed no immediate threat to Officer Little or others.'. . It noted that 'the dash camera video does not show Officer Little in the path of the SUV at any point,' and a photo of the scene 'show[s] tire marks and path [of Mr. Simpson's vehicle] in the grass.'. . From this evidence, the court said a reasonable jury could find that Mr. Simpson 'attempted to avoid hitting Little by veering off the right side of the road.'. . When discussing Officer Little's location when he fired his weapon, the court pointed to evidence regarding where and at what angle the bullets struck the vehicle, indicating Officer Little was not directly in the SUV's path but 'was standing to the side and to the rear of the SUV when he fired.'. . It concluded a reasonable jury could find Mr. Simpson 'posed no immediate danger to Officer Little or others when Little fired the fatal shots.'. . The district court further said a reasonable jury could find that because 'Simpson posed no immediate threat to Officer Little or others, the jury could also find that Officer Little's use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable and thereby violated Simpson's Fourth Amendment rights.'. . Officer Little seeks to relitigate the factual inferences the court made en route to that conclusion. But on interlocutory appeal we cannot 'second-guess[ ] the district court's determinations regarding whether [Ms. Simpson] has presented evidence sufficient to survive summary judgment.'. . . Officer Little's attempts to distinguish Cordova dispute 'facts we must assume to be true at this stage of the proceedings.'. . We lack jurisdiction to consider Officer Little's clearly-established-law arguments that are 'an intertwining of disputed issues of fact and cherry-picked inferences, on the one hand, with principles of law, on the other hand.'")

Duda v. Elder, 7 F.4th 899, 916-17 (10th Cir. 2021) ("The district court denied qualified immunity to Sheriff Elder because it found that Jantzen v. Hawkins, 188 F.3d 1247 (10th Cir. 1999), provided clearly established applicable law. In that case, three plaintiffs worked in a sheriff's office and actively campaigned for the incumbent sheriff's opponent. . . They were fired after the sheriff won reelection. . . We denied qualified immunity to the sheriff because he 'should have known that it would be unconstitutional to terminate [the plaintiffs] for affiliating with and/or believing in a particular candidate.'. . Our interlocutory jurisdiction would permit consideration of the clearly established law question of whether 'the facts that the district court ruled a reasonable jury could find,' taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, show a violation of clearly established law under Jantzen. See Sawyers, 962 F.3d at 1282. . . . But that jurisdiction is premised on our accepting 'the facts we must assume to be true at this stage of the proceedings.'. . On appeal, Sheriff Elder argues that Jantzen is distinguishable from his version of the facts. . . . Sheriff Elder does not present an argument based on 'the facts we must assume to be true at this stage of the proceedings.'. . We thus lack jurisdiction to consider Sheriff Elder's clearly-established-law argument, which is 'an intertwining of disputed issues of fact and cherry-picked inferences, on the one hand, with principles of law, on the other hand.'. . He has otherwise waived any jurisdictionally appropriate challenge to the district court's clearly-established-law holding because he has not made one. . .In sum, we lack jurisdiction where, as here, the defendant-appellant's argument 'is limited to a discussion of [his] version of the facts and the inferences that can be drawn therefrom.'. .We affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Sheriff Elder on Mr. Duda's Angley speech claim. The district court did not err in finding a constitutional violation. We lack jurisdiction to consider Sheriff Elder's fact-bound challenge to the district court's clearly-established-law holding.")

Frasier v. Evans, 992 F.3d 1003, 1029-33 (10th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 427 (2021) ("[L]ike Cox, even if we were to assume that the officers were 'obliged to marshal particularized arguments in support of the clearly-established-law question' and therefore forfeited such arguments by not making them before the district court, we would 'exercise ... our discretion to overlook the assumed forfeiture' on these facts and 'elect here to reach the merits of [the officers'] qualified-immunity arguments based on the absence of clearly established law.'. . In sum, even if the officers forfeited their clearly-established-law arguments, we would exercise our discretion to consider them. . . .In contending that we should not reach the merits, Mr. Frasier makes one last jurisdictional argument in the following terms: 'Defendants' argument about whether the law was clearly established at the time (as to conspiracy to violate ... Fourth Amendment rights) assumes facts favorable to them. This deprives this Court of jurisdiction to consider the argument.' . . In this regard, Mr. Frasier asserts that he 'presented evidence that after the Defendants surrounded him in a circle and demanded the video from him, implying arrest if he refused, he acquiesced and retrieved his tablet [computer] for Evans,' but that 'Defendants reject this view of the facts.'. . Mr. Frasier's last jurisdictional argument is mistaken and otherwise without merit. It is quite true that, under our 'limited jurisdiction' to review interlocutory, qualified-immunity appeals, our review is restricted to 'the district court's abstract legal conclusions,' and 'we are not at liberty to review a district court's factual conclusions.'. . Thus, where a district court 'concludes that a reasonable jury could find certain specified facts in favor of the plaintiff, the Supreme Court has indicated we usually must take them as true—and do so even if our own de novo review of the record might suggest otherwise as a matter of law.'. . But this well-settled prohibition against review of the district court's factual conclusions relates to the district court's factual findings based on the summary-judgment record. That is, the bar pertains to revisiting the court's factual conclusions concerning what facts a reasonable jury could find based on the evidence in that record—construing that evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. That prohibition, however, does not prevent appellate courts—and defendants asserting qualified immunity on interlocutory appeal—from challenging the district court's legal analysis of the facts it has found nor, relatedly, the court's ultimate resolution of the abstract legal questions before it. . . We believe that Mr. Frasier's jurisdictional argument here reflects a mistaken reading of the substance and thrust of the officers' briefing. Regarding the substance, though they sometimes use more muted language in describing the relevant events, we discern no indication from their briefing that the officers contest the evidence that Mr. Frasier 'presented' about the officers surrounding him and demanding that he turn over the video contained on his tablet computer and about Mr. Frasier's contention that he submitted to the officers' demands because he harbored concerns regarding being arrested and going to jail. . . Moreover, Mr. Frasier has not suggested that the district court did not construe the summary-judgment record in the light most favorable to him. This is significant because the officers leave no doubt, for purposes of this interlocutory appeal, that they accept the facts that the district court found to be supported by the record. . . Therefore, in doing so, the officers have necessarily accepted the version of the record that is construed in the light most favorable to Mr. Frasier. . . .[T]he thrust of the officers' argument is that—because of the district court's allegedly flawed approach to the facts that it did find—the court erred in reaching the legal conclusion that the facts were sufficient to establish that the officers engaged in a conspiracy to search Mr. Frasier's tablet computer that violated his clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. We conclude that, irrespective of the merits of the officers' arguments—and we do not opine on their merits now—these arguments do not dispute the facts found by the district court, but instead, raise the sort of legal questions that we have jurisdiction to resolve. . . Accordingly, we reject Mr. Frasier's last jurisdictional argument and proceed to the merits.")

Crowson v. Washington County State of Utah, 983 F.3d 1166, 1185-86, 1192-93 (10th Cir. 2020) ("If resolution of the collateral qualified immunity appeal 'necessarily resolves' the County's issues on appeal, then those otherwise nonappealable issues are 'inextricably intertwined' with the appealable decision. . . But 'if our ruling on the merits of the collateral qualified immunity appeal [would] not resolve all of the remaining issues presented by the [County],' then we lack jurisdiction to consider the County's appeal. . . . To frame our prior decisions, it is important to begin with the Supreme Court's direction in Collins v. City of Harker Heights that 'proper analysis requires us to separate two different issues when a § 1983 claim is asserted against a municipality: (1) whether plaintiff's harm was caused by a constitutional violation, and (2) if so, whether the city is responsible for that violation.'. . The absence of an affirmative answer to either of these questions is fatal to a claim against the municipality. With respect to the first question, a claim under § 1983 against either an individual actor or a municipality cannot survive a determination that there has been no constitutional violation. . . . Our conclusion that Nurse Johnson did not violate Mr. Crowson's constitutional rights does not completely resolve Mr. Crowson's claims against the County. The absence of a constitutional violation by Nurse Johnson forecloses Mr. Crowson's failure-to-train claim. However, it does not resolve the broader claim that the County's policy of failing to properly train nurses and guards, combined with its policy of relying on a largely absentee physician, evidenced deliberate indifference to Mr. Crowson's serious medical condition. Because this claim is not inextricably intertwined with the claim against any individual defendant, we lack jurisdiction over it in this interlocutory appeal. We therefore dismiss the County's appeal with respect to the systemic failure claim, and we remand for proceedings consistent with this opinion. In doing so, we express no view as to the merits of this claim. We simply decide we lack jurisdiction to consider it.")

Estate of Valverde by & through Padilla v. Dodge, 967 F.3d 1049, 1059 (10th Cir. 2020) ("[T]he mere existence of controverted factual issues does not necessarily divest us of jurisdiction. 'We need not ... decline review of a pretrial order denying summary judgment solely because the district court says genuine issues of material fact remain; instead, we lack jurisdiction only if our review would require second-guessing the district court's determinations of evidence sufficiency.'. . Thus, 'our jurisdiction is clear when the defendant does not dispute the facts alleged by the plaintiff and raises only legal challenges to the denial of qualified immunity based on those facts.'. .Also, when the district court expresses no view on the sufficiency of the evidence regarding an essential element of a claim or defense, we may assume that task. . . The only bar to our review in this regard is that we are required 'to accept as true the facts the district court expressly held a reasonable jury could accept.'. .We must note, however, that the appellate court is not always bound by a district court's ruling that the evidence presented would support a particular fact-finding. [citing Scott v. Harris] In sum, we have jurisdiction if the defendant's appeal seeks qualified immunity based on incontrovertible facts, facts that the district court has declared to be supported by the record, and—to the extent that the district court has not expressed its view—the remaining evidence as seen in the light most favorable to Plaintiff. Under this standard, we believe we have jurisdiction to consider the issues raised by Dodge on appeal.")

Estate of Ceballos v. Husk, 919 F.3d 1204, 1221 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Officer Husk's permissible interlocutory appeal raised the legal question of whether the district court erred in identifying clearly established law that put the officer on notice that his use of force, as Ceballos alleges it, was excessive and in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The City's interlocutory appeal involves, instead, the City's training of its officers. . . . On appeal, the City reasserts its argument that there is no evidence that its training was inadequate, but that if its training was inadequate, there is no evidence that any inadequacy rose to the level of deliberate indifference or caused any unconstitutional use of force against Ceballos. These issues do no overlap with the issue Officer Husk permissibly raised in his interlocutory appeal. Moreover, in resolving Officer Husk's interlocutory appeal, we concluded there was clearly established law that put the officer on notice that the alleged force he used against Ceballos was unconstitutional. But that determination does not 'necessarily resolve[ ]'. . . the training issues that the City raises in its appeal. We, therefore, decline to exercise pendent jurisdiction over the City's interlocutory appeal.")

Cummings v. Dean, 913 F.3d 1227, 1235-38 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Plaintiffs face several obstacles in establishing pendent jurisdiction over their cross-appeal. First, the exercise of pendent jurisdiction is generally disfavored as applied to cases in which primary appellate jurisdiction is based on the denial of qualified immunity. . . After all, the collateral order doctrine, used to appeal from denials of qualified immunity, 'is premised on the ability to decide the qualified immunity issue "in isolation from the remaining issues of the case,"' making it 'hard to reconcile' with pendent jurisdiction. . . . [E]ven were we to overlook Plaintiffs' failure to argue within the pendent-jurisdiction framework, we would conclude that their claims do not present either of the two scenarios where pendent jurisdiction may be appropriately exercised. With respect to Plaintiffs' appeal of the district court's dismissal of all claims against Secretary Bussey, the relevant question on appeal is whether Plaintiffs' amended complaint adequately identified an 'affirmative link' between Secretary Bussey and the alleged deprivations in this case. . . It is manifest that this question is not 'inextricably intertwined' with the appealable issue before us, i.e., whether Director Dean is entitled to qualified immunity as to Plaintiffs' substantive due-process claim. . . Nor is appellate review of this question 'necessary to ensure meaningful review,'. . . of the issues presented in Director Dean's qualified-immunity appeal[.] . . . As was the case in Cox, in resolving the non-pendent appeal, 'we [are] not required to decide the core issues implicated' in this ostensibly pendent matter, leaving us with 'grave doubt that there would be any appropriate basis for our exercise of pendent jurisdiction.'. . Our jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' appeal from the dismissal of their procedural due-process claim against Director Dean proves to be a closer call, but our conclusion is the same. It is axiomatic that procedural and substantive dueprocess claims require distinct analyses, undermining the notion that this pendent claim and the appealable claim are inextricably intertwined or that we must review the procedural claim in order to adequately address the substantive due-process claim that is properly before us. . . .Thus, given our general disfavor of pendent jurisdiction in the qualified-immunity context, . . . Plaintiffs' dereliction of their burden to establish our jurisdiction over their cross-appeal, and our conclusion that neither of the two accepted rationales for exercising pendent jurisdiction are present here, we decline to exercise pendent jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' cross-appeal.")

Montoya v. Vigil, 898 F.3d 1056, 1063-65 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Before addressing Montoya's specific contentions about the record, we find it useful to explain the basis of our jurisdiction over interlocutory qualified immunity appeals. Montoya's argument assumes the jurisdictional inquiry turns on whether or not the defendants adequately raised qualified immunity before the district court. That is not so. Our jurisdiction is based on district courts' 'decisions,' not on the particular arguments parties make in their briefs below. . . So the true jurisdictional inquiry is whether or not the district court decided the qualified immunity question at issue, not whether the defendants adequately raised the defense. On appeal, the plaintiff can very well argue the court should affirm because the defendant failed to adequately raise the defense below. But such an argument would go to the defendant's preservation of a merits argument, not this court's jurisdiction. That being so, we arrive at a simple rule: if the district court explicitly decided the qualified immunity question, we will usually have jurisdiction over the interlocutory appeal. There may be, of course, other considerations that remove our jurisdiction over an interlocutory qualified immunity appeal even when the district court explicitly decides the question. For example, a particular denial of qualified immunity may be too intertwined with questions of evidence sufficiency for our interlocutory review to be appropriate. Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304, 317, 115 S.Ct. 2151, 132 L.Ed.2d 238 (1995); Foote v. Spiegel, 118 F.3d 1416, 1422 (10th Cir. 1997). But in general, if the district court decided the qualified immunity question, we have jurisdiction to review it—regardless of whether or not the defendant properly raised the defense. The reverse of this rule is not true, however. A district court's failure to expressly decide the qualified immunity question does not necessarily mean we lack jurisdiction, because the district court's silence can operate as an implicit denial that is immediately appealable. E.g., Lowe v. Town of Fairland, 143 F.3d 1378, 1380 (10th Cir. 1998). In this context, it becomes important to make sure the defendants explicitly raised the defense. For how could the district court implicitly decide a question that was not clearly before it? If the defendant did not expressly raise the defense, we cannot interpret the district court's silence as an implicit denial of qualified immunity at that stage in the litigation. And that means there is no decision denying qualified immunity for us to review. With these maxims in mind, we turn to the jurisdictional questions here. It is clear we have jurisdiction over the qualified immunity question regarding Montoya's malicious prosecution claim. The district court explicitly decided that issue, holding Montoya had pleaded facts 'show[ing] malicious prosecution' under 'clearly established law.'. . We may review that holding in this interlocutory appeal. As explained earlier, Montoya may argue the Detectives forfeited their immunity defense at this stage in the litigation, but this would be a reason to affirm the district court on other grounds, not to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. It is equally clear, however, that we lack jurisdiction to review the qualified immunity question with respect to the false arrest claim. The district court never mentioned that question. And we cannot conclude this omission was an implicit denial because the Detectives did not expressly raise the defense below. Having reviewed the briefing below, we cannot find a single instance in which the Detectives raised qualified immunity against Montoya's false arrest claim. . . Instead, they only argued Montoya failed to state a claim for false arrest. The Detectives resist this result by offering a different reading of the record—indeed, a different reading of what it means to assert qualified immunity. As they see it, arguing Montoya failed to state a claim for false arrest under Rule 12(b)(6) is the same as invoking qualified immunity. Since a government official is entitled to qualified immunity when 'the facts that a plaintiff has alleged' fail to 'make out a violation of a constitutional right,'. . . the Detectives contend that a failure-to-state-a-claim argument is really a qualified immunity argument by another name. That is not correct. It is true that if the plaintiff failed to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6), the government would also be entitled to qualified immunity. But we have already held that '[a]lthough to a certain extent a qualified immunity analysis overlaps with a 12(b)(6) analysis, we do not have jurisdiction to review the merits' of a Rule 12(b)(6) failure-to-state-a-claim argument when the defendant appeals the district court's denial of qualified immunity. Tonkovich v. Kansas Bd. of Regents, 159 F.3d 504, 515–16 (10th Cir. 1998). As the Supreme Court has explained, 'a claim of immunity is conceptually distinct from the merits of the plaintiff's claim,' and an 'appellate court reviewing the denial of the defendant's claim of immunity need not ... even determine whether the plaintiff's allegations actually state a claim.'. . .Therefore, although the Rule 12(b)(6) and qualified immunity arguments can be similar—sometimes exceedingly so—they are not the same. And since it is defendants' burden to raise a qualified immunity defense, Crawford-El, 523 U.S. at 586–87, 118 S.Ct. 1584, a Rule 12(b)(6) failure-to-state-a-claim argument, without more, is insufficient to raise qualified immunity. Standing alone, a defendant's Rule 12(b)(6) argument fails to notify either the district court or the plaintiff that the defendant is invoking qualified immunity—with all its attendant complexity and possibility for interlocutory appeal. In short, the Detectives' Rule 12(b)(6) argument did not adequately raise a qualified immunity defense against the false arrest claim, and therefore the district court's silence cannot be construed as an implicit denial of immunity. We consequently have no jurisdiction to hear the Detectives' qualified immunity arguments against Montoya's false arrest claim.")

Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d 1116, 1119-20 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he district court relied on four factual findings in determining that Durborow wasn't entitled to qualified immunity. And Durborow's opening brief repeatedly takes issue with one of these four findings. So does his reply brief. Specifically, Durborow doggedly insists that to the extent the Jail's male detention officers were freely entering the female pod in violation of the Jail's emergencies-only policy, he remained unaware of that fact. For instance, both Durborow's opening brief and his reply brief state that to the extent the 'male officers allegedly enter[ed] the female pod against policy and training,' they did so 'without Durborow's knowledge.'. .Durborow's repeated challenges to this key factual finding would normally deprive us of jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal. . . But Durborow unequivocally—if belatedly—clarified at oral argument that he accepts all of the district court's factual findings as true for purposes of this interlocutory appeal. And that concession necessarily includes the district court's finding that Durborow was aware the male detention officers were entering the female pod on a regular basis and in violation of the Jail's emergencies-only policy. Thus, we reject Perry's argument that we lack jurisdiction to resolve the purely legal question before us. . . Instead, we will proceed to address whether, based on '[t]he district court's factual findings and reasonable assumptions,' Durborow is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .But before we address the legal issue before us, we hasten to add this caveat: A defendant who brings an interlocutory appeal like this one and then 'challenge[s] ... the district court's determinations of evidentiary sufficiency' (as Durborow initially and repeatedly did here) does so at his or her own peril. . . .As we pointed out in Ralston, the 'jurisdictional limitation' at issue here 'has been in place' for more than two decades. . . Thus, we 'expect[ ] practitioners [to] be cognizant of, and faithful to' this limitation throughout the entire course of interlocutory appeals like this one, . . .— not just when they are pressed, at oral argument, to abandon the factual challenges they repeatedly advance in their briefs.")

Ralston v. Cannon, 884 F.3d 1060, 1067-68 (10th Cir. 2018) ("It is certainly true that a mere determination on the part of a district court that genuine issues of material fact preclude summary judgment does not necessarily bar this court's exercise of appellate jurisdiction in a particular case. . . We have jurisdiction to review such denials of qualified immunity 'if our review would [not] require second-guessing the district court's determinations of evidence sufficiency.'. . This court, then, has jurisdiction over appeals challenging the denial of a qualified-immunity-based motion for summary judgment only if a defendant-appellant does not dispute the facts a district court determines a reasonable juror could find but, instead, 'raises only legal challenges to the denial of qualified immunity based on those facts.'. . As should be clear from the background set out above, Cannon does not assert on appeal that a conscious or intentional interference with Ralston's right to free exercise, whether relatively brief or not, is consistent with the First Amendment. . . Nor does he assert that it was not clear during the time period in question that an intentional or conscious placement of a substantial burden on Ralston's right to free exercise would violate the First Amendment. Instead, he simply asserts the district court erred in determining a reasonable juror could conclude he acted intentionally or consciously. This court lacks jurisdiction to take up such an issue in an interlocutory appeal from the denial of summary judgment. In closing, this court notes that the jurisdictional limitation at issue in this appeal has been in place since the Supreme Court's decision in Johnson, . . . more than twenty years ago. Johnson made clear that allowing appeals from district court determinations of evidentiary sufficiency simply does not advance the goals of the qualified-immunity doctrine in a sufficiently weighty way to overcome the delay and expenditure of judicial resources that would accompany such appeals. . . It certainly follows, then, that appeals like the instant one that flaunt the jurisdictional limitations set out in Johnson serve only to delay the administration of justice. . . That being the case, this court expects practitioners will be cognizant of, and faithful to, the jurisdictional limitation set out in Johnson.")

Brown v. City of Colorado Springs, 709 F. App'x 906, 916-17 (10th Cir. 2017) ("Whether a claim is inextricably intertwined often depends on whether we address the constitutional-violation prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. In cases where we do not do so—instead electing to resolve a claim under the clearly-established-law prong—we have repeatedly declined to exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over municipal-liability and official-capacity claims. . . In contrast, when we have resolved the constitutional-violation prong of the qualified-immunity analysis, we have found interrelated claims. . . .Even when we have jurisdiction to consider pendent appellate claims, doing so is generally disfavored. . . And 'when we resolve an individual-capacity § 1983 claim on the clearly-established-law prong of qualified immunity, our analysis often ... does not turn on issues inextricably intertwined with those implicated by an official-capacity claim arising out of the same facts.'. . Because we decided this case based solely on clearly established law, the claims here are not inextricably intertwined and we lack pendent appellate jurisdiction to consider the municipal-liability claims against Colorado Springs or the official-capacity claims against the named defendants.")

Clark v. Bowcutt, 675 F. App'x 799, 802-03 & n.4 (10th Cir. 2017) ("[E]ven where the district court has purported to rest its denial of summary judgment in the qualified-immunity context on the existence of genuine issues of material fact, we may still exercise jurisdiction over a defendant's interlocutory appeal where the defendant 'is willing to concede the most favorable view of the facts to the plaintiff for purposes of the appeal,'. . . and to respond to the plaintiff's claims 'based on the facts they have alleged[.]'. . . .In light of these principles, we conclude that we can properly exercise jurisdiction over the district court's denial of Deputy Bowcutt's qualified-immunity defense. We readily acknowledge, however, that Deputy Bowcutt does only the bare minimum amount necessary to make this result possible; he does himself no favors. Specifically, on more than one occasion in his opening brief, Deputy Bowcutt attempts to advance his own version of the facts, including references to his subjective state of mind. . . However, in his reply brief, in a section titled 'Clarification of Issues Presented,' Deputy Bowcutt unequivocally acknowledges that the facts must be 'taken in the light most favorable to Clark,' and his 'challenge[ ]' is to 'the legal analysis the district court employed to determine that Deputy Bowcutt is not entitled to qualified immunity.'. . . Though the timing of Deputy Bowcutt's acceptance of Ms. Clark's version of the facts is far from optimal, in our discretion, we take his acceptance into account and deem it sufficient to establish our jurisdiction over his interlocutory appeal. . . . We caution, however, that, in our discretion, we also very likely could have alternatively treated Deputy Bowcutt's late-blooming, jurisdiction-saving acceptance as waived. . . Accordingly, litigants would be well-advised not to follow Deputy Bowcutt's practice.")

Walton v. Powell, 821 F.3d 1204, 1208-10 (10th Cir. 2016) ("In an effort to ensure the 'wise use of appellate resources,' Johnson did tell us to take as given the district court's assessment of what facts a reasonable jury could accept at trial and focus our attention instead on 'abstract' questions of law. . . But what was supposed to be a labor-saving exception has now invited new kinds of labor all its own. Often enough, a party will argue that the district court failed to identify what facts a jury might reasonably find—an assertion that requires us, first, to decide if the district court did or didn't determine the facts a jury could find and, second, to determine the facts for ourselves if the district court didn't. . . Then there are the cases where the district court's assessment of the facts is 'blatantly contradicted' by the record—or someone alleges it is—and we must again sort out the dispute by asking whether there is a 'blatant' contradiction and, if so, what a reasonable jury could find given the record at hand. . . Indeed, without special modifications like these the Johnson exception would leave appellate courts often unable to adjudicate appeals from interlocutory rulings denying qualified immunity (rendering Mitchell's promise a dead letter) or bound to accept a clearly mistaken factual account and so left to decide less a case or controversy than a hypothetical question. . . Neither, we must always remember, is the Johnson exception applicable outside the summary judgment context. When we review denials of qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage or after trial the Supreme Court has told us not to apply Johnson and instead determine for ourselves de novo which facts are and are not sufficiently well-pleaded or proven that a reasonable jury could adopt them before proceeding to determine whether those facts suffice to state a claim or support the verdict. . . Much as we do when reviewing decisions granting summary judgment outside the qualified immunity context. . . Indeed, in most every situation but those Johnson carves out appellate courts traditionally and routinely do assess de novo what facts a jury might accept and that task is not considered incompatible with normal principles of appellate review or unduly inefficient. But however far Johnson's exception extends and whatever its consistency with general practice or capacity to fulfill its promised efficiencies, it doesn't extend so far as to bar consideration of Mr. Powell's appeal or any part of it. To be sure, Johnson requires us to accept as true the facts the district court expressly held a reasonable jury could accept. And in our recitation above and analysis below we do just that, treating as true all the facts the district court held a reasonable jury could find even as we are quite confident Mr. Powell would dispute nearly all of them. But Johnson does not also require this court to accept the district court's assessment that those facts suffice to create a triable question on any legal element essential to liability. That latter sort of question is precisely the sort of question Johnson preserves for our review. To be fair, we can understand why Ms. Walton might think otherwise. Indeed, we have struggled ourselves to fix the exact parameters of the Johnson innovation. But the Supreme Court has recently provided some helpful and clarifying guidance in Plumhoff v. Rickard, —— U.S. —— –, 134 S.Ct. 2012, 188 L.Ed.2d 1056 (2014). There the Court explained that Johnson only forecloses courts of appeals from reconsidering a district court's assessment of 'evidence sufficiency, i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. . By way of illustration, the Court pointed to Johnson itself, where the parties disputed whether certain officers were or 'were not present at the time of [an] alleged beating' and the district court held a reasonable jury could find the officers were indeed present. . . It is that sort of 'evidence sufficiency' question Johnson (usually) precludes us from reconsidering. Meanwhile, Johnson does not forbid a court of appeals from deciding whether the facts as determined by the district court are sufficient as a matter of law to state a triable question under each legal element essential to liability. Deciding 'evidence sufficiency' questions of this sort is, instead, 'a core responsibility of appellate courts, and requiring appellate courts to decide such issues is not an undue burden.'. . Since Plumhoff, our own decisions have made this distinction clear and abided it emphatically. . . Indeed, if the rule were otherwise and we could not consider the sufficiency of the (given) facts to sustain a lawful verdict, a great many (most?) qualified immunity summary judgment appeals would be foreclosed and Mitchell's promise of assuring a meaningful interlocutory opportunity to vindicate what is supposed to be an immunity from trial would be 'irretrievably lost.'. . Neither can we discern a reason why questions of causation would be immune from this arrangement. Ms. Walton suggests that, even if we have authority to hear certain portions of this appeal, we may not hear that portion of it. In her view, the district court's assessment that a reasonable jury could find causation—that her political affiliation was a substantial or motivating factor in her dismissal—is particularly inappropriate for our review. But Mr. Powell asks us to decide whether the facts the district court held a reasonable jury could find suffice as a matter of law to permit a favorable judgment for the plaintiff on the element of causation. And that seems to us precisely the sort of question Plumhoff preserves for appellate review. Courts of appeals regularly decide whether the facts as presented (in a complaint, at summary judgment, or after trial) are enough to permit a reasonable jury to render a favorable judgment on causation (just like any other legal element essential to liability). . . And Plumhoff makes clear we may do the same thing in the qualified immunity context while respecting the district court's special role in ascertaining the relevant facts for our analysis. Under Johnson, it is for the district court to tell us what facts a reasonable jury might accept as true. But under Plumhoff, it is for this court to say whether those facts, together with all reasonable inferences they permit, fall in or out of legal bounds—whether they are or are not enough as a matter of law to permit a reasonable jury to issue a verdict for the plaintiff under the terms of the governing legal test for causation or any other legal element.")

Henderson v. Glanz, 813 F.3d 938, 948-51 (10th Cir. 2015) ("[I]f on interlocutory appeal from a denial of qualified immunity a defendant-appellant's 'argument is limited to a discussion of [his or her] version of the facts and the inferences that can be drawn therefrom' and presents only 'a challenge to the district court's conclusion [p]laintiffs presented sufficient evidence to survive summary judgment,' we lack jurisdiction to consider that argument. . . Conversely, our jurisdiction 'is clear when the defendant does not dispute the facts alleged by the plaintiff' and raises only legal challenges to the denial of qualified immunity based on those facts. . . . Even when an appellant challenges the district court's findings of genuine issues of material fact, the Supreme Court has recognized two circumstances in which we may nonetheless exercise interlocutory review. First, 'if a district court fails to specify which factual disputes precluded a grant of summary judgment for qualified immunity, ... we "may have to undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed."'. . 'Second, when the "version of events" the district court holds a reasonable jury could credit "is blatantly contradicted by the record," we may assess the case based on our own de novo view of which facts a reasonable jury could accept as true.'. . . Ms. Henderson asserted in her summary judgment briefing and asserts on appeal that DO Johnson knew the door to the tub room was unlocked when she left the medical unit hallway. DO Johnson's argument. . . does not accept as true Ms. Henderson's version of this fact. The district court did not make any factual determination about DO Johnson's knowledge of the door being unlocked, but it did determine that DO Johnson was aware of a substantial risk of harm to Ms. Henderson. DO Johnson's argument is therefore not based on the facts viewed in the light most favorable to Ms. Henderson.

. . .The district court's factual determination of DO Johnson's awareness of the risk of assault is not clearly contradicted by the record. . . . Further, although the district court did not say whether a reasonable jury could find that DO Johnson knew the door was unlocked when she left the hallway of the medical unit, the court determined there was a genuine issue of material fact about whether DO Johnson was aware of a risk of assault to Ms. Henderson based on (1) DO Johnson's failure to secure Inmates Johnson and Williams before leaving the hallway of the medical unit, (2) her failure to check on Ms. Henderson before leaving, and (3) her inability to express why there was no risk of assault to Ms. Henderson. DO Johnson's argument challenges the district court's finding of a disputed issue regarding risk awareness. Under this circumstance, where the district court specified the facts on which it based the denial of summary judgment, . . . we lack jurisdiction over DO Johnson's interlocutory appeal because it 'would require second-guessing the district court's determinations of evidence sufficiency[.]' . . . Instead of accepting these facts as true or viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Ms. Henderson, Defendants argue Sheriff Glanz had no notice of a risk of assault because there had been no documented instances of inmate-on-inmate assault in the Jail. This argument ignores the district court's factual determination that staff-on-inmate assaults gave Sheriff Glanz notice about the risk of other kinds of assault—including the risk of sexual assault to female inmates by male inmates in the medical unit—caused by lack of surveillance and adequate staffing. Sheriff Glanz's argument poses 'a challenge to the district court's conclusion [that Ms. Henderson] presented sufficient evidence to survive summary judgment .'. . We may not consider this challenge on appeal unless the record clearly contradicts the district court's factual determinations or the district court failed to identify the factual disputes on which it rested its decision to deny qualified immunity. Defendants do not argue that either circumstance arises here. The district court clearly stated, and the record does not contradict, the facts it relied on in denying qualified immunity to Sheriff Glanz. We lack jurisdiction over Sheriff Glanz's interlocutory appeal because it 'would require second-guessing the district court's determinations of evidence sufficiency.' . . . The district court determined that a reasonable jury could find that DO Thomas was aware of the risk of assault to Ms. Henderson. But this determination is 'blatantly contradicted by the record.' See Lewis, 604 F.3d at 26 (quoting Scott, 550 U.S. at 380). The record indicates that, when DO Thomas left to deliver the gurney for the medical emergency, he knew only that Ms. Henderson was in the tub room and that DO Johnson was in the medical unit outside the tub room. DO Thomas testified that he believed the door to the tub room was locked when he left. Ms. Henderson presented no evidence to the contrary. These undisputed record facts blatantly contradict the district court's factual determination that DO Thomas could have been subjectively aware of a substantial risk of bodily harm to Ms. Henderson. We therefore have jurisdiction to determine whether, as a matter of law, DO Thomas violated Ms. Henderson's clearly established constitutional right.") Callahan v. Unified Gov't of Wyandotte Cty., 806 F.3d 1022, 1026-27, 1030 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Plaintiffs argue that we lack jurisdiction to hear this appeal because the district court's order relied on disputes of material facts and not questions of law. But if the district court inadequately explains the factual basis for its decision, we have the authority to 'review the entire record de novo to determine for ourselves as a matter of law which factual inferences a reasonable jury could and could not make.'. . Invoking this, Defendants argue that the district court did not sufficiently identify the facts supporting its conclusion. Therefore, they argue, we should perform an independent review of the record. We find that unnecessary. The district court made clear that it based its decision on disputed facts and, despite its brief explanation, . . . sufficiently established for us what the operative facts were. Regardless, we have jurisdiction to hear the individual Defendants' appeals. In reaching our decision, we are not 'second-guessing the district court's determinations of evidence sufficiency.'. . Rather, 'under any view of the facts,' we cannot say that Defendants violated Plaintiffs' clearly established rights. . . .Of course, an entity defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity and the denial of summary judgment is not immediately appealable. Moore v. City of Wynnewood, 57 F.3d 924, 928–29 (10th Cir.1995). We refuse to exercise pendent jurisdiction to avoid that result.")

Cox v. Glanz, 800 F.3d 1231, 1243-44 (10th Cir. 2015) ("At the outset, we acknowledge that Ms. Cox's concerns regarding the district court's methodology have some merit. The court's analysis was not consonant with our settled mode of qualified-immunity decisionmaking. Specifically, the court's central focus was on the existence vel non of genuinely disputed issues of material fact, and that focus is counter to our established qualified-immunity approach. . . At the summary-judgment phase, a federal court's factual analysis relative to the qualified-immunity question is distinct . . . .Although its mode of analysis focusing on the existence vel non of factual disputes was wanting, the district court clearly adjudicated Sheriff Glanz's defense of qualified immunity and ruled against him, albeit tacitly so. Perhaps because it was set adrift by the deficiencies of the parties' briefing, which are explicated infra, the district court did not mention qualified immunity in its summary-judgment order. However—critically, for purposes of our interlocutory review—the court did explicitly deny Sheriff Glanz all relief in its order, and part of the relief that Sheriff Glanz unquestionably sought in his summary-judgment briefing was qualified immunity. Consequently, the court effectively denied Sheriff Glanz the defense of qualified immunity when it denied his summary-judgment motion. . . Ms. Cox nevertheless suggests that the court's fact-based manner of disposing of the defense divests us of jurisdiction to reach the qualified-immunity issue on appeal. We disagree. Notably, Sheriff Glanz has accepted the truth of Ms. Cox's version of the facts for purposes of this appeal. Under our controlling caselaw . . . , that ordinarily will permit us to address the legal issues presented by the agreed-upon set of facts, and there is nothing about this case that would counsel against following that path.")

Cox v. Glanz, 800 F.3d 1231, 1256-57 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Sheriff Glanz has not asked us to exercise our discretion to assume pendent jurisdiction over the official-capacity claim in this interlocutory appeal, and we 'will not make arguments for [him] that [he] did not make in [his appellate] briefs.'. . But quite apart from that failing, we harbor grave doubt as to the propriety of exercising pendent jurisdiction over this claim. In other words, we question whether either of the two accepted rationales for exercising pendent appellate jurisdiction could be established here—i.e., interrelatedness of claims or the need to ensure meaningful review of a properly appealable claim. First, we strongly doubt that Ms. Cox's pendent (i.e., official-capacity) and non-pendent (i.e., individual-capacity) claims are interrelated. We generally will allow 'a suit [against the county] to proceed when immunity [based on a lack of clearly established law] shields the individual defendants.'. . This is because, as we suggested in Moore, when we resolve an individual-capacity § 1983 claim on the clearly-established-law prong of qualified immunity, our analysis often, as a matter of law, does not turn on issues inextricably intertwined with those implicated by an official-capacity claim arising out of the same facts. . . Stated otherwise, even if the Sheriff had sought pendent appellate jurisdiction, we would be inclined to reject his request on the ground that determining his entitlement vel non to qualified immunity here implicates an issue distinguishable from the official-capacity inquiry. And that specific qualified-immunity issue, as discussed supra, is whether the challenged conduct constituted an Eighth Amendment violation under clearly established law existing in July 2009. Additionally, we can undertake—indeed we have undertaken in Part III.A, supra—a meaningful analysis of Sheriff Glanz's appeal from the denial of qualified immunity (i.e., the non-pendent claim) without exercising pendent jurisdiction over the official-capacity claim. Our determination that Sheriff Glanz is entitled to qualified immunity on the individual-capacity § 1983 claim, as we have discussed at length, turns on whether Sheriff Glanz's conduct and that of his identified subordinates with respect to Mr. Jernegan constituted an Eighth Amendment deliberate-indifference violation under then-extant clearly established law. We were not required to decide the core issues implicated in the official-capacity § 1983 claim, which include whether, under our current law, that challenged conduct as regards Mr. Jernegan gave rise to an Eighth Amendment violation. Therefore, as shown from our analysis supra, we have grave doubt that there would be any appropriate basis for our exercise of pendent jurisdiction over the official-capacity claim. Ultimately, under our controlling circuit precedent, '[t]here is nothing anomalous about allowing ... a suit [against an official defendant] to proceed when immunity [based on a lack of clearly established law] shields the individual defendants.'. . The foregoing applies with equal force to this appeal: Sheriff Glanz does not ask us to exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over the official-capacity claim, and we perceive no reasoned basis to do so sua sponte. As a result, '[n]othing at this point prevents [Ms. Cox's] claim against [the Sheriff in his official capacity] from proceeding.'. . We thus decline to exercise pendent jurisdiction over Ms. Cox's official-capacity claim. And, because the pendent-jurisdiction doctrine is the only legally cognizable jurisdictional foothold for this claim, we are constrained to dismiss this aspect of the Sheriff's appeal for lack of appellate jurisdiction.")

Attocknie v. Smith, 798 F.3d 1252, 1256 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Plaintiff contends that we lack jurisdiction because the district court based its denial of the summary-judgment motions on the existence of fact questions that must be resolved by a jury before the legal issues may be addressed. We have jurisdiction, however, because we may determine whether Cherry and Smith are entitled to qualified immunity by applying clearly established law to the facts for which the district court said there was sufficient supporting evidence.")

Castillo v. Day, 790 F.3d 1013, 1018 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Although Day attempts to characterize the issue on appeal as Plaintiffs' failure to assert a violation of a constitutional right under clearly established law, her argument is limited to a discussion of her version of the facts and the inferences that can be drawn therefrom. Thus, Day's argument is actually a challenge to the district court's conclusion Plaintiffs presented sufficient evidence to survive summary judgment. . . As such, this court lacks jurisdiction to review her appeal at the interlocutory stage.")

Martinez v. Mares, 613 F. App'x 731, 736-37 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Mr. and Ms. Martinez are correct that Defendants' briefing to this court improperly challenges the district court's resolution of disputed facts and impermissibly states those facts in the light most favorable to Defendants. But Defendants also argue that they enjoy qualified immunity even under the facts alleged by Mr. and Ms. Martinez. Admittedly, this argument has evolved over the course of this appeal. But by the time of oral argument, Defendants had wisely abandoned any attempt to challenge the district court's factual findings and instead focused their challenge on the question of whether, even accepting the facts as alleged by Mr. and Ms. Martinez, the Officers had violated Mr. Martinez's clearly established constitutional rights. Resolution of this purely legal question falls squarely within our jurisdiction.")

Leatherwood v. Welker, 757 F.3d 1115, 1118, 1119 (10th Cir. 2014) ("The issue in this case is whether the Defendants' conduct violated the Fourth Amendment with an unreasonable search and the method of analysis should be the same as in Plumhoff and Scott . Fourth Amendment reasonableness is a legal question, and on this record it is plainly quite different than any factual issues which might be resolved at a trial. . . In other words, we need not engage in second-guessing whether the evidence supports an inference 'that particular conduct occurred.' Behrens, 516 U.S. at 313. Defendants ask us to review primarily legal issues, and we have jurisdiction to do so.")

Felders ex rel. Smedley v. Malcom, 755 F.3d 870, 878, 879 (10th Cir. 2014) ("[I]f the district court holds that a reasonable jury could find certain facts in favor of the plaintiff, we generally take these facts as true, even if the record would suggest otherwise upon our de novo review. . . Our jurisdiction is therefore limited to a review of the district court's abstract legal conclusions, in particular, 'whether the district court's factual determinations, taken as true, "suffice to show a violation of law," and, further, "whether that law was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation."'. . Finally, it should be remembered, '[d]etermining whether there is a genuine issue of material fact at summary judgment is itself a question of law.'. . Here, the district court found that it was clearly established law that an improper search occurs if an officer facilitates a drug dog's entry into a vehicle before probable cause has been established. The court also found as a matter of law that Malcom did not have probable cause prior to conducting the sniff. But the district court ultimately denied summary judgment because issues of fact remained as to whether Malcom conducted an unconstitutional search, based on the timing of Duke's alert and Malcom's possible facilitation of Duke's entry into the car. We have jurisdiction to consider Malcom's legal challenges to the district court's determination that (1) he lacked probable cause prior to conducting the dog sniff; (2) facilitating the entry of a drug sniffing dog into a vehicle without probable cause violates clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity; and (3) viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Felders, issues of material fact existed as to whether Malcom facilitated Duke's entry and whether Duke alerted prior to entering the car. Taking all facts in the light most favorable to Felders, we agree that Malcom did not have probable cause prior to conducting the dog sniff, the law was clearly established that facilitating a dog's entry into a car prior to establishing probable cause violates the Fourth Amendment, and that issues of fact remain regarding the timing of Duke's alert and Malcom's possible facilitation.")

Estate of Booker v. Gomez, 745 F.3d 405, 409-10 (10th Cir. 2014) ("Under this limited jurisdiction, we may review: ' "(1) whether the facts that the district court ruled a reasonable jury could find would suffice to show a legal violation, or (2) whether that law was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation."'. . Under the Supreme Court's direction in Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304 (1995), however, this court has no interlocutory jurisdiction to review 'whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a "genuine" issue of fact for trial.'. . Thus, 'if a district court concludes that a reasonable jury could find certain specified facts in favor of the plaintiff, the Supreme Court has indicated we usually must take them as true—and do so even if our own de novo review of the record might suggest otherwise as a matter of law.'. .A key exception to Johnson's jurisdictional rule arises if a district court fails to specify which factual disputes precluded a grant of summary judgment for qualified immunity. When faced with this circumstance, we are unable 'to separate an appealed order's reviewable determination (that a given set of facts violates clearly established law) from its unreviewable determination (that an issue of fact is "genuine").'. . Accordingly, before we can review abstract legal questions, we 'may have to undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.'. .This is one such 'cumbersome review' case.")

Plascencia v. Taylor, 514 F. App'x 711, 719 (10th Cir. 2013) ("Generally, a party may not 'appeal an order denying summary judgment [on qualified immunity] after a full trial on the merits.' Ortiz v. Jordan, 131 S.Ct. 884, 889 (2011). Rather, a party ordinarily must renew a qualified immunity argument under Rule 50. . . However, the Ortiz Court left open the possibility that a 'qualified immunity plea raising an issue of a purely legal nature' may be 'preserved for appeal by an unsuccessful motion for summary judgment, and need not be brought up again under Rule 50(b).'. . Our circuit recognized this exception prior to Ortiz. See Haberman v. Hartford Ins. Grp., 443 F.3d 1257, 1264 (10th Cir.2006). And we have stated that the exception remains valid following the Ortiz decision. See Stewart v. Beach, 701 F.3d 1322, 1329 n. 7 (10th Cir.2012); see also Feld v. Feld, 688 F.3d 779, 782 (D.C.Cir.2012) (noting that a majority of circuits recognize this exception for purely legal issues).")

Roosevelt-Hennix v. Prickett, 717 F.3d 751, 754, 757-60 (10th Cir. 2013) ("In denying Prickett qualified immunity, the district court simply stated as follows: 'I am denying the motion for summary judgment as to Prickett ... because it is ... disputed factually as to the need for the use of a taser device under all these circumstances. And ... this is quintessentially a jury matter.'. . In light of the district court's failure to set out which set of facts it assumed when it denied summary judgment, . . .Prickett's brief on appeal sets out a version of the encounter and asserts he is entitled to qualified immunity given that factual background. . . For her part, Roosevelt–Hennix sets out a materially different version of the facts and argues, given that set of facts, the district court correctly denied Prickett's assertion of qualified immunity. Given this unfortunate state of affairs, this court has no alternative other than 'to undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to [Roosevelt–Hennix], likely assumed.'. . That cumbersome review demonstrates a factual milieu at odds with Prickett's version. . . . As should be apparent from the discussion set out above, the resolution of this appeal turns entirely on questions of evidentiary sufficiency. Put simply, Prickett's arguments as to both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis—the existence of a constitutional violation that is clearly established—depend entirely on the assertion Roosevelt–Hennix actively resisted the officers' proper attempts to place her in leg restraints. Accordingly, as required by Lewis, this court turns to the record to determine whether it contains sufficient evidence from which a reasonable juror could find: (1) Roosevelt–Hennix informed the officers she was physically incapable of complying with the request to place her feet outside the patrol vehicle for hobbling; and (2) the officers did not attempt to aid her in moving her feet outside the patrol vehicle before applying the taser. . . .Having rejected, as at odds with the record, the factual underpinnings of Prickett's appeal, we take this opportunity to urge district courts to heed Johnson's admonition to state the facts the court is assuming for purposes of resolving a summary-judgment based request for qualified immunity. . . Such a consistent course of action preserves the district courts's institutional advantage, at this interlocutory stage, in determining 'the existence, or nonexistence, of a triable issue of fact.'. . It will also help prevent the waste of judicial resources, as the Supreme Court has made clear evidentiary sufficiency appeals simply do not advance the purposes of qualified immunity. . . The caveat here, of course, is that Prickett's appellate brief makes clear he would have brought this appeal under the blatantly-contradicted exception to Johnson even if the district court had set out the facts it assumed for purposes of resolving Prickett's summary judgment motion. For that reason, we emphasize that the exception means what it says. Litigants should be cognizant of the limited nature of the exception, and of their duty of candor to this court, before bringing such an appeal. . . . This court's de novo review of the record reveals sufficient evidence for a jury to conclude Roosevelt–Hennix informed the officers she was physically unable to comply with their request to move her feet outside the patrol vehicle. It likewise contains sufficient evidence for a jury to conclude the officers never attempted to aid Roosevelt–Hennix in moving her feet before applying the taser. Unsurprisingly, Prickett does not assert an entitlement to qualified immunity under that version of the facts. Accordingly, the order of the district court denying Prickett's motion for summary judgment is hereby affirmed.")

Lynch v. Barrett, 703 F.3d 1153, 1163, 1164 (10th Cir. 2013) ("Moore tells us that if we had held in this case that Defendant Officers' conduct did not violate Plaintiff's constitutional right to court access, that holding would have resolved any issue presented by Defendant City's appeal. This is because Plaintiff's claim against the City is premised on his claim Defendant Officers violated his right to court access. . . In that case, nothing would be gained by declining to dispose of the City's appeal on the merits because 'appellate resolution of the collateral appeal necessarily [would] resolve[ ] the pendent claim as well.'. . But because we assumed Defendant Officers violated Plaintiff's right to court access and held they were entitled to qualified immunity based on the lack of clearly established law, Defendant City's appeal in not 'inextricably intertwined' with Defendant Officer's appeal. Nor need we resolve the City's appeal to ensure meaningful review of the Officers' appeal. . . . Nothing at this point prevents Plaintiff's claim against Defendant City from proceeding. Accordingly, we dismiss Defendant City's appeal for want of subject matter jurisdiction.")

Stewart v. Beach, 701 F.3d 1322, 1329 (10th Cir. 2012) ("[T]o the extent Judge Belot's order denying Beach qualified immunity turned on the purely legal issue of whether the constitutional right he considered to be at issue was clearly established at the time of Beach's conduct, it remained appealable even after final judgment. And to the extent that order turned on a disputed question of fact, the issue of qualified immunity would be appealable only after a trial on the merits, 'but at that stage, the defense must be evaluated in light of the character and quality of the evidence received in court.' Ortiz, 131 S.Ct. at 889. Accordingly, there is no force to Stewart's argument that Judge Belot's denial of qualified immunity was binding on Judge Robinson as the law of the case because it was a final appealable order from which Beach did not immediately appeal.")

Morris v. Noe, 672 F.3d 1185, 1189 (10th Cir. 2012) ("Here, the district court denied summary judgment for two reasons, one appealable, and one not. First, the district court determined that fact issues remained on Plaintiff's constitutional claims. . . Second, the court held that Defendant was not entitled to qualified immunity based on the facts viewed most favorably to Plaintiff. . . We have jurisdiction over only the latter determination.")

Copar Pumice Company, Inc. v. Morris, 639 F.3d 1025, 1030-32(10th Cir. 2011) ("In response to Copar's waiver argument, appellants contend that they preserved review of their qualified immunity claim by filing motions for summary judgment. They rely on our precedent distinguishing between summary judgment denials based on abstract legal issues and those based on factual disputes. . . The Supreme Court recently considered this precise issue. . . . Some language in Ortiz appears to undermine Haberman. As to direct review of the denial of summary judgment, the Court noted that 'the time to seek that review expired well in advance of trial.' Ortiz, 131 S.Ct. at 891. The Court further cited its repeated holdings that 'an appellate court is powerless to review the sufficiency of the evidence after trial' absent a Rule 50(b) motion. . . But the Court stopped short of announcing a categorical rule. Acknowledging defendants' contention that a motion for summary judgment preserves a legal issue even without a Rule 50(b) motion, the Court stated: 'We need not address this argument, for the officials' claims of qualified immunity hardly present purely legal issues.'. .The same is true here. . . . The district court was abundantly clear that it was denying appellants' qualified immunity motion for summary judgment because 'there are genuine issues of material fact regarding whether the Defendants complied with the relevant statutes and permit.' The district court similarly denied appellants' other motion for summary judgment because 'there is a genuine issue of material fact whether the NMED inspectors' search went beyond the consent that the permit provided, and because there is a genuine dispute of material fact whether Ismael Gomez consented.' The issue decided by the jury was not whether AQCA or Copar's permit conditions allowed a warrantless search. Copar conceded during summary judgment briefing that ACQA was a constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant as long as Morris and Yantos complied with the statute. And the jury was instructed, without objection by appellants, that 'excessive investigation' beyond the scope of the statutory authorization would render Morris and Yantos liable absent consent. By returning a verdict in favor of Copar, the jury necessarily found that Morris and Yantos did not comply with ACQA and did not otherwise obtain consent. These are 'factual disputes,' not 'purely legal question[s].' Haberman, 443 F.3d at 1264. Because Morris and Yantos were denied qualified immunity based on factual rather than legal issues, we may not review that denial absent a Rule 50(b) motion. 'Failure to renew a summary judgment argument–when denial was based on factual disputes–in a motion for judgment as a matter of law ... at the close of all the evidence is considered a waiver of the issue on appeal.' Wolfgang, 111 F.3d at 1521 (citation omitted). And because appellants withdrew their Rule 50(b) motion, we have no occasion to consider the propriety of the district court's decision.")

Lewis v. Tripp, 604 F.3d 1221, 1225-30 (10th Cir. 2010) ("[I]n Johnson v. Jones the Supreme Court indicated that, at the summary judgment stage at least, it is generally the district court's exclusive job to determine which facts a jury could reasonably find from the evidence presented to it by the litigants. 515 U.S. 304, 313 (1995). After doing so, the district court and we may then consider the 'abstract' legal questions whether those facts suffice to show a violation of law and whether that law was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . Ordinarily speaking, it is only these latter two questions–and not questions about what facts a jury might reasonably find–that we may consider in appeals from the denial of qualified immunity at summary judgment. Of course, 'determining whether there is a genuine issue of material fact at summary judgment is [itself] a question of law,' Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1947 (2009), one we routinely review de novo in appeals from the grant of summary judgment. Still, Johnson held that this practice doesn't normally pertain to appeals from the denial of qualified immunity. . . So, for example, if a district court concludes that a reasonable jury could find certain specified facts in favor of the plaintiff, the Supreme Court has indicated we usually must take them as true–and do so even if our own de novo review of the record might suggest otherwise as a matter of law. Johnson's rule might appear, at first glance, to foreclose at least a good portion of Dr. Tripp's appeal. After all, his primary complaint seems to be that the district court erred when it found sufficient facts in the record from which a jury could infer his involvement in the allegedly illegal search. But that isn't the end of the matter, because Johnson's rule has attracted exceptions that we must also consider. Without attempting an exhaustive list of those exceptions, the Supreme Court has drawn our attention to at least three. First, the Court has indicated that, when the district court at summary judgment fails to identify the particular charged conduct that it deemed adequately supported by the record, we may look behind the order denying summary judgment and review the entire record de novo to determine for ourselves as a matter of law which factual inferences a reasonable jury could and could not make. [citing Behrens]. . . Second, when the 'version of events' the district court holds a reasonable jury could credit 'is blatantly contradicted by the record,' we may assess the case based on our own de novo view of which facts a reasonable jury could accept as true. [citing Scott v. Harris] Third, we need not defer to the district court's assessment of the reasonable factual inferences that arise from a complaint at the motion to dismiss stage, but may instead assess for ourselves the sufficiency of the complaint as a matter of law de novo. [citing Iqbal] . . . .This case falls within the first of these exceptions. The initial obligation of the district court in assessing a qualified immunity defense at summary judgment is to set forth with specificity the facts–the who, what, when, where, and why–that a reasonable jury could infer from the evidence presented by the parties. . . Only then can the district court (and we, on appeal) undertake the job of answering the question whether the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity on those facts as a matter of law. Put differently, unless the district court undertakes the essential task of specifying what a reasonable jury could find the facts to be, there is no way it (or, later, we) can rationally determine whether those facts constitute a violation of clearly established law. . . . Given that we lack from the district court a set of facts about Dr. Tripp's conduct to guide our qualified immunity analysis, it falls on us to review the entire record, construing the evidence in the light most favorable to Dr. Lewis as the plaintiff, and to ask de novo whether sufficient evidence exists for a reasonable jury to conclude that Dr. Tripp trenched upon Dr. Lewis's clearly established rights. . . .In short, while the record before us permits the inference that Dr. Tripp was doing his lawful–and statutorily-charged–duty of alerting the authorities to a possible case of the unauthorized practice of medicine, the record lacks any facts suggesting Dr. Tripp 'knew or reasonably should have known' that doing so would lead to an unlawful search or seizure, let alone one in violation of clearly established law.")

Cassady v. Goering, 567 F.3d 628, 634(10th Cir. 2009) ("At issue in this case is Sheriff Goering's entitlement to qualified immunity prior to a retrial. Mr. Cassady asserts that Mr. Goering lost or waived his right to an interlocutory appeal of the denial of qualified immunity. He does not provide us with authority for this proposition, however. . . . We have never held that a qualified immunity ruling is unreviewable following a trial, and we have allowed defendants to reassert qualified immunity claims post-trial where there were factual disputes requiring a jury determination. . . Here, Mr. Goering is facing a retrial and we see no reason why he should be prohibited from appealing the post-trial order rejecting his qualified immunity claim.")

Weigel v. Broad, 544 F.3d 1143, 1151 n.3 (10th Cir. 2008) ("In defendants' cross-appeal, they assert the district court erred in holding that the troopers 'unreasonably applied excessive force, in violation of the Fourth Amendment.'. . Plaintiffs contend we have no jurisdiction over the cross-appeal, arguing the district court only certified for appeal the issue of whether a lack of clearly established law shielded defendants from suit. We disagree. Although Rule 54(b) permits only those claims which the district court has declared final to be appealed separately, the rule provides for appeal of an entire claim, not certain issues within a claim. . . In granting plaintiffs permission to appeal interlocutorily, the district court necessarily certified for appeal plaintiffs' entire § 1983 claim, the validity of which is part of the qualified immunity analysis. Defendants' cross-appeal is thus better characterized as simply an argument urging us to affirm the district court's decision; in effect, defendants contend the district court reached the right decision for the wrong reason.").

Price-Cornelison v. Brooks, 524 F.3d 1103, 1119 n.1 (10th Cir. 2008) (O'Brien, J., dissenting in part, concurring in part, concurring with the result in part) ("The majority cites Cortez, 478 F.3d at 1120 n. 16, for the proposition that we lack jurisdiction to review a sufficiency of the evidence determination in the context of a defendant's appeal from the denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity. This proposition, which stems from Johnson v. Jones, 515 U.S. 304, 319-20 (1995), may be a dead letter in light of Scott v. Harris , 127 S.Ct. 1769 (2007). In Scott, an appeal from the denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the Court held the court of appeals erred in crediting respondent's version of the events (which was credited by the district court) because it 'is so utterly discredited by the record that no reasonable jury could have believed him.' . . Thus, it appears we would have jurisdiction to review a district court's conclusion that the evidence is sufficient to survive summary judgment in the qualified immunity context. . . if the issue was properly raised.").

Weise v. Casper, 507 F.3d 1260, 1264-66 (10th Cir. 2007), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 7 (2010) ("If a district court cannot rule on the merits of a qualified immunity defense at the dismissal stage because the allegations in the pleadings are insufficient as to some factual matter, the district court's determination is not immediately appealable. . . . Second, Defendants argue that the district court should have first analyzed the purely legal issue of whether a constitutional violation occurred based on the facts contained in the complaint and, if so, whether the constitutional right alleged to have been violated was clearly established. . . While this would be the ordinary course, . . . this analysis can only proceed after the court determines that a defendant is entitled to assert qualified immunity in the first instance. . . . The district court recognized that Defendants are not public officials and decided more inquiry was necessary before engaging in any further aspect of qualified immunity analysis. The district court did not abuse its discretion in ordering limited discovery given its concerns. Third, Defendants rely on Behrens, 516 U.S. at 305-14, in arguing that the district court's discovery order forces them to renew their defense on summary judgment, thus depriving them of their right to dispose of the case at the dismissal stage. . . Behrens does not provide that Defendants are automatically entitled to appeal both the denial of a motion to dismiss and a motion for summary judgment. Rather Behrens rejects the 'one-interlocutory-appeal' approach and clarifies that the denial of qualified immunity at the dismissal stage does not preclude a renewal of that defense at summary judgment after further factual development has occurred. . . Further, it is well established that limited discovery may be necessary to resolve qualified immunity claims on summary judgment. . . Finally, Defendants argue that some of our sister circuits have exercised appellate jurisdiction in analogous cases. . . We disagree as each of the cases relied upon by Defendants are distinguishable from this case. . . . Indeed, we have recognized that a district court cannot avoid ruling on the merits of a qualified immunity defense when it can resolve the purely legal question of whether a defendant's conduct, as alleged by plaintiff, violates clearly established law. . . The decisions relied upon by Defendants, however, are clearly distinguishable from the instant case. Here, the factual issue involves not whether Defendants' conduct violated a constitutional right, the factual issue involves the threshold question of whether Defendants are entitled to assert qualified immunity in the first instance. . . . In this case, the district court made no legal decision whatsoever, explicit or implicit, on the merits of Defendants' motions. The district court only determined that the allegations in the complaint even taken as true did not adequately address whether Defendants were entitled to assert qualified immunity, and thus ordered discovery on that question. Accordingly, the district court's interlocutory order is not appealable.") Weise v. Casper, 507 F.3d 1260, 1268-73 (10th Cir. 2007), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 7 (2010) (McConnell, J., dissenting) ("Contrary to the majority's holding, the district court's decision denying the defendants' motions to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds is an appealable order, turning as it does on a pure question of law: whether private citizens voluntarily assisting at a federally-sponsored event, when sued for alleged constitutional violations under Bivens, are entitled to invoke the protections of qualified immunity in the absence of proof that they were closely supervised by federal officials. Because the district court answered that legal question in the negative, it denied the defendants' motions for qualified immunity at the dismissal stage and ordered limited discovery to determine whether they were so supervised. As explained below, the court's legal conclusion was in error. The court should have gone on to the merits of the qualified immunity claim: whether the plaintiffs' complaint alleged a constitutional violation, and if so, whether that violation was clearly established. . .This court has jurisdiction to review that erroneous decision. I therefore respectfully dissent. . . . In this case, the district court conclusively resolved that the defendants had no 'right ... to avoid the burden[ ] of ... discovery,' Behrens, 516 U.S. at 308, on the issue of whether they were closely supervised by federal officials, notwithstanding the defendants' legal argument that such supervision is not a necessary predicate to their invocation of qualified immunity. . . Whether the defendants are correct depends on resolution of an 'abstract'–and important–question of law: whether the Supreme Court's holding that employees of a private, for-profit corporation conducting government functions are not entitled to qualified immunity, Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399 (1997), also eliminates immunity for private citizens who voluntarily assist in performing such functions at the behest of federal officials. The majority's holding that the district court's order is not appealable denies the defendants the valuable right to obtain a ruling on this significant legal question, and exposes them to the burden of discovery on an issue that can be resolved as a matter of law, on the pleadings. The majority's holding thus directly conflicts with Behrens and Mitchell. . . . All that the district court has held here–because it is all that can be held on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion–is that the facts in the complaint do not show that the defendants are entitled to invoke qualified immunity. That is a legal conclusion about the scope of qualified immunity for private parties, and we must decide whether it is correct. . . . The defendants here more resemble the 'private individual briefly associated with a government body, serving as an adjunct to government in an essentially governmental activity,' which the Court excluded from its rule in Richardson, than they do the employee of 'a private firm, systematically organized to assume a major lengthy administrative task (managing an institution) with limited direct supervision by the government, [which] undertakes that task for profit and potentially in competition with other firms.' Richardson, 521 U.S. at 413. Therefore, the allegation that the defendants here were directed by federal officials and acted pursuant to federal policy is enough for me to conclude that they are entitled to raise a qualified immunity defense at this stage of the litigation, without proof that their activities were closely supervised by federal officials.").

Harris v. Morales, 231 F. App'x 773, 777 (10th Cir. 2007) ("Mr. Harris contends that the conditions for an interlocutory appeal have not been satisfied in this case. We disagree. We recognize that the district-court order denying summary judgment to Captain Gore appeared to address only evidentiary sufficiency. On appeal, however, Captain Gore does not dispute Mr. Harris's account of what happened. Accordingly, the only issue on appeal is whether Captain Gore is entitled to qualified immunity on Mr. Harris's version of events. . . Furthermore, as we have stated, it is not dispositive that the district-court order did not explicitly address Captain Gore's qualified-immunity argument. To hold otherwise would be to deny Captain Gore the precise entitlement– namely, the right not to be burdened by litigation–afforded by qualified immunity. . . . That we have jurisdiction, however, does not mean that we must, or should, resolve the merits of the appeal. The district court did not fully consider qualified immunity; it did not address whether the applicable constitutional right was 'clearly established' at the time of Captain Gore's actions. . . . We therefore remand to the district court for further consideration on the issue of qualified immunity. On remand the court should address qualified immunity before proceeding further on the Eighth Amendment claim against Captain Gore. The court may consider any new arguments or evidence on the qualified-immunity issue so long as the opposing party is given an opportunity to respond.").

Dyer v. Rabon, No. 06-5085, 2006 WL 3539162, at *1, *2 (10th Cir. Dec. 7, 2006) ("Appellants argue on appeal that the district court erred in refusing to address their respective qualified immunity motions and that this refusal is immediately appealable. Appellee argues that because the district court has not yet ruled on the issue of qualified immunity, the issue is not ripe for appeal. Our decisions in Workman v. Jordan, 958 F.2d 332 (10th Cir.1992), and Lowe v. Town of Fairland, Okla., 143 F.3d 1378 (10th Cir.1998), make clear that a district court's postponement of or failure to rule on a qualified immunity defense is immediately appealable. This result is driven by the purpose behind qualified immunity, which protects an official not only from liability, but also 'from the ordinary burdens of litigation, including far-ranging discovery.'. . Accordingly, we may properly turn to the merits. These same two cases, however, also make clear that this court should not determine whether qualified immunity exists where the district court has not yet passed upon the issue. As pointed out in Workman, although Appellants ask us to determine this issue, and this court has honored such a request in at least one other case, see Laidley v. McClain, 914 F.2d 1386, 1394 (10th Cir.1990), we believe the better practice is to remand such a determination to the district court. . . .").

Robbins v. Wilkie, 433 F.3d 755, 763, 764 (10th Cir. 2006) ("[A]fter Behrens, no circuit has held that an appellate court lacks jurisdiction over denial of a motion for summary judgment when the motion raises the same legal arguments as a prior un-appealed motion to dismiss but relies on evidence developed during discovery. . . . If public officials can avoid discovery by success on a motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity, they should not be prevented from filing the motion because of a fear that denial of the motion will prevent them from raising the defense again once their evidence is strengthened through discovery. Additionally, public officials should not be forced to appeal an order denying dismissal on qualified immunity to preserve appeal of a potential subsequent order denying summary judgment on the same issue. Such a rule would dramatically increase the number of interlocutory appeals at the dismissal stage. . . . Thus, in the present case, Defendants' failure to appeal the district court's denial of dismissal on qualified immunity does not divest this court of jurisdiction to consider Defendants' current appeal because Defendants' summary judgment motion relies in part on evidence developed during discovery.").

Daniels v. Glase, No. 97-7115, 1999 WL 1020522, at *6 (10th Cir. Nov. 11, 1999) (unreported) ("We have held that the exercise of 'pendent jurisdiction over interlocutory appeals must be narrowly focused on those claims the review of which would not require the consideration of legal or factual matters distinct from those raised by the claims over which we unquestionably have jurisdiction.' [citing Malik] Such is the case here with respect to Ms. Daniels' claim against Sheriff Glase in his official capacity. We concluded above that Ms. Daniels has failed to alleged the deprivation of a constitutional right in connection with Mr. Daniels' suicide. That necessarily includes the conclusion that the County cannot be liable.").

Malik v. Arapahoe County Dep't. of Social Services, 191 F.3d 1306, 1317 (10th Cir. 1999) ("[O]ur application of the 'inextricably intertwined' standard for exercising pendent jurisdiction over interlocutory appeals must be narrowly focused on those claims the review of which would not require the consideration of legal or factual matters distinct from those raised by the claims over which we unquestionably have jurisdiction. We therefore decline to exercise jurisdiction over appellants' claims that the district court erred when it accepted and relied upon inadmissible hearsay evidence in its denial of their motion for summary judgment, upheld plaintiffs-appellees' outrageous conduct claim, and held in abeyance appellants' motion for attorney fees. We may, however, exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over appellants' claim that the district court erred in dismissing plaintiffs- appellees' conspiracy claim for damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1985, because we necessarily considered the issue in our review of the district court's denial of Coleman's absolute immunity defense. . . Appellants' legal challenge to the conspiracy claim is based solely on their contention there was no constitutional deprivation. This challenge necessarily fails given our resolution of appellants' immunity claims. We do not disturb the district court's finding of disputed facts sufficient to allege concerted action. . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's refusal to dismiss plaintiffs- appellees' 42 U.S.C. § 1985 conspiracy claim.").

Armijo v. Wagon Mound Public Schools, 159 F.3d 1253, 1259 (10th Cir. 1998) ("[I]f the district court concludes that a genuine issue of material fact exists in denying qualified immunity, but does not set forth with specificity the facts presented by the plaintiff that support a finding that the defendant violated a clearly established right, then we may look behind the order denying summary judgment. In such circumstances, but only in such circumstances, we may review the entire record, construing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and determine de novo whether the plaintiff in fact presented sufficient evidence to forestall summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity. Conversely, where the district court makes a legal finding and states specific facts upon which that finding is based, we do not have jurisdiction to delve behind the ruling and review the record to determine if the district court correctly interpreted those facts to find a genuine dispute.").

Lowe v. Town of Fairland, 143 F.3d 1378, 1380 (10th Cir. 1998) ("We have previously concluded that we have jurisdiction over an appeal from an order postponing a decision on qualified immunity. [citing Workman] In Workman, we reasoned that unless such orders are immediately appealable, a defendant loses his right to be free from the burdens of discovery and trial. Other circuits have concluded that orders failing or refusing to consider qualified immunity are also immediately appealable. [citing cases] We agree with this approach. Regardless of whether a district court merely postpones its ruling or simply does not rule on the qualified immunity defense, if we deny appellate review, a defendant loses the right not to stand trial. . . Accordingly, we may properly exercise jurisdiction over this appeal.").

Shinault v. Cleveland County Bd. of Commissioners, 82 F.3d 367, 370 (10th Cir. 1996) ("Shinault asserts that Skinner fired him for political patronage reasons. The district court first found that, based upon the events set out above, there was a genuine issue of material fact as to Skinner's motive for firing Shinault. The court then made the two-part legal finding, . . . that (1) Shinault's assertion, if true, amounts to a violation of his First Amendment right of association and (2) that right was clearly established at the time of the dismissal such that a reasonable person in the defendant's position would have known that his conduct violated the right. Under Johnson, Skinner may make an interlocutory appeal of these two legal findings. However, Skinner fails to contest either of them: he does not argue that firing a person for political patronage reasons is not a violation of that person's First Amendment right of association, nor does he argue that such a rule was not clearly established at the time of the termination. Instead, Skinner contests the factual finding that he had an illegitimate motive in firing Shinault. But the district court found that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether Skinner fired Shinault for engaging in constitutionally protected political activities and, under Johnson, that finding is unreviewable.").

Sevier v. City of Lawrence, Kansas, 60 F.3d 695, 700 (10th Cir. 1995) ("Individual defendants . . . may interlocutorily appeal the denial of qualified immunity. . . However, Johnson provides that the scope of such appeals is limited to "purely legal" challenges to the district court's ruling on whether a plaintiff's legal rights were clearly established, and cannot include attacks on the court's "evidence sufficiency" determinations about whether there are genuine disputes of fact. . . . In Johnson, the Supreme Court explicitly overruled our previous decisions holding that public officials could collaterally appeal district court rulings denying qualified immunity because of a finding of disputed material facts. . . The Supreme Court distinguished purely legal questions, which are easier to analyze separately from the underlying merits, from claims that implicate factual issues. . . The Court further observed that limiting collateral review to legal issues reduces the risk of delaying litigation and expending appellate resources on factual inquiries better suited to trial court expertise. . . Finally, the Court noted that narrowing the exceptional circumstances under which interlocutory appeals may be heard preserves the legislative command of 28 U.S.C. 1291 . . . .").

Moore v. City of Wynnewood, 57 F.3d 924, 930 (10th Cir. 1995) ("[D]espite its suggestion that appellate jurisdiction should never be exercised over nonfinal appeals that do not fall under the collateral order doctrine-unless they are certified or specially permitted by judicial rulemaking-Swint does not completely foreclose the use of pendent appellate jurisdiction . . . . Specifically, the Court suggested that pendent appellate jurisdiction might still be appropriate where the otherwise nonappealable decision is 'inextricably intertwined' with the appealable decision, or where review of the nonappealable decision is 'necessary to ensure meaningful review' of the appealable one . . . . As we read Swint, a pendent appellate claim can be regarded as inextricably intertwined with a properly reviewable claim on collateral appeal only if the pendent claim is coterminous with, or subsumed in, the claim before the court on interlocutory appeal-that is, when the appellate resolution of the collateral appeal necessarily resolves the pendent claim as well. Here, we conclude that the two appeals are coterminous because Moore's federal and state law claims against the City . . . are both premised on his claim that Defendants violated his First Amendment rights and because we hold that no such First Amendment violation occurred. As such, the issues presented in the City's appeal are no broader than those in [individual official's] permissible collateral appeal, and our disposition of [individual official's] appeal fully disposes of his claims against the City.").

Valdez v. Motyka, 416 F.Supp.3d 460, ___ (D. Colo. 2019), appeal dismissed, 804 F. App'x 991 (10th Cir. 2020) ("[T]he Tenth Circuit has employed two subtly different descriptions of the set of facts it assumes as true for purposes of resolving an interlocutory qualified immunity appeal. On the one hand, the Tenth Circuit has stated, Appellate jurisdiction in cases of this type is clear when the defendant does not dispute the facts alleged by the plaintiff. Alternatively, as here, if the defendant does dispute the plaintiff's allegations the defendant must nonetheless be willing to concede the most favorable view of the facts to the plaintiff for purposes of the appeal. . . This standard focuses on the story the plaintiff intends to present. On the other hand, the Tenth Circuit has also stated that the Supreme Court's Johnson v. Jones decision 'requires [the appellate court] to accept as true the facts the district court expressly held a reasonable jury could accept.' Walton v. Powell, 821 F.3d 1204, 1208 (10th Cir. 2016). This standard focuses specifically on the district court's assessment of the facts as presented at summary judgment. . . These standards are not obviously talking about different things. In most cases, no daylight will be visible between them. District courts usually deny summary judgment by finding that the plaintiff has enough evidence to prove his or her story. In other words, 'the most favorable view of the facts to the plaintiff,' Farmer, 288 F.3d at 1258, and 'the facts the district court expressly held a reasonable jury could accept,' Walton, 821 F.3d at 1208, are the same thing in most cases. But Judge Matsch's approach in the summary judgment order exposes a potential latent tension: What if the district court finds a genuine dispute regarding liability-creating, immunity-defeating facts, but those facts are not the same that the plaintiff hopes to prove? Upon further analysis, however, the Court is convinced Walton ultimately creates no tension with cases such as Farmer, and that, except in circumstances that do not apply here, Farmer's description of the set of facts against which qualified immunity must be judged continues to control. When Walton says that Johnson requires the appellate court to 'take as given the district court's assessment of what facts a reasonable jury could accept,' it cites page 317 of Johnson. The Court could locate nothing on page 317 that supports Walton's characterization of Johnson. However, page 319 contains the phrase 'take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment.' 515 U.S. at 319. This is obviously what Walton had in mind—it is the only place in Johnson that refers to 'tak[ing]' anything 'as given,' and Walton even replicates Johnson's lack of an indefinite article ('take as given' instead of 'take as a given'). . . . [T]he Supreme Court states its expectation that district courts are assuming facts in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. There is simply no discussion—because it was not at issue—about district courts assuming some less favorable set of facts and still denying summary judgment. Likewise, this was not a question in Walton, and so Walton's 'take as given' cannot be interpreted as a pronouncement that the Supreme Court requires appellate courts reviewing interlocutory qualified immunity questions to look at the facts as assumed by the district court to the exclusion of the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. There may be times when a district court explicitly rules at summary judgment that the only set of facts that can overcome qualified immunity is a set of facts different from what the plaintiff hopes to prove, but is nonetheless still provable. Judge Matsch did not make such a ruling here. In particular, when Judge Matsch said that Motyka might still be liable under a recklessness theory even if he had not been aiming at Valdez . . . or that an inference could be made that Motyka was firing without aiming at a clear target . . . , Judge Matsch was not declaring that to be the only liability-creating, immunity-defeating theory a jury could reasonably accept. He was simply responding to Defendants' theory—which Defendants know to be inaccurate—that Valdez was accidentally shot by Motyka when officers opened fire on Johnny Montoya (again, it is beyond reasonable dispute that Motyka intended to shoot Valdez, that the bullet which struck Valdez in the back came from Motyka's firearm, that Johnny Montoya was shot dead about three minutes later, and that Motyka had withdrawn from the engagement before officers opened fire on Montoya). Whether the undersigned would have concluded, as Judge Matsch did, that a hypothetical and knowingly counterfactual scenario might nonetheless create liability and defeat immunity is presently immaterial. The appropriate set of facts against which to judge qualified immunity on an interlocutory appeal is 'the most favorable view of the facts to the plaintiff.' Farmer, 288 F.3d at 1258. The summary judgment record shows that Valdez has evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude that Motyka had time to discern, and did discern, that the immediate danger had passed; that Valdez was laying prone on the ground with his hands above his head; and that Motyka opened fire anyway, intending to hit Valdez. If a jury accepted this view of the evidence, it would demonstrate the violation of a right that was clearly established as of January 16, 2013. . . Of course, a jury could also accept many other views of the facts, including perhaps that Motyka (contrary to his stated position) was not intentionally aiming at Valdez—which may raise a question of qualified immunity. . . But Defendants cite no authority, and the Court is aware of none, that the purpose of interlocutory qualified immunity review is to identify all possible variations of the facts where the law has not been clearly established. If there is one version a jury could accept that would constitute a violation of a clearly established right, no interlocutory review is available and the case may be set for trial. Defendants are free to propose any special interrogatories that they believe are necessary to preserve the qualified immunity defense.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Baysa v. Redinger, 851 F. App'x 175, ___ (11th Cir. 2021) ("Although Redinger asks us to reach the merits of his qualified-immunity defense, we decline to do so because the district court failed to address this important issue in the first instance. We have 'admonished district courts that their orders should contain sufficient explanations of their rulings so as to provide this Court with an opportunity to engage in meaningful appellate review.'. .Thus, we have vacated a one-sentence order denying qualified immunity on the grounds that, '[w]hile this Court certainly could review the record and applicable case law and render a reasoned decision on the qualified immunity issue, this is the responsibility of the district court in the first instance.'. .Here, the district court's order does not supply any reasoned explanation for its conclusion that 'Plaintiff's deposition testimony suffices to establish a contested fact issue as to whether the force used by Redinger at Plaintiff's lawful arrest was unconstitutionally excessive.' And that is especially troubling because our previous opinion in this case explicitly left open whether Baysa's testimony, even when fully credited, is sufficient to foreclose qualified immunity. . . For these reasons, we vacate the ruling below and remand with instructions for the district court to enter a new order that 'detail[s] the legal analysis used ... to reach its conclusions regarding the [motion for summary judgment].'")

Hall v. Flournoy, 975 F.3d 1269, 1276-79 (11th Cir. 2020) ("Since Johnson, the Supreme Court has reiterated that when legal questions of qualified immunity are raised -- either to determine whether any constitutional right was violated or whether the violation of that right was clearly established -- interlocutory appellate jurisdiction exists. But if the only question before the appellate court is a factual one, review must wait for a later time. . . . To be sure, the presence of a factual dispute on appeal does not automatically foreclose interlocutory review; rather, jurisdictional issues arise when the only question before an appellate court is one of pure fact. Thus, as the Supreme Court made clear in Behrens v. Pelletier, when a defendant challenges the conclusion that an alleged act violated clearly established law -- a question of law -- an appellate court may also consider factual questions that are inherently tied into such an evaluation. . . Similarly, in Scott v. Harris, the Supreme Court exercised jurisdiction over an excessive force case raising the legal question of whether ramming a car off the road constituted a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Notably, that case also raised fact questions, including how to view the facts at the summary judgment stage when videotape evidence 'quite clearly contradicts the [plaintiff's] version of the story.'. . Nevertheless, because a legal question was involved too, an appellate court had the power to review the matter on an interlocutory basis. Our Circuit's precedents are consistent. . . .The long and the short of our case law is clear: if there is no legal question to review -- like whether the officer's conduct violated a plaintiff's constitutional rights or whether those constitutional rights were clearly established by the Supreme Court, this Court or the highest court of the state in which the cause arose -- we cannot review a trial court's determination of the facts alone at the interlocutory stage. As explained further, in this appeal, Flournoy does not present a legal question such as whether her alleged conduct violated Hall's rights or whether the constitutional right in question was clearly established by the Supreme Court. Rather, she only asks us to review the factual sufficiency of the district court's decision classifying the dispute at issue -- whether the marijuana found in Hall's accessory building was planted -- as genuine. . . . Flournoy's fear that we are creating precedent for arrestees to claim that evidence was planted, destroying qualified immunity en masse, is itself unfounded. District courts have the authority to decide in the first instance whether a claim of planted evidence is supported by enough to move the case to trial. Even if a rush of plaintiffs begin to make specious arguments in opposition to summary judgment, we have every reason to believe that the district courts will reject these claims where the plaintiffs have failed to create a genuine issue of material fact, as set forth in the summary judgment rules and our case law. . . . In short, Flournoy challenges no legal issue we can find. Rather, she simply asks us to review whether the evidence presented supports the trial court's determination that there was a genuine dispute of material fact over whether the marijuana was planted. Because we are asked to resolve no more at this preliminary stage, we are required to DISMISS Flournoy's appeal for lack of jurisdiction.")

Scott v. Gomez, 792 F. App'x 749, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("In effect, Gomez and Weston say one thing—that they accept Scott's version of relevant events as true—and do another—namely, assume their own version of, rather than Scott's version of, a critical disputed fact, and then argue that, on such facts, the district court was legally incorrect. In so doing, they misstate the law and fail to demonstrate that we may properly exercise jurisdiction over their claims. As mentioned previously, issues regarding the district court's determination of genuinely disputed issues of material fact are not reviewable by us in isolation. . .Holding otherwise would entirely undermine the purpose of the collateral order doctrine and the exception created for denials of qualified immunity. Accordingly, we reject this attempt to manufacture appellate jurisdiction where it does not exist. Despite their assertions to the contrary, Gomez and Weston's appeal of the district court's order is entirely concerned with the sufficiency of the evidence. Accordingly, we may not exercise jurisdiction over this case.")

Johnson v. Houston County, Georgia, 758 F. App'x 911, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("We have interlocutory appellate jurisdiction to review an order denying qualified immunity, at least to the extent it turns on an issue of law. . . . In contrast, we lack 'interlocutory jurisdiction to review the grant of summary judgment to a defendant on qualified immunity grounds.'. . Nevertheless, '[a]n appeal from the denial of qualified immunity may implicate this Court's discretionary pendent appellate jurisdiction to review otherwise non-appealable matters.'. . . But '[w]e are wary of attempts to "piggy-back" cross-appeals on an appeal of the denial of qualified immunity.'. . Here, there is no dispute that we have jurisdiction over Hays's appeal of the denial of qualified immunity because she raises legal issues about whether her conduct violated the Fourteenth Amendment and whether the law was clearly established. . . But at this time, we will not review her argument that Johnson's claim is time-barred because the court's non-final limitations decision is not intertwined with or necessary for review of the qualified-immunity issue. . . . As for Johnson's cross-appeal, we decline to exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction because Johnson's procedural-due-process claim is not sufficiently interwoven with the qualified-immunity issue to necessitate immediate review. Johnson's substantive- and procedural-due-process claims may share the same basic factual predicate—Johnson's pretrial confinement in administrative segregation—but the legal issues to be resolved are distinct. The court's decision denying qualified immunity turns on the lack of a legitimate government objective for keeping Johnson in administrative segregation. The procedural-due-process claim, in contrast, turns on what procedures, if any, the jail was required to afford Hays with respect to that confinement. There is, of course, some overlapping evidence, but it is not necessary that we review the procedural-due-process claim in order to afford meaningful review of the substantive-due-process claim. Accordingly, we decline to exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over Johnson's cross-appeal.")

Saunders v. Sheriff of Brevard County, 735 F. App'x 559, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("We may exercise appellate jurisdiction over the denial of qualified immunity on a motion for summary judgment, . . . but we lack jurisdiction to conduct interlocutory review of Saunders' Monell claim against Sheriff Ivey. The defendants urge us to exercise pendent jurisdiction over the Monell claim because it is, they say, 'inextricably intertwined' with our qualified immunity analysis. We disagree. While it is true that an absence of any constitutional violation would be fatal to assertions of both personal and Monell liability, it remains the case that these forms of liability are subject to different standards. For instance, if officers violated a plaintiff's constitutional rights but those rights were not 'clearly established,' then Monell liability could survive even though qualified immunity would preclude individual liability. For these reasons, this Court has previously found Monell issues sufficiently distinct from issues relating to qualified immunity, and has thus held Monell claims ineligible for interlocutory review. . . The defendants have failed to persuade us that we may—let alone should—chart a different course here. We therefore address in this appeal only whether defendants Wright and Jeter are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Posada v. Brioso, No. 17-13430, 2018 WL 1975023, at *1 (11th Cir. Apr. 26, 2018) (not reported) ("In light of the fact that the district court refused to conduct a qualified immunity analysis because of deficiencies in the briefing and the evidence, dismissed the summary judgment motion without prejudice, emphasized that its order was 'not a final decision,' and encouraged the parties 'to seek leave to file an amended and corrected motion for summary judgment,' we think its order was too tentative and incomplete to constitute a final decision under Mitchell. Under these circumstances, the order did not 'finally and conclusively determine[ ] the defendant[s'] claim of right not to stand trial on the plaintiff[s'] allegations,' because 'further steps [ ] can be taken in the District Court to avoid the trial the defendant[s] maintain[ ] is barred.'. . Accordingly, we lack jurisdiction to hear the appeal of the qualified immunity issue at this time.")

Smith v. LePage, 834 F.3d 1285, 1292 (11th Cir. 2016) ("We choose to exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over the plaintiffs' claims in their cross-appeal. First, like the traffic stop in Hudson, the legality of the officers' entry to the Smith home is intertwined with our resolution of the appealable claims. In reviewing the totality of the circumstances surrounding the shooting, we consider whether the officers lawfully seized Mr. Smith in the first place. . . Second, the legality of the officers' use of their tasers is intertwined with the appealable claims, because it involves essentially 'the same facts and the same law.'. . Finally, Sgt. Gamble's actions as a supervisor are intertwined with the appealable claims because the facts are essentially the same and the plaintiffs claim that Sgt. Gamble was responsible for the second tasing and the shooting. In the interest of judicial economy, we will consider all the claims on appeal.")

Black v. Wigington, 811 F.3d 1259, 1270-71 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Although we sometimes exercise 'pendent appellate jurisdiction' to review 'nonappealable decisions of the district court when [we] already ha[ve] jurisdiction over one issue in the case,' Stewart v. Baldwin Cty. Bd. of Educ., 908 F.2d 1499, 1509 (11th Cir.1990), we cannot exercise that jurisdiction here. We can exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction 'only under rare circumstances.'. . It is not available unless the nonappealable issue is 'inextricably intertwined' with or 'necessary to ensure meaningful review' of the appealable issue. . . And 'we may resolve the Eleventh Amendment immunity issue here without reaching the merits of' the Blacks' argument under the Equal Protection Clause. . . We can decide whether Congress abrogated the sheriff's sovereign immunity (it did) and whether the sheriff's conduct plausibly violated the Equal Protection Clause (it did) '[w]ithout expressing any view on the merits' of the Blacks' argument. . . So, we lack jurisdiction to review whether the Blacks' argument that the sheriff violated the Equal Protection Clause should have been dismissed at summary judgment and express no view on this issue.")

McQueen v. Johnson, No. 11–15069, 2013 WL 425979, *3-*5 (11th Cir. Feb. 5, 2013) (not reported) ("McQueen's cross-appeal falls within our pendent appellate jurisdiction. . . . It is necessary to determine the reasonableness of Johnson's initial use of force in order to determine whether the subsequent uses of force by Johnson, O'Reilly, and Tatum mere seconds later were reasonable. . . Accordingly, we have jurisdiction over McQueen's cross-appeal regarding the partial grant of qualified immunity to Johnson. . . .The subsequent uses of force by Officers Johnson, O'Reilly, and Tatum were also objectively reasonable. As both the officers and McQueen agree, McQueen had the misfortune of falling on top of his hands after being incapacitated by Johnson's initial tasing. As a result, McQueen's hands were obscured under his body at the same time that the police were yelling at McQueen to reveal his hands, and many officers had already observed that there was a second weapon located in the same area as his hands. Despite McQueen's unfortunate inability to make his hands visible, a reasonable officer in this rapidly evolving situation could perceive that, rather than being incapacitated, the armed robbery suspect who undoubtedly had at least one firearm on his body was continuing to resist the officers' orders. Deputy Sergeant Johnson's second use of his taser—after reasonably believing that McQueen was being non-compliant and seeing that officers were still unable to handcuff him—was therefore reasonable. The reasonableness of this action was confirmed by the discovery of a second firearm—McQueen's service firearm—secreted in his belt shortly thereafter. After seeing this second weapon, Officers O'Reilly and Tatum, who had not seen the second firearm before and who could reasonably assume that McQueen was still not complying with the orders to make his hands visible, simultaneously tased the still-armed McQueen once more and released the K–9. Under these circumstances, in which a second firearm was revealed within arm's reach and the armed robbery suspect's hands remained beneath him in close proximity to a second gun, the officers acted reasonably in using additional force to immobilize a questionably noncompliant McQueen.")

Feliciano v. City of Miami Beach, 707 F.3d 1244, 1250 n.3 (11th Cir. 2013) ("Feliciano maintains that we lack jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal because the officers' challenge to the denial of qualified immunity centers on a number of disputed issues of material fact, including whether they actually smelled marijuana coming from the apartment, saw Gonzaga holding a joint, or found marijuana that was already in her home before their arrival. Although we do lack interlocutory jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 when the only issues appealed in a qualified immunity case are evidentiary issues about which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial, we have jurisdiction where the district court's denial of qualified immunity is based, even in part, on a question of law. . . And that includes the district court's determination in this case that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity under a given set of facts. . . Moreover, in the course of deciding such an interlocutory appeal, we may resolve any factual issues that are part and parcel of the core legal issues. . . The requirement that the evidence be viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff can itself create an issue of law. . . We do have jurisdiction over this appeal.")

Keating v. City of Miami, 598 F.3d 753, 760 (11th Cir. 2010) ("[I]nterlocutory appeal is available when the denial of qualified immunity is only partially based on an issue of law. . .The fact that Timoney, Fernandez, Cannon, and Burden also argue that the Protesters did not meet the heightened pleading standard for § 1983 actions does not foreclose this Court's jurisdiction. At the motion to dismiss stage in the litigation, 'the qualified immunity inquiry and the Rule 12(b)(6) standard become intertwined.'. . '[W]hether a particular complaint sufficiently alleges a clearly established violation of law cannot be decided in isolation from the facts pleaded.' [citing Ashcroft v. Iqbal] Thus, because Timoney, Fernandez, Cannon, and Burden argue that the First Amendment violations were not clearly established, we have jurisdiction over their appeal from the denial of qualified immunity as to the Protesters' First Amendment claims. . . Additionally, our jurisdiction extends to determine whether the Protesters' complaint sufficiently alleges clearly established constitutional violations.")

Keating v. City of Miami, 598 F.3d 753, 760-62 (11th Cir. 2010) ("The district court granted Timoney, Fernandez, Cannon, and Burden qualified immunity as to the Protesters' Fourth Amendment claims. It determined that the 'herding' of the Protesters away from the demonstration area constituted an unlawful seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment. However, the district court found that the conduct did not violate clearly established law. Despite the fact that the district court granted their motion to dismiss on the Protesters' Fourth Amendment claims, Timoney, Fernandez, Cannon, and Burden appeal the adverse determination that their conduct constituted an unlawful seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Because Timoney, Fernandez, Cannon, and Burden were granted qualified immunity, we do not have jurisdiction over this issue on interlocutory appeal. Nor would we if Timoney, Fernandez, Cannon, and Burden were appealing a final order. First, this issue does not satisfy the Cohen test for immediate review on interlocutory appeal because, regardless of a decision on the merits, the result is the same: Timoney, Fernandez, Cannon, and Burden would still be entitled to qualified immunity. Thus, this issue would not be unreviewable on appeal from the final judgment. . . Second, a party normally may not appeal from a favorable judgment. . . Third, and most basically, the Supreme Court has denied jurisdiction and discussed the lack of jurisdiction for this type of appeal under procedurally similar circumstances. . . . Although there are real concerns about the non-reviewability of adverse findings in this situation, [footnote omitted] we do not have jurisdiction to review an appeal from the district court's adverse determination, that 'herding' of the Protesters constituted an unlawful seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment because Timoney, Fernandez, Cannon, and Burden were granted qualified immunity on the Protesters' Fourth Amendment claims.")

Killmon v. City of Miami, 199 F. App'x 796, 2006 WL 2769526, at *2 (11th Cir. 2006) ("The Protesters' argument that we lack jurisdiction fails. We have jurisdiction over this appeal, because the denial of the Officers' defense of qualified immunity turns on whether the complaint of the Protesters alleges a violation of a clearly established right. The complaint alleges that the Officers were ordered by their commander to arrest the Protesters who were walking peacefully on the railroad tracks as instructed by other police officers. The Officers argue that these allegations require a finding of probable cause, and the Protesters respond that the complaint adequately alleges an arrest without probable cause. The dispute then does not turn on the sufficiency of the evidence, which would foreclose our jurisdiction . . . . instead, this appeal turns on whether the facts alleged in the complaint establish that the Protesters were arrested without probable cause.").

Koch v. Rugg, 221 F.3d 1283, 1297, 1298 (11th Cir. 2000) ("When discriminatory intent is a predicate factual element of the underlying constitutional tort, [footnote omitted] we have recognized that sufficiency of discriminatory-intent evidence generally is not part of the core qualified immunity analysis. . . In deciding whether jurisdiction is appropriate in a case where the interlocutory appeal is based on qualified immunity, we do not consider facts that the parties might prove at trial but whether the government actors' undisputed conduct, analyzed objectively, violates clearly established law. . . . Because Vice President Rugg and Dean Forrester have based their interlocutory appeal from denial of qualified immunity solely on the lack of evidence to show racially discriminatory intent in their decision not to hire Dr. Koch for the temporary full-time position, a critical element of the principal case for trial rather than core qualified immunity issues, [footnote omitted] we lack jurisdiction.").

Stanley v. City of Dalton, 219 F.3d 1280, 1287 (11th Cir. 2000) ("[W]hen both the 'evidence sufficiency' and clearly established issues are raised, we have two options of how to treat the factual issue. First, we may take the facts that the district court assumed when it denied qualified immunity as a given and address only the pure legal issues in the appeal. Or, we may conduct our own analysis of the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. [citing Johnson v. Clifton]. We may choose to conduct our own factual analysis either because the district court did not adequately identify the facts or because 'such a determination is part of the core qualified immunity analysis.' Id. Also, as stated in Johnson v. Clifton, 'even if such a determination were not part of the core qualified immunity analysis, it would be Ainextricably intertwined" with that analysis and within the appellate court's pendent jurisdiction.' . . . . Although we may independently review the record facts, we will not disturb a factual finding by the district court if there is any record evidence to support that finding. . . We, like the district court, must consider the record evidence regarding the defendant's conduct in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. In this appeal, because Chadwick raises both 'evidence sufficiency' and clearly established law arguments, we have jurisdiction to review them. Choosing the latter of our two options, we have made an independent review of the facts from the record.").

Hartley v. Parnell, 193 F.3d 1263, 1270-72 (11th Cir. 1999) ("The concurring opinion takes the position that the doctrine of qualified immunity does not apply in an individual capacity public official lawsuit, unless a court determines that a constitutional violation has been alleged (if at the motion to dismiss stage) or a genuine issue of material fact concerning such a violation exists (if at the summary judgment stage). To suggest that qualified immunity applies where no wrong has been committed, it says, is a non sequitur. What we ought to do, according to the concurring opinion, is direct the district court to enter summary judgment for the individual defendant on the merits, not on qualified immunity grounds. We disagree. Let us begin with why it matters. It matters because this is an interlocutory appeal, and courts of appeal have jurisdiction to review interlocutorily denials of summary judgment based on qualified immunity, but not denials of summary judgment that go only to the merits of a claim. . . . If there had been no qualified immunity defense raised in this case–if the only grounds for which summary judgment had been sought was on the merits–the denial of summary judgment would not be appealable; we would have to dismiss this appeal for lack of appellate jurisdiction. . . It is only because of the qualified immunity issue that we have appellate jurisdiction to review the denial of summary judgment. . . . [I]n its recent Wilson opinion, the Supreme Court described the determination of the merits as part of the process of evaluating a qualified immunity claim . . . . Thus, determining the merits of a claim is part and parcel of the qualified immunity inquiry, not a separate question. . . . Because our only basis for appellate jurisdiction at this stage of the case is fastened to the issue of qualified immunity, it would be incongruous for us to deny that the issue before us is one of qualified immunity. Instead of denying that which is essential, we will recognize that qualified immunity is the issue we are deciding, and we will do here what we did in Burrell and Cottrell, which is to reverse the district court's denial of the individual plaintiff's [sic] motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds.").

Mencer v. Hammonds, 134 F.3d 1066, 1069-71 (11th Cir. 1998) ("Even if the court had based its denial only on a bald assertion that sufficient evidence existed to allow a jury to find an equal protection violation, . . . Johnson would not foreclose our review of this appeal. . . . A denial of qualified immunity at summary judgment necessarily involves two determinations: 1) that on the facts before the court, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a reasonable jury could find that the defendant engaged in certain conduct, and 2) that the conduct violated 'clearly established law' such that a reasonable person in defendant's position would have had notice that his actions were unlawful. . . Johnson establishes only that a plaintiff [sic] may not base an interlocutory appeal on the district court's first determination by itself. . . . A determination of whether the evidence supports a finding that a defendant engaged in certain conduct, however, is necessary to reach a determination of whether that conduct violated clearly established law. . . . Thus, if we are confronted with an appeal from a denial of qualified immunity, we may exercise our discretion to review the district court's preliminary determination as a means of reaching the issue of clearly established law. . . . In this case, Mencer, in order to defeat Hammonds' defense of qualified immunity, had to present the district court with enough evidence to allow a reasonable jury to find that Hammonds intended to discriminate against her. She did not do so.").

Walker v. Schwalbe, 112 F.3d 1127, 1135-37 (11th Cir. 1997) (Birch, J., concurring in part and dissenting from portion of majority's decision discussing and concluding that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to plaintiff's retaliation claim) ("[T]he defendants do not argue in this appeal that, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, they nonetheless are entitled to qualified immunity. Rather, the defendants argue, in essence, that viewing the facts as the defendants allege them to be, they had another legitimate reason for demoting Walker, separate and apart from any First Amendment concerns. Because there is no conclusive support for the defendants version of the facts, the defendants' challenge effectively requires that we decide a factual issue– whether there is conclusive foundation to confirm the defendants' contention that Walker did violate state law–based neither on the record nor the drawing of reasonable inferences based on facts previously found. In my opinion, this type of purely factual decision-making is not the proper subject of an interlocutory appeal based on qualified immunity. This is not to say that we may never exercise jurisdiction whenever the underlying intent of a state actor is intertwined with the issue of qualified immunity; indeed, our circuit precedent holds otherwise. . . . [B]ecause the record does not reveal definitively that Walker violated a valid state anti-nepotism policy at the time the relevant events occurred, it also does not explicitly show that the defendants could have demoted Walker, at least in part, for violating this policy. Indeed, because we cannot discern conclusively at this juncture whether the defendants had some lawful justification for their decision to demote Walker, we do not know whether there exists an application of materially similar facts to law that may or may not have placed the defendants on notice that their conduct violated a clearly established right; in other words, we cannot decide the core qualified immunity question. For this reason, I believe that it is inappropriate to reach the remaining issue raised in this appeal.").

McMillian v. Johnson, 88 F.3d 1554, 1563 (11th Cir. 1996) ("[T]his circuit has not construed Johnson to bar immediate appellate review of fact-based rulings in all circumstances, and the Supreme Court's subsequent decision in [Behrens] confirms that Johnson did not work such a constriction of interlocutory appellate jurisdiction over orders denying a qualified immunity defense. . . . so long as the core qualified immunity issue is raised on appeal, a final, collateral order is being appealed, and the appellate court has jurisdiction to hear the case, including challenges to the district court's determination that genuine issues of fact exist as to what conduct the defendant engaged in.").

Cottrell v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480, 1485 (11th Cir. 1996) ("The Court in Behrens specifically rejected the contention that a district court's holding that material issues of fact remain bars interlocutory appellate review of related issues of law, labelling that contention a misreading of Johnson. . . . The contrary holdings in Mastroianni v. Bowers, 74 F.3d 236, 238 (11th Cir.1996), and Babb v. Lake City Community College, 66 F.3d 270, 272 (11th Cir.1995), preceded Behrens and cannot be reconciled with it. Where prior panel precedent conflicts with a subsequent Supreme Court decision, we follow the Supreme Court decision. . . . Accordingly, under Johnson, we lack interlocutory appellate jurisdiction over the denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds where the sole issues on appeal are issues of evidentiary sufficiency. However, as clarified by Behrens, Johnson does not affect our interlocutory jurisdiction in qualified immunity cases where the denial is based even in part on a disputed issue of law.").

Beauregard v. Olson, 84 F.3d 1402, 1403 (11th Cir. 1996) ("For purposes of our review we accept as true both that Plaintiffs' job duties were ministerial and that Olson fired them for political reasons. [footnote omitted] Even so, Olson says he is entitled to qualified immunity. So, we have jurisdiction [citing Behrens] to decide the core qualified immunity question of whether it was clearly established before Olson acted that he could not lawfully fire these deputized clerical employees of the Tax Collector's office for political reasons.").

Johnson v. Clifton, 74 F.3d 1087, 1091 (11th Cir. 1996) ("It seems clear to us that the Supreme Court [in Johnson] was not changing the well-established law of qualified immunity in the context of summary judgment, just elaborating on it. When faced with a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the District Court must determine whether there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the defendant committed conduct that violated clearly established law. This analysis can be broken down into two parts. First, what was the official's conduct, based on the pleadings, depositions, and affidavits, when viewed in the light most favorable to the non-moving party? Second, could a reasonable public official have believed that such conduct was lawful based on clearly established law? The resolution of the second issue constitutes a final, collateral order. . . A ruling on such an issue is immediately appealable. . . When such a ruling is appealable, the first issue–the factual issue–may be addressed by an appellate court because it is a part of the core qualified immunity analysis. [cite omitted] However, if only the first issue is appealed, namely what conduct the defendant engaged in based on the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and not the second issue, namely whether that conduct violated clearly established law, then the appellate court has no jurisdiction to hear the case. [citing Johnson] The first issue–the factual issue–can only be heard because it is a necessary part of the core qualified immunity analysis, the resolution of which constitutes a final, collateral order; when the core qualified immunity issue is not appealed, then the factual issue may not be either. . . When the core qualified immunity issue is raised on appeal, the appellate court has two options regarding how to deal with the factual issue. 'When faced with an argument that the district court mistakenly identified clearly established law, the court of appeals can simply take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment for that (purely legal) reason.' . . . Or, the court of appeals can conduct its own review of the record in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. First, the appellate court may have to do so because the trial court failed to state the facts it assumed. . . Second, the appellate court can do so because such a determination is part of the core qualified immunity analysis, as discussed above. [cite omitted] Third, even if such a determination were not part of the core qualified immunity analysis, it would be 'inextricably intertwined' with that analysis and within the appellate court's pendent jurisdiction. [cite omitted] Of course, if there is any evidence in the record to support the District Court's ruling that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the official actually engaged in the conduct that violated clearly established law, the District Court's factual ruling will not be disturbed.").

Dolihite v. Maughon, 74 F.3d 1027, 1034 n.3 (11th Cir. 1996) ("Unlike Johnson and unlike Ratliff, the primary argument of each appealing public official in this case is that a reasonable public official could have believed that his or her actions were lawful, in light of clearly established law and the information possessed by each official. . . This argument raises the core qualified immunity issue and is, therefore, immediately appealable under Mitchell . . . and Johnson. With respect to several subissues relating to several of the appellants, in order to evaluate the core qualified immunity issue presented by each appellant, we have identified precisely the relevant actions of the appellant and the relevant information possessed by each, of course, taking all reasonable inferences in favor of Dolihite. We are confident we have jurisdiction to do this. . . . Our conclusion that we have jurisdiction to identify the precise actions and the precise knowledge of each appellant is supported by the recent Eighth Circuit decision in Reece v. Groose, 60 F.3d 487 (8th Cir.1995). . . . Even if we are incorrect in our conclusion that the identification of the precise acts and knowledge of each appealing public official is part and parcel of the core qualified immunity issue, we are satisfied that it would be "inextricably intertwined" with the core issue, and thus would be within our pendent appellate jurisdiction. . . . Ordinarily, we might simply "take as given" the district court's identification of each appellant's actions and knowledge. . . However, with respect to the appellants in this case other than Jurls, we cannot conclude that the district court's identification of the actions and knowledge of each appellant was adequate. The Supreme Court in Johnson acknowledged that in such a circumstance, an appellate court appropriately would have to undertake such identification.").

McElroy v. City of Macon, 68 F.3d 437, 438 n.* (11th Cir. 1995) ("We have looked at Johnson . . . and conclude that defendants may immediately appeal the denial, based on untimeliness, of a summary judgment motion in a qualified immunity case. [cites omitted] We see Johnson's constraint on interlocutory appeals to be, itself, limited to barring appeals in which the issue is whether or not the evidence in the pretrial record was sufficient to show a genuine issue of fact for trial.").

Babb v. Lake City Community College, 66 F.3d 270, 272 (11th Cir. 1995) (per curiam) ("The claim of immunity must be 'conceptually distinct' from the merits of the plaintiff's claim; and the interlocutory appeal from its denial must be limited to the issue of whether the undisputed facts show a violation of 'clearly established' law. . . Where, as in this case, a district court finds that there exists a genuine issue of material fact regarding the conduct claimed to violate clearly established law, there is no 'final decision' and no interlocutory appellate jurisdiction under Mitchell to review the denial. . . An order determining the existence or non-existence of a triable issue of fact–the sufficiency of the evidence–is not immediately appealable.").

Kelly v. Curtis, 21 F.3d 1544, 1556 (11th Cir. 1994) ("[Defendants] were brought into federal court on the basis of federal claims, which we have held are now out of the case insofar as Curtis and Moore are concerned. If these two defendants are also entitled to summary judgment on the state law claims, then by declining to exercise our discretionary pendent appellate jurisdiction, we might undermine the purpose of permitting an interlocutory appeal from the denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds...We do not hold that a court of appeals should always exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over the state law claims against a defendant once it has held that defendant is entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds as to all the federal claims. We do, however, recognize such a situation as a special one that may warrant the exercise of our discretion to review.").

McKinney by McKinney v. DeKalb County, Ga., 997 F.2d 1440, 1442 (11th Cir. 1993) ("The issue on this appeal of a denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity is a purely legal one: first, whether there was a clearly established constitutional right, and second, whether, viewed most favorably to the plaintiffs, the alleged facts show a violation of that right.").

Collins v. School Board of Dade County, Fla., 981 F.2d 1203, 1205 (11th Cir. 1993) ("The district court's order declining to rule on the qualified immunity issue pending trial effectively denies defendants the right not to stand trial. Because the 'reserved ruling' is not materially different from an outright denial of a summary judgment motion, an immediate appeal on the qualified immunity issue is permissible.").

Green v. Brantley, 941 F.2d 1146 (11th Cir. 1990) (en banc) ("...denial of summary judgment based upon qualified immunity is appealable as a collateral order...even if an additional damage claim will proceed to trial regardless of the outcome of the appeal.").

X. TIMING & FREQUENCY OF APPEALS

Ortiz v. Jordan, 131 S. Ct. 884, 888, 889, 892 (2011) (holding party may not appeal an order denying summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds after a full trial on the merits and, absent a Rule 50(b) motion, an appellate court is "powerless" to review the sufficiency of the evidence after trial.)

Behrens v. Pelletier, 116 S. Ct. 834, 839-40 (1996) ("Harlow and Mitchell make clear that the [qualified immunity] defense is meant to give government officials a right, not merely to avoid 'standing trial,' but also to avoid the burdens of 'such pretrial matters as discovery ....' Whether or not a later summary-judgment motion is granted, denial of a motion to dismiss is conclusive as to this right. . . . [R]esolution of the immunity question may 'require more than one judiciously timed appeal,' because the legally relevant factors bearing upon the Harlow question will be different on summary judgment than on an earlier motion to dismiss.").

FIRST CIRCUIT

Rivera-Torres v. Ortiz Velez, 341 F.3d 86, 94-96 (1st Cir. 2003) ("This proposition–that a district court must actually file the certification of frivolousness to retrieve jurisdiction over the proceedings–is the springboard for defendants' argument that the trial in this case was a nullity. . . . This jurisdictional dispute might have been avoided if the district court had promptly ruled on the defendants' motion to continue the trial pending the resolution of their Forsyth appeal. . . . If the court had entered that order denying the stay on December 2, prior to beginning the trial, its jurisdiction over the proceedings would have been clearly established even without the inclusion of certification language in the opinion. We have never adopted the Apostol certification procedure in this circuit. Although appellants urge us to do so here in the hopes of adding fuel to their trial nullity argument, we decline their invitation. Whatever the merits of the certification procedure may be, its primary innovation– permitting the district court to reclaim jurisdiction from the court of appeals in the wake of a Forsyth appeal–has no relevance to this case. The defendants' notice of appeal was patently meritless, and therefore failed to divest the district court of jurisdiction in the first instance.").

Rosario-Diaz v. Ortiz, 140 F.3d 312, 316 (1st Cir. 1998) ("We have held that a defendant may bring an interlocutory appeal from a district court's refusal to entertain an untimely pretrial motion that raises a qualified immunity defense. See Valiente v. Rivera, 966 F.2d 21, 23 (1st Cir.1992) (per curiam); Zayas-Green v. Casaine, 906 F.2d 18, 23 (1st Cir.1990). . . . Given the baldness of the appellants' transgressions, the potential prejudice to the plaintiffs and to the orderly administration of the court's docket caused by the late filings, and the need to deter such conduct, we think the district court's refusal to entertain the appellants' motions for summary judgment is a concinnous sanction, well within the court's discretion. . . In reaching this conclusion, we do not denigrate the important purpose served by the qualified immunity doctrine. Nonetheless, it is (or should be) evident that a public official's right to raise a qualified immunity defense is commensurate with his responsibility to do so diligently and in keeping with the trial court's lawful case-management orders. . . The appellants' flagrant breach of this duty amply justifies the district court's carefully balanced rejoinder (precluding a belated pretrial sortie but leaving the appellants free to raise the qualified immunity defense at trial).").

Guzman-Rivera v. Rivera-Cruz, 98 F.3d 664, 667-69 (1st Cir. 1996) ("These considerable rights to raise and appeal the defense of qualified immunity are not, however, unlimited. . . . Delay generated by claims of qualified immunity may work to the disadvantage of the plaintiff. . . . Delay is also costly to the court system, demanding more time and energy from the court and retarding the disposition of cases. We must balance the need to protect public officials from frivolous suits with the need to have cases resolved expeditiously. Without some limit on the ability of defendants to raise immunity issues, any suit implicating the defenses of absolute and qualified immunity faces the possibility of at least three independent motions for summary judgment: (i) a motion for summary judgment on the non-immunity defenses, (ii) a motion for summary judgment based on absolute immunity, which can be appealed immediately; (iii) a motion for qualified immunity which can also be appealed immediately. The potential for delay is considerable. In order to reduce the potential for abuse by defendants, we believe that the defense of qualified immunity may be deemed to have been waived if it is not raised in a diligent manner during the post-discovery, pre-trial phase. To find otherwise is to invite strategic use of the defense by defendants who stand to benefit from delay. This ruling does not inhibit the ability of defendants to raise a defense of qualified immunity and benefit from the protections it offers. Our ruling today in no way prevents a defendant from raising the defense of qualified immunity at summary judgment, regardless of whether it was raised prior to discovery. We, therefore, adopt the position of the Sixth Circuit that the district court has the discretion to deny motions for summary judgment that are not filed in an expeditious manner. . . . In the instant case, however, defendants raised the qualified immunity defense very late in the pre-trial, post-discovery phase, despite the fact that they had ample opportunity to have the issue resolved expeditiously earlier in the proceedings, rather than generating additional delay by filing this third motion for summary judgment. The question before this court, therefore, is whether the defendants waived the right to raise the defense at this stage by failing to do so in a diligent manner and by failing to offer an explanation for the delay. Upon de novo review, we hold that the defense of qualified immunity has been waived for the pre-trial stage. . . . This decision does not imply, however, that the defense has been waived for other stages of the litigation. Because the defense of qualified immunity may be raised and appealed at multiple stages of the trial, it would be inappropriate to find waiver for all stages in the current case. We need not decide whether a sufficient showing of prejudice to the plaintiff would result in waiver for all stages: even assuming so arguendo, there is no such showing in the instant case. Our decision thus leaves defendants free to present the qualified immunity defense at trial, despite the fact that the defense is waived for pre-trial purposes.").

SECOND CIRCUIT

Plummer v. Quinn, 2008 WL 383507, at *2 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 12, 2008) ("In some circuits, a district court may proceed to trial despite a defendant's interlocutory appeal of the denial of qualified immunity if the court certifies that the appeal is frivolous or being used for purposes of delay. See e.g., Apostol v. Gallion, 870 F.2d 1335, 1339 (7th Cir.1989). Although the Second Circuit has not specifically addressed the issue, some courts in this circuit have adopted this approach. See e.g., Palmer v. Goss, No. 02 Civ. 5804, 2003 WL 22519454, at *1 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 5, 2003); Bean v. City of Buffalo, 822 F.Supp. 1016, 1019 (W.D.N.Y.1993). However, having determined that Quinn is entitled to an interlocutory appeal and that there is a possibility that the Court of Appeals will reverse this Court's denial of summary judgment based on the doctrine of qualified immunity, Defendants' appeal cannot be characterized as frivolous. Accordingly, Plaintiff's motion for certification of the appeal as frivolous is denied.")

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Thompson v. Farmer, 945 F. Supp. 109, 111-12 (W.D.N.C. 1996) ("Relying on Apostol v. Gallion, 870 F.2d 1335 (7th Cir.1989), Thompson has urged this Court to certify Farmer's appeal as frivolous and proceed to trial. Farmer argues that the Fourth Circuit has not adopted Apostol such that this Court has no authority to certify the appeal as frivolous. This Court has reviewed the Seventh Circuit's decision in Apostol and agrees with Thompson that this Court has power to certify an appeal as frivolous in an appropriate case. The Court believes that the reasoning of Apostol is well-rooted in the general principles governing appellate jurisdiction such that the Fourth Circuit would adopt its eminently sensible holding. Indeed, it seems the Supreme Court has approved of this procedure. See Behrens v. Pelletier, 116 S.Ct. 834, 841 (1996) (citing four circuits that have adopted this procedure). Of course it is also true, as Farmer notes, that the Court of Appeals will also satisfy itself that the appeal has merit sufficient to confer appellate jurisdiction. But there is no necessary conflict between appellate review and use of the procedure outlined in Apostol–they are complementary procedures. This is even more certain when one considers that Apostol also recognizes that the Court of Appeals may stay an action in the district court while it reviews the district court's determination that an appeal is frivolous.").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Salcido v. Harris County, Texas, No. CV H-15-2155, 2018 WL 6618407, at *11-12, *14, *18 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 18, 2018) ("In BancPass, the Fifth Circuit reaffirmed its holding in United States v. Dunbar, 611 F.2d 985, 987 (5th Cir. 1980) (en banc), that 'a district court may certify to the court of appeals that an interlocutory appeal of the denial of a ... motion is frivolous and then proceed with trial rather than relinquish jurisdiction.'. . . The Fifth Circuit specifically recognized that 'a district court is permitted to maintain jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal of an immunity denial after certifying that the appeal is frivolous or dilatory.'. . The court cautioned, however, that 'this rule is a permissive one: the district court may keep jurisdiction, but is not required to do so,'. . . and that '[s]uch a power must be used with restraint.'. . In other words, a district court must provide written certification and make an express finding of frivolousness in the immunity context in order for a court to not be deprived of jurisdiction. . . . For the reasons stated in the September 28, 2018, Memorandum Opinion and Order (Docket Entry No. 207) at pp. 69-93, and in § II.B.2, above, the court concludes that whether the defendants hogtied or effectively hogtied Lucas is not dispositive of whether they violated a constitutional right that was clearly established when the incident at issue occurred. The dispositive issues are whether the force that the defendants used caused Lucas injury, was clearly excessive, and whether the excessiveness was clearly unreasonable. . . . The officer defendants contend that they had no reasonable warning that the restraint technique used on Lucas violated his constitutional rights because there was then no binding caselaw on the appropriateness of using an 'effective hogtie or a 'basic hogtie.' But lawfulness of force does not depend on the precise instrument used to apply it. Qualified immunity will not protect officers who apply excessive and unreasonable force merely because their means of applying it are novel; the central concern is whether the officer defendants had fair warning that their conduct violated a constitutional right. . . The court concludes that Simpson, Darden, and other similar cases provided defendants fair warning of the violative nature of their alleged conduct, and that their argument to the contrary has no merit. . . . For the reasons stated in §§ II and III, above, the court concludes that issues of material fact exist as to whether the officer defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, and that there are no meritorious issues of law to be reviewed by the court of appeals. The court therefore CERTIFIES that defendants' interlocutory appeal is frivolous.")

SIXTH CIRCUIT

English v. Dyke, 23 F.3d 1086, 1089 (6th Cir. 1994) ("[A] qualified immunity defense can be raised at various stages of the litigation including at the pleading stage in a motion to dismiss, after discovery in a motion for summary judgment, or as an affirmative defense at trial. [citing Kennedy v. City of Cleveland, 797 F. 2d 297, 300 (6th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1103 (1987)] A denial of the defense at any stage entitles a defendant to an immediate appeal. If the trial court's ruling is affirmed on appeal, the defendant may raise the defense at the next stage of litigation and appeal again if the defense is denied. Id.").

Krycinski v. Packowski, 556 F.Supp.2d 740, 744-45 (W.D. Mich. 2008) ("As a practical matter, it is also important to recognize the disruption that interlocutory appeals create in the litigation process. Indeed, this disruption is the principal policy reason underlying the general rule against piecemeal appeals. . . The Supreme Court has carved out a narrow exception for federal qualified immunity decisions, . . . but even that narrow exception has, in practice, expanded beyond the Supreme Court's original basis for it. The original and understandable justification for the limited right to interlocutory appeal was to permit resolution of genuinely legal issues so that individual defendants did not have to endure the full trial-court process before having an appellate decision on a purely legal issue. . . However, in practice many motions for summary judgment on qualified immunity do not come up for consideration or decision until discovery has been completed in the case. The legal immunity issues are often inextricably bound up with factual issues, and denial of summary judgment at this stage of the case has less to do with a narrowly crystalized issue of law than with a morass of genuinely disputed facts. When interlocutory appeals routinely happen in this context they rarely serve to clarify a decisive legal issue in the case, and they always build new and significant delay into the trial process. This Court does not believe that this practice is in keeping with the policy rationale of the Supreme Court in Johnson and Mitchell. In an effort to address this issue in future cases, this Court intends to include a new deadline in case management orders applicable to cases in which qualified immunity may apply. The deadline will be early in the case and will be for any qualified immunity issue that a defendant may wish to raise and from which it may elect to take an interlocutory appeal if its motion is denied. The filing of such a timely motion will, under the case management order, toll discovery and other case management deadlines until the motion is resolved. If the deadline passes without a motion, the case management order will deem defendants to have waived interlocutory appeal of any denial of summary judgment on a subsequently asserted qualified immunity defense. . . On the one hand, this will effectuate the purposes recited by the Supreme Court in Johnson and Mitchell by providing defendants with an early opportunity to raise a qualified immunity defense that truly presents a narrow legal issue and that, if granted, would actually protect defendants from not only liability but also suit. On the other hand, it will also prevent the routine and disruptive use of qualified immunity defenses that come late in the case–after discovery, on the eve of trial, and usually inextricably intertwined with factual disputes.")

Rodriguez v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:08-CV-1892, 2009 WL 1661942, at *2 (N.D. Ohio June 10, 2009) ("The Court finds that the Defendants' interlocutory appeal does not present non-frivolous, appealable questions of law and therefore it grants the Plaintiff's motion to preserve the trial date and to deem the Defendants' interlocutory appeal to be frivolous. First, in light of the Defendants' brief, which is replete with references to disputed facts (a wholly improper inquiry on interlocutory appeal), it is not at all clear that the Defendants' interlocutory appeal is non-frivolous and was not submitted merely for the purposes of delay. Further, the Court has been unable to find that the Defendants have presented 'neat abstract issues of law' that can properly be considered by the Sixth Circuit on interlocutory appeal.")

Blair v. City of Cleveland, 148 F. Supp.2d 919, 922 (N.D. Ohio 2000) ("Under the court's holding in Apostol, where a court finds that an appeal is frivolous, or where the defendants use claims of immunity in a manipulative fashion, the district court may certify that the defendant has surrendered the entitlement to a pretrial appeal and proceed with trial. . . . The Sixth Circuit, while not applying the holding in Apostol, has cited that court's logic with approval. . . . Despite its determination that genuine issues of material fact preclude a finding of qualified immunity, the court declines to certify that the officers' appeal is frivolous. Acknowledging the importance of public officials' right to avoid trial where they are entitled to immunity, the court does not wish to defeat the purpose of the rule by forcing the officers to defend themselves at trial, effectively extinguishing their right to qualified immunity. Erring on the side of caution, the court instead stays the trial of Plaintiffs' claims against Officers Tankersley and Gibson, pending the outcome of their appeal on the issue of qualified immunity.").

Blair v. City of Cleveland, 148 F. Supp.2d 919, 923 (N.D. Ohio 2000) ("While it is true that in order to hold the City liable, there must be proof that the officers violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights, the elements of proof required for suits against the City and individual defendants vary in other important respects. An example best illustrates the point. Plaintiffs contend that Officers Tankersley and Gibson violated Michael Pipkins' constitutional rights by using excessive force to effect his arrest. Plaintiffs also contend that the City may be held liable for the alleged violation, based upon a failure to train its officers in the proper use and/or avoidance of certain neck restraints. A reasonable jury could find that the officers did, indeed, use excessive force in violation of Pipkins' rights. However, assuming the officers succeed in their appeal of this court's order, it could be determined that a reasonable officer would not have known that his actions violated a clearly-established right, and that the officers are therefore immune. As indicated above, there is no such immunity to protect the City. Notwithstanding the officers' immunity, a jury could still find that the City violated Pipkins' constitutional rights by failing to adequately train its employees. Therefore, uncertainty as to whether Officers Tankersley and Gibson will be held immune to Plaintiffs' claims does not mandate that this court stay the trial of Plaintiffs' claims against the City. . . . Notwithstanding the court's decision to stay the trial of Plaintiffs' claims against Officers Tankersley and Gibson pending a resolution of their interlocutory appeal, it is in the interest of justice to proceed with the trial of Plaintiffs' claims against the City of Cleveland.").

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Fairley v. Fermaint, 482 F.3d 897, 901 (7th Cir. 2007) (on reh'g and reh'g en banc denied) ("We now hold, in accord with Behrens and Toeller, that a public official may appeal from an order conclusively denying a motion (based on qualified immunity) seeking summary judgment, whether or not the official has appealed from an order denying a motion to dismiss the complaint, and whether or not the motion for summary judgment rests on new legal or factual arguments. But once a conclusive resolution has been reached at either stage, a renewed motion for the same relief, or a belated request for reconsideration, does not reopen the time for appeal.")

May v. Sheahan, 226 F.3d 876, 879, 880 (7th Cir. 2000) ("Apostol v. Gallion, 870 F.2d 1335, 1337-38 (7th Cir.1989), held that a notice of appeal presumptively deprives the district court of jurisdiction to proceed with a trial on the merits of the claims on appeal. The Apostol court concluded that whether a public official asserting immunity should face a trial 'is precisely the aspect of the case involved in the appeal' because the ultimate question in a Forsyth appeal is whether a public official should have to undergo the burdens of litigation. . . In this appeal, we face the related but unresolved issue of whether a district court retains jurisdiction to allow proceedings short of trial to go forward during the pendency of a proper Forsyth appeal. . . . In the years since Apostol, the Supreme Court has made clear that a Forsyth appeal implicates more than just a public official's right to avoid a trial, it also protects a public official from burdensome pretrial proceedings, including, most notably, discovery. . . Thus, there can be no doubt that a Forsyth appeal divests a district court of the authority to order discovery or conduct other burdensome pretrial proceedings. But what about a district court's authority to accept an amended complaint? . . . . Allowing a plaintiff to alter the allegations in his or her complaint would have an obvious effect on a pending Forsyth appeal. . . . Moreover, allowing a plaintiff to file an amended complaint while a Forsyth appeal is pending does place a litigation burden on a defendant public official. . . . [D]epriving the district court of jurisdiction to accept an amended complaint during a Forsyth appeal will not forever prevent a plaintiff from amending his or her complaint, but it will give the court of appeals the opportunity to both pass on many of the allegations the plaintiff will likely end up relying on and offer guidance to the district court (and the parties) on the legal issues involved in the case. . . . If a district court certifies the appeal to be frivolous, it may proceed forward with the case despite the pendency of the appeal. . . Thus, district court proceedings need not be delayed by successive appeals that raise only issues previously decided. . . . [W]e conclude that a Forsyth appeal deprives a district court of jurisdiction to accept an amended complaint filed while the appeal is pending. Therefore, the amended complaints May filed while this appeal was pending are nullities and the complaint in effect when this appeal was filed, his original Amended Complaint, is the operative document. Accordingly, this appeal is not moot, and our jurisdiction is secure.").

Monfils v. Taylor, 165 F.3d 511, 518-20 (7th Cir. 1998) ("Because the jury trial proceeded while Taylor's appeal on the qualified immunity issue was pending, we are left with what turns out to be a thorny problem. We are dismayed that this case proceeded in a fashion which allowed this problem to arise. . . . [T]he fact is that everyone proceeded in this case as though Taylor's individual constitutional liability was not being tried. . . . It is true that at trial Taylor was not the subject of a jury question as to a substantive due process violation. But, in what is a very important concern, he was the only person whose conduct was used to attempt to establish a substantive due process violation against the City. And the City, with the same lawyer representing it who represented Taylor (and the other officers) on the negligence claim against him, vigorously argued that Taylor's actions did not violate Monfil's constitutional rights. The question submitted to the jury was:

Did the City of Green Bay violate the constitutional rights of Thomas Monfils not to be deprived of his life or liberty absent due process of law in one or more of the following ways:

C. Ratification of unconstitutional conduct on the part of Chief Deputy Taylor?

The answer was 'yes.' The jury could not have answered 'yes' to the question without concluding that Taylor violated Monfils' constitutional rights. And that is precisely the claim against him individually. The unique situation presented here puts us in the position of having to determine whether the individual claim against Taylor must be tried–which would really be a second trial of the issue, or whether the verdict question, which by necessity includes a finding that Taylor's conduct was unconstitutional, if supported by sufficient evidence, will allow us to bypass another trial. . . . [E]ven though the qualified immunity issue was on appeal, the fact of the matter is that Taylor's conduct was the subject of considerable attention during the trial. The individual constitutional claim against Taylor, given the very unusual circumstances of this case, was, for all intents and purposes, tried to this jury. And it was not only tried in a legalistic, technical sense; in reality, the issue was tried in full, for Taylor's lawyers argued that his conduct, in all respects, was blameless. In the unique circumstances of this case, we see a number of problems if the matter is now sent back to the district court for another trial (which would actually be a retrial) of the due process claim against Taylor individually. If the case against Taylor is tried again, a risk of inconsistent verdicts arises. We would also be running afoul of principles of judicial economy and, we think, fairness. We will, therefore, proceed to answer the as-yet unanswered question as to whether the evidence was sufficient for the jury to conclude that Taylor placed Monfils in a position of danger greater than he would otherwise have faced. . . . Weighing all the factors and, above all, emphasizing that our conclusion grows out of the unique posture of the case–a posture we recommend that district courts attempt to avoid in the future–we find, based on the principle of law of the case, that the jury's finding of 'unconstitutional conduct on the part of Chief Deputy Taylor'. . . is binding as to the claim against Taylor in his individual capacity.").

Chan v. Wodnicki, 67 F.3d 137, 139-40 (7th Cir. 1995) ("The first question presented by [defendant's] new motion is the status of the appeal from the denial of immunity after the stay is denied. . . . The second question is whether, even if [defendant's] claim of immunity is not moot, the appeal is moot because the denial of the stay allowed the trial to go forward, and the appeal was only from the decision of the district court to allow the trial to go forward. . . . The claim of immunity survives the denial of a stay. . . . The trial has not made his claim of immunity moot, for while the immunity is from trial as well as from judgment, by the same token it is from judgment as well as from trial. . . . The denial of the stay was a ruling merely on the equities of postponing trial, not on the merits of the appeal. We add that our conclusion . . .is in accordance with the only decision that we have found on the question. Langley v. Adams County, 987 F.2d 1473, 1477 (10th Cir.1993).).

Apostol v. Gallion, 870 F.2d 1335, 1338-39 (7th Cir. 1989) (Judge Easterbrook, concerned that defendants might invoke Forsyth appeals for purpose of delay, suggested that trial courts certify such appeals as frivolous and proceed with the trial. Faced with a finding of frivolousness by the district court, the defendant would have to seek a stay from the court of appeals in order to bring the trial to a halt. The district court must provide a reasoned finding to accompany its certification of frivolousness.).

Damiani v. Allen, No. 416CV00053RLYDML, 2018 WL 6505929, at *1 (S.D. Ind. Dec. 11, 2018) ("A district court may certify an appeal of qualified immunity as frivolous when the appeal is entirely baseless. . . This rule prevents defendants from seeking a tactical advantage by further delaying trial. . . However, the Seventh Circuit has admonished district courts that this power should be used sparingly. . . It is only reserved for the rare case in which the appeal is completely unfounded. . . The court declines to certify Trooper Allen's appeal as frivolous. Reasonable minds—often recently—have disagreed on when the law is clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, particularly in excessive force cases. . . And even where the facts are in dispute, officers may appeal a denial of qualified immunity 'to the extent it turns on an issue of law.'. . While the court is mindful that an appeal may work a hardship on Plaintiff, the court does not believe Trooper Allen's appeal is so thin that it warrants certification.")

Estate of Heenan ex rel. Heenan v. City of Madison, No. 13-CV-606-WMC, 2015 WL 3539613, at *2-4 (W.D. Wis. June 5, 2015) ("While Apostol recognizes a means to keep a trial involving a public official as defendant on track and avoid needless delays caused by meritless appeals, courts have been appropriately reluctant to enter such certifications. . . Indeed, the court found but a handful of examples of district courts certifying an interlocutory appeal from the denial of qualified immunity to the Seventh Circuit as frivolous or a sham, all of which have come from the Northern District of Illinois. . . The Western District of Wisconsin has been particularly reticent to provide such a certification, even when faced with appeals that appear to be without merit. . . Curiously, despite the rarity of such certifications, the Seventh Circuit routinely dismisses appeals from a denial of qualified immunity because it turns on factual disputes, like those at issue here, or finds the factual issues preclude qualified immunity altogether. . . . As counsel for Heimsness acknowledges in its response to plaintiff's motion and again at oral argument, in the fairly well-established limits on interlocutory appeals from denials of qualified immunity, the Seventh Circuit would have to find as a matter of law that an objectively reasonable police officer could have believed that Heenan, as a breaking and entering suspect, posed an imminent threat to Heimsness because he did not go down to the ground after Heimsness gave a single command to do so, at gunpoint and without identifying himself as a police officer, but instead advanced slowly towards Heimsness while flailing his arms around and swatting at him, despite also knowing that (as viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff):

• Heenan had just voluntarily disengaged from a physical exchange with the purported victim,
• the victim immediately, urgently and repeatedly shouted to Heimsness that the suspect was his "neighbor";
• Heenan was obviously, extremely intoxicated;
• Heenan had no visible weapon, including nothing in either hand;
• another officer was on the scene behind Heenan at the time of the shooting, prepared to provide support;
• Heimsness was successfully able to get a distance of between four to six feet between himself from Heenan by just employing a light push with Heimsness's non-dominant hand;
• in response to this push, Heenan stumbled and fell backward until hitting a light pole; and
• Heimsness then shot Heenan from a distance of between four to six feet as Heenan was then crouched against the pole, unable to retreat further.

Although Heimsness's counsel represents an intent to abide by these facts on appeal. . . , they repeatedly failed to do so in written submissions and arguments to this court on summary judgment. . . Moreover, if the facts are interpreted in favor of plaintiff, the court is hard-pressed to see any merit in defendant's appeal for reasons addressed at length in this court's summary judgment decision. Still, whatever 'frivolous' may mean in this context, it is an even lower bar than an appeal 'without merit.'. . Accordingly, the court remains reticent to deny Heimsness one of the intended benefits of qualified immunity—avoiding an unnecessary trial—by certifying the appeal as frivolous. This case illustrates a perplexing dynamic. On the one hand, a public official is generally entitled to bring an interlocutory appeal from the denial of qualified immunity and to a complete stay of the proceedings, except in rare circumstances where the district court certifies such an appeal as frivolous. Even then, the Seventh Circuit is likely to grant an emergency stay. . . On the other hand, it is the fairly common practice of the Seventh Circuit to dismiss qualified immunity appeals for lack of jurisdiction where the determination ultimately depends on disputes of fact. Moreover, despite the Apostol decision being now more than 25 years old, district courts and summarily the Seventh Circuit have seldom, seriously considered its application to require trials to proceed without a full appeal on a claim of qualified immunity. Even so, unless the Seventh Circuit advises that the standard by which district courts should deem appeals of denials of qualified immunity 'frivolous' or 'sham' are different from their ordinary meaning, this court must decline to find that defendant Heimsness or his counsel have acted in bad faith by appealing this court's summary judgment decision, however likely it believes remand will ultimately be required. Instead, the court can only bolster plaintiff's view that a lengthy stay while waiting for the resolution of a marginal appeal will inevitably prejudice the parties and the court by requiring a completely new ramp up for a trial that is now less than three weeks away, not to mention impose an added burden on Mr. Heenan's parents, other relatives and friends who are still awaiting their day in court. At minimum, it would seem a good practice to consider expediting an interlocutory appeal under these circumstances.")

Trombetta v. Bd. of Education, Proviso Township High School District 209, No. 02 C 5895, 2004 WL 868265, at *3, *4 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 22, 2004) ("The law is clear that a suspension of proceedings due to a particular defendant's immunity-related appeal does not operate as a stay on the remainder of the case, at least so long as the rest of the case is properly severed. The Seventh Circuit has recently recognized that the divestiture of jurisdiction that applies following an interlocutory appeal on immunity grounds is 'limited' and that the trial court has authority to proceed with portions of the case 'not related to the claims on appeal, such as claims against other defendants.' May v. Sheahan, 226 F .3d 876, 880 n. 2 (7th Cir.2000). There may be, as the court indicated in May, prudential reasons why a trial court may not wish to proceed with trial as to non-immune defendants when other defendants have a pending appeal. In that case, the court cited to Monfils v. Taylor, 165 F.3d 511, 519 (7th Cir.1998), upon which defendants also rely in their motion for reconsideration. But the considerations that were at issue in Monfils do not apply in this case, at least not to any significant extent. First, the Court has no intention of submitting to the jury in this case special interrogatories asking them to determine if any particular Board member violated the constitution, a key problem identified by the Seventh Circuit in Monfils. And in this case unlike in Monfils, determination of the District's liability will not necessarily be based on the conduct of any particular Board member, or even on the conduct of any Board member at all: Jackson, who has no pending immunity appeal, remains as a defendant in the case. In sum, unlike in Monfils, the Court has been given no persuasive reason why the rest of the case should await the appeal's termination. Thus even if defendants' request for a continuance were timely, it would be without merit.").

Manning v. Dye, No. 02 C 372, 2003 WL 21704431, at *1, *2 (N.D. Ill. July 22, 2003) (not reported) ("Under ordinary circumstances, the filing of a notice of appeal on an immunity issue divests the district court of jurisdiction to proceed on the claims against the defendant claiming immunity . . .But this does not occur if the appeal is 'baseless,' and the district court so finds. . . . Only those appeals that are 'unfounded' meet the standard. . . . Having considered the issue, this Court concludes that Miller and Buchan's appeal is indeed baseless and that a stay of the case pending the appeal is not warranted. . . . [Manning's] claim is premised on a violation of Brady v.

Maryland, 373 U.S. 63 (1963), based on Miller and Buchan's failure to disclose exculpatory and impeaching information–specifically the fact that they had induced Dye to frame Manning and their knowledge he was lying. More importantly for present purposes, Miller and Buchan's argument is foreclosed by two recent decisions issued by the same court to which they are taking their appeal. Specifically, the extension of Briscoe and House that would be required to confer immunity on Miller and Buchan was squarely rejected by the Seventh Circuit in Ienco v. City of Chicago, 286 F.3d 994, 1000 (7th Cir.2002), which preceded our ruling in this case, and again in Newsome v. McCabe, 319 F.3d 301, 304 (7th Cir.2003), which followed our ruling by about three weeks. . . . In short, the Seventh Circuit would have to overrule both Ienco and Newsome, two recent and carefully considered decisions, in order for Miller and Buchan to prevail. Under the circumstances, their appeal on the absolute immunity issue is baseless as Apostol and McMath use that term."). [See also Manning v. Miller, 355 F.3d 1028 (7th Cir. 2004)]

Ruffino v. Sheahan, 61 F. Supp.2d 767, (N.D. Ill. 1999) ("Fortunately, the generally automatic stay that results from the appeal of a denial of qualified immunity may be denied when the legal issue the defendant has raised is 'frivolous.' . . . The court finds that this is just such an extreme and unusual case. As to the merits of the legal issue defendant raises, the court finds that defendant's position is so unsupportable that his appeal to the Seventh Circuit can only be another dilatory tactic to avoid bringing this matter to trial.), aff'd, 218 F.3d 697 (7th Cir. 2000).

Vidmar v. City of Chicago, No. 98 C 0951, 1999 WL 409929, at 3-5 & n.5 (N.D. Ill. June 7, 1999) (not reported) ("The linch pin to defendant Mingo's ability to obtain a stay is whether the interlocutory appeal on the qualified immunity issue is, as the Apostol court put it, 'a proper Forsythe [sic] appeal.' Mindful of the substantial costs exacted by a stay of trial court proceedings pending the determination of a qualified immunity appeal, the Seventh Circuit has authorized district courts to deny a request for a stay when the appeal is so thin as to be 'frivolous.'. . In that event, the district court may explain its view that the appeal is frivolous and 'get on with the trial.'. . The Seventh Circuit cautioned that this authority 'must be used with restraint,' but emphasized that used judiciously 'it may be valuable in cutting short the deleterious effects of unfounded appeals.'. . . As this Court held in ruling on the qualified immunity issue, plaintiff has asserted a violation of a federal constitutional right (the right, as a white individual, to be free from racial discrimination), and has also met his burden of showing that this right was clearly established at the time of defendant Mingo's challenged conduct in 1997. Defendant Mingo's submission in support of his request for a stay offers no argument or authority that defendant Mingo would not have known that to take action against a white employee for racially motivated reasons was impermissible. . . . The Court thus concludes that defendant Mingo's appeal of the qualified immunity issue is so thin on the merits that it is 'frivolous' as that term was used by the Seventh Circuit in the Apostol decision. . . . In these circumstances, to permit the appeal to delay plaintiff's trial against not only defendant Mingo but against the Board as well is unwarranted. . . . This Court believes that if a stay of proceedings were granted for defendant Mingo, the Court also would be obliged to stay the proceedings against the Board. The jury's determination of defendant Mingo's reasons for his actions would be critical to the Board's liability vel non under Title VII. Allowing the action to proceed to trial against the Board, while proceedings were stayed against defendant Mingo pending appeal, thus could create the same complex situation that 'dismayed' the Seventh Circuit in Monfils v. Taylor . . . .").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Rodriguez v. County of Los Angeles, 891 F.3d 776, 790-92 (9th Cir. 2018) ("Recognizing the importance of avoiding uncertainty and waste, but concerned that the appeals process might be abused to run up an adversary's costs or to delay trial, we have authorized the district court to go forward in appropriate cases by certifying that an appeal is frivolous or waived. . . 'In the absence of such certification,' however, 'the district court is automatically divested' of its authority 'to proceed with trial pending appeal.'. . .Unlike defects in constitutional or statutory jurisdiction, which deprive a court of the power to act and thus void actions taken while jurisdiction was lacking, . . . an error in following our circuit's divestiture procedure does not entirely eliminate the authority of the district court to hear a case. . . . [W]e conclude that the actions taken in the district court in violation of Chuman require reversal only if the error was prejudicial. We do not ignore the significance of the error of proceeding to trial in this case while the interlocutory appeal was pending. . . . We nonetheless conclude that the error was harmless here as well. We begin with the premise that 'a defendant, entitled to invoke a qualified immunity defense, may not appeal a district court's summary judgment order insofar as that order determines whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a 'genuine' issue of fact for trial.'. . We may exercise jurisdiction over issues that do not require resolution of factual disputes, including in cases where officers argue that they have qualified immunity, assuming the facts most favorable to the plaintiff. . . Here, during the pendency of the qualified immunity appeal, we issued a show cause order inviting appellants to identify the issues, if any, over which we had jurisdiction. Appellants' response failed to identify issues over which we would have had jurisdiction. Instead, appellants either relied on disputed facts or made conclusory assertions insufficient to show that they had a colorable claim to qualified immunity even if all inferences were drawn in appellees' favor. . . .Appellants thus failed to show cause why we should not have dismissed the interlocutory appeal of the immunity ruling by the district court for lack of jurisdiction, though the trial started before we issued a ruling to that effect. Though we initially concluded that the jurisdictional issue was not suitable for summary disposition, further review reveals that appellants' interlocutory appeal was frivolous. It is thus clear that the district court's error was harmless.").

Chuman v. Wright, 960 F.2d 104, 105 (9th Cir. 1992) ("[U]nder the Apostol rule, a district court may certify in writing that the appeal is frivolous or waived. Without such certification, the trial is automatically delayed until disposition of the appeal. . . This circuit has addressed the issue of the effect of appeals from interlocutory orders in a closely related context. In an appeal from the denial of a motion to dismiss on the basis of double jeopardy, as in a qualified immunity appeal, the issue to be addressed by the court is whether the defendant will be forced to appear at trial. United States v. LaMere, 951 F.2d 1106, 1108 (9th Cir.1991). The court in LaMere adopted a 'dual jurisdiction' rule wherein 'an appeal from the denial of a frivolous ... motion [to dismiss based on double jeopardy] does not divest the district court of jurisdiction to proceed with trial, if the district court has found the motion to be frivolous'. . . This court now adopts the rule set forth in LaMere in the context of interlocutory qualified immunity appeals. Should the district court find that the defendants' claim of qualified immunity is frivolous or has been waived, the district court may certify, in writing, that defendants have forfeited their right to pretrial appeal, and may proceed with trial. . . In the absence of such certification, the district court is automatically divested of jurisdiction to proceed with trial pending appeal. Because the district court did not certify this interlocutory appeal as frivolous or forfeited, the district court is automatically divested of jurisdiction to proceed with trial.")

Kendrick v. County of San Diego, No. 15CV2615-GPC(AGS), 2018 WL 3361354, at *1–2, *4 (S.D. Cal. July 10, 2018) ("An appeal of an order denying qualified immunity 'normally divests the district court of jurisdiction to proceed with trial[;]' however, under the Ninth Circuit's decision in Chuman v. Wright, 960 F.2d 104, 105 (9th Cir. 1992), a district court 'may certify the appeal as frivolous and may then proceed with trial[.]'. . Under Chuman, '[s]hould the district court find that the defendants' claim of qualified immunity is frivolous,' it 'may certify, in writing, that defendants have forfeited their right to pretrial appeal, and may proceed with trial.'. . If a district court certifies an appeal as frivolous, the defendant may then apply to the Ninth Circuit for a discretionary stay. . . 'An appeal is frivolous if it is wholly without merit.'. . A qualified immunity claim is frivolous if it 'is unfounded, so baseless that it does not invoke appellate jurisdiction.'. . An appeal of qualified immunity defense may not be made based on whether there are genuine issues of material fact at issue. . .Plaintiff argues that as to Deputy Block, Defendants' appeal is frivolous as the Court properly denied qualified immunity based on clearly established law under George v. Morris, 736 F.3d 829 (9th Cir. 2013). As to the unreasonable seizure claim by Cynthia, Plaintiff argues that the case of Maxwell v. Cnty. of San Diego, 708 F.3d 1075 (9th Cir. 2013) put the individual defendants on notice that their actions would violate the Fourth Amendment. Defendants do not substantively challenge the denial of qualified immunity as to Deputy Block. Instead, they primarily argue that the Court's order on qualified immunity as to the seven individual Defendant deputies and detectives who conducted an investigation after the incident are entitled to a separate determination that the law governing their actions was clearly established. They assert that the Court failed to consider the action of each person individually based on the facts known to each of them so it was 'obvious to all reasonable governmental actors, in the defendant's place, that what he is doing violates the federal law.'. . They argue that the seven deputies accused of an unlawful detention all acted based on different information and at different times. . . In reply, Plaintiff argues that Defendants' argument is a red herring as their argument relates to the sufficiency of the evidence and not a legal issue falling within the appellate court's limited jurisdiction to hear an interlocutory appeal challenging a denial of qualified immunity. . . .The Court recognizes that clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of each individual defendant. . . However, officers in the subsequent chain of the alleged seizure may also rely on the conduct of prior officers that proper procedures were followed. . . Therefore, as to the seven individual defendants on the unreasonable seizure claim by Cynthia Kendrick, the Court concludes the appeal is not frivolous and declines to certify it as such under Chuman. On the issue of excessive force by Deputy Block, the Court disagrees with Defendants and concludes it is clearly established by the Ninth Circuit ruling in George v. Morris, 736 F.3d 829 (9th Cir. 2013) that Deputy Block's conduct, relying on Plaintiff's version of the facts, was a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Therefore, Defendants' appeal of the qualified immunity ruling concerning Deputy Block is frivolous. Because the facts underlying the qualified immunity analyses are intertwined as to all the Defendants, the case will be stayed pending resolution of the interlocutory appeal in order to conserve judicial resources.")

Estate of Anastacio Hernandez-Rojas v. United States, No. 11CV522 L (DHB), 2015 WL 9592533, at *3-4 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 31, 2015) ("In their summary judgment motions, defendants contended that qualified immunity bars plaintiff's First Amended retaliation claim because only the Fourth Amendment governs the use of force during an arrest. In Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1988), the Court provided that 'all claims that law enforcement officers have used excessive force – deadly or not – in the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other "seizure" of a free citizen should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment ....'. . . The Court however found that plaintiffs' retaliation claim alleged a First Amendment violation relying on Skoog v. County of Clackamas, 469 F.3d 1221, 1232 (9th Cir. 2006) and Ford v. City of Yakima, 706 F.3d 1188, 1193 (9th Cir. 2013). Further, the Court found that the right based on retaliation was clearly established. This is the type of legal issue that is appropriate to be taken on appeal in the area of qualified immunity, i.e. it is an 'abstract issu[e] of law' relating to qualified immunity. Accordingly, the Court finds that the appeal of plaintiffs' first amendment retaliation claim is appropriately taken at this time. . . . Because at least one issue on appeal is appropriately before the Court of Appeals, the Court finds that defendants' appeal is not frivolous. As an appeal divests the district court of jurisdiction, defendants' motion to stay is redundant: the case is stayed pending a decision from the appellate court.")

Gilbaugh v. Balzer, No. Civ. 99-1576-AS, 2001 WL 34041845, at *1 (D. Ore. Sept. 6, 2001) (not reported) ("Presently before the court is Plaintiff's Motion for Certification that Defendants' Appeal is Frivolous. The court agrees that Plaintiff has not presented any evidence that Peter Gilbaugh did not grab for Balzer's gun just before he was shot. However, the conflicts in the evidence noted in the opinion call the Officer's credibility into question. Accordingly, an issue exists with regard to whether Officer Balzer's statement that Gilbaugh grabbed for his gun, which is the sole piece of evidence on that issue, is credible. The Ninth Circuit has clearly held that any genuine issue of material fact concerning the underlying historical facts bars a finding of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. Sinaloa Lake Owners Ass'n v. City of Simi Valley, 70 F.3d 1095, 1099 (9th Cir.1995). The court finds that Defendants' appeal of this ruling is not well founded. Plaintiff's motion (75) to certify the appeal as frivolous is GRANTED.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Burke v. Regalado, 935 F.3d 960, 1002-03 (10th Cir. 2019) ("By failing to raise the issue of qualified immunity in his Rule 50(a) or 50(b) motions, Sheriff Glanz waived any argument for qualified immunity on appeal. . . . Sheriff Glanz failed to preserve a qualified immunity argument based on the trial evidence because he did not raise it in a post-trial motion. At the close of evidence, the Sheriffs jointly moved for judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(a). They argued Ms. Burke's evidence has not supported the cause of action' under § 1983 and the evidence at most could establish 'medical malpractice.'. . The motion did not mention qualified immunity. After trial, the Sheriffs filed a joint motion under Rule 59(a) asking the court to order a new trial or reduce the compensatory damages verdict based on inflammatory statements made during Ms. Burke's counsel's closing argument. The motion did not reference any arguments made in the Sheriffs' Rule 50(a) motion. It also did not mention qualified immunity. Sheriff Glanz's separate motion under Rules 50(b) and 59(a) likewise did not address qualified immunity. Thus, at no point after the district court's summary judgment decision did Sheriff Glanz renew his request for qualified immunity. Although Sheriff Glanz, by filing a Rule 50(b) motion, did more than the defendants in either Ortiz or Copar Pumice, he did not address qualified immunity. He preserved his argument that there was insufficient trial evidence of a constitutional violation. But he did not argue for qualified immunity. As a result, he has waived any qualified immunity argument on appeal.")

Martinez v. Mares, 613 F. App'x 731, 735 & nn. 8 &9 (10th Cir. 2015) ("After Defendants filed their notice of appeal from the partial denial of summary judgment, Mr. and Ms. Martinez asked the district court to certify the appeal as frivolous so it could retain jurisdiction and proceed with the case. . . The district court granted the motion, concluding the appeal was frivolous because it challenged 'the Court's decision, not because of the Court's application of the facts to the governing law (which would be a permissible basis for interlocutory appeal), but rather because [Defendants] do not agree with the way the Court resolved certain factual issues.'[8] [fn8 Defendants claim in their opening brief that their appeal is not frivolous. If the district court's frivolousness certification were improper, Defendants might argue that any actions taken by the district court in the absence of a proper frivolousness certification should be vacated for lack of jurisdiction. See Stewart v. Donges, 915 F.2d 572, 579 (10th Cir.1990) . . . . But here, Defendants have not identified any action taken by the district court after their notice of appeal was filed. . . Accordingly, we need not consider whether the district court properly retained jurisdiction.] As a result, the district court retained jurisdiction over the case, which is proceeding in the district court.[9] [fn. 9 The fact that the district court certified the appeal as frivolous does not affect our jurisdiction. Instead, the case may proceed in both forums, with the district and appellate courts exercising concurrent jurisdiction.]")

Walker v. City of Orem, 451 F.3d 1139,1146, 1147, 1152 (10th Cir. 2006) ("Did, then, the district court retain the power after the appeal was filed to rule in favor of the officers on qualified immunity? We think not. The filing of the notice of appeal was an event of jurisdictional significance, which divested the district court from granting further relief concerning the issues on appeal. . . We see no reason to depart from this rule, even where the relief granted favored the appealing party. . . This does not mean that a party, having filed a notice of appeal from the denial of a motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity, has no option but to await the outcome of the appeal if facts subsequently emerge that it believes demonstrate its entitlement to summary judgment. An appealing party in that situation may seek to abate the appeal while requesting that we remand to the district court for consideration of a summary judgment motion. The officers have filed no such motions in this case, however, and our decision in their favor on their appeal from the motion to dismiss makes it unnecessary to consider whether we could or should grant such an abatement and remand nunc pro tunc. . . . [T]he officers' qualified immunity appeals [did not] divest the district court from determining whether the Sheriff's Office was entitled to summary judgment. The appeals only divested the district court of jurisdiction over claims against the individual officers.").

Langley v. Adams County, Colorado, 987 F.2d 1473, 1477 (10th Cir. 1993) (Plaintiff misconstrues the purpose and effect of the Stewart certification procedure. In Stewart [v. Donges, 915 F.2d 572, 577-78 (10th Cir. 1990)], we recognized that ordinarily the filing of a notice of appeal 'divests the district court of its control over those aspects of the case involved in the appeal.'. . . Because this divestiture of jurisdiction is subject to abuse and can unreasonably delay trial, we recognized in Stewart a procedure by which a district court may maintain jurisdiction over a defendant if the court certifies that the defendant's appeal is frivolous. . . Once a district court so certifies a qualified immunity appeal as frivolous and thus regains jurisdiction, that does not affect our jurisdiction.").

Gallegos v. City and County of Denver, 984 F.2d 358, 362 (10th Cir. 1993) ("Defendants' appeal in this case is not from an order of the district court denying summary judgment based on qualified immunity, but rather from an order denying summary judgment and postponing a decision on the qualified immunity question until trial. [cite omitted] In essence, the district court in this case is requiring the defendants to go to trial before determining whether or not they are entitled to qualified immunity. This illustrates the kind of undermining of the purpose of qualified immunity which the Supreme Court seeks to avoid in Harlow and Mitchell.").

Workman v. Jordan, 958 F.2d 332, 335-36 (10th Cir. 1992) (if court allows limited discovery to develop or clarify facts needed to rule on immunity claim and defers decision on immunity, such order is not immediately appealable; if court postpones decision on qualified immunity until trial, order is appealable).

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Olson v. Stewart, 240 F.Supp.3d 1251, 1252-53 (N.D. Fla. 2017) ("This appeal raises only the issue of whether I have properly construed the record. This is not and should not be an immediately appealable issue. . .Deciding whether any appeal should be dismissed is of course the province of the Eleventh Circuit, not of this court. The Eleventh Circuit will not rule on its jurisdiction prior to the trial date. So the stay issue must be addressed while the appeal is pending. Deputy Whitfield says he has an absolute right to a stay pending appeal. That is not so. Three factors cut against granting a stay, and one cuts in favor. . . First, the case is ready for trial. If the case is not stayed, the factual disputes will be tried to a jury within six weeks. The jury will be properly instructed. The jury will determine the actual facts; the jury will not be required to accept as true one side's version. At that point, we will know whether Ms. Olson complied with the deputies' instructions, as she says, or disobeyed a deputy's instruction, as the defendants say. As a practical matter, it is likely that the verdict will settle the matter and that the Eleventh Circuit will never have to deal with the case at all. That is what happens in most cases of this kind that are tried in this court without interruption by an interlocutory appeal. . . Second, if the case is stayed pending appeal, then no matter which side wins the appeal, it is likely that the case will still have to be tried. This is so because there are state-law claims against the Sheriff for which there is no qualified-immunity defense. If the case is stayed and the Eleventh Circuit eventually resolves the appeal for Ms. Olson, nothing related to the merits will have changed. The trial that goes forward on remand (a year or more in the future) will be precisely the same as the trial that could take place in six weeks. The one thing that will have changed is the cost of the litigation—the defendants will have paid much more in fees, and Ms. Olson's attorney will have a much larger contingent fee claim. If, on the other hand, the case is stayed and the Eleventh Circuit resolves the appeal for Deputy Whitfield based only on qualified immunity—the issue that purportedly justifies the appeal—the claims against the Sheriff will still have to be tried. The trial will be identical to the trial that could take place in six weeks. All the same witnesses will testify, and the jury will resolve the same factual disputes. The damages issues will be the same. The only change will be that Ms. Olson will be unable to recover attorney's fees if she wins. To be sure, the Eleventh Circuit could resolve the appeal for Deputy Whitfield on the basis that the arrest and use of force were not unconstitutional—not just on the basis of qualified immunity. If, as is likely, any such ruling also controlled the state-law issues, this would end the case. Note, though, that the justification for an immediate appeal is the purported need for a prompt ruling on the issue of qualified immunity, not on the underlying constitutional issue. Allowing an interlocutory appeal so that the underlying constitutional issue can be resolved makes no more sense here than in any other kind of federal case. Indeed, allowing an interlocutory appeal so that the underlying constitutional issue can be resolved runs afoul of an even more important principle: federal courts should decide constitutional issues only when necessary to resolve an actual dispute. . . This principle counsels against unnecessarily resolving constitutional disputes on hypothetical facts—'facts' determined by artificially resolving disputes in favor of the nonmoving party. If the case is not stayed, in six weeks we will know the actual facts, and if appellate review is still needed at all, the Eleventh Circuit will address any constitutional issues on the actual facts. . . The purported justification for an immediate appeal of any order denying qualified immunity is the need to protect an individual public officer from remaining in a case—and thus having his personal assets at risk—longer than necessary. Qualified immunity is immunity from suit, not just immunity from liability. The purported justification misses the mark here for two reasons. First, the appeal, even if successful, will keep Deputy Whitfield in the case longer; the appeal will not get him out of the case sooner. Second, Deputy Whitfield's personal assets are only superficially at risk. He has coverage for these claims from the same fund that covers the Sheriff. As a practical matter, Deputy Whitfield has no skin in the game. Deputy Whitfield is represented by the same attorney who represents the Sheriff. There is no separation—not a single ray of light—between the interests of the Sheriff and Deputy Whitfield. The law allows interlocutory appeals in qualified-immunity cases in some circumstances, and Deputy Whitfield is entitled to assert that this appeal qualifies. The Sheriff, though, is entitled neither to appeal nor to insist that the claims against him be delayed. . . That brings us to the one factor that cuts in favor of a stay. The defendants have asked for it, and Ms. Olson has consented. In the past, the Eleventh Circuit has accepted jurisdiction in most qualified-immunity appeals. Denying a consented motion to stay at this point would do more harm than good, because the attorneys would have to prepare for a trial while seeking a stay in the Eleventh Circuit. The circuit might well grant a stay shortly before the trial. Trying cases is difficult enough without that kind of last-minute confusion. As a matter of discretion, and with considerable misgivings, I conclude that the balance favors granting a stay. . . This is a case study on how not to run a railroad. In the federal judiciary, we generally do an excellent job of resolving disputes correctly in accordance with the law—when we finally get around to resolving them. But the process takes too long and costs too much. We bemoan the disappearing trial, but we adopt procedures that cause delays and increase costs, making it harder and harder to actually resolve factual disputes through trials. This case is an illustration. The case is ready for trial and could be resolved correctly, based on the actual facts, within six weeks. Instead, the case will now be delayed, probably for a year or more, awaiting an appellate ruling on hypothetical facts. The appellate ruling, if it ultimately makes any difference at all, probably will affect only the issue of attorney's fees, not resolution of the underlying dispute on the merits. This will happen based on the demonstrably false assertion that it will more quickly exonerate a party who has no skin in the game. As I said, a case study on how not to run a railroad. The events at issue occurred in less than an hour on December 8, 2012. Ms. Olson filed suit nearly three years later, on November 22, 2015. The case is finally ready for trial. There is no good reason for further delay. But the circumstances have conspired against good case management.") [See also Olson v. Stewart, 737 F.3d 478, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he District Court did rule that, even if Deputy Whitfield is entitled to qualified immunity on Ms. Olson's separately-pled excessive force claim, his use of force would remain relevant to the amount of damages Ms. Olson might recover on her false arrest claims. This comports with our Circuit precedent. See Bashir v. Rockdale Cty., 445 F.3d 1323, 1332 (11th Cir. 2006) ("[T]he damages recoverable on an unlawful arrest claim include damages suffered because of the use of force in effecting the arrest.") . . .The District Court correctly denied qualified immunity to Deputy Whitfield on Ms. Olson's false arrest claims and correctly ruled that Ms. Olson may recover damages for the force Deputy Whitfield used during her arrest.")]

Owens v. Alabama Dept. of Mental Health and Mental Retardation, No. 2:07cv650-WHA, 2008 WL 4722038, at *2, *3 (M.D. Ala. Oct. 24, 2008) ("At no time has the court either denied the defense of qualified immunity, denied the right to raise the defense of qualified immunity, or indicated that it will not rule on the defense now that it has been raised. Instead, the court has merely allowed the Plaintiffs time in which to file a response to the motion on the merits, and the court has every intention of considering the Second Motion for Summary Judgment in due course. It may well be that some, or all, of the Defendants will be found entitled to qualified immunity. The court is well-aware that a non-frivolous appeal of a denial of qualified immunity divests this court of jurisdiction over federal constitutional claims against individual defendants. . . The Defendants' Notice of Appeal is not a non-frivolous appeal. In evaluating the Motion to Stay Proceedings, the court finds helpful the analysis of the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals in Apostol v. Gallion, 870 F.2d 1335 (7th Cir.1989), a case cited favorably by the Eleventh Circuit on two occasions. See Blinco v. Green Tree Servicing, LLC, 366 F.3d 1249, 1252 (11th Cir.2004); Skrtich v. Thornton, 280 F.3d 1295, 1306 (11th Cir.2002). . . . This court is persuaded by this reasoning and concludes that the appeal from the Order denying a motion to shorten time is frivolous because the Defendants have forfeited their right to a pre-trial determination of the merits of their motion through their manipulative, and delaying, tactics. If this case is not one in which Defendants have forfeited their right to pre-trial determination of qualified immunity , then the right can never be forfeited. The court will, therefore, deny the Emergency Motion to Stay. The court will further certify, in accordance with Apostol, that the appeal is frivolous and taken for the purpose of delay. The court notes that this decision has no impact on the Defendants' continued right to assert qualified immunity from judgment at trial, and the court has every intention of ruling on that defense in due course.").

Davenport v. City of Columbus, GA, No. 4:06-CV-150 (CDL), 2008 WL 3871729, at *4 (M.D. Ga. Aug. 18, 2008) ("Defendants now appear to argue that a reasonable officer in Boren's shoes would have taken the same actions absent any retaliatory motive and that Boren should therefore receive qualified immunity. However, the objective reasonableness of Boren's actions is irrelevant where, as here, sufficient evidence exists for a jury to disbelieve Boren's proffered nonretaliatory reasons (i.e., his 'reasonable' reasons) and find that his sole motivation was retaliatory. The Court has not found that Boren is not entitled to qualified immunity. The jury may very well find that Plaintiff's version of the facts is not true. In that case, Boren will be entitled to qualified immunity. However, because genuine issues of material fact exist, that determination is premature and cannot be made based upon the pretrial record. Thus, finding that genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether Boren retaliated against Plaintiff because of her complaints of race discrimination and further finding that if such retaliation occurred it would be a clear violation of § 1981, the Court denied Boren's motion for summary judgment on his qualified immunity defense. . . The issue presently before the Court is not whether its rulings on Defendants' motions for summary judgment were erroneous. The issue is whether those rulings are immediately appealable. Since those rulings denied summary judgment on the qualified immunity defenses based upon the finding of genuine issues of material fact, it is clear that those rulings are not immediately appealable. In light of the clearly established legal precedent on this issue, Defendants have no reasonable expectation to believe that such rulings are immediately appealable. Accordingly, Plaintiff's right to her day in court should be delayed no longer, and Defendants' motion for a stay must be, and is hereby, denied.").

Rigdon v. Georgia Bd. of Regents, No. CV406-240, 2008 WL 2986389, at *2 (S.D. Ga. Aug. 4, 2008) ("It is proper . . . for the district court to stay proceedings pending appeal of a denial of immunity. . . But the district court may also 'declare that the appeal is frivolous, and if it is the district court may carry on with the case.'").

Andre v. Castor, 963 F. Supp. 1169, 1169-71 (N.D. Fla. 1997) ("The plaintiff . . . asks this Court to certify to the Court of Appeals that the defendants' qualified immunity appeal is 'frivolous.' She argues that there is simply nothing for the defendants to appeal, in that the Court deferred ruling on the defense of qualified immunity until the record was more developed. The defendants contend that this Court lacks jurisdiction to make such a certification and, even if it had jurisdiction, the defendants have advanced a colorable claim of immunity. The plaintiffs request is, apparently, one of first impression for both this district and this circuit. . . . This Court concludes that, contrary to the defendants' argument, it has power to certify as 'frivolous' and 'for purposes of delay' a notice of appeal based on qualified immunity. . . . [T]he only arguable basis for the defendants' appeal is the Court's decision to defer, rather than rule, on the issue of qualified immunity. A decision to defer ruling is, by definition, not 'final,' 'conclusive,' or 'important.' [citing Johnson v. Jones] . . . . As such, the Court finds no arguable basis in law or fact for the defendants' notice of appeal from its order. . . . Rather, the only plausible motivation behind the notice of appeal is delay. The stated basis of the Court's decision to defer ruling was the defendants' representation in open court that they would soon be filing a motion for summary judgment on the defense of qualified immunity. . . . Even if the defendants were to convince the circuit court that this Court erred in its decision to defer ruling on whether the complaint alleges a violation of clearly established law, the appellate remedy would be a remand to this Court with directions to rule on the issue. The Eleventh Circuit would lack jurisdiction to render an original order on the merits of the defendants' claim to immunity. . . . Having certified that the defendants' notice of appeal is frivolous, the Court orders the parties to continue discovery in this case. . . during the pendency of appeal. Dispositive motions and trial, however, will be stayed pending resolution of the appeal.").
