SECTION 1983: QUALIFIED IMMUNITY

Karen M. Blum (kblum@suffolk.edu)
Suffolk University Law School
Research Date: Sept. 23, 2022

Author's Note

This outline is arranged under various topic headings that indicate problem areas likely to be encountered in the qualified immunity analysis. Other than in the material dealing with absolute immunity, immunity for private actors, and that covering the basic scope of the immunity doctrine, the outline arranges the cases according to Circuits under each topic, with the most recent cases listed first. The outline does contain some district court decisions if they have useful language or analysis.

Please be advised that I do not use research assistants to prepare these outlines, so that any errors are my own. Each updated outline attempts to remove cases that may no longer be good law or to indicate any negative history of a case where important. I would advise you check the current status of any case you intend to rely on, especially a district court opinion.

SECTION 1983: QUALIFIED IMMUNITY

Karen M. Blum (kblum@suffolk.edu)
Suffolk University Law School
Research Date: Sept. 23, 2022

QUALIFIED IMMUNITY

I. INTRODUCTION

A. Note on Absolute Immunity

A government official may invoke one of two types of immunity from personal liability for damages: absolute or qualified immunity. The Supreme Court has adopted a "functional" approach to absolute immunity, so that whether an official is entitled to absolute immunity will depend on the function performed by that official in a particular context. Forrester v. White, 484 U.S. 219, 224 (1988). Most government officials are entitled only to qualified immunity. Officials performing judicial, prosecutorial, or legislative functions, however, have been afforded absolute immunity. Witnesses in judicial proceedings have likewise been afforded absolute immunity with respect to their testimony. The President enjoys absolute immunity when performing his official functions. Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731 (1982). But see Clinton v. Jones, 117 S. Ct. 1636, 1644 (1997) ("[W]e have never suggested that the President, or any other official, has an immunity that extends beyond the scope of any action taken in an official capacity.").

The leading cases on judicial, prosecutorial, witness, and legislative immunity are set out below.

1. Judicial Immunity

a. Judges

See, e.g., Mireles v. Waco, 502 U.S. 9 (1992) (absolute judicial immunity where conduct is in excess of jurisdiction rather than in absence of jurisdiction);); Forrester v. White, 484 U.S. 219, 228-29 (1988) (judge has absolute immunity only when acting in judicial, as opposed to administrative, capacity); Stump v. Sparkman, 435 U.S. 349 (1978) (absolute immunity for judge acting within jurisdiction).

See also Libertarian Party of Erie County v. Cuomo, 970 F.3d 106, 123-25 (2d Cir. 2020) ("[T]he entitlement of a judge to absolute immunity depends on the nature of the function being performed. Judges are entitled not to absolute immunity, but to at most a qualified immunity, with respect to acts that are administrative, such as employment decisions[.] . . . Judicial acts principally involve adjudication of particularized, existing issues. Thus, some functions may be viewed as judicial acts when performed in the context of a particular case but as administrative when performed for the purpose of overall management in anticipation of future cases. For example, empaneling a jury in a particular criminal trial is a quintessentially judicial act, . . . whereas compilation of an annual list of county residents believed to be qualified for jury duty is an act that is ministerial[.] . . Similarly, the act of disbarring an attorney as a sanction for the attorney's contumacious conduct in connection with a particular case is a judicial act, . . . whereas a committee, in making decisions as to additions to or deletions from a roster of attorneys deemed qualified to represent indigent defendants accused of crimes, unconnected to any particular criminal prosecution, is not performing a quasi-judicial function[.] . . . Here, the applications of those plaintiffs who requested a firearm license were ruled on by the judge who was the licensing officer for the applicant's county of residence. Actual rulings on such applications--referred to in the Complaint, some of which have been submitted by defendants in support of the motion to dismiss--directly addressed the specific applications, referred to relevant requirements of § 400.00, and decided the merits of the applicants' requests. . . . We conclude that the district court did not err in determining that the rulings on firearm license applications were judicial decisions and that Justice Boller and Judge Kehoe--the only defendants against whom traceable claims were asserted by plaintiffs with standing to sue--are entitled to absolute immunity from the claims asserted against them in their individual capacities."); McCullough v. Finley, 907 F.3d 1324, 1331-32 (11th Cir. 2018) ("A judge's motivation is irrelevant to determining whether his act was judicial. A judge enjoys absolute immunity for judicial acts regardless of whether he made a mistake, acted maliciously, or exceeded his authority. . . And the 'tragic consequences' that result from a judge's acts do not warrant denying him absolute immunity from suit. . .The district court erred when it based its decision on the judges' motivation instead of the nature and function of their acts. The district court reasoned that the judges' acts were not judicial because 'municipal revenue generation is not a function normally performed by a judge.' But even if the judges were motivated to generate municipal revenue, their acts 'do[ ] not become less judicial by virtue of an allegation of malice or corruption of motive.'. . Instead of assessing the motivation behind the judges' acts, we determine whether the nature and functions of the alleged acts are judicial by considering four factors: (1) the precise act complained of is a normal judicial function; (2) the events involved occurred in the judge's chambers; (3) the controversy centered around a case then pending before the judge; and (4) the confrontation arose directly and immediately out of a visit to the judge in his official capacity. . . Each of those factors favors immunity here. . . .Alabama law empowers municipal-court judges to order defendants to sit-out fines in jail, Ala. Code § 15-18-62, so the judges did not exceed their subject-matter jurisdiction when they did so. . . All of the jailees' claims against the judges are barred by absolute judicial immunity."); Woodworth v. Hulshof, 891 F.3d 1083, 1091-92 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Properly framed, the relevant inquiry is whether Judge Lewis's handling of evidence and his failure to disclose exculpatory evidence fell within the scope of his judicial duties. Judge Lewis came upon the relevant evidence through the judicial acts of appointing a special prosecutor, convening a grand jury, and presiding over a juvenile-certification hearing. His authority to conduct these activities is undisputed. . . Further, as the district court noted, the forwarding of correspondence to defense attorneys—or the failure to do so—was likewise a judicial act. . . We also note that Woodworth does not dispute that he was 'dealing with the judge in his judicial capacity' at all relevant times. . . Thus, even if true, the allegations in Count I are insufficient to defeat judicial immunity."); Stevens v. Osuna, 877 F.3d 1293, 1304 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Considering both the adjudicatory role that Immigration Judges play within the immigration-hearing process and the existence of what we view—in the light of the Supreme Court's guidance—as sufficient pertinent safeguards, we are persuaded that Immigration Judges are judges entitled to absolute immunity for their judicial acts, without regard to the motive with which those acts are allegedly performed."); Bright v. Gallia County, Ohio, 753 F.3d 639, 652 (6th Cir. 2014) ("While we ultimately conclude that Judge Evans is entitled to absolute judicial immunity, we cannot help but add our voices to the chorus of condemnation for his actions. By operating in such an unreasonable manner, Judge Evans has brought dishonor on himself and his position. The Ohio Supreme Court properly sanctioned him for this behavior. But we say again, absolute judicial immunity is not designed to protect individual bad actors; rather it is in place to protect judicial independence. In our legal system, there is often someone who loses his money, his liberty, or his life. This cannot be helped. But if that defeated party could turn around and file suit against the judge or judges in his case, then the whole system would unravel as the threat of suit crept into the judges' minds. This conclusion does little to help Bright, who was wronged by Judge Evans. It, however, preserves the independent judiciary. For the above reasons, we hold that Judge Evans is entitled to absolute judicial immunity."); Davis v. Tarrant County Tex., 565 F.3d 214, 225, 226 (5th Cir. 2009) ("After considering the applicable legal standard, the authorities that support each side of the immunity question in this case, and the underlying purpose of the judicial immunity doctrine, we believe that the act of selecting applicants for inclusion on a rotating list of attorneys eligible for court appointments is inextricably linked to and cannot be separated from the act of appointing counsel in a particular case, which is clearly a judicial act, and therefore that the judges' acts at issue in this suit must be considered to be protected by judicial immunity. . . . The Supreme Court has held that the related doctrine of prosecutorial immunity, which is justified by a similar rationale and governed by similar rules, may apply to acts made outside the context of a specific lawsuit when the acts are 'directly connected with the conduct of a trial' and 'necessarily require legal knowledge and the exercise of related discretion.'[citing Van De Kamp] Ultimately, the acts at issue in this case involve the performance of duties which are intimately connected to a judge's adjudicatory role, and are therefore judicial in nature."); Barrett v. Harrington, 130 F.3d 246, 264 (6th Cir. 1997) ("We hold that a judge is entitled to absolute immunity when contacting prosecutors to prompt an investigation of conduct by a disgruntled litigant which may constitute obstruction of justice in connection with an action or decision taken or made by the judge in his or her adjudicatory capacity. We affirm the District Court's ruling that Judge Harrington was not entitled to absolute immunity for her statements to the media, because such statements are not judicial acts."); Archie v. Lanier, 95 F.3d 438, 441 (6th Cir. 1996) (holding that "stalking and sexually assaulting a person, no matter the circumstances, do not constitute 'judicial acts.'").

See also Strawser v. Strange, 100 F. Supp. 3d 1276, 1282 (S.D. Ala. 2015) ("The issuance of marriage licenses is a purely ministerial act. See Ex parte State ex rel. Alabama Policy Institute, ——So.3d ——, ——, ——, 2015 WL 892752, *4, 8 (Ala., March 3, 2015) (discussing and referring to the probate judges' 'ministerial act of licensing marriages'). Neither Davis nor Russell is charged with discretion or judgment in carrying out this ministerial duty. Accordingly, the court finds Defendants are not entitled to judicial immunity.")

See also Savoie v. Martin, 673 F.3d 488, 496 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Savoie also asked the court to enjoin Tennessee judges 'from presiding over any matter under which they served as a Rule 31 mediator.' Savoie's claim for injunctive relief fails because 'injunctive relief shall not be granted' in an action brought against 'a judicial officer for an act or omission taken in such officer's judicial capacity ... unless a declaratory decree was violated or declaratory relief was unavailable.' 42 U.S.C. § 1983; accord Montero v. Travis, 171 F.3d 757, 761 (2d Cir.1999). The district court did not err in declining to render this relief.").

b. Officials Acting in Judicial or Quasi-Judicial Capacity

Spec's Family Partners, Ltd. v. Nettles, 972 F.3d 671, 678-80 (5th Cir. 2020) ("The Butz factors . . . strongly suggest that Defendants' challenged conduct was akin to prosecutors intimately involved in judicial proceedings and therefore 'entitled to absolute immunity from suit.'. . Defendants were discharging their statutory mandate to regulate the alcoholic beverage industry. The challenged acts—administrative holds, protests, and decisions regarding renewal permits—were related to, and arose out of the same alleged conduct as, the underlying SOAH case. This point is underscored by Spec's' allegations that the SOAH combined all the issues into a single consolidated case and that the bases for the underlying SOAH case and the protests were the same. Spec's counters, in conclusory fashion, that the challenged acts were merely administrative and regulatory and thus disentitled to absolute immunity. It accuses the district court of failing to analyze the functions Defendants were performing. But Spec's' argument suffers from precisely that flaw: it offers virtually no functional analysis of Defendants' acts, beyond labeling them 'administrative' and 'regulatory.'. . That is insufficient. For these reasons, we conclude that Defendants were functioning in quasi-prosecutorial roles as the State's advocate in a way 'intimately associated with' judicial proceedings. . . Defendants are thus entitled to absolute immunity from the § 1983 claims concerning the acts challenged here. . . .In sum, the district court correctly concluded Defendants are entitled to absolute immunity from Spec's' claims that they wrongfully placed administrative holds and protested Spec's' applications and wrongfully refused to renew existing permits during the SOAH proceedings. However, contrary to the district court's conclusion, Defendants are not entitled to absolute immunity from Spec's' claims that, during the investigation, they concealed evidence from a TABC auditor in order to get false testimony to be used as settlement leverage and as an evidentiary basis for filing additional charges against Spec's in the SOAH proceeding."); Hamilton v. City of Hayti, Missouri, 948 F.3d 921, 928 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Judge Ragland's practice of setting a bond schedule conditioning the pretrial release of persons accused of municipal ordinance violations was a judicial act within his jurisdiction to which judicial immunity attaches. . . .For court clerks, absolute immunity has been extended to acts that are discretionary, taken at the direction of a judge, or taken according to court rules. . . Here, even assuming that Judge Ragland did not direct Overbey to issue the warrant to arrest Hamilton, it is undisputed that Judge Ragland authorized Overbey to use her discretion to issue and set warrants with bond conditions. In similar situations, we have extended quasi-judicial immunity to court clerks."); Benavidez v. Howard, 931 F.3d 1225, 1230-32 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Relying on the Court's reasoning in Imbler and Butz, our sister circuits have held that absolute immunity also is available to attorneys defending the government in civil litigation because such immunity is necessary to achieve the independent judgment and vigorous advocacy vital to the effective functioning of our adversarial system of justice. [citing cases] We subsequently recognized absolute immunity as extending to 'government lawyers involved in civil proceedings.' Robinson v. Volkswagenwerk, 940 F.2d 1369, 1373 n.4 (10th Cir. 1991). . . . Paraphrasing Buckley, the rule of absolute immunity as applied to government attorneys charged with violating § 1983 may be stated generally as follows: A government attorney's administrative duties and those investigatory functions that do not closely relate to an advocate's preparation for judicial proceedings are not entitled to absolute immunity. Rather, absolute immunity shields those acts undertaken by a government attorney in preparation for judicial proceedings and which occur in the course of his or her role as an advocate for the government. . . Applying this rule to the facts of our case, we easily conclude that Defendants Hernandez, Zarr, and Bullock are entitled to absolute immunity for their acts of preparing and filing the motion for a protective order. . . Unquestionably, such acts are 'intimately associated' with the judicial process, falling within the advocacy function of the city attorneys assigned to defend the city clerk against Plaintiffs' § 1983 action. . . Any lesser immunity could impair the performance of a central actor—government defense counsel—in the 'judicial process.'. . . Absolute immunity for the city attorneys in this case is necessary to protect their independent judgment by freeing them from the possibility of harassment and intimidation associated with their defense of the city clerk. . . This, in turn, shields and protects the state court's truth-finding mission and decision-making process. . . . Accordingly, we hold a government defense attorney who, in the course of a civil adjudication, prepares a motion and arranges for the presentation of evidence on the court record by way of affidavit in support of the motion, is absolutely immune from a collateral § 1983 suit for damages based on the filing of such motion and affidavit."); Benavidez v. Howard, 931 F.3d 1225, 1233-36 (10th Cir. 2019) (Baldock, J., concurring in the judgment only as to Part IV) ("I concur fully in Parts I–III of the Court's opinion. As to Part IV, I concur only in the Court's judgment affirming dismissal of the claims against Defendant Howard. . . The Court holds Defendant Howard, the city clerk, is entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiffs' § 1983 complaint fails to allege a constitutional violation against her. In disposing of the case against her on such ground, however, the Court inexplicably bypasses the question of whether Defendant Howard is entitled to the greater protections of absolute immunity. I would not bypass this question, but instead would decide under the facts of this case that she is entitled to absolute immunity from § 1983 liability both as a party to the state court proceedings and a witness offering evidence therein. . . . I would hold as follows: A public official who, in the course of civil adjudication, assists her attorneys in preparing a motion on her behalf and arranging for the presentation of evidence on the record by way of a supporting affidavit, is absolutely immune from a collateral § 1983 suit for damages based on the filing of such motion and affidavit."); Matter of Ondova Ltd. Co., 914 F.3d 990, 993-94 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Trustees are entitled to absolute immunity for all actions taken pursuant to a court order. . . And while this circuit does not have controlling precedent on the issue, numerous sister circuits have held that trustees have qualified immunity for personal harms caused by actions taken within the scope of their official duties. . . Only ultra vires actions—actions that fall outside the scope of their duties as trustees—are not entitled to immunity. There is no compelling reason to depart from our sister circuits' sensible approach. We thus hold that bankruptcy trustees in the Fifth Circuit are entitled to qualified immunity for personal harms caused by actions that, while not pursuant to a court order, fall within the scope of their official duties. . . . Second, we agree with the district court that this immunity extends to Trustee Sherman's attorneys under both a derivative theory of judicial immunity and under the separate doctrine of attorney immunity. . . for essentially the same reasons articulated by the district court."); Sinapi v. Rhode Island Bd. of Bar Examiners, 910 F.3d 544, 554-55 (1st Cir. 2018) ("Our decision in Bettencourt v. Bd. of Registration in Med. of Com. of Mass., 904 F.2d 772 (1st Cir. 1990) establishes the applicable standards. In that case, the plaintiff doctor sought monetary damages from the Board of Registration (BOR) based on an alleged violation of his civil rights committed by the BOR when it revoked his medical license. We noted in Bettencourt that quasi-judicial immunity extended 'to agency officials who, irrespective of their title, perform functions essentially similar to those of judges or prosecutors, in a setting similar to that of a court.'. .In concluding that the BOR members were immune from claims for monetary damages, Bettencourt identified three pivotal questions. First, did the BOR member, 'like a judge, perform a traditional "adjudicatory" function, in that he decide[d] facts, applie[d] law, and otherwise resolve[d] disputes on the merits ...?' Second, did the BOR member, 'like a judge, decide cases sufficiently controversial that, in the absence of absolute immunity, he would be subject to numerous damages actions?' Third, did the BOR member, 'like a judge, adjudicate disputes against a backdrop of multiple safeguards designed to protect a [party's] constitutional rights?'. .The answers to all three of these questions are self-evident. First, the role of the Board member is functionally comparable to that of a judge. Here, Board members weighed the facts relating to the request for accommodations, albeit in a manner disappointing to Sinapi, and resolved the dispute about his entitlement to the accommodations on its merits. Second, the act of denying a bar applicant an accommodation is likely to stimulate a litigious reaction by the disappointed applicant, as was the case here. The need for quasi-judicial protection of the Board member is almost painfully obvious. Few people would serve on the Board knowing that any negative accommodation decision would likely trigger a lawsuit aimed at their personal checking accounts. Even if someone had the brass to join the Board in these circumstances, denials of accommodations, however well founded, would likely be few and reluctant. Quasi-judicial protection is simply essential if the Board is to function objectively. Finally, the process embraced protections (including an independent medical assessment and plenary review by the Rhode Island Supreme Court) sufficient to 'enhance the reliability of information and the impartiality of the decisionmaking process.'. .Based on this analysis we conclude that the Board members in their individual capacities were immune from any claim for monetary damages."); Tobey v. Chibucos, 890 F.3d 634, 650 (7th Cir. 2018) ("[I]n filing the memoranda requesting that the state's attorney begin proceedings to revoke probation, Chibucos was engaged in a quasi-judicial function for which she is protected by absolute immunity. . . . Absolute immunity does not, however, extend to day-to-day duties in the supervision of a parolee or investigating and gathering evidence for revocation."); Garcia v. Cty. of Riverside, 817 F.3d 635, 644 (9th Cir. 2016) ("It is true that 'prison officials charged with executing facially valid court orders enjoy absolute immunity from section 1983 liability for conduct prescribed by those orders.'. . However, absolute immunity applies 'only to the fact of a prisoner's incarceration pursuant to a facially valid court order—i.e., the prison official in question must act within his or her authority and strictly comply with the order.'. . Here, according to Plaintiff's allegations, Baca did not strictly comply with the order, as it was applied to the wrong person, and Plaintiff challenged not just the fact of his incarceration, but also the lack of procedures to prevent the misidentification. Because the facts Plaintiff has alleged go beyond the limits of quasi-judicial immunity, this immunity does not apply to Baca."); Flying Dog Brewery, LLLP v. Michigan Liquor Control Comm'n, 597 F. App'x 342, 349, 352 (6th Cir. 2015) ("We find the Third Circuit's analysis of the non-exhaustive Cleavinger factors useful. We apply a similar approach to decide only whether the Administrative Commissioners who grant or deny beer label registration applications are entitled to quasi-judicial immunity. We expressly do not consider whether quasi-judicial immunity is warranted for other factual situations the Administrative Commissioners may face, nor do we consider whether the Hearing Commissioners who suspend or revoke liquor licenses in disciplinary cases are entitled to quasi-judicial immunity. . . .Because the six Cleavinger factors are divided evenly both for and against a grant of quasi-judicial immunity, we call this close question in favor of Flying Dog. We limit our decision on quasi-judicial immunity to the specific factual and legal circumstances presented by this case. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's conclusion that quasi-judicial immunity is warranted here, and we turn to the question of qualified immunity."); Capra v. Cook County Bd. of Review, 733 F.3d 705, 709, 710 (7th Cir. 2013) (Individual members of Cook County Board of Review were entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity when performing duties that are functionally comparable to judicial officer."); Engebretson v. Mahoney, 724 F.3d 1034, 1039-42 (9th Cir. 2013) ("Consistent with this functional approach, the courts of appeals that have addressed whether prison officials are absolutely immune from § 1983 liability for enforcing facially valid court orders have uniformly concluded that they are. Absolute immunity applies even where a prisoner claims that the order at issue is invalid or the order is later overturned. [collecting cases] We now join our sister circuits and hold that prison officials charged with executing facially valid court orders enjoy absolute immunity from § 1983 liability for conduct prescribed by those orders. Our reasons are straightforward. First, such immunity is grounded in the common law. . .Second, such immunity is consistent with the Supreme Court's recent case law, because it is beyond dispute that prison officials enforcing court orders are 'performing functions necessary to the judicial process.'. . It is no accident that most courts refer to absolute immunity for prison officials enforcing court orders as 'quasi-judicial immunity.'. .Third, absolute immunity is necessary to free prison officials from the fear of litigation and 'insure that such officials can perform their function without the need to secure permanent legal counsel.'. . .Our sister circuits have been careful to extend absolute immunity only to the fact of a prisoner's incarceration pursuant to a facially valid court order— i.e., the prison official in question must act within his or her authority and strictly comply with the order. . . . This case fits within these limitations. There can be no question that the state court had the authority to issue Engebretson's sentencing order, that the defendants had the authority to enforce the order, or that the order was facially valid. . . .Prison officials who simply enforce facially valid court orders 'are performing functions necessary to the judicial process.'. . They must not be required to second-guess the courts if that process is to work fairly and efficiently. For this and the other reasons discussed above, we hold that prison officials, like the defendants in this case, who are charged with executing facially valid court orders enjoy absolute immunity from § 1983 liability for conduct prescribed by those orders."); Jackson v.Pfau, 523 F. App'x 736 (2d Cir. 2013) (Judge, judge's law clerk, chief judge, and other judicial officers were entitled to judicial immunity from suit under § 1983 for actions taken in performance of duties); Heyde v. Pittenger, 633 F.3d 512, 517, 519 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Here, the district judge found that the BOR [Board of Review] members are entitled to absolute immunity because, under the Butz criteria and Illinois statutes governing the BOR, their actions while reviewing Heyde's property assessment claim were quasi-judicial in nature. We agree. . . . The BOR has the characteristics that counsel towards granting absolute immunity. The BOR members' actions while performing their duties as instructed by Illinois statutes, Heyde's ability to present evidence and question witnesses, his ability to appeal both to the PTAB and, if still dissatisfied, to the Illinois courts, and the need to protect BOR members from fear of intimidation and litigation, fall squarely within the Butz factors and within our previous decisions regarding absolute immunity for state and local administrative officials. Accordingly, the BOR members are entitled to absolute immunity."); Keystone Redevelopment Partners, LLC v. Decker, 631 F.3d 89, 101 (3d Cir. 2011) ("In sum, we hold that the Butz factors, on balance, clearly support quasi-judicial immunity for members of the Pennsylvania Gaming Control Board."); Jallali v. Florida, No. 10-12386, 2011 WL 5019382, at *1 (11th Cir. Dec. 10, 2010) (not reported) ("Absolute judicial immunity extends not only to judges, but to other persons whose 'official duties have an integral relationship with the judicial process.'. .Because drafting an appellate court opinion is an inherently judicial activity, a law clerk enjoys absolute immunity in doing so."); Disraeli v. Rotunda, 489 F.3d 628, 632, 633 (5th Cir. 2007) (enforcement attorney with Texas State Securities Board was acting in quasi-judicial capacity when issuing an emergency order and entitled to absolute immunity); Dotzel v. Ashbridge, 438 F.3d 320, 323, 324, 327 & n.5 (3d Cir. 2006) ("Analysis of the functions undertaken by the Board in ruling on permit applications persuades us that the Board members act in a quasi-judicial capacity and are therefore entitled to absolute immunity from suit.. . . . As its name suggests, 'quasi-judicial' immunity is a doctrine under which government actors whose acts are relevantly similar to judging are immune from suit. 'Quasi-judicial absolute immunity attaches when a public official's role is "functionally comparable" to that of a judge.' . . Regardless of his job title, if a state official must walk, talk, and act like a judge as part of his job, then he is as absolutely immune from lawsuits arising out of that walking, talking, and acting as are judges who enjoy the title and other formal indicia of office. . . .The Board members here were acting in a quasi-judicial capacity, and are absolutely immune from suit in their individual capacities. Any actions against them in their individual capacities must therefore be dismissed. . . . The remaining substantive due process claim against the Township and the Board members in their official capacities is not affected by our decision in this appeal. The substantive due process claim against the Board members in their official capacities 'is, in all respects other than name, to be treated as a suit against the entity.'. . The Township, as a municipal entity, is not entitled to any form of immunity."); Diva's Inc. v. City of Bangor, 411 F.3d 30, 40, 41(1st Cir. 2005) (City Council members performed an adjudicatory function when they reviewed and voted on special amusement permit and thus were entitled to absolute immunity in their personal capacities); In re Castillo, 297 F.3d 940, 953 (9th Cir. 2002) (Bankruptcy trustee is entitled to quasi-judicial immunity for both scheduling and noticing of confirmation hearing); Lonzetta Trucking and Excavating Company v. Schan, No. 04-2758, 2005 WL 730363, at *4 (3d Cir. Mar. 9, 2005) (unpublished) ("[Z]oning officials, including the supervisors of Hazle Township, members of the Hazle Township Zoning Board, and the Zoning Officer of Hazle Township would be entitled to absolute immunity in their individual capacities if they were performing 'quasi-judicial' functions. However, the zoning officials in their official capacities, the Hazle Township Zoning Board, and the Hazle Township are not entitled to absolute immunity. The planning board as a governmental agency has no immunity whatsoever."); Tobin for Governor v. Illinois State Board of Elections, 268 F.3d 517, 523-26 (7th Cir. 2001) (collecting and discussing cases where court has extended absolute immunity to members of various state agencies acting in an adjudicatory capacity; concluding that "the board members act in the functional capacity of judges when they rule on the validity of nomination petitions, which entitles them to quasi-judicial absolute immunity."); Beck v. Texas State Bd of Dental Examiners, 204 F.3d 629, 635, 636 (5th Cir. 2000) (members of Board of Dental Examiners performed quasi-judicial function when they participated in disciplinary proceedings and had absolute immunity; Watts v. Burkhart, 978 F.2d 269 (6th Cir. 1992) (en banc) (affording absolute immunity to members of state medical licensing board sued in their individual capacities with respect to suspension or revocation of doctor's license).

See also In Re: J & S Properties, LLC, 872 F.3d 138, 148-51 (3d Cir. 2017) (Fisher, J., concurring in the judgment) ("Whether or not the Trustee sufficiently preserved her Harlow qualified immunity defense, I believe this case should be decided based on the historical tradition of according quasi-judicial immunity to bankruptcy trustees sued by third parties for actions taken within the scope of their official duties. It has long been understood that the various immunities from suit possessed by public officials at common law in 1871, the year Congress passed 42 U.S.C. § 1983, are retained in suits against state officials under that statute. . . . Among the immunities firmly established in the common law is the absolute immunity judges enjoy for actions when carrying out their judicial functions. . . Pre-1871 common-law courts also extended quasi-judicial immunity to public servants performing 'official acts involving policy discretion but not consisting of adjudication.'. . . Applying the analytical framework set forth in Antoine, Chapter 7 bankruptcy trustees should be accorded quasi-judicial immunity for actions taken within the scope of their duties that are necessary to the bankruptcy court's adjudication of a debtor's estate. The bankruptcy trustees of today perform quasi-judicial functions that trace back to their sixteenth-century English predecessors. . . . Against this background, granting the Trustee quasi-judicial immunity in this case is not a close call.")

But see Washington v. Rivera, 939 F.3d 1239, 1243–44 (11th Cir. 2019) ("We can see little daylight between the police officer's functions in Malley and Rivera's functions here. There is no material difference between a police officer applying for an arrest warrant and a probation officer seeking such a warrant. Both officers act on their own initiative and not at a judge's direction. And both perform a function that we would characterize as investigative rather than one having 'an integral relationship with the judicial process.'. . We thus hold that, because the Supreme Court in Malley concluded that a police officer's application for a warrant was not sufficiently judicial to receive quasi-judicial immunity, Rivera's action here cannot receive it either. We note that our decision brings us in line with most other circuit courts to have considered the issue. Most circuits have not extended absolute immunity to probation officers in related circumstances. . . .Thus, we conclude that the conduct at issue here—a Georgia probation officer applying for an arrest warrant—is not the kind of conduct entitled to absolute, quasi-judicial immunity."); Brunson v. Murray, 843 F.3d 698, 710-14 (7th Cir. 2016) ("The district court's grant of absolute immunity for action on a license renewal has support in our opinions in Killinger v. Johnson, 389 F.3d 765 (7th Cir. 2004), and Reed v. Village of Shorewood, 704 F.2d 943 (7th Cir. 1983), which hold or indicate that absolute immunity is available not only for a local liquor commissioner's decisions to suspend or revoke licenses, but also for actions on license renewals. On further consideration, however, and in light of supplemental briefing on the question, we conclude that those cases must be narrowed so as to exclude license renewal decisions. The key holding expressed in Reed based its grant of absolute immunity for license renewal decisions on a view of Illinois law that is no longer accurate and on a broad view of absolute immunity that the Supreme Court has narrowed. We reverse the grant of absolute immunity to the mayor with respect to the non-renewal of Brunson's liquor license. We start the analysis with the Supreme Court's approach to the strong medicine of absolute immunity. Absolute immunity is a powerful shield attaching primarily to judicial functions—not to the person or position. . . When a functional analysis of the responsibilities at issue reveals that they are judicial in nature, the actor is entitled to absolute immunity from damages no matter how erroneous the act or injurious the consequences. . . If the functions are not judicial in nature, however, then absolute immunity is not available. The official is left with the still-important protection of qualified immunity, which defeats individual liability unless his or her actions were contrary to clearly established law. . . Under the reasoning of Cleavinger and Butz, the action of renewing or not renewing an Illinois liquor license is a bureaucratic and administrative act—not a judicial act. Under state law, a local liquor commissioner's action on a license renewal lacks the procedural formalities and protections that apply to the same official's decision to suspend or revoke a license. The differences are great enough to produce different results for the availability of absolute immunity. . . . In this appeal, we invited the parties to file supplemental briefs on whether the absolute immunity holding of Reed and the dictum of Killinger on license renewals should be revisited. The principles of stare decisis demand that we give significant weight to our prior decisions unless supervening developments arise. . . While recognizing the importance of stare decisis in general, we conclude that we must narrow the Reed holding and disagree with the dictum in Killinger. We must deny absolute immunity to local liquor commissioners in decisions to renew licenses. We take this step based on developments in both federal and state law. . . The principal development in federal law is the Supreme Court's decision in Cleavinger, which laid out the factors discussed above for deciding when the rare grant of absolute immunity is required. . . .Cleavinger was decided after Reed and was not cited in Killinger, which in any event did not need to address whether absolute immunity should apply to decisions whether to renew licenses. . . .Accordingly, the combination of Cleavinger, the Illinois legislative response to City of Wyoming, and the more recent decision in Knoob Enterprises convinces us that the key assumption in Reed concerning non-renewals no longer applies. Absolute immunity should no longer apply to non-renewal decisions, which lack the hallmarks of a judicial act."); Burton v. Infinity Capital Mgmt., 753 F.3d 954, 959, 961 (9th

Cir. 2014) ("[T]he sole question in this appeal is whether an attorney who drafts an order at the request of a judge is entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity. We conclude that he is not. . . .Although the function performed by Gugino had a close nexus to the judicial process—he prepared the order during a judicial proceeding, and orders are a basic and integral part of judicial proceedings—preparing the order did not involve the kind of discretionary judgment that is protected by the doctrine. . . . Gugino argues that he is entitled to absolute immunity because a law clerk would have been entitled to absolute immunity for preparing the order. Although law clerks are entitled to absolute immunity and certainly prepare orders, an attorney cannot be compared to a law clerk, who is 'probably the one participant in the judicial process whose duties and responsibilities are most intimately connected with the judge's own exercise of the judicial function.'. . Gugino also contends he is entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity because he was doing what Judge Israel asked him to do. Other circuits have held that a function undertaken pursuant to the explicit direction of a judge entitles the subordinate to absolute immunity. . . However, immunity was extended in all of those cases to court officials, and Gugino is not a court official."); Goldstein v. Moatz, 364 F.3d 205, 216, 217 (4th Cir. 2004) ("The peer review functions in Ostrzenski [v. Seigel, 177 F.3d 245 (4th Cir.1999)] are readily distinguishable from those performed by the Defendants [officials of PTO conducting attorney disciplinary investigation], however, in that the peer reviewer was obliged by regulation not only to investigate but also to make recommendations to the Board concerning the actions it should take. . . As Judge Wilkins carefully explained, the peer reviewer could enjoy absolute immunity only when performing a protected prosecutorial function, which in that instance was 'reviewing the evidence to determine whether to recommend prosecution.'. . The function of recommending prosecution is protected by absolute immunity because it requires the exercise of discretion. And the doctrine of absolute immunity was designed to protect, among other things, the free exercise of discretion. . . The Defendants here, unlike the peer reviewer in Ostrzenski, have neither the statutory nor regulatory authority to recommend disciplinary action; they merely investigate. [footnote omitted] Although the peer reviewer enjoyed absolute immunity for the intertwined activities of making his recommendation to the Board and conducting the investigation to support his recommendation, we decline to expand or extend Ostrzenski to cover circumstances such as these, involving purely investigative activities without a concomitant recommendation."); Dean v. Byerley, 354 F.3d 540, 556, 557 (6th Cir. 2004) ("In this case, the actions Byerley allegedly took in response to Dean's picketing are not functions normally performed by an adjudicator nor are they related to functions normally performed by an adjudicator. Although Byerley was employed as Regulation Counsel for the State Bar of Michigan and although the Bar is merely an extension of the Michigan Supreme Court for purposes of deciding whether to grant or deny Bar applications, it is clear on the record as it now stands that Byerley was not performing an adjudicative function during the March 27, 2001 confrontation. [footnote omitted] Dean alleges that in response to his picketing, Byerley threatened that Dean would never practice law in the state of Michigan and threatened to have the picketers arrested. Neither of these actions are related to the decision of whether to grant or deny Dean's Bar application. While reporting an applicant's conduct to the police and the Bar might be related to the functions normally performed by an adjudicator, the actions Dean alleges that Byerley took were of a different function and nature. Byerley's alleged actions were in the form of a threat for the purpose of intimidating Dean so that Dean would cease picketing. Byerley's alleged actions were not in the form of a statement to the police for the purpose of reporting conduct by Dean that was unlawful, or in the form of a statement to the Bar for the purpose of reporting conduct by Dean that reflected adversely on Dean's character. Because Byerley has failed to demonstrate in any way that he was engaged in an adjudicative function when he allegedly retaliated against Dean, Byerley is not entitled to summary judgment based upon the defense of absolute immunity.").

Redmond v. Fulwood, 859 F.3d 11, 13 (D.C. Cir. 2017) ("Dissatisfied with his parole denials and without any option to appeal, Redmond brought suit against the then-Chairman of the United States Parole Commission, Isaac Fulwood, Jr., in his personal capacity, pursuant to Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971). . . The district court sua sponte dismissed Redmond's complaint under the Prison Litigation Reform Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1915(e)(2)(B)(iii), 1915A(b)(2), holding that Fulwood is absolutely immune from suit for acts taken in the course of his duties as Chairman of the United States Parole Commission. Redmond appealed to this court, and we now affirm. We do so, however, because Fulwood is entitled to qualified immunity for each of the claims in Redmond's complaint. Accordingly, we need not and do not reach the question of whether Fulwood is entitled to absolute immunity for actions taken during his tenure as Chairman of the United States Parole Commission."); Figg v. Russell, 433 F.3d 593, 598 & n.2 (8th Cir. 2006) ("[T]he Parole Board was within its power when it applied the conditions of Figg's parole to her suspended sentence, and when it took action concerning her suspended sentence when she violated parole. Thus, under our holding in Patterson [v. Von Riesen, 999 F.2d 1235 (8th Cir.1993)], the Parole Board's actions regarding Figg's parole and suspended sentence are entitled to absolute immunity.. . . . Even if the Parole Board had acted in violation of Figg's constitutional rights, as Figg asserts, those actions would not fall outside the board's power, such that absolute immunity would not apply. 'An official does not act outside her jurisdiction simply because she makes an unconstitutional or unlawful decision.' . . Rather, the subject matter of the action is the measure of the board's proper exercise of power. 'A decision about whether or not to grant parole is at the heart of a parole board member's jurisdiction, whether that decision is based on lawful or unlawful considerations.'. . In this case, decisions regarding a suspended sentence are also at the heart of the board members' jurisdiction, and thus are entitled to absolute immunity."); Homes v. Crosby, 418 F.3d 1256, 1258, 1259 (11th Cir. 2005) (per curiam) ("We repeatedly have held that individual members of the Parole Board are entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity from a suit for damages. . . Thus, we hold that the district court erred in permitting the claims for monetary damages to proceed against the individual Board members. We have not yet determined, however, whether a parole officer is also entitled to quasi-judicial immunity. We held in Hughes v. Chesser, 731 F.2d 1489, 1490 (11th Cir.1984) that probation officers receive immunity in preparing presentence investigation reports. Additionally, we held in Jones v. Cannon, 174 F.3d 1271, 1281 (11th Cir.1999), that witnesses in criminal trials and grand jury proceedings are afforded absolute immunity even if their testimony is false. . . . Although a parole hearing is not a criminal hearing or grand jury proceeding, we read the Supreme Court's and our previous cases to imply that parole officers enjoy immunity for testimony given during parole revocation hearings when they act within the scope of their duties. Thus, because Crosby was acting within the scope of his duties when he testified, we conclude that the district court erred in permitting the claims for monetary damages to proceed against Crosby."); Swift v. California, 384 F.3d 1184, 1191, 1193 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Applying the functional analysis articulated in Antoine and Miller, we conclude that Christian and Rodriguez are not entitled to absolute immunity for their conduct while: (1) investigating parole violations, (2) ordering the issuance of a parole hold and orchestrating Swift's arrest, and (3) recommending the initiation of parole revocation proceedings. . . . We conclude that, like the parole officer in Scotto, Christian and Rodriguez's actions requesting that the BPT initiate revocation proceedings, were more akin to a police officer seeking an arrest warrant, than to a prosecutor exercising quasi-judicial discretion to initiate criminal proceedings. Thus, Christian and Rodriguez are not entitled to absolute immunity for recommending that the BPT initiate revocation proceedings."); Scotto v. Almenas, 143 F.3d 105, 111-13 (2d Cir. 1998) ("Parole officers are entitled to absolute immunity when they perform judicial functions. Thus, a parole board official is absolutely immune from liability for damages when he 'decide[s] to grant, deny, or revoke parole,' because this task is functionally comparable to that of a judge. . . . Parole officers also receive absolute immunity for their actions in initiating parole revocation proceedings and in presenting the case for revocation to hearing officers, because such acts are prosecutorial in nature. . . . Upon deciding that Scotto had probably violated his parole, Almenas was required to recommend that a warrant issue. Senior parole officer Wegman thereafter made the discretionary decision to issue the warrant and initiate the parole revocation 'prosecution.' Almenas's role was similar to that of a police officer applying for an arrest warrant, a function for which qualified immunity is sufficient."); Walrath v. United States, 35 F.3d 277, 281 (7th Cir.1994) (holding that "parole board members are absolutely immune from suit for their decision to grant, deny, or revoke parole." (collecting cases)).

See also Ellingson v. Piercy, No. 2:14-CV-04316-NKL, 2015 WL 3713989, at *7 (W.D. Mo. June 15, 2015) ("The Court concludes the coroner's inquest conducted by Coroner Jones was a quasi-judicial proceeding, as a matter of law. Furthermore, Coroner Jones' function during the coroner's inquest was equivalent to a prosecutor's function during a grand jury proceeding. Therefore, Coroner Jones is entitled to absolute immunity for his actions in presenting, or not presenting, testimony or other materials during the coroner's inquest he conducted. Coroner Jones is entitled to absolute immunity even if he acted with malice, intentionally failed to present evidence, or presented false or misleading evidence. The Plaintiffs' conspiracy claims are also barred by absolute immunity because Coroner Jones' alleged participation in the conspiracy consisted of otherwise immune acts, that is, his decision not to present certain testimony and other materials at the coroner's inquest."); Mahoney v. Holder, 62 F. Supp. 3d 1215, 1220 (W.D. Wash. 2014) ("It is clear that Mr. Bobb was appointed by the district court to oversee formulation of a Policy which was both the product and the subject of an ongoing 'dispute between parties'—namely, the City of Seattle and the United States Department of Justice. According to Plaintiffs, Mr. Bobb agreed with the DOJ's preferred solutions and disagreed with the outcome preferred by Plaintiffs (who were not formal parties to the litigation). Still, this alleged course of action does not deprive his conduct of judicial character. Far from it: judges are usually persuaded by one side as opposed to another as they adjudicate disputes in our adversarial system. An outcome that favors one party is no less a 'resolution' because it does not please all stakeholders. Here, the Court agrees with Defendant Bobb that even if Mr. Bobb engaged in the conduct Plaintiffs assign to him, he was engaged in an essential judicial function: that of resolving a dispute between the parties to the City of Seattle litigation at the request of a federal district court judge."); Phillips v. Conrad, No. 10-40085-FDS, 2011 WL 684166, at *7, *8 (D. Mass. Feb. 18, 2011) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor the First Circuit has interpreted the phrase 'judicial officers' in the context of this statute. . . Parole board members and officers performing quasi-judicial functions within the scope of their official duties are treated like judges under the doctrine of absolute immunity from damages. . . And the only federal courts to have considered the issue have concluded that claims for injunctive relief and attorney's fees against parole board officials performing quasi-adjudicative functions are likewise barred. [collecting cases] . . . . [I]t would be incongruous to determine that parole board members and officers performing quasi-adjudicative functions are entitled to absolute immunity from damages but are not 'judicial officers' immune from actions seeking injunctions and attorney's fees under § 1983 and § 1988. If Congress intended the statute to apply differently to quasi-judicial officers, it would have been easy enough to say so. Accordingly, the parole board defendants in this case are 'judicial officers' within the meaning of the FCIA, and are therefore generally immune from actions seeking injunctive relief or attorney's fees, absent violation of a declaratory decree or the unavailability of declaratory relief."); Borzych v. Frank, No. 04-C-632-C, 2004 WL 235999, at *7 (W.D. Wis. Oct. 14, 2004) ("Because I conclude that the persons making recommendations for the disposition of inmate complaints are entitled to absolute immunity, plaintiff will not be allowed to proceed against defendants Hautumaki, Trumm, John Ray or Ellen Ray. This conclusion is consistent with the purpose behind affording absolute immunity, which is to free the judicial process from harassment and intimidation. . . The potential for harassment or intimidation is particularly high in the prison setting given the unusually litigious tendencies of inmate populations. Although the Wisconsin Administrative Code empowers inmate complaint examiners and corrections complaint examiners the authority to conduct investigations, plaintiff does not complain about the execution of any such investigation. Therefore, I will reserve for another day the question whether inmate complaint review personnel are entitled to absolute immunity for conducting investigations."); Friedland v. Fauver, 6 F. Supp.2d 292, 304 (D.N.J. 1998) ("Following the lead of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, the First, Fourth, Seventh, and Eighth Circuits have generally awarded parole officials absolute immunity for actions taken in the processing of alleged parole violations. However, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit has ruled that 'probation and parole officers are entitled to absolute immunity when they are engaged in adjudicatory duties,' but '[i]n their executive or administrative capacity, probation and parole officers are entitled only to a qualified, good faith immunity,' Wilson v. Rackmill, 878 F.2d 772, 775 (1989) . . . In this Circuit, parole board members and officers are entitled to absolute immunity only when serving as a hearing examiner or making a decision to revoke or deny parole.").

But see Victory v. Pataki, 814 F.3d 47, 66-67 (2d Cir. 2016) ("We affirm the district court insofar as it concluded that Graber was entitled to absolute immunity for any actions taken while performing the quasi-judicial function of deciding whether to rescind Victory's parole. We reject, however, the contention that Graber's absolute immunity automatically serves to shield any other individual who may have been involved in the sequence of events precipitating the initiation of the rescission proceedings. . . .We agree with the district court that Graber was entitled to absolute immunity for any actions taken while performing the quasi-judicial function of adjudicating whether to rescind Victory's parole. . . .However, Graber's absolute immunity does not extend to the alleged fabrication of evidence when performed outside that adjudicatory role, before the initiation of rescission proceedings. . . Nor does it protect alleged wrongdoers who, while not performing the function of an adjudicator or an advocate, enlist themselves in a scheme to deprive a person of liberty by rescinding his parole based on grounds known to be fabricated. . . . A government official cannot immunize for Section 1983 purposes all unlawful conduct performed prior to and independent of a later immunized act, merely by subsequently engaging in conduct entitled absolute immunity. . . This Court explained long ago that the doctrine of absolute immunity does not permit 'relating back' absolute immunity afforded for certain subsequent acts to acts of fabrication performed at earlier stages of the proceedings where absolute immunity did not attach. . . Accordingly, we reject the district court's categorical conclusion that, due to Graber's absolute immunity, Victory could not maintain a Section 1983 claim arising out of the procedural infirmities at the rescission hearing unless he showed that another Defendant had 'directly participate[d] in the rescission hearing' or participated in a conspiracy to deprive him of his rights."); Thornton v. Brown, 757 F.3d 834, 840 (9th Cir. 2014) ("Absolute immunity does not extend, though, to Plaintiff's claim that the parole officers enforced the conditions of his parole in an unconstitutionally arbitrary or discriminatory manner. Parole officers' 'immunity for conduct arising from their duty to supervise parolees is qualified.'. . Plaintiff's allegation that the officers enforced the residency restriction against him but not against similarly situated parolees relates to the manner in which Defendants implemented that condition—an element of their supervisory function. Absolute immunity therefore does not apply to Plaintiff's enforcement-based claim.")

See also Turner v. Houma Municipal Fire and Police Civil Service Board, 229 F.3d 478, 483 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[A] § 1983 suit naming defendants only in their 'official capacity' does not involve personal liability to the individual defendant. Concomitantly, defenses such as absolute quasi-judicial immunity, that only protect defendants in their individual capacities, are unavailable in official-capacity suits. . . . Appellants' contention that the Houma Board members should be granted absolute quasi-judicial immunity in their official capacities derives from a misreading of the case law in this circuit. To be fair, this circuit has not been explicit in articulating which 'capacity' we have granted absolute quasi- judicial immunity; however, a precise reading of the cases relied on by appellants demonstrate that the holdings in [Kentucky v.] Graham and Hafer have been consistently applied in this circuit and offer no support for the appellants' argument.").

c. Officials Executing or Enforcing Judicial Orders

Moss v. Kopp, 559 F.3d 1155, 1164, 1166-69 (10th Cir. 2009) ("Even if Judge Medley's approval of the motions that lead to the two challenged court orders was error, even grave procedural due process error, there is no indication under Utah law that Judge Medley was without subject matter jurisdiction to entertain the motions. And since he was a judge of a court of general jurisdiction, neither Judge Medley's commission of error in granting the motions that led to the two disputed orders, nor the apparent lack of a statute authorizing Judge Medley's approval of the motions leading to the orders, rendered his actions in 'clear absence of all jurisdiction.' Therefore, the district court here was correct to find this aspect of the quasi-judicial immunity analysis satisfied. . . . Even if the court orders here are unlawful, several considerations demonstrate that the orders did not reach the level of illegality necessary to render them facially invalid for purposes of quasi-judicial immunity and to justify imposing liability on the deputies: (1) Utah sheriff's deputies–who do not have the benefit of a formal legal education– are otherwise subject to being authorized to seize property in noncriminal actions through writs of replevin; (2) we are pointed to no law totally forbidding entry into a dwelling when executing a writ of replevin;. . . and (3) an order in a civil case that authorizes entry into a residence but does not meet warrant requirements is not as clearly unlawful as a similar order in a criminal case, where law enforcement officers are familiar with the requirements for legally obtaining evidence. Therefore, we conclude that the court orders in this case meet the facial validity requirement. . . .Here Kopp and Herlin obeyed the statute and executed Judge Medley's orders. From the facts presented, it cannot be said that they acted outside the scope of their jurisdiction. . . . Kopp and Herlin did not exceed the court orders even if they inadvertently obtained property that was not 'owned' by Yanaki, because the Discovery Order specifically directed the Salt Lake County Sheriff's Office to take custody of property 'in the possession, custody, or control' of Yanaki– not merely property 'owned' by Yanaki. . . . Under these facts, Kopp and Herlin did not exceed either the Discovery Order or the Supplemental Order. . . . As Yanaki and Moss rely entirely on the conduct of the deputies alone, they can only be alleging respondeat superior liability for [Sheriff] Kennard and Salt Lake County, which the Supreme Court has ruled cannot support § 1983 liability against municipalities. . . Therefore, the district court properly dismissed the claims against Kennard and Salt Lake County."); Cooper v. Parrish, 203 F.3d 937, 950 (6th Cir. 2000) ("Law enforcement officials are entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity when they act pursuant to a valid court order."); Mays v. Sudderth, 97 F.3d 107, 113 (5th Cir. 1996) (concluding "that an official acting within the scope of his authority is absolutely immune from a suit for damages to the extent that the cause of action arises from his compliance with a facially valid judicial order issued by a court acting within its jurisdiction."); Marr v. Maine Dep't of Human Services, 215 F. Supp.2d 261, 269, 271 (D.Me. 2002) ("As alleged in the complaint, Irwin's duties included meeting with the child, investigating, and reporting to the court the best interests of the child . . . In performing these duties, Irwin carried out a function that was 'integral to the judicial process.' . . . . Thus, Irwin is entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity for claims against him in the performance of these acts as a GAL. . . . A GAL is entitled to absolute immunity under § 1983 from any suit for damages based on the performance of his duties within the scope of his appointment.").

Compare Martin v. Hendren, 127 F.3d 720, 722 (8th Cir. 1997) ("Martin argues that even if [Officer] Hendren is absolutely immune from liability for implementing the judge's orders, Hendren ceased to act in a quasi-judicial capacity when he carried out those orders using excessive force. . . . Absolute quasi-judicial immunity would afford only illusory protection if it were lost the moment an officer acted improperly. . . .Because judges frequently encounter disruptive individuals in their courtrooms, exposing bailiffs and other court security officers to potential liability for acting on a judge's courtroom orders could breed a dangerous, even fatal, hesitation.") with Martin v. Hendren, 127 F.3d 720, 725 (8th Cir. 1997) (Lay, J., dissenting) ("When a judicial order is given to a courtroom official, the judge presumes that the order will be carried out in a lawful manner that does not violate the constitutional rights of the trial participants. When an allegation arises that such is not the case, justice demands that no more than qualified immunity should apply, so that the facts of the incident may be evaluated in relation to the nature of the traditional function of the officer."). See also Martin v. Board of County Commissioners, 909 F.2d 402, 405 (10th Cir.1990) ("Neither the rationale nor the express holding of Valdez [v. Denver, 878 F.2d 1285 (10th Cir. 1989)] supports defendants' argument that peace officers are absolutely immune from liability for the manner in which they carry out otherwise proper court orders.").

See also Brooks v. Clark Cty., 828 F.3d 910, 915-19 (9th Cir. 2016) ("We have never held that courtroom officials—bailiffs, marshals, and the like—receive absolute immunity whenever they act pursuant to a judge's order, regardless of whether they execute such order in a way that deviates from what the judge commanded. The circuits are divided on the question. Compare Richman v. Sheahan, 270 F.3d 430, 438–39 (7th Cir. 2001) (rejecting absolute immunity), and Martin v. Bd. of Cty. Comm'rs, 909 F.2d 402, 404–05 (10th Cir. 1990) (same), with Martin v. Hendren, 127 F.3d 720, 721–22 (8th Cir. 1997) (holding such officials do have absolute immunity). . . .In this case, Brooks has alleged that Keener violated his Fourth Amendment rights by using excessive force to remove him from Judge Lippis's courtroom. And the allegation is quite clear that Judge Lippis did not order Keener to use excessive force; instead, the allegation is that Keener acted beyond the scope of Judge Lippis's express and implied instructions. . . . We are satisfied that neither precedent nor first principles justify giving courtroom officials absolute immunity when they allegedly use force in excess of what their judge commanded and the Constitution allows."); In re Mills, 287 F. App'x 273, 279 (4th Cir. 2008) ("We do not find the Eighth Circuit's decision [in Martin] persuasive. As recognized by the dissent in that case, the majority failed to appreciate the distinction between protection from liability simply for following a judge's order and protection from liability for carrying out a judge's order in a manner not sanctioned by the judge. . . . Here, Mills's alleged unconstitutional execution of the order was not specifically authorized by the judicial officer who issued the warrant. Nor does the complaint seek to hold Mills liable for a quasi-judicial decision. Rather, the decision challenged in the complaint is the defendants' decision of how to execute the warrant. Thus, the state defendants clearly are not entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity."); In the Matter of Foust v. McNeill, 310 F.3d 849, 855 (5th Cir. 2002) ("Law enforcement officers have absolute immunity for enforcing the terms of a court order but only qualified immunity for the manner in which they choose to enforce it."); Richman v. Sheahan, 270 F.3d 430, 435, 436 (7th Cir. 2001) (" We have not yet had occasion to consider whether law enforcement officers charged with using unreasonable force when seizing a person pursuant to a judge's order are entitled to quasi-judicial immunity. Two other circuit courts of appeal have addressed this question, with different results. [citing Martin v.

Board of County Commissioners, 909 F.2d 402 (10th Cir.1990) and Martin v. Hendren, 127 F.3d 720 (8th Cir.1997)] We believe that the Eighth Circuit stretches the reasoning in Mireles too far, and confuses the question suggested by the Tenth Circuit in Martin– whether the challenged conduct was specifically ordered by the judge-with the separate question of whether the conduct was lawful or exceeded the actor's authority. . . . [W]hen the conduct directly challenged is not the judge's decision making, but the manner in which that decision is enforced, we agree with the Tenth Circuit that the law enforcement officer's fidelity to the specific orders of the judge marks the boundary for labeling the act 'quasi-judicial.'"); Levine v. Lawrence, No. 03-CV-1694(DRH ETB), 2005 WL 1412143, at 8-10 (E.D.N.Y. June 15, 2005) (not reported) ("[T]here appears to be no case in this Circuit discussing when arrests or uses of force by court officers restoring order in a courtroom or enforcing summary contempt orders fall within the scope of absolute quasi-judicial immunity, and the other authorities that have addressed this issue appear to be split. . . . While the outcomes of the various cases addressing this issue have thus varied, most courts seem to agree that absolute quasi-judicial immunity should not extend to court officers enforcing judicial orders if either (1) the judge's order is facially invalid, . . . or (2) the judge's order is not facially invalid, but the court officer exceeds the scope of that order, . . . or enforces it in an improper manner. . . In the latter regard, some courts have held that a bailiff is only entitled to quasi-judicial absolute immunity where his use of force to remove a person from the courtroom is within the scope of a direct judicial order. . . . Thus, where it is unclear from the record whether all of a court officer's challenged conduct, or the manner in which he acted was 'done under the trial judge's authority and direction,' the officer is not entitled to absolute quasi-judicial immunity.").

In Antoine v. Byers & Anderson Inc., 113 S. Ct. 2167 (1993), the Court held that a court reporter was not entitled to absolute immunity from damages for failing to produce a transcript of a federal criminal trial.

2. Prosecutorial Immunity

a. Prosecutors

Burns v. Reed, 500 U.S. 478 (1991) (prosecutor absolutely immune for functions performed in probable cause hearing, but only qualified immunity attached to function of giving legal advice to police); Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409, 424-26 (1976) (absolute immunity for prosecutors performing prosecutorial acts).

Compare Wearry v. Foster, 33 F.4th 260, 263, 267-73 (5th Cir. 2022) ("We agree with the district court that Wearry's complaint alleges misconduct that is fundamentally investigatory in nature. When a prosecutor joins police in the initial gathering of evidence in the field, he acts outside his quasi-judicial role as an advocate; instead he acts only in an investigatory role for which absolute immunity is not warranted. Therefore, District Attorney Perrilloux is not entitled to absolute immunity for his actions. Nor is Detective Foster absolutely immune. As the Supreme Court has made clear, a police officer is not entitled to the absolute immunity reserved for a prosecutor. . . .We can discern no meaningful difference between the prosecutor's fabrication of evidence in Buckley and the fabrication alleged here. Both involved, at bottom, a search for false witness testimony for use as evidence. . . . There is one noteworthy difference between Wearry's case and Buckley. Namely, the prosecutors in Buckley lacked probable cause to indict Buckley at the time they fabricated the evidence, while here Wearry had already been charged. But the existence of probable cause is not a bright-line rule, as Buckley itself recognized that 'a prosecutor may engage in "police investigative work"' even after probable cause has been found. . . As this court stated recently, '[t]he Supreme Court has never held that the timing of a prosecutor's actions controls whether the prosecutor has absolute immunity. Instead, the Court focuses on the function the prosecutor was performing.'. . And the function performed by a prosecutor in fabricating evidence is evidence creation, which is not part of the advocate's role, but a corruption of the investigator's function of 'searching for clues and corroboration.'. . The fact that Wearry's trial was only three months away when the defendants first pulled Ashton out of school to transform him into a prosecution witness does not change the fundamental nature of their actions. . . . What is alleged here is not simply that Foster and Perrilloux elicited false testimony from Ashton through improper means, but rather that they invented a false narrative and then coerced a vulnerable juvenile to adopt and testify to it in court. Based on Wearry's complaint, it does not even appear that Ashton was a witness in the State's case against Wearry until the defendants decided to use the child to present their fabricated evidence. Their initial intimidation of Ashton could not be an effort to control a witness when the child was not even yet a witness. It is the fabrication of false evidence, and not merely the perjury elicited at trial, that is the misconduct at issue here. . . . [O]ur brother's primary theory about why Cousin dictates a different outcome here is his claim that the Cousin opinion articulates a two-step test which Perrilloux and Foster satisfy. Specifically, 'a prosecutor accused of falsifying witness testimony is entitled to absolute immunity if he does so (1) after indictment or determination of probable cause, and (2) with the intent of presenting that testimony at trial.'. . Respectfully, Cousin articulated no such test. While both of the above elements existed in that case, the panel never held that they alone were sufficient to grant absolute immunity. . . . Indeed, it would be strange for Cousin to have created the framework that our brother says it did. Neither of the two conditions he identifies—the existence of probable cause or the intent to use fabricated evidence at trial—is sufficient alone or in combination to entitle a prosecutor to absolute immunity. . . In fact, the latter has been squarely rejected as an improper consideration under the functional test. . . This intent-to-convict is an element that almost always would be present, and thus automatically satisfied—why else would a prosecutor fabricate evidence if not to secure a conviction? More critically, it utterly fails to distinguish between investigatory and advocatory conduct which is the inquiry of the functional test—after all a police officer gathers evidence to, among other things, secure a conviction. This passing phrase, cherry-picked from Cousin cannot bear all the weight our that brother hangs on it. . . The principle distinguishing this case from Cousin that our brother says is lacking, . . . is the principle that the Supreme Court and this court has repeated time and again: evidence gathering and creation is investigatory in nature, while evidence presentation and organization is advocatory. . . Wearry alleges, at base, that Foster and Perrilloux created fictitious testimony as false evidence to use against him. The district court was correct in concluding that these facts do not compel an award of absolute immunity to District Attorney Perrilloux. . . . Neither Detective Foster nor District Attorney Perrilloux is owed absolute immunity under the facts alleged in Wearry's complaint. The Supreme Court has made clear that police officers, even when working in concert with prosecutors, are not entitled to absolute immunity. Nor are prosecutors when they step outside of their role as advocates and fabricate evidence. The facts and actions alleged by the complaint are fundamentally investigatory in nature, and therefore absolute immunity is not warranted. For these reasons, we AFFIRM the district court's ruling denying Foster's and Perrilloux's motions for judgment on the pleadings based on absolute immunity.") with Wearry v. Foster, 33 F.4th 260, 273-78 (5th Cir. 2022) (Ho, J., dubitante) ("There are good reasons to believe that the doctrine of absolute prosecutorial immunity is wrong as an original matter. So I am tempted to join the majority and hold that prosecutorial immunity does not foreclose this case from proceeding to the merits. But I am doubtful that governing precedent permits us to reach that result. The Supreme Court has repeatedly affirmed the doctrine of prosecutorial immunity. And our circuit has dutifully applied it—even in the face of disturbing claims of prosecutorial misconduct. So I write separately, first, to explain how governing precedent requires us to grant prosecutorial immunity in this case, and second, to note that I reach this conclusion reluctantly, because the doctrine of prosecutorial immunity appears to be mistaken as an original matter. . . . Just as in Cousin, the prosecutor here deliberately coerced false witness testimony in order to secure a capital murder conviction against Michael Wearry. Yet the panel today denies prosecutorial immunity—reasoning that coercing false testimony is an investigatory, and not an advocatory, function. As an original matter, I might agree with that result. But I am unable to reconcile it with Cousin, which we are of course duty-bound to follow. . . . The panel majority makes much of the fact that, according to Cousin, a 'determination of probable cause' is merely 'a significant factor to be used in evaluating the advocatory nature of prosecutorial conduct.'. . . Not all prosecutorial acts after indictment are subject to absolute immunity—and in particular, not all witness interviews after indictment are subject to absolute immunity. But here's what the panel majority misses about Cousin. In the concluding paragraph of the court's analysis, Cousin expressly states that, if a prosecutor allegedly conducts a witness interview with the 'inten[t] to secure evidence that would be used in the presentation of the state's case at the pending trial of an already identified suspect,' the prosecutor is 'entitled to absolute immunity with respect to this claim.'. . So when a prosecutor is accused of coercing false witness testimony, 'the question of absolute immunity turns on' two considerations: (1) 'whether [the falsely accused] had been identified as a suspect at the time [of the prosecutorial misconduct],' and (2) 'whether the interview related to testimony to be presented at trial.'. . In short, a prosecutor accused of falsifying witness testimony is entitled to absolute immunity if he does so (1) after indictment or determination of probable cause, and (2) with the intent of presenting that testimony at trial. . . . None of this is to say that there's no principled way to allow Wearry's claims to proceed to the merits. It's just to say that the way to justify that result is not by faithfully following our governing prosecutorial immunity precedent, as we must. Rather, it's by concluding that the entire doctrine of prosecutorial immunity is simply wrong as an original matter, as only the Supreme Court can do.")

See also Greenpoint Tactical Income Fund LLC v. Pettigrew, 38 F.4th 555, 567 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Because plaintiffs have not alleged that AUSA Halverson acted outside his prosecutorial role in helping to prepare a search warrant affidavit, after others had gathered the relevant evidence, and in presenting it to a judge, he is entitled to absolute immunity."); Annappareddy v. Pascale, 996 F.3d 120, 139-42 (4th Cir. 2021) ("In applying this functional approach, the timing of a prosecutor's conduct is a key factor. . . Actions taken by a prosecutor after a probable-cause determination has been made generally are classified as 'advocative' functions, . . . 'relat[ing] to an advocate's preparation for the initiation of a prosecution or for judicial proceedings' – that trigger absolute immunity[.] . . That includes, of course, the presentation of evidence at trial, or before a grand jury after a decision to seek an indictment is made. . . By contrast, actions taken before probable cause is established are more likely to be 'investigative' in nature – the same kind of function normally performed by detectives or police officers – and therefore protected only by qualified immunity. . . .Because Pascale was acting in her role as advocate when she allegedly fabricated evidence for use at trial, she is shielded by absolute prosecutorial immunity. . . . It is well established – and the parties here agree – that the failure to disclose exculpatory evidence while a criminal proceeding is pending is an 'advocative' function protected by absolute immunity. As the Supreme Court explained in Imbler, the 'deliberate withholding of exculpatory information,' even if unconstitutional, is considered part of the prosecutorial role for immunity purposes. . . . As a result, we and other circuits routinely hold that prosecutors are shielded by absolute immunity from claims that they deliberately withheld materially exculpatory evidence at any point in a criminal proceeding. . . The question in this case, then, is whether there is something about Annappareddy's claim that evidence was destroyed – rather than withheld – that would bring it outside this well-established rule. The district court thought this case was different because, 'viewing the [complaint's] allegations in the light most favorable' to Annappareddy, the decision to discard the boxes in question was made 'as part of a general cleanup' and was thus purely 'administrative' and unconnected to any advocative function. . . . What Annappareddy is alleging is not an innocent mistake made in the course of an office cleanup; it is that Pascale and the other defendants purposefully shredded three boxes of evidence, singling out for 'covert, selective, and intentional' destruction 'unique exculpatory documents' so that they could not be used by Annappareddy at a retrial or to expose the defendants' original wrongdoing. . . And indeed, Annappareddy does not meaningfully defend the 'office cleanup' theory on appeal, perhaps because it would so badly undermine the thrust of his actual allegations. . . Instead, Annappareddy argues that although the failure to disclose exculpatory evidence is advocative in nature and thus protected by absolute immunity, the destruction of exculpatory evidence is not. The failure to furnish evidence to the defense, Annappareddy recognizes, involves an exercise of prosecutorial discretion that bears on the evidence that will be introduced during judicial proceedings. But once that decision has been made, he argues, the advocative function comes to an end, and the actual disposal of that evidence implicates only ministerial or custodial functions. We do not think this is a meaningful distinction. Claims that evidence has been intentionally withheld and claims that evidence has been destroyed often will be two sides of the same coin, with one easily reframed as the other. . . . Under the functional approach of cases like Imbler, what matters is the decision to withhold exculpatory evidence from a defendant and the judicial process. . . That decision is made in an 'advocative' capacity whether or not it is accompanied by the evidence's destruction."); Watkins v. Healy, 986 F.3d 648, 661-62 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Decades of clarification have produced sundry examples of prosecutorial actions that fall on both sides of the advocacy-investigation border. Prosecutors function as advocates—and are thus protected by absolute immunity—when 'knowingly us[ing] false testimony and suppress[ing] material evidence[,]' Imbler, . . . ; 'evaluating evidence and interviewing witnesses as he prepares for trial,'. . . ; 'participat[ing] in a probable cause hearing,'. . .; 'prepar[ing] and filing ... the information and the motion for an arrest warrant[,]'. . .; or 'making statements at a preliminary examination about the availability of a witness[.]'. . Prosecutors act as investigators and are entitled at most to only qualified immunity when giving 'legal advice to the police[,]'. . . including 'g[iving] legal advice prior to the existence of probable cause and prior to [the prosecutor's] determination that she would initiate criminal proceedings against [a defendant,]'. . .; 'fabricat[ing] [ ] false evidence' before 'a special grand jury was empaneled[,]'. . . ; and 'directing the [police's] investigation, advising the [police] regarding the legality of the [products seized from defendants], and propelling the officers to execute [an operation to seize products]' 'prior to the initiation of judicial proceedings and without probable cause[.]' . . The Court has 'emphasized that the official seeking absolute immunity bears the burden of showing that such immunity is justified for the function in question[,]'. . . and is 'quite sparing' in granting absolute immunity[.] . . Watkins alleges that Healy committed four acts inside, or right outside, Herndon's interrogation room, all of which could implicate the doctrine of absolute immunity. First, Healy allegedly threatened to charge Herndon with two murders, even though Herndon had told Healy that Watkins was not involved in Ingram's murder. . . Second, Healy apparently promised Herndon immunity for testifying at Watkins's trial, notwithstanding Herndon's statements regarding Watkins's lack of involvement in the Ingram murder. . . Third, Healy purportedly 'assist[ed] with the interrogation of Herndon.'. . Fourth, Healy supposedly conspired with Schwartz to 'intimidat[e] and coerc[e] Travis Herndon into falsely implicating Watkins.'. Absolute immunity protects none of these four acts. Healy purportedly questioned and threatened a witness during an interrogation that took place in the midst of the investigation into Ingram's murder. All four of Healy's alleged actions occurred before any probable cause hearing, . . . before any arrest warrant was sought, . . . or before a grand jury was convened[.] . . By interrogating Herndon—and allegedly threatening Herndon during said interrogation—Healy was not performing 'the advocate's role [of] evaluating evidence and interviewing witnesses as he prepares for trial'; he was performing 'the detective's role in searching for the clues and corroboration that might give him probable cause to recommend that a suspect be arrested.'. . Healy's four actions were completely divorced from 'the judicial phase of the criminal process.'. . In short, '[p]rosecutors who supervise and participate in unconstitutional police interrogations of a criminal suspect are not entitled to absolute immunity.'"); Stockdale v. Helper, 979 F.3d 498, 502-07 (6th Cir. 2020) ("The 'analytical key to prosecutorial immunity ... is advocacy—whether the actions in question are those of an advocate.'. . Even when a prosecutor acts in an administrative capacity, not as an advocate, they still 'enjoy[ ] absolute immunity if the act is done in service of an advocacy function.'. . So long as it is 'directly connected with the conduct of a trial,' even administrative conduct stands behind the barricade of absolute immunity. . . But acts that merely 'safeguard[ ] the fairness of the criminal judicial process'—say a prosecutor offering legal advice to officers during an investigation—do not necessarily warrant absolute immunity. . . Because we grant absolute immunity only 'sparing[ly],' officials seeking its ironclad protection bear[ ] the burden' of showing that qualified immunity does not suffice. . . Think of qualified immunity as a face mask and absolute immunity as a vaccine, with a presumption that qualified immunity is fit for the job. . . . Helper's email may well have been an act of advocacy; it just wasn't case-driven advocacy. Her meddling with the hiring and firing decisions at the police department simply was not 'intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process.'. . She has not carried her burden to show that absolute immunity applies. . . . Helper insists that Van de Kamp shows that, even if communicating a decision about a case amounts to a separate act, it still receives complete immunity. But Van de Kamp involved a claim against supervisors after a line prosecutor 'failed to disclose impeachment material' at trial. . .The Court held that 'prosecutors involved in such supervision or training or information-system management' are entitled to absolute immunity too. Because the administrative failures related to 'an individual prosecutor's error in the plaintiff's specific criminal trial,' absolute immunity attached to those supervisors acting in an administrative capacity. . . That's not Helper's situation. Her communication did not relate to an ongoing prosecution or trial. Van de Kamp protects decisions tied to the trial process; it does not protect a prosecutor keen on influencing personnel decisions in cities within her jurisdiction. . . .The issue thus is not whether Helper's purported explanations amounted to the true explanations for her email. It's whether the email concerned case-related advocacy. . . . We ask only whether she functioned as a prosecutor when she involved herself in the department's personnel decisions. She did not. . . .All in all, absolute immunity does not bar the federal First Amendment claim against Helper. . . .The district court left one federal claim standing: a First Amendment claim that Helper retaliated against the officers for filing a prior lawsuit. To bring such a claim, Stockdale and Dunning had to show that (1) they engaged in protected activity under the First Amendment, (2) Helper took an adverse action against them, and (3) Helper did so in response to their protected activity. . . We can resolve the claim on the ground that Helper did not violate any clearly established law. See Pearson, 555 U.S. at 227, 129 S.Ct. 808. To meet this imperative, the claimant must show that case law put the issue 'beyond debate.'. . That simply was not the case here. Ask what Helper would have seen had she consulted precedent before acting. She would have encountered a tangle of cases about absolute immunity, most of which favored the prosecutor as just shown. That it has taken numerous pages in the federal reporter to make sense of the issue sends a first signal that liability is far from clearly established. Because a reasonable prosecutor would have found the absolute immunity question a close one in this context, that strongly suggests that qualified immunity applies. Ask then what Helper would have seen in the case law when it comes to retaliation claims and the liability of decision makers versus non-decision makers. Recall that she did not have authority to fire Stockdale and Dunning. Collins made the call. She was not the decision maker. That matters. . . .Instigating a firing by another is debatable territory, making it highly improbable that communicating exculpatory evidence obligations amounts to clearly forbidden territory."); Morgan v. Chapman, 969 F.3d 238, 244 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Actions performed before probable cause has been established are typically investigative; those after, prosecutorial. . . This is because '[a] prosecutor neither is, nor should consider himself to be, an advocate before he has probable cause to have anyone arrested.'. .Here, Chapman acted as an investigator both when she searched Morgan's office and when she allegedly fabricated a report based on that search. Searching a crime scene for evidence of wrongdoing is perhaps the quintessential investigative function. . .Thus, Chapman is not entitled to absolute immunity for the search of Morgan's clinic and the seizures of his records. Nor is she entitled to absolute immunity for allegedly compiling an inaccurate report by knowingly misrepresenting the proportion of Morgan's patients who received designated prescriptions. That report was the sole piece of evidence that established probable cause for Morgan's indictment. Absolute immunity does not apply where an 'official's function was to obtain evidence prior to indictment.'"); Rieves v. Town of Smyrna, Tennessee, 959 F.3d 678, 691-94 (6th Cir. 2020) ("While the existence of probable cause can help inform a court's determination that the prosecutor was acting as an advocate, the key inquiry still depends on whether the conduct at issue is intimately connected to the judicial process. Moreover, the fact that a prosecutor 'later call[s] a grand jury to consider the evidence [that his alleged misconduct uncovered] does not retroactively transform that work from the administrative into the prosecutorial.'. . . Absolute immunity also does not apply to the prosecutorial function of giving legal advice to police 'as part of the investigative or administrative phase of the criminal case.'. . . Jones and Zimmerman are not entitled to absolute immunity because their alleged conduct at issue—directing the RCSO's investigation, advising the RCSO regarding the legality of the CBD products, and propelling the officers to execute Operation Candy Crush—occurred prior to the initiation of judicial proceedings and without probable cause. . . . While our case law protects prosecutors when they act as advocates, Jones and Zimmerman have not demonstrated that absolute immunity should also protect their alleged conduct prior to any such prosecution. Because they have not met this burden, we affirm the district court's denial of absolute immunity for their conduct directing the investigation, advising the officers, and pushing officers to execute the arrests and raids despite the officers' concerns."); Fogle v. Sokol, 957 F.3d 148, 156, 159-64 (3d Cir. 2020) ("Fogle argues that the specific path Olson and Martin allegedly pursued during the investigation of Kathy's murder—characterized by investigation, not advocacy—lifts the veil of immunity at this stage. Parsing precedent in the fact-specific context of absolute immunity is notoriously tricky and turns not on black-letter rules, but on a 'meticulous analysis' of the Prosecutors' actions. . . So we begin with the basics, looking to the history, purpose, and scope of the doctrine of absolute immunity. And with that context established, we conclude that Fogle has alleged claims based on actions by Olson and Martin outside the traditional policy limitations that define absolute immunity. As a result, his complaint survives a motion to dismiss. . . . While the Supreme Court has extended the defense of absolute immunity to certain prosecutorial functions, it has not blanketed 'the actions of a prosecutor ... merely because they are performed by a prosecutor.'. . Instead, courts must 'focus upon the functional nature of the activities rather than [the prosecutor's] status' to determine whether absolute immunity is warranted. . . That functional test separates advocacy from everything else, entitling a prosecutor to absolute immunity only for work 'intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process.'. . . [W]hen prosecutors function as investigators, rather than advocates, they enjoy no right to absolute immunity. . . . Using this framework, we conclude that Olson and Martin are not, at this stage, entitled to absolute immunity from Fogle's §

1983 claims if they relate to investigative, not prosecutorial, activity. . . . Olson's role in obtaining Elderkin's statement constitutes investigatory conduct, a conclusion flowing from the Supreme Court's decision in Burns v. Reed. . . . Olson's conduct goes beyond advice, and allegedly included finding the hypnotist, encouraging undue suggestion, and participating in Elderkin's post-hypnosis questioning. By choreographing and securing Elderkin's statement, Olson played 'the detective's role' to 'search[ ] for the clues and corroboration,'. . . and establish probable cause to arrest Fogle. Those acts do not enjoy absolute immunity. While Martin's alleged conduct stands in a different light, it leads to the same conclusion. . . . But failing to report the alleged inconsistencies while 'appearing before a judge and presenting evidence' involves the Prosecutors' conduct as advocates, where they enjoy absolute immunity. Burns, 500 U.S. at 491, 111 S.Ct. 1934. So the Prosecutors are entitled to absolute immunity for this conduct. . . . Olson's claim of immunity for this conduct is temporal: he argues that since Dennis's interrogation occurred after arrest, the 'judicial process was clearly in motion' entitling him to immunity. . . But '[w]e have rejected bright-line rules that would treat the timing of the prosecutor's action (e.g. pre- or postindictment), or its location (i.e. in- or out-of-court), as dispositive.'. . That approach sensibly counsels that we 'not view the filing of a complaint as a foolproof measure of the commencement of "quasi-judicial" activity.'. . Instead, the 'key to the absolute immunity determination is not the timing of the investigation relative to a judicial proceeding, but rather the underlying function that the investigation serves and the role the [prosecutor] occupies in carrying it out.'. . As alleged, Olson's conduct in interviewing Dennis Fogle was not that of an advocate. Rather, the interview occurred at the end of a long chain of investigative events led, or supervised, by Olson. Recall that without Elderkin's hypnotic recollections, there may have been no probable cause for Dennis Fogle's arrest. Allegedly, Olson knew this; indeed, Lewis Fogle claims Olson's active participation fueled the entire investigation. For that reason, Olson was not acting as an advocate 'interviewing witnesses as he prepare[d] for trial'; instead, he was investigating the theory of his case by 'searching for ... clues.'. . On that basis, and at this stage, Olson does not receive absolute immunity for his role in obtaining Dennis Fogle's statement or concealing the methods leading to his confession. Less clear are Martin's interactions with Dennis Fogle. The complaint alleges that 'Defendants misrepresented in written and oral reports that Dennis Fogle had volunteered the "confession" and subsequent statement without coercion or suggestion, and otherwise hid their misconduct with respect to Dennis Fogle's statements.'. . Based on this assertion, Martin may have functioned as an advocate, an investigator, or played no role at all. While discovery may produce a different result, at this stage, Martin has not carried his burden to enjoy the protections of absolute immunity for his conduct related to Dennis Fogle's confession. . . . [R]elying on our decision in Yarris, the Prosecutors call for a bright line extending absolute immunity to all conduct surrounding informants after the filing of charges. But once again, that line is unsupported by our precedent. Our role is not to look at the 'timing of the prosecutor's action (e.g. pre- or postindictment),' but at the function being performed. . . .Thus, the Prosecutors were functioning not as advocates, but as investigators seeking to generate evidence in support of a prosecution. This illustrates why 'a determination of probable cause does not guarantee a prosecutor absolute immunity from liability for all actions taken afterwards,' because '[w]hen the functions of prosecutors and detectives are the same, as they were here, the immunity that protects them is also the same.'. . Accepting the facts alleged as true and drawing all inferences in favor of Fogle, neither Olson nor Martin have carried their burden to demonstrate that they are entitled to absolute immunity for this conduct at this stage. . . . In sum, Olson and Martin are absolutely immune only for their alleged conduct in launching the prosecution against Fogle, failing to include information about Patty Long's previous statements in their probable cause affidavit, withholding material exculpatory and impeachment evidence, and making misrepresentations to the court. But Olson and Martin are not, at this stage, entitled to absolute immunity for their alleged conduct in procuring Elderkin's statements, Dennis Fogle's confession, or the jailhouse informant statements. As these actions implicate all of Fogle's claims, we will affirm the District Court's decision to deny dismissal based on absolute immunity."); Singleton v. Cannizzaro, 956 F.3d 773, 781, 783-84 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Plaintiffs allege that Individual Defendants used fraudulent subpoenas to pressure crime victims and witnesses to meet with them outside of court. Both the Ninth Circuit and our court have issued decisions involving somewhat analogous facts. [discussing Lacey and Loupe] . . . . Here, in contrast, Defendants were not attempting to control witness testimony during a break in judicial proceedings. Instead, they allegedly used fake subpoenas in an attempt to pressure crime victims and witnesses to meet with them privately at the Office and share information outside of court. Defendants never used the fake subpoenas to compel victims or witnesses to testify at trial. Such allegations are of investigative behavior that was not 'intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process.'. . Defendants also note that the fake subpoenas were all issued after charges had been filed in the underlying criminal cases. It is true that the Supreme Court in Buckley relied on the prosecutors' lack of probable cause to conclude that they were not absolutely immune for allegedly fabricating evidence. . . But the Court also recognized that even after probable cause has been found, 'a prosecutor may engage in "police investigative work" that is entitled to only qualified immunity.'. . The Supreme Court has never held that the timing of a prosecutor's actions controls whether the prosecutor has absolute immunity. Instead, the Court focuses on the function the prosecutor was performing. . . Defendants' use of the fake subpoenas in an attempt to obtain information from crime victims and witnesses outside the judicial context falls into the category of investigative conduct for which prosecutors are not immune. . .In using the fake subpoenas, Individual Defendants also allegedly intentionally avoided the judicial process that Louisiana law requires for obtaining subpoenas. . . Their creation and use of the fake subpoenas thus fell 'outside the judicial process.'. . Construing the allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the creation and use of the fake subpoenas constituted investigative conduct for which Individual Defendants would not be absolutely immune. Denying Individual Defendants dismissal based upon absolute immunity for their creation and use of the fake subpoenas also accords with the policy underlying absolute prosecutorial immunity. Individual Defendants allegedly violated the rights of victims and witnesses with no cases pending against them. Denying them absolute immunity will not deter prosecutors' future decisions to charge specific defendants. Moreover, because Individual Defendants issued the subpoenas without court supervision, they operated free of 'the checks and safeguards inherent in the judicial process.'. . As a result, 'there is greater need for private actions to curb prosecutorial abuse and to compensate for abuse that does occur.'. . This case is likely Plaintiffs' only means of legally redressing the harms they suffered as a result of Individual

Defendants' alleged conduct. At the same time, further facts may develop that support Individual Defendants' defense. We leave open whether Individual Defendants may satisfy their burden of showing absolute immunity at the summary judgment stage. . . We offer no opinion on the future; we simply affirm the district court's decision presented to us. For the foregoing reasons, we hold that the district court did not err in denying the Individual Defendants absolute immunity for their alleged creation and use of fake subpoenas at this stage of the case."); Munchinski v. Solomon, 747 F. App'x 52, ___ (3d Cir. 2018) ("A prosecutor's knowing failure to preserve exculpatory evidence is not entitled to absolute immunity because it is not part of the prosecutorial function. . . . Warman's modification of the Goodwin report during pretrial discovery to remove information about whether the Bowen interview had been recorded was tantamount to the destruction of exculpatory evidence, which, like the knowing failure to preserve evidence, falls outside the prosecutorial function. . . As such, Warman is not entitled to absolute immunity under these facts. . . . The question before us is whether a prosecutor loses the protection of absolute immunity when, in addition to withholding exculpatory evidence in violation of Brady, he violates a judicial order. The more discretion a judicial order eliminates from the prosecutor's role, the more likely it is that a violation of that order strips the prosecutor of absolute immunity."); Nero v. Mosby, 890 F.3d 106, 118-20 (4th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 490 (2018) ("The official claiming absolute immunity 'bears the burden of showing that such immunity is justified for [each] function in question.' Burns v. Reed, 500 U.S. 478, 486, 111 S.Ct. 1934, 114 L.Ed.2d 547 (1991). In applying this functional approach, the Supreme Court has distinguished between advocative functions and investigative or administrative functions, holding that the former enjoy absolute immunity but the latter do not. . . A prosecutor acts as an advocate when she professionally evaluates evidence assembled by the police, Buckley, 509 U.S. at 273, 113 S.Ct. 2606, decides to seek an arrest warrant, Kalina, 522 U.S. at 130, 118 S.Ct. 502, prepares and files charging documents, id., participates in a probable cause hearing, Burns, 500 U.S. at 492, 111 S.Ct. 1934, and presents evidence at trial, Imbler, 424 U.S. at 431, 96 S.Ct. 984. In contrast, a prosecutor does not act as an advocate, but rather in an investigative or administrative capacity, when she gives legal advice to police during an investigation, Burns, 500 U.S. at 493, 111 S.Ct. 1934, investigates a case before a probable cause determination, Buckley, 509 U.S. at 274, 113 S.Ct. 2606, and personally attests to the truth of averments in a statement of probable cause, Kalina, 522 U.S. at 129, 118 S.Ct. 502. . . .We see no material difference between the conduct protected in Kalina and Springmen and the acts the Officers allege here. Mosby's assessment of the evidence—the knife, the failure to seatbelt Gray, information regarding what the Officers knew about Gray's medical condition before finding him unconscious—and her conclusion that it supported probable cause mirror the prosecutor's 'determination' in Kalina 'that the evidence was sufficiently strong to justify a probable-cause finding.'. . Mosby's alleged instruction to Cogen to file charges against the Officers is tantamount to a 'decision to file charges' under Kalina. . . And that decision is absolutely immune regardless of its motivation. . . Mosby's advice to Cogen that there was probable cause to charge the Officers is indistinguishable from that in Springmen, where the Assistant State's Attorney advised a police officer that the facts in an application for Statement of Charges were sufficient to warrant filing. . . And, assuming Mosby helped write the application here, both her characterization of the facts and her decision to provide some facts while omitting others fall within Kalina's 'drafting of the certification' of probable cause and 'selection of the particular facts to include.'. . We reject the argument, as we did in Springmen, that providing legal advice to police is never entitled to absolute immunity. . . To be sure, the Supreme Court held in Burns that 'advising police in the investigative phase of a criminal case' is not 'so intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process that it qualifies for absolute immunity.'. . But the Court has not retreated from the principle that 'acts undertaken by a prosecutor in preparing for the initiation of judicial proceedings'—including 'the professional evaluation of the evidence assembled by the police'—are absolutely immune. . . Where, as here, plaintiffs allege that a prosecutor initiated charges against them by informing a police officer that the evidence gathered amounted to probable cause and directing the officer to file charges, the prosecutor is entitled to absolute immunity. . . We also reject the Officers' argument that Mosby's involvement in the investigation of Gray's death strips her of absolute immunity. Certainly, prosecutors enjoy only qualified immunity for their actions before securing probable cause for an arrest. . . And Mosby apparently began investigating before she had probable cause. . . But conducting an investigation is not actionable—in fact, it was Mosby's responsibility to investigate—and the Officers make no specific allegation that Mosby engaged in misconduct during that investigation. . .To the extent the Officers ask us to create a new rule that participation in an investigation deprives a prosecutor's subsequent acts of absolute immunity, we balk at the proposition. Such a rule would not only upend the functional approach that the Supreme Court has articulated and applied for decades, . . but it would effectively eliminate prosecutorial immunity in police-misconduct cases. Most jurisdictions, including Baltimore, charge prosecutors with independently investigating cases of criminal behavior by police. . . Per the Officers' theory, whenever a prosecutor takes on one of these cases, her actions—even those intimately tied to the judicial phase—no longer enjoy absolute immunity. This approach torpedoes the fundamental premise of absolute prosecutorial immunity: ensuring a fair, impartial criminal justice system, in which prosecutors have the independence to hold even powerful wrongdoers accountable without fear of vexatious litigation. . . And we refuse to sanction it. When determining whether a prosecutor is entitled to absolute immunity, we look at the specific act challenged, not the prosecutor's preceding acts. . . For the foregoing reasons, Mosby's absolute-immunity defense plainly defeats the Officers' § 1983 claim. Holding otherwise would require us to rewrite the doctrine of absolute prosecutorial immunity. This we will not do."); Loupe v. O'Bannon, 824 F.3d 534, 539-40 & n.4 (5th Cir. 2016) ("Applying the principles of absolute immunity and the functional approach prescribed by the Supreme Court's decisions, we conclude that O'Bannon is absolutely immune from suit for money damages based on her alleged malicious prosecution of Loupe. . . .However, applying the Supreme Court's decisions, we conclude that O'Bannon is not absolutely immune from Loupe's federal and state actions based on O'Bannon's alleged order of Loupe's warrantless arrest, as that conduct was not part of O'Bannon's prosecutorial function. In Burns, the Supreme Court held that giving legal advice to police, including advice as to whether there is probable cause to arrest a suspect, is not a function protected by absolute immunity. . . The same is true when a prosecutor orders a warrantless arrest. . . . Ordering a warrantless arrest is not intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process; it is conduct outside the judicial process and therefore is not protected by absolute immunity. . . .Contrary to O'Bannon's assertions, it makes no difference that she ordered Loupe's arrest while in a courtroom. Just as 'the actions of a prosecutor are not absolutely immune merely because they are performed by a prosecutor,' . . . a prosecutor's conduct is not intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process merely because it takes place in a courtroom.")

In Buckley v. Fitzsimmons, 509 U.S. 259 (1993), the Supreme Court held that prosecutors did not have absolute immunity with respect to claims that they had fabricated evidence during the preliminary investigation of a crime and had made false statements at a press conference announcing the arrest and indictment of petitioner. See also Kassa v. Fulton County, Georgia, 40 F.4th 1289, 1293-95 (11th Cir. 2022) ("We have never applied the functional approach to determine whether absolute prosecutorial immunity protects a prosecutor who failed to initiate the cancellation of a material witness warrant after trial. Kassa argues that we should adopt the Third Circuit's approach in Odd v. Malone, 538 F.3d 202 (3d Cir. 2008), which denied absolute prosecutorial immunity under a very similar set of facts. For the following reasons, we agree. . . . As an initial matter, we believe the Third Circuit's reasoning is consistent with cases from this Circuit and from the Supreme Court. The Third Circuit's analysis employed the functional approach that the Supreme Court has consistently embraced. . . And, like our caselaw, the Odd decision underscored the fact-specific nature of the inquiry, stating that its 'prosecutorial immunity analysis focuses on the unique facts of each case and requires careful dissection of the prosecutor's actions.'. . We thus find Odd persuasive. Applying Odd's analysis, we conclude that Stephenson is not entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity. The Third Circuit's decision to deny immunity turned on several facts that are also present in this case. Both the prosecutor in Odd and Stephenson failed to take action to recall warrants even though the judicial proceeding had concluded, and the witnesses no longer were needed. . . And so, as the Third Circuit explained, the arrest and confinement had 'nothing to do with conducting a prosecution for the state.'. . In addition, Stephenson's counsel acknowledged during oral arguments that—like the prosecutor in Odd—Stephenson did not have to engage in any advocacy to initiate the warrant's recall. . . She needed only to notify the judge. The notification required no exercise of professional judgment or legal skill. Because professional judgment played no role here, like the Third Circuit, we have no concern that litigation will adversely impact prosecutorial independence going forward. Allowing witnesses detained after trial to sue prosecutors for their inaction in cancelling warrants is unlikely to result in a 'flood' of new litigation against prosecutors. . . We agree with the Third Circuit that this is a 'relatively clear example of a situation in which the prosecutor's role as an advocate for the state had concluded.'. . . Stephenson contends that Odd conflicts with the Supreme Court's decision in Van de Kamp v. Goldstein. . . . Stephenson argues that the Third Circuit based its holding in Odd on the administrative nature of the prosecutor's actions—a rationale she argues conflicts with Van de Kamp's conclusion that prosecutors can receive absolute prosecutorial immunity for some administrative actions. We disagree. It is true that the Third Circuit described the prosecutor's actions as administrative, . . . but the court applied the functional approach—looking at whether immunity is justified for the specific function in question—to conclude that the prosecutor's actions were not '"intimately associated with the judicial phase" of the litigation[.]'. . . [O]ur opinion says nothing about whether a prosecutor is entitled to absolute immunity for seeking a material witness warrant in connection with an ongoing judicial proceeding."); Bledsoe v. Vanderbilt, 934 F.3d 1112, 1118-21 (10th Cir. 2019) ("The principles set forth in Buckley I compel us to conclude that Defendant Vanderbilt is not entitled to absolute immunity. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Vanderbilt met with other like-minded individuals to craft a false yet detailed narrative that vindicated Tom and implicated Plaintiff as C.A.'s killer. Stated differently, Plaintiff claims that Defendant Vanderbilt fabricated evidence against him during the preliminary investigation of C.A.'s murder—the exact scenario that the Supreme Court addressed in Buckley I. Defendant Vanderbilt was thus more akin to a detective searching for (or, in this instance, creating) evidence that would give him probable cause to arrest a suspect than an advocate 'evaluating evidence and interviewing witnesses as he prepares for trial.' . . Under the reasoning of Buckley I, Defendant Vanderbilt is therefore not entitled to absolute immunity on either of Plaintiff's claims. . . .Defendant Vanderbilt's logic is flawed because he 'conflate[s] the question whether [Plaintiff] has stated a cause of action with the question whether [Defendant Vanderbilt] is entitled to absolute immunity for his actions.'. . Those two inquiries are distinct, and the conduct that ultimately allows Plaintiff a path to damages may very well differ from the conduct alleged in Plaintiff's complaint for which Defendant Vanderbilt can seek absolute immunity. . . . Plaintiff's two claims center around the actual act of fabricating evidence, so Defendant Vanderbilt must parry that conduct if he hopes to avoid suit for those claims. But as we explained above, that road leads to a dead end given the clear holding in Buckley I. By contrast, Plaintiff's injury and its direct cause may bear upon the question whether Plaintiff alleges valid causes of action against Defendant Vanderbilt. As the Seventh Circuit aptly put it, 'the immunity depends [only] on the official's acts; the existence of a cause of action depends on the illegality of those acts and on whether an injury results.'. .And to that end, Defendant Vanderbilt may be correct that only his use of the fabricated evidence at trial—as opposed to his earlier act of fabrication—can serve as the basis for Plaintiff's claim for damages. . . But again, that point of nuance does not influence our disposition of Defendant Vanderbilt's current appeal, which considers only whether absolute immunity shields Defendant Vanderbilt from suit and not whether Defendant Vanderbilt's alleged conduct actually amounts to a constitutional violation. And as we noted above, that question of absolute immunity does not require us to inquire into the conduct that caused Plaintiff's ultimate injury. . . . [O]n an appeal from a denial of absolute immunity, we lack jurisdiction to answer the question whether a plaintiff has adequately pleaded a cause of action. . . . To be sure, regardless of whether qualified or absolute immunity is at issue, 'a claim of immunity is conceptually distinct from the merits of the plaintiff's claim,' and '[a]n appellate court reviewing the denial of the defendant's claim of immunity need not ... even determine whether the plaintiff's allegations actually state a claim.'. . We therefore lack jurisdiction to decide whether Plaintiff's allegations against Defendant Vanderbilt state valid causes of action. That means, in turn, we must decline Defendant Vanderbilt's invitation to bifurcate Plaintiff's claims in the specific way he wants us to do so—namely, by explicitly preventing Plaintiff from employing Defendant Vanderbilt's alleged act of fabricating evidence as a means to recover damages for his wrongful conviction and imprisonment. If we instead accept that invitation, then for all intents and purposes we would (improperly) be answering the cause-of-action question. . .In conclusion, we hold that absolute immunity does not shield Defendant

Vanderbilt from Plaintiff's allegations that he fabricated evidence against Plaintiff during the preliminary investigation of C.A.'s murder. Whether those same allegations amount to valid causes of action, however, is a question that only a future panel of this Court can decide once that question is properly before it."); Bianchi v. McQueen, 818 F.3d 309, 318-19 (7th Cir. 2016) ("[I]t's clear that absolute immunity knocks out a large part of the case against McQueen—most notably the claims premised on allegations that McQueen presented false statements to the grand jury and at trial. Still, some of the allegations cover conduct that stretches back to the investigative period before McQueen was engaged in what could reasonably be called prosecutorial advocacy. The complaint contains allegations of evidence fabrication and other chicanery months before the grand jury was empaneled. . . . We agree with the judge that McQueen is not absolutely immune for his investigative conduct in the months before the grand jury was convened."); Simon v. City of New York, 727 F.3d 167, 172-74 (2d Cir. 2013) ("We have previously held that when a prosecutor seeks a material witness warrant, he does so as an advocate and is immune from suit. . . . Any alleged misstatements by Longobardi in his application for the material witness warrant therefore cannot form the basis for liability. However, defendants do not have absolute immunity for their detention of Simon against her will for two full days. . .The execution of a material witness warrant is a police function, not a prosecutorial function, as New York's material witness statute, and the warrant issued in this case, explicitly state. While under New York law a prosecutor is responsible for seeking a material witness warrant, only police officers, not prosecutors, are authorized to execute the warrant by arresting people. . . Accordingly, the warrant issued by the court in this case was directed to 'any police officer in the State of New York.' The arrest of Simon and her detention for questioning were thus police functions, not prosecutorial ones. . . .The prosecutorial function may encompass questioning a witness for a brief period before presentation to determine whether, in the prosecutor's judgment, the witness's testimony should still be pursued or whether the witness should be released without further action. Based on Simon's testimony, however, a reasonable jury could find that the detention and interrogation went beyond what could reasonably be construed as clarifying Simon's status or 'preparing' her for a grand jury appearance, and became an investigative interview. . . Under New York law, as under federal law, a prosecutor has no power to subpoena a witness to appear outside of judicial proceedings to answer questions from the prosecution or the police. A material witness warrant serves the purpose of securing a witness's presence at a trial or grand jury proceeding. It does not authorize a person's arrest and prolonged detention for purposes of investigative interrogation by the police or a prosecutor. . . . Therefore, the officers are not entitled to absolute immunity for their execution of the material witness warrant, even if they were following Longobardi's instructions. Police officers and a prosecutor who engage in extended detention and interrogation—including requiring attendance for a second full day—of a material witness whom the court has ordered to be brought before the court to determine whether she should be detained or bailed as a material witness are, as a matter of law, engaged in an investigative function that entitles them to, at most, qualified immunity."); Knowlton v. Shaw, 704 F.3d 1, 9 (1st Cir. 2013) ("Burns and Buckley teach us that investigative steps taken to search for 'clues and corroboration' that might lead to an arrest are more removed from the judicial process and merit only qualified immunity. . . But here, the state officials' execution of the consent agreements was not part of any investigative activity. By the time the consent agreements were on the table, the investigation had already revealed Knowlton's and Bankers Life's violations of Maine's insurance laws. The agreements resolved those violations and allowed all parties to avoid further legal proceedings on the matter. . . .In sum, the state officials carried their burden in establishing they are entitled to absolute immunity for entering into the consent agreements with Knowlton and Bankers Life. Given our ruling, we need not reach whether qualified immunity applies or delve into the merits of Knowlton's due process claim."); Odd v. Malone, 538 F.3d 202, 217 (3d Cir. 2008) ("[W]e conclude that both [ADAs] failed to perform a fundamentally administrative task, viz., notifying the warrant-issuing judges that [Plaintiffs] remained incarcerated after it was clear that their testimony would not be needed for quite some time, if ever. We also find that the policies underlying the recognition of prosecutorial immunity do not apply with the same force in these cases because the aggrieved persons are unindicted third-party witnesses rather than criminal defendants."); Siehl v. City of Johnstown, No. CV 18-77J, 2019 WL 585226, at *8 (W.D. Pa. Feb. 13, 2019) ("[T]he Defendant prosecutors' failure to provide the results of all forensic testing to the defense was done in violation of a court order. The court order left no room for the Defendant prosecutors to exercise prosecutorial judgment or evaluation. Instead, the allegations of the Complaint suggest that they had a non-discretionary duty to abide by the court's order and to truthfully answer the court's inquiry relating to that order. At this point, their duties became administrative, rather than advocative. Taking all of Plaintiff's allegations as true, as it must at this stage of the proceedings, the Court finds at the pleading stage that these Defendant prosecutors are not protected by absolute immunity regarding their alleged violation of a court order to turn over all results relating to forensic testing in the case."); Villars v. Kubiatowski, No. 12 CV 4586, 2014 WL 1795631, *11, *12 (N.D. Ill. May 5, 2014) ("The Seventh Circuit and, much more recently, the Third and Sixth Circuits, have held that a prosecutor's actions related to securing a material witness warrant fall within the scope of absolute immunity. . . The Seventh Circuit tackled the issue more than 35 years ago in a case where a witness accused a federal prosecutor of violating his constitutional rights by lying to the court to have him detained as a material witness. . . Therefore, to the extent that Villars seeks to hold Kubiatowski liable for misrepresentations that Kubiatowski allegedly made to Judges Castillo and/or Denlow to secure Villars's detention, Kubiatowski is absolutely immune. . . .However, Villars also alleges that Kubiatowski violated his Fourth Amendment and due process rights, along with the federal material witness statute and Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 46(h), by failing to keep the court apprised of Villars's continued detention, causing him to remain in jail for almost two months—from November 15, 2010 until January 11, 2011—without a bail hearing. . . . The Seventh Circuit did not have occasion in Daniels to address whether immunity shields a prosecutor from the sorts of allegations made by Villars, nor has the court of appeals addressed the issue of a prosecutor's immunity in the material witness context since then. The Third Circuit, however, recently ruled on an analogous set of allegations. In Odd v. Malone, a detainee brought suit for constitutional violations against a prosecutor who obtained a material witness warrant, but then failed to notify the Court that the trial for which the witness was being detained had been continued. . . The Third Circuit, following Daniels, held that, although the prosecutor was acting in her prosecutorial capacity when she secured the material witness warrant (and thus was entitled to absolute immunity), the state's attorney's failure to inform the Court that the detainee remained incarcerated—akin to a failure by a federal prosecutor to make report a list of material witness detainees to the Court in accordance with Rule 46(h), the Third Circuit said—was primarily administrative, because it required no advocacy on the part of the prosecutor. . . As to this administrative oversight, the Court held, the prosecutor was not entitled to absolute immunity. . . The Court finds the Third Circuit's reasoning persuasive, and notes, as the Third Circuit did, that it is the prosecutor's burden to show that he was functioning as the state's advocate when performing the action in question. Taking Villars's allegations as true, as the Court must, Kubiatowski has not done that at this stage of the litigation.")

Compare Anilao v. Spota, 27 F.4th 855, 869-70 (2d Cir. 2022) ("The plaintiffs urge us to adopt a new rule under which absolute immunity would no longer apply to cases 'where a prosecution is unconstitutional' from the start, where the unconstitutional nature of the prosecution 'was evident or should have been evident to the prosecutor from the facts and the law, and where the prosecution is based upon evidence deliberately fabricated by the prosecutors.'. . In inviting us to alter our approach to absolute immunity, the plaintiffs turn our attention to Fields v. Wharrie, 740 F.3d 1107 (7th Cir. 2014). There, the Seventh Circuit held that a prosecutor 'acting pre-prosecution as an investigator' was not entitled to absolute immunity because he 'fabricate[d] evidence' and eventually 'introduce[d] the fabricated evidence at trial.'. . . Fields makes clear that a prosecutor's action in the investigative stage of a case is not spared from liability simply because the results of his investigative work are presented at trial. . . Our view, and the District Court's, is consistent with Fields. After all, the District Court determined that Spota and Lato were absolutely immune for their conduct as advocates during the judicial phase (initiating the prosecution, using allegedly perjured testimony during the grand jury, and making allegedly false statements to the grand jury), but held, as in Fields, that they were not immune for their conduct during the investigative stage of the prosecution. And Barr and Shmueli prevent us from accepting the plaintiffs' invitation to further extend the exception to absolute immunity beyond Fields, to situations in which prosecutors during the advocacy phase bring charges they know violate an individual's constitutional rights. . . Because the 'postarraignment events' described above 'consisted only of the prosecution" of the plaintiffs "in a court of competent jurisdiction on charges that were within the [prosecutors'] authority to bring,' the prosecutors 'are entitled to absolute immunity against' the plaintiffs' 'claims for damages for those events.'. . The evidence that 'the charges were brought for improper purposes do[es] not deprive' the prosecutors of that immunity. . . . We therefore affirm the District Court's dismissal of the claims arising from the defendants' actions taken in their role as advocates during the judicial phase of the prosecution. In doing so, '[w]e recognize, as Chief Judge Hand pointed out, that sometimes such immunity deprives a plaintiff of compensation that [she] undoubtedly merits.'. . 'Especially in cases, such as the present one, in which a plaintiff plausibly alleges disgraceful behavior by district attorneys, the application of this doctrine is more than disquieting.'. . '[B]ut the impediments to the fair, efficient functioning of a prosecutorial office that liability could create lead us to find that [immunity] must apply here.'") with Anilao v. Spota, 27 F.4th 855, 880 (2d Cir. 2022) (Chin, J., dissenting) ("The majority cites a number of cases barring claims against prosecutors based on absolute immunity, and, indeed, there are many of them. What sets this case apart, however, is the Second Department's decision holding that the prosecutors were 'proceeding ... "without or in excess of jurisdiction,"'. . . holding that Spota and Lato had no colorable authority to indict the ten nurses for resigning to protest work conditions and their lawyer for filing a claim of discrimination on their behalf. I would permit the claim to proceed.")

In Van de Kamp v. Goldstein, 129 S. Ct. 855 (2009), the Court unanimously held that a district attorney and chief deputy district attorney had absolute immunity as to claims "that the prosecution failed to disclose impeachment material . . . due to: (1) a failure properly to train prosecutors, (2) a failure properly to supervise prosecutors, or (3) a failure to establish an information system containing potential impeachment material about informants." Id. at 858, 859. Although these obligations were "administrative" in nature, the Court said they were "unlike administrative duties concerning, for example, workplace hiring, payroll administration, the maintenance of physical facilities, and the like." Id. at 862. The obligations at issue here required "legal knowledge and the exercise of related discretion." Id. The Court concluded that the "management tasks at issue. . . concern how and when to make impeachment information available at a trial. They are thereby directly connected with the prosecutor's basic trial advocacy duties. And, in terms of Imbler's functional concerns, a suit charging that a supervisor made a mistake directly related to a particular trial, on the one hand, and a suit charging that a supervisor trained and supervised inadequately, on the other, would seem very much alike." Id. at 863. Note that Van de Kamp dealt only with the individual liability of the defendants and did not address any entity liability based on a policy or custom of the office. [See cases infra and cases collected in Blum, Overview of Section 1983 Outline]

See also Kamienski v. Ford, 844 F. App'x 520, ___ (3d Cir. 2021) ("Kamienski contacted the prosecutor's office seeking review of Marzarella's litigation conduct. He argues that the silence by Marzarella's supervisors, Defendants Marlene Ford and Ronald DeLigny, in response to these requests was egregious behavior. He also argues that Van de Kamp v. Goldstein. . . does not shield Ford and DeLigny from liability because their review would not directly impact the litigation. Kamienski misapplies Goldstein. As the Second Circuit explained in Warney v. Monroe County, overseeing litigation-related functions—like the ones here—is protected by absolute immunity. . . The allegations of failure to supervise all relate back to Marzarella's litigation conduct. Just as the administrative acts in Goldstein and Warney were 'integral to an advocacy function,' we conclude that the prosecutors' actions here 'were also integral to the overarching advocacy function' because they 'required legal knowledge and the exercise of related discretion.'. . Kamienski and Alongi allege serious wrongdoing. But their allegations are stymied by absolute or qualified immunity, so we must affirm the District Court's summary judgment."); Wooten v. Roach, 964 F.3d 395, 408-10 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Like the defendants in Buckley and Hoog-Watson, Milner's alleged actions were investigatory. Wooten alleges CCDAO took the place of law enforcement by initiating and conducting the entire investigation. . . . In short, Milner fulfilled the fact-finding role generally filled by law enforcement, and thus he is entitled to claim only the level of immunity available to law enforcement—qualified immunity. . . . Milner believes we should view his alleged actions as part of the process of initiating a judicial proceeding, and that we should 'apply[ ] prosecutorial immunity sooner in the criminal process rather than later.' He also asserts that, once a suspect has been identified as the subject of an investigation, the actions by prosecutors to investigate him are 'inherently "prosecutorial" determinations.' We disagree with both contentions. The question, rather, is the nature of the function alleged. Prosecutors 'may not shield [their] investigative work with the aegis of absolute immunity merely because,' in hindsight, 'that work may be ... described as "preparation" for a possible trial.'. . For these reasons, we conclude Milner is not shielded by absolute prosecutorial immunity. We reach a different conclusion regarding Roach, the District Attorney. Wooten fails to plausibly allege that Roach supervised or failed to intervene in Milner's non-prosecutorial actions in the Wooten investigation. Although Wooten generally alleges that Roach ran the CCDAO during the time in question and employed Milner, and that Roach was aware of Assistant District Attorney Davis's investigation of Judge Wooten and another judge, . . .Wooten does not specifically allege that Roach was involved in supervising Milner's investigation. . . Rather, Wooten alleges in conclusory fashion that Roach conspired with the other defendants 'to wrongfully arrest and prosecute [Wooten] for false and legally untenable claims' and to 'deprive [Wooten] of her constitutional rights,' and that Roach was the 'policy maker in relation to the wrongful arrests and prosecutions.' Wooten further alleges that Roach requested White's appointment as attorney pro tem. Under Supreme Court precedent, those allegations fail to show Roach was performing an investigative rather than prosecutorial function in supervising the office. The key decision is Van de Kamp v. Goldstein, 555 U.S. 335, 129 S.Ct. 855, 172 L.Ed.2d 706 (2009). . . . Applying Van de Kamp yields the conclusion that Roach is entitled to prosecutorial immunity. Wooten attacks Roach's supervision of, and failure to intervene in, the Wooten investigation. But she does not allege Roach was personally involved in the investigation. Rather, her allegations about Roach are more general: he supervised the office, he employed Milner, he was generally aware of the investigations against Wooten and another judge, he was the 'policy maker in relation to ... wrongful arrests and prosecutions,' he conspired 'to wrongfully arrest and prosecute [Wooten],' and he 'act[ed] pursuant to a custom, policy, practice and/or procedure of the CCDAO' to undertake 'political prosecutions' and violate the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. These allegations are either (1) connected to the administrative functioning of the office, . . . or (2) connected to the judicial process: arrests and prosecutions[.] . . . For those reasons, we hold that Roach is entitled to prosecutorial immunity based on the allegations in the operative complaint."); Hoffman v. Office of the State Attorney, 793 F. App'x 945, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("[I]t would be exceedingly odd if Colaw was entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity for his conduct in relation to the plaintiffs' prosecution, as we have concluded above, but Colaw's supervisors were not entitled to the same immunity for approving or failing to prevent that same conduct. The Supreme Court agrees. In Van de Kamp v. Goldstein, the Court explained that, where a prosecutor is entitled to absolute immunity for certain conduct, a supervisory prosecutor should likewise be entitled to absolute immunity for supervision or training of that same conduct. . . Were the rule otherwise, prosecutors' offices would be subject to suit 'in virtually every case in which a line prosecutor makes a mistake for which he is personally immune.'. . And that, in turn, would undermine the primary purpose of prosecutorial immunity, which is to 'protect[ ] the proper functioning of the office,' rather than the individual prosecutor. . . Here, the plaintiffs' claims against Corey and Nelson in their capacity as supervisors are all directly connected to Colaw's conduct in the individual prosecutions against the plaintiffs. In other words, the claims 'rest[ ] in necessary part upon a consequent error by an individual prosecutor' in those prosecutions. . . In a case like this, the same concerns that underlie prosecutorial immunity for the frontline prosecutor also apply to supervisory prosecutors. . . In sum, because Colaw is entitled to prosecutorial immunity for his conduct, so too are Corey and Nelson for supervising that conduct."); Penate v. Kaczmarek, 928 F.3d 128, 136-141 & nn.7 & 10 (1st Cir. 2019) ("All of these Supreme Court cases involved claims arising out of criminal proceedings which were initiated by the same officials who were seeking absolute prosecutorial immunity. But Kaczmarek was not Penate's prosecutor; . . . she rests her broad assertion of absolute prosecutorial immunity on her role as Farak's prosecutor. Kaczmarek's claim is thus a novel one, as neither the Supreme Court nor this court has ever extended absolute prosecutorial immunity to conduct by a prosecutor in a proceeding not initiated by that prosecutor or by an office that prosecutor supervises.[7] [fn. 7: The Supreme Court held in Van de Kamp v. Goldstein . . . that prosecutors were entitled to absolute immunity for supervising their office's compliance with constitutional disclosure requirements. . . As Kaczmarek did not work in or otherwise have control over the office of the DA prosecuting Penate, her claim to absolute prosecutorial immunity does not come under the rubric of Van de Kamp.] [See also fn.10: Kaczmarek also argues, relying on Van de Kamp, that she is absolutely immune because she advised Foster, whom the district court found to be absolutely immune[.] . . Van de Kamp, however, granted immunity to supervisors of prosecutors and to the prosecutor's 'colleagues' who shared an 'intimate[ ] association with the judicial phase of the criminal process.'. . Kaczmarek was not Foster's supervisor. And our conclusion that Kaczmarek could be found not to have shared such an association with the judicial phase of the criminal process distinguishes her from the hypothetical colleagues the Supreme Court deemed immune in Van de Kamp.] Absolute immunity is not triggered here by the simple fact that the conduct alleged in the complaint occurred while Kaczmarek was pursuing the commonwealth's criminal charges against Farak. . . . Rather, under the functional approach, Kaczmarek's defense turns on the following question: was Kaczmarek functioning as Farak's prosecutor when she withheld evidence from Penate's proceeding? . . . . Key facts alleged in the complaint answer that question in the negative. The most significant fact is that Kaczmarek turned over the mental health worksheets to Farak's defense. This shows that, when Kaczmarek orchestrated the withholding of that very same evidence in Penate's case, she did not do so because keeping the evidence under wraps was helpful to her prosecution of Farak. On the complaint's facts, we conclude jurors could find that Kaczmarek's decisions about disclosure of evidence in Penate's case were not made based on her role as Farak's prosecutor. The absence of this 'functional tie' between Kaczmarek's prosecutorial duties and her conduct in Penate's case, if proven, would doom Kaczmarek's assertion of absolute prosecutorial immunity. . . .In short, Kaczmarek does not enjoy absolute prosecutorial immunity from Penate's suit because of her role as Farak's prosecutor. . . .The next issue is Kaczmarek's theory that she enjoys absolute immunity because she was a government attorney performing an advocacy function when she advised Foster on the AGO's responses to the Ballou subpoena and to the subsequent court order requiring disclosure of documents. . . .

Butz involved agency attorneys with assigned roles in a quasi-judicial administrative proceeding. And the out-of-circuit cases involved attorneys appointed to represent the government in initiating or defending a civil proceeding. No case has extended absolute immunity to a government attorney like Kaczmarek for merely assisting, behind the scenes, in a state's response to a court request for documents. And we do not believe that such an extension is 'necessary to protect the judicial process.'. . But, even assuming that Butz immunity were as broad as Kaczmarek argues it is, her theory would fail on its own terms. The facts alleged in the complaint do not support it. . . .To the extent Kaczmarek did use discretion or legal knowledge in advising Foster, that does not change our conclusion that Kaczmarek's primary function was an administrative one not entitled to absolute government attorney immunity. As we explained in the previous section, it is the function for which evidence is evaluated, not the act of analyzing evidence itself which controls the type of immunity. And, here, the complaint alleges that Kaczmarek's primary function in analyzing the Farak materials was an administrative one -- to inform Foster whether those materials were responsive. . .The district court's denial of the motion to dismiss is affirmed."); Ogunkoya v. Monaghan, 913 F.3d 64, 69-71 (2d Cir. 2019) ("Instead of relying on strict categories of actions with respect to which absolute immunity attaches, the relevant question is 'whether there is pending or in preparation a court proceeding in which the prosecutor acts as an advocate.'. . Ultimately, we ask 'whether a reasonable prosecutor would view the acts challenged by the complaint as reasonably within the functions of a prosecutor.'. .The ADAs' decision to prosecute Ogunkoya and proceed by grand jury indictment rather than proceed on separate criminal complaints is a prosecutorial exercise of discretion entitled to absolute immunity. . . . [W]hether a prosecutor is performing a police function or acting as an advocate on behalf of the state with regard to a detained individual 'depends in part on whether one looks at the prosecutors' discrete actions, or at their role and function in an ongoing proceeding.'. . We take the second approach, determining the prosecutor's immunity 'chiefly on whether there is pending or in preparation a court proceeding in which the prosecutor acts as an advocate.'. . Viewed in the context of Ogunkoya's pending indictment and prosecution on multiple charges, a reasonable prosecutor would conclude that the ADAs' function in controlling Ogunkoya's arraignments on multiple different charges that would later be subsumed in a single charging document was part of a prosecutor's role as the gatekeeper of 'whether and when to prosecute.'. . . The analysis this Court undertook in Warney is helpful to our analysis here. In Warney, we recognized that prosecutors who are alleged to have not timely disclosed exculpatory DNA evidence obtained during habeas proceedings are entitled to absolute immunity. . . We concluded that classifying the steps that the prosecutors took—testing and delaying disclosure of DNA evidence, and identifying the real killer—was impossible 'with[out] reference to context.'. . Inculpatory results would aid advocacy; exculpatory results could give rise to an administrative burden to effect disclosure; results inculpating another would support initiation of a new investigation. We held that regardless of the test results, all the steps that the Warney prosecutors took 'were integral to and subsumed in the advocacy functions being performed in connection with Warney's post-conviction initiatives.'. .Our decision in Warney follows the Supreme Court's instruction in Van de Kamp v. Goldstein. . . that absolute immunity covers administrative acts 'directly connected with the conduct of a trial.'. . . The decision to initiate prosecution, what charges to bring, and how to perfect and consolidate those charges is a quintessential prosecutorial function. . . . So, while the District Court was correct that in New York state arraignment is generally a police function, its analysis failed to consider that a court proceeding was in preparation . . . and that the ADAs' participation in the act of scheduling arraignments on the multiple charges that were to be consolidated in a single indictment was 'directly connected with the conduct of a trial' and 'require[d] legal knowledge and the exercise of related discretion.'. . As the ADA explained in his email to Ogunkoya's counsel, Ogunkoya had already been arraigned on the Henrietta charges and was being detained on that basis. Further arraignments on the Greece and Irondequoit charges were not necessary for him to continue to be held pursuant to the Henrietta arraignment and on terms set by the Henrietta court. . . As their role with respect to the arraignments was prosecutorial, the ADAs are thus entitled to absolute immunity."); Savage v. Maryland, 896 F.3d 260, 265, 270-74 (4th Cir. 2018) ("We agree with the district court that prosecutorial immunity bars Savage's claims against Oglesby. Reviewing and evaluating evidence in preparation for trial, making judgments about witness credibility, and deciding which witnesses to call and which cases may be prosecuted all are directly connected to the judicial phase of the criminal process, protected by absolute immunity. . . . Because Oglesby was acting in his role as advocate, reviewing potential evidence for use at trial, he is protected by prosecutorial immunity. . . .That a judgment about witness credibility or which cases to try has negative employment consequences—even readily foreseeable ones—does not change the underlying nature of that judgment; the immunity analysis focuses on the prosecutorial conduct in question, and 'not on the harm that the conduct may have caused.'. . Nor does the effect on Savage's career do anything to distinguish this case from all the others, discussed above, in which courts apply absolute immunity when police officers lose their jobs or suffer other adverse actions because their employers are informed by prosecutors that they no longer will be used as witnesses. . . Most important, the Supreme Court has clarified that even if all or some of the conduct complained of by Savage could be categorized as employment-related and hence 'administrative,' it still would be protected by absolute immunity. In Van de Kamp, the Court considered whether prosecutors could be sued for non-disclosure of Giglio impeachment material that allegedly resulted from their failure to train and supervise attorneys properly or to collect potential impeachment material about informants. . . The Court recognized that the functions in which the defendant-prosecutors were engaged—training, supervision, and information-systems management—were 'administrative' in nature. . . But because they also were 'directly connected with the conduct of a trial' and required the exercise of legal discretion, the Court concluded. . . they remained protected by absolute immunity: 'The management tasks at issue ... concern how and when to make impeachment information available at a trial. They are thereby directly connected with the prosecutor's basic trial advocacy duties.'. . The same 'direct connection' to the trial process and the prosecutor's role as advocate is present here. Even if we were to categorize Oglesby's alleged actions—in particular, his communications with City officials about Savage's status—as 'administrative' or 'managerial,' they would remain inextricably linked with the underlying assessment of Savage's credibility and discretionary judgment about how best to respond. . . It remains the general rule, of course, that prosecutors will not be entitled to absolute immunity when acting in their administrative capacities as employers. . . It is only 'a certain kind of administrative obligation—a kind that itself is directly connected with the conduct of a trial,' like Oglesby's communications with the City regarding his assessment of Savage as a potential trial witness—that calls for the protections of absolute immunity. . . And we agree with Savage that not every action a prosecutor might take against a police officer who has been barred from testifying will be covered by absolute immunity. Even in that context, if a prosecutor's alleged conduct cannot be connected to discretionary judgments about which witnesses to call and which cases to prosecute, then absolute immunity will not apply. . . . But when, as here, the alleged prosecutorial conduct involves the decision not to call an officer as a witness and communication of that decision to the relevant employer, it is 'intimately tied to the judicial process' and thus entitled to absolute immunity."); Torres v. Goddard, 793 F.3d 1046, 1058 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Plaintiffs' claims against Goddard are analogous to the hypothetical case discussed in Van de Kamp. They don't arise from Goddard's 'general methods of supervision,' but rather arise from Goddard's 'acquiesce[nce]' and 'ratifi [cation]' of Holmes's procurement of particular seizure warrants. Under Van de Kamp, the absolute immunity that protects Holmes's preparation and application for the warrants also protects Goddard's decision to permit Holmes to do so. There is no functional difference between a civil forfeiture prosecutor's preparation and application for seizure warrants, and his supervisor's decision to allow him to engage in those activities. A supervisor's decision to permit a subordinate prosecutor to prepare and apply for seizure warrants is an 'act[ ] undertaken by [the supervisor] in preparing for the initiation of judicial proceedings,' and 'occur[s] in the course of [the supervisor's] role as an advocate for the [s]tate.'. . Indeed, if the rule were otherwise, a plaintiff could just 'restyle a complaint charging a trial failure so that it becomes a complaint charging a failure of training or supervision' and thereby 'eviscerate Imbler.'. . .Plaintiffs also allege that Goddard 'culpably acquiesced in and subsequently ratified the service of warrants and the seizure' of their funds. We hold that service and execution of seizure warrants, even when performed by a prosecutor, aren't protected by absolute immunity because those acts are functions of police officers, not prosecutors. . . Under Kalina, Goddard's supervision of Holmes's service and execution of seizure warrants is likewise a function of a supervising police officer, not a supervising prosecutor. Service and execution aren't 'intimately associated with the judicial phase' of the proceedings. Goddard therefore can't claim absolute immunity with respect to his supervision of the service and execution of the seizure warrants.")

Compare Lacey v. Maricopa County, 693 F.3d 896, 928-31 (9th Cir. 2012) (en banc) ("Lacey's challenge to Thomas's decision to appoint a special prosecutor presents a question that we have never addressed, a question that rests at the confluence of a district attorney's employment-related decisions, such as the hiring and promoting of deputy prosecutors, and his litigation related decisions to designate deputy prosecutors to act as the advocates of the state in particular matters. . . . If removing a prosecutor from a particular case is within the district attorney's duties, it stands to reason that appointing a prosecutor to a particular case would also fall within the prosecutorial function. The line between appointments in particular cases and employment decisions follows naturally from similar decisions concerning judicial immunity. . . . From these examples, we can draw a broad principle. Decisions related to general conditions of employment—including decisions to hire, promote, transfer, and terminate—and which do not affect the prosecutor's role in any particular matter are generally not sufficiently related to the initiation and conduct of a prosecution in a court of law or their role as an advocate of the state to qualify for absolute immunity. Decisions related to appointments and removals in a particular matter will generally fall within the exercise of the judge's or prosecutor's judicial and quasi-judicial roles and are shielded from suit by absolute immunity. . . . Even if Wilenchik were in some sense hired by Maricopa County, he was appointed by Thomas to do one and only one thing: prosecute the New Times.") with Lacey v. Maricopa County, 693 F.3d 896, 940-42 (9th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Kozinski, C.J., dissenting in part) ("Adjectives matter. They're not as action-packed as verbs, nor as self-sufficient as nouns. But adjectives do make a difference. Here, the majority overlooks a crucial one: 'special.' Dennis Wilenchik wasn't just any prosecutor: He was a special prosecutor. He got the job because his crony, County Attorney Andrew Thomas, gave it to him. Plaintiffs allege Wilenchik used that power to harass Thomas's and Sheriff Joe Arpaio's enemies. For this, the majority anoints Thomas with every governmental wrongdoer's favorite unguent, absolute immunity. The Supreme Court has told us that 'absolute prosecutorial immunity [is justified] only for actions that are connected with the prosecutor's role in judicial proceedings.' Burns v. Reed, 500 U.S. 478, 494 (1991). By appointing Wilenchik as special prosecutor, Thomas took no action remotely connected with any judicial proceeding. Instead, he gave up the power to take any such action and transferred it to his special buddy, Wilenchik. . . . If hiring and firing line prosecutors is not protected by absolute immunity, appointing a special prosecutor certainly is not. Subordinate prosecutors, after all, require general supervision and training, which remain the chief prosecutor's responsibility. Not so a special prosecutor. Once appointed, he serves as an independent agent and makes all prosecutorial decisions without any input or oversight of the chief prosecutor. There is absolutely no justification for giving Thomas absolute immunity for the non-prosecutorial and self-serving act of appointing Wilenchik to do his dirty work. . . . By enveloping Thomas with absolute immunity, my colleagues encourage malicious or corrupt prosecutors to do exactly what plaintiffs allege Thomas did here: intimidate and harass political rivals by delegating prosecutorial authority to a straw man. It's a blueprint for prosecutorial excess and abuse; we'll rue the day we started down this road.")

Compare Adams v. Hanson, 656 F.3d 397, 399, 403-08, 411 (6th Cir. 2011) ("In her federal § 1983 suit, Adams claims that she was unlawfully detained for twelve days as a result of Hanson's false and misleading representations to the state trial court regarding Adams's availability as a witness. The district court granted Hanson's motion for summary judgment on the grounds that Hanson is entitled to absolute immunity for conduct falling within her role as a prosecutor. Adams appeals, arguing that Hanson acted as a complaining witness or, in the alternative, fulfilled an administrative function. The American Civil Liberties Union Fund of Michigan filed an amicus brief arguing that absolute immunity should not protect prosecutors from suits filed by third-party witnesses. When making statements at a preliminary examination about the availability of a witness, Hanson functioned as an advocate for the State of Michigan and performed acts intimately associated with the judicial process. Because she is absolutely immune from suit for her prosecutorial conduct, we AFFIRM the district court's grant of summary judgment to Hanson. . . . Adams claims that Hanson made false and misleading factual representations to the state trial court, ex parte and off the record during a hearing recess, regarding the availability of Adams as a witness, and that these statements led to her unlawful arrest and detention. The district court determined that Hanson was entitled to absolute immunity from suit because she was acting as an advocate for the state in connection with a preliminary examination. Adams disagrees: she claims that Hanson acted as a complaining witness, or, in the alternative, fulfilled an administrative function. The case thus presents an issue of first impression in this circuit: whether a prosecutor is entitled to absolute immunity for her false and misleading statements to a trial court in the course of criminal proceedings about the availability of a witness. The Michigan ACLU as Amicus argues that, as a rule, absolute immunity should not apply to actions of a prosecutor with respect to a third-party witness. Under this view, actions of a prosecutor vis-à-vis a criminal defendant should be distinguished from actions vis-à-vis a third-party witness, and absolute immunity should not be extended to the latter because the historical and policy rationales for absolute immunity do not apply with equal force in the witness context. Other circuits that have addressed the question have held that prosecutors are ordinarily entitled to absolute immunity for conduct falling within a prosecutorial function when they seek detention of a material witness pursuant to judicial order. [citing cases] The Third Circuit has cautioned, however, that 'policy considerations underlying prosecutorial immunity counsel against recognizing absolute immunity' in material-witness cases. . . We have stated in dicta that absolute immunity protects a prosecutor seeking the incarceration of a material witness, White by Swafford v. Gerbitz, 860 F.2d 661, 665 n. 4 (6th Cir.1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1028, 109 S.Ct. 1160, 103 L.Ed.2d 219 (1989), but not a prosecutor who fails to act timely to secure a material-witness's release after being ordered to do so by the court, id. The scope of a prosecutor's immunity in this context, however, has never been squarely addressed by this court.We conclude that Hanson's statements before the trial court at the preliminary examination regarding Adams's availability as a witness fell within her role as an advocate for the State of Michigan and are therefore absolutely protected. The prosecutorial function includes initiating criminal proceedings, appearing before the court at a probable cause hearing or before a grand jury, seeking an arrest warrant, and preparing witnesses. . . Hanson's challenged conduct involved the analogous acts of appearing at a preliminary examination and making statements about her discussions with a potential witness–activities 'closely related ... to h[er] role as an advocate ' before the court in criminal proceedings. . . Furthermore, because the issuance of either a material-witness warrant or an order of contempt 'is unquestionably a judicial act,' a prosecutor's statements to the court regarding the availability of a witness are ' "intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process" .... [and are] connected with the initiation and conduct of a prosecution, particularly where,' as here, 'the hearing occurs after arrest [of the defendant]' in the criminal proceedings. . . It is especially instructive that, under Michigan law, it is the prosecutor's particular, non-delegable duty to 'make a diligent good-faith effort to find and produce' witnesses in criminal prosecutions. . . Although the parties dispute whether Hanson sought to hold Adams as a material witness or in contempt of court, there is no dispute that Hanson sought to secure Adams's testimony as a witness in a criminal prosecution, a province of the prosecutor. That Hanson allegedly acted outside of formal judicial proceedings, in an off-the-record discussion with the trial judge, does not strip her automatically of immunity for this conduct. . . . Specifically, conduct related to the preparation and presentation of witness testimony may be protected whether it occurs in or out of court. . . . Because Hanson's actions fell within her prosecutorial role, she is entitled to absolute immunity even if her statements were false or misleading. . . . The responsibility is thereby placed with the court to provide a witness the opportunity to be heard and to assess itself the materiality of her testimony and the likelihood that she would fail to appear. . . Because this judicial process was not followed in this case, Adams was not provided the opportunity to be heard or to furnish bail before the trial court ordered her detained. Although we remain seriously troubled by the abrogation of Adams's procedural rights, Adams's 'experience illustrates the importance of vigilant exercise of this checking role by the judicial officer to whom the warrant application is presented,' not that prosecutors must be held accountable for judicial error. Al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2088 n. 2 (Ginsburg, J., concurring). . . .Unlike the incarcerations in Odd, which were prolonged past the intention of the court due to prosecutorial oversight, it was left to the state trial court in this case 'to determine whom to incarcerate and for what length of time.' Our opinion does not foreclose the possibility that Adams's constitutional rights were violated . . . or that a prosecutor's actions in relation to a witness may be administrative or investigative in another context. . . If Hanson had detained Adams without a court order, she likely would have been engaging in an 'investigative act[ ] antecedent ... to the judicial process' rather than absolutely protected prosecutorial activity. . . If police had detained Adams unilaterally, or misrepresented the facts when applying for a warrant, she may have been able to bring a viable § 1983 claim against them. . . In fact, however, Adams was arrested pursuant to a signed order from the trial judge, and while it was Hanson's job to present information about witnesses to the court, it was the court's duty to respond with appropriate protections. Therefore, whether or not Adams's detention violated her constitutional rights, Hanson's acts are protected by absolute immunity. . . . Absent direction from the Supreme Court, we decline to make a categorical exception to traditional absolute immunity analysis for prosecutorial actions with respect to third-party witnesses. Accordingly, we hold that Prosecutor Hanson is entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity for her acts of advocacy before the state trial court in seeking to procure witness testimony at a preliminary examination.") and Schneyder v. Smith, 653 F.3d 313, 334 (3d Cir. 2011) ("One thing that Van de Kamp does not change is our characterization of the conduct in question as the nonperformance of a constitutional duty to advise the court of a significant change in the circumstances surrounding the detention of a material witness. We also continue to think that this duty is, broadly speaking, administrative rather than advocative. After Van de Kamp, we must ask the further question whether this is the sort of administrative duty the performance or nonperformance of which is protected by prosecutorial immunity. We hold that it is not. . . . After the continuance, the Overby case was a long way off, and it simply is not the prosecutor's prerogative to decide how long to keep a material witness detained. Declining to reveal the change in Overby's status was an abdication of Smith's responsibility to provide the court with information sufficient for it to decide an issue within its sole competence. As the sole government official in possession of the relevant information, Smith had a duty of disclosure that was neither discretionary nor advocative, but was instead a purely administrative act not entitled to the shield of immunity, even after Van de Kamp.").

See also Safar v. Tingle, 859 F.3d 241, 249-51 (4th Cir. 2017) ("A prosecutor's decision to seek an arrest warrant is protected by absolute immunity, . . . but it remains an open question whether a prosecutor receives absolute immunity when she fails to withdraw an arrest warrant after learning that no crime had been committed. Because a prosecutor's decision whether to withdraw an arrest warrant is 'intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process,' Imbler, 424 U.S. at 430, we conclude that Tingle is entitled to absolute immunity. Plaintiffs contend that retracting a stale warrant is merely a ministerial duty and thus cannot be protected by absolute immunity. This argument misses the mark. To the extent a decision to revoke an arrest warrant can be cast as administrative, it is 'directly connected with the prosecutor's basic trial advocacy duties,' Van de Kamp, 555 U.S. at 346, and 'require[s] legal knowledge and the exercise of related discretion,' id. at 344. Under Virginia law, a prosecutor does not have unilateral authority to withdraw an arrest warrant and must first file a motion to dismiss with the appropriate court. . . Filing and arguing motions in court is garden-variety trial work that falls comfortably within a prosecutor's core advocacy duties. . . The decision to file a motion to rescind, moreover, generally involves the exercise of substantial discretion. A prosecutor is not bound to withdraw a warrant every time a victim purports to recant or conflicting information comes to light. Rather, prosecutors engage in the familiar task of 'evaluating evidence' and determining whether to retain the warrant based on a revised assessment of probable cause. . . Consequently, we find that the choice to move the court for withdrawal is an extension of the prosecutor's fundamental judgment of 'whether and when to prosecute.'. . Moreover, deciding whether or not to withdraw an arrest warrant is one of those advocacy functions 'to which the reasons for absolute immunity apply with full force.'. . If absolute immunity does not insulate prosecutors for their refusal to withdraw an arrest warrant, it would work an end run around Kalina and give rise to an anomalous regime where criminal defendants could mount civil suits against prosecutors for the maintenance of arrest warrants even though those same defendants could not challenge the initial decision to seek a warrant. Given the frequency with which prosecutors come across new information after a warrant is sworn out, we are hesitant to open the door to all manner of collateral attacks on what at bottom is a prosecutor's appraisal of probable cause. We recognize, of course, that Safar's case, at least as alleged in the complaint, presents a stark scenario where the charges have been wholly discredited. But absolute immunity 'does not exist to help prosecutors in the easy case; it exists because the easy cases bring difficult cases in their wake.'. . .There are also existing safeguards that deter egregious prosecutorial misconduct in this arena. Prosecutors remain subject to criminal sanction for willful acts of abuse. . . And '[t]he organized bar's development and enforcement of professional standards for prosecutors' provides a 'well-developed and pervasive mechanism' for controlling official malpractice. . . . We acknowledge that granting absolute immunity leaves Safar, who was 'genuinely wronged' by Tingle's oversight, 'without civil redress' under § 1983. . . Yet the overall value of prosecutorial discretion may require that we accept the possibility that such discretion might be abused in the occasional case. As Justice Powell observed, the alternative of qualifying a prosecutor's immunity 'would disserve the broader public interest' by 'prevent[ing] the vigorous and fearless performance of the prosecutor's duty that is essential to the proper functioning of the criminal justice system.'"); Diaz-Colon v. Fuentes-Agostini, 786 F.3d 144, 151 (1st Cir. 2015) ("Prosecutors regularly prepare and present testimony by witnesses to whom the government has offered inducements to secure their cooperation. Disclosure requirements and due process principles provide some protection to criminal defendants from abuses of this practice. . .

It is another thing altogether, though, to provide wrongfully charged individuals with a private damages remedy against prosecutors when cooperating witnesses lie. If prosecutors could be sued civilly every time any such witness claimed a wrongful inducement to lie, prosecutors might well be exposed to numerous such suits. Weighing the costs and benefits to the public interest of such an exposure to civil liability, the law bars such claims when they arise out of the prosecutor's work in a criminal proceeding. . . In a last-ditch effort, plaintiffs' counsel argued that ADA Redondo's participation on 'the prosecution team' defeated absolute immunity, presumably by making him liable for the misconduct of others in the previous procuring of the false statements. Adopting this approach would render prosecutors vicariously liable in all cases involving improper actions since, at some point, a prosecutor is always a member of 'the prosecution team.' Such an exponential increase in potential liability plainly conflicts with the purpose of affording prosecutors absolute immunity, to insulate prosecutorial discretion and resources from the threat of litigation. . . Absolute immunity therefore shields ADA Redondo from having to stand trial for the malicious prosecution and conspiracy claims under section 1983."); Stapley v. Pestalozzi, 733 F.3d 804, 811, 812 (9th Cir. 2013) ("The Court has never stated that government attorneys receive absolute immunity for all litigation-related conduct, even in criminal cases. Rather, the Court has repeatedly stated that only certain actions taken by prosecutors receive absolute immunity, and that a functional comparison of the activities performed is critical. . . . The question here is whether, in the circumstances of this case, Thomas and Aubuchon are entitled to absolute immunity from claims arising out of their initiation of the civil RICO suit. Defendants have the burden of showing that they are entitled to absolute immunity. . . We conclude that Defendants have not carried their burden. Because the RICO suit was civil, . . .it was not 'intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process.'. . Defendants therefore try to analogize this case to Butz, where absolute immunity was extended in the civil context to 'functions analogous to those of a prosecutor.'. . We conclude that Defendants' actions here were not 'analogous to those of a prosecutor' for two reasons. . . First, the federal RICO statute does not provide any special authorization for county attorneys to file civil RICO suits. County attorneys may file civil RICO suits under 18 U.S.C. § 1964(c), but they have no status as plaintiffs different from private citizens. . . As the district court noted, Thomas and Aubuchon were thus 'in the same position as ... private lawyers' in bringing the RICO suit. . . This case is therefore distinguishable from all cited cases where a government attorney was granted absolute immunity. In those cases, the government attorney was taking action that only a legal representative of the government could take. . . Inasmuch as Defendants did not act in a uniquely governmental role in filing their civil RICO suit, their actions were not 'analogous to those of a prosecutor.'. .Second, the circumstances of this case indicate that the civil RICO suit was not 'analogous' to a criminal prosecution. Rather, Defendants filed the RICO suit as part of their long-running 'political war' against members of the Board of Supervisors, judges, and others. The suit was essentially a harassing public-relations ploy. Defendants filed baseless criminal suits against Stapley and others both before and after filing the RICO suit, seeking media publicity for their actions in connection with these suits. Before initiating the civil RICO suit, Defendants received warnings from attorneys both inside and outside their office that the suit had no basis in fact or law and would likely result in sanctions. Defendants had also been warned of ethical conflicts related to filing the suit."); Knowlton v. Shaw, 704 F.3d

1, 6 (1st Cir. 2013) (An agency official's decision to initiate administrative proceedings 'aimed at legal sanctions,'. . . is discretionary, 'very much like [a] prosecutor's decision to initiate or move forward with a criminal prosecution' and is, therefore, entitled to absolute immunity."); Slater v. Clarke, 700 F.3d 1200, 1203 (9th Cir. 2012) ("The decision whether to extradite him, like the decision whether to prosecute him, was intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process. Indeed, the decision whether to extradite was the next step in the judicial process. Accordingly, whether the decision in this case is characterized as a decision not to extradite, or as a decision to extradite only from a limited area, defendants are entitled to absolute immunity for their participation in that decision. We acknowledge that cases granting absolute immunity often involve decisions that are subject to judicial oversight, but judicial oversight is not a requirement of absolute immunity. . . Defendants are entitled to absolute immunity to the extent they participated in making the extradition decision described in plaintiffs' complaint."); Giraldo v. Kessler, 694 F.3d 161, 166, 167 (2d Cir. 2012) ("Good prosecutors may—usually should—perform acts reasonably characterized as investigative at all phases of a criminal proceeding. The investigative acts that are entitled to only qualified immunity are those undertaken in the phase of law enforcement that involves the gathering and piecing together of evidence for indications of criminal activities and determination of the perpetrators. . . In contrast, investigative acts reasonably related to decisions whether or not to begin or to carry on a particular criminal prosecution, or to defend a conviction, are shielded by absolute immunity when done by prosecutors. To be sure, as the Supreme Court cautioned in Buckley, even the presence of probable cause 'does not guarantee a prosecutor absolute immunity from liability for all actions taken afterwards.'. . Such acts are shielded by absolute immunity only when they are of a kind reasonably related to the ordinary functions of a prosecutor with such probable cause. Viewed through the eyes of a reasonable prosecutor, appellants' acts in the present case were well within their legitimate functions as prosecutors. Monserrate had been arrested prior to appellants' interview of appellee. Once the arrest took place, legal decisions at the core of the prosecutorial function—pursuit of the charges, arraignment, bail, etc.—had to be made by appellants and made quickly. The interview of appellee was clearly in a 'pending or in preparation [of] a court proceeding in which the prosecutor acts as an advocate.'. .Appellee was obviously an important witness with regard to the proceeding against Monserrate. That she claimed her injuries resulted from an accident hardly weighed against interviewing her. Viewing the circumstances objectively, her claim that her injuries were the result of an accident might well cause a reasonable prosecutor to believe that interrogation was even more necessary than would have been the case in more common circumstances. A reasonable prosecutor easily could—should—have viewed a first-hand interview and personal weighing of the credibility of appellee's self-propelled-shattering-glass story as necessary. While questioning an important witness may accurately be described as investigative, appellants' interview was an integral part of appellants' advocatory function as prosecutors protected by absolute immunity."); Flagler v. Trainor, 663 F.3d 543, 548, 549 (2d Cir. 2011) ("Seeking a material witness order is within the prosecutor's 'function' as an advocate. A prosecutor employs prosecutorial discretion when determining whether to seek such an order. . . It is an act 'intimately associated' with presenting the State's case. The material witness order ensures the attendance of a 'material' witness at trial, which often makes or breaks the prosecutor's case. Nevertheless, Flagler argues that the Third and Ninth Circuits have denied absolute prosecutorial immunity for wrongdoing in connection with prosecutorial functions. Flagler, however, fails to recognize that the wrongdoing in those cases was either administrative in nature or akin to the function of law enforcement officers in protecting the public safety by making a complaint of wrongdoing. Therefore, notwithstanding Flagler's arguments to the contrary, we find Trainor absolutely immune for making alleged false statements in support of a material witness order and warrant.") [footnotes omitted]

See also Fields v. Wharrie, 740 F.3d 1107, 1113, 1114 (7th Cir. 2014) (Fields II) ("Wharrie is asking us to bless a breathtaking injustice. Prosecutor, acting pre-prosecution as an investigator, fabricates evidence and introduces the fabricated evidence at trial. The innocent victim of the fabrication is prosecuted and convicted and sent to prison for 17 years. On Wharrie's interpretation of our decision in Buckley, the prosecutor is insulated from liability because his fabrication did not cause the defendant's conviction, and by the time that same prosecutor got around to violating the defendant's right he was absolutely immunized. So: grave misconduct by the government's lawyer at a time where he was not shielded by absolute immunity; no remedy whatsoever for the hapless victim. . . . A prosecutor cannot retroactively immunize himself from conduct by perfecting his wrong-doing through introducing the fabricated evidence at trial and arguing that the tort was not completed until a time at which he had acquired absolute immunity. That would create a 'license to lawless conduct,' which the Supreme Court has said that qualified immunity is not to do. . . .So Wharrie has not demonstrated an entitlement to absolute immunity—nor to qualified immunity for the fabrication, either. For it was established law by 1985 (indeed long before), when the fabrication is alleged to have occurred, that a government lawyer's fabricating evidence against a criminal defendant was a violation of due process. See Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264, 269 (1959); Pyle v. Kansas, 317 U.S. 213, 21516 (1942); Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103, 110, 112–13 (1935) (per curiam). It is true that the cases we've just cited involved not merely the fabrication, but the introduction of the fabricated evidence at the criminal defendant's trial. For if the evidence hadn't been used against the defendant, he would not have been harmed by it, and without a harm there is, as we noted earlier, no tort. But when the question is whether to grant immunity to a public employee, the focus is on his conduct, not on whether that conduct gave rise to a tort in a particular case. . . .So notice the disjunction: the immunity depends on the official's acts; the existence of a cause of action depends on the illegality of those acts and on whether an injury results, because, to repeat, no injury—no tort."); Fields v. Wharrie, 740 F.3d 1107, 1117-24 (7th Cir. 2014) (Fields II) (Sykes, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("To the extent that the § 1983 and state-law claims against Wharrie are based on his alleged coercion of the false statement from Sumner, absolute immunity does not apply. That act took place before there was probable cause to arrest Fields—that is, before the judicial process began—and was not functionally prosecutorial, so Wharrie cannot claim to be absolutely immune from suit for damages. . .But Wharrie remains protected by qualified immunity. . . . The Supreme Court's decision in Buckley addressed only absolute prosecutorial immunity; the Court did not have occasion to decide the qualified-immunity question. That is, the Court did not decide whether coercing or otherwise inducing a witness to give a false statement during a criminal investigation violates clearly established constitutional rights. But we decided that very question when the Supreme Court returned Buckley to this court for further proceedings. In our decision on remand in Buckley, we held that coercing or otherwise soliciting a witness to falsely incriminate a suspect during a criminal investigation does not violate any established constitutional rights—except perhaps the rights of the witness who is coerced. . . If the suspect is charged, then failing to disclose the false statement's corrupt origins at trial violates his due-process right to a fair trial under the rule of Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), and knowingly using perjured testimony to convict him is a more general violation of his due-process right to a fair trial. . . But a prosecutor who commits these acts or omissions at trial is functioning quintessentially as a prosecutor, so under well-established immunity law, he is absolutely immune from suit for damages under § 1983. . . In contrast, a prosecutor who coerces or otherwise procures a false statement from a witness during an investigation, before probable cause exists and the judicial process has begun, is not protected by absolute immunity, but he is entitled to qualified immunity because his conduct does not violate clearly established constitutional rights. . . In our earlier opinion in this case, we relied on this qualified-immunity holding from Buckley as an alternative basis for finding Wharrie and Kelley immune from suit under § 1983 for their solicitation of false statements from Hawkins and Langston. . . . Our alternative holding in Fields I followed the rule, established in Buckley, that even if a prosecutor participates in securing a false statement from a witness during a criminal investigation, his 'absolutely immunized prosecutorial decision to proceed to trial and introduce the [witness's] testimony' forecloses suit against him; there is no independently cognizable due-process claim for his investigative misconduct. . . Three months after we issued our opinion in Fields I, a new decision of this court, Whitlock v. Brueggemann, 682 F.3d 567 (7th Cir.2012), unsettled Buckley (and by extension, unsettled Fields I as well), which led the district court to do an about-face on remand in this case. Wharrie's new appeal requires us to decide whether Whitlock and Buckley can be reconciled. I think the answer is plainly 'no.'. . . I appreciate the force of stare decisis; we should try to harmonize the two cases if we can. With respect, however, harmonization is impossible. Whitlock and Buckley are factually indistinguishable and legally irreconcilable. They cannot both be the law. We must decide which one is correct. . . . For my part, I think Buckley is correct and Whitlock should be reconsidered. Because mine is the minority view here, any reconsideration of Whitlock must await a petition for rehearing en banc, which Wharrie may choose to pursue or forego. For the record, I'll briefly sketch the conceptual difficulty Whitlock has introduced, which I believe warrants the full court's attention. . . . Common-law causation analysis cannot be used to transform an act that does not violate the Constitution into one that does. That, in essence, is the effect of Whitlock. It turns the prosecutor's nonactionable investigative misconduct into an actionable constitutional wrong by recharacterizing it as a subsidiary 'cause' of a due-process violation that occurs later at trial but is absolutely immunized. . . . A prosecutor who coerces a witness to falsely incriminate a suspect during a criminal investigation breaches no constitutional duty owed to the suspect. If the suspect is charged, then suborning perjury against him at trial would violate his due-process rights—so too would withholding evidence about the coercion of the witness. But these are trial rights, and a prosecutor's violation of them is absolutely immunized. The prosecutor's investigative misconduct cannot independently support a due-process claim; that conduct violates no due-process duty. . . . The specific conduct in question here—inducing a witness to tell a lie during an investigation—is clearly wrong, but it does not violate any constitutional rights. . . . No one doubts that wrongful convictions are unjust; a person who is convicted and punished for a crime he did not commit has a serious moral claim to a compensatory remedy. Usually the law provides one, commonly in the form of a Brady claim against the officers who were involved in suppressing exculpatory evidence during the prosecution. It's possible that in some cases the effect of absolute immunity—or the combined effect of absolute and qualified immunity—might leave a wrongly convicted person without an actionable damages claim against any of the wrongdoers. I could be wrong, but I don't think that happens very often. Prosecutors do not work alone, and if the police officers working with them withhold exculpatory information about coerced or fabricated evidence, the aggrieved defendant will have a good § 1983 claim against the officers for violation of Brady. The Brady duty is well established, and the claim against the officers is available regardless of whether the prosecutor participated in the 'creation' of the fabricated evidence or the cover-up at trial or both. That basically describes this case. . . . Although a complicit prosecutor escapes civil liability for damages, he remains subject to criminal prosecution and professional discipline for his misdeeds; he is not immune from these consequences for his misconduct. . . . Although Wharrie's alleged wrongdoing may go unredressed via a federal damages remedy against him, Fields has an ongoing § 1983 claim against the police officers who were allegedly complicit in withholding exculpatory evidence about the circumstances surrounding Sumner's false statement. In sum, applying Buckley requires a conclusion that Wharrie is entitled to qualified immunity for his investigative misconduct. . . . I would reconsider Whitlock, restore Buckley, and reverse with instructions to dismiss the § 1983 claim against Wharrie."); Whitlock v. Brueggemann, 682 F.3d 567, 580-86 (7th Cir. 2012) ("As the Supreme Court suggested in Saucier v. Katz, 553 U.S. 194 (2001), we will take up first the question whether the plaintiffs have identified a violation of their constitutional rights, and we will then consider whether the law was clearly established such that any reasonable person should have known what was required. We have consistently held that a police officer who manufactures false evidence against a criminal defendant violates due process if that evidence is later used to deprive the defendant of her liberty in some way. . . .The only question is whether a prosecutor who is acting in an investigatory capacity is subject to rules that are any different. We think not. A prosecutor who manufactures evidence when acting in an investigatory role can cause a due process violation just as easily as a police officer. The fact that the prosecutor who introduces the evidence at trial cannot be liable for the act of introduction, whether it is the same prosecutor who fabricated the evidence or a different prosecutor, is beside the point. . . . McFatridge enjoys absolute immunity for anything that happened at trial, of course. We thus focus exclusively on the legal question whether coercing witnesses to perjure themselves during the investigatory phase of a case can give rise to an actionable due process violation against a prosecutor. McFatridge's error is to assume that because a prosecutor acting in a prosecutorial capacity cannot be liable for the act of introducing perjured testimony (because of the protection of absolute immunity), he cannot be liable while acting in an investigatory capacity for creating false testimony. The only wrong, he argues, is the one that occurred at trial and thus any fabrication in which he participated is beyond the reach of the law. . . . Here, the plaintiffs have properly alleged that the act of fabrication caused a harm to them: the fabricated evidence, because it was introduced against them at trial, was instrumental in their convictions. . . . Thus, a prosecutor whose investigatory conduct is the proximate cause of the due process violation that occurs when the false evidence is introduced at trial is held to the same standard of liability as a police officer who does the same thing. . . . We conclude, in summary, that the plaintiffs have asserted claims that, if proven, would demonstrate a violation of their constitutional rights, and thus they have satisfied the first step of Saucier and Pearson . . . .We turn therefore to the second issue, which is the one on which the district court focused: whether the 'right to due process that the plaintiffs claim' was clearly established before February 19, 1987, the date of their conviction. . . . Significantly, all courts that have directly confronted the question before us agree that the deliberate manufacture of false evidence contravenes the Due Process Clause. . . . Our decision to deny qualified immunity under the unusual circumstances presented by this case should not deter prosecutors from engaging in legitimate investigatory work. Qualified immunity remains an important shield that protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . Furthermore, the plaintiff bears the burden of alleging in the complaint 'enough factual matter' to supply 'plausible grounds' to infer that absolute immunity has not yet attached, that the prosecutor knowingly fabricated evidence, that the evidence was later used against the plaintiff at her criminal trial, and that it was material enough to have caused a wrongful conviction. . . . Finally, and in some ways most importantly, these claims cannot be brought at all unless and until a criminal defendant is able to secure a dismissal or reversal of his criminal conviction."); Fields v. Wharrie, 672 F.3d 505, 512-16 (7th Cir. 2012) (Fields I)("Prosecutors do not function as advocates before probable cause to arrest a suspect exists. . . If a prosecutor plants evidence before someone is arrested, he enjoys only qualified immunity. . . . Yet, for that same fabrication of evidence, if he commits the act during a judicial proceeding, he receives absolute immunity. . . The question before us, then, is whether, once judicial proceedings have been initiated, the trial prosecutor, who fabricates evidence after the trial, ceases to function in a prosecutorial manner once he is no longer the specific prosecutor handling the appeal or retrial.In Partee, we answered this question affirmatively. . . . The Supreme Court's reasoning in Van de Kamp, however, suggests that a prosecutor's direct participation in an appeal or retrial is no longer dispositive of his right to absolute immunity. The Court's hypothetical conferred absolute immunity upon a prosecutor's colleagues and supervisors—who may not have been directly involved in his particular case—for their failure to satisfy their disclosure obligations under Giglio . . . and Brady. . . .The Court did not explicitly state that the colleagues and supervisors had any individual Brady or Giglio obligations. . . That is, it did not expressly instruct us that every individual prosecutor in an office owes a Brady or Giglio obligation to a defendant solely due to his employment in the office, regardless of whether or not he is involved in that defendant's prosecution. Yet, for purposes of the hypothetical, the Court assumed that the supervisors and office prosecutors in question had Brady and Giglio obligations to the defendant and suggested that, insofar as these disclosure responsibilities existed, absolute immunity applied. Hence, Brady and Giglio duties are functionally prosecutorial—they are intimately related to the judicial phase of the criminal process. . . . While other state actors, like the police, share the prosecutor's constitutional obligation to disclose exculpatory evidence to the defendant, the prosecutor owes a distinct, if not heightened, disclosure obligation to the defendant once judicial proceedings commence. . . . One might argue that since we allow civil suits against police officers for causing

Brady violations, . . . failure to fulfill due process in this manner is not a functionally prosecutorial action. In our view, however, a Brady violation is not committed unless and until a prosecutor, in the course of preparing for or conducting a trial or direct appeal, does not turn over the material evidence in question. . . Brady and Giglio violations breach a defendant's trial rights and are, thus, inherently prosecutorial in nature. Allowing a police officer to be sued for his role in eventually causing the prosecutor to violate Brady or Giglio does not alter the nature of the violation. We recognize that this analysis allows for police officers to potentially incur financial liability where a prosecutor may not, even though the prosecutor and the police officers may both fabricate or suppress evidence. Herein lies the rub: absolute immunity doctrine focuses on whether the nature of the action is prosecutorial, not the fact that the actor is a prosecutor; Brady and its progeny, by contrast, elevate the prosecutor—qua prosecutor—as ultimately responsible for fulfilling the State's obligation to provide fair process. . . Under Brady, the office of prosecutor entails a special duty to 'get it right.' Perhaps counterintuitively, this heightened duty carries with it greater immunity from financial liability. Yet, so long as we view Brady and Giglio as distinct versions of the right to due process, and the prosecutor as responsible for ensuring Brady and Giglio compliance, we must also recognize that in fulfilling this responsibility, the prosecutor acts as an officer of the court embroiled in the judicial phase of the criminal process . . . . Our immunity analysis, therefore, must focus not only on whether a prosecutor is actively participating on a trial team when he suppresses material evidence, but also on whether he owes a continuing Brady or Giglio obligation to the defendant in question. If he does, he functions as a prosecutor when he commits the suppression. . . .A prosecutor's Brady and Giglio duties may survive the conclusion of a trial. . . . Accordingly, a prosecutor's Brady and Giglio obligations remain in full effect on direct appeal and in the event of retrial because the defendant's conviction has not yet become final, and his right to due process continues to demand judicial fairness. . . . The district court suggests that because Wharrie was preparing for other trials and no longer directly involved in Fields' appeal or retrial, this fact wrests from him his prosecutorial function. We disagree. As the original prosecutor on the case, Wharrie had a continuing Brady obligation to reveal material evidence to the defense until Fields' conviction became final, as the ongoing judicial process continued to evolve. . . .[H]e was not fully divorced from Fields' judicial proceedings until all direct judicial remedies were exhausted and Fields' conviction became final. It follows that the immunity attendant to his prosecutorial disclosure obligation survives his departure from the courtroom as well."); Starks v. City of Waukegan, 123 F.Supp.3d 1036, 1047-50 (N.D. Ill. 2015) ("Fields's remarking 'the fabrication of evidence harmed the defendant before and not just during the trial, because it was used to help indict him,' 740 F.3d at 1112, does not establish that a plaintiff can maintain a § 1983 suit based solely on the use of fabricated evidence or testimony to procure an indictment. That passage in Fields, which did not cite Rehberg, explicitly relied on Julian v. Hanna, 732 F.3d 842, 846–47 (7th Cir.2013), which involved a malicious prosecution claim—a federal malicious prosecution claim, which was allowed because Indiana law was found not to provide an adequate remedy under the circumstances of that case. . . And malicious prosecution, of course, is all about the baseless initiation of criminal proceedings—unlike the due process clause. . . Furthermore, that passage from Fields appears in a hypothetical in which a prosecutor, acting in an investigative capacity, fabricates evidence that a second prosecutor then uses to obtain a conviction. . . The hypothetical thus explicitly involved the introduction of fabricated evidence at trial; the question was whether the first prosecutor—the one who fabricated the evidence but then dropped out of the case—could be held liable for the fabrication. Fields answered 'yes.'. . But nowhere did Fields question the requirement that the fabricated evidence must be introduced at trial; to the contrary, it reaffirmed that requirement. . . Likewise, citing that passage from Fields, Armstrong reasoned that an eventually acquitted defendant is still deprived of his liberty if he is imprisoned awaiting trial, and therefore that if police irretrievably destroy (as opposed to merely suppress) exculpatory evidence, the defendant may have a viable Brady claim. . .This passage from Armstrong is inapposite, for it involved the destruction of evidence and not fabricated grand jury testimony. Moreover, Armstrong reaffirmed that a viable Whitlock claim requires the fabricated evidence to have been introduced at trial . . . . In any event, because the Seventh Circuit has not circulated to the full court under Circuit Rule 40(e) the question whether Alexander should be overruled, it cannot be understood in Fields or Armstrong to have silently overruled the requirement that a faulty photo array must taint the trial in order for it to give rise to a due process violation. . . without so much as citing it. . . . For these reasons, Starks cannot maintain his § 1983 claim against Juarez based on his grand jury testimony about the victim's photo identification. . . . There admittedly is tension between Sornberger and Whitlock . If, as Whitlock holds, a police officer violates due process by fabricating testimony for other witnesses to deliver in court, why should the officer escape liability if he gives the false testimony himself? Either way, the defendant suffers the same harm. But the same tension exists in the grand jury context, where the Supreme Court—recognizing that, as here, absolute immunity does not 'extend[ ] to all activity that a witness conducts outside of the grand jury room'—has nonetheless held that immunity 'may not be circumvented by ... refram[ing] a claim to attack the preparation instead of the absolutely immune actions themselves.'. . .The important point, however, is that Whitlock did not purport to overrule Sorenberger, which remains good law in the Seventh Circuit and, being squarely on point . . . decides the issue here. . . Therefore, Biang's allegedly false recounting of his own conversation with Starks cannot, under governing Seventh Circuit precedent, serve as the basis for a due process claim under § 1983. Nor can his allegedly false report, since it was never used against Starks during the criminal proceedings. Waukegan Defendants are therefore entitled to summary judgment on Starks's federal due process claim.").

See also Bledsoe v. Vanderbilt, 934 F.3d 1112, 1119 n.4 (10th Cir. 2019) ("To be sure, if an investigating prosecutor 'fabricates evidence and puts that fabricated evidence in a drawer, making no further use of it, then the officer has not violated due process.'. . But that is not quite how Plaintiff's case unfolded. Rather, Defendant Vanderbilt allegedly fabricated evidence against Plaintiff and then did make further use of it at trial to secure Plaintiff's wrongful conviction. And in our circuit, the effect of that procedural nuance is unclear. Does it mean that Plaintiff alleges valid causes of action because Defendant Vanderbilt's act of fabrication was a 'but-for and proximate cause' of Plaintiff's wrongful conviction (and therefore a constitutional violation)? . . . Or is that procedural nuance irrelevant because, as Defendant Vanderbilt argues, his use of the fabricated evidence at trial is what actually harmed Plaintiff and thus the only conduct upon which Plaintiff can establish valid causes of action? Some courts have gone the former route and concluded that a prosecutor's act of fabricating evidence during the preliminary investigation of a crime can serve as the basis for a valid cause of action in certain circumstances. [citing Fields, McGhee, and Zahrey] Other courts have gone the latter route in similar—but not identical—circumstances and concluded that a plaintiff is simply 'without recourse.' [citing Michaels and Buckley II] For the reasons we describe in more detail later on, . . . we do not express any opinion on the correct path in this specific case or any others like it. We simply mention these possibilities for the benefit of any future court that must delve into this issue.")

See also Cousins v. Lockyer , 568 F.3d 1063, 1069 (9th Cir. 2009) ("[T]o the extent Cousins faults the AG for failing to maintain an institutionalized information system for tracking all California appellate decisions with a direct bearing on individual prisoners' convictions. . . , the Supreme Court has indicated that, even if properly characterized as an attack on an office's administrative procedures, such a challenge does not strip a supervising prosecutor of absolute immunity."); Atherton v. District of Columbia Office of Mayor, 567 F.3d 672, 686, 687 (D.C. Cir. 2009) ("In sum, it is clear that Bailey-Jones was performing administrative/managerial functions when she dismissed Atherton from the Superior Court grand jury. The District has failed to meet its burden to show that the acts performed by Bailey-Jones were quasi-judicial functions that were functionally comparable to those of a judge. Therefore, the District Court erred in dismissing Atherton's claims against Bailey-Jones on the ground that she is entitled to absolute immunity. . . . Simply because a prosecutor's conduct is connected with the grand jury does not make it advocatory. Prosecutorial immunity undoubtedly may extend to cover prosecutors' conduct before grand juries . . . . In this case, however, Zachem was not the AUSA who was presenting evidence to the grand jury. He was the supervising AUSA who was called in to address complaints raised by members of the grand jury who were allegedly annoyed with Atherton's behavior during grand jury deliberations. . . . This determination is not inconsistent with the Supreme Court's recent decision in Van de Kamp v. Goldstein . . . . It is plain that the Court's analysis in Van de Kamp is inapposite here. In this case, Zachem's alleged activities–improperly removing a grand juror on the basis of his ethnicity and/or for the content and quality of his deliberations–had nothing to do with a prosecutor's preparation for or participation in a criminal trial. In sum, Zachem is not entitled to absolute immunity because the activities for which he is being sued do not relate to his performance as an advocate for the government."); Bertuglia v. City of New York, 839 F.Supp.2d 703, 732-33 (S.D.N.Y. 2012) ("Whether the ADA defendants already had made the decision to seek an indictment when they issued the first subpoenas and began conducting interviews in this case, and could therefore be considered to be preparing to present their case to the grand jury and initiate a prosecution, rather than investigating whether any criminality existed, is a factual dispute that cannot be resolved on this motion. Indeed, the parties dispute as a factual matter whether a grand jury had been convened by the return date of some of the subpoenas at issue. Accordingly, the record is insufficient to determine whether the ADAs' actions prior to the convening of the grand jury are protected by absolute immunity. . . . The next issue is whether the ADA defendants' activities in conducting interviews and subpoenaing witnesses after the grand jury had been convened were entitled to absolute immunity. These actions were plainly taken in the ADA defendants' roles as advocates, because they were in the process of gathering and presenting evidence to the grand jury. . . .Accordingly, based on the pleadings, the ADA defendants' actions in issuing subpoenas and interviewing potential grand jury witnesses after the convening of a grand jury constituted advocacy, were protected by absolute immunity, and cannot serve as the basis for a claim in this case."); Lawlor v. Connelly, No. 3:10-cv-1282 (JCH), 2011 WL 1740178, at *5, *6, *8,*9 (D. Conn. May 5, 2011) ("In sum, a prosecutor's role in preparing and filing an application for an investigatory jury pursuant to Conn. Gen.Stat. § 54-47c is akin to the court-related advocacy functions that have been recognized to be protected by absolute immunity. . . . Second Circuit precedent supports application of absolute immunity to conduct before a grand jury, regardless of whether that grand jury is engaged in an investigation or issuing an indictment. . . . The investigatory grand jury proceeding at issue here is closely tied to the judicial phase of criminal proceedings and to the initiation of prosecution. . . . In sum, because a prosecutor is entitled to absolute immunity for claims relating to his presentation of evidence to a grand jury, . . . and more generally for conduct in preparation for 'the initiation of judicial proceedings or for trial, and which occur in the course of his role as an advocate for the State,' Buckley, 509 U.S. at 273, Connelly is entitled to absolute immunity from Lawlor's claims based on his failure to disclose exculpatory evidence to the investigatory grand jury. . . . The Complaint alleges that, after the grand jury investigation, Connelly failed to disclose exculpatory information to the prosecutor assigned to litigate the state's case against Lawlor. . . The Supreme Court's unanimous decision in Van de Kamp v. Goldstein, 129 S.Ct. 862 (2009), makes clear that Connelly is entitled to absolute immunity on any claim arising from this conduct. . . .The hypothetical case considered in Van de Kamp is precisely the one before the court. Lawlor alleges that Connelly ought to have disclosed the exculpatory Brady material after the matter was transferred to a colleague for prosecution. . . At that point, the prosecutors were clearly preparing for litigation of criminal charges, and their decisions about what information to disclose is clearly protected by absolute immunity.").

Compare Smith v. Burge, 222 F.Supp.3d 669, 695-96 (N.D. Ill. 2016) ("As the Court has already concluded, Defendants are not protected by qualified immunity in relation to Plaintiff's Brady claim. Nonetheless, Defendant Kelly argues that Brady violations are inherently prosecutorial, and thus he is protected by absolute immunity. Indeed, once a case passes the investigative stage and the prosecutors start preparing for trial, failure to turn over exculpatory evidence is subject to absolute immunity. . . Plaintiff's claims against Defendant Kelly, however, concern Defendant Kelly's misconduct during the investigatory stage of the proceedings, as well as his conspiratorial conduct unrelated to the prosecution of Plaintiff's claims. The Court further notes that Defendant Kelly was not the trial prosecutor. As such, this argument is without merit.") with Kitchen v. Burge, 781 F.Supp.2d 721, 732 (N.D. Ill. 2011) ("Under Van de Kamp Lukanich and Eannace are entitled to prosecutorial immunity for their alleged post-trial suppression of exculpatory evidence. Although Lukanich and Eannace were no longer prosecutors on the case, they were colleagues of the prosecutors who had been assigned to work on the appellate phase of Kitchen's case. As Van de Kamp's hypothetical illustrates, immunity extends to a prosecutor's colleagues and supervisors, without regard to 'the pattern of liability among prosecutors within a single office.'").

Compare Livermore v. Arnold, No. 10-507-B-M2, 2011 WL 693569, at *5-*7 & n.11 (M.D. La. Jan. 20, 2011) ("Considering that the only way to impose Section 1983 liability against a District Attorney's office is pursuant to a Monell custom/policy claim and that the plaintiff's claims against Perrilloux and Peever, in their official capacities, are to be treated as claims against the District Attorney's office, the only remaining Section 1983 claim for the undersigned to consider is plaintiff's Monell custom/policy claim against the DA's office (i.e., the plaintiff's claim that Perrilloux, as the final policymaker for the D.A.'s office, has implemented an unconstitutional policy of prosecuting all misdemeanor charges without investigation and regardless of whether they have merit). . . . The Western District of Louisiana, in Johnson, faced the precise issue before the Court herein relative to Perrilloux's official capacity liability– whether the Supreme Court's holding in Van de Kamp concerning failure to supervise and train claims mandates the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint insofar as it asserts a Monell claim against the District Attorney's Office (i.e., against the district attorney in his official capacity). . . . Perrilloux argues that the plaintiffs have failed to state a claim against him in his official capacity because he is entitled to absolute immunity under an extension of Imbler's and Van de Kamp's policies to official capacity claims. However, as with the DA defendants in Johnson, he is unable to point to any cases from a superior court in which a Monell claim against a District Attorney's office has been expressly dismissed on the basis of absolute immunity. . . . This Court also recognizes the uncertainty created by Van de Kamp and the debate over whether municipal liability under Section 1983 is consistent with the doctrine of absolute immunity but agrees with the Western District of Louisiana that there is no binding authority from a superior court holding that the doctrine of absolute immunity applies to Monell claims and that it is inappropriate to speculate as to whether the doctrine will ultimately be expanded beyond its present scope to official capacity claims. Accordingly, because of the lack of any binding authority supporting the argument that Perrilloux is entitled to absolute immunity concerning the plaintiffs' official capacity Monell claim, the plaintiffs may proceed against him on that claim to the extent they have otherwise stated a claim upon which relief may be granted under Monell. . . . What plaintiffs' claim boils down to is an allegation that the District Attorney's Office has a policy of prosecuting all misdemeanors without first investigating them to determine whether they have merit. Thus, the constitutional violation alleged is a failure to investigate prior to initiating and proceeding with misdemeanor prosecutions. The Fifth Circuit has specifically recognized that a claim 'that [a] prosecutor failed to investigate is not of constitutional dimension' because '[t]here is no such due process right.'. . Thus, even though Perrilloux is not entitled to absolute immunity with respect to plaintiffs' Monell claim, such claim should nevertheless be dismissed for failure to state a claim pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). . . . [E]ven if plaintiffs' Monell claim was not subject to dismissal because of the failure to allege a constitutional violation, it would also be subject to dismissal because the plaintiff has failed to specifically allege a pattern of constitutional violations caused by the alleged general policy (such as any other cases where misdemeanors were prosecuted by the 21st Judicial District D.A.'s office without investigating whether the charges had merit), as required when proceeding under a policymaker theory of

liability."); Gearin v. Rabbett, No. 10-CV-2227 (PJS/AJB), 2011 WL 317728, at *7, *8 & n.8 (D. Minn. Jan. 28, 2011) ("Although the Eighth Circuit does not appear to have addressed the question of whether a prosecutor's immunity from § 1983 claims extends to municipalities, . . . the Eighth Circuit has held that defendants who were functionally similar to prosecutors and judges did not enjoy absolute immunity from claims brought against them in their official capacities. . . There is thus substantial authority for the proposition that prosecutorial immunity does not extend to municipalities. The contrary decisions cited by the City–four district-court cases from the 1980s–are not persuasive. Notably, two of those four decisions are from New York federal district courts and thus were overruled by the Second Circuit's decision in Pinaud v. County of Suffolk, 52 F.3d 1139 (2d Cir.1995). The Court therefore concludes that Kantrud's immunity does not extend to the City. . . . [T]he Eighth Circuit has held that, when a plaintiff attempts to pin Pembaur-type liability on a municipality by arguing that the prosecutor is a policymaker, the prosecutor's immunity also shields the municipality. Patterson v. Von Riesen, 999 F.2d 1235, 1238 n. 2 (8th Cir.1993) ("Because of the prosecutors' absolute immunity, Patterson cannot attach liability to the decision in question, and, thus, even if the policy was county policy, Patterson still may not recover damages.") . . . . [T]he Court reads Patterson to hold only that a plaintiff cannot state a Monell claim by alleging that a prosecutor was acting as a policymaker when performing functions protected by absolute prosecutorial immunity."); Johnson v. Louisiana, No. 09-55, 2010 WL 996475, at *11, *12 (W.D. La. Mar. 16, 2010) ("The parties join issue on whether the Supreme Court's holding in Van de Kamp mandates the dismissal of Johnson's complaint insofar as it asserts a Monell claim against the District Attorney's Office. The District Attorney's Office concedes that the Supreme Court addressed only the individual capacity claims asserted by the plaintiff in Van de Kamp, but argues no distinction should be made and that the Supreme Court's ruling in Van de Kamp mandates dismissal of Johnson's Monell claims. . . . The Court's conclusion that absolute immunity does not extend to Monell claims is supported by the exacting requirements a plaintiff must establish in order to recover for a claim based on the policymaker's failure to take affirmative action . . . . Absent a pattern of similar constitutional deprivations, a plaintiff will prevail only where the need for training or other affirmative action 'is so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the [District Attorney's Office] can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . A need for training or other affirmative action 'is considered sufficiently obvious only where the deprivation of constitutional rights is a "highly predictable consequence" of the training deficiency.'. . . Accordingly, the Court finds that District Attorney Davis and District Attorney Burkett are not cloaked with the protection of absolute immunity insofar as Johnson asserts claims against them in their official capacity– claims which must be treated as Monell claims against the District Attorney's Office itself.") with Hatchett v. City of Detroit, 714 F.Supp.2d 708, 726 & n.6 (E.D. Mich. 2010) ("The court is unaware of any binding authority extending a municipality's training duty to professionally educated and degreed employees, such as prosecutors. . . As Justice O'Connor indicated, a municipality's duty to train arises in two circumstances. The first arises when (1) a clear constitutional duty governs particular employees (e.g., police officers) who are likely to face a certain situation and be called upon to act in a certain way (e.g., using deadly force while attempting to apprehend a fleeing felon), and (2) 'it is ... clear that failure to inform [them] of that duty will create an extremely high risk that constitutional violations will ensue.'. . It is the second of these two requirements that is absent in the case of professionally educated employees–particularly prosecutors, who at the time they are hired presumably are already aware of their constitutional duties by virtue of the fact that they have graduated from law school and passed the bar examination. A municipality need not train prosecutors about that which they already know, including their duties under Brady. . . . An exception might well exist if the municipality were aware that its prosecutors have repeatedly violated citizens' rights under Brady. In this event, a duty to train (or, more aptly, to retrain) could arise under the second circumstance identified by Justice O'Connor–namely, where there is a 'pattern of constitutional violations.'. . Plaintiff does not allege the existence of any such pattern of Brady violations in Macomb County.").

See also Dock v. State of Nevada, No. 2:10-cv-00275-RCJ-LRL, 2010 WL 5441642, at *5 (D. Nev. Dec. 28, 2010) ("The question remains whether immunity should stretch so far as to immunize a municipality itself for its alleged deliberate indifference in failing to train an assistant of the courts, such as a child protective services worker, simply because the latter enjoys immunity for the alleged unconstitutional acts. The Court finds that it does. Last year, the Supreme Court unanimously reversed the Ninth Circuit in holding that a district attorney's office enjoys absolute immunity against failure-to-train claims arising out of one of its attorney's prosecution-related actions. See Van de Ramp v. Goldstein, 129 S. Ct. 855, 862 (2009). The Van de Kamp Court noted that with respect to prosecution-related actions, an office's 'general methods of supervision and training' are not distinguishable from direct supervisory decisions. . .This is a commonsense ruling. If the rule were otherwise, a plaintiff could easily circumvent the immunity doctrines by suing a municipality directly and arguing it 'failed to train' the judge and/or prosecutor. The same reasoning applies to a child protective services worker acting in her investigative capacity. The Court therefore grants the motion to dismiss as to the second cause of action.")

See also Nazir v. County of Los Angeles, No. CV 10-06546 SVW ("GRx), 2011 WL 819081, at *8 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 2, 2011) ("Under Weiner, this Court joins the reasoning of the courts in Goldstein and Neri in concluding that the DA's Office in this case was a state actor when creating a procedure to place police officers on 'Brady Lists.' As discussed in Goldstein, Weiner extends to decisions on how to proceed with a prosecution. Furthermore, as discussed in Neri, evaluating a witness's credibility, determining what constitutes 'Brady Material,' and decisions on whether to use a police officer as a witness in the future, are prosecutorial functions. . . Having found that the alleged policymaker, the DA's Office, was a state actor in implementing the allegedly unconstitutional procedure, the Court holds that Plaintiff's allegations against the DA's Office are alleged against the state and are barred by Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . Further, as the state is the relevant actor, the County cannot be held liable for the allegedly unconstitutional procedures. . . Thus, the County's Motion is GRANTED and the County and the DA's Office, as entities, are DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE."); Neri v. County of Stanislaus Dist. Attorney's Office, No. 1:10-CV-823 AWI GSA, 2010 WL 3582575, at *8 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 10, 2010) ("Placing Neri's name on a Brady List, disclosing what the district attorneys considered to be Brady Material, and not utilizing objective criteria for Brady List determinations is conduct that requires witness evaluation, involves obligations imposed pursuant to the Supreme Court (Brady v. Maryland), requires the application of legal knowledge, and is associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process. . . As such, the acts of placing Neri's name on a Brady List and disclosing Brady Materials were acts done in a prosecutorial capacity; thus, the acts were done by those who were the agents of the State of California. . . The DAO, and the district attorneys who actually performed the conduct, are entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . Further, because the conduct at issue was on behalf of the State and not the County, no viable claims are alleged against the County.").

In Kalina v. Fletcher, 522 U.S. 118 (1997), the Supreme Court held, in a unanimous opinion, that a prosecutor who makes false statements of fact in an affidavit supporting an application for an arrest warrant, is entitled to qualified, rather than absolute, immunity. The Court explained:

> [P]etitioner's activities in connection with the preparation and filing of two of the three charging documents-the information and the motion for an arrest warrant-are protected by absolute immunity. Indeed, except for her act in personally attesting to the truth of the averments in the certification, it seems equally clear that the preparation and filing of the third document in the package was part of the advocate's function as well. . . . [W]e merely hold that § 1983 may provide a remedy for respondent insofar as petitioner performed the function of a complaining witness. We do not depart from our prior cases that have recognized that the prosecutor is fully protected by absolute immunity when performing the traditional functions of an advocate.

Id. at 129, 131.

See also Garmon v. Cty. of Los Angeles, 828 F.3d 837, 843-45 (9th Cir. 2016) ("Garmon argues that we should adopt a rule that absolute prosecutorial immunity is unavailable against claims of unindicted third-party witnesses. . . She cites no circuit court opinion adopting such a rule and we decline to do so here. . . .Construed in the light most favorable to Garmon, the operative complaint alleges three acts performed by Hanisee: issuing the subpoena duces tecum, drafting its supporting declaration and publicizing Garmon's medical records at trial to discredit her testimony. Garmon does not dispute that Hanisee is entitled to absolute immunity for performing the 'traditional functions of an advocate' when using Garmon's medical information at trial. See Kalina, 522 U.S. at 131. We conclude that Hanisee is absolutely immune for issuing the subpoena duces tecum, but that the district court erred in granting absolute immunity to Hanisee for the accompanying declaration. Hanisee is entitled to absolute immunity for issuing the subpoena duces tecum to Kaiser because a 'prosecutor gathering evidence is more likely to be performing a quasi-judicial advocacy function when the prosecutor is "organiz [ing], evaluat[ing], and marshaling

[that] evidence" in preparation for a pending trial, in contrast to the police-like activity of "acquiring evidence which might be used in a prosecution."'. . Although issuing a subpoena is necessarily an evidence-gathering action, here it was issued in preparation for evaluating and countering a defense witness's testimony. In light of the timing and context, it is clear that Hanisee's subpoena was directed at obtaining evidence in preparation for trial. Thus, absolute immunity properly applies to this act. . . However, the district court erred in concluding that Hanisee is entitled to absolute immunity for presenting a false statement in a declaration supporting her application for the subpoena duces tecum. In Kalina, the Supreme Court distinguished the preparation and filing of charging documents from the execution of a supporting certification 'under penalty of perjury,' holding that the latter is not protected by absolute immunity. . . .The circumstances here are similar to those in Kalina. Under California law, like Washington law as described in Kalina, the party filling out and issuing the subpoena need not be an attorney. . . Further, like the prosecutor in Kalina, Hanisee's declaration states particular facts under penalty of perjury, making her more akin to a witness than a prosecutor in this function. Thus, following Kalina, Hanisee is not entitled to absolute immunity for her declaration in support of the subpoena. In sum, the district court erred in concluding that Hanisee is absolutely immune from suit here. We conclude that she is entitled to absolute immunity for issuing the subpoena and using the medical records at trial, but to qualified immunity, at most, for her declaration. . . .An attorney supervising a trial prosecutor who is absolutely immune is also absolutely immune. Van de Kamp, 555 U.S. at 345–46. So are prosecutors who conducted 'general office supervision or office training.'. . 'But nothing in Van de Kamp permits us to grant a supervising prosecutor absolute immunity for supervising an activity that's not protected by absolute immunity under Imbler and its progeny.'. . Thus, Cooley is immune to the same extent as Hanisee."); Torres v. Goddard, 793 F.3d 1046, 1052, 1054-57 (9th Cir. 2015) ("We . . . hold that absolute immunity is available to prosecutors in the context of civil forfeiture proceedings. In doing so, we join every other circuit that has addressed this question. [collecting cases] Holmes's preparation of and application for seizure warrants is the civil forfeiture analog to the prosecutor's application for an arrest warrant in Kalina. These actions are likewise shielded by absolute immunity and may not form the basis of a claim for damages. . . . Because Holmes went beyond the 'traditional functions of an advocate' and 'carr[ied] out' the warrants, he was only entitled to the qualified immunity that a police officer would receive when doing so. . . .Serving and executing seizure warrants are the functions of police officers, not the 'traditional functions of an advocate,'. . . and thus under Kalina are functions that aren't protected by absolute immunity. We acknowledge that our application of the functional approach means that Holmes is entitled to absolute immunity with respect to some acts but not others, even though all of plaintiffs' claims are predicated on the same constitutional violation: seizure of their funds without probable cause. However, the result we reach is the 'essence of the function test' because absolute immunity is based on the nature of the function performed, not the underlying constitutional claim. . . Critically, if Holmes's service and execution of the warrants were acts protected by absolute immunity, we'd be faced with an 'incongruous' result where a prosecutor performing the function of a police officer would be entitled to absolute immunity merely because of his status as a prosecutor. . . Service of the self-executing seizure warrants merely carried out the command of the warrants; it wasn't a 'function[ ] that require[s] the exercise of prosecutorial discretion.'. . Extending absolute immunity to this type of police activity would be inconsistent with the distinction drawn by the Supreme Court in Kalina. . . We express no opinion as to whether Holmes is entitled to qualified immunity. Although defendants raised qualified immunity in their cross motion for summary judgment, the district court didn't reach the issue because it held that absolute immunity barred all of plaintiffs' claims. The parties did not brief the issue on appeal. We therefore remand to the district court to determine, in the first instance, whether Holmes's actions in serving and executing the warrants are protected by qualified immunity. If the district court determines that any of Holmes's actions aren't protected by qualified immunity, it must then go on to assess whether those unprotected acts (and only those acts) give rise to a cause of action for damages against Holmes under section 1983."); Olson v. Champaign Cnty., Ill., 784 F.3d 1093, 1103 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Employing the functional approach and applying the teachings of Kalina here, we conclude that Ziegler is not entitled to absolute immunity. He performed the same function as a police officer witness when he swore to facts. A police officer witness would not be entitled to absolute immunity for swearing to false information, so neither is Ziegler. His signature is below the following statement: 'The undersigned, being duly sworn, states upon information and belief that the facts set forth in the foregoing information are true.' It is irrelevant that his affidavit was not on a separate piece of paper. In signing that he stated 'upon information and belief that the facts set forth' were true, Ziegler converted that part of the information into his own affidavit.Ziegler resists this conclusion and tries to distinguish Kalina by arguing that he did not attest to the truth of the allegations in the information because he was empowered by state law to verify the information. Illinois law provides that 'an information shall be signed by the State's Attorney and sworn to by him or another.' 725 Ill. Comp. Stat. 5/111–3(b). This statute thus distinguishes between the signing of the information as a charging document, which 'shall' be done by the State's Attorney, and swearing to the facts, which may be done 'by him or another.' All this shows is that Illinois law tracks the distinction between the roles of initiating a prosecution and swearing to facts—two roles that the Supreme Court took great care to keep separate in Kalina. An Illinois prosecutor who complies with state law that 'an information shall be signed by the State's Attorney' is using her professional judgment. . . . A prosecutor who signs and files an information, but does not swear to any of the facts contained in it, is protected by absolute immunity because she is acting as an advocate of the State. But, as Kalina explains, a prosecutor does not act as an advocate when testifying to facts because her professional 'judgment could not affect the truth or falsity of the factual statements themselves.'. . Accordingly, when a prosecutor goes beyond signing the information to initiate the suit by swearing to the facts it contains, the attorney is no longer absolutely immune from suit."); Spivey v. Robertson, 197 F.3d 772, 775, 776 (5th Cir. 1999) ("We are presented in the instant case with an opportunity to clarify the effect of the Supreme Court's opinion in Kalina v. Fletcher . . . on the Fifth Circuit's decision in Hart v. O'Brien 127 F.3d 424. Both courts apply a functional approach to absolute immunity. . . . The courts differ, however, as to their analysis of the threshold timing of prosecutorial absolute immunity. In Hart, this court held that the earliest time that absolute immunity may attach to a prosecutor's activities is when charges are filed. Shortly after this court's opinion in Hart, the Supreme Court decided Kalina. In Kalina, the Supreme Court found that a prosecutor has absolute immunity when acting as an advocate in supplying legal advice to support an affidavit for an arrest warrant, unless that prosecutor personally attests to the truth of the evidence presented to a judicial officer, or exercises judgment going to the truth or falsity of evidence. Hart is in conflict with Kalina, because a prosecutor may select the facts to include in the certification prior to when charges are filed. The starting point must be earlier than the formal onset of judicial proceedings, at least encompassing preparatory moments. Kalina now governs when absolute immunity may apply, thus the district court erred in applying Hart's chronological analysis to the facts of the instant case. Hart is no longer valid law regarding the threshold timing for absolute immunity. . . . Under Kalina, a prosecutor acts as an advocate in supplying legal advice to support an affidavit for an arrest warrant and is entitled to absolute immunity as long as a prosecutor does not personally attest to the truth of the evidence presented to a judicial officer, or exercise judgment going to the truth or falsity of evidence. Because the prosecutors were acting as advocates in supplying legal advice based on facts provided by police officers to support an affidavit for an arrest warrant, the prosecutors in the instant case are absolutely immune."); Roberts v. Kling, 144 F.3d 710, 711 (10th Cir. 1998) (on remand) ("Assuming without deciding that Kling acted as a complaining witness in testifying to the truth of the statements contained within the criminal complaint, a role which would deny his conduct the protection of absolute immunity under Kalina, we nonetheless reaffirm our earlier decision that summary judgment was properly granted to Kling in this case. First, Kalina leaves untouched our affirmance of the district court's conclusion that Kling was entitled to absolute immunity for his actions in preparing a criminal complaint against Roberts and in seeking a warrant for her arrest. . . . The only remaining issue is whether Kling is entitled to qualified immunity for his execution of the criminal complaint, by which he affirmed the truth of the facts set forth in that document to the best of his information and belief. . . . [W]e agree with the district court that Roberts has not demonstrated that Kling violated clearly established law."); Springmen v. Williams, 122 F.3d 211, 212-14 (4th Cir. 1997) ("Absolute prosecutorial immunity does not rest. . . on the technicality of who signed charging documents. Rather, it protects decisions that are integrally related to the charging process, such as Williams' decision to approve the prosecution here. . . . The fact that in this case a police officer implemented the prosecutor's decision does nothing to change this conclusion. . . . The Supreme Court has recently granted certiorari in Fletcher v. Kalina . . . to further address the doctrine of absolute prosecutorial immunity. Fletcher deals with a claim of absolute immunity for executing an affidavit in support of an arrest warrant–conduct which is not at issue here."); Ireland v. Tunis, 113 F.3d 1435, 1450 (6th Cir. 1997) (investigator in prosecutor's office who vouched for the truth of the contents of the criminal complaint in front of a judicial officer entitled to qualified immunity); Kohl v. Casson, 5 F.3d 1141, 1146 (8th Cir.1993) ("[T]he function of seeking an arrest warrant is subject only to qualified immunity, not absolute immunity."; prosecutor who vouched for truth of arrest warrant affidavits is analogous to police officer in Malley).

In Ireland v. Tunis, 113 F.3d 1435, 1446-47 (6th Cir. 1997), the court explained:

> A prosecutor's decision to file a criminal complaint and seek an arrest warrant and the presentation of these materials to a judicial officer fall squarely within the aegis of absolute prosecutorial immunity. . . . Presenting the charging documents to a judicial > officer and procuring an arrest warrant must be considered part of the formal process of initiating a prosecution and securing the presence of the accused at trial. . . . Absolute prosecutorial immunity will likewise attach to administrative or investigative acts necessary for a prosecutor to initiate or maintain the criminal prosecution. . . . Nonetheless, when a prosecutor or other official switches from presenting the charging document to vouching personally for the truth of the contents of the document, we believe the protection afforded by absolute immunity must give way to a qualified immunity inquiry. . . . [W]e believe that the only level of protection from suit that is potentially available when an official vouches for the truth of the contents of a criminal complaint is qualified immunity.

See also Lacey v. Maricopa County, 693 F.3d 896, 913, 914 (9th Cir. 2012) (en banc) ("Wilenchik argues that he is entitled to absolute immunity for claims arising out of the issuance of the purported grand jury subpoenas and those arising out of the arrests. With regard to the subpoenas, Wilenchik cannot claim absolute immunity, although we think the issue is a close one. . . . Had Wilenchik followed Arizona law, his drafting of the grand jury subpoenas would likely have come within the shield of absolute immunity. . . . Even if Wilenchik's authoring of a grand jury subpoena might in another context be considered 'a vital part of the administration of criminal justice,' by avoiding judicial scrutiny, his actions were one step 'further removed from the judicial phase of criminal proceedings.'. . Where the prosecutor has side-stepped the judicial process, he has forfeited the protections the law offers to those who work within the process. . .Wilenchik is also not entitled to absolute immunity in connection with ordering or advising those making the arrests. Neither are prosecutorial functions. . . . The same logic also precludes Wilenchik from claiming immunity for playing other roles in the arrests, including ordering them. Such decisions entail the same determination. When a prosecutor orders or counsels warrantless arrests, he acts directly to deprive someone of liberty; he steps outside of his role as an advocate of the state before a neutral and detached judicial body and takes upon himself the responsibility of determining whether probable cause exists, much as police routinely do. Nothing in the procuring of immediate, warrantless arrests is so essential to the judicial process that a prosecutor must be granted absolute immunity."); Waggy v. Spokane County Washington, 594 F.3d 707, 713 (9th Cir. 2010) ("[W]e conclude that where a prosecutor submits a motion for a bench warrant to the court applying the law to facts alleged in supporting affidavits signed by witnesses, she is acting not in an investigative capacity, but instead as a judicial advocate before the court. This entitles her to absolute prosecutorial immunity from suit for civil rights claims arising from the discharge of her duties."); McGhee v. Pottawattamie County, Iowa, 547 F.3d 922, 933 (8th Cir. 2008) ("We find immunity does not extend to the actions of a County Attorney who violates a person's substantive due process rights by obtaining, manufacturing, coercing and fabricating evidence before filing formal charges, because this is not 'a distinctly prosecutorial function.' The district court was correct in denying qualified immunity to Hrvol and Richter for their acts before the filing of formal charges."), cert. dism'd, 130 S. Ct. 1047 (2010); Mink v. Suthers, 482 F.3d 1244, 1261, 1262 (10th Cir. 2007) ("[T]here is no bright line between advocacy and investigation. It is clear that a prosecutor's courtroom conduct falls on the advocacy side of the line. . . And it is equally clear that advocacy is not limited to filing criminal charges or arguing in the courtroom. . . Thus, especially when considering pre-indictment acts, it is important to consider other factors, such as (1) whether the action is closely associated with the judicial process, Burns, 500 U.S. at 495, (2) whether it is a uniquely prosecutorial function, id. at 491 n. 7, and (3) whether it requires the exercise of professional judgment, Kalina, 522 U.S. at 130. In sum, a prosecutor is entitled to absolute immunity for those actions that cast him in the role of an advocate initiating and presenting the government's case. Absolute immunity, however, does not extend to those actions that are investigative or administrative in nature, including the provision of legal advice outside the setting of a prosecution. . . . We now turn to whether absolute immunity applies to the deputy district attorney's review of the affidavit in support of the search warrant in Mink's case. For the following reasons, we conclude the district attorney was not wearing the hat of an advocate and, thus, is not entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity. . . . Here, the review of the affidavit squarely falls on the side of investigatory legal advice, and not advocacy before a judicial body. The deputy district attorney played no role in preparing the affidavit, nor was she involved in preparing, analyzing, and presenting pleadings to a court. If she were, this would be quite a different case. We acknowledge this conclusion is complicated by those cases where prosecutors have been absolutely immunized for drafting, filing, and arguing in support of an arrest or search warrant. . . . In those cases, however, the prosecutor was acting as an advocate–evaluating evidence, preparing pleadings, and appearing in court. It may be true that a lawyer's more active involvement in preparing a warrant application and presenting it in court will confer absolute immunity. But in this case the prosecutor's function was not that of an advocate; her function was to provide legal advice outside the courtroom to aid a nascent investigation. . . . Here, the prosecutor was not preparing her case. Accordingly, in these circumstances, immunity does not attach. The district attorney urges us to consider her reliance on Colorado law in support of a finding of absolute immunity. . . .As the district court correctly noted, however, a state statute–even one requiring affirmative action–cannot create immunity from a federal civil rights claim where the functional analysis suggests otherwise. . . And under the Supreme Court's functional analysis we look to what the attorney did–she provided legal advice–and not to what state law requires."); Genzler v. Longanbach, 410 F.3d 630, 639-41 (9th Cir. 2005) ("The timing of evidence gathering is a relevant fact in determining how closely connected that conduct is to the official's core advocacy function in the judicial process, and thus informs the inquiry into whether the official's conduct is protected by absolute immunity. The Supreme Court has held that when a witness is being coached at or during a break in trial, the prosecutor is protected by absolute immunity even if he or she is instructing the witness to lie. . . Longanbach and O'Brien rely on the timing of their meetings with Flanders to argue that they are entitled to absolute immunity. They point out that their meetings with Flanders occurred after Genzler's April 19 arrest, which Genzler concedes was based on probable cause. In Buckley, the Court held that '[a] prosecutor neither is, nor should consider himself to be, an advocate before he has probable cause to have anyone arrested.'. . But the Court in Buckley was careful to note that 'a determination of probable cause does not guarantee a prosecutor absolute immunity from liability for all actions taken afterwards. Even after that determination ... a prosecutor may engage in "police investigative work" that is entitled to only qualified immunity.'. . Thus, while interviews conducted before probable cause to arrest has been established are not protected by absolute immunity, the converse is not necessarily true. . . . Timing is thus a relevant, but not necessarily determinative, factor. . . . [J]ust as the existence of probable cause to arrest is not conclusive, we do not view the filing of the complaint as an event after which, by definition, all actions by the prosecutor and his staff are protected by absolute immunity."); KRL v. Moore, 384 F.3d 1105, 1111-14 (9th Cir. 2004) ("The Supreme Court has not addressed whether a prosecutor is entitled to absolute immunity when assisting with the acquisition of evidence pursuant to a post-indictment search warrant. We have concluded, however, that '[p]rosecutors are absolutely immune from liability for gathering additional evidence after probable cause is established or criminal proceedings have begun when they are performing a quasi-judicial function.'. . . We conclude that, to the extent the second search warrant sought evidence to prosecute the crimes charged in the indictment, Riebe's and Irey's review of the warrant prior to submission was intimately associated with the judicial process. Probable cause had been established by the grand jury, and the prosecutors' actions were directed at the upcoming trial. . . . Ensuring that evidence recovered pursuant to a post-indictment search warrant will be admissible at trial is no less the function of an advocate than deciding what evidence will be presented at trial. . . . Where a prosecutor has secured an indictment and begins to marshal evidence for trial, i.e., undertakes the second or third step in the process of obtaining a conviction, Malley implies that exposing a prosecutor to liability for his or her decisions at that later stage has a greater likelihood of interfering with the prosecutor's independent judgment. . . . Unlike in Burns, the prosecutors here did not serve as free-standing legal advisors to police officers. Rather, because probable cause had been established, and because an indictment had issued against Womack, they were performing a traditional function of an advocate for the State, namely, overseeing trial preparations. . . . Hall is also entitled to absolute immunity for his reliance on the second search warrant to gather evidence for the prosecution of Womack. Investigative activities carried out in preparation for a prosecutor's case may enjoy absolute immunity. . . . Because we focus on 'the nature of the function performed, not the identity of the actor who performed it,' . . .an investigator gathering evidence, a month after an indictment was filed, to prepare the prosecutor for trial is engaged in an advocacy function intimately associated with the judicial process, and is entitled to the same immunity that would be afforded a prosecutor. . . . The collateral investigation into whether KRL is permeated with fraud went beyond any legitimate preparation to prosecute Womack for any crime in the removal of the storage tank or for the other crimes charged in the indictment. Like advising officers about the existence of probable cause during the pretrial investigation,. . . approving a search warrant to assist with a collateral investigation into new crimes is an investigative function that is not entitled to absolute immunity. . . . We must emphasize that our result would not necessarily be the same had the prosecutors reviewed an arrest warrant, rather than a search warrant, prior to submission. . . . Here, because probable cause had not been established to prosecute anyone for conduct relating to the collateral investigation, the prosecutors did not serve as advocates in reviewing and approving the investigatory search warrant."); Bernard v. County of Suffolk, 356 F.3d 495, 498, 504 (2d Cir.

2004) ("We reverse with respect to the denial of absolute immunity for advocative functions, reiterating what this court has held in other cases: as long as a prosecutor acts with colorable authority, absolute immunity shields his performance of advocative functions regardless of motivation. . . . The appropriate inquiry, thus, is not whether authorized acts are performed with a good or bad motive, but whether the acts at issue are beyond the prosecutor's authority. Accordingly, where a prosecutor is sued under § 1983 for unconstitutional abuse of his discretion to initiate prosecutions, a court will begin by considering whether relevant statutes authorize prosecution for the charged conduct. If they do not, absolute immunity must be denied. . . But if the laws do authorize prosecution for the charged crimes, a court will further consider whether the defendant has intertwined his exercise of authorized prosecutorial discretion with other, unauthorized conduct. For example, where a prosecutor has linked his authorized discretion to initiate or drop criminal charges to an unauthorized demand for a bribe, sexual favors, or the defendant's performance of a religious act, absolute immunity has been denied. . . Where, as in this case, a prosecutor's charging decisions are not accompanied by any such unauthorized demands, the fact that improper motives may influence his authorized discretion cannot deprive him of absolute immunity."); Spurlock v. Thompson, 330 F.3d 791, 798-800 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Here, as in Imbler, Thompson's decision, as prosecuting attorney, to have Whitley and Apple testify falsely at Spurlock's second criminal trial, even if done knowingly, is protected by absolute immunity. . . . Thompson clearly acted as an advocate during the second prosecutions of Spurlock and Marshall. However, at the time of the alleged coercion and threats, those prosecutions had concluded. There were no ongoing adversarial proceedings. Absolute immunity applies to the adversarial acts of prosecutors during post-conviction proceedings, including direct appeals, habeas corpus proceedings, and parole proceedings, where the prosecutor is personally involved in the subsequent proceedings and continues his role as an advocate. . . However, where the role as advocate has not yet begun, namely prior to indictment, or where it has concluded, absolute immunity does not apply. . . . Functionally, a prosecutor who injects himself into a post-trial investigation into the possibility of misconduct during the trial is not acting as an advocate. Likewise, coercing a witness to maintain his false testimony during this and other proceedings does not constitute protected advocacy. Rather, Thompson's retaliatory conduct after the trial was completed is more like the administrative and investigative acts for which prosecutors have been held not to be entitled to absolute immunity."); Cousin v. Small, 325 F.3d 627, 633 (5th Cir. 2003) ("Although Buckley did not explicitly hold that all witness interviews conducted after indictment are advocatory in nature, the Court's reasoning strongly indicates that many, perhaps most, such interviews are likely to be advocatory rather than investigative. . . .In this case, therefore, the question of absolute immunity turns on whether Cousin had been identified as a suspect at the time Rowell was interviewed and whether the interview related to testimony to be presented at trial."); Broam v. Bogan, 320 F.3d 1023, 1030, 1031 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Prosecutors are absolutely immune from liability for gathering additional evidence after probable cause is established or criminal proceedings have begun when they are performing a quasi-judicial function. . . . However, even after the initiation of criminal proceedings, a prosecutor may receive only qualified immunity when acting in a capacity that is exclusively investigatory or administrative.").

Hart v. Hodges, 587 F.3d 1288, 1298 (11th Cir. 2009) ("Hart's argument on appeal relies heavily on his assertion that a prosecutor should be categorically denied absolute immunity if he disobeys a judge's order (e.g., the second state sentence that Hodges appealed) outside the presence of the judge. This argument, however, misapprehends the functional analysis used in considering absolute immunity. As we repeatedly have stated, the determination of absolute prosecutorial immunity depends on the nature of the function performed, not whether the prosecutor performed that function incorrectly or even with dishonesty, such as presenting perjured testimony in court. . . . Hart's argument that conduct violating a judge's order, or more broadly, violating a legal obligation, should not be entitled to absolute immunity is not consistent with the fundamental purpose of absolute immunity. Absolute immunity renders certain public officials completely immune from liability, even when their conduct is wrongful or malicious prosecution."); Cady v. Arenac County, 574 F.3d 334, 341, 342 (6th Cir. 2009) ("[Plaintiff] has pointed to no authority, in this circuit or elsewhere, that supports his contention that a prosecutor's actions in connection with the negotiation and entry of a release-dismissal agreement is outside the scope of a prosecutor's role as an advocate. The defendants, on the other hand, have persuasively argued that County Prosecutor Broughton's actions in connection with the DPA [Deferred Prosecution Agreement] should be covered by absolute immunity."); Milstein v. Cooley, 257 F.3d 1004, 1007-10 (9th Cir. 2001) (discussing Supreme Court's absolute immunity precedent with respect to prosecutors); Cooper v. Parrish, 203 F.3d 937, 947, 948 (6th Cir. 2000) ("We agree that the prosecutors in this case may still be absolutely immune even though the alleged constitutional violations occurred when the officials were pursuing a civil action. Indeed, as long as the prosecutors were functioning in an enforcement role and acting as advocates for the state in initiating and prosecuting judicial proceedings, they are entitled to an absolute immunity defense. . . . Like the prosecutors in Ireland, the prosecutors in the present case are entitled to absolute immunity for their decision to file the public nuisance and civil forfeiture complaints and for their decision to seek the temporary restraining orders."); Prince v. Hicks, 198 F.3d 607, 612, 614 (6th Cir. 1999) ("The line between conduct that is part of a preliminary investigation and conduct that is intimately associated with the judicial phase of a criminal proceeding is difficult to draw in some cases. . . Nevertheless, the approach endorsed by the Supreme Court in Burns and Buckley requires a court to focus on the specific conduct at issue in a case and determine whether a prosecutor was acting as an advocate for the state or whether she was simply engaging in preparatory conduct and performing administrative or investigative functions. Indeed, although prosecutors generally are not absolutely immune when they engage in administrative or investigative acts, the absolute immunity question nonetheless turns on the specific circumstances of the case. . . . A prosecutor performing an investigative function before she has probable cause to arrest a suspect cannot expect to receive the protection of absolute immunity, but a prosecutor who initiates criminal proceedings against a suspect whom she had no probable cause to prosecute is protected by absolute immunity. . . . The dividing line is not, as Prince argues, the point of determination of probable cause. Instead, the dividing line is the point at which the prosecutor performs functions that are intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process."); Mastroianni v. Bowers, 173 F.3d 1363, 1366 (11th Cir. 1999) ("Although Mastroianni suggests that the prosecutors acted beyond the scope of their prosecutorial functions by both participating in the investigatory stages of the case and advising the GBI before bringing the notice of indictment, the record itself does not create a genuine issue of fact or give rise to a reasonable inference that Bowers and Deering engaged in pre-grand jury, pretestimonial conduct that would warrant stripping away their prosecutorial immunity.").

See also Rowe v. Fort Lauderdale, 279 F.3d 1271, 1281 (11th Cir. 2002) ("The most Lazarus did while acting in an investigative role, when he was protected only by qualified immunity, was to be aware that others were tampering with evidence and take no action to stop them. Rowe does not cite any decisions, and we are not aware of any, clearly establishing that a prosecutor's mere awareness of (as opposed to participation in) evidence fabrication or tampering violates the federal rights of a criminal defendant. To the contrary, in an analogous context, this Court has held that a police officer did not violate clearly established law merely by failing to act in the face of knowledge that another officer had fabricated a confession. . . Therefore, Lazarus is entitled to qualified immunity for the actions he personally took or failed to take while in the investigator's role."); Michaels v. New Jersey, 222 F.3d 118, 121, 122 (3d Cir. 2000) (coercion of child witnesses did not violate any right held by petitioner and, although petitioner's due process rights were violated when the testimony was used at trial, prosecutors had absolute immunity), cert. denied sub nom. Michaels v. McGrath, 121 S. Ct. 873 (2001). See also Michaels v. McGrath, 121 S. Ct. 873, 874 (2001) (Thomas, J., dissenting from denial of writ of certiorari) ("I believe that the Second Circuit's approach [in Zahrey] is very likely correct, and that the decision below leaves victims of egregious prosecutorial misconduct without a remedy. In any event, even if I did not have serious doubt as to the correctness of the decision below, I would grant certiorari to resolve the conflict among the Courts of Appeals on this important issue. I respectfully dissent."); Masters v. Gilmore, No. 08-cv-02278-LTB-KLM, 2009 WL 3245891, at *14, *15 (D. Colo. Oct. 5, 2009) ("I first note that the Supreme Court recently granted certiorari in Pottawattamie County, Iowa v. McGhee, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 2002, 173 L.Ed.2d 1083 ("pr. 20, 2009) to review McGhee v. Pottawattamie County, Iowa, 547 F.3d 922 (8th Cir.2008). There the Eighth Circuit, like the Second Circuit in Zahrey v. Coffey, 221 F.3d 342 (2nd Cir.2000), essentially rejected the Seventh Circuit's analysis in Buckley IV. Resolution of McGhee could clarify whether there is any merit to Mr. Gilmore's argument regarding the first prong to qualified immunity analysis. I must, however, proceed to decide this issue without the benefit of a decision in McGhee, and I am unpersuaded by the Seventh Circuit's analysis in Buckley IV. . . . I therefore decline to apply the majority's alchemic analysis in Buckley IV in this case and proceed to the second prong of qualified immunity analysis. . . . Remarkably, Mr. Gilmore argues that during the relevant time period a reasonable prosecutor would not have known that fabricating, destroying and/or concealing evidence violated Mr. Masters' constitutional rights. Given the egregious conduct alleged, taken as true, I disagree. . . . In Pierce, the Tenth Circuit recognized that it was clearly established in 1986 that the knowing or reckless falsification or omission of evidence in the pre-arrest and post-arrest stages of a prosecution violated an accused's constitutional rights. . . See also Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 45-48 (1st Cir.2004) (right to not be framed by law enforcement agents through the subornation of false testimony from a key witness and the suppression of exculpatory evidence was clearly established in 1967 based on Supreme Court precedent dating back to 1935). To avoid the inescapable conclusion that he had clear warning that the fabrication, destruction and/or concealment of evidence during the Hettrick murder investigation beginning in 1987 was a violation of Mr. Masters' constitutional rights, Mr. Gilmore focuses on his status as a prosecutor and relies on Buckley IV and Michaels to demonstrate that, at a minimum, it was unclear at the relevant time whether a prosecutor violated a defendant's constitutional rights by engaging in these acts. But, until Mr. Gilmore's intimate involvement with the preparation of the arrest warrant affidavit, taken as true, the allegations are that his role and function was that of an investigator. . . . [T]he limited authority cited by Mr. Gilmore cannot render decades of jurisprudence recognizing the unconstitutionality of the fabrication and suppression of evidence by law enforcement officers unclear.").

See also Lampton v. Diaz, 639 F.3d 223, 227, 228 (5th Cir. 2011) ("Lampton is a federal prosecutor with no duty to bring complaints before a state ethics commission, and the actions for which he seeks immunity are unrelated to his prosecution of the Diazes. Lampton protests that he would not have had access to the tax records were it not for his role as a prosecutor, but that connection is too tenuous. A prosecutor does not have carte blanche to do as he pleases with the information he can access. He can use it only to fulfill his duties as a prosecutor, and Lampton's actions went well beyond those bounds. Lampton's insistence that he had a duty under the Mississippi Rules of Professional Conduct to report Diaz's misconduct does not change that conclusion. . . Lampton could have reported Diaz's misconduct without releasing the tax records, so his ethical duty did not compel violation of the federal statute. Lampton's ethical responsibilities did not make the transfer of tax records to a state commission part of his duty as a prosecutor. In short, Lampton points to no case–and we know of none–extending immunity to post-trial conduct relating to a new action before a new tribunal. Every case extending immunity to post-trial actions involves conduct related to the criminal proceeding that the prosecutor initiated. . . Lampton cannot claim immunity, because his post-trial actions did not relate to the criminal proceedings and thus are beyond the scope of immunity at common law."); Warney v. Monroe County, 587 F.3d 113, 122-25 (2d Cir. 2009) ("On the facts of this case, we must now decide whether, and how, absolute immunity extends to prosecutors working on post-conviction collateral proceedings. We see no principled reason to withhold absolute immunity for work performed in defending a conviction from collateral attack. . . . Although a collateral attack is technically a separate, civil proceeding, a prosecutor defending a post-conviction petition remains the state's advocate in an adversarial proceeding that is an integral part of the criminal justice system. . . The considerations that militate in favor of absolute immunity for work done at trial or on appeal are just as relevant in the context of a collateral proceeding. . . . Several courts have already held, or suggested, that absolute immunity shields work performed by prosecutors opposing habeas petitions. [citing cases] We join these courts in holding that absolute immunity shields work performed during a post-conviction collateral attack, at least insofar as the challenged actions are part of the prosecutor's role as an advocate for the state. . . . Warney does not complain that the prosecutors ordered the testing; after all, that testing is what led to his release. Nor is Warney complaining (here) about the denial of access to test the DNA for himself. . . Nor is he complaining of non-disclosure of the test results– disclosure was made. Warney's narrow focus is (understandably) on the specific act that caused his harm: the failure to disclose the DNA results promptly. . . . For the following reasons, we conclude that it is unhelpful to ascertain the prosecutors' functional role by isolating each specific act done or not done; rather, a prosecutor's function depends chiefly on whether there is pending or in preparation a court proceeding in which the prosecutor acts as an advocate. Unless the DNA testing is considered with reference to context, it is impossible to classify functionally. If the testing inculpated Warney, it would be a potent tool of the advocacy; if it exculpated Warney, it might be deemed administrative, in the sense that it would entail disclosure; if it inculpated someone else, it would be investigative, at least to the extent that it might identify the real killer. But the steps taken here–testing, disclosure, and even the delay in making disclosure, as well as the identification of the real killer–were integral to and subsumed in the advocacy functions being performed in connection with Warney's post-conviction initiatives. The decisions made by the prosecutors in this case–whether to test for potentially inculpatory (or exculpatory) information, how and when to disclose or use that information, and whether to seek to vacate Warney's conviction–were exercises of legal judgment made in the 'judicial phase' of proceedings integral to the criminal justice process. . . . On the facts of this case, we need not, and do not, decide whether absolute immunity extends to prosecutorial conduct regarding DNA evidence, occurring after a prisoner's appeals and collateral attacks have been exhausted. Moreover, because we extend absolute immunity in this case, we do not address the prosecutors' alternative argument that they are entitled to qualified immunity."); Yarris v. County of Delaware, 465 F.3d 129, 136-39 (3d Cir. 2006) ("We believe that destroying exculpatory evidence is not related to a prosecutor's prosecutorial function. Unlike decisions on whether to withhold evidence from the defense, decisions to destroy evidence are not related to a prosecutor's prosecutorial function. . . . Accordingly, the ADAs are not entitled to absolute immunity from suit for constitutional violations caused by their alleged deliberate destruction of exculpatory evidence. . . . Less clear is whether the ADAs are absolutely immune from claims based on allegations that they withheld exculpatory evidence, in the form of DNA samples, after Yarris was convicted and sentenced to death. . . We agree with other courts that '[a]bsolute immunity applies to the adversarial acts of prosecutors during post-conviction proceedings ... where the prosecutor is personally involved ... and continues his role as an advocate,' but that 'where the role as advocate has not yet begun ... or where it has concluded, absolute immunity does not apply.'[citing cases] After a conviction is obtained, the challenged action must be shown by the prosecutor to be part of the prosecutor's continuing personal involvement as the state's advocate in adversarial post-conviction proceedings to be encompassed within that prosecutor's absolute immunity from suit. Based on the facts on the record as it now stands, the prosecutors have not satisfied their burden of showing that they are entitled to the immunity they seek. Yarris's direct appeal to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania was argued in April and decided in October of 1988. See Commonwealth v. Yarris, 519 Pa. 571, 549 A.2d 513 (Pa.1988). Yarris's numerous requests for DNA testing of physical evidence began in March 1988–presumably in an attempt to uncover new evidence that might entitle him to extraordinary relief in case the legal avenues he was pursuing did not succeed. The prosecutors have not shown that their response to Yarris's DNA test requests was part of their advocacy for the state in post-conviction proceedings in which they were personally involved. Without such a showing, a prosecutor acting merely as a custodian of evidence after conviction serves the same non-adversarial function as police officers, medical examiners, and other clerical state employees and–just as with certain police investigative work–'it is neither appropriate nor justifiable that, for the same act, [absolute] immunity should protect the one and not the other [s] .'. . The handling of requests to conduct scientific tests on evidence made after conviction–not related to grounds claimed in an ongoing adversarial proceeding–can be best described as part of the 'prosecutor's administrative duties ... that do not relate to an advocate's preparation for the initiation of a prosecution or for judicial proceedings' and 'are not entitled to absolute immunity.'. . Because the ADAs have not yet shown how the handling of DNA evidence related to ongoing adversarial proceedings in which they were personally involved, we conclude that the prosecutors may have been 'function[ing] as ... administrator[s] rather than as ... officer[s] of the court' and, thus, may be 'entitled only to qualified immunity.' . . . As a general matter, we note that a prosecutor is absolutely immune from liability for using 'false testimony in connection with [a] prosecution.'. . With respect to the solicitation of false statements alleged here, the ADAs are entitled to absolute immunity to the extent that their conduct occurred while they were acting as advocates rather than investigators."); Parkinson v. Cozzolino, 238 F.3d 145, 151, 152 (2d Cir. 2001) ("[I]f a prosecutor's conduct prior to conviction is protected by absolute immunity, equivalent conduct pending appeal of the conviction must be afforded the same protection. . . . Likewise, trial courts in this and other circuits have applied absolute immunity to shield prosecutors from liability for post-conviction conduct. [citing cases] We now join these courts in holding that absolute immunity covers prosecutors' actions after the date of conviction while a direct appeal is pending."); Dababnah v. Keller-Burnside, 208 F.3d 467, 473 (4th Cir. 2000) (Motz, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The Supreme Court has never held that the particular forum in which challenged conduct takes place is definitive one way or the other on the question of prosecutorial immunity. Nor has the Court eliminated the prosecutor's burden of proving entitlement to absolute immunity when she demonstrates that her allegedly wrongful act occurred before a judge while the court was in session. Similarly, the Court has not limited the investigative or administrative function analysis to conduct that takes place outside the formal strictures of a court proceeding. Faithful application of the functional approach prescribed by Imbler and its progeny focuses on the underlying function of the prosecutor's specific acts rather than on the context in which they occur."); Peterson v. Bernardi, 719 F.Supp.2d 419, 435, 436 (D.N.J. 2010) ("Where it is shown that a post-conviction inquiry will be genuinely probative (because, for example, new evidence has come to light), a prosecutor's interest, at least initially, in preserving a conviction's integrity may be in tension with the interest of the public in convicting and punishing the guilty. . . Because a prosecutor's advocacy in these cases is on his own behalf, his purpose is more administrative than genuinely prosecutorial. . . . .Despite this marked attenuation, Defendant Bernardi insists that his conduct's procedural context–that is, responding to a motion for post-conviction relief in court–places the conduct squarely within the traditional judicial/quasi-judicial prosecutorial function. In Yarris, the Third Circuit held that the decision of prosecutors to deny requests for the testing of DNA evidence was not a prosecutorial function entitled to absolutely immunity. . .The only material difference here is that Defendant Bernardi's prosecutorial decision may have been made in the context of a motion for post-conviction relief. The fortuitous fact that Plaintiff filed a motion, rather than requesting

DNA testing from Defendant Bernardi directly, does not alter the conclusion that such determinations are not traditionally advocative in nature. Entitlement to prosecutorial immunity cannot turn upon the accident-of-fate that Plaintiff happened to request relief from a court, rather than from Defendant Bernardi directly. The applicability of prosecutorial immunity here is a close and difficult call on which reasonable minds may differ. It is certainly counterintuitive that a prosecutor's conduct in defending a conviction on appeal is immunized, but his conduct in responding to a motion for post-conviction relief may not be. The manifest conclusion of the controlling cases is that the relevant inquiry is one not of type, but of degree. The precedents, in other words, turn not upon easily recognized categories or labels, but rather a measurement of conceptual proximity. Given the attenuated connection of Defendant Bernardi's conduct–particularly in light of its context, execution, and purpose–with a prosecutor's traditional advocative role, Defendant Bernardi's instruction to oppose Plaintiff's July 2002 motion is not protected by absolute immunity.")

See also White v. McKinley, 519 F.3d 806, 813, 814 (8th Cir. 2008) (White I) ("The right Brady describes definitely applies to prosecutors and imposes upon them an absolute disclosure duty. But, Brady's protections also extend to actions of other law enforcement officers such as investigating officers. However, an investigating officer's failure to preserve evidence potentially useful to the accused or their failure to disclose such evidence does not constitute a denial of due process in the absence of bad faith. Villasana v. Wilhoit, 368 F.3d 976, 980 (8th Cir.2004). . . . Consequently, to be viable, White's claim must allege bad faith to implicate a clearly established right under Brady. . . . Richard argues that the Brady-derived right alleged was not clearly established and that there are no cases factually similar that would have put him on notice of White's rights. . . . We hold that no reasonable police officer in Richard's shoes could have believed that he could deliberately misrepresent the nature and length of his relationship with Tina, or that he could deliberately fail to preserve a child victim's diary containing potentially exculpatory information. Because Richard is asserting the qualified immunity defense, he has the burden to establish the relevant predicate facts for its application. He has not done so. During this review, we are limited to the facts as alleged by the plaintiff. Given these facts, a reasonable juror could find that Richard deliberately misrepresented his relationship with Tina and that he deliberately failed to preserve the diary in bad faith. Therefore, we find no error in the district court's denial of qualified immunity for White's due process claim."); Villasana v. Wilhoit, 368 F.3d 976, 980 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Villasana would extend Brady's absolute liability to any law enforcement officer who was part of the prosecutor's 'team,' including in this case scientists employed by the Highway Patrol Crime Laboratory. This extension is not needed to secure post-conviction relief for one whose conviction was tainted by a Brady violation, because the prosecutor's duty is absolute. The extension is simply a device to avoid the impact of the prosecutor's absolute immunity from § 1983 damage liability. We conclude the extension is unsound. In Imbler, the Court explained that one reason for applying the prosecutor's absolute common law immunity to § 1983 damage actions is that the focus of post-conviction procedures–whether the accused received a fair trial–'should not be blurred by even the subconscious knowledge that a post-trial decision in favor of the accused might result in the prosecutor's being called upon to respond in damages for his error or mistaken judgment.' 424 U.S. at 427. That reasoning applies equally to post-conviction Brady inquiries into whether evidence unknown to the prosecutor should have been disclosed by another government official. Under Brady, the prosecutor is responsible for failing to produce materially favorable evidence regardless of fault, that is, intentional suppression or bad faith. The Supreme Court has also considered whether other law enforcement officers, including laboratory technicians, should be liable for destroying evidence that might have produced test results favorable to the defense. The Court concluded that 'failure to preserve potentially useful evidence does not constitute a denial of due process' in the absence of bad faith. Youngblood, 488 U.S. at 58; see California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479, 488 (1984). We conclude this bad faith standard should likewise apply to due process claims that law enforcement officers preserved evidence favorable to the defense but failed to disclose it. In other words, Brady ensures that the defendant will obtain relief from a conviction tainted by the State's nondisclosure of materially favorable evidence, regardless of fault, but the recovery of § 1983 damages requires proof that a law enforcement officer other than the prosecutor intended to deprive the defendant of a fair trial. We note that the few decisions in other circuits purporting to extend 'Brady liability' to police officers have involved claims of intentional or bad faith failure to disclose Brady material to the prosecutor or to the defense. See Newsome v. McCabe, 256 F.3d 747, 752 (7th Cir.2001); McMillian v. Johnson, 88 F.3d 1554, 1569 (11th Cir.1996), cert. denied, 521 U.S. 1121 (1997).") Accord, Porter v. White*,* 483 F.3d 1294, 1308 (11th Cir. 2007) ("On the authority of Daniels and Cannon, we hold that mere negligence or inadvertence on the part of a law enforcement official in failing to turn over Brady material to the prosecution, which in turn causes a defendant to be convicted at a trial that does not meet the fairness requirements imposed by the Due Process Clause, does not amount to a 'deprivation' in the constitutional sense."); Ihekoronye v. City of Northfield, Minn., No. 07-CV-1642(JMR/FLN), 2008 WL 906206, at *6, *7 (D.Minn. Mar. 31, 2008) ("There is no freestanding constitutional right to be free from unduly suggestive identification procedures. . . And the mere existence of exculpatory evidence does not violate the Fourteenth Amendment. A prosecutor's intentional withholding of such evidence at trial rises to the level of a constitutional violation. . . But the simple existence of exculpatory evidence does not violate the constitution. Only a violation of the 'core right' to a fair trial is actionable under § 1983, . . . and plaintiff must show prejudice. . . Absent a trial, there is no prejudice, and no due process violation. . . The Court cannot doubt that an erroneous charge and detention are excruciatingly painful, but plaintiff was exonerated and released as soon as it was discovered that the charges against him could not be proven. While he had to endure a criminal charge, that burden does not violate the constitution. There is no evidence showing the officers and investigator engaged in anything but regular investigative work. Plaintiff has not shown they knew or believed they were building a case against an innocent man. Ultimately, there is a total lack of any bad faith, as required for a procedural due process violation. Villasana v. Wilhoit, 368 F.3d 976, 980 (8th Cir.2004). There is no showing whatsoever of behavior which shocks the conscience, as required for a substantive due process violation. . . Negligent conduct–even grossly negligent conduct–does not violate due process. . . While not every interview was totally consistent, the resident's multiple interviews did not reveal her statements to be so entirely unreliable that defendants' reliance upon them would violate due process.").

b. Officials Acting in Advocacy Capacity

See Washington v. Napolitano, 29 F.4th 93, 98 (2d Cir. 2022), pet. for cert. filed, No. 22-80 (U.S. July 25, 2022) ("[W]e agree with the district court that absolute prosecutorial immunity did not apply to appellants' participation in obtaining the arrest warrant for Washington. Long-standing precedent makes clear that swearing to an arrest warrant affidavit and executing an arrest are traditional police functions, and performing such functions at the direction of a prosecutor does not transform them into prosecutorial acts protected by absolute immunity."); Red Zone 12 LLC v. City of Columbus, 758 F. App'x 508, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("At bottom, Red Zone's contentions about Pfeiffer's conduct all center around his initiation and prosecution of the nuisance abatement suit. Red Zone claims that Pfeiffer unjustifiably pursued the nuisance suit until the bitter end. Thus, Red Zone—understandably so—does not like the way Pfeiffer litigated this lawsuit. But the initiation and prosecution of a lawsuit on behalf of the government fall squarely within prosecutorial functions. . . As do actions that are 'preliminary to the initiation of a prosecution' and 'apart from the courtroom.'. . This includes preparing and filing a public nuisance complaint, . . . pre-trial negotiations, . . . improperly withholding or managing evidence, . . . and seeking injunctive relief[.] . . . Thus, because all of the actions that Red Zone points to 'are those of an advocate,' Pfeiffer's conduct was prosecutorial. . .Moreover, that Pfeiffer may have prosecuted with malicious intent is inapposite. Even bad motives do not void the protections of prosecutorial immunity."); Patterson v. Van Arsdel, 883 F.3d 826, 830-32 (9th Cir. Feb. 23, 2018) ("While this court has not yet addressed the precise circumstances under which a pretrial release officer may be entitled to prosecutorial immunity, our precedents regarding the official immunity of parole officers are instructive. Parole board members have absolute immunity for adjudicative actions and for other discretionary decisions related to the processing of parole applications. . .However, parole officers, when responsible for investigating potential parole violations and submitting recommendations regarding revocation, have only qualified immunity. . . The rationale is that a parole officer in the latter category fulfills a function that is 'more akin to a police officer seeking an arrest warrant, than to a prosecutor exercising quasi-judicial authority.'. . .Given the similarities between Van Arsdel's role and those of a parole officer and a law enforcement officer, we conclude that Van Arsdel's action in submitting the bare unsigned warrant to Judge Tichenor should be seen as making a recommendation that the warrant be signed, just like a parole officer recommending revocation, as in Swift, or like a police officer submitting documentation for an arrest warrant to a judge, as in Malley. Accordingly, Van Arsdel is not entitled to absolute immunity. . . .Mindful of the Supreme Court's warning to avoid extending absolute immunity 'further than its justification would warrant,' we hold that Van Arsdel is not entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity."); Spuck v. Pennsylvania Bd. of Prob. & Parole, 563 F. App'x 156, 158 (3d Cir. 2014) ("Spuck does . . . specifically challenge the District Court's determination that Defendant Robinson is entitled to immunity for his actions in representing the [Parole] Board in proceedings before the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. While we have not addressed this direct issue, we discern no error with the District Court's conclusion that a state agency attorney should be afforded such protection from liability in damages when carrying out courtroom functions. See, e.g., Williams v. Consovoy, 453 F.3d 173, 178 (3d Cir.2006) (citing

Burns v. Reed, 500 U.S. 478, 484, 111 S.Ct. 1934, 114 L.Ed.2d 547 (1991), and noting that absolute immunity attaches to those who perform functions integral to the judicial process); Barrett v. United States, 798 F.2d 565, 572 (2d Cir.1986) (extending absolute immunity to defending government litigators); Fry v. Melaragno, 939 F.2d 832, 837 (9th Cir.1991) (extending absolute immunity to government attorneys involved in civil tax litigation in a state or federal court); Mangiafico v. Blumenthal, 471 F.3d 391, 395-97 (2d Cir. 2006) ("We have not specifically decided whether absolute immunity protects a government official's discretionary determination regarding litigation pursuant to a statute such as Connecticut's. . . . As a general principle, a government attorney is entitled to absolute immunity when functioning as an advocate of the state in a way that is intimately associated with the judicial process. . . . We have consistently afforded absolute immunity to a government attorney's decision whether or not to initiate litigation on behalf of the state. . . . In light of this precedent, we can divine no meaningful difference between the Attorney General's decision in this case not to defend a state employee and the decisions of prosecutors and government attorneys to initiate (or not to initiate) civil or administrative proceedings. In both instances, the government attorney is serving as an advocate of the state, determining whether to commit the state's resources, reputation, and prestige to litigation. The structure of the statute confirms this conclusion since under its terms the state funds the defense or indemnifies the official. The state withholds the provision of a defense when the Attorney General, acting on its behalf, determines that a state-supported defense of the employee would be inappropriate. Conn. Gen.Stat.§ 5-141d(b). . . . It is apparent to us that in deciding not to commit the state's financial and legal resources to Mangiafico's defense, Blumenthal served as an advocate for the state and performed functions analogous to those of agency officials or prosecutors and other government attorneys whose decisions to commit or not commit the state are protected by absolute immunity. . . . It is not in the public interest that the Attorney General be constrained in making decisions under the Connecticut statute by potential consequences such as his own liability in a suit for damages. The defense of such suits would necessarily complicate, if not intimidate, the making of what may be routine, discretionary decisions, even where the Attorney General's decision was supported by the outcome of the underlying case. For these reasons we believe that qualified immunity is inadequate to ensure that the Attorney General can properly decide whether to defend a state employee in litigation pursuant to his statutory responsibilities without the specter of harassment or intimidation. . . . If Mangiafico were found to have acted within the scope of his employment in the discharge of his duties and not to have acted wantonly, maliciously, or recklessly, Connecticut law would mandate post-litigation reimbursement from the state for legal costs and fees. See Conn. Gen.Stat.§5-141d(c). Thus, if Mangifico acted reasonably– but in some respect improperly–the state would be obligated to make him whole. Only if he acted wantonly or maliciously . . . are such payments barred. We have little difficulty in concluding that this alternative means of redress is adequate and that its existence further supports granting absolute immunity."); Tomaselli v. Beaulieu, No. 08-10666-PBS, 2010 WL 1460259, at *6 (D. Mass. Mar. 10, 2010) ("Town Counsel employed to prosecute or defend claims, actions or proceedings by or on behalf of any town or town agency is immune from suit, even if a private law firm is retained as Town Counsel. . . Since all of the conduct by Kopelman and Paige which the plaintiffs challenge is 'closely relate[d] to the judicial process, or the lawyer's role as an advocate [,]' the attorneys are entitled to absolute immunity. . . . For these reasons, all the federal constitutional claims against these defendants should be dismissed."); Moore v. Schlesinger, 150 F. Supp.2d 1308, 1311, 1312 (M.D. Fla. 2001) ("The Defendants do not cite to any case, nor has the Court located one, where the Eleventh Circuit has addressed under what circumstances, if any, a government attorney who defends the government in a civil action is entitled to absolute immunity. A review of the case law of other jurisdictions, however, reveals support for conferring absolute immunity in such a situation. . . . the Court approves of the decision of the Second Circuit in Barrett v. United States and those courts which have extended the cloak of absolute immunity to a government defense attorney's performance of regular advocacy functions in a civil suit.").

See also J.T.H. v. Missouri Dep't of Soc. Servs. Children's Div., 39 F.4th 489, 492-94 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Purely investigative activities, even those conducted by a social worker, 'do not qualify for absolute immunity.'. . .By the time she reviewed her own finding as circuit manager, however, there was no longer an open investigation. To the contrary, her job at that point was to review the report and either 'uphold or reverse' it. . . Unsurprisingly, she stood by her own work. We have already held that absolute immunity is available for functions like this one. See Stanley v. Hutchinson, 12 F.4th 834 (8th Cir. 2021). . . . Little separates Cook's decision to uphold her own preliminary finding from the find-true determination in Stanley. Elsewhere in their brief, the parents point out that Stanley did not involve a First Amendment claim. But as we have explained, the availability of absolute immunity depends on 'the nature of the function performed,' not the type of claim brought."); Clark v. Stone, No. 20-5928, 2021 WL 1997205, at *7 (6th Cir. May 19, 2021) ("Stone is absolutely immune for filing the initial abuse petitions on December 19 before Judge Embry because social workers are given absolute immunity for initiating judicial proceedings. . . Similarly, Stone's discussion and preparations of those petitions in conjunction with Assistant County Attorney Durham are also protected. . . Any statements given under oath at that time or at subsequent court proceedings are shielded by absolute immunity."); Barnett as next friend of M.G.W. v. Smithwick, No. 20-5010, 2020 WL 6625028, at *4 (6th Cir. Nov. 12, 2020) (not reported) ("We have extended this so-called 'prosecutorial immunity' to a social worker engaged in legal advocacy on behalf of children, where the worker's conduct is 'intimately associated' with the judicial phase of proceedings like 'initiating court actions.' Holloway v. Brush, 220 F.3d 767, 774–75 (6th Cir. 2000) (en banc); Kovacic v. Cuyahoga Cnty. Dep't of Child. & Fam. Servs., 724 F.3d 687, 694 (6th Cir. 2013) (citing Pittman v. Cuyahoga Cnty. Dep't of Child. & Fam. Servs., 640 F.3d 716, 724 (6th Cir. 2011)). That describes Smithwick's role here, which was limited to preparing the protective custody order petitions filed in juvenile court to effectuate M.W.'s removal. As this conduct was 'intimately associated' with a judicial proceeding, Smithwick was entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity."); Turner v. Lowen, 823 F. App'x 311, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("The scope of immunity enjoyed by social workers is remarkably broad. A social worker, for example, is absolutely immune not only from negligent misrepresentations to the court, see Rippy ex rel. Rippy v. Hattaway, 270 F.3d 416, 422–23 (6th Cir. 2001), but also knowing and intentional misrepresentations, Barber, 809 F.3d at 844. The same holds true whether the misrepresentation is included as part of a petition for removal, sworn statement, or both. . . And although we have often repeated that the investigative and administrative acts of social workers are not shielded, we have interpreted this rule quite narrowly in practice."); Rivera-Martinez v. Kern County, No. 19-15008, 2020 WL 2111461, at *1 (9th Cir. May 4, 2020) (not published) ("Plaintiffs alleged that Meek falsely omitted information from her 'Social Study – Detentional' report, which Meek filed with the superior court in connection with its review of the county's temporary custody of Plaintiffs' son. The district court dismissed the action, holding that as a matter of law Meek was entitled to absolute immunity or, alternatively, qualified immunity. . . We affirm the district court judgment, but only on the ground of qualified immunity. The district court erred in applying absolute immunity to all of the conduct alleged in Plaintiffs' operative complaint. We have followed the Supreme Court in distinguishing between the quasi-prosecutorial task of filing charging documents (which is entitled to absolute immunity) and the separate but related task of providing factual evidence in support of the allegations made (which is not). Kalina v. Fletcher, 522 U.S. 118, 129–30, 118 S.Ct. 502, 139 L.Ed.2d 471 (1997) (prosecutor's attestation to underlying facts in support of arrest warrant involved performing "an act that any competent witness might have performed"); Hardwick v. Cty. of Orange, 844 F.3d 1112, 1116 (9th Cir. 2017) (absolute immunity did not apply to, inter alia, defendant social workers' "allegedly false statements and omissions made in defendants' court reports" during juvenile dependency proceedings). Under Hardwick, at least some of the claims against Meek were not subject to absolute immunity."); Arsan v. Keller, 784 F. App'x 900, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("Quasi-judicial immunity shields guardians ad litem for precisely what Arsan argues it does not—the actions they take while investigating, gathering information about the parents and children, and reporting to the court their custody recommendations. . . . Reporting custody recommendations to the court—based on biases or not—is within the scope of a guardian ad litem's functions. Thus, the district court properly dismissed the claims against Fierst because he was entitled to absolute immunity for the § 1983 equal protection and § 1985(3) conspiracy and Ohio state law conspiracy claims. We affirm. . . . When caseworkers give testimony or otherwise participate as legal advocates in custody hearings, quasi-prosecutorial immunity shields them from liability. . . This immunity, which is absolute and applies in the same way as prosecutorial immunity, shields caseworkers from damages even when they knowingly make false or defamatory statements, . . . or when their conduct is 'unquestionably illegal or improper[.]'. . All that matters is that the alleged illegal conduct stems from the caseworker's 'capacity as a legal advocate,' such as testifying in juvenile court."); Cox v. Dep't of Soc. & Health Servs., 913 F.3d 831, 837-38 (9th Cir. 2019) ("'[S]ocial workers are not afforded absolute immunity for their investigatory conduct, discretionary decisions or recommendations.'. . Viewing the record in the light most favorable to the Coxes, the visitation location was within the social workers' discretion. There is insufficient evidence that the Dependency Court required the boys' visits to take place in Joshua's home. None of the Dependency Court's rulings, oral and written, dictated the visitation location. Thus, the district court erred in concluding that the social workers were entitled to absolute immunity. . . .Viewing the record in the light most favorable to the Coxes, there is insufficient evidence to show that the social workers recognized, or should have recognized, an objectively substantial risk that Joshua would physically harm his sons. As the social workers did not act with deliberate indifference to the boys' liberty interest, the district court did not err in concluding that the social workers were entitled to qualified immunity."); Brent v.

Wayne Cty. Dep't of Human Servs., 901 F.3d 656, 684-85 (6th Cir. 2018) ("[W]e once held that a social worker could not receive absolute immunity for 'the act of personally vouching for the truth of the facts that provide the evidentiary support for [the family court's] finding of probable cause.'. . Young, however, is unpublished and non-binding, and our later published precedent overrides Young's holding. In Barber v. Miller, 809 F.3d 840 (6th Cir. 2015), for instance, we held that a social worker is entitled to absolute immunity against allegations that he 'included false and misleading statements of fact in the protective-custody petition.'. . As we explained then, the social worker 'offered his factual assessment in his capacity as a legal advocate initiating a child-custody proceeding in family court.'. . Because a petition for a removal order triggers a subsequent hearing in court, . . . a social worker's actions as a complaining witness are 'more analogous to a prosecutor's decision to prosecute than a police officer's testifying by affidavit in support of probable cause.'[citing Bauch]'The district court therefore did not err in granting absolute immunity to Wenk for serving as the 'complaining witness' in support of the removal order. Finally, plaintiffs argue that Wenk is not entitled to absolute immunity for her role in executing the removal order on February 18, 2017. . . On this point we agree. Social workers are entitled only to qualified immunity when removing children from a home because, in such circumstances, the social workers are 'acting in a police capacity rather than as legal advocates.' [citing Kovacic]"); Bauch v. Richland County Children Servs., 733 F. App'x 292, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("The central dispute over absolute immunity therefore concerns whether Hartman was acting in her capacity as a legal advocate when she completed and submitted her affidavit in support of emergency custody. As the party seeking absolute immunity, Hartman has the burden of demonstrating that the immunity is justified for the function being challenged. . . The district court held that Hartman was not acting as a legal advocate in completing the affidavit in support of emergency custody, relying primarily on this Court's previous unpublished decision in Young v. Vega, 574 Fed.Appx. 684, 689 (6th Cir. 2014). . . .[M]ultiple decisions of this Court, issued after both Young and Kalina were decided, have held in situations analogous to this case that the submission of an affidavit that triggers judicial child-removal proceedings is in fact an act of legal advocacy by social workers. . . .Like the social worker's petition in Barber, Hartman's affidavit offered her factual assessment as a legal advocate initiating a child-custody proceeding. . . Unlike a police officer's application for a search warrant, Hartman's affidavit for emergency custody necessarily triggered a subsequent custody proceeding in court pursuant to Ohio law. . . .Accordingly, Hartman's actions were more analogous to a prosecutor's decision to prosecute than a police officer's testifying by affidavit in support of probable cause. This case is also distinguishable from the facts of Kalina—although the affidavit submitted by the prosecutor in Kalina was 'filed as part of an ex parte process prior to the indictment that begins the criminal case,' Hartman's affidavit in support of emergency custody was 'an undeniable part of the judicial process' because 'the [affidavit] initiated the [removal] action' and subsequent hearing. . . .Just as absolute immunity is essential for prosecutors engaged in legal advocacy because 'any lesser degree of immunity could impair the judicial process itself,'. . that same immunity must be given to a children's services advocate as the initiator of home-removal actions; any lesser protection would jeopardize the essential process that has been established to provide protection to those children who need it most."); Hardwick v. County of Orange, 844 F.3d 1112, 1115-16 (9th Cir.

2017) ("Absolute immunity from private lawsuits covers the official activities of social workers only when they perform quasi-prosecutorial or quasi-judicial functions in juvenile dependency court. . . The factor that determines whether absolute immunity covers a social worker's activity or 'function' under scrutiny is whether it was investigative or administrative, on one hand, or part and parcel of presenting the state's case as a generic advocate on the other. Absolute immunity is available only if the function falls into the latter category. . . . Preslie's complaint targets conduct well outside of the social workers' legitimate role as quasi-prosecutorial advocates in presenting the case. Our opinion in Beltran v. Santa Clara County, 514 F.3d 906 (9th Cir. 2008) (en banc) (per curiam) disposes of this issue. . . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's denial to these defendants of absolute immunity."); Barber v. Miller, 809 F.3d 840, 844 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Here, Barber complains that Miller included false and misleading statements of fact in the protective-custody petition. But Miller offered his factual assessment in his capacity as a legal advocate initiating a child-custody proceeding in family court; Pittman therefore shields. And though Barber invites this court to revisit Pittman, we may not. . . Miller thus enjoys absolute immunity against allegations of false and misleading statements to the family court."); Piccone v. McClain, 586 F. App'x 709, (1st Cir. 2014) ("[T]o the extent the Piccones may be alleging that the juvenile court affidavit submitted by Nietsche and co-signed by Rice contained misrepresentations and omissions, these defendants, as witnesses at judicial proceedings, would be entitled to either absolute or qualified immunity from § 1983 liability as to this claim. See Watterson v. Page, 987 F.2d 1, 9 & n. 8 (1st Cir.1993)."); Booker v. S. Carolina Dep't of Soc. Servs., 583 F. App'x 147, 148 (4th Cir. 2014) ("[W]e agree with the district court that Sullivan was entitled to absolute immunity from Booker's claim that she made intentional misstatements when preparing and presenting a petition for J.J.'s retention in SCDSS's custody. Vosburg v. Dep't of Soc. Servs., 884 F.2d 133, 138 (4th Cir.1989). Although not addressed by the district court, we also conclude that Sullivan's absolute immunity extends to her alleged failure to notify Booker of J.J.'s removal and the resulting probable cause hearing.") (unpublished); B.S. v. Somerset County, 704 F.3d 250, 262, 264-66, 270 (3d Cir. 2013) ("As Appellees correctly point out, we have recognized that the justifications for according absolute immunity to prosecutors sometimes apply to child welfare employees. Specifically, in Ernst v. Child & Youth Services of Chester County, 108 F.3d 486 (3d Cir.1997), we joined several of our sister circuits in deeming 'child welfare workers and attorneys who prosecute dependency proceedings on behalf of the state ... absolute[ly] immun[e] from suit for all of their actions in preparing for and prosecuting such dependency proceedings.'. . . As a careful comparison of this case to Ernst reveals, the same sorts of protection we identified there actually do apply here with respect to the caseworkers' function of seeking judicial orders related to custody of Daughter. . . . [A]lthough Ernst is certainly distinguishable in that absolute immunity was available to child welfare workers 'for their actions on behalf of the state in preparing for, initiating, and prosecuting dependency proceedings," id. at 495 (emphasis added), that distinction is not dispositive as far as the availability of 'important safeguards that protect citizens from unconstitutional actions' goes. Id. . . . Having determined that the absence of dependency proceedings is not, in itself, a basis for resolving the absolute immunity question, we must now consider whether Eller and Barth were, in fact, formulating and presenting recommendations to a court when they undertook the conduct of which Mother complains. In other words, we need to ascertain whether Eller and Barth 'function[ed] as the state's advocate when performing the action(s)' that gave rise to the due process violations Mother seeks to redress, or whether those claims instead arose from unprotected 'administrative or investigatory actions.'. . . Inasmuch as their acts were fundamentally prosecutorial, in the manner described in Ernst, we conclude that Eller and Barth are absolutely immune from liability with respect to the procedural due process claims. . . . We emphasize, however, as we did in Ernst, that this holding does not insulate from liability all actions taken by child welfare caseworkers. . . Investigations conducted outside of the context of judicial proceedings may still be susceptible to due process claims. Nor can caseworkers shield their investigatory work from review merely by seeking a court order at some point. . . The key to the absolute immunity determination is not the timing of the investigation relative to a judicial proceeding, but rather the underlying function that the investigation serves and the role the caseworker occupies in carrying it out. . . Here, Eller advocated on behalf of the County in the May 5 meeting and continued in that role through the June 23 custody determination. Because the underlying function of her actions throughout that judicial proceeding—including during the investigation and composition of the report—was fundamentally prosecutorial in nature, she is entitled to absolute immunity for this claim."); Pittman v. Cuyahoga County Dept. of Children and Family Services, 640 F.3d 716, 724-26 (6th Cir. 2011) ("[S]ocial workers are absolutely immune only when they are acting in their capacity as legal advocates–initiating court actions or testifying under oath–not when they are performing administrative, investigative, or other functions. The case before us turns on whether the actions of which [the plaintiff] complains were taken by [the defendant social worker] in her capacity as a legal advocate. . . Hurry filed both the complaint and the affidavit in support of the motion for permanent custody in her capacity as a legal advocate, and she is therefore entitled to absolute immunity with regard to these actions. Hurry's submission of the affidavit for publication was conduct intimately associated with the judicial process and also qualifies for absolute immunity. Ensuring adequate service of process in juvenile court proceedings is a judicial function committed to the juvenile court under Ohio law. . . . Hurry's absolute immunity also protects her from Pittman's claim that her allegedly false assertions in the complaint and affidavits stem from an inadequate investigation. For these reasons, the district court erred by determining that Hurry was not absolutely immune from Pittman's claims based on the complaint and two affidavits she submitted to the juvenile court."); Costanich v. Department of Social and Health Services, 627 F.3d 1101, 1109 (9th Cir. 2010) ("The institution of a license revocation proceeding is sufficiently analogous to a decision to institute a custody termination proceeding to deserve absolute immunity. . . .Duron is not entitled to absolute immunity from the claims that she deliberately fabricated evidence in her investigation and made false statements in the sworn declaration submitted in support of the guardianship termination proceedings."); Abdouch v. Burger, 426 F.3d 982, 989 (8th Cir. 2005) (State social workers were entitled to absolute immunity from § 1983 liability for initiating and maintaining termination of parental rights proceedings against mother); Miller v. Gammie, 335 F.3d 889, 897, 898 (9th Cir. 2003) (en banc) ("The Court in Kalina . . . emphasized that it is only the specific function performed, and not the role or title of the official, that is the touchstone of absolute immunity. . . . We must now recognize that beyond those functions historically recognized as absolutely immune at common law, qualified and only qualified immunity exists. . . . The burden is on the official claiming absolute immunity to identify the common-law counterpart to the function that the official asserts is shielded by absolute immunity. . . . The relation of the action to a judicial proceeding, the test we formulated in Babcock, is no longer a relevant standard. . . . Our decision in Meyers is consistent with the controlling Supreme Court decisions. Meyers recognized absolute immunity for social workers only for the discretionary, quasi-prosecutorial decisions to institute court dependency proceedings to take custody away from parents. Meyers, 812 F.2d at 1157. At least two of our sister circuits have also recognized that the scope of absolute immunity for social workers is extremely narrow. See, e.g., Snell v. Tunnell, 920 F.2d 673, 686-91 (10th Cir.1990) (denying absolute immunity to social workers for the function of seeking a protective custody order that did not initiate court proceedings); Vosburg v. Dep't of Soc. Servs., 884 F.2d 133, 135-38 (4th Cir.1989). In Vosburg, citing our court's decision in Meyers, the Fourth Circuit held social workers absolutely immune from liability resulting from a decision to file a removal petition, which was deemed prosecutorial, but not immune for investigating whether a removal petition should be filed. See id."); Eldridge v. Gibson, 332 F.3d 1019, 1021 (6th Cir. 2003) (granting absolute immunity to private attorneys who were appointed as special prosecutors in criminal prosecution against former state prisoner, and who simultaneously represented crime victim in civil action against prisoner); Rippy v. Hattaway, 270 F.3d 416, 422, 423 (6th Cir. 2001) ("Prosecutors and, by analogy, social workers who initiate proceedings related to the welfare of a child are entitled to absolute immunity while functioning in roles intimately associated with the judicial phase of proceedings. . . . The promulgation and enforcement of policies is not related to the judicial phase of child custody proceedings."); Gray v. Poole, 243 F.3d 572, 577 (D.C. Cir. 2001) ("[W]e hold that government attorneys who prosecute child neglect actions perform 'functions analogous to those of a prosecutor [and] should be able to claim absolute immunity with respect to such acts.' [citing Butz] In so doing, we join every circuit that has addressed the question."); Holloway v. Brush, 220 F.3d 767, 775, 779 (6th Cir. 2000) (en banc) ("The analytical key to prosecutorial immunity . . .is advocacy–whether the actions in question are those of an advocate. . . By analogy, social workers are absolutely immune only when they are acting in their capacity as legal advocates–initiating court actions or testifying under oath–not when they are performing administrative, investigative, or other functions. . . . What Brush did was not the evaluation and presentation of evidence. It was not controlling the testimony of her witness. It was not intimately associated with the judicial process, nor was it the function of an advocate. Finally, it was not a recommendation to the county court. It was a usurpation of the judicial process that denied Holloway her right to be heard in court. The proper test is whether Brush has carried her burden of establishing that she was functioning as an advocate when she performed the actions complained of. . . She was not. The judgment of the district court granting summary judgment on grounds of absolute immunity to Defendant Brush is reversed."); Ernst v. Child and Youth Services of Chester County, 108 F.3d 486, 488-89 (3d Cir. 1997) ("Like the other courts of appeals that have addressed the issue, we hold that child welfare workers and attorneys who prosecute dependency proceedings on behalf of the state are entitled to absolute immunity from suit for all of their actions in preparing for and prosecuting such dependency proceedings.").

But see Thomas v. Kaven, 765 F.3d 1183, 1191-94 & nn. 6, 7 (10th Cir. 2014) ("The Supreme Court has not addressed the question of whether social workers can gain absolute immunity from suit for actions functionally analogous to a prosecutor's duties. But at least one Justice has noted potential problems with making absolute immunity available to social workers. See Hoffman v. Harris, 511 U.S. 1060 (1994) (Thomas, J., dissenting from denial of petition for writ of certiorari) ("The courts that have accorded absolute immunity to social workers appear to have overlooked the necessary historical inquiry; none has seriously considered whether social workers enjoyed absolute immunity for their official duties in 1871. If they did not, absolute immunity is unavailable to social workers under § 1983.") . . . . In Snell, we held that the crucial distinction for determining whether a social worker was entitled to absolute immunity was whether the social worker was acting in a way functionally analogous to a prosecutor or in an investigative capacity. . . Because the social workers in that case sought a custody order as part of their investigation into child abuse and before any petition was filed to adjudicate the status of the child, the social workers were acting in an investigative capacity. . . In concluding the social workers could claim only qualified immunity, we held that '[a] social worker seeking a pre-petition order for protective custody functions like a police officer seeking an arrest warrant; a functional approach to immunity requires that those performing like functions receive like immunity.'. . . Other circuits agree that absolute immunity does not protect social workers acting in an investigative capacity, but that it does protect social workers acting in a prosecutorial capacity—such as when initiating child custody proceedings in court. . . . The Thomases urge us to find that the defendants' roles in seeking involuntary commitment were not akin to the role of a prosecutor. They argue, rather, that filing an involuntary residential treatment petition is more akin to the role of a complaining witness. The Supreme Court has held that a complaining witness, as opposed to an official acting in a prosecutorial capacity, is not entitled to absolute immunity. . . The relevant distinction for absolute immunity purposes is whether the official's actions are prosecutorial or testimonial; is the prosecutor acting as an advocate for the state or as fact witness? . . . We need not fully decide this difficult question in this case. The injury alleged by the Thomases derived solely from the defendants' decision to place M.T. on a seven-day emergency medical hold. . . . The infringement on the Thomases' right to familial association stemmed solely from the emergency medical hold the defendants placed on M.T prior to the filing of the petition. Even if we were to find a causal connection between the filing of the petition and the injury, we doubt the defendants would be entitled to absolute immunity for their decision to seek a judicial order. . . . [T]he children's court attorney has the sole discretion to initiate involuntary commitment proceedings. The role of the physician or psychologist under this scheme is more akin to the role of the complaining witness who 'set[s] the wheels of government in motion by instigating a legal action.'. . Extending absolute immunity to government employees who are not statutorily authorized to petition the court directly would be an unwarranted expansion of absolute immunity protection. . . . Extending absolute immunity to those who solicit a government attorney to initiate judicial proceedings is unnecessary to protect the judicial process. . . . The defendants' decision to place an emergency medical hold on M.T. in anticipation of Mrs. Thomas's attempt to discharge M.T. is not protected by absolute immunity. The decision to place the hold was not closely associated with the judicial process. An emergency medical hold is a mechanism for facilities to temporarily prevent a patient's discharge when personnel believe the patient's medical circumstances warrant such a measure. Medical personnel are not required to obtain judicial permission before placing a temporary hold on a patient's discharge. In this case, the medical hold preceded the filing of an involuntary residential treatment petition and was functionally analogous to law enforcement officials taking unilateral emergency action. . . . In sum, the defendants are not entitled to absolute immunity for their decision to place M.T. on a medical hold."); Young v. Vega, 574 F. App'x 684, 689 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Absolute immunity will not bar Young's claims to the extent he has limited the wrongful acts complained of to Vega's swearing to the truth of the facts that provided the evidentiary basis for the juvenile court's probable cause determination."); Kovacic v. Cuyahoga County Dept. of Children and Family Services, 724 F.3d 687, 694 (6th Cir. 2013) ("Concerning the removal of the children from the home, the district court did not err in denying the social workers' motion for absolute immunity. When the social workers removed the children from the home, they were acting in a police capacity rather than as legal advocates."); McNulty v. Massachusetts Dep't of Children & Families, CIV.A. 11-11569-GAO, 2014 WL 4965403, *3 (D. Mass. Sept. 30, 2014) ("There does not appear to be a judicial order deciding specifically whether a DCF employee making recommendations to a juvenile court judge falls into the category of functions intimately associated with the judicial process. However, the First Circuit has found that witness testimony and guardians ad litem are protected by absolute immunity because of their association with the judicial process. . . Similarly, other jurisdictions have found absolute immunity for probation officers preparing presentencing reports, Demoran v. Witt, 781 F.2d 155, 157–58 (9th Cir.1985); grand jurors, Sellars v. Procunier, 641 F.2d 1295, 1301 fn.11 (9th Cir.1981) (internal citations omitted); state parole officers, id. at 1303; court-appointed psychiatrists, LaLonde v. Eissner, 539 N.E.2d 538, 541 (Mass.1989); and social workers initiating child dependency proceedings, Meyers v. Contra Costa County Dep't of Soc. Servs., 812 F.2d 1154, 1156–57 (9th Cir.1987). The defendants' argument that Segura's conduct before the Barnstable Juvenile Court 'falls squarely within the confines of behavior protected by absolute immunity' is convincing. . . Segura's reports may have recommended actions that ultimately resulted in harm to the minor child, but in the end it was the judge who made the final decision, as the defendants point out. . . Moreover, the policy justification and factors articulated in Butz counsel in favor of according the protection of absolute immunity to officials such as Segura.")

See also Newton v. City of New York, 738 F.Supp.2d 397, 408-11 (S.D.N.Y. 2010) ("Here, the testing of the rape kit was 'integral to and subsumed in the advocacy functions being performed in connection with [Newton's] post-conviction initiatives.'. . Ryan's analysis was conducted for the sole purpose of determining whether Newton's continued incarceration was necessarily warranted, not for a general purpose investigation to identify potential suspects in V.J.'s attack. Indeed, '[t]he DNA testing obviously would have bearing on the advocacy work of deciding whether to oppose [Newton's] initiatives' to vacate his conviction. . . . Taken as a whole then, the circumstances of the instant case support absolute immunity for Ryan. Certainly, the extension of absolute immunity to laboratory scientists presents the supremely difficult task of balancing the equities between the public good and individual rights, with 'evils inevitable in either alternative.'. . . [T]he protection of absolute immunity may not be appropriate in a pre-conviction context where the jury's determination of guilt may result from a faulty scientific process, and where the laboratory scientist's role is primarily an investigative one. . . . But these are not the circumstances presented here. Newton had an opportunity to assert his innocence at trial. He presented two alibi witnesses to testify on his behalf and successfully convinced the jury to acquit him of one of the incidents of rape with which he was charged. . . Biological evidence played no role in his initial conviction. Ryan's role in his prolonged incarceration resulted from her participation in a court ordered post-conviction adversarial proceeding, as a state advocate engaged in a search for the truth–thus satisfying 'the ultimate question' for the grant of full immunity.")

But see Cornejo v. Bell, 592 F.3d 121, 128, 129 (2d Cir. 2010) ("[T]he district court was incorrect in its conclusion that the caseworker defendants were also entitled to absolute immunity. . .Although they undoubtedly played a substantial role in providing the information that helped initiate many of the actions here complained of, the caseworker defendants essentially functioned much more like investigators than prosecutors. Even when they made the initial decision to remove Kevin from his mother's custody, their actions were the functional equivalent of police officers' making arrests in criminal cases, which are a classic example of actions entitled to qualified, rather than absolute immunity. . . . Under these circumstances, it was objectively reasonable for the caseworker defendants to believe that immediate temporary removal of both children without prior judicial authorization was proper. . .The caseworker defendants are thus entitled to qualified immunity on the due process and unlawful seizure claims arising from their initial removal of Kevin. As for the subsequent actions taken in Family Court, these actions were chiefly taken by the lawyer defendants, who, as already determined, were entitled to absolute immunity."); Morris v. Dearborne, 181 F.3d 657, 670, 671 (5th Cir. 1999) ("In Hodorowski [v. Ray, 844 F.2d 1210 (5th Cir.1988)], we grappled with the appropriate balance between independence for social workers charged with investigation of child abuse and protection for family privacy. We noted that other circuits have extended to such professionals absolute prosecutorial immunity, analogizing their function to that of executive branch officials who investigate and initiate criminal prosecutions. . . We also recognized that some courts have afforded absolute immunity to child protective service workers for policy reasons rather than by analogy to prosecutors. . . However, we rejected both of those approaches, concluding that qualified, rather than absolute immunity strikes the better balance and allows for the evaluation of the motive for and reasonableness of a welfare worker's challenged actions.").

3. Witnesses

Rehberg v. Paulk , 132 S. Ct. 1497, 1505-08 (2012) ("The factors that justify absolute immunity for trial witnesses apply with equal force to grand jury witnesses. In both contexts, a witness' fear of retaliatory litigation may deprive the tribunal of critical evidence. And in neither context is the deterrent of potential civil liability needed to prevent perjurious testimony. In Briscoe, the Court concluded that the possibility of civil liability was not needed to deter false testimony at trial because other sanctions—chiefly prosecution for perjury—provided a sufficient deterrent. . . Since perjury before a grand jury, like perjury at trial, is a serious criminal offense, see, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 1623(a), there is no reason to think that this deterrent is any less effective in preventing false grand jury testimony. . . .[W]e conclude that grand jury witnesses should enjoy the same immunity as witnesses at trial. This means that a grand jury witness has absolute immunity from any § 1983 claim based on the witness' testimony. In addition, as the Court of Appeals held, this rule may not be circumvented by claiming that a grand jury witness conspired to present false testimony or by using evidence of the witness' testimony to support any other § 1983 claim concerning the initiation or maintenance of a prosecution. . . . In sum, testifying, whether before a grand jury or at trial, was not the distinctive function performed by a complaining witness. It is clear—and petitioner does not contend otherwise—that a complaining witness cannot be held liable for perjurious trial testimony. Briscoe, 460 U.S., at 326. And there is no more reason why a complaining witness should be subject to liability for testimony before a grand jury. Once the distinctive function performed by a 'complaining witness' is understood, it is apparent that a law enforcement officer who testifies before a grand jury is not at all comparable to a 'complaining witness.' By testifying before a grand jury, a law enforcement officer does not perform the function of applying for an arrest warrant; nor does such an officer make the critical decision to initiate a prosecution. . . .Instead, it is almost always a prosecutor who is responsible for the decision to present a case to a grand jury, and in many jurisdictions, even if an indictment is handed up, a prosecution cannot proceed unless the prosecutor signs the indictment. [footnote omitted] It would thus be anomalous to permit a police officer who testifies before a grand jury to be sued for maliciously procuring an unjust prosecution when it is the prosecutor, who is shielded by absolute immunity, who is actually responsible for the decision to prosecute.")

See also Everette-Oates v. Chapman, No. 20-1093, 2021 WL 3089057, at *4-5 (4th Cir. July 22, 2021) (not reported) ("Like the district court, we think that absolute immunity bars much, if not all, of Everette-Oates's Fourth Amendment claim against Chapman. Under Rehberg, Chapman is absolutely immune from any § 1983 claim based on her testimony. . . And that absolute immunity is broad in scope, extending to claims that Chapman presented or conspired to present false evidence, and to claims based on Chapman's preparatory activity in advance of testifying. . . In other words, plaintiffs may not 'simply reframe a claim to attack the preparation instead of the absolutely immune actions themselves.'. . As the district court concluded, Everette-Oates's claims against Chapman 'fall squarely within' that absolute immunity. . . It has been clear since the beginning of this case that Chapman's grand jury testimony is the gravamen of Everette-Oates's claims against her. Each iteration of Everette-Oates's complaint has focused sharply on Chapman's allegedly false or misleading testimony before the grand jury. . . . On appeal, as before the district court, Everette-Oates suggests that she can advance a separate claim against Chapman, falling outside the scope of Rehberg immunity, based on the agent's representations to prosecutor Montanye. Like the district court, we disagree. First, it is not clear that the record in this case would allow a finding that Chapman's conversations with Montanye are not themselves protected by Rehberg, which immunizes not only grand jury testimony itself but also a witness's conversations with prosecutors in preparation for that testimony. . . But in any event, as the district court thoroughly explained, the summary judgment record simply will not support any otherwise viable claim that Chapman violated the Fourth Amendment by concealing or fabricating evidence regarding the Economic Development Committee in her interactions with prosecutor Montanye."); Krause v. Peele, No. 20-16087, 2021 WL 2555634, at *1 (9th Cir. June 22, 2021) (not reported) ("Peele's testimony at trial is entitled to absolute immunity, and he is also entitled to absolute immunity for the preparation of his report. The substance of Peele's report was inextricably tied to his testimony, in particular, because in order for Peele to testify at trial, he was required to produce the report under Arizona Rule of Criminal Procedure 15.1(a)(3). Moreover, Peele prepared the report several months after the initial investigation had been completed at a time when Krause had already been arrested and indicted, Peele never visited the crime scene to gather evidence or speak to witnesses in preparing his report, and his report's role was limited to the evaluation of evidence that had already been collected. Thus, the report is best seen as testimonial in nature prepared with an eye towards trial, and Krause is entitled to absolute immunity."); Knox v. Curtis, No. 18-2989, 2019 WL 2338525, at *2 (7th Cir. June 3, 2019) (not reported) ("The district court properly dismissed Knox's claim that Curtis and Lenting falsely testified at his criminal proceedings and conspired to do so. Both defendants have absolute immunity from a § 1983 damages suit based on their testimony. See Rehberg v. Paulk, 566 U.S. 356, 369 (2012); Briscoe v. LaHue, 460 U.S. 325, 327, 341–45 (1983). This immunity protects both law-enforcement and lay witnesses who testify at grand jury proceedings, trials, or any other adversarial pretrial hearing. . . It also extends to Knox's conspiracy claim, lest the immunity be frustrated by artful pleading."); DiPasquale v. Hawkins, 748 F. App'x 648, ___ & n.6 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Grand-jury witnesses enjoy absolute immunity from suit based on their grand-jury testimony. . . Hawkins argues that here the district court improperly found 'that an exception applied to remove Detective Hawkins'[s] entitlement to absolute immunity, based on King v. Harwood,' claiming King represents a narrow 'exception to the general rule of absolute immunity for grand jury testimony.' . . But King does not represent an exception to absolute immunity for claims based on grand-jury testimony—indeed, it reaffirms that 'absolute immunity is to be afforded to all grand-jury witnesses, even law-enforcement officers who have "conspired to present false testimony."'. . The complaint before us adequately alleges only a claim based on Hawkins's grand jury testimony, and that claim is barred by absolute immunity. DiPasquale argues that he also asserts a malicious prosecution claim. King recognizes that there is a 'thin but conspicuous line between, on the one hand, law-enforcement officers who only provide grand-jury testimony ... and, on the other hand, law-enforcement officers who either (1) "set the wheels of government in motion by instigating a legal action," or (2) "falsify affidavits" or "fabricate evidence concerning an unsolved crime."'. .Hawkins claims that 'DiPasquale never alleges any act by Detective Hawkins "prior to" or "independent of" his grand-jury testimony,'. . . but this is not exactly the case. Although the complaint does allege that Hawkins's grand-jury testimony was 'false, materially incomplete, and/or in reckless disregard of the truth,' it also alleges that 'Hawkins made, influenced, and/or participated in the decision to prosecute' when '[t]here was a lack of probable cause for the criminal prosecution.'. . The complaint also contains factual allegations about Hawkins's role in the investigation independent of his grand-jury testimony, including his decision to pursue a criminal case. Moreover, in assessing DiPasquale's malicious prosecution claim, the magistrate judge properly considered only Hawkins's role in 'setting the prosecution in motion based upon the allegedly false statements of Procter and Herres' and did not consider his testimony before the grand jury. . . .If the complaint intends to identify Hawkins's grand jury testimony as the sole act of participation in the decision to prosecute, then the entire claim is barred by absolute immunity and subject to dismissal."); Stillwagon v. City of Delaware, Ohio, 747 F. App'x 361, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("The district court noted that all this alleged false and fabricated evidence by Detective Segaard was prepared four months before he testified in front of the grand jury. The court concluded that such evidence could be viewed at laying the groundwork for an indictment but could not be viewed as a preparatory activity for grand-jury testimony and therefore not protected by absolute immunity. Applying the legal principles set forth in Rehberg and King, we agree with the district court."); Montoya v. Vigil, 898 F.3d 1056, 1069-71 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Montoya is not necessarily seeking to hold Detective Vigil liable for his testimony, but rather for the unconstitutionally coercive interrogation that happened much before. Had his coerced statements been introduced in some other way—say, through a videotape—Montoya would make exactly the same claim against the Detectives. And, Montoya emphasizes, as broad as Rehberg's language was, the Supreme Court disclaimed any approach that would allow absolute testimonial immunity too broad a reach. . . .Montoya thus suggests a claim is only 'based on' testimony when it depends on the wrongfulness of the testimony at trial, and not simply on the fact the testimony existed. After all, the Supreme Court has admonished that absolute immunity should apply sparingly. . . We have suggested the same once before. [discussing Vogt v. City of Hays, 844 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 2017)] . . . .Vogt supports Montoya's distinction between testimony that merely completes a violation and testimony that forms the basis of the wrongful conduct complained of. But even if Montoya is correct about this distinction, we conclude absolute testimonial immunity bars his claim. Unlike Vogt, who did 'not allege that the defendants acted unlawfully by testifying,'. . . Montoya's claim depends on showing Detective Vigil did act unlawfully by testifying. There is a simple reason for this: the trial court suppressed all testimony about the part of the interrogation Montoya claims was unconstitutionally coercive. Thus, in order to show Detective Vigil introduced his coerced statements at trial, Montoya must show Detective Vigil violated the suppression order—that he acted wrongfully by testifying. Put differently, Montoya is not complaining the Detectives coerced his confession and that his statements happened to be used against him through trial testimony as opposed to some other means; he is claiming both that they coerced his confession and that Detective Vigil unlawfully introduced his statements by disobeying the suppression order. Shielding witnesses from claims their testimony was unlawful is precisely what absolute testimonial immunity is meant to do. We conclude, then, that Montoya's Fifth Amendment claim is 'based on' trial testimony and is barred by absolute immunity."); Stinson v. Gauger, 868 F.3d 516, 529 (7th Cir. 2017) (en banc) ("As we discussed in the panel opinion, Stinson's claims against Johnson and Rawson focused on their actions while Cychosz's murder was being investigated, not on their testimony at trial or preparations to testify at trial. And if a prosecutor does not have absolute immunity for investigating the case, it follows that an expert witness does not either. So Johnson and Rawson are not entitled to absolute immunity."); Miller v. Maddox, 866 F.3d 386, 394-95 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Maddox seems to suggest that he cannot be held liable for the false statements made in the warrant affidavits because his testimony before the judicial commissioner was based on the false statements. His logic is apparently that because he is absolutely immune from § 1983 liability based on his testimony, that he is also immune for the false statements previously made in the affidavits. . . . We conclude. . . that Maddox is not entitled to absolute immunity for the false statements he made in his warrant affidavit."); King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 584-91 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 640 (2018) ("Crucially, . . . Rehberg does not affect the thin but conspicuous line between, on the one hand, law-enforcement officers who only provide grand-jury testimony (including related 'preparatory activity, such as a preliminary discussion in which the witness relates the substance of his intended testimony,' Rehberg, 566 U.S. at 370, and including any conspiracy with prosecutors or other officers to testify falsely), and, on the other hand, law-enforcement officers who either (1) 'set the wheels of government in motion by instigating a legal action,'. . . or (2) 'falsify affidavits' or 'fabricate evidence concerning an unsolved crime[.]'. . . Only qualified immunity extends to the acts of officers in these latter situations. . . .True, Rehberg most certainly applies to our case and affords Harwood absolute immunity from suit to the extent that King's claims are based on his grand-jury testimony, but Rehberg does not afford Harwood absolute immunity for his actions that are prior to, and independent of, his grand-jury testimony. And because King has alleged that Harwood set her prosecution in motion—and that Harwood both sought warrants despite the absence of probable cause and made knowing or reckless false statements implicating King in his investigative report—King may properly base her malicious-prosecution claim on those actions by Harwood without triggering the absolute immunity established by Rehberg. . . .We hold that where (1) a law-enforcement officer, in the course of setting a prosecution in motion, either knowingly or recklessly makes false statements (such as in affidavits or investigative reports) or falsifies or fabricates evidence; (2) the false statements and evidence, together with any concomitant misleading omissions, are material to the ultimate prosecution of the plaintiff; and (3) the false statements, evidence, and omissions do not consist solely of grand-jury testimony or preparation for that testimony (where preparation has a meaning broad enough to encompass conspiring to commit perjury before the grand jury), the presumption that the grand-jury indictment is evidence of probable cause is rebuttable and not conclusive. This exception to the presumption of probable cause finds support in Supreme Court caselaw, in our precedent, and in the decisions of our sister circuits and the district courts. First, the plain language and intent of Rehberg extend absolute immunity to grand-jury witnesses without declaring or even contemplating the complete foreclosure of malicious-prosecution claims. If a grand-jury indictment created an irrebuttable presumption of probable cause (which it would if the only way to overcome such a presumption were to rely on grand-jury testimony that is inadmissible under Rehberg), then there would be no point in distinguishing, as Rehberg and even Sanders did, cases in which a law-enforcement officer has set the prosecution in motion, for a plaintiff would be unable to prove the lack-of-probable-cause element of a malicious-prosecution claim even in such cases. Moreover, the Supreme Court's recent decision in Manuel v. Joliet, No. 14-9496 (U.S. Mar. 21, 2017), considered and rejected the argument that either a judge's finding of probable cause or 'a grand jury indictment or preliminary examination' forecloses a Fourth Amendment claim arising from unlawful pretrial detention. . . . The Court in Manuel went on: 'Whatever its precise form, if the proceeding [finding probable cause] is tainted—as here, by fabricated evidence—and the result is that probable cause is lacking, then the ensuing pretrial detention violates the confined person's Fourth Amendment rights.'. . Second, maintaining the viability of malicious-prosecution claims against officers who wrongly set prosecutions in motion is rooted in the common-law distinction of 'complaining witnesses,' who—unlike testifying witnesses—were not afforded absolute immunity, as Rehberg details at length. . . . Third, the decisions of our court have, since our court first recognized 'malicious prosecution' as a § 1983 claim cognizable under the Fourth Amendment, slowly but continually articulated both the elements of the claim and the contours of the exceptions to the presumption that an indictment provides proof of probable cause. . . Though Sanders states in dicta that 'it is well-established in this circuit that an indictment by a grand jury conclusively determines the existence of probable cause unless the defendant-officer "knowingly or recklessly present[ed] false testimony to the grand jury,"'. . . this statement mistakes the precedents it cites: while we certainly said in those cases that an officer's false statements to a grand jury are sufficient to overcome the presumption of probable cause, we have not said that such statements are necessary to do so. . . Nor did we have reason in Webb or other cases specifically to address the question whether the presumption of probable cause may be overcome by an officer's wrongful setting in motion of a prosecution or falsification or fabrication of evidence apart from the officer's grand-jury testimony, either because Rehberg had not yet been pronounced (as in Cook) or because the parties waived the applicability of Rehberg by failing to raise it (as in Webb and Robertson). None of these cases, which are the only cases cited by Sanders for its far-reaching statement that false grand-jury testimony is the only means of overcoming the presumption of probable cause, foreclose our adoption of the rule we pronounce today, which only clarifies, in light of Rehberg's distinction of ordinary grand-jury witnesses and officers who do more than only testify before a grand jury, that a plaintiff may overcome the presumption of probable cause in cases like King's upon a showing that the officer has made knowing or reckless false statements or has falsified or fabricated evidence in the course of setting a prosecution in motion. Fourth, there is no logical obstacle to the rule we articulate today. According to the discussion in Sanders, . . . a malicious-prosecution claim resting on evidence other than grand-jury testimony would seemingly fail for one of two reasons in attempting to overcome the presumption of probable cause created by an indictment: (1) if the other evidence were material to the grand jury's return of the indictment, then the evidence must have been introduced to the grand jury by means of grand-jury testimony (how else would the grand jury know of it?), in which case absolute immunity would foreclose a claim based on that evidence; or (2) if the evidence were not material to the indictment, then the plaintiff would be unable to show that probable cause did not exist apart from the evidence, and thus would be unable to prevail on the merits of a malicious-prosecution claim. . . But an officer's actions of wrongly setting a prosecution in motion or falsifying or fabricating evidence may be material to the grand-jury indictment even though they do not constitute 'testimony' or related preparation for testimony, and nothing in the caselaw indicates that such actions somehow mutate into grand-jury testimony simply because they are material to the return of an indictment. . . .Fifth, other courts have likewise rejected the proposition that Rehberg completely forecloses malicious-prosecution claims against law-enforcement officers who set a prosecution in motion or who falsify or fabricate evidence. . . .Applying our rule, we therefore hold that King has raised genuine issues of material fact as to (1) whether Harwood set King's prosecution in motion by applying for search warrants despite the lack of probable cause to search, by seeking King's indictment despite the lack of probable cause on which to prosecute King for murder, or by making knowing or reckless false statements in Harwood's investigative report; (2) whether any false statements made by Harwood, together with his material omissions of facts—if true—such as King's having one leg, the fact that the bullet wounds in Breeden's skull were non-exiting, or Harwood's knowledge that the bullets in King's home did not match the bullets that killed Breeden, were material to King's prosecution; and (3) whether any such false statements, evidence, and omissions were independent of Harwood's grand-jury testimony, so as to constitute 'laying the groundwork for an indictment,'. . rather than the sort of 'preparatory activity' in advance of a grand-jury hearing that would provide absolute immunity under Rehberg[.]. . . Thus, King has raised genuine issues of material fact sufficient to overcome, at least at summary judgment, the presumption that King's indictment is proof of probable cause. Accordingly, we hold that Rehberg does not bar King's claims on the basis of absolute immunity, nor does Rehberg preclude the possibility that King may prevail on the merits of her malicious-prosecution claim."); Avery v. City of Milwaukee, 847 F.3d 433, 440-43 (7th Cir. 2017) ("The judge's second reason for setting aside the verdict rested on the immunity rule that witnesses at a criminal trial cannot be sued for damages flowing from their testimony. See generally Briscoe v. LaHue, 460 U.S. 325 (1983). The judge thought the detectives' perjured testimony—and not their falsification of the confession—actually caused Avery's injury. So he concluded that the due-process claims were blocked by absolute immunity. This rationale is flawed for two reasons. First, virtually any item of evidence introduced at trial must be authenticated by oral testimony. . . Here, the detectives testified about Avery's 'confession' and authenticated their false reports memorializing it; the reports were then introduced into the trial record. If an officer who fabricates evidence can immunize himself from liability by authenticating falsified documentary or physical evidence and then repeating the false 'facts' in his trial testimony, wrongful-conviction claims premised on evidence fabrication would be a dead letter. That would squarely conflict with our caselaw—most notably Whitlock—and would put us at odds with every other circuit to consider the viability of due-process claims premised on fabricated evidence. . . Second, and more fundamentally, the judge's reasoning is utterly at odds with the Supreme Court's decision in Buckley v. Fitzsimmons, 509 U.S. 259 (1993). There the Court held that although a prosecutor is absolutely immune from liability for the actions he takes during the course of a prosecution, he remains subject to liability for misconduct committed in an investigative capacity 'before he has probable cause to have anyone arrested.'. . We've read the Buckley exception to mean that a 'prosecutor cannot retroactively immunize himself from conduct by perfecting his wrong-doing through introducing the fabricated evidence at trial and arguing that the tort was not completed until a time at which he had acquired absolute immunity.' . . Although this case involves evidence fabrication by detectives, not a prosecutor, the judge's ruling gives the detectives' testimony precisely that impermissible effect. It's true that the detectives' testimony was a factual predicate for Avery's claim: A § 1983 claim requires a constitutional violation, and the due-process violation wasn't complete until the false confession was introduced at Avery's trial, resulting in his conviction and imprisonment for a murder he did not commit. See Cairel v. Alderden, 821 F.3d 823, 831 (7th Cir. 2016) (explaining that the plaintiff's acquittal foreclosed his due-process evidence-fabrication claim); see also Whitlock, 682 F.3d at 582. After all, it was the admission of the false confession that made Avery's trial unfair. As we explained in Fields II, however, under common-law causation principles, '[h]e who creates the defect is responsible for the injury that the defect foreseeably causes later.'. . When the detectives falsified their reports of a nonexistent confession, it was entirely foreseeable that this fabricated 'evidence' would be used to convict Avery at trial for Griffin's murder. That was, of course, the whole point of concocting the confession. An unbroken causal chain connects the acts of evidence fabrication to Avery's wrongful conviction and imprisonment. The detectives are liable under § 1983 for this due-process violation even though their trial testimony, standing alone, would not subject them to damages liability. So the judge was wrong to set aside the verdict on this ground. The jury's verdict—including the City's liability on the Monell claim, which is not independently challenged—must be reinstated."); Canen v. Chapman, 847 F.3d 407, 414-15 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Ultimately, Ms. Canen has pointed us to no case that establishes the legal principle that an officer is obliged to reveal the limitations on his training when he has stated his background, such as it is, and then exposed himself to cross-examination by the defense. We accordingly see no reason to conclude that Detective Chapman's failure to declare affirmatively his lack of training in latent fingerprint evaluation violated any clearly established right. . . To the extent that Ms. Canen's allegation focuses on Detective Chapman's actual testimony and his preparation for that testimony, he also is protected by the traditional absolute immunity accorded to witnesses at a judicial proceeding. It is long-established that witnesses enjoy absolute immunity, Briscoe v. LaHue, 460 U.S. 325, 330–33 (1983), and we have acknowledged that this protection covers the preparation of testimony as well as its actual delivery in court, Newsome v. McCabe, 319 F.3d 301, 304 (7th Cir. 2003). The rule is designed to aid the search for truth by limiting any fear of recrimination, which in turn decreases any attendant motivation to self-censor."); Royse v. Wilbers, No. 16-5199, 2016 WL 5682710, at *1 (6th Cir. Oct. 3, 2016) (not published) ("In cases raising an absolute immunity issue, courts have followed Rehberg in concluding that, in claims for malicious prosecution based only on grand-jury testimony, absolute immunity applies. See Coggins v. Buonora, 776 F.3d 108, 113 (2d Cir. 2015). We have reached the same conclusion in several unpublished decisions. See Kavanaugh v. Lexington Fayette Urban Cty. Gov't, 638 Fed.Appx. 446, 454–55 (6th Cir. 2015); Vaughan v. City of Shaker Heights, 514 Fed.Appx. 611, 613 (6th Cir. 2013)."); Morris v. Town of Lexington Alabama, 748 F.3d 1316, 1321 n. 14 (11th Cir. 2014) ("The Supreme Court's decision in Rehberg v. Paulk, . . . which was not brought to the District Court's attention before it issued the rulings being appealed, foreclose the claims in Counts IV and V, as Morris readily concedes. Those two counts are based in significant part on the testimony Bradford, Bowers, and Wigginton provided to the Lauderdale County District Attorney and subsequently to the grand jury. Rehberg holds that 'a grand jury witness has absolute immunity from any § 1983 claim based on the witness'[s] testimony.'. . The Court also held that this absolute immunity 'may not be circumvented by claiming that a grand jury witness conspired to present false testimony or by using evidence of the witness'[s] testimony to support any other § 1983 claim concerning the initiation or maintenance of a prosecution.'"); Morales v. City of New York, 752 F.3d 234, 237 (2d Cir. 2014) ("[T]he rationale supporting immunity for grand jury witnesses in § 1983 actions applies with equal force to Bivens suits. Each of the policy justifications that Rehberg cited in support of granting absolute immunity to grand jury witnesses exists in the context of a Bivens action. . . And second, extending Rehberg's shelter to Bivens liability reflects the 'general trend in the appellate courts,'. . . of incorporating § 1983 law into Bivens suits. The District Court therefore correctly held that to the extent that Morales's claims are based on Arnett's grand jury testimony, Rehberg forecloses them under both Bivens and § 1983.").

See also O'Connell v. Alejo, No. 18-CV-01359-RBJ, 2020 WL 1244852, at *4 (D. Colo. Mar. 16, 2020) ("Ms. O'Connell does not challenge defendants' trial testimony, but rather the evidence they provided prior to trial that resulted in her arrest and prosecution, including Tuggle's notes and report, Alejo's report, his affidavit in support of her arrest warrant, and the statement she alleges he fabricated. Though some of this evidence was used at trial to convict Ms. O'Connell, defendants are not entitled to immunity for claims challenging its veracity.[citing Montoya v. Vigil, 898 F.3d 1056, 1070 (10th Cir. 2018)]"); Lucien-Calixte v. David, No. CV 17-11312-NMG, 2019 WL 4417690, at *4 (D. Mass. Sept. 16, 2019) ("Absolute immunity protects a state official from § 1983 suits based on grand jury testimony. . . This Court previously allowed defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings, finding that Officer David was entitled to absolute immunity because plaintiff's initial complaint was based on his grand jury testimony. . . In contrast, the allegations in plaintiff's amended complaint are not based on grand jury testimony. Instead, plaintiff's amended complaint alleges injury based on Officer David's inclusion of false statements in his police report and the concealing of evidence. Consequently, Officer David is not entitled to absolute immunity. . . .Plaintiff alleges that Officer David deliberately falsified statements in his police report and concealed evidence. There is no doubt that any reasonable officer would have recognized that falsifying witness statements and excluding potentially exculpatory evidence to establish probable cause violates an individual's constitutional right to be free from unreasonable arrest and prosecution. Because Officer David is entitled to neither absolute nor qualified immunity and Lucien-Calixte has stated a claim of malicious prosecution, defendants' motion to dismiss Count I, with respect to plaintiff's § 1983 malicious prosecution claim, will be denied."); Allen v. Rucker, No. 5:17-CV-00340-JMH, 2018 WL 1611595, at *4–6 (E.D. Ky. Apr. 3, 2018) ("Citing Manuel, the Supreme Court recently granted certiorari, vacated the judgment, and remanded a Sixth Circuit case decided only two months before Manuel. Sanders v. Jones, 138 S. Ct. 640 (2018). In the original Sixth Circuit case, Sanders v. Jones, 845 F.3d 721 (6th Cir. 2017), the circuit found 'it is well-established in this circuit that an indictment by a grand jury conclusively determines the existence of probable cause unless the defendant-officer "knowingly or recklessly presented false testimony to the grand jury to obtain the indictment."'. . The court further explained that Rehberg eliminated plaintiff's ability to rebut probable cause because grand-jury testimony was now untouchable. . . This created a 'harsh' consequence by 'largely foreclosing malicious prosecution claims where the plaintiff was indicted.'. . The circuit has since eased the 'harsh' result recognized in Sanders. In King v. Harwood, the court created a new exception allowing plaintiffs indicted by a grand jury to rebut probable cause in malicious prosecution cases where:
(1) a law-enforcement officer, in the course of setting a prosecution in motion, either knowingly or recklessly makes false statements (such as in affidavits or investigative reports) or falsifies or fabricates evidence; (2) the false statements and evidence, together with any concomitant misleading omissions, are material to the ultimate prosecution of the plaintiff; and (3) the false statements, evidence, and omissions do not consist solely of grand-jury testimony or preparation for that testimony (where preparation has a meaning broad enough to encompass conspiring to commit perjury before the grand jury), the presumption that the grand-jury indictment is evidence of probable cause is rebuttable and not conclusive.

852 F.3d at 587-88.

The court reasoned that this exception fits Rehberg's framework by allowing actions against 'complaining witnesses' (as opposed to 'testifying witnesses') who 'set the wheels of government in motion by instigating an action.'. . King further explains that the new exception aligns with the Supreme Court's decision in Manuel and circuit precedent. . . But King did not disturb the absolute immunity afforded to officers in malicious prosecution cases "to the extent that [Plaintiff's] claims are based on [Defendant's] grand-jury testimony.". . . Accordingly, plaintiffs cannot use grand-jury testimony to rebut probable cause. . . But plaintiffs may use evidence from outside the grand-jury room to rebut probable cause. . . Thus, the analysis does not begin and end with grand-jury testimony. To the contrary, 'actions that are prior to, and independent of, [an officer's] grand-jury testimony' may rebut the probable-cause presumption. . . . As such, a grand-jury indictment in the Sixth Circuit is no longer 'a talisman that always wards off a malicious-prosecution claim.'. . A plaintiff can overcome the grand-jury-indictment-created probable cause through 'pre-indictment nontestimonial acts that were material to the prosecution.'. . As such, to state a claim for malicious prosecution in a case where a grand-jury indictment has been issued, a plaintiff must plead specific facts showing a defendant-officer made false statements or fabricated evidence that set the prosecution in motion. Without more, a plaintiff cannot rebut the presumption of probable cause established by a grand-jury indictment. . . .King did not alter the federal pleading standard; it established a new route around the probable cause presumption created by a grand jury indictment. To take that route, a plaintiff must show that the officer made false statements or fabricated evidence, and those actions set the wheels of prosecution in motion. . . And to plead that a defendant-officer made false statements or fabricated evidence, a plaintiff must identify specific instances of such false statements or fabricated evidence. . . In other words, a plaintiff must tell the court what particular evidence was fabricated or what particular testimony was falsified. General statements alleging false, misleading, or fabricated evidence, without more, amount to vague conclusory allegations, 'not specific allegations necessary to survive a motion to dismiss.'. . . In sum, although Allen says Rucker employed improper tactics, concealed facts, suppressed evidence, omitted material facts, presented false information, and misled prosecutors, Allen fails to explain any of her allegations. She does not point to a single specific instance of any of these things happening. Simply saying so does not make it true. Nor does it satisfy the federal pleading standard. Even in her response to Rucker's Motion to Dismiss, Allen fails to include any specific factual allegations supporting her claims. Without any factual allegations, Allen's claims fail. Her complaint reads precisely like those in Meeks, Bickerstaff, and Rapp: general, vague, and conclusory allegations unsupported by specific facts. Without any particular facts, these statements amount to legal conclusions and do not provide a basis for surviving a motion to dismiss.").

Jones v. Dalton, 867 F.Supp.2d 572, 584 (D.N.J. 2012) ("Porter, as an investigator, is not entitled to prosecutorial immunity, but seeks absolute immunity with respect to his grand jury testimony. After briefing closed on these Motions, the Supreme Court resolved a Circuit split in Rehberg v. Paulk . . . . The work in preparation for such testimony is also absolutely immune. . .Accordingly, Porter may not be held liable for § 1983 claims on the basis of his grand jury testimony or preparatory work therefor. . . . Both malicious prosecution and First Amendment retaliation claims require Plaintiff to prove that the proceeding was not initiated with probable cause. . . A grand jury indictment is prima facie evidence of probable cause. Absolute immunity prohibits Jones from rebutting this presumption with evidence that Porter made misrepresentations to the grand jury. Accordingly, the Motion will be granted on these two claims.").

But see Lisker v. City of Los Angeles, 780 F.3d 1237, 1242-43 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Immunity for pre-testimony conduct. . . 'is not limitless.'. . In addressing claims of witness immunity, we have distinguished conspiracies to testify falsely from 'non-testimonial' acts, such as 'tampering with documentary or physical evidence or preventing witnesses from coming forward.'. . Our sister Circuits have done the same. [citing cases] The detectives argue that the notes and reports in the Murder Book are 'inextricably tied' to their testimony because these documents were not introduced at trial, and their purpose was to memorialize the substance of eventual testimony. We disagree. As the Sixth Circuit has recognized, police investigative materials have evidentiary value wholly apart from assisting trial testimony—they 'comprise part of the documentary record before the prosecution and defense' and affect charging decisions, plea bargaining, and cross-examination of the investigating officers. . . This non-testimonial evidentiary value distinguishes the materials in the Murder Book from pre-trial activity aimed exclusively at influencing testimony. . . The materials in the Murder Book are analogous to the sorts of documentary and physical evidence—such as falsified videotaped interviews and forensic reports—that fall outside the protection of absolute immunity. . . . The same conclusion applies to the allegedly falsified reconstruction of the crime scene. The photographs from the reconstruction were introduced at trial. . . They are therefore squarely governed by this Court's previous holding that 'a pretrial, out-of-court effort to ... fabricate physical evidence ... is not "inextricably tied"—or tied at all—to any witness' own testimony,' even '[i]f a potential witness does happen to be involved.'". . .Landgren and Monsue plainly acted in an investigative capacity in producing the Murder Book and crime-scene photographs. Qualified immunity provides sufficient protection for these activities. . . .The circumstances presented here fall squarely outside the carefully limited holding of Rehberg."); Coggins v. Buonora, 776 F.3d 108, 112-14 (2d Cir. 2015) ("The question before us is whether a law enforcement officer is entitled to absolute immunity as a grand jury witness pursuant to Rehberg when a § 1983 plaintiff alleges that the officer withheld and falsified evidence in addition to committing perjury before the grand jury—an issue of first impression in our circuit. . . .Buonora asserts that, at its core, Coggins's claims all 'involve his grand jury appearance.'. . We disagree. Buonora's interpretation of Rehberg would set a dangerous precedent: Any police officer could immunize for § 1983 purposes any unlawful conduct prior to and independent of his perjurious grand jury appearance merely by testifying before a grand jury. Such an outcome would also be inconsistent with the limitations Rehberg explicitly imposes on the scope of the absolute immunity, which the Supreme Court instructed was not to 'extend[ ] to all activity that a witness conducts outside of the grand jury room.'. . When a police officer claims absolute immunity for his grand jury testimony under Rehberg, the court should determine whether the plaintiff can make out the elements of his § 1983 claim without resorting to the grand jury testimony. If the claim exists independently of the grand jury testimony, it is not 'based on' that testimony, as that term is used in Rehberg. . . Conversely, if the claim requires the grand jury testimony, the defendant enjoys absolute immunity under Rehberg. . . .In this case, the TAC plausibly alleges misconduct by Buonora without reference to his perjurious grand jury testimony. The TAC's allegations are based on, among other things, Defendants' police reports, the statements of the unnamed Floral Park Police Officer, Buonora's knowledge of the falsity of Vara's police report, Buonora's statements to the district attorney, . . . and police radio transmissions. All of these facts existed before Buonora's March 2005 grand jury testimony and are independently actionable under § 1983 such that Coggins would be able to prove his claims without ever relying on the officers' grand jury testimony. . . The fact that Buonora's grand jury testimony paralleled information he gave in other contexts does not mean that Coggins's malicious prosecution claim was 'based on' Buonora's grand jury testimony. . . Rather it was based on Buonora's conduct that laid the groundwork for Coggins's indictment. The TAC alleges misconduct by Buonora that is not based on his grand jury testimony, and the district court properly found that absolute immunity is inappropriate."); Frederick v. New York City, No. 11 Civ. 469(JPO), 2012 WL 4947806, at *3, *4 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 11, 2012) ("Appearing in this case to oppose Plaintiff's request, the DA invokes the Supreme Court's recent opinion in Rehberg v. Paulk, 132 S.Ct. 1497 (2012), as the beginning and the end of the analysis, categorically foreclosing the relief sought by Plaintiff here. If the DA's position were correct—and Rehberg barred the use of grand jury witness testimony in a malicious prosecution suit brought under § 1983—then Plaintiff could not establish a particularized need to unseal A.C.'s grand jury records. Accordingly, the DA's argument is addressed at the outset. In Rehberg, a unanimous Court held that grand jury witnesses enjoy absolute immunity from § 1983 liability based on their testimony. . . It also declined to recognize exceptions for complaining witnesses or law enforcement witnesses. . .To preempt exceptions that could swallow its rule, the Court noted that this grant of immunity 'may not be circumvented by claiming that a grand jury witness conspired to present false testimony, or by using evidence of the witness' testimony to support any other § 1983 claim concerning the initiation or maintenance of a prosecution.'. . Without such a corollary to its main holding, Rehberg would soon become a nullity, since 'a criminal defendant turned civil plaintiff could simply reframe a claim to attack the preparation instead of the absolutely immune actions themselves.'. . This context is critical to an understanding of the specific language with which the Court expounded and protected its new rule. . . That very language rests at the heart of the DA's argument, which fixates on the final clause of the Rehberg corollary: a ban on 'using evidence of the [grand jury] witness' testimony to support any other § 1983 claim concerning the initiation or maintenance of a prosecution.'At first glance, this language appears to support the DA's position that Rehberg-whether intentionally or inadvertently-precludes the introduction of any grand jury testimony as evidence in a § 1983 malicious prosecution claim. Yet the apparent incongruity between such a sweeping prohibition and the traditionally narrow compass of absolute immunity doctrine suggests the need for a closer look. .

. So does the oddity of locating this doctrinal innovation in a corollary whose stated purpose is to protect grand jury witness immunity. The question is thus whether Rehberg's reference to 'any other § 1983 claim' refers to any claim at all-or, as Plaintiff urges, to any claim against the witness who testified. This is almost, but not quite, a question of first impression. The DA offers four citations to support his claim. Three of these cases, however, are inapposite, since they do not address circumstances where a witness other than the § 1983 defendant, and with whom the defendant had not conspired, offered the disputed grand jury testimony. . . Upon careful review of the opinion, this Court holds that Rehberg does not create a categorical bar to the use of grand jury testimony as evidence against defendants in malicious prosecution suits brought pursuant to § 1983. Rather, where Rehberg bans 'using evidence of the witness' testimony to support any other § 1983 claim concerning the initiation or maintenance of a prosecution,' that decision prohibits only the use of a witness's own grand jury testimony against that witness if he or she subsequently becomes a § 1983 defendant."); Sankar v. City of New York, No. 07 CV 4726(RJD)(SMG), 2012 WL 2923236, *2, *3 (E.D.N.Y. July 18, 2012) ("Defendants cite Rehberg v. Paulk to argue that Officer Ostrowski is absolutely immune from 'any § 1983 claim based on the witness' testimony.'. . Defendants argue that Rehberg 'clearly counsels against the Court's finding' that Ostrowski's signing of the sworn criminal complaint alone is sufficient to satisfy the initiation prong of a malicious prosecution claim. . . In Rehberg, the Supreme Court held that an investigator employed by the DA's office was entitled to the same absolute immunity under Section 1983 as a trial witness. In dicta, the Court observed: 'By testifying before a grand jury, a law enforcement officer does not perform the function of applying for an arrest warrant; nor does such an officer make the critical decision to initiate a prosecution.... [S]uch a witness, unlike a complaining witness at common law, does not make the decision to press criminal charges.'. . Rehberg, however, is inapplicable. Rehberg did not alter controlling Second Circuit (and New York) law that an officer's filing of a sworn complaint is sufficient to satisfy the initiation prong of a malicious prosecution claim. Ostrowski's testifying at the grand jury was but one additional step this officer took in his effort to push the case against plaintiff forward. If anything, Rehberg reinforces the distinction between one who simply testifies at a grand jury and 'does not make the decision to press criminal charges,' Rehberg, 132 S.Ct. at 1508, and one, like Ostrowski, who 'set[s] the wheels of government in motion by instigating a legal action.'. . Defendants' attempt to convert grand jury testimony into an all-purpose shield from malicious prosecution liability is unpersuasive. The adoption of such a broad interpretation of Rehberg would allow any police officer—regardless of the extent of their involvement in laying the groundwork for an indictment—to escape liability merely by securing an appearance before a grand jury.").

See also Vidro v. U.S., 720 F.3d 148, 149 (2d Cir. 2013) ("We must address two questions of first impression in this circuit: (1) whether, in FTCA suits, the United States may assert all defenses available to private persons; and (2) whether grand jury witness testimony is absolutely privileged under Connecticut law. Although our analysis is different from that of the district court, we concur with its ultimate conclusion that, if its agents would enjoy immunity from suit under state tort law, the United States may also assert immunity in FTCA actions. Further, because Connecticut would recognize an absolute privilege for grand jury witness testimony, the United States is not vicariously liable under the FTCA for the officers' statements before the federal grand jury. The district court's order of dismissal is affirmed.").

Briscoe v. LaHue, 460 U.S. 325, 342 (1983) (police officers entitled to absolute immunity for claims brought pursuant to § 1983 arising out of allegedly perjured testimony at criminal trials); Vakilian v. Shaw, 335 F.3d 509, 516 (6th Cir. 2003)(investigator denied absolute immunity for role in procuring arrest warrant and for his testimony as a "complaining witness"); Harris v. Roderick, 126 F.3d 1189, 1199 (9th Cir. 1997) ("While Cooper and Roderick are correct that police officers are generally entitled to absolute immunity for perjury committed in the course of official proceedings, Briscoe v. LaHue, 460 U.S. 325, 103 S.Ct. 1108, 75 L.Ed.2d 96 (1983), complaining witnesses who wrongfully bring about a prosecution generally are not. Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. 335, 341, 106 S.Ct. 1092, 89 L.Ed.2d 271 (1986). While we have extended the absolute immunity that exists for the testimony of law enforcement officials at the trial stage to other fora, including grand juries, we have not considered the question whether there is an exception to the absolute immunity rule with respect to law enforcement witnesses who serve functionally as complaining witnesses. In other words, we have not determined whether Malley provides an exception to Briscoe. The Second, Fifth, Seventh, and Tenth Circuits have expressly concluded, however, that law enforcement officials are not entitled to absolute immunity for false testimony when they function as complaining witnesses. [citing cases] . . . . We agree with the reasoning of the other circuits and hold that if Cooper and Roderick functionally served as complaining witnesses who may be said to have initiated Harris's prosecution they are not entitled to absolute immunity for their false statements."); Mejia v. City of New York, 119 F. Supp.2d 232, 273 n.38 (E.D.N.Y. 2000) ("Like a prosecutor's knowing use of false evidence to obtain a tainted conviction, a police officer's fabrication and forwarding to prosecutors of known false evidence works an unacceptable 'corruption of the truth-seeking function of the trial process.' [citing Ricciuti, 124 F.3d at 130] . . . Similarly, in the context of a § 1983 malicious prosecution claim, defendants should not be able to claim qualified immunity on the basis of an objectively reasonable belief that probable cause existed, where there is evidence on which a reasonable juror could find that the defendants induced the prosecutor to commence proceedings through the presentation of false testimony.").

See also Rolon v. Henneman, 517 F.3d 140, 145-47 (2d Cir. 2008) ("Because absolute immunity is 'justified and defined by the functions it protects and serves, not by the person to whom it attaches,' Forrester v. White, 484 U.S. 219, 227 (1988), in Austern v. Chicago Board of Options Exchange, Inc., 898 F.2d 882 (2d Cir.1990), we extended the common law protection of immunity accorded to judges to arbitrators in contractually-agreed upon arbitration proceedings. . . . Rolon urges that our holding in Austern should represent the limit of absolute immunity conferred to participants in the arbitration process; he argues that there is no sound basis for extending the absolute immunity doctrine to witnesses testifying at police disciplinary hearings of the type involved in this case. We do not agree. . . . The policy rationale for witness immunity, as articulated by the Supreme Court in Briscoe, applies with equal or near equal force in the arbitral context . . . . Applying the Supreme Court's reasoning in Briscoe, we therefore conclude that because the nature of this arbitration was materially indistinguishable to that of formal judicial proceedings, and because Henneman performed the same function as his judicial witness counterpart, absolute immunity should attach to Henneman as a testifying witness at the arbitration hearings. . . We acknowledge, however, that not all arbitrations will be conducted in a manner equivalent to that of the judicial process. . . The procedural safeguards employed in arbitrations may vary, altering the function of witnesses accordingly. We need not and do not opine as to the minimum safeguards required in order for absolute immunity to attach in other arbitral settings. It suffices for our decision that the arbitral proceeding at issue encompassed an adequate number of safeguards so as to ensure that its function and the function of the witnesses sufficiently mirrored the judicial process. Accordingly, we hold that, under a functional approach to immunity, Henneman is absolutely immune for his testimony in the arbitration proceedings."); Todd v. Weltman, Weinberg & Reis Co., L.P.A., 434 F.3d 432, 440-44, 447 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Plaintiff contends that Defendant should not receive absolute immunity for its affidavit because there were no procedural safeguards in insuring the veracity of the affidavit at the time it was submitted, due to the ex parte, nonadversarial nature of the initiation of garnishment proceedings under Ohio law. . . . While Plaintiff's proposed inquiry of adversarial-nonadversarial for questions of absolute immunity is viscerally appealing, considering the ease of its application and its partial support in the rationale of Briscoe, it is ultimately unviable. We agree with the cited cases insofar as they stand for the proposition that witness testimony at an adversarial proceeding is entitled to absolute immunity, because this proposition is supported by the rationale in Briscoe that witness immunity, coupled with 'the crucible of the judicial process,' is the path that would best 'lead to the ascertainment of truth.' . . . We do not agree, however, that the nonadversarial nature of a proceeding automatically precludes applicability of absolute immunity to witness testimony given at such a proceeding. One glaring example not mentioned by either Plaintiff or Defendant is witness testimony in grand jury proceedings. A grand jury proceeding is the quintessential form of an ex parte, nonadversarial proceeding where many of the procedural safeguards of a trial do not exist. Despite this fact, most circuits, including this circuit, have held that absolute witness immunity applies to witness testimony before a grand jury. . . .The question then becomes what the proper inquiry actually should be. We find that a reviewing court should look at the twin rationales listed in Briscoe: insuring that a witness is unafraid of providing testimony, and, when the witness testifies, insuring that the witness is not impermissibly pressured to alter her testimony. . . .Additionally, a reviewing court should look to the common law to determine whether immunity was available in specific instances. . . . The case law cited above demonstrates that states have allowed claims where a plaintiff alleges an improper garnishment, whether the claim is one of malicious prosecution, abuse of process, or wrongful garnishment. This includes a claim that the defendant improperly garnished exempt property. The defendant is not entitled to absolute immunity to counter these claims; instead, he has the defenses of probable cause and lack of malice. This common law backdrop generally indicates that Defendant would not be absolutely immune from suit for an improper garnishment. The question then becomes whether Defendant, although not immune from suit, should receive absolute immunity for the statements he made in the affidavit. From the Supreme Court precedent previously discussed, this Court draws several rules:

(1) A private witness testifying at trial is absolutely immune for her testimony;

(2) A private witness testifying at a grand jury is absolutely immune for her testimony;

(3) A private witness testifying as a complaining witness has no immunity for her testimony.

This Court finds that Defendant is a complaining witness. . . . From a practical perspective, treating Defendant as a complaining witness without immunity simply makes sense. The Court reserves absolute immunity for individuals when they functionally serve as 'integral parts of the judicial process,' such as judges, advocates, and witnesses in their ordinary judicial roles. . . The purpose of this immunity is to preserve the integrity of our judicial system, not to assist a self-interested party who allegedly lies in an affidavit to initiate a garnishment proceeding.").

See also Manning v. Miller, 355 F.3d 1028, 1031-33 (7th Cir. 2004) ("Ultimately, in this case, whether Agents Buchan and Miller are entitled to absolute immunity depends on how this court allows Manning to characterize his claim. On one hand, Agents Buchan and Miller believe this is merely a dressed-up claim of perjury and conspiracy to commit perjury (and therefore want absolute immunity). On the other hand, Manning characterizes this as a Brady claim [footnote omitted], that is, a claim for the withholding of exculpatory evidence (and claims there is no absolute immunity). The facts of this case are unique, after considering them closely we feel that Manning's claim may properly be brought under Brady and the agents are not entitled to absolute immunity. The law regarding immunity is very fact dependent, and the various facts courts have considered reveal a spectrum of behavior that has ultimately been categorized as immune or not immune. On the end of the spectrum where behavior is solidly considered to be immune from civil liability is perjury. . . . On the other end of the spectrum are cases where prosecutors withhold exculpatory evidence; in these cases they are not immune. . . . Agents Buchan and Miller worry that permitting Manning to style his cause of action as a Brady claim rather than a perjury claim will 'perform an effective end run around' testimonial immunity. . . We agree that in some cases it may be hard to distinguish the two. [footnote omitted] However, in this case Manning is accusing the agents of behavior that goes well beyond testimony given at trial. Additionally, while we must certainly be careful not to diminish testimonial immunity, we must also be cautious of eroding the viability of Brady claims. Considered from a different view, one could argue that appellants ask us to create a rule that would eliminate the availability of Brady claims any time perjury is involved. In short, based on the specific facts of this case, we believe that Manning has presented a Brady claim and as such, Agents Buchan and Miller do not have absolute immunity."); Newsome v. McCabe (Newsome II), 319 F.3d 301, 304, 305 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Seeking a way around our decision that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity, Chicago now contends that they should have received absolute immunity. . . . Chicago contends that testimonial immunity should be extended to non-witnesses who assisted in the testimony's preparation. We rejected that extension in Ienco v. Chicago, 286 F.3d 994, 1000 (7th Cir.2002), and see no reason to revisit that issue because Newsome's case does not present it. McCabe and McNally were not held liable for conspiring with the eyewitnesses to commit perjury; their liability is under the due process clause because they concealed exculpatory evidence–the details of how they induced the witnesses to finger Newsome."), cert. denied, 123 S. Ct. (2003); Keko v. Hingle, 318 F.3d 639, 642, 644 (5th Cir. 2003) (" . . . . Dr. West asserts that he is entitled to absolute immunity (a) for the expert witness report he authored, which was offered at a probable cause hearing to obtain an arrest warrant for Keko, and (b) for the research and investigative work that led to preparation of the expert report. Although West has not been sued for his testimony at Keko's criminal trial, he bases his claim on the Supreme Court's decision in Briscoe v. LaHue, . . . holding that witnesses, like judges and prosecutors, are shielded by absolute immunity from § 1983 liability arising from their participation in judicial proceedings. Dr. West argues, not without force, that the protection of absolute immunity is lost if an expert witness, whose testimonial competence derives solely from the application of his expertise to an investigation conducted by the state, may be sued for the activity that spawned his testimony. Or, as Judge Easterbrook put it, It would be a hollow immunity if the aggrieved party could turn around and say, in effect: 'True, your delivery of bad testimony is immunized, but preparing to deliver that testimony is not, so I can litigate the substance of your testimony.' Substance is exactly what Briscoe puts off limits. . . . Unfortunately for Dr. West, the Supreme Court not only perpetuated absolute immunity for witnesses in judicial proceedings, based on an historical analysis of the law as it stood when § 1983 was enacted, but the Court has subsequently bounded absolute immunity within the precise confines of adversarial judicial proceedings. Thus, when either a police officer or a prosecutor becomes a 'complaining witness' in a probable cause hearing, neither official may claim absolute immunity. . . . These decisions suggest that an informal, ex parte probable cause hearing is not the type of judicial proceeding for which a witness's testimony would require the full shield of absolute immunity. The only 'testimony' now at issue is his report submitted in such a probable cause hearing. We decline to extend absolute witness immunity into an arena where the Supreme Court has not found factual testimony to justify such heightened protection. . . .Further, to the extent Dr. West's pre-testimonial activities were investigative, his immunity ought to correlate with the merely qualified immunity granted to the police for comparable activities. Thus, if, as alleged, Dr. West used shoddy and unscientific research techniques that resulted in a report critical to a baseless murder prosecution of Keko, there is no obvious reason why Dr. West should enjoy immunity greater than that of other investigators. By holding that absolute immunity does not shield Dr. West, we do not imply any opinion on the strength of his qualified immunity defense or the ultimate validity of Keko's conspiracy allegations."); Hinchman v. Moore, 312 F.3d 198, 205 (6th Cir. 2002) ("Immunity regarding testimony, however, does not 'relate backwards' to events that transpired prior to testifying, even if they are related to subsequent testimony. . . . Hinchman's claims are based on the defendants' alleged prevarications prior to testifying at the preliminary hearing. Specifically, Hinchman contends that the defendants lied to State Trooper Taylor and to the prosecutors in order to establish probable cause to arrest, imprison, and prosecute her. Although she asserts in the complaint that the defendants also lied on the witness stand during the preliminary hearing, her claims are not based on such conduct. The defendants, therefore, are not entitled to absolute witness immunity."); Ienco v. City of Chicago, 286 F.3d 994, 1000 (7th Cir. 2002) ("If Ienco were merely claiming damages based upon the officers' perjured testimony, the officers would be entitled to absolute immunity. . . However, Ienco's claims are not based upon the officers' perjured testimony. Instead, he argues that the officers withheld exculpatory information and lied to the federal prosecutors who successfully indicted him. Neither the withholding of exculpatory information nor the initiation of constitutionally infirm criminal proceedings is protected by absolute immunity. . . Therefore, no absolute testimonial immunity attaches to the actions of the officers outside of trial, and they are proper defendants in this action."); Gray v. Poole, 275 F.3d 1113, 1117-19 (D.C. Cir. 2002) ("Poole's actions as an investigator and adviser to the Corporation Counsel - i.e., relating to whether Corporation Counsel should bring the neglect action - are analogous to actions taken by police officers prior to the giving of testimony in a criminal prosecution. Like a police officer, Poole tracked down information, made professional judgments, and passed on her findings to attorneys in the office of the Corporation Counsel. These functions are subject to qualified, not absolute, immunity . . . The statement Poole signed in the child neglect action in Superior Court is a different matter, however, because her function in this connection was as a witness in a judicial proceeding and hence was 'intimately associated' with the judicial process. Poole is therefore entitled to absolute immunity from suit for what she said in that statement. . . . It does not matter whether Poole's sworn statement was given in oral or written form; what matters is that her statement was the equivalent of sworn testimony in a judicial proceeding. . . . In this case, Poole's statement under oath was not that of a 'complaining witness.' Rather, the petition initiated the neglect action in Superior Court, just as a complaint does in federal district court, and Poole's sworn statement was thus an undeniable part of the 'judicial process.'"); Newsome v. McCabe, 256 F.3d 747, 751-53 (7th Cir. 2001) (Plaintiff, whose conviction for murder was overturned after he had served 15 years of his sentence, could state a procedural due process claim against officers who withheld exculpatory evidence from prosecutors; no immunity for officers), petition for reh'g denied, 260 F.3d 824 (7th Cir. 2001), abrogated by Manuel v. City of Joliet, 137 S. Ct. 911 (2017) ; Zahrey v. Coffey, 221 F.3d 342, 344, 349, 356, 357 (2d Cir. 2000) ("We hold that there is a constitutional right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer acting in an investigatory capacity, at least where the officer foresees that he himself will use the evidence with a resulting deprivation of liberty."); Jones v. Cannon, 174 F.3d 1271, 1288, 1289 (11th Cir. 1999) ("Whether Powers has absolute immunity from liability in a § 1983 action for allegedly suborning perjured testimony from Jones's cell mate presents an issue of first impression in this Circuit. The majority of circuits that have addressed the issue have extended the absolute immunity for a witness's trial testimony under Briscoe to those persons who allegedly conspired with the witness to present allegedly false testimony. [citing cases] In these cases, the circuit courts held that prosecutors and witnesses have absolute immunity for claims of conspiracy to commit perjury based on a witness's allegedly false testimony at trial, before a grand jury, or at a post-conviction hearing. . . . We concur with the Tenth Circuit [see Miller v. Glanz, 948 F.2d 1562, 1571 (10th Cir.1991)] that the extension of absolute immunity from civil liability to those who allegedly procure the perjured testimony serves the same important purposes as immunity to witnesses themselves.").

See also Doe v. Boland, 630 F.3d 491, 499 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Absolute immunity, it is true, also extends to witnesses, but it does not apply to the kind of conduct at issue here. . . . [T]his defense originated as an immunity 'only against suits for defamation,'. . . and is limited to in-court statements. That some 'acts may ultimately lead to witness testimony does not serve to cloak these actions with absolute testimonial immunity.' Spurlock v. Satterfield, 167 F.3d 995, 1001 (6th Cir.1999). . . . Because Boland created and possessed the images prior to testifying in court, he has no claim to any such immunity."); Gregory v. City of Louisville, 444 F.3d 725, 739, 741(6th Cir. 2006) ("This Court has consistently held that nontestimonial, pretrial acts do not benefit from absolute immunity, despite any connection these acts might have to later testimony. As early as 1987 this Court noted in Alioto v. City of Shively that the doctrine of absolute immunity would not protect an official accused of falsifying evidence or even conspiring to falsify evidence. . . More than a decade after the Alioto case, the Spurlock panel found that efforts to persuade a third-party witness to lie were non-testimonial acts, regardless of the acts' connection to the third-party witness' later testimony. . . The Spurlock case is particularly instructive, both because it establishes the law in this Circuit on the extent of absolute immunity, and because the facts alleged in the instant case and the facts alleged by the Spurlock plaintiffs are strikingly similar. . . . The Supreme Court demands a functional test for the extension of absolute immunity for government actors. This Circuit has consistently held that absolute immunity for testimony at trial does not 'relate back' to shield pretrial, nontestimonial acts such as fabrication of evidence. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's amended order and find that Defendants Katz, Carroll, and Clark are not entitled to absolute immunity on Plaintiff's fabrication of evidence claims."); Mowbray v. Cameron County, Texas, 274 F.3d 269, 277, 278 (5th Cir. 2001) ("Although witnesses are entitled to absolute immunity against § 1983 suits based on their testimony in a criminal trial, Briscoe v. LaHue, . . . it is less certain whether the rule of Briscoe extends to claims that a witness entered a pre-trial conspiracy to commit perjury. Of the eight circuits that have addressed the issue, seven have extended absolute witness immunity. [footnote omitted] The Second Circuit stands alone in reaching a contrary conclusion. [footnote omitted] We find the reasoning of the majority of circuits persuasive. As a matter of logic, '[a] person may not be prosecuted for conspiring to commit an act that he may perform with impunity.' . . .Accordingly, we conclude that absolute witness immunity bars § 1983 suits for conspiracy to commit perjury."); Paine v. City of Lompoc, 265 F.3d 975, 983 (9th Cir. 2001) ("[A]bsolute witness immunity does not shield an out-of-court, pretrial conspiracy to engage in non-testimonial acts such as fabricating or suppressing physical or documentary evidence or suppressing the identities of potential witnesses."); Franklin v. Terr, 201 F.3d 1098, 1102 (9th Cir. 2000) ("We are not presented with, and do not decide, the question whether § 1983 provides a cause of action against a defendant who conspired to present the perjured testimony of another but who did not testify as a witness herself. In concluding that the rule of Briscoe applies to allegations of conspiracy to commit perjury by someone who has testified as a witness in the proceeding where the perjury took place, or was to take place, we join six circuits that have reached the same conclusion."); Spurlock v. Satterfield, 167 F.3d 995, 1001 (6th Cir.1999) ("The simple fact that acts may ultimately lead to witness testimony does not serve to cloak them with absolute testimonial immunity."). Dory v. Ryan, 25 F.3d 81, 84 (2d Cir.1994) (declining to give witness absolute immunity for extra-judicial action of conspiring to convict Dory on the basis of perjured testimony); Mitchell v. City of Boston, 130 F. Supp.2d 201, 210-13 (D. Mass. 2001) ("In the wake of the Supreme Court's holding in Briscoe, most circuits have rejected § 1983 claims alleging that the defendants who were testifying witnesses were not entitled to absolute immunity because they were engaged in a conspiracy with each other or with the prosecutor to offer perjurious testimony in a criminal case against the plaintiff. [citing cases] Courts have differed on whether a non-testifying police officer is shielded by absolute immunity when he is charged with persuading a testifying witness to commit perjury.[comparing cases] . . . . The First Circuit has not yet had the opportunity to speak with a firm voice in the post-Briscoe debate. . . . I agree with the many courts that have held that a plaintiff cannot use a conspiracy claim to short-circuit Briscoe's grant of absolute immunity to testifying witnesses . . . However, as several courts including the First Circuit have noted, a defendant cannot use Briscoe's rule of absolute immunity as a shield to protect a whole course of conduct merely because, at some point, the defendant was linked to testimony given in a judicial proceeding. . . . Holland's actions differed from DeMarco's in that they were not inextricably tied to his role in the judicial proceedings. . . .[A]ll of the key allegations in the conspiracy claim deal with the extra-judicial course of conduct taken on Holland's part to secure the conviction of Mitchell with a fabricated story of a police station confession. . . Under these circumstances, a defendant is not entitled to take cover behind the shield of absolute immunity.").

See also Jones v. Cannon, 174 F.3d 1271, 1287 n.10 (11th Cir. 1999) ("This Court in Mastroianni pointed out in a footnote that several circuits have carved out exceptions to the doctrine of absolute immunity for testifying witnesses, but declined to decide whether that 'case challenges the previously delineated limits of our doctrine of absolute immunity.' For several reasons, we expressly reject carving out an exception to absolute immunity for grand jury testimony, even if false and even if Powers were construed to be a complaining witness. First, although Mastroianni cites circuits adopting an exception for complaining witnesses, we agree with the Third Circuit's rejection of that approach and its observation that Malley does not affect the broad witness protection adopted for law enforcement officers in Briscoe. Kulwicki v. Dawson, 969 F.2d 1454, 1467 n. 16 (3d Cir.1992). The Third Circuit rejected the reasoning of White v. Frank, 855 F.2d 956 (2d Cir.1988), one of the cases cited in the footnote in Mastroianni. Id. Second, this case vividly illustrates the serious problems with carving out such an exception and imposing civil liability for post-indictment detention based on Powers's false testimony deceiving the grand jury. To prove or to defend against such a claim would necessitate depositions from the prosecutor, the grand jury witnesses, and the grand jury members. Thus, allowing Powers's grand jury testimony, even if false, to subject Powers to additional civil damages on the false arrest claims for Jones's post-indictment detention, in effect, would emasculate both the absolute immunity for grand jury testimony and the confidential nature of grand jury proceedings. The remedy for false grand jury testimony is criminal prosecution for perjury and not expanded civil liability and damages.").

See also Zamora v. City of Belen, 383 F.Supp.2d 1315, 1334, 1335 & n.2 (D.N.M. 2005) ("Zamora is attempting to sue Valdez in his individual capacity for the prosecutor's failure to play the audiotape. . . . Zamora's argument fundamentally misconstrues the roles and respective duties of, on the one hand, an investigating law enforcement officer who testifies before a grand jury, and, on the other hand, the prosecuting attorney. Unlike the situation in which the officer has not reported or disclosed exculpatory evidence to the prosecutor, or in which the officer provides false or fabricated evidence to the prosecutor, [Valdez] fulfilled his duty as the investigating officer by providing all relevant information to Harwell. Zamora does not cite any case involving an officer's failure to present exculpatory evidence to a grand jury that the officer had already disclosed to the prosecuting attorney. . . In effect, without sound explanation for how he gets there, Zamora treats Valdez as the prosecutor. . . .The Court could also not locate any cases–Tenth Circuit or otherwise–which addressed whether an officer, having reported all relevant information to the prosecuting attorney and not having made any false or misleading representations, can nevertheless still be held liable under § 1983 for his failure to mention exculpatory evidence in his grand jury testimony. Instead, the cases located by the Court discuss the effect of an officer or other state office allegedly withholding exculpatory evidence from, or provided false evidence to, the prosecuting attorney. . . . The Tenth Circuit has stated that a police officer can be a 'complaining witness'–and therefore not entitled to absolute immunity–and 'initiate ... a baseless prosecution by giving false testimony at a grand jury proceeding.'. .The situation in this case, however, is fundamentally different from an officer excluding exculpatory evidence from the prosecuting attorney; here, Valdez provided all evidence–including the alleged exculpatory evidence–to Harwell. Harwell's legal determination of what constituted exculpatory evidence is the province of the prosecuting attorney, not the investigating officer. . . Because there is no evidence to support the allegation that Valdez testified falsely or misled the prosecutor, there is no genuine issue of material fact whether Valdez initiated or instigated the alleged wrongful prosecution of Zamora. Valdez is therefore entitled to absolute immunity for testimony at the grand jury proceeding. To hold otherwise would lead to the untenable situation in which an officer faithfully and dutifully discloses all material evidence–exculpatory and otherwise–to the prosecutor, but can nevertheless be held liable for damages arising out the prosecutors' legal decision to not present certain evidence at the grand jury proceedings. That is a result no court has yet endorsed.")

The Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit has distinguished cases involving misrepresentation of facts from cases involving misrepresentation of law. See Egervary v. Young, 366 F.3d 238, 250, 251(3d Cir.2004) ("To sum up, we adhere to the well-settled principle that, in situations in which a judicial officer or other independent intermediary applies the correct governing law and procedures but reaches an erroneous conclusion because he or she is misled in some manner as to the relevant facts, the causal chain is not broken and liability may be imposed upon those involved in making the misrepresentations or omissions. . . However, we draw a distinction between that situation and the facts as presented both here and in Townes, where the actions of the defendants, while clearly a cause of the plaintiff's harm, do not create liability because of the intervention of independent judicial review, a superseding cause. We conclude that where, as here, the judicial officer is provided with the appropriate facts to adjudicate the proceeding but fails to properly apply the governing law and procedures, such error must be held to be a superseding cause, breaking the chain of causation for purposes of § 1983 and Bivens liability. . . . Thus, because the judge's execution of the ex parte Order superseded any prior tortious conduct by defendants and shrouded any subsequent actions with a cloak of legitimacy, we find no basis for imposing Bivens liability on any of the defendants. This is not to say that we condone behavior in which an attorney urges the court to make an erroneous decision or fails to properly investigate the facts or governing law before presenting them to the court. However, such actions or omissions would neither excuse judges from their responsibility to correctly ascertain the relevant law and procedures nor would they create civil liability on the part of others for errors of law committed by judges. Finally, we note that neither the District Judge's error in granting the Order nor the defendants' actions in seeking and executing it left Egervary without a remedy in the underlying case. Egervary initially filed a motion for reconsideration of the ex parte Order. He could have pursued this motion, and, if it were denied, appealed the ruling. A reversal by this Court then would have permitted Egervary to enlist the aid of the State Department in obtaining Oscar's return. He instead chose to withdraw his motion for reconsideration and pursue the Bivens claim. While it was clearly his right to do so, he is now left with the consequences of that decision.").

4. Legislative Immunity

Tenney v. Brandhove, 341 U.S. 367 (1951) (absolute immunity for members of state legislature). In Bogan v. Scott-Harris, 118 S. Ct. 966 (1998), a unanimous Court made "explicit what was implicit in our precedents: Local legislators are entitled to absolute immunity from § 1983 liability for their legislative activities." Id. at 972. The Court went on to address question of whether Court of Appeals erred in classifying conduct here as administrative rather than legislative.

> Although the Court of Appeals did not suggest that intent or motive can overcome an immunity defense for activities that are, in fact, legislative, the court erroneously relied on petitioners' subjective intent in resolving the logically prior question of whether their acts were legislative. Whether an act is legislative turns on the nature of the act, rather than on the motive or intent of the official performing it. . . . This leaves us with the question whether, stripped of all considerations of intent and motive, petitioners' actions were legislative. We have little trouble concluding that they were. Most evidently, petitioner Roderick's acts of voting for an ordinance were, in form, quintessentially legislative. Petitioner Bogan's introduction of a budget and signing into law an ordinance also were formally legislative, even though he was an executive official. . . .We need not determine whether the formally legislative character of petitioners' actions is alone sufficient to entitle petitioners to legislative immunity, because here the ordinance, in substance, bore all the hallmarks of traditional legislation. The ordinance reflected a discretionary, policymaking decision implicating the budgetary priorities of the city and the services the city provides to its constituents. Moreover, it involved the termination of a position, which, unlike the hiring or firing of a particular employee, may have > prospective implications that reach well beyond the particular occupant of the office.

Id. at 972, 973.

Compare Cushing v. Packard, 30 F.4th 27, 37-38, 42-43 (1st Cir. 2022) ("The plaintiffs and the United States base the contention that the claims regarding the ADA and the RHA that they bring against the Speaker in his official capacity must be treated as claims against the State itself in part on Will v. Michigan Dep't of State Police, 491 U.S. 58 (1989), and Kentucky v. Graham, 473 U.S. 159 (1985). But, neither case supports our doing so here. Those two cases do make clear that suits against state officers in their official capacity often must be treated as suits against the State, notwithstanding that such suits do not specifically name the State as the defendant. . . But, the Court expressly recognized in Graham and Will that, at least when such an official capacity state officer suit is brought under § 1983 for the kind of relief that is at issue here, it must not be treated as a suit against the State itself. . . The plaintiffs and the United States go on to assert, however, that even if an official capacity state officer suit for prospective injunctive relief need not be treated as a suit against the State under § 1983, it must be so treated when it is brought to enforce Title II of the ADA and § 504 of the RHA. Thus, the plaintiffs argue, the claims concerning the ADA and the RHA at issue here must be so treated, despite the fact that the plaintiffs did not name the State as the defendant as to those claims and instead named only a state legislative officer. . . . In sum, neither the plaintiffs nor the United States persuasively explains why the official capacity state officer claims regarding the ADA and the RHA that are before us must be treated as if they are claims against the State itself and thus against a defendant that the plaintiffs assert to be, by its nature, incapable of asserting legislative immunity. Accordingly, we take the complaint at its word. We thus understand it to be alleging claims that seek to enforce Title II of the ADA and § 504 of the RHA against the state officer (in his official capacity) who is named, which, as Consumers Union holds, is an officer who is entitled even in that capacity to assert the defense of legislative immunity, at least insofar as that officer is not otherwise barred from doing so.") with Cushing v. Packard, 30 F.4th 27, 53-66 (1st Cir. 2022) (Thompson, J., with whom Kayatta, J., joins dissenting) ("As the COVID-19 pandemic raged to new heights in the winter of 2021, the New Hampshire House of Representatives conducted its sessions in person. Some members of the House have significant personal health issues, which put them at an increased risk of serious illness -- or even death -- if they were to contract COVID-19. Facing the unenviable choice between public duty and death, they sued the Speaker of the House, in his official capacity, for disability discrimination. But the Speaker told the court it would need to bounce the suit altogether without further ado: He says he is entitled to absolute legislative immunity, which shields judicial review of a House rule effectively ousting disabled members from that august assembly and (here's the kicker) leaving their constituents unrepresented. My colleagues agree with the Speaker's sweeping claim of absolute legislative immunity. I cannot abide by the Court's decision to turn a blind eye to the effective disenfranchisement of thousands of New Hampshire residents simply because their representatives are disabled. But it's not just that. My colleagues also today lay the foundation to immunize any legislative rule that 'does not, on its face, target any class of legislators' -- a standard so broad as to immunize race- and religion-based discrimination, too (examples to follow shortly). The Court's rule opens the floodgates to potential abuse and spells a recipe for disaster in the future. . . . The problem with the majority's telling here is that it has no limiting principle at all. Instead, it gives carte blanche to legislatures to strategically silence legislative opponents -- and effectively disenfranchise their constituents -- so long as they can conjure up some facially neutral rationale for the rule. I cannot concur in giving such wide latitude at the expense not only of other legislators (and solely on the basis of their federally protected disabilities), but also at the expense of their constituents' voices in the legislative process. I agree with Justice Story that '[t]he enormous disparity of th[at] evil' -- of forcing the absence of duly elected representatives from their solemn duties – 'admits of no comparison.'. . But forcing out duly elected New Hampshire representatives with disabilities is exactly the evil that has befallen here. I therefore respectfully dissent.")

See also Kent v. Ohio House of Representatives Democratic Caucus, 33 F.4th 359, 360 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Absolute immunity protects lawmakers from lawsuits for their legislative acts. At issue is whether the Ohio House Democratic Caucus performed a legislative act when it expelled a representative from its ranks and barred her from accessing party resources. We conclude that it did and affirm the district court's decision dismissing this lawsuit against Caucus members."); Jones v. Allison, 9 F.4th 1136, 1141-42 (9th Cir. 2021) ("Section 32's delegation authorized the CDCR to perform a legislative function, and the resulting Regulations themselves functioned as legislation. They bore the hallmarks of legislation—they were binding, policy-implementing rules that operated much as laws passed by a state legislature would. Accordingly, Defendants enjoy absolute immunity from Plaintiffs' claims for damages brought under § 1983. . . . Because Defendant officials of the CDCR were performing a legislative function when they adopted the Regulations as directed by Article I, Section 32 of the California Constitution, we find that they are entitled to legislative immunity from Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims for damages, and affirm the dismissal of these claims."); NRP Holdings LLC v. City of Buffalo, 916 F.3d 177, 192-93 (2d Cir. 2019) ("When 'high-level executive branch officials' like Mayor Brown seek to 'claim the protections of an immunity traditionally accorded to members of the legislative branch,' they must 'show that their activities were "legislative" both in form and in substance.'. . . Brown's actions (or specific inaction, here) seem to us without doubt legislative in form. Introducing a measure for a vote by a legislative body amounts to an 'integral step[ ] in the legislative process,' and is therefore a 'formally legislative' act, even when performed by an executive official. . . If introducing a resolution is a legislative act, then, precedent suggests, so must be refusal to introduce a resolution. . . .We turn, therefore, to the second element of the Rowland test, which asks whether Brown's conduct was legislative in substance. On this point, we lack the benefit of any precedential cases presenting similar facts. Since Bogan, our discussions of legislative immunity for state and local officials in precedential opinions have arisen primarily from disputes concerning individuals in public employment, not real estate or large-scale public projects. . . Those employment cases established the following principles, instructive here: 'The elimination of a position ... is a substantively legislative act .... By contrast, a personnel decision is administrative in nature if it is directed at a particular employee ... and is not part of a broader legislative policy.'. . Reasoning from those cases, NRP argues that '[i]n the land development context, refusal to process a proposed development plan and/or issue a needed permit is administrative in nature, and thus not protected by legislative immunity.'. . .Unlike the zoning board in Anderson, Brown was not deciding simply whether to seek the Common Council's blessing for a private development project; he was deciding whether a multimillion-dollar housing project, which would use extensive City resources, should proceed at all. Upon review of these circumstances, we agree with the District Court that Mayor Brown's decision not to introduce the resolutions for Common Council action amounted to a 'discretionary, policymaking decision[ ]' that implicated the City's 'budgetary priorities ... and the services [it] provides to its constituents.'. .[.] We decide, therefore, that Mayor Brown's conduct in failing to present the resolution for Common Council action was legislative in substance, as well as in form, and thus constitutes protected legislative conduct for purposes of our analysis of common-law legislative immunity."); McCann v. Brady, 909 F.3d 193, 197-98 (7th Cir. 2018) ("The question here is whether Minority Leader Brady's decisions about who is included within the Minority or Republican Caucus, and how to allocate resources to those people, are protected by the privilege. We conclude that they are. . . .[W]hen Minority Leader Brady concluded that McCann's decision to split from the Republican Party meant that he was no longer entitled to the minority party's resources for pushing legislation, he was acting in a legislative capacity. . . . Imagining what would happen if we were to adopt McCann's position demonstrates why legislative immunity must apply here. McCann would have the federal courts micro-manage exactly which resources, and in what amount, the legislative leaders of the two major political parties dole out to their members. This is emphatically not our job. The Speech or Debate Clause, and the doctrine of legislative immunity on which it rests, essentially tells the courts to stay out of the internal workings of the legislative process. The separation of powers principle reflected in Article II, section 1 of the Illinois Constitution, and inherent in the federal Constitution, requires us to accept the final output of the legislature without sitting in judgment about how it was produced."); Lee v. City of Los Angeles, 908 F.3d 1175, 1188 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We recognize that claims of racial gerrymandering involve serious allegations: 'At the heart of the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection lies the simple command that the Government must treat citizens "as individuals, not 'as simply components of a racial ... class.'"'. . Here, Defendants have been accused of violating that important constitutional right. But the factual record in this case falls short of justifying the 'substantial intrusion' into the legislative process. . . Although Plaintiffs call for a categorical exception whenever a constitutional claim directly implicates the government's intent, that exception would render the privilege 'of little value.'. . Village of Arlington Heights itself also involved an equal protection claim alleging racial discrimination—putting the government's intent directly at issue—but nonetheless suggested that such a claim was not, in and of itself, within the subset of 'extraordinary instances' that might justify an exception to the privilege. . . Without sufficient grounds to distinguish those circumstances from the case at hand, we conclude that the district court properly denied discovery on the ground of legislative privilege."); Allen v. Cooper, 895 F.3d 337, 358 (4th Cir. 2018) ("In this case, the North Carolina officials were sued in their individual capacities for 'conspir[ing] to convert [Allen's] copyrighted works into public documents' through the enactment of § 121–25(b). But the only actual conduct alleged in furtherance of the conspiracy—that the officers 'wrote, caused to be introduced, lobbied for passage of, and obtained passage' of § 121–25(b)—is quintessentially legislative in nature and falls squarely within the scope of legislative immunity. Allen and Nautilus's only argument to the contrary is that the complaint alleges that the officers sought enactment of § 121–25(b) with impure motives, seeking to benefit an affiliated nonprofit entity and to remove the threat of legal liability. As noted, however, motive is irrelevant to the issue."); Young v. Mercer County Comm'n, 849 F.3d 728, 734-35 (8th Cir. 2017) ("[D]ecisions about whether to approve or deny proposed budget items fall squarely within the discretion of the Commission as a legislative body, and we have little difficulty concluding that the Commissioners are entitled to legislative immunity for their action denying Mr. Young's budget request for part-time assistance. . . .Although this is a closer question, we believe the district court correctly ruled the Commissioners are entitled to legislative immunity for their termination of the Agreement and cessation of rent payments. . . . Thus, regardless of whether the decision to terminate the Agreement was budgetary or an independent act, the Commission is the legislative body tasked with housing and funding the county offices. When the Commission discovered the Agreement was possibly in violation of the state constitution, the Commissioners were entitled to take action to remedy the situation. . . .In this instance, the Commissioners met as a legislative body and voted on the appropriate course of action to deal with the possible illegality of a contract into which they had entered. . . That course of action was legislative, regardless of whether it resulted in an ordinance. We conclude that the district court correctly ruled that the Commissioners are entitled to legislative immunity for denying Mr. Young's budget request, terminating the Agreement, and ceasing the $350.00 monthly rental payments."); Bierce v.Town of Fishkill, No. 15-860-CV, 2016 WL 3749047, at *3 (2d Cir. July 13, 2016) (not published) ("Here, the Board voted to eliminate two positions from the police department, citing budgetary concerns. The district court concluded that LaColla's actions were legislative, and granted LaColla.s motion for judgment on the pleadings. However, we have previously held that personnel decisions—even if accomplished by vote—are administrative, and therefore not immune to liability, if they are directed at a particular employee and do not adopt or implement a broader legislative policy. . . The Board's resolution affected just two employees—both of whom were specifically identified by name. Even if we were to conclude that this resolution was not directed at a particular employee, the pleadings contain no allegations that the resolution formed part of a broader legislative policy. Defendants' reliance on Bogan, then, is misplaced. Although that decision involved the elimination of a particular department, of which the plaintiff was the sole employee, the elimination occurred as part of a larger budgetary package that proposed freezing the salaries of all municipal employees and eliminating 135 positions. . . We therefore conclude that the allegations were insufficient to support LaColla's claim of absolute legislative immunity on a motion for judgment on the pleadings."); Reeder v. Madigan, 780 F.3d 799, 803 (7th Cir. 2015) ("[T]he activity in question here—the decision whether to confer media credentials on an applicant—was legislative in nature, and integrally so. . . .Reeder's primary argument to the contrary—that the action to deny him credentials was administrative in nature, not legislative—finds little support in the case law or in the slim record before us. Reeder's conception of the scope of legislative immunity is too restrictive."); McCray v. Maryland Dept. of Transp., Maryland Transit Admin., 741 F.3d 480, 485, 486 (4th Cir. 2014) ("Finally, and most helpful to the MDOT and MTA, our case law shows that legislative immunity extends to those individuals who advise legislators. . .This case law stands for the proposition that just as a legislator is immune from discrimination lawsuits when she makes budget decisions based on improper animus, aides to that legislator are also immune. Legislative immunity is a shield that protects despicable motives as much as it protects pure ones. For this reason, the district court's conclusion is correct insofar as it shields the MTA and MDOT from lawsuit based on the counsel they gave executive officials in Maryland who carried out the budget cuts.Nonetheless, we vacate and remand because the complaint alleges discriminatory actions that took place before the legislative activity began."); Leapheart v. Williamson, 705 F.3d 310, 315 (8th Cir. 2013) ("The Defendants in the present case are entitled to legislative immunity because this case is distinguishable from Canary. Like Canary, the job duties appeared to stay the same after the Defendants recreated the human resources position. However, control over the position moved from the Mayor to the City Council, a quintessential legislative decision. Therefore, in the present case, moving control over human resources has 'implications beyond the occupant of a particular office' that were lacking in Canary. See also Bagley, 646 F.3d at 395–96 (declining to follow Canary because the newly created position, although similar, had different job tasks than the eliminated position at issue)."); Schmidt v. Contra Costa County, 693 F.3d 1122, 1138 (9th Cir. 2012) ("All four Kaahumanu factors support our determination that the Policy adopted by the Superior Court's Executive Committee in May 2004 was legislative. Furthermore, the district court correctly rejected Schmidt's argument that the Judge Defendants were liable for applying the Policy to her: the Policy was a legitimate legislative act, and was not applied to Schmidt until May 20 at the earliest, one day after it was unanimously adopted by the Executive Committee. We therefore conclude that the Judge Defendants are entitled to legislative immunity for their role in adopting and applying the Policy."); Kensington Volunteer Fire Dept., Inc. v. Montgomery County, 684 F.3d 462, 471 (4th Cir. 2012) ("Leggett and Bowers were tasked with executive and administrative duties, but they are named as defendants based on their legislative activity in proposing, submitting, and advocating for a budget. . . Legislative immunity includes 'officials outside the legislative branch ... when they perform legislative functions.'. . Thus, the district court properly found that Leggett and Bowers are entitled to legislative immunity."); Bagley v. Blagojevich, 646 F.3d 378, 393-96 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Legislative immunity claims are not successful when the action relates to the firing of a specific individual rather than the elimination of positions. . . .Other circuits apply the same distinction between actions that involve the elimination of positions for policy reasons (legislative actions) and actions that result in an individual's termination for reasons that relate to that individual (administrative actions). . . . Nothing in the record suggests that the Governor targeted particular employees; rather, he targeted the positions. Thus, Governor Blagojevich's line-item veto was substantively a legislative act and not administrative. . . . Because we find that Governor Blagojevich's veto was legislative, we also hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in blocking the Governor's deposition and limiting Curry's deposition."); Community House, Inc. v. City of Boise, Idaho, 623 F.3d 945, 973 (9th Cir. 2010) ("CHI must be satisfied with the City and the Council as defendants on the substantive issues raised in this case and with Chatterton and Birdsall in their official capacities only. Our decision today has no effect on CHI's claims against them. As the Supreme Court held in Owen v. City of Independence, 'imposing personal liability on public officials could have an undue chilling effect on the exercise of their decision-making responsibilities, but ... no such pernicious consequences [are] likely to flow from the possibility of a recovery from public funds.'. . . We hold only that as a matter of law, the individual defendants are beyond the reach of CHI's claims. To pursue these individuals–as suggested at oral argument by CHI's counsel–for damages, punitive or otherwise, serves no legally cognizable purpose. Mayor Bieter and City Council members Jordan, Clegg, Bisterfeldt, Eberle, Mapp, and Shealy are absolutely immune from suit, either for damages or injunctive relief. The lease and sale of Community House to the BRM, preceded as it was by the City's long partnership with CHI and grants of large amounts of funding, 'reflected a discretionary, policymaking decision implicating the budgetary priorities of the[C]ity and the services the [C]ity provides to its constituents.'"); Bryant v. Jones, 575 F.3d 1281, 1305, 1306 (11th Cir. 2009) ("By preparing the 2004 budget proposal, which Jones approved and submitted to the Board of Commissioners, Stogner argues that he necessarily acted in a legislative capacity and is deserving of absolute immunity. As part of his argument, Stogner seeks to have us adopt a per se rule that would provide an executive official immunity any time he drafts a proposal that is later submitted to a legislative body. We decline to adopt such a rule as it cuts too broadly and is inapposite to the principle that our inquiry is not bound by officials' titles and the characterizations officials place on their own activities. Instead, we examine the facts of each case to determine 'whether the [official] in the instant case [was] engaging in legislative activity.'. . . Relying on Bogan v. Scott-Harris, . . . Stogner characterizes his behavior as a legitimate legislative act by virtue of his developing and drafting the budget proposal that was later adopted by the Board of Commissioners. Implicit within this characterization is the assertion that the elimination of Lowe's position (Deputy Director of Strategic Management and Development Parks and Recreation Department) arose out of broad policy and budget considerations and did not stem from specific facts as they related to Lowe. We agree. . . . Lowe, however, attempts to cast this case as merely an employment action masked by the legislative process. He argues that legislative immunity is unavailable where, as here, the legislation adversely impacted a single individual. The argument is unavailing. Ordinarily, the decision to terminate an individual's employment is characterized as an administrative action, . . . but Lowe's employment was not terminated in this case. The Board of Commissioners chose to adopt the 2004 budget, which abolished the position of Deputy Director of Strategic Management and Development, Parks and Recreation Department. This distinction proves dispositive. . . . Unlike employee personnel decisions, the elimination of a public employment position does constitute a legislative act. In Bogan, the Supreme Court noted that the elimination of a public employment position–as compared to the firing of a single individual–is a quintessential legislative act."); Sable v. Myers, 563 F.3d 1120, 1126, 1127 (10th Cir. 2009) ("Mr. Sable, quite naturally, focuses on the particularity of the City Council action in this case. The condemnation was directed specifically at him. There was, as he sees it, no general policy involved in this land grab, just one discrete, and despicable, act. Adoption of this perspective, however, would virtually eliminate legislative immunity in the § 1983 context. Almost every plaintiff will perceive the challenged conduct as a particular act directed at violating the plaintiff's rights. Brandhove viewed the California legislative committee's hearing not as a pursuit of public policy but as an attempt to silence him. See Tenney, 341 U.S. at 371. Scott-Harris viewed the elimination of her one-person office as retaliation for her complaints against racism. See Bogan, 523 U .S. at 47. And the Frys viewed the vacation of county roadways as retaliation for their exercise of First Amendment rights. See Fry, 7 F.3d at 937. The decisions in these cases teach us that we must consider such claims from a broader perspective than the specific complaint of the plaintiff. In general, legislative investigations, the elimination of public agencies, and the vacation of roadways are matters of public interest and legitimate legislative concern. Legislators should be able to make decisions in these areas without fear of lawsuits against them personally. So, too, for decisions to construct or expand public works. We appreciate the discomfort that may arise from the recognition of legislative immunity in this case. Mr. Sable's allegations (whose truth has not been adjudicated) create an ugly picture of the abuse of public power to achieve improper ends. Perhaps such pettiness is more likely to arise in municipal legislative bodies than in legislatures with more members and broader jurisdiction. It is also true, however, that charges of improper motive are likely easier to bring at the local-government level. And the honor and fortune that come from service in local government are slight enough that many capable candidates for municipal office would surely forgo the rewards of such service if faced with the possibility of being sued for every decision taken without public consensus. . . . Moreover, those mistreated by municipal legislators are not without remedy. Not only are political remedies available, but a municipality, as opposed to its officials, is subject to suit under § 1983."); Smith v. Jefferson County School Bd. of Com'rs, 549 F.3d 641, 659, 660 (6th Cir. 2008)("We recognize that local legislators can be sued both in their individual and in their official capacities. Although plaintiffs may sue a local legislator in his or her official capacity under § 1983, local legislators may invoke legislative immunity to insulate themselves as individuals from liability based on their legislative activities. . . .Therefore, we hold that the Board members may be sued in their official capacities, but may not be sued as individuals for money damages, or declaratory or injunctive relief. Because the Board members are entitled to legislative immunity with respect to the claims made against them in their individual capacities, we need not address qualified immunity, which also is a doctrine applicable only in the context of individual capacity suits.); State Employees Bargaining Agent Coalition v. Rowland, 494 F.3d 71, 93, 94 (2d Cir. 2007) ("Assuming arguendo that defendants' alleged actions are substantively and procedurally legislative under Bogan, defendants must still show, before they are afforded the protections of legislative immunity as to claims for injunctive relief, that the requested relief would enjoin them in their legislative capacities. . . . Because ordering defendants to hire plaintiffs into existing positions in the state workforce would not require either a new allocation of funds or the passage of new legislation, but would instead compel defendants to act only in their administrative capacities as executive branch officials with authority over the state workforce, we conclude that legislative immunity presents no obstacle to the District Court's ordering of any such relief. . . . If defendants successfully demonstrate that their actions in terminating plaintiffs' positions were legislative in nature under Bogan, plaintiffs' claims for reinstatement to their previous positions would be barred by legislative immunity. This is so because ordering such relief would require no less than a judicial order compelling defendants, in their official capacities, to re-create positions that would have been eliminated through prior legislative action."); Baraka v. McGreevey, 481 F.3d 187, 197-203 (3d Cir. 2007) ("Baraka contends he named Governor McGreevey as a defendant not because the Governor signed the repealer, but because he advocated and orchestrated the legislation that abolished the position of poet laureate. His argument appears to concede the Governor's actions were central, or integral, to the legislative process. The New Jersey Constitution authorizes the Governor to 'recommend such measures as he may deem desirable,' and to convene the Legislature 'whenever in his opinion the public interest shall require.' N.J. Const. art. V, ' 1. The New Jersey Governor, therefore, is constitutionally authorized to recommend legislative measures. Furthermore, this is consistent with the type of activity designated as 'legislative' in Brewster and Youngblood. As the Governor's appointee, Harrington's actions in advising and counseling Governor McGreevey and the Legislature are also legislative. . . Though neither Governor McGreevey nor Harrington were legislators, their actions as public officials in proposing and advocating the repealer are properly characterized as legislative. . . . In determining whether legislative immunity attaches to municipal actors engaging in arguably administrative activities, we ask whether the activities are 'both substantively and procedurally legislative in nature.'. . . Here, defendants are public officers and state actors. Our cases differ as to whether the two-part substance/procedure inquiry, first applied to municipal actors, is also appropriate for actors at the state level. . . . Regardless of the level of government, we believe the two-part substance/procedure inquiry is helpful in analyzing whether a non-legislator performing allegedly administrative tasks is entitled to immunity. . . . In sum, we concluded their actions were procedurally legislative. Their actions in support of the repealer were also substantively legislative. This law, formally enacted, eliminated the position of poet laureate, a position that was legislatively created. Eliminating the position of poet laureate constitutes the type of 'policy-making' that traditional legislation entails, and the actions here were substantively legislative. . . . Nevertheless, Baraka contends the purpose of the repealer was to remove him specifically as poet laureate after he refused to resign, and its effect is better analogized to the termination of an individual's employment than to the elimination of a position. Baraka contends he was punished for his speech, which his detractors termed anti-Semitic. In his view, the intent and motive behind the purpose of the repealer was perceived anti-Semitism. But a defendant's intent and motive are immaterial to whether certain acts are entitled to legislative immunity. . . Accordingly, Baraka's allegation as to Governor McGreevey's and Harrington's intent and motive-which we accept as true in reviewing the denial of a Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) motion-cannot affect our analysis. . . . Baraka contends that even if legislative immunity bars his claim for damages, it does not bar his claim for reinstatement against Governor McGreevey and Harrington in their official capacities. He notes that legislative immunity is a personal immunity defense, citing Kentucky v. Graham, 473 U.S. 159 (1985), for the proposition that personal immunity defenses are unavailable in official-capacity actions. . . . Baraka seeks to require New Jersey legislators to rescind their votes repealing the statute and to enact legislation recreating the position. We agree with the District Court's conclusion that this 'would be inconsistent with the general policies underlying legislative immunity,' and 'would seriously interfere with the role assigned exclusively to the Legislature.'. . Debating, voting on, and passing statutes are 'role[s] assigned exclusively' to the Legislature, and this case is an 'appropriate case' for application of legislative immunity to a claim for prospective relief. . . Accordingly, the District Court did not err in concluding that Baraka's request for reinstatement was barred by legislative immunity."); Almonte v. City of Long Beach, 478 F.3d 100, 103 (2d Cir. 2007) ("We hold that legislative immunity applies not only to the Council members' vote on the budgetary resolutions that terminated the budget lines for Plaintiffs' positions, but also to any discussions and agreements the Council members may have had regarding the new budget prior to the vote, regardless of whether those discussions and agreements took place in secret. Thus, to the extent that the '§ 1983, 1985, and 1986 claims against the Council members relate to the legislative termination of the budget lines for Plaintiffs' positions, the District Court's denial of legislative immunity is reversed. While the grant of legislative immunity covers all aspects of the legislative process, it would not protect the Council members from a charge, if asserted here, that they administratively fired, or conspired to administratively fire, any Plaintiff prior to the date on which his or her position was effectively abolished pursuant to the legislative resolutions."); Fowler-Nash v. Democratic Caucus of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives, 469 F.3d 328, 340 (3d Cir. 2006) ("Neither Harhai nor Brubaker nor the Caucus were acting in a legislative capacity when they terminated Fowler-Nash. Harhai's decision did not reach beyond a single employee. It did not eliminate Fowler-Nash's position, thereby affecting future employees. Harhai's decision, according to the Caucus's pleadings, did not rely on any broad consideration of policy, neither was it directed to creating a new policy. It was a textbook example of a legislator performing an administrative function."); Torres-Rivera v. Calderon-Serra, 412 F.3d 205, 212-14 (1st Cir. 2005) ("The Supreme Court of a state is entitled to legislative immunity when its members act in a legislative capacity to promulgate a State Bar Code. . .As well, the President acts legislatively when he approves or vetoes bills passed by Congress. . . Likewise, a governor who signs into law or vetoes legislation passed by the legislature is also entitled to absolute immunity for that act. . . . The plaintiffs also seek damages for the actions taken by Governor Calderon, Miranda-Rodriguez (Governor Calderon's Chief of Staff), and Charriez to implement the new legislation: the naming of a new Chairman and new Commissioners, the notice to the plaintiffs that their positions had been eliminated, and the consequent termination of their employment. The actions by the executive officials (including the governor) taken to implement legislation are not shielded by legislative immunity. Under Scheur v. Rhodes. . . these implementation actions (as opposed to the governor's signing the law) should be evaluated under the qualified immunity doctrine, rather than under legislative immunity."); Kaahumanu v. County of Maui, 315 F.3d 1215, 1223, 1224 (9th Cir. 2003) ("In denying a single application for a CUP [conditional use permit], the Council did not change Maui's comprehensive zoning ordinance or the policies underlying it, nor did it affect the County's budgetary priorities or the services the County provides to residents. . . The Maui County Council's decision to deny the CUP was ad hoc, affected only the plaintiffs and did not bear all the hallmarks of traditional legislation. Despite its formally legislative character, the decision was administrative and the individual members of the Maui County Council are therefore not entitled to legislative immunity.");Bryan v. City of Madison, 213 F.3d 267, 274 (5th Cir. 2000) ("Although activities related to board meeting were "irregular and inappropriate[,]" they were "still legislative in nature because they involved a rezoning provision. It may be that at some point, when a legislature acts in a wholly irresponsible and undemocratic manner, its immunity for 'legislative' acts dissipates because it is no longer operating as a legislature, as we understand the term. But we are reluctant to conclude that this point has been reached here."); Canary v. Osborn, 211 F.3d 324, 330, 331 (6th Cir. 2000) (distinguishing Bogan and finding school board members were acting in administrative rather than legislative capacity when they voted not to renew certain employee's contract); Acevedo-Garcia v. Vera-Monroig, 204 F.3d 1, 9 (1st Cir. 2000) ("Although these two ordinances provided a framework for the administrative decisions of Vera and Gonzalez in implementing the layoff plan, it is precisely those administrative decisions that are at issue in this case. . . . Because the defendants' decisions stemmed from specific facts about the party affiliation of individuals and affected particular individuals differently from others, these actions were administrative rather than legislative. Legislative ratification does not shield the defendants from liability."); Macuba v. DeBoer, 193 F.3d 1316, 1321 (11th Cir. 1999) ("When DeBoer and Youseff voted to reorganize the land use departments, and later when they approved the CDD structure, they were exercising a 'quintessentially legislative' function. . . . Therefore, insofar as Macuba rests liability on the elimination of his position as a License Investigator, appellants are entitled to absolute immunity."); Kamplain v. Curry County Bd. of Commisioners, 159 F.3d 1248, 1251, 1252 (10th Cir. 1998) ("We are not persuaded by the approach taken by some of our sister circuits in determining legislative capacity or function. These courts rest their analysis on the number of persons affected by a legislative body's decision. [citing cases] Other courts have limited immunity to functions involving legislative speech and debate, voting, preparing committee reports, conducting committee hearings, and other 'integral steps in the legislative process.' [citing Bogan] . . . Not all actions taken at a legislative meeting by a local legislator are legislative for purposes of immunity. . . Nor does voting on an issue, in and of itself, determine that the act is legislative in nature. . . At issue here is not the Board's ejection of Plaintiff from the public meeting but its vote to ban Plaintiff from all future Commission meetings and its subsequent decision to prohibit Plaintiff from participating in or speaking before the Board at Curry County Commission meetings. After considering the function and character of the Board's actions, we conclude that its ban of Plaintiff from attending Commission meetings and its subsequent decision to prohibit Plaintiff from speaking at or participating in meetings were administrative acts. Because the circumstances of this case did not concern the enactment or promulgation of public policy, we cannot say that the bans were related to any legislation or legislative function. The Board's decisions to ban Plaintiff were simply efforts to monitor and discipline his presence and conduct at future Commission meetings. In voting to censure Plaintiff and prevent him from disrupting future public meetings, the Board members were not voting on, speaking on, or investigating a legislative issue. . . Even though the Board may have acted during a 'regularly scheduled meeting,' we hold that the Board did not commit these acts in a legislative capacity; the acts were of an administrative nature. . . Further, even if we accept Defendants' claim that the Board acted in relation to the business of awarding bids, we believe that the function of awarding of bids is essentially an administrative or executive function. Awarding bids and purchasing county property are actions whereby the Board applies known rules and legislation to make an administrative business decision." footnotes omitted); Woods v. Gamel, 132 F.3d 1417, 1419-20 (11th Cir. 1998) ("[C]ounty commissioners can be entitled to legislative immunity when acting in their legislative capacities. . . . In this case, the commissioners' act of passing the budget was legislative: policymaking of general application. The county commissioners deliberated and then voted on a budget resolution for the entire county, not just the jail. . . . Although we have not specifically ruled on the applicability of legislative immunity to local budgetary decisions, other circuits have addressed this issue and have held that absolute immunity applies to budgetary decisions. [citing cases] We agree with those decisions. The budgetary decisions made by defendants for funding the county –including the jail–are legislative acts protected by legislative immunity."); Jessen v. Town of Eastchester, 114 F.3d 7, 8 (2d Cir. 1997) (assuming, without deciding, that absolute immunity would apply to legislative acts of Town Board); Whitener v. McWatters, 112 F.3d 740, 742 (4th Cir. 1997) (absolute immunity applies similarly to federal, state and local legislative bodies).

See also Koury v. City of Canton, No. 1:04-CV-02248, 2005 WL 2649883, at *13 (N.D. Ohio Oct. 17, 2005) ("In the present case, the city counsel members did not actually determine whether or not to grant Plaintiff Koury the liquor licenses so their actions were not quasi-judicial in nature. While their request for a hearing pertained to a specific individual's application for a license rather than to any general policy concern, the Ohio legislature delegated this responsibility to the city counsel, thus vesting them with the special prerogative of requesting such hearings. Similar to the traditional legislative process, the council members adopted a formal resolution to request a hearing on the Cook Avenue application. The Court thus finds that their acts were legislative in nature and that the city council member defendants are entitled to absolute immunity for their requests."); Thomas v. Baca, No. CV 04-008448 DDP, 2005 WL 1030247, at *3 (C.D. Cal. May 2, 2005) (not reported) ("Here, the plaintiffs allege that the [County] supervisors failure to fund the Sheriff's Department resulted in the plaintiffs being forced to sleep on the floor of the county jail as well as the over-detention of plaintiff Thomas. Budget decisions bear all 'the hallmarks of traditional legislation.'. . They reflect discretionary policymaking that determines the services the County provides to its citizens. Perhaps, most importantly, they require tradeoffs that apply to the public at large, and thus inevitably leave some portion of the citizenry dissatisfied. Such decisions inherently involve the formulation of policy and affect the public at large. . . The traditional and best means of recourse for this dissatisfaction is that ultimate check on legislative abuse, the electoral process. Accordingly, the Court finds that this theory of liability is precluded by the supervisors' absolute legislative immunity."); Hershell Gill Consulting Engineers, Inc. v. Miami-Dade County, 333 F.Supp.2d 1305, 1335 (S.D. Fla. 2004) ("The plaintiffs contend, and I agree, that the Commissioners' votes to impose specific contract measures– i.e., set-asides and goals–on various solicitations for A & E [architectural and engineering] services, and to continue to apply the measures on specific contracts in the face of the advice from the County Manager that such action violated the County's own ordinance, are activities that do not constitute legislative action. Government officials are entitled to absolute legislative immunity only when they take actions that are 'an integral part of the deliberative and communicative process by which [they] participate in ... proceedings with respect to the consideration and passage of legislation.'. . On the other hand, legislators' administrative acts, such as employment decisions, are not entitled to legislative immunity even though those decisions are made through votes. . .The decision as to whether to hire architects and engineers to work on County contracts, and whether to apply performance goals to their specific contracts, is closely akin to decisions relating to the hiring of employees. . . . Accordingly, I conclude that the Commissioners were acting in an administrative, rather than legislative, capacity when they voted to apply performance goals to specific County A & E contracts, and therefore they are not absolutely immune.").

See also E.E.O.C. v. Washington Suburban Sanitary Com'n, 631 F.3d 174, 181 (4th Cir. 2011) ("Legislative privilege against compulsory evidentiary process exists to safeguard this legislative immunity and to further encourage the republican values it promotes. . . Consequently, if the EEOC or private plaintiffs sought to compel information from legislative actors about their legislative activities, they would not need to comply."); Powell v. Ridge, 247 F.3d 520, 525 (3d Cir. 2001) ("Despite their understanding of legislative immunity's broad parameters, however, the Legislative Leaders are not seeking immunity from this suit which, it must be remembered, they voluntarily joined. Nor are the Legislative Leaders seeking any kind of wholesale protection from the burden of defending themselves. Instead, the Legislative Leaders build from scratch a privilege which would allow them to continue to actively participate in this litigation by submitting briefs, motions, and discovery requests of their own, yet allow them to refuse to comply with and, most likely, appeal from every adverse order. As we noted at the outset, and as the Legislative Leaders conceded at oral argument, the privilege they propose would enable them to seek discovery, but not respond to it; take depositions, but not be deposed; and testify at trial, but not be cross-examined. In short, they assert a privilege that does not exist."); Morris v. Lindau, 196 F.3d 102, 111, 112 (2d Cir. 1999) ("The immunities Town Board members enjoy when sued personally do not extend to instances where they are sued in their official capacities. In other words, municipalities have no immunity defense, either qualified or absolute, in a suit under § 1983. . . . Being absolutely immune for their legislative acts, the Town Board members cannot be found personally liable for the abolition of the Police Department. But plaintiffs also named the Town as a defendant. The elimination of the Police Department, a legislative act passed by the Town Council, qualifies under Monell as a municipal act for which the Town may be held liable."); Cunningham v. Hill, 438 F.Supp.2d 718, 720-24 (E.D. Tex. 2006) ("Although no Supreme Court or Fifth Circuit decision directly addresses whether a testimonial privilege arising from the doctrine of legislative immunity applies to local legislators, the Supreme Court has recognized the privilege as it applies to other legislative actors and has alluded that the privilege is inherent to the doctrine of legislative immunity.[discussing cases] Several circuit courts have also recognized the testimonial privilege as it applies to federal and state legislative actors. [discussing cases] Although the Supreme Court and appellate court decisions cited above do not directly address the application of the testimonial privilege to local legislators, in Bogan, the Supreme Court stated that '[t]he rationales for according absolute immunity to federal, state, and regional legislators apply with equal force to local legislators.'. . Therefore, it is reasonable to conclude that the rationales for applying the testimonial privilege to federal, state, and regional legislators apply with equal force to local legislators. Accordingly, local legislators are protected by the testimonial privilege from having to testify about actions taken in the sphere of legitimate legislative activity. . . To hold otherwise, would undoubtably have a chilling effect on local legislative bodies and their members. Denying local legislators the protection of the testimonial privilege would likely dissuade some citizens from volunteering for such local legislative bodies and would surely hinder the free flow of discussion that is such an integral part of the democratic legislative process employed by these and all other legislative bodies in this country. . . . Cunningham may not depose Mosely or other trustees with regard to anything that occurred while the Board was debating, discussing, or voting on the decision to deny Cunningham's Level III grievance. Cunningham is also prevented from asking any questions regarding the mental impressions of Mosely or other trustees during the September 19 session at issue, or any other session held by the Board. However, the testimonial privilege is narrow in the sense that Cunningham may depose Mosely and the other trustees with regard to anything that occurred outside the sphere of legitimate legislative activities. Cunningham may ask Mosely or other trustees questions related to comments they might have made to members of the public or the press prior to or after the session in question, even if the comments were related to the session. However, Cunningham may not ask questions related to discussions or comments made by trustees or to trustees during the session in question, or any other session."); Jama Investments, L.L.C. v. Incorporated County of Los Alamos, No. CIV 04-1173 JB/ACT, 2006 WL 1304903, at *6 (D.N.M. Jan. 20, 2006) ("As a threshold matter, the Court must determine whether legislative immunity should apply in a situation such as this one, where the legislators have invoked the principle not to shield themselves from suit but to avoid testifying in a trial where non-legislators are the Defendants. While the Supreme Court and the Tenth Circuit have repeatedly upheld the centuries-old tradition of legislative immunity, those cases have arisen in the context of suits against the legislators themselves or the imposition of contempt sanctions on legislators personally. . . The initial question before the Court is whether, to the extent that courts have left this precise issue unaddressed, it should recognize legislative immunity against the act of testifying itself. The Court concludes that the same policy considerations that bar suit against legislators for legislative acts also prevents the Court from compelling them to testify about legislative acts. The knowledge that a legislator may have to justify his actions in court one day may hinder the free exercise of his judgment. . . The time and expense incurred in testifying, perhaps in another city, for potentially any legislative act done while in office may deter some legislators from seeking election in the first place. . . Finally, citizens may be able to more effectively question, and turn out of office, their local legislators than state or federal lawmakers, rendering judicial inquiry unnecessary. . . The Court also notes that the Fourth Circuit, in the past, has expressed support for a testimonial privilege based on legislative immunity, though it is unclear whether the Fourth Circuit still maintains that view. See Berkley v. Common Council, 63 F.3d at 303 n. 9; Schlitz v. Virginia, 854 F.2d at 46."); Knights of Columbus v. Town of Lexington, 138 F. Supp.2d 136, 139, 140 (D. Mass. 2001) ("[T]he doctrine of legislative immunity precludes inquiry into the individual defendants' state of mind. Moreover, since one of the purposes of the doctrine is to safeguard legislators from being burdened with the demands of discovery, the objective facts which can be used to challenge regulations should, if at all possible, come from sources other than the testimony of legislators. Therefore, unless the plaintiffs can establish that they cannot get the factual information they need from other sources, they are hereby precluded from taking the depositions of any of the Selectmen."); East High Gay/Straight Alliance v. Bd. of Educ. of Salt Lake City School Dist., 81 F. Supp.2d 1199, 1204 (D. Utah 2000) ("If scrutiny of legislative motive would be inappropriate for the court itself to undertake at this stage of this case, it seems likewise inappropriate for parties to invoke the court's machinery to conduct the same kind of scrutiny of individual Board members' motivations through deposition discovery."); Cooper v.

Lee County Board of Supervisors, 966 F. Supp. 411, 416 (W.D. Va. 1997) ("Although the defendant Board agrees that it is not immune from suit, it contends summary judgment is appropriate as to it because the individual board members, immune from suit, cannot be compelled to testify as to their motives, Schlitz v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 854 F.2d 43, 46 (4th Cir.1988), overruled in part by Berkley, 63 F.3d at 303, and thus the suit against the Board is barred. It is true that the individual board members enjoy a testimonial privilege flowing from the doctrine of legislative immunity. See Burtnick v. McLean, 76 F.3d 611, 613 (4th Cir.1996). However, while the plaintiff therefore must establish his prima facie case without the benefit of the supervisors' testimony, it does not necessarily follow that the suit against the Board is barred by the supervisors' privilege. Were that the case, Fourth Circuit precedent declining to extend immunity to a legislative board would in effect be defeated any time individual board members were entitled to exercise immunity. Further, the testimonial privilege may be waived.").

But see Trombetta v. Bd. of Education, Proviso Township High School District 209, No. 02 C 5895, 2004 WL 868265, at 2-5 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 22, 2004) ("In their present motion, the District and Jackson seek reconsideration of the Court's denial of their motions in limine nos. 4 and 10. In those motions, defendants sought an order barring questioning of any School Board members at trial regarding their motivations for what they characterize as the reorganization (plaintiff characterizes it as a termination of his employment) on the grounds of legislative immunity from suit, as well as any comment about those motivations by Trombetta or his attorneys (motion # 4), and any reference to their motives regarding the 'termination' (motion # 10). . . . Defendants' request to preclude any inquiry or mention of their motives amounts to a request for entry of summary judgment. Were the Court to grant what defendants request, the case would be over. A claim of retaliation for the exercise of First Amendment rights requires the plaintiff to prove that he suffered adverse action because of his exercise of protected rights, or, to put it another way, that 'the defendants' actions [were] motivated by [the plaintiff's] constitutionally protected speech.'. . The plaintiff cannot conceivably prevail without introducing evidence of, and arguing, the motivation of those who made the decision he attacks–in this case, Superintendent Jackson, Mayor Serpico, and the Board as a whole. Thus if defendants prevail on their motion for reconsideration, they are entitled to judgment in their favor. This request amounts to a motion for summary judgment which is not made in timely fashion. . . . There is another significant reason why defendants' claim is without merit. The District and Jackson argue that the Board members' legislative role entitles them to a testimonial privilege against inquiry about their reasons for acting. Even were this a viable claim, it is beyond question that the Board members have waived any such privilege. Each of the Board members appeared, without objection, for a deposition (nearly a year ago) and testified fully and completely about all of the events surrounding the termination / reorganization, including inquiries about their motives in acting as they did. If a testimonial privilege existed, it existed when the depositions were taken. Yet the Board members testified at their depositions about their reasons for acting, and they made no effort to seek a protective order barring inquiries about their reasons for acting as they did. . . . Finally, other than citing a plethora of cases, most of them either state-law decisions or non-controlling decisions of other district courts, defendants have made no effort to focus the Court in on any cases like this one in which the decision under attack is an employment-related decision by a public body and the plaintiff's claim is one that, as noted earlier, requires inquiry into the motivating factors for the decision. Based on our quick review, most of the cases appear to concern zoning matters, not the termination of a person's employment. If the purported evidentiary privilege proposed by the District and Jackson barred inquiry into the motivations of the members of a public entity that made employment decisions, it effectively would amount to a grant of immunity not just to the entity's individual members, but to the entity as a whole. If accepted, this would not only contravene Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622 (1980), in which the Supreme Court held that municipal bodies sued under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 are not entitled to the immunities from suit available to government officials, but would also effectively abrogate prohibitions against employment discrimination (Title VII, the ADEA, the ADA) for any municipal body whose "legislative" members are given decision making authority over employment matters. Defendants have marshaled no support for such a sweeping rule.").

See also Lake Country Estates, Inc. v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 440 U.S. 391, 406 (1979) (absolute immunity for members of regional land planning agency acting in legislative capacity); Church v. Missouri, 913 F.3d 736, 753-54 & n.3 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Even if the governor's appropriation-reduction authority is not shielded by sovereign immunity through Ex parte Young, legislative immunity, a separate defense, forecloses suit against the governor. . . . The plaintiffs argue that legislative immunity is a personal defense that does not apply to official-capacity suits, like the one here. They cite Roach v. Stouffer, 560 F.3d 860 (8th Cir. 2009), quoting a Second Circuit decision: 'immunity, either absolute or qualified, is a personal defense that is available only when officials are sued in their individual capacities; the immunities officials enjoy when sued personally do not extend to instances where they are sued in their official capacities.' . . But under Consumers Union, legislative immunity applies to official-capacity suits. Consumers Union, 446 U.S. at 725-26, 734, 100 S. Ct. 1967. See also Scott v. Taylor, 405 F.3d 1251, 1254 n.4, 1255 (11th Cir. 2005) (analyzing Consumers Union and Kentucky v. Graham, 473 U.S. 159, 105 S.Ct. 3099, 87 L.Ed.2d 114 (1985), and 'hold[ing] that the legislator defendants in the instant official capacity suit for prospective relief are entitled to absolute immunity.'). The Second Circuit–recognizing the tension between Almonte and Consumers Union–limited Almonte to 'claims against local-level officials, rather than state officials.' Rowland, 494 F.3d at 86, 88 ("claims for injunctive relief against defendant state officials, sued in their official capacities, may be barred by the doctrine of legislative immunity"). To the extent Roach conflicts with Consumers Union, this court is bound by Consumers Union."); State Employees Bargaining Agent Coalition v. Rowland, 494 F.3d 71, 86 (2d Cir. 2007) (distinguishing local officials from state officials and adhering "to the law of the Circuit that legislative immunity may bar claims for injunctive relief against state officials."); Scott v. Taylor, 405 F.3d 1251,1254-56 & n.6 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Appellee relies on Kentucky v. Graham . . . . In Graham, the Court emphasized 'the practical and doctrinal differences between personal and official capacity actions.' . . One key difference between individual and official capacity suits is the available defenses. . . The Court noted that a government official sued in his individual capacity may be entitled to various personal immunity defenses. . . However, because an official capacity suit against a government official is generally treated as a suit against the underlying governmental entity, such personal immunity defenses are unavailable. . . . Scott relies on the . . . language in Graham in arguing that the instant action sues the state legislators in their official capacity and that these defendants therefore are not entitled to legislative immunity, a personal defense. Scott's argument fails to appreciate an important exception to the Graham opinion's general rule. As the Graham Court stated, personal defenses are generally unavailable in official capacity suits because such suits are treated as suits against the underlying entity. . . The exception, however, is derived from Ex Parte Young, . . . which held that official capacity suits for prospective relief to enjoin state officials from enforcing unconstitutional acts are not deemed to be suits against the state and thus are not barred by the Eleventh Amendment. . . .Thus, the instant action–seeking prospective relief against these state legislator defendants in their official capacities–is not to be treated as a action against the entity. Therefore, the general rule of Graham is not applicable. For these reasons, our holding is not only controlled by Consumers Union, it is entirely consistent with Graham. Indeed, the Supreme Court in Graham discussed and expressly approved of the Consumers Union Court's holding that the Virginia Supreme Court's chief justice was protected by absolute legislative immunity when sued in his official capacity for promulgating an attorney ethics code that violated the First Amendment. . . . Following Consumers Union, we hold that the legislator defendants in the instant official capacity suit for prospective relief are entitled to absolute immunity. . . In addition to being consistent with prior Supreme Court opinions, our holding is consistent with the purposes of legislative immunity. . . . The purpose of legislative immunity being to free legislators from such worries and distractions, it makes sense to apply the doctrine regardless of the capacity in which a state legislator is sued. We finally turn our attention to Scott's argument that applying legislative immunity in this case would leave her with no recourse for the alleged discrimination she suffered. This is not so. Scott is free to maintain her suit against the Board of Elections. Indeed, the Board of Elections is the only defendant in this case which has any role with respect to the relief sought by Scott, i.e., prospective relief seeking to enjoin the enforcement of the challenged voting district and a declaration as to its legality. . . As noted above, the legislator defendants have no role in the enforcement or implementation of the voting district. Should Scott prevail, she will still be able to obtain all of the relief she seeks. . . . Because Appellants are state legislators who acted in their legislative capacities, they are entitled to absolute legislative immunity. This is true regardless of whether a suit seeks damages or prospective relief and regardless of whether the state legislators are named in their individual or official capacity. . . .[W]e are not concerned in this case with local legislators, and therefore we leave to another day issues relating to scope and breadth of their legislative immunity.").

But see Fuller v. Acklman, 616 F.Supp.2d 1307, 1309 n.3 (N.D. Ga. 2009) ("This court believes that the legal analysis regarding official capacity in Scott is wrong. That court recognized that official capacity suits seeking injunctive relief "are not deemed to be suits against the state and thus are not barred by the Eleventh Amendment." 403 F.3d at 1255. However, the court went on to say, "Thus, the instant action–seeking prospective relief against these state legislator defendants in their official capacities–is not to be treated as a[sic] action against the entity." Id. This statement, however, misstates the legal fiction that official capacity suits seeking injunctive relief are not against the state. In Ex Parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 28 S.Ct. 441, 52 L.Ed. 714 (1908), the Supreme Court allowed an official capacity suit seeking injunctive relief against the state to proceed on the legal fiction that the state was not really the defendant and thus the Eleventh Amendment was not implicated. However, the Court did not treat the case as being against the person individually. Official capacity suits seeking injunctive relief are in practice against the state, but the legal fiction that they are not avoids the Eleventh Amendment issue. In discussing legislative immunity, the Eleventh Circuit treated the defendants as though they were sued in their personal capacities since legislative immunity, like qualified immunity, is available to a defendant sued only in his individual capacity, not his official capacity. The Eleventh Circuit's statement that the Supreme Court in Supreme Court of Virginia v. Consumers Union, 446 U.S. 719, 100 S.Ct. 1967, 64 L.Ed.2d 641 (1980), ruled that the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Virginia was entitled to legislative immunity in both his individual and official capacities is simply incorrect. Nowhere in Consumers Union did the Supreme Court make such a conclusion. Finally, this court notes that the Eleventh Circuit, in discussing "official capacity" (which is a term of art and does not mean "scope of official duties") conflated the concept of official capacity with the possible immunity enjoyed by persons in their individual capacities and coined the term "official legislative capacities." 405 F.3d at 1254. Such "capacities" are unknown in Supreme Court jurisprudence. However, the Eleventh Circuit's error in giving legislative immunity to persons sued in their official capacities cannot be corrected by this court; only the Supreme Court (or the Eleventh Circuit sitting en banc) can do that.").

B. Note on Qualified Immunity and Private Actors

1. Richardson v. McKnight

The Supreme Court has held that private defendants in § 1983 suits challenging their use of state replevin, garnishment or attachment statutes later held unconstitutional, cannot invoke the qualified immunity available to government officials in such suits. Wyatt v. Cole, 504 U.S. 158, 168-69 (1992).

On remand, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit held that "private defendants, at least those invoking ex parte prejudgment statutes, should not be held liable under § 1983 absent a showing of malice and evidence that they either knew or should have known of the statute's constitutional infirmity." Wyatt v. Cole, 994 F.2d 1113, 1120 (5th Cir. 1993). On the difference between qualified immunity and the "good faith" defense, see Tapley v. Collins, 211 F.3d 1210, 1215 (11th Cir. 2000) ("Qualified immunity is an objective test, . . .while good faith defenses are subjective in nature . . . Qualified immunity is as a question of law for the judge, while good faith generally is a jury question. . . Because it is a question of law for the judge, a qualified immunity defense more often can be, and generally should be, decided earlier in the litigation than a good faith defense. . . Finally, a denial of qualified immunity is interlocutorily appealable, . . . while a denial of a good faith defense is appealable only after there has been a final judgment in the case . . . .").

See also Brown v. American Federation of State, County & Municipal Employees., Council No. 5, AFL-CIO, 41 F.4th 963, 969 (8th Cir. 2022) ("In sum, because the unions collected fair-share fees under Minn. Stat. § 179A.06 at a time when the procedure employed had been deemed constitutional by the Supreme Court, their reliance on the statute was objectively reasonable, and they are entitled to a good-faith defense. Even if subjective intent were deemed relevant, the employees have pleaded no facts to support a plausible inference that the unions collected these fees in subjective bad faith. The good-faith defense thus bars the employees' claims for damages."); Schaszberger v. American Federation of State County and Municipal Employees Council 13, No. 21-2172, 2022 WL 2826438, at *6 (3d Cir. July 20, 2022) (not reported) ("[W]e join a growing list of our sister circuits in recognizing a good faith defense for § 1983 private defendants who relied on then-controlling Supreme Court precedent and then-existing state law. See Lee v. Ohio Educ. Ass'n, 951 F.3d 386, 390–91 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Since Wyatt, a consensus has emerged among the lower courts that while a private party acting under color of state law does not enjoy qualified immunity from suit, it is entitled to raise a good-faith defense to liability under section 1983. It is not surprising then that the Seventh Circuit, the Ninth Circuit, and each of the District Courts to have considered the precise issue before us have all concluded that the good-faith defense precludes claims brought under § 1983 for a return of fair-share fees collected under the Abood regime." (cleaned up)); Wholean v. CSEA SEIU Loc. 2001, 955 F.3d 332, 335–36 (2d Cir. 2020); Danielson, 945 F.3d at 1101–02; Janus v. Am. Fed'n of State, Cnty. & Mun. Emps., Council 31, 942 F.3d 352, 365 (7th Cir. 2019) (Janus II). We agree. Because AFSCME relied in good faith on both Janus and 71 Pa. Stat. Ann. § 575, it is entitled to a good faith defense. . .We recognize a good faith defense here for § 1983 private defendants who reasonably relied on then-controlling Supreme Court precedent and then-existing state law. Under this standard, Appellee is entitled to a good faith defense."); Allen v. Santa Clara County Correctional Peace Officers Ass'n, 38 F.4th 68, 70-75 (9th Cir. 2022) ("Although left undecided in Danielson, that case preordains our decision here. In Danielson, we held that a union may assert a good faith defense in an action to recover retroactive agency fees if the union relied on binding Supreme Court precedent and state law in assessing the fees. . . Private parties may 'rely on judicial pronouncements of what the law is, without exposing themselves to potential liability for doing so.'. . And precedent recognizes that municipalities are generally liable in the same way as private corporations in § 1983 actions. . . It therefore follows that the rule announced in Danielson for unions also applies to municipalities. We thus hold that municipalities are entitled to a good faith defense to a suit for a refund of mandatory agency fees under § 1983. . . . Contrary to the Employees' contention, the Supreme Court did not rule out such a defense for municipalities in Owen. In Owen, the Court rejected 'a construction of § 1983 that would accord municipalities a qualified immunity for their good-faith constitutional violations.'. . In explaining its rationale, the Court stated that the 'municipality may not assert the good faith of its officers or agents as a defense to liability under § 1983.'. . The Employees take this statement to mean that a municipality may not assert a good faith defense. We do not read Owen so broadly. When speaking of 'good faith,' the Court discussed it only in terms of qualified immunity, not the affirmative defense of good faith at issue here. . . . The takeaway is that Owen was a case about qualified immunity, so its references to 'good faith' were made only in that context, not to the affirmative defense of good faith available to private litigants. . . . At the time, the County acted under a presumptively valid state law permitting the payroll deductions. . . And because unions may assert a good faith defense in an action to recover these compulsory fees as a matter of law, . . . so too may municipalities. We decline to hold municipalities to a different standard than we held unions in Danielson. . . . Because, under Danielson, unions get a good faith defense to a claim for a refund of pre-Janus agency fees, . . . and municipalities' tort liability for proprietary actions is the same as private parties, . . . the County is also entitled to a good faith defense to retrospective § 1983 liability for collecting pre-Janus agency fees."); Akers v. Maryland State Educ. Ass'n, 990 F.3d 375, 379-82 (4th Cir. 2021) ("We observe at the outset of our analysis that the plaintiffs' case is one of several dozen lawsuits being pursued around the country in which non-union employees seek monetary relief for the representation fees they paid to public-sector unions prior to the Janus decision. And every court of appeals to have addressed the question of whether public-sector unions are entitled to interpose the good-faith defense as a bar to the refund of representation fees — that is, the First, Second, Third, Sixth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits — have held that the good-faith defense bars such claims. [collecting cases] Consistent with the recent decisions of several of our sister circuits, however, we will not decide the retroactivity issue. We will instead assume that Janus is entitled to retroactive application and proceed to dispose of this appeal on the basis of the good-faith defense interposed by the union defendants. . . .And all the circuits that have since addressed the issue — that is, the Second, Third, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits — have ruled that a private party is entitled to assert the good-faith defense to liability under § 1983. [collecting cases] We readily agree with our six sister circuits and recognize that the good-faith defense is available to a private-party defendant sued under § 1983. As a result, we also agree with the resolution of this issue made by the Opinion of the district court from which this appeal emanates. . . .In sum, consistent with the weight of authority from our sister circuits, we affirm the district court and rule that the union defendants are entitled to utilize the good-faith defense with respect to the plaintiffs' Janus claim."); Doughty v. State Employees' Association of New Hampshire, 981 F.3d 128, 130, 137 (1st Cir. 2020) ("The District Court granted the Union's motion to dismiss Doughty and Severance's complaint, and we affirm, aligning ourselves with every circuit to have addressed whether such a backward-looking, Janus-based claim is cognizable under § 1983. . . . [A]lthough Doughty and Severance assert that their claim for damages seeks to vindicate their First Amendment right against compelled speech and association and that this right provides protection from harm that the common law itself did not, they ignore the unusual nature of their attempt to secure relief for the violation of that constitutional right. They thus develop no argument -- nor does any occur to us -- why close attention to the values and purposes of the First Amendment right against compelled speech and association supports the conclusion that the Congress that enacted § 1983 must have meant to create a claim for damages for its retroactive violation when the violation results in payments made pursuant to a lawful-when-invoked, state-backed process."); Diamond v. Pennsylvania State Education Association, 972 F.3d 262, 265, 269 (3d Cir. 2020) ("The District Courts, joining a consensus of federal courts across the country, dismissed Appellants' claims for monetary relief, ruling that because the Unions collected the fair-share fees in good faith reliance on a governing state statute and Supreme Court precedent, they are entitled to, and have successfully made out, a good faith defense to monetary liability under § 1983. We will affirm. . . . We are not the first court of appeals to rule on this question, and we join a growing consensus of our sister circuits who, in virtually identical cases, have held that because the unions collected the fair-share fees in good faith reliance on a governing state statute and Supreme Court precedent, they are entitled to a good faith defense that bars Appellants' claims for monetary liability under § 1983."); Wholean v. CSEA SEIU Local 2001, 955 F.3d 332, 335-36 (2d Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1735 (2021) ("We hold that a party who complied with directly controlling Supreme Court precedent in collecting fair-share fees cannot be held liable for monetary damages under § 1983. In so holding, we do not write on a blank slate. The Supreme Court in Wyatt v. Cole, . . . observed that 'principles of equality and fairness may suggest ... that private citizens who rely unsuspectingly on state laws they did not create and may have no reason to believe are invalid should have some protection from liability, as do their government counterparts.' Although the Court ultimately held that private defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity, the Court refused to 'foreclose the possibility that private defendants faced with § 1983 liability ... could be entitled to an affirmative defense based on good faith and/or probable cause.'. .Indeed, in Wyatt, several Justices opined that a good-faith defense for private individuals who rely on precedent has always existed. . . Since Wyatt, every Circuit Court of Appeals to have considered the question has held that a good-faith defense exists under § 1983 for private individuals and entities acting under the color of state law who comply with applicable law, including three circuits who have concluded that a good-faith defense is available to unions that relied on Abood and applicable state law in collecting fair-share fees prior to Janus. . . . Because Appellees collected fair-share fees in reliance on directly controlling Supreme Court precedent and then-valid state statutes, their reliance was objectively reasonable, and they are entitled to a 'good-faith' defense as a matter of law. . . . In finding a good-faith defense, we note that nothing in Janus suggests that the Supreme Court intended its ruling to be retroactive. Indeed, the Janus Court held that 'States and public-sector unions may no longer extract agency fees from nonconsenting employees,'. . . and the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for further proceedings rather than apply its new rule to the parties before it. . . Even if the retroactivity of Janus is presumed, no different outcome is warranted. A good-faith defense would still preclude the relief Appellants seek."); Lee v. Ohio Education Association, 951 F.3d 386, 389-91 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1264 (2021) ("We thus agree with our sister circuits that '[r]ather than wrestle the retroactivity question to the ground,' the most prudent course of action is to assume without deciding that the right recognized in Janus has retroactive application. . .We thus proceed to an evaluation of the remedies available to plaintiff. . .Even assuming the retroactivity of Janus, Lee's claim presents an 'instance[ ] where [the] new rule, for well-established legal reasons, does not determine the outcome of the case.'. . Here, the good-faith defense constitutes 'a previously existing, independent legal basis ... for denying' a retroactive remedy. . . . Ultimately, the Wyatt Court held that private parties were not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . It is not surprising then that the Seventh Circuit, the Ninth Circuit, and each of the district courts to have considered the precise issue before us have all concluded that the good-faith defense precludes claims brought under § 1983 for a return of fair-share fees collected under the Abood regime. . . We now add our voice to that chorus. The Union was authorized by Ohio law and binding Supreme Court precedent to collect agency fees. 'Until [Janus] said otherwise, [the Union] had a legal right to receive and spend fair-share fees collected from nonmembers as long as it complied with state law and the Abood line of cases. It did not demonstrate bad faith when it followed these rules.'. . Accordingly, we hold that the district court properly granted the motion to dismiss plaintiff's § 1983 claim because the Union's reliance on existing authority satisfied the good-faith defense as a matter of law."); Danielson v. Inslee, 945 F.3d 1096, 1097-1100, 1103-04 (9th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1265 (2021) ("Throughout the country, public sector employees brought claims for monetary relief against the unions pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Many unions asserted a good faith defense in response. Joining a growing consensus, the district court here ruled in favor of the union. We affirm and hold that private parties may invoke an affirmative defense of good faith to retrospective monetary liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, where they acted in direct reliance on then-binding Supreme Court precedent and presumptively-valid state law. . . . We hold that the district court properly dismissed Plaintiffs' claim for monetary relief against the Union. In so ruling, we join the Seventh Circuit, the only other circuit to have addressed the question before us. See Janus v. Am. Fed'n of State, Cty. & Mun. Emps., Council 31, 942 F.3d 352 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Janus II"); Mooney v. Ill. Educ. Ass'n, 942 F.3d 368 (7th Cir. 2019). We agree with our sister circuit that a union defendant can invoke an affirmative defense of good faith to retrospective monetary liability under section 1983 for the agency fees it collected pre-Janus, where its conduct was directly authorized under both state law and decades of Supreme Court jurisprudence. The Union was not required to forecast changing winds at the Supreme Court and anticipatorily presume the overturning of Abood. Instead, we permit private parties to rely on judicial pronouncements of what the law is, without exposing themselves to potential liability for doing so. . . . Plaintiffs also argue that an entity cannot invoke the good faith defense, just as a municipality cannot invoke qualified immunity. This argument, however, runs counter to Clement, in which we applied the good faith defense to an entity defendant. Plaintiffs' argument is also at odds with the purpose underlying the good faith defense: that private parties should be entitled to rely on binding judicial pronouncements and state law without concern that they will be held retroactively liable for changing precedents. This principle applies equally to a private entity as it does to a private individual. . . . In collecting compulsory agency fees, the Union relied on presumptively-valid state law and then-binding Supreme Court precedent. The Union now faces an assertion of monetary liability not for flouting that law or misinterpreting its bounds, but for adhering to it. Although some justices had signaled their disagreement with Abood in the years leading up to Janus, Abood remained binding authority until it was overruled. . . We agree with our sister circuit that '[t]he Rule of Law requires that parties abide by, and be able to rely on, what the law is, rather than what the readers of tea-leaves predict that it might be in the future.'. . . Because the Union's action was sanctioned not only by state law, but also by directly on-point Supreme Court precedent, we hold that the good faith defense shields the Union from retrospective monetary liability as a matter of law. In so ruling, we join a growing consensus of courts across the nation. [collecting cases in footnote]"); Janus v. American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, Council 31, 942 F.3d 352, 362-64, 366 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Sometimes the law recognizes a defense to certain types of relief. An example that comes readily to mind is the qualified immunity doctrine, which is available for a public employee if the asserted constitutional right that she violated was not clearly established. . . We must decide whether a union may raise any such defense against its liability for the fair-share fees it collected before Janus II. This is a matter of first impression in our circuit. But, as the district court noted, every federal appellate court to have decided the question has held that, while a private party acting under color of state law does not enjoy qualified immunity from suit, it is entitled to raise a good-faith defense to liability under section 1983. . . . In Wyatt I, the Court had to decide how far its immunity jurisprudence reached, and specifically, whether private parties acting under color of state law would have been able, at the time section 1983 was enacted (in 1871), to invoke the same immunities that public officials had. . . Surveying its immunity jurisprudence, including Mitchell v. Forsyth, . . . Harlow v. Fitzgerald, . . . Wood v. Strickland, . . . and Pierson v. Ray, . . . the Court 'conclude[ed] that the rationales mandating qualified immunity for public officials are not applicable to private parties.'. .The Court recognized that this outcome risked leaving private defendants in the unenviable position of being just as vulnerable to suit as public officials, per Lugar, but not protected by the same immunity. . . But, critically for AFSCME, the Court pointed toward the solution to that problem. It distinguished between defenses to suit and immunity from suit, the latter of which is more robust, in that it bars recovery regardless of the merits. . . It then confirmed that its ruling rejecting qualified immunity did 'not foreclose the possibility that private defendants faced with § 1983 liability under [Lugar] could be entitled to an affirmative defense based on good faith and/or probable cause or that § 1983 suits against private, rather than governmental, parties could require plaintiffs to carry additional burdens.'. . Mr. Janus rejects the line that the Court drew between qualified immunity and a defense to liability; he sees it as nothing but a labeling game. But Wyatt I directly refutes this criticism. . . . The distinction between an immunity and a defense is one of substance, not just nomenclature, and 'is important because there is support in the common law for the proposition that a private individual's reliance on a statute, prior to a judicial determination of unconstitutionality, is considered reasonable as a matter of law.'. . The Wyatt I Court remanded the case to the Fifth Circuit, which decided that the 'question left open by the majority'—whether a good-faith defense is available in section 1983 actions—'was largely answered' in the affirmative by the five concurring and dissenting justices. . . The court accordingly held 'that private defendants sued on the basis of Lugar may be held liable for damages under § 1983 only if they failed to act in good faith in invoking the unconstitutional state procedures, that is, if they either knew or should have known that the statute upon which they relied was unconstitutional.'. .Other circuits followed suit. . . . Mr. Janus pushes back against these decisions with the argument that there is no common-law history before 1871 of private parties enjoying a good-faith defense to constitutional claims. As we hinted earlier, however, the reason is simple: the liability of private parties under section 1983 was not clearly established until, at the earliest, the Court's decision in United States v. Price, 383 U.S. 787, 86 S.Ct. 1152, 16 L.Ed.2d 267 (1966). For nearly 100 years, nothing would have prompted the question. We now join our sister circuits in recognizing that, under appropriate circumstances, a private party that acts under color of law for purposes of section 1983 may defend on the ground that it proceeded in good faith. . . . Like our sister circuits, we read the Court's language in Wyatt I and Lugar, supplemented by Justice Kennedy's opinion concurring in Wyatt I, as a strong signal that the Court intended (when the time was right) to recognize a good-faith defense in section 1983 actions when the defendant reasonably relies on established law. This is not, we stress, a simple 'mistake of law' defense. Neither CMS nor AFSCME made any mistake about the state of the law during the years between 1982 and June 27, 2018, when Janus II was handed down. Abood was the operative decision from the Supreme Court from 1977 onward, until the Court exercised its exclusive prerogative to overrule that case. Like its counterparts around the country, the State of Illinois relied on Abood when it adopted a labor relations scheme providing for exclusive representation of public-sector workers and the remit of fair-share fees to the recognized union. The union then relied on that state law in its interactions with other actors. We realize that there were signals from some Justices during the years leading up to Janus II that indicated they were willing to reconsider Abood, but that is hardly unique to this area. Sometimes such reconsideration happens, and sometimes, despite the most confident predictions, it does not. . . . Until Janus II said otherwise, AFSCME had a legal right to receive and spend fair-share fees collected from nonmembers as long as it complied with state law and the Abood line of cases. It did not demonstrate bad faith when it followed these rules.")

But see Campos v. Fresno Deputy Sheriff's Association, 535 F.Supp.3d 913, 920, 925, 927 & n.7 (E.D. Cal. 2021) ("Together, Owen, Leatherman, and Evers can be read as standing for the proposition that, in order to redress constitutional wrongs, a municipality will be held liable for constitutional injuries caused by its practice, policy, or custom, irrespective of its officers' ability to assert qualified immunity and irrespective of any good faith reliance on state statutes. This proposition would seem to undercut application of a good faith affirmative defense to a municipality. Recognizing the good faith defense for a municipality could negate Owen's balancing and goal of ensuring the availability of compensation for injuries caused by municipal policies and practices. To the Court's knowledge, and as confirmed by the parties' briefing, no court in a reasoned decision has extended the good faith affirmative defense to municipalities. In light of Owen, Leatherman, and Evers, until the Supreme Court or the Ninth Circuit holds otherwise, this Court cannot hold that the County is entitled to assert the good faith affirmative defense. . . . In sum, after applying Harper, the Court concludes that Janus is to be applied retroactively. . . .The parties have been unable to find any cases post-Janus in which a municipality like the County has been held liable for pre-Janus conduct. . . . [T]he law is unsettled in the Ninth Circuit with respect to a municipality's liability under § 1983 when the municipality is following or acting in accordance with state law. Some courts find that there is no liability when the municipality follows a non-discretionary mandatory state law because the municipality did not make a policy decision. [citing cases] Some courts find or suggest that following state law, even if a non-discretionary, mandatory, state law duty is involved, does not relieve a municipality of liability. [citing cases] Other courts have noted that the issue has not been definitively settled. . . Within the Ninth Circuit, at least, part of the disagreement involves how to interpret Evers. Given the divide, the Court will not decide the issue without more in depth briefing from the parties. . . . [U]ntil further proceedings occur, the Court cannot hold that the fact that Chandavong and Her are challenging the taking of vacation hours is immaterial. In sum, this appears to be a unique case. The ultimate resolution of the County's liability (if any) will have to await further proceedings. . . In light of the arguments made in connection with the FDSA's motion to dismiss the SAC and the supplemental briefing received, the Court will not dismiss the third cause of action against the County for vacation hours involuntarily taken from Chandavong and Her pre-Janus when they were not members of the FDSA. . . .The Court at this time is not resolving the question of whether the County was under a mandatory duty, or what the effect of a non-discretionary mandatory duty on the County would be for purposes of § 1983. The Court is only noting the potential issues surrounding the proper classification of the vacation hours taken.")

In Richardson v. McKnight, 117 S. Ct. 2100, 2102 (1997), the Court held that "prison guards who are employees of a private prison management firm are [not] entitled to a qualified immunity from suit by prisoners charging a violation of . . . § 1983." The opinion was five-four, with Justice Breyer writing for the majority (joined by Justices Stevens, O'Connor, Souter and Ginsburg).

The Court found four aspects of Wyatt relevant to its decision: 1) Wyatt reaffirmed that § 1983 can sometimes impose liability upon a private individual; 2) Wyatt reinforced a distinction that exists between an "immunity from suit" and other kinds of legal defenses; 3) Wyatt identified the legal source of § 1983 immunities as both historical origins and public policy concerns underlying suits against government officials; and 4) Wyatt was a limited decision, not applicable to all private individuals regardless of their relationship to the government. Id. at 2103-04.

The majority concluded that "[h]istory does not reveal a 'firmly rooted' tradition of immunity applicable to privately employed prison guards." Id. at 2104. Furthermore, the Court found the public policy concerns underlying immunity for government officials (discouragement of "unwarranted timidity," reduction of threat of damages suits as a deterrent to talented candidates pursuing careers in public service and elimination of "distraction" from duty) were not implicated in the context of prison employees of the large, multistate private prison management firm. Id. at 2105-08.

The Court rejected petitioners' argument that a functional approach should be applied in deciding the immunity question. As the Court notes:

> The Court has sometimes applied a functional approach in immunity cases, but only to decide which type of immunity–absolute or qualified–a public officer should receive. [cites omitted] And it never has held that the mere performance of a governmental function could make the difference between unlimited § 1983 liability and qualified immunity, . . . especially for a private person who performs a job without government supervision or direction. Indeed a purely functional approach bristles with difficulty, particularly since, in many areas, government and private industry may engage in fundamentally similar activities, ranging from electricity production, to waste disposal, to even mail delivery.
>
> Id. at 2106.

2. Filarsky v. Delia

The Supreme Court distinguished Richardson in Filarsky v. Delia, 132 S.Ct. 1657, 1665-68 (2012) ("[I]mmunity under § 1983 should not vary depending on whether an individual working for the government does so as a full-time employee, or on some other basis. . . .Wyatt is plainly not implicated by the circumstances of this case. Unlike the defendants in Wyatt, who were using the mechanisms of government to achieve their own ends, individuals working for the government in pursuit of government objectives are 'principally concerned with enhancing the public good.'. . Whether such individuals have assurance that they will be able to seek protection if sued under § 1983 directly affects the government's ability to achieve its objectives through their public service. Put simply, Wyatt involved no government agents, no government interests, and no government need for immunity. . . .Richardson was a self-consciously 'narrow[ ]' decision. . . The Court made clear that its holding was not meant to foreclose all claims of immunity by private individuals. . . Instead, the Court emphasized that the particular circumstances of that case—'a private firm, systematically organized to assume a major lengthy administrative task (managing an institution) with limited direct supervision by the government, undertak[ing] that task for profit and potentially in competition with other firms'—combined sufficiently to mitigate the concerns underlying recognition of governmental immunity under § 1983. . . Nothing of the sort is involved here, or in the typical case of an individual hired by the government to assist in carrying out its work. A straightforward application of the rule set out above is sufficient to resolve this case. Though not a public employee, Filarsky was retained by the City to assist in conducting an official investigation into potential wrongdoing. There is no dispute that government employees performing such work are entitled to seek the protection of qualified immunity. The Court of Appeals rejected Filarsky's claim to the protection accorded Wells, Bekker, and Peel solely because he was not a permanent, full-time employee of the City. The common law, however, did not draw such distinctions, and we see no justification for doing so under § 1983. New York City has a Department of Investigation staffed by full-time public employees who investigate city personnel, and the resources to pay for it. The City of Rialto has neither, and so must rely on the occasional services of private individuals such as Mr. Filarsky. There is no reason Rialto's internal affairs investigator should be denied the qualified immunity enjoyed by the ones who work for New York.")

Accord Bartell v. Lohiser, 215 F.3d 550, 557 (6th Cir. 2000) ("[T]he purposes of qualified immunity apply with particular force to the foster care services provided by LSS [Lutheran Social Services]. Decisions pertaining to the welfare of a child, which may, as in this case, result in the termination of the natural bond between parent and child, require the deliberate and careful exercise of official discretion in ways that few public positions can match. The necessity that this delicate process not be over-burdened with encumbering litigation comports entirely with the Harlow Court's formulation of the purposes of qualified immunity protection. Accordingly, because of the closely monitored, non-profit interrelationship between FIA [Family Independence Agency] and LSS, we hold that the LSS defendants may assert qualified immunity."); Camilo-Robles v. Hoyos, 151 F.3d 1, 10 (1st Cir. 1998) ("Here, the psychiatrists acted under contract with the police department to assist in a necessary departmental function: the evaluation of officers. Hence, the psychiatrists, virtually by their own admission . . . are for purposes of this case state actors performing in concert with the department. As such, they are both subject to suit under section 1983 and eligible for the balm of qualified immunity."); Young v. Murphy, 90 F.3d 1225, 1234 (7th Cir. 1996) (private physician hired by office of county public guardian to evaluate competency of attorney's client was entitled to assert defense of qualified immunity); Eagon v. City of Elk City, 72 F.3d 1480, 1490 (10th Cir. 1995) ("Because defendant Nelda Burch was not 'invok[ing] state law in pursuit of private ends,' [citing Warner], Wyatt is inapplicable. Instead, Ms. Burch was performing a government function pursuant to a government request–determining what displays would, and would not, be allowed at Christmas in the Park. Under Warner, she is entitled to qualified immunity 'if a state official would have been entitled to such immunity had he performed the function himself.'"); Warner v. Grand County, 57 F.3d 962, 967 (10th Cir. 1995) ("We hold that a private individual who performs a government function pursuant to a state order or request is entitled to qualified immunity if a state official would have been entitled to such immunity had he performed the function himself. We believe that this holding is consistent with . . . Wyatt and the policy rationale that has shaped the qualified immunity defense from its inception."); Mejia v. City of New York, 119 F. Supp.2d 232, 261, 267, 268 (E.D.N.Y. 2000) ("Although it is presumably common place for private citizens to assist law enforcement in making arrests, the question of whether qualified immunity is available to such persons turns out to be surprisingly novel. No court in this circuit has addressed the issue, and the few decisions from courts in other circuits that have addressed similar questions, were decided before Richardson or else do not conduct the historical inquiry required by Richardson. . . . In sum . . . there was (1) strong support in the common law as of 1871 for shielding private citizens who are enlisted by the police to assist in making unlawful arrests, though that support probably does not rise to the level of a firmly rooted tradition, and (2) the purposes behind qualified immunity all strongly weigh in favor of recognizing the availability of qualified immunity in such cases. The conflict between the two prongs of the Richardson test in this case, thus, raises the question whether the Richardson test is truly conjunctive in nature. On the one hand, Richardson could be interpreted as commanding a reviewing court to examine both history and policy in deciding whether qualified immunity is available, but allowing the court to weigh the two considerations against each other if the two inquiries yield opposite results. On the other hand, Richardson may require that both inquiries be made and that each of them weigh in favor of recognizing the availability of qualified immunity. . . .[I]t is clear that the strength of common law tradition alone cannot justify extending qualified immunity to a given class of § 1983 defendants. However, this result leaves open the question presented by this case: whether sufficiently strong policy considerations, buttressed by a clear line of common law authority, though not one that can be properly described as a firmly rooted tradition, suffice to establish qualified immunity for a particular class of private actors. . . . It may be inferred . . . that the Richardson and Wyatt courts contemplated that qualified immunity might be available in cases where policy considerations strongly support extending qualified immunity, even if the relevant common law authorities do not unequivocally support its recognition. This case presents exactly such a scenario, and the above discussion of the relevant policy considerations leads to the conclusion that qualified immunity is available to private actors who are enlisted by law enforcement officials to assist in making an arrest."); Calloway v. Boro of Glassboro Dep't of Police, 89 F.Supp.2d 543, 557 n. 21 (D.N.J.2000) (holding that private citizen asked by police to act as sign language interpreter in course of the interrogation of deaf suspect was entitled to qualified immunity on ground that she was a "private individual who was asked to participate in a single criminal investigation, an undoubtedly essential governmental activity, and also was acting under the supervision of the investigators who could not themselves perform the function"); Murphy v. New York Racing Ass'n, Inc., 76 F. Supp.2d 489, 506, 507 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) ("Just as Richardson focused on the private prison management firm's guards–as opposed to its administrators or its cafeteria workers, so the Board Defendants focus on the private racing association's board of trustees–as opposed to its executive officers or its stable workers. We therefore find the Board Defendants' characterization (of the pertinent historical tradition) more appropriate than Plaintiff's. Hence, given that Plaintiff does not contest the Board Defendants' contention that there is a firmly-rooted common law tradition of affording corporate directors immunity from suit, we hold that the Board Defendants have satisfied the history prong of the Richardson test. This brings us to Richardson' s "purpose" prong. . . .[W]e conclude that, unlike the prison management firm in Richardson, NYRA is not really a market participant subject to competitive market pressures. As such, unlike the prison firm's employees, NYRA's trustees need the encouragement and protection of qualified immunity."); Ruppel v. Ramseyer, 33 F.Supp.2d 720, 728-29 (C.D.Ill.1999) (holding that private physician and nurse were immune from suit for subjecting motorist to blood-alcohol test, after she refused treatment following automobile accident, since police officer, acting under authority vested by state statute, ordered them to withdraw blood after driver was arrested for driving under the influence); Erwin v. City of Chicago, No. 90 C 950, 1998 WL 794297, *4 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 30, 1998) (unpublished) ("This court and others have suggested that public policy requires that the court, in some cases, grant qualified immunity to private actors ordered to act on behalf of the state. This court has recognized the importance of permitting a private defendant to be shielded by qualified immunity when justice requires. . . . [S]ubjecting lawyers to suit for acting pursuant to a court's mandate would strain the already short supply of resources most courts have in monitoring court ordered remedies. Flaxman and Seliger acted pursuant to court order. Just as the individual City defendants did."); Heinrich ex rel Heinrich v. Sweet, 62 F. Supp.2d 282, 318 (D.Mass. 1999) ("[B]ecause the private defendants in this case were engaging in matters of public concern rather than merely acting out of self-interest pursuant to something like a garnishment statute, the Court follows Camilo-Robles in holding that the private defendants are entitled to seek qualified immunity.").

3. Post-Filarsky Cases

See Moore v. LaSalle Management Company, L.L.C., 41 F.4th 493, 508 (5th Cir. 2022) ("We recently explained in Sanchez v. Oliver that employees of 'private firm[s] systematically organized to perform the major administrative task of delivering healthcare services to inmates, detainees, and juveniles,' like Mitchell, '[are] categorically ineligible to claim qualified immunity.'. . The district court did not have the benefit of our decision in Sanchez. The parties now agree that Mitchell was not entitled to qualified immunity. Therefore, the district court incorrectly concluded that he was."); Estate of Beauford v. Mesa County, Colorado, 35 F.4th 1248, 1263 n.12 (10th Cir. 2022) ("The district court, relying on Richardson v. McKnight . . . rejected the assertion of qualified immunity by the Individual Medical Defendants. . . While acknowledging our court had not yet reached the question, the district court found it compelling that 'every other circuit to address the issue has determined that McKnight precludes the application of qualified immunity to private medical professionals hired to work in a prison.'. . The parties have not challenged this ruling on appeal and for good reason. Six months after the district court entered its amended summary judgment order, we decided Tanner v. McMurray, 989 F.3d 860, 874 (10th Cir. 2021), and like our sister circuits, held qualified immunity is not available to private medical professionals employed full-time in a detention facility."); Davis v. Buchanan County, Missouri, 11 F.4th 604, 616-22 (8th Cir. 2021) (" A threshold issue is whether these medical defendants, employees of private medical-services-providers, may assert the defense of qualified immunity in response to the parents' section 1983 claim. This court has not directly addressed whether employees of private medical-services-providers are entitled to assert the defense of qualified immunity. See Langford v. Norris, 614 F.3d 445, 457 (8th Cir. 2010) (recognizing, but not directly holding, that employees of Correctional Medical Services, Inc., a medical services provider and direct predecessor to Corizon, 'cannot claim qualified immunity'). Although private employees, these medical defendants are considered state actors for purposes of the parents' section 1983 claim. . . . But private individuals, as state actors, are not necessarily entitled to assert the defense of qualified immunity in defending section 1983 claims. . . To determine whether these medical defendants are entitled to assert qualified immunity, this court applies the factors outlined by the Supreme Court in Richardson v. McKnight and Filarsky v. Delia[.] . . According to the Court, the availability of qualified immunity to state actors depends on two factors: the 'general principles of tort immunities and defenses applicable at common law, and the reasons we have afforded protection from suit under § 1983.'. . Applying these factors, this court concludes that these medical defendants are not entitled to assert the defense of qualified immunity. . . . All other circuits have not found a firmly rooted tradition of immunity for similarly situated privately-employed medical professionals defending claims like those of the parents. See Sanchez v. Oliver, 995 F.3d 461, 468 (5th Cir. 2021) ("all of our sister circuits to have considered the issue have found no compelling history of immunity for private medical providers in a correctional setting." (citations omitted)); Tanner v. McMurray, 989 F.3d 860, 867 (10th Cir. 2021) ("No circuit that has considered this issue has uncovered a common law tradition of immunity for full-time private medical staff working under the color of state law."). See also Est. of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 550–51 (7th Cir. 2017) (agreeing with the Sixth Circuit that there "was no common-law tradition of immunity for a private doctor working for a public institution at the time that Congress passed § 1983" (citation omitted)), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 138 S. Ct. 1285, 200 L.Ed.2d 471 (2018); McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696, 703 (6th Cir. 2012) ("the precedents that do exist point in one direction: there was no special immunity for a doctor working for the state."); Jensen v. Lane Cty., 222 F.3d 570, 577 (9th Cir. 2000) ("We have been unable to uncover even a suggestion that Oregon has a 'firmly rooted tradition' of immunity"); Hinson v. Edmond, 192 F.3d 1342, 1345 (11th Cir. 1999) ("Under common law, no 'firmly rooted' tradition of immunity applicable to privately employed prison physicians exists under circumstances such as these."). . . . This court's holding in Lawyer does not control here. Like in Filarsky, the individual physician was tasked with performing a limited and discrete task for the state. . . See also Est. of Jensen by Jensen v. Clyde, 989 F.3d 848, 855–57 (10th Cir. 2021) (individual physician working part time with a county jail could assert qualified immunity); Perniciaro v. Lea, 901 F.3d 241, 254 (5th Cir. 2018) (psychiatrist-employees of Tulane University—an employer "not 'systematically organized' to perform the 'major administrative task' of providing mental-health care at state facilities"—could assert qualified immunity from claims arising from their work at a state mental health facility); Est. of Lockett ex rel. Lockett v. Fallin, 841 F.3d 1098, 1109 (10th Cir. 2016) (private physician engaged by a prison to administer an execution could assert qualified immunity). These medical defendants are employees of systematically organized private firms, tasked with assuming a major lengthy administrative task. They are factually dissimilar to the individuals entitled to assert qualified immunity in Filarsky and Lawyer, but like those not entitled to assert qualified immunity in Richardson. . . . The second factor—the weight of the policy reasons for affording protection from suit under section 1983—does not support permitting these medical defendants to assert qualified immunity. . . . Like Richardson, various marketplace pressures are present here, sufficiently reducing the risk of unwarranted timidity. ACH and Corizon are for profit entities that contracted with the County and the Department of Corrections respectively to provide medical care for inmates. They were both insured, and there is no indication their insurance would not cover the types of claims made by the parents. While these medical defendants, ACH, and Corizon were supervised by County and state officials, there is no indication the oversight 'in any meaningful way distinguishes this case from Richardson.'. . ACH and Corizon had their own procedures and policies for their medical personnel to follow. . . . Corizon also had its own extensive internal policies for patient treatment protocol, outlining procedures for various medical situations. Like the County and ACH, there is no indication that the Department of Corrections had significant oversight over Corizon's medical operations. Last, ACH and Corizon are presumably pressured by potential competitors that provide similar services. ACH's contract with the County covered a three-year period, allowing competition at the expiration of its contract. . . Together, these marketplace pressures support the conclusion that unwarranted timidity is less likely present, or at least not special, here. . . . The second policy consideration—attracting talented candidates to public service—does not favor allowing these medical defendants to assert qualified immunity. . . . Generally, private firms insure themselves to cover claims against themselves and their employees, are not subject to various 'civil service law restraints,' and, unlike the government, may 'offset any increased employee liability risk with higher pay or extra benefits.'. . This second policy consideration similarly does not favor allowing these medical defendants to assert qualified immunity. . . . ACH and Corizon have various tools available to attract and retain talented employees, even if their employees can seek alternative, non-government employment. . . The third policy consideration—preventing harmful distractions caused by lawsuits—slightly favors allowing these medical defendants to assert qualified immunity. . . . Even if these medical defendants may be distracted by litigation, the 'risk of distraction alone cannot be sufficient grounds for an immunity.'. . Because the other policy considerations—including preventing unwarranted timidity, the most important consideration—do not favor immunity, this factor does not necessitate the conclusion that qualified immunity is favored here. On balance, the policy considerations support the conclusion that these medical defendants are not entitled to assert the defense of qualified immunity. . . Because this court has found no firmly rooted history of immunity, and the purposes of qualified immunity, on balance, do not favor extending immunity, these medical defendants, as employees of large firms 'systematically organized to perform a major administrative task for profit,' are not entitled to assert the defense of qualified immunity. . . Lacking the ability to assert qualified immunity, these medical defendants are unable to immediately appeal the district courts' denials of motions to dismiss and motions for summary judgment."); Sanchez v. Oliver, 995 F.3d 461, 466-67 (5th Cir. 2021) ("Here, there is no question that Oliver, as a medical professional treating a pretrial detainee on behalf of a governmental entity, was acting under color of state law for purposes of § 1983. . . As a private actor, Oliver may be liable for acting under color of state law under § 1983, but 'it does not necessarily follow that [she] may assert qualified immunity.'. . . In holding that Oliver was entitled to assert the defense of qualified immunity, the district court relied heavily on this court's ruling in Perniciaro that two private mental health providers employed by the state through Tulane University were entitled to qualified immunity. However, the Perniciaro court took pains to emphasize that Tulane University 'is not "systematically organized" to perform the "major administrative task" of providing mental-health care at state facilities.'. . By contrast, Oliver's employer, CHC, is—according to its marketing materials—a major corporation 'in the business of administering correctional health care services.' . . Our sister circuits unanimously agree that employees of such entities—including, specifically, CHC in two cases—are not entitled to assert qualified immunity. [collecting cases] After considering the historical tradition of immunity at common law around the time § 1983 was enacted and the policy considerations underlying qualified immunity, we agree with our sister circuits that Oliver—as an employee of a large firm systematically organized to perform the major administrative task of providing mental healthcare at state facilities—is categorically ineligible for qualified immunity."); Tanner v. McMurray, 989 F.3d 860, 864-74 (10th Cir. 2021) ("This appeal presents the question of whether employees of a national private corporation providing medical services in a correctional institution can assert qualified immunity. In the past, we have declined to address the issue in cases where the plaintiff overcame qualified immunity even if available. . . However, we recently allowed a sole practitioner doctor who was engaged part time by a county jail to assert the defense. See Estate of Madison Jody Jensen v. Tubbs, No. 20-4025, —— F.3d ——, 2021 WL 787451 (10th Cir. Mar. 2, 2021). Other circuits that have considered the question presented in this appeal have concluded with near uniformity that corporate medical contractors are not entitled to assert qualified immunity. See Estate of Clark, 865 F.3d 544, 551 (7th Cir. 2017); McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696, 704 (6th Cir. 2012*); Jensen v. Lane Cty.*, 222 F.3d 570, 580 (9th Cir. 2000); Hinson v. Edmond, 192 F.3d 1342, 1347 (11th Cir. 1999). But see Perniciaro v. Lea, 901 F.3d 241, 251 (5th Cir. 2018). . . . We conclude that neither late 19th century common law nor present-day policy considerations counsel in favor of extending qualified immunity in the manner Appellees seek. We therefore hold that the employees of private corporations providing medical care in correctional facilities under circumstances similar to those presented in this case are not entitled to assert qualified immunity. . . Our analysis is framed by Supreme Court cases that discuss when a private party is eligible to assert qualified immunity. Principal cases are Wyatt v. Cole, . . . Richardson v. McKnight, . . . and Filarsky v. Delia[.] . . . We extract from the above cases that availability of qualified immunity to private parties performing governmental functions depends on (1) 'the common law as it existed when Congress passed § 1983 in 1871,' and (2) the policy reasons the Supreme Court has 'given for recognizing immunity under § 1983.'. . We interpret this as a disjunctive test: Private individuals are entitled to assert qualified immunity if their claim is 'supported by historical practice or based on public policy considerations.'. . . All available authorities thus point to the historical availability of tort remedies against physicians regardless of whether they were employed by a government entity. Availability of tort remedies against private correctional employees led the Supreme Court to deny qualified immunity in Richardson. . . Appellees do not cite to any case law to gainsay the conclusion reached by our sibling circuits that similar remedies were historically available to those who suffered mistreatment at the hands of government-employed private medical practitioners. Given our own inability to find any cases to the contrary, we conclude that the common law at the time § 1983 was passed supports holding that qualified immunity is unavailable to Appellees. . . . We thus turn to the policy justifications of 'avoid[ing] unwarranted timidity in performance of public duties, ensuring that talented candidates are not deterred from public service, and preventing the harmful distractions' of litigation. . . . In sum, neither 19th century common law nor modern policy considerations support allowing private medical professionals who are employees of a contractor that provides healthcare in jails or prisons to avail themselves of qualified immunity. . . . Endorsing the district court's conclusion that Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity under Filarsky simply because they worked for the government through a contractor would establish a de facto functional test for qualified immunity. Any individual who is working full-time for the government through a contractor would be entitled to the same protections as if they were directly working for the government. This simple functional test could have appeal, but it was unequivocally rejected by Richardson. . . Richardson observes that while the Court occasionally applies a functional test to determine whether a public official is entitled to absolute or qualified immunity, it has never held 'that the mere performance of a governmental function could make the difference between unlimited § 1983 liability and qualified immunity, especially for a private person who performs a job without government supervision or direction.'. . . Filarsky took care to acknowledge that Richardson remained good law for situations involving 'a private firm, systematically organized to assume a major lengthy administrative task ... with limited direct supervision by the government, undertaking that task for profit and potentially in competition with other firms.'. . Filarsky was eligible to assert qualified immunity because 'nothing of the sort [was] involved' in his case. . . By comparison, Richardson provides a close factual analogue to this appeal. The factors in Richardson that counseled against allowing the defense of qualified immunity for guards working at a private prison are all present in this case. As were the prison guards in Richardson, Appellees are full time employees of a large private corporation that is 'systematically organized' to provide contract healthcare services in government facilities. Richardson's explanation of how the pressures of a competitive market ameliorate the qualified immunity-justifying concern of unwarranted timidity by providing 'strong incentives to avoid overly timid, insufficiently vigorous, unduly fearful or "nonarduous" employee job performance'. . . applies unerringly to the facts of this appeal. First, the firm in Richardson was 'a large, multistate ... firm ..., systematically organized to perform a major administrative task for profit.' . . Similarly, CCS is a nationwide company that is systematically organized to profit from providing medical care in detention facilities. Its sole business is to contract with government entities to provide medical care in correctional facilities. Its business is extensive: In 2016, CCS operated in roughly 200 local and county jails in 38 states. Second, as did the prison guards in Richardson, Appellees perform their tasks 'independently,' with only minimal 'ongoing direct state supervision.'. . .Neither historical justifications of special government immunity nor modern policy considerations support the extension of a qualified immunity defense to Appellees—private medical professionals employed full-time by a multi-state, for-profit corporation systematically organized to provide medical care in correctional facilities. Both Appellees' arguments on appeal and the district court's decision stretch the holding of Filarsky well beyond its breaking point. Their faulty reasoning would functionally overturn Richardson."); Estate of Jensen by Jensen v. Clyde, 989 F.3d 848, 855-57 & n.2 (10th Cir. 2021), cert. denied sub nom Estate of Madison Jody Jensen v. Tubbs, 142 S. Ct. 339 (2021) ("Dr. Tubbs was carrying out government responsibilities — namely, providing medical services to inmates — but was merely doing so on a part-time basis. He was working alongside the jail's officers and LPN, Ms. Clyde, whose full-time job was to monitor and provide some care for the inmates. In fact, had Dr. Tubbs been working as a doctor for the county on a full-time basis (e.g., like Ms. Clyde does as an LPN), he would have certainly been able to raise a qualified-immunity defense. . . Thus, common law principles support Dr. Tubbs' ability to raise a qualified-immunity defense. Turning next to the policy considerations, three objectives guide our analysis: (1) protecting against 'unwarranted timidity on the part of public officials;' (2) ensuring 'that talented candidates are not deterred by the threat of damages suits from entering public service;' and (3) guarding against employees being distracted from their duties. . . Given the unique facts of this case, these concerns support our conclusion that Dr. Tubbs may raise the defense. . . .Dr. Tubbs essentially ran a two-man shop (including his subcontract with PA Clark) when providing a discrete function to the prison. While Dr. Tubbs had some leeway in his decisions, it was the county that was in charge of implementing policies and training its officers. Dr. Tubbs was required to provide care in accordance with Utah Department of Corrections and Utah Medicaid guidelines, the county had to authorize any elective care, and Dr. Tubbs could only prescribe medication from the prison's formulary. . . Even though Dr. Tubbs had agreed to supervise and train Ms. Clyde, he still had no ability to discipline or fire her. . . In this capacity, Dr. Tubbs does not resemble a private doctor working in a private firm. . . As observed by the Fifth Circuit, private doctors providing services at a jail 'act within a government system, not a private one,' and 'market pressures at play within a purely private firm simply do not reach them there.' Perniciaro v. Lea, 901 F.3d 241, 253 (5th Cir. 2018). . . . The Estate relies heavily on McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir. 2012), to argue that qualified immunity does not apply to Dr. Tubbs.[2] [fn. 2: The Estate also points to other circuits concluding that qualified immunity is not available to a private medical professional providing services to a jail. See Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 551 (7th Cir. 2017) (denying qualified immunity to private nurse); McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696, 704 (6th Cir.

2012) (denying qualified immunity to private psychiatrist); Jensen v. Lane Cnty., 222 F.3d 570, 577 (9th Cir. 2000) (same); Hinson v. Edmond, 192 F.3d 1342, 1347 (11th Cir. 1999), amended, 205 F.3d 1264 (11th Cir. 2000) (denying qualified immunity to private physician). But see Perniciaro v. Lea, 901 F.3d 241, 255 (5th Cir. 2018) (allowing private psychiatrists to assert the qualified-immunity defense). As the Fifth Circuit points out, many of these cases were decided pre-Filarsky and may not align precisely with Filarsky's mode of analysis. See Perniciaro, 901 F.3d at 252 n.9.] . . . . Although Tepe provides persuasive support for the Estate's argument, we believe the circumstances of this case — i.e., an individual doctor with limited control over policy working alongside government employees — compel a different result. We also question whether Tepe's historical analysis fully comports with the Supreme Court's analysis in Filarsky. . . The Filarsky Court was clear that the common law provided individuals with 'immunity for actions taken while engaged in public service on a temporary or occasional basis.'. . That determination controls the outcome of this case. Therefore, given the common law principles and underlying policy concerns, we conclude that Dr. Tubbs may claim qualified immunity. However, we highlight the unique circumstances of this case that led to allowing Dr. Tubbs to raise the defense."); Crowson v. Washington County State of Utah, 983 F.3d 1166, 1181 n.9 (10th Cir. 2020) ("Mr. Crowson asserts that Dr. LaRowe is a private contractor who is not entitled to assert a defense of qualified immunity under Richardson v. McKnight[.] . . Although Mr. Crowson concedes he did not raise this argument before the district court, he requests we consider it as an argument for affirmance on alternate grounds. Not only did Mr. Crowson fail to raise this argument before the district court, his briefing on appeal treats it only perfunctorily. . . . Mr. Crowson's one-sentence argument not only overlooks the limited nature of the Supreme Court's holding in Richardson, but also does not address the rule outlined in Richardson and reiterated in Filarsky v. Delia, . . . for determining when a private party may assert a qualified immunity defense. Mr. Crowson also does not acknowledge that other circuits are split on whether private health care providers hired by the state may assert a qualified immunity defense. If we were to consider this argument, the result would be deepening a circuit split without the benefit of adequate adversarial briefing on the issue. We therefore decline to reach this argument."); Brennan v. Thomas, 780 F. App'x 813, ___ n.5 (11th Cir. 2019) ("The magistrate judge also found that several of the individual defendants, including three medical providers employed by Corizon, were entitled to qualified immunity. Because we hold that summary judgment was appropriate on other grounds, we need not consider whether the privately employed medical providers were entitled to qualified immunity."); Perniciaro v. Lea, 901 F.3d 241, 251-53 & nn. 9, 11 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Circuits are divided on whether privately employed doctors who provide services at prisons or public hospitals pursuant to state contracts are entitled to assert qualified immunity. Compare McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir. 2012) (no immunity for privately paid physician working at county prison), Jensen v. Lane Cty., 222 F.3d 570 (9th Cir. 2000) (no immunity for privately employed psychiatrist providing services at public psychiatric hospital), and Hinson v. Edmond, 192 F.3d 1342 (11th Cir. 1999) (no immunity for privately employed physician providing services at county jail), with Estate of Lockett ex rel. Lockett v. Fallin, 841 F.3d 1098 (10th Cir. 2016) (immunity for privately employed physician providing services at state penitentiary). . . After considering the facts of this case in light of the history and purposes of immunity, we find the cases disallowing immunity distinguishable and hold that Drs. Thompson and Nicholl may assert the defense of qualified immunity. . . . Here, as in Filarsky, . . . Drs. Thompson and Nicholl are private individuals who work in a public institution and alongside government employees, but who do so as something other than full-time public employees. And here, as in Filarsky, . . . it is clear that their public counterparts would be entitled to assert qualified immunity[.] . . Accordingly, as in Filarsky, general principles of immunity at common law support the right of Drs. Thompson and Nicholl to raise the defense of qualified immunity. . . .We note that while the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits reached contrary conclusions in Jensen and Hinson, respectively, they did so before the Supreme Court decided Filarsky. Accordingly, they followed Richardson's lead and framed the relevant question as whether there was a firmly-rooted tradition of immunity for private doctors performing some government-related function. . . Finding no tradition of immunity even for doctors working directly for the state, the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits concluded that history did not support immunity for the privately employed doctors there at issue. . . But Richardson considered only the issue of qualified immunity for prison guards employed by and working at a private prison; it explicitly did not consider the more nuanced question of whether a person 'briefly associated with a government body, serving as an adjunct to government in an essential governmental activity, or acting under close official supervision' would be entitled to assert immunity. . . That reserved question was then expressly taken up in Filarsky, resulting in a different focus to the necessary historical excavation. As described above, the Court in Filarsky suggests that where the defendant at issue worked in a governmental entity and alongside government employees, the relevant historical question asks whether someone bearing that relationship to the state would have had immunity at common law, not whether immunity was accorded to purely private persons performing some governmental function. . . The Court's deep dive into the common law yielded an answer in the negative. . . The Sixth Circuit decided McCullum just months after the Supreme Court decided Filarsky. With respect for our sister circuit's deep historical analysis of whether doctors had any special immunity at common law, . . . we read Filarsky to require a different focus. . . . [T]he market forces assumed in Richardson's reasoning are much weaker here. First, the state, not Tulane, oversees the operation of ELMHS and the services that Drs. Thompson and Nicholl provide there. ELMHS is a state-run facility, operated pursuant to state policies and overseen by a state employee. Dr. Thompson reports directly to Lea, not to anyone at Tulane. Similarly, issues pertaining to patient safety and the quality of care provided by the Tulane psychiatrists are reviewed by state employees, including Lea. . . Whereas the Supreme Court in Richardson concluded that the private prison guards there at issue "resemble those of other private firms and differ from government employees," 521 U.S. at 410, 117 S.Ct. 2100, here we conclude just the opposite. When Drs. Thompson and Nicholl go to work at ELMHS, they act within a government system, not a private one. The market pressures at play within a purely private firm simply do not reach them there. . . Furthermore, their direct employer, Tulane University, is not 'systematically organized' to perform the 'major administrative task' of providing mental-health care at state facilities. . . Unlike the private entities at issue in cases denying qualified immunity, . . . the university's primary function is not providing health-care services, whether by contract or directly. The professors it employs have many duties, including research and teaching, and their pay, as well as other means of incentivization, are likely determined by factors besides the quality of care they provide to any patients they may see at ELMHS. Any marketplace pressures influencing the performance of the university's employees, therefore, are likely not fine-tuned to preventing overly timid care at ELMHS. Finally, it does not appear that the pressures created by the threat of replacement are at play here. Unlike in Hinson, where the firm responsible for providing health services in a county jail had recently been replaced in light of performance concerns, . . . Tulane has held the contract to provide psychiatric services for the state since 1992. There is no indication in this record of any other private entities vying for the contract. Under these circumstances, it is unlikely that, absent immunity, market forces would swiftly intervene to discipline overly timid performance. . . . This level of state involvement and supervision sets this case apart from the Ninth and Eleventh Circuit cases denying qualified immunity to privately employed doctors. . . .In sum, considering the history and purposes of immunity in conjunction with the facts of this case, we hold that Drs. Thompson and Nicholl may raise the defense of qualified immunity."); Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 550-51 (7th Cir. 2017) ("The Court in Filarsky reached its conclusion on the part-time lawyer through an historical inquiry, asking whether the person asserting qualified immunity would have been immune from liability under the common law in 1871 when Congress passed the law later codified as § 1983. . . In a detailed opinion, the Sixth Circuit applied Filarsky's historical method and held that a privately employed doctor working for a state prison could not invoke qualified immunity. McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696, 697 (6th Cir. 2012). After examining numerous nineteenth-century sources, the Sixth Circuit concluded that 'the absence of any indicia that a paid physician (whether remunerated from the public or private fisc) would have been immune from suit at common law, convince[s] us that there was no common-law tradition of immunity for a private doctor working for a public institution at the time that Congress passed § 1983.'. . We found the Sixth Circuit's reasoning persuasive in Currie, 728 F.3d at 632, and have held in other post-Filarsky cases that private medical personnel in prisons are not afforded qualified immunity. See, e.g., Rasho, 856 F.3d at 479; Petties, 836 F.3d at 734. Because Kuehn was a privately employed nurse working at the Green Lake County Jail, she is ineligible for qualified immunity."); Meadows v. Rockford Housing Authority, 861 F.3d 672, 677-78 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Of particular importance to the Court in Richardson was that the defendants worked 'independently' of 'ongoing direct state supervision,' 521 U.S. at 409; indeed, it repeated this requirement at several points in its opinion, see id. at 413 (noting that the case before it arose in the context of a private firm 'with limited direct supervision by the government,' and that it did not involve 'a private individual ... acting under close official supervision'). Moreover, in Filarsky, the Court explained that providing qualified immunity to defendants performing specific tasks at the instruction of government officials implicated '[t]he public interest in ensuring performance of government duties free from the distractions that can accompany even routine lawsuits.'. . Such distractions not only affected a defendant's ability to perform his or her duties, but also 'affect[ed] any public employees with whom they work by embroiling those employees in litigation' as well. . . Here it is undisputed that Hodges and Novay were working under the direct supervision of RHA officials when they carried out the actions that Meadows challenges. Doyle, RHA's Security Support Manager, instructed Hodges that the locks on the door should be changed, and Novay was present in the apartment for that purpose. . . Meadows does not dispute that qualified immunity would protect Doyle if he had changed the lock himself. Here, given the 'purposes that underlie government employee immunity,' see Richardson, 521 U.S. at 404, Novay and Hodges should be afforded the same protections. As in Richardson, our holding is a narrow one. It should, by no means, be read to guarantee qualified immunity to all employees of private security companies that provide contractual security services to governmental entities. The circumstances presented here, however, establish that the defendants were operating at the direct instruction of a supervising government official. Under these circumstances, qualified immunity is available to the defendants."); Brewer v. Hayne, 860 F.3d 819, 823-24 (5th Cir. 2017) ("Plaintiffs point to McCullum v. Tepe, a Sixth Circuit case holding that a part-time prison psychiatrist was not entitled to assert qualified immunity because there was 'no common-law tradition of immunity for a private doctor working for a public institution.'. . But Defendants here, though calling on their medical training, were performing a role that more closely parallels criminal investigation—'a core government activity' traditionally protected at common law by immunity. . . .We are persuaded that Defendants, as consulting forensic experts, were engaged in the criminal investigative functions of the state protected at common law and are here entitled to assert qualified immunity."); Rasho v. Elyea, 856 F.3d 469, 479 (7th Cir. 2017) ("This Court has construed the Supreme Court's holding that employees of privately-operated prisons may not assert a qualified-immunity defense also to deny that defense to employees of private corporations that contract with the state to provide medical care for prisoners. Zaya, 836 F.3d at 807 (citing Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399, 412, 117 S. Ct. 2100, 138 L. Ed. 2d 540 (1997)). Thus, Dr. Massa, as an employees of the private contractor Wexford, cannot assert qualified immunity as a defense to Rasho's claims. See Petties, 836 F.3d at 734 ("[Q]ualified immunity does not apply to private medical personnel in prisons.") (citing Shields v. Ill. Dep't of Corr., 746 F.3d 782, 794 (7th Cir. 2014)); see also Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 632 (7th Cir. 2013) (citing with approval the Sixth Circuit's holding in McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir. 2012), that "a [private] doctor providing psychiatric services to inmates at a state prison is not entitled to assert qualified immunity")."); Estate of Lockett v. Fallin, 841 F.3d 1098, 1108-09 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Dr. Doe is entitled to assert qualified immunity because the purposes of qualified immunity support its application here: carrying out criminal penalties is unquestionably a traditional function of government, exactly the sort of activities that Richardson reasoned qualified immunity was meant to protect. If participants in an execution could be held liable for problems during the execution, that would necessarily implicate Filarsky's concerns about '[t]he public interest in ensuring performance of government duties free from the distractions that can accompany even routine lawsuits,' which the Court noted 'is also implicated when individuals other than permanent government employees discharge these duties.'. . The attorney in Filarsky received qualified immunity largely because a permanent government attorney doing the same acts would receive it. The Filarsky Court determined that denying a temporarily retained attorney the same defense as a full-time government attorney would undermine the purposes of the doctrine. The same is true here—for instance, had a state employee performed the same duties as Dr. Doe did here, qualified immunity would apply. We see no sense in depriving a private doctor the same protection. Here, Dr. Doe stands in the same position as the attorney in Filarsky—he was a private party hired to do a job for which a permanent government employee would have received qualified immunity. Thus, we conclude that qualified immunity applies to Dr. Doe."); Saenz v. Flores, No. 15-50119, 2016 WL 4750908, at *2 (5th Cir. Sept. 12, 2016) (not reported) ("Romero alleged that he was acting in the scope of his employment with a private security company under its contract with the City of El Paso when he assisted in transporting Saenz to jail. He also noted that Roswitha's own pleadings stated that Romero's responsibilities in transporting prisoners had traditionally been the exclusive province of the state, and that he was therefore in a 'position of interdependence' with the City of El Paso. In addition, Romero's pleadings explicitly stated that he was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Roswitha's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claims on multiple occasions. Taken together, these assertions are sufficient to invoke the defense of qualified immunity, and the district court erred in holding that Romero failed to do so. We stress, however, that we do not rule here on whether Romero, as an employee of a private contractor, is entitled to qualified immunity as a threshold matter. The district court should determine on remand whether Romero is entitled to qualified immunity in the first instance."); Zaya v. Sood, 836 F.3d 800, 807-08 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Dr. Sood contends that even if a jury could find that he consciously disregarded the risks of delaying Zaya's return to Dr. Bussey, he is nonetheless entitled to summary judgment on qualified-immunity grounds. The Supreme Court has held that employees of privately operated prisons may not assert a qualified-immunity defense. See Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399, 412 (1997). We have construed that holding to extend to employees of private corporations that contract with the state to provide medical care for prison inmates. See Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 631–32 (7th Cir. 2013); see also Shields v. Ill. Dep't of Corrs., 746 F.3d 782, 794 n.3 (7th Cir. 2014). As an employee of Wexford, a private corporation that contracts with the Illinois Department of Corrections, Dr. Sood asks us to reconsider our earlier decisions. We need not do so because even if a qualified-immunity defense were available to Dr. Sood, he would not be entitled to summary judgment on that basis. 'The doctrine of qualified immunity protects government officials "from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known."'. . Zaya's deliberate-indifference claim turns on Dr. Sood's mental state, and it is well established what the law requires in that regard. See Farmer, 511 U.S. at 837. If Dr. Sood consciously disregarded the risks of delaying Zaya's return to Dr. Bussey, then his conduct violates clearly established law under the Eighth Amendment. See Petties, slip op. at 18. As we've explained, that's a question of fact that needs to be resolved by a jury."); Petties v. Carter, 836 F.3d 722, 733-34 (7th Cir. 2016) (en banc) ("While the district court did not reach the issue, in the proceedings below, the defendants pursued the additional argument that they were entitled to qualified immunity. But even if the defendants preserved this argument, qualified immunity does not apply to private medical personnel in prisons. Shields v. Illinois Dep't of Corrections, 746 F.3d 782, 794 (7th Cir. 2014). Even if the Wexford employees were entitled in theory to qualified immunity, it could not be granted at this point. If a jury finds that Dr. Carter and Dr. Obaisi knew that the course of treatment they were pursuing was inadequate to meet Petties's serious medical needs, such conduct violates clearly established law under the Eighth Amendment. See Farmer, 511 U.S. at 837. Given that the threshold factual questions of the defendants' states of mind remain disputed, summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity is inappropriate."); United States v. Ackerman, 831 F.3d 1292, 1296 & n.1, 1300, 1303 (10th Cir.

2016) ("[W]hen an actor is endowed with law enforcement powers beyond those enjoyed by private citizens, courts have traditionally found the exercise of the public police power engaged. . . . Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399 (1997), might appear an exception to this rule, for there the Supreme Court held that certain private prison guards weren't state actors for purposes of qualified immunity. . . But Richardson was criticized at the time for elevating form over function, . . . (Scalia, J., dissenting), and since then the Court has both returned to Dartmouth College's tried and true approach and expressly limited Richardson to its facts, see Filarsky, 132 S. Ct. at 1662-65, 1667. . . .NCMEC's [National Center for Missing and Exploited Children] law enforcement powers extend well beyond those enjoyed by private citizens—and in this way it seems to mark it as a fair candidate for a governmental entity. . . . Even if we are wrong and NCMEC isn't a governmental entity, that doesn't necessarily mean its searches escape the Fourth Amendment's ambit. . . . As we've already acknowledged, a governmental licensing and regulation regime does not always suffice to render the licensed or regulated party a governmental entity or agent. After all private lawyers, doctors, and accountants are all licensed and regulated by the state, yet they don't (usually) qualify as governmental entities or agents. But as we've already observed, too, in this case we don't face a general licensing or regulatory regime open to all qualified applicants but a statutory grant of special law enforcement authority to a single entity and no other, authorizing and encouraging it to perform functions no other private person or entity may lawfully undertake. And as we've seen, helping law enforcement is at least part of NCMEC's intentions when it reviews emails pursuant to its statutory tipline authority."); Kellum v. Mares, 657 F. App'x 763, 768 n. 3 (10th Cir. 2016) ("As the district court noted, this court has yet to decide whether or not qualified immunity is available to employees of a private company providing medical services to inmates. See Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399, 409-12 (1997) (holding that prison guards employed by a large, for-profit multistate private prison management company that had contracted with the state to manage the prison are not entitled to qualified immunity in a prisoner's § 1983 action); McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696, 704 (6th Cir. 2012) (holding that a private doctor providing psychiatric services to inmates at a state prison is ineligible for qualified immunity); but see Filarsky v. Delia, ___ U.S. ___, 132 S. Ct. 1657, 1665, 1667-68 (2012) (extending qualified immunity under § 1983 to private investigator who was temporarily retained by a city to assist in an internal investigation, holding that "immunity under § 1983 should not vary depending on whether an individual working for the government does so as a full-time employee, or on some other basis"). We decline to decide this issue because we agree with the district court's alternative conclusion that, assuming for the sake of argument Nurse Breen could assert a qualified immunity defense, Ms. Kellum's complaint states a plausible claim that Nurse Breen is not entitled to such immunity because she violated Ms. Kellum's clearly established Eighth Amendment rights."); Franco v. Bd. of Cnty. Comm'rs for the Cnty. of Roosevelt, 609 F. App'x 957, 959-60 (10th Cir. 2015) ("We agree with the district court that Ms. Peel's position as an independently contracted probation officer is a good deal more like the one in Filarsky than Richardson, especially given the Court's express admonition that the 'typical case of an individual hired by the government to assist in carrying out its work' will fall outside Richardson's exception."); Gomez v. Campbell-Ewald Co., 768 F.3d 871, 881, 882 (9th Cir. 2014) ("Campbell–Ewald contends that a new immunity for service contractors was espoused by the Supreme Court in Filarsky v. Delia, ——

U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 1657 (2012). Yet the Court did not establish any new theory, and although the Filarsky discussion does include a broad reading of the qualified immunity doctrine, id. at 1667–68, that doctrine is not implicated by this case. . . . Filarsky has little to offer Campbell–Ewald. The decision is applicable only in the context of § 1983 qualified immunity from personal tort liability. . . Moreover, the Court afforded immunity only after tracing two hundred years of precedent. Here, not only do we lack decades or centuries of common law recognition of the proffered defense, we are aware of no authority exempting a marketing consultant from analogous federal tort liability. . . . The record contains sufficient evidence that the text messages were contrary to the Navy's policy permitting texts only to persons who had opted in to receive them. Consequently, we decline the invitation to craft a new immunity doctrine or extend an existing one."); United Pet Supply, Inc. v. City of Chattanooga, Tenn., 768 F.3d 464, 471, 479, 480 & n.2, 483 (6th Cir. 2014) ("We conclude that Hurn, acting as a private animal-welfare officer, may not assert qualified immunity as a defense against suit in her personal capacity because there is no history of immunity for animal-welfare officers and allowing her to assert qualified immunity is not consistent with the purpose of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. However, Walsh and Nicholson, acting both as private animal-welfare officers and as specially-commissioned police officers of the City of Chattanooga, may assert qualified immunity as a defense against suit in their personal capacities. . . . Hurn was not commissioned as a special police officer; she was working only in the capacity of her position as a McKamey employee, that is, an employee of a private contractor. Determining whether an employee of a private contractor that is acting under color of state law may herself assert qualified immunity demands a fact-intensive analysis under which some employees may be permitted to assert qualified immunity and some may not. . . . [T]he absence of a history of qualified immunity for similarly situated defendants, under Brentwood, does not necessarily preclude Hurn from asserting qualified immunity. . . . We recently noted, however, that it was unclear ' "whether policy and history form a conjunctive or disjunctive test,"' and we questioned whether a court may 'extend qualified immunity where there was no history of immunity at common law, even if sound policy justified the extension.'. . . In sum: there is no history of immunity for similarly situated defendants, but similar organizations did not exist in 1871 and there is no history of denying immunity; McKamey faces market pressures; refusing to allow qualified immunity could discourage qualified animal-welfare advocates from working on behalf of the City of Chattanooga; and having to go through a lawsuit could distract the defendants-appellants and possibly a single state employee from their job duties. This is a very close case but because there is no history of immunity and the most important immunity-producing concern—preventing unwarranted timidity—counsels against permitting the assertion of qualified immunity, we conclude that Hurn may not assert qualified immunity as a defense to suit in her personal capacity."); In re KBR, Inc., Burn Pit Litigation, 744 F.3d 326, 343-45 (4th Cir. 2014) ("Contrary to the district court's conclusion, there is no indication that the Supreme Court intended Filarsky to overrule Yearsley and its progeny. . . . After tracing the history of common law immunity up to the point Congress enacted § 1983, the Court concluded 'immunity under § 1983 should not vary depending on whether an individual working for the government does so as a full-time employee, or on some other basis.'. . The opinion never mentions Yearsley, sovereign immunity, or the FTCA and never purports to extend beyond § 1983 qualified immunity. We therefore believe that the district court erred in concluding that Filarsky compelled altering the conclusion that it reached in Burn Pit I. We interpret Filarsky as reaffirming the principles undergirding the Yearsley rule, albeit in the context of § 1983 qualified immunity rather than derivative sovereign immunity. Like Filarsky, Yearsley recognizes that private employees can perform the same functions as government employees and concludes that they should receive immunity from suit when they perform these functions. Furthermore, Yearsley furthers the same policy goals that the Supreme Court emphasized in Filarsky. By rendering government contractors immune from suit when they act within the scope of their validly conferred authority, the Yearsley rule combats the 'unwarranted timidity' that can arise if employees fear that their actions will result in lawsuits. . . Similarly, affording immunity to government contractors 'ensur[es] that talented candidates are not deterred from public service' by minimizing the likelihood that their government work will expose their employer to litigation. . . Finally, by extending sovereign immunity to government contractors, the Yearsley rule 'prevent[s] the harmful distractions from carrying out the work of government that can often accompany damages suits.'. . We now turn to applying the Yearsley rule, which asks us to consider whether the government authorized KBR's actions in this case. . . . According to the Servicemembers, KBR exceeded its authority in this case because it violated the specific terms of LOGCAP III and other 'government directives.' By contrast, KBR takes a broader view, contending that it acted within the scope of its authority by performing general waste management and water treatment functions. . .Yearsley supports the Servicemembers' view. . . . KBR is entitled to derivative sovereign immunity only if it adhered to the terms of its contract with the government."); Lee v. Willey, 543 F. App'x 503, 2013 WL 5645773, *1, *3-5 (6th Cir. Oct. 17, 2013) ("When the party raising qualified immunity as a defense works for the state as a private contractor, as is the case here, we must first engage in an antecedent inquiry concerning whether the defendant may properly invoke the defense qualified immunity. In this case, the district court gave us no answer to this question. We conclude that it was improper for the district court to gloss over the threshold question of assertability, and we answer that question in the plaintiff's favor. For this reason, we AFFIRM the district court's decision, finding that the defendant was not entitled to the defense of qualified immunity as a basis for his motion to dismiss. . . . When a private employee working at a state prison is sued under § 1983, we must first determine whether that employee 'can invoke qualified immunity in a lawsuit arising out of his activities at the prison.'. . To do so, we ask two questions: (1) whether 'there was a firmly rooted history of immunity for similarly situated parties at common law'; and (2) 'whether granting immunity would be consistent with the history and purpose of § 1983.'. . In this instance, however, we need not strain ourselves to discern the answer, for it was already decided in McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir.2012) that a psychiatrist 'employed by an independent non-profit organization, but working part-time for the County as a prison psychiatrist' was not entitled to the defense of qualified immunity. . . We found no nineteenth-century common law contemporary to § 1983's passage that granted immunity for private doctors working at public institutions. . . We also concluded that the policy considerations undergirding § 1983 immunity militated against granting immunity, where, as here, the defendant's primary employer, a private firm, is capable of 'offset[ing] ... [the] increased ... liability risk' resulting from its employees' lack of § 1983 immunity. . .There is little doubt that McCullum applies here. As Mehra's counsel conceded at oral argument, there is no meaningful distinction between him and the psychiatrist in McCullum. Acknowledging this reality, Mehra instead opts to attack the wisdom of our prior decision, contending that McCullum was wrongly decided. He cites four reasons in support of his argument: (1) the decision disregarded the Supreme Court's recognition of common-law immunity for private doctors in Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399 (1997); (2) the McCullum court erroneously assumed that the silence of nineteenth-century caselaw on common-law immunity for private doctors meant that no such immunity existed; (3) the role of private physicians is not distinguishable from other protected functions identified by the Supreme Court in Filarsky v. Delia, 132 S.Ct. 1657 (2012); and (4) the policy analysis used by the McCullum court applied only to private prisons and employees thereof. From the outset, we note that a three-judge panel of this court is not the proper audience for such contentions. McCullum is a published decision of this circuit, and whatever the wisdom of Mehra's arguments may be, we must treat it as binding authority. . . But stare decisis is not the only reason we reject Mehra's arguments—they are, in a word, wrong. We address each of them in turn. First, the McCullum court did address Richardson, noting its 'cryptic comment' about the possibility of private doctors being entitled to qualified immunity. It observed that the Richardson Court's dicta had no support in the law. . . Neither the common law contemporary to § 1983s passage nor the common law of the twentieth century supported the idea that there was a firmly rooted common-law practice of extending immunity to private psychiatrists. . . . Second, Mehra seems to suggest that this court improperly constrained itself by analyzing only nineteenth-century caselaw in concluding that there was no common-law immunity for private doctors serving the government. But nothing in twentieth-century caselaw helps his case, either. . . Moreover, we limited ourselves to nineteenth-century cases because the Filarsky Court suggested that we do so. . . Third, we need not distinguish private physicians from 'other protected functions identified by the Supreme Court,' as the Court has itself eschewed such a functional comparison. In Filarsky, the Court acknowledged that 'examples of individuals receiving immunity for actions taken while engaged in public service on a temporary or occasional basis are as varied as the reach of government itself.'. . Instead of comparing occupations side-by-side, the Court limited its analysis to the question of whether caselaw establishing immunity for a particular occupation existed at the time § 1983 was enacted. . . Finally, Mehra's contention that 'the Supreme Court's analysis of the policy rationales in Richardson apply only to denying qualified immunity to a private prison and its personnel' is incorrect. Indeed, the Filarsky decision belies this observation; the case had nothing to do with prisons, yet the Court still looked to Richardson's policy rationales to conclude that an investigator hired by a municipality was eligible to invoke the defense of qualified immunity. . .With no good reason to disturb our holding in McCullum, we conclude that there is no meaningful distinction between the psychiatrist in that case and Mehra; thus, we conclude that, under McCullum, Mehra is not eligible to invoke the defense of qualified immunity."); Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 631, 632 (7th Cir. 2013) ("The Supreme Court recently considered the question whether 'an individual hired by the government to do its work is prohibited from seeking [absolute or qualified] immunity, solely because he works for the government on something other than a permanent or full-time basis.'. . It held that 'immunity under § 1983 should not vary depending on whether an individual working for the government does so as a full-time employee, or on some other basis.'. . On the other hand, the Filarsky Court reaffirmed the holding of Richardson categorically rejecting immunity for the private prison employees there; in so doing, the Court emphasized that the incentives of the private market suffice to protect employees when 'a private firm, systematically organized to assume a major lengthy administrative task ... for profit and potentially in competition with other firms,' assumes responsibility for managing an institution. . . In a detailed opinion tracking the Court's analysis in Filarsky, the Sixth Circuit recently held that a doctor providing psychiatric services to inmates at a state prison is not entitled to assert qualified immunity. McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir.2012) (discussing the historical roots of immunity for similarly situated parties and the history and purpose of § 1983); see also Hasher v. Hayman, 2013 WL 1288205 (D.N.J. Mar. 27, 2013) (private medical employees failed to establish that they are entitled to assert a qualified immunity defense, 'even after Filarsky'). We find the Sixth Circuit's reasoning persuasive, though we need not definitively decide the issue today; even if our defendants were entitled to seek qualified immunity as a general matter, we would conclude that the defense is not applicable here."); McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696, 697, 699-704 (6th Cir. 2012) ("There does not seem to be a history of immunity from suit at common law for a privately paid physician working for the public, and the policy rationales that support qualified immunity are not so strong as to justify our ignoring this history, or lack of history. . . . The issue in this appeal is whether Tepe, a physician employed by an independent non-profit organization, but working part-time for the County as a prison psychiatrist, can invoke qualified immunity in a lawsuit arising out of his activities at the prison. A physician who contracts to provide medical services to prison inmates, the Supreme Court has held, acts under color of state law for purposes of § 1983. West v. Atkins, 487 U.S. 42, 54 (1988). But a party is not entitled to assert qualified immunity simply because he is amenable to suit under § 1983. Harrison v. Ash, 539 F.3d 510, 521 (6th Cir. 2008). . . . We cited both Hinson and Jensen with approval in our published Harrison opinion, relying on both for the conclusion 'that there is no "firmly rooted" common law practice of extending immunity to private [nurses working at a county jail].'. . . After Filarsky, however, Hinson and Jenson's historical analyses—which rested on Twentieth Century law—are suspect, at best. . . . [W]hile Filarsky did not impose a rigid date limit, it does illustrate the scope of the relevant inquiry: whether a person in the same position as the party asserting qualified immunity would have been immune from liability under the common law of the late Nineteenth Century. . . . With this in mind, we consider whether a private doctor working for a state institution would have been immune from a suit for damages at common law. . . . [Court examines cases from late 19th Century] These cases, as well as the American and English cases involving private physicians in private practice, and the absence of any indicia that a paid physician (whether remunerated from the public or private fisc) would have been immune from suit at common law, convince us that there was no common-law tradition of immunity for a private doctor working for a public institution at the time that Congress passed § 1983. The first piece of the Richardson analysis, then, suggests that we should not allow Tepe to assert qualified immunity. . . . We acknowledge that it is somewhat odd for a government actor to lose the right to assert qualified immunity, not because his job changed, but because a private entity, rather than the government, issued his paycheck. But just as market pressures, a private firm's ability to 'offset any increased employee liability risk with higher pay or extra benefits,'. . . the 'continual . . . need for deterring constitutional violations[,] and . . . [the] sense that the [private] firm's tasks are not enormously different in respect to their importance from various other publicly important tasks carried out by private firms,'. . . vitiated any policy-based concerns in Richardson, these same factors suggest that immunity would be inappropriate here. . . . Despite the Supreme Court's somewhat cryptic comment in Richardson that a doctor may have had immunity from damages at common law, there does not appear to be any history of immunity for a private doctor working for the government, and the policies that animate our qualified-immunity cases do not justify our creating an immunity unknown to the common law."); Walter v. Horseshoe Entertainment, No. 11–30867, 2012 WL 2041536, at *1, *2 & n.3 (5th Cir. June 6, 2012) (not published) ("Because we hold that the appellants' claims are in any event barred by the rule established in Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), we do not reach the question of whether the Horseshoe security staff should be considered state actors for the purposes of § 1983. . . . The district court found that the Horseshoe security staff was entitled to qualified immunity, which 'protects government officials from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . The law is not established in this circuit, however, as to whether private entities such as these are entitled to the protections of qualified immunity. While individuals who are retained by the government to perform a particular task are entitled to qualified immunity when performing that task, it is less clear whether a security guard working in concert with the police is entitled to the protections. See Filarsky v. Delia, 132 S.Ct. 1657, 1661–68 (2012) (holding that an individual retained by the government may be entitled to qualified immunity regardless of whether he is a full-time employee); Bishop v. Karney, 408 F. App'x 846, 848 (5th Cir.2011) (holding that a private doctor under contract with a state prison to provide medical care is entitled to qualified immunity). Cf. Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399, 412 (1997) (holding that prison guards employed by a private prison are not entitled to qualified immunity).").

See also Pendleton v. Murphy, No. 120CV00489JPHTAB, 2022 WL 4095167, at *5–6 (S.D. Ind. Sept. 7, 2022) ("In some circumstances, private actors may assert the defense of qualified immunity, Meadows v. Rockford Hous. Auth., 861 F.3d 672, 676–78 (7th Cir. 2017); Filarsky v. Delia, 566 U.S. 377, 393–94 (2012), but there is no categorical rule regarding whether officers employed by a private entity are entitled to raise qualified immunity as a defense. Payton v. Rush-Presbyterian-St. Luke's Med. Ctr., 184 F.3d 623, 627–31 (7th Cir. 1999), reaffirmed and explained why private actors with essentially the same powers as a public police officer can be held liable under § 1983. But it did not determine whether those private police officers could raise qualified immunity as a defense. Instead, it remanded the case to the district court with instructions to answer that question by considering the factors identified by the Supreme Court in Richardson: whether a history of immunity for private actors exists and relevant public policy considerations. . . On remand, the district court first noted the lack of 'any relevant historical evidence regarding immunity conferred on special police.' Payton v. Rush-Presbyterian-St. Luke's Med. Ctr., 82 F. Supp. 2d 901, 906 (N.D. Ill. 2000). Next, the court found that '[o]rdinary marketplace pressures [were] present in [that] case as they were in Richardson' because 'the behavior of not-for-profit hospitals is similar to that of for-profits' and 'the hospital independently employ[ed] and supervise[d] the special police... "with relatively less ongoing direct government supervision.”’. . . Thus, the court concluded that the ‘defendants [were] not entitled to qualified immunity.’. . Here, the officers have not cited precedent that would require the Court to find that they are entitled to assert the defense of qualified immunity. . . Nor have they cited a historical basis of immunity for private police officers. . . Rather, the officers argue that various public policy considerations support the availability of qualified immunity, including: 1) the IU Health Police Department was authorized by statute to enforce the laws of the state of Indiana and was granted ‘the same common law and statutory powers, privileges, and immunities as sheriffs and constables’; 2) the officers were trained and certified by the Indiana Law Enforcement Academy; 3) IU Health is a non-profit healthcare system; and 4) the officers perform police work that is a ‘traditional government function.’. . These facts are relevant to why the officers are considered state actors whose conduct is within the scope of § 1983. But the ability to raise the defense of qualified immunity is not coextensive with the reach of § 1983; the latter is broader. . . Here, the relevant factors do not support finding that the IU Health officers may assert qualified immunity. The officers may perform the ‘traditional government function’ of police officers, but they do not work for or at the direction of a government body. . . Instead, they work ‘independently, with relatively less ongoing direct state supervision,’ for a large, private network of hospitals. . . And while IU Health is a not-for-profit hospital, it is still subject to competitive market pressure. . . Last, unlike local law enforcement agencies, IU Health has a commercial incentive to provide safe and hospitable health care to its customers. . .The officers have not shown that they are entitled to raise qualified immunity as a defense against Plaintiffs’ constitutional claims.”); Collins v. Baucom, No. CV PWG-18-1908, 2019 WL 3046112, at *4 (D. Md. July 10, 2019) (“The individual Medical Defendants move to dismiss the Complaint on the basis of qualified immunity. They argue that they are not government officials but instead provided medical services to Collins through a contract between their employer and DPSCS. They rely, by way of analogy, on Filarsky v. Delia, 566 U.S. 377 (2012), in which the Supreme Court held that private individuals may assert qualified immunity when they are ‘retained by the [government] to assist [in a task for which] government employees performing such work are entitled to seek the protection of qualified immunity.’. . They cite no authority that Filarsky has been extended to contractual mental health care providers working in correctional facilities. Moreover, even if the individual Medical Defendants were entitled to assert qualified immunity, the right at issue in this case is a clearly established right. Knowingly denying appropriate medical care for a prisoner’s serious health need violates clearly established constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known. . . Here the Complaint sufficiently raises a genuine issue of material fact, and the right at issue was clearly established at the time. Therefore, even if legally permitted to seek the protection of qualified immunity, the individual Medical Defendants do not demonstrate that the circumstances of this case entitle them to it.”); Knight v. Grossman, No. 16-CV-1644, 2019 WL 1298569, at *6 (E.D. Wis. Mar. 21, 2019) (“According to the Seventh Circuit, ‘the Filarsky Court reaffirmed the holding of Richardson categorically rejecting immunity for the private prison employees there.’ Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 631 (7th Cir. 2013), citing Filarsky, 566 U.S. at 392-94. The Seventh Circuit has held in other post-Filarsky cases that private medical personnel in prisons are not afforded qualified immunity. See, e.g., Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 551 (7th Cir. 2017); Rasho, 856 F.3d at 479; Petties, 836 F.3d at 734.

Thus, Dr. Grossman is not entitled to qualified immunity on Knight's due process claim."); Salim v. Mitchell, No. CV-15-0286-JLQ, 2017 WL 3389011, at *10-11 (E.D. Wash. Aug. 7, 2017) ("Citing Filarsky, Defendants argue they should not be 'left holding the bag-facing full liability for actions taken in conjunction with government employees who enjoy immunity for the same activity.'. . However, as Plaintiffs pointed out at prior arguments, Defendants can hardly be considered to be left 'holding the bag'. They operated under a profit incentive different than that of Government employees. The Defendants and the company they formed were paid $80 million dollars. There is an indemnity provision in the contracts between the Government and the CIA under which the CIA has paid the considerable defense litigation expenses for this action. Defendants argue Filarsky immunity is available if the contractor's claim for immunity is: 1) historically grounded in the common law; and 2) did not violate clearly established rights. . . Plaintiffs argue Defendants are not entitled to derivative immunity under Filarsky because psychologists were not traditionally entitled to immunity at common law and Defendants violated clearly established rights. Defendants' argument fails under both prongs. Defendants argue psychiatrists and psychologists are given immunity when they render an opinion on a criminal defendant's mental competency in a legal proceeding. Defendants' actions herein are not analogous to a psychologist assisting court proceedings by evaluating a criminal defendant and writing a report or testifying. Additionally, Plaintiffs rely on Jensen v. Lane County, 222 F.3d 570 (9th Cir. 2000) for the proposition that medical doctors performing psychological assessments during commitment proceedings are not entitled to immunity. In Jensen the court referenced a lack of a 'firmly rooted tradition' of such immunity. . . The court also addressed privatization and market force arguments in acknowledging distinctions between private contractors and government employees. The court observed 'the potential for insurance, indemnification agreements, and higher pay all may operate to encourage qualified candidates' to undertake such obligations even without immunity. . . Defendants have not established their claim for immunity is historically grounded in the common law. Secondly, Defendants argue it was not clearly established that subjecting an individual to torture or other cruel, inhuman, and degrading conditions violated clearly established rights, citing to Padilla v. Yoo, 678 F.3d 748 (9th Cir. 2012). However, the illegality of torture is long-established. See for example Filartiga v. Pena–Irala, 630 F.2d 876, 884 (2nd Cir. 1980)("We conclude that official torture is now prohibited by the law of nations. The prohibition is clear and unambiguous, and admits of no distinction between treatment of aliens and citizens."). The case Defendants rely upon states, 'the unconstitutionality of torturing a United States citizen was beyond debate by 2001.' Padilla v. Yoo, 678 F.3d 748, 763 (9th Cir. 2012). The inquiry in this case is whether the enhanced interrogation methods outlined in the Program constituted 'torture'."); Powers v. City of Ferguson, 229 F.Supp.3d 894, 901 (E.D. Mo. 2017) ("[P]laintiffs have not cited, and the Court has not found, any cases decided after Filarsky in which a prosecutor was denied absolute immunity based on his or her status as a private attorney. By contrast, several cases have extended immunity to private attorneys serving prosecutorial roles. [collecting cases]"); Bonaparte v. Wexford Health Sources. Inc., No. GJH-15-738, 2015 WL 7738066, at *2 (D. Md. Nov. 30, 2015) ("Defendants claim entitlement to qualified immunity, citing Filarsky v. Delia. . . . Filarsky overturned the denial of qualified immunity to an attorney who was retained by a city in California to assist in an internal investigation concerning a firefighter's potential wrongdoing. . . Defendants fail to demonstrate that Filarsky has been extended to contractual health care providers working in detention centers or correctional facilities. and the Court will not extend the holding in Filarsky based on the record before it in the instant case."); Zikianda v. Cnty. of Albany, No. 1:12-CV-1194, 2015 WL 5510956, at *16 n.6 (N.D.N.Y. Sept. 15, 2015) ("The parties have not adequately briefed the issue of whether qualified immunity applies to Dr. Depner, a private physician working under a contract that made him prison medical director, at least at some points in his service. A question therefore might exist as to whether qualified immunity is even a possibility in this context. Courts are clear that 'private actors are not automatically immune (i.e., § 1983 immunity does not automatically follow § 1983 liability) [.]'. . Courts have found that immunity may be available for a private actor subject to liability under Section 1983 when granting immunity comports with 'general principles of tort immunities and defenses applicable at common law, and the reasons [the Superme Court has] afforded protection from suit under § 1983.' Filarsky v. Delia, 132 S.Ct. 1657, 1662 (2012). In determining whether immunity is available to private persons fulfilling a governmental role, then, the Court is 'to look both to history and to the purposes that underlie government employee immunity in order to find the answer.'. . As the Sixth Circuit has described this test, the Court must 'determine whether: (1) there was a firmly rooted history of immunity for similarly situated parties at common law; and (2) whether granting immunity would be consistent with the history and purpose of § 1983.' McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696, 700 (6th Cir.2012). Applying that standard, the Sixth Circuit determined that a prison psychologist employed by a private company could not claim qualified immunity in a case where he failed to provide any treatment to a patient who committed suicide. . . . The Court finds that, to the extent that Dr. Depner operated as a private physician working for the prison, he could not claim qualified immunity. The authority cited by the Court in McCullum in holding that private physicians working for the government did not traditionally enjoy any immunity from suit is persuasive. . . . As with other private prison employees, Dr. Depner's position as a private provider mitigates concerns about potential liability in ways not present for other public employees . . . . The parties did not fully develop this argument, and Defendant appears to offer no reply on the qualified immunity issue. In any case, as explained above, even when considered, qualified immunity is unavailable."); Jones v. Joubert, No. CIV.A. CCB-14-2391, 2015 WL 5136355, at *3 (D. Md. Aug. 31, 2015) ("Defendants fail to demonstrate that Filarsky has been extended to contractual health care providers working in detention centers or correctional facilities, and the holding in Filarsky will not be extended in this case based on the limited record before the court."); Starks v. City of Waukegan, No. 09 C 348, 2015 WL 5012131, at *11 (N.D. Ill. July 24, 2015) ("[I]t is questionable whether private dentists are even entitled to assert qualified immunity under § 1983. See Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 632 (7th Cir.2013) (finding "persuasive" the Sixth Circuit's holding in McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir.2012), that a private doctor providing services to state prison inmates is ineligible for qualified immunity); Shields v. Ill. Dep't of Corr., 746 F.3d 782, 794 n. 3 (7th Cir.2014) (same); compare Filarsky v. Delia, 132 S.Ct. 1657, 1665, 1668 (2012) (holding that a private lawyer retained by the city is entitled to assert a qualified immunity defense because "immunity under § 1983 should not vary depending on whether an individual working for the government does so as a full-time employee, or on some other basis"), with Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399, 412 (1997) (holding that

"private prison guards, unlike those who work directly for the government, do not enjoy immunity from suit in a § 1983 case"). Dentist Defendants also argue that they are not "state actors" for purposes of § 1983. Doc. 351 at 10–13; but see Burke v. Town of Walpole, 405 F.3d 66, 88 (1st Cir.2005) (holding that a forensic odontologist was a state actor because he "rendered a bite mark opinion only because the Norfolk District Attorney's Office, at the recommendation of the state's own forensic odontologist, sought his assistance with the analysis of forensic evidence in a criminal investigation"). The court need not resolve these issues, as Dentist Defendants prevail on the merits of Starks's due process claim."); Johnson v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., No. CIV.A. JKB-14-2513, 2015 WL 3441958, at *3 (D. Md. May 26, 2015) ("Defendants also claim entitlement to qualified immunity, citing Filarsky v. Delia. . . . Filarsky overturned the denial of qualified immunity to an attorney who was retained by a city in California to assist in an internal investigation concerning a firefighter's potential wrongdoing. . . Defendants fail to demonstrate that Filarsky has been extended to contractual health care providers working in detention centers or correctional facilities, and the undersigned will not extend the holding in Filarsky based on the record now before the court. Thus, dismissal of plaintiff's original and amended complaint based on qualified immunity is denied."); Wilder v. Rockdale Cnty., No. 1:13-CV-2715-RWS, 2015 WL 1724596, at *8-9 (N.D. Ga. Apr. 15, 2015) ("At oral argument, CorrectHealth argued that subjecting it to suit under § 1983 without permitting it to assert qualified immunity would be an unfair result, and therefore using the Richardson analysis to determine whether an entity is subject to suit under § 1983 would create a clearer standard. However, existing precedent compels the Court to find that the state-actor and qualified-immunity inquiries are different. The factors discussed in Richardson do not control whether a defendant acts under color of law for § 1983 purposes. As a result, the Court relies on West v. Atkins and finds that CorrectHealth acted under color of law and is subject to § 1983. . . . Defendants next argue that even if they acted under color of state law, they are entitled to qualified immunity because they did not violate Mr. Wilder's clearly established constitutional rights. The doctrine of qualified immunity protects government officials performing discretionary functions from being sued in their individual capacities. . . . Defendants fail to show that qualified immunity is available to them. As explained above, the purposes of the immunity doctrine do not justify extending immunity to a private, for-profit firm providing medical care potentially in competition with other firms. Like in Richardson, Defendants here operate subject to 'marketplace pressures' that encourage them 'to avoid overly timid, insufficiently vigorous, unduly fearful, or "nonarduous" employee job performance.'. . In fact, Defendants emphasize (albeit in an attempt to show that they are not state actors under § 1983) that they are similar to the defendants in Richardson, . . . and the Court agrees. Consequently, Defendants fail to show that they are entitled to qualified immunity, and the CorrectHealth Defendants' Motion for Partial Summary Judgment is DENIED."); Howard v. Koppel, No. CIV.A. RDB-14-3053, 2015 WL 1085628, at *4 (D. Md. Mar. 10, 2015) ('Defendant also claims entitlement to qualified immunity. Defendants cite Filarsky v. Delia. . . . Filarsky overturned the denial of qualified immunity to an attorney who was retained by a city in California to assist in an internal investigation concerning a firefighter's potential wrongdoing. . . Defendant fails to demonstrate that Filarsky has been extended to contractual health care providers working in detention centers or correctional facilities, and the undersigned will not extend the holding in

Filarsky based on the record presented here."); Miller v. Lehman, No. CIV.A. JKB-14-0896, 2015 WL 641299, at *2 (D. Md. Feb. 12, 2015) ("Defendants claim entitlement to qualified immunity, citing Filarsky v. Delia, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 1657, 1667–68 (2012). Filarsky overturned the denial of qualified immunity to an attorney who was retained by a city in California to assist in an internal investigation concerning a firefighter's potential wrongdoing. . . Defendants fail to demonstrate that Filarsky has been extended to contractual health care providers working in detention centers or correctional facilities, and the undersigned will not extend the holding in Filarsky based on the record now before the court. Further, assuming arguendo that defendants can invoke the doctrine of qualified immunity, the determination of whether they are entitled to qualified immunity is more appropriately addressed after the facts of the case have been developed and a determination has been made as to whether plaintiff has suffered a violation of his constitutional rights. Accordingly, dismissal of plaintiff's complaint based on qualified immunity is not proper at this time."); Dicks v. Shearin, No. CIV.A. GLR-14-1463, 2015 WL 629002, at *4 (D. Md. Feb. 10, 2015) ("The Medical Defendants argue they are entitled to qualified immunity and cite to [Filarsky v. Delia] . . . . Filarsky overturned the denial of qualified immunity to an attorney who was retained by a city in California to assist in an internal investigation concerning a firefighter's potential wrongdoing. . . The Medical Defendants fail to demonstrate that Filarsky has been extended to contractual health care providers working in detention centers or correctional facilities. The Court will not extend the holding in Filarsky based on the record before it. Accordingly, the Court will deny the Medical Defendants' Motion to Dismiss."); Foster v. City of Philadelphia, CIV.A. 12-5851, 2014 WL 5821278, *21-*23 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 10, 2014) ("Jefferson's situation is very different from the attorney's situation in Filarsky because Jefferson was not retained by the City in any manner to promote the public good. . . . Here, there is no question that Jefferson, in his actions with Boyle, was pursuing a purely private end: the removal of Foster's vehicles from his private property. . . . In this case, . . . the facts show that Jefferson's conduct does not fall under the three potential categories from which qualified immunity may arise as set forth in Richardson. Not only was Jefferson's conduct purely for private purposes and not the greater societal good, his interaction with the government was not fleeting. . . .It was not a brief association with a government body. . . .Furthermore, this case involves the seizure of allegedly abandoned cars from a private garage. This is not an 'essential governmental activity.' Jefferson also did not act under close official supervision. The seizures were done at his initiative, and he did not engage in any conduct that was 'closely' supervised by Boyle. . . .Despite Jefferson not being entitled to qualified immunity, he is entitled to assert good faith as an affirmative defense at trial. . . .Jefferson's subjective state of mind is for a jury to determine and cannot be disposed of on summary judgment. . . . Century Motors relies on Filarsky v. Delia to support its claim that it should have the protection of qualified immunity. . . Again, the facts in Filarsky are very different than the facts here involving Century Motors. For the reasons that Filarsky does not support Jefferson's claim of qualified immunity, it does not support Century Motors' claim. Finally, Century Motors' situation here does not fall within the cautionary language in Richardson, where the Court noted that the case did not involve a private individual briefly associated with a governmental body, serving as an adjunct to government in an essential government activity, or acting under close official supervision. . . Century's interaction with NSU was not brief. It operated under a contract with the City and towed cars and took parts that were pointed out by Officer Boyle. It expended considerable time storing the vehicles and parts, and returning cars to their owners. Thereafter, paperwork on the results of Century's activity was sent to NSU. Such actions by Century are not brief but protracted."); Pierce v. Moore, 1:11-CV-132 CEJ, 2014 WL 4724771, *3, *5 (E.D. Mo. Sept. 23, 2014) ("Defendants have not addressed whether there were common-law immunities available for private physicians and nurses providing psychiatric services for a public institution in 1871. The Sixth Circuit undertook the relevant inquiry, however, and determined that there was no such common-law tradition of immunity. . . Defendants provide no persuasive argument to the contrary; indeed, they have made no effort to conduct the relevant inquiry and the Court determines that they have not established that a relevant immunity existed at common law. . . . Defendants here are more akin to the prison guards in Richardson than the internal investigator in Filarsky. Defendants note that the county hospital had ultimate control and supervision over the psychiatric unit. That assertion, without more, does not establish that defendants worked in joint participation with state actors and there is no evidence in the record that defendants consulted with hospital administrators in making decisions regarding plaintiff's care. Defendants do not argue that they were performing an essential government function or that affording them qualified immunity is consistent with or serves the purposes served by immunities that were available at common law in 1871. The Court finds that defendants have failed to establish that there is substantial ground for difference of opinion about a controlling question of law on this point."); Herrera v. Santa Fe Pub. Sch., 41 F.Supp.3d 1027, 1099 (D.N.M. 2014) ("Permitting corporations to raise a qualified immunity defense also leads to the anomalous result where corporations performing functions for governments will have more protection from suit than the governments, government officials, or private individuals engaged in the same unconstitutional conduct. ASI argues in its motion that it is entitled to protection under the Monell standard for local governmental liability and it is entitled to protection under the qualified immunity doctrine. Of course, government officials and private actors deemed to be engaged in state action are not entitled to the protections of Monell and local governments are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . For the rationale articulated in Richardson and Filarsky, the particular circumstances presented in this case, and the incoherence of applying Monell and qualified immunity protections to a corporation like ASI, the company should not be permitted to raise the defense of qualified immunity."); Schneider v. Cnty. of Sacramento, CIV. S-12-2457 KJM, 2014 WL 4187364, *11, *12 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 21, 2014) ("Defendant argues the policies underlying qualified immunity-avoiding timidity in the performance of public duties, ensuring that people are not deterred from public service, and preventing lawsuits from distracting people from government work-apply equally to a contractor engaged to inspect mines and enforce environmental laws. . .Defendant provides no independent examination whether a geologist or one involved in civil enforcement would have been entitled to immunity in 1871, but instead relies on the Filarsky court's examples: immunity was extended to private citizens who acted as justices of the peace and assisted in the execution of warrants, among other things. . . He analogizes his position to those enlisted to execute warrants, arguing that he is empowered to enter onto mine property to carry out an inspection. . .In addition, he attempts to distinguish Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399, 117 S.Ct. 2100, 138 L.Ed.2d 540 (1997), which held that a guard employed by a private prison was not entitled to qualified immunity, by saying that the Supreme Court itself recognized Richardson's narrow holding. . . In Richardson, the Supreme Court said 'a private firm, systematically organized to assume a major, lengthy administrative task ... with limited direct supervision by the government for profit and potentially in competition with other firms' was not entitled to assert qualified immunity, whereas 'a private individual briefly associated with a government body, serving as an adjunct to government in an essential governmental activity, or acting under close official supervision' might be able to claim protection. . .Although defendant makes a more robust showing now in support of his claim for qualified immunity, the court need not at this point definitely decide whether he has established the historical basis for his claim of immunity. Government officials performing discretionary functions generally are shielded from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known. . . In determining whether a governmental officer is immune from suit based on the doctrine of qualified immunity, the court generally considers two questions. The district court may decide the order of addressing these questions and answer only the second, in accordance with fairness and efficiency and in light of the circumstances of a particular case. . . The first is, taken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, do the facts alleged show the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right? . . A negative answer ends the analysis, with qualified immunity protecting defendant from liability. . .If a constitutional violation occurred, a court must further inquire 'whether the right was clearly established.'. . . As noted above, plaintiffs have adequately pleaded that in 2012 defendant deprived them of property rights arbitrarily, in response to political pressure; yet the Ninth Circuit had said that a city council's rejection of the landowner's request to build condominiums because of pressure from neighboring landowners violated due process, Del Monte Dunes, 920 F.2d at 1508, and an arbitrary deprivation of a property right might give rise to a substantive due process claim. Action Apt. Ass'n, 509 F.3d at 1026. Moreover, the court has also recognized that actions taken in retaliation for protected activities are improper. Soranno's Gasco, 874 F.2d at 1314. A reasonable county official would have been aware that arbitrary, retaliatory actions could have violated plaintiffs' rights. Defendant has not shown he is entitled to qualified immunity."); Maldonado v. Powers, 12-CV-773-JPG-PMF, 2014 WL 2926522, *8 (S.D. Ill. June 27, 2014) ("The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals has yet to decide whether or not qualified immunity is available to employees of a private company providing medical services to inmates. See Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 632 (7th Cir.2013). In Currie, the Seventh Circuit discussed the U.S. Supreme Court's 2012 decision in Filarsky, which permitted application of the qualified immunity defense to certain private individuals hired by the government. The Seventh Circuit also noted in Currie that Filarsky also reaffirmed the U.S. Supreme Court's decision Richardson v. McKnight, which held that employees of a private prison management firm were not entitled to qualified immunity by reasoning that the private firm was 'subject to the ordinary competitive pressures that normally help private firms adjust their behavior in response to the incentives that tort suits provide-pressures not necessarily present in government departments' (Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399, 412, 117 S.Ct. 2100, 2108 (1997)). . . Further, the Seventh Circuit in Currie found persuasive the reasoning of a Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals decision, McCullum v. Tepe, which held that a doctor providing psychiatric services to inmates is not entitled to assert qualified immunity (McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir.2012)). . . Similarly, I find the reasoning of the McCullum and Richardson decisions persuasive, and I would hold that Dr. Powers is not entitled to assert the qualified immunity defense. Even if Dr. Powers was entitled to assert the defense, the contours of Maldonado's Eighth Amendment rights were sufficiently clear that Dr. Powers would have been on notice, as the facts appears before the court for purposes of this motion, that the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain upon Maldonado by failing to provide adequate medical care would be unlawful."); Sampson v. Blue Cross Blue Shield of Michigan, 997 F.Supp.2d 777, 790-92 (E.D. Mich. 2014) ("Although the BCBS Defendants acknowledge the first prong of the test, their brief glosses over prong one and focus on policy arguments, citing favorable portions from Filarsky. At oral argument, Counsel for the BCBS Defendants asserted that the BCBS Defendants were simply private citizens aiding the police in executing search warrants. While it is true that in 1871 Sheriffs executing a warrant were empowered to 'enlist the aid of able-bodied men of the community in doing so' and that '[w]hile serving as part of this "posse comitatus," a private individual had the same authority as the sheriff, and was protected to the same extent,' (Filarsky, supra, at 1664), that is not the situation that is alleged here. The BCBS Defendants were not uninterested townspeople who, out of necessity, were asked to aid law enforcement officers with a warrant. Rather, Plaintiffs allege that the BCBS Defendants were the complaining witnesses who instigated the investigation and that they acted in furtherance of BCBS's interests in participating with the searches and that they used information obtained during those searches for BCBS's own purposes. As the Supreme Court instructed in Wyatt, 'in determining whether there was an immunity at common law that Congress intended to incorporate in the Civil Rights Act,' this Court should 'look to the most closely analogous torts.'. . As in Wyatt, the most closely analogous torts here are malicious prosecution and abuse of process. Indeed, Plaintiffs have separately-titled § 1983 counts for malicious prosecution and abuse of process. And Wyatt tells us that '[a]t common law, these torts provided causes of action against private defendants for unjustified harm arising out of the misuse of governmental processes.' There was no immunity at common law extended for complaining witnesses. Accordingly, the Court finds prong one has not been met. . . As explained in Wyatt, . . . private parties such as the BCBS Defendants 'hold no office requiring them to exercise discretion' and therefore extending immunity to them 'would have no bearing on whether public officials are able to act forcefully and decisively in their jobs.'. .Moreover, Plaintiffs allege that: 1) the BCBS Defendants initiated criminal proceedings to further their own private interests in collecting or freezing funds allegedly owed to BCBS; 2) a BCBS Defendant approached the prosecutors and the police; and 3) the BCBS Defendants gave them a three-inch binder of information pertaining to BCBS's investigation of Dr. Sampson. . . The BCBS Defendants were not uninterested parties that the police, for some reason such as their professional expertise. . . asked to aid them in the execution of the search warrants. Like the private defendants in Wyatt, the BCBS Defendants are alleged to have used the government processes to achieve their own ends and were not 'principally concerned with enhancing the public good.'"); Cady v. Cumberland County Jail, No. 2:10–cv–00512–NT, 2013 WL 3967486, *1 (D. Me. Aug. 1, 2013) ("I write to address only one issue. The Magistrate Judge pointed out to the Court that the law on qualified immunity for private actors who are under contract to perform duties statutorily required of the state is unsettled. I agree with the Magistrate Judge that the Corizon Defendants are more like the defendants in Richardson v.

McKnight, 521 U.S. 399 (1997) (where guards working in a prison facility run by a private contractor were not entitled to qualified immunity) than the defendant in Filarsky v. Delia, 132 S. Ct. 1657 (2012) (private attorney who was retained by city to assist in investigation of firefighter's potential wrongdoing was entitled to seek qualified immunity). . . . Magistrate Judge Kravchuk also points to a First Circuit case, which predated Richardson and which was not cited by the parties, wherein the First Circuit held that private social workers who work for agencies under contract with the state to provide counseling and investigative services in suspected cases of child abuse were the functional equivalent of state actors and therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Frazier v. Bailey, 957 F.2d 920, 929 (1st Cir.1992). Because this case falls somewhere in between Frazier and Richardson, and because the First Circuit has not yet revisited Frazier in light of Richardson and Filarsky, I agree with the Magistrate Judge's prudent decision to assume for the sake of argument that the Corizon defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. I adopt her approach, and I agree with her conclusion for the reasons she states, that even if the Corizon Defendants are entitled to raise a qualified immunity defense, their defense fails."); Cady v. Cumberland County Jail, No. 2:10–cv–00512–NT, 2013 WL 3967486, *31-*33 (D. Me. Aug. 1, 2013) (Kravchuk, J., R & R) ("The defendants argue that Corizon's relationship to CCJ is different from the relationship that the private jailer had to the State of Tennessee in Richardson v. McKnight. This is a fair statement because the State of Maine has not privatized corrections to the extent that Tennessee has, there are county policy makers involved in the operation of CCJ, the Corizon defendants work alongside county-employed correctional officers, and there is consultation and collaboration between Corizon and the County on operational and financial matters. . . However, I am not persuaded that these differences justify extending the doctrine of qualified immunity to Corizon's employees because there has been no showing that this result is supported by legal tradition and because it appears that private market forces will influence Corizon as much as they do other private companies serving this market. . .Nothing in Filarsky v. Delia, 132 S.Ct. 1657 (2012) (extending qualified immunity to a private attorney specially retained by the government to assist with an investigation), or Burke v. Town of Walpole, 405 F.3d 66 (1st Cir.2005) (extending qualified immunity to physicians on contract with the state to perform forensic investigative services), cited by defendants, contradicts this assessment. The facts demonstrate a relationship between the government and the private service provider that is much more like the relationship in Richardson v. McKnight. Cumberland County has contracted with Corizon to assume the day-to-day responsibility of managing the delivery of medical care in CCJ and Corizon has undertaken that task for profit. Pursuant to the contract, Corizon has insured itself against prisoner claims. . . There is governmental oversight, but Cumberland County's policy-makers and jail administrator do not oversee or direct the day-to-day provision of medical care by Corizon employees. Additionally, Corizon has developed its own policies and procedures concerning the provision of medical services. Given these factors and the defendants' failure to identify a tradition of immunity in this context, I conclude that qualified immunity is not available to the individual Corizon defendants. Notwithstanding this conclusion, the court needs to be aware of a case not cited by the individual Corizon defendants, Frazier v. Bailey, 957 F.2d 920 (1st Cir.1992). The First Circuit decided Frazier prior to the Supreme Court's decisions in Richardson and Wyatt, and held that a privately employed social worker who conducted child abuse counseling was entitled to qualified immunity because her employer was 'under contract to perform the duties statutorily required of the state,' the idea being that she was 'compelled' to perform this function and therefore deserved qualified immunity for being the 'functional equivalent' of a state actor. . . Adherence to Frazier would call for application of the qualified immunity standard because the Corizon defendants were under contract to perform duties statutorily assigned to the state. Richardson would appear to supplant Frazier because it prescribes a different test than the 'functional equivalence' standard stated in Frazier. Additionally, Richardson is more closely on point because Frazier concerned a private party conducting child abuse counseling or investigations, whereas Richardson concerned private parties providing the state with jail services, as is the case here. Unfortunately, although the First Circuit has cited Frazier subsequent to Richardson, it has not done so in support of giving qualified immunity to private actors and has never discussed Richardson (or Wyatt) in the context of giving qualified immunity to private actors. Despite my reservations about the binding force of Frazier, '[u]ntil a court of appeals revokes a binding precedent, a district court within the circuit is hard put to ignore that precedent unless it has unmistakably been cast into disrepute by supervening authority.'. . This court may ultimately decide that Frazier is 'unmistakably cast into disrepute,' but for purposes of providing a complete recommendation, qualified immunity is considered here."); Allen v. Shawney, No. 11–cv–10942, 2013 WL 2480658, *10 (E.D. Mich. June 10, 2013) ("In Filarsky v. Delia, 132 S.Ct. 1657 (2012), the Supreme Court held that an attorney hired by a municipality was entitled to raise a defense of qualified immunity even though he was a private attorney rather than a municipal employee. . . .Here, Drs. Hutchinson and Mamidipaka are not employees of the state. Nevertheless, they are engaged in a public service and acting on behalf of the government agency, MDOC. Accordingly, they are entitled to raise the defense of qualified immunity."); Young v. County of Hawaii, No. 11–00580 ACK–RLP, 2013 WL 2286068, *13-*16 (D. Haw. May 22, 2013) ("As an initial issue, Defendant Yamada is employed by the Hawaii Island Humane Society, which is an independent contractor hired by the County of Hawai'i to carry out the 'County's animal control program' under Hawai'i County Code and the Hawai'i Revised Statutes. . . The Supreme Court has held that private defendants are not covered by immunity unless 'firmly rooted tradition' and 'special policy concerns involved in suing government officials' warrant immunity. . . In this case, Officer Yamada qualifies for qualified immunity. . . . In this case, state and county law demonstrates that officers of HIHS like Defendant Yamada are duly appointed by law to execute search warrants and perform law enforcement functions like those of the police. . . . The statutory provisions, close collaboration between HIHS and the HCPD, and HCPD's power to review HIHS procedures merits a conclusion that officers of HIHS are private actors enlisted by the police department to exercise police powers to discharge special public duties. . . Accordingly, in this situation, the private actors also enjoy the same protections afforded to law enforcement officers. . . . In Filarsky, the Supreme Court also noted that private individuals who work in close coordination with public employees may face threatened legal action for the same conduct. . . .In such cases, private individuals may be deterred from accepting such assignments. This special policy concern applies in this case, where HIHS officers are required to accompany HCPD officers upon request. . . .In conclusion, the nature of the relationship between HIHS and HCPD combined with the historical background of private individuals employed by law enforcement officers establishes that Officer Yamada is protected by qualified immunity in this case. . . . While HIHS as an independent contractor may also have competitive market pressures; the Court in Richardson noted that the prison performed its task independently, with relatively less ongoing direct state supervision.'. . Such freedom allowed the private contractor prison to respond to market pressures to adjust employee behavior. . .In this case, there is close government collaboration and supervision that restricts HIHS's ability to respond as a private firm to market pressures. . . Accordingly, the Court concludes that Defendant Yamada is protected by qualified immunity because of HCPD's collaboration with HIHS and its supervision over HIHS' work."); Hogan v. Wellstar Health Network, Inc., No. 1:12–CV–1418–RWS, 2013 WL 1136980, *11 & n.5 (N.D. Ga. Mar. 14, 2013) ("The Wellstar Defendants argue that Filarsky controls here and therefore, they are entitled to qualified immunity as to the § 1983 claim. Plaintiffs maintain that this case is more analogous to Richardson and therefore, qualified immunity does not apply. . . Of course, if Defendants were not acting under color of state law for qualified immunity purposes, they were not acting under color of state law for purposes of § 1983 liability. Given the similarities between the Wellstar Defendants and the private defendants in Richardson, and Plaintiffs' own position that the Wellstar Defendants did not act under color of state law, . . .the Court finds that the Wellstar Defendants should be treated as private actors in this case. Therefore, the § 1983 claims against the Wellstar Defendants are DISMISSED. . . . Plaintiffs' reliance on Richardson has substantial merit. This case does not involve a single individual briefly associated with a government body like the private attorney in Filarsky. Instead, like the defendants in Richardson, the Wellstar Defendants are affiliated with a private firm, systematically organized to assume a major lengthy administrative task (administration of health clinics in Cobb County detention facilities, as well as provision of medical care and personnel in those facilities) with limited direct supervision by the government, undertaking that task for profit and potentially in competition with other firms."); Ford v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., No. 12 C 4558, 2013 WL 474494, *7, *8 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 7, 2013) ("Whether a privately employed medical official working at a prison may invoke qualified immunity is an open question in the Seventh Circuit. . . Assuming the Individual Defendants may seek qualified immunity, construing the facts in a light most favorable to Ford, he has sufficiently set forth his deliberate indifference claims against Dr. Carter, Dr. Ghosh, and Williams under the first factor of the qualified immunity standard. The Court therefore turns to the second factor. Since the Supreme Court's 1976 decision in Estelle, 'it ha[s] been clearly established that medical treatment of prisoners would amount to cruel and unusual punishment if the conduct demonstrated a "deliberate indifference" to the prisoner's condition and an "unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain."'. . Indeed, the Seventh Circuit has repeatedly concluded that disregarding inmate complaints of severe pain constitutes deliberate indifference. . . Because these cases are analogous to the present matter, the Individual Defendants had fair warning that their treatment of Ford was unconstitutional."); Estate of Pridemore v. Bluegrass Regional Mental Health-Mental Retardation Bd., No. 11–38–KSF, 2012 WL 6691597, *4 (E.D. Ky. Dec. 21, 2012) ("The facts of McCullum are strikingly similar to this case. Here, Taylor, while not a physician, is a licensed clinical social worker. He is employed by Bluegrass, a private corporation and independent contractor doing business with the Detention Center pursuant to a contract between the parties. The Plaintiffs have failed to show any firmly rooted tradition of granting immunity to private parties like Taylor, nor does the history and purpose of § 1983 justify extending such immunity. Accordingly, Taylor is not entitled to assert the defense of qualified immunity.").

But see Bracken v. Okura, 869 F.3d 771, 776-78 (9th Cir. 2017) ("Chung conceded at oral argument that he 'absolutely' acted under color of state law in helping detain Bracken, and he argues that, because of this, qualified immunity is necessarily available to him. We agree that Chung acted under color of state law for § 1983 purposes: In preventing Bracken from leaving the party, Chung invoked the authority conveyed by his police uniform and badge. . . We disagree, however, that this automatically entitles him to invoke qualified immunity. State action for § 1983 purposes is not necessarily co-extensive with state action for which qualified immunity is available. . . . 'The purpose of § 1983 is to deter state actors from using the badge of their authority to deprive individuals of their federally guaranteed rights and to provide relief to victims if such deterrence fails.'. . Qualified immunity, on the other hand, 'protect[s] government's ability to perform its traditional functions.'. . .Thus, the availability of immunity does not necessarily overlap with state action under § 1983 when a government officer uses the 'badge of their authority[]'. . . in service of a private, non-governmental goal. . . .Neither this court nor the Supreme Court has addressed the general availability of qualified immunity to off-duty police officers acting as private security guards. . . In other contexts, however, we have followed the Supreme Court's instruction to 'look both to history and to the purposes that underlie government employee immunity in order to find the answer.' . . The first inquiry is whether '[h]istory ... reveal[s] a "firmly rooted" tradition of immunity.'. . We look principally to 'the common law as it existed when Congress passed § 1983 in 1871.'. . The next question is whether granting immunity would serve the purposes underlying the immunity doctrine – such as 'protecting government's ability to perform its traditional functions,' 'preserv[ing] the ability of government officials to serve the public good,' 'ensur[ing] that talented candidates [are] not deterred by the threat of damages suits from entering public service,' and 'protecting the public from unwarranted timidity on the part of public officials.'. . Applying that framework, we conclude qualified immunity is unavailable to Chung. First, he has shown no 'firmly rooted' tradition of immunity for off-duty or special duty officers acting as private security guards. Indeed, Chung has not cited any supporting historical authority. Nor has our own review revealed a 'firmly rooted' tradition of immunity. . . .We are not aware of any state that offers immunity where an officer serving as a private security guard did not act in service of a public duty, and some states have held immunity is simply unavailable in this context. . . Thus, the historical inquiry does not support immunity for Chung here. Second, Chung has not shown that the policies underpinning qualified immunity warrant invoking the doctrine here. In detaining Bracken, Chung did not act 'in performance of public duties' or to 'carry[ ] out the work of government.'. . He does not contend, for example, that he was preventing Bracken from committing a crime. Instead, Chung – acting on behalf of the hotel, at the hotel's direction and while being paid by the hotel – aided the hotel in realizing its goal of issuing Bracken a warning. Thus, shielding Chung from suit would not advance the policies underlying qualified immunity. . . We hold that qualified immunity is not available to Chung."); Gregg v. Ham, 678 F.3d 333, 339-41 & n.6 (4th Cir. 2012) ("A private party may be liable under § 1983 if acting 'under color of state law'. . . but is not necessarily entitled to assert a qualified immunity defense. . . . Thus, when determining whether a private party acting under color of state law is entitled to qualified immunity, the Supreme Court has instructed courts 'to look both to history and to the purposes that underlie government employee immunity.'. . .Applying the test articulated in Richardson, we conclude that the history and policy behind the qualified immunity defense do not support extending it to bail bondsmen. First, there is no evidence that bail bondsmen have historically been afforded immunity for their actions. . . .Second, the policy justifications underlying qualified immunity do not apply to bail bondsmen. . . . Courts have traditionally afforded qualified immunity to public officials because susceptibility to suit would distract them from performing their public functions, inhibit discretionary action, and deter desirable candidates from performing public service. . . There is no need, however, for qualified immunity to shield bondsmen from suit, as they are not entrusted with a public function. To the contrary, while the law certainly allows a bail bondsman to apprehend a fugitive, that right is exercised in tandem with the obligation of law enforcement to accomplish the same objective. . . Moreover, rather than operating in the interest of public service, the work of a bail bondsman is fueled primarily by a strong profit motive. . . In sum, neither history nor policy support extending the qualified immunity defense to bail bondsmen. . . . . The Court's recent decision in Filarsky—holding that immunity under § 1983 does not vary based on whether an individual works full-time for the government or does so on some other basis—does nothing to change the result in this case. . . As we have explained, Ham was a bail bondsman, not an 'arm of the court,' and thus operated in pursuit of his own financial self-interest. He was not employed by the Sheriff's Department and did not report to law enforcement. Moreover, the sheriff did not call on Ham to assist in its efforts to apprehend Rose; instead, it was Ham who called on Deputy Yelton to prevent—unsuccessfully it turns out—a breach of the peace at Gregg's home. Finally, as Yelton confirmed, Ham was in charge of the search and did not act at Yelton's direction. Because Ham was not hired by or working on behalf of the government in any capacity, Filarsky is inapposite and, for the reasons discussed, Ham is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

See also Al Shimari v. CACI Intern., Inc., 679 F.3d 205, 263, 264 (4th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Niemeyer, J., joined by Wilkinson, J., and Shedd, J., dissenting) [arguing that court had jurisdiction to entertain interlocutory appeal but court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over case because claims raised nonjusticiable political questions] ("In short, the unique federal interest embodied in the combatant activities exception to the FTCA is an interest in freeing military actors from the distraction, inhibition, and fear that the imposition of state tort law by means of a potential civil suit entails. It makes no difference whether the military actors are low-level soldiers, commanders, or military contractors. The Supreme Court has made clear that immunity attaches to the function being performed, and private actors who are hired by the government to perform public functions are entitled to the same immunities to which public officials performing those duties would be entitled. See Filarsky, 132 S.Ct. at 1661–66. The unanimous Supreme Court in Filarsky emphasized that imposing liability on private individuals performing public functions will result in 'unwarranted timidity' on the part of 'those engaged in the public's business,' calling this concern 'the most important special government immunity-producing concern.'. . It recognized the need to 'afford[ ] immunity not only to public employees but also to others acting on behalf of the government' because 'often when there is a particular need for specialized knowledge or expertise ... the government must look outside its permanent work force to secure the services of private individuals.'. .This case presents just such an example. The military had a need for specialized language and interrogation skills and hired private individuals to work with the military in performing its public function. Because potential suit and liability would result in 'unwarranted timidity' on the part of these government contractors, they must share the common law immunity enjoyed by the military and retained by the FTCA combatant activities exception. These interests underlying this immunity are only protected if the immunity is not only an immunity from liability, but also an immunity from suit. Thus, the denial of a combatant activities defense will be effectively unreviewable at final judgment because the defendants will no longer be able to vindicate their right to avoid the burdens and distractions of trial. Military contractors will have to undertake future actions 'arising out of combatant activities' with the understanding that they are presumptively subject to civil tort law and must abide by state law duties of care in the middle of a foreign war zone. The result will be exactly what the Supreme Court cautioned against in Filarsky: 'those working alongside [government employees] could be left holding the bag—facing full liability for actions taken in conjunction with government employees who enjoy immunity for the same activity.'. . The governmental interests in uninhibited military action and in the attraction of talented candidates, both public and private, animate the combatant activities exception, and these interests are far broader than the limited interests recognized by the majority, which focuses only on 'sensitive military issues.'. . Such a narrow mischaracterization of the federal interest ignores the broad language of the exception (protecting actions "arising out of combatant activities") and finds no support in federal common law.")

See also Harrison v. Ash, 539 F.3d 510, 521-25 (6th Cir. 2008) ("[A]s employees of a private medical provider, rather than Macomb County itself, Defendant nurses may not assert a defense of qualified immunity and thus we lack jurisdiction to hear their appeal. . . . As an initial matter, it is undisputed that Defendant nurses are subject to suit under § 1983 because they acted 'under color of state law.' . . . In the instant case, Defendant nurses were acting under the color of state law when the alleged constitutional violation occurred because of the contractual relationship between Macomb County and CMS. . . . Being subject to suit under § 1983, however, does not mean that a party has the right to assert qualified immunity. . . . Thus, this Court must engage in a context specific analysis, examining the common law tradition of immunity as well as the policy considerations supporting qualified immunity, to determine whether nurses employed by a private medical provider are eligible to assert qualified immunity in a § 1983 action.. . . . Applying the wisdom of Richardson to the instant case, we find that the purposes of qualified immunity do not support the extension of the doctrine to nurses employed by a private medical provider. . . .Importantly, like the company in Richardson, CMS is a for-profit entity that has undertaken the major administrative task of providing health care to Macomb County inmates, operates with little supervision from Jail authorities, and is subject to the pressures of the marketplace. . . . [O]ther circuits have denied qualified immunity to private medical providers under similar circumstances. [collecting cases]"); Cook v. Martin, 148 F. App'x 327, 2005 WL 2175922, at *13, *14 (6th Cir. Jul. 27, 2005) (not published) ("We therefore conclude that there is no firmly rooted history at common law of according qualified immunity to privately employed prison medical providers. Hence, Mason has failed to satisfy the first factor in determining whether a private individual is entitled to the protections of qualified immunity. Mason has also failed to satisfy the second factor because the purposes underlying the doctrine of qualified immunity do not warrant granting immunity for privately employed prison medical providers. . . . As for the first two purposes cited by the Court, we can discern no sufficiently meaningful distinction between the private prison management firms at issue in Richardson and the private prison medical providers at issue in the case at bar. . . . Mason argues that his situation is distinguishable because he was assigned to a state prison hospital and was required to abide by the same guidelines and regulations as state-employed personnel, therefore his actions were controlled by state supervision, pursuant to which he is entitled to qualified immunity. Mason's private employer, EMS, however, was subcontracted to MDOC through Correctional Medical Services (CMS), a separate private enterprise. Thus, Mason is effectively two steps removed from direct state supervision and can hardly be said to be controlled by the state. Inasmuch as Mason's employer, EMS, is accountable to another private entity, CMS, rather than to the State of Michigan, surely the marketplace pressures that attend Mason's functions carry even more weight. . . . Our examination of the history and purposes of qualified immunity does not reveal anything sufficiently special about the work of private prison medical providers that would warrant providing such providers with governmental immunity. Accordingly we agree with the district court that Mason is not protected by the doctrine of qualified immunity."); Derfiny v. Pontiac Osteopathic Hospital, No. 02-2308, 2004 WL 1543166, at *7 (6th Cir. July 6, 2004) ("Plaintiff attempts to argue that the Defendants do not even facially qualify for qualified immunity since they were private physicians employed by a private hospital contracted by the County to provide medical services at the County jail. As discussed above, since qualified immunity is reserved for state actors, private litigants are generally not eligible to receive qualified immunity pursuant to § 1983. . . The Court has previously held, however, that a private litigant, who performed service at the 'behest of the sovereign,' is entitled to receive qualified immunity from suit.[citing Cullinan v. Abramson, 128 F.3d 301, 310 (6th Cir.1997)] We addressed this issue again in Cooper v. Parish, and ruled that particular plaintiff was not working at the behest of the sovereign, or performing any unique government function; therefore, qualified immunity was not applicable. 203 F.3d 937, 953 (6th Cir.2000). As Defendant responds, this issue was neither briefed nor argued in the lower court; thus, this is yet another reason for this Court to remand."); United States v. Thomas, 240 F.3d 445, 448, 449 (5th Cir. 2001) ("It goes without saying that the policy considerations supporting private corrections officers' not being entitled to qualified immunity are quite different from those concerning whether they are 'public officials' for purposes of the federal bribery statute. Obviously, the Government has just as strong an interest in the integrity of private corrections officers charged with guarding federal detainees as it has in the integrity of federal corrections officers employed in federal facilities. Under such circumstances, and for purposes of the federal bribery statute, there is simply no basis for differentiating between such private and public officers."); Jensen v. Lane County, 222 F.3d 570, 576-78 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Limited information has been presented on the historical availability of immunity for doctors asked by the government to make a decision to commit persons suspected of mental illness. . . .[T]he parties have not offered, and we have not found, any definitive common law history of immunity outside of Oregon that would support a finding of qualified immunity here. . . . This case is similar to Richardson in many respects. PA is a privately organized group of psychiatrists providing services to the government pursuant to contract. The privatization and market forces arguments are equally applicable here as well. PA psychiatrists must provide psychiatric services for the County with the market threat of replacement for failure to complete their duties adequately. As in Richardson, the potential for insurance, indemnification agreements, and higher pay all may operate to encourage qualified candidates to engage in this endeavor and to discharge their duties vigorously."); Hinson v. Edmond, 192 F.3d 1342, 1345-47 (11th Cir. 1999) ("For the same reasons that the Richardson Court declined to extend the doctrine of qualified immunity to privately employed prison guards, we decline to extend qualified immunity to this privately employed prison physician. . . . The parties have not been able to point to, and independent research– including a look at the sources cited by the Supreme Court in Richardson– does not reveal, cases which show a common law tradition of immunity from liability for privately employed prison physicians for acts amounting to recklessness or intentional wrongdoing. Instead, case law shows that even state physicians may be subject to liability for intentional torts. . . . In addition to the lack of historical support for immunity, the public policy reasons for qualified immunity do not justify the extension of qualified immunity in this case. . . .Also, as was the case in Richardson, Wexford Health Sources was systematically organized to perform a major administrative task for profit. . . . Moreover, as was the case in Richardson, Wexford performed its task with limited direct supervision and control by the government. . . . Despite arguments raised by defendant in this case, that the inability of a privately employed prison physician to raise the defense of qualified immunity will deter qualified candidates is doubtful. Employee indemnification, increased benefits and higher pay are all tools at the disposal of a private company like Wexford; and they can be used to attract suitable employees."), opinion revised on other grounds, 205 F.3d 1264 (11th Cir. 2000); Bibeau v. Pacific Northwest Research Foundation, Inc., 188 F.3d 1105, 111, 112 (9th Cir. 1999) ("[C]ircuit precedent suggests that the private defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity here. [citing Halvorsen] . . . . This isn't a firm that was 'briefly associated with a government body,'. . . but rather a firm that conducted research at the OSP for a decade, from 1963 to 1973. We can find no principled distinction between private researchers such as the PNRF, the private prison guards involved in Richardson and the private detoxification facility in Halvorsen. Accordingly, [defendants] are not entitled to qualified immunity."); Malinowski v. DeLuca, 177 F.3d 623, 627 (7th Cir. 1999) (no qualified immunity for private building inspectors); Halvorsen v. Baird, 146 F.3d 680, 685 (9th Cir. 1998) ("A private firm providing a municipality with involuntary commitment services for inebriates does not enjoy qualified immunity, under Richardson v. McKnight. . . . The only significant difference between the private prison guard firm in Richardson and the private detoxification facility in the case at bar is that the firm in Richardson was for-profit, the one in the case at bar not-for-profit. That difference is not material, because both profit and nonprofit firms compete for municipal contracts, and both have incentives to display effective performance. That revenues may go to salaries and other activities of the firm, as opposed to dividends, is not likely to dampen the ardor of the nonprofit firm's employees."); Ace Beverage Company v. Lockheed Information Management Services, 144 F.3d 1218, 1219 (9th Cir. 1998) (private corporation that processes parking tickets for City of Los Angeles not entitled to qualified immunity); Bender v. General Services Admin., No. 05 Civ. 6459(GEL), 2008 WL 619035, at *10, *11 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 5, 2008) ("Following Richardson, the circuit courts have generally rejected qualified immunity for private parties operating under contract for the government.[citing cases] Where courts have found qualified immunity, it has been in cases falling within Richardson's narrow caveat regarding private party acts that are isolated, taken at the specific direction of the government, or done without profit or other marketplace incentive. [citing cases] Nothing about Del Valle's situation suggests he is entitled to the protections of qualified immunity. The services provided by Del Valle to the federal government were done under a contract in which Del Valle and his employer benefitted financially, and the contract was awarded to HWA in a market in which it competed with other security services firms. Such services to the federal government are continuous, not isolated and sporadic, and HWA has every opportunity and incentive to establish administrative systems for the efficient delivery of its service. Consequently, like the operator of private prisons in Richardson, there is every reason to think that 'marketplace pressures' will ensure that HWA employees are neither over-nor under-zealous in the performance of their duties in the face of constitutional liability, and there is therefore no justification for extending them the special protections of qualified immunity."); Weigand v. Spadt, No. 4:03CV3040, 2004 WL 1064235, at  5-7 (D. Neb. May 12, 2004) (assuming defendants were state actors and denying qualified immunity to Emergency Medical Services, Inc. ("EMS"), an independent contractor that oversees the provision of emergency medical services in the City of Lincoln and EMS's medical director); Tewksbury v. Dowling, 169 F. Supp.2d 103, 114 (E.D.N.Y. 2001) ("There are three Circuit Court cases that have examined whether private physicians are entitled to a qualified immunity from suit. In Sherman v. Four County Counseling Center, 987 F.2d 397 (7th Cir.1993), the Seventh Circuit found that a private psychiatric facility that was ordered by a state court to detain the plaintiff against his will and to treat him as it deemed appropriate was entitled to qualified immunity. Id. at 405-06. The court, however, rested its holding largely on the fact that the defendant had acted pursuant to court order on an emergency basis. Id. The Ninth Circuit, on the other hand, found that qualified immunity was unavailable to a private physician who, pursuant to a contract with a municipal government, detained an individual suspected of mental illness. Jensen v. Lane County, 222 F.3d 570 (9th Cir.2000). Finally, the Eleventh Circuit held that a jail's medical director who was an employee of a private, for-profit company that had contracted with the county to provide medical services to the jail was not entitled to a qualified immunity from suit. Hinson v. Edmond, 192 F.3d 1342 (11th Cir.1999). This Court finds that Sherman v. Four County Counseling Center is distinguishable since Defendants were not acting pursuant to a court order and the remaining authority supports a finding that Defendants are not entitled to a defense of qualified immunity."); Paz v. Weir, 137 F. Supp.2d 782, 805 (S.D. Tex. 2001) ("[U]nder either an entwinement analysis or a delegated duty theory, Weir, as head chaplain at the Jail, was acting under color of state law when interacting with Paz and other female inmates. In this instance, the County delegated to a private corporation its duty under state law to provide religious services to inmates and granted this entity broad access to inmates when providing such services. Under similar circumstances, the Sixth Circuit held a volunteer chaplain at a state prison to be a state actor. See Phelps v. Dunn, 965 F.2d 93, 102 (6th Cir.1992)."); Hernandez v. Hines, 159 F. Supp.2d 378, 383 (N.D. Tex. 2001)

("The Court is aware of no firmly rooted history of immunity for foster parents. The Clauds do not allege that they are state workers; indeed, they are private defendants. . . . This Court declines to extend the law of the Fifth Circuit to grant qualified immunity to foster parents."); Payton v. Rush-Presbyterian-St. Luke's Medical Center, 82 F. Supp.2d 901, 907, 908 (N.D. Ill. 2000)("Given that the hospital is subject to competitive market pressures, little or no direct government supervision and has insurance, we cannot find any special immunity-related need to encourage effective and responsible performance by the special police in this case. . . . The presumption is against immunity for private actors unless tradition and strong policy reasons dictate conferring immunity."); Edwards v. Alabama Dep't of Correction, 81 F. Supp.2d 1242, 1254, 1255 (M.D. Ala. 2000) ("Eleventh Circuit precedent clearly states that when a private corporation contracts with a state to perform a function traditionally within the province of the state government, including the provision of medical services to state inmates, then that corporation should be treated as a government entity and as a person acting under color of state law within the meaning of § 1983. . . . As such, the private entity is not entitled to qualified immunity, but certain special requirements for liability do apply. . . In order to prove that CMS should be liable, the plaintiffs would have to demonstrate that CMS itself directly caused the violation of their constitutional rights through their adoption of some official policy or practice."); Kesler v. King, 29 F. Supp.2d 356, 371, 374 (S.D. Tex. 1998) ("Applying the public function test to the actions of Defendant CCRI, the Court concludes that this private company was performing a function, the incarceration of inmates, that falls within the exclusive responsibility of the state, and thus was acting under color of state law. . . . Insofar as Defendant Crawford, the warden of the CCRI facility, was the ultimate decision-maker for CCRI with respect to the operations it conducted under color of state law at the Brazoria County facility, his actions are attributable to CCRI."); Raby v. Baptist Medical Center, 21 F. Supp.2d 1341, 1358 (M.D. Ala. 1998) ("In summary, because the policy concerns which have prompted courts to apply qualified immunity to municipal police officers also apply to Baptist Medical Center police officers, the court finds that the unique factual circumstances presented by this case require the application of qualified immunity to these private defendants to whom the state has given the same powers as those given to state and municipal police officers."); Giron v. Corrections Corporation of America, 14 F. Supp.2d 1245, 1248-49 (D.N.M. 1998) ("Although Richardson noted that 'correctional functions have never been exclusively public', . . . it did not conclude that correctional functions are not government functions. For one thing, the fact that a function may be privately performed does not exclude it from the 'government function' category. . . The function of incarcerating people, whether done publicly or privately, is the exclusive prerogative of the state. This is a truly unique function and has been traditionally and exclusively reserved to the state. For example, the government must retain final control with respect to inmate admissions and releases and further deprivations of basic freedoms, including, for example, disciplinary action, parole, good time credit, and furloughs. The fact that correctional functions have never been exclusively public does not mean that, because run by a private corporation, that the extent of the governmental nature of the function is any less. Only the government is empowered to incarcerate a citizen, and Defendant Torrez, as a corrections officer, was a state-regulated private actor performing the basics of this function. Defendant Torrez was 'acting under color of state law' in that he was performing a 'traditional state function' of checking on an inmate at the time he was admitted by the 'control officer' into Giron's cell. . . . I conclude that Torrez was able to rape Plaintiff only because of the abuse of his position as a corrections officer."), aff'd in part, and rev'd and remanded in part, 191 F.3d 1281 (10th Cir. 1999); Nelson v. Prison Health Services, 991 F. Supp. 1452, 1462, 1463 (M.D. Fla. 1997) ("The provision of medical treatment to an entire institution like the Pinellas County Jail, with little or no supervision by the Sheriff, is clearly the sort of 'major lengthy administrative task' contemplated by the Court in Richardson. . . . Moreover, the analysis undertaken by the Richardson Court supports the conclusion that private entities providing medical care or treatment to inmates may not raise a defense of qualified immunity. Like the private operation or management of the entire prison, private provision of medical care or treatment to inmates appears to have been historically commonplace and bare of the immunity traditionally afforded public functions. . . . Similarly, the same marketplace pressures that guard against a private prison guard's becoming overly timid in his or her duties, also guard against a private medical provider's becoming overly timid in his or her treatment of inmates. . . . Richardson leaves unaltered, however, the case law holding that a private medical provider is a 'state actor' for the purposes of section 1983."); McDuffie v. Hopper, 982 F. Supp. 817, 823-25 & n.7 (M.D. Ala. 1997) ("To no avail, the Defendants argue that Richardson's narrow holding leaves the door open for this court to distinguish the present Defendants, private party health care providers, from private party guard defendants, for purposes of § 1983 immunity. . . . It would strike this court as strange to find that private contractor doctors can claim the protections of qualified immunity, while private contractor guards cannot. Fairness dictates that like-situated persons be treated alike. Richardson makes it clear that the function that a private party serves is not determinative of whether they are entitled to qualified immunity. Richardson further makes clear that those who contract to engage in government services without supervision, and for profit in a competitive marketplace, subject themselves to liability under § 1983 without the protections of immunity. CMS and its employees are within Richardson's holding. They are, therefore, not entitled to claim the protections of qualified immunity. . . . . Plaintiff also makes an additional argument for denying qualified immunity to CMS. That argument analogizes the position of CMS to that of a municipality. When municipal corporations are sued under § 1983, a plaintiff must prove that the violation occurred because of the municipality's official policy or custom. . . The municipality is not entitled to claim qualified immunity. . . Here, McDuffie is asserting that because companies are treated like municipalities for the purposes of § 1983 liability, companies should also be treated like municipalities for the purposes of qualified immunity. Plaintiff is not able to cite to any case for the proposition that a company should be treated like a city for purposes of qualified immunity. The court does not have to decide whether private companies should be treated like municipalities for the purposes of qualified immunity. A distinction between CMS and the doctors in its employ, for purposes of qualified immunity, will make no difference here. If CMS is treated like an individual, it is not entitled to qualified immunity based on the analysis stated above. If it is treated like a municipality, it would also not be eligible to claim the protection of qualified immunity.").

See also See also S.P. v. City of Takoma Park, 134 F.3d 260, 268, 269 (4th Cir. 1998) (where involuntary commitment statute, "when viewed as a whole, is more permissive than mandatory, and [where] it grants private physicians complete medical discretion in determining whether an individual should be involuntarily committed[, court] decline[d] to hold the private individuals to be state actors...").

4. Note on Malesko, Minneci, and Ziglar

In Correctional Services Corp. v. Malesko, 122 S. Ct. 515, 519 (2001), the Court refused to extend an implied cause of action for damages under Bivens against private entities acting under color of federal law. The Court did not address the question of whether private individuals employed by such entities were subject to a Bivens action. That question has been answered in Minneci v. Pollard, 132 S. Ct. 617 (2012). The plaintiff in Minneci was a prisoner in a federal facility run by a private prison management company, Wackenhut Corrections Corporation. Plaintiff claimed that he had been deprived of adequate medical care in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and sought damages from several prison employees. The Ninth Circuit held that the Eighth Amendment provided Pollard with a Bivens action. Pollard v. The GEO Group, Inc., 607 F.3d 583, 603, as amended 629 F.3d 843, 868 (9th Cir. 2010). With only Justice Ginsburg dissenting, the Court (per Justice Breyer) held that Pollard could not assert a claim under Bivens. 132 S. Ct. at 623. The Court explained that "Pollard's Eighth Amendment claim focuses upon a kind of conduct that typically falls within the scope of traditional state tort law. And in the case of a privately employed defendant, state tort law provides an 'alternative, existing process' capable of protecting the constitutional interests at stake." Id. The Court noted that research disclosed that "state law imposes general tort duties of reasonable care (including medical care) on prison employees in every one of the eight States where privately managed secure federal facilities are currently located." Id. at 624. Finally, the Court acknowledged that state tort remedies may often prove "less generous" than Bivens actions, but this did not make such remedies inadequate. Id. at 625. The Court left "different cases and different state laws to another day[,]" concluding that "where, as here, a federal prisoner seeks damages from privately employed personnel working at a privately operated federal prison, where the conduct allegedly amounts to a violation of the Eighth Amendment, and where that conduct is of a kind that typically falls within the scope of traditional state tort law (such as the conduct involving improper medical care at issue here), the prisoner must seek a remedy under state tort law." Id. at 626.

In Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843 (2017), the Court refused to extend Bivens to "claims challenging the conditions of confinement imposed on respondents pursuant to the formal policy adopted by the Executive Officials (Ashcroft, Mueller, Ziglar) in the wake of the September 11 attacks." Id. at 1858. The Court likewise viewed claims against the Wardens based on their alleged knowledge of and failure to stop abuse by guards to present "a new Bivens context" and remanded those claims with instructions that the Second Circuit perform a "special factors analysis" and consider whether alternative remedies were available. Id. at 1864-65.

But see Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1877-78 (2017) (Breyer, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., dissenting) ("The claims in this suit would seem to fill the Bivens' bill. . . . It is true that the plaintiffs bring their 'deliberate indifference' claim against Warden Hasty under the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause, not the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause, as in Carlson. But that is because the latter applies to convicted criminals while the former applies to pretrial and immigration detainees. Where the harm is the same, where this Court has held that both the Fifth and Eighth Amendments give rise to Bivens' remedies, and where the only difference in constitutional scope consists of a circumstance (the absence of a conviction) that makes the violation here worse, it cannot be maintained that the difference between the use of the two Amendments is 'fundamental.'") Justices Sotomayor, Kagan, and Gorsuch took no part in the decision.

Note that the following cases, some of which present Bivens Claims, are Pre-Ziglar Cases:

Mack v. Warden Loretto FCI, 839 F.3d 286, 304-05 (3d Cir. 2016) ("Next, we address Mack's claim that the prison officers' anti-Muslim conduct violated his First Amendment right to freely exercise his religion. . . Mack seeks only monetary relief, asserting that he has an implied right of action for damages pursuant to Bivens. But neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has ever extended Bivens to Free Exercise claims. In view of RFRA's broad protections for religious liberty, we decline to do so here. . . The Supreme Court in Wilkie v. Robbins . . . set forth a two-part framework for considering whether to extend Bivens to new contexts. First, we ask whether there is an alternative remedial scheme available to the plaintiff and, if so, whether the existing scheme 'convinc[es]' us to refrain from providing a new, freestanding damages remedy. . . If not, then we consider whether 'special factors' counsel hesitation in creating a new cause of action for damages. . . 'Special factors' typically relate to the question of who should decide whether and how a remedy should be provided. . . . [A]s we have explained, RFRA provides claimants with all 'appropriate relief' for such violations. Given this alternative remedial scheme, we can conceive no adequate justification for extending Bivens to Free Exercise claims. We will therefore affirm the District Court's dismissal of Mack's Free Exercise claim."); Koprowski v. Baker, 822 F.3d 248, 250-52, 257-58 (6th Cir. 2016) ("The Supreme Court has consistently reaffirmed its holding in Carlson v. Green . . . that federal prisoners may bring Bivens claims under the Eighth Amendment against federal prison officials. Joining the three other circuits [7th, 9th, and 10th] to have considered this issue, we conclude that the IACA [Inmate Accident Compensation Act] does not displace such an action simply because the alleged Eighth Amendment violation occurred in the context of the prisoner's employment. . . . The Supreme Court has not expressly addressed whether the IACA is meant to exclude a prisoner's ability to seek money damages from a prison official for a constitutional tort like the one claimed by Koprowski. Three other circuits have addressed the question, . . . and each of them has come out the same way: The IACA does not displace an Eighth Amendment Bivens claim. . . . We agree and hold that the IACA does not displace Koprowski's Eighth Amendment Bivens claim. . . .In Carlson, the Supreme Court explicitly found that no special factors suggested that an Eighth Amendment Bivens remedy would be inappropriate. . . First, federal prison officials 'do not enjoy such independent status in our constitutional scheme as to suggest that judicially created remedies against them might be inappropriate.'. . Second, qualified immunity protects federal prison officials such that the availability of a Bivens remedy would not overly interfere with their ability to do their jobs. . .The defendants want to re-litigate the second point, but Carlson has already closed the door on their arguments. Even though subjecting prison officials to personal liability through Bivens suits 'might inhibit' prison officials in 'their efforts to perform their official duties,' qualified immunity 'provides adequate protection.'. . The Supreme Court's conclusion has become even more pertinent over time because the qualified-immunity doctrine has expanded to give more protection to government officers . . . Furthermore, the defendants have not presented any evidence of their concerns actually manifesting themselves in the three circuits that already allow Bivens suits despite the existence of the IACA. In sum, the defendants have not put forth any new special factors for us to consider. And we find no special factors that require us to preclude Bivens relief here. . . . The dissent looks at this case from the opposite direction. It presumes no Bivens remedy is available despite Carlson, and then asks whether we should create one, with a heavy presumption against doing so. But only the Supreme Court may overrule its own precedents, and we are bound by its decision 'until such time as the Court informs [us] that [we] are not.'. . Although some of Carlson's analytical framework has been altered by later decisions, its core holding allowing just this sort of suit binds us."); Alvarez v. U.S. Immigration & Customs Enf't, 818 F.3d 1194, 1206-09 & n.6 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Although we have never explicitly considered whether to imply a Bivens remedy in the immigration context, two of our sister circuits have counseled against it, concluding both that the Immigration and Nationality Act provides an adequate alternative remedy and that, even if it didn't, special factors counsel in favor of hesitation. . . . We too hold that a plaintiff cannot recover damages under Bivens for constitutional violations that caused him to endure a prolonged immigration detention. . . . We need not, and do not, decide whether a Bivens remedy would be available in cases of physical abuse, . . .or punitive confinement conditions, Turkmen v. Hasty, 789 F.3d 218, 235–37 (2d Cir.2015). Alvarez does not allege that he was mistreated during his detention, and thus we have no occasion to grapple with the unique issues that these types of allegations could present. . . Congress has provided for a host of review procedures tailored to the differently situated groups of aliens that may be present in the United States. The Act sets out numerous avenues for aliens to obtain review of ICE decisions by an immigration judge or federal court, as well as opportunities for aliens to seek discretionary relief. . . .Additionally, the Supreme Court has made it abundantly clear that a detained alien can seek a petition for a writ of habeas corpus to challenge his detention in the event that the statute's review procedures are insufficiently protective. . . . [T]he complexity of the Immigration and Nationality Act, and Congress's frequent amendments to it, suggest that no Bivens remedy is warranted."); Meshal v. Higgenbotham, 804 F.3d 417, 418, 424-27, 429 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("Faced with a shifting paradigm in which counterterrorism and criminal investigation merge, we rely on a familiar framework in an unconventional context. No court has countenanced a Bivens action in a case involving the national security and foreign policy context. And, while Bivens remedies for ill-executed criminal investigations are common, extraterritorial application is virtually unknown. We hold that in this particular new setting—where the agents' actions took place during a terrorism investigation and those actions occurred overseas—special factors counsel hesitation in recognizing a Bivens action for money damages. . . . To our knowledge, no court has previously extended Bivens to cases involving either the extraterritorial application of constitutional protections. . . or in the national security domain, let alone a case implicating both—another signal that this context is a novel one. . . .Two special factors are present in this case. . . .First, special factors counseling hesitation have foreclosed Bivens remedies in cases 'involving the military, national security, or intelligence.'. . Second, the Supreme Court has never 'created or even favorably mentioned a non-statutory right of action for damages on account of conduct that occurred outside the borders of the United States.'. . . At no point has the Supreme Court intimated that citizenship trumps other special factors counseling hesitation in creating a Bivens remedy. . . .If people like Meshal are to have recourse to damages for alleged constitutional violations committed during a terrorism investigation occurring abroad, either Congress or the Supreme Court must specify the scope of the remedy."); Klay v. Panetta, 758 F.3d 369, 372, 373, 377 (D.C. Cir. 2014) ("[W]hile Bivens could have ushered in a new era of broad constitutional tort liability, history has taken a different course. Only twice has the Supreme Court approved the application of Bivens's reasoning to new classes of cases, and never in the past thirty years. See Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 228, 230–31, 234 (1979) (congressional employee's employment discrimination claim under the Fifth Amendment); Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14, 18–23 (1980) (prisoner's cruel and unusual punishment claim against prison officials under the Eighth Amendment). In numerous other cases, by contrast, the Court has found extension of Bivens unwarranted, see Minneci v. Pollard, 132 S.Ct. 617, 622–23 (2012) (collecting cases), expressing its 'reluctan[ce] to extend Bivens liability to "to any new context or new category of defendants,"' Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1948 (2009) (quoting Corr. Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 68 (2001)); see also Wilkie v. Robbins, 551 U.S. 537, 550 (2007) (noting that "in most instances we have found a Bivens remedy unjustified"). This unwillingness to extend Bivens derives from the Court's shift toward disfavoring judicially implied causes of action generally. . . .Given that Congress is extensively engaged with the problem of sexual assault in the military but has chosen not to create such a cause of action, we decline to imply a Bivens remedy here, even in the face of plaintiffs' allegations of statutory violations. . . .We therefore join the Fourth Circuit in concluding that no Bivens remedy is available here. See Cioca v. Rumsfeld, 720 F.3d 505 (4th Cir.2013)."); Davis v. Billington, 681 F.3d 377, 388-90 (D.C. Cir. 2012) (Rogers, J., dissenting) ("From the unremarkable fact that Congress was aware that it was not including employees of the Legislative Branch in the remedial provisions of the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978 ('CSRA'). . . the court concludes that 'Congress consciously, "not inadvertently" omitted remedies' for Library of Congress employees, and thus the CSRA precludes a Bivens [footnote omitted] remedy for Col. Morris D. Davis. . . The premise of the court's holding is that when Congress enacts a remedial scheme for a specific group of claimants, it is making a conscious decision not to enact a remedial scheme for other claimants, regardless of how far beyond the intended scope of the enacted scheme those other claimants are, and even in the absence of any evidence demonstrating Congress chose to exclude them because it did not want them to have a remedy at all. There is no limiting principle to this theory, and in adopting it, the court allows the 'special factor' exception to swallow the rule. The Supreme Court has not gone so far, see Minneci v. Pollard, 132 S.Ct. 617 (2012); nor should we. . . . The court views the fact that Library of Congress employees are excluded from the CSRA's remedial scheme for personnel actions . . . as evidence that Congress intentionally withheld a remedy from them, and thus the CSRA constitutes a 'special factor' precluding a Bivens action for

Davis. . . Although the exclusion of Library employees is dispositive in this case, it demands the opposite result. . . . No evidence suggests that Congress intended anything about what remedies should be available to Library employees when it enacted the CSRA; it was addressing the altogether different question of how to provide a fair system for adjudicating remedial claims within the Executive Branch civil service. That Library employees are in the 'excepted service' as a matter of vernacular convenience adds nothing to the analysis. Congress did not view itself as legislating on what remedies should be available to Library employees when it enacted the CSRA and it is thus irrelevant to the 'special factors' analysis.")

See also Robles v. Kane, No. 12–14314, 2013 WL 6671556, *3, *4 (11th Cir. Dec. 19, 2013) (not published) ("Robles argues that the defendants violated his First Amendment right to confidential communication with his attorney. Because the Facility is a privately run prison, Robles cannot have a viable claim for relief unless we recognize a Bivens cause of action against it. . . We may do so only if: (1) there are no adequate alternative remedies under state or federal law, and (2) no 'special factors' counsel against implying a cause of action here. . . Robles' claim flounders on the first criterion. . . .We base our conclusion largely on the fact that Robles' constitutional claim would, if successful, entitle him only to nominal damages. Prisoners like Robles—who claim interference with their legal mail but no actual injury—can receive only nominal damages. . . That sets a very low bar for Georgia tort law to provide 'roughly similar incentives' and 'roughly similar compensation.' Minneci, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. at 625. Georgia law clears that bar by providing several causes of action for prisoners like Robles. [discussing Georgia tort claims available] Both Georgia law torts are arguably better remedies than a Bivens claim would be because they would allow Robles to seek compensatory and punitive damages, as well as 'apply principles of respondeat superior and thereby obtain recovery from a defendant's potentially deep-pocketed employer.' Minneci, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. at 625. At the least, the two Georgia law torts provide roughly similar incentives and compensation to a Bivens claim. For that reason, we decline to recognize a Bivens cause of action under these circumstances."); Ingram v. Faruque, 728 F.3d 1239 (10th Cir. 2013) (VA (Veterans Affairs) immunity statute provided an exclusive remedy for intentional torts arising in the context of VA health care employees providing medical care or treatment, thus precluding the creation of a remedy under Bivens); Flores v. U.S., 689 F.3d 894, 902, 903 (8th Cir. 2012) ("In recommending that summary judgment be granted to the APS defendants on plaintiffs' Bivens claim, the magistrate judge addressed 'whether decedent's representatives may pursue a Bivens action against a private physician employed by a private corporation that has contracted with the government to provide medical services to prison inmates.'. . The magistrate judge considered the circuit split on the issue, noting that this circuit had not yet addressed the question, and concluded that 'a Bivens action should not extend to private employees of federal prisons where state tort law already provides a remedy.'. .The magistrate judge concluded that alternative remedies were available to plaintiffs in the form of state tort law and that a Bivens action should not be allowed. After final judgment was entered, the Supreme Court resolved the circuit split in Minneci v. Pollard, 132 S.Ct. 617 (2012). The Court held that it could not 'imply the existence of an Eighth Amendment-based damages action (a Bivens action) against employees of a privately operated federal prison' because 'state tort law authorizes adequate alternative damages actions [.]'. . In light of the holding in Minneci, plaintiffs cannot maintain a Bivens action against Dr. Salmi and APS—a private citizen and a private corporation—because Minnesota law provides adequate alternative tort actions, including a wrongful death claim based on medical malpractice."); El-Hanafi v. United States, 1:13-CV-2072-GHW, 2014 WL 4199643, *4 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 22, 2014) ("As in Minneci, El–Hanafi brings claims against the employees of a private company for the negligent provision of medical care in violation of the Eighth Amendment. Because Minneci foreclosed a Bivens remedy in precisely this type of situation, El–Hanafi's claims are barred. While the Supreme Court in Minecci left open the possibility that some constitutional claims might not have a state tort law analogue, and that the court might therefore have to decide whether to imply a Bivens action 'when and if such a case arises,' 132 S.Ct. at 626, this is not such a case. The Supreme Court in Minneci was clear that 'state tort law remedies provide roughly similar incentives for potential defendants to comply with the Eighth Amendment while also providing roughly similar compensation to victims of violations,' thereby foreclosing a Bivens remedy for a federal prisoner seeking damages from a private employee, 'where the conduct allegedly amounts to a violation of the Eighth Amendment, and where that conduct is of a kind that typically falls within the scope of traditional state tort law (such as the conduct involving improper medical care at issue here) ...'. . . In this case, there is no question that analogous state law remedies do exist; El–Hanafi brings state law claims founded on the same negligent acts in this very action. El–Hanafi attempts to distinguish Minneci by arguing that the plaintiff there was an inmate at a privately-operated prison, while El–Hanafi was incarcerated at a state facility that contracted with the federal government. . . The Court does not believe that this distinction should trigger a departure from Minneci. In fact, CCS and Conmed assert that their contracts were actually with a local entity—the City of Alexandria—which in turn contracted with the federal government, . . . a claim which El–Hanafi does not dispute. Thus, defendants are, if anything, potentially even further removed from the federal government than the defendant in Minneci, a fact that would counsel in favor of, not against, foreclosing a Bivens remedy. . . Accordingly, because El–Hanafi's Eighth Amendment claims against the individual employees of Conmed and CCS staff are clearly premised on the improper provision of medical care, precisely the type of conduct that 'typically falls within the scope of traditional state tort law' and therefore cannot be the basis of a Bivens action, . . . El–Hanafi's Bivens claim against the individuals employed by Conmed and CCS employees is dismissed."); Espinoza v. Zenk, No. 10–CV–427 (MKB), 2013 WL 1232208, *8-*10 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 27, 2013) ("The holding of Minneci only specifically bars Eighth Amendment claims. For non Eighth Amendment Bivens claims against employees of private prisons, federal courts have declined to find them barred and decided them on the merits. See, e.g., Shan Wei Yu v. NEOCC, No. 12–CV–0507, 2012 WL 6705857, at *3 (N.D. Ohio Dec.26, 2012) (stating that "[w]hile Minneci clearly bars Eighth Amendment claims against individual employees of a private prison, it remains unclear whether Fourteenth Amendment claims" are barred and therefore deciding the Fourteenth Amendment equal protection claim on the merits); Govereh v. Pugh, No. 12–CV–697, 2012 WL 3683541, at *2 (N.D. Ohio Aug.22, 2012) (declining to find that the plaintiff's First Amendment claim was barred and deciding them on it on the merits ((collecting cases)); Murray v. Corr. Corp. of Am., No. 11–CV–2210, 2012 WL 2798759, at *2 (D. Ariz. July 9, 2012) (finding that "Eighth Amendment claims are no longer cognizable under Bivens" but allowing the First Amendment claims to proceed on the merits); McKaney v. Keeton, No. 12–CV–148, 2012 WL 1718056, at *3 (D. Ariz. May 15, 2012) ("While Minneci bars Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment claims against individual employees of a private prison, it remains unclear whether Plaintiff's First Amendment claims are of the type which fall within the scope of traditional tort law."). Cf. Baker v. Bannum Place of Saginaw, LLC, No. 09–CV–10360, 2012 WL 3930122, at *7 (E.D. Mich. Sept.10, 2012) ("While Minneci definitively bars Eighth Amendment claims against individual employees of a private prison, it is still unclear as to whether other constitutional claims, such as those under the First or Fifth Amendment, are of the type that fall within traditional tort law. Accordingly, the Court will consider Plaintiff's First Amendment claims on their merits."). . . . .A few courts have read Minneci expansively and found that it bars all claims against employees of private prisons. See, e.g ., Vega v. United States, No. 11–CV–632, 2012 WL 5384735, at *2 (W.D. Wash. Nov. 1, 2012) (dismissing Eighth, First, Fourth and Fifth Amendment claims "[b]ecause Minneci clarified that private employees acting under color of federal law cannot be held liable under Bivens") [aff'd in part on other grounds, 724 F. App'x 536 (9th Cir. 2018)] ; Gapa v. Three Unknown Named Officers of GEO Group, No. 12–CT–3083, 2012 WL 3060376, at *2 (E.D.N.C. July 26, 2012) (holding that Minneci bars First Amendment retaliation claims); Robles v. Stine, No. 511–CV–109, 2012 WL 3000832, at *1 (S.D. Ga. July 23, 2012) (holding that Minneci bars both Eighth Amendment and First Amendment claims); Feldman v. Lyons, 852 F.Supp.2d 274, 279 (N.D.N.Y.2012) (holding that there could be no Bivens action against private individual after Minneci). However, the Court notes that if the Supreme Court intended to bar all Bivens claims against employees of private prisons, the Court would have stated so clearly. . . . In order to determine whether Bivens applies to the case at bar, this Court must consider whether there are adequate state law remedies for Plaintiff's claims against the MVCC Defendants and whether any special factors counsel against applying Bivens.") [Court goes on to conclude that intentional infliction of emotional distress and false imprisonment are not adequate alternative state law remedies to Plaintiff's Fifth Amendment and First Amendment claims based on his placement in the SHU.]; Camp v. Richardson, No. 11–3128–SAC, 2014 WL 958741, *2 (D. Kan. Mar. 11, 2014) ("Mr. Camp attempts to avoid Minneci by 'reiterate(ing) his position' that defendants were federal actors. His position remains based upon his having witnessed 'employees of CCA' wearing pins resembling badges worn by U.S. Marshals and the display within the CCA of murals of the United States Marshal Service and the United States Department of Justice next to the CCA company logo. He argued in his Exhibit One that defendants were federal actors because there was a direct link between the CCA and the federal Government and the private parties were performing a government function. These allegations do not convince the court that the privately employed defendants at the CCA–Leavenworth may be sued as federal actors. The Supreme Court found in Minneci that where a federal prisoner seeks damages from personnel employed by a private firm, and not the government, that 'fact—of employment status—makes a critical difference.'"); Dorsey v. Tripp, No. 5:13–CT–3171–D, 2014 WL 630851, *1 (E.D.N.C. Feb. 18, 2014) ("Rivers is 'a privately run facility in North Carolina operated by the GEO Group, Inc. under contract with the federal Bureau of Prisons.' Holly v. Scott, 434 F.3d 287, 288 (4th Cir.2006). As this court noted in 2008, 'courts in this district have repeatedly held, and the Fourth Circuit has agreed, that private individuals who work as employees for [privately-operated prisons] are not subject to liability under Bivens.' Holly v. Christensen, No. 5:07–CT–3134–D, 2008 WL 956722, at *4 (E.D.N.C. Apr. 8, 2008) (unpublished) (collecting cases). The Supreme Court's decision in Minneci v. Pollard, 132 S.Ct. 617, 623–26 (2012), confirmed this court's observation. Thus, Dorsey's constitutional claim against Warden Tripp is frivolous."); Pinet v. Zickefoose, No. 10–2347 (NLH), 2013 WL 6734241, *8 (D.N.J. Dec. 19, 2013) ([Relying on Minneci, court held that] Plaintiff cannot proceed against the St. Francis Defendants, for alleged inadequate medical care, under a Bivens theory."); Flores v. Rodriguez, No. 4:13cv1460, 2013 WL 6731788, *3 (N.D. Ohio Dec. 19, 2013) ("Plaintiff asserts claims for 'false accusation, harassment, detriment of character .... wrong doing, injuries, liability, fraud, wrongful termination, medical malpractice, violation Due Process, violation of Fourteenth Amendment, misapplication of statute, malicious prosecution, [and] lack of jurisdiction.' ECF No. 1 at 3–4. Most of these claims, with the exception of his due process claim, are already state law claims. His due process claim is based on a statement made by Rodriguez in the presence of other inmates which Plaintiff believes endangered his life. Traditional tort law addresses claims for placing another individual in harm's way if a duty is owed to that individual by the actor. Consequently, Plaintiff cannot proceed with his due process claim in a federal civil rights action against the employee of a private prison facility."); Oladokun v. Correctional Treatment Facility, No. 13–00358(RC), 2013 WL 6147940 (D.D.C. Nov. 22, 2013) ("Next, CAA argues that, as a private entity, no constitutional claims could be asserted against it. CCA's argument is based on cases and analysis presuming that plaintiff's claims are premised on a theory of liability under Bivens. . . But as set forth above, the Court interprets plaintiff's claims as being pursued against the District of Columbia and the contractor that operates its prison treatment facility as being brought pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Under these circumstances, courts have allowed claims against private prison operators like CCA. See, e.g., Smith v. Corrections Corp. of America, 674 F.Supp.2d 201 (D.D.C.2009); Gabriel v. Corrections Corp. of America, 211 F.Supp.2d 132 (D.D.C.2002). As such, CCA's argument fails."); Cox v. Cunningham, No. 11–3215–SAC, 2013 WL 6094232, *2 (D. Kan. Nov. 19, 2013) ("In Minneci v. Pollard, 132 S.Ct. 617 (2012), the Supreme Court refused to extend a Bivens remedy to a federal prisoner seeking damages from privately employed personnel working at a privately operated federal prison for the alleged denial of adequate medical care in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . Plaintiff's argument that he was confined at CCA–LVN as a pretrial detainee presumed innocent of the federal charges against him, and not as a convicted prisoner as in Minneci, is a distinction that lacks persuasive legal force."); Baumann v. Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, No. 12–cv–01310–CMA–MEH, 2013 WL 4757264, 1 n.3 (D. Colo. Sept. 3, 2013) ("To be sure, the Court recognizes that Plaintiff may have contemplated bringing his constitutional claims against the FRLEOs under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Federal Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), which permits a claim for damages arising out of constitutional violations attributable to federal action. However, courts are divided as to when Bivens suits are tenable against private individuals acting under color of federal law. [collecting cases] Notwithstanding the ongoing dispute over the reach of Minneci, or the apparent inequity in allowing § 1983 claims against private parties acting under color of state law but prohibiting Bivens claims against the same parties acting under color of federal law, the Supreme Court's reasoning in Minneci seems to apply here, where state tort law appears to provide an 'alternative, existing process' capable of protecting the constitutional interests at stake. . . A remedy for Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim can be found in the tort of false imprisonment. . . Likewise, his claim for outrageous conduct can provide relief for the deprivation he asserts under his Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim. . . The Court presumes that for these reasons Plaintiff did not pursue an alternative argument under Bivens."); Doe v. Rumsfeld, 683 F.3d 390 (D.C. Cir. 2012) (refusing to imply a Bivens remedy on behalf of a United States citizen, an employee of an American-owned defense contracting firm, who alleged he was imprisoned at Camp Cropper for nine months, subjected to harsh treatment and ultimately never charged with a crime); Lebron v. Rumsfeld, 670 F.3d 540, 547, 548, 550-56 (4th Cir. 2012), cert. denied, 132 S. Ct. 2751 (2012) ("The designations of persons and groups as special threats to national security may be subject to a variety of checks and to habeas corpus proceedings. But they are not reviewable by the judiciary by means of implied civil actions for money damages. . . . We do not require congressional action before recognizing a Bivens claim, as that would be contrary to Bivens itself. We will, however, refuse to imply a Bivens remedy where, as in this case, Congress's pronouncements in the relevant context signal that it would not support such a damages claim. . . .Special factors do counsel judicial hesitation in implying causes of action for enemy combatants held in military detention. First, the Constitution delegates authority over military affairs to Congress and to the President as Commander in Chief. It contemplates no comparable role for the judiciary. Second, judicial review of military decisions would stray from the traditional subjects of judicial competence. Litigation of the sort proposed thus risks impingement on explicit constitutional assignments of responsibility to the coordinate branches of our government. Together, the grant of affirmative powers to Congress and the Executive in the first two Articles of our founding document suggest some measure of caution on the part of the Third Branch. . . .To the extent the Constitution may require these defendants to justify in court who is and is not an enemy combatant, it does so in the very different context of habeas corpus proceedings, . . . proceedings that Padilla took full advantage of up until his transfer to civilian custody. . . . In short, Padilla's complaint seeks quite candidly to have the judiciary review and disapprove sensitive military decisions made after extensive deliberations within the executive branch as to what the law permitted, what national security required, and how best to reconcile competing values. It takes little enough imagination to understand that a judicially devised damages action would expose past executive deliberations affecting sensitive matters of national security to the prospect of searching judicial scrutiny. It would affect future discussions as well, shadowed as they might be by the thought that those involved would face prolonged civil litigation and potential personal liability. Of course Congress may decide that providing a damages remedy to enemy combatants would serve to promote a desirable accountability on the part of officials involved in decisions of the kind described above. But to date Congress has made no such decision. This was not through inadvertence. Congress was no idle bystander to this debate. Indeed, it devoted extensive attention to the precise questions Padilla presents pertaining to the treatment of detainees and to the legitimacy of interrogation measures, see, e.g., Military Commissions Act of 2009, Pub.L. 111–84, 123 Stat. 2190; Military Commissions Act of 2006, Pub.L. 109–366, 120 Stat. 2600; Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, Pub.L. 109–148, 119 Stat. 2739. . . .This is a case in which the political branches, exercising powers explicitly assigned them by our Constitution, formulated policies with profound implications for national security. One may agree or not agree with those policies. One may debate whether they were or were not the most effective counterterrorism strategy. But the forum for such debates is not the civil cause of action pressed in the case at bar. The fact that Padilla disagrees with policies allegedly formulated or actions allegedly taken does not entitle him to demand the blunt deterrent of money damages under Bivens to promote a different outcome. Being judicial requires that we be judicious, and adherence to our constitutional role in this area requires that we await 'affirmative action by Congress.' Put simply, creating a cause of action here is 'more appropriately for those who write the laws, rather than for those who interpret them.'. . . Even a cursory survey thus suffices to illustrate that when Congress deems it necessary for the courts to become involved in sensitive matters, such as those involving enemy terrorists, it enacts careful statutory guidelines to ensure that litigation does not come at the expense of national security concerns. Such circumscribed grants and detailed directions as those set forth above stand in stark contrast to the unencumbered discretion that Padilla would invite all Article III courts across this country to exercise. Padilla responds that such constructs as qualified immunity and the state secrets privilege should suffice to allay these concerns. . . . But the litigation of such matters still presents the potential of diverting 'efforts and attention' from the primary obligations of officials entrusted with the sober responsibilities of protecting the lives and safety of American citizens. . . Moreover, courts have developed these doctrines to prevent unintended adverse effects on national security from already-established causes of action. . . Here, by contrast, Padilla asks for a new Bivens cause of action, and the Supreme Court has instructed us to consider any aspect of that claim that would cause us to hesitate before entertaining suit. . . We need not await the formal invocation of doctrines such as qualified immunity or state secrets to say that the prospect of adverse collateral consequences confirms our view that Congress rather than the courts should decide whether a constitutional claim should be recognized in these circumstances. . .The factors counseling hesitation are many. We have canvassed them in some detail, but only to make a limited point: not that such litigation is categorically forbidden by the Constitution, but that courts should not proceed down this highly problematic road in the absence of affirmative action by Congress. If Congress were to create a damages remedy here, we would trust that the legislative process gave due consideration to the broader policy implications that we as judges are neither authorized nor well-positioned to balance on our own. . .Before recognizing a Bivens action, courts must not only consider special factors that would counsel hesitation, but also 'whether any alternative, existing process for protecting the interest amounts to a convincing reason for the Judicial Branch to refrain from providing a new and freestanding remedy in damages.'. . Here, Padilla had extensive opportunities to challenge the legal basis for his detention. Padilla challenged his military detention in habeas corpus proceedings before five different courts. In adjudications on the merits before district courts in the Southern District of New York and the District of South Carolina, and on appeals to the Second Circuit and to this court, Padilla was able to present essentially the same arguments that he makes here about the legality of militarily detaining a U.S. citizen. . . Padilla pursued those claims up until the very moment that they were mooted by his transfer into civilian custody. And if Padilla is again detained by the military, he could presumably avail himself further of whatever 'adequate and effective substitute for habeas corpus' is in use for detainees at that time. . . With respect to Padilla's claims arising from his enemy combatant designation, this is not a case of 'damages or nothing.'. . The Supreme Court has warned that 'the full protections that accompany challenges to detentions in other settings may prove unworkable and inappropriate in the enemy-combatant setting.'. .. Because we conclude that Padilla's Bivens action cannot be maintained, we need not reach the questions of whether the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity or whether Padilla has pleaded his claim with adequate specificity."); Chen Chao v. Holder, No. 10–CV–2432 (RRM)(LB), 2013 WL 4458998, *3-*7 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 16, 2013) ("In two cases, the Supreme Court has considered whether to extend a Bivens remedy to a plaintiff in the privately run prison context. Both times it has declined to do so. [discussing Malesko and Minneci] Here, Chen asserts a number of constitutional claims against Gaston, an Ahtna employee, related to his detention at the Varick Street Detention Facility. Defendants argue that because Gaston is a private employee, Chen's constitutional claims against her should be dismissed under Minneci since Chen has alternative remedies under New York law. . . .Because the Court agrees with defendants, the Court declines to imply a Bivens remedy against Gaston and dismisses the constitutional claims. . . .Defendants argue that Chen's claims against Ahtna, a private corporation, are barred under Malesko and that, in any event, Bivens should not be extended here since alternative remedies exist under state law. . . The Court agrees. As in Malesko, implying a Bivens action against Ahtna would not advance Bivens' core purpose of deterring individual officers from engaging in constitutional wrongdoing. Furthermore, Chen has available alternative remedies under New York law against Ahnta. In particular, an employer is vicariously liable for the tortious acts of its employees under a theory of respondeat superior if those acts were committed in the furtherance of the employer's business and within the scope of employment. . .Thus, Chen could hold Ahtna liable if it could prove that Gaston was negligent in failing to protect him from Huang's attack and that she was negligent while acting within the scope of her employment."); Kinningham v. Adwell, 1:12-CV-00439-JMC, 2013 WL 4041888, *4 (D.S.C. Aug. 8, 2013) ("In holding that the plaintiff could not maintain a Bivens suit against employees of the privately-operated prison, the Minneci Court distinguished the case from a claim of constitutional violations by employees of the federal government. . . The Court also found that the plaintiff had adequate state-law remedies to protect the constitutional interests at issue. . . .Here, Plaintiff does not dispute that he also has available state-law remedies. . . Additionally, while Minneci only applied to employees of privately-operated prisons, the reasoning of Minneci appears equally applicable to defendant GEO in this case. Therefore, the undersigned recommends the district judge decline to extend Bivens to create liability for a private corporation operating a prison and grant Defendants summary judgment."); Bonilla v. Corrections Corp. of America, No. 4:11CV1349, 2012 WL 263378, at *3 (N.D. Ohio Jan. 27, 2012) ("Similar to the plaintiff in Minneci, Plaintiff herein is a federal prisoner seeking damages from privately employed personnel working at a privately operated federal prison for alleged Eighth Amendment violations that would typically fall within the scope of traditional Ohio state tort law. Accordingly, Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment Bivens claim against Defendant Rupeka in his individual capacity fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted and is, therefore, dismissed pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e).").

See also Maggio v. Shelton, No. 2:14-CV-01682-SI, 2015 WL 5126567, at *7 n.5 (D. Or. Sept. 1, 2015) ("Dr. Anderson also relies on this Court's opinion in Lantis v. Marion Cnty., 2014

WL 1910960, at *1 (D.Or. May 13, 2014). Lantis interpreted the Supreme Court's decision in Minneci v. Pollard, 132 S.Ct. 617 (2012), as foreclosing the proposition that a private physician providing medical services to inmates at a county jail could be held liable under Section 1983. Upon further consideration and review of Minneci and subsequent cases, the Court finds Minneci is not applicable to Section 1983 cases. In Minneci, the Supreme Court declined to extend Bivens v. Six Unknown Fed. Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), to find an implied cause of action under the Eighth Amendment against employees of a private company that operated a federal prison facility. Minneci considered when the judicial branch should recognize an implied cause of action under Bivens. It is not relevant to Section 1983 cases, where Congress has already created a cause of action. After Minneci, courts continue to recognize the validity of Section 1983 claims against private medical service providers. [collecting cases]")

The Ninth Circuit in Pollard had also held that the private prison employees acted under color of federal law. That holding was not reviewed by the Supreme Court. 132 S. Ct. at 627 n.* (Ginsburg, J., dissenting). Compare Pollard v. Geo Group, Inc., 629 F.3d 843, 854-58 (9th Cir. 2010), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. Minneci v. Pollard, 132 S. Ct. 617 (2012) ("[T]he threshold question presented here is whether the GEO employees can be considered federal agents acting under color of federal law in their professional capacities. We conclude that they can. . . . We note at the outset that the one federal court of appeal to have directly addressed the question–the Fourth Circuit–has held that employees of private corporations operating federal prisons are not federal actors for purposes of Bivens. Neither the Supreme Court nor our court has squarely addressed whether employees of a private corporation operating a prison under contract with the federal government act under color of federal law. That said, we have held that private defendants can be sued under Bivens if they engage in federal action. . . . In our view, there is no principled basis to distinguish the activities of the GEO employees in this case from the governmental action identified in West. Pollard could seek medical care only from the GEO employees and any other private physicians GEO employed. If those employees demonstrated deliberate indifference to Pollard's serious medical needs, the resulting deprivation was caused, in the sense relevant for the federal-action inquiry, by the federal government's exercise of its power to punish Pollard by incarceration and to deny him a venue independent of the federal government to obtain needed medical care. On this point, West is clear. . . . The relevant function here is not prison management, but rather incarceration of prisoners, which of course has traditionally been the State's 'exclusive prerogative.'. . .Likewise, in the § 1983 context, our sister circuits have routinely recognized that imprisonment is a fundamentally public function, regardless of the entity managing the prison. . . . In accord with West and other federal courts of appeal, we hold that there is but one function at issue here: the government's power to incarcerate those who have been convicted of criminal offenses. We decline to artificially parse that power into its constituent parts–confinement, provision of food and medical care, protection of inmate safety, etc.–as that would ignore that those functions all derive from a single public function that is the sole province of the government: 'enforcement of state-imposed deprivation of liberty.'. .Because that function is 'traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the [government],' it satisfies the 'public function' test under Rendell-Baker.") and Holly v. Scott, 434 F.3d 287, 297, 300, 301(4th Cir. 2006) (Motz, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The majority's holding that private correctional employees are not governmental actors ignores or misreads controlling Supreme Court case law. Those cases, as well as numerous cases from other federal courts, establish that individual private correctional providers are government actors subject to liability as such. Accordingly, I cannot join the majority opinion. However, because Ricky Holly possesses an alternative remedy for his alleged injuries, no action under Bivens . . . lies in this case. For that reason alone, I concur in the judgment. . . . In this case, the government has delegated its authority to the privately employed defendants, empowering them to incarcerate, to confine, to discipline, to feed, and to provide medical and other care to inmates who are imprisoned by order of the federal government. The defendants are acting as agents of the government; their actions are thus clearly attributable to the federal government, and a prisoner must be able to seek redress from the defendants if they cause him constitutional injury. Therefore, if Holly had no alternative remedy for the alleged deprivation of his constitutional rights, it seems to me that he could certainly bring a Bivens action against these defendants. . . . The fact is that, at least in this country, incarceration of those charged with committing crimes is, and always has been, the province and prerogative of the government. That historically immunity has not been afforded those performing some correctional duties demonstrates only that the government has delegated some of its correctional functions to private actors. . . These correctional functions have not been 'exclusively public,' . . . only in the sense that private individuals have long been empowered by the government to fulfill the tasks involved in the fundamentally governmental function of incarceration of criminals. But this government delegation of some duties to private persons or entities does not change the public character of the underlying function performed by 'private correctional providers,' as the Court recognized in Malesko . . . Indeed, in Richardson itself, the Court recognized that its historical discussion did not apply to questions of governmental action. After concluding that the defendants lacked qualified immunity, the Richardson Court remanded for a determination of whether the defendants were, in fact, liable as governmental actors for their operation, confinement, and care of inmates. . . If the Court's historical analysis of 'public function' for immunity purposes were meant to control the 'public function' determination for liability purposes–as the majority holds today–the Court would not have needed to remand the case at all. . . . In holding to the contrary, the majority disregards all of this authority and creates a circuit split. Indeed, like the en banc majority in West, the majority's view stands alone among the federal circuits addressing this point. [citing cases] Even more disturbingly, the majority, again like the en banc majority in West, misreads and misunderstands Supreme Court precedent. Pursuant to that precedent, the defendants here were clearly exercising authority fairly attributable to the government and so are government actors for liability purposes.") with Holly v. Scott, 434 F.3d 287, 288 (4th Cir. 2006) (actions of private prison employees not fairly attributable to federal government).

See also Schneider v. Donald, 2006 WL 1344587, at *7, *8 (S.D. Ga. May 12, 2006) ("While the Richardson Court did not address whether privately employed prison guards should be subject to lawsuit under Section 1983, other courts have held that employees of privately run prison facilities are subject to Section 1983 liability. [citing cases] The rationale used by these courts for finding private individuals subject to Section 1983 liability is that the privately run prisons perform 'a function which is traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the state.' . . A curious result follows. Employees of privately run prison facilities may be sued under Section 1983 because those prisons perform a function that courts deem the 'exclusive prerogative of the state.' Those same employees, however, may not claim qualified immunity because, according to the Supreme Court in Richardson, prison administration has never been an exclusively state function. The liability of employees of private prison facilities under Section 1983 becomes even more muddled when one considers the parallel universe of liability created by Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), which provides an avenue of recovery for constitutional violations caused by federal employees. Two courts have recently held that employees of privately run federal prison facilities are not subject to liability under Bivens. Holly v. Scott, 434 F.3d 287, 294 (4th Cir.2006); Peoples v. CCA Detention Centers, 422 F.3d 1090, 1108 (10th Cir.2005). In reaching its decision in Holly, the Fourth Circuit followed the Supreme Court's analysis in Richardson and found that prison administrators did not perform a traditionally 'public function.' . . . For prisoners, whereas their counterparts in federal private prison facilities may have no remedy at all in federal court for constitutional violations, and whereas their counterparts in state-run prison facilities must overcome the qualified immunity defense, prisoners in state private prison facilities may file under Section 1983 and not be concerned about the qualified immunity hurdle. The Court finds no reason for a prisoner in a state private facility to be in a more favorable position than his counterparts in state-run facilities or in federal facilities. The Court suggests that, to remedy this anomaly, the time has come for courts to revisit the liability of employees at state private prison facilities in light of the Supreme Court's analysis in Richardson. Defendants employed by CCA in this case, however, have not raised the issue of qualified immunity, and the Court accordingly will leave resolution of the issue for another day.").

See also Del Campo v. Kennedy, 517 F.3d 1070, 1072-74, 1080, 1081 & n.16 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Our question is whether a private company contracting with a district attorney for services related to a diversion program is entitled to state sovereign immunity. We decide that it is not. . . American Corrective Counseling Services ('ACCS'), a private corporation, contracted with the District Attorney for Santa Clara County, California, (the 'DA') to run a bad check diversion program. Its conduct of that program generated this litigation. . . . ACCS argued that it acted as an arm of the state when implementing the diversion program. As the court had 'determined that the diversion program in Santa Clara County is a county program and not a state program,' it held that 'ACCS's involvement in the diversion program cannot be a central function of the state government' and denied immunity. ACCS timely appealed the district court's immunity decision. . . . ACCS contends that it is entitled to state sovereign immunity, even though it is a private entity. . . . There is . . . no case of which we are aware in any circuit that would support granting state sovereign immunity to ACCS. . . The law makes clear that state sovereign immunity does not extend to private entities. . . . To be clear: Although we hold that private entities cannot be arms of the state, we emphatically do not hold that they cannot act under color of state law for the purposes of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and similar statutes."); Holly v. Scott, 434 F.3d 287, 292 n.3 (4th Cir. 2006) ("It is an open question in this circuit whether § 1983 imposes liability upon employees of a private prison facility under contract with a state. We need not decide that issue here.").

See also Gen. Steel Domestic Sales, L.L.C. v. Chumley, No. 15-1293, 2016 WL 6441028, at *3 (10th Cir. Nov. 1, 2016) ("There are three instances when courts may extend qualified immunity to private parties. First, if the private parties are 'closely supervised by the government.' Rosewood Servs., Inc. v. Sunflower Diversified Servs., Inc., 413 F.3d 1163, 1167 (10th Cir. 2005); see also DeVargas v. Mason & Hanger–Silas Mason Co., 844 F.2d 714, 722 (10th Cir. 1988). Second, if there is a historical basis for providing immunity to that type of private entity. Richardson v. McKnight, 521 U.S. 399, 404, 117 S.Ct. 2100, 138 L.Ed.2d 540 (1997). Third, if extending immunity implicates 'special policy concerns involved in suing government officials.' Wyatt, 504 U.S. at 167, 112 S.Ct. 1827. We need not delve into this analysis because this suit in no way involves the government, and Armstrong Steel has not identified a historical basis for providing private parties immunity from suit under the CDA [Communications Decency Act]."); Phillips v. Tiona, No. 12–1055, 2013 WL 239891, *15 (10th Cir. Jan. 23, 2013) (not published) ("In any event, while all these considerations bear somewhat on the problem, in the end we are still faced directly with a question of statutory interpretation: Is CCA a public entity? Is it an instrumentality of government in the same sense as a 'department, agency, or special purpose district'? We think not. In the absence of clarification on the point in the 2008 Amendments to the ADA or any of the regulations issued before or since, we agree with the reasoning of the Second Circuit in Green that the proper canon of construction to apply is noscitur a sociis (a word is known by the company it keeps), and that 'instrumentality' refers to a traditional government unit or one created by a government unit. Accordingly, we join the Eleventh Circuit and the overwhelming majority of other courts that have spoken directly on the issue, and hold that Title II of the ADA does not generally apply to private corporations that operate prisons. In particular, it does not apply to CCA with respect to the management of KCCC. And the complaint fails to state a claim against CCA upon which relief could be granted for an alleged violation of the ADA.")

5. Post-Ziglar v. Abbasi Cases

Supreme Court

Egbert v. Boule, 142 S. Ct. 1793, 1803-09 (2022) ("While our cases describe two steps, those steps often resolve to a single question: whether there is any reason to think that Congress might be better equipped to create a damages remedy. . . . Importantly, the relevant question is not whether a Bivens action would 'disrup[t]' a remedial scheme, . . . or whether the court 'should provide for a wrong that would otherwise go unredressed[.]' . . . Nor does it matter that 'existing remedies do not provide complete relief.'. . Rather, the court must ask only whether it, rather than the political branches, is better equipped to decide whether existing remedies 'should be augmented by the creation of a new judicial remedy.' Finally, our cases hold that a court may not fashion a Bivens remedy if Congress already has provided, or has authorized the Executive to provide, 'an alternative remedial structure.'. . .Applying the foregoing principles, the Court of Appeals plainly erred when it created causes of action for Boule's Fourth Amendment excessive-force claim and First Amendment retaliation claim. . . . While Bivens and this case do involve similar allegations of excessive force and thus arguably present 'almost parallel circumstances' or a similar 'mechanism of injury,'. . . these superficial similarities are not enough to support the judicial creation of a cause of action. The special-factors inquiry—which Bivens never meaningfully undertook, . . . shows here, no less than in Hernández, that the Judiciary is not undoubtedly better positioned than Congress to authorize a damages action in this national-security context. That this case does not involve a cross-border shooting, as in Hernández, but rather a more 'conventional' excessive-force claim, as in Bivens, does not bear on the relevant point. Either way, the Judiciary is comparatively ill suited to decide whether a damages remedy against any Border Patrol agent is appropriate. . . . As in Hernández, then, we ask here whether a court is competent to authorize a damages action not just against Agent Egbert but against Border Patrol agents generally. The answer, plainly, is no. . . . Second, Congress has provided alternative remedies for aggrieved parties in Boule's position that independently foreclose a Bivens action here. . . . Boule nonetheless contends that Border Patrol's grievance process is inadequate because he is not entitled to participate and has no right to judicial review of an adverse determination. . . But we have never held that a Bivens alternative must afford rights to participation or appeal. That is so because Bivens 'is concerned solely with deterring the unconstitutional acts of individual officers'—i.e., the focus is whether the Government has put in place safeguards to 'preven[t]' constitutional violations 'from recurring.'. . And, again, the question whether a given remedy is adequate is a legislative determination that must be left to Congress, not the federal courts. So long as Congress or the Executive has created a remedial process that it finds sufficient to secure an adequate level of deterrence, the courts cannot second-guess that calibration by superimposing a Bivens remedy. That is true even if a court independently concludes that the Government's procedures are 'not as effective as an individual damages remedy.'. . Thus here, as in Hernández, we have no warrant to doubt that the consideration of Boule's grievance against Agent Egbert secured adequate deterrence and afforded Boule an alternative remedy. . . We also conclude that there is no Bivens cause of action for Boule's First Amendment retaliation claim. While we have assumed that such a damages action might be available, see, e.g., Hartman v. Moore, 547 U. S. 250, 252 (2006), '[w]e have never held that Bivens extends to First Amendment claims[.] . . Because a new context arises when there is a new 'constitutional right at issue,'. . . the Court of Appeals correctly held that Boule's First Amendment claim presents a new Bivens context. . . Now presented with the question whether to extend Bivens to this context, we hold that there is no Bivens action for First Amendment retaliation. . . . In short, as we explained in Ziglar, a plaintiff cannot justify a Bivens extension based on 'parallel circumstances' with Bivens, Passman, or Carlson unless he also satisfies the 'analytic framework' prescribed by the last four decades of intervening case law. . . Boule has failed to do so. . . Since it was decided, Bivens has had no shortage of detractors. . . And, more recently, we have indicated that if we were called to decide Bivens today, we would decline to discover any implied causes of action in the Constitution. . . But, to decide the case before us, we need not reconsider Bivens itself. Accordingly, we reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals.")

Egbert v. Boule, 142 S. Ct. 1793, 1809-10 (2022) (Gorsuch, J., concurring in the judgment) ("Our Constitution's separation of powers prohibits federal courts from assuming legislative authority. As the Court today acknowledges, Bivens v. Six Unknown Fed. Narcotics Agents, 403 U. S. 388 (1971), crossed that line by 'impl[ying]' a new set of private rights and liabilities Congress never ordained. . . Recognizing its misstep, this Court has struggled for decades to find its way back. Initially, the Court told lower courts to follow a 'two ste[p]' inquiry before applying Bivens to any new situation. . . At the first step, a court had to ask whether the case before it presented a 'new context' meaningfully different from Bivens. . . At the second, a court had to consider whether '"special factors"' counseled hesitation before recognizing a new cause of action. . . But these tests soon produced their own set of questions: What distinguishes the first step from the second? What makes a context 'new' or a factor 'special'? And, most fundamentally, on what authority may courts recognize new causes of action even under these standards? Today, the Court helpfully answers some of these lingering questions. It recognizes that our two-step inquiry really boils down to a 'single question': Is there 'any reason to think Congress might be better equipped' than a court to '"weigh the costs and benefits of allowing a damages action to proceed"'? . . . But, respectfully, resolving that much only serves to highlight the larger remaining question: When might a court ever be 'better equipped' than the people's elected representatives to weigh the 'costs and benefits' of creating a cause of action? It seems to me that to ask the question is to answer it. To create a new cause of action is to assign new private rights and liabilities—a power that is in every meaningful sense an act of legislation. . . If exercising that sort of authority may once have been a '"proper function for common-law courts"' in England, it is no longer generally appropriate '"for federal tribunals'" in a republic where the people elect representatives to make the rules that govern them. . . Weighing the costs and benefits of new laws is the bread and butter of legislative committees. It has no place in federal courts charged with deciding cases and controversies under existing law. Instead of saying as much explicitly, however, the Court proceeds on to conduct a case-specific analysis. And there I confess difficulties. The plaintiff is an American citizen who argues that a federal law enforcement officer violated the Fourth Amendment in searching the curtilage of his home. Candidly, I struggle to see how this set of facts differs meaningfully from those in Bivens itself. To be sure, as the Court emphasizes, the episode here took place near an international border and the officer's search focused on violations of the immigration laws. But why does that matter? The Court suggests that Fourth Amendment violations matter less in this context because of 'likely' national-security risks. . . So once more, we tote up for ourselves the costs and benefits of a private right of action in this or that setting and reach a legislative judgment. To atone for Bivens, it seems we continue repeating its most basic mistake. Of course, the Court's real messages run deeper than its case-specific analysis. If the costs and benefits do not justify a new Bivens action on facts so analogous to Bivens itself, it's hard to see how they ever could. And if the only question is whether a court is "better equipped" than Congress to weigh the value of a new cause of action, surely the right answer will always be no. Doubtless, these are the lessons the Court seeks to convey. I would only take the next step and acknowledge explicitly what the Court leaves barely implicit. Sometimes, it seems, 'this Court leaves a door ajar and holds out the possibility that someone, someday might walk through it' even as it devises a rule that ensures 'no one ... ever will.'. . In fairness to future litigants and our lower court colleagues, we should not hold out that kind of false hope, and in the process invite still more 'protracted litigation destined to yield nothing.'. . Instead, we should exercise 'the truer modesty of ceding an ill-gotten gain,'. . . and forthrightly return the power to create new causes of action to the people's representatives in Congress.")

Egbert v. Boule, 142 S. Ct. 1793, 1811-24 (2022) (Sotomayor, J., with whom Breyer, J. and Kagan, J., join, concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part) ("The Court goes to extraordinary lengths to avoid this result: It rewrites a legal standard it established just five years ago, stretches national-security concerns beyond recognition, and discerns an alternative remedial structure where none exists. The Court's innovations, taken together, enable it to close the door to Boule's claim and, presumably, to others that fall squarely within Bivens' ambit. Today's decision does not overrule Bivens. It nevertheless contravenes precedent and will strip many more individuals who suffer injuries at the hands of other federal officers, and whose circumstances are materially indistinguishable from those in Bivens, of an important remedy. I therefore dissent from the Court's disposition of Boule's Fourth Amendment claim. I concur in the Court's judgment that Boule's First Amendment retaliation claim may not proceed under Bivens, but for reasons grounded in precedent rather than this Court's newly announced test. . . .Ziglar and Hernández control here. Applying the two-step framework set forth in those cases, the Court of Appeals' determination that Boule's Fourth Amendment claim is cognizable under Bivens should be affirmed for two independent reasons. First, Boule's claim does not present a new context. Second, even if it did, no special factors would counsel hesitation. . . .That it was a CBP agent rather than a Federal Bureau of Narcotics agent who unlawfully entered Boule's property and used constitutionally excessive force against him plainly is not the sort of 'meaningful' distinction that our new-context inquiry is designed to weed out. . . . At bottom, Boule's claim is materially indistinguishable from the claim brought in Bivens. His case therefore does not present a new context for the purposes of assessing whether a Bivens remedy is available. . . Even assuming that this case presents a new context, no special factors warrant foreclosing a Bivens action. The Court 'has not defined the phrase "special factors counselling hesitation,"' but it has recognized that the 'inquiry must concentrate on whether the Judiciary is well suited, absent congressional action or instruction, to consider and weigh the costs and benefits of allowing a damages action to proceed.'. . . The conduct here took place near an international border and involved a CBP agent. That, however, is where the similarities with Hernández begin and end. The conduct occurred exclusively on U. S. soil, and the injury was to a U. S. citizen. . . . Here, Boule plainly does not seek to challenge or alter 'high-level executive policy.'. . Allowing his claim to proceed would not require courts to intrude into 'the discussion and deliberations that led to the formation' of any policy or national-security decision or interest. . . Agent Egbert, a line officer, was engaged in a run-of-the-mill inquiry into the status of a foreign national on U. S. soil who had no actual or suggested ties to terrorism, and who recently had been through U. S. customs to boot. . . No special factors counsel against allowing Boule's Bivens action to proceed. . . .This Court has repeatedly assumed without deciding that Bivens extends to First Amendment claims, see Wood v. Moss, 572 U. S. 744, 757 (2014), but has never squarely held as much, see Reichle v. Howards, 566 U. S. 658, 663, n. 4 (2012). Accordingly, Boule's First Amendment retaliation presents a new context for the purpose of the Bivens analysis. . . Moving to the second step of the Bivens inquiry, unlike Boule's Fourth Amendment claim, there is 'reason to pause' before extending Bivens to Boule's First Amendment claim. . . In particular, his First Amendment claim raises line-drawing concerns similar to those this Court identified in Wilkie[.] . . .Unlike the constitutional rights this Court has recognized as cognizable under Bivens, First Amendment retaliation claims could potentially be brought against many different federal officers, stretching substantially beyond the 'common and recurrent sphere of law enforcement' to reach virtually all federal employees. . . Under such circumstances, this Court's precedent holds that '"evaluat[ing] the impact of a new species of litigation"' on the efficiency of civil service is a task for Congress, not the courts. . . I therefore concur in the judgment as to the Court's reversal of the Court of Appeals' conclusion that Boule's First Amendment Bivens action may proceed, not for the reasons the Court identifies, . . . but because precedent requires it. . . . If the legal standard the Court articulates to reject Boule's Fourth Amendment claim sounds unfamiliar, that is because it is. Just five years after circumscribing the standard for allowing Bivens claims to proceed, a restless and newly constituted Court sees fit to refashion the standard anew to foreclose remedies in yet more cases. The measures the Court takes to ensure Boule's claim is dismissed are inconsistent with governing precedent. . . . Indeed, until today, the Court has never so much as hinted that courts should refuse to permit a Bivens action in a case involving facts substantially identical to those in Bivens itself. . . The Court's application of its new standard to Boule's Fourth Amendment claim underscores just how novel that standard is. Even assuming the claim presents a new context, the Court's insistence that national-security concerns bar the claim directly contravenes Ziglar. Moreover, the Court's holding that a nonbinding administrative investigation process, internal to the agency and offering no meaningful protection of the constitutional interests at stake, constitutes an alternative remedy that forecloses Bivens relief blinks reality. . . .Most obviously, the Court's conclusion that this case, which involves a physical assault by a federal officer against a U. S. citizen on U. S. soil, raises 'national security' concerns does exactly what this Court counseled against just four years ago. Back then, the Court advised that 'national-security concerns must not become a talisman to use to ward off inconvenient claims—a "label" used to "cover a multitude of sins."'. . .This case does not remotely implicate national security. The Court may wish it were otherwise, but on the facts of this case, its effort to raise the specter of national security is mere sleight of hand. . . . The consequences of the Court's drive-by, categorical assertion will be severe. Absent intervention by Congress, CBP agents are now absolutely immunized from liability in any Bivens action for damages, no matter how egregious the misconduct or resultant injury. That will preclude redress under Bivens for injuries resulting from constitutional violations by CBP's nearly 20,000 Border Patrol agents, including those engaged in ordinary law enforcement activities, like traffic stops, far removed from the border. . . This is no hypothetical: Certain CBP agents exercise broad authority to make warrantless arrests and search vehicles up to 100 miles away from the border. . .The Court's choice to foreclose liability for constitutional violations that occur in the course of such activities, based on even the most tenuous and hypothetical connection to the border (and thereby, to the 'nationalsecurity context'), betrays the context-specific nature of Bivens and shrinks Bivens in the core Fourth Amendment law enforcement sphere where it is needed most. . . . The Court thinly veils its disapproval of Bivens, ending its opinion by citing a string of dissenting opinions and single-Member concurrences by various Members of this Court expressing criticisms of Bivens. . . But the Court unmistakably stops short of overruling Bivens and its progeny, and appropriately so. Even while declining to extend Bivens to new contexts, this Court has reaffirmed that it did 'not inten[d] to cast doubt on the continued force, or even the necessity, of Bivens in the search-and-seizure context in which it arose.'. . Although today's opinion will make it harder for plaintiffs to bring a successful Bivens claim, even in the Fourth Amendment context, the lower courts should not read it to render Bivens a dead letter. That said, the Court plainly modifies the Bivens standard in a manner that forecloses Boule's claims and others like them that should be permitted under this Court's Bivens precedents. That choice is in tension with the Court's insistence that 'prescribing a cause of action is a job for Congress, not the courts.'. . Faithful adherence to this logic counsels maintaining Bivens in its current scope, but does not support changing the status quo to constrict Bivens, as the Court does today. Congress, after all, has recognized and relied on the Bivens cause of action in creating and amending other remedies, including the FTCA. By nevertheless repeatedly amending the legal standard that applies to Bivens claims and whittling down the number of claims that remain viable, the Court itself is making a policy choice for Congress. Whatever the merits of that choice, the Court's decision today is no exercise in judicial modesty. . . This Court's precedents recognize that suits for damages play a critical role in deterring unconstitutional conduct by federal law enforcement officers and in ensuring that those whose constitutional rights have been violated receive meaningful redress. The Court's decision today ignores our repeated recognition of the importance of Bivens actions, particularly in the Fourth Amendment search-and-seizure context, and closes the door to Bivens suits by many who will suffer serious constitutional violations at the hands of federal agents. I respectfully dissent from the Court's treatment of Boule's Fourth Amendment claim.") Hernandez v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735, 744-50 (2020) ("Because petitioners assert claims that arise in a new context, we must proceed to the next step and ask whether there are factors that counsel hesitation. As we will explain, there are multiple, related factors that raise warning flags. . . The first is the potential effect on foreign relations. . . . A cross-border shooting is by definition an international incident; it involves an event that occurs simultaneously in two countries and affects both countries' interests. Such an incident may lead to a disagreement between those countries, as happened in this case. . . . Both the United States and Mexico have legitimate and important interests that may be affected by the way in which this matter is handled. The United States has an interest in ensuring that agents assigned the difficult and important task of policing the border are held to standards and judged by procedures that satisfy United States law and do not undermine the agents' effectiveness and morale. Mexico has an interest in exercising sovereignty over its territory and in protecting and obtaining justice for its nationals. It is not our task to arbitrate between them. . . .[P]etitioners' assertion that their claims have 'nothing to do with the substance or conduct of U.S. foreign ... policy,'. . . is plainly wrong. . . Petitioners are similarly incorrect in deprecating the Fifth Circuit's conclusion that the issue here implicates an element of national security. . . .While Border Patrol agents often work miles from the border, some, like Agent Mesa, are stationed right at the border and have the responsibility of attempting to prevent illegal entry.

For these reasons, the conduct of agents positioned at the border has a clear and strong connection to national security, as the Fifth Circuit understood. . . . We have declined to extend Bivens where doing so would interfere with the system of military discipline created by statute and regulation, . . . and a similar consideration is applicable here. Since regulating the conduct of agents at the border unquestionably has national security implications, the risk of undermining border security provides reason to hesitate before extending Bivens into this field. . . . [I]t is 'telling[]'. . . that Congress has repeatedly declined to authorize the award of damages for injury inflicted outside our borders. A leading example is 42 U.S.C. § 1983, which permits the recovery of damages for constitutional violations by officers acting under color of state law. We have described Bivens as a 'more limited' 'federal analog' to § 1983. . . It is therefore instructive that Congress chose to make § 1983 available only to 'citizen[s] of the United States or other person[s] within the jurisdiction thereof.' It would be 'anomalous to impute ... a judicially implied cause of action beyond the bounds [Congress has] delineated for [a] comparable express caus[e] of action.'. . Thus, the limited scope of § 1983 weighs against recognition of the Bivens claim at issue here. Section 1983's express limitation to the claims brought by citizens and persons subject to United States jurisdiction is especially significant, but even if this explicit limitation were lacking, we would presume that § 1983 did not apply abroad. . . .If this danger provides a reason for caution when Congress has enacted a statute but has not provided expressly whether it applies abroad, we have even greater reason for hesitation in deciding whether to extend a judge-made cause of action beyond our borders. . . . Th[e] pattern of congressional action—refraining from authorizing damages actions for injury inflicted abroad by Government officers, while providing alternative avenues for compensation in some situations—gives us further reason to hesitate about extending Bivens in this case. . . .In sum, this case features multiple factors that counsel hesitation about extending Bivens, but they can all be condensed to one concern—respect for the separation of powers. . . .When evaluating whether to extend Bivens, the most important question 'is "who should decide" whether to provide for a damages remedy, Congress or the courts?'. . The correct 'answer most often will be Congress.'. . That is undoubtedly the answer here.")

Hernandez v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735, 750, 752-53 (2020) (Thomas, J., with whom Gorshuch, J. joins concurring) ("The Court correctly applies our precedents to conclude that the implied cause of action created in Bivens. . . should not be extended to cross-border shootings. I therefore join its opinion. I write separately because, in my view, the time has come to consider discarding the Bivens doctrine altogether. The foundation for Bivens—the practice of creating implied causes of action in the statutory context—has already been abandoned. And the Court has consistently refused to extend the Bivens doctrine for nearly 40 years, even going so far as to suggest that Bivens and its progeny were wrongly decided. Stare decisis provides no 'veneer of respectability to our continued application of [these] demonstrably incorrect precedents.'. . To ensure that we are not 'perpetuat[ing] a usurpation of the legislative power,'. . . we should reevaluate our continued recognition of even a limited form of the Bivens doctrine. . . .The analysis underlying Bivens cannot be defended. We have cabined the doctrine's scope, undermined its foundation, and limited its precedential value. It is time to correct this Court's error and abandon the doctrine altogether.")

Hernandez v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735, 753, 756-60 (2020) (Ginsburg, J., with whom Breyer, Sotomayor, and Kagan, JJ. join dissenting) ("Rogue U.S. officer conduct falls within a familiar, not a 'new,' Bivens setting. Even if the setting could be characterized as 'new,' plaintiffs lack recourse to alternative remedies, and no 'special factors' counsel against a Bivens remedy. Neither U.S. foreign policy nor national security is in fact endangered by the litigation. Moreover, concerns attending the application of our law to conduct occurring abroad are not involved, for plaintiffs seek the application of U.S. law to conduct occurring inside our borders. I would therefore hold that the plaintiffs' complaint crosses the Bivens threshold. . . . Plaintiffs' Bivens action arises in a setting kin to Bivens itself: Mesa, plaintiffs allege, acted in disregard of instructions governing his conduct and of Hernández's constitutional rights. Abbasi acknowledged the 'fixed principle' that plaintiffs may bring Bivens suits against federal law enforcement officers for 'seizure[s]' that violate the Fourth Amendment. . . Using lethal force against a person who 'poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others' surely qualifies as an unreasonable seizure. . . The complaint states that Mesa engaged in that very conduct; it alleged, specifically, that Hernández was unarmed and posed no threat to Mesa or others. For these reasons, as Mesa acknowledged at oral argument, Hernández's parents could have maintained a Bivens action had the bullet hit Hernández while he was running up or down the United States side of the embankment. . . The only salient difference here: the fortuity that the bullet happened to strike Hernández on the Mexican side of the embankment. But Hernández's location at the precise moment the bullet landed should not matter one whit. After all, '[t]he purpose of Bivens is to deter the officer.'. . And primary conduct constrained by the Fourth Amendment is an officer's unjustified resort to excessive force. . . Mesa's allegedly unwarranted deployment of deadly force occurred on United States soil. It scarcely makes sense for a remedy trained on deterring rogue officer conduct to turn upon a happenstance subsequent to the conduct—a bullet landing in one half of a culvert, not the other. . . .Here, as Judge Prado, dissenting below, observed, '[i]t is uncontested that plaintiffs find no alternative relief in Mexican law, state law, the Federal Tort Claims Act ('FTCA'), the Alien Tort Statute ('ATS'), or federal criminal law.'. . While the absence of alternative remedies, standing alone, does not warrant a Bivens action, . . . it remains a significant consideration under Abbasi's guidelines. . . . Congress, although well aware of the Court's opinion in Bivens, . . . has not endeavored to dislodge the decision. The Court cites several statutes in support of the argument that affording a Bivens action to Hernández's parents would be inconsistent with measures Congress has taken. None of the cited statutes should stand in plaintiffs' way. Section 1983 actions, the Court points out, are available only to 'person[s] within the jurisdiction' of the United States. . . That statute has, as its provenance, Reconstruction-era policies aiming to secure to former slaves federal rights and to ward off state and local incursion on those rights. . . 'It is inconceivable that ... Congress [then] thought about (and deliberately excluded liability for) cross-border incidents involving federal officials.'. . . Regrettably, the death of Hernández is not an isolated incident. . . .[I]t is all too apparent that to redress injuries like the one suffered here, it is Bivens or nothing. . . I resist the conclusion that 'nothing' is the answer required in this case. I would reverse the Fifth Circuit's judgment and hold that plaintiffs can sue Mesa in federal court for violating their son's Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights.")

D.C. Circuit

K.O. v. Sessions, No. 20-5255, 2022 WL 3023645, at *3-6 (D.C. Cir. July 29, 2022) ("Bivens, Davis, and Carlson may have dealt with violations of the Fourth, Fifth and Eighth Amendment, but none of these cases dealt with unreasonable seizures, discrimination, or inadequate medical attention as it relates to immigration detention. The Supreme Court's recent decision in Egbert v. Boule, 142 S. Ct. 1793 (2022), underscores our new context analysis. In Egbert, the Supreme Court declined to recognize a Bivens action for damages against a CBP officer who allegedly used excessive force against a U.S. citizen because it determined that the plaintiff's claims, relating to immigration enforcement, arose in a new context as compared to previous Bivens actions. . . The Supreme Court's reasoning applies here too. . . .Determining that a constitutional right exists and has been abridged by official conduct is not only difficult at times, but asks much of a court that should resolve matters on constitutional grounds only when there is no other way to do so. . . In some cases, it is easier for a court to see that the claimed right, whether it exists or not, is by no means 'clearly established.'. . . Thus, the question before us is whether it is clearly established that officials from various executive agencies can engage in a conspiracy to violate constitutional rights when enacting policies. Fortunately for us, the Supreme Court addressed similar allegations in Abbasi. In Abbasi, the plaintiffs alleged that various officials from the Department of Justice engaged in a conspiracy to violate their civil rights. . . The Supreme Court began its analysis by observing a dispute among the lower courts regarding the applicability of the intra-corporate conspiracy doctrine, which recognizes that there is no unlawful conspiracy, within the meaning of 42 U.S.C § 1985, when officers within a single corporate entity consult among themselves and then adopt a policy for the entity. . . The Supreme Court did not rule on the applicability of the intra-corporate conspiracy doctrine; instead, it held that the defendant officials were entitled to qualified immunity because the division among lower courts 'demonstrate[d] that the law on the point [was] not well established' and therefore 'a reasonable official lack[ed] the notice required before imposing liability.'. .Like the Supreme Court in Abbasi, we too apply the qualified immunity analysis to the conspiracy element. And we hold that the Appellants failed to demonstrate it is clearly established in the law that officials in the Executive Branch, each answering to the same principal, can engage in a conspiracy among themselves and with their subordinates when communicating with each other about immigration policies. To be clear, the Appellants are not required to present a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, but 'for purposes of qualified immunity, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . Here, there is much uncertainty on applicability of the intra-corporate conspiracy doctrine. . . Therefore, we hold that the Executive Branch officials are entitled to qualified immunity on the Appellants' section 1985(3) claims.")

K.O. v. Sessions, No. 20-5255, 2022 WL 3023645, at *6-7 (D.C. Cir. July 29, 2022) (Silberman, J., concurring) ("The Supreme Court has effectively made clear that the only occasions in which a damages remedy can be implied for a constitutional violation are those with the exact kind of facts that gave rise to three Bivens cases. Bivens v. Six Unknown Fed. Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388

(1971); Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 288 (1979); Carlson v. Green, 466 U.S. 14 (1980). In theory—but only in theory—a court could imply a Bivens remedy in a 'new context' (beyond the facts in Bivens, Passman, or Carlson), if there are no 'special factors counseling hesitation.'. . But one of the more obvious 'special factors' in a new case is whether Congress has authorized any remedy for a particular alleged injury. . . That can include an injunctive remedy or even an APA claim. . . With that in mind, it seems obvious to me that a coinciding damages remedy authorized by the FTCA is a fortiori a special factor precluding a Bivens remedy and therefore that part of Carlson's language should be ignored. This seems especially clear since courts are not supposed to supplement Congress's remedial structure with a Bivens claim simply because, in the courts' view, Congress did not do enough.")

Loumiet v. United States, 948 F.3d 376, 381-86 (D.C. Cir. 2020) ("[I]n the decades since Bivens was decided, the Court has grown wary of creating implied damages actions in other contexts. . . For these reasons, 'expanding the Bivens remedy is now a disfavored judicial activity,' so the Supreme Court demands 'caution before extending Bivens remedies into any new context.'. . Exercising this caution, the Supreme Court has not recognized a new Bivens action in the four decades since Carlson was decided. At the same time, the Court has declined to extend Bivens on ten separate occasions. . . . This case clearly presents a new Bivens context. First, the constitutional right at issue differs from the ones at issue in Bivens, Davis, and Carlson. Loumiet alleges a violation of the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment, but Bivens was a Fourth Amendment search-and-seizure case, 403 U.S. at 389; Davis was a Fifth Amendment sex-discrimination case, 442 U.S. at 231; and Carlson was an Eighth Amendment medical-care case, 446 U.S. at 16 & n.1. Although the Supreme Court twice has assumed that the First Amendment creates an implied cause of action for damages, see Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 675 (2009) (Free Exercise Clause); Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 256 (2006) (Free Speech Clause), it has 'never held that Bivens extends to First Amendment claims,' Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658, 663–64 n.4 (2012). Abbasi removed any possible doubt on this point. There, the Supreme Court stressed that 'three cases—Bivens, Davis, and Carlson—represent the only instances in which the Court has approved of an implied damages remedy under the Constitution itself.'. . . Second, the legal mandate under which the OCC officials were operating is different from the ones in Bivens, Davis, and Carlson. The dispute here arose from the enforcement of federal banking laws under FIRREA, whereas Bivens involved the enforcement of federal drug laws, 403 U.S. at 389; Davis involved employment decisions by members of Congress, 442 U.S. at 230; and Carlson involved the provision of medical care to federal prisoners, 446 U.S. at 16. Third, Loumiet seeks damages from a new category of defendants. The defendants here are OCC officials, whereas the defendants in Bivens were federal narcotics agents, 403 U.S. at 389; the defendant in Davis was a former member of Congress, 442 U.S. at 230; and the defendants in Carlson were federal prison officials, 446 U.S. at 16. For each of these reasons, this case presents a new context. . . . Here, FIRREA's administrative enforcement scheme is likewise a special factor counselling hesitation. This scheme permits the imposition of civil penalties only for defined offenses such as knowingly breaching a fiduciary duty or recklessly engaging in an unsound banking practice. . . .We recognize that retaliatory enforcement actions can be hard to ferret out in administrative processes and can impose harms well beyond those remediable through EAJA. On the other hand, charges of a retaliatory motive are easy to make, hard to disprove, potentially crippling to regulators, and perhaps not unlikely in the context of hotly contested adversarial proceedings. As in Abbasi, there is a hard 'balance to be struck' in considering whether to create a damages remedy for the kind of claim that Loumiet seeks to press here. . . That decision is best left to Congress. . . . The First Amendment creates no implied damages action against OCC officials for inducing an allegedly retaliatory administrative enforcement proceeding. We therefore reverse the district court's judgment and remand the case with instructions to dismiss Loumiet's First Amendment claims.")

Liff v. Office of Inspector General for U.S. Dept. of Labor, 881 F.3d 912, 918-20 (D.C. Cir. 2018) ("Because the 'defense of qualified immunity from a Bivens damages action directly implicates the antecedent question whether to recognize that Bivens action at all,'. . . that question is appropriae for interlocutory appeal. . . .We begin with the availability of a Bivens remedy. The District Court declined to rule on this question; however, it is appropriate to determine the availability of a Bivens remedy at the earliest practicable phase of litigation because it is ' "antecedent' to the other questions presented[.]'. .In considering the availability of a Bivens remedy, we first look for 'an "alternative, existing process" capable of protecting the constitutional interests at stake.'. . . The constellation of statutes and regulations governing federal contracts, as well as the Privacy Act, provide a remedy for Liff's claims. And, to the extent that these statutes leave gaps in the remedies available to Liff, the presence of significant legislated remedies in this arena counsels against the recognition of a judicially created Bivens remedy.")

Black Lives Matter D.C. v. Trump, 544 F.Supp.3d 15, 30-34 (D.D.C. 2021) ("The plaintiffs' First Amendment claim arises in a new context because the Supreme Court has never extended Bivens to a claim brought under the First Amendment. . . Even so, the plaintiffs argue that the context is not new because decades-old D.C. Circuit precedent recognized a Bivens claim for First Amendment violations of protesters' rights. See Dellums v. Powell, 566 F.2d 167, 194 (D.C. Cir. 1977). But, as both Supreme Court and D.C. Circuit precedent instruct, it is only Supreme Court decisions that count when determining whether a Bivens claim arises in a new context. . . The plaintiffs' Fourth and Fifth Amendment claims likewise arise in a new context. In Bivens itself, the Supreme Court created an implied damages remedy under the Fourth Amendment for an allegedly unconstitutional search and arrest carried out in a New York City apartment . . . in Davis v. Passman, the Court allowed damages under the Fifth Amendment for alleged sex-based employment discrimination on Capitol Hill[.] . . But, critically, '[a] claim may arise in a new context even if it is based on the same constitutional provision as a claim in a case in which a damages remedy was previously recognized.' Hernandez, 140 S. Ct. at 743. . . .As in Hernandez, 'once we look beyond the constitutional provisions invoked in Bivens, Davis, and the present case, it is glaringly obvious that [the plaintiffs'] claims involve a new context, i.e., one that is meaningfully different.'. . The claims at issue here concern government officers' response to a large protest in Lafayette Square outside the White House, which is markedly different from entering and searching a private apartment to enforce federal narcotics laws. The context in which these claims arise is also 'meaningfully different' from the context of sex-based employment discrimination at issue in Davis. . . .Next, the Court considers whether any special factors counsel hesitation before extending an implied constitutional damages remedy to the new context presented by these cases. . . . In this case, several special factors counsel hesitation. First, national security—specifically, the country's national-security interest in the safety and security of the President and the area surrounding the White House—strongly weighs against creating a Bivens remedy here. . . . The national security considerations implicated in this context counsel against extending a damages remedy without congressional approval. . . Relatedly, a second special factor that weighs against creating a Bivens remedy here is Congress' activity in the field governing the relationship between White House and presidential security and protesters' rights. [discussion of examples] These examples illustrate that Congress has repeatedly considered the trade-offs between White House and presidential security and protesters' freedoms. Because of Congress' extensive activity in the field, 'Congress' failure to provide a damages remedy might be more than mere oversight, and that congressional silence might be more than inadvertent.'. . And given the many years Congress has had 'to extend the kind of remedies' sought by the plaintiffs, its silence is both 'relevant' and 'telling.'. . Congress' activity in the field thus constitutes another special factor which makes it inappropriate to recognize a Bivens remedy in the new context presented by these cases. And finally, a third special factor counseling hesitation is the availability of alternative remedies. . . Here, the plaintiffs seek alternative equitable relief in the form of a permanent injunction. . . and the Supreme Court in Abbasi specifically recognized 'an injunction' and 'some other form of equitable relief' as adequate alternative remedies[.]Though these alternative avenues may ultimately prove unsuccessful, that is irrelevant '[s]o long as the plaintiff[s] had an avenue for some redress.'. . Indeed, the Supreme Court has 'rejected the claim that a Bivens remedy should be implied simply for want of any other means for challenging a constitutional deprivation in federal court.'. . In conclusion, these special factors make it inappropriate to extend Bivens into the new context presented by these cases. The Court will grant the defendants' motions to dismiss the Bivens claims.")

First Circuit

Drewniak v. United States Customs & Border Protection, No. CV 20-CV-852-LM, 2021 WL 1318028, at *4, 7-8, *10 (D.N.H. Apr. 8, 2021) ("Following its more cautious approach to recognizing implied causes of action, the Supreme Court has uniformly refused to extend Bivens after Carlson despite numerous opportunities to do so. [collecting cases] Indeed, Abbasi expressed what one Court of Appeals deemed 'open hostility' to recognizing additional Bivens actions. . . Given the Court's consistent refusal to expand Bivens over the last forty years, the Court's discarding of the very analysis by which the Bivens cause of action was recognized, and the Court's recent and pronounced aversion to further expansion of the doctrine, it is beyond question that 'expanding the Bivens remedy is now a disfavored judicial activity.'. . .Even if Drewniak's claim involved no new context, however, his claim seeks to extend Bivens to a new category of defendants. The Court's three Bivens cases approved suits against the following categories of defendants: 'FBI Agents' in Bivens itself; 'a Congressman' in Davis; and 'prison officials' in Carlson. . . Here, Drewniak seeks damages from a Border Patrol agent. Recognizing a Bivens action against a Border Patrol agent would require extending Bivens to a new category of defendants. . . . In sum, the INA's complex remedial structure—created by Congress and implemented by the Executive pursuant to Congressional directive and duly-promulgated regulations—suggests that a judicially-superimposed damages action may 'interfer[e] with the authority of the other branches.'. . The comprehensive nature of the INA and the choices made by Congress as to how to violations ought to be redressed support the notion that the absence of an individual damages remedy against immigration officers was intended. . . And while Drewniak argues that existing remedial schemes would fail to adequately redress the constitutional violation he alleges, '[t]he question is not what remedy the court should provide for a wrong that would otherwise go undressed,' but rather, 'whether an elaborate remedial system that has been constructed step by step, with careful attention to conflicting policy considerations, should be augmented by the creation of a new judicial remedy.'. . In sum, the INA's complex remedial structure gives the court 'reason to pause before applying Bivens in [this] new context or to [this] new class of defendants.'. . Hesitation is further counseled by the fact that, although Congress has amended the INA numerous times since its enactment in 1952, it has never seen fit to provide an individual damages remedy against immigration officers for actions undertaken in the course of their duties. . . . In conclusion, multiple special factors counsel hesitation in recognizing the availability of a Bivens action in this context. Because Drewniak seeks to extend Bivens to a new context, and because special factors counsel hesitation against doing so, a Bivens action is not available. . . . Bivens actions are disfavored. Under the rigorous two-step inquiry mandated by governing Supreme Court jurisprudence, it is difficult to infer a damages action for claims that differ in even modest ways from those advanced in Bivens, Davis, and Carlson. Here, a principled application of this analysis leads to the conclusion that Drewniak may not pursue his constitutional claim against Qualter in an implied action for damages.")

Second Circuit

Gonzalez v. Hasty, No. 17-3790-CV, 2018 WL 5960773, at *1 (2d Cir. Nov. 14, 2018) (not reported) ("The parties have briefed and argued the question whether Abbasi abrogates our precedent extending the Bivens cause of action beyond the three contexts of Bivens, Davis, and Carlson. We need not address that question, however, to resolve the instant case. Here, even assuming arguendo that Gonzalez has a valid cause of action after Abbasi, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, dooming his Due Process and Eighth Amendment claims.")

Doe v. Hagenbeck, 870 F.3d 36, 42-44 (2d Cir. 2017) ("Doe seeks to hold her superior officers personally liable for money damages in connection with their decisions regarding the training, supervision, discipline, education, and command of service personnel at West Point, an officer training school and military base. But Congress, 'the constitutionally authorized source of authority over the military system of justice, has not provided a damages remedy'for the constitutional claim that Doe asserts. . . The Supreme Court, citing the 'inescapable demands of military discipline ... [that] cannot be taught on battlefields,'. . . has held, unanimously, that absent Congressional authorization, 'it would be inappropriate [for courts] to provide enlisted military personnel a Bivens-type remedy against their superior officers.'. . We conclude that Chappell and its progeny are dispositive of Doe's Bivens claim and, accordingly, that the district court erred in determining that Doe's Bivens claim may proceed. . . . Doe was a member of the military at the time the events giving rise to her claim occurred, and the claim concerns superior officers. Further, her claim calls into question 'basic choices about the discipline, supervision, and control' of service personnel and would 'require[ ] the civilian court to second-guess military decisions,' thus triggering the incident-to-service rule. . . In such circumstances, her Bivens claim must be dismissed.")

Doe v. Hagenbeck, 870 F.3d 36, 51, 61 (2d Cir. 2017) (Chin, J., dissenting) ("While West Point is indeed a military facility, it is quintessentially an educational institution. As its website proclaims, it is 'one of the nation's top-ranked colleges,' and it provides its 'students with a top-notch education.'. . In my view, the Feres doctrine does not bar Doe's equal protection claims. For these and other reasons discussed below, I would affirm the district court's decision denying the individual defendants' motion to dismiss the equal protection claim. Accordingly, I dissent. . . . [T]he majority and the Government rely on two recent decisions of other Circuits rejecting Bivens claims brought by current and former service members alleging they had been raped and sexually assaulted by other service members. The plaintiffs in these cases contended that the actions and omissions of current and former Secretaries of Defense had created a military culture of tolerance for sexual assault and misconduct. See Klay v. Panetta, 758 F.3d 369, 371-72 (D.C. Cir. 2014); Cioca v. Rumsfeld, 720 F.3d 505, 513-14 (4th Cir. 2013). The cases, however, are distinguishable, for they involved active duty service members who brought broad challenges to policies of high-ranking government officials, raising questions as to military discipline and command for those in active duty. The cases did not involve students or an educational institution or the deprivation of meaningful access to an education because of discriminatory academic policies or school administrators tasked with running an educational institution. The Feres concerns—particularly the question of interfering with military command and discipline—play out very differently in this scenario.")

Ramirez v. Tatum, No. 17 CIV. 7801 (LGS), 2018 WL 6655600, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 19, 2018) ("The Supreme Court has recognized only three Bivens contexts, none of which include retaliation or excessive force. Second, there are special factors that counsel against expanding a new Bivens remedy, including the availability of alternative relief (the FTCA, discussed below), and Congress's legislation in the area of prisoners' rights. . . . Therefore, Plaintiff's retaliation and excessive force claims are dismissed.")

Gonzalez v. Hasty, No. 12CV5013BMCSMG, 2017 WL 4158491, at *10-15 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 18, 2017) ("Ziglar . . . made it clear that the only recognized implied rights of action were the narrow situations presented in Bivens, Davis, and Carlson, and lower courts must scrutinize attempts to expand the Bivens remedy, even where courts had assumed the availability of such a remedy. . . Practically speaking, this means that even where a circuit court had previously found a Bivens remedy, that court must still consider the availability of an implied right of action in subsequent cases relying on the same precedent. . . Thus, this Court must also look 'anew' at the particular facts in this case. . . In doing so, this Court is guided by additional principles handed down by the Supreme Court. As an initial matter, even though the Supreme Court has recognized causes of action in Bivens under the Fourth Amendment, in Davis under the Fifth Amendment, and in Carlson under the Eighth Amendment, that does not mean that any cause of action may lie under those Amendments simply by virtue of these Supreme Court cases. In fact, the Supreme Court has refused to extend Bivens contexts beyond the specific clauses of the specific amendments for which a cause of action had been implied, or even to other classes of defendants facing liability under those same clauses. . . .Instead, the recognition of a cause of action is context-specific, and the Supreme Court has established a rigorous inquiry that courts must use before implying a Bivens cause of action in a new context or against a new category of defendants. . . . If the context is new, then the court must next ask 'whether any alternative, existing process for protecting the interest amounts to a convincing reason for the Judicial Branch to refrain from providing a new and freestanding remedy in damages.'. . Irrespective of whether an alternative remedy exists, a federal court must also conduct a specific analysis, 'paying particular heed ... to any special factors counselling hesitation before authorizing a new kind of federal litigation,' otherwise known as the 'special factors analysis.'. . . [T]here is no precedent suggesting that the unavailability of money is a factor that carries any weight in determining the expansion of a Bivens remedy. Rather, the emphasis is simply on the existence of an avenue to protect the right, not the method of protection that Congress or the Executive has chosen. . . . Thus, in light of Supreme Court precedent, past and very recent, there are significant special factors that give me pause, and in this context, there is reason to 'fear that a general Bivens cure would be worse than the disease.'. . .Ziglar has given priority to the need to consider the availability of Bivens relief, even where the Circuit had previously assumed the availability of a Bivens remedy. . . . In fact, Ziglar requires courts to consider each case individually, even where the court had previously found a new Bivens remedy, just as the Third Circuit recently recognized. In Vanderklok, the Third Circuit found that, even though it had previously found a Bivens remedy in a First Amendment retaliation context, it nonetheless 'must look at the issue anew in this particular context, and as it pertains to this particular category of defendants.'. . .Given all of the foregoing, I decline to create a new Bivens Fifth Amendment cause of action, and plaintiff's Fifth Amendment claim is dismissed." [Court also goes on to find Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment medical and non-medical claims lacked merit])

Third Circuit

Dongarra v. Smith, 27 F.4th 174, 180-81 (3d Cir. 2022) ("Although Bivens damages are available for some deliberate-indifference claims, this case is meaningfully different. . . Carlson extended Bivens to remedy prison officers' failure to give medical assistance. . . But there, the prisoner died because of the officers' neglect. Put differently, the risk that the prison officer ignored (death from not treating the prisoner's chronic asthma) in fact resulted. . . But here, Dongarra was not attacked. The potential harm that Smith allegedly ignored (assault by other prisoners) never happened. True, it may have been foreseeable that branding Dongarra a sex offender would cause him emotional and psychological harms. But Dongarra does not claim that Smith was indifferent to those risks. So this case presents a new context. . . As such, we must proceed to the second step of the Ziglar test. We ask whether there are 'special factors counselling hesitation.'. . Here, there are two: (1) alternative remedies are available, and (2) the judiciary is poorly suited to balance the costs and benefits of allowing damages. . . Because these factors give us 'reason to pause,' we decline to extend Bivens.. . First, Dongarra had two avenues for relief: the prison grievance process and a federal injunction. The prison's grievance process lets prisoners 'seek formal review' of officers' conduct. . . It is not only well suited to preventing an assault on Dongarra, but also seems to have worked: he complained and got a new T-shirt. And even if that process had failed, he could have asked a court for an injunction ordering the prison to fix its mistake. Second, creating a Bivens remedy would require us to make rules on when a prison official who is deliberately indifferent to one risk may be held liable for harms that result from a foreseeable yet distinct secondary risk. Dongarra did not allege that Smith was indifferent to the risk that labeling him a sex offender would lead to panic attacks, starvation, or loss of sleep—only the risk of assault by other prisoners. While such a secondary risk was arguably foreseeable, it remains a step removed from the prototypical failure-to-protect case. If we were to extend Bivens here, we would need to make rules on whether liability attaches for secondary risks when an officer is alleged to have been indifferent only to a primary risk. For instance, did Smith's subjective awareness of the risk that Dongarra would be assaulted include the risk that Dongarra might suffer mental anguish or be harmed by his efforts to avoid being assaulted? It is not obvious how far a prison official's liability should extend. If we strike the wrong balance, we could unleash a torrent of litigation on prisons. And unlike state tort damages, the availability of a federal constitutional remedy cannot be undone by the legislature. The stakes are high, and we are poorly suited to the task. So we must leave that judgment to Congress. . . . Smith should not have turned a blind eye to the risk that mislabeling Dongarra a sex offender could cause other prisoners to assault him. If he did, he violated Dongarra's Eighth Amendment rights. But Dongarra lacks a remedy. The prison has already issued him a new ID card and T-shirt, so it is too late for administrative and injunctive relief. And Bivens damages are unavailable for an assault that never happened. So we will affirm.") Shorter v. United States, 12 F.4th 366, 371-75 (3d Cir. 2021) ("In Farmer v. Brennan, . . . the Supreme Court applied Carlson in recognizing an Eighth Amendment damages claim nearly identical to the one at issue here, involving prison officials who failed to keep a transgender prisoner safe from sexual assault. The Farmer Court explained that the Eighth Amendment 'imposes duties on [prison] officials, who must provide humane conditions of confinement; prison officials must ensure that inmates receive adequate food, clothing, shelter, and medical care, and must take reasonable measures to guarantee the safety of the inmates.'. . Accordingly, the Court held 'a prison official can[ ] be found liable under the Eighth Amendment for denying an inmate humane conditions of confinement [if he or she] knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.'. . This includes liability for displaying deliberate indifference to a substantial risk that a prisoner will be attacked by other prisoners, because '[b]eing violently assaulted in prison is simply not part of the penalty that criminal offenders pay for their offenses against society.'. . In Ziglar v. Abbasi, . . . the Supreme Court summarized the status of Bivens jurisprudence. The Court emphasized that, although the doctrine is a 'settled,' 'fixed principle in the law' in certain spheres, 'expanding the Bivens remedy is now a "disfavored" judicial activity.'. . The Court then prescribed a two-pronged inquiry for courts to follow in deciding whether to recognize a Bivens remedy. First, they must evaluate whether a case presents 'a new Bivens context,' meaning that it 'is different in a meaningful way from previous Bivens cases decided by [the Supreme] Court.'. . The Abbasi Court named three previous cases in which a Bivens remedy has been recognized: Bivens itself, in addition to the above-referenced Davis and Carlson. . . . If a case does not present a new Bivens context, the inquiry ends there, and a Bivens remedy is available. . . If, however, the case does present a new Bivens context, a court proceeds to the second step of the analysis and asks whether any 'special factors counsel[ ] hesitation' in extending a Bivens remedy to that context. . . Defendants assert this case presents a new Bivens context and that special factors counsel hesitation before allowing a Bivens remedy here. Our Court's precedent in Bistrian II covers this argument. . . In that case, we considered a Bivens claim from a prisoner who was beaten by fellow inmates after they learned he was cooperating with a prison surveillance operation. Like Shorter, Bistrian claimed prison officials had failed 'to protect him from a substantial risk of serious injury at the hands of other inmates.'. . There, as here, the defendants contended Bistrian's claim presented a new Bivens context. We disagreed, reiterating that under our case law and the Supreme Court's longstanding precedent in Farmer, a federal prisoner 'ha[s] a clearly established constitutional right to have prison officials protect him from inmate violence' and has a damages remedy when officials violate that right. . . Because Bistrian's claim was not meaningfully different from the claim at issue in Farmer, we concluded the latter case 'practically dictate[d] our ruling' in the former. . . So too here. . . Farmer made clear, in circumstances virtually indistinguishable from our case, that an Eighth Amendment Bivens remedy is available to a transgender prisoner who has been assaulted by a fellow inmate. As Shorter points out, her case and Farmer's both involved (1) transitioning transgender women on estrogen who had developed female physical characteristics, (2) who were housed in allegedly unsafe cells in the general population of all-male prisons where assaults were frequent, (3) who were physically and sexually assaulted by fellow inmates, even after (4) prison officials admitted 'a high probability' that they 'could not safely function' in the prison due to their transgender status, and (5) who alleged that prison officials had therefore been deliberately indifferent to their safety. . . Defendants have pointed to no meaningful differences between the two cases. . . And as we held in Bistrian II, Farmer remains good law. Our case therefore does not present a new Bivens context. . . . Extending a Bivens remedy to a new context is a disfavored judicial activity. But Shorter's case does not require any extension of Bivens. Instead, her claim falls squarely within one of the Bivens contexts long recognized by the Supreme Court as discussed explicitly in our precedent. And Shorter's pro se complaint, liberally construed, has plausibly alleged a violation of the Eighth Amendment. We therefore reverse the dismissal of the Eighth Amendment claim and remand.") Mammana v. Barben, No. 20-2364, 2021 WL 2026847, at *3–4 (3d Cir. May 21, 2021) (not reported) ("Carlson involved an allegation that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to an inmate's medical needs during a severe asthma attack. . . But little links Carlson to Mammana's claims beyond federal prison employees and alleged Eighth Amendment violations. Mammana alleges Barben violated the Eighth Amendment through his 'deliberate indifference to the substantial risk of harm posed by Mr. Mammana's mistreatment in the Yellow Room.'. . Mammana challenged 'his confinement in a chilled room with constant lighting, no bedding, and only paper-like clothing.'. . All of which 'bear little resemblance to ... a claim against prison officials for failure to treat an inmate's asthma.'. . And the Supreme Court has made clear that 'even a modest extension [of Bivens] is still an extension,'. . . and '[a] claim may arise in a new context even if it is based on the same constitutional provision as a claim in a case in which a damages remedy was previously recognized.'. . . Beginning in Bivens, the Supreme Court has consistently cautioned courts against recognizing an implied cause of action against federal officers if there were any 'special factors counseling hesitation in the absence of affirmative action by Congress.'. . . From that direction, we have recognized two 'particularly weighty' special factors: 1) the availability of alternate remedies; and 2) separation-of-powers concerns. . . And here, significant separation-of-powers concerns abound. As Abbasi explained, 'legislative action suggesting that Congress does not want a damages remedy is itself a factor counseling hesitation' and Congress's omission of a 'standalone damages remedy against federal jailers' when it passed the Prison Litigation Reform Act post-Carlson 'suggests Congress chose not to extend the Carlson damages remedy to cases involving other types of prisoner mistreatment.'. . . Mammana's claim warrants hesitation. Candidly, he asks for a new implied cause of action to sue federal prison officials for unconstitutional conditions of confinement, a step never taken by the Supreme Court nor any circuit court. . . . Recognizing such a broad new category of claims would step well into the lawmaking privilege delegated only to Congress, and well over the bounds of our limited constitutional power. . . That is a special factor counseling hesitation to expand Bivens. Because we pause, we must 'reject the request' to recognize this new Bivens context.")

Mammana v. Barben, No. 20-2364, 2021 WL 2026847, at *5-10 & n.7 (3d Cir. May 21, 2021) (not reported) (Shwartz, J., dissenting) ("Today we consider whether a federal prisoner may sue a federal corrections officer based upon inhumane conditions of confinement that violate the Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. . . . Because the present case does not present a new context, and, even if it were a new context, the special factors do not counsel against recognizing a conditions of confinement claim, I would vacate the order granting Lieutenant Barben judgment on the pleadings. . . .Like the plaintiffs in Carlson and Farmer, Mammana (a) brought claims against individual officers, and not high-ranking officials; . . . (b) seeks relief for a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment; and (c) challenges a specific action, rather than a general policy, that he alleges subjected him personally to harm. Moreover, guidance exists that provides the parameters within which officers are to act and that directs how courts should assess alleged violations of the Eighth Amendment. Indeed, in this very case, we have applied the Supreme Court's teachings to conclude that prison officials must ensure that a prisoner has 'the minimal civilized measures of life's necessities,' . . . and that Mammana's allegations, if true, show he was deprived of them in violation of the Eighth Amendment[.] . . Finally, cases challenging conditions of confinement have not resulted in a judicial intrusion that has disrupted the executive branch's running of prisons. In fact, the intrusion from permitting Mammana's conditions of confinement claim to proceed is no different from the intrusion caused by the medical claims permitted by Carlson, the protection obligation embodied in Farmer, or the other types of conditions of confinement claims that state prisoners can bring against state officers. . . In short, these factors show that there is no meaningful difference between the conditions of confinement claim alleged here and those that the Supreme Court has permitted to proceed in Carlson and Farmer. Thus, Mammana's claim does not arise in a new context, and the District Court erred in concluding otherwise. . . .In sum, because Mammana has no alternative remedy, the PLRA does not preclude a damages claim against federal officers, various tools exist to weed out frivolous claims thus ensuring that condition of confinement claims would not overwhelm prison officials, and because such a claim does not challenge a prison policy or implicate national security, foreign relations, or military matters, and allowing the claim will deter individual federal officers from violating the constitution, there should be no hesitation in allowing such a claim to proceed.[7] [fn 7: Although no circuit court has recognized a Bivens claim premised on unconstitutional conditions of confinement in a precedential opinion, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit recently did so in a nonprecedential opinion. See Reid v. United States, 825 F. App'x 442, 444-45 (9th Cir. 2020) (holding that the plaintiff's Eighth Amendment "conditions of confinement" claim did not present a new Bivens context and, even if it did, there were no special factors counseling hesitation); but see Schwarz v. Meinberg, 761 F. App'x 732, 733-34 (9th Cir. 2019) (holding that the plaintiff's Eighth Amendment claim regarding "unsanitary cell conditions" presented a new Bivens context). Moreover, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is considering this very same issue. See Walker v. Schult, 463 F. Supp. 3d 323, 329 (N.D.N.Y. 2020) (holding that the plaintiff's Eighth Amendment "prison condition case" did not present a new Bivens context), appeal docketed, No. 20-2145 (2d Cir. July 30, 2020).")

Mack v. Yost, 968 F.3d 311, 314 (3d Cir. 2020) ("Here, Charles Mack, a former inmate, seeks to bring a First Amendment retaliation claim against federal prison officials, alleging that he was terminated from his prison job for complaining that correctional officers were harassing him at work because of his religion. In light of Abbasi and our recent precedents, we decline to expand Bivens to create a damages remedy for Mack's First Amendment retaliation claim.")

Davis v. Samuels, 962 F.3d 105, 112-13 (3d Cir. 2020) ("The GEO Defendants operate private prisons on behalf of the federal government, which, among other responsibilities, entails overseeing and controlling the daily lives of the prisoners. The performance of that function certainly appears to be the exercise of a right having its source in federal authority, by those who 'could in all fairness be regarded as ... federal actor[s.]'. . Despite that, we will affirm the Court's dismissal of the Bivens claim because the Appellants are asking for an unsupportable extension of Bivens liability. . . . Regarding the first step of the inquiry, the Appellants correctly 'assume[ ]' that their Bivens claim, premised as it is on a violation of the right to marry, arises in a 'new context.' . . The Supreme Court has never recognized, or been asked to recognize, a Bivens remedy for infringement of the right to marry. Accordingly, we turn to the inquiry's second step. When we do, it is evident that there are 'special factors' militating against extending Bivens to reach the Appellants' claim, particularly since that claim arises in a prison setting. Those factors include, but are not necessarily limited to, Congress's post-Bivens promulgation of the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995 ("PLRA"). . . and the potential availability of alternative remedies to the Appellants, such as injunctive relief. . . or relief under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act ("RFRA"). . . Because 'there are sound reasons to think Congress might doubt the efficacy or necessity of a damages remedy' for interfering with an inmate's right to marry, Ziglar v. Abbasi, —— U.S. ——, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1848, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017), no extension of Bivens is warranted here, and we will affirm the District Court's dismissal of the Appellants' Bivens claim.") Bistrian v. Levi, 912 F.3d 79, 87-96 (3d Cir. 2018) ("Some of the defendants' arguments raise factual issues and so are outside our jurisdiction on this interlocutory appeal. . . But the defendants also challenge whether the District Court properly applied principles of qualified immunity in denying summary judgment on the three Bivens actions. Those arguments involve only questions of law, including whether the rights in question were clearly established. . . 'And since the issue of whether a [Bivens] cause of action even exists ... is a threshold question of law, we have jurisdiction to consider that as well.'. . Accordingly, what follows is a review of the dispositive legal questions raised by the qualified immunity defenses to Bistrian's claims for failure to protect and punitive detention under the Fifth Amendment, and for retaliation under the First Amendment. . . . Bistrian has a cognizable Bivens cause of action for the alleged failure of the defendants to protect him from a substantial risk of serious injury at the hands of other inmates. The prisoner-on-prisoner violence is not a new context for Bivens claims, and no special factors counsel against allowing a failure-to-protect cause of action. We will therefore affirm the District Court's denial of summary judgment with respect to that claim. We must, however, reverse the denial of summary judgment on Bistrian's claims for punitive detention and retaliation because they are novel and special factors counsel against extending Bivens coverage to such claims. . . . Whether a Bivens claim exists in a particular context is 'antecedent to the other questions presented.' Hernandez v. Mesa. . . It is thus 'a threshold question of law' that 'is directly implicated by the defense of qualified immunity[.]'. . We can sometimes resolve a case by demonstrating that a plaintiff would lose on the constitutional claim he raises, even if Bivens provided a remedy for that type of claim. . .But threshold questions are called that for a reason, and it will often be best to tackle head on whether Bivens provides a remedy, when that is unsettled. . . That is true whether the parties raise the question or not. Assuming the existence of a Bivens cause of action—without deciding the issue—can risk needless expenditure of the parties' and the courts' time and resources. Thus, even when a defendant does not raise the issue of whether a Bivens remedy exists for a particular constitutional violation, we may still consider the issue in the interest of justice. . .Accordingly, we consider whether a Bivens cause of action exists for each claim at issue here. . . .Contrary to the opposition of some of the defendants, . . . an inmate's claim that prison officials violated his Fifth Amendment rights by failing to protect him against a known risk of substantial harm does not present a new Bivens context. On the contrary, we recognized just such a claim 45 years ago in Curtis v. Everette. 489 F.2d 516, 518-19 (3d Cir. 1973) (recognizing constitutional due process right for prisoner to be free from violent attack by fellow prisoner). Moreover, the Supreme Court ratified that kind of claim some 20 years later in Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 832-49, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811 (1994), and we recently concluded, in Bistrian II, that a pretrial detainee 'ha[s] a clearly established constitutional right to have prison officials protect him from inmate violence[,]' 696 F.3d at 367. Farmer is of greatest significance. In that case, the Court assessed a 'failure to protect' claim brought under the Eighth Amendment and Bivens as a result of prisoner-on-prisoner violence. . . Although the Farmer Court did not explicitly state that it was recognizing a Bivens claim, it not only vacated the grant of summary judgment in favor of the prison officials but also discussed at length 'deliberate indifference' as the legal standard to assess a Bivens claim, the standard by which all subsequent prisoner safety claims have been assessed. . . It seems clear, then, that the Supreme Court has, pursuant to Bivens, recognized a failure-to-protect claim under the Eighth Amendment. . . Abbasi does not contradict that reasoning. It is true that Abbasi identified three Bivens contexts and did not address, or otherwise cite to, Farmer. . . But we decline to 'conclude [that the Supreme Court's] more recent cases have, by implication, overruled an earlier precedent.'. . It may be that the Court simply viewed the failure-to-protect claim as not distinct from the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim in the medical context. Farmer continues to be the case that most directly deals with whether a Bivens remedy is available for a failure-to-protect claim resulting in physical injury. . . . Farmer practically dictates our ruling today because it is a given that the Fifth Amendment provides the same, if not more, protection for pretrial detainees than the Eighth Amendment does for imprisoned convicts. . . Accordingly, although Bistrian's claim derives from a different Amendment, it is not 'different in a meaningful way' from the claim at issue in Farmer. . . The failure-to-protect claim here thus does not call for any extension of Bivens. . . . As we previously concluded, 'Bistrian—as an inmate who at all relevant times was either not yet convicted or convicted but not yet sentenced—had a clearly established constitutional right to have prison officials protect him from inmate violence.'. . That conclusion was based on a right that was recognized in Farmer and not overruled by Abbasi, and thus a right that remains clearly established. . . Abbasi changed the framework of analysis for Bivens claims generally, but not the existence of the particular right to Bivens relief for prisoner-on-prisoner violence. . . . Bistrian's claim for damages for punitive detention is a different matter altogether. Unlike the failure-to-protect claim, the punitive-detention claim does amount to an extension of Bivens into a new context, and special factors do counsel against creating a new Bivens remedy in that context, so we hold there is no Bivens cause of action for that alleged violation of the Fifth Amendment. . . . Neither Carlson nor Davis addressed a constitutional right against punitive detention, and that alone warrants recognizing this as a new context. . . . Unlike Bistrian's failure-to-protect claim, which relates to a specific and isolated event, a punitive-detention claim more fully calls in question broad policies pertaining to the reasoning, manner, and extent of prison discipline. The warden and other prison officials have—and indeed must have—the authority to determine detention policies, to assess the endless variety of circumstances in which those policies may be implicated, and to decide when administrative detention is deserved and for how long. . . .Besides those serious separation of powers concerns, recognizing a Bivens remedy would likely cause 'an increase of suits by inmates, increased litigation costs to the government, and ... burdens on individual prison employees to defend such claims.'. . .Therefore, we will reverse the District Court's denial of summary judgment with respect to Bistrian's punitive-detention claim. It is not a valid Bivens action. . . . Likewise, we conclude that Bistrian's claim for retaliation under the First Amendment presents a new context for Bivens and that special factors counsel against allowing such a claim. In the heyday of Bivens expansion, we recognized an implied right to sue federal officials for damages for a violation of the First Amendment. [collecting cases] Since those cases were decided, however, the Supreme Court issued its opinion in Abbasi, which clearly communicates that expanding Bivens beyond those contexts already recognized by the Supreme Court is disfavored. . . It is Abbasi, not our own prior precedent, that must guide us now. . . .The Supreme Court has never recognized a Bivens remedy under the First Amendment. . . Accordingly, from the vantage of boundaries set by the Supreme Court, Bistrian's First Amendment retaliation claim is novel. We thus turn to the special factors analysis. . . . Bistrian's retaliation claim involves executive policies, implicates separation-of-power concerns, and threatens a large burden to both the judiciary and prison officials. We thus conclude that the special factors analysis prevents an extension of Bivens to cover such claims. Accordingly, we will reverse the District Court's denial of summary judgment with respect to his retaliation claim.") Vanderklok v. United States, 868 F.3d 189, 194, 197-200, 204-09 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Because Kieser sought and was denied summary judgment on the merits of Vanderklok's Fourth Amendment claim, rather than on the basis of qualified immunity, that claim cannot be reviewed on interlocutory appeal. By contrast, Kieser's appeal of the denial of qualified immunity as to Vanderklok's First Amendment claim is properly before us. As it turns out, however, a preliminary and dispositive question must be answered first: whether a First Amendment claim against a TSA employee for retaliatory prosecution even exists in the context of airport security screenings. Because we conclude that it does not, we will vacate the District Court's order, without reaching the issue of qualified immunity, and direct the District Court to enter judgment for Kieser on the First Amendment claim. . . .The qualified immunity dispute centers on whether a First Amendment right to be free from retaliation by a TSA employee was clearly established at the time of the incident in question. . . . In sum, our jurisdiction at this point extends only to the issue of whether Kieser ought to be immune from suit for Vanderklok's First Amendment retaliation claim, and, preliminary to that, whether such a claim exists at all in the specific circumstances of this case. . . . The Supreme Court has never implied a Bivens action under any clause of the First Amendment. . . .The present case compels us to decide the issue we assumed away in George. The facts here require it. Moreover, as the role of the TSA has become prevalent in the lives of the traveling populace, disputes involving airport screening personnel may come up with some frequency, and the existence of a Bivens action for First Amendment retaliation is no longer something that we should assume without deciding. Today we hold that Bivens does not afford a remedy against airport security screeners who allegedly retaliate against a traveler who exercises First Amendment rights. . . . It is not enough to argue, as Vanderklok does, that First Amendment retaliation claims have been permitted under Bivens before. We must look at the issue anew in this particular context, airport security, and as it pertains to this particular category of defendants, TSA screeners. . . .[F]or decades, the Supreme Court has repeatedly refused to extend Bivens actions beyond the specific clauses of the specific amendments for which a cause of action has already been implied, or even to other classes of defendants facing liability under those same clauses. . . . Instead, it has established a rigorous inquiry that must be undertaken before implying a Bivens cause of action in a new context or against a new category of defendants. . . .In summary, then, there can be a remedy against the United States in cases where the employee had the responsibility of an officer, and there can be a state law remedy against the individual when the offending TSA employee acted outside the scope of employment. Based on the District Court's orders as they now stand, however, there are no alternative judicial remedies available to Vanderklok, because the District Court concluded that Kieser was not an investigative or law enforcement officer and there was no challenge as to whether Kieser acted within the scope of his employment. . . .Here, Vanderklok asks us to imply a Bivens action for damages against a TSA agent. TSA employees like Kieser are tasked with assisting in a critical aspect of national security – securing our nation's airports and air traffic. The threat of damages liability could indeed increase the probability that a TSA agent would hesitate in making split-second decisions about suspicious passengers. In light of Supreme Court precedent, past and very recent, that is surely a special factor that gives us pause. . . .Ultimately, the role of the TSA in securing public safety is so significant that we ought not create a damages remedy in this context. The dangers associated with aircraft security are real and of high consequence.")

Fourth Circuit

Strickland v. United States, 32 F.4th 311, 373-74 (4th Cir. 2022) ("Applying the Abbasi framework to Strickland's Fifth Amendment Equal Protection claim, the first step is to determine whether that claim presents a new Bivens context. On the one hand, the Supreme Court has already extended Bivens to a Fifth Amendment Equal Protection claim arising in the context of sex discrimination in federal employment. . . In addition, there is relatively clear judicial guidance, albeit in the context of federal discrimination statutes rather than Bivens actions, as to how a supervisory official should respond to a complaint that an employee is being sexually harassed by another employee. But those two factors aside, Strickland's claim clearly appears to us to present a new context. To begin with, the defendants against whom the claim is asserted—a federal circuit judge, a federal public defender, and other federal judiciary employees—are strikingly different from the sole defendant in Davis, 'who was a United States Congressman at the time th[e] case commenced.'. . Further, the actions that Strickland seeks to challenge in her Fifth Amendment Equal Protection claim are more far-reaching than the one specific action that was challenged by the plaintiff in Davis, i.e., the defendant congressman's issuance of a letter terminating her employment because he believed that a man was needed in the position that she occupied. . . More specifically, Strickland is challenging defendants' response to her initial allegations of sexual harassment, as well as the manner in which the EDR Plan was executed by defendants in response to her request for an investigation and mediation. Further, unlike the situation in Davis, where the defendant congressman was not operating under any specific statutory or legal mandate when he issued the termination letter to the plaintiff, the defendants in this action were operating under the framework of the EDR Plan when they responded, or attempted to respond, to Strickland's allegations of sexual harassment. Finally, the fact that Congress has, to date, intentionally exempted the federal judiciary from the reach of anti-discrimination employment statutes appears to be a potential special factor that was not at issue in the previous Bivens cases. Thus, in sum, we conclude that Strickland's Fifth Amendment equal protection claim presents a new Bivens context. Because Strickland's Fifth Amendment equal protection claim presents a new Bivens context, the next question is whether there are special factors that counsel hesitation in the absence of affirmative action by Congress. As previously noted, Congress has, to date, intentionally exempted the federal judiciary from the reach of federal employment statutes (including, as discussed in greater detail below, the Civil Service Reform Act), and has instead effectively allowed the federal judiciary to police itself in terms of addressing claims of employment discrimination by federal judiciary employees. In light of that backdrop, it seems clear to us that the question of whether a damages action should be allowed against federal judicial officials in their individual capacities 'is a decision for the Congress to make, not the courts.'. . Thus, we conclude that Bivens should not be extended to the Fifth Amendment equal protection claim asserted by Strickland in her complaint.") Annappareddy v. Pascale, 996 F.3d 120, 134-38 (4th Cir. 2021) ("We have not yet applied the Abbasi standard to a factual context like the one presented here – where investigators and prosecutors allegedly participated together in a long-running scheme to fabricate and destroy evidence during a criminal investigation and prosecution. But as the district court noted, the Eighth Circuit has, in a set of appeals arising out of claims by several plaintiffs that a police officer, acting as a deputized U.S. Marshal, had exaggerated and invented facts and hidden exonerating evidence in order to implicate them in an alleged sex-trafficking operation. See Farah, 926 F.3d at 496–97; Ahmed v. Weyker, 984 F.3d 564, 566 (2020). In each case, that court held that Bivens could not be extended, under the Abbasi framework, to imply a cause of action to remedy the plaintiffs' wrongful arrests and prosecutions. Whether or not it would be sound policy to provide such a remedy, the court concluded, it would have to come from Congress, and not the courts. . . Against this backdrop, we turn now to the claims at issue in this case, starting with Annappareddy's two claims under the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause: that federal investigators violated his due process rights by fabricating evidence to secure the superseding indictment, and that federal investigators and prosecutors deprived him of due process by deliberately destroying exculpatory evidence. . . . Under Abbasi's first step, these claims clearly present a new Bivens context. As the district court correctly recognized, Bivens has never 'been extended to a Fifth Amendment due process claim.' . . . . And beyond the different right at issue, one of Annappareddy's Fifth Amendment claims also seeks to hold accountable a new set of defendants – federal prosecutors. . . By itself, these distinctions are enough to establish that we are in a new context for Bivens purposes. We also have little difficulty concluding that special factors counsel hesitation in extending the Bivens cause of action to this new constitutional right and class of defendants. Proving claims like these – the falsification and destruction of evidence by prosecutors as well as investigators, in connection with a criminal prosecution – would 'invite a wide-ranging inquiry into the evidence available to investigators, prosecutors, and the grand jury,'. . . and could require a jury to determine 'what [officers] knew, what [they] did not know, and [their] state of mind at the time[.]'. . All of these 'after-the-fact inquiries' pose the kind of 'risk of intrusion on executive-branch authority to enforce the law and prosecute crimes' that counsels against implying a cause of action for damages. . . . [As to Fourth Amendment claims] We start with whether Annappareddy's Fourth Amendment claims present a 'new context' under Abbasi's first step. The most analogous Supreme Court private-remedy case is Bivens itself, which recognized a cause of action against federal officers who violated the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights during a warrantless search and seizure. . . And there are respects in which Annappareddy's claims resemble those raised in Bivens. For instance, as in Bivens, the plaintiff seeks to hold accountable only line-level investigative officers, not high-ranking officials. . . And in both cases, the officers sought to enforce only ordinary criminal laws. . . Nevertheless, we are persuaded that each of these Fourth Amendment claims in fact arises in a different context than the one recognized in Bivens. . . . What Bivens involved was the Fourth Amendment right to be free of unreasonable warrantless searches and seizures; this case, by contrast, involves searches and a seizure conducted with a warrant. It thus implicates a distinct Fourth Amendment guarantee – that 'no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause,' see U.S. Const. amend. IV – governed by different legal standards. . . . For purposes of determining whether this is a 'new' Bivens context, we think the 'right at issue' here is meaningfully different from the one at issue in Bivens itself. . . . [W]e, like the district court, conclude that Annappareddy's Fourth Amendment claims are meaningfully different than those in Bivens, and, if permitted to proceed, would extend Bivens into a new context. . . .One special factor here is the existence of 'an alternative remedial structure,' even if it does not go so far as a Bivens remedy would. . . By itself, as the district court emphasized, that factor 'alone may limit the power of the Judiciary to infer a new Bivens cause of action.'. . And as the Eighth Circuit explained in Farah, Congress indeed has created a distinct and limited set of remedies to compensate individuals who suffer as a result of wrongful governmental conduct in the course of criminal prosecutions. . . . In short, we agree with the district court that 'special factors' counsel against extension of an implied cause of action into this new Bivens context. That does not mean that we can think of no policy reasons for making such a remedy available. But it does mean that 'whether a damages action should be allowed is a decision for the Congress to make, not the courts.'")

Earle v. Shreves, 990 F.3d 774, 776, 778-81 (4th Cir. 2021) ("In this case, we are called on to determine whether the implied constitutional cause of action recognized by the Supreme Court in Bivens . . . may be extended to include a federal inmate's claim that prison officials violated his First Amendment rights by retaliating against him for filing grievances. As we will explain, such an extension of Bivens is not permissible after Ziglar v. Abbasi . . . and Tun-Cos v. Perrotte. . . and we therefore affirm the district court's judgment dismissing the action. . . . Whether an implied damage remedy is available for a constitutional claim is logically 'antecedent' to any question about the merits of the claim. . . The implied-remedy question does not go to the jurisdiction of the court, and it is sometimes appropriate for a court to assume the existence of a Bivens remedy and dispose of the claim by resolving the constitutional question. . . In this case, because this area of the law is in flux and guidance would be beneficial, we believe it is appropriate to determine whether a Bivens remedy is available for Earle's First Amendment claim. . . .In sum, the recognition of a Bivens remedy in this case would work a significant intrusion into an area of prison management that demands quick response and flexibility, and it could expose prison officials to an influx of manufactured claims. And while the absence of a Bivens remedy forecloses any claims for monetary compensation, there are nonetheless other avenues available to inmates that offer the possibility of meaningful remedial relief for claims of retaliatory discipline. Under these circumstances, we believe that Congress, not the Judiciary, is in the best position to 'weigh the costs and benefits of allowing a damages action to proceed.' . . . Accordingly, because we find special factors that counsel hesitation before expanding the Bivens remedy, we must reject Earle's attempt to extend the Bivens remedy to his claim that the defendants violated his First Amendment rights by retaliating against him for filing grievances.")

Hicks v. Ferreyra, 965 F.3d 302, 309-12 (4th Cir. 2020) ("Here, the officers argue that their case – notwithstanding its similarities to Bivens, which likewise involved a Fourth Amendment claim against federal law enforcement officers – presents a 'new Bivens context,' and that allowing it to proceed runs afoul of Abbasi. Crucially, the officers raise this argument for the first time on appeal: At no point during the lengthy proceedings in the district court did the officers argue or even suggest that Hicks lacked a cause of action under Bivens. We thus conclude that this argument is forfeited on appeal. It is well established that this court 'do[es] not consider issues raised for the first time on appeal,' '[a]bsent exceptional circumstances.'. . .The officers do not dispute any of this longstanding doctrine. Instead they argue, in effect, that it does not apply here, because the error of which they complain is non-waivable. According to the officers, Abbasi sets out a framework 'that now must be applied in determining whether a Bivens remedy is available against a federal official,' under which courts first 'must inquire whether a given case presents a "new Bivens context,"' and, if it does, then it 'must, before extending Bivens liability, evaluate whether there are "special factors counselling hesitation."' . . And because the Abbasi analysis is mandatory, the officers argue, the district courts are obliged to take up the question sua sponte, even if the defendants in a Bivens action do not raise it. . . We disagree. As a general rule, 'the parties' litigation conduct' determines what issues are properly before a court, and a defense may be 'forfeited if the party asserting [it] waits too long to raise the point.'. . There is an exception for rules governing subject-matter jurisdiction, which may be raised by a party at any time or by a court on its own initiative. . . . But the availability of a Bivens cause of action does not fall within that exception, because it is not an issue that implicates a court's subject-matter jurisdiction. . . . To say that a court must apply a given analysis when it addresses a question is not to say that the court must address that question sua sponte when nobody has raised it. . . . Nor are we concerned that holding the officers to the normal consequences of this second forfeiture might risk a 'denial of fundamental justice.'. . The crux of the officers' claim, as described above, is that this case presents a new Bivens context,' different in some 'meaningful way' from cases in which the Supreme Court already has recognized a Bivens remedy. . . But along every dimension the Supreme Court has identified as relevant to the inquiry, this case appears to represent not an extension of Bivens so much as a replay: Just as in Bivens, Hicks seeks to hold accountable line-level agents of a federal criminal law enforcement agency, for violations of the Fourth Amendment, committed in the course of a routine law-enforcement action. . . Indeed, courts regularly apply Bivens to Fourth Amendment claims arising from police traffic stops like this one. . . On the record before us, enforcing our standard forfeiture rule works no fundamental injustice.")

Doe v. Meron, 929 F.3d 153, 169-70 (4th Cir. 2019) ("Applying the Abbasi framework here, Doe's constitutional claims present a new Bivens context because they differ in meaningful ways from previous Bivens cases. Beginning with Doe's Fourth Amendment claims, while the plaintiffs in Bivens also asserted a Fourth Amendment claim, the other circumstances surrounding the claims differ significantly. Similar to the differences described in Tun-Cos, the differences between Doe's claims and the claim recognized in Bivens include the rank of the officers and the legal mandate under which the officers were operating. Also in contrast to Bivens, these defendants were officers in the United States Navy or employees of the Department of Defense, operating under naval regulations. Likewise, Doe's Fifth Amendment claims differ significantly from the Fifth Amendment claim recognized by the Supreme Court in Davis. In Davis, the Court recognized an implied damages remedy under the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause for gender discrimination where an administrative assistant sued a congressman for firing her because of her gender. . . Unlike those alleged constitutional claims, Doe asserts multiple alleged Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause violations, including violations of his right to parentage, to familial relations and to equal protection of the laws. Additionally, there are meaningful differences between the rank of the officers involved and the legal mandate under which the officers were operating. We therefore find Doe's Fifth Amendment claim also presents a new Bivens context. Like his Fourth Amendment and Fifth Amendment claims, Doe's First Amendment claim also presents a new Bivens context. As Doe concedes, his First Amendment claim requires an extension of Bivens since it involves a new constitutional right. The Supreme Court has not recognized a Bivens remedy for an alleged violation of the First Amendment. Having determined that all Doe's constitutional claims present new Bivens contexts, we now consider whether any special factors counsel against extending a Bivens remedy. Multiple special factors counsel against such an extension. First, Doe's claims arose in a military context. . . . Second, Doe's claims would extend Bivens extraterritorially. . . Finally, the existence of an alternative remedial scheme, in this case an administrative claim under the Military Claims Act, counsels against extension. Applying the Abbasi framework, we conclude that Doe lacks an implied cause of action under the constitution, and we affirm the district court's dismissal of Doe's constitutional claims.")

Attkisson v. Holder, 925 F.3d 606, 621-22 (4th Cir. 2019) ("The plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment Bivens claim against Holder and Donahoe differs meaningfully from the claim raised in Bivens in numerous ways that are material under Abbasi. First, Holder and Donahoe held much higher ranks than the line-level FBI agents sued in Bivens. Second, a claim based on unlawful electronic surveillance presents wildly different facts and a vastly different statutory framework from a warrantless search and arrest. Finally, the plaintiffs seek to hold high-level officials accountable for what they themselves frame as policy-level decisions to target internal leaks to the media. In these circumstances, the plaintiffs' claim against Holder and Donahoe assuredly presents a 'new Bivens context.'. . Moreover, the plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment Bivens claim fails at the second step described in Abbasi. Various 'special factors' identified in the Abbasi decision counsel hesitation against recognizing a Bivens claim here. . . It is sufficient, however, to note that Congress has legislated extensively in the area of electronic surveillance and intrusions into electronic devices without authorizing damages for a Fourth Amendment violation in such circumstances. Indeed, Congress has created several private causes of actions under various statutes governing the surveillance and the integrity of personal computing devices, including the SCA, FISA, and the CFAA. That legislation suggests that Congress's 'failure to provide a damages remedy' for Fourth Amendment violations in similar factual circumstances is 'more than inadvertent,' and strongly counsels hesitation before creating such a remedy ourselves. . . Indeed, 'if there is an alternative remedial structure present in a certain case, that alone may limit the power of the Judiciary to infer a new Bivens cause of action.'. . In these circumstances, we discern 'sound reasons to think Congress might doubt the efficacy or necessity of a damages remedy as part of the system for enforcing the law and correcting a wrong,' and we are therefore obliged to 'refrain from creating the remedy.'. . Accordingly, we are satisfied to affirm the district court's dismissal of the plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment Bivens claim with respect to Holder and Donahoe.")

Tun-Cos v. Perrotte, 922 F.3d 514, 517-18, 520-21, 528 (4th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2565 (2020) ("Applying the Supreme Court's recent jurisprudence on Bivens actions, we reverse, concluding that a Bivens remedy is not available in the circumstances of this case. Where there is no statute authorizing a claim for money damages, 'it is a significant step under separation-of-powers principles' for a court to impose damages liability on federal officials. . . In such cases, '[t]he question is who should decide whether to provide for a damages remedy, Congress or the courts?'. . . 'The answer most often will be Congress.'. . Indeed, in the course of repeatedly declining to provide a Bivens remedy in recent years, the Supreme Court has now made clear that 'extend[ing] Bivens liability to any new context or new category of defendants' is highly 'disfavored.'. . We thus conclude that, because the plaintiffs seek to extend Bivens liability to a context the Supreme Court has yet to recognize and there are 'special factors counselling hesitation in the absence of affirmative action by Congress,'. . . the plaintiffs' action for damages should be dismissed. Therefore, we reverse the district court's order denying the ICE agents' motion to dismiss and remand with instructions to dismiss the plaintiffs' action. . . . At its core, the plaintiffs' complaint alleges that ICE agents, in the context of enforcing the INA, violated their Fourth Amendment rights in stopping them, detaining them, and entering their home, and their Fifth Amendment rights in discriminating against them based on their ethnicity. They seek money damages under Bivens. Such conduct, if engaged in by state officials, could give rise to a cause of action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. But § 1983 does not provide a cause of action against federal officials, and there is no analogous statute imposing damages liability on federal officials. . . . In the almost 40 years since Carlson, . . the Court has declined to countenance Bivens actions in any additional context. . . . The Court's most recent guidance on the continued availability of Bivens actions came in Ziglar v. Abbasi, where the Court expressed open hostility to expanding Bivens liability and noted that 'in light of the changes to the Court's general approach to recognizing implied damages remedies, it is possible that the analysis in the Court's three Bivens cases might have been different if they were decided today.'. . . At bottom, we conclude that the plaintiffs' complaint seeks to extend the Bivens remedy to a new context and that the application of Bivens to this new context causes us to hesitate, as it raises the substantial question of whether Congress would want the plaintiffs to have a money damages remedy against ICE agents for their allegedly wrongful conduct when enforcing the INA. Accordingly, we conclude that no Bivens remedy is available. Because of this ruling, we do not reach the ICE agents' claim of qualified immunity.")

Fifth Circuit

Butler v. Porter, 999 F.3d 287, 294-95 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 766 (2022) ("Butler has not raised any issues that draw the conclusion in Watkins into question due to the steps we take in addressing a Bivens claim. The first step requires determining 'whether the claim arises in a new Bivens context, i.e., whether the case is different in a meaningful way from previous Bivens cases decided by [the Supreme] Court.'. . That is the case here. We have already concluded that 'First Amendment retaliation claims are a "new" Bivens context.'. . This 'new' designation is appropriate because previously recognized Bivens remedies have arisen under different constitutional amendments and factually distinct circumstances. . . Given our previous holdings and the lack of Supreme Court precedent on the issue, . . . we conclude that Butler's First Amendment retaliation claim presents a new Bivens context[.] . . We thus proceed to the second step of the analysis. We also look at whether 'there are special factors counselling hesitation in the absence of affirmative action by Congress.'. . .The 'special factors' inquiry 'concentrate[s] on whether the Judiciary is well suited, absent congressional action or instruction, to consider and weigh the costs and benefits of allowing a damages action to proceed.'. . Such factors include whether Congress has legislated on the right at issue and whether alternative remedies exist for protecting that right. . . Courts also consider separation-of-powers concerns. . . Importantly, '[e]ven before Abbasi clarified the special factors inquiry, we agreed with our sister circuits that the only relevant threshold—that a factor counsels hesitation—is remarkably low.'. .At least two special factors counsel hesitation here. First, congressional legislation already exists in this area. Congress addressed the issue of prisoners' constitutional claims in the PLRA, . . . which 'does not provide for a standalone damages remedy against federal jailers.'. . This supports a conclusion that Congress considered—and rejected—the possibility of federal damages for First Amendment retaliation claims like Butler's. . . Such 'legislative action suggesting that Congress does not want a damages remedy is itself a factor counseling hesitation.'. . Second, separation-of-powers concerns counsel against extending Bivens. . . . Extending Bivens to First Amendment retaliation claims like Butler's would run afoul of this restraint and risk improperly entangling courts in matters committed to other branches. Indeed, because of the very complex nature of managing federal prisons, such a holding would substantially impinge on the executive branch, in addition to the legislative branch. Such a result would be a paradigmatic violation of separation-of-powers principles. Additionally, as Watkins explained, a robust amount of case law from other circuits supports this conclusion. [collecting cases] As a result, even if Watkins had come out the other way, this case would be subject to qualified immunity given the lack of 'clearly established' law supporting Butler's claim.")

Watkins v. Three Administrative Remedy Coordinators of Bureau of Prisons, 998 F.3d 682, 685-86 (5th Cir. 2021) ("Although Watkins asserts Bivens claims against the food administrators and foremen under the First Amendment, Fifth Amendment, and Eighth Amendment, his claims are best construed under the First Amendment since he claims that the defendants retaliated against him for filing grievances. Because Watkins's claims appear nothing like the Bivens trilogy, we conclude that his claims arise in a new context. Furthermore, this case presents special factors counseling hesitation. The 'most important' Bivens question is 'who should decide whether to provide for a damages remedy, Congress or the courts?'. . Like in Mesa, the answer to that question here is Congress. The Prison Litigation Reform Act, . . . which governs lawsuits brought by prisoners, 'does not provide for a standalone damages remedy against federal jailers.'. . So out of respect for Congress and the longstanding principle of separation-of-powers, we cannot imply such a remedy in this case. In sum, we decline to extend Bivens to include First Amendment retaliation claims against prison officials, joining our sister courts that have recently considered the matter. See Bistrian v. Levi, 912 F.3d 79, 96 (3d Cir. 2018); Earle v. Shreves, 990 F.3d 774, 781 (4th Cir. 2021). Our holding is underscored by the fact that the Supreme Court has not only never recognized a Bivens cause of action under the First Amendment, Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658, 663 n.4, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012), but also once rejected a First Amendment retaliation Bivens claim for federal employees, Bush v. Lucas, 462 U.S. 367, 368, 103 S.Ct. 2404, 76 L.Ed.2d 648 (1983).")

Byrd v. Lamb, 990 F.3d 879, 882 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2850 (2022) ("In Oliva, we held that Bivens claims are limited to three situations. First, 'manacling the plaintiff in front of his family in his home and strip-searching him in violation of the Fourth Amendment.'. . Second, 'discrimination on the basis of sex by a congressman against a staff person in violation of the Fifth Amendment.'. . Third, 'failure to provide medical attention to an asthmatic prisoner in federal custody in violation of the Eighth Amendment.' . . 'Virtually everything else is a "new context."'. . To determine whether Byrd's case presents a new context, we must determine whether his case falls squarely into one of the established Bivens categories, or if it is 'different in a meaningful way from previous Bivens cases decided by [the Supreme] Court.'. . Here, although Byrd alleges violations of the Fourth Amendment, as did the plaintiff in Bivens, Byrd's lawsuit differs from Bivens in several meaningful ways. This case arose in a parking lot, not a private home as was the case in Bivens[.] . . Agent Lamb prevented Byrd from leaving the parking lot; he was not making a warrantless search for narcotics in Byrd's home, as was the case in Bivens. . . The incident between the two parties involved Agent Lamb's suspicion of Byrd harassing and stalking his son, not a narcotics investigation as was the case in Bivens. . . Agent Lamb did not manacle Byrd in front of his family, nor strip-search him, as was the case in Bivens. . . Nor did Lamb discriminate based on sex like in Davis[.] . . Nor did he fail to provide medical attention like in Carlson[.] . . As explained in Oliva, Byrd's case presents a new context. We must also determine whether any special factors counsel against extending Bivens. Here, as in Oliva, separation of powers counsels against extending Bivens. . . Congress did not make individual officers statutorily liable for excessive-force or unlawful-detention claims, and the 'silence of Congress is relevant.'. . This special factor gives us 'reason to pause' before extending Bivens. . . For these reasons, we reject Byrd's request to extend Bivens. Because we do not extend Bivens to Byrd's lawsuit, we need not address whether Agent Lamb is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Byrd v. Lamb, 990 F.3d 879, 883-85 (5th Cir. 2021) (Willett, J., specially concurring), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2850 (2022) ("The majority opinion correctly denies Bivens relief. Middle-management circuit judges must salute smartly and follow precedent. And today's result is precedentially inescapable: Private citizens who are brutalized—even killed—by rogue federal officers can find little solace in Bivens. Between 1971 and 1980, the Supreme Court recognized a Bivens claim in three different cases, involving three different constitutional violations under the Fourth, Fifth, and Eighth Amendments. . . Those nine years represent the entire lifespan of Bivens. For four decades now, the Supreme Court, while stopping short of overruling Bivens, has 'cabined the doctrine's scope, undermined its foundation, and limited its precedential value.'. . Since 1980, the Supreme Court has 'consistently rebuffed' pleas to extend Bivens, even going so far as to suggest that the Court's Bivens trilogy was wrongly decided. . . The Bivens doctrine, if not overruled, has certainly been overtaken. Our recent decision in Oliva v. Nivar erases any doubt. . . José Oliva was a 70-year-old Vietnam veteran who was choked and assaulted by federal police in an unprovoked attack at a VA hospital. The Oliva panel isolated the precise facts of the three Supreme Court cases that recognized Bivens liability, . . . quoted the Court's recent admonition that extending Bivens was 'disfavored judicial activity,'. . . and concluded that Oliva had no constitutional remedy. 'Virtually everything' beyond the specific facts of the Bivens trilogy 'is a "new context,"' the panel held. . . And new context = no Bivens claim. My big-picture concern as a federal judge—indeed, as an everyday citizen—is this: If Bivens is off the table, whether formally or functionally, and if the Westfall Act preempts all previously available state-law constitutional tort claims against federal officers acting within the scope of their employment, . . . do victims of unconstitutional conduct have any judicial forum whatsoever? Are all courthouse doors—both state and federal—slammed shut? If so, and leaving aside the serious constitutional concerns that would raise, does such wholesale immunity induce impunity, giving the federal government a pass to commit one-off constitutional violations? Chief Justice John Marshall warned in 1803 that when the law no longer furnishes a 'remedy for the violation of a vested legal right,' the United States 'cease[s] to deserve th[e] high appellation' of being called 'a government of laws, and not of men.'. . Fast forward two centuries, and redress for a federal officer's unconstitutional acts is either extremely limited or wholly nonexistent, allowing federal officials to operate in something resembling a Constitution-free zone. Bivens today is essentially a relic, technically on the books but practically a dead letter, meaning this: If you wear a federal badge, you can inflict excessive force on someone with little fear of liability. At bottom, Bivens poses the age-old structural question of American government: who decides—the judiciary, by creating implied damages actions for constitutional torts, or Congress, by reclaiming its lawmaking prerogative to codify a Bivens-type remedy (or by nixing the preemption of state-law tort suits against federal officers)? Justices Thomas and Gorsuch have called for Bivens to be overruled, contending it lacks any historical basis. . . Some constitutional scholars counter that judge-made tort remedies against lawless federal officers date back to the Founding. . . Putting that debate aside, Congress certainly knows how to provide a damages action for unconstitutional conduct. Wrongs inflicted by state officers are covered by § 1983. But wrongs inflicted by federal officers are not similarly righted, leaving constitutional interests violated but not vindicated. And it certainly smacks of self-dealing when Congress subjects state and local officials to money damages for violating the Constitution but gives a pass to rogue federal officials who do the same. Such imbalance—denying federal remedies while preempting nonfederal remedies—seems innately unjust. I am certainly not the first to express unease that individuals whose constitutional rights are violated at the hands of federal officers are essentially remedy-less. . . A written constitution is mere meringue when rights can be violated with nonchalance. I add my voice to those lamenting today's rights-without-remedies regime, hoping (against hope) that as the chorus grows louder, change comes sooner.")

Oliva v. Nivar, 973 F.3d 438, 442, 444 (5th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1669 (2021) ("Today, Bivens claims generally are limited to the circumstances of the Supreme Court's trilogy of cases in this area: (1) manacling the plaintiff in front of his family in his home and strip-searching him in violation of the Fourth Amendment, see Bivens, 403 U.S. at 389–90, 91 S.Ct. 1999; (2) discrimination on the basis of sex by a congressman against a staff person in violation of the Fifth Amendment, see Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 228, 99 S.Ct. 2264, 60 L.Ed.2d 846 (1979); and (3) failure to provide medical attention to an asthmatic prisoner in federal custody in violation of the Eighth Amendment, see Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14, 100 S.Ct. 1468, 64 L.Ed.2d 15 (1980). Virtually everything else is a 'new context.'. . . That the FTCA might not give Oliva everything he seeks is . . . no reason to extend Bivens.")

Canada v. United States, 950 F.3d 299, 307, 312 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Canada contends that the Supreme Court recognized a Bivens claim for Fifth Amendment Due Process violations in Davis, and thus his claims do not present a new Constitutional context. His reliance on Davis is misplaced. The Supreme Court has made clear that claims for violations of Fifth Amendment rights can still be brought in a new context. . . . [T]he proper test is whether the case differs in a meaningful way from Bivens, Davis, or Carlson. . . Canada's claims that IRS agents intentionally manipulated a penalty assessment to ensure he could not pay the amount and sue for a refund 'bear little resemblance to the three Bivens claims the Court has approved in the past.'. . Thus, contrary to Canada's argument, the facts of this case clearly present a new context for a Bivens remedy. . . . Simply put, Congress has passed several statutes concerning the system for adjudicating tax disputes and damage remedies for taxpayers. Absent from this system, however, is a claim for damages for taxpayers who, like Canada, accuse IRS agents of intentionally imposing a tax penalty too high to pay before seeking judicial review. Congress' silence strongly suggests this is more than a mere oversight. In any event, this court cannot recognize an implied Bivens claim without violating the separation-of-powers principles that are at the core of the special factors analysis. . . The district court below properly found that Canada's claims against the Individual Defendants alleged a new Bivens context and that special factors exist under Ziglar. We therefore affirm the dismissal of those claims.")

Petzold v. Rostollan, 946 F.3d 242, 248 & n.21 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Almost a half-century ago, the Supreme Court in Bivens approved an implied damages remedy against federal officials who violate the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures. The Court later extended Bivens to Eighth Amendment claims of cruel and unusual punishment. And while the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause prohibits deliberate indifference to prisoners' medical needs, it is unclear if the Bivens remedy extends to this context. [footnotes omitted] We need not decide this question today; instead we assume that Bivens reaches Petzold's Eighth Amendment claims of deliberate indifference and address the claims' merit. . . . The Supreme Court has explicitly blessed, post-Abbasi, the assume-then-dispose approach we employ as 'appropriate' for 'many cases.' Hernandez v. Mesa, 137 S. Ct. 2003, 2007 (2017) ("[D]isposing of a Bivens claim by resolving the constitutional question, while assuming the existence of a Bivens remedy[,] is appropriate in many cases." (emphasis added)). And this approach is certainly not *in*appropriate for Petzold's routine constitutional questions—he doesn't assert 'sensitive' claims or ones with 'far reaching' consequences. . . Although relevant circuit caselaw is limited, district courts also follow the Court's mandate; they assume-then-dispose in 'many' 'appropriate' cases, just as we do today. [citing cases] But if we were to address whether Bivens extends to this context in light of Abbasi, Petzold's deliberate-indifference claims based on denied medical treatment are likely a 'new [Bivens] context' because they 'differ in a meaningful way' from existing Bivens claims. . . Here, the federal officers involved were low-level, the specific actions distinct, and the alternative remedial process robust. . . And we are unlikely to imply a Bivens remedy for this new context as 'special factors' counsel hesitation in federal prison administration.")

Petzold v. Rostollan, 946 F.3d 242, 255-56 (5th Cir. 2019) (Oldham, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The Supreme Court has told us that 'the Bivens question ... is antecedent to the other questions presented' in a case like this. . . 'The Bivens question,' of course, is whether Mr. Petzold has an implied cause of action under the Eighth Amendment. I agree with the Court's cogent explanation for why he does not. . . In my view, that is the beginning and end of this case. It is true that, in the past, courts occasionally skipped the antecedent Bivens question and rejected plaintiffs' claims on the underlying constitutional question. . . But those cases came before Abbasi. And it is not clear that we have the same liberty today. After Abbasi and Hernandez, once we determine the plaintiff has no cause of action, we should say so and no more.")

Cantu v. Moody, 933 F.3d 414, 421-23 (5th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 112 (2020) ("Since 1980, . . . 'the Court has refused' every Bivens claim presented to it. . . The Court has emphasized that Bivens, Davis, and Carlson remain good law. . . At the same time, 'it is possible that the analysis in the Court's three Bivens cases might have been different if they were decided today.'. . And it has admonished us to exercise 'caution' in the 'disfavored judicial activity' of extending Bivens to any new set of facts. . . So, before allowing Cantú to sue under Bivens, we must ask two questions. First, do Cantú's claims fall into one of the three existing Bivens actions? Second, if not, should we recognize a new Bivens action here? The answer to both questions is no.

Cantú purports to address the first question. And he thinks he's home free because his malicious-prosecution-type-claim alleges a violation of his Fourth Amendment right to be free from unlawful seizures—the same right recognized in Bivens. That's wrong. Courts do not define a Bivens cause of action at the level of 'the Fourth Amendment' or even at the level of 'the unreasonable-searches-and-seizures clause.'. . . What if a plaintiff asserts a violation of the same clause of the same amendment in the same way? That still doesn't cut it. In Chappell v. Wallace, 462 U.S. 296, 103 S.Ct. 2362, 76 L.Ed.2d 586 (1983), the Supreme Court rejected a Fifth Amendment Due Process claim for unlawful termination (the claim at issue in Davis) because the plaintiff was a military servicemember rather than a congressional employee. . . The Court has done the same thing in the Eighth Amendment cruel-and-unusual-punishment context. . . Naturally, these principles apply in the Fourth Amendment context too. . . . The Supreme Court recently addressed this threshold question. And it rejected just this sort of 'same right' reasoning. . . . In the wake of Abbasi, our Court and at least one of our sister circuits have rejected new Fourth Amendment claims under Bivens. See Hernandez v. Mesa, 885 F.3d 811, 816–17 (5th Cir. 2018) (en banc); Tun-Cos v. Perrotte, 922 F.3d 514, 517–18 (4th Cir. 2019). . . . By any measure, Cantú's claims are meaningfully different from the Fourth Amendment claim at issue in Bivens. He does not allege the officers entered his home without a warrant or violated his rights of privacy. Rather, Cantú alleges Moody and LaBuz violated the Fourth Amendment by falsely stating in affidavits that Cantú willingly took possession of the cooler ... to suggest he knowingly participated in a drug transaction ... to induce prosecutors to charge him ... to cause Cantú to be seized. . . This claim involves different conduct by different officers from a different agency. The officers' alleged conduct is specific in one sense: They allegedly falsified affidavits. But it's general in another: Cantú claims Moody and LaBuz induced prosecutors to charge him without any basis, which led to unjustified detention. The connection between the officers' conduct and the injury thus involves intellectual leaps that a textbook forcible seizure never does. . . . This is therefore a new context, and Cantú's claims cannot be shoehorned into Bivens, Davis, or Carlson. The second question is whether we should engage in the 'disfavored judicial activity' of recognizing a new Bivens action. . . Again, no. There are legion 'special factors' counseling that result. [Discussing factors weighing against recognizing Bivens claim here]")

Cantu v. Moody, 933 F.3d 414, 424-25 (5th Cir. 2019), 141 S. Ct. 112 (2020) (Graves, J., dissenting in part) ("I respectfully dissent from the majority's opinion insofar as it concludes there is no Bivens cause of action for fabrication of evidence. I agree with the majority's conclusion that Cantú's claim of malicious prosecution/fabrication of evidence presents a 'new context' for a Bivens claim under Supreme Court precedent. However, while the majority concludes several special factors counsel against recognizing a new claim, I would reach the opposite conclusion and determine no such factors dictate against recognizing a new Bivens action here. . . . Here, Cantú seeks to hold accountable two individual law enforcement officers who allegedly lied to support a finding of probable cause and a grand jury indictment, thereby leading to his prosecution and two years of imprisonment. This is exactly the type of run-of-the-mill 'law enforcement overreach' claim Abbasi emphasized could still be recognized under Bivens. . . In the instant case, there are no national security concerns, . . . no broad governmental policies at stake, and no high-level executive officials being sued for the actions of their subordinates. Nor is the giving of affidavits by law enforcement officials a heavily regulated area closely overseen by Congress so as to suggest Congress prefers courts not to interfere. . . Lastly, the legal standards for adjudicating this type of claim are 'well established and easily administrable,' meaning it is a 'workable cause of action.'")

Maria S. as Next Fried of E.H.F. v. Garza, 912 F.3d 778, 780-85 (5th Cir. 2019) ("The district court granted summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity, but the defendants prevail on an alternative basis: the plaintiffs lack an implied cause of action under Bivens. . . .When the district court addressed the Bivens issue, it lacked the guidance of the Supreme Court's recent elucidation of Bivens in Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843 (2017). Abbasi stressed that any extension of Bivens to new factual scenarios is now a '"disfavored" judicial activity.' . . The district court also lacked the guidance of Hernandez v. Mesa, this court's en banc application of Abbasi. . . In fact, the district court's Bivens analysis relied in part on the original panel opinion in Hernandez, which extended Bivens and which was repudiated by the en banc court. . . . There is no question that this case involves a 'new context,' and the district court acknowledged as much. Under Abbasi, there is a 'new context' whenever a 'case is different in a meaningful way' from prior Bivens cases. . . Neither the Supreme Court nor this court has ever implied a Bivens cause of action for a claim that an alien's death in another country was caused by the deprivation of procedural due process by CBP agents in the United States. . . . The comprehensive federal regulations governing immigration and the removal process weigh against creating a damages remedy in this context. . . .Creating a damages remedy against CBP agents for any injuries allegedly tied to deprivations of procedural due process during deportation would also 'yield a tidal wave of litigation.'. . One CBP supervisor testified in this case that roughly 95% of all aliens processed at the Weslaco facility choose 'voluntary removal.' If we were to extend a remedy in this case, any aliens selecting 'voluntary removal' on Form I-826 could subsequently sue on the theory that CBP agents coerced their signatures. Many of these claims would involve a he-said-she-said scenario, making them difficult to dismiss on summary judgment and costly to litigate. The danger of such litigation would, in turn, likely force CBP to change policies and procedures, even to adopt excessive precautions to prevent potential liability. Whatever the effect of such changes, the crucial point is that the consideration of policy changes is 'for the Congress, not the Judiciary, to undertake.'")

Sixth Circuit

Elhady v. Unidentified CBP Agents, 18 F.4th 880, 883-87 (6th Cir. 2021), pet. for cert. filed sub nom Elhady v. Bradley, No. 21-1492 (U.S. May 25, 2022) ("To ensure respect for these foundational principles, the Supreme Court devised a two-part inquiry to determine when we should engage in the 'disfavored judicial activity' of recognizing a new Bivens action. . . And under this exacting test, the answer will almost always be never. First, we ask whether the claim arises in a new Bivens context. And our 'understanding of a "new context" is broad.'. . The context is new if it differs in virtually any way from the Bivens trilogy. . .If the context does differ, we move to the second question: whether any special factors counsel against extending a cause of action. . . The Supreme Court has 'not attempted to create an exhaustive list of factors,' but it has explained that the separation of powers should be a guiding light. . . For that reason, the Court has told us that we must not create a cause of action if there's 'a single sound reason' to leave that choice to Congress. . . That's because we're not well-suited to decide when the costs and benefits weigh in favor of (or against) allowing damages claims. . . And trying to make those decisions would disrespect our limited role under the Constitution's separation of powers, even if we think it would be good policy to do so. . . . In Hernandez v. Mesa (Hernandez I), the Court advised lower courts in our position—that is, reviewing an interlocutory appeal of qualified immunity—to first consider the Bivens question. . . There, the Fifth Circuit resolved the case based on qualified immunity's clearly established prong. . . The Supreme Court disagreed with that approach. The Court explained that, while it had assumed a cause of action in prior cases, it is often imprudent to do so. . . So the Court vacated the Fifth Circuit's judgment and remanded for it to address whether Bivens provided a cause of action. . . Prudence demands we follow suit here. To bypass the Bivens question would 'allow new causes of action to spring into existence merely through the dereliction of a party.'. . It would also risk 'needless expenditure' of time and money in cases like this one, where Supreme Court precedent can easily resolve Bivens's applicability. . . Why analyze qualified immunity when it is an utterly unnecessary exercise? Constitutional structure points the same way. Plaintiffs like Elhady often have no cause of action unless we extend Bivens. And if there is no cause of action, courts should stop there. After all, Article III bars federal courts from giving 'opinions advising what the law would be upon a hypothetical state of facts.'. . Any qualified-immunity conclusion here is hypothetical if Elhady can't sue. The risk of issuing an advisory opinion is compounded in this context because addressing qualified immunity involves answering a constitutional question. And the constitutional-avoidance doctrine directs federal courts to sidestep constitutional questions whenever 'there is some other ground upon which to dispose of the case.'. . . Thus, we begin by focusing on the Bivens question. . . . When considering whether to extend Bivens, the Court explained that 'the most important question' is whether courts should make that call. . . The correct answer will almost always be no. . . That was 'undoubtedly the answer' in Hernandez II. . . And that is undoubtedly the answer here. First, Elhady's claims occurred in what Hernandez II recognized as a 'markedly new' Bivens context: the border. . . That context is new regardless of what constitutional claim is at issue. . . Indeed, the district court recognized—even before Hernandez II came down—that claims against border-patrol agents constitute a new Bivens context. . . And second, Hernandez II made clear that national security will always be a special factor counseling against extending Bivens to the border context. . . That is true regardless of whether the plaintiff is a United States citizen. The district court, however, believed that the defendants had 'offered no plausible explanation why intentionally placing a detainee in a freezing-cold holding cell protects national security.'. . But as the Supreme Court instructed in Hernandez II, '[t]he question is not whether national security requires such conduct—of course, it does not—but whether the Judiciary should alter the framework established by the political branches for addressing cases ... at the border.'. . The Court made its answer to that question clear: It should not. Nor does it matter that this case is not a carbon copy of Hernandez II. Hernandez

II involved a cross-border shooting whereas this case concerns conditions of confinement in a stateside facility; Hernandez II involved a Mexican citizen whereas this case involves a United States citizen. Such differences are of no moment. What matters is that both cases involve claims against border-patrol officers serving in their capacity as agents protecting the border. In this context, the Supreme Court has spoken: Bivens is unavailable. . . Moreover, we are in good company here. Every other circuit (except the Ninth) faced with an invitation to expand Bivens to the border/immigration context has held firm. [collecting cases from 4th, 5th, and 11th Circuits] Recently, the Ninth Circuit parted company with these circuits over three thoughtful dissentals (signed by twelve judges). Boule v. Egbert, 998 F.3d 370 (9th Cir. 2021). But that opinion is no longer on the books because the Supreme Court has since granted certiorari. Egbert v. Boule, No. 21-147, --- S. Ct. ---, 2021 WL 5148065 (Nov. 5, 2021) (mem.). In short, when it comes to the border, the Bivens issue is not difficult—it does not apply. And district courts would be wise to start and end there.")

Elhady v. Unidentified CBP Agents, 18 F.4th 880, 888-89 (6th Cir. 2021) (Rogers, J., dissenting), pet. for cert. filed sub nom Elhady v. Bradley, No. 21-1492 (U.S. May 25, 2022) ("Whether Elhady has a cause of action under Bivens is a close question, and in light of the Supreme Court's guidance in Wood v. Milyard, it is imprudent to decide such a difficult issue when the Government explicitly declined to ask us to consider it. Hernandez v. Mesa and this case both involve border patrol officials and incidents that occurred close to the border. . . But there are also critical factual differences. The cross-border shooting in Hernandez caused the death of a Mexican citizen on Mexican soil, an 'international incident' that caused a real diplomatic dispute between the United States and Mexico that should be, and was being, 'addressed through diplomatic channels.'. . The Supreme Court focused on 'the potential effect on foreign relations,' and emphasized that '[t]he political branches, not the Judiciary, have the responsibility and institutional capacity to weigh foreign-policy concerns.'. . The Court also found relevant several statutory provisions that specifically distinguish claims that have international elements from claims that do not. . . This case involves the alleged treatment of a U.S. citizen within the United States. The facts here are also very different from those in Ziglar v. Abbasi, in which the plaintiffs were foreign nationals residing illegally in the United States and were detained in the immediate aftermath of 9/11 based on suspected ties to terrorism. . . Bradley has not argued that any national security or foreign relations circumstances impacted this case in particular. The facts indicate that Elhady was an American college student who was detained within the United States without any explanation or apparent justification. That arguably makes this case more analogous to Bivens itself, in which federal agents abused a U.S. citizen in his home and in a court building in New York. . . Although the Court has recently limited the reach of Bivens, it does not necessarily follow that U.S. citizens have no remedy if they are abused within the United States by their own border patrol officials. It is thus imprudent to reach the difficult Bivens question on this appeal when Government counsel for Bradley repeatedly indicated that he was not raising the issue.")

Angulo v. Brown, 978 F.3d 942, 948 n.3 (5th Cir. 2020) ("As an antecedent matter, the Government asserted—briefly—that Angulo should not have recourse to a Bivens action in the first place because the border is a new Bivens context and special factors counsel against implying an action. . . Although this court has recognized Bivens actions against CBP officers in the past, . . . the Supreme Court's recent ruling in Hernandez v. Mesa strongly implies that proximity to the border alone is sufficient to qualify as a 'new context' in which Bivens is unavailable[.] . . . Nonetheless, we will assume without deciding that a Bivens remedy is available for three reasons. First, the international implications of a cross-border shooting—of vital importance in Hernandez—are not present here, where the dispute is more similar to standard Fourth Amendment unreasonable seizure cases to which Bivens has applied in the past. Second, the Supreme Court has expressly endorsed the 'assume-and-dispose' approach in 'appropriate' cases. . . This court has done the same. . . Third, the Supreme Court has 'repeatedly stressed the importance of resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage of the litigation.'. . We can resolve this case now, without having to decide—lacking the benefit of a district court opinion and with only a single paragraph of briefing—whether Hernandez should be understood to categorically preclude Bivens actions against CBP agents at the border. So, we do.")

Callahan v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 965 F.3d 520, 523-25 (6th Cir. 2020) ("The problem for Callahan is not just that there has been a long drought since the Court last recognized a new Bivens action or even that the Court has cut back on the three constitutional claims once covered. What's harder still is that the Court has never recognized a Bivens action for any First Amendment right, . . . and it rejected a First Amendment retaliation claim decades ago for federal employees, Bush v. Lucas, 462 U.S. 367, 368, 103 S.Ct. 2404, 76 L.Ed.2d 648 (1983). There's something to be said for leaving it at that and pointing out that the best idea for people in Callahan's situation is to urge Congress to create a cause of action for constitutional claims against federal officials like the one used against state officials. . . But even if we look at the court-created criteria for ascertaining whether a Bivens claim exists, they do not help Callahan. [court discusses criteria] . . . .While Callahan does not raise the point, it's true that we once allowed a prisoner to seek damages from officials who opened his legal mail. Merriweather v. Zamora, 569 F.3d 307, 310 (6th Cir. 2009). But the opinion assumed that Bivens applied without analyzing the issue, and Callahan at any rate does not claim that the pictures amount to legal mail. Also true is the reality that our court has questioned the prison grievance system's adequacy as a Bivens alternative. Koprowski v. Baker, 822 F.3d 248, 256–57 (6th Cir. 2016). But the brief discussion observed only that the grievance system's existence did not suffice to reject a Bivens claim already in existence. . . We said nothing about its relevance to the creation of a new Bivens claim.")

Callahan v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 965 F.3d 520, 526-27, 534 (6th Cir. 2020) (Moore, J., dissenting) ("Though whether Bivens relief is available is an 'antecedent' question to whether a constitutional violation occurred, we are not required to answer it first. . . '[I]n many cases,' it 'is appropriate' not to decide the Bivens question, but to 'resolv[e] the constitutional question, while assuming the existence of a Bivens remedy.'. .Given the majority's conclusion that Callahan would not satisfy Turner, its Bivens analysis is unnecessary. Put differently, the result of the majority opinion is the same, with or without the Bivens analysis. And considering the Supreme Court's consistent approach to 'assume[ ] without deciding that Bivens extends to First Amendment claims,' Wood v. Moss, 572 U.S. 744, 757, 134 S.Ct. 2056, 188 L.Ed.2d 1039 (2014), it is also inappropriate to decide the Bivens issue when the majority concludes that Callahan cannot demonstrate a First Amendment violation. . . . I would reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to the defendants on claims for equitable and declaratory relief and also reverse the district court's dismissal of Callahan's Bivens claims for money damages. I therefore dissent.")

Jacobs v. Alam, 915 F.3d 1028, 1036-39 (6th Cir. 2019) ("We deal here not with a request by plaintiff to extend Bivens, but rather with defendants' contention that we need to reexamine our Bivens jurisprudence following the Supreme Court's two most recent Bivens decisions—Ziglar and Hernandez. Before the Supreme Court decided Ziglar and Hernandez, defendants' appeal would have no merit. . . . Ziglar and Hernandez are not the silver bullets defendants claim them to be—plaintiff's claims are run-of-the-mill challenges to 'standard law enforcement operations' that fall well within Bivens itself. In arguing plaintiff's Bivens claims are 'new,' defendants make much out of factual differences between Bivens—which involved a warrantless search, unreasonable force during arrest, and an arrest without probable cause . . . and this case. Yet at no point do defendants articulate why this case 'differ[s] in a meaningful way' under Ziglar's rubric. Jacobs's action presents no such novel circumstances identified in Ziglar. We deal not with overarching challenges to federal policy in claims brought against top executives, but with claims against three individual officers for their alleged 'overreach,'. . . in effectuating a 'standard "law enforcement operation[.]"'. . . Despite defendants' protestations to the contrary, our circuit has readily provided guidance to individual line officers for how to comply with the Fourth Amendment while carrying out their routine police duties. As the district court aptly noted, we have recognized—for some time now—every one of plaintiff's Bivens claims. . . Given this, and the Supreme Court's express caution that Ziglar is not to be understood as 'cast[ing] doubt on the continued force, or even the necessity, of Bivens in the search-and-seizure context in which it arose,' we hew to this 'settled law ... in th[e] common and recurrent sphere of law enforcement' and find plaintiff's garden-variety Bivens claims to be viable post-Ziglar and Hernandez. . . Accordingly, we affirm the decision of the district court as to our Bivens jurisprudence.")

Seventh Circuit

Haas v. Noordeloos, No. 19-3473, 2020 WL 591565, at *1 (7th Cir. Feb. 6, 2020) (not reported ("[W]e conclude that the district court erred in holding that Haas cannot state a federal claim on the grounds that Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Fed. Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), 'does not provide a vehicle to litigate First Amendment claims.' Haas argues that this is not so, citing Dellums v. Powell, 566 F.2d 167, 184 (D.C. Cir. 1977). But cf. Loumiet v. United States, No. 18-5020, 2020 WL 424919, at *1 (D.C. Cir. Jan. 28, 2020) (finding no Bivens remedy for First Amendment violation where FIRREA provided detailed administrative remedy for alleged wrongs). In this circuit, at least, the question is unsettled. See Smadi v. True, 783 F. App'x 633 (7th Cir. 2019) (remanding so that district court can develop full record with recruited counsel on whether Bivens-style damages remedy is available for alleged violations of prisoner's First Amendment rights after Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843 (2017)).")

Eighth Circuit

Ahmed v. Weyker, 984 F.3d 564, 570-71 (8th Cir. 2020), cert. denied sub nom Mohamud v. Weyker, 142 S. Ct. 2833 (2022) ("When one or more meaningful differences exist, it is not enough to identify a few similarities. The plaintiffs and dissent make much of the fact that this case, like Bivens, arose out of an allegedly illegal arrest. But 'a modest extension is still an extension,'. . . even if it involves 'the same constitutional provision[.]'. . . Moreover, as in Farah, other remedies are available to address injuries of the sort the plaintiffs have alleged[ ]. . . 'The so-called Hyde Amendment allows courts to award attorney fees to criminal defendants who prevail against "vexatious, frivolous, or ... bad[-]faith" positions taken by the government.'. . And for 'those who are wrongly convicted and sentenced,' damages may be available. . . We are especially reluctant to supplement those remedies with our own, which could upset the existing remedial structure. . . This factor alone, as the Supreme Court has explained, is 'a convincing reason' not to extend Bivens. . . None of this should be surprising. After all, the Supreme Court has not recognized a new Bivens action 'for almost 40 years.'. . Our conclusion here is no different. . . .So what happens next? Just because a Bivens remedy is off the table does not mean the plaintiffs' cases are over. If the district court determines on remand that Weyker was acting under color of state law, their section 1983 claims may proceed, subject to Weyker's defense of qualified immunity. . .We accordingly vacate and remand to the district court to dismiss the plaintiffs' Bivens claims and determine whether their cases can proceed under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.")

Ahmed v. Weyker, 984 F.3d 564, 571-74 (8th Cir. 2020) (Kelly, J., dissenting), cert. denied sub nom Mohamud v. Weyker, 142 S. Ct. 2833 (2022) ("In Ziglar v. Abbasi, . . . the Supreme Court cautioned that extending Bivens to new contexts is a 'disfavored judicial activity.'. . But because I believe that one of plaintiffs' claims does not extend Bivens to a new context, I respectfully dissent from the court's conclusion otherwise. . . .In both of these actions, Ahmed and Mohamud contend, Officer Weyker fabricated 'probable cause that did not otherwise exist,' causing them to be 'seized, arrested, detained, charged and indicted' in violation of their Fourth Amendment rights. I agree with the court that, based on our precedent, no Bivens remedy is available for plaintiffs' claim that Officer Weyker violated their Fourth Amendment rights by submitting a false affidavit to the district court. In Farah v. Weyker, 926 F.3d 492 (8th Cir. 2019), this court held that a claim that a federally deputized officer (namely, Officer Weyker) 'duped prosecutors and a grand jury into believing that the plaintiffs were part of a multi-state sex-trafficking conspiracy' was 'meaningfully different' from established Bivens cases. . . Because 'special factors' weighed against extending Bivens to the new context, we declined to do so. . . As largely the same differences and special factors are present in Ahmed and Mohamud's second allegation against Officer Weyker, Farah forecloses the possibility of Bivens relief on that claim. But Farah does not foreclose relief for Ahmed and Mohamud's first allegation—that Officer Weyker lied to Officer Beeks, which resulted in their unlawful arrest. . . As Ahmed and Mohamud describe it in their complaints, this claim asserts that Officer Weyker caused them to be arrested without probable cause. . . This was the claim at issue in Bivens. Though Bivens also alleged that officers used unreasonable force during their search of his home, one of his core contentions was that the officers did not have probable cause when they arrested him. . . . Like the agents in Bivens, Officer Weyker was an investigative officer who is alleged to have violated plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment right to be free of unlawful arrest. . . The judicial guidance on conducting a lawful arrest remains clear, and the mandate comes from the Constitution. Recognizing plaintiffs' claim risks no more intrusion into the functioning of another branch of government than did Bivens, which also turned on the knowledge and actions of police officers. And here, plaintiffs challenge an 'individual instance[ ] ... of law enforcement overreach, which due to [its] very nature [is] difficult to address except by way of damages actions after the fact.'. . While these factors are not exhaustive, . . . each supports the conclusion that the context for plaintiffs' false arrest claim is not new. The Supreme Court in Abbasi did 'not intend[ ] to cast doubt on the continued force, or even the necessity, of Bivens in the search-and-seizure context in which it arose.' . . I find no meaningful difference between plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment false arrest claim and what the Supreme Court recognized in Bivens and has continued to recognize in Abbasi and Hernandez. In my view, a Bivens remedy is available to Ahmed and Mohamud on this claim. . . Because the court denies them this remedy, I respectfully dissent.")

Ninth Circuit

Greenpoint Tactical Income Fund LLC v. Pettigrew, 38 F.4th 555, 564 n.2 (7th Cir. 2022) ("The Supreme Court recently held in Egbert v. Boule . . . that Bivens does not extend to Fourth Amendment violations by federal officials engaged in border-related functions. The opinion in Egbert is consistent with the Court's cutting back on the scope of Bivens but does not change our understanding of Bivens' continued force in its domestic Fourth Amendment context.")

Hoffman v. Preston, 26 F.4th 1059, 1061-65, 1073-74 (9th Cir. 2022) ("While Hoffman's Eighth Amendment claim is different in some respects from the Eighth Amendment claim presented in Carlson, no special factors counsel hesitation against what is a very modest expansion of the Bivens remedy to this context. We therefore reverse the district court's Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal of Hoffman's pro se complaint for failure to state a claim under Bivens, and remand for further proceedings. . . . The magistrate judge rejected Hoffman's argument that the Court recognized a Bivens remedy for failure-to-protect claims in Farmer v. Brennan . . . because Farmer was not one of the three cases listed in Abbasi. . . After deciding that Hoffman's claim presented 'a new Bivens context,'. . . the judge concluded that special factors—the availability of other remedies, legislative action by Congress, and the impact on government regulation—cautioned against extending the Bivens remedy to Hoffman's claim. . . On January 6, 2020, the district court adopted the magistrate judge's findings and recommendations in full and dismissed the action with prejudice. Hoffman timely appealed. . . . A generous approach is not required to read Hoffman's complaint as alleging conduct beyond 'deliberate indifference.' 'Deliberate indifference' would mean that Preston failed to protect Hoffman from a known risk of substantial harm. Preston did not merely know of a risk of substantial harm; he intentionally and knowingly created the risk. Although this claim of intentional harm is not squarely presented in the Supreme Court's Bivens opinions, Hoffman's allegations taken as true are only a modest extension of Bivens. If the Supreme Court has allowed a guard who is aware of and deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk that a prisoner will suffer medical harm from an asthma attack to be sued under Bivens, it is but a modest extension to allow a suit against a guard who creates the substantial risk of harm and then allows it to occur. We find no special factors that counsel against allowing a Bivens remedy in this context. We reverse. . . . Having recognized that this claim presents a new Bivens context because it involves a factually different Eighth Amendment claim than Carlson, we hold that special factors do not counsel hesitation against allowing a Bivens remedy for a federal prison inmate alleging that a prison guard intentionally targeted him for harm and failed to protect him from the predictable harm that resulted. . . . The dissent's worry that allowing a Bivens remedy in this case will open a floodgate of claims against 'countless decisions taken by prison officials,' is misplaced. We write far more narrowly. A Bivens claim may proceed on allegations that an individual officer intentionally targeted an inmate for harm by spreading malicious rumors about and offering bribes to attack him, the inmate was attacked because of the officer's conduct, and the officer failed to protect the inmate against the known risk of harm that the officer himself created. . . We take no further, and certainly no broader, position on the scope of claims against prison officials that might otherwise warrant a Bivens remedy. In sum, although this case represents a modest extension of Bivens, no special factors caution against extending the remedy to encompass this well-established claim, brought against a single rogue officer under the same constitutional provision applied in a well-recognized Supreme Court Bivens case. Simply put, 'if the principles animating Bivens stand at all, they must provide a remedy' here.")

Hoffman v. Preston, 26 F.4th 1059, 1074, 1084 (9th Cir. 2022) (Bea, J., dissenting) ("The Supreme Court has made crystal clear that the days of freely implying damages remedies against individual federal officials under Bivens are at an end. 'The Constitution grants legislative power to Congress,' and so 'a federal court's authority to recognize a damages remedy must rest at bottom on a statute enacted by Congress.'. . The Court has recognized only three exceptions to this general rule: damages remedies may be implied for the specific claims at issue in Bivens, Davis, and Carlson. But these exceptions are limited to the factual contexts in which they arose, and the lower courts cannot extend them if any 'special factors counsel[ ] hesitation' before intruding on the separation of powers and acting in the absence of statutory authority. . .This should have been a straightforward affirmance of the district court's judgment. We are asked to decide whether a prisoner (Hoffman) may seek damages against a federal prison guard (Preston) who, the prisoner claims, intentionally and deliberately instigated other prisoners to beat him in retaliation for the prisoner's suspected snitching out of the prison guards' theft of prison food by offering to pay other prisoners to beat him. Is that a Bivens eligible violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment? The answer is no. Congress has never enacted a damages remedy against federal prison officials who act as in the allegations in this case, which amount to an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim; the Supreme Court has never recognized a remedy for such actions under Bivens, and at least three special factors bar the narrow gate towards extending the Bivens remedy to this new context. Unfortunately, my colleagues dismiss the Supreme Court's clear instructions by permitting this case to move forward as a Bivens cause of action. The majority prunes partial quotes from Hernandez and Abbasi to present a veneer of faithfulness to binding precedent. But do not be fooled: their reasoning and conclusions cannot be squared with modern Bivens jurisprudence. . . . Rather than break new ground, the majority should have followed binding precedents of the Supreme Court and our court and left the enactment of such a broad and novel remedy to Congress. We should not extend Bivens to this new context by judicial ipse dixit in light of the multiple 'special factors' that counsel hesitation. To be sure, the majority is correct that the alleged conduct here is more morally culpable than that in Carlson. The deliberate indifference of Carlson requires only that an 'official [be] subjectively aware of the risk,'. . . whereas here, Hoffman's claim of intentional harm demands that Preston have acted with specific intent to harm. However, the Supreme Court does not instruct us to look to the moral culpability of an act when deciding whether to extend Bivens. Instead, when a new Bivens context arises, as here, we are instructed to perform the special factors analysis commanded by Abbasi to determine whether the Bivens remedy should be extended. For all the foregoing reasons, this is surely not such a case. This case, perhaps more than any other, demonstrates that precisely because 'the principles animating Bivens' no longer stand in any capacity, . . . a Bivens remedy cannot be extended to Hoffman's claim consistent with current Supreme Court jurisprudence. Because the majority's decision usurps the legislative power in direct contradiction of Abbasi, I respectfully dissent and would affirm the district court.")

Quintero Perez v. United States, 8 F.4th 1095, 1099-1100, 1104-07 (9th Cir. 2021) ("Without doubt, Yañez's death is tragic, as are the circumstances that caused it. We conclude, however, that the relief his family pursues is foreclosed by the holding of Hernandez, the constraints imposed by various statutes, and by the limits of equitable tolling. We regret that the law compels this result. . . . Despite their divergent accounts of the killing, the parties agree that Diaz was on American soil when he shot Yañez and that Yañez was on the border fence when he was shot, which is also within the United States. The parties also agree that after Yañez was fatally shot, his body fell such that it was partially in the United States and partially in Mexico. . . . Here we confront a new Bivens context because the claims against Fisher and Diaz 'differ[ ] in a meaningful way' from prior Bivens cases. The most analogous Supreme Court case—and the only one to approve a Bivens remedy for an excessive force claim—is Bivens itself. . . There, the plaintiff alleged that federal narcotics agents violated his Fourth Amendment rights by arresting him, handcuffing him in his home, and searching his home without probable cause or a search warrant. . . This case, by contrast, involves a fatal shooting, at the border, by a federal agent, of a Mexican national who crossed into the United States. The shooting allegedly occurred pursuant to the 'Rocking Policy,' an executive policy authorizing deadly force in response to rock throwing. Though there are similarities between this case and Bivens, the differences suffice to satisfy the Court's permissive test for what makes a context 'new.'. . . Presented with a new context, we next consider whether there are 'special factors' supporting the conclusion that 'whether a damages action should be allowed [here] is a decision for the Congress to make, not the courts.'. . . The facts here fall squarely under Hernandez. Because Agent Diaz was an 'agent[ ] positioned at the border,' with 'the responsibility of attempting to prevent illegal entry,' and his use of force was in direct response to an actual illegal entry, the national-security factor applies. Indeed, the Department of Homeland Security, which includes U.S. Customs and Border Protection, was one of five different executive branch agencies that undertook an investigation of the shooting. . . Future cases may require further examination of what it precisely means to be 'at the border,' or to be engaged in an effort to prevent illegal entry, but this case presents no such complication: as in Hernandez, Diaz was patrolling the border, standing directly at the border, and engaged in an active, ongoing enforcement action to respond to an illegal entry. In concluding that the national-security factor applies, we recognize that 'national-security concerns must not become a talisman used to ward off inconvenient claims.'. . But there is no risk of that happening here because we do not identify any new national-security concerns. Rather, we apply the Court's conclusion that regulating the conduct of agents at the border is a genuine national-security concern, not simply a useful talisman. . . This case is a paradigmatic example of congressional parameters and Supreme Court precedent defining the scope of relief. The Alien Tort Statute does not reach the challenged conduct and the request for relief under the Federal Tort Claims Act came too late. And in accord with Abbasi and Hernandez, we conclude that a special factor precludes relief under Bivens.")

Reid v. United States, 825 F. App'x 442, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) ("Reid's Eighth Amendment claims do not present a new Bivens context. In Carlson, the Supreme Court recognized an Eighth Amendment Bivens claim based on prisoner mistreatment. . . A claim for damages based on individualized mistreatment by rank-and-file federal officers is exactly what Bivens was meant to address. . . Continuing to recognize Eighth Amendment Bivens claims post-Abbasi will not require courts to plow new ground because there is extensive case law establishing conditions of confinement claims and the standard for circumstances that constitute cruel and unusual punishment. . .Special factors do not counsel against allowing Reid to press his claim here. Indeed, the opposite holds true. First, Reid has no other viable remedy. . . The prison's internal administrative process is not available to him because the allegedly unconstitutional treatment described in his complaint was inflicted in retaliation for his earlier attempt to report abuse by a prison guard through the prison's internal grievance process. The FTCA does not allow actions against individual guards, so it does not offer a means for deterring future misconduct. . . The government does not attempt to explain how Reid's injuries could be redressed through habeas, state-law remedies only exist for actions outside the scope of employment, and equitable relief does nothing to cure the damage Reid already suffered. . . Finally, we conclude that allowing Reid's claims to proceed would not result in inappropriate judicial intrusion into Bureau of Prisons (BOP) policy. Reid does not seek to change BOP policy; he alleges individualized injuries and fears of retaliation unique to him, not the inmate population as a whole.")

Fazaga v. Fed. Bureau of Investigation, 965 F.3d 1015, 1055-59 (9th Cir. 2020) (on denial of reh'g and reh'g en banc) ("Bivens itself concerned a Fourth Amendment violation by federal officers. As we have recognized, a Fourth Amendment damages claim premised on unauthorized electronic surveillance by FBI agents and their surrogates 'fall[s] directly within the coverage of Bivens.'. . Recent cases, however, have severely restricted the availability of Bivens actions for new claims and contexts. See Ziglar v. Abbasi, —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 1856–57, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017). . .Here, the substance of Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment Bivens claim is identical to the allegations raised in their FISA § 1810 claim. Under our rulings regarding the reach of the § 1806(f) procedures, almost all of the search-and-seizure allegations will be subject to those procedures. Thus, regardless of whether a Bivens remedy is available, Plaintiffs' underlying claim—that the Agent Defendants engaged in unlawful electronic surveillance violative of the Fourth Amendment—would proceed in the same way. Moreover, if the Fourth Amendment Bivens claim proceeds, the Agent Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment Bivens claim to the same extent they are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' FISA claim. In both instances, the substantive law derives from the Fourth Amendment, and in both instances, government officials in their individual capacity are subject to liability for damages only if they violated a clearly established right to freedom from governmental intrusion where an individual has a reasonable expectation of privacy. . . Under our earlier rulings, the FISA search-and-seizure allegations may proceed against only two of the Agent Defendants, and only with respect to a narrow aspect of the alleged surveillance. In light of the overlap between the Bivens claim and the narrow range of the remaining FISA claim against the Agent Defendants that can proceed, it is far from clear that Plaintiffs will continue to press this claim. We therefore decline to address whether Plaintiffs' Bivens claim remains available after the Supreme Court's decision in Abbasi. On remand, the district court may determine—if necessary—whether a Bivens remedy is appropriate for any Fourth Amendment claim against the Agent Defendants. . . . Plaintiffs seek monetary damages directly under the First Amendment's Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses and the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause, relying on Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents. We will not recognize a Bivens claim where there is ' "any alternative, existing process for protecting" the plaintiff's interests.'. . The existence of such an alternative remedy raises the inference that Congress ' "expected the Judiciary to stay its Bivens hand" and "refrain from providing a new and freestanding remedy in damages."'. . . Here, we conclude that the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb et seq., taken together, provide an alternative remedial scheme for some, but not all, of Plaintiffs' First and Fifth Amendment Bivens claims. As to the remaining Bivens claims, we remand to the district court to decide whether a Bivens remedy is available in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Abbasi. . . . We have not addressed the availability of a Bivens action where the Privacy Act may be applicable. But two other circuits have, and both held that the Privacy Act supplants Bivens claims for First and Fifth Amendment violations. See Wilson v. Libby, 535 F.3d 697, 707–08 (D.C. Cir. 2008) (holding, in response to claims alleging harm from the improper disclosure of information subject to the Privacy Act's protections, that the Privacy Act is a comprehensive remedial scheme that precludes an additional Bivens remedy); Downie v. City of Middleburg Heights, 301 F.3d 688, 696 & n.7 (6th Cir. 2002) (holding that the Privacy Act displaces Bivens for claims involving the creation, maintenance, and dissemination of false records by federal agency employees). We agree with the analyses in Wilson and Downie. Although the Privacy Act provides a remedy only against the FBI, not the individual federal officers, the lack of relief against some potential defendants does not disqualify the Privacy Act as an alternative remedial scheme. Again, a Bivens remedy may be foreclosed 'even when the available statutory remedies "do not provide complete relief" for a plaintiff,' as long as 'the plaintiff ha[s] an avenue for some redress.'. . Thus, to the extent that Plaintiffs' Bivens claims involve improper collection and retention of agency records, the Privacy Act precludes such Bivens claims. As to religious discrimination more generally, we conclude that RFRA precludes some, but not all, of Plaintiffs' Bivens claims. RFRA provides that absent a 'compelling governmental interest' and narrow tailoring, 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb-1(b), the 'Government shall not substantially burden a person's exercise of religion even if the burden results from a rule of general applicability.'. . The statute was enacted 'to provide a claim or defense to persons whose religious exercise is substantially burdened by government.'. . It therefore provided that '[a] person whose religious exercise has been burdened in violation of this section may assert that violation as a claim or defense in a judicial proceeding and obtain appropriate relief against a government.'. . RFRA thus provides a means for Plaintiffs to seek relief for the alleged burden of the surveillance itself on their exercise of their religion. RFRA does not, however, provide an alternative remedial scheme for all of Plaintiffs' discrimination-based Bivens claims. . . . Here, many of Plaintiffs' allegations relate not to neutral and generally applicable government action, but to conduct motivated by intentional discrimination against Plaintiffs because of their Muslim faith. Regardless of the magnitude of the burden imposed, 'if the object of a law is to infringe upon or restrict practices because of their religious motivation, the law is not neutral' and 'is invalid unless it is justified by a compelling interest and is narrowly tailored to advance that interest.'. . It is the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment—not RFRA—that imposes this requirement. Moreover, by its terms, RFRA applies only to the 'free exercise of religion,'. . .; indeed, it expressly disclaims any effect on 'that portion of the First Amendment prohibiting laws respecting the establishment of religion,'. . . But intentional religious discrimination is 'subject to heightened scrutiny whether [it] arise[s] under the Free Exercise Clause, the Establishment Clause, or the Equal Protection Clause.'. . Here, Plaintiffs have raised religion claims based on all three constitutional provisions. Because RFRA does not provide an alternative remedial scheme for protecting these interests, we conclude that RFRA does not preclude Plaintiffs' religion-based Bivens claims. We conclude that the Privacy Act and RFRA, taken together, function as an alternative remedial scheme for protecting some, but not all, of the interests Plaintiffs seek to vindicate via their First and Fifth Amendment Bivens claims. The district court never addressed whether a Bivens remedy is available for any of the religion claims because it dismissed the claims in their entirety based on the state secrets privilege. In addition, Abbasi has now clarified the standard for determining when a Bivens remedy is available for a particular alleged constitutional violation. And, as we have explained, the scope of the religion claims to which a Bivens remedy might apply is considerably narrower than those alleged, given the partial displacement by the Privacy Act and RFRA. If asked, the district court should determine on remand, applying Abbasi, whether a Bivens remedy is available to the degree the damages remedy is not displaced by the Privacy Act and RFRA.") Ioane v. Hodges, 939 F.3d 945, 952 (9th Cir. 2018) (as amended) ("Here, a review of the Abbasi factors in the first step of the Bivens analysis demonstrates that this case is similar to Bivens and therefore does not present a 'new context.' Both cases concern an individual's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. In Bivens, federal agents allegedly searched Bivens's home and his person (by subjecting him to a visual strip search), without probable cause or a warrant. . . Likewise, Shelly's claim here is that a federal agent conducted a warrantless search of her person in violation of her Fourth Amendment right to bodily privacy. There is no difference between the two cases with respect to the rank of the officers involved, the generality or specificity of the official action at issue, or the legal mandate under which the officers were operating. . .Further, the extent of judicial guidance as to how Agent Noll should have responded to the problem was well established. . . Recognizing a Bivens action in this closely analogous case also does not result in any intrusion by the judiciary into the functioning of other branches. . . Nor does this case implicate any special factors not considered previously that counsel against recognizing a Bivens remedy. Rather, as was the case in Bivens, there is no alternative remedy for a person in Shelly's position—'it is damages or nothing.'. . Accordingly, Shelly may proceed with her Bivens suit against Agent Noll.") Schwarz v. Meinberg, 761 F. App'x 732, ___ (9th Cir. 2019) ("We decline to extend Bivens remedies to Schwarz's claims—unsanitary cell conditions, access to courts, and request for placement in a camp facility—because these claims do not fall within claims authorized by the Supreme Court. . . In Ziglar v. Abbasi, the Court cautioned lower courts not to expand Bivens remedies outside the three previously recognized Bivens claims. . . While there is some similarity in the constitutional basis of Schwarz's claims with previously recognized Bivens claims, Schwarz's claims nevertheless 'arise[ ] in a new Bivens context.'. . In other words, the claims are 'different in a meaningful way from previous Bivens cases decided by [the Supreme Court].'. . Schwarz's Eighth Amendment claim regarding unsanitary cell conditions presents a new Bivens context because Schwarz does not allege a failure to treat a serious medical condition, which was the issue in Carlson[.]. . Rather, the basis of Schwarz's claim—a nonfunctioning toilet—resembles the conditions of the confinement claim the Supreme Court rejected in Abbasi. . . Schwarz's access to courts claim under the First and Fifth Amendments and his Fifth Amendment claim that the BOP unlawfully denied his request for a camp placement also constitute new Bivens contexts. First, the Supreme Court has never recognized a Bivens claim under the First Amendment. . . Second, we recently held that both a First Amendment access to courts and a Fifth Amendment procedural due process claims presented new Bivens contexts. . . Third, while Davis recognized a Fifth Amendment due process claim for gender discrimination, . . . Schwarz's due process claim is a new context because it alleges national origin discrimination. If a proposed claim arises in a new context, courts must conduct a special factors analysis to determine whether to extend a Bivens remedy to that claim. . . . Here, Schwarz had alternative processes by which to pursue his claims and remedies. For example, he could have sought a remedy under the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995, . . . under the Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1346(b), or through injunctive remedies. Furthermore, we find that extending Bivens remedies to Schwarz's claims against regional and national BOP officials, individuals who lack direct connection to Schwarz's grievances, undermines the purpose of Bivens liability—to deter individual government officers, not their supervisors or the agency, from engaging in unconstitutional conduct. . . We also find that extending Bivens to Schwarz's claims would substantially affect government operations and unduly burden BOP officials who must defend against this suit in their personal capacities.")

Lanuza v. Love, 899 F.3d 1019, 1021, 1026-28, 1033-34 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We are tasked with answering in part a question asked by many legal commentators in the wake of the Supreme Court's decision in Ziglar v. Abbasi, —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017): where does Bivens stand? . . . . We recognize that the Supreme Court 'has made clear that expanding the Bivens remedy is now a "disfavored" judicial activity,'. . . but, if the principles animating Bivens stand at all, they must provide a remedy on these narrow and egregious facts. We therefore reverse the district court's holding that Lanuza was not entitled to a Bivens remedy. . . . [W]hile Abbasi clearly limited Bivens's scope, it did not preclude this case; nor is this case precluded by other Supreme Court precedent. . . . Although Mirmehdi and this case both arise out of immigration generally, the similarities between Mirmehdi and Lanuza's case end there. Mirmehdi relates to the detention of suspected terrorists, while Lanuza's case concerns an individual attorney's violation of his due process rights in a routine immigration proceeding. Accordingly, precedent does not preclude providing a Bivens remedy here. . . . Lanuza's claim arises in the context of deportation proceedings where a federal immigration prosecutor submitted falsified evidence in order to deprive Lanuza of his right to apply for lawful permanent residence. We know of no other case that has discussed a Bivens remedy in this context. . . The conclusion that Lanuza's case arises in a context meaningfully different is ineluctable. And it is likely for that reason that the district court, and both parties, agree. . . .We conclude that the special factors articulated in Abbasi do not counsel against extending a Bivens remedy to the narrow claim here, where an immigration official and officer of the court forged and submitted evidence in a deportation proceeding to deprive an individual of his right to relief under congressionally enacted laws. . . . Because providing a Bivens remedy does not risk improper intrusion by the judiciary into the functioning of other branches; the judiciary is well-equipped to weigh the costs and benefits of this case; the need for deterrence is substantial; and allowing a lawsuit to proceed will place little burden on the government, it is a proper use of our judicial power to allow this Bivens action to proceed. . . .For these reasons, we hold that a Bivens remedy is available here, where a government immigration attorney intentionally submitted a forged document in an immigration proceeding to completely bar an individual from pursuing relief to which he was entitled. Failing to provide a narrow remedy for such an egregious constitutional violation would tempt others to do the same and would run afoul of our mandate to enforce the Constitution. At its core, this case is about a lie, and all the ways it was used, over several years, to defraud the courts. Government attorneys are given great power, and with that power comes great responsibility. These attorneys represent the United States, and when they act, they speak for our government.")

Rodriguez v. Swartz, 899 F.3d 719, 735-47 (9th Cir. 2018), cert. granted, judgment vacated and remanded in light of Hernandez v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735 (2020) ("In Hernandez v. Mesa, the Fifth Circuit confronted a cross-border shooting similar to the one here. It held that even if the shooting was unconstitutional, the law was not clearly established at the time. It did not decide whether the family of the boy who was shot had a Bivens cause of action. In fact, the officer who shot him had not moved to dismiss on that basis. Yet the Supreme Court reversed, holding that whether Bivens applied was ' "antecedent" to the other questions presented.' It then remanded the case so that the Fifth Circuit could consider whether the boy's family had a Bivens cause of action. In a different context, we have also held that qualified immunity 'by necessity' implicates whether there is a Bivens cause of action. We therefore hold that we have jurisdiction to decide whether Rodriguez has a Bivens cause of action. Given the Supreme Court's instruction in Hernandez, we must now address that issue. . . . Abbasi demonstrates several principles that have emerged from this line of cases. First, Abbasi makes plain that even though a Bivens action lies for some constitutional violations (like the Fourth Amendment claim in Bivens), it does not lie for all violations (like the Fourth Amendment claim in Abbasi). Second, Abbasi explains that if a case presents a 'new context' for a Bivens claim, then we must exercise 'caution' in determining whether to extend Bivens. That is because 'expanding the Bivens remedy is now a "disfavored" judicial activity.' And while Abbasi mandates caution and disfavor only when courts extend Bivens into a 'new context,' a case presents a new context whenever it is 'different in a meaningful way from previous Bivens cases decided by [the Supreme] Court.' Third, if a case presents a new context for a Bivens claim, then we can extend it only if two conditions are met. One condition is that the plaintiff must not have any other adequate alternative remedy. The other condition is that there cannot be any 'special factors' that lead us to believe that Congress, instead of the courts, should be the one to authorize a suit for money damages. Together, these three principles restrict when we can extend a Bivens cause of action. But Bivens and its progeny are still good law. Bivens, Davis, and Carlson have never been overruled, implicitly or explicitly. Instead, Abbasi went out of its way to emphasize that the Court did 'not intend[ ] to cast doubt on the continued force, or even the necessity, of Bivens in the search-and-seizure context in which it arose.' So at least in the 'common and recurrent sphere of law enforcement,' Bivens is 'settled law.' This brings us to a fourth principle of the Court's Bivens jurisprudence: in the right case, we may extend Bivens into a new context. . . .We apply these four principles in this case. This case presents a new Bivens context. Like Bivens, this case is about a federal law enforcement officer who violated the Fourth Amendment. But this case differs from Bivens because J.A. was killed in Mexico (by a bullet fired in the United States) and because we are applying the Constitution to afford a remedy to an alien under these circumstances. We therefore cannot extend Bivens unless: (1) Rodriguez has no other adequate alternative remedy; and (2) there are no special factors counseling hesitation. We now turn to those two inquiries, keeping in mind that extension is disfavored and that we must exercise caution. . . . Rodriguez cannot bring a state-law tort action against Swartz without the Westfall Act converting it into an FTCA suit against the United States. At that point, as discussed, the claim would be barred by the FTCA's foreign country exception because the injury occurred in Mexico. Although the application of Arizona law would not on its face qualify as the application of foreign law, the concern was that a state's choice of law rules as applied to common law torts could still require the application of foreign law. . . . The United States indicted and tried Swartz for murdering J.A. Though a jury acquitted him of murder, the government has indicated that it will retry him for manslaughter. If he is convicted, federal law will require him to pay restitution to J.A.'s estate. The United States argues that such restitution is an adequate remedy. But restitution is not an adequate remedy for several reasons. . . .In short, for Rodriguez, it is damages under Bivens or nothing, and Congress did not intend to preclude Bivens. . . . Though a Bivens action is Rodriguez's only available adequate remedy, we cannot extend Bivens if a 'special factor' counsels hesitation. Because we must proceed with caution and are reluctant to extend Bivens, we have carefully weighed all the reasons Swartz and the United States have offered for denying a Bivens cause of action. But this case does not present any such special factors. . . .Rodriguez does not challenge any government policy whatsoever. And neither the United States nor Swartz argues that he followed government policy. Instead, federal regulations expressly prohibited Swartz from using deadly force in the circumstances alleged. Rodriguez also sued a rank-and-file officer, not the head of the Border Patrol or any other policy-making official. This case is therefore like the ones that Abbasi distinguished—those involving 'standard law enforcement operations' and 'individual instances of ... law enforcement overreach.' The standards governing Swartz's conduct are the same here as they would be in any other excessive force case. Thus, Abbasi implies that Bivens is available. . . It cannot harm national security to hold Swartz civilly liable any more than it would to hold him criminally liable, and the government is currently trying to do the latter. Thus, national security is not a special factor here. . . . The United States is correct that courts should not extend Bivens if it requires courts to judge American foreign policy. But the United States has not explained how any policy is implicated or could be complicated by applying Bivens to this shooting. It has not identified any policy that might be undermined. Just as national security cannot be used as a talisman to ward off inconvenient claims, neither does the 'mere incantation' of the magic words 'foreign policy' cause a Bivens remedy to disappear. In this case, extending Bivens would not implicate American foreign policy. There is no American foreign policy embracing shootings like the one pleaded here. . . . We fail to see how extending Bivens here would actually implicate American foreign policy. No policy has been brought to our attention, and no policymaking individuals have been sued, unlike in Abbasi. Swartz did not act pursuant to government policy. He broke the rules that were in the Code of Federal Regulations." [footnotes omitted])

Rodriguez v. Swartz, 899 F.3d 719, 749-58 (9th Cir. 2018) (Smith, J., dissenting),), cert. granted, judgment vacated and remanded in light of Hernandez v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735 (2020) ("This case presents yet another 'tragic cross-border incident in which a United States Border Patrol agent standing on United States soil shot and killed a Mexican national standing on Mexican soil.' Hernandez v. Mesa, —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 2003, 2004, 198 L.Ed.2d 625 (2017) (per curiam). However, before we can appropriately address any of the other challenging issues presented by this case, we must first respond to a question recently posed by the Supreme Court: 'When a party seeks to assert an implied cause of action under the Constitution itself, ... separation-of-powers principles are or should be central to the analysis. The question is "who should decide" whether to provide for a damages remedy, Congress or the courts?'. . In this case, the obvious answer is Congress. We lack the authority to extend Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388, 91 S.Ct. 1999, 29 L.Ed.2d 619 (1971), to the cross-border context presented in this case. In holding to the contrary, the majority creates a circuit split, oversteps separation-of-powers principles, and disregards Supreme Court law. I therefore respectfully dissent. . . .Hernandez's lengthy path through the federal court system underscores several points. First, the availability of a Bivens remedy is a critical threshold question. Second, Abbasi did not merely recapitulate the Supreme Court's past law on Bivens—the Court characterized Abbasi as 'intervening guidance.'. . Third, a principled application of Abbasi to the facts of this case can yield only one answer: We lack the authority to extend a Bivens remedy to the cross-border shooting context. Unlike the Fifth Circuit, which faithfully followed the Supreme Court's guidance, the majority fails to acknowledge the underlying principles of Abbasi, choosing instead to distinguish Abbasi on narrow factual grounds. The majority authorizes an impermissible extension of Bivens to a new context despite the presence of numerous special factors counselling judicial hesitation. In doing so, the majority creates a circuit split and tees up our court for a new 'chastening' by the Supreme Court. . . . The majority fails to accord any meaningful significance to the conclusion that this case presents a new context for a Bivens claim. By the majority's reckoning, the fact that a Bivens claim presents a new context means only that a court must perform the second half of the Bivens analysis—the special-factors inquiry—and nothing more. This approach clearly flouts the Supreme Court's instructions. The majority fails to heed the Supreme Court's warning that expanding Bivens is a 'disfavored' activity, . . . and that courts may not run roughshod across the separation of powers. As was the case in Hernandez, Rodriguez's 'unprecedented claims embody ... a virtual repudiation of the Court's holding' in Abbasi. . . In fact, '[t]he newness of this "new context" should alone require dismissal of [Rodriguez's] damage claims.'. . .Contrary to the majority, I conclude that several special factors prevent us from implying a damages remedy in this case. The special factors in this case are weighty, and counsel strongly against judicial interference 'in the absence of affirmative action by Congress.'. . .In dissenting today, I am fully mindful of the tragedy underlying this case. I am also aware of the Supreme Court's warning that '[t]here are limitations ... on the power of the Executive under Article II of the Constitution and in the powers authorized by congressional enactments,' and that 'national-security concerns must not become a talisman used to ward off inconvenient claims—a "label" used to "cover a multitude of sins."' Rather, heeding the Court's guidance in Abbasi, I have undertaken my analysis with one controlling question in mind: ' "[W]ho should decide" whether to provide for a damages remedy, Congress or the courts?'. . . Here, the task of deciding whether to create a damages remedy for Rodriguez lies squarely within the purview of Congress, not of the judiciary. By creating an extraterritorial Bivens remedy in this case, the majority veers into uncharted territory, ignores Supreme Court law, and upsets the separation of powers between the judiciary and the political branches of government. The majority pays only lip service to the new-context inquiry, without any real regard for the principles set forth in Abbasi, and concludes, remarkably, that there are no special factors weighing against this unprecedented expansion of Bivens. The Supreme Court has made clear its views on expanding Bivens, and the majority has, in turn, made clear how it views the Court's instructions. Instead of following suit, the majority turns back to the ancien regime now repudiated by the Court. Three circuit courts touch the border between the United States and Mexico—our court, the Fifth Circuit, and the Tenth Circuit. Today, two of the three are split. The implications are troubling. Whereas an alien injured on Mexican soil by a Border Patrol agent shooting from Texas lacks recourse under Bivens, an alien injured on Mexican soil by an agent shooting from California or Arizona may sue for damages. This is an untenable result, and will lead to an uneven administration of the rule of law. Applying Supreme Court law, I would adopt the reasoning of the Fifth Circuit. This case presents a new Bivens context, and numerous special factors counsel against judicial creation of an implied damages remedy in the cross-border context. I respectfully dissent." [footnotes omitted])

Brunoehler v. Tarwater, No. 16-56634, 2018 WL 3470210, at *2-3 (9th Cir. July 19, 2018) (not reported) ("Here, the Wiretap Act was another 'legal mandate under which the [Agents were] operating.'. . Given the Supreme Court's observation that 'even a modest extension is still an extension' of Bivens, we conclude that the application of an extensive statutory scheme like the Wiretap Act constitutes a meaningful difference from Bivens, which concerned only the Fourth Amendment. . .Further, under Ziglar, an extension of Bivens is not available here. . . . Because the Wiretap Act provides for damages when agents improperly obtain wiretaps, Brunoehler had an adequate alternative remedy for his alleged harm. That Brunoehler's claims under the Wiretap Act ultimately failed for lack of standing does not mean he did not have access to alternative remedies, but rather that he lacked standing to challenge the wiretaps at issue. Thus, in light of the available alternative remedies, we decline to extend Bivens in this context, and conclude that the district court did not err when it dismissed Brunoehler's claim for unlawful wiretapping. . . . We . . . conclude that Brunoehler's unlawful search and arrest claims are not 'meaningfully different' from Bivens, which involved the same claims—albeit for different crimes—in virtually the same search-and-seizure context. Thus, Brunoehler's allegation of unlawful search and arrest does not seek an extension of Bivens, and the district court erred when it dismissed those claims.")

Brunoehler v. Tarwater, No. 16-56634, 2018 WL 3470210, at *4, *9-11 (9th Cir. July 19, 2018) (not reported) (Bea, J., dissenting in part) ("I agree with the Majority that Dwight Brunoehler's Wiretap Act claim should be dismissed because he does not have standing to challenge the wiretap he alleges was based on a faulty application. However, I think Brunoehler has entirely failed to state a claim under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 91 S. Ct. 1999 (1971). I therefore respectfully dissent in part. . . . The Majority concludes that Brunoehler's arrest was not meaningfully different than Bivens's. The Majority is incorrect, because Bivens was subjected to a warrantless arrest . . . and Brunoehler was arrested pursuant to a warrant which followed a Grand Jury indictment. The difference is crucial: the officers whom Brunoehler now sues were operating under a different 'legal mandate[]'. . .than were the officers in Bivens, who executed a warrantless search without probable cause. As a result, per Ziglar, the difference between our case and Bivens is 'meaningful.'. . .The basic premise of a Bivens claim is that a plaintiff has suffered an injury to his constitutional rights. Each of Brunoehler's claims flows from wiretaps which he has no right to challenge, and from which he suffered no constitutional injury. The Bivens claim therefore fails. Even if we read Brunoehler's complaint to state a claim for an illegal arrest, the Bivens claim still would not lie, for the simple reason that such arrest was made upon a warrant supported by probable cause based on the Grand Jury's indictment. Further, where an adequate alternative remedy is available, the court may not extend a Bivens claim into a new context. The Wiretap Act provides such an adequate alternative. The district court's dismissal of Brunoehler's Bivens claim should be affirmed in full. I therefore respectfully dissent in part.")

Vega v. United States, 881 F.3d 1146, 1152-53 (9th Cir. 2018) ("Here, Vega asks us to expand the Bivens remedy against private defendants for allegedly violating his First Amendment right to access to courts, as well as his Fifth Amendment right to procedural due process. Although the district court stated that 'Minneci clarified that private employees acting under color of federal law cannot be held liable under Bivens,' Minneci's holding was in fact much more narrow. In Minneci, the Court examined whether to expand the Bivens remedy to include Eighth Amendment violations allegedly committed by employees of a private prison. . . In declining to do so, the Court relied on the fact that the defendants were private employees and that, unlike federal employees, they were subject to state law tort claims without qualified immunity. . . As such, the Court found that state law provided an adequate, alternative remedy, and declined to extend Bivens.. . In fact, the Minneci Court did not completely foreclose applying Bivens to private actors. . . For the following reasons, however, we decline to expand Bivens to include Vega's First and Fifth Amendment claims against private employees of a residential reentry center. . . . The Supreme Court has never explicitly recognized a Bivens remedy for a First Amendment claim. . . .In the Ninth Circuit, however, we have previously held that Bivens may be extended to First Amendment claims. . . . But because neither the Supreme Court nor we have expanded Bivens in the context of a prisoner's First Amendment access to court or Fifth Amendment procedural due process claims arising out of a prison disciplinary process, the circumstances of Vega's case against private defendants plainly present a 'new context' under Abbasi. . . .Here, Vega had adequate alternative remedies at his disposal and we therefore decline to address whether any special factors counsel hesitation. . . .Here, Vega had alternative means for relief against the alleged violations of his First and Fifth Amendment rights by the private defendants. First, Vega had a remedy 'to seek formal review of an issue relating to any aspect of his ... own confinement' under the Administrative Remedy Program ("ARP"). . . . Second, Vega could have sought review of the incident report by the UDC under 28 C.F.R. § 541.7, which is exactly what he ultimately did. . . .Third, Vega had state law claims as an alternative remedy. . . .That Vega's state law claims ultimately failed to satisfy the requirements of Washington law, or federal pleading standards, does not mean that he did not have access to alternative or meaningful remedies. . . .And although Vega contends that '[f]or [him], "it is damages or nothing,"' the fact that the administrative procedures in place to review sanctions resulted in his return to a residential reentry center belies his claim. Expanding Bivens in this context, therefore, seems imprudent given the Court's admonition that 'any alternative, existing process for protecting the interest amounts to a convincing reason for the Judicial Branch to refrain from providing a new and freestanding remedy in damages.'")

Manansingh v. United States, No. 2:20-CV-01139-DWM, 2021 WL 2080190, at *9 (D. Nev. May 24, 2021) ("Under the two-step inquiry identified above, the first question is whether Plaintiffs' fabrication claim seeks a Bivens remedy in a new context. . . Because the Supreme Court has extended Bivens only twice since it was decided, see Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14 (1980) (Eight Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Clause provided a prisoner's estate with a remedy for failing to provide adequate medical treatment); Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 228 (1979) (Fifth Amendment Due Process clause gave a Congressman's assistant a damages remedy for gender discrimination), a Fifth Amendment fabricated evidence claim based on the conduct of probation officers is unquestionably a new context. The next inquiry then is whether there are any special factors that counsel hesitation about extending Bivens to this context. . . Despite the overwhelming reluctance of courts to extend Bivens, it does not seem that any such factors exist here. The 'novel' circumstances at issue here do not implicate overarching challenges to federal policy, military interest, or national security. Rather, Plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment fabrication claim differs in no meaningful way from the Fourth Amendment contexts that have already been recognized. See Jacobs v. Alam, 915 F.3d 1028, 1038–39 (6th Cir. 2019) (collecting cases for "run of the mill" law enforcement Bivens actions). Moreover, post-Abbasi, the Ninth Circuit permitted a Bivens action against a federal immigration prosecutor who falsified evidence. See Lanuza v. Love, 899 F.3d 1019, 1033 (9th Cir. 2018). This case hews more closely to Bivens than that. As a result, Plaintiff's fabrication claim shall proceed under Bivens.")

Peterson v. Martinez, No. 3:19-CV-01447-WHO, 2020 WL 4673953, at *7 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 12, 2020) ("Although Abbasi's language sweeps broadly and fails to cite Farmer as a recognized Bivens context, the Third Circuit found that Farmer's absence did not indicate that it was, 'by implication, overruled.' Bistrian v. Levi, 912 F.3d 79, 91 (3d Cir. 2018). In that case, the Third Circuit noted that it was possible the Abbasi Court 'simply viewed the failure-to-protect claim as not distinct from the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim in the medical context,' which would explain why it cited only Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14, 16 (1980) (authorizing a remedy for failure to provide a prisoner medical treatment under the Eighth Amendment). . . Further, since Abbasi the Ninth Circuit decided Burnam, in which it reversed and remanded an Eighth Amendment claim for deliberate indifference to the risk that a prison employee was sexually abusing inmates—precisely the context at issue here. See Burnam, 787 F. App'x at 390. As the Ninth Circuit impliedly determined in Burnam, the fact that Farmer dealt with inmate-on-inmate sexual violence, while Peterson's involves staff-on-inmate sexual violence, is not a material fact that transforms this case into a new Bivens context. . . The defendants criticize Burnam and other cases for failing to cite Abbasi, but the Ninth Circuit clearly viewed Farmer as the viable and controlling authority even after Abbasi. . . Peterson's claim for an Eighth Amendment violation does not fall under a new Bivens context. Accordingly, I need not proceed to the special factors analysis under Abbasi.")

Jones v. Hernandez, No. 16-CV-1986 W (WVG), 2017 WL 5194636, at *11-12 (S.D. Cal. Nov. 9, 2017) ("Plaintiff urges the Court to infer unconstitutional retaliation based on the allegation that Jones asked Agent Hernandez, 'What's your fucking problem?' and was thereafter arrested and searched, allegedly through the use of excessive force. . . Judicially imposing First Amendment liability for arresting or searching a cursing suspect would threaten significant disruption of the proper functioning of the executive branch. . . It would extend the specter of litigation over broad swaths of agents' decision-making in the field, and it would likely increase the costs of enforcing federal law as a general matter. Second, and critically, this incident took place directly adjacent to the United States border—a place where 'the long-standing right of the sovereign to protect itself by stopping and examining persons and property crossing into this country' has been long-recognized and broadly protected. . . . Extending First Amendment Bivens liability to suspects trading profanities with border protection officers at the border could have wide-reaching consequences to agents' future decision-making—in searches as well as arrests. This is not the same Bivens context as those Plaintiff cites in opposition. . . As such, the question now becomes whether there exist ' "special factors counselling hesitation[,]"'. .—or, in modern parlance—' "who should decide" whether to provide for a damages remedy, Congress or the courts?'. . . .Here, Plaintiff urges the Court to extend a Bivens remedy for a violation of the First Amendment through retaliation for an exchange of profanity with a Border Patrol agent, directly adjacent to the border itself. There are at least two reasons why the Judiciary is not 'well suited, absent congressional action or instruction, to consider and weigh the costs and benefits of allowing a damages action to proceed' in this context. . . First, just as the Ziglar Court reiterated as to the military, the public purse, and federal land, Congress has designed its regulatory authority in a guarded way as to border protection. . . Second, such a remedy could have wide-reaching consequences as to the costs of enforcing the law at the border.")

Eleventh Circuit

Johnson v. Burden, 781 F. App'x 833, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("The district court erred in concluding that Bivens extends to First Amendment retaliation claims. The district court concluded that in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250 (2006), the Supreme Court explicitly recognized a First Amendment retaliation claim under Bivens. But the district court discounted the fact that Abbasi . . . did not identify a First Amendment retaliation claim as one of the three recognized Bivens contexts, reasoning that 'the Court must assume the Supreme Court knew what it was saying and meant what it said in Hartman when it recognized a First Amendment retaliation claim under Bivens.' In Hartman, the Supreme Court held that a plaintiff cannot state a claim of retaliatory prosecution in violation of the First Amendment if the charges were supported by probable cause. . . The Supreme Court stated that, '[w]hen the vengeful officer is federal, he is subject to an action for damages on the authority of Bivens.'. . But the Court appeared to assume the availability of a Bivens remedy for purposes of reaching its holding—that a complaint claiming retaliatory prosecution must allege and prove a lack of probable cause. . . In doing so, the Court qualified its holding, stating that 'we are addressing a requirement of causation, which [the plaintiff] must plead and prove in order to win, and our holding does not go beyond a definition of an element of the tort, directly implicated by the defense of qualified immunity and properly before us on interlocutory appeal.'. . Following Hartman, the Supreme Court has repeatedly confirmed that it has not extended a Bivens remedy to First Amendment claims. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 675 (2009) (noting that it has previously "declined to extend Bivens to a claim sounding in the First Amendment"); see also Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658, 663 n.4 (2012) ("We have never held that Bivens extends to First Amendment claims."). And in Wood v. Moss, 134 S. Ct. 2056, 2066 (2014), the Supreme Court confirmed that it has 'several times assumed without deciding that Bivens extends to First Amendment claims.' The Court did so again in Wood because that 'antecedent issue' was not preserved. . . Moreover, the Court in Abbasi did not mention Hartman as one of the cases establishing appropriate contexts in which to apply Bivens, indicating that the Hartman language was mere dicta. . . The Supreme Court's post-Hartman cases indicate that First Amendment claims, like Johnson's here, represent a new Bivens context. The district court was therefore required to apply a 'special factors' analysis consistent with Abbasi to determine whether expanding Bivens would be appropriate in Johnson's case. Accordingly, we remand to the district court to reconsider its ruling on the Defendants' motion to dismiss or for summary judgment in light of Abbasi, and we decline to consider Defendants' qualified immunity argument.").

II. QUALIFIED IMMUNITY:PRELIMINARY PRINCIPLES

A. Basic Doctrine

A public official performing a discretionary function enjoys qualified immunity in a civil action for damages, provided his or her conduct does not violate clearly established federal statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known. Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 (1982). The immunity is "immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability." Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 526 (1985).

See also Bamdad v. Drug Enforcement Admin., 617 F. App'x 7, 9 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("In any event, Bamdad is incorrect in arguing that qualified immunity does not apply to nominal-damages claims. In Elkins v. District of Columbia, 690 F.3d 554 (D.C.Cir.2012), this Court upheld a grant of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds in a case seeking nominal damages. . . And for good reason. Qualified immunity is an immunity from suit, not just remedial absolution.")

Note: In Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843 (2017), Justice Thomas wrote separately to express his "growing concern" with the Court's qualified immunity jurisprudence. His comments are worth noting:

> The Civil Rights Act of 1871, of which § 1985(3) and the more frequently litigated § 1983 were originally a part, established causes of action for plaintiffs to seek money damages from Government officers who violated federal law. . . Although the Act made no mention of defenses or immunities, 'we have read it in harmony with general principles of tort immunities and defenses rather than in derogation of them.'. . We have done so because '[c]ertain immunities were so well established in 1871 ... that 'we presume that Congress would have specifically so provided had it wished to abolish' them.'. . Immunity is thus available under the statute if it was 'historically accorded the relevant official' in an analogous situation 'at common law,'. . . unless the statute provides some reason to think that Congress did not preserve the defense[.] . . .In some contexts, we have conducted the common-law inquiry that the statute requires. . . For example, we have concluded that legislators and judges are absolutely immune from liability under § 1983 for their official acts because that immunity was well established at common law in 1871. . . We have similarly looked to the common law in holding that a prosecutor is immune from suits relating to the 'judicial phase of the criminal process,'. . . although not from suits relating to the prosecutor's advice to police officers[.] In developing immunity doctrine for other executive officers, we also started off by applying common-law rules. In Pierson, we held that police officers are not absolutely immune from a § 1983 claim arising from an arrest made pursuant to an unconstitutional statute because the common law never granted arresting officers that sort of immunity. . . Rather, we concluded that police officers could assert 'the defense of good faith and probable cause' against the claim for an unconstitutional arrest because that defense was available against the analogous torts of 'false arrest and imprisonment' at common law. . .In further elaborating the doctrine of qualified immunity for executive officials, however, we have diverged from the historical inquiry mandated by the statute. . . In the decisions following Pierson, we have 'completely reformulated qualified immunity along principles not at all embodied in the common law.'. . Instead of asking whether the common law in 1871 would have accorded immunity to an officer for a tort analogous to the plaintiff's claim under § 1983, we instead grant immunity to any officer whose conduct 'does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . We apply this 'clearly established' standard 'across the board' and without regard to 'the precise nature of the various officials' duties or the precise character of the particular rights alleged to have been violated.'. . We have not attempted to locate that standard in the common law as it existed in 1871, however, and some evidence supports the conclusion that common-law immunity as it existed in 1871 looked quite different from our current doctrine. [citing Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?] Because our analysis is no longer grounded in the common-law backdrop against which Congress enacted the 1871 Act, we are no longer engaged in 'interpret [ing] the intent of Congress in enacting' the Act. . . Our qualified immunity precedents instead represent precisely the sort of 'freewheeling policy choice[s]' that we have previously disclaimed the power to make. . . We have acknowledged, in fact, that the 'clearly established' standard is designed to 'protec[t] the balance between vindication of constitutional rights and government officials' effective performance of their duties.'. . The Constitution assigns this kind of balancing to Congress, not the Courts. In today's decision, we continue down the path our precedents have marked. We ask 'whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that the alleged conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted,'. . . rather than whether officers in petitioners' positions would have been accorded immunity at common law in 1871 from claims analogous to respondents'. Even if we ultimately reach a conclusion consistent with the common-law rules prevailing in 1871, it is mere fortuity. Until we shift the focus of our inquiry to whether immunity existed at common law, we will continue > to substitute our own policy preferences for the mandates of Congress. In an appropriate case, we should reconsider our qualified immunity jurisprudence.

Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1870–72 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

But see Wonsey v. City of Chicago, 940 F.3d 394, 400 (7th Cir. 2019) ("The district court rejected Wonsey's June 9 search and seizure claims based on qualified immunity. To challenge that decision, Wonsey's counsel lifted content from a law review article which suggests qualified immunity makes governments less accountable. From that premise, Wonsey boldly proposes this court should scrap the doctrine of qualified immunity. The Supreme Court, however, continues to apply the doctrine and recently reiterated its 'settled principles.' City of Escondido, Cal. v. Emmons, —– U.S. ——–, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503, 202 L.Ed.2d 455 (2019) (per curiam). Wonsey's request effectively asks us to ignore the structure of Article III courts and follow the lead of unnamed 'federal courts scholars.' We pass on Wonsey's proposal and follow the Supreme Court.")

B. Note on Application to Federal Statutory Claims

See Stramaski v. Lawley, 44 F.3d 318, 326-29 (5th Cir. 2022) ("The parties have assumed that the doctrine of qualified immunity applies to claims brought under the FLSA. Starting from that premise, their differing arguments address the doctrine. Our starting point is a conviction that substantial analysis is necessary before deciding if qualified immunity ever applies to the FLSA. Nonetheless, because neither party has disputed the relevance of that doctrine, perhaps any contrary notion has been waived. Whether waiver applies in this court due to the absence of argument by either party depends on the nature of the issue. If the issue of whether a qualified immunity defense is implied by or otherwise exists under a federal statute is a question of statutory interpretation, then this court is required to discern statutory meaning regardless of party argument. . . Further, regardless of the category in which to place the unasked question of whether the doctrine even applies, we may use our 'independent power to identify and apply the proper construction of governing law' to any 'issue or claim [that] is properly before the court, ... not limited to the particular legal theories advanced by the parties.'. . We conclude that regardless of whether the applicability of qualified immunity to the FLSA is a statutory-construction issue or whether it is simply too critical to ignore in this case, we will address it. . . We discover no Fifth Circuit opinion that holds qualified immunity is a defense under the FLSA. We also find very little discussion in opinions from other circuits and none from the Supreme Court. . . In light of the absence of any briefing on this foundational point, and because the analysis we set out indicates there are complexities involved for which briefing is needed prior to any decision, we will only identify some of the analysis that is necessary without reaching a conclusion. Because of our subsequent determination that qualified immunity would be available on these facts if it is available for this statute, we remand so the parties and the district court can make the initial resolution of whether the defense applies to the FLSA. We set out the principles for the availability of qualified immunity under a statute. It is applicable to a congressional enactment when two conditions exist: (1) 'the tradition of immunity was so firmly rooted in the common law' and (2) is 'supported by such strong policy reasons that Congress would have specifically so provided had it wished to abolish the doctrine.'. . . Were there analogous torts in the common law? Did Congress 'intend' to incorporate concepts of qualified immunity when it explicitly created a more limited defense of good faith in the FLSA? For example, a good faith following of administrative rulings on the meaning of the FLSA will bar an action for a violation of the Act. 29 U.S.C. § 259. Further, any employer who can show that the violation of the FLSA was committed 'in good faith and that he had reasonable grounds for believing that his act or omission was not a violation' will not be liable for liquidated damages in addition to actual damages. . . We will not go further with setting out the difficulties, which may not be insurmountable, of applying qualified immunity to the FLSA. Certainly, though, there are difficulties. The initial resolution of the issue is for the district court. . . . We now examine the facts as to whether, if available under the FLSA, qualified immunity would apply. The district court accepted the magistrate judge's conclusion that Stramaski's claim is that she was terminated for insisting that she be timely paid. We have held that a violation of a much earlier version of the FLSA occurs when 'an employer on any regular payment date fails to pay the full amount of the minimum wages and overtime compensation due an employee.' . . For purposes of our analysis in this case, we accept that as a fair reading of the obligation. For Stramaski's retaliation claims, she must have plausibly alleged that her discharge was because she 'filed any complaint or instituted or caused to be instituted any proceeding under or related to this chapter.'. . . There is a question, though, arising from the fact that Stramaski never complained about not being timely paid. In fact, she received her wages for the relevant time period on the proper date. Instead, her claim is that she suffered retaliation because she complained about being told that her next paycheck would be late. Whether her complaints made the difference or not, the prospect of late wages did not materialize. Thus, the issue under qualified immunity is whether discharging an employee when the employee insists that a violation of law not occur in the future, and the violation did not in fact occur, can constitute retaliation under the FLSA. It is that factual permutation that causes us to conclude that there is no clearly established law, with a sufficient degree of specificity, that Stramaski's termination was a violation of the FLSA. We will mention the defendant's separate argument that the law also was not clearly established that an individual supervisory state employee like Lawley could be held personally liable under the FLSA. Even if that was uncertain, and we do not conclude it was, any uncertainty about the liability that would arise for violating someone's certain rights is not the proper focus. Whether a lawsuit can follow, i.e., whether liability can be imposed, from someone's actions is an entirely separate question from whether it is clearly established that someone's actions were objectively reasonable at the time they occurred. In other words, the concern is whether, at the time that the relevant acts occurred, the future defendant's actions violated a clear right of a future plaintiff. . . We have been shown no caselaw that supports that the prospective defendant needs to know all the repercussions of a knowing violation of someone's right. It is enough that the right being violated is clear. Based on this analysis, Stramaski's claim would be barred by qualified immunity because she does not allege that Lawley violated a clearly established law. However, the antecedent question is whether qualified immunity applies to the FLSA to begin with. We therefore remand for the district court to decide this question in the first instance."); Stramaski v. Lawley, 44 F.4th 318, 329-31 (5th Cir. 2022) (Gregg, J., concurring) ("It says something about how much qualified immunity dominates section 1983 litigation that everyone in the district court—the experienced lawyers and judges alike—assumed the immunity exists whenever a public official is sued. But qualified immunity is not some 'brooding omnipresence in the sky' that automatically attaches in any suit. . . Rather, it is a defense that must be found in the governing statute. . . So whether the FLSA contains an immunity defense is a question of statutory interpretation. And in a textualist world, recognizing an immunity defense when the words of the statute do not provide one is an extraordinary act of interpretation. Courts should read an immunity defense into a statute only 'if the "tradition of immunity was so firmly rooted in the common law and was supported by such strong policy reasons that 'Congress would have specifically so provided had it wished to abolish the doctrine.'"' . . Given this stringent inquiry, it is no surprise that qualified immunity is 'typically invoked' in constitutional tort cases under section 1983 and Bivens, causes of action 'largely "devised by the Supreme Court without any legislative ... guidance."'. . After all, when Congress creates specific statutory defenses—which it did not do when enacting section 1983 in the Civil Rights Act of 1871—it likely does not intend to incorporate general common law defenses as well. . . While the Supreme Court has found a sufficient common law immunity to read in qualified immunity case a defense to constitutional torts, lower courts have found no similar tradition for rights created by some statutes. For example, we found no qualified immunity for retaliation suits under the False Claims Act. . . Other courts have rejected immunity defenses under the antifraud provisions of the False Claims Act . . . and under statutes as varied as the Wiretap Act, . . . the Civil Rights Act, . . . and the Stored Communications Act[.] . . .That said, courts have found immunity defenses to some statutory claims. [collecting cases] But the Supreme Court's instruction on how to evaluate the availability of qualified immunity is different. To find an atextual immunity defense, the court must conduct a statute-specific analysis to determine if common-law immunity from suit was 'firmly rooted' as a protection against a closely analogous tort. . . For this case, then, the proper inquiry is whether, when Congress enacted the Fair Labor Standards Act's antiretaliation provision, there was a tradition of immunity for a claim alleging intentional retaliation in the workplace. . . With these additional observations, I fully join the majority opinion and leave it to the district court to decide the existence of an immunity defense under the FLSA after full briefing from the parties."); Tanzin v. Tanvir, 141 S. Ct. 486, 492 n.* (2020) ("Both the Government and respondents agree that government officials are entitled to assert a qualified immunity defense when sued in their individual capacities for money damages under RFRA. Indeed, respondents emphasize that the 'qualified immunity defense was created for precisely these circumstances,' . . . and is a 'powerful shield' that 'protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who flout clearly established law[.]'"); Ajaj v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 25 F.4th 805, 813-14 (10th Cir. 2022) ("We hold that qualified immunity can be invoked by officials sued in their individual capacities for money damages under RFRA. . . . [M]any circuits have applied qualified immunity to individual-capacity suits under a variety of statutes, including RFRA. [collecting cases] . . . see also Gonzalez v. Lee Cnty. Hous. Auth., 161 F.3d 1290, 1299–1300, 1300 n.34 (11th Cir. 1998) (collecting 11 opinions from eight circuits recognizing qualified-immunity defense under eight different federal statutes); Tapley v. Collins, 211 F.3d 1210, 1214–16, 1215 n.9 (11th Cir. 2000) (same; also deciding that good-faith defense in Fair Housing Act did not abrogate qualified-immunity defense)."); Davila v. Gladden, 777 F.3d 1198, 1202-12 (11th Cir. 2015) ("After careful consideration, we conclude that Congress did not clearly waive sovereign immunity to authorize suits for money damages against officers in their official capacities under RFRA. Also, even if we were to assume the statute authorizes suits for money damages against officers in their individual capacities, we hold that the Defendants here would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . .In Sossamon v. Texas, . . . the Supreme Court held that identical 'appropriate relief' language in the related statute RLUIPA did not waive states' sovereign immunity from money damages. . . .The only two circuit courts to address whether RFRA waived the federal government's sovereign immunity have held that it did not. [citing Oklevueha Native Am. Church of Haw., Inc. v. Holder, 676 F.3d 829, 841 (9th Cir.2012) and Webman v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 441 F.3d 1022, 1026 (D.C.Cir.2006)]. . . . We recognize that in Sossamon, the Court was addressing the sovereign immunity of the states. . . However, the Court's analysis in addressing the ambiguity of 'appropriate relief' applies equally to issues of federal sovereign immunity. Congress did not unequivocally waive its sovereign immunity in passing RFRA. RFRA does not therefore authorize suits for money damages against officers in their official capacities. . . . Second, we decline to address whether RFRA authorizes suits against officers in their individual capacities. Even if RFRA did authorize individual-capacity suits for money damages, these Defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Whether or not the District Court concludes that the Defendants violated Mr. Davila's rights under RFRA at trial, the law preexisting the Defendants' conduct did not compel the conclusion that their actions violated RFRA. . . . Officers are entitled to clear notice about how their actions violate federal rights. In order to do away with qualified immunity for these offices, it must have been clearly established under RFRA that a prisoner can get religious property from outside sources when the religious items available through authorized means are not sufficient to meet the prisoner's religious needs. Mr. Davila has offered no prior case clearly establishing that proposition. . . . So even if Mr. Davila is successful at trial in proving a RFRA violation, these Defendants would be protected from paying money damages in their individual capacities."); Walden v. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 669 F.3d 1277, 1285 (11th Cir. 2012) ("The defense of qualified immunity applies not only to constitutional claims, but also to claims brought for alleged violations of RFRA. See, e.g., Rasul v. Myers, 563 F.3d 527, 533 n. 6 (D.C.Cir. 2009) (per curiam) (holding, in the alternative, that federal officials were entitled to qualified immunity against claims brought for violations of RFRA); cf. Tapley v. Collins, 211 F.3d 1210, 1214 (11th Cir.2000) ("[T]he Supreme Court has said that the defense of qualified immunity is so well established, that if Congress wishes to abrogate it, Congress should specifically say so."); id. at 1215 n. 9 (collecting cases holding that qualified immunity is a defense to claims arising under various federal statutes).").

Compare Hedquist v. Walsh, 786 F. App'x 130, ___ (10th Cir. 2019) ("Mr. Hedquist's evidence, when viewed in his favor, would indicate that the police chief was trying both to investigate a possible crime and to instigate the removal of a political opponent. One purpose was permissible, the other wasn't; and we lack precedent or meaningful other guidance on liability under the Driver's Privacy Protection Act when the defendant obtains protected driver records for both permissible and impermissible purposes. Given the absence of meaningful guidance, any statutory violation by the police chief would not have been clearly established. The police chief thus enjoys qualified immunity, and we affirm his award of summary judgment.") with Hedquist v. Walsh, 786 F. App'x 130, ___ (10th Cir. 2019) (Lucero, J., dissenting) ("There is no straight-faced argument to be made that rummaging through the driver record of a political opponent in hopes of finding damaging information fits within one of the DPPA's permitted purposes. . . In Collier v. Dickinson, 477 F.3d 1306 (11th Cir. 2007), the Eleventh Circuit held that '[t]he words of the DPPA alone are specific enough to establish clearly the law' in a case involving the selling of driver data to mass marketers. . . That court has since stated that the DPPA will not make every violation a clearly established one. . . But as in Collier, any reasonable officer would understand, merely under the text of the statute, that a search done for the purpose of political harassment is impermissible.")

Compare Roth v. Guzman, 650 F.3d 603, 612, 617 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Even if we accept that the DPPA may be read to impose liability on a state official in his individual capacity when personal information disclosed for a purportedly permissible purpose was actually obtained for an impermissible purpose, we cannot agree that this right was clearly established at the time of the disclosures. . . . The district court acknowledged that there was (and is) no binding precedent from the Supreme Court, the Sixth Circuit, the district court itself, or other circuits deciding the issues raised in this case such as would render the asserted right 'clearly established.'. . . To the extent that the plaintiffs could prove a violation of the DPPA based on the allegation that Shadowsoft misrepresented itself as having a proper purpose under § 2721(b)(3) or that the disclosures were made in bulk under § 2721(b)(3), we find the contours of such rights were not sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would have understood at the time that the disclosures would violate such rights.") with Roth v. Guzman, 650 F.3d 603, 617-21 (6th Cir. 2011) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("While I do not take issue with the majority's conclusion that nothing in the Drivers Privacy Protection Act . . . prohibits the bulk disclosure of personal information contained in drivers' records, I respectfully dissent from the majority's determination that the disclosure of such records to Shadowsoft by officials at the Ohio Department of Public Safety and the Ohio Bureau of Motor Vehicles . . . without reasonably inquiring into whether Shadowsoft was a legitimate business using the records for a permissible purpose, was not a violation of a clearly established statutory requirement. While, as the majority notes, we have no binding case authority to guide us in addressing the claims raised in this case, we do have the statutory language of the DPPA. Under the factual scenario and procedural posture of the case now before us, I agree with the district court that the language of the DPPA is, in itself, sufficient to defeat qualified immunity for Defendants . . . .Even if it were true, as the majority contends, that BMV Officials' obligation of reasonable inquiry into a requester's permissible use begins and ends with a check in a box on a standardized form, it cannot be the case that a state official fulfills his legal obligations, under 18 U.S.C. § 2721(b)(3), when he releases drivers' personal information with absolutely nothing to indicate that he is releasing the information to a 'legitimate business.' Under the facts as pleaded in this case, any reasonable official would have been on notice that to disclose the information requested by Shadowsoft in response to Shadowsoft's facially deficient request would violate the DPPA. Finally, it must be emphasized that the exceptions outlined in 18 U.S.C. §§ 2721(b)(1)-(14) are permissive, not mandatary. Holding that a state official must perform a reasonable minimal inquiry before releasing sensitive personal information to anyone with a fax machine, a pencil and two dollars does not impose an unreasonable burden. BMV Officials may decide that they do not want to face the threat of DPPA liability for disclosing drivers' information without first inquiring into whom and for what purpose they are being asked to disclose. The solution is simple: when in doubt as to whether the purpose of the request comports with the requirements of the Act, BMV Officials may choose not to release drivers' information for non-mandatory uses. After all, the purpose of the DPPA is to encourage state officials to do what they should strive to do anyway, which is to protect the personal information of state residents.")

See Sterling v. Bd. of Trustees of the Univ. of Arkansas, 42 F.4th 901, 904-05 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Here, after briefly describing the defendants' qualified-immunity argument in one paragraph, the district court rejected it in the next, holding that 'qualified immunity is not available to defendants on an FMLA claim.' That is incorrect. In Hager v. Arkansas Department of Health, we reversed a district court's denial of summary judgment, holding that a supervisor enjoyed qualified immunity from the plaintiff's retaliation claim under the FMLA. . .The district court's rejection of Wallace's qualified-immunity defense was based on a misreading of our statement in Darby v. Bratch that '[t]he Family and Medical Leave Act creates clearly established statutory rights, including the right to be free of discrimination or retaliation on account of one's exercise of leave rights granted by the statute.'. . The district court's sweeping interpretation of Darby—that qualified immunity is never available to FMLA defendants—is inconsistent with the Supreme Court's admonition 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . .Because of the district court's error, as in Ferguson, 'nowhere were the[ ] principles' of qualified immunity 'applied to the facts.'. . Wallace is 'entitled to a thorough determination of [his] claim of qualified immunity if that immunity is to mean anything at all.'. . We therefore 'remand the case to the district court for consideration of the motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.'"); Fazaga v. Fed. Bureau of Investigation, 965 F.3d 1015, 1031 & n.7 (9th Cir. 2020) (on denial of reh'g and reh'g en banc) ("The parties. . . agree that [the] legal standards from FISA—reasonable expectation of privacy and the warrant requirement—are evaluated just as they would be under a Fourth Amendment analysis. The Agent Defendants argue, however, that they are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' FISA claim. Plaintiffs accept that qualified immunity can apply under FISA but maintain that the Agent Defendants are not entitled to immunity. . . .We have found only one decision, unpublished, addressing whether qualified immunity is an available defense to a FISA claim. See Elnashar v. U.S. Dep't of Justice, No. CIV.03-5110(JNE/JSM), 2004 WL 2237059, at *5 (D. Minn. Sept. 30, 2004) (dismissing a FISA claim on grounds of qualified immunity because there was no evidence the defendant "would have known that the search of [plaintiff's] apartment would have required a warrant"), aff'd on other grounds, 446 F.3d 792 (8th Cir. 2006). As the issue is not contested, we do not decide it."); Attkisson v. Holder, 919 F.3d 789, 805-06 (4th Cir. 2019) ("Assessing the plaintiffs' ECPA [Electronic Communications Privacy Act] claim, we conclude that, to the extent

Holder and Donahoe procured any wrongful interception, use, or disclosure of the plaintiffs' electronic communications, they did not violate a clearly established right. To show a clearly established right, a plaintiff must identify existing precedent that 'placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . This the plaintiffs have failed to do. . . Whatever our view of the procurement issue, the lack of settled precedent supporting the plaintiffs' ECPA claim demonstrates that Holder and Donahoe are now entitled to qualified immunity. See Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. at 1868 ("When the courts are divided on an issue so central to the cause of action alleged, a reasonable official lacks the notice required before imposing liability."). Consequently, we affirm the district court's dismissal of the ECPA claim with regard to Holder and Donahoe."); Baas v. Fewless, 886 F.3d 1088, 1093 (11th Cir. 2018) ("When considering whether an official 'would have known that his actions were prohibited by the law at the time he engaged in the conduct in question,' '[t]he standard is one of objective reasonableness.'. . We use two methods to determine whether a reasonable officer would know that his conduct violates federal law. The first 'looks at the relevant case law at the time of the violation; the right is clearly established if a concrete factual context exists so as to make it obvious to a reasonable government actor that his actions violate federal law.'. . The second 'looks not at case law, but at the officer's conduct, and inquires whether that conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the [law] prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the officer, notwithstanding the lack of fact-specific case law.'. . To establish a violation of the DPPA, a plaintiff must show 'that a defendant (1) knowingly obtained, disclosed or used personal information, (2) from a motor vehicle record, (3) for a purpose not permitted.'. . 'The plain meaning of the third factor is that it is only satisfied if [it is] shown that obtainment, disclosure, or use was not for a purpose enumerated under § 2721(b)'; 'the burden [to show this] is properly upon the plaintiff.'. .There is no case law clearly establishing that Fewless' use of the photos was impermissible. Moreover, Appellants were required to show that no reasonable officer in the officers' position could have believed that he was accessing or distributing the photos for a permissible use under the DPPA. Appellants failed to make that showing. Appellees are therefore entitled to qualified immunity."); John K. MacIver Institute for Public Policy, Inc. v. Schmitz, 885 F.3d 1004, 1015 (7th Cir. 2018) ("MacIver responds that as a matter of law, qualified immunity does not apply to statutory claims arising from the SCA [Stored Communications Act]. That is not, however, the direction in which our decisions have gone in cases under the Wiretap Act. We have consistently recognized qualified immunity for alleged Wiretap Act violations. See Narducci v. Moore, 572 F.3d 313, 323 (7th Cir. 2009); Davis v. Zirkelbach, 149 F.3d 614, 618 (7th Cir. 1998). The Sixth and Eleventh Circuits agree. See Blake v. Wright, 179 F.3d 1003, 1012 (6th Cir. 1999); Tapley v. Collins, 211 F.3d 1210, 1216 (11th Cir. 2000). MacIver relies heavily upon the D.C. Circuit's decision in Berry v. Funk, 146 F.3d 1003 (D.C. Cir. 1998), which went the other way and held that qualified immunity did not apply to the Wiretap Act. . . We see no persuasive reason, however, to distinguish the SCA from the Wiretap Act or to depart from circuit precedent. To the extent it makes any difference (and that is unclear), we hold that qualified immunity is available to SCA defendants in general, and these defendants in particular."); Watts v. City of Miami, 679 F. App'x 806, 809-10 (11th Cir. 2017) ("We are compelled to conclude that the district court erred. Collier is not sufficiently similar to the facts at issue in this case as to constitute 'relevant case law' that put the officers on notice, nor did it lay down a general rule that violations of the DPPA are always violations of clearly established law. This Court in Collier addressed a situation in which executive-level DHSMV officials were selling driver records to third-party mass marketers without the consent of the drivers. . We concluded that this was a violation of clearly established law, because '[t]he language of Sections 2721(b)(11)–(13) unambiguously requires the consent of individuals before their motor vehicle record information may be released' for sale to marketers. Id. at 1310–11. This is very different from the Defendant's behavior in this case, where the officers obtained information about Watts for their own use. Moreover, Collier does not stand for the principle that all DPPA violations are so obviously clear that qualified immunity can never protect an official from suit under the DPPA. Rather, Collier represents the more common sense judgment that where a violation is readily apparent from the plain language of an act, the plaintiff need not point to any particular case addressing the obvious import of the statute. This Court found it clear from the DPPA's text that consent was required for information released to marketers. . . But as we've said before, '[o]bvious clarity cases are "rare" and present a "narrow exception" to the general rule of qualified immunity.'. . To fall into this category, a prohibition must be so clear that 'no reasonable officer could have believed that [the Defendants'] actions were legal.'. . It is not obviously clear that an officer obtaining the information for his own use is not within the permissible use of § 2721(b)(1), 'use by any government agency, including any court or law enforcement agency, in carrying out its functions,' or of § 2721(b)(14), 'any other use specifically authorized under the law of the State that holds the record, if such use is related to ... public safety.' To overcome the qualified immunity defense under this standard, Watts was required to show that no reasonable officer in the Defendants' position could have believed that he was accessing her DAVID information for a permissible use under the DPPA. Watts never made this showing, and the district court, nonetheless, misapplied Collier to conclude that all DPPA violations are obviously clear, and did not otherwise address the issue. . . . In short, '[i]n the absence of [any] caselaw to the contrary, [the Defendants], though [possibly] mistaken, could have reasonably believed' that their DAVID accesses were permitted uses under the DPPA. Dukes v. Deaton, —— F.3d ——, 2017 WL 370854, *5 (11th Cir., Jan. 26, 2017). We, therefore, agree with the Defendants that Watts did not show that the officers had 'clear notice ... that [accessing] the information in question violated federal law.'. . . Because Watts failed to show that the officers accessed her information for a purpose that was clearly not permitted by the DPPA, we need not address whether their actual purpose was permitted under the DPPA. . . Accordingly, we conclude that the district court erred in denying the Defendants qualified immunity."); Kampschroer v. Anoka Cty., 840 F.3d 961, 962 (8th Cir. 2016) (per curiam) ("After the parties briefed these appeals, we issued our decision in McDonough v. Anoka County, 799 F.3d 931 (8th Cir. 2015), cert. denied, 136 S. Ct. 2388 (2016), which squarely addressed this qualified immunity issue: 'Because the meaning of "obtain" in this context is unambiguous, ... [defendants'] contention that qualified immunity applies to [their] conduct because the meaning of "obtain" is unclear ... fails.'. . We invited the parties in all the pending DPPA cases to submit supplemental briefs on a different issue -- how we should apply the 'plausibility analysis' in our McDonough opinion to these appeals. Appellants did not take that opportunity to submit a brief arguing footnote 6 in McDonough does not govern their qualified immunity appeals. We conclude McDonough is controlling precedent. Our decision that the statutory term 'obtain' is unambiguous controls appellants' additional argument that the rule of lenity entitles them to qualified immunity."); McDonough v. Anoka Cnty., 799 F.3d 931, 956-57 (8th Cir. 2015) ("The circuits' varied interpretations of § 2724's mental state element reflect a lack of clarity regarding 1) to which element or elements the 'know[ledge]' requirement applies; 2) the standard of care, if any, that disclosers must exercise when ascertaining the purpose for an information request; and 3) whether the word 'purpose' in § 2724 refers to the discloser's purpose for divulging the information or the obtainer's purpose for requesting it. Even if, at the time of the disclosures in the instant action, it was clearly established that a discloser has a duty under the DPPA to make some effort to ascertain a recipient's purpose, it was not clearly established that the ascertained purpose must be express and explicit. Drivers allege that DPS issued passwords to police officers, employees at sheriffs' offices, court staff, or other similarly situated government agents in connection with their jobs. There are no allegations that DPS issued passwords to agents or officers whose job duties did not require the use of personal information in motor vehicle records and who nevertheless accessed Drivers' personal information. Drivers allege that Law Enforcement Does received training about proper use of the database and that the website used to log on to the database stated, 'Access to this service is for authorized personnel only conducting official business....' Law Enforcement Does thus implicitly certified a permissible purpose each time they logged on. In these circumstances, we cannot say that, at the time of the alleged accesses, any reasonable official would have understood that DPS's policy of allowing the above-described government employees password-protected access to the database violated Drivers' rights under the DPPA. Drivers also allege that Commissioners and DPS Does knew of the widespread misuse of the system and 'knowingly disclosed' Drivers' personal information by 'failing to safeguard and monitor the database' and by 'willfully refusing to correct the misuses.' These allegations, at most, allege negligence or recklessness. Even assuming that the DPPA imposes a duty of some degree of care on DPS officials, that duty of care was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violations. To the extent that Drivers attempt to allege, without support, that Commissioners and DPS Does actually knew that the particular disclosures alleged in the complaint were for impermissible purposes, such bald allegations are conclusory and are properly disregarded when determining whether the complaint survives a motion to dismiss."); Drimal v. Tai, 786 F.3d 219, 225-26 (2d Cir. 2015) ("While issues related to qualified immunity frequently must await a motion for summary judgment, that might not be the case here. A putative amended complaint, pleaded with the requisite specificity based on the hearing before Judge Sullivan, likely would enable the district court to address qualified immunity issues, at least in part, at the pleading stage. Section 2518(5) of Title III does not precisely define the minimization requirement. It states only that agents must 'minimize the interception of communications not otherwise subject to interception.' 18 U.S.C. § 2518(5). In Scott v. United States, the Supreme Court articulated an 'objective reasonableness' test to determine whether agents have properly minimized calls. . . This standard requires 'an objective assessment of an officer's actions in light of the facts and circumstances then known to him.'. . The district court must thus evaluate each agent's minimization efforts under such an 'objective reasonableness' standard based on the facts of this case to determine whether each defendant 'would understand that what he is doing violates' Title III's minimization requirement. . . .Should Drimal file an amended complaint, in assessing the defendants' claim of qualified immunity on remand, the district court must consider the actions of each individual defendant. . . . Government Exhibit 30, featured at the suppression hearing in the criminal case and of which we take judicial notice, . . . makes it apparent that different defendants responded differently to their duty to minimize: some may be able to successfully claim qualified immunity even at the pleading stage where others may not."); Gillie v. Law Office of Eric A. Jones, LLC, 785 F.3d 1091, 1109 & n.21 (6th Cir. 2015) ("[Q]ualified immunity is inapplicable to an action brought directly under the FDCPA [Fair Debt Collection Practices Act], where Congress has included an explicit exemption from debt collector liability for government officials. . . . Qualified immunity typically applies to actions brought under § 1983 or pursuant to Bivens. We have only extended its coverage to actions brought directly under a federal statute on a few occasions, see, e.g., Cullinan v. Abramson, 128 F.3d 301, 312 (6th Cir.1997) (RICO); Blake v. Wright, 179 F.3d 1003, 1011–12 (6th Cir.1999) (Federal Wiretap Act), and those statutes did not include explicit exemptions for public officials."); Bryant v. Texas Dep't of Aging & Disability Servs., 781 F.3d 764, 771 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Bryant has not cited to a single judicial opinion holding that employees on FMLA leave have a right to be free from phone calls. Thus, Littleton is entitled to qualified immunity on Bryant's remaining interference claim."); U.S. ex rel. Parikh v. Brown, 587 F. App'x 123, 127-29 (5th Cir. Oct. 1, 2014) (on panel reh'g) ("The parties largely dispute the categorical availability of qualified immunity against FCA suits, but we expressly decline to resolve this dispute. Instead, assuming arguendo that qualified immunity is an available defense, we hold on the merits that Brown and Campbell are not entitled to qualified immunity against these FCA claims. . . .Relators have born their burden on the first step of the qualified immunity analysis. As the district court found, Relators sufficiently pleaded that Appellants violated the FCA by submitting, or conspiring to submit, claims for payment while knowingly falsely certifying compliance with the AKS and Stark Law. . . . Because the well-pleaded complaint alleges that Brown and Campbell certified claims with "actual knowledge of their falsity," we need not address the more difficult question whether qualified immunity may be available for other FCA violations on a lesser scienter showing, namely deliberate indifference or recklessness. The key question, then, is whether the contours of the FCA were sufficiently clear at the time such that every reasonable official would have understood that—as Relators pleaded in their complaint—presenting claims for payment, while knowingly falsely certifying compliance with the AKS and Stark Law, violated the FCA. Based on circuit precedent, we answer in the affirmative."); Collier v. Dickinson, 477 F.3d 1306, 1311, 1312 (11th Cir. 2007) ("Having found that the statutory rights created by the DPPA [Driver Privacy Protection Act] are enforceable both directly and under Section 1983, we must now ask whether the law was sufficiently established to have provided fair warning to Defendants that they were violating the law. . . . We find that the plain language of the statute and the case law gave clear notice to Defendants that releasing the information in question violated federal law. The words of the DPPA alone are 'specific enough to establish clearly the law applicable to particular conduct and circumstances and to overcome qualified immunity.'"); Tapley v. Collins, 211 F.3d 1210, 1214, 1215 (11th Cir. 2000) ("In Gonzalez the plaintiff argued that the existence of the good faith defenses in the Fair Housing Act meant that Congress intended to abrogate the defense of qualified immunity to claims under that act. We unequivocally rejected that argument and held that qualified immunity is a defense to the Fair Housing Act, despite the inclusion of a good faith statutory defense. . . . We cited eleven federal appeals court decisions holding that qualified immunity is available as a defense to claims arising under eight different federal statutes. . . Gonzalez forecloses Tapley's contention, and the district court's holding, that the existence of an explicit good faith defense in [the Federal Wiretap Act] rules out the defense of qualified immunity. . . . [C]ourts should not infer that Congress meant to abolish in the Federal Wiretap Act that extra layer of protection qualified immunity provides for public officials simply because it included an extra statutory defense available to everyone."); Blake v. Wright, 179 F.3d 1003 (6th Cir.1999).

See also Driever v. United States, No. 19-1807 (TJK), 2021 WL 1946391, at *4 (D.D.C. May 14, 2021) ("[E]ven after Tanzin, for a plaintiff to prevail on a claim for monetary damages against a federal official in his personal capacity for a violation of her RFRA rights, the 'proponent of a purported right [still] has the burden to show that the particular right in question was clearly established for qualified-immunity purposes.'. . This inquiry turns on the 'objective legal reasonableness of the action, assessed in light of the legal rules that were clearly established at the time it was taken.'. . Driever premised her RFRA claim on the broad assertion that she has a right to modesty around members of the opposite sex. But the dispositive question was 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . This inquiry 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . Thus, the question was whether Driever had shown that she had a clearly established right not to be housed with female transgender prisoners. . . Driever failed to show this right was clearly established under RFRA."); Vanderburgh House, LLC v. City of Worcester, No. CV 18-40063-TSH, 2021 WL 1195800, at *7 (D. Mass. Mar. 30, 2021) ("Here, I can bypass the first step in the sequential analysis, that is, I need not address whether the Plaintiffs have alleged a violation of a clearly established federal right. Even if the actions taken by Kelly and Horne violated the FHAA, the contours of that right were not sufficiently clear that they reasonably should have understood that their conduct was violative of Plaintiffs' federal rights. Kelly and Horne issued the cease-and-desist letter requiring Southbridge to cease occupying the properties or obtain permits for a change in use classification and Kelly issued a cease-and-desist letter regarding the Vanderburgh property. Kelly also responded to the Plaintiffs' requests for reasonable accommodation with his opinion that they must apply for a change-in-use even if they were to be treated as a single family for purposes of the State Building Code. Even if I were to assume their actions were violative of the FHAA, the contours of what was permitted under that statutory scheme was not sufficiently clear to put Kelly and Horne on notice that enforcing the State Building Code under the circumstances of this case violated the Plaintiffs' federal rights. Because the state law of qualified immunity is patterned after federal law, Kelly and Horne are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the parallel state law claims. Accordingly, the claims against Kelly and Horne in their individual capacities are dismissed."); D.C. through Cabelka v. County of San Diego, No. 18-CV-13-WQH-MSB, 2020 WL 1674583, at *10 (S.D. Cal. Apr. 6, 2020) ("The Court has determined that Cabelka has sufficiently alleged that the Social Worker Defendants violated Cabelka's federal rights under the Adoption Act at this stage in the proceedings. . . . At the time of the Social Worker Defendants' alleged conduct, a reasonable County social worker was on notice that he or she was required under the Adoption Act to provide a foster parent with a foster child's medical and education records and to create an adequate case plan to assure that services are provided to the foster parent. Based on the allegations at this stage in the proceedings, the Court concludes that the Social Worker Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity for the alleged violations of Cabelka's federal rights under the Adoption Act."); Mannai Home, LLC v. City of Fall River, No. CV 17-11915-FDS, 2019 WL 456163, at *13 (D. Mass. Feb. 5, 2019) ("[P]laintiff appears to contend that Biszko's conduct violated its 'clearly established' rights under the FHA, citing to Safe Haven Sober Houses, LLC v. Good, 82 Mass. App. Ct. 1112, at *3 (2012). There, the court observed that 'by 2007, it was clearly established that recovering addicts were members of a legally protected class of handicapped individuals and that intentional discrimination against group housing for handicapped individuals violated the FHA[ ].' In light of Safe Haven, the right in question was clearly established at the relevant time, such that a 'reasonable person would have known' that intentionally discriminating against group housing for the disabled violates plaintiff's rights. Biszko is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity."); Higgins v. Town of Concord, No. 16-CV-10641-DLC, 2017 WL 1224540, at *9 n.1 (D. Mass. Mar. 31, 2017) ("The plaintiff argues that qualified immunity cannot be granted on a statutory claim, but instead requires a constitutional right. The Court does not agree. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 231 (2009) ("The doctrine of qualified immunity protects government officials from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.") (internal quotation marks omitted; emphasis added); see also Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 (1982)."); Klayman v. Obama, 125 F.Supp.3d 67, 87 (D.D.C. 2015) ("Qualified immunity analysis applies to claims against public officials for RICO violations. See, e.g., BEG Invs., LLC v. Alberti, 34 F.Supp.3d 68, 81–82 (D.D.C. 2014)."); Spence-Jones v. Rundle, 991 F.Supp.2d 1221, 1256 (S.D. Fla. 2013) ("[A]lthough, the Eleventh Circuit has not directly addressed the issue of whether absolute or qualified immunity applies to a RICO claim, its application of immunity with respect to other statutes, and its citation of cases from other circuits strongly suggest that immunity would be found to be available. In Tapley v. Collins, 211 F.3d 1210, 1216 (11th Cir.2000), while holding that qualified immunity was available as a defense to the Federal Wiretap Act, the Court stated that 'the qualified immunity defense is so well rooted in our jurisprudence that only a specific and unequivocal statement of Congress can abolish the defense.'"); Babb v. Eagleton, No. 07-CV-24-TCK-SAJ, 2008 WL 2492272, at *3, *4 & n.4 (N.D. Okla. June 18, 2008) ("First, the Court must address whether quasi-judicial absolute immunity is a defense to a Title III claim, which presents a question of first impression in the Tenth Circuit. Father argues that the only defenses to a Title III claim are those listed in the statute, see, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 2511(2)(a)-(i) (setting forth specific exceptions to Title III liability), and that the Court may not apply any defenses existing solely at common law, such as quasi-judicial immunity. . . . The Court concludes that quasi-judicial absolute immunity is a defense to Title III liability, notwithstanding the fact that it is not listed as a specific statutory exception in the text of Title III. In the context of prosecutors performing quasi-judicial functions, federal courts have indicated that quasi-judicial immunity can serve as a defense to a Title III claim. . . . In addition, there is authority holding that qualified immunity extended to government actors is a defense to Title III liability. [citing cases] . . . .The Tenth Circuit has not directly weighed in on the question of whether qualified immunity is a defense to Title III. In the case of Davis v. Gracey, 111 F.3d 1472, 1481-85 (10th Cir.1997), the court addressed separately the issues of whether officers were entitled to qualified immunity from § 1983 liability and whether officers qualified for a statutory defense to Title III liability. This led the Sixth Circuit to classify the Tenth Circuit as having 'implied' that statutory defenses and qualified immunity are 'separate defenses.'. . However, the Court does not interpret Davis to hold or imply that federal common-law immunity doctrines are not defenses to Title III claims."); Contra Berry v. Funk, 146 F.3d 1003 (D.C.Cir.1998).

See also Gonzalez v. Lee County Housing Authority, 161 F.3d 1290, 1299, 1300 (11th Cir. 1998) ("Neither the text nor the legislative history of section 3617 [of Fair Housing Act] indicates that Congress intended to abrogate the qualified immunity to which executive-branch officials were entitled under common law. Because of this fact and in light of the importance of protecting officials' decision-making capacity, we conclude that executive-branch officials sued in their individual capacities under section 3617 may assert the defense of qualified immunity. In reaching this conclusion, we follow the only other court of appeals that has considered the matter. See Samaritan Inns, Inc. v. District of Columbia, 114 F.3d 1227, 1238-39 (D.C.Cir.1997) (allowing public officials sued in their individual capacities under section 3617 to plead the affirmative defense of qualified immunity); see also Baggett v. Baird, No. Civ.A.4:94CV0282-HLM, (N.D.Ga. Feb. 18, 1997) (granting summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity in section 3617 action). Our holding also is consistent with various decisions in which this court and others have held that public officials are entitled to assert the defense of qualified immunity when sued under a federal statute other than section 1983."); United States v. Kent State Univ., No. 5:14CV1992, 2015 WL 5522132, at *3-4 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 16, 2015) ("Defendants assert that there is no controlling authority or robust consensus of case law that placed them on notice that the Fair Housing Act applies to student housing. The Court finds no merit in Defendants' assertions. . . .Kent State contends that it is not settled that the FHA applies to 'student housing.' In so doing, Kent State ignores that the FHA applies to all dwellings except those specifically exempted. . . None of the statutory exemptions suggest that student housing is somehow exempt from the FHA. Importantly, from the Court's review, 'student housing' or 'university owned housing' is not a term of art, nor a term defined or even referenced in the statutory text of the FHA. Accordingly, it comes as no surprise to the Court that there are not any lengthy analyses in case law determining whether student housing is covered by the FHA. To undertake such an analysis, a court would first have to manufacture 'student housing' as some subset of dwellings that was previously unmentioned by Congress. Additionally, even if this Court were inclined to recognize such a subset, it is not entirely clear that the apartments at issue could be included in that defined group. Many of the residents of the Allerton complex are not students at all, but rather the spouses and children of students. As a result, even acknowledging 'student housing' as some subset would not support the grant of immunity herein at this stage of the proceedings. Having found that the plain language of the FHA renders it applicable to 'student housing,' it follows that the rights at issue herein [including right to keep a "therapy dog" in University housing] were clearly established. Accordingly, Defendants motion to dismiss the individual defendants is not well taken.").

But see United States ex rel. Citynet, LLC v. Gianato, 962 F.3d 154, 156, 159-60 (4th Cir. 2020) ("Because the district court's ruling was contingent on the answer to the threshold legal question of whether qualified immunity may be invoked as a defense to FCA [False Claims Act] claims, we exercise appellate jurisdiction and hold that qualified immunity does not apply to protect government officials from claims against them for fraud under the Act. . . . Originally passed in 1863 in response to widespread fraud against the government during the American Civil War, 'the FCA is a fraud prevention statute' that imposes liability on those who defraud federal government programs. . . In its current version, the FCA provides that suit may be brought against 'any person' who, inter alia, 'knowingly presents, or causes to be presented, [to the United States government] a false or fraudulent claim for payment or approval'; 'knowingly makes, uses, or causes to be made or used, a false record or statement material to a false or fraudulent claim'; or conspires to commit such acts. . . . FCA liability attaches only where a person has acted intentionally or recklessly.Yet, by acting intentionally or recklessly, a government official necessarily forfeits any entitlement to qualified immunity. . . Stated otherwise, qualified immunity does not protect government officials when they act to violate the law with actual knowledge, deliberate ignorance, or reckless disregard of a risk to a constitutional or statutory right. . . . Thus, the state of mind required to establish liability under the FCA is also sufficient to preclude immunity protection, and therefore immunity cannot protect a public official from a suit alleging a claim under the FCA. In order to have violated the FCA, a government official would have necessarily had to act in a manner inconsistent with the type of 'reasonable but mistaken judgments' qualified immunity is designed to shield."); Abrams v. Dep't of Pub. Safety, 764 F.3d 244, 255 (2d Cir. 2014) (revised opinion) ("Since 'Title VII imposes no liability on individuals, the doctrine of qualified immunity is irrelevant to plaintiff's Title VII claims.' Genas v. State of N.Y. Dep't of Corr. Servs., 75 F.3d 825, 829 n. 3 (2d Cir.1996) (citing Tomka v. Seiler Corp., 66 F.3d 1295 (2d Cir.1995)). On remand, the district court should only consider the individual Defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity with regard to the Equal Protection Clause claim brought under § 1983.").

The Eleventh Circuit has held that "for qualified immunity purposes, the term 'damages' includes costs, expenses of litigation, and attorneys' fees claimed by a plaintiff against a defendant in the defendant's personal or individual capacity." D'Aguanno v. Gallagher, 50 F.3d 877, 881 (11th Cir. 1995). The court noted:

> In the present case, these kinds of monetary claims might follow from plaintiffs having a successful outcome (if they do) on their federal-law-based demands for injunctive and declaratory relief. . . The policy that supports qualified immunity–especially removing for most public officials the fear of personal monetary liability–would be undercut greatly if government officers could be held liable in their personal capacity for a plaintiff's costs, litigation expenses, and attorneys' fees in cases where the applicable law was so unsettled that defendants, in their personal capacity, were protected from liability for other civil damages. . .

. Put differently, if a defendant has qualified immunity for damages, the defendant has good faith immunity for the purposes of fees and so on.

Id. at 881-82.

But see Meredith v. Federal Mine Safety and Health Review Commission, 177 F.3d 1042, 1049 (D.C. Cir. 1999) ("In this case, the UMWA sought an order under section 105(c) of the Mine Act. . . directing the party accused of unlawful discrimination to take affirmative action to abate the violation–a purely equitable remedy. In one of the complaints, the UMWA additionally sought payment of attorney's fees; but where attorney's fees are provided for by statute, as here, qualified immunity has no application."); Tonya K. v. Board of Educ. of the City of Chicago, 847 F.2d 1243, 1246 (7th Cir.1988) (attorneys' fee award does not violate qualified immunity); Helbrans v. Coombe, 890 F. Supp. 227, 232 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) ("[T]he defense [of qualified immunity] has no application to a request for attorneys [sic] fees under Section 1988.").

C. Affirmative Defense

Although qualified immunity is an affirmative defense, see Gomez v. Toledo, 446 U.S. 635, 640 (1980), once the defendant asserts qualified immunity, a number of circuits hold that the burden then shifts to the plaintiff to show that the right allegedly violated was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct. See, e.g., J. K. J. v. City of San Diego, 42 F.4th 990, 999 (9th Cir. 2021) (amended opinion) ("When performing a qualified immunity analysis, courts have discretion to decide which of these two prongs to address first. . . If analysis under one prong proves dispositive, we need not analyze the other. . . Under both prongs, the plaintiff bears the burden of proof. Isayeva v. Sacramento Sheriff's Dep't, 872 F.3d 938, 946 (9th Cir. 2017)."); Hunt v. Montano, 39 F.4th 1270, 1284-85 (10th Cir. 2022) ("The court below declined to consider whether the children's representatives met their burden of proving the law was clearly established. The court found the prong was not material to its decision because the CYFD employees 'waived, for this motion only, review under the clearly established prong.'. . According to the district court, the employees had temporarily waived review because they 'did not raise the clearly established prong' when they asserted qualified immunity. . . But that is not how qualified immunity works. The district court was wrong to find the clearly established prong waived because doing so erroneously shifted the children's representatives' burden to the CYFD employees. . . When a § 1983 defendant raises qualified immunity, as the employees did in their motion for judgment on the pleadings, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to establish both prongs of the defense. . . Even if the CYFD employees failed to argue the clearly established prong in detail, as here, the children's representatives still bore the burden to demonstrate that it was met. The district court's provisional denial of qualified immunity, which sought to reserve the clearly established prong for later decision, was therefore improper. The CYFD employees could not waive, temporarily or not, the very defense that they asserted as grounds for judgment on the pleadings. We remand for the district court to conduct the clearly established inquiry in the first instance. . . The issue of whether the law is clearly established with respect to the conduct of Montano and Griffin, although a legal determination based on existing precedent, was only minimally briefed by the parties on appeal and was barely briefed below. It was also unaddressed by the district court. Now that we have clarified the specific constitutional violation by Montano and Griffin that the children's representatives have plausibly alleged under the special relationship doctrine, we think the clearly established prong is best addressed at the district court level as an initial matter."); Lachance v. Town of Charlton, 990 F.3d 14, 20 (1st Cir. 2021) ("'The plaintiff bears the burden of demonstrating that the law was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, and it is a heavy burden indeed.' Mitchell v. Miller, 790 F.3d 73, 77 (1st Cir. 2015)."); Joseph on behalf of Estate of Joseph v. Bartlett, 981 F.3d 319, 328-31 & n.19 (5th Cir. 2020) ("A plaintiff suing for a constitutional violation has the ultimate burden to show that the defendant violated a constitutional right—that is, the plaintiff must make this showing whether or not qualified immunity is involved. . . But when qualified immunity is involved, at least in this circuit, a plaintiff has the additional burden to show that the violated right was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation.[19] . . . [fn. 19: The First, Second, Third, Fourth, Ninth, and D.C. Circuits place the burden on the defendant, while the Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits place it on the plaintiff. Kenneth Duvall, Burdens of Proof and Qualified Immunity, 37 S. Ill. U. L.J. 135, 145 (2012). In the Fourth Circuit, the defendant has the burden to show that the law was clearly established, and the plaintiff has the burden to show violation of a constitutional right. . . In the Eighth Circuit, the opposite rule applies.] This expanded substantive burden isn't the only special feature of qualified immunity. Burden shifting changes, too. Under the ordinary summary-judgment standard, the party who moves for summary judgment bears the initial burden to show 'that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'. . The movant satisfies this burden by showing that a reasonable jury could not find for the nonmovant, based on the burdens that would apply at trial. . . For a defendant, this means showing that the record cannot support a win for the plaintiff—either because the plaintiff has a failure of proof on an essential element of its claim or because the defendant has insurmountable proof on its affirmative defense to that claim. . . The defendant can show this by introducing undisputed evidence or by 'pointing out ... an absence of evidence to support the [plaintiff's] case.'. . If the defendant succeeds on that showing, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to demonstrate that there is a genuine issue of material fact and that the evidence favoring the plaintiff permits a jury verdict in the plaintiff's favor. . .But that changes with qualified immunity. When a public official makes 'a good-faith assertion of qualified immunity,' that 'alters the usual summary-judgment burden of proof, shifting it to the plaintiff to show that the defense is not available.'. . In other words, to shift the burden to the plaintiff, the public official need not show (as other summary-judgment movants must) an absence of genuine disputes of material fact and entitlement to judgment as a matter of law. . .Once the burden is on the plaintiff, things briefly sound familiar again: The plaintiff must show that there is a genuine dispute of material fact and that a jury could return a verdict entitling the plaintiff to relief for a constitutional injury. That would be the same if the plaintiff did not face qualified immunity. But, to overcome qualified immunity, the plaintiff's version of those disputed facts must also constitute a violation of clearly established law. This requires the plaintiff to 'identify a case'—usually, a 'body of relevant case law'—in which 'an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the [Constitution].'. . While there need not be 'a case directly on point,' the unlawfulness of the challenged conduct must be 'beyond debate.'. . This leaves the 'rare' possibility that, in an 'obvious case,' analogous case law 'is not needed' because 'the unlawfulness of the [challenged] conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . Moving from the bar to the bench, qualified immunity similarly changes the court's normal task on summary judgment. A court decides whether summary judgment is appropriate by 'view[ing] the facts in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party and draw[ing] all reasonable inferences in its favor' (so far normal), then determining whether the plaintiff can prove a constitutional violation (still normal) that was clearly established (not normal). . . Things change for appellate courts, too—we review earlier than we otherwise would, and we review less than we otherwise would. An official who unsuccessfully moves for summary judgment on qualified-immunity grounds may immediately appeal the denial of qualified immunity, which would otherwise not be final and appealable. . . An official can take multiple immediate appeals because the official can raise qualified immunity at any stage in the litigation—from Rule 12(b)(6) motions to dismiss, to Rule 12(c) motions for judgment on the pleadings, to Rule 56 motions for summary judgment, to Rule 50(b) post-verdict motions for judgment as a matter of law—and continue to raise it at each successive stage. . . Our review is de novo, as summary-judgment review usually is. . . But we only review a denial of summary judgment based on qualified immunity 'to the extent that it turns on an issue of law.'. . Both steps—the constitutional merits and the 'clearly established law' inquiry—are questions of law. That means we do not second-guess the district court's determination that there are genuine disputes of material fact, as we otherwise might. . . When the district court identifies a factual dispute, as it did here, we consider only whether the district court correctly assessed 'the legal significance' of the facts it 'deemed sufficiently supported for purposes of summary judgment.'. . But we do not evaluate whether the district court correctly deemed the facts to be 'sufficiently supported'; that is, whether the 'evidence in the record' would permit 'a jury to conclude that certain facts are true.'. . In short, we may evaluate whether a factual dispute is material (i.e., legally significant), but we may not evaluate whether it is genuine (i.e., exists).")

See also Slater v. Deasey, 943 F.3d 898, 909 (9th Cir. 2019) (Collins, J., with whom Bea, Ikuta, and Bress, JJ., join, dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("The panel committed a further, related error in suggesting that Defendants bear the burden of proof on the disputed qualified-immunity issues presented in this appeal. In reciting the general standards governing qualified immunity, the panel stated that 'Defendants bear the burden of proving they are entitled to qualified immunity. See Moreno v. Baca, 431 F.3d 633, 638 (9th Cir. 2005).'. . But on the cited page, Moreno merely recites the boilerplate summary judgment point that, '[b]ecause the moving defendant bears the burden of proof on the issue of qualified immunity, he or she must produce sufficient evidence to require the plaintiff to go beyond his or her pleadings.'. . That, of course, is not the relevant burden of proof on the qualified-immunity issues presented in this appeal. Rather, the applicable—and well-settled—rule is that '[t]he plaintiff bears the burden of proof that the right allegedly violated was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct.' Romero v. Kitsap Cty., 931 F.2d 624, 627 (9th Cir. 1991) (emphasis added); see also Shafer v. Cty. of Santa Barbara, 868 F.3d 1110, 1118 (9th Cir. 2017). Other circuits follow the same rule. See, e.g., Callahan v. Unified Gov't of Wyandotte Cty., 806 F.3d 1022, 1027 (10th Cir. 2015) ("When a defendant raises the defense of qualified immunity, the plaintiff bears the burden to demonstrate that the defendant violated his constitutional rights and that the right was clearly established."); Findlay v. Lendermon, 722 F.3d 895, 900 (7th Cir. 2013) (plaintiff failed to "carry his burden of showing a clearly established right" when he failed to identify precedent showing that "any reasonable officer would know [the conduct at issue] violated the constitution"). The panel's error on this point is significant, because it underscores that Plaintiffs had the burden to find a controlling precedent that squarely governs the specific facts of this case. They failed to carry that burden, and the district court's grant of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds should have been affirmed. I respectfully dissent from the denial of rehearing en banc."); Perry v. Spencer, 751 F.App'x 7 (1st. Cir. 2018), rehearing en banc granted and opinion withdrawn, 21 F.4th 207 (1st Cir. 2022) ("[T]o avoid summary judgment for the defendant based on qualified immunity, a plaintiff must show that the defendant's actions violated a specific statutory or constitutional right, and that the right allegedly violated was clearly established at the time of conduct in issue. See Mitchell v. Miller, 790 F.3d 73, 77 (1st Cir. 2015) ("The plaintiff bears the burden of demonstrating that the law was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, and it is a heavy burden indeed")."); Felarca v. Birgeneau, 891 F.3d 809, 815 (9th Cir. 2018) ("A plaintiff must prove both steps of the inquiry to establish the officials are not entitled to immunity from the action. Marsh v. County of San Diego, 680 F.3d 1148, 1152 (9th Cir. 2012)."); Matthews v. Bergdorf, 889 F.3d 1136, 1143 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Because the caseworkers have asserted the defense of qualified immunity, the burden is on Plaintiffs to establish their right to proceed."); Mayfield v. Harvey County Sheriff's Dep't, 732 F. App'x 685, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("When a defendant raises qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, the burden shifts to the plaintiff, who must show (1) the defendant violated his constitutional rights and (2) the rights were clearly established. . . To satisfy the second requirement, the plaintiff must show it would have been 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation.' Maresca v. Bernalillo Cty., 804 F.3d 1301, 1308 (10th Cir. 2015) (internal quotation marks omitted). Only after 'the plaintiff meets this two-part test does a defendant then bear the traditional burden of the movant for summary judgment—showing that there are no genuine issues of material fact and that he or she is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'"); Cotropia v. Chapman, 721 F. App'x 354, ___ (5th Cir. 2018)("In her appellate brief, Chapman merely asserts that qualified immunity should be granted because it was Cotropia's burden to show that physicians' offices are not closely regulated. We reject this assertion. While 'we sometimes short-handedly refer to only one party's burden, the law [with respect to the qualified immunity defense] is that both bear a burden.' Salas v. Carpenter, 980 F.2d 299, 306 (5th Cir. 1992). The defendant must first 'plead his good faith and establish that he was acting within the scope of his discretionary authority.'. . Next, 'the burden shifts to the plaintiff to rebut this defense by establishing that the official's allegedly wrongful conduct violated clearly established law.'. . In showing that the defendant's actions violated clearly established law, the plaintiff need not rebut every conceivable reason that the defendant would be entitled to qualified immunity, including those not raised by the defendant."); Becker v. Bateman, 709 F.3d 1019, 1022 (10th Cir.2013) ("This court reviews summary judgments based on qualified immunity differently than other summary judgments. When a defendant asserts qualified immunity at summary judgment, the burden shifts to the plaintiff ....” (internal quotation marks omitted)); Crosby v. Monroe Cnty., 394 F.3d 1328, 1332 (11th Cir.2004) (“Once the official has established that he was engaged in a discretionary function, the plaintiff bears the burden of demonstrating that the official is not entitled to qualified immunity.”); Gardenhire v. Schubert, 205 F.3d 303, 311(6th Cir. 2000) (“The defendant bears the initial burden of coming forward with facts to suggest that he acted within the scope of his discretionary authority during the incident in question. Thereafter, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to establish that the defendant’s conduct violated a right so clearly established that any official in his position would have clearly understood that he was under an affirmative duty to refrain from such conduct.”); Pierce v. Smith, 117 F.3d 866, 871 (5th Cir. 1997) (where § 1983 defendant pleads qualified immunity and shows he is a government official whose position involves the exercise of discretion, plaintiff has the burden to rebut qualified immunity defense by establishing the violation of clearly established law); Magdziak v. Byrd, 96 F.3d 1045, 1047 (7th Cir. 1996); Dixon v. Richer, 922 F.2d 1456, 1460 (10th Cir. 1991).

See also Stanley v. Finnegan, 899 F.3d 623, 626 n.2 (8th Cir. 2018) (“On the merits, to defeat a qualified immunity defense, plaintiff has the burden of proving that defendant’s conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . But at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage, the issue is whether plaintiff ‘pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.’ . . Thus, the district court’s statement that Finnegan ‘has not established’ the defense, though imprecise, was not error.”); Sayed v. Virginia, 744 F. App’x 542, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) (“Defendants first challenge the district court’s determination that they forfeited qualified immunity. They assert the court improperly required them to show that they were entitled to the defense rather than require Mr. Sayed to show that qualified immunity was inappropriate. They point out that ‘[o]nce the defense of qualified immunity is raised, as it was in this case, a “heavy [two-part] burden” is then shifted to the plaintiff to show that qualified immunity is not appropriate.’. . .The flaw in this argument, however, as revealed by defendants’ citation to Buck, is that it employs the summary judgment standard for analyzing the qualified immunity defense. . . But defendants did not file a summary judgment motion—they raised qualified immunity in a motion to dismiss, which, as we have said, ‘subjects the defendant to a more challenging standard of review than would apply on summary judgment,’ Peterson, 371 F.3d at 1201. Again, on a motion to dismiss, we evaluate ‘the defendant’s conduct as alleged in the complaint.’. . Thus, the district court did not improperly shift the burden to defendants to show they were entitled to qualified immunity; they assumed the more challenging standard by raising the defense at the motion-to-dismiss stage rather than at summary judgment. Although the district court faulted defendants for failing to argue in favor of qualified immunity, the court correctly recognized that defendants did not address the dual qualified immunity inquiry—viz., whether the complaint plausibly alleged a constitutional violation and whether the rights at issue were clearly established. Indeed, defendants merely recited general qualified immunity principles in a five-sentence paragraph. They then proceeded with a Heck analysis, but they did not discuss the allegations in the complaint or dispute whether there was a constitutional violation or whether the rights asserted were clearly established. Nor did they address qualified immunity in their reply brief. This certainly suggests defendants forfeited qualified immunity, at least for purposes of Rule 12(b)(6). Nevertheless, we have discretion to overlook a potential forfeiture. . . Therefore, assuming without deciding that defendants failed to preserve qualified immunity, we exercise our discretion to consider it on the merits and proceed to evaluate defendants' qualified immunity arguments.")

But see Stanton v. Elliott, 25 F.4th 227, 233 & n.5 (4th Cir. 2022) ("In the Fourth Circuit, we have a split burden of proof for the qualified-immunity defense. The plaintiff bears the burden on the first prong, and the officer bears the burden on the second prong. . . . [fn. 5: Who bears the burden on qualified immunity turns out to be a surprisingly tricky question. Because qualified immunity is a two-prong test and because there are two sides to a lawsuit, there are four possible ways to split the burdens: (1) the plaintiff might have the burden on both prongs; (2) the officer might have the burden on both prongs; (3) the plaintiff might have the first prong and the officer the second; or (4) vice versa. While most circuits apply the first or second options above, all four possibilities have been put forth by at least one circuit in at least one opinion. See Joseph ex rel. Est. of Joseph v. Bartlett, 981 F.3d 319, 329–30 & n.19 (5th Cir. 2020) (citing Kenneth Duvall, Burdens of Proof and Qualified Immunity, 37 S. Ill. U. L.J. 135, 145 (2012) (collecting cases going in each direction)). You might even imagine further splintering, where the burdens of production and persuasion that make up our burden of proof are mixed and matched on each prong. The Fourth Circuit split burden for qualified immunity comes from a winding road. . . Perhaps because of the historical development of the defense from good-faith immunity to qualified immunity, or perhaps from the splitting of the defense into a two-step inquiry, . . . a messy intra-circuit split over the burden in qualified-immunity cases developed. The first case in the Fourth Circuit to explicitly decide the burden on both parts of the defense after the split in Saucier was Henry v. Purnell, 501 F.3d at 377. . . In Henry, we announced our new split-burden standard by citing both sides of the intra-circuit split that existed pre-Saucier. . . . Henry may have forged a rough compromise, but it was the first case to opine about both prongs. Some Fourth Circuit cases suggest that the full burden of proving qualified immunity rests on the party invoking it. See, e.g., Meyers v. Balt. Cnty., 713 F.3d 723, 731 (4th Cir. 2013) . . . But Henry is the case that binds us here as the earliest case that decides this precise issue.]"); Alston v. Town of Brookline, 997 F.3d 23, 50 (1st Cir. 2021) ("Because qualified immunity is an affirmative defense to liability, the burden is on the defendants to prove the existence of circumstances sufficient to bring the defense into play. See DiMarco-Zappa v. Cabanillas, 238 F.3d 25, 35 (1st Cir. 2001)."); Mays v. Sprinkle, 992 F.3d 295, 302 n.5 (4th Cir. 2021) ("Plaintiffs bear the burden of proof to show that a constitutional violation occurred. But, at least in our Circuit, defendants bear the burden of showing that the violation was not clearly established, and they are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Henry v. Purnell, 501 F.3d 374, 378 (4th Cir. 2007); see also id. at 378 nn.4–5 (collecting cases that place the qualified-immunity burden on plaintiffs). Even so, where defendants raise a qualified-immunity defense at the motion-to-dismiss stage we must ask whether a reasonable officer could have believed that their actions or omissions, as alleged in the complaint, were lawful (that is, the violation was not clearly established at the time).

. . If so, defendants are entitled to dismissal before discovery."); Vasquez v. Maloney, 990 F.3d 232, 238 n.5 (2d Cir. 2021) ("At the pleading stage, the plaintiff must plausibly allege that the defendants violated clearly established law. . . 'Because qualified immunity is an affirmative defense,' however, at the summary judgment stage 'the defendants bear the burden of showing that the challenged act was objectively reasonable in light of the law existing at that time.' Tellier v. Fields, 280 F.3d 69, 84 (2d Cir. 2000) (quoting Varrone v. Bilotti, 123 F.3d 75, 78 (2d Cir. 1997))."); Outlaw v. City of Hartford, 884 F.3d 351, 356 (2d Cir. 2018) ("On the cross-appeal, we conclude that Allen's contentions are without merit given that, as qualified immunity is an affirmative defense, the burden was on Allen to prove by a preponderance of the evidence any factual predicates necessary to establish that defense[.]"); Halsey v. Pfeiffer, 750 F.3d 273, 288 (3d Cir. 2014) ("Unlike some other courts, . . . we follow the general rule of placing the burden of persuasion at a summary judgment proceeding on the party asserting the affirmative defense of qualified immunity. See, e.g., Reedy v. Evanson, 615 F.3d 197, 223 (3d Cir.2010) ("The burden of establishing entitlement to qualified immunity is on [the defendant-movant]."); Bailey v. Pataki, 708 F.3d 391, 404 (2d Cir.2013) ("Qualified immunity is an affirmative defense and the burden is on the defendant-official to establish it on a motion for summary judgment."); see also Harlow, 457 U.S. at 812, 102 S.Ct. at 2735 ("The burden of justifying absolute immunity rests on the official asserting the claim." (emphasis added)). Thus, appellees either had to show that there was no genuine dispute of material fact to refute their contention that they did not violate Halsey's constitutional rights as he asserted them, or show that reasonable officers could not have known that their conduct constituted such a violation when they engaged in it."); DiMarco-Zappa v. Cabanillas, 238 F.3d 25, 35 (1st Cir. 2001) ("Qualified immunity is an affirmative defense, and thus the burden of proof is on defendants-appellants."); Andrich v. Kostas, No. CV-19-02212-PHX-DWL, 2022 WL 2905043, at *16 n.14 (D. Ariz. July 22, 2022) ("Although LSO and Romero place the burden on the plaintiff, other Ninth Circuit opinions hold that '[q]ualified immunity is an affirmative defense that the government has the burden of pleading and proving.' Frudden v. Pilling, 877 F.3d 821, 831 (9th Cir. 2017). These opinions are difficult to reconcile. See generally Slater v. Deasey, 943 F.3d 898, 909 (9th Cir. 2019) (Collins, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) ("The panel committed...error in suggesting that Defendants bear the burden of proof on the disputed qualified-immunity issues presented in this appeal....[T]he applicable—and well-settled—rule [in the Ninth Circuit] is that the plaintiff bears the burden of proof that the right allegedly violated was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct.") (cleaned up)."); Estate of Montanez v. City of Indio, No. 517CV00130ODWSHK, 2018 WL 1989533, at *12 (C.D. Cal. Apr. 25, 2018) ("Because qualified immunity is an affirmative defense, the burden of proving the absence of a clearly established right initially lies with the official asserting the defense.").

See also Chavez v. Robinson, 817 F.3d 1162, 1167-69 (9th Cir. 2016) ("The next question—and the crux of this appeal—is whether the district court had authority to dismiss sua sponte Chavez's claims against Robinson and Moore on qualified immunity grounds. Chavez's position is that a court should not be able to 'dismiss a case on qualified immunity grounds unless and until the defense has been affirmatively raised in a responsive pleading.' The statute governing IFP filings requires a court to dismiss an action 'at any time' if it determines that the complaint 'seeks monetary relief against a defendant who is immune from such relief.' 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(iii). Chavez acknowledges that the statute applies to absolute immunity. He argues, however, that we should not read § 1915 to permit a district court to screen sua sponte for qualified immunity before the defendants have been served and affirmatively raised the issue in a responsive pleading. . . . At the time Congress adopted this revision, the distinction between absolute and qualified immunity was well developed in the case law, . . . and '[w]e generally presume that Congress is knowledgeable about existing law pertinent to the legislation it enacts.'. . Although Congress could have limited dismissal under 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(iii) to absolute immunity, it did not do so. We conclude that Congress intended § 1915(e) to apply to both types of immunity. . . .We hold that a district court may dismiss a claim on qualified immunity grounds under 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(iii), but only if it is clear from the complaint that the plaintiff can present no evidence that could overcome a defense of qualified immunity. . . . Chavez's pro se complaint did not clearly show that he would be unable to overcome qualified immunity. Further amendment or proceedings would be necessary to clarify, for example, whether Robinson was acting under color of state law in operating the sex offender treatment program and whether Robinson or Moore violated any clearly established law."); Buckley v. Fitzsimmons, 20 F.3d 789, 793 (7th Cir. 1994) (Where the defense had not been waived, the court observed that "[a]lthough qualified immunity is an affirmative defense, [citing Gomez] no principle forbids a court to notice that such a defense exists, is bound to be raised, and is certain to succeed when raised.); Alexander v. Tangipahoa Parish Sheriff Dept., No. 05-2423, 2006 WL 4017825, at *5 (E.D. La. Oct. 2, 2006) ("Although there is some authority to the contrary, it appears that the majority of courts, including the Fifth Circuit, currently hold that the court 'may raise the issue of qualified immunity sua sponte.' [collecting cases]").

See also Penate v. Kaczmarek, No. CV 3:17-30119-KAR, 2022 WL 407411, at *5 (D. Mass. Feb. 10, 2022) ("While the First Circuit has not spoken on the issue, the majority of federal courts of appeals have taken the view that district courts are not empowered to raise the affirmative defense of qualified immunity sua sponte. [collecting cases]")

D. Timing and Questions of Waiver or Forfeiture

In Guzman-Rivera v. Rivera-Cruz, 98 F.3d 664, 667 (1st Cir. 1996), the Court discusses the question of when, during the course of the litigation, the defense may be raised:

> Because the doctrine of qualified immunity recognizes that litigation is costly to defendants, officials may plead the defense at various stages in the proceedings. Specifically, defendants may raise a claim of qualified immunity at three distinct stages of the litigation. First defendants may raise the defense on the pleadings, in a motion to dismiss. . . . Second, if a defendant cannot obtain a dismissal on the pleadings, he or she may move for summary judgment . . . . Finally, the defense is, of course, available at trial.

See also Henry v. Hulett, 969 F.3d 769, 785-87 (7th Cir. 2020) ("Plaintiffs argue that Defendants waived, or at least forfeited, their qualified immunity defense by failing to raise it at summary judgment before the district court. Defendants concede that they failed to raise the defense in their summary judgment briefs, but they contend that they neither waived nor forfeited the defense because they asserted it in their answer and interrogatory responses. Because Defendants failed to raise their qualified immunity defense in their summary judgment motion before the district court, and instead raised it for the first time in their appellate brief, they have waived it for purposes of this appeal. . . This is true even though Defendants asserted qualified immunity in their answer and interrogatory responses. . . We have previously said we will 'not affirm a judgment based on an affirmative defense raised for the first time on appeal.'. . Accordingly, we will not consider the merits of Defendants' qualified immunity defense at this stage. Even if we viewed Defendants' invocation of qualified immunity as only forfeited, the outcome is no different. Waiver and forfeiture are distinct legal concepts. . . Whereas waiver is the 'intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right,' forfeiture is the mere failure to raise a timely argument, due to either inadvertence, neglect, or oversight. . . In the criminal context, the distinction between waiver and forfeiture is critical: while waiver precludes review, forfeiture permits a court to correct an error under a plain error standard. . . This distinction between waiver and forfeiture and its relevance have been less clear in the civil context. In past decisions, we have not consistently used forfeiture 'as a way to signal whether plain error review applies' in civil cases. . . We therefore clarify that 'our ability to review for plain error in civil cases is severely constricted,' as 'a civil litigant "should be bound by his counsel's actions."'. . Indeed, in civil cases, 'we typically will not entertain an argument raised for the first time on appeal, even for the limited purpose of ascertaining whether a plain error occurred.'. . Plain error review is available in civil cases only in the rare situation where a party can demonstrate that: '(1) exceptional circumstances exist; (2) substantial rights are affected; and (3) a miscarriage of justice will occur if plain error review is not applied.'. . . Even if Defendants had only forfeited their qualified immunity defense, this case does not present an exceptional circumstance that would warrant its consideration in the first instance on appeal. We do not aim today, however, to provide a comprehensive list of considerations that meet the relevant criteria. It suffices to say that Defendants may still assert the defense in later proceedings on remand, even though they did not properly preserve it in the district court for purposes of this appeal. True, 'the most appropriate time to raise the qualified immunity issue is in a motion for summary judgment filed before allowing discovery.'. . But we have previously recognized that, '[a]lthough the benefit of immunity from suit is effectively lost once the parties go to trial, we allow plaintiffs to use "qualified immunity" as a defense to liability at any stage in the litigation.'. . Thus, despite their failure to properly preserve the issue for purposes of this appeal, Defendants may still invoke the defense in a later motion before the district court. . . With the defense still available to Defendants, there is no risk of a miscarriage of justice."); Sawyers v. Norton, 962 F.3d 1270, 1286 (10th Cir. 2020) ("Because the officers attack the district court's factual determinations regarding deliberate indifference, we lack jurisdiction to consider their challenge to the first prong of qualified immunity on interlocutory review. . . The court's summary judgment ruling on the first prong of qualified immunity—constitutional violation—therefore stands. . . . Due to their inadequate briefing, the officers have waived an argument that the district court erred in finding that clearly established law supported a deliberate indifference violation under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. We have appellate jurisdiction to consider the abstract issue of whether the law was clearly established. . . 'Issues not raised in the opening brief are deemed abandoned or waived.'. . 'This briefing-waiver rule applies equally to arguments that are inadequately presented in an opening brief ... [, such as those presented] only in a perfunctory manner.'. . .The district court determined 'it is ... clearly established by Tenth Circuit precedent that [Mr.] Sawyers is entitled to protection against deliberate indifference.'. . The officers fail to challenge this holding in their opening brief. . . Although they describe the law of qualified immunity, including the clearly established law requirement, . . . they present only a cursory statement in the 'Summary of the Argument' section that Mr. Sawyers was unable to establish clearly established law[.] . . Nowhere in their 'Argument' section do they address this perfunctory contention, much less rebut the two cases cited by the district court. . . A cursory half-sentence does not suffice. . . Although the officers argue in their reply brief that Mr. Sawyers 'produced no Tenth Circuit or United States Supreme Court case law ... tending to show that the right ... was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct,'. . . this argument is too little, too late. . . The officers thus waived a challenge to the district court's clearly-established-law holding."); Tillmon v. Douglas County, 817 F. App'x 586, ___ (10th Cir. 2020) ("Here, defendants raised qualified immunity below, and the district court declined to rule on their defense. This declination has the same effect as a denial because defendants have, for the time being, lost their right to be immune from this lawsuit. . . Therefore, we have jurisdiction over this appeal. . . . [I]f a defendant adequately raises qualified immunity and the district court declines to rule on the defense, then we typically remand and direct the district court to decide qualified immunity. . . But if a defendant does not adequately present the defense to the district court, then the defense is not preserved for appellate review and we affirm the district court. . . . Although the defendants' single-paragraph argument in the district court has morphed into 30 pages of appellate argument, their belated appellate argument cannot remedy their perfunctory assertion of qualified immunity below. . . . [W]e have previously held that an appellant's 'failure-to-state-a-claim argument[s]' cannot substantiate an otherwise unsubstantiated qualified-immunity defense. . . And although Rule 12(b)(6) arguments can be 'exceedingly' similar to arguments in support of qualified immunity, qualified immunity 'is conceptually distinct from the merits of the plaintiff's claim.'. . And here, defendants' motion to dismiss clearly delineates between its discussion of Rule 12(b)(6) and its discussion of qualified immunity. Although defendants' arguments supporting the former could also have supported the latter, their motion to dismiss made no attempt to do so. Accordingly, defendants' reliance on their Rule 12(b)(6) failure-to-state-a-claim arguments do not save an appeal predicated entirely on a qualified-immunity defense."); Spann v. Lombardi, 960 F.3d 1085, 1088 (8th Cir. 2020) ("The officials' motion for summary judgment does not even mention the term 'qualified immunity.' The motion makes no argument for qualified immunity based on the law and facts of the case as they stood in November 2018. The district court was not required to pore [sic] over papers that were filed in July 2015, December 2016, and October 2017, at different procedural junctures, to discern arguments about unspecified 'privileges and immunities' that were supposedly directed at a complaint filed in March 2018. If any of the officials sought a ruling on qualified immunity as to any particular claim or claims in the pending complaint, then they should have argued the point in their motion. We therefore reject the challenge to the order denying the motion for summary judgment, but the officials may assert a defense of qualified immunity at trial."); Hamner v. Burls, 937 F.3d 1171, 1175-76 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 611 (2020) ("Especially where a decision on qualified immunity is more straightforward than resolving a novel question of constitutional law, the Supreme Court has counseled that 'courts should think hard, and then think hard again, before turning small cases into large ones.'. . Because the parties had not briefed the issue, we requested supplemental filings to address whether any or all of the district court's judgment should be affirmed based on qualified immunity. Hamner responded that because the officials raised qualified immunity in their answer only as to his retaliation claims, but not in their motion to dismiss his due process and Eighth Amendment claims, the defense of qualified immunity was waived or forfeited for purposes of the pleading stage. The officials say not so: They initially had no occasion to raise qualified immunity on the due process claim, because the district court dismissed it before the defendants were even served with process. . . The officials then moved to dismiss the amended complaint (including the new Eighth Amendment claims and the renewed due process claim) for failure to state a claim, without filing an answer, and succeeded in obtaining a dismissal. In Story v. Foote, 782 F.3d 968 (8th Cir. 2015), we concluded that even where an appellee did not argue qualified immunity as an alternative ground for affirmance, it was appropriate to resolve the appeal on that basis where the defense was established on the face of the complaint. . . Hamner contends that Story is distinguishable, because the defendant there had no opportunity to raise qualified immunity in the district court; the case was dismissed before service of process under 28 U.S.C. § 1915A. Here, by contrast, the defendants moved to dismiss the amended complaint, and argued successfully that Hamner failed to allege a constitutional violation. But because the defendants did not argue a fallback position that they are entitled to qualified immunity, Hamner says that we must turn a small case into a large one and address only the constitutional questions decided by the district court. We are satisfied that it is appropriate to consider whether the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. We may affirm a judgment on any ground supported by the record; where qualified immunity is evident on the face of a complaint, it is an available basis for decision. . . Although the defendants here did not raise qualified immunity in their motion to dismiss, the posture of the case has materially changed. The claims for declaratory and injunctive relief are now concededly moot; all that remain are Hamner's claims for damages, and qualified immunity could be dispositive as to the only claims left on appeal. In that circumstance, we see no bar to addressing qualified immunity. Whether the allegations show a violation of a clearly established right is a purely legal issue that is amenable to consideration for the first time on appeal. The parties have been given notice and an opportunity to be heard on the issue in thorough supplemental briefs. The defendants have made clear that if this court were to reject the district court's decision on any claim, then they would promptly assert a defense of qualified immunity on remand. In that event, after the district court resolved the qualified immunity issue, the case inevitably would return to us for a decision on that point in a second appeal. There is nothing to be profited by that procedural roundabout."); Oglesby v. Lesan, 929 F.3d 526, 534 (8th Cir. 2019) ("On appeal, Oglesby argues that non-violent, non-fleeing suspects have a clearly-established right to not be shot with stun guns. However, in opposition to summary judgment, Oglesby's sole argument against applying qualified immunity was that Officer Hein possessed no authority to arrest him outside of the city of Lincoln. He failed to identify the right at issue, argue that right was clearly established, or cite any case that would have put the officers on notice that their conduct was unconstitutional. By failing to do so, Oglesby waived the arguments he now asserts. . . We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to the officers on Oglesby's excessive force claim."); Berkshire v. Beauvais, 928 F.3d 520, 530-31 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Dr. Pozios forfeited his qualified-immunity defense below. Although Dr. Pozios asserted qualified immunity in his motion for summary judgment, . . .he failed to raise an objection to the magistrate judge's report and recommendation that denied qualified immunity[.] . . Consequently, the district court did not address the issue. We have long held that, when a defendant does 'not raise [an] argument in his objections to the magistrate's report and recommendation ... [he] has [forfeited] his right to raise this issue on appeal.'. . We clarify that forfeiture, rather than waiver, is the relevant term here. Although our cases often use the terms interchangeably, '[w]aiver is different from forfeiture.'. . Waiver is affirmative and intentional, whereas forfeiture is a more passive 'failure to make the timely assertion of a right ....' . . . While Thomas v. Arn held that 'the failure to file objections to the magistrate's report waives the right to appeal the district court's judgment,'. . . Arn preceded the Olano Court's clarification. . . Nowhere in his briefs or the proceedings below did Dr. Pozios affirmatively abandon his qualified-immunity defense. . . Rather, he simply failed to file an objection to the magistrate judge's R & R denying qualified immunity. That is forfeiture, not waiver. The difference can sometimes be important because forfeited issues may in certain circumstances be considered on appeal. . . Even cases that have labeled a party's failure to object to a magistrate judge's R & R as 'waiver' have nonetheless acted as though the issue was forfeited by addressing the otherwise 'waived' issue on merits. . .Again, we do that in the forfeiture context. Even had Dr. Pozios not forfeited qualified immunity, we are bound by our prior decision in McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696, 697, 704 (6th Cir. 2012) (holding that a private doctor working for the government is not entitled to qualified immunity). . . As Dr. Pozios himself concedes, McCullum squarely decides the issue presented by his appeal."); Vallina v. Petrescu, No. 17-1428, 2018 WL 6331598, at *2 n.1 (10th Cir. Dec. 4, 2018) (not reported) ("Because Petrescu asserted a qualified immunity defense in her motion to dismiss, plaintiffs bore the burden to demonstrate that both: (1) their factual allegations established a constitutional violation and (2) that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . Plaintiffs' defense of the district court's conclusion that Petrescu waived certain components of her qualified immunity defense is inapposite because the cases upon which they rely address standard waiver issues outside the unique burden-shifting context of qualified immunity."); Washington v. Denney, 900 F.3d 549, 559 n.3 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The corrections officials initially phrase their argument in their opening brief as one of qualified immunity. . . . 'But a party seeking a qualified-immunity defense must continue to urge it during and after trial in order to avoid forfeiting the argument on appeal.'. . . The record shows that but for a contention in their reply brief to their Rule 50(b) motion that they 'did not violate Plaintiff's clearly established constitutional rights,' . . . the corrections officials never renewed their qualified-immunity argument. We acknowledge that the Supreme Court 'left open the possibility that a "qualified immunity plea raising an issue of a purely legal nature" may be "preserved for appeal by an unsuccessful motion for summary judgment, and need not be brought up again under Rule 50(b).'". .Here, the corrections 'officials' claims of qualified immunity hardly present "purely legal" issues capable of resolution "with reference only to undisputed facts." Cases fitting that bill typically involve contests not about what occurred, or why an action was taken or omitted, but disputes about the substance and clarity of pre-existing law.'. . Accordingly, we decline to address the corrections officials' argument to the extent they claim they are entitled to qualified immunity."); Wheatt v. City of East Cleveland, 741 F. App'x 302, 304–05 (6th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 457 (2018) ("While the appeal was pending, the plaintiffs and the County Defendants negotiated a settlement. . . Only the City Defendants' portion of the appeal remains for our determination. . .The plaintiffs argue that because the underlying judgments are neither final orders nor appealable collateral orders, inasmuch as the City Defendants did not assert qualified immunity in the district court, we have no jurisdiction. The City Defendants reply that they 'are appealing the district court's finding that they had waived the affirmative defense of qualified immunity.'. . The district court, noting that it 'does not lightly find waiver in this instance,' explained that 'in fully briefing their motion to dismiss, their summary judgment motion, and their opposition to [the] [p]laintiffs' motion for summary judgment, the City Defendants did not mention immunity.'. . . As a factual finding, this is uncontested—the City Defendants do not claim that they raised qualified immunity in any of these motions, nor could they. They instead rely on their answer to the complaint, in which they included the affirmative defense of immunity 'under all doctrines,' and contend that that alone is sufficient to inject qualified immunity into the district court's opinion and judgment, and preserve it for interlocutory appeal here. That is an unusual proposition, to say the least. We recognize that the district court used the word 'waiver,' whereas this is more appropriately a 'forfeiture' analysis. . . Therefore, we analyze this as forfeiture. In arguing for summary judgment in the district court, the City Defendants did not assert qualified immunity expressly or even implicitly. Consequently, they never challenged the plaintiffs to respond to a qualified-immunity claim; they did not compel the district court to decide the merits of a qualified-immunity dispute; and they did not preserve any substantive qualified-immunity question or error for appeal. That is forfeiture. The City Defendants point out that pursuant to Henricks v. Pickaway Correctional Institution, 782 F.3d 744, 749 (6th Cir. 2015), we have held that appellate panels have jurisdiction to hear interlocutory appeals on the question of whether a defendant forfeited qualified immunity. . . True enough. But here the defendants have so clearly and unmistakably forfeited any claim to qualified immunity that there is nothing further to decide and this appeal is frivolous, as the district court has already held. . . Consequently, we must DENY the plaintiffs' motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction and AFFIRM the judgment of the district court because it was correct."); Burns v. Martuscello, 890 F.3d 77, 94 n.4 (2d Cir. 2018) ("We acknowledge that defendants did not raise the defense of qualified immunity in the district court. Although we do not generally consider a claim raised for the first time on appeal, we can exercise our discretion to do so where, as here, 'the argument presents a question of law and there is no need for additional fact-finding.' Sniado v. Bank Austria AG, 378 F.3d 210, 213 (2d Cir. 2004)."); Oliver v. Roquet, 858 F.3d 180, 188 (3d Cir. 2017) ("[A]lthough amicus makes much of the fact that Roquet did not assert qualified immunity in her first motion to dismiss, 'there is no firm rule' as to when a defendant must raise this affirmative defense, . . and the defense is not necessarily waived by a defendant who raises it later in the case, Eddy v. V.I. Water & Power Auth., 256 F.3d 204, 210 (3d Cir. 2001). Indeed, it may be raised even after trial if the plaintiff suffers no prejudice. Sharp, 669 F.3d at 158. Thus, Roquet's failure to assert qualified immunity at an earlier stage does not divest us of jurisdiction over her immediate appeal."); Conte v. Rios, 658 F. App'x 639, 642-43 (3d Cir. 2016) ("Here, the District Court identified the right at issue. The District Court then found that there were disputed issues of material fact and went no further, deferring a decision on the qualified immunity issue. It reached this conclusion, however, without determining whether Conte's Fourteenth Amendment right was clearly established at the time of the conduct at issue. Moreover, the District Court failed to identify what factual issues were relevant to its deferral. These omissions constitute legal error that requires us to vacate the order denying the appellants' motions to dismiss. . . If the District Court at that point determines that such a right was clearly established, it may then determine whether the facts it already found to be in dispute—facts that were not clearly specified in its order—are material to assessing whether that right was violated."); Cox v. Glanz, 800 F.3d 1231, 1243-45 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Ms. Cox avers that because Sheriff Glanz exclusively briefed the no-constitutional-violation issue at summary judgment, he is not entitled to expand the inquiry on appeal by claiming an absence of clearly established law. In effect, Ms. Cox asks us to deem Sheriff Glanz's clearly-established-law argument to be forfeited. . . . The forfeiture issue turns on the extent of Sheriff Glanz's obligation to do more than nominally raise the qualified-immunity defense—that is, it turns on whether he was obliged to marshal particularized arguments in support of the clearly-established-law question, viz., specific arguments demonstrating that, under then-extant clearly established law, neither he nor any of his identified subordinates violated Mr. Jernegan's Eighth Amendment rights. Even assuming arguendo that he was required to do this, and therefore forfeited his clearly-established-law arguments by failing to do so, we cannot ignore, in deciding whether to recognize the forfeiture, the unique briefing burdens of the nonmovant plaintiff in the qualified-immunity context, and Ms. Cox's feeble efforts to bear them. Specifically, by asserting the qualified-immunity defense, Sheriff Glanz triggered a well-settled twofold burden that Ms. Cox was compelled to shoulder: not only did she need to rebut the Sheriff's no-constitutional-violation arguments, but she also had to demonstrate that any constitutional violation was grounded in then-extant clearly established law."); Henricks v. Pickaway Corr. Inst., 782 F.3d 744, 749-52 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Only one issue raised in this interlocutory appeal is properly before us: whether the district court was correct to hold at the summary judgment stage that Officer Maynard and Dr. Gonzalez waived the affirmative defense of qualified immunity by failing to assert it in a responsive pleading. The district court's holding that the defense was waived can be considered an appealable final order for purposes of 28 U.S.C. § 1291, under which we have jurisdiction to review 'final orders' of a district court, because it conclusively forecloses the defendants' entitlement not to stand trial and is separate from the merits of Henricks's claim. It is thus closely analogous to an appeal challenging the legal basis of a district court's denial of a summary judgment motion invoking qualified immunity, which is an appealable final order. Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 530, 105 S.Ct. 2806, 86 L.Ed.2d 411 (1985). This jurisdictional conclusion is consistent with the analyses of the three circuits to have considered the issue. Eddy v. Virgin Islands Water and Power Auth., 256 F.3d 204, 209 (3d Cir.2001); Pasco v. Knoblauch, 566 F.3d 572, 576–77 (5th Cir.2009); Hernandez v. Cook Cnty. Sheriff's Office, 634 F.3d 906, 912–13 (7th Cir.2011). . . . [T]he district court did not abuse its discretion in holding that Dr. Gonzalez and Officer Maynard waived qualified immunity. In light of Officer Maynard and Dr. Gonzalez's disregard for timeliness in asserting defenses, it was permissible for the district court to refuse to inconvenience itself and Henricks and further delay trial to make up for the defendants' errors. In the first place, Officer Maynard and Dr. Gonzalez's failure to plead qualified immunity at the very least subjects them to the possibility of waiver. Officer Maynard and Dr. Gonzalez raised qualified immunity in their motion to dismiss, but not in any responsive pleading. . . . Because Officer Maynard and Dr. Gonzalez have no reasonable explanation for their failure to plead qualified immunity and were very tardy in raising the defense, the district court did not abuse its discretion in presuming prejudice to Henricks and finding waiver. . . . In this case, Officer Maynard and Dr. Gonzalez asserted an affirmative defense in a motion to dismiss but did not object when the magistrate judge ignored the defense and did not file an answer or other responsive pleading. Henricks could fairly conclude from this conduct that Officer Maynard and Dr. Gonzalez did not intend to assert the qualified immunity defense. . . . However, as counsel for Henricks agreed at oral argument, the district court on remand may determine that the defendants' waiver of qualified immunity in pre-trial proceedings does not preclude the defendants from asserting the defense at trial. As we explained in English v. Dyke, a waiver 'need not waive the defense for all purposes but would generally only waive the defense for the stage at which the defense should have been asserted.' English, 23 F.3d at 1090."); Ayers v. City of Cleveland, 773 F.3d 161, 167 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Because Cipo and Kovach failed to raise their qualified-immunity defense in either a Rule 50(a) or Rule 50(b) motion, they have forfeited the defense on appeal. This court held that the qualified-immunity defense was forfeited when faced with a similar procedural posture in Sykes v. Anderson, 625 F.3d 294, 304 (6th Cir.2010). Like the defendants in Sykes, Cipo and Kovach made an oral Rule 50(a) motion, but that motion 'failed to provide the required notice' to the court of the qualified-immunity defense. . . The Sykes court found dispositive the fact that the Rule 50(a) motion never mentioned 'qualified immunity' or other terms associated with that defense (e.g., 'clearly established law' or 'objectively unreasonable actions') that might have put the court and the plaintiffs on notice as to that particular issue. . .Raising the defense in a later Rule 50(b) motion—which Cipo and Kovach failed to do here—did not save the defendants in Sykes. . . Neither did resting on the argument made at the summary-judgment stage. . . We therefore decline to consider Cipo and Kovach's qualified-immunity defense on appeal."); Chasensky v. Walker, 740 F.3d 1088, 1094 (7th Cir. 2014) ("That the defendants did not raise qualified immunity earlier in response to Chasensky's original complaint is irrelevant because the defendants raised the defense of qualified immunity at the very first opportunity after Chasensky filed her amended complaint. They then raised it again later in their answer to her amended complaint. Accordingly, as a matter of law, defendants did not waive the defense of qualified immunity."); Evans v. Vinson, 427 F. App'x 437, 447 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Defendants asserted the defense of qualified immunity both below and on appeal; however, they did so in both instances in a one-and-a-half page statement of the law with no attempt at argument, and they cited only the first prong of the test: whether their alleged conduct violated a constitutional right. Defendants have failed to argue that the rights at issue were not clearly established, and as a result they have waived that defense."); Sykes v. Anderson, 625 F.3d 294, 304 (6th Cir. 2010) ("'[E]ven if a defendant raises qualified immunity at summary judgment, the issue is waived on appeal if not pressed in a Rule 50(a) motion.' Parker v. Gerrish, 547 F.3d 1, 12 (1st Cir.2008); see also Fed.R.Civ.P. 50. The Defendants' failure to make a pre-verdict motion for judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(a) on the grounds of qualified immunity precluded them from making a post-verdict motion under Rule 50(b) on that ground. The qualified-immunity claim is waived."); Norwood v. Vance, 591 F.3d 1062, 1068-70 (9th Cir. 2010) (denying rehearing and rehearing en banc) (court finds that plaintiff waived the waiver argument, so addresses qualified immunity sua sponte and grants qualified immunity where prison officials denied outdoor exercise to prisoners for extended time in the midst of ongoing prison violence); Narducci v. Moore, 572 F.3d 313, 325 (7th Cir. 2009) (where qualified immunity defense to Title III claim was raised for first time in reply brief, court finds defense waived at summary judgment stage, but Ait remain[ed] available as a basis for a motion for judgment as a matter of law during the course of a trial in this case, or depending on the jury's verdict, as the basis for an appeal afterwards."); Pasco ex rel. Pasco v. Knoblauch, 566 F.3d 572, 577, 578 (5th Cir. 2009)("We have noted that a failure to plead an affirmative defense in the first response is 'especially excusable' where the law on the topic is not clearly settled. . .Despite referencing the above law, the district court found waiver based solely on the fact that a fifty-two month delay existed between Knoblauch's first responsive pleading and his assertion of qualified immunity. The district court concluded that Pasco was presumptively prejudiced by this delay, without any analysis or description of the prejudice. However, under Rule 8(c) we do not take a formalistic approach to determine whether an affirmative defense was waived. Rather, we look at the overall context of the litigation and have found no waiver where no evidence of prejudice exists and sufficient time to respond to the defense remains before trial. . . . We accordingly hold that the lack of prejudice to Pasco combined with the unusual circumstances and history of this litigation indicate that Knoblauch did not waive qualified immunity."); Parker v. Gerrish, 547 F.3d 1, 11-13 (1st Cir. 2008) ("Gerrish contends, in the alternative, that his decision to fire the Taser was at worst a reasonable mistake in judgment for which he should receive qualified immunity. Parker contends that Gerrish waived this defense by failing to raise it in his Rule 50(a) motion. . . . [W]e have held that even if a defendant raises qualified immunity at summary judgment, the issue is waived on appeal if not pressed in a Rule 50(a) motion. . . . .Gerrish does not dispute this proposition, but rather argues that he did raise qualified immunity in his motion under Fed.R.Civ.P. 50(a). Gerrish admits that the oral motion did not use the term 'qualified immunity,' but argues that he addressed every prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Gerrish contends that he dealt with the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, whether there was a constitutional violation, while discussing the excessive force issue. While it is true that Gerrish argued that there was no constitutional violation, he argued only that issue and did not place it in the context of a qualified immunity argument. Gerrish next points to his argument that 'the Taser itself has not been declared by any court as a per se unconstitutional use of force.' Gerrish contends that argument invoked the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, whether his actions violated 'clearly established' law. But this argument was made entirely in the context of an argument that there was no unconstitutional use of force. Gerrish did not refer to

'clearly established law' and made no effort to address his argument to qualified immunity. Similarly, Gerrish contends that he addressed the third prong of the qualified immunity analysis, whether a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct was unlawful, when he argued that 'an objectively reasonable officer in Officer Gerrish's position' would have seen Parker's arm movement as a threat to Caldwell justifying the Taser usage. But, as noted above, the excessive force analysis is also keyed to the perceptions of an objectively reasonable officer. Thus, Gerrish's discussion is again simply addressed to the argument that Gerrish did not use excessive force. In this way, the oral Rule 50(a) motion only argued that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding of a constitutional violation. Though Gerrish stated that there were two issues, he only argued the excessive force issue. Gerrish did not specify qualified immunity as the legal basis for his motion or give the district court judge adequate notice that he was renewing that claim in this context."); Noel v. Artson, No. 07-1987, 2008 WL 4665418, at *2 (4th Cir. Oct. 22, 2008) ("Our cases have been consistent on one thing: that to be preserved for appeal, the defense of qualified immunity must be raised in a timely fashion before the district court. . . . Here, plaintiffs would suffer prejudice because they had no chance to address the issue in their opposition to summary judgment. It was not until their reply to plaintiffs' opposition to the summary judgment motion that defendants even argued the immunity defense, and '[c]onsidering an argument advanced for the first time in a reply brief ... entails the risk of an improvident or ill-advised opinion ....' Our cases require that an affirmative defense be raised in a timely fashion for a reason: what happened here deprived plaintiffs of any chance to brief the question and receive a fully considered ruling. The failure to raise the defense in a timely fashion likewise deprived the district court of orderly process and this court of the full benefit of the district court's reasoning. To permit appellate review in these circumstances would reward parties who bypass settled procedural requirements, and would encourage imprecise practice before the trial courts. Accordingly, we decline to entertain this interlocutory appeal and remand the action for further proceedings in the district court."); Evans v. Fogarty, 241 F. App'x 542, 2007 WL 2380990, at * 6 n.9 (10th Cir. Aug 22, 2007) ("Although the defense of qualified immunity provides public officials important protection from baseless and harassing lawsuits, it is not a parachute to be deployed only when the plane has run out of fuel. Defendants must diligently raise the defense during pretrial proceedings and ensure it is included in the pretrial order."); Ahmad v. Furlong, 435 F.3d 1196, 1202-04(10th Cir. 2006) ("We agree with the D.C. Circuit that the best procedure is to plead an affirmative defense in an answer or amended answer. And, as that court pointed out, absence of prejudice to the opposing party is not the only proper consideration in determining whether to permit an amended answer; a motion to amend may also be denied on grounds such as '"undue delay, bad faith or dilatory motive ..., or repeated failure to cure deficiencies by amendments previously allowed."'. . Accordingly, courts should not permit a party to circumvent these other restrictions on amendments simply by filing a dispositive motion rather than a motion to amend. . . But that concern can be obviated without a strict requirement that the answer be amended before raising a defense in a motion for summary judgment. Rather than demanding that the defendant first move to amend the answer, we need only apply the same standards that govern motions to amend when we determine whether the defendant should be permitted to 'constructively' amend the answer by means of the summary-judgment motion. Because we review for abuse of discretion a district court's ruling on a motion to amend, . . . we apply the same standard to a ruling on whether an affirmative defense may first be raised in a motion for summary judgment. . . . [H]aving accepted the district court's determination that qualified immunity with respect to the RLUIPA claim was not pleaded in the Amended Answer, but also having concluded that it was adequately raised by the summary-judgment motion, we consider whether Appellants should have been precluded from constructively amending their answer by raising the defense in the motion. No grounds for such preclusion are apparent to us. Indeed, perhaps because Mr. Ahmad read the Amended Answer as asserting the defense, his response to the motion for summary judgment raised no objection to Appellants' claiming RLUIPA qualified immunity. Nor did his counsel at oral argument point to any prejudice he would have suffered had the district court considered the defense. In particular, counsel acknowledged that no additional discovery would have been necessary. We therefore hold that the defense could be raised for the first time in the summary-judgment motion. Had the district court ruled otherwise, the ruling would have been an abuse of discretion."); Isom v. Town of Warren, 360 F.3d 7, 9 (1st Cir. 2004) ("[D]efendants did not raise immunity as an issue at the time of their Rule 50 motion, and so they have waived that defense as a grounds for the motion."); Anthony v. City of New York, 339 F.3d 129, 138 n.5 (2d Cir. 2003) ("Anthony argues that Officers Collegio and Migliaro waived the defense of qualified immunity by failing to assert that defense in their answer before the district court. . . Officers Collegio and Migliaro first raised the defense in their motion for summary judgment, which the district court implicitly construed as a motion to amend the answer. Although affirmative defenses like qualified immunity must be pleaded in response to a pleading, see Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(c), the district court may, in its discretion, construe a motion for summary judgment as a motion pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 15(a) for leave to amend the defendant's answer."); Brown v. Crowley, 312 F.3d 782, 787, 788 (6th Cir. 2002) (Defendants waived right to present issue of qualified immunity on appeal, where, A[a]lthough the defendants preserved the defense in their first responsive pleading and in their answer to Brown's complaint, they did not pursue this argument before the district court in the motion for summary judgment that they filed after the case was remanded. . . . On the other hand, . . .the judgment of the district court must be vacated and the case remanded for further proceedings, because the district court erred in its application of the law to Brown's retaliation claim. The defendants will thus be free to reassert their immunity defenses in the district court. . . . By declining to consider qualified immunity defenses on appeal that were not raised properly before the district court, moreover, we might encourage future defendants to properly raise this defense at the district court level."); Hill v. McKinley, 311 F.3d 899, 902 (8th Cir. 2002) ("The defendants raised the qualified immunity defense in their answer to Hill's third amended and substituted complaint, but did not file a motion for summary judgment, as is the usual practice. Although the defendants did not receive the benefit of an early resolution to their claim of qualified immunity, the defense is not waived by failure to assert it by motion prior to trial."); St. George v. Pinellas County, 285 F.3d 1334, 1337 (11th Cir. 2002) ("While the defense of qualified immunity is typically addressed at the summary judgment stage of a case, it may be, as it was in this case, raised and considered on a motion to dismiss. . . . The motion to dismiss will be granted if the 'complaint fails to allege the violation of a clearly established constitutional right.' . . . Whether the complaint alleges such a violation is a question of law that we review de novo, accepting the facts alleged in the complaint as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in the plaintiff's favor. . . . The scope of the review must be limited to the four corners of the complaint. . . While there may be a dispute as to whether the alleged facts are the actual facts, in reviewing the grant of a motion to dismiss, we are required to accept the allegations in the complaint as true."); Skrtich v. Thornton, 280 F.3d 1295, 1306 (11th Cir. 2002) ("This Circuit has held that qualified immunity is a question of law that may be generally asserted (1) on a pretrial motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim; (2) as an affirmative defense in the request for judgment on the pleadings pursuant to Rule 12(c); (3) on a summary judgment motion pursuant to Rule 56(e); or (4) at trial. Ansley v. Heinrich, 925 F.2d 1339, 1241 (11th Cir.1991). However, all these pleadings must conform to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. In this case, because a responsive pleading–an answer–had been filed, under the plain language of Rule 12(b), a motion to dismiss would have been inappropriate."); Marsh v. Butler County, 268 F.3d 1014, 1023 (11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("We apply the qualified immunity defense to dismiss a complaint at the 12(b)(6) stage where, (1) from the face of the complaint, (2) we must conclude that (even if a claim is otherwise sufficiently stated), (3) the law supporting the existence of that claim–given the alleged circumstances–was not already clearly established, (4) to prohibit what the government-official defendant is alleged to have done, (5) before the defendant acted."); Provost v. City of Newburgh, 262 F.3d 146, 161 (2d Cir. 2001) ("Because [Defendant officer] did not specifically include a qualified immunity argument in his pre-verdict request for judgment as a matter of law, he could not have included such an argument in his post-verdict motion even had he attempted to do so."); Eddy v. Virgin Islands Water and Power Authority, 256 F.3d 204, 210 (3d Cir. 2001) ("We agree with the conclusions of the First and Sixth Circuits that the defense of qualified immunity is not necessarily waived by a defendant who fails to raise it until the summary judgment stage. Instead, the District Court must exercise its discretion and determine whether there was a reasonable modicum of diligence in raising the defense. The District Court must also consider whether the plaintiff has been prejudiced by the delay."); Sales v. Grant, 224 F.3d 293, 296, 297 (4th Cir. 2000) ("In concluding that Mason and Grant have waived their right to assert qualified immunity, we do not hold categorically that a section 1983 defendant must pursue the defense of qualified immunity on every occasion possible in order to preserve his right to raise that defense later in the proceedings. Rather, we hold only that where, as here, a defendant only cursorily references qualified immunity in his answer to a section 1983 complaint, and thereafter fails to mention, let alone seriously press, his assertion of that affirmative defense, despite filing several dispositive motions in the district court and despite participating in a trial on the merits of the section 1983 claim, that defendant may not actively pursue his claim of qualified immunity for the first time on remand after appeal.").

See also Davis v. McManus, No. 13-CV-11900-IT, 2020 WL 3065307, at *2 (D. Mass. June 9, 2020) ("McManus contends that he is not precluded 'from raising qualified immunity now as a defense post-trial' because the qualified immunity defense is not waived or lost if a case proceeds to trial. . . The problem, however, is not any waiver by proceeding to trial, but rather Defendant's failure to raise the qualified immunity defense in his Rule 50(a) motion or, more importantly, in opposition to Plaintiff's post-trial motions. To the extent that Defendant contends that Plaintiff's motion for a new trial should have been denied on the basis of qualified immunity, the time to raise that argument was in opposition to that motion, not on reconsideration of the decision on that motion."); Draine v. Bauman, No. 09 C 2917, 2010 WL 1541674, at *13 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 16, 2010) ("The defendants' failure to have based their argument for qualified immunity on anything beyond the claimed non-existence of a Fourth Amendment violation in their supporting memorandum constituted a waiver of the qualified immunity argument to the extent it rested on some other theory. See Ruffino v. Sheahan, 218 F.3d 697, 700 (7th Cir.2000) (defendant had to raise second part of Saucier inquiry)"); Thompson v. City of Tucson Water Department, No. CIV 01-53-TUC-FRZ, 2006 WL 3063500, at *6 n. 14 (D. Ariz. Oct. 27, 2006) ("The Court notes, however, that the Ninth Circuit case law doesn't address the exact issue before the Court. While there is case law indicating that qualified immunity can be raised in a Rule 50 motion, the case law does not address whether qualified immunity can be considered waived by a defendant where he raises the isz-sue in a motion for the first time on the fourth day of trial. It seems equitable to hold that waiver would apply in such circumstances. However, as the Ninth Circuit has generally found that qualified immunity can be raised in a Rule 50 motion, the Court will err on the side of caution and find that the qualified immunity defense has not been waived."); Garcia v. Brown, 442 F.Supp.2d 132, 143, 144 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) ("[T]his Court's Individual Practice Rules require that any defendant planning to claim qualified immunity must (1) file a pro forma motion for summary judgment on that ground along with his answer; (2) depose the plaintiff and file additional papers in support of the qualified immunity motion within thirty days thereafter; and (3) obtain a decision on the motion before conducting further discovery. See Ind. Practices of J. McMahon, Rule 3(C). The defendants in this case did not follow this procedure, but rather waited until the end of discovery to move for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity. Under my rules, the failure to obtain a qualified immunity determination at the outset means that I will not consider the defense on a belated motion, leaving the matter for trial. However, Brown counters that under this Court's Individual Practice Rule, a plaintiff who brings an action in which a defense of qualified immunity is to be anticipated must send defense counsel a copy of this rule. According to defendants' reply papers, plaintiffs did not do so. As neither party appears to have complied with this Court's Individual Practice Rules, I will consider the motion."); Philpott v. City of Portage, No. 4:05-CV-70, 2006 WL 1008868, at *1, *2 (W.D. Mich. Apr. 14, 2006) ("Here, defendant did not initially raise the defense of qualified immunity and he was properly subjected to a deposition. The defense of immunity is an affirmative defense . . . and may be waived like any other defense at different stages of litigation. . . Thus, it can be waived during the discovery process, yet nevertheless raised later in a motion for summary judgment. . . But now that the defense of qualified immunity has been raised, this court is required to address it–prior to permitting further discovery–absent a finding that material facts are in fact in dispute. . . The burden is on the party seeking additional discovery to demonstrate why such discovery is necessary prior to resolution of the issue of qualified federal immunity. The affidavits and other papers filed by the plaintiff fail to convince the court that the purpose of further discovery concerning Trooper Whiting, such as the purported need to delve into unrelated past incidences to see if a credibility problem exists, would have any bearing on the legal issues set forth above which underlie a qualified immunity defense. Accordingly, defendant's motion for a protective order staying further discovery as to this defendant (docket no. 41) is GRANTED pending resolution of the defense of qualified immunity."); Lee v. McCue, 410 F.Supp.2d 221, 225 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) ("In Saucier, the United States Supreme Court directed that issues of qualified immunity should be decided before discovery. Accordingly, this Court issued a Local Rule requiring that any defendant who planned to claim qualified immunity (1) file a pro forma motion for summary judgment on that sole ground with his answer; (2) depose the plaintiff and file papers in support of the motion within thirty days thereafter; and (3) obtain a decision on the motion before conducting any further discovery. The plaintiff's deposition enables the moving defendants to obtain all the particulars of plaintiff's claim and, after hearing them, to evaluate whether–viewing the facts most favorably to plaintiff–the defense of qualified immunity is likely to succeed. The defendant officers in this case did not follow my Local Rule. Instead, they waited until the close of discovery to move for summary judgment on all available grounds. Under this Court's Local Rule, 'A plaintiff who brings an action in which a qualified immunity defense is ordinarily asserted shall send defense counsel a copy of this rule. Failure to proceed in accordance with these rules after receipt of such notice shall operate as a waiver of the defense of qualified immunity as a matter of law.' Plaintiff did not demonstrate that he complied with this rule by sending a copy of this Court's qualified immunity rule to defense counsel and did not argue waiver in his opposition to the motion. I thus have no way of determining whether the defense was waived. Counsel for both sides are directed to observe this rule in the future."), aff'd, 218 F. App'x 26 (2007); Broudy v. Mather, 366 F.Supp.2d 3, 9 n.7 (D.D.C. 2005) ("Plaintiffs first argue that Defendants' claim of absolute immunity is precluded, or waived, because it was 'not raised in their initial motion to dismiss filed over a year and a half ago.'. .. This argument is unconvincing. The Sixth Circuit, faced with the issue of waiver of the qualified immunity defense at the pleadings stage in English v. Dyke, 23 F.3d 1086, 1090 (6th Cir.1994), concluded that 'the trial court has discretion to find a waiver if a defendant fails to assert the defense within the time limits set by the court or if the court otherwise finds that a defendant has failed to exercise due diligence or has asserted the defense for dilatory purposes.' Both the First and Third Circuits have adopted this position. [citing cases] This issue has not been directly addressed by our Circuit. These cases, however, present a well-reasoned analysis. Applying that analysis to the instant case, it is clear that Defendants have not waived the absolute immunity defense. First, Defendants raised the defense of qualified immunity in their initial motion to dismiss. While it is true that they did not raise the defense of absolute immunity until the instant Motion, the Court cannot say that Defendants failed to exercise a 'reasonable modicum of diligence in raising the defense.' . . Second, Plaintiffs would not be significantly prejudiced by the delay generated by claims of absolute immunity. Moreover, Plaintiffs have had ample opportunity to brief the issue."); Tiffany v. Tartaglione, No. 00 Civ. 2283(CM)(LMS), 2004 WL 540275, at *2 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 5, 2004) ("Plaintiff is incorrect that defendants waived their opportunity to move for qualified immunity as a matter of law by not so moving with their answer. My individual rules currently impose such a requirement, consistent with the United States Supreme Court's directive, in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S.194 (2001), that the issue of qualified immunity as a matter of law be determined at the earliest point in a case–preferably prior to discovery–so that an officer who is entitled to the doctrine's protections can take full advantage of them. However, I only added that requirement to my individual rules in 2003. While defendants should have made this motion far earlier in the case as a matter of logic, no such rule bound them to make the motion prior to discovery when this case was in that posture."); Shepard v. Wapello County, 303 F. Supp.2d 1004, 1012 (S.D. Iowa 2003) ("Preliminarily, the Court notes that defendants make a point of stating that qualified immunity 'ordinarily should be decided by the court long before trial. . . That is true. The reason the issue was not decided long before trial in this case was that defendants did not present it until their Rule 50(a) motions made during trial. [footnote omitted] When qualified immunity is raised after a trial in which the plaintiff has prevailed, the first question in the qualified immunity analysis is, examining the trial evidence in the light favorable to plaintiff, was the evidence 'so one-sided that defendants were entitled to prevail as a matter of law' on the constitutional claim.").

See also Falkner v. Houston, 974 F. Supp. 757, 759-61 (D. Neb. 1997), where the court explains:

> Under the objective reasonableness standard set forth in Harlow, in the ordinary case a defendant official may prevail on the qualified immunity defense at any one of four progressive findings: (1) Defendant's challenged conduct is not a violation of constitutional or federal law as currently interpreted; or (2) Although defendant's challenged conduct is a violation of constitutional or federal law as currently interpreted, that violation was not "clearly established" at the time of defendant's challenged conduct; or (3) The facts are undisputed, and a reasonable officer, confronting these facts and circumstances at the time of her challenged conduct, would not have understood that conduct to have violated plaintiff's clearly established constitutional or federal rights; or (4) The facts are disputed, and viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiff–that is, assuming that the plaintiff will prove his allegations –a reasonable officer, confronting these facts and circumstances at the time of her challenged conduct, would not have understood that conduct to have violated plaintiff's clearly established constitutional or federal rights. . . . Simply stated, unless there is a good reason for doing so, it is much more efficient, for all concerned, for the defendant to present the defense at the outset. . . .In the exceptional case, where detailed factual findings significantly affect the qualified immunity inquiry, it may be appropriate to defer presentation of the defense until trial. Such cases are rare, however, and consideration of a request to defer presentation of the defense requires a case-by-case determination in accordance with the facts peculiar to the inquiry. . . At the very least, the defendant official should show that significant disputed facts would very likely preclude a successful motion to dismiss or for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds and that the filing of such a motion would be nothing but a waste of time and money.

But see Dixon v. Parker, No. 01 C 7419, 2002 WL 99747, at *1 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 25, 2002) (unpublished order of Judge Shadur) ("Given the repeated teachings from the highest judicial sources (see particularly Saucier v. Katz, 121 S.Ct. 2151 (2001)), this Court continues to be amazed at the stubborn persistence of counsel for law enforcement personnel (whether as here from the Attorney General's Office, or from the Cook County State's Attorney's Office, or from the City of Chicago Corporation Counsel's Office) in invariably asserting qualified immunity defenses in a Pavlovian manner, rather than only selectively where such a defense is appropriate. In this instance Dixon's allegations, when accepted as gospel in AD [Affirmative Defense] terms, cannot spare defendants the need 'to stand trial or face the other burdens of litigation' (Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 526 (1985))–and so qualified immunity plays no legitimate role at this stage. If factual development were to change that, so that (for example) a qualified immunity defense might extricate one or more defendants from the case (say on a Rule 56 motion for summary judgment, see Saucier), the defense may be raised at that time. For the present, however, the advancement of that defense is just wrong."); Gonzalez v. Albarran, No. 99 C 4589, 2000 WL 655960, at *1 & n.1 (N.D. Ill. May 19, 2000) ("It is of course fundamental to the concept of an AD [affirmative defense] that it accepts the plaintiff's allegations as true but goes on to state some legal basis for the responding defendant's nonliability . . . . Yet Albarran's First AD is predicated on the proposition that 'a reasonable police officer objectively viewing the facts and circumstances that confronted Officer Albarran and having the information that Office Albarran possessed could have believed his actions to have been lawful and not in violation of any clearly established law.' That position is totally at odds with the allegations of FAC [first amended complaint] as to Albarran's unprovoked imposition of unreasonable and excessive force on Gonzalez, and so it simply cannot stand as an AD. . . . [T]here is no way that a defense of qualified immunity can come into play under the FAC, because it will require either a trial or a successful motion for summary judgment to demonstrate Gonzalez' allegations to be untrue. . . . It is really time that the City's Corporation Counsel's Office changed its position of asserting an AD of qualified immunity in cases such as this. Definitive case law from the Supreme Court (and from our Court of Appeals as well) squarely teaches the inappropriatness of that concept in the type of head-on factual confrontation situation that is involved here, and the Corporation Counsel's stated concern as to the possible waiver of a qualified immunity defense is wholly without merit.").

E. Discretionary Function

In some cases qualified immunity has been denied because the official was not performing a discretionary function. See, e.g., Sweetin v. City of Texas City, Texas, No. 21-40784, 2022 WL 4008105, at *2–3 (5th Cir. Sept. 2, 2022) ("Qualified immunity protects government officials acting within their authority from individual liability 'when their actions could reasonably have been believed to be legal.'. . Once a government official establishes that his conduct was within the scope of his discretionary authority, it is up to the plaintiff to show that (1) the official 'violated a statutory or constitutional right,' and (2) the right was 'clearly established at the time.'. . The first part of the rule often gets overlooked: To even get into the qualified-immunity framework, the government official must 'satisfy his burden of establishing that the challenged conduct was within the scope of his discretionary authority.'. . That oft-overlooked threshold requirement is dispositive here. To figure out whether an official was acting within the scope of his duties, we look to state law. . . Wylie was not acting within the scope of his discretionary authority because state law does not give a permit officer the authority to conduct stops of any kind. . . In fact, it says the contrary: Texas law criminalizes a public official's act of 'intentionally subject[ing]' a person to 'seizure' 'that he knows is unlawful.'. . Wylie intentionally subjected Sweetin and Stefek to seizure, and Wylie admits he knew he had no authority to stop them. For these reasons, we hold that Wylie is not entitled to qualified immunity."); Haywood v. Hough, 811 F. App'x 952, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("Hubbard argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity for Haywood's false arrest claim because he lacked the authority to end Haywood's detention. He claims that, as a corrections officer, he is not a 'peace officer' under Michigan law and therefore may not '[p]erform the functions of a peace officer,' including making arrests and conducting criminal investigations. . . To the extent he participated in Haywood's arrest, he contends that he did so at the direction of Eagle and Hough; he had no independent authority as a corrections officer to detain her. He concludes that because it is not clearly established that a corrections officer is unable to rely on the directions of a police officer in the circumstances he faced, he is entitled to qualified immunity. Hubbard, however, misunderstands the consequences of his claim that he lacked authority under state law to perform a criminal investigation. Rather than establishing his entitlement to summary judgment, Hubbard's claim effectively concedes that he may not raise qualified immunity as a defense. 'Government officials are entitled to qualified immunity' only 'with respect to "discretionary functions" performed in their official capacities.'. . Qualified immunity does not attach when an official manifestly 'act[s] outside his discretionary authority.'. . This is so because an official who 'goes completely outside the scope of his discretionary authority ... ceases to act as a government official and instead acts on his own behalf.'. . We look to state law to determine the scope of a state official's discretionary authority. . . 'A defendant bears the initial burden of putting forth facts that suggest that he was acting within the scope of his discretionary authority.'. . In the vast majority of cases, this requirement is an easy hurdle for the defendant to clear, 'because most § 1983 claims involve conduct that relates to, or flows from, conduct that the official is indeed authorized to commit.' . .In Gravely, the plaintiff, a family member of a prisoner shot dead after escaping, argued that the defendant acted outside the scope of his authority because, 'as a correctional officer, [he] lacked the authority' under Ohio law 'to engage in efforts to recapture an escaped inmate.'. . We rejected that argument because we found that Ohio law did in fact give corrections officers that authority. . . Here, by contrast, Hubbard does not argue that corrections officers have the authority under Michigan law to detain or investigate a prison visitor suspected of a crime. Instead, he affirmatively denies that he has any such authority. This amounts to a conscious waiver of the argument that he acted pursuant to his discretionary functions. Accordingly, Hubbard may not raise qualified immunity as a defense regardless of whether he violated any clearly established right. A government official who acts wholly outside the scope of his authority is akin to a private individual facing § 1983 liability. . . Although private individuals are not entitled to qualified immunity, they may raise good faith as an affirmative defense in a § 1983 action. . . A government official in Hubbard's position may likewise be able to rely on this defense, but only Hubbard's claim for qualified immunity is properly before us."); Cherry Knoll, L.L.C. v. Jones, 922 F.3d 309, 318-19 (5th Cir. 2019) ("'In this circuit, the qualified immunity defense involves a shifting burden of proof.'. . The defendant official must first satisfy his burden of establishing that the challenged conduct was within the scope of his discretionary authority. . .'An official acts within his discretionary authority when he performs non-ministerial acts within the boundaries of his official capacity.'. . Once the defendant establishes that the challenged conduct was within the scope of his discretionary authority, the burden then shifts to the plaintiff to rebut the qualified immunity defense. . . In evaluating whether the plaintiff has rebutted the defense, we first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the violation of a clearly established constitutional right. . . If the right was clearly established at the time of the incident at issue, we next determine whether the defendant's conduct was objectively reasonable in light of the clearly established legal rules at the time of the alleged violation. . . In this case, the threshold inquiry ends our analysis because Jones has not satisfied his burden to show that the challenged conduct was within the scope of his discretionary authority. . . Cherry Knoll asserts that under Texas law, the right to subdivide land belongs to the landowner. . . The landowner must prepare a plat and submit it to municipal authorities for approval. . . The City has enacted ordinances outlining its approval procedure. . .As Cherry Knoll points out, the ordinances require the 'applicant' for plat approval to have the plat recorded with the county clerk within sixty days after the City Council approves a final plat. . .The ordinances further require the applicant to file a corporate surety bond or letter of credit after council approval but prior to recordation of the plat. . . Cherry Knoll asserts that under state law and the City's charter and ordinances, the City (and its officials) had no authority to file plats affecting private property without the consent of the landowner. In response, Jones points to the various City ordinances governing the plat approval process. Although these ordinances delineate the various steps a landowner/applicant must complete in order to obtain the City's approval of a subdivision plat, none of the ordinances authorize the City, or any of its officials, to file approved plats. The ordinances also do not indicate that the City's plat approval process includes its filing of an approved plat, or that when a landowner requests approval of a plat, he is thereby also giving the City or any of its officials the authority to file the approved plat. Jones has failed to meet his burden of showing that the filing of the Subdivision Plats was within the scope of his discretionary authority. Therefore, the district court erred in determining that Jones was entitled to the protection of qualified immunity at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage."); Groten v. California, 251 F.3d 844, 851 (9th Cir. 2001) ("Although the Fourteenth Amendment right to due process in the application procedure may not have been clearly established at the time of the alleged violations, Groten alleged that the appellees refused to give him the proper application materials and did not allow him to apply for the licenses which he sought. These ministerial acts are unshielded by qualified immunity, which protects 'only actions taken pursuant to discretionary functions.'"); In re Allen, 106 F.3d 582, 593 (4th Cir. 1997) (holding "that an official who performs an act clearly established to be beyond the scope of his discretionary authority is not entitled to claim qualified immunity under § 1983."), reh'g en banc denied, 119 F.3d 1129 (4th Cir. 1997); Brooks v. George County, 84 F.3d 157, 165 (5th Cir. 1996) (where Mississippi law imposed on Sheriff "a non-discretionary duty to keep records of work performed by pretrial detainees and to transmit those records to the board of supervisors so that pretrial detainees [could] be paid[,]" Sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiff's due process claim.). See generally Dugas v. Jefferson County, 931 F. Supp. 1315, 1321 n.4 (E.D. Tex. 1996) (collecting circuit court cases commenting on the limited scope of the ministerial exception). See also Atteberry v. Nocona General Hospital, 430 F.3d 245, 257 (5th Cir. 2005) ("The Plaintiffs argue that these alleged violations of state statutes imposed non-discretionary duties upon Norris and Perry, vitiating their qualified immunity defense altogether. Qualified immunity is only available when an official acts 'within the scope of [his or her] discretionary authority.'. . . In both the Plaintiffs' complaint and in their briefs before this court, this argument is tenuous. It is enough, at this point, to say that some of these statutes may create non-discretionary duties which would vitiate qualified immunity, and others may create duties with an element of discretion.").

See also Central Specialties, Inc. v. Large, 18 F.4th 989, 1000-003 (8th Cir. 2021) (Grasz, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), pet. for cert. filed, No. 21-1552 (U.S. June 8, 2022) ("There's a new sheriff in town. Today, the court holds that a local official in charge of road design and maintenance is entitled to summary judgment on a claim against him for exercising the authority of a law enforcement officer and making traffic stops and seizing vehicles and their drivers. . . The holding implicitly cloaks such officials with near-absolute immunity for their actions since there are no existing cases circumscribing or defining the scope of this newly discovered, unwritten law enforcement authority. Because this holding runs counter to precedent dictating qualified immunity is not available in this context, . . . I respectfully dissent from those portions of the court's opinion granting qualified immunity to County Engineer Jonathan Large as to CSI's Fourth Amendment unlawful seizure claim and Fourteenth Amendment equal protection claim. . . The court's analysis of CSI's Fourth Amendment unlawful seizure and Fourteenth Amendment equal protection claims against Large 'begins and ends' with its qualified immunity analysis. . . But qualified immunity is not applicable here. We have 'held that an official acting outside the clearly established "scope of his discretionary authority is not entitled to claim qualified immunity under § 1983."'. . In doing so we 'adopted the rationale [of the Fourth Circuit] in In re Allen, 106 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1997).'. . The question, then, is what authority Large had as a county engineer. But first, it is important to identify what this inquiry entails and what it does not. 'In determining the scope of an official's authority, and whether the act complained of was clearly established to be beyond that authority, the issue is neither whether the official properly exercised his discretionary duties, nor whether he violated the law.'. . 'Instead, a court must ask whether the act complained of, if done for a proper purpose, would be within, or reasonably related to, the outer perimeter of an official's discretionary duties.'. . And whether Large's seizure of CSI's trucks was 'clearly established' as beyond his authority is not a function of finding similar cases involving road engineers making traffic stops. Rather, it entails reviewing the statutes governing county engineers in Minnesota. . . So, the task before us is to look to Minnesota law to see whether making traffic stops, enforcing traffic laws, or seizing and detaining vehicles and drivers to investigate potential weight limit violations is within Large's discretionary authority. It is not. To begin with, there is no statute giving a county engineer authority to stop and detain individuals. . . . Nowhere is there the slightest hint in Minnesota law that a county engineer is a peace officer, a constable, or someone 'charged with the enforcement of the law', . . . so as to have authority to make arrests or seizures of persons on public highways. . . . As a county engineer, Large is not charged with detecting crime and enforcing the general criminal laws of the state of Minnesota. And even as a private citizen, he had no authority to make an investigative stop. . . Put simply, Large is not a law enforcement officer. When he stopped and detained CSI's trucks and drivers, he possessed no warrant and had no authority to determine whether probable cause existed to seize CSI's trucks. Indeed, he had no authority to make traffic stops, enforce traffic laws, seize vehicles that may be in violation of weight limits, or detain drivers or vehicles to investigate violations of the law. Consequently, the doctrine of qualified immunity has no application to a county engineer in this situation, and Large cannot avail himself of its protections. I cannot square the court's contrary conclusion with our decision in Johnson, or the Minnesota Supreme Court's decision in Horner. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from the court's opinion as to the Fourth Amendment unlawful seizure claim."

See also Spencer v. Benison, 5 F.4th 1222, 1232 (11th Cir. 2021) ("[I]t was a legitimate job-related function for Benison, as an Alabama sheriff, to seek the removal of cones and vehicles for the purposes of achieving public safety. Benison also acted 'through means that were within his power to utilize.'. . Here, Benison carried out his duties by verbally commanding Spencer to remove the cones and vehicles and by threatening arrest should he fail to comply. Spencer has not argued that these specific means were beyond Benison's 'power to utilize.' Thus, we conclude that Benison was acting within the scope of his discretionary authority."); Robinson v. Ash, 805 F. App'x 634, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) ("We look to state law to determine the scope of an officer's authority. . . In Alabama, a law enforcement officer's authority hinges on the jurisdiction of the entity he serves: if a city officer takes enforcement action 'outside the police jurisdiction of the town,' he 'may not assert any privilege that might otherwise inure to him in his role as a police officer.'. . An officer operating beyond his geographically limited jurisdiction has 'exceeded his authority.'. . As the district pointed out, city police officers like Ash 'do not have free-floating jurisdiction in Alabama.'. . Generally, a city's police jurisdiction extends to the city's corporate limits or—at most—three miles beyond the city limits. . . That said, state law provides three relevant exceptions to this rule. First, a city officer may arrest a person anywhere in same county as the city in which he serves. . . Second, if acting as a 'private person,' an officer can make a citizen's arrest, regardless of jurisdiction. . . And third, a municipal officer may execute a search warrant outside of his ordinary jurisdiction—but only if accompanied by a deputy sheriff from the county. . . Under this framework, Ash has not shown that he had state law authority to investigate Robinson and arrange for the search and seizure of her phone—the core conduct challenged here."); Estate of Cummings v. Davenport, 906 F.3d 934, 939-44 (11th Cir. 2018) ("The district court ruled, and we agree, that Davenport is not entitled to qualified immunity because he failed to establish that his alleged actions were within his discretionary authority. Davenport has the initial burden of raising the defense of qualified immunity by proving that his discretionary authority extended to his alleged actions. Because Alabama law establishes that a prison warden does not have the discretionary authority to control a dying inmate's end-of-life decisions, Davenport cannot satisfy that burden and is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . .We look to state law to determine the scope of a state official's discretionary authority, as our decisions in Harbert International and Lenz v. Winburn, 51 F.3d 1540 (11th Cir. 1995), illustrate. . . .The district court correctly looked to Alabama law to determine whether Davenport's alleged actions were within his authority. And it correctly held that they were not. The Alabama Natural Death Act, Ala. Code § 22-8A-1 et seq., compels the conclusion that the office of a prison warden grants no authority to enter a do-not-resuscitate order or to order the withdrawal of artificial life support on behalf of a dying inmate. . . .Davenport argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because he had some general authority to make medical decisions for inmates, but this argument misunderstands our precedents. The reason we take care not to 'assess the defendant's act at too high a level of generality,' Holloman, 370 F.3d at 1266, is not to give officials additional slack; it is to avoid the 'tautology' of asking whether a defendant had the authority to violate the law, Harbert Int'l, 157 F.3d at 1282. What we strip away from the defendant's allegedly unconstitutional action to isolate its 'general nature' is nothing more than its alleged unconstitutionality: 'that it may have been committed for an unconstitutional purpose, in an unconstitutional manner, to an unconstitutional extent, or under constitutionally inappropriate circumstances.'. . If Davenport categorically lacked the authority to enter a do-not-resuscitate order or to withdraw Cummings's life support, we cannot hold that he is entitled to qualified immunity simply because he had some authority to make other medical decisions. That shift in the level of generality would be more generous to Davenport than is 'necessary to remove the constitutional taint[.]' If Alabama did empower prison wardens to make end-of-life decisions for permanently incapacitated inmates, then we would have to decide whether Davenport's exercise of that authority violated clearly established constitutional law. But the Act makes clear that Alabama has not given prison wardens that authority, and our recognition that Davenport's alleged actions were outside his discretionary authority says nothing about the merits of the estate's constitutional claim. Finally, contrary to our precedents, Davenport suggests that the discretionary-authority requirement is not part of the qualified-immunity analysis. He asserts that '[w]hile the requirement ... is ubiquitous in Eleventh Circuit authority, interestingly, such a requirement is nowhere to be found in Supreme Court qualified immunity cases.' True, the Supreme Court has never addressed the scope of an official's burden to establish that a suit against him is based on actions taken within his authority, but Davenport is wrong to suggest that Supreme Court precedent offers no support for such a requirement. On the contrary, the Court has explained that '[t]he conception animating the qualified immunity doctrine ... is that "where an official's duties legitimately require action in which clearly established rights are not implicated, the public interest may be better served by action taken with independence and without fear of consequences."'. . And recent precedent reiterates that '[g]overnment officials are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to "discretionary functions" performed in their official capacities.' [citing Ziglar v. Abbasi] We acknowledge that not every circuit court has formulated the discretionary-authority requirement as part of its qualified-immunity analysis, see, e.g., Stanley v. Gallegos, 852 F.3d 1210, 1214–16 (10th Cir. 2017) (opinion of Hartz, J.) (collecting cases and discussing pros and cons of the requirement); id. at 1225–27 (Holmes, J., concurring in the judgment) (arguing that Tenth Circuit precedent forecloses the requirement), and we acknowledge that not all of those that have formulated it apply it in precisely the same way as this Court, see In re Allen, 119 F.3d 1129, 1132 (4th Cir. 1997) (Motz, J., concurring in the denial of rehearing en banc). But these ambiguities, however potentially fascinating to legal scholars, are of no help to Davenport in this appeal. As Davenport concedes, we are bound by 'ubiquitous' circuit precedent to apply the discretionary-authority requirement. And we are bound to hold, based on the comprehensive Alabama law that governs end-of-life decisions, that Davenport acted beyond the scope of his discretionary authority when he allegedly instructed the University Hospital to enter a do-not-resuscitate order for Cummings and to remove him from artificial life support. We affirm the denial of qualified immunity."); Wilson v. Miller, 650 F. App'x 676, 681 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Officer Miller was clearly performing a legitimate job-related function when he responded to Sergeant Cook's request for assistance in locating Wilson. Even if we assume that Officer Miller was outside his jurisdiction when he located Wilson, . . . Officer Miller was still acting 'through means that were within his power to utilize.' Under Georgia law, police officers are authorized to make warrantless arrests for offenses committed in the officer's presence, even if the officer is outside his jurisdiction. . . . When Wilson threatened immediately to kill Officer Miller and approached Officer Miller in a threatening way, Officer Miller -- still acting within his discretionary authority -- used deadly force to protect himself from what he perceived reasonably to be an imminent threat of serious physical injury. In the light of the circumstances of this case, Officer Miller was acting inside the scope of his discretionary authority when the shooting occurred."); Gaillard v. Commins, 562 F. App'x 870, 872, 873 (11th Cir. 2014) ("Officer Commins participated in a police chase to arrest a felony suspect. Given that this activity falls within a police officer's job duties and authority, Officer Commins has established that he was acting within his discretionary function. . . .The district court reached the opposite conclusion after noting that Commins (1) was off-duty when he joined the police chase and (2) may have violated an internal police department rule by continuing the pursuit beyond the borders of his home jurisdiction without obtaining the required approval. But these facts do not change the calculus: an officer may act within his discretionary function even when he is off-duty or when his conduct possibly violates a department policy. What matters is whether the officer 'was (a) performing a legitimate job-related function (that is, pursuing a job-related goal), (b) through means that were within his power to utilize.' Harland, 370 F.3d at 1265. Officer Commins's pursuit of a fleeing felony suspect easily meets this test."); Johnson v. Phillips, 664 F.3d 232, 238, 239 (8th Cir. 2011) ("If Phillips were a police officer with arguable authority to conduct searches incident to arrest, then he would have qualified immunity for the search of the passenger compartment. As of 2006, before the Supreme Court's decision in Gant, this court's interpretation of the Fourth Amendment in light of Belton established a bright-line rule that officers could search the passenger compartment of a vehicle incident to arrest. . . A police officer with appropriate authority who relied on pre-Gant precedent to conduct a search before April 2009 is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Phillips is not entitled to qualified immunity for the search of the passenger compartment, however, because he acted outside the clearly established boundaries of his authority as an Auxiliary Reserve Police Officer. . . Of course, not every improper exercise of duties or violation of law eliminates qualified immunity. The dispositive question in evaluating the availability of immunity is 'whether the act complained of, if done for a proper purpose, would be within, or reasonably related to, the outer perimeter of an official's discretionary duties.'. . It is clear that Phillips's act of searching the car was not. Phillips's position as Auxiliary Reserve Police Officer did not grant him the power to arrest or search incident to arrest. Velda City Ordinance § 200.110(5) states that reserve officers have no power to arrest beyond that of any other citizen, and Phillips acknowledged this limitation in his deposition. With

Phillips standing in the same shoes as any other citizen, it was clearly established that he had no authority under state or local law to arrest persons believed to have committed traffic offenses. . . And Phillips likewise clearly lacked authority to conduct a search incident to an arrest that he was not authorized to make. We therefore conclude that Phillips is not entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's claim for unlawful search of her vehicle."); Jones v. City of Atlanta, No. 06-12140, 2006 WL 2273171, at *4 (11th Cir. Aug. 9, 2006) (not published) ("In this case, Officers Stone and Frye have not proven that they were acting within the scope of their discretionary authority when they interacted with Jones. The officers do not dispute that they were outside of their police jurisdiction when they allegedly violated Jones's constitutional rights. And, they have presented nothing to support a finding that their interaction with Jones was undertaken in performance of their official duties. While they suggest, in a footnote in their appellate brief, that Georgia law authorizes police officers to arrest those committing crimes in their presence even if the crime is committed outside of the officers' police jurisdiction, Officers Stone and Frye did not contend in the district court nor on appeal that they were arresting Jones. Instead, they have maintained that they intended to render him aid. And, Dr. Richard Clark, the City of Atlanta Police Department's head of Planning and Research, testified that, in such circumstances, City of Atlanta police officers have only the same authority as an ordinary citizen when they are outside the territorial jurisdiction of the City of Atlanta. . . Thus, Officers Stone and Frye are not entitled to summary judgment grounded upon qualified immunity for their actions during the interaction with Jones."); Holloman ex rel. Holloman v. Harland, 370 F.3d 1252, 1263-67, 1283 (11th Cir. 2004) ("To even be potentially eligible for summary judgment due to qualified immunity, the official must have been engaged in a 'discretionary function' when he performed the acts of which the plaintiff complains. . . It is the burden of the governmental official to make this showing. . . A defendant unable to meet this burden may not receive summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. . . While a number of our cases omit this step of the analysis, . . .binding Supreme Court and Eleventh Circuit precedents require us to consider expressly this critical threshold matter. . . . In many areas other than qualified immunity, a 'discretionary function' is defined as an activity requiring the exercise of independent judgment, and is the opposite of a 'ministerial task.'. . In the qualified immunity context, however, we appear to have abandoned this 'discretionary function / ministerial task' dichotomy. In McCoy v. Webster, 47 F.3d 404, 407 (11th Cir.1995), we interpreted 'the term Adiscretionary authority" to include actions that do not necessarily involve an element of choice,' and emphasized that, for purposes of qualified immunity, a governmental actor engaged in purely ministerial activities can nevertheless be performing a discretionary function. Instead of focusing on whether the acts in question involved the exercise of actual discretion, we assess whether they are of a type that fell within the employee's job responsibilities. Our inquiry is two-fold. We ask whether the government employee was (a) performing a legitimate job-related function (that is, pursuing a job-related goal), (b) through means that were within his power to utilize. . . . [T]o pass the first step of the discretionary function test for qualified immunity, the defendant must have been performing a function that, but for the alleged constitutional infirmity, would have fallen with his legitimate job description. Of course, we must be sure not to characterize and assess the defendant's act at too high a level of generality. Nearly every act performed by a government employee can be described, in general terms, as ostensibly 'furthering the public interest.' If we jump to such a high level of abstraction, it becomes impossible to determine whether the employee was truly acting within the proper scope of his job-related activities. Consequently, we consider a government official's actions at the minimum level of generality necessary to remove the constitutional taint. . . . .After determining that an official is engaged in a legitimate job-related function, it is then necessary to turn to the second prong of the test and determine whether he is executing that job-related function–that is, pursuing his job-related goals–in an authorized manner. The primary purpose of the qualified immunity doctrine is to allow government employees to enjoy a degree of protection only when exercising powers that legitimately form a part of their jobs. . . . Under this standard, Allred–as a matter of law–was undoubtedly engaged in a discretionary function in chastising Holloman for raising his fist during the Pledge of Allegiance and later referring him to Harland for punishment. . . .[but] [p]raying goes sufficiently beyond the range of activities normally performed by high school teachers and commonly accepted as part of their job as to fall outside the scope of Allred's official duties, even if she were using prayer as a means of achieving a job-related goal. It is not within the range of tools among which teachers are empowered to select in furtherance of their pedagogical duties. . . . We emphasize that, at this juncture, we are not denying Allred summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds against this claim because we feel her acts violated the Establishment Clause. Instead, we are holding her ineligible for qualified immunity as a matter of law because she failed to establish that her act–this type of act–fell within her duties or powers as a teacher. The fact that Allred is a teacher does not mean that anything she says or does in front of a classroom necessarily constitutes an exercise of her discretionary powers or is a job-related function. . . . Consequently, Allred is not even potentially entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds against Holloman's Establishment Clause claim."); Vicari v. Ysleta Independent School Dist., 546 F.Supp.2d 387, 421, 422 (W.D. Tex. 2008) ("The exception to qualified immunity for functions that are 'ministerial' rather than 'discretionary' is quite narrow. For qualified immunity purposes a duty is 'ministerial' only where the statute or regulation [in question] leaves no room for discretion–that is, it 'specifies the precise action that the official must take in each instance.'. . Moreover, 'the ministerial-duty exception applies only where it is a violation of the ministerial duty that gives rise to the cause of action for damages.'. . Here, Vicari does not claim Miller is liable because he violated a YISD regulation; rather she seeks damages based on Miller's purported taking of her salary without due process, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Thus, the issue before the Court is whether Miller violated any clearly established constitutional right rather than whether he violated a YISD policy. . . Further, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals has concluded 'the ministerial-duty exception to the qualified immunity defense is dead letter' law . . . . Indeed, it appears the First, Fifth, and Seventh Circuits have, like the Eighth Circuit, challenged the ministerial-discretionary distinction's relevance in the qualified immunity context. . . In addition, the Second Circuit has concluded a subordinate employee is entitled to qualified immunity when the subordinate performs a solely ministerial task by carrying out an order which is: (1) not facially invalid, and (2) issued by a superior employee who is himself entitled to qualified immunity . . . With these principles in mind and to the extent it is necessary for the Court to determine whether Miller's actions were 'discretionary' or merely 'ministerial,' after examining the relevant summary judgment evidence, the Court concludes

Miller's actions were discretionary as a matter of law. The district regulations in question do not sufficiently specify the precise action that officials such as Miller must take in each instance to make actions taken pursuant to those regulations 'ministerial,' as the Supreme Court has narrowly defined the term. . . In sum, the Court concludes Miller is eligible to raise the defense of qualified immunity with regard to Vicari's § 1983 claim against him." (footnotes omitted)); Scheuerman v. City of Huntsville, AL, 499 F.Supp.2d 1205, 1218 (N.D. Ala. 2007) ("While qualified immunity protects officials performing discretionary duties, it is not at all clear to the court that qualified immunity protects an off-duty bank fraud investigator who becomes angry after allegedly being tailgated, and who admittedly is not engaging in a traffic stop. If Weaber was not performing a traffic stop, then what was he doing? And how can he be performing a discretionary duty that qualified immunity was designed to protect?In some ways, Weaber's act of exiting his vehicle can be analogized to an off-duty officer who walks into a bar and becomes angry when someone bumps into him. If the officer confronts the person with his gun drawn, can he be said to be acting within his discretionary authority? Or is he, instead, abusing his authority? Does the mere fact that he is a police officer when he engages in the confrontation entitle him to qualified immunity? Of course not.Defendant has cited no case law to indicate how he would be qualifiedly immune from suit under such circumstances. To be sure, off-duty police officers performing discretionary duties can be entitled to qualified immunity. But it is not clear from the record before this court that defendant was acting pursuant to his discretionary authority for purposes of qualified immunity in this instance. The defendant must first establish that he was acting within his discretionary authority in performing a contested act before 'the burden shifts to the plaintiff to show that qualified immunity is not appropriate.' Lee, 284 F.3d at 1194. Defendant has failed to do so."), aff'd, 2008 WL 656080 (11th Cir. Mar. 12, 2008); Street v. City of Bloomingdale, 2007 WL 1752469, at *4 (S.D.Ga. June 15, 2007) ("In the instant case, Defendants have failed to even address whether their actions were part of their discretionary job functions. Accordingly, their motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds is DENIED."); Reed v. Okereke, No. 1:04-CV-1064-JOF, 2006 WL 2444068, at *19 (N.D. Ga. Aug. 22, 2006) ("The Court concludes that Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. For qualified immunity to apply, Defendants have the initial burden of showing that they engaged in a discretionary function. . . . .Defendants' motion for summary judgment is silent on the issue of whether Defendants were acting within the scope of their discretionary functions. In fact, Defendants' motion for summary judgment fails to identify the individual Defendants or their roles in the Fulton County Waste Management system. . . Without evidence of Defendants' job functions, they have not met their burden of showing that they were engaged in discretionary functions. . . As a result, Defendants are not entitled to summary judgment on the '§ 1981 and 1983 claims on the basis of qualified immunity."); Rodriguez v. McClenning, No. 03 Civ. 5269(SAS), 2005 WL 937483, at *6 & n.95 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 22, 2005) (not reported) ("Here, qualified immunity does not protect McClenning because the sexual assault of a prison inmate is outside the scope of a corrections officer's official duties. Boddie established that the sexual assault of a prison inmate by a prison employee serves no legitimate punitive purpose. . . New York State law criminalizes any sexual contact initiated by a prison employee against an inmate. . . A corrections officer who sexually assaults a prison inmate does not mistakenly judge how he should carry out his duties; instead, such conduct blatantly disregards

a New York State criminal statute and Second Circuit case law. . . . In sum, both of McClenning's arguments for summary judgment on the sexual assault claim fail. If McClenning engaged in the alleged sexual assault, that conduct would constitute an Eighth Amendment violation because such behavior violates contemporary standards of decency. Qualified immunity cannot protect McClenning as the sexual assault of a prison inmate falls outside the scope of a corrections officer's official duties. . . . In his motion for summary judgment, McClenning argued that he is entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity because sexual assault is not a clearly established Eighth Amendment violation. Since qualified immunity does not apply to McClenning's alleged acts, the question of whether the sexual assault of a prison inmate is a clearly established Eighth Amendment violation need not be addressed."); Rossignol v. Voorhaar, 321 F.Supp.2d 642, 647, 648 (D. Md. 2004) ("The typical qualified immunity case involving police officers centers around action that is unquestionably taken in the course of the officers' discretionary function of enforcing a community's laws. Thus, whether the questioned action was taken within the scope of the officer's employment is rarely debated within this legal genre. This element is nevertheless a crucial piece of a qualified immunity analysis, for without it, the claim of immunity is not permitted. . . . Defendants' briefing focuses on the lack of action under color of law as the main counter-point to the bulk of Rossignol's claims. The effectiveness of this strategy is evidenced by this Court's being persuaded, upon its first consideration of the case, that despite its abhorrence for Defendants' actions, they were not taken under color of law sufficient to trigger a cause of action under § 1983. With the benefit of the Fourth Circuit's contrary determination, however, this Court can now only conclude that this case falls into that category of actions taken under color of law, yet outside of the scope of the actors' employment as law enforcement officers. . . . Accordingly, the same arguments made in Defendants' briefs that persuaded this Court in its prior opinion that their actions were not taken under color of state law, now lead it to conclude that the defense of qualified immunity is unavailable to any of the defendants in this action.").

See also Kjellsen v. Mills, 209 F. App'x 927, 2006 WL 3544923, at 1-3 (11th Cir. Dec. 8, 2006) (" In the qualified immunity context, a discretionary function includes actions that 'are of a type that fell within the employee's job responsibilities.' Hollman, 370 F.3d at 1265. This Court asks whether the government employee was (1) performing a legitimate job-related function (pursuing a job-related goal (2) through means that were within her power to utilize. . . In applying the above test, the most difficult task is characterizing a defendant's conduct. If framed too narrowly, such as whether it was within a defendant's discretion to violate a plaintiff's constitutional rights, 'the inquiry is no more than an untenable tautology.' Hollman 370 F.3d at 1266. If framed too generally, such as whether it was within a defendant's discretion to perform acts to further the public interest, then every act performed by a government employee would qualify. Id. The test developed by this Circuit is to characterize a government official's actions 'at the minimum level of generality necessary to remove the constitutional taint.' Id. Therefore, applied to this case, we should not ask whether the Appellants had the right to wrongfully withhold mitigating evidence from the prosecutor and the court; rather, this Court should ask whether the Appellants had the power to withhold test results for any reason. . . . Although the Appellants failed to present sufficient evidence that they acted in their discretionary capacities in their briefs to this Court and their motion for summary judgment in the district court, such evidence exists in the record. The district court was correct in finding there was insufficient evidence based on what Appellants presented to it on summary judgment. We remand, however, because of the importance of deciding issues of qualified immunity as early as possible in a proceeding and because evidence exists in the record that should be more fully briefed to and analyzed by the district court.") (See opinion after remand, Kjellsen v. Mills, 517 F.3d 1232 (11th Cir. 2008) (rejecting plaintiff's Fourth Amendment malicious prosecution claim and Sixth Amendment denial of compulsory process claim); Harbert International, Inc. v. James, 157 F.3d 1271, 1281-83 (11th Cir. 1998) ("To establish the defense of qualified immunity, the burden is first on the defendant to establish that the allegedly unconstitutional conduct occurred while he was acting within the scope of his discretionary authority. . . If, and only if, the defendant does that will the burden shift to the plaintiff to establish that the defendant violated clearly established law. . . The doctrine of qualified immunity was developed to defray the social costs of litigation against government officials. . . . When a government official goes completely outside the scope of his discretionary authority, he ceases to act as a government official and instead acts on his own behalf. Once a government official acts entirely on his own behalf, the policies underlying the doctrine of qualified immunity no longer support its application. For that reason, if a government official is acting wholly outside the scope of his discretionary authority, he is not entitled to qualified immunity regardless of whether the law in a given area was clearly established. . . . While Harbert alleges the defendants engaged in a myriad of unlawful and improper conduct, only the conduct that caused Harbert's alleged constitutional injury is relevant to the discretionary authority inquiry. That conduct consists of the defendants' allegedly improper handling of Harbert's claim for extra compensation and their decision to withhold damages from Harbert under a liquidated damages clause in the construction contract. The determinative question is whether the defendants had the authority to receive and process Harbert's claims for compensation, and whether they had the authority to decide whether to withhold damages from Harbert under a liquidated damages clause of the construction contract. . . . With the inquiry properly defined, we see the defendants have met their burden of demonstrating that their conduct was undertaken pursuant to their duties and that they were acting within the scope of their authority when the allegedly unconstitutional conduct occurred."); Sims v. Metropolitan Dade County, 972 F.2d 1230, 1236 (11th Cir.1992) (rejecting the contention that "any time a government official violates clearly established law he acts beyond the scope of his discretionary authority" as "untenable" and explaining that "the question of whether the defendants acted lawfully [is distinct from] the question of whether they acted within the scope of their discretion"); Randles v. Hester, No. 98CV1214, 2001 WL 1667821, at *7 (M.D. Fla. June 27, 2001) (not reported) ("Given the position that the Department of Corrections has taken in related litigation, one could conclude that Defendant, in ignoring Department of Corrections' written policies, the known risk of harm for exposure to contaminated blood and the availability of protective clothing and equipment, stepped outside the scope of his discretionary authority and lost the protection of qualified immunity, if applicable."); Conner v. Tate, 130 F. Supp.2d 1370, 1378, 1379 (N.D. Ga. 2001) ("The Eleventh Circuit has held that the qualified immunity defense is available to officers in their individual capacities accused of violating the Federal Wiretap Act.

Tapley v. Collins, 211 F.3d 1210, 1216 (2000). Neither party has addressed in their briefs whether the police officers and other officials in this case were acting within their discretionary authority when the alleged violations occurred. A "[g]overnment official proves that he acted within the scope of his discretionary authority for purposes of establishing qualified immunity by showing objective circumstances that would compel the conclusion that his actions were undertaken pursuant to the performance of his duties and within the scope of this authority." Hutton v. Strickland, 919 F.2d 1531, 1537 (11th Cir.1990); Jordan v. Doe, 38 F.3d 1559, 1566 (11th Cir.1994). It is unclear from the facts outlined in the Complaint what duties the individual Defendants were performing when they distributed the contents of the taped conversations. Neither Plaintiff nor Michael Tate were under investigation by the department, and Defendant Tate was not operating as an undercover or confidential informant when the tapes were made. . . Given that the officers have not established that their actions as alleged in the Complaint were in the performance of their duties and within the scope of their authority, the Court holds that the Defendants were not acting within their discretionary authority. Therefore, at least at this stage of the litigation, the individual Defendants are not entitled to the defense of qualified immunity."); Adams v. Franklin, 111 F. Supp.2d 1255, 1266, 1267 (M.D. Ala. 2000) ("In determining whether a defendant acted within the scope of his or her discretionary authority, the test is not whether the government official acted lawfully. Rather, the court must ask whether the act complained of, if done for a proper purpose, would be within, or reasonably related to, the outer perimeter of the government official's discretionary duties. [citing Sims] Based on the foregoing, the court must ask whether Rogers and Estes were, at the very least, acting within the scope of the outer limits of their discretionary authority in detaining Plaintiff and in making decisions regarding his medical needs. In other words, under the first step, the court does not examine the manner in which Rogers and Estes performed their duties.").

See also Varrone v. Bilotti, 123 F.3d 75, 82 (2d Cir. 1997) ("The continued validity of the ministerial-discretionary function distinction in determining qualified immunity has been questioned. . . . Both the Supreme Court and this court, however, have continued to articulate the distinction. . . We need not here decide whether the distinction continues to have validity because we conclude that even if these two subordinate officers performed solely a ministerial function in conducting the strip search, they still have qualified immunity for carrying out the order, not facially invalid, issued by a superior officer who is protected by qualified immunity. . . . Those two subordinate officers are entitled to qualified immunity for conducting the strip search of Varrone pursuant to the facially lawful order of their superior officer, even if making the search involved the performance of a ministerial function."); Roberts v. Caise, No. Civ.A.5:04-01-JMH, 2005 WL 2454634, at *4, *5 (E.D. Ky. Oct. 3, 2005) ("In several other recent cases, the Sixth Circuit has found that defendants who failed to provide medical care to prisoners were not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, but the court did so not on the basis of the ministerial nature of the challenged activities, but rather on the grounds that the defendants were deliberately indifferent. [citing cases] In other words, the Sixth Circuit went straight to the qualified immunity analysis without regard to the ministerial nature of the defendants' actions. Other circuits have explicitly rejected the argument that the availability of qualified immunity rests on a distinction between ministerial and discretionary acts. [citing cases] As described by the Eleventh Circuit, courts that have applied the ministerial/discretionary distinction have done so based on a misreading of the Supreme Court's decision in Harlow. . . . The Supreme Court in Harlow held that 'government officials performing discretionary functions' are entitled to immunity so long as they do not violate clearly established rights. . .An unduly narrow reading of Harlow only allows for immunity for nonministerial functions. A better reading, according to recent case law from other circuits, interprets the 'discretionary functions' language from Harlow as meaning simply that the government officials must be acting within the scope of their discretion, i.e., within the scope of their authority. . . Language from recent decisions indicates that the Sixth Circuit follows the latter reading of Harlow: 'Qualified immunity protects government officials from civil liability for actions taken within their official discretion.'. . [I]t would be anomalous to hold Caise personally liable for removing the extension cord, when he was required to do so by BOP procedures.").

See also Greene v. Cabral, No. CV 12-11685-DPW, 2015 WL 4270173, at *5 (D. Mass. July 13, 2015) ("While the Eleventh Circuit regularly analyzes in detail whether an official is acting within the official's discretionary authority as a prerequisite to a qualified immunity analysis, . . . courts elsewhere, and in the First Circuit in particular, typically spend little time on this element. The First Circuit has held that '[g]enerally, prison officials and officers are included in the category of those whose positions qualify them for such immunity.' . . Each of the defendants here was alleged by the plaintiff to be involved in making high-level determinations about the practices and policies of the Suffolk Department of Correction or Suffolk House of Correction and their misconduct is alleged to be the creation or implementation of an improper practice or policy. Greene's efforts to undercut the claim of qualified immunity based on a non-discretionary function fails.")

One Tenth Circuit panel has recently expressed diverse views on this subject. Compare the opinions below:

Stanley v. Gallegos, 852 F.3d 1210, 1211-19 (10th Cir. 2017) ("The appeal before us raises a related issue that is not settled in this circuit. Say the violation of federal law was not clearly established, but under state law the action was unauthorized. Does a public officer lose the protection of qualified immunity when he acts outside the scope of his authority? Is there any justification for granting immunity in that context? The answer is not an easy one, as suggested by the division within this panel. Judge Holmes would not recognize a scope-of-authority exception to qualified immunity. Judge Matheson would not address whether the exception should be recognized or, if it were recognized, what the scope of the exception should be, because, in his view, the parties agree that the exception should apply and that the defendant's lack of authority must be clearly established. The author likewise would not decide whether to recognize or reject a scope-of-authority exception but would hold that were this court to recognize a scope-of-authority exception to qualified immunity, the lack of authority under state law would have to be clearly established at the time of the challenged action. In this case the district court endorsed the scope-of-authority exception to qualified immunity and ruled that Defendant Donald Gallegos, a district attorney, had clearly acted without state-law authority in forcibly removing a barrier that Plaintiff David Stanley had placed on a road to prevent traffic through his property. It therefore held that Defendant could not invoke the protection of qualified immunity. Exercising jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, the panel reverses and remands to the district court for further consideration of whether Defendant violated clearly established federal law or is instead entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Qualified immunity shields officials from the distractions of frivolous litigation, allowing them to effectively discharge their duties for the public good. But why worry about causing the employee to flinch when the employee's actions do not come within the job description? One could conclude that when officials are no longer acting with official authority, they are just like private citizens, so the doctrine of qualified immunity should not apply. . . .Why not provide the same treatment to a government employee who has no official sanction to be involved in the activity for which § 1983 liability is alleged? Perhaps it is not surprising that over half the circuit courts of appeal appear to have recognized a scope-of-authority exception to the protection of qualified immunity. [collecting cases] . . . .None have explicitly rejected the exception. These decisions find support in the intuition that a public official still has a private persona and when acting in that capacity the official should not be protected by qualified immunity any more than a private person would be. The scope-of-authority exception provides a natural place to draw the line between an official's two personas. On the other hand, the focus of § 1983 is federal law, not state law. Why should qualified immunity under that provision depend on whether the government employee complied with state law? That appears to be the lesson of Davis, in which the plaintiff sued state officials under § 1983 for unlawfully terminating his employment. . .The Supreme Court rejected the plaintiff's argument that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity because they failed to comply with a state regulation governing employee discharges. . . . No binding precedent of this court has adopted the scope-of-authority exception to qualified immunity. Despite the apparent endorsement of the exception by most other circuits, I think we should be quite circumspect before embracing it. To begin with, it is unclear how to draw the line between conduct that violates state law (which Davis said is irrelevant to qualified immunity) and conduct that is unauthorized by state law (which is the purview of the scope-of-authority exception). The federal appellate cases invoking a 'scope of authority' exception do not define the term. Nor does it appear to be a commonly used term of art in other contexts. As a matter of English usage, one might say that a state official acts beyond the scope of authority if he fires an employee without first giving him the opportunity to respond in writing, as required by state law. But Davis held that this misconduct was just a violation of state law that did not deprive the official of the protection of qualified immunity. . . This suggests that an official's scope of authority should be interpreted broadly. . . .The opportunity for (the risk of) litigation of the meaning of scope of authority is obvious. Difficult line-drawing questions are inevitable. Consider, for example, a suit against an animal-control officer under § 1983 for arresting the owner of an animal. If the arrest was for a misdemeanor and state law permits such an officer to arrest a person only for a felony, has the officer acted outside the scope of authority (so that the scope-of-authority exception applies), or has the officer merely violated state law (so that under Davis the officer is still entitled to qualified immunity)? What if state law gives animal-control officers no power of arrest whatsoever? One must pause before adopting a doctrine of such uncertain scope that is so in tension with controlling Supreme Court authority. . . .Even if Defendant was exceeding his authority, the action was on a matter of public interest, not a purely personal concern. And this litigation will distract Defendant from performing official duties regardless of the grounds for the claims and defenses. An additional concern raised in Davis also has purchase here. One reason the Court rejected consideration of state-law violations in determining whether an official enjoyed qualified immunity was that the federal court might then need to determine 'the meaning or purpose of [state law], questions that federal judges often may be unable to resolve on summary judgment.'. . . Taking into account all these concerns about the scope-of-authority exception, I conclude that if the exception were to be adopted, it should be limited to cases in which there was clearly established state law that the government official's actions exceeded the scope of authority. Any less stringent standard would pose too great a risk of deterring public officials from vigorously performing their duties, embroil them in excessive litigation that would distract them from their duties, and overly complicate and delay litigation by requiring federal courts to become expert in state law. . .So limiting the possible scope-of-authority exception is as far as this court need go to resolve the appeal before us, because New Mexico law did not clearly establish that Defendant exceeded his authority as district attorney. . . .In the federal courts it is widely accepted that prosecutors possess investigative and police-like power, even though this is not quasi-judicial power for which prosecutors have absolute immunity. When civil-rights claims are brought against prosecutors based on investigative or police-like actions, courts allow the prosecutors to invoke qualified immunity—without any suggestion that a prosecutor has no business engaging in police-like actions. . . .I cannot say that Defendant's conduct was beyond the scope of his authority under clearly established New Mexico law. His actions must be considered in context. Plaintiff asserts that Defendant needed court authority to halt a blockade of a road. But if someone were intentionally blocking an interstate highway, surely the district attorney could instruct law-enforcement officers to remove the obstruction without first waiting for a court order. Although Plaintiff argues that there was no emergency here, this does not go to Defendant's scope of authority, but to whether the action was constitutional. . .Plaintiff therefore cannot escape qualified-immunity doctrine under the scope-of-authority exception. Plaintiff argues in his appellate brief that even if his scope-of-authority argument fails, he has shown that Defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity because Defendant's acts violated clearly established constitutional law. But because the district court has not addressed the issue, this court should follow its general practice of having such matters first resolved by the district court.")

Stanley v. Gallegos, 852 F.3d 1210, 1219-28 (10th Cir. 2017) (Holmes, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I concur but only in the judgment. I respectfully disagree with the Lead Opinion's (i.e., the opinion of Judge Hartz) decision to apply a variant of the 'scope-of-authority exception to qualified immunity[]'. . . in resolving this case. . . The Supreme Court and our court have consistently engaged in a two-pronged inquiry centered on federal law when a defendant asserts a qualified-immunity defense: specifically, we ordinarily ask (in substance) whether the plaintiff can demonstrate (1) that the defendant violated his federal constitutional rights, and (2) that the rights in question were clearly established under federal law at the time of the defendant's conduct. This two-pronged inquiry constitutes settled law, and it does not contemplate—and, indeed, makes no room for—an antecedent, potentially dispositive examination of whether the defendant acted within the scope of his authority, as defined by state law; yet, the Lead Opinion's application of the scope-of-authority exception would require us to engage in precisely such an examination. As such, the Lead Opinion's application of this exception is legally erroneous; that is, the exception should be rejected and not applied at all to these facts. And, lest there be any confusion, the impropriety of the Lead Opinion's application of this exception is not diminished in any meaningful sense by the Lead Opinion's equivocation at the precipice about whether our court should formally endorse the exception. In this regard, the Lead Opinion states that '[t]he author ... would not decide whether to recognize or reject a scope-of-authority exception but would hold that were this court to recognize a scope-of-authority exception to qualified immunity, the lack of authority under state law would have to be clearly established at the time of the challenged action.'. . However, this vacillation is cold comfort to those concerned about the improper erosion of the settled two-pronged inquiry for addressing the qualified-immunity defense. . . Whether it formally adopts the exception or not, the Lead Opinion's application of it on these facts may cause such an erosion. In sum, I respectfully disagree with the Lead Opinion's decision to apply a scope-of-authority exception here. For the reasons explicated below, however, I nevertheless concur in the judgment. . . .In my view, the scope-of-authority exception that the Lead Opinion applies upends our federally focused qualified-immunity standard, by erroneously grafting onto it an antecedent state-law inquiry that becomes 'always relevant and often dispositive of a[n] [official's] federal right to qualified immunity.'. . Like my colleagues, I would reverse the district court's summary-judgment order—hence, my concurrence in the result. But my reason is more fundamental: the district court should never have applied a scope-of-authority exception in the first place. I would remand for the district court to address DA Gallegos's entitlement to qualified immunity under the established two-pronged qualified-immunity decisional framework. . . .Plaintiff-Appellee argued that an official's 'fail[ure] to comply with a clear state regulation,' 'although not itself the basis of suit, should deprive the official of qualified immunity from damages for violation of other statutory or constitutional provisions.'. . In effect, Plaintiff-Appellee contended that, 'because officials fairly may be expected to conform their conduct to [the] legal norms,'. . . found in state statutes and regulations, their violation of a clear state statute or regulation should be dispositive 'in deciding claims of qualified immunity[.]'. . . Significantly for present purposes, the Davis Court rejected Plaintiff-Appellee's argument in full. It underscored that Harlow's objective-reasonableness inquiry makes an official's liability under § 1983 depend on whether he violated clearly established federal law. . . Thus, the Court flatly stated, "Officials sued for constitutional violations do not lose their qualified immunity merely because their conduct violates some [state] statutory or administrative provision.". . . The qualified immunity doctrine recognizes that officials can act without fear of harassing litigation only if they reasonably can anticipate when their conduct may give rise to liability for damages and only if unjustified lawsuits are quickly terminated. Yet, under appellee's submission, officials would be liable in an indeterminate amount for violation of any constitutional right—one that was not clearly defined or perhaps not even foreshadowed at the time of the alleged violation—merely because their official conduct also violated some statute or regulation. . . .In my view, Davis makes clear that the Lead Opinion's application of the scope-of-authority exception is wrong-headed. Akin to Plaintiff-Appellee in Davis, the Lead Opinion erroneously permits an additional 'circumstance [ ]' to inform the qualified-immunity calculus—viz., a threshold scope-of-authority exception—and makes it, in many instances, 'decisive of the qualified immunity question.'. . That is, if an official acts outside of his scope of authority, as defined by clearly established state law, he 'forfeits' his right to have a federal court in a § 1983 action consider the merits of his defense that his actions did not violate clearly established federal law. However, Davis leaves no doubt that this approach is erroneous: aside from Harlow's objective-reasonableness inquiry, '[n]o other "circumstances" are relevant to the issue of qualified immunity.'. . And officials do not "forfeit their immunity" defense simply because they are shown to have acted outside the scope of their authority under state law. . . .Rather than 'pause before adopting a doctrine of such uncertain scope that is so in tension with controlling Supreme Court authority,'. . . the Lead Opinion should reject the scope-of-authority exception outright and conclude not only that it is 'in tension with' that authority, but also contrary to it. In sum, under Harlow and Davis, an official should be granted qualified immunity so long as he 'did not violate clearly established federal constitutional or statutory rights[;] [n]othing else is required for entitlement to the defense and nothing else need be shown.'. . Despite this established decisional framework, the Lead Opinion suggests, through its application of a scope-of-authority exception, that there is a threshold condition that an official must satisfy before a federal court can even consider whether he has violated clearly established federal law. In my view, controlling Supreme Court precedent leaves no analytic space for such an antecedent condition. . . . Accordingly, I could reject on this basis alone the Lead Opinion's approach. . . But there is more. . . . [T]he Lead Opinion candidly acknowledges that its proposed exception has no footing in our controlling caselaw. . . And, in my view, we would be deviating without authority from our precedent—which endorses and applies the two-part qualified-immunity framework outlined supra—if we adopt this exception here. . . .I would explicitly reject this exception as contrary to Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit precedent. Like my colleagues, I would reverse the district court's judgment. However, I would do so, not because the court applied the scope-of-authority exception improperly, but instead because it applied the exception at all. I respectfully concur in the judgment only.")

Stanley v. Gallegos, 852 F.3d 1210, 1228 (10th Cir. 2017) (10th Cir. Mar. 17, 2017) (Matheson, J., concurring in the result) ("I concur in the result. I commend my colleagues on their thoughtful opinions. I agree we must remand for the district court to consider Mr. Gallegos's qualified immunity defense. Like Judge Hartz, I would defer deciding whether this court should adopt a scope-of-authority test for cases brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. But I also would leave the question open and not constrain the eventual content of a test this court may adopt later when it has the benefit of more robust briefing on this significant issue. Seven other circuits have adopted some version of the scope-of-authority test. . . In this case, the district court applied the test from In re Allen, 106 F.3d 582 (4th Cir. 1997): 'an official may claim qualified immunity as long as his actions are not clearly established to be beyond the boundaries of his discretionary authority.'. . We have not adopted the Allen test as circuit precedent, but both parties use it to make their arguments on appeal. Considering the parties' arguments based on the Allen test and without opining whether this court should adopt it, I think the district court erred. . . As Judge Hartz shows, New Mexico law did not clearly establish Mr. Gallegos's actions exceeded his authority as district attorney. We must therefore remand for the district court to consider the qualified immunity issue.")

See also Cummings v. Dean, 913 F.3d 1227, 1241-42 (10th Cir. 2019) ("We agree with Director Dean that his duty to publish prevailing rates involved substantial discretion as that term applies in the federal qualified-immunity context, and that he therefore may avail himself of the qualified-immunity defense. Director Dean's implementation of the Act required him to interpret the language of a state statute. And although the New Mexico Supreme Court eventually held that Defendants' interpretation was contrary to the 2009 Amendments, . . interpretation of state law is exactly the kind of discretionary function for which the qualified-immunity defense against federal liability applies. . . . We therefore apply a federal standard to determine whether Director Dean's obligations were sufficiently discretionary to warrant the protections of the qualified-immunity defense under federal law, and we conclude that the United States Supreme Court's language in Davis compels our conclusion that such protections are available here.")

F. "Extraordinary Circumstances"

In Harlow, the Court indicated that there may be some cases where, although the law was clearly established, "if the official pleading the defense claims extraordinary circumstances and can prove that he neither knew nor should have known of the relevant legal standard, the defense should be sustained." 457 U.S. at 819. This "extraordinary circumstances" exception is applied rarely and generally in the situation where the defendant official has relied on advice of counsel or on a statute, ordinance or regulation that is presumptively constitutional.

1. Reliance on Advice of Counsel

See Messerschmidt v. Millender, 132 S. Ct. 1235, 1249, 1250 (2012) ("[B]y holding in Malley that a magistrate's approval does not automatically render an officer's conduct reasonable, we did not suggest that approval by a magistrate or review by others is irrelevant to the objective reasonableness of the officers' determination that the warrant was valid. . . . The fact that the officers secured these approvals is certainly pertinent in assessing whether they could have held a reasonable belief that the warrant was supported by probable cause.")

Compare Sims v. Labowitz, 885 F.3d 254, 260, 262-65 (4th Cir. 2018) ("Although we may consider either prong of the qualified immunity inquiry first, we begin by examining the constitutional right advanced by Sims. See Estate of Armstrong ex rel. Armstrong v. Village of Pinehurst, 810 F.3d 892, 898-99 (4th Cir. 2016). This approach is beneficial here because our inquiry addresses 'questions that do not frequently arise' and, therefore, 'promotes the development of constitutional precedent.'. . .[W]e hold that Sims sufficiently alleged a violation of his Fourth Amendment right to be free from the sexually invasive search of his person. . . .We therefore turn to consider the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, namely, whether Abbott should have known that his combined acts of (1) seeking to obtain a photograph of Sims' erect penis, and (2) demanding that Sims masturbate in the presence of others to achieve an erection, was unlawful under clear precedent at the time the search occurred. . . . Because there was no justification for the alleged search to photograph Sims' erect penis and the order that he masturbate in the presence of others, we conclude that well-established Fourth Amendment limitations on sexually invasive searches adequately would have placed any reasonable officer on notice that such police action was unlawful. . . Thus, the alleged conduct plainly did not qualify as the type of 'bad guesses in gray areas' that qualified immunity is designed to protect. . . We further observe that the Administrator is not entitled to invoke qualified immunity simply because no other court decisions directly have addressed circumstances like those presented here. . . For good reason, most outrageous cases of constitutional violations rarely are litigated. . . Abbott's conduct affronted the basic protections of the Fourth Amendment, which at its core protects personal privacy and dignity against unjustified intrusion by governmental actors. . . .Our conclusion is not altered by the Administrator's insistence that Abbott's conduct was not unlawful because he first obtained a warrant to take a photograph of Sims' erect penis. As a general matter, search warrants provide officers a 'shield of immunity' with respect to challenged searches because a neutral magistrate has considered whether the warrant is supported by probable cause and justifies the intrusion into an individual's privacy. . . But the fact that a search warrant has been obtained 'do[es] not confer immunity if it was objectively unreasonable' for the officer to rely on the warrant. . . Here, the obvious, unconstitutional invasion of Sims' right of privacy that was required to carry out the warrant rendered reliance on that warrant objectively unreasonable, thereby eliminating the protection that a search warrant typically would have afforded an executing officer. . . For these reasons, we conclude that the district court erred in dismissing Sims' Section 1983 Fourth Amendment claim on the ground of qualified immunity.") with Sims v. Labowitz, 885 F.3d 254, 265, 268-70 (4th Cir. 2018) (King, J., dissenting) ("I write separately to dissent from the majority's denial of Detective Abbott's qualified immunity claim. With great respect for my good colleagues, their decision fails to recognize the controlling facts that undermine the § 1983 claim of plaintiff Sims. That is, Detective Abbott was acting pursuant to the advice of counsel and adhering to a court order. In my view, Abbott's actions were entirely consistent with applicable law and the Fourth Amendment. . . .Put succinctly, where a police officer has sought and obtained a search warrant and acted within its scope, the resulting search is presumptively reasonable. In this situation, the safeguards guaranteed by the Fourth Amendment were carefully observed—i.e., the search of Sims was conducted pursuant to a search warrant issued by the neutral magistrate, and it was supported by probable cause. . . This was therefore a warranted search, carried out under the law of Virginia and in compliance with Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. Because Abbott obtained a search warrant and acted within its scope, his search of Sims is presumptively reasonable. . . Therefore, the § 1983 claim alleged by Sims plainly fails the first prong of Saucier, that is, no constitutional right was contravened in these circumstances. . . .If Detective Abbott somehow contravened a Fourth Amendment right (as the majority rules today), the § 1983 claim alleged by Sims would nevertheless fail under Saucier's clearly established prong, which requires an assessment of 'whether the constitutional violation was of a clearly established right.'. .The majority's ruling—that any reasonable law enforcement officer would have recognized that the search warrant violated a clearly established constitutional right—is not supported by any precedent, much less the compelling precedent that would 'have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' . . This lack of precedent fails to even create a 'gray area' that would require a reasonable police officer to make a close call. . . Addressing the merits of Saucier's clearly established prong, I agree with the district court that Abbott's conduct did 'not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . As we have recognized heretofore, 'there is simply no basis for a rule that would require law enforcement officers to take issue with or second-guess the considered judgments of prosecutors and magistrates.'. . Put simply, the search warrant at issue here was properly and legally issued, it was complied with, and Detective Abbott is entitled to qualified immunity.") Compare Kiesling v. Holladay, 859 F.3d 529, 534-37 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Whether or not the existence of probable cause for one item in a warrant is sufficient to immunize defects as to all of the other items, we conclude that Spurlock retains the shield of immunity conferred by the warrant because it was not entirely unreasonable for him to believe that his affidavit established sufficient probable cause for the search and seizure of the items included in the warrant. As an initial matter, it is important to emphasize that the relevant inquiry in cases such as this is not whether a warrant application was, in fact, sufficient to establish probable cause of criminal activity. Rather, when a search or seizure is conducted pursuant to a duly issued warrant, we must determine whether it was 'entirely unreasonable' for an officer to believe that the warrant application established probable cause. . . . On the record before us, we hold that it was not entirely unreasonable for Spurlock to believe that his affidavit established sufficient probable cause for the search and seizure of the items included in the warrant. . . . The dissent contends that there is 'no plausible connection' between the misdemeanor offense of keeping a deer as a pet and the items described in numbers five and six of the warrant. . . As an initial matter, the dissent appears to require actual probable cause and ignores Messerschmidt's more lenient 'entirely unreasonable' standard. Regardless, we do not agree that the inclusion of these items rendered Spurlock's reliance on the warrant entirely unreasonable. First, the inclusion of digital storage devices does not defeat immunity because there was a fair probability that officers would find digitally stored pictures of the deer or records of its purchase or the purchase of food, pens, or other related items. At the very least, it would not be entirely unreasonable for Spurlock to reach this conclusion, and Messerschmidt explicitly approved of the seizure of evidence that helps establish possession of items related to the crimes specified in a warrant application. . . As for the evidence of other instrumentalities of criminal activity, we agree with the dissent that the warrant affidavit likely fails to establish probable cause due to its limited focus on AGFC Code § 9.14. However, it would not be 'entirely unreasonable' for Spurlock to conclude that suspects keeping a live deer in their home also may be engaging in wildlife trafficking, which would constitute a violation of AGFC Code § 9.07. . . Relying on this inference, a reasonable officer could conclude that money, guns, and other such evidence would be relevant for a future prosecution in the same way that similar instrumentality evidence was justified in Messerschmidt. . . . In sum, although we are inclined to think that the affidavit contained sufficient indicia of probable cause to support the seizure of most of the items in the warrant, at a minimum, this is not the rare case where a warrant affidavit is 'so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence entirely unreasonable.' . . As such, the district court erred in determining that Spurlock was not entitled to qualified immunity.") with Kiesling v. Holladay, 859 F.3d 529, 537 (8th Cir. 2017) (Gritzner, District Judge, dissenting) ("Because I hold the view that the warrant was clearly overbroad, and the District Court properly declined to recognize the protection of qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent. I would find the warrant that Spurlock executed was so obviously overbroad in relation to the criminal act at issue that any reasonable officer would have known there was no probable cause for the scope of the warrant. . . Put simply, no reasonable officer could conclude that a search and seizure of digital storage devices, firearms, or monies would bear any plausible connection to a misdemeanor regulatory infraction of housing a deer as a pet. As it stands, the majority opinion could potentially permit overbroad, and thus unconstitutional, warrants so long as some portion of the warrant is supported by probable cause, substantially weakening the Fourth Amendment's protections against general searches.")

Compare Smith v. Munday, 848 F.3d 248, 254-56 (4th Cir. 2017) ("In short, Munday had no evidence about Smith's conduct, let alone whether she was a participant in, connected to, or even physically present near the drug sale in question. His only information about Smith was that she had previously been convicted for selling drugs years past, that she was a black woman, and that she was 'near' the site of the drug sale because her home address was eleven miles away. If this amount of evidence were sufficient for probable cause, then officers would have probable cause to obtain arrest warrants for any local residents who fit the generic description of the day--be it 'black woman,' 'black man,' or otherwise--so long as they had a criminal history and an

unfortunately common name. Such scant evidence barely meets the threshold of 'mere suspicion,' let alone the threshold of probable cause. An investigating officer need not 'exhaust[ ] every potential avenue of investigation.' . . But an investigating officer must still conduct some sort of investigation and assemble individualized facts that link the suspect to the crime. . . .A magistrate judge's approval of the arrest warrant does not alter this conclusion. We generally accord great deference to a magistrate judge's determination of probable cause, but that deference is not 'boundless.' . . . Here, the evidence placing Smith at the crime is so scant--indeed, it is nonexistent--that deferring to the magistrate judge would be inappropriate. Munday's application for an arrest warrant lacked probable cause and thus violated Smith's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Having found that no probable cause existed for the warrant, the next question is whether Munday is entitled to qualified immunity. 'Where the alleged Fourth Amendment violation involves a search or seizure pursuant to a warrant, the fact that a neutral magistrate has issued a warrant is the clearest indication that the officers acted in an objectively reasonable manner, or in "objective good faith."'. . But there is an exception to this general rule. Qualified immunity does not apply 'where the warrant application is so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence unreasonable.'. . .A warrant is so deficient in indicia of probable cause when it has an 'error that is apparent from a "simple glance" at the face of the warrant itself, not a defect that would "become apparent only upon a close parsing of the warrant application."'. . And here, even a glance shows that Munday was unreasonable if he believed he had probable cause. Smith did have a criminal history for possessing and selling cocaine. But as discussed above, Munday had no evidence about her conduct whatsoever, let alone any evidence connecting her to the crime in question. It would be unreasonable for any officer to view Munday's dearth of evidence as sufficient to establish probable cause. As a result, qualified immunity does not apply.") with Smith v. Munday, 848 F.3d 248, 261-62 (4th Cir. 2017) ("In a Fourth Amendment seizure case, 'the fact that a neutral magistrate has issued a warrant is the clearest indication that the officers acted in an objectively reasonable manner.'. . The magistrate's decision will be insufficient to show objective reasonableness only when 'it is obvious that no reasonably competent officer would have concluded that a warrant should issue,' such as 'where the warrant was based on an affidavit so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence entirely unreasonable.'. . The Supreme Court has recognized that 'the threshold for establishing this exception is a high one.'. . .While the majority finds probable cause totally lacking, it has cited to no case with circumstances similar to this one in which the Court found a complete dearth of probable cause. Thus, it is baffling how the majority can now find that Munday had 'fair warning that his alleged conduct was unconstitutional.'. . Munday's 'judgment that the scope of the warrant was supported by probable cause may have been mistaken, but it was not plainly incompetent.'. . Nor did the magistrate in this case 'so obviously err[ ] that any reasonable officer would have recognized the error.'. . The majority opinion leaves no room for the 'reasonable error' inherent in the qualified immunity analysis –- particularly where, as here, the officer obtained a warrant from a neutral magistrate -- and is not consonant with our qualified immunity jurisprudence, which does not support this type of de novo hindsight. Its overzealous use of retroactive perfection chills the effective operation of law enforcement officers, 'impair[ing] their ability to protect the public,'. .

. and causing 'overdeterrence of energetic law enforcement by subjecting governmental actors to a high risk of liability,' Rowland v. Perry, 41 F.3d 167, 172 (4th Cir. 1994).")

Compare Burgan v. Nixon, 711 F. App'x 855, ___ (9th Cir. 2017) ("We do not think that 'every reasonable official' would have understood that he was violating the Fourth, Fifth, or Fourteenth Amendments by issuing a trespass citation to Mr. Burgan under the circumstances of this case. Even assuming that the Burgans' easement was clearly established in August 2013, whether Mr. Burgan had exceeded the scope of that easement remained murky. . . . Additionally, Mr. Rieger and Mr. Nixon had been informed that the property dispute between the Burgans and their neighbor was escalating, that Mr. Burgan had cut the lock on his neighbor's gate, and that there was going to be 'trouble.' Both Mr. Burgan and the neighbor had called on Mr. Nixon and Mr. Rieger for help managing the dispute. Rather than attempting to resolve the legal questions himself, Mr. Rieger consulted with Mr. Nixon and relied on his legal advice in deciding to issue the trespass citation. Officers are entitled to rely on such legal advice, and 'while it will not automatically insulate an officer from liability, "it goes far to establish qualified immunity."') with Burgan v. Nixon, 711 F. App'x 855, ___ (9th Cir. 2017) (Wardlaw, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Unlike my colleagues, I believe that—at the very least—it is clearly established that a law enforcement officer violates due process when he intervenes to settle a private property dispute by threatening to arrest one of the disputing parties. . . On this motion to dismiss, taking the allegations in the complaint as true and construing them in the light most favorable to the Burgans, Nixon and Rieger violated that clearly established right. Their actions were not, as the majority suggests, a neutral preservation of the status quo. Indeed, the status quo was one in which Burgan had a prescriptive right to cross his neighbor's land—as Nixon and Rieger should have been aware. The officials' intervention deprived Burgan of that right, effectively ousting him from his easement for eighteen months. By taking it upon themselves to adjudicate Burgan's property rights in their 'curbside courtroom,'. . . Nixon and Rieger violated Burgan's clearly established due process rights. . . .In the end, a reasonable officer in Nixon and Rieger's shoes—that is, in possession of notarized affidavits from multiple disinterested and knowledgeable third parties stating that Burgan held a prescriptive easement across Brien's property—would have known that it was unlawful to charge Burgan with criminal trespass and threaten him with arrest for using that easement. I would affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity, at least with regard to the procedural due process claim. Therefore, I respectfully dissent.").

See also Morency v. City of Allentown, No. 20-3469, 2021 WL 3719220, at *5 (3d Cir. Aug. 23, 2021) (not reported) ("Under our precedent, a police officer who reasonably 'relies in good faith on a prosecutor's legal opinion that [an] arrest is warranted under the law is presumptively entitled to qualified immunity from Fourth Amendment claims premised on a lack of probable cause.'. .Here, the officers consulted with an assistant district attorney before either arresting Michael, or searching his home, and therefore are entitled to qualified immunity. As to the claims for false arrest, false imprisonment, and malicious prosecution, Officer Blood sought the advice of ADA Markovits to determine for what charges probable cause existed. She approved the filing of the three charges against Michael. As Officer Blood acted reasonably in relying on her determination that there was probable cause to charge Michael, Officer Blood is entitled to qualified immunity on those claims. . . Additionally, on the claim that the search of the Morencys' home was unlawful, Officer Diehl testified that he spoke to an assistant district attorney before going to the home, who told him that if there was an adult present who consented to the search, the officers could lawfully search for firearms at the judge's request. Again, as Officers Blood and Diehl reasonably relied on this advice, we agree that they are entitled to qualified immunity."); Shrewsbury v. Williams, 844 F. App'x 647, ___ (4th Cir. 2021) ("Here, in seeking the arrest warrants for Plaintiffs, Williams not only relied on evidence from his investigation, but also on advice from the commonwealth's attorney and findings of probable cause by a neutral magistrate. The commonwealth's attorney's authorization to apply for a warrant 'does not automatically cloak [Williams] with the shield of qualified immunity. However, this authorization—by the elected chief law enforcement officer of [the] County—is compelling evidence and should appropriately be taken into account in assessing the reasonableness of [Williams'] actions.'. . Therefore, we conclude that Williams was objectively reasonable in seeking the arrest warrants against McKinney and Shrewsbury, and that the district court did not err in finding that Williams was entitled to qualified immunity on the § 1983 malicious prosecution claims."); Stefani v. City of Grovetown, 780 F. App'x 842, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("The 'clearest indication' that the defendants 'acted in an objectively reasonable manner' is the fact that a neutral magistrate issued the arrest warrants. . . .While the warrants alone do not immunize Jones and Nalley, they are entitled to qualified immunity unless 'it is obvious that no reasonably competent officer would have concluded that a warrant should issue.'. . The 'threshold for establishing this exception is a high one' because it is the magistrate's job to determine whether the officer's allegations establish probable cause to issue a warrant. . . .In sum, Jones and Nalley are entitled to qualified immunity on Stefani's § 1983 claim of malicious prosecution because a reasonable officer in their position could have believed that probable cause supported the arrest."); Young v. Mercer County Comm'n, 849 F.3d 728, 735-36 (8th Cir. 2017) ("The district court properly found that the Commissioners are entitled to qualified immunity as to their request that the state attorney general review the legality of the Agreement. . . .The Youngs' argument on this point focuses on their broad contention that 'the right to criticize elected officials and seek redress of grievance[s] was clearly established well before the events giving rise to the Youngs' retaliation claim.'. . The problem with this argument is the same one the Supreme Court confronted in Reichle where the respondent argued that 'cases have settled the rule that, as a general matter[,] the First Amendment prohibits government officials from subjecting an individual to retaliatory actions for his speech.'. . Here, as in Reichle, 'the right allegedly violated must be established, not as a broad general proposition, but in a particularized sense so that the contours of the right are clear to a reasonable official.'. . Therefore, the Youngs need to establish that on March 31, 2014, when the Commissioners wrote the letter to the state attorney general to request the investigation, they would have understood that the request violated the Youngs' constitutional rights. . . However, no authority has been presented for the proposition that legislators, informed by independent counsel that an agreement may be legally unsound and advised by that counsel to ask the attorney general to investigate the matter, may not follow that advice. . . The district court correctly determined that the Commissioners were entitled to qualified immunity for this action."); Barboza v. D'Agata, 676 F. App'x 9, 12-15 (2d Cir. 2017) ("This case is not 'on all fours' with Mangano, as the district court concluded. . . Barboza did not transmit his offensive communication through a channel 'set up for the purpose ... of receiving complaints from the public.' Rather, he wrote his profane message on a government form the principal purpose of which was to transmit payment for a traffic offense to which he had already pleaded guilty. The recipients of his invective were employees charged with the clerical processing of such payments, not with receiving public complaints. This is not to conclude that such communications are not entitled to constitutional protection from § 240.30(1) prosecution. We observe only that neither Mangano nor any other case clearly established such a First Amendment right at the time of the events at issue. . . .On the totality of these circumstances, we cannot conclude that no reasonable officer in the position of defendants D'Agata and Gorr could have believed that Barboza could be arrested for aggravated harassment without violating the First Amendment. As already explained, precedent did not clearly establish the unconstitutional facial vagueness of § 240.30(1) until 2014. Rather, at the time at issue, New York's Court of Appeals had recognized both permissible and impermissible applications of the statute. Thus, existing precedent did not yet place the question of § 240.30(1)'s constitutional application to the circumstances of this case beyond debate. Further, an assistant district attorney, after discussing the matter with the district attorney, advised the officers that Barboza's communication was threatening and warranted a § 240.30(1) charge (and, indeed, directed its filing). That conclusion was reinforced by the actions of two judges, one of whom, after reviewing the charging information, advised Barboza that he was about to be arrested, and the second of whom, upon similar review, arraigned and detained Barboza on the charge. An officer is not automatically entitled to qualified immunity simply because prosecutors or magistrates approve a challenged arrest; he can still be subject to suit if 'it is obvious that no reasonably competent officer would have concluded' that a lawful arrest could be made. Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. at 341. But the threshold for reaching that conclusion 'is a high one' that is not easily satisfied where a challenged charging instrument is approved by both a prosecutor and magistrates. Messerschmidt v. Millender, 132 S. Ct. at 1245. The error here—a matter of constitutional law—was not one officers could be expected to identify at 'a simple glance.'. . In these circumstances, '[t]he fact that none of the officials who reviewed [a charging instrument] expressed concern about its validity demonstrates that any error was not obvious.' Messerschmidt v. Millender, 132 S. Ct. at 1250. Accordingly, we conclude that the defendant police officers are entitled to qualified immunity, not because—as the district court ruled—the First Amendment right violated was clearly established but the officers' conduct was nevertheless objectively reasonable, but rather because a First Amendment right to engage in the charged conduct in the circumstances of this case was not yet clearly established so that no reasonable officer could have thought (even if mistakenly) that Barboza could lawfully be arrested for aggravated harassment in violation of N.Y. Penal Law § 240.30(1)."); Belsito Communications, Inc. v. Decker, 845 F.3d 13, 24 (1st Cir. 2016) ("One more important qualified-immunity nugget to keep in mind as we go forward: if an officer consulted with a prosecutor about 'the legality of an intended action' — disclosing known info pertinent to that analysis — then his 'reliance on emergent advice might be relevant ... to the reasonableness of his later conduct' and so 'may help to establish qualified immunity.'. . As a policy matter, 'it makes eminently good sense, when time and circumstances permit, to encourage officers to obtain an informed opinion before charging ahead.'. . But we have cautioned that consultation with 'a friendly prosecutor does not automatically guarantee that qualified immunity will follow' and that 'the officer's reliance on the prosecutor's advice' must be 'objectively reasonable' — i.e., '[r]eliance' will not forestall liability 'if an objectively reasonable officer would have cause to believe that the prosecutor's advice was flawed, off point, or otherwise untrustworthy.'"); Hinshaw v. Moore, 666 F. App'x 565, 568 (8th Cir. 2016) ("The conclusion that qualified immunity protects Borders' conduct is supported by the fact that he consulted the county prosecutor prior to arresting Hinshaw. 'Although following an attorney's advice does not automatically cloak [officers] with qualified immunity, it can show the reasonableness of the action taken.'. . Here, Borders followed the county prosecutor's advice that he could charge Hinshaw with false imprisonment and peace disturbance if Hinshaw refused to move the tractor. We thus conclude that Borders arguably had probable cause to arrest Hinshaw for false imprisonment and peace disturbance."); Graham v. Gagnon, 831 F.3d 176, 182-83 (4th Cir. 2016) ("The right at issue here is not the general right to be free from arrest without probable cause, but rather the right to be free from arrest under the particular circumstances of the case. . . The appellee officers lose the shield of qualified immunity if it would have been clear to reasonable officers in their position that they lacked probable cause to arrest Graham for violating Virginia's obstruction of justice statute. . . In other words, the officers' immunity turns on the 'objective legal reasonableness' of their conclusion that there was probable cause to arrest Graham. . . Graham argues that it was objectively unreasonable for Gagnon and Clipp to conclude there was probable cause to arrest her. Therefore, Graham argues, the district court erred in holding that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. We agree. . . Before evaluating the reasonableness of the officers' probable cause determination, we first clarify the effect of the arrest warrant. The officers make much of the fact that Gagnon obtained—at least the second time he asked—an arrest warrant from a neutral magistrate. However, an arresting officer is not automatically immunized from suit merely because the officer successfully requested an arrest warrant first. . . .Consistent with Malley and Messerschmidt, we have repeatedly held that arrest warrants do not confer immunity if it was objectively unreasonable to conclude there was probable cause for the arrest. . . Accordingly, if the officers' decision to request a warrant for Graham's arrest was outside the range of professional competence expected of an officer—that is, if it was objectively unreasonable to conclude there was probable cause that Graham violated Virginia's obstruction statute—then the officers are not immune from suit."); Sampson v. Gee-Cram, 655 F. App'x 383, 389 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Plaintiffs cannot point to any defect in the financial warrants that was 'glaring' in a way comparable to the defect at issue in Groh. Rather, the facts of this case more closely approximate those of Messerschmidt, in which potential defects in the warrant 'would have become apparent only upon a close parsing of the warrant application.'. . Thus, we disagree with Plaintiffs that the district court misapplied Messerschmidt, and we affirm the court's grant of summary judgment to Cram and Rose as to Count I."); Burritt v. Ditlefsen, 807 F.3d 239, 251 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Further bolstering Ditlefsen's qualified immunity is the fact that she consulted with the Polk County District Attorney and her supervisor before arresting Burritt. In Fleming, we explained that the fact that the officer had consulted with the District Attorney prior to arresting the plaintiff-arrestee

'goes a long way toward solidifying his qualified immunity defense.'. . Prior to Burritt's arrest, Ditlefsen met with the Polk County District Attorney, Steffen, multiple times to keep him advised of developments in the investigation. When Ditlefsen believed she had probable cause to arrest Burritt, legal counsel (Steffen) and her supervisor (Smith) vetted her determination. When it came time to arrest Burritt, Steffen made the decision to arrest and told Ditlefsen to take Burritt into custody. Steffen independently determined that probable cause existed. Also, Ditlefsen's supervisor, Smith, believed probable cause supported the arrest. We find Ditlefsen was reasonable in her belief that she had probable cause to arrest Burritt. Further, Ditlefsen was objectively reasonable in her reliance on Steffen's probable cause determination and instructions to effect the arrest. Because Ditlefsen is entitled to qualified immunity, the district court did not err in granting her motion for summary judgment on Burritt's § 1983 claims."); Zimmerman v. Doran, 807 F.3d 178, 183 (7th Cir. 2015) ("It is undisputed that Zimmerman received notice to depart the property, both from the owner in the cease and desist letter and in texts, and from the officers relaying the information to him directly. He chose to remain on the property against the owner's wishes and therefore falls within the plain language of the criminal statute. Moreover, before arresting Zimmerman, the defendants attempted to sort out the relative legal rights, including contacting the state's attorney for advice as to whether the actions constituted criminal trespass. We have held that ' "[c]onsulting a prosecutor may not give an officer absolute immunity from being sued for false arrest, but it goes far to establish qualified immunity. Otherwise the incentive for officers to consult prosecutors—a valuable screen against false arrest—would be greatly diminished."'. . . Zimmerman's claim that no reasonable officer could believe that there was probable cause to believe he was trespassing is based on his theory that the timber deed rendered him the 'owner' of the property. He further faults the defendants for failing to read the timber deed which he asserts would have established his right to remain on the property. Zimmerman, however, provides no caselaw that would have indicated to the defendants that a timber deed granted such rights to the recipient. The timber deed itself transfers to him only ownership of the specified timber and grants a right of access to harvest the timber. It does not provide that the right of access is unbounded and cannot be restricted in time or manner by the property owner."); Stonecipher v. Valles, 759 F.3d 1134, 1144, 1145 (10th Cir. 2014) ("Where the law is technical and obscure, seeking the advice of a legally trained individual may be required. But in this case, the nuances of Missouri law in combination with the facts and federal law were not so obvious that Valles acted recklessly in failing to recognize their operation. To the contrary, Valles proceeded reasonably by securing the legal opinion of the AUSA when the law was unclear to him. The Stoneciphers argue that several aspects of the materials Valles reviewed should have put him on further notice that Mr. Stonecipher was not convicted for purposes of § 922(g)(9). . . . In sum, the amount of conflicting information in the documents reviewed by Valles indicates that Valles may have been, at most, negligent in the course of his investigation. But his effort to secure the second opinion of AUSA Jennings further undercuts any notion that Valles acted recklessly. The Supreme Court's holding in Messerschmidt is instructive. . . . Here, Valles did not simply tell Jennings that Mr. Stonecipher had a conviction on his record; he provided Jennings with all of the materials he used to reach that conclusion. Indeed, the potential for a technical, legal mistake in the probable cause determination is precisely why Valles would seek out a legal expert. Valles did not act in reckless disregard for the truth when he not only sought legal advice from an AUSA, but also provided the AUSA with all the materials he used to make his assessment. . .Based on the totality of the circumstances, Valles proceeded in an objectively reasonable manner based on arguable probable cause. The district court correctly granted summary judgment in his favor on qualified immunity grounds with respect to the claims for unlawful search and entry."); Snider v. City of Cape Girardeau, 752 F.3d 1149, 1156, 1157 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Beginning in 1974, with Spence, and culminating in 1989 and 1990, with Texas v. Johnson and Eichman, the Supreme Court clearly established the First Amendment prohibits the prosecution of an individual for using the American flag to express an opinion. This right had been clearly established for twenty years when Officer Peters arrested Snider on October 24, 2009, and, thus, a reasonably competent officer would have known Snider's expressive conduct was constitutionally protected. In response, Officer Peters argues his conduct should be insulated because he acted pursuant to an arrest warrant issued by a local magistrate judge, and he cites the Supreme Court's recent decision in Messerschmidt v. Millender, ––U.S. ––, 132 S.Ct. 1235, 182 L.Ed.2d 47 (2012). In Messerschmidt, the Court granted qualified immunity to officers who had executed a search warrant unsupported by probable cause, holding that 'the fact that a neutral magistrate has issued a warrant is the clearest indication that the officers acted in an objectively reasonable manner[.]'. . . However, the Court noted 'the fact that a neutral magistrate has issued a warrant authorizing the allegedly unconstitutional search or seizure does not end the inquiry into objective reasonableness.'. .The Messerschmidt court also affirmed the survival of the standard set forth in Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. 335, 106 S.Ct. 1092, 89 L.Ed.2d 271 (1986), which held there would be no grant of qualified immunity if 'it is obvious that no reasonably competent officer would have concluded that a warrant should issue.'. . We have also noted the survival of the Malley standard post-Messerschmidt. . . This outcome is a sensible one as both the Supreme Court and this Court have observed the fact that a warrant has issued should not be dispositive because 'it is possible that a magistrate, working under docket pressures, will fail to perform as a magistrate should.'. .Officer Peters' actions are not insulated by the arrest warrant. This country has a long history of protecting expressive conduct on First Amendment grounds, especially when the American flag is the mode of expression. A reasonably competent officer in Officer Peters' position would have concluded no arrest warrant should issue for the expressive conduct engaged in by Snider. Although it is unfortunate and fairly inexplicable that the error was not corrected by the county prosecutor or the magistrate judge, no warrant should have been sought in the first place. Thus, the district court correctly concluded Officer Peters was not entitled to qualified immunity."); Armstrong v. Asselin, 734 F.3d 984, 990-94 (9th Cir. 2013) ("This is a civil lawsuit, primarily for money damages, against police officers for obtaining and executing search and arrest warrants. . . We need not determine whether Satan Burger is 'indecent' or 'obscene,' because that does not control whether Officer Asselin and his colleagues are entitled to qualified immunity. We assume without deciding, for purposes of this decision, that Satan Burger, taken as a whole, is not obscene or indecent, and that giving the book to a minor did not violate the Anchorage ordinance. This assumption, however, does not control the qualified immunity determination for two reasons. First, all that is needed for a search or arrest warrant is probable cause, not proof, that giving the material to a minor would amount to a violation of the Anchorage ordinance. . . The cover (portraying a bare buttocks squatting over a dinner plate) and the few pages support a reasonable belief by a police officer that the work as a whole portrayed excretory functions or sexual conduct in a manner establishing violation of the ordinance. Even if the book were, on a full reading, not indecent, it would be too much to say that no reasonable police officer could seek a search warrant directed at the premises of the person who gave it to a minor until the police officer had read every word of the book and evaluated its literary value as a whole. A police officer may be entitled to qualified immunity even for a search and arrest based on invalid warrants if he has a 'reasonable belief that the warrant was supported by probable cause.'. .That low standard might be satisfied without reading the book in its entirety, even though the obscenity and municipal indecency standards would not be satisfied for purposes of a criminal conviction. . . .Second, and most important to the outcome of this case, the police officers subjected every step of their invasions of Armstrong's privacy to evaluation both by prosecutors and by neutral judicial officials before they acted. Such prior review of proposed searches and arrests supports qualified immunity, shielding police officers from liability under the line of cases reaffirmed and broadened most recently by Messerschmidt v. Millender. . . .Under Messerschmidt, consulting with and getting approval of one's superiors and of a judicial officer operates for an individual police officer something like liability insurance, though, like liability insurance, there are exceptions and exclusions to protection. One such exception occurs when 'it is obvious that no reasonably competent officer would have concluded that a warrant should issue.'. . The Court illustrates this 'obvious' standard by reference to a warrant that authorized the search of a house for a concealed two story house and to seize that house concealed within the house to be searched-an obvious error that would have been revealed by 'just a simple glance.'. . The Court uses the example to show that 'obvious' means error that is apparent from a 'simple glance' at the face of the warrant itself, not a defect that would 'become apparent only upon a close parsing of the warrant application.'. . Of course, such patent absurdity is not the only way the police officer can lose the shield of immunity. Leon establishes that another way the 'high' threshold for establishing an exception to immunity can be crossed is if the officer lied to the issuing magistrate . . . or if the issuing magistrate did not perform his neutral and detached function, serving instead as a mere 'rubber stamp for the police.'. . .Since Messerschmidt came down, we have identified 'rare' exceptions, at least in the context of motions to suppress in criminal cases. . . .Under Messerschmidt, approval by superiors, prosecutors, and a judge almost guarantees the honest police officer's claim to qualified immunity . . . Officers Asselin and Vandegriff consulted with six prosecutors and obtained warrants from five judicial officials. As Messerschmidt holds, we would have to treat all eleven prosecutors and judges as 'plainly incompetent' to deny Officer Asselin and the other officers qualified immunity. . . .Second, the officers in this case were not searching for or seizing Satan Burger. They already had the book. The affidavits focused upon the repeated contacts between an older man and underage boys despite parental requests that he leave their sons alone, his giving of gifts to the boys, his suggestion to a boy that he carry a weapon when he retrieved his gifts, and meeting with the boys in secret. The searches were for evidence of disseminating indecent material, stalking the boys, and eventually possession of child pornography, not for the book. The police officers, prosecutors, and judicial officials were not 'plainly incompetent' in concluding that there was a fair probability that the searches would turn up evidence of stalking and dissemination of indecent material to minors. The subsequent search and arrest warrants were supported by even greater evidence of probable cause, including pictures of the victims urinating, and the photograph of prepubescent boys performing fellatio. Those photographs did indeed provide a fair probability that the search would reveal evidence of possession of child pornography on Armstrong's computers, and thus Officer Vandegriff, the officer who applied for the last two warrants, is protected by qualified immunity."); Tebbens v. Mushol, 692 F.3d 807, 821 (7th Cir. 2012) ("[W]e have held that an officer who makes an arrest based on a reasonable understanding of a court order is entitled to qualified immunity."); Merchant v. Bauer, 677 F.3d 656, 662-66 & nn.6 & 7 (4th Cir. 2012) ("Bauer contends that an objectively reasonable officer could have believed that probable cause existed to arrest Dr. Merchant, and he maintains that the procedural steps that he took further justified his decision to seek an arrest warrant. . . . Dr. Merchant maintains that, although she was arrested on the basis of a warrant, it was not supported by probable cause and was therefore unreasonable. The issue of whether Merchant's arrest in Virginia for impersonating a police officer was reasonable or supported by probable cause is evaluated under an objective standard, based on what a prudent officer would have believed under the circumstances. . . .To his credit, Officer Bauer sought to corroborate his probable cause analysis by seeking advice from a deputy Commonwealth's Attorney and relying on the magistrate's evaluation of his warrant application. In Torchinsky v. Siwinski, we deemed it significant that the arresting officer had solicited an experienced supervisor's opinion that there was probable cause to arrest the plaintiffs, and that a magistrate had issued arrest warrants. . . . Nevertheless, Torchinsky is distinguishable because it involved a mistake of fact, i.e., an assault victim's misidentification of his attackers, rather than (as here) a mistake of law. . . . Relying on Wadkins, Bauer asserts that the district court erred by giving insufficient consideration to the procedural steps that he undertook before seeking an arrest warrant. . . . We do not discount that Officer Bauer sought assurances from the prosecutor prior to seeking an arrest warrant for Dr. Merchant. We do, however, agree with the district court's view of the matter: Bauer's conversation with the state's lawyer does not—as a matter of law—overcome the unreasonableness of the criminal charge and its lack of probable cause. . . . Bauer actually discovered information tending to exonerate Dr. Merchant but nevertheless pursued the charge against her. Moreover, that a magistrate issued an arrest warrant at Bauer's request is not determinative 'where the warrant application is so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence unreasonable.'. . Although Bauer's warrant application is not in the record, we assume, consistent with the constraints of summary judgment review, that it contained only the undisputed facts, which fail to show probable cause. Considering the totality of the circumstances, we conclude that no prudent person would have believed that Dr. Merchant violated the Impersonation Statute. It follows, then, that her arrest lacked probable cause and was unreasonable. Thus, Merchant's constitutional right not to be unreasonably seized was violated, and we must resolve the first Saucier inquiry in favor of Dr. Merchant. . . Having ascertained that Officer Bauer violated Dr. Merchant's Fourth Amendment right, we turn to whether that constitutional right was clearly established. . . .No reasonable police officer in Bauer's position could have believed that the Fourth Amendment permitted an arrest when no aspect of the Impersonation Statute had been established. . . . In ruling as we do today, we observe that the qualified immunity issue is not finally resolved against Bauer. As the district court explained in the Opinion, Bauer is entitled to reassert the defense at trial, pursuant to which the jury could resolve the disputed facts in his favor, such that qualified immunity applies. . . . On February 22, 2012, the Supreme Court decided Messerschmidt v. Millender. . . . Although the Court acknowledged that a magistrate's signature on a warrant is a clear indication of objective reasonableness, it nonetheless emphasized that a lawsuit can proceed when " 'it is obvious that no reasonably competent officer would have concluded that a warrant should issue." '. .Messerschmidt, therefore, does not control our decision today."); Fleming v. Livingston County, Ill. , 674 F.3d 874, 881 (7th Cir. 2012) ("We also note that Turner's act in calling state's attorney Carey Luckman goes a long way toward solidifying his qualified immunity defense. . . As we have stated before, '[c]onsulting a prosecutor may not give an officer absolute immunity from being sued for false arrest, but it goes far to establish qualified immunity. Otherwise the incentive for officers to consult prosecutors—a valuable screen against false arrest—would be greatly diminished.'. . Under these circumstances, Turner had arguable probable cause and was entitled to qualified immunity."); Cochran v. Gilliam, 656 F.3d 300, 309-11 (6th Cir. 2011) ("[A] law enforcement officer's phone call to a county or district attorney for general guidance when confronted with a situation where there is no legal basis for the contemplated actions does not automatically convert unreasonable actions into reasonable actions. . . . Defendants identify no extraordinary circumstance in this case, and we fail to find any. Nor do we find any merit in the attempt to factually distinguish Soldal from this case. The Gilliams argue that the landlord in Soldal did not have an eviction notice authorizing the removal of the trailer, while here the Landlords did have a valid eviction notice. However, a valid eviction notice in hand is not the operative fact. Both in Soldal and here, a deputy sheriff called a county attorney to ask whether to intervene. The deputy sheriff in Soldal was concerned because there was no eviction notice. Here, there was a valid eviction notice but the Gilliams were concerned with the confiscation of Cochran's personal property because the eviction notice made no provision for such a taking. Thus, while the deputies in Soldal oversaw an unlawful eviction, here the Gilliams facilitated an unlawful taking of Cochran's belongings. It is not reasonable for the Gilliams to oversee and personally assist the Landlords in taking possession of Cochran's belongings when there was no apparent legal basis for such action. In addition to their attempt to distinguish Soldal, the Gilliams argue that Kentucky state law supports their reasonable belief that the Landlords had a right to take Cochran's property, thereby absolving them of any constitutional wrongdoing. The Gilliams point to a Kentucky state statute that allows a landlord lien on a tenant's personal property to secure payment of rent. Ky.Rev.Stat. ("K.R.S") § 383.070. However, as the district court correctly noted, this section of the Kentucky code merely gives the landlord a lien on the personal property–the lien does not give a landlord carte blanche to take possession of the tenant's property without going through the proper judicial processes. See K.R.S. § 383.030. It is unclear to this Court how it could be construed as reasonable that two deputy sheriffs, knowing that the eviction notice was silent as to the amount owed to the landlord and the disposition of the tenant's personal property, could believe that a 'swat team' had the right to the tenant's worldly possessions. . . . Having established the Gilliams violated Cochran's Fourth Amendment rights, we consider the second prong of the Saucier analysis–whether the right at issue was 'clearly established' at the time of the Gilliams' conduct. The Gilliams argue that, even if there was a violation of Cochran's Fourth Amendment right based upon an unreasonable seizure of his personal property, there was no

'clearly established' decision or precedent on point that would have placed them on notice that their conduct could be construed as a constitutional violation. We disagree. The Gilliams argue for an overly narrow reading of the 'clearly established' standard, one in which it would appear no case would be sufficiently on point if the facts at issue were not identical. The Gilliams' reasoning is untenable in the larger view of qualified immunity determinations. . . . .Furthermore, this Court has employed a more reasonable, common sense approach to the 'clearly established' analysis, one that acknowledges that, while every situation will involve slightly different factual scenarios, they are not so different that courts and public officials cannot intuit the contours of the rights at issue. . . .This Court is satisfied that the Fourth Amendment violation was clearly established. . . .Accordingly, we reject the Gilliams' argument that their active involvement in assisting the Landlords in seizing Cochran's property was objectively reasonable in light of the legal rules that were 'clearly established' at the time. . . While the Gilliams' involvement may have begun as a civil standby to serve the eviction notice and simply keep the peace, their actions quickly turned into active participation in the seizure of Cochran's property–conduct explicitly foreclosed by the holding of Sodal, and in line with the reasoning from Coleman and Haverstick."); Kelly v. Borough Of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248, 251, 254-56, 258, 259 (3d Cir. 2010) ("The gravamen of Kelly's appeal-that the District Court erred when it held that Officer Rogers's reliance upon legal advice before he arrested Kelly shielded him from liability-raises a question of first impression in the Third Circuit. . . . Recognizing its discretion to do so under Pearson, the District Court bypassed the question of whether Kelly's constitutional rights were violated and first considered whether the law was clearly established. Although the District Court explicitly held that the First Amendment law was not clearly established, its analysis of the Fourth Amendment did not engage the relevant state court precedents interpreting the Wiretap Act. Instead, the District Court simply concluded that Officer Rogers acted reasonably under the circumstances. . . . Kelly claims Officer Rogers violated his clearly established Fourth Amendment rights by arresting him without probable cause. In challenging the District Court's conclusion that Officer Rogers acted reasonably, Kelly contends the District Court failed to analyze the Wiretap Act and inappropriately relied on the presence of legal advice. Conversely, Officer Rogers argues that reliance on a prosecutor's advice is a permissible consideration in determining the reasonableness of his actions, and that the District Court correctly held his reliance was reasonable. . . . Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has squarely addressed the question of whether a police officer's reliance upon legal advice cloaks him with qualified immunity. Although there is no holding directly on point, we do not write on a blank slate. . . . Like the Supreme Court in Malley, we reject the notion that a police officer's decision to contact a prosecutor for legal advice is per se objectively reasonable. Nevertheless, we recognize the virtue in encouraging police, when in doubt, to seek the advice of counsel. Considering the proliferation of laws and their relative complexity in the context of a rapidly changing world, we cannot fairly require police officers in the field to be as conversant in the law as lawyers and judges who have the benefit not only of formal legal training, but also the advantage of deliberate study. Consistent with these principles, the First Circuit has stated that advice obtained from a prosecutor prior to making an arrest 'should be factored into the totality of the circumstances and considered in determining the officer's entitlement to qualified immunity.' Cox v. Hainey, 391 F.3d 25, 34 (1st Cir.2004) (collecting cases from other circuits) . . . . Although we agree with much of the First

Circuit's opinion in Cox, we do not adopt its 'totality of the circumstances' approach. In our view, encouraging police to seek legal advice serves such a salutary purpose as to constitute a 'thumb on the scale' in favor of qualified immunity. Accordingly, we hold that a police officer who relies in good faith on a prosecutor's legal opinion that the arrest is warranted under the law is presumptively entitled to qualified immunity from Fourth Amendment claims premised on a lack of probable cause. That reliance must itself be objectively reasonable, however, because 'a wave of the prosecutor's wand cannot magically transform an unreasonable probable cause determination into a reasonable one.' Id. at 34. Accordingly, a plaintiff may rebut this presumption by showing that, under all the factual and legal circumstances surrounding the arrest, a reasonable officer would not have relied on the prosecutor's advice. . . . In addition to its failure to make essential factual findings, the District Court did not analyze sufficiently the state of the law at the time of Kelly's arrest. . . Instead, the District Court relied upon the mere existence of legal advice without considering the relative clarity or obscurity of the Pennsylvania Wiretap Act and the cases interpreting it. This was error. . . .In light of the foregoing precedents, at the time of Kelly's arrest, it was clearly established that a reasonable expectation of privacy was a prerequisite for a Wiretap Act violation. Even more to the point, two Pennsylvania Supreme Court cases-one almost 20 years old at the time of Kelly's arrest-had held that covertly recording police officers was not a violation of the Act. Finally, it was also clearly established that police officers do not have a reasonable expectation of privacy when recording conversations with suspects. . . . In sum, because the District Court did not consider the facts in the light most favorable to Kelly, did not evaluate the objective reasonableness of Officer Rogers's decision to rely on ADA Birbeck's advice in light of those facts, and did not evaluate sufficiently the state of Pennsylvania law at the relevant time, we will vacate the summary judgment insofar as it granted qualified immunity to Officer Rogers on Kelly's Fourth Amendment claims and remand for additional factfinding and application of the proper legal standard.") [See also Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 815 F.Supp.2d 810, 814-20 (M.D. Pa. 2011) ("In its opinion remanding this matter, the Court of Appeals outlined three questions for this Court's consideration. The first two questions are questions of fact, namely: (1) whether Plaintiff hid the camera and was in fact 'secretly' recording Defendant during the stop; and (2) whether Defendant called ADA Birbeck to seek legal advice. . . The third question is a question of law. The Court of Appeals held that it was clearly established that probable cause did not exist to arrest Plaintiff for a violation of the Pennsylvania Wiretap Act. In light of this holding, the court of appeals asked this Court to determine 'how the Pennsylvania Wiretap Act fits into the landscape painted' by cases holding that police officers generally have a duty to know the basic elements of the laws they enforce. . . The Court interprets this directive as requiring it to determine whether Defendant's erroneous probable cause determination was unreasonable as a matter of law and therefore not entitled to qualified immunity. Because an affirmative response to the legal inquiry would obviate the need for any further findings of fact, the Court will consider this issue first. Then, if necessary, the Court will make the findings of fact ordered by the court of appeals. . . .In the present case, a finding that the Defendant is not, as a matter of law, entitled to qualified immunity solely because he made an erroneous probable cause determination regarding a statute that was clearly established would unfairly burden police officers and 'dampen the ardor of all but the most resolute, or the most irresponsible, in the unflinching discharge of their duties.'. .

Although the law in this matter was clearly established and showed that Defendant did not have probable cause to make an arrest, the Court cannot conclude that Defendant must be denied qualified immunity on this basis. . . . In the case at bar, the Court is bound to assume certain facts. First, it must assume that during the stop Plaintiff made an audio and visual recording of Defendant. Plaintiff did not request Defendant's permission to make the recording, nor did Plaintiff tell Defendant he was making the recording. Plaintiff, sitting in the passenger seat as Defendant was standing on the driver's side of the car, kept the camera in his lap the entire time Defendant was at the car. The Court must further assume, however, that although Plaintiff's hands were in his lap, his hands were not covering the camera. In addition, Defendant saw Plaintiff holding the camera measuring approximately two inches wide by four inches long by two inches tall at the outset of the stop and did not object to the recording until after issuing Shopp a traffic citation. Before arresting Plaintiff, Defendant confiscated the camera and called ADA Birbeck. Defendant informed ADA Birbeck that he had pulled over a truck for a traffic violation and that the passenger in the truck had been secretly recording him without his permission. Defendant did not inform ADA Birbeck that pursuant to standard Carlisle Police Department procedure he was also recording the stop. After relaying these facts, Defendant asked if the conduct gave rise to a Wiretap Act violation. After reviewing the statute, ADA Birbeck informed Defendant that there was probable cause for an arrest and gave Defendant an approval number to charge Plaintiff. As the Court previously explained, when viewed in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, these facts could give rise to the conclusion that Defendant deliberately misled ADA Birbeck when he called for permission to charge Plaintiff. If a jury concluded that Defendant misled ADA Birbeck to secure an approval to arrest, then the Court could not conclude that Defendant relied in good faith on ADA Birbeck's advice. . . Accordingly, although qualified immunity should be decided at the earliest possible stage in the litigation, . . the outstanding dispute of material fact prevents the Court from making the qualified immunity determination at summary judgment. . . This is not to say that Defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. Rather, the Court concludes that it requires a jury to resolve the outstanding questions of fact identified in this memorandum prior to making the qualified immunity determination.") and Kelly v. Rogers, No. 1:07–cv–1573, 2012 WL 2153796, *4, *5 (M.D. Pa. June 13, 2012) ("The Court acknowledges that there is a tension between the principle that officers should know the elements of the laws they enforce and a potential finding that reliance on erroneous advice from a prosecutor regarding the elements of an offense could be reasonable. As explained in its prior order, however, this Court must conclude that a police officer's reliance on erroneous advice could, under some very limited circumstances, be found reasonable. . . .The Court acknowledges the Third Circuit's holding that the elements of the Pennsylvania Wiretap Act were clearly established and that probable cause did not exist to arrest Plaintiff for a violation of the Wiretap Act. However, the Court is compelled to find that in this matter, based on the facts as determined by the jury, Defendant Rogers is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .As has been explained by the Third Circuit, the advice given by ADA Birbeck was contrary to clearly established law. . . The advice was, however, consistent with Defendant's training and plausible in the absence of a thorough review of the relevant case law and given the time limitations and obvious lack of available legal resources at a roadside traffic stop. . . .The facts of this case show that Defendant acted precisely as one would hope that a police officer would act when confronted with a violation of a statute with which he could not reasonably be expected to be familiar: He stopped, he sought out a legal authority, he made a good faith reasonable recitation of the facts to that authority, and he reasonably relied on the advice of that authority. In the face of these facts, the Court cannot find that any purpose would be served by holding Defendant liable for his conduct in effectuating the arrest. The Court finds that this is one of those rare situations where, in the words of the Second Circuit, 'the legal fiction [that public officials know the elements of the laws they enforce] does not make sense.'. . To hold Defendant liable would have little effect beyond 'dampen[ing] the ardor of all but the most resolute, or the most irresponsible, in the unflinching discharge of their duties.'")]; Stearns v. Clarkson, 615 F.3d 1278, 1284 (10th Cir. 2010) ("Under certain circumstances, we have recognized that an officer's receipt of a prosecutor's pre-arrest probable cause determination supports the officer's qualified immunity defense. . . We have never held, however, that an officer's receipt of a favorable probable cause determination from a prosecutor prior to making an arrest necessarily entitles the officer to qualified immunity. Rather, we agree with our sister circuits that the fact that an officer obtains a prosecutor's determination of probable cause prior to making an arrest is only one factor that is relevant to the qualified immunity analysis."); Ewing v. City of Stockton, 588 F.3d 1218, 1231 (9th Cir. 2009) ("The Ewings do not establish that the unlawfulness of charging Heather with murder on the facts in question was clearly established. . . Further, the officers were entitled to rely on the legal advice they obtained from [the prosecutor]. . . Many courts, including this one, have endorsed such consultation . . . and while it will not automatically insulate an officer from liability, 'it goes far to establish qualified immunity.'. . . The officers are similarly entitled to qualified immunity with respect to their arrest of Mark. As the district court noted, the evidence against Mark was slim. One witness made a tentative identification. The officers did, however, have some circumstantial evidence. . . . Most significantly, however, they had [the prosecutor's] recommendation to add a murder charge. As stated, an officer's consultation with a prosecutor is not conclusive on the issue of qualified immunity. . . However, it is evidence of good faith, and in the present case, it tips the scale in favor of qualified immunity."); Friedman v. Boucher, 580 F.3d 847, 859 (9th Cir. 2009) (reliance on advice of prosecutor does not provide qualified immunity where reasonable officer would have known Athat forcibly taking a DNA sample from a pre-trial detainee without a search warrant or other court authority would violate the detainee's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights."); Poulakis v. Rogers, No. 08-15425, 2009 WL 2447356, at *9-*11 (11th Cir. Aug. 10, 2009) (not published) ("We have not had occasion to squarely address the role that an officer's prior consultation with counsel may play in Fourth Amendment qualified immunity analysis. . . Even where an officer has consulted with an attorney prior to making an arrest, we still must look at the relevant case law and the statutory text. If the case law or statutory text is crystal clear in prohibiting the officer's arrest of the civil rights plaintiff, the officer's consultation with an attorney will not aid him in our qualified immunity analysis, because an attorney's advice cannot transform the officer's patently unlawful activity into objectively reasonable conduct. Thus, for example, if the firearm in this case had been found in the glove compartment of the car, rather than in the center console, in the face of this statute, advice from an Assistant State Attorney that an officer had probable cause would be plainly insufficient to insulate the officer on the theory of qualified immunity. Conversely, if there was no case on point and the statutory text was unclear in its application, the officer's consultation with an attorney would be unnecessary to our analysis because the officer would be entitled to qualified immunity, regardless of whether he had consulted with an attorney. But, where the application of the law to the facts falls on the hazy border between clear and ambiguous, the officer's consultation with an attorney prior to making the arrest may become relevant to the calculus. . . . We agree with the approach taken by our sister circuits. As a practical matter, it is altogether consistent with a totality of the circumstances analysis to consider pre-arrest consultation and advice of a district attorney as being one circumstance contributing to the objective reasonableness of an officer's conduct. . . . . In this case, we think the officers acted in an objectively reasonable manner. Faced with a statute that was not abundantly clear in its application, and unsure of how to proceed, the officers asked their superior, who in turn called the on-duty Assistant State Attorney for advice. The undisputed facts indicate that the officers fairly explained the circumstances and material facts, the Assistant State Attorney unambiguously expressed his opinion that the officers would have probable cause to arrest Poulakis, and the officers had no reason to believe the prosecutor acted wrongfully. Thus, the opinion of the Assistant State Attorney should be considered as part of the mix in examining the question of qualified immunity, and it was of the kind that an objectively reasonable officer could consider reliable. When each of these circumstances is taken together, a reasonable officer could have believed that he had probable cause to arrest Poulakis for a violation of Fla. Stat. ' 790.01(2). Quite simply, we believe that Officers Rogers and Stender had arguable probable cause to arrest Poulakis for a violation of Fla. Stat. ' 790.01(2), and, therefore, that they are entitled to qualified immunity on the wrongful arrest claim."); Sueiro Vazquez v. Enid Torregrosa De La Rosa, 494 F.3d 227, 235, 236 (1st Cir. 2007) ("Reliance on advice of counsel alone does not per se provide defendants with the shield of immunity. . . . This case does not involve advice from private counsel, who may have financial incentives to provide exactly the advice the client wants. Rather, it involves advice from the office of the Secretary of Justice of Puerto Rico, which has much broader duties and obligations. Reliance on the advice of Puerto Rico's chief legal officer, advice the defendants were required to follow by Puerto Rico law, was not unreasonable here. . . We leave for another day the hypothetical situation in which there is very strong evidence that newly appointed or elected defendant state officials acted in conspiracy with the chief public legal officer to produce and act on plainly unreasonable legal advice meant to result in the violation of a plaintiff's clearly established rights under federal law. Cf. Vance v. Barrett, 345 F.3d 1083, 1094 n. 14 (9th Cir.2003).This case does not come close to being that situation. Plaintiffs ask us to get into the legal question of whether the Secretary of Justice correctly or even reasonably interpreted Puerto Rico law as to whether plaintiffs' appointments were null and void. That is not an appropriate inquiry for the federal court engaged in an immunity analysis. Even if the Secretary's advice were wrong or not even within the reasonable range of interpretations (and the Secretary's advice was within a reasonable range), that would not itself mean that reasonable officials in the position of defendants would understand that they were acting in violation of plaintiffs' clearly established constitutional rights. At oral argument, plaintiffs argued that Torregrosa de la Rosa's request for an opinion from the Secretary contained a 'mischaracterization' of Sueiro's job duties and description, that this mischaracterization was motivated by political discrimination, and that this led the Secretary astray. Other circuits have denied immunity to officers in Fourth Amendment cases where officers manipulate evidence to mislead a prosecutor into authorizing an arrest. See, e.g., Sornberger v. City of Knoxville, 434 F.3d 1006, 1016 (7th Cir.2006). . . . We leave for another day whether there is an analogy to these cases for mandated reliance on advice of the Secretary of Justice in a First Amendment political termination case which turns on a state law classification issue. This theory was not raised in the district court, nor was it raised in the plaintiffs' opening brief in this court, and it is twice forfeited."); Miller v. Administrative Office of the Courts, 448 F.3d 887, 896, 897(6th Cir. 2006) ("In this case, Administrator Vize and Judge Wine conducted a pre-termination investigation into Miller's status to determine whether any special procedures needed to be followed in order to lawfully terminate her. The advice they received from the AOC's Director, its attorney, and its Personnel Director was consistent–that Miller was a nontenured employee. Given this information, a reasonable officer would not have clearly known that terminating Miller without the procedures required only for tenured employees was unlawful. This is not a case where the official responsible for terminating a government employee was 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowingly violat[ed] the law.'. . Rather, Vize and Wine took precautionary measures to ensure that Miller was nontenured and, whether or not she was in fact nontenured, those precautionary measures, under the circumstances, rendered reasonable their decision to terminate Miller without a hearing. Furthermore, even if we were to conclude that Miller had met her burden in the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, we would still hold that Vize and Judge Wine are entitled to qualified immunity under the third step that this court occasionally employs. The decision to terminate Miller was simply not 'objectively unreasonable' based on the information Vize and Wine had received in their pre-termination investigation."); Silberstein v. City of Dayton, 440 F.3d 306, 317, 318 (6th Cir. 2006) ("The Board Members also argue that their actions were objectively reasonable because they relied upon the advice of counsel that Silberstein was an unclassified employee. This circuit has determined that reliance on counsel's legal advice constitutes a qualified immunity defense only under 'extraordinary circumstances,' and has never found that those circumstances were met. . . .The Board Members cannot cloak themselves in immunity simply by delegating their termination procedure decisions to their legal department, as the availability of such a defense would invite all government actors to shield themselves from §1983 suits by first seeking self-serving legal memoranda before taking action that may violate a constitutional right. . . There is no evidence that the Board Members' circumstances were in any way extraordinary. The Board Members argue that they are not attorneys, but this fact alone cannot give rise to 'extraordinary circumstances.' A reasonably competent public official is presumed to know the law governing his or her conduct."); Armstrong v. City of Melvindale, 432 F.3d 695, 701, 702 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Defendants present two arguments that they did not violate a clearly established right. First, they again proffer the forfeited argument regarding the Michigan drug forfeiture laws. Second, they argue that the assurances of constitutional propriety gained from consultation with Prosecutor Plants, her review of the warrant and supporting affidavit, and the judge's issuance of the warrant rendered reasonable their belief that probable cause supported the issuance of the warrant. . . . The district court never reached the question of whether the officers' reliance on the issuance of the warrant was unreasonable. It instead focused only on the fact of a constitutional violation. This suggests a misconception; even with a constitutional breach, the law accords qualified immunity protection under appropriate circumstances. This case presents such circumstances. Defendants consulted with Prosecutor Plants because they were uncertain as to whether a warrant to search the Melvindale premises was constitutional. Plants not only advised them that a warrant would be constitutionally permissible, she also sanctioned a draft of the warrant and supporting affidavit. . . Only then did Defendants apply to a judge for the warrant. With the judge's approval, Defendants executed the search, and Plaintiffs do not allege that the search exceeded the scope of the warrant. . . . Defendants wrongly believed that probable cause supported the warrant, but their mistake was not so unreasonable as to deny them qualified immunity. . . . Because the officers exercised reasonable professional judgment in applying for the warrant and because reasonable officers in Defendants' position might have believed that the warrant should have issued, we cannot say that Defendants violated a clearly established right by conducting the search of Plaintiffs' business."); Cox v. Hainey, 391 F.3d 25, 34-36 (1st Cir. 2004) ("[T]he appellant submits that a police officer should not be able to insulate himself from liability for an erroneous determination simply because he obtained a prosecutor's blessing to arrest upon evidence that did not establish probable cause. We agree with the appellant's premise that a wave of the prosecutor's wand cannot magically transform an unreasonable probable cause determination into a reasonable one. That is not to say, however, that a reviewing court must throw out the baby with the bath water. There is a middle ground: the fact of the consultation and the purport of the advice obtained should be factored into the totality of the circumstances and considered in determining the officer's entitlement to qualified immunity. Whether advice obtained from a prosecutor prior to making an arrest fits into the totality of circumstances that appropriately inform the qualified immunity determination is a question of first impression in this circuit. In Suboh v. Dist. Atty's Office of Suffolk Dist., 298 F.3d 81 (1st Cir.2002), we noted the question but had no occasion to answer it. See id. at 97. In dictum, we implied that if an officer seeks counsel from a prosecutor anent the legality of an intended action and furnishes the latter the known information material to that decision, the officer's reliance on emergent advice might be relevant, for qualified immunity purposes, to the reasonableness of his later conduct. . . Other courts, however, have spoken authoritatively to the issue. [collecting circuit cases] . . . .We agree with our sister circuits and with the implication of the Suboh dictum that there is some room in the qualified immunity calculus for considering both the fact of a pre-arrest consultation and the purport of the advice received. As a matter of practice, the incorporation of these factors into the totality of the circumstances is consistent with an inquiry into the objective legal reasonableness of an officer's belief that probable cause supported an arrest. It stands to reason that if an officer makes a full presentation of the known facts to a competent prosecutor and receives a green light, the officer would have stronger reason to believe that probable cause existed. And as a matter of policy, it makes eminently good sense, when time and circumstances permit, to encourage officers to obtain an informed opinion before charging ahead and making an arrest in uncertain circumstances. . . . Although we acknowledge the possibility of collusion between police and prosecutors, we do not believe that possibility warrants a general rule foreclosing reliance on a prosecutor's advice. . . . We caution, however, that the mere fact that an officer secures a favorable pre-arrest opinion from a friendly prosecutor does not automatically guarantee that qualified immunity will follow. Rather, that consultation comprises only one factor, among many, that enters into the totality of the circumstances relevant to the qualified immunity analysis. . . The primary focus continues to be the evidence about the suspect and the suspected crime that is within the officer's ken. In considering the relevance of an officer's pre-arrest consultation with a prosecutor, a reviewing court must determine whether the officer's reliance on the prosecutor's advice was objectively reasonable. . . Reliance would not satisfy this standard if an objectively reasonable officer would have cause to believe that the prosecutor's advice was flawed, off point, or otherwise untrustworthy. . . Law enforcement officers have an independent duty to exercise their professional judgment and can be brought to book for objectively unreasonable mistakes regardless of whether another government official (say, a prosecutor or a magistrate) happens to compound the error. . . The officer's own role is also pertinent. If he knowingly withholds material facts from the prosecutor, his reliance on the latter's opinion would not be reasonable. . . In this case, the advice that Hainey received from the assistant district attorney was of the kind that an objectively reasonable officer would be free to consider reliable. The undisputed facts indicate that the two reviewed the available evidence fully and had a frank discussion about it. This discussion culminated in the prosecutor's statement that he believed Hainey had probable cause to arrest the appellant. And, finally, there is nothing to suggest that the prosecutor was operating in bad faith. We conclude, therefore, that an objectively reasonable officer would have taken the prosecutor's opinion into account in deciding whether to make the arrest. Thus, the district court appropriately considered that opinion in assessing the objective reasonableness of Hainey's actions and, ultimately, in granting him qualified immunity."); Davis v. Zirkelbach, 149 F.3d 614, 620 (7th Cir. 1998) ("[O]fficers were objectively reasonable in their reliance on [counsel's] advice. A contrary conclusion on these facts would create perverse incentives for police officers faced with an unusual problem: if they sought advice of counsel that turned out to be wrong, they would be liable, but if they maintained a deliberate ignorance, they might be able to get away with arguing that no reasonable officer would have known that the rule applied to their particular situation."); V-1 Oil Co. v. Wyoming Dep't of Envtl. Quality, 902 F.2d 1482, 1488-89 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 920 (1990) (collecting cases and identifying four factors that determine when extraordinary circumstances exist in the context of reliance on counsel).

See also Sjurset v. Button, 810 F.3d 609, 620, 622 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Like the two officers in Mueller who 'made no decisions at all,'. . . the Stayton officers similarly made no independent decisions regarding protective custody and merely assisted DHS in securing the children. We thus decline to find that the Stayton officers were either plainly incompetent or that they knowingly violated the law when they relied on DHS's determination that Sjurset's children were in imminent danger. To hold otherwise would place the Stayton officers in a Catch–22 situation: either challenge DHS's determination, which could potentially endanger the children's safety and put the officers at risk of liability or discipline if harm had befallen the children, or carry out DHS's instructions in the absence of a court order at the risk of being sued for violating the children's and the parents' constitutional rights. The correct answer would not be obvious to a reasonable officer. Thus, the 'contours' of the Fourteenth and Fourth Amendment rights at issue were not clearly established in this context. Accordingly, for the purposes of qualified immunity, those rights did not preclude the officers' reliance on DHS's determination. . . . The Stayton officers were therefore not incompetent in believing that they were legally authorized to act in reliance on DHS's determination. And even if the officers were mistaken in their belief that they could remove the children at the direction of DHS without court authorization, their actions were objectively reasonable under the circumstances. Accordingly, the Stayton officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

See also D'Ambrosio v. City of Methuen, No. CV 16-10534-MPK, 2019 WL 1438050, at *9 (D. Mass. Mar. 31, 2019) ("When an officer consults with a prosecutor about 'the legality of an intended action,' the officer's 'reliance on emergent advice' may be relevant to the officer's later conduct and may help to establish qualified immunity. . . The First Circuit has admonished, however, that 'a wave of the prosecutor's wand cannot magically transform an unreasonable probable cause determination into a reasonable one,' and in order to rely on a prosecutor's advice, the officer must have made a 'full presentation of the known facts.'. . Further, the officer's reliance on the advice must be 'objectively reasonable.'. . An officer's reliance on a prosecutor's advice will not factor favorably into the qualified immunity analysis when 'an objectively reasonable officer would have cause to believe that the prosecutor's advice was flawed, off point, or otherwise untrustworthy.'"); Bell v. Norwood, 2:11-CV-3732-RDP, 2014 WL 4388348, *8 (N.D. Ala. Aug. 28, 2014) ("Similar to the facts in Ulrich, there is a factor in this case that supports the application of qualified immunity. Not only were Norwood and Cater called upon to interpret Alabama law, the DA's office approved the applications that Norwood and Cater submitted in support of the arrest warrants. Under the totality of the circumstances, Norwood and Cater reasonably relied on the DA's erroneous probable cause determination, and that is what actually resulted in Bell's arrests. . . Here, although Norwood and Cater were mistaken in applying for the arrest warrants, Bell would never have been arrested if the DA's office had not (erroneously) approved the applications for warrants. Thus, notwithstanding Norwood and Cater's mistaken understanding of Defendant's notification and registration requirements, no arrest warrants would have issued if the DA's office had reached a correct determination that Bell was not required to register a new address if he moved within Jefferson County."); Phillips v. Hubbard, No. 1:11–cv–00087, 2012 WL 3542640, *7, *8 (S.D. Ohio Aug. 16, 2012) ("As noted by Deputy Hubbard, he is being sued in his individual capacity for actions that he took pursuant to advice, counsel, and authority of the chief legal officer of Brown County, Prosecuting Attorney Jessie Little. Thus, Hubbard asserts that it cannot be said that he violated clearly established law by initiating criminal proceedings at the direction of the Prosecuting Attorney against Plaintiff for knowingly obstructing or interfering with a farmer's easement in the middle of the season. In Harlow, the Supreme Court created an 'extraordinary circumstances' exception that entitles a defendant to qualified immunity even where he or she is otherwise not entitled to it. . . The Sixth Circuit has held that reliance on the advice of counsel may constitute 'extraordinary circumstances' which would entitle a defendant to qualified immunity. York v. Purkey, 14 F App'. 628 (6th Cir.2001). Four factors are considered when a public official has followed the advice of counsel: (1) whether the advice was unequivocal and specifically tailored to the particular facts giving rise to the controversy; (2) whether complete information was provided to the advising attorney(s); (3) the prominence and competence of the advising attorney(s); and (4) how soon after the advice was received the disputed action was taken.

. . . In light of the facts and circumstances surrounding this action, it appears the four factors weigh in favor of finding that Hubbard's reliance on Prosecutor Little's advice may constitute 'extraordinary circumstances' which would entitle Hubbard to qualified immunity. However, the undersigned declines to engage in a lengthy discussion of this issue, as further discussed below, as Prosecutor Little's advice to Hubbard is not the sole basis for determining that Hubbard's actions were objectively reasonable for purposes of qualified immunity. See York, 14 F. App'x at 633 (consulting an attorney and relying on rendered legal advice alone is not extraordinary for purposes of qualified immunity, it is a factor to consider)."); Pate v. Village of Hampshire, 2007 WL 3223360, at *14, *15 (N.D.Ill. Oct. 25, 2007) ("Chief Atchison and Mayor Magnussen further argue that their actions are protected by the 'extraordinary circumstances' exception to the lack of immunity based on their reliance of counsel's advice before terminating Pate's and Stroyan's employment. If an immunity defense fails because the law was clearly established and a reasonably competent public official should have known the law governing the conduct, the public official may still be immune from suit if extraordinary circumstances exist, such as relying on the advice of counsel in making the disputed decision. See Davis v. Zirkelbach, 149 F.3d 614, 620 (7th Cir.1998) (Davis). Factors included in determining whether immunity may be granted based on this extraordinary circumstance include: (1) whether the advice of counsel was unequivocal, (2) whether the advice of counsel was specifically tailored to the particular facts giving rise to the controversy, (3) whether complete information was provided to the advising counsel, (4) the prominence and competence of the advising counsel, and (5) the time span after the advice was received and the disputed action was taken. . . In the instant case, the undisputed facts before the Court are insufficient to determine if the extraordinary circumstances defense applies to Chief Atchison's and Mayor Magnussen's decisions to terminate Pate's and Stroyan's employment based on advice from McGuire. . . . Accordingly, summary judgment based on qualified immunity and the extraordinary circumstance defense is denied."); Schroeder v. City of Vassar, 371 F.Supp.2d 882, 897 (E.D. Mich. 2005) ("The evidence shows that the legal counsel unequivocally approved the termination, the information Adkins provided to the attorney included the draft letter, the attorney consulted was competent to serve as the city's counsel, and that the action took place immediately after receiving the advice. The Court finds that Adkins is entitled to qualified immunity under the circumstances of this case.").

See also Poolaw v. Marcantel, 565 F.3d 721, 743, 744, 748, 749 (10th Cir. 2009) (O'Brien, J., dissenting) ("While not conclusive evidence of the officers' reasonable belief, a law trained judge found the affidavit sufficient to establish probable cause and issued the warrant. Moreover the officers also consulted counsel with respect to the adequacy of the affidavit before it was presented to the judge. . . In such circumstances the threshold over which the officers must pass to avoid suppression of evidence in a criminal case or to be entitled to qualified immunity in a civil case is quite low. . . . If the search was erroneously authorized the consequences of the error ought not be visited on Marcantel and Hix, who followed proper procedure in obtaining the warrant, which, in turn, was executed in good faith by other officers. . . .Assuming, arguendo, a constitutional violation occurred, Marcantel and Hix are entitled to qualified immunity because the law at the time of the search did not fairly warn their conduct was unlawful. . . . [T]he test is not whether the officers were incorrect in their assessment of probable cause or whether the judge was wrong to issue the warrant. It is whether the officers' request and the judge's response were reasonable. Even if the officers were mistaken, their mistake was reasonable. The protection of qualified immunity extends to such reasonable mistakes, whether they are ones of law, fact or a combination thereof.")

But see Wheeler v. City of Searcy, Arkansas, 14 F.4th 843, 852, 854 (8th Cir. 2021) ("We . . . address a narrow issue: whether the officers 'are entitled to qualified immunity because they reasonably relied on the advice of counsel.'. . The officers argue that Messerschmidt's holding 'is squarely on point with this case.'. . . We disagree and distinguish this case from Messerschmidt on its facts. . . . Because Messerschmidt did not involve a claim that officers obtained a warrant based on a misleading affidavit, its discussion of the officers' reliance on the prosecuting attorney's advice is inapplicable to the present case. . . Additionally, even if Messerschmidt were applicable, Prosecutor McCoy denied advising the officers on whether to omit the recantation and did not agree that she advised them on the language about the dog search. As a result, we hold that the district court did not err in denying the officers' second motion for summary judgment and rejecting their argument that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they reasonably relied on Prosecutor McCoy's advice in crafting a misleading arrest-warrant affidavit."); Novak v. City of Parma, 932 F.3d 421, 435 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Usually, a warrant from a neutral magistrate, like the ones Connor got in this case, would be a 'complete defense' to these § 1983 claims. . . Not so here. Warrants are typically a defense because they demonstrate probable cause. But warrants do not demonstrate probable cause if the officer 'ma[de] false statements and omissions to the judge' and if probable cause would not exist but for those false statements or omissions. . . In these limited circumstances, officers may be held liable for their searches, seizures, and arrests even though they obtained a warrant."); Hupp v. Cook, 931 F.3d 307, 324-25 (4th Cir. 2019) ("[W]here a police officer takes certain steps, such as first conferring with a prosecutor about moving forward with a criminal prosecution, and a magistrate judge later affirms the officer's determination that probable cause exists for the prosecution, those steps weigh in favor of a finding of qualified immunity. They do not end the qualified immunity inquiry, however, as they 'need only appropriately be taken into account in assessing the reasonableness of [the officer's] actions.'. . A grant of qualified immunity still rests on our determination that an officer acted reasonably under the circumstances. Because a magistrate's finding of probable cause is but a factor in our consideration of the overall reasonableness of the officer's actions, a defendant to a malicious prosecution claim is not absolved from liability when the magistrate's probable-cause finding 'is predicated solely on a police officer's false statements.' Manuel, 137 S. Ct. at 918. An officer who lies to secure a probable-cause determination can hardly be called reasonable. Likewise, where an officer provides misleading information to the prosecuting attorney or where probable cause is 'plainly lacking,'. . . the procedural steps taken by an officer no longer afford a shield against a Fourth Amendment claim. This is because '[l]egal process has gone forward, but it has done nothing to satisfy the Fourth Amendment's probable-cause requirement.'. . .Hupp contends that the magistrate's finding of probable cause does not afford Trooper Cook qualified immunity on her malicious prosecution claim because the probable-cause finding rested on false statements made by Trooper Cook in the criminal complaint against her. Specifically, Hupp asserts that the criminal complaint falsely stated, inter alia, that she refused to comply with Trooper Cook's orders to 'step aside,' began cursing at him, 'raised her hands towards' him before he grabbed her arm, and then grabbed at him and 'began cursing' after he grabbed her arm. . . We agree with Hupp that the district court's finding of qualified immunity on this claim was in error. As we have explained, disputes of fact preclude a finding at this stage that a reasonable officer would have believed that probable cause existed for Hupp's arrest. . . . .Given the disputes of the underlying historical facts, the supported assertion that Trooper Cook's statements in the criminal complaint were not entirely truthful, and the lack of undisputed evidence that otherwise would support a probable-cause finding, we cannot find that Trooper Cook is entitled to qualified immunity on Hupp's malicious prosecution claim under section 1983."); Burgess v. Bowers, 773 F. App'x 238, ___ (6th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 475 (2019) ("[T]he officers contend that the sheriff's chief legal counsel advised Norris, who advised Jenkins, that Jenkins could enter Grace's home if she had probable cause to make an arrest for evasion of service of process or obstruction of justice. But our circuit 'has determined that reliance on counsel's legal advice constitutes a qualified immunity defense only under extraordinary circumstances.'. . And here, the officers have failed to make any showing of extraordinary circumstances. We therefore affirm the district court's judgment that Bowers, Norris, and Jenkins are not entitled to qualified immunity on Grace's unreasonable-search claim."); Poolaw v. Marcantel, 565 F.3d 721, 734, 735 (10th Cir. 2009) ("The dissent presses the point that because Marcantel and Hix sought and obtained a search warrant from a judge, they should be entitled to qualified immunity unless they intentionally misled the judge. . . This conclusion is misguided for two reasons. First, it is clearly established that 'employ[ing] a reasonable process in seeking the warrant' does not relieve officers of their constitutional duty to 'exercise their own professional judgment' as to the existence of probable cause. . . .Second, it is beyond question that an officer's duty to exercise his independent professional judgment is not met simply because he lacks subjective bad faith. . . . Whether the officers intentionally misled the judge is simply of no moment unless such intent is an element of the plaintiffs' claims, which it is not here. . . As we explain above, given the absence of a factual connection other than Marcella between Astorga and the Poolaws' property, an officer could not reasonably apply for a search warrant believing that probable cause existed."); Sornberger v. City of Knoxville, 434 F.3d 1006, 1016 (7th Cir.2006) ("This record cannot establish that Officer Clauge and Chief Pesci simply made a good-faith mistake as to the existence of probable cause. We have held that, when an officer presents his case in good-faith to a prosecutor and seeks that official's advice about the existence of probable cause, his subsequent action, based on the prosecutor's advice that probable cause exists, is powerful evidence that the officer's reliance was in good faith and deserving of qualified immunity. . . Here, however, the record, as it comes to us, hardly establishes such a good-faith seeking of legal advice. Rather, the record is susceptible to the view that the officers themselves realized the weakness of their case, and therefore manipulated the available evidence to mislead the state prosecutor into authorizing Scott's arrest. . . This conduct, as alleged, creates serious factual issues as to whether the officers reasonably relied on the prosecutor's advice. On this record, neither Chief Pesci nor Officer Clauge can be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In the present case, the officers had obtained a warrant for the search of the Sornbergers' parents' computer, which would have allowed the investigators to confirm the couple's alibi. Rather than waiting to obtain this critical information, the officers arrested Scott while the search of his parents' home was taking place. On this record, given that the lynchpin of a probable cause determination was on the verge of being obtained, the officers' arrest of Scott before reviewing the results of the computer search appears to have been unreasonably premature."); Putnam v. Keller, 332 F.3d 541, 545 n.3 (8th Cir. 2003) (rejecting college officials' 'argument that they are insulated from liability due to 'extraordinary circumstances'–that is, their reliance on the advice of their attorney."); Roska v. Peterson, 328 F.3d 1230, 1254 (10th Cir. 2003) (Roska I) ("In this case, the district court alternatively concluded that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity based on their reliance on advice of counsel. For the reasons set forth below, we reverse and remand. First, the district court again based its decision on Utah Code ' 78-3a- 301, which, as discussed supra, does not authorize removal without pre-deprivation procedures. Second, based on the record before us, we cannot determine whether the district court was correct in concluding that Petersen's advice related specifically to the conduct in question: removing Rusty from his home without any pre-deprivation procedures. Finally, although the district court concluded that the advice 'was specifically tailored to the facts giving rise to this controversy,' neither the district court opinion nor the record indicate the specific facts upon which Defendant Peterson relied in approving removal."[footnotes omitted]); Charfauros v. Board of Elections, 249 F.3d 941, 954 (9th Cir. 2001) (reliance on advice of counsel does not establish that a reasonable elections official would not know that his or her conduct violated the Equal Protection Clause); Wadkins v. Arnold, 214 F.3d 535, 542 (4th Cir. 2000) ("[T]he mere fact that Detective Arnold acted upon the Commonwealth's Attorney's authorization in applying for the warrants does not automatically cloak Arnold with the shield of qualified immunity. However, this authorization–by the elected chief law enforcement officer of Washington County–is compelling evidence and should appropriately be taken into account in assessing the reasonableness of Arnold's actions."); Woodwind Estates, Ltd. v. Gretkowski, 205 F.3d 118, 125 (3d Cir. 2000) ("[T]he supervisor defendants contend that their Rule 50(a) motion should be upheld on the alternative ground that they are entitled to qualified immunity for their decision to deny Woodwind's application for subdivision approval. According to the supervisors, they are entitled to qualified immunity simply because they were relying upon the recommendation of the planning commission and the township solicitor. We disagree. . . . Under the local ordinance, the Woodwind plan as submitted must have been approved as a subdivision because it satisfied all of the objective criteria. Yet the supervisor defendants denied approval for the subdivision plan. The supervisor defendants have not shown that their interpretation or understanding of the ordinance was reasonable or that Pennsylvania law on the subject was unclear. Accordingly, the defense of qualified immunity is not available to the supervisor defendants in the instant matter."); Gilbrook v. City of Westminster, 177 F.3d 839, 870 (9th Cir. 1999) ("Both Demonaco and Huntley testified that they consulted with counsel before discharging Garrison because of his press release. Huntley even went so far as to read a Supreme Court opinion himself, before determining that Garrison had exceeded the permissible bounds of protected public-employee speech. Although such efforts are laudable, standing alone they do not bestow on public officials the shield of qualified immunity. . . . Were we to rule that reliance on the advice of counsel is sufficient to confer qualified immunity, no matter what the outcome of the Pickering balance, we would be abdicating to individual lawyers our collective judicial responsibility to evaluate the merits of First Amendment retaliation claims and providing an incentive for lawyers to tell public-employer clients that they have immunity even when other factors suggest the absence of immunity. In summary, on the record before us, we conclude that the Pickering balance so clearly weighs in favor of Garrison that it was patently unreasonable for defendants to conclude that the First Amendment did not protect his speech.").

See also Pattee v. Georgia Ports Authority, 477 F.Supp.2d 1253, 1268 (S.D. Ga. 2006) ("Finally, the defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they relied on an attorney's advice that terminating Pattee for lying would not violate his constitutional rights. . . . Defendants point to no Eleventh Circuit case applying the 'extraordinary circumstances' exception, nor any case granting a defendant qualified immunity for relying on the advice of private counsel. Furthermore, even were the Court to find V-1 persuasive, the legal advice in that case was extraordinary–from a high-ranking government attorney and regarding an untested statute–not the run-of-the-mill advice defendants received from their attorney in this case. Thus, the defense does not apply here."); Masonoff v. Dubois, 336 F.Supp.2d 54, 64, 65 (D. Mass. 2004) ("The First Circuit and courts in other jurisdictions have held that a state law sanctioning the conduct at issue can keep a reasonable official from knowing the relevant constitutional standard. . . Similarly, courts have also deemed reliance on advice of counsel reasonable under certain circumstances. . . Ultimately, the question here boils down to whether it was objectively reasonable for these defendants to believe, based upon Langton and advice of counsel, that their conduct conformed to law. . . . I conclude that Langton gave the defendants more than 'fair notice' that the portable toilets and slop sinks must be kept clean and well-maintained in order to pass constitutional muster. . . . In other words, it would not be reasonable for the defendants to rely on Langton–or advice of counsel–for the proposition that the conditions at SECC would always be constitutional, especially in the face of the court's warning in Langton and its prophylactic order regarding cleaning and maintenance of the portable toilets.").

See also In re County of Erie, 546 F.3d 222, 225, 229, 230 (2d Cir. 2008) ("After reviewing the submissions of the parties in regard to the Petition, we first determined that the writ was an appropriate device to review the discovery order in this case because the Petitioner presented an important issue of first impression: whether communications passing between a government attorney without policy-making authority and a public official are protected by the attorney-client privilege when the communications evaluate the policies' legality and propose alternatives. . . . An analysis of the attorney-client privilege in the government context and its application to the factual background of this case led us to conclude that each of the ten disputed e-mails was sent for the predominant purpose of soliciting or rendering legal advice. They convey to the public officials responsible for formulating, implementing and monitoring Erie County's corrections policies, a lawyer's assessment of Fourth Amendment requirements, and provide guidance in crafting and implementing alternative policies for compliance. This advice–particularly when viewed in the context in which it was solicited and rendered–does not constitute general policy or political advice unprotected by the privilege. . . We therefore granted the writ and directed the District Court to enter an order preserving the confidentiality of the e-mails in question. . . . .We hold that a party must rely on privileged advice from his counsel to make his claim or defense. We decline to specify or speculate as to what degree of reliance is required because Petitioners here do not rely upon the advice of counsel in the assertion of their defense in this action. Although the District Court held, inter alia, that the qualified immunity defense asserted by Petitioners placed the privileged communications between the County Attorney's Office and the Sheriff's personnel at issue, this is not so. . . . The question of whether a right is 'clearly established'is determined by reference to the case law extant at the time of the violation. . . . This is an objective, not a subjective, test, and reliance upon advice of counsel therefore cannot be used to support the defense of qualified immunity. Petitioners do not claim a good faith or state of mind defense. They maintain only that their actions were lawful or that any rights violated were not clearly established. In view of the litigation circumstances, any legal advice rendered by the County Attorney's Office is irrelevant to any defense so far raised by Petitioners. . . . The Petition for Mandamus is granted. The District Court's order to produce the ten e-mails is vacated, and the District Court is directed to enter an order protecting the confidentiality of those privileged communications. Respondents shall have leave to reargue forfeiture of the privilege before the District Court should the Petitioners rely upon an advice-of-counsel or good-faith defense at trial."); Ross v. City of Memphis, 423 F.3d 596, 597, 598 (6th Cir. 2005) ("Regardless of the way this case is captioned, the real dispute is between the City of Memphis (the 'City') and its former police director, Walter Crews, who has also been sued in his individual capacity. The City asserts the attorney-client privilege as to the content of conversations between Crews, while he was police director, and various attorneys employed by the City. However, in the present lawsuit, Crews has raised the advice of counsel as the basis of his qualified immunity defense. Thus, we are asked to determine whether Crews's invocation of the advice of counsel impliedly waives the attorney-client privilege held by the City. To answer this question, we must first decide whether a municipality can hold the attorney-client privilege. Holding that a municipality can maintain the privilege and that Crews's litigation choices cannot waive the City's privilege, we reverse the district court and remand for further proceedings.").

See also McRaven v. Sanders, 577 F.3d 974, 981 (8th Cir. 2009) ("Given McMurrian's knowledge of the drugs McFarland consumed and his physical state–facts that should have triggered special concern–it was unreasonable to rely on a medical assessment grounded on incorrect information.").

Note that ignoring advice of counsel may weigh against granting qualified immunity. See, e.g., Brockton Power LLC v. City of Brockton, No. 12–11047–LTS, 2013 WL 2407220, *20 (D. Mass. May 30, 2013) ("As set forth above, the plaintiffs have presented sufficient allegations of constitutional violations, satisfying the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . With respect to the second prong, the plaintiffs repeatedly have alleged that the defendants 'knowingly violate[d] the law.'. . Two factual allegations are especially relevant to assessing whether reasonable people in the defendants' positions would have realized their conduct violated the plaintiffs' due process and equal protection rights. First, the defendants allegedly acted in the face of warnings from the City's legal counsel against 'delay tactics,' 'acting outside the rules,' and failing 'to treat the plaintiffs fairly, disclose conflicts of interest, and not discriminate.'. . Second, the plaintiffs allege the defendants formed an agreement pursuant to which all applications and submissions related to the project would be either 'rejected ... out of hand' or denied after 'pretextual reviews.'. . Reasonable people in the defendants' positions should have understood such a systemic denial of any process whatsoever—including the denial of a landowner's request for access to drinking water—was beyond the scope of constitutionally permissible conduct. The defendants' bids for qualified immunity, therefore, are denied without prejudice to renewal at summary judgment, after further development of the relevant facts in discovery.")

2. Reliance on Statutes, Ordinances, Regulations

While not a qualified immunity decision, the Court's opinion in Heien v. North Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 530 (2014) is worth reading for comparison to qualified immunity doctrine.

Heien v. North Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 530, 539-40 (2014) ("Heien is correct that in a number of decisions we have looked to the reasonableness of an officer's legal error in the course of considering the appropriate remedy for a constitutional violation, instead of whether there was a violation at all. . . In those cases, however, we had already found or assumed a Fourth Amendment violation. An officer's mistaken view that the conduct at issue did not give rise to such a violation—no matter how reasonable—could not change that ultimate conclusion. . . Any consideration of the reasonableness of an officer's mistake was therefore limited to the separate matter of remedy. Here, by contrast, the mistake of law relates to the antecedent question of whether it was reasonable for an officer to suspect that the defendant's conduct was illegal. If so, there was no violation of the Fourth Amendment in the first place. None of the cases Heien or the dissent cites precludes a court from considering a reasonable mistake of law in addressing that question. . . . Contrary to the suggestion of Heien and amici, our decision does not discourage officers from learning the law. The Fourth Amendment tolerates only reasonable mistakes, and those mistakes—whether of fact or of law—must be objectively reasonable. We do not examine the subjective understanding of the particular officer involved. . . And the inquiry is not as forgiving as the one employed in the distinct context of deciding whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity for a constitutional or statutory violation. Thus, an officer can gain no Fourth Amendment advantage through a sloppy study of the laws he is duty-bound to enforce.")

Heien v. N. Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 530, 541 (2014) (Kagan, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., concurring) ("[T]he inquiry the Court permits today is more demanding than the one courts undertake before awarding qualified immunity. . . Our modern qualified immunity doctrine protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . By contrast, Justice Story's opinion in The Friendship, 9 F. Cas. 825, 826 (No. 5,125) (CC Mass. 1812) . . . suggests the appropriate standard for deciding when a legal error can support a seizure: when an officer takes a reasonable view of a 'vexata questio' on which different judges 'h[o]ld opposite opinions.'. . Or to make the same point without the Latin, the test is satisfied when the law at issue is 'so doubtful in construction' that a reasonable judge could agree with the officer's view. . . A court tasked with deciding whether an officer's mistake of law can support a seizure thus faces a straightforward question of statutory construction. If the statute is genuinely ambiguous, such that overturning the officer's judgment requires hard interpretive work, then the officer has made a reasonable mistake. But if not, not. As the Solicitor General made the point at oral argument, the statute must pose a 'really difficult' or 'very hard question of statutory interpretation.' And indeed, both North Carolina and the Solicitor General agreed that such cases will be 'exceedingly rare.'") Heien v. N. Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 530, 543-44, 547 (2014) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) ("Traffic stops like those at issue here can be 'annoying, frightening, and perhaps humiliating.'. . We have nevertheless held that an officer's subjective motivations do not render a traffic stop unlawful. . . But we assumed in Whren that when an officer acts on pretext, at least that pretext would be the violation of an actual law. . . Giving officers license to effect seizures so long as they can attach to their reasonable view of the facts some reasonable legal interpretation (or misinterpretation) that suggests a law has been violated significantly expands this authority. . . One wonders how a citizen seeking to be law-abiding and to structure his or her behavior to avoid these invasive, frightening, and humiliating encounters could do so. In addition to these human consequences—including those for communities and for their relationships with the police—permitting mistakes of law to justify seizures has the perverse effect of preventing or delaying the clarification of the law. Under such an approach, courts need not interpret statutory language but can instead simply decide whether an officer's interpretation was reasonable. . . . This result is bad for citizens, who need to know their rights and responsibilities, and it is bad for police, who would benefit from clearer direction. . . Of course, if the law enforcement system could not function without permitting mistakes of law to justify seizures, one could at least argue that permitting as much is a necessary evil. But I have not seen any persuasive argument that law enforcement will be unduly hampered by a rule that precludes consideration of mistakes of law in the reasonableness inquiry. After all, there is no indication that excluding an officer's mistake of law from the reasonableness inquiry has created a problem for law enforcement in the overwhelming number of Circuits which have adopted that approach. If an officer makes a stop in good faith but it turns out that, as in this case, the officer was wrong about what the law proscribed or required, I know of no penalty that the officer would suffer. . . Moreover, such an officer would likely have a defense to any civil suit on the basis of qualified immunity. . . .While I appreciate that the Court has endeavored to set some bounds on the types of mistakes of law that it thinks will qualify as reasonable, and while I think that the set of reasonable mistakes of law ought to be narrowly circumscribed if they are to be countenanced at all, I am not at all convinced that the Court has done so in a clear way. It seems to me that the difference between qualified immunity's reasonableness standard—which the Court insists without elaboration does not apply here—and the Court's conception of reasonableness in this context—which remains undefined—will prove murky in application. . . I fear the Court's unwillingness to sketch a fuller view of what makes a mistake of law reasonable only presages the likely difficulty that courts will have applying the Court's decision in this case. To my mind, the more administrable approach—and the one more consistent with our precedents and principles—would be to hold that an officer's mistake of law, no matter how reasonable, cannot support the individualized suspicion necessary to justify a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. I respectfully dissent.")

See also Villarreal v. City of Laredo, Texas, 44 F.4th 363, 370-75 (5th Cir. 2022) (superseding opinion) ("Ordinarily, a plaintiff defeats qualified immunity by citing governing case law finding a violation under factually similar circumstances. But that is not the only way to defeat qualified immunity. 'Although earlier cases involving "fundamentally similar" facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established, they are not necessary to such a finding.' Hope, 536 U.S. at 741, 122 S.Ct. 2508. [Court discusses Hope] Similarly, in Taylor v. Riojas, —— U.S. ——, 141 S. Ct. 52, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020) (per curiam), two prison cells contained massive amounts of feces over a period of six days. . . Again, there was no binding case on point involving those particular factual circumstances. But the Court nevertheless denied qualified immunity, reasoning that 'no reasonable correctional officer could have concluded that, under the extreme circumstances of this case, it was constitutionally permissible to house Taylor in such deplorably unsanitary conditions for such an extended period of time.'. . Perhaps the decision most analogous to this appeal is Sause v. Bauer, —— U.S. ——, 138 S. Ct. 2561, 201 L.Ed.2d 982 (2018) (per curiam). There, police officers entered a woman's living room in response to a noise complaint. When she knelt down to pray, they ordered her to stop, despite the lack of any apparent law enforcement need. . . She brought suit against the officers alleging, inter alia, a violation of the Free Exercise Clause. . . The Tenth Circuit granted qualified immunity, reasoning that any violation was not clearly established because 'Sause d[id]n't identify a single case in which this court, or any other court for that matter, has found a First Amendment violation based on a factual scenario even remotely resembling the one we encounter here.'. . The Court reversed the Tenth Circuit's grant of qualified immunity and remanded for further proceedings, holding that '[t]here can be no doubt that the First Amendment protects the right to pray,' and that '[p]rayer unquestionably constitutes the "exercise" of religion.'. .The point is this: The doctrine of qualified immunity does not always require the plaintiff to cite binding case law involving identical facts. An official who commits a patently 'obvious' violation of the Constitution is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . That principle should have precluded dismissal of the various constitutional claims presented here. Just as it is obvious that Mary Anne Sause has a constitutional right to pray, it is likewise obvious that Priscilla Villarreal has a constitutional right to ask questions of public officials. Yet according to her complaint, Defendants arrested and sought to prosecute Villarreal for doing precisely that—asking questions of public officials. . . . So it should be patently obvious to any reasonable police officer that the conduct alleged in the complaint constitutes a blatant violation of Villarreal's constitutional rights. And that should be enough to defeat qualified immunity. The Institute for Justice, a respected national public interest law firm, puts the point well in its amicus brief: There is a big difference between 'split-second decisions' by police officers and 'premeditated plans to arrest a person for her journalism, especially by local officials who have a history of targeting her because of her journalism.' We agree that the facts alleged here present an especially weak basis for invoking qualified immunity. For '[w]hen it comes to the First Amendment, ... we are concerned about government chilling the citizen—not the other way around.' Horvath v. City of Leander, 946

F.3d 787, 802 (5th Cir. 2020) (Ho, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part). Cf. Hoggard v. Rhodes, —— U.S. ——, 141 S. Ct. 2421, 2422, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2021) (Thomas, J., respecting denial of cert.) ("But why should university officers, who have time to make calculated choices about enacting or enforcing unconstitutional policies, receive the same protection as a police officer who makes a split-second decision to use force in a dangerous setting?"). Defendants respond that the officials were simply enforcing a statute. But 'some statutes are so obviously unconstitutional that we will require officials to second-guess the legislature and refuse to enforce an unconstitutional statute—or face a suit for damages if they don't.' Lawrence v. Reed, 406 F.3d 1224, 1233 (10th Cir. 2005). We agree with Judge McConnell and our other sister circuits that police officers can invoke qualified immunity by 'rely[ing] on statutes that authorize their conduct—but not if the statute is obviously unconstitutional.'. . We do not grant qualified immunity where the official attempts to hide behind a statute that is '"so grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional that any person of reasonable prudence would be bound to see its flaws."' [collecting cases] On its face, Texas Penal Code § 39.06(c) is not one of those 'obviously unconstitutional' statutes. Villarreal nevertheless prevails because it is far from clear that the officers can even state a plausible case against Villarreal under § 39.06(c) in the first place. . . . [W]e conclude that no reasonable officer could have found probable cause under § 39.06(c)—separate and apart from whether § 39.06(c) could constitutionally apply to a person motivated by journalism rather than by profits. . . . It should be obvious to any reasonable police officer that locking up a journalist for asking a question violates the First Amendment. Indeed, even Captain Lorenzo, the stubborn police chief in Die Hard 2, acknowledged: 'Now personally, I'd like to lock every [expletive] reporter out of the airport. But then they'd just pull that "freedom of speech" [expletive] on us and the ACLU would be all over us.' DIE HARD 2(1990). Captain Lorenzo understood this. The officers in Laredo should have, too. . . The complaint here alleges an obvious violation of the First Amendment. The district court erred in holding otherwise. . . . We turn to Villarreal's Fourth Amendment wrongful arrest claim. . . . Defendants argue they are entitled to qualified immunity because their arrest warrant sufficiently alleges a violation of § 39.06(c), which they obtained from a magistrate judge. But 'the fact that a neutral magistrate has issued a warrant authorizing the allegedly unconstitutional search or seizure does not end the inquiry into objective reasonableness.'. . Even when officers obtain an arrest warrant from a magistrate, we ask 'whether a reasonably well-trained officer in [the defendants'] position would have known that his affidavit failed to establish probable cause and that he should not have applied for a warrant.'. . . As explained above, a reasonably well-trained officer would have understood that arresting a journalist for merely asking a question clearly violates the First Amendment. 'A government official may not base her probable cause determination on an "unjustifiable standard," such as speech protected by the First Amendment.'. .Just as the First Amendment violation alleged in the complaint was obvious for purposes of qualified immunity, so too the Fourth Amendment violation alleged here. The district court therefore erred in dismissing Villarreal's Fourth Amendment claim."); Villarreal v. City of Laredo, Texas, 44 F.4th 363, 380-81 (5th Cir. 2022) (superseding opinion) (Ho, J., concurring) ("The dissent contends that our holding today 'shreds the independent intermediary doctrine.'. . In essence, the dissent says that a magistrate issued a warrant, so the officers were entitled to rely on it. But that's not how the doctrine works. As the majority already explains . . . 'the fact that a neutral magistrate has issued a warrant authorizing the allegedly unconstitutional search or seizure does not end the inquiry into objective reasonableness.'. . We deny qualified immunity if 'it is obvious that no reasonably competent officer would have concluded that a warrant should issue.'. .Similarly, the dissent argues that, just as we can't question the officers because a magistrate issued a warrant, we likewise can't question the officers because a federal district court granted them qualified immunity. To quote the dissent, '[w]hat does [our majority opinion] say about ... the United States Magistrate Judge ... who decided the motion to dismiss on its merits and concluded that the defendants had reason to find probable cause to arrest Villarreal under the Texas statute?'. . . My answer is simple: It says that the federal magistrate judge got it wrong. So we reverse. If I understand the dissent's theory, however, it's that it's just too insulting for us to deny qualified immunity, when a fellow member of the federal judiciary has already voted to grant such immunity. But that would mean that, if one member of the judiciary would grant qualified immunity, the rest of us have no choice but to go along. That can't be right. That not only misunderstands qualified immunity—it's an alarming theory of our role under the Constitution. Finally, the dissent asserts that '[i]t is asking a lot of law enforcement officers to know about and then apply the doctrine of constitutional avoidance.'. . I profoundly disagree. We don't just ask—we require—every member of law enforcement to avoid violations of our Constitution. As well we should, given the considerable coercive powers that we vest in police officers. . . And when the violation is as obvious as it is here, we don't grant qualified immunity. Lastly, the dissent accuses the majority of 'employ[ing] blunt force rather than careful analysis,' by 'cast[ing] aside every individual defendant's qualified immunity in connection with the Fourth and First Amendment claims without regard to the role each was alleged to have played.'. .That overreads the majority opinion. The district court categorically granted qualified immunity to all of the individual defendants, on the ground that § 39.06(c) gives each defendant a complete defense to the various claims presented in this case. The majority simply rejects that rationale, and remands for further proceedings, as we typically do under these circumstances. It goes without saying, of course, that if individual defendants have particular reasons why they should be entitled to qualified immunity, including the reasons intimated by the dissent, they are welcome to present those claims on remand."); Villarreal v. City of Laredo, Texas, 44 F.4th 363, 385-86 (5th Cir. 2022) (superseding opinion) (Richman, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("What are the bench and bar to make of this? Similarly, what are the bench and bar to make of the passages in the majority opinion cataloging cases in which qualified immunity was denied because law enforcement officials attempted to enforce 'obviously unconstitutional statutes'? . . . That discussion is followed by a single sentence, which is an actual holding of the majority opinion: 'o]n its face, Texas Penal Code § 39.06(c) is not one of those "obviously unconstitutional" statutes.'. . That holding, though a grudging one, correctly resolves the issue of whether section 39.06(c) is 'obviously' unconstitutional. That holding should not be lost or overlooked due to its brevity or obfuscated by preceding or succeeding passages in the majority opinion. Nor should JUDGE HO'S concurring opinion muddy the water. It directly conflicts with the majority opinion's holding. The concurring opinion leads off its discussion of Texas Penal Code § 39.06(c) saying, 'no statute may be enforced that violates the Constitution' and '[l]ikewise, no officer of the law may hide behind an obviously unconstitutional statute to justify trampling on a citizen's fundamental liberties.'. . This and the discussion that follows would validate Villareal's insistence that section 39.06(c) is obviously unconstitutional. None of the impassioned observations about the First Amendment in the majority opinion or JUDGE HO's concurring opinion would be relevant to the case before us if a reasonably competent officer could objectively have concluded there was cause to arrest Villareal for suspected violations of Texas Penal Code § 39.06. This is the core disagreement I have with the majority opinion; that, and the fact that it shreds the independent intermediary doctrine. The majority opinion also employs blunt force rather than careful analysis. It casts aside every individual defendant's qualified immunity in connection with the Fourth and First Amendment claims without regard to the role each was alleged to have played. For example, it concludes that every individual defendant violated the Fourth Amendment because there was no probable cause to arrest Villareal. Yet, not every defendant was alleged to have participated in preparing and presenting arrest warrant affidavits. This exemplifies the rush to judgment in this case, heaping condemnation on all."); Ness v. City of Bloomington, 11 F.4th 914, 921-22 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Ness contends that the officers' threat to enforce the harassment statute against her for filming children in and around Smith Park violated her 'right to film.' She alleges that Meyer and Roepke told her that if she continued with her videotaping, and the complainants felt harassed or threatened by her activity, then Ness would be subject to arrest regardless of her intentions. She alleges that she 'ceased' her recording activity as a result of the encounter. The officers, however, reasonably relied on Minnesota's harassment statute in warning Ness that her video recording may constitute harassment. At the time, the statute permitted a conviction on proof that 'the actor knows or has reason to know' that the conduct 'would cause the victim ... to feel frightened, threatened, oppressed, persecuted, or intimidated.'. . Consistent with the statute, the officers allegedly informed Ness that her actions had caused the school principal and a parent to feel intimidated and scared. They allegedly warned Ness that she could be arrested for harassment if the complainants felt harassed or threatened by her continued videotaping. The reliance on a state statute that has not been declared unconstitutional is generally a paradigmatic example of reasonableness that entitles an officer to qualified immunity. . . When a legislative body establishes a law, the enactment 'forecloses speculation by enforcement officers concerning its constitutionality,' unless the law is 'so grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional that any person of reasonable prudence would be bound to see its flaws.'. . Police officers are not trained as constitutional lawyers. The alleged flaws in the 2019 harassment statute are not so 'gross' and 'flagrant' that no reasonable police officer could have believed that it was constitutional. Thus, the district court did not err in dismissing the claims against the officers based on qualified immunity."); Serrano v. Customs & Border Patrol, 975 F.3d 488, 503 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Assuming without deciding that a Bivens remedy is available in this context, Serrano's complaint fails to state a claim. Serrano's Bivens claims are premised on the theory that unnamed CBP officers and a CBP paralegal, Espinoza, violated his constitutional rights by seizing his truck and keeping it for 23 months without giving him an opportunity to contest the seizure in a post-seizure judicial hearing. At minimum, Serrano failed to plausibly allege that any individual federal defendant has violated clearly established law sufficient to overcome qualified immunity. Qualified immunity shields government officials from 'liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . In order for an official to lose the protections of qualified immunity, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . . Espinoza is entitled to qualified immunity. Serrano fails to set forth any facts specifically identifying what Espinoza or any unnamed Customs officers did to violate his rights. Instead, Serrano admits that the defendants acted within their authority: Serrano 'alleges that the government followed the relevant statutes but that the statutes themselves violate the Constitution.' In other words, Serrano concedes that the individual defendants were following the relevant statutes governing the seizure of his truck. Even if we assume that the Constitution required CBP's employees to follow additional or more expedited procedures, there is no existing precedent clearly establishing as much, and thus, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity."); Campbell v. Florian, 972 F.3d 385, 399 (4th Cir. 2020) ("The correct interpretation of the Omnibus Act has now been settled as a matter of state law—Florian and Tatarsky were wrong. But legal error alone is not deliberate indifference. As a result, Campbell fails to make out a violation of the Eighth Amendment. Florian and Tatarsky are thus entitled to qualified immunity, and Campbell's claim against them should be dismissed with prejudice."); Michigan Interlock, LLC v. Alcohol Detection Systems, LLC, 802 F. App'x 993, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("We begin with the second prong of the qualified immunity test: whether the constitutional rights at issue were clearly established. . . . At issue is whether it was clearly established that Interlock had a right to notice and an opportunity to be heard when Johnson decertified ADS's BAIIDs and removed Interlock from the Department's certified BAIID manufacturer list, as well as whether Johnson could not direct Interlock to uninstall the decertified BAIID devices without just compensation. We cannot say that 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [was] apparent.'. . .At the time Johnson acted, no court had declared the Michigan statute unconstitutional, and Johnson acted reasonably in enforcing it. . . . A presumption of constitutionality accompanies validly enacted state legislation, 'a presumption on which executive officials generally may depend in enforcing the legislature's handiwork.'. . . Here, Michigan's law providing manufacturers procedural rights upon decertification of their BAIIDs, but not providing such rights to non-manufacturers is not 'so grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional' that Secretary Johnson was unreasonable in enforcing it. Moreover, although the statute at issue did not vest property or liberty interests in the certification of a manufacturer's BAIIDs in entities other than the manufacturer, that decision by the legislature was not unreasonable nor 'grossly and flagrantly' unconstitutional. Johnson's conduct here was reasonable and complied with the Michigan statute she was tasked with enforcing. Interlock has not alleged that it has a right that was clearly established at a particularized level. Interlock cites to cases involving a generalized right to due process when the government deprives a citizen of a property or liberty interest, but these cases do not address the particular right asserted here. Interlock fails to cite a case from the Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit that clearly establishes that it has a property and liberty interest in the state including it on the list of certified BAIID manufacturers protected by the Due Process Clause. Interlock also fails to cite any Michigan court case determining that it has these alleged rights. Not a single case instructed Johnson to provide Interlock notice or an opportunity for a hearing or required her to include Interlock on the list of certified BAIID manufacturers. Given that Interlock bears the burden of presenting such a case to overcome qualified immunity, this failure is fatal to its position."); Vaduva v. City of Xenia, 780 F. App'x 331, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("In this case, Officer Defendants were enforcing a properly enacted ordinance when they issued Plaintiff a citation for soliciting donations for charity on the sidewalk in front of Xenia City Hall. Indeed, Plaintiff, seeking to challenge the constitutionality of XCO § 648.12, affirmatively asked Officer Defendants to issue him a citation for violating the ordinance. Thus, Officer Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity against Plaintiff's claims unless XCO § 648.12 is 'grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional.'. .Plaintiff argues that it is, and analogizes this case to Speet v. Schuette, 726 F.3d 867, 870 (6th Cir. 2013), in which this Court held that Michigan's 'anti-begging statute' violated the First Amendment on its face. However, the statute at issue in Speet was significantly broader than XCO § 648.12. Michigan's anti-begging statute prohibited 'begging in a public place,'. . . and this Court reasoned that it could not be read to 'limit its constitutional effect;' rather, it 'simply ban[ned] an entire category of activity that the First Amendment protects.'. . In contrast, XCO § 648.12 prohibits 'panhandling' in 17 specific forms and areas of the City. While one might argue that the 17 specific prohibitions in XCO § 648.12 effectively ban an entire category of activity that the First Amendment protects, whether that argument would be successful is unclear, particularly in light of this Court's frequent acknowledgment that 'facial overbreadth has not been invoked when a limiting construction has been or could be placed on the challenged statute.'. . Thus, XCO § 648.12 is not grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional, and Officer Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity against Plaintiff's claims. . .Accordingly, we hold that Officer Defendants are entitled judgment on the pleadings based on qualified immunity."); Tschida v. Motl, 924 F.3d 1297, 1305-6 (9th Cir. 2019) ("Representative Tschida contends that the district court improperly dismissed his damages claim against Commissioner Motl based on qualified immunity. We have held that 'an officer who acts in reliance on a duly-enacted statute or ordinance is ordinarily entitled to qualified immunity.'. . Under these circumstances, liability may attach only where (1) the statute 'authorizes official conduct which is patently violative of fundamental constitutional principles,' or (2) the official 'unlawfully enforces an ordinance in a particularly egregious manner, or in a manner which a reasonable officer would recognize exceeds the bounds of the ordinance.'. . Neither of these exceptions applies here. While we conclude that the rationale of Lind is persuasive in holding Montana's confidentiality provision unconstitutional, it was not objectively unreasonable for Commissioner Motl to conclude that Lind was not controlling in the circumstances of this case. The Hawai'i provision at issue in Lind swept far more broadly than the confidentiality provision of Montana's § 2-2-136(4). . . . In sum, it was not unreasonable for Commissioner Motl to rely on the constitutionality of Montana's duly enacted confidentiality statute, given the differences between Montana law and the law at issue in Lind. Accordingly, we conclude that Commissioner Motl is entitled to qualified immunity and affirm the judgment in his favor."); Ericson v. Frankenberry, 752 F. App'x 327, ___ (7th Cir. 2018) (Rovner, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("[I]n my view, dismissal of the claims against the arresting officers was premature. . . .[N]o reasonable officer could have believed that Ericson had committed the crime of loitering as that offense is defined by the Rochelle Code of Ordinances (hereafter "Code"). The applicable part of the Code provides: No person shall loiter on any part of the airport or in any building on the airport. Violators will be subject to the provisions of section 66-403 of the Municipal Code. . . The Code further provides that, 'Loiter means to remain in an area for no obvious reason.'. . This provision is virtually identical to the Chicago loitering ordinance invalidated by the Supreme Court some twenty years before these officers arrested Ericson. That ordinance defines 'loiter' as 'to remain in any one place with no apparent purpose.'. . .Arresting a person for violating an ordinance that is essentially identical to one that has been invalidated by the Supreme Court is a mistake of law. And although the Supreme Court has found that 'reasonable suspicion can rest on a mistaken understanding of the scope of a legal prohibition,' I am aware of no case allowing officers to make a warrantless arrest on probable cause for violating an invalidated law. Heien v. North Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 530, 536 (2014). . . . That the unrepresented plaintiff failed to apprehend the importance of this point does not mean that we are similarly constrained. We should not countenance an arrest made for a non-existent crime and we should certainly not do so on a motion to dismiss."); Halley v. Huckaby, 902 F.3d 1136, 1151 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Even if their actions violated clearly established law, Huckaby and Deputy Calloway nonetheless contend they are entitled to qualified immunity because their actions were objectively reasonable. Huckaby and Deputy Calloway claim they acted in reliance on the Oklahoma Children's Code, which they argue authorizes the detention of a child under these circumstances. Once a plaintiff shows a constitutional violation and that it was clearly established, 'it becomes defendant's burden to prove that her conduct was nonetheless objectively reasonable.'. . 'Of course, an officer's reliance on an authorizing statute does not render the conduct per se reasonable.'. . . To determine whether statutory authorization renders an. official's unconstitutional conduct objectively reasonable, we consider '(1) the degree of specificity with which the statute authorized the conduct in question; (2) whether the officer in fact complied with the statute; (3) whether the statute has fallen into desuetude; and (4) whether the officer could have reasonably concluded that the statute was constitutional.'. .Because the statute cannot reasonably be read to authorize the conduct in question, we conclude Deputy Calloway's actions were not objectively reasonable; we also conclude for this reason that Huckaby's actions were not objectively reasonable."); Weed v. Jenkins, 873 F.3d 1023, 1028-29 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Weed argues that Jenkins's order to disperse violated the First Amendment. Weed says that the order also violated due process because it was void for vagueness. This court need not reach the merits of those issues due to the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . . Jenkins could reasonably interpret St. Charles ordinance § 340.020 to forbid overpass protests that hinder or impede vehicular traffic. The ordinance authorized Jenkins to issue a proper order to disperse. The doctrine of qualified immunity protects Jenkins from First Amendment damages because he had no reason to know, based on preexisting law, that his order was unlawful."); United States v. Diaz, 854 F.3d 197, 204 & n.12 (2d Cir. 2017) ("We think that Officer Aybar's belief that the apartment-building stairwell qualified as a 'public place' within the meaning of the open-container law was an objectively reasonable prediction of the scope of the law when it was made. As in Heien, her assessment was premised on a reasonable interpretation of an ambiguous state law, the scope of which had not yet been clarified. Even now, the New York Court of Appeals has not addressed whether a common area inside an apartment building is a 'public place' within the meaning of the open-container law, and the other New York courts that have done so have reached conflicting conclusions. . . . In light of these conflicting precedents, Officer Aybar's belief that an apartment-building stairwell is a public place within the meaning of the open-container law was a reasonable, even if mistaken, assessment of the scope of that law at the time it was made. Thus, contrary to Diaz's contention, Officer Aybar had probable cause to believe that Diaz had violated the open-container law. . . .In this respect, the label 'mistake of law' may be a misnomer that could lead to confusion. The notion of a mistake seems to presuppose that the legal question was already settled, yet it is only when the legal question is unsettled that an officer's erroneous assessment of the law can be objectively reasonable. It may be useful, therefore, to think of such an assessment instead as an inaccurate prediction of law. In this light, the question is whether the officer's prediction as to the scope of the ambiguous law at issue was objectively reasonable—even if ultimately mistaken—such that a reasonable judge could have accepted it at the time it was made in light of the statutory text and the available judicial interpretations of that text. Formulated this way, the Heien principle has echoes of a defendant's due-process right to fair warning of the crime for which he or she is punished."); Smith v. City of Fairburn, Georgia, 679 F. App'x 916, 923-24 (11th Cir. 2017) ("In short, some cases (which could be distinguished) suggest that Smith's statement to Officer Hammock could support a terroristic threats charge and some cases (which could be distinguished) suggest that it could not. A reasonable officer could come to either conclusion. As a result, even if Detective Israel was wrong to conclude that Smith's statement demonstrated intent to communicate under Georgia's terroristic threats statute, his error was a reasonable mistake of law. And a reasonable mistake of law does not destroy probable cause. Cahaly v. Larosa, 796 F.3d 399, 408 (4th Cir. 2015) ("[O]fficers may have probable cause based on reasonable mistakes of law."). Cf. Heien v. North Carolina, 574 U.S. ___, 135 S. Ct. 530, 536–540 (2014) (holding that an officer has reasonable suspicion to conduct traffic stop even when his suspicion that a law has been violated is based on a reasonable mistake of law). As a result, Smith's alleged statements would support a finding of probable cause. . . Of course, Detective Israel did not parse the decisions discussed above before seeking a warrant for Smith's arrest. Few, if any, officers would. And he indicated that he was not aware that intent to communicate the threat was an element of terroristic threats. But that doesn't matter. In determining the existence or non-existence of probable cause, we do not ask what evidence the officer seeking an arrest warrant thought he needed to establish probable cause. We ask whether a reasonable officer, knowing the facts that the officer in question knew, would have had sufficient evidence to believe that probable cause existed. Detective Israel did here.")

Compare von Brincken v. Voss, 671 F. App'x 962, 963 (9th Cir. 2016) ("An officer in Voss's position could reasonably believe that Arizona Revised Statutes section 28-3169(A) required that von Brincken produce his driver's license upon Voss's demand, and that section 28-622 in turn made von Brincken's refusal to comply with Voss's lawful order a misdemeanor. . . While Voss subjectively believed that von Brincken's refusal to present his license violated a different statute, section 28-1595(B), an officer's 'subjective reason for making the arrest need not be the criminal offense as to which the known facts provide probable cause,' Devenpeck v. Alford, 543 U.S. 146, 153 (2004). Because an officer in Voss's position could reasonably believe von Brincken committed a misdemeanor in his presence, Voss and Legarra could reasonably believe that Voss had the authority to arrest von Brincken, see Ariz. Rev. Stat. § 13-3883(A)(2), and that the arrest would not violate von Brincken's Fourth Amendment rights, see Atwater v. City of Lago Vista, 532 U.S. 318, 354 (2001). Because Voss and Legarra could reasonably believe that their conduct complied with the law, and any unlawfulness was not clearly established (even assuming their conduct was unlawful), they are entitled to qualified immunity.").") with von Brincken v. Voss, 671 F. App'x 962, 963-64 (9th Cir. 2016) (Thomas, J., dissenting) ("The Fourth Amendment serves to ensure that one may not be arrested on suspicion of non-criminal conduct. Because Officers Voss and Legarra arrested Tarahawk von Brincken without probable cause to believe he had committed a crime, the Officers violated von Brincken's clearly established constitutional rights. Therefore, the Officers are not entitled to qualified immunity, as the district court correctly held. Because I agree entirely with the district court's analysis on this issue, I must respectfully dissent. The Fourth Amendment to the US Constitution protects people from unreasonable searches and seizures. U.S. Const. amend. IV. The Supreme Court has held that 'Fourth Amendment seizures are reasonable only if based on probable cause to believe that the individual has committed a crime.'. . Officer Voss relied on Arizona Revised Statute § 28-921(A)(1) (driving an improperly equipped vehicle) and § 28-1595(B) (failure to produce identification) as his authority for arresting von Brincken. However, the former statute is a civil traffic offense that does not subject one to arrest for criminal conduct. . . The latter statute subjects a driver to arrest for criminal conduct for not producing a driver's license upon the request of an officer only if the officer first conducted a traffic stop of the driver. . . Because it is undisputed that Officer Voss did not conduct a traffic stop of von Brincken before demanding to see his driver's license, the arrest for failure to produce the driver's license lacked probable cause and was therefore unconstitutional. To hold otherwise, as the majority does, turns a traffic offense statute into a 'stop and show me your papers' statute. Furthermore, the right to be free from unreasonable seizures was clearly established at the time of von Brincken's arrest. This is so even though the Arizona Supreme Court has not previously held that being pulled over while driving is a prerequisite to a reasonable arrest pursuant to Arizona Revised Statute § 28-1595(B). . . . Officers Voss and Legarra violated von Brincken's clearly established constitutional right to be free from an unreasonable seizure. As a result, they are not entitled to qualified immunity, as the district court properly held. I respectfully dissent.")

See also Wilber v. Curtis, 872 F.3d 15, 21-22 (1st Cir. 2017) ("We have explained that, with respect to a § 1983 claim that seeks to hold a police officer liable for making a warrantless arrest without probable cause, 'if the presence of probable cause is arguable or subject to legitimate question, qualified immunity will attach.'. . We also have made clear that police officers are, in determining whether probable cause exists to make a state law arrest, entitled to qualified immunity for their reasonable but mistaken assessments of the bounds of state law. . . Here, as we have noted, the defendants identify two state law offenses for which an officer reasonably could have determined that there was probable cause to arrest Wilber beyond the two state law offenses (disorderly conduct and disturbing the peace) that the Magistrate Judge considered. In affirming the grant of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, we focus on only one of these two other state law offenses: interfering with the duties of a police officer, which is a common law crime in Massachusetts. . . .[F]or purposes of qualified immunity, it is not enough to show that the officers may have made a mistaken determination about whether Wilber's conduct provided probable cause to conclude that he had committed the offense for which he was arrested. Wilber must show that it was clear under state law that there was not probable cause to arrest him for this crime. . . And, with respect to that question, Wilber cites no authority—and we are aware of none—that would suggest that it was clear at the time of his arrest that this offense does not encompass the particular circumstances that the officers confronted. After all, Wilber does not dispute that Kinsella and Curtis were present at the worksite for a legitimate law enforcement reason, that he placed yellow tape across the worksite which the officers had to take down, or that he then remained on the site after those officers repeatedly requested that he leave in consequence of his actions and even after the officers had informed him that he would be arrested if he failed to comply with their request that he leave. To be sure, Wilber is right that there is nothing in the record to suggest that he had any physical contact with the officers. But Wilber cites to no Massachusetts authority that would indicate such contact is a requirement of the crime, nor does he make any argument as to why it would be unreasonable to conclude that no such requirement exists. Rather, the cases he does cite for the proposition that physical contact is required merely show that one can commit the crime by engaging in such conduct, . . . and not that this offense imposes any requirement that such conduct must have occurred . . . Thus, while the defendants bear the burden of proving that they are entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, we conclude that that they have met that burden here. Accordingly, we affirm the grant of summary judgment on this ground."); Mackey v. Meyer, 675 F. App'x 705, 709 (9th Cir. 2017) ("In the context of the Fourth Amendment, 'if the officer's mistake as to what the law requires is reasonable, [then] the officer is entitled to the immunity defense.'. . Here, Meyer's mistake was unreasonable as both statutes at issue are clear on their face. First, no reasonable officer would arrest an individual without ensuring that individual did not have a permit under Section 1860(a). Second, it was objectively unreasonable for Meyer to think Mackey was obstructing or intimidating individuals based on the information relayed by the dispatcher in combination with what he witnessed upon arriving on the scene. We thus conclude that Meyer is not entitled to qualified immunity."); Graham v. Gagnon, 831 F.3d 176, 186-89 (4th Cir. 2016) ("We cannot find in the record any attempted action by the officers that could be said to have been 'obstructed' by Graham, and the officers' brief and oral argument are likewise missing even a suggested action that was actually obstructed. Regardless, we are not the first court to read this statute. Both the Virginia courts and this Court have applied the statute many times before, and there is a small mountain of caselaw that makes clear that whatever the outer boundary of Virginia Code § 18.2-460(A), Graham came nowhere near it. . . .It is true that an actual lack of probable cause is not dispositive for qualified immunity purposes; qualified immunity protects officers who make mistakes if those mistakes are reasonable. But the officers' contention misses the point. The boundaries of the statute are extremely relevant to an assessment of whether a mistake was reasonable. . . .Numerous decisions of the Virginia courts and this Court provide guidance on the scope of Virginia Code § 18.2-460(A). There are undoubtedly still gray areas at the statute's boundaries, meaning that officers enforcing it will at times face close cases. This was not one of those cases. Given Graham's known conduct, it would have been clear to reasonable officers in Appellees' position that they lacked probable cause to arrest Graham for obstruction of justice. We therefore reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to Gagnon and Clipp."); Neita v. City of Chicago, 830 F.3d 494, 499 (7th Cir. 2016) ("An official who reasonably relies on a facially valid state law may be entitled to qualified immunity if his conduct is later challenged. . . But Neita has alleged that the officers never received a complaint of animal abuse or neglect, or alternatively, that they knew that any such complaint was false. Accepting these allegations as true, section 10 of the Illinois Act is not implicated, and the officers cannot invoke reliance on it as a basis for qualified immunity. Dismissal on qualified-immunity grounds was unwarranted at this stage of the litigation."); Citizens in Charge, Inc. v. Husted, 810 F.3d 437, 440-43, 445-46 (6th Cir. 2016) ("At the time Husted acted, no court had declared this residency requirement unconstitutional and he acted reasonably in saying he would enforce it. When public officials implement validly enacted state laws that no court has invalidated, their conduct typically satisfies the core inquiry—the 'objective reasonableness of an official's conduct'—that the immunity doctrine was designed to test. . . . Because Secretary Husted acted in the face of legislative action (a duly enacted, presumptively constitutional law) and judicial inaction (the absence of an on-point decision making the law unconstitutional), he did not violate clearly established law or otherwise act unreasonably. . . . So far as the parties' research has revealed and so far as our own research has uncovered, the Supreme Court has never denied qualified immunity to a public official who enforced a properly enacted statute that no court had invalidated. This indeed would seem to be the paradigmatic way of showing objectively reasonable conduct by a public official. . . . The enforcement of a presumptively valid law, it is also true, does not automatically entitle officials to qualified immunity. Some laws may be 'so grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional' that any reasonable officer would decline to enforce them. . . This exception means that, contrary to plaintiffs' concerns, the Secretary would not receive qualified immunity for enforcing an 'involuntary servitude' law or one that required 'separate but equal racial accommodations,' even if such laws somehow were enacted by the Ohio General Assembly. . . .Today's election statute is not a 'grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional' law. At the same time that the Tenth Circuit has invalidated residency requirements for initiative-petition circulators, . . . the Eighth Circuit has upheld such a requirement, see Initiative & Referendum Inst. v. Jaeger, 241 F.3d 614, 616–17 (8th Cir.2001). . . . Whether our court would accept the Eighth Circuit's reasoning if presented with the same question matters not. What matters is that the existence of a circuit split by itself amply supports Husted's position that he could reasonably conclude that Ohio's residency requirement was constitutional. . . If judges can reasonably disagree about the meaning of the Constitution, we should not punish public officials for reasonably picking one side or the other of the debate. . . .The plaintiffs worry that permitting public officials to rely on a presumption of constitutionality will convert qualified immunity into absolute immunity whenever an executive officer enforces a validly enacted law. They note that, while courts have expressed concern about imposing personal liability on police officers who enforce presumptively legitimate statutes, the same anxieties do not apply to the Secretary of State, who has the legal staff and the budget to assess a law's constitutionality. But the DeFillippo inquiry does not create an absolute bar, and we may still hold executive officers liable for 'grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional' conduct, . . . as we have done before . . . . And while police-officer cases may raise some different concerns than the present one, we have never suggested that the qualified-immunity inquiry differs depending on the precise official at issue."); Mocek v. City of Albuquerque, 813 F.3d 912, 922-27, 929 (10th Cir. 2015) ("During an investigative stop supported by reasonable suspicion of a predicate, underlying crime, 'it is well established that an officer may ask a suspect to identify himself.' [citing Hiibel] A state may criminalize the suspect's failure to comply. . . Thus, to determine whether Mocek's arrest comported with the Fourth Amendment, we must first consider whether there was reasonable suspicion to stop him and request his identity. If there was, we next must determine whether probable cause existed to believe he concealed his identity. Although we hold the investigative stop was justified by reasonable suspicion of disorderly conduct, we doubt that there was probable cause to arrest Mocek merely for failing to show documentation proving his identity in this case. Nonetheless, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because even assuming they misinterpreted New Mexico law, their mistake was reasonable. . . . In concluding there was reasonable suspicion of disorderly conduct, we emphasize the uniquely sensitive setting we confront in this case. . . . Based on the face of the complaint, the information available to Officer Dilley indicated that Mocek had distracted multiple TSA agents, persistently disobeyed their orders, already caused a 'disturbance' (according to the agents on the scene), and potentially threatened security procedures at a location where order was paramount. Under these circumstances, a reasonable officer would have had reason to believe, or at least investigate further, that Mocek had committed or was committing disorderly conduct. Accordingly, Officer Dilley was justified in stopping Mocek and asking him to identify himself as part of the investigation. . . .Mocek argues there was no probable cause to arrest him for concealing name or identity under § 30–22–3 because (1) Officer Dilley never even asked for Mocek's name; (2) although Officer Dilley did ask for Mocek's I.D., he did not ask for other identifying information; and (3) the statute does not criminalize the mere failure to produce physical documentation of identity. Mocek may be correct that Officer Dilley misinterpreted the statute. But even if he did, he at least had arguable probable cause to arrest Mocek because any mistake of law on his part was reasonable. . . .New Mexico law is not entirely clear on whether someone in Mocek's shoes might be required to answer basic questions about his identity, such as a request for his address. But Officer Dilley's only request was for documentation, and failing to show documentation, in isolation, during an investigative stop for disorderly conduct might not amount to concealing one's identity. Nonetheless, Officer Dilley is entitled to qualified immunity. A reasonable mistake in interpreting a criminal statute, for purposes of determining whether there is probable cause to arrest, entitles an officer to qualified immunity. . . . Here, New Mexico courts had explicitly held '[i]dentity is not limited to name alone' and 'failing to give either name or identity may violate the statute.'. . They had also held that at least during traffic stops, the statute requires a driver to produce a driver's license or the information therein upon request. . . Although the court declined to 'specify[ ] what identifying information might be appropriate' outside the driving context, . . . it nowhere foreclosed the possibility that documentation is required elsewhere. Thus, a reasonable officer could have believed that an investigative stop for disorderly conduct at an airport security checkpoint required the production of some physical proof of identity. And Mocek provided none. . . . Given Mocek's continued refusal to show identification and resolution to remain silent, a reasonable officer could have thought he was intentionally hindering investigative efforts. . . . Thus, in these circumstances, an officer who reasonably believed identification was required could have also believed that Mocek's ongoing failure to show it violated the statute. . . .We therefore hold Officer Dilley is entitled to qualified immunity on Mocek's Fourth Amendment claim."[footnotes omitted]); United States v. Cunningham, 630 F. App'x 873, 878-79 (10th Cir. 2015) ("The officers in this case could reasonably believe this language encompassed turns when exiting a private parking lot because such turns constitute 'turn[ing] a vehicle from a direct course.' And they could also reasonably believe that 'turn[ing] a vehicle from a direct course' need not occur 'upon a roadway.'. . But it really doesn't matter. Even assuming 'upon a roadway' modified 'turn [ing] a vehicle from a direct course,' the officers could have reasonably believed Ulloa's failure to signal in this case occurred 'upon a roadway'—her turn required her to cross the westbound parking and driving lanes of the public road and enter its eastbound driving lane. Similarly, while Colorado's traffic code does not apply to private roads and driveways, see Colo.Rev.Stat. § 42–4–103(2), the conduct in this case did not occur exclusively on a private road or driveway. The officers could reasonably conclude (as we do) that such conduct involved 'the use of streets or highways' under § 42–4–103(2). We have found no authority from the Colorado Supreme Court or any Colorado Court of Appeals indicating otherwise."); Freeman v. City of Tampa, No. 8:15-CV-2262-T-30EAJ, 2015 WL 8270025, at *4 (M.D. Fla. Dec. 8, 2015) ("Freeman alleges that Defendant Officers violated the Fourth Amendment because they lacked reasonable suspicion to detain him and search him. Freeman also alleges that Defendant Officers violated the Second Amendment to the extent that they interfered with his constitutional right to keep and bear arms. Defendants quibble with the facts, arguing that Defendant Officers had arguable reasonable suspicion to temporarily detain Freeman based on Fla. Stat. § 790.053(1), which prohibits the open carrying of a weapon. Defendants argue that Defendant Officers did not know that openly carrying a handgun while fishing was exempted conduct so they did not 'knowingly' violate the law. And that arguable reasonable suspicion can be supported by a mistake of law. This argument may ring true at the summary judgment stage. But the alleged facts, which this Court must accept as true at this stage, do not state or even suggest that Defendant Officers were acting under a mistake of law. Thus, qualified immunity cannot be determined at this time. Defendants' motion to dismiss on this issue is denied.").

Compare Coates v. Powell, 639 F.3d 471, 476, 477 (8th Cir. 2011) ("On appeal, neither Coates nor Glandon challenge the court's determination that Glandon's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, we turn to the second inquiry of qualified immunity analysis. . . . [W]e frame the clearly established question as whether a reasonable police officer would have known that he violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law by remaining in Coates's home for ten to fifteen minutes when the officer was accompanying a social services worker investigating a complaint of child neglect as authorized by state statute. We affirm the grant of qualified immunity. . . . Here, Glandon undertook an obligation under Missouri law to assist Clevenger in the investigation relating to Coates's children. . . Although Coates ordered the officers out of the house, she did not address Clevenger in that request. . . Clevenger remained inside the house, attempting to continue the investigation. We believe that a reasonable police officer could act in good faith and remain in the house still assisting Clevenger.") with Coates v. Powell, 639 F.3d 471, 477-79 (8th Cir. 2011) (Shepherd, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I part ways with the majority. . .over its decision to grant qualified immunity to Glandon. I am deeply concerned about the Fourth Amendment violation at issue in this case. . . . The Supreme Court is crystal clear that without a warrant, an officer cannot enter a home absent exigent circumstances. . . Because Glandon did not have a warrant and there were no exigent circumstances, Glandon could only enter the home with Coates's voluntary consent . . . and he remained in the home subject to her approval. . . . Although a report of child abuse is a serious allegation, by the time Glandon was asked to leave the home, Glandon knew there was no immediate danger to the children. Accordingly, Glandon violated Coates's Fourth Amendment rights when he did not leave her home at her request. . . A finding of a Fourth Amendment violation does not end the analysis, and I agree with the majority that the crux of the qualified immunity question is whether a reasonable officer would have understood that remaining in Coates's home without her permission violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law. But I disagree with the majority's conclusion that despite the longstanding Fourth Amendment prohibition, Glandon acted reasonably because of the obligations imposed on officers under the Missouri statute at issue. Because I believe the Missouri statute did not make Glandon's actions objectively reasonable, I respectfully dissent. . . . [B]efore concluding that the Missouri statute at issue made Glandon's actions reasonable, I think the majority should have considered the statute's specificity. Because the Missouri statute imposes only a general obligation on officers, Glandon's compliance with the statute did not make his actions reasonable. The relevant Missouri statute, section 2010.145 .4 of the Missouri Revised Statutes, states that '[t]he appropriate law enforcement agency shall ... assist the [Children's] division in the investigation.' The statute does not, however, define or specify the form of assistance required. Thus, although the statute obligated Glandon to offer some type of help, it did not specifically require him to accompany social services workers in their investigations, let alone require him to accompany them into private homes or remain with them in private homes even after homeowners withdraw their consent . . . Here, because remaining in Coates's home without her consent violated well-established Fourth Amendment law and nothing in Missouri statute obligated Glandon to stay, Glandon's actions were not objectively reasonable. . . .If the Missouri statute had in fact required Glandon to 'accompany' the social services worker, I would most likely agree that it made Glandon's actions reasonable. Because the statute imposed only a general obligation to assist, however, I conclude that despite the Missouri statute, a reasonable officer would have known that remaining in Coates's home violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law. I respectfully dissent from the majority's decision to grant qualified immunity to Glandon.").

See also Cahaly v. Larosa, 796 F.3d 399, 407 (4th Cir. 2015) ("We turn to Cahaly's cross-appeal of his § 1983 and state law claims. Because we find that probable cause supported his arrest for violating the anti-robocall statute, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to the Defendants. . . Cahaly alleges that LaRosa and Lloyd violated § 1983 by arresting and prosecuting him in retaliation for his exercise of free speech. He first argues that a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether LaRosa had probable cause to arrest him. We disagree. A law enforcement officer who obtains an arrest warrant loses the protection of qualified immunity '[o]nly where the warrant application is so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence unreasonable.'. . Although we agree with Cahaly and the district court that the statute is unconstitutional, at the time of Cahaly's arrest, 'there was no controlling precedent that [the statute] was or was not constitutional [and a] prudent officer [is not] required to anticipate that a court would later hold the [statute] unconstitutional.'. . Thus, our earlier holding has no bearing on whether LaRosa had probable cause when he arrested Cahaly."); Vincent v. Yelich, 718 F.3d 157, 170 (2d Cir. 2013) ("The district court in Vincent I also found qualified immunity appropriate on the ground that ' "absent contrary direction, state officials ... are entitled to rely on a presumptively valid state statute ... until and unless the statute is declared unconstitutional[.]"'. . . We agree with the principle. But that presumption cannot be relied upon once the federal court of appeals for the circuit in which the officials operate has ruled that the exact conduct of the official, undertaken on the basis of the state statute, violates federal law. Although we note that qualified immunity may sometimes be available where a decision of the Supreme Court or this Court has announced a constitutional principle and subsequent cases have differed as to the reach of that holding, see, e.g., Safford Unified School District # 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 378–79 (2009), such instances usually involve fact patterns that differ. Here, however, the very conduct that is challenged in the present cases is the conduct that was held unconstitutional in Earley I. Indeed, it was held unconstitutional with respect to one of the present plaintiffs. . . . The fact that it was not until 2008 that the New York Court of Appeals declared the administrative imposition of PRS on prisoners who had not been so sentenced judicially to be unlawful under State law, however, did not affect the invalidity of such impositions under federal law, which was announced in Earley I in 2006. State and local officials are required to comply not just with state law but with federal law as well."); Acosta v. City of Costa Mesa, 718 F.3d 800, 823, 824 (9th Cir. 2013) ("[O]ur determination that § 2–61 is facially invalid does not impact our review of the district court's determination that the individual officers are entitled to qualified immunity. When a city council enacts an ordinance, officers are entitled to assume that the ordinance is a valid and constitutional exercise of authority. . . If an officer reasonably relies on the council's duly enacted ordinance, then that officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In the present case, qualified immunity still protects the officers even though we find the statute upon which they relied facially unconstitutional. Like the statute in Grossman, § 2–61 was duly promulgated by the proper process and was recognized as a valid portion of the Costa Mesa Municipal Code. Just as the officer in Grossman reasonably believed the statute constitutional, the officers here reasonably believed § 2–61 was constitutional. During oral argument, strong arguments were presented for the constitutionality of this statute and it would not be fair to require the officers of Costa Mesa to be versed in the nuances of the canons of construction such that they would recognize this statute's potential constitutional invalidity. Thus, it was objectively reasonable for the officers to believe the ordinance valid when they removed and later arrested Acosta for violating § 2–61."); Mueller v. Auker, 700 F.3d 1180, 1188 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Idaho law permits a police officer to place a child in shelter care without a court order when necessary to prevent serious physical injury. I.C. § 16–1612(since renumbered as I.C. § 16–1608). The Muellers' late assertion in their reply brief that this law is 'obviously unconstitutional' is of no help to them on this issue, because at the time the disputed decisions were made, no clearly established law existed to that effect. Moreover, the existence of a state statute authorizing an official's disputed conduct weighs in that official's favor, so long as the statute itself does not offend the Constitution, and I.C. § 16–1612 does not."); Austell

v. Sprenger, 690 F.3d 929, 936, 937 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Qualified immunity is particularly appropriate in this instance because the DHS defendants were operating under conflicting statutory directives. DHS was required under Mo.Rev.Stat. § 210.245(2) to give TYBE notice and, upon TYBE's request, a hearing. However, TYBE's license expired on July 31, 2007, and Mo.Rev.Stat. § 210.211.1 explicitly prohibited TYBE from operating a childcare facility without a license 'in effect.' Once TYBE's license expired, DHS could not provide TYBE with pre-deprivation notice—the license expired by operation of law—while simultaneously enforcing the licensing requirement. We cannot say the DHS defendants' attempt to resolve this foggy statutory conflict was constitutionally unreasonable."); Alston v. Read, 663 F.3d 1094, 1099, 1100 (9th Cir. 2011) ("[N]either Haygood nor Alexander establishes a duty to obtain a prisoner's court file where the institutional file appears complete, the sentence was appropriately recalculated under state law, and the prisoner has presented no evidence to the contrary. Read and Simmons were entitled to rely on the state statute and the original judgment received from the court in their sentencing calculations and were not required to go in search of additional courthouse records that might affect Alston's sentence beyond what was initially received from the court for inclusion in DPS's institutional file. . . . We conclude that there is no clearly established duty on a prison official to review a prisoner's original court records beyond those in his institutional file on the facts of this case. Thus, Read and Simmons are entitled to qualified immunity."); Reher v. Vivo, 656 F.3d 772, 775-78 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Where the law is open to interpretation, qualified immunity protects police officers who reasonably interpret an unclear statute. . . .The difficulty, and the reason the officers in this case are entitled to qualified immunity, is that, given the lack of case law on point, a reasonable officer would not necessarily have known whether Reher's alleged videotaping of the children was suspicious enough to cross the line between 'mere videotaping' and videotaping plus whatever else is necessary to give rise to disorderly conduct in Illinois. Certain things, however, should have been clear to the officers. It should have been clear that refusing to talk to and calling Gabinski a pejorative name was not enough to arrest Reher for disorderly conduct. . . It also should have been clear that the neighbors' agitation, alone, did not give the officers probable cause to arrest–especially since Reher claims to have told the officers that he remained calm when the neighbors accosted him and took his bicycle. . . But here there was more. Gabinski, at least, was aware that there was a long history of domestic disputes between Reher and Outlaw. While the last such dispute had occurred several years before, the incidents Gabinski was aware of were fairly serious, and included distributing nude pictures of Outlaw in the apartment complex, throwing a rock through Outlaw's window, and violating orders of protection. At the scene, Outlaw accused Reher of harassing her and her daughter, and at least one neighbor told the police that she had seen Reher in the park before. An arrest for disorderly conduct is justified when the defendant directly harasses or threatens other people. . .And Illinois courts have found that behavior similar to stalking can form the basis of a disorderly conduct charge. . . We find that, in light of Outlaw's accusations at the scene, it would have been reasonable for an officer with Gabinski's knowledge of Reher and Outlaw's turbulent history to conclude that Reher was harassing Outlaw and Ashley. Gabinski therefore had probable cause to arrest Reher for disorderly conduct. Even assuming otherwise, Gabinski would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . Whether Vivo is entitled to immunity is a closer question. He was not aware of Outlaw's allegations against Reher. . .

.However, Vivo was aware that one of the women had accused Reher of videotaping the children. The same woman also told the officers that she was suspicious because she had seen Reher in the park several times before watching the children. Vivo would also have heard that Llorens, another neighbor, was worried that Reher was a sex offender or a peeping Tom. . . . [A]n officer faced with the circumstances present here could have reasonably, but mistakenly, believed that Reher was in fact harassing the children and alarming their parents, giving rise to probable cause to arrest. . .Therefore, Vivo is entitled to qualified immunity."); Amore v. Novarro, 624 F.3d 522, 534, 535 (2d Cir. 2010) ("The plaintiff and amici suggest the fact that the statute had been held unconstitutional automatically and necessarily strips the officer of immunity. We disagree. We accept that it is the unusual case where a police officer's enforcement of an unconstitutional statute will be immune. And there are suggestions from the Supreme Court and our own court that an officer's entitlement to rely on a statute ordinarily expires when a binding court decision declares the statute unconstitutional. . . There are cases, too, from other circuits where qualified immunity was denied to an officer enforcing a statute that, while still 'on the books,' had previously been declared unconstitutional in a binding court decision. . . We have no reason to doubt the conclusions of those courts. But the statutes at issue and the circumstances of arrest they were considering differ from the facts presented here. . . None of these cases, nor any other binding authority of which we are aware, stands for the categorical proposition that if a statute has been held unconstitutional, adherence to it by a law enforcement official is, ipso facto, unreasonable for qualified immunity purposes irrespective of the circumstances. We do not think that to be the law. . . We ordinarily impute knowledge of the case law to public officials. . . But, as Judge Hartz of the Tenth Circuit has noted, albeit in dissent, '[t]he statement in Harlow that reasonably competent public officials know clearly established law[ ] is a legal fiction.' Lawrence v. Reed, 406 F.3d 1224, 1237 (10th Cir.2005) (Hartz, J., dissenting) (internal citation omitted). Qualified immunity is appropriate in 'those situations in which the legal fiction does not make sense and applying that fiction would create problems that qualified immunity is intended to avert.'. . While we may not consider an official's subjective intent in determining whether he is entitled to qualified immunity, . . . we do–and must–consider 'the particular facts of the case,'. . . including the objective information before the officer at the time of the arrest. In the case at bar, where the defendant acted deliberately and rationally in seeking to determine the then–valid, applicable and enforceable law before taking the actions for which the plaintiff now seeks to hold him accountable, we cannot say that Novarro's arrest of Amore was objectively unreasonable. His immunity stands. . . . Our conclusion that Novarro's motion for summary judgment on the section 1983 claim against him must be granted on qualified-immunity grounds does not detract, of course, from Amore's remaining failure-to-train claim against the City of Ithaca; indeed the facts upon which it is based may tend to support such a claim."); Finch v. Peterson, 622 F.3d 725, 726 (7th Cir. 2010) ("The 1978 consent decree does not operate to confer qualified immunity on the city officials who were involved in making the challenged promotions. Nothing in that decree required them to take race into consideration in making promotions. To the contrary, specific language in the decree required promotions within the Police Department to be made without regard to race or color."); Cowart v. Enrique, 311 F. App'x 210, 215, 216 (11th Cir. 2009) ("Florida law gives agents of the FDOA inspection powers 'to enter into or upon any place ... if determined by the department to pose a threat to agricultural or public interest of this state.' Fla. Stat. ' 581.031(15)(a). The statute does not specifically require the agent to obtain a warrant before conducting an inspection. . . Deputies Enrique and Poole acted with the understanding that Agent Fagan did not need a warrant to remove the tree in Cowart's yard. Their reliance on the statute also led them to believe that Cowart committed a crime when he refused to allow the tree to be taken without a warrant. However, the Deputies' mistake will not subject them to liability for civil damages. The Deputies enforced a statute as it was enacted and therefore had no 'fair warning' that strict adherence to the Florida statutes would have them run afoul of the Constitution."); Kloch v. Kohl, 545 F.3d 603, 609 (8th Cir. 2008) ("Even if we were to conclude that Dr. Kloch properly alleged a constitutional violation, we are satisfied that Bruning is entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of our analysis: whether the right at issue was so clearly established that a reasonable official would have known that his conduct was unconstitutional. . . Qualified immunity protects public officials who act in good faith while performing discretionary duties that they are obligated to undertake. . . Bruning had a statutory obligation to enforce the laws of his state. . . His decision to enforce a law of arguable constitutional validity falls within the ambit of protected official discretion."); Hancock v. Baker, 263 F. App'x 416, 2008 WL 268267, at *2, *3 (5th Cir. 2008) ("[D]ismissal of Hancock for refusing to take a polygraph that required her to waive her Fifth Amendment rights was a violation of clearly established law. . . . Considering the clearly established law, a reasonable official should not have fired an employee under those circumstances. A reasonable official would have understood that a waiver of rights required by an officer from a different agency could have voided his promise that the investigation was administrative. The Supreme Court has clearly established that regardless of the ultimate effectiveness of the waiver, the coercion to waive the right violates the Fifth Amendment. . . . The fact that Fincher's requirement that Hancock waive her rights was a 'matter of procedure' does not make Baker's actions reasonable. That Fincher was blindly following a blanket procedure does not excuse Baker's violation of a clearly established constitutional right."); Kay v. Bemis, 500 F.3d 1214, 1221 n.6 (10th Cir. 2007) ("The question also remains whether the prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity in applying prison regulations to Kay's religious practices. Kay must show at the time of his challenged action it was clearly established that any regulation was unconstitutional. . . We have recognized that an officer's 'reliance on a state statute, regulation, or official policy that explicitly sanctioned the conduct in question' may absolve the officer from knowing that his conduct was unlawful. . . The exception to this rule is that 'where a statute authorizes conduct that is Apatently violative of fundamental constitutional principles," reliance on the statute does not immunize the officer's conduct."); Boles v. Neet, 486 F.3d 1177, 1183, 1184 & n.6 (10th Cir. 2007) ("The parties' disagreement about how broadly to define the constitutional right is understandable. As we have previously noted, striking the right balance is crucial to the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Our task is to evaluate Warden Neet's assertion of qualified immunity in the context of the circumstances that he faced without being too constrained by the particular facts of the case. . . . In support of his summary judgment motion, Warden Neet argued that his decision to deny Boles's request to wear religious garments during transport was based solely on prison regulations in effect at the time. . . . We appreciate Warden Neet's position that he did not intend to violate Boles's constitutional rights, but he is not immune from liability simply because he acted in accordance with prison regulations. . . . Warden Neet's actions were reasonable and he is entitled to qualified immunity only if the regulation that he relied on was reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest. Since, as we have already held, there is nothing in the record to indicate as much, he has not established the defense of qualified immunity. . . . We recognize that one of the relevant factors in evaluating the reasonableness of Warden Neet's actions is whether he relied on a regulation or official policy that explicitly sanctioned his conduct. . . But the regulation at issue here, AR 300-37 RD, at most only implicitly sanctioned his conduct. It states that inmates are to be transported in orange jumpsuits and transport shoes. In our view, whether it implicitly forbids the wearing of other items depends on the purpose behind the regulation."), qualified immunity granted on remand, Boles v. Neet, 2009 WL 3158125 (D. Colo. Sept. 29, 2009); Field Day v. County of Suffolk, 463 F.3d 167, 192 (2d Cir. 2006) ("In support of their assertion that no clearly established right has been pleaded in this case, the Suffolk County Employees make two related arguments. First, they argue that the Mass Gathering Law 'withstood a constitutional challenge in the New York State Court system,'. . . . Second, citing Vives v. City of New York, 405 F.3d 115 (2d Cir.2005), the Suffolk County Employees argue that because the Mass Gathering Law had never been declared unconstitutional they were entitled to rely on it as presumptively valid, and thus were without 'prior notice of an alleged constitutional infirmity.' These related arguments suffer from the same defect: They confuse and conflate the facial constitutionality of a statute with the unconstitutional application of that same statute. . . .Vives has no application to the issue presented here."); Way v. County of Ventura, 445 F.3d 1157, 1166 (9th Cir. 2006) (Wardlaw, J., concurring) ("In this case, the Ventura County Sheriff's Department policy authorized the conduct in question. Officers Brooks and Hanson complied with that policy. In addition, California Penal Code ' 4030(f) specifically exempts those arrested on misdemeanor 'weapons, controlled substances or violence' charges from the general prohibition on strip and body cavity searches of persons arrested for misdemeanors. Because the policy and the state statute had not fallen into desuetude, Grossman, 33 F.3d at 1209 n. 19, nor were they 'patently violative of fundamental constitutional principles,' id. at 1209, it was objectively reasonable for officers Brooks and Hanson to rely on the policy and the state statute in performing the strip search on Way. I therefore concur with the majority in finding that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity."); Roska v. Sneddon, 437 F.3d 964, 971, 972, 978 (10th Cir. 2006) ("In Roska I, this court held that Defendants' removal of Rusty without a warrant or pre-deprivation hearing deprived Plaintiffs of their clearly established constitutional right to maintain a family relationship. . . Usually, if the law is clearly established at the time of defendant's conduct, a qualified immunity defense will fail. . . 'Nevertheless, if the official pleading the defense claims extraordinary circumstances and can prove that he neither knew nor should have known of the relevant legal standard, the defense should be sustained.'. . Reliance on a state statute is one extraordinary circumstance which may render an official's conduct objectively reasonable. . . Reliance on a statute does not, however, make an official's conduct per se reasonable. . . Rather, it is one factor 'which militates in favor of the conclusion that a reasonable official would find that conduct constitutional.' . . Relevant factors in determining whether reliance on a statute rendered an official's conduct objectively reasonable include: (1) the degree of specificity with which the statute authorized the conduct; (2) whether the official in fact complied with the statute; (3) whether the statute has fallen into desuetude; and (4) whether the official could have reasonably concluded the statute was constitutional. . . Defendants bear the burden of proving their conduct was objectively reasonable in light of a state statute. . . Utah Code Ann.§62A-4a-202.1 (1998) [In footnote court points out that AUtah child protection laws were amended after the events that gave rise to this litigation. The amended statute, which took effect in July 2002, requires exigent circumstances before DCFS can remove a child without a warrant. Utah Code Ann.§62A-4a-202.1(1) (2000 & Supp.2005)"] authorized DCFS to take a child into protective custody without obtaining a warrant if: (1) a caseworker had substantial cause to believe any of the factors in Utah Code Ann.§78- 3a-301 existed, and (2) the caseworker provided the child's parents or child with services that would eliminate the need for removal, if those services were reasonably available and consistent with the child's safety and welfare. Utah Code Ann.§62A-4a-202.2 provided for post-deprivation procedures that had to be in place before DCFS could remove a child without a warrant pursuant to Utah Code Ann. § 62A-4a-202.1. The parties agree that these statutory provisions had not fallen into desuetude at the time of Defendants' actions. Further, Defendants could have reasonably concluded the statute was constitutional. . . . Applying the factors this court articulated in Roska I, Defendants could have reasonably concluded Utah Code Ann.§§62A-4a-202.1 and -202.2 were constitutional and had not fallen into desuetude. Defendants, however, failed to actually comply with the statute upon which they purportedly relied. While only one of the Roska I factors weighs against concluding Defendants' actions were objectively reasonable, it is an important factor and, in this case, it is dispositive. . . . [B]y failing to offer or provide preventive services that were reasonably available when faced with the opinion of the main treating physician that removal might harm Rusty more than allowing him to remain in the home, Defendants failed to properly consider and balance the parents' interest. In light of the balancing required by the statute and the Constitution, this failure was objectively unreasonable. Defendants are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity."); Cooper v. Dillon, 403 F.3d 1208, 1211, 1220 (11th Cir. 2005) ("This appeal requires us to determine the constitutionality under the First Amendment of a Florida statutory provision which makes it a misdemeanor for a participant in an internal investigation of a law enforcement officer to disclose any information obtained pursuant to the investigation before it becomes public record. . . .Now that we have determined that Fla. Stat. ch. 112.533(4) is unconstitutional, we turn to Cooper's claims that Dillon's enforcement of the statute subjected him to liability under § 1983 . . . in his individual and official capacities. At the time of Cooper's arrest, the statute had not been declared unconstitutional, and therefore it could not have been apparent to Dillon that he was violating Cooper's constitutional rights. . . While Cooper argues that the unconstitutionality of the pre-1990 version of the statute and Supreme Court precedent gave Dillon 'fair warning' that the new version would also be constitutionally deficient, such an argument is not persuasive. The legislative history reveals that the current version of the statute was designed to correct the constitutional problems within the pre-1990 statute, . . . and Dillon was entitled to assume that the current version was free of constitutional flaws."); Mimics v. Village of Angel Fire, 394 F.3d 836, 846, 847 (10th Cir. 2005) ("Reliance on a statute does not make an official's conduct per se reasonable. . . It is, however, 'one factor to consider in determining whether the officer's actions were objectively reasonable, keeping in mind that the overarching inquiry is one of fair notice.' . . Determining whether reliance on a statute makes an official's conduct objectively reasonable, despite violating the plaintiff's clearly established rights, depends on '(1) the degree of specificity with which the statute authorized the conduct in question; (2) whether the officer in fact complied with the statute; (3) whether the statute has fallen into desuetude; and (4) whether the officer could have reasonably concluded that the statute was constitutional.' . . Reliance on a statute or regulation will not make an official's conduct objectively reasonable if the statute or regulation is obviously unconstitutional or if the officer 'unlawfully enforces [such] ordinance in a particularly egregious manner, or in a manner which a reasonable officer would recognize exceeds the bounds of the ordinance.' . . To the extent Hasford is interpreting the Village ordinance and New Mexico statutes to permit nonconsensual warrantless entries at any time and under any circumstance, his understanding is not objectively reasonable. It has long been the rule that such warrantless nonconsensual entries into commercial property not open to the public violate the Fourth Amendment. . . More importantly, Hasford's reliance on the statue and regulations does not make his conduct objectively reasonable because there is evidence that Hasford did not comply with the terms of the statute and regulations.");Connecticut ex rel. Blumenthal v. Crotty, 346 F.3d 84, 104 (2d Cir. 2003) ("Common sense dictates that reasonable public officials are far less likely to conclude that their actions violate clearly established rights when they are enforcing a statute on the books with no transparent constitutional problems. Thus, in the realm of objective reasonableness, we hold that enforcement of a presumptively valid statute creates a heavy presumption in favor of qualified immunity. The question, then, becomes whether the Nonresident Lobster Law was so plainly unconstitutional and its enforcement so clearly unlawful, in light of all facts and circumstances, that the presumption in favor of qualified immunity is overcome, whereby Appellants should be held personally liable for monetary damages. We think not . . . ."); Buonocore v. Harris, 134 F.3d 245, 253 (4th Cir. 1998) ("[A]lthough reliance on counsel's advice may indeed be a factor to be considered in deciding whether a defendant has demonstrated an 'extraordinary circumstance,' reliance on legal advice alone does not, in and of itself, constitute an 'extraordinary circumstance' sufficient to prove entitlement to the exception to the general Harlow rule.").

See also Dumiak v. Village of Downers Grove, No. 19 CV 5604, 2020 WL 4349890, at *1-3 (N.D. Ill. July 29, 2020) ("The Village police officers assert qualified immunity, arguing that they violated no clearly established First Amendment law. The court disagrees. The officers started enforcing the statute and ordinance against plaintiffs in 2018. First Amendment law at that time was clearly established: a speech restriction targeting panhandling discriminates based on content and survives constitutional muster only when supported by a compelling justification. The statute and former ordinance fall short. . . . The Village police officers argue that they 'are being sued because they did their jobs.' They argue that '[t]he enactment of a law forecloses speculation by enforcement officers concerning its constitutionality — with the possible exception of a law so grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional that any person of reasonable prudence would be bound to see its flaws.' Michigan v. DeFillippo, 443 U.S. 31, 38 (1979). They argue that the Seventh Circuit—forty years ago—upheld Illinois' solicitation statute against a First Amendment challenge, holding that the statute 'is a narrow and reasonable limitation on solicitation in intersections which local villages are required to enforce.' U.S. Labor Party v. Oremus, 619 F.2d

683, 688 (7th Cir. 1980). The Village police officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. Cases since U.S. Labor Party 'have placed the...constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The Supreme Court in Reed v. Town of Gilbert held that a speech restriction 'is content based if a law applies to particular speech because of the topic discussed or the idea or message expressed.' 576 U.S. 155, 163 (2015). Following Reed, the Seventh Circuit in Norton v. City of Springfield held that '[a]ny law distinguishing one kind of speech from another by reference to its meaning now requires a compelling justification.' 806 F.3d 411, 412 (7th Cir. 2015) (granting rehearing and remanding with instructions to enjoin a content based panhandling ban). . .Content based laws usually violate the First Amendment. The former Village ordinance and Illinois statute are no exception. Both are content based restrictions on speech without any compelling justification. Defendants do not seriously argue that that the laws are content neutral. Nor do they argue that the laws are content based, yet supported by compelling justifications. The laws are flagrantly unconstitutional under Reed and Norton (2015)—and reasonably prudent police officers would have so concluded. The Village police officers violated clearly established First Amendment law and are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The Village police officers argue that they 'should not be expected to divine evolving developments and conclude that constitutional principles relating to content-based discrimination would apply to a statute (designed in this case) to prevent pedestrians from endangering themselves and distracting drivers at the busiest intersection in town.' But qualified immunity doctrine assumes that 'a reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.'. . Reed, Norton (2015), and all the other First Amendment cases cited in this opinion were on the books before 2018, when the officers started enforcing the statute against plaintiffs. As for running into the busiest intersection in town, plaintiffs allege that they stayed clear of traffic and avoided placing others at risk. That allegation must be taken as true for now. And plaintiffs do not challenge the constitutionality of other ordinance provisions regulating solicitation—for example, the provision barring solicitors from 'imped[ing] the flow of pedestrian or vehicular traffic.'"); Taylor v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't, No. 219CV995JCMNJK, 2020 WL 620275, at *3–4 (D. Nev. Feb. 10, 2020) ("Plaintiff contends that this court could not conclude that the officer defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because of their good faith reliance on the duly-enacted statute as interpreted by LVMPD. . . Plaintiff suggests that resolving the issue of qualified immunity in favor of the officer defendants would be more appropriate at summary judgment, rather than in a motion to dismiss. Plaintiff argues that the court is limited to the allegations within his complaint and that '[n]owhere in [his] complaint did he allege that the [o]fficer [d]efendants relied in good faith upon the duly-enacted statute as interpreted by [LVMPD].'. . Plaintiff further argues that 'there is simply no factual basis for determining that the [o]fficer [d]efendants acting in good faith reliance on [LVMPD's] interpretation of the statute.'. . Here, qualified immunity issue was properly resolved at the motion to dismiss stage in light of the Supreme Court's guidance in Pearson. Further, the court had sufficient facts—even if it was limited to the face of the complaint—to resolve the question of qualified immunity in the officer defendants' favor. The court's prior order relied on allegations in plaintiff's second amended complaint. . . Plaintiff alleged that 'Officer Bittner explained that Metro was enforcing the Code's obstruction provisions against artists and performers as a department-wide policy, and that he was obligated to issue a citation until a court ordered his superiors to change the policy.'. . The court found that this department-wide policy supported a Monell claim against LVMPD, but it also showed that the officer defendants relied on the LVMPD's policy when applying CCC chapter 16."); Crawford v. Blue, No. CV 14-13042-WGY, 2017 WL 4181348, at *9 (D. Mass. Sept. 21, 2017) ("Here, it is undisputed that the Defendants were merely following the letter of the state law [that required a nonrefundable $25 filing fee to appeal a civil motor vehicle infraction]. Crawford puts forth no evidence suggesting that they should have known the state law was unconstitutional. The Defendants are therefore immunized from monetary damages."); Barrios v. City of Chicago, No. 15 C 2648, 2016 WL 164414, at *15 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 14, 2016) ("The plaintiffs have identified a single case in this circuit supporting their claimed procedural due process right: Niemeyer, a 2012 Central District of Illinois district court decision. The Niemeyer court cited a 2004 Tenth Circuit case to support the proposition that a police officer who actively assists a private actor's repossession efforts can be liable under § 1983. . . This court agreed with the analysis in Niemeyer. However, it does not believe that the outcome in Niemeyer was foreordained by prior precedent, given the Niemeyer court's reliance on a 2004 out-of-circuit case. This is especially true given that the court has conducted its own research on the constitutional issue presented in this case. There is neither a robust nor a substantial consensus of opinion that encouraging a lienholder to repossess a car violates the right to procedural due process when remedies exist to challenge the impoundment of the car, as well as challenge any wrongful repossession. . . Moreover, the plaintiffs' allegations that Officer Jaeger's actions were taken in furtherance of the challenged City policy undermine their contention that he should have recognized that his actions violated a clearly established constitutional right. Reliance on a policy does not 'render the officer's conduct per se reasonable' for the purposes of qualified immunity. . . Thus, the existence of a policy cannot 'make reasonable a belief that was contrary to a decided body of case law.'. . But if 'the state of the law...[is] at best undeveloped,' it can be reasonable for a law enforcement officer to rely on a policy. . .The court finds that Officer Jaeger's reliance on the City's alleged policy is, therefore, further support for the court's conclusion that he is entitled to the protection of qualified immunity."); Peterson v. Bernardi, No. 07-2723 (RMB/JS), 2010 WL 2521392, at *14 (D.N.J. June 15, 2010) ("Since the Court has held that Defendant Bernardi's instruction to resist DNA evidence-testing is not subject to absolute immunity, the question remains whether Defendant Bernardi is entitled to qualified immunity for this conduct. The answer is straightforward: Defendant Bernardi cannot be faulted for his errant interpretation of a novel statute, particularly where the first court to pass upon his interpretation adopted it. Here, the controlling statute, N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2A:84A-32a, was enacted on January 8, 2002, just six months before Plaintiff filed his motion for post-conviction relief. Plaintiff's motion called upon Defendant Bernardi to interpret the statute without guidance from any prior cases, and the questions presented by the motion were matters of first impression. If ever an area of law were not 'clearly established', this area was not. . . Nothing in the record suggests that Defendant Bernardi's interpretation of the statute was objectively unreasonable. Indeed, although the Appellate Division ultimately vindicated Plaintiff's reading of the statute, the trial judge had sided with Defendant Bernardi in denying Plaintiff's motion. Accordingly, Defendant Bernardi's decision to oppose Plaintiff's July 2002 motion for postconviction relief is clearly protected by qualified immunity."); McNally v. Eve, No. 8:06-CV-2310-T-23EAJ, 2008 WL 1931317, at *10 n.18 (M.D. Fla. May 2, 2008)

("Defendants . . . argue that Eve is entitled to qualified immunity because the Sheriff's internal use of force policy governed Eve's taser use and the level of force used was consistent with the Sheriff's general order. Defendants submit expert opinion evidence that the Sheriff's taser policy 'is consistent with the recommended guidelines, practices, and procedures of professional law enforcement agencies and their use of force models.' . . . Defendants cite no authority to support the proposition that compliance with an internal policy acts as a complete shield to liability and entitles an officer to qualified immunity."); Copar Pumice Co., Inc. v. Morris, No. CIV 07-79 JB/ACT, 2008 WL 2323488, at *28 (D.N.M. March 21, 2008) ("Copar Pumice had a right not to be inspected without a search warrant, unless the state officials conducted their search pursuant to and in compliance with the substitute for a warrant–the statute and the permit. Furthermore, no extraordinary circumstances appear to have existed justifying the Defendants' failure to comply with state law or to secure a warrant. Nothing appears to have prevented the Defendants from knowing the law and following it. Additionally, reliance on a statute or regulation, such as the statute in this case, will not make an official's conduct objectively reasonable if the official 'unlawfully enforces [such] ordinance in a particularly egregious manner, or in a manner which a reasonable officer would recognize exceeds the bounds of the ordinance.' [citing Mimics, Inc.] The plain language of the statute and of the permit told Morris and Yantos what needed to be done. A reasonable officer would realize that, to comply with the statute and come within the warrantless exception, he or she must follow the statute. Morris and Yantos did not comply with the plain language of the statute or the permit. There is no basis to excuse the Defendants' violation of a well-established constitutional right on the basis of extraordinary circumstances. The Court will thus deny Defendants' motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity in regards to Morris and Yantos' search."); Wares v. Simmons, 524 F.Supp.2d 1313, 1325, 1326 (D. Kan. 2007) ("In considering the 'objective legal reasonableness' of the state officer's actions, one relevant factor is whether the defendant relied on a state statute, regulation, or official policy that explicitly sanctioned the conduct in question. . . Of course, an officer's reliance on an authorizing statute does not render the conduct per se reasonable. . . Rather, 'the existence of a statute or ordinance authorizing particular conduct is a factor which militates in favor of the conclusion that a reasonable official would find that conduct constitutional.' . . . Here, it is uncontested that defendants removed the desired religious books as a disciplinary measure in reliance upon and in accordance with the requirements of the property restrictions found in the relevant policies, which were official policies of the KDOC. These policies are not obviously unconstitutional, and no reason has been shown why defendants should have believed they were acting unconstitutionally in removing the books. This is particularly so since during the course of plaintiff's grievance about defendants' seizure of the books, defendants consulted with and relied upon the opinion of one considered to be an expert in the matter–a Jewish rabbi. When asked about the specific application of their policies to the religious books desired by plaintiff, the rabbi unequivocally confirmed that neither the 'Tanya' nor the 'Tehillim' was essential for the practice of plaintiff's faith. Although plaintiff now implies that the rabbi may have lacked knowledge about the details of plaintiff's particular branch of Judaism, defendants' reliance upon the rabbi's opinion was nonetheless objectively reasonable. Defendants had no reason to believe that the rabbi was uninformed or that their policy, which at all times preserved the inmate's right to possess the primary texts of his religion and to practice his religion, was unconstitutional. Accordingly, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity."); Steele v. City of Bemidji, 242 F. Supp.2d 624, 627, 628 (D.Minn. 2003) ("Defendants correctly note that the City's ordinances had not been ruled unconstitutional in 1998. They further point to the Magistrate's ruling, upheld by the District Court, finding the ordinances constitutional. . . From this, the City defendants argue that while the ordinances may have been found unconstitutional on appeal, their infringement on the First Amendment was not clearly established at the time of the incidents about which Steele complains. This argument is not without some persuasive force. The Court can hardly expect police officers to know better than judges that a duly-enacted city law violated the Constitution. Thus, the Court finds the police officers, who relied on the advice given to them by the City Attorney, are entitled to qualified immunity in this case. But this determination does not end the Court's inquiry. In the words of the Eighth Circuit, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Steele, the City Attorney sought to apply these ordinances to Mr. Steele 'whether or not he attempt[ed] to sell his newspapers and whether or not he place[d] them on City property.' . . Therefore, although the ordinances' unconstitutionality may not have been clearly established for all parties in August, 1998, the Court sees no basis on which the City Attorney could presume they were in conformity with the Constitution when Steele simply gave the Herald away, without charge, on the sidewalk outside the Post Office. The Court finds that the contours of the First Amendment are such that a reasonable city attorney would recognize this constitutional infirmity.").

But see Mglej v. Gardner, 974 F.3d 1151, 1165 (10th Cir. 2020) ("Different from the New Mexico statute at issue in Mocek, it is clear that Utah Code § 76-8-301.5 only permits an officer to arrest a suspect for his failure to provide his 'name' during such an investigative stop (provided the other conditions set forth in that statute are met). The Utah statute's language is unmistakably clear. The district court, therefore, correctly denied Deputy Gardner qualified immunity from Mglej's § 1983 unlawful-arrest claim."); United Pet Supply, Inc. v. City of Chattanooga, Tenn., 768 F.3d 464, 488, 489 (6th Cir. 2014) ("[T]here is no dispute that never providing an opportunity to challenge a permit revocation violates due process. Thus, the revocation of Pet Supply's permit without a pre-deprivation hearing or a post-deprivation hearing violated due process. No reasonable officer could believe that revoking a permit to do business without providing any pre-deprivation or post-deprivation remedy was constitutional. Walsh argues that she was entitled to rely on the constitutionality of the Chattanooga City Code, which does not provide for a hearing on the revocation of a pet-dealer permit. Certainly, there are policy reasons that counsel in favor of allowing government officials to presume the constitutionality of statutes and ordinances. . . . But the Chattanooga City Code does not make the revocation of the permit automatic upon the determination that negligence or misconduct has occurred. The Code states that an animal-related permit 'may be revoked if negligence in care or misconduct occurs that is detrimental to animal welfare or to the public.'. . The Code did not tie Walsh's hands; it was her discretionary decision immediately to revoke the permit. This is one of the rare situations where the unconstitutionality of the application of a statute to a situation is plainly obvious. . . . no reasonable officer could believe that revoking this permit without providing any opportunity for a hearing was constitutional. Accordingly, the evidence taken in the light most favorable to Pet Supply demonstrates the violation of a clearly established right, and so we deny qualified immunity to Walsh on this claim."); Courtney v. Oklahoma ex rel., Dept. of Public Safety, 722 F.3d 1216, 1226, 1227 (10th Cir. 2013) (no qualified immunity based on "mistaken legal conclusion regarding the scope of the felon-in-possession statute" where statute is not ambiguous and it was clear that officer lacked probable cause for arrest); Denton v. Rievley, 353 F. App'x 1, 6, 7 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Finally, Rievley argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because he was following a Tennessee statute denoting a preference for arrest in cases where there is probable cause of domestic abuse. . . Other Circuits have held that while reliance on a statute is a factor to consider in determining whether or not an officer's actions were objectively reasonable, '[r]eliance on a statute does not make an official's conduct per se reasonable.'. . Here, the relevant statute states: If a law enforcement officer has probable cause to believe that a person has committed a crime involving domestic abuse, whether the crime is a misdemeanor or felony, or was committed within or without the presence of the officer, the preferred response of the officer is arrest. . . .Even if compliance with a state statute generally renders an officer's conduct more reasonable, this particular statute lacks specificity and is not necessarily applicable to the case at hand. First, the statute does not require arrest in situations involving domestic violence; it has merely been interpreted to permit warrantless arrests in such situations. . . . Second, the statute does not specifically address warrantless in-home arrests; it is silent on whether its preference for arrest applies inside a home when an officer lacks consent or exigent circumstances. . . We, therefore, do not think an interpretation of Tenn.Code Ann. ' 36-3-619 to permit warrantless in-home arrests is objectively reasonable in light of long-standing Supreme Court precedent holding that such arrests violate the Fourth Amendment."); Guillemard-Ginorio v. Contreras-Gomez, 490 F.3d 31, 38-41(1st Cir. 2007) ("With respect to Contreras, Defendants argue that he is entitled to qualified immunity because he was acting pursuant to a presumptively constitutional statute. Defendants point out that the Puerto Rico Insurance Code authorizes the Insurance Commissioner to 'suspend, revoke or refuse to renew a license' by issuing an 'order ... to licensee not less than fifteen days prior to the effective date thereof, subject to the right of the licensee to have a hearing,' and provides that 'pending such hearing, the license shall be suspended.' P.R. Laws Ann. tit. 26, ' 947(2)(a). . . . [T]o the extent Contreras or Juarbe acted in reliance on section 947(2)(a), enacted in 1957, we find such reliance unreasonable because that statute is no longer in effect, having been superseded by the Puerto Rico Uniform Administrative Procedure Act, P.R. Laws Ann. tit. 3, ' 2101 et seq. (the "Puerto Rico APA"). . . . Neither party disputes that the Puerto Rico APA provides for pre-deprivation hearings at all agency levels. . . . The Supreme Court of Puerto Rico has held that the Puerto Rico APA expressly supersedes any conflicting statutes. . . . Given the Puerto Rico APA's pre-deprivation hearing requirement, any claimed reliance on section 947's summary-revocation provision is unreasonable as a matter of law. . . . We also find reliance on section 947(2)(a) unreasonable because the statute is patently unconstitutional. Although state officials are ordinarily entitled to rely on presumptively valid state statutes, courts have held such reliance unreasonable where the relevant law is 'so grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional that any person of reasonable prudence would be bound to see its flaws.' . . . Section 947(2)(a) is patently unconstitutional because it specifically provides for the suspension of a professional license before a hearing is provided, without limitation. . . . . Thus, we find that Defendants are not entitled to rely on section 947(2)(a)'s allowance for pre-hearing deprivations because a reasonable official in their position would have known that it violates the Due Process Clause.").

Compare Lawrence v. Reed, 406 F.3d 1224, 1230-36 (10th Cir. 2005) ("The only question on appeal, then, is whether 'extraordinary circumstances' excused [Sheriff] Reed from knowing the clearly established law. Mr. Reed points to two reasons why he neither knew nor should have known that the seizure of Mrs. Lawrence's vehicles violated clearly established law: his consultation with the city attorney, and his reliance on the derelict vehicle ordinance. . . . In this case, we find particularly significant the fact that Mr. Reed and City Attorney Lewis never once discussed the applicable constitutional law governing Mr. Reed's conduct. Mr. Reed concedes that a warrant or notice-and-hearing are required before depriving a citizen of their property; he also concedes that these constitutional requirements were clearly established and that he violated them. Yet he now argues that his consultation with the city attorney–who never once mentioned the requirement of a warrant or notice-and-hearing– somehow prevented him from knowing that these procedures were constitutionally required. This cannot be the case. What Mr. Reed really wants us to conclude is that it is generally reasonable to rely on the city attorney's advice–that it is the attorney's job, not the police officer's, to point out when a statutorily authorized course of conduct violates the Constitution. But this is an argument that officers should not be held responsible for knowing the law in the first place, not that consultation with the city attorney somehow interfered with that knowledge. Given Mr. Reed's concession that his conduct violated Mrs. Lawrence's clearly established rights, and given the Supreme Court's admonishment that 'a reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct,' . . . Mr. Reed must point to something in his consultation with the city attorney that prevented him from knowing the law. This he has not done. The district court therefore erred by granting Mr. Reed immunity on the basis of his consultation with the city attorney. . . . Alternatively, Mr. Reed argues that he should not be held responsible for knowing the unlawfulness of his conduct because his conduct was authorized by the Rawlins derelict vehicle ordinance. . . . Thus, officers can rely on statutes that authorize their conduct–but not if the statute is obviously unconstitutional. Again, the overarching inquiry is whether, in spite of the existence of the statute, a reasonable officer should have known that his conduct was unlawful. . . . Just as we do not require officials to predict novel constitutional rulings, we do not require them to predict novel statutory rulings. Instead, the focus of the qualified immunity inquiry is on what a reasonable officer should have known. Here, Mrs. Lawrence concedes that the derelict vehicle ordinance applies on its face to her property; but she argues that the 1982 Settlement Agreement carved out an exception for her industrially zoned property. What she has failed to produce, however, is any evidence that Mr. Reed knew or should have known about the 1982 Settlement Agreement. Absent such evidence, we cannot conclude that the agreement rendered unreasonable Mr. Reed's conclusion that the derelict vehicle ordinance authorized his conduct. . . But this does not end our inquiry. Another important consideration is whether Mr. Reed could reasonably have concluded that the statute was constitutional. . . . Mr. Reed should have known that the ordinance was unconstitutional. Had the derelict vehicle ordinance provided some form of pre-or post-deprivation hearing–even a constitutionally inadequate one–we would not necessarily expect a reasonable officer to know that it was unconstitutional. For once the ordinance provides a hearing, its constitutionality turns on a court's resolution of the Mathews balancing test, which, in the absence of case law directly on point, is not something we would require officers to predict. Here, however, the ordinance provides no hearing whatsoever; an officer need not understand the niceties of Mathews to know that it is unconstitutional. Our decisions, and those of other circuits, have made abundantly clear that when the state deprives an individual of property–for example, by impounding an individual's vehicle–it must provide the individual with notice and a hearing. . . This is especially true where, as here, the state not only impounds the vehicles but permanently disposes of them. . . In sum, a hearing is '[t]he fundamental requirement of due process,' . . . and the Rawlins derelict vehicle ordinance does not even pretend to provide one. This is a sufficiently obvious constitutional violation that Mr. Reed should have known about. Mr. Reed, therefore, was not entitled to rely on the ordinance, and qualified immunity is inappropriate. . . . In spite of the layers of complexity built up around the doctrine of qualified immunity, the fundamental inquiry is fairly simple: should the officer have known that his conduct was unlawful? For the reasons set forth above, we find that Mr. Reed should have known that his conduct was unlawful, and we therefore REVERSE the district court's grant of immunity and its dismissal of Mrs. Lawrence's claims, and REMAND for further proceedings.") with Lawrence v. Reed, 406 F.3d 1224, 1236-39 (10th Cir. 2005) (Hartz, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. The Supreme Court opinion providing for qualified immunity in 'extraordinary circumstances' despite the violation of clearly established law, Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818-19 (1982), gives little guidance on what circumstances are 'extraordinary.' The majority may well have construed the term correctly. But the very concerns expressed in Harlow suggest to me that Sheriff Reed is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Given the complexities of the law today, it should not be surprising to find intelligent, conscientious, well-trained public servants who do not know all the clearly established law governing their conduct. The statement in Harlow that reasonably competent public officials know clearly established law, . . . is a legal fiction. Nevertheless, the objective test, and the legal fiction it embraces, can advance the policies behind qualified immunity if the extraordinary-circumstances exception is properly understood. The extraordinary-circumstances exception should encompass those situations in which the legal fiction does not make sense and applying that fiction would create problems that qualified immunity is intended to avert. In my view, this goal can be advanced by including as an extraordinary circumstance the official's reliance on specific advice by a nonsubordinate attorney of sufficient stature regarding the specific challenged action. Although, as I previously stated, it is doubtful that reasonably competent public officials actually know all the clearly established law governing their conduct, it is largely true that reasonably competent public officials are sufficiently versed in the law that they know not to take certain actions without seeking proper legal advice. If they violate clearly established law without having sought legal advice, holding them liable makes good sense. But there is little sense in holding officials liable for unlawful action that received the imprimatur of properly sought legal advice. The Harlow legal fiction should not be extended to say that reasonably competent public officials know when the legal advice they receive is contrary to clearly established law. . . . Thus, in my view, incorrect legal advice is an extraordinary circumstance cloaking an official with qualified immunity when, as here, it comes from the highest level nonsubordinate attorney with whom the official is to consult and the attorney is fully informed of the planned action and the surrounding circumstances. . . . In the present case Sheriff Reed fully informed the City Attorney of the relevant surrounding circumstances and how he intended to proceed. The City Attorney gave his imprimatur. It would be contrary to Harlow's underlying concern about 'dampen[ing] the ardor of all but the most resolute, or the most irresponsible public officials, in the unflinching discharge of their duties,' . . . to tell officials like the sheriff that they cannot rely on their chief nonsubordinate government attorneys but must postpone action (to conduct their own research or call a professor at the nearest law school?) or risk being sued.").

Compare Leonard v. Robinson, 477 F.3d 347,355, 356, 361 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Probable cause is clearly relevant to Leonard's First Amendment retaliation claims. See Hartman v. Moore, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 1699 (2006). In Hartman, the Supreme Court determined that probable cause is an element of a malicious prosecution charge brought as constitutional tort under Bivens v. Six Unknown Federal Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971). . . Although there are differences between wrongful arrest and malicious prosecution, . . . there is an obvious similarity in that 'the significance of probable cause or the lack of it looms large,' . . . .Hartman, therefore, calls into question our cases holding that 'probable cause is not determinative of the [First Amendment] constitutional question.' . . Yet, we need not decide whether Hartman adds another element to every First Amendment claim brought pursuant to § 1983 because, when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, we find that the facts of this case demonstrate an absence of probable cause. In sum then, both Leonard's claims . . . and Robinson's defenses turn on the laws that Leonard allegedly violated and their validity as applied in the context of a democratic assembly. Again, when the facts are viewed in a light most favorable to Leonard, we believe that First Amendment freedoms, clearly established for a generation, preclude a finding of probable cause because the laws cited by Robinson are either facially invalid, vague, or overbroad when applied to speech (as opposed to conduct) at a democratic assembly where the speaker is not out of order. . . . We therefore hold that no reasonable officer would find that probable cause exists to arrest a recognized speaker at a chaired public assembly based solely on the content of his speech (albeit vigorous or blasphemous) unless and until the speaker is determined to be out of order by the individual chairing the assembly. . . . Therefore, because Leonard's arrest was not supported by probable cause, it was error for the district court to grant Robinson qualified immunity on the Fourth Amendment claims.") with Leonard v. Robinson, 477 F.3d 347, 363-67 (6th Cir. 2007) (Sutton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Put yourself in the shoes of Officer Robinson when it comes to enforcing just one of these statutes, §750.170 ("Disturbance of lawful meetings"), on the evening of October 15, 2002. Let us assume (improbably) that Robinson had looked at the statute before attending the meeting. Let us assume (even more improbably) that Robinson had looked at judicial interpretations of the statute before the meeting. And let us assume (most improbably) that Robinson had read Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971), before the meeting. The statute, he would have learned, says that '[a]ny person who shall make or excite any disturbance ... at any election or other public meeting where citizens are peaceably and lawfully assembled, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.' Nothing about the case law enforcing the provision would have tipped him off that he was clearly forbidden from applying it here. . . .Even had Robinson been equipped with this uncommonly extensive knowledge of Michigan and federal law, indeed even had Robinson carried a laptop equipped with Westlaw and Lexis/Nexis to the meeting, I am hard pressed to understand how he would have known that it was 'clearly established' that he could not enforce this law in this setting. . . . To my knowledge, the Supreme Court has never rejected a claim of qualified immunity to a police officer who enforced a statute that had not been declared unconstitutional at the time of the citizen-police encounter. While [Michigan v.] DeFillippo[, 443 U.S. 31 (1979)] acknowledges 'the possible exception of a law so grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional that any person of reasonable prudence would be bound to see its flaws, . . . the exception remains just that–a theoretical possibility, one that can be imagined but that the Court has never enforced. Adhering to DeFillippo's guidance that the combination of legislative action and judicial inaction generally 'forecloses speculation by enforcement officers concerning [a statute's] constitutionality,' 443 U.S. at 38, the Sixth Circuit has resisted imposing liability on police officers and other officials who fail to anticipate each twist and turn of judicial review. [collecting Sixth Circuit cases] The other courts of appeals have taken the same path. [collecting cases] . . . . In the end, Leonard not only asks us to take a road less traveled but one never traveled. It is one thing to credit police officers with knowledge of all statutory and constitutional rulings potentially bearing on all statutes they enforce; but this necessary requirement needlessly loses any connection with reality when we hold police officers to the standard of anticipating a court's later invalidation of a statute that was duly enacted by legislators sworn to uphold the Constitution, that is presumed constitutional, that has been on the books for 75 years and that has withstood two constitutional challenges. The First Amendment properly protected Leonard from being prosecuted for his unruly speech and conduct–and for now that is enough. To expose Robinson to money damages for enforcing these laws not only seems unfair (absolute immunity protects the legislature from similar risks, Bogan v. Scott-Harris, 523 U.S. 44, 48-49 (1998)) but also risks placing him in the push-me-pull-me predicament of having to decide which duly enacted laws to enforce and which ones not to enforce on the pain of losing either way–because he is charged with dereliction of duty when he opts not to enforce the law and because he is charged with money damages when he does enforce the law. . . . Leonard fares no better under his free-speech retaliation claim. Because probable cause existed to arrest Leonard, as has been shown, our case law forecloses this claim as a matter of law.")

See also Sampson v. City of Schenectady, 160 F. Supp.2d 336, 350 (N.D.N.Y. 2001) ("In this Court's view, even if the Officers' assertions were given full credit and borne out by discovery, their claims of negligent training and unlawful policy do not create the type of 'extraordinary circumstances' needed to invoke the exception to the general Harlow rule. This is so because municipal liability for negligent training and unlawful policies are typically incorporated into section 1983 claims of the type found here. If the Court were to conclude that a claim for negligent training or an unlawful policy on the part of a municipality entitled an official to avoid liability even if their actions violated clearly established constitutional rights, the 'extraordinary circumstances' exception to Harlow would become nullified as any officer could claim the exception to the rule simply because a Plaintiff filed suit against the municipality as well as the individual officer. Moreover, given the clarity of existing case law and the flagrancy with which the Officers violated it, the Court will not allow their city policy and negligent training claims to cloak their unlawful conduct with the veil of objective reasonableness.").

G. Supervisory Officials vs. "Line" Officers

See, e.g., Baude v. Leyshock, 23 F.4th 1065, 1073-75 (8th Cir. 2022) ("The pleadings before us and video evidence paint a picture of a compliant individual among a generally peaceful and compliant crowd who was boxed into an intersection by police, pepper sprayed, and forcefully arrested. Specific questions as to whether 'kettling' a crowd was in-and-of-itself excessive force, whether the application of the zip-ties caused the requisite 'de minimis injury' to establish a constitutional violation, or whether Baude was truly compliant cannot be answered on this limited record. Based on the allegations and on this record, we cannot conclude as a matter of law that the force used against Baude, when viewing the alleged facts in a light most favorable to him, was objectively reasonable. . . . [T]he supervisory officers contend they are entitled to qualified immunity because they did not personally participate in any use of force against Baude, and to the extent that they witnessed any unreasonable force, they either had no time to intervene or else it was reasonable for them to believe the officers were using only the necessary force to accomplish the arrest. Even though an officer has no liability under the doctrines of respondeat superior or supervisor liability, . . . at the time of this mass arrest, it was 'clearly established that an officer who fails to intervene to prevent the unconstitutional use of excessive force by another officer may be held liable for violating the Fourth Amendment[.]'. . . Supervisory officers who act with 'deliberate indifference toward the violation,'. . . or, in other words, are aware that their subordinates' actions create a 'substantial risk of serious harm,"'may be liable if they fail to intervene to mitigate the risk of harm[.] . . . Baude has alleged that the supervisory officers observed or intended the use of excessive force, and no one intervened to halt it. He has further alleged that the supervisors issued orders allowing their subordinates to use excessive force against an allegedly peaceful crowd. According to Baude's allegations, it was 'the coordinated actions of the officers in circling the assembly into the kettle and the systematic disbursement of chemical agents, [which made it] clear that these tactics were planned and that senior officials of the SLMPD not only had notice of but actually sanctioned the conduct of Defendants.' While these facts are hotly contested, the allegations and the video documenting the incident present issues that need to be resolved by a court with the power to decide facts. And this is not such a court. . . Baude has pled claims of excessive force against the supervising Officers sufficient at this stage in the proceedings to defeat the Officers' qualified immunity defense. . . . Subordinate police officers cannot escape liability when they blindly follow orders. Rather, their conduct while following orders must be reasonable. We have held that an assisting officer may rely on the probable cause determination and follow the directions of an officer who is directing the arrest 'as long as the reliance is reasonable.'. . But here, at the dismissal stage of the proceedings and on the record before us, there are simply too many factual disputes and unknowns to determine as a matter of law that the subordinate officers reasonably relied on their superiors' orders to arrest the crowd at the intersection of Washington Avenue and Tucker Boulevard. . . . At this stage of the proceedings, the pleadings and the attached evidence do not entitle the subordinate Officers to the protection of qualified immunity based on their arguments that they purportedly and reasonably followed orders from their supervisors in effecting the arrests."); Vasquez v. Maloney, 990 F.3d 232, 241-42 (2d Cir. 2021) ("'Plausible instructions from a superior or fellow officer support qualified immunity where, viewed objectively in light of the surrounding circumstances, they could lead a reasonable officer to conclude that the necessary legal justification for his actions exists.'. . Yet where an officer is clearly and unequivocally on notice that an individual's past encounters with police do not provide an adequate basis for stopping him, a superior's contrary instructions will not shield the arresting officer from liability."); Quraishi v. St. Charles County, Missouri, 986 F.3d 831, 837 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Here, unlike Ransom, no undisputed facts show why Anderson deployed the canister. . . It is disputed whether the SWAT Team gave dispersal orders, whether there were projectiles, and whether they ordered the reporters to turn off their lights before deploying the tear-gas. Anderson cannot use a mistake-of-fact to claim arguable probable cause. Anderson is not entitled to qualified immunity even if his sergeant told him to deploy the tear-gas. Anderson cites the Heartland case for the proposition that § 1983 'does not sanction tort by association.'. . True, but nothing in Heartland says that a government official is immune if a superior instructs him to engage in unconstitutional conduct. . . Instead, Heartland says that defendants must be individually involved in the unconstitutional act to be liable under § 1983. . . Here, it is undisputed Anderson was involved. He is the one who deployed the tear-gas at the reporters."); Alcocer v. Mills, 800 F. App'x 860, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) ("[E]ven if Mills did operate at the direction of Kirkland, she is not automatically shielded here by qualified immunity. We have held that officers may be protected by qualified immunity for actions taken at the direction of supervisors, but only so long as 'nothing in the record indicates that these officers acted unreasonably in following [the supervisor's] lead, or that they knew or should have known that their conduct might result in a violation of the [plaintiff's] rights.'. . For the reasons explained below, the record shows that it would have been unreasonable for Mills to simply follow Kirkland's orders to place an ICE hold on Alcocer, especially because Mills was in the best position to raise the facts surrounding Alcocer's legal presence in the United States to Kirkland, yet she never did so. . . . [A]s of January 2014, it was clearly established both that immigration arrests or detentions require probable cause and that someone's mere possibility of removability is insufficient to supply probable cause. . . . Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Alcocer, Mills's actions and omissions during her shift on January 30 do not entitle her to qualified immunity. The information Mills obtained—and information reasonably available to her—did not provide arguable probable cause to detain Alcocer after she secured bond for her release on the suspended-license charge. The district court reasoned that a trifecta of information obtained by Mills during her intake of Alcocer created a presumption of legal status, if not outright U.S. citizenship.'. . In particular, Mills produced a Georgia-issued driver's license, a Social Security number, and employment information, the combination of which should have negated suspicion of illegal presence. . . . These details, all within Mills's purview as the jailer who processed Alcocer upon arrival at the Detention Center and who received and entered the ICE hold on Alcocer's file, show that Mills's actions were unreasonable—whether initiated on her own or upon the order of Kirkland. Mills ignored evidence that directly contradicted the ICE message, and she failed to reach out to ICE or her supervisor to raise these discrepancies or clarify the message's seemingly conflicting statements. This failure is compounded by the facts that the message itself provided a phone number to direct such inquiries to and by the Detention Center's Standard Operating Procedure, which plainly provided that 'the booking officer is to contact the originating agency to verify the charges and place a detainer on the inmate.' There is no evidence that Mills or any other Detention Center staff contacted ICE. . . Once Alcocer attempted to post bond at some point before 6:00 p.m., any further detention with respect to potential immigration investigations was a new seizure requiring a new probable-cause justification. . . Mills lacked that arguable probable cause here because there was nothing beyond, perhaps, 'possible removability' under the 4:09 p.m. fax—a fax that by its plain terms, as Mills herself admits, was 'NOT A GOVERNMENT DETAINER!' and was 'FOR INFORMATIONAL PURPOSES ONLY.'. .Mills was on duty when the 4:09 fax came in, and her initials alone appear on the ICE hold on Alcocer's file. Yet Mills did nothing to satisfy herself that probable cause to maintain Alcocer in detention existed. Indeed, Mills concedes in her reply brief on appeal that 'she had no reason to believe that Alcocer was a "foreign citizen."' As a result of Mills's actions and omissions, a U.S. citizen continued to be unnecessarily and unlawfully detained under a completely inapplicable ICE 'detainer' that ICE never intended to be applied as such. . . The evidence, interpreted in the light most favorable to Alcocer, is sufficient for a reasonable jury to conclude that Mills violated Alcocer's Fourth Amendment rights by continuing to detain her without new probable cause after her attempted posting of bond before 6:00 p.m. on January 30, 2014. . . To rule otherwise on this record would raise real concerns about the continued unlawful detention of U.S. citizens based on legally inapplicable, groundless immigration hunches unsupported by even arguable probable cause. Mills's actions and inactions constituted a violation of Alcocer's clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure. Therefore, Mills is not entitled to qualified immunity."); Marsh v. Phelps County, 902 F.3d 745, 754-56 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Marsh's claim that Samuelson and Gregg 'knew or should have known' their actions or omissions created a substantial risk of injury to Marsh evinces a negligence standard not contemplated under § 1983. . . 'To establish personal liability of the supervisory defendants, [Marsh] must allege specific facts of personal involvement in, or direct responsibility for, a deprivation of [her] constitutional rights.'. . As to Marsh's failure-to-train claim, '[a] supervisor's failure to train an inferior officer may subject the supervisor to liability in his individual capacity only "where the failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the [officers] come into contact."'. . Overarching these claims is qualified immunity. A supervising officer will not be individually liable for an otherwise unlawful act if he is entitled to qualified immunity. Qualified immunity protects government officials from liability for civil damages in their individual capacities if their conduct did not violate 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . . Marsh does not allege that Samuelson or Gregg ordered or directed Campana to sexually assault female inmates, or Marsh particularly. Thus, their alleged liability cannot be based on direct participation in this constitutional violation. In this action, Marsh alleges that Samuelson and Gregg failed to protect her from the substantial risk of harm that Campana presented to herself and other inmates. She argues the evidence that Campana might possibly have problems working around females, that he was counseled to be careful with his interactions lest he open himself up to a law suit, the verbal complaints of Johnson not wanting to work alongside Campana, and the evidence of Campana's character while performing his job duties, all support an inference that Samuelson and Gregg were aware of the risk Campana posed to female inmates. Marsh claims as to Samuelson that it was his inaction against the 'known' danger Campana posed that establishes his liability. Sheriff Samuelson is entitled to qualified immunity unless he had notice of a pattern of conduct that was sufficiently egregious in nature. Qualified immunity from supervisory liability turns on what Samuelson knew of Campana's actions. . . Here, there is insufficient evidence to infer that Samuelson knew of any danger posed by Campana, and most certainly he did not receive notice of a pattern of unconstitutional acts. Much of the problem in this matter is that the evidence Marsh points to as creating material fact issues, is largely information garnered after Campana's suspension. That it became known later, when Campana no longer had a presence at the jail, there were red flags lurking but unknown at the time of his hiring does not create liability for Samuelson, nor does it create a fact issue on appeal when these facts were not known by Samuelson prior to Campana's suspension. . . .On these facts, a reasonable officer in Sheriff Samuelson's shoes would not have known that he needed to more closely supervise Campana. . The district court correctly granted Samuelson qualified immunity. . . . Marsh claims that there were written policies that prohibited male officers from being in the female cells and claims without record citation that Samuelson and Gregg were aware Campana 'openly defied' those policies. 'Assuming without deciding that "turning a blind eye" could ever constitute actual notice' of wrongdoing sufficient to support a constitutional claim, being aware that Campana violated jail policy, without more, by accompanying female inmates in their cells 'falls far short of notice of a pattern of conduct that violated' Marsh's constitutional rights. . . .On the facts before us, neither Gregg (nor Samuelson) had information that would have raised an inference that Campana was violating his duties as an officer by sexually assaulting female inmates. It is not a reasonable inference on these facts, for example, to assume that a general claim that someone might possibly have a problem working with women indicates that individual poses a threat of sexually assaulting women."); Gerhart v. McLendon, 714 F. App'x 327, 333-35 (5th Cir. 2017) ("McLendon concedes that the Gerharts have established the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, but he contends that they cannot establish the second prong for two reasons. First, there is no case that requires an officer who does not plan a search or lead a search team to ensure that the place to be searched is correctly identified. Second, the extreme circumstances under which he mistakenly entered the Gerhart residence tip the reasonableness balance in his favor. We consider (and reject) each of these arguments in turn. . . . McLendon concedes that the Gerharts have established the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, so we can assume that he did not make reasonable efforts to correctly identify the target residence. The question, then, is whether McLendon had fair notice that his efforts fell short of that standard under the second prong. An unpublished case from this circuit is directly on point. . . .McLendon counters that there is no binding precedent in which this court or the Supreme Court has held that a similarly situated officer acting under similar circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment. The Supreme Court has rejected a rigid requirement that previous cases be 'materially similar' in order for the law to be clearly established. . . We need not immunize an officer from suit for an obvious violation simply because no case has held that the officer's precise conduct was unlawful. . . The law was clear that McLendon had to make 'a reasonable effort to ascertain and identify the place intended to be searched.'. . McLendon is right, of course, that we have not exhaustively and precisely defined the contours of what constitutes a 'reasonable effort.' Whatever the precise contours of that phrase, it surely means that officers must make an effort to be sure they search the right residence in order to receive the protections of qualified immunity. . . . McLendon's conduct does not fall at the hazy borders of the law. The district court found that he was totally unaware of key operational details and did not even bother to ask. On this record, it appears that he did little more than show up. McLendon argues that the cases establish only that officers leading a search must make such efforts. We cannot endorse such a confined view of the precedent. To the contrary, although the cases impose heightened obligations on leaders, they make clear that officers who participate in searches still have an obligation to make reasonable efforts to correctly identify the place to be searched. . . . An officer who makes no reasonable effort to correctly identify the place to be searched does not get immunity merely because someone else was leading the search. Accordingly, McLendon violated clearly established law by failing to make any effort to ensure that he could correctly identify the target residence."); Ehlers v. City of Rapid City, 846 F.3d 1002, 1010 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Generally, an assisting officer is entitled to rely on the probable cause determination of the arresting officer and may receive qualified immunity as long as the reliance is reasonable. Doran v. Eckold, 409 F.3d 958, 965 (8th Cir. 2005) (finding that an officer assigned to operate a battering ram had no constitutional duty to verify the supervising officer's decision to execute a no-knock entry based on "the settled principle that law enforcement officers may rely on information provided by others in the law enforcement community, so long as the reliance is reasonable"); see also Mitchell v. Shearrer, 729 F.3d 1070, 1073 (8th Cir. 2013) (noting that "[t]here is no evidence to suggest that [the assisting officers] were involved in the decision to arrest [the plaintiff] or that they knew or should have known that the seizure was unlawful"). Other circuits likewise do not require assisting officers to have independent probable cause in order to receive qualified immunity. See Stearns v. Clarkson, 615 F.3d 1278, 1286 (10th Cir. 2010); Brent v. Ashley, 247 F.3d 1294, 1305-06 (11th Cir. 2001); Liu v. Phillips, 234 F.3d 55, 57-58 (1st Cir. 2000). Nothing in the record indicates that Dirkes's reliance on Hansen's instruction was unreasonable, and Ehlers does not argue to the contrary. Accordingly, Officer Dirkes is entitled to qualified immunity from Ehlers's unlawful arrest claim."); Heaney v. Roberts, 846 F.3d 795, 804 (5th Cir. 2017) ("Unlike the deputy in Cozzo, who had ample time and reasons to conclude that he was carrying out an illegal act, Black had no reason to believe that he was violating Heaney's First Amendment rights by following Roberts's order. We agree with the district court that 'Black was not required to cross-examine and second-guess Roberts regarding his First Amendment motives before acting.' See Collinson v. Gott, 895 F.2d 994, 997 (4th Cir. 1990) (affirming qualified immunity for a sheriff's deputy who escorted a citizen out of a city council meeting upon receiving orders to do so from the presiding officer). Black is entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment claim because his actions as sergeant-at-arms were not objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. We affirm on that claim."); Reza v. Pearce, 806 F.3d 497, 507 (9th Cir. 2015) (order denying reh'g and reh'g en banc and amending opinion) ("Reza also contends that Officers Jeff Trapp and John Burton violated his constitutional rights by preventing him from entering the Building, and by subsequently arresting him. The officers respond that they are entitled to qualified immunity, because they were complying with a facially-valid order from Senator Pearce to exclude Reza, and because they had probable cause to arrest Reza. We hold that the district court did not err in granting the officers' motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds, because they arrested Reza for criminal trespass pursuant to a facially-valid order issued by Senator Pearce."); Barnes v. Furman, 629 F. App'x 52, 56-57 (2d Cir. 2015) ("Taken together, our earlier decisions have clearly established that prison officials may not prohibit a sincere religious practice without some legitimate penological interest. The only legitimate penological objectives defendants point to are related to the requirement that inmates register their religious affiliation with prison officials and the Department of Corrections, and that prison officials rely to some extent on that designation. Defendants do not, however, provide any legitimate penological reasons behind prison officials' and chaplains' former adherence to a policy that limited Jewish inmates' head coverings to yarmulkes only. Nor do the defendants offer a legitimate penological reason for deferring to the New York State Board of Rabbis where the sincerity of Barnes's belief was apparently uncontested. . . .For qualified immunity to apply on this basis, defendants must demonstrate that 'no rational jury could fail to conclude' that it was reasonable for them to believe that their conduct did not violate the prisoner's constitutional rights. . . When officials follow an established prison policy, as defendants did here, their entitlement to qualified immunity depends on 'whether a reasonable officer might have believed that the challenged order was lawful in light of legitimate penological interests supporting' the directive. . . While the individual corrections officers who confiscated Barnes's Tsalot–Kob may very well have been acting reasonably when following DOCS policy, a different analysis may apply to those responsible for the policy. On this record, it is not apparent whether there was a legitimate penological reason to limit only Tsalot–Kobs to inmates registered as Rastafarian. Therefore, we cannot say as a matter of law that it was objectively reasonable for those defendants to believe that denying a Tsalot–Kob to an inmate registered as Jewish was constitutional. Moreover, because defendants have not identified any penological interests supporting the policy, we cannot assess the reasonableness of their actions. Accordingly, we remand to the district court for further proceedings and development of the record."); Estate of Brown v. Thomas, 771 F.3d 1001, 1002, 1005 (7th Cir. 2014)) ("The estate contends not that Secor shouldn't have pulled the trigger when he saw a shotgun was pointed at him but that the police search was executed in an unreasonable manner (see, e.g., Terebesi v. Torreso, 764 F.3d 217, 233–36 and n. 16 (2d Cir.2014); cf. Petkus v. Richland County, 767 F.3d 647, 650–52 (7th Cir.2014)), violating the Fourth Amendment and causing Secor mistakenly to think he had to kill Brown in self-defense. . . . [Expert] Gaut's report concludes that the search of the apartment was a 'gross deviation from accepted police practices and procedures by the Brown County Sheriff's Office,' a deviation that rose 'to the level of substantial, deliberate indifference for the rights and safety of" Brown. But even if Gaut's report is 100 percent on the mark, it can't justify imposing liability on Secor. Secor did not devise the search policy adopted by Brown County. He was doing what he was told to do when, accoutered as he was, he led the search of Brown's apartment. Of course if one is told by one's superiors to do something that is obviously illegal, it is no defense that one was just obeying orders; that was a defense conclusively rejected at the Nuremberg trials of Nazi war criminals. But the situation in this case was not that extreme. There were as we mentioned reasons for having the undercover officer, who needs a goatee, sideburns, etc. in his undercover work, lead the search. There was no compelling reason for him to be the one to knock on the door, but it wasn't because of that, but because he was visible through the window, that Brown saw him and commenced his fatal flight. Even if we thought Secor may have been exceeding proper constitutional bounds in leading the search given his appearance, he would still be entitled to qualified immunity, thus defeating the estate's claim against him."); Elkins v. District of Columbia, 690 F.3d 554, 568, 569 (D.C. Cir. 2012) ("The district court denied Williams–Cherry qualified immunity on the ground that it has long been clearly established that seizing items based on a warrant that does not authorize such seizure is unconstitutional. In doing so, the district court misapplied the 'clearly established' inquiry. That Elkins's rights were clearly violated does not mean Williams–Cherry clearly should have known she was violating them. The appropriate question for us to ask is whether it would have been clear to a reasonable official in Williams–Cherry's situation that seizing Elkins's notebook was unlawful. Williams–Cherry was one of several people who carried out the search, including MDP officers and officials from DCRA and HPO. The MPD officers led the search along with DCRA employee Juan Scott, one of Williams–Cherry's supervisors,. . . who provided primary oversight of the agency officials. Williams–Cherry was never given a copy of the warrant. She was not shown the warrant. Scott had the warrant in hand when he and the other agency officials arrived first at the home. When MPD officers arrived, Scott gave the warrant to them. According to Elkins, no one searched for any documents until an MPD officer announced that they had the right to do so. . . After the search began, Scott told Williams–Cherry, who was taking pictures of the outside of the house, to come inside and photograph its interior. Inside, Williams–Cherry saw officials searching through drawers. She asked Scott if that was allowed. Scott conferred with an MPD officer within earshot of Williams–Cherry, and the officer said again that anything related to construction, including documents, could be seized. When Elkins produced the notebook Williams–Cherry, who was standing nearby, took it from her. We do not think it would be clear to 'a reasonable officer ... in the situation [Williams–Cherry] confronted' that taking the notebook from Elkins was a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Williams–Cherry was but a junior member of the search team present to take pictures in an inspection led by police and her superiors. Before taking the notebook from Elkins, Williams–Cherry asked her superiors about the permissible scope of the search and relied upon the judgment of her supervisor and the police officer in charge. We do not find any one of these factors dispositive, but viewing them together, we conclude that Williams–Cherry's actions, though mistaken, were not unreasonable. . . Several other circuits have addressed the reasonableness of an inferior officer's reliance upon the conclusions of a superior and reached similar outcomes. [collecting cases] Whether an official's reliance is reasonable will always turn on several factors, but there is no basis in this record to find that Williams–Cherry's was not. She is entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity."); Shepard v. Hallandale Beach Police Dept., No. 09-14265, 2010 WL 3795067, at *4 (11th Cir. Sept. 30, 2010) (not published) ("This Court has concluded that assisting officers during a search are entitled to qualified immunity when there is no indication that they acted unreasonably in following the lead of a primary officer or that they knew or should have known that their conduct might result in a Fourth Amendment violation, even when the primary officer is not entitled to qualified immunity."); Kennedy v. City Of Cincinnati, 595 F.3d 327, 337, 338 (6th Cir. 2010) ("Here, after Zucker questioned Kennedy for approximately fifteen minutes, he determined that his 'basis for any reasonable suspicion to stop Mr. Kennedy had ceased, because [he] had no crime that [he] could verify had been committed, nor could [he] identify one that [was] being committed or [was] going to be committed.' Zucker informed Hudepohl of this fact, but Hudepohl still asked Zucker to confiscate Kennedy's pool pass and to order him off the premises. Zucker fully complied with this request, and, arguably, ordered Kennedy to not enter any CRC property for an indefinite period of time. Zucker avers that he should be immune from suit because he was following the orders of Hudepohl, an agent of the municipal pool. However, 'since World War II, the Ajust following orders" defense has not occupied a respected position in our jurisprudence, and officers in such cases may be held liable under § 1983 if there is a reason why any of them should question the validity of that order.'. . Regardless of the authority Hudepohl possessed, Zucker was not 'relieve[d] ... of his responsibility to decide for himself whether to violate clearly established constitutional rights[.]'. . '[U]nder the Supremacy Clause, public officials have an obligation to follow the Constitution even in the midst of a contrary directive from a superior or in a policy.'. . Thus, viewing the facts alleged in the light most favorable to Kennedy, we conclude that Zucker violated Kennedy's constitutional rights by banning him from all City recreational property without due process of law. . . . Any competent government official, particularly a police officer, should have realized that he cannot deprive a person, who has not committed a crime or violated some regulation, nor was likely to do so, of access to public grounds without due process of law. Therefore, we hold that for purposes of defendants' motion for summary judgment, Kennedy possessed a constitutionally-protected liberty interest to use municipal property open to the public and that depriving him of his liberty interest, without procedural due process, constituted a violation of a clearly established constitutional right."); Parrish v. Ball, 593 F.3d 993, 1002, 1003 (8th Cir. 2010) ("We have . . . noted that a supervisor's failure to train an inferior officer may subject the superior to § 1983 liability in his individual capacity, 'where the failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the police come into contact.'. . The plaintiff must also prove that the alleged failure to train 'actually caused' the constitutional deprivation. . .Thus, it follows that a supervisory officer is entitled to qualified immunity for a § 1983 failure to train action unless a reasonable supervisor would have known that his training program (or lack thereof) was likely to result in the specific constitutional violation at issue. . . As we noted in our analysis above, we find that there is no patently obvious need to train officers not to sexually assault women, nor is there a patently obvious need to train officers that if they sexually assault a woman, they may be charged with a felony. Moreover, a reasonable supervisor in Sheriff Ball's position would not know that a failure to specifically train Fite not to sexually assault a woman would cause Fite to engage in that very behavior. Thus, the district court correctly found that Sheriff Ball is entitled to qualified immunity in his individual capacity."); Merriweather v. Zamora, 569 F.3d 307, 318 (6th Cir. 2009) (no qualified immunity for supervisors who encouraged atmosphere of disregard for proper mail-handling procedures of prisoners' legal mail; qualified immunity for mail-room employees where no particular individual could be linked to improper handling of mail); Hunt v. Tomplait, 301 F. App'x 355, 2008 WL 5129642, at *4 (5th Cir. Dec. 8, 2008) ("The reasoning in Ramirez is persuasive. Deputy Tomplait was not a mere bystander in the execution of the search warrant. . . He actively led the search team at Chief

Hunter's request to the only 'Hunt residence' that he was aware of, without reading the search warrant or pursuing additional information about the residence described in the search warrant. The fact that Deputy Tomplait did not enter the house does not relieve him of liability as a matter of law; his identification of the Hunt residence as the residence to be searched–and subsequent leadership of the search team to the residence–was a direct cause of the Fourth Amendment violation. . . . Because Deputy Tomplait took the lead in identifying the residence without inquiring beyond the name of the family that lived there, he cannot contend that he did not effectuate the violation because he did not physically enter the incorrect residence."); Killmon v. City of Miami, 199 F. App'x796, 2006 WL 2769526, at *3 (11th Cir. Sept. 27, 2006) ("When an officer is present with a fellow officer and both observe the same course of events, it is unreasonable for an officer to rely upon the fellow-officer rule to determine that probable cause exists. Florida courts apply the fellow-officer rule when the arresting officer was absent for a significant portion of the events that gave rise to probable cause. . . . It is reasonable for an officer in that situation to rely upon his fellow officer's judgment about probable cause. The rule typically requires that the fellow officer actually communicate to the arresting officer the basis for probable cause. . . When the arresting officer observed the same events as his fellow officer, the fellow-officer rule does not apply. As the district court acknowledged and we have explained, 'the Ajust following orders" defense has not occupied a respected position in our jurisprudence, and officers in such cases may be held liable under § 1983 if there is a Areason why any of them should question the validity of that order."'); KRL v. Moore, 384 F.3d 1105, 1117 (9th Cir. 2004) ("The district court properly denied qualified immunity to Hall on Plaintiffs' claim that he unreasonably relied on the search warrant and that he seized documents predating 1990 during the January 13 search. Assuming he was the lead investigator, Hall would have greater responsibility for ensuring that the warrant was not defective. . . Even if probable cause existed to believe KRL was 'permeated with fraud' since 1995, no reasonable officer could conclude that the discovery of a 1990 ledger and several checks showed that KRL had been primarily engaged in fraudulent activity since 1990. . .The fact that a judge and a prosecutor had approved the warrant does not make Hall's reliance on it reasonable. . .Regarding the claim of overbroad execution, the law is clearly established that a search may not exceed the scope of the search warrant, and the warrant here was limited to documents created after 1990. . . Thus, Hall is not entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' claim that he seized documents predating 1990."); Penn v. United States, 335 F.3d 786, 790 (8th Cir.2003) ("We recognize that the ex parte nature of the order, its county-wide scope, and its thirty-day pre-hearing duration raise legitimate questions about its legality. A determination of whether an order is unlawful, however, is an inquiry distinct from whether it is facially valid. Penn does not complain about the manner in which Captain Vettleson and Sheriff Landeis served and executed the order–her complaint is that they carried it out at all. Given the circumstances, we will not subject the officers to the difficult choice 'between disobeying the court order or being haled into court to answer for damages.'"); Evett v. DETNTFF* (Texas Narcotics Trafficking Task Force), 330 F.3d 681, 690 (5th Cir. 2003) ("We believe that, based on the facts of this case, requiring Mendiola, as the supervising officer at the scene of the raid, to personally seek out all available information from all participating law enforcement officers before approving an arrest would not have been practicable. As a result, we find that Mendiola did not act with deliberate indifference by ultimately giving his approval of Evett's arrest. As noted above, Mendiola cannot be held liable for unintentional oversights; particularly when the evidence indicates Mendiola could not have consciously believed his actions, based on the information made available to him, would lead to a violation of Evett's constitutional rights. We, therefore, reverse the district court and hold that Mendiola is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law."); Sorensen v. City of New York, No. 00-9366, 2002 WL 1758432, at * (2d Cir. July 30, 2002) (unpublished disposition) ("Although it is true that low-level employees have been granted qualified immunity where they followed orders promulgated by their superiors, immunity has been granted only when the orders were facially valid. [citing cases] The strip-search policy at issue here, however, had twice been declared unconstitutional by this court, and so was not facially valid. . . . Appellants thus cannot establish that it was objectively reasonable for them to believe under the circumstances that strip-searching Sorensen was constitutional."); Lawrence v. Bowersox, 297 F.3d 727, 733 (8th Cir. 2002) (not inconsistent for jury to find excessive force was used, but not maliciously and sadistically by person following orders; fact that lower-level officer was found not liable did not establish that supervisor was entitled to qualified immunity; "Orchestrating an unnecessary pepper spray shower violated clearly established rights of which a reasonable person should have known."); Ramirez v. Butte Silver Bow County, 298 F.3d 1022, 1027, 1028 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Law enforcement officers are entitled to qualified immunity if they act reasonably under the circumstances, even if the actions result in a constitutional violation. . . What's reasonable for a particular officer depends on his role in the search. . . . The officers who lead the team that executes a warrant are responsible for ensuring that they have lawful authority for their actions. A key aspect of this responsibility is making sure that they have a proper warrant that in fact authorizes the search and seizure they are about to conduct. The leaders of the expedition may not simply assume that the warrant authorizes the search and seizure. Rather, they must actually read the warrant and satisfy themselves that they understand its scope and limitations, and that it is not defective in some obvious way. . . . Line officers, on the other hand, are required to do much less. They do not have to actually read or even see the warrant; they may accept the word of their superiors that they have a warrant and that it is valid. . . .The line officers here acted reasonably: They were told that a warrant had been obtained and learned through an advance briefing what items could be seized. . . Because they were not required to read the warrant, the line officers conducting this search cannot reasonably have been expected to know that it was defective."), aff'd by Groh v. Ramirez, 124 S. Ct. 1284, 1293, 1294 (2004) ("Given that the particularity requirement is set forth in the text of the Constitution, no reasonable officer could believe that a warrant that plainly did not comply with that requirement was valid. . . . [E]ven a cursory reading of the warrant in this case–perhaps just a simple glance–would have revealed a glaring deficiency that any reasonable police officer would have known was constitutionally fatal."); Liu v. Phillips, 234 F.3d 55, 57, 58 (1st Cir. 2000) ("[T]his case primarily presents the question whether and when an officer who participates in an arrest . . . may reasonably rely on a fellow officer or agent who does (or by position should) know the substantive law and the facts and who (based on that knowledge) asserts that an offense has been committed. Police officers without complete knowledge of the facts regularly participate in arrests ordered or authorized by superiors or by fellow officers. Where the authorizing officer has made a factual mistake but the mistake is not apparent, immunity for the officer who reasonably assisted is well settled. . . The outcome should not be different where the agent who directs or authorizes the arrest has made a mistake of law equally invisible to the assisting officer. . . . In the few pertinent cases we could find, officers who reasonably relied on superior officers have been held to be entitled to qualified immunity even if the officer who gave the direction acted on a misapprehension as to the law. Bilida v. McCleod, 211 F.3d 166, 174-75 (1st Cir.2000); Moore v. Marketplace Restaurant, Inc., 754 F.2d 1336, 1348 (7th Cir.1985).").

See also Arevalo v. City of Farmers Branch, No. 3:16-CV-1540-D, 2017 WL 5569841, at *9, *11, *13 (N.D. Tex. Nov. 20, 2017) ("The court will assume arguendo that Arevalo has stated a claim for supervisory liability based on the violation of a constitutional right through a failure to train, and it will focus on Saucier's second prong and determine whether Arevalo has overcome Chief Fuller's entitlement to qualified immunity. Accepting the second amended complaint's well-pleaded facts as true, and viewing them in the light most favorable to Arevalo, the record establishes the following: Chief Fuller decided not to provide deadly force training to an individual police officer with eight years of prior law enforcement experience who had been disciplined by a prior law enforcement employer on at least three different occasions for using excessive force and had been the subject of two excessive force complaints filed against him during those eight years. 'The relevant inquiry' then, 'is whether existing precedent placed the conclusion that [Chief Fuller] acted unreasonably in these circumstances "beyond debate."'. . . . Beyond Brown, the Fifth Circuit has declined to find deliberate indifference in several cases where the officers in question had histories generally suggestive of future misconduct—'even where a municipal employer knew of a particular officer's propensities for violence or recklessness.'. . . These decisions all instead looked for evidence concerning the officer's proclivity to commit the specific constitutional violation that had occurred. . . . Even if the court assumes that Officer Johnson violated E.R.'s rights through the use of excessive force, the bases for excessive force allegations can vary widely, and not all involve the application of deadly force. . . . If Officer Johnson's excessive force reprimands arose from the use of deadly force, then his use of such force against E.R. could be a 'highly predictable consequence' of not receiving training from Chief Fuller. But if the reprimands involved the use of non-deadly force, 'the evidence is far more equivocal on the question of whether there was...an obvious need for more or different training.'. . Thus without more specifics concerning the grounds for the reprimands, the court cannot say that Chief Fuller was objectively unreasonable under clearly established law for not providing deadly force training to Officer Johnson. Chief Fuller is therefore entitled to qualified immunity from Arevalo's § 1983 Fourth Amendment claim for failure to train. . . . [T]he court holds that hiring Officer Johnson was not unreasonable under clearly established law, despite his three excessive force reprimands and two excessive force complaints. Like the prior crime in Rivera, an excessive force allegation can cover a broad range of conduct, only some of which involves the application of deadly force. If Officer Johnson's reprimands for use of excessive force were due to the misuse of deadly force, there is a stronger connection between Officer Johnson's background and the subsequent shooting of E.R..Without the details of these reprimands, however, the court cannot conclude that Chief Fuller's decision to hire Officer Johnson was objectively unreasonable. Therefore, Chief Fuller is entitled to qualified immunity from individual liability on Arevalo's hiring claim. . . . Although

Arevalo's second amended complaint fails to allege facts that would overcome Chief Fuller's qualified immunity, the court will order Arevalo to file a Rule 7(a) reply specifically to Chief Fuller's assertion of qualified immunity for both the failure to train and hiring claims."); Glowczenski v. Taser Intern., Inc., No. CV04–4052 (WDW), 2013 WL 802912, *18, *19 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 5, 2013) ("Here, the use of the TASER by Platt was not gratuitous-he was ordered to apply it-nor was it excessive in the context of the injuries inflicted by the TASER in isolation. . . As noted, the only 'force' used by Platt against Glowczenski was multiple applications of the TASER, resulting in pain and marks on Glowczenski's body. Under the totality of the circumstances here, I find that those injuries, or, to put it differently, the force used to inflict them, are de minimis. The TASER is acknowledged as a pain compliance tool, so pain is not a sufficiently serious injury to rise to the necessary level of harm for an excessive force claim based on TASER applications. And, the marks on Glowczenski's body, which the plaintiffs argue were third degree burns, but which, I found earlier, cannot be so identified based on the evidence presented by the plaintiffs, are most akin to bruises and also are insufficiently serious for excessive force purposes. Nor was the use of the TASER multiple times objectively unreasonable as discussed infra in regard to qualified immunity, even without regard to the seriousness of the injuries. . . . Here, it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer on February 4, 2004 that using a TASER on an emotionally troubled individual-all of the disputed issues of fact notwithstanding-when ordered to do so by a superior officer was unlawful. Nor would a reasonable officer have believed that multiple applications of the TASER were unlawful. As Platt reports, the Second Circuit has noted that TASER application in drivestun mode 'typically causes temporary, if significant pain and no permanent injury.'. . The plaintiffs have pointed to no admissible evidence that the police knew or should have known in 2004 (or now, for that matter) that multiple drive-stun applications of the TASER could cause harm that would amount to excessive force. Under these circumstances, Platt's actions were objectively reasonable and he is entitled to qualified immunity."); Battiste v. Lamberti, 571 F.Supp.2d 1286, 1297, 1298 (S.D. Fla. 2008) ("Here, the arresting deputies argue that they arrested Plaintiffs because they were ordered to–that when they heard the call for an arrest team, they followed that order and arrested the first individuals they saw on the railroad tracks. . . They also testified that they did not see Plaintiffs committing any crime, except for trespassing and failing to disperse. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the arresting deputies should have known not to follow the order to make arrests on the railroad tracks. The Court has already held there is a genuine issue as to whether the arresting deputies had arguable probable cause to arrest Plaintiffs for trespassing, based on whether the arresting deputies knew or should have known that Plaintiffs were not on the tracks willfully. It follows that if the arresting deputies knew or should have known Plaintiffs were not on the tracks willfully, they would have had a reason to question the validity of an order to arrest them (given that no arguable probable cause existed to arrest Plaintiffs for any other crime). Thus, the arresting deputies are not entitled to qualified immunity on the basis of their 'following orders' argument."); Rauen v. City of Miami, 2007 WL 686609, at *20, *21 (S.D. Fla. Mar. 2, 2007) ("Brooks also argues, and other Individual Defendants incorporate his argument by reference, that because he was following the orders of his superior officers, he is entitled to qualified immunity unless Plaintiffs can establish that a reasonable officer in Brooks' position would have had fair notice that his carrying out of orders given by high-ranking Miami police officers would violate clearly established federal law. . . Officers following the orders of their superiors are entitled to qualified immunity unless they 'acted unreasonably in following [their superior's] lead, or ... they knew or should have known that their conduct might result in a violation of the plaintiff's rights.' Hartsfield v. LeMacks, 50 F.3d 950, 956 (11th Cir.1995). Qualified immunity has been afforded to officers following superiors' orders where, for example, an officer is ordered to search a person previously questioned by the officer's superior (such that the officer reasonably believes that there is individualized suspicion supporting the search). . . This case is not a case of that type. The Individual Defendants asserting this argument here had no reason to believe that an order from high-ranking Miami police officers to suppress legal protest on a wholesale basis with allegedly no justification would not result in a violation of clearly established federal law. Thus, the Individual Defendants who have asserted this argument are not entitled to qualified immunity on the basis that they were following orders."); Hunt v. County of Whitman, 2006 WL 2096068, at *7 (E.D. Wash. July 26, 2006) ("While the Ninth Circuit has decided that a supervisor is not entitled to qualified immunity where a jury issue exists with respect to whether his subordinate violated clearly established law, Watkins, 145 F.3d at 1093, the Ninth Circuit does not appear to have decided whether a supervisor is entitled to qualified immunity where, as here, his subordinates did not violate clearly established law. Nevertheless, there is every reason to think the Ninth Circuit will follow its sister circuits' lead. One of the objectives of the qualified-immunity doctrine is to enable public servants to effectively perform their duties by freeing them from the fear of harassing litigation. . . This objective can be accomplished only if public servants 'reasonably can anticipate when their conduct may give rise to liability for damages [.]' . . . As other circuits have recognized, granting a supervisor qualified immunity when his subordinate has not violated clearly established law 'comports with [this] core principle of qualified immunity by protecting supervisory officials from suit when they could not reasonably anticipate liability.' Camilo-Robles, 151 F.3d at 6. Assuming, then, that the Ninth Circuit will follow its sister circuits' lead, Sheriff Tomson is entitled to qualified immunity because Deputy Reavis, Sergeant Kelley, and Deputy McNannay did not violate clearly established law."); DeToledo v. County of Suffolk, 379 F.Supp.2d 138, 148, 149 (D. Mass. 2005) ("That Swain settled the strip search issue in this Circuit with respect to pretrial detainees, as Judge Gertner thought in Ford, is thrown into doubt by subsequent First Circuit cases. The arrestee in Swain was held in isolation in a temporary holding facility where there was no risk of contact with other prisoners. That fact, and the difference in magnitude between security concerns in a holding cell and those in a prison, led an equally divided en banc Court in Savard to conclude that neither Swain (nor Arruda) gave definitive guidance with respect to pretrial detainees. . . . Savard left standing a district court grant of qualified immunity to defendants who had implemented a policy mandating strip and visual body cavity searches of all persons admitted to a facility housing pretrial detainees, convicts in protective custody, and newly sentenced felons. I will assume without deciding that by July 26, 1998, the law was reasonably clear in banning strip searches in a case like this one (although Swain did not address the issue of the reasonableness of a policy mandating strip searches of persons like Williams who are arrested for serious non-violent felonies). Thus, the remaining step in the Saucier analysis requires a determination of whether a reasonable corrections officer in the position of Thomas (or Sinclair) would have known that her actions in carrying out a strip search in accordance with institutional policy would violate Williams' Fourth Amendment rights. At the time, the women officers were acting pursuant to a written directive promulgated by the general counsel of the Suffolk County Sheriff's Department on behalf of their ultimate superior, the Sheriff. The policy had been in place in one form or another since at least 1991. . . Neither woman held a policymaking position or was imbued with the discretionary authority to dispense with the strip search of a prisoner, even had the policy permitted the exercise of such discretion. Under the circumstances, it would be unreasonable to conclude that a similarly situated line officer would have believed that compliance with a long-established policy directive emanating from the leadership of the Department involved a violation of a prisoner's constitutional rights. That the defendants are excused from liability by virtue of 'following orders' is not intuitively appealing, but also not shocking in a correctional environment strongly influenced by military values of hierarchy and obedience to orders. A ruling encouraging low-ranking officers to second-guess the constitutionality of policies and procedures mandated by their superiors would appear neither constitutionally wise nor institutionally desirable. Nor does elemental fairness counsel holding rank-and-file officers liable while letting those who formulated and implemented an unconstitutional policy go scot free. Consequently, both Sinclair and Thomas are entitled to a grant of qualified immunity." [footnotes omitted]); Leonard v. Compton, 2005 WL 1460165, at *6 (N.D. Ohio June 17, 2005) (not reported) ("Even assuming that Lieutenant Seroka explicitly told Officer Compton that he could violate Ms. Leonard's clearly established constitutional rights by arresting her in her home without a warrant, that advice does not insulate Officer Compton from liability. . .Although supervisors may be liable under Section 1983 for the misconduct of an official he or she supervises if the supervisor condoned, encouraged, authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced to the unconstitutional conduct, . . . defendants have not identified a single case to support their proposition that reliance on a supervisor's advice absolves subordinates from liability for their own misconduct. Just as an official policy does 'not make reasonable a belief that was contrary to a decided body of case law,'. . police officers cannot obtain a license to violate clearly established constitutional rights from their superior officers. . . Accordingly, even if Officer Compton was relying on the advice of his superior officer in effectuating the warrantless arrest of Ms. Leonard in her home, his conduct was nonetheless objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established constitutional law."); Anoushiravani v. Fishel, 2004 WL 1630240, at *14 (D.Or. July 19, 2004) (not reported) ("In sum, plaintiff fails to show a reasonable front line Customs official would understand that the actions of defendant Fishel illegally deprived plaintiff of property without due process of law. While plaintiff alleges facts to support a possible constitutional violation, the case law, as set forth by plaintiff and defendants, is not so clear that a reasonable front line Customs official should be able to understand its nuances and consistently apply its teachings. . . . Unlike defendant Fishel, a front line Customs official, defendants Stilwell and Goldfarb are trained in the law, trained in its jargon and sometimes subtle distinctions. Furthermore, as lawyers for a federal law enforcement agency, an agency on the front lines of the inevitable conflict between government action and individual rights, they are expected to be well versed in core due process jurisprudence.").

See also KRL v. Estate of Moore, 512 F.3d 1184, 1191, 1192 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Faced with an assessment of probable cause upon which reasonable minds could disagree, defendants properly sought review by District Attorney Riebe and approval by a neutral and detached magistrate. . .These acts are sufficient to establish objectively reasonable behavior. . .We also reject Plaintiffs' argument that Moore, Irey and Hall, as lead investigators, held a greater responsibility than Riebe, who was minimally involved, for ensuring that the warrants were not defective. Interpreting the vague language in our prior opinion, the district court was led to assume that we had denied Hall qualified immunity for both the January 11 and January 13 warrants. Based on this assumption, it held that Riebe acted reasonably when he reviewed the January 11 warrant, but Hall acted unreasonably when he reviewed and relied on the same warrant. The district court reconciled this disparity by concluding that, under Ramirez, lead investigators have a greater responsibility than reviewing attorneys to ensure that warrants are supported by probable cause. . . . To alleviate any confusion caused by the admittedly ambiguous wording of our prior opinion, we stress that the liability of government attorneys reviewing a warrant for probable cause is not comparable to that of line officers executing a warrant under Ramirez. In Ramirez, we distinguished between lead and line officers in the context of the execution of a search warrant, when a few officers are typically in charge and other law enforcement personnel assist in defined roles. . . The rule from Ramirez, however, should not be used to distinguish between officers and government attorneys when the sole issue is whether the supporting affidavit provides sufficient facts to show probable cause. A rule requiring officers to question reasonable assessments of probable cause by government attorneys and magistrates would 'cause an undesirable delay in the execution of warrants' and 'would also mean that lay officers must at their own risk second-guess the legal assessments of trained lawyers.'. . Such a rule is not required by the Constitution, nor is it supported by a fair reading of Ramirez.")

KRL v. Estate of Moore, 512 F.3d 1184, 1192, 1193 (9th Cir. 2008)("Despite the January 13 warrant's obvious lack of probable cause, Hall argues that he reasonably relied on the warrant as a 'line officer' during the actual search. . . We reject Hall's argument, as well as his wishful reading of Ramirez. When analyzing qualified immunity , our underlying inquiry is the reasonableness of the officer's conduct.. . We recognized in Ramirez that 'officers' roles can vary widely' during a search. . . The distinction between lead and line officers lends itself well to cases with facts similar to Ramirez, in which some officers plan and direct the search, and other officers merely assist in its execution. . . However, the 'lead officer' and 'line officer' designations should not be treated as inflexible categories, nor should they obscure our underlying inquiry into the reasonableness of an officer's conduct in a particular case.In this case, Hall's role in the January 13 search defies easy classification. On the one hand, Hall correctly points out that his involvement in the actual search was dissimilar to that of the search leader in Ramirez. Hall did not draft the affidavit and warrant; he did not appear before the magistrate; and there is no evidence that he conducted the pre-search briefing or supervised the search. . . On the other hand, it would be inaccurate to classify Hall as a line officer at the January 13 search. Hall's involvement in the criminal investigation was not confined to assisting as part of the search warrant entry team. Rather, the record shows that Hall played an integral role in the overall investigation. . . . Although Hall's participation differed from that of the search leader in Ramirez, his activities with respect to the January 13 search place him on the 'lead' side of the lead-line distinction. . . . Thus, when analyzing Hall's role pursuant to the January 13 warrant, it is most useful to ask the question posed in Saucier: 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer [in Hall's position] that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . . Given his leadership role in the overall investigation, Hall acted unreasonably when he relied on the January 13 warrant without first ensuring that the warrant was facially valid. As we previously concluded, any reasonable officer making such an inquiry would conclude that the discovery of a ledger and several checks predating the allegedly fraudulent activity by five years did not provide sufficient probable cause to search for documents dating back to 1990. . . . We affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Hall to the extent that he relied on the January 13 warrant, which was so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence unreasonable.")

H. Development and Demise of the "Rigid Order of Battle"

1. Siegert v. Gilley

In Siegert v. Gilley, 500 U.S. 226 (1991), plaintiff, a clinical psychologist, brought a Bivens action against his supervisor, claiming impairment of future employment prospects due to the sending of a defamatory letter of reference. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia had dismissed on grounds that plaintiff had not overcome respondent's claim of qualified immunity under the "heightened pleading standard."

The Supreme Court held that the claim failed at an analytically earlier stage. The plaintiff did not state a constitutional claim. Under Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693 (1976), there was no constitutional protection for one's interest in his reputation, even if facts sufficient to establish malice were pleaded.

Chief Justice Rehnquist set out the "...analytical structure under which a claim of qualified immunity should be addressed." The first inquiry is whether the plaintiff has alleged the violation of a clearly established constitutional right. This question is a purely legal question. "Once a defendant pleads a defense of qualified immunity, '[o]n summary judgment, the judge . . . may determine not only currently applicable law, but whether the law was clearly established at the time," and until this threshold immunity question is resolved, there should be no discovery.

2. County of Sacramento v. Lewis

In County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833 (1998), a majority of the Court reinforced the view that "the better approach to resolving cases in which the defense of qualified immunity is raised is to determine first whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right at all." Id. at 841 n.5. Justice Souter, writing for the majority, explained:

> [T]he generally sound rule of avoiding determination of constitutional issues does not readily fit the situation presented here; when liability is claimed on the basis of a constitutional violation, even a finding of qualified immunity requires some determination about the state of constitutional law at the time the officer acted. What is more significant is that if the policy of avoidance were always followed in favor of ruling on qualified immunity whenever there was no clearly settled constitutional rule of primary conduct, standards of official conduct would tend to remain uncertain, to the detriment both of officials and individuals. An immunity determination, with nothing more, provides no clear standard, constitutional or non-constitutional. In practical terms, escape from uncertainty would require the issue to arise in a suit to enjoin future conduct, in an action against a municipality, or in litigating a suppression motion in a criminal proceeding; in none of these instances would qualified immunity be available to block a determination of law. . . But these avenues would not necessarily be open, and therefore the better approach is to determine the right before determining whether it was previously established with clarity.

Id. Justice Stevens would limit Siegert's analytical approach to cases where the constitutional issue is clear. Where the question is difficult and unresolved, he would prefer its resolution in a context where municipal liability is raised and the case cannot be disposed of on qualified immunity grounds. Id. at 859 (Stevens, J., concurring in the judgment). Justice Breyer wrote separately in County of Sacramento to express his agreement with Justice Stevens' view that Siegert "should not be read to deny lower courts the flexibility, in appropriate cases, to decide § 1983 claims on the basis of qualified immunity, and thereby avoid wrestling with constitutional issues that are either difficult or poorly presented." Id. at 858, 859 (Breyer, J., concurring).

See also Conn v. Gabbert, 526 U.S. 286, 290 (1999) ("[A] court must first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right at all, and if so, proceed to determine whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.").

3. Wilson v. Layne

In Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603 (1999), the Supreme Court resolved a split among the Circuits as to the availability of qualified immunity for law enforcement officers who invite the media to "ride along" to observe and record the activities of the officers while executing a warrant in a private home. The Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, in a divided en banc opinion, had granted the officers qualified immunity on the ground that, at the time of the challenged conduct, no court had held that the bringing of media into a private residence in conjunction with the execution of a warrant was a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Finding that the law was not clearly established at the time, the Fourth Circuit did not address the "merits" question of whether such media ride-alongs, involving entry into a private residence, constituted a violation of the Fourth Amendment. 526 U.S. at 608.

The Supreme Court affirmed the grant of qualified immunity, but did so by adopting the analytical approach it had established in Siegert, County of Sacramento, and Conn. Before addressing whether the law was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, the court must first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the violation of a constitutional right at all. 526 U.S. at 609. A unanimous Court concluded that such media ride-alongs violated the Fourth Amendment. "We hold that it is a violation of the Fourth Amendment for police to bring members of the media or other third parties into a home during the execution of a warrant when the presence of the third parties in the home was not in aid of the execution of the warrant." Id. at 614. Wilson not only strongly reinforces (requires?) the merits-first approach to the qualified immunity analysis, but also clarifies that this approach is not reserved for those cases in which the court determines that the constitutional right does not exist.

With only Justice Stevens dissenting, the Court went on to conclude that, despite the finding of a constitutional violation by a unanimous Court, the law was not clearly established at the time of the officers' conduct such that a reasonable officer would have known that the conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. The Court framed the issue as the objective question of "whether a reasonable officer could have believed that bringing members of the media into a home during the execution of an arrest warrant was lawful, in light of clearly established law and the information the officers possessed." Id. at 615. The Court concluded general Fourth Amendment principles did not apply with obvious clarity to the officers' conduct in this case. Id. Furthermore, "[p]etitioners [had] not brought to [the Court's] attention any cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which they [sought] to rely, nor [had] they identified a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful." Id. at 616. Finally, the Court gave considerable weight to the fact that the federal and local law enforcement departments involved in the incident had ride-along policies which "explicitly contemplated that media who engaged in ride-alongs might enter private homes with their cameras as part of fugitive apprehension arrests," or "did not expressly prohibit media entry into private homes." Id. at 617.

Justice Stevens took the position that "[t]he absence of judicial opinions expressly holding that police violate the Fourth Amendment if they bring media representatives into private homes provides scant support for the conclusion that in 1992 a competent officer could reasonably believe that it would be lawful to do so. Prior to our decision in United States v. Lanier, . . . no judicial opinion specifically held that it was unconstitutional for a state judge to use his official power to extort sexual favors from a potential litigant. Yet, we unanimously concluded that the defendant had fair warning that he was violating his victim's constitutional rights." Id. at 621. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

See also Hanlon v. Berger, 526 U.S. 808, 810 (1999) (per curiam) ("Petitioners maintain that even though they may have violated the Fourth Amendment rights of respondents, they are entitled to the defense of qualified immunity. We agree. Our holding in Wilson makes clear that this right was not clearly established in 1992. The parties have not called our attention to any decisions which would have made the state of the law any clearer a year later–at the time of the search in this case. We therefore vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.").

4. Saucier v. Katz

In Saucier v.Katz, 121 S. Ct. 2151 (2001), overruled in part by Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S. Ct. 808 (2009), the Court reinforced this analytical approach as follows:

> A court required to rule upon the qualified immunity issue must consider, then, this threshold question: Taken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, do the facts alleged show the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right? This must be the initial inquiry. [citing Siegert] In the course of determining whether a constitutional right was violated on the premises alleged, a court might find it necessary to set forth principles which will become the basis for a holding that a right is clearly established. This is the process for the law's elaboration from case to case, and it is one reason for our insisting upon turning to the existence or nonexistence of a constitutional right as the first inquiry. The law might be deprived of this explanation were a court simply to skip ahead to the question whether the law clearly established that the officer's conduct was unlawful in the circumstances of the case. If no constitutional right would have been violated were the allegations established, there is no necessity for further inquiries concerning qualified immunity. On the other hand, if a violation could be made out on a favorable view of the parties' submissions, the next, sequential step is to ask whether the right was clearly established.
>
> 121 S. Ct. at 2156.

5. Courts Doing Saucier Analysis

D.C. CIRCUIT

Pitt v. District of Columbia, 491 F.3d 494, 510, 511 & n.3 (D.C. Cir. 2007) ("This court has not yet addressed whether malicious prosecution can give rise to a violation of the Fourth Amendment. However, nearly every other Circuit has held that malicious prosecution is actionable under the Fourth Amendment to the extent that the defendant's actions cause the plaintiff to be 'seized' without probable cause. . . . We join the large majority of circuits in holding that malicious prosecution is actionable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 to the extent that the defendant's actions cause the plaintiff to be unreasonably 'seized' without probable cause, in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . . [W]e hold that the evidence received at trial sufficiently demonstrates that the defendant officers violated Mr. Pitt's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . At first glance, it may appear unnecessary to reach this issue at all, given that–as explained below–we hold that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the malicious prosecution claims brought under § 1983. However, the Supreme Court has expressly stated that courts must determine whether a constitutional right has been violated before moving to the analysis of whether a right was 'clearly established' at the time of the defendant's actions. . . . The Supreme Court has not addressed the precise scope of a malicious prosecution action under § 1983. The Court has held that malicious prosecution does not violate 'substantive' due process rights, but it left open the question whether such claims implicate Fourth Amendment rights. . . . [W]e hold that at the time of the officers' actions, it had not been 'clearly established' in this Circuit that malicious prosecution was a violation of any constitutional rights. Accordingly, the defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the malicious prosecution claims brought under § 1983.").

Lederman v. United States, 291 F.3d 36, 39 (D.C. Cir. 2002) ("In this interlocutory appeal, we consider a facial First Amendment challenge to a regulation banning leafleting and other 'demonstration activit [ies]' on the sidewalk at the foot of the House and Senate steps on the East Front of the United States Capitol. Finding that the sidewalk is a public forum and that no part of the ban is narrowly tailored to further a significant governmental purpose, we declare the ban unconstitutional. Because the Capitol Police violated no clearly established legal rules in arresting Appellant for leafleting in violation of the ban, however, we conclude that the officers named in Appellant's Bivens claim are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Kar v. Rumsfeld, 580 F.Supp.2d 80, 84, 85 (D.D.C. 2008) ("It may indeed be inconvenient to hold prompt probable cause hearings in Iraq, and military officials will be justifiably wary of releasing a suspected insurgent–particularly one thought to be involved in the manufacture of the IEDs that have claimed so many American lives. But it is startling that the government thinks it fitting to rely on a century-old Oliver Wendell Holmes opinion that asserts, flatly and without nuance, that 'public danger warrants the substitution of executive power for judicial power.' . . Granted that the 'exigencies are more pressing' in Iraq, and that 'the stakes are higher' there, and that 'pre-existing systems are more rudimentary'–an army that is fully equipped with the latest technology can surely organize itself to convene a probable cause hearing in far less than 48 days. . . Kar's problem in this suit, however, is that his right to a probable cause hearing was not clearly established with sufficient specificity to overcome the defendants' qualified immunity . As weak as the government's authority is, Kar has provided none at all–no precedent that clearly establishes the right of a U.S. citizen to a prompt probable cause hearing when detained in a war zone. Any attempt to apply the two-day requirement from City of Riverside or the seven-day requirement from the Patriot Act to Kar's circumstances ignores the differences between detention on U.S soil and detention in hostile territory. Because defendants did not violate any clearly established Fourth Amendment right, they are entitled to immunity.").

FIRST CIRCUIT

Philip v. Cronin, 537 F.3d 26, 34 (1st Cir. 2008) ("[E]ven if a constitutional right is clearly established, the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity so long as a reasonable official in Cronin's position could believe, albeit mistakenly, that his conduct did not violate the First Amendment. . . This is an objective test: Cronin is entitled to immunity so long as he reasonably could have believed on the facts before him that no violation existed.").

Jennings v. Jones, 499 F.3d 2, 10, 11 (1st Cir. 2007)(on rehearing) ("We have typically applied Saucier using a three-part test in which we inquire: (1) whether the claimant has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right; (2) whether the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged action or inaction; and (3) if both of these questions are answered in the affirmative, whether an objectively reasonable official would have believed that the action taken violated that clearly established constitutional right. . . Although this inquiry subdivides the second prong of the Saucier analysis into two separate questions, it is functionally identical to that analysis.").

Higgins v. Penobscot County Sheriff's Department, 446 F.3d 11, 14, 15 (1st Cir. 2006) ("At least arguably, then, Higgins has adduced enough evidence to meet the first two parts of this circuit's tripartite qualified-immunity inquiry. See, e.g., Wilson v. City of Boston, 421 F.3d 45, 52 (1st Cir.2005) (summarizing the first two questions the court should ask as: "(1) whether the claimant has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right; [and] (2) whether the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged action or inaction ..."); Riverdale Mills Corp. v. Pimpare, 392 F.3d 55, 60-61 (1st Cir.2004) (similar). In our view, the viability of Higgins' constitutional claims against Tibbetts depends on whether, to the extent that what happened properly can be found to have been an 'eviction' at all, Tibbetts could be found to have known that it was an unlawful eviction. Such a finding is necessary if Higgins is to clear the final hurdle presented by the qualified-immunity defense Higgins has interposed. . . . One could not reasonably find in Higgins' favor on this issue. As set forth above, Tibbetts encountered a volatile and potentially dangerous situation–described by Higgins himself as a 'screaming contest'–when he arrived at the trailer park. The subject of the dispute was a man who, so far as Tibbetts could tell, was driving a truck with out-of-state license plates, and who claimed a right to occupy a building with which Tibbetts was familiar and which Tibbetts reasonably thought, based on his prior knowledge of the building and the circumstantial evidence at the scene, to have been long unoccupied. The man provided no written lease or other documentation to support his claimed occupancy right, but only made a conclusory verbal claim of entitlement. Opposing this man were several members of his own family, all of whom disputed his claimed entitlement and informed Tibbetts that he previously had been told to stay away, and one of whom–the man's father–produced a deed which substantiated the father's claim of ownership of the property. . . . In these circumstances, Tibbetts' decision to disbelieve Higgins and to defuse the situation by asking him to leave under threat of citation for trespass was neither plainly incompetent nor involved a deliberate violation of the law. Given the paucity of evidence that Higgins was entitled to occupy the property and the abundance of evidence pointing the other way, Higgins' argument essentially invites us to hold, as a matter of constitutional law, that a police officer, summoned to mediate a volatile dispute involving an alleged trespasser, is obliged to leave the situation unresolved simply because the trespasser represents himself to be entitled to be there. To state the proposition is to expose its foolishness.").

Higgins v. Penobscot County Sheriff's Department, 446 F.3d 11, 15-17 (1st Cir. 2006) (Howard, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The opinion of the court applies the three-part qualified immunity analysis called for in our recent cases and concludes that Tibbetts is entitled to qualified immunity at prong three. . . I write separately because I believe that Tibbetts should have prevailed on the initial inquiry–whether he violated Higgins' constitutional rights–and more generally to urge consideration of a return to the 'two-step process,' Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 195 (2004), traditionally employed in qualified immunity cases. I do so because our three-step process invites erroneous holdings and, possibly, erroneous outcomes, especially in Fourth Amendment cases. For most of the last decade, this court has usually asked three questions when evaluating whether a government actor is entitled to qualified immunity: (1) Does the official conduct in question, as alleged, constitute the violation of an actual federal right? (2) If so, was the right so clearly established at the time of the alleged violation that a reasonable official would have been on notice that the conduct was unconstitutional? (3) If so, would a reasonable official have understood that the conduct violated the clearly established right at issue? . . . A negative answer to question one means that there has been no violation of a federal right; a negative answer to question two or three gives rise to qualified immunity insofar as plaintiff is seeking money damages from the defendant. The second and third questions we ask derive from an elaboration of the two-step process described in the Supreme Court's qualified-immunity cases. The two-step test directs courts evaluating assertions of qualified immunity to ask: (1) Do the specific case facts alleged describe a violation of a federal right? (2) If so, should the defendant, who is charged with knowledge of clearly established law, have known that the conduct in question violated that right? . . . Our elaboration seems to have been prompted, at least in part, by a desire to emphasize that official defendants should not be held liable in situations where they have made reasonable mistakes about the facts of the situation they confront, as well as reasonable mistakes as to whether, in light of clearly established law, their conduct infringed a federal right. . . . Of course, officials should not be made to pay damages for reasonable but mistaken factual judgments made in circumstances such as these. But the reason they should not be held liable is that an official who acts reasonably vis-a-vis the plaintiff has not violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights–even if the invasion in question proves unwarranted with the benefit of 20/20 hindsight. . . In such a situation, the qualified-immunity defense should not even be addressed because its necessary antecedent–the presence of a viable claim for the invasion of a federal right–is lacking. Our recent qualified-immunity cases obscure this point by suggesting that reasonable factual errors, like reasonable legal errors, are grist for the qualified-immunity mill, and are not to be analyzed as part of the threshold federal-right issue. . . . I would not write separately if my concern were merely theoretical. Although the results in Wilson and this case remain the same whether we hold that there has been no invasion of a right or that there has been a reasonable mistake of fact made in connection with the invasion of the right, that is so only because the plaintiff in each case sought only monetary damages, and not declaratory or injunctive relief . . . . We should not hold or imply, as we are invited to do in our tripartite elaboration of the qualified-immunity analysis, that a government official violates the Constitution when she makes a reasonable but mistaken factual judgment that a particular situation calls for a forceful intervention by her office. The traditional two-step qualified immunity analysis, still employed by the Supreme Court, does not permit this error, for it channels consideration of issues of reasonable mistakes of fact into the initial inquiry: whether there has been an invasion of a federal right. . . We should return to the two-step inquiry employed by the Supreme Court.").

Olmeda v. Ortiz-Quinonez, 434 F.3d 62, 65-68 (1st Cir. 2006) ("Although qualified immunity requires merely that a reasonable official could believe that his conduct was lawful, the Supreme Court has directed that the qualified immunity inquiry itself begin by asking whether on the facts alleged there is a constitutional violation at all. . . Saucier's inversion has its own logic, . . .but it has the potential to cause problems where answering this first question in the abstract is difficult. . . A first amendment right to protection against political discrimination was recognized by the Supreme Court about thirty years ago in Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976), and Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507 (1980). See also Rutan v. Republican Party of Ill., 497 U.S. 62 (1990). Where improper motive is shown, the employee is protected against significant adverse employment action–this is a loose formulation–but the right exists only where the job is one for which political affiliation is an improper criterion. . . . In a nutshell, protection does not extend to positions which potentially 'involve decision making on issues where there is room for political disagreement on goals or their implementation' and where the jobholder is a policymaker, confidential assistant, spokesman, or similar officeholder. . . . The cases have not been able to come up with a terse formula or standard for describing policy-related positions that are outside the constitutional constraint. Yet as we observed in Flynn, our circuit has 'regularly upheld against First Amendment challenge the dismissal on political grounds of mid- or upper-level officials or employees who are significantly connected to policy-making.' . . Olmeda's job description makes clear that she is an official, that she is involved in policymaking at least as an adviser, and that she is expected on occasion to serve as a representative of the Board itself. . . .Olmeda's case is not close: she is not federally protected against political discrimination and the federal damage claims are barred by qualified immunity.").

Jordan v. Carter, 428 F.3d 67, 71, 72 (1st Cir. 2005) ("To answer the immunity question, we employ a three-part test that examines both the state of the relevant law and the nature of the alleged conduct. . . First, we consider whether plaintiffs' allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation. Second, we look at whether the right allegedly violated was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct. Finally, if the prior two questions are answered affirmatively, we determine 'whether a similarly situated reasonable official would have understood that the challenged action violated the constitutional right at issue.' . . If the final answer is 'no,' a defendant will be entitled to qualified immunity notwithstanding constitutional injury to the plaintiff. The Supreme Court has directed us, in the absence of special circumstances, to take up these questions in order, even though it might be easier at times to bypass the substantive constitutional question and conclude that, at a minimum, the law was not clearly established when the challenged conduct occurred.").

Gonzalez-Alvarez v. Rivero-Cubano, 426 F.3d 422, 429, 430 (1st Cir. 2005) (" In the opinion from which this appeal arises, the district court essentially skipped over the first inquiry in order to reach the subsequent queries, which it found decisive. The court reasoned that 'even assuming arguendo, that constitutional rights were violated, ... it was objecti[vely] reasonable for Pedro to believe that his actions did not violate these clearly established rights.' . . Although we recognize the logic of this approach, the court's election to forego deciding whether the cancellation of the milk quotas constituted an unconstitutional taking, and instead to dismiss the claims based on the failure to demonstrate that whatever rights may have been violated were 'clearly established,' runs contrary the analysis required by the Supreme Court. . . . The district court–by 'assuming arguendo ' that a constitutional violation had occurred–was able to dismiss the cases without deciding whether the cancellation of appellants' milk quotas did in fact constitute an unconstitutional taking of their property. The problem with this methodology is that the law will be no clearer when future similarly situated plaintiffs bring the same claim. This unending state of ambiguity, which potentially allows the bad man (in this context, a government official) to walk the line time and time again, is precisely what the Supreme Court instructs us to avoid. Thus, we must now consider whether appellants' allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation. . . In this case, the essential facts are undisputed, and we have no difficulty in concluding that the cancellation of appellants' milk production quota did not constitute a taking for which they would be entitled to compensation.").

Riverdale Mills Corp. v. Pimpare, 392 F.3d 55, 60-63 & n.6, 65 (1st Cir. 2004) ("As most recently explained by Justice Breyer in his concurring opinion in Brosseau v. Haugen, the test laid out in Saucier has two basic parts: 'Saucier requires lower courts to decide (1) the constitutional question prior to deciding (2) the qualified immunity question.' . . This Circuit has usually explained qualified immunity as a three-stage test by subdividing Saucier's second stage into two distinct questions. [footnote omitte] . . . The three-part test asks first: 'Taken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, do the facts alleged show the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right?'. . . As to the second prong, we have asked 'whether the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation' such that a reasonable officer would 'be on notice that [his] conduct [was] unlawful.'. . On the third prong, we ask whether a 'reasonable officer, similarly situated, would understand that the challenged conduct violated' the clearly established right at issue. . . It is not always evident at the time an official takes an action that a clearly established right is involved. For example, the factual situation might be ambiguous or the application of the legal standard to the precise facts at issue might be difficult; in either case the officer's actions may be objectively reasonable and she may be entitled to qualified immunity. . . In this last stage we consider any material facts as long as they are undisputed. . . The Supreme Court has stated that courts should begin with the first prong, that is, whether the facts as seen in the light most favorable to the injured party show that the officers' conduct violated a constitutional right. . . This first step is meant to aid in the 'law's elaboration from case to case.'. . The issue of how specific the first prong is meant to be is an issue that has troubled courts for some time. . . The level of specificity depends on the stage of the proceedings at which a qualified immunity defense is brought. A qualified immunity defense can, of course, be brought as a Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) motion for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. In such a case the entire qualified immunity analysis, including the first prong, must be based only on the facts stated in the complaint itself. . . At the 12(b)(6) stage, the question on the first prong is whether, using all of the well-pleaded facts stated in the complaint and viewing them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the plaintiff has stated a claim for a violation of some constitutional right. The first prong inquiry at this 12(b)(6) stage is unlikely to be very specific, given that federal civil practice is based on notice pleading, where great specificity is not required,. . . and that there is no heightened pleading requirement for civil rights cases. . . .Where, as here, qualified immunity is brought at the summary judgment stage, the inquiry on the first prong is somewhat different. The language in Saucier is ambiguous on this point; the case refers both to 'the facts alleged' and to the 'parties' submissions.' . . But subsequent Supreme Court cases have clarified, implicitly if not explicitly, that courts assessing the first prong at summary judgment should look beyond the complaint to the broader summary judgment record. . . The first prong inquiry will usually gain specificity at this summary judgment stage because of the ability to determine then whether plaintiff's claim survives in light of all the uncontested facts and any contested facts looked at in the plaintiff's favor, rather than just the allegations that appear on the face of the complaint. We emphasize that the rule stating that the first prong must be performed before the rest of the qualified immunity analysis is not completely inflexible. The purpose of starting with the first prong is to aid in law elaboration. Saucier itself suggests that this law elaboration function will be well served only in 'appropriate cases,' . . . and we have previously noted that in some cases, such as where the claim depends on a 'kaleidoscope of facts not yet fully developed,' the law elaboration function is not well served and thus the Saucier rule may not strictly apply. . . . Indeed, three Supreme Court justices expressed concern in a recent concurrence that a rigid application of the Saucier rule–that the first prong must be decided before the rest of the qualified immunity inquiry–was unwise because of its tendency to lead to wasted judicial resources and to constitutional decisions that were insulated from judicial review. These justices thus asked that the rule be reconsidered. [citing Brosseau] However, the Saucier rule has not been overruled by the Supreme Court. Nonetheless, it is clear that when performing the first prong of the analysis, it is generally inadequate to state a very generalized proposition such as whether it is a constitutional violation for enforcement officers to perform an unreasonable search. . . Such an inquiry does nothing to further elaborate the law. In this case, Granz and Pimpare have raised the qualified immunity defense on summary judgment and not as a 12(b)(6) motion. We take it as undisputed at this stage that the agents lacked a warrant and that they exceeded the scope of Knott's consent. . . These issues, however, go only to the 'reasonableness' of any Fourth Amendment 'search.' The threshold issue is whether there was a 'search' at all for Fourth Amendment purposes. . . .We hold that based on the summary judgment record and using the normal summary judgment standard, Riverdale's Fourth Amendment rights were not violated and the agents are entitled to qualified immunity on the first prong. We thus need not reach the other two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis; we address the second prong merely as an alternative ground for decision, should we be wrong on the first prong.").

Bellville v. Town of Northboro, 375 F.3d 25, 30(1st Cir. 2004) ("Normally, we endeavor to avoid deciding constitutional issues and attempt to decide cases on the narrowest grounds possible. That approach is not available here. In evaluating a claim of qualified immunity, the Supreme Court has told us that we must evaluate whether there was a constitutional violation before we address the other elements of a qualified immunity defense." Court found no constitutional violation where civilians were used in search to assist in identification of stolen property).

Dirrane v. Brookline Police Dept., 315 F.3d 65, 69-71(1st Cir. 2002) ("In a decision issued after the district court ruled, the Supreme Court has instructed us to start not with the immunity issue but with the question whether the facts as alleged make out a violation of the First Amendment. [citing Saucier v. Katz] This makes sense where the issue is whether some abstract right exists; otherwise the 'rights' issue may never be resolved. . . But it is an uncomfortable exercise where, as here, the answer whether there was a violation may depend on a kaleidoscope of facts not yet fully developed. It may be that Saucier was not strictly intended to cover the latter case. . . . Nevertheless, assuming arguendo that Saucier applies, we agree with Dirrane that a colorable constitutional claim would be made out if everything asserted by Dirrane in his very lengthy complaint were established as true and–perhaps more importantly–defendants had no other facts with which to justify their actions. . . . In sum, the allegations have the structure of a classic cover-up in which the whistleblower suffered an adverse change in employment 'because' of his speech on a public issue. . . . However, on qualified immunity, the outcome is different. . . . Here, as is common where there is a lack of precedent, this is not a case in which a reasonable officer must have known that he was acting unconstitutionally.").

Duriex-Gauthier v. Lopez-Nieves, 274 F.3d 4, 9 (1st Cir. 2001) ("The Supreme Court has . . .noted the importance of providing certainty as to what are the clearly established rules of primary conduct for government officials. . . Rulings on qualified immunity grounds avoid reaching the issue of whether there is a violation at all. For these reasons, the Court has expressed that 'the better approach to resolving cases in which the defense of qualified immunity is raised is to determine first whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right at all.'").

Starlight Sugar, Inc. v. Soto, 253 F.3d 137, 141 (1st Cir. 2001) ("This Court has identified a three-step process for evaluating qualified immunity claims: (1) whether the claimant has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right; (2) whether the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged action or inaction; and (3) if both of these questions are answered in the affirmative, whether an objectively reasonable official would have believed that the action taken violated that clearly established constitutional right.").

Gardner v. Vespia, 252 F.3d 500, 502 (1st Cir. 2001) ("A cause of action brought under § 1983. . . . reverses the normal order of judicial analysis and requires that we consider the constitutional question first. . . .").

Seekamp v. Michaud, 109 F.3d 802, 805 n.4 (1st Cir. 1997) ("We note that a great many § 1983 claims are resolved under the doctrine of qualified immunity, see, e.g., Hegarty v. Somerset County, 53 F.3d 1367, 1379, 1381 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, __ U.S. __, 116 S.Ct. 675, 133 L.Ed.2d 524 (1995), without considering their constitutional merit. Our most recent decision involving an alleged seizure by roadblock, Horta v. Sullivan, 4 F.3d 2, 15 (1st Cir.1993) (declining to consider whether partial roadblock constituted a seizure), was such a case. With that constitutional issue squarely presented in the case now before us, however, we take the occasion to discuss the merits in some detail with a view to affording a modicum of concrete guidance not often warranted in our earlier cases.").

Aversa v. United States, 99 F.3d 1200, 1214-15 (1st Cir. 1996) ("Some courts have read this language [in Siegert] as requiring a resolution of the merits under current law before beginning the analysis of the law as it stood at the time of the alleged violation. . . But we think that these statements, read in context, simply mean that the plaintiff must assert a clearly established federal constitutional (or statutory) right, and not merely a state law tort claim. . . . This is not to say that currently applicable law cannot be considered in the course of, in addition to, or instead of determining the law in effect at the time of the alleged violation. . . . Or a court may look to current Supreme Court law to determine that, although the right may now exist, it was not clearly established before. . . A court may also bypass the qualified immunity analysis if it would be futile because current law forecloses the claim on the merits. . . We follow the latter course in this case . . . .").

Singer v. State of Maine, 49 F.3d 837, 844-45 (1st Cir. 1995) ("[T]he threshold question in our qualified immunity analysis is whether [plaintiff] has established that defendants violated her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.").

Watterson v. Page, 987 F.2d 1, 7 (1st Cir. 1993) ("[B]efore even reaching qualified immunity, a court of appeals must ascertain whether the appellants have asserted a violation of a constitutional right at all." citing Siegert).

Tardiff v. Knox County, 397 F.Supp.2d 115, 140, 141 (D.Me. 2005) ("Although it has been clearly established in the law for some time that a blanket policy of strip searching all misdemeanor detainees is unlawful, the constitutionality of a policy of strip searching detainees charged with non-violent, non-weapon, and non-drug felonies without reasonable suspicion has not been previously established in this Circuit. The fact that neither the Supreme Court nor the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit has specifically ruled on the constitutionality of blanket strip search policies for detainees charged with non-violent, non-weapon or non-drug felonies, inclines the Court to find that Sheriff Davey is entitled to the benefit of the doubt on this point. Although conduct could potentially violate clearly established law even if the allegedly unconstitutional conduct had not been the subject of a prior court case, . . . the right allegedly violated must be defined at an appropriate level of specificity before a court can conclude that it was clearly established. . . . The Department of Corrections Standards and the Attorney General's Rules permit strip searches of all felony detainees. Sheriff Davey's reliance on those standards and rules, led to the development and implementation of Knox County's policy authorizing strip searches of all felony detainees. While the Fourth Amendment rights of those individuals charged with felonies of a non-violent, non-weapon, and non-drug nature who were automatically strip searched were indeed violated, the Court concludes that those rights were not clearly established in the law during the relevant class period. The Court concludes that Sheriff Davey is, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity for the Knox County Jail Policy permitting the strip search of all persons charged with non-violent, non-weapon, and non-drug felonies without reasonable suspicion. . . . During the relevant class period, the Knox County Jail's practice of strip searching all new detainees charged with misdemeanors without reasonable suspicion, was clearly unconstitutional. . . Maintenance of the practice after the operative class date–November 19, 1996–insofar as it applied to misdemeanants, cannot be shielded by qualified immunity.") Doe v. Magnusson, No. Civ.04-130-B-W, 2005 WL 758454, at *2, 10-13 & n.9 (not reported) (D. Me. Mar. 21, 2005) ("The following discussion of the first inquiry apropos Doe's privacy claim illustrates the difficulty sometimes posed by requiring the court to ask and answer in the first instance if there is a claim for a constitutional violation before undertaking the qualified immunity 'clearly established' inquiry. It also demonstrates the wisdom of the approach dictated by Saucier v. Katz. . . as the lingering uncertainty about the question of whether such a right to privacy exists has been fostered by the inclination of courts to leapfrog the merits of the underlying claim by uses of 'even if,' 'assuming arguendo,' or 'whether or not.'. . . Based on the discussion of a right to non-disclosure of private medical information relied upon by the First Circuit in Borucki, and the reasoning of the Seventh Circuit in Pesce v. J. Sterling Morton High School, the Eleventh Circuit's Harris v. Thigpen, the Second Circuit's Doe v. City of New York, and the Third Circuit's Doe v. Delie, I conclude that there is a Fourteenth Amendment right to privacy that protects private medical information from unjustified disclosure by governmental actors. . . . Accordingly, Doe's complaint states a claim for a violation of his constitutional right not to have his HIV/AIDS status disclosed to others. . . . The discussion above demonstrates quite pointedly that the question of whether or not inmates have a Fourteenth Amendment right to privacy that protects private medical information from disclosure (not justified by legitimate penological reasons) by governmental actors was not clearly established by June 3, 2003. Certainly neither the Supreme Court nor the First Circuit had decisions that established this proposition. . . . Thus, it is with confidence that I conclude that, with respect to an inmate's Fourteenth Amendment right not to have private medical information disclosed to other inmates by governmental actors who were not proceeding on the basis of a legitimate penological reason, such a right was not clearly established by June 3, 2003. . . . While I have attempted 'to set forth principles which [might] become the basis for a holding that a right is clearly established,' . . . given the unsettled nature of the question, even if I am right on the first prong inquiry, it may be sometime before the clearly established question vis -a-vis this right can be answered in the affirmative with confidence.").

SECOND CIRCUIT

Moore v. Andreno, 505 F.3d 203, 215, 216 (2d Cir. 2007)("In concluding that, for purposes of qualified immunity, the Deputies could have reasonably believed that Sines had authority to consent to the search, we note that this analysis is distinct from that in Part I.A., in which we concluded that, for purposes of determining whether there had been a constitutional violation, common understanding could not have supported a belief that Sines had authority to consent. The latter concerns the question of whether the search itself was unreasonable, in violation of the Fourth Amendment (i.e., the first part of the qualified immunity test), based on common social understanding as clarified in Randolph; the former concerns the question of whether the officers' belief in the lawfulness of their conduct was unreasonable, thereby precluding a qualified immunity defense (i.e., the second part of the qualified immunity test), based on the state of the existing law, which of course pre-dated Randolph. . . . Thus, in this case, we conclude that the Deputies acted unreasonably when they searched the study because 'no ... authority [to consent] could sensibly be suspected.' Randolph, 547 U.S. at 112. However, we also conclude that because the law was unclear, the Deputies could reasonably have believed that Sines had access and a substantial interest and therefore had authority to consent to the search. . . . Because we believe that, at the time of the search, the law was not clearly established as to whether Sines had authority to consent to a search of the study, Deputies Andreno and Palmer are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Walczyk v. Rio, 496 F.3d 139, 154 (2d Cir. 2007) ("When a defendant officer charged with violations of federal constitutional rights invokes qualified immunity to support a motion for summary judgment, a court must first consider a threshold question: Do the facts, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, show that the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right? If the answer to this question is no, 'there is no necessity for further inquiries concerning qualified immunity .'. . Only if the answer to the first question is yes must a court proceed to the inquiry for qualified immunity : Was the right at issue clearly established at the time of the defendant's actions? . . . . If the right at issue was not clearly established by then existing precedent, then qualified immunity shields the defendant. Even if the right at issue was clearly established in certain respects, however, an officer is still entitled to qualified immunity if 'officers of reasonable competence could disagree' on the legality of the action at issue in its particular factual context.")

Walczyk v. Rio, 496 F.3d 139, 165-71 (2d Cir. 2007) (Sotomayor, J., concurring) ("I agree fully with the outcome of this case, and I concur with most of the majority's reasoning; however, I disagree with its description of the qualified immunity standard we should apply and its related discussion of 'arguable probable cause.' A long line of decisions of this Court features the same doctrinal misstatements, and it is time we stopped repeating uncritically this particular language and gave it the attention it deserves. . . . .The portion of the majority's qualified immunity discussion that I find objectionable reads as follows: 'If the right at issue was not clearly established by then existing precedent, then qualified immunity shields the defendant. Even if the right at issue was clearly established in certain respects, however, an officer is still entitled to qualified immunity if 'officers of reasonable competence could disagree' on the legality of the action at issue in its particular factual context.' . . . These two sentences and the citation to Malley reveal the two flaws I see in this circuit's approach to qualified immunity . First, our approach splits the single question of whether a right is 'clearly established' into two distinct steps, contrary to Supreme Court precedent. Second, we demand a consensus among all hypothetical reasonable officers that the challenged conduct was unconstitutional, rather than positing an objective standard of reasonableness to which defendant officers should be held, as the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed us to do. I address both of these points in turn.The Supreme Court has made clear that '[t]he relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his [or her] conduct was unlawful in the situation he [or she] confronted.' Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202 (2001). That is, whether a right is clearly established is the same question as whether a reasonable officer would have known that the conduct in question was unlawful. This Court's case law, in contrast, bifurcates the 'clearly established' inquiry into two steps. . . . By splitting the 'relevant, dispositive inquiry' in two, we erect an additional hurdle to civil rights claims against public officials that has no basis in Supreme Court precedent. . . . Contrary to what our case law might suggest, the Supreme Court does not follow this 'clearly established' inquiry with a second, ad hoc inquiry into the reasonableness of the officer's conduct. Once we determine whether the right at issue was clearly established for the particular context that the officer faced, the qualified immunity inquiry is complete. . . . This Court has used the term 'arguable probable cause' to describe the standard for finding that a defendant officer is entitled to qualified immunity for his or her reasonable but mistaken determination that probable cause existed in a particular context. . . . We have also stated that 'arguable probable cause' falls under the objective reasonableness determination of our qualified immunity test. . . Yet reasonableness–and therefore the existence of 'arguable probable cause'–are considerations that properly fall within the clearly established inquiry as the Supreme Court has described it. . . . It is not surprising, then, that 'arguable probable cause' finds no mention in any Supreme Court opinion; the need for a separate term to describe this concept arises only once we have improperly splintered the 'clearly established' inquiry. Because I believe 'arguable probable cause' is both imprecise and an outgrowth of the first flaw in our qualified immunity analysis, I do not agree with the majority's use of the term. . . . I recognize that the distinction I am drawing is a fine one, but I believe it has real consequences. Our approach does not simply divide into two steps what the Supreme Court treats singly, asking first, whether the right is clearly established as a general proposition, and second, whether the application of the general right to the facts of this case is something a reasonable officer could be expected to anticipate. Instead, we permit courts to decide that official conduct was 'reasonable' even after finding that it violated clearly established law in the particularized sense. By introducing reasonableness as a separate step, we give defendants a second bite at the immunity apple, thereby thwarting a careful balance that the Supreme Court has struck 'between the interests in vindication of citizens' constitutional rights and in public officials' effective performance of their duties.' . . . My second objection to the majority's formulation of the qualified immunity standard is that it treats objective reasonableness as turning on whether 'officers of reasonable competence could disagree.' . . This language, which our cases frequently recite, . . . derives from the Supreme Court's 1986 decision in Malley, 475 U.S. at 341. Whether reasonably competent officers could disagree about the lawfulness of the conduct at issue, however, is not the same question the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed us to consider: whether 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his [or her] conduct was unlawful in the situation he [or she] confronted.'. . . As with our bifurcation of the 'clearly established' inquiry, our requirement of consensus among all reasonable officers departs from Supreme Court dictates and unjustifiably raises the bar to liability for violations of constitutional rights. . . . Asking whether 'officers of reasonable competence could disagree' shifts this inquiry subtly but significantly. Instead of asking whether the defendant's conduct was beyond the threshold of permissible error, as the reasonable officer standard does, this inquiry affords a defendant immunity unless a court is confident that a range of hypothetical reasonably competent officers could not disagree as to whether the defendant's conduct was lawful. . . . Our Court . . .has adopted an unjustifiably stringent standard in the qualified immunity context by prohibiting liability for constitutional violations where a court believes that one reasonably competent officer would find the conduct at issue lawful, even if the overwhelming majority would not. . . .Finally, I note that although we repeat Malley's 'officers of reasonable competence' test with regularity, and it appears frequently in the decisions of other federal courts of appeals, . . .it has not appeared a second time in any majority opinion of the Supreme Court. It seems curious that we would continue to rest our qualified immunity standard on language the Supreme Court has carefully eschewed for over twenty years since Malley was decided. In sum, the Supreme Court has struck a careful balance between the vindication of constitutional rights and government officials' ability to exercise discretion in the performance of their duties. Our case law, in subtle but important ways, has altered this balance in favor of defendants by adding another analytic step to the qualified immunity analysis and equating objective reasonableness with unanimity among 'officers of reasonable competence.' In the vast majority of cases, including this one, the particular phrasing of the standard will not alter the outcome of the qualified immunity analysis. There is no doubt in this case that a reasonable officer would believe that the arrest of Thomas Walcyzk, as well as the search of his home and the seizure of firearms found there, were lawful. Yet the effect in future cases may not always be so benign. What is more, the majority's framework introduces unnecessary complications into an already complicated qualified immunity analysis. It is time to eliminate these complications and reconcile our qualified immunity analysis with the Supreme Court's most recent, authoritative jurisprudence.")

Zieper v. Metzinger, 474 F.3d 60, 68-71 (2d Cir. 2007) ("At the time of defendants' actions, it was well-established that the defendants could ' Aexhort[ ]" private entities' to remove speech so long as they did not engage in 'any threat, coercion, or intimidation' when doing so. . . Thus, it was clearly lawful for defendants to request that plaintiffs remove from the internet a video which they may have believed posed a danger to the public safety. . . However, in making this request, the defendants were forced to walk a difficult line: They could lawfully explain why the government was concerned about the video and request its removal, so long as none of their statements or actions might reasonably be interpreted as coercive. In walking this line, much of what the defendants here did was unobjectionable: They were free to contact both plaintiffs, to explain that the government was concerned about the video's effect on the general public, and to request that plaintiffs remove it from the internet. However, as we held above, a reasonable juror could conclude that some of the defendants' actions here did cross the sometimes fine line between an 'attempt[ ] to convince and [an] attempt[ ] to coerce.' . . Notwithstanding our conclusion that a reasonable juror could find a First Amendment violation, under our case law, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity if it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer in their position that their conduct was unlawful. . . Here, our pre-existing law would not have made apparent to a reasonable officer that defendants' actions crossed the line between an 'attempt[ ] to convince and [an] attempt[ ] to coerce' because the cases in which we have held that individuals' First Amendment rights were violated involved conduct more likely to be perceived as threatening than that here. . . . [A]s a result of our holding that a reasonable juror could conclude that the defendants' actions violated the First Amendment, officials who are in a similar situation in the future will be on notice that they must be especially careful to make sure that the totality of their actions do not convey a threat even when their words do not.").

Sira v. Morton, 380 F.3d 57, 81, 82 (2d Cir. 2004) ("[W]e conclude that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Sira's sufficiency challenge. As this court recently observed, neither this circuit nor the Supreme Court has clearly defined standards for determining what constitutes 'some evidence' in the context of prison disciplinary hearings; rather, decisions have addressed the problem piecemeal, focusing on the discrete problems raised by the facts of particular cases. . .At the time of Sira's disciplinary proceedings, the law of this circuit recognized a due process obligation to conduct some assessment of informant credibility to support prison discipline,. . . but there was an ambiguity– which persisted at least until this court's decision in Taylor v. Rodriguez, 238 F.3d at 192-93, and possibly thereafter, see Gaston v. Coughlin, 249 F.3d at 163–as to whether a hearing officer was required to conduct an independent assessment or whether he could rely on the opinion of another person. We have attempted to clarify that point today by reiterating *Taylor'*s recognition that due process requires an independent assessment of the confidential informant's credibility. Further, no prior case appears to have addressed the issue whether an independent assessment of informant credibility is necessarily sufficient to establish the reliability of all confidential disclosures, including third-party hearsay. Indeed, in cases where confidential information was found to constitute some reliable evidence, our decisions did not specifically discuss whether the evidence was based on the informant's direct knowledge or on hearsay. . . We today hold that the reliability of evidence is always properly assessed by reference to the totality of the circumstances and that an informant's record for reliability cannot, by itself, establish the reliability of bald conclusions or third-party hearsay. Because this principle was not clearly established before today, it was objectively reasonable for defendants to think that an independent assessment of the credibility of the confidential informants who proffered evidence against Sira, consistent with Russell v. Scully, 15 F.3d at 223, satisfied due process, and that Capt. Morton could, without further inquiry, rely on the third-party hearsay disclosed by those informants as some reliable evidence of Sira's participation in the Y2K strike. Accordingly, although we agree with the district court that the present record supports Sira's sufficiency challenge, we reverse the denial of qualified immunity on this part of Sira's due process claim and direct that, on remand, summary judgment be entered in favor of defendants on this point.").

Luna v. Pico, 356 F.3d 481, 491 (2d Cir. 2004) ("Taking these factors together, we hold that a reasonable hearing officer in defendants' position would not have clearly understood from the existing law that he was acting unlawfully. It was not clearly established at the time that the 'evidence' presented to Pico and Cave of Luna's guilt was insufficient to meet the requirements of due process. We are quick to emphasize, however, that our constitutional holding–that a prisoner's due process rights are violated when he is punished solely on the basis of a victim's hearsay accusation without any indication in the record as to why the victim should be credited–is 'clearly established' for the purpose of future qualified immunity cases involving similar fact patterns.").

Hanrahan v. Doling, 331 F.3d 93, 98 (2d Cir.2003) ("During the relevant events in this case, Doling ordered and Selsky affirmed that Hanrahan would serve up to ten years in SHU confinement. Because the reasonableness of their conduct is judged 'based upon the information the officers had when the conduct occurred'–the focus of the qualified immunity inquiry should be on the 120-month SHU sentence imposed on Hanrahan, not the 335 days which Hanrahan served in the SHU before his disciplinary sentence was overturned. . . . As we have already observed, the duration of actual confinement as well as the success of any subsequent administrative appeals may well be relevant in assessing whether sufficient evidence of a due process violation has been proffered in the first place, thus eliminating any need to proceed to the second step of the qualified immunity inquiry.").

Loria v. Gorman, 306 F.3d 1271, 1281 (2d Cir. 2002) ("We conduct a two part inquiry to determine if an official is entitled to qualified immunity. The threshold question is whether, '[t]aken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, ... the facts alleged show the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right.' . . . Addressing this initial question serves the important role of providing a clear standard against which officers can measure the legality of future conduct. . . . Thus, although we have under certain circumstances bypassed this first step and proceeded directly to the qualified immunity inquiry, that is the exception rather than the rule.").

Duamutef v. Hollins, 297 F.3d 108, 112, 114 (2d Cir. 2002) ("[B]efore applying the qualified immunity standard, we ask whether there was a constitutional violation in the first instance . . . .[N]o rational jury could find that defendants' decision to institute a temporary mail watch was not reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. There was no violation of plaintiff's First Amendment rights and, in any event, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Johnson v. Newburgh Enlarged School District, 239 F.3d 246, 251 (2d Cir. 2001) ("The Supreme Court has encouraged lower courts in appropriate circumstances 'to determine first whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right at all,' before reaching the question of whether the right was clearly established at the time. . . One such circumstance is where, as in the present case, the conduct complained of is of a type that generally occurs without significant warning and ceases in short order, and effectively precludes other forms of judicial review such as suits for declaratory or equitable relief, motions to suppress, or appeals from a conviction. . . In such instances, a § 1983 (or Bivens) damage action is likely to provide the only effective vehicle for aggrieved parties to adjudicate their claims, lest the asserted right never be clearly established and the allegedly unconstitutional conduct continue indefinitely. Accordingly, we first address whether the facts plaintiffs allege state a violation of the Constitution.").

Tellier v. Fields, 280 F.3d 69, 79 (2d Cir. 2000) ("[In Horne,]we noted that where the challenged conduct is particularly egregious, or where it is likely that the constitutional question would escape review over a lengthy period, or where deciding the constitutional issue plays a role in supporting the action taken by the court, avoidance would contravene the Supreme Court's guidance in Siegert and its progeny. . . Horne supports the need to address the constitutional question when a court finds that qualified immunity does not exist because the right asserted is clearly established. In that instance, (and in this case) the constitutional inquiry is inextricably bound to the resolution of whether qualified immunity exists. We also note that the challenged conduct here is particularly egregious. Accordingly, we find that it is proper for us to reach the merits of the constitutional question in this case.").

Lauro v. Charles, 219 F.3d 202, 203 (2d Cir. 2000) ("We hold that such a staged perp walk exacerbates the seizure of the arrestee unreasonably and therefore violates the Fourth Amendment. But we also hold that, because the Fourth Amendment right at issue was not clearly established until today's decision, the defendant police officer in this case is entitled to qualified immunity."). [Compare Caldarola v. County of Westchester, 343 F.3d 570, 575, 576 (2d Cir. 2003) (Plaintiff's privacy interest in not having his "perp walk" broadcast to the public was outweighed by County's legitimate government purposes).]

X-Men Security, Inc. v. Pataki, 196 F.3d 56, 65, 66 (2d Cir. 1999) ("Under the Harlow v. Fitzgerald standard, a government official sued in his individual capacity . . . is entitled to qualified immunity in any of three circumstances: (1) if the conduct attributed to him is not prohibited by federal law; or (2) where that conduct is so prohibited, if the plaintiff's right not to be subjected to such conduct by the defendant was not clearly established at the time of the conduct; or (3) if the defendant's action was 'objective[ly] legal[ly] reasonable[ ] ... in light of the legal rules that were clearly established at the time it was taken.' These three issues should be approached in sequence, for if the second is resolved favorably to the official, the third becomes moot; a favorable resolution of the first moots both the second and the third." [cites omitted]).

Wilkinson v. Russell, 182 F.3d 89, 106, 107 (2d Cir. 1999) ("At the outset of our discussion, we noted the Supreme Court's recent pronouncement that courts 'must' reach the constitutional merits before addressing an immunity defense. [citing Wilson] In this case, that guidance makes particularly good sense. Parents complaining that a faulty abuse investigation has prompted a state court to separate them from their children are often barred either by the Rooker-Feldman or Younger abstention doctrines from pursuing injunctive relief in a federal action. [citing cases] As a result, there have been few if any cases in which courts have considered a constitutional challenge to the adequacy of an abuse investigation unaccompanied by an immunity defense. Rather than separating the constitutional test from the immunity test in the cases that have arisen, courts have simply conflated the two and have routinely extended immunity even in instances of apparent serious abuse by case workers. . . As an unfortunate consequence, defendants have been immunized in connection with an ever expanding range of misconduct since so little has ever been deemed either clearly 'constitutional or non-constitutional.' By taking this opportunity to address constitutionality in advance of immunity, we have begun the difficult process of identifying particular conduct falling inside and outside of acceptable constitutional parameters. In this way, and at the Supreme Court's urging, we hope to 'promote[ ] clarity in the legal standards for official conduct.' . . Indeed, from this day forward, these and other case workers should understand that the decision to substantiate an allegation of child abuse on the basis of an investigation similar to but even slightly more flawed than this one will generate a real risk of legal sanction. . . . Although our finding on the constitutional merits is sufficient to resolve this case, we therefore consider it useful to undertake a qualified immunity style analysis demonstrating the extent to which there has been an absence of 'clearly established law' in this area. By analyzing a number of past cases, it becomes readily apparent that however marginal defendants' conduct was under the constitutional standard that we apply today, it was at least objectively reasonable for defendants to believe that their conduct was not inconsistent with plaintiffs' clearly established rights.").

Stuto v. Fleishman, 164 F.3d 820, 825 (2d Cir. 1999) ("While we have held that [the Siegert/Lewis approach] is non-mandatory, Medeiros v. O'Connell, 150 F.3d 164, 169 (2d Cir.1998), we acceded to it in Medeiros and affirmed on the merits of the constitutional claim in light of Lewis, although the district court's decision was based on qualified immunity. Therefore, we will examine whether Stuto has alleged a violation of due process.").

Medeiros v. O'Connell, 150 F.3d 164, 169 (2d Cir. 1998) ("The district court decided the case on what was then the most expeditious ground, qualified immunity. The Supreme Court's unambiguous preference is that we consider the merits first, and that is the ground on which we affirm.").

Mozzochi v. Borden, 959 F.2d 1174, 1179 (2d Cir. 1992) ("The first step is to determine whether the alleged conduct violates any constitutionally protected right at all. Conduct that does not violate any constitutional right certainly does not violate a constitutional right that was 'clearly established' at the time . . . .").

Baker v. Welch, No. 03Civ.2267(JSR)("JP), 2003 WL 22901051, at *19, *20 (S.D.N.Y. Dec.10, 2003) ("There is no Supreme Court or Second Circuit case on point, few parolee cases and essentially two different lines of prisoner cases. Whatever the scope of the constitutional right should be, this Court has no hesitation in holding that it was not 'clearly established' in September-October 2002 when Ms. Welch observed Mr. Baker's urine test. [footnote omitted] The Saucier and Ehrlich decisions, however, require this Court to go further and announce, in dicta, the proper scope of the constitutional right. . . Unfortunately, defendants claimed that there was no constitutional violation (based on Ms. Welch's version of the facts) and that, in any event, defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because the right was not clearly established; defendants' qualified immunity argument did not address whether there was a constitutional violation if the facts were as Mr. Baker alleged, i.e., a close viewing of his genitals by Ms. Welch during the urine test. The defendants thus offered the Court no help in this aspect of the decision. The cases make clear that the Court must balance the parolee's privacy interest with the State's legitimate equal employment and penological interests. [footnote omitted] The Court agrees that based on the current evidence before the Court, the balance should be struck to allow incidental and obscured viewing but prohibit regular and close viewing. Thus, a female parole officer is allowed to conduct a urine test of a male parolee and observe the test from a distance that does not provide a direct view of the male parolee's genitals. If 'close' observation of the urine test becomes necessary, it should be done by a person of the same sex as the parolee. Thus, under Mr. Baker's version of the facts, in the future, a female parole officer would not be entitled to qualified immunity if she conducted the urine test by standing next to the male parolee viewing his penis. Under Ms. Welch's and Mr. Rodriguez's version of the facts, the parole officer's conduct would not violate the parolee's privacy rights. The Court is confident that this balance will sufficiently protect the DOP's legitimate employment and penological interests. Indeed, the Court is essentially is adopting as the constitutional standard the very procedures that defendants Ms. Welch and Mr. Rodriguez describe as the current DOP policy. The Court reiterates that this is dicta and is based on the limited record before the Court (and defense counsel's failure to address this issue); other cases with a better developed record may lead to a different result. But following Ehrlich' s directive, this dicta will serve to put parole officers on notice that in the future, the law will be considered 'clearly established' in forbidding 'close' observation of a parolee's genitals during a urine test by a parole officer of the opposite sex.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

A.W. v. The Jersey City Public Schools, 486 F.3d 791, 794, 795, 803, 806 (3d Cir. 2007) (en banc) ("The first issue we confront is whether we should decide the availability of § 1983 relief for the alleged violations of A. W.'s statutory rights as part of the qualified immunity inquiry that is the basis for the appeal before us. We conclude we can, and should. We have jurisdiction to decide this question because it arises in the course of our analysis of defendants' request for qualified immunity. . . . Thus, the availability of § 1983 to remedy the alleged violations of A.W.'s statutory rights is part and parcel of our 'threshold' inquiry into defendants' qualified immunity defense. . . This inquiry parallels the constitutional or 'threshold' inquiry in the Saucier two-part qualified immunity analysis applied to constitutional claims. . . . In light of the recent, clear guidance provided by the Supreme Court in City of Rancho Palos Verdes v. Abrams, 544 U.S. 113 (2005), regarding the availability of § 1983 to remedy statutory violations, and the well-reasoned opinions of the Courts of Appeals for the Fourth and Tenth Circuits in Sellers v. School Board of Manassas, Virginia, 141 F.3d 524 (4th Cir.1998), and Padilla v. School District No. 1, 233 F.3d 1268, 1273 (10th Cir.2000), rejecting our holding in Matula, we now conclude that we should not continue to adhere to the principle we established in Matula. . . . [F]inding the reasoning of Sellers and *Padill*a convincing, we do not agree that ' 1415(l) shows that Congress intended the remedies in the IDEA to complement, rather than supplant, § 1983. Just like the savings clause in Rancho Palos Verdes, this provision merely evidences Congress' intent that 'the claims available under § 1983 prior to the enactment of the [Act] continue to be available after its enactment.' . . . [W]e [also] conclude that § 1983 is not available to provide a remedy for defendants' alleged violations of A.W.'s rights under Section 504. . . . A.W. has not alleged an actionable violation of his rights under the IDEA or Section 504. Accordingly, we will reverse the order of the District Court denying defendants' motion for qualified immunity and remand to the District Court for entry of judgment in favor of defendants.").

Miller v. State of New Jersey, No. 04-3502, 2005 WL 1811820, at *2 (3d Cir. Aug. 2, 2005) (not published) ("Miller's cause of action is premised on his belief that Prosecutors and Sheriff's Deputies from Union and Essex Counties conspired to restrict and, in doing so, to violate, what Appellant believes is his absolute right 'under the Second Amendment to possess a firearm [while] off-duty since it is reasonably related to his service in the state-sanctioned militia,' i.e., the Essex County Sheriff's Office. . . . While local law enforcement officers undoubtedly play a critical role in combating future acts of terrorism, the Essex County Sheriff's Office is clearly not a militia for purposes of satisfying the first prong of a qualified immunity analysis, i.e., a clearly established Constitutional right protected by the Second Amendment.").

Gibson v. Superintendent of New Jersey Dep't of Law and Public Safety-Division of State Police, 411 F.3d 427, (3d Cir. 2005)("Several circuits have recognized that police officers and other state actors may be liable under § 1983 for failing to disclose exculpatory information to the prosecutor. [citing cases] We agree. Although Brady places the ultimate duty of disclosure on the prosecutor, it would be anomalous to say that police officers are not liable when they affirmatively conceal material evidence from the prosecutor. In this case, Gibson alleges that the Troopers suppressed the extent of their impermissible law enforcement tactics, and had that information been available, he would have been able to impeach several witnesses and possibly could have halted the entire prosecution. We think that Gibson states an actionable § 1983 claim against the Troopers for interference with his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. However, we also realize that this duty on the part of the Troopers was not clearly established at the time of Gibson's prosecution in 1994. . . . Even in 2000, this Court was only able to assume that police officers 'have an affirmative duty to disclose exculpatory evidence to an accused if only by informing the prosecutor that the evidence exists .'[citing Smith v. Holtz, 210 F.3d 186, 197 n.14 (3d Cir.2000)]Because such a right was not clearly established in this Circuit at the time of Gibson's conviction, Troopers Pennypacker and Reilly are entitled to qualified immunity with regard to their failure to inform the prosecutor of Brady material.").

Wright v. City of Philadelphia, 409 F.3d 595, 600, 601 (3d Cir. 2005) ("There is some disagreement as to how Saucier should be interpreted. Specifically, the dispute is whether a court must determine the issue of whether there has been a constitutional violation before reaching the qualified immunity question, or whether that inquiry is the first part of a two-pronged test for qualified immunity. In some cases, we have interpreted Saucier to imply that the issue of qualified immunity is only relevant after a court has concluded that a constitutional violation has occurred. In that view, if there is no constitutional violation, there is no reason to reach the qualified immunity issue. . . In other cases, we have interpreted Saucier to mean that a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity unless a plaintiff can prove both that a constitutional right has been violated, and then that the constitutional right violated was clearly established. . .Under either interpretation, if no constitutional violation is found, a court need not address whether a reasonable officer would have known he or she was violating a clearly established right. As a practical matter, the outcome will be the same whether we conclude that the officers are immune from suit or instead, that the plaintiff has no cause of action. Our concurring colleague believes that Brosseau v. Haugen . . . conclusively resolves this dispute in favor of the first interpretation. We note that at least six of our sister Courts of Appeals would seem to disagree. [citing cases] Those Courts of Appeals considered Brosseau and yet still treated the constitutional violation as part of the qualified immunity test, as opposed to a separate inquiry like our concurring colleague recommends. . . Accordingly, at least two of those Courts of Appeals have specifically concluded that defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity upon a determination that no constitutional violation was committed. . . We believe that those Courts of Appeals acted reasonably in reading Brosseau as consistent with a two-step qualified immunity inquiry, with the first step being the 'constitutional issue' and the second being 'whether the right was clearly established.' This case, however, does not require us to decide between the two readings of Saucier because the constitutional violation was presented to us in the context of qualified immunity. Specifically, in the course of asserting their claim for qualified immunity, Heeney and O'Malley argue there was no constitutional violation. We recognize that a conclusion that no constitutional violation took place would also negate an essential element of the § 1983 claim, . . . but the constitutional violation is best addressed as an aspect of the qualified immunity analysis because that was the jurisdictional basis for this interlocutory appeal. . . .While we could construe the officers' arguments as challenging Wright's cause of action, we believe the proper way for us to review the constitutional violation here is through the qualified immunity denial. Accordingly, this opinion analyzes the threshold inquiry, whether the officers' conduct violated Wright's constitutional rights, as the first part of the qualified immunity analysis.")

Wright v. City of Philadelphia, 409 F.3d 595, 605, 606 (3d Cir. 2005) (Smith, J., concurring) ("The majority appears to attempt to avoid confusion by relabeling the second prong of the Saucier test. Whereas Brosseau refers to the second prong of the Saucier test as addressing the *'qualified immunity'* issue, the majority refers to that prong as addressing *'whether the right was clearly established.'* While I share the concern motivating this seemingly commonsensical change, I think it conceals the basic problem with the majority's approach. That is, the Supreme Court seems clearly to view the second prong of the Saucier test as the essential *'qualified immunity'* inquiry– not as part of a larger qualified immunity inquiry. . . We should do the same. Unfortunately, in my view the majority compounds its error in describing the nature of our inquiry by holding that the officers in this case were entitled to qualified immunity because there was no constitutional violation. . . To my knowledge, only one of our sister circuits has gone this far. [citing Riverdale Mills Corp. v. Pimpare, 392 F.3d 55, 65 (1st Cir.2004)] . . . By contrast, the Eleventh Circuit speaks neither of the qualified immunity inquiry as consisting of two steps, see Evans v. Stephens, ___ F.3d ___, No. 02-16424, 2005 WL 1076603, at *4 (11th Cir. May 9, 2005) (en banc), . . . nor holds that failure to establish a constitutional violation triggers qualified immunity.[citing Purcell v. Toombs County, 400 F.3d 1313, 1324 (11th Cir.2005)]. . . As the majority's terminology and holding seem to me inconsonant with Brosseau, I believe the Eleventh Circuit employs the better approach. Ultimately, the majority apparently feels compelled to hold that the officers have qualified immunity because *'that was the basis for this interlocutory appeal.'* In other words, the majority seems to believe that what arrived in a *'qualified immunity'* envelope cannot be returned in a *'failure to state a claim'* envelope. I disagree with the majority for two reasons. First, the purpose of the qualified immunity doctrine is to *'permit insubstantial lawsuits to be quickly terminated,'*. . . i.e., to allow the *'dismissal of insubstantial lawsuits without trial.'* . . In other words, the essential reason we are permitted to exercise interlocutory jurisdiction when qualified immunity is denied by a district court is broadly to determine whether dismissal is appropriate. *'Unless the plaintiff's allegations state a claim of violation of clearly established law,'* the Court has explained, a defendant pleading qualified immunity is entitled to dismissal before the commencement of discovery.' . . Thus, '[a] court evaluating a claim of qualified immunity must first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right at all, and if so, proceed to determine whether that right was clearly established at the time of the violation.'. . In my view, where no such claim is stated, dismissal on that ground–rather than on the ground that the officials are immune–is appropriate. Second, the majority's reasoning contravenes the purpose of the two-step Saucier inquiry. As discussed above, Saucier's *'order of battle'* is designed to force courts to establish precedent on the contours of constitutional rights to provide guidance for law enforcement officers. . . Applying this approach, a court may find that an official's alleged conduct was constitutionally permissible or that the conduct, while constitutionally impermissible, did not cross a *'clearly established'* line. Referring to both of these scenarios as establishing *'qualified immunity'* sends a confusing signal to law enforcement officials concerning what actions they may or may not take. The majority's reasoning thus ironically has the potential to frustrate the development of *'clearly established'* law, the very raison d'etre for Saucier's two-step test. In view of the foregoing, I believe the proper analytical course in this case would be first to consider whether the defendants violated the Constitution. Because we answer that question in the negative, Ms. Wright lacks a cause of action. That determination should end our inquiry, and we should decline to reach the *'*second, qualified immunity question.'").

Neuburger v. Thompson, 124 F. App'x 703, 2005 WL 19275, at *2, *3 (3d Cir. Jan. 5, 2005) ("We recognize the Supreme Court indicated in Hope . . . that in some cases 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though 'the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful.' ' . . Our case law establishes the general rule that a trooper violates an individual's Fourth Amendment rights by employing deadly force when that individual does not pose an immediate threat to the safety of the trooper or others. . . But here there is no persuasive argument that it was objectively unreasonable to respond with deadly force when Ms. Neuburger, who had refused to follow directions to put down her weapon, pointed a handgun at an officer. . . . Mr. Neuburger correctly points out that an overwhelming show of force that shocks the conscience may also amount to a constitutional deprivation under the state-created danger doctrine. . . Mr. Neuburger argues that Smith and other cases decided under the state-created danger doctrine, when read in connection with the Fourth Amendment's requirement that an officer's use of force be objectively reasonable, reveal that a situation in which deadly force becomes necessary because of the troopers' own actions can make out a constitutional violation. In making this argument, Mr. Neuburger is in effect attempting to blend the state-created danger doctrine with the analysis governing Fourth Amendment excessive force claims. Our Court has considered but not adopted this approach. Specifically, in Abraham v. Raso, 183 F.3d 279 (1999), we discussed decisions from other circuit courts offering that, in limited circumstances, an officer's acts creating the need for force may be important in evaluating the reasonableness of that officer's eventual use of force. . . But we left 'for another day' whether such an approach should be followed. . . Thus, Mr. Neuburger's assertions advocate a rationale that has not been accepted in our Circuit. As this is not the case to adopt that rationale, Mr. Neuburger's complaint does not allege the violation of a clearly established constitutional right, and therefore the troopers are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Sutton v. Rasheed, 323 F.3d 236, 250 n.27 (3d Cir. 2003) ("We believe that the Supreme Court directive in Wilson v. Layne is mandatory. Accordingly, the District Court can decide the issue of qualified immunity only after it has concluded that a cause of action has been stated. Therefore, we initiate our inquiry by examining whether plaintiffs have alleged a constitutional violation.").

Donahue v. Gavin, 280 F.3d 371, 378 (3d Cir. 2002) ("[T]he district court should only have considered the defendants' claim of immunity if Donahue first established that their conduct violated a clearly established statutory or constitutional right. . . . [P]ost-conviction incarceration is not a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment and, therefore, post-conviction incarceration cannot constitute a Fourth Amendment violation.").

Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 315 n.4 (3d Cir. 2001) ("Notwithstanding the fact that the Supreme Court has twice stated in mandatory, unqualified language that '[a] court evaluating a claim of qualified immunity must first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right at all ...'. . . , Judge Garth's dissent would prefer that we skip the first prong of qualified immunity analysis. . . This practice ignores the Supreme Court's express language and creates an exception based on the procedural posture of the case. While there may be pragmatic considerations favoring Judge Garth's qualification of the Supreme Court's unqualified language, the Court has not yet suggested any basis for departing from the rule articulated in Wilson.").

Wilson v. Russo, 212 F.3d 781, 786 (3d Cir. 2000) ("The qualified immunity defense requires that we engage in a two-step analysis. First, we must 'determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right at all.' [citing Conn] Only if he has should we 'proceed to determine whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.' Summary judgment is appropriate if no reasonable juror could conclude that Wilson's clearly established rights were violated. . . This does not mean that the jury determines the contours of the right. Rather, after making a legal determination about the existence of a right, and whether it is clearly established, we determine whether the facts on the record are such that a jury could conclude that the clearly established right was violated. . . As a methodological matter, we commonly work backwards: We arrange the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and then determine whether, given precedent, those 'facts,' if true, would constitute a deprivation of a right. And then, if necessary, we determine if the right is clearly established. In this case, since we conclude that Wilson has not adduced facts from which a jury could conclude that his constitutional rights were deprived at all, we need not engage in the second inquiry.")

Hedges v. Musco, 204 F.3d 109, 116 (3d Cir. 2000) ("Because '[a]n immunity determination, with nothing more, provides no clear standard, constitutional or nonconstitutional,'. . . and because we ultimately conclude that plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate a violation of the Fourth Amendment, we will address plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim on the merits.").

Torres v. McLaughlin, 163 F.3d 169, 172, 174 (3d Cir. 1998) ("When resolving issues of qualified immunity, we must first determine 'whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right,' [citing Lewis] which we generally cannot 'assume [ ], without deciding.' [citing Siegert] It is only after satisfying that inquiry that we should then 'ask whether the right allegedly implicated was clearly established at the time of events in question.'. . . [W]e conclude that post- conviction incarceration cannot be a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, and Torres's incarceration did not violate his Fourth Amendment rights. The central inquiry before us is the District Court's rejection of the officers' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. Because we have determined that Torres has not alleged a violation of the Fourth Amendment, the only constitutional provision pressed by Torres in this appeal, we need not reach the question of whether the officers have a qualified immunity.").

In re City of Philadelphia Litigation, 158 F.3d 711, 718, 719 (3d Cir. 1998) ("The City argues that because the court's seizure analysis was not required for its resolution of any of these [qualified immunity] issues, that analysis is dicta and therefore does not bind us under the law of the case doctrine. . . . It is . . . clear that the threshold determinations which inform a court's qualified immunity analysis are whether the plaintiff has asserted a violation of a constitutional right and whether that constitutional right was clearly established at the time the defendants allegedly violated that right. . . . [A] court's determination as to whether an official's conduct violated clearly established law must be premised upon an application of the facts as alleged by the plaintiff to the constitutional standards which were clearly established at the time of the official's conduct. . . . The prior panel therefore was required to determine whether the actions of the City officials, as alleged by Ms. Africa, violated her Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure as that right was understood at the time by reasonable City officials. Inherent in this inquiry is the determination of whether the City officials' alleged actions rise to the level of a Fourth Amendment violation; if the alleged actions are insufficient to amount to a Fourth Amendment violation, the City officials' actions could not possibly violate a clearly established constitutional right. Resolution of the question of whether there was a Fourth Amendment violation based upon the summary judgment record therefore was integral to the court's qualified immunity analysis. . . . [T]he prior panel could have disposed of the qualified immunity issue by holding that the defendants' alleged conduct did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . Accordingly, the panel's seizure determination was necessarily subsumed within the court's analysis of the qualified immunity issue and therefore does not constitute dicta to which the law of the case doctrine would not apply.").

In Re City of Philadelphia Litigation, 49 F.3d 945, 961 (3d Cir. 1995) ("Siegert . . . instructs that before a court addresses a claim of qualified immunity, it first should determine whether a plaintiff has alleged 'a violation of a constitutional right at all.'").

Brown v. Grabowski, 922 F.2d 1097, 1110 (3d Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S. Ct. 2827 (1991) (inquiry into whether asserted constitutional right to assistance in gaining access to the civil courts was clearly established at time, would seem to encompass inquiry into whether the right was recognized at all).

Gremo v. Karlin, 363 F.Supp.2d 771, 791 (E.D. Pa. 2005) ("As of November 13, 2001, the state of the law as to the state-created danger basis for constitutional liability, which is the only viable basis in the present case, did not give the individual defendants fair warning that their treatment of Gremo was unconstitutional. A reasonable state actor in the position of the individual defendants in the present case could have reasonably believed that his or her actions and omissions would not violate a constitutional right. Without a close analysis of D.R., Kneipp, and Morse, as set forth in this opinion, a reasonable state actor could have understood the collective holding to be that state actors would not be constitutionally liable under the facts of the present case. Their understanding could reasonably be gleaned from the facts in D.R., because the underlying incident in the present case occurred in a school, and the perpetrators who physically attacked Gremo were other students. As with the school defendants in D.R., the defendants in the present case were neither the attackers nor were they alleged to have witnessed the actual attack. D.R., which has not been overruled, held that the actions of the school defendants in that case did not result in a state-created danger and, therefore, the school defendants did not violate the plaintiffs' constitutional rights. Therefore, although individual defendants in the present case would be constitutionally liable for a state-created danger, they are entitled to qualified immunity. The motions to dismiss of the individual defendants are granted as to the federal claims for damages.").

Burke v. Mahanoy City, 40 F. Supp.2d 274, 283 n.11 (E.D. Pa. 1999) ("There seems to be some confusion as to whether the failure to assert an alleged deprivation of a constitutional right by a plaintiff means that the immunity question need not be reached, see Sameric Corp. of Delaware, Inc. v. City of Philadelphia, 142 F.3d 582, 590 n. 6 (3d Cir.1998), or merely that the official is entitled to qualified immunity. See City of Philadelphia Litig., 158 F.3d at 719. This court decides to follow the latter position as it is supported by a more recent Third Circuit opinion and by other sister circuits. See, e.g., Jones v. Collins, 132 F.3d 1048, 1052 (5th Cir.1998); Roe v. Sherry, 91 F.3d 1270, 1273-74 (9th Cir.1996).").

P.F. v. Mendres, 21 F. Supp.2d 476, 480 (D.N.J. 1998) ("Our analysis of the qualified immunity issue will follow the framework set forth by our Court of Appeals most recently in In re City of Phila. Litig. and Larsen v. Senate of the Commonw. of Pa. . . . . Those precedents instruct us to first ascertain whether the plaintiffs' Complaint has asserted a violation of a constitutional right at all. . . If plaintiffs have alleged a violation of a right which is protected by the Constitution in the general sense, we must next engage in a more particularized inquiry which asks if the defendant's conduct violated a constitutional right which was clearly established under the law as of the date the official acted. . . Necessarily subsumed in this inquiry is whether defendant's actions rose to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . If the Court determines that the defendant's conduct rises to the level of a violation of a clearly established right, we must next address whether the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the defendant . . . was nonetheless reasonable in his or her belief in the lawfulness of the conduct.").

Lattany v. Four Unknown U.S. Marshals, 845 F. Supp. 262, 266 (E.D. Pa. 1994) ("This more 'complete' examination of the plaintiff's constitutional claim is a practice which has been urged upon court's [sic] in this circuit even before the Siegert decision was announced ... The benefit of this procedure is that clearly meritless claims can be disposed of without the exhaustive search for precedents that the clearly-established analysis requires.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Parrish ex rel Lee v. Cleveland, 372 F.3d 294, 309, 310 (4th Cir. 2004) ("In conclusion, the evidence does not show that the officers here responded with deliberate indifference to the substantial risk of harm to Lee. Accordingly, the district court should have granted the officers' request for qualified immunity. Because Parrish fails the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry, we need not consider whether the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established under the specific circumstances of this case.").

Owens by and through Owens v. Lott, 372 F.3d 267, 273-76, 280 (4th Cir. 2004) ("Defendants appeal the district court's conclusion that plaintiffs' section 1983 action states a constitutional violation; defendants agree with the district court, of course, that the law was not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. Conversely, plaintiffs agree with the district court's determination that the search was constitutionally invalid, but challenge the court's conclusion that the law was not 'clearly established' at the time. We cannot completely accept either position because, in our opinion, the district court reached the correct result on both steps. Thus, we affirm the judgment of the district court. . . . Whether, and under what circumstances, an 'all persons' warrant is valid under the Fourth Amendment presents a novel question in this circuit. It also remains unanswered in the Supreme Court. . . . In sum, a handful of decisions suggest that an 'all persons' warrant is invalid per se under the Fourth Amendment, concluding it is either functionally the same as a general warrant, or it is not sufficiently particular to satisfy the requirements of the Fourth Amendment's Warrant Clause. . .By contrast, a majority of the courts have rejected the idea that an 'all persons' warrant could never under any circumstances be constitutional. . . . We agree that the majority view. . . correctly holds that an 'all persons' warrant can pass constitutional muster if the affidavit and information provided to the magistrate supply enough detailed information to establish probable cause to believe that all persons on the premises at the time of the search are involved in the criminal activity. In our view, the inclusion of 'all persons' language in a warrant presents probable cause issues rather than particularity problems. . . . In this case, we agree with the district court that Deputy Maldonado's affidavit did not supply sufficient information to establish probable cause that anyone who happened to be on the premises during the execution of the search warrant was involved in the sale of illegal drugs. . . . [but] We conclude that at the time of the search, the law was not sufficiently clear to strip defendants of qualified immunity.")

Mellen v. Bunting, 327 F.3d 355, 366, 368, 371, 372, 376 (4th Cir. 2003), cert. denied, 124 S. Ct. 1750 (2004) ("In construing the Establishment Clause, the Court has made clear that a state is prohibited from sponsoring prayer in its elementary and secondary schools. That said, the Court has never directly addressed whether the Establishment Clause forbids state-sponsored prayer at a public college or university. . . . General Bunting contends that we need not reach the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis because the Establishment Clause does not prohibit VMI's supper prayer. . . . Because of VMI's coercive atmosphere, the Establishment Clause precludes school officials from sponsoring an official prayer, even for mature adults. . . . Although the Establishment Clause plainly forbids public schools from sponsoring an official prayer for young children, the Supreme Court has never addressed the constitutionality of state-sponsored prayer in any university setting, much less in a military college. Indeed, some of our sister circuits have approved prayer at certain university functions. . . . In these circumstances, General Bunting could reasonably have believed that the supper prayer was constitutional, and we must affirm the district court's decision to award him qualified immunity.")

Leverette v. Bell, 247 F.3d 160, 166 n.4 (4th Cir. 2001) ("The applicable authorities dictate that we analyze the constitutionality of the challenged search before addressing whether the law was 'clearly established.' Thus, we cannot bypass, and thereby evade, a constitutional determination wherever the law is uncharted or ambiguous.").

Milstead v. Kibler, 243 F.3d 157, 162 (4th Cir. 2001) (noting that Wilson analytical approach Aapplies even when the non-constitutional issues in the analysis may resolve the immunity issue more easily than the underlying question of constitutional law.")

Jean v. Collins, 221 F.3d 656, 658-663 (4th Cir. 2000) (en banc) (on remand from Supreme Court) (per curiam) (Wilkinson, Chief Judge, with whom Judges Widener, Wilkins, Niemeyer, Williams, and Traxler join, concurring in the judgment) ("Wilson's directions are straightforward ones. . . . We must initially ask, therefore, if Jean has alleged a Fourteenth Amendment due process violation by Officers Collins and Shingleton. . . . The Supreme Court decisions establishing the Brady duty on the part of prosecutors do not address whether a police officer independently violates the Constitution by withholding from the prosecutor evidence acquired during the course of an investigation. . . . Recent cases, including some from this circuit, have pointed toward such a duty. . . . These cases have left unclear the exact nature of any duty that the law imposes on police with regard to exculpatory evidence. Several characteristics of this duty, however, seem evident. First, alleged failures to disclose do not implicate constitutional rights where no constitutional deprivation results therefrom. In this context, the constitutional deprivation must be defined as a deprivation of liberty without due process of law. . . . Second, to speak of the duty binding police officers as a Brady duty is simply incorrect. . . . To hold that the contours of the due process duty applicable to the police must be identical to those of the prosecutor's Brady duty would thus improperly mandate a one-size-fits-all regime. . . . Third, it would be impermissible to hold the police liable for due process violations under § 1983 where they have acted in good faith. . . . Indeed, negligent conduct cannot by definition establish the 'affirmative abuse of power' necessary to constitute a due process deprivation. . . . Because there was no threshold bad faith deprivation, the precise contours of any duty on the police in situations such as these is something we need not explore in detail. . . . As Jean has failed to allege a constitutional violation on the part of Collins and Shingleton, we would affirm the judgment.").

Jean v. Collins, 221 F.3d 656, 664-666 (4th Cir. 2000) (en banc) (on remand from Supreme Court) (per curiam) (Murnaghan, Circuit Judge, with whom Circuit Judges Michael, Motz, and King, and Senior Circuit Judge Hamilton join, dissenting) ("The concurrence does not seriously dispute that a Brady violation occurred. Instead, the dispute is whether Jean can redress this Brady violation in a § 1983 damages action against Officers Collins and Shingleton. . . . The challenge for the concurrence has been coming up with a way to say two seemingly contradictory things: that while Jean's Brady rights were clearly violated, entitling him to reversal of his conviction, Jean can not vindicate his Brady rights against Collins and Shingleton in a separate § 1983 damages action. . . . In order to seal the rupture its first en banc opinion created, the concurrence now holds that police officers who withhold exculpatory evidence from prosecutors are not independently liable for Brady violations, even under year 2000 jurisprudence. Thus, under the concurrence's new formulation, Brady can never furnish the doctrinal basis for a § 1983 action against police officers who fail to disclose exculpatory evidence.").

Chase v. Grant, 215 F.3d 1317 (Table), 2000 630953, at *3 (4th Cir. May 16, 2000) ("In this case. . .the district court neither identified the constitutional right or rights at issue, nor determined whether the right was clearly established. While the district court assumed that Chase alleged violations of the Eighth Amendment, the court did not analyze Chase's allegations to determine whether his version of the facts, if true, was sufficient to support his claim that his constitutional rights were violated. . . . We therefore remand for an analysis under Wilson v. Layne. If, after analyzing Chase's isolation confinement and excessive force claims under Layne, the district court concludes that there are genuine issues of material fact precluding summary judgment, the court shall recite in detail which facts are in dispute and shall explain the materiality of those disputes as to the qualified immunity defense.").

Randall v. United States, 30 F.3d 518, 522 (4th Cir. 1994) ("Once a defendant has pleaded qualified immunity from suit, the courts should, at the pleading stage, clearly determine whether the plaintiff had an existing constitutional right at the time the defendant acted.").

Gordon v. Kidd, 971 F.2d 1087, 1093 (4th Cir. 1992) ("In analyzing the appeal of a denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, it is 'necessary first to identify the specific constitutional right allegedly violated, then to inquire whether at the time of the alleged violation it was clearly established, then further to inquire whether a reasonable person in the official's position would have known that his conduct would violate that right.'").

Washington v. Buraker, 322 F.Supp.2d 692, 700, 701 (W.D. Va. 2004) ("Plaintiff recognizes that the concurrence in Jean II declined to extend an independent Brady obligation to police officers, but argues that this finding should be disregarded as dicta because the concurrence also found that the plaintiff in Jean II had only alleged that the police officers were negligent, and negligent conduct is not actionable under § 1983. . . This Court declines to disregard the legal findings of an en banc panel of Fourth Circuit judges. Based on the concurrence in Jean II, it appears that the Fourth Circuit does not currently recognize a cause of action under Brady against police officers. Accordingly, Washington has not alleged a constitutional violation in his third cause of action. Even if this Court were to disregard Jean II and find that a Brady claim could be brought against the officers in this case, Washington cannot establish that a reasonable officer in 1983 would have known his conduct in failing to disclose exculpatory information was unlawful.").

McCall v. Williams, 59 F. Supp.2d 556, 559, 560 (D.S.C. 1999) ("Although Plaintiff did not address this issue in his Motion for Reconsideration, this court is constrained to note that Wilson clarified the methodology of qualified immunity and thereby highlighted an error in this court's prior Order. In Wilson, the Supreme Court ruled that a district court must first evaluate the merits of a plaintiff's claim to determine if his constitutional rights were violated, before it proceeds to determine whether the right that was violated was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . This court did not take the first step in that analysis. Instead of addressing the merits of Plaintiff's case to determine whether his constitutional rights had been violated, this court assumed, for purposes of the qualified immunity analysis, that Plaintiff could prove that Lieutenant Williams had used excessive force in handcuffing his wrists too tightly. Thus, this court did not evaluate whether the force used was excessive. Although such a failure is now demonstrably legal error, it has no effect on the outcome of this case. Just as the Supreme Court found that the officials in Wilson had violated the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights, yet they were entitled to qualified immunity because the specific right had not been clearly established at the time of the incident, this court finds that Lieutenant Williams is entitled to qualified immunity, even though, taking the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Lieutenant Williams violated Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. Nevertheless, this court will engage in an analysis of the merits of Plaintiff's excessive force claim in order to comply with the Supreme Court's mandate. . . . Considering the severity of the crime, the threat Plaintiff posed to the officers, and the absence of any attempts on his part to resist or evade arrest, Lieutenant Williams used excessive force in handcuffing Plaintiff too tightly.").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Gates v. Texas Dept. Of Protective And Regulatory Services, 537 F.3d 404, 427, 438 (5th Cir. 2008) ("[T]he special needs doctrine will not support the decision to remain in the home in the absence of a court order, consent, or exigent circumstances. Therefore, the Gateses have alleged that the individual defendants violated the Fourth Amendment when the defendants did not leave the Gateses' house upon the request of Gary. Moving to the second step in the qualified immunity analysis, however, we note that the law in this area, particularly with respect to the special needs doctrine, was not clearly established in 2000, as described in the previous section. If the law was not clearly established at the time of the alleged constitutional violation, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity . . . . Affirmance is required because the law in this area was not clearly established, and the government's interest in stopping child abuse, along with the doctrine of qualified immunity , tips the balance in favor of TDPRS, Fort Bend, and all of the individual defendants. However, now that we have clearly established the law in this area, we expect that TDPRS, law enforcement agencies, and their agents and employees will abide by these constitutional rules and seek to involve the state courts, who act as neutral magistrates in these complicated matters, as early in the process as is practicable.").

Murray v. Earle, 405 F.3d 278, 293 (5th Cir. 2005) ("In this circuit, it was not well-established at the time of LaCresha's interrogation that an official's pre-trial interrogation of a suspect could subsequently expose that official to liability for violation of a suspect's Fifth Amendment rights at trial. We hold that, as in the analogous context of Fourth Amendment violations, an official who provides accurate information to a neutral intermediary, such as a trial judge, cannot 'cause' a subsequent Fifth Amendment violation arising out of the neutral intermediary's decision, even if a defendant can later demonstrate that his or her statement was made involuntarily while in custody. . . . LaCresha has not identified, and we have not found, any evidence in the record to indicate that the state judge who presided over her juvenile trial failed to hear (or was prevented from hearing) all of the relevant facts surrounding her interrogation before deciding to admit her confession into evidence. Armed with all those facts, that judge nevertheless concluded that LaCresha was not 'in custody' for purposes of Miranda or Texas law governing the interrogation of minors, and ruled that her statement to the police was voluntary and admissible. . . Like the state appellate court, we disagree with the trial court's ruling, yet we are constrained to hold that it constituted a superseding cause of LaCresha's injury, relieving the defendants of liability under § 1983. This holding pretermits our consideration whether she suffered a violation of a constitutional right that was clearly established at the time, and whether a reasonable official should have known that he was violating that right. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity for the defendants on LaCresha's Fifth Amendment claim.").

Flores v. City of Palacios, 381 F.3d 391, 395 n.3 (5th Cir. 2004) ("This two-tiered analysis can lead to a 'somewhat schizophrenic approach,' because we must apply current law to the first step and the law at the time of the incident to the second step, which may sometimes result in applying different tests to the two steps. Petta v. Rivera, 143 F.3d 895, 900 & n.4 (5th Cir.1998). Despite the confusion this approach creates, the Supreme Court has made clear that we are obliged to go through the first step of the analysis even if the second step shows that the law was not clearly established.").

Kipps v. Callier, 205 F.3d 203, 204 (5th Cir. 2000)(denial of rehearing en banc) ("An issue was raised with respect to the panel majority's qualified immunity analysis. Specifically, whether a court could assume arguendo the first prong of the analysis–the existence of a constitutionally protected right. . . Fifth Circuit case law appears to require a court to first answer whether an existing constitutional right has been asserted by a party. See, e.g., Evans v. Ball, 168 F.3d 856, 860 (5th Cir.1999) ("We may not pretermit that first prong but must decide whether Evans has alleged any constitutional violation before we may move to the inquiries under the second prong.") (citing Quives v. Campbell, 934 F.2d 668, 670 (5th Cir.1991)). Without resolving the question of whether Supreme Court and Fifth Circuit precedent require rigid application of Evans to all qualified immunity situations, we have little trouble finding that a constitutional interest in familial association does, in fact, exist and was clearly established at the time Kipps was fired.").

Macias v. Raul A. (Unknown), 23 F.3d 94, 98 (5th Cir. 1994) ("We have interpreted Siegert as first requiring the determination whether the plaintiff has stated a constitutional violation before reaching the qualified immunity issue.").

Brewer v. Wilkinson, 3 F.3d 816, 820 (5th Cir. 1993) ("To determine whether a defendant official is entitled to qualified immunity, a court must first ascertain whether the plaintiff has sufficiently asserted the violation of a constitutional right. . . If the plaintiff has asserted the violation of a constitutional right, the court must then determine whether that right had been clearly established so that a reasonable official in the defendant's situation would have understood that his conduct violated that right."), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1081 (1994).

Salas v. Carpenter, 980 F.2d 299, 304 (5th Cir. 1992) ("Until recently, uncertainty in this Circuit clouded whether or not we had jurisdiction in these interlocutory appeals to decide whether plaintiffs had stated a constitutional claim. . . . The Supreme Court in Siegert v. Gilley [cite omitted] has now made it clear that our first inquiry in an appeal asserting qualified immunity is whether a valid constitutional claim has been made.").

Enlow v. Tishomingo County, 962 F.2d 501, 508 & n.19 (5th Cir. 1992) (Noting that "[p]rior to Siegert, Courts generally examined the defendant's entitlement to the qualified immunity defense before examining the merits of the plaintiff's constitutional claim[,]" the court acknowledged that Siegert instructs the court to first "...decide if the plaintiff allege[s] a violation of a clearly established constitutional right[,].... [and] [o]nly if such an allegation is found, then the court must decide whether the public official's actions could reasonably have been thought consistent with the constitutional right.")

White v. Taylor, 959 F.2d 539, 545 n.4 (5th Cir. 1992) ("We have interpreted Siegert to require that we examine whether the plaintiff has stated a claim for a constitutional violation before reaching the issue of qualified immunity.")

Duckett v. City of Cedar Park, Texas, 950 F.2d 272, 278 (5th Cir. 1992) (noting the Court has "reassembled the analytical structure for reviewing an appeal of a denial of a motion for summary judgment asserting qualified immunity. . . [and has] instruct[ed] us that in a case where a defendant asserts such a qualified immunity defense, we should first resolve the constitutional question...that is, whether [plaintiff] has stated a claim for a violation of a right secured to him under the United States Constitution.").

Idoux v. Lamar University System, 828 F. Supp. 1252, 1256 (E.D.Tex. 1993) ("[P]rior to considering whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity, a district court must first address the threshold consideration of whether the plaintiff's complaint even states a violation of a constitutional right.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Nader v. Blackwell, 545 F.3d 459, 478 (6th Cir. 2008) (Moore, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("We hold that the voter-registration requirement contained in Ohio Rev.Code § 3505.06 is a severe restriction on political speech which cannot survive strict scrutiny. Similarly, we hold that the residency restriction in § 3503.06 severely limits political speech and is not justified by a sufficient state interest. Therefore, we hold that the voter-registration restriction and the residency restriction contained in § 3505.06 are both unconstitutional in violation of the First Amendment. Finally, we conclude that because these violations were not clearly established in 2004, Blackwell is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Leary v. Livingston County, 528 F.3d 438, 443-45 (6th Cir. 2008) ("While there is room for debate over whether the Due Process Clause grants pretrial detainees more protections than the Eighth Amendment does, . . .we need not resolve that debate here. Under either constitutional guarantee, an excessive-force claimant must show something more than de minimis force. . . . In the final analysis, this is an unusual case. It is not often that a constitutional tort claimant seeks relief for an alleged assault or battery but then says that the defendant's actions 'didn't hurt or nothing' and never says that he felt threatened by the officer's action. That is why we can agree with our colleague's framing of the issue–that the question is whether the actual or threatened force was de minimis, not just whether the injury was de minimis–but not with his conclusion. No doubt, the complaint in this case sufficed to move the action from the pleadings stage to discovery. But Leary's answers in discovery made it clear that McGuckin's actions, while rude and unprofessional, did not rise to the level of a cognizable constitutional claim.").

Leary v. Livingston County, 528 F.3d 438, 449-54 (6th Cir. 2008) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("Contrary to the majority's determination, McGuckin's actions were more than de minimis and constituted excessive force in violation of Plaintiff's Fourteenth Amendment rights. Therefore, McGuckin is not entitled to qualified immunity and the district court should be affirmed. . . . In evaluating excessive force claims made by pretrial detainees, this Court has adopted the due process rationale announced in Bell v. Wolfish. . . Thus, in the instant case, Plaintiff's excessive force claim is governed by the Fourteenth Amendment, which presents an inquiry distinct from the heightened showing required to establish a violation of the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause of the Eighth Amendment. . . . When viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, as the majority seems unwilling to do, it is clear that there is a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether McGuckin's actions were intended to punish Plaintiff because of the nature of the charge for which he was detained. The 'karate chop' at issue was preceded by McGuckin's initial harassment of Plaintiff wherein he called Plaintiff a 'sick bastard.' Moreover, the 'karate chop' served no legitimate penological objective inasmuch as Plaintiff was compliant with the orders given to him. . . . The majority, however, finds that Plaintiff cannot establish a constitutional violation. . . . The majority concludes that McGuckin's use of force was de minimis, and therefore not violative of the Fourteenth Amendment, because Plaintiff suffered no ascertainable physical injury. . . .Under the majority's reading of the caselaw outlining the boundaries of permissible uses of force in institutional settings, however, the government and its officials are permitted to engage in uses of force designed to psychologically harm a detainee so long as they do not impose some arbitrary quantum of physical pain. Such a rule is particularly disturbing given the current climate of detainee abuse as well as the evolving techniques of punishment and interrogation that will easily pass this test, while inflicting untold damage upon detainees and prisoners alike. Such a rule cannot stand. . . . [W]hen viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, . . . it cannot be said that McGuckin's flagrant assault on Plaintiff was de minimis or constitutionally insignificant. Plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to have his excessive force claim heard by a jury and to have the ability to make his case for damages, even if nominal.").

Revis v. Meldrum, 489 F.3d 273, 284, 286 (6th Cir. 2007) ("In short, no authority cited by Deputy Eaton has permitted levying an execution upon a residence by evicting the owner without postjudgment notice and the opportunity to be heard. This lack of authority permitting Eaton's actions, combined with both the longstanding due process requirements of notice and the opportunity to be heard before eviction and the Mathews balancing considerations outlined above, lead us to conclude that Eaton violated Revis's Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . . Revis's right to notice and an opportunity to be heard prior to eviction following the issuance of a writ of execution for his residence is the particular right at issue here. Just as Eaton has set forth no judicial authority that clearly justifies the eviction he effected, neither has Revis cited any federal authority that squarely defines due process requirements in the context of the postjudgment deprivation of one's residence. The lack of settled jurisprudence in this area indicates that the right at issue cannot be said to be 'so "clearly established" that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . Here, the advice from the County Attorney, combined with the language of the writs themselves, the newly promulgated Rule 69 of the Tennessee Rules of Civil Procedure, and the absence of clearly established federal caselaw governing the postjudgment deprivation of real property, all support the proposition that Deputy Eaton's actions were not such that a reasonable officer would have understood that what he was doing violated Revis's rights.").

Barnes v. Wright, 449 F.3d 709, 718-20 (6th Cir. 2006) ("We next turn to the question of whether Barnes's unlawful conduct bars his retaliation claim, even if his speech is constitutionally protected. McCurdy addressed the question of whether 'it was ... clearly established that the First Amendment prohibited an officer from effectuating an otherwise valid arrest if that officer was motivated by a desire to retaliate against the arrestee's assertion of First Amendment rights.'. . We responded affirmatively, explaining that '[w]e have held that adverse state action motivated at least in part as a response to the exercise of the plaintiff's constitutional rights presents an actionable claim of retaliation.'. . .The District of Columbia Circuit and the Tenth Circuit have also held that plaintiffs do not need to show a lack of probable cause in retaliatory-prosecution suits. . . . Other circuits, however, do require that plaintiffs prove that there was no probable cause for the underlying prosecution. [citing cases] The Supreme Court granted certiorari in Moore to resolve this split amongst the circuits, and while this case was pending on appeal the Court recently held that 'want of probable cause must be alleged and proven' by a plaintiff bringing a § 1983 or Bivens suit for retaliatory prosecution. . . . The concerns regarding the intervening actions of a prosecutor do not apply in this case, because the officers themselves initiated the grand jury proceedings against Barnes. However, in its analysis, Hartman appears to acknowledge that its rule sweeps broadly; the Court noted that causation in retaliatory-prosecution cases is 'usually more complex than it is in other retaliation cases.' Id. at 1704 (emphasis added). Regardless of the reasoning, it is clear that the Hartman rule modifies our holdings in McCurdy and Greene and applies in this case. As discussed above with regard to Barnes's malicious-prosecution claim, the defendants had probable cause to seek an indictment and to arrest Barnes on each of the criminal charges in this case. Barnes's First Amendment retaliation claim accordingly fails as a matter of law, and we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the officers on this issue.").

Miller v. Administrative Office of the Courts, 448 F.3d 887, 893-96 (6th Cir. 2006) ("In determining whether a law enforcement officer is shielded from civil liability due to qualified immunity, this court typically employs a two-step analysis: '(1) whether, considering the allegations in a light most favorable to the party injured, a constitutional right has been violated, and (2) whether that right was clearly established.'. . This court occasionally considers a third step in the qualified immunity analysis, in addition to the two steps listed above. . .When utilized, this third step requires an inquiry into 'whether the plaintiff has offered sufficient evidence to indicate that what the official allegedly did was objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established constitutional rights.'. . The Supreme Court since Saucier has continued to use the two-step approach to qualified immunity, but this court has noted that 'the three-step approach may in some cases increase the clarity of the proper analysis.'. . If, on the other hand, the case at issue 'is one of the many cases where, if the right is clearly established, the conduct at issue would also be objectively unreasonable,' then this court has 'collapse [d] the second and third prongs' in an effort to 'avoid duplicative analysis.'. . Throughout the analysis, the burden is on Miller to show that the individual defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The first step in analyzing this claim is to determine whether Miller had an interest that was protected by the Due Process Clause. In order to be entitled to a due process hearing prior to her termination, Miller must prove that 'she enjoyed a property interest in her position' as jury-pool manager. . . . In order to determine whether Miller had a property interest in her job, reference must be made to Kentucky law. . . . Miller therefore has to show that she was a tenured employee, as opposed to a nontenured, at-will employee. The district court found that a 'resolution of this difficult issue was unnecessary to the disposition' of the various motions for summary judgment. To the contrary, the district court should have resolved this preliminary issue before proceeding to the second step of the qualified immunity analysis. . . Although we could remand the case in order for the district court to determine this issue, we will proceed to make the determination ourselves in light of the completeness of the record and in the interests of judicial economy.").

Causey v. City of Bay City, 442 F.3d 524, 528 n.2 (6th Cir. 2006) ("As we recently explained in Estate of Carter, Panels of this court occasionally employ a three-step qualified immunity analysis, as opposed to the two-step analysis set forth here. As two recent opinions indicate, both the two-step approach and the three-step approach can be said to capture the holding of Saucier v. Katz . . . . The third step is 'whether the plaintiff offered sufficient evidence to indicate that what the official allegedly did was objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established constitutional rights.'. . In cases subsequent to *Saucie*r the Supreme Court has not formally broken up the two steps prescribed by Saucier into three steps, . . .but the three-step approach may in some cases increase the clarity of the proper analysis. In many factual contexts, however, including this one, the fact that a right is 'clearly established' sufficiently implies that its violation is objectively unreasonable.").

Silberstein v. City of Dayton, 440 F.3d 306, 319, 320 (6th Cir. 2006) ("While Pickering provides the basic framework for analyzing a §1983 First Amendment claim, this circuit employs a different test when a claim is brought by an employee who held a policymaking or confidential position. . . In the cases of Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347, 367-68 (1976), and Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507, 518 (1980), the Supreme Court recognized an exception to the general prohibition against adverse employment actions on the basis of political patronage where an employee occupies a policymaking position. In Rose v. Stephens, this court applied the Elrod/Branti policymaking exception to a § 1983 First Amendment claim, holding that when an employee is in a policymaking or confidential position and is terminated for speech related to his or her political or policy views, there is a presumption that the Pickering balance favors the government. Thus, if Silberstein occupied a policymaking position as Assistant Chief Examiner, and if her letter to the editor related to her policy views, then her free speech interests presumptively lose out to the city of Dayton's interests in efficiently running its government. . . . We conclude that Silberstein was a policymaking employee commenting upon matters of policy, and we therefore apply the Rose presumption to conclude that government interests outweigh Silberstein's First Amendment interests. The Board's alleged retaliatory action therefore does not constitute a constitutional violation. . . . Having found that no First Amendment violation occurred, we need not address the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis. We therefore reverse the district court's denial of the defendants' motion for summary judgment on Silberstein's First Amendment claim.").

Caudill v. Hollan, 431 F.3d 900, 909 n.5, 910 n.10 (6th Cir. 2005) ("We take this opportunity to remind district courts that they may not assume a constitutional violation or skip to qualified immunity, even when qualified immunity analysis seems conclusive. . . . Like Estate of Carter, this case is one of the many cases where, if the right is clearly established, the conduct at issue would also be objectively unreasonable. Thus, in order to avoid duplicative analysis, we choose to collapse the second and third prongs discussed in some of our cases into one prong in this case.")

Simasko v. County of St. Clair, 417 F.3d 559, 562 (6th Cir. 2005) ("Simasko was allegedly fired for refusing to support the campaign of his supervisor for a district court judgeship, and for refusing to try to curtail his brother's public support of his supervisor's opponent in the election. Because Simasko's job as an assistant county attorney qualified as a policymaking position subject to the Elrod/Branti exception, he could be fired for his political or policy views without violating the First Amendment. Accordingly, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Estate of Carter v. City of Detroit, 408 F.3d 305, 311 n.2 (6th Cir. 2005) ("Panels of this court occasionally employ a three-step qualified immunity analysis, as opposed to the two-step analysis set forth here. As two recent opinions indicate, both the two-step approach and the three-step approach can be said to capture the holding of Saucier . . . The third step is 'whether the plaintiff offered sufficient evidence to indicate that what the official allegedly did was objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established constitutional rights.'. . In cases subsequent to Saucier the Supreme Court has not formally broken up the two steps prescribed by Saucier into three steps, . . . but the three-step approach may in some cases increase the clarity of the proper analysis. In many factual contexts, however, including this one, the fact that a right is 'clearly established' sufficiently implies that its violation is objectively unreasonable.").

Adams v. City of Auburn Hills ("dams I), 336 F.3d 515, 520 (6th Cir. 2003) ("In this case, Officer Backstrom's firing at the automobile did not impair Adams's movement. Adams was not hit by Officer Backstrom's bullets and was able to leave the scene unharmed despite Backstrom's use of his firearm. Even though the tire of the Taurus was hit, it appears that the car still was operable and Adams reached his destination, his mother's house. Hence, Adams never was seized, and our holding that no seizure occurred makes the discussion of the reasonableness of Backstrom's conduct unnecessary. Because the Fourth Amendment is not implicated, Adams has not alleged a constitutional violation to support a § 1983 claim. Without an underlying constitutional violation, the question of whether Backstrom is entitled to qualified immunity is moot.").

Higgason v. Stephens, 288 F.3d 868, 876, 877 (6th Cir. 2002) ("The Court applies a three-part test when determining whether a government official is entitled to the affirmative defense of qualified immunity. . . The first inquiry is whether the Plaintiff has shown a violation of a constitutionally protected right; the second inquiry is whether that right was clearly established at the time such that a reasonable official would have understood that his behavior violated that right; and the third inquiry is 'whether the plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts, and supported the allegations by sufficient evidence, to indicate that what the official allegedly did was objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established rights.' . . . Here, when applying the three-part test to the facts of this case, Plaintiff's case is barred by the affirmative defense of qualified immunity at the inception inasmuch as Plaintiff has failed to show a violation of a constitutionally protected right. . . As noted, Plaintiff's due process allegation comes down to a claim he was indicted without probable cause. However, it has long been settled that 'the finding of an indictment, fair upon its face, by a properly constituted grand jury, conclusively determines the existence of probable cause for the purpose of holding the accused to answer." . . Therefore, because Plaintiff was indicted pursuant to a determination made by the grand jury, he has no basis for his constitutional claim.").

Klein v. Long, 275 F.3d 544, 552 (6th Cir. 2001) ("In sum, we conclude that Long and Rogers had probable cause to arrest Klein and that they therefore did not violate Klein's constitutional rights. We need not reach, then, the second part of the qualified immunity analysis delineated in Saucier– whether the constitutional right violated was clearly established. 'If no constitutional right would have been violated were the allegations established, there is no necessity for further inquiries concerning qualified immunity.").

Neague v. Cynkar, 258 F.3d 504, 508 (6th Cir. 2001) ("We now make explicit what this court in Kain implied: when there is no allegation of physical injury, the handcuffing of an individual incident to a lawful arrest [footnote omitted] is insufficient as a matter of law to state a claim of excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. The threshold inquiry in a qualified immunity inquiry is whether a plaintiff has stated a valid constitutional claim. . . Under the undisputed facts of this case, the answer to that inquiry is no. Accordingly, defendants Murphy and Cynkar are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Flagner v. Wilkinson, 241 F.3d 475, 482, 483 (6th Cir. 2001) ("[W]e believe that Flagner has presented sufficient evidence that application of the grooming regulation would violate his constitutional rights. . . . Based on our decision in Pollock which upheld an application of the challenged prison regulation, we conclude that Flagner's right to grow his beard and sidelocks in contravention of the Ohio prison grooming regulation at the time of his forced cutting was not 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'").

Seal v. Morgan, 229 F.3d 567, 581 (6th Cir. 2000) ("As an abstract matter, the right of public school students not to be expelled arbitrarily or irrationally has been clearly established since at least the Supreme Court's decision in Goss v. Lopez . . . which held that long-term suspensions and expulsions must comport with minimal standards of due process. More concretely, however, we do not believe that the contours of that right were sufficiently clear to put a reasonable school superintendent on notice in 1996 that a school disciplinary policy's lack of a conscious-possession requirement could produce irrational expulsions and thus violate the legal rights of students expelled under the policy. For this reason, we will reverse the judgment of the district court to the extent that it denied Superintendent Morgan's motion for summary judgment, and remand with instructions to enter summary judgment in his favor. For the future, however, we expect that our opinion today will clarify the contours of a student's right not to be expelled for truly unknowing or unconscious possession of a forbidden object.").

Farley v. Farley, Nos. 98-6114, 98-6115, 2000 WL 1033045, at *6, *7 (6th Cir. July 19, 2000) (not published) ("Since [defendants'] conduct occurred after they had an opportunity to deliberate and consider how to proceed in Ms. Farley's case, they have violated Ms. Farley's substantive due process rights if such conduct was 'deliberately indifferent' to her right to the immediate physical custody of her children. Such conduct would be conscience shocking, thus violating Ms. Farley's substantive due process rights. We are satisfied that the conduct outlined above, as set forth by the district court, is sufficient to show that Brock and Grissom were deliberately indifferent, based on the analysis this court applied in Claybrook. . . . At the time of the events giving rise to this suit, the standard for finding a substantive due process violation was whether a defendant 'engage[d] in arbitrary conduct intentionally designed to punish someone....' Lewellen v. Metropolitan Gov't, 34 F.3d 345, 351 (6th Cir.1994). . . . The Lewellen standard must be applied in determining the issue of qualified immunity. . . . On the facts before us, a genuine issue exists as to whether defendants' conduct constituted a substantive due process violation under Lewellen.").

Jackson v. Leighton, 168 F.3d 903, 909 (6th Cir. 1999) ("Before examining the reasonableness of defendants' conduct in light of a clearly established constitutional right, however, we must determine whether Jackson has made out a claim for violation of his constitutional rights at all.").

Jarvis v. Wellman, 52 F.3d 125, 126 (6th Cir. 1995) ("Because disclosure of plaintiff's medical records did not violate a constitutional right, it follows that defendants were entitled to qualified immunity and that plaintiff was unable to state a claim.").

Silver v. Franklin Township, 966 F.2d 1031, 1035-36 (6th Cir. 1992) ("In this case, the district court concluded the Board was immune from liability, but the court never determined whether the Board's action was even sufficient to constitute a violation of [plaintiff's] substantive due process rights. This is contrary to the Supreme Court's directive in Siegert...that before reaching a qualified immunity issue a court should determine whether there has been a constitutional violation.").

Lyons v. U.S., 2008 WL 141576, at *15 & n.6 (N.D. Ohio Jan. 11, 2008) ("The Sixth Circuit has vacillated between a three-step or two-step analysis when evaluating the assertion of qualified immunity . . . . The second step under Saucier is 'whether the right was clearly established.'. . Whereas, under the three-step approach in Dickerson, the court must determine whether a constitutional violation occurred, whether the right violated was clearly established and finally [A]whether plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts and supported the allegations by sufficient evidence, to indicate that what the official allegedly did was objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established constitutional right." . . Employing the third step in Dickerson would in the undersigned's view lead to confusion, rather than being helpful because the reliance simply on objective reasonableness is more directed to Fourth Amendment claims rather than Eighth Amendment claims which require proof of objective and subjective components.")

Pierce v. Ohio Dep't of Rehabilitation and Corrections, 284 F.Supp.2d 811, 829, 830 & n.17, 834, 842, 843, 845 (N.D. Ohio 2003) ("Since Virgili was decided in 2001 until the date of this memorandum opinion, the status quo in this circuit remains: no decision has established the constitutional standard that must be satisfied before prison employees may be strip searched. Interestingly, the court in Seiter, and again in Virgili, faced the same question of qualified immunity in the same context as the Court faces today, but skipped over the constitutional violation inquiry and, instead, addressed only the second prong of the analysis (i.e., whether such a right was clearly established). In view of the Supreme Court's recent holding in Hope and the Sixth Circuit cases issued subsequent to that opinion, the Court observes that a proper qualified immunity analysis requires: first, an examination of whether a constitutional violation exists in plaintiff's allegations; and second, if, and only if, a constitutional violation is found, an examination of whether that right was clearly established at the time it was allegedly violated. [citing cases] Thus, a court does not reach the clearly-established prong until the constitutional-violation prong is satisfied. . . . Given the precedent dictating that the constitutional violation inquiry be answered first in a qualified immunity analysis and the legitimate justifications presented above for answering this question, the Court examines whether a Fourth Amendment violation exists in the context of the strip searches in this case. . . . Since the first prong goes to the more general inquiry of whether a given act amounts to a constitutional violation, which, in this case, is a question of first impression, there is no apparent justification to refrain from looking initially outside the circuit in which this Court sits in order to make this determination. Although this inquiry still remains within the qualified immunity framework, whether conduct amounts to a constitutional violation is not unique to qualified immunity jurisprudence. Thus, the Court freely examines the case law of other circuits for persuasive authority on how to resolve this issue. . . . Balancing the interests of the correctional officers. . .and the competing interests of the Department, the Court holds in accordance with the above decisions that the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution imposes a reasonable suspicion standard that governs strip searches of prison employees. . . . Based on these circuit decisions [Seiter and Virgili], the fact that the strip searches in the instant case took place less than a year and a half after the searches at issue in Virgili, and that no party or the Court's own research has come up with a case in this circuit since Virgili that justifies straying from this binding precedent, the Court necessarily must follow Seiter and Virgili and hold that, as of November 2000 (i.e., the date of the challenged searches), the Fourth Amendment standard governing strip searches of prison employees was not clearly established. Accordingly, qualified immunity shields Defendants from § 1983 liability under the Fourth Amendment for strip searching Plaintiffs. . . . [T]o implement this standard not only in the discussion of future opinions of the courts, but also in practice within the state penal institutions, the Court recommends that the Ohio Attorney General, who represented Defendants in this case, distribute this memorandum opinion to the wardens of the state prisons for further publication within those institutions.").

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Phelan v. Village of Lyons, 531 F.3d 484, 488, 489 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Because Phelan's Cadillac was not in fact stolen, and Officer Dyas would have known that had he read line three of the LEADS report he requested, there was no probable cause and the felony traffic stop was unreasonable under the circumstances. . . . Undoubtedly the Fourth Amendment's general proscription against unreasonable seizures was clearly established at the time Officer Dyas stopped Phelan. Our inquiry, however, is whether the application of that right to this particular set of circumstances is clear enough that a " 'reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . Instead of focusing on the contours of the right to be free from unreasonable seizures itself, Officer Dyas argues that his behavior under the circumstances was reasonable. Phelan construes this argument as an attempt by Officer Dyas to append a 'third prong' to the qualified immunity inquiry: namely, whether the officer's actions were reasonable even if they violated clearly established law. As Phelan points out, we rejected this precise line of argument in Jones.").

Jones v. Wilhelm, 425 F.3d 455, 460, 461 (7th Cir. 2005) ("In Saucier, . . . the Supreme Court set out a two-part test for qualified immunity. First, a court must decide whether the facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, indicate that the officer's conduct violated some constitutional right of the plaintiff. . . Second, if the answer to the first question is 'yes,' then the court must determine whether the constitutional right violated was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation. . . The officer will enjoy qualified immunity unless the court affirmatively answers both questions. . . Wilhelm urges us to append a third prong to the two-part Saucier test, contending that '[e]ven if the Court finds that there was clearly established law which was violated, the immunity question should be decided based on whether police officers acted reasonably under the circumstances they faced.' . . Saucier clearly states, however, that '[t]he relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . It goes without saying that the reasonableness of an official's actions is not a factor in determining whether the facts as alleged constitute a violation of constitutional rights. Neither is the reasonableness of an official's actions an independent factor in determining whether a right is clearly established, as an official is held to have violated a clearly established right only where a reasonable officer would have known the alleged actions to be illegal, if faced with similar circumstances. . . .Thus, following Saucier, we reaffirm that the proper standard for qualified immunity remains a two-part test which first examines whether the defendant's alleged actions constitute a violation of constitutional rights, and then determines whether the implicated right was clearly established at the time. . . . In the alternative, Wilhelm asks that when we determine whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that Wilhelm's actions violated the Joneses' constitutional rights, we impute to the hypothetical, reasonable officer only Wilhelm's actual knowledge, and not the knowledge he ought reasonably to have amassed during the execution of the warrant. Such an interpretation, however, would enable state agents to trample on the constitutional rights of citizens by maintaining willful ignorance of what reasonable officers should have known, and we refuse to take such a step. In determining whether a defendant's alleged actions violated a clearly established right, courts may properly take into account any information the defendant ought reasonably to have obtained.").

Crowley v. McKinney, 400 F.3d 965, 971 (7th Cir.2005) ("So we greatly doubt that a noncustodial divorced parent has a federal constitutional right to participate in his children's education at the level of detail claimed by the plaintiff. But if we are wrong it cannot change the outcome of this case. As should be apparent from our discussion, the existence of the right that Crowley asserts is not established law, and McKinney is therefore immune from having to pay damages for violating that right.").

Greenawalt v. Indiana Dep't of Corrections, 397 F.3d 587, 592 (7th Cir. 2005) ("There is no due process claim in this case. It is enough to decide this case that the Fourth Amendment does not provide a remedy for the unpleasantness of being subjected to a psychological test, and that if we are wrong still there is no doubt that the existence of such a remedy was not clearly established when this suit was filed.").

Hildebrandt v. Illinois Dep't of Natural Resources, 347 F.3d 1014, 1036, 1038 n.22 (7th Cir. 2003) ("We begin by noting that the district court did not employ the methodology set forth by the Court in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), to determine whether the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. According to Saucier, the district court was required to analyze first whether there was a constitutional violation and second whether it was clearly established, at the time the defendants took the allegedly discriminatory actions, that such actions violated the Constitution. The district court incorrectly skipped the first step and rather first inquired whether there was qualified immunity. Here, we follow Saucier and inquire first whether the actions of each defendant resulted in a constitutional violation. . . . [T]here is a genuine issue of material fact that precludes a finding that Mr. Little did not discriminate against Dr. Hildebrandt on the basis of her sex by giving her a lower raise within the guideline range. Consequently, summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is not appropriate.").

Sparing v. Village of Olympia Fields, 266 F.3d 684, 691 (7th Cir. 2001) ("Although Sparing has demonstrated a constitutional violation, he cannot show that the violation was clearly established under the second part of the standard for qualified immunity. Indeed, we are in agreement with the First Circuit in concluding that the law surrounding Fourth Amendment 'doorway arrest' questions, particularly on the facts of this case, was not sufficiently settled or defined at the time of the arrest to defeat qualified immunity in this case.").

Townsend v. Vallas, 256 F.3d 661, 672 n.11 (7th Cir. 2001) ("This case implicates none of the concerns noted in Kalka v. Hawk, 215 F.3d 90 (D.C.Cir.2000), and Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244 (2d Cir.1999), that might warrant a deviation from the usual methodology.").

Delaney v. DeTella, 256 F.3d 679, 682, 683 (7th Cir. 2001) ("Whether the first prong of a qualified immunity defense, as outlined by the Court in Lewis, is a mandatory step or merely a recommendation remains, to some extent, a bit of an open question. . . However, in recent cases where the Supreme Court considered qualified immunity defenses on summary judgment, [ciitng Saucier, Wilson, and Conn] it first addressed if a constitutional violation was asserted before moving on to the question of whether it was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation. These cases, however, require only that a plaintiff allege a constitutional deprivation; thus we are required to determine only whether Delaney's allegations, if true, state a claim of deprivation.").

Pearson v. Ramos, 237 F.3d 881, 884 (7th Cir. 2001) ("In order that legal doctrine may continue to evolve in common law fashion, the Supreme Court has instructed us to decide the merits of an appeal even if there is a good immunity defense, since a decision on whether the defendant is entitled to immunity requires freezing the law as of the date he acted. . . Whether this rule is absolute may be doubted, for reasons explained in Kalka v. Hawk, 215 F.3d 90, 94-98 (D.C.Cir.2000), and Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244 (2d Cir.1999), but the reasons are inapplicable here.").

Denius v. Dunlap, 209 F.3d 944, 950 (7th Cir. 2000) (Denius I) ("To evaluate a claim of qualified immunity, we engage in a two-step analysis. First, we determine whether the plaintiff's claim states a violation of his constitutional rights. Then, we determine whether those rights were clearly established at the time the violation occurred. . . . Because the doctrine of qualified immunity should not stand as an impediment to the clarification and evolution of a court's articulation of constitutional principles, we evaluate the constitutionality of the official's conduct even though, in the end, he may not be held liable for monetary damages flowing from that conduct.").

Kitzman-Kelley v. Warner, 203 F.3d 454, 457 (7th Cir. 2000) ("In County of Sacramento v. Lewis, . . . the Supreme Court of the United States set forth the appropriate methodology for adjudicating a motion to dismiss on the ground of qualified immunity at the complaint stage of the litigation. Lewis counsels that the 'better approach' is for the district court to consider first the question of whether the complaint states a cause of action. If the district court determines that a cause of action has been stated, it must then determine whether qualified immunity nevertheless shields a defendant from trial and possible liability. . . Since the Court's pronouncement in Lewis, it has twice repeated this directive.").

Kernats v. O'Sullivan, 35 F.3d 1171, 1176, 1183 (7th Cir. 1994) ("Once a defendant has pleaded a defense of qualified immunity, it is appropriate for courts to approach the issue using a two-step analysis: (1) Does the alleged conduct set out a constitutional violation? and (2) Were the constitutional standards clearly established at the time in question? . . . . Because the case law had not clearly established the unlawfulness of O'Sullivan's alleged actions as of the time he acted, O'Sullivan was entitled to qualified immunity. This does not mean, of course, that the Kernats' allegations do not state a Fourth Amendment claim (we need not and do not reach this question) . . . .").

Kernats v. O'Sullivan, 35 F.3d 1171, 1183 (7th Cir. 1994) (Rovner, J., concurring) ("As Judge Flaum explains, at the time of the official conduct here, it was not clearly established that O'Sullivan's alleged abuse of his position of power and public trust would violate the Fourth Amendment. Having reached that conclusion, Judge Flaum leaves unanswered the ultimate question of whether Kernats successfully alleged an unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment, as it is unnecessary to his conclusion with respect to the state of existing law. I fully concur in Judge Flaum's qualified immunity analysis but write separately to emphasize that...a Fourth Amendment claim was stated.").

Sivard v. Pulaski County, 17 F.3d 185, 189 (7th Cir. 1994) ("An analysis of qualified immunity is appropriate only after resolution of the purely legal question of whether Sivard has alleged a violation of a constitutional right.").

Marshall v. Allen, 984 F.2d 787, 793 (7th Cir. 1993) ("Under the Harlow qualified immunity analysis as explicated in Siegert, the first inquiry is a threshold issue that can defeat entirely a claim of qualified immunity. If a plaintiff's allegations . . . do not state a cognizable violation of constitutional rights, then the plaintiff's claim fails. . . Courts are not required to examine the clearly established law at the time of the offense if the plaintiff's allegations do not assert a violation of constitutional rights.").

Elliott v. Thomas, 937 F.2d 338, 342 (7th Cir. 1991)("Deciding just when it became 'clearly established' that public officials could not do something that the Constitution allows them to do is silly.").

Thornton v. Lund, 538 F.Supp.2d 1053, 1058, 1059 (E.D. Wis. 2008) ("[A]lthough one co-tenant may authorize a search of a home, such authorization is insufficient if another co-tenant is present and objects to the search. . . . In the present case, both plaintiffs were present when defendants sought to search their home, and both refused to consent to a search. The parties dispute whether Sherrie subsequently changed her position, but it is undisputed that Latanga did not. Thus, notwithstanding William's consent, defendants' entry into and search of plaintiffs' home was unreasonable as to Latanga and, under Sherrie's version of the facts, was also unreasonable as to Sherrie. . . Thus, defendants violated Latanga's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches and may also have violated Sherrie's right. . . . In February 2006, it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that a warrantless search of a parolee's residence was unreasonable as to a present, objecting co-tenant. Prior to Randolph, most courts had concluded that one resident's consent to a home search authorized entry into the home even over the objections of a co-resident. . . Further, several pre-Randolph cases treated a parolee's co-tenant as having no more rights than the parolee.").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

O'Neil v. City of Iowa City, Iowa, 496 F.3d 915, 918 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Giving the court's order the best possible reading, the determination that '[p]laintiff has presented enough documentary evidence' on his First Amendment and due process claims could possibly be intended as a finding that O'Neil has established a constitutional violation–'step one' of Saucier. However, even if that generous reading is accurate (and it is doubtful that it is), there is absolutely no discussion on 'step two' of the qualified immunity analysis-whether reasonable officials in the Commissioners' positions would have known that their actions violated O'Neil's constitutional rights.. . .It is possible, we suppose, that the district court considered the issue of qualified immunity and only provided a truncated analysis. However, we can neither affirm nor reverse the denial of qualified immunity based on the cursory commentary advanced by the district court in its denial order. . . . We remand the case to the district court for a more detailed consideration and explanation of the validity, or not, of the defendants' claim to qualified immunity.").

Vaughn v. Ruoff, 253 F.3d 1124, 1128 (8th Cir. 2001) ("Qualified immunity analysis initially asks the following two questions: (1) was there a deprivation of a constitutional right, and, if so, (2) was the right clearly established at the time of the deprivation? County of Sacramento v.. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 841 n.5 (1998). If either question is answered in the negative, the public official is entitled to qualified immunity. If both questions are answered in the affirmative, a public official can avoid a denial of qualified immunity only if she meets her burden of establishing undisputed and material predicate facts which demonstrate that her actions were reasonable under the circumstances. Pace v. City of Des Moines, 201 F.3d 1050, 1056 (8th Cir.2000). If the material predicate facts are undisputed, the reasonableness inquiry is a question of law. Id. If there is a genuine dispute over material predicate facts, a public official cannot obtain summary judgment. Id.").

King v. Beavers, 148 F.3d 1031, 1034 (8th Cir. 1998) ("When qualified immunity is asserted in a § 1983 action, we 'determine first whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right at all,' and if so, 'whether the right allegedly implicated was clearly established at the time of the events in question.'[citing County of Sacramento]").

Rowe v. Lamb, 130 F.3d 812, 814 (8th Cir. 1997) ("In order to determine whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity, we engage in a two-part analysis. [citing Manzano] The first question is whether the plaintiff has alleged a constitutional violation. [citing Siegert] It is not until we have made that required determination that we may analyze whether such right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.").

Thomason v. SCAN Volunteer Services, Inc., 85 F.3d 1365, 1371 (8th Cir. 1996) ("Our court has not gone so far as to say that there are no 'clearly established' substantive due process rights held by parents in the context of child abuse investigations. However, in Myers [v. Morris, 810 F.2d 1437 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 828 (1987)], we did recognize the problem of defining such rights. . . More generally, this need to balance competing interests makes the Siegert approach difficult to apply in child abuse cases involving the right to familial integrity. In these types of cases, it is nearly impossible to separate the constitutional violation analysis from the clearly established right analysis.").

Manzano v. South Dakota Dept. of Social Services, 60 F.3d 505, 510 n.2 (8th Cir. 1995) ("We recognize that the Supreme Court's decision in Siegert . . . has caused considerable disagreement among the circuits with regard to the proper analytical framework for qualified immunity questions. . .However, our court has consistently interpreted Siegert to mean that we must first address the question whether the plaintiff has asserted the violation of a constitutional right, and then consider whether the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.").

Cole v. Bone, 993 F.2d 1328, 1334 (8th Cir. 1993) ("Because we have found that [defendant's] seizure of [plaintiffs' decedent] was constitutionally reasonable as a matter of law, plaintiffs have failed to assert a constitutional violation against [defendant]. Accordingly, it is thus unnecessary for us to reach [defendant's] contention that the district court erred in denying his claim of qualified immunity.").

Get Away Club, Inc. v. Coleman, 969 F.2d 664, 666 (8th Cir. 1992) ("In Siegert, ...the Supreme Court clarified the proper analysis for determining when a public official is entitled to qualified immunity. First, [plaintiff] must assert a violation of its constitutional rights ...If no constitutional right has been asserted, [plaintiff's] complaint must be dismissed.").

Sheridan v. City of Des Moines, No. 4:00-CV-90024, 2001 WL 901267, at *7 (S.D. Iowa Aug. 8, 2001) (not reported) ("The lawful placement of handcuffs on an individual, without more, is inadequate to sustain Plaintiffs' claim for excessive force. Having determined that the officers did not violate Mr. Sheridan's constitutional rights and that an action under § 1983 cannot be maintained, the Court does not need to address the issue of qualified immunity.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Skoog v. County of Clackamas, 469 F.3d 1221, 1229, 1231-35 (9th Cir. 2006) ("Determining whether an official is entitled to summary judgment based on the affirmative defense of qualified immunity requires applying a three-part test. First, the court must ask whether '[t]aken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, [ ] the facts alleged show the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right?' If the answer is no, the officer is entitled to qualified immunity. If the answer is yes, the court must proceed to the next question: whether the right was clearly established at the time the officer acted. That is, 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted. If the answer is no, the officer is entitled to qualified immunity. If the answer is yes, the court must answer the final question: whether the officer could have believed, 'reasonably but mistakenly ... that his or her conduct did not violate a clearly established constitutional right.' If the answer is yes, the officer is entitled to qualified immunity. If the answer is no, he is not. . . .To demonstrate retaliation in violation of the First Amendment, Skoog must ultimately prove first that Royster took action that 'would chill or silence a person of ordinary firmness from future First Amendment activities.' The parties do not dispute that searching someone's office and seizing materials can satisfy this first requirement. The second requirement is the focus in this case. That requirement involves causation. Skoog must ultimately prove that Royster's desire to cause the chilling effect was a but-for cause of the defendant's action. Whether a plaintiff must plead the absence of probable cause in order to satisfy this second requirement and state a claim for retaliation is an open question in this circuit and the subject of a split in the other circuits. After close review of the relevant precedent, we conclude that a plaintiff need not plead the absence of probable cause in order to state a claim for retaliation. . . . In Hartman v. Moore, the Supreme Court considered whether the absence of probable cause should be an element of a particular subcategory of retaliation claims: retaliatory prosecution claims. The Court ultimately decided that the absence of probable cause should be an element of that subcategory. Although this outcome might seem to conflict with Crawford-El, the Supreme Court's reasoning brings it into harmony with that earlier decision. In Hartman, the Supreme Court was careful to explain that the practical problems of establishing causation in retaliatory prosecution actions motivated its decision, not any need to provide additional protection to government officials. According to the Court, it makes sense to require the absence of probable cause in retaliatory prosecution claims because several attributes of such claims make doing so necessary and not very onerous. . . . Pleading and proving the absence of probable cause is necessary in retaliatory prosecution cases, the Court reasoned, because of the complexity of causation in such cases. Retaliatory prosecution claims are really 'for successful retaliatory inducement to prosecute' because they can only be maintained against officials, such as investigators, who may persuade prosecutors to act. To prove causation, then, a plaintiff must show not only that the defendant official harbored retaliatory animus and thus sought to induce prosecution, but also that the official succeeded–that is, that the 'prosecutor [ ] would not have pressed charges otherwise.'. . . The requirement of no probable cause is necessary 'to bridge the gap between the nonprosecuting government agent's motive and the prosecutor's action, and to address the presumption of prosecutorial regularity.' Thus, differences between retaliatory prosecution claims and other retaliation claims justified and necessitated the additional requirement in retaliatory prosecution claims. We conclude that the retaliation claim in this case does not involve multi-layered causation as did the claim in Hartman. . . . Thus, the rationale for requiring the pleading of no probable cause in Hartman is absent here. This case presents an 'ordinary' retaliation claim. . . . . We have concluded that Skoog need not have pled the absence of probable cause in order to state a claim for retaliation. Our earlier conclusion that probable cause existed for the still camera's seizure therefore does not preclude his statement of a claim. Moreover, he has stated all the elements necessary for a retaliation claim. Thus, the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis does not end our inquiry and we must proceed to the second. The second prong requires us to determine whether the right, defined according to the actual facts of the case, was clearly established at the time of the search. In this case, we define the right as the right of an individual to be free of police action motivated by retaliatory animus but for which there was probable cause. At the time of the search, the right we have just defined was far from clearly established in this Circuit or in the nation. We have decided only today that a right exists to be free of police action for which retaliation is a but-for cause even if probable cause exists for that action. At some future point, this right will become clearly established in this Circuit. At the time Royster acted, however, the law was far from clear. Accordingly, even assuming Royster's primary motivation for seizing Skoog's still camera was to retaliate for Skoog's exercise of his First Amendment rights, he violated no clearly established law because probable cause existed for the search. Royster is thus entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of our qualified immunity analysis. We therefore reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment on Skoog's claim for retaliation." [footnotes omitted]).

[But see Baldauf v. Davidson, 2007 WL 2156065, at *2, *3 & n.3 (S.D.Ind. July 24, 2007) ("In Hartman, the Supreme Court's primary rationale for making proof of probable cause a required element of retaliatory prosecution claims was the complex causation that must ordinarily be established. . . A plaintiff hoping to prevail must show that the officials seeking to retaliate, normally the police officers, induced the prosecutor to bring charges that the prosecutor would not otherwise have brought. . . However, prosecutors ordinarily do not inquire into an arresting officer's motivation; they simply want to know that probable cause exists. In the Supreme Court's view, requiring plaintiffs to establish the absence of probable cause would 'bridge the gap between the nonprosecuting government agent's motive and the prosecutor's action' and would 'address the presumption of prosecutorial regularity.'. . At first glance, no such complex causation problems are present when a person brings a retaliatory arrest claim that focuses entirely on an officer's bodily seizure of a plaintiff through the power of arrest. The Ninth Circuit concluded as much, although with regard to a seizure of property, not of a person. In Skoog v. County of Clackamas, the court held that a plaintiff could bring a First Amendment retaliation claim against a police officer who seized a still camera even if probable cause existed for the search and seizure. 469 F.3d 1221, 1232 (9th Cir.2006). The court reasoned that Hartman's ruling was limited to retaliation cases involving 'multi-layered causation.'. . . It dismissed the case, however, after finding that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because 'the right of an individual to be free of police action motivated by retaliatory animus but for which there was probable cause' was not clearly established. . . In contrast, the Sixth and Eighth Circuits have concluded that Hartman's ruling sweeps 'broad[ly] enough to apply even where intervening actions by a prosecutor are not present.' Williams v.. City of Carl Junction, 480 F.3d 871, 876 (8th Cir.2007) (adopting the reasoning of Barnes v. Wright, 449 F.3d 709, 720 (6th Cir.2006)). . . . [T]his court finds the Sixth Circuit's reasoning persuasive for several reasons. First, the distinction between a retaliatory prosecution claim and a retaliatory arrest claim is somewhat artificial. In both cases, the defendants in such suits are the arresting or investigating officers because of the prosecutor's absolute immunity. . . .Moreover, an arrest is merely the first step in a prosecution. Insofar as the plaintiff's injuries stem from the filing of charges, plaintiff, in essence, is claiming retaliatory prosecution, and under Hartman, must show the absence of probable cause. . . . . The Seventh Circuit does not appear to have used the term 'retaliatory arrest' at all, preferring to discuss instead whether a First Amendment retaliation claim might be brought 'in the context of an arrest.' Abrams v. Walker, 307 F.3d 650, 657 (7th Cir.2002), overruled on other grounds by Spiegla v. Hull, 371 F.3d 928, 941-42 (7th Cir.2004). In this case, decided prior to Hartman, the court declined to rule at that time whether the existence of probable cause barred such a claim although it noted that such a rule 'would not be incongruent' with its Fourth Amendment precedent.").]

Way v. County of Ventura, 445 F.3d 1157, 1161-63 (9th Cir. 2006) ("We recognize the difficulty of operating a detention facility safely, the seriousness of the risk of smuggled weapons and contraband, and the deference we owe jail officials' exercise of judgment in adopting and executing policies necessary to maintain institutional security. . . However, this does not mean that a blanket policy is constitutionally acceptable simply by virtue of jail officials' invocation of security concerns. . . Rather, the policy must be ' Areasonably related" to the [detention facility's] interest in maintaining security.'. . As there is no evidence that security concerns require strip searching all arrestees on all drug offenses before placement in the general jail population, and none that all persons arrested for being under the influence of a drug are likely to have concealed more drugs in a bodily cavity, the Sheriff Department's blanket policy cannot be a proxy for reasonable suspicion. There was no individualized suspicion that Way concealed drugs in a bodily cavity. Therefore, subjecting her to a strip search with visual cavity inspection offended her constitutional right to be free of an unreasonable search. We had held prior to Way's search that performing a strip search with visual cavity inspection before determining whether the person was eligible for release on his own recognizance could not be justified based on a blanket policy of subjecting all minor offense arrestees to a strip search, Ward, 791 F.2d 1329; that a visual body cavity search of a person arrested on an offense that did not involve violence could not be justified by a blanket policy of subjecting all those arrested for felonies to such a search, Kennedy, 901 F.2d 702; and that a strip and body cavity search of all felony arrestees could not be justified based on the jail's blanket search policy regardless of the crime with which they were charged, Fuller, 950 F.2d 1437. However, we had never previously addressed the constitutionality of a body cavity search policy premised on the nature of this or any other drug offense. More importantly, we had held that the nature of the offense alone may provide reasonable suspicion, Thompson, 885 F.2d at 1447, and twice pointed to charges involving drugs, contraband and violence as the kind of offense that might give rise to reasonable suspicion. Kennedy, 901 F.2d at 716; Giles, 746 F.2d at 618. In these circumstances, we cannot conclude that a reasonable officer would necessarily have realized that relying on a Department policy that excepted arrestees being held on controlled substance offenses from the general prohibition on strip searches, and subjecting Way to a strip search with visual cavity inspection pursuant to it, was unconstitutional. We therefore conclude that subjecting Way to a strip search with visual cavity inspection during the booking process on a misdemeanor charge of being under the influence of a drug was not justified by the jail's blanket policy of strip searching all those arrested on charges involving a controlled substance. Undocumented security needs of the jail facility do not outweigh the invasion of Way's personal rights. Nor is such an intrusive search warranted solely on account of the nature of the charge in this case, as being under the influence of a drug does not necessarily indicate that the person has concealed more drugs in a body cavity. This said, a reasonable official in the position of Brooks and Hanson would not have understood that following the jail's policy violated Way's rights because the unconstitutionality of the search they conducted was not clearly established at the time.").

Jimenez v. City of Costa Mesa, No. 04-55948, 2006 WL 897711, at *3 (9th Cir. Apr. 5, 2006) (unpublished) ("A jury could reasonably conclude that Officer Chamberlin's use of pepper spray on Tony Maae in the manner alleged was objectively unreasonable. Although Tony Maae initially resisted arrest and the pepper-spraying occurred prior to handcuffing, his arrest was for a minor crime, and he posed little threat at the time because three officers were holding him to the ground. We conclude, however, that Officer Chamberlin is entitled to qualified immunity because in 2001, the contours of the right against excessive force in the pepper-spray context were not so clearly established that a reasonable officer would have known the unlawfulness of this conduct.").

Boyd v. Benton County, 374 F.3d 773, 779, 784 (9th Cir. 2004) ("There are likely circumstances in which a risk to officers' safety would make the use of a flash-bang device appropriate. And we recognize that less-than-lethal alternatives are intended to avoid unnecessary fatalities. Nonetheless, given the inherently dangerous nature of the flash-bang device, it cannot be a reasonable use of force under the Fourth Amendment to throw it 'blind' into a room occupied by innocent bystanders absent a strong governmental interest, careful consideration of alternatives and appropriate measures to reduce the risk of injury. Given the facts Boyd has presented, the use of the flash-bang here did not meet these requirements, and thus she has established a Fourth Amendment violation sufficient to overcome summary judgment under the first prong of Saucier. . . . We conclude that in October 1997 a reasonable officer faced with these facts, and without guidance from the courts, was not on notice that the use of a flash-bang was unconstitutional. Thus, while we now hold that the officers in the specific circumstances of this case violated Boyd's Fourth Amendment rights in using a flash-bang inside a dark apartment where five to eight people might be sleeping, that error was not so egregious as to have been an unreasonable application of the law that existed at the time of the incident. Consequently, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because Boyd's Fourth Amendment right to be free from dangerous flash-bang devices under these circumstances was not clearly established.").

Doe v. Lebbos, 348 F.3d 820, 828, 829 (9th Cir. 2003) ("We note that the parties did not brief the issue of whether Herrera's alleged actions, if proven, violated a constitutional right. We are obligated under Saucier, however, to address this issue at the outset of our qualified immunity analysis. . . .Herrera did not obtain parental consent or a court order before referring Lacey for a medical sexual abuse examination. . . .We therefore hold, consistent with our reasoning in Wallis, that, on the Does' version of the facts, Herrera violated the Does' constitutional rights to family association and procedural due process. .. . Our inquiry, however, does not end here. . . .We conclude that a reasonable social worker in Herrera's position would have believed that she had an appropriate court order authorizing the examination and that her conduct was lawful. Herrera therefore is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Billington v. Smith, 292 F.3d 1177, 1184, 1185, 1189-91 (9th Cir. 2002) ("[W]e will not assume without deciding that Detective Smith violated Hennessey's constitutional rights and move on to the qualified immunity question. Instead, we will first decide whether Detective Smith did in fact violate Hennessey's rights. . . . The district court assumed that Detective Smith's use of deadly force was reasonable at the moment of the shooting, but denied summary judgment because it found a genuine issue of material fact whether alleged tactical errors made by Detective Smith before the moment of the shooting made his reasonable use of force at that moment unreasonable. It is this theory of excessive force that Hennessey's estate advances against Detective Smith's appeal, and the theory is basically that Detective Smith shouldn't have gotten himself into the situation, so he couldn't constitutionally shoot his way out of it. . . . Under Alexander [v. City and County of San Francisco], the fact that an officer negligently gets himself into a dangerous situation will not make it unreasonable for him to use force to defend himself. . . . But if, as in Alexander, an officer intentionally or recklessly provokes a violent response, and the provocation is an independent constitutional violation, that provocation may render the officer's otherwise reasonable defensive use of force unreasonable as a matter of law. In such a case, the officer's initial unconstitutional provocation, which arises from intentional or reckless conduct rather than mere negligence, would proximately cause the subsequent application of deadly force. . . . even if we were to assume for the sake of argument that a jury could conclude that Detective Smith should have sat in his car until backup arrived, or donned all of his equipment before approaching Hennessey, or have taken precautions against Hennessey grabbing him by his throat and pulling himself out of the car window to attack the detective, or that Detective Smith should have dropped off his wife and daughter somewhere before dealing with Hennessey, none of Detective Smith's supposed errors could be deemed intentional or reckless, much less unconstitutional, provocations that caused Hennessey to attack him. . . . We need not reach the question whether, if Detective Smith violated Hennessey's constitutional rights by shooting him, he would nevertheless be entitled to qualified immunity, because he did not violate Hennessey's rights.").

See also Tubar v. Clift, 2008 WL 5142932 (W.D. Wash. Dec. 5, 2008) ("Clift's decision to approach the stolen vehicle in an attempt to arrest its occupants and then backpedal through the parking lot once the vehicle began moving, may have been a bad tactical decision or even negligent. But the Court cannot employ 20/20 hindsight to find that these decisions effected an unconstitutional provocation as a matter of law. . . . In sum, Plaintiff has not met his burden of demonstrating that Clift intentionally or recklessly provoked a violent response, and such provocation was an independent constitutional violation. Accordingly, partial summary judgment that Defendants are liable for unreasonable seizure is not appropriate.")

Orin v. Barclay, 272 F.3d 1207, 1214 (9th Cir. 2001) ("To determine whether each individual defendant is entitled to qualified immunity, we must first determine whether Orin has stated a prima facie claim that a defendant violated his constitutional rights. . . If we determine that Orin has stated a prima facie claim that a particular defendant violated his constitutional rights, then we must determine whether the rights allegedly violated were clearly established by federal law.").

Armendariz v. Penman, 75 F.3d 1311, 1318 (9th Cir. 1996) (en banc) (finding defendants entitled to qualified immunity where plaintiffs failed to state a claim of violation of their substantive due process rights), overruled, Crown Point Development, Inc. v. City of Sun Valley, 2007 WL 3197049, at *4 (9th Cir. Nov. 1, 2007) ("[It is no longer possible in light of Lingle and Lewis to read Armendariz as imposing a blanket obstacle to all substantive due process challenges to land use regulation.).

.

Pena v. Gardner, 976 F.2d 469, 471 (9th Cir. 1992) (where complaint lacked facts sufficient to state a claim under § 1983, consideration of qualified immunity was premature).

Romero v. Kitsap County, 931 F.2d 624, 627 (9th Cir. 1991) (three inquiries required by the qualified immunity test: (1) identification of the specific right allegedly violated; (2) a determination of whether that right was so "clearly established" as to alert a reasonable officer as to its constitutional parameters; and (3) whether a reasonable officer could have believed lawful his particular conduct at issue, given the circumstances and the information possessed at the time.).

Beaver v. City of Federal Way, 507 F.Supp.2d 1137, 1149 (W.D.Wash. 2007) ("Therefore, the Court finds that at the time of the arrest, a reasonable law enforcement officer might well have failed to recognize that the actions taken by defendants–specifically, the fourth and fifth tasings of Mr. Beaver– violated his Fourth Amendment rights. Under the second prong of Saucier, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. In part, the purpose of the two-prong Saucier analytical framework is to force courts to establish contours of the law involving potential violations of civil rights. . . In this case, because the case law on use of Tasers is not well developed, liability for violations of Mr. Beaver's rights caused by the fourth and fifth tasings cannot be imposed. It has been said that qualified immunity exists because police officers 'cannot be expected to predict what federal judges' might decide is constitutionally unacceptable. . . However, at least as far as the undersigned is concerned, the following issues are now clearly established. First, the use of a Taser involves the application of force. Second, each application of a Taser involves an additional use of force. Third, multiple applications of a Taser cannot be justified solely on the grounds that a suspect fails to comply with a command, absent other indications that the suspect is about to flee or poses an immediate threat to an officer. This is particularly true when more than one officer is present to assist in controlling a situation. Fourth, any decision to apply multiple applications of a Taser must take into consideration whether a suspect is capable of complying with an officer's commands."), aff'd, 2008 WL 5065620 (9th Cir. Nov. 25, 2008)("Here, there was no clearly established law on August 27, 2004, to put a reasonable officer on notice that tasing an arrestee who was suspected of a serious crime, had attempted to flee from officers, and continued to be non-compliant was unconstitutional. Additionally, the officers' conduct was not a patently offensive violation of Beaver's constitutional rights.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Kirkland v. St. Vrain Valley School District No. RE-1J, 464 F.3d 1182, 1188 (10th Cir. 2006) ("Although at times it may be tempting for a court to address the second issue first, the Supreme Court directs that a court consider these questions in order.").

Douglas v. Dobbs, 419 F.3d 1097, 1102, 1103 (10th Cir. 2005) ("Having established that Douglas has a constitutional right to privacy in her prescription drug records, we must determine whether ADA Dobbs' conduct violated that right . . . Douglas cites to no statutory or case law to support her claim that the Fourth Amendment is implicated when district attorneys advise law enforcement officers about proposed motions or orders submitted to judges to obtain authorization to conduct searches. . . . Because Douglas cannot rely merely upon identifying an abstract right to privacy protected by the Fourth Amendment and then allege that Dobbs has violated it, she has failed to carry her burden under the threshold inquiry for qualified immunity . . . . Absent a showing that Dobbs' actions in authorizing the submission of the Motion and proposed Order to the magistrate judge violated a clearly established constitutional right, qualified immunity applies and Douglas's suit must fail.").

Lawrence v. Reed, 406 F.3d 1224, 1230 (10th Cir. 2005) ("In the Tenth Circuit, we employ a three-step inquiry. . . First, we ask 'whether the plaintiff's allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation.' . . If not, the suit is dismissed; if so, we move to the second step: 'whether the law was clearly established at the time the alleged violations occurred.'. . This step gives the official an opportunity to show that he 'neither knew nor should have known of the relevant legal standard' because the law was not clearly established at the time he acted. . . Where the law is not clearly established, courts do not require officials to anticipate its future developments, and qualified immunity is therefore appropriate. If the law was clearly established, we reach the third step of the inquiry: whether, in spite of the fact that the law was clearly established, 'extraordinary circumstances'-such as reliance on the advice of counsel or on a statute-'so "prevented" [the official] from knowing that his actions were unconstitutional that he should not be imputed with knowledge of a clearly established right.'. . This occurs only 'rarely.'").

Tonkovich v. Kansas Board of Regents (Tonkovich II), 254 F.3d 941, 944 & n.1 (10th Cir. 2001) ("Although Tonkovich I dealt with qualified immunity, its analysis and, more importantly, its holding are germane to our Rule 12(b)(6) inquiry. The relevance becomes apparent upon comparing the two analyses. First, both analytical frameworks employ the same factual lens: "[A]ll of the well-pleaded allegations in the complaint [are accepted] as true." . . . Second, the qualified immunity inquiry itself–whether Defendants (1) violated (2) clearly established law–requires a court to confront an obvious Rule 12(b)(6) issue: whether Plaintiff has alleged a legal violation at all. Put more specifically, both analyses require the court to determine whether Plaintiff has argued facts that, if proven, would demonstrate illegal conduct by Defendants for which relief may be granted. . . . The fact that Tonkovich I disavowed any intent to review the merits of the case, 159 F.3d at 515-16, does not alter our conclusion. The panel did not do a Rule 12(b)(6) review of the merits, despite acknowledging its relation to a qualified immunity analysis, because the court lacked jurisdiction to do so. Id. However, that does not devalue Tonkovich I's relevance to a subsequent Rule 12(b)(6) analysis such as this. Indeed, in light of the law of the case doctrine, it would be ludicrous to argue that we are free to construe the same aspects of Plaintiff's complaint differently than did Tonkovich I, although we address essentially the same issue.").

Cruz v. City of Laramie, 239 F.3d 1183, 1188, 1189 (10th Cir. 2001) ("We do not reach the question whether all hog-tie restraints constitute a constitutional violation per se, but hold that officers may not apply this technique when an individual's diminished capacity is apparent. This diminished capacity might result from severe intoxication, the influence of controlled substances, a discernible mental condition, or any other condition, apparent to the officers at the time, which would make the application of a hog-tie restraint likely to result in any significant risk to the individual's health or well-being. In such situations, an individual's condition mandates the use of less restrictive means for physical restraint. . . . While the use of a hog-tie restraint in this case falls within the rule we announce today, we cannot say, however, that a rule prohibiting such a restraint in this situation was 'clearly established' at the time of this unfortunate incident. The decisions from other circuit and district courts fall shy of the mandated 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts.' ").

Herring v. Keenan, 218 F.3d 1171, 1173 (10th Cir. 2000) ("We conclude that there is a constitutional right to privacy that protects an individual from the disclosure of information concerning a person's health. We reverse the denial of the motion to dismiss, however, because we hold that it was not clearly established, at the time Keenan disclosed to Herring's sister and his employer that Herring had tested positive for HIV, that a probationer had a constitutionally protected right to privacy regarding information concerning his or her medical condition.").

Baptiste v. J.C. Penney Company, Inc., 147 F.3d 1252, 1255 n.6 (10th Cir. 1998) ("In accord with County of Sacramento v. Lewis, . . . this court first determines whether Ms. Baptiste has alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right. Only after determining that Ms. Baptiste has alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right, does this court ask whether the right allegedly violated was clearly established at the time of the conduct at issue.").

Abeyta v. Casados, 77 F.3d 1253, 1257-58 (10th Cir. 1996) ("We are unwilling to hold that actions which inflict only psychological damage may never achieve the high level of 'a brutal and inhuman abuse of official power literally shocking to the conscience' [cite omitted] necessary to constitute a substantive due process violation. . . . But we are sure that the actions alleged in the instant case do not reach that level–whether they were done with indifference or with deliberate intent to cause psychological harm. . . . Because we hold that taking plaintiff's claims as true they do not state an actionable 1983 claim against defendant based on the substantive due process violation alleged, we need not discuss qualified immunity as a separate issue.").

Pino v. Higgs, 75 F.3d 1461, 1467 (10th Cir. 1996) ("Applying the two-part inquiry of Siegert," defendants are entitled to summary judgment where Appellant failed to allege facts sufficient to show violation of any of her constitutional rights.).

Liebson v. New Mexico Corrections Dep't, 73 F.3d 274, 276 (10th Cir. 1996) ("Following the Siegert framework, we must first decide whether Ms. Liebson has asserted the violation of her due process rights.").

Albright v. Rodriguez, 51 F.3d 1531, 1535 (10th Cir. 1995) ("[A] defendant is entitled to qualified immunity if the plaintiff fails to show a violation of a constitutional right at all.").

Romero v. Fay, 45 F.3d 1472, 1478 (10th Cir. 1995) ("The district court denied Defendants qualified immunity on Plaintiff's claim of an unreasonable post-arrest investigation without conducting the inquiry mandated by Siegert. Under Siegert, the district court should have first ascertained whether Plaintiff sufficiently asserted facts in his complaint and response to Defendants' motion for summary judgment that established the violation of a constitutional right at all.").

Doe v. Bagan, 41 F.3d 571, 577 n.7 (10th Cir. 1994) ("Because plaintiffs have failed to allege the violation of a constitutional right . . . we need not consider whether the various defendants are entitled to immunity. Like the plaintiff in Siegert . . . their claims fail at an analytically earlier stage, before consideration of immunity, qualified or otherwise, is necessary. [cites omitted]").

Martinez v. Mafchir, 35 F.3d 1486, 1490 (10th Cir. 1994) ("Courts have recognized that the constitutional right to familial integrity is amorphous and always must be balanced against the governmental interest involved. [cites omitted] As a result, the Siegert framework has proved difficult to apply in child abuse cases involving the generalized constitutional right to familial integrity because the threshold constitutional violation analysis may run together with the 'clearly established' analysis. [cites omitted] Nevertheless, we undertake to apply the Siegert framework here. In the context of this case, we must first determine whether [Defendant's] actions in pursuing the Neglect Petition, not to seek [the child's] actual physical removal from the Martinez home but basically to force Ms. Martinez to follow through with the recommended psychological evaluations for [the child], rose to the level of a constitutional violation.").

Hinton v. City of Elwood, 997 F.2d 774, 779, 780 (10th Cir. 1993) ("The initial twofold burden imposed on the plaintiff requires a court reviewing a qualified immunity claim to analyze the state of the law at two different times. First, the court must analyze the law at the time of trial to determine whether the plaintiff has alleged a violation of existing law as required by the first prong of the plaintiff's summary judgment burden. Then, pursuant to the second prong, the court must analyze the law at the time of the alleged conduct in order to determine whether the plaintiff has established that the defendant's conduct, when perpetrated, violated clearly established law . . . . Hinton's failure to satisfy the first prong of his summary judgment burden is dispositive of [defendants'] claim to qualified immunity and renders it unnecessary for us to consider whether Hinton satisfied his burden under the second prong by showing that [defendants] violated clearly established law.").

Maldonado v. Josey, 975 F.2d 727, 729 (10th Cir. 1992) ("As a threshold inquiry to qualified immunity, we first must determine whether [plaintiff's] allegations, even if accepted as true, state a claim for violation of any rights secured under the United States Constitution."), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1266 (1993).

Frohmader v. Wayne, 958 F.2d 1024, 1026 n.3 (10 Cir. 1992) ("Identification of the controlling constitutional principles and evaluation of the defendant's compliance therewith is . . . the threshold question to be resolved when qualified immunity is asserted." (citing Spielman v. Hildebrand, 873 F.2d 1377, 1385 (10th Cir. 1989)).

Workman v. Jordan, 958 F.2d 332, 334 n.2 (10th Cir. 1992) (relying on Pueblo Neighborhood Health Ctrs., Inc. v. Losavio, 847 F.2d 642, 646 (10th Cir. 1988), for proposition that defendant may raise qualified immunity by way of Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b) (6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim or by way of summary judgment motion.).

Snell v. Tunnell, 920 F.2d 673, 696 (10th Cir. 1990) ("Once a defendant raises the defense of qualified immunity, plaintiffs must come forward with facts or allegations to show both that the defendant's alleged conduct violated the law and that the law was clearly established when the alleged violation occurred." If the plaintiff can't produce enough evidence to show that the challenged conduct violated law "as presently interpreted," then it is unnecessary to consider whether the law was clearly established.).

Anderson v. Alpine City, 804 F. Supp. 269, 276 (D.Utah 1992) ("The court cannot determine whether qualified immunity applies until it first determines that there has been a violation of a constitutional right.")

Pride v. Kansas Highway Patrol, 793 F. Supp. 279, 283 n.3 (D.Kan. 1992) ("Because the threshold requirement of establishing a constitutional violation is not met, the qualified immunity analysis necessarily terminates at this point."), aff'd, Pride v. Does, 997 F.2d 712 (10th Cir. 1993).

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Bates v. Harvey, 518 F.3d 1233, 1235 (11th Cir. 2008) ("Although we agree that Deputy Harvey deprived Mrs. Bates of her constitutional rights, we nonetheless conclude that Deputy Harvey is entitled to qualified immunity on Mrs. Bates's false arrest claim because at the time he acted, the law did not give a reasonable officer fair and clear warning that a civil commitment order does not present circumstances sufficiently exigent to excuse the warrantless entry and search of an unrelated third party's home. . . . Deputy Harvey's initial warrantless entry and search of Mrs. Bates's home was presumptively unreasonable and not justified by either the consent or exigent circumstances exceptions to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement. Therefore, his subsequent seizure and arrest of Mrs. Bates was unlawful, in violation of her constitutional rights under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. Nevertheless, we are constrained to conclude that a reasonable officer could have believed, at the time Deputy Harvey acted, that the averments in the civil commitment order about a person presenting a substantial imminent threat of danger to himself or others presented a sufficiently emergent situation, justifying the warrantless entry and search of a third party's home for that person. Because the contours of the exigent circumstances exception were not sufficiently clear, prior to this case, to give a reasonable officer fair and clear warning that a warrantless entry and search such as this one was not justified, Deputy Harvey is entitled to qualified immunity.").

McClish v. Nugent, 483 F.3d 1231, 1237, 1238, 1248, 1249 (11th Cir. 2007) ("The district court did not determine the constitutionality of Deputy Terry's actions in arresting McClish. Instead, the court avoided answering whether the arrest violated the Fourth Amendment by assuming that it did. The court then disposed of the case on the ground that the law was not clearly established. . . .However, as the Supreme Court has made abundantly clear, qualified immunity determinations may not be disposed of in this arguendo form, by first simply assuming the violation and then proceeding to address whether the law was clearly established at the time of the infraction. . . Although both qualified immunity inquiries are logically related, the two inquiries must be conducted in the proper order. We may not assume an answer to the first question in order to avoid difficult constitutional issues. . . . Having determined that Terry violated McClish's Fourth Amendment rights during the warrantless arrest, however, we must still answer whether the violation was so clearly established that Terry should be stripped of the qualified immunity customarily granted law enforcement officers engaged in the discretionary performance of their official duties. The critical inquiry is whether the law provided Deputy Terry with 'fair warning' that his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. . . We think the answer is no–the law did not provide the deputy with fair notice when the arrest occurred. . . . No Supreme Court, Eleventh Circuit, or Supreme Court of Florida cases have resolved the question whether Payton or Santana applies to the arrest of a person who, while standing firmly inside the house, opens the door in response to a knock from the police and is then pulled outside the unambiguous physical dimensions of the home. . . . While we believe that the better answer to the first question is that Deputy Terry's conduct was a violation of the Fourth Amendment, we are constrained to conclude that the unlawfulness of his conduct was not so clearly established as to justify stripping him of qualified immunity. Although we conclude that Payton set forth a bright line rule, Appellants have failed to meet their burden of demonstrating that the law was clearly established in 2001 because they have failed to demonstrate, in light of Santana, that a reasonable officer would have clearly known that McClish's arrest was unlawful.").

Baltimore v. City of Albany, Georgia, No. 02-00125 CV-WLS-1-1, 2006 WL 1582044, at *3, *5 (11th Cir. June 9, 2006) (not published) ("Here, the district court ruled that summary judgment could not be granted in favor of any of the three remaining defendants on the basis of qualified immunity because 'genuine issues of material fact' exist as to whether their conduct violated Baltimore's constitutional rights. This application of the summary judgment standard was incorrect because, in qualified immunity cases, a 'material issue of fact' never exists. As we recently explained in Robinson v. Arrugueta, 415 F.3d 1252, 1257 (11th Cir.2005), when the district court considers the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, as it must, it necessarily eliminates all issues of fact and proceeds with the 'plaintiff's best case before it.'. . . In this case, the district court failed to follow this approach in ruling on the defendants' motion for summary judgment. Instead of eliminating all material fact issues, as it should have, the court searched for disputed facts and, finding them, ruled that summary judgment could not lie. We now rectify this mistake and simply take the evidence, and the facts it establishes, in the light most favorable to Baltimore, and decide whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Even under Baltimore's 'best case scenario,' the evidence shows that Officer Long delivered a quick, surprise blow when he was not under any control or direction of Cpl. Rizer. . . As such, there is no evidence that Cpl. Rizer was individually responsible for the excessive force at issue, the blow to the head. The district court therefore erred in denying Cpl. Rizer qualified immunity."). Grayden v. Rhodes, 345 F.3d 1225, 1232 (11th Cir. 2003) ("We address the two Saucier inquiries in turn. In Part A, we evaluate the plaintiffs' procedural due process allegations in light of the balancing test established in Mathews v. Eldridge, . . .and the standard for notice set forth in Mullane . . . and conclude that the plaintiffs have alleged a violation of their right to constitutionally-adequate notice under the Fourteenth Amendment. In Part B, we examine the relevant caselaw at the time of eviction and conclude that a reasonable public official could have believed that § 30A.11 of the City Code provided constitutionally-adequate notice to the plaintiffs of their right to challenge the condemnation decision and thus that Rhodes did not violate a clearly established constitutional right.").

Smith v. Siegelman, 322 F.3d 1290, 1297, 1298 (11th Cir. 2003) ("The complaint does not at any point allege that Smith was denied any right or status other than his not being branded a child sexual abuser. Smith has not contended that he was discharged, demoted, or rejected from a job due to the information on the Registry. . . . In short, Smith has not alleged that he has suffered any loss of employment, any diminution of salary, or anything else that 'would ... qualify as Asome more tangible interest[ ]," as required by Paul.' . . . Since Smith has failed to allege the violation of a constitutional right, defendants. . . are entitled to qualified immunity on Smith's due process claim.").

Thomas v. Roberts, 261 F.3d 1160, 1169, 1171 (11th Cir. 2001) ("We therefore conclude that the alleged theft of twenty-six dollars, while certainly not insignificant in the context of a grade school, does not present such an extreme threat to school discipline or safety that children may be subject to intrusive strip searches without individualized suspicion. Because the strip searches in this case were conducted without individualized suspicion, they were not justified at their inception and were thus unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . .[However,] [i]t is . . . difficult to imagine how school officials reading T.L.O. or Vernonia would have found themselves compelled to conclude that the searches in this case were constitutionally impermissible. Although a reasonable school official might have paused before strip searching a class of fifth graders, the best she could have discovered from a reading of the available caselaw was that a court may later determine that the searches were unreasonable. We conclude that the law was not developed in such a factually defined context that the individual defendants should have been aware that they were acting illegally when they either ordered or performed the searches in question."), opinion reinstated and supplemented by Thomas v. Roberts, 323 F.3d 950 (11th Cir. 2003).

Oladeinde v. City of Birmingham, 230 F.3d 1275, 1290, 1293, 1294 (11th Cir. 2000) ("In determining whether the defense of qualified immunity is applicable, we must first consider whether the plaintiffs established facts demonstrating a deprivation of an actual constitutional or statutory right. . . . In a law enforcement agency, there is a heightened need for order, loyalty, morale and harmony, which affords a police department more latitude in responding to the speech of its officers than other government employers. . . . [A] report by Officer Fields to the district attorney of her undisclosed and unverified observations, prior to an investigation by the IAD, would have created a risk of harming the reputation and careers of two BPD officers who may not have committed any misconduct. Permitting such an injustice undoubtedly would have harmed the morale of the members of the BPD. We conclude that the plaintiffs' speech was not protected because their interest in speaking out was outweighed by the BPD's interests in maintaining order, loyalty, morale, and harmony. Because the plaintiffs have not demonstrated a violation of a right protected by the First Amendment, we need not proceed to an analysis of whether the law was clearly established. Likewise, we need not consider whether their transfers, and the failure to promote Sergeant Oladeinde were retaliatory. We conclude that Captain Walker and Chief Deutsch were entitled to the protection of the defense of qualified immunity as a matter of law. Thus, the district court erred in submitting this question to the jury . . . and in denying their renewed motions for a judgment as a matter of law.. A).

Taylor v. Adams, 221 F.3d 1254, 1257 (11th Cir. 2000) ("We begin our review of a denial of the qualified immunity by discussing 'Awhether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right at all,"' [citing Wilson] but we may ultimately decide the propriety of the denial on either of two alternative bases: first, on our answer to the question whether there is 'an underlying constitutional violation,' . . . or second, on our determination whether the law the public official is alleged to have violated was 'clearly established' at the time of incidents giving rise to the suit. . . . If either question is properly answered in the negative, then qualified immunity must be granted.").

Hartley v. Parnell, 193 F.3d 1263, 1268 (11th Cir. 1999) ("[W]e must first determine whether the facts, read in the light most favorable to Ms. Hartley, establish that Parnell's actions deprived her of any statutory or constitutional rights. If the answer is 'yes,' we must then consider whether those rights were clearly established at the time of the events in this case.").

Crosby v. Paulk, 187 F.3d 1339, 1345 (11th Cir. 1999) ("In reviewing an assertion of entitlement to qualified immunity, we 'must first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right at all.' [citing Conn, County of Sacramento, Siegert] Only if this threshold determination is surmounted do we 'proceed to determine whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.'").

Brown v. Cochran, 171 F.3d 1329, 1332, 1333 (11th Cir. 1999) ("Seigert stated that a court must first decide whether the plaintiff has presented a violation of a constitutional or statutory right. . . However, this is not an absolute rule. The Supreme Court only suggests that first deciding whether the plaintiff has established a deprivation of a constitutional right at all is the 'better approach.'. . . We follow the 'better approach,' and address first whether or not Brown has established a deprivation of a constitutional right at all.").

Cottrell v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480, 1490 (11th Cir. 1996) ("Where the absence of merit in the plaintiff's case can be readily determined at the interlocutory appeal stage, the Siegert analytical approach makes sense . . . . Although we have not considered the Siegert approach mandatory, . . . we have followed it on occasion.").

Tinney v. Shores, 77 F.3d 378, 381 (11th Cir. 1996) (per curiam) ("pplying Siegert, "we first examine whether the Tinneys have asserted a cognizable constitutional claim.").

Wooten v. Campbell, 49 F.3d 696, 699 n.3 (11th Cir. 1995) ("Our court has not specifically stated which analysis comes first–the establishment of a violation of a constitutional right or the establishment of a violation of a 'clearly established' constitutional right (readily analogized to the question: which came first, the chicken or the egg?). There are several cases in our circuit and in other circuits, however, which intimate that the first question to be answered in this analytical framework is whether the plaintiff establishes the violation of a constitutional right." [citing cases]).

Marshall v. West, No. 2:06cv701-ID, 2008 WL 2262347, at *17 (M.D. Ala. June 2, 2008) ("Having considered the totality of the circumstances, including the absence of evidence of a known threat or a crime more serious than a seatbelt violation, the court concludes that the level of force employed–a gunshot in Plaintiff's direction–was not objectively reasonable and that, therefore, Plaintiff has established a constitutional violation. . . . The court, though, cannot say that West violated Plaintiff's clearly-established constitutional rights when he discharged his weapon. The court finds that the state of the law, which as indicated from the court's discussion above, was not sufficiently developed so as to give West fair warning that he was violating Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights when on June 28, 2005, as a warning to Plaintiff, he shot a bullet into the ground six to eight feet from Plaintiff, only after repeatedly commanding, with no success, that Plaintiff 'get on the ground.'. . Accordingly, West is entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim that he used excessive force when he discharged his weapon.").

6. Courts Not Doing Saucier Analysis

D.C. CIRCUIT

Kalka v. Hawk, 215 F.3d 90, 95-98 (D.C. Cir. 2000) ("Both sides tell us we first must determine whether Kalka has alleged a constitutional violation, which depends on whether the 'humanism' to which Kalka allegedly subscribes is a 'religion' within the meaning of the First Amendment.Wilson v. Layne . . . they say, precludes us from simply assuming arguendo that Kalka's humanism is a 'religion,' and then determining whether this was clearly established. . . . The Second Circuit treats County of Sacramento, and the two cases following it–Conn and Wilson– as not always requiring federal courts to dispose of the constitutional claim before upholding a qualified immunity defense. . . We agree with the Second Circuit's conclusion but not with all of its reasoning. . . . The Second Circuit. . . refused to treat the Sacramento procedure as mandatory because: 'where there is qualified immunity, a court's assertion that a constitutional right exists would be pure dictum.' Horne, 191 F.3d at 247. One wonders. A conclusion that a constitutional right exists would be dictum if and only if it were unnecessary to the decision. But if the Sacramento line of cases requires the constitutional issue to be reached first, a lower court's resolution of that issue becomes a necessary part of its decision. The fact that the case theoretically could have been decided without deciding the constitutional question is of no moment. . . . The Second Circuit gave another reason for its reading of Wilson and Conn. Whenever the qualified immunity issue is reached–that is, whenever the constitutional issue is first decided against the official– 'the government defendants will ... have no opportunity to appeal for review of the newly declared constitutional right in the higher courts.' . . . the Second Circuit's point is that the Supreme Court surely could not have wanted newly-devised constitutional rights to be recognized at the district court level without giving federal officials any chance for appellate review. . . . [T]he Supreme Court's stated rationale for the Sacramento procedure does not pertain to all constitutional tort actions. . . . [It] has little force when injunctive relief against the official's actions is potentially available, as it will be when an alleged constitutional violation is ongoing. . . . Although the injunctive portion of this case has become moot. . . , there is still the potential that other prisoners who practice humanism may bring such suits and settle the question whether humanism (of one form or another) is a religion within the First Amendment. . . . There is still another distinction between this case and Sacramento, Conn and Wilson, perhaps more important than the ones already mentioned. Whether Kalka's humanism is a religion under the First Amendment could not be decided in the abstract. Not only discovery but also a trial may be necessary to resolve the question. . . . It thus makes no sense to say that in order to determine whether one is entitled to immunity from trial we must first hold the trial. Yet that is what we would be saying if we proceeded directly to the question whether Kalka's form of humanism constituted a religion under the First Amendment. For this and the other reasons we have mentioned, we shall therefore assume arguendo that Kalka's humanism is a 'religion,' but as we next explain, the defendants are still entitled to qualified immunity.").

FIRST CIRCUIT

Estate of Bennett v. Wainwright, 548 F.3d 155, 168, 175, 176 (1st Cir. 2008) ("The reason to favor addressing the first prong at the outset is that 'doing so assists in the development of the law on what constitutes meritorious constitutional claims.' . . However, we have noted that 'Saucier itself suggested that the law elaboration function of the first prong would be well served only in "appropriate cases."'. . This law elaboration purpose is not furthered 'where [a] Fourth Amendment inquiry involves a reasonableness question which is highly idiosyncratic and heavily dependant on the facts.' . . In such cases, we may avoid definitive determinations of the substantive constitutional claims and turn directly to the second and third prongs of the Saucier test. . . . This approach is especially prudent when it is clear that the officers are entitled to immunity based on the other prongs. . . Because we find this approach prudent on the facts before us, our analysis of the Estate's various Fourth Amendment claims will generally proceed directly to the third prong. . . . In this case, reasonable officers in Wainwright and Baker's position, faced with an armed mentally ill man, who had already shot at them once, could reasonably believe that they were faced with imminent and grave physical harm that justified resort to deadly force. . . . Since a reasonable factfinder must conclude that Bennett's shooting, while unfortunate, was not the result of plain incompetence or knowing violation of law on the part of the officers, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity under the third prong of the Saucier analysis.").

Hatfield-Bermudez v. Aldanondo-Rivera, 496 F.3d 51, 60 & n.6(1st Cir 2007) ("Given the circumstances, we bypass the standard Saucier order of inquiry, thereby freeing us to ask if Hatfield's alleged constitutional right had been clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Cf. Santana, 342 F.3d at 30 (bypassing Saucier's step one in a procedural due process case where the existence of a property right turned on an unresolved question of Puerto Rico law). . . . Indeed, the whole premise for Saucier's order of inquiry is that it helps 'set forth principles which will become the basis for a holding that a right is clearly established.' Saucier, 533 U .S. at 201. Given the context in which we face our current inquiry, our resolution of the constitutional issue would be dependent on ruling on an unclear question of Puerto Rico law. This would hardly create clearly established law for future cases.").

Tremblay v. McClellan, 350 F.3d 195, 199-201(1st Cir. 2003) ("The reason given for first addressing the alleged constitutional violation is that doing so assists in the development of the law on what constitutes meritorious constitutional claims. . . In many cases that approach is useful, especially where some novel theory is advanced. The utility of this approach, however, depends on the level of generality that is permitted in stating the constitutional right at stake. Here, for example, if the question asked is framed at the abstract level of whether a police officer may detain

a person without any cause, then the plaintiffs have stated a claim under the Fourth Amendment. But saying that does not clarify the law; it just crosses oft-tread ground. Alternatively, the question could be framed as whether it is unconstitutional for a police officer, acting under a state protective custody statute, to detain a juvenile reasonably suspected to have been drinking and walking along a highway at two in the morning with an intoxicated juvenile companion. . . . This analysis supports the constitutionality of a statute authorizing the temporary protective detention of a child when there is reasonable suspicion to believe that he or she is in immediate danger. But it does not resolve whether the detention of Jason was authorized under New Hampshire law: while there is in our view no federal constitutional bar to protective custody of a juvenile based on reasonable suspicion of immediate danger to the juvenile, the detention could still be unlawful, but not necessarily unconstitutional, if New Hampshire law required a higher level of suspicion. New Hampshire has not defined what quantum of suspicion or cause is needed to detain a juvenile under its protective custody statute. [footnote omitted] Although Saucier can be read as encouraging federal courts to decide unclear legal questions in order to clarify the law for the future, it surely did not mean to require federal courts to define and clarify unclear state statutes when this is wholly unnecessary to decide the case at hand. The plaintiffs are not contending that the U.S. Constitution compels New Hampshire to adopt a standard more stringent than reasonable suspicion for protective custody. In fact, the parties agree, as do we, that the ultimate question resolves into whether New Hampshire law authorized the officer's action based on a reasonable concern that Jason's welfare was endangered. Even were a reasonable suspicion constitutional standard clearly established in 1999 for these circumstances, the question would be whether an objectively reasonable officer in Officer McClellan's position could have understood that his actions did not violate the Fourth Amendment. This question could be considered to merge the second and third prongs of the immunity analysis. . . . On the undisputed facts, there is no doubt that a reasonable officer could have understood that his actions were authorized by the statute and constitutional. . . . Under the circumstances here, a reasonable officer could have believed that he or she was authorized to take Jason into protective custody and then to release him to his home.").

Santana v.Calderon, 342 F.3d 18, 29, 30 (1st Cir. 2003) ("The Supreme Court's 'sequential rule' in Saucier reflects a concern that if courts do not decide the constitutional right in question, the law will never become clearly established and guidelines for official conduct will not develop. However, in this case, any ruling by us on the constitutional right question would be premised on our best judgment about the application of the separation of powers doctrine in the Puerto Rico Constitution. The property right at the core of the federal constitutional allegation is dependent on an unresolved issue of Commonwealth constitutional law that can only be resolved definitively by the Puerto Rico Supreme Court. Thus, the sequential rule of Saucier may not contemplate a situation such as this. . . . Our primary responsibility in a case such as this is to see that the federal law of qualified immunity is properly applied without presuming to opine on sensitive matters of Commonwealth constitutional law in a case where it is unnecessary to disposition of the appeal, and in which our own prediction one way or the other would not alter our analysis of or decision upon the federal issue. The first step of the qualified immunity analysis–whether Santana has alleged a constitutional violation–turns on whether the Governor of Puerto Rico has the constitutional power to terminate her employment at will, despite the statute stipulating a four-year term for the position of Executive Director. Under other circumstances, we might choose to certify this issue to the Puerto Rico Supreme Court. At issue is a fundamental point of Commonwealth constitutional law on which there is no precedent. . . However, to certify at this stage of the case would cause undue delay in both the resolution of this interlocutory appeal and the progression of the case on the merits. Moreover, due to the nature of the qualified immunity analysis, such delay would be wholly unnecessary to the outcome of this interlocutory appeal. Regardless of the Puerto Rico Supreme Court's decision–whether they determined that the Governor does or does not have the power to remove the Executive Director of the HRODC at will and, accordingly, whether Santana does or does not have a property interest in her job–we would grant the defendants' qualified immunity on the ground that at the time that Santana was fired, the constitutional right in question was not clearly established and a reasonable government official could have believed that her conduct in firing Santana was lawful. Thus, the best way for us to reconcile our competing obligations of faithful application of the federal law of qualified immunity and respect for the primacy of the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico on issues arising under the Puerto Rico Constitution, is to focus on the second step of the qualified immunity analysis–the clearly established question.").

Joyce v. Town of Tewksbury, 112 F.3d 19, 23 (1st Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("There is some cost in not deciding the Fourth Amendment issue on the merits, even in the form of dictum. But the en banc court is agreed that qualified immunity applies, and there is less consensus about the underlying constitutional issue. Indeed, some members of the en banc court consider that Donovan and Budryk's entry into the Joyce home was of very doubtful legality under the Fourth Amendment. Resolution can properly await a case where the issue is decisive, as it could easily be on a suppression claim where qualified immunity does not apply.").

Doe v. Preston, 472 F.Supp.2d 16, 23-25, 28, 29 (D. Mass. 2007) ("The Supreme Court's reason for 'insisting upon turning to the existence or nonexistence of a constitutional right as the first inquiry' is that doing so will aid the 'law's elaboration from case to case,' in the course of which principles may be articulated 'which will become the basis for a holding that a right is clearly established' for similar controversies arising in the future. . . As the First Circuit has noted, however, that purpose is less likely to be achieved satisfactorily 'where the Fourth Amendment inquiry is a reasonableness question which is highly idiosyncratic and heavily dependent on the facts.' Buchanan v. Maine, 469 F.3d 158, 168 (1st Cir.2006). That is especially true where the factual determinations that need to be made involve not simply deciding what happened as a matter of historical fact–e.g., what did the police do when they arrived at the plaintiff's house, as in Buchanan, 469 F.3d at 167-68–but also involve identifying, valuing and balancing competing interests, as required by the Bell v. Wolfish test. The fine tuning of competing interests can be done most confidently after a full evidentiary hearing on the merits. Facts can be found, values can be assigned, and a balance struck, all in reference to specific and detailed findings based on the evidentiary record. At the summary judgment stage, however, disputes are likely, perhaps as to base facts, but certainly as to the relative value and balance of interests in the concrete case. In such circumstances, there are only two practical options: either judgment can be deferred until a full hearing or judgment can be made prior to that on a version of the disputed facts most favorable to the plaintiff. . . The former course is undesirable because it prevents the early determination of the question of qualified immunity. . . The second option, basing a conclusion about the existence of a constitutional right exclusively on the record in its most favorable light to the plaintiff's claim, may also be undesirable. It runs the considerable risk of basing the elaboration of constitutional principles on hypothetical cases, since it will be only the rare case where the facts found after full adjudication would mirror the plaintiff's best pretrial version. Assuming facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff is not an assessment of the realistic possibility of the plaintiff's proving those facts, and not uncommonly a plaintiff who has had the benefit of a particular factual assumption in her favor at the summary judgment stage will fail to establish that fact by her proof at trial. Making constitutional pronouncements on facts that are not tested by proof, and are not even required to be shown to be reasonably likely to be true, is not a very sound method for elaborating new constitutional principles. In this case, we have the circumstance identified by the First Circuit in Buchanan: 'Given the complexity of the matter, and since it is perfectly clear that the officers are entitled to immunity, we turn to the second and third prongs [of the qualified immunity test].' 469 F.3d at 168. And so, I turn to those prongs: was it clearly established that the strip search policy complained of by the plaintiff was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment, and would an objectively reasonable state official in the position of the defendants have known that adopting and promulgating the DYS policy at issue violated that clearly established law? . . . . No First Circuit case has yet addressed the question of routine, suspicionless strip searches of juveniles committed to state custody. . . . So far as our and the parties' research indicates, no circuit had considered strip searches in a juvenile detention facility at the time the defendants promulgated and implemented the policy at issue here. Since then, some appellate courts have addressed the issue of routine strip searches in juvenile detention settings but, notably, those courts have commented on the novelty of the legal issues presented. . . . I conclude that the context of an adult arrested for a minor offense, as in Roberts and Swain, is sufficiently distinct from the context of a juvenile detained pending trial in a secure DYS facility that, at the very least, the Bell v. Wolfish balancing would have to be done independently for the juvenile case, with the consequence that its outcome could not be predicted to be necessarily the same as in the prior cases decided on different facts. . . Again, the present question is not whether those differences warrant a different balancing in this case than in the prior ones, but rather whether objective persons in the defendants' positions could reasonably have thought so and thus would not have understood that their actions in promulgating and implementing the policy violated a clearly established principle of constitutional law. In sum, decisions concerning the lawfulness of strip searches of persons in custody have been divergent, with the determining factors often relating to the specific kind of facility and the particular characteristics of the searched individual. . . . Whatever the ultimate judgment about the constitutionality of the DYS strip search policy, an objective person in the defendants' position, aware of the decided cases pertinent to the question, could reasonably have thought that the DYS policy did not violate the Fourth Amendment. For this reason, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from damages under § 1983, and their motion for summary judgment on that basis should be allowed.").

SECOND CIRCUIT

Vives v. City of New York* (Vives II), 405 F.3d 115, 118 & n.7 (2d Cir. 2005) (as amended) ("[W]e hold that defendants did not have fair notice of section 240.30(1)'s purported unconstitutionality and that the District Court erred in denying Detectives Li and Lu qualified immunity on that ground. Because we hold that the District Court's denial of qualified immunity to defendants was improper, we do not reach the question of whether New York Penal Law ' 240.30(1) survives constitutional scrutiny, but save that question for another day. . . . Although the constitutionality of section 240.30(1) was not properly presented to us, Judge Cardamone takes issue with our decision not to address the penal provision's constitutionality. We do not reach the constitutional question because we are reluctant to pass on the issue in dicta and because the parties did not genuinely dispute the constitutionality of section 240.30(1) either in the District Court or on appeal.").

Vives v. City of New York* (Vives II), 405 F.3d 115, 119-24 (2d Cir. 2005) (as amended) (Cardamone, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I respectfully depart from the majority insofar as it does not address the constitutionality of ' 240.30(1). . . . The majority passes over [Saucier's] preliminary inquiry, holding instead that the 'fair notice' prong of the test is not met and from that concluding that there is no need to reach the constitutional question. Saucier precludes this approach. Finding a constitutional violation is a prerequisite to reaching the fair notice issue, and answering the constitutional question is therefore '[ ]necessary to the disposition of the case.' . . . The majority states no rationale for deciding that Saucier is inapplicable. Instead, it relies solely on the Horne factors as a reason to disregard Saucier, an approach that we explicitly rejected in Ehrlich. . . . The majority rests its decision on the avoidance of 'constitutional dicta.' Under Ehrlich, this is not, in itself, a sufficient ground for disregarding Saucier. Even if it were, however, it provides no justification for avoiding the constitutional question in this case. In cases in which we ultimately resolve the issue in favor of defendants on qualified immunity grounds, any finding of a constitutional violation is dicta. As we noted in Ehrlich, however, 'the Supreme Court, by the very logic of Saucier, makes clear that such dicta is enough to put defendant state actors on notice that, if they repeat their acts, they will not have the benefit of qualified immunity.' Ehrlich, 348 F.3d at 56 n. 11. I believe this principle carries added weight in a case where, as here, state courts have placed the imprimatur of legitimacy on an arguable violation of the federal Constitution, and thus if a federal court does not step in and inform state actors that the law violates the federal Constitution, state law enforcement officers will continue to be placed in the same impossible position as the defendants in this case: they will have a duty to enforce a law that violates core federal constitutional rights because state courts have told them that the law is valid. . . . The Horne majority raised another objection to constitutional dicta that is more substantial. When we find a constitutional violation, but then find that the defendants are protected by qualified immunity, the defendants have no opportunity to appeal the constitutional issue because they won on qualified immunity. . . This scenario is, of course, an inescapable result of the sequential order of the Saucier inquiry, and since we cannot both follow Saucier and avoid this problem, we must assume the Supreme Court anticipated this result and was not troubled by it. In any event, if the plaintiff appeals this Court's qualified immunity ruling, there is no reason to believe that the Supreme Court would not review the constitutional issue, since doing so is the first step in analyzing any qualified immunity claim. . . As the Supreme Court will have ample opportunity to review our constitutional decision if plaintiff appeals our decision, the expressed concern over constitutional dicta is to my mind unavailing in the present case, especially since the majority failed to articulate any reason why Saucier should not apply. . . . In Ehrlich, we stated that '[w]e are, of course, bound to implement [Saucier], and fully expect to do so in the vast majority of qualified immunity cases that come before us.'. . The majority's treatment of Saucier in this case demonstrates how far we have deviated from *Ehrlich'*s narrow language. Perhaps our responsibilities were less burdensome under Horne and other pre-Saucier cases, but I am troubled by a decision that seeks to avoid the difficult questions that the Supreme Court has obligated us to face. For whatever reason, New York's courts have shown no inclination to hold that ' 240.30(1) violates the First Amendment insofar as it criminalizes speech that is merely annoying or alarming, and New York police continue to enforce the statute to the detriment of citizens' core First Amendment rights. Accordingly, for the reasons stated, I concur with the majority's resolution of the qualified immunity issue, but respectfully dissent from its refusal to reach the constitutional issue and, once and for all, hold ' 240.30(1) unconstitutional.")

Erlich v. Town of Glastonbury, 348 F.3d 48, 56-60 (2d Cir. 2003) ("In Saucier, the Supreme Court made plain that a sequential two-step analysis of qualified immunity claims is not simply recommended but required. We are, of course, bound to implement that decision, and fully expect to do so in the vast majority of qualified immunity cases that come before us. . . But this does not mean that Horne's principles are no longer relevant to qualified immunity analysis, in those situations in which one can conclude that the Supreme Court did not intend to make the Saucier sequence mandatory. . . . Moving directly to the immunity question will frequently be appropriate when the existence of a constitutional violation depends on the resolution of uncertain state law. That is the case here. Whether or not Ms. Ehrlich's rights were violated depends, substantially, on how Connecticut defines the rights of a conservator vis-a-vis the property of his ward, and this question, as we have seen, is not settled in Connecticut. . . . we believe we are more faithful to the underlying aim of Saucier by declining to make a constitutional determination at the first stage of the inquiry–where that determination, based on an interpretation of ambiguous state law, is provisional only and subject to reversal as a result of subsequent state court rulings–than by following the Saucier sequence. Accordingly, this is the course we have chosen to take here.")

African Trade & Information Center, Inc. v. Abromaitis, 294 F.3d 355, 359, 360 (2d Cir. 2002) ("We may, in an appropriate case, decline to rule on the question whether an asserted right exists where, as here, we conclude that it was not clearly established at the relevant time. This is such a case. As discussed below, it squarely raises an issue that was expressly reserved by the Supreme Court in Board of County Commissioners v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668 (1996): whether applicants for new government contracts who have no pre-existing commercial relationship with the government are protected by the First Amendment from retaliation based on speech. However, the merits of this issue are scarcely mentioned in the briefs on appeal, let alone adequately briefed. Plaintiffs' brief, which devotes barely more than a page to the issue, simply assumes the point, and cites none of the various Supreme Court decisions on which the right they assert would be based. This cursory briefing would make it 'all the more perilous' for us to render an advisory opinion on the issue. . . Moreover, the issue is not likely to evade judicial review if we do not address it now. . . Indeed, if standing objections can be met, the issue might be addressed in this very case on remand, as plaintiffs seek injunctive relief as well, and qualified immunity is not a defense when such relief is sought. . . Accordingly, we think the more prudent approach in the circumstances of this case is to refrain from deciding whether the asserted right exists.").

Koch v. Town of Brattleboro, 287 F.3d 162, 165-68 (2d Cir. 2002) ("When determining whether a public official is entitled to qualified immunity, we ordinarily begin with a two-step test. . . First, we determine whether a constitutional right was violated. . . Then, we determine whether that right was 'clearly established.' . . . Although we normally apply this two-step test, where we are convinced that the purported constitutional right violated is not 'clearly established,' we retain the discretion to refrain from determining whether, under the first step of the test, a constitutional right was violated at all. . . In such an instance, we may rely exclusively on qualified immunity to decide a case. . . This procedure avoids the undesirable practice of unnecessarily adjudicating constitutional matters. . . The principle concern directing us to decide the constitutional issue, however, is the 'likelihood that the question will escape federal court review over a lengthy period' because federal courts will repeatedly rely on qualified immunity to decide cases. . . Were this to happen, the right would never be 'clearly established' because courts would habitually avoid the question. . . Here, there is little chance that any unsettled constitutional issues raised will escape federal review for long. The facts of this case are not ones that only occur in § 1983 cases. More often, they will be litigated during a motion to suppress in a criminal trial. At such a time, the court will not be able to avoid deciding the constitutional questions raised in this case. Therefore, where appropriate, we refrain from determining whether Koch's Fourth Amendment rights were violated. On such issues, summary judgment was appropriate for the Defendant-officers because Koch cannot point to the existence of a 'clearly established' right. . . . It is unsettled whether the Fourth Amendment allows the police to remain in a home over the objections of the primary occupant when they enter pursuant to the reasonable belief that a third party, whom the police know has lesser authority over the premises than the primary occupant, has consented to their entry. Therefore, Koch cannot point to a 'clearly established right' that was violated. As such, we find it unnecessary to decide, as the district court did, whether the officers violated Koch's Fourth Amendment rights. Instead, we explain both arguments only to show the ambiguity in the law and affirm the grant of summary judgment because the officers were entitled to qualified immunity.")

Vega v. Miller, 273 F.3d 460, 468, 471 (2d Cir. 2001) ("Since this episode occurred seven years ago and involves a highly unusual set of circumstances, unlikely to be repeated, we see no reason to rule definitively on whether the Defendants' action was unlawful. For purposes of the pending appeal, we rule only that on the state of the law in 1994, the Defendants could reasonably believe that in disciplining Vega for not exercising professional judgment to terminate the episode, they were not violating his clearly established First Amendment academic freedom rights. . . . . We do not decide whether termination of Vega's employment was an appropriate response to his allowing the classroom exercise to get out of hand, or whether some lesser sanction might have been sufficient. The issue for us is whether, on the undisputed facts of what occurred, the defendants are entitled to the defense of qualified immunity from his claims against them for money damages.").

Mollica v. Volker, 229 F.3d 366, 372 (2d Cir. 2000) ("The concerns we discussed in Horne counseling against the articulation of constitutional rights in dictum apply forcefully to the case before us. Determining the constitutionality of Volker's checkpoint would require resolution of a complex constitutional question by balancing the factors determining the reasonableness of a checkpoint, where not all factors clearly point in the same direction. Traditional principles of restraint counsel against unnecessary adjudication of this complex constitutional question. . . . Given the scant record before us (as is common in appeals from summary judgment based on qualified immunity), we are faced with three possible courses of action: (1) reach out on an inadequate record to announce a view, in dictum, on a constitutional question whose resolution is unnecessary to decide the case, (2) remand to the district court and direct the district court to require the parties to participate in further proceedings that will have no bearing on the result of their case, or (3) decline to express a view on the underlying constitutional question since we lack adequate information to do so. We think it clear that the third option is the preferable one. We do not read the Supreme Court's precedents as to the contrary. Without doubt there are circumstances that strongly favor the course of action suggested in footnote five of Sacramento. . . . But there are others that do not. We conclude that Volker is entitled to qualified immunity and do not reach out to answer whether Volker's checkpoint was constitutional.").

Charles W. v. Maul, 214 F.3d 350, 357, 358, 360 (2d Cir. 2000) ("We acknowledge that the Court should not determine the existence of the constitutional right alleged if the question could be decided in proceedings in which qualified immunity is not a defense. See Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244, 250 (2d Cir.1999).. . . . We must decide whether this alleged due process right exists before reaching the issue of qualified immunity because McGhie's due process claim presents a question that is unlikely to be reviewed in a proceeding in which qualified immunity is not a defense, such as an action for . . . . [With respect to the equal protection claim,] [t]he district court decided the qualified immunity question before reaching the underlying constitutional issue. This approach was correct in light of Horne, 191 F.3d 244. Unlike McGhie's due process claim, his equal protection claim could have been reviewed by way of a habeas corpus petition or an action for an injunction–proceedings in which qualified immunity is not a defense.").

Sound Aircraft Services, Inc. v. Town of East Hampton, 192 F.3d 329, 334, 335 (2d Cir. 1999) ("If the district court deems it appropriate, it may first 'determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right at all, and if so, proceed to determine whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.' [citing Wilson v. Layne] . . . . If the threshold determination reveals a possible constitutional violation, the court should then assess whether the law violated was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. If the district court decides to proceed in this manner, it should insist on a full briefing of the constitutional issues by the parties.").

Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244, 248-50 (2d Cir. 1999) ("We recognize that since Sacramento, the Supreme Court has twice stated that, where the defendant raises qualified immunity as a defense, a court 'must first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right at all, and if so, proceed to determine whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.' [citing Wilson and Conn] However, Wilson and Conn both relied on Sacramento, and neither purported to abandon the measured position adopted in that decision. The opinions in Wilson and Conn were both also joined by Justice Breyer, who expressly stated in Sacramento that courts need not invariably decide the merits before reaching qualified immunity. And, as described below, both cases also provided sound reasons for reaching the merits. We do not understand Wilson and Conn, to have, intentionally but without explanation, abandoned the carefully modulated position taken in Sacramento and adopted instead a rigid rule requiring federal courts to express advisory constitutional opinions in every case governed by qualified immunity. . . . Because the constitutional question in this case is easily amenable to adjudication in a suit for injunctive relief by any adversely affected prisoner, and because this does not represent an instance of egregious, outrageous conduct, we reaffirm our decision to rely on the lack of clearly established law to dismiss Horne's action on grounds of qualified immunity.").

Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244, 251, 252, 254 (2d Cir. 1999) (Cardamone, J., dissenting) ("In sum, I understand footnote five in Sacramento to hold as follows: A federal court faced with a suit alleging the deprivation of a constitutional right under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 should ordinarily decide whether the constitutional right alleged by the plaintiff actually exists, even where the defense of qualified immunity might provide an alternative ground for decision. Although this principle need not govern in each and every case, it is undoubtedly the '[n]ormal[ ]' rule and the 'better approach' to constitutional adjudication in § 1983 litigation. Moreover, neither the policy of avoidance of constitutional questions nor the remote possibility of clarifying the law in later suits for injunctive relief justifies a departure from this general principle. . . . I would defer to the Sacramento Court's statement, reiterated by the Conn and Wilson Courts, that the better approach in § 1983 litigation is first to decide whether the asserted constitutional right exists and only then to determine whether the right was clearly established. While we need not resolve whether Conn and Wilson foreclose all exceptions to this principle, the Supreme Court's formulation of the principle as a general rule couched in mandatory language requires, at the very least, that a court articulate some persuasive reason to justify its departure from this approach in a given case.").

Wilkinson v. Russell, 182 F.3d 89, 110-13 (2d Cir. 1999) (Calabresi, J., concurring) ("I write separately because I am troubled by the court's holding that we can, as a matter of law, say that Thomas Wilkinson's constitutional rights were not violated by the SRS investigation. Since, however, the unreasonableness of a probe like the one conducted in this case was not clearly established when Wilkinson was falsely labeled a child abuser and deprived of his children, qualified immunity applies and suffices to support the court's judgment. Relying on a line of recent Supreme Court decisions that stem from Footnote Five of County of Sacramento v. Lewis, . . . the majority argues that it is appropriate to separate the discussion of whether Wilkinson's rights were violated from the question of whether those rights, even if infringed, were clearly established at the time the SRS investigation occurred. . . To accomplish this feat, the majority necessarily engages in a 'dual reasonableness' analysis and considers first whether the conduct of the SRS officials was so unreasonable that it violated Wilkinson's parental rights, and then whether, even if Wilkinson's rights were infringed, the SRS officials could reasonably believe that they were not violating his rights and therefore still benefit from qualified immunity. I am skeptical that reasonableness can remain a coherent standard when it is piled layer upon layer in this fashion. On the other hand, I do believe that the majority's effort to identify when a child abuse investigation goes beyond the constitutional pale is admirable, and so I would be inclined to adopt the majority's framework despite my doubts as to whether this kind of analysis can be pulled off successfully. My reason for not joining the majority's opinion derives instead from a different uncertainty, one based on the facts of the case. . . . I believe instead that the reasonableness of Adams' reliance on the doctor's conclusion was, on the facts before us, a jury question (or would have been but for the existence of qualified immunity). . . . [W]e are all in agreement that, whether or not a constitutional violation occurred, the defendants are still entitled to qualified immunity because the law in this area was not clearly established at the time the SRS investigation took place. In one sense, therefore, it does not matter whether the majority or I read the facts correctly, since the entire discussion of the scope of Wilkinson's parental right is, necessarily, dicta. Indeed, all statements about constitutional rights made in the Sacramento framework (i.e., where qualified immunity exists notwithstanding the violation of a right since the right was not clearly established at the time the conduct allegedly occurred) are dicta . . . and hence provisional only. The significance of such Sacramento statements must rest, therefore, not in ultimately determining what are or are not constitutional rights . . . . The importance of defining rights provisionally in a Sacramento context lies elsewhere. Its function is to place government officials on notice that they ignore such 'probable' rights at their peril. The Supreme Court, moreover, said as much when it told the lower courts to issue dicta declaring that certain conduct violates a fundamental right in order to 'promote[ ] clarity in the legal standards for official conduct.' [citing Wilson] Footnote Five of Sacramento, as expounded in Wilson, stands for the proposition that lucid and unambiguous dicta concerning the existence of a constitutional right can without more make that right 'clearly established' for purposes of a qualified immunity analysis. . . As the High Court has told us, the thrust of Sacramento is to keep the existence of qualified immunity from preventing the clarification of constitutional rights. By providing that the first statement about a given right will usually be in dicta that is explicit enough to put state actors on notice, . . .Sacramento creates a situation in which the next time that particular right is alleged, qualified immunity will not be a defense. On that occasion, the court will therefore face the ultimate questions about the existence and scope of the right that is being contested. The court may then decide to back down from the prior dicta about the right, or it may instead establish that right by turning the prior dicta into a holding. Either way, however, by permitting a subsequent court (and often a second panel of the same court of appeals) to take up a constitutional right in the absence of a qualified immunity defense, Sacramento increases the probability that the courts of appeals will receive full briefings and arguments before making final decisions on important constitutional issues. . . It goes without saying that dicta from a prior panel concerning a constitutional right deserves respect. It certainly ranks with holdings from other circuits. Nevertheless, it is not binding, and therein lies its unusual significance in the constitutional scheme. The majority today finds no violation of a constitutional right. And yet in doing so it draws a line beyond which it means for state actors to operate at their peril. That line is, of course, asserted in dicta. But, in a Sacramento context, it is dicta that cannot casually be ignored.").

Severino v. Negron, 996 F.2d 1439, 1441 (2d Cir. 1993) ("If we were to rule today on the due process question, we likely would hold that a violation has occurred . . . . We do not need to rule definitively on the constitutional question, however, because even if there were a violation of due process, the appellee officials would be protected by qualified immunity.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

Egolf v. Witmer, 526 F.3d 104, 109-12 (3d Cir. 2008) ("Although Saucier requires that courts engage a two-tiered analysis that first examines whether a constitutional violation exists, we must approach this framework in a manner that is consistent with its purpose. As Saucier clearly explains, the underlying principle of first requiring constitutional analysis is to advance the elaboration of the law to give state actors better guidance on the parameters of constitutional violations. . . This principle guides our resolution of this case. Although the District Court thoroughly reviewed the First and Fourth Amendment claims, it found that the state law questions underlying the constitutional issues were ones of first impression for the state courts. . .Accordingly, in both claims of constitutional violations the District Court's analysis relied upon its prediction of how the Pennsylvania courts would rule if this case was before them. . .We find such cases to be exceptions to the constitutional analysis requirement of Saucier, because the purpose of Saucier would be undermined. . . . . In concluding that we will not analyze the First or Fourth Amendment issues in this case, we find a decision of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to be persuasive in reasoning that the underlying principle of law elaboration is not meaningfully advanced in situations, such as this, when the definition of constitutional rights depends on a federal court's uncertain assumptions about state law. Ehrlich v. Town of Glastonbury, 348 F.3d 48, 55-58 (2d Cir.2003); See also Robinette v. Jones, 476 F.3d 585, 592 n. 8 (8th Cir.2007). We agree that, in cases such as this, federal courts do a disservice to state actors who would be induced to rely on a ruling that might change altogether upon subsequent review by the state court. . . Our position is bolstered by the fact that, even if we were to find constitutional rights violations we are convinced that such rights were not clearly established. . . . Here, even if we assume that the police violated the protesters' rights under the First and Fourth Amendments by arresting them, we are mindful that the circumstances were quite unusual. . . . [T]he choice that the protesters made to portray this particular image [Abu Ghraib] generates a question that would have been difficult to assess on the scene: whether the depiction of an inherently sexually offensive image is any less shocking simply because people recreate it as a protest. While we can rationalize from our vantage point that the scene created by the protesters might be distinguishable from the original image, the objective on-the-scene perspective required of us in this qualified immunity review inexorably mires such contrasts. For these reasons, we conclude that there is ample evidence that this event was precisely the type of scene envisaged in Saucier, where an officer in the field must make 'split second judgments–in circumstances that are tense, uncertain and rapidly evolving.'. . This situation demanded an instantaneous, finely calibrated judgment in response to a disturbance that arose amid circumstances that were undeniably unique, surprising, confusing and charged. It was plainly one in which the parameters of probable cause were confusing and the boundaries of free speech were quite muddled. . . As a result, we cannot characterize the officers' actions, for purposes of qualified immunity, as either incompetent or as willful violations of the law. For these reasons, we conclude that, even if the officers' decision to arrest the protesters was mistaken, it was a reasonable mistake in the context in which it occurred. We do not find error in the District Court's grant of qualified immunity to the police.").

Egolf v. Witmer, 526 F.3d 104, 112-14 (3d Cir. 2008) (Smith, J., concurring) ("Like the majority, I conclude that we should affirm the District Court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the State Troopers. I write separately, however, because I believe the constraints of Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), compel a different analytical path. . . . The majority acknowledges that 'Saucier requires that courts engage a two-tiered analysis that first examines whether a constitutional violation exists.' Yet, the majority declines to follow this mandate because it finds that doing so in this case would not accomplish Saucier's purpose. It may be that the Supreme Court will return to its pre-Saucier jurisprudence, where determining first whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right is considered only the 'better approach.' . . For now, however, I regard the Saucier rule as mandatory and do not believe that inferior courts are free to depart from it. . . . Because I conclude that, on the facts alleged, the Troopers' conduct did not violate the Plaintiffs' constitutional rights, my analytical course would not require that we reach the question of qualified immunity.").

Carswell v. Borough of Homestead, 381 F.3d 235, 240, 421 (3d Cir. 2004) ("Our appellate review of a Rule 50 ruling is plenary and is similar to that in a summary judgment appeal. We review the record as would a District Court. This scope of appellate review places us in the same position as the District Court with respect to the admonition in Siegert v. Gilley, 500 U.S. 226 (1991) and Saucier to decide the constitutional issue before considering qualified immunity. . . It is quite understandable that the trial judge was hesitant to rule that a constitutional violation had occurred on the facts in the record at that point when the qualified immunity issue offered a more sure-footed disposition of the Rule 50 motion. Here, unlike Saucier and Siegert, the case had already been in trial for a week. Consequently, Snyder had already lost much of the benefit of qualified immunity - freedom from trial. . . It is preferable to resolve the qualified immunity issue at the summary judgment, or earlier, stage, but if this is not possible, it remains appropriate to consider the matter in a Rule 50(a) motion. . . . We believe that the circumstances here, however, are sufficiently unlike those in Saucier and Siegert that we may proceed directly to the qualified immunity issue without ruling preliminarily on the constitutional violation claim. . . We are hesitant to hold that the jury could find excessive force based on the record here. It appears to us that without the testimony of Dr. McCauley, the plaintiff failed to establish a constitutional violation. . . We have serious doubts about the admissibility of his opinion that Snyder should not have drawn his gun based on the expert's assumption that the officer knew the husband was unarmed. . . . Accordingly, we assume, but do not decide, that plaintiff established a Fourth Amendment constitutional violation and proceed to the immunity issue.").

Acierno v. Cloutier, 40 F.3d 597, 606 n.7 (3d Cir. 1994) (en banc) ("The Supreme Court's majority opinion in Siegert, when read as a whole, seems to suggest that where practicable or expedient an appellate court should first address whether the plaintiff has alleged a cognizable constitutional claim at all, before turning to the question of whether the constitutional right asserted was 'clearly established' at the time the defendant acted. [cite omitted] In fact, we have emphasized this aspect of the Siegert decision in a subsequent case where we decided to address all plaintiffs' allegations of constitutional error as a predicate question to whether the constitutional rights were 'clearly established' at the time the defendant acted. . .Nevertheless, concurring in the judgment in Siegert, Justice Kennedy recognized that in certain cases . . . it is an 'altogether normal procedure' for the court of appeals to decide the case 'on the ground that appear[s] to offer the most direct and appropriate resolution,' . . . which in difficult constitutional cases will sometimes be whether the constitutional right was 'clearly established' at the time the defendant acted. Furthermore, the majority opinion in Siegert does not state that courts of appeals must always as an initial inquiry address whether a constitutional violation has been alleged by the plaintiff. . . . In cases such as the present one, where the court would be required to undertake a detailed analysis of unreported and undeveloped state and county law issues in order to determine whether a cognizable constitutional claim was alleged at all, we believe a more prudent course is to first address whether the constitutional right asserted by the plaintiff was 'clearly established' at the time the defendant acted. We will follow such a course in this case because . . . the state and county law issues which we would need to decide in order to determine whether Acierno possessed a vested right to develop his commercial property before the rezoning ordinances were passed are particularly difficult and undeveloped.").

Giuffre v. Bissell, 31 F.3d 1241, 1255 (3d Cir. 1994) ("Where appropriate, we may consider whether the constitutional rights asserted by Giuffre were 'clearly established' at the time the individual officials acted, without initially deciding whether a constitutional violation was alleged at all." citing Acierno).

Kulwicki v. Dawson, 969 F.2d 1454, 1462 (3d Cir. 1992) (on review of denial of 12(b)(6) motion based on qualified immunity, "...we are concerned neither with the accuracy of the facts alleged nor the adequacy of [the] underlying claim, [cite omitted]; our only duty is to construe the facts in the manner most favorable to [plaintiff], in order to determine whether the official behavior he describes falls outside the cloak of official immunity.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Pittman v. Nelms, 87 F.3d 116, 118-19 & n.2 (4th Cir. 1996) ("A qualified immunity case must develop through two primary levels. The first does not involve immunity at all, but focuses on the merits of the plaintiff's claim–whether the defendant's conduct violated a constitutional right of the plaintiff. It includes the factual issue of what actually happened . . . and the legal question of whether the defendant's actions were unconstitutional. . .Only if the defendant did act illegally must the case proceed to the second level to determine whether he is, nevertheless, immune from suit. . . . When a court addresses qualified immunity in the summary judgment context, it can condense its analysis. As with any motion for summary judgment, it must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmovant, so it need not make factual findings. Nor must it determine directly whether the plaintiff's evidence indicates a constitutional violation. Instead it can combine the second prong of the constitutional inquiry and the first prong of the immunity inquiry by asking whether the plaintiff has 'allege[d] the violation of a clearly established constitutional right.'. . The hybrid inquiry of whether the plaintiff has 'allege[d] the violation of a clearly established constitutional right,'. . . is an easier question than whether there was a violation at all. It is useful, therefore, when a court is determining whether a defendant should be burdened by a trial, or when the law is unclear. But it invokes immunity prematurely if the facts indicate no constitutional violation, clearly established or otherwise.").

Torcasio v. Murray, 57 F.3d 1340, 1352 (4th Cir. 1995) ("[W]e conclude that, although the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act were both in effect at the time of the alleged violations, it was not then clearly established that either statute applied to state prisons. We suspect that the district court reached the opposite, erroneous conclusion because of the order in which the court addressed the defenses raised by the VDOC officials. Rather than begin with the prison officials' claim that they were entitled to qualified immunity because the applicability of the acts to state prisons was not clearly established, the court first considered their defense that the acts do not apply to state prisoners. In a recent decision of this court, we reminded district courts that they are to consider as a threshold matter whether officials in a given case are entitled to qualified immunity, and move on to other issues only after concluding that the officials are not. [citing DiMeglio] This case illustrates the dangers of not adhering to this analytical sequence, for we cannot help but suspect that the court's conclusion that it was clearly established that the acts applied to prisons was heavily influenced by its earlier conclusion that the acts today apply to prisons.").

Dimeglio v. Haines, 45 F.3d 790, 795-99 (4th Cir. 1995) ("Although the Supreme Court's decision in Siegert . . . has generated significant confusion, that case did not, contrary to the view of almost every court, effect a fundamental change in this analytical framework for deciding whether an official is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Siegert did not mandate that courts determine, as a part of the qualified immunity analysis, whether the plaintiff has stated a claim upon which relief can be granted in a Rule 12(b)(6) sense. It did not direct courts to decide, independent of and prior to addressing a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity, whether a plaintiff has stated a claim upon which relief can be granted. Nor did it require that courts decide the merits of the constitutional claim. . . . Siegert simply reaffirmed that a court reviewing a qualified immunity defense should assess, before anything else, whether the alleged conduct violated law clearly established at the time the conduct occurred. . . . That current law has no application to the specific question of qualified immunity is not to say that courts should be foreclosed from conducting a Rule 12(b)(6) or . . . a summary judgment inquiry, independent of the qualified immunity defense. In many cases where a defendant has asserted qualified immunity, dismissal or even an award of summary judgment may be obviously warranted, based upon existing law, without the court ever ruling on the qualified immunity question.").

Hodge v. Jones, 31 F.3d 157, 169 (4th Cir. 1994) (Powell, Associate Justice, concurring in the judgment) ("Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from civil monetary damages if their conduct did not violate the [plaintiffs'] clearly established federal statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known ... In deciding this question, the Court may, in the exercise of its discretion, reach the merits of the underlying constitutional question at issue ... I prefer not to reach them .... [E]ven assuming that Defendants' actions infringed a constitutionally protected liberty interest, such interest was not clearly established at the time of Defendants' conduct.").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Wooley v. City of Baton Rouge, 211 F.3d 913, 923 (5th Cir. 2000) ("Wooley and Jordan contend that under the rubrics of the foregoing cases the emotional ties between a minor and an unrelated adult care giver can create a liberty interest vis-a-vis the child's biological grandparents when the relationship is countenanced by the child's natural mother. They thus contend that under the circumstances here presented Wooley and Jordan shared a fourteenth amendment protected expectation that the state would not interfere in their relationship. However persuasive this contention ultimately may be, we need not definitively resolve it here, for it is indisputable that, at the time of the events in question, no such fourteenth amendment right could be described as clearly established.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Frierson v. Goetz, No. 02-6522, 2004 WL 1152172, at *5 (6th Cir. May 19, 2004) (unpublished) ("Because we have not been presented with enough facts in this case to decide this novel issue concerning privacy expectations in cordless phones, we can only conclude that plaintiff has attempted to allege a constitutional violation. We are unable to conclude, as a matter of law, that the interception of a cordless telephone, in the circumstances alleged, violated the Fourth Amendment. We find no cases that would, in such novel situations, require us to answer conclusively the constitutional question as a matter of law before proceeding to steps two and three [of the qualified immunity analysis]. The answer is clear, however, when we turn to the questions of whether the alleged constitutional violation was 'clearly established' at the time it occurred and whether a reasonable person in defendant's position would have known that his actions violated clearly established rights. . . . The right to privacy in using a cordless phone is not 'clearly established.' As explained above, prior to the amendment to the Federal Wiretap Law in 1994 to cover cordless phones, courts uniformly held that cordless telephone users did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in their phone conversations under the Fourth Amendment. . . .To date neither the Supreme Court nor the Sixth Circuit has specifically addressed whether a reasonable expectation of privacy exists under the Fourth Amendment for cordless telephone communications. We therefore agree with the district court that the law is not 'clearly established' that users of cordless phones have a reasonable expectation of privacy under the Fourth Amendment.").

Potts v. Hill, 77 F. App'x 330, 337 (6th Cir. 2003) (unpublished) ("Recognizing that there is a split among Ohio Courts of Appeals, we cannot predict whether the Ohio Supreme Court would hold that, as a matter of law, the first knife was or was not 'concealed' under Ohio Rev.Code 2923.12("). . . We do not decide this issue in the present case because, as explained in the next section, we believe that defendant acted as any reasonable officer would and that he did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. . . . Assuming arguendo that a constitutional violation did occur, we now examine whether defendant is entitled to a qualified immunity defense. . . .As discussed above, whether plaintiff's constitutional rights were violated is an open question since the Ohio courts have simply failed to provide its police officers with adequate guidance in this area of law. . . .It does not appear that the State of Ohio had definitively resolved the question of partially concealed weapons even in the decisions made after the search here, let alone at the time of the arrest. Therefore, since plaintiff cannot even now prove that the narrower definition of 'concealed' weapons in Ohio is 'clearly established,'. . .it is beyond doubt that defendant is shielded from any liability by the theory of 'qualified immunity' for his conduct in 1996. He neither was 'plainly incompetent,' nor did he 'knowingly violate the law.'").

Cherrington v. Skeeter, 344 F.3d 631, 640 (6th Cir. 2003) ("[I]t ultimately is unnecessary for us to decide whether the individual Defendants did or did not heed the Fourth Amendment command of reasonableness in their conduct toward Daija King, because they are entitled to qualified immunity in any event. . . . As is evident from our foregoing discussion, the pre-existing law is silent on the lawfulness of keeping a young child with her mother while the latter is placed under arrest and held in custody at a location other than a traditional detention facility. If the Defendant officers had scoured the case law at the time (or even to this day), they could not have located a decision indicating that Daija King's Fourth Amendment rights might be violated if she were taken with her mother to a hotel for about a 24-hour period while Mary Cherrington cooperated with the authorities by attempting to arrange drug purchases. Rather, the most closely analogous case, Matheny, leads to the opposite conclusion. Under these circumstances, the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, because the law did not (and still does not) 'clearly proscribe[]' the actions they took.").

Virgili v. Gilbert, 272 F.3d 391, 394 (6th Cir. 2001) ("We need not, and do not, opine on the Fourth Amendment standard to be applied to strip-searches of prison employees. We conclude merely that the standard to be applied to such searches was not clearly established in this circuit in 1999. In conclusion, we note that ample opportunities exist to establish that standard via other means, for example through actions for declaratory or injunctive relief.").

Williams v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 24 F.3d 1526, 1542 (6th Cir. 1994) ("We have resolved the qualified immunity issue without addressing whether there was actually a due process violation. We merely held that Williams could not recover monetary damages against defendants in their individual capacities because it was not clearly established at the time of Williams' demotion that failing to provide predemotion notice and hearing would violate Williams' due process rights. In this case, our holding on qualified immunity has nothing to do with the merits of the due process claim.").

Long v. Norris, 929 F.2d 1111 (6th Cir. 1991) ("We need not define in this case precisely what level of individualized suspicion is required in the context of prison visitor searches....The question before the court is not whether the proper standard should be reasonable suspicion...or probable cause...but whether the right to be free from a strip search absent probable cause was clearly established at the time of the conduct ....").

Binkowski v. Family & Children's Services Agency, 39 F. Supp.2d 882, 886 (W.D. Mich. 1998) ("This Court acknowledges that, as a general rule, it is best for courts to identify the 'exact contours of the underlying right said to have been violated.' . . . However, the reasons the Court cited in Lewis to support this proposition are more applicable to the Court of Appeals than to the District Court because, among other things, only the Court of Appeals establishes the 'standards of official conduct' under § 1983. . . . Furthermore, there is also a 'policy of avoiding the unnecessary adjudication of constitutional questions,' particularly those which are 'both difficult and unresolved.' Lewis, 118 S.Ct. at 1722-23 (Stevens, J., concurring) . . . Accordingly, the Court will resolve the § 1983 claim against Defendants under the doctrines of qualified immunity and Eleventh Amendment immunity, as well as on the particular facts under which certain defendants are being sued, thus avoiding the difficult and unresolved constitutional issue raised by Plaintiff's claim.").

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Forman v. Richmond Police Dep't., 104 F.3d 950, 958 (7th Cir. 1997) ("In regard to Forman's unreasonable search and seizure claim, it makes sense to initially analyze the second prong of the qualified immunity test–i.e., whether there were clearly established constitutional standards governing the warrantless search of the locked room–in order to avoid addressing the more difficult question of whether the warrantless search was in fact unconstitutional.").

Supreme Video, Inc. v. Schauz, 15 F.3d 1435, 1442 n.9 (7th Cir. 1994) ("Supreme Video argues that the district court erred by following the same decisional process we followed in this opinion, namely by deciding the qualified immunity issue without deciding whether Schauz actually violated a constitutionally guaranteed right. The cases Supreme Video cites, such as Siegert . . . do not hold that courts must address the question of a right before speaking to whether that right was clearly established. Rather, Siegert held only that both issues are necessary for a successful Section 1983 action. The Federal Reporters are expanding quickly enough without our addressing issues that will not affect the outcomes of our decisions.").

Viereckl v. Ramsey, No. 05 C 6292, 2006 WL 3319973, at *4, *5 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 13, 2006) ("The question of whether there was probable cause in the instant case is one that largely turns on an interpretation and application of the Illinois criminal code. The answer to that interpretive inquiry is at least relatively clear, and, as explained, leads the Court to conclude that probable cause was present under Illinois law. Nonetheless, candor compels the concession that the answers to the state law issues are not pellucid, as there is no Illinois case directly on point. This lack of absolute clarity, however, is not material to the bottom-line result concerning Deputy Sheriff Pogorzielski's motion to dismiss, because the potential ambiguity serves to underscore why qualified immunity is appropriate, irrespective of how the Illinois issues ultimately are resolved by the Illinois courts in an appropriate case. In such a circumstance, one might be tempted to avoid what is essentially an unnecessary endeavor by a federal court to (attempt to) explicate Illinois's criminal code and to interpret and apply its state law precedents. Saucier appears to require this threshold analysis in the qualified immunity context, however, irrespective of whatever considerations might counsel otherwise. . . To be sure, there is a substantial body of jurisprudence criticizing this seemingly inflexible mandate to first assess the constitutional question and related issues and only then proceed to the question of whether any putative unlawfulness was clearly established in applicable precedent, such that qualified immunity does not adhere. . . There also is a meaningful body of federal appellate precedent–much from before the Supreme Court's opinions in Bunting and Brosseau–which held or strongly suggested that the Saucler sequential analysis was more of a preference than a requirement, such that a lower court could proceed simply to the qualified immunity/clearly established question in an appropriate case. [citing cases] In addition, some appellate courts have even gone so far as to put aside the Saucier ordering in the context of a qualified immunity question. [citing cases] Were this Court persuaded that there is flexibility to simply assume a constitutional violation arguendo in this case, and to proceed straight to the qualified immunity/clearly established analysis, the Court would almost surely do so. The threshold questions concerning the Illinois criminal code involve areas of state law that are at least somewhat undeveloped in Illinois caselaw; concomitantly, the questions about Illinois law at issue have seldom been of interest or material consequence in the Illinois courts, so it seems particularly inappropriate to opine about them unnecessarily. In this regard, Saucier explained that its mandate to resolve the issue of whether a constitutional violation occurred first was necessary to ensure that the refinement and illumination of important constitutional concepts is not frustrated. . . That principle would not seem to mandate that federal courts unnecessarily opine about the meaning of a relatively obscure state criminal statute–here, for example, concerning issues relating to the misdemeanor Illinois offense of obstructing the service of legal process–when such speculation is not necessary to fairly resolve the federal case. . . That dynamic is underscored by the fact that this Court's statements about the meaning of the Illinois statute–indeed, even unanimous pronouncements about the meaning of the Illinois statute by higher federal appellate courts–would have no precedential effect vis-a-vis the Illinois courts, which have not been shy about rejecting federal interpretations of state statutes in at least some other instances. . . Nonetheless, the Court finds it difficult to see how it can, consistent with the Supreme Court's directives in Saucier, as underscored again in Brosseau, elide past the threshold issue of whether a false arrest occurred, which issue is interlaced with questions about the meaning of the Illinois statutes. . . As a result, the Court will proceed sequentially through the two-step Saucier analysis, even though the answer to the first-step of the analysis is not necessary to the resolution of the case, given the answer to the step-two 'clearly established' question.")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Smook v. Minnehaha County, 457 F.3d 806, 814, 815 (8th Cir. 2006) ("In addition to granting partial summary judgment in favor of Smook, the district court's order also granted partial summary judgment for unnamed class members who, as the class was defined by the court, were strip searched at the JDC from June 1, 1999, through September 14, 1999. Banbury and Cheever contend that they are also entitled to qualified immunity from suits for damages by the unnamed class members. To review that contention, it appears that we would be required by the Supreme Court's current direction to resolve first whether the searches of the unnamed class members violated the Fourth Amendment, and then, if so, whether the defendants are nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The requirement to resolve the reasonableness of these searches of unnamed class members places us in a quandary. The specific facts underlying the claims are not yet developed, and the reasonableness of a particular search is often highly contextual. . . . The posture of the appeal is complicated further by our decision that the named class representative, Smook, has no claim for damages against the defendants. . . . Under these unusual circumstances, we decline to pass on the merits of the constitutional claims of the unnamed class members that must be resolved as a first step in determining whether Banbury and Cheever are entitled to qualified immunity from suit.").

Young v. City of Little Rock, 249 F.3d 730, 735 (8th Cir. 2001) ("The plaintiff argues that Baker [v. McCollan, 443 U.S. 137 (1979)] is distinguishable. In Baker, the fact of the mistaken identity was not discovered for three days. Here, plaintiff argues, the defendants knew that they had the wrong woman, but decided to keep her detained for a probable-cause hearing on Monday morning nonetheless. If we were faced head on with the question whether the Fourth Amendment was violated, this distinction might well prove dispositive. But when the doctrine of qualified immunity is taken into account, we believe the District Court correctly held that these individual police officers are not liable in an action for damages. We decline to hold officers in this situation to the niceties of legal distinctions, even though the distinctions might seem persuasive to judges in the light of hindsight.").

Greer v. Shoop, 141 F.3d 824, 829 (8th Cir. 1998) (Beam, J., concurring specially) ("The court . . . 'assume[s] without deciding, based on the facts accepted for purposes of summary judgment, that [appellant] has sufficiently alleged a violation of Mora Greer's constitutional rights pursuant to the state-created danger theory.' . . On this assumption, the court proceeds to deal with the issue of qualified immunity. This approach is squarely at odds with Siegert v. Gilley . . . . The Supreme Court established that the 'first inquiry in the examination of [a claim of qualified immunity]' is whether a 'violation of a clearly established constitutional right' has been alleged at all. . . In Siegert, as here, the circuit court had assumed, without deciding, that Gilley's actions violated Siegert's constitutional rights. . .The Supreme Court found this approach to be error. It stated, 'We think the Court of Appeals should not have assumed, without deciding, this preliminary issue in this case.'")

Murphy v. Dowd, 975 F.2d 435, 437 (8th Cir. 1992) ("Assuming, without deciding, that a prisoner's involuntary exposure to ETS can state a constitutional claim, we conclude here that the district court properly granted [defendant] summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . .[A]t the time . . . there was no clearly established constitutional right to be free from exposure to ETS.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Motley v. Parks, 432 F.3d 1072, 1077, 1078 (9th Cir. 2005) (en banc) ("The parties urge us to skip the first step of the Saucier analysis. They ask us to assume that the officers violated Motley's constitutional rights by conducting a warrantless and suspicionless search of her apartment without sufficient reason to believe Jamerson lived there, and determine whether those rights were clearly established at the time of the search. The Supreme Court has placed strong emphasis on the need to concentrate at the outset on the definition of the constitutional right. . . . Given the Supreme Court's emphasis on our duty to clarify the constitutional standards governing law enforcement officers in the performance of their duties, we find it necessary to decide, first, what level of knowledge the officers needed to support the belief that Jamerson resided at the 40th Place address. In other words, how certain did they have to be that they were at the right residence? However, resolution of the related constitutional issue, whether the officers also needed particularized suspicion of wrong-doing on Jamerson's part, poses unique circumstances that warrant deviating from Saucier's threshold inquiry. The Supreme Court has granted certiorari in Samson v. California on the precise issue involved in this case. . . Thus, the very justification for Saucier's first step is inapplicable; avoiding the constitutional question will not impede the elaboration of constitutional principles, and answering the constitutional question would foster neither certainty nor finality. The confluence of our consideration of this case en banc and the Supreme Court's concurrent review of the same issue presents an extraordinary circumstance not before presented. . .In this unusual circumstance, we bypass Saucier's first step and decide only whether it was clearly established at the time of the search that the officers needed some suspicion of wrongdoing.").

Hemphill v. Kincheloe, 987 F.2d 589, 593 & n.4 (9th Cir. 1993) ("If a reasonable official could have believed that his actions were lawful, summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity is appropriate. [cite omitted] This determination should have been made before the district court considered whether the policy was constitutional.... Because we conclude that the officials' belief was reasonable, we need not decide whether the search policy [permitting digital rectal probe searches on inmates prior to their entry into a secure area of the prison] violated [plaintiff's] Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights.").

Erickson v. United States, 976 F.2d 1299, 1301 (9th Cir. 1992) ("Fundamental principles of judicial restraint require federal courts to consider nonconstitutional grounds for decision prior to reaching constitutional questions.... Thus, a federal court should decide constitutional questions only when it is impossible to dispose of the case on some other ground....Because the doctrine of qualified immunity disposes of this case, we do not reach the question whether the individual defendants violated [plaintiff's] constitutional rights.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Warner v. Grand County, 57 F.3d 962, 964 (10th Cir. 1995) ("Without addressing the merits of the constitutional issue, we hold that it was not clearly established on the date in question that a strip search following an arrest for possession of marijuana, a misdemeanor for which there was no risk that the suspects would be intermingled with the general jail population, was unconstitutional.").

Woodward v. City of Worland, 977 F.2d 1392, 1401 (10th Cir. 1992) ("We do not take the occasion here to decide whether an outside third party or co-employee could ever be liable for sexual harassment under 1983 and the Equal Protection Clause. We resolve this case simply by noting that the Officers here were not violating clearly established law under the Equal Protection Clause when they acted as they did with respect to [plaintiffs].").

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Williams v. Bd of Regents of Univ. System of Georgia, 477 F.3d 1282, 1300, 1301 (11th Cir. 2007) (on sua sponte reh'g) ("The district court dismissed Williams's second § 1983 claim against Adams, Harrick, and Dooley as individuals, holding that the defendants have qualified immunity and that Williams failed to state a claim. We need not address whether Williams failed to state a claim because we affirm the district court's holding on qualified immunity grounds. . . . The Equal Protection Clause confers a federal constitutional right to be free from sex discrimination. . . . Here, Williams has alleged a harrowing incident, similar to other allegations that unfortunately have become increasingly common on today's university campuses. . . Williams presents a compelling case that Adams, Harrick, and Dooley knew about the criminal and disciplinary problems that plagued Cole's past, but that they considered his basketball skills a greater benefit than his questionable mores were a burden. Furthermore, Williams has presented evidence to show that the defendants' action, coupled with others' actions, may amount to discrimination actionable under Title IX. At a minimum, Adams, Harrick, and Dooley acted recklessly, and their apparent 'win at all costs' attitude resulted in enormous costs and fewer wins than expected. Nevertheless, Williams has failed to present any cases that show the three defendants violated her clearly established equal protection rights by recruiting and admitting an individual like Cole. Therefore, Williams cannot meet her burden under the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, and we hold that Adams, Harrick, and Dooley are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hudson v. Hall, 231 F.3d 1289, 1295 n.5 (11th Cir. 2000) ("We recognize that the Supreme Court has written that generally we should–when we adjudicate qualified immunity cases–first decide whether the defendant has violated federal law at all before considering whether the law was clearly established. . . According to the Supreme Court, such an approach facilitates the development of federal constitutional law. . . Our Circuit now follows that practice, [citing Hartley], although it means that we often decide close questions of constitutional law when we know that no party in the case before us will be affected by that decision. And at times, some of us do wonder if this abstract development is the kind of development of constitutional law that should be encouraged. But we do not think that the Supreme Court's suggested approach is–without exceptions–required absolutely, and we decline to follow that approach in this instance. In this case, whether probable cause existed–and, whether the Fourth Amendment was violated–turns upon a difficult question of state law. If we followed here the approach set out in Wilson and in Lewis, we would be required to determine whether O.C.G.A. ' 40-6-123 applies to turns from private driveways onto public roadways before we reached the clearly-established question. And, to determine the true scope of O.C.G.A. ' 40- 6-123–insofar as the plain language of the statute does not seem clear and no Georgia case law exists to guide us–we would need to certify the question to the Georgia Supreme Court. Yet, certification–at least in this case–would be an exercise in futility and a waste of the time and resources of both this Court and the Georgia Supreme Court. Indeed, regardless of the answer delivered by the Georgia Supreme Court, Officer Hall would be entitled to qualified immunity. We are unwilling to engage in–and we do not believe the Supreme Court intended to require–so vain a gesture.").

Denno v. School Board of Volusia County, 218 F.3d 1267, 1274 n.5 (11th Cir. 2000) ("Neither party has argued that we must decide the merits of the substantive constitutional issue before addressing qualified immunity. And we believe that this appeal is one of those exceptional cases in which we are not required to do so. . . Thus, we need decide only whether pre-existing law dictates, that is, truly compels the conclusion that the Tinker standard applies to the exclusion of the Fraser standard. . . We cannot so conclude.").

Santamorena v. Georgia Military College, 147 F.3d 1337, 1342-44 (11th Cir. 1998) ("[W]e do acknowledge that the existence or nonexistence of a constitutional right (or duty) in this case presents a perplexing question: a question that we–in part, because it cannot be easily answered–decline to answer at this time. . . . A Supreme Court opinion recently suggested that the "better approach"–in cases involving the defense of qualified immunity–might be to decide whether the contended for constitutional right exists at all before determining whether the right was, at the pertinent time, clearly established. [citing County of Sacramento] . . . . We do not understand this footnote as an absolute requirement that lower courts must always follow this "normally" "better approach." In County of Sacramento, the district court decided the case strictly on qualified immunity grounds, that is, on the ground of the unsettled nature of the law; but the Supreme Court never said the district court erred. And if the Supreme Court intended to impose an absolute requirement on lower courts always to address the merits of constitutional issues even where qualified immunity obviously applies and readily resolves the case, we believe the Supreme Court would have said so more directly. At least in situations like this one–(1) where the existence of a constitutional right (or duty) presents a perplexing question, (2) where the alleged right obviously was not already clearly established, and (3) where the qualified immunity determination does end the whole case–it remains appropriate, and sometimes preferable, to stop at the determination that the right, if any, was not clearly established. . . . [W]e conclude the Supreme Court did not mean to nullify all the traditional restraint principles or to take away all our discretion to analyze particular qualified immunity cases, involving perplexing constitutional issues, without first deciding whether the constitutional right exists. We think the Supreme Court was telling us that, notwithstanding the usual restraint arguments, sometimes the courts can and should decide the constitutional issues; and we will but– because we believe the Supreme Court has left us with some discretion–not today.").

Spivey v. Elliott, 41 F.3d 1497, 1498-99 (11th Cir. 1995) ("In our opinion, the panel majority had followed the perceived teachings of Siegert . . . in which the Supreme Court indicated that faced with this situation a court should first determine whether there is a statutory or constitutional right implicated, and if so, whether that right was clearly established at the time. Upon reconsideration on the suggestion of other members of this Court, we now think it enough to decide that there was no clearly established constitutional right allegedly violated by the defendants. . . . Since a plaintiff must show both that there is a constitutional right that is allegedly violated and that the right was clearly established at the time, a negative decision on either prevents the plaintiff from going forward. Once it is determined that there is no clearly established right, the Court could well leave for another day the determination as to whether there is such a right, albeit not one that a reasonable person would have known.").

Wright v. Whiddon, 951 F.2d 297 (11th Cir. 1992) (court takes an approach which is arguably inconsistent with the analysis required by Siegert where parents of a pretrial detainee who was shot and killed during an attempted escape, asserted that the use of deadly force violated the detainee's Fourth Amendment rights. The court did not decide the question of whether a pretrial detainee could assert an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment, but disposed of the case on qualified immunity grounds because "[t]he presence of such doubt about the existence and content of the constitutional right that [the defendant] is alleged to have violated is enough to entitle him to qualified immunity." Id. at 300.).

Powers v. CSX Transportation, Inc., 105 F. Supp.2d 1295, 1307 (S.D. Ala. 2000) ("This Court does not construe Conn and Wilson as mandating a specific order of analysis to be followed in every case. First, the Supreme Court ordinarily can be expected to acknowledge that it is changing an existing rule. Second, the Court cited Siegert and Lewis and clearly was aware they do not establish a mandatory scheme. Third, Justice Breyer concurred in Lewis for the express purpose of clarifying that Lewis 'should not be read to deny lower courts the flexibility, in appropriate cases, to decide § 1983 claims on the basis of qualified immunity, and thereby avoid wrestling with constitutional issues that are either difficult or poorly presented.' . . . Fourth, the Conn Court's use of the term 'must' can reasonably be read as requiring that the existence of a constitutional right be determined first only in the 'normal' case envisioned by Lewis. . . . Moreover, the Supreme Court has identified only two rationales for analyzing first the existence of a constitutional right. The first–to honor the policies undergirding qualified immunity by disposing of cases quickly on legal grounds–is equally applicable to the 'clearly established' inquiry. The second–to 'promot[e] clarity in the legal standards for official conduct,' . . . does not readily apply to decisions of the district courts, which typically are unpublished and which do not create binding precedent in any event.").

Rose v. Town of Jackson's Gap, 952 F. Supp. 757, 762 n.6 (M.D. Ala. 1996) ("The court notes that, in this circuit, it may in some instances no longer be necessary to answer this inquiry [of whether plaintiff has asserted a constitutional violation]. In a recent case, the Eleventh Circuit diverged from the Siegert order of analysis and stated that 'we now think it enough to decide that there was no clearly established constitutional right allegedly violated by the defendants.' Spivey v. Elliott, 41 F.3d 1497, 1498 (11th Cir.1995). . . . In so deciding, however, the panel emphasized that its decision in no way precludes a court, if deemed appropriate, from first determining whether a plaintiff has asserted the violation of a constitutional right.").

7. Criticisms of the "Rigid Order of Battle"

NOTE: In a denial of certiorari and dissent from the denial, some members of the Court commented on problems caused by the "constitutional- question-first rule."

Bunting v. Mellen, 124 S. Ct. 1750, 1751 (2004) (Stevens, J., joined by Ginsburg J., and Breyer, J., respecting the denial of certiorari) ("The 'perceived procedural tangle' described by Justice SCALIA's dissent. . . is a byproduct of an unwise judge-made rule under which courts must decide whether the plaintiff has alleged a constitutional violation before addressing the question whether the defendant state actor is entitled to qualified immunity. Justice BREYER and I both questioned the wisdom of an inflexible rule requiring the premature adjudication of constitutional issues when the Court adopted it. See County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 858, 859 (1998). Relaxing that rule could solve the problem that Justice SCALIA addresses in his dissent. Justice SCALIA is quite wrong, however, when he states that the 'procedural tangle' created by our constitutional-question- first procedure explains our denial of certiorari in this case. Indeed, it is only one of three reasons for not granting review.")

Bunting v. Mellen, 124 S. Ct. 1750, 1754, 1755 (2004) (Scalia, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) ("The Fourth Circuit's determination that a state military college's grace before meals violates the Establishment Clause, creating a conflict with Circuits upholding state-university prayers, would normally make this case a strong candidate for certiorari. But it is questionable whether Bunting's request for review can be entertained, since he won judgment in the court below. For although the statute governing our certiorari jurisdiction permits application by 'any party' to a case in a federal court of appeals, 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1), our practice reflects a 'settled refusal' to entertain an appeal by a party on an issue as to which he prevailed. . . . . I think it plain that this general rule should not apply where a favorable judgment on qualified-immunity grounds would deprive a party of an opportunity to appeal the unfavorable (and often more significant) constitutional determination. That constitutional determination is not mere dictum in the ordinary sense, since the whole reason we require it to be set forth (despite the availability of qualified immunity) is to clarify the law and thus make unavailable repeated claims of qualified immunity in future cases. . . . Not only is the denial of review unfair to the litigant (and to the institution that the litigant represents) but it undermines the purpose served by initial consideration of the constitutional question, which is to clarify constitutional rights without undue delay. . . This problem has attracted the attention of lower courts. Two Circuits have noticed that if the constitutional determination remains locked inside a § 1983 suit in which the defendant received a favorable judgment on qualified immunity grounds, then "government defendants, as the prevailing parties, will have no opportunity to appeal for review of the newly declared constitutional right in the higher courts." Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244, 247 (C.A.2 1999) (quoted in Kalka v. Hawk, 215 F.3d 90, 96 (C.A.D.C.2000)); see Horne, supra, at 247, n. 1 (concluding that this Court could not have reviewed the judgment in County of Sacramento v. Lewis, supra, if the Ninth Circuit had not believed the right clearly established). As both Circuits recognized, the mess up here is replicated below. See Horne, supra, at 247 (noting the parallel between unreviewability of district court and court of appeals decisions); Kalka, 215 F.3d, at 96, and n. 9 (similar). This understandable concern has led some courts to conclude (mistakenly) that the constitutional-question-first rule is customary, not mandatory. See id., at 96, 98; Horne, supra, at 247, 250; see also Pearson v. Ramos, 237 F.3d 881, 884 (C.A.7 2001) (doubting that the Saucier rule is "absolute," for the reasons given in Kalka and Horne). The perception of unreviewability undermines adherence to the sequencing rule we have created. . . . This situation should not be prolonged. We should either make clear that constitutional determinations are not insulated from our review (for which purpose this case would be an appropriate vehicle), or else drop any pretense at requiring the ordering in every case.").

See also:

Morse v. Frederick, 127 S. Ct. 2618, 2624 & n.1 (2007) ("We granted certiorari on two questions: whether Frederick had a First Amendment right to wield his banner, and, if so, whether that right was so clearly established that the principal may be held liable for damages. . . We resolve the first question against Frederick, and therefore have no occasion to reach the second. . . . Justice BREYER would rest decision on qualified immunity without reaching the underlying First Amendment question. The problem with this approach is the rather significant one that it is inadequate to decide the case before us. Qualified immunity shields public officials from money damages only. . . In this case, Frederick asked not just for damages, but also for declaratory and injunctive relief.")

Morse v. Frederick, 127 S. Ct. 2618, 2638, 2639 (2007) (Breyer, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part) (" This Court need not and should not decide this difficult First Amendment issue on the merits. Rather, I believe that it should simply hold that qualified immunity bars the student's claim for monetary damages and say no more. . . Resolving the First Amendment question presented in this case is, in my view, unwise and unnecessary. . . .[R]egardless of the outcome of the constitutional determination, a decision on the underlying First Amendment issue is both difficult and unusually portentous. And that is a reason for us not to decide the issue unless we must. In some instances, it is appropriate to decide a constitutional issue in order to provide 'guidance' for the future. But I cannot find much guidance in today's decision. . . . In order to avoid resolving the fractious underlying constitutional question, we need only decide a different question that this case presents, the question of 'qualified immunity.'. . . The relative ease with which we could decide this case on the qualified immunity ground, and thereby avoid deciding a far more difficult constitutional question, underscores the need to lift the rigid 'order of battle' decisionmaking requirement that this Court imposed upon lower courts in Saucier . . . . In resolving the underlying constitutional question, we produce several differing opinions. It is utterly unnecessary to do so. Were we to decide this case on the ground of qualified immunity , our decision would be unanimous, for the dissent concedes that Morse should not be held liable in damages for confiscating Frederick's banner. . . .While Saucier justified its rule by contending that it was necessary to permit constitutional law to develop, . . . this concern is overstated because overruling Saucier would not mean that the law prohibited judges from passing on constitutional questions, only that it did not require them to do so. . . . I would end the failed Saucier experiment now.")

Wilkie v. Robbins, 127 S. Ct. 2588, 2617 n. 10 (2007) (Ginsburg, J., joined by Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("As I have elsewhere indicated, in appropriate cases, I would allow courts to move directly to the second inquiry.").

Brosseau v. Haugen, 125 S. Ct. 596, 598 n.3 (2004) (per curiam) (" We have no occasion in this case to reconsider our instruction in Saucier. . . that lower courts decide the constitutional question prior to deciding the qualified immunity question.")

Brosseau v. Haugen, 125 S. Ct. 596, 598, 600-01(2004) (per curiam) (Breyer, J., joined by Scalia, J., and Ginsburg, J., concurring) ("I join the Court's opinion but write separately to express my concern about the matter to which the Court refers in footnote 3, namely, the way in which lower courts are required to evaluate claims of qualified immunity under the Court's decision in Saucier v. Katz. . . . As the Court notes, . . . Saucier requires lower courts to decide (1)

the constitutional question prior to deciding (2) the qualified immunity question. I am concerned that the current rule rigidly requires courts unnecessarily to decide difficult constitutional questions when there is available an easier basis for the decision (e.g., qualified immunity) that will satisfactorily resolve the case before the court. Indeed when courts' dockets are crowded, a rigid 'order of battle' makes little administrative sense and can sometimes lead to a constitutional decision that is effectively insulated from review, see Bunting v. Mellen, 541 U.S. 1019, 1025 (2004) (SCALIA, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari). For these reasons, I think we should reconsider this issue.").

Scott v. Harris, 127 S. Ct. 1769, 1774 n.4 (2007) ("Prior to this Court's announcement of Saucier's 'rigid "order of battle,"' . . . we had described this order of inquiry as the 'better approach,' . . . though not one that was required in all cases. . . There has been doubt expressed regarding the wisdom of Saucier's decision to make the threshold inquiry mandatory, especially in cases where the constitutional question is relatively difficult and the qualified immunity question relatively straightforward. . . . We need not address the wisdom of Saucier in this case, however, because the constitutional question with which we are presented is . . . easily decided. Deciding that question first is thus the 'better approach,' . . . regardless of whether it is required.").

Scott v. Harris, 127 S. Ct. 1769, 1780, 1781 (2007) (Breyer, J., concurring) ("[T]he video makes clear the highly fact-dependent nature of this constitutional determination. And that fact-dependency supports the argument that we should overrule the requirement, announced in Saucier v. Katz . . . that lower courts must first decide the 'constitutional question' before they turn to the 'qualified immunity question.' . . Instead, lower courts should be free to decide the two questions in whatever order makes sense in the context of a particular case. Although I do not object to our deciding the constitutional question in this particular case, I believe that in order to lift the burden from lower courts we can and should reconsider Saucier's requirement as well. Sometimes (e.g., where a defendant is clearly entitled to qualified immunity) Saucier's fixed order-of-battle rule wastes judicial resources in that it may require courts to answer a difficult constitutional question unnecessarily. Sometimes (e.g., where the defendant loses the constitutional question but wins on qualified immunity) that order-of-battle rule may immunize an incorrect constitutional ruling from review. Sometimes, as here, the order-of-battle rule will spawn constitutional rulings in areas of law so fact dependent that the result will be confusion rather than clarity. And frequently the order-of-battle rule violates that older, wiser judicial counsel 'not to pass on questions of constitutionality ... unless such adjudication is unavoidable.'. . In a sharp departure from this counsel, Saucier requires courts to embrace unnecessary constitutional questions not to avoid them. It is not surprising that commentators, judges, and, in this case, 28 States in an amicus brief, have invited us to reconsider Saucier's requirement. . . I would accept that invitation. While this Court should generally be reluctant to overturn precedents, stare decisis concerns are at their weakest here. . . . The order-of-battle rule is relatively novel, it primarily affects judges, and there has been little reliance upon it.").

Los Angeles County, California v. Rettele, 127 S. Ct. 1989, 1994 (2007) (Stevens, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., concurring in the judgment) ("This case presents two separate questions: (1) whether the four circumstances identified in the Court of Appeals' unpublished opinion established a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the seizure violated respondents' Fourth Amendment rights . . . (2) whether the officers were nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity because the right was not clearly established. The fact that the judges on the Court of Appeals disagreed on both questions convinces me that they should not have announced their decision in an unpublished opinion. In answering the first question, the Ninth Circuit majority relied primarily on Franklin v. Foxworth, 31 F.3d 873 (C.A.9 1994). As Judge Cowen's discussion of Franklin demonstrates, that case surely does not clearly establish the unconstitutionality of the officers' conduct. . . Consequently, regardless of the proper answer to the constitutional question, the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. I would reverse on that ground and disavow the unwise practice of deciding constitutional questions in advance of the necessity for doing so.").

Criticism by Cases in the Circuits:

Estate of Buchanan v. Maine, 469 F.3d 158, 168-70 (1st Cir. 2006) ("We do not think the law elaboration purpose will be well served here, where the Fourth Amendment question is a reasonableness question which is highly idiosyncratic and heavily dependent on the facts. The question is close whether under normal summary judgment rules, drawing all inferences in plaintiff's favor, this record would preclude submission to the jury of the question whether, given the circumstances, the officers reasonably entered Buchanan's house when they did rather than wait to see if they could break through a busy phone line to ask Buchanan's social worker for advice. On summary judgment on qualified immunity, the threshold question is whether all the uncontested facts and any contested facts looked at in plaintiff's favor show a constitutional violation. . . Given the complexity of the matter, and since it is perfectly clear that the officers are entitled to immunity, we turn to the second and third prongs. . . . At the time of the deputies' visit to Buchanan's home, it had been clearly established that 'a warrantless entry ... of a residence may be "reasonable," in Fourth Amendment terms,' but was not reasonable unless 'the government [could] demonstrate ... "exigent circumstances,"' such as 'an imminent threat to the life or safety of members of the public, the police officers, or a person located within the residence.' . . . But, under Saucier, that level of analysis is insufficient. The relevant inquiry is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct would be unlawful in the situation he confronted, and this inquiry must be taken in light of the case's specific context, not as a broad general proposition. . . We cannot say the officers had fair warning under the law that if they entered the house when they did, they would violate Buchanan's Fourth Amendment rights. While there is no case directly on point, case law tended to support the officers' actions, not put them on notice of illegality. . . . . Even if we were wrong in our analysis thus far, the deputies would be entitled to immunity on the third prong. Our inquiry at this stage is limited to those objective facts known to (or discernible by) the officers at the time of the event. . . . A reasonable officer could have believed that waiting was not a good idea. There was no assurance the deputies could reach the social worker or that he would have been able to calm Buchanan or provide meaningful help to the officers from his remote location. Plaintiff put on no evidence that a reasonable officer would have waited. Further, the situation was escalating, with Buchanan punching out a window on a cold night, and the deputies did not know that the social worker would be available once the phone line was cleared. Even if the officers were mistaken, this was a reasonable judgment call, and they are entitled to immunity.”).

Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766, 773 n.3 (6th Cir. 2005) (“Two judges of this circuit have recently articulated a number of reasons to eliminate the Supreme Court’s requirement that courts always begin with the question of whether a right has been violated, and never begin with the question of whether any such right at stake has been clearly established. See Lyons v. City of Xenia, 417 F.3d 565, 580-84 (6th Cir.2005) (Sutton and Gibbons, JJ., concurring). Although the points raised are excellent, like those judges, we continue to follow the order of inquiry the Supreme Court set forth in Saucier. It is true that the Supreme Court in Brosseau exercised its discretion to resolve the qualified immunity inquiry without first resolving whether there was a constitutional violation, notwithstanding the Court’s earlier contrary ‘instruction’ to the lower courts. . . As lower courts we are bound to follow the Supreme Court’s reasoning and holdings, as much as, if not more so than, its ‘instructions.’ The reasoning of Brosseau certainly permits us to follow the instructions, however, and we continue to do so.”)(emphasis original).

Lyons v. City of Xenia, 417 F.3d 565, 581-84 (6th Cir. 2005) (Sutton, J., with whom Gibbons, J., joins, concurring) (“As the Court has acknowledged,. . . requiring courts preemptively to resolve constitutional questions where non-constitutional grounds for disposition remain readily available cuts against the normal grain of constitutional adjudication. The customary rule is that a court ‘will not pass upon a constitutional question although properly presented by the record, if there is also present some other ground upon which the case may be disposed of.’. . . Just as the Court has been right to identify the risk that the constitutional question might infrequently, if ever, be decided, . . . so there is a risk that constitutional questions may be prematurely and incorrectly decided in cases where they are not well presented. Heightening these concerns is the fact that some constitutional rulings effectively will be insulated from review by the en banc court of appeals or the Supreme Court where the appellate panel identifies a constitutional violation but grants qualified immunity under the second inquiry. . . . By multiplying constitutional holdings that are not subject to review in the normal course, a rigid application of the two-step inquiry may do as much to unsettle the law as to settle it. An unbending requirement in this area produces another oddity: The same lower-court judges that are supposed to adhere to this rule are given complete discretion over whether to publish a given decision. Appellate panels that choose not to publish a decision no more create binding precedent than those that decide only the clearly established question. . . . Lower federal courts given the authority to exercise judgment about when to publish their decisions, it seems to me, ought to be given authority occasionally to decide the last qualified immunity question before the threshold one. The same administrative concerns that permit the former ought to permit the latter. . . . Much as the Saucier two-step inquiry is a reasoned departure from the general rule that a court ‘will not pass upon a constitutional question’ unless essential to the disposition of a case,. . . so also the Court should permit lower courts to make reasoned departures from Saucier's inquiry where principles of sound and efficient judicial administration recommend a variance. Here, as elsewhere, avoiding difficult and divisive constitutional questions will at times promote, not hinder, the enforcement and development of the law. . . . The alternative, as the four separate opinions from this three-judge panel illustrate, is to require courts to issue narrow, panel-riven, fact-bound constitutional rulings of limited precedential value, only to have them then announce that the government officials are entitled to qualified immunity because the precedents 'taken together undoubtedly show that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case.'. . And of course in Brosseau itself, the very case that prompted the Court to ask us to take a second look at this case, the Court did not address the constitutional question but only the clearly established question. Lower federal courts ought to have the same authority.").

Robinette v. Jones, 476 F.3d 585, 592 n.8 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Saucier requires a full analysis of the first prong of a qualified immunity analysis because it 'permits courts in appropriate cases to elaborate the constitutional right with greater degrees of specificity. . . However, the 'law's elaboration from case to case,' . . . would be ill served by a ruling here, where the parties have provided very few facts to define and limit any holding on the reasonableness of the execution of the arrest warrant. See Buchanan v. Maine, 469 F.3d 158, 168 (1st Cir.2006) ("We do not think the law elaboration purpose will be well served here, where the Fourth Amendment question is a reasonableness question which is highly idiosyncratic and heavily dependent on the facts."); see also Ehrlich v. Town of Glastonbury, 348 F.3d 48 (2d Cir.2003).").

Clement v. City of Glendale, 518 F.3d 1090, 1093 n.4 (9th Cir. 2008) ("In deciding a motion for summary judgment in a section 1983 action we are bound to look first to whether there was a constitutional violation and then to whether defendants have qualified immunity, even if the qualified immunity inquiry would resolve the case more easily. . . Some have questioned the logic of this 'rigid Aorder of battle,"' . . . but we are bound to follow it until further notice. We are free to muse, however, that the Saucier rule may lead to the publication of a lot of bad constitutional law that is, effectively, cert-proof. If a court of appeals holds that a constitutional right exists under Saucier in step one, but that the right is not clearly established (as we do in this case), then neither party will have both the incentive and the standing to petition for review of the constitutional ruling. It may be many years before another case arises that presents the same issue in a form ripe for review by the Supreme Court.").

Kwai Fun Wong v. United States, 373 F.3d 952, 956, 957 (9th Cir. 2004) ("The confluence of two well-intentioned doctrines, notice pleading and qualified immunity, give rise to this exercise in legal decisionmaking based on facts both hypothetical and vague. On one hand, the federal courts may not dismiss a complaint unless 'it is clear that no relief could be granted under any set of facts that could be proved consistent with the allegations.' . . All that is required is a 'short and plain statement' of the plaintiff's claims. . . On the other hand, government officials are entitled to raise the qualified immunity defense immediately, on a motion to dismiss the complaint, to protect against the burdens of discovery and other pre-trial procedures. . . The qualified immunity issue, in turn, cannot be resolved without first deciding the scope of the constitutional rights at stake.[citing Saucier] The unintended consequence of this confluence of procedural doctrines is that the courts may be called upon to decide far-reaching constitutional questions on a nonexistent factual record, even where, as the government defendants contend and as may be the case here, discovery would readily reveal the plaintiff's claims to be factually baseless. We are therefore moved at the outset to suggest that while government officials have the right, for well-developed policy reasons, see Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 525-27 (1985), to raise and immediately appeal the qualified immunity defense on a motion to dismiss, the exercise of that authority is not a wise choice in every case. The ill-considered filing of a qualified immunity appeal on the pleadings alone can lead not only to a waste of scarce public and judicial resources, but to the development of legal doctrine that has lost its moorings in the empirical world, and that might never need to be determined were the case permitted to proceed, at least to the summary judgment stage.").

McClish v. Nugent, 483 F.3d 1231, 1253 n.1 (11th Cir. 2007) (Anderson, J., concurring specially) ("Because we hold that the law was not clearly established at the time of the relevant conduct, it would not be necessary to address the constitutional issue in this case but for the Supreme Court's admonition in Saucier v. Katz . . . Unfortunately, in this case, because the defendants prevailed on the clearly established prong, the Saucier rule not only requires a constitutional holding that would be unnecessary otherwise; it also operates to insulate from further appellate review an erroneous constitutional ruling that will guide the conduct of police officers in three states. . . Also, under the Saucier approach, a court is handicapped in addressing the constitutional issue because at least one party often has little incentive to litigate the issue vigorously, especially when it is apparent that the law is not clearly established, as in this case. Similarly, only the Supreme Court's mandate provides an incentive for busy federal judges to focus intently on the issue; they lack the usual incentive that proper resolution of the matter will make a real difference to a real party. For these reasons and others, twenty-eight states and Puerto Rico have recently urged the Supreme Court in an amicus brief to reconsider its mandatory Saucier approach to qualified immunity. See Brief for 28 States and Puerto Rico as Amici Curiae in Support of Petitioner, Scott v. Harris, No. 05-1631 (Supreme Court, December 2006).).

8. Pearson v. Callahan

In Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S. Ct. 808 (2009), the Court reviewed a decision of the Court of Appeals of the Tenth Circuit that had held the "consent-once-removed" doctrine which permits a warrantless entry into the home by police when consent has been given to an undercover officer who has observed contraband in the home–did not apply when the person to whom consent was given was a police informant rather than a police officer. The Court of Appeals also denied qualified immunity to the officers involved, noting that "the Supreme Court and the Tenth Circuit have clearly established that to allow police entry into a home, the only two exceptions to the warrant requirement are consent and exigent circumstances." Callahan v. Millard County, 494 F.3d 891, 898 (10th Cir. 2007), rev'd by Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S. Ct. 808 (2009). In granting certiorari, the Supreme Court directed the parties to brief and argue whether Saucier should be overruled.

In an unanimous opinion authored by Justice Alito, the Court reexamined the mandatory constitutional-question-first procedure required by Saucier and concluded "that a mandatory, two-step rule for resolving all qualified immunity claims should not be retained." 129 S. Ct. at 817. The Court acknowledged much of the criticism that had been leveled at the "rigid order of battle" by lower court judges and by members of the Court. Id. The Court justified its overruling of precedent by highlighting the various criticisms that have been directed at Saucier's two-step protocol: (1) Deciding the constitutional question first often results in substantial expenditures of resources by both the parties and the courts on "questions that have no effect on the outcome of the case." Id. at 818. (2) The development of constitutional doctrine is not furthered by decisions that are often "so fact-bound that the decision provides little guidance for future cases." Id. at 819. (3) It makes little sense to have lower courts forced to decide a constitutional question that is pending in a higher court or before an en banc panel. Id. (4) It likewise does little to further the development of constitutional precedent to force a decision that depends on "an uncertain interpretation of state law." Id. (5) Requiring a constitutional decision at the pleading stage based on bare or sketchy allegations of fact or one at the summary judgment stage resting on "woefully inadequate" briefs creates a risk of "bad decisionmaking." Id. at 820. (6) The mandated two-step analysis often shields constitutional decisions from appellate review when the defendant loses on the "merits" question but prevails on the clearly-established-law prong of the analysis. Such unreviewed decisions may then have "a serious prospective effect" on conduct. Id. (7) Finally, the approach requires unnecessary determinations of constitutional law and "departs from the general rule of constitutional avoidance." Id. at 821.

While abandoning the mandatory nature of two-step analysis, the Court continued to recognized that the approach can be beneficial in promoting "the development of constitutional precedent[,]"Id. at 818, and "is especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable." Id. In the end, the Court has left it to the lower court judges to decide, as a matter of discretion, what "order of decisionmaking will best facilitate the fair and efficient disposition of each case." Id. at 821. The Court addressed expressed "misgivings" about its decision. First, the Saucier approach is not prohibited; it is simply no longer mandated. Second, constitutional law will continue to develop in other contexts, such as criminal cases, cases involving claims against government entities and cases involving claims for injunctive relief. Third, the Court does not predict a flood of suits against local governments by plaintiffs pursuing novel claims. Id. at 821, 822. Nor does the Court anticipate a new "cottage industry of litigation" over the proper standards to use in deciding whether to reach the merits in a given case. Id. at 822.

Without addressing or overruling the constitutional holding of the Court of Appeals, the Court reversed the Tenth Circuit on the grounds that the law on the "consent-once-removed" doctrine was not clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct such that a reasonable officer would have understood the conduct here to be unlawful. As the Court explained:

> When the entry at issue here occurred in 2002, the 'consent-once-removed' doctrine had gained acceptance in the lower courts. This doctrine had been considered by three Federal Courts of Appeals and two State Supreme Courts starting in the early 1980's. [citing cases] It had been accepted by every one of those courts. Moreover, the Seventh Circuit had approved the doctrine's application to cases involving consensual entries by private citizens acting as confidential informants. See United States v. Paul, 808 F.2d, 645, 648 (1986). The Sixth Circuit reached the same conclusion after the events that gave rise to respondent's suit, see United States v. Yoon, 398 F.3d 802, 806-808, cert. denied, 546 U.S. 977, 126 S. Ct. 548, 163 L.Ed.2d 460 (2005), and prior to the Tenth Circuit's decision in the present case, no court of appeals had issued a contrary decision. The officers here were entitled to rely on these cases, even though their own Federal Circuit had not yet ruled on "consent-once-removed" entries. The principles of qualified immunity shield an officer from personal liability when an officer reasonably believes that his or her conduct complies with the law. Police officers are entitled to rely on existing lower court cases without facing personal liability for their actions. . . .[H]ere, where the divergence of views on the consent-once-removed doctrine was created by the decision of the Court of Appeals in this case, it is improper to subject petitioners to money damages for their conduct.

129 S. Ct. at 822, 823.

9. Post-Pearson Cases

U.S. SUPREME COURT

City of Tahlequah, Oklahoma v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 10 (2021) (per curiam) (granting certiorari and reversing) ("We need not, and do not, decide whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment in the first place, or whether recklessly creating a situation that requires deadly force can itself violate the Fourth Amendment. On this record, the officers plainly did not violate any clearly established law.")

Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7-9 (2021) (per curiam) (granting certiorari and reversing) ("Even assuming that controlling Circuit precedent clearly establishes law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde did not give fair notice to Rivas-Villegas. He is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]his is not an obvious case. Thus, to show a violation of clearly established law, Cortesluna must identify a case that put Rivas-Villegas on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful. Cortesluna has not done so. Neither Cortesluna nor the Court of Appeals identified any Supreme Court case that addresses facts like the ones at issue here. Instead, the Court of Appeals relied solely on its precedent in LaLonde. Even assuming that Circuit precedent can clearly establish law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde is materially distinguishable and thus does not govern the facts of this case. . . . On the facts of this case, neither LaLonde nor any decision of this Court is sufficiently similar. For that reason, we grant Rivas-Villegas' petition for certiorari and reverse the Ninth Circuit's determination that Rivas-Villegas is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1152-54 (2018) (per curiam) ("Here, the Court need not, and does not, decide whether Kisela violated the Fourth Amendment when he used deadly force against Hughes. For even assuming a Fourth Amendment violation occurred—a proposition that is not at all evident—on these facts Kisela was at least entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Where constitutional guidelines seem inapplicable or too remote, it does not suffice for a court simply to state that an officer may not use unreasonable and excessive force, deny qualified immunity, and then remit the case for a trial on the question of reasonableness. An officer 'cannot be said to have violated a clearly established right unless the right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it.' [citing Plumhoff] That is a necessary part of the qualified-immunity standard, and it is a part of the standard that the Court of Appeals here failed to implement in a correct way. Kisela says he shot Hughes because, although the officers themselves were in no apparent danger, he believed she was a threat to Chadwick. Kisela had mere seconds to assess the potential danger to Chadwick. He was confronted with a woman who had just been seen hacking a tree with a large kitchen knife and whose behavior was erratic enough to cause a concerned bystander to call 911 and then flag down Kisela and Garcia. Kisela was separated from Hughes and Chadwick by a chain-link fence; Hughes had moved to within a few feet of Chadwick; and she failed to acknowledge at least two commands to drop the knife. Those commands were loud enough that Chadwick, who was standing next to Hughes, heard them. This is far from an obvious case in which any competent officer would have known that shooting Hughes to protect Chadwick would violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . [N]ot one of the decisions relied on by the Court of Appeals—Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (C.A.9 2001), Glenn v. Washington County, 673 F.3d 864 (C.A.9 2011), and Harris v. Roderick, 126 F.3d 1189 (C.A.9 1997)—supports denying Kisela qualified immunity." [majority discusses and distinguishes Deorle, Glenn, and Harris])

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 589 & n.7 (2018) ("Our conclusion that the officers had probable cause to arrest the partygoers is sufficient to resolve this case. But where, as here, the Court of Appeals erred on both the merits of the constitutional claim and the question of qualified immunity, 'we have discretion to correct its errors at each step.'. . We exercise that discretion here because the D. C. Circuit's analysis, if followed elsewhere, would 'undermine the values qualified immunity seeks to promote.'. . .We continue to stress that lower courts 'should think hard, and then think hard again,' before addressing both qualified immunity and the merits of an underlying constitutional claim. . . We addressed the merits of probable cause here, however, because a decision on qualified immunity alone would not have resolved all of the claims in this case.")

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 593 (2018) (Sotomayor, J. concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("I agree with the majority that the officers here are entitled to qualified immunity and, for that reason alone, I concur in the Court's judgment reversing the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. But, I disagree with the majority's decision to reach the merits of the probable-cause question, which it does apparently only to ensure that, in addition to respondents' 42 U. S. C. §1983 claims, the Court's decision will resolve respondents' state-law claims of false arrest and negligent supervision. . . It is possible that our qualified-immunity decision alone will resolve those claims. . . In light of the lack of a dispute on an important legal question and the heavily factbound nature of the probable-cause determination here, I do not think that the Court should have reached that issue. The lower courts are well equipped to handle the remaining state-law claims in the first instance.")

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 593-94 (2018) (Ginsburg, J., concurring in the judgment in part) ("This case. . .leads me to question whether this Court, in assessing probable cause, should continue to ignore why police in fact acted. . . No arrests of plaintiffs-respondents were made until Sergeant Suber so instructed. His instruction, when conveyed to the officers he superintended, was based on an error of law. Sergeant Suber believed that the absence of the premises owner's consent, an uncontested fact in this case, sufficed to justify arrest of the partygoers for unlawful entry. . . An essential element of unlawful entry in the District of Columbia is that the defendant 'knew or should have known that his entry was unwanted. . . But under Sergeant Suber's view of the law, what the arrestees knew or should have known was irrelevant. They could be arrested, as he comprehended the law, even if they believed their entry was invited by a lawful occupant. Ultimately, plaintiffs-respondents were not booked for unlawful entry. Instead, they were charged at the police station with disorderly conduct. Yet no police officers at the site testified to having observed any activities warranting a disorderly conduct charge. Quite the opposite. The officers at the scene of the arrest uniformly testified that they had neither seen nor heard anything that would justify such a charge, and Sergeant Suber specifically advised his superiors that the charge was unwarranted. . . The Court's jurisprudence, I am concerned, sets the balance too heavily in favor of police unaccountability to the detriment of Fourth Amendment protection. A number of commentators have criticized the path we charted in Whren v. United States, 517 U. S. 806 (1996), and follow-on opinions, holding that 'an arresting officer's state of mind . . . is irrelevant to the existence of probable cause,' Devenpeck v. Alford, 543 U. S. 146, 153 (2004). See, e.g., 1 W. LaFave, Search and Seizure §1.4(f), p. 186 (5th ed. 2012) ('The apparent assumption of the Court in Whren, that no significant problem of police arbitrariness can exist as to actions taken with probable cause, blinks at reality.'). I would leave open, for reexamination in a future case, whether a police officer's reason for acting, in at least some circumstances, should factor into the Fourth Amendment inquiry. Given the current state of the Court's precedent, however, I agree that the disposition gained by plaintiffs-respondents was not warranted by 'settled law.' The defendants-petitioners are therefore sheltered by qualified immunity.")

Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 308-12 (2015) (per curiam) ("We address only the qualified immunity question, not whether there was a Fourth Amendment violation in the first place, and now reverse. . . . In this case, the Fifth Circuit held that Mullenix violated the clearly established rule that a police officer may not '"use deadly force against a fleeing felon who does not pose a sufficient threat of harm to the officer or others."'. . Yet this Court has previously considered—and rejected—almost that exact formulation of the qualified immunity question in the Fourth Amendment context. [discussing Brosseau] In this case, Mullenix confronted a reportedly intoxicated fugitive, set on avoiding capture through high-speed vehicular flight, who twice during his flight had threatened to shoot police officers, and who was moments away from encountering an officer at Cemetery Road. The relevant inquiry is whether existing precedent placed the conclusion that Mullenix acted unreasonably in these circumstances 'beyond debate.'. . The general principle that deadly force requires a sufficient threat hardly settles this matter. . . Far from clarifying the issue, excessive force cases involving car chases reveal the hazy legal backdrop against which Mullenix acted. . . . The threat Leija posed was at least as immediate as that presented by a suspect who had just begun to drive off and was headed only in the general direction of officers and bystanders. . . By the time Mullenix fired, Leija had led police on a 25-mile chase at extremely high speeds, was reportedly intoxicated, had twice threatened to shoot officers, and was racing towards an officer's location. This Court has considered excessive force claims in connection with high-speed chases on only two occasions since Brosseau. [discussing Scott and Plumhoff] The Court has thus never found the use of deadly force in connection with a dangerous car chase to violate the Fourth Amendment, let alone to be a basis for denying qualified immunity. Leija in his flight did not pass as many cars as the drivers in Scott or Plumhoff; traffic was light on I–27. At the same time, the fleeing fugitives in Scott and Plumhoff had not verbally threatened to kill any officers in their path, nor were they about to come upon such officers. In any event, none of our precedents 'squarely governs' the facts here. Given Leija's conduct, we cannot say that only someone 'plainly incompetent' or who 'knowingly violate[s] the law' would have perceived a sufficient threat and acted as Mullenix did. . . . Ultimately, whatever can be said of the wisdom of Mullenix's choice, this Court's precedents do not place the conclusion that he acted unreasonably in these circumstances 'beyond debate.'. . .More fundamentally, the dissent repeats the Fifth Circuit's error. It defines the qualified immunity inquiry at a high level of generality—whether any governmental interest justified choosing one tactic over another—and then fails to consider that question in 'the specific context of the case.'. . . Cases decided by the lower courts since Brosseau likewise have not clearly established that deadly force is inappropriate in response to conduct like Leija's. . . .Finally, respondents argue that the danger Leija represented was less substantial than the threats that courts have found sufficient to justify deadly force. But the mere fact that courts have approved deadly force in more extreme circumstances says little, if anything, about whether such force was reasonable in the circumstances here. The fact is that when Mullenix fired, he reasonably understood Leija to be a fugitive fleeing arrest, at speeds over 100 miles per hour, who was armed and possibly intoxicated, who had threatened to kill any officer he saw if the police did not abandon their pursuit, and who was racing towards Officer Ducheneaux's position. Even accepting that these circumstances fall somewhere between the two sets of cases respondents discuss, qualified immunity protects actions in the ' "hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'" . . Because the constitutional rule applied by the Fifth Circuit was not '

"beyond debate,"'. . . we grant Mullenix's petition for certiorari and reverse the Fifth Circuit's determination that Mullenix is not entitled to qualified immunity. It is so ordered.")

Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 312-13 (2015) (per curiam) (Scalia, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I join the judgment of the Court, but would not describe what occurred here as the application of deadly force in effecting an arrest. Our prior cases have reserved that description to the directing of force sufficient to kill at the person of the desired arrestee. See, e.g., Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U. S. ___ (2014); Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U. S. 194 (2004) (per curiam); Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U. S. 1 (1985). It does not assist analysis to refer to all use of force that happens to kill the arrestee as the application of deadly force. . . . [I]t stacks the deck against the officer, it seems to me, to describe his action as the application of deadly force. It was at least arguable in Scott that pushing a speeding vehicle off the road is targeting its occupant for injury or death. Here, however, it is conceded that Trooper Mullenix did not shoot to wound or kill the fleeing Leija, nor even to drive Leija's car off the road, but only to cause the car to stop by destroying its engine. That was a risky enterprise, as the outcome demonstrated; but determining whether it violated the Fourth Amendment requires us to ask, not whether it was reasonable to kill Leija, but whether it was reasonable to shoot at the engine in light of the risk to Leija. It distorts that inquiry, I think, to make the question whether it was reasonable for Mullenix to 'apply deadly force.'")

Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 313-16 (2015) (per curiam) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) ("Chadrin Mullenix fired six rounds in the dark at a car traveling 85 miles per hour. He did so without any training in that tactic, against the wait order of his superior officer, and less than a second before the car hit spike strips deployed to stop it. Mullenix's rogue conduct killed the driver, Israel Leija, Jr. Because it was clearly established under the Fourth Amendment that an officer in Mullenix's position should not have fired the shots, I respectfully dissent from the grant of summary reversal. . . . Here, then, the clearly established legal question—the question a reasonable officer would have asked—is whether, under all the circumstances as known to Mullenix, there was a governmental interest in shooting at the car rather than waiting for it to run over spike strips.The majority does not point to any such interest here. . . . It is clearly established that there must be some governmental interest that necessitates deadly force, even if it is not always clearly established what level of governmental interest is sufficient. Under the circumstances known to him at the time, Mullenix puts forth no plausible reason to choose shooting at Leija's engine block over waiting for the results of the spike strips. I would thus hold that Mullenix violated Leija's clearly established right to be free of intrusion absent some governmental interest. . . . By granting Mullenix qualified immunity, this Court goes a step further than our previous cases and does so without full briefing or argument. . . . When Mullenix confronted his superior officer after the shooting, his first words were, 'How's that for proactive?'. . . The glib comment does not impact our legal analysis; an officer's actual intentions are irrelevant to the Fourth Amendment's 'objectively reasonable' inquiry. . . But the comment seems to me revealing of the culture this Court's decision supports when it calls it reasonable—or even reasonably reasonable—to use deadly force for no discernible gain and over a supervisor's express order to 'stand by.' By sanctioning a 'shoot first, think later' approach to policing, the Court renders the protections of the Fourth Amendment hollow. For the reasons discussed, I would deny Mullenix's petition for a writ of certiorari. I thus respectfully dissent.")

Taylor v. Barkes, 135 S. Ct. 2042, 2044-45 (2015) (per curiam) ("The Third Circuit concluded that the right at issue was best defined as 'an incarcerated person's right to the proper implementation of adequate suicide prevention protocols.'. . This purported right, however, was not clearly established in November 2004 in a way that placed beyond debate the unconstitutionality of the Institution's procedures, as implemented by the medical contractor. . . . In short, even if the Institution's suicide screening and prevention measures contained the shortcomings that respondents allege, no precedent on the books in November 2004 would have made clear to petitioners that they were overseeing a system that violated the Constitution. Because, at the very least, petitioners were not contravening clearly established law, they are entitled to qualified immunity. The judgment of the Third Circuit is reversed.")

City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Cal. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1775-78 (2015) ("The real question. . . is whether, despite these dangerous circumstances, the officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they decided to reopen Sheehan's door rather than attempting to accommodate her disability. Here we come to another problem. San Francisco, whose attorneys represent Reynolds and Holder, devotes scant briefing to this question. Instead, San Francisco argues almost exclusively that even if it is assumed that there was a Fourth Amendment violation, the right was not clearly established. This Court, of course, could decide the constitutional question anyway. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 242, 129 S.Ct. 808, 172 L.Ed.2d 565 (2009) (recognizing discretion). But because this question has not been adequately briefed, we decline to do so. . . Rather, we simply decide whether the officers' failure to accommodate Sheehan's illness violated clearly established law. It did not. To begin, nothing in our cases suggests the constitutional rule applied by the Ninth Circuit. The Ninth Circuit focused on Graham v. Connor,. . . but Graham holds only that the ' "objective reasonableness"' test applies to excessive-force claims under the Fourth Amendment. . . That is far too general a proposition to control this case. 'We have repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Qualified immunity is no immunity at all if 'clearly established' law can simply be defined as the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. Even a cursory glance at the facts of Graham confirms just how different that case is from this one. That case did not involve a dangerous, obviously unstable person making threats, much less was there a weapon involved. There is a world of difference between needlessly withholding sugar from an innocent person who is suffering from an insulin reaction. . . and responding to the perilous situation Reynolds and Holder confronted. Graham is a nonstarter. Moving beyond Graham, the Ninth Circuit also turned to two of its own cases. But even if 'a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established federal law in these circumstances,' Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. ——, —— (2014) (per curiam) (slip op., at 4), it does not do so here. The Ninth Circuit first pointed to Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (C.A.9 2001), but from the very first paragraph of that opinion we learn that Deorle involved an officer's use of a beanbag gun to subdue 'an emotionally disturbed' person who 'was unarmed, had not attacked or even touched anyone, had generally

obeyed the instructions given him by various police officers, and had not committed any serious offense.'. . The officer there, moreover, 'observed Deorle at close proximity for about five to ten minutes before shooting him' in the face. . . Whatever the merits of the decision in Deorle, the differences between that case and the case before us leap from the page. Unlike Deorle, Sheehan was dangerous, recalcitrant, law-breaking, and out of sight. The Ninth Circuit also leaned on Alexander v. City and County of San Francisco, 29 F.3d 1355 (C.A.9 1994), another case involving mental illness. There, officials from San Francisco attempted to enter Henry Quade's home 'for the primary purpose of arresting him' even though they lacked an arrest warrant. . . Quade, in response, fired a handgun; police officers 'shot back, and Quade died from gunshot wounds shortly thereafter.'. . The panel concluded that a jury should decide whether the officers used excessive force. The court reasoned that the officers provoked the confrontation because there were no 'exigent circumstances' excusing their entrance. . .Alexander too is a poor fit. As Judge Graber observed below in her dissent, the Ninth Circuit has long read Alexander narrowly. . . Under Ninth Circuit law. . . an entry that otherwise complies with the Fourth Amendment is not rendered unreasonable because it provokes a violent reaction. . . Under this rule, qualified immunity necessarily applies here because, as explained above, competent officers could have believed that the second entry was justified under both continuous search and exigent circumstance rationales. Indeed, even if Reynolds and Holder misjudged the situation, Sheehan cannot 'establish a Fourth Amendment violation based merely on bad tactics that result in a deadly confrontation that could have been avoided.'. . Courts must not judge officers with 'the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . When Graham, Deorle, and Alexander are viewed together, the central error in the Ninth Circuit's reasoning is apparent. The panel majority concluded that these three cases 'would have placed any reasonable, competent officer on notice that it is unreasonable to forcibly enter the home of an armed, mentally ill suspect who had been acting irrationally and had threatened anyone who entered when there was no objective need for immediate entry.'. . But even assuming that is true, no precedent clearly established that there was not 'an objective need for immediate entry' here. No matter how carefully a reasonable officer read Graham, Deorle, and Alexander beforehand, that officer could not know that reopening Sheehan's door to prevent her from escaping or gathering more weapons would violate the Ninth Circuit's test, even if all the disputed facts are viewed in respondent's favor. Without that 'fair notice,' an officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Nor does it matter for purposes of qualified immunity that Sheehan's expert, Reiter, testified that the officers did not follow their training. . . .Even if an officer acts contrary to her training, however, (and here, given the generality of that training, it is not at all clear that Reynolds and Holder did so), that does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted. Rather, so long as 'a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was justified,' a plaintiff cannot 'avoi[d] summary judgment by simply producing an expert's report that an officer's conduct leading up to a deadly confrontation was imprudent, inappropriate, or even reckless.'. . Considering the specific situation confronting Reynolds and Holder, they had sufficient reason to believe that their conduct was justified. Finally, to the extent that a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' could itself clearly establish the federal right respondent alleges, . . . no such consensus exists here. . . .In sum, we hold that qualified immunity applies because these officers had no 'fair and clear warning of what the Constitution requires.'. .

Because the qualified immunity analysis is straightforward, we need not decide whether the Constitution was violated by the officers' failure to accommodate Sheehan's illness. * * * For these reasons, the first question presented is dismissed as improvidently granted. On the second question, we reverse the judgment of the Ninth Circuit. The case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350-52 (2014) (per curiam) ("Carroll petitioned for certiorari. We grant the petition and reverse the Third Circuit's determination that Carroll was not entitled to qualified immunity. . . .In concluding that Officer Carroll violated clearly established law in this case, the Third Circuit relied exclusively on Marasco's statement that 'entry into the curtilage after not receiving an answer at the front door might be reasonable.'. . In the court's view, that statement clearly established that a 'knock and talk' must begin at the front door. But that conclusion does not follow. Marasco held that an unsuccessful 'knock and talk' at the front door does not automatically allow officers to go onto other parts of the property. It did not hold, however, that knocking on the front door is required before officers go onto other parts of the property that are open to visitors. Thus, Marasco simply did not answer the question whether a 'knock and talk' must begin at the front door when visitors may also go to the back door. Indeed, the house at issue seems not to have even had a back door, let alone one that visitors could use. . .Moreover, Marasco expressly stated that 'there [was] no indication of whether the officers followed a path or other apparently open route that would be suggestive of reasonableness.' Ibid. That makes Marasco wholly different from this case, where the jury necessarily decided that Carroll 'restrict[ed] [his] movements to walkways, driveways, porches and places where visitors could be expected to go.'. . To the extent that Marasco says anything about this case, it arguably supports Carroll's view. In Marasco, the Third Circuit noted that '[o]fficers are allowed to knock on a residence's door or otherwise approach the residence seeking to speak to the inhabitants just as any private citizen may.'. .The court also said that, ' "when the police come on to private property ... and restrict their movements to places visitors could be expected to go (e.g., walkways, driveways, porches), observations made from such vantage points are not covered by the Fourth Amendment."'. . Had Carroll read those statements before going to the Carmans' house, he may have concluded—quite reasonably—that he was allowed to knock on any door that was open to visitors. . . The Third Circuit's decision is even more perplexing in comparison to the decisions of other federal and state courts, which have rejected the rule the Third Circuit adopted here. [citing cases from 2d, 7th, and 9th circuits and New Jersey Supreme Court] We do not decide today whether those cases were correctly decided or whether a police officer may conduct a 'knock and talk' at any entrance that is open to visitors rather than only the front door. 'But whether or not the constitutional rule applied by the court below was correct, it was not "beyond debate."' Stanton v. Sims, 571 U.S. ——, —— – (2013) (per curiam) (slip op., at 8) (quoting al-Kidd, 563 U.S., at —— (slip op., at 9)). The Third Circuit therefore erred when it held that Carroll was not entitled to qualified immunity. The petition for certiorari is granted. The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Lane v. Franks, 134 S. Ct. 2369, 2377-79 & n.4, 2381-83 (2014) ("We granted certiorari. . . to resolve discord among the Courts of Appeals as to whether public employees may be fired—or suffer other adverse employment consequences—for providing truthful subpoenaed testimony outside the course of their ordinary job responsibilities. . . .Truthful testimony under oath by a public employee outside the scope of his ordinary job duties is speech as a citizen for First Amendment purposes. That is so even when the testimony relates to his public employment or concerns information learned during that employment. In rejecting Lane's argument that his testimony was speech as a citizen, the Eleventh Circuit gave short shrift to the nature of sworn judicial statements and ignored the obligation borne by all witnesses testifying under oath. . . Sworn testimony in judicial proceedings is a quintessential example of speech as a citizen for a simple reason: Anyone who testifies in court bears an obligation, to the court and society at large, to tell the truth. . . . In holding that Lane did not speak as a citizen when he testified, the Eleventh Circuit read Garcetti far too broadly. It reasoned that, because Lane learned of the subject matter of his testimony in the course of his employment with CITY, Garcetti requires that his testimony be treated as the speech of an employee rather than that of a citizen. . . . It is undisputed that Lane's ordinary job responsibilities did not include testifying in court proceedings. . . For that reason, Lane asked the Court to decide only whether truthful sworn testimony that is not a part of an employee's ordinary job responsibilities is citizen speech on a matter of public concern. . . We accordingly need not address in this case whether truthful sworn testimony would constitute citizen speech under Garcetti when given as part of a public employee's ordinary job duties, and express no opinion on the matter today. . . . In other words, the mere fact that a citizen's speech concerns information acquired by virtue of his public employment does not transform that speech into employee—rather than citizen—speech. The critical question under Garcetti is whether the speech at issue is itself ordinarily within the scope of an employee's duties, not whether it merely concerns those duties. . . . Respondent Franks argues that even if Lane's testimony is protected under the First Amendment, the claims against him in his individual capacity should be dismissed on the basis of qualified immunity. We agree. . . .The relevant question for qualified immunity purposes is this: Could Franks reasonably have believed, at the time he fired Lane, that a government employer could fire an employee on account of testimony the employee gave, under oath and outside the scope of his ordinary job responsibilities? Eleventh Circuit precedent did not preclude Franks from reasonably holding that belief. And no decision of this Court was sufficiently clear to cast doubt on the controlling Eleventh Circuit precedent. . . . Morris, Martinez, and Tindal represent the landscape of Eleventh Circuit precedent the parties rely on for qualified immunity purposes. If Martinez and Tindal were controlling in the Eleventh Circuit in 2009, we would agree with Lane that Franks could not reasonably have believed that it was lawful to fire Lane in retaliation for his testimony. But both cases must be read together with Morris, which reasoned—in declining to afford First Amendment protection—that the plaintiff's decision to testify was motivated solely by his desire to comply with a subpoena. The same could be said of Lane's decision to testify. Franks was thus entitled to rely on Morris when he fired Lane. . . . Lane argues that Morris is inapplicable because it distinguished Martinez, suggesting that Martinez survived Morris. . . But this debate over whether Martinez or Morris applies to Lane's claim only highlights the dispositive point: At the time of Lane's termination, Eleventh Circuit precedent did not provide clear notice that subpoenaed testimony concerning information acquired through public employment is speech of a citizen entitled to First Amendment protection. At best, Lane can demonstrate only a discrepancy in Eleventh Circuit precedent, which is insufficient to defeat the defense of qualified immunity. Finally, Lane argues that decisions of the Third and Seventh Circuits put Franks on notice that his firing of Lane was unconstitutional. See Reilly, 532 F.3d, at 231(CA3) (truthful testimony in court is citizen speech protected by the First Amendment); Morales v. Jones, 494 F.3d 590, 598 (C.A.7 2007) (similar). But, as the court below acknowledged, those precedents were in direct conflict with Eleventh Circuit precedent. . . There is no doubt that the Eleventh Circuit incorrectly concluded that Lane's testimony was not entitled to First Amendment protection. But because the question was not 'beyond debate' at the time Franks acted, al-Kidd, 563 U.S., at —— (slip op., at 9), Franks is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Wood v. Moss, 134 S. Ct. 2056, 2061, 2066-70 (2014) ("The First Amendment, our precedent makes plain, disfavors viewpoint-based discrimination. . . But safeguarding the President is also of overwhelming importance in our constitutional system. . . Faced with the President's sudden decision to stop for dinner, the Secret Service agents had to cope with a security situation not earlier anticipated. No decision of this Court so much as hinted that their on-the-spot action was unlawful because they failed to keep the protesters and supporters, throughout the episode, equidistant from the President. . . . The particular question before us is whether the protesters have alleged violation of a clearly established First Amendment right based on the agents' decision to order the protesters moved from their original location in front of the Inn, first to the block just east of the Inn, and then another block farther. . . .[W]e address the key question: Should it have been clear to the agents that the security perimeter they established violated the First Amendment? . . . .No decision of which we are aware. . . would alert Secret Service agents engaged in crowd control that they bear a First Amendment obligation 'to ensure that groups with different viewpoints are at comparable locations at all times.'. .Nor would the maintenance of equal access make sense in the situation the agents confronted. . . .It may be, the agents acknowledged, that clearly established law proscribed the Secret Service from disadvantaging one group of speakers in comparison to another if the agents had 'no objectively reasonable security rationale' for their conduct, but acted solely to inhibit the expression of disfavored views. . . We agree with the agents, however, that the map itself . . . undermines the protesters' allegations of viewpoint discrimination as the sole reason for the agents' directions. The map corroborates that, because of their location, the protesters posed a potential security risk to the President, while the supporters, because of their location, did not. . . .This case comes to us on the agents' petition to review the Ninth Circuit's denial of their qualified immunity defense. . . Limiting our decision to that question, we hold, for the reasons stated, that the agents are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S. Ct. 2012, 2016, 2017, 2020-23 (2014) ("The courts below denied qualified immunity for police officers who shot the driver of a fleeing vehicle to put an end to a dangerous car chase. We reverse and hold that the officers did not violate the Fourth Amendment. In the alternative, we conclude that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because they violated no clearly established law. . . .Heeding our guidance in Pearson, we begin in this case with the question whether the officers' conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. This approach, we believe, will be 'beneficial' in 'develop[ing] constitutional precedent' in an area that courts typically consider in cases in which the defendant asserts a qualified immunity defense. . . . In this case, respondent advances two main Fourth Amendment arguments. First, she contends that the Fourth Amendment did not allow petitioners to use deadly force to terminate the chase. . . Second, she argues that the 'degree of force was excessive,' that is, that even if the officers were permitted to fire their weapons, they went too far when they fired as many rounds as they did. . . We address each issue in turn. . . . Rickard's outrageously reckless driving posed a grave public safety risk. And while it is true that Rickard's car eventually collided with a police car and came temporarily to a near standstill, that did not end the chase. Less than three seconds later, Rickard resumed maneuvering his car. Just before the shots were fired, when the front bumper of his car was flush with that of one of the police cruisers, Rickard was obviously pushing down on the accelerator because the car's wheels were spinning, and then Rickard threw the car into reverse 'in an attempt to escape.' Thus, the record conclusively disproves respondent's claim that the chase in the present case was already over when petitioners began shooting. Under the circumstances at the moment when the shots were fired, all that a reasonable police officer could have concluded was that Rickard was intent on resuming his flight and that, if he was allowed to do so, he would once again pose a deadly threat for others on the road. Rickard's conduct even after the shots were fired—as noted, he managed to drive away despite the efforts of the police to block his path—underscores the point. In light of the circumstances we have discussed, it is beyond serious dispute that Rickard's flight posed a grave public safety risk, and here, as in Scott, the police acted reasonably in using deadly force to end that risk. . . .We now consider respondent's contention that, even if the use of deadly force was permissible, petitioners acted unreasonably in firing a total of 15 shots. We reject that argument. It stands to reason that, if police officers are justified in firing at a suspect in order to end a severe threat to public safety, the officers need not stop shooting until the threat has ended. As petitioners noted below, 'if lethal force is justified, officers are taught to keep shooting until the threat is over.'. . .This would be a different case if petitioners had initiated a second round of shots after an initial round had clearly incapacitated Rickard and had ended any threat of continued flight, or if Rickard had clearly given himself up. But that is not what happened. In arguing that too many shots were fired, respondent relies in part on the presence of Kelly Allen in the front seat of the car, but we do not think that this factor changes the calculus. Our cases make it clear that 'Fourth Amendment rights are personal rights which ... may not be vicariously asserted.'. . Thus, the question before us is whether petitioners violated Rickard's Fourth Amendment rights, not Allen's. If a suit were brought on behalf of Allen under either § 1983 or state tort law, the risk to Allen would be of central concern. . . But Allen's presence in the car cannot enhance Rickard's Fourth Amendment rights. After all, it was Rickard who put Allen in danger by fleeing and refusing to end the chase, and it would be perverse if his disregard for Allen's safety worked to his benefit. . . . We have held that petitioners' conduct did not violate the Fourth Amendment, but even if that were not the case, petitioners would still be entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity. An official sued under § 1983 is entitled to qualified immunity unless it is shown that the official violated a statutory or constitutional right that was '"clearly established"' at the time of the challenged conduct. . . And a defendant cannot be said to have violated a clearly established right unless the right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it. . . . In other words, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question' confronted by the official 'beyond debate.'. . In addition, '[w]e have repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,'. . . since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced. We think our decision in Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 125 S. Ct. 596, 160 L.Ed.2d 583 (2004) (per curiam) squarely demonstrates that no clearly established law precluded petitioners' conduct at the time in question. . . .Brosseau makes plain that as of February 21, 1999—the date of the events at issue in that case—it was not clearly established that it was unconstitutional to shoot a fleeing driver to protect those whom his flight might endanger. We did not consider later decided cases because they 'could not have given fair notice to [the officer].'. . To defeat immunity here, then, respondent must show at a minimum either (1) that the officers' conduct in this case was materially different from the conduct in Brosseau or (2) that between February 21, 1999, and July 18, 2004, there emerged either '"controlling authority"' or a 'robust "consensus of cases of persuasive authority,"'. . . that would alter our analysis of the qualified immunity question. Respondent has made neither showing.")

Stanton v. Sims, 134 S. Ct. 3, 5, 7 (2013) (per curiam) ("There is no suggestion in this case that Officer Stanton knowingly violated the Constitution; the question is whether, in light of precedent existing at the time, he was 'plainly incompetent' in entering Sims' yard to pursue the fleeing Patrick. . . The Ninth Circuit concluded that he was. It did so despite the fact that federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit of that suspect. . . .To summarize the law at the time Stanton made his split-second decision to enter Sims' yard: Two opinions of this Court were equivocal on the lawfulness of his entry; two opinions of the State Court of Appeal affirmatively authorized that entry; the most relevant opinion of the Ninth Circuit was readily distinguishable; two Federal District Courts in the Ninth Circuit had granted qualified immunity in the wake of that opinion; and the federal and state courts of last resort around the Nation were sharply divided. We do not express any view on whether Officer Stanton's entry into Sims' yard in pursuit of Patrick was constitutional. But whether or not the constitutional rule applied by the court below was correct, it was not 'beyond debate.' al–Kidd, supra, at ——, 131 S.Ct., at 2083. Stanton may have been mistaken in believing his actions were justified, but he was not 'plainly incompetent.'") [*See Lange v. California, 141 S. Ct. 2011 (2021) ("The flight of a suspected misdemeanant does not always justify a warrantless entry into a home. An officer must consider all the circumstances in a pursuit case to determine whether there is a law enforcement emergency. On many occasions, the officer will have good reason to enter—to prevent imminent harms of violence, destruction of evidence, or escape from the home. But when the officer has time to get a warrant, he must do so—even though the misdemeanant fled.")]

Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2093-97 (2012) ("We granted certiorari on two questions: whether a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim may lie despite the presence of probable cause to support the arrest, and whether clearly established law at the time of Howards' arrest so held. . . . If the answer to either question is 'no,' then the agents are entitled to qualified immunity. We elect to address only the second question. We conclude that, at the time of Howards' arrest, it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could violate the First Amendment. We, therefore, reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals denying petitioners qualified immunity. . . .The 'clearly established' standard is not satisfied here. This Court has never recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause; nor was such a right otherwise clearly established at the time of Howards' arrest. . . .Here, the right in question is not the general right to be free from retaliation for one's speech, but the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause. This Court has never held that there is such a right. . . . We next consider Tenth Circuit precedent. Assuming arguendo that controlling Court of Appeals' authority could be a dispositive source of clearly established law in the circumstances of this case, the Tenth Circuit's cases do not satisfy the 'clearly established' standard here. . . .At the time of Howards' arrest, Hartman's impact on the Tenth Circuit's precedent governing retaliatory arrests was far from clear. Although the facts of Hartman involved only a retaliatory prosecution, reasonable officers could have questioned whether the rule of Hartman also applied to arrests. . . . A reasonable official also could have interpreted Hartman's rationale to apply to retaliatory arrests. . . . Like retaliatory prosecution cases, evidence of the presence or absence of probable cause for the arrest will be available in virtually every retaliatory arrest case. Such evidence could be thought similarly fatal to a plaintiff's claim that animus caused his arrest, given that retaliatory arrest cases also present a tenuous causal connection between the defendant's alleged animus and the plaintiff's injury. . . . To be sure, we do not suggest that Hartman's rule in fact extends to arrests. Nor do we suggest that every aspect of Hartman's rationale could apply to retaliatory arrests. Hartman concluded that the causal connection in retaliatory prosecution cases is attenuated because those cases necessarily involve the animus of one person and the injurious action of another, 547 U.S., at 262, but in many retaliatory arrest cases, it is the officer bearing the alleged animus who makes the injurious arrest. Moreover, Hartman noted that, in retaliatory prosecution cases, the causal connection between the defendant's animus and the prosecutor's decision is further weakened by the 'presumption of regularity accorded to prosecutorial decisionmaking.'. .That presumption does not apply here. Nonetheless, the fact remains that, for qualified immunity purposes, at the time of Howards' arrest it was at least arguable that Hartman's rule extended to retaliatory arrests. . . . Hartman injected uncertainty into the law governing retaliatory arrests, particularly in light of Hartman's rationale and the close relationship between retaliatory arrest and prosecution claims. This uncertainty was only confirmed by subsequent appellate decisions that disagreed over whether the reasoning in Hartman applied similarly to retaliatory arrests. Accordingly, when Howards was arrested it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could give rise to a First Amendment violation. Petitioners Reichle and Doyle are thus entitled to qualified immunity.") Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2097, 2098 (2012) (Ginsburg, J., with whom Breyer, J., joins, concurring in the judgment) ("Were defendants ordinary law enforcement officers, I would hold that Hartman v. Moore . . . does not support their entitlement to qualified immunity. . . . A similar causation problem will not arise in the typical retaliatory-arrest case. Unlike prosecutors, arresting officers are not wholly immune from suit. As a result, a plaintiff can sue the arresting officer directly and need only show that the officer (not some other official) acted with a retaliatory motive. Because, in the usual retaliatory arrest case, there is no gap to bridge between one government official's animus and a second government official's action, Hartman's no-probable-cause requirement is inapplicable. Nevertheless, I concur in the Court's judgment. Officers assigned to protect public officials must make singularly swift, on the spot, decisions whether the safety of the person they are guarding is in jeopardy. In performing that protective function, they rightly take into account words spoken to, or in the proximity of, the person whose safety is their charge. Whatever the views of Secret Service Agents Reichle and Doyle on the administration's policies in Iraq, they were duty bound to take the content of Howards' statements into account in determining whether he posed an immediate threat to the Vice President's physical security. Retaliatory animus cannot be inferred from the assessment they made in that regard. If rational, that assessment should not expose them to claims for civil damages.")

Note on Post-Reichle Cases:

Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1721, 1724- 28 (2019) ("We are asked to resolve whether probable cause to make an arrest defeats a claim that the arrest was in retaliation for speech protected by the First Amendment. . . . Reichle and Lozman also recognized that the two claims give rise to complex causal inquiries for somewhat different reasons. Unlike retaliatory prosecution cases, retaliatory arrest cases do not implicate the presumption of prosecutorial regularity or necessarily involve multiple government actors (although this case did). . . But regardless of the source of the causal complexity, the ultimate problem remains the same. For both claims, it is particularly difficult to determine whether the adverse government action was caused by the officer's malice or the plaintiff's potentially criminal conduct. . . Because of the 'close relationship' between the two claims, . . their related causal challenge should lead to the same solution: The plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest. . . . Bartlett's purely subjective approach would undermine that precedent by allowing even doubtful retaliatory arrest suits to proceed based solely on allegations about an arresting officer's mental state. . . Because a state of mind is 'easy to allege and hard to disprove,'. . . a subjective inquiry would threaten to set off 'broad-ranging discovery' in which 'there often is no clear end to the relevant evidence[.]'. . As a result, policing certain events like an unruly protest would pose overwhelming litigation risks. Any inartful turn of phrase or perceived slight during a legitimate arrest could land an officer in years of litigation. Bartlett's standard would thus 'dampen the ardor of all but the most resolute, or the most irresponsible, in the unflinching discharge of their duties.'. . . Adopting Hartman's no-probable-cause rule in this closely related context addresses those familiar concerns. Absent such a showing, a retaliatory arrest claim fails. But if the plaintiff establishes the absence of probable cause, 'then the Mt. Healthy test governs: The plaintiff must show that the retaliation was a substantial or motivating factor behind the [arrest], and, if that showing is made, the defendant can prevail only by showing that the [arrest] would have been initiated without respect to retaliation.'. . . Although probable cause should generally defeat a retaliatory arrest claim, a narrow qualification is warranted for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so. In such cases, an unyielding requirement to show the absence of probable cause could pose 'a risk that some police officers may exploit the arrest power as a means of suppressing speech.'. .When § 1983 was adopted, officers were generally privileged to make warrantless arrests for misdemeanors only in limited circumstances. . .Today, however, 'statutes in all 50 States and the District of Columbia permit warrantless misdemeanor arrests' in a much wider range of situations—often whenever officers have probable cause for 'even a very minor criminal offense.'. . . For those reasons, we conclude that the no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been. Cf. United States v. Armstrong, 517 U. S. 456, 465 (1996). That showing addresses Hartman's causal concern by helping to establish that 'non-retaliatory grounds [we]re in fact insufficient to provoke the adverse consequences.'. . And like a probable cause analysis, it provides an objective inquiry that avoids the significant problems that would arise from reviewing police conduct under a purely subjective standard. Because this inquiry is objective, the statements and motivations of the particular arresting officer are 'irrelevant' at this stage. . . After making the required showing, the plaintiff's claim may proceed in the same manner as claims where the plaintiff has met the threshold showing of the absence of probable cause. . . .Because there was probable cause to arrest Bartlett, his retaliatory arrest claim fails as a matter of law.")

Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1728-29 (2019) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("I do not join Part II–D . . . because I do not agree that 'a narrow qualification is warranted for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.'. . That qualification has no basis in either the common law or our First Amendment precedents. . . . Because no common-law tort for retaliatory arrest in violation of the freedom of speech existed when § 1983 was enacted, we 'look to the common-law torts that "provid[e] the closest analogy" to this claim.'. . Here, those torts are false imprisonment, malicious arrest, and malicious prosecution. . .The existence of probable cause generally excused an officer from liability for these three torts, without regard to the treatment of similarly situated individuals. . . . Indeed, the majority cites not a single common-law case that supports imposing liability based on an officer's treatment of similarly situated individuals. . . . The majority's exception is also untethered from our First Amendment precedents. . . . The majority today imports its 'qualification' from our jurisprudence on selective-prosecution claims. . . But '[t]he requirements for a selective-prosecution claim draw on "ordinary equal protection standards,"' not the First Amendment. . . That jurisprudence therefore is not relevant here. . . With no guidance from the common law or relevant precedents, the majority crafts its exception as a matter of policy. But this 'narrow' qualification threatens to derail our retaliation jurisprudence in several ways. For one, although the majority's stated concern is with ' "warrantless misdemeanor arrests"' for ' "very minor"' offenses like 'jaywalking,'. . . its exception apparently applies to all offenses, including serious felonies. This overbroad exception thus is likely to encourage protracted litigation about which individuals are 'similarly situated,'. . . while doing little to vindicate First Amendment rights. Moreover, the majority's rule risks chilling law enforcement officers from making arrests for fear of liability, thus flouting the reasoning behind the emphasis on probable cause in arrest-based torts at common law. . . In short, the majority's exception lacks the support of history, precedent, and sound policy. . . .The requirement that plaintiffs bringing First Amendment retaliatory-arrest claims plead and prove the absence of probable cause is supported by the common law and our First Amendment precedents. The majority's new exception has no basis in either. Accordingly, I join all but Part II–D of the majority opinion.")

Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1730-34 (2019) (Gorsuch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The parties approach their dispute from some common ground. Both sides accept that an officer violates the First Amendment when he arrests an individual in retaliation for his protected speech. They seem to agree, too, that the presence of probable cause does not undo that violation or erase its significance. And for good reason. History shows that governments sometimes seek to regulate our lives finely, acutely, thoroughly, and exhaustively. In our own time and place, criminal laws have grown so exuberantly and come to cover so much previously innocent conduct that almost anyone can be arrested for something. If the state could use these laws not for their intended purposes but to silence those who voice unpopular ideas, little would be left of our First Amendment liberties, and little would separate us from the tyrannies of the past or the malignant fiefdoms of our own age. The freedom to speak without risking arrest is 'one of the principal characteristics by which we distinguish a free nation.'. . .So if probable cause can't erase a First Amendment violation, the question becomes whether its presence at least forecloses a civil claim for damages as a statutory matter under § 1983. But look at that statute as long as you like and you will find no reference to the presence or absence of probable cause as a precondition or defense to any suit. Instead, the statute imposes liability on anyone who, under color of state law, subjects another person 'to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution.' Maybe it would be good policy to graft a no-probable-cause requirement onto the statute, as the officers insist; or maybe not. Either way, that's an appeal better directed to Congress than to this Court. Our job isn't to write or revise legislative policy but to apply it faithfully. Admittedly, though, that's not quite the end of the statutory story. Courts often assume that Congress adopts statutes against the backdrop of the common law. And, for this reason, we generally read § 1983's terms 'in harmony with general principles of tort immunities and defenses' that existed at the time of the statute's adoption. . . As the officers before us are quick to point out, too, law enforcement agents who made a lawful arrest at the time of § 1983's adoption couldn't be held liable at common law for the tort of false arrest or false imprisonment. Of course, at common law a police officer often needed a warrant to execute a lawful arrest. But today warrantless arrests are often both authorized by state law and permitted by the Constitution (as this Court has interpreted it), so long as the officer possesses probable cause to believe a crime has been committed. And, given this development, you might wonder if the presence of probable cause should be enough to foreclose any First Amendment claim arising out of an arrest. But that much doesn't follow. As the officers' own reasoning exposes, the point of the common law tort of false arrest or false imprisonment was to remedy arrests and imprisonments effected without lawful authority. . . So maybe probable cause should be enough today to defeat claims for false arrest or false imprisonment, given that arrests today are usually legally authorized if supported by probable cause. But that doesn't mean probable cause is also enough to defeat a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim. The point of this kind of claim isn't to guard against officers who lack lawful authority to make an arrest. Rather, it's to guard against officers who abuse their authority by making an otherwise lawful arrest for an unconstitutional reason. Here's another way to look at it. The common law tort of false arrest translates more or less into a Fourth Amendment claim. That's because our precedent considers a warrantless arrest unsupported by probable cause—the sort that gave rise to a false arrest claim at common law—to be an unreasonable seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . But the First Amendment operates independently of the Fourth and provides different protections. It seeks not to ensure lawful authority to arrest but to protect the freedom of speech. Here's a way to test the point, too. Everyone accepts that a detention based on race, even one otherwise authorized by law, violates the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. . . . I can think of no sound reason why the same shouldn't hold true here. Like a Fourteenth Amendment selective arrest claim, a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim serves a different purpose than a Fourth Amendment unreasonable arrest claim, and that purpose does not depend on the presence or absence of probable cause. We thus have no legitimate basis for engrafting a no-probable-cause requirement onto a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim. But while it would be a mistake to think the absence of probable cause is an essential element of a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim under § 1983—or that the presence of probable cause is an absolute defense to such a claim—I acknowledge that it may also be a mistake to assume probable cause is entirely irrelevant to the analysis. It seems to me that probable cause to arrest could still bear on the claim's viability in at least two ways that warrant further exploration in future cases. First, consider causation. To show an arrest violated the First Amendment, everyone agrees a plaintiff must prove the officer would not have arrested him but for his protected speech. And if the only offense for which probable cause to arrest existed was a minor infraction of the sort that wouldn't normally trigger an arrest in the circumstances—or if the officer couldn't identify a crime for which probable cause existed until well after the arrest—then causation might be a question for the jury. By contrast, if the officer had probable cause at the time of the arrest to think the plaintiff committed a serious crime of the sort that would nearly always trigger an arrest regardless of speech, then (absent extraordinary circumstances) it's hard to see how a reasonable jury might find that the plaintiff's speech caused the arrest. In cases like that, it would seem that officers often will be entitled to dismissal on the pleadings or summary judgment. In the name of causation concerns, the officers ask us to go further still and hold that a plaintiff can never prove protected speech caused his arrest without first showing that the officers lacked probable cause to make an arrest. But that absolute rule doesn't wash with common experience. No one doubts that officers regularly choose against making arrests, especially for minor crimes, even when they possess probable cause. So the presence of probable cause does not necessarily negate the possibility that an arrest was caused by unlawful First Amendment retaliation. . . . Though this case involves a retaliatory arrest claim rather than a selective prosecution claim, it's at least an open question whether the concerns that drove this Court's decision in Armstrong may be in play here. No one before us argues that Armstrong was wrongly decided. And the Court today seems to indicate that something like Armstrong's standard might govern a retaliatory arrest claim when probable cause exists to support an arrest. . . Some courts of appeals, too, have already applied Armstrong to claims alleging selective arrest under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . At the same time, enough questions remain about Armstrong's potential application that I hesitate to speak definitively about it today. Some courts of appeals have argued that Armstrong should not extend, at least without qualification, beyond prosecutorial decisions to arrests by police. These courts have suggested that the presumptions of regularity and immunity that usually attach to official prosecutorial decisions do not apply equally in the less formal setting of police arrests. They've reasoned, too, that comparative data about similarly situated individuals may be less readily available for arrests than for prosecutorial decisions, and that other kinds of evidence—such as an officer's questions and comments to the defendant—may be equally if not more probative in the arrest context. . . Importantly, we did not grant certiorari to resolve exactly how Armstrong might apply to retaliatory arrest claims. Nor did the briefing before us explore the competing arguments in this circuit split. And given all this, I believe it would be rash for us to do more at this point than acknowledge the possibility of Armstrong's application. Dissenting, JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR reads the majority opinion as adopting a rigid rule (more rigid, in fact, than Armstrong's) that First Amendment retaliatory arrest plaintiffs who can't prove the absence of probable cause must produce 'comparison-based evidence' in every case. . . But I do not understand the majority as going that far. The only citation the majority offers in support of its new standard is Armstrong, which expressly left open the possibility that other kinds of evidence, such as admissions, might be enough to allow a claim to proceed. Given that, I retain hope that lower courts will apply today's decision 'commonsensically,'. . . and with sensitivity to the competing arguments about whether and how Armstrong might apply in the arrest setting. For today, I believe it is enough to resolve the question on which we did grant certiorari—whether 'probable cause defeats ... a First Amendment retaliatory-arrest claim under § 1983.'. . I would hold, as the majority does, that the absence of probable cause is not an absolute requirement of such a claim and its presence is not an absolute defense. At the same time, I would also acknowledge that this does not mean the presence of probable cause is categorically irrelevant: It may bear on causation, and it may play a role under Armstrong. But rather than attempt to sort out precisely when and how probable cause plays a role in First Amendment claims, I would reserve decision on those questions until they are properly presented to this Court and we can address them with the benefit of full adversarial testing.")

Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1734-35 (2019) (Ginsburg, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part) ("If failure to show lack of probable cause defeats an action under 42 U. S. C. § 1983, only entirely baseless arrests will be checked. I remain of the view that the Court's decision in Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Ed. v. Doyle, 429 U. S. 274 (1977), strikes the right balance: The plaintiff bears the burden of demonstrating that unconstitutional animus was a motivating factor for an adverse action; the burden then shifts to the defendant to demonstrate that, even without any impetus to retaliate, the defendant would have taken the action complained of. . . In this case, I would reverse the Ninth Circuit's judgment as to Trooper Weight. As the Court points out, the record is bereft of evidence of retaliation on Weight's part. . . As to Sergeant Nieves, there is some evidence of animus in Nieves' statement, 'bet you wish you would have talked to me now,'. . . but perhaps not enough to survive summary judgment. . . In any event, I would not use this thin case to state a rule that will leave press members and others exercising First Amendment rights with little protection against police suppression of their speech.")

Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1735-42 (2019) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) ("We granted certiorari to decide whether probable cause alone always suffices to defeat a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim under 42 U. S. C. § 1983. The Court answers that question 'no'—a correct and sensible bottom line on which eight Justices agree. There is no basis in § 1983 or in the Constitution to withhold a remedy for an arrest that violated the First Amendment solely because the officer could point to probable cause that some offense, no matter how trivial or obviously pretextual, has occurred. Unfortunately, a slimmer majority of the Court chooses not to stop there. The majority instead announces a different rule: that a showing of probable cause will defeat a § 1983 First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim unless the person arrested happens to be able to show that 'otherwise similarly situated individuals' whose speech differed were not arrested. . . The Court barely attempts to explain where in the First Amendment or § 1983 it finds any grounding for that rule, which risks letting flagrant violations go unremedied. Because the correct approach would be simply to apply the well-established, carefully calibrated standards that govern First Amendment retaliation claims in other contexts, I respectfully dissent. . . . As JUSTICE GORSUCH explains, the issue here is not whether an arrest motivated by protected speech may violate the First Amendment despite probable cause for the arrest; the question is under what circumstances § 1983 permits a remedy for such a violation. . . From that common starting point, JUSTICE GORSUCH and I travel far down the same path. I agree that neither the text nor the common-law backdrop of § 1983 supports imposing on First Amendment retaliatory arrest claims a probable-cause requirement that we would not impose in other contexts. . . I agree that Hartman v. Moore, 547 U. S. 250 (2006), turned on concerns specific to malicious prosecution, and that its automatic probable-cause bar therefore does not extend to claims like this one. . . And I agree that—while probable cause has undeniable evidentiary significance to the underlying question of what motivated an arrest—some arrests are demonstrably retaliation for protected speech, notwithstanding probable cause of some coincidental infraction. . . Plaintiffs should have a meaningful opportunity to prove such claims when they arise. I follow this logic to its natural conclusion: Courts should evaluate retaliatory arrest claims in the same manner as they would other First Amendment retaliation claims. . . The standard framework for distinguishing legitimate exercises of governmental authority from those intended to chill protected speech is well established. See Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Ed. v. Doyle, 429 U. S. 274, 287 (1977). The plaintiff must first establish that constitutionally protected conduct was a ' "substantial"' or ' "motivating"' factor in the challenged governmental action (here, an arrest). . . If the plaintiff can make that threshold showing, the question becomes whether the governmental actor (here, the arresting officer) can show that the same decision would have been made regardless of the protected conduct. . . If not, the governmental actor is liable. . . In other words, if retaliatory animus was not a 'but-for cause' of an arrest, a suit seeking to hold the arresting officer liable will fail 'for lack of causal connection between unconstitutional motive and resulting harm.'. .This timeworn standard is by no means easily satisfied. Even in cases where there is 'proof of some retaliatory animus,'. .

. if evidence of retaliatory motive is weak, or evidence of nonretaliatory motive is strong, but-for causation will generally be lacking. That is why probable cause to believe that someone was a serial killer would defeat any First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim—even if, say, there were evidence that the officers also detested the suspect's political beliefs. . . .Regrettably, the Court casts aside the Mt. Healthy standard for many arrests. It instead announces that courts should look beyond the presence of probable cause only when (in its view) the evidence of a constitutional violation is objective' enough to warrant further inquiry—namely, when a plaintiff can muster evidence 'that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . Plaintiffs who would rely on other evidence to prove a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim appear to be out of luck, even if they could offer other, unassailable proof of an officer's unconstitutional 'statements and motivations.'. .To give partial credit where due: The Court sensibly rejects the absolute probable-cause bar urged by petitioners and embraced by JUSTICE THOMAS, . . . and its contrary rule will at least allow the First Amendment to operate in some cases where it is sorely needed. The majority's reasons for imposing a probable-cause bar in some cases but not others, however, do not withstand scrutiny. And by arbitrarily insisting upon comparison-based evidence, the majority's rule fences out First Amendment violations for which redress is equally if not more 'warranted,'. . . leaving the public exposed potentially to flagrant abuses. . . .On the practical side, the majority worries that because discerning the connection between an arrest and a retaliatory motive may involve causal complexities,' . . .; some plaintiffs who raise dubious challenges to lawful arrests may evade early dismissal under Mt. Healthy[.] . . Our precedents do not permit an interpretation of § 1983 to rest on such a freewheeling policy choice,'. . . and in any event the majority's concerns do not withstand scrutiny. With regard to the majority's concern that establishing a causal link to retaliatory animus will sometimes be complex: That is true of most unconstitutional motive claims, yet we generally trust that courts are up to the task of managing them. . . And the Mt. Healthy standard accounts for the delicacy of such inquiries with its but-for causation requirement, calibrated to balance governmental interests with individual rights. . . As for the risk of litigating dubious claims, the Court pays too high a price to avoid what may well be a marginal inconvenience. Prevailing First Amendment standards have long governed retaliatory arrest cases in the Ninth Circuit, and experience there suggests that trials in these cases are rare—the parties point to only a handful of cases that have reached trial in more than a decade. . . Even accepting that, every so often, a police officer who made a legitimate arrest might have to explain that arrest to a jury, that is insufficient reason to curtail the First Amendment. No legal standard bats a thousand, and district courts already possess helpful tools to minimize the burdens of litigation in cases alleging constitutionally improper motives. . . . Far from supporting the novel burden the Court imposes on First Amendment retaliatory arrest plaintiffs, then, the analogy on which the majority's analysis depends is an unfounded exercise in hybridizing two different constitutional protections. The result is a Frankenstein-like constitutional tort that may do more harm than good. . . . Were it simply an unorthodox solution to an illusory problem, the standard announced today would be benign. But by rejecting direct evidence of unconstitutional motives in favor of more convoluted comparative proof, the majority's standard proposes to ration First Amendment protection in an illogical manner. And those arbitrary legal results in turn will breed opportunities for the rare ill-intentioned officer to violate the First Amendment without consequence—and, in some cases, openly and unabashedly. These are costs the Court should not tolerate. The basic error of the Court's new rule is that it arbitrarily fetishizes one specific type of motive evidence—treatment of comparators—at the expense of other modes of proof. . . In particular, the majority goes out of its way to forswear reliance on an officer's own 'statements,'. . . even though such direct admissions may often be the best available evidence of unconstitutional motive. As a result, the Court's standard in some cases will have the strange effect of requiring courts to blind themselves to smoking-gun evidence while simultaneously insisting upon an inferential sort of proof that, though potentially powerful, can be prohibitively difficult to obtain. The Court's decision to cast aside evidence of the arresting officer's own statements is puzzling. . . . Instead, the majority suggests that comparison-based evidence is the sole gateway through the probable-cause barrier that it otherwise erects. Such evidence can be prohibitively difficult to come by in other selective-enforcement contexts, and it may be even harder for retaliatory arrest plaintiffs to muster. . . After all, while records of arrests and prosecutions can be hard to obtain, it will be harder still to identify arrests that never happened. And unlike race, gender, or other protected characteristics, speech is not typically sorted into statistical buckets that are susceptible of ready categorization and comparison. The threshold exercise prescribed today—comparing and contrasting a plaintiff's protected speech and allegedly illegal actions with the speech and behavior of others who could have been arrested but were not—is likely to prove vexing in most cases. I suspect that those who can navigate this requirement predominantly will be arrestees singled out at protests or other large public gatherings, where a robust pool of potential comparators happens to be within earshot, eyeshot, or camera-shot. . . While some who fit that bill undoubtedly need the protection, see, e.g., Brief for National Press Photographers Association et al. as Amici Curiae 9–15 (collecting examples of journalists arrested during public protests or gatherings), it is hard to see why those plaintiffs are the only ones deserving of a § 1983 remedy. . .Put into practice, the majority's approach will yield arbitrary results and shield willful misconduct from accountability. . . . Worse, because the majority disclaims reliance on 'statements and motivations' for its threshold inquiry, . . . it risks licensing even clear-cut abuses. . . . I do not mean to overstate the clarity of today's holding. What exactly the Court means by 'objective evidence,' 'otherwise similarly situated,' and 'the same sort of protected speech' is far from clear. . . I hope that courts approach this new standard commonsensically. It is hard to see what point is served by requiring a journalist arrested for jaywalking to point to specific other jaywalkers who got a free pass, for example, if statistics or common sense confirm that jaywalking arrests are extremely rare. Otherwise, there will be little daylight between the comparison-based standard the Court adopts and the absolute bar it ostensibly rejects. . .JUSTICE GORSUCH, alert to the illogic of the majority's position, instead contemplates borrowing a requirement to adduce 'clear evidence' of prohibited purpose from our cases concerning equal-protection-based selective-prosecution claims. . . This suggestion, though perhaps an improvement over the majority's approach, would nevertheless take a doctrine applying (1) equal protection principles (2) in a criminal proceeding to (3) charging decisions by prosecutors. . . and ask it also to govern the application of (1) First Amendment principles (2) in a suit for civil damages challenging (3) arrests by police officers. JUSTICE GORSUCH commendably reserves judgment on a proposal not yet subjected to adversarial testing, so I too refrain from speaking too definitively. . . . For the foregoing reasons, I agree with JUSTICE GINSBURG that the tried-and-true Mt. Healthy approach remains the correct one. And because petitioners have not asked us to revisit the Court of Appeals' application of the governing standard, I would affirm. . . .The power to constrain a person's liberty is delegated to law enforcement officers by the public in a sacred trust. The First Amendment stands as a bulwark of that trust, erected by people who knew from personal experience the dangers of abuse that follow from investing anyone with such awesome power. . .Because the majority shortchanges that hard-earned wisdom in the name of marginal convenience, I respectfully dissent.") Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, Fla., 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1951, 1954-55 (2018) ("Lozman's claim is that, notwithstanding the presence of probable cause, his arrest at the city council meeting violated the First Amendment because the arrest was ordered in retaliation for his earlier, protected speech: his open-meetings lawsuit and his prior public criticisms of city officials. The question this Court is asked to consider is whether the existence of probable cause bars that First Amendment retaliation claim. . . [W]hether in a retaliatory arrest case the Hartman approach should apply, thus barring a suit where probable cause exists, or, on the other hand, the inquiry should be governed only by Mt. Healthy is a determination that must await a different case. For Lozman's claim is far afield from the typical retaliatory arrest claim, and the difficulties that might arise if Mt. Healthy is applied to the mine run of arrests made by police officers are not present here. . . . Here Lozman does not sue the officer who made the arrest. Indeed, Lozman likely could not have maintained a retaliation claim against the arresting officer in these circumstances, because the officer appears to have acted in good faith, and there is no showing that the officer had any knowledge of Lozman's prior speech or any motive to arrest him for his earlier expressive activities. Instead Lozman alleges more governmental action than simply an arrest. His claim is that the City itself retaliated against him pursuant to an 'official municipal policy' of intimidation. . . In particular, he alleges that the City, through its legislators, formed a premeditated plan to intimidate him in retaliation for his criticisms of city officials and his open-meetings lawsuit. And he asserts that the City itself, through the same high officers, executed that plan by ordering his arrest at the November 2006 city council meeting. The fact that Lozman must prove the existence and enforcement of an official policy motivated by retaliation separates Lozman's claim from the typical retaliatory arrest claim. . . . This unique class of retaliatory arrest claims, moreover, will require objective evidence of a policy motivated by retaliation to survive summary judgment. Lozman, for instance, cites a transcript of a closed-door city council meeting and a video recording of his arrest. There is thus little risk of a flood of retaliatory arrest suits against high-level policymakers. As a final matter, it must be underscored that this Court has recognized the 'right to petition as one of the most precious of the liberties safeguarded by the Bill of Rights.'. . Lozman alleges the City deprived him of this liberty by retaliating against him for his lawsuit against the City and his criticisms of public officials. Thus, Lozman's speech is high in the hierarchy of First Amendment values. . . For these reasons, Lozman need not prove the absence of probable cause to maintain a claim of retaliatory arrest against the City. On facts like these, Mt. Healthy provides the correct standard for assessing a retaliatory arrest claim. The Court need not, and does not, address the elements required to prove a retaliatory arrest claim in other contexts. This is not to say, of course, that Lozman is ultimately entitled to relief or even a new trial. On remand, the Court of Appeals, applying Mt. Healthy and other relevant precedents, may consider any arguments in support of the District Court's judgment that have been preserved by the City. Among other matters, the Court of Appeals may wish to consider (1) whether any reasonable juror could find that the City actually formed a retaliatory policy to intimidate Lozman during its June 2006 closed-door session; (2) whether any reasonable juror could find that the November 2006 arrest constituted an official act by the City; and (3) whether, under Mt. Healthy, the City has proved that it would have arrested Lozman regardless of any retaliatory animus—for example, if Lozman's conduct during prior city council meetings had also violated valid rules as to proper subjects of discussion, thus explaining his arrest here. For these reasons, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, Fla., 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1955-56 (2018) (Thomas, J., dissenting) ("We granted certiorari to decide 'whether the existence of probable cause defeats a First Amendment claim for retaliatory arrest under [42 U.S.C.] § 1983.'. . Instead of resolving that question, the Court decides that probable cause should not defeat a 'unique class of retaliatory arrest claims.'. . To fall within this unique class, a claim must involve objective evidence, of an official municipal policy of retaliation, formed well before the arrest, in response to highly protected speech, that has little relation to the offense of arrest. . . .No one briefed, argued, or even hinted at the rule that the Court announces today. Instead of dreaming up our own rule, I would have answered the question presented and held that plaintiffs must plead and prove a lack of probable cause as an element of a First Amendment retaliatory-arrest claim. I respectfully dissent. . . .By my count, the Court has identified five conditions that are necessary to trigger its new rule. First, there must be 'an "official municipal policy" of intimidation.'. . Second, the policy must be 'premeditated' and formed well before the arrest—here, for example, the policy was formed 'months earlier.'. . Third, there must be 'objective evidence' of such a policy. . . Fourth, there must be 'little relation' between the 'protected speech' that prompted the retaliatory policy and 'the criminal offense for which the arrest is made.'. . Finally, the protected speech that provoked the retaliatory policy must be 'high in the hierarchy of First Amendment values.'. . Where all these features are present, the Court explains, there is not the same 'causation problem' that exists for other retaliatory-arrest claims. . . I find it hard to believe that there will be many cases where this rule will even arguably apply, and even harder to believe that the plaintiffs in those cases will actually prove all five requirements. Not even Lozman's case is a good fit, as the Court admits when it discusses the relevant considerations for remand. . . In my view, we should not have gone out of our way to fashion a complicated rule with no apparent applicability to this case or any other. . . Turning to the question presented, I would hold that plaintiffs bringing a First Amendment retaliatory-arrest claim must plead and prove an absence of probable cause.").

See also Sears v. Roberts, No. 15-15080, 2019 WL 1785355, at *6–7 (11th Cir. Apr. 24, 2019) (Martin, J., concurring) ("I concur entirely in the well-reasoned opinion of the majority. Mr. Sears's sworn allegations directly contradict the prison officials' version of the incident. Our legal system tasks juries with arriving at the truth from among conflicting accounts. Cases brought by inmates are no exception. Our Circuit departed from this allocation of factfinding responsibilities in O'Bryant v. Finch, 637 F.3d 1207 (11th Cir. 2011) (per curiam), and it was O'Bryant that led the District Court to deny Mr. Sears a trial. O'Bryant held that no inmate can state a First Amendment retaliation claim based on a disciplinary report if that inmate is found guilty of the infraction after a hearing that satisfies due process. . . The majority here rightly holds O'Bryant does not control the outcome for Mr. Sears. . . I write separately now to point out the flaws in the reasoning of O'Bryant and in hopes that this Court will correct them in an appropriate case. O'Bryant was wrong to hold that being found guilty of an infraction necessarily precludes a First Amendment retaliation claim. To state a retaliation claim, an inmate must show he (1) engaged in First Amendment protected conduct and (2) suffered an adverse action that would deter a person of ordinary firmness from exercising his First Amendment rights (3) because he engaged in protected conduct. . . First Amendment retaliation claims turn on whether a prison official took retaliatory action against an inmate because the inmate exercised his First Amendment rights. . . In other words, the question of whether retaliation occurred looks to why officials took the action they did, not whether they had a factual basis for doing so. That there is a factual basis for an inmate to be charged with an infraction does not negate the possibility of a retaliatory motive in bringing those charges. It plainly can be true both that an inmate violated a prison disciplinary rule and that a prison official disciplined the inmate because the inmate engaged in First Amendment-protected conduct. O'Bryant's ruling that guilt of an infraction precludes a retaliation claim overlooks the point that prison officials might impose discipline in order to retaliate. In missing this point, O'Bryant undermines the very purpose of retaliation claims: to ensure that prison officials do not chill inmates in the exercise of their First Amendment rights. O'Bryant's error took root when it transplanted due process principles to the First Amendment's altogether different soil. . . . Neither a finding that due process was accorded nor a finding that the disciplinary infraction happened should dispose of an inquiry into why officials took the action they did. O'Bryant's holding also puts us on the short side of a circuit split. The Third, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits have all taken a view contrary to ours. [collecting cases] Under our Circuit rules, no panel may overrule O'Bryant. . . Here, the panel has determined that the rule from O'Bryant does not apply in any event. Nevertheless, when the appropriate case presents itself, I believe the holding in O'Bryant merits the attention of the whole Court.")

Post-Nieves Cases

D.C. CIRCUIT

Goodwin v. District of Columbia, No. 21-CV-806 (BAH), 2022 WL 123894, at *10 (D.D.C. Jan. 13, 2022) ("[P]laintiffs have plausibly alleged that defendants, including then-Chief Newsham, deployed excessive force against them and retaliated for engaging in protected speech to protest police brutality. To be sure, plaintiffs' assertion of retaliatory arrest is, as noted, viable under Nieves at this early stage, but their success on that claim will ultimately depend on 'present[ing] objective evidence' that then-Chief Newsham did not order, and MPD did not arrest, other individuals who also violated the curfew but were not participants in the protests against police brutality on June 1, 2020. . . The precise mechanisms by which then-Chief Newsham authorized and directed the conduct allegedly causing plaintiffs' well-alleged constitutional injuries and 'the particular circumstances that he ... faced' to inform his decision-making throughout the evening of June 1, 2020, . . . are thus unknown at this stage of the proceedings. . . This undeveloped factual record makes premature a ruling on then-Chief Newsham's qualified immunity claim. . . Accordingly, determining the applicability of qualified immunity must await further factual development and this defense does not provide a basis for dismissal of the § 1983 claims against then-Chief Newsham at this stage of the litigation.")

Whittaker v. Munoz, No. CV 17-1983 (EGS), 2019 WL 4194499, at *5 & n.9 (D.D.C. Sept. 4, 2019) ("In March 2017, the time of the arrest in this case, the precedent in this Circuit was inconclusive on the question of whether an arrest supported by probable cause could violate the First Amendment's protection against retaliatory arrests. See Nieves, 139 S.Ct. at 1728 (explaining that the Court took up the question in 2018, but "ultimately left the question unanswered"). . . And courts had not spoken on the issue of whether an officer who has probable cause to make an arrest, but would typically exercise his or her discretion not to, will violate the First Amendment if he or she arrests someone who engages in protected speech. Since there was no consensus view at the time of the actions in this case, even if there was a First Amendment violation for retaliatory arrest notwithstanding the fact Officer Munoz had probable cause to arrest Mr. Whittaker, Officer Munoz is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Therefore, the Court GRANTS Officer Munoz's motion for summary judgment on the First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim. . . . The Court notes that, as of May 28, 2019, it is clearly established that probable cause may not defeat a claim for retaliatory arrest when an officer arrests and individual who engages in protected speech but chooses not to arrest otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same type of protected speech.")

FIRST CIRCUIT

Ward v. Petow, No. CV 18-496-JJM-PAS, 2020 WL 1929125, at *4-5 (D.R.I. Apr. 21, 2020) ("The Court agrees with Det. Corporal Petow that Ms. Ward's claim of retaliatory arrest for exercise of her First Amendment rights must fail as it is undisputed that there was probable cause to arrest her. As correctly noted by both parties, the Supreme Court held in Nieves v. Bartlett that the Heck bar applies equally to First Amendment retaliatory arrest claims and the presence of probable cause thus generally bars recovery. . . Ms. Ward's plea of no contest acknowledged that there was probable cause to arrest her. As Ms. Ward points out, the Supreme Court did recognize a 'narrow qualification for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.'. . But, to fit into this narrow qualification, a plaintiff must 'present[ ] objective evidence that [she] was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . Ms. Ward has not presented any such 'objective evidence,' nor suggested that such evidence exists. Instead, she relies on the fact that she was not arrested until she complained of her breast being grabbed. . . That complaint, according to Ms. Ward, must have been the basis of the arrest and not her overall disorderly conduct. . . Unfortunately for Ms. Ward, that is not the type of objective evidence suitable for the narrow qualification recognized in Nieves and thus summary judgment for Det. Corporal Petow is appropriate.")

Cass v. Town of Wayland, No. CV 17-11441-PBS, 2019 WL 2292526, at *14–15 (D. Mass. May 30, 2019) (" 'Claims of retaliation for the exercise of First Amendment rights are cognizable under § 1983.'. . To prove a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim, a plaintiff must show that he engaged in constitutionally protected conduct and that he was subjected to an adverse action by the defendant. . .'The plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must [also] plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.' Nieves v. Bartlett, -- S.Ct. --, 2019 WL 2257157, at *6 (2019). 'Absent such a showing, a retaliatory arrest claim fails.'. . But, '[i]f the plaintiff proves the absence of probable cause, then the Mt. Healthy test governs: The plaintiff must show that the retaliation was a substantial or motivating factor behind the [arrest], and, if that showing is made, the defendant can prevail only by showing that the [arrest] would have been initiated without respect to retaliation.' Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1952 (2018). There is a 'narrow qualification' to the no-probable-cause requirement 'for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.'. . This exception is necessary because 'an unyielding requirement to show the absence of probable cause could pose a risk that some police officers may exploit the arrest power as a means of suppressing speech.'. . Thus, a plaintiff can overcome the requirement if he 'presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . If the plaintiff shows objective evidence, then 'the plaintiff's claim may proceed in the same manner as claims where the plaintiff has met the threshold showing of the absence of probable cause.'. . Cass asserts that his protected First Amendment activities include distributing the 'Three Amigos' fliers, distributing leaflets stating, 'Fire GAV,' and recording the Wayland football team practice in Maine. . . Cass has not asserted a violation of his First Amendment rights against the school officials, but to the extent his whistleblowing activity could be the basis for this claim, that argument has been disclaimed. . . Detective Berger had probable cause to arrest Cass, and that would normally be the end of the analysis under Nieves v. Bartlett. However, in light of the minor nature of the crime of failing to return a used laptop in the context of an employment dispute, an objective inquiry might produce evidence that an officer would typically exercise his discretion not to arrest other similarly situated individuals. . . Even if Cass could prove that the 'narrow qualification' applies, his claim still fails because there is no evidence that Berger was motivated by Cass's First Amendment activities as opposed to his retention of the purloined laptop. While Berger was likely aware of Cass's summertime incidents, Chief Irving directed Detective Berger to investigate the missing laptop based on information from school officials. Berger applied for and received a search warrant, and when he served that warrant on Cass at his home, he quickly found the laptop in question on Cass's couch, in plain view. Being aware of protected speech is not sufficient evidence that it was a substantial or motivating factor in the arrest. Cass's MCRA claim also fails as there is no evidence of a constitutional violation. Therefore, the Court grants summary judgment for the Defendants on Count V.")

SECOND CIRCUIT

Meyers v. City of New York, No. 19-892, 2020 WL 2079458, at *2 (2d Cir. Apr. 30, 2020) (not published) ("'The existence of probable cause defeats a First Amendment claim premised on the allegation that defendants arrested a plaintiff based on a retaliatory motive.'. . Though a narrow exception exists where there is 'objective evidence' that the police refrained from arresting similarly situated people not engaged in speech, Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1727 (2019), no such facts were alleged here. As Plaintiffs admit, the NYPD arrested 'everyone who remained in the [P]ark' following the dispersal order.")

Maradiaga v. City of New York, 16 Civ. 8325 (GBD), 2020 WL 5849465 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 1, 2020) ("In this case, probable cause existed to arrest Plaintiffs and they have not presented 'objective evidence that [they were] arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech ha[ve] not been.'. . That is, Plaintiffs have not demonstrated that other individuals who were not filming or handing out flyers, but were within feet of vehicles stopped at a checkpoint and who refused to comply with police orders to move a reasonable distance away, were not arrested. Plaintiffs present no evidence that Defendants' actions were motivated or substantially caused by their exercise of their First Amendment rights. It is undisputed that both Officer Cox and Sgt. Thorney told Plaintiffs they were welcome to film the checkpoint, though at a safe distance. . . Further, the 'back' team was also filming the checkpoint. Those two individuals, however, were not arrested.")

Nigro v. City of New York, No. 19-CV-2369 (JMF), 2020 WL 5503539, at *1-5 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 11, 2020) ("Although Nigro's allegations are troubling and several of his claims would be sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss under current law, the law as it existed at the time of Nigro's arrest compels the Court to grant Defendants' motion on all claims save one: a failure-to-train claim against the City. Accordingly, and for the reasons that follow, Defendants' motion is granted except as to that one claim. . . . Here, Nigro's own Complaint makes plain that there was probable cause — or, at a minimum, arguable probable cause — to arrest him for jaywalking. Indeed, his 'striking' photograph of NYPD officers walking down 57th Street (which appears in the Complaint) confirms that, shortly before his arrest, he stood in the middle of the street. . . . Nigro's claim of retaliatory arrest in violation of the First Amendment is more complicated, if only because the Supreme Court held last year that probable cause does not defeat such a claim 'when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.' Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1727 (2019). In justifying this exception to the general rule that probable cause defeats a retaliatory arrest claim, the Court noted the broad discretion of law enforcement officers to arrest 'for "even a very minor criminal offense."'. . Notably, the Court then singled out jaywalking by way of example. . . . Based on the allegations in the Complaint, Nigro's retaliatory arrest claim would seem to fall squarely within the Nieves exception. . . The problem for Nigro is that the Nieves exception was not clearly established at the time of his arrest in 2016. To the contrary, until Nieves, it was clearly established — at least in this Circuit — that probable cause defeated all claims of retaliatory arrest. [collecting cases] Under well-established law, therefore, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Nigro's retaliatory arrest claim, and it must be dismissed. . . . Taking Nigro's allegations as true, as the Court must, his claims are troubling, raising the specter of a police officer singling out a member of the media in retaliation for his First Amendment activity. Notably, it was precisely facts like those alleged here that caused the Supreme Court concern in Nieves and prompted it to hold that where 'a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been,' a finding of probable cause does not defeat a retaliatory arrest claim. . . As the Court observed, where 'jaywalking is endemic but rarely results in arrest' — as is surely the case in most, if not all, of New York City — 'it would seem insufficiently protective of First Amendment rights to dismiss' the retaliatory arrest claim of a person arrested for jaywalking after 'vocally complaining about police conduct' merely because there was 'probable cause for the arrest.'. . Yet, as discussed above, binding Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent compel dismissal of all Nigro's claims save one: his failure-to-train claim against the City")

McKenzie v. City of New York, No. 17 CIV. 4899 (PAE), 2019 WL 3288267, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. July 22, 2019) ("[A]s the Supreme Court has recently held, where officers have probable cause to arrest, a plaintiff's 'retaliatory arrest claim fails as a matter of law' unless plaintiff can show that individuals whose speech differed from plaintiff's were not arrested. Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1728 (2019); see also id. (probable cause generally defeats a retaliatory arrest claim except where "a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been"). Such evidence could potentially include admissions by officers, statistical evidence of the arrest rates for the offense in question, or other direct evidence. See id. at 1733 (Gorsuch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); id. at 1741 (Sotomayor, J., dissenting). Here, however, the record is devoid of such evidence. Summary judgment is therefore warranted for the officers on this claim.")

Vidal v. Valentin, No. 16-CV-5745 (CS), 2019 WL 3219442, at *10 (S.D.N.Y. July 17, 2019) ("Claims of retaliatory arrest and prosecution provide useful comparisons. The Supreme Court recently declared that a 'plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.' Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1724 (2019). A similar rule applies in the context of retaliatory prosecutions. . . Although the retaliatory act here is not an arrest or prosecution, the import of the rules is that where retaliation is alleged, if the allegedly retaliatory actor can show probable cause, the retaliation claim cannot stand, or if 'arguable probable cause' is shown, the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Here, in the absence of clearly established law that Plaintiff's conduct did not violate Rule 113.26, Plaintiff cannot show the equivalent of the absence of probable cause, or at least arguable probable cause, for Defendant's Report. Defendant would thus be entitled to qualified immunity had summary judgment otherwise been denied.")

THIRD CIRCUIT

Demetro v. National Association of Bunco Investigations, No. CV146521KMSCM, 2019 WL 2612687, at *18 n. 20 (D.N.J. June 25, 2019) ("[P]laintiffs alleging claims for racially selective arrests or prosecutions in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment are not required to show a lack of probable cause. See Nieves, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1731–32 (2019) (Gorsuch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citing Hedgepeth v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Auth., 386 F. 3d 1148, 1156 (D.C. Cir. 2004) ("[S]imply because a practice passes muster under the Fourth Amendment (arrest based on probable cause) does not mean that unequal treatment with respect to that practice is consistent with equal protection.")); see also Gibson v. Superintendent of NJ Dep't of Law & Pub. Safety-Div. of State Police, 411 F.3d 427, 440 (3d Cir. 2005) ("The fact that there was no Fourth Amendment violation does not mean that one was not discriminatorily selected for enforcement of a law. Plaintiffs' equal protection claims under the Fourteenth Amendment require a wholly separate analysis from their claims under the Fourth Amendment." (quoting Carrasca v. Pomeroy, 313 F.3d 828, 836 (3d Cir.2002))).")

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Snoeyenbos v. Curtis, No. 3:19CV377 (DJN), 2020 WL 572716, at *10–11 (E.D. Va. Feb. 5, 2020) ("After reviewing the state of the law in this Circuit in January 2019, the Court finds that a reasonable law enforcement officer would have known that inducing another officer to issue a citation to a citizen in retaliation for the citizen's protected First Amendment activity violated the citizen's constitutional rights. . . For one, the Fourth Circuit's 2013 decision in Tobey recognized that 'effect[ing]' someone's arrest in retaliation for their exercise of First Amendment rights without probable cause to effect that arrest established a viable First Amendment retaliation claim. . . Likewise, the Supreme Court in Lozman found that directing the arrest of a citizen pursuant to an official retaliatory policy presented a cognizable First Amendment retaliation claim regardless of the existence of probable cause for the arrest. . . These precedents provided fair notice to government officials in this Circuit that they could not direct or effect the arrest of a citizen in retaliation for the citizen's protected First Amendment activity. Logic dictates that if government officials cannot direct or effect the arrest of a citizen for retaliatory reasons, government officials cannot induce the arrest — or, in this case, citation — of a citizen for those same reasons, even if the official so induced otherwise has probable cause for the arrest or citation. . . The difference between directing or effecting an arrest and inducing it is one of degree, not kind. Neither do the policy reasons underlying the qualified immunity doctrine militate in Defendant's favor. . . . Of these policies, avoiding unwanted timidity constitutes 'the most important special government immunity-producing concern ... ensuring that those who serve the government do so with the decisiveness and the judgment required by the public good.'. . These considerations do not justify shielding Defendant from liability if Plaintiff proves that Defendant's retaliatory inducement violated her rights. For one, the undisputed facts show that Defendant did not act in the performance of her public duties when she called Deputy Riley to offer to buy him lunch. Rather, Defendant called Deputy Riley privately without knowing the reasons justifying the stop of Plaintiff's vehicle and attempted to cause the issuance of a citation to Plaintiff by inducing Deputy Riley. Although the Court does not question the dutifulness of Deputy Riley and his decisions during the stop of Plaintiff's vehicle, the same cannot be said of Defendant's conduct. Such conduct cannot possibly be considered a discretionary decision in furtherance of Defendant's duties as a law enforcement officer. Nor does Defendant's decision to call Deputy Riley to induce the issuance of a citation 'ensur[e] that those who serve the government do so with the decisiveness and the judgment required by the public good.'. . . Ultimately, because the state of the law in January 2019 put Defendant on fair notice that her conduct violated Plaintiff's constitutional rights, and after considering the policy reasons underlying the qualified immunity doctrine, the Court finds that qualified immunity does not shield Defendant from liability under Plaintiff's retaliatory inducement theory. However, a triable issue remains as to whether Defendant's conduct violated Plaintiff's rights in this instance, and the Court will revisit whether, as a matter of law, Plaintiff has proven a violation of her rights after the presentation of Plaintiff's evidence during trial.")

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Gonzalez v. Trevino, 42 F.4th 487, 492-94 (5th Cir. 2022) ("All parties agree that Nieves governs this case; they differ, however, on whether this 'case squeezes through the crack of an opening that Nieves left ajar.'. . Gonzalez cannot take advantage of the Nieves exception because she has failed to 'present[ ] objective evidence that [s]he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . . [T]he plain language of Nieves requires comparative evidence, because it required 'objective evidence' of 'otherwise similarly situated individuals' who engaged in the 'same' criminal conduct but were not arrested. . . The evidence Gonzalez provides here comes up short. We recognize that one of our sister circuits has taken a broader view of the Nieves exception and held that 'the [Nieves] majority does not appear to be adopting a rigid rule that requires, in all cases, a particular form of comparison-based evidence.' Lund, 956 F.3d at 945. The Seventh Circuit came to this conclusion primarily in reliance on Justice Gorsuch's concurrence in part and Justice Sotomayor's dissent in Nieves. . . We do not adopt this more lax reading of the exception. Instead, the best reading of the majority's opinion compels the opposite approach. The Court's language was careful and explicit: it required 'objective evidence' of 'otherwise similarly situated individuals' who engaged in the same criminal conduct but were not arrested. . . The most reasonable reading of this language is that some comparative evidence is required to invoke this 'narrow' exception. . . .In sum, the plain language of the Nieves exception requires evidence that Gonzalez has not provided. Lacking such evidence, Nieves tells us that Gonzalez's claims fail because probable cause existed to arrest her. Gonzalez also relies on another Supreme Court case to argue that her claim may proceed notwithstanding probable cause. . . .But the Supreme Court allowed Lozman's claims to proceed not because of the unusual facts of the case, but because he was asserting a Monell claim against the municipality itself, rather than individuals. . . . Lozman's holding was clearly limited to Monell claims. . . Our sister circuits have recognized as much. See Novak v. City of Parma, 932 F.3d 421, 429–30 (6th Cir. 2019) (holding that "Lozman does not apply where, as here, the plaintiff sues individual officers"); DeMartini v. Town of Gulf Stream, 942 F.3d 1277, 1294 (11th

Cir. 2019) (noting that Lozman applies only to cases involving official policies). Gonzalez did bring a Monell claim against the City of Castle of Hills, but that claim is irrelevant to this appeal. . . . In his dissent, Judge Oldham makes a forceful case for why the Constitution ought to provide a claim here, particularly given that Gonzalez's arrest was allegedly in response to her exercise of her right to petition. Were we writing on a blank slate, we may well agree with our distinguished colleague. But we remain bound by what we consider the better readings of the relevant Supreme Court precedent.")

Gonzalez v. Trevino, 42 F.4th 487, 494-95, 501-07 (5th Cir. 2022) (Oldham, J., dissenting) ("This case involves an alleged conspiracy of city officials to punish Sylvia Gonzalez—a 72-year-old councilwoman—for spearheading a nonbinding petition criticizing the city manager. The district court concluded that Sylvia's claim survives qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss phase. My esteemed colleagues don't reach the clearly-established-law question because they conclude that under the best reading of Supreme Court precedent, Sylvia failed to adequately state a claim. With the deepest respect and admiration for my learned and distinguished friends in the majority, I disagree. . . . [M]y esteemed colleagues don't dispute that Sylvia engaged in protective activity, that the Conspirators took a material adverse action, or that retaliatory animus caused the arrest. Instead, they conclude that because the parties agree that there was probable cause for the arrest, Sylvia's claim fails under the Supreme Court's decision in Nieves. With deepest respect, I am obligated to disagree. I first (i) explain Nieves. I then (ii) explain the more relevant precedent, Lozman. I last (iii) explain that under Nieves or Lozman or both, Sylvia has met her burden. . . . [M]y colleagues hold that probable cause will defeat a retaliatory-arrest claim (Nieves part one) unless the retaliatory-arrest plaintiff can produce comparative evidence showing that officers generally do not arrest people for the underlying crime (Nieves part two). In my view, and again with deepest respect, such comparative evidence is not required. Nieves simply requires objective evidence. And evidence is '[s]omething (including testimony, documents, and tangible objects) that tends to prove or disprove the existence of an alleged fact.'. . So the retaliatory-arrest plaintiff need only provide (objective) evidence that supports the required proposition by tending to connect the officers' animus to the plaintiff's arrest. Such evidence could be comparative. But as far as I can tell, nothing in Nieves requires it to be so. . . .I think the absolute most that can be said about the Court's holding is that (1) the presence of probable cause is not a bar to retaliatory-arrest claims, so long as (2) the plaintiff produces objective evidence of retaliatory animus. . . . But the more fundamental problem is that it's not even clear to me Nieves is the most relevant precedent here. . . .It's unclear to me why we should apply a rule designed for split-second warrantless arrests to a deliberative, premediated, weeks-long conspiracy. . . In short, Nieves designed a rule to reflect 'the fact that protected speech [or conduct] is often a legitimate consideration when deciding whether to make an arrest' and the fact that 'it is particularly difficult to determine whether the adverse government action was caused by the officer's malice or the plaintiff's potentially criminal conduct.'. . In this case, it's plainly impossible that Sylvia's speech and petitioning activity was a 'legitimate consideration' in the Conspirators' efforts to jail her. And there's zero difficulty or complexity in figuring out whether it was animus or her purportedly criminal conduct that caused her arrest. It was plainly the former;

if it were even conceivably the latter, the Conspirators would not have needed a faux detective, would not have needed to circumvent the DA's office, and would not have had their charges dismissed the moment a real law-enforcement official found out about them. It's therefore unclear to me what purchase Nieves has here. . . Rather, the more relevant rule appears to come from Lozman.. . . In the end, the only relevant difference between Lozman and this case is that Sylvia's claim is against the Conspirators, while Lozman brought a Monell claim against the City itself. My esteemed colleagues find this difference dispositive. . . But as the Nieves Court acknowledged, the Monell claim mattered because it showed that Lozman involved 'facts [that] were far afield from the typical retaliatory arrest claim,' while Nieves involved a 'more representative case.'. . So even though Lozman's holding is limited, the opinion's teachings are still instructive—especially when understanding Nieves. . . Under Nieves or Lozman or both, Sylvia has met her burden. She alleges that 'a review of the misdemeanor and felony data from Bexar County over the past decade makes it clear that the misdemeanor tampering statute has never been used in Bexar County to criminally charge someone for trying to steal a nonbinding or expressive document.' More specifically, she alleges that most indictments under the statute involved fake government IDs, such as driver's licenses, social security numbers, and green cards. . . In these circumstances, that is enough to satisfy the second part of the Nieves rule and to hold that probable cause does nothing to defeat Sylvia's retaliatory-arrest claim. . . . Here, common sense dictates that Sylvia's negative assertion amounts to direct evidence that similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected activity had not been arrested. . . .In short, Sylvia properly alleged that the Conspirators jailed her for petitioning the government. Nieves is no barrier to her retaliatory-arrest claim. She has therefore pleaded a constitutional violation and satisfied the first prong of the qualified-immunity inquiry. . . The second prong is whether the Conspirators violated Sylvia's clearly established rights. This question is admittedly harder. You might reasonably think that if the First Amendment clearly establishes anything, it's that the government cannot arrest a citizen for her petition. That's obviously been true since at least the English Declaration of Rights in 1689. . . On the other hand, in Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658 (2012), the Court held that we cannot define the right against retaliatory arrests 'as a broad general proposition.'. . Rather, 'the right in question is not the general right to be free from retaliation for one's speech, but the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause. This Court has never held that there is such a right.'. . So Reichle might lead you to think that Sylvia cannot surmount the clearly-established-law prong. On yet another hand, however, Reichle (like Nieves) involved a split-second decision to arrest an unruly person in a public place. . . Neither Reichle nor Nieves involved secret, deliberative, and intentional conspiracies to jail an elderly woman for petitioning the government. And it's not at all clear that we should apply the same qualified-immunity inquiries for First Amendment cases, Fourth Amendment cases, split-second-decisionmaking cases, and deliberative-conspiracy cases. . . As Justice Thomas has observed, 'why should [speech-suppressing] officers, who have time to make calculated choices about enacting or enforcing unconstitutional policies, receive the same protection as a police officer who makes a split-second decision to use force in a dangerous setting? We have never offered a satisfactory explanation to this question.'. . see also Andrew S. Oldham, Official Immunity at the Founding, 46 HARV. J.L.

& PUB. POL'Y --- (forthcoming) (manuscript at 26–27), https://ssrn.com/abstract=3824983. That further suggests that the Conspirators here should not get the same qualified-immunity benefits that cops on the beat might get. And in any event, Reichle was not the Court's last word on the topic. In Lozman, the Court supplied the holding that Reichle said was theretofore missing—namely, it held that retaliatory-arrest plaintiffs can prevail even when their arrests are supported by probable cause. . . Moreover, as noted above, Lozman and our case involve materially identical facts. And the Supreme Court decided Lozman in 2018—the year before the Conspirators jailed Sylvia for petitioning the government. So that might lead you to think that the Conspirators were given every conceivable form of fair notice—in a string of authority from 1689 to 2018—that their conduct was flagrantly violative of the First Amendment. . . Whatever the right answer to this question might be, my distinguished colleagues in the majority have no occasion to reach it. . . So I see little use in saying more about it. With deepest respect, I dissent.")

Buehler v. Dear, 27 F.4th 969, 993-94 (5th Cir. 2022) ("[O]ur conclusion . . . that the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Buehler's First Amendment claim does not dispose of his corresponding claim against the City, since 'a municipality may [still] be liable if a plaintiff states a claim against an official but the official is protected by qualified immunity.'. . Nevertheless, we 'may affirm a district court's Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal on any grounds ... supported by the record,'. . . and here there is an obvious alternate ground on which to affirm dismissal of Buehler's First Amendment claim against the City. Such a claim, just to reiterate, cannot succeed unless the harm he claims to have suffered as a result of the City's policies or practices (his August 2, 2015 arrest) violated the First Amendment. It did not. As the Supreme Court recently held, a 'plaintiff pressing a [First Amendment] retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.'. . (An exception exists 'when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been,'. . . but Buehler points to no such evidence. . .) And as we have already explained in affirming summary judgment for Defendants on Buehler's false-arrest claims, the arresting Officers had probable cause to arrest Buehler for interference with official duties. The arrest therefore did not violate his First Amendment rights, and his municipal-liability claim premised on the contrary notion necessarily fails.")

Roy v. City of Monroe, 950 F.3d 245, 255-56 (5th Cir. 2020) ("To prevail on a First Amendment retaliation claim. . . plaintiffs must plead and prove the absence of probable cause. . . It follows that, at summary judgment, Roy could not rebut Booth's qualified immunity defense without, first, producing evidence that Booth's summons was unsupported by probable cause and, second, establishing that the absence of probable cause would have been apparent to any reasonable officer in Booth's position. . . . In sum, we find that Roy has failed to carry his summary judgment burden. . . Roy has not shown that Booth's issuance of the summons was unsupported by probable cause or, much less, that a reasonable officer would have known that it was unsupported. On the contrary, our decisions in Johnson, Burbridge, and other comparable cases convince us that probable cause supported Booth's summons. His reliance on the purported victim was justified because there was no 'apparent reason' to disbelieve her account. We affirm the district court's ruling that Booth is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ayala v. Aransas County, 777 F. App'x 100, ___ n.5 (5th Cir. 2019) ("The Supreme Court recently announced an exception to the general notion that probable cause ordinarily defeats a retaliatory arrest claim: 'when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.' Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1727 (2019). Ayala has not argued that this case falls within the exception, nor is there anything in the record to suggest such a conclusion.")

Gray v. City of Denham Springs, No. CV 19-00889-BAJ-EWD, 2021 WL 1187076, at *9 (M.D. La. Mar. 29, 2021) ("Jacob Gray's First Amendment retaliation claim is not barred at this stage by Nieves v. Bartlett. Nieves instructs that a Section 1983 plaintiff cannot pursue a claim of retaliatory arrest in violation of the First Amendment when the summary judgment evidence shows that police had probable cause to make an arrest. . . Nieves is distinguishable in two respects. First, it addresses a claim of retaliatory arrest. Here, by contrast, Jacob alleges retaliatory excessive force. As explained above, the issue of whether the John Doe Officers engaged in unlawful and excessive force to prevent Jacob from filming the traffic stop is temporally and conceptually distinct from the issue of whether probable cause to arrest Jacob for disturbing the peace arose after the Officers took his phone, tackled him to the ground, and sprayed him with mace. Second, Nieves was decided at summary judgment, after development of evidence proving that police had probable cause to arrest the plaintiff for drunken conduct and resisting arrest. Here, no such evidence is presently before the Court. Rather, Jacob alleges that he was peaceably and lawfully recording the traffic stop when he suffered retaliation. For present purposes, Jacob's allegations are sufficient.")

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Enoch v. Hamilton County Sheriff's Office, 818 F. App'x 398, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("Deputy Hogan testified that court security officers are trained that people are not allowed to film inside the courthouse without permission. . . Judge Nadel thought that it was implied that the hallways were included in Rule 33(D)(6)'s prohibition on recording in the courtroom. Even if the rule itself, and Judge Nadel's supplemental order, did not explicitly characterize the hallways as 'ancillary area[s],' the unrebutted evidence shows that the common practice in the Hamilton County courthouse was to treat it as such. It was accordingly reasonable for the Deputies to have believed that was the case here. . . . Because they reasonably believed that Rule 33(D)(6) applied to the hallways outside the courtroom, we cannot say that the Deputies were 'plainly incompetent,' or that they 'knowingly violate[d] the law.'. . There was no wrongful arrest in violation of the Fourth Amendment based on the conduct at issue on this appeal. They are therefore entitled to qualified immunity from liability based on such conduct, and we reverse. . . .No one denies that Rule 33(D)(6) is a reasonable restriction on speech. Rather, Enoch and Corbin maintain that the Deputies could not 'punish them for gathering news about matter of public importance when their actions violated neither rules nor laws.' . . Because Rule 33(D)(6) did not extend to the hallways, they contend, the Deputies arbitrarily stifled their speech. But, as we determined above, it was reasonable for the Deputies to believe that Enoch and Corbin's conduct violated Rule 33(D)(6). 'When public officials implement validly enacted state laws that no court has invalidated, their conduct typically satisfies the core [qualified immunity] inquiry—the "objective reasonableness of an official's conduct"—that the immunity doctrine was designed to test.'. . Because it was not objectively unreasonable for the Deputies to conclude that they were enforcing Rule 33(D)(6) when they arrested Enoch and Corbin—and thus had probable cause to arrest them—they are entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment claims. See Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1725 (2019) (holding that the presence of probable cause for an arrest generally defeats a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim as a matter of law). Enoch and Hogan respond that other individuals in the hallway were allowed to continue to take pictures and record videos and that they were singled out for disparate treatment, allegedly because of their race or speech. Either way, this claim fails. Starting with the race-based retaliation claim, it is clearly established law that the police may not discriminate on the basis of race. As the Supreme Court has long made clear, however, 'the constitutional basis for objecting to intentionally discriminatory application of laws is the Equal Protection Clause.' Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 813 (1996). Enoch and Corbin did not assert a violation of the Equal Protection Clause. Their race-based claims therefore are not properly alleged in this case. Turning to the speech-based retaliation claim, the Deputies are entitled to qualified immunity. When Enoch and Corbin were arrested, 'it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause,' like the arrests in this case, 'could violate the First Amendment.' Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658, 663 (2012). To be sure, the Supreme Court later clarified that holding in Nieves, which left open the possibility that a retaliatory-arrest claim could survive without a finding of the absence of probable cause if the plaintiff presented sufficient 'objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . But Nieves was decided after Enoch and Corbin were arrested. Its principles, therefore, were not clearly established law at the time of the arrests. So Enoch and Corbin cannot rely on Nieves's potential exception to the requirement to prove the absence of probable cause to make out a retaliatory-arrest claim under the First Amendment.")

Novak v. City of Parma, 932 F.3d 421, 429-30 (6th Cir. 2019) ("If the police did not have probable cause to arrest Novak, then he may bring a claim of retaliation. Nieves, 139 S. Ct. at 1725. . . . If the officers did have probable cause, on the other hand, they are entitled to qualified immunity. The Supreme Court has said as much. 'This Court has never recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause.' Reichle, 566 U.S. at 664–65, 132 S.Ct. 2088. The Supreme Court said that in 2012, and it remains true today. The Supreme Court decided two retaliation cases after Reichle. Neither case clearly established Novak's right to be free from a retaliatory arrest based on probable cause. First, the Supreme Court decided Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach. There, the Court held that a plaintiff can bring a retaliation claim if the police had probable cause to arrest but only against official municipal policies of retaliation. . . So Lozman does not apply where, as here, the plaintiff sues individual officers. . . Second, the Court held most recently in Nieves that a plaintiff generally cannot bring a retaliation claim if the police had probable cause to arrest. . . Though Nieves also created an exception to that general rule that we will discuss later, the exception does not apply here because the officers would not have been aware of it at the time of Novak's arrest since the case was decided later. Nor has our circuit clearly established the law on this issue. In Sandul v. Larion, the Sixth Circuit denied an officer qualified immunity for a First Amendment retaliation claim and held that 'protected speech cannot serve as the basis for a violation of any of the ... ordinances.'. . But in that case, the ordinance criminalized the plaintiff's speech directly, and there was little question whether the speech was protected. . . . Plus, it is not clearly established how we reconcile the apparent holding in Sandul that protected speech cannot be the basis for probable cause with the rule that protected speech can be a 'wholly legitimate consideration' for officers when they decide whether to arrest someone. Reichle, 566 U.S. at 668, 132 S.Ct. 2088. '[I]f judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.'. . Simply put, Ohio's statute appears to punish the effects of speech (interruptions), not the speech itself, and whether enforcing such a statute in these circumstances violates the First Amendment is not clearly established. So the officers would be entitled to qualified immunity. To sum up, to resolve the retaliation claim, the factfinder below will have to decide: (1) whether Novak's Facebook page was a parody, and thus protected speech, and; (2) whether the officers had probable cause to arrest Novak under the Ohio statute. If the officers did not have probable cause, they are not entitled to qualified immunity, and Novak can attempt to show the arrest was retaliatory. If the officers did have probable cause, they are entitled to qualified immunity even if Novak's page was protected speech because the law at the time did not clearly establish that charging Novak under the statute would violate his constitutional rights.")

Novak v. City of Parma, 932 F.3d 421, 430-32 (6th Cir. 2019) ("The Supreme Court held recently in Nieves that to bring a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim, a plaintiff must generally show that there was no probable cause for the arrest. . . But the Nieves Court also recognized a narrow exception to this rule 'where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.' . . . It is plausible that Novak's arrest under Ohio Rev. Code § 2909.04(B), or one like it, would trigger the exception—i.e., if officers never or rarely arrested someone under this statute. Unfortunately for Novak, this exception was not clearly established before Nieves. . . Even if Novak's case would not fall within the narrow exception of Nieves, . . . there is good reason to believe that in the future probable cause alone may not protect the officers. First, this case may not be subject to the general rule of Nieves because the sole basis for probable cause was speech. Besides posting to his Facebook page, Novak committed no other act that could have created probable cause. In other First Amendment retaliation cases on point, by contrast, the defendant's conduct was a mix of protected speech and unprotected conduct. That is, the defendants both said something and did something. . . Here, we have nothing like that. Novak did not create a Facebook page criticizing police and use his computer to hack into police servers to disrupt operations. The sole basis for probable cause to arrest Novak was his speech. And there is good reason to believe that, based on the reasoning underlying the First Amendment retaliation cases, this is an important difference. This is important because in Nieves and its predecessors, the Court based its reasoning on the thorny causation issue that comes up in cases with both protected speech and unprotected conduct. The idea is that in cases where the plaintiff both did something and said something to get arrested, the factfinder will not be able to disentangle whether the officer arrested him because of what he did or because of what he said. . . . [T]he vague language of the Ohio statute further heightens the concern raised in Issue 2. That statute makes it a crime to 'use any computer ... or the internet so as to disrupt, interrupt, or impair the functions of any police ... operations.' Ohio Rev. Code § 2909.04(B). . . . Where a statute gives police broad cover to find probable cause on speech alone, probable cause does little to disentangle retaliatory motives from legitimate ones. Thus, this case raises new questions under Nieves. It may be that, based on the Supreme Court's reasoning in that case and others, the general rule of requiring plaintiffs to prove the absence of probable cause should not apply here. We need not decide that now.")

Hartman v. Thompson, 931 F.3d 471, 484 n.6 (6th Cir. 2019) ("We note that the Nieves Court held 'that the no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . Here Plaintiffs have not put forth any objective evidence that similarly situated individuals at the Breakfast had been allowed to engage in similarly disruptive activities without arrest.")

Hartman v. Thompson, 931 F.3d 471, 496 n.6 (6th Cir. 2019) (Moore, J., dissenting) ("As the majority notes, the Supreme Court in Nieves held that, notwithstanding the general rule that probable cause defeats a claim for a retaliatory arrest under the First Amendment, 'the no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . Because I conclude that Defendants lacked probable cause to arrest Plaintiffs, I need not rely on this exception to the Nieves holding.")

Enoch v. Hamilton County Sheriff's Office, No. 1:16-CV-661, 2021 WL 2223894, at *12 (S.D. Ohio June 2, 2021) ("[T]here are genuine issues of material fact as to whether plaintiffs and the other individuals recording in the Courthouse hallways at the time of plaintiffs' arrests were similarly situated. There is no evidence that any of these individuals had been granted permission to record in the hallways or that they were violating an admonition or order from Judge Nadel by doing so. Yet, plaintiffs were detained and arrested and the other individuals using recording devices in the hallways were not. Defendants have not offered a plausible explanation for this discrepancy that is supported by the evidence. In light of these factual issues, the Court cannot resolve on summary judgment whether the Nieves exception applies and a constitutional violation occurred; i.e., whether despite having probable cause to detain and arrest plaintiffs, defendants violated plaintiffs' First Amendment rights by singling them out for punishment. Though plaintiffs cannot pursue their First Amendment claim against the defendant deputies in their individual capacity based on the Nieves exception, Enoch II does not foreclose plaintiffs from pursuing their official capacity claim for speech-based retaliation under the First Amendment. Plaintiffs can proceed under the theory that the deputies were enforcing an official policy or custom of the County when they arrested plaintiffs for recording events in the hallway of the Hamilton County Courthouse while other similarly situated individuals were not arrested. The Sixth Circuit did not resolve the factual issues concerning the existence of a Sheriff's Office policy on appeal in Enoch II, and defendants have not introduced new evidence on remand that leads to a different conclusion on plaintiffs' official capacity claim than the district court reached in its prior order. Issues of fact remain as to whether the defendant deputies acted pursuant to a County policy when they arrested plaintiffs. Summary judgment on the official capacity claims against defendants Hogan and Nobles for violations of plaintiffs' First Amendment rights based on the Nieves exception is not warranted.")

Bridgewater v. Harris, No. 16-14112, 2020 WL 813388, at *7 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 19, 2020) ("Although probable cause generally will defeat a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim, two exceptions exist in a case like this, where the defendant officers are being sued in their official capacity. The Supreme Court recently outlined one set of conditions that allow a First Amendment retaliation claim to proceed despite probable cause for an arrest. See Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1954–55 (2018). First, there must be an 'official municipal policy of intimidation.'. . Second, the municipality must have 'formed a premeditated plan' to retaliate against the plaintiff. . . Third, the plaintiff must present 'objective evidence of a policy motivated by retaliation.' . . Fourth, there must be 'little relation' between the protected speech and the offense that led to the arrest. . . Finally, the protected speech must be 'high in the hierarchy of First Amendment values,' such as the freedom to petition. . .In addition to that very narrow exception, last year the Court recognized another situation when the no-probable-cause requirement does not apply. [citing Nieves] In particular, if 'a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been,' the existence of probable cause will not preclude a First Amendment retaliation claim. . .So unless the case falls under either of the two exceptions outlined in Lozman and Nieves, Bridgewater also must plead and prove that there was no probable cause for the arrest.")

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Lund v. City of Rockford, Illinois, 956 F.3d 938, 943-49 (7th Cir. 2020) ("Lund claims that the officers arrested him in retaliation for speech and news-gathering activities protected by the First Amendment. Lund's concerns are not without basis. Nearly every authoring justice of the latest Supreme Court opinion on retaliatory arrest acknowledged '"a risk that some police officers may exploit the arrest power as a means of suppressing speech."'. . . Even while expressing concerns about abuse of police power for retaliatory arrests, the Nieves Court answered the only question posed in this case: Does 'probable cause to make an arrest defeat[ ] a claim that the arrest was in retaliation for speech protected by the First Amendment?'. . The answer, the Supreme Court held (just thirty-nine days after the district court entered its opinion in this case), is 'yes.'. . This answer definitively resolves the question presented by Lund in this case. At the time of Lund's arrest, the officers had probable cause to arrest him for, at a minimum, driving a motorized vehicle the wrong way on a one-way street. Lund does not challenge this finding. Therefore his claim for retaliatory arrest fails. . . .Lund, however, proposes that his case squeezes through the crack of an opening that Nieves left ajar. . . . Lund asserts that his arrest for driving a vehicle the wrong way down a one-way street was, in fact, retaliation for his protected First Amendment journalistic activity. But to make this argument, Lund would have to present 'objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . That language in Nieves implies that Lund would have to present objective evidence that the Rockford police rarely, if ever, arrest citizens who drive vehicles or, perhaps more specifically, motorized bicycles the wrong way down one-way streets. It is possible; however, Nieves has left open the possibility that Lund could demonstrate objective evidence of retaliation in some other way. Lund urges us to take the view of the concurring and dissenting Justice Gorsuch and dissenting Justice Sotomayor and apply the majority's view of the exception 'commonsensically.'. . . Regardless of how we interpret the requirements of Nieves, however, Lund has not presented sufficient objective evidence of retaliation that would allow him to slip into the narrow exception to the rule which dictates that probable cause to arrest defeats a retaliatory arrest claim. Lund has made no attempt to present objective evidence showing that the police rarely make arrests for driving the wrong way on a one-way street, or that other similarly situated persons were not arrested, and he has not demonstrated retaliation in some other way. . . . We take no position as to whether Lund's behavior met the criteria for obstruction of justice, and we need not. The officers' reasonable belief that Lund's activities were obstructing, or might come to obstruct, their investigation was sufficient for them to stop Lund and ask him to move along. Although First Amendment activity is generally protected, it loses its protection when it violates the law. . . And generally applicable laws, like those that prohibit interference with a police investigation, 'do not offend the First Amendment simply because their enforcement against the press has incidental effects on its ability to gather and report the news.'. . It is possible, of course, that based on Lund's activities, a court might conclude that no reasonable officer could have construed his actions as constituting obstruction of justice. After all, reporters are free to take photos and videos of what they see on a public street, even when it involves police activity. . . Again, however, we note that we need not delve into this question. The officers had a clear right to stop Lund, question him, and direct him to cease doing anything that placed their undercover investigation in jeopardy. We need not address the question of whether the officers had probable cause to arrest Lund for obstruction of justice, because whatever the officers reasonably believed about Lund's activities, and whether those activities in fact constituted obstruction of justice, did not matter in the end. Lund was not arrested until after his clear violation of an Illinois vehicular law—driving against the traffic pattern on a one-way street. . . And Lund has not argued in this court that the officers did not have probable cause to arrest him for that offense. Lund has not supplied any 'objective evidence' that 'similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech' have not been and would not be arrested for driving the wrong way down a one-way street. . . Although we might all agree that jaywalking—the example given in Nieves—is the type of law-breaking toward which most officers would turn a blind eye, it is less clear that officers routinely give a pass to persons driving motorized vehicles the wrong way on one-way streets, an action that could have fatal consequences. . . . In sum, it is clear that the officers had probable cause to arrest Lund for violating an Illinois traffic law. Probable cause defeats a retaliatory arrest claim in all but the most narrow of exceptions. . . Lund has offered no evidence that his actions or arrest fall within that narrow exception. . . . [E]ven if Nieves did not apply retroactively, Lund still could not prevail, as the defendant officers were entitled to qualified immunity. Police officers are entitled to qualified immunity under section 1983 unless they 'violated a statutory or constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.'. . Three years before Lund's arrest, the Supreme Court was asked to decide two questions: 'whether a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim may lie despite the presence of probable cause to support the arrest,' and second, 'whether clearly established law at the time of [the plaintiff's] arrest so held.' Reichle, 566 U.S. at 663. The Court passed on the first question, (but, as we just noted, answered it seven years later in Nieves, as we described above). The Court, in 2012, did, however, decide the second question and determined that at the time of the defendant's arrest in Reichle, 'it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could violate the First Amendment.'. . At the time of Lund's arrest, therefore, the Supreme Court had specifically stated that it had 'never recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause.'. . This forecloses an argument that any reasonable officer would have understood that the First Amendment precluded Lund's arrest. In short, no matter whether we apply the substantive holding of Nieves or look at the qualified immunity question presented in Reichle, Lund cannot prevail. None of Lund's other arguments—including Lund's arguments about the publication of his name, the officers' subjective intent, and causation, among others—therefore, are relevant.")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Mitchell v. Kirchmeier, 28 F.4th 888, 897-98 (8th Cir. 2022) ("[W]e need not address the argument pressed by Mitchell and amici First Amendment scholars that if the complaint's allegations are true, then the bridge closure violated the First Amendment. Officers merely carrying out their duty as they understand it are not liable for retaliatory arrest or retaliatory use of force even if their understanding of their duty is mistaken—indeed, even if it is so mistaken as to be 'unreasonable.' To be sure, they may be liable for unlawful arrest or use of excessive force. . . But constitutional torts of retaliation require acting on retaliatory animus. Here, Mitchell failed to plead facts that make an inference of retaliatory animus plausible. Therefore, his claims for retaliatory arrest and retaliatory use of force were subject to dismissal even assuming the First Amendment protected his right to assemble and speak on the bridge.")

Thurairajah v. City of Fort Smith, Arkansas, 925 F.3d 979, 985 n.5 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Because we conclude that 'Trooper Cross lacked even arguable probable cause for an arrest and thus violated Thurairajah's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure,'. . . the Supreme Court's recent decision holding that a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim fails as a matter of law when the arrest is based on probable cause is inapposite. See Nieves v. Bartlett, No. 17-1174, —— U.S. ——, —— S.Ct. ——, —— L.Ed.2d ——, 2019 WL 2257157 (U.S. May 8, 2019).")

Franks v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, No. 4:19 CV 2663 RWS, 2022 WL 1062035, at *5–6 (E.D. Mo. Apr. 8, 2022) ("[W]ith respect to Franks' First Amendment retaliation claim, I need not determine whether Officer Olsten's deployment of pepper spray constituted excessive force. I must only determine whether a reasonable jury could find that: (1) Franks engaged in protected activity, (2) Officer Olsten's deployment of pepper spray was an adverse action taken against Franks that would deter an ordinary person from continuing in protected activity, and (3) Officer Olsten's deployment of pepper spray was motivated at least in part by Franks' exercise of protected activity. The parties have presented very little evidence of what Franks was doing in the moments leading up to Officer Olsten's deployment of pepper spray. The evidence that has been presented indicates only that Franks was standing near—and possibly behind—Brandy and recording the scene. . . While participating in a protest and recording police officers performing their duties in public are generally protected activities, and the use of pepper spray may be an adverse action that would deter an ordinary person from continuing in protected activity, Franks has failed to present sufficient evidence showing that Officer Olsten's deployment of pepper spray was motivated, even in part, by her exercise of these activities. Indeed, a reasonable jury could not find that Officer Olsten's deployment of pepper spray was motivated by Franks' act of recording the scene because there is little, if any, evidence that Officer Olsten was even aware that Franks was recording the scene. . . Based on the present record, a reasonable jury could also not find that Officer Olsten's deployment of pepper spray was motivated by Franks' actions at the protest because there is no evidence that Franks was identified or targeted by Officer Olsten. . . Rather than showing that Officer Olsten's deployment of pepper spray was motivated by Franks' exercise of protected activity, the evidence tends to show that it was motivated instead by other protestors. . . . Because Franks has failed to present sufficient evidence showing that Officer Olsten's deployment of pepper spray was motivated by her exercise of protected activity, Officer Olsten is entitled to qualified immunity on Franks' First Amendment retaliation claim. Accordingly, summary judgment will be granted to Officer Olsten on Count I.")

Murray v. McNutt, No. 2:18-CV-63 KGB, 2019 WL 5485589, at *7, *10 (E.D. Ark. Oct. 24, 2019) ("Because there was probable cause to support seizure of the truck and an arrest of Mr. Murray, and because this is not a case in which an exception to the probable cause requirement has been recognized, the Court grants summary judgment in favor of Deputy McNutt on Mr. Murray's First Amendment claim. . . .When applying the recognized exception to Albright set forth in Moran, the Eighth Circuit has indicated that probable cause must be lacking for the case to proceed. . . If probable cause exists for the seizure of the truck and Mr. Murray's arrest, then Deputy McNutt's alleged demand for money to make the charges go away and Mr. Murray's purported refusal to pay the demand were not the sole cause of the actions about which Mr. Murray complains. Further, if a lack of probable cause is required to state a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim in this context, that requirement makes the law for Fourteenth Amendment claims consistent with the law governing First Amendment retaliation claims based on arrest. See Nieves, 139 S.Ct. 1715. However, it is unclear if proof of lack of probable cause is required to state a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim on the facts alleged here.

Because the Court can find no case in which an allegation of extortion has been examined in the context of a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim, because the parties cite the Court to none, and more specifically because the Court is unaware of a case decided by the Supreme Court or the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals that specifies the level of causation required to state such a claim, the Court grants Deputy McNutt qualified immunity on the basis that such a right is not clearly established. If Deputy McNutt engaged in the alleged attempt to extort money from Mr. Murray, his purported conduct was thoroughly offensive and particularly reprehensible for a government official in the course of his official duties. . . However, for the reasons explained, the Court grants Deputy McNutt qualified immunity on Mr. Murray's Fourteenth Amendment claim against him in his individual capacity.")

NINTH CIRCUIT

Ballentine v. Tucker, 28 F.4th 54, 61-64 (9th Cir. 2022) ("To evaluate whether there is a constitutional violation, we apply the current law. See Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657, 678 (9th Cir. 2021). Accordingly, the retaliatory arrest framework stated by the Supreme Court in Nieves governs here. . . . To be sure, the Nieves exception applies only 'when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . . Detective Tucker contends that Plaintiffs' claims do not fall within the Nieves exception because the evidence does not support their allegations that they were singled out based on a retaliatory motive. But Plaintiffs presented objective evidence showing that they were arrested while others who chalked and did not engage in anti-police speech were not arrested. During discovery, Metro produced records indicating only two instances in which chalkers were suspected of or charged with violating Nevada's graffiti statute. In these two instances, only one individual was cited—not arrested—for chalking on public property. There is no evidence that anyone besides the Plaintiffs has been arrested for chalking on the sidewalk. Additionally, the Plaintiffs presented evidence that other individuals chalking at the courthouse at the same time as Plaintiffs were not arrested. This is the kind of 'objective evidence' required by the Nieves exception to show that a plaintiff was 'arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.' . . . If chalking on sidewalks violates Nevada law, committing the offense in Las Vegas is much like jaywalking in that both are offenses for which 'officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.'. . . Similar to jaywalking, if chalking constitutes an offense, it is an offense for which 'probable cause does little to prove or disprove the causal connection between animus and injury.'. . Thus, Plaintiffs have shown differential treatment of similarly situated individuals, satisfying the Nieves exception. . . . "T]he district court correctly concluded that a reasonable jury could find that the anti-police content of Plaintiffs' chalkings was a substantial or motivating factor for Detective Tucker's declarations of arrest. . . . Detective Tucker had previously engaged with Plaintiffs, challenging a chalked message that indicated no Metro officer had ever been prosecuted for murder. In the declarations of arrest, he explicitly included Plaintiffs' association with anti-police groups and the critical content of their messages. Moreover, rather than cite Plaintiffs—which the evidence showed was an extremely rare occurrence to begin with—Detective Tucker sought arrest warrants. Coupled with the evidence of differential treatment already discussed, a reasonable jury could find that the anti-police content of Plaintiffs' chalkings was a substantial or motivating factor for effecting the arrest. . . . Viewing the evidence and drawing all reasonable inferences in the favor of Plaintiffs, a jury could conclude that Detective Tucker violated Plaintiffs' First Amendment rights. Accordingly, Plaintiffs have raised a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether their constitutional right was violated and have satisfied one part of the qualified immunity inquiry.")

Ballentine v. Tucker, 28 F.4th 54, 64-67 (9th Cir. 2022) ("To determine if a right was clearly established, '[t]he relevant inquiry is whether, at the time of the officers' action, the state of the law gave the officers fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional.'. . Accordingly, we look to the state of the law that concerned conduct at the time of the challenged police action. At the outset, Detective Tucker argues that the law was not clearly established at the time of his conduct in 2013 because the Supreme Court's decision in Nieves did not clarify the appropriate standard for First Amendment retaliation claims until 2019. But a right can also be clearly established by this circuit's precedent. . . Contrary to Detective Tucker's characterization of Plaintiffs' claims, Plaintiffs did not merely 'describe the "clearly established" right in general terms like "retaliatory law enforcement action."'. . Rather, Plaintiffs defined the right as 'the right to be free from retaliatory law enforcement action even when probable cause existed for that action.'. . In so doing, Plaintiffs defined the right as we did in Skoog and Ford.. . . Thus, at the time of Detective Tucker's conduct in July 2013, binding Ninth Circuit precedent gave fair notice that it would be unlawful to arrest Plaintiffs in retaliation for their First Amendment activity, notwithstanding the existence of probable cause. . . . Detective Tucker argues that our decision in Acosta, 718 F.3d at 806, created uncertainty as to the state of the law. But Detective Tucker misunderstands Acosta. There, police arrested Acosta in January 2006 for violating a municipal ordinance prohibiting disorderly conduct at city council meetings. . . We correctly concluded that 'at the time of the Council meeting,' there was no clearly established right to be free from a retaliatory arrest otherwise supported by probable cause. . . Since Acosta only addressed the state of the law in January 2006, it has no effect on the state of the law in July 2013, the time of Detective Tucker's conduct. Neither Skoog nor Ford had any place in the Acosta inquiry. In contrast, by the time of Detective Tucker's conduct in 2013, Skoog had clearly established the right. That the decision in Acosta was issued in 2013 is therefore irrelevant because the decisive inquiry is the state of the law at the time of the challenged conduct. . . . Finally, Detective Tucker argues that the facts of then-existing case law are distinguishable from the facts of this case. But '[a] right can be clearly established despite a lack of factually analogous preexisting case law, and officers can be on notice that their conduct is unlawful even in novel factual circumstances.' . . . By the time of Detective Tucker's conduct, Ninth Circuit precedent had long provided notice to officers that 'an individual has a right to be free from retaliatory police action, even if probable cause existed for that action.'. . Detective Tucker's belief that his conduct was not unlawful because he thoroughly investigated and made the decision to arrest after lesser alternatives failed does not vitiate such notice. A reasonable officer in Detective Tucker's position had fair notice that the First Amendment prohibited arresting Plaintiffs for the content of their speech, notwithstanding probable cause. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to Detective Tucker.")

Bello-Reyes v. Gaynor, 985 F.3d 696, 698, 700-01 & n.7 (9th Cir. 2021) ("This case requires us to consider whether the Supreme Court's recent decision in Nieves v. Bartlett. . . applies to a noncitizen's claim that Immigration and Customs Enforcement ("ICE") unconstitutionally retaliated against him for his speech when revoking his bond and re-arresting him. Jose Bello-Reyes ("Bello") had been detained by ICE and released on bond in 2018. On May 13, 2019, Bello spoke at a rally and read a poem of his own writing, entitled 'Dear America.' In this poem, he publicly criticized ICE enforcement and detention practices. Less than thirty-six hours later, ICE revoked his bond and re-arrested him. The Government contends that ICE had probable cause to arrest Bello, and thus his retaliatory arrest argument fails under Nieves. . . We agree with Bello, however, that the distinctions between Nieves and Bello's habeas petition indicate that Nieves should not control in this case. We reverse and remand for the application of the standard from Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Educ. v. Doyle[.] . . . We conclude that Nieves, a suit for damages brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and arising out of a criminal arrest, should not be extended to Bello's habeas challenge to his bond revocation. . . .For at least these reasons, in combination, Nieves is not applicable here. First, problems of causation that may counsel for a no probable cause standard are less acute in the habeas context. In § 1983 suits, it is necessary to identify the particular state official or officials who violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Not so in habeas: the petitioner need not identify a particular violator, only that his confinement is unconstitutional. . . Second, Nieves does not apply here because it arose out of the criminal arrest context, where 'evidence of the presence or absence of probable cause for the arrest will be available in virtually every retaliatory arrest case.'. . This reasoning does not translate to the immigration bond revocation context. While a probable cause requirement exists for initial immigration arrests, . . . no equivalent benchmark exists where ICE is revoking bond rather than arresting in the first instance. Instead, the decision is completely discretionary. . . Since the Nieves rule depended on this objective benchmark of a reasonable arrest, extending it to this situation would effectively eliminate almost any prospect of obtaining release on habeas for actually retaliatory, unconstitutional immigration bond revocation. As long as those authorizing the bond revocation exercised discretion (as opposed to acting automatically or arbitrarily) there could ordinarily be no release on habeas. . .We need not define the precise extent of Nieves's applicability in the immigration context here. . . However, we decline to extend a rule this closely dependent on § 1983 case law and the particularities of criminal arrests to Bello's habeas petition. We conclude that Nieves does not control in this case.[7] [fn.7: Because Nieves does not control, the presence of probable cause for ICE's revocation of Bello's bond is not dispositive. However, even if Nieves did apply, we doubt that it would foreclose Bello's claim. The warrant that the Government alleges establishes probable cause only establishes probable cause for his initial immigration arrest. . . There was no need for ICE to have independent probable cause to revoke Bello's bond.] . . . . Because Nieves does not control, we remand to the district court to apply the Mt. Healthy standard, the default rule for First Amendment retaliation claims.")

Lopez v. City of Glendora, 811 F. App'x 1016, ____ n.7 (9th Cir. 2020 ("Kodadek argues that Lopez must also plead and prove the absence of reasonable cause for the pat-down and use of force in light of Nieves v. Bartlett, __ U.S. __, __, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1725, 204 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2019). We assume without deciding that Nieves would apply to this case, but because a jury could conclude that no reasonable suspicion justified the pat-down and that the force was excessive, the Nieves requirements are satisfied.")

Capp v. County of San Diego, 940 F.3d 1046, 1056-58 (9th Cir. 2019) ("[W]e conclude that the mere existence of a legitimate motive, supported though it might be by the FAC, is insufficient to mandate dismissal. If Firth would not have made the recommendation absent retaliatory animus, there could still be a viable retaliation claim. . . And Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that retaliatory animus was a but-for cause of Firth's actions. We find instructive the Supreme Court's decision in Nieves. There, the Court held that plaintiffs bringing 'First Amendment retaliatory arrest claims' must generally 'plead and prove the absence of probable cause.'. . In 'retaliatory arrest cases,' the Court explained, there is 'a tenuous causal connection between the defendant's alleged animus and the plaintiff's injury.'. . . If the plaintiff demonstrates that the arresting officer lacked probable cause, that showing bridges the causal gap by 'reinforc[ing] the retaliation evidence and show[ing] that retaliation was the but-for basis' of the official's action. . . But the Court carved out an exception to the 'no-probable-cause requirement' in retaliatory arrest cases. . . That requirement does 'not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . . A plaintiff who shows differential treatment 'addresses [the] causal concern by helping to establish that "non-retaliatory grounds [we]re in fact insufficient to provoke the adverse consequences."'. .In this case, Plaintiffs have pleaded both a lack of any substantiated concern for the children's safety (which may well be the equivalent of probable cause in this context). . . and differential treatment. These allegations together support the inference that Firth was motivated by retaliatory animus. . . .At summary judgment or at trial, Defendants could well marshal evidence that Firth and her colleagues were motivated primarily by their legal obligation to investigate allegations of child abuse, and would have made the custody recommendation for that reason alone. . . But Plaintiffs plead that Defendants, Firth included, 'were purely motivated by their desire to retaliate against' Capp, acted 'without proper reason or authority' and 'without reasonable probable cause,' and 'ma[de] false and misleading statements to retaliate against [Capp] and in order to unduly influence and threaten [Debora] to file an application with the Family court.' Taking these allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, and emphasizing the liberal pleading standard afforded to pro se litigants, we conclude that Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that retaliation was the but-for motive for Firth's actions. Plaintiffs therefore plead a plausible First Amendment retaliation claim.")

American News and Information Services, Inc. v. Gore, 778 F. App'x 429, ___ (9th Cir. 2019) ("The district court correctly dismissed Playford's First Amendment retaliatory arrest, search, and seizure claims against the arresting officers, though it did so based on qualified immunity. The Supreme Court recently held that '[t]he plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.' Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1724 (2019). Playford concedes that the officers had probable cause for his first three arrests, and the allegations in the complaint about his fourth arrest on May 25, 2012, for violation of California Penal Code § 148(a)(1), establish the existence of probable cause for that arrest. Because Playford has not demonstrated that an exception to the no-probable-cause requirement applies, see Nieves, 139 S. Ct. at 1727; Lozman v. City of Rivera Beach, 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1951, 1954–55 (2018), his claims fail as a matter of law. Because we can affirm on any basis fairly presented in the record, . . . we affirm the dismissal of these claims.")

Bressi v. Pima County Board of Supervisors, No. CV-18-00186-TUC-DCB, 2020 WL 1904620, at *4 (D. Ariz. Apr. 17, 2020) ("Plaintiff claims that Deputy Sheriff Roher arrested and charged him with blocking the traffic lane in retaliation for refusing to answer USBP agent's citizenship question. In this context, Defendants assert that a finding of probable cause for an arrest defeats a retaliatory arrest claim. Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S.Ct. 1715 (2019). Defendants have not, however, established that there was probable cause for the arrest. The Plaintiff alleges that he was told to not move his vehicle out of the primary inspection land by the USBP agent, Sheriff Roher knew this, and the Plaintiff promptly moved his vehicle when Sheriff Roher told him to pull through the checkpoint. Plaintiff alleges he was falsely imprisoned by Defendant Roher when he was 'handcuffed and prevented from leaving his location outside of the checkpoint,'. . . without 'probable suspicion' of any crime or state traffic violation[.] . . Plaintiff alleges facts supporting a constitutional claim that he was illegally seized without probable cause. Deputy Roher and Deputy Kunze are not entitled to qualified immunity on the facts as alleged by the Plaintiff, without evidence that the arrest was supported by probable cause or that a reasonable officer would have believed probable cause existed for the arrest.")

Meade v. Smith, No. C17-4034-LTS, 2020 WL 1180410, at *11 (N.D. Iowa Mar. 11, 2020) ("While showing an absence of probable cause is clearly required for some First-Amendment retaliation claims, the requirement does not apply in all cases. Meade does not allege retaliatory arrest or retaliatory prosecution as the basis for his claim. Instead, he challenges other actions by Smith that allegedly caused harm before any arrest or prosecution occurred. I am aware of no binding authority requiring a plaintiff to prove a lack of probable cause under these circumstances. And, in fact, the reasons outlined in Hartman and Nieves for adopting a no-probable-cause element are generally absent here. If Meade were challenging only Smith's decision to investigate Meade, or the search warrant itself, requiring Meade to show a lack of probable-cause would likely be justified. . . Probable cause for these actions would fulfill the same role as it does for arrests and prosecutions by providing 'a "distinct body of highly valuable circumstantial evidence" that is "apt to prove or disprove" whether retaliatory animus actually caused the injury.'. .Here, however, Meade challenges the manner in which Smith carried out his investigatory activities, not the mere fact of the investigation. Viewing the record most favorably to Meade, it is obvious that Smith went above and beyond normal investigatory tactics. . . . In short, when viewed most favorably to Meade, there are genuine issues of fact for trial on Meade's First Amendment retaliation claim. Meade is not required to demonstrate a lack of probable cause for the actions he challenges and there is sufficient evidence to show that 'the presumption of regularity accorded to prosecutorial decisionmaking' should be suspended and to raise a genuine issue about retaliatory motive. . . Even if the eventual prosecution against Meade may have been supported by probable cause, that would not retroactively shield Smith from liability for prior wrongful acts. . . Smith is not entitled to summary judgment on Meade's First Amendment retaliation claim.")

Bledsoe v. Ferry County, Washington, No. 2:19-CV-227-RMP, 2020 WL 376611, at *4-6 (E.D. Wash. Jan. 23, 2020) ("Generally, the plaintiff in a First Amendment retaliation case must also plead and prove a lack of probable cause. See Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1727 (2019); see also Hartman, 547 U.S. at 261. However, the Supreme Court recently has clarified the want of probable cause requirement in the context of retaliatory arrests. In Nieves v. Bartlett, the Court explained that, '[a]lthough probable cause should generally defeat a retaliatory arrest claim, a narrow qualification is warranted for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.'. . . The Supreme Court's exception, as explained in Nieves, recognizes that requiring the plaintiff to plead and prove lack of probable cause in every First Amendment retaliation case does not sufficiently protect First Amendment rights. Ms. Bledsoe's Complaint properly states the first element of her First Amendment retaliation claim, as she alleged that she engaged in constitutionally protected activity by writing political messages in chalk in a public forum. Second, the Court considers whether Defendants' action would chill a person of ordinary firmness from continuing to exercise her First Amendment rights. Ms. Bledsoe has alleged that the Commissioners' Office encouraged and directed her prosecution. . . She claims that Commissioner Blankenship asked the prosecuting attorney to seek the harshest penalty possible under the malicious mischief statute. . . Facing criminal prosecution and a possible penalty of up to one year in jail would chill a person of ordinary firmness from continuing to exercise her right to free speech. Third, Ms. Bledsoe has alleged facts that, if taken as true, show that the protected activity was a substantial motivating factor contributing to her prosecution. Ms. Bledsoe claims that her messages were designed to encourage citizens to oppose Commissioner Blankenship at a public meeting. . . In response to Ms. Bledsoe's chalking, Commissioner Blankenship allegedly told the Prosecuting Attorney's Office that Ms. Bledsoe should be imprisoned for one year and fined $5,000. . . Ms. Bledsoe states that no other person in the City of Republic has been prosecuted, imprisoned, or fined for writing on the sidewalk in chalk. . . From these factual allegations, the Court draws the reasonable inference that the content of Ms. Bledsoe's messages, rather than Ms. Bledsoe's act of chalking, caused Defendants to seek her prosecution. Therefore, Ms. Bledsoe has stated facts sufficient to show that her alleged protected activity, engaging in political speech via chalked messages, was a substantial factor motivating Defendants' conduct. Fourth, the Court considers whether Defendants 'induced the prosecutor to bring charges that would not have been initiated without [their] urging.'. . As already explained, Ms. Bledsoe's allegations indicate that Defendants in the Commissioner' Office initiated and directed her prosecution. Additionally, ... Ms. Bledsoe's Complaint contains factual allegations showing that Defendants induced the prosecutor to bring charges that would not have been brought otherwise. Finally, the Court considers whether Ms. Bledsoe has alleged a lack of probable cause. The charges against Ms. Bledsoe were dismissed because, according to Judge Brown, writing in chalk is not property damage, which is an essential element of RCW 9A.48.090(a), the crime for which Ms. Bledsoe was charged. . . Defendants argue that probable cause existed to prosecute Ms. Bledsoe under RCW 9A.48.090(b), a different subsection of Washingto's third-degree malicious mischief statute that does not require proof of property damage. However, Ms. Bledsoe was not charged with violating RCW 9A.48.090(b). Therefore, the Court finds that Ms. Bledso's Complaint demonstrates that there was a lack of probable cause 'to bring the criminal charge' against her. . . Alternatively, the Court finds that Ms. Bledsoe is not required under Nieves to plead and prove a lack of probable cause, as Ms. Bledsoe has alleged facts demonstrating that chalking on public sidewalks rarely, if ever, is prosecuted. . . The Court emphasizes that this finding is made at an early stage of the proceedings, under the 12(b)(6) standard. For the foregoing reasons, Ms. Bledsoe has alleged a viable First Amendment retaliation claim.")

Taylor v. Vangesen, No. C18-5682 BHS, 2019 WL 4980436, at *6 (W.D. Wash. Oct. 8, 2019) ("Taylor argues that VanGesen had no probable cause to arrest him for obstruction because he complied with VanGesen's instructions to get out of the car, walk to the back, and submit to a pat-down. . . Taylor alleges that he was arrested only after he implied that the stop was based on race through his statement that 'we both know this isn't about the brake light,' and for twice objecting to VanGesen's excessive use of force. In his motion, VanGesen argues the only way to interpret Taylor's pled facts is to find probable cause existed and the arrest was not based on Taylor's speech. . . The Court finds that as Taylor plausibly alleges he complied with VanGesen's instructions, Taylor has plausibly alleged that he was arrested without probable cause. Having plausibly alleged a lack of probable cause, actual causation of the arrest becomes a question of fact, and so Taylor has sufficiently alleged VanGesen arrested him based on protected speech.Therefore, the Court denies VanGesen's motion on Taylor's First Amendment claim. . . .Regarding qualified immunity to Taylor's Fourteenth Amendment and Fourth Amendment claims, VanGesen argues that Taylor would have to prove 'initiating a traffic stop for an equipment malfunction on a motor vehicle operated by a person of a different race' violates clearly-established rights. . . This clearly mischaracterizes Taylor's position. Taylor does not argue police may not stop motorists of another race for legitimate traffic infractions. Taylor alleges VanGesen had no reason to suspect he had committed a traffic infraction and instead stopped him based only on his race. . . It appears that as alleged VanGesen's actions would violate the clearly-established right under the Fourteenth Amendment not to be stopped by police based only on race, . . . and the clearly-established right under the Fourth Amendment not to be seized without reasonable suspicion[.] . . Regarding qualified immunity to Taylor's First Amendment claim, VanGesen argues that there was probable cause to arrest Taylor for obstructing an officer. . . However, that conclusion would require the Court to find that Taylor's position, that no probable cause existed, is implausible. Notwithstanding VanGesen's argument that the Kitsap County District Court found probable cause, the Court finds it is plausible that as alleged, Taylor complied with VanGesen's commands to the point that probable cause for arrest was not present and so Taylor was arrested on the basis of his protected speech. Arrest only on the basis of protected speech violates clearly established First Amendment rights. . .Therefore, the Court finds that VanGesen has not shown he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ballentine v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't, No. 17-16728, 2019 WL 2807848, at *1 (9th Cir. July 2, 2019) (not reported) ("In Nieves v. Bartlett, the Supreme Court held that a plaintiff pursuing a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim must generally plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest. . . The Court noted, however, 'that the no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . Because neither the district court nor the parties had the benefit of Nieves when the order on appeal was decided, we vacate that order and remand for further proceedings in light of Nieves.")

Thomas v. Cassia County, Idaho, No. 4:17-CV-00256-DCN, 2019 WL 5270200, at *8–9 (D. Idaho Oct. 17, 2019) ("Akers recently filed a Motion to Reconsider based on the United States Supreme Court's decision in Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715 (2019). . . In Nieves, the Supreme Court held that a 'plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.'. . This holding abrogates the validity of Ford v. Yakima, 706 F.3d 1188 (9th Cir. 2013), upon which this Court's analysis previously relied, allowing Thomas' First Amendment retaliation claim to survive summary judgment. As stated above, a plaintiff alleging a retaliatory arrest claim must 'plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.'. .The Supreme Court explained further that the absence of probable cause will 'generally provide weighty evidence that the officer's animus caused the arrest, whereas the presence of probable cause will suggest the opposite.'. .This is because 'probable cause speaks to the objective reasonableness of an arrest.'. .The Supreme Court did identify a narrow exception to this rule in Nieves. It explained that 'the no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. .Since the Court has determined probable cause existed for Thomas' arrest, Thomas cannot prevail on his First Amendment retaliation claim unless the exception set forth in Nieves applies. As will be explained more fully below, the Court will reopen discovery for ninety (90) days on this limited issue. . . . Although Nieves dealt with a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim, the same logic, analysis, and principles apply to a Second Amendment retaliatory arrest claim as well. The Supreme Court used broad language applicable to any retaliatory arrest claim when it said '[t]he plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.'. .There are also important policy considerations that apply equally well to both First and Second Amendment retaliation claims. In Nieves, the Supreme Court explained that in retaliatory arrest cases, it is 'particularly difficult to determine whether the adverse government action was caused by the officer's malice or the plaintiff's potentially criminal conduct.'. . Obviously, a subjective inquiry into the mental state of an arresting officer is problematic. . . There are also 'overwhelming litigation risks' and the Supreme Court 'generally review[s] [police officer] conduct under objective standards of reasonableness' to 'ensure that officers may go about their work without undue apprehension of being sued.'. .Based on the similar legal standards that apply to both First and Second Amendment retaliation claim, as well as policy concerns that apply equally well to both situations, the Court intends to apply the Nieves holding to the merits of Thomas' Second Amendment retaliation claim. However, as just noted, the Court will reopen discovery for ninety (90) days on the limited issue of whether evidence exists that triggers the Nieves exception. Once this discovery window has closed, and the parties have filed their supplemental briefing, the Court will address the merits of Akers' Motion for Reconsideration.")

Henneberry v. City of Newark, No. 13-CV-05238-TSH, 2019 WL 4194275, at *5, *7, *9 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 4, 2019) ("In their motion, Defendants argue that Henneberry's First Amendment retaliation claim is barred because the Court has already determined Fredstrom had probable cause to arrest him, and the Supreme Court's holding in Nieves establishes that a retaliation claim must fail in such circumstances. . . . Defendants acknowledge that Nieves 'provides a "narrow qualification" to its ruling, setting forth that the "no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff provides objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been."'. . However, they argue this exception is inapplicable here because the Supreme Court explained that 'this narrow exception is warranted "for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so."'. . Defendants note that the offense in question here is trespassing, which they argue cannot be characterized as a crime for which officers rarely affect an arrest. . . Defendants further argue there is no evidence that probable cause existed to arrest any other attendee at the Event. . . Defendants note that, in denying their motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, Judge James relied upon Ford, but they argue Ford is no longer viable after Nieves. . . They now request the Court reexamine the decision because Henneberry cannot establish that Fredstrom 'was "plainly incompetent" or "knowingly violated the law," such that no reasonable officer could conclude his actions were lawful.'. . . Henneberry notes there are two sets of events at issue here: (1) his arrest and (2) whether Fredstrom's decision and actions to book, transport, and jail him were in retaliation for his speech. . . Henneberry maintains his First Amendment claim is grounded on the latter, 'on the conduct and punishment flowing from his arrest,' including his transportation to Santa Rita Jail and detention there for approximately 30 hours. . . 'As a result, Nieves's general rule that a plaintiff must plead and prove an absence of probable cause, and that a finding of probable cause precludes a retaliatory arrest claim, does not apply.'. . Henneberry argues that, even if Nieves's general rule were to apply to his claims, they fall within the exception to that rule because he was arrested and jailed for misdemeanor trespass under California Penal Code section 602, '[b]ut hardly anyone is arrested or cited for this offense.'. . To the extent the Court determines there is insufficient evidence to make this determination, Henneberry requests it deny or defer Defendants' motion under Rule 56(d) while discovery is reopened. . . Finally, Henneberry argues Fredstrom is not entitled to qualified immunity 'because at the time of his conduct here, it was clearly established that an officer "could not exercise his discretion to book an individual in retaliation for that individual's First Amendment activity."'. . . Given that Fredstrom had probable cause to arrest Henneberry, it is clear that Nieves would not permit Henneberry to pursue a First Amendment retaliation claim based on that arrest. Defendants argue Henneberry also cannot satisfy Nieves's no probable cause requirement as to the subsequent actions because they were tied to the initial arrest. . . However, it is not clear that Nieves protects an officer from all subsequent action after an arrest, which here includes Fredstrom's decision to transport Henneberry to the Newark Police Department, his decision not to 'field cite' him at the Newark Police Station and to instead transport him to Fremont City Jail, and Henneberry's ultimate transfer to Santa Rita Jail, where he was jailed for 30 hours. Henneberry alleges these actions were all in retaliation for his speech. As Judge James observed in her decision, Henneberry's claim is based on the 'narrow question: whether Fredstrom's desire to chill Plaintiff from engaging in future First Amendment activities was a but for cause of his decision not to cite and release Plaintiff from the Newark Police Department.'. . Given the post-arrest conduct at issue here, it is not clear that Nieves prohibits such claims. . . .Even if Nieves were to immunize all post-arrest conduct, Henneberry argues his claims fall within an exception to Nieves's general rule. . . In Nieves, the Court emphasized that '[a]lthough probable cause should generally defeat a retaliatory arrest claim,' there is an exception when officers have probable cause but typically exercise their discretion not to make arrests. . . Thus, the 'no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . Henneberry contends that is the case here because Newark Police records show they rarely cite or arrest individuals for the offenses for which he was arrested and jailed. . . He cites to records showing that from 2012 to present, there were only 14 citations or bookings for violations of California Penal Code sections 602(o) or 602.1(a) by the Newark Police. . . Thus, even if the Court were to conclude that Henneberry's First Amendment retaliation claim is a retaliatory arrest claim like that in Nieves, he argues this exception applies and he is not required to plead and prove an absence of probable cause. . . Alternatively, if the Court finds that the Newark Police records do not establish that his claim falls within Nieves's exception, Henneberry argues Defendants' motion still should be denied or deferred pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56(d) for additional discovery related to police records and discretion regarding arrests under California Penal Code section 602. While the standard for this 'narrow qualification' has not been further clarified since Nieves, the Supreme Court used the example of jaywalking, which 'is endemic but rarely results in arrest.'. . . That could be the case here, where it is undisputed that for several years leading up to the Event, Henneberry attended many, if not every, City Council meeting held by the City of Newark, that he actively criticized City officials, and that he was well known to Defendants Becker, Fredstrom, and Ashley because he was disruptive and complained too much. Within a few minutes of Henneberry sitting down in the gallery, Ashley informed him he needed to leave because he had not made a reservation, yet Ashley did not check whether persons in the gallery had reservations. After Henneberry stated he felt he was entitled to attend the meeting under the Brown Act, Fredstrom was dispatched to the Event 'because there was some type of disturbance involving Mr. Henneberry.' There is no evidence he was loud, used inappropriate language, was confrontational, or abusive. There is also no dispute that, while Henneberry was seated, Fredstrom and Lawson grabbed him by the hands and arms and escorted him out of the building using a rear wrist lock, handcuffed him and arrested him. Given Henneberry's reputation as a vocal critic of City officials, coupled with his proffered evidence regarding Newark Police's citations for trespass in similar circumstances, the Court finds the Nieves exception could apply. . . . As discussed above, Henneberry has established the existence of genuine dispute as to whether Fredstrom violated his First Amendment rights by retaliating against him for his free speech activities. Thus, the Court must determine whether Fredstrom violated clearly established law at the time of his actions. Judge James found it was 'clearly established in April 2013 that officers could not exercise their discretion to "automatically" book individuals even though they had probable cause to arrest them if the booking officer was retaliating against the individual for exercising his or her First Amendment rights.'. . In Ford, the court found that '[a] reasonable officer would have understood that he did not automatically possess the authority to book and jail an individual upon conducting a lawful arrest supported by probable cause.'. . Ford, decided in February 2013, concerned an officer's decision to book an arrestee in 2007. . . The Court noted that '[a]t the time the officers acted in 2007, the law in this Circuit gave fair notice that it would be unlawful to jail Ford in retaliation for his First Amendment activity.'. . In this case, as the allegations took place in April 2013, the Court finds this right was clearly established at that time and a reasonable officer in Fredstrom's position would have known in April 2013 that he could not exercise his discretion in retaliation for Henneberry's First Amendment activity. Finally, the Court must determine whether Fredstrom 'reasonably but mistakenly' could have believed his conduct did not violate his rights. Qualified immunity applies whether the error is a mistake of law or fact, or mixed question of law and fact. . . Judge James found 'there is nothing in the record that suggests Fredstrom reasonably believed his conduct did not violate Plaintiff's rights.'. . She noted the only evidence Defendants presented was Fredstrom's 'conclusory declaration that he did not intend to interfere with' Henneberry's First Amendment rights, but such evidence 'does not establish the grounds for reasonable mistake; at most, it creates a triable issue of fact whether Fredstrom acted in retaliation.'. . Defendants provide no additional evidence on this issue in their renewed motion. Accordingly, the Court agrees with Judge James's decision and therefore finds Defendants have not established Fredstrom is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Daniels v. Alameda County, No. 19-CV-00602-JSC, 2019 WL 3017645, at *7 (N.D. Cal. July 10, 2019) ("Nieves did not recognize an exception to the no-probable cause rule for retaliatory-prosecution section 1983 cases. To the contrary, Nieves adopted the no-probable cause rule from retaliatory prosecution cases into retaliatory-arrest cases, with one narrow exception. . . As this is not a retaliatory-arrest case, Nieves does not apply.")

TENTH CIRCUIT

Bustillos v. City of Carlsbad, New Mexico, No. 21-2129, 2022 WL 1447709, at *5–6 (10th Cir. May 9, 2022) (not reported) ("Officer Vasquez had probable cause for Bustillos's arrest, which defeats Bustillos's retaliatory arrest claim. Although Bustillos professes a desire to serve the public by filming police encounters, his desire to film from a particular location does not authorize him to break the law. Bustillos correctly observes that the Constitution gives him the rights to free speech and protection from unreasonable seizures. . . But this same Constitution also empowers a state—without violating these rights—to (1) criminalize Bustillos's refusal to obey lawful police commands, (2) criminalize his subsequent concealment of his identity, and (3) arrest him upon probable cause that he committed either or both crimes. . . In sum, Officer Vasquez is entitled to qualified immunity on Bustillos's First Amendment claim because there is no genuine factual dispute regarding probable cause. Because Bustillos failed to demonstrate that Officer Vasquez violated his constitutional rights, Bustillos fails to meet the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, and we need not address the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis regarding clearly established law or Bustillos's claim that the City is liable. We therefore conclude that the district court correctly entered judgment in favor of Officer Vasquez and the City.")

Fenn v. City of Truth or Consequences, 983 F.3d 1143, 1149 (10th Cir. 2020) ("Fenn argues, however, that a lack of probable cause is not a required element of First Amendment retaliation under the circumstances presented here. He claims to fit within a narrow exception to the no-probable-cause requirement, as described by the Supreme Court in Nieves. In that case, the Court held a plaintiff need not show a lack of probable cause 'when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.'. . But Fenn has not pointed to any evidence in the record that he was arrested when other similarly situated individuals were not. Indeed, it seems unlikely that any such similarly situated individuals exist. The record demonstrates, after all, that Fenn was arrested only after having violated no-trespass orders at the Center at least three times, and only after multiple complaints from building tenants about his behavior. Fenn does not fit within the narrow exception carved out in Nieves.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Brienza v. City of Peachtree City, Georgia, No. 21-12290, 2022 WL 3841095, at *9 (11th Cir. Aug. 30, 2022) (not reported) ("Nieves, and the exception to the absence-of-probable-cause requirement, were not clearly established until 2019. As the district court concluded, at the time of Brienza's arrest in 2015, there was no clearly established law creating an exception to the 'no-probable-cause' requirement for First Amendment retaliatory arrest claims. Indeed, at the time of Brienza's arrest, the clearly established law was that a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim was 'defeated by the existence of probable cause.'. . Because, as we've already explained, the officers had probable cause to arrest Brienza for obstructing the investigation into underage drinking, the officers were entitled to qualified immunity on Brienza's First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim.")

Toole v. City of Atlanta, 798 F. App'x 381, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("No reasonable officer could have believed that there was probable cause to arrest Toole for standing in the street and impeding traffic if Toole was on the sidewalk and the streets were closed to traffic. '[Q]ualified immunity protects the police ... but only up to the line defined by the arguable probable cause standard.'. . So, in a situation where 'the resolution of disputed critical facts determines on which side of this line the officer's conduct fell, summary judgment is inappropriate,' and Toole is 'entitled to have [his] case heard by a jury.'. . Now on to the First Amendment. '[W]hen an officer has arguable probable cause to arrest, he is entitled to qualified immunity both from Fourth Amendment claims for false arrest and from First Amendment claims stemming from the arrest.' Gates v. Khokhar, 884 F.3d 1290, 1298 (11th Cir. 2018). But as we have already explained, here Zorn did not have arguable probable cause to arrest Toole, so he isn't automatically entitled to qualified immunity on Toole's First Amendment claim. Eleventh Circuit precedent holds that individuals have 'a First Amendment right, subject to reasonable time, manner and place restrictions, to photograph or videotape police conduct,'. . . as well as to engage in lawful protests[.] . . . Additionally, we've established that law enforcement officers may not arrest an individual as a way 'to thwart or intrude upon First Amendment rights otherwise being validly asserted.'. . Toole was engaging in constitutionally protected activities—namely, protesting and filming police conduct—at the time of his unlawful arrest. . . Toole alleges that Zorn's actions were aimed at preventing him from continuing to film police activity. He recalls protesters saying that people in the crowd were being grabbed and arrested by officers for filming, and Toole's video of the event shows that he was arrested after zooming in on an officer's name and saying it out loud. The fact that his phone was returned to him and that was able to film inside the paddy wagon does not change the fact that Toole's unlawful arrest stopped him from continuing to participate in the protest or film police conduct in public, or that his arrest was allegedly effected to stop him from filming. So, reading the facts in Toole's favor, he was engaging in protected First Amendment activities when Zorn unlawfully arrested him to stop him from filming police activities. Thus, Zorn violated Toole's First Amendment rights. Next, we must determine whether Toole's First Amendment rights were clearly established at the time of his arrest. For Toole to show that his First Amendment rights were clearly established, he 'must demonstrate (1) that a materially similar case has already been decided, giving notice to the police; (2) that a broader, clearly established principle should control the novel facts in this situation; or (3) this case fits within the exception of conduct which so obviously violates [the] constitution that prior case law is unnecessary.'. .This Court has established that individuals have 'a First Amendment right, subject to reasonable time, manner and place restrictions, to photograph or videotape police conduct' and that '[t]he First Amendment protects the right to gather information about what public officials do on public property, and specifically, a right to record matters of public interest.'. . We've also held that individuals have a clearly established right to protest peacefully and 'engage in expressive activities.'. . It is also clearly established law in this Circuit that law enforcement officers cannot punish or retaliate against individuals for expressing their First Amendment rights. . . Reading the facts in Toole's favor, he was unlawfully arrested without arguable probable cause while engaging in protected First Amendment conduct—protesting and filming police activities—specifically to stop him from doing so. Zorn, therefore, violated Toole's clearly established First Amendment rights and isn't entitled to qualified immunity.") DeMartini v. Town of Gulf Stream, 942 F.3d 1277, 1297-1309 (11th Cir. 2019) ("To recap, the presence of probable cause will (1) defeat a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim for an underlying retaliatory criminal prosecution, Hartman, and also (2) will generally defeat a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim for an underlying retaliatory arrest, Nieves, except (a) when the 'unique' five factual circumstances in Lozman exist together, or (b) where the plaintiff establishes retaliation animus and presents 'objective evidence' that he was arrested for certain conduct when otherwise similarly situated individuals (committing the same conduct) had not engaged in the same sort of protected speech and had not been arrested, Nieves. While these Supreme Court decisions provide significant guidance, the Supreme Court has not addressed a § 1983 First Amendment claim predicated on a retaliatory civil lawsuit. Although there is scant circuit precedent, we discuss those few decisions because they demonstrate how circuit courts have assessed what a plaintiff must prove to establish the required causal connection in § 1983 First Amendment retaliation cases when predicated on civil lawsuits. [court discusses circuit cases] In sum, even before the probable cause decisions in Hartman and Nieves, other circuits were considering whether the underlying civil lawsuit was frivolous before allowing a plaintiff to move forward on a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim predicated on that civil lawsuit. . . . DeMartini contends that the circumstances of her case are like those in Lozman because the record amply demonstrates the Town adopted an official municipal policy of retaliation against her. DeMartini argues Hartman's and Nieves's probable cause requirement does not apply because the Town unanimously voted to bring its RICO civil action 'for the sole purpose of stopping the protected activity' of filing public records requests and lawsuits. Alternatively, even if Hartman and Nieves's probable cause requirement applies, DeMartini argues that the Town lacked probable cause for its RICO lawsuit. DeMartini contends that the Town's RICO action was 'baseless' and frivolous given Eleventh Circuit precedent that a threat to file a civil lawsuit is not a valid RICO predicate. Not surprisingly, the Town responds that the 'causation landscape' here is more similar to that in Hartman because attorneys here functioned in the same role as that of a prosecutor in Hartman. Just as the dual actors in Hartman, the individuals filing the civil lawsuit (outside counsel) were not the same individuals allegedly harboring the animus (the Town's Commissioners). The Town also stresses, however, that the Supreme Court limited Lozman to its unique factors, several of which are missing here. And like the Supreme Court did in Nieves, this Court should look to the closest common law analog to DeMartini's First Amendment retaliation claim based on a civil lawsuit, which is a claim for 'wrongful institution of legal process' and also requires proving the want of probable cause. If DeMartini is correct that the Town lacked probable cause to file its civil RICO lawsuit, we would not have to address whether the presence of probable cause defeats DeMartini's § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim as a matter of law. Thus, we first examine whether the Town had probable cause to file its civil RICO lawsuit. . . . Because the Town had probable cause to file its civil RICO lawsuit, we must answer the final question: whether the existence of probable cause for a civil lawsuit defeats a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim predicated on that underlying civil lawsuit. Based on the factors discussed in the Supreme Court's Hartman and Nieves decisions, we conclude that, as with § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claims arising in the criminal prosecution and arrest context, the presence of probable cause will generally defeat a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim based on a civil lawsuit as a matter of law. . . This principle will particularly be apt when the alleged retaliatory civil litigation by the government is itself taken as a reasonable response to the plaintiff's own litigation, or threat of litigation, against the government. Just as a citizen may have the right to sue the government, the government likewise has the right, and duty, to engage in

