James v. New Jersey State Police, 957 F.3d 165, 168-73 (3d Cir. 2020), reh'g and reh'g en banc denied sub nom Gibbons v. New Jersdy State Police, 969 F.3d 419 (3d Cir. 2020), cert. denied sub nom James v. Bartelt, 142 S. Ct. 4 (2021) ("We will not review the District Court's holding that Trooper Bartelt may have violated a constitutional right—the first prong of qualified immunity. The District Court based this holding on its conclusion that 'genuine issues of disputed fact' existed, but it did not identify these disputed facts. . . To the extent that the District Court is correct that these unstated facts are material to the inquiry, we lack jurisdiction under the collateral-order doctrine to review its holding on this prong. . . Thus, we will assume without deciding that Trooper Bartelt violated one of Gibbons's constitutional rights and proceed to qualified immunity's second prong. . . . On appeal, Trooper Bartelt argues that he did not violate a clearly established right. We agree because, at the time, no Supreme Court precedent, Third Circuit precedent, or robust consensus of persuasive authority had held that 'an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Trooper Bartelt] ... violated the Fourth Amendment.' . . Because the events here occurred on May 25, 2011, we will consider only precedents that clearly established rights as of that date. . . .First, we consider whether Trooper Bartelt violated a right that was clearly established by Supreme Court precedent. . . He did not. The closest factually analogous Supreme Court precedent, Kisela v. Hughes, . . . is instructive. . . . Many of the same distinguishing facts are present here: (1) Gibbons was armed with a gun; (2) Gibbons ignored Trooper Bartelt's orders to drop his gun; (3) Gibbons was easily within range to shoot Troopers Bartelt or Conza; and (4) the situation unfolded in 'seconds.'. .In sum, Trooper Bartelt did not violate a right that had been clearly established by Supreme Court precedent. . . . Next, we consider whether Trooper Bartelt violated a right that had been clearly established by Third Circuit precedent. None of our relevant precedents present a sufficiently similar factual scenario at the 'high "degree of specificity"' that Supreme Court precedent requires. . . So we conclude that he did not. . . . Three factual differences lead us to conclude that Trooper Bartelt did not violate a clearly established right. First, Trooper Bartelt's pre-standoff knowledge of Gibbons differs from the Bennett officer's pre-standoff knowledge of the suspect. Trooper Bartelt was aware of several facts from which he could reasonably conclude that Gibbons posed a threat to others. . . .Second, Gibbons was much closer to and less compliant with Trooper Bartelt than the suspect in Bennett. . . .Third, Trooper Bartelt's standoff with Gibbons lasted only moments, unlike the nearly hour-long standoff in Bennett. Trooper Bartelt's interaction with Gibbons was over within seconds of his arrival on the scene. He necessarily 'had mere seconds to assess the potential danger' posed by the armed and non-compliant Gibbons. . . . For these reasons, although Bennett may be the most analogous precedent from our Court, its holding does not '"squarely govern[ ]" the specific facts at issue' here. . . And because no other Third Circuit precedent is factually analogous to this case, we conclude that Trooper Bartelt did not violate a clearly established right under our precedent. . . .The caselaw of our sister circuits prohibits the use of deadly force against non-threatening suspects, even when they are armed and suicidal. . . But none of the cases that stand for this general principle involve the 'high "degree of specificity"' required to clearly establish a right under the circumstances Trooper Bartelt faced.")

But see James v. Bartelt, 142 S. Ct. 4 (2021) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) ("On May 24, 2011, Willie Gibbons was shot and killed by a police officer. It is undisputed that the officer who shot him knew that Gibbons suffered from a mental illness and that he was holding a gun to his own temple. It is also undisputed that Gibbons never threatened the officer in any way and that the encounter was over within seconds, leaving Gibbons fatally wounded. The remaining facts surrounding his tragic death are disputed, including whether Gibbons' right arm was by his side or raised in surrender, whether the officer instructed Gibbons to drop the weapon or spoke unintelligibly, and whether the officer gave Gibbons a chance to comply or opened fire immediately. In light of these substantial disputes of material fact, the District Court declined to grant qualified immunity to the officer on summary judgment. The Third Circuit took a different view of the facts, reversing and granting qualified immunity. For the reasons ably set forth by Judge McKee in his dissent from denial of en banc review, the Third Circuit erred by improperly resolving factual disputes in respondent's favor and by overlooking binding precedent to conclude that he did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. See Gibbons v. New Jersey State Police, 969 F.3d 419 (2020). I add only that qualified immunity properly shields police officers from liability when they act reasonably to protect themselves and the public. [citing White v. Pauly and Plumhoff v. Rickard] It does not protect an officer who inflicts deadly force on a person who is only a threat to himself. That proposition is so 'apparent' that any reasonable officer is surely 'on notice' that such a use of force is unlawful. [citing Hope v. Pelzer] I would grant the petition and summarily reverse the Third Circuit's judgment. I respectfully dissent from the Court's failure to do so."); Gibbons v. New Jersey State Police, 969 F.3d 419, 419, 425-28, 435-38 (3d Cir. 2020) (McKee, J., with whom Greenaway, Krause, and Restrepo, JJ., join, dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) ("Today, we deny the Petition for Rehearing in this case even though our Opinion squarely contradicts controlling precedent established by our decision in Bennett v. Murphy. . . . Obviously, Bennett does not apply if an individual threatening self-harm also poses a risk to others. Just as the circumstances in Bennett (construed in the plaintiff's favor) compelled the conclusion that a reasonable officer could not have believed that David Bennett posed a threat to anyone but himself, the circumstances here, viewed in a light favorable to Gibbons, compel the conclusion that Willie Gibbons only posed a threat to himself. When asked whether Gibbons had threatened him "in any way," Bartelt responded unequivocally: "No." Thus, when he opened fire, Bartelt violated clearly established law. . . .[M]ore than once, this Court has advised that 'a court ruling on summary judgment in a deadly-force case' must be careful 'to "ensure that the officer is not taking advantage of the fact that the witness most likely to contradict his story—the person shot dead—is unable to testify."' The Supreme Court has likewise emphasized 'the importance of drawing inferences in favor of the nonmovant, even when, as here, a court decides only the clearly-established prong of the standard.' Instead, the Opinion improperly resolves multiple disputed issues of material fact in Bartelt's favor when determining if clearly established law applies. For example: whether Gibbons' right arm was raised in surrender or at his side (ignored by the Opinion), whether it was light or dark when Bartelt shot Gibbons (ignored), whether Bartelt told Gibbons to drop his gun or spoke unintelligibly (Opinion repeatedly assumes Bartelt gave the order), whether Bartelt even gave Gibbons a chance to comply with any command he may have given or opened fire immediately after issuing such command (Opinion repeatedly assumes Gibbons chose not to comply), and most importantly, whether Gibbons threatened Bartelt in any way (ignored). The Opinion implicitly or explicitly resolves each of these inferences against Gibbons when determining whether clearly established law governs this case. But it does not stop there: Bartelt never stated that Gibbons threatened him or anyone other than himself. In fact, Bartelt admits Gibbons made no threat. Here, there is no factual dispute. So the Opinion simply invents one and then resolves it in favor of Bartelt. That is not merely wrong, it is indefensible. . . . The Fifth Circuit's careful en banc decision in Cole v. Carson amplifies the relevance of Tolan. There, officers pursued a suicidal young man, Ryan Cole, and fatally shot him while he pressed a gun to his own head. As here, it was disputed whether the officers warned the victim before opening fire, and, if so, whether they gave him an opportunity to comply. The circumstances are not identical; Ryan Cole survived and his suit subsequently alleged that the officers conspired to lie about the threat he posed in order to justify having shot him. A panel of the Fifth Circuit initially denied qualified immunity, but the Supreme Court summarily reversed and remanded for reconsideration in light of Mullenix v. Luna. On remand, the panel reaffirmed its earlier decision, and the Fifth Circuit granted rehearing before the full court. The en banc court explicitly followed Tolan's requirement that disputed facts be viewed in the non-movant's favor, and found from that perspective:

Ryan was holding his handgun pointed to his own head, where it remained. [He] never pointed a weapon at the Officers, and never made a threatening or provocative gesture towards [the] Officers. [The officers] had the time and opportunity to give a warning for Ryan to disarm himself. However, the officers provided no warning ... that granted Ryan a sufficient time to respond, such that Ryan was not given an opportunity to disarm himself before he was shot.

Viewed in that light, the en banc court affirmed the denial of qualified immunity. The court explained: '[w]e conclude that it will be for a jury, and not judges, to resolve the competing factual narratives as detailed in ... the record as to the [plaintiffs'] excessive-force claim.' While Gibbons' death leaves us reliant on the officers' recounting of events, there are many similarities between Cole and James. In both cases, Tolan requires that the facts be viewed in the non-movant's favor. As noted before, the Opinion entirely ignores Tolan; it also ignores Cole. Under Tolan, we must view the facts in Gibbons' favor; when we do so, Bennett clearly governs this case. . . . I realize that, given the controlling precedent of Bennett, precedents from other Circuits are not relevant to our qualified immunity analysis. Nevertheless, before concluding, I think it helpful to note that every Circuit Court of Appeals that has addressed this issue in a precedential opinion, and there are ten of them, has held that it is a clear violation of the Constitution to shoot someone who is only threatening self-harm. To summarize: Bennett controls this analysis and failing to grant the Petition for Rehearing is a serious mistake. There will always be differences between two events featuring different participants, separated by time and place. The Supreme Court has never required a prior case that is absolutely identical to the circumstances surrounding a plaintiff's claim, nor could it. No such case will ever exist and requiring one tacitly transforms qualified immunity into absolute immunity. What is required is notice. Controlling precedent that is based upon circumstances sufficiently similar (when analyzed at an appropriate level of generality) to inform a reasonable officer that his/her conduct violates clearly established law. Bennett is exactly such a case. To reiterate once again our unqualified pronouncement there, if the victim 'did not pose a threat to anyone but himself, the force used against him, i.e. deadly force, was objectively excessive.' For the reasons I have explained, Bennett remains the law of this Circuit even after the denial of this Petition for Rehearing. However, institutionally, en banc reconsideration of the Opinion is certainly preferable to relying on the operation of I.O.P. 9.1 to prevent an officer from subsequently attempting to claim that our law on this issue is not clearly established. It is, and it will remain so after today. While remaining appreciative and cognizant of the risks that law enforcement officers face daily, we must nevertheless take care not to transform the shield of qualified immunity into a sword that licenses unreasonable force. I therefore must respectfully dissent from my colleagues' decision to deny the petition for rehearing in this case. I do not reach that conclusion lightly. This is only the second time in 26 years on our Court that I have thought it necessary to draft an opinion dissenting from a denial of rehearing. But, in Justice Frankfurter's words: 'justice must satisfy the appearance of justice.' Given our controlling law here, that appearance is sorely lacking if we grant Trooper Bartelt immunity as a matter of law.") [footnotes omitted]

Thomas v. Tice, 948 F.3d 133, 141 (3d Cir. 2020) (on rehearing) ("Our precedent makes clear that, without some penological justification, an inmate may not be administratively confined in a dry cell. . . While the penological purpose must always be legitimate, . . . we have never determined the exact quantum or nature of penological interest that is needed to justify confinement in a dry cell. But we are satisfied that there must be at least some interest. Here, the PRC failed to present evidence of any continuing penological interest after its initial interview with Thomas. Without such a penological justification for Thomas's continued confinement in the dry cell, the PRC members are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Thomas v. Tice, 948 F.3d 133, 145-48 (3d Cir. 2020) (on rehearing) (Greenaway, Jr., J., concurring in part, dissenting in part) ("Put simply, we cannot say as a matter of law that Defendants did not have personal knowledge of, and thus were not personally involved in, the conditions of Thomas's confinement in the dry cell. Especially since we must make all reasonable inferences in Thomas's favor, this factual dispute precludes summary judgment. . . In entirely overlooking these facts, the Majority makes a glaring error. . . .Upon summarily affirming the District Court's personal involvement analysis, the Majority explicitly declines to determine whether Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Thomas's conditions claim. But because, as explained above, we cannot determine as a matter of law that Defendants were not personally involved in the conditions of Thomas's dry cell, we must answer this qualified immunity question. In so doing, our precedent demands that we resolve this issue in Thomas's favor. . . . In short, then, qualified immunity does not shield Defendants from Thomas's conditions claim. Among others, Young, Hope, and the cases on which Mammana relies clearly established before Thomas's confinement in the dry cell that the conditions he suffered there taken together violate the Eighth Amendment. Hence, Thomas's conditions claim must proceed to a jury. . . . Here, Thomas was housed in a dry cell in utterly undignified conditions. On that, the record is clear. As to whether Defendants were personally involved in these conditions, the record reveals a genuine dispute of material facts that precludes summary judgment. Qualified immunity, moreover, is of no aid to Defendants given the ample precedent deeming similar conditions as violative of the Eighth Amendment. I would vacate in full the District Court's grant of summary judgment and remand to the District Court for trial on both Thomas's duration and conditions claims. Given my divergence of viewpoint, I dissent from the Majority's disposition of Thomas's conditions claim.")

E. D. v. Sharkey, 928 F.3d 299, 306-09 (3d Cir. 2019) ("This Circuit has longed [sic] viewed the legal rights of an immigration detainee to be analogous to those of a pretrial detainee. . . We now join a number of our sister Circuits in expressly holding that immigration detainees are entitled to the same due process protections. Charles v. Orange County, 925 F.3d 73 (2d Cir. 2019); Chavero-Linares v. Smith, 782 F.3d 1038, 1041 (8th Cir. 2015); Belbachir v. County of McHenry, 726 F.3d 975, 979 (7th Cir. 2013); Porro v. Barnes, 624 F.3d 1322, 1326 (10th Cir. 2010); Edwards v. Johnson, 209 F.3d 772, 778 (5th Cir. 2000). . . .The right to 'not be sexually assaulted by a state employee while in confinement' was clearly established at the time of Sharkey's conduct. . . E.D.'s allegations of Sharkey's sexual assault, which could not have served a legitimate governmental objective and thereby constituted impermissible punishment, set forth a plausible violation of her right to personal bodily integrity protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Regarding Sharkey's co-workers' liability, this Court has recognized a detainee's right to be protected by state actors who knew of ongoing violating conduct under the theory that a reasonable state official 'could not believe that [their] actions comported with clearly established law while also believing that there is an excessive risk to the plaintiffs and failing to adequately respond to that risk.'. . Supervisor Diane Edwards' claim for immunity was properly denied because this Court has recognized the right to have state supervisory officials that neither condone nor authorize, through either their actions or inactions, sexual assault committed by another state actor. . . We therefore agree with the District Court that E.D.'s claims against the individual Defendants alleged the violation of a known constitutional right. . . . We further agree that a detainee's right to be protected by state officials aware of ongoing sexual assault was clearly established at the time of Sharkey's conduct. . . Initially, the District Court fittingly recognized that Sharkey's conduct was illegal in the state in which it occurred. He committed institutional sexual assault in violation of Pennsylvania Statute 18 Pa.C.S. § 3124.2, which forbids an employee of a 'residential facility serving children and youth' from having sexual intercourse with a 'detainee,' regardless of whether the detainee gave consent. . . That Sharkey's conduct was illegal renders E.D.'s right to be free from sexual assault 'so "obvious" that it could be deemed clearly established even without materially similar cases.'. . In any event, there is a materially similar case, decided twelve years before E.D. had entered the country. In 2001 this Court held that juvenile detention facility employees could be liable for their co-worker's sexual conduct with an inmate if they knew of but ignored the risk their co-worker posed. . . . [W]e agree there is enough evidence to support an inference that the Defendants knew of the risk facing E.D., and that their failure to take additional steps to protect her – acting in their capacity as either a co-worker or supervisor – 'could be viewed by a factfinder as the sort of deliberate indifference' to a detainee's safety that the Constitution forbids. . . We agree there is a genuine need for trial to determine whether the Defendants are liable, and that summary judgment was therefore properly denied.")

Baloga v. Pittston Area Sch. Dist., 927 F.3d 742, 762-63 (3d Cir. 2019) ("Here, Defendants contend that Serino is entitled to qualified immunity because '[t]here is no clearly established case law ... that stands for the [proposition] that ... a grievance about a day off[ ] constitutes constitutionally protected ... association.'. . But Defendants misunderstand the right at issue. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Baloga, Serino retaliated against Baloga because he ascribed to him responsibility for the union's grievance based on his leadership of the union. Thus, the right at issue is a public employee's right not to be subjected to adverse treatment for his leadership role in a public union—not, as Defendants contend, for the content of the grievance that the union filed. Once the right at issue is properly identified, it is apparent that '[t]he contours of [that] right,'. . . were clearly established when Serino ordered Baloga's transfer. The Supreme Court has long recognized the right to become a member of a union and the attendant right not to be penalized for that membership. [collecting cases] So have we and other Courts of Appeals. [collecting cases] Given this 'robust consensus,'. . . we have no difficulty concluding that Baloga's right not to face retaliation for his leadership role in a public union was clearly established at the relevant time and, thus, Serino is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Bryan v. United States, 913 F.3d 356, 361-63 (3d Cir. 2019) ("On September 4, 2008, a day before Officer Ogg entered 'lookouts' for the travelers and two days before the cabin searches, we ruled for the first time on the constitutional propriety of border searches in the same context presented in this appeal—in remarkable coincidence, searches of cabins aboard the Adventure of the Seas. . . In United States v. Whitted, we acknowledged 'the surprising dearth of authority' on whether a search of a cruise ship cabin at the border is a routine search requiring no suspicion, or a non-routine search requiring 'reasonable suspicion' (i.e., a 'particularized and objective basis' to suspect criminal activity). . . We held for the first time that because of a passenger's 'high expectation of privacy' and the 'level of intrusiveness,' a search of a cruise ship cabin at the border is non-routine and requires reasonable suspicion. . . We also held that unsubstantiated information from TECS can establish reasonable suspicion. . . .In considering whether a government official is entitled to qualified immunity, a court can determine whether a constitutional right was violated or in the alternative, whether that right was clearly established. . . Following that precedent, we will not opine as to whether there were underlying Fourth Amendment violations involved in the search here. We will instead determine whether the Whitted standard, that a search of a cabin on a cruise ship required reasonable suspicion, was clearly established when Officer Ogg included in his entry of 'lookouts' in the TECS System that 100 % examination of the three travelers, i.e., examination of their cabins, was recommended and the next day when the St. Thomas officers searched the travelers' cabins. . . . Until September 4, 2008, there had been no ruling in the Third Circuit as to what constituted a 'routine search.' As for Officer Ogg, he was located in San Juan, Puerto Rico, in the First Circuit. There had not been any such ruling in the First Circuit, and the First Circuit courts would not be bound by Whitted, a Third Circuit case. When such a ruling is made, a ruling which affects the procedures used in border searches, it is beyond belief that within two days the government could determine what was 'reasonable suspicion' and what new policy was required to conform to the ruling, much less communicate that new policy to the CBP officers. We can only conclude that as of September 5, 2008, it was not clearly established in either the Third Circuit or the First Circuit that a search of a cruise ship cabin at the border had to be supported by reasonable suspicion. Accordingly, under the circumstances that Officer Ogg confronted, he did not violate clearly established law by entering lookouts for the three passengers the day after we issued our decision in Whitted. He is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . For purposes of qualified immunity, a legal principle does not become 'clearly established' the day we announce a decision, or even one or two days later. . . .We are, however, deciding only this case. For that reason, we decline to draw a bright line demarcating when a legal principle becomes 'clearly established.' We leave that exercise for another day.")

Cole v. Encapera, 758 F. App'x 252, ___ (3d Cir. 2018) ("Cole cites Thomas v. Independence Township, as demonstrating that his due process rights were clearly established. . . In Thomas, the Third Circuit addressed the assertion of qualified immunity in a motion to dismiss, holding that a plaintiff's ability to succeed on such a due process claim depends on whether he can show that the alleged harassment removed or significantly altered the plaintiff's liberty and property interests in his business. . . However, the court did not affirmatively address the extent to which a business must suffer reputational and fiscal harm before a plaintiff's liberty and property interest in his business becomes significantly altered.' Although Thomas appears applicable at first glance, on closer review, it merely stands for the proposition that Cole has adequately pled a Fourteenth Amendment due process claim. By no means did Thomas 'place[ ] the ... constitutional question' here 'beyond debate.'. . It simply cannot be said that Third Circuit precedent sufficiently establishes the legal principle Cole advances such that 'every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule [Cole] seeks to apply.'. . Furthermore, Supreme Court case law appears to diverge from Cole's position. . . Because no Supreme Court or Third Circuit precedent clearly establishes the right at issue, we look to other circuits for a consensus. . . Childs and Shultz point to Fifth Circuit precedent that contradicts Cole's position that his rights were clearly established. . . We thus reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment to the officers and hold that Shultz and Childs are entitled to qualified immunity on Cole's Fourteenth Amendment due process claim. . . Here, Cole may appropriately be viewed as having the right to be free from police retaliation directed toward his business because he complained about the officers' conduct. In Thomas, we found such allegations sufficient to state a claim. . . And, unlike in the due process context discussed above, the discussion in Thomas placed officers like Schultz and Childs on notice of what actions would constitute a First Amendment violation. . . For this reason, the district court correctly denied the officers qualified immunity on Cole's First Amendment claim.")

Walker v. Coffey, 905 F.3d 138, 144, 148-50 (3d Cir. 2018) ("[F]or purposes of qualified immunity, we must consider, at a minimum, whether it is clearly established that the Fourth Amendment affords an employee, such as Walker, the right to have the contents of her work emails remain free from a law enforcement search, absent a warrant or valid exception to the warrant requirement. Because we conclude that such a right is not clearly established—especially where, as here, the employer ultimately produces the emails to law enforcement—we hold that Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [W]e would be hard put to find that Walker enjoyed a clearly established right to privacy in the content of her work emails. But because this case involves Walker's work emails, which were produced to law enforcement by her employer, Penn State, our inquiry does not end there. As explained below, those facts remove any doubt that Walker has failed to allege a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. . . . We emphasize that nothing in this opinion should be taken as condoning the actions of Appellees in this case. On the contrary we are dismayed by their reliance on an invalid subpoena to procure the documents that they sought. And we add a note of caution that, under slightly difference circumstances, similar actions might well lead us to a conclusion opposite from the one we reach today. But improper conduct alone does not result in a forfeiture of qualified immunity. . . Rather, the relevant question is whether, under the particular circumstances of this case, Appellees' conduct violated Walker's clearly established constitutional rights. Because we conclude that it did not, Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Munchinski v. Solomon, 747 F. App'x 52, ___ (3d Cir. 2018) ("Our decision in Perdomo. . . clearly established that a defendant had a right to exculpatory evidence in the hands of the police, not just evidence physically possessed by the prosecutors. But at the time, the prosecution team's disclosure requirements did not extend to evidence that the defendant, with due diligence, should have discovered on his own. Specifically, '[e]vidence [was] not considered to be suppressed if the defendant either knew or should have known of the essential facts permitting him to take advantage of any exculpatory evidence.'. . In sum, Warman violated clearly established law if he suppressed or withheld favorable and material evidence in possession of police or prosecutors, but only if Munchinski, in the exercise of diligence, could not have discovered that evidence himself.")

Kane v. Barger, 902 F.3d 185, 188-95 (3d Cir. 2018) ("Altogether, the record—again, viewed in the light most favorable to Kane—supports the inference that Barger acted for his own personal gratification, rather than investigative ends, in both touching Kane and photographing her intimate bodily areas with his personal cell phone in violation of department policy. That is conscience-shocking behavior. Thus, Barger violated Kane's right to bodily integrity. . . . Here, the right at issue is an individual's right not to be sexually fondled and illicitly photographed by a police officer investigating his or her case, for the officer's own gratification. Thus, based on the above, '[t]he ultimate question is whether the state of the law when the offense occurred' gave Barger 'fair warning' that his conduct violated this right. . . We conclude that it did. Intuitively, it seems absurd to analyze whether the right to be free from an officer's sexual assault was clearly established by case law at the time of Barger's conduct. This is because, given the egregiousness of Barger's violation of Kane's personal security and bodily integrity, the right here is so 'obvious' that it could be deemed clearly established even without materially similar cases. . . Indeed, while Barger has not been convicted of a crime, his actions—viewed in the light most favorable to Kane—resemble the crime of indecent assault in Pennsylvania, where Barger's conduct occurred. . . .Further, at the time of Barger's conduct, both our case law and that of other circuits placed Barger on notice that he acted unconstitutionally.")

Santini v. Fuentes, 739 F. App'x 718, 721(3d Cir. 2018) ("Here, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Santini, the District Court considered: whether Plaintiff had a right to be free from the use of force, including the use of pepper spray and strikes from nightsticks, as a non-suspect witness who walked away from an investigatory discussion, and who admitted he (1) unintentionally did not comply with an officer's request to keep his hands visible, and (2) resisted arrest. . . We agree with the District Court that this formulation of the question adequately contextualizes the alleged conduct as Saucier instructs, with consideration of specifics rather than 'broad general proposition[s].'. . This question captures the particular conduct alleged and allows us meaningfully to consider whether the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. We conclude that the right, if it exists, was not clearly established. First, there are no cases directly on point that suggest that this conduct is unlawful. Santini cites several excessive force cases, but none establish a rule for these facts or state a constitutional right that is obviously applicable to this case. Second, the amount of force used was not so significant that the objectively reasonable officer would know it to be unlawful. This is evidenced by the facts that all force stopped as soon as Santini was in handcuffs and that he suffered no significant or lasting injuries. Finally, the objectively reasonable officer would not know the use of force on these facts to be unlawful. Even in the light most favorable to Santini, the facts suggest some level of resistance to Fuhrmann at all stages of the physical interaction and continued resistance, even as officers instructed him to stop resisting. Also relevant is the repeated non-compliance with the instruction to keep hands visible. Even if the right to be free from police use of force in those circumstances exists, the objectionably reasonable officer might not know that. Because qualified immunity protects officers from reasonable error, we conclude that the grant of summary judgment is appropriate.")

Olson v. Ako, 724 F. App'x 160, 165 (3d Cir. 2018) ("Here, the District Court correctly noted that 'a finding of qualified immunity should be made at the earliest possible point,' but then allowed Plaintiffs' claim to proceed without so finding. . . . A defense motion for a more definite statement is appropriate to 'facilitate an early resolution of the qualified immunity issue.'. . Here, Defendants moved alternatively to dismiss or for a more definite statement. When the Court granted their 12(e) motion, they provided Plaintiffs with relevant documents from the underlying criminal matter. Plaintiffs then filed an amended complaint, attaching exhibits including: the arrest warrants for the Plaintiffs, the interviews of M.R. and J.C., the search warrant and Detective Ako's supporting affidavit, the interview with R.W., the investigation report following the execution of the search warrant, and evidence vouchers signed by Defendant Sullivan. The District Court therefore had a record sufficient to rule on qualified immunity. Considering whether the Defendants are immune, the pertinent question 'is whether a reasonable officer could have believed that his or her conduct was lawful, in light of the clearly established law and the information in the officer's possession.'. . The unlawfulness of the conduct must have been placed 'beyond debate' in light of 'controlling authority' or 'a "robust consensus of ... persuasive authority."'. . Here, neither of Plaintiff's generalized Fourth Amendment claims convincingly places Defendants' conduct in the orbit of unlawful, let alone unlawful 'beyond debate.' Indeed, the Supreme Court has emphasized that '[t]he general proposition ... that an unreasonable search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment is of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . .Plaintiffs' allegations 'are the kinds of broad propositions of law that cannot guide a court in determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established.'. . And even if we were to consider their allegations at the broad level of generality requested, Plaintiffs have failed to identify, for either claim, a case where an officer in similar circumstances was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.")

Kedra v. Schroeter, 876 F.3d 424, 435-38, 440-42, 450-52 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Granted, the contours of a given right are necessarily co-extensive with the scope of conduct that violates that right, so that where it would not be clear to 'a reasonable official ... that what he is doing violates [a] right,'. . . the second prong of qualified immunity would not be satisfied regardless of whether the lack of clarity arose from an uncertain theory of liability or from the application of a clearly established theory of liability to a set of facts so novel as to deprive an actor of fair notice of the violative nature of his actions. But where a defendant contends that neither the theory of liability nor the right at issue is clearly established, the reviewing court may need to analyze both to determine conclusively whether the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Here, the District Court addressed the 'clearly established' inquiry only in the first sense, determining that the theory of liability was not clearly established. Because we conclude this was error, we also address the inquiry in the second sense, assessing whether, under the facts of this case, the specific right at issue was clearly established. . . . Here the District Court examined one of the elusive aspects of deliberate indifference with which we and other Courts of Appeals have wrestled over time: whether deliberate indifference in the substantive due process context—as opposed to the Eighth Amendment context—may be satisfied using an objective test or only a subjective 'actual knowledge' test. . . In the Eighth Amendment context, the Supreme Court has rejected an objective standard for 'deliberate indifference,' i.e., a standard where liability may be premised on an official's objective 'failure to alleviate a significant risk that he should have perceived but did not,'. . . and the Court has instead explicitly required a showing of 'subjective culpability,'. . . i.e., a showing that 'the official kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk[.]'. . But uncertainty about whether this 'subjective culpability' requirement carried over to pretrial detainees and other plaintiffs asserting substantive due process claims produced a split among the Courts of Appeals. . . That split led us in Sanford to note, in the substantive due process context, 'the possibility that deliberate indifference might exist without actual knowledge of a risk of harm when the risk is so obvious that it should be known,'. . . and to acknowledge shortly thereafter that we 'ha[d] not yet definitively answered the question of whether the appropriate standard in a non-Eighth Amendment substantive due process case is subjective or objective,' Kaucher v. Cty. of Bucks, 455 F.3d 418, 430–31 (3d Cir. 2006). More recently, both the Supreme Court and this Court have spoken to the issue. In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . distinguishing between the different language of the Eighth Amendment and the Due Process Clause and the different nature of those claims, the Supreme Court held that a pretrial detainee claiming a substantive due process violation based on excessive force 'must show ... only that the officers' use of that force was objectively unreasonable' and not 'that the officers were subjectively aware that their use of force was unreasonable.'. . . Consistent with this approach, we too recently embraced an objective standard in the context of a substantive due process claim—in particular, for a claim of state-created danger. In L.R. v. School District of Philadelphia, we denied qualified immunity to a teacher who released a kindergartener to a stranger who then abused the child. . . After reiterating our observation in Sanford that 'deliberate indifference might exist without actual knowledge of a risk of harm when the risk is so obvious that it should be known,'. . we held this standard was met by the allegations in that complaint. . . . Seeking to benefit from the trajectory of this case law, . . . Appellant would have us rely on L.R. to conclude an objective standard of deliberate indifference was clearly established at the time Schroeter shot Kedra and to reverse the District Court on that basis. We reject that invitation, however, because we assess qualified immunity based on the law that was 'clearly established at the time an action occurred,'. . . while L.R. was not decided until nearly two years after the action at issue in this case. That is, regardless of what may be deemed 'clearly established' in the wake of Kingsley and L.R., we must look to the state of the law at the time of shooting. And at that point, as the District Court correctly recognized, it was not yet clearly established whether deliberate indifference in the substantive due process context was governed by an objective or subjective standard. . . The question to which we therefore turn is whether Appellant pleaded deliberate indifference under the subjective test, which was then-clearly established, or under an objective test, which then was not. . . . Contrary to the way that Schroeter and the District Court characterize it, the complaint here clearly and unmistakably alleges facts that support an inference of actual, subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of lethal harm, and neither the Supreme Court nor we have wavered from the well-established principle that a plaintiff may plead and prove deliberate indifference in the substantive due process context using this subjective test. . . . The risk of lethal harm when a firearms instructor skips over each of several safety checks designed to ascertain if the gun is unloaded, points the gun at a trainee's chest, and pulls the trigger is glaringly obvious, and this obviousness supports the inference that the instructor had actual knowledge of the risk of serious harm. . . . '[D]raw[ing] all inferences from the facts alleged in the light most favorable to [Appellant],'. . . the allegations in Appellant's complaint are more than sufficient to state a claim for a state-created danger based on actual knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm—the subjective theory of deliberate indifference that was then-clearly established. . . .Having concluded that the facts, as alleged, plead the elements of a substantive due process violation under a clearly established theory of liability, we must still contend with Schroeter's argument that there was no precedent sufficiently 'factually similar to the plaintiff's allegations[ ] to put [him] on notice that his ... conduct [was] constitutionally prohibited.'. . .Here, in view of the allegations of the complaint, we define what is at issue as an individual's right not to be subjected, defenseless, to a police officer's demonstration of the use of deadly force in a manner contrary to all applicable safety protocols. . . We then must determine whether the contours of that right are sufficiently clear that 'a reasonable officer would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . We typically look to Supreme Court precedent or a consensus in the Courts of Appeals to give an officer fair warning that his conduct would be unconstitutional. . . . We are persuaded that Schroeter had such fair warning at the time of the shooting. This was not merely an accidental discharge of a firearm that happened to be 'point[ed] ... at another officer' at the time. . . Instead, at a training Kedra was required to attend, he was subjected to his training instructor contravening each and every firearm safety protocol by skipping over both required safety checks, treating the firearm as if it were unloaded, pointing the firearm directly at Kedra, and pulling the trigger. Our case law made it clear at that time that state actors may be liable for affirmatively exposing a plaintiff to a deadly risk of harm through 'highly dangerous ... conduct,'. . . or through 'us[ing] their authority as police officers to create a dangerous situation or to make [the victim] more vulnerable to danger had they not intervened,'. . . and that officials are expected to use the benefit of their expertise and professional training when confronted with situations in which they are responsible for preventing harm to other individuals[.]. . Under that case law, no reasonable officer who was aware of the lethal risk involved in demonstrating the use of deadly force on another person and who proceeded to conduct the demonstration in a manner directly contrary to known safety protocols could think his conduct was lawful. . . .In addition to our own case law and that of the Supreme Court, 'we routinely consider decisions by other Courts of Appeals as part of our "clearly established" analysis when we have not yet addressed the specific right asserted by the plaintiff.'. . A closely analogous case from the First Circuit confirms that a reasonable officer would anticipate liability for this conduct. [discussing Marrero-Rodriguez v. San Juan, 677 F.3d 497 (1st Cir. 2012)] . . . In sum, the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established, and Appellant's complaint sufficiently pleads a violation of that right. Accordingly, Schroeter was not entitled to qualified immunity.") Kedra v. Schroeter, 876 F.3d 424, 452-53, 457-58 (3d Cir. Nov. 28, 2017) (Fisher, J., concurring) ("I file this concurrence to explain my belief that the District Court's judgment should be reversed on narrower grounds than those on which the majority relies. . . . The District Court granted Schroeter qualified immunity under the second prong, concluding that it was not clearly established that he could violate a constitutional right without actual knowledge that his actions

posed a substantial risk of harm. The majority reverses, concluding that (1) Kedra has pleaded that Schroeter acted with actual knowledge that his actions posed a substantial risk of harm, and (2) the right at issue here was clearly established. . . . I would limit this decision to the narrowest possible grounds, and would reverse solely because of the allegation that Schroeter pleaded guilty to recklessly endangering another person in Pennsylvania court. I do not believe that the other allegations on which the majority relies are sufficient—separately or together—to state a claim. . . . In short, after scrutinizing the entire complaint, I conclude that aside from Schroeter's guilty plea to reckless endangerment, the remaining allegations in Kedra's complaint make out only a strong case of negligence. I do not believe they would be sufficient, by themselves, to state a claim that Schroeter acted with the deliberate indifference required to shock the conscience. . . .To summarize, Kedra adequately pleaded deliberate indifference, and therefore she alleged all four required elements of a state created danger claim. . . Having adequately pleaded her constitutional claim, Kedra has met the first requirement of the qualified immunity analysis: conduct by an officer that violates a federal right. . . I arrive, then, at the second element that must be shown in order to defeat Schroeter's claim of qualified immunity: that 'the right in question was clearly established at the time of the violation.'. . I agree with the majority's conclusion that the right at issue in this case was clearly established—but again, based on different reasoning. . . .The majority defines the right at issue here as 'an individual's right not to be subjected, defenseless, to a police officer's demonstration of the use of deadly force in a manner contrary to all applicable safety protocols.'. . I would define the right more narrowly, and in accordance with my analysis of the first qualified immunity prong in Section I.A., as: a police officer's right not to be subjected to a firearms training in which the instructor acts with deliberate indifference, that is, consciously disregards a known risk of death or great bodily harm. Schroeter's admitted deliberate indifference is crucial, in my opinion, to the conclusion at the first step of the analysis that a right was violated. . . Therefore, in order to narrowly define the right in light of the particular conduct at issue, . . . I would include deliberate indifference in the definition. . . Given the unique facts of this case—namely, Schroeter's guilty plea—I believe it is appropriate to tether the right in question to the standard of care he admitted he breached. The majority's approach, by contrast, suffers from its focus on the violation of 'all applicable safety protocols,' which will inevitably lead to disputes over how many safety protocols need to be violated for qualified immunity to be forfeited. And those disputes, I predict, will devolve into a negligence-type analysis, which precedent clearly forbids. The majority's definition of the right could prove fertile ground for future plaintiffs seeking to lower the bar yet further in § 1983 cases. Turning to whether the right as I define it was clearly established, I conclude that in light of existing case law, a reasonable person could not have believed that it was consistent with Kedra's substantive due process rights to subject him to a firearms training at which the instructor was deliberately indifferent to his safety. Therefore, the right was clearly established. Unlike the majority, I do not read existing cases as being 'fundamentally' or 'materially' similar to this one. . . The lack of on-point precedent gives me pause, because a case's 'present [ation] [of] a unique set of facts and circumstances' can be 'an important indication' that the conduct at issue 'did not violate a clearly established right.'. . Nonetheless, I feel constrained to conclude that Supreme Court and Circuit precedents have 'clearly established' the 'violative nature,'. . . of conducting a firearms training with deliberate indifference to a known risk. To begin with, the deliberate indifference standard was clearly enunciated in the state created danger context more than a decade ago and was clear at the time of Kedra's death in 2014. . . While our state created danger cases are not factually similar to this one—they do not involve police officers conducting firearms training—I cannot see how any reasonable official could believe that acting with deliberate indifference in the police firearms training context would be consistent with trainees' constitutional rights.")

In Re: J & S Properties, LLC, 872 F.3d 138, 143-45 (3d Cir. 2017) ("We . . . hold that bankruptcy trustees are government officials, entitled under Harlow to qualified immunity from § 1983 claims by third parties when they act in their official capacity in a manner that is not contrary to clearly established law. . . .In this case, Swope was not plainly incompetent and did not violate clearly established law. We agree with the Bankruptcy Court that there is a 'dearth of case law on the topic' of whether a bankruptcy trustee may take control of a building which she is obliged to preserve and which is at imminent risk of destruction or damage, especially in the face of the lack of cooperation by a third-party tenant. . . Rather than point to any case balancing a bankruptcy trustee's duties to preserve the estate under her care in the face of 'exigent circumstances' and her duties to a third-party tenant, . . .Phoenician cites black-letter Pennsylvania law indicating that self-help eviction is generally impermissible. . . .The Supreme Court has cautioned that the question of 'objective legal reasonableness' with respect to clearly established precedent should not be applied at too high a level of generality. . . Phoenician makes that mistake by noting that its rights to due process of law and to be free of illegal seizure are 'quite clearly established.'. . But the existence of those clearly established rights sheds no light on whether Swope's actions would violate them in the circumstances presented here. . . The cases Phoenician cites do not approach the level of specificity required for clearly established law. . . .None of the cases upon which Phoenician relies involved a trustee attempting to preserve assets of an estate under her care in the face of past and future damage to those assets. And considering Phoenician's lack of cooperation by giving Swope a key that only opened the outer door, its refusal 'to keep the property adequately heated,' and its failure to meet at the property and maintain insurance, . . . there is no law that clearly establishes the unlawfulness of Swope's actions. . . . It strains credulity to suggest, as Phoenician does, that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what' Swope did constituted an impermissible eviction that violated due process.")

Borrell v. Bloomsburg Univ., 870 F.3d 154, 162-63 (3d Cir. 2017) ("The record indicates that it is hardly 'beyond debate' that Ficca violated Borrell's due process rights. Although many cases have concluded that graduate students at public universities have property interests in continuing their education, . . . those cases do not speak to the right of a clinical student at a private hospital to a hearing or comparable process before termination—even if the natural consequence of that termination is an inability to complete an educational program. The District Court pointed to no cases even suggesting such a right and we are aware of no such case. And the district court cases cited cannot clearly establish law for qualified immunity purposes in any event. . . . In responding to Ficca's qualified immunity argument, Borrell seems to miss the relevant question—would a reasonable official have known that her actions violated a clearly established right? Even if, as Borrell claims, Ficca should have known that Richer's actions were disciplinary and not academic, and Borrell was thus entitled to more process from someone, this does not answer the question of whether Ficca was that person. Given all the factors discussed herein, and given her reasonable understanding that she could not have provided process for the clinical dismissal even if she thought it was necessary in the abstract, the District Court should have granted qualified immunity to Ficca.") Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 355-62 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Every Circuit Court of Appeals to address this issue (First, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh) has held that there is a First Amendment right to record police activity in public. [collecting cases] Today we join this growing consensus. Simply put, the First Amendment protects the act of photographing, filming, or otherwise recording police officers conducting their official duties in public. . . .Defendants ask us to avoid ruling on the First Amendment issue. Instead, they want us to hold that, regardless of the right's existence, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity and the City cannot be vicariously liable for the officers' acts. We reject this invitation to take the easy way out. Because this First Amendment issue is of great importance and the recording of police activity is a widespread, common practice, we deal with it before addressing, if needed, defenses to liability. . . . We have not ruled on the First Amendment right, instead merely holding that at the time of our rulings the claimed right was not clearly established. Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248 (3d Cir. 2010); True Blue Auctions v. Foster, 528 F. App'x 190 (3d Cir. 2013). In the years since, First Amendment issues from the recording of police activity recur, and they deal directly with constitutional doctrine. With technological progress and the ubiquity of smartphone ownership—especially in the years since our Kelly decision—we are now in an age where the public can record our public officials' conduct and easily distribute that recording widely. This increase in the observation, recording, and sharing of police activity has contributed greatly to our national discussion of proper policing. Consequently, police departments nationwide, often with input from the U.S. Department of Justice, are developing polices addressing precisely these issues, and our opinion can assist in their efforts to comply with the Constitution. Moreover, in the case before us the constitutional question is not 'so factbound that [our] decision [will] provide[ ] little guidance for future cases.'. . All we need to decide is whether the First Amendment protects the act of recording police officers carrying out official duties in public places. We also have excellent briefing on appeal, including counsel for the parties and eight amici, including the U.S. Department of Justice, the Cato Institute, well-known First Amendment law professors, and some of the largest news organizations in the country. We therefore address the First Amendment question before moving to the defenses. . . . The First Amendment protects the public's right of access to information about their officials' public activities. . . .[R]ecording police activity in public falls squarely within the First Amendment right of access to information. As no doubt the press has this right, so does the public. . . .We do not say that all recording is protected or desirable. The right to record police is not absolute. '[I]t is subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions.'. . But in public places these restrictions are restrained. We need not, however, address at length the limits of this constitutional right. Defendants offer nothing to justify their actions. Fields took a photograph across the street from where the police were breaking up a party. Geraci moved to a vantage point where she could record a protestor's arrest, but did so without getting in the officers' way. If a person's recording interferes with police activity, that activity might not be protected. For instance, recording a police conversation with a confidential informant may interfere with an investigation and put a life at stake. But here there are no countervailing concerns. In sum, under the First Amendment's right of access to information the public has the commensurate right to record—photograph, film, or audio record—police officers conducting official police activity in public areas. . . . To determine whether the right is clearly established, we look at the state of the law when the retaliation occurred, here in 2012 (Geraci) and 2013 (Fields). . . To conduct the clearly established inquiry, we 'frame the right "in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition,"'. . . as it needs to be 'specific enough to put "every reasonable official" on notice of it.'. . At issue here is Plaintiffs' ability to record the police carrying out official duties in public. We have never held that such a right exists, only that it might. . . In 2010 we held that there was no clearly established right for the public to do so, at least in the context of a police traffic stop. . . Only a few years later in 2013, in a non-precedential opinion, we held that '[e]ven if the distinction between traffic stops and public sidewalk confrontations is [ ] meaningful ... [,] our case law does not clearly establish a right to videotape police officers performing their duties [in 2009].'. . . So to resolve whether the right has become clearly established after these decisions, we must decide whether a 'robust consensus' has emerged that puts the existence of this First Amendment right 'beyond debate.'. . .Plaintiffs contend the absence of Circuit precedent does not end the inquiry, as after the events in Kelly and True Blue the Philadelphia Police Department adopted official policies recognizing the First Amendment right of citizens to record police in public. As plausible as that may be on the surface, it does not win the argument. With one breath Plaintiffs assert that these policies clearly established their legal right, but for purposes of municipal liability (an issue we remand) they vigorously argue that the policies were utterly ineffective in conveying to the officers that this right clearly existed. And Plaintiffs have compiled evidence indicating this was so. . . .As to decisions of other appellate courts relevant to the qualified immunity analysis, Defendants and the District Court argue that those decisions are distinguishable because they involved expressive intent or an intent to distribute. . . .Indeed, the Fifth Circuit just this year recognized that these other appellate decisions did not clearly establish the constitutional right to record. . . Where District Courts in our Circuit have held in favor of the First Amendment right, Defendants also distinguish those cases for requiring expressive act or intent, not just recording alone, once again echoing the reasoning of the District Court here. . . .Whether Defendants and the District Court correctly distinguished these cases, we cannot say that the state of the law at the time of our cases (2012 and 2013) gave fair warning so that every reasonable officer knew that, absent some sort of expressive intent, recording public police activity was constitutionally protected. Accordingly, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.") Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 362-65 (3d Cir. 2017) (Nygaard, J., concurring in the part, dissenting in part) ("I agree with the majority that the cause must be remanded. Because I conclude that the First Amendment right at issue is and was clearly established, I dissent. . . .First, as the majority notes, every Circuit Court of Appeals that has considered the issue ruled that there is a First Amendment right to record police activity in public. Four of these decisions were published before the conduct at issue here, and two of them occurred after our decision in Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248 (3d Cir. 2010), in which we posited that the right was not clearly established at that time. See Am. Civil Liberties Union of Ill. v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583 (7th Cir. 2012); Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78 (1st Cir. 2011); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332 (11th Cir. 2000); Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436 (9th Cir. 1995). . . I am convinced that such a 'robust consensus,' alone, sufficiently grounds a ruling that the right is clearly established. . . However, our record goes far beyond that. The Police Department's official policies explicitly recognized this First Amendment right well before the incidents under review here took place. . . .Although the Directives declared a First Amendment right well ahead of this Court, the Philadelphia Police Department Commissioner had a desire to 'get out ahead' of what he presciently viewed as an inevitable ruling. With all of this, it is indisputable that all officers in the Philadelphia Police Department were put on actual notice that they were required to uphold the First Amendment right to make recordings of police activity. From a practical perspective, the police officers had no ground to claim ambiguity about the boundaries of the citizens' constitutional right here. Mindful of the established trend among the Circuit Courts of Appeals, this combined with this clear Guidance from the Commissioner sufficiently grounds a conclusion that the right to record official, public police activity was clearly established and 'beyond debate.'. . However, this, too, ignores another piece of the context of this case that should be considered as part of the 'reasonable official' inquiry. The majority cites to the 2011 article of Seth F. Kreimer. . . in which he notes that, given the ubiquity of personal electronic devices with cameras, '[w]e live, relate, work, and decide in a world where image capture from life is routine, and captured images are part of ongoing discourse, both public and private. Capture of images has become an adjunct to memory and an accepted medium of connection and correspondence.' Seth F. Kreimer, Pervasive Image Capture and the First Amendment: Memory, Discourse, and the Right to Record, 159 U. Pa. L. Rev. 335, 337 (2011). If we are to assess the issue from a reasonable officer perspective, we cannot artificially remove him or her from this widespread societal phenomenon. (Indeed, it is not unreasonable to speculate that most—if not all—of the police officers themselves possessed such a personal electronic device at the time that the incidents underlying these cases took place.) A reasonable police officer would have understood, first-hand, the significance of this proliferation of personal electronic devices that have integrated image capture into our daily lives, making it a routine aspect of the way in which people record and communicate events. Apart from any court ruling or official directive, the officers' own lived experience with personal electronic devices (both from the perspective of being the one who is recording and one who is being recorded) makes it unreasonable to assume that the police officers were oblivious to the First Amendment implications of any attempt by them to curtail such recordings. As I noted above, I concur with the majority's analysis and conclusions regarding the existence of a First Amendment right to record, and agree that the case against the City of Philadelphia should be remanded for further proceedings. However, in light of the social, cultural, and legal context in which this case arose, I am convinced that—in this unique circumstance—no reasonable officer could have denied at the time of the incidents underlying these cases that efforts to prevent people from recording their activities infringed rights guaranteed by the First Amendment. For these reasons, I dissent from the majority's conclusion that the police officers are immune from suit.")

De Ritis v. McGarrigle, 861 F.3d 444, 458 n.12 (3d Cir. 2017) ("As we conclude that there was no constitutional right violated by Roger under then-existing case law, a fortiori, such right was not ' "clearly established" at the time of the challenged conduct,'. . . and thus Roger was entitled to qualified immunity on that independent ground. The District Judge here diligently identified the relevant case law and properly recognized as a general matter that a public employee has a clearly established right to 'alleg[e] misconduct or wrongdoing by public officials.'. . . That description of the right, however, is so general as to encompass not only cases where speech alleging misconduct or wrongdoing is protected, . . . but also those where it is not[.] Under our case law, the 'clearly established' inquiry requires reference not to such 'broad general proposition[s],' but to precedent that is 'factually similar to the plaintiff's allegations,' based on 'the specific context of the case.'")

Bag of Holdings, LLC v. City of Philadelphia, 682 F. App'x 94, ___ (3d Cir. 2017) ("BOH does not cite, and the Court has not found, any precedent clearly establishing that operation of a governmental land sale process which results in more favorable treatment for friends and political contributors amounts to an equal protection violation. To now say that Olech established that principle of law would be too near to concluding that any disparate treatment by a government actor without a rational basis—regardless of the factual circumstance—so clearly establishes a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment that the question is beyond debate. Such a broad pronouncement would fail to define the right at issue with sufficient specificity, and it would run contrary to a long-recognized purpose of qualified immunity: to shield public officials from potentially disabling threats of constitutional liability except in those situations where they have fair warning that their conduct violates federal law. . .Accordingly, we agree with the District Court's conclusion that Councilman Johnson is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Holt v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, No. 15-3302, 2017 WL 1048055, at *6 (3d Cir. Mar. 20, 2017) (not published) ("We start with the First Amendment retaliation claim, for which a plaintiff must prove: (1) constitutionally protected conduct; (2) an adverse action sufficient to deter a person of ordinary firmness from exercising his constitutional rights; and (3) a causal link between the constitutionally protected conduct and the retaliatory action. . . Our Circuit has not considered whether the initiation of an internal investigation can constitute an 'adverse action' for purposes of a First Amendment retaliation claim, and our sister circuits are split on the issue. Compare Breaux v. City of Garland, 205 F.3d 150, 158 (5th Cir. 2000) ("Investigating alleged violations of departmental policies ... [is] not [an] adverse employment action[.]"), with Dahlia v. Rodriguez, 735 F.3d 1060, 1078–79 (9th Cir. 2013) (holding that placement on administrative leave pending discipline can constitute an adverse action for a First Amendment retaliation cases). This disagreement among our sister courts indicates that Winterbottom is entitled to qualified immunity. After all, '[i]f judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject [a public official] to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.' Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 618 (1999). We next consider Holt's racial discrimination claim, where we apply the McDonnell Douglas burden-shifting framework. See Stewart v. Rutgers, The State Univ., 120 F.3d 426, 431–32 (3d Cir. 1997). At the first step of the McDonnell Douglas framework, Holt must establish a prima facie case of discrimination, which includes proving by a preponderance of the evidence that he suffered an 'adverse employment action.'. . In the Title VII context, we recently held that suspension with pay pending an internal investigation does not constitute an adverse employment action. . .And because of the overlap between Title VII claims and constitutional discrimination claims, we have applied Title VII caselaw to equal protection claims. . . Given our holding in Jones and the close relationship between Title VII and equal protection claims, it would have been reasonable for Winterbottom to conclude that the initiation of an IAD investigation would not create liability under the Equal Protection Clause. She is thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Pearson v. Prison Health Service, 850 F.3d 526, 542 n.6 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Nurse Rhodes argued that he was entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established at the time of these events that an official would be liable for a delay in care without expert medical evidence that the inmate suffered harm as a result. This fundamentally misunderstands the qualified immunity inquiry. Qualified immunity requires us to ask whether a reasonable official would have understood, at the time of the challenged conduct, that what he or she was doing violated an established right. Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 741 (2011).That analysis cannot turn on facts that could not be known to an official at the time, like whether the plaintiff would ultimately be able to produce expert testimony that the delay resulted in harm. It was sufficiently clear at the time of these events that exposing an inmate to the kind of severe and protracted pain and mental anxiety alleged in this case could expose an official to Eighth Amendment liability.")

Rossiter v. City of Philadelphia, 674 F.App'x 192, ___ (3d Cir. 2016) ("Rossiter alleged that Ramsey and the Department retaliated against him because he exercised his First Amendment right to be a member of the FOP, his union. The District Court found a clearly established right of a public-sector employee to be a member of an association. . . However, what it did not do was focus specifically on the kind of associational activity present in this case. . .That a public employee has a right to associate with a union is unchallenged. What is contested here is whether there is an established right of that employee in a pending disciplinary proceeding to associate passively with a union whose representatives oppose internal policies. . . .In Sanguigni, we emphasized Labov 'd[id] not make clear' whether Connick's public concern requirement for public employee speech applies in associational cases. . .We recognized that, in the years since we decided Labov, our Court had not settled the question of whether a public employee must demonstrate that the union representative's advocacy raises a matter of public concern in bringing a claim for expressive association. . . We reserved judgment on whether the public concern requirement applies to association claims when those claims do not allege retaliation for the member's speech. . .Our sister Circuits are split on whether an employee must demonstrate that the protected activity relates to a matter of public concern to trigger First Amendment associational rights and consequent protections against retaliation. [collecting cases] . . . .We accordingly find no consensus of authority that leveraging a claim against a specific union member facing good faith disciplinary action in an effort to settle internal police affairs implicates a clearly established constitutional right. What the Deputy Commissioner attempted to resolve by tethering Rossiter's case to resolution of union opposition to the Disciplinary Code may not be Hoyle, but it was not established as unconstitutional when it occurred. Therefore, Ramsey and the Department are entitled to qualified immunity, and we reverse the decision of the District Court and remand this case for it to enter judgment in their favor.")

L.R. v. School District of Philadelphia, 836 F.3d 235, 248-50 (3d Cir. 2016) ("Defendants argue that the District Court defined Jane's right at the highest level of generality: '[Jane's] Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily integrity ... under the state-created danger theory.'. . We agree that this definition is too broad. Individuals indeed have a broad substantive due process right to be free from 'unjustified intrusions on personal security.'. . In light of the specific allegations in the complaint, however, the right at issue here is an individual's right to not be removed from a safe environment and placed into one in which it is clear that harm is likely to occur, particularly when the individual may, due to youth or other factors, be especially vulnerable to the risk of harm. Framed in this way, and surveying both our case law and that of our sister circuits, we conclude that this right was clearly established at the time of Littlejohn's actions. Although there is no case that directly mirrors the facts here, as in Estate of Lagano, there are sufficiently analogous cases that should have placed a reasonable official in Littlejohn's position on notice that his actions were unlawful. . . .[W]e conclude that the state of the law in 2013 was sufficiently clear to put Littlejohn on notice that permitting a kindergarten student to leave his classroom with an unidentified adult could lead to a deprivation of that student's substantive due process rights. . . .State-created danger cases often involve unsettling facts and this case is no different. Even so, our resolution of the legal issues is straightforward. Exposing a young child to an obvious danger is the quintessential example of when qualified immunity should not shield a public official from suit. Accordingly, the order of the District Court is affirmed.")

Mammaro v. New Jersey Div. of Child Prot. & Permanency, 814 F.3d 164, 169-70 (3d Cir. 2016) ("In bringing a substantive due process claim, one alleges that the government has abused its power in an arbitrary manner that 'shocks the conscience.'. . In this case Mammaro alleged the arbitrary interference with her right to parent her child. . . She contends that the right at issue is her right to be free from the temporary removal of her child unless there is 'some reasonable and articulable evidence giving rise to a reasonable suspicion that a child has been abused or is in imminent danger of abuse.'. . This definition is too broad for purposes of qualified immunity, however. We must frame clearly established law 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . . We thus consider the substantive due process right of Mammaro as a parent in light of the specific allegations in her amended complaint. She contends that the caseworkers removed her child after she violated the restrictions on her contact with D.M. by removing the child from supervised housing. At the time of the removal, Mammaro alleges that there was insufficient evidence of past abuse or risk of future abuse by her to justify D.M.'s removal. Even if so, for Mammaro's case to have legs she must show that the law was so well established at that time a reasonable caseworker would have understood that temporarily removing a child in those circumstances would violate substantive due process. . . We conclude that there was no consensus of authority that temporarily removing a child after the parent takes the child from approved housing violates substantive due process. . . . The Court has never found a substantive due process violation when state agencies temporarily remove a child, whatever the circumstances of the removal. Accordingly, no Supreme Court precedent clearly establishes that D.M.'s temporary removal from her mother's custody violated substantive due process. Likewise, assuming a consensus of persuasive authority could clearly establish a right, there is no consensus that removing D.M. was an unconstitutional interference with the parent-child relationship.")

Estep v. Mackey, 639 F. App'x 870, 872-74 & n.4 (3d Cir. 2016) ("Here, the District Court's order turned on its view that there were disputed issues of material fact, but it reached this conclusion without identifying with the requisite level of specificity the right that was allegedly violated and whether that right was clearly established at the time of the conduct at issue. This omission constitutes a legal error that requires us to vacate the order denying summary judgment. . . In this case, the District Court defined the right at issue as the Fourth Amendment right to be free from the excessive use of force. This formulation lacks the required level of specificity and does not address the question that needs to be answered in this context because it does not describe the specific situation that the officers confronted. . . As a result, we will remand to the District Court to allow it to more specifically identify the right at issue. After the District Court formulates the right, its second task will be to determine if that right was clearly established at the time the taser was used against Baum. While there need not be a case on point, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . Put differently, while a court need not find that 'the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,'. . to be clearly established, it must 'conclude that the firmly settled state of the law, established by a forceful body of persuasive precedent, would place a reasonable official on notice that his actions obviously violated a clearly established constitutional right.' . . If the District Court determines that such a right was clearly established, it would then determine whether the facts it already correctly found to be in dispute are material to assessing whether that right was violated. . . . Our Court has not yet spoken in a precedential opinion about taser use and we decline to do so here, as the District Court has not specifically identified the right allegedly violated and whether it was clearly established at the time Baum was tased. As stated in the text, the identification of the right depends upon the factual circumstances of the case.")

Michtavi v. Scism, 808 F.3d 203, 207 (3d Cir. 2015) ("Barkes makes clear that there must be precedent indicating that the specific right at issue is clearly established. There is no Supreme Court or appellate precedent holding that prison officials must treat retrograde ejaculation, infertility, or erectile dysfunction; in fact, the weight of authority is to the contrary. The Magistrate Judge relied on Skinner, but Skinner establishes only that states may not sterilize prisoners; it does not hold that prisoners are entitled to treatment for infertility or sexual problems. The Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit has held that a prisoner is not entitled to treatment for erectile dysfunction. . . . Because there is no authority establishing—let alone 'clearly' establishing—a right for prisoners to receive treatment for a right for prisoners to receive treatment for conditions resulting in impotence and/or infertility, such as retrograde ejaculation or erectile dysfunction, Appellants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Young v. Martin, 801 F.3d 172, 180 & n.8, 182 (3d Cir. 2015) ("[I]n Hope, the Supreme Court applied its excessive force jurisprudence for the first time to a prisoner's allegation that his placement in mechanical restraints was unconstitutional. We conclude, under Hope, that Young's claims should be analyzed under the excessive force test and that such analysis demonstrates that the District Court's grant of summary judgment was in error. . . .We conclude from our independent review of the videotape and record evidence that the District Court failed to draw all reasonable inferences in Young's favor and that, when those inferences are properly drawn, there are genuine disputes of material fact as to whether the Defendants' use of the restraint chair in this case violated the Eighth Amendment. . . .In sum, applying the use of excessive force test, analyzing the record under the criteria identified in Hope, and drawing all inferences in favor of Young as the nonmoving party, we cannot say that 'there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'. . .The Defendants also ask us—in a single sentence—to affirm on the ground of qualified immunity. The District Court did not reach the issue and the availability of the defense was not briefed on appeal. In Hope, the Supreme Court held that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity because their actions violated 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . We will leave this issue for the District Court to address in the first instance on remand, considering (1) whether 'the state of the law' in 2009, including Hope, gave the Defendants 'fair warning that their alleged treatment of [Young] was unconstitutional,'. . . and (2) whether Young's confinement in the restraint chair violated prison regulations of which the Defendants were aware[.]. . . While we conclude that the particular claims here concerning the use of mechanical restraints are properly analyzed under the excessive force test, we note that the record in this case, reflecting Young's detention in solitary confinement for over six years, and the DOJ investigative report, detailing prolonged solitary confinement at SCI–Greene and five other Pennsylvania prisons, raises serious concerns under the Eighth Amendment's conditions of confinement test. As Justice Kennedy recently observed, '[y]ears on end of near-total isolation exact a terrible price.' Davis v. Ayala, — – U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 2187, 2210, 192 L.Ed.2d 323 (2015) (Kennedy, J., concurring)[.]")

Potts v. Holt, 617 F. App'x 148, 151-53 (3d Cir. 2015) ("The District Court determined that defendants had not adduced evidence sufficient to show that their suspension of the certified meals program was reasonable under Turner or that it satisfied the RFRA standard. We agree with these determinations because, inter alia, defendants did not establish the nature or even the existence of any nexus between the salmonella outbreak/lockdown and their suspension of certified religious meals. . .The District Court concluded, however, that Potts's rights were not clearly established at the time of defendants' alleged conduct. . . . The District Court defined the right at issue in this case as the right to 'religious meals during a prison-wide lockdown that resulted after an outbreak of food poisoning (or disease generally) in the inmate population.'. . The District Court further concluded that such a right was not clearly established because there is no case law addressing an inmate's right to religious meals in a similar factual scenario. There does indeed appear to be a dearth of such case law. . . . 'Even though there may be no previous precedent directly on point,' however, 'an action can still violate a clearly established right where a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law applies with obvious clarity.'. .Such is the case here. At the time of defendants' alleged conduct, it was clearly established in this Circuit that prisoners' general right to freely exercise their religion gives them the more specific right to be served religiously acceptable meals while in prison. . . It also had long been established that prison officials may constitutionally infringe that specific First Amendment right when prison administration so requires, but only when the infringement is reasonable under the Turner factors. . . And RFRA clearly establishes that defendants may not substantially burden an inmate's exercise of religion without satisfying the standard set forth in 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb–1(b). Thus, at the time of defendants' alleged conduct, it was clearly established both that Potts had a right to religiously acceptable meals and that defendants could not infringe on that right without sufficient justification under Turner and RFRA. . . In light of our precedent addressing prisoners' religious diets, no reasonable prison official could have believed that he or she could simply withhold Potts's religious meals for two weeks in the absence of some justification. And in light of Turner and RFRA, no reasonable prison official could have believed that the salmonella outbreak and lockdown provided such justification in the absence of some nexus between the outbreak/lockdown and defendants' ability to provide religious meals, which the current record does not reveal. . . .In sum, the District Court erred in concluding on this record that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Potts's First Amendment and RFRA claims. We express no opinion on the merits of those claims or on whether, at some later stage, defendants might show that they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Vargas v. City of Philadelphia, 783 F.3d 962, 972 n.13 (3d Cir. 2015) ("The officers' conduct here would also be shielded by qualified immunity. . . The case law does not indicate any analogous factual circumstances that would have put the officers on notice that they cannot briefly detain individuals in response to an emergency call and to await trained medical transport without violating the Fourth Amendment. We had not, before today, expressly held that the community caretaking doctrine could justify the seizure of a person outside of a home, which suggests that, to the extent there was doubt, the law in this area was not 'clearly established.'")

Estate of Lagano v. Bergen Cnty. Prosecutor's Office, 769 F.3d 850, 859 (3d Cir. 2014) ("The District Court focused on the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, holding that the constitutional right claimed to have been violated was not clearly established at the time of Lagano's murder. In reaching this conclusion, the District Court reasoned that because '[t]here are no published cases that extend the state created danger right to confidential informants in the Third Circuit[,] ... it would be unfair to hold that a constitutional right was "clearly established."'. . The District Court defined the right asserted by the Estate as 'a confidential informant's constitutional right to nondisclosure.'. . We cannot endorse the District Court's unduly narrow construction of the right at issue, or its statement that the right was not clearly established. It has been clearly established in this Circuit for nearly two decades that a state-created danger violates due process. . . That we have not applied the state-created danger theory in the context of a confidential informant is not dispositive on the qualified immunity defense. . . . Thus, the Estate can overcome Mordaga's qualified immunity defense without proving that we have previously issued a binding decision recognizing a state-created danger in the context of the disclosure of a confidential informant's status, and the District Court erred in requiring it to do so. The focus of the qualified immunity inquiry is on the allegations made by the Estate. Specifically, the question is whether the facts averred by the Estate fall within the elements of the state-created danger theory, and whether 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer' that the alleged disclosure was unlawful under the circumstances. . . We express no opinion as to whether the amended complaint satisfies these inquiries, but, because the District Court failed to apply the proper standard, we must vacate the District Court's decision in favor of Mordaga on the qualified immunity defense.")

Montanez v. Sec'y Pennsylvania Dep't of Corr., 773 F.3d 472, 487 (3d Cir. 2014) ("At the time that the deductions from Hale's account first occurred in February 2004, it was not clearly established in this Court that the failure to provide prison inmates with a pre-deprivation opportunity to object to automatic deductions from their prison accounts violated the Due Process Clause. In 2005, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court decided Buck v. Beard, which could be read to suggest that a sentencing hearing was the only pre-deprivation hearing constitutionally required. . . Further, earlier decisions of our Court had held that, in some circumstances, postdeprivation remedies were sufficient constitutional process for deductions. . . For these reasons, there was a sufficient lack of clarity in Third Circuit and Pennsylvania case law regarding automatic deductions that the Corrections Officials should be entitled to qualified immunity in this case.")

Shively v. Green Local Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., 579 F. App'x 348, 356, 358 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Here, Defendants' alleged decision not to enforce rules against bullying or punishments for bullying gave students license to act with impunity. We decline to establish a standard in which '[d]ereliction of duty becomes a school's best defense,' particularly in cases such as this where it 'enabl[es] a pattern of physical abuse to persist,' Morrow v. Balaski, 719 F.3d 160, 196 (3d Cir.2013) (Fuentes, J. dissenting), and would reasonably be expected to embolden them to continue to escalate their abuse. In any event, even assuming there was a state-created danger, reasonable officials would not have believed that their conduct was unlawful based on clearly established law. Defendants correctly argue that federal cases addressing the state-created danger doctrine have not previously found school officials liable for student-on-student harassment. Although these cases are distinguishable, the fact remains that at the time Defendants violated T.S.'s substantive due process right, it was not clearly established that school officials violate due process by failing to address student-on-student harassment. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity for violations of T.S.'s substantive due process right. . . . The equal protection right to be free from student-on-student discrimination is well-established. See Williams, 455 F. App'x at 619; Murrell, 186 F.3d at 1250–52; Flores, 324 F.3d at 1135. It is difficult to imagine how any school administrator could think he would not be liable for allowing unregulated religious and gender-based persecution that spanned a four-year period. In light of the case law, the Shivelys have pled facts that show Defendants were objectively unreasonable in failing to address their complaints of student-on-student harassment and are not entitled to qualified immunity on the Shivelys' equal protection claim.")

Shively v. Green Local Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., 579 F. App'x 348, 360-63 (6th Cir. 2014) (Griffin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Although I agree with the majority in most respects, I respectfully disagree with my colleagues regarding two issues. First, the majority finds no error with the district court's blanket denial of immunity to all six individual defendants. I disagree. . . . The district court failed to separately analyze the constitutionality of each defendant's actions. Its failure to do so was error. . . In the same vein, neither did the Shivelys 'plead that each' individual defendant, 'through [the individual defendant's] own ... actions' violated the constitution. . . The Shivelys did make specific allegations as to defendants Booth, Nutter, and Lucas (a school principal and two superintendents, respectively). The Shivelys' complaint alleges that these defendants had knowledge of T .S.'s harassment and that they made decisions about the district's response to that harassment. However, the complaint is deficient regarding defendants Wells, Miller, and Brown. The complaint does not allege any instances where Wells, Miller, or Brown were informed about T.S.'s harassment or that they made any decisions about how to respond to that harassment. The majority concludes that it is proper to allow claims against Wells, Miller, and Brown to proceed, despite the complaint's failure to make allegations regarding these defendants. I respectfully disagree. The majority reaches this conclusion on the theory that, because Wells, Miller, and Brown were administrators of the schools T.S. attended, it is reasonable to infer that they must have known about the harassment and made decisions in response to it. This, however, is precisely the type of inference that the law prohibits. . . For these reasons, I would hold that we should address the claims against Lucas, Booth, and Nutter, as they were properly pleaded. However, the claims as to Wells, Miller, and Brown should be dismissed because the Shivelys have not shown that they are entitled to relief against these defendants. Second, although I agree with the majority that the district court properly concluded that Lucas, Booth, and Nutter are entitled to qualified immunity on the Shivelys' substantive due process claim, I write separately to emphasize that the majority does not hold that the Shivelys have established a substantive due process violation. Rather, it holds that, assuming the Shivelys did establish such a violation, the right at issue here was not clearly established. Therefore, the majority's rather extensive discussion regarding whether the Shivelys have established a due process violation is unnecessary. Moreover, in my judgment, the Shivelys could not establish a due process violation in any event. As the majority notes, generally 'a State's failure to protect an individual against private violence ... does not constitute a violation of the due process clause.'. . A failure of the state to protect a citizen is only cognizable if the plaintiff can establish that the 'state-created danger exception' is met. . . . The thrust of the Shivelys' allegations are that Booth, Nutter, and Lucas knew about the violence and harassment to which T.S. was subjected and failed to act. Repeatedly, the Shivelys assert that defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because 'defendants did nothing to stop' the violence and 'fail[ed] to address' the violence. However, this court has specifically held that a 'failure to act is not an affirmative act under the state-created danger theory.'. . . Accordingly, I would also reverse the district court's judgment on the basis that plaintiffs failed to establish a violation of T.S.'s due process rights.")

Halsey v. Pfeiffer, 750 F.3d 273, 289, 292-96 & n.19 (3d Cir. 2014) ("When falsified evidence is used as a basis to initiate the prosecution of a defendant, or is used to convict him, the defendant has been injured regardless of whether the totality of the evidence, excluding the fabricated evidence, would have given the state actor a probable cause defense in a malicious prosecution action that a defendant later brought against him. We thus pass to the question of whether a state actor can be liable on a stand-alone claim for fabrication of evidence or whether a defendant's fabrication claim must be included as an aspect of a malicious prosecution claim. . . . To the best of our knowledge, every court of appeals that has considered the question of whether a state actor has violated the defendant's right to due process of law by fabricating evidence to charge or convict the defendant has answered the question in the affirmative. See Whitlock v. Brueggemann, 682 F.3d 567, 585 (7th Cir.2012) (collecting court of appeals cases. . . We join these courts in expressly adopting this principle. . . . Accordingly, we hold that if a defendant has been convicted at a trial at which the prosecution has used fabricated evidence, the defendant has a stand-alone claim under section 1983 based on the Fourteenth Amendment if there is a reasonable likelihood that, without the use of that evidence, the defendant would not have been convicted. . . [W]e [do not] decide whether a defendant acquitted at a trial where fabricated evidence has been used against him has an actionable section 1983 claim. We note, however, that if fabricated evidence is used as a basis for a criminal charge that would not have been filed without its use the defendant certainly has suffered an injury. . . . Analogous precedent should have informed appellees or any reasonable state actor that, by fabricating evidence for use in a criminal prosecution, a state actor would violate a defendant's constitutional rights regardless of whether or not the state actor violated other constitutional rights of the defendant. . . .The obviousness of this violation would be difficult to escape even without the closely analogous Supreme Court precedent discussed above. By the time appellees allegedly fabricated Halsey's confession, more than two decades had passed since the Supreme Court had held that the due process clause required that the prosecution reveal exculpatory evidence to a criminal defendant. Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194 (1963). Reasonable officers should have known that if they could not withhold exculpatory evidence from a defendant, they certainly could not fabricate inculpatory evidence against a suspect or defendant. For these reasons, we will reverse the District Court's entry of summary judgment dismissing Halsey's fabricated-evidence claim.") Hinterberger v. Iroquois School Dist., 548 F. App'x 50, 2013 WL 6284433, *4 & n.2 (3d Cir. 2013) (not published) ("We note that cases decided in this circuit after Hinterberger's accident have not been models of clarity as to whether a state-created danger claim can be successfully maintained in the context of school sports. [collecting and comparing cases] The differing outcomes in these cases further undermines Hinterberger's contention that Loftus should reasonably have understood her actions in March 2004 to violate a constitutional right. . . . We thus conclude that Hinterberger's alleged right was not clearly established at the time of her accident. It was not 'beyond debate' as of March 2004 that Loftus's decision to introduce a new cheerleading stunt following a delay of several months, through the instruction of an experienced cheerleader, with the use of multiple spotters, but without any matting, violated Hinterberger's substantive due process rights. . . . As Hinterberger's alleged right was not clearly established at the time of her injury, Loftus is entitled to qualified immunity from suit.")

Sharp v. Johnson, 669 F.3d 144, 159, 160 (3d Cir. 2012) ("At issue here is whether Sharp had a clearly established right under the First Amendment to separate religious services in accordance with the Habashi sect of Sunni Islam when Sunni Islamic services were already available. The Supreme Court has stated that '[a] special chapel or place of worship need not be provided for every faith regardless of size; nor must a chaplain, priest, or minister be provided without regard to the extent of the demand.'. . We echoed this when we said, 'The requirement that a state interpose no unreasonable barriers to the free exercise of an inmate's religion cannot be equated with the suggestion that the state has an affirmative duty to provide, furnish, or supply every inmate with a clergyman or religious services of his choice.' Gittlemacker v. Prasse, 428 F.2d 1, 4 (3d Cir.1970). . . . Given this precedent, a reasonable official would not have understood the denial of Sharp's request, whether made by Sharp on behalf of either himself or a small number of inmates, to violate a constitutional right.")

Beckinger v. Township of Elizabeth, No. 10-2002, 2011 WL 2559446, at *4, *5 (3d Cir. June 29, 2011) (not published) ("As the District Court reasoned, after Garcetti and prior to our decision in Reilly on July 1, 2008, the status of First Amendment protection for government employee attendance at hearings as part of employment duties was uncertain. To the extent that Reilly clarified the issue, it did so in the context of testimony presented under compulsion of a subpoena in a criminal trial. Reilly, therefore, does not stand for the proposition that a law enforcement officer has a First Amendment right to attend voluntarily a parking ticket adjudication hearing in derogation of direct orders to the contrary. Thus, it cannot be said that the right asserted in this case was clearly established when Memorandum No. 07-17 was issued. Moreover, Reilly is also distinguishable on the ground that it involved discipline for the content of the employee's testimony. In this case, by way of contrast, the employer made a decision not to pursue parking violation charges against any alleged violators as part of an effort to correct what it felt was an overzealous enforcement of a township parking ordinance. . . . The instant case, rather than focusing on an employer's retaliation based on the substance of testimony, is far more akin to an employer's attempt to restrain the actions of employees which were considered to 'detract from the agency's effective operation.' In this case, a decision was made to not devote public resources to pursuing parking citations issued under unique circumstances. Our holding in Reilly certainly did not address this particular context. Nor have the Appellants cited any authority that would preclude a municipality from instructing its law enforcement officers from appearing at hearings to enforce parking violations. Under this set of facts, it simply cannot be said that the Appellants' 'right' to appear at hearings was 'clearly established.' In summary, we find that a government employee's right to attend a court proceeding to enforce parking violations was not clearly established at the time Memorandum No. 07-17 was issued. . . Thus, we will affirm the District Court's finding of qualified immunity for Appellants McNeilly and Black and its concomitant grant of summary judgment on this basis.")

Burns v. PA Dept. of Corrections, 642 F.3d 163, 179 (3d Cir. 2011) ("[W]e do not think it is unreasonable for prison officials at the time of Burns' hearing to have known that: (1) Burns had a property interest in his prison account, (2) he was entitled to due process before his account could be debited, (3) a later Holloway hearing would determine the amount of money to be deducted, but the actual disciplinary hearing was the only forum for determining if any money should be deducted at all, and (4) due process is violated when a determination to deprive an inmate of a protected interest is based solely on the uncorroborated statements of confidential informants. However, two matters give us pause in concluding that Burns is entitled to relief here. First, although it was not unreasonable for a government official to have realized that due process must be provided in adjudicating whether a prison account can be debited, Burns is the first case that clearly established that the assessment itself implicates a prisoner's protected property interests, even if the account is not actually debited. The devaluation in the property interest in the inmate's funds that results from such an assessment was not clearly established before Burns I, and we do not believe that a reasonable official could have foreseen the analogy to a judgment creditor that formed the basis of our holding in Burns I. Second, we think it understandable that the existence of a later Holloway hearing could have caused a reasonable prison official to believe that, because the Pennsylvania state courts have found that a Holloway hearing was necessary to satisfy due process, that hearing was also sufficient to satisfy due process. Although some officials may have been able to deduce that a Holloway hearing was insufficient to satisfy due process, we do not believe that a reasonable official in Canino's position would have had a 'fair warning' that an assessment of the account prior to the Holloway hearing was subject to due process protections. Prior to Burns I, inmates were only entitled to procedural due process before their accounts were debited. Neither this court, nor any Pennsylvania appellate courts had held that an inmate was also entitled to procedural due process before the account was assessed, even if the fund was not debited before we decided Burns I. Thus we cannot conclude that the circumstances here were sufficient to give prison officials 'fair warning' that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Accordingly, we hold that they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

McSpadden v. Wolfe, No. 08-2209, 2009 WL 1059552, at *5 (3rd Cir. Apr. 21, 2009) ("In the case at hand, Appellees were forced to apply confused caselaw to a confusing factual situation– when presented with a sentence that, in their opinion, violated Bowser, they twice wrote for clarification to the sentencing judge, who, in emphasizing that the April 10, 1997, sentence was 'with all appropriate credit for time served,' led them to believe that the credit specified in the amended order had already been applied. In light of the complexity of Pennsylvania sentencing case law, and the fact that Appellees were confronted with Judge New's ambiguous letter, computation of Appellant's sentence constituted a discretionary function for which qualified immunity may be available.").

Yarris v. County of Delaware, 465 F.3d 129, 142, 143 (3d Cir. 2006)("At the outset, we note that Youngblood addresses law enforcement officials' constitutional duty to preserve evidence prior to conviction, whereas Yarris's claim is based on the CID Detectives' post-conviction conduct. . . . The CID Detectives contend that their alleged mishandling of DNA samples does not amount to a constitutional violation because they could not have acted in bad faith insofar as DNA testing was still in its infancy at the time of the alleged violation. We disagree. . . . [A]ccepting Yarris's allegations as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor, we conclude that even though DNA testing may have been less common at the time of the alleged mishandling of evidence, the CID Detectives were given fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Accordingly, the CID Detectives are not entitled to qualified immunity from this claim at this stage of the proceedings.").

Jones v. Brown, 461 F.3d 353, 364, 365 (3d Cir. 2006) ("Bieregu established as a general matter that prisoners have a First Amendment protected interest in being present when their legal mail is opened. . . But as the Supreme Court emphasized in Saucier, 'that is not enough.'. . . For two reasons, we believe it cannot be said with confidence that reasonable prison administrators in the defendants' position would have realized that they were violating the teachings of Bieregu. First, as we have explained, prison administrators in defendants' position would not have been violating inmates' rights if they reasonably believed they were acting in the interest of inmate and staff health and safety. As we have further explained, the Turner test is highly fact sensitive and, at the time the challenged regulation was adopted, there was no guidance in our case law regarding the application of Bieregu and Turner in the context of the special circumstances encountered in the Fall of 2001. Without being able to determine whether the October 2001 series of anthrax letters had ended or was on-going, a reasonable administrator might well have understood the legal mail policy to be consistent with those cases. Second, even at a later point in time when it became apparent that there was no significant, on-going risk from anthrax attack, we believe a reasonable prison administrator evaluating whether the legal mail policy should be continued might well have concluded that Bieregu was no longer sound law. As previously noted, at that point we had declared without reservation in Oliver v. Fauver, 118 F.3d 175, 178 (3d Cir.1997), that the Supreme Court had 'effectively overruled Bieregu.' While we here hold that this was not true with respect to the First Amendment aspects of Bieregu, in the absence of authority suggesting otherwise, we cannot find a prison administrator to have been unreasonable in taking our statement in Oliver at face value. Accordingly, we will affirm the ruling of both the Allah Court and the Jones Court that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to plaintiffs' damage claims.").

McKee v. Hart, 436 F.3d 165, 171-73 (3d Cir. 2006) ("Before Sattele allegedly engaged in the conduct at issue in this case, we held . . . that a public employee states a First Amendment claim by alleging that his or her employer engaged in a 'campaign of retaliatory harassment' in response to the employee's speech on a matter of public concern, even if the employee could not prove a causal connection between the retaliation and an adverse employment action. . . Jones contends that Suppan and Baldassare, taken together, were sufficient precedent to put Sattele on notice that his conduct–making harassing comments to Jones arising out of Jones's voicing of concerns about corruption in the pharmaceutical industry–was constitutionally prohibited. In Suppan, however, we gave little guidance as to what the threshold of actionability is in retaliatory harassment cases. Instead, we merely held that such a claim existed. . . . Moreover, the alleged conduct in Suppan spanned more than a year and involved the supposed lowering of ratings on employees' promotion evaluations and the admonishment of employees because of their union activities and support for a particular mayoral candidate. . . Based only on our acknowledgment of a retaliatory harassment cause of action in Suppan and the facts of that case, a reasonable official in Sattele's position would not have been aware that making a few comments over the course of a few months (the gist of which was asking an employee to focus on his job) might have run afoul of the First Amendment. Baldassare also does not further Jones's argument that his First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory harassment was clearly established at the time of Sattele's alleged conduct. That case involved a straightforward retaliation claim brought under the First Amendment in which the plaintiff alleged a direct causal connection between his speech on a matter of public concern and his demotion, . . . not that he was subject to a campaign of retaliatory harassment such as the one involved in Suppan and alleged by Jones in this case. Thus, Baldassare would not have helped Sattele understand that his conduct might be constitutionally prohibited. . . . Brennan provided some additional guidance about what types of conduct would support such a claim, holding that some of the plaintiff's allegations (that he had been taken off the payroll for some time and given various suspensions as a result of his speech) would support a retaliation claim, whereas other of his allegations (including his claim that his supervisor stopped using his title to address him) would not because of their triviality. . . However, Brennan was not decided until 2003, after Sattele's alleged conduct, which occurred in the fall of 2002, had already taken place. Thus, to the extent that *Brenna*n added some specificity to the contours of the retaliatory harassment cause of action, an employee's First Amendment right to be free from such harassment was still not clearly established at the time of Sattele's conduct. . . . Accordingly, because of the dearth of precedent of sufficient specificity (and factual similarity to this case) regarding a public employee's First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory harassment by his or her employer at the time of Sattele's conduct, we cannot say that the constitutional right Jones alleged Sattele violated was clearly established. Sattele is therefore entitled to qualified immunity under the second, as well as the first, prong of our Saucier analysis.").

Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 430 F.3d 140, 154, 155 (3d Cir. 2005) (Smith II)("The question we must address, of course, is not simply whether the behavior of the troopers 'shocks the conscience' under the applicable standard, but whether a reasonable officer would have realized as much. In this regard, 'the salient question' we must ask is whether the law, as it existed in 1999, gave the troopers 'fair warning' that their actions were unconstitutional. . . It is not necessary for the plaintiffs to identify a case presenting analogous factual circumstances, but they must show that the contours of the right at issue were ' Asufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right." ' . . While the jurisprudence does not yield a clear definition of 'conscience-shocking' (applicable to situations such as this), we agree with the District Court that the Smiths have not shown that a reasonable officer in the position of these troopers would have understood his conduct to be 'conscience-shocking.' . . We therefore conclude that the troopers are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the state-created danger claim. . . . [W]e think a reasonable officer could recognize a difference between abandoning a private citizen with whom he had come in contact and failing to prolong a two-hour search for a private citizen whom he has been unable to locate . . . . At this stage, such a difference is sufficient for the officers to be entitled to qualified immunity.").

Rivas v. City of Passaic, 365 F.3d 181, 200, 201 (3d Cir. 2004) ("We discern from these cases that, as of November 1998, our case law had established the general proposition that state actors may not abandon a private citizen in a dangerous situation, provided that the state actors are aware of the risk of serious harm and are partly responsible for creating the opportunity for that harm to happen. As the Supreme Court explained in Hope v. Pelzer . . . in some cases 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though "the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful."' In sum, we find that the preexisting law of 'state-created danger' jurisprudence was clearly established. As such, it was sufficient to put Garcia and Rodriguez on notice that their conduct, if deemed unlawful, would not shield them with immunity.").

Doe v. Groody, 361 F.3d 232, 243 (3d Cir. 2004) ("We agree that in determining whether a right is 'clearly established,' we should analyze the right with specificity. . .Where a challenged police action presents a legal question that is 'unusual and largely heretofore undiscussed' . . . or where there is 'at least some significant authority' that lends support of the police action, . . . we have upheld qualified immunity even while deciding that the action in question violates the Constitution. On the other hand, the plaintiff need not show that there is a prior decision that is factually identical to the case at hand in order to establish that a right was clearly established. . . . The principal narrow question in this case is whether in 1999, when these searches occurred, it was clearly established that police could not broaden the scope of a warrant with an unincorporated affidavit. We think that a review of the cases indicates that it was.").

Kopec v. Tate, 361 F.3d 772, 778 (3d Cir. 2004) ("Therefore, we hold that the right of an arrestee to be free from the use of excessive force in the course of his handcuffing clearly was established when Officer Tate acted in this case, and that a reasonable officer would have known that employing excessive force in the course of handcuffing would violate the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, the district court committed error in granting summary judgment in favor of Officer Tate on the basis of his qualified immunity defense. In reaching our result we point out that other courts of appeals have made determinations consistent with ours. [citing cases] ").

Kopec v. Tate, 361 F.3d 772, 779, 785, 786 (3d Cir. 2004) (Smith, J., dissenting) ("The Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed that the determination of qualified immunity requires particularizing the constitutional right 'in light of the specific context of the case.' . . This is where I believe the majority's analysis falls short, because it only relies on the broad proposition that the Fourth Amendment secures the right to be free from the use of excessive force during an arrest, and concludes that Officer Tate violated this clearly established right. This analysis is flawed, in my view, because it fails to determine what the contours of the right were, and neglects to recognize that the law did not provide Officer Tate with fair warning that he was required to respond more promptly than he did to Kopec's complaint that the handcuffs were too tight. . . . In February 2000, only a handful of cases of § 1983 claims involving tight handcuffing were extant. [citing cases] . . . . Prior to the incident at issue in this case, the caselaw did not provide any guidance with respect to how quickly an officer must respond to a complaint that handcuffs have been applied too tightly. Nor was there any guidance in the cases as to how an officer should prioritize his response when there are other tasks in which he is legitimately engaged or may be required to undertake at the time. In light of this caselaw, I conclude that Tate could have reasonably believed that his response to Kopec's complaints was lawful. To put it another way, I believe the law did not put Officer Tate on notice that he had to respond immediately to Kopec's complaint that the handcuffs were too tight. Nor was there any caselaw providing Officer Tate with fair notice that he must stop engaging in the legitimate police task at hand, i.e., interviewing Smith, in order to assess whether the handcuffs were too tight. Because the caselaw did not provide Tate with notice that his response was unlawful, he should be entitled to qualified immunity.").

S.G., as Guardian ad Litem of A.G. v.Sayreville Bd. of Ed., 333 F.3d 417, 423 (3d Cir. 2003) ("[W]e hold that the school's prohibition of speech threatening violence and the use of firearms was a legitimate decision related to reasonable pedagogical concerns and therefore did not violate A.G.'s First Amendment rights. In any event, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established law to the contrary.")

Atkinson v. Taylor, 316 F.3d 257, 264 (3d Cir. 2003) ("In the present case, without weighing the underlying evidence with respect to Atkinson's claim, we conclude that appellants are not entitled to qualified immunity on the ETS claim of future harm. As the Warren Court recognized, the Helling decision established the constitutional right required by the first prong of the Saucier test. . . Atkinson invokes the constitutional right claimed by the Helling prisoner: alleging that he was unwillingly exposed to levels of ETS that pose an unreasonable risk of future harm. Similarly, Atkinson has satisfied the second prong of the Saucier test. The right recognized by the Helling decision is 'clearly established' so that a reasonable prison official would know when he is violating that right.").

McLaughlin v. Watson, 271 F.3d 566, 572 (3d Cir. 2001) ("[W]e agree with Defendant that the District Court erred in summarily dispensing with the qualified immunity issue in favor of Plaintiffs. As discussed above, the analytical framework that a court must use in addressing a 'qualified immunity' argument is well-settled in this Circuit. The court cannot–as the District Court essentially did here–stop with a conclusory statement that Stiles' alleged use of 'influence with plaintiffs' employer' violated the first amendment. Rather, the District Court must go one step further and determine whether the facts alleged by plaintiffs violated a 'clearly established right.' This necessarily entails an analysis of case law existing at the time of the defendant's alleged improper conduct. Without such an analysis there is no way to determine if the defendant should have known that what he or she was doing was constitutionally prohibited . . . . In other words, there must be sufficient precedent at the time of action, factually similar to the plaintiff's allegations, to put defendant on notice that his or her conduct is constitutionally prohibited.").

Brown v. Muhlenberg Township, 269 F.3d 205, 211 & n.4 (3d Cir. 2001) ("If the facts asserted by the Browns are found to be true, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Officer Eberly's position could not have applied these well established principles to the situation before him and have concluded that he could lawfully destroy a pet who posed no imminent danger and whose owners were known, available, and desirous of assuming custody. . . In other words, it would have been apparent to a reasonable officer that shooting Immi would be unlawful. . . . If the unlawfulness of the defendant's conduct would have been apparent to a reasonable official based on the current state of the law, it is not necessary that there be binding precedent from this circuit so advising.").

Brown v. Muhlenberg Township, 269 F.3d 205, 219-22 (3d Cir. 2001) (Garth, J., dissenting and concurring) ("The issue that has divided this panel and which should concern every judge, every police officer and every official who claims qualified immunity by virtue of his or her office is: how do we determine the second prong of the qualified immunity doctrine–i.e., when is the constitutional right which is claimed to have been violated clearly established so as to visit liability on the official? Distressingly, the majority opinion fails to announce a standard by which the bench and the bar can test whether a particular legal principle–that is the particular constitutional right–is 'clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity. I strongly urge that in deciding this second prong, at the least a balancing process should be undertaken whereby the factors to be balanced are: (1) Was the particular right which was alleged to have been violated specifically defined, or did it have to be constructed or gleaned from analogous general precepts? [citing Wilson v.Layne] (2) Has that particular right ever been discussed or announced by either the Supreme Court or by this Circuit? (3) If neither the Supreme Court nor this Circuit has pronounced such a right, have there been persuasive appellate decisions of other circuit courts– and by that I mean more than just one or two–so that the particular right could be said to be known generally? (4) Were the circumstances under which such a right was announced of the nature that an official who claimed qualified immunity would have, acting objectively under pre-existing law, reasonably understood that his act or conduct was unlawful? . . . . Can it really be held that the Fourth Amendment 'seizure of property' right was readily and generally known to apply to the shooting of a Rottweiler which was loose on the street? Can we really say that this particular Fourth Amendment principle was defined with particular specificity and was therefore clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity? I am aware of no authority which defines the principle with sufficient particularity so as to make it applicable to the situation here. . . . The relevant focus has to be on the final part of the qualified immunity inquiry–whether the right allegedly violated was clearly established so that a reasonable official in Eberly's position would understand that what he was doing violated that right. . . . If there has never been a constitutional right articulated that would prevent a police officer from shooting a barking, unleashed, uncontrolled dog such as the Rottweiler which was killed–as there has not been in this jurisdiction or any others–how can the absence of such a right as postulated by the majority constitute a clearly established right so as to hold Eberly liable?").

Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 322 (3d Cir.2001) ("We conclude that the contours of defendants' legal obligations under the Constitution were not sufficiently clear in 1995 that a reasonable prison official would understand that the non-consensual disclosure of a prisoner's HIV status violates the Constitution.").

Doe v. County of Centre, 242 F.3d 437, 454 (3d Cir. 2001) ("The Supreme Court has directed that the right in question should be defined in a particularized and relevant manner, rather than abstractly. . . .Therefore, we define the right in question as the right of HIV-positive individuals and related persons to be free from generalized discrimination when public agencies place HIV-negative individuals into their HIV-positive private homes. To defeat qualified immunity, this right must have been sufficiently clear such that a reasonable official would have known that enacting and applying the County's policy would have violated the right. . . To the contrary, however, the placement of HIV-negative children into HIV-positive private homes presents a novel legal issue.").

Sterling v. Borough of Minersville, 232 F.3d 190, 197, 198 (3d Cir. 2000) (". . . Wilinsky testified that he did not include suspicion of homosexual activity in his police report because of the confidential nature of the information. Obviously, then, Wilinsky was aware that one's sexual orientation is intrinsically personal and no compelling reason to disclose such information was warranted. Because the confidential and private nature of the information was obvious, and because the right to privacy is well-settled, the concomitant constitutional violation was apparent notwithstanding the fact that the very action in question had not previously been held to be unlawful.").

Gruenke v. Seip, 225 F.3d 290, 300 (3d Cir. 2000) ("Merely because the Supreme Court has not yet ruled on whether a school official's administration of a pregnancy test to a student violates her Fourth Amendment rights does not mean the right is not clearly established. Moreover, a review of current Fourth Amendment law in the public school context reveals not only that the right is clearly established, but also that Seip's conduct as alleged was objectively unreasonable.").

Bartholomew v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 221 F.3d 425, 429, 430 (3d Cir. 2000) ("[W]hile it was 'clearly established' that warrants must be particular, the narrower and more appropriate question, i.e. whether it was clearly established that one has a constitutional right to be free from a search pursuant to a warrant based upon a sealed list of items to be seized, has not heretofore been answered, at least in those terms. . . It simply cannot be said, therefore, that 'the contours of the right'–the precise right at issue here–were 'sufficiently clear' such that 'a reasonable official would understand that what he[or she] is doing violates that right.' . . . We now make clear what was heretofore not 'sufficiently clear' and hold that, generally speaking, where the list of items to be seized does not appear on the face of the warrant, sealing that list, even though it is 'incorporated' in the warrant, would violate the Fourth Amendment.").

Assaf v. Fields, 178 F.3d 170, 177 (3d Cir. 1999) ("Given the nature of the inquiry in the Branti-Elrod cases, we reject appellees' argument that qualified immunity is 'well suited to cases where there is no "bright line" rule.'. . Were we to adopt this position, we would effectively eviscerate the constitutional imperative behind Branti-Elrod jurisprudence. Under the qualified immunity regime contemplated by appellees, liability in such areas could never attach because the lack of 'bright line' rules inherent in the doctrine would continually provide cover for violations of constitutional rights. In an earlier case in which we rejected the defendants' qualified immunity claim, we explained that if we were to require ' "precise factual correspondence" between the case at issue and a previous case ... we would not be "faithful to the purposes of immunity by permitting ... officials one liability-free violation of a constitutional or statutory requirement."' . . . . Contrary to the District Court's assertion, our cases have given guidance to government officials within our circuit. An employee may be terminated for political reasons only if 'a difference in party affiliation [is] highly likely to cause an official to be ineffective in carrying out the duties and responsibilities of the office,' . . . and that only if an employee's duties make it possible to cause 'serious political embarrassment,'. . . will the position meet the narrow Branti-Elrod exception.").

Ogrod v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 21-2499, 2022 WL 1093128, at *8, *13 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 12, 2022) ("Defendants' duty under the due process clause and Brady to disclose exculpatory evidence was not clearly established in 1996, when Ogrod was convicted of Barbara Jean's murder. Accordingly, we hold that the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Count II of the Complaint insofar as it rests on the withholding of material exculpatory evidence, and we grant Defendants' Motions insofar as they seeks dismissal of that aspect of Count II. . . . We are aware of no legal authority on which we could base a conclusion that the individual Defendants had a clearly established duty to intervene to prevent his false arrest, malicious prosecution, false imprisonment and deprivation of liberty. While Smith is clear that there is such a duty in connection with an excessive force violation, there is simply no clear authority that such a duty exists in other contexts. We therefore conclude that the individual Defendants did not violate a clearly established right by allegedly failing to intervene in their fellow officers' actions in fabricating evidence and engaging in malicious prosecution. Consequently, we conclude that the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Ogrod's failure to intervene claims and we dismiss Count V on that basis")

Remlinger v. Lebanon County, No. 1:18-CV-00984, 2020 WL 3104008, at *4 (M.D. Pa. June 11, 2020) ("Although Defendants are correct that issues of qualified immunity should be resolved 'at the earliest possible stage in litigation,'. . . this does not mean that qualified immunity must be resolved before the relevant facts have been developed. . . As the report and recommendation notes, 'it is generally unwise to venture into a qualified immunity analysis at the pleading stage as it is necessary to develop the factual record in the vast majority of cases.'. . Here, the court agrees with the magistrate judge's conclusion that additional factual development is necessary with regard to Defendants' assertion of qualified immunity. The moving corrections Defendants' argument that the right at issue was not clearly established also fails. Although Defendants argue that there is no binding precedent from the Supreme Court or the Third Circuit establishing the right, this does not automatically entitle them to qualified immunity. Where the existence of a right is 'obvious,' it may be 'deemed clearly established even without materially similar cases.'. . In the report and recommendation, Judge Saporito concludes that the present case might present a situation where the right at issue is so obvious as to permit a finding that it is clearly established. . . The court finds no error in this conclusion and will accordingly overrule the Defendants' objection.")

Duvall on behalf of Sowell v. Hustler, No. CV 18-3278, 2020 WL 1357315, at *13–15 & n.214 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 19, 2020) ("Th[e] fact-specific approach set out by the Supreme Court is a particularly odd fit for cases like this one. The Court has advised that '[i]f the law did not put the officer on notice that his conduct would be clearly unlawful, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is appropriate,'. . . In this case, however, where credibility is an issue and most of the operative facts are therefore in dispute, it is a futile exercise to attempt to determine whether the officer's 'conduct,' which is wholly undefined, violated clearly established law. Critical disputes leave the fatal encounter with essentially no factual content with which to make the fact-intensive comparisons that are the crux of the qualified immunity analysis.[214] [fn. 214: See Curly v. Klem, 499 F.3d 199, 208 (3d Cir. 2007) (noting that the Supreme Court's instruction that qualified immunity should ordinarily be decided well before trial "is well and good when there are no factual issues in a case," but that "often the facts are intensely disputed, and our precedent makes clear that such disputes must be resolved by a jury after a trial"). Indeed, some Justices have aptly recognized that some, and perhaps ail, excessive force cases are simply 'not meet' for the two-part qualified immunity inquiry. Saucier, 533 U.S. at 214 (Ginsburg, J., concurring, joined by Stevens & Breyer, JJ.).] There is a ghost at the center of this case, and there is little use in comparing its hazy outline with the fact patterns of other officer-involved shootings. Nevertheless, it is crystal clear that the Court is required to conduct both steps of the Saucier analysis—in this context, courts may not deny summary judgment simply because there are genuine disputes of material fact, . . . as Rule 56 would otherwise seem to require. . . .Even if there were no cases directly on point, the Court would conclude that the unreasonableness of the officers' conduct in shooting Sowell—again, on the current record and viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs—was so obvious that it meets the standard for clearly established law. There are cases in which, although the applicable constitutional rule is expressed in general terms, that general rule 'appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . As long as 'the state of the law' gives 'fair warning' of what is permitted and what is forbidden, 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . Indeed, the Third Circuit held, in a case with some similarities to this one, that the 'immediate threat' standard of Graham and Garner, although general, would have made it clear to reasonable officers that they could not shoot an 'armed distraught man' who was not fleeing and not threatening anyone but himself. . . In this case, however, it is not necessary to rely on the obviousness of the constitutional violation. Published Third Circuit precedent put the officers on notice well before September 2016 that using deadly force in these circumstances was unreasonable. . . . Similarly, even if the initial use of force was reasonable, the unreasonableness of the officers' continued use of deadly force was clearly established under published Third Circuit precedent. More than five years before these events, the Third Circuit had held that it was already clearly established that '[e]ven where an officer is initially justified in using force, he may not continue to use such force after it has become evident that the threat justifying the force has vanished.'. . . Lamont would give any reasonable officer adequate notice that the use of deadly force is only permitted so long as an immediate threat persists. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to them, Plaintiffs have shown that the officers violated Sowell's clearly established right to be free of unreasonable seizures. As a result, summary judgment will be denied and Plaintiffs' excessive-force claim will proceed to trial.")

Cuvo, on behalf of A.C. v. Pocono Mountain School District, No. 3:18-CV-01210, 2019 WL 7105560, at *6–8 (M.D. Pa. Dec. 23, 2019) ("As discussed above, we find the allegations of the second amended complaint sufficient to plausibly state a state-created danger claim at this, the pleadings stage. But the defendants may nevertheless prevail on this defense under the second prong of the Saucier analysis. . . .The claimed violation of A.C.'s constitutional rights occurred on December 18, 2017. We previously ruled that the plaintiffs failed to identify a controlling case or a robust consensus of cases that could be said to have clearly established the unconstitutionality of the defendants' conduct. . . . Indeed, our own review of prior precedent reveals no cases where a state-created danger was established after a student-athlete was required to participate in tackle-football drills, or other obviously violent contact drills, without protective equipment or on a gymnasium floor covered with wrestling mats, which is the level of specificity that both controlling case law and a robust consensus of cases would appear to require us to apply in this analysis. . . . Nevertheless, the plaintiffs now argue that Hall v. Martin, Civ. Action No. 17-523, 2017 WL 3298316 (W.D. Pa. 2017), is controlling as it shows that the right at issue is clearly established and provided a fair warning to the defendants. . . In Hall, the plaintiff, a high school student, was instructed by the gym teacher, Martin, to play floor hockey 'like regular hockey' as a regular gym activity. The students were provided with floor hockey sticks, goalie nets, and a hockey net. They were not provided with eye or facial protection. During the game, Hall played goalie and was hit in the left eye by the floor hockey puck causing him to be permanently legally blind. Unlike the facts of our case, in Hall, the gym teacher was aware from past incidents that students who played goalie were injured after being hit by a floor hockey puck. Some of those incidents were reported to the school nurse who then notified the school district about the injuries. Under those facts, the court found that the plaintiff pled sufficient facts to state a viable § 1983 claim against the gym teacher, thereby defeating a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. The court did not address the application of qualified immunity as the motion to dismiss did not raise it. Here, the plaintiffs define the constitutional right as prohibiting students from engaging in dangerous sports without protective equipment where it is foreseeable that an injury will occur. . . In response to the defendants' position that Hall is distinguishable from the facts of this case because in Hall there was an awareness of prior injuries, the plaintiffs contend that the issue of prior injuries establishes the foreseeability element to the state-created danger theory. Further, the plaintiffs point out that we previously ruled that the foreseeability element was met in the first amended complaint without an allegation of prior injuries. . . . Under these circumstances, based on the facts alleged in the second amended complaint, we find that at the pleading stage it is premature determine whether the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the plaintiffs' § 1983 state-created damages claim. We further find that it is necessary to develop a factual record on this issue.")

Siehl v. City of Johnstown, No. CV 18-77J, 2019 WL 585226, at *11 (W.D. Pa. Feb. 13, 2019) ("Defendants argue that they are protected by qualified immunity because police officers were not subject to Brady. . . at the time of Plaintiff's trial and conviction in 1991 and 1992. In addition, Defendants argue that they have been unable to locate a decision that would put Defendant Brant on notice that his alleged observations during the criminal defense expert's (Bennett) forensic evaluation violated the Constitution.Plaintiff responds that both of Defendants' arguments are incorrect. Plaintiff concedes that Brady did not apply to police officers at the time of Plaintiff's trial and conviction. Plaintiff contends, however, that Brady is not the source of Plaintiff's claims against Brant and Ermlick. Instead, Plaintiff argues that he relies on long established precedent establishing that the Due Process Clause prohibits officers from engaging in deliberate deception and suppression of evidence, citing Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103, 112 (1935) and Pyle v. Kansas, 317 U.S. 213, 216 (1942). Plaintiff then directs the Court to Haley v. City of Boston, where the First Circuit Court of Appeals acknowledged the proscription originating from Mooney and Pyle, stating that '[d]eliberate concealment of material evidence by the police, designed to grease the skids for false testimony and encourage wrongful conviction, unarguably implicates a defendant's due process rights.'. . The Haley court concluded that the context of Pyle 'makes it apparent that this holding encompasses the misconduct of police officers[,]' and that further progeny clearly established the law regarding concealment by 1972. . . The Court must again deny qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings. According to the Complaint, Brant knew that his conclusion regarding the showerhead fingerprint was false. Ermlick knew that his conclusions regarding the blood splatter and presumptive bloodstains on Plaintiff's shoes were false, along with his mid-trial testing showing that the tennis shoes actually corroborated Plaintiff's statement to police. Although Plaintiff invokes Brady in Count III, he also invokes his due process protections under the Fourteenth Amendment which is sufficient to state a claim pursuant to Mooney and its progeny. Therefore, Plaintiff's allegations, if true, would constitute a violation of clearly established law that would have been apparent to a reasonable officer in 1991.")

Thomas v. City of Philadelphia, No. 17-4196, 2018 WL 684836, at *8-10 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 5, 2018) ("The fundamental distinction between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments is temporal: The Fourth Amendment's 'protection against unlawful seizures extends only until trial.'. . Once trial starts, however, the Fourteenth Amendment kicks in: 'The guarantee of due process of law...protects defendants during an entire criminal proceeding through and after trial.'. . This temporal distinction suggests that a procedural due process right against malicious prosecution may exist. However, this was, and indeed remains, an unsettled question, meaning that Mr. Thomas fails to overcome the defense of qualified immunity, discussed next. . . .The procedural due process right against malicious prosecution is not clearly established. The Supreme Court has not yet articulated such a right. And the Third Circuit Court of Appeals stopped short of deciding the right's 'viability' in 2014, let alone in the early 1990s when Mr. Thomas interacted with the defendants. . . In response, Mr. Thomas shifts his focus from the right to the officers' conduct. As he puts it, the 'exact constitutional provision' that has been violated is 'irrelevant,' so long as some constitutional provision is clearly violated. The officers' conduct as alleged in this case was clearly unconstitutional: it violated Mr. Thomas's clearly established Fourth Amendment right against malicious prosecution. But the conduct was not clearly unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, the question becomes: what is a Court to do when certain conduct is clearly unconstitutional, but due to a different constitutional source? Is there still qualified immunity as to the unsettled constitutional source — in this case, the Fourteenth Amendment? The parties each endeavor to marshal case law to support their positions. On the one hand, courts have addressed qualified immunity as providing 'fair and clear warning' to officers 'that their conduct is unlawful.' Halsey, 750 F.3d at 295 (quoting Devereaux v. Abbey, 263 F.3d 1070, 1075 (9th Cir. 2001) (en banc)) (emphasis added); see also United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 270 (1997) (explaining that "the qualified immunity test is simply the adaptation of the fair warning standard" from the criminal context). As Mr. Thomas put the issue: 'The dispositive question here is whether Defendants Devlin and Worrell were on notice that their conduct violated Mr. Thomas' constitutional rights. The answer is yes.' On the other hand, '[t]he contours of the right,' as opposed to the conduct, 'must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640 (1987) (emphasis added). The Court holds that this latter 'right-centric' position is the correct one. It would be strange to say that right X is clearly established just because right Y is clearly established and happens to prohibit the same conduct. Indeed, precisely because right Y is clearly established (in this case, precisely because a Fourth Amendment right against malicious prosecution is clearly established), Mr. Thomas has a clear avenue to recovery for being the target of a malicious prosecution. Therefore, the Court holds that the individual defendants have qualified immunity from a claim for malicious prosecution in violation of the procedural due process clause.")

Castellani v. City of Atl. City, No. CV 13-5848 (JBS/AMD), 2017 WL 3112820, at *14-15 (D.N.J. July 21, 2017) ("Thus, the question presented here is whether a reasonable officer in Defendant Wheaten's position would have understood that it violated the Fourth Amendment to use mechanical force against an individual who was pinned to the ground face down by five officers and was told '[w]e're ok right now.' Applying the evidence most favorably to Plaintiff, a reasonable officer, even arriving late to the scene and assuming the other officers followed proper procedures, could not have believed that immediately unleashing his K9, without warning or without assessing the situation, to attack a person who, under Plaintiff's testimony, was not resisting arrest and restrained by five officers, was lawful. It would have been clear to a reasonable K9 officer approaching the scene that the unleashing of the K9 to attack the downed civilian was excessive and unconstitutional. Additionally, clearly establishing the existence of the right does 'not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The Supreme Court gave no indication that its decision in Pauly was intended to repudiate the proposition that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.' Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002). Furthermore, Justice Ginsberg's concurrence in Pauly confirms that the per curium opinion 'does not foreclose the denial of summary judgment' on qualified immunity where fact disputes exist on material issues. . . Accordingly, and in light of the previously identified disputed issues of material fact, Defendant Wheaten is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . While Plaintiff does not submit any factually-identical cases regarding the deployment of a police dog while five officers have already subdued a plaintiff, it was certainly clearly established in June 2013 that even if someone posed a threat at the time force was initiated on them, an officer cannot continue to apply serious force when the threat has subsided. . . .Regardless of what Defendant Wheaten knew as he arrived to the scene and when he initially deployed the dog, it was clearly established at the time that he could not continue holding the dog on Plaintiff for two additional minutes.")

Igwe v. Skaggs, No. CV 16-1403, 2017 WL 395745, at *4-7 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 30, 2017) ("Citing this mid-level culpability standard, Mr. Igwe alleges Officer Skaggs was not involved in a high-speed chase the day of the accident and, having voluntarily undertaken the pursuit, had a reasonable three minute opportunity to deliberate. . .Mr. Igwe alleges Officer Skaggs, against Monroeville's policy, voluntarily joined the pursuit of the suspect despite Officer Supancic's dispatch as 'secondary unit;' failed to advise dispatch he intended to provide assistance until he approached the intersection where the accident occurred; failed to obtain approval from a pursuant supervisor before joining the pursuit in violation of Monroeville's policy; failed to comply with Monroeville's 'Pursuit' and 'Emergency Response' policies as well as Pennsylvania law on pursuits and emergency vehicles; drove his police car at a high rate of speed in the area of a retail shopping area; entered an intersection against a red traffic signal; and outran the Opticom safety system, all of which evidences Skaggs 'consciously disregarded a substantial risk that great harm would result from his conduct.'. . Taking Mr. Igwe's allegations as true and applying the mid-level culpability standard, the allegations give rise to a plausible claim under a state-created danger theory. The thrust of Mr. Igwe's allegations focuses on Officer Skaggs' decision to voluntarily assume a role as a responding officer in violation of Monroeville policy, knew he could terminate his response at any time, and drove his police car in reckless disregard for the safety of the general public. While Mr. Igwe provides us with no authority, nor could we find any, where this alleged conduct shocks the conscience and thus requires we dismiss Officer Skaggs under qualified immunity, we cannot find Mr. Igwe's allegations could never state a substantive due process claim at this preliminary stage. At this stage, we address only whether Mr. Igwe pleaded Officer Skaggs consciously disregarded a great risk of harm by voluntarily joining a police pursuit including over-running several red lights. Until we review the discovery, we defer to Mr. Igwe's allegation of either no need to pursue or a limited emergency. Under this rubric, Officer Skaggs' speeding through traffic lights in a voluntary pursuit of a suspect leaving his vehicle may shock the conscience. . . . Having found Mr. Igwe pleads a plausible substantive due process claim, we now must determine whether this substantive due process right was 'clearly established' when Officer Skaggs decided to join a police pursuit on December 8, 2014. . . .Earlier this month in White, the Supreme Court again reminded district courts we must identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances violated the Constitution to defeat qualified immunity. . . While our Court of Appeals defined the high standards in a hyperpressurized police pursuit, we are aware of no controlling precedent applying when an officer decides to join in a police pursuit and whether he has time to deliberate. . . A clearly established right is not defined by the state actors' internal guidelines and policies. . . . As conceded by the absence of authority in the parties' briefs, we are unaware of any existing precedent giving fair warning to Officer Skaggs deciding to join an ongoing high speed police pursuit as to his substantive due process liability. We have no guidelines in clearly established law. As in Taylor, we have a general standard with no clearly established law. We have general guidance from the Supreme Court in Lewis and our Court of Appeals in Sanford regarding the officer's potential mid-level culpability depending on the immediacy of the need for police action and generally directing a test focusing on whether he 'consciously disregarded a great risk of harm' in circumstances where there is less than a 'split-second' decision but more than an 'unhurried judgment.' But this general test does not define the procedures or conduct permissible when deciding to join a police pursuit. Officer Skaggs has no clearly established caselaw advising when he can decide to join a high speed police pursuit during the course of his police duties. As in the Fourth Amendment context in White, this case of an allegedly voluntary joinder into an ongoing police pursuit presents a unique set of facts and circumstances. . . Also, unlike the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit's decisions in Browder v. Casaus, . . . the parties do not dispute Officer Skaggs acted within the scope of his police duties and did not speed for personal purposes. Counsel has not shown, and we are not aware, of any clearly established federal constitutional right contravened by Officer Skaggs' deciding to join a police pursuit and, through violating state driving laws, causing fatal harm to Ms. Robinson. Absent a clearly established federal constitutional right, Mr. Igwe may seek damages under state law claims but Officer Skaggs is immune from civil rights liability.")

Kenneth v. Palmerton Area Sch. Dist. et al., No. 3:14-CV-00068, 2016 WL 3090404, at *7-8 (M.D. Pa. June 2, 2016) ("The viability of a state-created danger claim is well-settled. . . However, no published opinion of the Third Circuit has found that a state-created danger arises when coaches fail to take certain precautions in athletic practice or in any analogous situation. . . . Here, Plaintiffs allege that the relevant constitutional right is 'the student's right to freedom from school officials' deliberate indifference to, or affirmative acts that increase the danger of, serious injury from unjustified invasions of bodily integrity perpetrated by third parties in the school setting.'. . In support of this constitutional right, Plaintiffs rely on an opinion from the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, Sciotto v. Marple Newtown Sch. Dist., 81 F. Supp. 2d 559, 568 (E.D. Pa. 1999). However, as explained by the Third Circuit in Hinterberger, which was decided in 2013, over a decade after Sciotto was decided, this right was not clearly established. . . In fact, the Third Circuit cited Sciottio in their opinion, yet still found that the right was not clearly established. . . Because Sheldon's alleged right was not clearly established at the time of his injury, Coach Walkowiak is entitled to qualified immunity. Judgment will be entered in favor of Coach Walkowiak on this claim.")

Rodriguez v. Panarello, 119 F. Supp. 3d 331, 342-43 (E.D. Pa. 2015) ("The most compelling aspect of this case is the height at which Plaintiff was standing when the Taser was discharged. The record does not reveal the precise height of the roof of the vehicle on which Mr. Rodriguez was standing at the time, but for purposes of analogy it is enough to note that the prevailing standard for fall protection in general industry workplaces is four feet. . . Despite that, the circuit court decision most analogous to this case is of no help to the plaintiff. In Harper v. Davis, an alcohol-fueled disturbance at a barbecue prompted an inebriated suspect to fire a rifle inside a home. . . He then hid in the woods with the weapon, perching on a tree branch eight feet above the ground. . . When found by officers, he was told both to descend the tree and show his hands. . . The suspect protested he could not do both, but identified for the officers the location of the gun down by his feet. . . Upon seeing the gun, even though the plaintiff was not holding it and had volunteered its location, an officer Tasered him, and the resulting fall caused paraplegia. . . The Court concluded that the officer's perception of risk was reasonable and warranted the precautionary use of force. . . In this case, the officers did not see a gun, but responded to radio calls that included a report of shots fired, and a man with a gun. Unlike the suspect in Harper, Plaintiff here resisted the officers' instructions, and most importantly he refused to show his hands. The law is clear that an officer need not be accurate in his perception of a risk in order to justify deadly force, but only that his perception of the threat and the corresponding need to use force is objectively reasonable under the conditions he faced. Moreover, to defeat a qualified immunity defense, the right allegedly violated must have been clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . As of 2012, several courts had found the use of a Taser to bring a resisting subject under control was reasonable. . . .The parameters of the constitutional use of a Taser in circumstances like those Officer Panarello confronted would not have been sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would have known his conduct was unlawful. . . Officer Panarello is thus protected by qualified immunity for his conduct using a Taser on Plaintiff.") Kingsmill v. Szewczak, 117 F. Supp. 3d 657 (E.D. Pa. 2015) ("Although the parties did not identify, and we were unable to locate, a case with a cognate claim and a constellation of factual averments, this is the type of case where the alleged conduct is outrageous enough, and the broad contours of the constitutional right sufficiently well-known, that Officer Szewczak was on notice that his conduct violated Kingsmill's constitutional rights. Officer Szewczak lured Kingsmill away from a physical altercation, engaged him in conversation, and then watched as Brown hit Kingsmill in the face with a steel pipe. Officer Szewczak reacted by telling Brown to flee the scene, declining to make a police report, and refusing to render assistance to the injured Kingsmill. . .Qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . . Although this particular scenario does not appear to have been considered by our Court of Appeals, the conduct alleged is not the type qualified immunity protects. Any reasonable officer at the time of this incident—February 9, 2014—would have known that he had a duty not to place an individual at greater risk of injury from a physical assault by hailing him away from the altercation and then declining to intervene. A reasonable officer would have known that he had a duty not to command such an individual to comply with a directive, so that compliance would increase the risk of harm to him. This is not a case where the 'most that can be said of the state functionaries in this case is that they stood by and did nothing when ... circumstances dictated a more active role for them.'. . . Officer Szewczak exercised his authority to command Kingsmill to disengage from a physical altercation, and, as a result of Kingsmill's compliance, Brown was able to attack him from behind. Officer Szewczak's failure to warn Kingsmill that Brown was approaching from behind might appear more akin to the inaction that prior courts have found insufficient to ground liability under a state-created danger theory. But Officer Szewczak did not just fail to warn: his initial hail and interference with the assault in this circumstance placed Kingsmill at risk of additional serious injury. After placing Kingsmill in greater danger than he had been before, the officer did not bother to warn him of Brown's oncoming assault. Nor is this a case where the exercise of a state actor's discretion did not increase the danger. . . To be sure, Officer Szewczak was not obligated to protect either Kingsmill or Brown, and his knowledge of their altercation was not sufficient to create an affirmative duty to act. But once Officer Szewczak chose to call Kingsmill to his patrol car, and chose to continue their conversation despite Brown's approach, pipe in hand, he put Kingsmill in greater danger of the assault from Brown. . . . Officer Szewczak may not have placed Kingsmill in the physical confrontation with Brown, but observing Kingsmill in such a snake pit, he made it worse by hailing him and commanding him to disengage, leaving him vulnerable to Brown's attack from behind. Such conduct is sufficiently outrageous that a reasonable officer would have known that doing so could violate Kingsmill's constitutional rights. We find that Kingsmill's right to be free from state-created danger in this particular factual circumstance was clearly established when this incident took place in February of 2014, when this incident took place. Officer Szewczak is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Biddle v. Parker, No. CV 13-343-RGA, 2015 WL 5190694, at *3 (D. Del. Sept. 4, 2015) ("Similar to the claim at issue in Taylor, Counts III and IV assert Plaintiff's right to the proper implementation of training, supervision, and policies for handling individuals who suffer from seizures. As of May 16, 2012-the date of the challenged conduct-there was no Supreme Court decision establishing such a right. Further, there was not a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' suggesting that such a right existed. Plaintiff fails to cite a single case suggesting the existence of an inmate's right to the implementation of adequate training and policies for handling inmates with seizures. . . As the Supreme Court held in Taylor, even if HRYCI's training and policies regarding seizures were as deficient as Counts III and IV allege, there was no precedent in May 2012 that would have made clear to Supervisor Defendants 'that they were overseeing a system that violated the Constitution.' Taylor, 135 S. Ct. at 2045. Thus, Counts III and IV do not allege a 'statutory or constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.' Therefore, Supervisor Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Counts III and IV").

Gaymon v. Borough of Collingdale, No. CIV.A. 14-5454, 2015 WL 4389585, at *9-10 (E.D. Pa. July 17, 2015) ("Here, Mrs. Gaymon openly videotaped the officers, and the recording took place within the curtilage of her property and inside her home. No officer could credibly claim any expectation of privacy on Plaintiffs' property or inside their house. If anyone had an expectation of privacy under these circumstances, it was clearly the Gaymons. Unlike Kelly II, there are no allegations that Defendant White stopped and in good faith sought advice provided from a prosecuting authority. Moreover, in Kelly there was at least some basis on which a uniformed officer might be confused, because the recording there was 'surreptitious,' as opposed to Mrs. Gaymon's open and obvious recording. Without a doubt, Mrs. Gaymon wanted the officer to know he was being recorded. This was not an 'inherently dangerous situation,' such as a traffic stop. . . Rather, the officers responded during daylight to a non-violent complaint about a vehicle's tire touching the curb in a residential neighborhood. . . . Killingsworth involved events in 2011. Even if I assume that there was still no clearly established First Amendment right to record officers by 2014, the lack of such a right would not transform a citizen's act of recording on her own property to something criminal in nature justifying arrest. It is certainly clear that the absence of a First Amendment right to record from the confines of one's own home would not amount to exigent or other circumstances that would justify entering the Plaintiffs' home without a valid warrant or consent. . . The Killingsworth plaintiffs were all citizens who came upon police activity on public streets and undertook the role of observers and recorders of events. The issues presented by cases of that nature, where the person inserts himself into a situation as the police are discharging their duties, bear little relevance to this case, where Mrs. Gaymon was either on or inside her private property at all times, the police had entered onto that property without permission, and in addition to herself, both her daughter and husband were directly affected by the actions of the police. Finally, Plaintiffs' retaliatory arrest claim focuses on the Plaintiffs' First Amendment right to 'verbally express their disagreement with and challenge the authority' of the Defendant officers. . . 'The Supreme Court has explicitly held that an individual has a viable claim against the government when he is able to prove that the government took action against him in retaliation for his exercise of First Amendment rights.'. . It is indisputable that 'the First Amendment protects a significant amount of verbal criticism and challenge directed at police officers.'. . In fact, the Supreme Court has gone so far as to say that '[t]he freedom of individuals verbally to oppose or challenge police action without thereby risking arrest is one of the principal characteristics by which we distinguish a free nation from a police state.'. . . Here, a jury could reasonably conclude that the Defendant officers arrested Mrs. Gaymon and Ms. Purnell for voicing disagreement about the officers' actions in violation of the First Amendment. Accordingly, a jury could find liability on every constitutional claim alleged without ever needing to confront the issue of whether recording an officer under these circumstances is protected by the First Amendment. . . It is the combination of factors that make this case compelling to the Court on the facts alleged: the frivolous nature of the neighbor's initial complaint; the absence of lurking risks inherent in other police activities, such as traffic stops; the alleged aggressiveness of the responding officers; the purported threat to deploy Tasers against a family on the premises of their own home; the overall disproportionate response of law enforcement; the protective instincts of a wife and mother seeking only to record what was occurring; the makeweight nature of the criminal charges brought; and finally, the contorted nature of the qualified immunity defense raised. Defendants have the right to contest, and may well disprove, these allegations at trial. But the contention that no reasonable officer would have understood that such conduct would palpably violate our Constitution is utterly lacking in merit. Therefore, qualified immunity is not a viable defense at this preliminary stage. Defendants' Motion has been denied.") Montgomery v. Killingsworth, No. 13CV256, 2015 WL 289934, at *11-12 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 22, 2015) ("[T]he clearly established right cannot be the broad First Amendment right to be free from retaliation for engaging in protected speech, although the specific right in this case differs from the one the Court defined in Reichle. Unlike Reichle, Fleck asserts the constitutional right to be free from an arrest that is not supported by probable cause and was initiated in retaliation for peacefully criticizing a government official. This right was clearly established at the time of Fleck's arrest. . . . Under Fleck's version of that day's events, Nicholson and Doe thus violated clearly established law. Losch was decided many years before the incident here, and it involved a constitutional right that almost mirrors the right asserted by Fleck in this case: the right to be free from an arrest that lacked probable cause and was initiated in retaliation for the peaceful observation and criticism of a police officer. To be sure, the cases are not factually identical, but the rights invoked in both cases are close enough to establish that 'existing precedent [has] placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . .[T]he right that Fleck asserts was clearly established because any reasonable officer would have known that arresting her in this manner and for this reason violated her constitutional rights.")

Montgomery v. Killingsworth, No. 13CV256, 2015 WL 289934, at *13-15 & n.7 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 22, 2015) ("Although Montgomery and Loeb urge the court to follow the two-step Saucier procedure and first 'reaffirm the existence of a First Amendment right to observe and record public police activities in public,' it declines to do so and addresses only the second Saucier step. That is because, unlike Fleck's case, these cases are ones 'in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.'. . .Under their version of the facts, which the court must adopt here, Montgomery and Loeb were arrested without probable cause while they were peacefully recording police officers performing their duties in public. . . The dispositive inquiry here is thus whether they had a clearly established constitutional right to peacefully record police officers performing their duties in public. . . . Existing precedent is not limited to Third Circuit case law; case law from other circuits is relevant in analyzing whether a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct violated the Constitution. . . Importantly, this inquiry focuses only on the state of the law at the time of the arrests: January 23, 2011, for Montgomery, and July 14, 2011, for Loeb. . . Relying on case law from the First, Ninth, and Eleventh circuits, Montgomery and Loeb contend that this right was clearly established at the time of their arrests. . . . Killingsworth and Gaspar, on the other hand, draw mostly on a Third Circuit case in arguing that the right to peacefully film police conduct was not clearly established at the time of the arrests. . . . Given this pre-existing and recent Third Circuit case law, Montgomery and Loeb did not have a clearly established right to record police officers while they were performing their duties in public. The case law at the time of their 2011 arrests did not establish a clear constitutional rule such that reasonable police officers would know that they were violating the constitutional rights of Montgomery and Loeb. . . . Killingsworth and Gaspar are thus entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment retaliation claims asserted against them by Montgomery and Loeb, respectively. . . . Whether the Third Circuit will eventually decide to follow what appears to be a growing trend in other circuits to recognize a First Amendment right to observe and record police activity is, of course, not for this court to decide, even if there are good policy reasons [to] adopt that change.")

Hartman v. Gloucester Tp., No. 12–2085, 2014 WL 2773581, *10-*12 (D.N.J. June 19, 2014) ("Defendants argue that the right to be free from entry of a home under the community caretaking function was not clearly established in April, 2010. Ray v. Twp. Of Warren was decided on November 23, 2010 (after Hartman's arrest) and held that:

> The community caretaking doctrine cannot be used to justify warrantless searches of a home. Whether that exception can ever apply outside the context of an automobile search, we need not now decide. It is enough to say that, in the context of a search of a home, it does not override the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment or the carefully crafted and well-recognized exceptions to that requirement.

Ray, 626 F.3d at 177. Until Ray, the question of whether the community caretaking doctrine could justify a warrantless entry into a home was unanswered in our Circuit; on that basis the Ray police officer defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because it would not have been apparent to an objectively reasonable officer that entry into Ray's home on June 17, 2005 was a violation of the law. While Ray resolved the question of whether the community caretaking exception applied to searches of the home, it is not dispositive here. Although Belcher and the other officers may have had a mistaken belief as to whether or not they could enter the home under the community caretaking exception, application of the exception still requires an evaluation of the totality of the circumstances. And an assertion of a constitutional right to privacy cannot be evidence of wrongdoing or used as justification for warrantless entry. . .Thus, even if the police officers believed they could enter the home under the exception, because Hartman's right was not clearly established, there are questions of facts related to whether the circumstances justified warrantless entry into Hartman's residence pursuant to the community caretaking exception. . . As a result, the Court cannot evaluate whether the police officer's actions were objectively reasonable under the present record, and Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment is denied on this basis.")

Adams v. Springmeyer, 17 F.Supp.3d 478, 508-09 (W.D. Pa. 2014) ("Nine months after the raid at issue in this case, the Court of Appeals continued to question whether Payton had established a threshold lower than 'probable cause' to justify an entry into the residence of an individual named in an arrest warrant. . . If the applicable standard was unclear to members of the Court of Appeals after the raid, there is no way that it could have been clear to the Defendants at the time of the raid. In Deary, the Court of Appeals concluded that defendants sued under § 1983 could not establish their entitlement to qualified immunity as long as genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether their actions had been supported by probable cause. . . To the extent that Deary held that a defendant could never establish his or her entitlement to qualified immunity as a matter of law in the face of such a factual dispute, it is no longer good law. In Karnes v. Skrutski, 62 F.3d 485, 491, n. 3 (3d Cir.1995), the Court of Appeals recognized that Deary had been 'supplanted by the Supreme Court's subsequent determination of the question' in Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 107 S. Ct. 3034, 97 L.Ed.2d 523 (1987). In Anderson, the Supreme Court clarified that a law enforcement officer may be entitled to qualified immunity if he or she 'reasonably but mistakenly conclude[s] that probable cause is present' and proceeds to conduct a search proscribed by the Fourth Amendment. . . .Although the meaning of the phrase 'reason to believe' appearing in Payton has been the subject of disagreement among courts, the Defendants cannot establish their entitlement to qualified immunity simply by demonstrating that 'courts ha[ve] not agreed on one verbal formulation of the controlling standard.'. . The relevant question is whether the 'state of the law' on March 3, 2011, gave the Defendants 'fair warning that their conduct violated the Constitution.'. . Regardless of how the applicable standard has been articulated, courts have generally agreed that an entry is permissible under Payton only where multiple facts support a belief that the individual named in an arrest warrant is both residing and present within a particular home at the time of entry. . . Extensive surveillance of the Orchard Avenue residence conducted in February 2011 failed to yield a single observation of Hunter. . . . On the basis of the existing record, the Court is not convinced that objectively reasonable officials in the situation faced by the Defendants would have concluded that they had 'reason to believe' that Hunter was still residing and present within the home on the morning of March 3, 2011. . . The Defendants' decision to move forward with the raid appears to have been heavily influenced by Whaley's alleged observation of Black at the Orchard Avenue residence on February 10, 2011. . . In his email of February 25, 2011, Christman expressed a belief that Hunter and Black were living together. . . At the time of Black's earlier arrest, however, it became known that he was a resident of Delaware. . . .This inconsistency in the Defendants' asserted beliefs about the location of Black's residence undermines their contention that they reasonably believed him to be living in the Plaintiffs' home. Reasonable officials in the position of the Defendants would have known that they needed a search warrant to 'legally search for the subject of an arrest warrant in the home of a third party.'. . The entering officers sued in Ray were entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time of their actions, it had not been clear whether the 'community caretaking doctrine' could justify a warrantless search of a home in the absence of consent or exigent circumstances. . . Ray was decided more than three months before the raid conducted at the Orchard Avenue residence. The evidentiary record, when viewed in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, could support a finding that Springmeyer entered the Orchard Avenue residence after learning that Hunter and Black were not present. . . . At the time of Springmeyer's entry, it was clearly established law that, in the absence of a warrant, a law enforcement officer could enter a home without the consent of the owners only in the face of exigent circumstances. . . Because the Defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity will turn on the existence of facts that have not yet been reduced to findings, the Defendants' motion for summary judgment will be denied with respect to the Fourth Amendment claims remaining in the case. The Defendants remain free to raise the defense of qualified immunity at trial.")

Caldwell v. Nodiff, No. 13–162, 2014 WL 641356, *9, *10 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 18, 2014) ("Notwithstanding the sometimes broad statements about the scope of the failure-to-intervene doctrine, however, the Court has not found a case applying the failure-to-intervene doctrine to a case analogous to this one where the alleged constitutional violation is an unreasonable search and seizure of a person's bodily fluids for the purposes of testing for substance abuse. Under these circumstances, the Court concludes that it would not be clear to a reasonable officer that his failure to intervene in what plaintiff avers was an unreasonable drug test was unlawful. Walker v. Jackson, No. 12–cv–10267, 2013 WL 3379685, at *5 (D.Mass. July 8, 2013) ("The court has not found any support for the proposition that allowing a fellow officer to enter a residence and participating in the subsequent search constitutes a claim for failure to intervene."). Thus, the Court concludes that

Sgt. Henry and Jane and/or John Does are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to plaintiff's Section 1983 claim insofar as it asserts liability against officers who failed to intervene with respect to the four drug tests.")

Fleck v. Trustees of University of Pennsylvania, 995 F.Supp.2d 390, 408 (E.D. Pa. 2014) ("The plaintiffs were on a public street, not in a car, and initially recorded only their own activity. But when they ignored repeated police requests to move from the mosque doorway and lower their voices, the landscape changed. Marcavage refused to shift the camera away from the Penn officer's face, a refusal she took as a threat. That disregard led to their arrest and the video camera's seizure. Under such circumstances we hold that there was then no clearly-established First Amendment right in our Circuit to film police activity where, as here, the plaintiffs actively impeded efforts to restore public order.")

McAndrew v. Bucks Cnty. Bd. of Comm'rs, 982 F. Supp. 2d 491, 499-503 (E.D. Pa. 2013) ("The Third Circuit has categorically found that testimony, even voluntary testimony, at a grand jury hearing is protected speech. . . . Therefore, plaintiff's grand jury testimony as alleged in paragraph 39 of his complaint is protected speech. The court further concludes that plaintiff's reporting of corruption and wrongdoing also implicate the First Amendment because, based on the limited information before the court, it appears that these statements were made in plaintiff's capacity as a citizen, not as a government employee. Plaintiff was a deputy at the Bucks County Sheriffs Office, and the complaint alleges that he complained to his superiors about rigged auto-repair bids, false gun-training certifications, the office's use-of-force policy, corruption, and retaliation for his whistleblowing activities. While the parties have provided only limited information from which the court may infer the boundaries of plaintiff's job responsibilities, the reporting of corruption and wrongdoing does not appear to fall within the ambit of the responsibilities of a deputy sheriff. Furthermore, it is not dispositive that plaintiff learned about the alleged wrongdoing by nature of his position with the Sheriff's Department; indeed 'courts have found that public officials are uniquely qualified to comment on issues of public concern, precisely because of the access to information their positions afford them.'. . After carefully examining the allegations of the complaint and considering the inferences that flow therefrom, the court has determined that plaintiff has stated a plausible First Amendment claim for which relief can be granted, one which discovery may further substantiate. . . Furthermore, the court believes that the Supreme Court's decision in Garcetti v. Ceballos as well as a long line of Third Circuit cases addressing the free speech rights of government employees have settled the issue of when a government employee's speech is entitled to First Amendment Protection. . . While these cases may be somewhat distinguishable from the present matter, the Third Circuit has acknowledged that there need not be 'previous precedent directly on point' for a constitutional right to be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes. . . Given the substantial precedent addressing the First Amendment rights of public employees, the court believes plaintiff's rights were clearly established at the time he was discharged from employment. As such, defendants' qualified immunity defense is without merit.")

Ingram v. Township of Deptford, 858 F.Supp.2d 386, 399, 400 (D.N.J. 2012) ("A right is clearly established when 'it would [have been] clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . It is clearly established that the '[u]se of excessive force by a state official effectuating a search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment.'. . Moreover, while the law surrounding excessive force is fact-dependent, this does not mean the law is not clearly established. Tofano v. Reidel, 61 F.Supp.2d 289, 299 (D.N.J.1999). At the time of this incident, it was clearly established law in the Third Circuit that the objective reasonableness standard articulated in Graham v. Connor, infra, and reiterated in Couden v. Duffy, infra, applied to alleged excessive force violations of the Fourth Amendment. . .While there was no case law in this circuit addressing the reasonableness of force used when removing a litigant from a courtroom pursuant to a judge's directive, it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in Sergeant Taylor's position that forcibly lifting a non–resisting senior citizen and carrying her out of the courtroom was excessive. Therefore, from the facts alleged in the Plaintiff's complaint, Sergeant Taylor is not entitled to qualified immunity on the allegation that he used constitutionally excessive force in executing the judge's directive. Accordingly, the Defendants' motion to dismiss the claims against Sergeant Taylor will be denied.")

Velius v. Township of Hamilton, No. 09-53 (JEI/JS), 2010 WL 4975979, at *5 (D.N.J. Dec. 7, 2010) ("[T]e Court concludes that in 2007, the law with respect to claims of excessive force by handcuffing, was clear: officers may violate a person's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force even in the absence of physical injury. Defendants are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hain v. DeLeo, No. 1:08-CV-2136, 2010 WL 4514315, at *5 (M.D. Pa. Nov. 2, 2010) ("Even now many questions remain as to the scope of the Second Amendment. As the Third Circuit has recently cautioned, 'Second Amendment doctrine remains in its nascency, and lower courts must proceed deliberately when addressing regulations unmentioned by Heller.' United States v. Marzzarella, 614 F.3d 85, 101 (3d Cir. 2010). Plaintiffs' argument must therefore be rejected; there is no question that the clearly established legal rules confronting DeLeo would not have put him on notice that his conduct violated the Second Amendment. As a local official, it would not have been clear to him at the time that his actions implicated Plaintiff's Second Amendment right, which was only just recently incorporated by the Supreme Court. Indeed, it was not and is still not clear that the Second Amendment right set out in Heller is implicated by the revocation of a license to carry concealed weapons in public. Even interpreting the complaint to allege that the revocation of Plaintiff's permit in retaliation for Plaintiff's exercise of her Second Amendment rights is a distinct Second Amendment violation, qualified immunity applies to Plaintiff's claims against Sheriff DeLeo. Accordingly, the Court finds that DeLeo is entitled to qualified immunity; the Defendants' motion to dismiss will be granted on this claim.")

Burke v. Twp. of Cheltenham, No. 10-1508, 2010 WL 3928524, at *15 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 5, 2010) ("Even though the strip search in question here occurred in April of 2008–well before our Circuit decided Florence–we cannot find that the right of an arrestee–even one charged with a minor offense–not to be strip searched while in a correctional facility was 'clearly established' twenty-eight months ago. Baskins is therefore entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Burke's unlawful search and seizure claims arising out of the strip search of Burke at the Cheltenham Township Police station. Regarding strip searches incident to arrest, however, Judge DuBois has recently noted that '[n]o Supreme Court case discusses the constitutionality of strip searches incident to arrest, which appear to fall between the "full searches" considered by Robinson and the "intrusions beyond the body's surface" considered by Schmerber.'. . But the factors elucidated in Wolfish that must be considered before ruling on whether a strip search in prison is reasonable–'the scope of the particular intrusion, the manner in which it is conducted, the justification for initiating it, and the place in which it is conducted,'. . all militate against the legality of the street strip search described in Burke's complaint. . . . [A] public strip search that fails the four-factor test of Wolfish would necessarily be unreasonable given that Wolfish explicitly dealt with strip searches *in prisons.*Applying Wolfish to Burke's version of the facts, then, we conclude on this limited record that the arresting officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they searched Burke on Fenton Road. While this satisfies only the first prong of Saucier, what little precedent there is dealing with public strip searches suggests that such searches violate clearly established rights under *Saucier'*s second prong.")

Henry v. City of Philadelphia, No. 09-1584, 2010 WL 3927638, at *15, *16 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 30, 2010) ("Since Grazier, which was issued on May 9, 2003, and the Third Circuit's decision in Neuberger, which was issued on January 5, 2005 but was non-precedential, our Court of Appeals has not answered the question left open by Abraham v. Raso in 1999. As a result, we cannot say that, as of August 5, 2007, the notion that an officer violates an individual's constitutional rights if he engages in conduct that unreasonably or unnecessarily increased the likelihood that significant force would be applied against the individual was a constitutional right that was 'clearly established' by virtue of controlling case law in the Third Circuit. . . Nor do we find that a consensus of cases of persuasive authority had embraced this notion as of the relevant date as to have had the effect of 'clearly establishing' it for purposes of the qualified immunity analysis. . . .Having surveyed the case law, we are not persuaded that Henry had a clearly established right as of August 5, 2007 to be free of instructions by officers to drop his knives and come outside, where the officers sought to disarm and subdue him at a time when he was subject to arrest for his earlier assaults on officers and notwithstanding the fact that department policy instructed them to leave such tactics to colleagues in a specialized unit. . . .Because Plaintiffs have not established that any conduct of Officer Orth or Sergeants Schiavone or Bradshaw in directing Henry to emerge from the house violated a clearly established constitutional right, these officers are entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity . . . .")

Beckinger v. Township of Elizabeth, No. 08-432, 2010 WL 1024644, at *17 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 17, 2010) ("As evident from Green, with respect to whether an employee has a clearly established First Amendment right to attend or testify at judicial proceedings, this court concludes that Garcetti called into question whether the testimony of a government employee at a judicial hearing in the course of the employee's duties may constitute speech as a citizen entitled to First Amendment protection. This ambiguity after Garcetti lasted until Reilly was decided. While Reilly recognized that the right was clearly established prior to Garcetti, it noted that no precedential opinion was rendered after Garcetti until the court of appeals in Reilly addressed the issue. The relevant conduct in Reilly occurred prior to Garcetti at a time when the right was clearly established. Reilly did not address the situation where the conduct occurred in the period between Garcetti and Reilly when there was uncertainty about how broadly Garcetti would be applied. . . . The court finds that during the small window of time between May 30, 2006 when Garcetti was decided and July 1, 2008 when Reilly was decided, it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that imposing discipline on a police officer for testifying on matters related to the officer's official duties was unlawful.")

Crawford v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, No. Civ.A. 1CV03-693, 2005 WL 2465863, at *10 (M.D. Pa. Oct. 6, 2005) ("The individual Defendants argue that because it was not clear at the time of Plaintiff's prosecutions that police were obligated under Brady to disclose favorable evidence to the accused, they are entitled to qualified immunity. If this was the extent of the violation claimed by Plaintiff, Defendants argument might have some appeal. [citing Gibson]However, the right to be free from falsifying documents, fabricating evidence, giving misleading or perjured testimony, and malicious prosecution was clearly established. It strains credibility to think that police officers could participate in the conduct alleged here and not understand that their actions violate the accused's rights. . . It is up to Plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence at trial that the individuals did in fact conspire to alter the evidence in order to convict him and are responsible for his imprisonment. At summary judgment, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the individual Defendants have failed to meet their burden in demonstrating immunity for the violations claimed.").

Maslow v. Evans, No. 01-CV-3636, 00-CV-5660, 00-CV-5805, 01-CV-1538, 01-CV-2166, 2003 WL 22594577, at *27, *28 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 7, 2003) ("It is beyond question that when Plaintiffs' claim arose it was a clearly established principle of law that a state actor violates another's constitutional rights when he sexually assaults that person in the course of an arrest, or transports a person to her house and then forcibly performs oral sex, or otherwise uses his authority as a state official to force himself sexually upon an unwilling victim. Even if no case had ever proclaimed it so, it would be manifestly clear to any reasonable officer that such conduct is unlawful. . . . Having addressed the law applicable to the subordinate, the Court must next determine whether the supervisory liability doctrine, as it applies to this context, was clearly established. . . As set forth above, Plaintiffs have adduced sufficient facts to make out a constitutional violation, thus satisfying the first step in the Saucier analysis. . . The Court concludes that it was clearly established by early 1999 that a supervisor who was deliberately indifferent in the face of an unreasonable risk of harm could be held liable under § 1983 if his inaction bore an affirmative causal link to the harm suffered by the plaintiff. . . . Given the nature, quality and quantity of scandalous and troubling information known to these Defendants, the Court cannot conclude that their legal obligations could have been unclear. Each of these Defendants was aware that Evans had used his authority as a state trooper improperly and that the objects of his egregious misconduct were, on far too many occasions, women or young girls in the community. Defendants contend that it is only with the benefit of hindsight that the extent of Evans' depravity and risk to the community could be known and that these officials acted reasonably at the time. However, the Court is satisfied that the information known to these Defendants in early 1999 would compel a reasonable officer to intervene and take appropriate steps to prevent Evans from abusing his position of power for his own perverted sexual gratification. In these circumstances, no reasonable officer could believe that the Constitution demanded less. Accordingly, these Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Knibbs v. Momphard, 30 F.4th 200, 223-26 (4th Cir. 2022), pet. for cert. filed, No. 22-8 (June 28, 2022) ("[T]he question is whether it was clearly established in April 2018 that an officer may not use deadly force against a homeowner who possesses a firearm inside his own home while investigating a nocturnal disturbance but does not aim the weapon at the officer or otherwise threaten him with imminent deadly harm. This is so even after the homeowner hears the officer announce himself—but cannot visually verify that to be true—and ignores commands to drop the weapon. We recognize that neither the Supreme Court nor this Circuit has considered a qualified immunity case with a fact pattern precisely identical to the instant one, but that does not preclude a finding that the right was clearly established. . . As explained below, our case law demonstrates that the contours of Knibbs' constitutional right were clearly established in April 2018. Cooper and Hensley are clear regarding an individual's right to arm himself in his own home without fear of being shot by police, so long as he does not threaten the officer with the weapon. . . . Deputy Momphard's announcement of his presence is not dispositive when considered in the context of all of the Estate's evidence. While that fact was absent in both Cooper and Hensley, a core principle of our holding in Cooper is present here. . . Namely, given the lack of lighting on Knibbs' porch and Deputy Momphard's failure to activate the blue emergency light equipment on his patrol vehicle, a reasonable officer would not have believed Knibbs unquestionably knew a law enforcement officer was on his porch. . . Further, if a jury accepts the Estate's evidence, Knibbs' decision to rack his shotgun also does not impact the totality of the circumstances. Given Cooper's holding that a homeowner is entitled to possess a firearm during his investigation of a nocturnal disturbance on his premises, a reasonable officer would have logically inferred that a homeowner is entitled to load his firearm before conducting that investigation for his own protection without fear that an officer will use deadly force against him. . . . Nor are the two commands that Knibbs ignored legally significant at this point under the Estate's proffered facts. Cooper, Hensley, Slattery, Anderson, Sigman, McLenagan, and Elliott together clearly establish that the failure to obey commands by a person in possession of, or suspected to be in possession of, a weapon only justifies the use of deadly force if that person makes some sort of furtive or other threatening movement with the weapon, thereby signaling to the officer that the suspect intends to use it in a way that imminently threatens the safety of the officer or another person. If a jury finds that Knibbs was not aiming or otherwise directing his gun at Deputy Momphard—the only fact that would have given him probable cause to fear for his life considering the totality of the Estate's evidence—this case would fall squarely within the contours of those clearly established precedents. . . . Therefore, if a jury accepts the Estate's version of the events, Deputy Momphard could be found to have violated Knibbs' clearly established Fourth Amendment right to possess a firearm in his own home in a non-threatening manner while investigating a nocturnal disturbance on his premises. Our dissenting colleague asserts that our analysis runs contrary to the Supreme Court's recent summary reversals in City of Tahlequah and Rivas-Villegas. Not so. In those cases, the lower courts relied on precedents that were 'dramatically different,'. . . and 'materially distinguishable' in 'several respects,'. . . to find a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. As the dissent would have it, Deputy Momphard would be held liable for his conduct only if one of our prior cases addressed the same facts presented here. But as noted, even the Supreme Court does not require as much. [citing Hope] In fact, even 'cases involving "fundamentally similar"' or 'materially similar' facts are not prerequisites for concluding that a constitutional right is 'clearly established.'. . As we have explained, assuming that the jury accepts the Estate's evidence, Cooper and Hensley are materially indistinguishable from what happened here. And for the few factual differences that do exist, it would not have taken more than Deputy Momphard 'drawing logical inferences, reasoning by analogy, or exercising common sense' from those two cases to realize that his use of deadly force against a homeowner possessing a firearm in a non-threatening manner in his own home while investigating a nocturnal disturbance was unconstitutional. . . Under these circumstances, the contours of Knibbs' constitutional right were 'beyond debate' in April 2018. Accordingly, we vacate the district court's award of summary judgment to Deputy Momphard on the Estate's § 1983 claim against him in his individual capacity.") Knibbs v. Momphard, 30 F.4th 200, 233, 236-39 (4th Cir. 2022) (Niemeyer, J., dissenting), pet. for cert. filed, No. 22-8 (June 28, 2022) ("This case presents the unfortunately-too-frequent situation in which a law enforcement officer is faced with the risk of serious physical harm and, in face of that risk, makes a split-second decision to shoot the person who created the risk. . . If that officer reasonably had 'probable cause to believe' that he was confronted with a risk to him of 'serious physical harm,' he cannot be held liable for addressing the risk with deadly force. . . . Based on the undisputed facts in this record, Deputy Momphard undoubtedly had probable cause to believe — as would any reasonable officer — that Knibbs knew that he was facing a law enforcement officer; that Knibbs had just loaded his gun in the presence of the law enforcement officer; that Knibbs had refused to drop his gun in response to the officer's commands; and that Knibbs refused to speak or ask questions to resolve any doubt. Yet, the majority's analysis fails to account for what a reasonable officer would have perceived in light of these undisputed facts about what Deputy Momphard saw and experienced, focusing instead on Knibbs's subjective beliefs. Moreover, to do so, the majority discounts Deputy Momphard's testimony as 'self-serving' and therefore turns to accept the 'Estate's proffered evidence' about what Deputy Momphard saw and experienced, even while recognizing that the Estate's only witness to the events was Knibbs. . . It then concludes that Knibbs's Estate legitimately showed that '[Knibbs] was shot simply because he stood in his living room holding a shotgun.'. . The only other fact that the majority identifies as disputed is whether Knibbs was actually pointing the gun at Deputy Momphard at the time Deputy

Momphard passed the window and fired his shots. But that fact hardly dispels the risk that Deputy Momphard reasonably perceived, which must be the focus of the inquiry. . . . The issue is not whether Deputy Momphard was actually at risk of harm at that moment, but whether, in the totality of the circumstances, he reasonably believed that he was at risk of serious bodily injury. . . Thus, whether the gun was actually pointing at Deputy Momphard at that point is irrelevant, because we have 'consistently held that an officer does not have to wait until a gun is pointed at the officer before the officer is entitled to take action.'. . . [N]either party, nor the majority, has uncovered a case that would inform Deputy Momphard that he should have understood that firing his service pistol in the circumstances of this case violated clearly established law. As the majority recognizes, immunity depends on whether every reasonable officer in Deputy Momphard's situation would have understood that his conduct was unlawful. . . And despite that clear principle, the majority can only reason from general principles to argue, as a lawyer would, that Deputy Momphard should have known that he could not shoot, even in circumstances where he reasonably believed that he was subject to imminent serious physical harm. Indeed, the majority acknowledges, 'We recognize that neither the Supreme Court nor this Circuit has considered a qualified immunity case with a fact pattern precisely identical to the instant one.'. . But it does not even come close to providing cases from which an officer such as Deputy Momphard would conclude that his particular conduct was unlawful. Rather, the majority identifies only two cases, which are clearly distinguishable, Cooper and Hensley, and argues over several pages how a reasonable officer would be able to deduce that he would be violating the law if he did what Deputy Momphard did — this without taking account of the numerous cases pointing the other way. Fundamentally, the majority fails to demonstrate that reasonable officers would know from clearly established law that what Deputy Momphard did was, beyond debate, unlawful in the circumstances. . . .In this case, Deputy Momphard knew that Knibbs was actually armed; that he had announced himself loudly and clearly as an officer; and that Knibbs had refused multiple commands to drop the gun, without providing any explanation or response to the officer. In such circumstances, it would not be clear to any reasonable officer, based on precedents from our court or the Supreme Court, that the use of deadly force was unlawful. Instead of recognizing this, the majority makes the same error as did the lower court in City of Tahlequah, namely 'contravene[ing]' settled principles of law and relying on cases that have 'dramatically different' facts in order to improperly find the officer is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . Our officers in uniform deserve clearer guidance than this before they are held liable, especially when they, in good faith, believe that they are performing their jobs lawfully, albeit in a manner that results in tragic consequences. . . . Over the years, the Supreme Court has repeatedly admonished courts of appeals to recognize police officers' immunity. And only recently, perhaps in some exasperation, it again reminded courts of appeals of this fact. In City of Tahlequah, the Court reiterated that 'qualified immunity protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law' and noted that it has 'repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality. It is not enough that a rule be suggested by then-existing precedent; the rule's contours must be so well defined that it is clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . The Court determined that officers presented with a far less serious risk than was presented here were entitled to qualified immunity when the person they shot looked like he was going to throw a hammer at the officers after the officers told him to drop it. The Court also stated in Rivas-Villegas what is applicable here — that 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . Unfortunately, we continue to violate these repeated admonitions. I would affirm, concluding both that Deputy Momphard did not violate Knibbs's constitutional rights and that, in any event, no existing precedent clearly placed that conclusion beyond doubt.")

Sheppard v. Visitors of Virginia State University, 993 F.3d 230, 240 (4th Cir. 2021) ("[W]e conclude the right Sheppard asserts was not clearly established. The Supreme Court and this Court's assumptions, without express recognition, hardly amount to a clearly established right. Sheppard, in fact, admits as much. . . Further, Sheppard's additional arguments regarding an implied contract or general property interest in policies and procedures underscore the unestablished nature of any right. We agree with the district court that Debose is entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established right to continued enrollment in higher education, and, having so concluded, we need not evaluate whether or not Sheppard received procedural due process.")

Mays v. Sprinkle, 992 F.3d 295, 300-03 & n.4, 305 (4th Cir. 2021) ("[E]ven though Mays's claim arises under the Fourteenth Amendment, we have traditionally looked to Eighth Amendment precedents in considering a Fourteenth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. . . . Mays now argues that the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley. . . altered this deliberate-indifference standard when applied to pretrial detainees. Kingsley, he claims, requires turning the subjective element into a purely objective one. . .We need not resolve this argument as that standard would make no difference here because of qualified immunity. . . . On the night of Mays's death, it was clearly established that 'a pretrial detainee ha[d] a right to be free from any form of punishment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . And that right required 'that government officials not be deliberately indifferent to any serious medical needs of the detainee.'. . At that time, our caselaw considered a deliberate-indifference claim to require both an objectively serious medical condition and subjective knowledge by a prison official of both the 'serious medical condition and the excessive risk posed by the official's action or inaction.'. . . In the wake of Kingsley, the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits adopted a completely objective standard for pretrial-detainee-medical-deliberate-indifference claims that requires showing that a reasonable officer would have recognized the serious medical condition and appreciated the excessive risk to the detainee's health. [citing cases] The Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits cabined Kingsley to its facts—pretrial-detainee-excessive-force claims—and continue to require subjective knowledge of the condition and risk for pretrial-detainee-deliberate-indifference claims. [citing cases] While we have not directly addressed the import of Kingsley, we did recently state that a pretrial detainee's claim of inadequate medical care requires proof '(1) that the detainee had an objectively serious medical need; and (2) that the official subjectively knew of the need and disregarded it.' Doe 4 ex rel. Lopez, 985 F.3d at 340. But there, neither party raised Kingsley and the discussion should not be read to resolve this issue. . . .The clearly established inquiry asks whether 'any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating' then-existing law, including any then-existing objective or subjective elements. . . . We had not decided whether Kingsley's excessive-force-claim rationale extended to deliberate-indifference claims by the time Mays died. And we still have not. Both before and after Mays's death, we said a pretrial-detainee-medical-deliberate-indifference claim required both an objectively serious medical condition and subjective knowledge of the condition and the excessive risk posed from inaction. . . So regardless of Kingsley, qualified immunity turns on whether 'any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating' that objective and subjective standard. . . Without allegations that plausibly satisfy both the objective and subjective elements, the officers would have a right to dismissal based on qualified immunity. . . Said another way, if the allegations show that the officers lacked the required subjective knowledge, then the officers would not have violated clearly established law. Only if the allegations plausibly show an objectively serious medical condition and subjective knowledge by the officers will Mays's claim clear the qualified-immunity hurdle. And by clearing the qualified-immunity hurdle, Mays would have also plausibly alleged a violation of his rights under the Fourteenth Amendment, whatever the standard. The officers' subjective knowledge necessarily establishes any post-Kingsley objective standard (that is, whether every reasonable officer would have recognized the serious medical condition and appreciated the excessive risk to the detainee's health. . . If the deliberate-indifference standard for pretrial detainees continues to include a subjective component (and is thus unchanged by Kingsley), then the qualified-immunity finding satisfies the constitutional-violation standard as well. So no matter if the deliberate-indifference standard for pretrial detainees continues to include a subjective component, the qualified-immunity determination resolves whether Mays's allegations establish a plausible claim. . . So this appeal hinges on whether Mays pleaded sufficient facts to show both that he had an objectively serious medical condition and that the officers had subjective knowledge of the condition and the excessive risk posed by inaction. . . .[W]e conclude that the complaint plausibly alleges that Mays had an objectively serious medical condition requiring medical attention and that the officers subjectively knew of that need and the excessive risk of their inaction. That is enough to overcome qualified immunity and survive a motion to dismiss.")

Halcomb v. Ravenell, 992 F.3d 316, 319-22 (4th Cir. 2021) ("Here, we conclude that even assuming a violation of Appellee's due process rights, Appellant is entitled to qualified immunity because the right at issue was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . . We agree with the district court that the right is appropriately framed as the right to fair notice of a security detention hearing, rather than a specific right to 48 hours' notice. It is true that the right to fair notice is somewhat general, but it is also true that the right to fair notice is a specific subset within the more general right to due process. . . . Having defined the right at issue as the right to fair notice of a security detention hearing, we turn to the law surrounding Appellee's claimed right to fair notice to determine whether this right was 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . . We need not decide which merits argument wins the day on this point. Instead, we conclude only that Appellee's right to fair notice of a security detention hearing was not 'clearly established at the time of the alleged violation'; that is, it was not 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that [failing to provide prior notice of a security detention hearing] violates [the right to fair notice].'")

Wingate v. Fulford, 987 F.3d 299, 310-12 (4th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 89 (2021) ("Read together, Brown and Hiibel illustrate that a valid investigatory stop, supported by Terry-level suspicion, is a constitutional prerequisite to enforcing stop and identify statutes. . . Necessarily so. The prevailing seizure jurisprudence flows from the idea that, short of an investigatory stop, a person is 'free to disregard the police and go about his business.'. . To be sure, officers may always request someone's identification during a voluntary encounter. . . But they may not compel it by threat of criminal sanction. Allowing a county to criminalize a person's silence outside the confines of a valid seizure would press our conception of voluntary encounters beyond its logical limits. We therefore decline to do so here. As discussed, Deputy Fulford's initial stop was not justified at its inception. The Officers do not argue, nor does the record suggest, that they acquired constitutionally adequate suspicion of criminal activity between the deputy's initial stop and the Officers' eventual arrest. . . Accordingly the Officers' enforced Stafford County's stop and identify statute outside the context of a valid Terry stop, and arrested Mr. Wingate on that basis. The arrest was therefore unconstitutional. The district court erred in holding otherwise. . . The question remains whether Deputy Fulford and Lt. Pinzon are entitled to qualified immunity for their violations of Mr. Wingate's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Deputy Fulford is not entitled to qualified immunity for his unconstitutional investigatory stop. As Mr. Wingate argues, the circumstances here are nearly indistinguishable from those in Slocumb, . . . a case where we found officers lacked the requisite suspicion to conduct an investigatory stop. . . . Deputy Fulford's suspicion of criminal activity in this case is on par with that which we found insufficient in Slocumb, and pales in comparison to that which we found lacking in Massenburg. Because these cases placed Deputy Fulford on notice that suspicion of criminal activity must arise from conduct that is more suggestive of criminal involvement than Mr. Wingate's was, he is not entitled to qualified immunity for his unlawful investigatory stop. The Officers are, however, entitled to qualified immunity for their unlawful arrest under Stafford County Ordinance § 17–7(c). Until today, no federal court has prescribed the constitutional limits of § 17–7(c)'s application. And although the proper reading of Brown encompasses Stafford County's ordinance, it was not 'plainly incompetent' for the Officers to believe that § 17–7(c) fell outside the decision's reach. . . The law at issue in Brown criminalized a person's refusal to identify himself to an 'officer who ha[d] lawfully stopped him.'. . Because the Texas provision only applied in the context of lawful investigatory stops, the need to comply with Terry's requirements was evident from the text of the statute. Stafford County's ordinance, on the other hand, does not predicate enforcement upon the investigation of criminal activity. Rather, it criminalizes a person's refusal to provide his identity upon an officer's request 'if the surrounding circumstances are such as to indicate to a reasonable man that the public safety requires such identification.'. . A reasonable officer could infer—albeit incorrectly—that Terry's requirements did not apply to stop and identify statutes rooted in public safety rather than crime prevention. Deputy Fulford and Lt. Pinzon violated Mr. Wingate's Fourth Amendment rights by enforcing § 17–7(c) outside the context of a valid Terry stop. But because this right was not clearly established at the time of the arrest, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Wingate v. Fulford, 987 F.3d 299, 313 (4th Cir. 2021) (Richardson, J., concurring), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 89 (2021) ("I readily concur with the majority's resolution of this case. But I have one reservation. The majority holds that constitutionally enforcing Stafford County Ordinance § 17-7(c) requires 'a valid investigatory stop, supported by Terry-level suspicion.'. . And in the circumstances this case presents, I agree that enforcing the ordinance required Terry-level suspicion. But I would be clear that we address only this case and not the constitutionality of applying an ordinance like this one outside the context of investigatory stops. Consider, for example, an officer requiring a driver's identification at a constitutionally proper, but suspicionless, sobriety checkpoint. Or an officer at a border crossing or secure facility who asks for identification from someone seeking entry. In those instances (and others), the encounter might constitutionally permit enforcing a law requiring identification. Those circumstances were not addressed in Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47, 99 S.Ct. 2637, 61 L.Ed.2d 357 (1979) or Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada, 542 U.S. 177, 124 S.Ct. 2451, 159 L.Ed.2d 292 (2004). And I would make plain that we are not expanding their guidance here, where we are without briefing on those issues and those circumstances are not before us.")

Dean v. Jones, 984 F.3d 295, 310-11 (4th Cir. 2021) ("The officers argue that because there is no published circuit precedent finding an Eighth Amendment violation where force is used shortly after an inmate has assaulted an officer, Dean's right to be free from Officer Hobgood's use of pepper spray or Sergeant Jones's blows was not 'clearly established' at the time of the incidents in 2015. . . For two reasons, we disagree. First, it was clearly established in 2015 – and for many years before that – that inmates have a right to be free from pain inflicted maliciously and in order to cause harm, rather than in a good-faith effort to protect officer safety or prison order. . . And our case law long has made clear that correctional officers cross this line when they use force to punish an inmate for prior misconduct or intransigence. . . So assuming – as we do, for purposes of this alternative argument – that the officers here acted with a wrongful and punitive motive, then they violated clearly established Eighth Amendment law. And as we have explained before, that clearly established Eighth Amendment principle was enough by itself to put reasonable officers on 'fair notice' that their use of force against Dean – assuming, again, that it was intended to retaliate against Dean for his head-butts and not to protect officer safety – would violate the Constitution. . . In this 'unusual' qualified immunity context, we are 'dealing with a constitutional violation that has "wrongful intent" as an element.'. . The case law, in other words, is 'intent-specific,'. . . which means that liability turns not on the particular factual circumstances under which the officer acted – which may change from case to case as the precedent develops – but on whether the officer acts with a culpable state of mind. And because an officer necessarily will be familiar with his own mental state, he 'reasonably should know' that he is violating the law if he acts with a prohibited motive. . . Second, even if the officers were entitled to some additional notice, we had explained before 2015, 'at the appropriate level of specificity,"'. . . that a correctional officer uses excessive force if he maliciously uses force against an inmate who has been subdued, even if force might have been justified to control the inmate only moments before. . . . It was enough to put officers on clear notice, in 2015, that the use of pepper spray – or kicks and punches, see, e.g., McMillian, 503 U.S. at 4, 112 S.Ct. 995; Thompson, 878 F.3d at 102 (discussing cases) – against Dean after he had been fully subdued and no longer posed a risk to their safety could give rise to an inference of 'wanton punishment' in violation of the Eighth Amendment, even if force appropriately might have been used just a few seconds earlier. . . The officers insist that Iko is not sufficiently on point, because in that case, the initial justification for the use of force was the enforcement of prison rules and not, as here, the protection of officer safety after Dean's two head-butts. But the point is precisely the same – once the justification for the use of force has expired, any additional force may be deemed 'malicious' and hence unconstitutional – and it applies with 'obvious clarity' whatever the original justification. . . And in any event, the rationale for force in Iko was not as singularly focused on prison discipline as the officers suggest. Instead, the purported need to compel compliance with prison rules was intertwined with concerns for officer safety: Iko's refusal to obey orders to present his hands for cuffing posed a danger to the officers attempting to carry out a cell extraction. . . In sum, the officers here were on 'fair notice' of Dean's right not to be subjected to force in the form of pepper spray or a beating if that force was deployed to retaliate against Dean after he was subdued, and not to protect officer safety. For that reason, the officers cannot prevail on their alternative argument that they are entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds even if they violated Dean's Eighth Amendment rights.")

Barrett v. Pae Gov't Services, Inc., 975 F.3d 416, 432-33 (4th Cir. 2020) ("Because the undisputed evidence establishes that the Arlington County defendants had probable cause to detain Plaintiff, qualified immunity bars her § 1983 claim under the first prong of the qualified immunity test, and summary judgment was properly awarded. But even if we were to assume that probable cause to detain Plaintiff was lacking, the Arlington County defendants are also entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong because 'the unlawfulness of their conduct was [not] clearly established at the time' the decision was made. . . . [W]e reject Plaintiff's argument that the law at the time of the officials' conduct 'was sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing is unlawful,' placing the unconstitutionality of the officials' conduct 'beyond debate.'. . On the contrary, '[r]easonable [officials], relying upon our decision[s] ... would have concluded that involuntarily detaining [Plaintiff] was not only reasonable, but prudent.'")

Haze v. Harrison, 961 F.3d 654, 661 (4th Cir. 2020) ("Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Haze's Fourth Amendment claim. Neither we nor the Supreme Court has previously considered the question of whether incarcerated persons have a reasonable expectation of privacy in their legal mail. Nor is there a consensus of persuasive authority on the matter — indeed, neither party identifies a single case, in any Circuit, where interference with an incarcerated person's legal mail was held to be violative of the Fourth Amendment. Consequently, Defendants have met their burden to show that their actions did not violate clearly established law for purposes of Haze's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Livingston v. Kehagias, 803 F. App'x 673, ___ (4th Cir. 2020) ("The ultimate question, as the district court recognized, is whether under the Graham factors and in light of all the circumstances, the officers used proportionate force in what they allege was an effort to arrest Livingston for two misdemeanor offenses committed after they attempted to search his home in the middle of the night and without a warrant. On the record as it comes to us on this interlocutory appeal, the officers were faced with an individual who had committed, at most, minor offenses; did not attempt to attack the officers; was not and did not appear to be armed; and offered no resistance until after he was suddenly brought to the ground, and only passive resistance after that. The force the officers deployed against Livingston included elbowing him in the head, causing it to bleed; kneeing and kicking him; threatening to kill him with a gun to the head; and repeatedly pepper-spraying and using a taser against him. Like the district court, we think the mismatch here between provocation and response is great enough to render the officers' actions 'unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate' in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . We likewise agree with the district court that it would have been 'clear to a reasonable officer,' at the time and under the circumstances, that the non-deadly force used against Livingston was constitutionally excessive. . . As the officers stress and the district court recognized, '[w]hether a right was clearly established must be particularized to the facts of the case and may not be defined at a high level of generality.'. . It is not enough, in other words, that it was clearly established in November of 2015 that the Fourth Amendment prohibits the use of excessive force generally; what matters is whether it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibited this use of force under these circumstances. Like the district court, we think it was. Since at least 1994, when we decided Rowland v. Perry, 41 F.3d 167 (4th Cir.), it has been clear that serious physical force – there, a wrestling maneuver that cracked a suspect's knee – is constitutionally excessive when used against an individual suspected, at most, of a minor crime, who is unarmed, and who does not attempt to flee or physically attack the officer – even if the suspect offers passive resistance, struggling with the officer after an initial use of force against the suspect. . . .We relied and elaborated on Rowland in Smith v. Ray, decided in March of 2015, before the incident here. In that case, we held that it was clearly established in 2006 that the constitutional line had been crossed when an officer, confronted with an individual suspected only of a misdemeanor and who passively resisted by refusing to give up her hands, responded by throwing her to the ground, kneeing her, and twisting her arm. . . . We think Rowland and Smith made plain enough, in November of 2015, the excessive nature of the force used here. . . . In arguing that the excessiveness of the non-deadly force they used in an effort to arrest Livingston was not clearly established, the officers point to fine factual distinctions between this case and Rowland and Smith, as well as other cases relied upon by the Estate. But as the district court explained, we 'do not require a case directly on point' where existing authority puts a reasonable officer on notice of the relevant constitutional limits. . . And as we explained in Rowland and Smith, the Graham factors themselves, when they point clearly enough in one direction, can be enough to give an officer 'fair warning,'. . . that his conduct is unconstitutional. . . .[L]ike the district court, we are unpersuaded by the officers' argument that it was not until 2016 that we established in Armstrong that use of a taser against a non-violent resister violates the Fourth Amendment. . . This case involves more than use of a taser, and when we look at the force used as a whole – not element by element or moment by moment, see Rowland, 41 F.3d at 173 (rejecting "segmented view of the sequence of events" and considering the total force used "in full context") – it is clear, and would have been clear to a reasonable officer at the time, that the cumulative force deployed against Livingston was under the circumstances constitutionally excessive.")

Livingston v. Kehagias, 803 F. App'x 673, ___ (4th Cir. 2020) ("The officers appeal only the denial of summary judgment on Cardwell's unreasonable seizure claim. Here, the officers have raised a legal argument that we may review in this interlocutory posture, contending that on the facts as viewed by the district court, they are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law: Either they did have probable cause to seize Cardwell for a mental health evaluation or, if they did not, then the lack of probable cause was not 'clearly established' at the time of the incident. We agree with the officers on their second point, and hold that they are entitled to summary judgment on their qualified immunity defense because it was not clearly established that they lacked probable cause for a mental health seizure. . . .In order to undertake a mental health seizure, 'an officer must have probable cause to believe that the individual posed a danger to [him]self or others.'. . That much is clear. But what exactly counts as probable cause in this context, we have recognized, is less certain: There is a 'distinct lack of clarity in the law governing seizures for psychological evaluations, compared with the painstaking definition of probable cause in the criminal arrest context.'. . .We think this case falls somewhere between Bailey and Cloaninger, the cases most directly on point, so that a reasonable officer would be left without clear guidance as to whether probable cause existed. Some of the indicia on which we relied to find probable cause in Cloaninger are absent here: Cardwell did not refuse to respond to the officers when they arrived, and there was no knowledge of a prior suicide attempt or guns on the premises. But as the officers argue, Bailey, too, is distinguishable: Here, the call that gave rise to a suicide concern came not from a third party but from Cardwell himself, and when the officers arrived, instead of a person calmly eating lunch, they were confronted with an agitated Cardwell pacing his driveway at midnight, venting his frustrations, and throwing a beer can. We need not decide on what side of the probable-cause line this case falls. It is enough to say that it was not clearly established, at the time of the incident, that the officers lacked probable cause for a mental health seizure, and that they therefore are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.")

Ray v. Roane, 948 F.3d 222, 228-30 (4th Cir. 2020) ("The problem with Roane's argument, and thus with the district court's decision adopting it, is that it requires us to ignore certain factual allegations in Ray's complaint and to draw reasonable inferences against Ray on a motion to dismiss. . . According to the complaint, Roane stopped backing away from Jax when the dog reached the end of the zip-lead, and then took a step toward the dog before firing his weapon. . . These factual allegations yield the reasonable inference that Roane observed that the dog could no longer reach him, and, thus, could not have held a reasonable belief that the dog posed an imminent threat. Taking these factual allegations as true and drawing these reasonable inferences in Ray's favor, Roane's seizure of Jax was unreasonable because Jax no longer posed any threat to Roane. Tellingly, in reaching the opposite conclusion, the district court relied on cases that were all decided on summary judgment involving one or more dogs that, like here, were barking or advancing toward an officer but, unlike here, were unleashed or unrestrained and posed an immediate danger to the officer. . . . Accordingly, we conclude the district court erred in holding that the complaint failed to allege a violation of Ray's Fourth Amendment rights. We next turn to whether Roane is entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation. . . .The question of whether a right is clearly established is a question of law for the court to decide. . . The question of whether a reasonable officer would have known that the conduct at issue violated that right, however, cannot be decided prior to trial if disputes of the facts exist. . . Thus, 'while the purely legal question of whether the constitutional right at issue was clearly established is always capable of decision at the summary judgment stage [or on a motion to dismiss], a genuine question of material fact regarding [w]hether the conduct allegedly violative of the right actually occurred ... must be reserved for trial.'. .In addition, to determine whether a right was clearly established, we first look to cases from the Supreme Court, this Court, or the highest court of the state in which the action arose. . . In the absence of 'directly on-point, binding authority,' courts may also consider whether 'the right was clearly established based on general constitutional principles or a consensus of persuasive authority.'. . The Supreme Court has ruled against defining a right at too high a level of generality and held that doing so fails to provide fair warning to officers that their conduct is unlawful outside an obvious case. . . On appeal, Ray argues that since at least 2003, we have 'placed Roane on fair notice/warning that [she] had a clearly established right to enjoy her dog Jax, free from Roane using unreasonable deadly force against Jax,' particularly where her dog Jax was secured, controlled, and could no longer reach Roane. According to Ray, Roane's actions—killing a pet while that pet poses no immediate threat of harm to a law enforcement officer—are unreasonable and contravene well-recognized precedents. In response, Roane contends neither our precedents nor the body of case law involving police-dog shooting address the 'particularly unusual circumstances' Roane had faced at Ray's home. According to Roane, there is no authority involving 'a 150-pound dog that had advanced toward [an officer] to within a step, "alarmed" and barking'; a '25-foot zip-lead contraption'; or other relevant facts similar to the ones here. As a result, qualified immunity protects 'mistakes in judgment' and gives officers like Roane 'breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments.' Moreover, this Court should not engage in 'Monday morning quarterback[ing]' to find an officer, like Roane, 'could have or should have done something different.' We disagree with Roane's contentions with respect to qualified immunity, for the same reasons already set forth in our discussion of whether the complaint states a claim for a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Viewing all facts in the complaint and inferences arising therefrom in Ray's favor, it is clear that Roane shot Jax at a time when he could not have held a reasonable belief that the dog posed a threat to himself or others. Accepting these facts, we hold that a reasonable police officer would have understood that killing Jax under such circumstances would constitute an unreasonable seizure of Ray's property under the Fourth Amendment. We acknowledge that there is no 'directly on-point, binding authority' in this circuit that establishes the principle we adopt today. . . Until now, we have never had the occasion to hold that it is unreasonable for a police officer to shoot a privately owned animal when it does not pose an immediate threat to the officer or others. Still, even without 'directly on-point, binding authority,' qualified immunity is inappropriate if 'the right was clearly established based on general constitutional principles or a consensus of persuasive authority.'. . This is such a case.

. . .Based on this preexisting consensus of persuasive case law, together with the general principles we announced in Altman, we hold that a reasonable officer in Roane's position would have known that his alleged conduct was unlawful at the time of the shooting in this case. . . . Notably, Roane does not contest the legal principle we adopt today, namely, that it is unreasonable for an officer to shoot a privately owned dog when the dog poses no objective threat to the officer or others. Instead, Roane's arguments exclusively focus on the underlying facts, and ultimately amount to the factual assertion that Roane reasonably perceived Jax as a threat at the time of the shooting. But this is an appeal from a motion to dismiss, which tests the sufficiency of the complaint, not its veracity. For the reasons discussed above, we cannot accept Roane's version of the facts at this stage of the proceedings, in which we must grant all reasonable inferences in favor of Ray.")

Calloway v. Lokey, 948 F.3d 194, 202-03 (4th Cir. 2020) ("[W]e now make clear that, as the parties agree, the standard under the Fourth Amendment for conducting a strip search of a prison visitor — an exceedingly personal invasion of privacy — is whether prison officials have a reasonable suspicion, based on particularized and individualized information, that such a search will uncover contraband on the visitor's person on that occasion. . . .Sgt. Lokey and Unit Manager Brown, who together made the decision that Calloway be strip-searched, did so based on reasonable suspicion. The strip search of Calloway — though embarrassing and perhaps frightening — did not violate her Fourth Amendment rights.")

Calloway v. Lokey, 948 F.3d 194, 206, 211 n.3 (4th Cir. 2020) (Wynn, J., dissenting) ("Upon viewing the evidence in this case—to determine whether Ms. Calloway's rights were violated—under the appropriate legal standard, which is in a light most favorable to her, it is evident that a reasonable jury could conclude the intrusive search was not supported by reasonable suspicion based on individualized, particularized facts. With respect for my colleagues in the majority, I must dissent. . . . The majority wisely does not address the qualified immunity analysis beyond concluding the search was supported by reasonable suspicion. As discussed, I disagree with the majority's conclusion that the information available to the decision-making officers amounted to reasonable suspicion. But even if the majority were to reach qualified immunity, I believe the right of prison visitors to be free from strip searches absent reasonable suspicion was clearly established at the time of this search. In determining 'whether a right was clearly established, we first look to cases from the Supreme Court, this Court, or the highest court of the state in which the action arose.'. . Looking to 'our sister circuits' decisions applying the reasonable suspicion standard to searches of prison visitors,' this Court has previously held 'prison authorities generally may conduct a visual body cavity search when they possess a reasonable and individualized suspicion that an employee is hiding contraband on his or her person.'. . But even if Leverette and Johnson were somehow insufficient to put officials on notice that they may not strip search prison visitors without reasonable suspicion, cases from our sister circuits would surely suffice. 'In the absence of "directly on-point, binding authority," courts may also consider whether "the right was clearly established based on general constitutional principles or a consensus of persuasive authority."'. . The Second Circuit concluded it was clearly established in March 1989, 'under the law of the United States Supreme Court, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, and the other circuit courts of appeals,' that a search of prison visitors without reasonable suspicion violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Many of our sister circuits have held similarly. [collecting cases]") Betton v. Belue, 942 F.3d 184, 190-95 (4th Cir. 2019) ("We first consider whether the facts as alleged show that Officer Belue's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Officer Belue contends that his conduct of firing his weapon at Betton did not constitute the use of excessive force. Focusing on 'the instant' that he fired his weapon, Officer Belue argues that his use of deadly force was justified because Betton posed a serious threat by drawing his pistol. Officer Belue further submits that based on this threat, it is irrelevant whether Betton knew that the intruders were members of law enforcement. According to Officer Belue, the factual question whether the officers had announced their presence is relevant only to Betton's separate claim of unlawful entry, which is not at issue in this appeal. We disagree with Officer Belue's arguments. . . .[W]hile we focus our review of reasonableness on the 'moment that force is employed,' Waterman v. Batton, 393 F.3d 471, 477 (4th Cir. 2005), we view the facts and any reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to Betton, the non-moving party. . . .Our analysis in Cooper is directly applicable here. Officer Belue shot Betton, who was holding a firearm 'down,' without first identifying himself as a member of law enforcement or giving any commands to Betton. We reject Officer Belue's attempt to distinguish Cooper by arguing his own version of the evidence, namely, that Betton drew his pistol, in a direction 'coming up' from his waistband toward the officers. At its core, Officer Belue's argument collapses because of his failure to accept the facts in the light most favorable to Betton as found by the district court. . . .Like the citizen in Cooper, Betton could not have known that members of law enforcement caused the noise that he heard on his property, because the officers had failed to announce their presence at any time before firing their weapons. And as in Cooper, neither Officer Belue nor the other officers on the scene issued any commands after entering Betton's residence and observing him holding a gun at his side. If Officer Belue or another officer had identified themselves as members of law enforcement, Officer Belue reasonably may have believed that Betton's presence while holding a firearm posed a deadly threat to the officers. . . And had Betton disobeyed a command given by the officers, such as to drop his weapon or to 'come out' with his hands raised, Officer Belue reasonably may have feared for his safety upon observing Betton holding a gun at his side. . . However, under our precedent, Officer Belue's failure to employ any of these protective measures rendered his use of force unreasonable. Officer Belue claims, nevertheless, that we are precluded from considering the officers' failure to identify themselves, because that failure relates to Betton's distinct unlawful entry claim now pending in the district court. We find no merit in this argument. We are required to consider the relevant circumstances immediately preceding the moment that force was used. . . And, as of that time, the officers had not announced their presence in Betton's home. Moreover, were we to ignore the officers' failure to identify themselves or to give any verbal commands, we would be discounting the analysis in Cooper and other prior decisions in which we found such facts critical in determining whether excessive force was used. . . For these reasons, we agree with the district court that a jury reasonably could find that Officer Belue violated Betton's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. . . . Having determined that Officer Belue's actions in these circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment as a use of excessive force, we turn to consider the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, namely, whether Officer Belue's conduct violated a constitutional right that was clearly established at the time the conduct occurred. The key inquiry in this regard is not whether one of these courts has considered identical factual circumstances and held that an officer's conduct violated particular constitutional rights. . . Instead, we consider whether officers within our jurisdiction have been provided fair warning, with sufficient specificity, that their actions would constitute a deprivation of an individual's constitutional rights. . . The officer's use of deadly force in Cooper occurred in 2007. Since issuing our decision in Cooper in 2013, the Supreme Court has emphasized that courts are 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,' and that 'specificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context.'. . Defined at the level of specificity required by the Supreme Court, the question before us here is whether it was clearly established in April 2015 that shooting an individual was an unconstitutional use of excessive force after the officer: (1) came onto a suspect's property; (2) forcibly entered the suspect's home while failing to identify himself as a member of law enforcement; (3) observed inside the home an individual holding a firearm at his side; and (4) failed to give any verbal commands to that individual. The answer, as explained in our 2013 decision in Cooper, plainly is yes. As set forth above, the critical circumstances involving the use of deadly force in Cooper are present in the case before us. . . Thus, we conclude that Officer Belue's use of deadly force presents an 'obvious case' exhibiting a violation of a core Fourth Amendment right. . . . Accordingly, we conclude that Officer Belue's conduct of shooting Betton while Betton held a firearm by his side does not qualify as the type of 'bad guesses in gray areas' that qualified immunity is designed to protect. . . Thus, we hold under our established standard of review that Officer Belue's alleged conduct violated Betton's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force, a right that was clearly established at the time the conduct occurred.")

Gilliam v. Sealey, 932 F.3d 216, 235, 237, 241 (4th Cir. 2019) ("There can be no reasonable dispute that it was clearly established in 1983 that an arrest in the absence of probable cause was a violation of an individual's Fourth Amendment rights, and that a coerced confession could not form the basis of probable cause for an arrest. . . Further, existing precedent in 1983 would have made it clear to a reasonable officer that the police conduct at issue here, viewed in the light most favorable to Appellees, was coercive. . . . Therefore, the district court did not err by concluding that Appellees' right not to be arrested without probable cause based on a coerced and fabricated confession was clearly established in 1983, and the district court was correct to deny summary judgment to Appellants on the basis of qualified immunity in light of the numerous material disputes of fact. . . . It was beyond debate at the time of the events in this case that Appellees' constitutional rights not to be imprisoned and convicted based on coerced, falsified, and fabricated evidence or confessions, or to have material exculpatory evidence suppressed, were clearly established.")

not to intervene in violence among protesters. In general, a defendant's mere failure to act does not give rise to liability for a due process violation. . . Turner seeks to avoid that rule by invoking the state-created danger exception, under which state actors may be liable for failing to protect injured parties from dangers which the state actors either created or enhanced. . . But it was not clearly established at the time of the rally that failing to intervene in violence among the protesters would violate any particular protester's due process rights. Accordingly, we agree with the district court that Thomas and Flaherty are entitled to qualified immunity, and we affirm the dismissal of Turner's complaint. . . . [W]e must determine whether, at the time of the rally, there existed legal authority giving Thomas and Flaherty fair warning that ordering officers not to intervene in violence among protesters would implicate the state-created danger doctrine and amount to a violation of protesters' due process rights. . . . Following Pinder's narrow reading of the state-created danger doctrine, we have never issued a published opinion recognizing a successful state-created danger claim. Rather, our precedent on the issue has emphasized the doctrine's limited reach and the exactingness of the affirmative-conduct standard. . . . Against this background, we conclude that it was not clearly established at the time of the rally that ordering officers not to intervene in private violence between protesters was an affirmative act within the meaning of the state-created danger doctrine. Our precedent sets an exactingly high bar for what constitutes affirmative conduct sufficient to invoke the state-created danger doctrine. Turner has put forth no facts suggesting that a stand-down order crosses the line from inaction to action when the state conduct in Pinder and Doe did not. Acting under Pinder's teaching that state actors may not be held liable for 'st[anding] by and d[oing] nothing when suspicious circumstances dictated a more active role for them,' Thomas and Flaherty could have reasonably concluded that a stand-down order violated no constitutional right. . . Accordingly, Turner has not alleged a violation of clearly established law, and Thomas and Flaherty are entitled to qualified immunity.") Graves v. Lioi, 930 F.3d 307, 332-33 (4th Cir. 2019) ("[E]ven if the facts proven during discovery set out a constitutional violation, Lioi and Russell would still have been entitled to qualified immunity because that right was not clearly established. Once again, we note that our consideration of this legal question is governed by the changes in the facts developed during discovery as opposed to those that had been alleged in Robinson's Complaint. We previously affirmed the denial of qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage because we accepted Robinson's allegations concerning Lioi's conduct, including the allegations that Lioi actively interfered with the execution of the warrant by lying about not being able to find it on the evening Williams attempted to self-surrender, feigned the BCPD's efforts to arrest Williams, and conspired with him to remain free despite multiple opportunities to arrest him. Based on those allegations we concluded that > in 2008, a reasonable police officer in Lioi's position would have known that a law enforcement officer affirmatively acting in a conspiracy with a third party to avoid arrest on assault charges could give rise to a constitutional violation when the third party acts in furtherance of the conspiracy to injure another person.

As already described at length, the evidence does not allow for the conclusion that Lioi or Russell were lying about the warrant being missing or their inability to serve the warrant. Instead, the record shows that—at most—they agreed to allow a cooperating individual that posed no known immediate risk to self-surrender. And it was not clearly established in 2008 that a decision to allow self-surrender rather than aggressively serve a misdemeanor arrest warrant would serve as a basis of liability under the state-created danger doctrine. Indeed, no case then or now could be taken to stand for that proposition. . . . To be sure, DeShaney and other cases have acknowledged the existence of the state-created danger theory of liability to establish a due process violation. But in determining whether a right is clearly established, courts do not look at the right 'at its most general or abstract level, but at the level of its application to the specific conduct being challenged.'. . Although there does not need to be a case identical to the facts of a particular case for the right to be clearly established, there must be a reasonable correlation. . . Put simply, a reasonable officer must have been able to ascertain the 'apparent' unlawfulness of his conduct 'in light of the pre-existing law.'. . Applying these principles here, while a reasonable officer in 2008 would have notice that the state-created danger theory existed in the abstract, no Supreme Court or Fourth Circuit case law would have described when its requirements had been met in any particular set of circumstances. Instead, officers would have recognized multiple cases setting forth the general framework that, to be held liable under this doctrine, an officer had to engage in conduct that created or increased 'the dangerous situation that resulted in a victim's injury' such that the circumstances were 'much more akin to an actor ... directly causing harm to the injured party.'. . But they would have encountered no cases discussing the state-created danger doctrine in the context of serving an arrest warrant. Nor would they have encountered any cases holding an officer liable under the doctrine for harm that arose from an officer's decision to allow a party named on an arrest warrant to self-surrender. The absence of case law in this area coupled with the Supreme Court's statements in Town of Castle Rock regarding police discretion executing a warrant means that Lioi and Russell did not have 'fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional' even if we were to conclude that a violation occurred in this case. . . In sum, as the district court held, '[a] reasonable police officer in Lioi and Russell's position could not have known that the failure to guarantee [Williams'] arrest on a misdemeanor warrant prior to [the date of his wife's death] would violate [Mrs. Williams'] constitutional rights.'. . Lioi and Russell are entitled to qualified immunity for this additional reason as well.")

Graves v. Lioi, 930 F.3d 307, 348-49 (4th Cir. 2019) (Gregory, C.J., dissenting) ("In finding that it was not clearly established in 2008 that an officer's 'decision to allow self-surrender rather than aggressively serve a misdemeanor arrest warrant' would be a constitutional violation, the majority again improperly construes the disputed facts of this case in the light most favorable to the wrong party. . . As the Supreme Court has emphasized, it is critical that courts evaluating a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage construe disputed facts and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-movant, 'even when, as here, a court decides only the clearly-established prong of the [qualified immunity] standard.'. . . By defining the right at issue in the way that it does—as nothing more than a right to be free from a police officer's failure to aggressively serve an arrest warrant and to instead allow the subject of a warrant to self-surrender—the majority accepts Deputy Lioi and Major Russell's construction of the record evidence, effectively 'weigh[ing] the evidence and resolv[ing] disputed issues in favor of the moving party.'. . This is patently improper. . . Moreover, the mere lack of binding precedent in 2008 regarding the application of the state-created-danger doctrine in this context is insufficient grounds to conclude that the right at issue was not clearly established. It is settled that an officer can be placed on notice that an action is unconstitutional even when 'the very action in question' has not previously been found unlawful. . . As the majority concedes, the general right to be free from affirmative state conduct that creates or enhances the danger that a person faces at the hands of a private citizen was clearly established at the time of Deputy Lioi and Major Russell's actions. And while there may have been no binding precedent addressing the specific circumstances of the case at hand, it requires little more than common sense to understand that a police officer could face liability when she acts to assist the subject of an arrest warrant in evading arrest until a date of his own choosing. . . Such conduct is not the failure to act that DeShaney and Pinder had rejected as a basis for liability. Nor is it a simple exercise of police discretion in executing warrants that the Supreme Court spoke of in Town of Castle Rock. Rather, it is a 'misuse of state authority,' which before 2008 had been held to violate the Due Process Clause. . . In short, this is not a case 'in which an officer would be required to reason backward from case law "at a high level of generality" to determine whether his conduct violated a constitutional right.'. . I would find that Deputy Lioi and Major Russell are not entitled to qualified immunity.") Billioni v. Bryant, 759 F. App'x 144, 149-51 & n.2 (4th Cir. 2019) ("Sheriff Bryant argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because in October 2013, it was not clearly established that Billioni's speech was protected by the First Amendment. Specifically, Sheriff Bryant argues that it was not clearly established that Billioni's interest in speaking on a matter of public concern outweighed any disruption that speech caused to the operation and mission of the YCSO. We hold that the district court applied the incorrect legal standard in determining whether Billioni's speech was protected by the First Amendment, and remand for the district court to apply the correct legal standard as well as to make any further factual findings that may be warranted under that standard. . . . The district court found that a reasonable juror could conclude that Billioni's statement to his wife about the surveillance video to be speech on a 'matter of public concern,' as it involved allegations of misconduct by public employees possibly causing, or contributing to the death of a man in their custody and control.'. . We agree. Billioni told his wife about a video that showed the role that an officer's use-of-force played in a man's in-custody death, directly contradicting the YCSO's official statement on the incident. This speech relates to a 'matter of political, social, or other concern to the community.'. . .McVey's second prong balances the plaintiff's interest in the speech against the employer's interest in avoid[ing] disruption of its internal operations.'. . The district court found that this prong was met because 'Sheriff Bryant did not make any showing of disruption within the YCSO due to the statements made by [Billioni] to his wife' and that 'any disruption caused by the internal investigation that was conducted by the YCSO' was 'clearly outweighed by the public's interest in the disclosure of misconduct or malfeasance.'. . However, in conducting this balancing the district court used the incorrect 'actual disruption' standard instead of the 'reasonable apprehension of disruption' standard. . . . By looking to whether Sheriff Bryant made a 'showing of disruption within the YCSO' instead of whether Sheriff Bryant made a showing that he reasonably apprehended a disruptive effect from Billioni's speech, the district court committed legal error. Instead of conducting this fact-intensive balancing in the first instance, we remand to the district court to use the correct legal standard to determine whether the evidence permits a conclusion that a reasonable factfinder could find that Sheriff Bryant reasonably apprehended disruption within the YCSO as a result of Billioni telling his wife about the surveillance video that outweighs Billioni's interest in speaking out about the surveillance video. Sheriff Bryant contends that because the district court applied the incorrect legal standard for determining whether Billioni's speech was protected under the First Amendment, we should find that he is entitled to qualified immunity. We decline to do so, as we can only reach Sheriff Bryant's qualified immunity argument after a determination whether Billioni's speech is protected by the First Amendment. . . . Sheriff Bryant also argues that even if Billioni's speech should be accorded First Amendment protection, the district court erred in denying qualified immunity because at the time of Billioni's termination it was not 'clearly established law' that an employer could not terminate an employee for protected speech when that speech was a substantial but not exclusive factor in the termination decision. This argument fails under our precedent. We reiterate that given the procedural posture of this appeal, we must assume for purposes of appeal that Billioni's discussion of the existence and contents of the surveillance video with his wife was a substantial factor in Sheriff Bryant's decision to terminate him. The third prong of the McVey test asks whether the protected speech was a 'substantial factor' in the termination decision, . . . making it clear that the mere existence of a credible lawful motive for an employee's termination does not, on its own, shield the employer from liability. Our recent cases are consistent with this interpretation of McVey. . . Sheriff Bryant urges us to abandon our own precedent and instead follow the Eleventh Circuit in finding that where the facts assumed for summary judgment purposes 'show mixed motives (lawful and unlawful motivations) and preexisting law does not dictate that the merits of the case must be decided in plaintiff's favor, the defendant is entitled to immunity.' Sherrod v. Johnson, 667 F.3d 1359, 1364 (11th Cir. 2012) (internal citations and quotation marks omitted). We decline to do so. Such a rule has the practical effect of giving a veneer of legality to those supervisors who give pretextual reasons for termination so long as the record could also support a lawful reason for that termination. And, most saliently, it runs directly contrary to our decisions in Hunter and Durham. Of course, this does not mean that the presence of both lawful and unlawful motivations cannot be dispositive in the context of the second prong of the McVey test. In Cannon, . . . we considered a series of text messages sent between police officers that were alternately a matter of public concern and 'disruptive and insubordinate.'. . We concluded that this combination of messages meant that the officers' interest in First Amendment expression did not outweigh the police department's interest in maintaining order and discipline, such that we reversed the district court's determination that the department was not shielded by qualified immunity from the retaliation claims. . . Finally, Sheriff Bryant contends that to the extent that the Court is inclined to rely on the denial of qualified immunity in Hunter or in Durham, both cases were decided after October 2013 when Billioni was terminated. But what matters is not when the cases were decided, but that the events in both Hunter and Durham occurred before the events in this case. In both Hunter and Durham we held that it was 'clearly established in the law of this Circuit in September 2009 that an employee's speech about serious governmental misconduct, and certainly not least of all serious misconduct in a law enforcement agency, is protected.'. . Both cases acknowledge the existence of an already clearly established right.")

Williamson v. Stirling, 912 F.3d 154, 186-89 (4th Cir. 2018) ("Williamson may be able to prove to a jury that Director Stirling and Sheriff Carroll violated his substantive and procedural due process rights. That ruling, however, does not entirely resolve this appeal. Stirling and Carroll are entitled to qualified immunity from the trial itself and from liability on those claims if — as the district court ruled —'a reasonable person in [the defendants'] position could have failed to appreciate that his conduct would violate [Williamson's] rights.'. . . With respect to Williamson's substantive due process claim, it is clear that Director Stirling and Sheriff Carroll are not entitled to qualified immunity. It has been clearly established since at least 1979 that pretrial detainees are not to be punished. . . If a jury finds that Williamson's prolonged conditions of solitary confinement constituted punishment within the meaning of Bell, Stirling and Carroll have violated that substantive due process right. The district court will therefore have erred, and qualified immunity was inappropriately awarded on that claim. . . .Turning to Williamson's procedural due process claim, we must again distinguish between claims arising from disciplinary sanctions and claims arising from administrative restrictions. That distinction also turns on the nature of Williamson's confinement, that is, the issue of whether his confinement was 'disciplinary' or 'administrative.' If the law regarding the level of process owed to pretrial detainees was not clearly established as to either situation, Director Stirling and Sheriff Carroll would yet be entitled to qualified immunity on Williamson's procedural due process claim. . . Accordingly, we must assess whether, at the time of the defendants' conduct, the law was clearly established on the level of process owed to a pretrial detainee who was subjected to disciplinary restrictions, or, in the alternative, to administrative restrictions. . . .If Williamson's prolonged conditions of solitary confinement were imposed as a disciplinary measure, it was clearly established that he was entitled to the notice and hearing mandated by the Court's 1974 decision in Wolff. We explicitly ruled as much two years ago in Dilworth (during Williamson's solitary confinement). But we need not have spoken to the precise issue presented if the law already provided 'fair warning' that the challenged conduct was unconstitutional. . . With respect to disciplinary restrictions, by November 2013, Williamson's right to the procedural protections of Wolff was 'manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principles' at stake. . . Specifically, the Wolff level of process owed to prisoners — notice, a hearing, and a written decision — provided a floor for the procedural rights due to Williamson as a pretrial detainee, as specified in the Bell decision. Moreover, every court of appeals to address the question had ruled that pretrial detainees are entitled to the Wolff level of process in connection with disciplinary restrictions. [collecting cases] Those decisions show a clear consensus of persuasive authority applying the rule derived from Wolff and Bell. . . In short, when Williamson was placed in safekeeper status in 2013, no 'reasonable official' could have believed that a pretrial detainee could be disciplined absent the level of due process required by Wolff. . . If Williamson's prolonged period of solitary confinement was of an administrative nature, a separate question arises as to whether the level of process to which he was entitled was clearly established during such confinement. The combined force of Bell and Hewitt strongly suggests, however, that pretrial detainees subjected to administrative segregation merited at least the minimal level of process established by Hewitt in 1983. Moreover, in 2005, the Supreme Court ruled in its Wilkinson decision that convicted prisoners possessed a liberty interest in avoiding administrative assignment to a state 'supermax' prison, based in part on the extreme isolation imposed on inmates in such a facility, under conditions that resemble Williamson's experience in several ways. . . That said, a pretrial detainee's liberty interest in avoiding administrative segregation — clearly defined today — conceivably remained within the realm of reasonable debate in 2013, given the lack of direct rulings on the issue, the somewhat conditional terms of the Hewitt decision, and the distinct factors at play in the Wilkinson decision. . . Nevertheless, in our Incumaa decision in July 2015, Judge Thacker carefully explained that convicted prisoners possess a liberty interest in avoiding solitary confinement under conditions similar to those imposed on Williamson, even when those conditions are imposed for security reasons. . . Like Williamson, Incumaa was confined to his prison cell for nearly every hour of every day and deprived of reading materials and most human contact. . . The Incumaa record was also fuzzy as to whether the prisoner was accorded an opportunity to secure his release from those conditions (Incumaa had been confined for twenty years, rather than three). . . Our panel ruled that Incumaa had 'demonstrated a liberty interest in avoiding solitary confinement in security detention.'. . A triable issue was therefore presented as to whether the defendants had provided Incumaa with a sufficient level of process, as the record was 'bereft of any evidence' that Incumaa 'ever received meaningful review,' which would fall 'short of satisfying Hewitt.'. . Because convicted prisoners such as Incumaa possess those procedural protections, Williamson, as a pretrial detainee, is also entitled to them. . . Thus, the Incumaa decision gave clear notice to jail officials in 2015 that a long-term detention in solitary confinement — even when imposed for security reasons — justifies some level of procedural protection. Nevertheless, Williamson's circumstances went unchanged for twenty-two months after the Incumaa decision. The responsible officials — Director Stirling and Sheriff Carroll — could not be entitled to qualified immunity on the procedural due process claim during the nearly two-year period in which they ignored that controlling precedent. Accordingly, after the July 2015 Incumaa decision, Stirling and Carroll are not entitled to qualified immunity from trial or liability with respect to any renewals of Williamson's solitary confinement conditions if they failed to provide him with the level of process that would at least satisfy Hewitt. . . Because the legal principles controlling the level of process owed to pretrial detainees were — but for a narrow exception — clearly established at the time of the defendants' relevant conduct, Stirling and Carroll are not presently entitled to qualified immunity on Williamson's procedural due process claim. By way of further explanation, however, Director Stirling and Sherriff Carroll could be entitled to qualified immunity with respect to liability for a procedural due process violation — if Williamson's confinement was 'administrative' in nature — between November 2013 and July 2015. Whether that discrete exception might apply to liability depends on what a jury may find regarding the nature of Williamson's solitary confinement during that period, that is, whether it was disciplinary or administrative. We therefore leave further analysis of that question for the remand proceedings. . .We will therefore vacate the awards of qualified immunity made by the district court to Director Stirling and Sheriff Carroll on the procedural due process claim. We leave to the jury and the district court the issue of whether Williamson's solitary confinement was disciplinary or administrative. We also leave for the remand proceedings the determination of whether the level of process accorded to Williamson satisfies the legal requirements applicable to his procedural due process claim.")

Abbott v. Pastides, 900 F.3d 160, 174-75 (4th Cir. 2018) ("For the reasons laid out above, we agree with the district court that the plaintiffs have failed as a matter of law to establish that the University defendants violated their First Amendment rights in connection with the inquiry into the Free Speech Event. . . We note, however, that even if this were not the case, the defendants would be entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. . . [E]ven assuming, arguendo, that it were possible to find that the University's response to student complaints arising out of the Free Speech Event transgressed some First Amendment limit, the plaintiffs are unable to identify any precedent – and we have found none – that would put that result 'beyond debate.' As we and other courts have recognized, First Amendment parameters may be especially difficult to discern in the school context. . . And as we have noted, the plaintiffs' claim for damages relief in connection with a speech event that the University approved and for which they were never sanctioned presents some especially novel questions. At a minimum, the University defendants were not on clear notice that their response to student complaints regarding the Free Speech Event violated the First Amendment, and for that reason alone they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Cannon v. Vill. of Bald Head Island, N. Carolina, 891 F.3d 489, 499-501 (4th Cir. 2018) ("Acknowledging that the fact-specific nature of the Pickering inquiry often leads courts to conclude that a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity from a First Amendment retaliation claim, the district court nonetheless held that this Court's opinions in Cromer and Ridpath clearly established that the balance of interests weighed in the Officers' favor. [Court distinguishes both cases] . . . . [N]either Cromer nor Ridpath rendered it 'beyond debate,'. . . that the balance of interests weighs in the Officers' favor here. We therefore reverse the district court's determination that Peck and Mitchell were not shielded by qualified immunity from the Officers' First Amendment retaliation claims.")

Cannon v. Vill. of Bald Head Island, N. Carolina, 891 F.3d 489, 502, 506 (4th Cir. 2018) ("In the context of a claim that a governmental defendant violated a former employee's Fourteenth Amendment rights by publicly disclosing the reasons for the employee's discharge, as here, this Court has held that this opportunity to be heard 'must be granted at a meaningful time.'. . This is because, as we further held, '[a]n opportunity to clear your name after it has been ruined by dissemination of false, stigmatizing charges is not "meaningful."'. . .With this legal framework in mind, we now must determine (1) whether, under clearly established law, the Officers were deprived of a protected liberty interest and (2) if so, whether, under clearly established law, the Officers were deprived of that interest without due process of law. . . . '[H]arassment,' 'sexual harassment,' and 'detrimental personal conduct' amount to 'significant character defects,'such as

'immorality,'. . . and therefore stigmatize the Officers' reputation in a constitutionally cognizable manner. Additionally, the Officers' evidence shows that after the Department released the relevant documents, each Officer either had difficulty securing a job or accepted a job with less significant responsibilities and lower pay, thereby creating a reasonable inference that the claims in the termination letters did, in fact, place a stigma on the Officers' reputations with prospective employers. . . . This Court decided Sciolino, Ledford, Ridpath, and the other cases cited above years before the Department discharged the Officers and disclosed the grounds for their termination. Accordingly, under our qualified immunity analysis, it was clearly established at the time of the disclosures that the disclosed allegations would place a constitutionally cognizable stigma on the Officers' reputations. . . .In sum, under our qualified immunity analysis, at the time of the disclosures this Court's precedent clearly established that the allegedly stigmatizing statements were made public by Peck. . . . In sum, we conclude that under clearly established precedent, Peck made public false and stigmatizing charges regarding the grounds for the Officers' termination. This satisfies Sciolino's four prongs, thus demonstrating deprivation of the Officers' constitutionally cognizable liberty interests under clearly established law. . . . Having concluded that this Court's decisions clearly established that Peck deprived the Officers of a liberty interest, we now must determine whether, under clearly established law, the Officers were deprived of that interest 'without due process of law.'. . As explained above, when a governmental employer places an employee's reputation 'at stake' by publicly disclosing defamatory charges, the employee is entitled to a hearing 'to "clear [his] name" against [the] unfounded charges.'. . Here, the Officers never received a name-clearing hearing. Accordingly, Peck has denied the Officers due process of law. Peck nonetheless asserts that the failure to afford the Officers a name-clearing hearing does not amount to a violation of clearly established law for two reasons: (1) he 'w[as] not required to provide [the Officers] with an adversarial pre-termination hearing,'. . . and (2) '[the Officers] had alternative processes to contest the contents of the termination letter[s][.]'. . We disagree. . . . In Sciolino, this Court clearly established that '[a]n opportunity to clear your name after it has been ruined by dissemination of false, stigmatizing charges is not "meaningful."'. . Accordingly, regardless whether the Fourteenth Amendment obliged Defendants to afford the Officers an adversarial, pre-termination name-clearing hearing, Sciolino established that the Fourteenth Amendment required Defendants to afford the Officers a constitutionally adequate name-clearing hearing before publicly disclosing false information regarding the basis for the Officers' termination that, in fact, restricted their ability to obtain new employment.")

Adams v. Ferguson, 884 F.3d 219, 226-30 (4th Cir. 2018) ("The Supreme Court previously required courts to address the first prong before the second. . . In 2009, however, the Court held that judges 'should be permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.'. . Thus, we now can 'skip ahead to the question whether the law clearly established that the officer's conduct was unlawful in the circumstances of the case.'. .We do so here. . . . Farmer, Iko, and Slakan. . . do not establish that failure to transfer an inmate from a prison to a state mental health facility creates 'an excessive risk to inmate health or safety,'. . . or, as Adams claims, a 'know[n] ... substantial risk' that an inmate will 'suffer[ ] serious harm[.['

. . . This is true even with respect to an inmate subject to a Competency Order or equivalent court order directing treatment of the inmate's mental health needs. Adams has not identified any case law that holds that mentally ill prisoners housed in state prisons, including those subject to Competency Orders or the like, must be transferred to state mental health hospitals to escape an excessive risk to their health. Nor have we found any. Virginia law requires prisons to provide mental health services to inmates. . . The Competency Order scheme presumes that inmates with serious mental health conditions are more likely to have their competency restored if they receive treatment at a state mental health hospital. . . But that does not mean that inmates with such conditions who remain in Virginia's prison system are per se subject to an 'excessive risk to inmate health or safety.'. .We are not blind to the fact that many prison systems offer inadequate mental health care. But we are unaware of any clearly established law (or indeed, any law at all) holding that prisons are, as a general rule, unfit to house mentally ill inmates. Instead, inmates regularly challenge, and judges regularly address, the provision of prison mental health services on a system-by-system, facility-by-facility, and prisoner-by-prisoner basis. . . Of course, in this case, the complaint alleges that prison officials affirmatively denied Mitchell his constitutional right to personal health and safety. It maintains that prison guards denied Mitchell food, turned off the water to his cell, and allowed him to live in a less-than-human state. Prison medical staff assertedly provided Mitchell little-to-no medication or treatment for severe mental and physical ailments. The complaint further alleges that guards forced Mitchell 'to the ground, dragged, sprayed with mace, stood upon, punched and kicked' him, and that after he died, 'a correctional officer employee ... attempted to clean Mitchell's cell' to hide the evidence of this systemic mistreatment. Adams has brought suit against some forty-nine other defendants in an effort to hold them liable for this conduct. But these are not the claims alleged against Ferguson. In assessing whether she is entitled to qualified immunity, we must differentiate the claims made against other defendants from those asserted against her. The Tenth Circuit recently undertook a similar analysis in Blackmon v. Sutton, 734 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2013), which concerned the treatment of a juvenile in a detention facility. The court, in an opinion by then-Judge Gorsuch, denied qualified immunity for defendants who allegedly 'shackled' the plaintiff to a restraining chair and allowed 'a fully grown man ... to sit on the [plaintiff's] chest' 'simply ... to punish him.'. . It also denied qualified immunity for prison officials who 'were well aware of' the plaintiff's 'grave mental health problems' but 'delayed or denied' the plaintiff's access to necessary medical care. . . But the Blackmon court rejected the claim that the director of the facility violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights by 'failing to transfer him to' a less restrictive facility pending trial. . . The court reasoned that the plaintiff had not shown 'that his placement in the juvenile detention facility automatically and alone amounted to an "objectively excessive risk" to his health and safety.'. . Said differently, it was not clear that, absent the use of excessive force or denial of access to medical care, placing the plaintiff in the detention center and denying him a transfer per se violated the Constitution. The court therefore granted the director qualified immunity. . .The same is true here. Adams has alleged conduct by many other defendants that, if true, clearly violates the Constitution. But her claim against Ferguson turns on 'five words: "waiting lists and empty beds."'. . Our qualified immunity analysis must therefore focus on this conduct, and this claim, alone: that—in her own words—it is clearly established that 'plausible allegations of "waiting lists and empty beds" state claims for relief' under § 1983. . . We cannot hold that they do. Time and again, the Supreme Court has reiterated that for a right to be clearly established, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . No clearly established law dictates that housing mentally ill inmates in prisons, rather than transferring them to state mental health facilities, 'automatically and alone amount[s] to an "objectively excessive risk" to [inmate] health and safety.'. .In light of repeated instruction from the Supreme Court, we must conclude that Ferguson is entitled to qualified immunity from suit on Adams's § 1983 claims.")

Thompson v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 878 F.3d 89, 101-10 (4th Cir. 2017) ("The excessive force analysis thus focuses on the maliciousness of the force used, not the severity of the injury that results from that force. . . Here, the momentum from the van was sufficient to cause a gash on Mr. Thompson's forehead, bleeding from his hands and arms and bruising, not to mention significant emotional distress. The force alleged is therefore beyond de minimis for Eighth Amendment purposes. . . .Because Mr. Thompson has alleged facts from which a reasonable factfinder could conclude that Officer Cooper maliciously subjected him to a rough ride, he has sufficiently alleged an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim sufficient to survive summary judgment as to Cooper. . .We further hold that Mr. Thompson's right was clearly established by April 8, 2010, the date of the incident. Defined at the appropriate level of specificity, prisoners have a right not to be assaulted by their captors. Under the Eighth Amendment, prisoners have the right to be free from malicious or penologically unjustified infliction of pain and suffering. . . . After examining both controlling and persuasive authority, we conclude that Officer Cooper had fair warning that gratuitously giving an inmate a 'rough ride' for no reason other than to retaliate against him for filing lawsuits and grievances is unconstitutional. A reasonable officer would have known from Supreme Court precedent that the Eighth Amendment prohibits such malicious acts of violence or intentional endangerment. In McMillian, one of the seminal cases defining the scope of the right not to be subjected to excessive force, the Supreme Court reversed the dismissal of an Eighth Amendment claim based on a correctional officer's gratuitous punch of an inmate during transport. . . In Wilkins, a prison official, angered by the prisoner's request for a grievance form, slammed the prisoner against the ground and physically beat him in response. . . The Supreme Court reversed the district court's dismissal of the case for failure to state a claim and held that the prisoner would prevail if he proved that the official had in fact acted maliciously. . . As in Wilkins, if we credit Mr. Thompson's account, the only reason Cooper used force against him was in retaliation for filing grievances. Accordingly, Wilkins and McMillian are sufficiently similar to Cooper's alleged conduct that a reasonable officer would have known that a retaliatory "rough ride" is unconstitutional. To be sure, McMillian and Wilkins involved direct punches and kicks, rather than a 'rough ride,' but it makes no difference to the constitutional analysis whether Mr. Thompson was slammed against the side of the van by the officer's hands or by the momentum maliciously created by the officer's driving. . . The intentionally erratic driving was simply a different means of effectuating the same constitutional violation. To draw a line between these acts would encourage bad actors to invent creative and novel means of using unjustified force on prisoners. Although McMillian and Wilkins did not reach the qualified immunity question, their holdings provide officers with fair notice that malicious, unprovoked, unjustified force inflicted on inmates who are compliant and restrained, and violates the Eighth Amendment. In other words, the Eighth Amendment principle prohibiting such gratuitous violence applies with 'obvious clarity' to a malicious 'rough ride,' just as it does to a malicious direct blow. . . Indeed, two Eighth Circuit cases have held that malicious 'rough rides' violate the Eighth Amendment. . . .Given the factual parallels, the Eighth Circuit cases are powerful indicators that the officers here had fair notice. . . .As is apparent from the case law of eleven federal courts of appeals, the Eighth Amendment protection against the malicious and sadistic infliction of pain and suffering applies in a diverse range of factual scenarios. That unifying thread provides fair notice to prison officials that they cannot, no matter their creativity, maliciously harm a prisoner on a whim or for reasons unrelated to the government's interest in maintaining order. That principle applies with particular clarity to cases such as this one, where the victim is restrained, compliant, and incapable of resisting or protecting himself, and otherwise presents no physical threat in any way. The government argues, unpersuasively, that the law is not clearly established because courts have not found a constitutional violation in some failure-to-fasten-seatbelt cases, notwithstanding the Eighth Circuit precedent. However, with one exception, every other seatbelt case cited by the district court and the government involved mere negligence, rather than malice or even recklessness. . . . The government also argues, unpersuasively, that an official's wrongful intent is never relevant to the qualified immunity analysis, even in the context of an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference or excessive force claim. . . The government cites Crawford-El v. Britton for the sweeping proposition that, under Harlow v. Fitzgerald . . . '[e]vidence concerning the defendant's subjective intent is simply irrelevant.'. . Crawford-El's holding is much more limited and is not itself a decision on qualified immunity. . . Read in context, the Court was merely referring to and reiterating Harlow's holding that ' "bare allegations of malice" cannot overcome the qualified immunity defense.'. . Crawford-El and Harlow do not forbid us from considering evidence of intent in Mr. Thompson's excessive force claim. Harlow did not involve an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim or a deliberate indifference claim. . . As Crawford-El itself recognized, the significance of evidence of intent differs when it 'is an essential component of the plaintiff's affirmative case.'. . For claims where intent is an element, an official's state of mind is a reference point by which she can reasonably assess conformity to the law because the case law is intent-specific. Considering evidence of intent in this manner is not foreclosed by Crawford-El, as the Supreme Court itself has applied the clearly established prong in reference to retaliatory intent. See Ortiz v. Jordan, 562 U.S. 180, 189–91, 131 S.Ct. 884, 178 L.Ed.2d 703 (2011) (holding that law was clearly established that prison guard cannot retaliate against inmate by putting her in solitary confinement) (citing Crawford-El, 523 U.S. at 592, 118 S.Ct. 1584). Thus, in light of the Supreme Court precedent in McMillian and Wilkins, case law on 'rough rides' from our sister circuit, and the overwhelming consensus on the prisoner's right to be free from assault, i.e., malicious infliction of pain and suffering, we conclude that Officer Cooper had fair warning that his actions were unconstitutional and that Mr. Thompson's right was therefore clearly established. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's determination that Officer Cooper is entitled to qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment excessive force claim. . . .Unlike Cooper, who drove the van, Diming did not use unlawful force against Mr. Thompson—rather, he failed to do anything to stop it. Accordingly, the claim against Diming is functionally the same as claims in failure-to-protect or conditions-of-confinement cases, which are evaluated under the deliberate indifference standard. . . .In sum, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. Thompson, he has alleged sufficient facts to satisfy both prongs of the deliberate indifference test. He adequately asserts that he was exposed to the substantial risk of harm of being physically tossed about in an erratic vehicle and that Diming was aware of that risk and disregarded it by failing to take any preventative measures. . .The only remaining question is whether Mr. Thompson's right to reasonable protection from a known threat was clearly established as of April 8, 2010, the date of the incident. . . .We conclude that Mr. Thompson's right was clearly established. Odom held that, by June 2000, it was clearly established in the Fourth Circuit that 'a correctional officer who stands by as a passive observer and takes no action whatsoever to intervene during an assault violates the rights of the victim inmate.' . . Reasonable officials would understand Odom to mean that inmates have an Eighth Amendment right to be protected from malicious attacks, not just by other inmates, but also from the very officials tasked with ensuring their security. . . . Because controlling authority clearly establishes an inmate's right to reasonable protection from malicious assault, we look no further and conclude that Mr. Thompson's right was clearly established in this case. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Officer Diming.")

Humbert v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore City, 866 F.3d 546, 560-62 (4th Cir. 2017) ("All of [the] facts taken together are not 'sufficient to warrant a prudent person, or one of reasonable caution, in believing, in the circumstances shown,' that Humbert engaged in criminal activity. . . Much like with the corrected warrant application, we simply cannot see how, under the circumstances of this case, the Officers could have reasonably concluded that they had probable cause to arrest Humbert. At most, the circumstances would have given the Officers only reasonable suspicion to investigate Humbert further. We therefore conclude that Humbert's arrest was not supported by probable cause. Similarly, the legal process instituted against Humbert and his resulting pretrial detention were unsupported by probable cause. The evidence shows that the court commissioner made his probable cause determination by relying on a materially false and misleading warrant application. And during Humbert's fifteen-month detention, the Officers never obtained any evidence of his criminality before or after his arraignment. To the contrary, the victim continuously informed them that she could not identify Humbert. What is more, the Officers received reports excluding Humbert as a source of the DNA found on the victim and her clothing—the first report on June 2, 2008, and the last report on December 15, 2008. Yet, they did not give the reports to Assistant State's Attorney Tan until May 11, 2009, despite receiving a memorandum from Tan a year earlier on May 12, 2008, expressly demanding that any and all information received by the BPD in connection with the case be immediately delivered to his office. Drawing all inferences in Humbert's favor, the Officers failed to promptly give the reports to Tan because the victim only agreed to testify against Humbert based on their assurances that DNA evidence supported Humbert's guilt. Further, they never notified Tan of the victim's inability to identify Humbert. It was only after Tan received the reports that he learned from the victim herself that she could not identify Humbert and she refused to testify. Because the Officers withheld such substantial information from Tan, he maintained the criminal proceedings against Humbert without any proper basis. To be sure, once Tan finally possessed this information, he entered a nolle prosequi. Viewing these facts in the light most favorable to Humbert, his criminal proceedings and pretrial detention also violated his Fourth Amendment rights. Put differently, the Officers caused legal process to be instituted and maintained against him without probable cause to believe that he committed a crime. See Manuel v. City of Joliet, ——U.S. ——, 137 S. Ct. 911, 918 (2017) (holding that pretrial detention resulting from legal process unsupported by probable cause violates the Fourth Amendment). We therefore conclude that the evidence reasonably supports the jury's verdict in favor of Humbert's § 1983 malicious prosecution claim. . . . Because we have determined that the Officers lacked probable cause to seize Humbert, we must next examine whether instituting criminal process against him violated a clearly established rule. The Officers argue that a reasonable person in the Officers' positions would not have known that his or her actions violated a clearly established right. Certainly, the Fourth Amendment right to be seized only on probable cause was clearly established at the time of the events at issue here. . . The law made clear that arresting and initiating legal process against a person without probable cause amounts to a seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Additionally, it was clearly established 'that the Constitution did not permit a police officer deliberately, or with reckless disregard for the truth, to make material misrepresentations or omissions to seek a warrant that would otherwise be without probable cause.'. . The objective standard for qualified immunity accommodates the allegation of falsity or material omissions 'because a reasonable officer cannot believe a warrant is supported by probable cause if the magistrate is misled by [stated or omitted facts] that the officer knows or should know are false [or would negate probable cause].'")

Bounds v. Parsons, 700 F. App'x 217, ___ (4th Cir. 2017) ("[I]n 2013, when Bounds was arrested, relevant precedent did not clearly prohibit an officer from using force, including a taser, in order to effectuate an arrest of a suspect who physically resists. It was not until 2016, in Armstrong, that we made clear that a taser 'may only be deployed when a police officer is confronted with an exigency that creates an immediate safety risk,' and not 'in the face of stationary and non-violent resistance to being handcuffed.'. . Nor does Meyers v. Baltimore Cty., Md., 713 F.3d 723 (4th Cir. 2013), decided before Bounds's arrest, clearly establish any limit on the use of force to restrain a suspect who is resisting: At the time excessive force was applied in Meyers, the suspect 'was not actively resisting arrest,' . . . whereas Bounds resisted arrest throughout, starting with his efforts to turn and face Parsons while being handcuffed and continuing through the officers' multiple efforts to secure Bounds in the police car. . . . At the time of Bounds's arrest, neither Meyers nor any other precedent would have made clear to 'every reasonable official,'. . . that they were precluded from using force to effectuate the arrest of a physically resistant and noncompliant suspect. The officers are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Safar v. Tingle, 859 F.3d 241, 246-48 (4th Cir. 2017) ("Here the complaint presupposes an altogether novel duty: after a magistrate issued the arrest warrants based on probable cause, Rodriguez had the duty to take steps to withdraw the warrants upon learning that the charges were meritless. By no means do we diminish the dreadful ordeal that Rodriguez might have averted by seeking to retract the warrants. But that is a different matter from holding that Rodriguez had an affirmative duty in law to do so. We need not decide whether such a duty exists: the critical point is that the proposed duty was certainly not clearly established. Tellingly, plaintiffs fail to note what exactly the duty was or where in the law the obligation was to be found. They do not sketch out the procedures officer Rodriguez was supposed to follow, identify the point in the criminal process when such steps should have been taken, or explain why it was her responsibility to have the warrants revoked. Moreover, a Virginia police officer does not 'ha[ve] the authority to unilaterally withdraw or dismiss a lawfully issued arrest warrant.'. . Only an attorney for the Commonwealth may move the court for dismissal. . . And while Rodriguez might have raised the issue with a supervisor or relayed her concerns to a prosecutor, we are unaware of a nebulous duty requiring police officers to follow some undefined procedure whenever they come across further information that casts doubt on an active arrest warrant. After all, 'in a situation in which a warrant has issued upon probable cause, a police officer is not called upon either to exercise discretion or to weigh the proof.' Brady v. Dill, 187 F.3d 104, 112 (1st Cir. 1999); see also id. at 111 ("[I]t is the magistrate and not the policeman who should decide whether probable cause has dissipated to such an extent following arrest that the suspect should be released.").This is no abstract point. Although plaintiffs assure us that this is an exceptional circumstance where probable cause had completely dissipated, we must be careful not to make bad law out of an ostensibly 'easy' case. . . To say that an affirmative duty attached here fails to emphasize the limits of such an obligation and how it might function in practice. Probable cause is fluid; after an arrest warrant is sworn out there often comes to light additional evidence that may be more or less exculpatory. Sometimes a victim may recant, as Costco did here. Or perhaps a complaining witness offers new or conflicting testimony. In either case, an officer is forced to make a discretionary call about whether the subsequent information undermines a magistrate's finding of probable cause and, if so, how best to proceed. Given the vagaries of these evidentiary judgments, courts should not lightly enter the business of micromanaging police investigations and impose a categorical duty on officers governing the termination of allegedly stale arrest warrants. Indeed, if every failure of a police officer to act in some unspecified way on the basis of new information gave rise to liability, we would invite a legion of cases urging us to second-guess an officer's decision about whether to second-guess a magistrate's finding of probable cause. In any event, to the extent that plaintiffs struggle to define a Fourth Amendment right, they face an even bigger obstacle demonstrating that such a duty was clearly established. Plaintiffs frame the constitutional right at the highest level of generality, asserting that centuries of 'Anglo-American law' forbid a state official from 'knowingly caus[ing] or permit[ting] the arrest of an innocent citizen.'. . That is certainly true, as far as it goes. But what plaintiffs fail to do is 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.' White, 137 S. Ct. at 552. The absence of controlling cases suggests that Rodriguez did not have a clearly established affirmative duty to take steps to revoke the arrests warrants. In fact, all the indications from our case law point to the opposite conclusion. . . .We do not require that a prior case be identical to the case at bar to advance a civil suit. . . But despite their assertions to the contrary, plaintiffs cannot marshal a 'settled Fourth Amendment principle' that would have put Rodriguez on notice that she was violating the Constitution. . . Given the absence of an established duty to act, we award qualified immunity to Rodriguez on the § 1983 claims.")

Safar v. Tingle, 859 F.3d 241, 252-55 (4th Cir. 2017) (Floyd, J., concurring) ("The seizures that occurred when Plaintiffs Jan Eshow and Fadwa Safar were arrested strike me as manifestly unreasonable. The affiant for their warrants, Officer Rodriguez, was aware that probable cause for their arrests had entirely dissipated. . .Yet, she did nothing to initiate any recall of the arrest warrants or to inform the Commonwealth's Attorney's Office that the information on which she relied to obtain the warrants was entirely undermined. I believe that the Fourth Amendment mandates that when probable cause for an outstanding arrest warrant wholly disappears and the affiant is aware, the affiant has a duty to take steps to rescind the warrant. My belief that a seizure pursuant to a warrant for which probable cause has entirely dissipated is unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment is not novel. Multiple justices of the Supreme Court have recognized this point, albeit in opinions that have no binding force of law, as have several of our sister circuits. . . .The duty I envision would be limited to those extreme cases where probable cause has completely dissipated, a question we ask police officers to evaluate every day in the context of warrantless arrests. . . Thus, it would not be a departure to require an officer, having sworn under oath to facts in support of a warrant application, to have a responsibility to inform the court when the facts have so drastically changed as to eliminate all probable cause prior to the execution of the warrant the officer sought. . . Although I believe that the Fourth Amendment mandates such a duty, I recognize that announcing such a duty in this case would stand in tension with our decisions in Taylor v. Waters, 81 F.3d 429 (4th Cir. 1996) and Brooks v. City of Winston-Salem, N.C., 85 F.3d 178 (4th Cir. 1996), as the majority notes. . . I fear that the holdings in these cases are overbroad, and ultimately stray too far from their facts in appearing to establish a bright line rule that all potential liability for an officer cuts off at the moment of a warrant being issued, absent a materially false statement or material omission in the warrant application. . .If we adhere to the idea of reasonableness in understanding the Fourth Amendment, as we must, then the holdings of Taylor and Brooks appear to be in tension with that idea. Thus, I write separately to note this problem in the hopes that a future en banc court may have the chance to consider the impact of Taylor and Brooks and considerably narrow the scope of their holdings.")

Martin v. Duffy, 858 F.3d 239, 251 (4th Cir. 2017) ("In Booker, this Court held that an inmate's 'right to file a prison grievance free from retaliation was clearly established under the First Amendment' at least as far back in time as 2010—the year in which the defendant's conduct in Booker took place. . . Because Martin's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation by prison officials for filing a grievance was clearly established in 2010, . . . Duffy—whose alleged conduct took place in 2014—is not entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, we conclude that the district court erred in dismissing Martin's First Amendment retaliation claim.")

Liverman v. City of Petersburg, 844 F.3d 400, 407-12 (4th Cir. 2016) ("The threshold question in this case is whether the Department's policy regulates officers' rights to speak on matters of public concern. There can be no doubt that it does: the restraint is a virtual blanket prohibition on all speech critical of the government employer. The explicit terms of the Negative Comments Provision prevent plaintiffs and any other officer from making unfavorable comments on the operations and policies of the Department, arguably the 'paradigmatic' matter of public concern. . . .If the Department wishes to pursue a narrower social media policy, then it can craft a regulation that does not have the chilling effects on speech that the Supreme Court deplored. We cannot, however, allow the current policy to survive as a management and disciplinary mechanism. . . .In light of the First Amendment protection accorded to the officers' posts, we conclude that the discipline they received pursuant to the social networking policy was unconstitutional. . . . Having found that Dixon violated the officers' First Amendment rights, we must consider whether such rights were 'clearly established' at the time of the events at issue. . . . [T]his case does not involve gray areas: the right against such a sweeping prior restraint on speech was clearly established and then some. Indeed, it is axiomatic that the government may not ban speech on the ground that it expresses an objecting viewpoint. . . Accordingly, there can be no doubt that prohibiting any '[n]egative comments on the internal operations of the Bureau, or specific conduct of supervisors or peers' — even comments of great public concern — violates the First Amendment. . . .Dixon also asserts that the disciplinary actions taken pursuant to the policy were reasonable in light of the vague boundaries distinguishing public and private speech. Given the patent unconstitutionality of the social networking policy, however, efforts to enforce the policy are similarly suspect. After all, the core of the policy was a prohibition on legitimate speech and, as detailed above, we have little difficulty locating the officers' speech within this protected sphere. Plaintiffs raised serious concerns regarding the Department's training programs and the promotion of inexperienced supervisors, both of which are matters of public concern. As this court has held time and again, it was clearly established law that such speech is protected by the First Amendment. . .We appreciate the need for order and discipline in the ranks. . . At the same time, we cannot countenance an arm of government with such enormous powers being removed to this extent from public scrutiny. This is not an all- or-nothing matter; there is a balance to be struck. But the Department's social networking policy, and the disciplinary actions taken to enforce it, lean too far to one side. We therefore hold that Chief Dixon is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jackson v. Holley, 666 F. App'x 242, ___ & n.* (4th Cir. 2016) ("In this case, Jackson alleges only that Holley: (1) sent him one 'sexually explicit and lurid' letter; (2) 'posed up seductively before [Jackson] and whispered sexually explicit words to [him;]' and (3) 'plant[ed] her groin area in [Jackson's] face while [he] was seated for [his] haircut in the barber's chair.' We conclude that the conduct about which Jackson complains does not amount to an Eighth Amendment violation. . . . Given the lack of circuit authority regarding whether sexual harassment by prison officials amounts to a constitutional violation, we also find that it was not unreasonable for Holley to have 'failed to appreciate that h[er] conduct would violate [Jackson's] rights.' Meyers v. Baltimore Cnty., 713 F.3d 723, 731 (4th Cir. 2013) (internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, even if the conduct about which Jackson complains is sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment violation, Holley is entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry.")

Scinto v. Stansberry, 841 F.3d 219, 235-36 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient for a reasonable jury to conclude that his constitutional rights were violated when Dr. Phillip denied Plaintiff his prescribed insulin and when Dr. Phillip and Administrator McClintock failed to aid Plaintiff during a medical emergency. . . Although a jury may ultimately decide that Defendants' version of events is more credible, we are barred from making such a determination when deciding whether to grant summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . To determine whether the right was clearly established, we first must define the right at issue. . . Dr. Phillip maintains that we should frame our analysis of qualified immunity as to Plaintiff's insulin claim as whether it is 'clearly established that a prison medical provider runs afoul of the Eighth Amendment when he does not give one single dose of insulin to a federal inmate, after the inmate becomes angry and hostile ..., and the doctor implements a plan to monitor the inmate thereafter.'. . Similarly, Dr. Phillip and Administrator McClintock assert that we should consider their qualified immunity as to Plaintiff's medical emergency claim based on whether a reasonable official would have known it violated a clearly established constitutional right to follow protocol by placing an inmate in administrative detention after he receives an incident report. But '[f]or a constitutional right to be clearly established, its contours "must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right."'. . There is no requirement that the 'very action in question [must have] previously been held unlawful' for a reasonable official to have notice that his conduct violated that right. . . Accordingly, we reject Dr. Phillip's and Administrator McClintock's invitations to define the rights at issue in accordance with the 'very action[s] in question.'. .Rather, we define the right in question as the right of prisoners to receive adequate medical care and to be free from officials' deliberate indifference to their known medical needs. This definition is consistent with previous deliberate indifference cases from this Circuit. For example, in Iko v. Shreve--a case in which a prisoner alleged government officials failed to conduct a medical evaluation after pepper-spraying him to compel compliance during a cell removal--this Court defined the right at issue as 'the right to adequate medical care.'. . This definition also accords with Supreme Court jurisprudence, which has long dictated that the Eighth Amendment confers a duty upon prison officials to ensure that prisoners 'receive adequate ... medical care.'. .A prisoner's right to adequate medical care and freedom from deliberate indifference to medical needs has been clearly established by the Supreme Court and this Circuit since at least 1976 and, thus, was clearly established at the time of the events in question. . . Because we conclude that there is sufficient evidence that Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care and freedom from officials' deliberate indifference to his medical needs was violated and that the right was clearly established, Dr. Phillip and Administrator McClintock are not entitled to qualified immunity.") Lane v. Anderson, 660 F. App'x 185, ___ (4th Cir. 2016) ("With respect to the first McVey prong, we cannot agree with Sheriff Anderson that Appellant stated his concerns merely as a self-serving complaint. Rather, Appellant, as a private citizen, spoke on a matter of public concern when he questioned a police shooting, which resulted in a fatality, and the subsequent investigation. When Appellant communicated with the media, he was acting outside the scope of his duties as a deputy sheriff. Although Appellant's 'expressions related to [his] job,' the First Amendment affords him protection when he conveys these views as a private citizen. . . . The content of Appellant's speech here was undeniably a matter of public concern. He questioned a shooting in which a suspect was killed (and Appellant himself injured). He questioned an allegedly botched investigation, which he suspected was cloaked in a police cover-up. And he ultimately questioned whether friendly fire occurred, as opposed to the Suspect having allegedly shot him, which resulted in the Suspect's death. . . .Having concluded that Appellant's speech should be accorded First Amendment protection, we now turn to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: whether every reasonable official would have known that terminating Appellant for speaking out would be in violation of his First Amendment rights. . . Appellees maintain that Maryland state law, specifically the Law Enforcement Officers' Bill of Rights, expressly provides that the law enforcement agency's chief -- here, Sheriff Anderson -- is permitted to punish Appellant for 'divulg[ing] information' that is contrary to the department's policy. . . If Sheriff Anderson complied with this express statutory right, Appellees' argument goes, 'he had no reason to doubt the constitutionality of the policies.'. . But, the position urged by Appellees, and adopted by the district court, that the Sheriff was acting within his legal authority because he was acting pursuant to Maryland law, ignores clearly established precedent. . .Sheriff Anderson's adherence to state law is not helpful here. An independent basis for sanctions does not provide a shield from liability when the speech is constitutionally protected. . . .[W]hen Sheriff Anderson terminated Appellant in 2012, the law was not in any 'gray area[ ].' . . Rather, the law was clearly established. After our decisions in Andrew and Durham, no reasonable official could have believed that a law enforcement officer's statements to media outlets regarding misconduct and corruption surrounding a police-involved shooting lacked First Amendment protection. Therefore, we hold that Sheriff Anderson is not entitled to qualified immunity, and Appellant can continue to press the damages claim brought against Sheriff Anderson in his individual capacity."

Brickey v. Hall, 828 F.3d 298, 303-08 (4th Cir. 2016) ("On appeal, Hall does not challenge the district court's holding that Brickey has properly alleged a constitutional violation—the first qualified-immunity prong. Instead, Hall contends that the right Brickey asserts was not clearly established in 2012 when Brickey was terminated. Our review, therefore, is confined to the question of what law was clearly established—we do not reach the merits of Brickey's constitutional claim. . . .Because we hold that the law was not clearly established as to the second question—the balancing of the employee's and employer's interests—Hall is entitled to qualified immunity. Consequently, we need not reach the question of whether it was clearly established that Brickey spoke as a citizen on a matter of public concern. . . .It was clearly established in 2012 that police officials are entitled to impose more restrictions on speech than other public employers because a police force is ' "paramilitary"—discipline is demanded, and freedom must be correspondingly denied.'. . Because of this heightened need for discipline, police officials have 'greater latitude ... in dealing with dissension in their ranks.'. . . In sum, the parties have not directed us to any case that would have clearly warned Hall that terminating Brickey for his comments about the D.A.R.E. funds would violate his First Amendment rights. On the contrary, our case law had stressed the broad discretion granted police officials to limit speech when discipline is at stake. As a result, we cannot say that it was beyond debate that Brickey's interests outweighed Hall's. . . .We hold that it was not clearly established on the date of Brickey's termination that his speech interests as a citizen outweighed Hall's interests as an employer. Hall is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Lawson v. Union Cty. Clerk of Court, 828 F.3d 239, 250 (4th Cir. 2016) ("In an effort to demonstrate that the law in this area is muddled, Gault cites a 1996 decision in which we held, in an unpublished opinion, that qualified immunity shielded a clerk of court who fired his chief deputy for disloyalty. . . This does not advance Gault's argument, however, because the fact that the law was unsettled in 1996 tells us nothing about the state of the law nearly sixteen years later. As we have explained, the state of the law in 2012 would have put Gault on notice that political affiliation was not an appropriate requirement for administrative employees. Thus, we conclude that Gault has not established the defense of qualified immunity, and we cannot affirm the district court's judgment on that basis.")

Cox v. Quinn, 828 F.3d 227, 239 (4th Cir. 2016) ("On the record as we may view it here, we find that the district court correctly concluded that the correctional officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. It has long been established that jail officials have a duty to protect inmates from a substantial and known risk of harm, including harm inflicted by other prisoners. . . Moreover, by 2011, we had made it clear that 'a prison official acts with deliberate indifference when he ignores repeated requests from a vulnerable inmate to be separated from a fellow inmate who has issued violent threats which the aggressor will likely carry out in the absence of official intervention.'. . Here, Cox repeatedly informed the appellants that he was being threatened and robbed and that he feared for his safety, and his concerns were corroborated by other inmates. But the only action the correctional officers took in response to this information — despite the instructions of their sergeant — was to do the one thing Cox specifically warned them would increase the risk to his safety. And when confronted with Cox's concerns again, Miles just threw up his hands and walked away. Under the law of this Circuit, an objectively reasonable correctional officer — certified or uncertified — would have known that these actions were unreasonable, ran afoul of clearly established law, and violated rights "manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle" articulated in Farmer. . . Accordingly, the correctional officers are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

King v. Rubenstein, 825 F.3d 206, 222 n.3 (4th Cir. 2016) ("The defendants argued that they are entitled to qualified immunity, as any constitutional violations were not clearly established. The district court did not consider this argument, presumably because it concluded that King failed to allege a violation. As we may affirm a dismissal on any grounds supported by the record, . . . we briefly consider the argument here. Even where a plaintiff suffers a constitutional violation, an officer is only liable if 'the right was clearly established at the time the violation occurred such that a reasonable person would have known that his conduct was unconstitutional.'. . . We decline to affirm the dismissal on qualified-immunity grounds at this stage: we cannot conclude that a right to be free from an egregiously sexually invasive, unjustified, compelled surgery was not clearly established under the Fourth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments.")

Goines v. Valley Cmty. Servs. Bd., 822 F.3d 159, 170 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Accepting the allegations of the complaint as true, Goines, though having speech and other physical difficulties, exhibited no signs of mental illness and made no threats to harm himself or others, but instead sought the help of the police to avoid a confrontation and potential fight with a neighbor who had spliced into Goines' cable line. Under these facts, the Officers lacked probable cause for an emergency mental-health detention, and Goines' complaint therefore alleges a constitutional violation. . . And again accepting Goines' allegations as true, the constitutional violation alleged is one for which the Officers would not be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he facts as alleged by Goines—the involuntary detention of a man with physical disabilities who exhibited no signs of mental illness and made no threats of harm—are sufficiently beyond the realm of probable cause that no reasonable police officer would find them adequate. . . . Because Goines' complaint plausibly alleges facts that no reasonable officer would have found sufficient to justify an emergency mental-health detention, the complaint states a constitutional violation by the Officers for which they would not be entitled to qualified immunity.")

Yates v. Terry, 817 F.3d 877, 886-88 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Our analysis of the Graham factors when measured against the level of force used by Terry against Yates leads us to conclude that such force was not objectively reasonable in light of the totality of the circumstances in this case. Terry was ordered out of his car and subsequently tased three times over not having his driver's license. We have explained that '[d]eploying a taser is a serious use of force,' that is designed to 'inflict[ ] a painful and frightening blow.'. . For these reasons, it 'may only be deployed when a police officer is confronted with an exigency that creates an immediate safety risk and that is reasonably likely to be cured by using the taser.'. . As we held in Estate of Armstrong, '[t]he subject of a seizure does not create such a risk simply because he is doing something that can be characterized as resistance-even when that resistance includes physically preventing an officer's manipulations of his body.'. . The objective facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to Yates, as we must do at this point in the proceedings, show that he was neither a dangerous felon, a flight risk, nor an immediate threat to Terry or anyone else. Yates has thus established that Terry's use of his taser constituted excessive force in violation of Yates' Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Having concluded that Yates' constitutional rights were violated, we must determine whether those rights were clearly established at the time of Terry's conduct. . . .In this case, it was clearly established in 2008 that a police officer was not entitled to use unnecessary, gratuitous, or disproportionate force by repeatedly tasing a nonviolent misdemeanant who presented no threat to the safety of the officer or the public and who was compliant and not actively resisting arrest or fleeing. . . Although our decisions in Meyers, Bailey, and Jones dealt with individuals who were secured when they were subjected to excessive force, our precedent nonetheless provided Terry with fair notice that the force he used against Yates under the facts of this case was unconstitutionally excessive. . . .Even though Yates was not handcuffed, our precedent makes clear that a nonviolent misdemeanant who is compliant, is not actively resisting arrest, and poses no threat to the safety of the officer or others should not be subjected to 'unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate force.'. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Yates, no reasonable officer would have believed that Terry's use of the taser was justifiable at all and certainly not on three occasions. We reject Terry's argument that the unlawfulness of his conduct was not clearly established because he was faced with a dual-sided threat. Drawing reasonable inferences in Yates' favor, there was no threat to safety, dual-sided or otherwise. Rather, there was a commotion attributable to Terry's excessive and unjustifiable use of force, which unnecessarily escalated tension during what can at best be described as a routine traffic stop. . . . For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that based on the totality of the circumstances and viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, Terry is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. We therefore affirm the district court's denial of Terry's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Smith v. Murphy, 634 F. App'x 914, 917 (4th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants contend, the fact that Smith suffered only de minimis injuries absolves them from liability under the clearly established law at the time of the incident. Prior to Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010), this court 'consistently held that a plaintiff could not prevail on an excessive force claim [under the Eighth Amendment] absent the most extraordinary circumstances, if he had not suffered more than a de minimis injury.'. . For Fourth Amendment excessive force claims, however, the severity of injury resulting from the force used has always been but one 'consideration in determining whether force was excessive.'. . . The cases cited by Defendants do not suggest otherwise. All but one of the cases involves either prisoners or pretrial detainees, therefore implicating either the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment, rather than the Fourth Amendment. And Carter v. Morris, 164 F.3d 215, 219 n.3 (4th Cir.1999), the free citizen case, does not demonstrate that the de minimis injury rule applies to Fourth Amendment claims; rather, it merely suggests, in passing, that the plaintiff's claim failed because she offered 'minimal evidence' to support it. . . Finding no support for Defendants' contention that suffering only de minimis injuries bars one from asserting a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim, we conclude that the district court appropriately denied Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to this claim.")

Hunter v. Town of Mocksville, N.C., 789 F.3d 389, 399-402 (4th Cir. 2015) ("Nothing before us suggests that Plaintiffs' 'daily professional activities,'. . . included calling the Governor's Office for any purpose, much less to express concerns about the Mocksville PD. Nothing suggests that Plaintiffs' request that the Governor's Office look into suspected corruption and misconduct at the Mocksville PD was 'ordinarily within the scope of [Plaintiffs'] duties.'. . . Indeed, a 'practical' inquiry into Plaintiffs' day-to-day duties, . . . manifestly does not lead to the conclusion that those included reaching out to the Governor's Office about anything at all. Instead, the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs illustrates that Plaintiffs acted as private citizens. . . . Defendants counter that Plaintiffs acted pursuant to their official duties because all sworn police officers have a duty to enforce criminal laws, and Plaintiffs, police officers, suspected criminal conduct. While some of the suspected corruption and misconduct at issue here, such as misusing public funds for personal gain, might qualify as criminal, other misconduct, such as racial discrimination within the Mocksville PD, might not. Moreover, and more importantly, a general duty to enforce criminal laws in the community does not morph calling the Governor's Office because the chief of police himself is engaging in misconduct into part of an officer's daily duties. . . . . In sum, privately reaching out to the Governor's Office about suspected corruption and misconduct at the Mocksville PD, at the hands of the chief of police, cannot fairly or accurately be portrayed as simply part of Plaintiffs' 'daily professional activities.'. . . In reaching out to the Governor's Office, Plaintiffs were not 'just doing [their] job'. . . Rather, Plaintiffs spoke as citizens, on a matter of undisputedly public concern. . . and no countervailing government interest has even been suggested. Accordingly, the district court rightly rejected Defendants' motion for summary judgment on this basis. . . .With their final argument on appeal, Defendants contend that even if Plaintiffs' First Amendment rights were violated, those rights were not clearly established at the time, i.e., in December 2011. Accordingly, Cook and Bralley argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity protecting them from suit. . . . Andrew and Durham clearly established that, long before the December 2011 speech and retaliation at issue here, 'speech about serious governmental misconduct, and certainly not least of all serious misconduct in a law enforcement agency, is protected.'. . . Defendants attempt to make much of the fact that, in both Andrew and Durham, the plaintiffs had reached out to the news media (though in Durham, the plaintiff also reached out to others, including the Governor's Office). That may be. But nothing in this Court's reasoning or broadly-worded holdings in either Andrew or Durham suggests that that fact was somehow dispositive. Nothing in either Andrew or Durham stands for the proposition that only speech to a media organization can qualify for First Amendment protection. And we agree with Justice Stevens that it would be 'perverse to fashion a new rule that provides employees with an incentive to voice their concerns publicly,'. . . which is precisely what we would be doing, were we to adopt Defendants' position that exposing serious government misconduct to the news media is protected, but exposing that same misconduct to the Governor's Office, as in this case, by definition is not. In sum, 'it was clearly established in the law of this Circuit' in December 2011 that speech about 'serious misconduct in a law enforcement agency[ ] is protected.'. . The district court therefore did not err in denying qualified immunity to Cook and Bralley on this basis.")

Hunter v. Town of Mocksville, N.C., 789 F.3d 389, 403-07 (4th Cir. 2015) (Niemeyer, J., dissenting) ("I would grant qualified immunity to Police Chief Robert Cook and Town Manager Christine Bralley because it was not clearly established at the time that Chief Cook fired the plaintiff-officers that the officers had complained to the North Carolina Governor's Office as citizens, rather than as employees. If the officers had complained as employees, 'the Constitution does not insulate their communications from employer discipline.'. . . [T]he majority fails to identify any controlling precedent that would have informed Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley that they were acting unlawfully in firing the officers for going over their heads to the Governor's Office to complain about departmental misconduct. The question of whether police officers speak as employees or as citizens when complaining to the Governor's Office about departmental corruption and misconduct was undecided in this circuit—and has remained so before today—and the proper application of relevant principles is murky at best. Therefore, the relevant case law was not clearly established at the time of the defendants' conduct. In such circumstances, Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley are entitled to qualified immunity, which shields government officials from suits for damages when acting in their personal capacity unless (1) they violate a statutory or constitutional right (2) that was 'clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.'. . .I agree with the defendants that, as of December 2011, the law was not clearly established—nor, indeed, has it been at any time before now—that a police officer complaining to the Governor's Office of departmental corruption involving his police chief speaks as a citizen. Given the lack of relevant authority, it was entirely reasonable for Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley to have concluded that the officers were complaining as employees in the course of their official duties when making their complaints. In deciding otherwise, the majority relies on two decisions—Andrew v. Clark, 561 F.3d 261 (4th Cir.2009), and Durham v. Jones, 737 F.3d 291 (4th Cir.2013). But those cases only go so far as to conclude unremarkably that exposing corruption within a police department is a matter of public concern—a proposition with which Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley agree. Neither case addresses the independent inquiry of whether the officers were speaking as citizens when reporting departmental corruption for investigation. . . . Not only did Andrew and Durham not address whether police officers speak as citizens when reporting corruption to a state agency, but the facts of those cases also render them decidedly distinguishable from the case before us. Whereas the terminated officers in those cases had leaked information to members of the media, either exclusively (Andrew) or in tandem with a distribution to a broad spectrum of public officials (Durham), the terminated officers in this case reported the corruption exclusively to a single governmental agency that could have been thought to have supervisory or investigatory responsibility over the Police Chief and the Town Manager. In light of this factual distinction, it can hardly be said that existing precedent 'placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate[.]'. . . To the extent that our prior case law suggested that a law-enforcement officer speaks as a citizen when reporting corruption and misconduct to the media for publication, it would not necessarily have been apparent to a reasonable official that such an officer speaks as a citizen when making such a report to a governmental agency for investigation. . . 'Officials are not liable for bad guesses in gray areas; they are liable for transgressing bright lines.'. . Here, not only was there no authority in this circuit holding that the defendants' conduct was unlawful, but also there was no precedent regarding when a police officer speaks as a citizen rather than as an employee. Thus, Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley were left to speculate about and guess whether terminating the employment of Officers Hunter, Donathan, and Medlin would violate their First Amendment rights. Because those public officials are not liable for incorrect guesses, I would grant them qualified immunity and reverse the district court's ruling denying that immunity.") Ussery v. Mansfield, 786 F.3d 332, 335-36, 338 (4th Cir. 2015) ("As the parties agree, the law clearly established at the time of the extraction governs the entitlement to qualified immunity here. Further, they agree that Norman v. Taylor, 25 F.3d 1259 (4th Cir.1994) (en banc), provides the legal framework for determination of that question. In Norman, this court held that 'absent the most extraordinary circumstances, a plaintiff cannot prevail on an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim if his injury is de minimis.'. . The Supreme Court expressly abrogated Norman in Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34, 38–39 (2010). . . . We have subsequently concluded, however, that where the alleged use of force occurred prior to Wilkins, a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity turns on whether that force 'was objectively reasonable in view of the clearly established law at the time of the alleged event'—i.e., the law as set forth in Norman. See Hill v. Crum, 727 F.3d 312, 321, 322 (4th Cir.2013). To prevail, then, an inmate like Ussery, seeking relief for excessive force deployed before the issuance of Wilkins in 2010, must establish either that he sustained more than de minimis injuries or that the defendants' use of force was 'of a sort repugnant to the conscience of mankind and thus expressly outside the de minimis force exception.'. . With this standard in mind, we turn to the case at hand. . . . [O]n numerous occasions, applying the Norman standard, we have concluded that injuries comparable to—and arguably less severe than—those Ussery maintains he suffered were not de minimis.")

Smith v. Ray, 781 F.3d 95, 104 (4th Cir. 2015) ("In arguing that the unconstitutionality of his conduct was not clearly established on the day in question, Ray attempts to draw fine distinctions between the facts of the present case and those of Rowland. However, our determination that the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity in Rowland was not based on any case that was factually on all fours. Rather, it was based on the simple fact that the officer took a situation where there obviously was no need for the use of any significant force and yet took an unreasonably aggressive tack that quickly escalated it to a violent exchange when the suspect instinctively attempted to defend himself.")

Covey v. Assessor of Ohio Cnty., 777 F.3d 186, 196 (4th Cir. 2015) ("At this stage, we cannot conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. As to the police officers, the Supreme Court has held that no reasonable officer can 'claim to be unaware of the basic rule, well established by our cases, that, absent consent or exigency, a warrantless search of the home is presumptively unconstitutional.'. . As we have recognized for over a decade, 'the curtilage is entitled to the same level of Fourth Amendment protection extended to the home.'. . As alleged in the complaint, the officers violated clearly established law by proceeding directly to where they suspected marijuana would be found and without any reason to believe that they would find Mr. Covey there. Thus, they are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage. The tax assessor's claim to qualified immunity is a closer call. On one hand, 'an official who performs an act clearly established to be beyond the scope of his discretionary authority is not entitled to claim qualified immunity under § 1983,' and the Supreme Court has 'made clear that determination of the scope of an official's authority depends upon an analysis of the statutes or regulations controlling the official's duties.'. . . Arguably, by entering into the curtilage and house despite the presence of 'No Trespassing' signs and a regulation's explicit directive to leave, the tax assessor exceeded his discretionary authority and therefore should not be entitled to qualified immunity. On the other hand, the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed that we should not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . . The parties have failed to offer any caselaw involving facts substantially similar to this case. Thus, it may be unwarranted to deny qualified immunity on the basis that 'a reasonable [civil servant] would have known' that merely entering into the curtilage, in contravention to a regulatory directive, violated a clearly established right under the Constitution. . . As already stated, however, the exact manner in which Crews searched the property is unknown and should be developed through discovery. Therefore, at this stage, Crews is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

M.C. ex rel. Crawford v. Amrhein, 598 F. App'x 143, 147-50 (4th Cir. 2015) ("The 'salient question' before us is 'whether the state of the law in [2006] gave [the defendants] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [M.C.] was unconstitutional.'. . Because we find that the alleged rights at issue in this case were not clearly established at the time of M.C.'s 2006 sex assignment surgery, we need not reach the question of whether M.C. alleged sufficient facts to show that the surgery violated his constitutional rights. . . We first consider M.C.'s contention, accepted by the district court, that the defendants had fair warning that the sex assignment surgery violated his constitutional right to reproduction. In support of this proposition, M.C. draws our attention to three cases: Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992); Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535 (1942); and Avery v. County of Burke, 660 F.2d 111 (4th Cir.1981). Although we acknowledge the broad statements in these cases about reproductive rights, we cannot say that a reasonable official would understand them as clearly establishing an infant's constitutional right to delay sex assignment surgery. . . .Relying on the principles gleaned from these cases, the district court concluded that the defendants violated M.C.'s clearly established 'right to procreation.'. . We think, however, that this frames the right too broadly for purposes of assessing the defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity. . . .In our view, the alleged right at issue is that of an infant to delay medically unnecessary sex assignment surgery. By 'medically unnecessary,' we mean that no imminent threat to M.C.'s health or life required state officials to consent to the surgery, or doctors to perform it. Viewed in that light, we do not think that Casey, Skinner, or Avery put reasonable officials on notice that they were violating M.C.'s constitutional rights. As we have repeatedly emphasized, '[o]fficials are not liable for bad guesses in gray areas; they are liable for transgressing bright lines.'. . We hold that the defendants did not transgress such a bright line in this case. . . . Our core inquiry is whether a reasonable official in 2006 would have fair warning from then-existing precedent that performing sex assignment surgery on sixteen-month-old M.C. violated a clearly established constitutional right. In concluding that these officials did not have fair warning, we do not mean to diminish the severe harm that M.C. claims to have suffered. While M.C. may well have a remedy under state law, . . . we hold that qualified immunity bars his federal constitutional claims because the defendants did not violate M.C.'s clearly established rights.")

Owens v. Baltimore City State's Attorneys Office, 767 F.3d 379, 396-401(4th Cir. 2014) ("A qualified immunity defense can be presented in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, but, as the Second Circuit has noted, when asserted at this early stage in the proceedings, 'the defense faces a formidable hurdle' and 'is usually not successful.'. . This is so because dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) is appropriate only if a plaintiff fails to state a claim that is plausible on its face. . . A claim has 'facial plausibility when the pleaded factual content allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . To satisfy the standard, a plaintiff must do more than allege facts that show the 'sheer possibility' of wrongdoing. . . The plaintiff's complaint will not be dismissed as long as he provides sufficient detail about his claim to show that he has a more-than-conceivable chance of success on the merits. . . . We have little difficulty concluding that Owens's allegations state a plausible § 1983 claim. First, the information Officers Pelligrini, Dunnigan, and Landsman assertedly withheld from ASA Brave was favorable to Owens. Had the

Officers properly disclosed Thompson's statements, his inconsistencies would have lent support to the contention advanced by Owens's defense that Thompson, not Owens, had raped and murdered Ms. Williar. At a minimum, the inconsistencies would have aided Owens in his attempt to discredit Thompson's testimony and sow reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors. . . Second, Owens has offered specific allegations as to the Officers' bad faith. He asserts that these experienced police officers willfully, consciously, and in bad faith 'chose not to disclose' the multiple revisions to Thompson's statement that they elicited from him during their hours-long interrogation. Further, he alleges that the Officers told ASA Brave about the final version of the story almost as soon as the witness had said it. The temporal proximity between Thompson's succession of narratives and the Officers' report to the prosecutor lends support to the contention that Thompson's inconsistent narratives were fresh in the Officers' minds, and thus, the Officers' omissions were not accidental, but intentional and malicious. Finally, Owens's allegations satisfy Brady's materiality requirement. Owens asserts that Thompson was the State's 'star witness,' and that in post-trial proceedings, ASA Brave admitted that without Thompson, 'the case could not have gone forward.' Certainly, it is plausible that impeachment of such a key witness could have altered the outcome at trial. We emphasize that Brady does not require that disclosure probably would have modified a trial's result. . . On the contrary, it is enough that the suppression of evidence cast serious doubt on the proceedings' integrity. . . If Owens can prove his allegations, they would certainly satisfy this requirement. . . . [T]o be clearly established, a right need not be one with respect to which all judges on all courts agree. Rather, '[i]f the unlawfulness is apparent, the fact that some court may have reached an incorrect result will not shield a defendant's violation of a clearly established right.'. . Thus, although judicial disagreement about the existence of a right is certainly a factor we consider in determining whether a right has been clearly established, . . . disagreement alone does not defeat a plaintiff's claim in every instance. The Supreme Court has never sanctioned such a rule, see, e.g., Hope, 536 U.S. at 745–46 (holding a right was clearly established and rejecting a qualified-immunity defense notwithstanding the contrary views of three dissenting justices and the court of appeals), and neither have we, see, e.g., Henry v. Purnell, 652 F.3d 524, 536–37 (4th Cir.2011) (en banc) (rejecting a qualified-immunity defense over a three-judge dissent). With these principles in mind, we consider whether the constitutional rights Owens asserts were clearly established as of February and March 1988, the time of the alleged violations. . . . The partial dissent offers a different view. It maintains that the law was not clearly established in 1988 because the cases decided before that date—Barbee, Sutton, and Boone—imposed no independent obligation on police officers to disclose exculpatory evidence. The dissent insists that Barbee, Sutton, and Boone stand only for the proposition that 'a police officer's knowledge of exculpatory evidence will be imputed to the prosecutor for Brady purposes.' This holding, the dissent contends, fails to notify police officers of their susceptibility to suit, and thus, the Officers in the case at hand enjoy qualified immunity. We cannot agree. Qualified immunity exists to ensure that 'public officials performing discretionary functions [are] free to act without fear of retributive suits ... except when they should have understood that particular conduct was unlawful.' Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 44 (1st Cir.2004). Ever since it first articulated the contours of modern qualified-immunity doctrine, the Supreme Court has emphasized that qualified immunity assesses the apparent unlawfulness of conduct. . . . Barbee, Sutton, and Boone each held that certain conduct by police officers—the suppression of material exculpatory evidence—results in the violation of criminal defendants' rights. Whether or not an officer's knowledge is "imputed" to the prosecutor does not affect the lawfulness of the officer's own conduct. See Limone, 372 F.3d at 47 (rejecting police officers' argument that law was not clearly established because cases announcing plaintiff's constitutional right referenced "the State's" obligations, not those of police officers). Barbee, Sutton, and Boone taught police officers how to conform their conduct to the law. These cases each held that if a police officer suppresses material exculpatory evidence, courts will invalidate a defendant's criminal sentence as unconstitutional. A police officer acting after the issuance of these decisions, like each of the Officers here, could not have thought that the suppression of material exculpatory evidence would pass constitutional muster. . . Goodwin recognized this reality, and held in light of Barbee, Sutton, and Boone that a police officer's obligation to disclose material exculpatory evidence was clearly established by 1983, five years prior to the Brady violations alleged in this case. Yet the dissent suggests that our reliance on Goodwin retroactively subjects the Officers to liability. Not so. For although Goodwin issued after the Officers in this case acted, Goodwin announced no new rule of constitutional law. Rather, it merely held, in light of the constitutional rule already established by Barbee, Sutton, and Boone, that a police officer's duty to disclose material exculpatory evidence was clearly established in 1983. If a right was clearly established in 1983 (as Goodwin held), it must have been clearly established in 1988 (when the Officers acted). To hold to the contrary would directly conflict with Goodwin. . . Indeed, if the dissent is correct and Barbee, Sutton, and Boone announced no rule of constitutional law applicable to police officers, then Goodwin was wrongly decided. For according to the dissent's view, Goodwin acted in the absence of any prior circuit precedent to hold that a constitutional right was clearly established and so a police officer did not enjoy qualified immunity. We cannot endorse such an extraordinary view of our precedent. In sum, our precedent unmistakably provides that, by 1988, a police officer violates clearly established constitutional law when he suppresses material exculpatory evidence in bad faith. Accordingly, we hold that the Officers were clearly on notice of the impermissibility of their conduct in 1988, the time of the alleged violations.")

Smith v. Gilchrist, 749 F.3d 302, 312, 313 (4th Cir. 2014) ("Gilchrist argues to us. . . as he did to the district court, that even assuming that Smith's interests actually (and completely) outweighed the government's, he is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity because it would not have been clear to a reasonable official in Gilchrist's position that Smith's interests outweighed the government's. . . In this regard, Gilchrist emphasizes that balancing the government's interests against the employee's is a subtle process. He also maintains that because of the significant role that the defensive-driving course played in reducing the DA's office caseload and freeing resources for other matters, a reasonable DA in his position could have believed that any public criticism of that course undermined the operation and mission of the DA's office. Gilchrist contends that, under this theory, a reasonable DA might have believed he was justified in firing Smith for publicly making the statements in question. This argument need not detain us long. For purposes of determining whether Smith's right to speak without recrimination was clearly established, we conclude that the right at issue, described at the appropriate level of specificity, is as follows: it is the right of an ADA running for public office not to be fired for speaking publicly in his capacity as a candidate on matters of public concern when the speech is critical of a program that substantially reduces the DA's office's caseload but there is no reason to believe the speech will negatively impact the DA's office's efficiency. Any reasonable official in Gilchrist's position would have been aware of that right on the day of Smith's termination. . . The notion that programs that reduce a government agency's workload are somehow off limits from criticism by government employees even when there is no reason to expect that the criticism will actually hamper the government office's efficiency finds no basis whatsoever in the law. At the time of Smith's firing, it was well established that a government employee's speech made as a private citizen on a matter of public concern is balanced against the adverse effect that the government reasonably anticipates the speech will have on its ability to operate efficiently. See Maciariello, 973 F.2d at 300. In this case, there was no evidence forecasted in the summary judgment record that Smith's speech was expected to have any particular effect, as Gilchrist's concession in the district court reflected. Thus, although Gilchrist is certainly correct that the process of balancing the employer's interests against the employee's is a subtle one, the general complexity of the balancing test is of no consequence in this case since there is nothing on the employer's side of the ledger to weigh. . . . In sum, a reasonable DA in Gilchrist's position would have known that he could not fire an ADA running for public office for speaking publicly in his capacity as a candidate on matters of public concern when the speech is critical of a program that substantially reduces the DA's office's caseload but there is no reason to believe the speech will negatively impact the DA's office's efficiency. We therefore hold that the district court erred in granting summary judgment to Gilchrist on the First Amendment claim on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Wall v. Wade, 741 F.3d 492, 502, 503 (4th Cir. 2014) ("As noted, we have previously held that under 'the Free Exercise Clause ... a prisoner has a clearly established ... right to a diet consistent with his ... religious scruples, including proper food during Ramadan.'. . Further, '[a] prison official violates this clearly established right if he intentionally and without sufficient justification denies an inmate his religiously mandated diet.'. . We take these statements to mean quite exactly what they say: that Wall's right to participate in Ramadan was clearly established, and when the defendants abridged this right without first satisfying Turner's reasonableness test, they subjected themselves to the potential for liability. As expressed above, the defendants' application of their policy to Wall was unnecessarily strict. They overlooked (at best) significant evidence that Wall was, in fact, a practicing Muslim who was entitled to participate in Ramadan. We cannot conclude that a reasonable official in the defendants' position, giving proper consideration to our statement in Lovelace that the right is clearly established, and to Turner's objective reasonableness test, would have felt it permissible to apply the policy in so strict a fashion. The defendants attempt to avoid this rather straightforward result by arguing that there is a lack of case law elucidating exactly how prisons may utilize sincerity tests in determining eligibility for religious accommodations. While it may be true that we have never specifically evaluated a sincerity test, . . . this argument overlooks the broader right at issue: that inmates are entitled to religious dietary accommodations absent a legitimate reason to the contrary. As we have previously stated, clearly established 'includes not only already specifically adjudicated rights, but those manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle invoked.'. . In light of our unequivocal statement in Lovelace that inmates are entitled to religious dietary accommodations, we need not to have previously passed judgment on the appropriateness of particular sincerity tests in order to demand that prison officials act reasonably in administering that right. An expectation of reasonableness in this context is not a high bar, and does not punish officials for 'bad guesses in gray areas.'. . To the contrary, it offers only a minimal level of protection to inmates seeking to exercise their constitutionally protected rights.")

Williams v. Calton, 551 F. App'x 50, 51 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Viewed in the evidence most favorable to Williams, the evidence showed that when Williams, who was being escorted in restraints, resisted entering a cell, Calton slammed his head into the cell door and then shoved him to the floor. Williams sustained a "minor" and "superficial" 1.5 inch scalp laceration requiring six staples. . . . In Norman v. Taylor, 25 F.3d 1259 (4th Cir.1994) (en banc), this court held that, 'absent the most extraordinary circumstances, a plaintiff cannot prevail on an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim if his injury is de minimis.'. . Three days after Williams filed his initial complaint, however, the Supreme Court handed down Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010), abrogating Norman and stating that there was no injury threshold for excessive force claims. However, because 'Norman and its progeny were controlling in the Fourth Circuit' when the incident in this case occurred, Williams' excessive force claim and Calton's qualified immunity defense must be analyzed under the standards established by those cases. Hill, 727 F.3d at 322. We conclude that, under the legal standards in place when the incident occurred, a reasonable officer in Calton's position would not have understood his actions to have violated Williams' constitutional rights. . . Consequently, Calton is entitled to qualified immunity.") Occupy Columbia v. Haley, 738 F.3d 107, 121, 122, 124, 125 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Stated at the appropriate level of particularity, the right allegedly violated by Appellants is the right to be present and protest on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m. Therefore, the qualified immunity analysis must begin with this alleged constitutional violation in mind, and we must simply determine 'whether [Occupy Columbia's] allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation.'. . . Occupy Columbia's Third Amended Complaint sufficiently alleges that its members were engaged in protected speech at the time they were arrested. Specifically, the complaint alleges Occupy Colombia's members were assembled on State House grounds (a public forum) and were 'protesting and petitioning our government.'. . Occupy Columbia's allegations thus satisfy the standards to qualify as protected speech. . . .Therefore, in the absence of a valid time, place, and manner restriction, Occupy Columbia had a First Amendment right to assemble on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m., and its Third Amended Complaint sufficiently alleges that this right was violated. . . .Having concluded that Occupy Columbia's complaint sufficiently alleges that arresting its members for their presence and protests on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m. constituted a violation of their First Amendment rights, we must turn to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . At this stage, we must assess whether the First Amendment right allegedly violated by Appellants was a 'clearly established' right 'of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . It is not disputed that South Carolina and its state officials could have restricted the time when the State House grounds are open to the public with a valid time, place, and manner restriction. However, as explained above, at the time of Occupy Columbia's arrest, no such restrictions existed. In light of the case law from this circuit and from the Supreme Court, it was clearly established on November 16, 2011, that arresting Occupy Columbia for protesting on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m. was a First Amendment violation. Accordingly, at this stage, Appellants are not entitled to qualified immunity for damages arising out of Occupy Columbia's arrest on November 16, 2011. . . .In sum, we hold that the Occupy Columbia protesters have stated a viable claim that Appellants violated their First Amendment rights to assemble and protest peacefully on the grounds of the South Carolina State House in the absence of a valid time, place, or manner regulation. Condition 8 did not constitute a valid regulation because on its face it imposed no limit on when the State House grounds were open to the public and, even if it had restricted the time during which protesters could assemble, it did not contain any standards to guide the official's decision regarding when to grant special permission to continue such activities beyond closing time. Furthermore, at this point in the proceedings, we cannot say as a matter of law that the state statutes upon which Appellants rely are valid applicable time, place, and manner restrictions. For purposes of this motion, we must accept as true Occupy Columbia's assertion that its members gathered in a peaceful and lawful manner and conclude that the protesters were not violating any law. Based on the complaint, there were no existing time, place, and manner restrictions on the protesters' First Amendment activities on the State House grounds. Therefore, Appellants violated these rights by removing the protesters from the grounds. We also hold that the right of the protesters to assemble and speak out against the government on the State House grounds in the absence of valid time, place, and manner restrictions has been clearly established since Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229, 235 (1963).")

Durham v. Jones, 737 F.3d 291, 303, 304 (4th Cir. 2013) ("We have been clear that where public employees are speaking out on government misconduct, their speech warrants protection. . . .The incidents at issue here rise far above an ordinary workplace dispute. Durham accused several high-ranking law enforcement officials, in positions of authority within the SCSO, of falsifying law enforcement reports and with authorizing aggressive threats against a member of their own agency if he persisted in his opposition to such a practice. As we have indicated above, Durham's honest belief, even if it was a mistaken belief, that his use of force was both justified to assist in the apprehension of the suspect, but (at the same time) did not arise out of any contemporaneous criminal act by the suspect, might call for retraining or some other response from his supervisors. That is their call. But the use of coercion and threats against him as shown in this record and accepted as accurate by the jury goes far beyond such permissible bounds. Durham was being coerced to lie under oath insofar as they demanded that he revise his reports in a way contrary to his honestly-held beliefs; he testified that, as when any law enforcement officer signs a police report, 'you're swearing under oath and swearing to God that that's the truth, that's the facts of the case.'. . . This is especially important to the function of law enforcement, as such reports 'become a piece of evidence that could later on be used in court to prosecute somebody, to possible even send them to jail, so it has to be truthful and accurate of the facts.'. .In short, it was clearly established in the law of this Circuit in September 2009 that an employee's speech about serious governmental misconduct, and certainly not least of all serious misconduct in a law enforcement agency, . . . is protected. The mere fact that Jones may have had an independent basis to impose some lesser disciplinary sanction on Durham short of outright termination, such as a short suspension from duty, does not muddle the clarity of that legal principle.")

Bland v. Roberts, 730 F.3d 368, 391-94 (4th Cir. 2013) ("We conclude that the Sheriff is entitled to qualified immunity concerning Carter's, McCoy's, and Dixon's claims because in December 2009 a reasonable sheriff could have believed he had the right to choose not to reappoint his sworn deputies for political reasons, including speech indicating the deputies' support for the Sheriff's political opponent. Simply put, Jenkins sent very mixed signals. Although we conclude today for the reasons discussed earlier that Jenkins is best read as analyzing the duties of the particular deputies before the court, much of the opinion's language seemed to indicate that a North Carolina sheriff could terminate his deputies for political reasons regardless of the duties of their particular positions. Truthfully, the Jenkins majority opinion reads almost like two separate opinions that are in tension with one another. All of the majority's analysis up to the opinion's final page concerns deputies generally or North Carolina deputies, and references particular duties of deputies without indicating that the plaintiffs had those duties. . . . This analysis leads up to the broad conclusion that 'North Carolina deputy sheriffs may be lawfully terminated for political reasons under the Elrod–Branti exception to prohibited political terminations.'. . .As if this language were not already strong support for a broader reading of Jenkins, as we have pointed out, the dissent in Jenkins read it that way as well, accusing the majority of 'hold[ing] that all deputy sheriffs in North Carolina—regardless of their actual duties—are policymaking officials.'. . .Additionally, Knight v. Vernon, while important to our decision regarding the merits of Carter's, McCoy's, and Dixon's constitutional claims, did not clearly establish that the broader reading of Jenkins was incorrect. . . . A sheriff reasonably reading Jenkins as painting all deputies with a broad brush could well have viewed Knight as doing the same, or, at the very least, not weighing in on the issue. . .The broader reading of Jenkins is also in line with a statement from another of our opinions, which was issued after Knight. In Pike v. Osborne, 301 F.3d 182 (4th Cir.2002), we held that, on a claim that a sheriff terminated a dispatcher for political affiliation reasons, the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity because in December 1999 it was not clearly established that a sheriff in Virginia could not lawfully terminate, for political affiliation reasons, a dispatcher who was privy to confidential information. . . . For the reasons we explained in reviewing the merits of the Elrod–Branti issue, we believe that this language, while consistent with the Jenkins dissent's characterization of Jenkins's reasoning, is an overstatement in light of the Jenkins majority's specific rejection of the dissent's characterization of its analysis. Nevertheless, considering the conflicting signals that Jenkins and Pike sent, we conclude that a reasonable sheriff in December 2009 could have believed that he was authorized to terminate any of his deputies for political reasons. . .If we were deciding what the law was in December 2009 regarding the legality of a sheriff firing a deputy for political reasons, we would agree with our colleague in dissent that the law was that a sheriff could not fire for political reasons a deputy sheriff with the limited duties of a jailer. Where we believe we differ in our assessment of this case is in whether that law was clearly established and would have been so recognized not by a judge trained in the law, but by a reasonable sheriff. For the reasons stated previously, we believe we have sent mixed signals as to when a sheriff could fire a deputy for political reasons and we have been unclear as to when he could and when he could not. Some parts of our en banc decision in Jenkins indicate he could do so and other parts would prohibit it. The dissent in Jenkins expressed its own confusion as to what the holding of Jenkins was and language in our cases since, as well as those from other courts, have interpreted the holding in Jenkins broadly and consistent with the Sheriff's. In short, we understand why a sheriff would not find the law in this situation clear, particularly given that he is a lay person. We do not expect sheriffs to be judges and to have the training to sort through every intricacy of case law that is hardly a model of clarity. . .Rather, in considering whether constitutional rights were clearly established for qualified-immunity purposes, we view the issue from 'the layman's perspective,'. . . recognizing that '[p]articularly with regard to legal conclusions, lay officers obviously cannot be expected to perform at the level achievable by those trained in the law. . . . We note that in cases in which the Elrod–Branti exception applies, and an employer therefore does not violate his employee's association rights by terminating him for political disloyalty, the employer also does not violate his employee's free speech rights by terminating him for speech displaying that political disloyalty. . . Thus, a reasonable sheriff in December 2009 who believed that the Elrod–Branti exception applied to his deputies could have also reasonably believed that he could choose not to reappoint them for their speech indicating their political disloyalty to him. And Carter's and McCoy's Facebook activity and Dixon's bumper sticker and polling-place comment certainly fall into that category. For this reason, we conclude that the Sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity concerning the claims of Carter, McCoy, and Dixon.") Bland v. Roberts, 730 F.3d 368, 395, 401, 402 (4th Cir. 2013) (Hollander, District Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in Chief Judge Traxler's excellent opinion, with one exception. The majority concludes that, at the relevant time, 'a reasonable sheriff could have believed he had the right to choose not to reappoint his sworn deputies for political reasons,'. . . and, on this basis, it determines that Sheriff Roberts is protected by qualified immunity with respect to his discharge of Carter, Dixon, and McCoy. In my view, when these deputies were discharged in December 2009, the law was clearly established that a sheriff's deputy with the job duties of a jailer could not be fired on the basis of political affiliation. Therefore, I respectfully disagree with the majority's ruling as to qualified immunity. . . .The salient facts of this case are so close to the facts in Knight that any reasonable sheriff would have predicted that both cases would yield the same result. To the extent that there is any distinction between Knight and this case, it concerns only the title of the positions held by the employees. Yet, it was clearly established that the title itself is of no legal significance. Therefore, Sheriff Roberts should have known that he could not discharge his jailers on the basis of their political affiliation. The majority is correct in stating that, in considering whether the law was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, we look to the perspective of a layperson, not a lawyer. . . .In 1997, this court delivered an unequivocally clear message to lay sheriffs. Directly addressing sheriffs, the Jenkins Court announced: 'We ... caution sheriffs that courts examine the job duties of the position, and not merely the title, of those dismissed.'. . Any person capable of serving as a sheriff surely would have understood that directive, which was subsequently reiterated in Knight, and would have grasped what all the members of this panel agree was 'the law ... in December 2009 regarding the legality of a sheriff firing a deputy for political reasons.'. .In sum, Sheriff Roberts' dismissal of Carter, McCoy, and Dixon on the basis of their political allegiance, if ultimately proven, cannot be excused on the basis of qualified immunity. Therefore, I respectfully dissent from the portion of the majority opinion that upholds the finding of qualified immunity for Sheriff Roberts with respect to the First Amendment claims lodged by Carter, McCoy, and Dixon.")

Hill v. Crum, 727 F.3d 312, 320-24 (4th Cir. 2013) ("The threshold requirement that a plaintiff suffer more than a de minimis injury to state an excessive force claim was thus settled law in this circuit until 2010, when the Supreme Court in Wilkins abrogated Norman, Riley, and Taylor. . . The Wilkins Court clarified that the nature of the force, rather than the extent of the injury, is the relevant inquiry. . .Thus, it is clear that the de minimis injury threshold that this Court (and the district courts within this circuit) had relied upon in considering excessive force claims is no longer the appropriate test. The question, however, is whether Crum's alleged conduct which took place prior to the Supreme Court's Wilkins decision, is covered by qualified immunity. . . . Crum does not dispute the first prong, that there is a constitutional right to be free of excessive force. His argument is that he is entitled to qualified immunity because Hill's claimed constitutional violation was not clearly established at the time of the assault. Under the clearly established law of the Fourth Circuit on November 1, 2007, we must agree with Crum. . . .At the time of the alleged assault on Hill, Norman and its progeny were controlling in the Fourth Circuit and had been since 1994. Although Wilkins abrogated Norman in 2010, Wilkins can only be applied prospectively in the context of a qualified immunity analysis. . . In other words, the 2010 holding in Wilkins cannot be imputed retroactively to an officer in this circuit whose allegedly tortious conduct predated the Wilkins decision. The applicable law for qualified immunity purposes would be that in existence in 2007, the time of the alleged assault. In 2007 under Norman, a reasonable correctional officer would have objectively believed that the law in this circuit was what the Fourth Circuit said it was; that is, a plaintiff could not prevail on an excessive force claim 'absent the most extraordinary circumstances,' if he had suffered only de minimis injury. . . Although Wilkins established that the Fourth Circuit had been applying the incorrect standard, the inquiry—for qualified immunity purposes—is not whether the officer correctly interpreted the law as it would be changed in later years, but rather, whether the conduct at issue was reasonable based on the officer's imputed knowledge of the law at the time. Crum's reliance on Norman satisfies this standard. . . . In no sense do we suggest that Crum's alleged conduct was appropriate for a correctional officer, but it fails to cross the very high threshold for extraordinary circumstances that permit an excessive force claim to advance in the absence of more than de minimis injury for purposes of a pre- Wilkins qualified immunity analysis.")

Hill v. Crum, 727 F.3d 312, 325-29 (4th Cir. 2013) (Thacker, J., dissenting) ("With all due respect to the majority, I must dissent. Under prevailing Supreme Court precedent available at the time of the assault in this case, it was clearly established that an officer could not maliciously or sadistically impose harm on a custodial, handcuffed, and completely non-resistant inmate without violating the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment—and any reasonable officer would have known as much. . . . Appellant Crum claims that he was entitled to assault Mr. Hill unabated for over two minutes so long as any resulting injury was de minimis. . . Not so. Under controlling Supreme Court precedent at the time—- not to mention applying pure common sense—no reasonable officer could have believed such abuse was lawful. . .On November 1, 2007, the controlling Supreme Court authority for excessive force cases in the Eighth Amendment context was Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1 (1992). One need only read the first paragraph of Hudson to realize the right at issue was clearly established:

> This case requires us to decide whether the use of excessive physical force against a prisoner may constitute cruel and unusual punishment when the inmate does not suffer serious injury. We answer that question in the affirmative.

The Supreme Court went on to emphasize as follows:

> When prison officials maliciously and sadistically use force to cause harm, contemporary standards of decency always are violated. This is true whether or not significant injury is evident. Otherwise, the Eighth Amendment would permit any physical punishment, no matter how diabolic or inhuman, inflicting less than some arbitrary quantity of injury.

At the time of the incident in this case, Hudson had been controlling Supreme Court precedent for 15 years. In fact, this was the controlling law even before Hudson. The Hudson Court merely extended its prior holding in Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312 (1986) (regarding the legal standard for an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim arising out of a prison riot), to standard claims by inmates against prison officials for the use of excessive force. . . Under Whitley and Hudson, '"the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain ... constitutes cruel and unusual punishment forbidden by the Eighth Amendment."'. . The Court explained that 'the core judicial inquiry' in excessive force cases is not whether a certain quantum of injury was sustained, but rather 'whether force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . Thus, although this circuit misinterpreted Hudson in Norman v. Taylor, 25 F .3d 1259 (4th Cir.1994), the fact remains that Hudson and Whitley set forth the long standing and clearly established controlling precedent at the time of this incident. . . The law was, and is, clear; the proper focus is on the force used, not on the resulting injury. . . . Even if we assume Hill's injuries were minor—which he does not concede—analysis of the other factors make clear Crum's alleged use of force could be deemed excessive. . . . A lone cooperative inmate, handcuffed and hunched over a desk could not pose a reasonable threat to a prison officer sufficient to justify the use of force. Moreover, Appellant Crum did not temper the severity of the force employed, but, rather, allegedly continued beating Hill for a total of two minutes. These factors indicate that Crum exercised force, not in a good-faith effort to restore order, but, rather, maliciously and sadistically simply to cause harm. . . .Ultimately, whatever erroneous interpretive gloss Norman placed on Hudson, see Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010) (abrogating Norman), on November 1, 2007, it would have been readily apparent to a reasonable officer that where a disturbance had already been abated, he could not assault a restrained, compliant, and cooperative inmate for 'a good solid two minutes,'. . . punching and elbowing him repeatedly in the abdomen and head, without applying excessive force in violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Accordingly, I would hold Appellant Crum is not entitled to qualified immunity, and affirm the decision of the district court.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 391 & n.6 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Taken together, it is crystal clear that the First Amendment protects peaceful nondisruptive speech in an airport, and that such speech cannot be suppressed solely because the government disagrees with it. Thus, Mr. Tobey's right to display a peaceful non-disruptive message in protest of a government policy without recourse was clearly established at the time of his arrest. . . .[E]ven though the dissent purports to understand factually analogous precedent is not a prerequisite for finding that a right is clearly established, the entire dissent seemingly hinges on this very premise. Moreover, the unequivocal constitutional precedent provided Appellants with more than adequate notice that they cannot retaliate against Mr. Tobey for exercising his First Amendment rights. This is not an abstract principle but an irrefutable precept. . . . Appellants argue that because there is no case on-point detailing what is a reasonable restriction on speech in an airport screening area, Mr. Tobey's constitutional rights cannot be said to have been clearly established. . . . .While reasonableness in and of itself may be an ineffective guide as to whether a right is 'clearly established,' in this case there are clear constitutional parameters. It may be unclear as to what reasonableness entails in the abstract, but at a minimum, given well-established precedent, we know that it is unreasonable to effect an arrest without probable cause for displaying a silent, nondisruptive message of protest—which is what allegedly occurred here. Appellants even conceded at oral argument that it would have clearly been unlawful for them to seize Mr. Tobey if the text of the Fourth Amendment was printed on his t-shirt. We see no reason why the same clear principle should not apply here, as Mr. Tobey's allegations amount to the factual equivalent. Appellants cite Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088 (2012) as supporting their argument that Mr. Tobey's constitutional rights were not clearly established, but in doing so, miss the mark completely. In Reichle, an appeal from summary judgment, the Supreme Court found that it was not clearly established that a plaintiff could make out a cognizable First Amendment claim for an arrest that was supported by probable cause. . . . Reichle does not apply here because Mr. Tobey specifically alleges that his arrest was not supported by probable cause, and 'probable cause or its absence will be at least an evidentiary issue in practically all [ ] cases.' Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 265 (2006). At this stage in the litigation, of course, we must credit Mr. Tobey's allegation that Appellants arrested or caused him to be arrested without probable cause. He has, therefore, satisfied the requirement in Hartman and Reichle to plead an absence of probable cause.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 392 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Given that peaceful, silent, nondisruptive protest is protected in a nonpublic forum, like an airport; that it is unequivocally clear that the government cannot effectuate an arrest for the display of a message of peaceful protest; and that Mr. Tobey's arrest in this instance was allegedly not supported by probable cause—we find that Mr. Tobey's rights at the time of his arrest were clearly established by decades-old precedent. . . . Here, Mr. Tobey engaged in a silent, peaceful protest using the text of our Constitution—he was well within the ambit of First Amendment protections. And while it is tempting to hold that First Amendment rights should acquiesce to national security in this instance, our Forefather Benjamin Franklin warned against such a temptation by opining that those 'who can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety, deserve neither liberty nor safety.' We take heed of his warning and are therefore unwilling to relinquish our First Amendment protections—even in an airport.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 394-97 (4th Cir. 2013) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) ("I cannot join the majority's decision permitting a damages action to proceed against Transportation Security Administration ("TSA") agents who were faithfully performing one of the most essential functions in our post–9/11 age: protecting air passengers from the threat of air terrorism. We now view these events in the comfort of hindsight. But while some may consider plaintiff Aaron Tobey's conduct to be cute or even funny in retrospect, it was no laughing matter at the time. . . . One would think the Supreme Court's admonitions on the need for some modicum of specificity in notice to defendants might actually mean something. . . And yet, by allowing Tobey's suit to proceed by enunciating legal principles at the highest and most nebulous level of generality, the majority deprives the doctrine of its value. . . . I regret that a doctrine so essential to the performance of public functions has been reduced to hollow and formulaic recitations that signal only its demise. . . . General propositions stripped of all sense of context may seem useful to my fine appellate colleagues, . . . but they are of no use at all to people who must confront specific and difficult real-life situations. Neither Tobey nor the majority points to a single court decision addressing a situation even remotely similar in time, place, or manner to the one that occurred here, let alone a decision that would have made the unlawfulness of defendants' actions 'apparent.' They cite no decision involving the period before scores of passengers board airplanes, no decision involving the security-screening area of an airport, and no decision involving distracting conduct that poses a potential security threat. . . . The complete dearth of pertinent precedent should be dispositive of the question whether it was clearly established that defendants' conduct was unreasonable: it was not.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 400, 401 (4th Cir. 2013) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) ("Tobey's complaint. . . alleged a violation of the Fourth Amendment as well as the First, and for many of the reasons noted above, the district court rightly dismissed Tobey's Fourth Amendment claim, describing defendants' decision to summon local law enforcement as 'eminently reasonable.'. . This conclusion should have led it to dispose of Tobey's First Amendment claim as well. For just last Term, the Supreme Court held that, notwithstanding the First Amendment's general prohibition against retaliatory arrests, 'the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause' is not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, reasoning that any inference of impermissible causation is severely undermined by the existence of probable cause. . . .The same conclusion applies here: the causation element of Tobey's First Amendment claim is undermined, if not vitiated, by the fact that defendants' actions were reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. In light of Reichle, then, it was not clearly established that these same actions violated the First Amendment. The majority responds by pointing to Tobey's allegation that defendants' actions were not supported by 'probable cause.'. .

The problem with this argument is that neither Tobey nor the majority cites a single case holding that probable cause is the relevant standard governing the decision by an official who does not have arresting authority, such as a TSA agent, to refer someone to another official who does. And any confusion regarding the appropriate Fourth Amendment standard only bolsters the conclusion that defendants' alleged constitutional violation was not clearly established. For the majority to hold otherwise, it must ignore conflicting precedents and expect lay TSA agents to have imposed on the spot a degree of coherence on First and Fourth Amendment jurisprudence that has eluded serious students of constitutional law. Qualified immunity exists to forestall precisely this result.")

Cilman v. Reeves, Nos. 09-1887, 09-1920, 2011 WL 5252646, at *3 (4th Cir. Nov. 4, 2011) (unpublished) ("No controlling Supreme Court or Fourth Circuit precedent speaks to a person's right to be free from a warrantless entry into his home in circumstances like those in the case at hand. Numerous out-of-circuit cases do address this issue, but courts have divided on this question. Some hold that commission of a misdemeanor drunk driving offense subject to a possible jail term does not justify a warrantless home arrest. [collecting cases] Others, however, hold to the contrary. [collecting cases] In light of the divergence in these holdings, we can only conclude that Officer Reeves was entitled to qualified immunity. . . Accordingly, the district court erred in granting summary judgment to Cilman on liability as to the § 1983 and Va.Code Ann. § 19.2-59 claims.")

H.H. ex rel. H.F. v. Moffett, No. 08-1009, 2009 WL 1931203, at *7 (4th Cir. July 7, 2009) ("We have little difficulty finding that a reasonable teacher would know that maliciously restraining [disabled] child in her [wheel]chair for hours at a time interferes with that child's constitutional liberty interests.").

Fields v. Prater, 566 F.3d 381, 389, 390(4th Cir. 2009) ("It is true that defendants knew or should have known that consideration of political affiliation when hiring a local director was forbidden by the State Board's regulations. However, 'an official's clear violation of a state administrative regulation does not allow a § 1983 plaintiff to overcome the official's qualified immunity .'. . The law requires something more, namely that it be clear to a reasonable official at the time of the decision that selecting a local director on the basis of political affiliation contravened the First Amendment. We conclude that at the time of the hiring decision the law had not achieved that level of constitutional clarity that would allow us to hold defendants liable. . . . Because application of the principles of Branti and Jenkins to new situations invariably requires particularized inquiries into specific positions in the context of specific systems, it is not always easy to say that there is a clearly drawn line between those positions for which consideration of political affiliation is allowed and those for which it is not. . . . Undisputed evidence in the record, including an affidavit from a state official familiar with the system and the job application itself, show that political affiliation was not 'an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of the public office involved.'. . But to say that the rule in the Commonwealth is now clear going forward is a different matter from the retrospective imposition of monetary consequence. Both Nader and this case concerned management positions in local services agencies. In both cases, resolving the constitutional issue required a fact-intensive inquiry into the particular responsibilities of the positions and their role in their respective state systems. There was thus no 'bright line[ ]' rule in this context. . . .We find no fault with the able district judge, who concluded that the constitutional rights at issue were clearly established; this was a close question. But because we cannot unequivocally say that defendants knew or should have known they were violating Fields's constitutional rights when they refused to hire her, they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Iko v. Shreve, 535 F.3d 225, 240 (4th Cir. 2008) ("We held over a decade ago that '[i]t is generally recognized that it is a violation of the Eighth Amendment for prison officials to use mace, tear gas or other chemical agents in quantities greater than necessary or for the sole purpose of infliction of pain.' . . Notwithstanding this clear pronouncement, Lt. Shreve attempts to distinguish Williams on the grounds that it involved the use of mace, not pepper spray. Williams's use of 'or other chemical agents,'. . . plainly reaches the use of pepper spray, and evinces the principle that '"[c]learly established" ... includes not only already specifically adjudicated rights, but those manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle invoked.' . . . Because Lt. Shreve had '"fair warning" that [his] conduct was unconstitutional,' . . . we hold that Iko's right to be free from excessive use of pepper spray was clearly established, preventing an award of qualified immunity to Lt. Shreve on the facts before us.").

Campbell v. Galloway, 483 F.3d 258, 271 (4th Cir. 2007) ("There is no doubt that the broad legal principle governing this case– that public employees may not be fired on a basis that infringes on their First Amendment rights–was clearly established at the time of Campbell's termination. At this stage of our analysis, however, our focus must be narrower, as the determination of whether a given right was clearly established requires us to define that right 'at a high level of particularity.' . . When the right is defined at the proper level of particularity and the analysis is directed to what is disputed in this case, the question becomes whether a reasonable officer would have known that Campbell's rambling thirteen-page memo to Chief Galloway, which focused overwhelmingly on personal grievances and vague gripes about fellow officers not being very nice to her, touched on a matter of public concern, thus entitling Campbell to the protection of the First Amendment. We answer that question in the negative. . . . As discussed above, this circuit has provided limited guidance on when complaints about sexual harassment will amount to matters of public concern. . . . Our fact-specific resolution of individual cases has done little to sharpen the line between cases where the complaints about discrimination are matters of public concern and those where such complaints are not matters of public concern. In our view, the speech at issue in this case falls within the gray area between speech that clearly is a matter of public concern and speech that clearly is not a matter of public concern. . . . Under these circumstances, we cannot conclude that the defendants unreasonably viewed Campbell's letter as involving personal grievances only, particularly given the state of the law in other circuits.").

Miller v. Prince George's County, 475 F.3d 621, 632, 633 (4th Cir. 2007) (". . . . Det. Dougans. . . seems to claim entitlement to qualified immunity on the theory that the magistrate found that his affidavit provided probable cause to issue the warrant. . . . In sum, well before the events at issue in this case, it was clearly established that a police officer could not lawfully make intentionally or recklessly false material statements or omissions in order to obtain a warrant. Accordingly, Det. Dougans is not entitled to qualified immunity, as a matter of law, on the present record.")

Lovelace v. Lee, 472 F.3d 174, 196-99 (4th Cir. 2006) ("Here, the district court erroneously granted Lester qualified immunity on the premise that there was uncertainty about RLUIPA's constitutionality at the time of the alleged violation. We apply a two-step analysis in assessing whether qualified immunity is available. . .We first consider whether the facts alleged, taken in the light most favorable to Lovelace, show that Lester violated Lovelace's statutory rights under RLUIPA. Lovelace satisfies this part of the test, as our earlier discussion establishes. Second, we consider whether these statutory rights were clearly established at the time of the claimed violation. . . .Chronology and the origins of RLUIPA inform our analysis of whether the rights in question were clearly established at the time Lovelace was removed from the Ramadan pass list. RLUIPA was enacted in September 2000; the alleged violation occurred more than two years later, November and December 2002. . . . Section 3 of RLUIPA. . .encountered some hurdles before the Supreme Court declared it constitutional under the Establishment Clause in Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. at 719-26. Prior to that decision, the Fourth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits had upheld the provision under the Establishment Clause while the Sixth Circuit had invalidated it. . . . The question still remains whether a reasonable prison guard should have known that the conduct attributed to Lester violated Lovelace's free exercise rights under RLUIPA. . . . Because the facts support an inference that Lester acted intentionally in depriving Lovelace of his free exercise rights, Lester is not entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. Although the outer boundaries of RLUIPA may have been uncharted at the time, its core protections were not. As explained earlier, RLUIPA incorporates and exceeds the Constitution's basic protections of religious exercise. . . Under both the Free Exercise Clause and RLUIPA in its most elemental form, a prisoner has a 'clearly established ... right to a diet consistent with his ... religious scruples,' including proper food during Ramadan. . . A prison official violates this clearly established right if he intentionally and without sufficient justification denies an inmate his religiously mandated diet. . . Thus, under both the First Amendment and any straightforward interpretation of RLUIPA, the unlawfulness of intentional and unjustified deprivations of Ramadan meals was apparent at the time of the incident. Lester's state of mind is therefore critical to determining whether a reasonable person in his position would have understood that his conduct violated clearly established rights. If Lovelace succeeds in showing that Lester intentionally blocked his observance of Ramadan in violation of RLUIPA's basic protections, then Lester would not be entitled to qualified immunity. Because there is on this record a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Lester intentionally and purposefully infringed Lovelace's free exercise rights–rights clearly established at the time under RLUIPA and the First Amendment–Lester is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage on the RLUIPA claim.")

Blankenship v. Manchin, 471 F.3d 523, 533 (4th Cir. 2006) ("In sum, the general proposition that a government official may not retaliate against a citizen for the exercise of a constitutional right is clearly established law, per Trulock. The specific right at issue here, the right to be free of threats

Ridpath v. Bd. of Governors of Marshall University, 447 F.3d 292, 314, 315, 321 (4th Cir. 2006)("We have provided, in several decisions, concrete examples of the types of public statements implying the existence of serious character defects such as dishonesty and immorality. . . Of course, none of these decisions involved the use of the 'corrective action' label in the course of an NCAA investigation. However, there is no logical distinction between, for instance, linking an employee's discharge to an investigation of financial irregularities . . . and tying Ridpath's reassignment from the Department of Athletics to the University's serious NCAA rules violations (as the 'corrective action' label served to do). In each of these scenarios, the charge at issue can be understood to insinuate dishonesty and other serious character defects. Thus, our precedent gave the Administrators fair warning that the 'corrective action' label was just the type of charge that implicates a protected liberty interest. . . Similarly, we have specified that a public employer's stigmatizing remarks may infringe on an employee's liberty interest if such remarks are 'made in the course of a discharge or significant demotion.'. . . The Administrators therefore were provided with fair and clear warning that, by banishing Ridpath from the Department of Athletics, they were unlawfully subjecting him to a 'significant demotion' within the meaning of Stone and authorities relied on therein. . . Finally, because it is undisputed that Ridpath was not provided any procedural safeguards with respect to the labeling of his reassignment as a 'corrective action,' it cannot be questioned that the Administrators contravened Roth's requirement for 'notice and an opportunity to be heard.'. . Accordingly, accepting the allegations of the Amended Complaint as true, the Administrators contravened a clearly established Fourteenth Amendment procedural due process right of which a reasonable person would have known. They therefore are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of these proceedings on Ridpath's due process claim. . . . While further factual development in this case may present a murky picture of why Ridpath was relieved of his teaching position, the content and context of his statements, and any negative impact his remarks had on the efficiency of his workplace, the scene painted by the Amended Complaint is crystal clear. Read in the proper light, it alleges that the Administrators retaliated against Ridpath for making protected statements that they did not like. Such activity does not merely implicate the gray edges of the right Ridpath asserts; it goes to its very core. And taking the allegations of the Amended Complaint as true, a clearer violation of constitutionally protected free speech would be difficult to fathom. Therefore, Ridpath's retaliation claim alleges a violation of clearly established law of which a reasonable person would have known.").

Short v. Smoot, 436 F.3d 422, 427-30 (4th Cir. 2006) (" The right in question here, defined at the appropriate level of specificity, is the right of a detainee, whose jailers know that he is suicidal, to have his jailers take precautions against his suicide beyond merely placing him in a cell under video surveillance. We hold that Brown v. Harris, 240 F.3d 383 (4th Cir.2001), demonstrates that no such right derives from the Eighth Amendment. . . . Importantly, a prison official 'who actually [knows] of a substantial risk to inmate health or safety may be found free from liability if [he] responded reasonably to the risk, even if the harm ultimately was not averted.'. . . Brown demonstrates that the first-shift officers' response to Short's risk of suicide was objectively reasonable and therefore sufficient to prevent liability under the Eighth Amendment. . . . Here, the first-shift officers' response to the risk that Short would kill himself was the same as Ogden's response in Brown: they placed the detainee in a cell under video surveillance. Thus, under Brown, this response was sufficient under the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause regardless of whether additional precautions might also have been advisable. . . . The critical point is that despite the actual failure of the officers' measures to prevent the detainees' suicides, and despite possible inattentiveness of the officers whose duty it was at the time of the suicides to watch the monitors, in both Brown and the present case the officers placed their detainees in video-monitored cells, knowing that someone would be responsible for watching the monitors. . . . Appellants do not dispute that it was clearly established on the day of Short's death that the conscious failure by a jailer to make any attempt to stop an ongoing suicide attempt by one of his detainees would constitute deliberate indifference.").

Meeker v. Edmundson, 415 F.3d 317, 323 (4th Cir. 2005) ("Having concluded that Meeker has alleged the violation of a constitutional right, we turn to the second step of the Saucier qualified immunity analysis to determine whether Coach Edmundson is nonetheless entitled to immunity from suit. . . . [H]ere we ask whether in November 2000 a reasonable educator could have believed that repeatedly instituting the unprovoked and painful beatings of one of his students was lawful, in light of clearly established law. By November 2000, the law provided clear guidance: No school official could, consistent with constitutional principles, cause a student to be subjected to such beatings.").

Washington v. Wilmore, 407 F.3d 274, 283, 284 (4th Cir. 2005) ("We therefore conclude that the facts stated by Washington allege the violation of his constitutional right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by an investigating officer. Moreover, this right was clearly established in 1983, when the events relevant to this litigation took place. . . Accordingly, we affirm the denial of qualified immunity.").

Kirby v. City of Elizabeth City, 388 F.3d 440, 448, 450, 451 (4th Cir. 2004) ("It would violate the principles articulated in McDonald and Thorne to extend constitutional protection of public employees' petitions for redress beyond the protections afforded to public employee speech. In fact, it would allow the anomalous result that a private employment dispute could 'be constitutionalized merely by filing a legal action.' . . We therefore join the majority of circuits to have addressed the question in holding that a public employee's petition, like his speech, is constitutionally protected only when it addresses a matter of public concern. . . . Although we hold that Kirby's petitions implicated a matter of public concern, we affirm the judgment in favor of Appellees on other grounds. . . . Here, the petition rights that Kirby alleges that Chief Hampton and Lieutenant Koch violated were anything but clear. As is apparent from our analysis of the petition claim, the legal viability of the claim presents a close and novel issue, and even assuming that Kirby's allegations are true, Hampton and Koch cannot be held liable for what would amount to 'bad guesses in [a] gray area [ ].'").

Mom's Inc. v. Willman, 109 F. App'x 629, 2004 WL 2179166, at *5, *6 (4th Cir. Sept. 29, 2004) ("The remaining question is whether Colaprete's Fourth Amendment right against having his property converted following a search was clearly established when the alleged conversion occurred. The Seventh Circuit has held that the existence of this right is '[s]o obvious ... that we do not think the absence of case law can establish a defense of immunity.' . . We respectfully disagree. This court has never applied the Fourth Amendment in this manner, and Supreme Court precedent tilts slightly against the existence of any constitutional right against theft during the course of a search. . . . If either Appellant stole Colaprete's watch, he or she should have recognized that this was a tort, a crime, and even a sin, but he had no clear notice that this action violated the United States Constitution. Accordingly, the district court erred in denying summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity.").

Love-Lane v. Martin, 355 F.3d 766, 784 (4th Cir. 2004) ("Thus, by 1997 it was clearly established that Love-Lane's speech about race discrimination at Lewisville involved a matter of public concern. We have said on many occasions, however, that 'only infrequently will it be "clearly established" that a public employee's speech on a matter of public concern is constitutionally protected, because the relevant inquiry requires a "particularized balancing" [under Pickering] that is subtle, difficult to apply, and not yet well-defined.' . . But we have never said 'that a public employee's right to speak on matters of public concern could never be clearly established.' . . In light of this earlier discussion, we are persuaded that the interests to be balanced under Pickering weigh so heavily in Love-Lane's favor that her right to speak about race discrimination in a public school was clearly established well before 1997 and 1998. . . . Because case law had confirmed Love-Lane's right to speak and because the Pickering balancing test tips decidedly in her favor, we hold that any reasonable school superintendent in Martin's position in 1997 and 1998 would have realized that he would violate the Constitution if he, in fact, took adverse employment action against Love-Lane for speaking out about race discrimination at Lewisville Elementary School.")

Love-Lane v. Martin, 355 F.3d 766, 801 (4th Cir. 2004) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) ("In the final analysis, even if we disagree with Martin's personnel actions, his educational philosophy, his view of school discipline, or his feelings about the need for cooperative relations at the head of a school within his district, that is a far cry from saying that he violated clearly established federal law. In holding that he did, my fine colleagues have made a serious mistake. . . . To eviscerate the doctrine of qualified immunity, as the majority has done here, is to subject public schools uniquely to the omnipresent spectre of litigation, to the detriment of the children and communities they were intended to serve.").

Odom v. South Carolina Dep't of Corrections, 349 F.3d 765, 773, 774 (4th Cir. 2003) ("In June 2000, it was clearly established in this circuit that correctional officers who are present when a violent altercation involving an armed inmate erupts and fail to intervene immediately do not violate the Eighth Amendment if the officers are unarmed, unaware of a risk of harm prior to the altercation, and take reasonable steps to intervene safely. . . . By the same token, we had also determined, well before the time of this attack, that a correctional officer who stands by as a passive observer and takes no action whatsoever to intervene during an assault violates the rights of the victim inmate. . . . Other circuit courts of appeal, at the time of the attack, had concluded that a prison official acts with deliberate indifference when he ignores repeated requests from a vulnerable inmate to be separated from a fellow inmate who has issued violent threats which the aggressor will likely carry out in the absence of official intervention. . . We conclude that, at the time of the attack on Odom, the state of pre-existing law was such that reasonable prison guards in the defendants' position would have understood that doing nothing in response to Odom's requests in light of the circumstances of this case violated Odom's rights.").

Bailey v. Kennedy, 349 F.3d 731, 741 (4th Cir.2003) ("Defining the right at issue with the requisite level of particularity, the appropriate question is whether, at the time of Kennedy and Whitley's actions on May 27, 1998, it was clearly established that a police officer may not detain someone for an emergency mental evaluation based only on a 911 report that the person was suicidal, where the officers were able to observe the person alleged to be suicidal and observed nothing indicating that the person might have been a danger to himself. We conclude that it was clearly established that probable cause was lacking in such a situation."), pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 360 F.3d 470 (4th Cir. 2004).

Martin v. St. Mary's Dep't of Social* Services, 346 F.3d 502, 506(4th Cir. 2003) ("Because of the complicated balance between parents' rights to raise their children and a State's interest in protecting its minor citizens, the right to familial integrity is 'amorphous' in many cases. . . The contours of the right to familial integrity may not be 'sufficiently clear' in certain situations, to be deemed 'clearly established' as required. . . A public official must decipher what conduct violates protected rights, but an official will not be held liable for 'bad guesses in gray areas.'").

Wilson v. Kittoe, 337 F.3d 392, 403 (4th Cir. 2003) ("In deciding whether the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established, the right must be defined 'at a high level of particularity.'. . Defining the right at issue with the requisite level of particularity, we agree with the district court that the appropriate question is whether, at the time of Kittoe's actions on April 14, 1999, it was clearly established that a police officer may not arrest a third party for criticizing the officer's conduct and refusing to leave the scene of an arrest. We conclude that that right was clearly established at the time of Wilson's arrest: a reasonable Virginia police officer in Kittoe's position would have understood that, as 'obstruction' has long been circumscribed in Virginia law, the four Conversations and the three Refusals to Obey could not generate probable cause for arrest under the Obstruction Statute.").

Altman v. City of High Point, 330 F.3d 194, 210, 211 (4th Cir. 2003) ("The dissent's effort to adduce relevant legal authority is ineffective. At the time Officers Moxley and Perdue acted, neither the Supreme Court nor the Fourth Circuit had held that dogs were 'effects' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. Nor had either court issued any opinion as to the Fourth Amendment reasonableness standards governing seizure of dogs. . . . Perhaps sensing this weakness, the dissent seeks to marshal a consensus of cases from other circuits, but no such consensus existed at the time of the actions at issue here. . . . There is one remaining avenue open to the dissent. Qualified immunity is also inappropriate when the action at issue was so obviously unconstitutional that, even though no precedent was factually similar, any reasonable officer would have known from the general contours of the law that his action was in violation thereof. . . . This is a difficult standard to satisfy . . . and it has been rendered even more so in this circuit by the Robles decision. For, if binding a man to a pole in the middle of a deserted parking lot at three in the morning and abandoning him all for no legitimate law enforcement purpose was not clearly unconstitutional, then few things will be. Indeed, it follows a fortiori from the fact that it was far from obvious, even to a court of law, that dogs are 'effects' protected by the Fourth Amendment, that the officer on the beat could not reasonably be expected to know that his seizure of a dog might violate the Fourth Amendment.").

Mills v. Steger, 64 F. App'x 864, 2003 WL 21089092, at *8, *9 (4th Cir. May 14, 2003) (unpublished) ("Although plaintiffs have prevailed in some First Amendment retaliation cases, . . . most do not, simply because the individualized assessment required by the Pickering balancing test means we can rarely say that the law was clearly established and that reasonable officials would have been aware of the law. . . Here, as with most cases, we cannot say that the defendants should have known that transferring or terminating Mills because of his speech would be a violation of his First Amendment rights. Given the fine line drawing required to determine whether someone in Mills's position is entitled to First Amendment protection under the Pickering test, we cannot say that the law with respect to Mills's First Amendment rights was clearly established. We also cannot say that a reasonable official should have known what the outcome of our First Amendment analysis would be. We therefore conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Mills's First Amendment claim.").

Jones v. Buchanan, 325 F.3d 520, 532 (4th Cir. 2003) ("Both before and after November 1999, courts have consistently applied the Graham holding and have consistently held that officers using unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate force to seize a secured, unarmed citizen, do not act in an objectively reasonable manner and, thus, are not entitled to qualified immunity. So it is here. Jones has proffered evidence that Deputy Keller severely injured him by knocking him to the floor and jumping on him, even though Jones, although drunk and using foul language, was unarmed, handcuffed, and alone in a secured room in the sheriff's headquarters, having come there voluntarily and not under arrest or suspected of any crime. In reported cases prior to November 1999 and involving conduct that took place well before then, we and other courts have repeatedly denied qualified immunity to law enforcement officers in similar circumstances.").

Batten v. Gomez, 324 F.3d 288, 296 (4th Cir. 2003) ("The gist of Batten's argument is that it was clearly established that due process required notice and an opportunity to be heard before a state official could interfere with a mother's liberty interest in her child. The statement of the right at this level of generality, however, is of little help in determining the reasonableness of Shuster and Gomez's conduct. . . As the court in Morrell explained, '[t]he appropriate question is whether it would be clear to reasonable officials in the defendants' position that enforcing the [out-of-state] order without prior notice or an opportunity to be heard in [the home state] was unconstitutional.' . . In this case, aside from Morrell, we have been unable to find any authoritative cases considering analogous circumstances that hold that pre- deprivation notice and an opportunity to be heard is required as a matter of constitutional due process before a state may enforce another state's order directing that a child be brought before the out-of-state court. Because Morrell was decided after Shuster and Gomez's actions in this case, Shuster and Gomez, like the defendants in Morrell, are immune from suit under the law of qualified immunity.")

Mansoor v. Trank, 319 F.3d 133, 139, 140 (4th Cir. 2003) ("Appellants' principal . . . argument is that in cases involving qualified immunity and the Pickering balancing test, the outcome of the balancing test can 'only infrequently' be said to be 'clearly established.' [citing DiMeglio] Although this is so, 'we did not say [in DiMeglio] that a public employee's right to speak on matters of public concern could never be clearly established.' . . In this case, as discussed earlier, Appellants have conceded that they had no interest in restricting the clearly protected speech covered by the Plan (i.e., Mansoor's right to speak about matters of public concern as a private citizen). Given this concession, we have no difficulty concluding that the district court did not err in denying them qualified immunity.").

Robles v. Prince George's County, Maryland, 308 F.3d 437, 439, 440 (4th Cir. 2002) (denying rehearing en banc) ("In reasoning as it did, the panel followed the two-step analysis in [Siegert and Wilson]. Under step one of that analysis, if a constitutional violation is found then it will nearly always be a 'bad act.' In fact the constitutional violation in Wilson could be argued to be a far more invasive act than the incident the panel confronted here. If every bad act under step one of the Wilson analysis sufficed by itself to answer the step two qualified immunity inquiry, there would simply be no qualified immunity defense. The district court felt strongly that the officers had not been placed on notice that their behavior, however dumb, violated a clearly established constitutional right. My dissenting brother quotes at length from the majority's analysis under the first step of Wilson. The panel naturally relied on general language in Bell v. Wolfish to find a constitutional violation on these specific facts. The dissent indicates that the language of the step one analysis detailing the unconstitutionality of the officers' actions also suffices to satisfy the second prong of Wilson. However, the pitfalls of this approach should be apparent. If a court's general explanation of why an act is unconstitutional also suffices to supplant the need for specific notice, then there will be no independent force to the qualified immunity inquiry at all. The two steps of an analysis which the Supreme Court clearly intended to be sequential and distinct will simply collapse. The concept of notice is rooted in case law. The panel emphatically did not require the plaintiff to come forward with a case on all fours with the present one in order to abrogate the qualified immunity defense. . . It pressed for even one case that would put the officers on fair notice of a constitutional infraction, but all the cases plaintiff advanced involved much more egregious or far different circumstances than those present here. The plaintiff was unable to provide a single decision to illustrate even the general point that a fleeting or misguided prank rose to the level of a constitutional violation. Wilson requires that a plaintiff point to at least some pertinent authority. . . Plaintiff provided none at all. . . . While Hope certainly did not require prior cases to have fundamentally similar facts, neither did it take leave of the need to inquire into the case law to give at least a semblance of specificity to what would otherwise be general and abstract constitutional principles. These basic, simple principles worked well here. The officers did not go unpunished. In finding a constitutional violation, the panel allowed the plaintiff to proceed before a jury on his state due process claim for which Maryland provides no qualified immunity defense. . . . It makes good sense to allow state law to hold officers to strict account while the parameters of federal violations are fairly defined. Moreover, the proper precedent has been established for the future. Police officers have been put on the clearest notice in this circuit that even brief episodes of foolishness implicate due process guarantees.")

Robles v. Prince George's County, Maryland, 308 F.3d 437, 441, 445 (4th Cir. 2002) (Luttig, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) ("Irrespective of any larger doctrinal implications, it is significant when a court of appeals holds, as did this panel, that law enforcement officers today could not reasonably have known that handcuffing a pretrial detainee to a pole in a deserted shopping center, and abandoning him there in the middle of the night, admittedly for no law enforcement purpose whatsoever, would violate his rights under the Constitution. I think it clear that the constitutional impermissibility, not to mention the inherent danger of such, is sufficiently self-evident to require the denial of qualified immunity to the defendant officers. . . . It should be apparent that I do not believe that a decided case is necessary in order for officers to be on fair notice that conduct like that by the officers here is violative of the Constitution. . . . And I would like to have thought that at this point in our history no court would hold, as did this panel, that law enforcement officers need an opinion from this court in order for them to be on notice that handcuffing a pretrial detainee to a metal pole in a deserted shopping center at 3:00 a.m. in the morning, and abandoning him there, for no law enforcement purpose at all, is unconstitutional. The sheer danger, not even to mention the constitutional irresponsibility, of such conduct is manifest as a simple matter of common sense, and is made all the more evident by events such as the recent spree of unpredictable sniper killings in the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area, which have even reached to the identical shopping center in which appellant was handcuffed. Such a holding as that of the panel analytically completes the transformation of qualified immunity into absolute immunity and goes a long way toward the dilution of section 1983 itself.").

McVey v. Virginia Highlands Airport Commission, No. 01-2466, 2002 WL 1869992, at * (4th Cir. Aug. 15, 2002) (unpublished) ("Because we conclude that McVey has failed to demonstrate at least two of the necessary elements for establishing a First Amendment claim, we need not reach the second inquiry under qualified immunity–whether her constitutional right was 'clearly established.' But we note in passing that in Cromer v. Brown, 88 F.3d 1315, 1326 (4th Cir.1996), we explained that 'only infrequently will it be "clearly established" that a public employee's speech on a matter of public concern is constitutionally protected, because the relevant inquiry requires a "particularized balancing" that is subtle, difficult to apply and not yet well- defined.'").

Pike v. Osborne, 301 F.3d 182, 186 (4th Cir. 2002) (Hamilton, J., concurring in the judgment) ("Jenkins is confusing, at best, on the point of whether sheriffs in Virginia can lawfully terminate for political affiliation reasons dispatchers with privity to confidential information. Accordingly, because the law was not clearly established in December 1999 that a sheriff could not lawfully terminate for political affiliation reasons a dispatcher with privity to confidential information, Sheriff Osborne was entitled to qualified immunity").

Trulock v. Freeh, 275 F.3d 391, 403, 404 (4th Cir. 2001) ("Trulock had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the password-protected computer files and Conrad's authority to consent to the search did not extend to them. Trulock, therefore, has alleged a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. Nevertheless, the Defendants are entitled to immunity because a reasonable officer in their position would not have known that the search would violate clearly established law. [footnote omitted] At the time of the search, at least one published case, although from a district court outside this circuit, held that a third party may consent to the search of a shared computer when the third party has complete access to the computer. . . . Conversely, we are aware of no reported cases answering whether an individual has a reasonable expectation of privacy in password-protected files stored in a shared computer. Trulock, though conceding the absence of computer specific caselaw, urges us to recognize a clearly established right based upon Block and other similar cases. We decline to do this. Although cases involving computers are not sui generis, the law of computers is fast evolving, and we are reluctant to recognize a retroactive right based on cases involving footlockers and other dissimilar objects. Thus, a reasonable officer in the Defendants' position would not have known that Conrad's consent did not authorize them to search Trulock's files; the Defendants are, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity.").

Trulock v. Freeh, 275 F.3d 406, 407, 409 (4th Cir. 2001) (Michael, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority holds that Conrad lacked the authority to consent to a search of Trulock's password-protected computer files. . .I agree. I also agree with the majority's conclusion. . .that Trulock's computer files are analogous to the locked footlocker in United States v. Block, 590 F.2d 535, 540-42 (4th Cir.1978) (holding that a mother's consent to the search of her son's room did not extend to his locked footlocker). I respectfully disagree, however, with the majority's view that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established law saying that one co-user's consent to search a computer does not extend to the password-protected files of another co-user when the consenting co-user does not know the other's passwords. I would reject the defendants' qualified immunity defense because the unlawfulness of searching Trulock's password-protected files was readily apparent in light of the principles established in Matlock and reiterated in Block. . . . The central question here is whether in the light of pre-existing law it would have been apparent to a reasonable FBI agent that Conrad's general consent to search the computer she shared with Trulock did not authorize the search of Trulock's password-protected files stored in that computer. In answering this question, we look to Supreme Court cases, ' Acases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction," [and] the Aconsensus of cases of persuasive authority" from other jurisdictions' as sources of clearly established law. Amaechi v. West, 237 F.3d 356, 363 (4th Cir.2001) (quoting Wilson, 526 U.S. at 617). No court has decided a case involving third-party consent to the search of password-protected computer files. Nevertheless, we have clearly established law that is applicable: it comes from Matlock and Block. . . . Whatever the physical differences between locked footlockers and password-protected computer files, the question here must be whether a reasonable officer would believe that there is a legal difference for Fourth Amendment purposes. In other words, is there any reason why a reasonable FBI agent fully apprised of the principles in Block would believe that he could lawfully search Trulock's password-protected files on the basis of Conrad's general consent to search the computer? If there is no such reason, the unlawfulness of the agents' conduct in this case is 'apparent,' Wilson, 526 U.S. at 615, and qualified immunity does not apply. Any reasonable officer should have recognized that the privacy expectations attaching to a password-protected computer file are essentially the same as those attaching to a locked footlocker. A computer file is a repository for information and images in electronic form, just as a footlocker is a repository for more tangible items such as papers and other personal effects. Once password protection attaches to a computer file, that protection is the electronic equivalent of the lock on a footlocker containing items that are intended to remain private. The password is an electronic key. While the medium for ensuring privacy is different, the result–a clear signal that privacy is expected against all those who lack the key (or the password)–is the same. There is simply no reason why a reasonable officer who understood that a locked footlocker signals a discrete expectation of privacy would believe that a password-protected computer file does not. The physical differences between the two repositories have no legal significance.").

Knussman v. Maryland, 272 F.3d 625, 638 & n.9 (4th Cir. 2001) (Knussman IV) ("Here, the concurring opinion departs and would, like the district court, define the right in fairly broad terms: whether 'a person's right not to have a gender neutral statute applied in a discriminatory manner' was clearly established in 1994. Such a broad definition is not faithful to the particularity principle which 'mandates that courts refer to concrete applications of abstract concepts to determine whether the right is clearly established.'[citing Amaechi v. West] In our view, defining the right so broadly is not too far removed from framing the issue as whether it was clearly established that a person had the right not to be discriminated against based on gender. Such a definition is too general to provide state officials with adequate guidance on the constitutional limits to their conduct. . . . We view the relevant constitutional question as follows: was the law clearly established in December 1994 that the equal protection clause prohibited a state agency from permitting only mothers, never fathers, to take child-nurturing leave benefits available to the primary care giver for a newborn? We think the decisions outlined above demonstrate that it was.").

Amaechi v. West, 237 F.3d 356, 362, 363 (4th Cir. 2001) ("West conceded at oral argument that a strip search or a body cavity search conducted in public violates an arrestee's Fourth Amendment right to a reasonable search, but he argues that relevant precedent does not define his conduct as unlawful because no case holds that the 'swiping' and 'slight' penetration of an arrestee's genitalia pursuant to a search incident to an arrest violates the Fourth Amendment. Contrary to West's argument, the exact conduct at issue need not have been held unlawful for the law governing an officer's actions to be clearly established. . . . Such precise precedent is not what the particularity principle mandates. Rather, the particularity principle mandates that courts refer to concrete applications of abstract concepts to determine whether the right is clearly established. . . . Accordingly, we must determine whether the contours of the right to be free from an unreasonable search have been identified in such a way as to afford West adequate notice that his search of Amaechi transgressed the Fourth Amendment. In doing so, we look to 'cases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction,' as well as the 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' from other jurisdictions. [citing Wilson]").

Doe v. Broderick, 225 F.3d 440, 455 (4th Cir. 2000) ("In August 1998, clearly established Fourth Amendment principles prohibited officers from searching private areas within commercial or business premises, or even private areas within public places, without probable cause. We believe it would have been apparent to a reasonable officer that these limitations encompassed a locked, patient-records room within a methadone clinic that contained confidential patient files, and that, if nothing else, Detective Broderick knew (or should have known) that his actions violated the Fourth Amendment rights of every person who had an expectation of privacy in the records room or the records contained there.").

Norwood v. Bain, 166 F.3d 243, 252, 253 (4th Cir. 1999) (en banc) (per curiam) (Wilkins, J., writing separately, and joined in this part of his opinion by Wilkinson, C.J., and JJ. Widener, Luttig, Niemeyer, Williams, Traxler) ("The constitutional right that Plaintiffs claim was violated, defined at the appropriate level of specificity, is their Fourth Amendment right to avoid individualized searches of their motorcycle saddlebags and unworn clothing performed prior to entering the rally for the purpose of detecting weapons when reliable information indicated that a real and imminent danger existed that armed members of warring motorcycle gangs planned to attend the rally and when Plaintiffs were informed that they would not be searched unless they chose to enter the fairgrounds on their motorcycles. The qualified immunity question presented, then, is whether in September 1994 this right was clearly established and whether a reasonable officer would have understood that the conduct at issue violated it. . . . But, it is undisputed that when this incident took place there was no clear law from the Supreme Court, this court, or the South Carolina Supreme Court holding that a search fails to pass constitutional muster under the Fourth Amendment as a special needs search when officers conduct a search at a checkpoint without individualized suspicion or a warrant–and a grave matter of public interest is at stake, an effective means of preventing that harm is available, and the searching technique employed is relatively unintrusive.").

Gould v. Davis, 165 F.3d 265, 270-71 (4th Cir. 1998) ("The parties agree, then, that the following was clearly established law in October 1992: the officers were required by the Fourth Amendment to knock and announce their presence, and wait a reasonable time for a response, prior to entering Gould's home; and, this requirement could only be excused if exigent circumstances justified immediate entry. With this background in mind, we turn now to the officers' basic argument in this court–that the exigent circumstances doctrine was not sufficiently defined in 1992 so that a reasonable officer would know he was violating clearly established law in seeking and executing a no-knock warrant under the circumstances of this case. . . . We believe it would have been 'sufficiently clear' and 'apparent' to a reasonable officer in October 1992 that failure to knock and announce prior to entering Gould's home could only be justified by a fear for officer safety or a fear that the evidence sought in the warrant could be easily destroyed.").

Gould v. Davis, 165 F.3d 265, 274 (4th Cir. 1998) (Williams, J., dissenting) ("Although the majority contends that the unlawfulness of the officers' actions was apparent in 1992, it was only last year, 1997, that the Supreme Court stated that the officer safety exception would not justify a 'no-knock' search 'at a time when the only individuals present in a residence ha[d] no connection with the [criminal] activity.' Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385, 117 S.Ct. 1416, 1421, 137 L.Ed.2d 615 (1997). Thus, although it is now clearly established that the officers' conduct–as portrayed by the majority– violated the 'knock and announce' requirement, it was not clearly established that their conduct violated the 'knock and announce' requirement in October 1992.").

Vathekan v. Prince George's County, 154 F.3d 173, 175 (4th Cir. 1998) ("We hold that it was clearly established in 1995 that it is objectively unreasonable for a police officer to fail to give a verbal warning before releasing a police dog to seize someone. We conclude that there is a factual dispute about whether Simms failed to give a warning before sending his dog into the house where Vathekan lived. This unresolved factual issue makes it impossible to grant summary judgment to Simms on qualified immunity grounds.").

Osborne v. Rose, Nos. 97-1259, 97-1264, 1998 WL 17044, *4 (4th Cir. Jan. 20, 1998) (unpublished) ("The Osbornes accept that Albright foreclosed malicious prosecution claims based on the Fourteenth Amendment but contend that Albright recognized such claims brought under the Fourth Amendment. It is true that Albright left open this question, and, prior to November 1994, some courts read Albright in conjunction with earlier Supreme Court cases to permit malicious prosecution claims under the Fourth Amendment. . . We do not believe, however, that the mere possibility that such claims might survive after Albright demonstrates that a constitutional right had reached the status of being clearly established.").

S.P. v. City of Takoma Park, 134 F.3d 260, 265-67 (4th Cir. 1998) ("Peller asserts that the clearly established right that the officers violated was her Fourth Amendment right to be free from seizure for the purpose of medical treatment absent probable cause to believe that she suffered from a mental disorder, posed a danger of serious harm to herself, and that there was no less restrictive alternative available consistent with her welfare. Because we conclude that the contours of such a right were not clearly established so as to make the unlawfulness of these officers' actions apparent, we affirm the district court's order granting the officers qualified immunity and dismissing her claim. . . . Reasonable officers, relying upon our decision in Gooden and the other circuit court decisions addressing similar situations, would have concluded that involuntarily detaining Peller was not only reasonable, but prudent.").

White v. Chambliss, 112 F.3d 731, 736, 737 (4th Cir. 1997) ("If section 1983 liability attaches too readily to removal and placement decisions, the course of public agencies would invariably become one of inaction, thus leaving children in abusive environments. The facts presented by White reveal that the DSS defendants violated no 'clearly established' law in removing White's children from her custody. Therefore, qualified immunity must lie.").

Winfield v. Bass, 106 F.3d 525, 531 (4th Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("The district court ruled that the right to personal security protected by the Eighth Amendment was well established at the time the events underlying this appeal transpired. But, it is axiomatic that defining the applicable right at that degree of abstraction is inappropriate. . . . Thus, we must inquire whether the established contours of the Eighth Amendment were sufficiently clear at the time of the attack to make it plain to reasonable officers that their actions under these particular circumstances violated Winfield's rights. In the context of this case, we ultimately are called upon to decide whether it was clearly established in February 1993 that an unarmed prison official would be deliberately indifferent to an inmate's need for safety if, during an attack by a prisoner armed with a dangerous weapon upon another prisoner, the official instantly mobilized to take control of the situation but failed to intervene immediately. We conclude that it was not.").

Conner v. McGraw, 104 F.3d 358 (Table), 1996 WL 741132, 5-7 (4th Cir. Dec. 30, 1996) ("While no one disagrees with a general statement of the principles of the Elrod/Branti line of cases, the jurisprudence of what offices are legally subject to political patronage terminations has been a burning and unresolved issue that has not been resolved even yet in this circuit, or indeed elsewhere. Less than a year before McGraw terminated Conner, we conducted a survey in the Fourth Circuit as well as in other jurisdictions to determine which positions could require political patronage. See Stott v. Haworth, 916 F.2d 134, 143-144 (4th Cir.1990) . . . . We hold that just as in the area of the Elrod/Branti line of cases, the Pickering/Connick line of cases was, and today is, not much clearer when applied to particularities. . . . The area of discharge for the exercise of First Amendment rights . . . is one of the most complex that we have to apply. When the courts have applied it inconsistently to justify dismissals of some employees and not others, it is simply expecting far too much of an objectively reasonable elected chief clerk to conclude that he is not entitled to fire his chief deputy clerk when he takes office in order to have his own administration carry out the policies of his campaign.").

Hogan v. Carter, 85 F.3d 1113, 1116 (4th Cir. 1996) (en banc) ("[A]lthough [Washington v.] Harper [, 494 U.S. 210 (1990)] had clearly established by the time that Dr. Carter ordered administration of the single emergency dose of Thorazine to Hogan that an inmate possesses a liberty interest in avoiding the administration of psychotropic drugs by prison officials, Harper had not established, let alone clearly established, the particular process that must precede the one-time administration of an antipsychotic drug in an emergency circumstance such as that confronted by Dr. Carter. Contrary to Hogan's contention, and to the holdings of the district court and panel, Harper does not, therefore, constitute clearly established law of which Dr. Carter could have been in violation.")

Price v. Sasser, 65 F.3d 342, 347 (4th Cir. 1995) ("While Farmer established that a risk of danger particular to the individual was not required, . . . that was not clearly the law, at least in this circuit, at the time of the attack on Price. . . . Because Tadlock could not reasonably have known that his behavior violated Price's clearly established rights at the time he was assaulted, Tadlock is entitled to qualified immunity . . . .").

Pinder v. Johnson, 54 F.3d 1169, 1176 (4th Cir. 1995) (en banc) ("Given the principles laid down by DeShaney, it can hardly be said that Johnson was faced with a clearly established duty to protect Pinder or her children in March of 1989. Indeed, it can be argued that DeShaney established exactly the opposite, i.e., that no such affirmative duty existed because neither Pinder nor her children were confined by the state.").

Hodge v. Jones, 31 F.3d 157, 167-68 (4th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e feel compelled to address a matter raised in the district court's opinion with which we find a fundamental error, namely the court's generalized formulation of a constitutional right which prevents reasonable government officials from knowing just what conduct is actually prohibited by the broad concept of family inviolability. [cite omitted] We commend the district court's thoughtful consideration of the familial privacy right, but note that it is this very need for such complex legal analysis that renders a denial of qualified immunity inappropriate in this case. Absent our conclusion that Defendants violated no constitutional rights, this would be a proper case for the application of qualified immunity because '[o]fficials are not liable for bad guesses in gray areas; they are liable for transgressing bright lines.'... To expect Defendants to resolve what reasonable jurists have long debated–namely the precise strictures of the penumbral right of familial privacy . . .is to impose burdens and expectations well beyond their reasonable capacities ... On the facts of this case and in light of preexisting law, we cannot say that the purported unlawfulness of retaining records of unsubstantiated child abuse charges should have been apparent to Defendants.").

Pritchett v. Alford, 973 F.2d 307, 314 (4th Cir.1992) ("[T]he fact that an exact right allegedly violated has not earlier been specifically recognized by any court does not prevent a determination that it was nevertheless 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes. [cite omitted] 'Clearly established' in this context includes not only already specifically adjudicated rights, but those manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle involved.").

Smith v. City of Greensboro, No. 1:19CV386, 2020 WL 1452114, at *6–8 (M.D.N.C. Mar. 25, 2020) ("Recognizing this poor fit under similar facts, the Sixth Circuit in Estate of Hill v. Miracle 'suggest[ed] that a more tailored set of factors [than the Graham factors] be considered in the medical-emergency context,' including whether the person experiencing the emergency could think clearly, whether the person posed an immediate threat of serious harm to himself or others, and, if so, whether some degree of force was necessary to ameliorate that threat. . . Keeping in mind the ultimate goal of resolving 'whether the officers' actions are objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them,'. . . this Court sees no harm in likewise tailoring its considerations—especially since applying both the Graham and Miracle factors at this stage yields the same result. Accepting the complaint's factual allegations as true, the three Graham factors weigh heavily in Plaintiffs' favor. First, the 'severity' of any purported crime was low. As discussed above, the allegations portray the incident as primarily a medical emergency—the complaint's only reference to criminal behavior is a citation to Smith's autopsy report, which lists two illicit drugs, 'n-ethylpentalone [and] cocaine,' as among the causes of death. . . Second, while Plaintiffs allege that Smith was 'agitated, afraid, and in the throes of a mental health crisis,'. . . the complaint does not readily support an inference that Smith 'pose[d] an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others[.]' . . . [T]he complaint repeatedly states that Smith was unarmed, nonviolent, and nonthreatening, such that the cadre of eight Officers had no trouble restraining him. . . Third, although Smith was 'grunting and groaning and moving his body' as the Officers applied the hobble, he nonetheless 'was not actively resisting the Defendants' or attempting to flee. . . Thus, under the Graham framework, Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that the Officers' behavior was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances. What the Graham analysis fails to capture, however, is the urgency of Smith's medical need, and the potential that some force would become necessary in light of that need. . . . Plaintiffs do not directly dispute the idea that some measure of restraint may have been warranted under the circumstances. Nonetheless, they maintain that the manner in which Smith was restrained—holding him prone on the ground, 'bending his knees ... until his feet were touching his handcuffed hands at the small of his back,' while 'tightening the [hobble] so tight' that he asphyxiated—was excessive. . . Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the Court agrees. . . . It is plausible that this behavior was unreasonable; even if some use of a restraint was warranted under the circumstances, there was no need to ratchet up the tension on the hobble once Smith—who was not actively resisting in the first place—had been clearly subdued. Thus, even under an analysis more appropriately tailored to the medical-emergency context, Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that the Officers violated Smith's right to be free from excessive force. . . .Given the somewhat atypical facts here, the Court cannot locate—and Plaintiffs have not provided—a Fourth Circuit case which is precisely on point. However, the '"exact conduct at issue need not" previously have been deemed unlawful for the law governing an officer's actions to be clearly established.'. . That is because '[p]recedent involving similar facts can help move a case beyond the otherwise "hazy border between excessive and acceptable force."'. . With that principle in mind, the Court finds that a long line of precedent supports Plaintiffs' contention that the Officers were on notice that their conduct was unlawful. At the time the allegedly excessive force was deployed against Smith—ratchetting up the tension on the hobble well beyond what was necessary to subdue him—he was secured, unarmed, and nonresistant. . . As numerous reported cases in this circuit confirm, it is clearly established that the use of 'unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate force' against an incapacitated citizen who poses no active threat violates the Fourth Amendment. [collecting cases] Defendants argue that the use of a hobble in this case, as opposed to some more familiar weapon or device, meaningfully distinguishes it from the precedent cited above. . . However, the Fourth Circuit has made it clear that the use of gratuitous force against an unarmed and secured individual is unconstitutional 'whether arising from a gun, a baton, a taser, or other weapon.'. . As alleged in the complaint, the Officers did more than use the hobble to restrain Smith; they 'violently push[ed] [his] feet toward his back' and 'tightened the strap ... so tight' that he could no longer breathe. . . The fact that force was exerted through the hobble, rather than a more conventional mechanism, is simply 'not dispositive.'. . In sum, Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that the Officers violated Smith's clearly established constitutional right to be free from excessive force. At the time of the incident, it was well established that 'serious physical force... is constitutionally excessive when used against an individual suspected, at most, of a minor crime, who is unarmed, and who does not attempt to flee or physically attack the officer.'. . Accordingly, the Officers have not demonstrated that they are entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.")

Smith v. City of Greensboro, No. 1:19CV386, 2020 WL 1452114, at *16-17 (M.D.N.C. Mar. 25, 2020) ("Having determined that the custody exception has been sufficiently alleged here, the Court must now consider whether, as alleged in the complaint, the Paramedics exhibited deliberate indifference towards Smith's serious medical needs in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Though it is a close question, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged deliberate indifference on the part of the Paramedics. According to the complaint, both Paramedics stood near Smith as he gasped for air. . . Even after they 'knew [Smith] was unconscious, unresponsive[,] and not breathing,' the Paramedics waited more than two minutes before trying to resuscitate him. . . Any medical professional in the Paramedics' position should have appreciated the urgency of the situation; with Smith not breathing, time was of the essence. . . However, as Smith lay there, the Paramedics sat idly by. Viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, these facts plausibly support the allegation that the Paramedics disregarded a substantial risk of danger to Smith by delaying their resuscitative efforts for more than two minutes after learning that he was unconscious and not breathing. . . . The Paramedics contend that, even if their failure to provide timely aid violated Smith's rights, they are still entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that their behavior ran contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Once again, Plaintiffs have not identified, nor has the Court been able to locate, a Fourth Circuit case with facts directly on point. However, that does not mean that it would not have been 'apparent' to the Paramedics that their behavior was unlawful. The general standard governing liability for the failure to provide medical care in the custodial context—deliberate indifference—has been established for decades. . . Over time, a wide array of cases have applied the deliberate indifference standard to facts similar to those here. [collecting cases] What these cases and others make clear is that governmental officials responsible for the medical care of a person in their custody may act with deliberate indifference when they (a) recognize that the person is unconscious or not breathing, but (b) allow critical minutes to pass before seeking or rendering aid. . . In light of the foregoing, it would have been sufficiently clear to government medical personnel in the Paramedics' position that delaying efforts to resuscitate Smith—for more than two minutes after recognizing that he was unconscious and not breathing—could amount to deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. Accordingly, the Paramedics have not established that they are entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.")

Newhard v. Borders, 649 F.Supp.2d 440, 448, 449 (W.D. Va. 2009) ("First, the Unnamed Officer who allegedly searched through Newhard's phone after the arrest is entitled to qualified immunity because Newhard's constitutional right to be free from such a search under the Fourth Amendment was not 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged misconduct. As an initial matter, it is well established that, subsequent to an arrest, an officer may conduct a warrantless search of an arrestee's person and the area 'within his immediate control' 'in order to remove any weapons that the [arrestee] might seek to use in order to resist arrest or effect his escape,' or to prevent the concealment and destruction of evidence, without running afoul of the Fourth Amendment. Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 763, 89 S.Ct. 2034, 23 L.Ed.2d 685 (1969). Furthermore, a post-arrest, pre-incarceration inventory search is another 'well-defined exception to the warrant requirement.' Illinois v. Lafayette, 462 U.S. 640, 644, 103 S.Ct. 2605, 77 L.Ed.2d 65 (1983). In the Internet age, the extent to which the Fourth Amendment provides protection for the contents of electronic communications (such as images stored on a cell phone) in a search incident to arrest or inventory search is an open question. . . The Fourth Circuit has held that 'officers may retrieve text messages and other information from cell phones and pagers seized incident to an arrest' in order to preserve evidence, see United States v. Murphy, 552 F.3d 405, 411 (4th Cir.2009), and other courts have reached similar conclusions. See, e.g., United States v. Finley, 477 F.3d 250, 259-60 (5th Cir.2007); United States v. Santillan, 571 F.Supp.2d 1093, 1102 (D.Ariz.2008); United States v. Deans, 549 F.Supp.2d 1085, 1093-94 (D.Minn.2008). Under different circumstances, however, other courts have invalidated warrantless searches of cell phones incident to arrest. See, e.g., United States v. McGhee, 2009 WL 2424104, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62427 (D.Neb. July 21, 2009); United States v. Quintana, 594 F.Supp.2d 1291, 1301 (M.D.Fla.2009). But given the Fourth Circuit's approval of the retrieval of text messages and other information from a cell phone seized incident to an arrest in Murphy and the lack of a clear rule from the Supreme Court or other lower courts regarding with the permissible scope of a search of a cell phone incident to arrest, I cannot conclude that the search conducted by the Unnamed Officer in this case violated any 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment right of Newhard's, or that the purported illegality of the search 'would have been evident to a reasonable officer based on existing caselaw.'..Under the circumstances alleged in the Amended Complaint, a reasonable officer could have believed that the Unnamed Officer's search of the cell phone after Newhard's arrest 'comported with the Fourth Amendment' as either a valid search incident to arrest or inventory search.").

Brown v. Mitchell, 327 F.Supp.2d 615, 649-51 (E.D. Va. 2004) ("Mitchell contends that, because Brown is unable to cite to a case presenting the specific fact pattern in this case, qualified immunity attaches. Thus, according to Mitchell, because there is no precedent finding a sheriff, who runs a jail facility owned by a separate political entity and who has tried to get this separate political entity to improve the facility, liable for an inmate's death caused by a disease, of a type that the facility has never before experienced, she is entitled to qualified immunity. Mitchell's argument proves too much. Indeed, to ascertain whether a right is 'clearly established' as posited by Mitchell would mean that, until a particular fact pattern (or an almost identical fact pattern) had been judicially determined to infringe a constitutional right and, thereafter, repeated itself, officials would remain immune from Section 1983 liability. [footnote omitted] Contrary, however, to Mitchell's argument, the nonexistence of controlling authority holding that the defendant's identical (or virtually identical) conduct is unlawful does not guarantee qualified immunity. . . 'Clearly established' does not mean that the very actions in question have previously been held unlawful; rather, it merely means that, in light of preexisting law, the unlawfulness of the official's conduct was reasonably and objectively apparent. . . Qualified immunity is not intended to relieve government officials from the responsibility of applying settled legal principles to new, but reasonably analogous, situations; there need not exist a case on 'all fours' with the fact pattern presented by the case under review before Section 1983 liability can attach. . .[footnote omitted] Mitchell's argument, unfortunately, has come into vogue in this district. Counsel all too often look to, and cite (often out of context), snippets of qualified immunity decisions and not the doctrine of qualified immunity reflected in Fourth Circuit jurisprudence as a whole. That is precisely what Mitchell has done here. As the Court of Appeals recently explained in Parrish, however, the Fourth Circuit rule does not instruct district courts to define the implicated right in terms of decided cases on all fours with the one at issue. And, none of the decisions cited by Mitchell follow the approach that Mitchell urges here. . . . It is undisputed that here, Mitchell knew that the overcrowded conditions at the Jail presented an unacceptably high risk of the spread of contagious disease. A reasonable official, armed with this knowledge, would have realized that housing inmates under such conditions was violative of their rights. And, as explained above, the absence of decisional law containing Mitchell's precisely posited facts (e.g., a jail facility owned by a separate political entity, a inmate who dies from a disease that the facility has never before experienced, a jailor who has asked the jail owners to fix the facility's problems) does not entitle her to qualified immunity. Rather, because the applicability of the complained of right on the facts presented here is manifestly apparent from the core constitutional principle, the absence of a case presenting a virtually identical fact pattern to this one is not dispositive. Simply stated, in light of the clearly established legal authority respecting inmates' rights to be housed in prison conditions that meet their basic human needs, a reasonable official in Mitchell's position would have realized that it was a violation of the Constitution to continue to house inmates in a jail that was so grossly overcrowded that it presented an unacceptably high risk of spreading contagious diseases.").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Craig v. Martin, No. 19-10013, 20222 WL 4103353, at *8-10 (5th Cir. Sept. 8, 2022) (superseding opinion on denial of reh'g en banc) ("In sum, Martin's conduct in this case was not objectively unreasonable and did not violate Hymond's or any of the other plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights. On this basis alone, Martin is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Even assuming the plaintiffs could show that Martin committed a constitutional violation, Martin is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . The plaintiffs have failed to provide any controlling precedent showing that Martin's particular conduct violated a clearly established right. . . . Instead, they have pointed to several cases that discuss the excessive force issue at a 'high level of generality'—precisely what the Supreme Court has repeatedly advised courts they cannot do in analyzing qualified immunity claims. . . .[T]he decisions in Sam, Darden, and Joseph would not have provided fair notice because the plaintiffs in each case were not resisting arrest when the alleged unlawful conduct occurred. In all three cases, the plaintiffs had either signaled their surrender by placing their hands in the air and ceasing further movements or were lying on the ground before the alleged unlawful conduct occurred. In contrast, the plaintiffs in this case—except for Craig—were still resisting when the alleged unlawful conduct occurred. . . . Although the plaintiffs need not point to a factually identical case to demonstrate that the law is clearly established, they nonetheless must provide some controlling precedent that 'squarely governs the specific facts at issue.'. . The plaintiffs have not provided such precedent here and thus fail to show that the law clearly established that Martin's particular conduct was unlawful at the time of the incident. Moreover, as we have noted before, the plaintiffs' reliance on the cases above 'requires us to assume that Fifth Circuit precedent alone can clearly establish the law for qualified immunity purposes, something the Supreme Court has left open.' Regardless, the plaintiffs have not overcome Martin's qualified immunity defense.")

Harris v. Clay County, Mississippi, No. 21-60456, 2022 WL 3646129, at *5–6 (5th Cir. Aug. 24, 2022) ("The commit-or-release rule is fifty years old. The rule has no wiggle room; its line is as bright as they come: An incompetent defendant who has no reasonable expectation of restored competency must be civilly committed or released. . . It is also clear as day that Harris's detention after the October 2010 dismissal of his civil proceeding violated Jackson's rule. And it has long been the law that sheriffs can be held responsible for unlawful detentions, especially when a court order tells them that the detainee should be released. . . That is the case here, as the circuit court's order informed the jailers that Harris should remain detained only so long as his commitment proceeding was pending. Detaining Harris for more than six years after he should have been released under Supreme Court precedent and a state court order is a violation of clearly established law. Qualified immunity thus does not protect Huffman and Scott.")

Villarreal v. City of Laredo, Texas, 44 F.4th 363, 370-75 (5th Cir. 2022) (superseding opinion) ("Ordinarily, a plaintiff defeats qualified immunity by citing governing case law finding a violation under factually similar circumstances. But that is not the only way to defeat qualified immunity. 'Although earlier cases involving "fundamentally similar" facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established, they are not necessary to such a finding.' Hope, 536 U.S. at 741, 122 S.Ct. 2508. [Court discusses Hope] Similarly, in Taylor v. Riojas, —— U.S. ——, 141 S. Ct. 52, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020) (per curiam), two prison cells contained massive amounts of feces over a period of six days. . . Again, there was no binding case on point involving those particular factual circumstances. But the Court nevertheless denied qualified immunity, reasoning that 'no reasonable correctional officer could have concluded that, under the extreme circumstances of this case, it was constitutionally permissible to house Taylor in such deplorably unsanitary conditions for such an extended period of time.'. . Perhaps the decision most analogous to this appeal is Sause v. Bauer, —— U.S. ——, 138 S. Ct. 2561, 201 L.Ed.2d 982 (2018) (per curiam). There, police officers entered a woman's living room in response to a noise complaint. When she knelt down to pray, they ordered her to stop, despite the lack of any apparent law enforcement need. . . She brought suit against the officers alleging, inter alia, a violation of the Free Exercise Clause. . . The Tenth Circuit

granted qualified immunity, reasoning that any violation was not clearly established because 'Sause d[id]n't identify a single case in which this court, or any other court for that matter, has found a First Amendment violation based on a factual scenario even remotely resembling the one we encounter here.'. . The Court reversed the Tenth Circuit's grant of qualified immunity and remanded for further proceedings, holding that '[t]here can be no doubt that the First Amendment protects the right to pray,' and that '[p]rayer unquestionably constitutes the "exercise" of religion.'. .The point is this: The doctrine of qualified immunity does not always require the plaintiff to cite binding case law involving identical facts. An official who commits a patently 'obvious' violation of the Constitution is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . That principle should have precluded dismissal of the various constitutional claims presented here. Just as it is obvious that Mary Anne Sause has a constitutional right to pray, it is likewise obvious that Priscilla Villarreal has a constitutional right to ask questions of public officials. Yet according to her complaint, Defendants arrested and sought to prosecute Villarreal for doing precisely that—asking questions of public officials. . . . So it should be patently obvious to any reasonable police officer that the conduct alleged in the complaint constitutes a blatant violation of Villarreal's constitutional rights. And that should be enough to defeat qualified immunity. The Institute for Justice, a respected national public interest law firm, puts the point well in its amicus brief: There is a big difference between 'split-second decisions' by police officers and 'premeditated plans to arrest a person for her journalism, especially by local officials who have a history of targeting her because of her journalism.' We agree that the facts alleged here present an especially weak basis for invoking qualified immunity. For '[w]hen it comes to the First Amendment, ... we are concerned about government chilling the citizen—not the other way around.' Horvath v. City of Leander, 946 F.3d 787, 802 (5th Cir. 2020) (Ho, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part). Cf. Hoggard v. Rhodes, —— U.S. ——, 141 S. Ct. 2421, 2422, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2021) (Thomas, J., respecting denial of cert.) ("But why should university officers, who have time to make calculated choices about enacting or enforcing unconstitutional policies, receive the same protection as a police officer who makes a split-second decision to use force in a dangerous setting?"). Defendants respond that the officials were simply enforcing a statute. But 'some statutes are so obviously unconstitutional that we will require officials to second-guess the legislature and refuse to enforce an unconstitutional statute—or face a suit for damages if they don't.' Lawrence v. Reed, 406 F.3d 1224, 1233 (10th Cir. 2005). We agree with Judge McConnell and our other sister circuits that police officers can invoke qualified immunity by 'rely[ing] on statutes that authorize their conduct—but not if the statute is obviously unconstitutional.'. . We do not grant qualified immunity where the official attempts to hide behind a statute that is '"so grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional that any person of reasonable prudence would be bound to see its flaws."' [collecting cases] On its face, Texas Penal Code § 39.06(c) is not one of those 'obviously unconstitutional' statutes. Villarreal nevertheless prevails because it is far from clear that the officers can even state a plausible case against Villarreal under § 39.06(c) in the first place. . . . [W]e conclude that no reasonable officer could have found probable cause under § 39.06(c)—separate and apart from whether § 39.06(c) could constitutionally apply to a person motivated by journalism rather than by profits. . . . It should be obvious to any reasonable police officer that locking up a journalist for asking a question violates the First Amendment. Indeed, even Captain Lorenzo, the stubborn police chief in Die Hard 2, acknowledged: 'Now personally, I'd like to lock every [expletive] reporter out of the airport. But then they'd just pull that "freedom of speech" [expletive] on us and the ACLU would be all over us.' DIE HARD 2(1990). Captain Lorenzo understood this. The officers in Laredo should have, too. . . The complaint here alleges an obvious violation of the First Amendment. The district court erred in holding otherwise. . . . We turn to Villarreal's Fourth Amendment wrongful arrest claim. . . . Defendants argue they are entitled to qualified immunity because their arrest warrant sufficiently alleges a violation of § 39.06(c), which they obtained from a magistrate judge. But 'the fact that a neutral magistrate has issued a warrant authorizing the allegedly unconstitutional search or seizure does not end the inquiry into objective reasonableness.'. . Even when officers obtain an arrest warrant from a magistrate, we ask 'whether a reasonably well-trained officer in [the defendants'] position would have known that his affidavit failed to establish probable cause and that he should not have applied for a warrant.'. . . As explained above, a reasonably well-trained officer would have understood that arresting a journalist for merely asking a question clearly violates the First Amendment. 'A government official may not base her probable cause determination on an "unjustifiable standard," such as speech protected by the First Amendment.'. .Just as the First Amendment violation alleged in the complaint was obvious for purposes of qualified immunity, so too the Fourth Amendment violation alleged here. The district court therefore erred in dismissing Villarreal's Fourth Amendment claim.") Ramirez v. Escajeda, 44 F.4th 287, 293-94 (5th Cir. 2022) ("At the outset, we note that '[b]y citing no factually similar Supreme Court cases, [the plaintiffs] effectively concede[ ] that Supreme Court precedent offers [them] no help.'. . Additionally, the plaintiffs' argument requires us to assume that Fifth Circuit precedent alone can clearly establish the law for qualified immunity purposes, something the Supreme Court has left open. See Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, —— U.S. ——, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7, 211 L.Ed.2d 164 (2021) (per curiam) ("assuming" the proposition that "controlling Circuit precedent clearly establishes law for purposes of § 1983"). . . Those caveats aside, the three circuit cases cited by the plaintiffs are not factually similar enough to the situation Escajeda faced to have placed the lawfulness of his taser use beyond debate. . . . These cases do not clearly establish Escajeda's conduct was unlawful. All three involved plaintiffs already under police control (either handcuffed or submitting to a frisk) who were nevertheless subjected to gratuitous violence (face slammed into a car, beaten with batons, tased). Those cases are not this one. Contrary to the plaintiffs' arguments, Escajeda did not have Daniel 'subdued' and under his control when he used the taser. To the contrary, Escajeda faced a 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' situation, . . . wholly unlike those faced by the officers in Bush, Newman, and Martinez. Escajeda used the taser precisely because Daniel was not in custody and Escajeda was unsure whether the strange scenario he faced posed a threat to his safety. Perhaps his fear that he might be walking into an 'ambush' was unfounded; in that event, the tasing could be excessive under prong one of the analysis. . . But even so, no authority cited by the plaintiffs remotely addresses the situation Escajeda faced. It follows, then, that Escajeda could not have been on notice that his single use of the taser was clearly unlawful. . . Furthermore, the district court did not 'frame the constitutional question with specificity and granularity.'. . The court asked about the proper use of tasers 'against a subdued person.' That is too general. It is one thing to ask whether police may tase someone after they have handcuffed him and put him face-down on the ground. . . It is quite another to ask whether an officer may tase someone who may be hanging himself, who may or may not have a weapon, who does not respond to the officer's commands—all when the officer approaches him rapidly, alone, and in the dark. . . Even viewing the facts most favorably to the plaintiffs, as we must, the unusual setting separates this case from routine pat-downs and arrests gone wrong where officers pointlessly or sadistically use force. Existing precedent did not put the lawfulness of Escajeda's actions 'beyond debate,'. . . and so his use of a taser under these unique circumstances did not violate clearly established law.")

Macias v. Salazar, No. 21-51127, 2022 WL 3044654, at *3 (5th Cir. Aug. 2, 2022) (not reported) ("The district court held that the defendants violated Macias's clearly established right to be free from deliberate indifference to his 'basic human needs, including medical care and protection from harm.'. . But that proposition is defined too generally to defeat the defendants' assertion of qualified immunity here. . . As the defendants observe, neither the district court nor the plaintiffs identified any binding authority holding jailers liable for failing to provide medical care to a detainee who refused treatment. Instead, this court has held that it is not 'clearly established that any jailer ... must either force a conscious, incompetent, but clearly refusing inmate to undergo medical treatment or seek a surrogate decision-maker for the same. Neither is there any statutory duty [under Texas law] to impose medical care or locate a surrogate in these or similar circumstances.'. . Thus, plaintiffs have not alleged a violation of clearly established law. Despite this lack of clearly established law, this court must nonetheless consider whether the defendants' 'actions were objectively reasonable in light of that law that was then clearly established.'. . We conclude that the defendants satisfied this standard. Again, we emphasize that pretrial detainees have a clearly established right 'not to have their serious medical needs met with deliberate indifference on the part of the confining officials.'. . But the plaintiffs do not allege that the defendants ignored Macias's serious medical needs. Rather, they allege that Macias was admitted to the BCADC infirmary, where he was seen by multiple heath care providers before he was twice admitted to the local hospital. These health care providers attempted to treat Macias, but he 'refused his dialysis treatment and other daily needs.' 'Given the absence of even a single case constitutionally requiring the imposition of medical care ... in this or any similar context,' it could not have been clear to every reasonable official that the defendants' conduct would have violated Macias's rights. . . To be sure, the plaintiffs also allege that Macias did not receive mental health treatment during his detention. And mental health issues may qualify as a serious medical need that cannot be met with deliberate indifference. . . But elsewhere in their complaint the plaintiffs acknowledge that the local hospital 'provided medical and mental health care to Fernando Macias while he was incarcerated' at BCADC. Macias was also listed for placement in the state mental health hospital. Although the plaintiffs allege that the defendants did not provide Macias with a psychiatrist or other mental health specialist while detained, they do not identify any precedent holding that doing so was constitutionally required where, as here, all agree that the detainee rejected most medical attention and nevertheless received some mental health treatment in jail while awaiting transfer to another facility for specialized care. Accordingly, the defendants' conduct was objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law. They were thus entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court erred to the extent that it concluded otherwise.")

Tyson v. Sabine, 42 F.4th 508, ___ (5th Cir. 2022) ("Here, Deputy Boyd allegedly visited Tyson alone at her home under the pretense of a welfare check and coerced her to strip for his sexual gratification. He further ordered her to show him her clitoris while he masturbated to her exposed body. It is beyond dispute that no legitimate state interest can justify an officer's use of coercion to compel the subject of a welfare check to expose her most private body parts for his sexual enjoyment. . . . Deputy Boyd's alleged conduct was an outrageous abuse of power that shocks the conscience and violated Tyson's right to bodily integrity. . .Our holding that Deputy Boyd violated Tyson's right to bodily integrity is not enough to defeat the defense of qualified immunity. Tyson must demonstrate that the right was clearly established when the challenged conduct occurred. . . . It is obvious that the right to bodily integrity forbids a law enforcement officer from sexually abusing a person by coercing them to perform nonconsensual physical sex acts for his enjoyment. As noted, we have long held that physical sexual abuse by a government official violates the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Regardless whether an officer uses physical or mental coercion, physical sexual abuse by a state official offends the Constitution. No reasonable officer could believe otherwise. We have little trouble finding that the constitutional offense was obvious because the physical sexual abuse alleged here is a 'particularly egregious' and 'extreme circumstance[ ]' of assault by a state official. . . . That Deputy Boyd's alleged physical sexual abuse violated Tyson's constitutional right to bodily integrity would have been obvious to any reasonable officer. . . . By their nature, cases addressing the most flagrant forms of unconstitutional conduct seldom rise to the court of appeals. . . When they do, the obviousness exception 'plays an important role in ... ensur[ing] vindication of the most egregious constitutional violations.'. . No reasonable officer could believe that it was constitutionally permissible to use the pretense of legitimate police activity to sexually abuse a person by coercing her to perform physical sex acts for the officer's sexual gratification. We hold that Tyson's right against physical sexual abuse by a government official was clearly established.")

Williams v. City of Yazoo, Mississippi, 41 F.4th 416, 426-27 (5th Cir. 2022) ("The defendants' knowledge of Williams's condition also means that the unlawfulness of their conduct was clearly established. To defeat the immunity defense, Williams's survivors must show that his constitutional rights were clearly established at the time of the violation. . . A right is clearly established if reasonable officials have notice that their actions are unlawful. . . Caselaw must place the constitutional question 'beyond debate,' though it need not be 'directly on point.'. .Officers and jailers have long had notice that they cannot ignore a detainee's serious medical needs. It is clearly established that an official who refuses to treat or ignores the complaints of a detainee violates their rights. . . We are mindful that we must not define clearly established law 'at too high a level of generality,'. . . but we have seen cases like this before. . . . The facts of this case fit comfortably within Easter's and Nerren's teaching that law enforcement may not ignore reports that a detainee is suffering a serious medical emergency, particularly when those reports are backed by knowledge of a preexisting condition or trauma. Here, the reports came from numerous sources:

Williams, his family, and his fellow detainees. At the time of Williams's death, it was beyond debate that the defendants' total failure to respond to his medical needs was unconstitutional. We do not know whether a jury will agree with Williams's survivors' and fellow detainees' account of what happened the night of his death. But if they do, the defendants violated clearly established law by responding to Williams's serious medical need with deliberate indifference. The district court correctly held that the federal denial-of-care claim can proceed to trial.")

Fairchild v. Coryell County, Texas, 40 F.4th 359, 367-68 (5th Cir. 2022) ("The caselaw specificity required to overcome qualified immunity is lacking for the early parts of the fateful encounter. It is a close call whether it is clearly established that throwing Page to the ground was an excessive response to her tapping the hairbrush on the cell door. But given that the jailers did first seek compliance through verbal commands, we do not see the notice of unlawfulness that qualified immunity requires. And as we have noted, when Page took the handcuffs, it was not excessive for the jailers to try and overcome her resistance and subdue her. The knee strikes and punches may have crossed the line of excessiveness but—given the need to subdue Page at this juncture—not clearly so. The jailers thus cannot be liable for the early stage of the incident. But a jury's finding that the jailers continued to apply pressure to Page's neck, back, and legs for more than two minutes after she was subdued—Page at this point in the encounter was lying prone on her stomach with her hands handcuffed behind her back—would establish a violation of clearly established law. [citing cases] By the time of this October 2017 encounter, the law had thus 'clearly established the unreasonableness of [Pelfrey's and Lovelady's] continued use of bodyweight force to hold [Page] in the prone restraint position after [she] was subdued and restrained.'")

Salazar v. Molina, 37 F.4th 278, 282-88 (5th Cir. 2022) ("A reasonable officer will have little cause to doubt the apparent surrender of a compliant suspect who has not engaged in dangerous or evasive behavior. But when a suspect has put officers and bystanders in harm's way to try to evade capture, it is reasonable for officers to question whether the now-cornered suspect's purported surrender is a ploy. That's especially true when a suspect is unrestrained, in close proximity to the officers, and potentially in possession of a weapon. . . . As Escobar [v. Montee, 895 F.3d 387 (5th Cir. 2018)] illustrates, a suspect cannot refuse to surrender and instead lead police on a dangerous hot pursuit—and then turn around, appear to surrender, and receive the same Fourth Amendment protection from intermediate force . . . he would have received had he promptly surrendered in the first place. Like Escobar, this case involves a fleeing felony suspect who eventually decided to surrender and was then temporarily subjected to intermediate force. . . . When Molina made the split-second decision to deploy his taser, Salazar had just committed a dangerous felony and was unrestrained at night in the open. Because of the preceding high-speed chase, Molina could reasonably be concerned about the sincerity of Salazar's purported surrender. And the totality of the force deployed—a 10-second tasing—was comparatively modest and not grossly disproportionate to the threat Molina could have reasonably perceived. We hold that Molina's conduct did not amount to an unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment. . . On the undisputed facts before us, Salazar cannot show that Molina violated his Fourth Amendment rights. But even if he could, Molina would nonetheless be entitled to qualified immunity because Salazar can't show a violation of clearly established law. . . .Salazar frames the applicable inquiry somewhat differently. He points to Hope v. Pelzer, . . . an Eighth Amendment case, as well as Fifth Circuit decisions that relied on Hope and predated City of Tahlequah and Rivas-Villegas. . . . It's true Hope established that a plaintiff need not identify an on-point case to overcome qualified immunity when a violation is 'obvious.'. . But Salazar does not argue that this case is obvious. Accordingly, Molina is 'entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.'. . . By citing no factually similar Supreme Court cases, Salazar effectively concedes that Supreme Court precedent offers him no help. He turns instead to Fifth Circuit excessive-force cases. Even on the assumption that Fifth Circuit precedent can create clearly established law, see Rivas-Villegas, 142 S. Ct. at 7 (assuming the proposition), none of Salazar's cases is a close enough fit. . . . To generalize a bit, all four of Salazar's tasing-related cases share two characteristics that make them materially different from this case. First, they all involved far less-threatening circumstances than here—in none of them was the plaintiff suspected of a dangerous felony, and in two of them the plaintiff was suspected of no crime at all. Nor had the plaintiff just attempted to flee from officers. Second, all four involved far more force than was deployed here—so much force, in fact, that it killed two of the arrestees. Salazar points to no case where officers used a similar level of force in similarly threatening circumstances. And because this is an excessive-force case that required a split-second judgment, Salazar can only win if 'the law [was] so clearly established that—in the blink of an eye, in the middle of a high-speed chase—every reasonable officer would know it immediately.'. . Salazar cannot meet that burden, so Molina is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Crittindon v. LeBlanc, 37 F.4th 177, 188 (5th Cir. 2022) ("This Court has recognized the 'clearly established right to timely release from prison.'. . Of course, 'timely release' is not the same as instantaneous release: it is reasonable for jailers to have some administrative delay in processing an inmate's discharge. . . While courts have declined to define the amount of delay that is reasonable, . . . it is without question that holding without legal notice a prisoner for a month beyond the expiration of his sentence constitutes a denial of due process. . . Indeed, Defendants knew not just of delay, but that there was, on average, a month-long delay in receiving paperwork from the local jails. Therefore, they had 'fair warning' that their failure to address this delay would deny prisoners like Plaintiffs their immediate or near-immediate release upon conviction. . . We conclude that because a reasonable jury may find that Defendants' inaction was objectively unreasonable in light of this clearly established law, they have failed to show they are entitled to qualified immunity on these claims.")

Crittindon v. LeBlanc, 37 F.4th 177, 198-203 (5th Cir. 2022) (Oldham, J., dissenting) (As in all qualified-immunity cases, our inquiry should start with the Constitution. It's not immediately obvious which constitutional provision is implicated by plaintiffs' 'deliberate indifference on a failure-to-adopt-policies' theory. It appears to be an amalgamation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. Neither the majority nor the parties pause to explain how either part of the Constitution, standing alone or combined with some other part, says anything to urge prison officials to adopt particular policies with particular alacrity. The majority and the parties likewise point to no Supreme Court precedent that requires any of the DPSC defendants to do anything at any time. Everyone instead points only to our precedent. . .Our precedent, in turn, requires two things. First, plaintiffs must show that defendants had 'actual or constructive notice' of a constitutional violation. Porter v. Epps, 659 F.3d 440, 447 (5th Cir. 2011). Second, there must be an 'obvious' causal link between the failure to adopt a particular policy and that same constitutional violation. . . . [T]he majority commits the tell-tale mistake that courts make when all else fails to deny qualified immunity: It lumps the defendants together. . . The law squarely prohibits such group pleading. . . What's worse, the majority lumps the three DPSC defendants together with others—like the sheriffs—who are not before us. . . That's the only way the majority can fault our three defendants for delays that were undisputedly caused by others. Our precedent squarely forecloses this entire enterprise to impose joint-and-several liability under § 1983. . . . [I]t's absurd to charge Griffin and Stagg with 17 days of deliberate indifference. But let's say, for the sake of argument, that Griffin and Stagg knew their actions could cause 17 days of overdetention. Even still, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, because it is not clearly established that it violates the Constitution to hold a prisoner for 17 days while employing reasonable efforts to verify his sentence and calculate his release date. To show a violation of clearly established law, plaintiff must 'identify a case—usually, a body of relevant case law—in which an officer acting under similar circumstances was held to have violated the Constitution.'. . Whether the challenged conduct was unlawful must be obvious and without doubt. . . . It is not sufficient to define 'clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . The majority makes precisely that mistake, concluding 'there is a clearly established right to a timely release from prison.'. . That general rule of law is undisputed—and gets us nowhere. What matters here is when release is sufficiently 'timely,' because as the majority concedes, '"timely release" is not the same as instantaneous release.'. . That's why we held more than fifty years ago that a jailer's 'duty to his prisoner is not breached until the expiration of a reasonable time for the proper ascertainment of the authority upon which his prisoner is detained.'. .So where's the line between timely (no constitutional violation) and untimely (constitutional violation)? Is 17 days reasonable or unreasonable? Courts have declined to draw a bright line. . . Without a bright line, we're left to infer from precedent. And in considering that precedent, we can consider only holdings. . . In the majority's only case, we held that detaining a prisoner for 'thirty days beyond the expiration of his sentence in the absence of a facially valid court order or warrant constitutes a deprivation of due process.' Douthit v. Jones, 619 F.2d 527, 532 (5th Cir. 1980). Just as a case regarding the unreasonableness of (say) ten taser strikes says nothing about the reasonableness of (say) one, so too does Douthit's 30-day holding say nothing about our 17-day case. Moreover, Douthit says nothing about DPSC's efforts during those 17 days to obtain plaintiffs' preclassification paperwork. Douthit is, in a word, irrelevant. But once again, all of this is beside the point because even if a precedent involving a 30-day overdetention somehow renders unconstitutional a 17-day overdetention, there is no conceivable basis for saying that result is 'obvious.' At very most, the majority can say that it wants to extend the 30-day case to give future plaintiffs the benefit of its new 17-day shot clock. But the whole point of qualified immunity is that, when courts change the law like that, it cannot fault the defendants before it with failing to predict the change. Section 1983 does not require officers to be Nostradamus. . . A frequent criticism of our qualified-immunity doctrine is that it leaves some plaintiffs without a meaningful remedy for constitutional violations. That concern is irrelevant here. These plaintiffs had an obvious habeas remedy, as discussed in Part I. And even though the DPSC defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as discussed in Part II, the plaintiffs have viable claims against other defendants—namely the sheriffs. The district court denied the sheriffs' motions for summary judgment, and the sheriffs did not appeal. That means that regardless of what happens with the DPSC defendants here, these plaintiffs will get to go to trial and litigate their claims against officials at the Orleans Parish Sheriff's Office and the East Carroll Parish Sheriff's Office who actually caused their overdetention. That makes the majority's decision all the more inexplicable. I respectfully dissent.")

Sims v. Griffin, 35 F.4th 945, 949-52 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Under our caselaw, . . .Sims must also show that Qualls's 'rights were clearly established at the time of the violation.'. . A right is clearly established only once it is 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Sims contends she has met that burden. She argues both that the law was sufficiently clear and that the officers' conduct was obviously unconstitutional. . . The officers disagree. As we agree with Sims that the law was clearly established, we need not decide whether the officers' conduct was obviously unconstitutional. To show the law was sufficiently clear when the officers violated Qualls's rights, Sims cannot define the 'contours' of Qualls's rights too generally. Rather, Qualls's rights must be defined 'with a high degree of particularity.'. . That means Sims must 'identify a case' or 'body of relevant case law' holding that 'an officer acting under similar circumstances ... violated the [Constitution].'. . She did. The district court concluded, and Sims contends on appeal, that our decision in Easter v. Powell clearly established Qualls's rights. In Easter, a case decided well before Qualls's death, we explained that a prisoner can show his clearly established rights under the Eighth Amendment were violated if a prison official 'refused to treat him, ignored his complaints, intentionally treated him incorrectly, or engaged in any similar conduct that would clearly evince a wanton disregard for any serious medical needs.'. . Easter's facts fit within that standard: 'offer[ing] no treatment options to a patient with a history of cardiac problems who was experiencing severe chest pains.'. . The officers in this case acted similarly to the prison official in Easter. As recounted above, the district court found material fact disputes over whether all three officers acted deliberately indifferent towards Qualls. That means a reasonable jury could conclude on the evidence at this stage that each officer knew Qualls had swallowed a bag full of drugs, vomited multiple times, screamed for help, pleaded to go to the hospital, and had steadily deteriorated since his arrival at the jail. Further, a reasonable jury could conclude that no officer sought medical assistance for Qualls. In other words, a reasonable jury could find that the officers each refused to treat Qualls, ignored his cries for help, and overall evinced a wanton disregard for Qualls's serious medical needs. The officers' three counter arguments do not persuade us otherwise. First, the officers argue that the record does not support that they refused to treat Qualls. We disagree. As we already explained, the district court found a genuine fact dispute over whether each officer knew Qualls had asked to go to the hospital, and no officer took him or otherwise sought medical assistance for him. But even if it were true that the officers didn't technically refuse to treat Qualls, it's also of little consequence. Even if a jury merely finds that the officers ignored Qualls's complaints or otherwise evinced a wanton disregard for his serious medical needs, then that would still be enough to support a violation of Qualls's rights. . . So whether the officers refused Qualls's requests, or merely disregarded them, makes no difference on this record. Second, the officers argue that the district court and Sims identify 'nothing more than the "broad general propositions" [we have] repeatedly held "are not enough to overcome qualified immunity."' But in the same breath the officers footnote their agreement that we have clearly established it violates a prisoner's rights if officials 'refused to treat him, ignored his complaints, intentionally treated him incorrectly, or engaged in similar conduct that would clearly evince a wanton disregard for serious medical need.' That's exactly what a reasonable jury could conclude on this record, and so this argument fails to persuade us. Third, the officers imply that Easter is distinguishable because the officers here monitored Qualls, provided him sustenance, spoke with him, cleaned him and his cell, and so on. But those facts aren't as helpful to the officers as they think. Prominently missing in this record are any facts suggesting the officers addressed Qualls's serious medical needs—what matters under Easter. . . More importantly, these facts capture in a nutshell why the officers aren't entitled to qualified immunity at this point. On this record and without considering genuineness, the officers had a front-row seat to Qualls's agonizing demise but did nothing to stop it. . . Our review at this stage is hemmed in. Perhaps the jury will discount Sims's evidence. . . Perhaps not. All we can say now is that (1) the fact disputes identified by the district court are material to Sims's deliberate indifference claims, and (2) our decision in Easter clearly established Qualls's rights before the officers allegedly violated them.")

Solis v. Serrett, 31 F.4th 975, 986-88 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Since May 2019, we have decided numerous cases with facts even more like this case than Trammell or Hanks, and we have repeatedly found no constitutional violation. . . . Although Tucker, Craig, and Betts were decided after the incident at issue here, they demonstrate that as of May 2019 the constitutional question at issue here was far from 'beyond debate.'. . Moreover, it is telling that in none of these cases did the court find a 'clearly established' right. If the law was not sufficiently clear to deny qualified immunity in these factual similarly cases, it follows that no 'clearly established' right exists here.")

Stokes v. Matranga, No. 21-30129, 2022 WL 1153125, at *3-4 (5th Cir. Apr. 19, 2022) (not reported) ("To overcome Sergeant Matranga's qualified immunity defense, Betancourt must show that Sergeant Matranga's conduct (1) violated a constitutional right and (2) that 'the right at issue was "clearly established" at the time of [the] alleged misconduct.'. . Courts may address either prong in the qualified immunity analysis or both. . . Here, we conclude that Sergeant Matranga is entitled to qualified immunity because his actions did not violate 'clearly established' law. . . . Even if an officer makes a warrantless arrest without probable cause, qualified immunity immunizes the officer from suit unless that 'officer had fair notice that [his] conduct was unlawful.'. . . Betancourt has not shown that Sergeant Matranga violated clearly established law. Louisiana's Terrorizing statute prohibits the (1) 'intentional communication' of (2) 'information that the commission of a crime of violence is imminent' with the (3) 'intent of causing members of the general public to be in sustained fear for their safety; or causing evacuation of a building ...; or causing other serious disruption to the general public.'. . At the time of the first arrest, Sergeant Matranga had seen a photo of Betancourt posing next to a caricature of himself labeled 'Future School Shooter.' Sergeant Matranga also knew that someone had posted the photo to social media and that parents of other students had called the school to express concerns or to ask about taking their kids out of school. Even assuming that Sergeant Matranga lacked actual probable cause, the court cannot conclude that every reasonable officer in his shoes would know that arresting Betancourt based on that information would violate the Fourth Amendment. So, too, with the second arrest. At that time, Sergeant Matranga had interviewed both Betancourt and the student who drew the caricature. In his interview, Betancourt told Sergeant Matranga about the circumstances of the photo and insisted that it was all just a joke. Betancourt argues that Sergeant Matranga had no evidence of criminal intent and therefore lacked probable cause. But even so, the court cannot conclude that every reasonable officer with that information would so conclude. More importantly, Betancourt does not even attempt to identify a single case where a court found that an officer violated the Fourth Amendment in similar circumstances. Nor has this court's research revealed any such case. It is not enough to merely invoke the general prohibition on arrests without probable cause. . . Thus, Betancourt has not satisfied his burden to overcome the qualified immunity defense. We AFFIRM.")

Stokes v. Matranga, No. 21-30129, 2022 WL 1153125, at *4, *8 (5th Cir. Apr. 19, 2022) (not reported) (Duncan, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. No reasonable officer, knowing what Sergeant Matranga knew, would have thought Lennon Betancourt was guilty of anything. Lennon's arrest was based on an obviously satiric photo (1) that Lennon didn't take, (2) that Lennon didn't post online, and (3) that grew out of a classroom prank Lennon's own teacher was in on. Matranga knew all that—and yet he arrested Lennon, clapped him in jail, and misled the district attorney into charging him with 'terrorizing,' a crime punishable by a $15,000 fine and 15 years in prison. Before these absurd charges were dropped, Lennon's mother had to hire a lawyer and Lennon was expelled from school. Qualified immunity does not protect the officer who orchestrated this outrageous clown show. . . . Nothing in the statute or the caselaw justified Matranga's belief that Lennon had committed terrorizing by allowing his photo to be taken in front a caricature of himself labeled 'Future School Shooter,' especially after he learned about the innocuous origins of the photo. . .In short, no reasonable officer would have concluded there was probable cause to arrest Lennon for terrorizing or for any other crime, especially after the officer learned facts dissipating any probable cause. I therefore respectfully dissent from the majority's holding that Sergeant Matranga is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Templeton v. Jarmillo, 28 F.4th 618, 623 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Templeton alleges he experienced pain in his shoulder from tight handcuffing that occurred over a matter of minutes. This allegation is insufficient to raise an excessive force claim. Disagreeing at least with the implications of the district court's analysis of Heitschmidt, we conclude it is no outlier. Far differently than the brief handcuffing in the present case, Heitschmidt was painfully handcuffed for over four hours, prevented from using the bathroom, and suffered 'serious and permanent' injury from the handcuffing. . . Those are not the allegations here. Facts matter in excessive force claims. Based on the alleged facts in the complaint, Templeton failed to state a claim that the officers violated his clearly established rights.")

Buehler v. Dear, 27 F.4th 969, 992-93 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Buehler asserts that the officers arrested him in retaliation for filming the officers in a public setting, an activity protected by the First Amendment's freedom-of-speech guarantee. The district court, relying on our 2017 decision in Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, . . . held that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity from Buehler's retaliation claim, since it was not clearly established at the time of his arrest in August 2015 that the right to publicly film police was protected by the First Amendment. The district court properly dismissed Buehler's First Amendment retaliation claim. Buehler is correct that the First Amendment guarantees, subject to reasonable limitations, a right to publicly film police. We are bound, however, by our holding in Turner (a published opinion) that the First Amendment right to film police was not clearly established in this circuit as of September 2015. . . And it follows a fortiori from Turner's holding that neither was such a right clearly established a month earlier. Buehler's First Amendment claims against the Officers thus cannot proceed.")

Bevill v. Fletcher, 26 F.4th 270, 279-81 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Defendants argue that the law was not clearly established that 'any person other than the ultimate decision-maker could be liable for First Amendment retaliatory termination,' until this court issued its opinion in Sims v. City of Madisonville, 894 F.3d 632 (5th Cir. 2018). According to Defendants, because their purported unconstitutional conduct occurred a year before this court issued the Sims decision, they are entitled to qualified immunity. The district court determined that Sims settled a question distinct from the one posed here—namely, whether a supervisor/coworker of the plaintiff can be held liable for influencing a final decisionmaker to terminate the plaintiff's employment. The district court went on to explain that another case, Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc), clearly established that Defendants were not unfettered by the First Amendment, long before Defendants allegedly retaliated against Bevill. . . . We agree with the district court that Sims settled the question whether a supervisor/coworker of the plaintiff can be held liable for First Amendment retaliation under § 1983 for influencing a final decisionmaker to terminate the plaintiff's employment. That question is distinct from the one posed here—whether a governmental official, not a supervisor/coworker of the plaintiff, can be held liable for First Amendment retaliation under § 1983 for influencing the plaintiff's employer to terminate the plaintiff's employment. . . .[T]he district court concluded that Sims was inapplicable because it dealt with 'retaliatory employment termination in the context of an employment relationship,' i.e., all parties were employed by the same governmental agency. The district court determined that Kinney instead controlled because it 'contemplated the situation in which a government [official], because of retaliatory animus, uses his or her position to influence a third-party employer to terminate one of its employees for exercising his or her First Amendment rights.' Applying Kinney, the district court concluded that Defendants 'had "fair warning" that allegedly using their respective government positions to violate Plaintiff's First Amendment rights would be objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law at the time.' We agree with the district court that Kinney controls.")

Bevill v. Fletcher, 26 F.4th 270, 284-85 (5th Cir. 2022) (Oldham, J., dissenting) ("All agree that Terry Bevill must overcome qualified immunity to sue these defendants for First Amendment retaliation. . . And all agree that Bevill cannot overcome qualified immunity unless 'the court [can] point to controlling authority—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority—that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.'. . The majority finds the requisite authority in Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 347 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc). Yet it takes the majority seven pages of writing—plus one page of elegant geometric diagramming—to explain how Kinney clearly established the right the defendants allegedly violated. . . And never mind that Sims v. City of Madisonville, 894 F.3d 632 (5th Cir. 2018), which we decided shortly after the events giving rise to this case, described the law in this area as 'confus[ed]' and 'unsettled' before trying to 'provide the overdue clarification.'. . Whatever one might think about qualified immunity, I think we're duty bound to say the law is not clearly established when it takes a full-page flow chart to hold otherwise. I respectfully dissent.")

Harmon v. City of Arlington, Texas, 16 F.4th 1159, 1164-67 & n.7 (5th Cir. 2021) ("The reasonableness inquiry is inherently factbound, making the video of this ten-second event critical. . . While Tran was waiting with Terry and Harmon, Terry abruptly rolled up the windows and reached for his keys. Tran immediately shouted 'hey, hey, hey, hey' and 'hey stop,' grabbed onto the SUV's passenger window, and stepped onto the running board (a narrow ledge at the base of the SUV doors designed to assist passengers climbing into the car). Ignoring Tran's commands to stop what he was doing, Terry started the car, put it in gear, and started to drive off—with Tran hanging onto the passenger window, perched on the narrow running board. Before Terry accelerated, Tran kept his pistol holstered. But about a second after the car lurched forward, Tran drew his pistol and shot Terry four times. That brief interval—when Tran is clinging to the accelerating SUV and draws his pistol on the driver—is what the court must consider to determine whether Tran reasonably believed he was at risk of serious physical harm. . . That belief was reasonable. . . Indeed, what came next illustrates the danger Tran faced. Several seconds after Tran shot Terry, while the SUV was still moving, Tran fell off the running board and into the busy street. . . Common sense confirms that falling off a moving car onto the street can result in serious physical injuries. Moreover, as Tran tumbled across the asphalt, the car's rear tires nearly overran his limbs. That this near miss occurred after Tran had shot Terry is of no moment; it confirms that Tran could reasonably perceive a serious threat of harm as Terry drove away with Tran holding onto the SUV. The plaintiffs attempt to refute that conclusion by arguing that being 'at' the side of a moving vehicle does not pose a threat of harm because 'the existence of the threat generally turns on whether the person is in the vehicle's path.' But Tran faced a different threat altogether. The threat of falling from a vehicle in motion is unrelated to whether Tran was in the vehicle's path. As a result, Terry's analogy to cases where officers were 'at' the vehicle's side, and not in its path, falls flat. The plaintiffs also contend that Tran could have simply stepped off the running board and let Terry drive away, the availability of that alternative, they argue, makes Tran's use of deadly force unreasonable. But qualified immunity precedent forbids that sort of Monday morning quarterbacking; the threat of harm must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . Heeding the Supreme Court's admonition, this court consistently rejects such arguments. . . .Significantly, the plaintiffs have cited no case in which a law enforcement officer, holding onto a suspect's car as it drove away, has been held to have used unconstitutionally excessive force to restrain the driver. In sum, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and drawing every reasonable inference in plaintiff's favor, Tran's use of deadly force was not excessive under the circumstances because he could reasonably apprehend serious physical harm to himself as an unwilling passenger on the side of Terry's fleeing vehicle. . . .Even if they could allege sufficient facts showing a constitutional violation, the plaintiffs do not show that Tran violated any 'clearly established' constitutional right. The burden here is heavy: A right is 'clearly established' only if preexisting precedent 'ha[s] placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . And, as the Supreme Court has repeatedly admonished lower courts, we must define that constitutional question with specificity. . . Indeed, '[t]he dispositive question is "whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established."'. . The specificity requirement assumes special significance in excessive force cases, where officers must make split-second decisions to use force. . . . To overcome qualified immunity, the law must be so clearly established that every reasonable officer in this factual context—an officer holding onto the side of a fleeing car where the driver has ignored instructions to stop—would have known he could not use deadly force. The plaintiffs here attempt to identify relevant, 'clearly established' law in only two cases: Lytle v. Bexar County, 560 F.3d 404 (5th Cir. 2009) and Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 105 S. Ct. 1694 (1985). But neither case clearly establishes squarely governing precedent. . . .The plaintiffs also attempt to extract, from Lytle and several out-of-circuit cases, . . . the principle that 'an officer lacks an objectively reasonable basis for believing his own safety is at risk—and therefore cannot use concerns about his own safety to justify deadly force—when he is not in the path of the vehicle.' That Lytle and those other cases do 'clearly establish' such a principle is dubious.[7] [fn. 7: The Supreme Court has repeatedly expressed uncertainty about whether circuit-level precedent is controlling for purposes of qualified immunity. See Dist. of Columbia v. Wesby, —— U.S. ——, 138 S. Ct. 577, 591 n.8 (2018*); Carroll v. Carman*, 574 U.S. 13, 17, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350 (2014); Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658, 665-66, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012).] Be that as it may, it has no bearing on this case. An officer standing at the side of a fleeing vehicle faces a different risk calculus than the officer clinging onto the side of a fleeing vehicle. Lytle and the other cases cannot put the constitutional question 'beyond debate.'. . . At most, Garner prohibits using deadly force against an unarmed burglary suspect fleeing on foot who poses no immediate threat. Viewing Garner through that narrower lens, as we must, reveals that Garner does little to establish law so that every reasonable officer in Tran's shoes would have known he could not use deadly force. Finally, the plaintiffs argue that this is an 'obvious' case under Garner, rendering it unnecessary to identify any particular case that puts the constitutional question beyond doubt. No doubt 'obvious' excessive force cases can arise. . . But they are so rare that the Supreme Court has never identified one in the context of excessive force. Because this officer faced an all too 'obvious' threat of harm, further speculation based on Garner is out of line. The clearly established inquiry is demanding, especially in claims for excessive force. . . Because the plaintiff must point to a case almost squarely on point, qualified immunity will protect 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . Here, the plaintiffs failed to identify any clearly established law that would place beyond doubt the constitutional question in this case, whether it is unreasonable for an officer to use deadly force when he has become an unwilling passenger on the side of a fleeing vehicle. As a result, their excessive force claims cannot succeed.")

Cope v. Cogdill, 3 F.4th 198, 204-10 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2573 (2022) ("We are bound by the restrictive analysis of 'clearly established' set forth in numerous Supreme Court precedents. . . .Supreme Court cases have been repeated and consistent on this high standard at the second prong. . . . It might seem that things changed with the recent opinion in Taylor v. Riojas, 141 S. Ct. 52 (2020) (per curiam). But, instead, that decision emphasizes the high standard. In Taylor, the Supreme Court vacated our grant of qualified immunity to a group of corrections officers for an alleged Eighth Amendment violation. . . But that was based upon the Supreme Court's conclusion of how 'particularly egregious' and over the top the misconduct at issue was . . . . Accordingly, under Taylor, plaintiffs are only excused of their obligation to identify an analogous case in 'extreme circumstances' where the constitutional violation is 'obvious.'. . . The first issue we address is whether Laws's failure to immediately intervene after Monroe strangled himself and decision to instead wait until another jailer arrived was constitutionally unlawful under clearly established law. Laws's decision not to enter Monroe's cell was in line with his training and the jail's policy that jailers not enter the cell until back up arrives. . . .We conclude that Laws's decision to wait for Brixey before entering the cell did not violate any clearly established constitutional right. Specifically, it would not be 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that' waiting for a backup officer to arrive in accordance with prison policy 'violates [a pretrial detainee's] right.'. . Since our case law supports that jailers who follow policies aimed at protecting the jailer should not be considered deliberately indifferent to an inmate's medical need, . . . Laws is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . But watching an inmate attempt suicide and failing to call for emergency medical assistance is not a reasonable response. This was especially true in the situation at hand, where jail policy did not permit Laws to personally enter the jail cell to assist Monroe until a second staff member arrived. Calling for emergency assistance was a precaution that Laws knew he should have taken, and failing to do so was both unreasonable and an effective disregard for the risk to Monroe's life. . . For these reasons, we now make clear that promptly failing to call for emergency assistance when a detainee faces a known, serious medical emergency—e.g., suffering from a suicide attempt—constitutes unconstitutional conduct. As explained above, in determining whether the law was clearly established at the time the conduct occurred, constitutional rights must not be defined at a high level of generality. . . Until today, we have not spoken directly on whether failing to call for emergency assistance in response to a serious threat to an inmate's life constitutes deliberate indifference. . . . Unlike the officers in Taylor, Laws did nothing so extreme or even close as forcing an inmate to sleep naked in raw sewage. . . The failings of Laws are in a time of minutes and lack of complete action, not days and affirmative misconduct. . . Accordingly, even though Laws fails on the first prong, he is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity.")

Cope v. Cogdill, 3 F.4th 198, 210-12 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2573 (2022) ("Here, Brixey had placed Monroe on a temporary suicide watch, and Cogdill was aware that Monroe had attempted suicide by hanging the day before. However, the record does not suggest that any inmate had previously attempted suicide by strangulation with a phone cord; nor is there non-speculative evidence that Brixey and Cogdill were aware of this danger. . . The danger posed by the phone cord was not as obvious as the dangers posed by bedding, which is a well-documented risk that has been frequently used in suicide attempts. . . We therefore conclude, under these facts and circumstances, that Brixey's and Cogdill's holding of Monroe in a cell containing a phone cord did not violate a clearly established constitutional right.[12] [fn.12 Recently, in Sanchez v. Oliver, we determined that summary judgment on the plaintiff's deliberate indifference claim was inappropriate where the defendant had placed a suicidal inmate 'in general population, with ready access to blankets, other potential ligatures, and tie-off points.'. . Sanchez did not involve the possible dangers of phone cords; hence, whatever its import, Sanchez did not hold that, at the time relevant for this case, it was clearly established that a defendant violates the Constitution by placing a suicidal inmate in a cell containing a phone cord. In short, Sanchez is not contrary to our conclusion here.] . . . . Cope also alleges that Brixey and Cogdill acted with deliberate indifference when they staffed the jail with just one jailer even though they knew both that Monroe was on suicide watch and that the jail's policy did not allow for the jailer to intervene until backup arrived. Coleman County employs only one weekend jailer due to budgetary constraints. Our precedent suggests that municipalities, not individuals, should generally be held liable for city policies. . . Thus, at the time of the suicide, no clearly established precedent suggested that Brixey and Cogdill could be liable under an episodic-acts theory for staffing the jail in line with Coleman County's budget and policies. Cope has cited no case law providing that jailers must deviate from the typical staffing procedures if they believe that a detainee is a suicide risk. We, therefore, hold that Brixey's and Cogdill's decision to staff only one weekend jailer did not violate any clearly established constitutional right.")

Cope v. Cogdill, 3 F.4th 198, 212, 215-220, 226-29 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2573 (2022) (Dennis, J., dissenting) ("Monroe's tragic death resulted not just from egregious acts and omissions by Coleman County Jail staff after he was taken into custody on September 29, 2017. The jail leadership's decision to implement policies that they knew to be inadequate also contributed to Monroe's avoidable suicide. In particular, the jail maintains only one jailer on duty during nights and weekends. But jail policy forbids a jailer from entering a cell without backup support. Thus, on nights and weekends, jail policy effectively prevents the lone jailer from rescuing a known suicidal detainee who is actively committing suicide inside a cell. . . . Detainee Monroe's death by his own hand with a thirty-inch cord in plain sight of a jailer while emergency medical services were on duty only five minutes away is especially tragic. In this interlocutory appeal from the district court's denial of qualified immunity, the legal questions for this court are (1) whether the acts and omissions of each of the defendants individually amounted to deliberate indifference and therefore violated Monroe's constitutional rights and (2) if so, whether Monroe's constitutional right to be free from each Defendants' deliberate indifference was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . In this case, Defendants were all aware of Laws's risk of suicide. Their responses to this known risk convince me that a reasonable jury could find that they each effectively disregarded the risk by acting in a manner that they knew or believed was likely inadequate in light of the circumstances. . . . [V]iewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs and making all reasonable inferences in their favor—as we must in this appeal—the officers violated clearly established law. It should be for a jury to decide the factual question of whether Defendants 'responded reasonably' to the grave and urgent situation and thus were deliberately indifferent to the risk of suicide. . . Departing from longstanding and binding precedent, the majority erroneously grants the officers' qualified immunity defense by embracing an excessively narrow definition of the clearly established rights at issue and the risk of harm Monroe faced. Because I would follow our court's deliberate-indifference caselaw and affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity on several of Plaintiffs' claims, I respectfully dissent. . . . Given that the focus of a deliberate-indifference claim is on the jailer's subjective knowledge and intent, it is apparent that, in the uniquely extreme and consequential circumstance where a jail official is aware of a prisoner's risk of suicide but 'effectively disregards' that risk, the jailer has violated clearly established law. . . Put another way, it is always clearly, objectively unreasonable for a jail official to intentionally disregard a known suicide risk. Therefore, in this context—deliberate indifference by a jailer who knows that a detainee in his custody and care is at risk of suicide—establishing prong one of the qualified-immunity test necessarily satisfies the demands of prong two. A showing that a jailer violated the Fourteenth Amendment by being deliberately indifferent to a known suicide risk is necessarily also a showing that the official's conduct was 'objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law.'. . Put simply, the two prongs of the qualified-immunity test merge in this specific situation. . . . There is no need for a prior case to put an officer on notice that a situation presents a risk of inmate suicide or that a particular sort of response is unreasonable because, by the very nature of a deliberate-indifference claim, the officer must actually know both of these things in order for a constitutional violation to occur. . . In sum, if an officer faced with the greatest possible risk—the loss of a human life that an officer is charged with protecting—intentionally disregards that known risk by either failing to act or acting in a manner that is so clearly inadequate as to permit the inference that the officer knew or believed that his 'response' was substantially likely to be ineffectual but did not care, the officer's conduct contravenes clearly established law. The majority asserts, however, that the determination that a jailer effectively disregarded a prisoner's known risk of suicide is not sufficient to satisfy the strictures of the qualified-immunity analysis. Their conclusion rests on two errors in the qualified-immunity analysis. First, the majority takes an incredibly narrow approach to defining the clearly established right at issue, claiming that the right must be defined much more specifically than simply the right of a suicidal detainee to be free from a deliberately indifferent response by officers charged with his supervision. Second, having defined the clearly established right in an overly narrow manner, the majority requires in effect that Plaintiffs point to a case with virtually identical facts to prove that this excessively narrow description of the right has been clearly established. . . Both of these propositions are contrary to what our precedent in the detainee-suicide context demands. . . . Though the majority cites Taylor, it fails to absorb and apply the case's lesson. In the majority's view, because the conduct of Defendants here was not as extreme as that of the guards in Taylor, the Supreme Court's decision is inapplicable. . . But this essentially repeats the very same analytical error this court made in Taylor and which the Supreme Court found necessary to correct. Rather than asking only whether the facts here are closely analogous to Taylor and thus if there exists an on-point precedent—which is essentially the majority's analysis—Taylor teaches that the proper qualified-immunity inquiry must also ask whether the violation was so obvious that 'any reasonable officer should have realized that' their conduct 'offended the Constitution.'. . And because, as discussed above, deliberate indifference by an officer in the face of an inmate's known risk of suicide is always objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law, such a violation will necessarily be 'obvious' in that 'any reasonable officer should have realized that' their conduct 'offended the Constitution.'. . Where the violation at issue is intentionally disregarding a known suicide risk, this standard is clearly met. In sum, in the deeply alarming circumstance where a detainee is known by jail officials to be at risk of suicide, a response by those officials that deliberately 'effectively disregards' that risk violates clearly established law in a manner that should be clear to all reasonable officers. . . Such facts would thus defeat qualified immunity if proven. . .For the reasons outlined below, a reasonable jury could infer that Laws was deliberately indifferent by failing promptly to contact emergency services once Monroe had begun actively choking himself and Cogdill and Brixey were likewise deliberately indifferent for housing Monroe by himself in a cell with a lengthy phone cord. . . . Cogdill and Brixey adhered to a policy of maintaining just one jailer on duty even when a suicidal detainee was in the jail's custody, despite knowing that this policy was unsafe, and instead of transferring suicidal detainees to better equipped facilities or keeping a second jailer on duty—policies that they knew were available to them. A jury could determine that the supervisors' were deliberately indifferent based on their 'failure to adopt [ ] polic[ies]' when they knew—as any reasonable jailer would know—that the consequence of not implementing these policies was likely to be an in-custody suicide. . . . To summarize, Cogdill and Brixey chose to house Monroe, who they knew was a suicide risk, alone in a cell with a thirty-inch long phone cord despite (1) their training, which generally advised against housing suicidal prisoners by themselves; (2) their knowledge that there were other, safer facilities to house Monroe and that they had a duty to relocate him if their jail could not adequately protect Monroe; (3) the risk posed by the lengthy cord, which was both obvious and a specific risk that a jury could infer that the officials were made aware of by the Texas Jail Commission. Considering this evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs and drawing all reasonable inferences in their favor, a juror could conclude that Cogdill and Brixey knew or believed that their response to Monroe's risk of suicide was deficient and therefore possessed a 'state of mind more blameworthy than lack of due care.'. . Put differently, one could conclude that the officers 'effectively disregarded' the risk of harm to Monroe. . . Plaintiffs have thus raised material questions as to whether each officer independently was deliberately indifferent and, as explained above, have therefore also established a violation of clearly established law. . . . Qualified immunity is not the judicial equivalent of the Armor of Achilles, an impenetrable shield that governmental actors can wield to insulate themselves from liability no matter how flagrant their conduct. As the Supreme Court has recently reminded this court, qualified immunity vanishes where an official's action or inaction so obviously violates the Constitution that 'any reasonable officer should have realized' the unlawfulness of the conduct. .

. And 'any reasonable officer' would know that it offends the Constitution to be deliberately indifferent to a detainee's known risk of suicide. Taking the facts and inferences in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, a reasonable juror could conclude that the officers here responded with deliberate indifference to the risk that pretrial detainee Derrek Monroe would commit suicide, and therefore the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. It should be left to a jury to weigh the competing evidence and resolve the factual disputes, most particularly Defendants' subjective states of mind. Instead, today's majority ends all claims against all officers by erroneously granting them qualified immunity. Because the majority misapprehends decades of clearly established law and denies Plaintiffs the jury trial to which they are entitled, I respectfully dissent.")

J.W. v. Paley, 860 F. App'x 926, ___ (5th Cir. 2021) ("This is a suit against a school resource officer for tasing a special education student who was trying to leave the school after engaging in disruptive behavior. The district court denied summary judgment based on its conclusion that the facts, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, supported a finding of excessive force under a Fourth Amendment analysis. Although some of our cases have applied the Fourth Amendment to school official's use of force, other cases have held that such claims cannot be brought. That divide in our authority is the antithesis of clearly established law supporting the existence of Fourth Amendment claims in this context. As a result, the defendant prevails on his qualified immunity defense. . . . A plaintiff can overcome an official's qualified immunity if he can show '(1) that the official violated a statutory or constitutional right, and (2) that the right was "clearly established" at the time of the challenged conduct.'. . Courts can choose which of these elements to address first. . . We resolve this case on the second ground because our law does not clearly establish a student's Fourth Amendment claim against school officials. We start with an issue on which our law is quite clear even if it is at odds with the law in in other circuits: students cannot assert substantive due process claims against school officials based on disciplinary actions. See Fee v. Herndon, 900 F.2d 804 (5th Cir. 1990). . . . Fee has been criticized, . . . but remans binding in our circuit, T.O. v. Fort Bend Ind. Sch. Dist., -- F.3d --, 2021 WL 2461233, at *2-3 (June 17, 2021). What about the Fourth Amendment right J.W. asserts? Perhaps the rejection of a substantive due process right does not also doom the more specific right to be free from unreasonable seizures. . . . And the Fourth Amendment's companion right to be free from unreasonable searches applies in schools, though its protections are lessened to account for pedagogical interests. . . J.W. can find some support in our caselaw for his Fourth Amendment claim. In a case dealing with a student's claim of excessive detention (though not excessive force), we said that the Fourth Amendment 'right extends to seizures by or at the direction of school officials.' Hassan v. Lubbock Indep. Sch. Dist., 55 F.3d 1075, 1079 (5th Cir. 1995). . . . The problem for J.W. is that at least one decision from our court, albeit an unpublished one, rejected the notion of Fourth Amendment claims based on school discipline. We reasoned that allowing a Fourth Amendment challenge to a teacher's choking a student would 'eviscerate this circuit's rule against prohibiting substantive due process claims' based on the same conduct. Flores v. Sch. Bd. of DeSoto Par., 116 F. App'x 504, 510 (5th Cir. 2004) (unpublished). The even bigger obstacle to J.W.'s claim may be Fee's comment, though the case did not involve a Fourth Amendment claim, that 'the paddling of recalcitrant students does not constitute a [F]ourth [A]mendment search or seizure.' 900 F.2d at 810. The upshot is that our law is, at best for Paley, inconsistent on whether a student has a Fourth Amendment right to be free of excessive disciplinary force applied by school officials. That does not make for either the 'controlling authority' or 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' needed to show a right is clearly established. . . The best case for J.W., and the one the district court understandably relied on, is Curran. Although that case did allow a Fourth Amendment claim against a school resource officer to get past summary judgment, the defendant had not argued that a student's Fourth Amendment claim was at odds with Fee. As qualified immunity is an affirmative defense, . . . the officer's failure to assert immunity on the grounds that students cannot bring Fourth Amendment excessive force claims meant the question was not squarely before the court. Citing many of the cases we have just discussed, our court recently held that a plaintiff could not identify a clearly established Fourth Amendment right against school officials' use of excessive force. See T.O., 2021 WL 2461233, at * 4. That conclusion renders Paley immune from the Fourth Amendment claim asserted in this case.")

T.O. v. Fort Bend ISD, 2 F.4th 407, 415-16 (5th Cir. 2021) ("This court has not conclusively determined whether the momentary use of force by a teacher against a student constitutes a Fourth Amendment seizure. We have rejected Fourth Amendment claims brought by a student who was choked by a teacher on the basis that allowing such claims to proceed would 'eviscerate this circuit's rule against prohibiting substantive due process claims' stemming from the same injuries. But we have also noted that the claims of excessive force and unlawful arrest against other school officials 'are properly analyzed under the Fourth Amendment.' In light of this inconsistency in our caselaw, we cannot say that it was clearly established, at the time of the incident, that Abbott's actions were illegal under the Fourth Amendment. Plaintiffs-Appellants unpersuasively attempt to avoid this outcome by suggesting that Fee has been abrogated by Knick v. Township of Scott and Kingsley v. Hendrickson. Not so. Knick concerns Fifth Amendment Takings claims, and Kingsley concerns excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees—circumstances markedly distinguishable from substantive due process claims brought in an educational context. In any event, Knick was decided after the offending incident in this case, and Kingsley has never been interpreted by this court as altering the law in the manner Plaintiffs-Appellants suggest. Even if these cases do call Fee's validity into question, they would not have been sufficient to put Abbott on notice of the illegality of her conduct at the time of the incident. To defeat a claim of qualified immunity, the illegality of the conduct must be 'clearly established' at the time it took place. It is certainly true that '[b]y now, every school teacher ... must know that inflicting pain on a student ... violates that student's constitutional right to bodily integrity.' But, for more than thirty years, the law of this circuit has clearly protected disciplinary corporal punishment from constitutional scrutiny. Neither Knick nor Kingsley permits us to deviate from out established precedent in this regard." footnotes omitted)

Aguirre v. City of San Antonio, 995 F.3d 395, 411-21 (5th Cir. 2021) ("To summarize, the first Graham factor—the severity of any crime of which Aguirre was suspected—weighs in favor of it being unreasonable and excessive for the Officers to hold Aguirre in the dangerous maximal-restraint position for five and a half minutes, and there are at very least genuine disputes as to the second two Graham factors—whether Aguirre posed a safety threat to Officers or others or was resisting the Officer's efforts to remove him from the highway and hold him safely until the police wagon arrived. These disputes as to material facts alone are enough to preclude a finding at summary judgment that the force used by the Officers in holding Aguirre in a hog-tie like position was constitutionally reasonable, for, under Graham and its progeny, it is unreasonable for an officer to use injurious force against a non-resisting, non-dangerous individual who is not suspected of a serious crime, which we must assume occurred here under Aguirre's version of events. . . This is especially so when the force is applied after the suspect has been restrained and subdued, as may have been the case here. . . Indeed, several of our sister circuits have specifically applied these basic principles in cases involving maximal restraint techniques like the one the Officers employed against Aguirre. . . However, Plaintiffs also contend the Officers' use of force was excessive for a second reason: it amounted to the unconstitutional use of deadly force. . . . Claims that law enforcement unreasonably utilized deadly force are treated as a special subset of excessive force claims. . . The Supreme Court held in Scott that there is no 'magical on/off switch that triggers rigid preconditions whenever an officer's actions constitute "deadly force,"' and such claims are broadly analyzed under the same general rubric of 'reasonableness' as other excessive force claims. . . At bottom, the Court held, a Fourth Amendment challenge to deadly force still calls for a 'balanc[ing of the] nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against the importance of the governmental interests alleged to justify the intrusion.'. . Nevertheless, we have long held that the use of 'deadly force' is unreasonable where the officer does not have 'probable cause to believe that the suspect pose[d] a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others,'. . . and we know of no case that has departed from this basic principle. . . And, although '[l]ower courts ... have struggled with whether to characterize various police tools and instruments as "deadly force,"' this court defines deadly force as force that 'creates a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury.'. . .As discussed above, . . the record at the very least reflects a genuine dispute of fact as to whether Aguirre was resisting or otherwise posed a threat of serious physical injury to the Officers or others so as to make the use of the prone maximal-restraint position necessary or potentially reasonable. These same factual disputes, relevant to whether the force was generally excessive to the situation, also preclude summary judgment under our case law's 'deadly force' analysis. . . These facts are material because, if a jury concludes that the Officers had reason to believe Aguirre was on drugs and that he posed no threat of serious bodily harm at the time the Officers used the maximal restraint position against him, the Plaintiffs will have established that the Officers violated Aguirre's constitutional right to be free from the unreasonable use of deadly force. . . In sum, facts material to whether the Officers violated Aguirre's Fourth Amendment rights are genuinely disputed. The lack of visible resistance by Aguirre, the presence of numerous Officers surrounding him, and the fact that the Officers had already blocked off several lanes and caused traffic to slow significantly all weigh against the inference of any immediate safety threat or other need that would justify placing Aguirre in the prone maximal-restraint position. '[A] jury could conclude that no reasonable officer would have perceived [Aguirre] as posing an immediate threat to the officers' [or his own or the public's] safety,'. . . meaning that the Officers' use of what may have amounted to deadly force was necessarily excessive of any need to mitigate a public safety threat. Likewise, 'a jury could conclude that no reasonable officer on the scene would have thought that [Aguirre] was resisting arrest,'. . . meaning that the use of force far exceeded the amount necessary to effect Aguirre's arrest or ensure his safety. Although the Officers presented their own version of events that included claims of Aguirre's resistance—including, for example that he 'was resisting and trying to pull away from' the Officers while walking near the westbound side of the median, 'was still resisting' when placed on the hood of the car, and 'continued to resist by shifting his body around and trying to break free' while pinned against the hood of the patrol car—these averments in contravention of what the police dashcam videos show do no more than reinforce that genuine disputes as to material facts exist at this stage of the litigation. . . . As set out below, I conclude that this court's precedents demonstrate that, if they indeed employed excessive and deadly force in the specific manner that Plaintiffs contend they did, the Officers had '"fair warning" that their conduct was unconstitutional.'. . '[I]n an obvious case, the Graham excessive-force factors themselves can clearly establish the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'. . . It has long been clearly established that, when a suspect is not resisting, it is unreasonable for an officer to apply unnecessary, injurious force against a restrained individual, even if the person had previously not followed commands or initially resisted the seizure. . . Indeed, at least five other circuits have held that, even in the absence of a previous case with similar facts, 'it [is] clearly established ... that exerting significant, continued force on a person's back while that person is in a face-down prone position after being subdued and/or incapacitated constitutes excessive force.' [collecting cases] As discussed, 'a jury could conclude that no reasonable officer would have perceived [Aguirre] as posing an immediate threat to the [O]fficers' safety or thought that he was resisting arrest.'. . Thus, if the Officers unnecessarily placed Aguirre in the maximal-restraint position when there was no reason to believe he had committed a serious crime, that he posed a continuing threat to the Officers or public safety, or that he was resisting the Officers' seizure or holding of him, the Officers violated Aguirre's clearly established constitutional rights. . . But I need not rely solely on the Graham factors to find a violation of clearly established law. Plaintiffs' claim that the Officers unconstitutionally employed deadly force in the absence of any threat of death or serious injury to the Officers or the public presents facts very similar to those found in Gutierrez v. City of San Antonio, 139 F.3d 441 (5th Cir. 1998). . . . As this court held in Gutierrez in 1998, it is clearly established that the use of hog-tie-like restraint may amount to deadly force 'in a limited set of circumstances'–that is, when employed against an individual who a reasonable officer would have cause to know is 'a drug-affected person in a state of excited delirium'—and there is a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of such deadly force when there is no probable cause to believe the force is necessary to ameliorate a threat of death or serious bodily injury. . . I recognize that this court has distinguished Gutierrez in factual scenarios different from the case at bar. In Hill v. Carroll County, for example, this court stated that 'Gutierrez does not hold four-point restraint a per se unconstitutionally excessive use of force, nor does it extend beyond its facts as a mirror of the then-unchallenged San Diego Study' on which the Plaintiffs relied in Gutierrez. . . Instead, according to this court in Hill, 'neither the San Diego Study nor Gutierrez raises a triable fact issue in this case where there is no evidence of drug abuse or drug-induced psychosis.'. . But this goes not to the question of whether the law against the use of deadly force was clearly established, but rather to whether the use of a hog-tie under those circumstances constituted deadly force—an issue we have held is a question for the jury that is based on the evidence in the case. . . Hill therefore simply addressed the plaintiffs' failure to introduce evidence that a reasonable officer would have known that placing the individual in a hog-tie like position posed a risk of death or serious bodily injury, and it does not weigh against the conclusion that, when the evidence shows that the use of a hog-tie-like position does meet this test—and thus meets the constitutional standard for deadly force—the right to be free from such force when it is not reasonable or necessary is clearly established. Here, of course, unlike in Hill, the Plaintiffs point to evidence that Aguirre suffered from drug abuse and drug-induced psychosis and that a reasonable officer would have known this, including from his erratic conduct that actually lead the Officers to believe he was under the influence of drugs and from his blue lips and the fresh needle marks that the Officers noticed on his arms. . . And, as discussed in detail . . . the Plaintiffs introduced a wealth of evidence from which a reasonable juror could conclude that the use of a hog-tie-like position in these circumstances was deadly force, including the opinion of a medical expert and a Department of Justice bulletin addressing the dangers of positional asphyxia when the maximally prone restraint position is used on detainees who suffer from 'cocaine-induced excited delirium.' Hill is therefore inapposite. . . . Though the facts here are not identical to Gutierrez, we need not find the facts to be precisely the same as a previous case to hold that the Officers would have had 'fair warning' that their handling of Aguirre was dangerous, unnecessary, and unconstitutional under the circumstances. . . The central holding in Gutierrez remains intact: 'hog-tying may present a substantial risk of death or serious bodily harm ... in a limited set of circumstances—i.e., when a drug-affected person in a state of excited delirium is hog-tied and placed face down in a prone position.'. . And, as already established, a reasonable jury could conclude that the maximal prone restraint position was tantamount to and as dangerous as a hog-tie. I therefore conclude Aguirre's right to be free from this position under the facts we must accept here—where he was not resisting, posed no immediate safety threat, and was presenting reasons to believe he was on drugs and in a drug-induced psychosis—was clearly established at the time of the incident. Based on the foregoing, the Officers who participated in bringing Aguirre to the ground and restraining him in the prone maximal-restraint position—Officers Gonzales, Mendez, Morgan, and Arredondo—are not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity because genuine disputes exist regarding whether they violated Aguirre's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . .Notwithstanding the foregoing, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on the Plaintiffs' deliberate indifference claims. Unlike our inquiry into whether officers used excessive force, which judges '[t]he "reasonableness of a particular use of force ... from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene,'. . . and our qualified immunity analysis, which asks whether '[t]he contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right,'. . . the Fourteenth Amendment's deliberate indifference inquiry turns on law enforcement officials' 'subjective knowledge.'. . Law enforcement officials violate an arrestee's Fourteenth Amendment due process rights when they have 'subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm to a pretrial detainee but respond[ ] with deliberate indifference to that risk.'. . Negligence or even gross negligence is not enough: the officials must have had actual knowledge of the substantial risk. . . .On appeal, Plaintiffs do not even claim, much less offer evidence to demonstrate, that any of the Officers were actually aware that Aguirre was losing consciousness or otherwise in danger. The Officers have consistently asserted, and the video evidence does not otherwise indicate, that none of them knew Aguirre was in medical distress until he became unresponsive. They stated that he continued to talk, yell, and move his head while on the ground, so they believed he was able to breathe. The Officers testified that they believed Aguirre's groaning and discolored lips were due to heavy drug use, not asphyxiation, and Plaintiffs do not offer evidence to dispute these accounts. Even if these asserted beliefs were unreasonable and their actions contrary to what they should have known from their training, that can only at most establish gross negligence, not the required deliberate indifference. Because Plaintiffs do not cite to, and we have not identified, any evidence that the Defendant officers were aware that Aguirre was in danger until he became unresponsive, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on this claim. Once the Officers realized Aguirre was unresponsive, however, there was a delay of several minutes before effective CPR was administered. Plaintiffs claim that Defendants were deliberately indifferent to Aguirre's serious medical needs by delaying CPR once they assessed that he was not breathing. Plaintiffs' medical expert points out that '[t]here appears to be a delay of approximately 4 minutes and 30 seconds from the time the SAPD officers turn ... Aguirre on his back to when functional CPR started,' and that there was a mere 'half hearted attempt at a few chest compressions' within three minutes of turning Aguirre over and seeing he was unresponsive, but effective CPR was not started for four and a half minutes. Delay of medical care can result in liability where there has been deliberate indifference, in that the officers were subjectively aware of the risk of serious harm but disregarded it. . . . But Plaintiffs have not established that the Officers were deliberately indifferent to the risk to Aguirre's health after they discovered he was no longer breathing. This is not a case where the Officers elected to do nothing in response to a known health risk. . . The videos illustrate, and Plaintiffs do not contest, that once the Officers discovered Aguirre was unresponsive, they flipped him over, unhandcuffed him, and Officer Juarez, the medic on the scene, went to retrieve his medical equipment. Juarez can be seen in the videos jogging to the trunk of his car to get medical equipment, returning just over a minute later. Approximately one minute after he returned, Officer Mendez performed a sternum rub, and approximately another minute thereafter, the Officers began full CPR, with continuous chest compressions until EMS arrived. While these measures may have been inadequate, Plaintiffs do not present any evidence that the Officers knew they were insufficient and intentionally failed to do more out of indifference to Aguirre's well-being. Plaintiffs point to the Officers demeanor in the dashcam video, arguing that their smiling and laughing suggests that they did not care about the obvious risk to Aguirre's health. However, the video depicts this behavior before Juarez's initial efforts to revive Aguirre were unsuccessful. The Officers quickly took on a sober aspect as Aguirre remained unresponsive, which suggests their initial manner was the result of subjective unawareness of the risk rather than knowledge of the risk and a deliberate choice not to take any precautions against the realization of the danger's fatal consequences. To be sure, we do not condone the Officers light-hearted attitudes, and it may well have been objectively unreasonable for them to have been ignorant of the serious threat to Aguirre's health. But gross negligence on the part of the Officers is not sufficient to establish the kind of subjective, deliberate indifference that must be demonstrated to establish a Due Process violation. . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's finding of qualified immunity on these claims.")

Aguirre v. City of San Antonio, 995 F.3d 395, 423-24 (5th Cir. 2021) (Jolly, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The question here is excessive force, vel non. The force applied to subdue Aguirre cannot be properly evaluated without an appreciation of the context: a busy highway, cars at high speeds, and a suspect wandering in and out of lanes of traffic. During the event, a wreck occurred nearby. And once Aguirre was apprehended and placed on the hood of a police car, he attempted to break away from the officers in the midst of the traffic. In short, the context could hardly have been more tense, fast-moving, and dangerous. Because I view these facts differently from Judge Dennis, I believe that the restraint the officers employed was initially a justified use of force. This force may have even been justified for a brief period after Aguirre was thrown to the ground: to me, the video indicates that Aguirre may have continued resisting for a bit. But there is a good deal that is going on that has not been captured by the camera and cannot clearly be discerned. After about three minutes, however, Aguirre was surrounded by nine officers, only three of whom were restraining him—and by that point, he does not appear to be resisting much, if at all. Multiple officers are seen mulling around. So it would appear that, with the additional surveilling officers, the need for the extreme restraint may have lessened. Despite this change, the officers continued to apply the maximal restraint position for another two minutes. For those two minutes, there is a material factual dispute as to whether the restraint continued to be necessary to keep Aguirre from fleeing, given the number of officers available to prevent Aguirre from bolting into traffic. This disputed issue of fact requires a full airing of all the evidence before a fact-finder. Were a jury to find that the restraint used became, at some point, unnecessary to keep Aguirre from escaping into traffic, continuing this restraint against this particular person with some known health risks would constitute excessive force as a matter of law because an objective, reasonable officer would know that such force would not constitute a measured, appropriate degree of force. . . Excessive force is unreasonable; unreasonable force, unconstitutional. Furthermore, if a jury concludes that the restraint was unnecessary, it would have been 'obvious' to a reasonable officer that the use of such a severe tactic against this particular person would be constitutionally proscribed, and he would have no recourse to qualified immunity. See Taylor v. Riojas, —– U.S. ——–, 141 S. Ct. 52, 52–54, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020). I therefore concur with the result reached.")

Aguirre v. City of San Antonio, 995 F.3d 395, 424-25 (5th Cir. 2021) (Higginson, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I write separately only as to our reversal of the district court's grant of summary judgement on qualified immunity grounds with respect to the plaintiffs' excessive force claims. I concur on the narrow ground that our court's clearly established law, though lacking clarity in some respects, had converged by spring of 2013 to stand at least for the proposition that police officers use constitutionally excessive force when they put a handcuffed arrestee, no longer resisting or posing a safety threat to himself or others, and whom the officers observed in an excited state of delirium and suspected to have ingested drugs, on the ground, face down in an asphyxial position, i.e., pulling back his leg and arms into prone restraint, and simultaneously apply vertical pressure to such a prone, immobile arrestee for sufficient time to see his lips turn blue and his breathing stop. Put otherwise, our caselaw had converged by spring 2013 around the clearly established proposition that while such an initial restraint is not per se unconstitutional, the continued application of asphyxiating force may be unreasonable where there is no ongoing threat posed by the suspect. . .Of course, this evidence of police suffocation of a restrained, prone suspect is in the light most favorable to plaintiffs. One or more circumstance may prove untrue whereupon qualified immunity may attach.")

Brown v. Tarrant County, Texas, 985 F.3d 489, 496-97 (5th Cir. 2021) ("[W]hen the question is pitched at the right level of specificity, Anderson's actions do not appear 'objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law ... at the time the defendant acted.'. . The sole relevant act Brown attributes to Anderson is signing the MOU or otherwise agreeing to confine him. But, as Anderson aptly explains, he had solid reason to believe that Brown's confinement in the Cold Springs Jail was lawful under Brown's commitment order, the SVPA, and the MOU. Moreover, at the time of the confinement, the Supreme Court had 'repeatedly upheld civil commitment laws' similar to Texas' SVPA against various constitutional challenges, as the district court pointed out. . . And, as we noted in our 2018 opinion, the Texas Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the original SVPA in 2005. . . Brown does not point to any authority that would have alerted Anderson to the unconstitutionality of Brown's confinement. . . Because 'it cannot be said that all reasonable sheriffs would recognize the unconstitutionality of [Anderson]'s supervisory or personal acts or omissions,'. . . Anderson's acts were not objectively unreasonable. Anderson is therefore entitled to qualified immunity, as the district court correctly concluded.")

Cunningham v. Castloo, 983 F.3d 185, 193-94 (5th Cir. 2020) ("The district court's reliance on broad pronouncements from Constantineau and Bledsoe evinces a methodological error: It defined clearly established law too generally for any controlling relevance in this case. Courts must 'frame the constitutional question with specificity and granularity.'. . The district court did not do that. Instead, the district court appears to have asked whether, generally, the procedural-due-process right to a name-clearing hearing was clearly established. That wording is the wrong way to frame the question, as the Supreme Court repeatedly has told us. . . 'The dispositive question,' we emphasize, is whether 'the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . The answer here is no. To further explain that compact response, we begin by describing the particular conduct for which Cunningham seeks to hold Sheriff Castloo liable. . . Sheriff Castloo's subordinates—Chief Deputy Sanders, Lieutenant Burge, and Captain Holland—met with Cunningham and fired her for 'improper use of chain of command and lying,' without further explanation. In response, Cunningham asked 'to speak with the Sheriff,' but Sheriff Castloo's subordinates did not 'allow' her to do so. Sheriff Castloo was not present at the meeting, and there is no evidence that he instructed his subordinates to deny Cunningham's request 'to speak with' him. . . Having first described Sheriff Castloo's particular conduct, as reflected by the summary-judgment record and viewed in Cunningham's favor, we now ask whether the 'violative nature,' vis-à-vis the Constitution, was clearly established. . . We conclude that it was not. . . Specifically, the law was not clearly established that Cunningham's request 'to speak with' Sheriff Castloo constituted a request for a name-clearing hearing in the context of our 'stigma-plus-infringement' test, such that denying the request would amount to a procedural-due-process violation. Our cases are quite unclear, even confusing, on what constitutes a request for a name-clearing hearing. . . What is clear, however, is that none of our cases—and certainly none from the Supreme Court—holds that an employee requests a name-clearing hearing, triggering procedural-due-process protections, when she asks only 'to speak with' her boss in the context of her discharge. Of importance, granting Cunningham's request 'to speak with' Sheriff Castloo would not have provided Cunningham a 'public forum' of any sort; it would have resulted only in a private audience with Sheriff Castloo. . . . All told, Cunningham has failed to cite 'adequate authority at a sufficiently high level of specificity' to put Sheriff Castloo 'on notice that his conduct is definitively unlawful.'. .She therefore failed to satisfy her burden of defeating Sheriff Castloo's claim of qualified immunity. Sheriff Castloo is entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court erred in denying that defense.")

Estate of Bonilla by & through Bonilla v. Orange County, Texas, 982 F.3d 298, 307 (5th Cir. 2020) ("The more specific rights that Plaintiffs claim for Bonilla lack adequate support in the case law to be 'clearly established.' For instance, Plaintiffs identify no cases establishing a clear constitutional right to adequate suicide screening or to screening only by medical professionals. In Taylor v. Barkes, a case involving a factually similar instance of suicide by a pretrial detainee, the Supreme Court observed: 'No decision of this Court establishes a right to the proper implementation of adequate suicide prevention protocols. No decision of this Court even discusses suicide screening or prevention protocols.'. . The Supreme Court has not revisited Taylor. Further, since no 'robust consensus of cases' has developed within this circuit on the issue of suicide screening, there is no basis for asserting such a 'right' is clearly established. . .Similarly, Plaintiffs identify no cases establishing that adequate medical care requires the distribution of prescription narcotics to an inmate within hours of her intake.")

Cotropia v. Chapman, 978 F.3d 282, 287-88 (5th Cir. 2020) ("As Chapman concedes, "Zadeh already contains the very holding Cotropia asks the Court to announce in accordance with this constitutional analysis.' Chapman thus violated Cotropia's constitutional rights when she copied documents in Cotropia's office without any precompliance review of the administrative subpoena. . . With the first prong satisfied, we address whether Cotropia's right to precompliance review was clearly established at the time of the search. In Zadeh, even though we concluded that the TMB's subpoena authority for searching pain management clinics was unconstitutional, we could not conclude that 'every reasonable official prior to conducting a search under the circumstances of this case would know this Burger factor was not satisfied.'. . Zadeh was issued in 2019; Chapman searched Cotropia's office in 2015. Thus, at that time, it was not clearly established that her search per §§ 153.007(a), 168.052, 179.4(a), and 195.3 was unconstitutional. Cotropia seeks to avoid that conclusion by differentiating Zadeh in several respects. . . Cotropia tries to distinguish Zadeh by reasoning that, unlike the office in Zadeh, Cotropia's office was 'undisputedly not a [PMC].' Because 'it was clearly established at the time of this search that the medical profession as a whole is not a closely regulated industry,'. . Cotropia contends that '[e]very reasonable officer should have known that the closely regulated industry exception did not apply to the instant search of Cotropia's office.'. .Cotropia is correct that his office was not registered as a PMC. The statute that provided the TMB authority to search Cotropia's documents, however, gives the TMB authority to investigate not only 'a [PMC] certified under this chapter' but also 'a physician who owns or operates a clinic in the same manner as other complaints under this subtitle.'. . For instance, in Zadeh, . . . the relevant clinic was not required to be registered as a PMC for an officer reasonably to have relied on the regulatory scheme relevant to PMCs. It is thus irrelevant whether Cotropia registered his office as a PMC. The question, instead, is whether Chapman was investigating a complaint that Cotropia was operating his clinic in the same manner as a PMC. . . The record provides ample evidence that could lead a reasonable officer to believe that Cotropia operated New Concept in the same manner as a PMC. The TMB received allegations that Cotropia was operating an unregistered PMC. Cotropia, by his own admission, prescribed opioids through March 20, 2015, and previously had operated an unregistered PMC. His practice involved the care of patients whom he had taken over from Tommy Swate, whose medical license was revoked in 2014 for improper treatment of chronic-pain and addiction patients. Based on those undisputed facts, Chapman acted reasonably in relying on § 168.053 as authorizing her to investigate the allegations regarding Cotropia's practice.")

Taylor v. McDonald, 978 F.3d 209, 214 (5th Cir. 2020) ("[W]e need not, and do not, decide whether the A1-3 Suicide Prevention Program, or others like it, are qualitatively different enough to trigger a liberty interest. It is enough to note that 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality,' but instead, 'must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . Even viewing the program in the light most favorable to Taylor, as we must on motion for summary judgment, the A1-3 program is not factually similar enough to any behavioral change program we've held triggers a liberty interest to constitute clearly established law. And as demonstrated in the above paragraph, whether the program is qualitatively different is not 'beyond debate.'. . Therefore, the defendants are entitled to QI.")

Lansdell v. Miller, No. 20-60143, 2020 WL 4873224, at *1 (5th Cir. Aug. 19, 2020) (not reported) ("We have held that 'handcuffing too tightly, without more, does not amount to excessive force.' Glenn v. City of Tyler, 242 F.3d 307, 314 (5th Cir. 2001). Lansdell cites no controlling precedent that would put every reasonable officer on notice as to how to arrest someone with a preexisting injury. Lansdell points to out-of-circuit precedent, but we can only rely on out-of-circuit cases as part of the clearly-established inquiry when they demonstrate 'a robust consensus of persuasive authority.'. . As the First Circuit has observed, the circuit courts 'have reached different holdings on the constitutionality of handcuffing an allegedly injured arrestee behind his or her back.' Hunt v. Massi, 773 F.3d 361, 369 (1st Cir. 2014). There is therefore no robust consensus on the issue. Accordingly, at the time of Lansdell's arrest, it was not clearly established that Miller could not use two sets of cuffs to handcuff Lansdell behind his back.")

Morgan v. Chapman, 969 F.3d 238, 245-50 (5th Cir. 2020) ("In Castellano v. Fragozo, an en banc majority of this court extinguished the constitutional malicious-prosecution theory. . . Castellano explained that claims under § 1983 are only 'for violation[s] of rights locatable in constitutional text.'. . This makes sense: the people have a constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches and unreasonable seizures. In so far as the defendant's bad actions (that happen to correspond to the tort of malicious prosecution) result in an unreasonable search or seizure, those claims may be asserted under § 1983 as violations of the Fourth Amendment. But that makes them Fourth Amendment claims cognizable under § 1983, not malicious prosecution claims. There is a constitutional right to be free of unreasonable searches and seizures. There is no constitutional right to be free from malicious prosecution. Therefore, qualified immunity bars Morgan's § 1983 malicious prosecution claims against Chapman and Kopacz. . . . We recognize that previous decisions of this court may have left open the possibility that the freedom-from-abuse-of-process right lay hidden in the constitutional ether. . . We close the door on that possibility. Putting together Beker, Brown, and Castellano, we observe that facts that constitute the state tort of abuse of process can also constitute an unreasonable search, unreasonable seizure, or violation of another right 'locatable in constitutional text.'. . Such claims, rooted in the violation of constitutional rights, are actionable under § 1983. But those claims 'are not claims for [abuse of process] and labeling them as such only invites confusion.'. . Because there is no constitutional right to be free from abuse of process, the district court erred by failing to grant defendants qualified immunity on that claim. . . . The Zadeh search violated the Fourth Amendment even if pain management clinics were a closely regulated industry, we explained. Nonetheless, we concluded that the law was not clearly established at the time, because 'the defendants reasonably could have believed that the administrative scheme here provided a constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant.'. . The Zadeh court also concluded, under an alternative theory, that the searches at issue were not pretextual. . . A search is not really administrative if it is used solely to find evidence of criminal wrongdoing. . . Neither the closely regulated industry holding nor the pretextual search analysis would stop Morgan's claims. In Zadeh, the defendants received qualified immunity because the law of instanter searches of closely regulated pain management clinics was unclear. . . Here, accepting the plaintiff's allegations as true, it is uncontroverted that Morgan was not operating a pain management clinic. Indeed, he alleges that he 'has never obtained, stored, maintained or dispensed any controlled substances of any kind from either medical practice.' Because Morgan was not operating a pain management clinic, the qualified immunity available to the defendants in Zadeh would be inapplicable here. The pretext analysis in this case also departs from Zadeh. In Zadeh, we concluded that the searches were not pretext for criminal investigation because there was no evidence that the 'investigation resulted in a criminal prosecution' and because the TMB took 'subsequent administrative action against' the physician. . . Therefore, we reasoned, the search was not pretextual because it 'was not performed "solely to uncover evidence of criminality."'. . Here, neither of those two facts are present. The search did result in a criminal prosecution, and TMB did not take any subsequent administrative action against Morgan. Based on this case law, we cannot say it would be futile for Morgan to add a Fourth Amendment claim for an unreasonable search. . . . A Fourth Amendment unreasonable seizure claim arising from Morgan's arrest on false charges would also be familiar. We recently concluded that an unlawful seizure claim was cognizable and qualified immunity did not apply where a plaintiff 'was wrongfully arrested due to the knowing or reckless misstatements and omissions' in a law enforcement officer's affidavits. .

. . We also must address whether it would be futile to remand to allow the district court to consider a due process claim. This court recently announced that there is a 'due process right not to have police deliberately fabricate evidence and use it to frame and bring false charges against a person.' Cole v. Carson, 802 F.3d 752, 771 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Cole I"), cert. granted, judgment vacated sub nom. Hunter v. Cole, 137 S. Ct. 497 (2016) and opinion reinstated in part, 935 F.3d 444 (5th Cir. 2018) (en banc). And, although Cole had a peripatetic procedural history, that holding is binding Fifth Circuit precedent today. . . Given the on-point Cole holding, the due process claim would similarly not represent a futile amendment. Remand to allow the district court to consider that claim would not be futile. . . It would not be futile on the merits for Morgan to pursue an unreasonable search, unreasonable seizure, or due process claim. But the decision as to whether Morgan should be allowed to amend is not ours to make. It is unclear what legal theories the plaintiff presented in the district court. And his claims seem to have transformed on appeal. We remand for the district court to consider amendment and, if necessary, issues of waiver and forfeiture.")

Dyer v. Houston, 964 F.3d 374, 381-85 (5th Cir. 2020) (on denial of reh'g and reh'g en banc) ("Pointing to inconsistency in our court's deliberate-indifference standards, the district court reasoned that 'there is no clearly established right in the Fifth Circuit to be free from medical inattention by officers who do not actually intend to cause harm.' The court therefore granted summary judgment dismissing the Dyers' deliberate-indifference claims against all three Officers. . . Turning first to the district court's prong one ruling, we agree that the record discloses genuine disputes of material fact regarding whether Officers Heidelburg and Gafford acted with deliberate indifference. But we disagree as to Officer Scott, finding similar fact disputes as to him. The district court correctly found a genuine dispute concerning whether Gafford and Heidelburg were deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of a detainee in their custody. A reasonable trier of fact could find that those Officers were aware that Graham, in the grip of a drug-induced psychosis, struck his head violently against the interior of Heidelburg's patrol car over 40 times en route to jail and thereby sustained severe head trauma. . . . Yet the Officers sought no medical care for Graham when they arrived at the jail. Nor did they alert jail officers (who had no way of knowing what had happened en route to the jail) of the possibility that Graham had seriously injured himself. . . . A reasonable jury could find that Graham's injuries—from which Graham would die within roughly 24 hours—were so severe, and their cause so plainly evident to the Officers, that the Officers acted with deliberate indifference by failing to seek medical attention, by failing to inform jail personnel about Graham's injuries, and by informing jail personnel only that Graham had been 'medically cleared' before arriving at the jail. . . A reasonable jury could find otherwise, of course, but the district court correctly concluded that the Dyers presented enough evidence that the Officers 'were aware of a risk of injury to Graham that they did nothing to alleviate,' allowing the Dyers to survive summary judgment on prong one. . . . The district court's prong two analysis was legally erroneous. Instead of asking whether controlling authority placed the unconstitutionality of the Officers' alleged conduct 'beyond debate,'. . . the court instead found that our deliberate-indifference case law was too muddled even to attempt the inquiry. Specifically, the district court pointed to 'confusion' in our cases over whether deliberate indifference requires proof of an officer's 'actual intent to cause harm in medical-inattention claims.' The court therefore concluded that 'there is no clearly established right in the Fifth Circuit to be free from medical inattention by officers who do not actually intend to cause harm.' We disagree with the district court's prong two analysis. Admittedly, the district court was correct that our deliberate-indifference cases are not a paradigm of consistency. As discussed supra, a panel of our court recently observed that, whereas many of our decisions hew to the traditional deliberate-indifference standard from Farmer v. Brennan, . . . others appear to add the element that the officer 'subjectively intended that harm occur.'. . Contrary to the district court's reasoning, however, this apparent tension in our cases does not ipso facto 'doom[ ]' the Dyers' deliberate-indifference claim. To the contrary, the district court was still required to analyze whether the Officers' alleged conduct contravened clearly established law as set by the controlling precedents of this court and the Supreme Court. Reviewing the record de novo, we conclude a reasonable jury could find the Officers' conduct contravened clearly established law. . . . Thompson defines clearly established law in sufficient detail to have notified the Officers that their actions were unconstitutional. . . Similar to the jail sergeant in Thompson, here the Officers had custody of a delusional detainee who was severely harming himself, and yet—despite being aware of the detainee's dire condition—they did nothing to secure medical help. Arguably, this situation presents a clearer case of deliberate indifference than Thompson. There, although providing Thompson some care, the jailer recklessly misjudged the severity of Thompson's condition that led to the seizure that caused his death. . . Here, the Officers actually witnessed Graham violently slamming his head against the patrol car over and over again, inflicting the cerebral trauma that would kill him within about a day's time. . . And yet, instead of seeking medical assistance, the Officers deposited Graham at the jail, told jailers nothing about what Graham had done to himself en route, and informed the jail sergeant only that Graham 'had been medically cleared at the scene.' In sum, Thompson gave officers 'fair warning[]'. . . that their behavior was deliberately indifferent to Graham's serious medical needs.") Wigginton v. Jones, 964 F.3d 329, 335-39 (5th Cir. 2020) ("We regularly grant qualified immunity in substantive due process cases where the plaintiff fails to establish a clearly-established property interest . . . Because Wigginton fails to identify any state or federal law that placed defendants on notice that his alleged contractual right to a fair tenure-review process was a constitutionally-protected interest, we reverse. . . . The district court acknowledged that Wigginton did not have a protected property interest in 'continued employment,'. . . but it concluded that he presented sufficient evidence to establish a different kind of protected interest—an interest in 'a fair merit-based inquiry free from irrationality as to whether he should receive tenure and promotion.' We hold that the district court erred in denying defendants' motion for qualified immunity because there was neither controlling authority nor a robust consensus of persuasive authority that placed Wigginton's rights beyond debate. . . . As the party defending against a claim of qualified immunity, Wigginton bears the burden of demonstrating that clearly-established law placed defendants on notice that they were violating his protected property interest. . . The cases he relies upon do not define his asserted property right with sufficient particularity to defeat defendants' qualified immunity defense. . . .Because Wigginton has failed to demonstrate that clearly-established law placed defendants on notice that he had a protected property interest, we reverse the district court's denial of their qualified immunity defense.")

Goode v. Baggett, 811 F. App'x 227, ___ (5th Cir. 2020) ("[A] jury could find that the Officers lacked reason to believe that Troy committed a crime, posed a threat to anyone, or actively resisted arrest when they hog-tied him. On those facts, a jury could reasonably conclude that the Officers used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . The Officers argue that even if they used excessive force, they're entitled to qualified immunity because the unlawfulness of their conduct was not clearly established at the time. . . . [T]he question is whether the state of the law in 2015 gave the Officers fair warning that hog-tying Troy would constitute excessive force under the circumstances. To answer that question, we look first to 'controlling authority,' i.e., published opinions of the Supreme Court and the Fifth Circuit. . . If we find controlling authority on point, our inquiry ends. . . Absent controlling authority, we look to our sister circuits to see whether 'a robust "consensus of cases of persuasive authority"' established the unlawfulness of the conduct at issue. . . At the time in question, the Fifth Circuit had decided three cases addressing whether officers used excessive force when they hog-tied arrestees. . . . As shown by our precedent, Gutierrez presents us with 'several yardsticks' by which to measure claims for excessive force involving restraints. . .Unless justified by a threat of serious harm, hog-tying a drug-affected person in a state of drug-induced psychosis and placing him face down in a prone position for an extended period constitutes excessive force. . . Thus, if the facts here are sufficiently similar to those in Gutierrez, then the Officers would not be entitled to qualified immunity. The Officers argue that Gutierrez didn't clearly establish the unlawfulness of hog-tying under any circumstances because the medical study it relied on has been called into question by a study co-authored by Dr. Tom Neuman and three others, including one of the defense experts here[.] . . . In Gutierrez, we relied on a study by the San Diego Police Department and the research of Dr. Donald T. Reay as evidence that hog-tying can become deadly force. . . We were aware of Dr. Neuman's study, however, and acknowledged that it possibly 'call[ed] the validity of Dr. Reay's research into question,' but we didn't consider it because it wasn't in the record. . . We similarly noted Dr. Neuman's study in Hill and Khan, but it didn't affect our analysis in those cases; we still applied the Gutierrez factors. . . Dr. Neuman's study has no bearing on whether the law was clearly established. First, the various studies are relevant to whether hog-tying in certain circumstances is 'deadly force.' But 'whether a particular use of force is "deadly force" is a question of fact.'. . We must accept the truth of Kelli's evidence on the degree of force used. . . Second, Dr. Neuman's study can't unsettle the law in this circuit. Although a circuit split can sometimes show that the law wasn't clearly established, . . . the same isn't true of a 'battle of the experts' like we have here[.] . . . Even when other circuits are split, . . . our inquiry ends if 'the law was clearly established in this circuit.'. . Gutierrez remains binding precedent. We conclude that Gutierrez clearly established the unlawfulness of hog-tying in certain circumstances. The next step is to determine whether the facts here are similar enough to those in Gutierrez for that case to have given the Officers fair warning that hog-tying Troy would constitute excessive force. . .The facts here mirror those in Gutierrez in all relevant respects. First, the Officers knew that Troy was 'under the influence of drugs.'. . Second, Troy exhibited signs of excited delirium. . . In fact, he was running around in circles, sweating profusely, yelling incoherently, and 'acting really strange,' similar to how Gutierrez was acting. . . Third, despite Troy's drug use and bizarre behavior, the Officers hog-tied Troy. . . Fourth, the Officers placed Troy 'in a face-down prone position' while hog-tied. . . And unlike the officers in Khan, who removed the restraints almost immediately, the Officers here left Troy hog-tied for ninety minutes—three times as long as the thirty-minute period in Hill, which we described as an 'extended period of time.'. . Finally, there's a dispute as to whether Troy posed a threat to anyone when the Officers hog-tied him, just as there was in Gutierrez. . . Thus, Gutierrez squarely governs this case. . . . In sum, hog-tying a nonviolent, drug-affected person in a state of drug-induced psychosis and placing him in a prone position for an extended period is objectively unreasonable. In light of the similarities between the facts of Gutierrez and those here, the state of the law in 2015 was sufficiently clear to provide fair warning to the Officers that their alleged conduct was unlawful. . . . On the facts as we must take them, the Officers' conduct in hog-tying Troy violated clearly established law. Of course, at trial, Kelli will bear the burden of proving the many facts and inferences that we assume in her favor. Depending on the facts proven at trial and the inferences drawn by the jury, a very different picture may result than the one we confront here. The Officers may ultimately be protected by qualified immunity in the end. But they aren't entitled to qualified immunity at this stage.")

Keller v. Fleming, 952 F.3d 216, 224-27 (5th Cir. 2020) ("[W]ithout a valid exception to the probable cause requirement, the seizure is . . . presumptively unreasonable, and a constitutional violation is present. . . Plaintiffs must still demonstrate that there was a clearly established right at the time of the challenged actions. Thus, the question becomes whether there is precedent that put Deputy Fleming on notice that he was committing a constitutional violation when he drove Simpson several miles to the county line and dropped him off. For purposes of determining whether the right was clearly established, '[t]he relevant question ... is ... whether a reasonable officer could have believed [his or her conduct] to be lawful, in light of clearly established law and the information the ... officers possessed.'. . In other words, Plaintiffs must point this court to a legislative directive or case precedent that is sufficiently clear such that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that law. . . Here, Plaintiffs' burden is not met. Plaintiffs' clearly established law contentions in their briefing are in fact a narrative as to why Deputy Fleming's seizure was unreasonable. Plaintiffs' narrative argument is of no import of a pre-existing or precedential case. . . In turn, there is no binding Supreme Court or Fifth Circuit precedent to anchor our de novo review of whether a similarly situated officer violated a constitutional right acting under similar circumstances. . . Without setting forth a clearly established right for which the analysis can continue, Plaintiffs have not defeated Deputy Fleming's qualified immunity defense. . . Of note, the dissent cites to Hope v. Pelzer for the proposition that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning' and 'general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . The dissent argues that Deputy Fleming was on clear notice that the reasonableness of the seizure of Simpson would be subject to a Fourth Amendment balancing test (weighing individual intrusion against legitimate government interests). Weighing the cognizable interests of Simpson against the government interests here, the dissent's position is that the scale tips starkly in Plaintiff's favor in light of Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville's holding that 'anti-vagrancy' laws are void for vagueness as they permit 'unfettered discretion' in seizing an individual like Simpson. . . Assuming that general statements (under Hope) may suffice, the balance of interests here are not so lopsided. As stated herein and by the district court, there is an argument for the community caretaker function (for example) which would be a legitimate government interest as to public safety. . . Because there are legitimate interests on both sides, this is not a one-sided balancing test where the officer 'do[es] not have any relevant, legitimate interests to put on their side of the[ ] scales.'. . Accordingly, Deputy Fleming's qualified immunity defense as to Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim prevails because Plaintiffs failed to prove that a reasonable officer like Fleming would have understood his actions violated clearly established law. Judgment is therefore rendered in Deputy Fleming's favor as he is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . Plaintiffs submit that Deputy Fleming's conduct created the 'special relationship' under DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services and a 'state-created-danger' resulted thereof. . . The district court held that Fleming was not entitled to qualified immunity under this claim because, inter alia, there were genuine issues of material fact as to whether there was a 'special relationship' between Fleming and Simpson that deprived Simpson of his liberty. Deputy Fleming argues that the law does not clearly establish that a special relationship would have existed under the facts of this case. We agree with Fleming because even if a 'special relationship' existed, Plaintiffs must show that Simpson's Fourteenth Amendment right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Again, the dispositive question is 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . Here, while Simpson was killed by a motorist after Fleming dropped him off at the county line, the High Court in DeShaney held that states and their officials have no affirmative duty to protect individuals from violence by private actors. . . . [T]he Fifth Circuit has never recognized this 'state-created-danger' exception. Plaintiffs therefore have not demonstrated a clearly established substantive due process right on the facts they allege. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment and render judgment that Deputy Fleming is entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment claim.") Keller v. Fleming, 952 F.3d 216, 227-29 (5th Cir. 2020) (Dennis, J., dissenting) ("The district court found that it was genuinely disputed whether Darrin Fleming picked up and transported Gerald Simpson out of the county pursuant to a local unwritten custom of ousting those perceived as vagrants from the jurisdiction, and we must accept these facts as true at this juncture. . . . I agree with the majority that, under these facts, Fleming violated Simpson's Fourth Amendment rights. I disagree, however, that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that these rights were clearly established. . . . [Q]ualified immunity works only 'to ensure that before they are subjected to suit, officers are on notice their conduct is unlawful.'. . Under this framework, a right may be clearly established even without on-point precedent where a defendant's conduct clearly and obviously violates the Constitution. . . At the time the incident at issue here occurred, Supreme Court precedent provided clear notice that 'the reasonableness of a seizure under the Fourth Amendment is determined by balancing its intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against its promotion of legitimate government interests.'. . When the question of whether a constitutional violation occurred depends on this sort of balancing of interests, qualified immunity should not apply when, 'given the factual disputes identified by the district court and taking the plaintiffs' side of those disputes, [a] case does not require any real balancing at all' because the officers 'do not have any relevant, legitimate interests to put on their side of the[ ] scales.'. . . Accepting the facts that the district court found to be genuinely disputed, there is simply no legitimate government interest against which to balance the significant intrusion posed by Deputy Fleming's decision to seize Simpson and dump him in the next jurisdiction without his valid consent. The Supreme Court has long made clear that the Constitution does not permit police to 'roundup ... so-called undesirables' merely because they are 'poor people, nonconformists, dissenters, idlers.' Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156, 171 (1972). With a balance so one-sidedly contrary to an individual's Fourth Amendment rights, every reasonable officer would have understood that seizing Simpson under these circumstances was arbitrary and unreasonable. . . Further, precedent from the Supreme Court provided notice when these events occurred that a law that provides officers with 'unfettered discretion' to arrest persons as vagrants merely on suspicion of future criminality is impermissibly vague. . . .Given the Supreme Court's well-established jurisprudence limiting an officer's discretion to act pursuant to an established vagrancy or vagrancy-related law, it follows a fortiori that an unwritten custom—which would provide even vaguer standards and grant greater discretion—is necessarily unreasonable as a matter of law. When combined with this principle, it is even more apparent that the clearly one-sided balancing of interests served as clear and obvious notice to any reasonable officer in Deputy Fleming's position that seizing Simpson and driving him to the county line violated Simpson's Fourth Amendment rights. . . Under the facts the district court found genuinely disputed, which we must accept for purposes of this appeal of a denial of qualified immunity, Deputy Fleming's conduct clearly and obviously violated Simpson's Fourth Amendment rights. Accordingly, I would affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment on Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim.")

Blanchard-Daigle v. Geers, 802 F. App'x 113, ___ (5th Cir. 2020) ("Deputy Geers' decision did not violate clearly established law. 'Our circuit has repeatedly held that an officer's use of deadly force is reasonable when an officer reasonably believes that a suspect was attempting to use or reach for a weapon.' Valderas v. City of Lubbock, 937 F.3d 384, 390 (5th Cir. 2019); see also Manis v. Lawson, 585 F.3d 839, 844 (5th Cir. 2009) (collecting cases). We have found that officers reasonably used deadly force when a suspect reached for his waistband, see Salazar-Limon v. City of Houston, 826 F.3d 272, 279–80 (5th Cir. 2016), when a suspect reached under a seat while sitting in a parked car, see Manis, 585 F.3d at 844–45, and even when a suspect reached into a nearby boot, see Ontiveros v. City of Rosenberg, 564 F.3d 379, 385 (5th Cir. 2009). In light of these precedents, we cannot say that every reasonable officer would have known that it was unconstitutional to use deadly force against a suspect who reached for something—particularly when Mr. Blanchard had driven 1,000 feet down a private road before pulling over and then exiting his vehicle unprompted. Qualified immunity thus defeats Ms. Blanchard-Daigle's claim against Deputy Geers.")

McCoy v. Alamu, 950 F.3d 226, 233 & n.8 (5th Cir. 2020), cert. granted, vacated and remanded in light of Taylor v. Riojas, 592 U.S. ___ (2020) (per curiam), 141 S. Ct. 1364 (2021) ("[O]ur caselaw 'does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established.'. . Indeed, QI 'will not protect officers who apply excessive and unreasonable force merely because their means of applying it are novel.'. . Thus, it's irrelevant that we hadn't previously found a use of pepper spray—as distinguished from some other instrument—to violate the Eighth Amendment. . . But for the law to be clearly established, it must have been 'beyond debate' that Alamu broke the law. . . 'The Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments necessarily excludes from constitutional recognition de minimis uses of physical force, provided that the use of force is not of a sort repugnant to the conscience of mankind.'. . . Thus, for the law to be clearly established, it must be beyond debate that the spraying crossed the line dividing a de minimis use of force from a cognizable one. . . Above, we held that the spraying crossed that line. But it was not beyond debate that it did, so the law wasn't clearly established.[8] [fn. 8: Some might find this a puzzling result, insofar as QI might have us find a violation in one breath, but, in the next, hold it too debatable to prevent immunity. No matter. What the first prong gives, the second prong will often snatch back. The Supreme Court has repeatedly reversed courts of appeals for failing to define established law narrowly, and we must follow that binding precedent.] This was an isolated, single use of pepper spray. McCoy doesn't challenge the evidence that Alamu initiated the Incident Command System immediately after the spray, nor that medical personnel promptly attended to him and provided copious amounts of water. Nor does he provide evidence to contest the Use of Force Report's finding that Alamu used less than the full can of spray. In somewhat related circumstances, we held that spraying a prisoner with a fire extinguisher 'was a de minimis use of physical force and was not repugnant to the conscience of mankind.'. . Similarly here, on these facts, it wasn't beyond debate that Alamu's single use of spray stepped over the de minimis line. For that reason, the law wasn't clearly established. In contending that the law was clear, McCoy points to the general principle that prison officers can't act 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . That won't do. The Supreme Court has repeatedly admonished courts not to define the relevant law too capaciously. . . Fact-intensive balancing tests alone (such as the Hudson factors) are usually not 'clear' enough. . . because the illegality of the particular conduct at issue must be undebatable. . . And even if general standards can clearly establish the law where the constitutional violation is 'obvious,'. . . this is not such a case. Above, we found that two of Hudson's five factors (injury, and efforts to temper force) weighed for Alamu, so the result was hardly obvious. . . Accordingly, we affirm the summary judgment.")

McCoy v. Alamu, 950 F.3d 226, 234-37 (5th Cir. 2020) (Costa, J., dissenting in part), cert. granted, vacated and remanded in light of Taylor v. Riojas, 592 U.S. ___ (2020) (per curiam), 141 S. Ct. 1364 (2021) ("If a prison guard punched an inmate 'for no reason,' that assault would violate clearly established law. . . The same would be true if a guard hit an inmate with a baton 'for no reason.'. . A guard who tased an inmate without provocation could also be held accountable. . . Should the result be different because Alamu's weapon of choice was pepper spray? Our precedent answers 'No'. . . . Qualified immunity is about notice. . . If a public official knows that using force is unlawful in a given circumstance, there is no reason to 'protect [him for] apply[ing] excessive and unreasonable force merely because [his] means of applying it are novel.'. . So just as the use of force in Newman violated clearly established law even though there were no 'tasing' cases on the books, . . . Alamu's gratuitous use of force on an inmate also violated clearly established law despite the lack of published 'pepper spraying' cases so holding. Despite recognizing that an unprovoked assault violates the Constitution, the majority grants the guard immunity because we have not decided a similar case involving pepper spray. That holding is at odds with Newman, which recognizes that the circumstances surrounding the use of force—the need for applying force, 'the relationship between the need and the amount of force used,' etc.—are what matter. . . The chosen instrument of force does not. . . And apart from its wisdom in the first place, Newman has put officials on notice for the last seven years that using a unique 'instrument' of force does not allow them to escape liability for constitutional violations. That notice alone defeats qualified immunity. Although the majority purports to recognize that the instrument of force does not matter in a 'no provocation' case, its grant of immunity ultimately turns on the fact that the guard used pepper spray instead of a fist, taser, or baton. It relies on the absence of law clearly establishing that wantonly spraying a prisoner with a chemical agent involves more than a de minimis use of force. The same could have been said in Newman about tasing. Unexplained in the majority opinion is why tasing is a more serious use of force than pepper spraying. The use of pepper spray is no small thing. The chemical agent, which temporarily blinds its recipients, is—unlike tasers—banned for use in war. . . And numerous federal courts have treated pepper spray as a dangerous weapon in criminal cases, which requires a finding that the 'instrument [is] capable of inflicting death or serious bodily injury,'. . a much higher force threshold than clearing the de minimis hurdle. . . Like tasing, pepper spraying is a far more significant use of force than the 'push or shove' the Supreme Court has held out as examples of de minimis force. . . The majority neglects that the gratuitous tasing in Newman was deemed an 'obvious' case of excessive force, . . . a label that also fits the pepper spraying of McCoy 'for no reason.' Qualified immunity is often a game of find-that-case, but not always. Common sense still plays a role; when the violation of constitutional rights is 'obvious,' there is no immunity. . . . And it is obvious in prison use-of-force cases that 'the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain ... constitutes cruel and unusual punishment forbidden by the Eighth Amendment.'. . . McCoy's testimony, which we must accept at this stage, is that there was 'no reason at all' to spray him. How could any guard not know that an unprovoked use of pepper spray is unlawful? Yet the majority concludes it would have been reasonable for a guard to think the law allowed him to gratuitously blind an inmate. Although the obviousness exception does not often apply, it plays an important role in qualified immunity doctrine. It ensures vindication of the most egregious constitutional violations. Requiring an on-point precedent for obvious cases can lead to perverse results. Because cases involving the most blatantly unconstitutional conduct will not often end up in the courts of appeals, it may be harder to find factually similar caselaw for such cases than it is for cases with conduct presenting closer constitutional questions. But cases involving obvious constitutional violations should be the easiest ones in which to find that an officer was 'plainly incompetent or ... knowingly violate[d] the law.'. .The panel agrees that if the jury finds the facts as McCoy presents them—a guard's infliction of painful force on a compliant, nonthreatening inmate—then Alamu violated the law. Any reasonable guard would know that such an unprovoked use of pepper spray violates the Constitution, so I would allow a jury to decide if that is what happened. Because McCoy's excessive force claim should go forward under current qualified immunity law, it does not depend on the success of recent calls to reconsider or recalibrate the doctrine. See, e.g., Kisela v. Hughes, —– U.S. ——–, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1162, 200 L.Ed.2d 449 (2018) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting); Ziglar v. Abbasi, —– U.S. ——–, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1871–72, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring); Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 479–81 (5th Cir. 2019) (Willett, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). But with so many voices critiquing current law as insufficiently protective of constitutional rights, the last thing we should be doing is recognizing an immunity defense when existing law rejects it.")

Ratliff v. Aransas County, Texas, 948 F.3d 281, 288-89 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Prior to Garza, our cases had clearly established that deadly force is not unreasonable when an armed suspect has ignored multiple orders to disarm and has either pointed his weapon at a person or used the weapon in such a manner as to make a threatening gesture. . . . The plaintiff in Garza argued, as Ratliff argues now, that 'a reasonable jury could find that [the suspect] never pointed his gun at the officers.'. . In support of this argument, the plaintiff relied on an affidavit from one of the officer-defendants, which stated that the suspect 'did not at any time point the gun [at the] cops.'. . Although we found that video evidence had conclusively contradicted the affiant's statement, we explained that this fact was not essential to the outcome and further held that a 'reasonable officer in any of the defendants' shoes would have believed that [the suspect] posed a serious threat regardless of the direction [of his] gun.'. .Thus, in Garza, we found that it is not unreasonable for law enforcement officers to use deadly force against an armed suspect, irrespective of the pointed direction of that suspect's weapon, when the suspect has ignored orders to drop the weapon and has displayed erratic or aggressive behavior indicating that he may pose an imminent threat. We can concede that, here, unlike in Garza, the video evidence is inconclusive with respect to the direction of Ratliff's gun. Moreover, we are willing to accept that the gun's direction is genuinely disputed. But we cannot agree that the pointed direction of Ratliff's gun is material in the context of these facts. Once Ratliff had ignored repeated warnings to drop his weapon, the deputies here, like the officers in Garza, had ample reason to fear for their safety.")

Soto v. Brock, 795 F. App'x 246, ___ (5th Cir. 2019) ("In this case, the specific right at issue was clearly established. At the time of the alleged violation, the law made clear that (1) due process safeguards—specifically, notice of why the letter was rejected and an opportunity to appeal the decision—are required when a prisoner's letter is rejected, and (2) the fact that Soto's son was a minor does not change the analysis. . . Thus, a reasonable official would have understood that failing to provide adequate notice and an opportunity to appeal after rejecting a letter sent to a minor detained in a boot camp would violate the sender's constitutional rights.")

Defrates v. Podany, 789 F. App'x 427, ___ (5th Cir. 2019) ("Were Podany's actions a model of police conduct? Possibly not. Could Podany have used more verbal commands before tackling Defrates? Maybe. And could he have tried a little longer to control Defrates's arms? Perhaps. But our job is not to decide the best course of action. Our job is to determine whether Defrates has identified law clearly placing the unreasonableness of Podany's actions under the circumstances beyond debate. That is an uphill battle for any plaintiff. '[T]he United States Reports teem with warnings about the difficulty of placing a question beyond debate.' Morrow v. Meachum, 917 F.3d 870, 874 (5th Cir. 2019). Defrates has not risen to the challenge; Podany's qualified immunity remains intact.")

Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 452-57 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc), cert. denied sub nom Hunter v. Cole, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) ("Under Mullenix, application of clearly established law is undertaken with close attention to the relevant legal rule and the particular facts of the case. Here, based on the facts taken in the light most favorable to the non-movant Coles, and with reasonable inferences drawn in their favor, the district court determined there were genuine factual disputes as to Ryan's and the officers' conduct, upon which a reasonable jury could find '[Ryan] ... did not pose an immediate threat to the officers' when they opened fire. It held that 'on October 25, 2010, the date of the shooting, the law was clearly established' that 'shooting a mentally disturbed teenager, who was pointing a gun the entire time at his own head and facing away from the officer, in an open outdoor area, and who was unaware of the officer's presence because no warning was given prior to the officer opening fire, was unlawful.' As we will detail, the officers ask us to consider a different set of facts, but we cannot do so. We lack jurisdiction to reconsider the district court's factual determinations on an appeal from denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity. . . .The summary judgment facts, as determined by the district court, are that Ryan posed no threat to the officers or others to support firing without warning. The 'Officers had the time and opportunity to give a warning and yet chose to shoot first instead.' This is an obvious case. Indeed, Officer Hunter conceded that he would have had no basis to fire upon Ryan unless Ryan had been facing him and pointing a gun at him. This case is obvious when we accept the facts as we must. It is also informed by our precedent. Before 2010, Baker v. Putnal established clearly that Cassidy's and Hunter's conduct—on the facts as we must take them at this stage—was unlawful. . . .Rather than engage on the facts as we must take them at the summary judgment stage, the officers repeatedly argue from a different set of facts. . . .The Coles and amicus Cato Institute are correct that it is beyond our jurisdiction to consider the officers' set of facts, a narrative evolving over time. . . . Whereas the officers will have a chance to present their factual narrative—and to question the Coles'—at trial, they cannot contest the facts in the current appeal. . . .The dissents overlook the fundamental reason most of these facts should not be part of the analysis: we consider only what the officers knew at the time of their challenged conduct. 'Facts an officer learns after the incident ends—whether those facts would support granting immunity or denying it—are not relevant.' [citing Hernandez v. Mesa, 137 S. Ct. 2003, 2007 (2017) (per curiam)]. . . Despite the many 'red flags' listed by the dissents as known to others, only those known to Hunter and Cassidy are relevant to the qualified immunity analysis. . . .What Hunter and Cassidy knew before shooting at Ryan, whether they warned him before doing so, and what actions Ryan took before being shot are all disputed. The district court must afford Cassidy and Hunter qualified immunity at the earliest point the defense's applicability is determinable. Here, we have not yet reached that point. It will be for a jury to resolve what happened on October 25, 2010. The district court did not err in denying the officers qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage.") [footnotes omitted]

Rather, it follows the longstanding en banc rule that 'we lack jurisdiction to review the genuineness of a fact issue' on an interlocutory appeal of a denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . . As the able district court determined, the facts are very much in dispute.")

Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 457-58, 460, 463-65, 467-69 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Jones, J., joined by Smith, Owen, Ho, Duncan, and Oldham, JJ., dissenting), cert. denied sub nom. Hunter v. Cole, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) ("Neither we nor the Supreme Court has ever held that police officers confronted in close quarters with a suspect armed and ready to shoot must hope they are faster on the draw and more accurate. The increasingly risky profession of law enforcement cannot put those sworn to 'serve and protect' to a Hobson's choice: place their lives on the line by heroic forbearance or risk their financial security in defense of lawsuits. The Supreme Court has repeatedly stated in plain terms that the purpose of qualified immunity is to prevent precisely this quandary. Respectfully dissenting, we are convinced that the Supreme Court's remand from the original panel opinion denying immunity meant something; the governing Supreme Court law is foursquare in the corner of Officers Hunter and Cassidy; and they were entitled to receive summary judgment confirming their immunity from suit, not simply from liability. . . .The only legal question that needs to be addressed by this court is whether, under the circumstances of this five-second confrontation, every reasonable police officer would have reasonably perceived no life-threatening danger such that deadly force could be used to incapacitate Cole without a preliminary warning. Put otherwise, as a matter of law, was it clearly established that officers may not fire on a suspect, armed and ready to shoot a pistol, who is turning in their direction with one of their brethren ten to twenty feet away, unless the gun barrel points at them or they first shout a warning and await his response? The majority deny qualified immunity, seeming to answer on the basis of disputed fact issues' that Cole posed 'no threat.' The majority's reasoning is at too high a level of generality. And the majority ignore the critical criterion for qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases: the reasonableness of the officers' reasonable perceptions. In sum, the majority here double down on the mistakes that got our court reversed in Mullenix. . . . For immunity purposes, the question phrased one way is whether any reasonable officers could have believed that Cole's split-second turning toward them posed a life-threatening danger such that lethal force was necessary. Alternatively, what "clearly established law" held as of October 2010 that under all of the relevant circumstances, deadly force was not justified unless either a warning was given and the suspect allowed a chance to react, or the suspect actually turned his loaded pistol on the officer? The answer here directly parallels the Supreme Court's reasoning in Mullenix, which the majority seriously shortchanged. . . .The majority here posit as clearly established law, indeed an 'obvious case,' that a police officer may not use deadly force—without prior warning—against an armed, distraught suspect who, with finger in the pistol's trigger, posed

'no threat' while turning toward an officer ten to twenty feet away. But in Mullenix, the Supreme Court reversed this court because '[t]he general principle that deadly force requires a sufficient threat hardly settles this matter.'. . Likewise, here, the majority's 'no threat' and 'obvious case' conclusions do not settle the matter of clearly established law. . . .Characterizing this case as a 'no threat' or obvious' Fourth Amendment violation is wrong for additional reasons. Whether, under the material undisputed facts, Cole presented 'no threat' to a reasonable police officer is the relevant issue to assess a Fourth Amendment violation. But the immunity question, which the majority elides, is whether every reasonable officer in this factual context would have known he could not use deadly force. . . The majority's analysis conflates these inquiries. . . Like this court's panel in Mullenix, the majority here offer no controlling Supreme Court precedent, including Garner, to support that 'clearly established law' mandated that the officers hold their fire until they had both warned Cole and given him a chance to drop his gun or until he pointed the loaded weapon directly at them. . . . Moreover, to the extent it is relevant, Fifth Circuit law does not support denying qualified immunity to Officers Hunter and Cassidy. . . .To sum up, the majority opinion here repeats every error identified by the Supreme Court when it granted summary reversal in Mullenix and sent the instant case back for reconsideration. The majority's 'clearly established' rule has changed, but not its errors. Tennessee v. Garner does not formulate 'clearly established law' with the degree of specificity required by the Supreme Court's decisions on qualified immunity. The majority's 'no threat' and 'obvious case' statements pose the issues here at an excessive level of generality. The majority has no Supreme Court case law demonstrating that Officers Hunter and Cassidy were either plainly incompetent or had to know that shooting at Cole was unconstitutional under the circumstances before them and with the knowledge they possessed—he was mentally distraught; he was armed with his finger in the pistol's trigger; he was very close to Hunter; he had been walking in the direction of schools for which extra police protection had been ordered; and he had ignored other officers' commands to stop and drop his weapon. And they had three to five seconds to decide how dangerous he could be to them. The majority cites not one case from this court denying qualified immunity under similar circumstances. Mullenix aptly summed it up for our purposes: 'qualified immunity protects actions in the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'. .'[T]he constitutional rule applied by the Fifth Circuit was not "beyond debate."'. . .Shooting at Cole may not have been the wisest choice under these pressing circumstances, but the officers' decision, even if assailable, was at most negligent. Hunter and Cassidy were neither plainly incompetent nor themselves lawbreakers. While we are confident a jury will vindicate their actions, they deserved qualified immunity as a matter of law. We dissent.")[footnotes omitted]

Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 469-70 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Smith, J., dissenting), cert. denied sub nom. Hunter v. Cole, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) ("Abandon hope, all ye who enter Texas, Louisiana, or Mississippi as peace officers with only a few seconds to react to dangerous confrontations with threatening and well-armed potential killers. In light of today's ruling and the raw count of judges, there is little chance that, any time soon, the Fifth Circuit will confer the qualified-immunity protection that heretofore-settled Supreme Court and Fifth Circuit caselaw requires. Red flags abound. [listing red flags] Normally we expect police officers to recognize such red flags and to respond appropriately. Instead of protecting these officers from obvious danger to themselves and the public, however, the en banc majority orders them to stand down. What is the hapless officer to do in the face of today's decision? What indeed is the 'clearly established law' that the majority now announces? The judges in the majority do not say.")

Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 470-73 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Willett, J., dissenting), cert. denied sub nom. Hunter v. Cole, No. 19-753 (U.S. June 15, 2020) ("I repeat what I said last month: The entrenched, judge-invented qualified immunity regime ought not be immune from thoughtful reappraisal. . . .The real-world functioning of modern immunity practice—essentially 'heads government wins, tails plaintiff loses'—leaves many victims violated but not vindicated. More to the point, the 'clearly established law' prong, which is outcome-determinative in most cases, makes qualified immunity sometimes seem like unqualified impunity. . . .That said, as a middle-management circuit judge, I take direction from the Supreme Court. And the Court's direction on qualified immunity is increasingly unsubtle. We must respect the Court's exacting instructions—even as it is proper, in my judgment, to respectfully voice unease with them. . . . Merely proving unconstitutional misconduct isn't enough. A plaintiff must cite functionally identical authority that puts the unlawfulness 'beyond debate' to 'every' reasonable officer. . . . The Supreme Court demands precedential specificity. But it's all a bit recursive. There's no earlier similar case declaring a constitutional violation because no earlier plaintiff could find an earlier similar case declaring a constitutional violation. . . .In recent years, individual Justices have raised concerns with the Court's immunity caselaw. Even so, the doctrine enjoys resounding, even hardening favor at the Court. Just three months ago, in a case involving the warrantless strip search of a four-year-old preschooler, a strange-bedfellows array of scholars and advocacy groups—perhaps the most ideologically diverse amici ever assembled—implored the Court to push reset. To no avail. This much is certain: Qualified immunity, whatever its success at achieving its intended policy goals, thwarts the righting of many constitutional wrongs. Perhaps the growing left–right consensus urging reform will one day win out. There are several 'mend it, don't end it' options. The Court could revisit Pearson and nudge courts to address the threshold constitutional merits rather than leave the law undeveloped. Even if a particular plaintiff cannot benefit (due to the 'clearly established law' prong), this would provide moving-forward guidance as to what the law prescribes and proscribes. Short of that, the Court could require lower courts to explain why they are side-stepping the constitutional merits question. Or the Court could confront the widespread inter-circuit confusion on what constitutes 'clearly established law.' One concrete proposal: clarifying the degree of factual similarity required in cases involving split-second decisions versus cases involving less-exigent situations. The Court could also, short of undoing Harlow and reinstating the bad-faith prong, permit plaintiffs to overcome immunity by presenting objective evidence of an official's bad faith. Not subjective evidence of bad faith, which Harlow, worried about peculiarly disruptive' and 'broad-ranging discovery,' forbids. And not unadorned allegations of bad faith. But objective evidence that the official actually realized that he was violating the Constitution. Prudent refinements abound. But until then, as Judge Jones explains in today's principal dissent, the Supreme Court's unflinching, increasingly emphatic application of 'clearly established law' compels dismissal.")[footnotes omitted]

Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 473-79 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Ho, J., and Oldham, J., joined by Smith, J., dissenting), cert. denied sub nom. Hunter v. Cole, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) ("We write to emphasize the en banc majority's unmistakable message: Four years after Mullenix, nothing has changed in our circuit. . . The Supreme Court has not hesitated to redress similar intransigence from our sister circuits—often through the 'extraordinary remedy of a summary reversal.' [collecting cases] So where is our clearly established law at issue here? Unbelievably, the en banc majority says we don't need any. That's so, they say, because '[t]his is an obvious case.'. . That's obviously wrong for three reasons. . . .First, the Supreme Court to date has never identified an 'obvious' case in the excessive force context. . . .Second, the Supreme Court has granted qualified immunity in much tougher cases than this one. [referencing Plumhoff, Brosseau, Kisela, and Sheehan] Third, this is Mullenix all over again. . . .The Supreme Court's message could not be clearer. Still, somehow, today's majority does not get it. Here, as in Mullenix, the majority attempts to rely on Garner to establish the governing rule of law. From Garner, the majority somehow divines a rule that an officer cannot shoot a mentally disturbed teenager holding a gun near his school. This is demonstrably erroneous. In fact, one thing that unites the Supreme Court's recent reversals in cases involving qualified immunity and excessive force is the attempt by lower courts to extrapolate Garner to new facts. . . . The majority cannot dodge responsibility for today's decision by pointing to the limits of appellate jurisdiction. . . We obviously lack interlocutory appellate jurisdiction to review the genuineness of an officer's fact dispute . . .But that does nothing to defeat jurisdiction where, as here, the factual disputes are immaterial. That is why the Supreme Court repeatedly has rejected such no-jurisdiction pleas from those who wish to deny qualified immunity. . . All the fact disputes in the world do nothing to insulate this legal question: Is this an 'obvious case' under Garner—notwithstanding a mountain of SUMREVs, GVRs, and pointed admonitions from the Supreme Court? The majority says yes. . . They obviously must have jurisdiction to say so. With respect, it makes no sense to say we lack jurisdiction to disagree with them. . .What explains our circuit's war with the Supreme Court's qualified-immunity jurisprudence? Two themes appear to be at play. First, the majority suggests we should be less than enthused about Supreme Court precedent in this area, because it conflicts with plaintiffs' jury rights. . . . We appreciate the majority's candor. But inferior court judges may not prefer juries to the Justices. Second, some have criticized the doctrine of qualified immunity as ahistorical and contrary to the Founders' Constitution. . . . Subjecting these officers to trial on originalist grounds is precisely the unprincipled practice of originalism that Justices Scalia and Thomas railed against. . . .The majority undoes the careful balance of interests embodied in our doctrine of qualified immunity, stripping the officers' defenses without regard to the attendant social costs. Now that is a one-sided approach to qualified immunity as a practical matter. And as Justices Scalia and Thomas have observed, it's also a one-sided approach to qualified immunity as an originalist matter: It abandons the defense without also reconsidering the source and scope of officers' liability in the first place. . . .Our circuit, like too many others, has been summarily reversed for ignoring the Supreme Court's repeated admonitions regarding qualified immunity. There's no excuse for ignoring the Supreme Court again today. And certainly none based on a principled commitment to originalism. Originalism for plaintiffs, but not for police officers, is not principled judging. Originalism for me, but not for thee, is not originalism at all. We respectfully dissent.") [footnotes omitted]

Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 484 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Duncan, J., joined by Smith, Owen, Ho, and Oldham, JJ., dissenting), cert. denied sub nom. Hunter v. Cole, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) ("Judge Jones' dissent shows that, even resolving all disputed facts in Cole's favor, the officers did not 'obviously' violate Garner's generalized test during the immediate shooting—that is, when in the space of five seconds at most, the officers met Cole at a distance of 10–20 feet as he backed out of the woods, still armed, and began to turn. . . But if we include the undisputed facts leading up to the shooting, the notion that this is an 'obvious case' crumbles. To believe that, we would have to blind ourselves to the facts that (1) the officers were searching for an irate, distraught suspect; (2) who was wandering through the woods armed with a loaded semi-automatic handgun; (3) who had refused police demands to turn over his weapon; (4) who had just that morning deposited a cache of weapons and ammunition at his friend's house; and (5) who had threatened to 'shoot anyone who came near him.' Those were the 'totality of the circumstances' facing the officers, . . .and they were not disputed by Cole or the district court. Given those circumstances, the officers might have taken any number of actions when they met Cole in the woods that morning—they might have warned him, or shot him, or shot in the air, or retreated, or remained frozen in place to see what he would do. But to say it is 'obvious' what they should have done is to denude the concept of an 'obvious case' of any meaning. Once stripped of the conceit that this is an 'obvious case,' the majority has nothing left to justify its holding.") [footnotes omitted]

Marks v. Hudson, 933 F.3d 481, 486 (5th Cir. 2019) ("It is clearly established that Fourth Amendment procedures and standards apply to social workers' investigations. Wernecke, 591 F.3d at 399-400. Process that satisfies Fourth Amendment standards is adequate to protect parents' Fourteenth Amendment liberty interest in their child's custody. . . It is also clearly established that a constitutional violation occurs if an official makes a knowing, intentional, or reckless false statement or omission that causes the issuance of a warrant without probable cause that leads to the removal of a child from its parent's custody.")

Rich v. Palko, 920 F.3d 288, 294-97 (5th Cir. 2019) ("In sum, QI 'represents the norm, and courts should deny a defendant immunity only in rare circumstances.'. . . Rich alleges that the officers violated Dupuis-Mays's Fourth Amendment rights through unlawful detention, excessive force, and false reporting. The officers assert QI on each claim. . . .Rich points to no case even suggesting that staff at a group home for disabled persons, who have been told by a hospital and a psychiatrist that a patient should be taken to the hospital, are not credible persons under the Texas Health and Safety Code. The district court erred in denying QI on the claim of unlawful detention. . . . Rich has not demonstrated that the officers violated clearly established law by moving Dupuis-Mays—who was increasingly aggravated, repeatedly spitting at the officers, and failing to comply with instructions to stop—to the floor, even though he collided with a cabinet on the way down. The cases Rich cites on appeal do not implicate the situation Palko and Hudgens faced and certainly do not put it 'beyond debate,' . . that the officers' actions violated Dupuis-Mays's rights. . . .Rich fails to identify a single case suggesting that an individual has a right to be free from inaccuracies in an after-the-fact police report or that an inaccurate report serves as a sort of continuing constitutional violation, as the district court suggested.")

Blake v. Lambert, 921 F.3d 215, 220-22 (5th Cir. 2019) ("We hold that Blake established a Malley violation at the summary judgment stage. Lambert's affidavit simply identifies Blake, recites the charged offense, and cites the corresponding Mississippi statutes. . . It does not provide any supporting facts from which a magistrate could independently determine probable cause. For example, it does not describe Lambert's experience, the sources of his information and their reliability, his conversations with Blake and the Perrys, Blake's relationship to S.W., or S.W.'s absence record. Lambert's affidavit is indistinguishable from what we called the 'textbook example' of a facially invalid affidavit in Spencer v. Staton. . . The affidavit in Spencer, like Lambert's, stated that the named person committed the offense but did not provide factual support. . . We also hold that this was clearly established when Lambert swore his affidavit. The general Malley rule dates from the 1980s. And our 2007 decision in Spencer shows Lambert's affidavit violated that rule. It has also been clear since the 1980s that the Fourth Amendment applies to school officials. . . . [T]he right against arrest on a 'barebones' affidavit was well known, and there is no reason to distinguish Blake's right from that of someone arrested on a police officer's affidavit. . . Initially, the rule that 'no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause' is quite uniform. . .The school and social worker cases are distinguishable because they define what Fourth Amendment rights exist in certain contexts. For example, in Roe we held for the first time that the warrant and probable cause requirements apply to a social worker's body cavity search of a child. . .Here, in contrast, Lambert does not dispute that probable cause governs arrest warrant affidavits. As the Supreme Court teaches, '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . And Lambert's distinction from a police officer is unconvincing. First, Lambert has some understanding of warrant affidavits. He routinely submitted them to the court and was aware they could lead to arrests. . . . Second, Lambert's claim to limited experience and training goes to subjective good faith, not objective legal reasonableness. '[A] reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.'. . There is some evidence that Lambert's affidavit followed a standard practice for local school attendance officers. But even if proven, this fact also goes to subjective good faith. The Supreme Court has held that agency policy may support an action's reasonableness if Fourth Amendment law is 'undeveloped.'. .But '[s]uch a policy, of course, could not make reasonable a belief that was contrary to a decided body of case law.'. . That was exactly the situation here. Malley, as applied in Spencer, was a decided body of law. We are bound not to 'reintroduce into qualified immunity analysis the inquiry into officials' subjective intent that Harlow [v. Fitzgerald] sought to minimize.'. . Nor does the judge's warrant approval insulate Lambert. 'Although we accord great deference to a magistrate's determination of probable cause, we will not "defer to a warrant based on an affidavit that does not provide the magistrate with a substantial basis for determining the existence of probable cause."'. . The district court correctly denied summary judgment on the Malley claim based on qualified immunity.")

Arizmendi v. Gabbert, 919 F.3d 891, 899-904 (5th Cir. 2019) ("The critical question is . . . whether an officer who knowingly or recklessly included false statements on a warrant affidavit can be held liable for false arrest despite having had probable cause to arrest the plaintiff without a warrant for a different offense not identified in the affidavit, an argument with great force. This said, the principle was not clearly established at the time of Gabbert's alleged conduct, so Gabbert is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .In sum, Vance rejected the possibility that an officer could arrest someone based on a warrant and then, on its challenge, retroactively justify his conduct by arguing that he had probable cause to arrest the person without a warrant for a different offense. Taking the disputed facts in the light most favorable to Arizmendi, that is exactly what Gabbert has done. . . . Gabbert argues that Devenpeck squarely applies here: he arrested Arizmendi for one crime, but since he had probable cause to arrest her for a different crime, it does not matter whether he committed Franks violations in the course of obtaining the arrest warrant. The parties dispute whether Devenpeck applies solely to warrantless arrests, or also reaches warrant-based arrests. We, like other courts, have not explicitly addressed the reach of Devenpeck in circumstances like these. . . After Devenpeck, but without addressing it explicitly, we characterized as 'dubious' the argument that 'an officer can give a knowingly false affidavit and avoid liability by the fortuity that, after the fact, he may be able to argue some other basis for the arrest.'. . We have since acknowledged the possibility that Devenpeck may be limited to warrantless arrests, though we have not offered further analysis. . . There are two reasons, however, to doubt that Devenpeck applies here. First, Devenpeck applies with significantly more force in the warrantless arrest context. . . . While Devenpeck held that the validity of a warrantless arrest should not be limited by an insistence that the officer have probable cause for the charged offense or related offenses, it did not disturb our previous recognition that allowing an officer conducting an improper warrant-based arrest to point to another offense for which there was probable cause would 'unjustifiably tilt [the balance of protection] in favor of qualified immunity.'. . Second, and relatedly, Devenpeck hinged on the requirement that we distance ourselves from an arresting officer's subjective state of mind, focusing solely on the objective facts known to the officer at the time. Yet Franks explicitly requires inquiry into officers' states of mind to assess the validity of arrest warrants. Only deliberate or reckless misstatements or omissions are Franks violations; mere negligence will not suffice. . . This stands in stark contrast to the Supreme Court's emphasis on objectivity surrounding warrantless arrests. . . Today we cannot conclude that an officer can deliberately or recklessly misstate or omit facts in a warrant affidavit to procure a warrant to arrest someone for a specific crime, then escape liability by retroactively constructing a justification for a warrantless arrest based on a different crime. That said, overarching and reconciling principles bring clarity. Franks and Devenpeck operate in tandem by protecting the validity of an arrest in circumstances where the arrest does not deny a person the protections of the Fourth Amendment—in these circumstances, the mental state of the officer aside, the arrest is lawful. In warrantless arrests, there is no threat to a citizen's Fourth Amendment rights where the officer had probable cause to arrest, albeit not for the offense he chose to charge. With a warrant, even where there was ultimately no probable cause for the arrest, an officer instead gains the protection of Franks—invalidating the warrant only for misstatements willfully or recklessly made, and then only for misstatements necessary to the finding of probable cause for the charged offense. As of Gabbert's conduct, we had not yet explained this common ground between warrantless and warrant-based arrests—let alone established that these principles do not mandate further protection for an officer who arrests someone based on a Franks-violating warrant, then later points to probable cause to have effected a warrantless arrest for another offense. A reasonable officer in Gabbert's position may not have recognized that by proceeding with an arrest based on a warrant, the validity of the arrest would not be judged by standards applicable to warrantless arrests, standards he could have met. In short, one could have reasonably taken Devenpeck to protect the validity of Arizmendi's arrest, even if—based on the facts in the light most favorable to Arizmendi—Gabbert should have known that the warrant itself was invalid under Franks. Knowing or reckless false statements in a warrant affidavit are not to be condoned. But Arizmendi has not persuaded us that Gabbert's actions were then illicit by clearly established law. Gabbert is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.") Anderson v. Valdez, 913 F.3d 472, 476-78 (5th Cir. 2019) ("We conclude that Valdez is entitled to qualified immunity. It was not clearly established as of May 2014 that where a briefing attorney swore as part of his employment to comply with a code of conduct requiring him to report judicial misconduct to a specific state authority, he nonetheless spoke as a citizen in reporting a judge to that authority. . . . Garcetti left for later the line between citizen and public-employee speech. As relevant here, after Garcetti, we repeatedly held that employees speaking in discharge of job-imposed obligations to report wrongdoing did so as public employees—not as citizens. . . Clarity came with Lane v. Franks' holding that '[t]he critical question under Garcetti is whether the speech at issue is itself ordinarily within the scope of an employee's duties, not whether it merely concerns those duties.'. . Under Lane, a general job-imposed obligation to detect and prevent wrongdoing does not qualify as an employee's 'official duty' because 'such broad [obligations] fail to describe with sufficient detail the day-to-day duties of a public employee's job.'. . . Lane and our post-Lane caselaw make clear that a general obligation to report judicial misconduct does not constitute an 'official duty' demarcating employee speech under Garcetti. That said, Lane was decided in June 2014—roughly one month after Anderson's employment offer was withdrawn—leaving unsettled whether Anderson then spoke as a citizen or as an employee. Anderson argues that this issue is no different from the one addressed in Anderson I, where we held that a general duty as a lawyer to report judicial misconduct cannot constitute an 'official duty' under Garcetti because 'there is an analogue to speech by citizens who are not public employees.'. . His argument is essentially that a job-imposed duty with a 'citizen analogue' is never an official duty for the purposes of Garcetti. But this relies on an implicit premise—that when an employee is obligated to speak under both the terms of employment and an analogous citizen obligation, the employee speaks only as a citizen and not also as a public employee—that we have explicitly declined to adopt. . . .We conclude that it was not clearly established that Anderson's original complaint to the State Commission on Judicial Conduct was not employee speech. It follows that Valdez is entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds concerning Anderson's later contact with the District Attorney. There may be cases where a public employee's later, protected speech as a citizen was sufficiently attenuated from his earlier, unprotected speech as an employee that it can ground a retaliation claim. Not here. . . As Valdez is entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established at the time of the alleged retaliation, we end our inquiry and reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment on the individual-capacity claim.")

Shumpert v. City of Tupelo, 905 F.3d 310, 321-23 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Plaintiffs have the burden of demonstrating that Officer Cook violated a 'clearly established law at the time the challenged conduct occurred.' Plaintiffs do not provide any legal authority to demonstrate that Officer Cook violated clearly established law by releasing the K9. Instead, they contend generally that Shumpert had a constitutional right to be free from excessive force. This court has previously rejected such general contentions. Even if Plaintiffs had included case law to support their argument, they would still be unable to demonstrate that Officer Cook's conduct violated clearly established law. At the time of the challenged conduct, neither the United States Supreme Court nor this court had addressed what constitutes reasonable use of K9 force during an arrest. After that date, this court decided Cooper v. Brown, which addressed the issue. . . .[U]nder Cooper, the law is now clearly established that when '[n]o reasonable officer could conclude that [a suspect] pose[s] an immediate threat to [law enforcement officers] or others,' it is unreasonable to use K9 force to subdue a suspect who is complying with officer instructions. Even if Cooper were applicable, Officer Cook's conduct would not violate clearly established law. We emphasized in Cooper that '[o]ur caselaw makes certain that once an arrestee stops resisting, the degree of force an officer can employ is reduced." Because the officer in Cooper continued to use force and even increased its use while the threat to officers decreased, he violated clearly established law. By contrast, Officer Cook did not use or increase the use of force after Shumpert was subdued; instead, Shumpert ignored Officer Cook's instructions and retreated further under the home, preventing Officer Cook from determining whether he was armed. While caselaw establishes that it is unreasonable to use force after a suspect is subdued or demonstrates compliance, this court has repeatedly held that the 'measured and ascending' use of force is not excessive when a suspect is resisting arrest—provided the officer ceases the use of force once the suspect is subdued. Because it is undisputed that Shumpert was violently resisting arrest and that Officer Cook did not know whether he was armed, Plaintiffs have not met their burden of demonstrating that—under the discrete facts of this case—Officer Cook's use of K9 force was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. The district court properly determined that Officer Cook was entitled to qualified immunity on this claim." [footnotes omitted])

Mote v. Walthall, 902 F.3d 500, 505 n.12 (5th Cir. 2018) ("We recently remarked in another First Amendment case, Davidson v. City of Stafford, 848 F.3d 384 (5th Cir.2017):
On the second prong of the qualified immunity defense, recent Supreme Court decisions addressing claims for excessive force have 'reiterate[d] the longstanding principle that "clearly established law" should not be defined "at a high level of generality."'. . Our cases outside the excessive force area involving warrantless arrests and limits on speech have not specifically mentioned this aspect of Supreme Court cases. See, e.g., Deville v. Marcantel, 567 F.3d 156, 166 (5th Cir.2009); Evett v. DETNTFF, 330 F.3d 681, 687 (5th Cir.2003).

848 F.3d at 394. But we recited the 'high level of generality' standard in another First Amendment case soon thereafter. See Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 686 (5th Cir.2017). Because we believe, as shown below, that the First Amendment law here meets this higher standard, we need not analyze whether the 'high level of generality' language perforce applies to cases outside of the excessive force line of cases.")

Collie v. Barron, 747 F. App'x 950, ___ (5th Cir. 2018) (per curiam) ("An officer's use of deadly force is justified when the officer reasonably perceives an immediate threat of serious bodily harm or death to themselves or to others. . . Neither post-incident proof that Collie carried no weapon, nor the fact that Collie never directly pointed at Flores changes this analysis. Nor do the stop-action shots made by Collie's expert from the dash cam video change this analysis, because they give a false perspective on events that transpired in a few seconds. The district court properly focused on whether Officer Barron's actions were justified in the heat of the moment. . . The district court's determination that Officer Barron acted reasonably in light of the facts before him is well supported. . . .Collie fails to address the Supreme Court's explicit directive in Pauly that although claims of excessive force do not require a case that is directly on point, the standard hugs the line closely by requiring a case 'under similar circumstances.'. . Instead, Collie relies on Graham v. Connor for the general rule that an officer's actions must be objectively reasonable. He then contends that because he did not fit more complete descriptions of the suspects, did not point in the direction of Deputy Flores, and did not have a weapon in his hand, Officer Barron's claim to believe his partner's life was in danger should be given no more weight than Collie's own testimony. We note that the summary judgment evidence does not show that the officers had received the height/weight/age descriptions of the suspects at the time they encountered Collie. Collie's position also excludes the relevant facts that he was a shirtless black male on foot in the near vicinity of the robbery who encountered the officers in a dimly lit area and did not stop in response to their commands. Accordingly, Collie's argument failed to discharge his legal burden to 'find a case in his favor that does not define the law at a "high level of generality."'")

Winfrey v. Rogers, 901 F.3d 483, 494-98 (5th Cir. 2018), pet. for cert. filed sub nom Johnson v. Winfrey, No. 21-1466 (U.S. May 18, 2022) ("Here, the clearly established constitutional right asserted by Junior is to be free from police arrest without a good faith showing of probable cause. Since Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154, 98 S.Ct. 2674, 57 L.Ed.2d 667 (1978), it has been clearly established that a defendant's Fourth Amendment rights are violated if (1) the affiant, in support of the warrant, includes 'a false statement knowingly and intentionally, or with reckless disregard for the truth' and (2) 'the allegedly false statement is necessary to the finding of probable cause.'. . In Franks, the Supreme Court observed that the warrant requirement is meant 'to allow the magistrate to make an independent evaluation of the matter.'. . It requires affiants to 'set forth particular facts and circumstances underlying the existence of probable cause,' including those that concern the reliability of the information and the credibility of the source to avoid 'deliberately or reckless false statement[s].'. .Still, 'negligence alone will not defeat qualified immunity.'. . '[A] proven misstatement can vitiate an affidavit only if it is established that the misstatement was the product "of deliberate falsehood or of reckless disregard for the truth."'. . Recklessness requires proof that the defendant ' "in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth" of the statement.'. .Here, we conclude that Junior alleges a clearly established constitutional violation. . . . In short, the evidence presented is sufficient to support a finding that [Johnson's] conduct was unreasonable in the light of the well-established principle requiring probable cause for the issuance of an arrest warrant. . . . The primary question on remand appears to be whether Johnson acted recklessly, knowingly, or intentionally by presenting the judge with an arrest-warrant affidavit that contained numerous omissions and misstatements. This case should go to trial without delay in a manner not inconsistent with this opinion.") Perniciaro v. Lea, 901 F.3d 241, 256-57 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Even if we agreed that the professional-judgment standard applies to persons detained pre-trial for competency restoration, Perniciaro still would have failed to establish that defendants' conduct violated clearly established law. . . Perniciaro has not cited a single case—either in his briefing before the district court or before us—clearly establishing that the particular conduct at issue here violates the professional-judgment standard. Thus, he has failed to address the dispositive question: '[W]hether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. .Perniciaro relies on the general statement that, under Youngberg, his due-process rights to care and safety were violated because defendants' actions '[were] such a substantial departure from accepted professional judgment, practice, or standards as to demonstrate that the person responsible actually did not base the decision on such a judgment.' But general propositions of law defined at 'high level[s] of generality' are insufficient to define clearly established law for purposes of defeating qualified immunity. . . Even assuming that the Youngberg standard applies, Perniciaro has failed to establish that defendants' conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. . . . But assuming—as did the district court—that the deliberate-indifference standard applies, defendants would still be entitled to qualified immunity. The evidence, taken in the light most favorable to Perniciaro, fails to establish a dispute of material fact as to whether defendants' conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law.

Romero v. City of Grapevine, Texas, 888 F.3d 170, 178 n.3 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Even if Clark had used excessive force in violation of Villalpando's Fourth Amendment right, Clark would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the right, defined at a fact specific level, was not clearly established at the time of the violation. . . The Supreme Court has explained that courts must not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Instead, the question is 'whether it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibited the officer's conduct in the "situation [he or she] confronted."'. . Romero does not cite to any controlling authority nor does she point to a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority' that suggests Clark's actions were obviously unconstitutional. . . While authority need not be exactly analogous to aid the court in determining whether a right was clearly established, 'this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case,' and the authority must 'squarely govern[ ]' the circumstances. . . There simply is no such authority.")

Hale v. City of Biloxi, 731 F. App'x 259, ___ (5th Cir. 2018) ("Hale must point to case law clearly establishing that Lea and Garner acted unreasonably based on facts similar to the particular circumstances they faced—the use of deadly force and a taser where a person suspected of a nonviolent crime ignores repeated warnings to keep his hands visible and step outside of a confined area when he knows the people warning him are armed police officers, even if they have not told him he is under arrest. . . Hale does not cite any such case on point. Hale does try to distinguish our prior cases where officers were entitled to qualified immunity because they reasonably believed the suspect was reaching for a weapon. As discussed, Hale argues that, in those cases, the suspect was wanted for a violent crime, resisting or fleeing arrest, or clearly brandishing a weapon. We have already explained that Manis shows Hale cannot prevail on this front. Moreover, the fact that in previous cases we found qualified immunity where such factors were present, but where we did not state that those factors were required for qualified immunity, would hardly provide 'fair warning' to Garner and Lea.")

Sam v. Richard, 887 F.3d 710, 714 & n.3 (5th Cir. 2018) ("On the facts as recounted by Sam, Richard's use of force was objectively unreasonable at the summary judgment stage. Although Sam initially ran, he states in deposition that he was lying face down on the ground with his hands on his head when Richard kneed him in the hip and pushed him against a patrol car. Such a use of force on a compliant suspect is excessive and unreasonable. . . Furthermore, it was clearly established at the time of this incident that pushing, kneeing, and slapping a suspect who is neither fleeing nor resisting is excessive. . . Richard's contention that the force alleged by Sam would have produced more serious injuries is a question of credibility which is not appropriate for resolution at this stage. Accordingly, we hold that Sam's evidence of excessive force is sufficient to survive a motion for summary judgment. . . .We note that the Supreme Court recently reversed denial of qualified immunity in an excessive force case. See Kisela v. Hughes, —— U.S. ——, 138 S.Ct. 1148, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2018) (per curiam). But, as that decision instructs, '[u]se of excessive force is an area of the law "in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case."' The facts at issue in Kisela bear little resemblance to those before us here.")

Lincoln v. Scott, 887 F.3d 190, 197-98 (5th Cir. 2018) ("[A]lthough the officers violated Erin's Fourth Amendment rights by detaining her for four hours without probable cause, the court must determine whether that right was 'clearly established.'. . . In a recent, related appeal, this court held that it was not clearly established that an officer could not detain the sole compliant witness to a police shooting. Turner, 874 F.3d at 849. . . The court disagreed with Erin's reliance on Dunaway v. New York . . . and Davis v. Mississippi. . . as evidence that the Fourth Amendment right violated was clearly established. Turner, 874 F.3d at 849. It held that those cases did not 'clearly establish[ ] that a law enforcement officer could not detain a witness to a police shooting for ... two hours while a SWAT team sorted out the scene, [particularly] when the witness was standing beside a person when the police shot him.'. . . Moreover, Walker similarly determined that the officers did not violate clearly established law when officers forcefully detained witnesses in their own home. . . The intricate facts here—reasonableness of detaining a sole, compliant witness to a police shooting—have never been directly addressed or clearly established by this Circuit or the Supreme Court. See Turner, 874 F.3d at 849. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly stressed that courts must not "define clearly established law at a high level of generality, since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced."'. . Our inability to point to a string of cases establishing 'settled law' that these facts amount to a Fourth Amendment violation demonstrates that the violated right was not so clearly established that these officers can be liable. . . In sum, this court, as well as other circuits, have determined that officers acting under similar circumstances—detaining a sole witness for questioning and investigative preservation—do not violate any clearly established right. It follows that these officers—Meeks, Scott, and Barnes—similarly were not bound by any such clearly established law. The district court correctly granted these officers qualified immunity.")

Melton v. Phillips, 875 F.3d 256, 262-66 (5th Cir. 2017) (en banc) ("The panel opinion treated Jennings and Hampton as in conflict with Hart. . . However, we, like the parties in this case, interpret our precedents to be in one accord. Thus, an officer who has provided information for the purpose of its being included in a warrant application under Hart has assisted in preparing the warrant application for purposes of Jennings and Hampton and may be liable, but an officer who has not provided information for the purpose of its being included in a warrant application may be liable only if he signed or presented the application. . . . Here, the fact issue that the district court identified was whether Deputy Phillips used the P.I.D. in an improper way while preparing the incident report. The district court determined that this fact issue was material to recklessness and that Deputy Phillips's immunity depended on whether he was reckless because, as the district court understood it, Franks applies to 'any government official who makes a reckless misstatement.' However, even assuming arguendo that Deputy Phillips was reckless in completing the incident report, . . . he is still entitled to summary judgment unless there is a question of fact as to whether he assisted in the preparation of the complaint on the basis of which the capias warrant issued. . . Melton seeks to create a fact issue as to whether Deputy Phillips helped prepare the complaint by providing information for use in it, asserting that '[a]ny investigator would know' an incident report will be used to obtain a warrant. However, there is no record evidence of a policy or practice at the Hunt County Sheriff's Office that would have allowed Deputy Phillips to anticipate that the incident report would be used to obtain a warrant. . . .Even assuming arguendo that Melton could demonstrate that a fact issue exists on his claim that Deputy Phillips recklessly filled out the incident report, Melton bears the burden of demonstrating that Deputy Phillips violated his clearly established rights. . . . Rather than attempting to demonstrate that his rights were clearly established by cases addressing analogous or near-analogous facts, Melton has repeatedly emphasized that the facts of his case are unique. . . Moreover, Melton conceded at oral argument that he could not identify a single case applying Franks to a situation in which there was no error in the complaint and no false statement that made its way into the warrant. . . Indeed, Franks expressly requires a falsehood to be included in the warrant application for there to be a Fourth Amendment violation. . . Particularly in light of Franks's detailed discussion of why its rule must be narrowly construed, we cannot say Franks clearly established the unconstitutionality of Deputy Phillips's conduct. . . Moreover, even if Melton had attempted to satisfy his burden rather than conceding that his case is unique and that no case applies Franks in similar circumstances, Melton could not have shown that Deputy Phillips violated his clearly established rights without assisting in preparing, presenting, or signing the complaint. Hart and Hampton had been decided at the time Deputy Phillips prepared the incident report. As discussed above, Hampton held that an officer is entitled to qualified immunity if he does not prepare, present, or sign a warrant application. . . Hart held that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity if he 'deliberately or recklessly provides false, material information for use in an affidavit in support of [a warrant].". . Because Melton cannot show that Deputy Phillips prepared, presented, signed, or provided information for use in the complaint, he cannot show that Deputy Phillips violated clearly established law.")

Melton v. Phillips, 875 F.3d 256, 268 (5th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (Costa, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The en banc court's attempt to reconcile rather than correct our caselaw, with Hart apparently now being a subpart of the Hampton standard, will continue to result in confusion. That confusion is especially problematic for a claim in which individuals can assert a qualified immunity defense as a lack of clarity in the law provides a defense. In a future Franks case, an officer who provided false information 'for use in' an affidavit will no doubt argue he was not 'fully responsible' for the warrant application and thus is immune under the Hampton and Jennings decisions that we reaffirm today. Such a conflict in the caselaw will support an easy defense of qualified immunity as this case demonstrates. Although the 'violation of clearly established law' standard is increasingly being questioned, see Ziglar v. Abbasi, —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 1870–72, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring) (citing Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 Cal. L. Rev. (forthcoming 2018)), it is hard to imagine that any immunity threshold should hold law enforcement to a higher standard than judges when it comes to interpreting the law. If judges thought (and apparently still think) that the Michalik standard should extend to Franks cases, then an officer like Phillips who has neither the legal training of judges nor the time we can devote to parsing caselaw should not face civil liability for that error. So I join the majority opinion in concluding that Phillips is immune from this suit. . .But I would use the en banc process to recognize the dubious provenance of the 'sign or prepare' requirement in our Franks case. Hart alone should provide the appropriate standard for Franks claims. Its 'for use in' requirement is more straightforward, consistent with the law in other circuits, and fully captures Franks's concern that an officer's misrepresentations to a court should not be a basis for interfering with citizens' privacy and liberty interests. Our failure to straighten out the strands of Fourth Amendment law that got tangled in Hampton means that the next time one of these cases comes along, perhaps with a stronger case for liability than this one, the important Fourth Amendment concerns that Franks protects might not be vindicated.")

Melton v. Phillips, 875 F.3d 256, 271-75 (5th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (Dennis, J., joined by Graves, J., dissenting) ("The majority opinion's holding that an officer who makes a deliberate or reckless misrepresentation can only be held liable if he 'assisted in the preparation of, or otherwise presented or signed a warrant application' is unsound and, unsurprisingly, is not the law in any other circuit. . .Our sister circuits' caselaw reflects a common-sense understanding: when an officer, acting with reckless disregard for the truth, includes false, material information in an official report for further official use, leading to an unlawful search or arrest of an innocent person, there is no justification to insulate him from liability. . . . .In addition to establishing an imprudent and unfounded rule of law, the court makes serious procedural missteps. On appeal from the denial of a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, this court 'lack[s] jurisdiction to review the genuineness of a fact issue.'. . We have jurisdiction to review only the materiality of the factual issues. . . In this case, the district court found that the plaintiff 'has introduced evidence suggesting that Phillips's identification of [the plaintiff] in his incident report was reckless.' The majority opinion acknowledges that recklessness is a question of fact, but in the same breath, it concludes that the facts identified by the district court are not 'material' to recklessness. . . In actuality, the majority opinion simply overrules the district court's determination that there is a genuine dispute as to whether Phillips 'in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of the information included in the warrant application,'. . . and by so doing exceeds this court's jurisdiction. . .The majority proceeds to absolve Phillips on the additional basis that, even if he did violate the plaintiff's constitutional rights, those rights were not 'clearly established.' Phillips never made such an argument—not before the district court, not in his brief on appeal, and not in his supplemental en banc brief. The majority opinion states that Phillips's assertion of qualified immunity below 'placed the burden on Melton to demonstrate that neither prong of the defense applies.'. . But it is the appellant's burden to show that the district court erred. . . .Pro se litigants could only dream of receiving the judicial help that the en banc court is giving an officer represented by a highly competent attorney. . . This court's zeal to protect officers from the prospect of chilling liability cannot justify abandoning our rules and reversing the district court's judgment on the basis of arguments that the appellant has not made. . .Because I believe that the majority opinion errs in reversing the district court's denial of qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent.")

Lincoln v. Turner, 874 F.3d 833, 848-51 (5th Cir. 2017) ("As we have already concluded that Erin sufficiently alleged violations of her right to be free from unreasonable seizure and excessive force, the remaining question for qualified immunity purposes is whether those rights were clearly established. . . .The district court held that plaintiffs did not cite clearly established law establishing that an officer cannot 'detain a witness for a period of approximately two hours while an investigation was underway,' although the parties have also consistently addressed Erin's detention as a potential suspect. . . The reality may be somewhere in between. Turner seized Erin in the aftermath of a police shooting resulting from a SWAT team deployment. Even on Erin's account, the scene was tense, and the officers were acting with incomplete information. In these circumstances, Turner may have been entitled to detain Erin for some amount of time to determine her role in the situation. As we explained, Turner exceeded this authority when he handcuffed Erin and detained her in the back of a police car for two hours. In doing so, Turner violated Erin's constitutional rights. Yet we are not persuaded that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' At this stage, Erin has the burden to demonstrate that the law was clearly established in this area on the date of the incident. . . .Davis and Dunaway put officers on notice that probable cause may be required even where an interaction is not labeled an arrest, and Lidster warns officers that the Fourth Amendment applies even in a brief, information-gathering stop. However, none of those cases clearly established that a law enforcement officer could not detain a witness to a police shooting for these two hours while a SWAT team sorted out the scene, at the least when the witness was standing beside a person when the police shot him. Thus, we find that Erin has not shown that the contours of the right were so clearly established that 'a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Finally, we note that there may well be an emerging trend toward holding it unreasonable to detain a police shooting witness for an extended period of time, absent either reasonable suspicion or probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed. . . While we may look to other circuits to find clearly established law, we must consider 'the overall weight' of such authority. . . A 'trend' alone is just that. As of December 2013, only two circuits had weighed in on the 'contours of the right.' These cases alone do not provide sufficient authority to find that the law was clearly established. This conclusion is bolstered by the fact that the Tenth Circuit itself found no 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts,'. . . and the Ninth Circuit relied on intra-circuit precedent to find clearly established law. . . .Although Erin identifies the second step in the qualified immunity analysis, it is not clear that her contention was that the right to be free from excessive force was clearly established in this case. Instead, she suggests that her allegations lead to the conclusion that physically removing Erin in the manner that Turner did was unreasonable, and that her injuries sustain her claim. However, these are arguments that feed into the first step of the qualified immunity analysis—whether there was a constitutional violation. Accordingly, Erin waived argument as to the clearly established law prong and thus cannot overcome qualified immunity. . . Regardless, we cannot on this record conclude that Erin could overcome qualified immunity on her excessive force claim given the lack of guiding precedent that shows the force used in this particular situation was 'clearly unreasonable.'")

Jauch v. Choctaw County, 874 F.3d 425, 436-37 (5th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 638 (2018) (" We have spilled much ink to thoroughly establish our constitutional footing, an effort we found necessary in light of Jones' limited analysis. That explication does not diminish the Jones holding, however—prolonged detention without the benefit of a court appearance violates the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment right to due process. . . The right at issue here was clearly established and its contours 'sufficiently clear' that any reasonable official would understand that the Constitution forbids confining criminal defendants for a prolonged period (months in this case) prior to bringing them before a judge. . . And so we held in Jones itself, ruling the individual defendants, a sheriff and his deputy, not entitled to qualified immunity. . . Sheriff Halford's claim to qualified immunity is less compelling than was the claim of those Mississippi law enforcement officers. Tellingly, Sheriff Halford's arguments relating to qualified immunity do not even mention Jones. In fact, at one point in this litigation, he conceded that that 'the Choctaw County Sheriff's Office, Choctaw County District Attorney or Circuit Court Judge clearly should have provided Plaintiff Jauch with an appearance before the Circuit Court of Choctaw County' within the 30 days provided for by state law. (Emphasis added.) While he attempted to spread the blame to other officials, his actions and decisions are the cause of Jauch's constitutional injury. Either Sheriff Halford is plainly incompetent, or he knowingly violated the law. Sheriff Halford's lone argument regarding qualified immunity is that '[f]unctions of state officials do not impute legal duties actionable by federal tort to a county official simply because the applicable state official is otherwise immune.' Translated from legalese, the assertion is that Jauch sued him only because the truly responsible parties, judges of the circuit court, are immune from suit. This is simply wrong. Sheriff Halford is responsible for those incarcerated in his jail, Miss. Code Ann. § 19-25-69, and the capias did not require him to impose the unconstitutional detention policy.)

See also Jauch v. Choctaw County, 886 F.3d 534, 535, 539-41 (5th Cir. 2018) (Southwick, J., joined by Jones, Smith, Owen, Willett, and Ho, JJ., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) ("I respectfully dissent from our failure to rehear this case en banc. The panel opinion — for the first time in this or any circuit — declared that a sheriff violated the Constitution when an indicted, pretrial detainee was held until the next regular term of the local criminal court before being afforded an opportunity to have bail set. A capias warrant instructed the sheriff to hold her until the term of court, which was when a judge with authority over that prisoner would be in the county. The sheriff did so, following a practice authorized by the state's Supreme Court. There is no law to the contrary that is established with the clarity the United States Supreme Court requires under recent caselaw that was not considered because it postdates the panel opinion. At its most basic, my concern is that in assessing the liability of the County and the sheriff, the panel opinion used precedents that are inapplicable to the process afforded in this case, a process drawn from statutes, court rules, and perhaps even policies of the local judges. I cannot discern how these defendants had any effect on when this plaintiff was considered for release. Thus, as to these parties, I believe the panel was wrong. More relevant to whether to take a case en banc, what rights prisoners have to be released on bail or otherwise before trial is a profoundly significant question due to its implications for individual liberty. The full court should rework the answer. . . .In summary, under state law the sheriff had no clear obligation to take Jauch before a judicial officer for an initial appearance or for a preliminary hearing because she had been indicted. There was no obligation on the sheriff to have Jauch arraigned because that is a duty that falls elsewhere. The explicit obligation under the court-issued capias was to hold Jauch until the next circuit court term, which is just what the sheriff did. Those legal points are clear, to my eyes at least. The controlling question, then, is whether there was other law that with better clarity established that every reasonable sheriff would have known Jauch had a federal right that overrode these state procedures. See Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 641 (1987). The only precedent the Jauch panel considered to be directly on point involved jail procedures in Jackson, Mississippi. Jauch v. Choctaw Cnty., 874 F.3d 425, 429 (5th Cir. 2017) (citing Jones v. City of Jackson, 203 F.3d 875 (5th Cir. 2000)). That is a decision that set no specific time limit for presenting a detainee to a magistrate, did not discuss the practice of waiting until the next term of court, and did not address a sheriff's responsibility in such matters. Absolutely critical, Jones had not been jailed after indictment. Thus, in light of what I have already discussed about indicted detainees, Jones seems all but irrelevant. Silence in these varied respects is itself enough to say Jones did not clearly establish the relevant law for the Choctaw County sheriff. . . . [T]he governing law was not clearly established to justify denying qualified immunity to the sheriff.

Under Wesby, Jones is not a closely analogous case. Whether Jauch was detained unconstitutionally while awaiting the return of a circuit court judge is not clearly established by Jones, which did not set a specific time limitation and did not involve a circuit-riding judge. Eldridge and Medina offer general pronouncements about due process without remotely similar facts. Finally, this is not a case about indefinite detention. It is about unfairly delayed consideration for bail, but not a delay yet clearly announced as unconstitutional. . . .My able colleagues on the Jauch panel held that based on Jones and these more general authorities, it was 'clearly established' that Mississippi's 'policy whereby certain arrestees were indefinitely detained without access to courts' violates an individual's constitutional due process rights. Jauch, 874 F.3d at 436. No such clarity was established by Jones — it did not even deal with the relevant post-indictment procedures. The panel also concluded it was 'clearly established' that 'the Constitution forbids confining criminal defendants for a prolonged period' before bringing them before a judge. . . True, but what was not clear at all to someone responsible for detention is how prolonged detention must be to constitute a violation of rights. The caselaw would not have informed very many officials that the state's post-indictment rules violated the federal Constitution. Thus, qualified immunity applies.")

Trammell v. Fruge, 868 F.3d 332, 343 (5th Cir. 2017) ("[T]his Court's opinion in Goodson outlines a scenario very similar to this case. Both Goodson and this case involve a plaintiff who was tackled by officers after very minimal physical resistance—pulling away from an officer after the officer grabbed the plaintiff's arm. The primary distinction between Goodson and this case appears to be the fact that in Goodson, the defendant officers lacked any reasonable suspicion to detain or frisk the plaintiff in the first place. Goodson, 202 F.3d at 740. Here, on the other hand, it is virtually undisputed that the officers had probable cause to arrest Trammel for public intoxication. But we find this distinction is merely a matter of degree. In Graham, the Supreme Court directed lower courts to consider 'the severity of the crime at issue' in determining whether police officers used excessive force. . . We interpret Goodson's focus on reasonable suspicion as a consideration of this factor. So, while in Goodson, the officers lacked reasonable suspicion that the plaintiff had committed any crime, here the officers believed the plaintiff was guilty of the minor offense of public intoxication. Although the severity factor may have weighed slightly more in favor of finding a use of force reasonable in this case than it did in Goodson, we nevertheless conclude that Goodson gave officers 'fair warning' that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Accordingly, the law at the time of Trammel's arrest clearly established that it was objectively unreasonable for several officers to tackle an individual who was not fleeing, not violent, not aggressive, and only resisted by pulling his arm away from an officer's grasp.") Trammell v. Fruge, 868 F.3d 332, 346-47 (5th Cir. 2017) (Southwick, J., dissenting in part) ("The majority concludes there are several genuine factual disputes, but it does not always view the facts from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene. For example, it concludes there is 'a question of fact as to whether Trammell posed any danger to himself,' and there is 'a factual dispute as to whether Trammell was actively resisting arrest....' When we review a grant of summary judgment in this context, we 'first constru[e] disputed historical facts in favor of the nonmovant,' but we 'then ask how a reasonable officer would have perceived those historical facts.'. . So the question is not, for example, whether 'a reasonable jury might find that [Trammell] was not actually resisting arrest,' but whether the force used was reasonable 'under the facts as a reasonable officer would perceive them[.]'. . . [T]he law was not clearly established so that 'every "reasonable official would have understood"' that the force used here was unlawful. . . The majority relies heavily on one case to conclude that the law was clearly established. See Goodson v. City of Corpus Christi, 202 F.3d 730 (5th Cir. 2000). That case focused on whether the officers violated the defendant's right to be free from seizure without reasonable suspicion. . . After reversing summary judgment on that claim, the court also held the defendant raised a fact issue regarding whether the officers, 'who lacked reasonable suspicion to detain and frisk [the defendant] and from whom [the defendant] was not fleeing,' used reasonable force. . . Goodson's import in the excessive-force context is limited because it focused on the officers' lack of reasonable suspicion. For that reason, we said in Poole that Goodson 'lack[ed] analytical force in assessing the reasonableness of [the officer's] actions' regarding the amount of force used. . . Griggs supports that the law was not clearly established in our case. . . In Griggs, after the officer told the defendant to stop performing a one-legged stand sobriety test and to put his hands behind his back, the defendant 'lurched to one side and said "no, no."'. . The officer 'immediately placed [the defendant] in a choke hold, swept his legs out from under him, and body-slammed him onto the nearby grass.'. . Once on the ground, the officer punched the defendant several times with a closed fist to the back of the head as he struggled to gain control of the defendant's hands. . . We concluded that our precedent did not clearly establish that the officer's takedown maneuver or use of 'non-deadly punches' to gain control of the defendant was constitutionally unreasonable. . . We distinguished Goodson because that case 'turned not on whether the force was excessive, but on whether the force was justified at all because fact issues remained as to whether the officer had reasonable suspicion to initiate the stop.'. . Here, as in Griggs, our precedents do not make clear to every reasonable officer that the force used was unlawful.")

McClin v. Ard, 866 F.3d 682, 696 (5th Cir. 2017) ("Here, we cannot say that every reasonable officer would understand that McLin was seized for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. To date, neither the Supreme Court nor the Fifth Circuit has decided that an officer's acceptance of a voluntary surrender to an arrest warrant constitutes a Fourth Amendment seizure. And there is no a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority': only one circuit—the Eleventh—has found a seizure in these circumstances in a published opinion, and a majority of circuit courts have not yet weighed in. Although we now hold that McLin was seized, reasonable officers might not have understood that accepting McLin's surrender to the arrest warrants, without imposing further pre-trial restrictions, constituted a seizure. We therefore hold that McLin fails to plead a violation of a 'clearly established' constitutional right, and we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the Defendants and dismissal of McLin's Fourth Amendment claim on that basis.")

Cobarobio v. Midland County, Tex., No. 15-50096, 2017 WL 3495588, at *1 (5th Cir. Aug. 15, 2017) (not reported) ("As determined by the district court, Cobarobio fails to establish that there was a clearly established First Amendment right for him to record police activity during an ongoing emergency situation like the one involved in the instant case. In Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 688 (5th Cir. 2017), this court held that 'First Amendment principles, controlling authority, and persuasive precedent demonstrate that a First Amendment right to record the police does exist, subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions.' However, we did so only after noting that 'there was no clearly established First Amendment right to record the police at the time of Turner's [2015 arrest].'. . Because Cobarobio's arrest occurred in 2012, he cannot satisfy his burden of establishing that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . Moreover, because there was probable cause to arrest Cobarobio for interference with public duties, Cobarobio cannot establish a Fourth Amendment violation.")

Rivera v. Bonner, 952 F.3d 560, 568-70 (5th Cir. 2017) ("[A] few months before Rivera was sexually assaulted, another senior jailer sexually abused a female detainee at the Hale County Jail. This event should have alerted Appellees that a substantial risk of serious harm existed in their facility and that they needed to do more to protect detainees from sexual exploitation. Yet the record suggests that Appellees did not make any modifications to their training, policies, or supervision. Instead, Appellees merely reminded jailers that they should not sexually exploit detainees and posted a sign indicating that 'sex with inmates' was prohibited. A jury could conclude that these reminders did not constitute an adequate response to the serious incident of sexual abuse that had recently transpired in the jail. . . Nonetheless, we must determine whether the constitutional right at issue was clearly established at the time of Appellees' alleged misconduct. In doing so, we look to 'cases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule' or 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable [official] could not have believed that his actions were lawful.'. .It has long been clearly established that detainees like Rivera have the right to be protected from sexual abuse, both at the hands of correctional officers and fellow inmates, and that jail officials violate inmates' constitutional rights 'by showing "deliberate indifference" to a substantial risk' of sexual abuse 'when the official[s] "know[ ] of and disregard[ ] an excessive risk' of that harm occurring. . . By now, the substantial risk of sexual assault in jails and prisons is well-documented and obvious. . . Jail administrators are not permitted to 'bury their heads in the sand' and ignore these obvious risks to the inmate populations they have an affirmative duty to protect. . . Accordingly, this Court has previously held that jail officials who provide 'no training' on sexual abuse and leave their employees 'virtually unsupervised' are deliberately indifferent to the substantial risk that jailers might abuse detainees. . . Still, in the case at bar, Rivera concedes that officers at the jail received at least some state-sanctioned training aimed at sexual assault prevention. She also agrees that Appellees took some limited responsive action following the prior incident of sexual abuse. In other words, we are not faced with a case in which jail officials took no preventive measures to address the risk of sexual assault. And unfortunately, when Rivera was sexually assaulted, our case law did not provide much clarity on the scope of jail officials' obligations with respect to protecting detainees from sexual abuse. Indeed, Rivera has not identified any controlling Fifth Circuit authority establishing the constitutional inadequacy of Appellees' response to the risk of sexual assault in their jail. . . . Furthermore, at the time of the sexual assault in this case, there was not a consensus of persuasive authority such that reasonable officials in Appellees' position would have known their actions were unlawful. . . . As a result, we conclude that it was not clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct that Appellees needed to make significant changes to their training, supervision, and policies in response to the July 2014 incident of sexual abuse. We hold that the district court did not err in concluding that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Rivera's inadequate training and supervision claims.")

Brinsdon v. McAllen ISD, 863 F.3d 338, 350-53 (5th Cir. 2017) ("[I]t is clearly established that a school may compel some speech. Otherwise, a student who refuses to respond in class or do homework would not suffer any consequences. Students, moreover, generally do not have a right to reject curricular choices as these decisions are left to the sound discretion of instructors. . . .As true of us all, teachers and administrators can exercise their discretion poorly. This case involved a student's disagreement with a teacher's curricular choices and First Amendment issues arising from how the disagreement was addressed. We conclude that Santos as teacher, and Cavazos as principal, were not ignoring clearly established law when compelling a non-operative recitation of the Mexican pledge. Qualified immunity on compelled speech was properly granted. . . .Making unauthorized and secret video recordings of secondary-school classes does not represent a recognized First Amendment right, nor does the public dissemination of the video. To use Tinker's formulation, it was an 'invasion of the rights of others[.]'. . No clearly established law would have counseled these defendants not to respond to such behavior. To summarize, the evidence is that disruptions in mid-October were triggered primarily by dissemination of the secret video that showed students, with their faces blurred, performing the Mexican pledge. School officials did not violate clearly established law when the school reacted to the secretly taken video, and the evidence is that is what the officials did. We agree with the district court that Brinsdon's First Amendment rights were not violated by school officials reacting to the disruptions that had occurred and might continue. Qualified immunity was properly granted to Santos and Cavazos on the claim they violated Brinsdon's First Amendment rights by removing her from class.")

Brewer v. Hayne, 860 F.3d 819, 824-26 (5th Cir. 2017) ("Plaintiffs argue that the clearly established right at issue here is the due process right to be free from fabricated evidence. We have previously held that 'deliberate or knowing creation of misleading and scientifically inaccurate [evidence] amounts to a violation of a defendant's due process rights,' and that reasonable officers know of this right. . . .As a baseline, we agree with the district court that merely presenting forensic odontology evidence in the early 1990s was not unreasonable or violative of due process. While that sort of evidence has been called into question, . . . at the time of Plaintiffs' trials, forensic odontology was widely accepted. Plaintiffs are thus tasked with demonstrating not that the evidence Defendants presented is no longer considered trustworthy, but rather that Defendants intentionally created false evidence or intentionally produced evidence that they knew to be scientifically inaccurate by the standards of the day. . . . Plaintiffs have made a compelling showing that Defendants were negligent in their forensic analysis, but negligence alone will not defeat qualified immunity. . . Viewed in the most favorable light, Plaintiffs' evidence is not suggestive of an intent to fabricate. . . . Absent some additional evidence, the autopsy form and the result of the biopsy in the Brooks case are not sufficient to raise a reasonable inference that Dr. Hayne either deliberately failed to perform biopsies or withheld exculpatory evidence. At most, Plaintiffs have presented evidence that Dr. Hayne was negligent in failing to perform the biopsies or in failing to examine biopsied tissues. Ultimately, we think that true of all the evidence in the record: viewed in its entirety and in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the record tends to show that Defendants were negligent—perhaps grossly so—but no more. Plaintiffs have failed to raise a genuine issue of fact as to whether Defendants violated their right to due process by intentionally creating false or misleading scientific evidence. Defendants were entitled to summary judgment under the defense of qualified immunity. We affirm.")

Lincoln v. Barnes, 855 F.3d 297, 301-04 (5th Cir. 2017) ("The question . . . is whether Erin's detention at the police station for the purposes of questioning her as a witness to her father's shooting and obtaining her statement satisfied the Fourth Amendment's 'reasonableness' requirement. The relevant facts are as follows: Erin witnessed the events leading up to her father's death; after her father was lethally shot by members of the SWAT team, the police had an interest in detaining Erin to solicit information from her, including a statement; toward that end, Erin was handcuffed and placed in the backseat of a patrol car; after a period of approximately two hours, she was transported to the police station; and at the station, Barnes and Meeks questioned her for approximately five hours and forced her to write out a statement. . . . Accordingly, police violate the Fourth Amendment when, absent probable cause or the individual's consent, they seize and transport a person to the police station and subject her to prolonged interrogation. . . .Walker is persuasive authority that the prolonged detention of witnesses to a police shooting for the sole purpose of obtaining information from them, including statements, is unreasonable absent any exigencies justifying the detention for investigative purposes. . . But the clearly established law governing this case derives from Davis and Dunaway, not Walker. . . .While 'the law ordinarily permits police to seek the voluntary cooperation of members of the public in the investigation of a crime,'. . . '[a]bsent special circumstances, the person approached may not be detained ... but may refuse to cooperate and go on his way[.]'. . . Any further detention of such individual constitutes a seizure under the Fourth Amendment, which must satisfy the Fourth Amendment's 'reasonableness' requirement. . . As a general matter, the detention of a witness that is indistinguishable from custodial interrogation requires no less probable cause than a traditional arrest. Dunaway, 442 U.S. at 216; Davis, 394 U.S. at 726–28.")

Alexander v. City of Round Rock, 854 F.3d 298, 305, 308 (5th Cir. 2017) ("We do not suggest that officers in this circuit have faced this precise factual situation before. But that is not a condition precedent to denying qualified immunity—'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . Based on these facts alone, we cannot conclude as a matter of law that Garza had reasonable suspicion to detain Alexander pursuant to the Fourth Amendment. Moreover, taking the facts as alleged, the lack of reasonable suspicion was clearly established—the factors we laid out as relevant in Hill, Martinez, Rideau, and Micheletti, as well as the Supreme Court's decision in Wardlow, do not support reasonable suspicion here. We therefore reverse the district court's dismissal of Alexander's unlawful detention claim. . . . Alexander also argues that the officers retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment right to be silent and not answer their questions. This argument was not addressed straight-on by the district court. We hold that Alexander's claim on this point cannot overcome the officers' qualified immunity, because 'it was not clearly established that an individual has a First Amendment right to refuse to answer an officer's questions during a Terry stop.' Koch v. City of Del City, 660 F.3d 1228, 1244 (10th Cir. 2011). . . Surprisingly few courts have ruled on this precise issue; the parties point to no cases from this circuit directly on point. The sparse case law that does exist, however, indicates no consensus that a defendant has a First Amendment right not to answer an officer's questions during a stop like the one at issue here.")

Hanks v. Rogers, 853 F.3d 738, 747-49 (5th Cir. 2017) ("'[C]learly established law must be "particularized" to the facts of the case,'. . . and 'should not be defined "at a high level of generality,"'. . . . " In other words, outside of 'an obvious case,' the law is only 'clearly established' if a prior case exists 'where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . In 'an obvious case,' Graham and Garner may supply the 'clearly established law.'. .In this case, we conclude that on the night Officer Rogers stopped Hanks, clearly established law demonstrated that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment if he abruptly resorts to overwhelming physical force rather than continuing verbal negotiations with an individual who poses no immediate threat or flight risk, who engages in, at most, passive resistance, and whom the officer stopped for a minor traffic violation. . . . Though we conclude Deville clearly proscribed Officer Rogers's actions, we also view this as an 'obvious' instance of excessive force in light of the factors set forth in Graham. Graham directs us to consider the 'facts and circumstances of each particular case, including the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . As noted above, all of these factors strongly favor Hanks. No reasonable officer who is aiming a taser at the back of an individual such as Hanks—i.e., an individual who (1) was stopped for a minor traffic violation; (2) exited his car and has his hands displayed behind his back, thus presenting no immediate threat or flight risk; and (3) has displayed, at most, passive resistance, including asking whether he was under arrest—would escalate the situation via a physical takedown only seconds after ordering that individual to kneel. . . We hold that on Feb. 26, 2013, clearly established law demonstrated, and Graham makes obvious, that it was clearly unreasonable and excessive for Officer Rogers to abruptly escalate the encounter via a physical takedown where (1) Officer Rogers stopped Hanks for a minor traffic offense; (2) immediately before the takedown, Officer Rogers had his taser aimed at Hanks's back while Hanks stood against his vehicle, facing away from Officer Rogers, with his empty hands displayed behind his back, presenting no immediate threat or flight risk; and (3) Hanks offered, at most, passive resistance, including asking whether he was under arrest.")

Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 685-90 (5th Cir. 2017) ("The district court's analysis rested on the second, 'clearly established,' prong, so we begin there. . . .At the time in question, neither the Supreme Court nor this court had determined whether First Amendment protection extends to the recording or filming of police. . . Although Turner insists, as some district courts in this circuit have concluded, that First Amendment protection extends to the video recording of police activity in light of general First Amendment principles, . . . the Supreme Court has 'repeatedly' instructed courts 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality': 'The general proposition, for example, that an unreasonable search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment is of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.' . . Thus, Turner's reliance on decisions that 'clarified that [First Amendment] protections ... extend[ ] to gathering information' does not demonstrate whether the specific act at issue here—video recording the police or a police station—was clearly established. . . The district court stated that circuit courts 'are split as to whether or not there is a clearly established First Amendment right to record the public activities of police.' The circuit courts are not split, however, on whether the right exists. The First and Eleventh Circuits have held that the First Amendment protects the rights of individuals to videotape police officers performing their duties. . . In American Civil Liberties Union v. Alvarez, the Seventh Circuit explained that the First Amendment protects the audio recording of the police and concluded that an Illinois wiretapping statute, which criminalized the audio recording of police officers, merited heightened First Amendment scrutiny because of its burdens on First Amendment rights. . . No circuit has held that the First Amendment protection does not extend to the video recording of police activity, although several circuit courts have explained that the law in their respective circuits is not clearly established while refraining from determining whether there is a First Amendment right to record the police. . . We cannot say, however, that 'existing precedent ... placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate' when Turner recorded the police station. . . Neither does it seem that the law 'so clearly and unambiguously prohibited [the officers'] conduct that "every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates [the law]."'. . In light of the absence of controlling authority and the dearth of even persuasive authority, there was no clearly established First Amendment right to record the police at the time of Turner's activities. All three officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Turner's First Amendment claim. . . . Although the right was not clearly established at the time of Turner's activities, whether such a right exists and is protected by the First Amendment presents a separate and distinct question. . . Because the issue continues to arise in the qualified immunity context, . . .we now proceed to determine it for the future. We conclude that First Amendment principles, controlling authority, and persuasive precedent demonstrate that a First Amendment right to record the police does exist, subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. . . .We agree with every circuit that has ruled on this question: Each has concluded that the First Amendment protects the right to record the police. . . .This right, however, 'is not without limitations.'. . Like all speech, . . filming the police 'may be subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions.'. . In this case, however, we need not decide which specific time, place, and manner restrictions would be reasonable. . . Nonetheless, we note that when police departments or officers adopt time, place, and manner restrictions, those restrictions must be 'narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest.'. . That said, to be constitutionally permissible, a time, place, and manner restriction 'need not be the least restrictive or least intrusive means of serving the government's interests.'")

Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 696-97 (5th Cir. 2017) (Clement, J., dissenting as to Parts III.A.2 & III.B.1.b) ("I respectfully dissent from the majority's dicta purporting to clearly establish a First Amendment right to film the police and from the majority's reversal of the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Officers Grinalds and Dyess regarding Turner's unlawful arrest claim. . . .The majority does not determine that the officers here violated Turner's First Amendment rights—perhaps because it would be reasonable for security reasons to restrict individuals from filming police officers entering and leaving a police station. Because the majority does not hold that the officers actually violated the First Amendment, 'an officer acting under similar circumstances' in the future will not have violated any clearly established law.")

Davidson v. City of Stafford, Texas, 848 F.3d 384, 392-94 (5th Cir. 2017) ("We agree with the district court that there was no actual probable cause for Davidson's arrest. At the time Officers Flagg and Jones arrested Davidson, the only crime charged to Davidson was failure to identify under § 38.02. This is further confirmed in Davidson's police report, which charged Davidson with failure to identify under § 38.02(a). But § 38.02(a) applies only when an officer 'has lawfully arrested the person and requested the information.' Tex. Penal Code § 38.02(a). At the time they performed the arrest for the alleged § 38.02 violation, Davidson was not under arrest for any other violation, thus, the 'failure to identify' statute clearly was not triggered. We therefore conclude that the district court correctly determined that the officers had no actual or 'arguable' probable cause for arresting Davidson under § 38.02. We consider whether they had probable cause under any other statute below. Turning to objective or 'arguable' probable cause, and taking the facts in the light most favorable to Davidson, it is clear that the officers were objectively unreasonable in believing that there was probable cause for Davidson's arrest under the only other section posited here, § 42.03. Based on the information available to Officers Flagg and Jones, Davidson had not 'render[ed] impassable or ... render[ed] passage unreasonably inconvenient or hazardous' for Clinic patients. Tex. Penal Code § 42.03. . . .In addition to cases establishing the lack of probable cause, there was fulsome case law clearly establishing that an arrest without probable cause violates both First and Fourth Amendment rights at the time of Davidson's arrest in 2013. Specifically, Officers Flagg's and Jones's conduct violated Davidson's clearly established rights as demonstrated in federal case law. . . .These federal and state decisions make clear that Davidson's arrest without probable cause was a violation of his First and Fourth Amendment rights. . . . On the second prong of the qualified immunity defense, recent Supreme Court decisions addressing claims for excessive force have 'reiterate[d] the longstanding principle that "clearly established law" should not be defined "at a high level of generality."'. . Our cases outside the excessive force area involving warrantless arrests and limits on speech have not specifically mentioned this aspect of Supreme Court cases. . . Assuming arguendo that the specific White/Mullenix admonition applies to all qualified immunity cases regardless of the constitutional violation charged, the officers here still come up short. The cases cited above clearly demonstrate what does and does not violate § 42.03 and also clearly establish the unconstitutionality of warrantless arrests without probable cause. Even if he had not been exercising core First Amendment rights, Davidson was not (even arguably) in violation of § 42.03 when he stood outside of the Clinic. Additionally, his right to protest prohibited the officers' application of § 42.03 in the manner employed here. Resolving all factual disputes in favor of Davidson, the objective unreasonableness displayed by Officers Flagg and Jones in the face of law clearly establishing Davidson's rights leads us to the conclusion that qualified immunity cannot shield their actions against Davidson. We conclude that in Davidson's case, 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates' Davidson's rights.")

Cooper v. Brown, 844 F.3d 517, 524-25 (5th Cir. 2016) ("The undisputed facts establish that Brown's use of force was objectively unreasonable. . . To be clear, we do not say that any application of force to a compliant arrestee is per se unreasonable, and we do not opine on the line of reasonableness. Instead, we state only the obvious: Under the facts in this record, permitting a dog to continue biting a compliant and non-threatening arrestee is objectively unreasonable. . . .Cooper's right was clearly established. Our caselaw makes certain that once an arrestee stops resisting, the degree of force an officer can employ is reduced. [discussing cases] In the same way, Cooper was not attempting to resist arrest or flee, and Brown had no reason to think that he posed an immediate threat. Moreover, the fact that Bush and Newman are not dog-bite cases does not shield Brown. 'Lawfulness of force ... does not depend on the precise instrument used to apply it. Qualified immunity will not protect officers who apply excessive and unreasonable force merely because their means of applying it are novel.'. . Thus, Brown had 'fair warning' that subjecting a compliant and non-threatening arrestee to a lengthy dog attack was objectively unreasonable.")

Anderson v. Valdez, 845 F.3d 580, 599-602 (5th Cir. 2016) ("Valdez urges that, even if Anderson stated a retaliation claim, he (Valdez) is entitled to qualified immunity because neither Garcetti nor other relevant contemporary cases clearly established that speech made pursuant to a professional (here, ethical) duty is not speech made pursuant to an official duty. Anderson counters that Garcetti did nothing more than create a limited presumption that speech made by a public employee pursuant to an official duty is unprotected; it did not disrupt the presumption that speech made by a public employee is presumptively protected, including speech made pursuant to an ethical duty. . . . By at least 2014, it was clearly established that an employee's speech made 'externally' concerning 'an event that was not within [his or her] job requirements' was entitled to First Amendment protection. . . Taking Anderson's allegations as true, as we must at this stage of the litigation, Anderson alleges exactly what Cutler requires. First, Anderson alleges that he reported his concerns about Justice Valdez externally, viz., to the State Commission on Judicial Conduct. . . Second, Anderson alleges that his complaint to the judicial conduct commission was outside of his job duties. Accepting Anderson's allegations as true, Cutler decides this appeal. That is not to say that, by 2014, our law applying Garcetti spoke loudly regarding every factual circumstance. Indeed, just after Anderson spoke, the Supreme Court clarified Garcetti in Lane. . . . Lane plainly demonstrates that, following Garcetti, some First Amendment retaliation cases would still result in findings of qualified immunity. That is, Garcetti did not plainly establish all First Amendment retaliation law. Nonetheless, Cutler makes it apparent that Garcetti, and this court's jurisprudence interpreting it, clearly established some law. The question is how much. Based on the allegations at issue here, Howell v. Town of Ball answers that question. . . There, the plaintiff alleged that he had been fired from his job as a town police officer for cooperating with an FBI investigation into public corruption. . . The plaintiff 'emphasize[d] that, under the Supreme Court's recent decision in Lane, the relevant question [was] whether the speech at issue [was] ordinarily within the scope of an employee's duties.'. . And, what job duties were 'ordinary' was critical to the court's holding. The plaintiff 'offered evidence that his involvement in the FBI investigation was outside the ordinary scope [of] his professional duties.'. .The defendants pointed to the 'general' duty of all police officers to 'detect and prevent crime.'. .We found that the defendants' evidence was inadequate because broad general duties 'fail to describe with sufficient detail the day-to-day duties of a public employee's job.'. . . Nonetheless, we determined that the individual defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. . .In doing so, we noted that 'the Supreme Court did not emphasize that only speech made in furtherance of an employee's "ordinary" job duties is not protected until nearly three years after [plaintiff] was discharged.'. . . Reading Howell in the framework of Cutler properly synthesizes Lane's effect on Garcetti. Namely, Garcetti and our court's pre-Lane jurisprudence established that when employees speak outside of their chain of command and outside of their job duties they are entitled to First Amendment protection. . . Lane and Howell, however, indicate that some cases are too difficult to be determined pursuant to that rule. Even though in some cases employees might have a general employment duty to speak, that duty is not part of their 'ordinary' official duties, so their speech pursuant to that general duty is protected by the First Amendment. Equally clear, however, is that neither Lane nor Howell meaningfully altered the analysis required by Garcetti and Cutler when an employee's allegations do not concern the distinction between 'ordinary' and 'non-ordinary' job duties. . . Here, there is not—and at the motion to dismiss stage there can never be—a meaningful factual dispute that implicates Lane's ordinariness rule. . . Anderson alleges that his speech to the State Commission on Judicial Conduct was made outside of his chain of command and outside of his job duties. Perhaps at the summary judgment or trial phase facts will come to light that implicate Lane. Until then, however, the ordinariness rule simply does not implicate the right at issue here. Accordingly, under Cutler, Anderson has pleaded the violation of a clearly established right. Qualified immunity thus does not apply—at least, not yet.")

Anderson v. Valdez, 845 F.3d 580, 603-07 (5th Cir. 2016) (Jones, J., dissenting) ("I agree with the majority that even after Garcetti v. Ceballos, 547 U.S. 410, 126 S. Ct. 1951 (2006), Anderson has plausibly alleged a violation of his First Amendment rights. Unfortunately, that is the end of our agreement, because I disagree with the majority's reasoning to this conclusion and would grant qualified immunity. . . . [T]he issue is more complex than the majority's analysis acknowledges because, under the Texas Constitution, the Commission includes members of the public, . . . but its proposed sanctions against a judge are ultimately reviewable by the Texas Supreme Court. . . The Texas judiciary may thus be considered its own self-regulator. In this situation, Chief Justice Valdez's argument is far from frivolous that Anderson's complaint went up the 'chain of command' within the judiciary. Consequently, the ultimate constitutional status of Anderson's speech, and thus his right to a First Amendment shield against employment consequences, are debatable. Debatable constitutional violations demand qualified immunity for public officials, even when this court is bound to conclude that a violation in fact occurred. . .For these reasons, even if Anderson's allegations are proven to be true, I conclude that Chief Justice Valdez visited unconstitutional retaliation upon Anderson but the law was not 'clearly established' such that any 'reasonable [judicial] official would understand' that Anderson's speech was constitutionally protected because it occurred outside the law clerk's 'chain of command.'") .

Cowart v. Erwin, 837 F.3d 444, 454-55 (5th Cir. 2016) ("We have little difficulty concluding that in 2009, the time of the incident, it was well-established, in sufficiently similar situations, that officers may not 'use gratuitous force against a prisoner who has already been subdued ... [or] incapacitated.' . .Reasonable officers had fair notice that such conduct under the circumstances violated Cowart's right to be free from excessive force.")

Gonzalez v. Huerta, 826 F.3d 854, 857-59 (5th Cir. 2016) ("[E]ven if we assume that Huerta violated Gonzalez's constitutional rights by detaining him without reasonable suspicion, we cannot say that this detention was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. . . Gonzalez argues that the law is clearly established that a police officer's demand for identification constitutes a seizure under the Fourth Amendment and must be based on reasonable suspicion. But this general claim—that a seizure under the Fourth Amendment must be based on reasonable suspicion—is precisely the type of 'general proposition' that the Supreme Court has rejected. See Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074, 2084 (2011). Instead, the Court has repeatedly emphasized the need to look at the specific facts of a case when determining qualified immunity. . . .With the more specific inquiry the Court requires, the question becomes whether there is either 'directly controlling authority ... establishing the illegality of such conduct' or 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful[.]' . . . Here, it appears that Huerta's decision to detain Gonzalez was based, at least in part, on his belief that Gonzalez was required to identify himself pursuant to § 37.105 of the Texas Education Code. [section 37.105 of the Texas Education Code. Section 37.105 provides: The board of trustees of a school district or its authorized representative may refuse to allow a person without legitimate business to enter on property under the board's control and may eject any undesirable person from the property on the person's refusal to leave peaceably on request. Identification may be required of any person on the property.] And while prior Supreme Court cases have held that police may not detain an individual solely for refusing to provide identification, see Brown [v. Texas], 443 U.S. at 52, and Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada, Humboldt County, 542 U.S. 177, 188 (2004), neither of those cases dealt with incidents occurring on school property. This is no small distinction, as the Supreme Court has routinely reconsidered the scope of individual constitutional rights in a school setting. See, e.g., Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393 (2007); Vernonia Sch. Dist. 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995); New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985). Thus, we find that Brown—which Gonzalez relies on—and Hiibel do not meet the 'sufficiently high level of specificity' necessary 'to put a reasonable official on notice' that detaining an individual for a failure to provide identification on school property 'is definitively unlawful.'. . Accordingly, we do not find that Huerta's actions were 'objectively unreasonable in light of a clearly established rule of law.'. . Huerta is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Gonzalez v. Huerta, 826 F.3d 854, 859-61 (5th Cir. 2016) (Graves, J., dissenting) ("The majority essentially acknowledges that Huerta did not have a reasonable basis to detain Gonzalez, but then determines that the law is not clearly established. I disagree. As an initial matter, I would explicitly conclude that, under the totality of the circumstances, Huerta lacked reasonable suspicion to detain Gonzalez and, thus, violated his constitutional rights. Huerta received only a bare report that originated from an unknown third party of a suspicious' vehicle in the school parking lot and information of a recent history of automobile burglaries at the same location. Huerta did not receive any information connecting either Gonzalez or the 'suspicious' vehicle to that information. As the majority states, the scenario encountered by Huerta was akin to that in Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47, 52 (1979), and did not justify reasonable suspicion for a stop. As the majority further concludes, based on the totality of the facts and circumstances in this case, any suspicions held by Huerta should have been alleviated when he approached the vehicle. However, after a fairly thorough analysis outlining how Huerta violated Gonzalez's constitutional rights without reasonable suspicion, the majority then determines that the very law it relies upon is not clearly established. . . I cannot agree. Further, I disagree with any attempt to make the qualified immunity analysis so fact-specific that it would never be clearly established. Thus, I would conclude that Huerta's detention of Gonzalez was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. In so concluding, I disagree with the majority's characterization of Gonzalez's claim as a 'general proposition' rejected by the Supreme Court. Although the law is clearly established that a seizure under the Fourth Amendment must be based on reasonable suspicion, Gonzalez does not merely make a general claim. Instead, he asserts that a police officer's demand for identification constitutes such a seizure and must be based on reasonable suspicion based on the clearly established law of Brown. . . Further, even Huerta acknowledges that the applicable law here is well-settled. . . . The Supreme Court has definitively held that a police officer may not detain an individual he deems suspicious solely for refusing to provide identification, even under a state statute and in a neighborhood frequented by drug users, without reasonable suspicion. See Brown, 443 U.S. at 51-52; Tex. Penal Code Ann., Tit. 8, § 38.02. See also Hiibel v. Sixth Jud. Dist. Ct. of Nev., Humboldt Cty., 542 U.S. 177, 188 (2004). . . Despite the fact that the Supreme Court specifically said in al-Kidd that '[w]e do not require a case directly on point,' the majority concludes that school property is somehow different and there must be a case directly on point. . . The majority cites, as does Huerta, section 37.105 of the Texas Education Code. Section 37.105 says:

The board of trustees of a school district or its authorized representative may refuse to allow a person without legitimate business to enter on property under the board's control and may eject any undesirable person from the property on the person's refusal to leave peaceably on request. Identification may be required of any person on the property. . . . However, section 37.105 says nothing about any authority to detain an individual who does not immediately provide identification upon demand, but rather says only that a person may be ejected. Moreover, it is not clear that Huerta is either a member of the board of trustees of the school district or an authorized representative. Nonetheless, assuming that section 37.105 allowed Huerta to require that Gonzalez provide identification, it would have been unreasonable for Huerta to believe that he could then detain Gonzalez under that same section for failing to immediately do so. Huerta apparently agrees because he argues that he did not detain Gonzalez solely for failing to provide identification, but did so because he had a reasonable basis to suspect a connection between Gonzalez and recent car burglaries under what he refers to as the 'settled law' of Terry and Michelletti. Further, the district court decided the case on reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. But, as the majority's analysis reveals, the record does not support the existence of reasonable suspicion. Both Huerta and the district court attempted to distinguish Brown on the basis that Huerta had more specific information than the officer in Brown, not because Brown did not occur in a school parking lot. However, the record does not establish that Huerta had more information than the officer in Brown and the case law does not support the majority's conclusion that the law is not clearly established. For these reasons, I would reverse the grant of summary judgment on the illegal detention claim. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.")

Hinojosa v. Livingston, 807 F.3d 657, 669-70 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants argue . . . that the complaint cannot surmount the qualified immunity hurdle because there is no clearly established right to an air-conditioned cell or to around-the-clock medical care. Defendants' argument again misreads the complaint and confuses right with remedy. While the complaint does allege that TDCJ cells are not air-conditioned and that TDCJ fails to employ medical staff during nighttime hours, it does not claim that the Eighth Amendment requires such accommodations. Rather, the right that it asserts is the right to be free from exposure to extremely dangerous temperatures without adequate remedial measures. The complaint's description of the lack of remedial measures does not purport to be an exhaustive list of the Eighth Amendment's basic requirements. It is simply a description of several ways in which Defendants could have addressed the risk, but instead chose not to do so. The right that it asserts, however, is the well-established Eighth Amendment right not to be subjected to extremely dangerous temperatures without adequate ameliorative measures. Defendants also contend that the Supreme Court's recent decision in Taylor v. Barkes, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 2042, 192 L.Ed.2d 78 (2015), bolsters their qualified immunity argument. It does not. . . .In sum, the Court found, even if the alleged shortcomings existed, 'no precedent on the books ... would have made clear to petitioners that they were overseeing a system that violated the Constitution.'. . Here, by contrast, assuming Hinojosa's allegations to be true, our precedent put Defendants on notice that they were 'overseeing a system that violated the Constitution.'. . Our circuit has made very clear that inmates have a right, under the Eighth Amendment, not to be subjected to extreme temperatures without adequate remedial measures, and Defendants have not alerted us to any contrary authority.")

Hinojosa v. Livingston, 807 F.3d 657, 675-80, 683 (5th Cir. 2015) (Jones, J., dissenting) ("No one doubts the tragedy of a prisoner's life lost to heat stroke during a hot Texas summer. The question here, however, is not whether better prison policies or procedures might theoretically have prevented Hinojosa's death in the Garza West transfer unit of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice ("TDCJ"). As in all cases of qualified immunity, the question is whether the three top officials of the TDCJ ("Executive Defendants"), whose 111 institutions supervise over 150,000 prisoners at a time, must endure litigation and potential personal liability in damages for this prisoner's death because of some arguably defective 'condition of confinement.'. . . By the lights of Taylor, Mullenix, and many other Supreme Court decisions, the majority opinion is indefensible for two primary reasons. First, it defines the allegedly 'clearly established right' of Hinojosa in an overbroad and ambiguous way, the antithesis of what qualified immunity stands for. Qualified immunity is due these officials as a matter of law. Second, it affords credence to pleadings that are insufficient under Iqbal . . . to raise a question about these officials' liability under any circumstances. The pleadings thus failed to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). . . .Here, as in Taylor, the Executive Defendants were neither plainly incompetent nor knowing lawbreakers. The alleged actions of the Executive Defendants were not objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established law at the time of the violation, and they are entitled to immunity from suit. . . .The right to be free from extreme temperatures without adequate remedial measures is too generalized to be of any use to the Executive Defendants in deciding what actions they should or should not take regarding system-wide policies. The qualified immunity doctrine is 'highly context-sensitive.'. . And the Supreme Court has repeatedly and frequently instructed—recently with some exasperation—that courts should not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Instead, the right must be defined so that it is 'beyond debate' that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . The Supreme Court's guidance underlines the real world implications of the qualified immunity analysis. General principles are of limited use to prison officials who must often make difficult policy choices in highly fact-dependent situations. Because reasonable mistakes are inevitable in these settings, the 'clearly established' requirement protects mistaken judgments. . . .The parallels between Taylor and this case are obvious. Like the Third Circuit majority, the majority here affirm an Eighth Amendment right of medically vulnerable inmates not to be subjected to extreme temperatures without adequate remedial measures. Like the Third Circuit majority, the panel majority here approve a claim that these defendants were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs because their policies failed to provide certain 'adequate remedial measures' or 'measures like those' mentioned in prior circuit case law. Moreover, as in Taylor, it is alleged that the Executive Defendants knew their system was inadequate because thirteen other inmates died from heatstroke in five years before Hinojosa's death. The Taylor plaintiffs also explicitly alleged that the Delaware prison officials 'were aware that the suicide rate in the Delaware prisons was above the national average.'. . The majority's analytical mistake in this decision is the same mistake made by the Third Circuit. . . . No prior Fifth Circuit case comes close to giving these Executive Defendants fair notice that they needed additional system-wide housing, medical, or intake policies to avoid running afoul of the Constitution and exposing themselves to personal liability. This court should grant the Executive Defendants' motion to dismiss.") Chavis v. Borden, 621 F. App'x 283, 286-87 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Unlike our sister Circuits, we have repeatedly declined to decide whether such a cause of action [state-created-danger claim] is viable in the Fifth Circuit. . . Nevertheless, we have identified elements that a plaintiff would need to allege if we ever recognized the state-created danger doctrine. First, the plaintiff would have to allege that the defendant used his or her authority to create a dangerous environment. . .Second, the plaintiff would have to allege that the defendant ' "acted with deliberate indifference to the plight of the plaintiff."'. . To establish deliberate indifference, the plaintiff must allege that (1) the environment created by the state actor was dangerous; (2) the state actor knew the environment was dangerous; and (3) the state actor used his or her authority ' "to create an opportunity that would not otherwise have existed for the third party's crime to occur.'". .A number of our opinions also state that the plaintiff would also have to allege he or she was a 'known victim' of the state-created danger, rather than merely one of many foreseeable victims of the danger in question. . . Chavis asks us to recognize the state-created danger theory without including the 'known victim' requirement as an element of the plaintiff's prima facie case. . . We have no occasion to consider whether a plaintiff must be a 'known victim' to prevail on a state-created danger claim, or, if so, whether Jones would qualify as a 'known victim' under these facts. Nor must we consider whether a state-created danger cause of action exists in this Circuit at all, or whether Chavis's complaint properly alleges a constitutional violation. Assuming—without deciding—that Borden violated Jones's substantive due process rights, we conclude that Borden did not violate a constitutional right that was 'clearly established' at the time of Jones's tragic death. . . . As reckless and unprofessional as Borden's alleged conduct was, none of our Circuit's prior decisions gave Borden reasonable warning that leaving a drunk driver behind the wheel of his vehicle could violate another motorist's substantive due process rights. . .To the contrary, this Court previously held, in a case with relatively similar facts, that a police officer did not 'offend due process by permitting an intoxicated driver to remain on the highway' because his 'decision, while imprudent and ultimately tragic, was not sufficiently willful and targeted toward specific harm to remove the case into the domain of constitutional law.'. . Chavis argues that it is not dispositive that our Circuit has never recognized the state-created danger theory because there is a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority' from other Circuits that could support liability under these facts. It is true that this Court 'may consider the law of other circuits when determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established.'. . However, [t]he reluctance of this court ... to embrace some version of the state-created danger theory despite numerous opportunities to do so suggests that, regardless of the status of this doctrine in other circuits, a reasonable officer in this circuit would, even today, be unclear as to whether there is a right to be free from 'state-created danger.'. .Thus, Chavis's claim does not satisfy the 'clearly established law' element, so Borden is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Culbertson v. Lykos, 790 F.3d 608, 627 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Palmer argues she is entitled to qualified immunity because, in light of Beattie, the law was not clearly established that a mere recommendation of termination to a higher authority who makes the final decision causes an adverse employment action. We have already noted ambiguity as to the liability of a person for recommending an adverse employment decision. 'The doctrine of qualified immunity protects government officials from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . It was unsettled at the time of Palmer's actions, and remains so now, whether someone who is not a final decision-maker and makes a recommendation that leads to the plaintiff being harmed can be liable for retaliation under Section 1983. . . In fact, some clear statements in the caselaw have held there can be no liability. . . We conclude the claims against Palmer should be dismissed based on qualified immunity.")

Singleton v. Darby, 609 F. App'x 190, 196 (5th Cir. 2015) ("[T]he Supreme Court recently repeated its warning against defining the law in question 'at a high level of generality.'. . In doing so, the Supreme Court rejected the lower court's reliance on a generalized assessment of the Graham factors for overcoming qualified immunity in an excessive force case—the same analysis the dissent employs to try and defeat qualified immunity here. . . Instead, to overcome qualified immunity, the plaintiff must identify case law clearly establishing that the 'official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.'. . Notably, the dissent is unable to point to case law with facts anywhere close to the particular circumstances involved here—the use of pepper spray to clear a road filled with protestors who vastly outnumbered law enforcement—that would have placed Darby on notice that his conduct was unlawful. Thus, viewing the facts through the deferential lens of qualified immunity and from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, we conclude that Darby's use of force was not objectively unreasonable under the circumstances. At a minimum, case law did not make it clear to every reasonable officer that use of pepper spray in this situation was unreasonable. . . The district court therefore properly granted summary judgment in Darby's favor.")

Singleton v. Darby, 609 F. App'x 190, 196-97, 206-07 (5th Cir. 2015) (Dennis, J. concurring in part and dissenting in part) (not reported) ("Regarding the Fourth Amendment claim, the majority incorrectly read the Supreme Court's decision in Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007) to hold that in analyzing a motion for summary judgment in an excessive force case in which the record contains a videotape of crucial events in question, a court is not required to determine the relevant facts by adopting the plaintiff's version of events and reading the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, but rather should decide whether the officer violated the Fourth Amendment solely in light of the facts depicted by the videotape. Scott v. Harris did not so hold. Rather, the Court so proceeded in that case only because the record contained a telling videotape that 'blatantly' and 'utterly' contradicted and discredited the plaintiff's version of the facts, so that no reasonable jury could have believed him. . . In a case, such as the present one, in which the record with a videotape does not contradict, but instead corroborates, plaintiff Singleton's version of the facts, the court is required to apply standard summary-judgment principles, including accepting the plaintiff's version of the facts as the basis for its decision and viewing the record and reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to her. The majority's failure to do so skewed its entire decisional process, leading it to erroneously affirm the district court's summary judgment. . . .At the time of the pepper-spraying incident, '[Singleton] had a clearly established right to be free from excessive force ... and it was clearly established that the amount of force that [Darby] could use depended on the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect posed a threat to the officer's safety, and whether the suspect was resisting arrest or attempting to flee.'. . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Singleton, she and the other protesters posed no threat, were not resisting arrest, and were committing, at the very most, a non-violent, minor offense when Darby almost immediately and, without any warning that he would do so, resorted to the significant force of pepper spray. 'While the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness test is "not capable of precise definition or mechanical application," the test is clear enough that [Darby] should have known that he could not [use pepper spray against Singleton and the other protesters under the particular circumstances.]' Bush v. Strain, 513 F.3d 492, 502 (5th Cir.2008) (quoting Graham, 490 U.S. at 396). Accordingly, I would conclude that Darby is not entitled to qualified immunity on Singleton's Fourth Amendment claim. In reaching the opposite conclusion, the majority erroneously contends that the Supreme Court's recent decision in Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S.Ct. 2012 (2014), requires us to find a case with nearly identical facts to the particular circumstances here in order to conclude that Darby's conduct violated 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment law. In so doing, the majority grossly misreads that decision and altogether ignores the long-established principle that the lodestar in qualified-immunity cases is whether officers had 'fair warning' that their conduct would violate a constitutional right. . . In Plumhoff, the Court held that police officers who shot the driver of a fleeing vehicle in order to end a dangerous car chase were entitled to qualified immunity. . . In conducting the 'clearly established law' prong of its qualified immunity analysis, the Court emphasized its precedents observing that deadly force cases 'depend[ ] very much on the facts of each case,' meaning that a pure application of the Graham and Garner factors may not be appropriate in such a case. . . Accordingly, in light of the unique fact that the officers utilized deadly force in response to a high-speed car chase, the Court held that Graham and Garner alone did not put the officers on notice that their conduct violated 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment law. . . Contrary to the majority's position, Plumhoff does not eviscerate the long-established principle that a police officer is not entitled to qualified immunity where, as here, he has 'fair warning' based on existing precedents that his conduct would violate the constitutional rights of the plaintiff. . . Rather, as even a cursory review of Plumhoff reveals, the Court's 'clearly established law' analysis pivoted entirely upon the unique fact that the case involved 'deadly force' in response to a dangerous 'vehicular flight,'. . . which is clearly not the case confronting us here. Indeed, unlike the instant case where there was no threat to Darby or the public whatsoever, the officers in Plumhoff 'shot at Rickard to put an end to what had already been a lengthy, high-speed pursuit that indisputably posed a danger both to the officers involved and to any civilians who happened to be nearby.'. . Moreover, in addition to ignoring these meaningful factual distinctions between Plumhoff and the instant case, the majority also errs in concluding that Plumhoff militates against applying a 'generalized assessment of the Graham factors' in order to conclude that Darby violated 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment law. Such logic further reflects the majority's careless reading of Plumhoff. Plumhoff explicitly and repeatedly endorsed the Court's earlier decision in Brousseau, wherein the Court made clear that, even in the fact-dependent context of deadly force cases, 'Graham and Garner alone [can] offer a basis for decision' that officers violated 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment law in 'an obvious case.'. . As explained above, this is an obvious case: in response to the alleged commission of a non-violent and indisputably minor offense, Darby unleased pepper spray into the face and eyes of an elderly woman without providing her any warning or opportunity to comply with his command and without attempting to first utilize any less severe alternative whatsoever. . . Given these egregious facts, a reasonable officer in Darby's position would have 'fair warning' that his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on excessive force pursuant to both Supreme Court and this Circuit's precedents.")

Trent v. Wade, 776 F.3d 368, 382-84 (5th Cir. 2015), reh'g en banc denied, 801 F.3d 849 (5th Cir. 2015) ("We conclude that hot pursuit—unless accompanied by one of the specific justifications enumerated in Richards—does not justify a no-knock entry. Wade points to no authority to the contrary. The fact that the pursued in a hot pursuit is aware of the officer's presence says nothing, without more, about the awareness of the other occupants of the home, all of whom are protected by the knock-and-announce rule. Therefore, the mere fact that the district court upheld the constitutionality of Wade's search of the Trents' home as one carried out in hot pursuit does not justify Wade's failure to knock and announce. . . . As explained above, Wilson and Richards placed the knock-and-announce rule and the justifications for dispensing with it beyond debate. With respect to the justifications, any reasonable officer would know that he was violating the rule if he did not have reasonable suspicion that knocking and announcing would be dangerous or futile or that it would inhibit effective investigation of the crime. . . The rule and the justifications are therefore clearly established. . .Any reasonable officer would understand that, because the knock-and-announce rule serves to alert the occupants of a home of an impending lawful intrusion, the futility justification requires reasonable suspicion that the occupants of the home to be searched are already aware of the officer's presence. The Fifth Circuit's decision in Seelig and the Supreme Court's decisions in Wilson and Richards gave Wade the 'fair warning' that the law requires. . . Although the law in our circuit is not flush with cases explaining specific circumstances in which officers were or were not entitled to rely on the futility justification, the knock-and-announce rule and its accompanying reasonable suspicion requirement are clear. In light of the materiality of the genuine issues of fact regarding whether Wade violated clearly established Fourth Amendment rights when he entered the Trents' home without knocking or announcing his presence, the district court was correct to deny qualified immunity on this ground. The remaining fact issues must be resolved at trial."), pet. for reh'g en banc denied, 2015 WL 5432089 (5th Cir. Sept. 14, 2015)

Wilkerson v. Goodwin, 774 F.3d 845, 858 (5th Cir. 2014) ("The Wade Defendants contend that, despite subsequent developments in the law, they were objectively reasonable in relying on the assumption in Wilkerson I that a liberty interest could not arise from an initial classification, regardless of the duration or indefiniteness of Woodfox's solitary confinement. . . However, the law did not freeze with the decision in Wilkerson I in 2003. As we have said, prior to the 2010 transfer of Woodfox, both our court and the Supreme Court had recognized that even if an initial security classification does not generally implicate a liberty interest, such an interest may arise where an initial classification is also attended by 'extraordinary circumstances,' that is, an 'atypical and significant hardship.'. . .Woodfox was subjected to the sort of 23–hour–a–day in-cell confinement, limited physical exercise, limited human contact, and effectively indefinite placement that gave rise to a liberty interest in Wilkinson. Any differences between the Supermax conditions in Wilkinson and the CCR conditions at Wade are insufficient to render reasonable the conclusion that there is no liberty interest here. . . .In the circumstances of this case, no reasonable prison official could conclude that continuing four decades in indefinite solitary confinement would not implicate a liberty interest protected by due process.")

Gibson v. Kilpatrick, 773 F.3d 661, 667-73 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Lane seems to us to be an application of prior Supreme Court precedent. It was, after all, undisputed in Lane that 'Lane's ordinary job responsibilities did not include testifying in court proceedings.'. . Garcetti had indicated that the mere fact that speech concerns information learned while performing official job duties does not preclude First Amendment protection. . . More fundamentally, the Court's reasoning in Pickering indicated that the high value of public employees' contributions to civic discourse often derives from the knowledge they gain from their public employment, . . . a premise that was reiterated in Garcetti . . . . Given that precedent, Lane does not appear to have altered the standard for whether public employees speak pursuant to their official duties, but appears rather to be an application of Garcetti's rule. Yet three aspects of the Lane opinion merit discussion, as they appear to offer the prospect of new law. The first is Lane's injection of the word 'ordinary' into the 'pursuant to official duties' test. . . . The second is Lane's discussion of the importance of public-employee speech in ferreting out public corruption. The third is Lane's discussion of the affirmative legal obligation to testify truthfully in reasoning that the speech at issue was speech as a citizen. . . . Whatever may come of Lane's use of the 'ordinary' modifier, at this point it likely has not altered the rule in Garcetti, at least not in any way that can be said to be clearly established. It was undisputed in Lane that the employee had not spoken pursuant to his official duties. . . . As such, there was no occasion for the Court to refine the standard for determining when an employee speaks pursuant to his official duties. Therefore, whatever change in the jurisprudence 'ordinary' may augur, we are unable to discern any change in Garcetti's rule from Lane applicable to this case, for any change resulting from Lane cannot be said to have been ' "clearly established" at the time of the challenged conduct.' Al–Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2080 (emphasis added). Second, we turn to Lane's discussion of the context of public corruption and its impact on whether the speech in that case was protected by the First Amendment. Lane's discussion of whether the plaintiff spoke as a citizen or as an employee concludes by addressing the necessity of public-employee whistleblowing in stemming public corruption. . . . We doubt that this discussion means that speech is 'as a citizen' whenever public corruption is involved, as that could conflict with the opinion in Garcetti. . . . In Lane, it was undisputed that the employee was not speaking as part of his ordinary job duties. . . The testimony of public-employees is frequently necessary to prosecute public corruption. But it cannot be said to be strictly necessary that they be speaking pursuant to their official duties when they testify in order to prosecute public corruption. As such, it cannot be said that Lane's discussion of public corruption alters Garcetti in a way that is clearly established for purposes of this case. Lastly, we must confront Lane's discussion of the legal obligation to testify truthfully and its relation to classifying speech as citizen-speech. . . . Lane. . . relied upon an independent legal obligation to tell the truth. . . Citing this discussion in Lane, Gibson points to 18 U.S.C. § 4 and Roberts v. United States, 445 U.S. 552, 557–58 (1980), as establishing a similar duty of citizens to affirmatively report crime. But any such independent legal obligation is only relevant if Gibson was speaking pursuant to his official duties; otherwise, his speech would be outside of Garcetti's ambit regardless. And, fatally, if Gibson was speaking pursuant to his official duties and was under an independent legal obligation as a citizen to report crime, it would raise the question that Lane expressly declined to answer, that is, whether there are obligations as a citizen that preempt obligations as an employee for First Amendment purposes. . . As such, we could not say that such a right was 'clearly established' at the time Gibson was allegedly retaliated against. Therefore, we turn to the central issue—whether Gibson was acting pursuant to his official duties in reporting Kilpatrick's use of the gas card to outside agencies. In making that inquiry, one of the factors that we have considered is whether the employee's complaint was made within the chain of command or to an outside actor, such as a different government agency or the media. . . . [W]hen an employee's official duties include communicating with outside agencies or the press, it would be in dissonance with Garcetti to conclude that, when he does so, he enjoys First Amendment protection. . . Further, where, as here, the employee is reporting the misconduct of his supervisor, an outside agency may be the most appropriate entity to which to report the misconduct. . . In turning to the instant case, we cannot say that Kilpatrick's reprimanding Gibson for reporting the illegal use of the gas card to outside agencies violated Gibson's clearly established constitutional rights. Gibson was the Chief of Police for the city, indicating that communicating with outside law enforcement agencies was part of his job responsibilities. The presumption is buttressed by Gibson's admission that he reported his concerns about the gas card to law enforcement officers at the outside agencies whom he had met through his official duties. It is also supported by his statement in a letter to the Mayor and Board of Aldermen that he worked with the FBI and DEA as part of his role as Chief of Police. Further, Gibson's statutory duties provide additional support to the notion that he was acting pursuant to his official duties. . . . While we cannot, and do not, rely on official job descriptions, even statutory ones, in applying Garcetti's rule, they can be instructive. . . . Moreover, the facts of this case make plain that Gibson was acting pursuant to his official duties when he made the reports to the OSA. For Gibson did not merely make a report to the OSA on his personal time after work. He met with the investigator in his office, he coordinated his department's resources with the OSA, and he instructed his employees to aid extensively in the investigation. All of this is compelling circumstantial evidence that Gibson reported the misuse of the gas card not as a citizen, but in his official capacity as Chief of Police. . . . The fact that what was being reported in this case was public corruption does not change the result—Garcetti's rule is a broad one, and it must be applied even where it may lead to a potentially distasteful result in an individual case. As such, any reprimand based on Gibson's reports to the OSA cannot be said to violate his clearly established constitutional rights. Similarly, reprimanding Gibson for his report to the Attorney General would not have violated his clearly established First Amendment rights. Gibson communicated his concerns about the gas card at the 'Chief of Police Conference' to the Mississippi Attorney General in person. He spoke with the Attorney General and others who were with him for about twenty minutes. Given that Gibson was attending a chief of police conference when he met with the Attorney General and expressed his concerns, it would not have been objectively unreasonable for Kilpatrick to believe Gibson made the report while performing his official duties. To the extent that additional facts could show that Gibson was not acting pursuant to his official duties when he made his report to the Attorney General, Gibson has failed to meet his burden of producing evidence sufficient to show that Kilpatrick violated his clearly established constitutional rights. . . The reports to the FBI and DEA present a closer case. Gibson made a call to an FBI agent that he had met through his law enforcement work. He then met with two FBI agents, including the agent he already knew, at schools in Drew rather than at his office. He testified that he believed his report to the FBI was confidential. He also made his initial complaint to the DEA via telephone, then met with DEA agents, and agents from other federal law enforcement agencies, at the DEA office in Oxford, Mississippi, again not at his office in Drew. Gibson testified that he believed his report to the DEA was also confidential. Gibson did, however, testify that he had previously met the agents he contacted at the FBI and the DEA through his official duties. Further, he stated in a letter to the Mayor and Board of Aldermen that he generally worked with outside agencies, including the DEA and FBI, 'to help with crimes within the city of Drew.' Additional facts could elucidate Gibson's role when he made his complaints in this case. Whether he spoke with the agents during working hours, whether he was in uniform, and whether he offered the assistance of local law enforcement would all be instructive as to whether he acted pursuant to his official duties. But those facts are not present in the record, and, there being no genuine dispute as to the facts, we take record as it is. Given the lack of evidence clarifying Gibson's role when he made his reports to the FBI and the DEA, we hold that Gibson has not met his burden of producing evidence sufficient to show that Kilpatrick violated his clearly established constitutional rights, and, as such, summary judgment should have been granted for Kilpatrick. . . We do not hold that, as the Chief of Police, any report of criminal activity Gibson made to outside agencies was part of his official duties. We hold only that Gibson has adduced insufficient evidence here to meet his burden of producing evidence showing that his reports here were made as a citizen rather than in his official capacity. He has therefore failed to come forward with evidence showing that his clearly established constitutional rights were violated. As such, Gibson's communications to the outside agencies in this case are distinguishable from previous cases in which we have held that communications outside the chain of command are speech as a citizen. Therefore, we cannot say that reprimanding Gibson for reporting violations of the law to outside law enforcement agencies violated his clearly established constitutional rights.")

Stephen F. Austin State Univ., 767 F.3d 462, 472, 473 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Garcetti alone may not 'clearly establish' Cutler's First Amendment right. Garcetti did not 'articulate a comprehensive framework for defining the scope of an employee's duties in cases where there is room for serious debate.'. . After all, Garcetti 'did not explicate what it means to speak pursuant to one's official duties, although we do know that a formal job description is not dispositive ... [,] nor is speaking on the subject matter of one's employment.'. .Several pre–2010 decisions have, however, given the Defendants the 'fair warning' they need. [discussing cases] These cases should have provided Defendants with a clear warning that terminating Cutler on the basis of his speech to Rep. Gohmert's office—based on the undisputed facts and taking all reasonable inferences in Cutler's favor—would violate Cutler's First Amendment right. Assuming that Cutler's account of his conversations with Rep. Gohmert's office is credible, as we must do, Cutler's speech was made externally to a staff member of an 'elected representative[ ] of the people' allegedly about participating in an event that was not within his job requirements. . .. Cutler spoke about concerns entirely unrelated to his job and from a perspective that did not depend on his job as a university employee, but rather emanated from his views as a citizen. . . Therefore, reasonable officials in the Defendants' position should have known on the basis of Charles and Davis that Cutler's speech was protected as the speech of a citizen and that their decision to terminate Cutler on the basis of that citizen speech would violate Cutler's First Amendment right.")

U.S. ex rel. Parikh v. Brown, 13-41088, 2014 WL 3906268, *3, *4 (5th Cir. Aug. 11, 2014) ("Properly focused on the claim for payment here, the relevant pleading that we have taken as true is that Appellants knew their compliance certification was false. The key question, then, is whether the contours of the FCA were sufficiently clear at the time such that every reasonable official would have understood that—as Relators pleaded in their complaint—presenting claims for payment, while knowingly falsely certifying compliance with the AKS and Stark Law, violated the FCA. . . Based on circuit precedent, we answer in the affirmative. . . . In light of our decision in Thompson, every reasonable official would understand that the FCA is violated when (1) 'the government has conditioned payment of a claim upon a claimant's certification of compliance with, for example, a statute or regulation,' and (2) the official 'falsely certifies compliance with that statute or regulation.'. . This clearly established statutory right is precisely what Relators alleged Appellants to have violated. Accordingly, we hold that as a matter of law Brown and Campbell are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Morgan v. Swanson, 755 F.3d 757, 761, 762 (5th Cir. 2014) (per curiam) ("Morgan argues that his right to distribute religious material is clearly established because 'regardless of forum, viewpoint discrimination regarding private speech is unconstitutional.' This assertion is generally true. Yet such a broad generalization is exactly the kind of proposition that will not suffice for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis, as it simply does not provide the official with any sense of what is permissible under a certain set of facts. . . . When asked at oral argument to name a case that clearly establishes Morgan's right to distribute the religious gifts, Morgan pointed to Chiu v. Plano Indep. Sch. Dist., 260 F.3d 330 (5th Cir.2001). Yet the case is inapposite. Chiu dealt with after-school meetings whose express purpose was to allow adults to discuss mathematics instruction. . . This Court held that-regardless of whether the meetings were properly classified as public forum or limited public forum-school officials could not prohibit the plaintiffs from distributing material related to certain curriculum options. . . It is difficult to imagine how Chiu establishes a specific rule applicable to this case. The present case does not involve an individual trying to contribute relevant materials to a public forum dedicated to adult dialogue. Instead, a parent asked whether he could distribute religious material during a classroom activity. So while Chiu may indeed be relevant in discerning the nature and extent of Morgan's rights in the classroom, the case does not itself establish those rights, and its radically different factual context renders Chiu incapable of providing any meaningful guidance to an educator trying to handle First Amendment concerns arising out of a third-grade party. . . .After carefully considering Morgan's arguments, we find that he has not identified any case clearly establishing the constitutional right asserted here. Nor are we aware of such a case. Where there is no authority recognizing an asserted right, and where the area of law is as 'abstruse' and 'complicated' as First Amendment jurisprudence, that right cannot be clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis. . . Accordingly, Morgan's allegations are not sufficient to overcome Swanson's qualified immunity defense. His claim is therefore properly dismissed.")

Castro v. Cabrera, 742 F.3d 595, 599-602 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Before addressing qualified immunity, we decide the threshold question whether the Fourth Amendment applies to these detainees. As a general matter, it applies to aliens within U.S. territory. . .In Verdugo–Urquidez, however, the Court held, 494 U.S. at 261, that it does not apply to the search and seizure of nonresident aliens on foreign soil. . . Moreover, excludable aliens that have been denied entry into the United States, even when technically within U.S. territory, may be 'treated, for constitutional purposes, as if stopped at the border.'. .That is the doctrine of 'entry fiction,' which is applied to excludable aliens regarding the constitutionality of indefinite detention and, more specifically, the applicability of substantive and procedural due process rights under the Fifth Amendment. . . There are limitations to our application of entry fiction. In Lynch, we specifically confined it to the contexts of immigration and deportation and held that it 'does not limit the right of aliens detained within the United States territory to humane treatment.'. .For purposes of this exception, we have interpreted 'humane treatment' as being denied only in those cases involving 'gross physical abuse.' . .Therefore, if these detainees are excludable aliens stopped before entry into the United States and their claims arise in the context of immigration, the entry fiction applies and there is no violation of the Fourth Amendment. If, however, they were subject to wanton or malicious infliction of pain or gross physical abuse, the doctrine does not apply, and we consider whether Cabrera was entitled to qualified immunity. . .The detainees, however, were detained as excluded aliens for varying amounts of time—all ten hours or less—as their admissibility was being determined, a situation well within the immigration context. Additionally, neither of the claims involve physical abuse, let alone 'gross physical abuse' as in Lynch or Martinez–Aguero. Therefore, these claims fall squarely within the confines of entry fiction, and the Fourth Amendment is not applicable; the detention did not violate constitutional rights. . .and the district court properly dismissed these claims under Rule 12(b)(6). . . . Lastly, we decide whether the entry fiction applies to the detainees' Fourth Amendment claim of excessive force through the use of harsh interrogation techniques. Although we held in Lynch and Martinez–Aguero that the entry fiction did not apply to the excessive-force claims under, respectively, the Fifth and Fourth Amendments, we did so because the fiction does not apply to 'gross physical abuse at the hands of state or federal officials.'. . The present detainees do not allege any physical contact but make bare assertions of 'threats, insults, and false statements.' These accusations, without any allegation of conduct that could be considered 'gross physical abuse' or the wanton or malicious infliction of pain, do not meet our standard for avoiding application of the entry fiction. . Therefore, the fiction applies to the Fourth Amendment claim, which was properly dismissed. . . .Even if they individuals are in fact U.S. citizens, dismissal is proper because Cabrera enjoys qualified immunity, . . . as the district court convincingly discussed in its order of dismissal. The detainees point to no authority clearly establishing that Cabrera's actions in detaining, even for as long as ten hours, individuals who presented facially valid documentation, plus the use of unspecified threats and insults during interrogation, violated the Constitution. . . Instead, the caselaw of the Supreme Court . . . and of this circuit, . . .as well as federal regulations, . . . are to the contrary. Therefore, the claims of any of the detainees who might be U.S. citizens were properly dismissed.")

Marquez v. Garnett, 567 F. App'x 214, 217, 218 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Stripped of multiple conclusory statements in the amended complaint, the allegation here is that the student was sliding Garnett's compact disc across a table during class time and Garnett reacted. As in Fee and Moore, the setting is pedagogical, and C.M.'s action was unwarranted. The inference must be that Garnett acted to discipline C.M., even if she may have overreacted. . . Because Marquez's pleadings demonstrate corporal punishment rather than a mere attack, the only remaining question is the sufficiency of state remedies. The parties do not dispute that, as we found in Fee and Moore, Texas provides criminal and civil remedies to parents like Marquez. . . In this case, Garnett was charged in state court with assault causing bodily injury, was placed on administrative leave, and was required to surrender her teaching certificate in response to her conduct. Marquez has not shown that C.M.'s substantive due process rights were violated . . .Fifth Circuit law squarely forecloses Marquez's claim against Garnett. Accordingly, she was entitled to qualified immunity.")

Estate of C.A. v. Castro, 547 F. App'x 621, 2013 WL 6155819, *4 (5th Cir. Nov. 25, 2013) ("In addition to the Agwuokes' failure to make out a cognizable constitutional violation, Castro and Coronado are entitled to qualified immunity because the right at issue was not clearly established. The Agwuokes claim that the individual defendants did more than fail to protect C.A. from the inherent dangers of swimming pool: they planned and approved a school project that placed students in a dangerous environment, and did so in a manner that disregarded reasonable and legally required safety measures. . . . Applying this case's facts to the standard set forth in al-Kidd and Kinney, the Agwuokes would need to demonstrate that reasonable teachers and school officials were on notice that designing and executing a high school science experiment involving a pool violated the constitutional right to life of any student that may drown. The Agwuokes do not identify 'controlling authority—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority—that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.'. . Instead, they note merely that C.A. had a 'right to life' under the Fourteenth Amendment, which the individual defendants allegedly violated through their deliberately indifferent conduct. This falls short of the requirement to show 'defendants' actions were objectively unreasonable in light of the law that was clearly established at the time of the actions complained of.'. . We hold that, even assuming a constitutional violation, the individual defendants were not on notice that their conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right because no case has found a violation under similar facts.")

McCreary v. Richardson, 738 F.3d 651, 658, 659 (5th Cir. 2013) ("Strip searches have been upheld as constitutional even when conducted in non-private areas in the presence of non-essential personnel, see Elliott, 38 F.3d at 190–92, or on male prisoners in the presence of female officers, see Letcher, 968 F.2d at 510; Tasby v. Lynaugh, 123 F. App'x 614, 615 (5th Cir.2005). Given the present case law in this circuit, we are not prepared to say that a reasonable officer would believe that a public strip search conducted by a male officer on a male offender in the presence of females after an equally public disruption was contrary to clearly established law. Precedent does not clearly establish that a reasonable officer could not perform the strip search in the most efficient manner possible without abandoning his post—the location where the incident occurred. . .

Richardson accordingly deserves qualified immunity relating to Fourth Amendment claims concerning the public nature of the strip search.") Wyatt v. Fletcher, 718 F.3d 496, 503-06, 508-10 (5th Cir. 2013) ("Under the Fifth Circuit standard, the doctrine of qualified immunity protects government officials from civil damages liability when they reasonably could have believed that their conduct was not barred by law, and immunity is not denied unless existing precedent places the constitutional question beyond debate. . . When deciding whether the right allegedly violated was 'clearly established,' the court asks whether the law so clearly and unambiguously prohibited the conduct that every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates the law. . . Answering in the affirmative requires the court to be able to point to 'controlling authority—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority—that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.'. . This requirement establishes a high bar. When there is no controlling authority specifically prohibiting a defendant's conduct, the law is not clearly established for the purposes of defeating qualified immunity. . . .The Fifth Circuit has never held that a person has a constitutionally-protected privacy interest in her sexual orientation, and it certainly has never suggested that such a privacy interest precludes school authorities from discussing with parents matters that relate to the interests of their children. . . Therefore, when the magistrate judge in this case held that there is a constitutional right that bars the unauthorized disclosure by school coaches of a student's sexual orientation to the student's mother, he proclaimed a new rule of law. . . .In summary, then, when we consider ACLU of Miss. and Fadjo, neither is established—much less clearly established—authority for the claims presented here. It is of major significance that neither occurred in the context of public schools' relations with their students and the students' parents. We therefore hold there is no controlling Fifth Circuit authority—certainly not with 'sufficient particularity'—showing a clearly established Fourteenth Amendment privacy right that prohibits school officials from communicating to parents information regarding minor students' interests, even when private matters of sex are involved. . . . In our case today, the trial court cited other cases from outside the circuit on its way to denying summary judgment to the coaches. Perhaps the most salient distinguishing factor in all these cases is that none occurred in a school context; together, they establish only the simple and unsurprising proposition that individuals generally can have a privacy interest in some personal 'sexual matters,' a broad, general proposition with which we do not take issue. . . None of these cases approximate the factual context we have before us, and none of them provide any guidance regarding the crucial question: whether a student has a privacy right under the Fourteenth Amendment that forbids school officials from discussing student sexual information during meetings with parents. . . In sum, then, we hold that Wyatt has not alleged a clearly established constitutional right—drawn either from the Supreme Court's jurisprudence, from our own precedent or from that of other circuits—that the coaches violated . . . .To summarize our opinion today: we hold that the magistrate judge erred in denying Newell and Fletcher summary judgment on the claims of qualified immunity. It was error because there is no Supreme Court or Fifth Circuit case that clearly establishes or even suggests that a high school student has a Fourth Amendment right that bars the student from being questioned by coaches in a locker room or a Fourteenth Amendment right to privacy that bars a teacher or coach from discussing the student's private matters with the student's parents. Fletcher and Newell were entitled to qualified immunity for this suit with respect to the federal claims, because, based on undisputed facts, there was no violation of a clearly established federal right.")

Wyatt v. Fletcher, 718 F.3d 496, 513, 514 (5th Cir. 2013) (Graves, J., dissenting) ("At least five other circuits have recognized a right of privacy regarding personal sexual matters. [collecting cases] Based on the applicable case law set out above, there clearly exists a right to privacy regarding one's sexual orientation. The findings of the United States Supreme Court and six Circuit Courts of Appeal (including the 5th) that information of a sexual nature is intrinsically private is more than a 'simple and unsurprising proposition.' Additionally, the school context does not defeat the very existence of a right, but rather comes into play with regard to a balancing test and whether the government's interest outweighs a student's privacy right.")

Waganfeald v. Gusman, 674 F.3d 475, 486 (5th Cir. 2012) ("There is no doubt that Appellees suffered terribly while held in custody after Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans. It is equally clear, however, that (1) Gusman's failure to release Appellees falls within the emergency exception to the rule that a probable cause determination must be made within 48 hours, and (2) Hunter's failure to allow Appellees to use cell phones was not objectively unreasonable in light of any clearly established law. We therefore reverse and vacate the judgment of the district court, and remand with instructions to enter judgment in favor of Gusman and Hunter on all claims asserted by Appellees.")

Bishop v. Arcuri, 674 F.3d 456, 466, 467 (5th Cir. 2012) ("In sum, neither Arcuri's concerns for evidence preservation nor for officer safety amounted to reasonable suspicion based on particular facts, so exigent circumstances did not justify his team's no-knock entry of Appellants' home. The entry therefore violated Appellants' Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Having concluded that the no-knock entry led by Arcuri violated Appellants' Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches, we now turn to the second prong of qualified-immunity analysis: whether Arcuri's conduct was objectively unreasonable under established law. . . .At the time of the search, the Supreme Court's unanimous decision in Richards rejecting a blanket exception to the knock-and-announce requirement for narcotics searches had been on the books for twelve years. As discussed above, Arcuri's proffered justifications for his team's no-knock entry—evidence preservation and officer safety—were based primarily on generalities rather than particularized suspicion, and his position is therefore virtually indistinguishable from the type of blanket rule repudiated in Richards. Moreover, multiple decisions of this circuit, and of the Texas state courts [footnote omitted] have reinforced the applicability of the knock-and-announce requirement to searches indistinguishable from the one conducted on Appellants' home. Arcuri's no-knock entry of Appellants' home, based only on generalized concerns about evidence preservation and officer safety, violated clearly established law and was therefore unreasonable. . .Because the rights violated by Arcuri's team were well-established at the time of the raid, Arcuri's actions were unreasonable, and he is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Cantrell v. City of Murphy, 666 F.3d 911, 921 (5th Cir. 2012) ("Taking the allegations in the Cantrells' complaint as true, we conclude that they have failed to satisfy their burden of demonstrating the inapplicability of the Officers' qualified immunity defense. In their brief, they fail to cite any cases involving sufficiently similar situations that would have provided reasonable officers with notice that they had an affirmative constitutional duty to provide medical care and protection to a young child [who was strangled when he became entangled in a soccer net] when they temporarily physically separate the child from his mother. While the Cantrells analogize to cases involving foster care in arguing that Matthew's putative right was clearly established, this line of cases is materially distinguishable, and therefore could not have provided reasonable officials in the Officers' position with notice that they had an affirmative constitutional duty to provide medical care and protection to Matthew. Stated differently, Matthew's asserted right was not clearly established on October 2, 2007.")

Juarez v. Aguilar, 666 F.3d 325, 336 (5th Cir. 2011) ("Appellants have not shown their entitlement to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings. Appellee's retaliation claim is straightforward. He alleges that because he informed the FBI of illegal activities, the Appellants entered into an agreement not to extend Appellee's contract. Assuming Appellee's allegations are true, . . . such conduct would fall well within the clearly established elements of retaliation in violation of Appellee's First Amendment rights. With respect to the issues we can consider on this appeal, the only distinction between this case and the previous cases we have decided is the fact that Appellants did not formally vote when making the alleged adverse employment decision. That this court has not previously considered an identical fact pattern does not mean that a litigant's rights were not clearly established. . . As long as the officials received fair notice that their conduct violated the litigant's rights, the right was clearly established. . . In this case, it would have been unreasonable for the Appellants to believe that the absence of a formal vote would absolve them of liability. As we explained above, the conclusion that informal actions can result in liability follows clearly from the precedent of this court and the Supreme Court. This was sufficient to provide Appellants with fair notice that even an informal decision to retaliate against Appellee would violate Appellee's First Amendment rights. Accordingly, the district court did not err when it denied summary judgment on Appellants' qualified immunity defense.")

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 371, 372 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Benevides, J.) ("Before discussing the substantive law in this case, we turn to first principles to guide our determination of what it means for the law to be 'clearly established.'. . .Where no controlling authority specifically prohibits a defendant's conduct, and when the federal circuit courts are split on the issue, the law cannot be said to be clearly established. This is true even when the circuit split developed after the events in question. . . . The Supreme Court's admonition in Al-Kidd that we should not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality' sits in tension with its earlier statement in Hope v. Pelzer that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning,' at least in a certain category of 'obvious' cases. In Hope, the Court noted that the general Eighth Amendment prohibition against the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain 'arguably' gave the defendants 'fair warning' that it was unconstitutional to strip a prisoner shirtless and chain him to a hitching post (a painful stress position) for seven hours in the Alabama sun. But the Court's suggestion that generalizations can sometimes clearly establish the law was dicta; the Court did not rest its qualified-immunity decision on such a broad statement. It relied instead on binding circuit precedent prohibiting extremely similar conduct, including 'handcuffing inmates to the fence and to cells for long periods of time.'. . .The Al-Kidd Court, in admonishing lower courts 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,' did not discuss or even cite Hope, nor other earlier opinions reflecting a similar concern that a damages remedy be available for 'obvious' or flagrant constitutional violations. This silence is puzzling given that Al-Kidd reversed a Ninth Circuit decision denying immunity in reliance on Hope. Adding to the perplexity is that, in its next major 'clearly established' opinion after Hope, the Supreme Court granted qualified immunity because there were no cases that 'squarely govern[ed].' That said, this case does not call on us to decide whether the Court's statements in Hope survive Al-Kidd: the constitutional issue in this case is far from 'beyond debate,' as evidenced by a large body of oft-conflicting case law and the variety of opinion among members of this Court. We leave for another day the question of whether and when a constitutional violation may be so 'obvious' that its illegality is clear from only a generalized statement of law." [footnotes omitted])

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 391-94 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Dennis, J., specially concurring in parts and not joining in other parts) ("I . . . do not join fully in Part IV.A of Judge Benavides' opinion because I disagree with one of its premises in discussing clearly established law. Specifically, I disagree with the blanket statement that 'generalizations and abstract propositions are not capable of establishing the law.'. . . [T]he Hope Court reversed the court of appeals not only because it reached the wrong result on qualified immunity based on prior circuit precedent, but also because it had wrongly applied the 'materially similar' standard in reaching that result. Indeed, the Court first held that the fair warning standard from Lanier should be used to evaluate whether the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity, and then applied that standard to conclude that they were. . . .Therefore, the Court's pronouncements on the fair and clear warning standard were an essential part of its holding in Hope. Moreover, in the years since Hope, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed this principle. . . . The Supreme Court's recent decisions in Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020 (2011), and Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074 (2011), do not overrule Hope, Lanier, or any case in that line. In fact, the majority in neither al-Kidd nor Camreta mentions them, and Justice Kennedy's concurrence in al-Kidd cites Lanier affirmatively as supporting the 'fair and clear warning' rule. . . . In sum, pursuant to the line of cases described above, I believe that certain official conduct may so obviously fall within the prohibition of a general or abstract rule of the Constitution that any reasonable official would have 'fair warning' that his actions are unconstitutional, even absent a prior court decision to that effect. However, I agree with Judge Benavides that this case does not present a situation where the defendants had fair warning that their actions were unconstitutional, for substantially the reasons given by Judge Benavides in his opinion.")

Swindle v. Livingston Parish School Bd., 655 F.3d 386, 401 (5th Cir. 2011), reh'g en banc denied, 662 F.3d 328 (5th Cir. 2011) ("[I]t has been clear since Goss that when state law directs local authorities to provide public education, a student's 'total exclusion from the educational process' must be accompanied by the procedural protections required by the Due Process Clause. . . In Nevares and Harris, this court made clear that no deprivation of the liberty and property interests associated with public education occurs when a student is removed from her regular school environment and transferred to an alternative education program. . . In a disciplinary alternative education model like those in Nevares in Harris–and like the Louisiana statutory scheme at issue here. . . a student's expulsion from her regular school does not deny her access to the educational process, because she continues to receive a public education in the form of alternative programming. . . Under these decisions, a constitutionally relevant deprivation occurs when an official denies a student access to alternative education to which she has an entitlement based on state law . . . . We conclude that these 'precedents ... placed ... beyond debate,' [citing Ashcroft v. Al-Kidd] the question of whether procedural due process safeguards had to be complied with in connection with Pope's refusal to permit Morgan access to alternative education.")

Good v. Curtis, 601 F.3d 393, 400-02 (5th Cir. 2010) ("In the instant case, Curtis is alleged to have intentionally secured a false identification that produced a wrongful conviction in retaliation for a suspect's failure to cooperate in an unrelated matter–a Malley 'knowing violation of the law.'. . . In keeping with Geter I and II, we conclude that knowing efforts to secure a false identification by fabricating evidence or otherwise unlawfully influencing witnesses constitutes a violation of the due process rights secured by the Fourteenth Amendment. A plaintiff need not undertake the impossible task of satisfying the Brathwaite test where an officer's intentional conduct was designed to artificially produce precisely the sort of witness certainty that otherwise justifies the admission of suggestive lineups and the criminal defendant has been exonerated in the meantime. Moreover, we find that any reasonable official would know that framing an individual for a crime they did not commit by securing such an identification represents a constitutional violation. Accordingly, the appeal must be dismissed on his Fourteenth Amendment claim. With respect to the Fourth Amendment, Curtis's efforts to secure Good's arrest notwithstanding the fact that Curtis affirmatively knew he manufactured probable cause constituted a clearly established violation of Good's Fourth Amendment rights at the time of the arrest such that the appeal on this claim must also be dismissed.").

Wernecke v. Garcia, 591 F.3d 386, 399, 400 (5th Cir. 2009) ("In the light most favorable to the Werneckes, a reasonable person would not believe that an immediate danger would be posed by JW and JW remaining in the home. Therefore, the Werneckes have asserted a Fourth Amendment violation by Garcia. Although the Werneckes have asserted a constitutional violation, the question whether the applicable law was clearly established remains. The Werneckes argue that the general contours of the Fourth Amendment sufficed to give 'fair warning' to reasonable officials of the alleged unlawfulness of the seizure of the boys. Although '[i]t could plausibly be asserted that any violation of the Fourth Amendment is "clearly established,"' we recall that 'the right allegedly violated must be defined at the appropriate level of specificity before a court can determine if it was clearly established.'. . Therefore, we must consider the state of the clearly established law in 2005 and whether it gave TDFPS employees 'fair warning that their alleged treatment of [the plaintiffs was] unconstitutional.'. . As of June 1, 2005, Fifth Circuit precedent clearly established that the Fourth Amendment governs social workers' investigations of allegations of child abuse. . .We indicated in Roe v. Texas Department of Protective & Regulatory Services that '[s]ocial workers retain the power to seize a child if Aexigent circumstances" exist; if they Ahave reason to believe that life or limb is in immediate jeopardy," they need not obtain a court order.'. . . The quoted language from Roe, combined with the reference to 'evidence of danger' in Wooley, clearly established that, at the very least, some evidence of imminent danger to a child was required to justify a warrantless seizure. . . Officials do not receive the protection of qualified immunity when 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [of the challenged act is] apparent,' and in the light of Roe and Wooley, Garcia's actions (as alleged by the Werneckes) were clearly unlawful. . . . On the facts as stated by the Werneckes, Fifth Circuit law clearly established in June 2005 that the warrantless seizure of the Wernecke boys–in the absence of any imminent danger–was a constitutional violation.").

DePree v. Saunders, 588 F.3d 282, 288 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Because this court has not formally applied Burlington to First Amendment retaliation claims, the interrelation among Harrington, Dorsett, and Burlington yields no 'clearly established law' that Saunders would have known she was violating by revoking DePree's teaching duties and access to the business school. At most, these cases create a fact issue [as] to whether DePree suffered a material adverse employment action. Similarly, no clearly established law dictated that Saunders could not impose discipline, notwithstanding a few references to DePree's 'speech,' in light of the uniform reports about his intimidating and disruptive behavior. In sum, this court cannot conclude that Saunders's action was objectively unreasonable, 'assessed in light of the legal rules that were clearly established at the time it was taken.'").

Brown v. Miller, 519 F.3d 231, 327, 238 (5th Cir. 2008) ("We . . . hold that the deliberate or knowing creation of a misleading and scientifically inaccurate serology report amounts to a violation of a defendant's due process rights, and that a reasonable laboratory technician in 1984 would have understood that those actions violated those rights. The district court did not err in denying qualified immunity on this theory. . . . Brown also alleges that Miller concealed, suppressed, or destroyed lab results that were conclusively exculpatory with respect to Brown. The Supreme Court held in Brady v. Maryland that a criminal prosecutor's failure to disclose exculpatory evidence to a criminal defendant violates a defendant's right to a fair trial. . . A police officer's deliberate concealment of exculpatory evidence violates this same right, and can give rise to liability under § 1983. . . By 1967, a public official's concealment of exculpatory evidence was a constitutional violation in this circuit. . . Therefore, the law was sufficiently clear in 1984 that a state crime lab technician would have known that suppression of exculpatory blood test results would violate a defendant's rights. Miller does not argue otherwise. We therefore hold that the district court did not err in denying the qualified immunity defense on this theory.")

Bolton v. City of Dallas, 472 F.3d 261, 266 (5th Cir. 2006) ("Although we now conclude that ' 5 of the Dallas City Charter creates a vested property right in employment at a former rank for executive-level officials, this decision is not apparent from Muncy. There we were considering a due process claim in the context of demotion, but we stated that executive rank officials are 'employees at will, and the city was free to discharge them without cause.'. . If we are to respect the principle underlying qualified immunity to the effect that officials must be able reasonably to 'anticipate when their conduct may give rise to damages,' we cannot hold an official liable for taking action that was arguably supported by decisions of this court. . . Bolton's claim against Benavides in his personal capacity must be dismissed based on qualified immunity, because reasonable public officials could have differed on whether discharging Bolton would violate his constitutional rights.").

Williams v. Ballard, 466 F.3d 330, 333 (5th Cir. 2006) ("The fundamental question is whether the state of the law gave defendants fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Because at the time there was no binding precedent clearly establishing the right, we must determine if other decisions at the time showed 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.'. . As the district court noted, in 1998 only the Ninth Circuit had recognized a non-sex offender's right against mandatory sex-offender registration and treatment as a condition of parole, . . . and it unsurprisingly held the law not clearly established . . . .Moreover, another Ninth Circuit panel that same year declined to recognize a non-sex offender's right against registration under a community notification statute as a condition of parole. . . We cannot conclude from this that Williams's right was clearly established.").

Porter v. Ascension Parish School Board, 393 F.3d 608, 620 (5th Cir. 2004) ("Because Adam's drawing was composed off-campus, displayed only to members of his own household, stored off-campus, and not purposefully taken by him to EAHS or publicized in a way certain to result in its appearance at EAHS, we have found that the drawing is protected by the First Amendment. Furthermore, we have found that it is neither speech directed at the campus nor a purposefully communicated true threat. However, a reasonable school official facing this question for the first time would find no 'pre-existing' body of law from which he could draw clear guidance and certain conclusions. Rather, a reasonable school official would encounter a body of case law sending inconsistent signals as to how far school authority to regulate student speech reaches beyond the confines of the campus. Given the unsettled nature of First Amendment law as applied to off-campus student speech inadvertently brought on campus by others, the contours of Adam's right to First Amendment protection in the present case cannot be deemed 'clearly established' such that it would be clear to a reasonable EAHS official that sanctioning Adam based on the content of his drawing was unlawful under the circumstances. Thus, Braud is entitled to qualified immunity. Even if Adam's rights were clearly established at the time of his expulsion, Braud's determination that the drawing was not entitled to First Amendment protection was objectively reasonable. The Supreme Court has observed that, even when a particular legal doctrine is clearly established, '[i]t is sometimes difficult for an [official] to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the [official] confronts.' . . The record indicates that, at the time he recommended Adam for expulsion, Braud was aware that Adam was responsible for the drawing, that the drawing was two or three years old, and that the drawing had been brought to Galvez Middle School by Adam's younger brother. These facts raise the subtle but important legal questions of whether the drawing constitutes on-campus speech, or an intentionally communicated threat. Although we have answered both of these queries in the negative, we cannot say that all reasonable school officials facing these circumstances would reach the same conclusion.").

Collins v. Ainsworth, 382 F.3d 529, 544, 545 5th Cir. 2004) ("For essentially the same reasons we find no error in the district court's denial of qualified immunity against Ainsworth on the Fourth Amendment issue, this Court agrees with Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs presented evidence that after failing to dissuade the Concert sponsors from proceeding with their plans for the 2 Live Crew event, Ainsworth chose to erect an indirect (but fully effective) bar in the guise of a facially valid pair of driver's license checkpoints on either side of OPG Road, flanking the only entrance to Collins Field. By setting up these checkpoints to stop the Concert from taking place, Ainsworth abused his discretionary power to deny in advance the use of Collins Field for First Amendment-protected musical expression and association. No procedural safeguards were put in place to prevent censorship of legitimate speech and music. Therefore, we find Ainsworth's use of the driver's license checkpoints amounted to an impermissible prior restraint on the Concert. Most Plaintiffs thus have clearly alleged a constitutional violation by Ainsworth. As to most Plaintiffs, we find under these circumstances that no sheriff could reasonably believe his actions aimed at stopping the Concert were legal and would entitle him to qualified immunity.").

Hart v. Texas Dep't of Criminal Justice, No. 03-40274, 2004 WL 1682757, at *4, *5 (5th Cir. July 26, 2004) (not for publication) ("In fact, the Hope Court's discussion of 'clearly established' constitutional rights casts serious doubt on the continued viability of the rigid standard laid down in Pierce v. Smith and Thompson v. Upshur County. In Hope, the Supreme Court expressly disapproved of Eleventh Circuit precedent requiring that 'the facts of previous cases be 'materially similar' ' to the situation before the reviewing court, explaining that '[t]his rigid gloss on the qualified immunity standard ... is not consistent with our cases.' This is significant because Pierce, the foundation of our own rigid standard on the 'clearly established law' question, itself borrowed that standard from Lassiter v. Alabama A & M University, Board of Trustees–a case specifically noted by the Hope Court as being inconsistent with Supreme Court precedent. Thus, Hope pushes us toward a more general description of the constitutional right at issue both by describing a level of specificity lower than that we have used in the past, and by undermining the case law that originally established the more rigid standard and thereby eroding the foundations of our precedent on this point. It is in this context that we must consider whether the right at issue in the instant case was 'clearly established.' As we must take the facts in the light most favorable to the non-movant, the real question is whether a public official in charge of inmate medical care may ignore system-wide problems–especially when they are repeatedly brought to her attention by another similarly credentialed public official–that threaten the health and safety of inmates, thereby (as Hall has alleged) knowingly, i.e. consciously, pursuing a path of complete inactivity–affirmatively deciding to do nothing– in the face of these problems. We must ask rhetorically whether the more general formulations of the Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care give 'fair and clear warning' that such inaction is impermissible, despite the 'novel factual circumstances' of the instant case. We think that they do. Were we to define the right at issue as narrowly as Dr. Adams urges, we would, in effect, be freezing the law as it exists today. No plaintiff could ever successfully allege a violation of a constitutional right, as long as the violation was perpetrated in even a slightly new and unusual way. This appears to be exactly the situation about which the Hope Court was concerned." [footnotes omitted]).

Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 371, 372 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc) ("While some of the relevant First Amendment retaliation precedents in place in the fall of 1998 involved schools . . . and others of them . . . have involved police departments, we concede that our past cases do not include one that has specifically addressed retaliation against instructors at a police academy. We do not see the absence of such a case as an embarrassment to our conclusion that the Police Officials are not entitled to qualified immunity. If we accepted the defendants' view of what it means for the law to be clearly established, qualified immunity would be available in almost every case, even those cases in which 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [was] apparent,' Anderson, 483 U.S. at 640. As the Supreme Court has recently admonished, 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.' Hope, 536 U.S. at 741. Although we are sensitive to the fact that reasonable officials might not always be able to predict the outcome of a balancing test such as that used in Pickering cases, . . . we believe that in this case the illegality of the Police Officials' conduct is sufficiently clear that they can fairly be said to have been on notice of the impropriety of their actions. Indeed, given the factual disputes identified by the district court and taking the plaintiffs' side of those disputes, this case does not require any real balancing at all, for the Police Officials do not have any relevant, legitimate interests to put on their side of the Pickering scales. Our cases show that it is entirely appropriate to deny qualified immunity when the balance of cognizable interests weighs so starkly in the plaintiff's favor.").

Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 398 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc) (Jolly, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent and agree with Judges Jones and Barksdale that the defendant law enforcement officers are entitled to qualified immunity and should be released from personal liability. It seems disingenuous to hold that the law is clearly established when it takes 20,467 words to explain, and when six United States Court of Appeals judges sharply disagree about it. To my way of reasoning, the majority has turned the words, and the doctrine, of 'clearly established' on its head when it denies immunity in this novel case.").

Williams v. Kaufman County, 352 F.3d 994, 1007, 1011, 1012 (5th Cir. 2003) ("In sum, Ybarra, Stewart and Watt dispel any doubt that the law was clearly established by the night of the raid in April, 1995, that strip searching individuals, about whom the police had no individualized probable cause of weapon or drug possession, was unlawful. . . .Although we hold today that the prolonged detention of plaintiffs was unlawful, we nonetheless agree with the district court that qualified immunity shields Harris from liability. Even though Summers does not sanction Harris's conduct, neither did it establish a clear rule warning defendants that such conduct was illegal. . . . In the instant case, there is no doubt that the illegal strip search of plaintiffs corrupted the legality of their detention by extending it unnecessarily. Still, the objective unreasonableness of Harris's conduct in ordering a strip search of plaintiffs does not automatically make his conduct in unduly detaining plaintiffs for the duration of the search objectively unreasonable in and of itself. Whereas Ybarra established the clear rule that any full search of plaintiffs required individualized probable cause, Summers allows a seizure without probable cause when the proper balance is struck between law enforcement and personal security interests. Thus, Summers left the state of the law more ambiguous as to what constituted an unlawful detention in a premises search like the one here. In other words, under the law as it existed in April, 1995, Harris had fair warning that his generalized law enforcement safety interests did not justify strip searching plaintiffs; the law was less clear about whether these same interests were sufficient to permit detention of plaintiffs until the completion of the otherwise unlawful search. We agree with the district court's grant of qualified immunity on plaintiffs' unlawful detention claims.")

Barrow v. Greenville ISD, 332 F.3d 844, 848 (5th Cir. 2003) ("Brantley and Fyfe . . . confirm that the constitutional right of public-school employees to select a private-school education for their children was clearly established when Smith refused to consider Barrow for the position of assistant principal. Smith argues that Brantley and Fyfe does not give fair warning to all reasonable officials in his place that refusing to consider Barrow for the assistant principal position would be unconstitutional. Initially, we note that the question whether there was a clearly-established right does not turn on the existence of a court decision determining that conduct identical to that which is at issue here is unlawful.")

Austin v. Johnson, 328 F.3d 204, 210 (5th Cir. 2003) ("Defendants do not dispute the accuracy of Gipson's log, nor its literal interpretation. Before 3:00 p.m., defendants' conduct was perhaps only negligent, but their failure to call an ambulance for almost two hours while John E lay unconscious and vomiting rises to the level of deliberate indifference. Since Estelle v. Gamble . . . state officers have been on notice that deliberate indifference to a prisoner's serious medical needs violates the Eighth Amendment. Defendants' contention that no case has specifically proscribed the withholding of medical treatment for boot camp attendees reads the right too narrowly; officers need only have 'fair warning' that their conduct is unlawful. . . Given the serious medical consequences of dehydration, a reasonable person would not have waited nearly two hours to call an ambulance once John E became unconscious.")

Estep v . Dallas County, Texas, 310 F.3d 353, 360, 361 (5th Cir. 2002) ("Although we have stated that the constitutional right at stake is Estep's right to be free from a vehicle search unless an officer has a reasonable belief that he is in danger, we must further evaluate whether the contours of that right were 'clearly established' in a more particularized way. . . As applied to this case, we must consider whether it is clearly established law that a reasonable officer could not conclude that he was in danger when faced with a citizen who exited the car prior to the approach of the officer, continuously asked why he had been stopped, showed the officer a key chain with mace, possessed camoflauge [sic] gear, and possessed an NRA sticker? There is no Fifth Circuit case which directly addresses whether a reasonable officer could conclude, based on these specific facts, that a citizen posed a danger and could gain immediate control of a weapon. [footnote omitted] However, there does not have to be a case directly on point for the law to be 'clearly established.' . . Our cases make clear that a Long 'frisk' of a vehicle is only constitutional if there are specific, articulable facts from which a reasonable police officer could believe he was in danger. In our view, the constitutional violation in this case is clear-cut and obvious. No reasonable police officer could have really believed that a search was constitutional under the circumstances presented.").

McClendon v. City of Columbia (McClendon II), 305 F.3d 314, 331-33 (5th Cir. 2002) (en banc)("[I]n the instant case we must assess whether those cases from our sister circuits recognizing the existence of a substantive due process right to be free from state-created danger established the contours of that right with sufficient clarity to provide a reasonable officer in Detective Carney's position with fair warning that providing Loftin with a gun would violate McClendon's rights. . . . [W]hile a number of our sister circuits had accepted some version of the state-created danger theory as of July of 1993, given the inconsistencies and uncertainties within this alleged consensus of authorities, an officer acting within the jurisdiction of this court could not possibly have assessed whether his or her conduct violated this right in the absence of explicit guidance from this court or the Supreme Court. . . . [E]ven if a 'consensus' of circuits had adopted some version of the state-created danger theory in July of 1993, this consensus did not at that time establish the contours of an individual's right to be free from state-created danger with sufficient clarity to provide Detective Carney with fair warning that his conduct violated that right.").

McClendon v. City of Columbia (McClendon II), 305 F.3d 314, 341 (5th Cir. 2002) (en banc) (Robert M. Parker, J., joined by Judges Wiener and Harold R. DeMoss, Jr., dissenting) ([T]he majority contends that the numerous cases which had adopted the state-created danger theory by 1993 do not constitute a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' on this point of law because slight variations existed among the circuits concerning the level of culpability required to hold the state actor constitutionally liable. This conclusion strikes me as plainly inconsistent with the more liberal approach to the 'clearly established law' inquiry as set forth in Wilson. . . .By July of 1993, a consensus of cases of persuasive authority existed to put reasonable police officers on notice that they may violate the Constitution if (1) they create or increase a danger to a known victim; and (2) act with deliberate indifference towards the known victim during the creation of such danger.").

Roe v. Texas Dep't of Protective and Regulatory Services, 299 F.3d 395, 408-11 (5th Cir. 2002) ("In Hope, the Court recently elaborated on what is required for a particular right to be 'clearly established' in the context of qualified immunity. . . . On July 10, 1999, Supreme Court and Fifth Circuit precedent plainly established the following: (1) A strip or body cavity search raises serious Fourth Amendment concerns, Watt, 849 F.2d at 199; and (2) The Fourth Amendment governs the lawfulness of a social worker's entry into a dwelling to resolve a child custody dispute. Mary and Jackie need not prove that 'the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.' . . We had not, however, ever addressed whether the traditional test or the 'special needs' doctrine applies to a social worker's visual searches of naked juveniles. . . . The Supreme Court's previously vague test for finding a 'special need' caused the federal circuits to diverge over this precise substantive question and to disagree again as to whether the rights were 'clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity. It is difficult to argue that a matter of law is clearly established for state actors in this circuit where this court has not opined on the issue in question and the other circuits are in disagreement as to whether the challenged acts constitute a constitutional violation. We need not even reach the question whether, or to what extent, the law of other circuits may be relevant to our qualified immunity jurisprudence, in the absence of plain guidance from our own circuit's caselaw, because here the other circuits were inconsistent in their treatment of the rights here alleged. . . . In July 1999, there was insufficient legal guidance, even under the standard enunciated in Hope, to inform a CPS worker that what Strickland did in reaction to the reports received about Jackie's conduct ultimately would be considered a constitutional violation." [footnotes omitted]) .

Thompson v. Upshur County, 245 F.3d 447, 460, 463 (5th Cir. 2001) ("As to the scope of clearly established law, the question is whether an unmarried adult, under no guardianship or finding of incompetency, who is a pretrial detainee at the jail of a small rural county, holding him on transfer from and as accommodation to a larger neighboring county where he is charged and was arrested for DWI, and who while at the smaller county jail becomes delusional and hallucinatory from DTs, has a clearly established constitutional right to have his jailers at the smaller county either force him to submit to medical care for his DTs against his clearly communicated refusal to do so, or make reasonable efforts to locate a substitute decision maker, in lieu of promptly returning him to the custody of the larger county's jail from which he was transferred and which has detoxification facilities the smaller county's jail lacks. . . . In these circumstances, and given the lack of precedent on the matter, we conclude that not all reasonable sheriffs situated similarly to either sheriff Cross or sheriff Tefteller would realize that the United States Constitution required them to have their jail personnel medically trained respecting the likely medical seriousness of an inmate suffering from DTs and the need to have such an inmate promptly receive medical care or respecting the inability of such an inmate to legally or competently refuse medical treatment despite being able to adequately communicate such refusal. The failure of the sheriffs to furnish such training cannot reasonably be analogized to welfare officials selling foster children into slavery . . . , at least not so long as the doctrine of qualified immunity is to retain any significance beyond the strictly aberrational or symbolic. "). (emphasis original)

Brown v. Nationsbank Corp., 188 F.3d 579, 592 (5th Cir. 1999) ("Applying the Lewis analysis to the FBI's alleged activity in this case, we conclude that the FBI made decisions which harmed the Plaintiffs after ample opportunity for cool reflection. In fact, they invested almost two years and thousands of man hours in developing the sting operation. Thus, the due process clause protects the Plaintiffs from any harm that arose from the officers' deliberate indifference. The facts, as pleaded, establish at least that level of federal agent culpability as Operation Lightning Strike evolved into a disastrous boondoggle. We therefore hold that Hodgson's allegations that federal agents inflicted damages on him, an innocent non-target, during this particular undercover operation and refused him compensation states a claim under Bivens. However, because we address today for the first time the parameters of due process protections afforded innocent third parties injured by law enforcement sting operations run amok, and because the Supreme Court's language that drives our analysis appeared in a case decided in 1998, we cannot say that the due process rights claimed by Hodgson were clearly established during 1992- 94. . . . We therefore affirm the district court's dismissal of Hodgson's Bivens claims on the alternative basis of qualified immunity.").

Harris v. Victoria Independent School District, 168 F.3d 216, 224 (5th Cir. 1999) ("The Defendants are not insulated from their unconstitutional conduct merely because a balancing test is involved in our analysis. While employee speech cases are a likely vehicle for varied fact scenarios, the law is clearly established that a 'mix of public and private speech' may be constitutionally protected.").

Petta v. Rivera, 143 F.3d 895, 899, 908, 911-14 (5th Cir. 1998), denying pet. for reh'g and superseding opinion at 133 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 1998), ("[O]ur review of the record shows that Rivera is entitled to the defense of qualified immunity based on the undisputed fact that the Petta children alleged purely psychological harm as a result of Rivera's actions. At the time of these events, it was not 'clearly established' in our law that such non-physical harm gave rise to a constitutional tort. . . . Between July 5, 1989 and February 25, 1992 . . . Johnson v. Morel was 'clearly established law' regarding an excessive force claim brought under the Fourth Amendment. As we have noted above, this is the relevant 'legal window' within which we must look to determine whether Officer Rivera's actions on January 15, 1990 were 'objectively reasonable.' . . . Our inquiry here is very narrow. We are not asking whether the Petta children's psychological injuries were redressable under the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1990. We are merely asking whether a § 1983 plaintiff at that time had a clearly established right under the Fourteenth Amendment to be free from purely emotional harm resulting from an officer's use of excessive force. We have already demonstrated . . . that such a right was not clearly established in January, 1990, under the Fourth Amendment. What we hold here is simply that the same right was equally 'unclear' (for qualified immunity purposes) under the Fourteenth Amendment. We do so for essentially two reasons: (1) our cases following Graham v. Connor do not clearly distinguish between Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment analyses in this context; we are thus persuaded that Johnson v. Morel and Dunn v. Denk. . . , although admittedly addressing the Fourth Amendment right, also affected the Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force; and, (2) under the particular facts here, we see no principled reason for drawing an analytical distinction between the Petta children's due process claim and an arrestee's Fourth Amendment claim, given the substantially similar concerns implicated by the two claims (e.g., the right to be free from excessive force in an arrest situation and the need for a police officer to use reasonable force in effecting arrests). . . . [O]ur precedents, such as Johnson v. Morel . . . and Dunn v. Denk. . . interjected as much uncertainty into our Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence as into our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, regarding whether a purely non-physical injury rose to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . We must therefore hold that in January, 1990, the Petta children had no 'clearly established' constitutional right under the due process clause to be free from a police officer's use of excessive force where the only injuries allegedly suffered were psychological.").

Petta v. Rivera, 133 F.3d 330, 346, 347 (5th Cir.1998) (Dennis, J., dissenting) ("The contours of the right of helpless and innocent bystander children of tender years, such as the Petta children, to be free from potentially lethal assault, such as being fired upon with a .357 magnum, was sufficiently clear on January 15, 1990 that a reasonable official in Rivera's alleged position would have understood that what he was doing violated the Petta children's constitutional rights. Even in the absence of any analogous judicial precedent, a reasonable officer would or should have known that such egregious conduct was unlawfully excessive and unconstitutional. . . . I am persuaded that on January 15, 1990 a reasonable law enforcement officer knew or should have known that to attack a family suburban automobile occupied by an unarmed mother and her three and seven year old children by firing on the vehicle with a .357 magnum, bludgeoning its window, pointing the .357 magnum in the direction of the mother and three year old child while threatening to kill the mother, and other acts of excessive force and violence, in connection with minor traffic violations, was constitutionally impermissible. Rivera's misbehavior was simply too egregious to justify concluding that because of language in cases involving an entirely different context, i.e., the arrest, detention and seizure of adult suspects, offenders or prisoners, a reasonable officer in Rivera's situation would not know or should not know that his actions in assaulting helpless and innocent bystander children with deadly force for no justifiable reason violated the Petta children's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process constitutional rights and subjected him to liability under § 1983 for their severe psychological damage."), pet. for reh'g denied and opinion superseded by 143 F.3d 895 (5th Cir. 1998). (In the superceding opinion, Judge Dennis adopts his original dissenting opinion. See 143 F.3d at 914)

Gutierrez v. City of San Antonio, 139 F.3d 441, 445-51 (5th Cir. 1998) ("[W]e have jurisdiction to consider the officers' contention that issues of law separable from the merits exist–namely, whether hog-tying violates clearly established law and whether their conduct was objectively reasonable. . . [Defendants] initially argue that the right to be free of hog-tying was not clearly established in November 1994 because neither the Supreme Court nor the Fifth Circuit (or any other circuit) had specifically held that hog-tying constituted excessive force. Such a dogmatic argument is unjustified. . . . [W]e will examine whether a reasonable police officer in November 1994 would have known whether hog-tying falls within the bounds of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of the use of excessive force 'in the light of pre-existing law.'. . . Although guns represent the paradigmatic example of 'deadly force,' Garner failed to address whether other police tools and instruments can also be characterized as 'deadly force.' Lower courts since have struggled with whether to characterize various police tools and instruments as 'deadly force.' . . . These courts have generally described 'deadly force' as force 'carry[ing] with it a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily harm.' . . . Although we have not had occasion to adopt this description, both the Texas statute and SAPD procedures in effect in November 1994 employed it. . . The Texas statute and SAPD procedures in effect in November 1994 also conformed to Garner's holding that an officer can use 'deadly force' only against a suspect who poses a threat of death or serious physical harm to the officer or to others. . . Accordingly, we find both the definition of 'deadly force' and Garner's holding to have been clearly established prior to November 1994. . . . The question thus becomes whether hog-tying in these circumstances creates a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury, and hence, becomes deadly force. . . . Gutierrez thus presents sufficient evidence that hog-tying may create a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury in these circumstances and thereby become deadly force. . . . Assuming this evidence to be true, hog-tying in these circumstances would have violated law clearly established prior to November 1994. . . . In arguing that their conduct was objectively reasonable, [Defendants] first present the affidavit of Commander Albert Rodriguez, who states that the official policies of the SAPD, the Texas Department of Public Safety, and the International Association of Chiefs of Police Use of Force Model Policy in November 1994 did not prohibit the use of hog-ties. He further avers that SCDS was not known to reasonably well-trained police officers in Texas at that time, and that hog-tying was reasonable under these circumstances. To counterbalance this affidavit, Gutierrez presents that of Lou Reiter, former Deputy Chief of the Los Angeles Police Department, who analyzes the facts of this case and states that [Defendants'] use of force and actions were unreasonable. Claiming that a 'battle of the experts' thus exists, [Defendants] assert that they are entitled to qualified immunity because 'if officers of reasonable competence could disagree on this issue, immunity should be recognized.' [citing Malley v. Briggs] We do not believe that the Supreme Court intended by this statement to mean that summary judgment must be granted in favor of the police whenever they can find an expert to testify that their actions were reasonable; in such a scenario, the police would virtually always win summary judgment. Moreover, an expert's opinion does not establish reasonableness as a matter of law, especially when directly contradicted by another expert's well-supported opinion. . . . [B]ased on the combination of the multiple factual issues in dispute and the evidence weighing against the officers, we cannot determine whether [Defendants'] conduct was objectively reasonable as a matter of law. . . .Accordingly, we dismiss the officers' appeal from the district court's denial of summary judgment on Gutierrez's Fourth Amendment claim for lack of jurisdiction.").

Sorenson v. Ferrie, 134 F.3d 325, 328, 330 n.12 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Sorenson cannot satisfy Siegert's first prong–the need to allege the violation of a clearly established constitutional right–merely by asserting that the right not to be arrested without probable cause is clearly established. Instead, she must show that the legality of her conduct was clearly established. That is to say, she must demonstrate that, at the time of her arrest, it was clearly established in Texas that one may lawfully possess a handgun in one's trunk. . . . We hold only that, for purposes of qualified immunity in this civil case, the law was not clearly established on this question as of the date of this incident. We do not mean to express a view as to whether ' 46.02 does or does not prohibit the possession of a weapon in one's trunk. That is for the state courts to decide.").

Dunn v. Denk, 79 F.3d 401, 402 (5th Cir. 1996) (en banc) ("This is a case controlled by the law applicable from 1989 to 1992, a window created by our decision in Johnson v. Morel, 876 F.2d 477 (5th Cir.1989) (en banc), and Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1 (1992), the decision of the Supreme Court effectively overruling it. . . . Given the explicit language of Johnson, and its footnote 1 in particular, we conclude that the law at the time of this arrest was uncertain regarding whether 'a significant injury will be caused by unnecessary force without significant physical injury.' On the present facts, Denk was entitled to qualified immunity from the claims asserted in this case.").

Dunn v. Denk, 79 F.3d 401, 407 (5th Cir. 1996) (en banc) (Reavley, Circuit Judge, joined by Politz, Chief Judge, Wiener, Benavides, Stewart, Parker and Dennis, Circuit Judges, dissenting) ("Once an officer uses objectively unreasonable force to effect an arrest, he loses his qualified immunity, whether the other elements of an excessive force claim are clearly established or not.").

Kiser v. Garrett, 67 F.3d 1166, 1173 (5th Cir. 1995) ("[I]t is apparent that, although a substantive due process right to family integrity has been recognized, the contours of that right are not well-defined, and continue to be nebulous, especially in the context of a state's taking temporary custody of a child during an investigation of possible parental abuse. Even assuming that such a right exists under the circumstances involved here, it certainly was not clearly established when the appellees engaged in the conduct at issue.").

Foster v. City of Lake Jackson, 28 F.3d 425, 430 (5th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e hold that the right of access, as clearly established in 1985-1988, encompassed a right to file an action, but not the right to proceed free of discovery abuses after filing. . . . [E]ven assuming that the contours of the right of access have been expanded since 1988 to include the Fosters' definition, those contours were not clearly established at the time the claimed violations occurred.").

Doe v. Taylor Independent School Dist., 15 F.3d 443, 455 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc) ("The 'contours' of a student's substantive due process right to be free from sexual abuse and violations of her bodily integrity were clearly established in 1987".).

Doe v. Taylor Independent School Dist., 15 F.3d 443, 465 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc) (Higginbotham, J., and Politz, J., specially concurring) ("Justice Scalia pointed out in Anderson v. Creighton, [cite omitted] the hazards of framing the legal question at too great a level of generality. The error can be made in the opposite direction–a search so narrowed that legal nuance rises to uncertainty and ultimately confounds common sense. Qualified immunity reflects the judgment that an official ought not to be mulcted for choices made that only later prove to have been 'illegal.' I don't think we today put any school principal in peril or unfairly second guess this one. This was not an episodic act of an interloper to the school scheme nor the private act of a student. Rather, it was the persistent pattern of indefensible conduct of a school official, the principal's subordinate.").

Doe v. Taylor Independent School Dist., 15 F.3d 443, 467 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc) (Garwood, J., joined by Jones, J., Smith, J., Garza, J., and DeMoss, J., dissenting in part) (finding it not clearly established that the Constitution protects a fifteen-year-old schoolgirl from being sexually fondled and having "consensual" sexual relations with a public schoolteacher.).

Colle v. Brazos County, 981 F.2d 237, 246 (5th Cir. 1993) ("We are persuaded that Sheriff Miller knew of or should have known that if he staffed the jail with persons having no authority to transfer a seriously ill detainee to a hospital, and if he pursued a policy of failing to monitor the critical medical condition of a detainee, these actions would be constitutionally impermissible. If the allegations in Plaintiffs' complaint are true, and they must be accepted as true, Miller should have known that such a policy would result in the deprivation of a detainee's right to reasonable medical care. At this stage of the proceeding, Miller is not entitled to a 12(b)(6) dismissal.").

White v. Taylor, 959 F.2d 539, 546 (5th Cir. 1992) ("[W]hile we think the law was clearly established...that a warrantless misdemeanor arrestee had a right to a prompt determination of probable cause, we hold the contours of that right were not sufficiently clear so that a reasonable law enforcement officer would have known that such a person, arrested late at night in a city without a night magistrate, could not be held overnight before [being taken] before a magistrate.").

Estate of Chapa v. City of Alvin, No. 3:20-CV-00362, 2021 WL 3077671, at *5 (S.D. Tex. July 21, 2021) ("[C]onsider what the Cole court held was 'clearly established' as unlawful, dooming the officers' chance at qualified immunity: '"shooting a mentally disturbed [person], who was pointing a gun the entire time at his own head and facing away from the officer, in an open outdoor area, and who was unaware of the officer's presence because no warning was given prior to the officer opening fire."'. . This case is different. Chapa was aware of the officers, and they gave warning. He was instructed to drop his weapon and he complied. But when he was then ordered to get down on the ground, he refused, begged the officers to shoot him, and picked up his gun again. He pointed it back at himself, but now the officers were facing a mentally unstable man who was defying their instructions, had rearmed himself, had already discharged his weapon at least once, and who could turn it on them in a moment. Judge Edith Jones had a point when she wrote in her Cole dissent:

Neither we nor the Supreme Court has ever held that police officers confronted in close quarters with a suspect armed and ready to shoot must hope they are faster on the draw and more accurate. The increasingly risky profession of law enforcement cannot put those sworn to 'serve and protect' to a Hobson's choice: place their lives on the line by heroic forbearance or risk their financial security in defense of lawsuits. The Supreme Court has repeatedly stated in plain terms that the purpose of qualified immunity is to prevent precisely this quandary.

The plaintiffs bear the burden to show the inapplicability of the defendants' qualified-immunity defense. . . In this case they have failed to do so on both qualified-immunity inquiries. First, there was no Fourth Amendment violation, as the force the officers employed was reasonable under the circumstances. Second, the officers violated no 'clearly established' law. The plaintiffs' excessive-force claim is dismissed.")

I.M. by his next friend M.M. v. Houston ISD, No. CV H-20-3453, 2021 WL 2270271, at *3 (S.D. Tex. June 3, 2021) ("The amended complaint does not plead facts plausibly alleging a special relationship between I.M. and Swearer, the school official. The Fifth Circuit has noted, but not adopted, a 'state-created danger' exception to the special-relationship rule. See Hernandez, No. CV H-19-915, 2019 WL 1934674, at *8 (collecting cases). The exception requires that the state official 'used [his or her] authority to create a dangerous environment for the plaintiff' and 'acted with deliberate indifference to the plight of the plaintiff.'. . The amended complaint alleges that I.M. informed Swearer about Student O.'s assaults, and that she nevertheless continued to leave him unattended, allowing the assaults to take place. This may be sufficient to allege a state-created danger exception to the special-relationship requirement, but the Fifth Circuit has repeatedly declined to recognize that exception. . . The amended complaint does not plausibly allege a special relationship between I.M. and Swearer. Qualified immunity precludes a state-created-danger theory because when Swearer failed to respond to I.M.'s report of abuse, there was no clearly established law that held her responsible for a state-created danger.")

Dyer v. Fyall, No. 3:15-CV-2638-B, 2018 WL 2739025, at *9 (N.D. Tex. June 6, 2018) ("The confusion surrounding medical-inattention claims in the Fifth Circuit dooms the Dyers' medical-inattention claim. The officers in this case have qualified immunity, which means the Dyers can hold them liable for violations of only clearly established rights. A right is clearly established only if 'the contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would understand what he is doing violates that right.'. . So, given that some Fifth Circuit cases require plaintiffs to show intent to cause harm in medical-inattention cases and other do not, there is no clearly established right in the Fifth Circuit to be free from medical inattention by officers who do not actually intend to cause harm. Here, the Dyers neither argue nor present evidence that any of the officers in this case actually intended to harm Graham by withholding medical care. Thus, because qualified immunity bars the Dyers' medical-inattention claim, the Court GRANTS the officers' motion for summary judgment on that claim.")

Luna v. Valdez, No. 3:15-CV-3520-D, 2018 WL 684897, at *14-15 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 2, 2018) ("The court concludes that, with respect to Luna's § 1983 claims against Sheriff Valdez based on the County's alleged policy of refusing to release on bail inmates with an immigration hold, or on the County's alleged policy of holding inmates with an immigration hold for 48 hours after they were otherwise eligible for release, Luna has failed to present evidence that would enable a reasonable jury to find that Sheriff Valdez's conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of Luna's clearly established constitutional rights. . . .Luna has failed to meet his summary judgment burden with respect to the second prong of Sheriff Valdez's qualified immunity defense. In his response brief, Luna contends that 'there can be no dispute that the extant jurisprudence at the time in question required the Defendants to have probable cause to believe Mr. Luna had committed another crime, which the Defendants did not have. The ICE detainer did not give the Defendants that required probable cause.'. . But the only authority Luna cites is Mercado II, which post-dates Luna's period of confinement by more than a year and a half. . . Luna does not point to any controlling authority (or to a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority') that would establish the following critical element: that at the time Luna was detained pursuant to the Immigration Detainer, all reasonable officials in Sheriff Valdez's position would have known that honoring federal immigration detainers by denying pretrial release to detainees with immigration holds, or by holding inmates subject to ICE detainers for up to 48 hours after they were otherwise eligible for release, resulted in a clear violation of Luna's constitutional rights under the circumstances. For example, in holding in Mercado II that 8 C.F.R. § 287.7(d) does not mandate that local law enforcement detain persons who are subject to detainers, it was necessary for this court to piece together out-of-circuit authority, relying on Galarza v. Szalczyk, 745 F.3d 634 (3d Cir. 2014), and the decisions of several district courts that agreed with Galarza. The court specifically noted that "the Fifth Circuit has not yet addressed the issue." Mercado II, 229 F.Supp.3d at 514. And the court held that, '[a]bsent Fifth Circuit authority to the contrary, [it would] follow Galarza and the district courts that rel[ied] on its reasoning or otherwise reach[ed] the same result.'. . The law does not require that, to be entitled to qualified immunity, reasonable officials accurately predict how the court might decide a new legal issue. . . Accordingly, under the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, the court holds that Sheriff Valdez is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Luna's § 1983 claims asserted against her.").

Basler v. Barron, No. CV H-15-2254, 2017 WL 784895, at *3 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 1, 2017) ("In denying Deputy Barron's motion on the grounds of qualified immunity, this court analyzed the second prong and concluded that filming the police is a clearly established First Amendment right. . . However, later, in Turner, the Fifth Circuit noted divergent district court opinions in analyzing the second prong of the qualified immunity defense in determining whether filming the police is a 'clearly established right.'. . The Fifth Circuit's holding in Turner is directly applicable to Deputy Barron's assertion of a qualified immunity defense against Basler's First Amendment claim. . . In light of Turner, the court reconsiders the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . .Like the police officers in the Turner case, Deputy Barron asserted the defense of qualified immunity in his motion to dismiss. . . Basler responded that the right to film the police is a 'clearly established' First Amendment right. . . Basler was arrested in 2014, prior to Turner's 2015 arrest and prior to the Fifth Circuit's 2017 decision in Turner. Applying the Fifth Circuit's reasoning in Turner, the court concludes that First Amendment right to film the police was not clearly established 'at the time' of Basler's arrest.")

Estate of Gray v. Dalton, No. 1:15CV061-SA-DAS, 2017 WL 564035, at *1–2 (N.D. Miss. Feb. 10, 2017) ("The Court entered a Memorandum Opinion and Order on January 6, 2017 granting in part and denying in part the Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment. Those Defendants have asked for a reconsideration of three points: (1) the Court's denial of qualified immunity for the individual officer, (2) the Court's lack of finding as to the County's liability under the Fourth Amendment, and (3) the Court's denial of summary judgment as to Plaintiffs' state law wrongful death and gross negligence claims. After reviewing the motion, responses, rules and authorities, the Court hereby GRANTS IN PART the request for reconsideration and alters its judgment as follows: As noted in the Memorandum Opinion, Wilburn Gray claimed that Defendants illegally detained him in violation of the Fourth Amendment at the Alcorn County Jail from December 23

until December 26 without a judicial hearing on probable cause being held.The Court held that based on the United States Supreme Court's general presumption that "[j]udicial determinations of probable cause within 48 hours of arrest will, as a general matter, comply with the promptness requirement of Gerstein", County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 56, 111 S. Ct. 1661, 114 L. Ed. 2d 49 (1991), together with the state statute citing 48 hours as the threshold for probable cause hearings, and no explanation from the Defendants as to why there would be that delay, that the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis was satisfied. The Court then found that genuine issues of material fact as to whether Dalton's actions were objectively reasonable existed based on the absence of a factual record. Defendants now seek reconsideration based on a recent United States Supreme Court proclamation regarding the blanket of qualified immunity. [Court notes White v. Pauly] Instead of focusing on the more general constitutional issue regarding time, the Court should have, and now does, examine the facts and circumstances of this particular case to determine whether Wilburn Gray's constitutional rights were affected. Here, Wilburn Gray was physically arrested by Deputy Scott Dalton who immediately handed Gray over to Deputy David Harrison for transport to the Alcorn County Jail. Dalton was soon thereafter placed on administrative leave due to his role in the shooting incident. Dalton was not released from administrative leave until January or February of the next year. The record is undisputed in these regards. Plaintiff failed to put forth any case law showing facts approximating those present here. The United States Supreme Court recently admonished a lower court for 'fail[ing] to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.' White, 137 S. Ct. at 552. The Supreme Court quoted the Circuit Court's pronouncement that the case 'presents a unique set of facts and circumstances' as indicative that the officer's conduct did not violate a clearly established right. . . . Under the qualified immunity standards as articulated, to demonstrate that Defendants unreasonably detained Gray, Plaintiff must present controlling authority that 'squarely governs the case here,'. . . and that would have put 'beyond debate,'. . . the question of whether Wilburn Gray's Fourth Amendment rights were violated. Plaintiff did not carry this burden. There is no controlling case law involving sufficiently similar circumstances that would apprise every objectively reasonable officer that he had further duties and obligations to ensure a probable cause hearing to a suspect once custody of that suspect is relinquished to another officer and even after he was placed on administrative leave. This case presents a 'unique set of facts and circumstances' which require the Court's reconsideration. Accordingly, Deputy Scott Dalton is entitled to the protections of qualified immunity.") Sanders v. Vincent, No. 3:15-CV-2782-D, 2016 WL 5122115, at *11-12 (N.D. Tex. Sept. 21, 2016) ("Sanders alleges that Lt. Vincent, Officer Bagley, and Officer Jones deprived him of his 'constitutional rights under the First Amendment to videotape the activities of the Addison Police Department by harassing, detaining, seizing and arresting' him. . . Assuming arguendo that defendants' actions violated Sanders' First Amendment rights, defendants are nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity to the extent Sanders bases his § 1983 claim on these allegations because it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that the First Amendment protects an individual's right to videotape police activities. . . .Sanders has failed to point to any controlling authority that would establish that he had a constitutionally-protected First Amendment right to videotape police activity. Nor is there a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority,'. . . that such activity is protected. . . . [U]nder the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, the court holds that Lt. Vincent, Officer Jones, and Officer Bagley are entitled to qualified immunity to the extent Sanders bases his § 1983 claim on defendants' alleged deprivation of his First Amendment rights.")

Bishop v. City of Denton, No. 4:14-CV-608, 2015 WL 8273986, at *4 (E.D. Tex. Dec. 8, 2015) ("As discussed above, the Court concludes that Bishop has presented sufficient evidence to establish that a question of fact exists as to whether Porter violated Bishop's right to be free from the use of excessive force. However, Porter argues that his conduct was not a violation of clearly established law. To support this contention, Porter cites Justice Alito's dissent in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, which states that it has not been determined whether a pretrial detainee may bring a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim against a detention facility employee. . . However, the Fifth Circuit has allowed pretrial detainees to assert Fourth Amendment excessive force claims against detention facility employees. . . . If bystander liability for excessive force based on the Fourth Amendment was clearly established law as of January 2010, direct liability for excessive force was also clearly established. Therefore, within the Fifth Circuit, there was clearly established law at the time the event at issue occurred that detention facility employees could be held liable under the Fourth Amendment for using excessive force against pretrial detainees.")

Cauley v. Walker, No. CV 1:10CV326, 2015 WL 5521972, at *6 & n.4 (E.D. Tex. Sept. 16, 2015) ("Plaintiff has presented competent summary judgment showing that the amount of force used against him was objectively unreasonable and that he suffered more than a de minimis injury. Moreover, plaintiff's right to be free from having excessive force used against him was clearly established at the time of the incident in question. . . .The right of a pretrial detainee to be free from the use of excessive force was clearly established at the time of the incident in question. However, as indicated above, at that time courts considering an excessive use of force claim against a pretrial detainee asked whether force was used maliciously and sadistically, for the very purpose of causing harm, or in a good faith effort to maintain and restore discipline, rather than whether the force used was objectively unreasonable. As stated above, plaintiff's testimony at his deposition indicates that he was not presenting any threat while in the defendant's office and, accordingly, there was no need for any force to be used to maintain or restore discipline. Plaintiff has therefore demonstrated excessive force was used against him even under the test previously applied.")

Modica v. Humphrey, 2007 WL 2777779, at *5 (W.D.Tex. Sept. 21, 2007) ("At the time of Modica's termination, the law regarding public employees' First Amendment rights was well-established, by Pickering, Givhan, and many other Supreme Court and appellate court decisions. All that Garcetti did was to reduce the class of plaintiffs who can prevail on such claims by making it clear that only public employees who are speaking outside of their official duties may bring retaliation claims. It otherwise did not change the general rule, set out in Pickering and countless other cases, that it is unlawful to terminate an employee for exercising their First Amendment rights. In other words, given the facts of this case, Humphrey cannot plausibly contend that she relied on law existing at the time she took actions against Modica, and then that law was changed by Garcetti to her detriment. Indeed, it is quite the opposite; Humphrey filed the instant motion because she contends that Garcetti changed the law in a manner favorable to her (i.e., to eliminate the Plaintiff's claim). Because Garcetti narrowed the class of people who may sue under the First Amendment, but that narrowing did not eliminate Modica's claim, nothing about the change affected by Garcetti is relevant to the question of whether Modica's right infringed upon by her harassment and firing was 'clearly established' at the time it took place.").

Caudillo v. Lubbock ISD, No. Civ.A. 5:03-CV-165-C, 2003 WL 22670934, at *6, *7 (N.D. Tex. Nov. 10, 2003) ("The Court finds the appropriate level of generality in this case relates to the issue of whether a school and its officials may deny a gay-straight student group access to the campus. In a more highly specific query relevant to this case, the issue presented here is whether a school superintendent may deny access to the school's bulletin boards, PA system, and group meeting areas if a prospective student group 1) lists as one of its goals that it will discuss subject matter relating to sexual activity and birth control other than abstinence–a subject matter the school's administration and board of trustees have declared inappropriate for the forum; and 2) seeks to advertise itself by posting fliers with the group's website address which has direct links to sites that contain explicit sexual material and discussions. . . . Under the circumstances of this case, this Court cannot say that the unlawfulness of Defendant Clemmons' particular actions should have been apparent to him in light of clearly established law at the time of the actions. The relatively few cases addressing the issue on a level of generality relevant to this case occurred not only outside of this circuit, but also in federal district courts. None of the cases consisted of opinions handed down by a circuit court. Such a fact seems relevant since the Fifth Circuit has stated that 'even if a Aconsensus" of circuits had adopted' the relevant rule, such an adoption still may not have provided a defendant with fair warning. McClendon, 305 F.3d at 332-33 (emphasis added to show that the consensus of cases should be from a higher level than obscure district court orders). Clemmons may have had fair warning that generalized limits on a student's free speech might violate the First Amendment; the law was less clear whether, in the context of secondary school students, limits on the speech of a group of minors whose goals included discussing safe sex and providing a website with direct links to materials that clearly discussed explicit sexual acts, might violate the First Amendment.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Campbell v. Cheatham County Sheriff's Dep't, No. 21-5044, 2022 WL 3714606, at *7-8 (6th Cir. Aug. 29, 2022) ("Fox . . . contends that he believed Mark was holding a gun when Mark began opening the door. However, this is a genuine dispute of fact, as Mark contends that he was not holding a gun . . . and there is evidence in the record that the officers did not know what, if anything, Mark was holding. We lack jurisdiction to resolve the factual dispute over what Fox perceived that evening when Mark slightly opened the door. . . Accepting the Campbells' version of the facts, a reasonable jury could find that Fox's use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable. Therefore, we turn to whether the right was clearly established. . . . [V]iewing the record in the light most favorable to the Campbells, Floyd, . . . decided a decade before the incident here, clearly establishes that Fox's conduct was unconstitutional. . . . Under the Campbells' version of events, Floyd is controlling. Mark was in his own home, unarmed, when Fox knocked on his door late in the evening. Though Mark did not make any threatening gestures indicating a danger of physical harm to others, Fox began repeatedly shooting at him without warning. In both cases, the officers had some reason to believe that the suspect had a weapon. Despite this, we determined in Floyd that the officers' use of force was excessive. This finding comports with our caselaw at the time of Fox's use of force, which made clear that merely possessing a weapon, without more, is insufficient to justify the use of deadly force against a suspect. . . .Given this clear precedent and the analogous facts of Floyd, any reasonable officer in Fox's position would know that using deadly force, under the circumstances that the Campbells have asserted, was unconstitutional. . . . Accepting the Campbells' version of events, as we must in this interlocutory appeal, Fox used deadly force while conducting a welfare check, shooting eight times into the home of two unarmed nonthreatening individuals without warning. The 'fortuity that [Fox's] shot[s] failed to strike [the Campbells]' does not take this case out of the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable seizures. . . The Campbells were seized when Fox shot at their house, thereby restricting their freedom to leave. There remains a genuine dispute of material fact regarding how Mark appeared to officers that night, but in the light most favorable to the Campbells, Fox's use of deadly force was clearly excessive and unconstitutional. The district court properly determined Fox was not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. We affirm.")

Campbell v. Cheatham County Sheriff's Dep't, No. 21-5044, 2022 WL 3714606, at *8, *12-15 (6th Cir. Aug. 29, 2022) (Nalbandian, J., dissenting) ("This excessive-force case involving qualified immunity presents a threshold question: Did Officer Fox seize Mark and Sherrie Campbell under the Fourth Amendment when he fired his gun at Mark eight times, thankfully striking no one? Under current law, including the Supreme Court's recent decision in Torres v. Madrid, —— U.S. ——, 141 S. Ct. 989, 209 L.Ed.2d 190 (2021), I believe the answer is no. And regardless, neither the Campbells nor the majority points to an on-point case that gave Officer Fox notice that his conduct constituted a seizure. Next, even if Officer Fox seized the Campbells, he acted reasonably given that Mark announced he had a gun and then quickly opened the door at point-blank range with something in his hand. And, in any event, no case exists that would have put Officer Fox on notice that his conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right. I would grant Officer Fox qualified immunity, so I respectfully dissent . . . . Here, neither the Campbells nor the majority 'identified any Supreme Court case that addresses facts like the ones at issue here.'. . . Because I don't believe that Officer Fox seized either of the Campbells, I would stop here and grant qualified immunity. But even if Officer Fox did seize them, his conduct was reasonable. To decide whether Officer Fox's use of force was reasonable, we must balance Officer Fox's use of force with the threat that Mark posed to Officer Fox and his partner. . . .'If you were a police officer, what risk of getting shot would you be willing to face before' firing your weapon at a suspect who announced he had a gun, then, without warning, opened a door mere feet away from you? . . . That's the choice Officer Fox faced here. And I believe that he made a reasonable one. . . . [I]t's clear that when officers are close to a suspect and have reason to believe he's armed, either because of his statement or other gestures, the use of deadly force is reasonable. . . . Moreover, even if Officer Fox seized the Campbells, the law didn't provide him sufficient notice that his conduct was unlawful. . . . In nonobvious cases like this one, the Campbells must identify a case that put Officer Fox on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful. . . The Campbells land on Floyd v. City of Detroit as that case. . . .Above all, the officers in Floyd had much less reason to feel threatened by Floyd than Officer Fox did by Mark. Those officers were responding to a call about a dispute from more than an hour before regarding a suspect with a weapon. . . And although the first officer who fired did so without hearing from Floyd first, Floyd testified that he yelled that he didn't have a gun before the second officer fired, striking him. . . . Mark himself announced that he had a gun just seconds before opening the door. What's more, Floyd's hands were empty and extended out in front of his body. . . It's clear that shooting an unarmed man with his hands out based on a stale tip is markedly different from shooting at someone feet away who announced they had a gun and opened a door without warning. Floyd is thus materially distinct and an improper case for providing Officer Fox notice that his conduct was unlawful.")

Fugate v. Erdos, No. 21-4025, 2022 WL 3536295, at *12–13 (6th Cir. Aug. 18, 2022) (not reported) ("Stoudemire—and more generally, the seminal Supreme Court case, Bell—clearly established that where a corrections official lacks any penological interest for a search, the 'general' standard is sufficient to place a reasonable officer on notice because the case is an obvious one. . . That conclusion is harmonious with the Supreme Court's admonitions for determining whether a right is clearly established in Fourth Amendment excessive force cases. In excessive force cases, where the constitutional test is 'objective reasonableness,' an officer will not be able to fairly 'determine how the relevant legal doctrine' applies to his case without a sufficiently similar factual scenario that theoretically places the officer on notice that his conduct is unlawful. . . The same is true in unlawful search cases: where the constitutional test is one of objective 'interest-balancing, the point at which the constitutional shades into the unconstitutional will necessarily be gray.'. . But where there is no governmental interest, there's nothing to balance against the interests of the inmate, and the outcome of a one-sided 'apples-only' balancing test is obvious. . . Here, under Fugate's version of the facts, this is an 'obvious' case. . . As discussed at length above, whether the warden had any penological purpose for ordering three daily strip searches for an inmate in a J1 slammer cell turns on the disputed issue of whether an inmate in such a secure, isolated cell could have obtained contraband from an inmate porter (the warden's asserted justification for the search) or some other way. Under Fugate's version of the facts, without any legitimate penological purpose for the excessive number of invasive strip searches, the general standards in Stoudemire and Bell suffice to clearly establish the constitutional violation.")

Fugate v. Erdos, No. 21-4025, 2022 WL 3536295, at *13-14 (6th Cir. Aug. 18, 2022) (not reported) ("We held in 1992 that, in the context of a prison strip search, force applied 'maliciously and sadistically' and not in a 'good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline' violates the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause. . . . Although Cornwell is not 'directly on point,'. . . the 'operative inquiry' is '"whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted."'. . Under Fugate's version of the facts, Cornwell would have made it clear to any reasonable officer in the warden's position that maliciously imposing 90 strip searches in a period of 30 days to punish Fugate violates the Eighth Amendment. True, the Supreme Court has been clear regarding Fourth Amendment violations that specificity of prior cases is 'especially important' because it can be difficult for an officer to know whether his conduct is objectively reasonable in a given scenario. . . But the Court has not required the same level of specificity for Eighth Amendment violations. That lines up with the purpose of qualified immunity: fair notice. . . It is difficult for an official to conform his actions to the constitution with notice of only a general objective reasonableness standard. It is much easier, however, for a reasonable official to conform his conduct to the Constitution with notice that he cannot impose punishment with a 'malicious[ ] or sadistic[ ]' subjective state of mind, even without a prior case with facts that specifically match the official's case. . . In all, Cornwell is sufficient to make 'clear to a reasonable officer[,]'. . that it violates the Eighth Amendment to impose a draconian number of strip searches 'maliciously and sadistically' for the purpose of punishment rather than in a 'good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline[.]'. . Thus, we affirm the denial of qualified immunity to the warden on Fugate's Eighth Amendment claim.")

Grant v. Wilson, No. 21-5642, 2022 WL 3500190, at *8–9 (6th Cir. Aug. 18, 2022) (not reported) ("The question here by analogy would be whether it is clearly established that an officer cannot use deadly force when a person is undisputedly wielding a firearm in close proximity to the officers, but is not aiming the firearm at the officers, and the person does not respond to commands to drop the weapon. The administrator does not point to any cases in which we have held that an officer used excessive force under analogous circumstances. . . . Recent Supreme Court precedent cuts against the administrator's argument that it is clearly established that officers cannot use lethal force when confronted with a person wielding a firearm. In recent cases, the Court held that officers were entitled to qualified immunity when facing potential threats from weapons that are less lethal than a firearm. [discussing City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U.S. 600 (2015) and City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 11 (2021) (per curiam).] In another recent case, we held that the officers' use of force was reasonable when the officers fired at a man who was holding a firearm pointing up, even though it was undisputed that the man did not at any point aim the firearm at the officers. See Thornton v. City of Columbus, 727 F. App'x 829, 838 (6th Cir. 2018). . . .We further rejected the argument that the officers acted too quickly in using deadly force. . . . The Thornton decision contains several factual similarities to the instant case, most notably that it was undisputed that the victim never aimed his firearm at the officers and it was unclear whether the victim was moving towards the officers when he was shot. While there were other factors at play in Thornton, such as the fact that the police had responded to a report of a man threatening other people with a gun, . . . the reasoning regarding the use of force when the gun was not aimed at the officers is similar enough to the facts of this case to prevent the administrator of Grant's estate from successfully arguing that it was clearly established that such conduct was prohibited.")

Shumate v. City of Adrian, Michigan, 44 F.4th 427, 449-50 (6th Cir. 2022) ("In sum, our analysis of the three Graham factors leads to the conclusion that the officer's use of force was not objectively reasonable considering the totality of the circumstances. The objective facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to Shumate, show that the severity of the offense (assuming there was one) was quite low; he posed no immediate threat to officer safety; and he offered nothing more than verbal belligerence or passive noncompliance. Accordingly, the district court did not err in finding that a reasonable jury could find that Powers violated Shumate's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . .By 2019, when this incident occurred, the right to be free from physical force when one is not actively resisting the police was clearly established. . . It was also clearly established in this Circuit that an individual has a constitutional right not to be tased when he is not actively resisting. . . Consequently, Powers violated those rights by tasing Shumate three times and using physical force where Plaintiff was not engaged in active resistance. . . Under Shumate's version of the facts, there was no indication that he committed a severe crime, posed an immediate threat to Powers, or attempted to evade arrest by flight or resisted arrest. Because the right to be free from being tased and subjected to physical force (in the alleged form of punching, knee strikes, kicking, and hitting) while not actively resisting and while being non-violent was clearly established prior to 2019, Powers was on 'notice that his specific conduct was unlawful.'. . Thus, a reasonable jury could find that Powers violated Shumate's clearly established right to be free from excessive force. The district court properly denied Powers qualified immunity for the § 1983 claim.")

Skatemore, Inc. v. Whitmer, 40 F.4th 727, 739 (6th Cir. 2022) ("[T]here is no clearly established precedent that pandemic-era regulations limiting the use of individuals' commercial properties can constitute a Fifth Amendment taking. In fact, the overwhelming majority of caselaw indicates that such regulations are not takings.")

Bell v. City of Southfield, Michigan, 37 F.4th 362, 367-68 (6th Cir. 2022) ("For the tasing, we start and end with the second: Was Bell's right not to be tasered clearly established in these specific circumstances? The plaintiff bears the burden of showing that the right was clearly established. . . And to do so, a plaintiff must point to a case showing that reasonable officers would have known their actions were unconstitutional under the specific circumstances they encountered. . . Except in an 'obvious' circumstance, it's not enough for a plaintiff to offer cases that merely stand for the 'general proposition' that the Fourth Amendment bars the use of excessive force. . . Instead, when it comes to excessive force, the Court has repeatedly told us that specific cases are 'especially important.'. . The unlawfulness of the officer's acts 'must be so well defined' that no reasonable officer would doubt it. . .In addition, a plaintiff cannot point to unpublished decisions to meet this burden. Basic logic tells us at least this much. After all, the qualified-immunity inquiry looks at whether a right has been clearly established. For a right to be clearly established, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . .

So at a minimum, Bell must provide on-point caselaw that would bind a panel of this court. Bell fails to do so. He fleetingly cites a single published case that found tasing the plaintiff constituted excessive force. But there, the defendants offered no video evidence. . . So the court had to adopt the plaintiff's explanations—that he never resisted arrest, never threatened the officers, and ran away from them during handcuffing to avoid getting hit. . . Here, indisputable video evidence shows Bell actively resisting—he repeatedly pulled his left arm away from Langewicz to avoid the handcuff (even after officers warned that he would be tased if he didn't comply). . . So Brown, which assumed no active resistance, doesn't come close to providing the officers notice that tasing Bell was excessive here. Nor do Bell's other cases help. All are either out-of-circuit or unpublished, and thus do not clearly establish anything as to the officers. Plus, those cases also diverge from Bell's.")

Wiley v. City of Columbus, Ohio, 36 F.4th 661, 669-70 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Wiley argues that Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc. 'clearly established that putting substantial or significant pressure on a suspect's back while that suspect is in a face-down prone position after being subdued and/or incapacitated constitutes excessive force.'. . Champion is distinguishable because in that case Champion was face down, handcuffed, and bound at the ankles by a hobble strap. . . Witnesses testified that officers sat on his back while he was prone on the ground. . . Also, Champion was no longer resisting, and officers continued putting weight on his back. . . In this case Thomas consistently resisted efforts to be restrained and he was not yet hobbled. Shaffner testified that he did not put pressure on Thomas's chest or breathing cavity, and no evidence rebuts this testimony. Champion fails to demonstrate that the actions of Andrews and Shaffner violated a clearly established right. Next Wiley argues that Martin v. City of Broadview Heights clearly establishes a right against the force used on Thomas. . . In Martin a mentally unstable individual that displayed no risk to others was subdued through severe force by law enforcement. This court found in Martin that the level of force used did not match the threat Martin presented. . . Officers lay on Martin, fell on him, dropped a knee into his side, punched his face and torso repeatedly, wrapped his pelvis area with one officer's legs and then gripped his chin and neck, and kneeled on his calves. . . In Martin there was little safety risk to others and the officers applied compressive body weight to his chest. . . In this case Thomas presented a safety risk to officers, paramedics, and himself. Officers here also did not apply compression to Thomas's chest, whereas at one point three officers were on top of Martin. . . The facts in the instant case are distinguishable; Martin does not offer a clearly established right against the measures used to restrain Thomas nor is it applicable to the circumstances presented by Thomas's combative behavior. Finally, Wiley relies upon Griffith v. Coburn, but it is not persuasive. . . In Griffith officers used an unprovoked neck restraint tactic. . . There is no allegation of a similar tactic being used on Thomas; therefore, Griffith does not demonstrate a clearly established right relevant to this case. Wiley cannot meet her burden of demonstrating a clearly established right as of January 14, 2017, prohibiting the use of the techniques used by Andrews and Shaffner on Thomas under the circumstances of his erratic and combative behavior. Because Wiley cannot show that Thomas had a clearly established right against the type of force that was used, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Burnett v. Griffith, 33 F.4th 907, 912-15 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Because we ultimately conclude that Sergeant Griffith did not have fair warning that his specific conduct violated Burnett's Eighth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force, the circumstances of this case warrant addressing the 'clearly established prong' first and obviate the need to address whether Sergeant Griffith in fact violated Burnett's rights under the Eighth Amendment. The relevant inquiry is thus whether Sergeant Griffith had fair warning that propelling a handcuffed prisoner to the floor, in response to the prisoner's attempt to break free, was 'an unreasonable method of regaining control of a prisoner in a [room] occupied only by other jail officials.'. . . There are indeed similarities between the facts of Cordell and those in the present case. Both Cordell and Burnett were handcuffed and in an area of the jail where only jail officials were present. But unlike in Cordell, Burnett created an immediate exigency by pulling away from Sergeant Griffith in an attempt to break free from Sergeant Griffith's grasp. The act of breaking away from an officer's control is a far greater show of resistance than the act of turning toward an officer. Although Burnett was restrained by handcuffs with his arms behind his back, the video plainly establishes that Burnett was resisting control, which was never the situation with Cordell. The fact that Cordell was always under control was a key consideration in this court's ultimate holding that a reasonable jury could find that the prison officer in that case used excessive force. . . . In sum, the contours of the fair-warning requirement that were satisfied in Cordell do not extend to the circumstances of Burnett's case. Cordell makes clear that the Eighth Amendment includes the right to be free from a jail official's use of excessive force against a compliant prisoner who is handcuffed and in an area of the jail where only other jail officials are present. Whether the prisoner is under control can thus be characterized as an important determinate of the right established by Cordell. . . The video evidence here shows that Burnett was resisting control at the time that Sergeant Griffith used force to restrain him. Cordell thus cannot fairly be extended to this case to conclude that Sergeant Griffith had fair warning that his use of force to take Burnett to the floor, in response to an exigency created by Burnett, was a violation of Burnett's rights under the Eighth Amendment. . . . Sergeant Griffith's actions were not so egregious as to obviate the requirement of identifying precedent that places 'the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate' such that Sergeant Griffith was placed on fair warning that his conduct was unconstitutional. . . And in further contrast to Taylor and McCoy, the video evidence in this case establishes that Sergeant Griffith's use of force was motivated by an exigency created by Burnett's actions. . . Based on the foregoing, we conclude that the state of the law at the time that Sergeant Griffith acted did not provide him with fair warning that his actions would violate Burnett's Eighth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. The district court accordingly did not err in granting summary judgment in favor of Sergeant Griffith on qualified-immunity grounds.")

Lee v. Russ, 33 F.4th 860, 863-66 (6th Cir. 2022) ("[C]onstruing the record evidence in the estate's favor as we must at this stage, a reasonable jury could find that Russ violated Groom's constitutional rights. Groom did not pose an imminent and serious risk when Russ fired his weapon. Russ, the closest individual, stood near the back of his vehicle 30 feet away. Officer Lee provided cover with his firearm from behind Groom. Aside from telling Russ '[n]ot today' when Russ said they needed to talk, . . . Groom did not make any verbal threats. He stood still for roughly 20 seconds, lowered his knife to waist height, then made one step sideways to Russ. This was not a threatening advance or at least that is what a jury could find on this record. Even so, Russ fired the shot as soon as Groom 'began to move.'. . Granted, Russ knew that Groom had robbed a pharmacy. He knew that Groom had unsheathed a knife when the officers confronted him and disregarded commands to drop it. And he knew that Groom had walked to a position 30 feet away and that Groom told Russ to shoot him. But all record facts considered, Groom's actions in the moments before the shooting did not justify lethal force. Even Officer Lee thought that Groom had calmed down and 'didn't see any reason for a shot to be fired from where' he stood behind Groom. . . On this record, a reasonable jury could find that Russ used excessive force. In the second place, this right was clearly established in this context. . . . What was true in Sova, what was clearly established there, governs us here. Both cases involved a knife-wielding man who disregarded commands to drop the weapon. Each man told officers to shoot him. And each man moved just before being shot. One man opened a screen door and started moving onto a porch where officers stood. The other man took a halting step from 30 feet away after remaining stationary for 20 seconds. When it comes to the threat of imminent and serious harm posed by these fateful movements, there are no material distinctions. If anything, Sova might be the harder case, because the officers were closer to the suspect and at greater risk given his prior aggressive movement onto the porch, and because Sova's movement was directly toward the officers. . . . Russ resists this conclusion. He argues that we should not entertain the estate's argument concerning the sideways direction of Groom's fateful step because the estate raised it for the first time on appeal. But the estate argued all along that '[t]he video speaks for itself,'. . and that Groom's 'minimal' movement did not create an imminent threat[.] . . It has not abandoned its position, mainly premised on the video, that Groom took a halting step perpendicular to Russ, not toward him. . . .The district court reasoned that Reich v. City of Elizabethtown, decided after the shooting in this case, muddies the water. . . . Reich involved a 'knife-wielding belligerent' with severe schizophrenia who was not taking his medication, apparently prompting him to think 'everybody [was] out to get him' and apparently prompting him to ignore officers' 'demands that he drop the knife.'. . Just before being shot, the suspect 'walked at a fast pace toward the officers,' had his knife hand raised in a 'stabbing position,' and said 'you're gonna have to kill me mother*er.'. . The law did not clearly establish that the officers' use of force lacked justification, we held, even granting the plaintiff's theory that the suspect took a step away just before the shooting. . . That was in part because the suspect posed a threat not just to the officers, but also to 'neighborhood residents,' as the encounter occurred in a front yard and the officers had seen the man 'pacing back and forth between houses in the neighborhood' and 'acting bizarre.'. .Groom's conduct differed materially. He stopped moving toward Russ for 20 seconds and lowered his knife to waist height. And Groom's step from 30 feet away did not suggest that he posed an immediate threat to anyone in the area. That makes this a meaningfully different case from Reich. Sova, by contrast, constitutes '[p]recedent involving similar facts' sufficient to move this case 'beyond the otherwise hazy border between excessive and acceptable force and thereby provide an officer notice that a specific use of force is unlawful.'")

Novak v. City of Parma, 33 F.4th 296, 304-05, 312 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Whether Novak's satirical posts were protected parody is a question of fact. . . But Novak didn't just post fake event advertisements mocking the police department. He also modeled his page after the Department's, using the same profile picture. He deleted comments that let on his page wasn't the official one. And when the Department tried to clarify that Novak's page was imitating its own, he copied the official page's clarification post word for word. . .Whether these actions—deleting comments that made clear the page was fake and reposting the Department's warning message—are protected speech is a difficult question. After all, impersonating the police is not protected speech. . . And for good reason—one can easily imagine the mayhem that a scam IRS or State Department website could cause. . .But while probable cause here may be difficult, qualified immunity is not. That's because qualified immunity protects officers who 'reasonably pick[ ] one side or the other' in a debate where judges could 'reasonably disagree.'. . That's just what the officers did—they reasonably found probable cause in an unsettled case judges can debate. Indeed, Novak has not identified a case that clearly establishes deleting comments or copying the official warning is protected speech. So even with Leonard's protected-speech rule on the books, the officers could reasonably believe that some of Novak's Facebook activity was not parody, not protected, and fair grounds for probable cause. What's more, the officers had good reason to believe they had probable cause. Both the City's Law Director and the judges who issued the warrants agreed with them. Reassurance from no fewer than three other officials further supports finding that the officers 'reasonably,' even if 'mistakenly,' concluded that probable cause existed. . . That's enough to shield Riley and Connor from liability. Thus, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Novak's retaliation claims. . . .Little did Anthony Novak know when he launched "The City of Parma Police Department" page that he'd wind up a defendant in court. So too for the officers who arrested him. At the end of the day, neither got all they wanted—Novak won't be punished for his alleged crime, and the defendants are entitled to summary judgment on Novak's civil claims. But granting the officers qualified immunity does not mean their actions were justified or should be condoned. Indeed, it is cases like these when government officials have a particular obligation to act reasonably. Was Novak's Facebook page worth a criminal prosecution, two appeals, and countless hours of Novak's and the government's time? We have our doubts. And from the beginning, any one of the officials involved could have allowed 'the entire story to turn out differently,' simply by saying 'No.'. . Unfortunately, no one did. Because the law compels it, we affirm.")

LaPlante v. City of Battle Creek, Michigan, 30 F.4th 572, 581-83 (6th Cir. 2022) ("[I]n this case, we cannot completely determine the nature of the interaction or the communications between Plaintiff and Officer Ziegler from the video alone. That task is best left to a jury. Plaintiff and the district court rightly compare this case to our opinion in Baker v. City of Hamilton, 471 F.3d 601 (6th Cir. 2006). In that case, we held that qualified immunity is inappropriate where there is a dispute regarding whether a suspect stopped and raised his hands in the air during a police encounter, and a reasonable jury could conclude that the suspect's movements indicated that he had surrendered. . . This case is factually analogous to Baker in various respects, even considering the fact that, unlike in Baker, the record includes a video depicting the moment when Plaintiff raised his hands in the air ahead of the takedown maneuver. . . That is because a reasonable jury could view the video and determine that Plaintiff surrendered when he raised his hands. Importantly, we have determined that the use of a takedown maneuver, in a variety of scenarios, can amount to excessive force. [collecting cases] Considering the factors outlined by the relevant caselaw, this case presents genuine disputes as to Officer Ziegler's use of force, both as Ziegler engaged in the takedown maneuver and as he proceeded to 'put pressure on [Plaintiff's] back, upper body, arms, and the side of his head.'. . Where, as here, the available video is not clear as to those factors, . . . we must reject Ziegler's qualified immunity defense because a reasonable jury could find that his use of force violated Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Viewing the disputed facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Officer Ziegler violated Plaintiff's clearly established right to be free from excessive force when he employed the takedown maneuver. While Defendants claim that no reasonable officer in Ziegler's shoes would have known that it was constitutionally excessive to use a takedown maneuver to subdue an intoxicated, uncooperative person, the extent of Plaintiff's cooperation is disputed here. . .We have held that takedown maneuvers are excessive when officers deal with a 'generally compliant' suspect, and that the police may not use physical force against a subdued, non-resisting subject. . . We have also established that such a maneuver is excessive when a suspect surrenders to the police, does not offer resistance, and/or when the interaction happens in the presence of multiple officers. . . Considering the totality of the circumstances, and viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, an objective officer in Ziegler's shoes was on 'notice that his specific conduct was unlawful.'")

Murray v. Dep't of Corrections, 29 F.4th779, 790 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Courts have frequently rejected officials' contentions that a 'legal duty need ... be litigated and then established disease by disease or injury by injury' in the context of Eighth Amendment claims. . . Murray argues that in 2011 and 2012—when Dr. Heyd was treating him—the two constitutional rights at issue in this case were already clearly established. Those rights are (1) the Eighth Amendment right to be free from the denial or delay of adequate treatment for serious medical needs, and (2) for prison officials to diligently carry out the prescribed treatment plan. As discussed below, both rights were clearly established at the time that Dr. Heyd was treating Murray. [discussion of rights and precedents]")

Trozzi v. Lake County, Ohio, 29 F.4th 745, 760-61 (6th Cir. 2022) ([W]e need not decide whether Snow's decision not to seek immediate emergency help for Trozzi amounted to a constitutional violation. For when that same conduct 'does not violate clearly established ... [federal] rights of which a reasonable person would have known,' it is not necessary to decide whether a constitutional violation occurred. . . In other words, finding that Snow did not violate a clearly established right is a separate ground by which we may affirm the district court. . . Turning, then, to the clearly established inquiry, qualified immunity is appropriate unless the officer in question had 'fair notice' that her conduct was unlawful. . . To provide such notice, the scope of the constitutional right must be 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what [she] is doing violates that right.'. . Whether the official had such notice is 'judged against the backdrop of the law at the time of the conduct.'. . Critically, we do not define clearly established law at a 'high ... level of generality.'. . While a case need not be 'directly on point for a right to be clearly established,' the burden is on the plaintiff to show that closely analogous precedent has placed the 'constitutional question beyond debate.'. . As an initial observation, we agree with Trozzi that pre-Brawner case law—that is, cases that consider whether the government official was subjectively aware of the detainee's serious medical issues—is the appropriate focus for determining what constitutional rights are clearly established. After all, a change in the law (such as Brawner) that occurs after the official's conduct is 'of no use in the clearly established inquiry.'. . This view joins that of the majority of our sister circuits who have held that Kingsley modifies the Farmer test. See Balsewicz v. Pawlyk, 963 F.3d 650, 657 & n.5 (7th Cir. 2020); Ross v. Corr. Officers John & Jane Does 1-5, 610 F. App'x 75, 77 n.1 (2d Cir. 2015). But see Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657, 672 (9th Cir. 2021).")

Montgomery v. Whidbee, No. 21-5327, 2022 WL 1008284, at *3 (6th Cir. Mar. 16, 2022) (not reported) ("It is clearly established that the voting rights of pretrial detainees are protected by the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. See O'Brien v. Skinner, 414 U.S. 524, 529–30 (1974). Jamison argues she is protected by qualified immunity unless Montgomery can identify a case that found a constitutional violation in the precise circumstances she faced, which Montgomery failed to do. A case with the precise factual scenario need not be found, however, 'for it to be sufficiently clear to a reasonable official that his actions violate a constitutional right' such that the right is clearly established. . . The relevant inquiry is whether the law was clear enough that a reasonable official in her position would have recognized that her actions were unconstitutional. . . There are no controlling cases directly on point to this factual scenario, but it is arguable that a reasonable official would have recognized that delaying the processing of a pretrial detainee's absentee ballot would unconstitutionally interfere with the detainee's right to vote. The right is thus clearly established. Montgomery's complaint, construed liberally and in his favor, must plausibly allege that Jamison was deliberately indifferent to the fact that her conduct would violate his right to vote. See Brawner v. Scott Cnty., Tenn., 14 F.4th 585, 596 (6th Cir. 2021). The deliberate indifference standard is an objective one and requires more than mere negligence. . . Montgomery must show that Jamison 'disregarded a known or obvious consequence of [her] action.'. . . Given the twenty-day delay in giving Montgomery his requested application and four-day delay in returning the notarized application in the face of the clearly stated deadline, Montgomery plausibly alleges that Jamison was deliberately indifferent that her conduct would violate his right to vote. A reasonable official in her position would have been aware that her actions were unconstitutional, and she is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.")

Palma v. Johns, 27 F.4th 419, 429-32, 438-44 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Where 'a plaintiff claims that excessive force was used multiple times, "the court must segment the incident into its constituent parts and consider the officer's entitlement to qualified immunity at each step along the way."'. . Here, Plaintiffs claim that Johns used excessive force in three ways: (1) by tasing Palma three times, . . (2) by taking initial shots at Palma, and (3) by continuing to shoot Palma even after Palma bent over with his hands on the ground. After viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Palma, if 'a jury could conclude that [the defendant] engaged in gratuitous violence by using force beyond the scope of that which was reasonably necessary or justifiable,' then the defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. . . . Johns could not have tased Palma merely for refusing to stop and show his hands unless he had some other reason to fear for his safety. . . Palma never physically resisted. However, the parties agree that Palma ignored Johns' orders to stop moving and take his hands out of his pockets. Even so, this defiance, alone, cannot justify Johns' decision to tase Palma. . . If the jury accepts Johns' version of events—that Palma 'aggressively' approached him with a 'crazed look on his face,'. . . then the taser applications may have been reasonable. At the summary judgment stage, however, we do not blindly "accept the officers' subjective view of the facts.". . As discussed below in relation to the shootings, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Palma's mere failure to follow orders would not lead a reasonable officer to believe that Palma posed a danger. . . .Accepting the facts most favorable to Plaintiffs, the tasings amounted to excessive force, and Defendants were not entitled to summary judgment on this issue. . . . In reality, mental illness may mitigate the risk in one situation and aggravate the risk in another. Therefore, we cannot simply defer to an officer's post hoc use of mental illness as a justification for using force. Rather, if a jury could find that a reasonable officer would not perceive an imminent threat of danger—or would use other de-escalation tactics—then qualified immunity is unwarranted. . . Based on the undisputed facts that Johns knew Palma was mentally ill and that Palma was unresponsive but not threatening throughout the entire encounter, mental illness in this case was a mitigating factor showing that Palma did not pose an immediate threat. . . Furthermore, Palma's mental illness is relevant when considering whether Johns used excessive force. 'The diminished capacity of an unarmed [person] must be taken into account when assessing the amount of force exerted.'. . While we have found that using a taser or pepper spray on a mentally ill person was reasonable, . . . we have never held that shooting a mentally ill person was reasonable when the officers had little reason to suspect that the person was armed. . . A jury is best positioned to balance these considerations. . . .It must be remembered that the police were called to the scene only because of a family dispute over a TV remote control. Johns should have waited for backup before engaging with a mentally ill man who posed no immediate threat to anyone. Even after engaging with Palma, Johns still could not use force that was 'grossly disproportionate to the need.'. . After tasing Palma, Johns had the opportunity to subdue him using other, non-lethal methods such as handcuffs or his baton. Indeed, Johns pulled out his baton, extended it, and raised it above his head ready to strike Palma. Ultimately, Johns abandoned any attempt to use the baton after Palma turned back towards Johns. If an officer reasonably unholsters his gun during an encounter, it may be unreasonable to expect him to swap out the gun for a less lethal tool. . . But the opposite happened here; Johns unholstered his gun even though a less deadly alternative was already in his hands. Furthermore, if the entire encounter lasted eight to ten minutes, Johns may have been able to safely pursue other options such as getting into his patrol car and awaiting backup. . . .While each of these factual considerations is distinct, none can be considered standing alone. Altogether, the facts, viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, raise a triable issue as to the reasonableness of Johns' decision to use lethal force. Defendants focus primarily on Palma's disobedience; Palma purportedly kept walking towards Johns and refused to show his hands. But equally important is that Johns knew Palma was mentally ill; Palma did not commit any crime before Johns arrived; he did not threaten Johns; he did not make any threatening gestures, like raising his fists; and he did not visibly brandish a weapon. Palma walked towards Johns at a normal pace—and it is the jury's job to decide whether this was 'aggressive,' as Johns said. After tasing Palma, Johns saw one of Palma's hands, but still did not see any weapons. According to Melissa, the encounter lasted eight to ten minutes and, even while approaching Johns, Palma never got within ten to fifteen feet of Johns. Under these circumstances, Johns lacked probable cause to believe that Palma posed an imminent threat of serious bodily harm. . . . Finally, Plaintiffs argue that, even if the tasing and initial shooting were reasonable, Johns acted unreasonably by continuing to shoot at Palma with a second volley of shots. Once an officer eliminates the imminent threat, any continued use of force is unreasonable. . . . As Plaintiffs note, the number of shots fired is certainly relevant, but it is not dispositive. . . . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Johns continued shooting even though he could now see that Palma was not holding a weapon, Palma was not moving, and Palma was bent over with his hands on the ground. In that situation, any threat Palma posed dissipated after the first few shots and that Johns acted unreasonably by continuing to shoot Palma. . . . As we held in Wright, officers violate the Fourth Amendment by tasing a man who is not under arrest, does not physically resist, and is not visibly armed, even if the man defies the officers' orders and officers cannot see his hands. . . Thus, a reasonable officer would know that tasing Palma violated his clearly established constitutional rights. . . Second, 'it is axiomatic that individuals have a clearly established right not to be shot absent "probable cause to believe that [they] pose[ ] a threat of serious physical harm."'. . Under our precedents, reasonable officers would know that Palma did not pose a threat of serious physical harm and, therefore, using lethal force would be unconstitutional. An officer does not have probable cause to justify deadly force just because the person's hands are in his pockets and the officer cannot see his hands. . . . Under Plaintiffs' factual account, Johns had no reason to believe that Palma 'pose[d] a threat of serious physical harm.'. . Under the circumstances, shooting Palma violated clearly established constitutional law. . . Finally, '[w]e have held repeatedly that the use of force after a suspect has been incapacitated or neutralized is excessive as a matter of law.'. . Thus, by continuing to shoot after Palma was bent forward or on the ground, Johns violated Palma's clearly established constitutional rights. . . . Plaintiffs raise genuine disputes of material fact that bear on whether Deputy Johns violated Vincent Palma's clearly established constitutional rights. Therefore, we REVERSE the district court's order granting Defendants' motion for summary judgment and REMAND for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.") Palma v. Johns, 27 F.4th 419, 444-45, 454, 456-58, 460-61 (6th Cir. 2022) (Readler, J., dissenting) ("If one were unsure about the power a circuit court can wield, this case is a blunt example. With two circuit judges in agreement, a majority opinion can run roughshod over a well-reasoned opinion by an experienced and dispassionate district court judge. It can selectively amplify arguments barely made by the parties and can willfully resurrect others long ago abandoned. And, perhaps most striking of all, it can entirely ignore our Court's prior decisions as well as those from the Supreme Court, comforted by the knowledge that few decisions garner review beyond the appellate panel stage. . . .[I]n beating a new path in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, the majority opinion dramatically—and dangerously—limits the ways in which officers can protect themselves during threatening encounters. By the majority opinion's logic, an officer may not act too soon, for fear of engaging in excessive force. But he also may not wait too long. For if he does, the majority opinion reasons, that proves the threat posed to the officer was not immediate, rendering the officer's actions excessive. And while the officer waits (and hopefully remains unharmed), he must attempt alternative uses of force. Unless, of course, that alternative is a taser. Yet all of this goes out the window, we learn, if the officer knows the individual has some vague mental health issue. While the majority opinion ties its holding to the individual's mental health status, it never explains how an officer is to respond to a threatening individual believed to be suffering from mental distress, short of advising officers to hide in their cars rather than intervene in a potentially hostile situation. Instead, the majority opinion erects a seemingly insurmountable standard to justify an officer's use of force in encounters with a person suffering mental distress. Doing so effectively bars a grant of qualified immunity if the officer is generally aware an individual faces such challenges. That is not how we have previously interpreted the Fourth Amendment. Nor, for even more obvious reasons, is it reflective of a clearly established rule in our Circuit. . . . All things considered, the majority opinion simply 'substitut[es] [its] personal notions of proper police procedure for the instantaneous decision of the officer at the scene.'. . Nowhere is this more evident than in the majority opinion's assessment, from its perch on the bench, years after the incident at hand, that '[Officer] Johns should have waited for backup.'. . . This approach tramples our decades old understanding that it is not 'appropriate for us, in the quietude of our chambers, to second-guess ... [an officer's] on-the-scene judgment.'. . Accordingly, we should affirm the grant of summary judgment to Officer Johns. . . . Assuming, for purposes of argument, that the Palmas' claims satisfy the first step of qualified immunity, they wildly fail the second. Step two's legal framework is familiar. . . . To prove that Vincent's right in this instance was clearly established, the Palmas bear the burden to either 'identify a case that put [Officer Johns] on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful' or show that the case is an 'obvious' one, such that the generalized Fourth Amendment standards set forth in Graham and Garner '"clearly establish" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'. . In other words, a plaintiff faces a fork in the road: present controlling, on-point contemporaneous case law, or show that the violated right was obvious. Yet standing at that fork, the Palmas proceeded down neither path. Officer Johns's assertion of qualified immunity obligated the Palmas to explain why Officer Johns's conduct—either the tasing or the shooting—violated clearly established law. . . On appeal, however, they left those questions largely unanswered. Here again, the Palmas' litigating decisions should spell the end of the case. Enter the majority opinion. Once again, it comes to aid the Palmas, both crafting an argument on the Palmas' behalf—this time, that Officer Johns violated clearly established law—and then evaluating that argument. And, unsurprisingly, the majority opinion agrees with the argument it advocates. This approach is as disrespectful to the legal process as it is unprecedented. . . . [T]he district court did not address the clearly established prong at all, and . . . the appellant did not raise the issue on appeal. . . .In a situation like this, where the district court did not consider a potentially case-dispositive issue, the ordinary and more prudent practice is to remand the matter to the district court for further consideration. . . . And the majority opinion's decision to issue a published case declaring the clearly established law of our Circuit without prior consideration by the district court and full development of the record is, quite literally, a rush to judgment. . . Were it appropriate for the clearly established inquiry to make its debut on appeal, Officer Johns's conduct did not violate clearly established law. The Palmas effectively concede that there is no on-point, controlling case law prohibiting Officer Johns's conduct. In their appellate briefing, the Palmas confessed that 'there is no Sixth Circuit precedent directly on point with the facts of this case.' They likewise failed to cite to any on point Supreme Court decision. Those concessions foreclose this manner of overcoming qualified immunity. . . In the absence of a controlling, on-point case, the Palmas are left to show that this is the rare, 'obvious' case where the general excessive force standard articulated in Graham and Garner clearly established the law. . . But the Palmas essentially concede this argument too. After all, they describe their case in their brief as one involving 'factually nuanced questions,' not obvious and blatant misconduct. . . With the Palmas having failed to offer any manner of argument that Officer Johns violated any clearly established law, we must affirm the judgment of the district court. . . That surely would be the result in most cases. But not here, we learn. Unwilling to accept the Palmas' concessions, the majority opinion takes it upon itself to show that Officer Johns violated clearly established law. Setting aside the procedural oddities of the referees taking shots for one team, none of the majority opinion's cases clearly establishes that Officer Johns's uses of force were unreasonable. Several of the majority opinion's cases were decided after the shooting, meaning that they 'could not have given fair notice to [Officer Johns] and are of no use in the clearly established inquiry.'. . And all of the cases involved factually different circumstances. . . . [T]he majority opinion essentially duplicates its analysis as to whether a Fourth Amendment violation occurred when it addresses the separate clearly established prong. That approach, however, eviscerates the two-step qualified immunity inquiry. . . It deems a finding that an officer's use of force violated the Fourth Amendment (because he lacked probable cause to believe the person posed a sufficient threat) as tantamount to a finding that the officer violated a clearly established right. Here too, the majority opinion runs afoul of bedrock Supreme Court precedent, this time cases holding that resolution of step one does not automatically resolve step two. . . The majority opinion, of course, has some company of its own. But it is not respectable company to keep. By my count, the Supreme Court has summarily reversed our sister circuits at least ten times in as many years for incorrectly analyzing the clearly established prong. [collecting cases] The majority opinion bears a striking resemblance to, among other cases, the decisions reversed in Emmons, Kisela, White, and Mullenix. In each instance, the Supreme Court reiterated the courts of appeals' error in failing to identify on-point, controlling precedent holding that the official's conduct was unconstitutional, and instead erroneously relying on the general statement that excessive force violates clearly established law. . . Regrettably, we have not learned from these past mistakes. At day's end, qualified immunity 'protects "all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law."'. . Because the Palmas have not come close to satisfying that demanding standard, I would affirm the judgment of the district court.")

Moser v. Etowah Police Dep't, 27 F.4th 1148, 1151-52 (6th Cir. 2022) ("On appeal, we consider Moser's allegations as one excessive-force claim because Davis's actions cannot be meaningfully separated into two distinct uses of force. When Davis decided to intervene on the porch, he took Moser to the ground, and he immediately pinned her to the ground. . . In other words, Davis's alleged kneeling on Moser was effectively a continuation of his efforts to bring Moser to the ground. To be sure, we typically analyze 'the subject event in segments when assessing the reasonableness of a police officer's actions.'. . On the other hand, however, we have considered immediately consecutive uses of force as one excessive-force claim when the plaintiff asserted that the uses of force were excessive for the same reasons. . . . Since Davis's actions cannot be meaningfully separated into two different uses of excessive force, we consider Moser's allegations as one claim that Davis used excessive force to throw Moser to the ground and pin her there. . . . On these facts, which of course may ultimately be rejected in whole or part by the jury, Davis violated a clearly established constitutional right, and Davis was therefore not entitled to summary judgment on the excessive-force claim. Of course, to prevail on an excessive-force claim, Moser must show that Davis's use of such force amounted to a violation of Moser's clearly established constitutional rights. . . By September 2017, it was clearly established in this circuit that a person has a constitutional right to be free from injury-threatening physical force when he or she is not actively resisting the police, and Davis violated this right by taking Moser to the ground with such force that she broke two bones and then pinning her to the ground. Put another way, since a reasonable juror could conclude that Davis knew Moser was not actively resisting arrest, Davis was not entitled to throw Moser to the ground and pin her there.")

Wood v. Eubanks, 25 F.4th 414, 427-28 (6th Cir. 2022) ("In Henry v. City of Flint, we denied qualified immunity because 'there was no ground for believing there was a basis for arresting [the plaintiff]—other than his profanity and verbal abuse of the officers, which we have clearly held is not, standing alone, a basis for an arrest.'. . Henry was decided in 2020, so the defendants contend it cannot clearly establish Wood's right to be free from arrest in 2016. But Henry did not represent a change in the law. Henry relied on our decisions in Greene v. Barber and Kennedy v. City of Villa Hills, which we decided in 2002 and 2011, respectively. . . In Greene, we held that the plaintiff's 'right not to be arrested for insulting a police officer [was] "clearly established."'. . The same goes for Kennedy. Although the plaintiff in that case 'used coarse language,' he 'did not pose [a] risk of public alarm' because there were 'no third parties ... whom an arrest would protect' or whom the plaintiff disturbed. . . We said then that 'the First Amendment requires ... police officers [to] tolerate coarse criticism,' and '[e]ven crass language used to insult police officers does not fall within the "very limited" unprotected category of "fighting words."'. . Beyond Greene and Kennedy, we had already made clear by 2016 that profanity alone is insufficient to constitute fighting words under Ohio's disorderly conduct statute. [collecting cases] Given this backdrop, it was clearly established in 2016 that there was no probable cause to arrest Wood for disorderly conduct.")

Young v. Kent County Sheriff's Department, No. 21-1222, 2022 WL 94990, at *6 (6th Cir. Jan. 10, 2022) (not reported) ("Clark is not entitled to qualified immunity for tasing Young where Young was partially incapacitated by the time he was tased. Young testified that he was never warned he would be tased and was returning to his cell. Passive resistance includes noncompliance with an officer's order without evidence of 'volitional and conscious defiance' of that order. . . But taking the facts in the light most favorable to Young, as the district court did, a reasonable jury could conclude that Young did not consciously defy the officer's orders. Where an individual is complying and at most passively resisting, tasing would violate a clearly established right. . . Here, based on the district court's factual determination that Young's resistance was passive, not active, the use of a taser against him would be a violation of his clearly established constitutional rights. Ultimately, the outcome of this case rests on how the jury views the facts, and who the jury finds most credible. Put simply, if Young was fully subdued and incapacitated and did not see or hear any orders to get on the ground, a second or third use of force was excessive. On this record, it is possible that a jury could find the facts to be so. But the jury could just as easily view any one of those facts in the deputies' favor. And it is not this court's place to determine which is correct: 'Where, as here, the legal question of qualified immunity turns on which version of facts one accepts, the jury, not the judge, must determine liability.'. . We must defer to the district court's determination of facts in favor of Young.")

Young v. Kent County Sheriff's Department, No. 21-1222, 2022 WL 94990, at *6-10 (6th Cir. Jan. 10, 2022) (Murphy, J., dissenting) (not reported) ("The Supreme Court recently made one thing clear when summarily reversing circuit courts for refusing to grant qualified immunity to officers: A plaintiff alleging an excessive-force claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 generally 'must identify a case that put [the officers] on notice that [their] specific conduct was unlawful.' Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 8 (2021) (per curiam). And a case cannot satisfy this notice requirement if its facts are 'materially distinguishable' from the facts that the officers confronted. Id.; City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 11–12 (2021) (per curiam). My colleagues depart from the Supreme Court's framework by denying qualified immunity to Deputies William Jourden and Bryan Clark for their use of pepper spray and a taser on a pretrial detainee who violated a jail's security-based rules. The cases on which my colleagues rely to find the deputies' actions unlawful are 'materially distinguishable' from this case in obvious ways. . . Most of the cases, for example, did not involve this jail setting—a setting with unique dangers and security needs. So none gave the deputies the 'fair notice' that the Supreme Court demands. . . I thus respectfully dissent from the denial of qualified immunity. . . . Before 2015, our cases would have clearly established, if anything, the propriety of Jourden's and Clark's use of force. We traditionally treated a pretrial detainee's excessive-force claim under the Fourteenth Amendment's substantive-due-process protections as analogous to a convicted prisoner's excessive-force claim under the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishments. . . To show that force was excessive, therefore, a pretrial detainee needed to meet a demanding subjective test and prove that an officer used force maliciously to cause harm. . . Under this test, we had held that officers may use 'stun guns' or 'chemical agents' on 'recalcitrant prisoners' merely for disobeying orders. . . . If this precedent remained the law, this case would be easy. Young identifies no evidence suggesting that Jourden and Clark used force 'maliciously and sadistically' to harm Young without any security-related purpose. . . Since 2015, however, the law has been in a state of flux. . . In Kingsley, the Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment's objective-reasonableness test (not the Eighth Amendment's subjective-maliciousness test) applies to the use of force on pretrial detainees (as opposed to convicted prisoners). . . Critically, however, the Court left no doubt that the objective-reasonableness test in this jail context comes with different rules than the objective-reasonableness test outside a jail. . . . So it held that courts must 'acknowledg[e] as part of the objective reasonableness analysis' the deference due 'to policies and practices needed to maintain order and institutional security' at a jail. . .A reasonable officer thus could find that this institutional environment affects the force objectively justified when an inmate makes a jail disturbance—whether that inmate is a convicted prisoner or a pretrial detainee. . . . [N]o case of ours clearly established that their split-second decision to deploy pepper spray and a taser on an inmate who had caused a disturbance in a jail was unreasonable under the circumstances. . . My colleagues cite only one jail-specific case holding that an officer used excessive force: Guy v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville & Davidson County, 687 F. App'x 471 (6th Cir. 2017). . . . Guy does not rebut Jourden's and Clark's qualified-immunity defense. To begin with, I question whether we can rely on this unpublished decision at all to show that the law clearly prohibited the deputies' conduct. Other circuit courts have noted that '[u]npublished cases ... do not serve as binding precedent and cannot be relied upon to define clearly established law.'. . That is because another panel of our court could simply refuse to follow Guy at a later date in a published decision. . . How can Guy 'clearly establish' anything for officers if it does not clearly establish anything for us? . . . Regardless, '[t]he situation in [Guy] and the situation at issue here diverge in several respects.' [distinguishing facts of two cases] . . . . My colleagues suggest that our caselaw in the "arrest" context clearly established the excessiveness of Jourden's use of pepper spray and Clark's use of a taser. Yet I find our caselaw in this context unclear on the dividing line between when officers may use pepper spray or a taser and when they may not. And the deputies' actions in this case fell within this 'hazy border' that our precedent creates. . . That fact also confirms that we should grant the deputies qualified immunity. . . Our pepper-spray caselaw distinguishes between the use of pepper spray on individuals who do not voluntarily go into custody from the use of pepper spray on those who do. On the one hand, we have upheld the use of pepper spray on arrestees whom officers could conclude were not cooperating or might pose a threat. [collecting cases] On the other hand, we have found the use of pepper spray excessive when an officer had fully subdued an arrestee or when the arrestee had unambiguously surrendered. [collecting cases] Our cases on the use of a taser fit the same mold. There, we have held that officers generally may tase arrestees who actively resist but may not tase arrestees who passively resist or who do not resist at all. . . What qualifies as 'active' resistance? It obviously reaches arrestees who physically struggle with police. . . Yet we have defined the word to cover conduct that is not all that 'active. . . How about 'passive' resistance? It includes mere noncompliance with an officer's order without evidence of 'volitional and conscious defiance' of that order (whether verbal or physical). . . . I do not think that these cases establish a clear line dividing the permissible use of pepper spray or a taser from the impermissible use of that force. And we have granted qualified immunity when an officer's force fell within the unclear border between the two. . . . Young's claims against Deputies Jourden and Clark fall within the same gray area. Even outside this case's jail setting, it is not clear whether our caselaw would treat Jourden's use of pepper spray and Clark's use of a taser as excessive. . . .My colleagues respond that a reasonable jury could find that Young had been 'subdued' after the first pepper spray. Yet the video shows him plainly walking around the pod. . . . In retrospect, perhaps Deputies Jourden and Clark could have casually walked up to Young, handcuffed him, and led him out of the pod without incident. But that sort of after-the-fact speculation engages in the type of hindsight bias that judges must avoid when identifying the safety risks that the Constitution imposes on officers who confront dangerous situations. . . . While any reasonable officer would know that a gratuitous pepper spraying or tasing of a subdued detainee would violate clearly established law, those are not this case's facts. For these reasons, I would reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity. Because my colleagues see things differently, I respectfully dissent.")

Greene v. Crawford County, Michigan, 22 F.4th 593, 614-15 (6th Cir. 2022) ("County Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established that they could not rely on mental healthcare providers like CMH to assess the medical condition of an inmate experiencing severe alcohol withdrawal and delirium tremens. . . . As discussed earlier, we have denied qualified immunity to an officer who failed to seek medical assistance for an individual suffering from delirium tremens in a situation of obvious illness even when the officer knew that the detainee was on withdrawal medication and being observed. . . No case answers the precise question of whether it is reasonable to rely on a mental health professional to provide a medical assessment of a detainee exhibiting symptoms of delirium tremens. But to ask that question is to answer it. In the end, Greene experienced a clearly established life-threatening medical condition for at least two days prior to his incapacitation. County Defendants did not provide any medical assistance during that time. Greene's right not to have 'known, serious medical needs disregarded by' County Defendants was clearly established in this scenario.")

Browning v. Edmonson County, Kentucky, 18 F.4th 516, 525, 529 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Certainly by 2018 when Jones tased C.S., it was clearly established in this circuit that an individual has a constitutional right not to be tased when he or she is not actively resisting. Jones violated this right by tasing an unconscious C.S., who, after experiencing a major automobile collision as a backseat passenger, was not visibly engaged in active resistance. Consequently, the denial of qualified immunity was proper here. Put differently, the district court denied qualified immunity on the facts that, following a collision resulting from a dangerous car chase, the defendant officer tased a passenger of the vehicle who did not respond to the officer's instruction to show his hands, where the passenger showed no signs that he was even conscious beyond rocking back and forth, a movement that may have been attributable to rocking of the car and was not interpreted as hostility or active resistance. It is clearly established that such a preemptive tasing is an objectively unreasonable use of force. . . .C.S. had a clearly established constitutional right not be tased under the circumstances. Jones violated that right by tasing C.S. despite observing that C.S. was not resisting and expressed no verbal or physical behavior that was hostile or threatening. On these facts, a reasonable jury could find that use of a taser was not objectively reasonable and therefore amounted to excessive force under the law. Thus, the district court properly denied qualified immunity for the § 1983 claim.")

concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("If you were a police officer, what risk of getting shot would you be willing to face before using your taser to incapacitate a suspect who may (or may not) be armed after he appeared to ignore your commands to show his hands? A 25% risk? 10%? 5%? 1%? It seems to me this is the basic question that Officer Jordan Jones needed to answer in a matter of seconds when he decided to deploy his taser on C.S. while securing the accident scene following a high-speed chase. My colleagues say that the risk that C.S. had a firearm was too 'remote' to make Jones's use of a taser objectively reasonable. I do not think that our cases clearly establish that conclusion, so I must respectfully dissent from their decision to deny Jones qualified immunity on C.S.'s excessive-force claim. . . . Combining the Fourth Amendment's fact-specific test with qualified immunity's fair-notice test makes this defense especially difficult to defeat for plaintiffs who allege excessive-force claims. The Supreme Court's many decisions granting qualified immunity to officers on these claims illustrate this point well. [collecting Supreme Court cases] A plaintiff cannot argue simply that the Supreme Court has 'clearly established' that the police may not use excessive force or that the force must be objectively reasonable under the circumstances. . . These general legal tests typically will not show that an officer's specific use of force was plainly excessive. See Rivas-Villegas, 2021 WL 4822662, at *2. In all but the most egregious of cases, the plaintiff instead 'must identify a case that put [the officer] on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful.'. . And if a circuit court's prior cases are 'materially distinguishable,' they cannot provide the required notice. . . We may resolve this two-part qualified-immunity test in any order we choose, so I would jump immediately to the clearly established prong. . . C.S. has not identified a sufficiently analogous case that would have put Jones on notice that his use of the taser was excessive under the circumstances. . . . We must ask: Did our cases clearly establish that Jones could not tase a passenger in a crashed vehicle who did not show his hands upon request and who Jones suspected might be hiding a firearm in the uncertain moments following a high-speed chase? I do not think so. Whether or not the use of the taser actually violated the Fourth Amendment, our caselaw would not have made Jones 'plainly incompetent' in thinking that it did not. . . Jones could have reasonably believed that the tasing was constitutionally permissible based on the three general questions that the Supreme Court uses for evaluating excessive-force claims. . . .[W]hat is the specific level of risk of getting shot that an officer must identify to render the use of a taser objectively reasonable? Should it be the reasonable suspicion test from Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)? Something lower? Something higher? I am unsure, which means I do not think our caselaw clearly establishes the answer. Indeed, our prior cases 'have found no clearly established right of a suspect to be free from tasing where he or she disobeys police orders and may be in possession of a weapon.'. . . My colleagues respond that a reasonable jury could find it objectively unreasonable for Jones to believe that C.S. might have had a firearm. I disagree. To begin with, I do not think this question is a factual one (for the jury) rather than a legal one (for the court). As we have recognized, the Supreme Court has held that the ultimate issue—whether the facts construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff rise to the level of unconstitutionally 'excessive force'—is one of law for the court. Stricker v. Township of Cambridge, 710 F.3d 350, 364 (6th Cir. 2013) (citing Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 381 n.8 (2007)); see Thomas v. City of Columbus, 854 F.3d 361, 366 (6th Cir. 2017). So it is a legal question whether this case's facts (construed in C.S.'s favor) created a sufficient risk of harm to Jones to render his use of a taser objectively reasonable.")

Redrick v. City of Akron, Ohio, No. 21-3027, 2021 WL 5298538 (6th Cir. Nov. 15, 2021) (not reported) ("Here, Turnure was in position behind Redrick as he walked down the sidewalk with his lawfully carried gun in his pocket or at his side. In these circumstances, Turnure's failure to warn Redrick to drop his weapon before shooting was unreasonable. Without any other facts indicating an immediate danger beyond possession of a lawful firearm, it was feasible to attempt non-lethal means of deescalating the situation. Turnure could have ordered Redrick to drop the gun. If a jury finds those warnings were given and ignored, this may be a different case. But if the need for deadly force could have been obviated by a simple command to drop the weapon and the officer failed to attempt such less-than-lethal means, deadly force was unreasonable. . . Accepting Redrick's account of the facts, Turnure violated Redrick's clearly established rights when he shot him six times from behind without warning and without any indication that Redrick would use his lawfully carried gun to harm officers or others. . . In general, cases like Graham and Garner cannot clearly establish a constitutional violation because they are 'cast "at a high level of generality."'. . But 'in an obvious case, these standards can "clearly establish" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'. . Under Redrick's facts, this is a case where no reasonable officer could believe deadly force was justified. . . And beyond that, a body of relevant case law from this Circuit supports the denial of qualified immunity here. [collecting cases] . . . . Holding that using deadly force against Redrick was unreasonable does not dictate that shooting Pruiett was likewise unreasonable. . . But we need not reach the constitutionality of Turnure's actions as related to Pruiett because the law in these circumstances was not clearly established. . .When the shooting occurred, case law did not clearly establish that Turnure's use of deadly force against Pruiett was unconstitutional. . . The situation was unfolding rapidly. Amidst gunfire, Redrick's firearm came out of his hand and Pruiett lunged for it. This quick movement toward a deadly weapon in the heat of gunfire is different from Redrick's simply holding a lawful weapon at his side. Because Pruiett was grabbing for the gun, the immediacy of the situation makes it less feasible that less-than-lethal force, i.e. giving commands to drop the gun, would have sufficed. There was no clearly established law from the Supreme Court or this Circuit that would have informed Turnure that using deadly force against a suspect who lunged for a weapon amidst a dangerous altercation was unlawful. Plaintiffs cite Bouggess v. Mattingly to argue that having and holding a weapon is not enough to make deadly force reasonable, but that case does not squarely govern the facts before us. . . More than mere possession of a weapon, Pruiett made a quick movement to grab the gun as his brother was being fired upon. The immediacy of that movement—and the inference that could reasonably be drawn regarding what a person might do with a gun after they grab it during a gunfight—is a material factual difference between this case and those referenced in Redrick's analysis that may otherwise clearly establish the law.")

Sexton v. Cernuto, 18 F.4th 177, 190-93 (6th Cir. 2021) ("The district court correctly identified the constitutional right at issue for Sexton's § 1983 claims. Under Sexton's claims against Cernuto for actively facilitating Dunn's assaults on her and for failing to protect her, this prong examines whether Sexton's right to be free and protected from a government actor's sexual assault against her was clearly established at the time Cernuto allegedly contributed to and enabled Dunn to carry out the sexual assaults. Citing precedent from our circuit, the district court explained that 'there is no dispute that sexual assault is "so contrary to fundamental notions of liberty and so lacking of any redeeming social value, that no rational individual could believe that sexual abuse by a state actor is constitutionally permissible under the Due Process Clause."'. . The federal courts have long acknowledged the constitutional right to personal security and bodily integrity. . . .Cernuto argues that the panel must define the relevant constitutional right in very narrow terms, proposing a requirement of near factual identity. Although the court is to consider 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,'. . . it should also avoid a 'rigid, overreliance on factual similarity' that could overwhelm the clearly established prong[.] Because he did not personally assault Sexton, Cernuto contends that the district court should have analyzed whether Sexton, 'as a probationer in a work program, had a clearly established constitutional right that required Cernuto, a non-law enforcement, nonsupervisory employee, to protect her from or intervene in a sexual assault by his co-worker.' Cernuto's formulation is flawed in several respects. First, it compels an 'overreliance on factual similarity.' Second, as discussed above, Cernuto's assertion that § 1983 liability is limited to law enforcement officials has no basis in our case law. Third, although Cernuto was not Dunn's supervisor, the record shows that he and Dunn were work program co-supervisors, both of whom had considerable authority over program participants. Fourth, his formulation of the constitutional right fails to identify the most pertinent aspect of Cernuto's relationship to Sexton—his authority and control over her in the probationary program. In sum, Cernuto misconstrues the constitutional rights at issue in Sexton's claims by seeking to rehash the special relationship analysis already conducted above. But that formulation improperly ignores the constitutional violation that Sexton claims: that Cernuto violated her right to personal security and bodily integrity both by actively facilitating the assaults and by failing to protect her from the assaults. As to that duty to protect, even under Cernuto's narrower focus on whether it was clearly established that he had a duty, the answer is plain. Our case law has clearly established that government actors owe citizens 'a constitutional duty to keep them from harm ... when the state has acted to deprive an individual of certain indicia of liberty.'. . . Here, any reasonable supervisor would be aware that a probationer is entitled to be free from sexual assault and that facilitating the assault or failing to stop such an assault would contribute to a violation of clearly established rights. Sexton's right to be free from sexual assault was clearly established in July 2017. The district court did not err in finding the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis satisfied and holding that Cernuto was not entitled to summary judgment on the qualified immunity issue.")

Barrera v. City of Mount Pleasant, 12 F.4th 617, 620-25 (6th Cir. 2021) ("The officers directly observed Barrera's refusal to identify himself when ordered to do so. No one doubts what he did. What the parties debate is whether the relevant state law, a Michigan statute, criminalizes this conduct. That reality introduces an analytical complication, one that requires a brief digression. What part of the qualified immunity inquiry does a dispute over the meaning of a state law implicate? The first question: Did the officers violate the citizen's constitutional right? Or the second one: Did the officers violate a clearly established right? Both are in play, it seems to us, and either one permits a federal court to resolve a qualified-immunity defense without deciding exactly what the state law means. One possibility is that a constitutional violation never arises in the first place because, even if the officers misread state law, the mistake was a reasonable one. Just as a reasonable mistake of fact does not violate an individual's Fourth Amendment rights, so a reasonable mistake of law does not violate them either. Heien v. North Carolina illustrates the point. . . . The other possibility is that the ambiguity in state law shows that the officers did not violate a clearly established right—the second prong of the qualified immunity test. While this inquiry is similar to the reasonable mistake-of-law test, it is not the same. The reasonable mistake-of-law 'inquiry is not as forgiving as the one employed in the distinct context of deciding whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity for a constitutional or statutory violation.'. . The more forgiving question asks only whether, at the time of the officer's conduct, the law was 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would [understand] that what he is doing' violates the law—so clear that the invalidity of the officer's actions was 'beyond debate.'. . This rigorous standard covers 'all but the plainly incompetent' officer. . . . Under either approach, we need not decide exactly what the statute means if the officers reasonably interpreted it. . . Let us start, and largely end, with the Heien reasonable mistake-of-law inquiry. The statute makes it a felony to 'obstruct[ ]' a police officer who is 'performing his or her duties.' . . . 'Obstruct,' the statute says, 'includes the use or threatened use of physical interference or force or a knowing failure to comply with a lawful command.'. . That leaves this question: Was it 'objectively reasonable for an officer in [Murch and Thompson's] position to think that [Barrera's refusal to identify himself] was a violation of [Michigan] law'? . . . . Officers Murch and Thompson both repeatedly told Barrera to identify himself. Even knowing that they were police officers, Barerra refused. In these respects, Barrera knowingly failed to comply with the police officers' command, or at least gave the officers reason to believe he had. . . Barrera does not argue otherwise. Today's dispute centers on the third element: Was the command that Barrera identify himself 'lawful'? Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada takes us part of the way to the answer. . . . Hiibel confirms that an officer may detain a person to investigate a crime when the officer has 'reasonable suspicion' that the person 'may be involved in criminal activity.'. . It confirms that, during a Terry stop, an officer may request that the detained person identify himself, so long as the request amounts to one 'reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the stop.'. . It confirms that a Terry stop suspect does not have a Fourth Amendment right to refuse the request. . . And it confirms that a State may criminalize the failure to comply. . . In today's case, the officers reasonably could believe that their command that Barrera identify himself complied with these principles. . . . All in all, the officers reasonably could believe that Michigan's obstruction statute encompassed Barrera's refusal to identify himself and that this interpretation of state law did not violate the Fourth Amendment. Barrera pushes back on this conclusion. He first argues that the officers lacked reasonable suspicion to stop him, removing the encounter from Terry's safe harbor. But he never explains why as a matter of law or fact. As a matter of law, he does not cite any cases rejecting reasonable suspicion under similar circumstances. As a matter of fact, he does not explain why the speeding car, the lack of a driver's license for the owner of the car, or the unusual nature of the stop—including the missing owner of the car—did not create reasonable suspicion to stop the vehicle and detain its passengers. Barrera next argues that a State may not penalize someone for failing to identify himself during a Terry stop, invoking dicta from a 1984 U.S. Supreme Court decision and a concurrence from the 1968 Terry decision. The dicta: "[T]he officer may ask the detainee a moderate number of questions to determine his identity and to try to obtain information confirming or dispelling the officer's suspicions. But the detainee is not obliged to respond." Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 439 (1984). The concurrence: "Of course, the person stopped is not obliged to answer, answers may not be compelled, and refusal to answer furnishes no basis for an arrest, although it may alert the officer to the need for continued observation." Terry, 392 U.S. at 34 (White, J., concurring). To the extent these observations once created uncertainty about the rules surrounding this aspect of a Terry stop, Hiibel eliminated it. Hiibel acknowledged both statements, determined they did not control, and concluded that a State may penalize a refusal to identify oneself during a Terry stop. '[W]e cannot view the dicta in Berkemer or Justice White's concurrence in Terry,' the Court explained, 'as answering the question whether a State can compel a suspect to disclose his name during a Terry stop.'. . . [E]ven if the officers unreasonably misread state law, Barrera still would come up short. He has not shown that they violated clearly established law that would pierce the officers' qualified immunity shield. He has not cited, and we have not found, 'a single precedent—much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases—finding a Fourth Amendment violation "under similar circumstances."'. . As the district court aptly put the point, '[i]t would be extraordinary to expect law enforcement officers in the field to make determinations in a matter of minutes that judicial officers themselves cannot come to a consensus on after hours of measured consideration of the law and facts.'")

Colson v. City of Alcoa, Tennessee, No. 20-6084, 2021 WL 3913040, at *8 (6th Cir. Sept. 1, 2021) (not reported) ("When viewed in the light most favorable to Colson, a reasonable officer in England's position would have been aware that she was violating Colson's right to adequate medical care. We have consistently held that prison officials violate a detainee's constitutional rights when they ignore a detainee's obvious, serious medical needs. . . Here, a reasonable juror could conclude that England subjectively knew of and disregarded signs that Colson was at a serious risk of harm including Colson's difficulties standing and moving her knee. Accordingly, the district court properly held that Colson's right to adequate medical care was clearly established.")

Colson v. City of Alcoa, Tennessee, No. 20-6084, 2021 WL 3913040, at *8–11 (6th Cir. Sept. 1, 2021) (not reported) (Readler, J., dissenting) ("Officer Mandy England is entitled to qualified immunity. In this setting, I acknowledge, our interlocutory jurisdiction is limited, particularly as factual findings are 'insulated from review.'. . As a result, our charge customarily is to 'take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment' on legal grounds, yet assess whether, in doing so, the district court 'mistakenly identified clearly established law.'. . That said, where the version of the facts presented to us is 'blatantly contradicted' by video evidence in the record, we 'should not adopt that version of facts for purposes of ruling on a motion for summary judgment.'. . Here, the salient facts either are not in dispute or are confirmed by a video recording of the events at hand. . . . Colson alleges that England evinced deliberate indifference to Colson's serious medical needs, conduct that fell below constitutional norms. That may or may not be true. Either way, to overcome England's defense of qualified immunity, Colson must also show that, at the time these events unfolded, our decisions clearly established that England's actions violated the Constitution. . . . To that end, Colson must identify a fact pattern from a prior case 'similar enough to have given fair and clear warning to officers about what the law requires' so that 'a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates the rule.'. . . In denying summary judgment, the district court determined that 'a reasonable jury could find that Officer England knew of Colson's [serious and obvious medical need] and disregarded it despite having reasons to believe that the nurse rendered an unreliable medical opinion, if no medical opinion at all.'. . Any notion that Russell offered 'no medical opinion at all,' however, is 'blatantly contradicted' by the body camera video footage of Russell's examination. . . Video footage plainly shows that Russell had Colson move her legs to assess her range of motion, that Russell bent down to examine each of Colson's knees for swelling, and that Russell did not discern any unusual swelling, which prompted Russell to believe that no further medical treatment was necessary. And even if a genuine issue exists as to whether this examination was inadequate, the fact remains that Russell conducted an examination for nearly 60 seconds and, at its close, offered her medical assessment, albeit somewhat inartfully. On this record, the clearly established inquiry must account for the medical component underlying England's qualified immunity defense. In other words, the district court had a duty to address England's qualified immunity defense with respect to the particularized facts of the case—chief among them, that a medical examination took place—when evaluating the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity test. And once this case is framed in the proper factual setting, England is entitled to qualified immunity. A reasonable officer in England's position would not have understood the Fourteenth Amendment to require her to override Russell's assessment—condensed as it may have been—of Colson's knee injury. Indeed, neither the majority opinion nor the district court points to any case that addresses with particularity the central factual premise of this one: an officer's deference to a medical professional's evaluation. . . None of the pre-2015 cases the district court surveyed address a scenario where an officer consulted medical personnel with respect to a detainee's medical condition. Rather, they were all cases in which officers failed to consult a medical professional in a timely manner. [collecting cases] At most, these cases establish an officer's obligation to contact medical professionals promptly when a detainee exhibits obvious symptoms of distress. Colson's jailers did so. True, as both my colleagues and the district court have noted, we previously stated in Estate of Carter v. City of Detroit that a 'detainee's right to medical treatment has been established since at least 1987.'. . But Carter's formulation of the right in question is akin to a broad legal principle like 'an unreasonable search and seizure violates the Fourth Amendment,' something the Supreme Court has repeatedly said is 'of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . Nor am I alone in this view—we previously reversed a district court for relying on Carter to establish the 'right to medical care' at a high level of generality, emphasizing that clearly established law 'must be more particularized than that'. . . .Proving the point, the facts at hand in Carter did not involve a medical professional, let alone a scenario where a non-medically trained officer relied on a medical professional's evaluation. . . For these reasons, I would not accept the district court's broadly described contours of the constitutional right at play here. Nor would I suggest, as the majority opinion does, that England bears the burden to disprove the generalized contours of a broadly defined right to detainee medical care. . . That puts the inquiry in reverse. After all, Colson, not England, bears the burden of proving the clearly established law specific to the contours of this case. . . Nor, for that matter, may we dispense with the duty to identify a factually similar case. Time and again, the Supreme Court has required us to point to factually specific case law establishing the right in question. . . Sure enough, the Supreme Court has, on occasion, done otherwise in unique instances in which a constitutional violation is self-evident from the particularly egregious conduct of government officials. . . But Colson's case does not fall into that sui generis category of cases embodied by Hope v. Pelzer, and, more recently, Taylor v. Riojas. . . . [T]hose shocking circumstances are worlds apart from this case. In short, nothing in our pre-2015 case law instructed England to disregard a medical professional's assessment. That is true even in view of the district court's factual findings—that Russell was not present when Colson fell and had trouble standing, that Russell examined Colson's knee for just about a minute, and that Russell's only statement to England after her brief examination was that she did not see swelling, at which point Russell walked away. The same goes for the inference drawn by the district court that Russell's medical opinion was 'unreliable.'. . . Confirming the point, since Colson's arrest, we have held that a non-medically trained officer can 'reasonably defer[ ]' to a medical professional's opinion, so long as she 'had no reason to know or believe that [the] recommendation was inappropriate.'. . As the majority opinion implies, that rule might prove problematic to England's qualified immunity defense if the events underlying this case happened today. But looking back, as we must, this development only further demonstrates that the district court's broadly defined constitutional violation was both inadequately particularized and not clearly established as of 2015. . . When these standards are properly defined, Colson cannot overcome England's qualified immunity.") DeCrane v. Eckart, 12 F.4th 586, 599-601 (6th Cir. 2021) ("[P]laintiffs generally cannot defeat qualified immunity simply by arguing that they have a clearly established right not to suffer an 'abridgment' of the 'freedom of speech.'. . Such a rule (defined at the highest possible level of generality) would not have immediately alerted public officials of the First Amendment's limits in the specific situations that they confronted. . . Even Garcetti's rule (that speech can receive protection if taken as a citizen rather than employee) sometimes cannot provide sufficient guidance because we have recognized that it can be 'challenging' to distinguish public from private speech. . . Eckart thinks that this fact resolves the qualified-immunity issue in his favor. He argues that the then-existing caselaw did not clearly establish that the media leak would have fallen outside DeCrane's job duties within the meaning of Garcetti. . . Eckart is mistaken because our cases at the relevant time had already set more specific ground rules to distinguish public from private speech. We had held that employees speak as private citizens (not public employees) at least when they speak on their own initiative to those outside their chains of command and when their speech was not part of their official or de facto duties. . . Would this 'firmly established' rule have 'immediately' alerted a reasonable person that the media leak would have been in DeCrane's private capacity? . . . We think so. Such a leak would have fallen outside his duties. The speech also would have been to journalists, not supervisors. For these reasons, we had already held that a police officer's disclosure to the media fell outside Garcetti precisely because the officer engaged in the speech on his own time and had no media-related duties. . . . We close by reiterating our ruling's narrow scope. Eckart made just one argument as to why the media leak was not protected speech: because it would have fallen within DeCrane's job duties. Eckart did not argue that he could reasonably believe that he could discipline employees for violating a seemingly neutral policy banning unauthorized speech to the media. . . Nor did he ask us to consider the circumstances in which a public employer may have such a media policy or the manner in which to analyze this constitutional question. We thus do not consider these issues; we resolve only the Garcetti argument presented to us.")

Dahl v. Kilgore, No. 20-6392, 2021 WL 3929226, at *5–7 (6th Cir. Sept. 2, 2021) (not published) ("To the extent that we have applied the community caretaking exception outside the vehicle context and those applications survive Caniglia, we have done so only when police are 'totally divorced from the detection, investigation, or acquisition of evidence relating to the violation of a criminal statute,'. . . and are instead engaged in activities such as 'assist[ing] persons who are seriously injured or threatened with such injury[.]'. . 'As we have repeatedly and consistently observed, the critical issue is whether there is a "true immediacy" that absolves an officer from the need to apply for a warrant and receive approval from an impartial magistrate.'. . To permit a warrantless search of a Fourth Amendment protected space such as a cell phone when the circumstances are not 'urgent or life threatening ... would certainly [make] "the presumption of unreasonableness ... difficult to rebut."'. . We have found sufficient evidence to justify a caretaking search in cases where the police have been called to the scene of some sort of disturbance or have themselves witnessed persons putting themselves or others in danger. . . . In conclusion, the Supreme Court in Riley clearly established Dahl's right to be free from an unreasonable search of his cell phone. . . The community caretaking exception does not apply to these facts. Therefore, the district court correctly rejected Kilgore's arguments for qualified immunity against Dahl's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Burwell v. City of Lansing, Michigan, 7 F.4th 456, 476-77 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Because there is sufficient evidence for a jury to conclude that Kelley was deliberately indifferent to Phillips's medical needs, 'the only remaining question is whether the right was clearly established.'. . For a right to be clearly established, '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . The 'unlawfulness must be apparent ... in the light of pre-existing law,' but '[w]e need not ... find a case in which "the very action in question has previously been held unlawful."'. . 'As early as 1972, we stated that "where the circumstances are clearly sufficient to indicate the need of medical attention for injury or illness, the denial of such aid constitutes the deprivation of constitutional due process."'. . 'Furthermore, in 1992, this court explicitly held that a pretrial detainee's right to medical treatment for a serious medical need has been established since at least 1987.'. . We reiterated in 2013 that '[i]t is clearly established that a prisoner has a right not to have his known, serious medical needs disregarded by his doctors.'. . That right applies no matter if the defendant is a medical provider or officer. . . Therefore, it was clearly established at the time of Phillips's detention that declining to render aid to an unconscious detainee lying in a pool of vomit constitutes a constitutional violation.") Clemons v. Couch, 3 F.4th 897, 903-06 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Caniglia makes clear that Couch cannot justify his warrantless entry into Richard's home by calling on the community-caretaker exception. Without any other valid justification for his entry, we hold that Couch violated Richard's Fourth Amendment rights. . . Here, we must determine whether the law regarding the community-caretaker exception was clearly established such that it would have been apparent to a reasonable officer in Couch's position that the exception did not apply to his warrantless entry into Richard's home. We now know, based on Caniglia, that the community-caretaker exception, to the extent it exists at all, does not apply to the home. . . But Caniglia, of course, had not been decided by the date of the events in question, March 27, 2016. At that time, a reasonable officer in Couch's position could have determined—based on Cady, and our pre-2016 precedent interpreting Cady—that the community-caretaker exception applied to an officer's home entry, at least as a general matter. . . . That does not, however, absolve Couch of potential liability. For it was clearly established before March 27, 2016, that if the exception applied to home entry, it could 'not provide the government with refuge from the warrant requirement except when delay is reasonably likely to result in injury or ongoing harm to the community at large.'. .That principle made clear that Couch's actions could not fall within the community-caretaker exception. . . Couch may have been engaged in community caretaking when he accompanied Christina to collect her and her son's belongings. Christina was afraid to go to the Clemonses' house alone, perhaps for good reason, and Couch was her requested escort. But the need for entry was not urgent. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Richard, any delay in Couch's entry into the residence—to obtain a warrant or court order permitting his entry—was not 'reasonably likely to result in injury or ongoing harm to the community at large.'. . We decline to hold that sufficient injury would have or could have resulted if Christina had been forced to delay the collection of her and her son's belongings. True, the son was to attend school the next day and required his school supplies and attire, but that type of harm does not reach the level of harm required by Washington to permit the state's warrantless entry into Richard's home. . . . The facts in this case more closely mirror those in cases where we refused to apply the community-caretaking rationale to warrantless home entry. . . . At bottom, Richard Clemons has produced evidence that would allow a reasonable jury to conclude that Couch's conduct was in violation of Richard's clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from the state's warrantless entry into his home. Couch is therefore not entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . .With this decision, we do not intend to cast aspersions on the work done by law enforcement. Although it may seem that holding Trooper Couch potentially liable for his warrantless entry reinforces the old adage that no good deed goes unpunished, that is not our aim. Today we simply acknowledge the sanctity of the home, a notion 'embedded' in our constitutional tradition 'since the origins of the Republic,' that protects against warrantless government intrusion. . . It is not our role as judges to change constitutional safeguards to further what some may argue is better policy. . . Accordingly, we reverse the magistrate judge's grant of summary judgment to Couch based on the community-caretaker exception and remand for proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Clemons v. Couch, 3 F.4th 897, 906-12 (6th Cir. 2021) (Nalbandian, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("First, I agree that the community caretaking exception (CCE) does not extend to Trooper Couch's conduct here—as well-intentioned as it was. I do not, however, agree that it was clearly established at the time that what Trooper Couch did was unconstitutional. So I would affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity. . . Second, in the absence of qualified immunity, I concur with the majority that the consent issue is a matter for further consideration in the trial court, . . . and I would clarify the legal framework that should guide the consent inquiry. . . . When Trooper Couch helped Christina collect her belongings, little about our circuit's CCE jurisprudence could have been considered clearly established. . . . Before Caniglia cleaned the slate, our circuit's discordant trains of thought on the CCE failed to establish clear rules for officers. . . Since Trooper Couch did not disregard clearly established law when he acted, . . . he should not bear the consequences of our failure to elucidate. I would affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity. . . . In sum, single-tenant consent can authorize entry even when it cannot authorize a search. In Caniglia, the Court instructed us to process difficult issues like these in the context of the three ways that officers may enter a home: a warrant, an exigency, and consent. Now that the CCE is no longer smothering the finer distinctions between exigency and consent, courts need to pick up where Randolph left off in parsing consent, trespass, and search. In my opinion, the best reading of Randolph is that single-tenant veto negates consent to search but not consent to enter to protect a co-tenant, even without an exigency. Since the majority is not granting qualified immunity, I agree that the consent issue needs further attention in the district court. I leave it to the district court on remand to consider how this issue impacts the case.")

Hughey v. Easlick, 3 F.4th 283, 289-91, 293 (6th Cir. 2021) ("We apply the three-prong handcuffing test to one specific act: a law-enforcement official's allegedly placing too-tight handcuffs on a person's wrists. If a plaintiff creates a genuine dispute of material fact that they complained that their handcuffs were too tight, the officer ignored those complaints, and the plaintiff experienced 'some physical injury' from the physical contact between cuffs and wrists, summary judgment is unwarranted. If a plaintiff's sole allegation is that the cuffs around their wrists were too tight, we need apply only the handcuffing test and our analysis terminates there. But if a plaintiff alleges that excessive force otherwise occurred—even if related to the handcuffing process—we apply the general Fourth Amendment framework to all allegations underlying the excessive-force claim. If the plaintiff creates a genuine dispute of material fact about whether the officer acted unreasonably, summary judgment is likewise inappropriate. Thus, in Hughey's case, we first apply the handcuffing test to her allegation that Easlick placed overly tight cuffs around her wrists. We then administer the general excessive-force framework to all the alleged events that sustain Hughey's excessive-force claim, including what transpired before, during, and after the handcuffing. . . .At bottom, Hughey testified that she complained to Easlick about the tightness of the handcuffs, that the handcuffs left rings on her wrists, that a nurse saw these marks, and that Easlick acknowledged that the cuffs caused the marks—all of this being enough to satisfy the handcuffing test's third element at the summary-judgment stage. . . . No doubt, when we view the facts in the light favoring Hughey, as we must on summary judgment, Easlick violated Hughey's clearly established rights. We have held that the right to be free from too-tight handcuffing had been 'clearly established' by 1991. . . As we pointed out in McGrew, we clearly established that handcuffing that results in wrist marks is unconstitutional no later than 2009, when we issued Morrison. McGrew[.] . . At bottom, 'this Court [has] directly and unequivocally determined, time and time again, that unduly tight or excessively forceful handcuffing is a clearly established violation of the Fourth Amendment.'. . The plethora of excessive-force handcuffing cases from the last three decades put Easlick on notice that the way that he yanked Hughey's arm, placed overly tight handcuffs around her wrists, and ignored her complaints of pain violated her right to be free from excessive force.")

Clark v. Stone, 998 F.3d 287, 298-302 (6th Cir. 2021) ("When a qualified immunity defense is asserted at the pleading stage, we have historically found that the inquiry should be limited to the 'clearly established' prong of the analysis if feasible. . . In the qualified immunity context, a right is considered clearly established when existing precedent has placed the question 'beyond debate' and 'any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating [the right]'. . . 'When determining whether the right is clearly established, "we look first to decisions of the Supreme Court, then to our own decisions and those of other courts within the circuit, and then to decisions of other Courts of Appeal."'. . . While the plaintiffs cite an ample number of cases that support the general notion that the Due Process Clause protects the right to bring up one's children, they point to no case law from either the Supreme Court or this circuit that indicates there is a clearly established right to use corporal punishment that leaves marks. . . . While we can state with ease that there is a general right to use reasonable corporal punishment at home and in schools, that right is not an unlimited one. The Clarks have offered no authority that imposing corporal punishment that leaves marks is reasonable and is therefore a protected right. We find, therefore, that the district court did not err in dismissing the Clarks' Fourteenth Amendment claims. . . .Social workers are generally governed by the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement. . . Here, the court order fell well below the requirements of a valid warrant. The order contains no facts that detail probable cause, nor does it describe with any particularity the area of the home to be searched. . . The defendants do not assert that they entered the home due to exigency or under any other exception to the warrant requirement. The district court was therefore correct in finding that the entries into the Clarks' home were Fourth Amendment violations. Our inquiry then becomes whether a reasonable social worker would have known based on these particular circumstances that their actions were violating the Clarks' constitutional rights. . . .As the district court recognized, . . . Andrews does not clearly establish that a reasonable social worker in this situation would know that his conduct was violating the Fourth Amendment. First, Judge Goff stated in open court that the Fourth Amendment did not fully apply in this context. While his statement may have been in error, it was not unreasonable for the defendants to rely upon instruction from a judge to conclude that their conduct was allowed. More importantly, each home visit by CHFS workers was conducted under the direct provenance of a court order issued specifically for this case. No such order existed in either Andrews or Kovacic, and it is significant in our assessment of what a social worker ought to have known about the legality of their conduct. Given that we have previously found that social workers may rely on police officers in assessing whether they are allowed to enter a home, it is hard to imagine that a reasonable social worker would not also believe that they could rely on an order from a judge, an even more authoritative source on the law. And indeed, at their first home visit Stone and Campbell were accompanied by a police officer. Despite Jacob's assertion that his rights were being violated, Stone and Campbell proceeded with the visit. If nothing else, this demonstrates an implicit endorsement from the police officer, upon which Stone and Campbell were entitled to rely. . . Because the presence of the court order meaningfully distinguishes this case from Andrews, a reasonable social worker in the position of the defendants would not have understood that he was violating the Clarks' Fourth Amendment rights. Indeed, this case represents precisely the type of haziness that Andrews alluded to in this area of law. Since the doctrine of qualified immunity is designed to protect 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law,' we agree with the district court that the plaintiffs have not overcome the qualified immunity defense.")

Clark v. Stone, 998 F.3d 287, 303-04 (6th Cir. 2021) ("The Clarks assert that they had a clear First Amendment right to record the home visits conducted by Hazelwood, Stone, and Campbell. In doing so, they cite to numerous cases from other circuits and one from the Northern District of Ohio that stand for the proposition that there is a constitutional right to film an encounter with a police officer. [collecting cases] . . . .The Clarks reason that because we have held that social workers are held to the same standard as police officers when it comes to other constitutional rights, the cases listed above are sufficient to demonstrate that the right to film interactions with a social worker is clearly established. We disagree. First and foremost, the Clarks have not cited a single case that applies this right to social workers. While we have clearly established that a social worker is not excepted from the Fourth Amendment, this concerns an entirely different set of rights. We should not take the equivalence of social workers and police officers in one context as determinative in a completely different area of civil rights law. Doing so would violate our mandate to avoid construing rights too generally. . . Furthermore, the cases cited by the plaintiffs do not demonstrate that the right to film a social worker during a home visit was clearly established. A single district court opinion (and here, a district court opinion emanating from an entirely different district than where the events at issue took place) is not sufficient to demonstrate that a right is clearly established in this circuit for purposes of qualified immunity. . . And, as the district court recognized, other district courts in this circuit have found that the right is not clearly established. . . The existence of this conflict is itself evidence that the right was not sufficiently established such that any reasonable social worker in the defendants' shoes would have clear notice of the right.")

Moderwell v. Cuyahoga County, Ohio, 997 F.3d 653, 662 (6th Cir. 2021) ("[T]his Court has held that '"claims of excessive force do not necessarily require allegations of assault," but rather can consist of the physical structure and conditions of the place of detention.'. . . Therefore, Plaintiff's claims of excessive force based on the Corrections Defendants subjecting Johnson to the horrible conditions of CCCC's Red Zone, despite his suicidal condition and in response to a non-violent minor infraction, are not categorically barred by the Amended Complaint's failure to allege that the Corrections Defendants assaulted Johnson. Because it was unnecessary for Plaintiff to allege an assault in conjunction with her excessive force claim, there is no reason to depart from 'our general preference' not to grant qualified immunity based only on the pleadings. . . To understand 'the "facts and circumstances of [this] particular case,"' and to decide whether, faced with those facts and circumstances, a reasonable official would have understood that placing Johnson in CCCC's Red Zone constituted objectively unreasonable force, Plaintiff must be provided the opportunity to develop the factual record. Kingsley, 576 U.S. at 397, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (quoting Graham, 490 U.S. at 396, 109 S.Ct. 1865). Although there is limited precedent addressing claims of excessive force without an assault, at this stage, we cannot determine whether discovery will nonetheless establish that the Corrections Defendants' actions were so 'egregious' that 'any reasonable officer should have realized that' the force used against Johnson 'offended the Constitution.' Taylor, 141 S. Ct. at 54.")

Strickland v. City of Detroit, 995 F.3d 495, 508-09 (6th Cir. 2021) ("There is a genuine dispute of fact as to whether Officer Schimeck ignored Plaintiff's complaint that his handcuffs were too tight. Plaintiff testified in his deposition that '[w]hen I told [Officer Schimeck] the cuffs were too tight, there wasn't a response.'. . The district court recognized 'there is some question of fact as to how Defendant Schimeck responded to Plaintiff's complaint that the handcuffs hurt....'...Qualified immunity should have been denied on that basis. However, the district court went on to observe that the disputed fact as to how Officer Schimeck responded to Plaintiff's complaint was not material because 'the issue was ultimately addressed: Plaintiff's handcuffs were loosened and locked into place by Schimeck's partner, and they were ultimately removed upon Plaintiff giving notice to Bliss that they were too tight.'. . It concluded that 'Plaintiff's complaints were not ignored' because someone eventually loosened his handcuffs. . . Officer Schimeck is not immune from suit because it is a disputed fact whether she ignored Plaintiff's complaint of excessively tight handcuffs. Granting summary judgment because Plaintiff's handcuffs were loosened at some later point by someone else was not appropriate. Our decision in Baynes v. Cleland provides much guidance. In Baynes, we reversed a district court's grant of qualified immunity to sheriff's deputies who had ignored the plaintiff's complaints that his handcuffs were too tight. The analysis of the excessive force claim against Deputy Brandon Cleland is particularly instructive. Like Officer Schimeck, Deputy Cleland did not actually handcuff the plaintiff, instead another officer did so. . . As with Officer Schimeck, Deputy Cleland took custody of the plaintiff after the handcuffing, and there was evidence that he ignored complaints that the handcuffs were too tight. . . And just like Officer Schimeck, another law enforcement officer removed the plaintiff's handcuffs sometime after the complaints had been made to Deputy Cleland. . . In Baynes, this was enough for us to conclude that the district court had erred in granting Deputy Cleland qualified immunity on the plaintiff's excessive force claim based on tight handcuffing. . . And the same result is required here. Qualified immunity is inappropriate just because another officer eventually loosens and removes a plaintiff's handcuffs.")

Anders v. Cuevas, 984 F.3d 1166, 1178-79 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Assuming Star Towing's allegations are correct in that Cuevas' removal of Star Towing from the non-consent tow list was based on Anders' speech to state investigators, the law was clearly established that so doing would violate the First Amendment. Indeed, our decision in Lucas, a case in which we had the benefit of looking at summary judgment evidence, is on point and renders the unlawfulness of such conduct, if true, apparent. Marohnic and See also provide strong and firmly grounded Circuit precedent identifying that speech made in the context of cooperating with law enforcement is protected under the First Amendment. And, as explained above, the Amended Complaint contains enough factual allegations to find that Anders' speech was a motivating factor in Anders' alleged adverse actions taken against Star Towing. Cuevas disputes that Marohnic and See provided him with sufficient notice that he may have been violating the Constitution. He argues that, unlike the plaintiffs in Marohnic and See, 'Anders was not a public employee and was directly involved in the wrongdoing.'. . However, our cases foreclose any suggestion that these distinctions should alleviate Cuevas' understanding of the clearly established law in this Circuit. Specifically, in Lucas, we rejected the argument that only public employees or contractors are entitled to First Amendment protection. . . . Factual development of this case might reveal that Anders cooperated with the state investigation in order to insulate himself from any accusation of wrongdoing. However, we cannot make that assumption from the Amended Complaint, and even if we could, Anders' motives underlying his speech should not determine whether it is protected by the First Amendment. Against the backdrop of this Circuit's precedents, we conclude that a reasonable government officer would have known at the time in question that he would be violating the Constitution if he retaliated against Star Towing for Anders' cooperation with law enforcement.")

Johnson v. City of Saginaw, 980 F.3d 497, 513 (6th Cir. 2020) ("We conclude that Johnson's right to procedural due process prior to the deprivation of water service was clearly established and the denial of qualified immunity to Appellants on Johnson's procedural due process claim was proper.")

Johnson v. City of Saginaw, 980 F.3d 497, 518-20 (6th Cir. 2020) (Sutton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Johnson cannot possibly overcome qualified immunity. She has not identified any case clearly establishing that government officials must provide pre-deprivation process before discontinuing utilities to a business that endangered the public in so many life-threatening ways. Her key case, Memphis Light, gives comparison a bad name. It concerned the routinized discontinuance of residential water services due to nonpayment. It has nothing to say about the targeted discontinuance of commercial water services due to repeated public safety and welfare violations. As one might suspect, the prevailing law in truth tacks hard the other way, supporting Saginaw, not Johnson. The Supreme Court and this court have both authorized more dramatic and final government actions without process when officials identified a concern for the safety and welfare of others. . . . I remain bewildered by Johnson's claim that the city's actions violated clearly established law. Memphis Gas & Light is no more useful here than it was above. That case involved an automatic shutdown of water for nonpayment of a bill to a home whose residents could use the water and indeed needed the water to live. This case involves an earned shutdown of water to a business based on serial violations of public safety, and the owner could not use the water until the business could obtain its license to operate again.")

Barnett as next friend of M.G.W. v. Smithwick, No. 20-5010, 2020 WL 6625028, at *4 (6th Cir. Nov. 12, 2020) (not reported) ("Although qualified immunity typically presents a two-step analysis, we have discretion to skip the first step in certain instances. . . For example, we may pass over the constitutional violation question when the parties' briefing on the issue is 'woefully inadequate,' or where the issues are 'so factbound that the decision provides little guidance for future cases.'. . Both of those traits are present here. Barnett's briefing on the constitutional questions 'lacks clarity and detail, posing a risk that we will decide the issue incorrectly.'. . And the exigency determinations in this case turn on circumstances so fact-specific that our 'law elaboration purpose' will not be well-served by deciding those questions today. . . Thus, faced with a quintessential 'poorly presented constitutional question but an easily resolved clearly established question,' we decline to reach the constitutional questions in this case and proceed straight to the clearly established law inquiry. . .Barnett points to Kovacic as evidence that the warrantless removal of M.G.W. violated clearly established law. . . But Kovacic is unlike today's case. For one thing, qualified immunity was denied there because the social worker in question was relying on 'weeks-old' information, whereas here, the situation unfolded in real time. . . For another, Kovacic 'turned on the greater constitutional concerns surrounding government intrusion into a citizen's home,' as there, children were removed from their mother's home without a warrant. . . Here, by comparison, M.G.W. was warrantlessly removed from a hospital, not her home. And because 'the Fourth Amendment has drawn a firm line at the entrance to the house,' removing a child from a hospital presents different constitutional implications and raises unsettled questions of constitutional law. . .The upshot of those implications was not clearly established as of 2016. Since that time, we have granted qualified immunity to social workers who conducted a warrantless in-school interview because a warrantless seizure in that location was not a clearly established constitutional violation. . . That decision helps explain why the principle was not clearly established in 2016. Suffice it to say, a reasonable officer in Smithwick's position would not have known that emergency removal from a location outside the home was a clearly established constitutional violation. Especially so for someone in Smithwick's shoes, who, as a lawyer, would recognize the special protections in our constitutional system for searches and seizures in the home. . . Qualified immunity grants state actors the space to make just this kind of reasonable, if imperfect, decision. . . All told, Smithwick was entitled to qualified immunity.")

Lipman v. Budish, 974 F.3d 726, 750 & n.13 (6th Cir. 2020) ("[C]ases finding qualified immunity in the DeShaney context have relied on the fact that the plaintiff failed to show that state actors actually 'created the danger—either by increasing the risk of harm to third parties by its affirmative conduct or by doing something that endangers a discrete member or group of the public.'. . But the right to be free from such state-created danger was clearly established at the time of Defendants' actions. Accordingly, their assertion of qualified immunity must fail. . . .While not addressed by Defendants in their limited discussion of qualified immunity, it is worth noting that describing the right at issue as the right against a state-created danger of bodily harm does not broadly expose officers to suit any time they take an affirmative act. This is because, while an affirmative act that increases the plaintiff's risk of harm can give rise to a due process claim, this is only true when the defendant commits this act with the necessary mental state, usually meaning deliberate indifference as to whether her actions will harm the plaintiff. . . Thus, while the right at issue within the qualified immunity inquiry should be defined with an appropriate level of specificity, because the right at issue here is the right against a state official acting to increase an individual's risk of private violence with the knowledge of or at least deliberate indifference to that increased risk, the right is 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'")

Hammond v. County of Oakland, Michigan, 825 F. App'x 344, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("Any reasonable officer would have understood that commanding a dog to bite a handcuffed suspect who was not attempting to flee would violate the Fourth Amendment. Cadotte thus is not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the bites. Hammond also claims that Deputies Salyers and Welch violated the Fourth Amendment when they failed to stop the bites. Whether they did depends upon whether they 'had both the opportunity and the means to prevent the harm from occurring.'. . But Hammond cites no caselaw clearly establishing that officers who are not trained as dog handlers have a duty to intervene and control a dog notwithstanding the presence of the dog's handler. Salyers and Welch are therefore entitled to qualified immunity from Hammond's claim.")

Abdur-Rahim v. City of Columbus, Ohio, 825 F. App'x 284, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("Analysis of the propriety of the district court's call on Masters's entitlement to immunity here encompasses two questions: (1) whether Masters violated Abdur-Rahim's constitutional rights; and (2) whether those rights were clearly established. . . Because the second disposes of the issue, we opt to address only it. . . A clearly established right must be 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Existing precedent must place the constitutional question 'beyond debate.'. . The court cannot 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Instead, caselaw must 'clearly and specifically hold that what the officer did—under the circumstances the officer did it—violated the Constitution.'. . Specificity proves especially important in the excessive force context, an 'area of the law in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case, and thus police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue.'. . As an initial matter, Masters contends that he did not seize Abdur-Rahim and that the district court therefore erred by analyzing the excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment, rather than under a heightened Fourteenth Amendment standard. Rather than confront this issue, we assume that the Fourth Amendment governs because, in any event, no clearly established law barred Masters's conduct. In finding that Masters violated clearly established law, the district court failed to define the right with requisite specificity and failed to identify a case where an officer acted under similar circumstances. First, the district court found that 'the right to be free from physical force when one is not resisting the police is a clearly established right.'. . Perhaps, but defining the right at this level of generality misses the Supreme Court's admonition that 'the clearly established law must be "particularized" to the facts of the case.'. . Indeed, in the sole published case cited for this proposition, an officer tasered a lone arrestee—a markedly different circumstance. . . . Second, the district court found that Masters had 'notice that the use of force after mace has incapacitated a suspect is excessive.'. . But again, none of our cases has extended that proposition to apply when using pepper spray to disperse a crowd. Rather, the cases cited by the district court and Abdur-Rahim each pertain to the reasonableness of using force against an individual arrestee whom officers already have restrained or subdued. . . .Abdur-Rahim has not provided a Sixth Circuit case that would have put Masters on notice that it constitutes excessive force to pepper spray directly a lingering individual blocking an intersection after forty-five minutes of dispersal orders and warnings, followed by a general spray over a crowd. Abdur-Rahim also suggests out-of-circuit cases to support her stance. We generally, however, disregard such authority because 'we can't expect officers to keep track of persuasive authority from every one of our sister circuits.'. . Regardless, those cases address distinguishable circumstances that don't clearly establish the specific right alleged here. . . . With no existing precedent that '"squarely governs" the specific facts at issue' in this appeal, qualified immunity shields Masters from Abdur-Rahim's excessive force claim, and we reverse the denial of qualified immunity to Masters.")

Bard v. Brown County, Ohio, 970 F.3d 738, 754-55 (6th Cir. 2020) ("The clearly-established prong of the qualified-immunity analysis is straightforwardly satisfied here. As the Supreme Court observed in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 121 S.Ct. 2151, 150 L.Ed.2d 272 (2001), 'there is no doubt that Graham v. Connor clearly establishes the general proposition that use of force is contrary to the Fourth Amendment if it is excessive under objective standards of reasonableness.'. . At the time of the alleged unconstitutional conduct, the proscription against the excessive use of force was clearly established. As to the objective reasonableness of the use of force, the fact that both the excessive-force and qualified-immunity analyses involve assessing whether the force was objectively unreasonable does not render the latter assessment 'merely duplicative' of the former. . . Indeed, '[t]he qualified immunity inquiry ... has a further dimension' that 'acknowledge[s] that reasonable mistakes can be made as to the legal constraints on particular police conduct.'. . As discussed above, the only theoretical reason for yanking Goldson out of the vehicle by his lower body, guaranteeing that his upper body would immediately fall to the ground, was that Goldson had recently attempted to escape from the officers. But we have repeatedly rejected this argument when the officer 'used [such] force well after securing [the individual] and defusing the situation.'. . 'A reasonable officer would understand that, after compliance is secured and a threat is no longer posed, force should not be employed.' Cole v. City of Dearborn, 448 F. App'x 571, 576 (6th Cir. 2011). Because there is no indication in the record that Goldson posed a threat to the officers, I believe that the district court erred in concluding that Huff's use of force was objectively reasonable and granting him qualified immunity on this basis.")

Stewart v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 970 F.3d 667, 673-75 (6th Cir. 2020), ), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2690 (2021) ("As a threshold issue, it should be noted that Rhodes's choice to enter the vehicle, and his choice not to exit the vehicle when it was stopped for ten to fifteen seconds, is irrelevant in assessing the reasonableness of his use of force. . . But having no duty to retreat does not mean

Rhodes could use deadly force; his actions must still be reasonable under the circumstances. Here, some of the circumstances support the reasonableness of Rhodes's actions. Stewart drove into a police car at the beginning of the interaction; his vehicle, for whatever reason, unexpectedly stopped in the middle of an intersection; and twice he drove onto a pedestrian sidewalk. All of this occurred at approximately 7:00 a.m. in a residential neighborhood with a school nearby. Stewart certainly presented some danger to the general public in the area. So too do the circumstances show some danger to Rhodes. He was unsecured in a vehicle doing those things listed above. From the beginning to the end of the interaction, Stewart continued to put the car in drive and rev the engine, showing his commitment to driving the vehicle despite Rhodes's efforts to stop him. But the question is 'whether the totality of the circumstances' justifies deadly force. . . It does not. . . . Most importantly, Rhodes admits the car was in neutral at the time of the shooting and, in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, the car was not moving forward. Even were Stewart to get the car back in gear, it seems doubtful that Stewart's driving alone was threatening enough to justify shooting him. . . . Here, Stewart went up on the curb twice at low speeds as Rhodes hit and tasered him. . . . A jury could find that Stewart's use of the vehicle was not threatening lives around him and thus Rhodes's use of force was unreasonable. . . Finally, no reasonable officer in Rhodes's position would believe he was being kidnapped by Stewart. In fact, the circumstances here are the opposite of a kidnapping: Stewart was attempting to flee officers. While Rhodes had no duty to retreat from the vehicle, his entry into the vehicle and the availability of an exit speak to the totality of the circumstances informing his use of deadly force. A reasonable officer in Rhodes's position would have known that it was his own choice, and not any sort of pressure by Stewart, that caused him to enter the car. While these are acts Rhodes was legally entitled to do, a reasonable officer in his position would have understood he was not being kidnapped. Some of the circumstances in this case suggest that Rhodes's use of deadly force was reasonable. Others—specifically, Stewart's lack of aggression toward Rhodes, the low speeds at which he was driving, and the fact that the car may have been already stopped at the time he was shot—allow a reasonable jury to find facts showing Stewart did not present an immediate danger of serious physical injury and thus the use of deadly force was unreasonable. . . . Regardless of whether a constitutional violation occurred, however, the district court was correct to find the contours of the right were not clearly established in these circumstances. . . . Other than in the 'obvious' case, . . . the Supreme Court has indicated these general propositions are 'not enough' to delineate the contours of the right—to alert officers to the beginning and end of the right in the particular circumstances they face. . . Given the competing concerns noted earlier, this is not an obvious case. Stewart has pointed to no cases in this circuit involving an officer being driven in a suspect's car, much less a case that shares similar characteristics such as the suspect's level of speed, aggression, or recklessness. While it is correct that the Sixth Circuit has established precedent for use of deadly force on those who flee in a vehicle, the two cases cited by Stewart involve officers standing outside a vehicle with wholly different concerns than an officer inside the vehicle. Those cases primarily focused on whether the officer was at risk of being hit or run over by the vehicle, a threat Rhodes did not face inside Stewart's car. . . Put simply: cases about when officers may use deadly force against the driver of a vehicle bearing down on them explain very little about whether that force is appropriate as a passenger of the vehicle. While plaintiff need not provide a case factually on all fours, existing precedent must be similar enough to place the question beyond debate. . . This circuit has not debated the types and level of threat faced by an officer inside a fleeing suspect's vehicle, much less placed it beyond debate. . . Further, Stewart's reference to two out of circuit cases does not provide the 'robust consensus' required for the right to be clearly established. . . Neither controlling nor persuasive precedent has clearly established Stewart's rights in the 'particular circumstances' Rhodes faced. . . Indeed, few cases have ever considered the danger faced by an officer inside a fleeing suspect's vehicle and at what point it justifies the use of deadly force. Rhodes is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Stewart v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 970 F.3d 667, 677-84 (6th Cir. 2020),), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2690 (2021) (Donald, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("While I agree that the district court should be reversed on the state law claims and that Officer Rhodes violated Luke Stewart's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures, I would also find that the constitutional right was clearly established and that, therefore, Rhodes is not entitled to qualified immunity. The majority evaluates the clearly-established prong too narrowly and provides immunity to an officer who created a dangerous situation and then used that situation to justify the fatal shooting of a man who did not present an immediate danger of serious physical injury to the officer. In fact, it is debatable whether Stewart presented any danger to the officer or the public, or if he even knew that Rhodes was a law enforcement officer, since neither Rhodes nor Catalani announced themselves as police officers. . . . Despite § 1983's categorical decree that all persons under color of state law who cause the deprivation of a constitutional right 'shall' be subject to liability, the Supreme Court overlaid qualified immunity onto the statute's directive in an effort to balance its underlying policies. . . More specifically, the doctrine—as we know it today—was deemed necessary to protect public officials from unforeseeable developments in the law. . . Today, the seemingly endless struggle with applying the doctrine is in defining the extent of a clearly established right. . . .Judge Willett from the Fifth Circuit recently highlighted some of the issues with the clearly-established standard in his dissent in Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 479 (5th Cir. 2019) (Willett, J., dissenting). Noting the courts' division over what level of 'factual similarity must exist,' he wrote that 'the "clearly established" standard is neither clear nor established among our Nation's lower courts.' Id. He also emphasized that deciding immunity issues based on a too-narrow construction of clearly established law prevents the vindication of constitutional rights[.] . . . Of course, the problems do not end there, as courts have increasingly begun to skip the constitutional question and simply ask whether the right was clearly established. . . . Here, the majority answered the constitutional question first but construes the clearly-established prong too narrowly. The sole purpose of the clearly-established prong, as created and announced by the Supreme Court, is to protect officials from unforeseeable or unknowable developments in the law. . . It is not a blank check to engage in specific acts that have not previously been considered by a court of controlling authority. . . Nor is it 'a license to lawless conduct.'. . When defining clearly established rights, we must have in the forefront of our mind this question: would a reasonable officer have known that his actions were unconstitutional? . . . . The majority notes that Rhodes had no duty to retreat. However, Rhodes likewise had a duty to only use such force as was necessary under the totality of the circumstances. The fact that Rhodes shot Stewart five times at near point-blank range defies reasonableness. This is the type of wantonness that does not require a case on point to put an officer on notice that his conduct is unreasonable. As Judge Gorsuch opined, 'some things are so obviously unlawful that they don't require detailed explanations' or happen so rarely that there will be no case on point. Browder v. City of Albuquerque, 787 F.3d 1076, 1082 (10th Cir. 2015). Had Rhodes been standing outside of the car when he used lethal force, this would be a very simple case—he would not be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . However, in this Circuit, the Court has not encountered the exact situation that occurred in this case—the officer being inside of the car at the time of the shooting. That lack of precisely-analogous controlling law can oftentimes sound the death knell to a § 1983 claim. . . Here, the majority sounds the death knell for Stewart's § 1983 claims and finds that the right was not clearly established, but I disagree. In addition to this being a situation where precisely-analogous law should not be required, both in-circuit cases and out-of-circuit cases show that Rhodes violated Stewart's clearly-established right to be free from excessive force when he shot Stewart five times and killed him, even though he posed no imminent threat of physical injury or death to the officer or the public. . . . The law is clearly established in this Circuit that an officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing suspect unless the suspect is presenting an imminent threat of physical injury or death to the officer or the public. . . . Although Rhodes asserts that he felt that he was in danger while the car was moving, and that he feared that he may be in danger if the car were to begin moving again, the fact remains that the car was not moving at the time Rhodes chose to shoot Stewart. This lack of imminent threat of serious physical injury renders lethal force objectively unreasonable in this circumstance (despite Rhodes' individualized concern to the contrary). . . .Although this case presents unique factual circumstances within this Circuit, there are at least four factually similar cases from other jurisdictions. [discussing cases] While it is arguable that these four cases establish the 'robust consensus' that would put a reasonable officer on notice of Stewart's specific rights, . . . what is more persuasive is that these four cases illuminate the application of the specific—and clearly established—right that an individual has to be free from lethal force when fleeing arrest in a car that is not presenting an imminent threat of serious physical harm to anybody. . . Moreover, these four cases applied that specific right when the suspect's car was actually moving, whereas in our case Stewart's car was stopped when he was killed. That distinction makes it even more apparent that a reasonable officer would have known that lethal force was inappropriate in this case. As such, I would find that Stewart's rights were clearly established at the time that Rhodes shot and killed him. . . . I find myself writing separately about the dangers of unchecked police powers with unsettling and increasing frequency. Six years ago, I dissented from a decision affirming summary judgment for several officers who killed Leroy Hughes, an African American man suffering from mental illness, by shocking him with tasers twelve times in five minutes. See Sheffey v. City of Covington, 564 F. App'x 783, 796-97 (6th Cir. 2014) (Donald, J., dissenting). The first eight shocks occurred in a single minute. . . The total delivery exceeded 14,000 volts. . . In that dissent, I recalled the names of Amadou Diallo, Sean Bell, Oscar Grant, Jonathan Ferrell, and others. . . And I exhorted this Court and its readers not to 'ignore the seeds of systemic inequalities sown in our Nation's history and lain bare by diligent review.'. . We have new names today: George Floyd, Elijah McClain, Rayshard Brooks, and too many others. The world knows why they died. The same seeds whose bitter fruit killed Leroy Hughes killed them too. And on March 13, 2017, in Euclid, Ohio, they killed Luke Stewart. That the seeds of these senseless killings are systemic should not absolve the shooters. Our system of justice bestows upon police great powers and a sacred trust. We rightly protect police from penalties that otherwise would follow from poor conduct when officers act with reason. But when officers fail to act with reason, when they are motivated by impulses that spring from dark corners of the psyche or simply fail implicitly to acknowledge the humanity of the people before them, they violate our sacred trust. And then the same system that empowers and protects police must, if it is to function properly, if it is to be worthy of recognition as a system of justice, strip those powers and protections away. Luke Stewart should be alive today. He was unarmed, unsuspected of committing a serious felony, and behind the wheel of a stationary vehicle when Rhodes opened fire into his torso, chest, neck, and wrist. Qualified immunity should not shield Rhodes from the consequences of that unreasonable decision. I dissent.")

Tlapanco v. Elges, 969 F.3d 638, 650, 653-55 (6th Cir. 2020) ("For several of Tlapanco's claims, . . . the 'breathing room' granted to officers by qualified immunity is not dispositive given the facts of this case. . . Specifically, with regard to all of Tlapanco's Fourth Amendment claims against Elges except the mirroring claim, the primary issue to resolve is whether a reasonable jury could find that, when he applied for the search and arrest warrants, Elges intentionally or recklessly disregarded material facts negating probable cause. Further, while it will sometimes be possible for officers to make 'reasonable but mistaken judgments' about the materiality of the information omitted, that is not true here. . . In this case, as described below, the information Elges left out of the warrant applications obviously negated probable cause because it demonstrated that Tlapanco was not the Kik user harassing A.F. Thus, under the circumstances of this case, Elges is not entitled to qualified immunity as long as a reasonable jury could find that his omission of this information was intentional or reckless. . . . Because a reasonable jury could find that Elges's sworn statements supporting the arrest warrant were recklessly indifferent to the truth that Tlapanco did not hack or communicate with A.F., and Tlapanco's right to be free from arrest without probable cause was clearly established, Elges is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . Despite Tlapanco's substantial showing that Elges possessed information establishing that Tlapanco did not hack A.F. nor communicate with her on Kik, Tlapanco was arrested pursuant to a warrant and therefore needs to prove: '(1) that the officer applying for the warrant, either knowingly and deliberately or with reckless disregard for the truth, made false statements or omissions that created a falsehood[,] and (2) that such statements or omissions were material to the finding of probable cause.'. . . A reasonable jury could find that Elges did not have probable cause to conclude that Tlapanco was connected to the conduct at issue, and that the judge would not have issued the arrest warrant but for recklessly false statements or material omissions by Elges. A reasonable jury could find that Tlapanco was arrested without probable cause, a violation of a clearly established right. Accordingly, Elges is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Tlapanco has provided evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that Elges violated Tlapanco's 'clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has "made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff" by ... "knowingly or recklessl" making false statements that are material to the prosecution either in reports or in affidavits filed to secure warrants.'. . Elges is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Proctor v. Krzanowski, 820 F. App'x 436, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("Here, Proctor claims a property interest in not being restricted from using his medical license to issue certifications to patients seeking a medical marihuana registry card. That right is far from clearly established. As Krzanowski and Mitchell point out, the ' "contour" of the [right to] professional licensing and medical marihuana has not been made clear in the federal realm.' . . Federal district courts have consistently rejected claims that state laws permitting medical marihuana possession can create a constitutionally protected property interest in medical marihuana or medical marihuana patient cards. . . Thus, if in 2016 Krzanowski and Mitchell had surveyed the limited legal landscape of Fourteenth Amendment protections for medical marihuana, they would have found only decisions declaring that the nature of the property interest (in possessing a substance deemed contraband by federal law) disentitled the interest to Fourteenth Amendment protections. . . This is true even though state law imposed substantive restrictions on when medical marihuana licenses could be denied—traditionally an indicator of constitutionally protected property interests. Krzanowski and Mitchell would understandably believe that if the 'nature' of the patient's interest in a medical marihuana registry card disentitled the interest to constitutional protection, the same would be true of the nature of Proctor's interest in helping patients obtain a registry card. Similarly, Krzanowski and Mitchell might reasonably believe that a physician's interest in providing a medical certification required for obtaining that patient card is not sufficiently weighty to warrant constitutional protection. Against a backdrop of federal district court cases declining to recognize a constitutionally protected property interest in medical marihuana registry cards, it could not have been obvious to Krzanowski and Mitchell that Proctor had a constitutionally protected interest participating in a process to assist others to obtain a medical marihuana patient registry card.")

Ouza v. City of Dearborn Heights, Michigan, 969 F.3d 265, 280-84 (6th Cir. 2020) ("[W]e have . . . recognized that 'just as a court can generalize too much, it can generalize too little. If it defeats the qualified-immunity analysis to define the right too broadly ... it defeats the purpose of § 1983 to define the right too narrowly.'. . In the present case, we are guided by the Supreme Court's opinion in Wesby, which was also a false arrest case. . . . [I]t was certainly clearly established at the time of Plaintiff's arrest in 2014 that 'absent probable cause to believe that an offense had been committed, was being committed, or was about to be committed, officers may not arrest an individual.'. . In Logsdon, this Court held that this standard alone, absent any 'sea change in this body of law since [the plaintiff's] arrest,' was sufficient to overcome the defendant's qualified immunity defense. . . Nevertheless, the district court in this case chose to define the right more narrowly. It considered whether Plaintiff had a clearly established right to be free 'from the type of arrest Plaintiff experienced: arrest based on the testimony of one eyewitness who has an apparent bias in the matter.'. . And our case law establishes that she did under these circumstances. In a series of cases, we have refined the governing standard for when an eyewitness' allegations are sufficient to establish probable cause. [discussing cases] . . . . These cases and their progeny clearly establish that Plaintiff had a right to be free from arrest based solely on Mohamad's unreliable and uncorroborated accusation. This is especially true where Mohamad's account was the only piece of evidence from which Officer Dottor could even conceivably (although unreasonably) have concluded that he had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff. Our conclusion that Officer Dottor had 'fair warning' that his conduct would be unlawful is further supported by our precedent establishing that an officer must consider both inculpatory and exculpatory evidence when assessing probable cause. . . . Moreover, this Court does not require 'a prior, "precise situation," a finding that "the very action in question has previously been held unlawful," or a "case directly on point"' in order to hold that a right was clearly established. . . Thus, under the applicable case law, we must reject the dissent's proposed qualified immunity standard because it is too rigid and unyielding. Qualified immunity is not absolute immunity, and our case law establishes that individuals must have some right to sue government officials who knowingly or unreasonably violate their constitutional rights. At the time of the arrest, our case law clearly established that Plaintiff had a right to be free from an arrest unsupported by probable cause. . . And we had clearly held that a single witness' unreliable accusation is insufficient to create probable cause to arrest a person without further corroboration (especially when that witness is himself a suspect, as here). . . . Accordingly, under the standard announced in City of Escondido and Wesby, Officer Dottor had fair notice that his arrest of Plaintiff would be unlawful in the circumstances with which he was confronted.")

Ouza v. City of Dearborn Heights, Michigan, 969 F.3d 265, 290-94 (6th Cir. 2020) (Griffin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I join the majority opinion regarding plaintiff's excessive-force claim, however regarding the false-arrest and municipal-liability claims, I respectfully dissent because I conclude the district court correctly granted summary judgment in defendants' favor. . . Time and again, . . . the Supreme Court has admonished lower courts that broad statements of 'clearly established law do not provide the 'specificity' required to put a police officer on notice that his 'conduct in the particular circumstances before him' is unconstitutional[.]. . Accordingly, when a court denies qualified immunity to a police officer on a Fourth Amendment claim, it must normally 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . Because no such similar case clearly establishes defendant police officer Jordan Dottor unconstitutionally arrested plaintiff Ehsan Ouza, the majority opinion errs in denying him qualified immunity on her § 1983 false-arrest claim. . . .The district court defined the right at issue as whether one may be 'arrest[ed] based on the testimony of one eyewitness who has an apparent bias in the matter.' The majority opinion agrees. . . It then relies on three cases to conclude this right was clearly established at the time of plaintiff's arrest. . . None, however, satisfy the Supreme Court's similar-circumstances mandate. [distinguishing cases] Qualified immunity is a 'demanding standard [that] protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . No case unquestionably put Officer Dottor's decision to arrest plaintiff on the wrong side of constitutionality. At that time, our caselaw was unclear both as to (1) whether an eyewitness's statement alone is enough to establish probable cause and (2) how much credence a police officer must give to an eyewitness's account when he may have some reason to doubt at least some aspect of that account. 'Tellingly,' neither plaintiff nor my colleagues

'have identified a single precedent—much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases—finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances.'. . Nor am I aware of a case generally holding that it is unconstitutional for an officer to rely on a complaining witness's version of events to arrest an individual when an officer might have some reason to discredit some portions of the complaining witness's story, let alone one involving the 'complex emotional causes of behavior' that frequently accompany domestic-violence situations. . . That is the precise circumstance here and caselaw requires that we defer to Officer Dottor's contemporaneous judgment call regarding the existence of probable cause when he arrested plaintiff. Accordingly, the unlawfulness of [Officer Dottor]'s conduct does not follow immediately" from a review' of the majority's three case[.] . . Officer Dottor is entitled to qualified immunity, and I would therefore affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Officer Dottor.")

Siders v. City of Eastpointe, 819 F. App'x 381, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("To deny qualified immunity here would be to hold that a suspected domestic-violence perpetrator has a clearly established constitutional right to thwart the responding officer by getting into a car and closing the door, to resist restraint by kicking the officer and clinging to the car's seat, and to refuse the officer's orders for handcuffing. There are no such rights. To be sure, a reasonable person viewing the video of this incident could characterize the officer's actions as impatient, overzealous, and perhaps unnecessary. But whether we personally condone or condemn the officer's conduct is immaterial; the question is whether our constitutional precedent so clearly forbids it that we cannot even construe the officer's actions as a reasonable mistake. Even if we were to agree that the officer was impatient or overzealous, his actions were not wholly unreasonable under the circumstances, and those actions did not violate the suspect's clearly-established constitutional rights. Therefore, he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .[I]n deciding this appeal, we rely primarily—almost entirely, in fact—on our own plenary review of the videotape recordings.")

Siders v. City of Eastpointe, 819 F. App'x 381, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Stranch, J., dissenting) ("To have jurisdiction over Defendants' interlocutory appeal, we must view the facts in Siders' favor. . . The majority opinion fails to do so. When the most favorable view of the facts is conceded in Siders' favor, . . . genuine disputes remain over whether Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. I therefore respectfully dissent. . . . Application of the Graham factors to the facts taken in the light most favorable to Patricia shows: (1) that Patricia's misdemeanor offenses were not serious, (2) there was little basis to believe Patricia was a threat to the officers or others, (3) Patricia's withdrawal into the van was at most a passive refusal to comply with an unwarranted threat ('close the door and you're going to get ripped out of the car'), and (4) she had stopped resisting when Piro tasered her. The majority opinion's contrary conclusions rely on Defendants' challenges to Patricia's version of events, which have no place in our qualified immunity analysis in an interlocutory appeal. The facts viewed most favorably to Patricia, as we must at this stage, state a constitutional violation. We should therefore reach the next constitutional question—whether the violated right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Framed properly, we should ask 1) whether a potential misdemeanant, who has not been placed under arrest and who has neither fled nor resisted investigation, has a clearly established right not to be forcibly removed by her ankles from a passenger seat of her car, and 2) whether a potential misdemeanant has a right not to be tasered when she is lying on the ground and has stopped resisting. I would answer these questions affirmatively because Piro had 'fair warning' that his actions were unconstitutional. . . . The majority opinion is fair in acknowledging that Piro could have achieved his goal of investigating or arresting Siders without using any force: 'he might have been more patient and less threatening (and less profane); he might have ordered Patricia to exit the minivan and given her time to comply voluntarily; or he might have coerced her from the minivan with the threat of tasing, rather than physically overwhelming her and pulling her out.'. . This honest acknowledgement suggests that the amount of force used was not reasonable and, in my view, shows that the force used was objectively unnecessary to investigating Siders or effecting her arrest. It was therefore excessive in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . .Because Patricia had a clearly established constitutional right not to be pulled from her car by the ankles onto concrete in front of her children when she was, at most, passively resisting investigation, and because she also had a clearly established right not to be gratuitously tasered after ceasing resistance, I would affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment with respect to the excessive force claim against Piro.")

Kesterson v. Kent State University, 967 F.3d 519, 525-26 (6th Cir. 2020) ("[W]e think the case law, by 2014, had put beyond debate that a coach at a state university cannot retaliate against a student-athlete for speaking out by subjecting her to harassment and humiliation. For decades, employees at 'state colleges and universities' have known that those institutions 'are not enclaves immune from the sweep of the First Amendment.'. . Students may exercise their First Amendment rights unless doing so would 'materially and substantially disrupt' school operations. . . And school officials may not retaliate against students based on their protected speech. . . More specifically, long before these events, our court explained that coaches could not retaliate against a player 'for reporting improprieties.'. . Based on these cases, a reasonable coach would have known at the time Linder acted that she could not retaliate against a student athlete for reporting a sexual assault. All that remains is for a jury to decide whether Kesterson can carry her burden of proof.")

Kesterson v. Kent State University, 967 F.3d 519, 533-34 (6th Cir. 2020) (Stranch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I disagree. . . with the majority opinion's dismissive approach to the two cases clearly establishing that Linder's conduct would violate Kesterson's constitutional right to equal protection. In Patterson v. Hudson Area Schools, 551 F.3d 438, 448 (6th Cir. 2009), we declined to grant qualified immunity to school officials where the student suffered bullying that was 'severe and pervasive' and the officials' response was inadequate 'to deter other students from perpetuating the cycle of harassment.'. . And in Shively, where the defendants 'failed to enforce the school policy on harassment,' we relied on Patterson and held that it was well established by 2011 that school officials' deliberate indifference to reports of student harassment violate a student's equal protection rights. . .The majority distinguished Patterson on the basis that it involved a funding recipient's liability under Title IX. But we have already established that deliberate indifference in a § 1983 equal protection claim is 'substantially the same' as demonstrating deliberate indifference in Title IX cases. . . And the majority opinion's attempt to distinguish Shively because it dealt with gender and religious—as opposed to sexual—harassment is simply a distinction without a difference. The law is clear that the plaintiff need only offer evidence that she was subjected to peer harassment, regardless of its form, . . . and then focus on 'the recipient's response to [allegations of] harassment or lack thereof' in evaluating a deliberate indifference equal protection claim[.] . . The conclusion that the law requires a match of the particulars of the harassment endured is not a part of the applicable legal standard. Here a head coach learned that her son raped a student athlete and the coach intentionally ignored school policy mandating that she report the rape—a coach who had reported similar assaults not involving her family. . . . Patterson and Shively clearly established that Linder could be held liable for acting with deliberate indifference to Kesterson's claim of harassment. . . Under our precedent, I think qualified immunity should be denied for Kesterson's equal protection claim.")

Jones v. City of Detroit, 815 F. App'x 995, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("To the extent cases from outside our circuit figure into the 'clearly established' analysis—they usually do not, Ashford v. Raby, 951 F.3d 798, 804 (6th Cir. 2020)—they tell the same story. No case to our knowledge, and none cited by Jones, elaborates a Fourth Amendment standard for safety restraints, head-guiding, or headroom in transporting wheelchair users. . . . Jones claims the officers used excessive force when they transported him in a van without using traditional safety restraints to secure the wheelchair and without enough headroom. But our cases say the opposite when it comes to the closest analogy, transporting non-wheelchair users. Faced with that question, courts within and outside our circuit have repeatedly rejected constitutional challenges to transportation of detainees without seatbelts. [collecting cases] Jones does not cite any contrary authority. The closest analogy, in other words, would not have warned the officers of a constitutional requirement to transport Jones only with the aid of safety restraints to secure the wheelchair. And those cases would not have shown that what the officers did do—allow an individual to hold the wheelchair in place with his feet in a tight space that left little room for movement anyway—violated clearly established law. Our cases about transporting people in wheelchairs similarly tell the officers nothing about whether they transgressed constitutional boundaries in transporting Jones. Jones identifies just one case about transporting an arrestee who used a wheelchair. [court discusses St. John case] Only one other case in our circuit has involved a claim that an officer used excessive force while arresting a wheelchair user. That case upheld a jury verdict against an officer who pulled a paraplegic driver out of his car by his neck, dropped him on the ground, kicked and kneed him in the head, and dragged him across the ground by his forearms. Koehler v. Smith, 124 F.3d 198, at *5 (6th Cir. 1997) (table). Our circuit thus has decided two cases about excessive force against wheelchair-bound suspects, and neither one could have alerted the officers to constitutional headroom, head-guiding, or safety-restraint requirements. The case's scarce forebears suggest it 'presents a unique set of facts and circumstances' cutting in favor of qualified immunity, . . not a constitutional rule that is 'beyond debate[.]'")

Jones v. City of Detroit, 815 F. App'x 995, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Moore, J., dissenting) ("The majority opinion is vise-like in its analysis of whether Jones's constitutional rights are clearly established. Rather than considering '"the salient question" in evaluating the clearly established prong,' 'whether officials had "fair warning" that their conduct was unconstitutional,'. . . the majority frames the question at the most granular level. It concludes that '[n]o case ... elaborates a Fourth Amendment standard for safety restraints, head-guiding, or headroom in transporting wheelchair users.' . . If this definition of the constitutional right is not so narrowly defined as to 'defeat[ ] the purpose of [42 U.S.C.] § 1983,' then it is difficult to imagine what definition would be too narrow. . . The majority treats the fact that Jones is wheelchair-bound as a feature that makes it less likely that a reasonable officer would know that his actions violated our excessive-force precedent because few cases address arrestees in wheelchairs. But this misses the obvious point—because of Jones's apparent disability and because of the prevalence of persons without disabilities in our excessive-force precedent, we should conclude that this fact makes it more likely that a reasonable officer would be on notice that his treatment of Jones amounted to excessive force. . . .In St. John, we addressed the transport of a person with a physical disability who was in a wheelchair. There, we concluded that the right at issue was 'the right of a nonviolent arrestee to be free from unnecessary pain knowingly inflicted during an arrest' and that the right 'was clearly established.'. . .This is how we should define the right at issue here. Jones was also a nonviolent arrestee and the portion of his arrest where the defendants pushed his head down is materially indistinguishable from the arrest in St. John. Jones was arrested for disorderly conduct, the same crime as the plaintiff in St. John; he did not present a risk of flight; he posed no threat to others; and there were no exigent circumstances necessitating his immediate transport or confinement in the van. Additionally, the defendants here were aware that they were causing Jones unnecessary pain. First, it was readily apparent that he was wheelchair-bound, like the plaintiff in St John. . . Second, Jones cried out, 'ow,' to the officers as they pushed his head down. . . The fact that Jones did not apprise the officers of the specifics of his disability is not fatal to his case. In St. John, the plaintiff explained to the officers that his legs could not bend due to muscular dystrophy. . . But the issue was whether the officers were aware that they were causing the plaintiff, 'an obviously disabled and wheelchair-bound man,' pain—not that he gave a particular verbal warning. . . To that end, we considered the plaintiff's verbal warning and the fact that he used a wheelchair. . . The majority opinion interprets 'knowingly' from St. John to require a particular verbal warning, even if the arrestee has an obvious disability that a reasonable officer would appreciate and has otherwise communicated his pain to the officers. This makes little sense. Moreover, St. John also gave the defendants here fair notice that they could not leave a person with an apparent disability in an unsafe position.")

Sevy v. Barach, No. 19-2038, 2020 WL 3564660, at *5–7 (6th Cir. July 1, 2020) (not reported) ("First Amendment retaliation claims often involve retaliatory arrests. But to establish a retaliatory arrest, plaintiffs generally must prove that the arresting officer lacked probable cause. [citing Nieves] On appeal in this case, Sevy does not argue that Barach lacked probable cause to arrest him. That means his retaliation claim is not based on the arrest itself. Rather, Sevy's claim is based on the allegedly excessive force Barach used in carrying out the arrest. This certainly seems like a case where it would be 'particularly difficult to determine whether the adverse government action was caused by the officer's malice or the plaintiff's potentially criminal conduct.'. . Regardless, we need not untie this Gordian knot, because Sevy's asserted First Amendment right was not clearly established. . . Recall that to overcome qualified immunity, Sevy must show that (1) Barach violated his constitutional rights, and (2) his right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . A right is 'clearly established' when the alleged conduct violates 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . In other words, the right is clearly established if someone in Barach's position should reasonably have known—based on existing law—that the conduct violated Sevy's First Amendment rights. . .But it's not clear whether Sevy even had a viable First Amendment claim on his excessive-force retaliation theory, let alone whether his First Amendment rights were clearly established under existing law. . . . Judge Moore concludes otherwise, reasoning that Sevy's right to protest was clearly established, and a reasonable officer would have known not to use physical force in retaliation. But this is not a case about physical force in isolation. Rather, the issue is whether the use of excessive force in executing an arrest supported by probable cause can amount to a First Amendment, rather than a Fourth Amendment, violation. This is at least an open question, . . . and existing precedents do not answer that question 'beyond debate' in Sevy's favor[.] . . Thus, Sevy's First Amendment right to recover under this hybrid theory is not clearly established.")

Sevy v. Barach, No. 19-2038, 2020 WL 3564660, at *7-8 (6th Cir. July 1, 2020) (not reported) (Moore, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("In short, it should not take a previous case holding that officers may not choke individuals in retaliation for their exercise of free speech, such as protest and public criticism of officers, to conclude that Sevy's rights were clearly established. This case is a prime example of 'the easiest cases don't even arise.'. . For these reasons, I concur in the majority opinion's resolution of Barach's appeal of the district court's denial of qualified immunity for Sevy's Fourth Amendment claim, and I dissent from the resolution of Barach's appeal of the district court's denial of qualified immunity for the First Amendment retaliation claim.")

Wright v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 962 F.3d 852, 866-72 (6th Cir. 2020) ("[B]ased only on Wright's brief stop at the residence, the officers decided to conduct a traffic stop with weapons drawn. These circumstances are very different from those in Heath where the officers had a justifiable fear for their safety given that the defendant, whom they had identified and surveilled for a month, was a large-scale drug dealer and likely to be carrying a weapon. Flagg and Williams at most had a suspicion that Wright had briefly visited with a suspected drug dealer, but given that the officers had not identified Wright himself as a drug dealer or sought any corroboration of their suspicions of criminal activity, there is a genuine dispute as to whether the officers were justified in brandishing their firearms upon approach. Thus, a jury must determine whether their decision to do so was unconstitutionally excessive. . . . When Wright was unable to comply with Flagg's commands because of his stomach staples and colostomy bag, the encounter turned violent. Wright was not armed. According to Flagg, he thought Wright was reaching for a weapon in the center console and considered that movement to be an act of resisting arrest. Wright, however, disputes that his hand movement was threatening to the extent that he moved his hand at all. Although these two versions of events are not inconsistent with each other—that is, Flagg could have reasonably believed Wright was reaching for a gun when in reality he was trying to comply with orders—a reasonable jury could find, based on the totality of the circumstances, that a reasonable officer would not believe that Wright posed an immediate threat to their safety. . . . Even if Flagg is correct that Wright's act of pushing down on the center console constituted some resistance, if the resistance was merely "passive," then the use of a taser was unreasonable. See Goodwin, 781 F.3d at 323. The tasering of Wright was justified only if he engaged in resistance that was 'active,' which 'can take the form of "verbal hostility" or a "deliberate act of defiance."'. . . [A]n officer may not tase a citizen not under arrest merely for failure to follow the officer's orders when the officer has no reasonable fear for his or her safety. Whether the tasering in this instance was constitutionally permissible must be decided by the jury, given the genuine factual disputes described above concerning the circumstances of Wright's encounter with the officers. . . .The district court held that it was 'unaware of any controlling cases that have established a constitutional violation occurred when non-lethal force was used to obtain control over the suspect who reasonably appeared to pose a safety risk to officers.'. . In so holding, the district court examined the issue of whether the law was clearly established using too specific of a level of generality. . . The district court also incorrectly framed the issue based upon Flagg's version of the facts by assuming that Wright did in fact 'reasonably appear[ ] to pose a safety risk' to the officer. Given that this was a summary judgment ruling, the district court instead should have considered whether the law was clearly established using Wright's version of the facts. Wright contends that he had done nothing prior to his encounter with police to justify the officers' brandishing of their firearms. He also maintains that he had a right not to be tased when, during the course of an investigatory detention, he inadvertently broke away from the officer's grip, but presented no threat to others, and did not actively resist arrest. For the reasons discussed below, we hold that, viewing the facts in Wright's favor, Flagg's drawing of his firearm and use of his taser violated Wright's constitutional rights that were clearly established as of the date of the encounter, November 4, 2016. . . . We have also recognized that pointing a gun at an individual can constitute excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. [noting cases] Based on this authority, it was clearly established as of the time of Wright's encounter with the officers that brandishing a firearm without a justifiable fear that Wright was fleeing or dangerous was unreasonable and constituted excessive force. . . .To summarize, a reasonable jury could find that Flagg's actions constituted unreasonable and constituted excessive force. It was clearly established as of November 4, 2016 that drawing a weapon on a suspect who was not fleeing or posing a safety risk and tasering a suspect who was not actively resisting arrest constituted excessive force. Therefore, we REVERSE the district court's grant of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds to Flagg as to the excessive-force claims. . . . Wright's excessive-force claim against Williams, based on his brandishing of a firearm and use of the pepper spray, largely mirrors the claim against Flagg based on his similar use of a firearm and tasing, and therefore the analysis is largely the same. . . . For reasons similar to those discussed above as they relate to Flagg's use of his taser, we hold that the right to be free from being pepper sprayed when a suspect is not actively resisting arrest was also clearly established at the time of the encounter in question. . . . Wright has produced evidence that would allow a reasonable juror to conclude that he had not committed a serious crime, or any crime at all; that he was not a danger to the officers or the public; and that he was not resisting arrest.

Although the officers tell a different story, it should be up to the jury to determine whose story is more credible. Therefore, we REVERSE as to the excessive-force claim against Williams for deploying his pepper spray, as well as for brandishing his firearm.")

Jones v. Clark County, Kentucky, 959 F.3d 748, 756, 760, 766-67 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Under federal law, a plaintiff must prove four elements to establish a malicious prosecution claim: (1) that a criminal prosecution was initiated against the plaintiff and that the defendant 'made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute;' (2) that the state lacked probable cause for the prosecution; (3) that the plaintiff suffered a deprivation of liberty because of the legal proceeding; and (4) that the criminal proceeding was 'resolved in the plaintiff's favor.'. . .[E]ven though there was probable cause for Jones' arrest and the grand jury indictment creates a presumption of probable cause for his prosecution, the forensics test results vitiated probable cause for Jones' ongoing detention. The record is clear that Murray knew by January 11, 2014, that there was no evidence of child pornography on Jones' devices. But because there is a factual dispute as to whether Murray informed the prosecutors of these results, a genuine issue exists as to whether Murray 'knowingly or recklessly' withheld this exculpatory evidence. . . Ultimately, at the summary judgment stage, it is not for this Court or the district court to 'weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter.'. . There is a genuine dispute as to whether Murray falsely maintained probable cause for Jones' continued detention by not informing the prosecutors that there was no forensic evidence connecting Jones to the illegal video. Thus, a fact-finder should decide whether, 'had this information been made known, probable cause for Plaintiff's continued detention would have dissolved.'. . . If there was no probable cause for Jones' continued detention and Murray withheld the forensics test results from the prosecutors, then Murray did violate Jones' constitutional rights. The greater challenge is the second inquiry: whether the right was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation. The right must be 'so clearly established in a particularized sense that a reasonable officer confronted with the same situation would have known that his conduct violated that right.'. . A court is to 'zoom in close enough to ensure the right is appropriately defined to reach a 'concrete, particularized description of the right.'. . . This Court has repeatedly held that 'individuals have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff.'. . The right includes malicious prosecutions in which an officer participates by 'knowingly or recklessly making false statements that are material to the prosecution either in reports or in affidavits filed to secure warrants.'. . This Court has also held that '[f]reedom from malicious prosecution is a clearly established Fourth Amendment right.'. . .
In the present case, Defendants argue that:
The law was not clear in 2013 (and still is not clear) that probable cause to prosecute a suspect on a child pornography charge requires forensic evidence of child pornography or that the identification of the subscriber for an IP address used to download child pornography coupled with other undisputed facts Deputy Murray learned is insufficient to establish probable cause for prosecution.
Br. of Appellees at 29.

Defendants do not demonstrate why their formulation of the requisite 'clearly established law' is appropriate. There is an undoubted right 'to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff.'. . This right applies in cases where the officer has falsified statements or withheld evidence and facilitated the continued detention of a plaintiff without probable cause. That is the right Jones argues was violated. And this has been the law since at least 1999, when Spurlock was decided.")

Jones v. Clark County, Kentucky, 959 F.3d 748, 768-76 (6th Cir. 2020) (Murphy, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I must respectfully part ways with the majority's view that Jones may proceed with his claim that Murray lacked probable cause for Jones's 'continued detention' after January 2014 when Murray received the results of a forensic examination of Jones's cellphone and tablet computer. I would affirm the denial of Jones's continued-detention claim on qualified-immunity grounds. My reason is simple: The majority notes that Jones has a clearly established right to be free from a malicious prosecution. But the Supreme 'Court has repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . . The Supreme Court has imposed doubly demanding standards on plaintiffs who seek to hold police officers liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for 'seizing' them without 'probable cause' in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Plaintiffs must show not just that the officers failed to meet the minimal threshold required for probable cause, but also that the officers were plainly incompetent in concluding that they had met it. . . .To overcome the defense, a plaintiff must show that 'the violative nature of particular conduct [was] clearly established' when a police officer engaged in that conduct. . . These two phrases—'clearly established' and 'particular conduct'—give this test its teeth. . . . That caselaw affirmatively shows the presence of probable cause when Murray arrested Jones in October 2013, and it does not clearly establish the absence of probable cause when Murray received the forensic-examination results in January 2014. Under the Supreme Court's precedent, then, Jones cannot overcome Murray's qualified-immunity defense. . . . Under our caselaw governing a 'continued detention without probable cause,' Jones must prove that the forensic-examination results 'dissolved' the probable cause that initially supported Murray's arrest (and the indictment in December 2013). . . I do not think the results did so when assessed through the lens of the demanding qualified-immunity framework. And I do not see a need to say anything more about this closer constitutional question on the merits, both because the constitutional question is 'factbound' and because courts regularly provide probable-cause guidance in criminal cases with no qualified-immunity defense. . . . When considering all the facts collectively and objectively, an officer would not have been 'plainly incompetent' in believing that probable cause still existed. . . 'Tellingly,' Jones does not cite 'a single precedent—much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases—finding [the absence of probable cause] "under similar circumstances"': when police connect child pornography to a residence's IP address but fail to uncover child pornography on electronic devices at the residence. . . Yet in this probable-cause context the Supreme Court has stressed 'the need to "identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment."'. . And what is the 'clearly established' legal rule that would have given Murray unambiguous notice that probable cause no longer existed after January 2014? . . I do not think it can be the general 'right under the Fourth Amendment to be free from continued detention without probable cause.'. . That right is far 'too general' because the 'unlawfulness of [Murray's] conduct "does not follow immediately from the conclusion that"' it is clearly established. . . In sum, Jones's continued-detention claim must fail because he has not proved that Murray's conduct 'violate[d] clearly established ... constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . . Neither Jones nor the majority opinion identifies a clearly established legal rule that would have put Murray on notice that he lacked probable cause after receiving the forensic-examination results. Jones does not even attempt to meet this 'demanding standard.'. . His 47-page brief devotes a single sentence to qualified immunity, asserting that because Murray 'failed to show that [Murray] did not violate Jones' constitutional rights, [Murray] is not entitled to qualified immunity.'. . This will not do. To rebut qualified immunity, Jones must prove that Murray violated a constitutional right and that this right was clearly established. . . Jones both flips the burden of proof and collapses the two inquiries, leaving no separate work for qualified immunity apart from the underlying constitutional question. With respect, the majority largely does the same by defining the 'clearly established' law at a high level of generality. It correctly notes that our cases establish 'an undoubted right '"to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff"' and that '[t]his right applies in cases where the officer has falsified statements or withheld evidence and facilitated the continued detention of a plaintiff without probable cause.'. . But the qualified-immunity inquiry 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . . I do not believe the majority identifies its legal rule with the 'high "degree of specificity"' that the Supreme Court's cases demand. . . Its proposed legal rule is analogous to suggesting that there is a clearly established right to be free from 'excessive force'—a level of generality that the Supreme Court has repeatedly rejected. . . I concede that the Supreme Court does not require a case directly on point and that courts may face difficulty identifying the 'correct' level of generality at which to articulate a legal rule. . . But the Court has recognized these concerns too. It has given us a benchmark to decide whether a rule is too general: Does 'the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct' 'follow immediately from the conclusion' that the proposed rule is clearly established? . . If not, the rule 'is too general.'. . Apply this question to the majority's proposed rule: Does the lack of probable cause to detain Jones after the forensic-examination results 'follow immediately from' the rule that plaintiffs have a right to be free from a continued detention without probable cause? . . Not at all. . . . In this probable-cause context, I would think Jones should have identified a 'body of relevant case law' setting forth more specific rules over when evidence tying a defendant's IP address to child pornography does not create probable cause. . . But Jones identifies no such caselaw. The reason is obvious: the caselaw supports the conclusion that probable cause existed here. . . . The majority also suggests that the probable-cause issue is not suited for a summary-judgment resolution because a jury should decide the ultimate question whether probable cause continued to exist after the forensic-examination results. . . Our § 1983 cases have not spoken with one voice on this issue. We have said '[w]hen no material dispute of fact exists, probable cause determinations are legal determinations that should be made by a court.'. . But we have also treated the question as factual. [collecting cases] In any event, I would follow the Supreme Court's most recent teachings in Wesby. There, the district court had granted summary judgment to § 1983 plaintiffs on the ground that police officers lacked probable cause to arrest them. . . The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the officers were entitled to summary judgment both because they had probable cause and because they were entitled to qualified immunity. . . Wesby tells us that officers are entitled to qualified immunity on this probable-cause issue at the summary-judgment stage when, 'looking at the entire legal landscape,' a reasonable officer could have concluded that probable cause existed. . . That is the case here.")

Rieves v. Town of Smyrna, Tennessee, 959 F.3d 678, 696-97 (6th Cir. 2020) ("It is clearly established that prosecutors may not make a probable cause determination based on unreliable evidence. . . Moreover, a probable cause finding may not be based on 'information too vague and from too untested a source.'. . If 'no reasonably competent officer would have concluded' that probable cause existed, qualified immunity does not apply. . . Jones and Zimmerman's actions were objectively unreasonable because their probable cause determinations rested on the inconclusive results in the TBI reports. It is unreasonable to submit an innocuous product to a lab test that is incapable of determining its legality, then rely on that inconclusive evidence to say that the substance was probably illegal. According to the TBI statement—which is corroborated by RCSO officers and, in any case, presumed to be true—Jones and Zimmerman were explicitly informed that the TBI lab reports could not determine the origin of the products or their THC percentages. Meanwhile, the relevant Tennessee statutes, by their plain language, did not criminalize CBD products that were hemp-derived and had less than 0.3% THC. Tenn. . . Without information regarding origin and THC percentage, the TBI could not and would not establish that the plaintiffs' CBD products were illegal. A reasonable officer would know that the mere presence of CBD in products, without any indication as to the products' origin or THC percentage, did not provide probable cause for violations of Tennessee's controlled-substance laws. Concluding otherwise was objectively unreasonable. Therefore, we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity for Jones and Zimmerman.")

Machan v. Olney, 958 F.3d 1212, 1215 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Machan also argues that, rather than take T.R. to the hospital for a mental evaluation without his consent, Olney should have simply detained T.R. at the school for 90 minutes, until Machan could arrive to take her home. But Olney had reason to fear that T.R. might hurt herself at home, given that T.R. herself had just said that 'she sees things' there (i.e., guns and knives) that made 'her want to hurt herself.'. . Moreover, seizures by definition are not consensual; and the existence of probable cause meant that Olney did not need Machan's consent to take T.R. to the hospital for a mental evaluation. Olney therefore did not violate the Fourth Amendment when she took T.R. to the hospital and authorized the blood draw. Yet that very same conduct, Machan claims, amounted to a violation of both his and T.R.'s substantive due process rights. To overcome qualified immunity, however, Machan must identify a case whose facts and holding would make 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . And Machan has not remotely identified any such case here. Olney is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Machan's substantive due process claims.")

Hicks v. Scott, 958 F.3d 421, 434 (6th Cir. 2020) ("The right to be free from warrantless entry into a private residence and its curtilage was clearly established at the time of Quandavier's death. As the Supreme Court has recognized, '[n]o reasonable officer could claim to be unaware of the basic rule, well established by our cases, that, absent consent or exigency, a warrantless search of the home is presumptively unconstitutional.'. . That conclusion is no different if the door to a private residence is unlocked or even ajar. . . We recently recognized as much in a case involving material facts nearly identical to those here. . . Because, as already discussed, there is evidence that the exterior side door of 1751 Chase Avenue opened into the interior of Quandavier's apartment and not a common hallway, we find that Quandavier's right to be free from the defendants' warrantless entry was clearly established.")

Graves v. Malone, 810 F. App'x 414, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("Graves identifies three separate segments in which he argues unconstitutionally excessive force was used: First, the segment in which Hedger pried the door to the trailer open and either supervised the unconstitutional use of force and/or failed to protect Graves against the unconstitutional use of force; second, the segment in which Myers and Potratz fired their weapons at Graves; and third, the segment in which Hedger tased Graves. . . . In short, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Graves, the officers used lethal force against an unresponsive, slight, unarmed man who was trapped in his bathtub. His only movement was to raise his hand, which contained an object that—taking the facts in the light most favorable to Graves—the officers perceived as no more inherently dangerous than a permanent marker, or a cell phone, or an action figure. Under the second Graham factor, we must then ask whether it was reasonable for the officers to conclude that on these facts, Graves posed an objective, immediate, and severe threat of physical harm. . . Our case law is clear: no reasonable officer would make such a conclusion. . . . This ends the constitutional inquiry: because the officers did not have probable cause to believe that Graves posed an immediate threat of severe physical harm, the 'minimum requirement' to justify the use of lethal force is not met. . . . Graves, it is true, did not comply with officers' repeated commands to show his hands. But failure to comply with commands alone 'does not indicate active resistance.'. . Thus, the totality of facts and circumstances—viewed in a light most favorable to Graves—compel the conclusion that the officers' use of lethal force was objectively unreasonable. . . . Here, the right of a criminal suspect 'not to be shot unless he [is] perceived to pose a threat to pursuing officers or to others' has been established since at least 1988. . . . In short: there is, perhaps, a version of events in which it was reasonable for Myers and Potratz to have shot at Graves. But where the question of qualified immunity depends on which version of events one accepts, it is the jury's province, not ours, to decide the truth. . . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Graves, Myers and Potratz applied lethal force against a suspect from whom they perceived no serious physical threat. Those actions violate clearly established law. . . . We have clearly established the straightforward proposition of law that it is objectively 'unreasonable to tase a nonresisting suspect.'. . The dissent suggests that this principle is defined at too high a level of generality. But, as the Supreme Court has repeatedly explained, 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning to officers.'. . Here, our precedent provides a simple decisional rule: every reasonable law enforcement officer in our circuit knows that to deploy a taser against a non-resisting suspect is excessive. That the rule is straightforward makes it more capable of giving fair and clear warning to officers, not less. It is also objectively unreasonable to use a taser against a suspect who previously resisted arrest but was, at the time the taser was deployed, incapacitated. . . . The dissent identifies a limited exception to this rule where the uncontested facts establish that an officer deployed a taser against a suspect who was not resisting at the moment, but had been resisting immediately prior, and—but for the use of a taser—was expected to continue resisting in a manner that would have justified the later use of lethal force. . . Under such circumstances, we have concluded than an officer is entitled to qualified immunity because the actions 'were intended to avoid having to resort to lethal force.'. . The record does not support the application of this exception here for at least two reasons because lethal force had already been applied against Graves—twice—at the time Hedger deployed his taser and it is a genuine dispute of material fact whether it was reasonable to perceive Graves as posing a continued threat. . . .Hedger conceded that he would likely have been in shock had he sustained the injuries that Graves had just sustained. A reasonable jury could therefore conclude that, whatever threat Graves had ever arguably posed to the officers, it had abated during the seven-second span in which he was bloodied and nonresponsive. And if a jury so-concluded, the law of this circuit clearly would prohibit Hedger's use of a taser.")

Graves v. Malone, 810 F. App'x 414, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Larsen, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("In qualified immunity cases, our ultimate inquiry is not whether the officers in question acted reasonably; it is instead whether existing law established 'beyond debate' that they acted unreasonably. . . And although we must construe the facts in the light most favorable to Graves, the objective reasonableness of the officers' actions is 'a pure question of law' that is for the court to decide, not a jury. Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 381 n.8 (2007). Applying these principles, I agree with the majority that Hedger is entitled to qualified immunity for Graves' claims that he is liable for supervising an unconstitutional use of force and failure to protect. I disagree, however, with the majority opinion's denial of qualified immunity to the three officers for their uses of force. Even under the version of the facts most favorable to Graves, it is clear that Myers and Potratz perceived that Graves was brandishing a dangerous weapon when he was only six to eight feet away from Myers. No existing precedent establishes that the use of lethal force under these circumstances is excessive; they are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Hedger is also entitled to qualified immunity for his use of a taser. In his case, not only is there no controlling authority that 'squarely governs the specific facts at issue,'. . . but binding circuit precedent affirmatively establishes that an officer who uses a taser—and even lethal force—in analogous circumstances is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The majority identifies no case where we have held, on similar facts, that an officer's belief that a suspect was holding a gun was unreasonable. This is no surprise, because we have never expected officers to adhere to such an exacting standard for distinguishing guns from objects that merely look like guns within a fraction of a second. . . .[E]ven construing the facts in the light most favorable to Graves, it is 'at least arguable,'. . . that an officer in Myers' position would have reason to believe that Graves posed an imminent threat to his life and safety. I would therefore hold that he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As with Myers, the majority identifies no case where we have similarly second-guessed the reasonableness of an officer's belief that a suspect was brandishing a dangerous weapon. . . . Because it is at least debatable that Potratz had reason to believe Graves was brandishing a dangerous weapon, he is entitled to qualified immunity. Myers was only six to eight feet away from Graves at the moment Graves sought to scare the officers off by lifting up the knife handle. Even though Graves would have had to get up out of the bathtub to reach Myers, it would not violate clearly established law for Potratz to conclude that Graves posed an imminent threat to Myers' safety. 'There is no rule that officers must wait until a suspect is literally within striking range, risking their own and others' lives, before resorting to deadly force.'. . . Russo holds that an officer is entitled to qualified immunity when he uses nonlethal force in an effort to deescalate a situation where seconds prior he reasonably believed a suspect posed a lethal threat, even if, in hindsight, the suspect no longer posed a threat. . . .As shown above, when Hedger heard the gunshots, he had reason to believe that Graves posed an imminent, mortal threat to the officers under his command, which would have made the use of lethal force in response proportionate. Since we do not judge officers' actions 'with the 20/20 vision of hindsight,'. . . that justification for lethal force did not disappear in the moments between when Hedger heard the gunshots and when he tasered Graves. We have held that '[w]ithin a few seconds of reasonably perceiving a sufficient danger, officers may use deadly force even if in hindsight the facts show that the persons threatened could have escaped unharmed.'. . . It follows a fortiori that Hedger's use of nonlethal force seven seconds after he heard gunshots was not excessive under clearly established law. The majority does not even attempt to grapple with these precedents. The majority reaches a contrary conclusion only by 'defin[ing] clearly established law at a high level of generality,' which the Supreme Court 'has repeatedly told courts ... not to' do. . . The majority cites caselaw for the proposition that an officer may not taser an unresisting suspect or a suspect who, although formerly resisting arrest, is now incapacitated. But the majority makes no effort to analogize Hedger's use of a taser to the facts of any prior precedent. 'That is a problem' because, outside of 'the rare obvious case,' we must 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . The majority protests that 'every reasonable law enforcement officer in our circuit knows that to deploy a taser against a non-resisting suspect is excessive,' . . . but that is simply begging the question. In many cases, whether a suspect qualifies as 'non-resisting' will not be obvious, hence the need to find a case establishing 'the violative nature of [the] particular conduct' at issue. . . Here, Hedger on the one hand could see that Graves had been shot and was seriously injured and possibly in shock. On the other hand, he also had reason to believe that Graves had shot at Myers just a few seconds prior, still had a gun on his person, and was possibly still capable of firing it. Whether, under such circumstances, Graves qualified as no longer resisting is at least debatable, so in the absence of a case finding a constitutional violation under similar circumstances, Hedger must be granted qualified immunity. None of the cases on which the majority relies squarely governs the facts of Hedger's use of a taser. . . . Hedger. . . had no time to step back and consider whether the threat had abated. The specific principle that we do not second guess officers' nonlethal use of force when they had reasonably perceived a threat a few seconds prior must prevail over the general principle that an officer may not taser a non-resisting suspect. . . .Our precedents show that Hedger's use of the taser did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. Accordingly, I would hold that Hedger is entitled to qualified immunity.") Howse v. Hodous, 953 F.3d 402, 406-07 & n.1 (6th Cir. 2020), rehearing en banc denied, 960 F.3d 905 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1515 (2021) ("We begin our analysis with the second prong—by asking whether the unlawfulness of the officers' conduct was clearly established at the time they approached and arrested Howse. . . 'Clearly established' means that the law is so clear at the time of the incident that every reasonable officer would understand the unlawfulness of his conduct. . . That's a deferential rule. And for good reason: officers often find themselves in positions where they must make split-second decisions in dangerous situations. In those crucial seconds, officers don't have the time to pull out law books and analyze the fine points of judicial precedent. To avoid 'paralysis by analysis,' qualified immunity protects all but plainly incompetent officers or those who knowingly violate the law. . . With all this in mind, we consider Howse's claim. Howse argues that the officers violated his clearly established right to be free from 'unreasonable government intrusions.'. . But that frames the 'clearly established' test at too high a level of generality. The law must be specific enough to put a reasonable officer on clear notice that his conduct is unlawful. . . The right to be free from 'unreasonable government intrusions' is much too vague to do that. Instead, we must examine the particular situation that Hodous and Middaugh confronted and ask whether the law clearly established that their conduct was unlawful. To answer this question, we must ask whether every reasonable officer would know that law enforcement cannot tackle someone who disobeyed an order and then use additional force if they resist being handcuffed. Importantly, this question asks about the lawfulness of conduct under the Fourth Amendment. And in that context, the Supreme Court has stressed 'the need to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances' was found 'to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . Without such a case, the plaintiff will almost always lose. . . .Because the alleged unlawfulness of the officers' conduct wasn't clearly established, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.[1] [fn. 1: The dissent concludes otherwise after it frames the question as follows: 'whether it violates a clearly established constitutional right for an officer to throw a person to the ground in order to arrest that person without probable cause.'. . Of course, it's true that an officer cannot arrest someone without probable cause. But it's also true that an officer doesn't need probable cause to stop someone—reasonable suspicion is enough. . . Thus, the level of justification depends on whether the officer is carrying out a stop or an arrest. . . The mere act of handcuffing someone doesn't transform a stop into an arrest. That's because an officer may temporarily handcuff someone during a Terry stop 'so long as the circumstances warrant that precaution.'. . So it isn't obvious that the officers were effectuating an arrest (rather than an investigatory stop) when they tackled and handcuffed Howse. Acknowledging this point, the dissent cites Centanni v. Eight Unknown Officers, 15 F.3d 587, 591 (6th Cir. 1994) to show that the officers arrested Howse when they initially threw him to the ground. But Centanni cuts against the dissent's conclusion. That's because Centanni says that an arrest generally doesn't occur until the officers physically remove the suspect from the scene. . . Of course, the officers hadn't removed Howse from the scene when they initially threw him down. So that would mean the officers didn't need probable cause until they removed him from his home and took him to the station. Even if we assume the officers carried out an arrest unsupported by probable cause, that doesn't change the outcome here. Howse still needs a case putting the officers on clear notice that their use of force was excessive. And we still aren't aware of one.]")

Howse v. Hodous, 953 F.3d 406, 414 (6th Cir. 2020) (Cole, C.J., dissenting in part), rehearing en banc denied, 960 F.3d 905 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1515 (2021) ("The majority asks, 'whether every reasonable officer would know that law enforcement cannot tackle someone who disobeyed an order and then use additional force if they resist being handcuffed.'. . We should instead be asking whether it violates a clearly established constitutional right for an officer to throw a person to the ground in order to arrest. . . that person without probable cause. I conclude that the answer to that question is yes[.] . .Accordingly, I would deny Middaugh qualified immunity")

Siefert v. Hamilton County, 951 F.3d 753, 764-65 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 896 (2020) ("[R]eading the complaint in the light most favorable to the Sieferts, they have alleged a plausible claim that Defendants interfered with their parental rights and they received no process. . . . [I]t must be clear that Defendants' actions in this particular circumstance—as alleged in the complaint—violated the Sieferts' due process rights. Plausibly, they did. In case after case, the Supreme Court has emphasized the parent-child relationship's special place in our society. . . The right's importance means that '[e]ven a temporary deprivation of physical custody requires a hearing within a reasonable time.'. . . In short, when Minor Siefert was hospitalized, 'existing precedent ... placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . At least, that is, according to the complaint. Defendants argue that the Sieferts cannot overcome qualified immunity because no case says that parents deserve due process when they voluntarily hospitalize their child, the state investigates allegations of abuse, and the parents consent to the ongoing hospitalization. But characterizing the case this way puts the cart before the horse. The complaint does not establish the depth of abuse allegations or that the Sieferts consented to Minor Siefert's ongoing hospitalization. The complaint says the Sieferts routinely demanded that Minor Siefert be discharged. And the complaint alleges that the Sieferts' insurance company had a psychiatrist determine that Minor Siefert was no harm to anyone and was medically stable. We REVERSE the district court's holding that the Sieferts failed to adequately plead a violation of their procedural due process rights.")

Nelson v. City of Battle Creek, 802 F. App'x 983, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("We must . . . inquire whether, as of November 16, 2013, it was clearly established that it was unconstitutional for an officer to shoot when, over the span of two seconds, someone pulls what appears to be a gun, drops it, and raises his hands after being given a warning. We hold it was not. Rivera reasonably perceived a threat of serious physical harm when he saw N.K. reach for and grab what looked like a real gun. It was not objectively unreasonable for Rivera to decide to shoot N.K. as he saw N.K. grip and raise his gun, even if the bullet ultimately struck N.K. after he had dropped the gun. Neither the district court nor Nelson identified any case law where an officer under sufficiently similar circumstances was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment. The district court instead relied on what it perceived as 'sufficient factual disputes' as to the reasonableness of Rivera's conduct. . . The dissent similarly says the evidence is 'equivocal' as to whether Rivera shot N.K. while N.K threw away his gun or after doing so. . . To the extent any facts are disputed, however, these disputes do not deprive Rivera of qualified immunity. The dissent highlights testimony from N.K. and his friend suggesting that Rivera shot N.K. after he had already thrown away his gun. But these observations about when N.K. was struck—which Rivera concedes was after N.K. threw his gun away—do not create a dispute of fact as to when Rivera decided to shoot. Rivera claims he decided to shoot when he saw N.K. grab and raise the gun. Nelson fails to dispute this fact because N.K. and other witnesses cannot speak to Rivera's decision-making or his perception of harm in the two-second span the events unfolded. Even assuming that N.K. dropped the gun—and was raising his hands—before Rivera shot him, this does not alter our analysis. 'What matters is the reasonableness of the officers' belief,' and '[t]he fact that [N.K.] was actually unarmed when he was shot is irrelevant to the reasonableness inquiry in this case.'. . Although 'hindsight reveals that [N.K.] was no longer a threat when he was shot, we do not think it is prudent to deny police officers qualified immunity in situations where they are faced with a threat of severe physical injury or death and must make split-second decisions.'. . Indeed, the Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit have repeatedly said that an officer's employment of deadly force in split-second decisions when faced with a threat of serious injury or death should not be questioned. . . . Thus, Nelson has not met her burden to demonstrate that the contours of N.K.'s right were sufficiently defined such that 'every reasonable official' in Rivera's shoes would understand that using deadly force would violate N.K.'s constitutional rights. . . . The case before us is not an 'obvious case' such that, under the general principles of Garner, Graham, and Robinson, a reasonable officer would be aware that shooting N.K. violated his clearly established constitutional rights.")

Nelson v. City of Battle Creek, 802 F. App'x 983, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Moore, J., dissenting) ("It should go without saying that reasonable police officers do not shoot disarmed young boys with upraised hands. But because the majority misconstrues both the factual record and our circuit precedent to condone that result here, I must respectfully dissent. I would affirm the district court and allow this case to proceed to trial. . . . Fairly read, the parties' deposition testimony is equivocal as to whether Rivera shot N.K. while N.K. was throwing down his gun and raising his hands or after N.K. had taken those two actions. . . . All told, although a reasonable jury could accept Rivera's narrative (that he shot N.K. while N.K. was pulling a realistic-looking toy gun out of his pants), it could alternatively accept N.K.'s narrative (that Rivera shot him after he had thrown his gun to the ground and begun raising his hands). And so, for purposes of this appeal, we must accept N.K.'s narrative as true and assume that Rivera shot N.K. under the latter circumstances. Given these facts, the relevant legal question is whether, as of November 16, 2013, our case law put Rivera on fair notice that it is unconstitutional for a police officer to shoot an armed individual after that individual has thrown their weapon to the ground and begun raising their hands, in compliance with officer commands. It did. . . . [T]he majority attempts to sidestep Bletz's general holding by adjusting the 'clearly established law' lens to a microscopic level. . . But this mode of analysis runs afoul of our precedent cautioning panels against being too particular in defining 'clearly established' law. . . To survive qualified immunity a plaintiff need only point to a 'reasonably particularized' constitutional right that the government allegedly violated. . . The Fourth Amendment rule laid out in Bletz meets that 'middle ground' standard. . . . [I]f the jury agrees with N.K.'s version of events, Rivera shot 14-year-old N.K. after he put down his weapon and raised his hands, which would suggest that Rivera did not face a life-or-death decision at the moment he pulled the trigger. . . For these reasons, I respectfully dissent. This case belongs in front of a jury.")

Barton v. Martin, 949 F.3d 938, 949-52, 954-55 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Without additional evidence of a threat against the police or bystanders, a report of an armed suspect inside his home does not justify warrantless entry. . . . As the police must have more than just a shots-fired report to justify warrantless entry into one's home, Vann's belief that Barton had shot at a stray cat did not indicate '"real immediate and serious consequences" that would certainly occur were a police officer to "postpone action to get a warrant."'. . Evidence that someone has shot at a stray cat does not indicate willingness to shoot at a human being, and there was no indication that Barton was shooting at strays inside his home; thus, Vann's belief that there was an exigency that precluded procuring a warrant before entering Barton's home was unreasonable. Taking all inferences in Barton's favor, a reasonable jury could therefore find that Vann's warrantless entry into Barton's home violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches. Moreover, it was clearly established that warrantless entry into a home without an exception to the warrant requirement violated clearly established law. . . .Therefore, Vann is not entitled to qualified immunity on the unlawful entry claim. . . . Here, taking all factual inferences in favor of Barton and viewing the information possessed by Vann at the time of the arrest, a reasonable jury could find that Vann lacked probable cause to arrest Barton for animal cruelty under Michigan law. . . . More specifically, it was clearly established that a non-eyewitness neighbor's call reporting criminal activity without further corroborating information does not provide probable cause for an arrest. . . . We therefore reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment on the basis that Vann is not entitled to qualified immunity on the wrongful arrest claim. . . . Looking to the facts and circumstances of the present case, Barton has presented sufficient evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Vann's use of force was reasonable. 'A reviewing court analyzes the subject event in segments when assessing the reasonableness of a police officer's actions.'. . Thus, we make separate qualified immunity determinations for each of the two grounds offered by Barton for excessive force: (1) Vann's picking up Barton and slamming him against the kitchen cupboard and wrenching his arms behind his back to handcuff him; and (2) Vann's throwing Barton down the front porch steps while he was handcuffed. Vann is not entitled to qualified immunity on either excessive force claim. . . .The right to be free from excessive force was clearly established in 2014. The Supreme Court has held that use of force that is not objectively reasonable violates the Fourth Amendment. . . A compliant, non-threatening individual's right to be free from excessive force during arrest was also clearly established in this circuit. . . The facts here do not present one of the hazy cases where an officer should be entitled to qualified immunity for making an objectively reasonable mistake as to the amount of force that was necessary. Vann's use of force occurred after he saw that Barton was unarmed, non-threatening, and compliant. We conclude that no reasonable officer would find that the circumstances surrounding the arrest of Barton required the level of force used here. . . .Vann was on notice that his conduct was a violation of Barton's constitutional right to be free from excessive use of force as it was obvious that Vann could not shove a handcuffed detainee off a front porch about three feet off the ground when there was no threat to the safety of the officers or others. Accordingly, Vann is not entitled to qualified immunity on Barton's excessive force claims.")

Estate of Barnwell v. Grigsby, 801 F. App'x 354, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("As the district court noted in its order denying reconsideration and as Gilmore herself recognizes in her brief, the defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity turns on whether they restrained Barnwell in order to punish or incarcerate him or in order to assist the paramedics in their provision of emergency medical care. This is because 'whether the [defendants are] entitled to qualified immunity depends on whether they acted in a law-enforcement capacity or in an emergency-medical-response capacity when engaging in the conduct that' was allegedly violative of Barnwell's constitutional rights. . . And there is no clearly established right to be free from unintentional, invasive medical care provided by a defendant-officer acting in an emergency-medical-response capacity. . . .Here, . . . the evidence clearly indicates that the defendants' conduct served a medical-emergency function, rather than a law-enforcement function. The paramedics requested that Stooksbury and Grigsby place Barnwell in handcuffs so that they could better treat Barnwell. . . . In our analysis of the defendants' conduct pertaining to the restraint of Barnwell, there is no evidence or facts indicating that they acted in a law-enforcement role or with a punitive purpose, and Gilmore's mere speculation is insufficient to create a genuine dispute and withstand summary judgment. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Gilmore and drawing reasonable inferences in her favor, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court's decision to grant summary judgment was proper.")

Korthals v. County of Huron, 797 F. App'x 967, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("The determinative question becomes whether th[e] right was 'clearly established,' so as to overcome qualified immunity. . . There are two aspects to qualified immunity's 'clearly established' element that the district court overlooked or misunderstood. The first is that, 'to determine if the law is clearly established ... , we look principally to the law of this circuit and to the Supreme Court.'. . The district court relied on a single case from the District of Massachusetts. As a general principle, it is doubtful that decisions from out-of-circuit district courts carry such authority. . . But even assuming that decisions from such other courts can provide 'clearly established law,' we have explained that, to do so, such 'decisions must both [1] point unmistakably to the unconstitutionality of the conduct complained of and [2] be so clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable [official] that his conduct, if challenged on constitutional grounds, would be found wanting.'. . The second noteworthy aspect is that '[c]learly established law is not defined at a high level of generality but must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . . Korthals's contention is that Deputy Strozeski violated her constitutional right to be protected from a substantial risk of serious harm because he failed to walk behind or alongside her, failed to watch her carefully for a stumble or fall, and failed to hold her or provide physical support when she attempted to mount the stairs, drunk and physically wobbly. 'The dispositive inquiry ... is whether the violative nature of [that] particular conduct [wa]s clearly established.'. . Korthals has pointed us to no clearly established precedent from the Supreme Court or this Circuit to support that contention, and the cited out-of-circuit district court case (Carroll) does not qualify as clearly established law. Even if Deputy Strozeski's failure to exercise caution when taking the drunken and handcuffed Korthals up the stairs were not merely negligent, but deliberately indifferent, such that it rose to the level of a constitutional violation, we cannot conclude that the constitutional impropriety of that particular conduct was clearly established.")

Korthals v. County of Huron, 797 F. App'x 967, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (White, J., concurring) ("As to the question of qualified immunity, I agree that Deputy Strozeski's conduct, while surely negligent, likely did not rise to the level of conscious disregard of a substantial risk of serious harm. And I agree that even assuming it did, Korthals has not shown that Strozeski's actions violated her clearly established constitutional rights. I do not agree, however, with my colleagues' characterization of Korthals's asserted constitutional right as a 'right to be closely guided, intently watched, and physically supported when walked from the car to booking, drunk and physically wobbly,'. . . because precedent does not require a plaintiff to define her constitutional right so exactly. Although '[a] plaintiff can meet [her] burden ... by presenting caselaw "with a fact pattern similar enough to have given 'fair and clear warning to officers' about what the law requires," [t]hat case "need not be on all fours" with the instant fact pattern to form the basis of a clearly established right.'")

Hudson v. City of Highland Park, Michigan, 943 F.3d 792, 798 (6th Cir. 2019) In qualified immunity cases like this one, we also ask whether the claimant (1) established a constitutional violation (2) that was clearly established. Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 227, 129 S.Ct. 808, 172 L.Ed.2d 565 (2009). In this case, only one question matters. We have repeatedly held—we have repeatedly clearly established—that employers may not retaliate against employees based on their protected speech. Buddenberg v. Weisdack, 939 F.3d 732, 741 (6th Cir. 2019); Chappel v. Montgomery Cty. Fire Prot. Dist. No. 1, 131 F.3d 564, 579–80 (6th Cir. 1997). All that concerns us today is the constitutional question.")

Dolbin v. Miller, 786 F. App'x 52, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("Dolbin confuses the two issues presented in this case. The district court considered both whether Officers Whelan and Miller actually had probable cause and whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because they had the reasonable but mistaken belief that they had probable cause. . . In District of Columbia v. Wesby, for example, the Supreme Court recently considered both whether police officers responding to complaints of loud music at a vacant home had probable cause and whether they were entitled to qualified immunity because they 'reasonably but mistakenly conclude[d] that probable cause [wa]s present.'. .Here, although the district court found a genuine issue of fact material to the former issue, . . . it is squarely within this court's jurisdiction to consider the legal issue of whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity based on their reasonable, but mistaken, belief that they had probable cause. . . As recently as this past term, the Supreme Court 'stressed the need to "identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment,"' to deny an officer qualified immunity. . . Dolbin cannot identify a single controlling precedent finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar enough circumstances to put the question beyond doubt. That failure is fatal to his attempts to defeat qualified immunity. . . . In this case, it was no doubt difficult for Officers Whelan and Miller to determine how best to proceed. Presented with a report from his own daughter that he was actively suicidal, his admission that he had made a statement that indicated he was experiencing active suicidal ideation, and arrest instructions from his supervisor, we cannot conclude that it would be clear to a reasonable officer that transporting Dolbin for a mental health evaluation violated a clearly established constitutional right. We thus reverse the district court's decision and hold that the officers are protected by qualified immunity.")

Rudolph v. Babinec, 939 F.3d 742, 747-48, 750-51 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Although the officers had a reason to show up at Rudolph's door for a wellness check, a jury could reasonably find that the officers lacked probable cause when they executed this mental-health seizure. . . . A review of the facts provides a basis for the officers to have arrived at Rudolph's house to check on her. Upon arrival, however, the totality of the circumstances 'would have caused a reasonable officer to question the veracity of the attempted suicide report.' Fisher, 398 F.3d at 843. Or at least a jury could see this case that way, and consequently a jury reasonably could determine that the officers lacked probable cause. . . .Although qualified immunity grants officers leeway for mistakes on probable-cause determinations, based on the facts of this case, the probable-cause question is better left to the jury. . . . The officers propose a bright line rule: ten minutes of handcuffing is not long enough for excessive force. And in a prior case, albeit unpublished, we noted that simply complaining during a ten-minute car ride was not enough to state a claim. Fettes v. Hendershot, 375 F. App'x 528, 533–34 (6th Cir. 2010). But Fettes did not set a bright-line rule. Instead, it noted that during a short trip, where officers adhere to police protocol and act reasonably, they cannot be held liable. . . Conduct, not time, is the measurement of a violation. To see why, imagine that someone was handcuffed so tightly that she was bleeding from her wrists and screaming in pain while an officer ignored the complaint. The law would not require us to ignore that excessive force claim because the bleeding went on for ten minutes instead of eleven. Rather than specific time limits, what matters in an excessive force claim is whether the Miller requirements—complaint, ignoring of complaint, and injury—are met, and whether the officers acted reasonably in the circumstances.")

Rudolph v. Babinec, 939 F.3d 742, 753-56 (6th Cir. 2019) (Thapar, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("To get the right answer, we must ask the right question. For qualified immunity, the right question is not whether Officers Babinec and Atkinson took the best possible course of action when they brought Leticia Rudolph to the hospital for a mental health evaluation. The right question is not even whether they were correct to fear that Rudolph might harm herself. Instead, the right question is whether the officers were 'plainly incompetent' in fearing that Rudolph might harm herself. . . They were not. . . .Given the information known to the officers—that Rudolph's gun had been confiscated, that her own son was concerned, and that her ex-husband told the officers that Rudolph might harm herself—the officers were not plainly incompetent to err on the side of caution. . . . Courts must remember that law enforcement officers must protect the public in an uncertain and dangerous world, not the cold crucible of the courtroom. . . In that world, officers don't have time to debate whether the emergency in front of them falls 'more on [one] side of the line' of precedent than another. . . Indeed, the specificity requirement of qualified immunity protects officers from this very paralysis by analysis. As the Supreme Court repeatedly reminds us, '[a] rule is too general if the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct does not follow immediately.'. . In short, the rule must 'obviously resolve whether the circumstances ... constitute[d] probable cause.'. . The majority's 'which side of the line rule' simply does not. . . . I fear we have placed officers in an untenable catch-22. No doubt, if the officers here had failed to act and were wrong, they would have faced significant criticism and personal guilt. Maybe even legal consequences. Qualified immunity does not enforce a regime of 'damned if they do, damned if they don't.' Just the opposite. It protects reasonable but mistaken judgment calls made in extremely difficult situations. Because the officers could have reasonably believed that they had probable cause for a mental health seizure under these facts, they should receive qualified immunity. Thus, I respectfully dissent from the denial of qualified immunity for the mental health seizure and concur on all other issues.")

Buddenberg v. Weisdack, 939 F.3d 732, 741-42 (6th Cir. 2019) ("We have long recognized that a public employer may not retaliate against an employee for her exercise of constitutionally protected speech. . . Buddenberg's right to report public corruption, unethical conduct, and sex-based discrimination within her workplace was clearly established. Budzik is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity at this phase of the litigation.")

Richards v. City of Jackson, Michigan, 788 F. App'x 324, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("In determining whether the district court erred in denying Peters qualified immunity for shooting Kane, we begin with the question of whether the right at issue was clearly established on November 28, 2014, and then address whether the plaintiffs have presented a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Peters's seizure of Kane violated the Fourth Amendment. . . .Despite this court's holding in Brown, Peters argues that the right at issue was not clearly established for two reasons, neither of which is convincing. First, Peters argued that Brown was issued in 2016, which is later-in-time than the conduct at issue and therefore cannot suffice to clearly establish the law. This argument misreads Brown, where we unequivocally stated that the 'constitutional right under the Fourth Amendment to not have one's dog unreasonably seized ... was clearly established in 2013.'. . Because the right was clearly established in 2013, it was also clearly established when Peters shot Kane on November 28, 2014. Second, Peters argues that he could not have been expected to anticipate our recognition in Smith v. City of Detroit, 751 F. App'x 691, 692 (6th Cir. 2018) that unlicensed dogs are property under the Fourth Amendment. Had Peters argued that he shot Kane because he believed Kane was unlicensed and that Harris and Richards had no property interest in an unlicensed dog, this argument might have some force. But Peters gives no indication that he knew or even considered whether Kane was unlicensed at the time of the shooting. . .Thus, Peters's ability to anticipate this court's ruling in Smith has no bearing on whether Peters should reasonably have known that his actions were unconstitutional.")

McGrew v. Duncan, 937 F.3d 664, 668 (6th Cir. 2019) ("The officers do not dispute that McGrew complained and that they did not loosen the handcuffs. So whether they are entitled to qualified immunity turns on whether McGrew suffered an injury and whether the right she claims they violated was clearly established when they acted. On these two points, the officers present essentially the same argument: bruising is not enough. They contend that '[h]andcuffing that results in bruising does not violate any clearly established constitutional right and '[t]here was no manifest evidence of a clear physical injury.' This argument is without merit. In Morrison, we held that 'allegations of bruising and wrist marks create a genuine issue of material fact' on whether a plaintiff has suffered a physical injury. . . Thus, under Morrison, bruising is enough. That means McGrew has created a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the officers violated her right to be free from excessively tight handcuffing that causes physical injury. Further, because we decided Morrison before the events in this case, McGrew's right was clearly established at the time defendants acted. Thus, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on this variant of McGrew's excessive-force claim.")

J. Endres v. Northeast Ohio Medical University Board of Trustees, 938 F.3d 281, 301-02 (6th Cir. 2019) ("When a university student faces a serious sanction like dismissal over allegations of disciplinary misconduct, he is entitled to a 'fundamentally fair hearing.'. . Endres received a hearing. But his allegations, which we must take as true at this stage, reveal that hearing was far from fair. For one, the student has a 'right to be present for all significant portions of the hearing,' provided the hearing is live. . . And even when the hearing is not live, the university must 'provide the accused with the opportunity to "respond, explain, and defend."'. . Endres, however, alleges he was not allowed in the room while Emerick presented her case to the CAPP panels. That alone establishes a due process violation, but Endres's allegations do not end there. Doe also says that the university must provide the student with 'an explanation of the evidence' against him, but Endres's allegations show that NEOMED repeatedly failed on this front. . . .Endres has alleged more than enough to establish a due process violation, but that does not end the matter. Because Emerick has claimed qualified immunity, Endres must also show that the constitutional rights Emerick violated were clearly established when the violation occurred. . . . Emerick alleges that the law defining Endres's due process rights was not clearly established, and on this front, she is correct. To be sure, the Supreme Court's decisions in Goss and Horowitz make clear that a student facing a serious sanction for disciplinary misconduct is entitled to a fair hearing, but neither those cases nor our own decisions have articulated a bright-line rule to distinguish academic from disciplinary matters. Moreover, clearly established law 'must be "particularized" to the facts of the case,' yet no case from the Supreme Court or this court has held that cheating is a disciplinary matter warranting more robust procedures under the Due Process Clause. . . And because no precedent clearly established that Endres was even entitled to a hearing, it follows that his right to be present at the hearing and to hear the evidence against him was not clearly established, either. We therefore hold that Emerick is entitled to qualified immunity. We note, however, that qualified immunity '"only immunizes defendants from monetary damages"—not injunctive or declaratory relief.'. . Thus, our ruling shields Emerick from monetary damages. But the qualified immunity doctrine does not preclude Endres from continuing to pursue the injunctive and declaratory relief that he has also requested in his § 1983 claim.")

Ermold v. Davis, 936 F.3d 429, 436-37 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Here, Obergefell both recognized the right to same-sex marriage and defined its contours. . . .For a reasonable official, Obergefell left no uncertainty. For Davis, however, the message apparently didn't get through. And it still doesn't appear to have gotten through: She now argues that Obergefell doesn't even apply to her conduct. Because she stopped issuing licenses to all couples regardless of their sexual orientation, she claims, she 'obviate[ed] any equal protection issue.' That might be so, but the right to marry also arises from the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . . Davis further contends that Obergefell doesn't apply for another reason: Obergefell involved a total ban on same-sex marriage, but here plaintiffs could've obtained marriage licenses elsewhere in Kentucky. She also presents two other arguments with similar thrusts: (1) The relevant inquiry is whether Kentucky violated plaintiffs' right to marry, not whether she violated it, and (2) Obergefell didn't clearly establish a right to demand marriage licenses from particular state officials. The common denominator is a claim that we should focus broadly on Kentucky instead of narrowly on Davis. Yet Davis provides no legal authority for that proposition. We can find none. And we know why: that's not how qualified immunity works, and that's not how constitutional rights work. Qualified immunity protects government officials from lawsuits against them in their individual capacities. . . The focus of the analysis, then, is on what the law requires of them individually. And nowhere in the Constitution—or in constitutional law, for that matter—does it say that a government official may infringe constitutional rights so long as another official might not have. All government officials must respect all constitutional rights. And that means Obergefell's holding applies not just to monolithic governmental entities like Kentucky but to the officials acting for those entities as well. . . . In the presence of Obergefell's clear mandate that 'same-sex couples may exercise the fundamental right to marry,'. . . and in the absence of any legal authority to support her novel interpretation of Kentucky law, Davis should have known that Obergefell required her to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples—even if she sought and eventually received an accommodation, whether by legislative amendment changing the marriage-license form or by judicial decree adopting her view of the interplay between the Constitution and Kentucky law. In short, plaintiffs pleaded a violation of their right to marry: a right the Supreme Court clearly established in Obergefell. The district court therefore correctly denied qualified immunity to Davis.")

See also Ermold v. Davis, No. CV 15-46-DLB-EBA, 2022 WL 830606, at *3 (E.D. Ky. Mar. 18, 2022) ("Defendant Davis once again uses arguments recycled from her Motion to Dismiss briefing to argue that she is entitled to qualified immunity in her personal capacity. . . Again, this Court finds that Davis is not entitled to qualified immunity. Although this Court, and the Sixth Circuit, explained this analysis ad nauseum in its previous orders, it will briefly address this issue. . . . It is readily apparent that Obergefell recognizes Plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment right to marry. It is also readily apparent that Davis made a conscious decision to violate Plaintiffs' right. Both the Ermold and Yates Plaintiffs sought marriage licenses from either Defendant Davis or the deputy clerks who were acting in conformance with the policy instituted by Davis—a policy directing deputy clerks to refuse to issue marriage licenses in the wake of Obergefell. . . . The explicit holding in Obergefell was that states could not exclude same-sex couples from civil marriage. The logical next step is clear. Davis, an elected county official who was tasked by her constituents to manage marriage licensing in Rowan County, could not exclude same-sex couples from civil marriage. . . . Davis. . . argues that her conduct was 'objectively reasonable' and '[q]ualified immunity allows for mistaken judgments and balancing reasonable uncertainties.'. . . Davis did not make a mistake. Rather, she knowingly violated the law. . . . Any argument that Davis made a mistake, instead of a conscious decision to violate the law, is not only contrary to the record, but also borders on incredulous . . . . Ultimately, the qualified immunity inquiry involves a determination of whether Plaintiffs' constitutional rights were violated, not whether Davis's actions should be excused by her claim to religious freedom. The question is simple—did Davis knowingly violate the law? The answer here is clear—yes. Davis is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Butler v. City of Detroit, Michigan, 936 F.3d 410, 425 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Butler—that he was fully cooperative and yet was gratuitously 'slammed' into the wall—Meadows has no claim to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation. Assaulting an unarmed and compliant individual has been a clearly established violation of the Fourth Amendment for decades. . . And the Constitution says nothing about free passes for just 'one shove against the wall,' even during drug raids.")

Coffey v. Carroll, 933 F.3d 577, 587 (6th Cir. 2019) ("That Coffey was suspected of committing only a misdemeanor raises the bar for law enforcement, erecting a 'double presumption' against warrantless entry, one, that a warrant is ordinarily necessary, and two, that a misdemeanor offense is not serious enough to justify an otherwise unreasonable search. . . . This 'double presumption' is well settled. Indeed, six years ago we observed that the 'double presumption' had been clearly established by the Supreme Court for more than 25 years. . . By the time the officers entered Coffey's home then, the relevant law had been clearly established for more than three decades, contrary to the officers' contention. To sum up, the officers did not have a warrant to enter Coffey's home, there were no exigent circumstances identified by the officers justifying their entrance, and there is an issue of material fact as to whether David Coffey gave the officers consent to enter. If the issues of fact are ultimately resolved in Coffey's favor, the officers violated the clearly established constitutional prohibition against unlawful entry. Thus, the district court correctly denied summary judgment to the officers on Coffey's unlawful-entry claim.")

Coffey v. Carroll, 933 F.3d 577, 589 (6th Cir. 2019) ("A suspect has a clearly established constitutional right to be free from the use of physical force by police officers when he is not resisting efforts to apprehend him. . . Drawing the line at a suspect's active resistance defines the right at a level of particularity appropriate for a claim pursued under § 1983. . .Measured against this legal backdrop, Coffey's claim survives the officers' qualified immunity defense. He has articulated a specific, precise, and established constitutional right to be free from excessive force.

Accordingly, the district court did not err in denying the officers qualified immunity and summary judgment on this claim.")

Coffey v. Carroll, 933 F.3d 577, 590-91 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Given the nature of Coffey's malicious-prosecution claim, our decision in Sykes v. Anderson, 625 F.3d 294 (6th Cir. 2010), is instructive. We held there that an officer can influence or participate in the decision to prosecute a defendant when the officer testifies at a preliminary hearing in which the decision was made to bind over the defendant. . . In view of this precedential backdrop, we cannot say the district court erred in concluding that Coffey had submitted sufficient evidence from which a jury could conclude that Officers Carroll and Pranger violated Coffey's Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution. As the two officers testified at the preliminary hearing, a jury reasonably could conclude that the officers influenced or participated in the decision to prosecute Coffey. And viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Coffey, there is an issue of material fact as to whether the officers' testimony was false. . . . We likewise agree with the district court regarding the existence of a right to be free from malicious prosecution. While clearly established, the right is a narrow one. . . . Providing false testimony (both written and oral), as alleged here, could have resulted in Coffey's arrest and prosecution without probable cause. Reading the facts in the light most favorable to Coffey, a reasonable jury could conclude that Officers Carroll and Pranger deliberately provided untrue testimony at the preliminary hearing, which resulted in the court finding probable cause to continue legal proceedings against Coffey. Accordingly, the district court did not err in denying the two officers' motion for summary judgment on Coffey's malicious-prosecution claim.")

Fineout v. Kostanko, 780 F. App'x 317, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("Recognizing that police entered plaintiffs' residence without a search warrant and the house was not, in fact, red-tagged, we conclude this case is best decided on the second qualified-immunity question—whether it would have been apparent to a reasonable police officer that his or her conduct violated plaintiffs' clearly established constitutional rights. We conclude that a reasonable officer in defendants' position would have believed entry into the residence was lawful based on all of the circumstances in this case, including the 9-1-1 call reporting child abuse, the outstanding arrest warrant for Fineout, and the dispatcher's confirmation that the residence was red-tagged. Police officers have the 'right to rely on dispatch information' and courts therefore consider an officer's reasonable reliance on such information when determining whether the officer is protected by qualified immunity. . . . We note that Lansing's practice of conducting warrantless entries into occupied, red-tagged homes is troubling. However, in this case, plaintiffs have identified no case supporting that it was clearly established that police cannot lawfully enter an illegally occupied structure without a warrant.")

Novak v. City of Parma, 932 F.3d 421, 429-30 (6th Cir. 2019) ("If the police did not have probable cause to arrest Novak, then he may bring a claim of retaliation. Nieves, 139 S. Ct. at 1725. . . . If the officers did have probable cause, on the other hand, they are entitled to qualified immunity. The Supreme Court has said as much. 'This Court has never recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause.' Reichle, 566 U.S. at 664–

65, 132 S.Ct. 2088. The Supreme Court said that in 2012, and it remains true today. The Supreme Court decided two retaliation cases after Reichle. Neither case clearly established Novak's right to be free from a retaliatory arrest based on probable cause. First, the Supreme Court decided Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach. There, the Court held that a plaintiff can bring a retaliation claim if the police had probable cause to arrest but only against official municipal policies of retaliation. . . So Lozman does not apply where, as here, the plaintiff sues individual officers. . . Second, the Court held most recently in Nieves that a plaintiff generally cannot bring a retaliation claim if the police had probable cause to arrest. . . Though Nieves also created an exception to that general rule that we will discuss later, the exception does not apply here because the officers would not have been aware of it at the time of Novak's arrest since the case was decided later. Nor has our circuit clearly established the law on this issue. In Sandul v. Larion, the Sixth Circuit denied an officer qualified immunity for a First Amendment retaliation claim and held that 'protected speech cannot serve as the basis for a violation of any of the ... ordinances.'. . But in that case, the ordinance criminalized the plaintiff's speech directly, and there was little question whether the speech was protected. . . . Plus, it is not clearly established how we reconcile the apparent holding in Sandul that protected speech cannot be the basis for probable cause with the rule that protected speech can be a 'wholly legitimate consideration' for officers when they decide whether to arrest someone. Reichle, 566 U.S. at 668, 132 S.Ct. 2088. '[I]f judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.'. . Simply put, Ohio's statute appears to punish the effects of speech (interruptions), not the speech itself, and whether enforcing such a statute in these circumstances violates the First Amendment is not clearly established. So the officers would be entitled to qualified immunity. To sum up, to resolve the retaliation claim, the factfinder below will have to decide: (1) whether Novak's Facebook page was a parody, and thus protected speech, and; (2) whether the officers had probable cause to arrest Novak under the Ohio statute. If the officers did not have probable cause, they are not entitled to qualified immunity, and Novak can attempt to show the arrest was retaliatory. If the officers did have probable cause, they are entitled to qualified immunity even if Novak's page was protected speech because the law at the time did not clearly establish that charging Novak under the statute would violate his constitutional rights.")

Novak v. City of Parma, 932 F.3d 421, 433-34 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Novak argues that when Officers Riley and Connor deleted comments on the official police Facebook page, they unlawfully censored speech in a public forum and violated his right to receive information. These claims fail because they are not based on clearly established law. The First Amendment no doubt applies to the wild and 'vast democratic forums of the Internet.'. . But when it comes to online speech, the law lags behind the times. And rightly so. 'The forces and directions of the Internet are so new, so protean, and so far reaching that courts must be conscious that what they say today might be obsolete tomorrow.'. . Courts have not reached consensus on how First Amendment protections will apply to comments on social media platforms. So far, the courts that have considered the issue have taken different approaches. . . No doubt, any right Novak or the commenters may have to post or receive comments was not 'beyond debate' at the time the officers deleted the comments. . . Riley and Connor are entitled to qualified immunity from these claims.")

Berkshire v. Beauvais, 928 F.3d 520, 536-38 (6th Cir. 2019) ("The evidence surveyed above shows that both Beauvais and Sermo, despite knowing that Berkshire was suicidal, 'rendered "grossly inadequate care."'. . The expert report, Berkshire affidavit and Lang declaration, deposition testimony, and the email all provide more than ample support for the inference that Beauvais and Sermo knew of and were deliberately indifferent toward a potential risk of suicide. . . Viewed in the light most favorable to Berkshire, Beauvais's and Sermo's approach was not merely 'wait and see if Berkshire gets better,' but rather, they took a 'medically deprive and hope the problem goes away' approach. . . To the extent that these two Defendants contest this evidence, at this stage we do not have jurisdiction to address factual disputes. . . .Berkshire had a clearly established right to have his suicidal tendencies attended to, and evidence supports the inference that Beauvais and Sermo acted with deliberate indifference toward Berkshire's medical needs. Beauvais and Sermo are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Berkshire's claim against Sergeant Nelson entails a different Eighth Amendment analysis, one based on Berkshire's conditions of confinement. This claim also has an objective and subjective prong. . . .Based on Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), and Barker v. Goodrich, Sergeant Nelson is not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary-judgment stage. In Hope, the Supreme Court held that 'the Eighth Amendment violation is obvious' when an inmate was handcuffed in a restrictive position for seven hours in the sun without access to water or bathroom breaks. . . . In so holding, the Supreme Court explained that '[a]mong unnecessary and wanton inflictions of pain are those that are totally without penological justification.'. .Then in Barker, we relied on Hope and similar cases to hold that the defendants in that case 'had fair warning in 2007 that their conduct was unconstitutional.'. . . Notably, we viewed seven hours (the length of time in Hope) as an 'extended period.'. . The Barker court further reasoned that 'our sister circuits have found shorter deprivations to violate the Constitution when they lack a penological purpose'. . Accordingly, we adopted the reasoning of Hope and other circuits that addressed 'shorter deprivations' and concluded that the case law was 'thus sufficient to give the Defendants fair warning.'. . Soo too for Sergeant Nelson. The differences between Hope, Barker, and the cases surveyed therein are immaterial and do not overcome the fact that Sergeant Nelson denied Berkshire a bathroom break and then left Berkshire to lay in his own urine and feces for several hours. Sergeant Nelson had fair warning that this conduct, if without a penological purpose, constitutes a denial of life's necessities, subjects Berkshire to a significant risk of pain and damage to the bladder (as well as humiliation), and therefore could rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. . . The district court correctly concluded 'that there is a material question of fact whether [Sergeant Nelson's] actions were taken for a legitimate penological reason ....'")

Watson v. Pearson, 928 F.3d 507, 511-13 (6th Cir. 2019) ("[W]e agree with the district court's conclusion that the officers violated Watson's constitutional rights by searching the curtilage of the home without a warrant. . . . Watson stated that his girlfriend lived in the house and that he had left his keys inside. As explained above, Watson reasonably communicated that he was at least an overnight or social guest. This would afford him a legitimate expectation of privacy in the residence. . . In addition, Watson had just exited the house and stated that his girlfriend was still inside. The residence was therefore clearly not abandoned. No officer could have reasonably believed that Watson disclaimed his privacy interest in the residence or that the property was abandoned by its owners or tenants. . . . The officers also contend that their warrantless intrusion into the curtilage was not prohibited by clearly established law when the search occurred in December 2013. They claim that a reasonable officer could have believed that the 'knock and talk' exception, as discussed in Hardesty v. Hamburg Township, 461 F.3d 646 (6th Cir. 2006), extended to their actions. . . . In September 2006, this court concluded that the 'knock and talk' exception permitted officers to proceed around a house and knock on the back door if they have reason to believe that an individual is inside the house and no one answered the front door. . . But in March 2013, the Supreme Court clarified in Jardines that a police officer without a warrant is limited to 'approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.'. . The Court held that 'a police officer not armed with a warrant may approach a home and knock, precisely because that is '\"no more than any private citizen would do."'. . And in September 2018, the Sixth Circuit explicitly stated that Jardines had overturned Hardesty and Turk. Morgan v. Fairfield County, 903 F.3d 553, 565 (6th Cir. 2018). The officers argue, however, that Jardines was not understood in 2013 to have clearly superseded Hardesty and Turk. They claim that the scope of the 'knock and talk' exception was not clearly established until the Sixth Circuit decided Morgan in September 2018. The officers rely on Brennan v. Dawson, 752 F. App'x 276 (6th Cir. 2018), an unpublished case concluding that Hardesty was good law until Morgan was decided. . . Brennan posited that Jardines did not clearly govern situations in which a police officer had reason to believe that someone was inside the home and the officer entered the curtilage in an attempt to contact that person. . .We are not persuaded. First, Jardines clearly rejected the kind of intrusion into the curtilage that Hardesty had permitted. A plain reading of Jardines does not allow an officer to intrude into the curtilage by walking around the house. . . Although Brennan interprets Jardines differently, it is an unpublished case and clearly conflicts with then-existing Supreme Court caselaw. We are not bound by Brennan. . . Moreover, even if Jardines was not understood in 2013 to have overturned Hardesty and Turk, those cases do not permit an officer to enter the curtilage to engage in a search. Hardesty and Turk at most held that the scope of the 'knock and talk' investigative technique permitted officers to walk to the backyard of a residence in an effort to communicate with individuals thought to be inside. Those cases did not permit officers to enter the curtilage with the intent of performing a search. . . . In sum, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity because they violated Watson's constitutional rights and because those rights were clearly established when the incident occurred. The district court accordingly erred by granting summary judgment in favor of the officers based on qualified immunity.") Cavin v. Michigan Dep't of Corr., 927 F.3d 455, 461 (6th Cir. 2019) ("[I]t is notoriously difficult to predict the outcome of a balancing test in advance, making it even more important that precedent place the question beyond doubt. Cf. Sumpter v. Wayne County, 868 F.3d 473, 485 (6th Cir. 2017). Cavin hasn't identified cases that do so. Cavin instead points us to two out-of-circuit district court opinions involving Wiccan prisoners' religious rights. See LaPlante v. Mass. Dep't of Corr., 89 F. Supp. 3d 235 (D. Mass. 2015) (RLUIPA claim); Rouser v. White, 630 F. Supp. 2d 1165 (E.D. Cal.

2009) (RLUIPA and First Amendment claims). But district courts, let alone those in other circuits, don't provide clearly established precedent. . . . Cavin adds that we should deny Leach qualified immunity because precedent can put an official on notice even if it does not involve 'fundamentally similar' or 'materially similar' circumstances. . . But the Supreme Court has also told us not to do the qualified immunity analysis from 60,000 feet. See White v. Pauly, –— U.S. ——, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552, 196 L.Ed.2d 463 (2017) (per curiam). Instead, 'the clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . That isn't so here.")

Campbell v. Mack, 777 F. App'x 122, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("Because a reasonable jury could find that Mack lacked any objective basis for the traffic stop, and because Campbell's Fourth Amendment rights were clearly established, qualified immunity does not shield Mack from Campbell's Fourth Amendment claim arising from the traffic stop. . . . Having determined that Campbell established a First Amendment violation for purposes of summary judgment, we must analyze whether Campbell's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation was clearly-established. We find that it was. Therefore, Mack is not entitled to qualified immunity on Campbell's First Amendment retaliation claim. '[I]t is well-established that a public official's retaliation against an individual exercising his or her First Amendment rights is a violation of § 1983.'. . Further, 'the courts that have considered qualified immunity in the context of a retaliation claim have focused on the retaliatory intent of the defendant' rather than on the retaliatory action the defendant allegedly undertook. . . This is because '[t]he unlawful intent inherent in such a retaliatory action places it beyond the scope of a police officer's qualified immunity if the right retaliated against was clearly established.'. . Recognizing that the unlawful intent aspect of a public official's retaliatory action violates clearly-established law, this Court has denied qualified immunity to a police officer who arrested a citizen in retaliation for protesting and failing to comply with his order to return to his home, McCurdy v. Montgomery Cty., 240 F.3d 512, 516 (6th Cir. 2001), and to a police officer who effectuated an arrest in retaliation for being called a derogatory term, Greene v. Barber, 310 F.3d 889, 897–98 (6th Cir. 2002). Mack is not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Campbell's First Amendment retaliation claim. When the events at issue occurred, the right to be free from retaliation at the hands of police officers for asserting one's First Amendment rights was 'sufficiently clear' that a reasonable officer would have understood that retaliating against Campbell as a result of his complaints would violate his First Amendment rights. . . Further, just as the police officers in McCurdy and Greene should have known that arresting someone in retaliation for asserting his or her First Amendment rights violated clearly-established law, Mack should have known that further tightening Campbell's handcuffs and engaging in aggressive strip search and/or body cavity searches in retaliation for Campbell's asserting his First-Amendment rights violated clearly-established law. In fact, Mack argues that while 'this case involves a claim of a retaliatory search, rather than a retaliatory arrest or prosecution, [this] is a distinction without a difference, particularly in the context of applying qualified immunity.'. . Mack makes this statement in arguing that qualified immunity protects searches supported by probable cause from First Amendment retaliation claims, just as it protects arrests and prosecutions supported by probable cause. But the inverse is also true—just as arrests or prosecutions without probable cause can support a First Amendment retaliation claim, so can a retaliatory search. Mack argues that the district court erred by denying him qualified immunity on this claim because it failed to cite a case with sufficiently analogous facts to place him on notice that his conduct violated Campbell's First Amendment rights. However, 'the Supreme Court "do[es] not require a case directly on point [if] existing precedent [has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate."'. . 'Instead, the operative inquiry is "whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted."'. . Based on Sixth Circuit precedent that existed before 2016, a reasonable officer would have known that retaliating against Campbell for complaining about Mack's conduct by tightening his handcuffs to the point of injury, subjecting him to strip and/or body cavity searches, and conducting these searches in an overly aggressive manner would violate the First Amendment. Accordingly, Campbell's failure to locate a case with perfectly analogous facts does not entitle Mack to qualified immunity.") Guertin v. State of Michigan, 924 F.3d 309, 311-15 (6th Cir. 2019) (Sutton, J., concurring in the denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied sub nom. City of Flint v. Guertin, 140 S. Ct. 933 (2020) ("Negligent, even grossly negligent, conduct by local officials does not generally violate citizens' substantive due process rights. Least of all would these actions clearly violate such rights, as there is very little that is clear about substantive due process. If that's what happened here, this litigation needs to end—promptly. It is a distraction to the key goal (fixing Flint's water supply), and it is unfair to the public servants to boot. Their mistakes may deserve public criticism, but they do not deserve the tag of violating clearly established constitutional rights and what comes with it: exposure to crippling monetary judgments. But an intentional or reckless effort to poison Flint's water supply is another matter. If that's what happened, the case must proceed. So which account is the right account? It's too early to say. At the pleading stage of a case, plaintiffs are entitled to make plausible allegations in their complaint and use the discovery process to ferret out support for their preferred account through depositions, emails, and documents. At this early stage of the case, we must give the benefit of the doubt to the plaintiffs' preferred theory of the case and allow the discovery process to determine whether plausible allegations in their complaint mature into fact-supported allegations. In view of the starkly different nature of these two accounts and in view of the starkly different outcomes for each of them, I would have written the majority opinion—permitting this case to proceed to discovery—in a different key. . . . The precedent the panel majority found 'especially analogous' to today's case, Guertin v. Michigan, 912 F.3d 907, 921 (6th Cir. 2019), has no business in the inquiry. It is a district court case. . . And district court decisions do not mark appellate law—the relevant benchmark for ascertaining well-established constitutional law. . . Cautionary feature three. Even aside from the one-off nature of these cases, the inscrutable nature of the inquiry by itself gives pause. While many acts of public officials might theoretically affect the right to bodily integrity, only an official who 'shocks the conscience' violates the right. . . Missing from this case so far is any recognition that the purpose of the test is to restrain judges, not empower them; to remove claims from the constitutional arena, not to expand nebulous notions of substantive due process. . . Also missing is an appreciation of the imperative that we not apply the 'clearly established' prong of qualified immunity at a nose-bleed level of generality, but rather must find precedent 'particularized to the facts of the case.'. .

Whatever else the shocks-the-conscience test means in the context of an effort to pierce public employees' qualified immunity, it at a minimum requires 'an exact analysis of circumstances,'. . . measured by truly comparable cases. In the often 'unfamiliar territory' that cases like this one present, 'mechanical application' of prior precedent usually does little good. . . . Having urged our court and the district court to address these claims with caution and restraint, I must accept a dose of my own medicine. Two features of this case offer some support for these decisions—sufficient support to wait and see before granting a petition to review the case as a full court. One reasonable explanation for waiting to review the dispute is the stage of the case—Rule 12(b)(6)—from which these decisions arose. This is not a barebones complaint based on implausible allegations. It comes in at 89 pages. And it offers plenty of details that at least plausibly allege public acts of recklessness and intentional misbehavior. The point of discovery is to allow claimants and the courts to determine whether facts support plausible claims. That opportunity should help us all in resolving this case fairly. A second reasonable explanation for waiting to review this case as a full court is the hard-to-pin-down nature of the clearly established inquiry. The officials, it is true, can be found liable only if this lawsuit falls into the narrow category of cases so egregious, so obvious, that all reasonable officials must have known what they did was wrong. . . What's tricky is figuring out what counts as reckless or intentional behavior—in the context of a clearly established conscience-shocking standard of care. For better or worse, the case law seems to present a sliding scale—the more evidence of unforgiveable intent, the less necessity to identify a case just like this one. That is what seemed to happen in Hope v. Pelzer. The facts were unique. No correctional officials before then, at least in a litigated case, had thought to chain inmates to a hitching post in the unrelenting heat of the Alabama sun for seven hours as a form of prison discipline. What permitted the U.S. Supreme Court to hold that the state officials violated clearly established norms turned not on any one precedent but on the egregiousness of the state officials' state of mind. . . So long as that is an appropriate approach to qualified immunity claims, it would seem that allegations like these—intentional or reckless poisoning of citizens—plausibly clear the clearly established hurdle and warrant discovery. . .That discovery should proceed does not eliminate a role for the district court. One would hope that the court, in view of the seriousness of the allegations and the potential protections of qualified immunity at summary judgment, would not deploy a laissez-faire approach to document and deposition discovery. Carefully tailored and prompt discovery should answer whether the intentional and reckless poisoning allegations hold up. If not, this case needs to return to the court of public opinion, where one suspects it should have remained all along.") Guertin v. State of Michigan, 924 F.3d 309, 315-17 (6th Cir. 2019) (Kethledge, J., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied sub nom. City of Flint v. Guertin, 140 S. Ct. 933 (2020) ("To state the obvious, the sympathies of every decent person run entirely to the plaintiffs in this case. But sometimes the law, evenhandedly applied, leads to a result contrary to the crush of popular opinion. This is one of those cases. Respectfully, the majority's decision on the issue of qualified immunity is barely colorable. To overcome qualified immunity, the plaintiffs must show that 'existing law' made not merely the legality, but 'the constitutionality of the [state] officer's conduct "beyond debate."'. . Here, the putative constitutional violation concerns the vaguest of constitutional doctrines, namely substantive due process. The doctrine purports to protect—'specifically,' no less—'those fundamental rights and liberties which are, objectively, deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition, and implicit in the concept of ordered liberty, such that neither liberty nor justice would exist if they were sacrificed.'. . That formulation (along with any number of alternative ones) is more oratory than legal rule, which has made the doctrine malleable enough to generate an array of constitutional rights over the years. [collecting cases] But just as crowbars are not made out of tin, substantive due process's easy malleability makes it a notably poor instrument for prying away an officer's qualified immunity. For to overcome that immunity in a case (like this one) where the claim is constitutional, the 'contours' of the relevant constitutional rule 'must be so well defined that it is "clear to a reasonable office"' that his conduct would violate the rule. . . That requirement—often repeated by the Supreme Court, but sometimes, as here, overlooked—presents two obstacles to the majority's decision in this case. The first concerns the particular 'fundamental right' (or rule) that the majority relies upon, namely a 'right to bodily integrity[.]'. . The sheer vagueness of that formulation illustrates that its 'contours' are shapeless rather than crisp, subjective rather than objective, unknowable until judicially announced. Even the majority acknowledges (as it stretches the right further) that the right presents 'far from a categorical rule.'. .The second problem is related: the 'bodily integrity' caselaw fails to provide the 'high "degree of specificity[,]"'. . necessary to overcome qualified immunity, at least as to the claim here. Instead that caselaw for the most part provides a handful of data points, which form more of a dusty nimbus than a planetary ring. But the caselaw does reveal a sine qua non for the right's violation: that the officer's invasion of the plaintiff's bodily integrity be intentional. . . . No official—no matter how blameworthy he might be on moral grounds—can be expected to recognize in advance that a court will recast a legal rule so that it applies to conduct to which it has never applied before. That in part is why the Supreme Court has 'repeatedly stressed that courts must not "define clearly established law at a high level of generality[.]"'. . Yet that is precisely what our court's opinion does here. The Supreme Court has also repeatedly said that courts must not turn substantive due process into 'a font of tort law to be superimposed upon whatever systems may already be administered by the States[.]'. . Yet our court's opinion does that too, by expanding substantive due process to reach claims based on negligence rather than intent. Our court's opinion, 'in other words, does exactly what the Supreme Court has repeatedly told us not to do.'. . I respectfully dissent from the order denying rehearing en banc.") Rayfield v. City of Grand Rapids, Michigan, 768 F. App'x 495, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("[E]ven if Rayfield has plausibly alleged that the City defendants violated his Fourth Amendment rights when they failed to ensure that he receive a probable-cause hearing within 48 hours, this right was not 'clearly established' as applied to Rayfield's case. . . Although we have recognized that, per County of Riverside, officers are on notice that defendants have a right to a probable-cause hearing within 48 hours, . . . Cherrington does not deal with the factually and legally distinct situation presented by Rayfield's case, namely when two municipalities, both of which have authority to process a detainee, jointly manage the custody of a pre-hearing detainee. Indeed, when discussing his wrongful-detention claim, Rayfield cites only Cherrington. . . Moreover, in support of his municipal liability claim against the City and County, Rayfield states:

The question is whether an arresting authority may be liable for constitutional violations committed by another municipal entity to whom it has regularly transfers [sic] custody of its arrestees. The Sixth Circuit has never answered this question.
. . .While we can plausibly conceive of a situation in which City and County officials would violate a detainee's rights under County of Riverside by failing adequately to inform the other municipal authority regarding the status of the individual's detention, Rayfield does not provide us with such a case and we have been unable to identify one. Consequently, because it was not clearly established that Defendants' failure to communicate regarding Rayfield's detention would necessarily violate Rayfield's constitutional rights, Hornbacher, Glowney, and John Doe City defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Gardner v. Evans, 920 F.3d 1038, 1063-64 (6th Cir. 2019) ("[W]e conclude that the inspectors are immune from suit on the entirety of the due-process counts against them. Plaintiffs insist that Flatford clearly established their right to receive notice, at some point, about their right to appeal. We agree that plaintiffs had a clearly established right to receive notice of their right to appeal, but they did not have the right to receive it from the inspectors who red tagged their homes. In Flatford, we explained that the actions of City's Director of Building and Safety were objectively unreasonable because 'despite actual knowledge of the [tenants'] possessory interests, [the director] took no action on their behalf. It is too plain for argument that the [tenants], who were barred from entering their home, have at least a clearly-established right to process of the sort that [the director] afforded to their landlord.'. . We immediately distinguished our holding, however, from a similar case in the Seventh Circuit:
The Seventh Circuit reached a different conclusion in McGee v. Bauer, 956 F.2d 730 (7th Cir.1992), where a homeowner was dispossessed of his home under perceived exigent circumstances. Although troubled by the building inspector's failure to advise the plaintiff of his right to a hearing, the court reasoned that the inspector's omission was not unreasonable since it was not his but a city attorney's duty to advise the plaintiff of his legal rights. This case, however, is distinguishable by the fact that [the director] is not merely a building inspector but the highest official of the City's Building Safety Department, vested with the statutory duties of commencing proceedings against those responsible for dangerous structures.
Id. at 169 n.7. Here, plaintiffs have sued the individual inspectors who red tagged their homes, not any other, higher-up officials. In that respect, the case is more akin to the Seventh Circuit's decision in McGee and less like our own decision in Flatford. Summary judgment for the inspectors on the post-deprivation claims was therefore appropriate.")

Jackson v. City of Cleveland, 925 F.3d 793, 821-27 (6th Cir. 2019) (as amended), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 855 (2020) ("[A] careful reading of King shows that fabricated evidence can be material to a grand jury's determination of probable cause without being presented to the grand jury. If only evidence presented to a grand jury could be material to that grand jury's decision, plaintiffs would be faced with the Scylla and Charybdis of either admitting that the fabricated evidence was not

material or claiming that it was material because it was presented to the grand jury, thereby gracing the fabricator with the absolute immunity afforded to grand jury testimony. . . Instead, plaintiffs can show that a fabrication was material to the grand jury's determination by showing 'that the officer has made knowing or reckless false statements or has falsified or fabricated evidence in the course of setting a prosecution in motion.'. . Here, according to the prosecutor, had Stoiker not fabricated Vernon's statement, there would have been no grand jury. But even had there been one, Vernon would not have testified falsely before it. Stoiker's fabrication was therefore material to the grand jury's determination because it 'was material to the ultimate prosecution' of Plaintiffs. . . .At issue in this appeal is whether, in 1975, the constitutional rights allegedly violated by Stoiker were sufficiently clearly established to deprive him of the protection of qualified immunity. It is a plaintiff's burden to show that the right at issue was clearly established. . . Although the Supreme Court 'do[es] not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . In examining 'existing precedent,' 'we may rely on decisions of the Supreme Court, decisions of this court and courts within this circuit, and in limited instances, on decisions of other circuits.'. . . In 1975, it was clearly established law that prosecutorial withholding of exculpatory evidence violates a criminal defendant's Fourteenth Amendment right to due process. See Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 86–87 (1963). Multiple circuits had also recognized by that time that 'Brady-derived' claims could be based on the conduct of law-enforcement officers—as distinct from prosecutors—who had allegedly withheld exculpatory evidence. [collecting cases] The above cases, decided prior to Plaintiffs' trials, make clear that the duty to disclose evidence falls on the state as a whole and not on one officer of the state particularly, and it was therefore clearly established by the time of those trials that Stoiker had a Fourteenth Amendment obligation to disclose exculpatory evidence. It was also clearly established that impeachment evidence, such as the fact that a witness was coerced into making a fabricated statement, qualifies as exculpatory. . . . Stoiker is not entitled to qualified immunity on the withholding-of-evidence claims. . . . It is difficult to countenance any argument that a law-enforcement officer in 1975 would not be 'on notice [his] conduct [was] unlawful' when coercing a witness into perjuring himself in a capital trial. . . The obvious injustice inherent in fabricating evidence to convict three innocent men of a capital offense put Stoiker on notice that his conduct was unlawful. . . .Stoiker is not entitled to qualified immunity on the fabrication-of-evidence claims. . . . Stoiker argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiffs 'fail to identify a pre-1975 case that would clearly establish that a police officer could be held liable for malicious prosecution where he did not actively participate in the prosecution [and] did not testify before the grand jury or at trial.'. . Stoiker's argument admits of two interpretations, one of which is possibly valid but has false premises and the other of which has true premises but is invalid. Stoiker might be arguing that the state of malicious prosecution law in 1975 was in flux and that it was not clear at that time that he could be liable under a malicious prosecution cause of action. That may be true, but it does not follow that he is protected by qualified immunity. Whether a defendant is protected by qualified immunity turns not on whether the defendant was on notice that his actions satisfied the elements of a particular cause of action, but instead on whether the defendant was on notice that his actions violated the laws of the United States. Recently, when presented with a similar argument to Stoiker's, we responded:

[The defendant] spends a considerable portion of his brief illustrating why it is not clear that he should be liable for malicious prosecution, thus reasoning that he is entitled to qualified immunity. Yet, his claim that the contours of our jurisprudence concerning malicious prosecution are not entirely clear misses the point. Our inquiry is whether [the defendant's] alleged actions—arresting and detaining [the plaintiff] based on false pretenses and then seeking an arrest warrant based on these false statements—violated [the plaintiff's] clearly established constitutional rights. We conclude that they did.

Miller v. Maddox, 866 F.3d 386, 395 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 2622 (2018). In short, 'the sine qua non of the "clearly established" inquiry is "fair warning,"'. . . and we ask only 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted[.]' Stoiker's argument may, on the other hand, be that it was not clear in 1975 that an officer who fabricated evidence but did not testify for the prosecution had violated the laws of the United States. If this were true, he would be protected by qualified immunity. It is not, and he is not. For Plaintiffs' claims to survive summary judgment, it must have been clearly established that where an officer fabricates evidence against a defendant and then withholds exculpatory evidence from the prosecution, but does not testify at trial or a grand jury hearing, he is 'influenc[ing]' the decision to initiate the prosecution in a way that violates the defendant's constitutional rights. . . Stoiker cites no case requiring testimony as an element of a § 1983 claim for malicious prosecution and no case suggesting that testifying is required in order to influence the decision to prosecute. To the contrary, this court held long before 1975 that if officers arrested a suspect without a warrant (in violation of state law), and 'subjected [that suspect] to fraudulent trial in a criminal case' that resulted in wrongful conviction, the officers caused the suspect 'a deprivation of [her] liberty without due process of law.' McShane v. Moldovan, 172 F.2d 1016, 1019 (6th Cir. 1949). The court in McShane made no mention of whether the officers had testified against the suspect, and with good cause: the crux of the violation is the institution of judicial processes without probable cause, which does not require a testimonial act. In conjunction with the cases cited in section II(C)(2)(b), supra, McShane is sufficient to have clearly established before May 1975 that an officer need not testify in order to violate a defendant's right to due process. That the phrase 'malicious prosecution' was not used in that case to describe the cause of action is immaterial; what matters are the actions allegedly taken by Stoiker, not the name we give to the claim used to seek redress for those actions. Stoiker is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity on the malicious-prosecution claims.") Cruise-Gulyas v. Minard, 918 F.3d 494, 497-98 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Minard adds that no case put him on notice about this fact pattern—that a second stop after a first stop supported by probable cause violated Cruise-Gulyas's Fourth Amendment rights. Defined at that specific level of generality, he says, the case law did not clearly prohibit the stop. But Minard misses a point. In making his argument, he fails to acknowledge that the second stop was distinct from the first stop, not a continuation of it. At this stage, we must accept Cruise-Gulyas's allegations—that Minard stopped her twice—as true. In that light, case law clearly requires independent justification for the second stop. . . No matter how he slices it, Cruise-Gulyas's crude gesture could not provide that new justification. . . While these cases are not factually identical, they establish clear, specific principles that answer the questions this case asks. . . At this stage, Cruise-Gulyas's allegations survive Minard's motion for judgment on the pleadings based on qualified immunity. . . . Cruise-Gulyas also alleges that Minard violated her free speech rights by stopping her the second time in retaliation for her expressive, if vulgar, gesture. To succeed, she must show that (1) she engaged in protected conduct, (2) Minard took an adverse action against her that would deter an ordinary person from continuing to engage in that conduct, and (3) her protected conduct motivated Minard at least in part. . . Precedent clearly establishes the first and second elements. Any reasonable officer would know that a citizen who raises her middle finger engages in speech protected by the First Amendment. . . An officer who seizes a person for Fourth Amendment purposes without proper justification and issues her a more severe ticket clearly commits an adverse action that would deter her from repeating that conduct in the future. The Constitution suggests as much by prohibiting unreasonable searches and seizures. . . . Cruise-Gulyas also meets the third element, a fact-intensive question in this instance. She alleged in the complaint that Minard stopped her because she made a crude gesture. That counts as a cognizable, and clear, violation of her speech rights.")

Harcz v. Boucher, 763 F. App'x 536, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("Accepting the allegations in the complaint, precedent clearly established that the state defendants violated the appellants' First Amendment rights. Over ten years before the events in this case, Parks established that 'one's constitutionally protected rights' do not 'disappear because a private party is hosting an event that remain[s] free and open to the public.'. . As a result, cases stretching back decades requiring that a significant government interest support a valid time, place, and manner restriction controlled here. . . In addition, previous decisions of this court and the Supreme Court clarify that the government must demonstrate the reality of an asserted interest when justifying speech restrictions and that mere conjecture will not suffice. . . Moreover, Startzell v. Philadelphia, an analogous case that the district court discussed at length, provided a blueprint for proper police action under the circumstances. . . There, the officers allowed protestors to enter a permitted event held in a public forum and imposed a constitutionally-permissible restriction only after 'protestors move[d] from distributing literature and wearing signs to disruption of the permitted activities.'. . Accepting the appellants' allegations as true, these cases placed the state defendants' constitutional violation beyond debate. . . We therefore reverse dismissal of the appellants' First Amendment claim.")

Rafferty v. Trumbull Cty., Ohio, 915 F.3d 1087, 1095-97 (6th Cir. 2019) ("[T]he Court finds that Sherman has satisfied the objective component of her Eighth Amendment claim. Drennen's repeated demands that Sherman expose her breasts and masturbate are 'sufficiently serious' to implicate the Eighth Amendment under settled case law from the Supreme Court, this Circuit, and numerous other courts of appeals. . . . Drennen argues that he did not violate the Eighth Amendment because he did not physically touch Sherman. But this Court held nearly three decades ago that sexual abuse of inmates can violate the Eighth Amendment even in the absence of physical touching by a corrections officer. . . .This Court has not determined whether deliberate indifference or the heightened malice standard is required to satisfy the subjective component of an Eighth Amendment claim alleging sexual abuse by a prison guard. But the Court need not resolve this issue at present; Sherman prevails regardless of whether malice or the less-stringent deliberate indifference standard applies. Obviously, Drennan could not conceivably offer a legitimate penological justification for his repeated demands that Sherman expose herself and masturbate against her will. Thus, a jury could conclude that Drennen acted with deliberate indifference or acted maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing her harm. . . .When Drennen made his sexual demands towards Sherman in early 2014, it was clearly established that sexual abuse of prisoners could rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. . . Further, it was clearly established that sexual abuse could be sufficiently severe to implicate the Eighth Amendment even in the absence of physical touching by a guard. . . Accordingly, when Drennen allegedly sexually abused Sherman, it was clearly established that such abuse could violate the objective prong of the Eighth Amendment. . . . Furthermore, it was clearly established in 2014 that ignoring known risks of harm to an inmate due to inadequate medical care, inhumane conditions of confinement, or abuse by another inmate could constitute deliberate indifference. . . A jury could conclude that Drennen's alleged conduct violates either standard. Accordingly, it was clearly established that Drennen's alleged conduct could violate the subjective component of the Eighth Amendment. Drennen argues that Sherman's Eighth Amendment rights were not clearly established because Sherman failed to identify a case with sufficiently analogous facts. But the Supreme Court 'do[es] not require a case directly on point [if] existing precedent [has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . Instead, the operative inquiry is 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Based on the settled precedent that existed in 2014, a reasonable officer should have known that making repeated sexual demands of an inmate could violate the Eighth Amendment. Therefore, the fact that Sherman failed to identify a case with completely analogous facts does not entitle Drennen to qualified immunity. . . In sum, a reasonable officer in Drennen's position would have known that repeatedly ordering Sherman to expose her breasts and masturbate in his presence could violate her Eighth Amendment rights. Therefore, Drennen is not entitled to qualified immunity.") Naselroad v. Mabry, 763 F. App'x 452, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("We find that, viewing the record in the light most favorable to Naselroad, summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity is inappropriate. This is so because, first, Naselroad enjoyed a clearly established right not to be shot if he did not present a threat sufficient to justify the use of deadly force. . . Second, on Naselroad's rendition of the facts, a reasonable juror could conclude that Mabry's use of deadly force was excessive in light of the threat Naselroad presented. . . This conclusion squares with our prior decisions. . . A jury crediting Naselroad's account could conclude that his gun was always pointed at the ground, never directly at an officer, and that Naselroad did not indicate, verbally or physically, an intention to harm the officers. Such a jury could conclude that Mabry lacked probable cause to believe Naselroad presented an immediate threat to officer safety. . . It may matter to the jury, as well, that the officers were at the property to investigate a non-violent, low-level crime and had no additional information to suggest that Naselroad was threatening. Mabry cites several out-of-circuit appellate and district court cases as persuasive precedent in support of the proposition that deadly force is constitutionally reasonable 'when a suspect draws, or merely appears to attempt to draw, a weapon against police.' None of the cases Mabry cites stands for so broad a claim and all are, moreover, fundamentally distinguishable from the facts of this case.")

Guertin v. State of Michigan, 912 F.3d 907, 933-35 (6th Cir. 2019), reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 924 F.3d 309 (2019), cert. denied sub nom. Busch v. Guertin, 140 S. Ct. 933 (2020) ("Given the unique circumstances of this case, defendants argue we should defer to the 'breathing room' qualified immunity provides and hold that the invasion of plaintiffs' right to bodily integrity via life-threatening substances with no therapeutic benefit introduced into individuals without their consent was not clearly established before the officials engaged in their respective conduct. The dissent likewise suggests that 'plaintiffs must be able to "identify a case with a similar fact pattern" to this one "that would have given 'fair and clear warning to officers' about what the law requires."'. . But the Court has 'mad[e] clear that officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . For the reasons that follow, we decline to erect the suggested 'absolute barrier to recovering damages against an individual government actor.' . . The lack of a comparable government-created public health disaster precedent does not grant defendants a qualified immunity shield. Rather, it showcases the grievousness of their alleged conduct . . . .Knowing the Flint River water was unsafe for public use, distributing it without taking steps to counter its problems, and assuring the public in the meantime that it was safe 'is conduct that would alert a reasonable person to the likelihood of personal liability.'. . As set forth above, taking affirmative steps to systematically contaminate a community through its public water supply with deliberate indifference is a government invasion of the highest magnitude. Any reasonable official should have known that doing so constitutes conscience-shocking conduct prohibited by the substantive due process clause. . . These 'actions violate the heartland of the constitutional guarantee' to the right of bodily integrity . . . and 't[he] obvious cruelty inherent' in defendants' conduct should have been enough to forewarn defendants. . . Furthermore, the long line of Supreme Court cases discussed above—Harper, Cruzan, Rochin, Winston, to name a few—all build on each other from one foundation: an individual's right to bodily integrity is sacred, founded upon informed consent, and may be invaded only upon a showing of a government interest. The Court could not have been clearer in Harper when it stated that '[t]he forcible injection of medication into a nonconsenting person's body represents a substantial interference with that person's liberty.'. . Here we have an even more dramatic invasion, for at least in Harper the state forced medication—something needed to improve or sustain life—into its citizens; here, government officials caused Flint residents to consume a toxin with no known benefit, did so without telling them, and made affirmative representations that the water was safe to drink. . . . Put differently, plaintiffs' bodily integrity claim implicates a clearly established right that 'may be inferred from [the Supreme Court's] prior decisions.'. . . Several defendants take issue with the district court's definition of the right, contending it deals in generality instead of specificity. . . To be sure, sweeping statements about constitutional rights do not provide officials with the requisite notice. . . . But, the deficiencies of a too-general clearly established test have no bearing on the specifics of this case. Here, the right recognized by the district court—and one we adopt as directly flowing from the reasoning of the long line of bodily integrity and shocks-the-conscience cases—is neither a 'general proposition' nor one 'lurking in the broad "history and purposes"' of the substantive due process clause. . . In providing a tainted life-necessity and falsely assuring the public about its potability, government officials 'strip[ped] the very essence of personhood' from those who consumed the water. . . They also caused parents to strip their children of their own personhood. If ever there was an egregious violation of the right to bodily integrity, this is the case; the 'affront to human dignity in this case is compelling,'. . . and defendants' 'conduct is so contrary to fundamental notions of liberty and so lacking of any redeeming social value, that no rational individual could believe ... [their conduct] is constitutionally permissible under the Due Process Clause.'. . We therefore agree with the district court that plaintiffs have properly pled a violation of the right to bodily integrity against Howard Croft, Darnell Earley, Gerald Ambrose, Liane Shekter-Smith, Stephen Busch, Michael Prysby, and Bradley Wurfel, and that the right was clearly established at the time of their conduct. Should discovery shed further light on the reasons behind their actions (as but one example, a governmental interest that trumps plaintiffs' right to bodily integrity), they are free to raise the qualified immunity defense again at the summary judgment stage.") Guertin v. State of Michigan, 912 F.3d 907, 942, 957-62 (6th Cir. 2019) (McKeague, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), cert. denied sub nom. Busch v. Guertin, 140 S. Ct. 933 (2020) ("[E]ven if plaintiffs have alleged the violation of a recognized due process right, their claim nonetheless fails at prong two of the qualified-immunity analysis, which asks whether the right was clearly established. The mere fact that no court of controlling authority has ever recognized the type of due process right that plaintiffs allege in this case is all we need to conclude the right is not clearly established. Accordingly, qualified immunity must shield each defendant from suit. . . .In sum, because the conduct alleged does not appear to rise to the level of conscience-shocking, and because I believe it does not demonstrate the deprivation of a recognized fundamental right, I have serious doubts about whether plaintiffs state a substantive due process claim sufficient to carry them past prong one of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . To the extent plaintiffs do successfully allege the violation of a constitutional right, the novelty of that right just shows that it was not clearly established at the time the alleged events unfolded. Therefore, the doctrine of qualified immunity shields every defendant from suit. . . . Plaintiffs must be able to 'identify a case with a similar fact pattern' to this one 'that would have given "fair and clear warning to officers" about what the law requires.'. . Identifying a factually similar case is especially important in the realm of substantive due process, where the inherent ambiguity of what the law protects is best discerned through 'carefully refined ... concrete examples[.]'. . .As the majority acknowledges, plaintiffs point to no factually similar controlling case in which a court found that such conduct violated a constitutional right to bodily integrity. 'This alone should have been an important indication to the majority that [the defendants'] conduct did not violate [plaintiffs'] "clearly established" right.'. . .Due to the lack of controlling precedent and the many cases suggesting substantive due process does not protect plaintiffs' asserted right, the majority again falls back on its exaggerated characterization of defendant's actions and statements, likening them to the 'systematic' poisoning of an entire community. Advancing that narrative, the majority concludes that this case is one of the easy' ones that should never have arisen in the first place. . . But this is not one of those cases. As already demonstrated, the majority's systematic poisoning narrative has no basis in plaintiffs' factual allegations. . . This is not a case about a government official knowingly and intentionally introducing a known contaminant into another's body without that person's consent. It is a case about a series of erroneous and unfortunate policy and regulatory decisions and statements that, taken together, allegedly caused plaintiffs to be exposed to contaminated water. The proper framing of the factual narrative exposes how far off base are the bodily integrity cases relied upon by the majority. . . . In sum, the majority's opinion is a broad expansion of substantive due process, which contradicts the traditional understanding that due process does not 'supplant traditional tort law' or impose a duty on the government to ensure environmental safety. . . What is more, it effectively 'convert[s] the rule of qualified immunity ... into a rule of virtually unqualified liability' for government officials making policy or regulatory decisions or statements that have any effect on a publicly consumed environmental resource. . . That turns qualified immunity on its head.")

Apr. 1, 2019) ("Although plaintiffs plausibly plead that Governor Snyder violated their right to bodily integrity, qualified immunity shields public officials 'from undue interference with their duties and from potentially disabling threats of liability.'. . It provides protection to government officials who make reasonable yet mistaken decisions that involve open questions of law. . . But an official cannot avail herself of qualified immunity if the right violated was 'clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.'. . If controlling caselaw or a body of persuasive authority has put the constitutional question beyond debate, government officials are on notice that their conduct must conform to an established legal standard. . .As the Sixth Circuit recently held, the right to bodily integrity was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct. . . 'Knowing the Flint River water was unsafe for public use,' failing to take 'steps to counter its problems, and assuring the public in the meantime that it was safe' was ' "conduct that would alert a reasonable person to the likelihood of personal liability."'. . In other words, any reasonable official should have known that 'contaminat[ing] a community through its public water supply with deliberate indifference is a government invasion of the highest magnitude.'. . As a result, the Governor is not entitled to qualified immunity.")] Cahoo v. SAS Analytics Inc., 912 F.3d 887, 903-04, 906-07 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Plaintiffs' rights to adequate notice and a pre-deprivation hearing were clearly established. . . . It has been nearly fifty years since the Supreme Court held that recipients have a protected property interest in unemployment compensation. . . Similarly, the Supreme Court held approximately five decades ago that the government violates due process by garnishing employee wages without holding a pre-deprivation hearing. . . And because tax refunds are 'significant property interests,' it was also clearly established that Plaintiffs were entitled to a hearing before the Agency intercepted their tax refunds. . . Therefore, every reasonable Agency employee should have known that depriving Plaintiffs of their property interests without adequate notice or a meaningful opportunity to be heard violated due process. And, more specifically, every reasonable Agency employee should have realized that the flawed MiDAS system resulted in unconstitutional deprivations of protected property interests. MiDAS rendered a staggeringly high ratio of false fraud determinations, did not entail any meaningful fact-finding measures, and failed to provide adequate notice or an opportunity to be heard prior to terminating claimants' unemployment benefits, garnishing their wages, and seizing their tax returns. Accordingly, the Individual Agency Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' due process claim. The Court rejects the Individual Agency Defendants' assertion that Plaintiffs' due process rights were not clearly established. The Individual Agency Defendants contend that Plaintiffs' due process rights were not clearly established because Plaintiffs failed to locate a case holding that a governmental official violates individuals' due process rights by 'not ceasing to use the computerized system that its employing agency contracted for, based on reports of performance issues of the system....'. . . . The Individual Agency Defendants' argument is based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the doctrine of qualified immunity. Contrary to the Individual Agency Defendants' contention, 'an official can be on notice that his conduct violates established law even in novel factual situations.'. . . The operative inquiry is not whether a previous court faced perfectly analogous facts—it is 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . In this case, any reasonable official would have known that depriving Plaintiffs of their protected property interests in the manner alleged violated their due process rights. If this Court accepted the Individual Agency Defendants' argument that Plaintiffs must identify cases with virtually identical facts to defeat a qualified immunity defense, this Court would enable state actors to violate citizens' constitutional rights with impunity simply by employing new technologies. This would give state actors a roadmap for evasion and effectively insulate them from any liability—they would use new technologies to carry out unconstitutional conduct, and avoid liability based on qualified immunity, even when the underlying conduct is clearly unconstitutional. The Court rejects the Individual Agency Defendants' invitation to allow state actors to evade liability by utilizing new technologies to effectuate unconstitutional conduct. . . . The Court has not located a published opinion from this Circuit that answers the question of whether government actors violate the Fourth Amendment by seizing assets without a warrant if the seizure does not violate privacy interests. However, even if the Individual Agency Defendants' conduct violated the Fourth Amendment—an issue that this Court does not now decide—Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights were not clearly established in light of the Supreme Court's decision in G. M. Leasing Corp. and this Court's decision in Sachs. Accordingly, qualified immunity shields the Individual Agency Defendants from Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claims.") Virgil v. City of Newport, No. 18-5129, 2018 WL 6659861, at *1 (6th Cir. Dec. 19, 2018) (not reported) ("Twenty-eight years after a jury convicted William Virgil of rape and murder, newly discovered DNA evidence won Virgil a new trial. The government re-presented Virgil's case to a grand jury that ultimately refused to indict him. Virgil then sued thirteen individual police officers for violating his constitutional right to a fair trial by, among other things, deliberately withholding exculpatory evidence during Virgil's original prosecution. Asserting qualified immunity, the individual police officers moved to dismiss. The district court found the officers ineligible for qualified immunity because clearly established law at that time required them to disclose such evidence. The officers appeal. Our review of the record, the applicable law, and the parties' briefs convinces us that the district court's opinion comprehensively sets forth the governing law—

United States v. Moldowan, 578 F.3d 351 (6th Cir. 2009)—and the correct analysis. None of the officers' arguments to the contrary undercuts our confidence in the district court's decision. Thus, rather than duplicate the district court's careful work with our own opinion, we affirm on the reasoning of Part II(B)(1)(ii) of its January 9, 2018 order denying the Newport Police Officers' motion to dismiss Count One on qualified-immunity grounds.")

Virgil v. City of Newport, No. 18-5129, 2018 WL 6659861, at *1 (6th Cir. Dec. 19, 2018) (not reported) (Larsen, J., concurring in the judgment) ("In Moldowan v. City of Warren, this court held that it was clearly established in August 1990 that police officers had a duty to disclose evidence to the prosecutor when its 'exculpatory value' was 'apparent.'. . The question in this case is whether Moldowan's rule was also clearly established two years earlier, in September 1988. In D'Ambrosio v. Marino, this court held that the Moldowan standard is 'the functional equivalent of a requirement that the officer act in bad faith.'. . On that understanding of the Moldowan test, I concur in the court's judgment that defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. Virgil has alleged that defendants deliberately concealed exculpatory evidence that was material to his case. He alleges, for example, that the officers tried to frame him; that they coerced an inmate to testify falsely that Virgil had confessed to the murder; and that they then deliberately suppressed exculpatory evidence regarding alternative suspects. Such conduct, if proved, would surely amount to bad faith or its functional equivalent; and there can be little question that it was well established before September 1988 that police officers could not deliberately conceal material, exculpatory evidence.")

Estate of Collins v. Wilburn, 755 F. App'x 550, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("Where video shows an arrestee actively resisting and refusing to be handcuffed, officers do not violate his Fourth Amendment rights by using force—such as a knee strike and a Taser deployment—in subduing him. Rudlaff, 791 F.3d at 639, 642-43. The estate insists that 'a lesser degree of force is reasonable when the offense is a misdemeanor and not a violent offense.' This argument conveniently ignores the two other Graham factors, which here include the violence Collins demonstrated in the course of his arrest, including punching Wilburn, and his active resistance to officers' attempts to subdue him. As held in the district court, the estate has failed to establish a violation of Collins's clearly established constitutional rights based upon the officers' use of excessive force. Therefore, the grant of qualified immunity will be affirmed.")

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 560-65 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Government officials sued in their individual capacities for constitutional violations are free from liability for civil damages unless (1) they violate a constitutional right that (2) was clearly established at the time that it was violated. . . Courts can address these two elements in any order. . . And although this decision turns on the second element—whether the law was clearly established—we have the ability, if not the responsibility, to clarify the state of the law in this circuit so that government agents can understand the limits of their power and that citizens will be protected when those limits are transgressed. For that reason, we address both parts of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . Because the area surrounding Morgan's and Graf's house was curtilage, and curtilage is treated as part of the home for Fourth Amendment purposes, the officers' entry onto the curtilage could be justified only by a warrant or one of the recognized exceptions to the warrant requirement. It is undisputed that the SCRAP unit had no warrant. As for exceptions to the warrant requirement, the county argues that the entry was justified for three reasons. None, however, is convincing. . . .The SCRAP unit was concerned about general drug activity at Morgan's and Graf's house. But the Fourth Amendment prohibited them from entering the property: they had no warrant, no exigent circumstances, and no other exception to the warrant requirement. A "knock and talk" by police was permitted 'precisely because that is "no more than any private citizen might do."'. . Thus, the officers' right to enter the property like any other visitor comes with the same limits of that 'traditional invitation': 'typically ... approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.'. . Certainly, '[a] visitor cannot traipse through the garden, meander into the backyard, or take other circuitous detours that veer from the pathway that a visitor would customarily use.'. . Neither can the police. By doing so here, the SCRAP unit violated Morgan's and Graf's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . In determining the contours of the right, there is a tension between defining the right at too high a level of generality, on one hand, and too granular a level, on the other. There does not need to be 'a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . . In all, the most important question in the inquiry is whether a reasonable government officer would have 'fair warning' that the challenged conduct was illegal. . . For centuries, the common law has protected the curtilage of the house. . . And the Supreme Court long has held that the curtilage is 'considered part of the home itself for Fourth Amendment purposes.'. . That means that the police can enter the curtilage on the same terms that they can enter the rest of the home—no more, no less. . . Under those long-settled principles, warrantless searches 'are per se unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment—subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions.'. . A reasonable officer thus would understand that without a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement, entering the curtilage violates a clearly established right. Despite these long-settled standards, one case from this circuit, although incorrectly decided, requires that we grant qualified immunity. That case, Turk v. Comerford, decided within a month of the "knock and talk" in this case, found that the law was not clearly settled against a factual background that was, in every material way, the same as here. . . Central to Turk's analysis was our published decision in Hardesty, in which we held that '[if] knocking at the front door is unsuccessful in spite of indications that someone is in or around the house, an officer may take reasonable steps to speak with the person being sought out even where such steps require an intrusion into the curtilage.'. . Hardesty's extension of the knock-and-talk doctrine was, by its terms, limited to particular circumstances. . . And if our case law ended there, qualified immunity here would be improper. But in Turk, this court read Hardesty more broadly and reasoned that because some limited intrusions of the curtilage were allowed, it was not clearly established that surrounding a house for a "knock and talk" was in the category of unacceptable intrusions. . . Although Hardesty and Turk are outliers, Morgan and Graf cannot overcome their burden of showing that the law was clearly established at the time of the search in this case. In those two cases, this court should have reaffirmed long-settled Fourth Amendment principles. . . But it did not. And although unpublished cases do not upset the state of the law, in rare instances they can show that members of this court, during the same time period, facing the exact same question, did not think the law to be clearly established. And '[i]f judges ... disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.'. . For that reason we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the officers in their individual capacities. Nevertheless, in light of recent Supreme Court decisions, neither Hardesty nor Turk remains good law. . . Jardines and, more recently, Collins made clear that, outside of the same implied invitation extended to all guests, if the government wants to enter one's curtilage it needs to secure a warrant or to satisfy one of the exceptions to the warrant requirement. . . Our acknowledgment that those cases are no longer good law does not affect the qualified-immunity analysis here, which looks to the law at the time of the challenged action. . . But it does put officers on notice that principles of Jardines and Collins—and not Hardesty or Turk—should guide their actions going forward.")

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 567 (6th Cir. 2018) (Stranch, J., concurring) ("I join the majority opinion in full. I write separately only to emphasize the unique circumstances that merit applying qualified immunity in this case. As the Supreme Court recently reaffirmed, it 'has long been clear that curtilage is afforded constitutional protection,' and 'officers regularly assess whether an area is curtilage before executing a search.'. . Despite this fundamental principle, our jurisprudence has evidenced some confusion related to the police action that we refer to as ' "knock and talk" investigations.'. . A materially indistinguishable case, Turk v. Comerford, 488 F. App'x 933 (6th Cir. 2012), demonstrates that, at the time of the search at issue, even federal appellate judges were struggling with assessments of curtilage in the limited context of knock-and-talk investigations. It is rare to have a contemporaneous circuit case revealing judicial confusion on the precise question confronted by police officers. The existence of one here supports finding the law sufficiently unsettled that the officers should receive qualified immunity. This case, moreover, presents different circumstances from even Wilson v. Layne, . . . referenced by the majority. There, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the 'state of the law' at the time of the constitutional violation was 'undeveloped' and that a circuit split had arisen between the alleged violation and that Court's ultimate decision. . . The Supreme Court therefore declined to punish the officers' lack of prescience. . . But the case before us is quite unlike the open question in Wilson, which had percolated up through the circuits on its way to final resolution by the Supreme Court. As explained in the majority opinion, Turk and Hardesty instead stand alone on a doctrinal spur. For purposes of this case, however, Turk is sufficient to show that the law surrounding knock and talk investigations was muddy at the relevant time. Though this is the unusual case in which an outlier may insulate officers from liability, today's decision forecloses that possibility for future cases.")

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 574 (6th Cir. 2018) (Thapar, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Turning to the officers, I agree with the majority that the constitutional violation was not clearly established. But, if I was writing on a clean slate, I would remand. And the question I would direct the district court to answer is whether the officers engaged in a purposeful, investigative act to find the marijuana plants. . . .As the county's policy did not direct a search in Morgan and Graf's case (and the original meaning approach to the Fourth Amendment would require a remand to determine whether the officers in fact 'searched'), the court need not go further.")

Bunkley v. City of Detroit, Michigan, 902 F.3d 552, 566 (6th Cir. 2018) ("The duty of law enforcement officers to intervene to prevent an arrest not supported by probable cause was stated in precedent 'clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish' this rule. . . . And the arresting officers here—Dennis, Tanguay, and Washington (and Lucas)—knew that they had not investigated the Knox shooting at all, knew that Knox and Bunkley did not reasonably match the descriptions that Ainsworth had given them, knew that they did not question Bunkley (or Knox) before arresting him, and knew that Bunkley did not have a probation violation (their asserted reason for arresting him). They identified Bunkley, left the room to call Lucas, and returned to arrest Bunkley. Any of these officers had time to stop, intervene, and prevent this arrest-without-probable-cause. Based on Sixth Circuit law, the court properly denied qualified immunity.")

Stillwagon v. City of Delaware, Ohio, 747 F. App'x 361, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("Despite having different purposes, tight handcuffing and the tight hand taping both constrain the movement of a person's wrists. From an excessive-force analysis, both can cut off circulation and cause the restricted person's hands to go numb as a result of restricted blood flow. This court's tight-handcuffing precedent puts officers on notice that they cannot cut off the circulation to a suspect's wrists—regardless of how they do it. This means that the right was clearly established at the time Flynn allegedly taped Stillwagon's hands too tightly.We affirm the district court's finding that Officers Ailes and Flynn are not entitled to immunity from claims of excessive force.")

Brent v. Wayne Cty. Dep't of Human Servs., 901 F.3d 656, 685 (6th Cir. 2018) ("[I]f Wenk violated plaintiffs' clearly established constitutional rights when executing the removal order, she would not be entitled to qualified immunity from plaintiffs' claims. Plaintiffs first argue that Wenk violated clearly established law by executing a removal order that she knew to contain falsehoods, in contravention of the well-established Fourth Amendment principle that an officer 'cannot rely on a judicial determination of probable cause' to justify executing a warrant 'if that officer knowingly makes false statements and omissions to the judge such that but for these falsities the judge would not have issued the warrant.'. . Though we entirely agree—and now directly hold—that a social worker, like a police officer, cannot execute a removal order that would not have been issued but for known falsities that the social worker provided to the court to secure the order, this principle was not clearly established at the time Wenk executed the order in this case. Indeed, we held as recently as 2015 that 'general assertions that "the Fourth Amendment was violated as to [a child] when he was seized pursuant to [an] order" that he claims "was based on false statements and otherwise lacked probable cause" invoke no clearly established right.'. . As Barber concerned conduct that occurred after the allegedly unlawful actions in this case, . . . we must grant Wenk qualified immunity here.")

Hansen v. Aper, 746 F. App'x 511, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("Aper's reliance on Fettes, O'Malley, and Lee is misplaced because these cases are all distinguishable from Morrison. First, O'Malley is easily distinguishable because there, '[the plaintiff] did not have an obvious physical injury.'. . .Therefore, the plaintiff did not meet one of the essential elements of the Morrison test. Hansen, though, has presented medical records diagnosing him with a crush injury caused by handcuffing. Fettes and Lee, in addition to being unpublished and therefore non-precedential, are also distinguishable from both Morrison and this case. The plaintiff in Fettes was handcuffed for around ten minutes. . .and in Lee, the handcuffing lasted only between five to ten minutes[.] . . In contrast, the plaintiff in Morrison was handcuffed for forty to fifty minutes, . . and Hansen was handcuffed for thirty to forty minutes. Another pertinent distinction between Fettes and both Morrison and the instant case has to do with the officers' reactions to being told the cuffs were too tight. . . In both Morrison and the instant case, then, the defendant did not merely ignore the plaintiff's complaints but actively rebuffed them. Granting Aper qualified immunity here would thus directly conflict with Morrison, which controls in this circuit absent an intervening change in the law. . . Aper was on notice that handcuffing violates the Fourth Amendment if the arrestee is handcuffed, complains about the tightness, law enforcement ignores the complaint, and the arrestee suffers injury. Therefore, the district court correctly denied Aper qualified immunity.") Przybysz v. City of Toledo, 746 F. App'x 480, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) (Gilman, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("I fully concur in my colleague's disposition of Marcia Przybysz's Monell and state-law claims, as well as their decision to vacate the district court's sanction order. Where we part company is over their disposition of Marcia's § 1983 claim against Sgt. Karrie Williams, although in the end I agree (for different reasons) that we should affirm the judgment of the district court. The lead opinion holds that no clearly established law governs Marcia's claim against Sgt. Williams. . . I respectfully disagree. Although the facts of this case differ from those of Kallstrom v. City of Columbus, 136 F.3d 1055 (6th Cir. 1998), that case sets out a clear standard for constitutional torts premised on the state-created-danger theory. I believe that my colleagues' qualified-immunity analysis is overly rigid because it relies too heavily on factual differences between Marcia's claim and state-created-danger cases in which plaintiffs have prevailed. Nevertheless, I share my colleague's ultimate conclusion because the record contains insufficient evidence to show that Sgt. Williams acted with deliberate indifference to Thomas's safety. . . .True enough, the only similarly situated plaintiffs who have prevailed under the state-created-danger theory in our circuit are those in cases where the state official directly disclosed confidential information. . . In contrast, Sgt. Williams did not directly disclose Thomas's identity to his supplier, Scott Warnka, or to Warnka's associates. This fact alone appears to be enough, in my colleagues' view, to shield Sgt. Williams from liability. . .I disagree. The Supreme Court has warned the lower courts against placing too 'rigid [a] gloss on the qualified immunity standard' by 'requir[ing] that the facts of previous cases be "materially similar"' to those at hand. . . The unlawfulness of an official act 'must be apparent' to give rise to individual liability, but the doctrine of qualified immunity does not require that 'the very action in question ha[ve] previously been held unlawful.'. . Moreover, 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and ... a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. .If a state actor is on notice that directly disclosing a confidential informant's name to violent third parties can give rise to liability, then I see no reason why that same actor lacks sufficient notice that affirmative acts that indirectly but unmistakably identify a confidential informant can do the same. Kallstrom and its progeny set forth 'a general constitutional rule' that 'appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question' here. . . Accordingly, I would find that clearly established law is at issue in this case. But that is not the end of the qualified-immunity analysis. We must also consider whether the facts of the case, '[t]aken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, ... show [that] the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right.'. . In my view, this prong of Saucier's two-part framework, not the clearly-established-law prong, is the insurmountable barrier to Marcia's claim against Sgt. Williams.")

Scott v. Becher, 736 F. App'x 130, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he inquiry into whether a right is clearly established asks whether a reasonable government officer would have 'fair warning' that the challenged conduct was illegal. . . The standard is 'fair warning' because the purpose of qualified immunity is not to protect malicious behavior that violates constitutional rights in a manner the precise likes of which have not yet been the basis of a lawsuit in this circuit. Instead, qualified immunity has a two-fold purpose: to ensure that government agents are not deterred from vigorous pursuit of their duties due to fear that an honest misstep will expose them to money damages and, at the same time, to provide citizens a remedy for constitutional injuries. . . After all, qualified immunity 'acts to safeguard government, and thereby to protect the public at large, not to benefit its agents.'. . To conclude otherwise in the Eighth Amendment context would 'encourage bad actors to invent creative and novel means of using unjustified force on prisoners.'. .Taking the allegations in Scott's complaint as true, we conclude that Becher was not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of Scott's Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference through reckless driving. According to the complaint and the attachments, Scott was one of a number of prisoners being transferred from Saginaw Correctional Facility to Bellamy Creek Correctional Facility. Becher was driving above the speed limit, swerving, and generally driving recklessly. When Scott and other inmates 'beg[ged] him to slow down, before [they] all die[d],' Becher refused, laughed, and instead accelerated. At some point, the speeding bus hit a bump, sending the front tires of the bus airborne. The inmates went airborne, too. One would assume that all the prisoners were handcuffed at the time, but apparently none were seat-belted. As a result, Scott was catapulted out of his seat, and was then slammed down onto his head, neck, and back. When the bus tires landed, the front tire of the bus went off the road, and in an apparent overcorrection, Becher swerved the bus into the lane of oncoming traffic before regaining control. Scott has alleged actions by Becher that no reasonable corrections official could believe were legal. Caselaw supports that conclusion. Scott points to factually similar cases out of the Eighth and the Fifth Circuits that analyzed under the Eighth Amendment allegations of reckless driving while transporting an inmate without a seatbelt. [discussing cases] Although a number of circuits have not addressed the specific reckless use of a vehicle to harm an inmate, 'there is a clear consensus among the circuits' that 'the Eighth Amendment protect[s] against the malicious and sadistic infliction of pain and suffering ... in a diverse range of factual scenarios.'. . And to use a vehicle maliciously to harm an inmate falls squarely into that category—especially when there is no risk posed by the inmate and no legitimate penal interest. . . A 'rough ride' is 'a peculiarly cruel means of punishment, as [it] is designed to place the victim in fear for his life. Not only is the prisoner not able to protect himself, but motor vehicles, unlike a controlled spray or direct applications of force, are not designed for use as a means of securing compliance or otherwise subduing a prisoner.'. . .[F]ailure-to-seatbelt cases 'involved mere negligence,' but 'all cases that have squarely dealt with intentional misconduct'—which Scott has alleged here—'have found an Eighth Amendment violation.'. .In light of the obviousness of the constitutional violation, Becher could not reasonably have believed that driving recklessly while Scott and the other prisoners were not wearing seatbelts was lawful. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting Becher qualified immunity on Scott's Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate-indifference by reckless driving.")

Cummin v. North, 731 F. App'x 465, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("We determined that we did not need to resolve the issue in Johnson, and to date have not decided whether to adopt the 'continuing seizure' doctrine. . . Thus, even if the conditions of Cummin's release could constitute a seizure under this doctrine, Defendants 'would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the particularized right alleged—the right to be free from a "continuing seizure" by virtue of a pending criminal charge—is not clearly established.' Rapp v. Putman, 644 Fed.Appx. 621, 628 (6th Cir. 2016). Cummin cites several cases in support of his assertion that the right was clearly established. But the cases he cites are distinguishable. . . .Further, Cummin has cited no Sixth Circuit case finding the requirement that he attend five court appearances sufficient to constitute a seizure. In contrast, we have previously held, albeit in unpublished opinions, that requiring attendance at court proceedings does not constitute constitutional deprivation of liberty. [citing cases] In the absence of additional, onerous conditions, we cannot say the requirement to appear in court constitutes a clearly established seizure. This is consistent with many of our sister circuits. . . Because Cummin was not arrested, incarcerated, required to post bail or pay any bond, and was never subject to any travel restrictions, we cannot conclude that a reasonable government official would understand that the conditions of Cummin's release constituted a seizure under the Fourth Amendment.")

Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 754-56 (6th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 567 (2018) ("Defendants also argue that no clearly established law barred unreasonable force against civil contemnor detainees in 2012. Plaintiff relies primarily on this court's opinion in Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893 (6th Cir. 2004), as notice to defendants that their 'conduct was unlawful in the situation [they] confronted.'. . In Champion, we considered an excessive-force claim brought by the family of a severely autistic man who died after several arresting officers restrained him, prone on the ground and handcuffed behind his back, for seventeen minutes. . . Several witnesses described how the officers were 'laying on top of' the man while 'he was prone on the ground with his face towards the carpet.'. . We affirmed the denial of qualified immunity to the officers and explained that '[c]reating asphyxiating conditions by putting substantial or significant pressure, such as body weight, on the back of an incapacitated and bound suspect constitutes objectively unreasonable excessive force.'. . Although the man was also pepper sprayed, the application of asphyxiating force 'by itself violated a clearly established right.'. .Thus 'the prohibition against placing weight on [Richardson's] body after he was handcuffed was clearly established in the Sixth Circuit as of' May 2012. . . Although not every defendant may have placed his weight on Richardson's torso, we have cautioned against taking 'too cramped a view' of our precedent, and have explained that Champion 'proscribes the use of "substantial or significant pressure" that creates asphyxiating conditions in order to restrain a subject who does not pose a material danger to the officers or others.'. . Even though 'Champion arose in the context of an arrest, the conduct at issue, the risk of death to the detainee, and the minimal threat posed by a bound and incapacitated detainee to officer safety is the same in a' jail. . . In response to Champion's admonition, defendants maintain that the presence of medical personnel distinguishes this case because defendants claim they restrained Richardson only to facilitate his medical treatment. No medical personnel were present while force was used on Champion, but defendants do not explain how this distinction is material to our clearly-established analysis here. There is no dispute that Richardson was suffering a medical emergency, or that while he may have kicked and thrashed, defendants did not consider him a threat to anyone after he was handcuffed. Champion, who had created a disturbance in a store and 'kick[ed] violently' while on the ground, arguably posed a threat. . . In any event, neither the mere presence of a third party at the scene nor defendants' professed reason for using force would excuse defendants' use of an otherwise unreasonable amount of force or alter relevant, clearly established constitutional guarantees. . . We are cognizant that plaintiff must identify a case with a fact pattern similar enough to have given 'fair and clear warning to officers' about what the law requires. . . But such a case need not 'be on all fours in order to form the basis for the clearly established right.'. .Defendants also argue that they cannot be held liable for their actions because it was not clear in 2012 whether civil contemnor detainees fell within the Eighth or the Fourteenth Amendment. Although some district courts in this circuit may have applied the Eighth Amendment to civil contemnor detainee excessive-force claims, the Supreme Court long ago 't[ook] the position that the Eighth Amendment is inapplicable to [a civil contempt] sentence.'. . Moreover, it is well-established that 'the qualified immunity doctrine is an objective one[.]'. . We decline to accept the defense of qualified immunity based on defendants' 'dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose.' See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 832–33 (7th Cir. 2015) (per curiam). Nor can defendants escape liability merely because the incident in question occurred before the Supreme Court made it clear that the standard of liability applicable to Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims is purely an objective one. . . As defendants acknowledge, we have rejected this argument before because 'a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity simply because the courts have not agreed upon the precise formulation of the [applicable] standard.'. . Rather, the relevant question under the clearly established prong is whether defendants had notice 'that [their] conduct was unlawful in the situation [they] confronted.'. .We agree with the district court that Champion, among other precedent, gave such notice to defendants here. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's conclusion that it '[w]as unconstitutional' on May 19, 2012, to create asphyxiating conditions by 'forcibly restraining an individual in a prone position for a prolonged period of time' when that individual posed no material threat.")

Maben v. Thelen, 887 F.3d 252, 270 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Thelen . . . argues that there was no violation of a clearly established right because our cases dealing with the false issuance of misconduct charges deal with the issuance of major misconduct charges and not minor misconduct charges. We think Thelen's preoccupation with MDOC's label of major and minor misconduct is misplaced. Instead of focusing on that classification, Thelen should focus on the action of retaliating by issuing a misconduct ticket and the penalties that come with being found guilty of misconduct. We have made clear that a prison officer may not undertake adverse actions in retaliation for a prisoner's exercise of his First Amendment rights. . . We have also made clear that actions comparable in seriousness to the ones at issue in this case implicate a prisoner's First Amendment rights. . . .[W]e think that a reasonable prison officer would have been aware that issuing a misconduct ticket, even a minor misconduct ticket, in retaliation for the inmate's exercise of his First Amendment rights could give rise to constitutional liability.")

Enoch v. Hogan, 728 F. App'x 448, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("The Complaint alleges that the Deputies stopped and searched Enoch and Corbin because of their race and despite the fact that their behavior was entirely lawful. It has been the law of this circuit for decades that 'the reasonable suspicion requirement for an investigative detention cannot be satisfied when the sole factor grounding the suspicion is race.' United States v. Avery, 137 F.3d 343, 354 (6th Cir. 1997). Enoch and Corbin therefore plausibly allege that they were victims of an unconstitutional search and seizure. Because individualized suspicion is less demanding than probable cause, . . . the same race-related facts necessarily do not satisfy the higher probable cause standard. . . .As of June 2014, the published precedent of this court made clear that an officer may not stop, much less arrest and prosecute, an individual on the basis of her race. . . . Enoch and Corbin have plausibly alleged violations of their clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. The Deputies are not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law on these counts of the Complaint. . . .The Deputies could not constitutionally prevent Enoch and Corbin from or punish them for gathering news about matters of public importance when their actions violated neither rules nor laws. Enoch and Corbin have therefore plausibly alleged a violation of their First Amendment rights. Those rights were clearly established. Decades ago, the Supreme Court established with clarity that the First Amendment protects the rights of both the media and the general public to attend and share information about the conduct of trials, 'where their presence historically has been thought to enhance the integrity and quality of what takes place.'. . The Court linked the right of access to another fundamental First Amendment right, explaining that '[t]he explicit, guaranteed rights to speak and to publish concerning what takes place at a trial would lose much meaning if access to observe the trial could, as it was here, be foreclosed arbitrarily.'. . The same logic necessitates finding a constitutional violation in this case, where Enoch and Corbin's access to a press conference held immediately after a hearing was foreclosed on the basis of their race. The Supreme Court has likewise been clear for more than fifty years that state officials may not enforce rules or regulations that implicate First Amendment rights in a racially discriminatory manner. . . . [O]n the facts alleged, state officials purported to enforce state law in a racially discriminatory manner, stopping and arresting black citizens for engaging in behavior that was both protected by the First Amendment and permitted for their white counterparts. Based on the Complaint, the Deputy Sheriffs violated Enoch and Corbin's clearly established First Amendment rights. The Deputies are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law on this count of the Complaint.")

Richmond v. Huq, 885 F.3d 928, 948 (6th Cir. 2018) ("[I]t was clearly established at the time of Richmond's incarceration in Wayne County Jail that neglecting to provide a prisoner with needed medication, intentionally scrubbing her wound to cause unnecessary pain, and failing implement the prescribed plan of treatment could constitute a constitutional violation.")

Greer v. City of Highland Park, Michigan, 884 F.3d 310, 317-18 (6th Cir. 2018) ("In this case, the Greers claim that the officers did not knock or announce their presence before entering the residence, and—taking the Greers' factual allegations as true—exigent circumstances did not excuse the officers' disregard of the knock-and-announce rule. Although the search warrant listed controlled substances as items to be seized, which could potentially be destroyed, the presence of drugs alone did not vitiate the knock-and-announce requirement. . . Moreover, the Greers state that they were in bed when the officers arrived and that they presented no threat of violence. The warrant gives no indication that a person was in peril at the Greers' home. Finally, facts set forth in the complaint clearly allege that no person within the home knew of the searching officers' authority or purpose. These facts indicate a lack of exigent circumstances. Furthermore, '[n]ighttime searches have long been recognized as more intrusive than searches conducted during the day.'. . Consequently, the officers' failure to knock and announce their presence at the Greers' home at 4:00 a.m. absent exigent circumstances was clearly unconstitutional. As to the officers' refusal to show the Greers the search warrant, it is clearly established that the purpose of a search warrant—informing citizens that the searching agents are authorized—cannot be accomplished if executing officers withhold presentation of the warrant despite an occupant's requests to view it. . . The Greers claim that they repeatedly asked to see the warrant, and the officers refused. Furthermore, they state that the officers failed to leave a copy of the warrant at the Greers' home after the search concluded. These alleged facts further support the Greers' claim that the officers violated their clearly established Fourth Amendment rights by conducting the search of their home in an unreasonable manner. Thus, taking the facts alleged in the second amended complaint as true, the district court properly found that the Greers stated a claim for relief that is plausible on its face. . . Even if the underlying search warrant was based on probable cause, the Greers have posed factual allegations that the officers violated their clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonably conducted searches. Consequently, the district court did not err in denying the officers' Rule 12(c) motion based on qualified immunity.")

Doe v. Miami University, 882 F.3d 579, 604 (6th Cir. 2018) ("John has. . . sufficiently alleged a claim under § 1983 that Vaughn violated his equal-protection and procedural-due process rights. . . All of these rights were clearly established in the fall of 2014. John's 'right to freedom from invidious [gender] discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause was certainly clearly established at all times pertinent to this action ....' Rondigo, L.L.C. v. Twp. of Richmond, 641 F.3d 673, 681 (6th Cir. 2011). John's procedural-due-process right to an impartial adjudicator and access to the evidence used against him was also clearly established. First, viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to John, we conclude that a reasonable person in Vaughn's position should have known that she was partial and that she could not, therefore, sit on John's Administrative Hearing Panel. 'The impropriety of [Vaughn's] alleged conduct in failing to disqualify [her]self should have been apparent based on Goss [, 419 U.S. at 579–84], Newsome[v. Batavia Local Sch. Dist., 842 F.2d 920, 927 (6th Cir. 1988)], and other precedent directly on point.' Heyne, 655 F.3d at 568. Second, John's right to view all of the evidence against him is clearly established. . . Thus, we reverse the district court's holding that Vaughn is entitled to qualified immunity from John's equal-protection and procedural-due-process claims.")

Flanigan v. Panin, 724 F. App'x 375, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("[T]o withstand Panin's qualified immunity argument, Flanigan must also show that his right to be free from fifteen to twenty hits to the head was clearly established at the time of the claimed violation. 'In order for a right to be clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity, "[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right."'. . . Sixth Circuit case law supports Flanigan's 'right not to be struck ... gratuitously,' Shreve, 453 F.3d at 688, and Flanigan's version of events permits the court to draw the inference that he did not fight back against Panin's attempts to handcuff him. In such a scenario, Panin's blows to Flanigan's head were gratuitous. . . Thus, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Flanigan, a reasonable jury could conclude that Panin used excessive force. . . Accordingly, at this point in the proceedings, Panin 'is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.'")

Flanigan v. Panin, 724 F. App'x 375, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) (Kethledge, J., dissenting) ("Qualified immunity protects all police officers except 'the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . Neither label fits Deputy Scott Panin. Hence I would reverse the district court's partial denial of immunity. The only question on appeal is whether Panin violated Joseph Flanigan's clearly established rights when he (allegedly) hit Flanigan in the head toward the end of their encounter. Our caselaw says that a police officer may use force to subdue a suspect who actively resists arrest—e.g., one who struggles with, threatens, or disobeys an officer. See Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 641-42 (6th Cir. 2015). By contrast, an officer may not use force against a suspect who is compliant or has stopped resisting. . . Although in this appeal we must accept Flanigan's story as true, we must also view it through the eyes of a reasonable officer on the scene. . . In Flanigan's telling, he ran away from Panin into someone's backyard, repeatedly ignoring Panin's orders to stop. After Panin had chased, tased, and maced Flanigan, Panin told him, 'Don't get up. Don't resist.' Yet Flanigan tried to get up. Only then did Panin hit Flanigan in the head. And only after that did Flanigan give up, follow Panin's commands, and submit to handcuffing. A reasonable officer in this hectic situation could have viewed Flanigan as actively resisting arrest until he was restrained. Since Panin used only the force necessary to subdue Flanigan—and used no further force thereafter—he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . In holding otherwise, the majority stresses that Panin used too much force to subdue Flanigan. Our cases are to the contrary.

For example, we have granted qualified immunity to officers who struck a naked (and obviously unarmed) suspect with batons, maced him, and tased him 38 times, because they needed to use that much force to gain his compliance. See Williams v. Sandel, 433 F. App'x 353, 362-63 (6th Cir. 2011). So it is here. Tasing and macing Flanigan had proven ineffective, so Panin was justified in hitting him, and each blow was necessary to overcome Flanigan's resistance. See Jackson v. Washtenaw County, 678 F. App'x 302, 309 (6th Cir. 2017). The majority speculates that Panin could have arrested Flanigan with less force, but in Flanigan's own account, he did not give up until Panin had hit him 15 to 20 times. The majority also draws support from three cases in which we denied qualified immunity, but in those cases officers used force far beyond what was necessary to make prone suspects produce their hands for cuffing, or hit suspects who had already surrendered. See Griffith v. Coburn, 473 F.3d 650, 658 (6th Cir. 2007); Shreve v. Jessamine Cty. Fiscal Court, 453 F.3d 681, 686-88 (6th Cir. 2006); Baker v. City of Hamilton, 471 F.3d 601, 607-09 (6th Cir. 2006). Neither was true here. As shown above, Flanigan remained defiant throughout, refused to stay on the ground, and resisted being handcuffed. Moreover, Panin used only the force necessary to overcome Flanigan's resistance. Hence Panin did not violate Flanigan's clearly established rights. I respectfully dissent.")

Seales v. City of Detroit, 724 F. App'x 356, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("In light of these cases, we find Seales had a clearly established constitutional right to be free from continued detention after officers should have known that he was not the person named in the warrant. Accordingly, we find the district court correctly determined that Zberkot was not entitled to qualified immunity. It is for the trier of fact to decide whether Zberkot violated Seales' constitutional rights.")

Richmond v. Huq, 879 F.3d 178, 196-97 (6th Cir. 2017) ("'The proposition that deliberate indifference to a prisoner's medical needs can amount to a constitutional violation has been well-settled since Estelle in 1976.'. . This certainly includes the 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.'. . It is also well-established that right of a prisoner to be free from deliberate indifference extends to psychological needs. . . Further, as noted above, this Circuit's precedent is clear that neglecting a prisoner's medical need and interrupting a prescribed plan of treatment can constitute a constitutional violation. . . Thus, it was clearly established at the time of Richmond's incarceration in Wayne County Jail that neglecting to provide a prisoner with needed medication, intentionally scrubbing her wound to cause unnecessary pain, and failing [to] implement the prescribed plan of treatment could constitute a constitutional violation.")

Nailon v. University of Cincinnati, 715 F. App'x 509, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("[V]iewing all these facts in the light most favorable to Nailon, she has demonstrated a causal connection between her termination and her niece's protected speech and established a First Amendment retaliation claim. She has thus satisfied the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis by showing a constitutional violation. . . . The Defendants argue that there is no clearly established law putting a university official on notice that terminating an individual in retaliation for speech made by her niece would be a constitutional violation. In their principal brief, they allege it is '[n]ot clear at all that a claim of retaliation for the speech of a family member fits under the First Amendment.' The district court determined that such a right was clearly established based on cases within this circuit that examined claims of First Amendment retaliation where the underlying speech was made by a relative, rather than the plaintiff herself. . . The Defendants revise this argument in their Reply. There they posit that even though there is precedent establishing that a First Amendment retaliation claim may be based on speech made by a relative, these cases involve a 'closer' relationship between the speaker and the plaintiff than aunt and niece. They cite Teare v. Independence Local School District Board of Education, No. 1:10-cv-01711, 2011 WL 4633105, at *5 (N.D. Ohio Aug. 18, 2011), in which the district court determined that the plaintiff, a thirteen-year-old girl, had not shown a clearly established right of familial association with her uncle. Again, Nailon does not assert a claim for violation of her associational rights—she alleges that the Defendants retaliated against her based on her niece's speech. Accordingly, Teare does not control our analysis. The Supreme Court has found that in the Title VII context, a third-party reprisal can form the basis of a retaliation claim. . . Moreover, the Court has explicitly 'decline[d] to identify a fixed class of relationships for which third-party reprisals are unlawful.'. . It recognized that there may be 'difficult line-drawing problems concerning the types of relationships entitled to protection,' and that 'the significance of any given act of retaliation will often depend on the particular circumstances.'. . .An examination of the facts in this case confirms that Nailon and Davis's relationship may form the basis for Nailon's retaliation claim. As in Ward and Henley, the close familial relationship between Nailon and Davis was known to the Defendants. . . . Given these facts showing the close relationship between Nailon and Davis, as well as the cases establishing that private citizens have a protected First Amendment right to criticize public officials, . . . it should have been clear to a reasonable University official that retaliating against Nailon for Davis's speech would be unlawful. The Defendants are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.") Bays v. Montmorency Cty., 874 F.3d 264, 268-70 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they act with 'deliberate indifference' to the 'serious medical needs' of inmates committed to their charge. . . The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides the same guarantee to pretrial detainees. . . Two inquiries loom over every deliberate indifference case: Was the ailment a serious one? And was the official 'subjective[ly] reckless[ ],' such that she was actually 'aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exist[ed], and ... also [drew] the inference'? . . . . Sigler adds that nothing in the record shows that she subjectively knew, then disregarded, that Shane was at risk of suicide. But the relevant question is not whether Sigler recognized that Shane might kill himself. It is whether Sigler recognized that Shane was suffering from a serious mental illness creating a host of risks and requiring immediate treatment during the fourteen days that Sigler treated him. . . Sigler argues that while she may have committed malpractice, her conduct was not deliberately indifferent to Shane's plight. If a prison medical official provides treatment, it is true, constitutional liability attaches only if the treatment is 'so cursory as to amount to a conscious disregard for [the inmate's] needs.'. . Taking the Bays' allegations as true, Sigler's care fell below this admittedly low bar. She scheduled an appointment weeks in the future despite symptoms that she, Nurse Pilarski, and the Bays' expert now all agree required immediate or near-immediate care. Yes, she eventually did try to schedule an earlier appointment. But the sum total of her efforts were two phone calls and a message, all while she had the option of getting immediate emergency room treatment or at least putting him on a watch list, and yet she chose to do neither. Sigler looks to Taylor v. Burkes, which held that inmates have no clearly established right to the proper implementation of suicide prevention procedures. . . But the Bays do not argue that Sigler violated Shane's right to procedures that might have prevented his suicide. They argue that Sigler violated Shane's right to have a serious psychological illness treated seriously. And that right is clearly established.")

Moody v. Michigan Gaming Control Bd., 871 F.3d 420, 430 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Under the conditions articulated with respect to the particular right at issue, a public employee 'may rightfully refuse to answer unless and until he is protected at least against the use of his compelled answers.'. . The Supreme Court has made clear that if a state wishes to punish an employee for invoking that right, 'States must offer to the witness whatever immunity is required to supplant the privilege and may not insist that the employee or contractor waive such immunity.'. . We therefore reverse the district court's grant of qualified immunity on the Fifth Amendment claim, and hold that the right articulated in Moody I was clearly established at the time of the violation.")

Moody v. Michigan Gaming Control Bd., 871 F.3d 420, 433, 436-37 (6th Cir. 2017) (Batchelder, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("At 'a high level of generality,'. . . a public employee or, in this case, a licensee may refuse to answer questions that may tend to incriminate himself unless and until he has immunity from prosecution on the basis of his answers to the State's questions. Moody I was correct to explain that ' "a governmental body may not require an employee to waive his privilege against self-incrimination as a condition to keeping his job ... even [when] no criminal proceedings were ever instituted against" an employee who was later successful in constitutional claims.'. . I part ways with the majority, however, because it does not—and cannot—point to 'clearly established law [that is] "particularized" to the facts of [this] case.'. . The majority finds clearly established Moody I's holding that MGCB violated the drivers' rights when it 'did not offer [them] immunity before the hearing.'. . Based on my understanding of the Supreme Court's precedent, I cannot agree. . . .I cannot agree that Turley, Gardner, and like cases provide the proper lens through which we should assess this case for purposes of qualified immunity. These cases address different situations from the one here. The question, then, is whether MGCB needed to 'offer' immunity in the form of notifying the drivers that their testimony could not be used against them. This is where Garrity, which is the progenitor of the other cases I have discussed so far, fits into the picture. . . .Interpreting Garrity to mean that coerced testimony cannot be used in a subsequent criminal proceeding, however, leaves an important question unanswered: is that effect of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination a self-executing one, or must the public employer or agency affirmatively make its employee, contractor, or licensee aware of the immunity that Garrity affords? In Moody I, we concluded that MGCB had an affirmative obligation to notify the drivers that they were afforded immunity in exchange for being threatened with the loss of their licenses. In effect, we created a prophylactic rule, but this rule had not been in place before. The district court was therefore correct when it explained that

'[w]hat was not clearly established in this Circuit [before Moody I] was whether the State was required to offer immunity in the first place.'. .This is the proper lens through which to analyze this case, so I cannot find that the right had been clearly established before Moody I. The Supreme Court has not directly addressed how this right plays out in non-prosecutorial administrative proceedings, as I discussed above. Nor has our circuit addressed this previously. And looking to the other circuits demonstrates precisely why I cannot find that the right announced in Moody I was clearly established, for it is the subject of a circuit split among the various United States Courts of Appeals. . . . This split of authority, although not acknowledged by the majority, supports my conclusion that the law was not clearly established prior to Moody I. To saddle MGCB with the unjustified holding that this issue was clearly established before Moody I runs counter to the qualified immunity doctrine. I therefore respectfully dissent.")

Brenay v. Schartow, 709 F. App'x 331, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("If an officer initiates an arrest in a public place, but the suspect flees into a private one, the officer may give chase without stopping for a warrant. . . In other words, a suspect may not defeat an arrest by simply running inside. . . Whether the hot pursuit doctrine applies to this case depends on whether Brenay, Jr. was standing in a public place when Officer Sierras told him that he was under arrest. We know that Brenay, Jr. was standing in the foyer, six inches from the open doorway, for most of his interaction with the officers. The Supreme Court has said that a person who stands in his front doorway stands in a public place because he is 'as exposed to public view, speech, hearing, and touch as if [he] had been standing completely outside [his] house.'. . But this circuit has not addressed whether a person who opens his door voluntarily to talk to police loses his reasonable expectation of privacy within the meaning of Santana. Our sister circuits are split on the issue. . . And how the analysis might change when the person is standing six inches back from the doorway is even less settled. If this appeal came down to these questions, it would be easy. Government officials are entitled to qualified immunity unless 'existing precedent ... placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . With so many answers outstanding, how Santana would apply to this case is hardly 'beyond debate.' That the officers violated the Brenays' constitutional rights when they entered the Brenays' home would not be clearly established. Unfortunately for Officer Sierras, the hot pursuit doctrine may not apply because Brenay, Jr. may have ended his interaction with the police before Officer Sierras told him he was under arrest. . . . Unless and until Officer Sierras initiated an arrest, the Brenays were free to shut the door and walk away.")

Kulpa for Kulpa v. Cantea, 708 F. App'x 846, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("Cantea argues that even if his conduct was objectively unreasonable, the law's contours were not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation with respect to the restraint of pretrial detainees. The gist of his argument is that because the events in this case took place before the Supreme Court adopted the objective reasonableness standard in Kingsley, no clearly established law barred unreasonable force against pretrial detainees. At the time of Kulpa's death in October 2011, we evaluated a pretrial detainee's excessive-force claim by asking 'whether the force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . . Our pre-Kingsley caselaw put Cantea on notice 'that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Champion, decided seven years before Kulpa's death, clearly articulated that driving heavy pressure into a prone, handcuffed, incapacitated detainee's back was constitutionally impermissible because it posed a serious risk of asphyxiation to the arrestee and was unnecessary to protect the officers. . . . Although Champion arose in the context of an arrest, the conduct at issue, the risk of death to the detainee, and the minimal threat posed by a bound and incapacitated detainee to officer safety is the same in a pretrial detention center. Furthermore, it was clearly established in 2011 that 'pretrial detainees had a clearly established right not to be gratuitously assaulted while fully restrained and subdued.'. . Cantea argues that—notwithstanding Champion's clear admonition about this precise conduct—the law permitted him to plant significant weight into a prone, handcuffed detainee's back so long as he lacked malicious intent. For the reasons explained above, however, sufficient evidence exists that Cantea acted with malicious intent, given the extent of Kulpa's injury, the minimal threat Kulpa posed to officer safety, and Cantea's application of unnecessary force. In addition, as the Seventh Circuit recently explained, to buy Cantea's argument 'we would have to accept the dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose.' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 833 (7th Cir. 2015). As we have noted, however, the law clearly established that the 'amount of force that was used' must be roughly proportionate to the 'need for the application of force.'").

Mills v. Barnard, 869 F.3d 473, 486-87 (6th Cir. 2017) ("In holding that Mills sufficiently pleaded his claims of fabrication of evidence, suppression of evidence, and malicious prosecution, we determine that at this time qualified immunity is not warranted. Again, in the factually similar Gregory case, we stated that it was clearly established by at least 1992 that knowing fabrication of evidence violates constitutional rights. . . Brady violations are, of course, clearly established violations of constitutional rights. And, as we stated recently, it is also clear that 'individuals have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has "made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff" by, for example, "knowingly or recklessly" making false statements that are material to the prosecution either in reports or in affidavits filed to secure warrants.")

Sumpter v. Wayne County, 868 F.3d 473, 478, 485-88 (6th Cir. 2017) ("The issue we face is whether periodically conducting group strip searches when the number of jail inmates waiting to be processed makes individual searches imprudent constitutes a violation of clearly established Fourth Amendment law. Under the facts of this case, we answer that question 'no' and therefore hold that the jail official who conducted the group searches, defendant Terri Graham, is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . To summarize, on one hand, the group strip searches plaintiff endured in the Registry were especially intrusive; on the other hand, defendants have asserted a legitimate penological justification for periodically conducting the searches. Typically, we would proceed to balance the nature of the intrusion against the penological justification to determine whether the searches were unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. However, we need not go that far in order to determine that Graham is entitled to qualified immunity. Qualified immunity protects a constitutional tortfeasor from personal liability unless the contours of the constitutional right she violated 'were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it.'. . The dispositive inquiry, 'undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, [and] not as a broad general proposition,' is 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . Nowhere is that specificity as important as in the Fourth Amendment context, where, under the governing ad-hoc interest-balancing test, '[i]t is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'. . Because 'case-by-case, incremental decisionmaking of balancing tests ... infrequently will provide the "fair notice" that qualified-immunity precedent requires,'. . . '[c]ourts generally accord public officials wide latitude (for qualified-immunity purposes) when the constitutionality of their acts comes down to the subtleties of interest balancing[.]'. . . Thus, it is imperative that plaintiff rely on a decision that 'squarely governs' the outcome of the case. . . That she cannot do. . . .Both Stoudemire and Williams are distinguishable in one important respect: in both cases, there was no penological justification for the particular searches at issue. This critical difference makes Stoudemire and Williams poor templates for declaring the particularized right at issue in this case—freedom from a group strip search supported by a legitimate penological justification—clearly established. . . .Regardless of how the balancing actually plays out, one thing is clear: Stoudemire and Williams could not have predicted the result since neither case involved penological justifications to weigh against the nature of the intrusion. To put it in more descriptive terms: it is easy enough to predict how scales with one hundred apples on one end will balance out, but it is far more difficult to predict how many oranges must be added to the other side to bring it to equipoise. Tasked with making that second prediction, Graham would have found no clues in 'apples-only' cases like Stoudemire and Williams. The dissent starts with the wrong question. It asks whether our case law clearly establishes Officer Graham's justification for the group searches as a legitimate one. . . But that's not how qualified immunity works. To overcome an officer's request for immunity, the plaintiff must show that the 'right' she seeks to vindicate is clearly established, not that the officer's justification is not clearly established. . . The issue is the right to be free from a group strip search where the officer has an administrative need to process a large quantity of inmates at one time. The cases fail to address this situation, and so the right is not (and was not) clearly established. In focusing on only one half of the right at issue, the dissent inverts the burden, leaving the officer, rather than the plaintiff, in need of clearly established law to succeed. The dissent also focuses much of its energy on a question we do not address: whether the searches violate the Fourth Amendment. Its key points—that the jail later changed (or clarified) its policy, that Officer Graham had other alternatives available to her, and that she could have anticipated the situation and planned accordingly—all fail to address whether the law at the time clearly established the searches as Fourth Amendment violations. The absence of a decision that 'squarely governs' this situation is particularly detrimental to plaintiff's claim because, when the constitutional test is one of interest-balancing, the point at which the constitutional shades into the unconstitutional will necessarily be gray. . . Qualified immunity exists to give public officials breathing room to make close calls when the issue is not black-and-white. . . And this breathing room is especially appropriate when the legal standard is flexible and heavily dependent on on-the-ground judgment calls, as it is in this context.

. . . Strip searches, even when conducted in the most private circumstances, are intrusive. But in the absence of bright lines and per se prohibitions, whether and when to subject inmates to increasingly intrusive searches depends on the facts confronting the corrections official in each particular case. For these reasons, we need not conduct the Fourth Amendment analysis to its completion in order to conclude that Graham is entitled to qualified immunity. Neither Stoudemire, nor Williams, nor any other case, would have put Graham on notice that conducting group strip searches when the volume of inmates made individual searches imprudent was unreasonable. Thus, regardless of whether Graham, in fact, violated the Fourth Amendment, no reasonable officer would have known that at the time. We therefore hold, as the district court did, that defendant Graham is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Sumpter v. Wayne County, 868 F.3d 473, 498-500 (6th Cir. 2017) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("The issue as the majority frames it is whether our cases clearly establish that a group strip search conducted to expedite access to medical treatment violates the Fourth Amendment. However, that is definitively not the issue in this case. Rather, the true issue is whether the justification provided by Graham sufficiently demonstrates a special, exigent, or emergency circumstance which necessitated that such an invasive and humiliating jail intake process be conducted in the presence of others who had no reason to view such things. . . . Because the three Registry group strip searches violated Plaintiff's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights, I would hold that Graham is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Miller v. Maddox, No. 17-5021, 2017 WL 3298570, at *7 (6th Cir. Aug. 3, 2017) ("Maddox spends a considerable portion of his brief illustrating why it is not clear that he should be liable for malicious prosecution, thus reasoning that he is entitled to qualified immunity. Yet, his claim that the contours of our jurisprudence concerning malicious prosecution are not entirely clear misses the point. Our inquiry is whether Maddox's alleged actions—arresting and detaining Miller based on false pretenses and then seeking an arrest warrant based on these false statements—violated Miller's clearly established constitutional rights. We conclude that they did.")

Darrah v. Krisher, 865 F.3d 361, 374 (6th Cir. 2017) ("The first inquiry of the qualified-immunity analysis asks 'whether plaintiff has alleged facts which, when assumed to be true, show that the defendants' conduct violated a constitutional right.'. . This inquiry 'collapses into the analysis of whether [Darrah] has produced sufficient evidence to show that [Defendants] were deliberately indifferent to [Darrah's] medical needs under the subjective component' of the deliberate-indifference standard. . . We have already concluded that a jury could so find. Thus, we turn to the question of whether the right was clearly established. For a right to be clearly established, '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Further, we are not required to 'find a case in which "the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,"'but, 'in the light of pre-existing law, the unlawfulness must be apparent.' . . Initially, '[t]he proposition that deliberate indifference to a prisoner's medical needs can amount to a constitutional violation has been well-settled since Estelle in 1976.'. . Furthermore, we have already noted that this Circuit's precedent is clear that neglecting a prisoner's medical need and interrupting a prescribed plan of treatment, even for a relatively short period, can constitute a constitutional violation. . . Thus, it was 'clearly established' in 2011, at the time of Darrah's transfer to MCI, that neglecting to provide a prisoner with needed medication, choosing to prescribe an arguably less efficacious treatment method, and continuing on a treatment path that was clearly ineffective could constitute a constitutional violation.")

Guy v. Nashville, No. 16-6100, 2017 WL 1476896, at *3–4 (6th Cir. Apr. 25, 2017) (not reported) ("Taking a different tack on appeal, Romines argues that this right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Although this argument was not made in the district court, we exercise our discretion to consider the issue because it is a legal question within our jurisdiction and resolution of the defendant's asserted qualified-immunity defense would further the progress of the litigation. . . The essence of this argument is that the use of force in this case occurred prior to the Supreme Court's adoption of the objective reasonableness standard in Kingsley. It is true that there was disagreement among the circuits prior to Kingsley about whether a claim of excessive force 'brought by a pretrial detainee must satisfy the subjective standard or only the objective standard.'. . But, a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity 'simply because the courts have not 'agreed upon the precise formulation of the [applicable] standard.' Harris v. City of Circleville, 583 F.3d 356, 367 (6th Cir. 2009) (alteration in original) (quoting Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202-03 (2001)). Rather, the question under the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis 'is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Although there need not be a case directly on point, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The right must not be defined at a 'high level of generality,' and the 'dispositive question is "whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established."'. . . At the time of the use-of-force incident in September 2013, this court applied analogous standards to excessive-force claims brought under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . That is, under either amendment the question was whether the use of force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm. . . The force need not have been absolutely necessary, but we asked in Griffin 'whether the use of force could plausibly have been thought necessary.'. . In Griffin, this court held that the prison officials' use of a leg-sweep maneuver to gain control over a pretrial detainee who created a disturbance, resisted being moved, and struggled as two officers tried to guide her away from a nurse's station did not violate this standard. . . In Williams, prison officials used a chemical agent and assault team on an inmate who was ordered to 'pack up' his cell and responded by asking, 'What for, sir?' Williams v. Curtin, 631 F.3d 380, 384 (6th Cir. 2011). We concluded in Williams that the facts, if true, could permit a finding that the use of force was unnecessary, was not applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, and was possibly motivated by malicious purpose. . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, we conclude that a reasonable officer would have been on notice in September 2013 that use of a chemical agent on a non-threatening pretrial detainee who did not comply with the officer's verbal orders and then passively resisted an open-handed escort by hesitating and stopping to turn to ask again about seeing a nurse would amount to constitutionally excessive force. The denial of qualified immunity with respect to this claim was not error.")

Evans v. Plummer, 687 F. App'x 434, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("In sum, Evans 'fail[s] to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Feehan] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . Thus, 'in the light of pre-existing law,' it was not apparent that pointing a taser at Evans violated the Fourth Amendment. . . We therefore reverse the denial of qualified immunity to Feehan.")

Littlejohn v. Myers, 684 F. App'x 563, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("Myers' conclusion that Littlejohn constituted a threat rests entirely on a misplaced belief that Littlejohn was armed, and that he previously attempted a robbery. But at the moment that he was shot, it is hard to see what threat of serious harm Littlejohn posed to anyone in the alley. Upon resisting arrest by merely bucking his hips and evading Myers' grasp, Littlejohn never explicitly threatened Myers, never reached for a weapon, and never attempted to strike the officer. Instead, he immediately began to run. During his flight, Littlejohn did not reach to his side or make any comparable gesture that may have given a reasonable officer the impression that Littlejohn posed a serious threat. And the facts indicate that no one beside Myers was in the alley—removing any threat to an innocent bystander. Consequently, we conclude that a reasonable officer would not have exercised deadly force under the circumstances because Littlejohn did not constitute a threat to either the officer or to any bystanders. . . .Our conclusion is further buttressed by the fact Myers never warned Littlejohn that he might shoot, as required by Garner when feasible under the circumstances. . . Consequently, we agree that under Littlejohn's version of the facts, Myers violated Littlejohn's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .The district court held that an officer who employs deadly force against a fleeing suspect without reason to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of serious physical harm to himself or others constitutes an excessive force violation. In so doing, the district court relied upon this Circuit's 2007 decision, Bouggess v. Mattingly, to say such a right was clearly established. The aforementioned case clearly establishes a constitutional violation when an officer shoots a fleeing suspect in the back without a basis for believing that the suspect poses an imminent threat, regardless of the previous felony the suspect committed. . . As we have previously explained, Littlejohn did not pose a threat to the officer or to any innocent bystanders. Accordingly, a reasonable officer in Myers' position would know that the use of deadly force was not authorized.") Middaugh v. City of Three Rivers, 684 F. App'x 522, 529-30 (6th Cir. 2017), on remand from Piper v. Middaugh, 136 S. Ct. 2408 (2016) (per curiam) (vacating and remanding for further consideration in light of Mullenix) ("In light of this record, we affirm as a matter of law the district court's conclusion that the Officers acted unreasonably in violation of the Middaughs' Fourth Amendment rights. See Cochran, 656 F.3d at 308 (noting that "police officers [who] take an active role in a seizure or eviction" generally "are not entitled to qualified immunity ... when there is neither a specific court order permitting the officers' conduct nor any exigent circumstance in which the government's interest would outweigh the individual's interest in his property"). . . . In sum, Mullenix instructs that the qualified immunity inquiry must be formulated not based on general principles, but rather on officers' specific conduct, especially in the Fourth Amendment context. Whether the Middaughs' rights were clearly established depends on the 'objective legal reasonableness' of the Officers' specific conduct. . . This fact-specific analysis asks whether reasonable officials in the Officers' positions could have believed that their conduct was lawful at the time. . .We look to the totality of the circumstances here in light of then-existing precedent. For example, although we find the Officers' conduct here more similar to the physical interventions in Cochran and Hensley than the distant observation in Coleman, the conduct in both Cochran and Hensley includes some substantive distinctions from the Officers' conduct here. In those two cases, the officers engaged in direct confrontations with the plaintiffs. The officials in Cochran threatened to arrest the plaintiff, and in Hensley an official brandished his handgun, broke a car window, and pulled the plaintiff out of her car. Although the Officers here came onto the Middaughs' property, parked a patrol car between the Buick and the Middaughs' home, and stayed until Chrystal left with the Buick, the Officers neither threatened arrest nor used force. They had no direct interaction with the Plaintiffs. In light of the analysis in Mullenix, we find it not beyond debate that reasonable officers in their position could have believed their conduct was lawful under then-existing precedent. It is important to note that Mullenix does 'not require a case directly on point,' 136 S. Ct. at 308, and 'the very action in question' need not have 'previously been held unlawful,' Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 739 (2002). For example, 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . Mullenix does not undermine our circuit's longstanding holding that 'an action's unlawfulness can be apparent from direct holdings, from specific examples described as prohibited, or from the general reasoning that a court employs.'. . However, there is sufficient daylight between the Officers' conduct here and the conduct in Cochran and Hensley that those precedents may not 'apply with obvious clarity to [this] specific conduct.'. . Therefore, Officers Piper and Gipson are entitled to qualified immunity.") King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 581-83 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 640 (2018) ("[E]ven if King did impliedly concede probable cause by signing the Alford plea, that does not retroactively prove that there had been probable cause to support King's prosecution all along. . . .Nothing in Broaddus helps Defendants to use King's vacated Alford plea to prove, at summary judgment, that no reasonable trier of fact could find a lack of probable cause to support King's prosecution. Further, once the strength of the Alford plea is removed from the district court's probable-cause analysis, a genuine issue of material fact remains as to whether the 'facts and circumstances' known to Harwood would be 'sufficient to lead an ordinarily prudent person to believe' that King was guilty of murdering Breeden. . . . [I]n light of the fact that all reasonable inferences must be given to King at the summary-judgment stage, the district court erred in holding that King would be unable to prove the requisite lack of probable cause to win her malicious-prosecution claim. . . .[I]ndividuals have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has 'made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff" by, for example, 'knowingly or recklessly' making false statements that are material to the prosecution either in reports or in affidavits filed to secure warrants. . . .Though our ultimate ruling is based on the written record, Defendants' arguments at oral argument reflect just how much of the dispute before us consists of contested facts. Summary judgment is therefore inappropriate for disposing of King's malicious-prosecution claim against Harwood. We therefore hold that the district court erred in granting summary judgment for Harwood on the issue of Harwood's qualified immunity from suit.")

Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988, 992-94 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 738 (2018) ("The second prong resolves this case. Because no case clearly established the unlawfulness of the decisions made during Omar's arrest and detention, the officers involved are entitled to qualified immunity. Yes, 'a pretrial detainee's right to medical treatment for a serious medical need has been established since at least 1987.'. . . And yes, that right encompasses physiological and psychiatric ailments. . . But these principles do not suffice on their own. . . The Supreme Court recently reminded us that a plaintiff must identify a case with a similar fact pattern that would have given 'fair and clear warning to officers' about what the law requires. [White v. Pauly] The district court, we note, did not have the benefit of Pauly. But we do, and accordingly we must follow its lead. Immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. .Arrington-Bey has not pointed to, and we have not found, any case like this one—a case showing to 'all but the plainly incompetent' that the officers at the scene immediately needed to seek medical treatment or that the jailers had to do the same once he arrived at the prison. . . .Arrington-Bey's case citations are at least one step removed from this fact pattern. We begin with, and could end with, the reality that she points to no Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit case that requires officers to take a delusional arrestee like Omar to a hospital rather than a jail. Each of Arrington-Bey's cases fails to address this point, and not one involves remotely comparable facts. . . .In short, no clearly established law, here or anywhere else from what we've seen, required the arresting officers to drive Omar to a hospital rather than the jail under these circumstances. . . .Even if the jail officers knew that Omar was bipolar and delusional, no clearly established law required them to do more than what they did: They kept him in seclusion for everyone's safety, waited until he was calm to feed him and book him, asked him about any psychiatric diagnoses during the medical screening, and after eight hours of detention uncuffed him and released him from his cell to make a call to be released on bail. Because a reasonable officer in the situations confronted by officers Honsaker, Ellis, Chow, Hill, Lee, Mudra, Sindone, and Leonardi could have believed their treatment of Omar was lawful, they each are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Scott v. Kent County, 679 F. App'x 435, 441 (6th Cir. 2017) ("While Scott was being removed from a cell for disruptive conduct, he stepped towards Lyons in close quarters, unhandcuffed and with clenched fists. We have not found other Supreme Court or Circuit precedent that would have put Lyons on notice that his takedown was an excessive use of force in this situation. Because Scott has not met his burden on this inquiry, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Lyons on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Scott v. Kent County, 679 F. App'x 435, 441-42 (6th Cir. 2017) (Moore, J., dissenting) ("I disagree with the majority that Lyons is entitled to qualified immunity. There is ample evidence that 'the right which was violated was clearly established' in our circuit. . . We have held that an officer's conduct is not objectively reasonable where he performs a 'takedown' of an individual already in custody, who, despite being argumentative and possibly intoxicated, was not actually aggressive against any officers. . . .Although the video confirms that Scott was unruly and yelling in the holding cell, there is no indication that he was being physically aggressive toward any officers.")

Hermansen v. Thompson, No. 16-6197, 2017 WL 438225, at *3–4 (6th Cir. Feb. 1, 2017) (not published) ("As recently as last month, the Supreme Court unanimously and insistently reaffirmed its repeated admonition that, for purposes of qualified immunity, 'clearly established law' is not to be defined 'at a high level of generality,' but must be defined in a 'particularized' sense. . . The Court reiterated that although 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning' to government officials, their conduct is protected by qualified immunity unless its unlawfulness was 'apparent' or 'obvious' in light of pre-existing law. . .Applying this teaching, we find the instant record devoid of support, in fact or law, for the notion that it should have been obvious to defendants that their provision of kosher food products to Hermansen, prepared in a separate kitchen facility, was nonetheless violative of his First Amendment free exercise rights because the same utensils used to prepare or serve otherwise approved meat products had also been used to prepare or serve otherwise approved dairy products, at some point, without having first been kashered and certified by a rabbi. Hermansen contends these defendants are without excuse because they were on notice of the Froman case, where Kosher Meal Program Guidelines were implemented by agreement at KSR as early as 2010. Yet, even if one or more of the individual defendants was actually aware of the guidelines implemented by agreement at KSR, the fact remains that no court had, in authoritative precedent, interpreted the First Amendment as requiring strict compliance with the guidelines, whether at KSR or elsewhere. Even though the Froman agreement was enforced by district court order, it never ripened into a precedential ruling on the merits of the free exercise claim. The Froman agreement simply did not become precedent defining the 'clearly established law.' Accordingly, there was no error in the district court's ruling that defendants are protected from damages liability by qualified immunity and are therefore entitled to summary judgment on Hermansen's First Amendment claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.")

Courtright v. City of Battle Creek, 839 F.3d 513, 520 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Having failed to establish that Courtright's factual allegations did not plausibly allege the violation of a constitutional right, the defendants argue, in the alternative, that it was not clearly established that handcuffing without physically injuring the suspect constitutes excessive force. The premise of this argument is flawed. As discussed, Courtright did suffer physical injury: he suffered pain as a result of the manner in which he was handcuffed. Moreover, the relevant clearly established right in our circuit is 'freedom from excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing.'. . 'Requiring any more particularity than this would contravene the Supreme Court's explicit rulings that neither a "materially similar," "fundamentally similar," or "case directly on point"—let alone a factually identical case—is required, and that the specific acts or conduct at issue need not previously have been found unconstitutional for a right to be clearly established law.'. . Therefore, we affirm the district court's order denying the motion to dismiss the excessive-force claim based on qualified immunity.")

Stamm v. Miller, 657 F. App'x 492 (6th Cir. 2016) ("We have held that '[i]t has been settled law for a generation that, under the Fourth Amendment, '"w]here a suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others, the harm resulting from failing to apprehend him does not justify the use of deadly force to do so."'. . Though Walker was decided after the events giving rise to this case, its principle was not new, as we explicitly noted. In that case, which involved a collision similar to the one here, we noted that '[i]t is only common sense—and obviously so—that intentionally ramming a motorcycle with a police cruiser involves the application of potentially deadly force.'. . Thus, it is clearly established law that an officer may not use his police vehicle to intentionally hit a motorcycle unless the suspect on the motorcycle poses a threat to the officer or others. The evidence, construed in the light most favorable to Mrs. Stamm, indicates a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. Under Mrs. Stamm's version of the facts, Miller intended to block Stamm's passage with his police cruiser, causing the deadly collision. As the district court observed, the risk to others at the time of Miller's use of force was minimal, as there were no other vehicles in sight, and Stamm's motorcycle posed little threat to Miller, who was inside a much-larger vehicle. Because the facts as interpreted in the light most favorable to Mrs. Stamm indicate a violation of a clearly established constitutional right, and material facts are in dispute, the district court properly denied summary judgment to Miller").

Gohl v. Livonia Public Schools School Dist., 836 F.3d 672, 680-81 (6th Cir. 2016) ("The head-grabbing incident here mirrors the head-grabbing incident in Domingo and involves far less illegitimate force than the act of binding a student to a gurney and gagging him. What was true in Domingo is true here. While Turbiak's 'educational and disciplinary methods ... may have been inappropriate' and 'insensitive,' they are not 'unconstitutional.'. . . The Fourteenth Amendment's right to be free from excessive force may include, we have said, protection from physical force that causes only psychological injury. . . But we have never said that purely psychological bullying can suffice to shock the conscience. And we certainly have not said so with clarity that 'place[s] the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . That necessarily means that the right Gohl asserts is not clearly established, making Turbiak eligible for qualified immunity.") Gohl v. Livonia Public Schools School Dist., 836 F.3d 672, 698 (6th Cir. 2016) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("By fundamentally misapplying well-settled summary judgment standards, ignoring some of the most important facts, and disregarding evidence favorable to Gohl, the majority reveals how result-oriented it is in attempting to reach its own conclusions. The majority's approach to this case sidesteps the Supreme Court's clear direction that when reviewing a summary judgment decision, an appellate court must examine the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party and draw all inferences in that party's favor. This basic and fundamental principle of civil procedure seems lost on the majority in this case. All that matters here is that Gohl has presented enough evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact on each of her claims, and as a result, her case should go to a jury. For these reasons, this case should be reversed and remanded. I respectfully dissent.")

Gavitt v. Born, 835 F.3d 623, 648 (6th Cir. 2016) ("In Osborne, 557 U.S. at 68, the Supreme Court noted that 'nothing in our precedents' suggests that the prosecutor's obligation to disclose Brady material to the defendant before trial continues after the defendant is convicted and the case is closed. Gavitt has failed to cite any contrary authority. To the extent due process could be deemed to include such an obligation, it is not yet a matter of clearly established law and defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

D.E. v. Doe, 834 F.3d 723, 729, 733 (6th Cir. 2016) (Keith, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I cannot join the majority's interpretation of the Fourth Amendment. In holding that Customs and Border Protection ("CBP") officers may, without reasonable suspicion, search individuals who are not in the process of crossing an international border, the majority stretches the 'border search' exception to its breaking point. . . .While I am inclined to conclude that the right was clearly established, three other judges (the two on this panel, and the district court judge) have concluded—for whatever reason—that our unpublished decision in Humphries can be read as sanctioning the conduct in this case. While I disagree for the reasons explained above, Humphries' supposed muddling of the waters in this area compels me to conclude that it less likely that a reasonable official would have known that his conduct violated a clearly established right. See Sheets v. Moore, 97 F.3d 164, 168 (6th Cir. 1996) ("If federal district judges could reasonably disagree over the constitutionality of the regulation, then it can fairly be said that a reasonable official would not have known that his conduct violated a clearly established right."). Therefore, I concur in the judgment of the majority to dismiss D.E.'s civil rights complaint.")

Schattilly, ex rel A.F. v. Daugharty, 656 F. App'x 123, ___ (6th Cir. 2016)("With respect to her first claim, Schattilly has not identified any cases that support her contention that, in May 2011, it was clearly established that interviewing a juvenile about suspected parental abuse or neglect without parental consent violates a parent's First Amendment or Fourteenth Amendment rights. This is not surprising. First, these rights are typically grounded in the Fourteenth Amendment, not the First Amendment. . . And second, we recently held that as of January 2011, this right—as it pertains to the Fourteenth Amendment—was not clearly established. See Barber v. Miller, 809 F.3d 840, 842 (6th Cir. 2015). . . . Additionally, in an unpublished case, we held that, as of January 2010, it was not clearly established that interviewing a child in an abuse-and-neglect investigation without the parent's consent violated the parent's Fourteenth Amendment rights. Brent v. Wenk, 555 F. App'x 519, 530 (6th Cir. 2014). Schattilly does not provide any bases on which to distinguish Barber or Brent, nor does she point to any developments in the law from January 2011 to May 2011 that would warrant a different conclusion. . . Accordingly, we hold that officials do not violate clearly established First Amendment or Fourteenth Amendment rights by interviewing a child about suspected abuse or neglect by the parent without the parent's consent.")

Williams v. Morgan, 652 F. App'x 365, 374-75 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Officer Morgan also argues that the prohibition against this force was not clearly established. That is, under the facts established for purposes of this appeal, Officer Morgan is contending that he had no forewarning that it would be improper for him to accost a 13-year old girl, without provocation or resistance, use his size advantage to place her physically against a wall; verbally menace or threaten her while he twisted her arm behind her back and lifted her off the floor until he broke that arm; and then maintain pressure on that broken arm, despite her pleas for relief, as he forced her down the hall to the principal's office with further verbal threats. We disagree. This was clearly established. See Norton v. Stille, 526 F. App'x 509, 513-14 (6th Cir. 2013) (holding that the prohibition against gratuitous force was clearly established as of October 2010). But, even lacking a specific case on point, we conclude that this conduct, as alleged, was so gratuitous that Officer Morgan was nonetheless 'on notice that [this] conduct violate[d] established law even in novel factual circumstances.' See Hope, 536 U.S. at 741. Officer Morgan is not entitled to qualified immunity on this basis.")

Smith v. City of Wyoming, 821 F.3d 697, 711 (6th Cir. 2016) ("On the facts developed thus far, taken in a light favorable to Smith, the officers violated her Fourth Amendment rights when they made a warrantless entry into her home on March 9, 2012. The Supreme Court has consistently validated the right to retreat into one's home and avoid contact with the police. . . Any reasonable officer would have understood that to enter a private home after being expressly told the occupant could not speak with him, in the course of a routine child welfare check, flies in the face of this clearly established law. Qualified immunity does not protect the officers from liability for the constitutional violation under these circumstances. We therefore vacate the entry of judgment for the officers on this claim.")

Rapp v. Putman, 644 F. App'x 621, 627-28 (6th Cir. 2016) ("To state a valid Fourth Amendment malicious-prosecution claim, a plaintiff must establish four elements: (1) a criminal prosecution was initiated against the plaintiff and the defendant made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute; (2) there was no probable cause for the criminal prosecution; (3) as a consequence of the legal proceeding, the plaintiff suffered a deprivation of liberty apart from the initial seizure; and (4) the criminal proceeding was resolved in the plaintiff's favor. . . . The sole basis for plaintiff's retaliation claim against Poston is his refusal to intervene and stop the prosecution. Even reading plaintiff's complaint generously, it alleges a merely 'passive[ ] or neutral [ ]' role in the prosecution, insufficient to state a claim for malicious prosecution. . . Finally, by far the most evident deficiency in plaintiff's complaint is his failure to allege the third element, a 'deprivation of liberty.'. . Nowhere in his complaint does plaintiff allege that he was 'seized' or otherwise detained following the issuance of the citation. . . .The closest he comes is alleging that he 'was subject to the authority of the 54–B District Court or appellate Courts as a direct and proximate result of the conduct of Defendants.' This allegation echoes Justice Ginsburg's 'continuing seizure' doctrine from her concurrence in Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266 (1994), in which she argued that 'a defendant [released pretrial] is ... indeed "seized" for trial, so long as he is bound to appear in court and answer the state's charges.'. . However, neither the Supreme Court nor this court has adopted the 'continuing seizure' doctrine. . . Thus, even if we assume that being 'subject to the authority of the [court]' constitutes a Fourth Amendment seizure, defendants would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the particularized right alleged—the right to be free from a 'continuing seizure' by virtue of a pending criminal charge—is not clearly established. . . .Having failed to adequately allege several elements of his malicious-prosecution claim, plaintiff has failed to show that defendants violated his constitutional rights. As a result, the district court was correct to dismiss the malicious-prosecution claim, not because it was untimely, but because defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Brown v. Chapman, 814 F.3d 447, 460-62 (6th Cir. 2016) ("The heart of the parties' dispute is over the third factor—whether Brown was actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight. . . .The parties' dispute is resolved by the constraints placed on this court at this point in the litigation. We are obligated to take the plaintiff's facts as true and make all reasonable inferences from those facts in her favor. Accordingly, for the purposes of summary judgment, we assume that the facts show that Brown broke away from the officers in order to avoid further injury, that he was standing still at the time Chapman tasered him, and that therefore Brown was not actively resisting or evading arrest. Thus, a jury could find that Chapman's actions were not objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting him. . . . Mindful of the need to define the right narrowly, . . . we frame this question as whether Brown's right not to be tasered, after having broken away from police officers but while not threatening others or actively resisting arrest, was clearly established as of December 31, 2010. . . .In conducting this analysis, two lines of cases emerge. The first line of cases has held that there is no clearly established right not to be tasered when a suspect is actively resisting arrest. . . .The second line of cases has held that an individual's right to be free from a taser is clearly established when the individual is not actively resisting arrest or is already detained. . . .The right articulated above fits squarely within this second line of cases: as of December 31, 2010, it was clearly established that tasering a non-threatening suspect who was not actively resisting arrest constituted excessive force. Accordingly, Chapman is not entitled to summary judgment regarding the claimed Fourth Amendment violation based on his use of a taser.")

Gardner v. Evans, 811 F.3d 843, 846-48 (6th Cir. 2016) ("First, we address whether a constitutional violation occurred. The Tenants argue that the Inspectors violated their due process rights by failing to provide constitutionally sufficient notice of their ability to appeal the red-tag evictions. . . In response, the Inspectors assert that the telephone number and the offer to answer questions was sufficient to satisfy the constitutional notice requirement. . . They also assert that, because the Lansing Housing and Premises Code was extant and available to the public, the Tenants had constructive notice of the appeals process. . . The district court agreed with the Tenants, holding that our precedent in Flatford clearly established that direct and clear notice of an appeals process is necessary to satisfy the constitutional notice requirement. . . .For purposes of deciding this case, we need not determine whether the red-tags provided by the Inspectors meet the constitutional notice standard that we have just outlined. Even if we assume, without deciding, that the Tenants are correct and that the red-tags were constitutionally infirm, the Tenants cannot satisfy the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, namely, whether this constitutional notice requirement was clearly established. . . .Flatford stands for the principle that the tenant is entitled to the same notice that is afforded to the landlord. But it does not clearly establish the particularity or specificity required for such notice. A diversity of precedent highlights this general lack of clarity regarding the notice requirement for a post-deprivation appeals process. . . . Flatford did not clearly establish that a notice of eviction must include an explicit reference to the availability of any post-deprivation appeals process and the manner in such an appeal may be pursued. The case law is not so clear on this point as to render the Inspectors' actions unreasonable.")

Snow v. Nelson, 634 F. App'x 151, ___ (6th Cir. 2015) ("Here, the State did not secure a criminal conviction by improperly withholding exculpatory evidence. On the contrary, the record is clear that the State was complying with discovery requests. Moreover, there is no question that before a plea was discussed or trial dates set, Snow's attorney learned of the allegedly exculpatory information. Perhaps Snow would have been released earlier had the alleged misidentification come to light sooner, but he can have no complaints about the ultimate outcome of his case. The fifty-two days Snow spent in jail awaiting a plea or a trial is simply not the type of deprivation Brady claims are intended to remedy. Even were we to recognize a Brady claim in this context, defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity. As we held in Robertson v. Lucas, our precedent does not support any clearly established right of criminal defendants to receive exculpatory Brady material before plea bargaining. . . There, the court found that while every reasonable officer 'would know that they were under an obligation to present Brady material to the prosecutors in time for its effective use at trial,' the officers were under 'no clearly established obligation to disclose exculpatory Brady material to the prosecutors in time to be put to effective use in plea bargaining.'. . Here, Snow's attorney was aware of the alleged misidentification prior to any plea bargaining. Thus, defendants are well within the ambit of qualified immunity.")

Devlin v. Kalm, 630 F. App'x 534, 538-39 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Devlin also must show that his First Amendment rights in this setting were clearly established when the agency fired him on July 24, 2008. This is rarely an easy question given the fact-specific nature of Pickering-balancing inquiries, but Devlin satisfies the test in this instance. It was well established that Devlin's speech on the regulation of tribes addressed a matter of public concern. . . And it was well established that he spoke outside the duties of his employment. . . As to the third question, our Pickering caselaw points in the same direction. It was well established by mid–2008 that Devlin's speech 'substantially involved matters of public concern' and thus the officers had to 'make a particularly strong showing that the employee's speech interfered with workplace functioning before taking action.'. . And a reasonable officer could not find that Devlin's speech was sufficiently disruptive of the internal workplace—which Pickering balancing is primarily focused on—to lose protection. . . . In scenarios such as this one—where the violation of a constitutional right is 'so obvious that a materially similar case would be unnecessary'—a case directly on point (which is lacking here) is not required. Paterek v. Vill. of Armada, 801 F.3d 630, 651–52 (6th Cir.2015). Devlin's First Amendment rights were clearly established.")

Stinebaugh v. City of Wapakoneta, 630 F. App'x 522, 531 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Rains and Krites argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because reasonable officials could have believed that Stinebaugh's speech was not protected. We disagree. The district court properly found that reasonable officials in Rains's and Krites's positions could not have believed their conduct was lawful given the state of the law as it existed at the time of the events giving rise to this action. . . . Likewise, it is clearly established in this circuit that an off-duty public employee who speaks to city council members about city expenditures may be a private citizen for First Amendment purposes, even if those comments involve expenditures by his own agency or department. . .Thus, the district court properly denied qualified immunity.")

Bible Believers v. Wayne Cnty., Mich., 805 F.3d 228, 252, 257-60 (6th Cir. 2015) (en banc) ("The Supreme Court, in Cantwell, Terminiello, Edwards, Cox, and Gregory, has repeatedly affirmed the principle that 'constitutional rights may not be denied simply because of hostility to their assertion or exercise.'. . . If the speaker's message does not fall into one of the recognized categories of unprotected speech, . . . the message does not lose its protection under the First Amendment due to the lawless reaction of those who hear it. Simply stated, the First Amendment does not permit a heckler's veto. In this Circuit, a modicum of confusion is understandable with respect to the prohibition against the heckler's veto due to Glasson's discussion of a good-faith affirmative defense. However, this defense is inconsistent with subsequent Supreme Court precedent, with the strict scrutiny that must be applied to content-based discrimination, and with the superseding affirmative defense to a § 1983 suit—qualified immunity. . . Therefore, to the extent that *Glasson'*s good-faith defense may be interpreted as altering the substantive duties of a police officer not to effectuate a heckler's veto, it is overruled. . . . Whether Deputy Chiefs Richardson and Jaafar can be held liable for civil damages is a separate question from whether their actions violated the Constitution. . . Although Glasson spoke about a good-faith defense, qualified immunity—announced seven years after Glasson in Harlow v. Fitzgerald—is the presently available affirmative defense for government officials subject to liability under § 1983. . . . Deputy Chief Defendants Richardson and Jaafar contend that, 'no "clearly established" law existed on the subject of correct law enforcement response to a situation where speakers may or may not be engaged in protected speech, the audience in proximity to the speech reacts violently, and the deputies do not have sufficient manpower to restrain the audience, to protect the speakers, and to ensure their own safety.'. . The Deputy Chiefs' position is untenable and unsupported by the record. As is evident from the Supreme Court opinions detailed above, and as explicitly stated in Glasson, '[a] police officer has the duty not to ratify and effectuate a heckler's veto.... Instead, he must take reasonable action to protect from violence persons exercising their constitutional rights.'. . Defendants were specifically put on notice of this requirement, insofar as the Bible Believers quoted this precise language in a letter that was sent to Wayne County. To the extent that Glasson's discussion of a good-faith defense confused the issue of whether a heckler's veto constitutes a constitutional violation, the facts and analysis in Glasson nonetheless alerted Defendants that removing a peaceful speaker, when the police have made no serious attempt to quell the lawless agitators, could subject them to liability. . . .Defendants emphasize the fact that Glasson involved an officer tearing up a sign in response to agitated hecklers, as opposed to officers removing a speaker in an attempt to quell an angry crowd that was actually engaged in violent retaliation. These distinctions are immaterial. The violence here was not substantial, much less overwhelming, and speech, whether it be oration or words written on a poster, is speech nonetheless. Moreover, this case was also about removing from view signs that were considered offensive by a group of hecklers—as Israel informed the Deputy Chiefs, his group was no longer preaching during the latter portion of the onslaught against them. Finally, it should be noted that Glasson involved a more compelling state interest—protection of the President—yet the officers' actions were still deemed to be unreasonable. . . .Had the Bible Believers refused to leave, and consequently been arrested, charged, and convicted of disorderly conduct, the convictions could certainly be held invalid pursuant to Gregory. . . The Bible Believers' decision to comply with the police officers' demands, under threat of arrest for disorderly conduct—as opposed to the speaker's decision in Gregory to disregard the officer's command—cannot stand for the proposition that there was no clearly established law as to whether the police may threaten to arrest a peaceful speaker in order to calm a hostile crowd of hecklers. . . Gregory, like this case, involved protestors who used offensive language and, in response, were assaulted with debris by a violent crowd of hecklers. On facts such as these, state-sanctioned penalties for alleged breaches of the peace cannot withstand constitutional scrutiny.")

Welch v. Spaulding, 627 F. App'x 479, 484 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The legal question of immunity will ultimately depend on which version of the facts the jury finds most credible. Brandenburg v. Cureton, 882 F.2d 211, 216 (6th Cir.1989). Thus, we find as a matter of law that it is clearly established that the prison must provide adequate nutrition to prisoners, despite religious restrictions. Welch has demonstrated that his allegations—if accepted by a jury—give rise to a constitutional violation. He has therefore made Plumhoff's required showing to defeat defendants' claim of qualified immunity at this stage, and established a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the particular restricted diet in his case was so lacking as to violate this established right. Accordingly, we AFFIRM the district court's order denying qualified immunity.")

Welch v. Spaulding, 627 F. App'x 479, 484-88 (6th Cir. 2015) (McKeague, J., dissenting) ("This qualified-immunity case presents two purely legal questions of constitutional interpretation. After taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff—i.e., that the prisoner (Welch) received only 1,300 calories a day for the month of his religious fast—we must decide (1) whether administering such a diet violated the Constitution; and (2) if so, whether that violation was clearly established at the time of the fast. . . . The majority answered 'yes' to both questions, affirming the district court's denial qualified immunity. I would answer 'no' to both, because Welch has not met his burden of producing evidence that shows a constitutional violation, much less a clearly established one. The majority, however, affirms the district judge's improper denial of qualified immunity—improper both because (A) Welch did not meet his burden of producing evidence that the officials violated the Constitution; and because (B) even if they did violate the Constitution, the right at issue was not clearly established. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent. . . . It all, then, boils down to this: The majority holds that the First Amendment requires a specific number of calories during a religious fast. That's the only possible way to understand its judgment. It doesn't matter that the lower number of calories didn't cause any substantial burden-none. All that matters is that the number of calories the plaintiff received was less than the other inmates or others in the plaintiff's age group. Lacking even an alleged substantial burden, Welch cannot make out a First Amendment violation. . . .As misguided as the majority's novel constitutional holding is, the error in its determination of the clearly established law is worse. Even assuming the defendants violated Welch's First Amendment right to a nutritionally adequate diet during a prison fast, how can we possibly hold that such a violation was clearly established? There is simply no way that 'every reasonable official would have understood' that administering a 1,300–calorie–per–day diet for thirty days during an inmate's religious fast—with no evident or even alleged adverse effects to the inmate—violates the First Amendment. . . These officials should not be subject to personal liability because, if nothing else, Welch has not met his burden of showing that they violated a 'clearly established' constitutional right. . . . I've already gone through all the cases the majority cites, and none of them establishes anything more than the generalized right to a 'nutritionally adequate diet' during a religious fast. That was enough for the district court, and it's apparently enough for the majority, too. But it shouldn't be. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Courts must instead define the law in a particularized sense, by looking for a body of law that 'squarely governs' the conduct at issue. . . The majority's cited cases no more 'squarely govern' this case than Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), 'squarely governs' all excessive-force cases. . . Indeed, until now, not one Sixth Circuit case has even allowed this kind of alleged violation to proceed to a jury. How, then, can the right be clearly established? The majority's telling silence on this issue—and its telling failure to even try to support its prong-two conclusion with caselaw—suffices to demonstrate its error. If anything is clearly established here, it's that this was not a clearly established constitutional violation. . . .To affirm on the ground that the defendants violated a clearly established First Amendment right is wrong both because of the startling lack of facts to prove such a violation and because of the even-more-startling lack of caselaw to clearly establish that right.") Paterek v. Vill. of Armada, Mich., 801 F.3d 630, 650-51 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants contend that Delecke is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to each of the constitutional claims, but they fail to offer any analysis on this point, other than to say that Delecke's actions did not offend the Constitution. This failure to address the clearly established prong of our inquiry is unsurprising given the complete absence of case law with remotely comparable fact patterns—a point, which at first glance, seems to weigh in favor of Delecke's claim for qualified immunity. . . However, 'a case directly on point' is not required to establish that the law is clearly established, Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2083, 179 L.Ed.2d 1149 (2011), because '[s]ome violations of constitutional rights are so obvious that a materially similar case' would be unnecessary, Hearring v. Sliwowski, 712 F.3d 275, 280 (6th Cir.2013). At bottom, the dispositive inquiry is whether, at the time of injury, the law was 'sufficiently clear [such] that a reasonable official would understand that what he [was] doing violate[d]' the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . The allegations in this case, if proven, would constitute an obvious violation of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights of which any reasonable official should have been aware. Viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the facts suggest that Delecke used his government post to harass and retaliate against Plaintiffs by causing tickets to be issued and by denying Plaintiffs the rights bestowed to them under their SALUs. It is fundamental that the right to be free of such retaliation, arbitrary and capricious state action, and disparate treatment with no rational basis is clearly established.") Baynes v. Cleland, 799 F.3d 600, 611-16 & n.3 (6th Cir. 2015) ("In Hope, the Supreme Court established that, for purposes of qualified immunity, the precise factual scenario need not have been found unconstitutional for it to be sufficiently clear to a reasonable official that his actions violate a constitutional right—that is, for the right to be 'clearly established.'. . In fact, the Supreme Court determined that government officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances. . . .To be sure, the Supreme Court also has also explained that generalizations and abstract propositions are insufficient to establish the law clearly. . . .Reading these cases together, the Supreme Court has made clear that the sine qua non of the 'clearly established' inquiry is 'fair warning.'. . While it is apparent that courts should not define clearly established law at a high level of generality, it is equally apparent that this does not mean that 'a case directly on point' is required. . . In fact, under Hope, a requirement that a prior case be 'fundamentally' or 'materially' similar to the present case would be too rigid an application of the clearly established inquiry. . . Rather, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,' al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083, although the specific conduct need not have been found unconstitutional. . . Our task, then, is to determine whether the contours of the right at issue have been made sufficiently clear to give a reasonable official fair warning that the conduct at issue was unconstitutional. This test has been applied, both explicitly and implicitly, in our own jurisprudence. . . In applying this test, both pre- and post-Hope, we have found that freedom from excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing is a clearly established right for purposes of qualified immunity. . . .The extent of case law in this Circuit suffices to put a reasonable officer on notice that excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing is a constitutional violation under the Fourth Amendment. The cases in this Circuit place it beyond peradventure that such a right exists; thus, the law is sufficiently clear for the purpose of the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis. These cases define the right that is clearly established not at a high level of generality or on the basis of a broad historical proposition, . . . but rather, in a particularized context: excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing, a type of excessive force, is a type of Fourth Amendment violation, which, in turn, is a constitutional violation. This level of particularity in defining the constitutional right easily meets the standards set out by the Supreme Court, which requires that the contours of a right to be sufficiently clear under preexisting law. . . Although the court first found the constitutional right at issue clearly established in this Circuit, in its subsequent pursuit of what it called a 'more particularized inquiry,' it then determined that the law had not been clearly established, essentially because no prior case presented the exact factual circumstances present in this case. The factual nuances the district court noted to distinguish Baynes' case from this Court's extensive precedent on unduly tight handcuffing amount to precisely the kind of rigidity the Supreme Court foreclosed in Hope. Hope was unequivocal in mandating that precise factual similarity is not required . . . . In this case, under the guise of determining whether the law regarding excessively forceful handcuffing is clearly established, the district court essentially made a determination of whether it believed that Deputy Cleland's behavior was reasonable—in other words, whether the deputy should be liable for a claim of unduly tight or excessive handcuffing. But such a determination infringes on the province of the jury and is therefore improper. The trial court had already determined—appropriately so—that Baynes had adduced sufficient evidence to state a claim for excessively forceful handcuffing sufficient to survive a motion for summary judgment. Indeed, Baynes had established already that genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether the deputies acted objectively reasonably. Then, a few pages later, the district court decided that, based on its view of the facts, there was an 'absence of ... egregious, abusive, or malicious conduct' that 'support[ed] the reasonableness of the deputy's conduct.' Such a determination is inappropriate under a 'clearly established' analysis. Once a plaintiff demonstrates a genuine issue of material fact as to whether there has been a constitutional violation, by making out a claim of excessively forceful handcuffing sufficient to survive summary judgment, weighing the evidence and determining whether an officer should be liable are tasks exclusively for the jury. In this case, however, the district court turned the factual determinations best left to the jury into factors militating in favor of qualified immunity. That is not the role of the district court in analyzing the second prong of a qualified immunity analysis; rather, it is to determine whether the law was clearly established at the time of the allegedly unconstitutional conduct. As discussed, supra, while a right may not be 'clearly established' at a 'high level of generality' or by broad historical assertions, neither must the specific conduct at issue have been found unconstitutional for a reasonable officer to be on notice that the conduct is unconstitutional. Rather, the contours of the right must be sufficiently clear such that a reasonable officer has fair warning. . . Such is the case in the Sixth Circuit with respect to the law surrounding excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing under the Fourth Amendment. Because, in the Sixth Circuit, the right to be free from excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing under the Fourth Amendment is clearly established law, no more specificity in defining this right is required. We recognize, however, that the district court's error was based in part on reliance on our unpublished decisions in Fettes v. Hendershot, 375 F. App'x 528 (6th Cir.2010) and Lee v. City of Norwalk, Ohio, 529 F. App'x 778 (6th Cir.2013). We also note that the case of O'Malley v. City of Flint, 652 F.3d 662 (6th Cir.2011), would seem to disagree with our conclusion here.").

Coley v. Lucas Cnty., Ohio, 799 F.3d 530, 540-41 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The key inquiry is whether a defendant claiming qualified immunity 'was on notice that his alleged actions were unconstitutional.'. . The inquiry 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . We look first to Supreme Court decisions, then Sixth Circuit case law in order to determine if the right claimed was clearly established when the events occurred. . . The plaintiff 'has the burden of showing that a right is clearly established,' while the defendant 'carries the burden of showing that the challenged act was objectively reasonable in light of the law existing at the time.'. . At the time of the incident, pretrial detainees had a clearly established right not to be gratuitously assaulted while fully restrained and subdued. . . Under the Fourteenth, Fourth, or Eighth Amendments, assaults on subdued, restrained and nonresisting detainees, arrestees, or convicted prisoners are impermissible. . . The facts alleged show that Schmeltz assaulted the fully restrained Benton so that he fell and hit his head on the cement floor.

Schmeltz then attempted to cover up the assault by filing false reports and lying to federal investigators after Benton's death. These actions reasonably lead us to conclude that Schmeltz violated clearly established law and was 'on notice that his alleged actions were unconstitutional.'. . Schmeltz's argument that his actions did not violate clearly established law fails. . . . Having determined that Gray violated Benton's constitutional rights, we turn again to whether the right in question—to be free from deadly physical force such as a chokehold while fully restrained—was clearly established, providing Gray notice that 'what he [was] doing violate[d] that right.'. . Our cases make it abundantly clear that it is constitutionally impermissible to abuse a shackled prisoner to the point of death and then leave him to die in his cell. . . Chokeholds are objectively unreasonable where an individual is already restrained or there is no danger to others. . . Gray's actions as described in the complaint violated clearly established law: Gray put Benton in a chokehold and continued to choke him even after Gray heard him gurgling and another officer told Gray to stop, and Gray left Benton in his cell without medical care. Gray's efforts to hide evidence of his actions, by filing false reports and lying to federal investigators, reasonably lead to the conclusion that he knew he had violated the law. In short, like Schmeltz, Gray behaved like someone who 'was on notice that his alleged actions were unconstitutional.'. . Gray's argument that his actions did not violate clearly established law thus also fails.")

Gradisher v. City of Akron, 794 F.3d 574, 584-86 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Gradisher argues that his 'right to be free from a warrantless forced entry absent exigent circumstances was clearly established on September 2, 2011, and, therefore, these defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.' But Gradisher frames the issue at too high a level of generality. . .The appropriate question to ask is whether, on September 2, 2011, it was clearly established that no exigent circumstance exists when officers enter a residence in response to multiple erratic 911 calls from there and when they believe that someone inside may have threatened the use of a gun. . . .Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Gradisher, we are unpersuaded that the defendants violated any of his clearly established rights by entering his house. As our precedent establishes, such an entry may be justified if there is evidence that an individual in a residence has a gun and officials receive a 911 call from within that residence that was hung up. . . . The parties dispute whether or not Gradisher was resisting or refusing to be handcuffed. . . . Thus, whether Gradisher resisted or not and whether he was given an opportunity to comply with commands before, and while, being tased are material facts in dispute. 'Where, as here, the legal question of qualified immunity turns upon which version of the facts one accepts, the jury, not the judge, must determine liability.'. . Accordingly, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to Officer Craft on Gradisher's excessive-force cause of action.")

Booker v. Lapaglia, 617 F. App'x 520, 525-26 (6th Cir. 2015) ("A remand here will result in the district court developing the factual record. Despite the dissent's contentions, Shelton's specific role in the search and his relationship to LaPaglia and the other officers involved in the hospital search cannot be determined on the present record. Despite the lack of record, the dissent improperly reads like an order granting summary judgment against Shelton in Booker's favor by focusing on various facts irrelevant to Shelton's liability, like events leading up to the hospital search not alleged to be constitutional violations. While the dissent suggests there is nothing to be gained from a remand, such factual development of the record may very well entitle Shelton to qualified immunity. At the very least, he will have been heard on that issue. But as it stands now, we cannot distinguish between Shelton's involvement and that of the other officers as is required by our precedent. . . We therefore vacate and remand for the district court to address Shelton's role in the search and to properly evaluate his qualified immunity defense.")

Booker v. Lapaglia, 617 F. App'x 520, 527, 532-35 (6th Cir. 2015) (Karen Nelson More, J., dissenting) ("This appeal is ripe for adjudication because there is nothing more for the district court to do; the record will not change, and neither will the law as of February 12, 2010. . . . When the record is viewed in the light most favorable to Booker, this search violated the Fourth Amendment. A reasonable jury could find that Shelton caused, watched, and was complicit in the unconstitutional searches, and therefore violated the Fourth Amendment. . . .Even if we were not bound by Booker I, however, I would have no trouble finding that the law was clearly established in February 2010 that an officer cannot use private parties to conduct illegal searches. . . . I also believe that it was clearly established that this search was far more invasive than other searches the Supreme Court and other circuits have found unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has declared that forcible surgery and induced vomiting are unreasonable investigative searches. . . I do not have to strain to conclude that penological goals do not justify anesthetizing, paralyzing, intubating, and anally probing someone if induced vomiting is 'too close to the rack and screw to permit constitutional differentiation.'. . Both Rochin and Winston significantly predate this search. . . . Finally, our holding that, on February 12, 2010, the right to be free from forced anesthetization, paralyzation, intubation, and warrantless rectal examinations to prevent a suspect from overdosing on drugs lodged in his rectum was clearly established is consistent with the Ninth Circuit. In George v. Edholm, the Ninth Circuit concluded that a warrantless digital rectal examination and forced sedation and intubation violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Not only was it a constitutional violation, but the right to be free of that procedure had been clearly established long before March 13, 2004. I see no reason to create a circuit split, and therefore would hold that no reasonable officer would believe that this search was reasonable under the circumstances apparent in this record.")

Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 641-44 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Our cases firmly establish that it is not excessive force for the police to tase someone (even multiple times) when the person is actively resisting arrest. . . Active resistance includes 'physically struggling with, threatening, or disobeying officers.'. . And it includes refusing to move your hands for the police to handcuff you, at least if that inaction is coupled with other acts of defiance. . .But active resistance does not include being 'compliant or hav[ing] stopped resisting,'. . . or having 'done nothing to resist arrest,' or having 'already [been] detained[.]'. . .A simple dichotomy thus emerges: When a suspect actively resists arrest, the police can use a taser (or a knee strike) to subdue him; but when a suspect does not resist, or has stopped resisting, they cannot. . . .A reasonable police officer observing this scene in the heat of the moment did not need to give Carpenter any more time to comply before tasing him. Because Carpenter 'actively resist[ed] arrest and refus[ed] to be handcuffed,'. . . a reasonable jury applying the law of our circuit could conclude only that the officers were constitutionally able to use the force they did to subdue him. . . .Now assume we got it completely wrong. On the constitutional point (prong one), assume Carpenter gets it right: The officers violated the Fourth Amendment because Carpenter did not resist enough to justify the knee strike or the one-time use of a taser. We would still have to reverse. . . .The district court wrote that 'this case do[es] not fall neatly into the[ ] categories' of clearly established taser law. . . That's a concession that it could find no clearly established constitutional violation, and the court should have stopped there—and held for the defendants. In fact, we have done the same in an excessive-force case that 'does not fit cleanly within' our taser case law . . . because qualified immunity operates in the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'")

Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 644, 647-48 (6th Cir. 2015) (Bernice Bouie Donald, J., concurring only in the judgment) ("In my view, the facts in this case—properly construed in Lawrence Carpenter's favor—did not justify the level of force employed by the officers. However, in light of the Supreme Court's recent heightening of the second prong of the qualified-immunity standard, I agree with the majority that the officers in this case are entitled to qualified immunity. Because I would hold that the officers' nearly immediate resort to the use of a taser constituted excessive force, I concur only in the judgment. . . . In its recent pronouncements on qualified immunity, the Supreme Court arguably has heightened the standard to clarify that a right is clearly established if it is 'sufficiently clear "that every reasonable official would [have understood] that what he is doing violates that right."'. . . Prior case law merely required a right to be 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right'—not every reasonable official. . . Nor was any identical case required to be on point . . . . Now, however, the law at the time of the officers' conduct must have placed the constitutional question 'beyond debate.'. . Here, as demonstrated by my disagreement with the majority regarding the constitutionality of the officers' use of a taser in this scenario, the constitutional question is not—as it must be—'beyond debate.'. . I would hold that the officers' practically immediate resort to the use of a taser in this 26–second encounter violated Carpenter's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. But because the question is debatable, it cannot be said that the officers' mistaken belief in the justification of their actions signals that they are 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowing[ ] violat[ors of] the law.'. .Accordingly, I concur only in the judgment.")

Webb v. United States, 789 F.3d 647, 659-60, 662, 670 (6th Cir. 2015) ("To succeed on a malicious-prosecution claim under Bivens or § 1983, a plaintiff must prove the following: (1) the defendant made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff; (2) there was no probable cause for the criminal prosecution; (3) as a consequence of the legal proceedings, the plaintiff suffered a deprivation of liberty apart from the initial arrest; and (4) the criminal proceeding was resolved in the plaintiff's favor. . . As there is no dispute that Webb and Price were deprived of their liberty as a result of criminal proceedings that were resolved in their favor, we focus on the first and second elements. Within the meaning of the first element, 'the term "participated" should be construed within the context of tort causation principles. Its meaning is akin to "aided." To be liable for "participating" in the decision to prosecute, the officer must participate in a way that aids in the decision, as opposed to passively or neutrally participating.'. . Webb and Price were arrested and charged following grand-jury indictments. As a general rule, 'the finding of an indictment, fair upon its face, by a properly constituted grand jury, conclusively determines the existence of probable cause.' . . An exception to this general rule applies when defendants knowingly or recklessly present false testimony to the grand jury to obtain the indictment. . . .A law-enforcement defendant is deliberately indifferent—and therefore not entitled to qualified immunity—if he mistakenly identifies an individual as a suspect when the individual does not match the suspect's description. . . . Because there is a dispute of material fact as to whether Webb and Conrad looked alike, we cannot determine that it was objectively reasonable for Lucas to believe that the person who sold him drugs on October 14, 2005, was Webb unless he undertook appropriate efforts to confirm Webb's identity in light of potential differences. Nothing in the record indicates that Lucas undertook such efforts. Accordingly, a jury could reasonably conclude that Lucas's grand-jury testimony contained knowing or reckless falsehoods as to the identity of the person who sold him drugs, and therefore the grand-jury indictment against Webb cannot be the basis for probable cause at summary judgment. . . . The district court held that all individual Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Price's fabrication-of-evidence claims because there was independent evidence to support probable cause. . . But there are genuine issues of material fact as to the existence of probable cause against Price. More importantly, even if independent evidence establishes probable cause against a suspect, it would still be unlawful for law-enforcement officers to fabricate evidence in order to strengthen the case against that suspect. . . Accordingly, it was improper for the district court to grant summary judgment to Lucas, Metcalf, and Faith for fabricating evidence against Price on the basis that there was probable cause to charge Price.")

Northrup v. City of Toledo Police Dep't, 785 F.3d 1128, 1131-34 (6th Cir. 2015) ("In today's case, Officer Bright relies on two 'specific and articulable facts': Northrup's open possession of a firearm and the 911 call about what Northrup was doing. The Fourth Amendment no doubt permitted Bright to approach Northrup and to ask him questions. But that is not what he did. He relied on these facts to stop Northrup, disarm him, and handcuff him. Ohio law permits the open carry of firearms, Ohio Rev.Code § 9.68(C)(1), and thus permitted Northrup to do exactly what he was doing. While the dispatcher and motorcyclist may not have known the details of Ohio's open-carry firearm law, the police officer had no basis for such uncertainty. If it is appropriate to presume that citizens know the parameters of the criminal laws, it is surely appropriate to expect the same of law enforcement officers—at least with regard to unambiguous statutes. Heien v. North Carolina, 135 S.Ct. 530, 540 (2014). Clearly established law required Bright to point to evidence that Northrup may have been 'armed and dangerous.' Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 64 (1968) (emphasis added). Yet all he ever saw was that Northrup was armed—and legally so. . . . This requirement and the impropriety of Officer Bright's demands are particularly acute in a State like Ohio. Not only has the State made open carry of a firearm legal, but it also does not require gun owners to produce or even carry their licenses for inquiring officers. . . .If Bright had no reason to stop and frisk Northrup, he violated clearly established law in handcuffing—fully seizing—Northrup in his squad car for thirty minutes. . . . Unlike Officer Bright, Sergeant Ray is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Sergeant Ray did not arrive until after Northrup was handcuffed in the back of Officer Bright's police car. Ray was then told Bright's account of events, including of Northrup's 'furtive movement' toward his gun and his failure to produce identification when initially requested. . . With this information in hand, Ray contacted the Toledo Police Department detective's bureau to help determine the proper charge. A detective advised Ray to cite Northrup for failure to disclose personal information, Ohio Rev.Code § 2921.29, which Ray and Bright then did. Northrup has a claim against Sergeant Ray only if we infer that Officer Bright, in his initial conversation apprising Ray of recent events, confessed to an illegal seizure. There is no basis in the record for such an inference. . . . Accordingly, Ray should receive qualified immunity.") Wenk v. O'Reilly, 783 F.3d 585, 598-600 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Schott does not contest that the Wenks' right to be free from retaliation for exercising their First Amendment right to criticize school officials is clearly established. Rather, Schott argues that 'a reasonable governmental official in [Schott's] position would not recognize that, by following a mandatory obligation to report abuse, she is violating federal law.'. . Schott does not cite any federal case law to support her argument, and instead cites only Ohio's mandatory reporting statutory scheme. . . Schott points to the fact that Ohio imposes no good faith requirement on mandatory reporters and provides that they are absolutely immune from civil and criminal liability for those reports. Ohio Rev.Code § 2151.421(G)(1)(a). As an initial matter, we note that Schott does not take the facts in the light most favorable to the Wenks in framing the clearly-established-law inquiry, as she must do on appeal. . . . The premise of Schott's argument is that Schott in fact believed herself to be following her mandatory duty to report child abuse under Ohio law when she reported the Wenks to FCCS. However, this argument ignores the factual disputes that the district court found as to whether Schott would have reported the Wenks absent their protected conduct. Reading those disputes in the light most favorable to the Wenks suggests that Schott did not think that the report she made to FCCS was required under Ohio's mandatory reporting law. . . . A reasonable official in Schott's position would have understood that what she did violated the Wenks' right to be free from retaliation for exercising their First Amendment rights. Our decision in Jenkins, decided in 2008, made clear that school officials can be liable if they make reports of child abuse to retaliate against parents for exercising their First Amendment rights. . . Although the report in Jenkins was false, the heart of a First Amendment retaliation claim, which we have reaffirmed numerous times before 2011, is that '[a]n act taken in retaliation for the exercise of a constitutionally protected right is actionable under § 1983 even if the act, when taken for a different reason, would have been proper.' Bloch, 156 F.3d at 681–82 (emphasis added). Under this rule, it is clear that the distinction between a completely false report and a partially false report does not matter. At oral argument, Schott appeared to frame the inquiry slightly differently, asking whether a reasonable school official would think that the immunity conferred under Ohio law for reports of child abuse made in bad faith would prevent liability for violating the Wenks' clearly established right not to be retaliated against for exercising their First Amendment rights. The Supreme Court has long held 'that a state law that immunizes government conduct otherwise subject to suit under § 1983 is preempted, even where the federal civil rights litigation takes place in state court, because the application of the state immunity law would thwart the congressional remedy, ... which of course already provides certain immunities for state officials.' Felder v. Casey, 487 U.S. 131, 139 (1988). . . .In sum, we hold that the Wenks' right to be free from retaliation for exercising their First Amendment rights was clearly established at the time of this case, and that a reasonable official in Schott's position would have understood that filing a child abuse report in bad faith violated the Wenks' rights.")

Flying Dog Brewery, LLLP v. Michigan Liquor Control Comm'n, 597 F. App'x 342, 352, 355 (6th Cir. 2015) ("We begin with the district court's analysis on the second part of the qualified immunity inquiry: whether the constitutional right the Administrative Commissioners are alleged to have violated was clearly established at the time the Commissioners acted. . . .By the time the Administrative Commissioners banned Flying Dog's beer label in 2009, the clear line of Supreme Court commercial speech precedents, coupled with our own decision in Sambo's and the persuasive opinion of the Second Circuit in Bad Frog Brewery, should have placed any reasonable state liquor commissioner on notice that banning a beer label based on its content would violate the First Amendment unless the Central Hudson test was satisfied. Consequently, we disagree with the district court's determination that applicable First Amendment law was not clearly established in 2009 and set aside the grant of qualified immunity to the Commissioners.")

Moore v. Money, 590 F. App'x 562, 565-66 (6th Cir. 2014) ("After the district court issued its opinion, the Supreme Court in Lane v. Franks, —— U.S. ——, 134 S.Ct. 2369, 2374–75, 189 L.Ed.2d 312 (2014), a case arising from the Eleventh Circuit, held that the First Amendment protects a public employee who provides truthful testimony under oath outside of his ordinary job duties. Nonetheless, the Court upheld qualified immunity for the defendant because at the time of Lane's 2008 and 2009 trial testimony, neither Eleventh Circuit nor Supreme Court precedent provided clear notice that a public employee's testimony, given under oath and outside the scope of his ordinary job duties, is entitled to First Amendment protection. . . In so holding, the Supreme Court determined that 'the relevant question for qualified immunity purposes' is whether the defendant could 'reasonably have believed, at the time he fired [the plaintiff], that a government employer could fire an employee on account of testimony the employee gave....'. . . To answer that question, the Supreme Court looked to Eleventh Circuit decisions addressing whether testimony, either in-court testimony or deposition testimony, is protected employee speech. . . Here, as the district conceded, at the time of Moore's testimony and the alleged retaliatory conduct, neither this Court nor the Supreme Court had addressed whether in-court testimony is protected public employee speech. . . Moreover, as highlighted by the Court in Lane, there was a circuit split among the other circuit courts that had decided this issue. . . Thus, at the time of Moore's testimony, there was no 'controlling authority' or a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' that could have put Defendants on notice that Moore's testimony was protected by the First Amendment.")

Roberson v. Torres, 770 F.3d 398, 407 (6th Cir. 2014) ("As a theoretical matter, spraying a chemical agent upon a sleeping prisoner might not violate clearly established law where the corrections officer, under the circumstances, reasonably believed that the prisoner was in fact awake but disobeying the order. But that is not Torres's claim here, nor does Roberson concede such a reasonable belief on Torres's part. We are required to 'take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment.'. . On those facts, we agree that using a chemical agent in an initial attempt to wake a sleeping prisoner, without apparent necessity and in the absence of mitigating circumstances, violates clearly established law.")

Baker v. Union Twp., 587 F. App'x 229, 235-36 (6th Cir. 2014) ("The right at issue can be expressed as Baker's right not to be shot with a taser without warning, while offering no resistance to arrest, and while standing on an observably elevated surface. This articulation comports with al-Kidd's mandate that rights not be defined at 'a high level of generality' at the second step of qualified immunity analysis. . . Examining the incident under the facts conceded, it is fairly certain that a reasonable officer would have been 'on notice that [this] conduct violates established law' at the time Ventre tased Baker. . .Baker was suspected of, at most, a minor, non-violent misdemeanor at the time he was tased. The police were called to the scene of a disturbance at the VFW. It is unclear what, exactly, the police suspected him of at the time they gave chase. The police did not even positively identify Baker as the suspect of the reported incident, they merely chased someone they saw running away. This is a far cry from the scenarios implicitly contemplated by Graham in which a heightened level of caution may be warranted in the apprehension of someone suspected of a violent felony. Under the facts conceded, Baker did not resist arrest before Ventre deployed his taser the second time. . . In the past, this court has held that an officer violates a suspect's clearly-established Fourth Amendment rights when 'he pepper sprays a suspect who has not been told she is under arrest and is not resisting arrest.'. . Other courts have held similarly. . . . Here, Baker was not resisting arrest. . . A reasonable officer would have known that it was unlawful to deploy a taser against an un-resisting suspect standing stock-still in a well-lit hallway. Moreover, Ventre should not have tased Baker without a warning. The tasing of a suspect without warning is, at the very least, an additional factor useful in determining whether an officer violated a suspect's Fourth Amendment right to be free of excessive force. . .Here, Ventre's tasing of Baker before giving Baker an opportunity to comply with instructions was a violation of clearly established law.")

Bolick v. City of E. Grand Rapids, 580 F. App'x 314, 318-23 (6th Cir. 2014) ("The officers contend that a reasonable officer would have interpreted Matthew's actions as active resistance. . .We have jurisdiction when a defendant appeals the 'denial of a claim of qualified immunity,' . . . but the scope of our jurisdiction is narrow. We may only review the denial of qualified immunity based purely on issues of law, . . . meaning the officers must accept 'the plaintiff's facts, taken at their best[.]'. . . In other words, we do not have jurisdiction insofar as the officers solely contest 'whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a "genuine" issue of fact for trial.'. . . The officers in this case appeal the denial of qualified immunity as to two discrete police actions against Matthew on the night of his death: Parker's alleged use of a taser while Matthew lay handcuffed on his stomach, and Davis's alleged pressure against Matthew's back under the same circumstances. . . .Yes, Matthew assaulted Parker and attempted to evade arrest. But, taking the facts in his favor, Matthew could barely move, had stopped resisting, was under control, and thus posed little risk to himself or anyone else by the time he was in handcuffs—at which point Parker tased him and Davis (who knew Matthew suffered from a diminished mental state) put the weight of his body into Matthew's upper back. For these reasons, a reasonable jury could conclude that the officers' post-handcuff actions were not calibrated to the threat Matthew posed, and thus were objectively unreasonable uses of force. . . .We thus ask: whether it was clearly established in November 2009 that it was excessive for an officer to apply the weight of his body to the back of a handcuffed suspect who did not resist, all while the suspect lay on his stomach with another officer controlling his legs; and whether it was excessive for an officer to tase the arrestee in drive-stun mode under the same circumstances. The answer to both questions is yes. . . . Champion also applies to Parker's use of the taser in drive-stun mode. To be sure, Champion addressed the use of pepper spray (not a taser) on a hobbled and handcuffed suspect. But the Champion court did note that, as of 2004, we had 'consistently held that various types of force applied after the subduing of a suspect are unreasonable and a violation of a clearly established right.'. . . Here, if it was 'clearly established that the Officers' use of pepper spray against [an arrestee] after he was handcuffed and hobbled was excessive,'. . it was clearly established that Parker's tasing of Matthew under substantially similar conditions was also excessive. . . . The officers counter that not every reasonable officer in their position would have understood that Matthew did not struggle or resist. . . Again, this argument asks us to view the facts in a light most favorable to the officers, which we cannot do. A view of the record in Matthew's favor (which shows that he was barely able to move and did not resist) controls our analysis, not one that considers whether every reasonable officer would have acted differently under a situation drawn more in their favor. . . .In this case, even though the district court declined to grant summary judgment to the officers based on qualified immunity, it improperly dismissed qualified immunity as a defense. Reinforcing our conclusion is the fact that the officers complied with the only requirement necessary for them to invoke the defense at trial: raising qualified immunity as an affirmative defense from the outset. . . We thus reverse the district court's decision to dismiss qualified immunity as a defense to the police actions that remain at issue.")

Cordell v. McKinney, 759 F.3d 573, 587, 588 (6th Cir. 2014) ("To sum up, at this stage in the litigation, we must accept Cordell's version of events without weighing the evidence or assessing the credibility of prospective witnesses. The district court failed to do so and, thus, committed error. If we do accept Cordell's testimony and allegations as true—that Deputy McKinney rammed Cordell headfirst into the wall while he was handcuffed and controlled—a reasonable jury could conclude that Cordell suffered severe pain that objectively violated our contemporary norms of human dignity. Thus, Cordell has demonstrated that summary judgment on the objective component of his Eighth Amendment claim was inappropriate. . . .While there may be much sense in stating that it is inappropriate to grant qualified immunity whenever a jury could find that a jail official acted with malicious and sadistic intent, it seems that Plumhoff requires us to frame Cordell's Eighth Amendment right at a lower level of generality. In the past, we have held that 'if there is a genuine issue of fact as to whether an officer's use of force was objectively reasonable, then there naturally is a genuine issue of fact with respect to whether a reasonable jail official would have known such conduct was wrongful.' Kostrzewa v. City of Troy, 247 F.3d 633, 642 (6th Cir.2001). Under this standard, as discussed above, we conclude that any reasonable official would know that ramming a handcuffed and controlled prisoner headfirst into a concrete wall is an unreasonable method of regaining control of a prisoner in a hallway occupied only by other jail officials. . . Therefore, Cordell's rights were clearly established as of July 20, 2009, and granting qualified immunity at this time is inappropriate.")

Daily Services, LLC v. Valentino, 756 F.3d 893, 901-04 (6th Cir. 2014) ("The applicability of Parratt . . . is irrelevant to the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis. As a colleague on our sister circuit noted, 'Granting immunity based on the lack of clarity as to whether the State bears responsibility would turn the qualified immunity doctrine on its head. The official would in effect be seeking immunity based on a "reasonable" belief that his conduct was so wrong—i.e., it was "random and unauthorized"—that it could not provide the basis for a procedural due process claim.' San Gerónimo Caribe Project, Inc. v. Acevedo–Vilá, 687 F.3d 465, 500 (1st Cir.2012) (en banc) (Lipez, J., concurring). Qualified immunity exists to shield actions reasonable in light of current law without protecting abuses of office. . . It would undermine that doctrine's purpose to find a due process violation but provide no remedy because the defendant could have thought that Parratt would let him (and the state) off the hook for his violation of clearly established due process law. San Gerónimo, 687 F.3d at 500 (Lipez, J., concurring). Indeed, the Supreme Court has never looked to the Parratt doctrine when assessing whether a defendant deserves qualified immunity because the claimed procedural due process right was not clearly established. Nor has our court ever held that uncertainty about whether Parratt applies gives rise to qualified immunity. . . Some of our sister circuits and other courts also have suggested that uncertainty about the Parratt doctrine does not affect the 'clearly established' inquiry. [collecting cases] A handful of other cases have discussed the Parratt doctrine while assessing whether the claimed procedural due process right was clearly established, but none have examined whether the Parratt doctrine is properly part of the clearly established law inquiry in the first place. [collecting cases] These cases therefore fail to provide meaningful guidance on the question before us. Thus, while courts may consider the Parratt doctrine to determine whether the plaintiff has alleged a procedural due process violation, courts should not consider the Parratt doctrine to determine whether the due process right at issue was clearly established. The doctrine simply has no place in assessing whether 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Here, the district court erred when it granted qualified immunity based on its understanding that the law 'is unsettled as to whether the failure of a public official to follow established procedure constitutes "random and unauthorized" conduct, thereby triggering Parratt.' Simply put, the court focused on the clarity of the wrong law. The inquiry is not whether a reasonable official would understand that his wrongful denial of predeprivation process might not ultimately amount to a due process violation by the state under the Parratt doctrine. Rather, in the context of this procedural due process claim, the 'clearly established law' inquiry should ask whether a reasonable official would understand that the plaintiff was entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard before the official filed a judgment or lien against the plaintiff. . . At the time of the defendants' actions, it was clearly established that 'even the temporary or partial impairments to property rights that attachments, liens, and similar encumbrances entail are sufficient to merit due process protection.'. . As the Supreme Court stated many years ago, 'the root requirement' of due process protection is 'that an individual be given an opportunity for a hearing before he is deprived of any significant property interest.'. . Ohio law recognizes these requirements by requiring the Bureau and its employees to provide notice and an opportunity to be heard before filing a judgment or lien for unpaid premiums. . .It is well-established and unassailable that 'a reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.'. . Thus, if Daily Services has alleged facts that make out a violation of its constitutional right to predeprivation process, discussed infra, the only basis for qualified immunity would be the defendants' reasonable uncertainty about whether the circumstances presented 'extraordinary situations where some valid governmental interest' justified postponing notice or the opportunity to be heard until after the deprivation. . . The facts of this case present no such uncertainty. Reasonable officials in the defendants' positions would know that predeprivation process—notice and an opportunity to be heard—was required before filing the judgments and liens against Daily Services.")

Burgess v. Fischer, 735 F.3d 462, 473, 474 (6th Cir. 2013) ("In the instant case, the district court applied the 'shocks the conscience' standard of the Fourteenth Amendment to find that there was no evidence that the deputies acted maliciously and sadistically. . . The district court found that the claim did not fall under the Fourth Amendment because the right to be free from excessive force as a pretrial detainee in the booking process was not clearly established until our decision in Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858 (6th Cir.2010), well after Burgess' arrest. . . .However, a review of our case law, including Aldini, compels the opposite conclusion, and we find that the district court erred in not applying the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard to the facts of this case. . . .To be sure, Aldini did set forth a new principle. The Aldini court clearly established in 2010 that the dividing line between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment zones of protection was the probable cause hearing for warrantless arrests. . . However, the district court missed a critical point of the decision—it was already clearly established that the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard applied at least through the booking process. . . Indeed, the court held that the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard applied to a set of facts arising in May 2006, over two-and-a-half years before Burgess' car was stopped on January 23, 2009. . . Because it was a reversal, the Aldini decision necessarily held that the Fourth Amendment right was clearly established in 2006. Therefore, the right was no less established in January 2009 when Burgess was allegedly assaulted. Consequently, the district court erred in applying the Fourteenth Amendment's 'shocks the conscience' standard rather than the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard.")

Hidden Village, LLC v. City of Lakewood, Ohio*,* 734 F.3d 519, 529 (6th Cir. 2013) ("To defeat the qualified immunity defense, . . . Hidden Village must also show that precedents on the books when the defendants acted (in 2006 and 2007) clearly established that their conduct violated § 3617 even though it violated nothing else in the Fair Housing Act. That in turn requires pointing to either 'controlling authority' or 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'. . Hidden Village does not have controlling authority on its side. Until today, the Sixth Circuit has never held that a defendant can violate § 3617 without violating §§ 3603–3606. To the contrary, we had left the question open. . . Nor was there a 'consensus' of cases of 'persuasive authority.' Just the opposite. By 2007, the Fifth Circuit had held that a violation of §§ 3603–3606 is indispensable to a § 3617 claim. . .The Seventh Circuit had twice reserved the question. . . Another Seventh Circuit opinion implied that the defendants' interpretation was right. . . Hidden Village, meanwhile, does not identify a single federal appellate court decision that had clearly come out on its side of this debate. The best we have found is dictum to that effect from the Ninth Circuit, see Smith v. Stechel, 510 F.2d 1162, 1164 (9th Cir.1975), and a handful of decisions from district courts. This state of affairs circa 2007 does not amount to the 'robust consensus' that the qualified immunity test demands. Hidden Village invokes Bloch v. Frischholz, which interpreted § 3617 as we do today. 587 F.3d 771, 781 (7th Cir.2009) (en banc). But that decision came out in 2009; it did not clearly establish anything in 2006 or 2007. More telling is Bloch's observation about the state of the law on whether liability under § 3617 depends on a violation of §§ 3603–3606: 'Courts are split on the issue.' Id. at 781. In the final analysis, Hidden Village may carry on with its Fair Housing Act lawsuit against the city. But the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jasinski v. Tyler, 729 F.3d 531, 540, 544 (6th Cir. 2013)("Under the circumstances presented here, the contours of the substantive due process right to be free from government action increasing the risk of harm was not sufficiently clear under our case law that a reasonable official would understand that the state's actions in pursuing Oliver for use of the cattle prod and then failing to immediately remove Nicholas would violate Nicholas's substantive due process rights. Accordingly, Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity [on substantive due process claim]. . . . Given the previous decisions of our court, we cannot say that a reasonable CPS official would understand that the failure to file a petition under § 722.638 would constitute a denial of procedural due process. No decision has yet found a procedural due process right in a similar context. In the future, CPS officials are on notice that if a petition is mandated based on a substantive predicate, the failure to file a petition when the predicate is met may constitute a denial of procedural due process under statutes similar to the instant one.")

Kovacic v. Cuyahoga County Dept. of Children and Family Services, 724 F.3d 687, 695-700 (6th Cir. 2013) ("The social workers argue that the district court erred in denying their motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, contending that exigent circumstances existed and that the relevant Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were not clearly established as of March 26, 2002. . . . While there certainly remain unresolved issues relating to the Fourth Amendment, as noted by the dissent, . . . the issue at hand—whether a government official can seize children from their homes without a warrant or exigent circumstances—is simply not one of them. . . .In sum, there is an absence of pre–2002 case law specifically mentioning social workers, which under our binding precedent is insufficient to upset the presumption that all government searches and seizures are subject to the strictures of the Fourth Amendment. . .We thus agree with the district court that at the time of the social workers' actions, it was clearly established that Fourth Amendment warrant requirements, including the exigent-circumstances exception, apply to the removal of children from their homes by social workers. . . .Concerning the Fourteenth Amendment due-process right, we established in Doe that in the context of child removal, due process requires, among other things, that 'parents be given notice prior to the removal of the child ... stating the reasons for the removal ... [and that] [t]he parents be given a full opportunity at the hearing to present witnesses and evidence on their behalf.'. . . The district court did not err in concluding that the due-process right at issue was clearly established in 2002.")

Kovacic v. Cuyahoga County Dept. of Children and Family Services, 724 F.3d 687, 703, 708-10 (6th Cir. 2013) (Sutton, J., dissenting) ("The defense prompts a present-tense and a past-tense inquiry: Does the seizure violate the requirements of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments? If so, were those requirements clearly established at the time of the seizure—here in 2002? I would skip the first question, . . . and answer no to the second. . . . All appellate law considered, the social workers acted reasonably from the vantage point of 2002. Even had they consulted a lawyer at every turn, consider the many questions implicated by this case. Do the normal Fourth Amendment standards apply? Is there a special needs exception for child endangerment cases? Does it make a difference whether the state officials are engaged in investigating criminal conduct or protecting children? Does past abuse suffice? Must the evidence of danger be within the past 24 hours? Or will evidence over the last month suffice? The majority may have some confidence in answering some of these questions today. But in the face of our previous silence, the Supreme Court's continued silence and the conflicting signals sent by other circuits, I doubt even the most sophisticated social worker, accompanied by the most sophisticated attorney,could have distilled one framework for answering all of these questions in 2002. That is the purpose of qualified immunity, and that is why it applies here. . . . When a social worker has concerns that immediate removal is required and when a state court judge later vindicates those concerns after a hearing, it is a strange notion of qualified immunity that would permit the social workers to be found liable under § 1983. We should pause before making social workers retroactively liable for a three-day temporary seizure when the state court judge is insulated from liability for the ten months of custody that followed. No such oddity occurs if we respect the state court's contemporaneous finding that probable cause of an exigency existed, which confirms that the social workers at most made a mistake. In the end, these social workers faced two state laws allowing them to act, set against a murky backdrop of federal court precedent. And they had evidence of abuse, enough in fact to convince a magistrate that they acted correctly and that Nancy's children ought not stay in Nancy's care. Qualified immunity applies.") Villegas v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville, 709 F.3d 563, 569-71, 574, 575, 578-80 (6th Cir. 2013) ("Plaintiff predicates her first deliberate indifference claim on her being shackled during labor and postpartum recovery. In bringing such a claim, Plaintiff finds herself in the recent 'burgeoning movement to end the practice of shackling pregnant women prisoners, particularly during labor and delivery.'. . Though the push to end the practice is fairly new, sadly, it is a practice that has been around for at least a century. . . In spite of this history, the law on the shackling of pregnant women is underdeveloped, and this Court has not previously decided a deliberate indifference claim based on the practice. Therefore, we must at the outset determine a framework under which to analyze such a claim. . . .In dealing with deliberate indifference claims in the past, this Court has enumerated some specific types of claims for factual scenarios that frequently arise.

These types include, but are not limited to, conditions-of-confinement, excessive-force, and medical-needs. . . The district court as well as the parties in their briefing discuss this as a medical-needs claim, . . . but as we explain below, the nature of Plaintiff's claim does not quite square with our medical-needs jurisprudence nor our other refinements of the general deliberate indifference principles. . . . A shackling claim does not necessarily involve the denial of or interference with medical treatment; rather, it may be premised on the notion that the shackles increase Plaintiff's risk of medical complications. We should hasten to add that there may be circumstances where shackling could interfere with medical treatment—where, for example, the shackles are not removed so that the medical treatment may proceed unimpeded; however, such were not the circumstances in this case. This problem led one court to analyze the shackling claim it faced as a conditions-of-confinement claim. . . .While a shackling claim does in some respects resemble some of our conditions-of-confinement cases, see, e.g., Barker, 649 F.3d at 434 (analyzing the use of handcuffs on a mentally ill prisoner under a conditions-of-confinement, as well as excessive-force, rubric), the nature of the medical proof offered by Plaintiff is different than we have previously addressed in the conditions-of-confinement context. Similarly, we believe that the excessive-force type of claim is also not well adapted for analysis of Plaintiff's claim. . . . In sum, it seems to us that none of the refinements we have made to the general deliberate indifference principles in order to more easily analyze common factual scenarios are particularly well-suited to the theory and proof offered by Plaintiff. The Eighth Circuit in Nelson v. Correctional Medical Services, 583 F.3d 522 (8th Cir.2009) (en banc), seems to have similarly recognized the crossover nature of a pregnant shackling claim. . . . [R]ather than attempt to pigeonhole Plaintiff's shackling claim into a more specific subcategory of deliberate indifference claims, we think it best to analyze her claim under the general deliberate indifference principles. . . . Consistent with the general principles discussed above, we analyze Plaintiff's claim in two steps, addressing first the objective component and then the subjective one. . . . On the objective component, we ask whether shackling pregnant detainees in the manner and under the circumstances in which Plaintiff was shackled creates a substantial risk of serious harm that society chooses not to tolerate. . . On the subjective component, the inquiry is whether the officers were aware and understood (or should have been aware and understood) that they were exposing Plaintiff to a substantial risk of serious harm. . . .Two things are clear from Plaintiff's evidence on the objective component. First, the shackling of pregnant detainees while in labor offends contemporary standards of human decency such that the practice violates the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against the 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain'—i.e., it poses a substantial risk of serious harm. . .The universal consensus from the courts to have addressed this issue as well as the chorus of prominent organizations condemning the practice demonstrates that, without any extenuating circumstances, shackling women during labor runs afoul of the protections of the Eighth Amendment. Second, it is equally clear, however, from both courts and commentators that the right to be free from shackling during labor is not unqualified. . . .To be sure, this evidence shows that the jail's classification procedures were followed in this case. However, because of Plaintiff's obvious, physical condition as a pregnant woman in labor, a reasonable factfinder could nonetheless conclude that Plaintiff was not a flight risk despite the jail's conformity with its classification procedures. This potential dispute renders summary judgment inappropriate. . . .In light of the material factual disputes surrounding whether Plaintiff was shown to be a flight risk, whether Defendant's officers had any knowledge about a no restraint order, and the conflicting expert testimony about the ill effects of Plaintiff's shackling, we conclude that the district court improperly granted summary judgment to Plaintiff on her shackling claim. On remand, a jury will need to determine whether Plaintiff was a flight risk in her condition and whether Defendant had knowledge of the substantial risk, recognized the serious harm that such a risk could cause, and, nonetheless, disregarded it, . . . recognizing that such knowledge may be established through the obviousness of the risk. . . . Absent proof that the breast pump was prescribed, as is necessary under a diagnosed medical-needs theory, Plaintiff must show that it was so obvious that even a layperson would recognize the need to provide Plaintiff with a breast pump. . . Unlike her shackling claim, where Plaintiff pointed to specific statements by outside organizations and testimony from Defendant's officer, Plaintiff on this claim has only pointed to the opinion testimony of Torrente and DeBona, who both opined that a breast pump was necessary to allow Plaintiff to express her milk and relieve her breast pain. Such testimony regarding the harmful consequences of being denied the breast pump does not specifically speak to the obviousness of the risk to Plaintiff. Therefore, Plaintiff has failed to produce sufficient evidence to make out the objective component of her breast pump claim, and therefore, the district court improperly granted summary judgment to Plaintiff on this claim as well.")

Villegas v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville, 709 F.3d 563, 581, 582, 584 (6th Cir. 2013) (Helene N. White, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. The district court determined on the parties' cross-motions for partial summary judgment that shackling Villegas during labor and postpartum recovery absent any indication that she was a flight risk or posed a risk of harm to herself or others, and denying her the breast pump hospital staff provided her on discharge, constituted deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. The material facts-the facts that might affect the determination of Defendant's liability-were not in dispute. . . .Villegas was not being held for a crime of violence and had not been convicted of any crime. She was not individually assessed for flight risk or risk of harm to herself or others, and she had not engaged in any conduct evidencing such. . . . The subjective component of a deliberate indifference claim goes to whether Defendant's officers were deliberately indifferent to substantial risks of serious harm posed by shackling. Defendant's experts did not address several of the serious medical risks to which Villegas's experts attested and did not rebut that shackling Villegas while en route to the hospital, during labor and postpartum, increased the medical risks of serious harm to Villegas and her unborn child. . . I agree with the district court that no genuine or material factual dispute remained regarding whether Defendant's officers knew of and disregarded the substantial risks of harm posed by shackling Villegas during labor and postpartum and denying her the breast pump hospital staff gave her on discharge.")

McAdam v. Warmuskerken, Nos. 12–2330, 12–2331, 2013 WL 1092729, *2 (6th Cir. Mar. 15, 2013) (unpublished) ("First, may an officer tase an individual who is subdued on the ground and is not resisting arrest, even if the officer does so only once? No. See Hagans v. Franklin Cnty. Sheriff's Office, 695 F.3d 505, 509–10 (6th Cir.2012); Austin v. Redford Twp. Police Dep't, 690

F.3d 490, 497–98 (6th Cir.2012). A single tasing violates a plaintiff's clearly established rights if he is neutralized and is not resisting an officer's efforts to restrain him. The district court thus properly denied the officers' qualified-immunity defense. Second, may an officer tase an individual, who is handcuffed to a hospital bed and is verbally resisting medical treatment, but does not pose a safety risk to hospital staff or police officers? No. See Austin, 690 F.3d at 497–98. Again, the right of an individual to be free from an officer's force if he is cooperative and non-aggressive is clearly established. See Hagans, 695 F.3d at 509–10. Taking McAdam's factual description of the hospital tasing as true, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. Because McAdam has put forward plausible factual bases for his legal claims, he is entitled to a trial.")

Quigley v. Tuong Vinh Thai, 707 F.3d 675, 685 (6th Cir. 2013) ("Because a reasonable factfinder could conclude that Thai consciously exposed Quigley to a substantial risk of death through his medical treatment without so much as a warning, the estate has shown that Thai violated a clearly established right.That there is no federal case directly on point does not undermine this conclusion. The principle at issue—namely, that a doctor cannot 'consciously expos[e a] patient to an excessive risk of serious harm' while providing medical treatment—is enshrined in our caselaw. . . . The estate has established that Thai violated a constitutional right and that the right was clearly established. Thai is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Stoudemire v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 705 F.3d 560, 571, 575 (6th Cir. 2013) ("According to Stoudemire, the relevant constitutional question is not whether clearly established law proscribes same-sex strip searches in prisons, but whether clearly established law proscribes a strip search that served no legitimate penological purpose and was intended only to harass. [Defendant] focuses on whether the law regarding same-sex strip searches is 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes. However, the applicable inquiry is whether the strip search was reasonable under the circumstances and whether Stoudemire's constitutional rights in this regard were clearly established at the time of the search. We address both issues. [Defendant's] position is that inmates have no right to be free from same-sex strip searches. But that is not the right that Stoudemire is seeking to vindicate. Rather, Stoudemire has 'identified a well established right, the right not to be subjected to a humiliating strip search in full view of several (or perhaps many) others unless the procedure is reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest.'. . Based on the state of the law in existence at the time of the strip search, it was clearly established that suspicionless strip searches were permissible as a matter of constitutional law, but only so long as they were reasonable under the circumstances and performed pursuant to a legitimate penological justification.")

Sutton v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, 700 F.3d 865, 877 (6th Cir. 2012) ("The district court summarily concluded that the law clearly established that an arrest without probable cause and a Terry stop without reasonable suspicion violate the Fourth Amendment. But the court's bare-bones analysis is far too general, failing to recognize that the right violated must be clear in a particularized context so that a reasonable official would be on notice that his actions were unconstitutional. . . Still, taking the facts alleged in the complaint as true, Sutton's constitutional rights were clearly established in this context and the court properly concluded that the qualified-immunity defense fails at this juncture.")

Andrews v. Hickman County, Tenn., 700 F.3d 845, 858-64 (6th Cir. 2012) ("The State Defendants argue that while the Andrews have asserted facts that taken as true, 'may establish a formulation of a general Fourth Amendment claim,' they have failed to assert sufficient facts to establish that 'a clear violation of the Fourth Amendment as it applies to social workers has occurred....' Although the State Defendants do not cite any authority for their contention, their argument seems to imply that social workers engaging in their statutorily mandated investigative functions are not governed by the same requirements of the Fourth Amendment that apply to law enforcement officers or other state actors.[footnote omitted] If their implication is that social workers are not state actors for the purposes of the Fourth Amendment, the Supreme Court has established that the Fourth Amendment's restrictions on unreasonable searches and seizures extend well beyond the police . . . . In other circuits, defendant caseworkers and social workers have unsuccessfully attempted to argue that the Fourth Amendment should not apply to their actions when entering homes to investigate allegations of child abuse. . . .Although this court has not yet had occasion to definitively address this issue, other courts have found that the Fourth Amendment governs entries and searches of homes made by social workers. [collecting cases] Given the presumption that state actors are governed by the Fourth Amendment and the sanctity of the home under the Fourth Amendment, we agree that a social worker, like other state officers, is governed by the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement. This would simply mean that social workers would have to obtain consent, have sufficient grounds to believe that exigent circumstances exist, or qualify under another recognized exception to the warrant requirement before engaging in warrantless entries and searches of homes. . . . Given that the Fourth Amendment's strictures apply to social worker actions, the Andrews have asserted a violation of their constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches unless an exception to the warrant requirement is established. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to the Andrews, the State Defendants have not demonstrated that an exception to the warrant requirement applies. . . .The State Defendants argue that it was not clearly established at the time of their actions that social workers may not enter a home without a warrant or an applicable exception to the warrant requirement. . . .The Supreme Court has not expressly held that the Fourth Amendment prohibition on warrantless searches of homes does or does not apply to social workers carrying out investigations regarding the welfare of children. . . . [W]e must examine whether our own decisions have addressed the issue in order to ascertain whether the law was clearly established at the time the State Defendants entered the Andrews' home. . .While Jordan is not binding precedent, it is the only case from our court that bears on the issue of whether the reasonable social worker, facing the situation in the instant case, would have known that her conduct violated clearly established law. Yet, Jordan fails to give clear guidance to the social worker faced with the decision to enter the Andrews home. First, the Jordan footnote referencing the views of other circuits does not endorse them, explicitly or otherwise. The footnote does not hint at whether the court believes a social worker exception to the application of the Fourth Amendment should apply. The footnote is merely an observation about the existence of an issue not explored in Jordan. Moreover, the court in Jordan concluded, using fairly broad language, that social workers should not 'have to second guess' the decisions of officers. . . . Although the court mentions that the officer told the social worker the children in the house were in immediate physical danger—a circumstance not present here—the opinion makes no effort to delineate the situations in which reliance on officers' decisions would be appropriate and those in which it would not. Consequently, a social worker could not determine, based on Jordan, whether she might reasonably rely on the officers' decision under the circumstances presented here. In fact, to the extent Jordan suggests an answer to the question of whether the social worker could rely on an officer's decision, it suggests that she could do so. . . . Quite simply, the reasonable social worker faced with the circumstances of this case could not ascertain from clearly established law the legality of her conduct. [footnote omitted] . . . . [G]iven the lack of clarity of Jordan, it was not objectively unreasonable for the State Defendants to enter the home. . . .As we have explained, the actions of social workers in entering a home are governed by the Fourth Amendment, and we have concluded that no social worker exception applies in such situations. Nonetheless, there is still a question, going forward, about whether social workers can rely upon the actions of police officers in deciding whether they can enter a home, although, to be sure, there is a question of fact in this case about whether reliance on the officers occurred. While we recognize that social workers have a duty to cooperate with police officers and, perhaps, a natural inclination to defer to their decisions, exempting social workers from the Fourth Amendment whenever they rely upon a police officer's actions is tantamount to recognition of a 'social worker exception' to the Fourth Amendment's requirements. We join other circuits in recognizing that Fourth Amendment standards are the same, whether the state actor is a law enforcement officer or a social worker. [collecting cases] Nonetheless, if social workers cannot be treated better than police officers under the Fourth Amendment, they should not be treated worse, either. Social workers are frequently asked to make decisions based on information provided to them, directly or indirectly, by the police. When social workers rely in good faith on information from police officers which suggests they can enter a home under an exception to the warrant requirement, or can reasonably infer that an exception applies from their actions, they are entitled to rely on that information. . . The social workers' position is the same as that of a police officer who reasonably relies on another police officer.")

Patrizi v. Huff, 690 F.3d 459, 465-67 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Construing the facts in Patrizi's favor, we conclude it is clear that Patrizi's actions did not constitute an affirmative act under the obstruction ordinance. Patrizi asked the officer questions in a calm and measured manner; she did not continuously interrupt so that the officer could not speak to the subjects of his investigations. She did not ignore instructions from him to cease her questioning—in fact, she was never even given such instructions—and she did not in any way exhibit aggressive, boisterous, or unduly disruptive conduct. . . In short, it is evident that Patrizi's actions were of the same nature as those held not to constitute an affirmative act by the Ohio Court of Appeals in Kristoff. Therefore, under clearly established law the officers lacked probable cause to arrest her. . . . [D]espite any arguable ambiguity in the Ohio state courts' jurisprudence, the U.S. Supreme Court has clearly established that nonaggressive questioning of police officers is constitutionally protected conduct. . . Patrizi's actions fall precisely within that protected ambit because, when the facts are viewed in her favor, her conduct did not cross the line into fighting words or disorderly conduct prohibiting the officers from conducting their investigation.")

McGlone v. Bell , 681 F.3d 718, 735 (6th Cir. 2012) ("State university officials in their individual capacities were not entitled to qualified immunity in § 1983 action by Christian evangelist challenging university's policy requiring nonaffiliated individuals to obtain permission before speaking on certain parts of its campus; evangelist had clearly established right to engage in his desired expression on campus free from requirements imposed by university.)

Clemente v. Vaslo, 679 F.3d 482, 492, 493 (6th Cir. 2012) ("What is clearly established is only that public employers may not coerce their employees to abdicate their constitutional rights on pain of dismissal, and that is not what happened here. . . . Defendants' actual conduct highlights the blurriness of the Fourth Amendment's contours in the context of an employer-employee relationship. Bartok and White acted on a gradient, applying more pressure at each step to obtain consent (simply asking, then citing to a city ordinance, then giving a direct order as supervisor), but never forced Plaintiffs to choose between letting them in or losing their jobs. Though we do not decide the issue, we note that a supervisor's direct order may be coercive in some situations, as it may be reasonable for an employee to believe that disobeying it will result in termination. The question, however, is not whether such conduct could possibly constitute a Fourth Amendment violation but whether, according to settled Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit precedent at the time, such conduct was so clearly violative of the Fourth Amendment that it is beyond debate. . .Short of threatening termination, what public employers could do to obtain an employee's consent to conduct an inspection was not clearly established. Duchane and Bartok are thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Whitney v. City of Milan, 677 F.3d 292, 299 (6th Cir. 2012) (public employee's "right to speak publicly and participate in a lawsuit addressing workplace discrimination and public corruption in the City's government was clearly established.")

O'Neill v. Louisville/Jefferson County Metro Government, 662 F.3d 723, 731, 732, 735 (6th Cir. 2011) ("In concluding that the LMAS officers could constitutionally reenter the O'Neills' home without a warrant, the district court relied on the consent-once-removed doctrine. This doctrine allows government agents to enter a suspect's premises to arrest the suspect without a warrant if [undercover agents]: 1) entered at the express invitation of someone with authority to consent; 2) at that point established the existence of probable cause to effectuate an arrest or search; and 3) immediately summoned help from other officers. . .The O'Neills argue that this doctrine does not apply in the present case, where the undercover officers left the premises and then attempted to make a second entry. This court has previously held that, under the consent-once-removed doctrine, an undercover agent or informant in a suspect's home may signal to agents outside to come in and effectuate an arrest. . . But this court has not extended the doctrine to cover reentry after the undercover agent or informant has left the premises, or where there is no intent to effectuate an arrest, and we decline to do so here. . . .Applying the consent-once-removed doctrine to the LMAS officers' second entry, where no arrest was intended, would go well beyond the confines of this limited doctrine, which has yet to be adopted by the Supreme Court. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 243-44 (2009) (declining to rule on whether the consent-once-removed doctrine is constitutional by instead resolving the issue of qualified immunity on the basis that no clearly established law was violated). We therefore conclude that the O'Neills have sufficiently pleaded a Fourth Amendment violation based on the second warrantless entry. . . . Given that we are reversing the court's rulings on the Class A kennel issue, the consent-once-removed doctrine, and procedural due process issue, the court's analysis of the O'Neills' Fourth Amendment and procedural due process claims will necessarily change, as will its determination of what law was or was not clearly established. We accordingly remand the qualified-immunity issue to the district court for further proceedings in light of our opinion.")

Wheeler v. City of Lansing, 660 F.3d 931, 941-43 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Although we refused to address whether Wheeler's first Fourth Amendment claim actually presented a constitutional violation, we must address the constitutionality of her second claim in order to determine whether Wirth is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The warrant to search Wheeler's apartment listed broad categories of stolen property, providing no basis to distinguish the stolen items from Wheeler's own personal property. Moreover, it appears that officers had additional information about the stolen items to be seized that they could have included in the warrant. . . . Wirth is not entitled to qualified immunity from this aspect of Wheeler's claim, as it would be apparent to a reasonable officer that listing general categories of items to be seized even though further details are available violates the Fourth Amendment's specificity requirement. . . .Because a reasonable officer would have known that the warrant was deficient, Wirth is not entitled to qualified immunity on this portion of Wheeler's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Barker v. Goodrich, 649 F.3d 428, 435-37 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Defendants had fair warning in 2007 that their conduct was unconstitutional. Case law from the Supreme Court, this Court, and other circuits established at that time that each condition seen here-restraining an inmate in an uncomfortable position, denying access to water, and denying access to the toilet–could rise to an Eighth Amendment violation if allowed to persist for an extended period. These cases, taken together with the notice given by normal prison practice and the obvious cruelty inherent in the conduct, clearly established that Defendants' alleged conduct–subjecting Barker to all of these conditions at once for a period in excess of twelve hours-violated Barker's Eighth Amendment rights. . . . Although Ort and Gates come from the Eleventh and Fifth Circuits, respectively, and so are not binding on this Court, neither are they 'single idiosyncratic opinions' from other circuits. . . Moreover, these cases were thoroughly analyzed and served as the basis for the Supreme Court's decision in Hope–a decision that is certainly binding on this Court. . . They are thus sufficient to give the Defendants fair warning. A defendant's deviation from normal practice and prison policies can also provide notice that his actions are improper. . . In this case, the evidence establishes that normal procedure would have been to change Barker's clothing and remove his handcuffs before placing him in the observation cell, thus allowing him full use of his hands to rest comfortably and access the water fountain and toilet. Defendants argue that they deviated from this practice because Barker was resisting the removal of his handcuffs. However, for the purposes of qualified immunity, this Court must take the plaintiff's evidence as true. . . Thus, the fact that Defendants deviated from normal procedure, even though Barker was cooperating and removal of the handcuffs would have been simple, provides further evidence that Defendants knew their conduct was unconstitutional. Furthermore, Hope makes clear that the obvious cruelty inherent in a punishment can serve as notice that it is unconstitutional. . . . Taking Barker's evidence as true, he was handcuffed in an uncomfortable position for over twelve hours for no legitimate purpose, and denied even the basic dignity of relieving himself. The obvious cruelty in Defendants' actions warned them that they were violating the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Accordingly, the constitutional right was clearly established and we REVERSE the district court's grant of qualified immunity to all Defendants.")

Gaspers v. Ohio Dept. Of Youth Service, 648 F.3d 400, 417(6th Cir. 2011) ("Here, as in Adkins and Sowards, plaintiffs' right of intimate association was clearly established by the Supreme Court as early as 1984 and by this court as early as 1993–long before William was terminated and Aldine was demoted and transferred. As a result, it was objectively reasonable to require the individual defendants to be aware of and to observe this constitutional right.")

Pritchard v. Hamilton Township Bd. of Trustees, 424 F. App'x 492, ___(6th Cir. 2011) ("At first blush it might seem unduly harsh to have an expectation that law enforcement officers should know the intricacies of criminal statutes, but this position finds support in other areas of the qualified immunity doctrine that regularly impute knowledge of statutes and caselaw to officers. Indeed, it is a touchstone of qualified immunity doctrine that 'a reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.'. . For instance, we impute knowledge of state-law definitions and state-court interpretations of a statute to police officers when we decide whether an officer could reasonably conclude that probable cause exists under a given set of circumstances. . . .In light of these principles, and the abundantly plain language of the statute at issue here, we hold that the Defendant officers did not have probable cause to arrest Christman for underage drinking because the facts and circumstances known to the officers established a statutorily affirmative justification of the suspected criminal act.")

Kennedy v. City of Villa Hills, Ky., 635 F.3d 210, 214-19 (6th Cir. 2011) ("For purposes of this appeal, Schutzman concedes that a genuine issue of material fact exists about the amount of noise that Kennedy made, and therefore whether Schutzman violated Kennedy's constitutional right to be free from wrongful arrest. At stake is the second question: whether Kennedy's constitutional right to be free from wrongful arrest in these circumstances was clearly established such that Schutzman should have known of it. We conclude that Kennedy's right was clearly established. . . . In the context of qualified immunity, preexisting, clearly established law refers to 'binding precedent from the Supreme Court, the Sixth Circuit, the district court itself, or other circuits that is directly on point.'. . . Given the context of the arrest as Kennedy has portrayed it, a reasonable officer could not conclude that Kennedy's outburst provided probable cause for his arrest. . . . Regardless of why Schutzman made the arrest, the relevant inquiry is whether an officer with no ill will toward Kennedy could have believed that he had probable cause to arrest Kennedy. We answer no, rendering qualified immunity inappropriate on the claim of wrongful arrest. . . . In contrast to its role in the Fourth Amendment context, motive is relevant to Kennedy's claim that Schutzman arrested Kennedy in retaliation for Kennedy's exercise of his First Amendment rights. . . . At the summary-judgment stage, this evidence suffices to show that the content of Kennedy's speech may have been a motivating factor for Schutzman to arrest Kennedy. Finally, Kennedy's right to be free from retaliatory arrest after insulting an officer was clearly established.")

U.S. v. Buford, 632 F.3d 264, 276 n.10 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Gant itself underscored the reasonableness of an officer's reliance on settled law, even if that law is later overturned. The Court noted that qualified immunity will shield officers from liability in civil suits challenging unconstitutional vehicle searches conducted before Gant because such officers acted in 'reasonable reliance' on the then-prevailing and 'widely accepted' understanding of Belton. . . That observation directly supports the conclusion that the good-faith exception to the exclusionary rule applies in criminal prosecutions because the qualified immunity test turns on the same standard of reasonableness as the good-faith exception.")

Ellison v. Balinski, 625 F.3d 953, 959 (6th Cir., 2010) ("While police generally are entitled to rely on a judicially secured warrant for immunity from liability for unconstitutional searches, qualified immunity is not appropriate 'where the warrant application is so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence unreasonable.'. . Here, a jury could reasonably determine that this affidavit–mentioning no specific crimes thought probably committed, making no link between Plaintiff's residence and any crime, yet seeking broad authority for a search of Plaintiff's entire residence for any document 'pertaining to' Plaintiff–was so lacking in indicia of probable cause to render Defendant's belief in its existence objectively unreasonable. Accordingly, the district court was correct to deny Defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law.")

Elkins v. Summit County, Ohio, 615 F.3d 671, 676, 677 (6th Cir. 2010) ("Having assumed that the officers received the Mann memorandum and did not divulge it, we must next determine whether that failure violated Elkins' constitutional right to due process. . . .[I]n Moldowan, we held that 'the due process guarantees recognized in Brady also impose an analogous or derivative obligation on the police [to disclose to the prosecutor evidence whose materially exculpatory value should have been 'apparent' to him at the time of his investigation].'. . Thus, Elkins had a constitutional right to have favorable evidence disclosed to the prosecution and court. . . In Moldowan, we found that 'at least three circuits recognized prior to August 1990 ... this right was clearly established,'. . and that the right may have been clearly established as early as 1964. . . Thus, Elkins' right to have the Mann memorandum disclosed was clearly established on January 5, 1999.")

Knisley v. Pike County Joint Vocational School Dist., 604 F.3d 977, 982, 983 (6th Cir. 2010) ("The United States Supreme Court has asked us to reconsider this case in light of Redding, in which the Court invalidated a strip search of a female student when looking for ibuprofen tablets. Redding, 129 S.Ct. at 2642-43. The Court, however, found that the officials at issue were nevertheless protected by qualified immunity because (1) there was no clearly established law finding unconstitutional the strip searching of students under materially similar circumstances from the Supreme Court and (2) the appellate courts who had ruled in factually similar circumstances were not in concert. Id. at 2643-44. Essentially, the Redding defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because neither the Supreme Court nor the Ninth Circuit had clearly established case law on point . . . and there was no national consensus on this issue among the Circuits at the time of the Redding search. . . However, this Circuit's law on student strip searches was clearly established as early as 2005, when we published our opinion in Beard. We read Redding to affirm our constitutional holding in Beard. Thus, because Beard remains good constitutional law and because that law was clearly established at the time of the strip search in this case, Redding does not require a result contrary to that reached in Knisley I. . . Our Circuit's clearly established case law on this issue put the school and its employees on notice that this search was unconstitutional, so defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity protection.").

Harris v. City of Circleville, 583 F.3d 356, 367 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Defendants contend that the law was not clearly established because the law was unclear about what standard applies to Harris's excessive force claims (i.e., the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment). We reject that argument because even if there were some lingering ambiguity as to whether the Fourth or the Fourteenth Amendment applies in this precise context, the 'legal norms' underlying Harris's claims nevertheless were clearly established. A defendant is not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity simply because the courts have not 'agreed upon the precise formulation of the [applicable] standard.'. . Under this circuit's existing case law, there undoubtedly is a clearly established legal norm precluding the use of violent physical force against a criminal suspect who already has been subdued and does not present a danger to himself or others. . . . Thus, even if it were unclear whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment governs Harris's excessive force claims, the legal norms underlying those claims were nevertheless clearly established.").

Moldowan v. City of Warren, 578 F.3d 351, 378, 381-84, 386-89 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Because prosecutors rely so heavily on the police and other law enforcement authorities, the obligations imposed under Brady would be largely ineffective if those other members of the prosecution team had no responsibility to inform the prosecutor about evidence that undermined the state's preferred theory of the crime. As a practical matter then, Brady's ultimate concern for ensuring that criminal defendants receive a 'fundamentally fair' trial . . . demands that "Brady's protections also extend to actions of other law enforcement officers such as investigating officers," White v. McKinley, 519 F.3d 806, 814 (8th Cir.2008). Although this Court has not yet directly addressed the issue, a number of our decisions support this conclusion. . . . If the police can be expected to recognize what evidence must be preserved, certainly it is not too burdensome to demand that they simply turn that same information over to the prosecutor's office. . . . For most of the same reasons we have laid out here, virtually every other circuit has concluded either that the police share in the state's obligations under Brady, or that the Constitution imposes on the police obligations analogous to those recognized in Brady. . . . Although our recognition of this type of a claim is more recent and less specific, the overwhelming number of decisions from other circuits recognizing this type of claim satisfies us that any reasonable police officer would know that suppressing exculpatory evidence was a violation of the accused's constitutional rights. . . . Notwithstanding the concurrence's argument to the contrary, the cases in this area clearly establish that police actions taken in bad faith are not the only species of police conduct that can deprive criminal defendants of the due process guaranteed by the Constitution. We acknowledge that a number of courts, including the Supreme Court, have held that a showing of bad faith is required to prevail on a claim that the police deprived a defendant of due process by concealing or withholding evidence that is only 'potentially useful.' But, where the police are aware that the evidence in their possession is exculpatory, the Supreme Court's decisions in this area indicate that the police have an absolute duty to preserve and disclose that information. The critical issue in determining whether bad faith is required thus is not whether the evidence is withheld by the prosecutor or the police, but rather whether the exculpatory value of the evidence is 'apparent' or not. . . . In other words, the critical issue in determining whether government conduct deprived a criminal defendant of a fair trial is the nature of the evidence that was withheld; it emphatically is not the mental state of the government official who suppressed the evidence. . . . Simply put, where the evidence withheld or destroyed by the police falls into that more serious category, the defendant is not required to make any further showing regarding the mental state of the police. . . . The only difference in the requisite inquiry is that, where the police are concerned, the 'exculpatory value' of the evidence must be 'apparent.' . . . Where the exculpatory value of a piece of evidence is 'apparent,' the police have an unwavering constitutional duty to preserve and ultimately disclose that evidence. . . . The reason no further showing of animus or bad faith is required is that, where the police have in their possession evidence that they know or should know 'might be expected to play a significant role in the suspect's defense,'. . . the destruction or concealment of that evidence can never be done 'in good faith and in accord with their normal practice,' Killian v. United States, 368 U.S. 231, 242 (1961). Consequently, requiring a criminal defendant or § 1983 plaintiff to show a 'conscious' or 'calculated' effort to suppress such evidence would be superfluous.")

Back v. Hall, 537 F.3d 552, 557 (6th Cir. 2008) ("[Defendants] argue that any constitutional protection Back enjoyed could not have been clearly established because, as in Cope, 'there was no published decision ... holding that political compatibility is not ... an appropriate requirement for [her former] position.' . . In one sense, they are right. Neither we nor the Supreme Court has ever held that the Internal Policy Analyst III job in the Kentucky Office of Homeland Security is a nonpolitical job. But in a more fundamental way, they are wrong. The absence of such a precise holding does not prevent the relevant law from being clearly established, even in the particularized sense that our case law requires.").

Parsons v. City of Pontiac, 533 F.3d 492, 504 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Detectives Martin and McKinney . . . are entitled to qualified immunity unless their actions 'were objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established right.'. . But viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Parsons, a jury could find that their actions were not objectively reasonable. The problem is not that they ignored exculpatory evidence in arresting a suspect as in Gardenhire, . . . but that a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether they possessed sufficient inculpatory evidence to reasonably believe that Parsons shot Frantz. We therefore conclude that the decision of the district court with regard to qualified immunity for Martin and McKinney must be reversed.").

Jacob v. Township of West Bloomfield, 531 F.3d 385, 391, 392 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Because the warrantless searches at issue in this case began in 1999, there is no question that the Fourth Amendment's protection of the intimate area surrounding Plaintiff's home was clearly established at the time of Defendant's entry upon the property. Indeed, the Supreme Court's longstanding precedents show that it was clearly established at the time of Defendant's intrusion onto Plaintiff's land that such a criminal investigation is constrained by the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement.").

El Bey v. Roop, 530 F.3d 407, 421 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Reasonable officers presented with the circumstances as alleged by El Bey should have known that a warrantless search of El Bey's home, and an arrest based on an outstanding warrant that was discovered only as a result of the warrantless search, would be unconstitutional.").

Lanman v. Hinson, 529 F.3d 673, 689 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The facts viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff demonstrate that defendants knew because of their NAPPI training that restraining a patient face-down on the floor and putting pressure on a patient's back posed a substantial risk of asphyxiation. Despite knowledge of this risk, defendants chose to restrain Lanman using these dangerous restraint techniques. Their actions were objectively unreasonable given the fact that plaintiff's eyewitness testified that defendants continued to restrain Lanman in this dangerous position five minutes after he wasn't resisting at all and looked like he was passed out. It would have been clear to defendants that it was not necessary to continue restraining a patient who looked like he was passed out with techniques that pose a substantial risk of asphyxiation. A reasonable official in defendants' positions would understand that his actions violated Lanman's constitutional right to freedom from undue bodily restraint.").

Jones v. City of Cincinnati, 521 F.3d 555, 559, 560 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The complaint alleges that the six officers who subdued Jones (1) savagely beat him with batons, striking him at least 33 times without giving him a chance to comply with their orders; (2) sprayed chemical irritant in his face after they had placed him in handcuffs; and (3) used their combined weight to hold him prone on the ground after he had stopped struggling. Such use of force is not objectively reasonable, and hence a violation of Jones's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . The right of an unresisting suspect to be free from baton strikes, 'significant pressure on [his] back,' and a dose of chemical irritants was clearly established over three years before Jones died. . . Therefore, the officers who subdued Jones are not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim. . . . The defendants argue that this case should be analyzed under the heightened malice standard because there was little time between taking Jones into custody and the time he stopped breathing. We disagree. The complaint alleges that the officers left Jones on the ground for a prolonged time and that they 'stood there and discussed the absence of fire personnel' after they noticed Jones was not breathing. These facts are similar to those in Owensby, in which this Court ruled that the deliberate indifference standard was appropriate because the six minutes between taking the suspect into custody and the time medical care was provided gave the officers 'time to fully consider the potential consequences of their conduct.' . .The complaint alleges that each of the officers present–the six who subdued Jones and the three sergeants who arrived afterwards–knew that the handcuffed Jones was not breathing. Therefore each knew of a substantial risk of serious harm to Jones's safety while he was in their custody and disregarded that risk by failing to provide aid. The right of a suspect in custody to receive adequate medical care, even if the suspect had been fleeing and resisting before the officers placed him in custody, was clearly established almost three years before Jones's death. . . Therefore, the officers who subdued Jones and the sergeants who arrived soon after are not entitled to qualified immunity on the failure to provide medical care claim.").

King v. Ambs, 519 F.3d 607, 615 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The undisputed facts of this case are that King repeatedly interfered with an ongoing criminal investigation, that after King had done so twice, Officer Ambs warned King that 'if he said one more word' he would be arrested for so doing, and that King continued to interfere with the officer's attempt to interview Klein. Based on these facts, and regardless of whether King actually 'spoke over' Officer Ambs, it is clear that King was arrested for the act of disrupting the officer's investigation, and not for the content of his speech. . . . [A]s with our analysis of King's Fourth Amendment claim above, while King's arrest did not violate any constitutional right, and the first step of the qualified immunity analysis is not met, even if the holding in Hill could be extended to apply to King's arrest under the particular facts of this case, Officer Ambs would still be entitled to qualified immunity as to the alleged First Amendment violation. For a violation to be clearly established, '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Because a reasonable officer would not have known that enforcement of the Columbia Township obstruction ordinance in the context of this case violated the First Amendment, the right was not clearly established and Officer Ambs would be entitled to qualified immunity at the second step of the Saucier analysis.")

King v. Ambs, 519 F.3d 607, 615, 625 (6th Cir. 2008) (O'Malley, District Judge, dissenting) ("The majority, much like the district court before it, appears loathe to allow a civil rights action to proceed where that action would give voice to the complaints of an obnoxious, disrespectful and likely intoxicated young man, whose own classless conduct led to his arrest. I certainly sympathize with that apparent concern. Established First Amendment jurisprudence counsels against indulging such concerns, however, especially in the context presented here. . . . Put simply, the majority concludes that the First Amendment right was not clearly established because no protected First Amendment conduct occurred. Putting aside its circularity, the ultimate conclusion that the right at issue here was not clearly established can not be squared with the state of the law when the arrest occurred.At least twenty years ago, the Supreme Court made clear that, within reason, individuals may not be subject to arrest merely because they interrupt or challenge police conduct. . . . The majority's decision today provides a broad shield to police officers who seek to enforce obstruction statutes against those engaged in speech-related challenges to police activity. It simply cannot be squared, however, with well-established, and, indeed, important First Amendment jurisprudence.").

Dorsey v. Barber, 517 F.3d 389, 394, 400 (6th Cir. 2008) ("[A]lthough the district court couched its ruling in terms of factual disputes, the pure legal issue legitimately before us on appeal concerns whether Begin's display of his firearm in conjunction with ordering plaintiffs to lie face-down on the ground for a period of time undisputedly no greater than two minutes–until additional law enforcement support arrived and control of the scene was assumed by a superior officer–constituted an unreasonable seizure or an excessive use of force in violation of plaintiffs' clearly established rights, of which a reasonable officer would have known. . . . [W]e have no trouble concluding that Begin made a mistake. Considering that the suspects were wanted in connection with an auto theft investigation, . . . and that plaintiffs did not manifestly pose an immediate threat to anyone's safety or a risk of flight, Begin should have been able to 'stop and hold' them without brandishing his firearm and ordering them to lie face-down on the pavement. Begin's response to the apparent demands of the situation seems to have been exaggerated and the resultant seizure, though supported by reasonable suspicion, was, due to the unnecessarily intrusive means employed by Begin, at least arguably unreasonable. . . . Yet, it does not follow that Begin's mistake necessarily disqualifies him from qualified immunity. Qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . There is no support for the notion that Begin knowingly and deliberately violated plaintiffs' right to be free from unreasonable seizure. Nor can his mistake be fairly characterized as so egregious as to suggest outright incompetence. At worst, Begin made an error of judgment, erring on the side of public safety. Not knowing the seriousness of the criminal activity for which the suspects were wanted, but knowing that the persons before him, who matched the BOLO description, had first disregarded and then resisted his orders to stop, Begin chose to stabilize the situation by acting with a preemptive show of authority. This approach turned out to be unnecessary, but cannot be said to have been plainly incompetent or objectively unreasonable.").

Brannum v. Overton County School Board, 516 F.3d 489, 494, 495, 498, 499(6th Cir. 2008) ("Before explaining our Fourth Amendment analysis, we think it might be useful to explain why we do not assess the students' privacy claims under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. This court has held that the constitutional right to privacy, which includes the right to shield one's body from exposure to viewing by the opposite sex, derives from the Fourth Amendment, rather than the Due Process Clause. . . We are aware that some circuits have found that the same privacy right is located in the Due Process Clause. . .. However, since the Fourth Amendment approach is the precedent in this circuit, and the Supreme Court seems to prefer it, . . . we will follow our precedent. . . . Neither the Supreme Court nor this court has ever addressed the applicability of video surveillance to the Fourth Amendment's proscription against unreasonable searches. However, the Supreme Court has applied the amendment's guarantees to practices that were not in existence at the time the amendment was enacted and has instructed that in such cases, the ultimate measure of the constitutionality of such searches is one of 'reasonableness.'. . . We are satisfied that both the students' expectation of privacy and the character of the intrusion are greater in this case than those at issue in Vernonia and T.L.O. We conclude that the locker room videotaping was a search, unreasonable in its scope, and violated the students' Fourth Amendment privacy rights. . . . In analyzing whether a constitutional right is clearly established, we look 'principally to the decisions of the United States Supreme Court and this circuit to determine whether the law was clearly established at the time of the action.'. . The Supreme Court has left it to the lower federal courts to decide, case by case, what 'clearly established' means when applied to factual situations not previously confronted by the Supreme Court. The Court provided some guidance in Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 199 (2004), when it announced that the specific constitutional right at issue must be clearly established when considered at an appropriate level of specificity and cannot be asserted at a high level of generality. . . . Some personal liberties are so fundamental to human dignity as to need no specific explication in our Constitution in order to ensure their protection against government invasion. Surreptitiously videotaping the plaintiffs in various states of undress is plainly among them. . . Stated differently, and more specifically, a person of ordinary common sense, to say nothing of professional school administrators, would know without need for specific instruction from a federal court, that teenagers have an inherent personal dignity, a sense of decency and self-respect, and a sensitivity about their bodily privacy that are at the core of their personal liberty and that are grossly offended by their being surreptitiously videotaped while changing their clothes in a school locker room. These notions of personal privacy are 'clearly established' in that they inhere in all of us, particularly middle school teenagers, and are inherent in the privacy component of the Fourth Amendment's proscription against unreasonable searches. But even if that were not self-evident, the cases we have discussed, supra, would lead a reasonable school administrator to conclude that the students' constitutionally protected privacy right not to be surreptitiously videotaped while changing their clothes is judicially clearly established.").

Figel v. Overton, 263 F. App'x 456, 2008 WL 341458, *3 (6th Cir. Feb. 6, 2008) ("At the time of the alleged conduct, one circuit had already concluded that the RULPA [sic] was constitutional, see Mayweathers v. Newland, 314 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir.2002), and five circuits, including the Ninth, had concluded that the identical operative language in RFRA did not violate the Establishment Clause. . . Thus, at the time of Defendants' alleged unconstitutional acts, the RULPA [sic] was presumptively constitutional, and no federal appellate authority was to the contrary. Thus, at the time of the conduct in question, the constitutionality of the RULPA [sic] was clearly established and Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on Figel's RULPA [sic] claim. . . . Defendants' reliance on Key is misplaced. In Key, this Court addressed the applicability of the Americans with Disabilities Act and the Rehabilitation Act to prisoners, noting that prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity during the time that there was uncertainty on this issue. . . Unlike those statutes, it is clear from the face of the state that the RULPA [sic] applies to prisoners.

Further, as noted above, until November 7, 2003, when Cutter was decided by this Circuit, the RULPA [sic] was valid law requiring compliance by prison officials.").

Logsdon v. Hains, 492 F.3d 334, 346 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The contours of the First Amendment public forum doctrine are sufficiently clear. Here, Defendants ostensibly arrested Plaintiff for violating Ohio's criminal trespass law. However, if instead, as Plaintiff appears to allege, Defendants arrested him because of the content of his speech, then Defendants acted in violation of the First Amendment in ways that should have been clear to a reasonable officer. Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the district court erred in dismissing Plaintiff's First Amendment claims. We reverse because Plaintiff stated a claim, but express no opinion as to whether Plaintiff will ultimately succeed on his claim following discovery.").

Peete v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, 486 F.3d 217, 219, 221, 223 (6th Cir. 2007) ("We find no case authority holding that paramedics answering a 911 emergency request for help engage in a Fourth Amendment 'seizure' of the person when restraining the person while trying to render aid. Hence there is no 'clearly established law' creating federal liability for a constitutional tort under these circumstances. The district court, therefore, erred in failing to grant qualified immunity to the paramedics. . . . [W]here the purpose is to render solicited aid in an emergency rather than to enforce the law, punish, deter, or incarcerate, there is no federal case authority creating a constitutional liability for the negligence, deliberate indifference, and incompetence alleged in the instant case. The Eighth Amendment 'Cruel and Unusual Punishment' Clause raising a 'deliberate indifference' standard does not apply here because Becerra was not incarcerated and the purpose of the alleged wrong was not punishment. . . . Assuming arguendo that the restraint techniques used by the EMT's were excessive or medically unreasonable, the plaintiff may be entitled to recovery under the state law of negligence, but improper medical treatment by a government employee, standing alone, does not violate the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment. . . . The custody exception imposes on state officials a 'constitutional duty to provide adequate medical care to incarcerated prisoners ... and those under similar restraint of personal liberty.'. . The court in Jackson held that a constitutional duty was not triggered where paramedics placed an individual wounded by a gunshot into their ambulance and began transporting him to the hospital. The District Court had held that moving an unconscious patient into the ambulance constituted custody, but we held that 'the concept of custody does not extend this far.'. . The facts in the present case similarly fail to allege that Becerra was taken into custody. He was restrained while he was unconscious, and the defendants' actions were undertaken in an effort to render medical treatment. This is easily distinguished from the archetypical custody exception case where jail or prison officials fail to provide medical treatment to an incarcerated individual.").

Koulta v. Merciez, 477 F.3d 442, 448 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Even if we assumed for the sake of argument that the officers' actions violated Koulta's substantive due process rights, his estate cannot show that these rights were 'clearly established' at the time of the accident. Not just in 2002, but since then as well, our cases have failed to recognize a 'state-created danger' claim unless the State indeed created the danger-either by increasing the risk of harm to third parties by its affirmative conduct or by doing something that endangers a discrete member or group of the public. . . The estate has not identified a case from our circuit or any other that clearly establishes the contours of a substantive-due-process right of action on facts like these.").

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. City of Springboro, 477 F.3d 807, 830, 831 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Here, the 'contours' of Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights were 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand' that detaining Plaintiffs over two hours after they dispelled any reasonable suspicions ripened the investigatory stop into an arrest absent probable cause. . . Although Defendants confronted novel factual circumstances, the unlawfulness of their conduct should have been apparent in light of well-settled precedent of the Supreme Court and of this Circuit.")

See also Center for Bio-Ethical Reform Inc. v. City of Springboro, 2007 WL 4322234, at *2, *3 (S.D. Ohio Dec. 7, 2007) ("The Court agrees with Defendants Morris and Shaw that there is a reasonable probability that four Justices of the Supreme Court would grant certiorari in this case and a majority of at least five would vote to overturn the decision of the Sixth Circuit. The Supreme Court in recent years has been particularly solicitous of the doctrine of qualified immunity; it has taken many cases raising that issue and not infrequently reversed courts of appeals on the issue. See, e.g., from the 2006 Term, Morse v. Frederick, 127 S.Ct. 2618, 168 L.Ed.2d 290 (2007)(the "bong hits for Jesus" case); Scott v. Harris , 127 S.Ct. 1769 (2007). These were two out of only sixty-eight cases, the smallest Supreme Court docket since the mid-19th century. However, Defendants Morris and Shaw cannot demonstrate that they will suffer any substantial harm from denial of the stay. They argue, correctly, that the doctrine of qualified immunity protects public officials not only from liability, but also from suit and the inconveniences attendant on defending litigation. . . Because qualified immunity is an immunity from suit as well as from damages, a public official who pleads a qualified immunity defense is entitled to have that defense decided before the case proceeds even to discovery. . . Had Defendants Morris and Shaw sought such relief, they would have been entitled to have their qualified immunity defense decided before any discovery took place and could have taken an interlocutory appeal from an adverse decision. However, they did not exercise that right in this case, but permitted the case to proceed to discovery without objection. They are not now faced with any additional discovery burden: discovery was completed in this case before the pre-appeal summary judgment motions were filed. After remand, the Court conducted a scheduling conference and no party suggested the need for any additional discovery in the case (See Scheduling Order, Doc. No. 102). Thus the only immediate burden Defendants Morris and Shaw face is the burden of briefing the currently pending Motion for Summary Judgment. That burden will fall entirely on the shoulders of their counsel and the performance of their important duties as special agents of the F.B.I. will in no way be impacted. A different situation might be presented if the case were set for immediate trial, but in fact the trial date is not until August, 2008. As Plaintiffs note, the Supreme Court is very likely to decide any petition for certiorari by that time. Of course, if the Court grants certiorari, this Court will then stay its proceedings. Thus Defendants Morris and Shaw will not suffer the harms which the doctrine of qualified immunity shields them from by denial of the stay. Moreover, the stay will work harm to others. The asserted interference with Plaintiffs' constitutional rights occurred in June, 2002; even without a stay, it will be more than six years before they receive a trial. The other Defendants in the case also deserve finality and have not sought a stay . . . Even without a stay, the Court was unable in September, 2007, to confirm a trial date in less than eleven months because of counsels' trial calendars. Unless the Supreme Court decides to grant certiorari, this Court is loathe to lose the currently set trial date.").

Haynes v. City of Circleville, Ohio, 474 F.3d 357, 364, 365 (6th Cir. 2007) ("In lodging his protests to Chief Gray against the training cutbacks, Haynes was acting as a public employee carrying out his professional responsibilities . . . Haynes's speech is therefore unprotected as a matter of law because all of the speech at issue in this case, like the speech at issue in Garcetti, was made pursuant to his official duties. . . . . As a police officer, Haynes had developed the standard operating procedure for the canine unit and worked with his dog as part of his day-to-day professional activities. His memo to Chief Gray, made pursuant to these professional duties, is not protected under the First Amendment. . . . . At the time that Haynes sent his memo in February of 2003, he was simply speculating that someday there could be a negative incident that might result from the reduction in canine training. Haynes's memo focused on his discontent with the new program, which he later admitted in his deposition was in compliance with Ohio law. The memo thus reflects nothing more than 'the quintessential employee beef: management has acted incompetently.'. . Haynes's invocation in his memo of legal terms such as 'deliberate indifference' and 'failure to train' do not, without more, render Haynes's speech a matter of public concern. . . In short, the district court erred in concluding that Haynes's memo constituted protected speech even under the law of this circuit prior to Garcetti. Haynes thus has no First Amendment cause of action even if Chief Gray did fire him as a direct result of either the memo or the ill-fated 'Christmas gift.'. . . Because Haynes's speech took place pursuant to his official duties as a police officer, he cannot establish that a constitutional violation took place. . . . Haynes is a fortiori unable to satisfy the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis–that the constitutional right was clearly established.").

Carver v. City of Cincinnati, 474 F.3d 283, 287 (6th Cir. 2007) ("There are no cases that present facts similar to Carver's situation that would make it 'clear to [an objectively] reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . . The district court, citing to Beck v. Haik, 377 F.3d 624, 643 (6th Cir., 2004), found it clearly established that the officers violated Carver's constitutional rights. Beck, however, stands for the proposition that the state may not cut off access to private rescue without providing an adequate state alternative of aid. In this case, unlike Beck, there were no allegations of any attempted private rescue. There are no other cases from this circuit or the Supreme Court with analogous facts to the one before us. Therefore, the law was not clearly established at the time of the alleged constitutional violation.").

Perez v. Oakland County, 466 F.3d 416, 427-29 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Here, we have already determined that there is a genuine issue of fact as to whether Rice violated Perez's Eighth Amendment constitutional right. Thus, though it is a close case, we cannot hold that Rice is entitled to qualified immunity (on summary judgment) based on the first step of the qualified immunity analysis. We thus move to the second step of the qualified immunity test; we determine whether the right violated was 'clearly established' at the time of the violation. . . . In the context of a prisoner's Eighth Amendment medical-care claim, such precedent had to alert Rice that her conduct was deliberately indifferent to a strong likelihood that Perez would try to kill himself. . . . In Comstock v. McCrary, 273 F.3d 693 (2001), this court held that once a prisoner has been deemed suicidal, it is clearly established that the prisoner is entitled to continuing medical treatment. Here, Perez was not deemed to be suicidal at the time he was moved to the single cell. Additionally, Perez was not generally deprived of medical treatment involving his mental health needs. Thus, Perez Sr. would have to prove that his son's right to have his serious medical needs treated without deliberate indifference encompassed a right to a correct assessment of his suicide risk or an effective suicide-monitoring arrangement. . . . Perez identifies no pre-November 2002 published decision of the U.S. Supreme Court or this court requiring such a determination, nor have we found any. If no binding precedent is available that directly holds that conduct materially or fundamentally similar to Rice's was unlawful in October-November 2002 under the circumstances, as is the case here, the court may still find that Rice violated a clearly established right through one other avenue: showing 'a generally applicable principle from either binding or persuasive authorities whose Aspecific application to the relevant controversy" is Aso clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that his conduct was unconstitutional."'. . However, Perez Sr. failed to show such a principle. On the contrary, by October 2002 this circuit's published case law had established that inmates have no general right to be correctly screened for suicidal tendencies. . . The circuit's published case law also held that 'the generalized right of a prisoner to be free from deliberate indifference [to a known serious medical need] cannot support a finding that there was a clearly established right to be protected from committing suicide.'").

Baranski v. Fifteen Unknown Agaents of the Bureau of Alcolhol, Tobacco and Firearms, 452 F.3d 433, 447-50 (6th Cir. 2006) (en banc) ("Doubtless, the agents would have been wiser to bring a written summary of the items to be seized (presumably signed by the magistrate) or to list the items to be seized in the warrant itself. There seems to be little doubt (and none has been offered by the United States) that agents who choose to rely on an incorporated affidavit typically have good reason and ample means to avoid complaints like this one. But the question is whether the Fourth Amendment demands these things, even when the purposes of doing them have been satisfied and even when the failure to do them has not prejudiced the property owners. On this record and under these circumstances, we hold that no constitutional violation occurred. . . But even if that were not the case, even if the search violated the Fourth Amendment, it did not violate 'clearly established' law. . . . Even aside from this mirror-image precedent from another circuit, the prevailing law in this circuit would have led reasonable agents to believe that their conduct was legal at the time they conducted the search. [discussing cases] . . . Groh does not alter this conclusion. The Court could criticize that search as warrantless because the warrant contained a 'glaring deficiency' upon issuance recognizable by 'any reasonable police officer[.]'. . . Absent any evidence on the face of the warrant that it incorporated the attached affidavit, the Court concluded, the warrant was 'manifestly invalid,' 'warrantless' and thus 'constitutionally fatal.' . . . Today's facts offer a poor analogy. At the time of issuance, this warrant specifically incorporated the affidavit ('See Attached Affidavit'), which in turn particularly described the items to be seized. Far from invalidating incorporated affidavits, Groh recognized that they may satisfy the particularity requirement, and in this case no one disputes that the warrant upon issuance appropriately incorporated the affidavit and that the magistrate reviewed, approved and signed the warrant and affidavit. At the time of issuance, in marked contrast to Groh, no amount of study by the agents or the magistrate would have revealed a constitutional infirmity in the warrant. Nor did Groh say that it was clearly established that a warrant valid upon issuance becomes invalid upon execution if the incorporated affidavit does not accompany the search. The words of the Constitution, to which the Court referred in concluding that the Groh warrant was facially invalid, establish particularity requirements that apply by their terms upon the 'issu[ance]' of a warrant, not upon the execution of it. Whether a particularized warrant at the time of issuance may become an unparticularized warrant when a cross-referenced affidavit does not accompany the search remains a matter of continued debate among the circuits and remains an issue that neither the text of the Fourth Amendment nor Groh resolves. We thus conclude that even if this search had violated the Fourth Amendment right, it did not violate 'clearly established' constitutional law, and accordingly the agents should receive qualified immunity.").

Silberstein v. City of Dayton, 440 F.3d 306, 316, 317 (6th Cir. 2006) ("The Board Members do not dispute that a City of Dayton employee in the classified service had a clearly established right to a pre-termination hearing at the time of Silberstein's termination; rather, they argue that Silberstein's status as a classified employee is disputable such that a reasonable person would not know that he or she was violating Silberstein's rights. . . . No reasonable official reading the plain language of the Charter would reach the conclusion that Silberstein was an unclassified employee. Although some cases reveal disagreement or ambiguity regarding an employee's status as classified or unclassified, these cases address whether an employee's position falls within the particular statutory language defining the categories of unclassified service. . . . Silberstein's position was clearly established as classified not only by the plain language of the Charter but also by general understanding and practice.").

Caudill v. Hollan, 431 F.3d 900, 913, 914 (6th Cir. 2005) ("We believe that Hall, Heggen, and McCloud make the law in this circuit with respect to patronage dismissals of these types of county employees clearly established with the requisite specificity to satisfy the Supreme Court's requirement that the law 'clearly establish[ ] in [a] more particularized sense' that the act was unconstitutional. . . The duties of the deputy sheriffs described in Hall are little different from the duties of the deputy clerks here. Deputy sheriffs duties were described in Heggen as 'including road patrol, serving arrest warrants and civil papers, taking complaints and 'working' auto accidents, ... transport [ing] prisoners[,] and providing courtroom security.' . . Heggen described all of these duties as 'nonpolicymaking duties .'. . Deputy clerks, whose work is essentially clerical work, also perform nonpolicymaking duties. Although deputy sheriffs and deputy clerks engage in different tasks, their respective levels of responsibility and the nature of their jobs are not so different as to cause this court to find that the law with respect to deputy sheriffs is clearly established, but that the law with respect to deputy clerks is not clearly established. In addition, Hager's duties are also best described as nonpolicymaking duties. It is difficult to understand how a reasonable official could believe that it would be constitutionally permissible to terminate a clerical employee like a deputy clerk through political patronage, when this court has held that it is not constitutionally permissible to terminate a deputy sheriff or a teacher and administrator of a gifted and talented program through political patronage. Furthermore, were this court to hold that Hall, Heggen, and Hager did not make the law clearly established for deputy county clerks, we would be ignoring the Supreme Court's rule that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . Were this court to require position-specific findings before it found that the law was clearly established, we would be, in effect, requiring a previous finding on the constitutionality of patronage dismissals for every government position before holding that the law was clearly established for that position. Such a finding could lead to the result that similarly situated county officials could engage in political patronage dismissals at least once with impunity, unless and until a court ruled on the constitutionality of political patronage for that particular position. Such a result is not warranted by logic or precedent. . . . In sum, by virtue of McCloud, Heggen, and Hager, Defendant had sufficient notice that patronage dismissals in Kentucky were constitutionally suspect. These cases alone are enough to find that the rule prohibiting patronage dismissals of deputy county clerks was clearly established. The memo from the Boyd County Attorney warning new county executives against patronage dismissals further solidifies our holding that a reasonable official would be on notice that patronage dismissals would violate the constitutional rights of county employees in most circumstances.").

Evans-Marshall v. Bd. of Education of the Tipp City Exempted Village School District, 428 F.3d 223, 232, 233 (6th Cir., 2005)("Evans-Marshall has made allegations sufficient to satisfy the first prong of qualified immunity, that 'the officer[s'] conduct violated a constitutional right[.]'. . Since the Complaint adequately alleges a claim of First Amendment retaliation, there are sufficient allegations to support a claim that the individual defendants violated Evans-Marshall's constitutional rights by terminating her. . . Evans-Marshall's claim also satisfies the second prong of qualified immunity, that 'the right was clearly established.'. . Under a liberal reading of the Complaint, Evans-Marshall was terminated due to a public outcry engendered by the assignment of protected material that had been approved by the Board. Such a claim dovetails with previous, meritorious claims in this circuit. . . The dissent calls our attention to the comments by several of our sister circuits to the effect that constitutional rights discovered only pursuant to a balancing of interests have special implications for qualified immunity. . . . Yet Cockrel is clearly analogous to the facts at bar. In Cockrel, a teacher was fired because of a public outcry over material she presented in class that had been approved by the school. . . We held that her presentation of material in class constituted speech that dealt with a matter of public interest.. . We assumed that the concerns of the school did not outweigh Cockrel's interest in speaking because the school had approved the very material that gave rise to the disruption. . . Even were this circuit to adopt the reasoning of some of our sister circuits, surely the fact that Evans-Marshall assigned books, whereas Cockrel brought in a guest lecturer about industrial hemp, does not obscure the constitutional right at issue.")

Evans-Marshall v. Bd. of Education of the Tipp City Exempted Village School District, 428 F.3d 223, 234-38 (6th Cir., 2005)(Sutton, J., concurring) ("Individual defendants likewise will only rarely be able to establish that the right was not 'clearly established' at this stage of the dispute. The case-by-case, incremental decisionmaking of balancing tests, it is true, infrequently will provide the 'fair notice' that qualified-immunity precedent requires, as each case may contain unique employee interests in speaking and unique employer concerns in restricting the speech. . . But just as these considerations frequently will make it difficult for a plaintiff to surmount a qualified-immunity defense after discovery, so they make it difficult for a defendant to claim qualified immunity on the pleadings before discovery and before the parties (much less the courts) know what is being balanced against what. . . Absent any factual development beyond the allegations in a complaint, a court cannot fairly tell whether a case is 'obvious' or 'squarely govern[ed]' by precedent, which prevents us from determining whether the facts of this case parallel a prior decision or not. Third, while I am prepared to accept these conclusions in this case, I respectfully believe that our circuit should re-think the way it has applied Connick and Pickering to in-class curricular speech. The Supreme Court has never held that the First Amendment applies to a teacher's classroom speech, and there is good reason to think that it would not do so. In Connick, the Court said that 'when a public employee speaks not as a citizen upon matters of public concern, but instead as an employee upon matters of personal interest, absent the most unusual circumstances, a federal court is not the appropriate forum in which to review the wisdom of a personnel decision taken by a public agency allegedly in reaction to the employee's behavior.'. . Connick, then, draws two dichotomies: (1) between speech by public employees acting as 'employees' and speech by public employees acting as private 'citizens'; and (2) between speech 'on matters of public concern' and speech 'upon matters of personal interest.' When public school teachers speak as 'employees,' even when they speak on 'matters of public concern,' the First Amendment thus does not protect their speech under Connick, a conclusion that respects the reality that it is the employer (not the employee) who bears ultimate responsibility for what goes on in the classroom, the reality that virtually all speech by public school teachers in the classroom involves speech in the teacher's capacity as an employee and the reality that many public school teachers (consider English, History and Government teachers) speak about 'matters of public concern' virtually every day of the school year. Only when teachers speak as private citizens on matters of public concern does the First Amendment and the Pickering balancing test apply. . . Submitting issues of this sort to the federal courts is not a sensible way to make decisions about the books that children read in public school or about the way books are taught in school, and it is not something that the Constitution mandates. Because it is the method that our circuit's case law appears to have adopted, however, I respectfully concur in today's opinion.")

Evans-Marshall v. Bd. of Education of the Tipp City Exempted Village School District, 428 F.3d 223, 238 (6th Cir., 2005) (Zatkoff, District Judge, concurring, in part, and dissenting, in part) ("I concur in Judge Cole's majority opinion, which faithfully applies this circuit's precedent in Cockrel v. Shelby County School District, 270 F.3d 1036 (6th Cir.2001) to the present facts. In addition, I concur in Judge Sutton's concurring opinion, which calls for a re-examination of this circuit's First Amendment jurisprudence regarding in-class curricular speech. I disagree with the majority insofar as it would deny qualified immunity to the individual defendants. Because I find that the alleged Constitutional violation was not 'clearly established,' I would grant qualified immunity to the individual defendants.").

Cagle v. Headley, No. 04-6162, 2005 WL 2108367, at *6 (6th Cir. Sept. 1, 2005) (not published) ("No case 'squarely governs' the outcome here. Although the generalized right to be free of a patronage demotion was clearly established at the time of Headley's actions, the qualified-immunity inquiry 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . As our discussion of the Williamson County lieutenants' duties fairly indicates, the position at best falls on the 'hazy border' between Hall and Heggen. . . Although Cagle need not identify 'a separate patronage dismissal decision by the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit involving a particular position before qualified immunity can be denied,' . . . he has failed here to identify a case from the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit that treats as nonpolicymaking a position that is similar for constitutional purposes to a lieutenant's position with these particular responsibilities. Indeed, there is considerable disagreement among the federal courts of appeals as to whether a deputy sheriff–a position that in most sheriffs' departments involves fewer responsibilities than a Williamson County lieutenant–falls on the policymaking side of the First Amendment divide.[comparing cases] This division of opinion, as the Supreme Court has explained in a related context, by itself indicates that the 'cases taken together undoubtedly show that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case.' [citing Brosseau] Neither can we say that Cagle's right to be free of a patronage dismissal was so 'obvious' as to be clearly established by a 'general test[ ] ... even without a body of relevant case law.' . . He thus also cannot prevail under this option for showing the existence of a clearly established right.").

Schultz v. Sillman, No. 04-1507, 2005 WL 2175942, at *8 (6th Cir. Aug. 10, 2005) (not published) ("Once we have established that Plaintiff's version of the facts demonstrates a violation of his constitutional right, the court next decides whether at the time of the suicide, in December 2001, a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct was unlawful. . . While this analysis is particularized and fact-specific, the plaintiff does not have to show that the court has had a 'fundamentally similar' or 'materially similar' case in order for a clearly established right to apply here. . .The jurisprudence of the Sixth Circuit has established a clear right of a prisoner not to have his psychological medical needs, in the form of suicidal tendencies, treated with deliberate indifference. . . Based on this case law, a reasonable officer would know that recklessly disregarding a known risk of an inmate's suicide would violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment right. Importantly, Sillman does not contest that there is clearly established law that would hold a corrections officer liable for deliberate indifference to the risk of suicide if an inmate demonstrates a strong likelihood that he would commit suicide. Therefore, if a jury determines that Schultz demonstrated a strong likelihood of suicide, and that Sillman was aware of this likelihood but chose to disregard it, Sillman's actions would constitute a violation of Schultz's clearly established Eighth Amendment right to receive medical treatment for his suicidal tendencies.").

Knott v. Sullivan, 418 F.3d 561, 571 (6th Cir. 2005) ("In light of the extensiveness of the search warrant defects at issue in this case, we conclude that the constitutional infirmity of the search warrant executed by the Defendants was clearly established at the time they searched Knott's 1988 Plymouth Horizon. . . . The Fourth Amendment obviously forbids relying on a warrant to search one vehicle when all of the vehicle-specific descriptors refer to another vehicle, and thus we conclude that the constitutional invalidity of the search warrant at issue in this case was clearly established at the time Knott's vehicle was searched.").

Fisher v. Harden, 398 F.3d 837, 846-49 (6th Cir. 2005) ("The specific question at issue is whether it was clearly established at the time of Fisher's arrest that a law enforcement officer may not affect a mental health seizure without probable cause. As we have already noted, in 1997 this court specifically held that '[t]he Fourth Amendment requires an official seizing and detaining a person for a psychiatric evaluation to have probable cause to believe that the person is dangerous to himself or others.' . . . The seizure in this case was not specifically for purposes of a professional psychiatric evaluation. This difference, however, is of no effect. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Fisher, we must reject the sentiments of the dissent that the deputies were 'merely securing the scene.'. . . This record evidence reveals that the officers seized and detained Fisher, not merely to secure the scene, but for purposes of a mental health evaluation. Under our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, that action requires probable cause. We have not found any case in which this court has stated that officers may restrain an individual's liberty on the sole basis that they have a reasonable suspicion that the individual suffers from a mental illness. In addition, the other circuits that have examined this issue have similarly held that probable cause is the correct standard. . . . Fisher has alleged facts sufficient to establish a violation of his constitutional rights. It is clearly established that an officer may not affect a mental health seizure without probable cause. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Fisher, we conclude that the Alexanders engaged in conduct that violated a clearly established constitutional right. Accordingly, we find that qualified immunity does not shield them from civil liability." [footnotes omitted]).

Barrett v. Steubenville City Schools, 388 F.3d 967, 973, 974 (6th Cir. 2004) ("In this case, Barrett made a decision to send his son to private school. Barrett's choice in directing his son's education is activity shielded by his constitutionally protected right of liberty. The Defendants do not dispute that. Because it has been clearly established that one's involvement in constitutionally protected activity cannot be the sole basis for denying public employment, any reasonable official would know that denying employment based on a parent's constitutional right to direct his child's education is a violation of the law. Nevertheless, Defendants argue that '[t]here is no clearly established line of cases out of the Supreme Court or this Circuit which establish that dictating where public school employees send their children to school violates the employees' parental rights.' Defendants would have us find that the district court erred by relying on other circuits in its analysis. . .The cases referenced by the district court point unmistakably to the unconstitutionality of the conduct complained of and are clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority in the Supreme Court. . . While it was therefore permissible for the district court to rely on these cases in finding that the law was clearly established, it was unnecessary. We do not adopt the district court's analysis, . . .for we need not rely on law outside of our jurisdiction to find that a clearly established right exists. The Supreme Court has instructed that qualified immunity does not require 'the very action in question [to] ha[ve] previously been held unlawful,' but rather 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.'. . .Defendants cannot escape liability by arguing that no precedent exists that specifically enunciates a law that a public school official cannot deny someone employment solely because that person chooses to his child to a private school. . .As aforementioned, Barrett has a constitutionally protected fundamental right to educate his child at the school of his choice. There is also a clearly established law that forbids employers from denying one employment based only on 'person's involvement in activity shielded by the constitutionally protected rights of privacy and liberty.' In accordance with these fundamental principles of law, Lucci cannot obtain qualified immunity by claiming that no clearly established right existed.").

Barrett v. Steubenville City Schools, 388 F.3d 967, 975, 976 (6th Cir. 2004)(Rogers, J., dissenting) ("The majority concludes that 'any reasonable official would know that denying employment based on a parent's constitutional right to direct his child's education is a violation of the law.' And yet, such a right has not been articulated in the Supreme Court or this circuit. Rather, the majority constructs this right from the parts of two others: the fundamental right of a parent to raise his or her children and direct their education, which is clearly established, and a right the majority describes as a right not to be denied government employment because of a decision to exercise a fundamentally protected right. This second 'right' is not a right in all contexts, and has certainly not been clearly established in the context presented by this case. . . . On the facts of this case, it is not clear that 'every like-situated, reasonable government agent' would have clearly understood that the right to direct the education of one's children should be combined with a balancing test used to determine what rights a public employer can require a public employee to give up, with the result that a public school can not require a public school teacher to send his or her child to that public school.").

Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893, 902-05 (6th Cir. 2004) ("Our caselaw and the evidence presented at trial about the training that the Officers received demonstrate that the force exerted against Champion violated his clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . . The particular type of physical force exerted against Champion was unreasonable, and the Officers should have been aware that they were violating Champion's rights. First, it is clearly established that the Officers' use of pepper spray against Champion after he was handcuffed and hobbled was excessive. . . . In addition to prior precedent, the Officers' training demonstrates that they were aware of Champion's clearly established right to be free from this type of excessive force. The Officers were taught that pepper spraying a suspect after the individual was incapacitated constitutes excessive force. Sergeant Robert Allen, who testified about the training the Nashville Police Officers received, agreed that if Champion were handcuffed and hobbled, spraying him with pepper spray would be excessive. Second, it also clearly established that putting substantial or significant pressure on a suspect's back while that suspect is in a face-down prone position after being subdued and/or incapacitated constitutes excessive force. This appeal gives us no cause to consider whether leaving a bound suspect on his or her stomach without more constitutes excessive force that violates a suspect's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. This is neither a 'positional asphyxia' case nor a case in which the officers lightly touched or placed incidental pressure on Champion's back while he was face down. The asphyxia was caused by the combination of the Officers placing their weight upon Champion's body by lying across his back and simultaneously pepper spraying him. Creating asphyxiating conditions by putting substantial or significant pressure, such as body weight, on the back of an incapacitated and bound suspect constitutes objectively unreasonable excessive force. . . . Additionally, the Officers' training outlined the boundaries of excessive force and made clear that lying on a suspect can cause asphyxiation. All three Officers admitted that they were aware of the potential danger of putting pressure on an individual's back or diaphragm. . . Additionally, Sergeant Allen testified that he taught his officers that lying across an individual's back when that person is on his or her stomach increases the possibility of asphyxia. Just as the Supreme Court determined that the Alabama Department of Corrections Regulations and the communications between the U.S. Department of Justice and the State of Alabama put the state on notice about what constituted cruel and unusual punishment, so too here the training these Officers received alerted them to the potential danger of this particular type of excessive force. . . It cannot be forgotten that the police were confronting an individual whom they knew to be mentally ill or retarded, even though the Officers may not have known the full extent of Champion's autism and his unresponsiveness. The diminished capacity of an unarmed detainee must be taken into account when assessing the amount of force exerted. . . . Consequently, the right to be free from the two types of excessive force exerted against Champion was clearly established by the law of this circuit and by the training of the Officers. Either action by itself violated a clearly established right, and the combination of the actions bolsters the conclusion that no reasonable officer could believe that excessive force was not being used. We recognize that the Officers perhaps did not intend to harm Champion; indeed, they may have believed they were helping him. Such a consideration is immaterial, however, because the qualified immunity doctrine is an objective one; motive is irrelevant. The evidence presented in the light most favorable to Champion, and in the light accepted by the jury, demonstrates that the Officers unreasonably applied excessive force to Champion after he had been incapacitated in violation of Champion's clearly established rights. No reasonable officer would have continued to spray a chemical agent in the face of a handcuffed and hobbled mentally retarded arrestee, who was moving his or her head from side to side in an attempt to breathe, after the arrestee vomited several times. No reasonable officer would continue to put pressure on that arrestee's back after the arrestee was subdued by handcuffs, an ankle restraint, and a police officer holding the arrestee's legs.").

Dean v. Byerley, 354 F.3d 540, 558 (6th Cir. 2004) ("Dean had a constitutionally protected right to engage in peaceful targeted residential picketing, in the absence of an applicable time, place, or manner regulation, and retaliation against Dean for exercising that right would violate Dean's First Amendment rights. Therefore, Dean has satisfied the first hurdle necessary to survive summary judgment based upon qualified immunity by pointing to evidence showing that Byerley violated Dean's First Amendment rights. The Sixth Circuit precedent holding that a § 1983 claim can be predicated upon retaliation for exercising First Amendment rights and the Supreme Court precedent holding that peaceful picketing is constitutionally protected predate the March 27, 2001 confrontation, and thus the right to engage in peaceful targeted residential picketing, free from such retaliation, was clearly established at the time of the confrontation. . . Therefore, Dean has satisfied the second hurdle necessary to survive summary judgment based upon qualified immunity by showing that the constitutional right was clearly established. Finally, through his complaint and Doolittle's deposition, Dean has presented evidence that Byerley's alleged conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of Dean's clearly established First Amendment rights. Therefore, Dean has satisfied the third hurdle necessary to survive summary judgment based upon qualified immunity by pointing to evidence showing that what Byerley did was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established constitutional rights.").

Akers v. McGuinnes, 352 F.3d 1030, 1042, 1043 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Having found no constitutional violation, we must answer the qualified immunity question in the affirmative. While this disposes of this question, we note that for a plaintiff to defeat a defense of qualified immunity, he must not only prove the violation of a right, but of a clearly established right. . . Indeed, the right must be 'so clearly established when the acts were committed that any officer in the defendant's position, measured objectively, would have clearly understood that he was under an affirmative duty to have refrained from such conduct.' . . However, in the present case the district judge found no violation of a constitutional right at all. Thus, for the plaintiffs to prevail here on the question of qualified immunity, the situation would have to be such that any MDOC official when promulgating the Rule would be aware of the fact that it violated the Constitution, but a United States district judge, given the benefit of decades of legal training and practice, years of hearings and adversarial briefings by able counsel, was unable to find such a violation. While such a situation is not logically impossible, and doubtless has occurred from time to time, it certainly must be a very rare one, implicitly casting some doubt on the minimum competency of such a trial judge. Therefore, in cases such as this, unless counsel are prepared to contend that such an extreme and unusual situation occurred, they will not be able to succeed in reversing a grant of qualified immunity.").

Akers v. McGuinnes, 352 F.3d 1030, 1055 n.3 (6th Cir. 2003) (Clay, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I do take issue with the majority's statement that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because "a United States District Court Judge, given the benefit of decades of legal training and practice, years of hearings and adversarial briefings by able counsel, was unable to find ... a violation." With all due respect, my brethren in the district courts have been known to commit legal error, including plain error through the failure to cite and apply clearly established legal precedent. If a district judge's opinion of the state of the law were somehow dispositive of the qualified immunity issue, the Courts of Appeals rarely would have occasion to reverse a district judge's ruling on qualified immunity. Thus, whether a district judge failed to find a constitutional violation should not control this Court's analysis of the issue.").

Toms v. Taft, 338 F.3d 519, 526, 527 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Because the case law fails to show that an inmate's right to marry was so clearly established that an official reasonably would believe that declining to assist an inmate in obtaining a marriage license is unconstitutional, the [Plaintiffs] have failed to meet their burden. We affirm the finding of qualified immunity. [footnote omitted] However, in order to provide more guidance to officials in the future, we note that Turner's test extends to situations in which an inmate's right to marry will be completely frustrated without prison officials' affirmative assistance. Although it was not previously clearly established, we now hold that the distinction between actively prohibiting an inmate's exercise of his right to marry and failing to assist is untenable in a case in which the inmate's right will be completely frustrated without officials' involvement. Therefore, where an inmate will be unable to marry without prison officials' affirmative assistance, Turner's strictures apply. The inmate's right to marry may be curtailed only where the officials' refusal to assist the inmate is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.").

Gean v. Hattaway, 330 F.3d 758, 775-77(6th Cir. 2003) ("The law in the Sixth Circuit is not settled regarding whether Rehabilitation Act claims are properly brought pursuant to § 1983. [citing cases] Moreover, federal courts outside of this circuit are not in agreement as to whether Congress intended the remedies available under the Rehabilitation Act to preclude a suit brought under § 1983 to enforce rights created by the Rehabilitation Act. [citing cases] Because, as we explain below, a § 1983 claim to enforce the plaintiffs' rights under the Rehabilitation Act is barred by qualified immunity in this case and therefore has no chance of success even if it is not precluded by the remedial scheme of the Act, we need not pick a side in that debate. . . . The plaintiffs . . . fail to allege that the defendants' use of plaintiffs' Social Security benefits to pay for part of their current maintenance 'excluded [them] from the participation in, ... denied [them] the benefits of, or ... subjected [them] to discrimination under any program or activity' on the basis of their disability. 29 U.S.C. § 794(a). Rather, as with their claim under the Medicaid Act, their Rehabilitation Act claim alleges discrimination only in highly general terms. In order to overcome the defense of qualified immunity, the plaintiffs must show that the right allegedly violated was 'clearly established in a more particularized ... sense,' Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640 (1987), which they have wholly failed to do. Therefore, the plaintiffs may proceed directly under the Rehabilitation Act against the defendants in their official capacities, but plaintiffs' § 1983 claim against the defendants in their individual capacities, were that claim allowed to proceed, would be barred by qualified immunity. . . . Only with respect to the plaintiffs' claim brought under the Rehabilitation Act against the defendants in their official capacities–for which sovereign immunity has been waived–may this suit go forward.")

Thacker v. City of Columbus, 328 F.3d 244, 259, 260 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Although no case has explicitly sanctioned an entry into a private home under circumstances identical to those presented here, such precedent is not required for qualified immunity purposes. . . . It was not apparent that entering plaintiffs' apartment to secure the safety of the paramedics was unlawful. In fact, reasonable officials at the scene would likely disagree over whether the entry into plaintiffs' home violated plaintiffs' rights. . . .Thus, we cannot find that it was clearly established that entering a home without a warrant to secure the safety of paramedics under the circumstances presented in this case would violate the Fourth Amendment.")

Feathers v. Aey, 319 F.3d 843, 850, 851 (6th Cir. 2003) ("[T]he rights at issue here were clearly established when the incident occurred. Under Hope v. Pelzer, a right can be clearly established even if there is no case involving 'fundamentally similar' or 'materially similar' facts. . . We see no exception in this analysis for the admittedly 'somewhat abstract' problem of determining when the reasonable suspicion requirement is met, Arvizu, 534 U.S. at 274, because Hope specifically states that a right is clearly established when '[t]he reasoning, though not the holding,' of a prior court of appeals decision puts law enforcement officials on notice, or when the 'premise' of one case 'has clear applicability' to a subsequent set of facts. . . Here, this standard is met. Terry, which requires reasonable suspicion for investigative detentions, had been clearly established since 1968. The Supreme Court had emphasized the importance of establishing the reliability of anonymous tips in 1990 in White and had re-affirmed that principle in J.L., decided just a few months before this incident. And the principle that an officer may rely on a dispatch for reasonable suspicion only to the extent that the dispatch is itself based on sufficient information had been established since Hensley in 1985. These premises clearly apply to the case at hand, and a reasonable officer would have been aware of the relevant rights. Nonetheless Feathers cannot overcome the officers' qualified immunity. Aey's and Donohue's behavior was not objectively unreasonable, even in light of the clearly established rights, as Williams v. Mehra, 186 F.3d at 691, requires before a plaintiff can overcome qualified immunity. Based on the information that Aey and Donohue had themselves, the Terry stop was reasonable. The dispatcher informed the officers of a suspicious person who was possibly intoxicated and supposed to be carrying a weapon. Although this information was from an anonymous tipster, whose information was not sufficient to create reasonable suspicion under J.L., the officers knew only what had been reported from the dispatch, and efficient law enforcement requires–at least for the purposes of determining the civil liability of individual officers– that police be permitted to rely on information provided by the dispatcher. If the dispatcher's information were accurate and reliable, as the police presumed, the totality of circumstances would justify the Terry stop. . . . So although the stop violated the Fourth Amendment because the authorities' collective information did not amount to reasonable suspicion, Feathers cannot prevail in a § 1983 suit because the individual defendants had a sufficient factual basis for thinking that they were acting consistently with Terry. Although there might be a legitimate question about whether the City should be held liable for a policy that does not inform dispatched officers of the reliability of their tip, the dismissal of the claims against the City is not before us.").

Burchett v. Kiefer, 310 F.3d 937, 945, 946 (6th Cir.2002) ("Burchett claims that his detention in the police car with the windows rolled up in ninety degree heat for three hours constituted excessive force. We agree that unnecessary detention in extreme temperatures, like those that could be reached in an unventilated car in ninety-degree heat, violates the Fourth Amendment's prohibitions on unreasonable searches and seizures. The Supreme Court has noted that under certain circumstances 'unnecessary exposure to the heat of the sun, to prolonged thirst and taunting, and to a deprivation of bathroom breaks' can violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.' . . Such actions a fortiori violate the Fourth Amendment, which requires a showing of objective unreasonableness rather than any particular subjective motivation. . . Further, the government's interest in effecting the seizure in this case did not justify the imposition of extreme heat on the individual. The officers had many equally effective alternative ways of detaining Burchett that would not have subjected him to excessive heat, but their denial of his request that they roll down the windows to allow him air indicates a wanton indifference to this important safety factor. They could have left the windows slightly open, for example, or utilized the car's cooling or ventilation devices. If the detainee did spit upon officers or passers-by or otherwise disrupted the officers' search, and the officers could not otherwise effectively separate the detainee from passers-by, a reasonable officer might conclude that closing the windows was necessary. Resolving factual disputes in Burchett's favor, however, those circumstances were not present here. Thus we conclude that those responsible for detaining Burchett for three hours in ninety-degree heat with no ventilation violated his Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizures. We also conclude that, under the Supreme Court's recent guidance in Hope v. Pelzer, this right was clearly established for qualified immunity purposes. In Hope, the Court made clear that a right can be clearly established even if there is no case involving 'fundamentally similar' or 'materially similar' facts. . . Rather, a right is clearly established when '[t]he reasoning, though not the holding,' of a prior court of appeals decision puts law enforcement officials on notice, or when the 'premise' of one case 'has clear applicability' to a subsequent set of facts. . . Here, this standard is met. We have long recognized, for instance, that the Fourth Amendment permits detention using only 'the least intrusive means reasonably available.' . . Similarly, we have recognized that 'claims of excessive force do not necessarily require allegations of assault,' but rather can consist of the physical structure and conditions of the place of detention. . . These premises have clear applicability to this case, and the reasoning of those cases should have alerted reasonable officers to the constitutional violations inherent in subjecting a detainee to excessive heat.").

Farm Labor Organizing Committee v. Ohio State Highway Patrol, 308 F.3d 523, 539, 541, 542 (6th Cir. 2002) ("[E]ven if Trooper Kiefer is correct that the record reveals that he possessed some race-neutral basis for initiating the investigation of the plaintiffs, this fact alone would not entitle him to summary judgment on qualified immunity as long as the plaintiffs can demonstrate that he was partly motivated by a discriminatory purpose. Of course, Trooper Kiefer can still argue, based upon Mt. Healthy and Arlington Heights, that his race-neutral reasons would have caused him to investigate the plaintiffs regardless of any discriminatory motive that may have existed. The question of whether Trooper Kiefer's allegedly discriminatory motive played a determinative role in the decision to investigate the plaintiffs, however, is a factual dispute best suited for resolution at trial. . . . We disagree with the defendant's characterization of the state of the law in 1995. While Travis may have been the first case to reach the merits of such an equal protection claim, we expressly acknowledged in a 1992 en banc case, United States v. Taylor, that an equal protection claim could be based upon evidence that law enforcement officers targeted minorities for consensual interviews on the basis of race. . . . We conclude, therefore, that a reasonable officer at the time of the events in question would have known that the Constitution forbade embarking on an investigation of someone for a particular offense on the basis of that person's race.").

Bell v. Johnson, 308 F.3d 594, 612, 613 (6th Cir. 2002) ("In sum, we conclude that the plaintiffs' allegations, if proven, would establish a violation of the law that was clearly established in 1994. Our review of the relevant case law reveals that it was not until McLaurin was issued in 1997 that a reasonable official might expect to escape liability for retaliatory acts falling short of conscience-shocking abuses of power. Prior to that opinion, the published authority in our circuit made it clear that the "shocks the conscience" test did not apply to retaliation claims expressly brought under the First Amendment. We therefore determine that defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Waller v. Trippett, No. 01-2716, 2002 WL 31296347, at *4, *6, *7 (6th Cir. Oct. 10, 2002) (unpublished) ("In this Circuit, we have recognized the possibility of using the 'state-created danger' theory to hold a state or state actor liable under the Fourteenth Amendment for private acts of violence. See, e.g., Jones v. City of Carlisle, 3 F.3d 945, 949-50 (6th Cir.1993); Gazette v. City of Pontiac, 41 F.3d 1061, 1965 (6th Cir.1994); Sargi, 70 F.3d 907 at 912-13; Stemler, 126 F.3d at 868. However, it was not until Kallstrom that we actually held a state actor liable for private acts of violence under the 'state-created' danger theory. . . . We conclude that the district court described the right that the Defendant allegedly violated too broadly. . . . Contrary to the district court's conclusion, we do not believe that the relevant 'legal rule,' here, the 'state-created danger,' was articulated in a particularized sense at the time of the Defendant's challenged conduct in May 1998. To be sure, in 1989 in DeShaney, the Supreme Court suggested, but did not hold, that state actors may be liable if they help create the danger that causes an individual's injury by a private party or if they render an individual more vulnerable to injury by a private party. The DeShaney Court did not specify how a state might create the danger causing an individual's injury, what actions of a state would render an individual more vulnerable to danger, or by how much the state must increase an individual's risk of injury from a third party before that individual's substantive due process rights are violated. . . . . While each of these cases generally suggests that a state actor might be liable if he or she renders a victim more vulnerable to danger, not one of them convinces us that, in the period after DeShaney and before Ms. Taylor's death, the Defendant should have known that, by acting as he did, he would violate Ms. Taylor's substantive due process rights. Absent law that would have put the Defendant on notice that his particular conduct offended the Constitution, we find that he is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Thomas v. Cohen, 304 F.3d 563, 580, 581 (6th Cir. 2002) (" We do not believe that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Plaintiffs' procedural due process claim. The Supreme Court had decided Fuentes and Good Real Prop. long before Plaintiff's eviction. As we stated in Flatford, "it was sufficiently clear at the time of the eviction that [Plaintiffs] were entitled to pre-eviction judicial oversight in the absence of emergency circumstances." . . . Furthermore, Kentucky laws forbidding self-help evictions without judicial process and providing for preeviction notice and forcible detainer actions were well-established. As trained police officers, Defendants should have known that self-help evictions are prohibited in the state of Kentucky, and that the eviction they facilitated was therefore 'patently unlawful.'").

Sheets v. Mullins, 287 F.3d 581, 589, 590 (6th Cir. 2002) ("In denying relief to Mullins, the district court wrote: 'Based upon the state of the law in February 1997, this Court concludes that a reasonable official in the position of Sergeant Mullins should have known that a party's right to substantive due process is violated by a public actor whose conduct significantly increases the risk of injury from a third party.' We think the district judge described the right that Mullins allegedly violated too broadly. As the Supreme Court explained in Anderson v. Creighton, . . . the 'clearly established' standard becomes meaningless if the relevant 'legal rule' is defined in abstract or general terms. Instead, the relevant 'legal rule' must be articulated in a particularized sense, such that the contours of the rule are sufficiently clear to put a reasonable official on notice that what he is doing is probably unlawful. . . . The district court determined that it was clearly established in February, 1997, that an officer would violate the substantive due process clause by significantly increasing an individual's risk of injury from a third party. To be sure, in 1989 in DeShaney, the Supreme Court suggested, but did not hold, that state actors may be liable if they help create the danger that causes an individual's injury by a private party or if they render an individual more vulnerable to injury by a private party. The DeShaney Court did not specify how a state might create the danger causing an individual's injury, what actions of a state would render an individual more vulnerable to danger, or by how much the state must increase an individual's risk of injury from a third party before that individual's substantive due process rights are violated. . . . In Kallstrom, decided in February of 1998, a year after Mullins responded to the call about Sheets, we noted that no court within the Sixth Circuit had yet held the state or a state actor liable for private acts of violence under the state-created-danger theory. Indeed, before Kallstrom was decided and before Mullins acted in February of 1997, there was only one reported decision from a court within this circuit that had even allowed a private-act-of-violence case to survive a motion for summary judgment. Smith v. City of Elyria, 857 F.Supp. at 1203. . . . Absent law that would have put Mullins on notice that his particular conduct offended the Constitution, we find that he is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Comstock v. McCrary, 273 F.3d 693, 711 (6th Cir. 2001) ("The right at issue in this case is not, as defendants argue, the right to be diagnosed accurately for one's propensity to commit suicide; Montgomery had already been correctly identified as suicidal by McCrary and the prison staff. As we have discussed above, the right that plaintiff claims on Montgomery's behalf is the more basic right to continuing medical treatment once a prisoner has been determined to be suicidal. This circuit has consistently recognized a prisoner's established right to medical attention once the prisoner's suicidal tendencies are known. . . . Based on case law from the Supreme Court and our circuit, we conclude that a reasonable prison psychologist in 1995 'would have clearly understood that [he] was under an affirmative duty' to offer reasonable medical care to a prisoner whom he knew to be suicidal, in the circumstances confronted by McCrary. . . Because, viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, McCrary's conduct violated Montgomery's constitutionally protected right to medical care for his serious medical needs under the Eighth Amendment, and the constitutional right was clearly established such that a reasonable official, at the time McCrary acted, would have understood that his behavior violated that right, we AFFIRM the district court's denial of summary judgment with respect to McCrary.").

Rippy v. Hattaway, 270 F.3d 416, 425 n.4 (6th Cir. 2001) ("The right to representation by counsel in a proceeding affecting custody of one's child was a clearly established requirement of procedural due process in 1995. . .The right to be informed of the right to representation by a social worker, who performs a role like that of a prosecutor in that proceeding,was not clearly established at that time, however. The distinction is that Aaron and Janet Rippy do not allege that Appellant Bryant deprived them of their right to counsel, but that she failed to inform them of that right. A reasonable official in Appellant Bryant's position in May 1995 would not have clearly understood that she bore an affirmative duty to inform Aaron and Janet Rippy of their right to representation by counsel at the May 25, 1995 hearing.").

LeMarbe v. Wisneski, 266 F.3d 429, 440 (6th Cir. 2001) ("It is clearly established that, if a doctor knows of a substantial risk of serious harm to a patient and is aware that he must either seek immediate assistance from another doctor to prevent further serious harm or must inform the patient to seek immediate assistance elsewhere, and then fails to do in a timely manner what his training indicates is necessary to prevent such harm, that doctor has treated the patient with deliberate indifference.")

Rodgers v. Hawley, No. 99-2219, 99-2311, 2001 WL 798618, at *5 & n.5 (6th Cir. June 22, 2001) (unpublished) ("In this case, the alleged retaliatory conduct occurred in 1995 and 1996. At that time, the law of this Circuit required that actionable retaliation shock the conscience or involve an egregious abuse of government power. . . In his dissent, Judge Clay suggests that the shocks-the- conscience test did not govern Kedzierzawski and Kirkwood's conduct in 1995 and 1996. He says the new standard for retaliation claims adopted in Thaddeus-X 'did not effect a profound change in the law ...,' but merely recognized the standard for retaliation claims 'long ago established' by the United States Supreme Court's decision in Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 395 (1989). We disagree. . . Unlike the Fourth Amendment involved in Graham, the First Amendment does not express any substantive standard governing intrusions on the rights guaranteed thereunder. Including no explicit standard, the First Amendment could not have alerted Kedzierzawski and Kirkwood that they were violating Irvin's First Amendment rights.").

McCurdy v. Montgomery County, 240 F.3d 512, 525, 526 (6th Cir. 2001) (Engel, J., dissenting) ("The majority holds that the district court erred in its conclusion that when Officer Cole acted, it was not clearly established that the First Amendment prohibited an officer from effectuating an otherwise valid arrest if that officer was motivated in part by a desire to retaliate against the arrestee's assertion of First Amendment rights. The majority reasons that because it was well-established then that McCurdy had a constitutional right to challenge verbally Officer Cole's surveillance, the district court erred in granting Officer Cole qualified immunity on the retaliation claim. . . . Whether a plaintiff may recover for a deprivation of First Amendment rights caused by an allegedly retaliatory arrest which the officer had probable cause to effect was not a matter of clearly established law in 1996. Indeed, it is still an issue that is subject to debate in the federal courts. The majority cites no Supreme Court or published Sixth Circuit cases discussing retaliation claims in the context of an arrest, and I am aware of none.").

Sowards v. Loudon County, 203 F.3d 426, 439, 440 (6th Cir. 2000) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor the Sixth Circuit has evaluated whether a jailer at the LCSD, or a jailer possessing the same duties as those mandated by Tennessee law, falls under the Elrod/Branti exception . . . .[H]owever, the position of a jailer is analogous to the position of a prison guard, and the Supreme Court concluded that political considerations are inappropriate for the employment decisions concerning a prison guard in 1990. . . It was objectively unreasonable for Guider to believe that political considerations were appropriate for the position of a jailer in 1995 in light of the Supreme Court's 1990 Rutan decision. Because the law was so clearly established that he could not reasonably take political considerations into account when terminating Sowards, Guider is not entitled to qualified immunity in his individual capacity for Sowards's political association claim.").

Gable v. Lewis, 201 F.3d 769, 771, 772 (6th Cir. 2000) ("We believe that the law is clearly established that the 'public concern test' does not apply to the petitioning activity in the instant case. . . . [T]here is no basis in our First Amendment jurisprudence for applying Connick's public concern test to petitioning activity by a private business woman who is simply supplying services to a governmental agency as an independent contractor. . . .[W]e conclude that the law interpreting the petition clause protects the plaintiff in filing a complaint with the Ohio Highway Patrol claiming sex discrimination, and this law was clearly established prior to the retaliatory conduct found by the jury in the present case. We also conclude that the law was clearly established that the 'public concern' test does not apply to plaintiff's petitioning activity. Hence the doctrine of official immunity is inapplicable . . . .").

Gable v. Lewis, 201 F.3d 769, 773 (6th Cir. 2000) (Nelson, J., dissenting) ("[I]f reasonable members of this court could disagree in March of 1997 over the applicability of the public-concern test in the Petition Clause context, how can we say that the law was so clearly established seven months earlier that there was no room at that time for disagreement among reasonable Highway Patrol officials?").

Blake v. Wright, 179 F.3d 1003, 1008, 1010, 1011, 1013 (6th Cir. 1999) ("Although we acknowledge that the Fourth Amendment warns of inherent dangers with wiretapping, we agree with Wright that the case law, when examined with the relevant Ohio statute, was sufficiently uncertain regarding the unlawfulness of implementing the DigiVoice system in a police department's official phones in Ohio. . . . In sum, we hold that Wright is entitled to qualified immunity under § 1983 because the law regarding the administrative monitoring of police phone lines was sufficiently unclear at the time of the alleged violations that a "reasonable" officer in Wright's position would not have known he was violating clearly established law. . . . Ultimately, we believe that the Court intended to apply qualified immunity to statutory violations and we thus hold that a defendant may claim qualified immunity in response to a Title III claim. We fail to see the logic of providing a defense of qualified immunity to protect public officials from personal liability when they violate constitutional rights that are not clearly established and deny them qualified immunity when they violate statutory rights that similarly are not clearly established.").

Key v. Grayson, 179 F.3d 996, 997, 1002 (6th Cir. 1999) ("[W]e conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because, prior to 1996, it was not clearly established that the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act applied to prisoners. . . .[T]he language of the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act indicates the statutes' applicability to prisons but, prior to 1996, there is no published court decision so holding from the Supreme Court, this court or a court within this circuit. At least one circuit has held that, prior to 1994, the statutes did not apply to state prisons. [citing Torcasio] Finally, in a similar–albeit distinguishable–situation, the Eighth Circuit determined that qualified immunity was available to defendants because it was not clearly established that the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act applied to the transportation of arrestees.").

Bloch v. Ribar, 156 F.3d 673, 686, 687 (6th Cir. 1998) ("Despite what appears to be a possible violation of the Blochs' privacy interests in this case, their claim against Ribar on this ground must fail because, as the district court held, a reasonable public official would not be on notice that the release of such intimate details of a rape constituted an actionable violation of a rape victim's privacy interests. A reasonably prudent sheriff should have refrained from unnecessarily releasing the highly confidential and embarrassing personal information, but in light of the dearth of case law on this issue and the complexities stemming from the nature of crimes of sexual violence, it would be unfair to conclude that a reasonable official would have been aware that releasing these details violated a clearly established constitutional right to privacy. . . . In light of our ruling in the present case, however, public officials in this circuit will now be on notice that such a privacy right exists. Therefore, any future violation will not allow an official such as Ribar to claim the lack of reasonable notice that is necessary to sustain a defense of qualified immunity.").

Daughenbaugh v. City of Tiffin, 150 F.3d 594, 603 (6th Cir. 1998) ("[T]he illegal search occurred before this court's decision in United States v. Jenkins, 124 F.3d 768 (6th Cir.1997) (holding that one's backyard is definitely part of the curtilage). In light of Jenkins and the instant case, however, the police will be precluded in the future from relying on qualified immunity as a defense to warrantless searches of garages and backyards in situations similar to those herein.").

Gravely v. Madden, 142 F.3d 345, 348, 349 (6th Cir. 1998) ("While it was clear in 1987 that Tennessee v. Garner governed the use of excessive force by law enforcement officers on free citizens, it was not clearly established that Garner applied in excessive force cases involving escaped convicts. The use of excessive force to recapture an escaped convict creates a different problem than the use of force to apprehend a nonviolent fleeing felony suspect. The Fourth Amendment is not triggered anew by attempts at recapture because the convict has already been 'seized,' tried, convicted, and incarcerated. . . . Although Whitley involved the use of deadly force during the suppression of a prison riot, the factors relied on by the Court in that context are also relevant in evaluating the use of force in the apprehension of an escaped felon. Applying these factors in the present case, and viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Madden's position may well have deemed it permissible to use deadly force under the circumstances.").

Gravely v. Madden, 142 F.3d 345, 350, 352-53 (6th Cir. 1998) (Kennedy, J., concurring in the result) ("The cases upon which the majority relies all involve actions taken against convicted persons in the prison context. Because I believe that a convicted person whom prison officials are not hotly pursuing is more analogous to a fleeing felon than to a confined prisoner, I would apply the Fourth Amendment to the claims of escapees. I then would find that the prison officials' actions violated the decedent's rights under this Amendment. However, I too believe summary judgment is appropriate because the Fourth Amendment's applicability to an official's use of deadly force during an attempt to apprehend an escaped, convicted felon was not clearly established in 1987, when the relevant actions took place. . . . I would hold that the Eighth Amendment applies so long as the officials are in 'hot pursuit,' or 'immediate and continuous pursuit,' of the escapee. . . The Eighth Amendment should apply so long as the officials are in 'hot pursuit' because we cannot expect prison guards to know, or take the time to learn, for what crime the escapee was imprisoned. In addition, applying the lesser constitutional standard throughout the 'hot pursuit' of an escapee would be a deterrent to other prisoners contemplating an escape attempt. This deterrent interest is served when other prisoners are prevented from witnessing successful escapes. Once a convicted person is no longer being hotly pursued, his eventual recapture is less likely to affect other inmates' decision to attempt escape. At that point, the policy reasons militate in favor of Fourth Amendment protection.").

Cope v. Heltsley, 128 F.3d 452, 460 (6th Cir. 1997) ("Would it have been possible, at the end of 1993, for a reasonable person, newly-elected a Kentucky county clerk, to believe that the law entitled her to take political compatibility into account in deciding whom to retain as her deputy clerks? The answer, we think, is 'yes.' . . . [T]here was no published decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit–and certainly no decision of the United States Supreme Court–holding that political compatibility is not, in the words of Rutan, 'an appropriate requirement for the position involved.'. . . '[I]n the circumstances' of the present case, pre-existing law did not 'truly compel' the conclusion that in selecting her staff–the public face of the county clerk's office–the clerk could not take political compatibility into account.").

Hall v. Tollett, 128 F.3d 418, 429-30 (6th Cir. 1997) ("[A]n absence of cases directly on point does not indicate that the constitutionality of a patronage based discharge has yet to be established. In McCloud, we developed a categorical approach to help establish and define which public offices fall within the Branti exception. This approach, however, will not remove all uncertainty. . . . Although Elrod seemingly established that low-level sheriff's department employees fall outside this exception, we held in Cagle v. Gilley, 957 F.2d 1347 (6th Cir.1992), that it was not clearly established that deputy sheriffs were protected from patronage based dismissals. Unfortunately, we granted a sheriff qualified immunity, without first determining whether there had actually been a constitutional violation. 957 F.2d at 1349. Therefore, Cagle effectively established only that in 1992 the state of the law regarding patronage dismissals of sheriffs' deputies was not clearly established. In the time between Cagle and September 1, 1994, no further cases added clarity to the status of deputy sheriffs. The split among circuits regarding this issue also indicates the unsettled nature of the law regarding the status of deputy sheriffs. . . For these reasons, we agree with the District Court that defendant is entitled to qualified immunity in this case.").

Stemler v. City of Florence, 126 F.3d 856, 866-67, 870 (6th Cir. 1997) ("[T]he district court reviewed the relevant case law dealing with claims that state actors violated substantive due process by allowing individuals to become subject to an indirect harm, and found much of that law to be confused and in conflict. It then appeared to reason that, since the doctrine of substantive due process was unclear in its entirety, no such claim could ever survive a motion to dismiss on the ground of qualified immunity . . . . This was error. While. . . there is a good deal of uncertainty with regard to the precise contours of substantive due process, it does not follow that state actors are insulated from liability on all such claims, no matter what the underlying facts may be. The fact that the law may have been unclear, or even hotly disputed, at the margins does not afford state actors immunity from suit where their actions violate the heartland of the constitutional guarantee, as that guarantee was understood at the time of the violation. Stated differently, it is simply irrelevant that the definition of the right to substantive due process has been in flux if, under any definition found in the case law at the time, the defendants should have known in February 1994 that their actions violated that right. . . . The very notion that police officers should not have known that they could not force an incapacitated woman to drive off with an obviously drunk man who they had reason to believe had beaten her betrays a chilling and unacceptable vision of the role of the police in our society.").

Sandul v. Larion, 119 F.3d 1250, 1255, 1256 (6th Cir. 1997) ("In 1990 when Sandul was arrested for his use of the "f-word," it was clearly established that speech is entitled to First Amendment protection with the exception of fighting words. . . . While the Livonia ordinances are presumptively valid as they have not been challenged, Sandul's § 1983 claims are unaffected by his failure to challenge the constitutionality of the ordinances.").

Saylor v. Bd. of Educ. of Harlan County, 118 F.3d 507, 516 (6th Cir. 1997) ("We are aware of no pre-existing law 'dictat[ing]' the conclusion that a disciplinary paddling administered by a school teacher in violation of school regulations would ipso facto violate federal constitutional law." citing Lassiter).

Martin v. Heideman, 106 F.3d 1308, 1312-13 (6th Cir. 1997) ("The district court found that at the time of the plaintiff's arrest, the law was not clearly established that the overly tight application of handcuffs was a violation of an arrestee's constitutional right not to have excessive force applied during an arrest, citing conflicting cases from around the country. . . . This circuit, however, has chosen to view an 'excessively forceful handcuffing' claim under the general excessive force rubric. . . . Because clearly established law in 1991 . . . prohibited an officer's use of excessive force, and because a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether Officer Paul used excessive force under the circumstances, the district court erred by granting Paul qualified immunity on the handcuffing issue.").

Doe v. Claiborne County, 103 F.3d 495, 507 (6th Cir. 1996) ("We . . . hold that Doe had a clearly established right under the substantive component of the Due Process Clause to personal security and to bodily integrity, that such right is fundamental, and that Davis's sexual abuse of Doe violated that right.").

McBride v. Village of Michiana, 100 F.3d 457, 461 (6th Cir. 1996) ("The possible scenarios involving retaliatory treatment of persons engaged in protected speech are too numerous to begin to list. . .[I]t is not essential that a Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit case discuss each of those imaginable possibilities before finding that the right to be free from retaliation for exercise of First Amendment freedoms is clearly established. At the time of the alleged retaliatory actions, Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit precedent had clearly established that retaliation aimed at chilling fundamental rights was improper. Although no Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit decisions had...applied time-honored First Amendment principles to a situation specifically involving governmental retaliation against a news reporter, relevant pre-existing case law made the illegality of such retaliation apparent.").

McCloud v. Testa, 97 F.3d 1536, 1547, 1557 (6th Cir. 1996) ("We conclude that it is improper to grant qualified immunity to every defendant who has taken an adverse employment action against a plaintiff occupying or previously occupying a public office that the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit has not yet explicitly held falls into or outside of the Branti exception. In doing so, we give more precise content to the Branti exception, so that we can better delineate those public positions that as a general matter should receive First Amendment protection, and those that should not. . . . We reject the notion that there must be a separate patronage dismissal decision by the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit involving a particular position before qualified immunity can be denied in such a case. The lack of specific precedent holding that a particular position is outside the Branti exception is a necessary condition to arguing that the First Amendment right to be free from patronage dismissal is unclear as to a particular position, but the lack of such precedent is not a sufficient condition for concluding that the law is unclear on the subject and so qualified immunity must be granted to a defendant. . . . It simply cannot be true that there must be a specific patronage dismissal case in the Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit before qualified immunity can be denied to any otherwise eligible defendant in such a case. If this were true, qualified immunity would be converted into a nearly absolute barrier to recovering damages against an individual governmental actor in patronage cases because the reported case law classifies new positions very slowly. . . . we believe that certain categories of positions falling into the Branti exception can be specified with reasonable certainty. We set these categories out below so that the district courts may apply them in future patronage cases, especially those involving issues of qualified immunity . . . .").

Durham v. Nu'Man, 97 F.3d 862, 867 (6th Cir. 1996) ("Although there has not yet been a case in this Circuit specifically holding that a hospital security officer can be held liable under § 1983 for failing to protect a patient or inmate from being beaten by another hospital security officer, it is not necessary that there be a specific holding in order to find that a constitutional rule in the § 1983 area has been 'clearly established.'").

Sheets v. Moore, 97 F.3d 164, 168 (6th Cir. 1996) ("If federal district judges could reasonably disagree over the constitutionality of the regulation [prohibiting prisoners from receiving free advertising and other bulk mail], then it can fairly be said that a reasonable official would not have known that his conduct violated a clearly established right.").

Hughes v. City of North Olmstead, 93 F.3d 238, 243 (6th Cir. 1996) ("In this case, it is clear that there was a generally established right to privacy and free association at the time of the police investigation. However, at that time, those rights were not so clearly established by the Supreme Court or this Circuit that police department officials would have realized their actions were violating the law. Thus, in the absence of more fact-specific authority defining how an investigation into private sexual matters invades the realm of privacy and free association, the department investigation could not have infringed upon clearly established constitutional rights.").

Smith v. Williams, 78 F.3d 585 (Table), No. 94-6306, 1996 WL 99329, *5 (6th Cir. March 6, 1996) ("[T]he right to be free from malicious prosecution is a clearly established right, although prior to January of 1994, this circuit analyzed the right as accruing under the Fourteenth rather than the Fourth Amendment.").

Adams v. Yontz, 73 F.3d 361 (Table), 1996 WL 5563, *2 (6th Cir. Jan. 5, 1996) ("[T]he relevant inquiry for the purposes of our qualified immunity analysis is whether the law clearly established supervisory liability on principals for the unconstitutional actions of their subordinates at the time that the alleged incidents occurred. We believe that it did.").

Foy v. City of Berea, 58 F.3d 227, 229 (6th Cir. 1995) ("On May 3, 1990, neither the Supreme Court nor this court had held that police officers commit a substantive due process violation if, after receiving complaints from the owner of property that intoxicated persons are causing a disturbance on that property, the officers command these individuals to leave the property and the intruders are injured later by their own actions or those of other private parties. In fact, we find no controlling authority holding that such action by police under generally similar circumstances would constitute a due process violation.").

Thomas v. Whalen, 51 F.3d 1285, 1292 (6th Cir. 1995) ("[Plaintiff] did not have a clearly established right to invoke the name of the Cincinnati Police Division or display the police department's insignia in order to enhance his own credibility in advocating [the NRA position against gun control].").

Cameron v. Seitz, 38 F.3d 264, 275-76 (6th Cir. 1994) ("We hold that, at the time of the relevant actions underlying the complaint in this case, the constitutional protection of the right of marital association did not clearly extend to a dating relationship or to engagement, and qualified immunity attaches to Seitz's interference with Cindy's and Larry's relationship by his employment actions. Whether an engagement to marry is a right protected by the Constitution against any adverse action is a question we need not decide today. The fact that the contours of such protection simply have not been clearly extended to engagements compels the conclusion that qualified immunity is mandated here.").

Buckner v. Kilgore, 36 F.3d 536, 540 (6th Cir. 1994) ("[A]n officer violates a clearly established right under Brower if he pulls his squad car onto a highway with knowledge or reason to know that an approaching motorcyclist will not have time or the ability to stop or otherwise safely avoid collision with the car.").

Williams v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 24 F.3d 1526, 1537 (6th Cir. 1994) ("Defendants argue that because particularized balancing is necessary under Pickering and its progeny, they are entitled to qualified immunity because the contours of a public employee's free speech rights are unclear . . . . We agree that in many public employee free speech cases it would be unclear to a reasonable official what the outcome of the balancing inquiry should be. However, the instant case presents a situation where the employee has spoken out on matters of great public concern, and these statements apparently had only minimal effect on the efficiency of the office. . . [T]his is not a case where the imprecision of the standard makes a difference.).

Centanni v. Eight Unknown Officers, 15 F.3d 587, 592 (6th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e conclude that it has been clearly established that–regardless of any exigent circumstances–the seizure and removal to the station house of an individual who is not suspected of any criminal activity constitutes a de facto arrest requiring probable cause."), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 2740 (1994).

Walton v. City of Southfield, 995 F.2d 1331 (6th Cir. 1993) ("[A]t the time of [plaintiff's] arrest in 1988, there was no clearly established right to personal security forbidding the police from abandoning passengers. . . . [T]he 'contours of the right,' if there is such a right, were not sufficiently clear so that a reasonable officer would have known that leaving the children in the parking lot violated that right.").

Heflin v. Stewart County, 958 F.2d 709, 717 (6th Cir. 1992) ("There can be no doubt that in 1987 existing law clearly established the right of pretrial jail inmates to receive care for their serious medical needs. At least as early as 1985 we recognized this right as the basis for section 1983 claims involving jail suicides by hanging....The unlawfulness of doing nothing to attempt to save [the inmate's] life would have been apparent to a reasonable official in [defendants'] position in light of pre-existing law."), rehearing granted in part on reconsideration, 968 F.2d 1 (6th Cir. 1992).

Rich v. City of Mayfield Heights, 955 F.2d 1092, 1096-97 (6th Cir. 1992) ("[G]eneralized right of a prisoner to be free from deliberate indifference cannot support a finding that there was a clearly established right to be protected from committing suicide....The 'right' at issue in the instant appeal is the right of a pretrial detainee to be cut down by police officers when discovered hanging in a jail cell.").

Daugherty v. Campbell, 935 F.2d 780 (6th Cir. 1991) (where very action in question, visual body cavity search of prison visitor without reasonable suspicion, had been held unlawful by every circuit considering the issue since 1982, and where cases from other circuits were similar enough to merit reasonable reliance upon them, the contours of the right were clearly established).

Napper v. Hankison, No. 3:20-CV-764-BJB, 2022 WL 3008809 (W.D. Ky. July 28, 2022) ("After a state-court grand jury indicted Hankison for his role in these events, the Court stayed the civil claims against him. . . Since then, the Commonwealth tried Hankison for wanton endangerment and a jury acquitted him. . . So at this juncture the Court does not face the question whether the Plaintiffs stated a plausible claim against Hankison—the only Defendant whose bullets allegedly entered the Plaintiffs' apartment.Instead, this Order addresses the motions to dismiss filed by Louisville Metro Government and the individual defendants aside from Hankison. . . . This case concerns a dispute about a shooting that occurred as officers attempted to serve a warrant at an apartment building. . . The Plaintiffs were unintended rather than intended targets of police gunshots. The officers were returning fire rather than shooting at a fleeing suspect. Much of the alleged harm concerns fear and a perceived inability to leave, rather than a gunshot that physically restrained and indeed killed the suspect. . . And the officers at issue in this order are not the ones whose shots directly violated the constitutional rights of the Plaintiffs—even on their own theory. These factual and legal distinctions are dispositive—regardless of whether the claim is analyzed under the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendments. According to the Supreme Court, the qualified-immunity analysis turns on 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . Decisions from cases that are 'too factually distinct to speak clearly to the specific circumstances here' are not enough to deny qualified immunity. . . This 'specificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context, where ... "[i]t is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts."'. . The same logic applies with equal or greater force in the Fourteenth Amendment context. . . Indeed, more factually analogous caselaw from the Sixth Circuit has made clear that '[w]hen a person aims a weapon in a police officer's direction, that officer has an objectively reasonable basis for believing that the person poses a significant risk of serious injury or death.'. . On this basis, the court has recognized that the 'officer may use deadly force whenever he or she, in the face of a rapidly unfolding situation, has probable cause to believe that a suspect poses a serious physical threat either to the police or members of the public.'. .And, as already noted, in Claybrook the Sixth Circuit dismissed the Fourteenth Amendment claims of a bystander shot by officers engaged in a shootout with a suspect. . . Certainly, Plaintiffs have pointed to no caselaw and have pled no facts that would proscribe, rather than authorize, the type of force they allege the Defendants at issue used. . . .The tragic events on the night of March 13, 2020, have been hotly debated in the public square and the courts alike. But the questions presented and answered here concern the rights of the neighboring Plaintiffs, not those of Breonna Taylor or Kenneth Walker, whose lawsuit remains pending in this District. The Plaintiffs here haven't alleged facts showing a deprivation of their own constitutional and state-law rights by officers whose bullets never pierced their walls. The many exceptions Plaintiffs take with the officers' conduct–even accepting those assertions as true—don't connect those earlier actions to the ultimate harm. Nor do these alleged errors add up to a violation of the laws the Plaintiffs rely on—either because their legal theories are mistaken or because they simply assume the facts necessary to recover. So the Court grants the motions to dismiss . . . filed by the Defendants other than Hankison. The Court will address the stay of the claims against Hankison, as well as the Plaintiffs' further requests to amend their complaint . . . in separate orders.")

Prince v. Scioto County Common Pleas Court, No. 1:20-CV-652, 2022 WL 1569868, at *5 (S.D. Ohio May 18, 2022) ("Each Defendant's 'liability must be assessed individually based on his own actions.'. . To prove his claim, Plaintiff must present evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that each Defendant had notice of his medical need and took some action that 'was intentional (not accidental)' and 'either (a) acted intentionally to ignore [the] serious medical need, or (b) recklessly failed to act reasonably to mitigate the risk the serious medical need posed to [Plaintiff], even though a reasonable official… would have known that the serious medical need posed an excessive risk to [Plaintiff's] health or safety.' Brawner, 14 F.4th at 597. On the record presented, the evidence unequivocally demonstrates that the individuals' actions were reasonable, while Plaintiff has utterly failed to present evidence that could overcome their assertions of qualified immunity. Even if a reviewing court were to decide that issue differently, any such right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. This is true even if this Court considers the new deliberate indifference standard applicable in the Sixth Circuit under the Due Process Clause. In short, no genuine issues of material fact remain and Defendants are entitled to judgment as a matter of law even if the lower standard applies.")

Riley v. Hamilton County Government, No. 1:19-CV-304, 2022 WL 1051784, at *10-12 (E.D. Tenn. Apr. 7, 2022) ("[T]he Court finds that Goforth's duty to intervene to stop an unreasonable seizure in violation of Riley's Fourth Amendment right was clearly established at the time of the events in this case. Goforth stresses the exceptionality of the facts of this case. . . But the lack of factually similar cases does not automatically confer qualified immunity. . . And like the courts deciding Bunkley, Holloran, and Kaylor, the Court may rely on cases decided in other constitutional contexts to find that the duty to intervene to stop a Fourth Amendment violation of any kind was clearly established at the time of the events in this case. The Sixth Circuit and district court opinions at the time gave Goforth fair warning that he had a duty to intervene to stop Wilkey from committing an unreasonable seizure. And, if anything, the truly bizarre nature of these facts should have put Goforth further on notice that the seizure was inappropriate. . . Accordingly, Goforth is not entitled to qualified immunity on Riley's Fourth Amendment claim for unreasonable seizure, and the Court will deny his motion for summary judgment as to this claim. . . . The Court finds that, although there is no case directly on point, the law was sufficiently clear in February 2019 that any reasonable officer would have recognized that coerced participation in a Christian baptism—an overtly religious act with no secular purpose—was unlawful. . . . Here, a reasonable observer, aware of the history, context, and purpose of a baptism, would plainly perceive a baptism by a uniformed, on-duty state officer as an endorsement of religion even if the baptism were voluntary. Goforth clearly understood that the baptism was religious in nature. . . Yet he insists that there was no violation of the Establishment Clause because it seemed to him that the baptism was voluntary. . . Other courts have held that similar religious displays by law-enforcement officers in the context of their work are properly deemed state-sponsored actions. . . And the record establishes that Goforth knew Riley was being baptized, that she had been cited for a criminal violation, and that Wilkey was an on-duty sheriff's deputy. Accordingly, Goforth had reason to know that Wilkey was violating Riley's constitutional rights, and, thus, his duty to intervene was triggered. Goforth also points to the lack of cases establishing 'that a law enforcement officer would have a duty to intervene under [ ] similar circumstances.'. . Although there is no case directly on point, this case is one in which the unconstitutional nature of Wilkey's conduct was 'so patently evident that no particular case—and certainly not one directly on point—need have existed to put a reasonable officer on notice of its unconstitutionality.'. .Though there appear to be no cases directly addressing the circumstances Goforth faced, the Court concludes that, based on the state of the law at the time, Goforth had fair warning that he had a duty to intervene to stop constitutional violations of this nature. And a reasonable jury could conclude that Goforth had both notice of the violation and an opportunity to stop the baptism. Accordingly, Goforth is not entitled to summary judgment on Riley's First Amendment claim.")

Jackson v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:21-CV-1679, 2022 WL 515759, at *7 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 22, 2022) ("Defendants argue that, when Ms. Marburger responded to Mr. Jackson's public records request, no decision from the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit had held that failure to disclose exculpatory evidence in response to a post-conviction public records request violated the right of access to the courts as a prelude to post-conviction litigation. But clearly established law does not require 'a case directly on point.'. . Instead, existing precedent must place the question beyond debate, as the law of this Circuit did before the events at issue here. To the extent Defendants argue that Arrington-Bey places a burden on Plaintiff to identify a specific case with a similar fact pattern, that ruling and the discussion in Pauly on which it relies both involve police officers responding in a matter of moments to life-threatening situations. Here, in contrast, Ms. Marburger took nearly two months to respond to Mr. Jackson's public records request. . . She is a trained and experienced lawyer responding in an office setting over a considerably longer period of time. Unlike a police officer responding to a dynamic scene in real time, Ms. Marburger had time to consider whether withholding exculpatory information might violate Mr. Jackson's rights or prejudice his efforts at exoneration. At bottom, the inquiry turns on whether a reasonable person would know her conduct was unlawful. . . At this stage of the proceedings, Plaintiff has stated a claim that Ms. Marburger knowingly violated his rights.")

Cleveland for the Estate of Wicker v. Louisville Metro Government, No. 3:16-CV-588-CRS, 2019 WL 1058154, at *8 (W.D. Ky. Mar. 6, 2019) ("Kisela certainly has some level of factual similarity: both cases involved a knife-wielding roommate who did not heed the commands of police to drop the weapon. However, there are also important factual dissimilarities. For example, the suspect in Kisela advanced within six feet of the bystander—10 feet closer than Wicker was to Gadegaard—and had approximately 58 seconds longer than Wicker to respond to the officers' commands. In such a scenario, Kisela does not provide much guidance. Therefore, the issue is whether Chappell, Scozzari, and Lopez would have clearly demonstrated to the officers that their conduct was impermissible. . . Chappell was clear that it would be 'objectively unreasonable' for police to fire on a knife-wielding suspect when they first saw him and he had not moved in an aggressive way. . . When a blade-wielding suspect is not 'quickly advancing toward the officers while holding the knife up and refusing to drop it' deadly force is simply not authorized. . . Lopez and Scozzari then further demonstrate the application of the rule laid down in Chappell. Lopez noted that shooting would be impermissible when a suspect is standing still and holding a bladed weapon at his side, even when a bystander was within seven feet. . . This was because there was no immediate threat of danger. . . Put another way, the officers lacked probable cause to believe that Lopez would imminently injure the officers or a bystander. However, Scozzari is truly on point and demonstrates most clearly that the officers in this case violated a clearly established right. . . .The cases indicate that, on August 8, 2016, it was clearly established that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by using deadly force on a subject more than 15 feet away who was moving slowly and, though holding a pruning saw, was not using or brandishing it aggressively. Here, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, the officers were between 15.9 and 17.6 feet away from Wicker when they fired, he did not raise the pruning saw at the officers or swing at them in an aggressive manner, and only took two steps towards the officers while moving one-third of a normal human's walking speed. A reasonable officer would have known that they were not entitled to shoot in that scenario. Therefore, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity and the motions for summary judgment will be denied on that issue.")

Collett v. Hamilton County, Ohio, No. 1:17-CV-295, 2019 WL 121360, at *7-8, *10, *13, *15 (S.D. Ohio Jan. 7, 2019) ("There is no dispute that failing to seatbelt an arrestee, standing alone, does not give rise to a Fourth Amendment violation. . . However, as of June 5, 2015, no reasonable corrections official could believe that it was legal to intentionally drive a motor vehicle in a reckless manner so as to cause injury to an arrestee who was handcuffed but not seat-belted. The Sixth Circuit in Scott cited a number of cases predating June 2015 that lead to this conclusion . . . . Although Scott was decided under the Eighth Amendment, the law set forth in the decision applies to plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim. The court acknowledged in Scott, as plaintiff does here, that an individual has no per se constitutional right to be seat-belted while being transported by a government official. But when an officer engages in additional acts that rise to the level of the 'malicious and sadistic infliction of pain and suffering' or that violate the 'objectively reasonable' standard of the Fourth Amendment, a constitutional violation occurs. A reasonable official would have been on notice of the applicable law set forth in Scott prior to June 2015. . . .Consistent with Scott, this evidence is sufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendant McKown used excessive force by intentionally driving recklessly while transporting plaintiff and causing injury to him. Defendant McKown is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. 'In light of the obviousness of the constitutional violation, [defendant] could not reasonably have believed that driving recklessly while [plaintiff was] not wearing [a] seatbelt[ ] was lawful.' Scott, 736 F. App'x at 133-34. Defendants' motion for summary judgment is denied on the Fourth Amendment claim for reckless driving. . . .Even if plaintiff's evidence were sufficient to create a genuine factual dispute as to whether too-tight handcuffs prevented him from grasping the strap in the van or breaking his fall from the bench, plaintiff has failed to carry his burden to show that defendants would not be entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. An arrestee's right to be free from unduly tight or excessively forceful handcuffing has long been established. However, plaintiff has not cited case law to show that a claim for excessively forceful handcuffing has been recognized where the arrestee does not allege injury resulting from the handcuffs themselves or the direct application of physical force to the arrestee after he has been handcuffed and subdued. The constitutional prohibition against unduly tight or excessively forceful handcuffing in the course of an arrest was clearly established for qualified immunity purposes as early as 1991. . . The Sixth Circuit has recognized since 1991 that freedom from 'excessively forceful handcuffing' is included in the Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . .Although 'a case directly on point' is not required for a right to be clearly-established, the state of the law at the time of the action giving rise to the claim must have been such as to give the defendants fair warning that their actions violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Plaintiff has not provided any authority which indicates that as of June 5, 2015, a reasonable officer would have been on notice that there was anything about the manner in which defendants handcuffed or transported plaintiff that violated the Fourth Amendment prohibition against excessively forceful handcuffing. Jackson and the cases it cites establish that there was support in the case law for an excessively forceful handcuffing claim under the Fourth Amendment as of June 5, 2015; however, 'no case permit[ted] an excessive force claim for overly tight handcuffing in the absence of a physical injury caused by the handcuffing,' such as bruising or nerve impingement. . . Plaintiff points to no evidence in the record that demonstrates a causal connection between his too-tight handcuffs and the physical injuries he sustained. Further, unlike the cases that preceded Jackson where courts found that the use of violent physical force against a handcuffed and subdued individual could constitute a Fourth Amendment violation, plaintiff does not allege that defendants used 'violent physical force' by pulling or yanking on any part of his handcuffs or that they applied direct physical force to any part of his body. . . Thus, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity and to summary judgment as a matter of law on plaintiff's claim that defendants subjected him to excessively forceful handcuffing in violation of his Fourth Amendment rights.")

Davis-Bey v. City of Warren, No. 16-CV-11707, 2018 WL 895394, at *6 (E.D. Mich. Jan. 16, 2018), report and recommendation adopted, No. 16-CV-11707, 2018 WL 878879 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 14, 2018) ("The parties cite conflicting cases from within this circuit regarding whether the First Amendment clearly establishes a right to film police officers carrying out their duties. . . The existence of conflicting caselaw suggests that an absolute right to record is not clearly established. Furthermore, the court in the Crawford case cited by Plaintiff subsequently reversed its position and held that 'The Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit have not ruled specifically on the right of the public openly to film police officers and their actions in a public setting.' Crawford v. Geiger (Crawford II), 131 F. Supp. 3d 703, 714 (N.D. Ohio 2015). Finally, the Glik case, cited by Plaintiff, holds that any recording of police officers must be done from 'a comfortable remove' and without interfering with the performance of the officers' duties. . .As several officers testified, Plaintiff was arrested for remaining 'too close' to the scene and interfering with the investigation, despite several officers directing Plaintiff to 'leave,' 'back up,' and/or 'walk away.' Officers testified that this was a safety concern. Accordingly, the Court should find that there is no clearly established right to videotape police officers under the circumstances of this case.")

S.R. v. Kenton County Sheriff's Office, No. 215CV143WOBJGW, 2017 WL 4545231, at *9–11 (E.D. Ky. Oct. 11, 2017) ("[U]nder the totality of the circumstances, the Court concludes as a matter of law that Sumner's manner of handcuffing S.R. and L.G. was an unconstitutional seizure and excessive force. . . . On the facts of this case, qualified immunity is a close call. Neither party points to a Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit decision directly on point that would have alerted a reasonable officer in 2014 to the unlawfulness of his actions under these circumstances. In New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), which involved searches of children in a school setting, the Court recognized that public school students' rights under the Fourth Amendment are not as broad as those of the public and adopted a 'reasonableness' test based on all the circumstances. . . .At a general level, one might argue that T.L.O. put police officers on notice that they would be subject to a reasonableness standard in determining whether their search or seizure of a school child passes constitutional muster. However, the Sixth Circuit has rejected such an application of T.L.O. in the qualified immunity context, reasoning that T.L.O. merely established basic principles of law without guidance as to their application in specific situations. Beard v. Whitmore Lake Sch. Dist., 402 F.3d 598, 607 (6th Cir. 2005). In Beard, high school students who were strip searched sued school officials and a police officer alleging Fourth Amendment violations. The Sixth Circuit held that the searches did violate the students' constitutional rights, but that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because, notwithstanding the general principles set forth in T.L.O., the lack of factual context similar to the case before the Court meant that T.L.O. could not have 'truly compelled' defendants to realize that they were acting illegally in conducting the strip searches. . . Similarly here, the broad principles set forth in T.L.O. would not have alerted Sumner to the unlawfulness of his actions under the specific facts of this case. . . . .The parties cite no Sixth Circuit authority that would have alerted Sumner to the illegality of his actions. However, at least two other Circuits had denied qualified immunity to police officers who handcuffed young school children. See C.B. v. City of Sonora, 769 F.3d 1005, 1039-40 (9th Cir. 2014) (officer who handcuffed calm, compliant but nonresponsive 11-year-old child not entitled to qualified immunity); Gray v. Bostic, 458 F.3d 1295, 1306 (11th Cir. 2006) (handcuffing of nine-year-old student who had threatened to hit coach was unlawful seizure; incident was over, student posed no threat, and handcuffing by sheriff's deputy was attempt to punish student and change her behavior in the future). Under the Sixth Circuit's teaching in Beard, however, these out-of-circuit cases are insufficient to satisfy the 'clearly established' requirement. . . . Here, the two out-of-circuit cases cited above both rely on T.L.O., which Beard held is insufficiently generalized to constitute 'applicable direct authority.' Therefore, plaintiffs have not shown that it was 'clearly established' in 2014 that Sumner's handcuffing of S.R. and L.G. was unconstitutional, and Sumner is thus entitled to qualified immunity." [Note that the court did find the County liable as a matter of law for the unlawful handcuffing. See Blum, "Overview Outline"])

O'Brien v. City of Mason, No. 1:16-CV-391, 2017 WL 2805165, at *4 (W.D. Mich. June 29, 2017) ("Marcia's First Amendment claim fails because she has not cited a case clearly establishing a First Amendment right to observe the police. A number of circuits have addressed the existence of a First Amendment right to observe and record the police activity, and some have found that right to be clearly-established. See, e.g., Gericke v. Begin, 753 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir. 2014); ACLU of Ill. v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583, 600 (7th Cir. 2012); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332, 1333 (11th Cir. 2000). But the Sixth Circuit has yet to join those courts, and the only district courts in the Sixth Circuit to address that issue have found otherwise. See Williams v. City of Paris, No. 5: 15-108-DCR, 2016 WL 2354230, at *4 (E.D. Ky. May 4, 2016); Crawford v. Geiger, 131 F. Supp. 3d 703, 715 (N.D. Ohio 2015), aff'd in part, rev'd in part and remanded, 656 F. App'x 190 (6th Cir. 2016)[.]")

Cummerlander v. Patriot Preparatory Acad. Inc., No. 2:13-CV-0329, 2015 WL 519308, at *14-15 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 9, 2015) ("At the time of the search at issue, the prior law of the Supreme Court and this Circuit involving searches of students for suspected drug use and possession all clearly establish that Smith's determination that JT should be subjected to a drug test was unconstitutional. A reasonable principal should have known that students have a Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches and seizures, and that the standard for a reasonable search of students is reasonable suspicion. . . The Supreme Court standard for free and voluntary consent to a search under the Fourth Amendment is also well-established. Further, the Supreme Court cases T.L.O. and Safford, as well as the Sixth Circuit case Williams, and the District Court case Fewless, puts Smith on notice as to the indicia of drug use and possession that should be considered in an investigation for and determination of reasonable suspicion of drug use. While it is unfortunate that Smith may have acted in conformity with a school policy to which he was bound, as will be discussed in the following section, such a school policy is unconstitutional and provides no protection to Smith in the individualized qualified immunity analysis. Thus, this Court concludes that it was objectively legally unreasonable for Smith to believe that JT and his mother gave voluntary and free consent to a urinalysis, and unreasonable for him to believe that his investigation into JT's alleged drug use met the well-established standard of reasonable suspicion under the circumstances. As the Sixth Circuit has explained, '[l]ike police officers, school officials need discretionary authority to function with great efficiency and speed in certain situations, so long as these decisions are consistent with certain constitutional safeguards.'. . While questioning 'an official's every decision with the benefit of hindsight would undermine the authority necessary to ensure the safety and order of our schools,' coercing a student under threat of expulsion to take a drug test without establishing reasonable suspicion under the circumstances is akin to a student shedding his or her constitutional rights at the school gate. . . Accordingly, the Court does not find that qualified immunity precludes personal liability for Smith.")

Hoskins v. Cumberland Cnty. Bd. of Educ., No. 2:13-CV-15, 2014 WL 7238621, at *12-13 (M.D. Tenn. Dec. 17, 2014) ("Although neither the Court nor the parties has identified a Sixth Circuit case directly on point, at least two courts of appeal have held that law enforcement officers were not entitled to qualified immunity for handcuffing children. [discussing C.B. v. City of Sonora (9th Cir.) and Gray ex rel Alexander v. Bostic (11th Cir.)] The record in this case does not demonstrate whether the principal and the officer actually continued to be afraid for their safety at the time the handcuffs were placed on [8 year-old] T.H., how much time elapsed between T.H.'s threats and rearing back of his fist and the officer's putting him in handcuffs, what T.H.'s demeanor was at the time the handcuffs were put on, or what his demeanor was for any of the forty-five minutes that he sat with handcuffs on in the principal's office. . .Based on the record before the Court, Plaintiffs have not demonstrated that Officer Tollett is not entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, Officer Tollett's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's claim of unlawful seizure will be granted on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Combs v. City of Birmingham, No. 12–14528, 2013 WL 4670699, *1, *8, *9, *11, *12 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 30, 2013) ("Michigan is not among the 25 states with a law requiring its citizens to provide identifying information to police officers during a lawful Terry stop. . . .This case is not about the legality of Mr. Combs carrying his rifle openly, or any right he may have to do so. In this 42 U.S.C. § 1983 case, Mr. Combs claims that his unquestionable Fourth Amendment right to be free from seizure without probable cause was violated through false arrest and false imprisonment. But, even in the absence of a mandatory state identification law in Michigan, the Court finds that under the totality of the circumstances, including Mr. Combs' youthful appearance, the police officers' request for proof that Mr. Combs was 18 constituted a lawful command; and, Mr. Combs' refusal to provide such proof gave the police officers probable cause to arrest him for resisting their lawful command under Birmingham, Mich., Code of Ordinances part II, ch. 74, art. II, § 74–27 and Mich. Comp. Laws § 750.479. The principles of Terry v. Ohio require a suspect to supply proof of his age when the suspected criminal activity is a minor carrying a loaded weapon in public. And, the failure to supply such proof can lead to charges, including resisting a lawful command, breach of the peace, and brandishing. However, even if the Court had found an absence of probable cause to arrest Mr. Combs, these police officers would be entitled to the protection of qualified immunity because Mr. Combs' right is not clearly established in the contours of this particular situation: the police officers could have mistakenly concluded that it was reasonable to require Mr. Combs to prove his age so that they could assure themselves that a minor was not openly carrying a loaded assault rifle on a public street. . . . Accordingly, even in the absence of a stop and identify law in Michigan, the police officers' request that Mr. Combs provide identification that would prove his age was a lawful command, based on this Court's finding that: (1) Hiibel stands for the proposition that identifying information can be required of suspects during a Terry stop; and (2) a police officer can require proof to dispel reasonable suspicions of underage violations of the law during a Terry stop. The police officers' requests were reasonably related to the circumstances justifying Mr. Combs' legal Terry stop; they investigated a suspected violation of the underage weapon statute, based on a reasonable suspicion that Mr. Combs was not 18. . . . Although Hiibel has been the law of the land since 2004, one could argue it only applies in states with stop and identify laws. This case involves a request for identification to verify age in a state without a stop and identify law, but with a law requiring compliance with police officers' commands. The Supreme Court has only addressed the legality of an arrest for failure to provide a name during a Terry stop. Consequently, probable cause may not be sufficiently clear in the contours of this particular situation, such that police officers would understand that their request for Mr. Combs to prove his age may violate the law. In other words, while police officers always need probable cause to arrest, it may be arguable that Mr. Combs' failure to supply proof of his age amounted to probable cause to arrest him. Because reasonable police officers could disagree, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Mr. Combs' false arrest and false imprisonment claims, even if the Court found an absence of probable cause to arrest him.")

Ayers v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:12–CV–753, 2013 WL 775359, *7, *8, *10-*12 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 25, 2013), appeal not considered by Ayers v. City of Cleveland, 773 F.3d 161 (6th Cir. 2014) ("[T]his Court has previously held that Brady's application against police officers who fail to disclose material and potentially exculpatory evidence is clearly established law. . . Defendants do not contend otherwise. Therefore, Defendants Cipo and Kovach do not enjoy qualified immunity as to Plaintiff Ayers's due process Brady claim, and the claim survives summary judgment. . . . A § 1983 claim for malicious prosecution is cognizable, although 'the contours of such a claim remain uncertain.'. . To succeed on such a claim, Ayers must prove the following: first, that a criminal prosecution was initiated against him and that the defendants made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute; second, that there was a lack of probable cause for the criminal prosecution; third, that as a consequence of the proceeding, Ayers suffered a deprivation of liberty; and fourth, that the criminal proceeding was resolved in Ayers's favor. . . Neither a lack of malice, nor the intervention of a prosecutor, works to absolve an individual officer of liability. . . . The Court therefore finds that, viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to Ayers, there is sufficient evidence that Defendants Cipo, Kovach, and Donaldson violated Ayers's constitutional right to be free of malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment. Further, the Court finds that through deposition testimony and affidavits, Ayers has created a genuine issue of material fact. Finally, the Court finds that the acts in question—stating falsehoods in warrant affidavits and mischaracterizing key evidence—is well-understood by reasonable officers to be violative of a suspect's rights. . . .Certainly, the right to Brady material, to a constitutionally sufficient indictment, or to counsel during important criminal proceedings is clearly established. But with the failure to intervene claim, the Court must ask whether there was a clearly established constitutional right that a law enforcement officer was required to intervene to prevent another law enforcement officer from violating these rights. For there to be a failure to intervene, there must be a corresponding duty. There is ample Sixth Circuit caselaw regarding police officers' duty to intervene in excessive force cases. . . But the Court finds no such caselaw (nor does Ayers provide any) regarding a duty to intervene in the situations described in Ayers's complaint. . . '[G]iven the absence of any case law that has imposed a duty of protection under even roughly analogous circumstances,'. . . it could not be 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Therefore, the Court concludes that the failure to intervene claim is independent of the other claims and that there is insufficient authority to show that Detectives Cipo and Kovach violated clearly established law.")

Colebrook v. Kentucky Dept. of Motor Vehicle Enforcement, No. 08-110-JGW, 2010 WL 4979072, at *5 (E.D. Ky. Dec. 2, 2010) ("Officer Scott is entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time of the incident in question, Gant had not yet been decided. Rather, at the time of the incident Belton controlled and a reasonable officer would have believed that the search of the vehicle was permissible. As the Court in Gant itself anticipated, '[b]ecause a broad reading of Belton has been widely accepted, the doctrine of qualified immunity will shield officers from liability for search conducted in reasonable reliance on that understanding.'")

Ambris v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:12CV774, 2012 WL 5874367, *8-*10 (N.D. Ohio Nov. 19, 2012) ("Here, if we decided to follow Scarbrough and determine that the plaintiff has plead a prima facie constitutional violation, our inquiry would turn to whether the existence of Scarbrough is enough to determine that Plaintiff's right to be free from discrimination based on her sexual orientation was 'clearly established.' While the Sixth Circuit's most recent decision is Scarbrough and there have been cases, both in other circuits and the United States Supreme Court, that have showed a trend to giving homosexuals such protection, the heavily conflicting case law in the Sixth Circuit would tend to show that there is no 'clearly established right.' The Courts have been all over the place with regard to treating such claims for disparate treatment based on sexual orientation, so it would be difficult to say that Defendant Bahhur knew, or should have known, that he was violating a clearly established right. Plaintiff points to the United States Supreme Court's decision in Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996) for the proposition that Defendants should have been on notice that their actions violated Plaintiff's 'clearly established rights.'. . . Romer is distinguishable from the facts in the present case. Romer was decided outside of an employment context. There is no mention of Title VII throughout the entire opinion, which this Court is required to implement in an employment discrimination analysis. . .Were the facts to show that this discrimination happened outside of an employment context, the holding and analysis of Romer would serve to put Defendants on notice that their actions were violating a 'clearly established right,' as is required to negate qualified immunity. However, there is no binding case law that would 'clearly establish' Plaintiff's rights under this fact pattern, and as such, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Cline v. City of Mansfield, No. 1:07-CV-1070, 2010 WL 3860735, at *27 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 30, 2010) ("In this case, that prior Sixth Circuit caselaw does not name which specific law enforcement official must review the affidavit underlying a search warrant does not immunize the very person responsible for planning and executing a search. It was clearly established that some member of Mack's team needed to perform that review and it is reasonable to conclude that Mack was charged with either doing it himself or assuring it was done. . . There need not be a Sixth Circuit or Supreme Court case specifically stating that a supervisor has the responsibility to supervise to make it so. . . To the contrary, it was clearly established as of September 12, 2006 that some officer needed to at least look at the affidavit attached to this search warrant . . . and it was objectively unreasonable in view of that clearly established law for Team Leader Mack to fail to ensure that someone did so. . . Again, the Court's determination rests squarely on the fact that even a simple glance would have revealed the defect in this document.")

Wilson v. Columbus Bd. of Educ., 589 F.Supp.2d 952, 964, 965 (S.D. Ohio 2008) ("There is no Sixth Circuit case law involving materially similar facts to this case. However, although Sisco confronted a novel factual circumstance, well-settled precedent of the Sixth Circuit recognizes that in a non-custodial setting, a governmental actor can be held responsible for an injury committed by a private person if that governmental actor increases the risk of harm to the plaintiff and acts with deliberate indifference. . . Therefore, it would have been clear to a reasonable person in Sisco's position that her issuance of the suspension, which placed Jane Doe in a dangerous environment, could subject Sisco to constitutional liability.").

Hendrickson v. Caruso, No. 1:07-cv-304, 2008 WL 623788, at *10 (W.D. Mich. Mar. 4, 2008) ("The Sixth Circuit has never held that a prisoner has a statutory cause of action for monetary damages under RLUIPA. RLUIPA creates a private cause of action for a prison inmate if section 3 is violated, and further provides that the complaining party, if successful, may 'obtain appropriate relief against a government.' 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-2(a). The Eleventh Circuit recently observed, 'To put it mildly, there is a division of authority on th[e] question [of whether RLUIPA authorizes an award of monetary damages].' Smith v. Allen, 502 F.3d at 1270 (collecting cases). Assuming arguendo that RLUIPA authorizes a cause of action for damages, qualified immunity is undoubtedly an appropriate defense. . . Plaintiff has not addressed much less demonstrated how defendants' actions violated any 'clearly established' rights under RLUIPA. Plaintiff has not identified any authority that clearly established his right to official MDOC recognition of Satanism as a religion, and every court that has considered Anton LaVey's books on Satanism has determined that they are fundamentally incompatible with prison safety, security, and prisoner rehabilitation. Accordingly, I find that defendants are entitled to summary judgment on plaintiff's claims for monetary damages on the alternative basis of qualified immunity.")

Yamaha Motor Manufacturing Corp. of America v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 403 F.Supp.2d 601, 607 (W.D. Ky. 2005) ("The court must first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of a constitutional or statutory right at all and then, and only then, determine whether the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . .Here, the plaintiffs have alleged violations of statutory rights under the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act, so the court will turn to the second prong. . . . Here, the plaintiffs argue that the 'clearly established right' is 'meaningful access' to the Commonwealth's golf courses. As of the date in question, the requirement that certain types of golf cars must be provided to constitute 'meaningful access' to state golf courses was not clearly established. . . Consequently, the plaintiffs cannot maintain their claims for monetary damages against the Commonwealth Defendants in their individual capacities. There is thus no need for the court to consider the third element of the qualified immunity test.").

Hainey v. Parrott, No. 1:02-CV-733, 2005 WL 2397704, at *8 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 28, 2005) ("There is no dispute in this case that the coroner's office retained and then disposed of Plaintiffs' decedents' brains without any notice to Plaintiffs. As explained above in Part III.A, Plaintiffs have established uncontested facts which demonstrate that Defendants violated their constitutional right to receive notice prior to the disposal of their decedent's body parts. The Court also finds that this right was clearly established at the time the coroner's office committed the acts in question here. As the Court stated above, supra, at 10-15, in 1991, Brotherton very broadly and very clearly held that family members have a property interest in their decedent's body parts which is protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Finally, a reasonable coroner in this judicial circuit would have known that disposing of body parts without notice to the decedent's next of kin would have violated that right. That seems especially true where, as Plaintiffs observe, this same coroner's office was involved in the case that established the right at stake here.").

May v. City of Springfield, No. 3:03 CV 293, 2005 WL 2338785, at *6 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 23, 2005) ("Immediately before Emmel took Plaintiff to the pavement, she had resumed her vandalism of Hatter's truck by kicking it. Thus, Emmel had a reason for his actions, to wit: preventing Plaintiff from continuing to damage Hatter's truck. Moreover, Plaintiff's ability to resume her destructive acts towards Hatter's truck, even though she was handcuffed at the time, demonstrates beyond cavil that she had not been completely restrained. Plaintiff has not cited a case which would demonstrate that it was clearly established in December, 2001, that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by using force to bring a suspect to the ground, in order to prevent her from resuming her vandalism of the private property of another. Nevertheless, Plaintiff argues that the evidence raises a genuine issue of material fact concerning the question whether the Fourth Amendment right she relies upon herein was clearly established, because, after a post-incident investigation, Springfield found that Emmel had violated the use of force policy for its Police Department. It bears emphasis, however, that the right must be clearly established at the time the alleged constitutional violation occurred. . . Simply stated, after the fact conclusions by Springfield concerning Emmel's compliance with its use of force policy do not demonstrate that a constitutional right had been clearly established before the incident giving rise to the investigation. Accordingly, the Court concludes that the evidence fails to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the particulars of Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure through the use of excessive force had been clearly established before December 15, 2001.").

Cahill v. Walker, No. 3:03-CV-00257, 2005 WL 1566494, at *4 (E.D. Tenn. July 5, 2005) ("Certainly, a reasonable police officer would understand that sexually harassing and assaulting an individual violates a constitutionally-protected right; however, this court does not now address Officer Walker's conduct. Here, the conduct at issue is Chief Montgomery's inaction, failing to discipline Officer Walker for his alleged prior sexual misconduct. The appropriate question is whether a reasonable supervisor would have understood that, by failing to discipline Officer Walker, he was allowing the misconduct to continue and thus proximately causing Plaintiff's constitutional right to be violated. . . In Lynn v. City of Detroit, the court found that this question 'turns on whether the defendant[ ] knowingly acquiesced in [the] subordinates' unconstitutional conduct, to the plaintiffs' injury.' . . In this case, the question of whether Chief Montgomery 'knowingly acquiesced' in Officer Walker's alleged misconduct is dependent on the question of whether he knew of that misconduct. When genuine issues of material fact remain as to an element of qualified immunity, summary judgment on qualified immunity is not appropriate. . . Here, the factual issue of whether Chief Montgomery knew of Officer Walker's prior misconduct is intertwined with the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. Chief Montgomery is therefore not entitled to summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity.")

Shahit v. Tosqui, No. 04-71538, 2005 WL 1345413, at *9 (E.D. Mich. June 1, 2005) (not reported) ("The Court finds it impossible to conclude that Defendants, police officers who are required to make split-second decisions on the street, violated a 'clearly established' right to be stopped only upon probable cause that a civil traffic violation occurred when only a few months later, in Weaver, a trio of federal appellate judges clearly believed that probable cause was not required. Accordingly, given that the Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit had not directly addressed the issue of whether probable cause is always required to stop a vehicle for a civil traffic offense, and Sixth Circuit in Weaver upheld a traffic stop based upon reasonable suspicion shortly after the events of this case occurred, the Court finds that the right to be stopped only upon probable cause that a civil traffic offense occurred was not clearly established when Defendants stopped Plaintiffs' vehicle.").

Rose v. Saginaw County, 353 F.Supp.2d 900, 924 (E.D. Mich. 2005) ("In this case, the right to be free from unreasonable seizures is clearly established. But the qualified immunity defense requires the Court to look beyond the right in the abstract. . . .The Court finds that the contours of the right to reasonable seizures pertaining to pretrial detainees was not sufficiently clear to impose liability on individual actors following the County's policy in effect during the period at issue in this case. Issues relating to strip and body cavity searches, viewing of naked inmates by guards of the other gender, and removal of clothing from unruly detainees have troubled courts over the past several years and have not yielded a uniform set of decisions on the subject. . . . At the time of the detentions in this case, there was no clear precedent that would have provided guidance to the individual defendants, who were attempting to walk the line between protecting detainees from harming themselves and violating their rights to personal privacy. That they transgressed that 'hazy border' here will not forfeit their qualified immunity from suit.").

Magrum v. Meinke, 332 F.Supp.2d 1071, 1082 (N.D. Ohio 2004) ("Defendant directs the Court to Ferguson v. Leiter, 220 F.Supp .2d 875 (N.D.Ohio 2002), Hale v. Vance, 267 F.Supp.2d 725 (S.D.Ohio 2003), and Joy. . . for the proposition that a reasonable officer in Meinke's position would have concluded that the amount of force employed was lawful. In Hale, the court determined that the use of a choke hold, or escort position, in the context of a Terry stop might give rise to an excessive force claim. The officer, however, was still entitled to qualified immunity because the court could not 'say that it was clearly established as of February 20, 2001, that a police officer may not detain an individual exiting a house reportedly providing sanctuary for at least one suspect in an investigation of gunshots by placing her arm behind her back and holding her in a choke hold.' . . Likewise, in Ferguson, though the use of a neck hold under the circumstances presented therein might have constituted excessive force, the officer was still entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In reaching its conclusion, this Court observed that the '[p]laintiffs have not presented relevant, controlling authority from this jurisdiction, or a consensus from other jurisdictions, regarding the constitutionality of neckholds.' . . Subsequently, however, the Fultz court, relying on Hope, declined to follow Ferguson, even though 'there was no direct precedent from the Sixth Circuit or Supreme Court directly dealing with the constitutionality of neck restraints.'. . Instead the Fultz court focused on general excessiveness of the conduct in light of the circumstances presented, and noted that '[a]t the time of the incident in question, the law was clearly established that a police officer should use no more force than necessary to effect an arrest.'. . Upon further consideration, and in light of Hope, the Court agrees with Fultz's analytical framework. If, as Defendant contends, he employed a takedown maneuver together with a head or neck repositioning technique, then Meinke did not act contrary to any clearly established standards. However, under Plaintiff's version of events, in which Meinke flipped Magrum to the ground and choked him two times, the second time while Magrum was not resisting, Defendant acted in violation of clearly established law.")

Watkins v. The Millennium School, 290 F.Supp.2d 890, 902, 903 (S.D. Ohio 2003) ("Applying the Williams test, the Court has already determined that a constitutional violation may have occurred. The next issue then is whether the right was 'clearly established' such that a reasonable official would have known about it. In this case, a reasonable teacher should have known that students have Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures. The Supreme Court decided T.L.O. in 1985, clarifying that the Fourth Amendment applies to searches conducted by school officials. . . . The third prong–whether the official's actions were objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established rights–is the most contentious because there are no comparable cases such that it could be said that Defendant Apley should have understood that what she was doing violated Plaintiff Watkins' privacy rights. Even Thomas, to the extent that it is analogous, was decided after the events in question took place. However, the Williams test is in accord with Anderson v. Creighton, where the Supreme Court considered not whether the defendant should have known, but whether the official's actions were 'objectively unreasonable' in light of the clearly established right. This Court finds that Plaintiffs have presented a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Defendant Apley is entitled to qualified immunity. As explained by the Court in Anderson v. Creighton, the official is not protected by qualified immunity just because this very action previously has not been held unlawful. . . A reasonable jury could find Defendant Apley acted objectively unreasonable in requesting Plaintiff Watkins to accompany her alone, and into a supply closet, to conduct a second search, despite having no apparent basis to search further. A reasonable jury also could conclude that Defendant Millennium's School Policy 425 put Apley on notice that her actions in contravention of that policy would be objectively unreasonable.").

Fultz v. Whittaker, 261 F. Supp.2d 767, 776 & n.6 (W.D. Ky. 2003) ("[T]he fact that there was no direct precedent from the Sixth Circuit or Supreme Court directly dealing with the constitutionality of neck restraints does not necessarily mean that the right to be free from certain types of restraints under these circumstances was not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. . . . The Court is aware that this is contrary to the holding of Ferguson v. Leiter, 220 F.Supp.2d 875, 881 (N.D.Ohio 2002), upon which Defendants heavily rely. In Ferguson, the Court concluded that the right to be free from an unconstitutional excessive neck restraint was not clearly established. Id. The Ferguson court, however, did not reference the Hope opinion. The Court believes that Ferguson defines the issue too narrowly, and that based on Hope a court must look generally at the excessiveness of the conduct in light of the circumstances instead of focusing on whether the precise conduct at issue has previously been held unconstitutional. . . . The appropriate inquiry in this case is whether a reasonable officer could have objectively believed that using a neck restraint in which pressure or force is applied is an acceptable method by which to maintain control over a handcuffed individual not actively resisting arrest or physically threatening the Officers or others under these particular circumstances.").

Smartt v. Grundy County, Tennessee, No. 4:01-CV-32, 2002 WL 32058965, at *4 (E.D. Tenn. Mar. 26, 2002) ("Shooting a fleeing car thief when the officer was not in physical danger, if proven, would violate clearly established law of which a reasonable person should have known.").

Fewless v. Bd. of Education of Wayland Union Schools, 208 F. Supp.2d 806, 822, 823 & n.17 (W.D. Mich. 2002) ("The Court could not find any cases involving school officials attempting to obtain legally valid consent from youths with disabilities like ADHD. [Relying on Hope v. Pelzer,] [t]his Court finds that Schneckloth gave 'fair warning' that Joseph's personal characteristics, as they affected the totality of the circumstances, rendered him unable to voluntarily consent to be searched. . . . As to the reasonableness of the strip search, a Sixth Circuit case on point, Williams v. Ellington, held the school officials protected by qualified immunity only after an investigation much more extensive and reliable than the one that was conducted here. . . . Thus, the decision to strip search Joseph Fewless was not objectively legally reasonable. Moreover, the decision was highly questionable in light of common sense and general experience. Qualified immunity does not bar the personal liability of Defendants Cutler and Medendorp.").

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Stockton v. Milwaukee County, 44 F.4th 605, 620-21 (7th Cir. 2022) ("As discussed above, a reasonable jury could conclude Piasecki-by deliberately causing Madden to fall and hit his head-violated Madden's Eighth Amendment right to be free of excessive force. We also examine whether the violated right was 'clearly established' at the time the challenged conduct occurred. . . . A right is clearly established where it is 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . . Stockton may demonstrate a right is "clearly established" in three ways. First, by identifying a 'closely analogous case finding the alleged violation unlawful.'. . Second, by identifying in the relevant caselaw 'such a clear trend ... that we can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by a controlling precedent was merely a question of time.'. . These first two avenues are not at issue here. Stockton does not identify, and we cannot find, a closely analogous case or such a clear trend. Stockton relies instead upon the third option, reserved for 'rare cases,' arguing Piasecki's conduct was 'so egregious and unreasonable that no reasonable official could have thought he was acting lawfully.'. .This is one of those rare cases. Piasecki encountered Madden in clear and debilitating medical distress. Madden was hyperventilating, experiencing difficulty breathing, and complained of severe chest pain. He could not walk, stand, or support himself; was crawling on the floor of his cell dry heaving; could not move about his cell without being physically dragged by the officers; and vomited an orange substance. Madden proved unable to sit in a chair or remain upright when propped against a wall. Piasecki witnessed Madden fall several times, at least once striking his head on the wall of his cell. Piasecki volunteered to act as Madden's physical support, bracing the man on his legs. Then, two witnesses watched Piasecki 'purposefully [take] a step backward' and, according to Litrenta, 'allow[ ] Madden to fall back and smack the back of his head on the cement' floor 'very hard.' Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Stockton, Piasecki deliberately caused Madden to fall and hit his head. It strains credulity to imagine Piasecki, or any reasonable officer in his position confronted with these particular circumstances, could possibly think he acted lawfully by intentionally causing Madden to hit his head. A reasonable jury could find Piasecki was on notice his conduct amounted to a 'gratuitous infliction of wanton and unnecessary pain' prohibited by the Eighth Amendment. . . The district court erred in awarding Piasecki summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Holloway v. City of Milwaukee, 43 F.4th 760, 767 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Because Holloway can point to no controlling or persuasive authority that clearly established that it was impermissible for the police to use a photo array only a day or so before the physical lineup, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.")

Doxtator v. O'Brien, 39 F.4th 852, 863-64 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Even assuming O'Brien had violated a constitutional right belonging to Tubby, the Estate has not put forth any cases convincing us that the right was 'clearly established.' We therefore further hold that O'Brien is entitled to qualified immunity shielding him from suit. . . . The Estate offers only two cases purporting to establish that O'Brien violated a 'clearly established' right belonging to Tubby. Neither is at all close to being 'particularized to the facts of [this] case,'. . . and, therefore, neither satisfies the 'high bar,' . . . required to defeat the defendant's assertion of qualified immunity. First, the Estate points to Garner for its proposition that '[a] police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead.'. . But the Supreme Court itself has held that Garner is "cast at a high level of generality" and therefore cannot clearly establish rights for the purposes of qualified immunity, except in the most obvious cases. . . .Then the Estate cites this Circuit's decision in Becker v. Elfreich, 821 F.3d 920 (7th Cir. 2016), where we held that a reasonable jury could conclude that a police officer used excessive force in executing a search warrant when he deployed a police canine to apprehend an arrestee using the 'bite and hold' technique. . . While the discussion in Becker includes more details than the rule from Garner, those details share very few similarities with the instant case, and Becker therefore cannot have clearly established the right asserted by the Estate. Importantly, the arrestee in Becker never displayed any conduct suggesting to the officers that he was armed. In fact, he 'did not exhibit any sort of aggressive behavior toward [the arresting officer] or anyone else.'. . 'Nor was [the arrestee] actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . These dissimilarities with the instant case are more than sufficient for us to conclude that Becker provides no help to the Estate's attempt to defeat O'Brien's assertion of qualified immunity. . . . We hold that, given Tubby's conduct, no reasonable jury could conclude that O'Brien's use of force violated Tubby's Fourth Amendment rights. Furthermore, we hold that O'Brien is entitled to qualified immunity because the right he is alleged to have violated was not 'clearly established' at the time. For these reasons, we affirm the district court's entry of summary judgment on the Estate's § 1983 claim against O'Brien.")

Elim Romanian Pentecostal Church v. Pritzker, 22 F.4th 701, 703 (7th Cir. 2022) ("[I]f we were to ignore the 'official capacity' language that the complaints used to describe Governor Pritzker's status, the churches still could not obtain damages, because the Governor would be entitled to qualified immunity. Recall that the Governor won on the merits on the first appeal, which makes it impossible to describe as 'clearly established' in the spring of 2020 a rule that a capacity limit on religious services during a pandemic violates the Constitution. Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn was not decided until November 25, 2020, six months after the Governor rescinded the order imposing capacity limits on in-person religious events, and Tandon, decided on April 9, 2021, shows that there were (and are) still debatable issues about how public officials may regulate religious gatherings during a pandemic.")

Gupta v. Melloh, 19 F.4th 990, 1001 (7th Cir. 2021) ("The evaluation of qualified immunity . . . requires the same assessment of the material fact at issue in this case on the substantive claim of excessive force. It 'requires careful attention to the facts and circumstances' of the situation in which Officer Melloh found himself, including, the severity of the crime and how much of a risk Gupta posed to himself, the officer, and others, and most importantly for our purposes, it includes an assessment of whether Gupta was actively resisting arrest. . . Our case law has long put police officers on notice that they 'do not have the right to shove, push, or otherwise assault innocent citizens without any provocation whatsoever,'. . . and that significant force is unreasonable after a suspect is subdued or has stopped resisting or evading arrest or is, at most, passively resisting arrest. . . But in this case, we have no concessions about the facts of provocation or resistance that would allow us to determine reasonableness as a matter of law.")

Taylor v. City of Milford, 10 F.4th 800, 807, 810-11 (7th Cir. 2021) ("Viewing all of the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, we find that a reasonable jury could conclude that Garrett violated Steven's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures when Garrett applied deadly force to a non-suspect civilian who was not resisting arrest and did not pose an imminent threat to any officer, bystander, or himself. Garrett used physical force in a manner that restrained Steven's liberty, effectuating a seizure of Steven. . . Moreover, the nature and quality of the intrusion by Garrett was severe—as told by Serena and Shannon, Garrett aggressively restrained Steven for several minutes using his full body and police tactics intended to inflict pain and induce submission to the officer's will despite the fact that Steven was not a threat to him. . . And Garrett continued to apply this force, despite Steven's alleged pleas that he could not breathe and even after he vomited and lost consciousness. Yet the 'countervailing governmental interest[ ] at stake' was slight—Steven did not pose an immediate threat to himself or anyone else, and paramedics who could offer medical treatment for Steven's suspected hypoglycemia were already on their way. . . Furthermore, Garrett did not carry a first aid kit with him, he did not check or monitor Steven's vital signs, and he did not permit Steven to drink the orange juice that his niece offered (which was likely the most immediately accessible treatment for hypoglycemia). If we accept, as we must, Plaintiff's version of the facts, the force Garrett deployed against Steven was not a proportional response to Steven's mumbling and stumbling around his bedroom. . . . To review, three principles are clear: First, officers do not have a right to assault civilians without provocation. . . Second, officers may not use unnecessary force when a civilian is already subdued or compliant. . . Third, a medical emergency impacts the objective reasonableness of a seizure, but an emergency does not 'eviscerate' the civilian's Fourth Amendment rights. Taking these principles together, it has been clearly established that the method and manner of restraint must fit the circumstances of the particular case. . . Officers can employ only those means of restraint appropriate in a given situation. This is especially so for lethal force. In other words, it was clearly established by 2016 that an officer who forcibly restrained a civilian who was not a suspect of a crime and who did not pose a threat to those around him, resulting in vomiting and loss of consciousness before the officer released the civilian, violated that civilian's Fourth Amendment rights. We acknowledge that the Plaintiff's and Defendant's accounts of the events diverge with respect to the facts surrounding the incident, including whether Steven was a threat to himself or others, whether Garrett's actions served a medical or law enforcement purpose, and whether the force used was objectively reasonable under the circumstances. Each of these material disputes of fact must be determined by the jury, so that the court can properly assess Garrett's entitlement to qualified immunity.")

Taylor v. Ways, 999 F.3d 478, 487-88, 490-92 (7th Cir. 2021) ("The district court found that Taylor presented sufficient evidence that a reasonable jury could find that Ernst, motivated by racial animus, caused Taylor's firing. Ernst argues he is entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established that an official with his investigatory responsibilities, but without decision-making authority, could be held liable on a 'cat's paw' theory for race-motivated firing. Ernst also argues that the district court erred by refusing to consider the non-discriminatory rationale that he provided in defense of his termination recommendation: that the probable cause he had to arrest Taylor immunized him for anything that happened later. We consider these arguments in turn. For his claim against Ernst as an individual, Taylor relies on the cat's paw theory of liability used so often in employment discrimination cases. . . Taylor's theory is that Ernst's racial animus poisoned the investigation against him and that Ways, Whittler, and the Merit Board failed to take sufficient steps of their own to remove the taint of Ernst's racial animus. In response, Ernst argues, in effect, that as the monkey who used Ways, Whittler, and the Merit Board as his cat's paw, he is shielded from individual liability under § 1983. We disagree. In 2012 we observed that a cat's paw theory would support imposing individual liability under § 1983 on subordinate government employees who act with unlawful motives to cause the actual decision-makers to take action against another employee. . . We noted that at least five other circuits had held or said as much. . . So despite Ernst's non-supervisory role, he is not insulated from individual liability under § 1983 so long as Taylor can prove that Ernst's discriminatory motive was a factor in bringing about his termination. . .Taylor has presented just such evidence: evidence of Ernst's racial animus toward Taylor and evidence of Ernst's significant role in the investigative and disciplinary proceedings that brought about Taylor's termination. . . . Taylor is not challenging his arrest. He is challenging his termination. Ernst took the lead in an investigation that continued for weeks after Taylor's arrest, and Ernst's involvement in the case continued for years, at least through the Merit Board hearing in 2013. If his racial animus toward Taylor led him to conceal or turn a blind eye to exculpatory evidence during that longer investigation, and if his actions caused Taylor's termination, the Equal Protection Clause reaches such actions. . . . Under the facts asserted by Taylor and relied upon by the district court, Ernst violated clearly established law. . . .In 2011 and 2013, when the events took place, it was clearly established that a government official violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by using his official powers to cause a colleague to be fired on the basis of race. . . Any reasonable official in Ernst's position would have known that intentional racial discrimination toward another employee was unconstitutional. And what Taylor alleges against Ernst is textbook racial discrimination. The word "n*r," used by Ernst, a white man, aimed at Taylor on several separate occasions, reflects a uniquely virulent strain of racism, long recognized by the federal courts as capable of having a 'highly disturbing impact on the listener.'. .The illegality of Ernst's alleged conduct was obvious long before these events in 2011 and 2013. . . . Ernst, however, argues that the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry requires precedent tied to more particularized facts. He argues that the district court incorrectly denied qualified immunity based on the 'broad principle that terminating an employee on the basis of his race violates equal protection.' According to Ernst, in 2011 and 2013, it was not clearly established that a subordinate employee could be held liable for unlawful efforts to cause the termination of another employee. Ernst's argument asks the wrong question about qualified immunity. The question is not whether rules of individual liability for the conduct were clearly established at the time. The question is whether the wrongfulness of the defendant's conduct was clearly established. . . The Supreme Court has repeatedly described the defense of qualified immunity in terms of whether the defendant official's 'actions' or 'conduct' violated clearly established law, not in terms of whether a defendant should have realized he would be held civilly liable for his actions or conduct. . . By 2011, a veritable river of precedents established that public employees may not discriminate against other employees on the basis of race. . . . Based on the district court's analysis of the summary judgment evidence, we must assume here that Ernst acted out of racial animus and that his actions caused Taylor's termination. Any reasonable public employee, and certainly any public employee responsible for investigating other employees for disciplinary purposes, would have known he could not act on the basis of racial animus. Ernst simply has not offered a plausible argument to the effect that a reasonable police officer in 2011 could have thought he could engineer a colleague's termination because of his race without violating the Constitution. In addition, while precedent tied to particularized facts can indicate that a point of law is clearly established, the Supreme Court does not demand a case directly on point. Thompson v. Cope, 900 F.3d 414, 422 (7th Cir. 2018); see also Taylor v. Riojas, —— U.S. ——, 141 S. Ct. 52, 53–54, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020) (reiterating that "a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question"), quoting Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002). . . . If the cited cases on race discrimination in public employment decisions were not enough, the facts we must assume would qualify this case as that rare, obvious case. Based on the wealth of case law on the unlawfulness of race discrimination in the employment context, Ernst had 'fair and clear warning' in 2011 and 2013 that he was violating the Constitution. . . We therefore affirm denial of summary judgment for Ernst.")

Lopez v. Sheriff of Cook County, 993 F.3d 981, 987-92 (7th Cir. 2021) ("Like the district court, we begin and end with the second step of the analysis: determining whether Officer Raines violated Fernando Lopez's clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure. For the law to be clearly established, the 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . . While an officer may be authorized to use deadly force at one moment, it is not a blank check. When an individual has become 'subdued and [is] complying with the officer's orders,' the officer may no longer use deadly force. . . Yet we must be careful not to allow the benefit of hindsight to cause us to discount the reality that officers must make quick decisions as to how much force, if any, to employ. . . While cases like Garner and Graham are instructive in the excessive force context, they 'do not by themselves create clearly established law outside an obvious case.'. . Determining whether an officer violates clearly established law requires a look at past cases with specificity. . . The Supreme Court has time and again instructed lower courts 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Specificity is critical to making qualified immunity a workable doctrine in the Fourth

Amendment context, where it 'is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'. .But this requirement is not unbending. The prong-two clearly-established-law assessment does not require a case with identical factual circumstances, lest qualified immunity become absolute immunity. . . Still, the right must be so clearly established such that it is 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . That sounds like a high bar because it is—qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. .The district court approached this inquiry the exact right way, looking first to past precedent to ask whether any cases squarely govern the facts at issue. In following suit, we too think it best to consider Officer Raines's use of force that early morning in two distinct phases: the shooting of Lopez and the use of Lopez as a human shield during the sidewalk standoff. . . . Neither the Supreme Court's precedent nor our own clearly establishes that Officer Raines's split-second decision to open fire was unlawful. There were many people on the city street when Lopez, just moments before, opened fire. All Raines knew at the time he fired was that Lopez had just popped off two rounds and that Lopez was now walking in his general direction with gun in hand. A reasonable officer could have concluded that Lopez was an imminent threat both to the officer and the bystanders on the street and outside the Lounge. Lopez insists that Officer Raines should have given him a warning. Whether Raines did so is disputed. At summary judgment and without any clear evidence to the contrary, we must credit Lopez's contention that Raines did not announce himself as a police officer. A warning is decidedly preferred—but it is not required in every circumstance. . . Given the lack of clearly established law, Officer Raines is entitled to qualified immunity as to the first shot. From here the case gets much harder. Lopez contends that even if the first shot did not transgress established law, Raines's subsequent shots clearly violated Lopez's constitutional right not to have lethal force used against him once he was subdued by the initial shot. But that contention too discounts the speed and unpredictability with which events unfolded on the street that morning. As the district court explained, the video shows that Raines first shot Lopez at 3:56:27 a.m. Lopez dropped his gun one second later, but as he turned and started to run, Officer Raines fired for two more seconds, until 3:56:30 a.m. Raines fired all of his shots in the span of three seconds. In retrospect, and with the benefit of the security footage, it is inviting to parse the multiple shots fired into separate individual events. But we must consider them together in light of how quickly—and in precisely what circumstances—everything transpired. Indeed, in this very context of qualified immunity, the Supreme Court has emphasized that a proper analysis must 'allo[w] for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.'. . Lopez cannot point to a case that clearly establishes a reasonable officer cannot use lethal force over the span of three seconds on an individual he had just seen fire his weapon, who has not surrendered, and is still moving to evade capture. Lopez points to precedent that we find either easily distinguishable or standing for principles that do not show that Officer Raines's conduct violated clearly established law. [discussing and distinguishing cases relied on by Lopez] Our assessment does not change when we consider Officer Raines's conduct on the sidewalk. Recall that after Raines shot Lopez, Lopez quickly moved around the rear of his car and scampered toward the sidewalk. Security footage shows Lopez dropped his gun but was still fleeing. Raines followed after him, quickly reaching Lopez on the sidewalk near the entrance to the Lounge just a few seconds later (at 3:56:34 a.m.). As Officer Raines followed after Lopez, Mario Orta picked up Lopez's gun and immediately opened fire on Raines—shooting directly at him but missing. Raines was then forced to deal with two assailants—restraining an injured Lopez and keeping a mobile, gun-toting Orta at bay. Notice what Officer Raines did not do: he never again fired his weapon. He instead used Lopez's body as a buffer between himself and Orta, rotating his position (and the injured Lopez) to react to Orta's constant movement. . . . To be sure, Raines aggressively restrained Lopez, at times holding a gun to his head. You certainly (and rightly) will not find this maneuver in a police training manual. But the qualified immunity inquiry is not whether Officer Raines's action is immune from criticism. The question the Supreme Court instructs courts to consider instead is whether Officer Raines violated clearly established law. In our view, he did not. . . .The combination of these unusual facts compels our conclusion. We cannot say that Officer Raines's actions on the sidewalk violated law clearly established in 2014—especially when considering the Supreme Court's admonition to define the violation with specificity. Try as Lopez might, there is no analogous case to put Raines on notice that his conduct was unlawful given the circumstances he faced in those early morning hours. Nor is this a situation where a violation is so egregious that any reasonable officer would know they are violating the Constitution notwithstanding the lack of an analogous decision. . . The situation was too fast-moving, too unpredictable, and too volatile to reach that conclusion. Raines could have reasonably concluded he was acting lawfully in protecting himself and the public when he subdued Lopez and tried to defuse the situation by using him as a shield to ward off Mario Orta until police arrived at the scene. . .What makes this case difficult is the distinct impression the video leaves us with after watching it multiples times. By the looks of it, there is a reasonable chance that Fernando Lopez was about to get in his car and leave the scene right when Officer Raines opened fire. That observation invites the conclusion that Raines may not have needed to use lethal force at all. This whole situation may have been avoided had cooler heads prevailed that morning. Hindsight—aided by watching this scene unfold frame by frame on video footage from four distinct angles in the comfort of the courthouse—allows us to ponder how Officer Raines could have best handled the situation. But that is not our inquiry here. We are left to evaluate whether Raines's conduct violated clearly established law, given the dangerous, delicate, and dynamic circumstances he faced that morning and the state of the law at the time. The benefit of hindsight does not lower the clear and high bar that is the law of qualified immunity. In this case that bar compels us to AFFIRM the grant of qualified immunity.") Cibulka v. City of Madison, 992 F.3d 633, 639-41 (7th Cir. 2021) ("The Cibulkas admit that they 'are unable to cite ... a case that clearly applies to the level of force exercised by the defendant officers ... because none exist.' Admissions of this sort are often fatal to plaintiffs' attempts to overcome qualified immunity. . . But the Cibulkas argue that the analysis should not end there for two main reasons. First, they contend that 'a reasonable officer should not be able to assume his conduct is reasonable ... unless there is case law affirmatively so stating.' They cite no support for this argument, which is unsurprising because that's plainly not the law. 'In this circuit, once a defendant claims qualified immunity, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the right claimed to have been violated was clearly established.'. .We will not flip this well-established burden on its head. Second, the Cibulkas employ the expected last-ditch argument against qualified immunity and claim that the officers' constitutional violations were so obvious that the Cibulkas don't need to cite a closely analogous case. But they misplay this argument, too, because they still need to identify 'some settled authority that would have shown a reasonable officer in [these officers'] position that [their] alleged actions violated the Constitution.'. . In other words, they must show that 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law ... appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question,'. . . so that 'a reasonable person necessarily would have recognized it as a violation of the law[.]'. . If anything is obvious about this case, however, it's that the officers' conduct did not obviously violate the Constitution. Let's take a look at the instant replay. First, the officers grabbed Todd when he stood up from the retaining wall and moved toward Johnson Street. Todd disputes that he was going to fall into the street, but a reasonable officer could certainly have thought that Todd was in danger of toppling headlong into traffic and potentially harming himself (or disappointed Purdue fans driving back to Indiana). Erwin testified that he did think Todd was about to fall and grabbed him for that reason. The Cibulkas cite no 'settled authority that would have shown a reasonable officer' that grabbing an inebriated individual for his own safety is a constitutional foul. . . And it is not the least bit surprising that such cases do not exist. . .Next, the officers took down and handcuffed Todd after he admittedly began resisting and refused to sit down (and after, we repeat, arguable probable cause to arrest was formed). Again, we fail to see how this routine police activity is an obvious constitutional violation. Indeed, cases involving arguably more forceful conduct indicate otherwise. . . Finally, the officers huddled with Todd and tried to persuade him to get into a squad car to de-escalate the situation. When those efforts failed, they used incremental levels of force to get him into the car. And when those efforts failed too, they called a timeout and let Todd get out. Once again, the Cibulkas fail to convince us that this is one of those 'rare cases ... where the state official's alleged conduct is so egregious that it is an obvious violation of a constitutional right.'. .In the end, 'it should go without saying that this is not an "obvious case" where "a body of relevant case law" is not needed.'. . Maybe the Cibulkas' case would be more persuasive if, say, the officers started gratuitously smashing Todd's ribs. . . But they stopped well short of such unnecessary roughness. . . That's enough to decide the Cibulkas' excessive-force claim. We need not take up the parties' offer to consider the 'community caretaker doctrine.'. . We note only that the pertinent cases from the Supreme Court and this court shed virtually no light on how that doctrine might apply to this case, and Wisconsin cases (which we may consider, . . . have applied it to justify the warrantless seizure of an individual in public[.]. . If anything, these cases make it even more reasonable for an officer to believe that the conduct here was fair game and violated no clearly established rights. But ultimately, the community caretaker doctrine is beside the point. The only thing that matters is that the Cibulkas cite neither ' "controlling authority" [n]or "a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority"' that establish the right to be free from the conduct in this case, . . . and the officers' conduct was not 'so egregious that it is an obvious violation of a constitutional right[.]'. .Qualified immunity is therefore proper with respect to the Cibulkas' excessive-force claim.")

Balsewicz v. Pawlyk, 963 F.3d 650, 657-58 (7th Cir. 2020) ("If any reasonable officer in Sergeant Pawlyk's shoes—after discovering that Balsewicz faced a substantial danger of being beaten up by Rivers—would have understood that taking no action to address that danger violated Balsewicz's right, then the right was clearly established. . . Put another way, if applying the law at that time to the facts 'would have left objectively reasonable officials in a state of uncertainty,' then immunity is appropriate. . . It is true that, here, factual uncertainty remains about whether Sergeant Pawlyk knew Balsewicz faced an imminent, rather than a lapsed, danger of serious harm. But that is not the kind of uncertainty that matters. The reason is that we approach the qualified-immunity inquiry by treating as true the evidence-supported facts and inferences favoring Balsewicz. . . The appropriate question, then, is this: Assuming Sergeant Pawlyk was informed that Balsewicz faced an ongoing threat from Rivers, did Sergeant Pawlyk's inaction violate one of Balsewicz's clearly established rights? The answer is yes. Farmer v. Brennan made clear that being violently assaulted by a fellow inmate in prison is a serious harm. . . And Farmer also made clear what a prison official must do when he learns that an inmate faces an excessive danger of such a harm: take reasonable measures to abate the danger. . .Cases since Farmer have confirmed that inmates have a right to have officers take reasonable measures to abate a known risk of violent assault by a fellow inmate. . . . Accordingly, at the time Sergeant Pawlyk was informed that Rivers presented an ongoing excessive danger to Balsewicz, a competent officer in Sergeant Pawlyk's shoes would have known that taking no protective action in response—no additional investigation, no reporting to a supervisor, no measures to keep Rivers away from Balsewicz, etc.—violated Balsewicz's right to be reasonably protected from a violent beating by another inmate. Given the clear governing rules set out by Farmer, and given their application in cases confirming that inaction in like circumstances violates an inmate's constitutional right, Sergeant Pawlyk is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Day v. Wooten, 947 F.3d 453, 461, 463 (7th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1449 (2021) ("The district court defined the rights at issue as Day's right to be free from excessively tight handcuffs and his right to have the officers consider his injury or condition in determining the appropriateness of the handcuff positioning. The court concluded that the officers' conduct violated those rights. However, there is no Seventh Circuit precedent clearly establishing that the conduct the officers engaged in violated either of those rights. The plaintiffs point to Payne v. Pauley . . . and identify it as the best case to clearly establish the right to be free from excessively tight handcuffs. . . .Payne does not help the plaintiffs because it involves circumstances and conduct drastically different than this case. Day was suspected of shoplifting while armed with a gun, a much more serious offense than the plaintiff in Payne (who had allegedly done nothing wrong). It is also undisputed that Day was not cooperative: he repeatedly changed position despite the officer's instructions to remain seated upright, and he argued with the officers to let him go. More importantly, Officer Denny and Sergeant Wooten did not violently yank or jerk Day's arms and shoulders, or any of Day's person for that matter. Furthermore, the handcuffs in Payne were much tighter than they needed to be to accomplish the purpose of detaining the arrestee, to the point of causing visible physical injury. There is no suggestion that the handcuffs used on Day were any tighter than would have been typically used to restrain an arrestee in similar circumstances. In fact, the coroner noted no visible signs of trauma, and the autopsy report indicated no lacerations or contusions on Day's wrists. The rule announced in Payne is inapposite. . . .Given the facts as assumed by the district court and the information known to the officers at the time of the arrest, the only right plaintiffs can assert would be the right of an out-of-breath arrestee to not have his hands cuffed behind his back after he complains of difficulty breathing. We find no Seventh Circuit precedent clearly establishing such a right. The cases relied upon by the district court and the plaintiffs present circumstances far different, and therefore cannot clearly establish that the officers' conduct violated Day's rights. One further point must be addressed. The Supreme Court has stated that even in the absence of existing precedent addressing similar circumstances, 'there can be the rare "obvious case,' where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear.'. . This case is certainly not one of those rare obvious cases. As already discussed, the handcuffs were used in a manner that would not have harmed an average arrestee, and there is no evidence the officers were aware the handcuffs were causing Day's breathing trouble. The officers' conduct under the circumstances was not obviously unlawful.") Harnishfeger v. United States, 943 F.3d 1105, 1120-21 (7th Cir. 2019) ("No prescience is demanded. . .of the public employer who retaliates against protected speech 'where the speech caused no actual disruption of any kind for four months, and where the employer neither articulates a belief that the speech has the potential to be disruptive in the future, nor has evidence to support the reasonableness of such a belief.'. . Substitute 'three months' for 'four months,' and the observation applies here. First, under clearly established law in September 2016, Conversations was protected. It was speech neither at work nor about work; it was addressed to a general audience; and there was no sign that Harnishfeger deliberately linked its content or message to the Guard's mission, purpose, or image. . . Though we must take care not to define the right asserted by Harnishfeger at too high a level of generality, . . . there is no real dispute on these points here. Defendants argue that Roe and Craig v. Rich Township High School District 227, 736 F.3d 1110 (7th Cir. 2013), together suggest that sexually explicit speech 'is generally not considered of public concern,' but those cases suggest no such thing. Roe made clear that the plaintiff's sexualized performances would have been protected under NTEU but for his deliberate linkage of them to his police work. . . And Craig lost at the Pickering balancing step of the analysis, not the threshold step of whether his speech addressed a matter of public concern under Connick. . . Second, clearly established law in September 2016 held that the public employer's side of the Pickering balance must be supported with evidence of actual disruption, or at least the articulation of a reasonable belief in future disruption plus evidence of its reasonableness at the time. . . The Pickering analysis here shows no actual disruption; no articulation of a belief in future disruption with respect to Kopczynski's appeal that Conversations does not 'favorably represent' the Guard; and no rational connection between Kopczynski's appeal to the Guard's Domestic Violence Prevention and Response Plan and Conversations or Harnishfeger's VISTA placement. On this record, the explanations provided appear to be so flimsy as to support an inference that they were not objectively reasonable but reflected only disgust with Conversations and its author, whom the Guard, as Kopczynski emphasized, 'likely would not have considered' for VISTA placement had it been aware of her 'previous employment/work experience.' On this record, 'the line between the permitted and the forbidden' was clearly 'marked in advance.'. . Kopczynski has not shown that she stayed within that line and is entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity.") Frederickson v. Landeros, 943 F.3d 1054, 1061-62, 1064-67 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Landeros's actions occurred in 2011, and so the first question we must address is whether the right Frederickson is trying to vindicate was clearly established before then. Olech was decided in 2000, well before Landeros acted, and this court had recognized class-of-one claims long before Olech. . . . Importantly, this case does not involve state employment, and so it is unaffected by the Supreme Court's recognition in Engquist v. Oregon Department of Agriculture, . . . that the class-of-one theory is not cognizable in public employment cases. . . Bearing in mind the relation between the lack of a rational basis in general, and actions taken solely on the basis of animus in particular, we have consistently stated that a class-of-one plaintiff's 'right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus' is clearly established. . . .Let's assume for the sake of argument, however, as the dissent urges, that Hanes and Hilton and Geinosky were wrong when they held that a claim is stated under Olech if 'the police decided to withdraw all protection' from a person 'out of sheer malice,'. . . and thus that the 'right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus' states the constitutional standard too broadly. A quick look at Frederickson's complaint shows that his claim is far more particularized. He is asserting that, just as in Olech, no rational basis supports the police officer's action—motivated exclusively by animus and no other discernible rational basis—to block him from complying with an ordinary registration requirement or from filing a complaint with Village authorities. In order to prove this class-of-one claim, Frederickson will eventually have to present evidence that would allow a reasonable jury to conclude that in this particular respect he 'has been intentionally treated differently from others similarly situated and that there is no rational basis for the difference in treatment.'. . Although we have not definitively resolved the question whether it is sufficient for a plaintiff simply to allege differential treatment at the hands of the police with no rational basis, or if a class-of-one claim requires a plaintiff additionally to prove that the police acted for reasons of personal animus, malice, or some other improper personal motivation, . . . whatever uncertainty exists makes no difference to this case in its present posture. We accept (favorably to Landeros) that the only form of class-of-one equal protection right that is clearly established within our circuit involves government actors who single out a citizen for differential treatment with no objective rational basis for that difference and because of 'a vindictive or harassing purpose.'. . . In other class-of-one cases, we have recognized that an equal protection violation may have occurred even though no due process violation was present. . . We thus conclude that Frederickson's right to register as a sex offender or to file complaints with the local authorities without being blocked by a police officer who acts exclusively out of animus was clearly established at the time of these events. . . This brings us to the second part of the qualified-immunity analysis: whether the facts Frederickson has asserted describe a violation of the Equal Protection Clause and suffice to defeat summary judgment. We agree with the district court that the answer is yes. Frederickson has introduced evidence that would allow a jury to find both that Landeros had no objective rational basis to prevent his move to Bolingbrook, and that Landeros took affirmative steps to block his move for reasons of personal animus. . . . If Frederickson were complaining only about arrests supported by probable cause, we freely concede that Nieves would require a different result. But his complaint goes well beyond that. Relations between Frederickson and Landeros were combative. Frederickson testified that Landeros threatened to arrest him when he announced his plan to leave Joliet in 2008 and when he attempted to do so again in 2011; there is no hint of probable cause for those actions. Frederickson also stated that Landeros repeatedly refused to correct his status as an independent contractor and the name of his employer on his registration. Landeros, in turn, complained that he thought Frederickson gave him 'trouble.' Probable cause has nothing to do with those actions. A jury would not be compelled to find anything nefarious about this history of interactions between a single officer and citizen—even a homeless ex-sex-offender. But our question is only whether a rational jury could make that finding. When combined with the series of events surrounding Frederickson's attempted move, this history would entitle a jury to conclude that Landeros acted against Frederickson for no conceivable reason other12 than personal animus. We therefore agree with the district court that Frederickson has presented sufficient evidence to defeat qualified immunity at this ")

Frederickson v. Landeros, 943 F.3d 1054, 1069-70 (7th Cir. 2019) (Easterbrook, J., dissenting) ("According to the majority, everyone has a 'right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus.'. . And on this approach, all of the obstacles I have mentioned vanish. Want to avoid Nieves? Ignore the First Amendment and assert that the retaliatory arrest was a 'class-of-one equal-protection' problem. Disagree with Hartman? Same solution. Seeking to sidestep Beley? Class-of-one is your silver bullet. Trouble showing that any of these legal propositions was clearly established in 2011? Just assert that everyone always has had a 'right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus.' I don't see how this magic can work. . . .If it has always been the law that everyone has a 'right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus', why did the Supreme Court decide Hartman in 2006? Why did Reichle hold in 2012 that qualified immunity blocks recovery on a retaliatory-arrest claim? Why did we bother with Del Marcelle v. Brown County, 680 F.3d 887 (7th Cir. 2012) (en banc)? Del Marcelle alleged that, as a result of personal animus, local officials failed to protect him from criminals and so violated the Equal Protection Clause on a class-of-one theory. The court en banc rejected that claim, though by an equally divided vote. On the view taken by my colleagues today, Del Marcelle should have prevailed. He did not. A view that lost in 2012 cannot have been clearly established in 2011. I explained in Del Marcelle that a class-of-one equal-protection theory is not an appropriate way to evaluate police officers' conduct. . . It is not necessary to repeat that analysis, because the question is whether the right Frederickson asserts was clearly established in 2011 rather than 2012 or today. But it is apt to ask why, if it has always been established that everyone has a 'right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus', that supposed right was still at issue in 2012—and why it is not possible to find support for it in the decisions of the Supreme Court. The debate within this court in 2012, and the lack of a good precedent in Frederickson's favor from the Supreme Court, bring into play the principle that '[i]f judges ... disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.'. .More than that. My colleagues' conclusion that the clearly established right is one

'to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus' is at far too high a level of generality. The Supreme Court has held a right is 'clearly established' only if it has been 'defined with specificity.'. . These decisions, and more, tell us that a high level of generality won't do. A right has been defined 'with specificity' when existing judicial decisions tell the officer what to do, concretely, in a given situation. . . The proposition that everyone is entitled to 'police protection uncorrupted by personal animus' does not convey that information. It does not tell Landeros when to transfer a LEADS file (state law does that). It does not tell any officer where a given sex offender must register, or when a sex offender under investigation in one jurisdiction (such as Joliet) is entitled to register in another (such as Bolingbrook). Official action uncorrupted by personal animus is an ideal—something to which all public employees should aspire—but not a rule of conduct governing day-to-day business. It is therefore not adequate as a foundation for damages under § 1983.")

Stewart v. Parkview Hosp., 940 F.3d 1013, 1016 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Like the district court, we have identified no case law establishing that an officer's receipt of blood-test results from medical personnel offends the Fourth Amendment. Those cases that do address the question point in the other direction. In 1966 the Supreme Court recognized that the exigent-circumstances exception to the Fourth Amendment permitted police officers to order a warrantless blood draw from a conscious driver involved in an accident. . . Earlier this year, the Court reinforced and extended this same point, holding that, despite reductions in the time needed to obtain a warrant, warrantless blood draws from unconscious drivers involved in car accidents do not offend with the Fourth Amendment. . . Against the backdrop of Schmerber and Mitchell, we cannot say 'beyond any debate' that the police officers' actions here were unconstitutional. . . Accepting Stewart's account that he was unconscious at the time of the blood draw, the officers had no reason to believe the Fourth Amendment barred the police from seeking the results of a blood test that a doctor ordered for medical purposes from a driver after a collision. In these circumstances, Stewart cannot establish that the officers violated a right clearly established under the Fourth Amendment, and qualified immunity applies.") Weiland v. Loomis, 938 F.3d 917, 919-21 (7th Cir. 2019) ("The 'state-created danger exception' to DeShaney does not tell any public employee what to do, or avoid, in any situation. It is a principle, not a rule. And it is a principle of liability, not a doctrine (either a standard or a rule) concerning primary conduct. For that one must look elsewhere, but the district judge did not do so. Nor have the plaintiffs. Citing decisions of this circuit, the district court understood the 'state-created danger exception' to DeShaney as equivalent to a constitutional rule prohibiting any act, by any public official, that increases private danger. . . .Over and over, the Supreme Court has held that a right is 'clearly established' only if it has been 'defined with specificity.' [collecting cases] . . . These decisions, and more, tell us that a high level of generality won't do. The district judge resisted the conclusion that 'state-created danger' is too general by observing that Loomis's proposal—something like a case establishing how guards must prevent being overpowered by prisoners in hospitals during bathroom breaks—would be too particular. . . By insisting on a case identical to the one at hand, public employees could insulate themselves from liability, for every case differs in some respect from its predecessors. We agree with the district judge that a search for identity is not required and would be a fool's errand. A principle can be clearly established without matching a later case's facts. The search is for an appropriate level of generality, not the most particular conceivable level. And the level of generality is appropriate when it establishes the rule in a way that tells a public employee what the Constitution requires in the situation that employee faces. . . .It is not possible to say that a constitutional obligation to keep a prisoner under control has been 'clearly established' when every appellate court that has addressed the question has held that the proposed obligation does not exist. Because 'clearly established' law does not support the § 1983 claim against Loomis, we need not decide whether we agree with these decisions. . . But it is apt to add that we also have not approved the district court's view that the complaint states a good constitutional claim. Plaintiffs allege that Loomis was incompetent, but the Due Process Clause generally does not condemn official negligence. . . Plaintiffs depict themselves as frightened but not otherwise injured, and, even in the law of torts, negligent actors are not liable for conduct that threatens bodily harm but produces only emotional distress. . . . For now, it is enough to say that even if Loomis is civilly and criminally liable as a matter of Illinois law, he is entitled to qualified immunity from a claim based on the federal Constitution, so the district court's decision is REVERSED.")

Campbell v. Kallas, 936 F.3d 536, 538, 546-49 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Qualified immunity shields a public official from suit for damages unless caselaw clearly puts him on notice that his action is unconstitutional. The judge's approach to the qualified-immunity question was far too general. The Eighth Amendment requires prison healthcare professionals to exercise medical judgment when making decisions about an inmate's treatment. And they cannot completely deny the care of a serious medical condition. But cases recognizing those broad principles could not have warned these defendants that treating an inmate's gender dysphoria with hormone therapy and deferring consideration of sex-reassignment surgery violates the Constitution. Moreover, it's doubtful that a prisoner can prove a case of deliberate indifference when, as here, prison officials followed accepted medical standards. The defendants are immune from damages liability. . . .The Supreme Court's message is unmistakable: Frame the constitutional right in terms granular enough to provide fair notice because qualified immunity 'protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. .Here the judge framed the qualified-immunity question in very broad terms, asking whether it was clearly established that 'denying effective treatment' for Campbell's medical condition violates the Eighth Amendment. That formulation—which is basically a highly conceptualized version of the deliberate-indifference standard—is far too general. On appeal Campbell likewise frames the issue at too high a level of generality, arguing that the defendants violated clearly established law by failing to exercise individualized medical judgment and persisting in an ineffective course of treatment. These broad principles have support in our caselaw, but neither has been applied in a factual context specific enough to provide fair notice to the defendants that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . . When considering deliberate-indifference claims challenging the medical judgment of prison healthcare personnel, qualified-immunity analysis requires us to frame the legal question with reasonable specificity. The proper inquiry is whether then-existing caselaw clearly established a constitutional right to gender-dysphoria treatment beyond hormone therapy. This framing is specific enough to ensure that the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct ... follow[s] immediately from the conclusion that [the rule] was firmly established.'. . And in this fact-intensive area of constitutional law, a broader formulation would violate the Supreme Court's instruction that the specific contours of the right must be 'sufficiently definite that any reasonable official ... would have understood that he was violating it.'. . Neither Elyea nor Fields provides the required level of specificity. Elyea amounts to a general admonition that officials must exercise medical judgment rather than mechanically apply categorical rules. And Fields doesn't place 'beyond debate' the proposition that medical professionals violate the Eighth Amendment when they provide hormone therapy but decide—after extensive deliberation and consultation with an outside expert—to deny sex-reassignment surgery. . . In both cases prison officials refused to provide any treatment for serious diseases based solely on categorical rules. That simply didn't occur here. These DOC officials consulted an expert in the field and, facing a gray area of professional opinion, decided to deny the 'last and ... most considered step' of gender-dysphoria treatment. No case in the Federal Reporter could have warned these DOC officials that their treatment choice was unconstitutional. When the defendants were making these decisions, only one federal appellate decision had addressed the merits of a deliberate-indifference claim involving sex-reassignment surgery: Kosilek v. Spencer, 774 F.3d 63 (1st Cir. 2014) (en banc). . . There the First Circuit concluded that prison officials who provided hormone therapy and lifestyle accommodations but denied a request for surgery did not violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . To be sure, the constitutional concern in cases involving no treatment at all is not disease-or injury-specific. But prisons aren't obligated to provide every requested treatment once medical care begins. In a deliberate-indifference case challenging the medical judgment of prison healthcare professionals who actually diagnose and treat an inmate's medical condition (as opposed to ignoring it), we necessarily evaluate those discrete treatment decisions. And we defer to those decisions 'unless no minimally competent professional would have' made them. . . . Given the fact-specific nature of these claims, the notice aspect of qualified-immunity doctrine is crucial. . . . Qualified-immunity analysis also asks whether 'the facts, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff[ ], show that the defendants violated a constitutional right.'. . Because no case clearly establishes that denying treatment beyond hormone therapy is unconstitutional, qualified immunity applies regardless. . . .Because clearly established law did not require Wisconsin prison officials to provide Campbell with gender-dysphoria treatment beyond hormone therapy, the defendants are immune from damages liability.")

Campbell v. Kallas, 936 F.3d 536, 549-54 (7th Cir. 2019) (Wood, C.J., dissenting) ("The Supreme Court has pounded home the point that when deciding whether qualified immunity applies, lower courts cannot view the law at a 'high level of generality.'. . Nonetheless, while 'a case directly on point' may be sufficient, it is not necessary. . . The majority opinion in the case before us recognizes this distinction, admitting that " '[f]or purposes of qualified immunity, [the Eighth-Amendment] duty' to treat prisoners' serious medical conditions 'need not be litigated and then established disease by disease or injury by injury.' . . The Eighth Amendment applies whether the serious condition is Type I diabetes, paraplegia, congestive heart failure, or a broken leg, even though the treatments for those conditions are quite different. Yet the majority fails to follow this rule. Instead, it states that Campbell must show a clearly established right specific to her condition—gender dysphoria—and to the particular way the medical profession addresses it. . . With respect, that is the wrong question, and so it leads to the wrong answer. I therefore dissent. . . . Our inquiry should be simple: first, we must determine whether Campbell suffers from a medical need that is clearly established as objectively serious; second, we must determine whether, as a subjective matter, it was clear to the defendants that they were being deliberately indifferent to Campbell's objectively serious medical need. The first half of this inquiry is easy. We recognized in 1997 that '[g]ender dysphoria ... is a serious psychiatric disorder.'. . It has thus been established for more than 20 years that gender dysphoria is a serious medical need; commendably, the defendants in this litigation do not contend that it is not. . . That takes us to the second inquiry: whether the defendants were deliberately indifferent in refusing Campbell's requests for surgery. . . . Importantly, whether a defendant had a deliberately indifferent state of mind is not a legal question; it is a factual one. . . We can thus resolve this case now only if there is no disputed issue of material fact on this point. . . . While no other court of appeals has dealt with a prisoner's claim for SRS in the context of qualified immunity, our sister circuits are largely in accord about whether the denial of SRS can violate the Eighth Amendment: It can. See Rosati v. Igbinoso, 791 F.3d 1037, 1040 (9th Cir. 2015) (holding that the denial of SRS stated a claim under the Eighth Amendment); De'lonta v. Johnson, 708 F.3d 520, 525–26 (4th Cir. 2013) (same). The cases denying a plaintiff's claim for SRS do so not because the denial of SRS can never be deliberate indifference, but because the factual record before them did not contain evidence that, if believed, would show that only SRS would be appropriate for that plaintiff. . . . As the district court recognized, when viewed in the light most favorable to Campbell, the evidence shows that despite being treated with hormones, Campbell's gender dysphoria has not improved. She has continued to threaten self-castration and to experience suicidal ideation. The defendants are aware of Campbell's continued suffering and have nevertheless refused her further treatment. Campbell's experts have opined that no reasonable medical professional would recommend any course of treatment in her case except surgery. The majority opinion swipes this evidence away. Instead it chooses to reach its own conclusion that, despite members of the medical community swearing to the contrary, SRS is not so well-established that Kallas could be deliberately indifferent by refusing to provide it. But that is a conclusion of fact that lies outside our competence. It also rests on the flawed legal basis of an "injury by injury" determination of clearly established law. I respectfully dissent.")

[Compare Edmo v. Corizon, Inc., 935 F.3d 757, 767, 794-97, 803 (9th Cir. 2019) ("The record before us, as construed by the district court, establishes that Edmo has a serious medical need, that the appropriate medical treatment is GCS [gender confirmation surgery], and that prison authorities have not provided that treatment despite full knowledge of Edmo's ongoing and extreme suffering and medical needs. In so holding, we reject the State's portrait of a reasoned disagreement between qualified medical professionals. We also emphasize that the analysis here is individual to Edmo and rests on the record in this case. We do not endeavor to project whether individuals in other cases will meet the threshold to establish an Eighth Amendment violation. The district court's order entering injunctive relief for Edmo is affirmed, with minor modifications noted below. . . .Several years ago, the First Circuit, sitting en banc, employed that fact-based approach to evaluate a gender dysphoric prisoner's Eighth Amendment claim seeking GCS. The First Circuit confronted the following record: credited expert testimony disagreed as to whether GCS was medically necessary; the prisoner's active treatment plan, which did not include GCS, had 'led to a significant stabilization in her mental state'; and a report and testimony from correctional officials detailed significant security concerns that would arise if the prisoner underwent GCS. Kosilek, 774 F.3d at 86–96. 'After carefully considering the community standard of medical care, the adequacy of the provided treatment, and the valid security concerns articulated by the DOC,' a 3–2 majority of the en banc court concluded that the plaintiff had not demonstrated GCS was medically necessary treatment for her gender dysphoria. . . Our approach mirrors the First Circuit's, but the important factual differences between cases yield different outcomes. Notably, the security concerns in Kosilek, which the First Circuit afforded 'wide-ranging deference,' are completely absent here. . . The State does not so much as allude to them. The medical evidence also differs. In Kosilek, qualified and credited experts disagreed about whether GCS was necessary. . . As explained above, the district court's careful factual findings admit of no such disagreement here. Rather, they unequivocally establish that GCS is the safe, effective, and medically necessary treatment for Edmo's severe gender dysphoria. We recognize, however, that our decision is in tension with Gibson v. Collier. In that case, the Fifth Circuit held, in a split decision, that '[a] state does not inflict cruel and unusual punishment by declining to provide [GCS] to a transgender inmate.' 920 F.3d at 215. It did so on a 'sparse record'—which included only the WPATH [World Professional Association of Transgender Health] Standards of Care and was notably devoid of 'witness testimony or evidence from professionals in the field'—compiled by a pro se plaintiff. . . Despite the sparse record, a 2–1 majority of the Gibson panel concluded that 'there is no consensus in the medical community about the necessity and efficacy of [GCS] as a treatment for gender dysphoria. ... This on-going medical debate dooms Gibson's claim.'. . We respectfully disagree with the categorical nature of our sister circuit's holding. Most fundamentally, Gibson relies on an incorrect, or at best outdated, premise: that '[t]here is no medical consensus that [GCS] is a necessary or even effective treatment for gender dysphoria.'. . As the record here demonstrates and the State does not seriously dispute, the medical consensus is that GCS is effective and medically necessary in appropriate circumstances. . . .Gibson is unpersuasive for several additional reasons. It directly conflicts with decisions of this circuit, the Fourth Circuit, and the Seventh Circuit, all of which have held that denying surgical treatment for gender dysphoria can pose a cognizable Eighth Amendment claim. Rosati, 791 F.3d at 1040 (alleged blanket ban on GCS and denial of GCS to plaintiff with severe symptoms, including repeated self-castration attempts, states an Eighth Amendment claim); Fields v. Smith, 653 F.3d 550, 552–53, 558–59 (7th Cir. 2011) (law banning hormone treatment and GCS, even if medically necessary, violates the Eighth Amendment); De'lonta, 708 F.3d at 525 (alleged denial of an evaluation for GCS states an Eighth Amendment claim). . . Relatedly, Gibson eschews Eighth Amendment precedent requiring a case-by-case determination of the medical necessity of a particular treatment. . . . The First Circuit did precisely what we do here: assess whether the record before it demonstrated deliberate indifference to the plaintiff's gender dysphoria. On the record before it, the First Circuit determined that either of two courses of treatment (one included GCS and one did not) were medically acceptable. . . . In summary, Edmo has established that she suffers from a 'serious medical need,'. . . and that the treatment provided was 'medically unacceptable under the circumstances' and chosen 'in conscious disregard of an excessive risk' to her health[.] . . She established her Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference as to Defendant-Appellant Dr. Eliason. . . .We hold that where, as here, the record shows that the medically necessary treatment for a prisoner's gender dysphoria is gender confirmation surgery, and responsible prison officials deny such treatment with full awareness of the prisoner's suffering, those officials violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment."); See also Edmo v. Corizon, Inc., No. 19-35017, 2020 WL 612834, at *1–2, *12-13 (9th Cir. Feb. 10, 2020) (O'Scannlain, J., with whom Callahan, Bea, Ikuta, R. Nelson, Bade, Bress, Bumatay, and Vandyke, J.J., join, respecting the denial of rehearing en banc) ("With its decision today, our court becomes the first federal court of appeals to mandate that a State pay for and provide sex-reassignment surgery to a prisoner under the Eighth Amendment. The three-judge panel's conclusion—that any alternative course of treatment would be 'cruel and unusual punishment'—is as unjustified as it is unprecedented. To reach such a conclusion, the court creates a circuit split, substitutes the medical conclusions of federal judges for the clinical judgments of prisoners' treating physicians, redefines the familiar 'deliberate indifference' standard, and, in the end, constitutionally enshrines precise and partisan treatment criteria in what is a new, rapidly changing, and highly controversial area of medical practice. Respectfully, I believe our court's unprecedented decision deserved reconsideration en banc. . . .Although I am not aware of any other circuits to have directly addressed the questions posed in this case,[9] for its part, the Seventh Circuit has held that it is at least not 'clearly established' that there is a constitutional right to gender-dysphoria treatment beyond hormone therapy. Campbell v. Kallas, 936 F.3d 536, 549 (7th Cir. 2019). Nor is it 'clearly established' that a prison medical provider is prohibited from denying sex-reassignment surgery on the basis of the patient's status as an institutionalized person. . . With this decision, our circuit sets itself apart."); Edmo v. Corizon, Inc., No. 19-35017, 2020 WL 612834, at *13-14, *19 (9th Cir. Feb. 10, 2020) (Bumatay, J., with whom Callahan, Ikuta, R. Nelson, Bade, and Vandyke, JJ., join, and with whom Collins, J., joins as to Part II, dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("Like the panel and the district court, I hold great sympathy for Adree Edmo's medical situation. And as with all citizens, her constitutional rights deserve the utmost respect and vigilant protection. . . . Adree Edmo is a transgender woman suffering from gender dysphoria—a serious medical condition. . . .I respect Edmo's wishes and hope she is afforded the best treatment possible. But whether SRS is the optimal treatment for Edmo's gender dysphoria is not before us. As judges, our role is not to take sides in matters of conflicting medical care. Rather, our duty is to faithfully interpret the Constitution. That duty commands that we apply the Eighth Amendment, not our sympathies. Here, in disregard of the text and history of the Constitution and precedent, the panel's decision elevates innovative and evolving medical standards to be the constitutional threshold for prison medical care. In doing so, the panel minimizes the standard for establishing a violation of the Eighth Amendment. After today's denial of rehearing en banc, the Ninth Circuit stands alone in finding that a difference of medical opinion in this debated area of treatment amounts to 'cruel and unusual' punishment under the Constitution. While this posture does not mean we are wrong, it should at least give us pause before embarking on a new constitutional trajectory. This is especially true given the original meaning of the Eighth Amendment. Because the panel's opinion reads into the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Clause a meaning in conflict with its text, original meaning, and controlling precedent, I respectfully dissent from the denial of rehearing en banc. . . . By judicially mandating an innovative and evolving standard of care, the panel effectively constitutionalizes a set of guidelines subject to ongoing debate and inaugurates yet another circuit split. And by diluting the requisite state of mind from 'deliberate indifference to negligence, the panel effectively holds that—contrary to Supreme Court precedent—'[m]edical malpractice [does] become a constitutional violation merely because the victim is a prisoner.'. . I respectfully dissent from the denial of rehearing en banc.")]]

Hardeman v. Curran, 933 F.3d 816, 820-21 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Plaintiffs here focus on two conditions that they allege violated their clearly established rights: the denial of the minimal amount of water needed for necessary activities of life, and the deprivation of the basic sanitary measure of preventing the build-up of feces, which forced plaintiffs to be surrounded by their own and others' excrement. Both of these claims describe conditions of confinement that courts have long recognized as potential constitutional violations. It has been clearly established for decades that prisons must provide inmates with 'the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities.'. . We have interpreted this general statement as a requirement that prisons provide inmates with 'reasonably adequate ventilation, sanitation, bedding, hygienic materials, and utilities.'. . Wathen argues that despite the generally well-established nature of these rights, the circumstances of this case—a non-total deprivation caused by a three-day planned water shutdown—take us into novel territory. But what is so new about it? All but the most plainly incompetent jail officials would be aware that it is constitutionally unacceptable to fail to provide inmates with enough water for consumption and sanitation over a three-day period. Perhaps an official would be excused for miscalculating the amount of water needed ex ante, so long as he worked to fix the problem once it manifested. But that is not the case before us. According to plaintiffs' allegations, Wathen provided a limited amount of water, he and his staff were quickly made aware that more water was needed both for consumption and for sanitation, and they failed to provide any additional water. Indeed, plaintiffs allege that Wathen punished them for continued water requests. . . . Drawing reasonable inferences in plaintiffs' favor, as we must at this stage, problems caused by limited drinking water may have been exacerbated by the lack of water for sanitation and the consequent exposure to feces and insects. The rights that plaintiffs identify—to have enough water for drinking and sanitation, and not to be forced to live surrounded by their own and others' excrement—are thus clearly established.")

Leiser v. Kloth, 933 F.3d 696, 702-05 (7th Cir. 2019) ("In deciding a question of qualified immunity, the level of specificity at which the legal question is asked is often decisive, and it is possible to be too general and too specific. . . . The district court determined that Leiser had 'a clearly established right to be free from intentionally inflicted psychological harm.' Leiser frames the question differently, as 'whether Kloth subjected Leiser to calculated harassment unrelated to prison needs.' Both of these statements are at too high a level of generality. . . .As we see the case, the issue is whether it was clearly established that Kloth was constitutionally required to accommodate Leiser's specific and unique mental health need based solely on his self-reporting and demands of other inmates, absent instructions from the medical staff. . . . Inmates have long had a clearly established right to be free from intentionally inflicted psychological torment and humiliation unrelated to penological interests. . . .Leiser argues that Kloth had a constitutional obligation to modify her movements around the common area to avoid standing directly behind Leiser after he informed her that this proximity to him exacerbated his self-reported PTSD. However, none of the cases from this circuit he relies upon have facts closely analogous to those here. . . .The cases Leiser cites from other circuits also fail to show this right was clearly established. . . .Because he does not provide an analogous case, we now consider whether Leiser established that Kloth's conduct was so outrageous that no reasonable correctional officer would have believed the conduct was legal. He did not meet this burden. . . .At the time of Kloth's conduct here, it was not clearly established that she was constitutionally required to avoid standing behind Leiser as a result of his self-reporting of a pending (albeit eventual) diagnosis. Such conduct, if intended to provoke a negative response from Leiser, may have been unprofessional and unjustified, but the law did not make clear that it amounted to cruel and unusual punishment. Leiser's claim here implies that prison staff have a constitutional obligation to modify the way they do their jobs based solely on an inmate's assertion that their actions elicit extreme psychological responses. We must recognize the risk that such a rule of law, which would apply without orders from prison medical staff, could create a real danger of inmates manipulating correctional officers for purposes unrelated to their mental health. This would be an entirely different case if Leiser had been diagnosed with PTSD and the medical staff had ordered correctional staff to provide an accommodation for Leiser that Kloth ignored. Generally, non-medical staff of jails and prisons must comply with medical directives, which includes mental health accommodations. . . .Kloth is entitled to summary judgment because Leiser did not establish that he had a clearly established constitutional right to an accommodation of a self-reported mental diagnosis without confirmation from medical staff or existence of a treatment plan.") Doe v. Purdue University, 928 F.3d 652, 665-66 (7th Cir. 2019) ("For the reasons that we have already explained, John has alleged facts that amount to a constitutional violation. But because the defendants have asserted qualified immunity, John can recover damages from them only if his right to receive procedural due process in the disciplinary proceeding was clearly established. . . The magistrate judge did not address qualified immunity because he concluded that John had failed to state a due process claim. The defendants raised it below, however, and they press it again here as an alternative ground for affirmance. John insists that it would be premature for us to address the issue because we are reviewing the magistrate judge's dismissal of his claims under Rule 12(b)(6). As he points out, qualified immunity is generally addressed at summary judgment rather than on the pleadings. . . There is no hard-and-fast rule, however, against resolving qualified immunity on the pleadings. The reason for deferring it to summary judgment is that an officer's entitlement to qualified immunity often 'depend[s] on the particular facts of a given case,'. . . and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not require a plaintiff to include much factual detail in a complaint[.] . . That said, the existence of qualified immunity is not always dependent on factual development—it is sometimes clear on the face of the complaint that the constitutional right invoked was not clearly articulated in the case law. In that circumstance, the existence of qualified immunity is a 'purely legal question' that the court can address on a motion to dismiss. . . That is the situation here. Qualified immunity is a high standard. It protects government officials from liability for civil damages as long as their actions do not violate 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . While the general stigma-plus test is well-settled in our law, . . . we have never applied it specifically in the university setting. Instead, our cases in this area have considered only whether students have a property interest in their public university education—and to this point, no student has success-fully shown the requisite interest. Because this is our first case addressing whether university discipline deprives a student of a liberty interest, the relevant legal rule was not 'clearly established,' and a reasonable university officer would not have known at the time of John's proceeding that her actions violated the Fourteenth Amendment. We therefore affirm the dismissal of John's individual-capacity claims against Rollock, Sermersheim, Oliver, and Amberger.")

Clark v. Reed, No. 18-2120, 2019 WL 2714611 (7th Cir. June 28, 2019) (not reported) ("Even if an oral grievance is protected speech, see Pearson v. Welborn, 471 F.3d 732, 741 (7th Cir. 2006), Clark has not shown that a threat to file a grievance was protected. To the contrary, 'it seems implausible that a threat to file a grievance would itself constitute a First Amendment-protected grievance.'. . Though at least one other circuit has since concluded otherwise, see Watson v. Rozum, 834 F.3d 417, 422–23 (3d Cir. 2016), the right was not clearly established in 2014, when Clark made his threat. It was also not clearly established that Clark's refusal to be an informant, which Clark contends led Johnson to allow the discipline, was protected speech. Truthful speech may be protected, . . . but Clark's rebuff was different from truthful speech. Rather, he refused to cooperate in an investigation, rejecting Johnson's request that he say what he has heard from others, partly because he did not want to 'risk' the consequences. Yet prisons may punish inmates for declining to participate in investigations through polygraph exams, even when they assert a right against self-incrimination. . . Thus, Clark's refusal to cooperate might not be protected. This ambiguity entitles Johnson to qualified immunity.") Goudy v. Cummings, 922 F.3d 834, 843-44 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Goudy's allegations (if proven) describe a constitutional violation: the infringement of the due-process right to obtain exculpatory evidence, in this case through the investigators' concealment of that evidence from the trial prosecutors. Moreover, at the time of these events, this right was clearly established. We see no need to repeat the underlying facts with respect to the video here. We add only that the fortuity that Cummings changed job titles over the period of his retention of the video does not have any effect on our analysis. At the time he allegedly acted to suppress evidence, he was still a police officer, and he was not acting in a prosecutorial capacity when he checked the video back into the evidence room. It was already clearly established as early as 1981 that police could not withhold exculpatory information from prosecutors. . . Nothing had changed as of 1994 and 1995, when these defendants were involved in Goudy's case. The same conclusion applies to the Harvell interview notes. Cummings and Napier urge us to frame the qualified immunity issue regarding the notes as follows: 'whether it was clearly established in 1994 that an initial denial of involvement by a suspect, when that suspect later admits involvement in the crime, is material impeachment evidence such that a police officer can be held monetarily liable for not providing it.' Even on this narrow view of the issue, materiality is easy to see: flip-flops in accounts about the central events in a case provide rich impeachment evidence, and potentially evidence on the merits. In addition, there are problems with the state's version. It cannot be the case that the qualified-immunity inquiry is so specific that materiality depends on the outcome of a trial. If we were to adopt such an approach, we would shield officers from liability for withholding impeachment evidence whenever materiality was a close call (for example, if the police officer felt the overall case was strong enough). Such a shield would be incompatible with the rule announced and elaborated in the Brady line of cases. Even if we were to formulate the inquiry as the investigators suggest, we would need to add something along the lines of: 'when that suspect is the state's star witness, the other identifying testimony contains serious internal inconsistencies, and there is a dearth of physical evidence tying the accused to the crime.' The state's case here was far from a slam dunk. . . It should have been obvious to Napier and Cummings that evidence impeaching the story told by the state's main cooperating witness, in a case with no physical evidence and inconsistent witness identifications, needed to be disclosed. (Notably, trial prosecutors Puckett and Maras-Roberts acknowledged that they would have had to disclose the notes had they possessed them.) Of course, it is still up to the jury to decide whether Napier and Cummings suppressed these pieces of evidence. But if they did, they cannot use qualified immunity to avoid liability.")

de Lima Silva v. Department of Corrections, 917 F.3d 546, 565-66 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Defendants argue that not a single case existed as of December 2014, when Champagne decided to terminate plaintiff, that would have alerted her that this scenario was unconstitutional. We disagree. Plaintiff presented sufficient evidence such that a reasonable jury could find that Champagne terminated plaintiff because of his race and national origin. And if a jury draws that inference, it is of course true that Champagne's actions would violate clearly established law. It is well-established that terminating an employee on the basis of his protected status—including race or national origin—violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Therefore, qualified immunity does not shield Champagne from liability here.")

Lewis v. City of Chicago, 914 F.3d 472, 477 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Lewis alleges that the officers falsely asserted, both in their police reports and in testimony at the probable-cause hearing, that he admitted residing at the apartment where the gun was found and that they found evidence showing that he lived there. Accepting these allegations as true, as we must at this stage, no reasonable officer could have thought this conduct was constitutionally permissible. It makes no difference that our circuit caselaw situated the constitutional violation in the Due Process Clause rather than the Fourth Amendment").

Rainsberger v. Benner, 913 F.3d 640, 652-54 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Benner argues that even if he violated Rainsberger's Fourth Amendment rights, the district court still wrongfully denied him qualified immunity. He concedes—as he must—that it violates clearly established law 'to use deliberately falsified allegations to demonstrate probable cause.'. . Even so, Benner says, he is entitled to qualified immunity if the facts of the hypothetical affidavit demonstrate 'arguable probable cause'—in other words, if a competent officer faced with the facts in the hypothetical affidavit could reasonably if mistakenly believe that those facts were sufficient to establish probable cause. Benner's argument takes some untangling, but its logic is this: (1) only material lies and omissions violate the Fourth Amendment, so the materiality of those lies and omissions must be clearly established; (2) the court evaluates materiality by determining whether a hypothetical affidavit would demonstrate probable cause; (3) if a competent officer reviewing the hypothetical affidavit could reasonably but mistakenly conclude that it established probable cause, then the materiality of the false or omitted information was not 'clearly established.' We have never applied the test that Benner proposes. There is a reason: it doesn't make sense. To begin with, Benner's framing has the proverbial reasonable officer facing a situation different from the one Benner did. Qualified immunity depends on whether it would have been 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . In other words, the court puts a competent officer in the defendant's shoes, facing the same choice that the defendant did. Benner did not face a choice about whether the facts in the hypothetical affidavit established probable cause. He faced a choice about whether to make false or misleading statements in the affidavit. (He has also been faulted for excluding exculpatory evidence, but that presents different issues that we'll get to below.) Thus, the relevant question is what a well-trained officer would have thought about the lawfulness of that action. What Benner is really arguing, then, is that he is entitled to qualified immunity if a well-trained officer could 'reasonably but mistakenly conclude' that it was lawful to include an incriminating lie in an affidavit because the lie wasn't material to the probable cause determination. . . Of course, a competent officer would not even entertain the question whether it was lawful for him to lie in a probable cause affidavit. The hypothetical officer in the qualified immunity analysis is one who acts in good faith. That is what the standard of 'objective reasonableness' is designed to capture. . . .It would be flatly inconsistent with that justification to imagine a competent officer considering the question whether a lie helpful to demonstrating probable cause is so helpful that he should not tell it. That is neither a reasonable question to ask nor a reasonable mistake to make. . . . To summarize: if an officer knowingly or recklessly includes false information in an affidavit and that information is not material, he will not be liable in a § 1983 action because the plaintiff will not be able to prove a constitutional violation. But if that information is material, the officer is not entitled to qualified immunity. The unlawfulness of using deliberately falsified allegations to establish probable cause could not be clearer. . . . And the plaintiff need not show that the materiality of the lie would have been clear to a competent officer. The qualified immunity analysis uses the perspective of an officer acting in good faith, and an officer acting in good faith would not entertain that question. . . . An officer sued for failing to include materially exculpatory facts in a probable cause affidavit is differently situated. It violates clearly established law to 'intentionally or recklessly withhold material information from a warrant application.'. . But while a competent officer would not ask whether the Fourth Amendment permits him to tell a particular lie, a competent officer would—indeed, must—consider whether the Fourth Amendment obligates him to disclose particular evidence. Because an officer acting in good faith could make a reasonable mistake about his disclosure obligation, the materiality of omitted facts, unlike the materiality of false statements, is properly part of the qualified-immunity analysis. We have repeatedly held, therefore, that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by omission only if 'it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that the omitted fact was material to the probable-cause determination.'. . .Here, Benner has not argued that it would have been unclear to a reasonable officer that any of the information that he omitted was material to the probable cause determination. Thus, we need not address whether he made any reasonable mistakes in that regard.")

Neely-Bey Tarik-El v. Conley, 912 F.3d 989, 998-1000 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Here, the district court observed that there was no governing law 'directly establishing that the defendants' conduct in this case, where state officials enforced a ban from participating in religious activities that was put in place by the religious entity itself, violated Mr. [Neely-Bey's] rights under the First Amendment.'. . Mr. Neely-Bey believes, however, that the law 'provided "fair warning" to the defendants "that their alleged [conduct] was unconstitutional."'. . According to Mr. Neely-Bey, the law was clearly established that a prison official cannot deny a prisoner's free exercise rights based on the official's understanding of the tenets of a particular faith. He relies principally on Grayson v. Schuler, 666 F.3d 450 (7th Cir. 2012), and Vinning-El v. Evans, 657 F.3d 591 (7th Cir. 2011), for this proposition. . . . Neither Grayson nor Vinning-El speak to the circumstances before us today. In both cases, the individual inmate requested that his religious belief be accommodated even though that belief was arguably personal to him and more demanding than the ones generally followed by adherents of the religion with which he professed to be affiliated. Mr. Neely-Bey presents a very different situation. He does not ask the CIF [Correctional Industrial Facility] to accommodate a personal belief not required of MSTA [Moorish Science Temple of America] adherents. Rather, he asks that the CIF require the MSTA to accept him as a full member even though his belief system as a declared sovereign citizen differs substantially from that of the MSTA and MSTA liturgical practices require that its adherents share their religious beliefs in the course of their worship services. The MSTA consequently believes that admitting Mr. Neely-Bey as a member would challenge its teachings and, possibly, jeopardize its status. This is the crux of the defendants' position: They maintain that, had they required the MSTA to allow Mr. Neely-Bey to participate as a full member in Friday services, they would have violated MSTA's associational rights. . . .Here, Chaplain Smith and the enforcement officers were required to balance the religious practices of one adherent against the rights of other inmates to exercise their religious beliefs in accordance with MSTA teaching. Neither Grayson nor Vinning-El offers guidance for correctional officers who find themselves in this dilemma. Indeed, there do not appear to be any cases that instruct prison officials on how they should strike the appropriate balance between these competing interests. . . As we have explained previously, '[p]ublic officials can be held liable for violating clearly established law, but not for choosing sides on a debatable issue.'. . The district court, therefore, did not err in granting the defendants qualified immunity on Mr. Neely-Bey's damages claims under the Free Exercise Clause.")

Sinn v. Lemmon, 911 F.3d 412, 422 (7th Cir. 2018) ("The reason the specificity of an inmate's complaint matters is because that complaint is often the only information a prison official has of the treatment or conditions the inmate is experiencing. Failure-to-protect claims are predicated on a prison official's subjective knowledge, though, not just the ability of an inmate to write detailed complaints. . . Framed this way, it is clearly established that a prison official's knowledge of prevalent gang violence, a prior attack on an inmate by gang members, and the victim's fear of a retaliatory attack by other gang members in a new dorm, supported by evidence that related victims from the first attack had already been attacked a second time after being relocated, necessitates that the prison official reasonably respond to abate that risk of harm to the victim. . . Here, it is reasonable to infer that Brush had such knowledge but took no responsive action. It is well-settled, clearly established law that such a failure con-stitutes deliberate indifference. . . Thus, construing all facts in Sinn's favor, Brush is not entitled to qualified immunity, and we reverse and remand the district court's grant of summary judgment on Sinn's deliberate indifference claim as to Brush.")

Horshaw v. Casper, 910 F.3d 1027, 1030 (7th Cir. 2018) ("The district court held that all defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132393 at *19, and defendants ask us to accept that conclusion. But the district judge did not find that the law is uncertain. It is not; Farmer clearly establishes the governing rules. The judge found instead that, because the defendants are not liable at all, they also are entitled to immunity. That's a confusion. Immunity is appropriate when the law, as applied to the facts, would have left objectively reasonable officials in a state of uncertainty. . . The uncertainty in this case is factual. Did Casper or Atchison receive some-thing from Horshaw?; what did the letter to Casper, or the note to Atchison, say?; could the defendants have kept Horshaw safe even if they tried? Atchison himself has told us that, if he had received a note with the contents Horshaw describes, then he knew exactly what he was supposed to do: offer Horshaw protection. The factual disputes may be hard to resolve given the lapse of time and Horshaw's brain injury, but if he is right on the facts then neither Casper nor Atchison is entitled to immunity. (Uncertainty about the limits of supervisory liability after Iqbal and Vance might have supported an immunity defense, but, to repeat, Atchison has not made such an argument.)")

Howard v. Koeller, 756 F. App'x 601, ___ (7th Cir. 2018)) ("Qualified immunity does not shield Koeller. Citing Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 741 (2011), she argues that 'there are no analogous cases that would give [her] notice 'beyond debate' that the First Amendment prohibits [her] from reporting that an inmate provided the name of another inmate within a conduct report.' But that is not an accurate characterization of what Howard alleges. As the Supreme Court repeatedly has admonished, the right at issue when qualified immunity is invoked must be specifically tailored to the alleged conduct at issue, not defined at a high level of generality. . . Howard alleges that Koeller made deliberate misrepresentations in disciplinary reports with the intent to trigger a punitive response from other inmates. Koeller does not argue that a reasonable prison official would be unaware that this deliberate misconduct violated Howard's constitutional rights, so qualified immunity does not protect her.") of a defendant's conduct, the objects of those analyses are different. As we have explained in prior cases, ' "the substantive constitutional standard protects [a defendant officer's] reasonable factual mistakes [whereas] qualified immunity protects [the officer] from liability where [he] reasonably misjudge[d] the legal standard.". . . This distinction allows us to work around the factual disputes identified by the district court by assuming that the Officers knew Martin was severely intoxicated and that cells without upper bunks were available. Making these assumptions, we can properly exercise jurisdiction to determine whether providing a severely intoxicated person access to an upper bunk, in a cell where the lower bunk was occupied, violates clearly established law for qualified immunity purposes. . . .Here, the right at issue is a pre-arraignment detainee's Fourth Amendment right to 'objectively reasonable' treatment. We have explained that this right is assessed with reference to the defendant officer's notice of the detainee's medical need, the seriousness of the medical need, the scope of the alleged required treatment, and police interests. The Estate argues that the Officers obviously violated this right by giving a severely intoxicated person access to an upper bunk. The Officers argue that only analogous precedent could have put them on notice that their conduct was unreasonable, but that no such precedent exists. Examination of the specific context of the Officers' conduct in this case shows that it was not 'egregiously' or 'obviously' unreasonable. Martin's severe intoxication did not necessarily indicate imminent or ongoing danger, such that giving access to an upper bunk was patently unreasonable. Although severe intoxication impairs a person's physical and mental abilities, the level of impairment varies by individual, and it is undisputed that Martin was communicating with the Officers and moving around under his own capacity prior to being left in the cell. Further, impairment from intoxication eventually decreases with time. We and the Supreme Court have required a much higher level of obvious risk to deny qualified immunity based on the Fourth Amendment's general requirement of reasonable conduct with respect to detainees. . . . [Court distinguishes cases relied on by the Estate and concludes that] even drawing all factual inferences in its favor, the Estate has failed to show that the Officers' conduct violated clearly established law. For that reason, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity.") Muhammad v. Pearson, 900 F.3d 898, 901, 904-07 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Law enforcement officers who discover that a search warrant does not clearly specify the premises to be searched must ordinarily stop and clear up the ambiguity before they conduct or continue the search. . . If they do not, they may lose the legal protection the warrant provides for an invasion of privacy and accompanying restraints on liberty. As we explain below, however, we conclude that summary judgment for the officer was appropriate here. Defendant Pearson testified that he did not know there were two apartments, including an apartment 1B, and he has offered undisputed, reliable, and contemporaneous documents confirming his after-the-fact testimony that the address searched was in fact the correct target of the search authorized by the ambiguous warrant. Summary judgment on the unlawful entry claims was correct. Also, Officer Pearson had arguable probable cause to arrest plaintiff Muhammad for suspected drug trafficking, though Pearson quickly confirmed that Muhammad was not the right suspect and released him within fifteen minutes. Summary judgment based on qualified immunity was also correct on that unlawful arrest claim . . . . We approach this illegal entry claim through the lens of qualified immunity and ask whether Officer Pearson's actions violated clearly established law. More precisely, since the district court granted summary judgment for Pearson, the question is whether the undisputed facts show that Pearson did not violate clearly established law. . . .With th[e] qualified immunity standard in mind, we take a closer look at Fourth Amendment law where search warrants have errors or key ambiguities. We have held that officers executing a search warrant can rely on what they know and see independent of the documents to make sure they search the correct premises, at least where the circumstances show there is no reasonable chance that the officers will search the wrong location, meaning a location other than the one the issuing magistrate authorized. . . . Search first, check later, is not a sound policing strategy. Jones teaches that officers need to read the warrant before executing it, and they should call a judge if there is a discrepancy between the affidavit and the warrant. . .This case, however, is different from Jones in a critical way. Unlike the officer in Jones, who knew there were two apartments, knew that the warrant was ambiguous, and essentially took his best guess about which one to search, Officer Pearson testified that when he applied for the warrant he did not know there was an apartment 1B in the building. He also testified that the omission of 'A' from the warrant was a clerical omission. Pearson used his knowledge of the case, including information from his source, to search the correct apartment, the one for which he had probable cause. So Officer Pearson relies on the line of cases cited above that allow executing officers to rely on what they know to make sure they search the correct locations, despite errors or ambiguities in search warrants. The critical question for this case is whether it was proper to resolve Pearson's defense in his favor on summary judgment. In civil litigation about searches that turned out to involve mistakes or ambiguities in warrants, there can be plenty of room for material factual disputes about what the executing officers actually knew and did. Parties and courts can reasonably question the credibility of officers' after-the-fact attempts to explain away their mistakes. Such cases may well present factual issues that require a full trial to resolve. In this case, however, summary judgment was justified. Officer Pearson has offered undisputed evidence, in the form of reliable, contemporaneous documents, confirming that the correct target apartment—the one he intended to search and had probable cause to search—was apartment 1A. The LEADS report (dated the day before the warrant) and the deconfliction submission (dated the same day the warrant was executed) both listed apartment '1A' as the target of the search. Those documents remove reasonable grounds for disputing Pearson's claim that he used his knowledge to ensure that he searched the intended location. This contemporaneous evidence distinguishes this case from others where we held that officers could not have concluded that a plaintiff's apartment was the appropriate target of the search warrant. . . .Given the case law that allows an executing officer to use his or her own knowledge to resolve ambiguities, at least where there is no chance that the wrong location might be searched by mistake . . . and the contemporaneous documentation that corroborates Pearson's testimony, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment. Plaintiffs have not identified a precedent that should have alerted Officer Pearson that he could not proceed to search the apartment that he knew, beyond reasonable dispute, was the intended target.")

Thompson v. Cope, 900 F.3d 414, 420-24 (7th Cir. 2018) ("The plaintiff estate has not cited any cases holding that a paramedic could violate a patient's Fourth Amendment rights by rendering medical treatment. We have found just two opinions allowing such cases to go forward. . . Given the undisputed facts here, we doubt that the reasoning of those cases applies. In any event, the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis is dispositive here, so we decline to decide the first. . . .We have appellate jurisdiction to review the legal issue at the second step of qualified immunity analysis: whether the constitutional right that Heishman's estate asserts was clearly established at the time Cope administered the sedative. . . . [H]ow should courts analyze whether a right is clearly established? The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Defining the right too broadly 'may defeat the purpose of qualified immunity.'. . On the other hand, defining the right too narrowly is equally problematic. That error 'may defeat the purpose of § 1983.'. . The Second Circuit has said that the 'Goldilocks principle' illustrates the 'middle course' between the two extremes—not too broad, not too narrow, but just right. [citing Golodner, 770 F.3d at 206] Can we be more specific? Precedent tied to particularized facts can indicate that law is clearly established, but the Supreme Court does 'not require a case directly on point.'. . 'Of course, there can be the rare "obvious case," where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . As we view this case, the question for qualified immunity is whether it was clearly established in 2014 that a paramedic 'seizes' an arrestee and is subject to Fourth Amendment limits on excessive force by sedating the arrestee—who appears to the paramedic to be suffering from a medical emergency—before taking the arrestee by ambulance to the hospital. It was not. The district court defined the asserted right too broadly. It said that 'officers cannot use excessive force in effectuating an arrest.'. . That 'lofty definition of the right' is just 'one floor down from the words of the Fourth Amendment itself ("the right to be free of 'unreasonable ... seizures'") and two floors down from the highest level of generality possible ("the right to be free from a constitutional violation").'. . The district court's formulation suggests that it tried to treat this case as an obvious one, evident from broad principles in excessive force cases. But we do not think a paramedic (or his lawyer) reasonably familiar with circuit and Supreme Court precedent would have understood that the Fourth Amendment prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures applies to treatment in the field during a medical emergency. Fourth Amendment restrictions are almost wholly alien to that situation, where paramedics are subject to a distinct set of professional standards and goals aimed at responding to medical emergencies. . . The district court's formulation 'defines the qualified immunity inquiry at a high level of generality ... and then fails to consider that question in "the specific context of the case."'. . Neither the plaintiff estate nor the district court cited any case where a court found that conduct like Cope's—administering a therapeutic drug in response to a medical emergency—violated the Fourth Amendment. The cases cited by plaintiff and the district court involved excessive force cases brought against police officers. . . .Qualified immunity exists to avoid or at least to reduce the risk of the kind of catch-22 that would result from accepting the estate's position: treat the arrestee or don't treat him, but face a lawsuit either way. Suppose we put aside for a moment the human and professional ethics and responsibilities of paramedics and police officers when confronting a person in dire straits. Let's focus only on legally enforceable duties. If the officers and paramedic had not responded to Heishman's excited delirium, they could easily have found themselves defending against a deliberate indifference claim for ignoring his obvious and serious medical needs. . . .That dilemma helps to explain why the right the plaintiff estate asserts here was not clearly established under the circumstances. To treat the right as clearly established, the district court boiled away key circumstances of the situation here—especially the fact that Cope was a paramedic confronting a patient suffering from a life-threatening emergency. Those facts take this case out of the realm of clearly established Fourth Amendment law. It was not clearly established that a paramedic effects a 'seizure' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment and subjects himself to an excessive force claim by sedating an arrestee who is suffering from a medical emergency to take the arrestee to the hospital. Defendant Cope was entitled to summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment claim.")

Mitchell v. Kallas, 895 F.3d 492, 499-501 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Dr. Kallas urges that he is entitled to qualified immunity because no binding decision guarantees inmates the right to a speedier gender dysphoria evaluation or short-term hormone therapy prior to release. That formulation, however, frames the right too narrowly. Dr. Kallas has conceded (consistently with other cases) that Mitchell's gender dysphoria was a serious medical need. . . The first question is thus whether a prison doctor would have known that it was unconstitutional never to provide a person with the appropriate treatment for her particular case (and for many others)—hormone therapy. . . Prison officials have been on notice for years that leaving serious medical conditions, including gender dysphoria, untreated can amount to unconstitutional deliberate indifference. . . .Because circuit precedent clearly established that a total absence of treatment for the serious medical needs created by gender dysphoria is unconstitutional, Dr. Kallas may not claim qualified immunity for the denial of Mitchell's request for care. . . .To the extent that Mitchell may be complaining about the length of time it took for the assessment to be completed, as opposed to the lack of treatment, our answer is different. It is true that delays in care for 'non-life-threatening but painful conditions may constitute deliberate indifference if the delay exacerbated the injury or unnecessarily prolonged an inmate's pain.'. . Yet prisons have limited resources, and that fact makes some delay inevitable. For a delay in treatment to qualify as deliberate indifference, we must weigh 'the seriousness of the condition and the ease of providing treatment.'. . As we have said, the serious nature of gender dysphoria is not disputed here. But the ease of evaluating the appropriateness of hormone therapy remains to be considered. There is little evidence about the typical length of these evaluations, either in prisons or in the community. The few courts that have considered this question (some after the events in question) have determined that even longer delays in evaluating an inmate's candidacy for hormone treatment did not amount to deliberate indifference. . . Because Dr. Kallas was not on notice that a 13–month evaluation would violate Mitchell's Eighth Amendment right, he is entitled to qualified immunity on any possible claim of unreasonable delay. That is not to say that this delay cannot be criticized. Far from it. The lack of any sense of urgency, or even of the need for prompt follow-through, is quite disturbing. But on these facts, no clearly established law would have signaled to Dr. Kallas that this delay amounted to deliberate indifference.")

Comsys, Inc. v. Pacetti, 893 F.3d 468, 474 (7th Cir. 2018) ("As an IT specialist, Comsys surely knew that it could acquire its own domain name and set up an email server on its own equipment, for the greatest possible security. Instead it chose to use the City's servers, without any contractual guarantee of privacy. This puts it in a middle ground: it did not consent to the search (expressly or by implication), but neither did it arrange privacy by contract. Clearly established law does not tell us what expectation of privacy a contractor has in such a situation, which means that the appellants are entitled to qualified immunity. ualified immunity protects public employees who do not violate clearly established law. Unless we accept highly general statements—such as 'do not invade reasonable expectations of privacy without probable cause'—as clearly establishing the law when the existence of a reasonable privacy interest is itself debatable, these appellants prevail. We have been told by the highest authority not to take general principles as clearly establishing how novel situations must be resolved. It follows that Mayor Bosman, Administrator Pacetti, and Manager St. Peter cannot be ordered to pay damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.")

Comsys, Inc. v. Pacetti, 893 F.3d 468, 474-76 (7th Cir. 2018) (Gilbert, District Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I join with my colleagues on the Fourth Amendment question. The majority's holding on the First Amendment issue, however, is problematic. . . .The majority then holds that Pacetti gets qualified immunity for his actions because he did not violate any clearly established rights of the appellees. What the majority is effectively saying is that you do not have a clearly established right to report a crime against you or your privately-held business to the police. That cannot be correct. The First Amendment expressly protects 'the right of the people ... to petition the government for a redress of grievances.' U.S. Const. amend. I. This clause has been incorporated against the states through the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. . . .It should be clear that the First Amendment protects your ability to report to the police that you are the victim of a crime. And although the Supreme Court 'does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established,' Kisela v. Hughes, —— U.S. ——, 138 S.Ct. 1148, 1152, 200 L.Ed.2d 449 (2018), there are numerous published opinions at both the district and circuit court levels coming to the same conclusion. . . .There is one final matter: the majority is correct that the Supreme Court continues to move the ball on when law is 'clearly established' for a qualified immunity analysis, but the majority takes this principle too far. My colleagues rely chiefly on Trigillo v. Snyder, 547 F.3d 826 (7th Cir. 2008) to indicate that the right to report a crime against you or your personally-held business is not clearly established at the moment. But Trigillo dealt with a public service administrator trying to ensure that the Illinois Department of Corrections was proceeding appropriately, and when the employee became more concerned with what was going on at the Department, she filed a report with the Illinois Attorney General. . . The employee wrote the report on a department letterhead and signed it as the 'Chief of Procurement.'. . So it should not be a surprise that the speech in Trigillo fell within the scope of Garcetti v. Ceballos. . . considering the speaker was undoubtedly speaking as an employee rather than as a citizen in her private capacity. That is far different from our case, where McAuliffe learned that someone was stealing trade secrets from her privately-held business and reported as much to the authorities. And the fact that McAuliffe's privately-held business had a contract with the city cannot mean that suddenly McAuliffe loses her right to report those computer crimes simply because 'performance of the contract' may be at play. Because it is clearly established that McAuliffe had a First Amendment right to report a crime against herself and her privately-held business to law enforcement, and Pacetti retaliated against her for doing so, Pacetti should not be entitled to qualified immunity on that claim. I respectfully dissent as to the majority's holding on the First Amendment question.")

Broadfield v. McGrath, 737 F. App'x 773, ___ (7th Cir. 2018) ("[A] defendant who is denied qualified immunity at summary judgment may not immediately appeal whether the evidence was sufficient to show a genuine issue of fact for trial. . . And accepting the defendants' argument would require disrupting the district court's conclusion that Broadfield's level of cooperation was sufficiently disputed. Because the court's ruling on this step of the qualified immunity inquiry turns on factual questions, we lack jurisdiction to review this issue. We do have jurisdiction to decide the second step of the qualified-immunity inquiry: whether Broadfield's right to be free from the type of excessive force described by the district court was clearly established. The Supreme Court has stressed that this right must be defined with adequate specificity. Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1151 (2018). The question, then, is not whether the law forbids the use of excessive force, but whether the law clearly established as excessive force the pressing of a non-resisting detainee's neck against the concrete in a manner that prevented him from breathing, carrying him hog-tied to his cell, and severely twisting his wrist in the process. . . In making this determination, we do not require a case be directly on point, but existing precedent must be sufficiently analogous to place the officers on notice that their conduct was unlawful. . . The Supreme Court has held that a pretrial detainee can succeed on an excessive force claim by showing only that the force used against him was objectively unreasonable. . . And our precedent makes clear that the actions of McGrath and Durham were objectively unreasonable if Broadfield was not resisting. . . Thus, we will not disturb the district court's denial of McGrath and Durham's qualified-immunity defense.")

Hurt v. Wise, 880 F.3d 831, 844-47 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Introducing an involuntary confession in a criminal prosecution violates the protection against compelled self-incrimination. . . Vantlin raises two preliminary legal arguments, which if accepted would entitle all three defendants to qualified immunity. First, he argues that Deadra's confession was never introduced against her in a criminal trial, and so she was never compelled to testify against herself. We have already rejected such a cramped understanding of what it means to 'use' a confession against someone in a criminal case. . . It is enough that the statement was used against Deadra in a probable cause affidavit and in a pre-trial hearing. . . .False confessions are a real problem, as both the majority and dissenting opinions in Dassey recognized. . . Even though William and Deadra 'confessed,' if a trier of fact could conclude that the officers knew that the confessions were false, then the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for their actions. . . .We acknowledge, as we did in Dassey, that '[t]he Supreme Court's many cases applying the voluntariness test have not distilled the doctrine into a comprehensive set of hard rules.'. . Nonetheless, when the facts must be taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, and when an interrogation is infected with numerous problems, a full trial may be necessary before a final characterization of the process is possible. This is not the place for an in-depth look at psychological coercion and false confessions, because we are not charged with making the final decision on the admissibility of William's and Deadra's statements. We must decide only whether, taking the facts and inferences favorably to the plaintiffs, any reasonable officer would have known that he was applying impermissible pressure. The district court concluded that the answer to this more limited question is yes, and we agree with it.") [See also Hurt v. Vantlin, No. 314CV00092JMSMPB, 2019 WL 3980759, at *3 (S.D. Ind. Aug. 23, 2019) ("The EPD Defendants also argue that because the law is 'unsettled' for a Fourth Amendment wrongful pretrial detention claim, they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . The Seventh Circuit affirmed this Court's denial of qualified immunity related to William and Deadra's wrongful pretrial detention. . . The Court rejects the argument that the same conduct at issue in their former malicious prosecution claim – which the Seventh Circuit found was not subject to immunity – is magically immune because the claim is now labeled a Fourth Amendment claim. The law proscribing detention in the absence of probable cause, and the inapplicability of qualified immunity for detention in the absence of arguable probable cause, however the claim is labeled, has been settled for years.")]

Kemp v. Liebel, 877 F.3d 346, 351-52 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Before we can determine if the law was clearly established, 'the right allegedly violated must be defined at the appropriate level of specificity.'. .The Supreme Court has expressly rejected over-general formulations of clearly established law in the Fourth Amendment context. . . . In recent years, the Court has repeatedly stressed that Graham and Garner 'lay out excessive-force principles at only a general level.'. . . Thus, the Court held that 'Garner and Graham do not by themselves create clearly established law outside "an obvious case."'. . Here, plaintiffs ask us to define the relevant clearly established law as 'the right of prisoners not to have their religious practices interfered with and prevented absent a legitimate penological basis.' This formulation is too broad. In fact, it simply restates the standard for analyzing prisoners' constitutional claims created by the Court in Turner v. Safley[.] . . . Just as Garner and Graham create a generalized excessive force standard, Turner creates a generalized framework to analyze prisoners' constitutional claims. Both describe a multi-factor reasonableness test used to determine whether a defendant's actions violated the Constitution. Thus, like the Garner and Graham standard, the Turner test cannot create clearly established law outside an obvious case. . . Instead, as the district court stated, the proper inquiry is whether there existed a 'clearly established constitutional right on the part of prisoners to congregate services and study absent appropriate leadership and supervision at the time of an interfacility transfer.' . .Under this framework, it is clear that Liebel is protected by qualified immunity. Plaintiffs cite no case where we held that the Free Exercise Clause provides prisoners the right to group worship when outside volunteers were unavailable to lead or train inmates. Likewise, they cite no case where we held that a prison official violates the Free Exercise Clause by transferring inmates to a facility that does not provide congregate worship and study, or by failing to delay a transfer until the new facility provides congregate worship and study.")

Smith v. Anderson, 874 F.3d 966, 968 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Qualified immunity bars Smith's claim. No court has held that the Fourth Amendment compels the release of sex offenders who lack lawful and approved living arrangements. Brown v. Randle, 847 F.3d 861, 864 (7th Cir. 2017). Thus, when sex offenders lack these arrangements, their continued detention does not violate clearly established rights. In such circumstances, the officers responsible for their detention are entitled to qualified immunity. . . That is the situation here. Indeed, Illinois law requires the Department to ensure that inmates have proper and approved residences before releasing them on parole. . . It also authorizes the Department to hold inmates until it has approved their living arrangements. . . As of his release date, Department had not approved Smith's host site. Thus, Smith's continued detention did not violate a clearly established right.")

Estate of Perry v. Wenzel, 872 F.3d 439, 460 (7th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 1440 (2018) ("The defendants urge us to narrowly define Perry's right. But, in doing so, they are essentially urging us to conclude that because there is no case with the exact same fact pattern, qualified immunity applies. That is not what the qualified immunity analysis requires us to do. Rather, we find that in September 2010, it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment governed claims by detainees who had yet to receive a judicial probable cause determination. . . In 2007, in Williams, we identified the four factors later articulated in Ortiz, and upon which we have relied to evaluate the merits of Perry's claims. And, if by 2010, it was clearly established that an officer or prison nurse's actions were judged by the objectively reasonable standard of the Fourth Amendment, the failure to take any action in light of a serious medical need would violate that standard. Because Perry has met his burden at summary judgment of establishing that there was a violation of his constitutional rights and that that right was clearly established in 2010, his claims must be submitted to a jury for consideration.")

Orlowski v. Milwaukee Cty., 872 F.3d 417, 422-23 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Defendants' construction of the 'clearly established' law at issue here is narrow to the point of meaninglessness. Defendants assert that there is no clearly established right for 'a convicted prisoner to be awoken and told that he is snoring or breathing irregularly' or 'to receive immediate medical attention simply because he is snoring or breathing inconsistently in his sleep.' This inaccurately construes the Estate's claim. We cannot assume the Defendants' version of the facts that Orlowski was only snoring. The Estate provides evidence that Alexander knew, and told Manns, that Orlowski was breathing irregularly, appeared to have a severe sleeping disorder, and could not be woken up. Any reasonable officer would know that these observations indicated a serious medical condition and the law required them to seek medical attention. But, Alexander and Manns instead ignored Orlowski's condition. Because the facts proffered by the Estate could demonstrate a violation of Orlowski's clearly established Eighth Amendment rights, factual disputes prevent a finding that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.") Houlihan v. City of Chicago, 871 F.3d 540, 546-49 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Given the 'considerable uncertainty [that] exists in the area of patronage law,' it is often difficult to prove that a government official violated a clearly established right by considering politics when making an employment decision. . . The reason for this uncertainty is that determining whether it is permissible to consider politics is a highly fact-specific inquiry—one that requires considering 'a wide range of government positions, which in turn involve an endless variety of job responsibilities and varying degrees of discretion and autonomy.'. . Between the low-level government worker (who typically receives protection from patronage hiring and firing) and the confidential employee (who receives no such protection), there are numerous government positions for which the pro-priety of patronage-based employment decisions 'has depended largely on the courts' juggling of competing constitutional and political values.'. . For that reason, 'it is difficult to imagine how any plaintiff ... could have a clearly established right to be free from patronage dismissal unless a nearly identical case had already been decided.'. . .Although the Shakman decrees reflect one of the First Amendment's proscriptions—that is, the general prohibition of patronage-based employment decisions—the decrees are not an edict encapsulating the contours of the constitutional rule; the decrees instead are the result of settlement between the parties to litigation. . . .The evidence shows that a reasonable person not only could debate whether the security-specialist position is a confidential one, but in fact could conclude so. And because the position is arguably confidential, a patronage-based employment decision regarding the position—although illegal under Shakman—does not necessarily entail a First Amendment violation. Accordingly, at the time of the plaintiffs' reassignment, Hillard and Thompson did not have notice that it is an obvious constitutional violation to consider politics when appointing security specialists. Hillard and Thompson are thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Archer v. Chisholm, 870 F.3d 603, 620 (7th Cir. 2017) ("In sum, Garcetti might support either side: Archer, because the defendants were not her employer; the defendants, because Archer's activities were part of her job as a public employee. This uncertainty means that Archer has not shown that her asserted right was 'clearly established'—a stringent standard that demands that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . . [T]he existence of probable cause and the judicial supervision of the John Doe investigation further counsel in favor of finding that qualified immunity applies. No case we have seen has considered how to treat public employee speech that draws the attention of a John Doe judge or a grand jury for purposes of the First Amendment. . . And we know from Hartman that probable cause (or the lack thereof) is relevant to a claim of retaliatory prosecution. . . There is no clearly established rule of law under which an official pursuing a lawful investigation, based on probable cause, has been found liable under the First Amendment to a target.")

Green v. Newport, 868 F.3d 629, 634-35 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Green counters that, while Gentry and Packer may not have expressly proscribed Officer Newport's conduct, these cases provided him 'fair warning' that his conduct was unlawful. . . It is not clear on what legal basis Green asserts this argument, but as we have already concluded, Gentry and Packer are too factually dissimilar to control this case. The inquiry into whether a right is clearly established 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . Green ignores the context of the situation which Officer Newport confronted: the auto store's recent robbery; the 'casing' behavior reportedly carried out by the driver of the Marquis; and the proximity to the store's closing hour. These facts make this case wholly distinguishable from Gentry and Packer, in which officers lacked any information to warrant suspicion of criminal conduct, and consequently these cases cannot provide Officer Newport 'fair warning' that his conduct was unlawful. Accordingly, the district court erred in its determination that Officer Newport's Terry stop violated clearly established law, and we find that Officer Newport is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 552-53 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Walker argues that the Supreme Court's decision in Taylor v. Barkes shows that Clark's rights were not clearly established. . . . Taylor is readily distinguishable from this case. First, Clark's estate is not suing supervisory officials who did not know about Clark's risk. The estate contends that Walker and Kuehn actually knew Clark's risk and disregarded it. Second, in Taylor the Supreme Court reversed the Third Circuit in part because the right at issue was not clearly established in the Third Circuit. Here, the right at issue has long been clearly established in this circuit, as explained above. Finally, Walker argues that the clearly established prohibition on deliberate indifference to prisoners' and jail inmates' risk of suicide is too general to be enforceable for purposes of qualified immunity. Walker urges us to consider Clark's rights at a very high level of specificity: whether a jail inmate had a right 'to be placed immediately on a special watch in a suicide cell despite no outward signs of suicidal ideation during an initial intake assessment, when the intake officer knew that trained medical personnel would conduct a follow-up assessment and ultimately determine the inmate's proper observation and housing status.' This very specific right, Walker argues, 'has never been clearly established by the Supreme Court.' Courts may not define clearly established law at too high a level of generality, . . . but there is no such problem here. The Supreme Court has long held that prisoners have an Eighth Amendment right to treatment for their 'serious medical needs.'. . For purposes of qualified immunity, that legal duty need not be litigated and then established disease by disease or injury by injury. Risk of suicide is a serious medical need, of course. . . .Walker should have taken action based on this knowledge, yet he chose to do nothing. Our precedent establishes that 'particular conduct' such as this violates clearly established law. . . To the extent Walker argues that our prior cases are factually distinguishable from this case, our limited jurisdiction precludes considering that argument.")

Lewis v. McClean, 864 F.3d 556, 565-66 (7th Cir, 2017) ("[W]e reject the defendants' claim that they are entitled to qualified immunity from Lewis's suit. Qualified immunity protects government employees from liability for civil damages for actions taken within the scope of their employment unless their conduct violates 'clearly established ... constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Lewis, we ask whether the defendants violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . In establishing whether a constitutional right has been clearly established, it is unnecessary for the particular violation in question to have been previously held unlawful. . . Instead, we ask whether the 'contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . It has long been clear that deliberate indifference to an inmate's serious medical needs violates the Eighth Amendment. As for whether Cichanowicz and McLean's delay in assisting Lewis ran afoul of that clearly established right, as the discussion above makes clear, when viewed in the light most favorable to Lewis, his factual allegations could demonstrate a constitutional violation. Thus, the defendants are not entitled to immunity from suit.")

Karow v. Fuchs, 695 F. App'x 966, ___ (7th Cir. 2017) ("Public officials are entitled to qualified immunity unless their acts violate clearly established law. See, e.g., White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548 (2017). Neither the Supreme Court nor any court of appeals has held that prisoners are entitled to place advertisements in an effort to attract support for a proposal to change a prison system's policies. To the contrary, many decisions have held that a prisoner's efforts to speak directly to the public at large or to the press are subject to restrictions by wardens and other officials. . . Karow had every right to contact lawyers who might have been willing to help him and to initiate litigation seeking an injunction requiring the prison system to recognize Asatru. By choosing a different route—one that could have entailed gang code, even if it did not in fact—Karow invited a reaction by the prison system. The district court was right to conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from damages.")

Karow v. Fuchs, 695 F. App'x 966, ___ (7th Cir. 2017) (Rovner, J., dissenting) ("Thaddeus Karow placed an ad in a religious newsletter, seeking 'ideas' for how to have his religion recognized as 'legitimate' in the Wisconsin prison system. Officers viewed the ad as a prohibited call for collective action, placed Karow in segregation, and issued him a conduct report. Even though a hearing committee exonerated Karow of violating prison rules, the officers continued to threaten Karow with punishment if he ran the ad again. The majority, in concluding that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Karow's claim that the officers violated the First Amendment, misframes the issue by asking whether prisoners have a clear right to advertise. But it is Karow's message, not its medium, that matters. I view Karow's speech as a request for legal assistance that, because no reasonable officer would believe it threatened legitimate prison interests, was clearly protected speech. I would therefore deny the officers qualified immunity on Karow's First Amendment claim.")

Isby v. Brown, 856 F.3d 508, 529-30 (7th Cir. 2017) ("It is well established that whenever process is constitutionally due, no matter the context, it must be granted in a meaningful manner. . . That said, we must also be cautious about defining the due process violation at issue here 'at the appropriate level of specificity.'. . There is no Seventh Circuit or Supreme Court case establishing exactly that periodic reviews of administrative segregation like those at issue here violate due process. 'However, a case holding that the exact action in question is unlawful is not necessary.'. . After all, prison officials have been on notice since Hewitt that periodic reviews of administrative segregation are constitutionally required, and it is self-evident that they cannot be a sham. Although some appellate courts that have considered this issue have concluded that qualified immunity applied, see, e.g., Toevs, 685 F.3d at 916 ("we cannot conclude that the state of the law from 2005 to 2009 gave defendants fair warning that the [Quality of Life Level Program] review process [for prisoners in administrative segregation] was not meaningful, or that the lack of reviews at QLLP Levels 4 through 6 was a due-process violation"), in the case at hand, the various factual disputes discussed above preclude summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . .As Isby may be able to convince the trier of fact that defendants-appellees have been deliberately giving him meaningless 'reviews,' without any intention of ever releasing him from the SCU, qualified immunity may not apply.")

Gill v. City of Milwaukee, 850 F.3d 335, 341 (7th Cir. 2017) ("The right 'to be free from coercive interrogation' is highly generalized. Therefore, it cannot be the basis for defeating a qualified immunity defense, unless there is closely analogous precedent that is 'particularized' to the facts of the instant case. . . . Gill has not cited, and we have not identified, any precedent from the Supreme Court or this Circuit that puts the unconstitutionality of the officers' conduct here 'beyond debate.'. . When no such precedent exists, we look outside our Circuit 'to determine whether there was such a clear trend in the case law that we can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by a controlling precedent was merely a question of time.'. . Gill relies exclusively on two cases from the Eighth Circuit that he argues clearly establish the contours of the right violated here. See Livers v. Schenk, 700 F.3d 340 (8th Cir. 2012); Wilson v. Lawrence Cty., 260 F.3d 948 (8th Cir. 2001). In both cases, the court denied officers summary judgment after determining that there were questions of fact as to whether the interrogation methods in question violated the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment rights of a mentally disabled suspect. . . In our view, however, these two cases from another circuit are insufficient to establish a 'clear trend' indicating that recognition of this right as clearly established in this Circuit is 'merely a question of time.'. . . This is particularly true in light of our recent holding in Cairel, where we rejected a closely similar substantive due process claim based on the interrogation of a suspect with a cognitive disability. . . There, the officers interrogated the suspect without a lawyer present, despite the fact that they were 'aware of [the suspect's] disability and knew that he might not have been fully able to understand what was going on.'. .In sum, Gill has failed to demonstrate that his right to be free from the interrogation tactics used here is clearly established. There is no precedent that places the constitutionality of the detectives' actions 'beyond debate.'. . For that reason, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Gill's Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment claims.")

Brown v. Randle, 847 F.3d 861, 863-64 (7th Cir. 2017) ("No matter how the Due Process calculus may come out, Brown insists, he had a right under the Fourth Amendment to release as soon as his prison sentence ended. Yet as of 2009, when he was kept in prison, no court had held that the Fourth Amendment entitles a sex offender to release even though it appears likely that, as soon as he steps outside the prison's front door, he will be in violation of the terms of release. Indeed, no federal court has so held to this day. Under the circumstances, therefore, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from damages. And so we concluded with respect to Wisconsin's system of keeping sex offenders in prison until they have a lawful post-prison residence. See Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751 (7th Cir. 2016). In a supplemental brief filed after argument, Brown asks us to put Werner to one side because Illinois and Wisconsin do not use identical systems, and he emphasized the Fourth Amendment while Werner relied principally on the Eighth Amendment. These distinctions are true but beside the point. The core conclusion of Werner is that the federal judiciary has not clearly established that sex offenders who lack a lawful place to live must nonetheless be released from prison. That conclusion does not depend on the particulars of the state systems or the constitutional provision a given plaintiff emphasizes. Brown does not identify any decision of a federal court establishing that sex offenders without approved living arrangements must be released. Instead he states the constitutional rule at a high level of generality (the Fourth Amendment forbids unreasonable seizures) and contends that this suffices. No, it doesn't. As the Justices reiterated earlier this month:

'clearly established law' should not be defined 'at a high level of generality.'. . As this Court explained decades ago, the clearly established law must be 'particularized' to the facts of the case. . . Otherwise, '[p]laintiffs would be able to convert the rule of qualified immunity ... into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.'. . [citing White v. Pauly] Federal courts have not particularized the sort of right Brown asserts, so the defendants are entitled to immunity from liability in damages.")

Catledge v. City of Chicago, 666 F. App'x 558, ___ (7th Cir. 2016) ("That probable cause was so lacking in this case—at least if the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to Catledge—also forecloses the defendants' reliance on their defense of qualified immunity. On this question we disagree with the district court. A police officer loses the shield of qualified immunity if the facts, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, demonstrate that the officer's conduct constituted a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. . . The constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches, including being free from searches of one's vehicle if the police lack probable cause to conclude that it contains evidence of a crime, has been long established. And on this record a jury readily could conclude that Martin and Kappel, who have yet to offer their version of events, knew that they did not have probable cause to believe that Catledge had engaged in stalking or disorderly conduct. Instead a jury could find that the officers searched Catledge's car knowing full well that he had done nothing more than pretend to be engaged in lawful use of a video camera on a public street. The officers argue that they have qualified immunity because there wasn't yet a clear interpretation of the Illinois disorderly conduct statute. Again, they base this argument on Reher's statement that it was unclear what type of 'other suspicious circumstances' would push 'mere videotaping' over the line into disorderly conduct. . . But as we just explained, the officers have not identified any suspicious circumstances, so it is irrelevant that ambiguity may exist regarding the kinds of suspicious circumstances that might suggest disorderly conduct. And as we have noted repeatedly, after the Terry investigatory stop, the officers knew that Catledge was not engaged in videotaping at all.")

Williams v. Hansen, 837 F.3d 809, 810-11 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Williams asserted in his deposition and affidavit that he had ordered the death certificate for use in state post-conviction proceedings rather than to save as a trophy of his crime, and the defendants have presented no contrary evidence to support their assumption that Williams wanted a trophy. And the prison could have avoided this controversy in the first place by holding on to the death certificate except for the short time needed to include it (or indeed just a xerox copy of it) in Williams's court filing. The remaining defendants argue however that even if Williams has stated a claim for relief, they are insulated from liability because the right that he asserts was not clearly established when they violated it. Ashcroft v. Al–Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 735 (2011). Wrong. The right of a prison inmate to read the mail he receives, provided that his reading it would not infringe the prison's legitimate interests, is, as noted above, clearly established.")

Rebirth Christian Academy Daycare, Inc. v. Brizzi, 835 F.3d 742, 746-49 (7th Cir. 2016) ("We. . .begin with the question whether the law clearly established that Rebirth had a property interest in its registration as a child care ministry. We conclude that the answer is yes. This question is not a close one, as the law on this issue has been clearly established for decades. . . . Thus, any reasonable government official would have understood that Rebirth had a property interest in its registration as a child care ministry. . . .Numerous Supreme Court decisions reinforce our conclusion that, because Rebirth was entitled to retain its registration unless it violated state law, Rebirth's ability to operate a registered child care ministry was a clearly protected property right at the time that the defendants revoked its registration. . . .These decisions thus demonstrate that the question whether Rebirth had a protected property interest in its registration was beyond debate. . . . It has long been clearly established that the 'root requirement' of due process is that a person 'be given an opportunity for a hearing before he is deprived of any significant property interest, except for extraordinary situations where some valid governmental interest is at stake that justifies postponing the hearing until after the event.'. . .Rebirth was clearly entitled to a pre-deprivation opportunity to challenge the proposed loss of its registration. We agree with the district judge's assessment—unchallenged by the appellees—'that the interest at stake here, to wit, [Rebirth's] interest in the continued operation of its child care business, is an important one.'. . Moreover, the appellees have not identified any governmental interest that might have arguably justified their failure to provide Rebirth with an opportunity to be heard before depriving it of this significant property interest. The fact that the Bureau did not revoke the registration until two weeks after it gave Rebirth notice of the revocation further undermines any potential argument that the Bureau was responding to some perceived emergency necessitating that it quickly rescind Rebirth's registration without first giving it a chance to challenge the Bureau's allegations. We therefore conclude that, by revoking Rebirth's registration without first providing the organization with an opportunity to be heard, the appellees violated clearly established law and are not entitled to qualified immunity. The appellees argue that the proper inquiry is not whether Rebirth had a clearly established right to be heard before its registration was revoked but whether it had a clearly established right to an administrative appeal of the type available to license holders. We reject this argument. Contrary to the appellees' assertions, this is not a case about 'what amount of process is due.' Rather, this is a case in which due process clearly required some pre-deprivation opportunity to be heard and the appellees provided no opportunity for a hearing, though nothing prevented them from doing so. . . .[A]lthough the appellees are correct that no statutory provision requires an administrative appeal before the revocation of a registration, this does not mean that Brizzi and Gargano are excused from providing Rebirth with due process. True, the statutory scheme did not require that registered child care ministries receive an administrative appeal of the type afforded to license-holders, but neither did it prohibit the appellees from providing registered child care ministries with some type of pre-deprivation hearing. The issue then is whether Rebirth adequately alleged that the appellees personally decided to withhold from Rebirth the pre-deprivation hearing that they could have provided. We conclude that Rebirth's complaint plausibly alleges that Brizzi and Gargano were personally involved in depriving Rebirth of an opportunity for a pre-deprivation hearing, and thus the complaint satisfies the requirements of notice pleading. . . . In sum, we do not decide the type of pre-deprivation hearing that Rebirth was entitled to or that Rebirth shall now recover damages. We conclude only that Rebirth's complaint alleges that the appellees personally violated clearly established law by depriving Rebirth of a property interest (its registration) without first providing Rebirth with any opportunity to be heard. Rebirth will, of course, need more than allegations to prevail on these claims; it will need evidence proving that these defendants were personally involved in the constitutional violation. Given the procedural posture of this case, the district court should, if necessary, provide Rebirth with an opportunity for additional discovery so that it may obtain such evidence.")

Kristofek v. Village of Orland Hills, 832 F.3d 785, 798-99 (7th Cir. 2016) ("We have 'long recognized that an employer may not retaliate against an employee for expressing his views about matters of public concern.'. . . However, we typically conduct qualified-immunity inquiries by focusing on the 'specific context in the case,' rather than on a 'broad general proposition.'. . Nevertheless, 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and in [certain] instances a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . As discussed above, Kristofek has adequately demonstrated that Scully terminated him in retaliation for speaking out about potential political corruption involving senior officials within the police department. In addition, it was clearly established at the time of Scully's actions that the First Amendment prohibited retaliating against a public employee because he had spoken with colleagues and with the FBI about public corruption. [citing cases] . . . .So Scully is not entitled to qualified immunity on Kristofek's First Amendment retaliation claim.")

Figgs v. Dawson, 829 F.3d 895, 905-06 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Fishel contends that 'no clearly established constitutional rule established that [she] violated the Eighth Amendment by failing to recalculate Figgs's sentence in response to his concerns or by referring it to' the chief record office. This argument is flawed because it does not address the broader deficiencies with Fishel's chosen course of action, which we have discussed above. The appropriate inquiry here is whether it was clearly established that Fishel's failure to investigate the substance of Figgs's complaints violated his constitutional rights by requiring him to serve more time than his sentence required. . . At the time Figgs presented his complaints, it was clearly established by decisions in closely analogous cases that the failure to investigate a claim that an inmate is being held longer than the lawful term of his sentence violates the Eighth Amendment if it is the result of indifference. . . While, to be clearly established, 'a right must be specific to the relevant factual context of a cited case and not generalized with respect to the Amendment that is the basis of the claim,' the 'very action in question' need not have previously been held unlawful for a public official to have reasonable notice of the illegality of some action. . . Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Figgs, the evidence supports his claim that Fishel's conduct violated his established constitutional right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Thus, Fishel is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Becker v. Elfreich, 821 F.3d 920, 926-30 (7th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e are not holding the 'bite and hold' technique is per se deadly force. . . Rather, whether a 'bite and hold' technique constitutes deadly force 'depends on how [the dog] is trained to behave when confronting a suspect.'. . .

[B]ased on the record, we cannot say whether the use of the 'bite and hold' constituted deadly force. But the force was clearly force at the higher end of the spectrum, and the government's intrusion on Becker's rights was thus significant. . . . Reading the facts in the light most favorable to Becker, after his mother told him police were there to arrest him, Becker got dressed and started down the stairs within two minutes with his hands above his head. And just two seconds after he released Axel, Officer Elfreich encountered Becker toward the bottom of the stairs with his hands above his head. At this point, Officer Elfreich should have recognized that Becker was not hiding in the house but was in the process of surrendering. Further, when Officer Elfreich saw Becker on the stairs Becker had his hands in full view over his head and kept his hands there even while being bitten by Axel. Becker did not exhibit any sort of aggressive behavior toward Officer Elfreich or anyone else. . . Nor was Becker actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight. Accordingly, while the initial release of Axel to find Becker may have been justified because the officers believed Becker was concealing himself in the house, once it became clear that Becker was not concealing himself, but was actually near the bottom of the staircase about 30 seconds after Officer Elfreich purportedly told him to come down, the force used by Officer Elfreich was no longer reasonable. . . .Under the facts as a whole, it was unreasonable for Officer Elfreich to pull Becker down three steps and place a knee in his back while allowing Axel to violently bite his leg. . . . Case law makes clear that officers cannot use significant force on a nonresisting or passively resisting suspect. Further, as we have often said, 'a case directly on point is not required for a right to be clearly established and "officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances."' Thus, the relevant case law did not need to involve a police dog in order to clearly establish the principle that you cannot allow a dog to violently attack such a suspect. . . .When Evansville police attempted to arrest Jamie Becker, Officer Elfreich released his police dog under the belief that Becker was hiding in the house. However, two seconds later, Officer Elfreich discovered Becker had been descending the stairs to surrender with his hands above his head. Nonetheless, Officer Elfreich continued to allow the police dog to bite Becker, while pulling him down three steps and placing his knee on his back and handcuffing him. And Becker suffered serious bodily injury as a result of the dog bite. While it is unclear from the record whether Axel presented a substantial risk of serious risk bodily harm (and thus deadly force), the force was clearly at the more severe end of the force spectrum. A jury could reasonably find such force was excessive. Further, because it was clearly established at the time of Becker's arrest that no more than minimal force was permissible to arrest a non-resisting, or passively resisting, suspect, Officer Elfreich was not entitled to qualified immunity on this record.")

Alicea v. Thomas, 815 F.3d 283, 290-92 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Applying the Graham factors to Alicea's account, we do not find that Alicea, standing in broad daylight with his hands up at gunpoint and enclosed by a five-foot pool, posed a sufficient threat to Thomas to justify ordering Leo to attack and hold him. The district court erred in holding it was reasonable to command a dog to attack a suspect who had ceased flight, was effectively trapped, and who immediately complied with police orders. . . . We see even less of a basis to grant summary judgment to Officer Alvarez, taking all facts in a light most favorable to Alicea. At the point at which Alvarez first saw Alicea, Alicea's arm was in the jaws of a seventy-two pound dog. Two other officers were already at the scene. A reasonable officer would not think that punching, kicking, and stomping on Alicea was required to control the situation. It is true that Alicea was screaming, but there is no dispute that he was crying for help. . . . Officer Alvarez came upon Alicea when he was already seriously injured. Alicea was agitated, to be sure, but the source of his agitation was clear: he had just been attacked by a dog, and needed medical attention. Alicea testified at his deposition that he was already face-down, on the ground, when Alvarez began to punch, kick and stomp on him. At this point, however loudly Alicea was screaming, under his version of events, he simply did not present a threat that justified kicking, stomping, and punching him. . . . In sum, Alicea's factual account creates a material dispute as to whether Officer Alvarez used excessive force. Lack of medical documentation of his injuries, while potentially relevant to Alicea's credibility, is immaterial to the threshold question of whether Officer Alvarez's use of force was reasonable when the facts are viewed and reasonable inferences are drawn in Alicea's favor. . . . As explained above, we conclude that the evidence, taken in a light most favorable to Alicea, would permit a reasonable jury to find excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. So we turn to the question of whether Thomas's and Alvarez's actions violated clearly established law. . . .At the time of Alicea's arrest, it was clearly established that an officer may not use excessive force against an individual during an arrest. . .It was also clearly established that using a significant level of force on a non-resisting or a passively resisting individual constitutes excessive force. . . Commanding a dog to attack a suspect who is already complying with orders clearly violates the principles set forth in Holmes and Rambo. Punching, stomping and kicking a suspect who is on the ground and seriously injured similarly violates clearly established law. There is a material dispute as to whether Alicea was resisting arrest, both at the moment that Thomas commanded Leo to attack him, and at the moment that Alvarez arrived at the scene of the arrest and removed Alicea from the pool. There is also a material dispute as to the level of force that Alvarez used, described in detail above. . . . It was improper to grant qualified immunity to Thomas and Alvarez prior to a jury determining whether Alicea was, as he contends, fully complying with orders before the defendants used force to arrest him.")

Gustafson v. Adkins, 803 F.3d 883, 892 (7th Cir. 2015)("[T]he Supreme Court and this Circuit had clearly established the right of employees to be free from unreasonable employer searches by the time Adkins installed the hidden surveillance equipment in 2007. Adkins also claims that Gustafson failed to satisfy her burden of setting forth 'existing precedent [that] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . However, a broad constitutional test, such as the O'Connor plurality's reasonableness test, is sufficient to clearly establish the law 'in an obvious case ... even without a body of relevant case law.'. . Because this is an obvious case that presents a flagrant Fourth Amendment violation, identification of a body of relevant case law is unnecessary. In sum, we find that O'Connor clearly established the contours of the Fourth Amendment violation Gustafson alleges. Therefore, the district court properly denied Adkins's motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 831-33 (7th Cir. 2015) (on remand) ("The defendants next suggest that they should be able to avoid retrial because they are entitled to qualified immunity. Their argument is a nuanced one. In their view, the decision of the Supreme Court, resolving a circuit split in its decision in this case, altered the substantive law of liability. Because there was a division among the circuits on the state of the law at the time that they acted, they contend that they cannot be held liable for their actions. Although the matter of qualified immunity was brought to the attention of the Court, its instructions to us make no mention of our returning to this issue. In any event, we do not believe that this defense is a viable one here. . . .[I]n this case, the scope of the right in issue must be drawn more narrowly than the right of a pretrial detainee to be free from excessive force during his detention; instead, we must examine whether the law clearly established that the use of a Taser on a non-resisting detainee, lying prone and handcuffed behind his back, was constitutionally excessive. Here, the facts surrounding the underlying incident are in sharp dispute. When those facts are construed in the light most favorable to Mr. Kingsley, see Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 201 (2001), a reasonable officer was certainly on notice at the time of the occurrence that Mr. Kingsley's conduct did not justify the sort of force described in his account. According to Mr. Kingsley, he was not resisting the officers in a manner that justified slamming his head into the wall, using a Taser while he was manacled, and leaving him alone after use of that instrument. Our precedent makes clear that when the officers applied the Taser to Mr. Kingsley in May 2010, use of the Taser violated Mr. Kingsley's right to be free from excessive force if he was not resisting. . . If we were to accept the defendants' argument here, we would untether the qualified immunity defense from its moorings of protecting those acting in reliance on a standard that is later determined to be infirm. Here, before and after the Supreme Court's decision in this case, the standards for the amount of force that can be permissibly employed remain the same. To accept the defense of qualified immunity here, we would have to accept the dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose. As we have noted, however, the law clearly established that the amount of force had to be reasonable in light of the legitimate objectives of the institution. Accordingly, the judgment of the district court is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.")

Gevas v. McLaughlin, 798 F.3d 475, 485 (7th Cir. 2015) ("On the record before us, construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the defendants were aware that Gevas was in danger of being harmed by Adkins, who was threatening to stab him, and yet did nothing to address that danger other than having previously made him aware that he had the option to refuse housing, be ticketed in response, and have himself transferred into disciplinary segregation. Expecting a prisoner to defy an order in pursuit of his own safety runs counter to the essential nature of incarceration as well as to cases emphasizing the need for order and discipline in the prison environment. . . . A prison official could not logically believe, in view of the duty imposed on him by the Eighth Amendment, Farmer, and other deliberate indifference cases, that requiring a prisoner to violate a prison directive (including his cell assignment) is a reasonable response to a substantial risk of the prisoner's cellmate attacking him. And the defendants may not now find refuge in the doctrine of qualified immunity simply because no case had previously rejected the specific defense that they have creatively fashioned, when the logic (or illogic) of that defense is so at odds with the respective duties that existing case law imposed on prisoner and prison official.").

Davis v. Wessel, 792 F.3d 793, 803-05 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Wessel and Lay contend that they are entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the basis of qualified immunity. . . Wessel and Lay contend that the intent requirement for a substantive due process claim was unsettled at the time of the restroom incident. They argue that a reasonable official could have believed at the time that the Eighth Amendment's 'malicious and sadistic' excessive-force standard applied to a due process claim such as that asserted by Davis. . . They assert that '[t]here was insufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to infer that Wessel and Lay acted with the requisite subjective intent.'. . In making this determination, we must view the evidence in the light most favorable to Davis. . . Viewing the evidence in that light, a reasonable jury could have found that Wessel and Lay knew that Davis could not effectively use the restroom while wearing the hand restraints; they refused to remove the hand restraints despite knowing that Davis was old, frail, and not a security risk while in the windowless restroom; and they laughed at Davis as he urinated on himself and then refused to allow him to clean himself. . . Taken together, these findings allowed the jury to conclude that Wessel and Lay refused to remove Davis's hand restraints for the purpose of humiliating and causing psychological pain to Davis, and not for any legitimate security reason. At the time of the incident at issue, it was clearly established that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited the unreasonable use of bodily restraints in a manner that serves to punish a civilly committed individual. . . . The evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Davis demonstrates that Wessel and Lay violated the clearly established law governing substantive due process claims for excessive use of restraints. Even under the Eighth Amendment standard advocated by Wessel and Lay, the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Davis demonstrates that Wessel and Lay violated clearly established law by refusing to remove Davis's hand restraints for the purpose of humiliating and ridiculing Davis.")

Armstrong v. Daily, 786 F.3d 529, 532-33, 556-57 (7th Cir. 2015) ("[A]t the time of the original investigation, it was clearly established under Killian v. United States, 368 U.S. 231, 82 S.Ct. 302, 7 L.Ed.2d 256 (1961), and then Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963), that bad-faith destruction or loss of exculpatory evidence would violate a suspect's due process rights. Brady made clear that the police and prosecution could not suppress exculpatory evidence. A reasonable police officer or prosecutor would not have concluded that he could instead destroy evidence to avoid disclosing it to the defense. . . . [W]hile there is some disagreement among courts about the conditions for obtaining a civil remedy for destruction of exculpatory evidence, those disagreements do not support a qualified immunity defense. It was clearly established in 2006 that the defendants' alleged conduct of destroying the evidence would violate defendant's due process rights. That is sufficient to defeat the qualified immunity defense. . . .Defendants argue that reasonable officials would not be aware that they violated a constitutional right in these circumstances—destroying evidence that would or could exculpate a criminal defendant detained in preparation for retrial. This argument is built on a basic misunderstanding about qualified immunity. The issue is not whether issues concerning the availability of a remedy are settled. The qualified immunity defense focuses instead on whether the official defendant's conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . . This point is consistent with the way the Supreme Court has repeatedly described the defense of qualified immunity, in terms of whether the defendant official's 'actions' or 'conduct' violated clearly established law, not in terms of whether a defendant should have realized he would be held civilly liable for his actions or conduct. . . . Debate about the need for a trial or conviction goes to the question of injury, which is essential to proving liability but not relevant to qualified immunity. Focusing on the defendants' conduct—destroying a semen stain that had previously tested negative for Armstrong's DNA—it is clear that they had fair warning that this exculpatory evidence had to be preserved. Their alleged actions were objectively unreasonable in defying that command. The fact that their actions were so egregious as to cause dismissal of the charges before a retrial does not protect them from liability for injuries they caused. The district court correctly denied their motion to dismiss on the ground of qualified immunity.")

Doe v. Vill. of Arlington Heights, 782 F.3d 911, 916 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Even though dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) on qualified immunity grounds may be inappropriate in many cases, . . . in some cases it is proper; indeed, we have reversed the denial of qualified immunity at the pleading stage where appropriate, see, e.g., Chasensky v. Walker, 740 F.3d 1088, 1095–97 (7th Cir.2014) (holding that the plaintiff failed to establish a clearly established right and the district court erred in denying the defendants' motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds); Steidl v. Fermon, 494 F.3d 623, 633 (7th Cir.2007) (reversing denial of motion to dismiss plaintiff's access-to-the-courts claim because officials were entitled to qualified immunity). The district court correctly determined that it was not clearly established that calling off another police officer or falsely reporting to dispatch that the scene was clear violates a constitutional right of a victim of private violence. Doe has not shown that it was clearly established that any other conduct or inaction of Del Boccio violated a constitutional right. Even assuming that the complaint alleges that Del Boccio violated Doe's constitutional right, the law was not clearly established such that he should have known he was violating her rights. Therefore, Del Boccio is entitled to qualified immunity and Count IV against him was properly dismissed.")

Beaman v. Freesmeyer, 776 F.3d 500, 509-10 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Beaman argues that Brady 'has been on the books since 1963 and easily qualifies as clearly established law.'. . The withholding of materially exculpatory evidence violates the Due Process Clause. . . He contends that the novelty of the factual circumstance cannot excuse the Brady violation where it is well-established that investigators who withhold exculpatory evidence violate the defendant's constitutional due process right. While it is true that the idea that police officers must turn over materially exculpatory evidence has been on the books since 1963, it certainly has not been on the books since 1963 that polygraph reports are materially exculpatory evidence. That is because in most states, polygraph reports are inadmissible at trial. . .And a few months after Beaman's trial concluded, the Supreme Court decided Wood v. Bartholomew, 516 U.S. 1, 116 S.Ct. 7, 133 L.Ed.2d 1 (1995). In Wood, the Court held that because polygraph results were not admissible at trial, the state's failure to disclose the fact that a witness failed a polygraph test did not deprive a defendant of 'material' evidence under Brady, absent a reasonable likelihood that disclosure of the polygraph test could have had a direct effect on the outcome of the trial. . . .Even if the relevant inquiry was what the Illinois Supreme Court decided, that court's determination in 2008 that the polygraph test could have affected the trial does not answer the question of whether, in 1995, it was clearly established that the officers needed to turn over inadmissible polygraph reports. . . Beaman points to no cases pre–1995 where the Illinois Supreme Court, or any Illinois court for that matter, found that inadmissible polygraph tests, or any other type of inadmissible evidence, could constitute Brady material. Without such a case, it cannot be said that it was clearly established in 1995 that inadmissible polygraph reports were Brady material in Illinois. . . Beaman also argues that it was clearly established in 1995 that evidence inculpating another suspect was Brady material. While that is true as a general matter, Beaman forms the question too broadly. In its broadest form, the relevant inquiry is whether inadmissible information inculpating another suspect could be Brady material. Again, Beaman points to no pre–1995 case from Illinois or the Supreme Court, and we are unable to find one, establishing that inadmissible evidence inculpating another suspect (to frame it broadly) or polygraph tests (to frame it narrowly) is Brady material. During the relevant time period, it was not clearly established that the results of a polygraph test, inadmissible at trial, constituted Brady material. Arguably, it was not until Wood—decided three months after Beaman's trial concluded—that it became clearly established that inadmissible polygraph tests stood any chance of ever being Brady material. The question of whether and when inadmissible evidence can be Brady material remains an open question in many jurisdictions today. . . Therefore we find that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to turn over the Murray polygraph report to the prosecution and Beaman's defense counsel.")

O'Keefe v. Chisholm, 769 F.3d 936, 942 (7th Cir. 2014) ("Plaintiffs' claim to constitutional protection for raising funds to engage in issue advocacy coordinated with a politician's campaign committee has not been established 'beyond debate.' To the contrary, there is a lively debate among judges and academic analysts. The Supreme Court regularly decides campaign-finance issues by closely divided votes. No opinion issued by the Supreme Court, or by any court of appeals, establishes ("clearly" or otherwise) that the First Amendment forbids regulation of coordination between campaign committees and issue-advocacy groups—let alone that the First Amendment forbids even an inquiry into that topic. The district court broke new ground. Its views may be vindicated, but until that day public officials enjoy the benefit of qualified immunity from liability in damages. This makes it unnecessary for us to consider whether any defendant also enjoys the benefit of absolute prosecutorial immunity, which depends on the capacities in which they may have acted at different times.")

Seiser v. City of Chicago, 762 F.3d 647, 658 (7th Cir. 2014) ("At the point that the breathalyzer test was administered to Seiser, a reasonable police official would have believed in light of Carey and like cases that so long as there was probable cause to justify a breathalyzer examination, there was no need to consider seeking a warrant first. By the time Seiser was being processed at the Ninth District, nearly two and one-half hours had transpired since he was seen drinking from the liquor bottle, and an attempt to obtain a warrant, through whatever means, would have portended at least some further delay. Carey suggested that dispensing with a warrant application was a sound course. And as the McNeely decision recognizes, there was a prior division of authority among courts on this very point. . . Conflicting precedents present the very sort of uncertainty as to what the law requires that entitles a public official to qualified immunity.")

Volkman v. Ryker, 736 F.3d 1084, 1090, 1091 (7th Cir. 2013) ("The qualified immunity analysis . . . traditionally involves a two-part inquiry. The first question is whether the defendants' conduct violated a constitutional right. . .The second question is whether that particular constitutional right was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation. . .We may consider the two questions in either order. . . In this case, we begin by asking whether the right alleged to be violated is 'clearly established.'. . .The cases Volkman has put forward demonstrate little more than that the First Amendment right against retaliation, writ large, is clearly established. But this is not so easy a case that citing to a general proposition of law is enough to show that any reasonable official would have known that to restrict or punish Volkman's speech was unconstitutional. . . There are fact-intensive considerations at play, including whether Volkman spoke as a private citizen or in his capacity as a public employee, whether he spoke on a matter of public concern, and whether IDOC had an adequate justification for treating Volkman differently from any other member of the general public. . . The defendants highlighted the weakness of Volkman's effort to show that his rights were clearly established in their response brief, but he did nothing to buttress his position in his reply. As a result, we need not say at exactly what level of specificity Volkman was required to show that his rights were clearly established on these facts; it is enough to note that what he has done is plainly not enough.")

Hardaway v. Meyerhoff, 734 F.3d 740, 745 (7th Cir. 2013) ("As Hardaway admits in his appeal, 'there is ambiguity among various Seventh Circuit cases regarding the proper baseline against which to measure conditions of disciplinary confinement.' Although the district court would benefit from a bright-line rule on the types of conditions and duration of segregation give rise to a prisoner's liberty interest, no such guidance has yet to be specifically addressed by this Court. Hence, even if Hardaway's segregation amounted to the violation of a liberty interest, the Defendants should not be held responsible for incorrectly guessing otherwise due to the ambiguity of the parameters of the law. In sum, the right to avoid disciplinary segregation in a cell with a solid metal door and a confrontational cell mate for 182 days with weekly access to the shower and recreational yard was not a clearly established right in September 2009 when the conduct occurred. Therefore, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hobgood v. Illinois Gaming Bd., 731 F.3d 635, 648 (7th Cir. 2013) ("First, as we have described, the facts make out a violation of Hobgood's right to be free from retaliation for exercising his First Amendment rights. Second, it was clearly established at the time of the Gaming Board's actions that the First Amendment prohibited investigating and then suspending and terminating a public

Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 628-32 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Currie filed her initial complaint on October 14, 2009, naming as defendants various jail officials, Williamson County, Chhabra and Reynolds, and Health Professionals, Ltd. The initial iterations of her complaint alleged that the defendants acted with 'deliberate indifference' to Okoro's medical needs, suggesting a claim that the defendants violated Okoro's due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . At the close of discovery, however, in response to the defendants' motion for summary judgment, Currie argued for the first time that the Fourth Amendment's 'objectively unreasonable' standard should govern. . . . Upon receipt of Currie's revised complaint alleging 'objectively unreasonable' conduct, Chhabra, Reynolds, and Health Professionals filed a motion to dismiss, asserting qualified immunity 'because the Fourth Amendment has not been applied to licensed medical professional[s] subcontracted to care for state detainees.' The court denied this motion. Only Chhabra and Reynolds are before us on appeal. . . . The defendants' real argument is that the Fourth Amendment never governs constitutional claims alleging inadequate provision of medical care to an arrestee by a nurse or doctor, regardless of the defendant's employment arrangement. Although the Supreme Court has provided relatively little guidance regarding the constitutional rights of arrestees and pretrial detainees, . . . this court's cases foreclose the defendants' argument. [discussing cases] The defendants attempt to distinguish Ortiz, Williams, and Sides as cases involving the objectively unreasonable denial of medical care by jailers, not the objectively unreasonable provision of medical care by doctors and nurses. A jailer might violate an arrestee's Fourth Amendment rights by unreasonably denying the arrestee access to insulin, the defendants urge, but a health care professional who unreasonably withholds insulin does not. This argument lacks support in law or logic. . . . True, the named defendants in our earlier Fourth Amendment medical-care cases were 'lockup keepers' (Ortiz and William) and police detectives (Lopez), but from the perspective of the arrestee, it matters not a whit whether it is the jailer or the doctor whose conduct deprives him of life-saving medical care. This is why our Fourth Amendment cases speak broadly of claims involving the 'provision of medical care,'. . . not simply the 'denial of medical care by a jailer' (as the defendants would have it). . . . The defendants next argue that even if their conduct violated Okoro's Fourth Amendment rights, qualified immunity is proper because no previous decision 'applied the Fourth Amendment to analyze the reasonableness of health care provided by contracted medical professionals to arrestees being held by the police in jail.' If there is any lack of clarity in our previous cases, however, it is only with respect to the threshold issue whether the defense of qualified immunity is ever available to private medical care providers like the defendants. . . .The Supreme Court recently considered the question whether 'an individual hired by the government to do its work is prohibited from seeking [absolute or qualified] immunity, solely because he works for the government on something other than a permanent or full-time basis.'. . It held that 'immunity under § 1983 should not vary depending on whether an individual working for the government does so as a full-time employee, or on some other basis.'. . On the other hand, the Filarsky Court reaffirmed the holding of Richardson categorically rejecting immunity for the private prison employees there; in so doing, the Court emphasized that the incentives of the private market suffice to protect employees when 'a private firm, systematically organized to assume a major lengthy administrative task ... for profit and potentially in competition with other firms,' assumes responsibility for managing an institution. . . In a detailed opinion tracking the Court's analysis in Filarsky, the Sixth Circuit recently held that a doctor providing psychiatric services to inmates at a state prison is not entitled to assert qualified immunity. McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir.2012) (discussing the historical roots of immunity for similarly situated parties and the history and purpose of § 1983); see also Hasher v. Hayman, 2013 WL 1288205 (D.N.J. Mar. 27, 2013) (private medical employees failed to establish that they are entitled to assert a qualified immunity defense, 'even after Filarsky'). We find the Sixth Circuit's reasoning persuasive, though we need not definitively decide the issue today; even if our defendants were entitled to seek qualified immunity as a general matter, we would conclude that the defense is not applicable here. The contours of Okoro's Fourth Amendment rights were 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right' throughout the period of Okoro's detention. . . . As we already have explained, nothing in our opinions hints at some special Fourth Amendment exemption for health care professionals . . . . It was 'quite clear' in 2004, we said, 'that the Fourth Amendment protects a person's rights until she has had a probable cause hearing.'. . It was no less clear in December 2008, when Okoro collapsed in his cell, that the same Fourth Amendment standard applies to the wrongdoing alleged here.")

Chrzanowski v. Bianchi, 725 F.3d 734, 742, 743 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Given our rationale in the Fairley line of cases, we have little trouble concluding that reasonable officials in the defendants' shoes would understand that retaliating against Chrzanowski for giving truthful grand jury and trial testimony would violate the First Amendment. . . . Defendants point out that Morales involved testimony in the civil context, whereas this case involves testimony in criminal proceedings, but this is a distinction without a difference: providing eyewitness testimony regarding potential wrongdoing, civil or criminal, was never 'part of what [Chrzanowski] was employed to do.' Chrzanowski's rights were clearly established at all relevant times.")

Humphries v. Milwaukee County, 702 F.3d 1003, 1004, 1007 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Although Humphries maintains that the denial of her application violated her right to due process, we agree with Muniz and his supervisor that qualified immunity protects them from any liability for this decision. They had no involvement whatsoever in the investigation or determination of the 1988 finding of substantiated abuse, and no case law clearly establishes that they violated Humphries's constitutional rights when they relied on that finding to deny her child care provider renewal application. Therefore, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Muniz and his supervisor on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . None of the case law to which Humphries points holds that persons without a role in the abuse determination may not later rely on such a determination without first independently ensuring the determination was made in accordance with due process.")

Betker v. Gomez, 692 F.3d 854, 864 (7th Cir. 2012) ("The question is whether, at the time of the violation in this case, a 'reasonably well-trained police officer would have known that the arrest was illegal.'. . In 1985, we held in Olson that immunity does not extend '[w]here the judicial finding of probable cause is based solely on information the officer knew to be false or would have known was false had he not recklessly disregarded the truth.'. . In 1992, in Juriss v. McGowan, we stripped an officer of qualified immunity where only his false and misleading statements provided probable cause to arrest a woman for aiding a fugitive. . . We reiterated this point in Knox, 342 F.3d at 658 ('We have held in previous cases that a warrant request violates the Fourth Amendment if the requesting officer knowingly, intentionally, or with reckless disregard for the truth, makes false statements in requesting the warrant and the false statements were necessary to the determination that a warrant should issue.'). And this principle has been firmly established in the criminal context since the Supreme Court decided Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978). . . . In the civil context, the plaintiff need only 'point to a closely analogous case decided prior to the challenged conduct in order to defeat qualified immunity.'. . We think there are plenty. So Officer Gomez is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.")

Levin v. Madigan, 692 F.3d 607, 622 (7th Cir. 2012), cert. dismissed as improvidently granted by Madigan v. Levin, 134 S. Ct. 2 (2013) ("Because the ADEA does not preclude Levin's § 1983 equal protection claim, we now turn to the issue of qualified immunity. . . . At the time of the alleged wrongdoing, it was clearly established that age discrimination in employment violates the Equal Protection Clause. . . Although age is not a suspect classification, states may not discriminate on that basis if such discrimination is not 'rationally related to a legitimate state interest.'. . Whether or not the ADEA is the exclusive remedy for plaintiffs suffering age discrimination in employment is irrelevant, and as Judge Chang noted, it is 'odd to apply qualified immunity in the context where the procedural uncertainty arises from the fact that Congress created a statutory remedy for age discrimination that is substantively broader than the equal protection clause.'. . Because Levin's constitutional right was clearly established, the Individual Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Estate of Miller, ex rel. Bertram v. Tobiasz, 680 F.3d 984, 991 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Having established that plaintiff has alleged facts that, if proven, show the defendants violated a constitutional right, we must evaluate whether they would be entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis; that the constitutional right must be clearly established. The defendants urge this Court to apply a very high threshold for this prong. They argue for an examination of this prong in such a specific manner that virtually nothing besides intentionally harmful actions could be 'clearly established.' Under defendants' analysis, for a right to be clearly established there must be precedent holding that a prisoner has a constitutional right specific to the conduct alleged. However, the cases in this circuit have understood the term 'right' in a broader sense. For example, in Cavalieri v. Shepard, we stated that the right that Cavalieri was asserting is 'the right to be free from deliberate indifference to suicide.' 321 F.3d 616, 623 (7th Cir.2003) (citing Hall v. Ryan, 957 F.2d 402, 406 (7th Cir.1992). Here, plaintiff asserts the same right. We therefore conclude that that right was clearly established in 2009 as it was in 1998.")

Grayson v. Schuler, 666 F.3d 450, 451, 455 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Inmates' complaints that prison authorities have infringed their religious rights commonly include a claim under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc et seq., which confers greater religious rights on prisoners than the free exercise clause has been interpreted to do. . . The plaintiff doesn't mention the Act, but he is proceeding pro se and in such cases we interpret the free exercise claim to include the statutory claim. . . But the Act can no longer do him any good. Although his complaint is none too clear, he appears to be seeking damages against the defendant in both the latter's official capacity and his personal capacity, and the former claim is barred by the state's sovereign immunity, Sossamon v. Texas, 131 S.Ct. 1651, 1658–61 (2011); Vinning–El v. Evans, 657 F.3d 591, 592 (7th Cir.2011), and the latter claim cannot be based on the Act because the Act does not create a cause of action against state employees in their personal capacity. . . It does authorize injunctive relief, which the plaintiff initially sought along with damages, but he's since been released from prison, so his injunctive claim is moot and he is left with his personal-capacity damages claim under section 1983. . . . Since, however, '[qualified] immunity protects public employees who make reasonable errors in applying even clearly established law,' Vinning–El v. Evans, supra, 657 F.3d at 594, the defendant is entitled to immunity if he committed a reasonable error in failing to apply clearly established law—that is, if he reasonably thought the plaintiff insincere in his religious belief, or a security threat. But there is no suggestion that the defendant ordered the plaintiff's dreadlocks shorn because of a reasonable belief in either of these possibilities. He seems just to have been applying the Rastafarian exception, which could not reasonably be thought constitutional. So neither on substantive nor immunity grounds can the grant of summary judgment be upheld. The judgment is reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Surita v. Hyde, 665 F.3d 860, 873, 874 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Here, Hyde's purpose in silencing Surita is apparent from his words at the city council meeting: he demanded that Surita apologize to Figueroa before he would be allowed to speak. A reasonable person in January 2004 would have known that silencing Surita for that purpose was constitutionally impermissible. Thus, the denial of qualified immunity on this theory is affirmed. . . . Recently, in Greene v. Doruff, 660 F.3d 975 (7th Cir.2011), we addressed the tension in our cases between motivating-factor causation and but-for causation, clarifying that First Amendment cases are governed not by Gross but by Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977). Greene, 660 F.3d at 977. We noted that Spiegla and Fairley are correct to an extent because the burden of proof relating to causation is divided between the parties in First Amendment cases. . . To meet the prima facie burden regarding causation in a First Amendment case, a plaintiff needs to show only that the defendant's conduct was a motivating factor, i.e., a 'sufficient factor,' meaning when something present makes something else bound to happen. . . The defendant can then rebut that showing, but only by establishing that his or her conduct was not a but-for or 'necessary condition' of the harm, i.e., that the harm would have occurred anyway. . . .Thus, Judge Shadur was not wrong in referencing a burden-shifting test that included a plaintiff's burden to show a motivating factor. Moreover, at the summary judgment stage the burden-shifting test is used to determine whether a plaintiff makes it to trial. Even as we stated in Fairley, if evidence exists upon which a reasonable jury could find but-for causation, no more is necessary to overcome a defendant's summary judgment motion. Here, viewing the facts in Surita's favor, his speech at the Belvidere Mall was protected. Hyde argues that he was not motivated to suppress Surita's point of view but only the threatening manner in which Surita's view was delivered. However, Hyde's comments during the city council meeting indicate that Surita was silenced to induce him to apologize for the Belvidere Mall speech; by Hyde's own words, excluding Surita from speaking was a reaction to what Surita said at the Belvidere Mall. Thus, Hyde's comments at the meeting provide evidence that the Belvidere Mall speech was the cause (whether motivating or but-for) that prevented Surita from expressing his views at the city council meeting. Even before January 2004 an official's act taken in retaliation for the exercise of free speech under the First Amendment was recognized to violate the Constitution. Vukadinovich and Abrams, decided in 2002, made clear that Hyde could not retaliate against someone for protected First Amendment speech, whether acting pursuant to a but-for motive or a substantially motivating one. Hence, a reasonable official in January 2004 would have known he could not retaliate.")

Hernandez ex rel. Hernandez v. Foster, 657 F.3d 463, 486, 487 (7th Cir. 2011) ("At the time of Jaymz's removal, our case law did not put a reasonable DCFS investigator, supervisor, or manager on notice that removing Jaymz without a pre-deprivation hearing violated the plaintiffs' clearly established procedural due process rights. Jensen had indicated that the removal was lawful as long as there was probable cause to believe that Jaymz would be subject to the danger of abuse if not removed, and a post-deprivation hearing was held within two business days. We have concluded that a reasonable DCFS worker could have believed there was probable cause to remove Jaymz. . . . . [T]he defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the due process claim arising from Jaymz's initial removal. But the process due with respect to the allegedly coerced safety plan is another matter. Due process 'requires that government officials not misrepresent the facts in order to obtain the removal of a child from his parents.'. . This conclusion applies equally in the context of obtaining parental consent to a restrictive safety plan. Under Dupuy, the state may not threaten to infringe parental custody rights when the state has no legal right to carry through on the threat. . . If Foster misrepresented the facts and Crystelle's and Joshua's legal rights in order to obtain their consent to the safety plan, their agreement to the safety plan was not voluntary and they were illegally coerced into signing the plan. Hence, they would have been denied due process. . . The plaintiffs have created a triable issue as to whether a reasonable parent in their situation would have felt free to refuse to sign the safety plan. Therefore, they have enough evidence to raise a genuine issue as to whether they were coerced into agreeing to the safety plan.")

Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 538, 539 (7th Cir. 2011) ("In light of our decision to reverse the grant of summary judgment in favor of the seven defendants mentioned above, we must address the defendants' qualified immunity defense. They argue that the uncertainty over whether the 'deliberate indifference' or 'objectively unreasonable' standard governs the medical care claim entitles them to qualified immunity. They argue that until 2007, when we decided Williams v. Rodriguez, 509 F.3d 392 (7th Cir. 2007), and Sides v. City of Champaign, 496 F.3d 820 (7th Cir.

2007), no decision had applied the Fourth Amendment to analyze the reasonableness of the provision of medical care to arrestees. While that may be true, we have long held that the Fourth Amendment protects a person's rights until she has had a probable cause hearing. . . The multifactor test announced in Sides and clarified in Williams was unannounced at the time of Molina's death, yet it was quite clear that the Fourth Amendment applied to her stage of the criminal process. But even if we were to assume that the standard we have applied in this case was not clearly established at the time Molina died, the outcome of this case would be unaffected. To survive summary judgment, Ortiz would then be required to satisfy the more stringent deliberate indifference standard. This, however, is not a case that turns on the difference between the two standards. Ortiz's argument, if credited by a jury, satisfies the deliberate indifference standard because she argues that defendants were subjectively aware that Molina had a serious medical condition that needed care and they failed to respond adequately. . . The defendants do not argue that Molina did not suffer from an objectively serious medical condition. The question is only whether the officers' failure to act was not only negligent, but deliberately indifferent. Yet it is well settled that providing no medical care in the face of a serious health risk constitutes deliberate indifference. . . This is not a case where prison officials provided substandard medical care and we must decide whether they crossed the line from medical malpractice (negligence) to deliberate indifference (recklessness). Ortiz's claim is that each of the defendants knew that Molina suffered from a serious medical condition, yet they failed to take any step in response. At this stage, she has done enough to defeat summary judgment even if the higher standard applied. We therefore conclude that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Ammons v. Washington Dept. of Social and Health Services, 648 F.3d 1020, 1026-34 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Courts are given the discretion to decide 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.'. . Here, it is difficult to assess whether the facts alleged by Ammons establish the alleged constitutional violation without setting forth the governing law. Therefore, we first examine the clearly established law with respect to the alleged Fourteenth Amendment violation, and then determine whether the facts before us support such a violation. . . .[A]t the time the events alleged in this case took place, it was clearly established that LaFond and Webster, as state officials, had a duty to exercise professional judgment to provide safe conditions for Ammons and the other patients at CSTC. . . .In light of the clearly established law that hospital officials must provide safe conditions for involuntarily committed patients, we now examine the circumstances under which state hospital officials may be held responsible for failing to do so. . . . Youngberg and Neely serve as pre-existing, clearly established law as to what conduct supports infringement of the Fourteenth Amendment rights of involuntarily committed hospital patients. At the time of the alleged events, then, it was clear that the actions of LaFond and Webster violated the Constitution if they ran afoul of the objective Youngberg professional judgment standard as applied in Neely. . . . Under Neely, a jury could find that a reasonable administrator, exercising professional judgment with respect to providing safe conditions, would have taken Resident A's allegation into account when assigning and supervising staff members in cottages where female patients resided. While LaFond had no cause to discipline Grant, because he had been exonerated of the molestation charge, she certainly had reason, in light of her duties with respect to the safety of her patients, to manage and monitor his duties more carefully. Instead, LaFond allowed Grant to gain unfettered and unmonitored access to the female residents, and to spend time with them on a one-on-one basis. . . . We hold that, under the facts alleged and produced, LaFond's apparent inaction and poor supervision with respect to the safety of Ammons and the other female patients support a finding that she failed to exercise professional judgment, and thereby violated the Fourteenth Amendment."[footnotes omitted])

Florek v. Village of Mundelein, Ill., 649 F.3d 594, 601(7th Cir. 2011) ("Florek points to no case where a court has held that police acted unreasonably when they summoned emergency medical personnel instead of supplying non-prescription medication to an arrestee, nor has she pointed to other authority that might help her in making the argument. We located no helpful authority on her behalf, and a straightforward application of our precedent militates against her position. Thus, summary judgment on the merits was appropriate as to Hansen, and that means that judgment for the Village was proper as well.")

Vodak v. City of Chicago, 639 F.3d 738, 746, 747 (7th Cir. 2011) ("The underlying problem is the basic idiocy of a permit system that does not allow a permit for a march to be granted if the date of the march can't be fixed in advance, but does allow the police to waive the permit requirement just by not prohibiting the demonstration. . . The defendants' lawyer at oral argument was unable to come up with a reason for such a rule. As a result not of the rule itself but of the failure to plug the hole in it, the police did not know what the route of the march would be and, reacting ad hoc and perhaps in some panic, resorted to mass arrests without justification. Or so at least a trier of fact could find on the record compiled to date. The district judge ruled that it was not clearly established law on March 20, 2003, that police cannot upon revocation of a permit arrest any demonstrator who does not immediately cease demonstrating and leave the scene. If this is right, then the judge's ruling that the police are protected by the doctrine of qualified immunity from liability in damages to any demonstrator or suspected demonstrator who was arrested is also right. But the premise is wrong. The Supreme Court had held decades earlier that police must give notice of revocation of permission to demonstrate before they can begin arresting demonstrators. . .No precedent should be necessary, moreover, to establish that the Fourth Amendment does not permit the police to say to a person go ahead and march and then, five minutes later, having revoked the permission for the march without notice to anyone, arrest the person for having marched without police permission. . . . So this is one of those cases in which a defense of immunity would fail even in the absence of a precedent that had established the illegality of the defendants' conduct. . .The absence of a reported case with similar facts may demonstrate nothing more than widespread compliance with well-recognized constitutional principles.")

Roe v. Elyea, 631 F.3d 843, 859, 861 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Dr. Elyea inaugurated a protocol for hepatitis C treatment that categorically required that all candidates for antiviral therapy–despite their particular genotype–have at least two years left on their sentence. This categorical rule, the plaintiffs submit, deprived them of necessary treatment that would have been effective. This rule was grounded, they further contend, in consideration of administrative convenience rather than medical effectiveness. . . . The evidence permitted, although it did not compel, the jury to conclude that Dr. Elyea's policy prevented treating physicians from exercising any professional judgment as to whether to commence interferon treatment for inmates who could complete the prescribed course of treatment during the remaining period of their incarceration. Mr. Roe's records reflect that on several occasions his physicians identified him as not a candidate for treatment because of the policy. . . Under these circumstances, we believe that the district court properly denied, each time it was presented, Dr. Elyea's invocation of qualified immunity.")

Purvis v. Oest, 614 F.3d 713, 721 (7th Cir. 2010) ("There is no case law of the U.S. Courts of Appeals or Supreme Court of which we are aware that demonstrates that Purvis's constitutional rights would have been violated by reporting her to a body that would perform an independent investigation before effecting a deprivation. . . . It was clearly established that due process was denied by the introduction of a fundamental conflict of interest into the investigative process. But it was not clearly established that such a procedural defect violated the Constitution if whatever conclusion eventuated was subject to confirmation and validation by a subsequent independent investigation.")

T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583, 590 (7th Cir. 2010) ("Grindle argues that because none of our decisions have explicitly adopted Stoneking, it cannot be considered clearly established for the purpose of qualified immunity. Grindle's argument misses the mark. . . . While district court decisions alone do not clearly establish a right for the purpose of qualified immunity, the number and unanimity of these decisions, combined with our circuit-level precedent, show that a reasonable school principal would have concluded that she could be held liable for turning a blind eye to and affirmatively covering up evidence of child sexual abuse by one of her teachers.").

Catlin v. City of Wheaton, 574 F.3d 361, 369 (7th Cir. 2009) ("If there is a legitimate question as to the existence of the right at issue, then qualified immunity attaches. . . In the present case, even if the defendants had consulted a casebook prior to formulating their plan, they still would not have had fair notice that they had a constitutional obligation to announce their identity prior to completing [an] arrest [in a public place].")

Narducci v. Moore, 572 F.3d 313, 322, 323 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Although there was "no square holding addressing whether recording an employee's phone calls violates his Fourth Amendment rights," court holds Ait was sufficiently clear that government employees enjoyed a reasonable expectation of privacy in the workplace to preclude qualified immunity.").

Matrisciano v. Randle, 569 F.3d 723, 730, 731, 735, 736 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Although we ultimately decide this case on account of the failure to meet the 'clearly established' requirement, some examination of the alleged constitutional right that was violated is helpful in understanding whether such a right was clearly established at the relevant time. Matrisciano argues that the defendants retaliated against him, in a manner contrary to the protections guaranteed by the First Amendment, by reassigning him after he testified before the Prisoner Review Board in support of Aleman's release. . . . Matrisciano voluntarily testified before the Board on a day that he took off from work. His job description does not hint at voluntary testimony before the Board. In short, we find no evidence that Matrisciano spoke to the Board pursuant to his official duties, and the defendants do not argue otherwise. . . .In these particular circumstances, the law at the time was not such that reasonable officials would know that transferring Matrisciano after his testimony before the Board was unlawful. . . . This is also not an obvious case. Aleman was an infamous prisoner known to have bribed a government official, and an Assistant Deputy Director in the Department of Corrections voluntarily made his first Prisoner Review Board comments on behalf of that inmate, without any special knowledge of the inmate's daily behavior in custody. None of the cases to which Matrisciano points put the defendants on notice that reassigning him as a result of this testimony violated the Constitution.").

Carvajal v. Dominguez, 542 F.3d 561, 569, 570 (7th Cir. 2008) ("The district court reached the second step of qualified immunity analysis in concluding that the obligation to disclose impeaching or exculpatory information would have been clear to a reasonable law enforcement officer. Given our conclusion that no Brady violation occurred here, we do not need to evaluate that aspect of the ruling. Nonetheless, a more careful examination of this question should have produced a different result. The question at this step, if reached, would not be whether a law enforcement officer would clearly know that he had to disclose impeaching or exculpatory information. That assumed the result. Rather, the question should have been whether it was clear that a law enforcement officer would have been expected to disclose whether he had seen a photo of a suspect before he went to a potentially dangerous undercover meeting with that individual. As noted, good police practices and common sense would suggest that an officer ought to prepare in that way. We are aware of no case which clearly indicates, or even hints, for that matter, that a law enforcement officer would be expected to disclose that he had undertaken such preparation. It is about the equivalent of strapping on a concealed weapon or reviewing a suspect's prior criminal history before attending such an undercover encounter. Unless clear guidance is given that such a practice must be disclosed as potentially impeaching or exculpatory, the broad protection of qualified immunity should protect a law enforcement officer from liability for failure to mention viewing a suspect's photo before meeting with him.").

Lee v. Young, 533 F.3d 505, 512 (7th Cir. 2008) ("While we agree with the district court's overall disposition of the case, we pause to note that we explicitly do not affirm its rulings regarding qualified immunity . . . . The district court concluded, in error, that no factually similar cases were on point, and so the contours of the right at issue were not clearly defined. In Alvarado v. Litscher, 267 F.3d 648, 653 (7th Cir.1999), we explicitly held that '[g]iven the decision in Helling, the right of a prisoner to not be subjected to a serious risk of his future health resulting from ETS was clearly established in 1998-99.' Since this right was clearly established in 1998-1999, it was also clearly established during the relevant period of time here, 2001-2002. Nevertheless, the district court did not have to rule on the issue of qualified immunity, and neither do we, since the first prong of the

Michael C. v. Gresbach, 526 F.3d 1008, 1017, 1018 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Considering the facts above in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, we find that a reasonable child welfare worker would have known that conducting a search of a child's body under his clothes, on private property, without consent or the presence of any other exception to the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment, is in direct violation of the child's constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches. Gresbach argues that Heck is distinguishable from this case, because Heck did not address the issue of scope of consent in the context of child abuse investigations. However, a general constitutional rule already identified may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful. . . . At the time Gresbach conducted the searches at Good Hope in 2004, there was a clearly established doctrine as to what actions a Bureau caseworker must take when conducting a child abuse investigation at a private school. Today we reiterate Heck's definitive holding, along the lines of the Fourth Amendment principles outlined above, that it is a violation of a child's constitutional rights to conduct a search of a child at a private school without a warrant or probable cause, consent, or exigent circumstances.").

Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 802, 803 (7th Cir. 2008) ("RLUIPA was enacted on September 22, 2000. . . Koger filed his requests for a non-meat diet in May 2001, December 2001, and April 2002. His internal grievance was filed in January 2002. Because of the dearth of cases dealing with RLUIPA during this period, Koger must show that RLUIPA itself, or principles established in other contexts and applicable to RLUIPA, established the contours of his rights so that a reasonable official could have easily discerned them. There are numerous reasons leading us to conclude that the rights protected by RLUIPA, and violated by the prison officials as set forth above, were clearly established during the period the prison officials denied Koger's dietary requests. First, RLUIPA did not announce a right having broad application across many segments of society. Rather, it prohibited substantially burdening religious exercise in only two contexts: by land use regulation, 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc, or while a person is imprisoned. 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1. Moreover, RLUIPA did not announce a new standard, but shored up protections Congress had been attempting to provide since 1993 by means of the RFRA, and which had seen frequent litigation in the prison context. . . Aside from the fact that RLUIPA employs a standard already contained in the RFRA, it is noteworthy that the components of its analysis have been used in constitutional litigation for some time. For example, the difficult burden laid on a defendant who must show that its conduct was the 'least restrictive means of achieving some compelling state interest' has been established for decades. . . Similarly, the prohibition against substantially burdening sincerely held religious beliefs is well-established in Free Exercise Clause cases. . . RLUIPA has a broader scope of protection than 'central religious beliefs or practices,' but Congress cleared up any resulting ambiguity by expressly setting forth what is included within that broader protective scope–'any exercise of religion, whether or not compelled by, or central to, a system of religious belief.'. . While the case will undoubtedly arise where a plaintiff asserts a right only questionably covered by RLUIPA, Koger asserted the right to religious accommodation for a religious practice demonstrably associated with, though not compelled by, his religion. The prison officials violated this clearly established right because they required exactly what RLUIPA provides they cannot–a religious practice compelled by OTO. Likewise, in requiring clergy verification, the prison officials employed a clergy-as-arbiter-of-orthodoxy standard that had long been rejected. . . Finally, we note that the only other circuit court to have considered this issue held that '[a]lthough the outer boundaries of RLUIPA may have been uncharted at the time [of the defendant's conduct], its core protections were not.' [citing Lovelace v. Lee, 472 F.3d 174 (4th Cir. 2006)]Accordingly, Koger's right not to be subjected to a religiously required test or a clergy verification requirement was clearly established when the prison officials employed both. Those rights being clearly established at the relevant time, we conclude that the prison officials are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Steidl v. Fermon, 494 F.3d 623, 632, 633 (7th Cir. 2007) ("We have found no case that is directly analogous to the alleged misconduct of the police here. (This is essentially good news: we sincerely hope that this type of behavior is rare.) We therefore must decide whether the alleged actions were 'so egregious' that no reasonable person could have believed that they were permissible. This is the approach that the Supreme Court took in its decisions in United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 265 (1997), and Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 740 (2002), both of which focused on whether a reasonable person would know that the challenged behavior violated a constitutional right and held that there need not be case law on point so long as the official had 'fair warning' that her conduct was impermissible. . . In urging this court not to dispense with the need to find a closely analogous case, the ISP Officials rely on Denius v. Dunlap, 209 F.3d 944, 951 (7th Cir.2000), which held that '[i]n some rare cases, where the constitutional violation is patently obvious, the plaintiff may not be required to present the court with any analogous cases.' Id. at 951. But Denius's use of the word 'rare' did not mean that the second route should normally be closed. To the contrary, Denius noted that 'widespread compliance with a clearly apparent law may have prevented the issue from previously being litigated.'. . We are persuaded that the ISP Officials, and indeed all of the police officers involved in this case, had ample notice that the knowing suppression of exculpatory material that was in the files at the time of the trial violated the defendant's constitutional rights. If, as we held in Newsome, the duty to disclose was clearly established as of 1979 and 1980, then it remained clearly established at Steidl's initial trial in 1987 and throughout his post-trial proceedings. Supervisors in the Illinois State Police cannot have thought that they were permitted deliberately to obstruct the access to this evidence of the post-conviction court and the Governor's Office, which has its own role to play in the state's criminal justice system. By the time these officials acted, Kyles v. Whitley was also on the books, eliminating any doubt about the joint responsibility of the police and prosecutors to assure the fair administration of the criminal justice system. Much of our discussion of the scope of the right Steidl is asserting applies with equal force to the question whether that right was clearly established, as we have taken care to rely on cases and doctrines that were in place before these officials acted. We therefore conclude that the district court correctly denied the ISP Officials' motion for dismissal based on qualified immunity.").

Boyd v. Owen, 481 F.3d 520, 523, 524 (7th Cir. 2007) ("The district court appears to have conflated the two prongs of the qualified immunity test. The court held that Boyd possessed a protected liberty interest in his employment as a police officer. The court then recognized that our decision in Dupuy could not clearly establish any due process violation because it was issued after the events at issue in the case. The court nevertheless held that Foott and Owen violated Boyd's clearly established constitutional right to due process because 'DCFS' own rules and regulations imposed a duty to identify other possible explanations for the abuse,' and Owen and Foott failed to do so. . . The district court properly held that our Dupuy decision could not demonstrate a clearly established right because it did not exist when these events occurred, but its alternative reasoning is erroneous. The Supreme Court has made clear the requirement of due process is not defined by state rules and regulations, but is an independent determination. . . Accordingly, the district court erred in determining that the failure to comply with DCFS regulations demonstrated a violation of a clearly established constitutional right.").

Borello v. Allison, 446 F.3d 742, 749, 750 (7th Cir. 2006) ("Because Defendant has not shown that his constitutional rights were violated, we need not move to the second step of the qualified immunity analysis: whether those rights were clearly established at the time of the attack. We note, however, that the district court improperly simplified this second step, finding that '[i]t is untenable to say that prison officials don't know what actions in this area are illegal.' This analysis relieved Plaintiff of his burden of proof. . . . The inquiry into whether a right is clearly established 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . It is insufficient for a plaintiff simply to point to a recognized constitutional right and claim that the right has been violated. A plaintiff is required to show that a violation of that right has been found in factually similar cases, or that the violation was so clear that an official would realize he or she was violating an inmate's constitutional rights even in the absence of an on-point case. . . Although it is well established that a plaintiff can bring an Eighth Amendment claim based on a prison official's deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm, there is still a question whether the facts of this case are sufficient to establish deliberate indifference. The purpose of the second step of the qualified immunity analysis is to ensure that prison officials will not be held personally liable for their official conduct when they were not aware that their conduct violated any of an inmate's constitutional rights. Plaintiff has not attempted to compare this case to any factually similar ones, or argue that the violation was so obvious that Defendants should have been on notice that their actions constituted deliberate indifference.").

Miller v. Jones, 444 F.3d 929, 939 (7th Cir. 2006) ("To leap from the simple observation that the boundaries of what constitutes public concern require some searching, to the argument that after San Diego 'no reasonable law enforcement official' may be expected to determine what is appropriate behavior in this realm, is a step too far. Nothing in San Diego reformed the core of our jurisprudence on the matter. Nor did San Diego strike down Delgado, where we held that employee speech on a matter of public concern was protected under the First Amendment, and therefore protected against retaliatory transfers, when it grew out of some discretionary act. . . For examples of similar factual scenarios, Chief Jones may have turned to our holding in Campbell v.

Touse, where we held that a police officer's speech criticizing the management of a community-oriented policing program was a matter of public concern. . . Additionally, Jones may have turned to Knapp v. Whitaker, wherein we held a public school teacher had spoken on a matter of public concern when protesting an inequitable reimbursement scheme for expenses incurred in coaching students. . . The core of the public concern in Knapp was the misuse of funds intended for the school's athletic program; a secondary mission of the school system, to be sure. . . Finally, should former Chief of Police Jones have needed personal notice that the retaliatory transfer of public employees for speech protected by the First Amendment is subject to suit under § 1983, he need only look to our holding in Octavio Delgado v. Police Chief Arthur Jones and Deputy Chief Monica Ray, 282 F.3d 511, Mar. 8, 2002, decided against the appellant himself in the same month during which the merger was first proposed.").

Wernsing v. Thompson, 423 F.3d 732, 747, 748 (7th Cir. 2005) ("We are satisfied that Thompson is entitled to qualified immunity, though not for the precise reasons he advances. Simply put, Thompson must prevail in the present suit since it was not clearly established, at the time the pre-clearance directive was first issued (December 5, 2000), that such a directive constituted an unlawful prior restraint on speech. Of course the case law on prior restraints is replete with decisions invalidating zoning ordinances, licensing schemes, permit regulations and other official acts that limit expressive activity. Additionally, our recent decision in Crue v. Aiken, where we held a similar pre-clearance directive to constitute an unlawful prior restraint on speech, casts serious doubt upon the legality of Thompson's directive. . . However, while the constitutional limits of restraints applicable to the general public are well-settled, and while the Supreme Court has struck down formal statutory bans of certain speech activity by government employees, . . . the prerogatives of a government supervisor in managing the communications of his own staff are far less clear. We emphasize that our analysis of qualified immunity here is focused specifically and exclusively on this kind of relatively informal supervisory directive aimed at close subordinates. . . In December 2000 case law touching on this kind of internal pre-clearance directive was decidedly scant and, to the extent that it existed at all, actually suggested that such directives are permissible.").

Nanda v. Moss, 412 F.3d 836, 844, 845 (7th Cir. 2005) ("We find that a reasonable dean or university administrator was on notice as of 1998 that it would be a violation of federal law to ratify a recommendation to terminate a female professor without investigation into several allegations of gender and ethnic discrimination surrounding the recommendation, and then to falsely report that the recommendation was made with the approval of faculty and an advisory committee.").

Kiddy-Brown v. Blagojevich, 408 F.3d 346, 356 (7th Cir. 2005) ("The State defendants contend that it was not clearly established at the time Ms. Kiddy-Brown's employment was terminated that dismissing the warden at a state prison would violate the Constitution. They submit that 'there are no closely analogous cases ... involving the position at issue–Warden of a state correctional institution.' . . However, the law of qualified immunity does not require a plaintiff to produce a case that is 'directly on point' in order to show that a right is clearly established. . . . As we noted earlier, because this case is before us on a motion for judgment on the pleadings, we are obliged–as was the district court–to view the facts alleged in Ms. Kiddy-Brown's complaint in the light most favorable to her. . . According to Ms. Kiddy-Brown, she had no 'discretionary policymaking powers' and 'no meaningful input into government decision making on issues where there was room for principled disagreement on goals.'. . Accepting these allegations as true, Ms. Kiddy-Brown was among the employees who have a right not to be subjected to patronage dismissal. We think the law was sufficiently clear at the time Ms. Kiddy-Brown was dismissed that a reasonable official would have understood that political affiliation was not an appropriate requirement for a position such as the one described in Ms. Kiddy-Brown's complaint.").

Lunini v. Grayeb, 395 F.3d 761, 769 (7th Cir. 2005) ("We acknowledge that 'liability is not predicated upon the existence of a prior case that is directly on point,' . . . yet nonetheless '[t]he contours of the right [at issue] must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . However suggestive our dicta in Hilton, we are instructed to conduct the 'clearly established' inquiry from the defendant-official's perspective, and in this light, a claim in a factually dissimilar case which ultimately fails to survive a qualified immunity defense cannot be said to sufficiently define 'the contours of the [purported] right' to any significant degree. Indeed the precise contours of class of one equal protection rights continue to elude some of this circuit's most capable judges. . . . Certainly Lunini is unhappy with defendant police officers' response to the incident at the High Street residence. However, on this record it appears highly doubtful that any alleged police misjudgments (if misjudgments there were) took on constitutional proportions. While we take pains to affirm the baseline principle that police support and protection must be afforded to all citizens on a non-discriminatory basis, we decline to take the unprecedented step of implying a general constitutional police duty to arrest certain individuals during a response to an isolated domestic incident. Such a ruling would threaten to turn every police house call into a potential federal constitutional lawsuit.").

Board v. Farnham, 394 F.3d 469, 484 (7th Cir. 2005) ("Because dental care is a basic human need and the constitutional test requires us to look at 'the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society,'. . .Farnham was or should have been 'on notice' and had 'fair warning' that it would be unconstitutional for him to deny oral hygiene products to pretrial detainees under his watch for long periods of time. [citing Hope] We hold that the district court did not err in denying qualified immunity to Farnham based on the alleged denial of toothpaste to Duke and Jerry Board for three-and-a-half weeks and approximately 113 days respectively.").

Baird v. Bd. of Educ. for Warren Community Unit School Dist. No. 205, 389 F.3d 685, 696, 697 (7th Cir. 2004) ("The Board contends that its individual members are absolutely immune from liability since various discrete actions in firing Baird–namely the determination of rules and procedures, participation in the pre-termination hearing and individual decisions to terminate Baird–were legislative acts. The issues raised by this appeal are, however, a totality involving the termination of an employee, which is an administrative act. The evidence does not establish that the Board members are entitled to legislative immunity. Nor do Board members appear to be entitled to qualified immunity, which protects public officials who exercise discretionary or policymaking functions from liability in damages. . . We have already found that the Board violated Baird's due process rights by according him a hearing whose procedures were severely deficient. Thus, we proceed directly to the question whether Baird's rights were clearly established. We conclude that they are. . . . Determining the reasonableness of a 'mistake' does not necessitate comparison to a precedent that squares in every detail with the present case. . .As earlier discussed, numerous cases from Perry v. Sindermann to Loudermill to Lujan–a case the defendants rely on to justify their conduct–have defined the contours of what process is due to a public employee who is to be terminated. Given the quality and volume of this precedent, we cannot determine on this record that the Board's conduct was a reasonable mistake, thereby establishing the defense of qualified immunity.").

Manning v. Miller, 355 F.3d 1028, 1034 (7th Cir. 2004) ("Buchan and Miller also argue that Brady should not be extended to cover the actions of police or investigators, but rather, only prosecutors. This assertion, while eloquently argued, is flatly contradicted by existing case law. In Kyles v. Whitley, the Supreme Court found that the Brady duty of turning over exculpatory evidence includes not only the prosecutor, but the investigating officers as well. 514 U.S. 419, 438 (1995). . . . Manning is able to meet the second prong of the qualified immunity test: his constitutional due process right was 'clearly established' at the time he asserts it was violated. Buchan and Miller assert that this behavior was not clearly prohibited at the time of its occurrence because no decision had dealt with a Brady claim that matched the facts in Manning's Brady claim. Following this logic, all Brady violations would receive qualified immunity because the facts of every case are unique. Instead, we hold that it is enough that, prior to the actions that gave rise to this case, it was well established that investigators who withhold exculpatory evidence from defendants violate the defendant's constitutional due process right. See, e.g ., United States ex rel. Smith v. Fairman, 769 F.2d 386, 391 (7th Cir.1985). It is immaterial whether Manning complains that Agents Buchan and Miller withheld exculpatory information regarding fabricated testimony or fingerprint analysis.")

Dunn v. City of Elgin, 347 F.3d 641, 650, 651 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Although it was objectively unreasonable for the police officers to believe they had authority to seize a child pursuant to an out-of-state order, we cannot say that the unconstitutionality of this action was clearly established when Katia was seized. It may have been clearly established that such conduct violated Illinois law and the standard operating procedures for the City of Elgin Police Department, but Plaintiffs must also show that the conduct was so severe that 'a reasonable person would have known of the unconstitutionality of the conduct at issue.' . . This requires either that the plaintiff point to closely analogous cases, . . . or prove that the right is 'so clear... that no one thought it worthwhile to litigate the issue.'. . In both cases the plaintiff must do more than merely prove that a general right, such as the right to be free from unreasonable seizures, was clearly established. . . Plaintiffs have not met this burden. Plaintiffs have pointed to no cases where the enforcement of an out-of-state custody order in violation of a state statute was found to be a constitutional violation. . . .

Considering the circuit split that existed regarding whether an officer may act reasonably when acting beyond his or her jurisdiction, . . . we also cannot say that the absence of cases on point is due to the obviousness of the constitutional violation.").

McCann v. Mangialardi, 337 F.3d 782, 787, 788 (7th Cir. 2003) ("In Brady v. Maryland . . . the Supreme Court held that during trial the government is constitutionally obligated to disclose evidence favorable to the defense when the evidence is material to either the guilt or punishment of the defendant. . . The Court has yet to address, however, whether the Due Process Clause requires such disclosures outside the context of a trial. . . . [W]e have a question not directly addressed by [United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. 622 (2002)]: whether a criminal defendant's guilty plea can ever be 'voluntary' when the government possesses evidence that would exonerate the defendant of any criminal wrongdoing but fails to disclose such evidence during plea negotiations or before the entry of the plea. . . . Ruiz indicates a significant distinction between impeachment information and exculpatory evidence of actual innocence. Given this distinction, it is highly likely that the Supreme Court would find a violation of the Due Process Clause if prosecutors or other relevant government actors have knowledge of a criminal defendant's factual innocence but fail to disclose such information to a defendant before he enters into a guilty plea. We need not resolve this question, however, because even if such disclosures of factual innocence are constitutionally required, McCann has not presented any evidence that Mangialardi knew about the drugs being planted in McCann's car prior to the entry of his guilty plea.").

Molina ex rel Molina v. Cooper , 325 F.3d 963, 972 (7th Cir. 2003) ("As for the Molinas' alternative argument that the police failed to wait a reasonable amount of time after announcing their presence to forcibly enter the house, we are similarly unconvinced. Police officers' compliance with the 'knock and announce' requirement is determined on a case- by-case basis. . . . Although the duration is disputed, the officers claim that five seconds passed after their third and final knock, and that a total of twelve to fifteen seconds passed between their first knock and forcible entry. . . Under the circumstances, we find that this was a reasonable interval. Even if it was not, the officers would be entitled to qualified immunity. The plaintiffs have not cited any cases which clearly establish that an interval of this length was unconstitutional at the time that they conducted the search.").

Cavalieri v. Shepard, 321 F.3d 616, 623, 624 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Of course, the law did not require Shepard to sit by the telephone all day, communicating with the CCCF about transferred prisoners. The question is what he was supposed to do in the face of the knowledge of a life-threatening situation that he actually had. He made several telephone calls to the CCCF, but he passed by the opportunity to mention that he had been informed that Steven was a suicide risk, and that the jail itself had recognized this only a month earlier. If Shepard had known that a detainee had an illness that required life-saving medication, he would also have had a duty to inform the CCCF, or any other entity that next held custody over the detainee. . . . We conclude that the law as it existed at the time of Steven's suicide attempt provided Shepard with fair notice that his conduct was unconstitutional. The rule that officials, including police officers, will be 'liable under section 1983 for a pre- trial detainee's suicide if they were deliberately indifferent to a substantial suicide risk,' . . . was clearly established prior to 1998. The fact that several state agencies were working together on his case, and that Steven happened to attempt suicide in the county's facility rather than at the police station, does not change this analysis.")

Sonnleitner v. York, 304 F.3d 704, 716 (7th Cir. 2002) ("Under the first prong of this inquiry, we agree with Sonnleitner that the Institute may have violated his procedural due process rights by failing to accord him a predisciplinary hearing on the unenumerated (i.e., the more serious) charges contained in the Bellaire report. However, under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, Sonnleitner has failed to establish that this right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Although Sonnleitner need not offer up a federal decision which precisely mirrors the facts of this case, at a minimum he must point to a closely analogous case decided prior to the challenged conduct. . . Sonnleitner contends that the Supreme Court's decision in Loudermill clearly established his right to more exhaustive pre-disciplinary proceedings. However, as discussed earlier, Loudermill involved the termination of two public employees without any pre-termination proceedings, and is therefore factually distinguishable from this case.").

Driebel v. City of Milwaukee, 298 F.3d 622, 637, 652 (7th Cir. 2002) ("[I]in light of the Saucier decision, we must determine whether, and at what point, actions initiated by the Department against its on-duty police officers during a criminal investigation should be classified as unreasonable seizures in violation of the officers' Fourth Amendment rights. . . . [W]e have been unable to discover any case law that would justify a reasonable belief that an officer suspected of criminal misconduct may be seized during a criminal investigation and detained for questioning based on the reasonable suspicion standard.").

Morrell v. Mock, 270 F.3d 1090, 1100 (7th Cir. 2001) ("Morrell contends that it was clearly established that due process requires notice and an opportunity to be heard before state actors may interfere with a mother's liberty interest in her child. The statement of the right at this level of generality, however, is of little help in determining the reasonableness of the defendants' conduct. . . The appropriate question is whether it would be clear to reasonable officials in the defendants' position that enforcing the New Mexico court's order without prior notice or an opportunity to be heard in Illinois was unconstitutional. . . . Morrell has not identified, and we have been unable to find, any authoritative cases considering analogous circumstances that hold that pre-deprivation notice and an opportunity to be heard is required as a matter of constitutional due process before a state may enforce another state's custody order.").

Siebert v. Severino, 256 F.3d 648, 654, 655 (7th Cir. 2001) ("A violation may be clearly established if the violation is so obvious that a reasonable state actor would know that what they are doing violates the Constitution, or if a closely analogous case establishes that the conduct is unconstitutional. . . This case seems to fit within the 'obvious' scenario–a reasonable state actor would know that he cannot enter a fenced-in, closed structure located within 60 feet of a person's house without a warrant or some exception to the warrant requirement. But even if not reasonably obvious to Severino, a closely analogous case indicates that his conduct was unconstitutional: his search took place in 1996, and less than three years earlier the Fourth Circuit held that citizens enjoy an expectation of privacy in their barn.[citing Fourth Circuit case] Therefore, Severino is not protected by qualified immunity.").

Campbell v. Peters, 256 F.3d 695, 700, 701 (7th Cir. 2001) ("Campbell contends that he has shown that it was clearly established that incarcerating a prisoner beyond the termination of his sentence without penological justification violates the Eighth Amendment as cruel and unusual punishment. At a general level, this proposition may be true. . . . But we do not deal with generalities. Instead, we must determine whether it was clearly established that the defendants, in revoking the good conduct credits and computing a new release date after the recommitment, were violating Campbell's constitutional rights by requiring him to serve more time than state law and his sentence required. As Campbell points out, it is not necessary for him to point to a case saying that the revocation, under the identical circumstances, was unlawful. Instead, as the Supreme Court put it in Katz, the law is 'clearly established' if 'various courts have agreed that certain conduct is a constitutional violation under facts not distinguishable in a fair way from the facts presented in the case at hand....'. . . At the time of the revocation of Campbell's credits, it was not apparent that this kind of state law mistake rose to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation.").

Pearson v. Ramos, 237 F.3d 881, 884 (7th Cir. 2001) ("Since no one could believe that a single 90-day denial of yard privileges would be a cruel and unusual punishment for a serious violation of prison disciplinary rules, the dispositive issue in this case is whether the stacking of such sanctions to the point of depriving a prisoner of an entire year of yard access is cruel and unusual punishment; and as there was no case law when the defendant acted indicating that it is and no tenable argument then or now that stacking so clearly violated the Eighth Amendment that an official in the defendant's position would have had to know that it did, even without any guidance from case law, it is obvious that the immunity defense should have been sustained.")

Brokaw v. Mercer County, 235 F.3d 1000, 1022, 1023 (7th Cir. 2000) ("The defendants argue that it was not clearly established in June 1983 that their actions violated C.A.'s constitutional rights, noting that C.A. failed to cite to closely analogous cases clearly establishing his constitutional rights. However, a plaintiff need not always identify a closely analogous case; rather, he can establish a clearly established constitutional right by showing that the violation was so obvious that a reasonable person would have known of the unconstitutionality of the conduct at issue.Thus, binding precedent is not necessary to clearly establish a right. . . . As alleged, this case fits that principle to a T. The defendants' alleged conduct in this case is so severe that a reasonable person would have understood that he was violating C.A.'s constitutional rights. Specifically, a reasonable person would have known that it was unconstitutional to use the government's power to cause, or conspire to cause, the unjustified removal of a six-year-old child from his parents in order to destroy the family, based simply on the family's religious beliefs. . . . In closing our discussion of qualified immunity, we note that several circuit courts have concluded that because the balance between a child's liberty interest in familial relations and a state's interest in protecting the child is nebulous at best, social workers and other state actors who cause a child's removal are entitled to qualified immunity because the alleged constitutional violation will rarely–if ever–be clearly established.[citing cases]. While we agree that that is generally the case, . . .as noted above, some governmental actions are so clearly beyond the pale that a reasonable person should have known of their unconstitutionality even without a closely analogous case.").

Elwell v. Dobucki, 224 F.3d 638, 641 (7th Cir. 2000) ("A snapshot of the law in 1992 . . . shows that there was no clearly established prohibition against taking race into account in a hiring decision within a prison or police department context.").

Perry v. Sheahan, 222 F.3d 309, 317 (7th Cir. 2000) ("In summary, it was clearly established law at the time of the seizure that even seizures pursuant to an eviction are not immune to the strictures of the Fourth Amendment. Here, the defendants seized the weapons even though they knew that the eviction had been stayed by order of the court and thus that the seizure was not pursuant to any court order. It was also clearly established that warrantless seizures of personal effects from a home are presumably unreasonable. No exception to that rule or other circumstances apparent in this motion to dismiss would render objectively reasonable their belief that this seizure was constitutional. Therefore, there is no basis for qualified immunity, and the decision of the district court in Perry I must be reversed on this issue.").

Coady v. Steil, 187 F.3d 727, 734 (7th Cir. 1999) ("[W]e reject the defendant's argument that because this court has not previously had a case with identical facts to this one, the violation of the plaintiff's right to be free from harassment in his exercise of protected political speech could not have been clearly established. . . . Indeed, because Connick-Pickering balancing always involves factspecific balancing, if plaintiffs had to point to a case on all fours with their own, defendants would nearly always be entitled to qualified immunity. However, we have rejected that argument. . . . We believe it was clear on March 18, 1995, that in this circuit, a government official could not harass a subordinate employee because of that individual's activities in support of political candidates, when the subordinate employee's actions were protected by the First Amendment and not in contravention of any state law, municipal ordinance or departmental policy.").

Markham v. White, 172 F.3d 486, 492 (7th Cir. 1999) ("[I]t was well established by 1993 that the U.S. Constitution does not tolerate sex discrimination in an educational setting. Contrary to the defendants' argument, the fact that neither this court nor any other has ever dealt with a situation involving a short training seminar conducted for narcotics officers is of no moment. Under the doctrine of qualified immunity, 'liability is not predicated upon the existence of a prior case that is directly on point.'. . In light of the law at the time, a reasonable government official in the defendants' shoes would have understood that the prohibition against sexual harassment extended to their training seminars.").

Kerr v. Puckett, 138 F.3d 321, 323-24 (7th Cir. 1998) ("We must determine whether the generalities of the Constitution have been made concrete, so that officeholders can understand the limits on their conduct. No court has ever held that 'brainwashing' of prisoners as part of substance-abuse-control programs violates the eighth amendment.... Prison officials needn't predict the outcome of cases yet to be brought. And the lack of precedent is not because these programs are so plainly unconstitutional that no one has ever needed to litigate the point before.").

Khuans v. School District 110, 123 F.3d 1010, 1018-19 (7th Cir. 1997) ("Khuans alleges termination of an independent contractor relationship. And back in mid-1994, whether the analysis regarding First Amendment rights of public employees to free speech extended to independent contractors was an unsettled matter. Not until June 28, 1996, did the Supreme Court address whether and to what extent the First Amendment restricts the freedom of federal, state, or local governments to terminate a relationship with an independent contractor because of the contractor's speech.... [A]t the time Khuans lost her job, whether independent contractors could be terminated for their exercise of free speech in the workplace was unaddressed, undecided and unsettled in this circuit.").

Flenner v. Sheahan, 107 F.3d 459, 465 (7th Cir. 1997) ("We do not take exception with the district court's observation that considerable uncertainty exists in the area of patronage law. This is an observation that. . . we have made often ourselves. . . . The district court's error lies in its conclusion that the uncertainty in applying the Branti standard precludes liability for the dismissal of those employees who do in fact occupy an extremely 'low rung on the bureaucratic ladder.' [cite omitted] . . . In making the determination whether the law was sufficiently clear in 1993 that correctional officers were not subject to patronage dismissal, the district court should look to analogous case law. . . . To prevail, appellants need not point to a case holding unconstitutional the dismissal of Cook County correctional officers for patronage reasons. . . . Appellants must, however, establish that, given the inherent powers of their positions and in the light of pre-existing law, the unlawfulness of Sheriff Sheahan's actions was apparent.").

Vickery v. Jones, 100 F.3d 1334, 1340 (7th Cir. 1996) ("We simply do not agree with the plaintiff's assertion that the constitutional status of patronage hiring of temporary positions was clearly established at the time of the activities challenged in this case. For the reasons stated above, the plaintiff has not provided a 'closely analogous' case that covers both the Rutan holding and its application to temporary employment positions like the temporary highway maintainer positions, nor has he shown that using information regarding an applicant's political affiliation was so obviously unconstitutional that the State Defendants should have known that they were violating the law. Therefore, the district court correctly concluded that the State Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity.").

Hernandez v. O'Malley, 98 F.3d 293, 297 (7th Cir. 1996) ("A regimen of case-by-case balancing makes it hard to dismiss complaints and simultaneously makes it hard to show that the right in question was 'clearly established.' . . . . Drawing a stable line in Elrod cases has been difficult; even slight differences in the nature and context of the job can lead to opposite outcomes . . . . Contextual balancing tests should be worked out prospectively, rather than at the expense of public officials who guess wrong about future legal developments.").

Erwin v. Daley, 92 F.3d 521, 528 (7th Cir. 1996) ("Whatever else one might say about the state of the law in 1990 on affirmative action programs, the standard of review to which they are subject, and the nature of the justifications that will support them, it is clear that as of the time the City officials implemented their promotion program it was not 'clearly established' . . . that the use of standardization techniques and out of rank order promotions in police departments was illegal. . . it may not be illegal at all.").

Anderson v. Romero, 72 F.3d 518, 525-27 (7th Cir. 1995) ("Neither in 1992 nor today was (is) the law clearly established that a prison cannot without violating the constitutional rights of its HIV-positive inmates reveal their condition to other inmates and to guards in order to enable those other inmates and those guards to protect themselves from infection. . . . [D]istrict court decisions cannot clearly establish a constitutional right. . . . They are evidence of the state of the law. Taken together with other evidence, they might show that the law had been clearly established. . . .And, although we cannot find any cases on the point, we are confident that an unpublished decision cannot elevate the decision that it affirms to the status of circuit precedent. . . . If the only reason that the defendants denied haircuts and yard privileges to Anderson was that he was HIV- positive, and there is no conceivable justification for these as AIDS-fighting measures, then the absence of a case involving this specific form of arbitrary treatment would not confer immunity on the defendants. A constitutional violation that is so patent that no violator has even attempted to obtain an appellate ruling on it can be regarded as clearly established even in the absence of precedent.").

Camp v. Gregory, 67 F.3d 1286, 1298 (7th Cir. 1995) ("Certainly it was clear by 1991 that a child had a right not to be placed with an abusive caretaker. K.H., a 1990 decision, settled that issue in this circuit. However, Camp has cited no decision to us recognizing a constitutional right to adequate supervision and guidance. There are hints in the cases that caseworkers must not place children with caretakers who will abuse or neglect them. E.g., K.H. . . . Neglect certainly could be construed to include not only the failure to provide a child with the necessities, but the degree of supervision, instruction, and involvement necessary to steer the child clear of dangerous activities. Yet, no case cited to us does so. Thus, at best a public official would have had to predict that cases such as K.H. would be construed expansively in order to anticipate our holding today. Certainly an official could be charged with knowledge that it was impermissible to misrepresent facts to a court. . . but he could not have predicted civil liability under the due process clause for the placement decision itself.").

Burns v. Reed, 44 F.3d 524, 528 (7th Cir. 1995) ("Plaintiff. . . would need to cite more specific precedent than the basic line of coercion cases to persuade this Court that the United States Constitution clearly proscribed hypnosis of a suspect at the time of her interrogation.").

Dahm v. Flynn, 60 F.3d 253, 258 (7th Cir. 1994) ("Because it was not clearly established at the relevant time that qualitative reductions in job responsibilities, without discharge, transfer, demotion, or salary loss, could constitute an adverse employment action, [Defendant] is immune from civil damages . . .").

Eberhardt v. O'Malley, 17 F.3d 1023, 1028 (7th Cir. 1994) ("If the complaint is taken at face value, ... the defendants punished the plaintiff for writing a novel, without having any legitimate reason for such punishment. This is such an elementary violation of the First Amendment that the absence of a reported case with similar facts demonstrates nothing more than widespread compliance with well-recognized constitutional principles.").

Donovan v. City of Milwaukee, 17 F.3d 944, 952 (7th Cir. 1994) ("Garner is not the most apt analogy to this case because the facts of Garner are not sufficiently particularized to put potential defendants on notice that striking a fleeing vehicle with their police cruisers constitutes an unreasonable seizure.").

Henderson v. DeRobertis, 940 F.2d 1055, 1058-59 (7th Cir. 1991) ("...until a particular constitutional right has been stated so that reasonably competent officers would agree on its application to a given set of facts, it has not been clearly established"; court should look to whatever decisional law is available to decide whether right clearly established), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 1578 (1992).

K.H. ex rel Murphy v. Morgan, 914 F.2d 846, 851 (7th Cir. 1990) ("There has never been a section 1983 case accusing welfare officials of selling foster children into slavery; it does not follow that if such a case arose, the officials would be immune...because no previous case had found liability in those circumstances.")

Wynn v. City of Indianapolis, No. 1:20-CV-1638-JMS-MJD, 2022 WL 1120490, at *13 (S.D. Ind. Apr. 14, 2022) ("Based on the foregoing caselaw, it was clearly established as of May 6, 2020 that a police officer can generally use a taser against an actively resisting suspect, but not against a nonresisting or passively resisting suspect. However, Ms. Wynn has not pointed to a case—and the Court's own research has not located one—that clearly establishes that Mr. Reed fleeing on foot constitutes passive rather than active resistance. In fact, the cases cited above suggest that attempting to evade arrest by flight, and specifically by running, may justify the use of force. . . Although, as Ms. Wynn points out, IMPD's Use of Force Policy prohibits the use of a taser against a suspect who is merely fleeing and requires that an officer should warn a suspect before tasing him if feasible, a violation of IMPD policy does not establish a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Accordingly, the Court concludes that Ms. Wynn has failed to meet her burden of demonstrating that it was clearly established as of May 6, 2020 that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by deploying a taser against a suspect under the circumstances in which Officer Mercer deployed his taser against Mr. Reed. Officer Mercer is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Ms. Wynn's excessive force claim related to the use of the ECD.") Gonzalez v. Scaletta, No. 17-CV-7080, 2021 WL 4192065, at *19 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 15, 2021) ("Justice Kavanaugh's concurring opinion in Caniglia demonstrates the necessity of giving officers some leeway when responding to emergency situations to protect the community. Justice Kavanaugh provided '[a] few (non-exhaustive) examples [that] illustrate' some 'heartland emergency-aid situations.'. . One of his examples refers to a person who may be suicidal:

Suppose that a woman calls a healthcare hotline or 911 and says that she is contemplating suicide, that she has firearms in her home, and that she might as well die. The operator alerts the police, and two officers respond by driving to the woman's home. They knock on the door but do not receive a response. May the officers enter the home? Of course....The Fourth Amendment does not require officers to stand idly outside as the suicide takes place.
Caniglia, 141 S. Ct. at 1604 (Kavanaugh, J., concurring) (emphasis added).
Officers do not have to wait for catastrophe. They can try to prevent it. 'The officers do not need to show that the harm has already occurred or is mere moments away, because knowing that will be difficult if not impossible in cases involving, for example, a person who is currently suicidal....If someone is at risk of serious harm and it is reasonable for officers to intervene now, that is enough for the officers to enter.'. . '[W]hen police are acting in a swiftly developing situation...a court must not indulge in unrealistic second-guessing.'. . This Court cannot second guess the officers' decision to enter the home to ensure Cardenas's safety. Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity on the warrantless entry claim. The Court grants the officers' motion for summary judgment on the illegal entry claim (Count I).")

Renee v. Neal, No. 3:18-CV-592-RLM-MGG, 2020 WL 5230605, at *5–6 (N.D. Ind. Sept. 2, 2020) ("Little case law, either within the Seventh Circuit or outside it, address[es] the First Amendment rights of transgender inmates to wear makeup or female clothing. The few courts to have considered the issue have held that transgender inmates don't have a First Amendment right to wear makeup or women's clothing. . . Some circuits, including ours, have analyzed this type of claim under the Eighth Amendment, but have held that denying transgender inmates makeup and similar items did not violate the Constitution. . . At least one court has recognized the 'serious security concerns' posed by requests like Ms. Renee's, namely, 'that an inmate dressed and groomed as a female would inevitably become a target for abuse in an all-male prison.'. . Because there is no case law that would have put defendants on notice that Ms. Renee had a clearly established First Amendment right to wear makeup and purchase female hygiene items, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. The court doesn't intend to minimize the comfort such items might bright to one with gender dysphoria who identifies as female. But the defendants are correct that what Ms. Renee presents is not a clearly established federal constitutional right.")

Obriecht v. Splinter, No. 18-CV-877-SLC, 2019 WL 1779226, at *6 (W.D. Wis. Apr. 23, 2019) ("As discussed at length above, the law is far from settled about whether drivers have a First Amendment right to flash their headlights to convey a warning to oncoming vehicles. Neither the Supreme Court nor any federal court of appeals has addressed the issue. Accordingly, defendant Splinter is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Obriecht's First Amendment retaliation claim against him and defendants Lind, Teasdale, Zeeh, Larson, and Ross are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Obriecht's individual capacity claims that they created or approved the policy and practice of stopping and citing drivers the on-and-off flashing of headlights violates his right to free speech under the First Amendment.")

Terry v. County of Milwaukee, No. 17-CV-1112-JPS, 2019 WL 181329, at *9-10 (E.D. Wis. Jan. 11, 2019) ([T]he 'objectively unreasonable' standard for pretrial detainees that was announced in Miranda is not entirely new. It is well-established in this circuit that arrestees awaiting their probable cause hearings have a right to medical care that is protected under the Fourth Amendment's 'objectively unreasonable' standard. Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 629–30 (7th Cir. 2013); Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523 (7th Cir. 2011). In Ortiz, the Seventh Circuit denied qualified immunity despite uncertainty over whether the 'deliberately indifferent' or objectively unreasonable' standard governed medical care claims for arrestees because it was clear that the Fourth Amendment protected arrestees at the time of the plaintiff's death. Id. at 538. The Court of Appeals further held that qualified immunity was inappropriate because defendants' conduct would not have been entitled to qualified immunity under the deliberate indifference standard anyway. . . Thus, Miranda does not change the qualified immunity standard. The defendants may argue that they believed they were held to the deliberate indifference standard and did not realize that they would be subject to the objectively unreasonable standard of care. This is, in effect, an argument that defendants were unaware that they had to act a modicum more humanely towards Terry. Such a miserable contention is not persuasive. . . Although mistakes of fact may sometimes give rise to qualified immunity, . . it was well established at the time that the Fourteenth Amendment protected pretrial detainees. [citing Wolfish] Moreover, Terry's arguments, 'if credited by a jury, satisf[y] the deliberate indifference standard because she argues that the defendants were subjectively aware that she had a serious medical condition...and failed to respond.'. . Therefore, even if the Court applied the old standard, qualified immunity would not be appropriate. As discussed below, Wenzel and Bevenue knew, without a doubt, that detainees had a constitutional right to medical care, and they also knew that they were not allowed to ignore serious medical risks. That was true under the deliberate indifference standard, and it remains true under the new standard.")

Wordlow on behalf of M.M. v. Chicago Bd. of Educ., No. 16-CV-8040, 2018 WL 6171792, at *3-4, *8–11 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 26, 2018) ("At the time of Yarbrough's hire, the Board knew that this was his first job working with students in a school setting; prior to working at Fernwood, Yarbrough was a bouncer at the Red Diamond Strip Club. . . During the 2015-16 school year, M.M. was a six-year-old, first grade student at Fernwood. . . At that time, she weighed 67 pounds and was three-feet, six inches tall. . . . Based upon the record, this Court finds that under the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard, Yarbrough's handcuffing constituted excessive force as a matter of law. The undisputed facts demonstrate that at the time Yarbrough decided to handcuff

M.M. without parental consent and bring a compliant 6-year old child to his security desk: (1) Yarbrough was a 46-year-old adult male . . . (2) M.M. weighed 67 pounds and was three-feet, six inches tall. . . (3) M.M. had taken candy from a teacher. . . (4) Yarbrough saw vomit on M.M. and knew she had thrown up on herself. . . and (5) M.M. has since been diagnosed with PTSD due to the incident[.]Moreover, Yarbrough admits that at the time he handcuffed and brought M.M. to his security desk, he was aware that a police officer 'would not handcuff nor arrest a 6-year-old girl for stealing candy and that someone is in 'custody' when they are in handcuffs. . . Nonetheless, he handcuffed M.M. to create 'kind of an isolated time out' and as a 'teaching moment.'. . . Yarbrough handcuffed a six-year-old student who committed no crime, posed no threat, and did not resist in any way. Thus, this Court finds as a matter of law that Yarbrough's handcuffing constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . In March 2016, the law was clearly established that, at a minimum, seizures in response to school-related incidents had to be reasonable in light of the circumstances, and not excessively intrusive. . . . Plaintiff admittedly cannot identify an on-point Supreme Court or Seventh Circuit case addressing the Fourth Amendment implications of handcuffing a compliant, 6-year old special-needs child (without parental consent) for allegedly stealing a piece of candy, where such student presented no risk of flight or harm to herself or others. Given the facts, however, Plaintiff need not identify a specific case. . . . Given the undisputed portions of the record, however, there is no hazy border in this case, and no reasonable officer would ever need a judge to tell them in advance that the conduct at issue here was unreasonable. . . In the alternative, this Court also turns to 'all relevant case law to determine "whether there was such a clear trend in the case law that [it] can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by a controlling precedent was merely a question of time."'. .The three circuit courts that have addressed the issue of handcuffing students under the Fourth Amendment remain split on whether school security personnel warrant qualified immunity. [Court discusses Sonora (9th Cir.) and Bostic (11th Cir.) (both denying qualified immunity in student handcuffing cases) and Dolgos (4th Cir.) (granting qualified immunity)] Yarbrough, of course, argues in light of the Fourth Circuit's ruling that M.M.'s 'right not to be handcuffed under the circumstances of the case was not clearly established at [the] time of her seizure.'. . Plaintiff, on the other hand, argues, consistent with the Ninth and Eleventh Circuit's conclusions, that such an incident constitutes an 'obvious violation,' and also maintains that the Seventh Circuit's decision in Wallace put Yarbrough on notice that his behavior violated the Fourth Amendment. Specifically, she argues that '20 years before Yarbrough's actions in this case, the Seventh Circuit applied T.L.O. to schoolhouse seizures, holding that "in the context of a public school, a teacher or administrator who seizes a student does so in violation of the Fourth Amendment only when the restriction of liberty is unreasonable under the circumstances then existing and apparent."'. . Despite the Fourth Circuit's holding in Dolgos, a clear trend exists that recognition of the particular right here by a controlling precedent is 'merely a question of time.' . . Consistent with the precedent of both the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits, handcuffing a compliant six-year-old for taking candy—when she posed no risk whatsoever to Yarbrough, herself, or her classmates—constituted an obvious violation of M.M.'s Fourth Amendment rights. The Seventh Circuit's decision in Wallace, more than 20 years before Yarbrough handcuffed M.M., put Yarbrough on notice that seizures in response to school-related incidents must be reasonable and non-excessive. . . The Fourth Circuit in Dolgos, in contrast, relied only upon Graham in determining that the law was not clearly established. . . And Yarbrough's decision to seize M.M. was obviously unreasonable and excessive; as discussed above, M.M. did not constitute any sort of security threat at the time Yarbrough handcuffed her. Moreover, she is both younger and smaller than the plaintiffs in Sonora, Bostic, and Dolgos. In short, every reasonable officer would have known that handcuffing a compliant six-year-old for purely punitive purposes is unreasonable and excessive under the facts of this case. . . Therefore, because Yarbrough had fair warning that handcuffing M.M. to teach her a lesson was an obvious violation of her Fourth Amendment rights, he is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Rivera v. Guevara, 319 F.Supp.3d 1004, 1053-54 (N.D. Ill. 2018) ("The facts of Jones are very similar to those here, and the Jones decision more than suffices to show that by 1988 it was clearly established that due process would not tolerate a police officer fabricating evidence. . . .As for the Brady claims, the Seventh Circuit held in Newsome v. McCabe that it was 'clearly established in 1979 and 1980 that police could not withhold from prosecutors exculpatory information about fingerprints and the conduct of a lineup.'. . Jones again furnishes the salient example. . . The officer defendants again cite Gauger v. Hendle, 349 F.3d 354, 360 (7th Cir. 2003), for the proposition that it was not established, much less clearly, that they had to turn over anything if the person who ultimately stood trial was present at the lineup. . . But Newsome involved a lineup in which the wrongfully convicted person stood (so he knew about it), and the officers nevertheless had no qualified immunity for Brady claims that they did not tell the prosecutors or the defense that they encouraged witnesses to pick the § 1983 plaintiff from the lineup. . . Newsome, therefore, clearly established that the Brady disclosure requirement expounded in Jones has full force when the person who later stands trial is in the lineup (which is usually the case since introducing evidence identifying someone else as the perpetrator of a crime is a poor strategy for winning a conviction). . . Given the genuine fact issues, the court cannot say that Rivera is complaining of the nondisclosure of 'little...tidbit[s]' of evidence whose value to the defense would not have been apparent to the officer defendants. . . As discussed extensively earlier, the jury could find that whole swaths of evidence that would have corroborated the existence of the first lineup were suppressed and that cumulatively the withheld evidence was an impeachment goldmine. Based on the foregoing analysis, the court concludes that a jury viewing the summary judgment record most favorably to Rivera could find that his clearly established rights were violated.")

Chatman v. City of Chicago, No. 14 C 2945, 2018 WL 1519160, at *15 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 28, 2018) ("Mokstad and Cartrette assert that they are shielded, in their individual capacities, from Chatman's due process claim by qualified immunity. As noted, in the context of a Brady claim, the qualified immunity issue is not whether the officer knew he had to disclose exculpatory information; rather, the question is whether it was clearly established that the information the plaintiff claims the police failed to disclose was exculpatory or impeaching. . . For the reasons discussed above, Chatman has satisfied his burden of showing, at least at this stage of the litigation, that Mokstad and Cartrette should not be afforded qualified immunity. As explained above, it was clearly established that the sleeping deputy evidence was exculpatory or impeaching, and a reasonable jury could view the record and conclude that the evidence was otherwise unavailable. In addition, whether Mokstad and Cartrette knowingly suppressed the evidence depends on disputed issues of fact.") Myvett v. Chicago Police Detective Edward Heerdt, 232 F.Supp.3d 1005, 1024 (N.D. Ill. 2017) ("Whitlock and its progeny stand for the proposition that if a police officer fabricates information that is used 'in some way' to deprive a plaintiff of his liberty, then that officer has violated the very laws he has sworn to protect. . . The Seventh Circuit made no suggestion in Whitlock, or any other case, that fabrication claims should somehow turn on the admissibility of the concocted information. Instead, what Whitlock illustrates is that so long as the fabricated statements are used to deprive a plaintiff of his liberty in some way, then the defendant officers have violated his clearly established constitutional rights. Here, as discussed supra, that is exactly what happened (or so the jury could reasonably conclude).

Smith v. Burge, 222 F.Supp.3d 669, 680-83 (N.D. Ill. 2016) ("Reviewing Plaintiff's well-pleaded allegations and all reasonable inferences in his favor—as the Court is required to do at this procedural posture—Plaintiff bases his Brady violation on more than just Defendant Officers' failure to disclose their unlawful interrogation tactics in relation to his coerced confession. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Officers suppressed the implements of their torture, including the plastic bag, the rubber nightstick, and Plaintiff's bloody clothes. . . More importantly, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants suppressed and destroyed evidence of systemic torture and abuse in Area 2, obstructed investigations into the CPD's systemic torture, and discredited findings of systemic torture. . . With the Seventh Circuit's Gauger and/or Sornberger decisions in mind, courts in this district have concluded that similar allegations state a Brady claim based on events that transpired outside of the interrogation room. [collecting cases] The decision in Saunders-El does not change this reasoning as it relates to Plaintiff's allegations of Defendants suppressing the implements of their torture, destroying evidence of systemic torture and abuse in Area 2, obstructing investigations into the CPD's systemic torture, and discrediting findings of systemic torture. In sum, at this stage of the proceedings, Plaintiff's allegations are distinguishable from the facts in Saunders-El because Plaintiff is not merely basing his Brady claim on Defendants 'keeping quiet about their wrongdoing.'. . .[T]he individual Defendants argue that qualified immunity protects them from liability as to Plaintiff's Brady claim. . . . Defendants argue that their 'failure to disclose the alleged torture evidence did not in 1984 and does not today violate any clearly established constitutional right.'. . In making this argument, Defendants characterize Plaintiff's Brady claim as follows: 'Plaintiff has essentially alleged that Brady requires police officers to disclose their misconduct, including criminal misconduct, to criminal defendants.'. .First, Defendants mischaracterize Plaintiff's Brady claim, which includes allegations that Defendants suppressed and destroyed evidence of systemic torture and abuse in Area 2, obstructed investigations into the CPD's systemic torture, and discredited findings of systemic torture. Second, Defendants fail to explain how it was not clearly established in 1983-84 that destroying and suppressing exculpatory evidence was unconstitutional. In fact, since Brady and Killian v. United States, 368 U.S. 231, 82 S.Ct. 302, 7 L.Ed.2d 256 (1961), 'bad-faith destruction or loss of exculpatory evidence violate[s] a suspect's due process rights.' Armstrong v. Daily, 786 F.3d 529, 532 (7th Cir. 2015); see also Tillman, 813 F. Supp. 2d at 966 n.12. Moreover, viewing Plaintiff's allegations and all reasonable inferences in his favor, his allegations show that Defendants' conduct was 'so egregious that no reasonable person could have believed that it would not violate established rights.'. .The Court therefore denies Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's Brady claim.")

Alton v. City of Naperville, No. 16 CV 6640, 2016 WL 6877678, at *2 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 22, 2016) ("Naperville argues that this Court should find that qualified immunity shields the officers from liability. Qualified immunity shields officers from civil liability stemming from discretionary functions so long as their conduct did not violate a clearly established statutory or constitutional right that a reasonable person would have known. . . Naperville asserts that: The correct inquiry is whether it was clearly established that police engagement of a canine constitutes excessive force when the engagement of the canine arises when a suspect in a serious crime has recklessly utilized every available means to evade capture, including fleeing in a vehicle until the vehicle becomes inoperable, followed by fleeing on foot across a major interstate highway, and secreting himself underneath garbage within a small, confined and enclosed dumpster space, all during the dark of night, and before police were able to determine whether the suspect was armed. . . . If constitutional rights needed to be so narrowly defined to be 'clearly established,' then police officers would enjoy qualified immunity in nearly every instance. . . .This Court must take the allegations in the Complaint as true for purposes of ruling on the motion to dismiss, including that Alton was not resisting and was complying with Officer Lippencott's order to get out of the dumpster. Further, there are no allegations in the Complaint suggesting Officer Lippencott had reason to suspect that Alton was armed. Under Alton's version of the facts, he was at most passively resisting. Accordingly, at this stage, the Court finds the allegations in the Complaint do not establish the affirmative defense of qualified immunity.")

Chatman v. City of Chicago, No. 14 C 2945, 2016 WL 4734361, at *2-4 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 12, 2016) ("The OPS Defendants argue, that even if they had a duty to disclose exculpatory material, such an extension of Brady was not clearly established at the time of Chatman's criminal proceedings. . . . Initially, only the members of the prosecution bore the obligation to disclose material, exculpatory evidence to defense counsel. . . Subsequently, Brady was extended so that the prosecutor's duty to disclose reached evidence in the hands of police officers, even if the information was not known to the prosecutor. . . Although the rule was articulated in terms of a duty by the prosecutor to learn of information held by the police, it has also been understood to establish an independent duty on the part of police officers to disclose such information. See Steidl v. Fermon, 494 F.3d 623, 630–33 (7th Cir. 2007) (holding that the duty of police officers to disclose exculpatory information—which is enforceable under § 1983—has been clearly established since Kyles). That said, neither the Seventh Circuit nor the Supreme Court has addressed whether governmental agencies that are in charge of investigating the police officers themselves—as opposed to the criminal defendant—are also subject to the duty to disclose under Brady. . . . 'Exactly who constitutes a member of the prosecution team is determined using a "case-by-case analysis of the extent of interaction and cooperation between" a potential member of the team and the prosecutor.'. . . In this case, the second amended complaint is bereft of any allegations that the OPS Defendants actively investigated the case against Chatman, acted under the Assistant State's Attorney's supervision, or were involved in crafting trial strategy. In short, there is no indication in the second amended complaint that the OPS Defendants were part of the prosecution team against Chatman. The inquiry that was sparked by the anonymous memo focused on uncovering misconduct by Officer Kato rather than investigating the allegations of rape against Chatman. . . .Because the OPS Defendants were not part of the prosecution team behind Chatman's arrest and conviction (at least, as they are portrayed in the second amended complaint), there was no clearly established law in this circuit tasking them with a duty to disclose the anonymous memo to the defense. . . Chatman relies heavily on the fact that OPS was formally part of the Chicago Police Department. As a result, argues Chatman, the OPS Defendants' duty to disclose under Brady is coextensive with that of the police—which has been clearly established since Kyles. . . But Chatman's reliance upon the organizational relationship between the OPS and the Chicago Police Department ignores the functional inquiry utilized in cases like Morris that asks whether the individual in question participated in the investigation and prosecution of the underlying crime. . . In fact, OPS has since been replaced by the Independent Police Review Authority, which is an entity separate from the Chicago Police Department. . . To rely entirely on CPD's internal organizational structure to determine the bounds of Brady, as Chatman urges here, would invite the type of formalistic departmental compartmentalization denounced in Morris. . . With no Supreme Court or Seventh Circuit cases on point, Chatman turns to out-of-circuit cases to argue that the OPS Defendants clearly had a duty to disclose. The cases he relies on, however, all turn on the prosecutor's duty to search for information held by other government agencies as opposed to the agencies' independent duty to disclose. . . . For these reasons, the Court holds that the duty at issue in this case (assuming that one exists) was not clearly established at the relevant time period. The Court takes no position as to the appropriateness of imposing a duty to disclose on the OPS Defendants under these circumstances, particularly given that they plainly were aware of the ongoing criminal proceedings against Chatman. What is clear, however, is that such a duty was not clearly established at the time the proceedings were taking place.")

Sanders v. City of Chicago Heights, No. 13 C 0221, 2016 WL 2866097, at *10 (N.D. Ill. May 17, 2016) ("Because the Court has determined that Sanders has set forth sufficient evidence raising a genuine issue of material fact for trial that Defendant Officers violated his due process rights by employing unnecessarily suggestive identification procedures, the Court addresses whether this due process right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violations in December 1993 and January 1994. . . In support of their argument, Defendant Officers maintain that because there is no set of universally adopted police identification procedures, they are shielded by qualified immunity. In other words, Defendant Officers argue that at the time of the identification procedures at issue, there were no established guidelines for them to follow. Defendant Officers, however, admit that it is 'well established that an officer should not do anything overtly or intentionally to cause the witness to identify a suspect in a photo array or line-up.'. . Defendants' argument about established police procedures misses the mark because whether there were generally accepted police practices for conducting identification procedures does not speak to whether it was clearly established in December 1993 and January 1994 that police officers violated a criminal defendant's due process rights by conducting impermissibly suggestive identification procedures. Indeed, it has been clearly established since at least 1977 that a criminal defendant has a due process right not to be subjected to unduly suggestive identifications that taint his criminal trial. . . As such, Defendant Officers' qualified immunity argument fails.")

Spaulding v. City of Chicago, No. 12 C 8777, 2016 WL 2733232, at *10-13 (N.D. Ill. May 11, 2016) ("The parties agree that Plaintiffs' work for IAD is not protected by the First Amendment. . . They disagree, however, over whether Plaintiffs' reports to the FBI about Watts's illegal activity, and their pre-IAD work for the FBI, are constitutionally protected. . . .Under these precedents [discussed in case], all of which were issued before the retaliatory conduct alleged in this case, Plaintiffs' speech to the FBI—from their initial report to Smith in late 2007 until the August 17, 2008 meeting where the CPD formally assigned them to Operation Brass Tax—is protected by the First Amendment. Prompted by Watson's dismissal of Echeverria's debriefing of the suspect who reported Watts's activity, Plaintiffs reported Watts's misconduct to an outside law enforcement agency, on their own initiative, while off-duty and on their own time. These were not 'the tasks [Plaintiffs were] paid to perform,'. . . and police corruption is, as Defendants concede, . . . a matter of public concern. It follows that Plaintiffs' speech to the FBI before August 17, 2008—when, with their assignment to Detached Services, their reports to the FBI became part of their official CPD duties—is constitutionally protected. . . .As discussed above, the record would allow a reasonable jury to find a First Amendment violation, so Plaintiffs have met their 'burden of establishing that [their] rights were violated' under the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . For the second element, Plaintiffs submit that ever since the Supreme Court issued Garcetti in 2006, it 'has been clearly established law … that the First Amendment protects a public employee who complains about public corruption in a forum outside of his or her official job duties.'. . As noted above, the Seventh Circuit has applied the Garcetti standard in a variety of contexts. [collecting cases] All of these cases were issued before August 17, 2010, the first alleged act of retaliation in this case. And because the Seventh Circuit—in Chaklos, Chrzanowski, and Houskins—has consistently interpreted Garcetti to hold that the speech of an employee who reports misconduct outside official or established channels is constitutionally protected, reasonable police officers in the defendant officers' position would have known that Plaintiffs' speech to FBI was protected and that any retaliation against them for that speech would violate the First Amendment.")

Herrera v. Pohl, No. 15 C 2983, 2015 WL 7731867, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 1, 2015)("It was ultimately discovered that Herrera could be charged with an unrelated crime, but that is of no effect when the question is whether he was unlawfully held for the month preceding the issuance of a warrant in that other case. The wheels that ultimately resulted in the indictment's dismissal were set in motion too late because Houpt and Knudsen failed in their duty to consider evidence at their ready disposal that at a glance would have resolved whether they had the wrong man. . . .Houpt and Knudsen raise the defense of qualified immunity, a defense that should be decided at as early a stage as is consistent with the liberal notice pleading requirements of Rule 8 . . . .Houpt and Knudsen cannot . . . take refuge by simply pointing to the absence of clearly analogous caselaw. Law enforcement personnel do not get a free pass for shocking and egregious abuses of power simply because those abuses mark an innovation in the catalogue of shocking and egregious abuses of power. And their conduct as alleged by Herrera (and as necessarily credited at this threshold stage) does fit under the well-established rubric of Hankins, BeVier and Armstrong, which possess the appropriate specificity to have put a reasonable officer on notice that he had a duty to act.")

Vaughn v. City of Chicago, 14 C 47, 2014 WL 3865838, *3, *4 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 5, 2014) ("At the motion to dismiss stage, Defendants are not entitled to the inference that their actions left Vaughn no worse off than when he returned to the scene with a stick in hand. . . It is plausible that Vaughn was safer with a stick in his hand than he was after Defendants ordered him to drop it. In simple terms, Defendants made Vaughn an easier target for would-be assailants in the rival group than he otherwise would have been. This marginal increase in risk is sufficient to state a plausible state-created danger claim. . . . [A]n individual has clearly established rights not be stranded (Paine) or trapped (Monfils) in dangerous situations that state actors either created or made more perilous. . . Plaintiff's claim falls within this clearly established line of cases. Defendants stranded Vaughn in a dangerous situation by ordering him to drop the object he intended to use for self-protection and simply watching while he was bludgeoned to death. The same police actions placed Vaughn in a trap of sorts by making him an easy target for the man who killed him. In short, Defendants are not entitled to dismissal on qualified immunity grounds because Plaintiff's claim is based on clearly established due process rights.")

T.V. ex rel. B.V. v. Smith-Green Community School Corp., 2011 WL 3501698, at *17 (N.D. Ind. 2011) ("Principal Couch has qualified immunity from damages because, on the current state of the developing law in this context, particularly involving student speech originating off-campus and by use of the internet, Couch's actions could reasonably have been thought to be consistent with the rights they are alleged to have violated.")

Husband v. Turner , No. 07-CV-391-bbc, 2008 WL 2002737, at *4, *5 (W.D. Wis. May 6, 2008) ("Defendants contend that plaintiff's right to a Miranda warning under the circumstances of the in-school interrogation was not so clear that reasonable officers would have known that failure to give a Miranda warning would violate plaintiff's Fifth Amendment rights. Defendants are correct. No precedent addresses the custodial nature of school interrogations by police officers. Moreover, although no case on point is necessary where the constitutional violation is obvious, . . . this is not such an obvious case. In the circumstances of plaintiff's interrogation, it was not so evident that a Miranda warning was required that defendants should have reasonably known that a lack of such a warning would violate plaintiff's constitutional rights. Accordingly, when defendants interrogated plaintiff on April 12, 2002, his right to a Miranda warning was not clearly established. Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to give such a warning. Moreover, although defendants do not raise this argument, it was not even clear in 2002 that a failure to give a Miranda warning was a violation of a constitutional right and not simply a ground for excluding evidence obtained from a suspect before the warning was given. At the time, no opinion from the Supreme Court or the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that a failure to give a Miranda warning violated a person's constitutional rights. . . Indeed, courts in other circuits had explained that a failure to give a Miranda warning was not a constitutional violation.[citing cases] Some courts have suggested that the Supreme Court repudiated this rationale in 2000 in Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000), in which the Court stated that Miranda announced a 'constitutional rule.' . . However, Dickerson did not hold that a violation of Miranda is a violation of the Fifth Amendment. . . The Court declined the invitation to 'go farther than Miranda' and refused to say that 'Miranda warnings are required by the Constitution.'. . . In the absence of clear Supreme Court authority, a failure to give a Miranda warning was not clearly established as a constitutional violation until *Sornberge*r, 434 F.3d 1006, was decided in 2006. Sornberger held that if a suspect's statement were used against him in a 'criminal case,' a Miranda violation was actionable under § 1983 (and therefore a constitutional violation). . . Because it was not clearly established until 2006 that a failure to give a Miranda warning was a constitutional violation, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to give plaintiff a Miranda warning on April 12, 2002.").

West v. Frank, No. 04-C-173-C, 2005 WL 701703, at 5-7 (W.D. Wis. Mar. 25, 2005)(not reported) ("Defendants do not try to defend the constitutionality of the decisions to deny plaintiff the downloaded internet materials sent to him under the old version of DOC 309 IMP 1. They do not argue that any penological interest was furthered by denying plaintiff the materials sent to him by his family and they do not try to show any reasonable relation between their actions and any penological interest. Instead, they argue that plaintiff's right to receive internet materials was not clearly established at the time the original version of DOC 309 IMP I was in effect. Because the policy burdens plaintiff's First Amendment right to receive mail and because there is no record evidence of any legitimate penological interest served by the restriction, I must conclude that the policy violated plaintiff's First Amendment rights. . . Plaintiff frames the right at issue in this case as an inmate's 'right to information,' which was recognized in Turner. Although that case did not establish or recognize this right explicitly, it did acknowledge implicitly that prison inmates have protected interests in sending and receiving mail. . . It is reasonable to infer that these interests grow out of an underlying interest inmates have in receiving and sending information. Thus, plaintiff's contention is not an incorrect statement of the law. For the purpose of the 'clearly established' inquiry, however, the right identified by plaintiff is too broad because it fails to incorporate the specific factual context of this case. . . The fact that an inmate's right to information was clearly established at the time defendants' denied plaintiff's mail would not put defendants on notice that the reason why plaintiff's mail was denied in this case was constitutionally suspect. The proper formulation of the right at issue in this case is an inmate's right to receive and possess materials downloaded from the internet. To date, neither the United States Supreme Court nor the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit has held that a prison policy prohibiting inmates from receiving internet materials violates the First Amendment. . . The lack of controlling authority in plaintiff's favor does not foreclose the possibility of finding a right clearly established if there is 'such a clear trend in the case law that we can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by controlling precedent was merely a matter of time.' . . . . From August 2003 to February 2004, the time during which defendants denied delivery of plaintiff's mail, Clement [v. California Dept. of Corrections, 364 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir.2004)] was the only case fairly on point. One case does not constitute a clear trend in the law. Given the sometimes extensive curtailment of constitutional rights in the prison setting, the limitation imposed by the earlier version of DOC 309 IMP 1 was not so obviously unconstitutional that reasonable persons in defendants' shoes would have known they were violating plaintiff's First Amendment rights by refusing delivery of his mail.").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Clinton v. Garrett, No. 21-2763, 2022 WL 4362171, at *7 (8th Cir. Sept. 21, 2022) ("The officers argue that there is no clearly established right to drive with a nervous passenger through a high crime neighborhood with a temporary tag that is unable to be read by officers following the vehicle. We have already dismissed this argument to the extent that it relies upon Clinton's nervous passenger and the area where he was driving. These facts, in isolation, do not support a conclusion that Clinton's vehicle was connected to unlawful activity in general, much less to the specific kind of unlawful activity for which the officers pulled him over—a possible temporary tag violation. Nor can a driver rightly be held responsible for ambient conditions that render a tag illegible. . . The authority is clear: officers must have particularized facts that give rise to reasonable suspicion in order for a stop to be constitutionally valid. . . The officers cannot point to any positive indicator for their suspicion that Clinton's tag was falsified. . . . By the clearly established law, this court 'cannot sanction stops justified only by the generalized and ever-present possibility that interrogation and inspection may reveal that any given motorist has committed some crime.'. . For these reasons, the officers' stop of Clinton's vehicle constituted a violation of his clearly established rights. Hence, the district court did not err in concluding that they were not entitled to qualified immunity. And since the stop constituted a violation of Clinton's Fourth Amendment rights, the court did not err in granting summary judgment to Clinton.")

McDaniel v. Neal, 44 F.4th 1085, 1090-92 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Because the district court denied Neal qualified immunity, we can infer it concluded that, accepting McDaniel's description of the facts, a reasonable jury could conclude that Neal's use of force was excessive. At this stage, we view the facts in the light most favorable to McDaniel. McDaniel did attempt to flee, but both Smith and Neal had grabbed him by the time he reached the closed door. They knew McDaniel was unarmed, and the offense they were there to arrest him for was nonviolent. [shoplifting at Walmart] At the time Neal performed the takedown, he had already wrapped his arms around McDaniel and pulled him back to the bench, so McDaniel was no longer able to flee. Despite these circumstances, Neal proceeded to throw McDaniel to the ground with enough force to fracture his collarbone and skull and cause a brain injury. . . . McDaniel acknowledges that his case is factually similar to Kelsay v. Ernst, 933 F.3d 975 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc). . . . The takedown knocked Kelsay briefly unconscious and broke her collarbone. . . The district court denied the officer's motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, and the en banc court reversed, holding that the officer did not violate a clearly established right on May 29, 2014. . . McDaniel does not point to a case between May 29, 2014, and August 13, 2017, that clearly established that Neal's use of force was excessive. . . .[N]either we nor McDaniel can identify a case or body of case law that clearly established as of August 13, 2017, that Neal's use of force was excessive, even viewing the facts in the light most favorable to McDaniel. Given the Supreme Court's strict instructions on this point, we are compelled to conclude that Neal is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Doe v. Aberdeen School District, 42 F.4th 883, 890-94 (8th Cir. 2022) ("A school seizure requires that a 'limitation on the student's freedom of movement must significantly exceed that inherent in everyday, compulsory attendance.'. . We believe secluding A.A. in the little room and B.B. in the calm-down corner constituted seizures. In Couture, the Tenth Circuit noted that a child 'was certainly subject to greater restrictions than are most students' because he had been 'at times physically carried into' a small 'timeout room, where teachers shut and barricaded the door,' while his 'requests for release from the room were consistently denied.'. . Likewise here, Weisenburger and her aides picked up and carried A.A. into the little room, held the door shut, and forbade her from leaving until she completed tasks unrelated to any disciplinary violation. Staff also shuttered B.B. in the calm-down corner with physical barriers and prevented him from leaving. We emphasize that an ordinary school timeout is not a Fourth Amendment seizure. To reiterate, the restriction on liberty 'must significantly exceed' what a child usually confronts in a public educational setting. . . The combination presented here—dragging students, confining them in locked or barricaded areas, and barring them from leaving on pain of further physical intervention—exceeds that demanding threshold. Weisenburger curtailed A.A. and B.B.'s movement severely enough to implicate the Constitution. Grabbing B.B. to push him into the swimming pool and pinning C.C. down to strip his clothes off also rose to the level of seizures. . . .It is often repeated that qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . By its terms, the 'substantial departure' standard ensures that only plainly incompetent professionals who forsake accepted judgment, practices, or standards will face liability for the unconstitutional seizure of a disabled student. '[A] general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though "the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful."'. . Because Weisenburger substantially departed from accepted principles when restraining and secluding the students, she violated clearly established federal rights. . . . [V]iewing the facts in the light most favorable to the students, we find four violations of clearly established Fourth Amendment rights: (1) secluding A.A. in the little room before February 4, 2016; (2) secluding B.B. in the calm-down corner using dividers; (3) grabbing B.B.'s arms to push him into the swimming pool; and (4) pinning C.C. down to strip his clothes off. Weisenburger is not entitled to qualified immunity for those violations but is for all other unreasonable seizure allegations. . . . The takeaway is that student unreasonable seizure claims must rise or fall under the Fourth Amendment, while school excessive force claims warrant separate review under the Due Process Clause. In consequence, the students' restraint and seclusion allegations cannot move forward as substantive due process claims. The remaining generalized assertions of physical and verbal abuse fail to meet the high bar required for a substantive due process violation. Plaintiffs 'must show that "the behavior of the [government official was] so egregious, so outrageous, that it may fairly be said to shock the contemporary conscience."'. . The physical abuse allegations never specifically identify A.A., B.B., or C.C. as the victims. . . In any event, briefly grabbing a student's chin or arm is not 'so inspired by malice or sadism rather than a merely careless or unwise excess of zeal that it amount[s] to brutal and inhumane abuse of official power.'. . Also, '[v]erbal abuse is normally not a constitutional violation'. . . . Nothing in the record convinces us otherwise here. The district court erred in denying qualified immunity for Weisenburger on the students' substantive due process claims.")

Street v. Leyshock, 41 F.4th 987, 990 (8th Cir. 2022) ("[T]he officers assert that they are entitled to qualified immunity on the plaintiffs' conspiracy claims, because the unsettled nature of the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine means that they did not violate a clearly established right. The intracorporate conspiracy doctrine provides that 'a local government entity cannot conspire with itself through its agents acting within the scope of their employment.'. . The Supreme Court in Ziglar v. Abbasi . . . held that officials who allegedly conspired to interfere with civil rights under 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3) were entitled to qualified immunity, because the unresolved scope of the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine meant that reasonable officers 'would not have known with any certainty that the alleged agreements were forbidden by law.'. . In Faulk, this court explained that neither the Supreme Court nor this court had 'definitively addressed the issue whether the doctrine applies to § 1983 conspiracy claims,' and observed that two other circuits had held that the doctrine does apply. . . Accordingly, the officers who allegedly conceived or executed the 'kettling plan' were entitled to qualified immunity on the conspiracy claim. . . The same result obtains here.")

Hartman v. Bowles, 39 F.4th 544, 545-47 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Does a detective violate a clearly established constitutional right by omitting information from a warrant application that he does not actually know, even if the reason is his own reckless investigation? The answer is no, which means he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .[T]he question is whether his failure to know that fact—allegedly due to a reckless investigation—can give rise to a clearly established Franks violation. . .The cases say no. . . For that reason, '[w]hat the officer-affiant should have known does not matter.'. .For their part, the Hartmans cannot identify a single case that holds otherwise. . . Of those they cite, many are not Franks cases at all. . . Others were not even on the books when Detective Bowles acted. . . The bottom line is that, given there are no cases supporting the Hartmans' position, Detective Bowles was not on 'fair notice that [his] conduct was unlawful.'") Torres v. City of St. Louis, 39 F.4th 494, 507 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Moving to appellees' § 1983 conspiracy claims, we recently noted that 'we have never definitively addressed the issue whether the [intracorporate conspiracy] doctrine applies to § 1983 conspiracy claims.'. . In Faulk, we concluded that our opinions recognizing § 1983 conspiracy claims against police officers from the same department who conspired to violate clearly established rights do not address the applicability of the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine and, thus, 'do not clearly establish that reasonable officers "would ... have known with any certainty" that planning, designing, monitoring, or executing "the illegal kettling plan" would expose them to damage liability for a § 1983 conspiracy claim.'. . Similarly, here, given the uncertain applicability of the doctrine, these precedents do not clearly establish that reasonable officers would have known that agreeing and planning to violate Hammett's and Dennis's constitutional rights and then taking steps to cover up their use of excessive force would expose them to liability for a § 1983 conspiracy claim. Thus, because it is not clearly established that the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine does not apply to § 1983 conspiracy claims, we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the defendant officers on Counts 2 and 6.")

J.T.H. v. Missouri Dep't of Soc. Servs. Children's Div., 39 F.4th 489, 493 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Here, the complaint falls short of establishing that Cook violated a clearly established right. . . Even assuming that the facts in the complaint are true and drawing all reasonable inferences in the parents' favor, 'existing precedent' does not 'place[ ] ... the constitutional question beyond debate.'. . After all, we have never recognized a retaliatory-investigation claim of this kind. Nor have other courts around the country, which have either rejected the possibility outright or concluded, like we do today, that the law is still in flux. . . It is safe to say, in other words, that the law is anything but clear. It makes no difference that, 'as a general matter, the First Amendment prohibits government officials from subjecting an individual to retaliatory actions ... on the basis of ... constitutionally protected speech.'. . The Supreme Court has instructed us 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . So even if there is a general right to be free of retaliation, the law is not clearly established enough to cover the 'specific context of the case': retaliatory investigation. . . Cook is entitled to qualified immunity for both investigative acts.")

Northland Baptist Church of St. Paul, Minnesota v. Walz, 37 F.4th 1365, 1374-75 (8th Cir. 2022) ("We agree with the district court that Governor Walz is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim because appellants have not shown that Governor Walz's response to COVID-19—specifically, closing and then restricting the capacity of businesses deemed non-critical—was a taking under clearly established law. . . . Ultimately, we find that, in 2020, the law was not clearly established such that Governor Walz would have understood that his issuance of the challenged EOs violated appellants' constitutional right to just compensation for a government taking. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity and dismiss appellants' takings claim.")

Hovick v. Patterson, 37 F.4th 511, 516-19 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Our qualified-immunity inquiry 'involv[es] two questions—whether the official's conduct violated a constitutional or statutory right, and whether that right was clearly established.'. . 'We may take up either question first, and in this case we opt to consider whether any right violated here was clearly established, a matter that [the Hovicks] bear[ ] the burden to show.'. . . Winegar . . .is distinguishable from the present case and would not have alerted a reasonable DHS official that his or her conduct was unlawful in the present case. . . First, the public school teacher in Winegar was a government employee. . . By contrast, Mrs. Hovick is not a government employee. And, even if her employer, Boys Town, qualifies as an independent contractor of the government entitled to due process protections, it is not clear under our precedents that Mrs. Hovick—an employee of an independent contractor— is also entitled to such protections. . . Second, as the district court noted, in Winegar, '[t]he investigation had concluded and a final decision made against [the teacher]. Pre-deprivation procedures were not the focus of the analysis.'. . Instead, we focused on the postdeprivation procedures, explaining that 'at some point' the teacher would be 'entitled ... to a full-blown hearing.'. . By contrast, the focus of this case is on predeprivation procedures; specifically, whether the offer of an interview as a predeprivation procedure is sufficient to satisfy procedural due process prior to an interim finding of founded child abuse. . . .The Hovicks rely on persuasive authority from the Seventh Circuit, the Ninth Circuit, a federal district court, and several state courts. . . But the Hovicks cite these cases for 'general proposition[s]' of law, not for their factual similarity to the present case. . . .'Finally, this is not the rare case where a general constitutional rule applies with "obvious clarity."'. .In summary, the Hovicks have not proven that the law was clearly established such that the defendants should 'reasonably have been expected to know that the interim finding of founded child abuse pending the interviews of the Hovicks violated Mrs. Hovick's right to due process.'. . We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to the defendants on the basis of qualified immunity.") Martinez v. Sasse, 37 F.4th 506, 509-10 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Although the claim here alleges use of excessive force, the parties dispute the threshold question whether Sasse seized Martinez at all within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. Martinez argues that Sasse effected a seizure when she pushed Martinez to the ground before locking the doors to the ICE facility. Sasse maintains, however, that when an officer's use of force is designed only to repel a person from entering a facility, there is no seizure. On that view, Martinez may have a tort claim against Sasse for assault or battery if the officer used unjustified force, but Sasse did not violate the Fourth Amendment. As of June 2018, the Supreme Court had explained that a seizure occurs 'when the officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, has in some way restrained the liberty of a citizen.'. . Sasse maintains that her alleged push of Martinez did not 'restrain' the lawyer, but served instead to 'repel' her from entering the federal facility. . . . Martinez responds that a seizure occurs where an officer restrains a person even briefly. She relies on Torres v. Madrid, —— U.S. ——, 141 S. Ct. 989, 209 L.Ed.2d 190 (2021), which held that police seized a suspect for the instant that police bullets struck her, even though the suspect temporarily eluded capture thereafter. . . Torres, however, was decided after the encounter at issue here, so cannot be clearly established law for purposes of this case. In any event, Torres involved force used to apprehend a suspect, and did not address whether force used only to repel constitutes a seizure. . . . As with the force used to repel Martinez in this case, the force in Quraishi was not employed to apprehend a subject. If there is a constitutional distinction between force used for repulsion that momentarily restricts forward movement and force used for dispersion that impels retreat, the distinction is not so readily apparent that every reasonable officer would have understood it. For these reasons, we conclude that Martinez has not adequately pleaded that Sasse violated a clearly established right, because it was not clearly established as of June 2018 that Sasse's alleged push was a seizure under the Fourth Amendment.")

Davis v. Dawson, 33 F.4th 993, 999 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Officers of the Des Moines Police Department, in particular, were on notice that they could not detain someone for questioning against their will, even in a homicide investigation, absent probable cause. This court determined in Seymour that officers from that department violated a father's rights when they detained him without probable cause while investigating his young son's sudden hospitalization and death. . .The officers cite a district court case with similar facts to support that the law is not clearly defined. See Magnan v. Doe, 2012 WL 5247325, at *5 (D. Minn. 2012). In that case, the officers detained family members of an attempted-homicide victim at the crime scene despite their protestations that they needed to go to the hospital to be with him. . . The district court, however, found that based on the circumstances the officers formed a reasonable suspicion that the family members 'were somehow involved with the homicides.'. . Here, by contrast, the officers denied having any such reasonable suspicion that the family was involved in the homicide. Further, the district court in Magnan denied qualified immunity as to the duration and conditions of detention once the scene was secure because it was not clear that detention in the squad cars was the 'least intrusive means available.'. . There is also a robust consensus that seizing witnesses to a crime in similar circumstances is a clearly established constitutional violation. [collecting cases]")

Doe by next friend Rothert v. Chapman, 30 F.4th 766, 772, 774-75 (8th Cir., 2022) ("Public officials are protected by qualified immunity unless the facts show a violation of a constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . Doe claims that Chapman violated her clearly established constitutional right to apply for a judicial bypass without notifying her parents. Chapman counters that (1) the Supreme Court has not recognized a constitutional right to apply for a judicial bypass without pre-hearing parental notification; (2) there is a circuit split on the issue; and (3) this court's decision in Planned Parenthood Ass'n of Kansas City, Missouri, Inc. v. Ashcroft is not controlling because (a) it is factually distinguishable, (b) a single holding of this court does not make a right clearly established, and (c) clerks of Missouri courts are not bound by Eighth Circuit precedent. . . . Relying on parental notice cases like Akron (and Miller and Camblos), Chapman argues she could not have deprived Doe of a clearly established right because Supreme Court precedent is inconclusive, and circuit courts are split. But § 188.028 is not a 'mere notice statute'; it requires parental consent—or a court order bypassing parental consent—exactly like the statute in Bellotti (and Ashcroft). Bellotti is clear: parental consent statutes are unconstitutional unless they provide the pregnant minor an opportunity to seek a court order without notifying her parents. . . By requiring notice to Doe's parents before her bypass hearing, Chapman implemented the prior version of § 188.028 this court found unconstitutional under Bellotti. . . Because Doe's constitutional right to apply for a judicial bypass without notifying her parents is clearly established by Supreme Court precedent, this court need not address Chapman's other arguments about qualified immunity.")

Faulk v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 30 F.4th 739, 749-50 (8th Cir. 2022) ("As Faulk notes, we have never definitively addressed the issue whether the [intracorporate conspiracy] doctrine applies to § 1983 conspiracy claims. . . Other circuits have addressed the issue. Two have expressly held that the doctrine applies to § 1983 conspiracy claims, but its application in a particular case is subject to recognized exceptions. . . In surveying the decisions from other circuits, what stands out is the fact-intensive nature of their inquiries. None holds the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine always applies, or never applies. Some hold it generally applies but is subject to exceptions. Others hold it does not apply in certain circumstances. This array is consistent with the doctrine's history we have briefly summarized. On one side of the current ledger as defined by Faulk is Justice Breyer's opinion as a circuit judge in Stathos, a decision cited in Justice White's dissent to illustrate the circuit conflict later addressed in Ziglar. . . It is reasonable to assume that the Court's statement in Ziglar that 'different considerations [might] apply to a conspiracy respecting equal protection guarantees,' . . . reflected consideration of the Stathos opinion. Justice Breyer, the author of Stathos, dissented in Ziglar but only addressed the main issue in that case -- whether to extend Bivens to the various claims at issue. Logically, this silence suggests at least tacit agreement with the majority that issues regarding whether and how to apply the doctrine to civil rights cases defy categorical pronouncements. Approaching the issue from this perspective, it is significant that the FAC's conspiracy allegations are entirely focused on 'the illegal kettling plan.' If the plan itself was an unconstitutional municipal policy, then the City and all defendants 'personally involved in that unconstitutional policy-making' are subject to § 1983 liability; Count V adds nothing to Faulk's § 1983 claims against those defendants. . . Likewise, Faulk does not need Count V to hold liable under § 1983 SLMPD officers who, while executing the kettling plan, participated in the constitutional violations Faulk alleges, even if the plan itself was not an unconstitutional policy. Under these particular circumstances, all that Count V adds is the risk of liability for an officer whose only role in the illegal kettling plan was to follow his employer's orders to block egress. This claim is inconsistent with well-established § 1983 principles of individual liability. . . In these circumstances, we conclude that the issue on appeal regarding Count V is analogous to Ziglar, where the Court granted qualified immunity because the uncertain applicability of the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine meant that § 1985(3) liability was not clearly established. . . Our opinions in *Small a*nd Lenderman did not address this issue and have not been endorsed by the Supreme Court. Therefore, they do not clearly establish that reasonable officers 'would ... have known with any certainty' that planning, designing, monitoring, or executing 'the illegal kettling plan' would expose them to damage liability for a § 1983 conspiracy claim.")

Mitchell v. Kirchmeier, 28 F.4th 888, 898-99 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Here, the complaint did not suggest that Mitchell was suspected of anything more than trespassing and obstructing a government function, both nonviolent misdemeanors. . . Nor did the complaint suggest that Mitchell threatened anyone or fled or resisted arrest; on the contrary, it alleged that he simply stood with his hands above his head. It is 'clearly established' that the use of more than de minimis force in circumstances like these violates the Fourth Amendment. . . Nonetheless, according to the complaint, the officers shot Mitchell with shotgun-propelled, lead-filled bean bags that shattered his eye socket. Our cases clearly establish that gentler treatment than this constitutes more than de minimis force. . . True, the complaint did not allege that the officers were aiming at Mitchell's face. But it did allege that the officers were aiming at Mitchell. And the severity of Mitchell's injuries confirms what any 'reasonable officer in [the defendants'] position' would have known: to fire a shotgun loaded with a lead-filled bean bag at a person, regardless of whether one is aiming at the person's face, is to use more than de minimis force against the person. . .Therefore, assuming the nonconclusory allegations in the complaint are true, the officers who shot Mitchell violated his Fourth Amendment rights. Furthermore, because it was clearly established that the alleged conduct violated Mitchell's Fourth Amendment rights, we must assume at this stage in the litigation that the officers who allegedly shot Mitchell are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . The district court erred in dismissing Mitchell's Fourth Amendment claim against the officers who allegedly shot him. . . . Mitchell's allegations that he was 'peacefully protesting'—neither committing a serious crime nor threatening anyone's safety nor fleeing or resisting arrest—when the officers shot him with lead-filled bean bags capable of shattering his eye socket are sufficient to state a claim for excessive force. Unless and until discovery tells a different story, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Williams v. City of Burlington, Iowa, 27 F.4th 1346, 1352 (8th Cir. 2022) (" 'Since 1985, it has been established by the Supreme Court that the use of deadly force against a fleeing suspect who does not pose a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officers or others is not permitted.'. . The right established in Garner is sufficiently clear. . . . Chiprez emphasizes his (alleged) belief that Jones was still armed. He does not claim that he was ignorant of the constitutional prohibition against the use of deadly force against an unarmed, non-dangerous suspect. The officers had no reason except the gun to believe Jones was dangerous; the traffic stop was initiated for a noise ordinance. If, construing the evidence most favorably to the estate, Chiprez knew Jones was unarmed, then shooting him violated a clearly established constitutional right.")

Irvin v. Richardson, 20 F.4th 1199, 1204-05, 1207 (8th Cir. 2021) ("When the issue is whether a § 1983 defendant police officer violated a clearly established Fourth Amendment right, if we determine that the officer lacked reasonable suspicion and thus conducted an unlawful Terry stop, he 'may nonetheless be entitled to qualified immunity if [he] had arguable reasonable suspicion -- that is, if a reasonable officer in the same position could have believed [he] had reasonable suspicion.'. . . Here, Officers Richardson and Jupin actively investigated the disturbance after detaining Irvin and Bates, delayed by their refusal to cooperate. When backup arrived, Richardson interviewed a cooperative third individual and searched the area for a weapon. Jupin contacted a witness, who said that Irvin and Bates were not involved in the reported disturbance. Jupin promptly removed the handcuffs and told Irvin and Bates they were free to go, ending their detention. The entire encounter lasted approximately 13 minutes. We agree with the district court that Irvin and Bates 'were detained no longer than was necessary for the officers to pursue their investigation' and therefore the lawful Terry stop 'did not evolve into an arrest.' The circumstances here are readily distinguishable from the handcuffing and extended detention in our recent, divided panel opinion in Haynes v. Minnehan, No. 20-1777 (8th Cir. Sep. 21, 2021). For these reasons, we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity dismissing these Fourth Amendment claims.")

Irvin v. Richardson, 20 F.4th 1199, 1210-12 (8th Cir. 2021) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("That Irvin and Bates may have matched the race and gender of the suspect and that they were in the same general location identified by the caller are not enough to raise a reasonable suspicion that either of them was the person who displayed a firearm. . . .Viewing the facts in Irvin and Bates's favor, a reasonable jury could find that the officers lacked reasonable suspicion to stop and detain them. . .Applying the same standard, the Terry stop in this case—even if it was lawful initially—evolved into an arrest requiring probable cause. . . . Because I would find that the officers lacked reasonable and articulable suspicion to detain Bates and Irvin, I would also conclude that they failed to meet the more demanding standard of probable cause required for an arrest. . . .With the contours of these rights sufficiently clear . . . and viewing all of the facts in the light most favorable to Bates and Irvin, I believe that Officers Richardson and Jupin are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceeding.")

LeMay v. Mays, 18 F.4th 283, 288 (8th Cir. 2021) ("In both instances, the complaint sets forth that Mays shot both Ciroc and Rocko when they presented no imminent danger and were not acting aggressively. This establishes a viable claim that Mays unreasonably seized the dogs in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . It is clearly established that an officer cannot shoot a dog in the absence of an objectively legitimate and imminent threat to him or others.")

Haynes v. Minnehan, 14 F.4th 830, 837-38 (8th Cir. 2021) ("[T]he way that the officers conducted the seizure 'was not "reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place."'. . Consequently, the initially lawful Terry stop ultimately violated Haynes's Fourth Amendment rights. . . Because the officers violated the Constitution, Haynes satisfied the first qualified-immunity prong. . . For the second qualified-immunity prong, we ask if case law would have fairly notified every reasonable officer in Minnehan and Steinkamp's shoes that their conduct would violate the Constitution. . . We conclude that it does. More than six years before Steinkamp handcuffed Haynes, we said that it was 'well established that if suspects are cooperative and officers have no objective concerns for safety, the officers may not use intrusive tactics such as handcuffing absent any extraordinary circumstances.'. . We concluded that 'the prior case law provided fair warning to [an officer] at the time of the incident' that a reasonable officer in her place 'could not have believed it was lawful to handcuff and frisk a suspect absent any concern for safety.'. . And even earlier, we rejected an argument that reasonable suspicion justified handcuffing a suspect after a frisk confirmed that the suspect lacked a weapon or contraband. . . The dissent suggests this case is controlled by our recent decision in Pollreis v. Marzolf, 2021 WL 3610875 (8th Cir. Aug. 16, 2021). But we believe Pollreis differs from this case in a number of important ways. There, on a dark and rainy night, a police officer set up a perimeter around a car crash to apprehend fleeing suspects of gang-related activity, one of whom was believed to be carrying a gun. . . The officer encountered two individuals who matched a vague description of the fleeing suspects. . . The officer held them for several minutes until backup arrived and then handcuffed and frisked them before letting them go. . . In stark contrast to the situation in Pollreis, no dispatcher warned that Haynes was likely armed. There was not a solitary officer left with multiple suspects in the dark. Haynes, unlike the suspects in Pollreis, had been thoroughly searched and cleared for weapons, contraband, and evidence of drug dealing. Yet, he remained handcuffed. In sum, the reasonable concern of danger to the officer present in Pollreis was lacking here. Because Minnehan and Steinkamp had fair notice that they could not handcuff Haynes without an objective safety concern, we conclude that the district court erred in granting qualified immunity. By extension, that conclusion also upends the district court's Monell holding, which it fused to its qualified-immunity analysis.")

Haynes v. Minnehan, 14 F.4th 830, 838-43 (8th Cir. 2021) (Shepherd, J., dissenting) ("[T]he majority properly concludes that Officer Steinkamp constitutionally placed Haynes in handcuffs, noting that 'we have repeatedly equated a person's suspected drug-deal involvement with a reasonable belief that the same person may be armed and dangerous.'. . However, the majority denies qualified immunity to the officers because the handcuffs were not removed at the conclusion of Officer Steinkamp's patdown and search of Haynes's person, and Haynes remained handcuffed for an additional approximately four minutes and forty-five seconds. I disagree because it was not clearly established that the officers could not constitutionally keep Haynes handcuffed post-frisk and until his identity and his criminal status could be determined. For this reason, I respectfully dissent. . . . I doubt that Haynes has shown the violation of a constitutional right by virtue of the failure of the officers to remove the handcuffs from Haynes's wrists for four minutes and forty-five seconds after the conclusion of the patdown and search. However, even if he has, it was not clearly established on July 26, 2018, that Haynes's Fourth Amendment rights would be violated under these circumstances. . . . In some circumstances, a frisk during a Terry stop will no doubt dispel an officer's suspicion that the suspect is armed and dangerous and that he or she may flee. However, the facts here are not so straightforward. Haynes was suspected of drug activity, which we deem a dangerous crime. . . While the check of a driver's name is a routine 'mission' of traffic stops, Haynes was unable to produce his driver's license or any other form of government-issued identification upon the officers' request, a misdemeanor offense under Iowa law, . . . and this delayed the officers' confirmation of Haynes's identity and his lack of outstanding wants or warrants to the end of the traffic stop. While the search of Haynes's person did not reveal a weapon or contraband, it did reveal a wad of cash in Haynes's pocket. Further, Haynes stood next to the open door of his vehicle, which had not been searched. And ultimately, the entire stop took approximately 11 minutes. . . It is incongruous that, after finding qualified immunity appropriate in Pollreis, the Court now denies qualified immunity to Officers Steinkamp and Minnehan. In Pollreis, an officer responded to a dispatch call describing suspects who had fled from the scene of a car crash, one of which was likely armed. . . The officer stopped two young boys—12 and 14 years old—and held them facedown at gunpoint despite their mother's and stepfather's identification of them; the boys' cooperation; and the frisk of the boys and the search of their backpack, neither of which revealed weapons or drugs. . . In total, the officer kept the boys handcuffed for approximately 2 minutes and the stop lasted a total of approximately 7 minutes. . . . I can see no meaningful distinction between the facts in Pollreis and the facts here. Like the officer in Pollreis, Officers Steinkamp and Minnehan kept Haynes handcuffed only long enough to satisfy 'the stop's specific purpose: to identify [Haynes].'. . The Pollreis Court noted the boys' close proximity to a reported crime scene and appearance, which matched that of the suspects. . . Factually, Haynes's story is almost identical: he was stopped near the scene of an alleged hand-to-hand drug transaction and matched the suspect's description given by dispatch. True, there was not 'low visibility' during Haynes's stop, and Haynes did not make a 'hand-to-waist' movement as one of the boys did. . . However, the objective of both stops was the same: verify the identity of the handcuffed suspect(s). In Pollreis, the Court held that 7 minutes was not too long to achieve that objective while here, the majority holds that 11 minutes is too long to achieve the same objective. Given the approximate 4-minute difference in the two stops' lengths, I cannot square the Court's two outcomes. Contrary to the majority's suggestion, it is not my position that handcuffing should be 'a routine part of a Terry stop.'. . Indeed, handcuffing is inappropriate where there is no indication the suspect is dangerous. However, this is not a situation in which there was an 'absence of reasons to believe the subject [was] dangerous.'. . My conclusion is limited to the scenario currently before this Court: the officers were responding to a suspected hand-to-hand drug transaction in a high crime area—a scenario that this Court has repeatedly characterized as inherently dangerous and often associated with weapons—and therefore, until the officers could satisfy the 'stop's specific purpose' and identify Haynes, they were 'justified in taking the amount of time needed to accomplish [that] purpose.'. . I would grant the officers qualified immunity as, under prong two of the qualified immunity inquiry, it was not clearly established that Haynes should have been released from handcuffs at the conclusion of the patdown and search of his person. For these reasons, I would affirm the district court.")

Graham v. Barnette, 5 F.4th 872, 880-83 (8th Cir. 2021) (on remand from Supreme Court) ("We previously affirmed the district court's judgment. . . Graham then petitioned for a writ of certiorari, arguing (as relevant here) that the doctrine we relied on to find that the officers' warrantless entry was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment—the so-called community-caretaking or community-caretaker exception—did not apply to the home. . . While Graham's petition was pending, the Supreme Court decided Caniglia, where it explained that this 'exception' is not actually a 'standalone doctrine that justifies warrantless searches and seizures in the home.'. . Subsequently, it granted Graham's certiorari petition, vacated our prior judgment in Graham's appeal, and remanded the matter to us for further consideration in light of Caniglia. . . We have reconsidered this appeal in light of Caniglia, and we once again affirm the district court's judgment. . . . Graham first argues that the officers violated her clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable search by entering her home. Pre-Caniglia, the officers responded that their warrantless entry into her home was reasonable under the community-caretaking exception but that, even if it was not, they were entitled to qualified immunity as to this claim because it was not clearly established that their actions were unreasonable in the circumstances. . . .Due to the 'dearth of community caretaking cases,' the district court bypassed the first prong of the analysis, . . . concluding instead that the law was not clearly established that the officers violated Graham's Fourth Amendment rights by entering her home without a warrant pursuant to the community-caretaking exception. Previously, we opted to affirm under the first prong, . . . concluding that the officers' warrantless entry was sufficiently justified and thus reasonable under the community-caretaking exception[.] . . But Caniglia rendered our prior rationale untenable insofar as it explained that 'community caretaking' was not a 'standalone doctrine' that could justify warrantless entry into the home. . . Accordingly, we now affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment under the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . On May 25, 2017, it was well established in this circuit that the community-caretaking exception was a standalone doctrine that alone could justify warrantless entry into a home. . . And, in the circumstances present here, the officers' warrantless entry did not violate Graham's Fourth Amendment rights under our then-extant community-caretaking jurisprudence. . . .We need not and do not unpack today Caniglia's full ramifications for our community-caretaking jurisprudence. . . Rather, we decide only that the officers' warrantless entry was reasonable under 'the legal rules that were clearly established' in this circuit on May 25, 2017. . . While Caniglia made clear that 'community caretaking' was not its own Fourth Amendment exception that alone could justify warrantless entry into the home, 'Caniglia did not address' what 'rights were clearly established' under 'pre-existing circuit law.' Luer v. Cnty. of St. Louis, --- F.4th ---, 2021 WL 2285499, at *1 (8th Cir. June 3, 2021). Accordingly, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity to the officers with respect to Graham's Fourth Amendment warrantless-entry claim.") Intervarsity Christian Fellowship/USA v. University of Iowa, 5 F.4th 855, 865-67 (8th Cir. 2021) ("The University and individual defendants say that the law is not clearly established when there is a direct conflict between civil rights laws and First Amendment protections in the University setting. InterVarsity, on the other hand, argues that its right to be free from viewpoint discrimination when speaking in a university's limited public forum was clearly established at the time of the violation. In denying the individual defendants qualified immunity below, the district court treated its preliminary injunction in the BLinC case as precedent. The court explained that the order applied the appropriate First Amendment cases and put the individual defendants on notice that their actions were unconstitutional. . . .While we share the district court's frustration with the University's conduct, we do not consider the BLinC preliminary injunction as precedent that clearly established the individual defendants' conduct was unconstitutional. 'A decision of a federal district court judge is not binding precedent in either a different judicial district, the same judicial district, or even upon the same judge in a different case.' Camreta v. Greene, 563 U.S. 692, 730 n.7 (2011) (citation omitted). 'Many Courts of Appeals therefore decline to consider district court precedent when determining if constitutional rights are clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity.' Id. While the Eighth Circuit 'subscribes to a broad view of what constitutes clearly established law,' and we often look to 'state courts, other circuits and district courts,' for what is clearly established, K.W.P. v. Kan. City Pub. Schs., 931 F.3d 813, 828 (8th Cir. 2019) (citation omitted), we will not rely on a district court's preliminary injunction as clearly established law in this case. But when the district court denied the individual defendants qualified immunity, it did not have the benefit of our decision in BLinC II. We found that the law was clearly established that universities may not engage in viewpoint discrimination against RSOs based on a nondiscrimination policy. . . In reaching that conclusion, we relied on Supreme Court precedent, our own case law, and other circuit decisions. The Supreme Court has clearly stated that universities may not single out groups because of their viewpoint. . . Our own precedent clearly establishes that this is a violation of the First Amendment. . . Out-of-circuit decisions also define the selective application of a nondiscrimination policy against religious groups as a violation of the First Amendment. . .Relying on those precedents, we held that the University's choice to deregister BLinC while permitting other student organizations to base membership and leadership on specific traits or affirmations of beliefs was viewpoint discrimination and a violation of the First Amendment that was clearly established. . . The University and individual defendants in that case took action against BLinC well before InterVarsity was ever on their radar. If the law was clearly established when the University discriminated against BLinC, it was clearly established when they did the same thing to InterVarsity. We acknowledge that the intersection of the First Amendment and anti-discrimination principles can present challenging questions. . . . But as Justice Thomas asked in Hoggard v. Rhodes, 'why should university officers, who have time to make calculated choices about enacting or enforcing unconstitutional policies, receive the same protection as a police officer who makes a split-second decision to use force in a dangerous setting?' —— S.Ct. ——, *1 (2021) (Thomas, J., statement regarding denial of certiorari). What the University did here was clearly unconstitutional. It targeted religious groups for differential treatment under the Human Rights Policy—while carving out exemptions and ignoring other violative groups with missions they presumably supported. The University and individual defendants turned a blind eye to decades of First Amendment jurisprudence or they proceeded full speed ahead knowing they were violating the law. Either way, qualified immunity provides no safe haven.")

McReynolds v. Schmidli, 4 F.4th 648, 655 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Applying the requisite amount of specificity, we conclude that a reasonable officer would have had fair warning that, in June 2012, he could not violently takedown a person who was not threatening anyone, not actively resisting arrest, and not attempting to flee. The district court erred in granting qualified immunity to Schmidli.")

Gerling v. City of Hermann, Missouri, 2 F.4th 737, 743-44 (8th Cir. 2021) ("The existence of probable cause. . . guarantees Waite qualified immunity only for an arrest in a public place. There is a genuine dispute of material fact about whether Waite entered Gerling's home without a warrant to effect the arrest. Gerling says that he might have taken a step onto the porch during his initial conversation with Waite to gesture at the street, but immediately moved back into the house before Waite arrested him. The video recording of the incident does not contradict Gerling's account: we agree with the district court that it is 'dark and difficult to make out' where the parties are standing. If Gerling's testimony is accepted, then any reasonable officer should have known that he could not enter Gerling's home to make an arrest without a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement that is not present here. . . On these assumed facts, it was clearly established at the time of the incident that Waite could not reach into Gerling's home to arrest him. . . We therefore affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment on Gerling's unlawful arrest claim. . . . [W]here a suspect ignores instructions and walks away, officers may be justified in using force to effect an arrest. . . Because the inquiry is fact-intensive, officers are entitled to qualified immunity 'unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.'. .Gerling relies on a line of cases involving non-resisting suspected misdemeanants, but he admits that he pulled away from Waite, did not comply with directions to raise his hands, and walked into an area of the home that was unfamiliar to Waite. . . . An officer reasonably could have believed Gerling was resisting arrest. Under those circumstances, Waite's use of force did not violate a clearly established right. It was not clearly established in November 2012 that officers were forbidden to use force, including a taser, to arrest a suspect who resisted, ignored instructions, and walked away from the officer. . . We note, however, that any damages that Gerling suffered because of his arrest are subsumed within his unlawful arrest claim. Although we analyze unlawful arrest and excessive force claims separately, 'the damages recoverable on an unlawful arrest claim "include damages suffered because of the use of force in effecting the arrest."'. . Therefore, even without a freestanding claim for use of excessive force, Gerling may recover any damages that he suffered from Waite's use of a taser if Gerling succeeds on his claim alleging unlawful arrest based on an unjustified entry into the home.")

Luer v. County of St. Louis, Missouri, 2 F.4th 1063 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Appellees move to recall and stay the mandate in light of Caniglia v. Strom, 141 S. Ct. 1596 (2021), which held that there is no 'freestanding community-caretaking exception' to the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment. In this case, we held that the appellant police officers were entitled to qualified immunity in certain respects because the officers did not violate rights of the appellees that were clearly established as of July 2016—long before Caniglia was decided. Appellees' motion recognizes that this court had issued 'prior opinions extending the community-caretaking exception to the home,' and argues that this court's precedent aligns with the decision of the First Circuit that was disapproved in Caniglia. The police officers were acting in light of pre-existing circuit law, and this appeal required us to determine what rights were clearly established as of July 2016. Because Caniglia did not address that issue, the motion is denied.")

Banks v. Hawkins, 999 F.3d 521, 529-31 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Applying the appropriate level of specificity here, we conclude that a reasonable officer had fair warning in February 2017 that he may not use deadly force against a suspect who did not present an imminent threat of death or serious injury, even if the officer felt attacked earlier and even if he believed the suspect had previously posed a threat. This proposition finds support in at least two cases involving similar, albeit not identical, circumstances. . . . We must presume that, at the moment Hawkins shot Banks, there was no longer a threat to Vanessa Banks's safety—assuming there ever was—and Johnny Banks was not charging Hawkins or otherwise moving towards him. As in Ellison, '[i]f [Hawkins] shot [Banks] while he was simply standing in his [home] and holding no [weapon], then there were not reasonable grounds to believe that [Banks] posed a serious threat of death or serious physical injury to the officers or others.'. . . Similarly, the officers in Nance were also responding to a 'dangerous situation' when one of them shot the suspect. . . We nevertheless affirmed the denial of qualified immunity because, even though the suspect had a gun in his pants and may have raised his hands while trying to get to the ground, he was not holding the gun or acting in a threatening manner and the officers failed to provide a warning before shooting. . . In other words, the officers had no 'reason to fear for their safety at the time of the shooting.'. . This means that Hawkins had fair warning in February 2017 that fear of imminent harm cannot justify shooting a suspect absent a reasonable basis to believe the suspect would act violently in that moment. As in Nance, the fact that Hawkins 'knew [he] might encounter a dangerous situation' did 'not permit the use of deadly force,' even if Banks raised his hand when he opened the front door. . . '[O]n the facts we are bound to assume,'. . . Ellison and Nance 'clearly prohibit[ed]' Hawkins's conduct[.] . . This is further supported by a 'body of relevant case law.' [collecting cases] At bottom, while the fact that Hawkins suffered a blow to the head from a source he knew was not Banks may amount to a 'novel factual circumstance[ ],'. . . it does not blur the contours of the constitutional right at issue. Even assuming he thought he was 'under attack,' the record indicates that Hawkins nevertheless understood he was not under attack by Banks. . . Because a reasonable officer in the same circumstances as Hawkins would have known that it was unlawful to shoot an unarmed and nonaggressive man who posed no imminent threat to the officer or to anyone else, we conclude—at this stage of the proceedings—that Hawkins's use of deadly force violated clearly established law.

Banks v. Hawkins, 999 F.3d 521, 531-34 (8th Cir. 2021) (Stras, J., dissenting) ("The question for us is whether Officer Hawkins is entitled to qualified immunity. Whether his actions that night were objectively reasonable is a close call, and I tend to agree with the court that it is likely one for a jury to decide. . . But qualified immunity applies precisely when an officer is forced to make a hard choice. . . . The court says that Officer Hawkins should have known that he could 'not use deadly force against a suspect who did not present an imminent threat of death or serious injury, even if [he] felt attacked earlier and even if he believed the suspect had previously posed a threat.'. . Not only is this formulation so broad that it lacks clarity, it also risks sweeping too broadly. The proof is in the pudding: there are cases that both fall within the court's supposed clearly established rule and do not involve the violation of a constitutional right. If you are wondering how both can be true, they cannot be. [discussing cases] Today's decision does more than just expose Officer Hawkins to liability. It stands as a warning to other officers who may need to make split-second decisions to protect their own safety. The message could not be clearer: even in the absence of a clearly controlling legal rule, think twice before acting, regardless of whether your own life is at stake, because a court may step in later and second-guess your decision. . . We can reasonably disagree about whether qualified immunity should exist, see Baxter v. Bracey, —— U.S. ——, 140 S. Ct. 1862, 1864–65, 207 L.Ed.2d 1069 (2020) (Thomas, J., dissenting from the denial of certiorari), but there is no question that circumstances like these are why it does, see Winzer v. Kaufman County, 916 F.3d 464, 482 (5th Cir. 2019) (Clement, J., dissenting in part). I respectfully dissent.")

Masters v. City of Independence, Missouri, 998 F.3d 827, 836-38 (8th Cir. 2021) ("In sum, Masters 'was an unarmed suspected misdemeanant, who [was] not resist[ing] arrest, did not threaten [Runnels], did not attempt to run from him, and did not behave aggressively towards him.'. . A reasonable officer would not have continued to tase Masters under these circumstances.

. . . Runnels nevertheless argues that this was a 'tense and rapidly evolving' encounter. In his view, it was reasonable to continue discharging the Taser, even while Masters was compliant, until Masters was fully subdued. It is true that the reasonableness of an officer's use of force must take into account that 'police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.'. . 'Even so, a reasonable officer is not permitted to ignore changing circumstances.'. . The undisputed evidence shows that Masters stopped resisting arrest soon after Runnels initially discharged his Taser. A reasonable officer would have taken into account those changed circumstances to determine whether continued or additional use of the Taser was warranted. Runnels did not do so, and the record supports Masters's claim that Runnels used excessive force when prolonging the use of the Taser. Second, we consider whether the right to be free from an excessive, prolonged use of a Taser was clearly established as of September 14, 2014, when the traffic stop occurred. . . . In September 2014, it was clearly established that prolonging the use of a Taser against a suspect who was complying with a police officer's commands constituted an excessive use of force. . . .Runnels also asserts there is 'no bright line' on how long an officer may tase a suspect. But there is: An officer may not continue to tase a person who is no longer resisting, threatening, or fleeing. That is so whether the tasing comes in the form of multiple, separate deployments or, as in this case, a single, continuous deployment that lasts for an extended period of time. By September 2014, 'when the tasing[ ] of [Masters] occurred, there was sufficient case law to establish that a misdemeanor suspect in [Masters's] position at the time of the [prolonged] tasing—non-threatening, non-fleeing, non-resisting—had a clearly established right to be free from excessive force,'. . . and that prolonged tasing of such a suspect was excessive.The district court did not err in denying Runnels's motion for judgment as a matter of law on Masters's prolonged Taser claim.")

Masters v. City of Independence, Missouri, 998 F.3d 827, 842 (8th Cir. 2021) (Colloton, J., concurring) ("In my view, Jackson v. Stair, 944 F.3d 704 (8th Cir. 2019), was wrongly decided and should not be extended. . . Unlike Jackson, where a reasonable officer could have believed that the offender's 'momentary post-tasered position on the ground' did not 'justify considering it as a clearly punctuated interim of compliance' that made further use of a taser unreasonable, . . . Masters was compliant for the last fifteen seconds of the disputed tasing and lying face-down on the pavement for most of that time. No reasonable officer could have believed that Masters was resisting during that period, or that continued application of a taser was reasonable under the circumstances, so the district court properly denied qualified immunity.")

T.S.H. v. Green, 996 F.3d 915, 919-21 (8th Cir. 2021) ("A school official need not have probable cause to search a student in a school; '[r]ather, the legality of a search of a student should depend simply on the reasonableness, under all the circumstances, of the search.'. . A student search is reasonable if it is 'justified at its inception, and 'reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place.'. . The law is not settled on whether the same reasonableness inquiry applies to student seizures, . . . but there is no clearly established law to the contrary. At least one circuit has concluded that the reasonableness standard from T.L.O. applies to student seizures. Gray ex rel. Alexander v. Bostic, 458 F.3d 1295, 1304 (11th Cir. 2006). This court and the Ninth Circuit have reserved judgment on whether to apply T.L.O. or the objective reasonableness standard from Graham v. Connor[.] . . Given the state of the law, a reasonable officer could have proceeded on the understanding that a student seizure is permissible if it is reasonable under the standard of T.L.O. Although the alleged seizure in this case did not occur at the high school and was initiated by law enforcement, reasonable officers could have believed that probable cause was not required. We have applied the reasonableness standard to searches of high school students outside of 'traditional school grounds,' because the 'nature of administrators' ... responsibilities for the students entrusted to their care, not school boundary lines, renders the Fourth Amendment standard in the public-school context less onerous.'. .T.L.O. left open whether the reasonableness test should apply to actions 'conducted by school officials in conjunction with or at the behest of law enforcement agencies,'. . . but our decision in Shade applied the reasonableness standard where both school officials and law enforcement officers were involved. . . . Given that Green and Williams were employed by the University Police, it is also noteworthy that searches conducted by school police or school liaison officers have been evaluated under a reasonableness standard. . . We recently rejected an argument that clearly established law required 'probable cause' before a school resource officer could summon a high school student to the school office for interrogation about an alleged sexual assault. . . In light of these decisions, the students had no clearly established right to be free from a seizure instigated by Green and Williams if it passed muster under a standard of reasonableness. Under the facts alleged here, we further conclude that a reasonable officer could have believed that the seizure was reasonable. When the principles of T.L.O. are applied to this context, a seizure is 'justified at its inception' if there are reasonable grounds to believe that 'the student has violated or is violating either the law or the rules of the school.'. . A seizure is reasonable in scope if it is 'reasonably related to the objectives' of the investigation and not excessive in light of the student's characteristics and the nature of the alleged infraction. . . There were sufficient grounds on these facts to place the officers' action at least within the gray area for which qualified immunity is available. On justification for the seizure, the students allege that the officers described the cheerleading coach's allegation as a 'possible Title IX incident.' Title IX is a federal statute that prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex in 'any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.'. . But the students contend that because the cheerleading coach was neither a student nor an employee of the University, there was thus no reasonable justification under Title IX for the seizure. They argue that the officers were attempting instead to 'prove the commission of a crime,' such as invasion of privacy under Missouri law. See Mo. Rev. Stat. § 565.252.1(1). We think a reasonable officer could have believed that either basis justified an investigatory seizure. Under then-applicable Title IX guidance, a school with knowledge of 'student-on-student harassment that creates a hostile environment' was required 'to take immediate action to eliminate the harassment, prevent its recurrence, and address its effects.'. . The same guidance said that 'Title IX also protects third parties from sexual harassment ... in a school's education programs and activities,' and included the example of 'a visitor in a school's on-campus residence hall.'. . Based on the report of the cheerleading coach who was housed in the University's dormitory, the officers reasonably could have believed that they were authorized to investigate the incident to comply with the prevailing Title IX guidance. So too with a possible violation of Missouri law. A person commits the offense of invasion of privacy if he photographs another person, without her consent, while she is in a state of full or partial nudity and is in a place where one would have a reasonable expectation of privacy. Mo. Rev. Stat. § 565.252.1(1). Reasonable officers could have believed that the cheerleading coach's report gave reasonable grounds to suspect that questioning the students would turn up evidence about invading the privacy of the cheerleading coach. Finally, the seizure must have been reasonable in scope. The students claim that they were 'not free to leave for a period of hours.' Other courts, however, have found student seizures of similar durations to be reasonable. [giving examples] In light of this authority, we conclude that the students had no clearly established right to be free from a seizure that extended for a period of hours. In sum, it was reasonable for Officers Green and Williams to believe that a seizure of high school students by a high school coach acting at the behest of the officers was permissible if reasonable. It was also reasonable for the officers to believe that the seizure was justified under that standard. The officers thus did not violate the students' clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment, so they are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

T.S.H. v. Green, 996 F.3d 915, 922-25 (8th Cir. 2021) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Because I believe T.S.H. and H.R.J. have stated a plausible claim for violation of their Fourth Amendment rights, I respectfully dissent. . . Assuming the standard articulated in New Jersey v. T.L.O. . . . applies to a seizure of high school students carried out by their football coach at the behest of law enforcement and away from traditional school grounds, . . . I disagree with the court's conclusion that the seizure at issue here was reasonable. Under the T.L.O. standard, we must evaluate both whether the seizure was 'justified at its inception' and whether it 'was reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified [it] in the first place.'. . . Here, the students adequately allege that they never consented to the seizure. And because the Amended Complaint suggests the officers made no effort to coordinate with the university's Title IX officer or to comply with Title IX regulations, there is no basis to conclude that they reasonably believed they had authority under Title IX to independently initiate an investigation and to seize and interrogate high school students. . . . [E]ven if the seizure was justified at its inception, it was not 'reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place.'. . . Considering the absence of a security threat and the lack of any apparent disruption to the camps or to the students' learning environment, it was unreasonable for the officers to believe that the hours-long detention and interrogation of T.S.H. and H.R.J. were warranted.")

Perry v. Adams, 993 F.3d 584, 587-88 (8th Cir. 2021) ("The question of qualified immunity as against the current § 1983 claim, therefore, does not ask simply whether Adams's alleged actions or failures to act might have violated an internal policy at the St. Louis City Justice Center or whether as a matter of state law such actions might have constituted negligence. . . Similarly, it does not ask whether Adams possessed knowledge that Brison was at 'some risk' yet failed to act. Rather it asks whether on the facts presented, Adams knew of a substantial risk of serious harm yet failed to act. Framed at the level of specificity that the Supreme Court mandates for our analysis, we understand the specific question we must answer to be as follows: 'Does a transferring officer violate a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment rights by failing to inform a receiving entity that the detainee is on a close-observation status if a mental health professional has determined that the detainee is not suicidal and if the applicable close-observation status is, in and of itself, indicative of the absence of a suicide risk?' Framed in this way, and even assuming that Adams had knowledge that Brison was on Close Observation, we find no clearly established right. Brison was analyzed by a mental health professional and was on a watch status indicating he was not suicidal. Therefore, this is not a case like Boswell v. Sherburne County, 849 F.2d 1117, 1122 (8th Cir. 1988), where a jailer with knowledge of a detainee's serious medical condition failed to contact medical professionals or advise incoming jailers as to the detainee's risk. Here, short of a suicide risk which a mental health professional found to be absent, the plaintiffs do not identify what risk of 'serious harm' Brison faced and what actual knowledge Adams possessed regarding any such risk. Of course, detention officers have a general duty to guard reasonably against known risks of suicide. . . As such, transferring officers generally should strive to convey important information likely to aid in the protection of inmates' health and welfare. But, clearly established and specific constitutional requirements defined under this general rule do not support the proposition that an officer is required to second-guess a mental health professional's judgment as to the substantiality of a suicide risk.")

Business Leaders In Christ v. Univ. of Iowa, 991 F.3d 969, 980, 985-88 (8th Cir. 2021) ("To prove that the law was clearly established at the time that the individual defendants violated BLinC's constitutional rights of free speech, expressive association, and free exercise, BLinC must 'point to existing circuit precedent that involves sufficiently similar facts to squarely govern [the individual defendants'] conduct in the specific circumstances at issue, or, in the absence of binding precedent, to present a robust consensus of persuasive authority constituting settled law.'. .We first address whether BLinC's free-speech and expressive-association claims are undergirded by clearly established law. . . . An important task in determining whether the law was clearly established at the time the individual defendants acted is to avoid defining the law at a 'high level of generality.'. . . In the present case, the appropriate inquiry is 'whether [BLinC's] right not to be subject to viewpoint discrimination when speaking in a university's limited public forum was clearly established.'. . This inquiry takes into account the undisputed facts of the present case: the University's creation of a limited public forum for student speech and subsequent viewpoint discrimination against BLinC, a student organization, within that forum. First, 'it was clearly established at the time of these events' that the University's recognition of RSOs constituted a limited public forum. . . . Second, 'it was clearly established that a university may not discriminate on the basis of viewpoint in a limited public forum.' . . Martinez, Rosenberger, Widmar, Healy, and Gerlich all place 'beyond debate,'. . . that BLinC had a 'right not to be subjected to viewpoint discrimination while speaking in [the] [U]niversity's limited public forum.'. . . Nonetheless, the individual defendants argue that there is no clearly established law 'definitively decid[ing] the issue of the uneven enforcement of a nondiscrimination policy against registered student organizations on a university campus.'. . But Walker and Reed both recognized the legal principle that a nondiscrimination policy neutral on its face violates a student group's rights to free speech and expressive association if not applied in a viewpoint-neutral manner. . . . In summary, we are satisfied that Supreme Court precedent, existing Eighth Circuit precedent, and 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority,' 'squarely govern[ed] [the individual defendants'] conduct in the specific circumstances at issue.'. . As a result, we hold that the district court erroneously granted the individual defendants' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity on BLinC's free-speech and expressive-association claims. . . . BLinC also maintains that its free-exercise rights were clearly established. Three Supreme Court cases concerning student speech in a university's limited public forum are instructive in determining whether it was clearly established that the individual defendants' selective enforcement of its nondiscrimination policy against BLinC violated BLinC's free-exercise rights. See Martinez, 561 U.S. at 697 n.27, 130 S.Ct. 2971; Rosenberger, 515 U.S. at 841–42, 115 S.Ct. 2510; Widmar, 454 U.S. at 273 n.13, 102 S.Ct. 269. . . . None of these cases make clear that BLinC would have a free-exercise claim—as opposed to a free-speech claim—against the University defendants for selectively enforcing its nondiscrimination policy against BLinC in a limited public forum. In fact, Widmar expressly declined to 'inquire into the extent, if any, to which free exercise interests are infringed by the challenged University regulation.'. .BLinC cites several other cases in support of its argument that the law clearly established that the individual defendants' conduct violated BLinC's free-exercise rights, but none of them involve student speech in a limited public forum. . . We may not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality,'. . . and to apply the general principles derived from those cases to the present case would contravene the Supreme Court's directive. Because the law was not clearly established at the time that the individual defendants' conduct violated BLinC's free-exercise rights, we hold that the district court did not err in granting qualified immunity to them on BLinC's free-exercise claim.")

Business Leaders In Christ v. Univ. of Iowa, 991 F.3d 969, 988-90 (8th Cir. 2021) (Kobes, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Administrators at the University of Iowa discriminated against religious student groups. The University and individual defendants do not appeal that finding. I join the well-written majority opinion in denying qualified immunity on BLinC's free speech and association claims, but I write separately because I think the law is clearly established on its free exercise claim, too. . . .The purpose of qualified immunity is to shield good-faith actors who make mistaken judgments about unresolved issues of law, and it protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . But we do not need the benefit of hindsight to know that the individual defendants' choices were prohibited by the Constitution. They had more than 'fair warning' that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . In fact, they knew it was. . . The law is clear: state organizations may not target religious groups for differential treatment or withhold an otherwise available benefit solely because they are religious. That is what happened here. The individual defendants may pick their poison: they are either plainly incompetent or they knowingly violated the Constitution. Either way, they should not get qualified immunity.")

Luer v. Clinton, 987 F.3d 1160, 1168-70 (8th Cir. 2021) ("The officers found no one in the attached garage but observed that the door from the garage into the kitchen of the home was ajar. They knocked, announced police, entered the kitchen with guns drawn, and made 'loud verbal commands' that anyone in the house 'make themselves known.' Up to this point, we conclude that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity under the community caretaker exception because an open door into a home late at night, when no one had responded to their repeated knocking at the outside doors, arguably warranted a limited protective entry. However, even if their intrusions to this point were justified, we must assess whether they sufficiently tailored their subsequent activity to this limited purpose. . . No one responded to the officers' repeated announcing at the kitchen door threshold. From there, they saw a light emanating from an open door to the basement. They descended to the basement, found no signs of disturbance, returned to the main level, and continued searching the entire home until encountering Luer outside his bedroom. We conclude the community caretaker exception cannot justify this severe, warrantless intrusion into a home. In searching two yards, underneath a deck, behind an air conditioning vent, and in the Luer-Steinebach attached garage, Officer Clinton observed no sign of the intoxicated fare-skipper. The officers had no information the suspect was armed or otherwise dangerous. They got no response from inside the Luer-Steinebach home and saw no signs of criminal activity. The cab driver reported that a petty thief had run, not that a burglar was on the prowl in a residential neighborhood. Reasonable police officers acting as community caretakers should have left the home. Whether the community caretaker exception extends to entries into the home is not a resolved Fourth Amendment question, as the recent grant of certiorari in the First Circuit's Caniglia decision demonstrates. The First Circuit recognized that the need to limit the extent of this exception 'is especially pronounced in cases involving warrantless entries into the home.... [P]olice officers must have "solid, noninvestigatory reasons" for engaging in community caretaking activities.' . . The other 'exigent circumstance' exceptions to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement do not apply in these circumstances. The officers were not in 'hot pursuit' of the intoxicated fare-skipper, and they had no information suggesting that he was armed and dangerous. The officers argue that, because of the open doors, they had a 'reasonable belief that the occupants of the [home] may be under a threat to their safety.' Of course, there may be a threat to safety in almost any situation. However, it is clearly established that '[s]omething more than a speculative hunch is needed for police to conduct a protective sweep.'. . Nor did the officers have information suggesting that anyone in the home was in need of emergency assistance. Had they confronted a person dressed as the cab driver described the fare-skipper in a place where the officers were entitled to be, they may well have had reasonable suspicion to stop and question the person and perhaps take him a short distance to see if the cab driver would identify him as the fare-skipper. But they were not entitled to enter and conduct an extensive search of the Luer-Steinebach home for this purpose without a warrant or consent. . . .Here, as in Selberg, Officers Clinton and Selz encountered no signs of disturbance outside the Luer-Steinebach home or in their attached garage. Nothing suggesting imminent danger to persons or property was visible from the kitchen door threshold. Although Selberg did not use the phrase 'community caretaking,' the opinion in substance addressed whether an interest in community caretaking -- that is, protection of persons or property -- justified the entry, . . . and the case is nearly on point factually. Considering Selberg together with the Supreme Court's frequent cautions that exigent circumstances rarely justify a warrantless home intrusion, we conclude that it was clearly established by controlling Fourth Amendment precedents that the officers' full blown search of the entire Luer-Steinebach domicile without a warrant was objectively unreasonable.")

Luer v. Clinton, 987 F.3d 1160, 1170 (8th Cir. 2021) (Kobes, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority wrestles with the outer limits of community caretaking. Those are hard questions—but they are questions we need not answer. Community caretaking was not raised in the district court and was only discussed here in a reply brief. It was waived. . . Even if the exception was properly raised, no facts support a reasonable belief that the officers needed to enter Luer and Steinebach's property to protect community safety. The cab driver told Officers Clinton and Selz that the fare skipper walked away from Luer and Steinebach's home, and the officers 'had no information the suspect was armed or otherwise dangerous.'. . The cab driver reported only 'that a petty thief had run, not that a burglar was on the prowl in a residential neighborhood.'. . On these undisputed facts, I do not think this is one of the 'certain limited situations' where community caretaking justifies 'a noninvestigatory search[ ].'. . Officers Clinton and Selz raised only two exigent circumstances—hot pursuit and emergency aid. The majority correctly rejects both arguments, and I would affirm on those grounds. To the extent the majority's opinion grants immunity to the officers, I respectfully dissent.")

MacKintrush v. Pulaski County Sheriff's Dep't, 987 F.3d 767, 770-71 (8th Cir. 2021) ("The right of a passive arrestee to be free from excessive use of body slams (or similar techniques) was clearly established when Hodge took MacKintrush to the floor. Force may be appropriate if a suspect presents a possible threat to police. . . 'There is no requirement that the plaintiff must find a case where the very action in question has previously been held unlawful so long as existing precedent has placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . It is 'unreasonable for an officer to body-slam a nonviolent, nonthreatening misdemeanant who pulled her arm away from the officer to extinguish a cigarette, where no reasonable officer would have viewed the act as noncompliance.'. . Ambiguous gestures that officers claim are noncompliant (such as reaching to extinguish a cigarette) do not justify body slamming an otherwise compliant, nonviolent, nonthreatening misdemeanant. . . . Crediting MacKintrush's account and the video of the incident, he was not actively resisting Hodge. Hodge tried to physically steer MacKintrush while he was walking through booking. MacKintrush shrugged off his touch. Hodge immediately body-slammed MacKintrush to the floor, knocking him out. Assuming that MacKintrust was a nonviolent, nonthreatening misdemeanant who pulled his arm away from the officer, Karels put Hodge on notice that his body slam was excessive force.")

Kuessner v. Wooten, 987 F.3d 752, 756-58 (8th Cir. 2021) ("[D]isparate cases did not give Wooten fair warning that arresting Kuessner based on bloodshot eyes, a drinking admission, and her refusal to take a breath test was unconstitutional. . . .These cases provided no fair warning to Wooten that his conduct was unconstitutional. They did not clearly establish that he lacked arguable probable cause to believe Kuessner had been driving based on the available facts—arriving alone, at the remote station, early in the morning, keys in hand, to pick up Wood. The district court properly granted summary judgment to Wooten.")

Quraishi v. St. Charles County, Missouri, 986 F.3d 831, 838-39 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Anderson insists that the law was not clearly established at the time of his alleged misconduct. 'A citizen's right to exercise First Amendment freedoms without facing retaliation from government officials is clearly established.'. . .True, the Eighth Circuit has not considered a case 'directly on point' with the present facts—where reporters are arrested while peacefully filming a protest. . . An exact match, however, is not required if the constitutional issue is 'beyond debate.'. .Reporting is a First Amendment activity. . . . Based on this robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority, it is clearly established that using an arrest (that lacks arguable probable cause) to interfere with First Amendment activity is a constitutional violation. . . A reasonable officer would have understood that deploying a tear-gas canister at law-abiding reporters is impermissible. . . This court affirms the denial of qualified immunity on the First Amendment claim.")

Quraishi v. St. Charles County, Missouri, 986 F.3d 831, 840 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Neither the district court nor the reporters cite authority that gave 'fair warning' to Anderson that deploying one canister of tear-gas was a seizure. . . The district court relied on inapposite law. True, use of pepper spray to arrest an unarmed, compliant suspect can be excessive force. . . Peterson is distinguishable, because it focused on the officer's behavior after the individual was already seized. This court did not consider whether the use of chemical agents alone is a seizure. . . Here, the issue is whether deploying tear gas is a seizure.The reporters cite Supreme Court cases to argue they were restrained because they could not stay in their chosen location. . . But these cases did not give fair warning. Brendlin held that, during traffic stops, passengers are seized. . . Brower held that setting up a roadblock that stops a fleeing suspect is a seizure. . . Brendlin and Brower are inapposite because both involve police action that terminated or restricted freedom of movement. . . Here, the reporters' freedom to move was not terminated or restricted. See Johnson, 926 F.3d at 506 (no seizure where plaintiff was not "ordered to stop and remain in place" and "was able to leave the scene"). They were dispersed. The reporters cite no 'precedent,' 'controlling authority' or 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' to show it was clearly established that tear-gassing was a seizure. . . When Anderson deployed the tear-gas, it was not clearly established that his acts were a seizure. The district court should have granted qualified immunity to Anderson on the Fourth Amendment claim.")

Robbins v. City of Des Moines, 984 F.3d 673, 678-79 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Robbins asserts the defendant officers reasonably should have known that the First Amendment protected his recording activity, verbal challenge of the police, and refusal to leave a public place. Assuming Robbins had a constitutionally protected right to record as he was doing in this case, that right is not absolute. . . Here, law enforcement officers observed Robbins recording both vehicles near the police station and officers and civilian employees entering and leaving the police station. The officers also possessed other significant information: they were aware of recent criminal activity involving cars parked in the area, and they were aware of a previous filming and stalking incident that escalated into the murder of two officers. Armed with this knowledge, Officer Youngblut approached Robbins and asked him what he was doing. Robbins was non-responsive, evasive, and confrontational. Officer Youngblut reasonably found Robbins's behavior suspicious. Robbins' behavior that went beyond any constitutionally protected recording activity when combined with the officers' knowledge about vehicles being stolen and vandalized in the area and the previous filming that led to officers being murdered could cause an objectively reasonable person in the officers' position to suspect Robbins was up to more than simply recording the police. Under these circumstances, we can neither say that the officers' conduct was objectively unreasonable under clearly established law, nor in violation of the First Amendment. Robbins's remaining arguments are too generalized to show a violation of a clearly established right. . . While the First Amendment 'protects a significant amount of verbal criticism and challenge directed at police officers,'. . . Robbins cannot rely on broad general allegations to show a deprivation of a clearly established right[.] . . The defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the Count I claims.")

Garcia v. City of New Hope, 984 F.3d 655, 672-73 (8th Cir. 2021) (Shepherd, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I join the majority's opinion in all respects except its conclusion that Officer Baker is not entitled to qualified immunity on Garcia's First Amendment retaliation claim. Because I conclude that Garcia has not shown a violation of a clearly established constitutional right, I would affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity on this claim. . . . [E]ven if Garcia has shown the violation of a constitutional right, it was not clearly established on February 1, 2016, that driving through a school zone during school hours and in the presence of a crossing guard, leaning his entire head and arm out the window of his vehicle to raise his middle finger, all following a confrontation about Garcia's rate of speed in the same location earlier that day, was protected by the First Amendment. The majority relies on cases are factually distinct[.] . . Although we held in Thurairajah that shouting 'fk you!' at an officer was protected speech, the Court's recognition of the clearly established right to be free from First Amendment retaliation was stated at a high level of generality and did not involve the same kind of conduct here, where Garcia demonstrated escalating aggressive and offensive behavior. . . Cohen similarly lacked any evidence of escalating behavior; the individual in that case engaged only in the passive action of wearing a jacket bearing the words 'Fk the Draft.'. . And although the Sixth Circuit held in Cruise-Gulyas that a reasonable officer would know raising a middle finger is protected speech, this case is of no precedential value to our Court, post-dates the incident here, and involves a single interaction between the individual and the officer, not two in one day, like Garcia. . . Finally, none of the cases include a scenario where the offensive speech or conduct was offered in a school zone during the school day. These cases simply do not describe the facts confronting Officer Baker. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . The dispositive inquiry for this court 'is "whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,"' taking into account 'the specific context of the case, not [considering the determination] as a broad general proposition.'. . When viewed with the proper level of specificity, accounting for the specific circumstances of this incident, I cannot conclude that it was clearly established that Garcia's conduct was protected by the First Amendment. . . . Given the facts of this case, I believe Garcia has failed to show a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. Accordingly, I conclude Officer Baker is entitled to qualified immunity on Garcia's First Amendment claim.")

Bell v. Neukirch, 979 F.3d 594, 608-09 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Taking the evidence in the light most favorable to Bell, it was clearly established at the time of Bell's warrantless arrest that no reasonable officer in the position of Officers Munyan and Neukirch could have believed that probable cause existed to arrest Bell based on the plainly exculpatory evidence available to them. Bell wore different shorts and socks than the suspect wore at the scene. His height varied by five inches from Munyan's real-time description of the suspect. Bell did not exhibit signs of exertion that would be expected of a suspect who ran a mile in seven minutes on a warm afternoon. Given the glaring differences, there was not arguable probable cause to believe that Bell was the fleeing suspect. Bell's right to be free from an arrest and detention under the circumstances was clearly established. It is an obvious case of insufficient probable cause. The officers assert that they acted reasonably because they reviewed the video recording of the suspect multiple times before confirming that Bell should be arrested. There is a factual dispute over how thoroughly they reviewed the video. Given Officer Munyan's averment that he could not tell whether the suspect's shorts included a broad white stripe on the side, a reasonable jury could conclude that Officer Munyan did not reasonably consider the video. But even assuming that the officers collectively watched the video eight times as they claim, it should have been obvious to any reasonable officer that Bell's shorts and socks were different from the suspect's shorts and socks at the scene. Qualified immunity requires more than subjective good faith; it requires objectively reasonable official conduct. . . Simply scanning a video does not make conduct objectively reasonable if an officer ignores or overlooks plainly exculpatory evidence. . . Qualified immunity does not protect the 'plainly incompetent[.]'. . An officer who repeatedly watched the video and failed to take note of the substantial discrepancies between Bell and the suspect demonstrates less diligence that what is expected of competent police officers about to limit someone's liberty by arrest.The officers fall back on their claim that it was reasonable to think that Bell shed an outer layer of shorts and socks, so they reasonably could have believed that there was probable cause on that assumption. The record includes only a general undisputed fact allegation that the officers had prior experience with suspects shedding an outer layer of clothing in undefined circumstances. As we have said, unless there is evidence that the officers had training or experience about suspects discarding layered clothing in a situation reasonably comparable to this one, the inference that Bell dispensed with a second pair of shorts and socks is implausible. Without more, it was not objectively reasonable to believe that Bell may have attempted to change his appearance by discarding solid dark-colored shorts in favor of underlying black-and-white shorts, and by removing long gray socks to reveal short black socks, while retaining his single white t-shirt and walking along the side of a road towards a parked patrol car during the supposed getaway. Even the initial detaining officer found little suspicious about Bell's appearance or demeanor. . . .The breadth of the officers' position illustrates the obviousness of its shortcoming. They contend that it was reasonable to believe that Munyan's height estimate of 5'10" could be off by five inches. They argue that it was reasonable to believe that a fleeing suspect found a mile away after only seven minutes would breath normally and sweat little on an 86-degree sunny afternoon. They maintain that it was reasonable to mistake one pair of shoes for another. And they assert that it was reasonable to believe that the suspect could be found wearing any combination of t-shirt, shorts, and socks, because suspects are known to change their appearance by discarding layered clothing during foot pursuits. On that view, a reasonable officer could have believed that there was probable cause to arrest any black male aged approximately 17–18, with a dreadlock hair style. . . and slender build, who was found within a one-mile radius of the original scene, if the young man's height ranged from 5'5" to 6'3" and he was wearing a white t-shirt, shorts, and socks of any color or design. We cannot accept that such an implication represented an objectively reasonable interpretation of the law at the time of Bell's arrest.")

Bell v. Neukirch, 979 F.3d 594, 610-11 & n.3 (8th Cir. 2020) (Colloton, J., concurring) ("The dissent. . . would affirm the judgment without addressing whether a reasonable officer could have believed that there was probable cause to arrest. (And by declining to address the first order question whether the officers had probable cause to arrest, the dissent's approach would allow officers qualified immunity to do the same thing again in the future.) On this view, because there is no decision of the Supreme Court or this court holding that an officer 'acting under similar circumstances' violated the Fourth Amendment, the officers have qualified immunity, without an inquiry into whether their actions were objectively legally reasonable. The dissent declines to address whether the existing constitutional rules were sufficient to give fair and clear warning on these facts, because Bell's appellate briefs did not invoke the language of Wesby that this is 'an obvious case where a body of relevant case law is not needed.'. .That is not how qualified immunity analysis should work. When an arrestee argues on a given set of facts that no reasonable officer could have believed that there was probable cause to arrest, the argument brings up for our consideration whether the officer's seizure was objectively legally reasonable. That question includes whether the existing constitutional rules apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question. Sometimes a plaintiff can prevail by arguing from general constitutional standards that a right is clearly established on a given set of facts. . . Bell argued that 'fourteen obvious evidentiary reasons should have negated probable cause,' asserted that the right in question was clearly established, maintained that it was not objectively reasonable on these facts for officers to conclude that there was probable cause, and employed a rhetorical question—'If all this was objectively reasonable, what would be unreasonable?'—to say, in effect, 'it's obvious.' We should not parse Supreme Court opinions as though they were statutes, . . . nor should we read them as though they implemented a code-pleading regime for qualified immunity cases. We cannot avoid the issue of objective legal reasonableness in this case by requiring the arrestee to use certain magic words in his appellate briefs. I join the opinion of the court and concur in the conclusion that 'this is an obvious case of insufficient probable cause.'. . Given the obvious distinctions between the video-recorded suspect and the arrestee, and the implausibility of Officer Munyan's post-hoc assertion that the fleeing juvenile may have sought to disguise himself by disposing of layered shorts and socks while retaining his white t-shirt, any reasonable officer should have known that he lacked probable cause to arrest and detain Bell.[3] [fn. 3: In recent decisions, the Supreme Court has added the modifier 'rare' when discussing the 'obvious case' in which the unlawfulness of an officer's conduct is sufficiently clear to deny qualified immunity without existing precedent that addresses similar circumstances. One hopes that obvious constitutional violations are rare, but it is not evident why rarity would be part of the legal standard; frequency seems to be an empirical question that depends on the conduct of police officers. But accepting that it should be a rare Fourth Amendment case in which qualified immunity is denied without a prior decision involving similar circumstances, this one fits the bill: for me, it is likely the first case in seventeen years to meet the standard.]")

Bell v. Neukirch, 979 F.3d 594, 611-14 (8th Cir. 2020) (Stras, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Tyree Bell spent three weeks in custody due to a case of mistaken identity. The district court held that the arresting officers were entitled to qualified immunity. Because there is no clearly established law to support Bell's claims against them, I would affirm across the board. . . .This case is hardly the model of good police work, but the question for us is whether Munyan and his partner were on 'notice' that their conduct violated 'clearly established law.'. . .The bottom line is that neither Bell nor the court 'have identified a single precedent ... finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances.' [citing Wesby] For this reason, I agree with the district court that Officer Munyan and his partner are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Goffin v. Ashcraft, 977 F.3d 687, 689-92 (8th Cir. 2020) ("An officer may constitutionally use deadly force when she reasonably believes a fleeing suspect poses a threat of serious harm to herself or others. But Goffin claims (and Officer Ashcraft disputes) that he was patted down by another officer just before he fled. The pat down removed nothing from Goffin and was later shown to have been unusually ineffective; the officer failed to discover that Goffin was carrying a loaded magazine and extra bullets. We conclude that Officer Ashcraft is entitled to qualified immunity on these facts because it was not clearly established at the time of the shooting that a pat down that removes nothing from a suspect eliminates an officer's probable cause that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm. . . . The case turns on whether the pat down changes our analysis. . . Goffin argues that the pat down creates an issue of material fact because, if it occurred, then Officer Ashcraft must have known he was unarmed, or at least that there is an issue of material fact as to whether she knew he was unarmed. But whether probable cause exists is a legal question, not a factual one. . . He must therefore provide a case clearly establishing that a pat down that recovered nothing. . . eliminated Officer Ashcraft's objectively reasonable belief that he was armed and dangerous. Goffin fails to point to such a case. He relies on Tennessee v. Garner, but that case stands for a general proposition and cannot clearly establish the rule in most cases. . . . We . . . conclude that Officer Ashcraft is entitled to summary judgment because it is not clearly established that after observing a pat down that removes nothing from a suspect who an officer reasonably believed to be armed and dangerous, an officer cannot use lethal force against that suspect when he flees and moves as though he is reaching for a weapon. Nor do we think this is the 'rare obvious case' in which 'the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . The district court is affirmed.")

Goffin v. Ashcraft, 977 F.3d 687, 692-94 (8th Cir. 2020) (Smith, C.J., concurring) ("I concur in the court's determination that the unlawfulness of Officer Ashcraft's conduct was not clearly established. I write separately to express my view that Officer Ashcraft did, however, violate Goffiin's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. . . . In my view, probable cause to believe that Goffin was armed dissipated upon completion of this full body pat-down search that revealed no weapons. Some cases analyzing probable cause in the context of investigatory stops have so held. . . The dissipation of probable cause to believe Goffin possessed a firearm should have reduced the officers' reasonable concern that Goffin posed an imminent threat to them or to bystanders. Thus, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Goffin, Officer Ashcraft violated Goffin's constitutional right to be free from excessive force by shooting him after witnessing a full body pat-down search that revealed no weapons. Nonetheless, I agree with the court's determination that Officer Ashcraft is entitled to qualified immunity because Goffin has not identified 'a case clearly establishing that a pat down that recovered nothing eliminated Officer Ashcraft's objectively reasonable belief that he was armed and dangerous.'. . . In this case, the officer who shot Goffin was not the officer who conducted the pat-down search. A pat down is not an invasive search and oversights can occur. The possibility of an oversight by the pat-down officer means an observing officer may still need to exercise independent judgment as to a potential threat. Here, circumstances abruptly changed and a compliant arrestee bolted from custody with unknown motives and capabilities. Pat-down searches are conducted precisely to diminish the officers' concern that an arrestee is armed, but those searches are not foolproof. The absence of authority clearly establishing that Officer Ashcraft's actions, on these facts, was constitutionally prohibited supports the district court's grant of qualified immunity under existing precedent.")

Goffin v. Ashcraft, 977 F.3d 687, 694-97 (8th Cir. 2020) (Kelly, J., dissenting) ("Officer Ashcraft never saw Goffin with a weapon, and she watched a fellow officer conduct a pat down that revealed no weapons. Yet Ashcraft shot Goffin in the back, in 'a split-second,' after he took 'no more than two steps.' Because I believe that the relevant law is clearly established—a question for the court to decide—and that a reasonable jury could find that Ashcraft's use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable, I respectfully dissent. . . . [T]he law is clearly established even if no prior case contained the exact factual circumstance here: a pat down before the suspect fled. The Supreme Court has long rejected the notion that 'an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.'. . Officials can be on notice that their conduct violates established law 'even in novel factual circumstances.'. . . The court relies on the precise scenario of a suspect fleeing after a pat down that revealed no weapons to conclude that Ashcraft violated no clearly established law. But the pat down is a novel fact that does not render inapplicable the clearly established law that officers 'may not use deadly force unless the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'. . And here, although the novel factual circumstance of a pat down may impact whether a reasonable jury finds Ashcraft's actions objectively reasonable, it does not render inapplicable the clearly established law that she cannot use deadly force unless a suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to her or others. I would reverse the grant of qualified immunity.")

Thurmond v. Andrews, 972 F.3d 1007, 1012-13 (8th Cir. 2020) ("While prisoners certainly have an Eighth Amendment right to sanitary prison conditions including 'reasonably adequate sanitation, personal hygiene, and laundry privileges, particularly over a lengthy course of time,' the articulation of this broad right does not answer whether the presence of non-toxic environmental allergens are necessarily violative of this right. . . A more specific and particularized inquiry is necessary in order to assess clearly established law in the context of an assertion of qualified immunity. . . The only thing clearly established in this case is that the definition of the asserted constitutional right embraced by the district court — a right to sanitary prison conditions — was impermissibly broad. . . And the finding that such a right was clearly established based on this general definition was therefore in error. Because the right at issue has not been properly defined and there are genuine disputes of material fact at play, it is not possible for us to determine whether the individual officers committed a constitutional violation in the Faulkner County Detention Center due to the presence of Cladosporium. To do so would require us to delve into genuinely disputed facts beyond our jurisdiction. This is not to say that there can never be a case in which the presence of mold or another environmental allergen may give rise to unsanitary prison conditions that violate inmates' Eighth Amendment rights. Nor does it mean that truly dangerous environmental conditions could not reach such a high level where the violation was obvious. . . But that is not the case here. Despite our limited ability to address whether a constiutitonal violation has occurred, we can still reach the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. A grant of qualified immunity is inappropriate, absent an obvious violation, if the right was not clearly established. Here there is no controlling case and no robust consensus of persuasive authority able to place the question beyond debate. Neither our research nor the parties' briefing uncovered any controlling Eighth Circuit cases addressing prison conditions and issues related to mold or other allergens more broadly. Instead, tangential and sparse references to mold or allergens in our precedent arise specifically in the adequate medical care context, and not the conditions of confinement context. . . As such, a reasonable officer could glean little to no guidance from Eighth Circuit precedent about how to address the presence of a common mold in the jail, especially at the levels alleged. Likewise, there is a dearth of persuasive authority from outside the Eighth Circuit. . . . In short, we have not identified either 'controlling authority' or a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority' clearly establishing a right to be free from Cladosporium, mold, or other allergens in the prison context at the levels alleged here. The right in question, even if properly defined, was not clearly established.") Kohorst v. Smith, 968 F.3d 871, 878-79 (8th Cir. 2020) ("While Officer Smith's takedowns and repeated tasings of Kohorst 'likely reside[ ] on the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force, we cannot conclude that only a plainly incompetent officer would have believed the force used ...was constitutionally reasonable.'. . Officer Smith's actions, while a close call, did not violate a clearly established right and the district court did not err in granting qualified immunity. . . . Unlike Blazek, Kohorst was uncooperative, arguably resisting, and posed a potential threat as he had already attempted to escape his handcuffs. While we view the evidence in the light most favorable to Kohorst, no reasonable jury could review the video and conclude that Sergeant Stoler's action was gratuitous or unnecessarily violent–especially where Kohorst has no recollection of the event to testify to. Kohorst has also offered no evidence to refute Sergeant Stoler's explanation that he intended to place Kohorst in a way that reduced injury risk. . . . Sergeant Stoler's movement of Kohorst, an at least passively resisting suspect, was not gratuitous or unnecessarily violent. Even if we were to find that Sergeant Stoler's actions violated a

Kohorst v. Smith, 968 F.3d 871, 879-83 (8th Cir. 2020) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I do not agree that Officer Smith is entitled to qualified immunity on Kohorst's excessive-force claim stemming from his initial takedown. First, there is a genuine dispute over whether Smith knew Kohorst was a suspect in a fight when he threw Kohorst to the ground face-first. . . . On summary judgment, we must view the evidence in the light most favorable to Kohorst, and it is not appropriate for this court to remove the task of assessing witness credibility from the hands of the jury. . . Therefore, Kohorst must be treated as a nonviolent misdemeanant, at most, when evaluating whether Smith used excessive force. . . . Second, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Kohorst, he did not fail to comply with commands to sit on the front of the squad car and take his hands out of his pockets. . . . Here, as in Rohrbough, the police officer initiated the physical confrontation. While Kohorst held his wallet behind his back, Smith forcefully grabbed Kohorst's right arm. Smith yelled 'Don't fight with me,' as he pushed Kohorst against the squad car and then used an arm-bar maneuver to force Kohorst face-first to the ground. All of this happened within a span of 17 seconds. A reasonable jury could conclude that Kohorst's putting his arm behind his back was no more than 'de minimis or inconsequential' resistance. . . Indeed, if Rohrbough's pushing an officer did not justify Officer Hall's use of force, then Kohorst's moving his arm away did not justify Smith's taking Kohorst to the ground. Because a jury could reasonably conclude that Smith violated Kohorst's clearly established right to be free from excessive force during the initial takedown, Smith is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . I also do not agree that Sergeant Stoler is entitled to qualified immunity on Kohorst's separate excessive-force claim against him. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Kohorst, Stoler's use of force was gratuitous and excessive under the circumstances. It is clearly established 'that when a person is subdued and restrained with handcuffs, a "gratuitous and completely unnecessary act of violence" is unreasonable and violates the Fourth Amendment.'. . A reasonable jury could conclude that Stoler violated this clearly established right. Before Stoler pulled Kohorst out of the car and threw him onto the hard pavement, Kohorst was subdued, handcuffed, and seated. He was talking somewhat incoherently but calmly to the multiple officers who surrounded him. No reasonable officer would perceive Kohorst as a threat to officer safety. Indeed, one officer can be heard chuckling at Kohorst's awkward position. And although Kohorst twisted his hands while Stoler attempted to remove the handcuffs, this resistance was 'de minimis or inconsequential.'. . The officers reasonably may have used some degree of force to reapply Kohorst's handcuffs, and we have said that 'officers are not required to treat detainees as gently as possible.'. . But Kohorst has offered evidence to show that Stoler's actions were 'gratuitous and completely unnecessary' under the circumstances. . . With multiple officers surrounding a subdued Kohorst, '[t]here were other means, short of the force employed,' to reapply Kohorst's handcuffs. . . As a result, Stoler is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . .I respectfully dissent as to these two claims. I otherwise concur.")

Ivey v. Audrain County, Missouri, 968 F.3d 845, 849 (8th Cir. 2020) ("We have the discretion to decide either question first. . . and we think this case can be resolved on the second question, namely, whether the officers violated clearly established law. To prevail, Ivey's father has the burden to show that legal authorities establish beyond debate that a constitutional violation has occurred, so that, in responding to Ivey, the officers were plainly incompetent or knowingly violated the law. . .The Supreme Court has cautioned courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality. . . We have recognized this principle in cases involving deliberate indifference to a pretrial detainee's objectively serious medical needs. . . The district court here defined the right at issue quite broadly when it said that 'it is unlawful to delay medical treatment for a detainee exhibiting obvious signs of medical distress.' Assuming the court's statement is true as a general matter, its application to the situation that the officers faced here is unclear because they encountered a detainee who declined medical assistance, and Ivey's father has not shown that the law clearly establishes what officers must do in that situation.")

Ivey v. Audrain County, Missouri, 968 F.3d 845, 851-53 (8th Cir. 2020) (Grasz, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The court today concludes the defendant jail employees are entitled to qualified immunity because it believes Ivey's father failed to establish a violation of clearly established law related to his son's death while in custody. But even applying our rigorous 'clearly-established' jurisprudence, I believe Ivey's claims should survive summary judgment. Here's why. 'Summary judgment is appropriate only if "the movant shows that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law."'. . 'In making that determination, a court must view the evidence "in the light most favorable to the opposing party."'. . Such an approach is required 'even when ... a court decides only the clearly-established prong of the [qualified immunity] standard.'. . The Supreme Court has highlighted 'the importance of drawing inferences in favor of the nonmovant' when deciding whether the law was clearly established. . . Under such an approach, my view of this case differs from the court in a few key ways — ways that impact whether the inaction of the jail officials violated clearly established law. . . .Viewed in a light most favorable to Ivey, the facts demonstrate jail employees ignored medical instructions regarding Ivey's needed asthma medication, failed to report Ivey's first observed seizure to health officials, and either defied medical instruction and jail policy requiring Ivey's observation or observed a second seizure and then failed to respond for nearly an hour. I believe a reasonable jail employee in July of 2016 would know such conduct was constitutionally deficient.")

Dillard v. O'Kelley, 961 F.3d 1048, 1053-55 (8th Cir. 2020) (en banc) ("Often, controlling precedent establishes that an alleged constitutional right exists, but its parameters are 'inapplicable or too remote,' or their application to the facts is unclear. . . In other cases, the right's parameters are unclear because there is no controlling case, and courts in other jurisdictions may be 'sharply divided' on the issue. . . Here, by contrast, a Supreme Court decision raises the threshold question whether the right Defendants are alleged to have violated even exists. In Whalen v. Roe, the Supreme Court stated that its prior cases 'sometimes characterized as protecting "privacy" have in fact involved ... the individual interest in avoiding disclosure of personal matters.'. . The Court then upheld a New York statute requiring the State Department of Health to collect records identifying persons who acquired certain prescription drugs, concluding that 'this record does not establish an invasion of any right or liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . . Despite the Court's inconclusive acknowledgment of a constitutional right it held not violated, a majority of the courts of appeals interpreted Whalen and Nixon as recognizing a constitutional right to the privacy of medical, sexual, financial, and other categories of highly personal information, grounded in the Fourteenth Amendment right to substantive due process. . . . More than thirty years after Whalen and Nixon, the Supreme Court returned to the issue in NASA v. Nelson, 562 U.S. 134, 131 S.Ct. 746, 178 L.Ed.2d 667 (2011). It again rejected a constitutional privacy challenge, this time to mandatory background checks for contractors at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory. . . The Court declined to provide a 'definitive answer' to whether there is a constitutional right to informational privacy, because the government as petitioner had not presented the issue for decision and it was not briefed and argued. . . . Although Nelson left the issue unresolved, it confirmed that our court and other circuits erred in reading inconclusive statements in Whalen and Nixon as Supreme Court recognition of a substantive due process right to informational privacy. In this case, at oral argument before our en banc court, Defendants urged us to hold that the alleged right does not exist. But they did not raise this issue in the district court, before the panel, or in their petition for rehearing en banc. Nor did Plaintiffs address the issue prior to responding at oral argument. In similar circumstances, seven Supreme Court Justices declined to decide this constitutional issue in Nelson, observing that, 'Particularly in cases like this one, where we have only the scarce and open-ended guideposts of substantive due process to show us the way, the Court has repeatedly recognized the benefits of proceeding with caution.'. . The Court in Nelson opted to 'assume, without deciding, that the Constitution protects a privacy right of the sort mentioned in Whalen and Nixon.'. . However, even if the right is assumed to exist, in reviewing the denial of qualified immunity, Nelson raises an essential question: whether a right the Supreme Court has only assumed may exist, and this court has never held to be violated, can be a clearly established constitutional right. . . . The disclosures in this case occurred years after the decision in Nelson, and we have not revisited the issue. The resulting legal uncertainty surely means the alleged constitutional right to informational privacy is not 'beyond debate' in the Eighth Circuit. . . . Under Reichle, therefore, the uncertain status of the right to informational privacy means that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. If a right does not clearly exist, it cannot be clearly established.") Dillard v. O'Kelley, 961 F.3d 1048, 1055-56 (8th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (Colloton, J., concurring) ("I join the opinion of the court and submit these observations in response to the separate opinions that follow. Both opinions take the view that court decisions rejecting a plaintiff's claim of constitutional right can clearly establish a constitutional right for the benefit of a future plaintiff. The court properly declines to adopt that reasoning. . . . If there is no decision that a constitutional right exists, then the right is not clearly established, and officials do not have fair notice about it. In the context of qualified immunity, therefore, 'clearly established law comes from holdings, not dicta,'. . with the likely exception of decisions that declare a constitutional violation in a concrete case before granting qualified immunity. . . . [I]n discerning a clearly established substantive due process right to informational privacy, the panel decision in this case mistakenly attributed the force of binding law to dicta in Peffer, Eagle, and Cooksey. . . Whether some other disclosure of information that amounted to a 'shocking degradation' or 'egregious humiliation' would have implicated the concept of substantive due process was unnecessary to the decision or result in those cases. It was sufficient for this court in Peffer, Eagle, and Cooksey to assume without deciding that a disclosure of matters more personal would violate the Constitution, just as it was sufficient for the Supreme Court to do so in Whalen . . . and. . . Nelson[.]. . Such an assumption does not clearly establish a constitutional right. . .Decisions of four other circuits denying qualified immunity in this context relied on precedent of that circuit deciding in an actual case that a constitutional right to informational privacy existed and was sufficiently pleaded or proved.")

Dillard v. O'Kelley, 961 F.3d 1048, 1057-59 (8th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (Grasz, J., with whom Smith, C.J., joins, concurring in part and concurring in the result) ("The constitutional right to informational privacy in the Eighth Circuit is dead. . . Some believe it never lived. In any event, in this age of digital information, where the government may possess massive amounts of personal data, the protection of twenty-two million people from wrongful disclosure of intimately private information by government officials now lies squarely in the hands of the state legislatures in Arkansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota. . . Perhaps that is where it belonged from the start, given that the federal constitution is silent on the matter and the United States Supreme Court has yet to conclude that a constitutional right to informational privacy exits. . . . While the demise of informational privacy as a constitutional right in this circuit may be appropriate, we should at least recognize this was not an academic exercise to the plaintiffs. The court has concluded that the Arkansas public officials here, who are alleged to have callously revealed intimate and humiliating personal information of young sexual assault victims to a tabloid under highly suspicious circumstances, are exempt from liability because of qualified immunity. . . The court does so, in part, based on the proposition that a constitutional right not definitively recognized by the Supreme Court cannot be 'clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity analysis. . . While this reasoning may have facial appeal, it is simply not true that a right established in circuit precedent cannot be 'clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity even in the absence of definitive Supreme Court precedent. Indeed, many other circuit courts would likely be quite surprised by this holding. . . Regardless, today's decision means future litigants have no recourse in this circuit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for informational privacy violations. I remain of the view that the panel below was bound to follow this court's opinions in Cooksey v. Boyer, 289 F.3d 513, 515–16 (8th Cir. 2002), Eagle v. Morgan, 88 F.3d 620, 625 (8th Cir. 1996), and Alexander v. Peffer, 993 F.2d 1348, 1350 (8th Cir. 1993), in which we recognized and narrowly defined the right to informational privacy. . . However, I agree with the en banc court that the foundation of those cases is gone. And today's decision has effectively negated them. . . With no right to informational privacy recognized in this circuit, the appellants cannot, as a matter of law, prevail against the assertion of qualified immunity. They must instead look to state law for relief.")

Dillard v. O'Kelley, 961 F.3d 1048, 1059-62 (8th Cir. 2020) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("In 2006, Plaintiffs provided private and intimate details regarding their childhood sexual abuse to government officials under a promise of confidentiality. More than eight years later, government officials broke that promise and disclosed this sensitive information to a tabloid without Plaintiffs' consent. Because I believe this violated Plaintiffs' clearly established right to privacy, I respectfully dissent. The issue in this appeal is whether a reasonable government official in the Eighth Circuit would have understood that disclosing to a tabloid private information regarding childhood sexual abuse would violate the constitutional right to privacy. . . . Following other circuits, we have held that to violate an individual's constitutional right of privacy 'the information disclosed must be either a shocking degradation or an egregious humiliation of her to further some specific state interest, or a flagrant bre[a]ch of a pledge of confidentiality which was instrumental in obtaining the personal information.'. .Until this case, we had not been presented with a factual scenario that satisfied this exacting standard. . . But in my view, we had provided fair notice to government officials in the Eighth Circuit that the public disclosure of 'highly personal matters representing the most intimate aspects of human affairs,' that is 'either a shocking degradation or an egregious humiliation ..., or a flagrant breach of a pledge of confidentiality,' violates the constitutional right to privacy. . . . The question then becomes whether our precedent was undermined, such that the rule in this circuit would not have been clear to a reasonable official, by the Supreme Court's decision in Nelson. In that case, the Court 'assume[d], without deciding, that the Constitution protects a privacy right of the sort mentioned in Whalen and Nixon.'. . And it explained that, contrary to the interpretation adopted by most circuits, this was 'the same approach ... the Court took more than three decades ago in Whalen and Nixon.'. . In the court's view, 'Nelson raises an essential question: whether a right the Supreme Court has only assumed may exist, and this court has never held to be violated, can be a clearly established constitutional right.'. . Relying on Reichle v. Howards, the court answers this question in the negative, reasoning that 'the uncertain status of the right to informational privacy means that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.'. . I disagree. In Reichle, the Supreme Court decided that it was not clearly established in the Tenth Circuit that a retaliatory arrest could violate the First Amendment even if the arrest was supported by probable case. . . The Court reasoned that, although there was Tenth Circuit caselaw to this effect, a reasonable officer could have believed that caselaw had been abrogated by the Court's subsequent decision in Hartman v. Moore, . . . which reached the opposite conclusion regarding retaliatory prosecutions. . . The Court explained that most circuits had treated retaliatory arrest and prosecution claims similarly before Hartman, that it had granted certiorari in Hartman to resolve a circuit split pertaining to both retaliatory arrests and prosecutions, that much of the rationale in Hartman applied to both retaliatory arrests and prosecutions, and that several circuits had decided that Hartman's no-probable-cause requirement extended to retaliatory arrests. . . I do not agree that Nelson's effect on our right-to-privacy caselaw is similar to Hartman's effect on the Tenth Circuit's retaliatory-arrest caselaw. Unlike Hartman, which was intended to resolve a circuit split and abrogate contrary circuit authority, Nelson purported to leave the state of the law intact. . . The Court expressly acknowledged that, after Whalen and Nixon, different circuits had adopted different interpretations of when the disclosure of private information by government officials would violate the right to privacy, and the Court declined to decide which circuit's caselaw was correct. . . . Nelson did clarify that our prior caselaw was not required by Whalen and Nixon. A reasonable government official could have wondered whether, in light of that clarification, we would revisit our past decisions and change our right-to-privacy jurisprudence. But because we had not done so when the government officials made the disclosures at issue here, they could not have reasonably concluded that the law in the Eighth Circuit had been changed. And we have not been presented with an opportunity to revisit our pre-Nelson caselaw in this appeal. . . For these reasons, I believe the panel's opinion was correct, and I would reinstate it. To the extent the court does otherwise, I respectfully dissent.")

Chestnut v. Wallace, 947 F.3d 1085, 1090-92 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Taking the facts in Chestnut's favor, we think Walker establishes that Wallace violated Chestnut's clearly established right to watch police-citizen interactions at a distance and without interfering. The dissent says our definition of the right is defined too abstractly, at too high a level of generality. We respectfully disagree. We think we have correctly characterized the principle acted on in Walker, and thus the right in question, and we conclude that Chestnut has carried his burden to show that Walker clearly establishes such a right. Wallace tries to distinguish Walker on several grounds, but we find none of them persuasive. He maintains that Walker involved an arrest, whereas Chestnut was only detained. But the same facts that led us to conclude that it was clearly unlawful to arrest Walker lead us to conclude it was likewise clearly unlawful for Wallace to detain Chestnut; in both cases, no reasonable officer could conclude that a citizen's passive observation of a police-citizen interaction from a distance was criminal. We think it is legally irrelevant that Chestnut did not undergo similar post-seizure experiences as Walker, such as being placed in a hot police car, taken to the police station, or charged with a crime: This case is about the facts that existed when Chestnut was seized. Nor do we place any weight on the fact that Walker provided identification when Chestnut did not, for the reasons already stated. In short, we think Walker puts this constitutional question beyond debate, . . . and we can't see how applying Walker means that we are requiring police officers 'to parse fine distinctions between statutory and constitutional law in split-second decisions,' as the dissent maintains. Respectfully, it is the distinctions that Wallace invites us to draw between our case and Walker that are too fine and irrelevant. . . . Other legal authorities fully support our holding that the right here was clearly established. Every circuit court to have considered the question has held that a person has the right to record police activity in public. See, e.g., Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 355–56 (3d Cir. 2017). Four circuits had so decided by the time of the events in question here. See ACLU of Ill. v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583, 595 (7th Cir. 2012); Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78, 82–83 (1st Cir. 2011); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332, 1333 (11th Cir. 2000); Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436, 439 (9th Cir. 1995). This robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority suggests that, if the constitution protects one who records police activity, then surely it protects one who merely observes it—a necessary prerequisite to recording. Our circuit in particular has been quite forthright in upholding the right of citizens to engage with officers while they perform their duties. . . .The dissent explicitly agrees with our characterization of these cases, but it argues 'that factual distinctions matter greatly in delimiting the right.' We agree. But it supports its argument with a case, Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678 (5th Cir. 2017), that is distinguishable. In that case, a man recorded the exterior of a police station. The facts do not indicate that he recorded any police-citizen interactions or any other public police activity. The case therefore presents a much different question from ours, though we point out that that court, like every other circuit court that has considered the question, held that there was a constitutional right to record police activity. . . . We observe in closing that the fact-finder at trial may determine that Chestnut was indeed lurking in the woods, or at least otherwise disagree with Chestnut's telling of the night's events, in which case Wallace's detaining, handcuffing, and frisking Chestnut may have been justified. But at this stage, we must view the facts in Chestnut's favor. And though we agree with the dissent that 'qualified immunity is important to society as a whole,' so is the people's ability to monitor police activities to ensure that their duties are carried out responsibly.")

Chestnut v. Wallace, 947 F.3d 1085, 1095-96, 1099 (8th Cir. 2020) (Gruender, J., dissenting) ("The court does not explain why the distinctions between this case and Walker fail to sufficiently distinguish it. Instead, it says it is unconvinced by Wallace's attempt to do so. . . Yet Wallace does not bear the burden to show that these cases are too distinct to provide obvious guidance; Chestnut has the burden to prove they are sufficiently similar. . . We cannot—and should not—shift that burden. In light of the dissimilarities in these cases, I do not believe that Walker put 'beyond debate' what the law required in the circumstances Wallace faced. . . In an effort to support its finding that Wallace violated clearly established law, the court turns away from Walker to an argument Chestnut does not advance: that a consensus of cases from other circuits establishing that the Constitution protects those who video record police activity as long as they do not interfere with police duties also includes the right to merely observe police conduct. . . I agree with the court's characterization of those cases. But—again—the fact that a certain right exists does not mean it is without limits, nor does it necessarily indicate that it is obvious how the right applies to a certain set of facts. Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678 (5th Cir. 2017), a recent Fifth Circuit case considering the right to record the police, illustrates that factual distinctions matter greatly in delimiting the right. There, officers observed an individual videotaping the Fort Worth Police Station from a sidewalk across the street from the station. . . Officers approached, questioned, and detained the on-looker, eventually handcuffing him and placing him in the back of a patrol car. . . The court found that, because of the unusual nature of where and what he was recording, '[a]n objectively reasonable person in [the officers'] position could have suspected that Turner was casing the station for an attack, stalking an officer, or otherwise preparing for criminal activity, and thus could have found Turner's filming of the "routine activities" of the station sufficiently suspicious to warrant questioning and a brief detention.'. . .Likewise, under the circumstances presented here, a reasonable officer could believe it would not violate clearly established law to conduct an investigative stop. . . . In recent years, the Supreme Court has issued several decisions reversing denials of qualified immunity by the courts of appeals. The Court found those reversals 'necessary both because qualified immunity is important to society as a whole, and because as an immunity from suit, qualified immunity is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.'. . We should hew closely to the wisdom of this instruction and to the counsel of our own precedent which emphasizes that officers in the line of duty are not 'participating in a law school seminar.'. . It is thus worth emphasizing again that police officers are not—and should not be—expected to parse fine distinctions between statutory and constitutional law in split-second decisions. . . Because there is no authority that would have given Officer Wallace notice that it was a Fourth Amendment violation to conduct an investigative stop in the manner he did under the circumstances presented in this case, I respectfully dissent.")

Jan. 21, 2022) (" Unlike many other circuits, the Eighth Circuit has not expressly held that the First Amendment protects the photographing and recording of police activities in public. But it has provided the Court significant guidance on this issue in a recent decision, Chestnut v. Wallace, 947 F.3d 1085 (8th Cir. 2020). In Chestnut, the plaintiff brought an action against a police officer, alleging that the officer violated the Fourth Amendment when he stopped, frisked, and handcuffed him without reasonable suspicion or probable cause. . . According to the plaintiff, he had been watching another police officer perform traffic stops at a distance without interfering. . . That police officer radioed the defendant police officer for assistance. . . The defendant police officer approached the plaintiff, and, after the plaintiff refused to provide his full social security number, frisked him for weapons and handcuffed him. . . After the district court denied the officer's qualified immunity defense, the officer appealed. . . With one judge dissenting, the Eighth Circuit held that the defendant police officer 'violated [the plaintiff's] clearly established right to watch police-citizen interactions at a distance and without interfering.'. . The majority cited with approval the other circuits that had 'held that a person has the right to record police activity in public.'. . Thus, the Chestnut court wrote, 'If the constitution protects one who records police activity, then surely it protects one who merely observes it—a necessary prerequisite to recording.'. . The majority noted that the Eighth Circuit 'in particular has been quite forthright in upholding the right of citizens to engage with officers while they perform their duties.'. . And, the Chestnut court observed, the majority's holding protected 'the people's ability to monitor police activities to ensure that their duties are carried out responsibly.'. .
Although Chestnut was a Fourth Amendment case, its pronouncement of a constitutionally protected right to observe and record police activity leads the Court to find Keup was engaged in a protected activity when he was hit with a pepper ball. A strong consensus has developed amongst the circuits that this conduct fits within the First Amendment's protections. Indeed, no circuit to consider the issue has held that the right to record police activity does not exist under the First Amendment. . . . The weight of authority from the other federal circuits and the statements in Chestnut proclaiming a constitutional right to record and observe police activity in public lead this Court to conclude that the ability to watch and assist in taking photographs of a protest is activity protected by the First Amendment. When Keup was observing the protest and assisting his partner in photographing the event, he was engaged in activity protected by the First Amendment. . . Therefore, Keup's First Amendment claim survives Defendants' Motions to Dismiss.")]

Johnson v. McCarver, 942 F.3d 405, 410-11 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Whether the officers subjectively thought there was probable cause to arrest for trespass is irrelevant. . . We examine only the objective question whether the circumstances known to the officers established a fair probability that Johnson committed an offense. Johnson's refusal to leave after agents of the club revoked his license to remain established arguable probable cause to believe that he trespassed. Arguable probable cause that he had committed an offense inside the club continued to exist fifteen minutes later when the officers arrested Johnson. Whether the officers exercised poor judgment in electing to arrest Johnson after the original dispute was resolved is not pertinent to the objective probable-cause analysis under the Fourth Amendment. The officers also claim qualified immunity on Johnson's claim under the Due Process Clause. Johnson asserts that the officers deprived him of liberty without due process of law by falsifying a report of his arrest. Any deprivation of Johnson's liberty before his criminal trial, however, is governed by the Fourth Amendment and its prohibition on unreasonable seizures. Manuel v. City of Joliet, 137 S. Ct. 911, 917 (2017). (On this issue, Manuel abrogated Moran v. Clarke, 296 F.3d 638, 646-47 (8th Cir. 2002) (en banc).) Any post-trial claim based on the alleged false report requires a showing that the report was used to deprive Johnson of liberty in some way. See Winslow v. Smith, 696 F.3d 716, 735 (8th Cir. 2012). The jury acquitted Johnson, and he suffered no deprivation of liberty after the trial. Accordingly, there is insufficient evidence to support a finding that the officers violated Johnson's rights under the Due Process Clause. For these reasons, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's claims alleging false arrest under the Fourth Amendment, retaliatory arrest under the First Amendment, and deprivation of liberty in violation of the Due Process Clause.")

Johnson v. McCarver, 942 F.3d 405, 411-12 (8th Cir. 2019) ("There are genuine disputes of material fact about whether McCarver's use of the taser violated Johnson's clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment. It is undisputed that more than fifteen minutes after Johnson exited the club, the officers went outside and saw that Johnson was sitting on a planter while filming them with his cell phone. McCarver approached Johnson and knocked Johnson's phone to the ground. Johnson stood up, bent over, picked up his phone, and sat back down on the planter. The parties disagree about what happened next. Johnson testified that '[o]nce [he] sat down,' McCarver tased him in the back. The officers contend that Johnson stood up again before McCarver fired his taser: LaLuzerne testified that Johnson stepped onto the planter and 'lunged back down at' him; McCarver asserts that Johnson 'stepped onto the bench' surrounding the planter, and pushed LaLuzerne away from him. The officers argue that we should disregard Johnson's account because it is 'blatantly contradicted' by video footage from a security camera. . . The district court saw no blatant contradiction and concluded that 'the video is more supportive of Johnson's version of the incident.' Having reviewed the evidence ourselves, we deem it inconclusive. In reviewing the denial of a motion for summary judgment, therefore, we accept Johnson's version that he was seated peacefully on the planter when McCarver tased him. At the time of the incident, it was clearly established that it was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment to apply a taser to a 'nonviolent, suspected misdemeanant who was not fleeing or resisting arrest, [and] who posed little to no threat to anyone's safety.'. . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Johnson, McCarver violated this clearly established right when he applied the taser to Johnson. The district court correctly determined that there are genuine issues of material fact that preclude summary judgment on this claim.")
