Johnson v. McCarver, 942 F.3d 405, 412-15 (8th Cir. 2019) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I agree that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's deprivation-of-liberty claim because he suffered no post-trial deprivation of liberty. I also agree the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's claim for excessive force arising from the tasing. I disagree, however, that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's remaining Fourth Amendment claims for false arrest and excessive force, as well as his First Amendment retaliation claim. . . The court concludes that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's claims for false arrest under the Fourth Amendment and retaliatory arrest under the First Amendment because the officers had arguable probable cause to arrest Johnson for trespass. I disagree. . . . A reasonable officer would understand that Johnson was no different than any other person waiting in the lobby for the valet to bring around their car. While Webster told Johnson he would have to leave because the owner would not allow his boots, Johnson explained the owner had previously allowed his boots. Hearing this explanation, Webster walked away. When McCarver approached Johnson and told him to leave, Johnson said he was in fact leaving, but was just waiting for the valet like the rest of the patrons—a claim of right to be inside the lobby. . . McCarver then pushed Johnson as he was backing up toward the exit. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Johnson, he was not refusing to leave the premises, and his right to remain in the lobby had not been revoked. Rather, he was lawfully inside awaiting the valet. As such, the elements of trespass were not satisfied, and the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's false arrest claim. . . Because I believe the officers lacked even arguable probable cause to arrest Johnson, I also believe his First Amendment retaliation claim remains viable. Johnson alleges the officers arrested him in retaliation for recording them with his cell phone outside the club. To succeed on a claim for retaliatory arrest, Johnson must show (1) he engaged in a protected activity; (2) the government official took adverse action against him that would chill a person of ordinary firmness from continuing the activity; (3) the adverse action was motivated at least in part by the exercise of the protected activity; and (4) lack of probable cause or arguable probable cause for the arrest. . . The officers do not dispute the facts underlying this claim, but instead argue they are entitled to qualified immunity because Johnson's right to record and photograph the officers was not clearly established. While this Court has not decided this precise question, I would join every circuit that has done so and hold that the First Amendment protects the right to record police officers in public. See Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 360 (3d Cir. 2017); Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 690 (5th Cir. 2017*); ACLU of Ill. v. Alvarez*, 679 F.3d 583, 595 (7th Cir. 2012); Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78, 82 (1st Cir. 2011); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332, 1333 (11th Cir. 2000); Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436, 439 (9th Cir. 1995). Moreover, absent binding authority from this Court, a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' can itself 'clearly establish' the federal right Johnson alleges. . . By the time the officers arrested Johnson, all four circuit courts that had considered the question decided that filming the police in public is a First Amendment right. . . This 'robust consensus,' together with our general pronouncement that a citizen's 'right to exercise First Amendment freedoms without facing retaliation from government officials is clearly established,'. . . was more than sufficient to put McCarver and LaLuzerne on notice that they were violating Johnson's clearly established right[.] . . Consequently, I would hold that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for this claim. . . .Finally, the court concludes the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's claim of excessive force for using pepper spray and pushing him inside the club, because such force 'was not unreasonable under the circumstances.' I disagree. . . .Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Johnson, the three Graham factors provide no justification for pushing and pepper-spraying him and, as a result, the officers' use of force was objectively unreasonable. . .The officers also argue that the right at issue was not clearly established. But by the time they acted on October 5, 2014, we had held in Peterson v. Kopp that it was objectively unreasonable for the police to use pepper spray on a non-fleeing, nonviolent suspect who 'took a few steps backward, put his hands up, and said "[y]ou can't handle me like that"' immediately before being pepper-sprayed. . . Because these facts are sufficiently similar to this case, McCarver and LaLuzerne had 'fair warning' that their actions were unconstitutional.") Hamner v. Burls, 937 F.3d 1171, 1178-79 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 611 (2020) ("In evaluating an officer's claim to qualified immunity, '[t]he dispositive question is whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . Neither Langford nor Johnson-El shows that the 'particular conduct' alleged in Hamner's pleadings runs afoul of the Eighth Amendment. A reasonable prison official, aware of the alleged gaps in Hamner's treatment, could have understood the Eighth Amendment to allow administrators an opportunity to fix problems that arise in a prison's health care system by responding to grievances and taking corrective actions. . . .Hamner alleges that the defendants knew that he was 'seriously mentally ill' and that his confinement 'risked irreparable emotional damage or a death by suicide.' He argues that since In re Medley, 134 U.S. 160, 168, 10 S.Ct. 384, 33 L.Ed. 835 (1890), courts have recognized the damaging effects of solitary confinement. He contends that 'it is now beyond serious dispute' that administrative segregation poses serious risks, which are particularly pronounced for prisoners with mental illness. He points to our decision in Simmons v. Cook, 154 F.3d 805 (8th Cir. 1998), as establishing that solitary confinement, together with a prisoner's physical limitations, can deprive him 'the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities.'. . To defeat qualified immunity, however, 'the clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case' and not 'defined at a high level of generality.'. . None of the prior decisions involved a mentally ill prisoner in administrative segregation, and they do not demonstrate that the prison officials here violated a clearly established right. Indeed, although Orr did not involve a conditions of confinement claim, this court rejected a claim that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment by holding a mentally ill prisoner in administrative segregation for nine months while providing treatment. . . . Hamner maintains that various studies on solitary confinement and decisions of other circuits placed the defendants on notice that subjecting a prisoner with Hamner's mental illnesses to prolonged administrative segregation violates the Eighth Amendment. Although 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' may suffice to put a 'constitutional question beyond debate,'. . . Hamner fails to demonstrate such authority existed as of October 2015. . . . Scholarly literature about negative effects of segregation may influence prison administrators and future court decisions, but it likewise does not establish that the constitutional question raised by Hamner was beyond debate in 2015. Hamner's allegations identify a combination of circumstances that was not present in previous cases. We do not gainsay that lengthy administrative segregation of an inmate with serious medical illness and no access to television or regular reading material requires different analysis than solitary confinement of prisoners with no history of psychiatric difficulties and milder restrictions. That Hamner presents a debatable argument for distinguishing prior decisions and breaking new legal ground, however, does not suffice to allege that the officials violated a clearly established right.")

Hamner v. Burls, 937 F.3d 1171, 1179-80 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 611 (2020) ("Hamner argues that his Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated when prison officials placed him in administrative segregation for 203 days without affording him proper procedural avenues for challenging his classification. Prisoners have a liberty interest in freedom from conditions of confinement that impose 'atypical and significant hardship' relative to 'ordinary incidents of prison life.'. . The duration and degree of restrictions bear on whether a change in conditions imposes such a hardship. . . Hamner contends that the conditions of his confinement in administrative segregation departed materially enough from his experience in general population to trigger a liberty interest. He also claims that prison officials afforded him inadequate process by failing to articulate a clear justification for his placement in administrative segregation and to afford meaningful periodic review of his classification thereafter. Hamner identifies no circuit precedent holding that an inadequate justification for administrative segregation or shortcomings in review of a prisoner's placement violate the Due Process Clause. Instead, he attempts to derive a set of legal rules from cases in which we have held that prisoners did not allege a sufficient liberty interest. . . . None of the cited cases, however, clearly establishes the 'violative nature of [the] particular conduct' in question here. . . Our precedents have said that 'a demotion to segregation, even without cause, is not itself an atypical and significant hardship,'. . . and held that nine months in administrative segregation did not deprive a mentally ill prisoner of a liberty interest. . . While it is possible in this fact-specific area that a combination of circumstances involving solitary confinement could curtail a liberty interest, e.g., Incumaa v. Stirling, 791 F.3d 517, 531-32 (4th Cir. 2015); Williams v. Norris, 277 F. App'x 647, 648-49 (8th Cir. 2008) (per curiam), it is not beyond debate that the defendant officials did so by segregating a prisoner with Hamner's particular medical condition for 203 days under the conditions alleged. Where Hamner's only remaining claim is for damages, we conclude that the officials are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hamner v. Burls, 937 F.3d 1171, 1180-81 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 611 (2020) (Erickson, J., concurring) ("I concur in the majority's analysis, but write separately to express my concerns about Hamner's placement in administrative segregation and our reluctance to meaningfully address the significant hardship imposed on inmates placed in isolation, particularly those with pre-existing mental health issues. In light of the detrimental and devastating effects that placement in administrative segregation has on the human psyche, I am troubled in this case by both the prison administrators' lack of process and their failure to comply with their own policies. While I agree that there is currently no precedent in our court establishing a due process violation for failing to provide adequate procedural protections in the context of administrative segregation, I believe that the Constitution requires, at a minimum, an opportunity for meaningful review when prison administrators impose restrictions on an inmate as significant and as potentially injurious as placement in administrative segregation. I also believe that the time has come to revisit our precedent that ignores the known negative effects of segregation and isolation. Hamner alleged that the Arkansas Department of Corrections violated its own policies and the Due Process Clause by failing to provide an adequate justification for administrative segregation and by allowing a review process that essentially provided no meaningful review. Hamner was denied a probable cause hearing required by prison policy to take place within 72 hours of placement in administrative segregation. When the hearing actually occurred, Hamner was neither given advance notice of it nor an opportunity to appear. By the time Hamner was allowed to appear, more than a dozen days had passed. Hamner further alleged that prison policy provides for review hearings every seven days for the first two months. Documentation of the first seven-day review hearing in the record is dated May 13, 2015, when Hamner had been in administrative segregation for six weeks. It is uncontroverted that the check-the-box form completed by prison officials following the hearing gave no reason for Hamner's initial assessment or continued placement in administrative segregation. In fact, the forms completed following the review hearings contained no rationale for the initial placement or justification for continued placement in administrative segregation until August 12, 2015 (more than four months after Hamner was originally placed in administrative segregation) and then the form only contained the handwritten words 'security concerns.' Hamner disputes that he ever expressed a security concern. No findings were made that evidenced the nature of the alleged security concern. Hamner was inexplicably confined in administrative segregation for nearly five months without any explanation. During the almost seven months he was held in administrative segregation, he was given no meaningful opportunity to challenge his placement in isolation. As noted by the majority, we have consistently said that placement in administrative segregation, even without cause, is not itself an atypical and significant hardship. Given the developing science of mental health and what is now known – that is, the profound detrimental and devastating impact solitary confinement has on an inmate's psyche, particularly an inmate with pre-existing mental illnesses – we can only reach the conclusion that this type of isolation is, as a matter of law, not an atypical and significant hardship if we ignore reality. The majority acknowledges that '[s]cholarly literature about negative effects of segregation may influence prison administrators and future court decisions.' I suggest the time has come to consider that literature and reverse the precedent that stands for the proposition that isolation is not a significant hardship with constitutional implications. If we also factor in the prison administrators' failure to provide any explanation for Hamner's placement in administrative segregation for nearly five months and the hollow review process afforded him, I believe Hamner has shown a sufficient hardship to trigger a liberty interest. But, because I reluctantly conclude that our precedent precludes a finding of the existence of a clearly established constitutional right giving sufficient notice to prison administrators, I concur.")

Robinson v. Hawkins, 937 F.3d 1128, 1138 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Robinson claims a male officer was watching while Officer Hawkins conducted the strip search, and Officer Hawkins acknowledges that 'a male should not be present for a female search.' Robinson claims the search was 'conducted in [an] unsanitary parking lot,' and Officer Hawkins has also acknowledged that the parking lot was not sanitary. . . Finally, Robinson claims Officer Hawkins cursed and yelled at her. The other officer at the scene was not of the same sex as Robinson. An oily tractor-trailer in an open-air parking lot is not hygienic. And Robinson's claim that Officer Hawkins called her a 'bitch' and a 'f*cking dope fiend,' is 'evidence of insulting, intimidating or humiliating comments or jokes.'. .As of October 19, 2012, the law spoke directly and clearly to the issues raised with respect to Officer Hawkins's search. Therefore, we conclude that the law was sufficiently clear to inform Officer Hawkins her search of Robinson was unlawful both in scope and manner. The district court did not err in denying Officer Hawkins qualified immunity on Robinson's unreasonable search claim.")

Robinson v. Hawkins, 937 F.3d 1128, 1138-41 (8th Cir. 2019) (Smith, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in Part II.A of the panel opinion, and in Part II.B.2, which affirms the district court's denial of qualified immunity as to Robinson's unreasonable search claim. I write separately to express why I would also affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity on Robinson's excessive force claim based on Robinson's allegation that Officer Hawkins twice slammed her against the trailer while performing the strip search. . . . The majority holds that 'it is not clearly established that the amount of force [Officer] Hawkins used against Robinson is excessive.' I dissent from that portion of the panel opinion. Existing precedent put Officer Hawkins on notice that her use of force in the context of a strip search was unlawful. . . .Though a suspect's degree of injury may be relevant to assessing the degree of force used, the force itself, and the reasonableness of that force in light of the circumstances, is the critical inquiry. . . It is the degree of force in light of the circumstances, not the degree of injury, that determines lawfulness or unlawfulness of a particular use of force. . . Significantly, Crumley involved a plaintiff who resisted the arresting officer. . . Here, by contrast, it is undisputed that Robinson did not resist Officer Hawkins at any point during their encounter and that she was already handcuffed when Officer Hawkins twice shoved her against the trailer. On this record, I also would not characterize Officer Hawkins's forceful pushing of Robinson against the trailer as a de minimis use of force. . . .Robinson's allegation that Officer Hawkins used excessive force in slamming her against the trailer to effect a search is distinct from her claim that Officer Hawkins used excessive force in applying her handcuffs or otherwise effecting her seizure. Officer Hawkins's tightening of Robinson's handcuffs may be characterized as de minimis. But, her alleged slamming of Robinson against the trailer should not be. Robinson had already submitted when Officer Hawkins allegedly shoved her against the trailer. The shoving did not further Officer Hawkins's legitimate purpose of arresting Robinson or effecting a lawful search. I would permit the excessive force claim to proceed as well as the unreasonable search claim.")

Robinson v. Hawkins, 937 F.3d 1128, 1141-44 (8th Cir. 2019) (Colloton, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Officer Hawkins unquestionably had probable cause to search appellee Robinson's person for contraband at the time of her arrest. Indeed, Robinson admitted before the search that she had concealed drugs inside the front of her waistband before the arrest. Yet without identifying any decision of the Supreme Court or this court holding unreasonable the scope and manner of a search of a suspect's person for contraband, the court holds that Hawkins violated a clearly established right of Robinson's under the Fourth Amendment. Proper application of the doctrine of qualified immunity calls for a contrary conclusion, so I would reverse the district court's order on Robinson's unreasonable search claim. . . .The first significant problem with the court's qualified-immunity analysis is that it relies on dicta rather than holdings of the Supreme Court or this court. Clearly established law must be derived from holdings, not from dicta. . . To support its ruling that Hawkins's conduct violated a clearly established right, the court relies almost entirely on a decision of this court holding that a search did not violate clearly established rights. See Richmond v. City of Brooklyn Center, 490 F.3d 1002, 1008 (8th Cir. 2007). The court cites dicta from Richmond as the source of 'clearly established law.' Yet Richmond could not place the Fourth Amendment issue beyond debate, because the decision did not even hold that the search in that case was unconstitutional. . . . The second major difficulty is that the dicta from Richmond—even assuming that they could clearly establish a constitutional right—do not address the particular circumstances of this case. In considering a defense of qualified immunity, the law must not be examined at a high level of generality. . . . The discussion from Richmond does not address facts comparable to those presented here. The decision could not place the constitutionality of Hawkins's search 'beyond debate,' such that only a 'plainly incompetent' officer or a knowing lawbreaker could have conducted the search. . . . The only witness to Hawkins's search of Robinson was a male police officer. Under Robinson's version of the facts, he was present at a distance of twenty feet. The relevant precedents gave no fair warning that this court would hold the manner of searching unconstitutional based on the male officer's observations. . . . Hawkins's alleged name-calling and use of profanity was not sexually suggestive or particular to the intimate search. Hawkins did not misuse a baton or threaten physical abuse of Robinson's private areas. Hawkins did not have fair warning that she was forbidden to proceed with a search after allegedly uttering the quoted expletives. While the cited language may offend the sensibilities of a reviewing judge in chambers, the court cites no authority holding that use of foul language during the rough-and-tumble of street interaction between officer and suspect renders a subsequent search unreasonable. . . . Rulings declaring the violation of a 'clearly established right' require careful attention, because 'qualified immunity is important to "society as a whole," and because as "an immunity from suit," qualified immunity "is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial."'. . For the reasons discussed, the district court's decision denying qualified immunity to Hawkins on Robinson's unreasonable search claim should be reversed. Any disputed facts are not material to the legal conclusion. I concur in Parts II.A and II.B.1 of the opinion of the court and would reverse the district court's order on all three points raised.") Rudley v. Little Rock Police Dep't, 935 F.3d 651, 653-55 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Turning first to the claims against Bryant, Rudley alleges that Bryant's repeated tasing violated her Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of unreasonable force. In rejecting Bryant and Oldham's qualified immunity defense, the district court reasoned that Rudley and M.D.B. were unarmed, made no attempt to flee the scene, and did not appear to pose a 'real threat' to the safety of the officers. The court then identified several disputes of material fact, among them whether Rudley assaulted Bryant and whether her actions after the first tasing justified the subsequent tasings. Upon our de novo review, we conclude that neither Rudley nor the district court has identified controlling authority establishing a right to be free from any of the three tasings applied against Rudley. . . Rudley relies almost exclusively on Shekleton v. Eichenberger, 677 F.3d 361, 366 (8th Cir. 2012), in which the plaintiff complied with the arresting officer's orders and did not behave aggressively or direct obscenities at the officer. The plaintiff in that case told the officer that he was physically unable to comply with the order to place his arms behind his back and, although the two men fell to the ground while the officer attempted to effectuate the arrest, at no time did the plaintiff resist arrest or attempt to flee. Our en banc court recently distinguished Shekleton in Kelsay v. Ernst, No. 17-2181, slip op. at *3 (8th Cir. Aug. 13, 2019) (en banc). . . .The situation here, involving aggressive behavior and a 'chaotic and combative' scene, . . . is unlike Shekleton and more akin to the situation in Kelsay. Prior to their altercation, Bryant believed Rudley to have thrown a book at the principal, just as Ernst had been told that Kelsay had interfered with an arrest before his arrival. Rudley then physically inserted herself between M.D.B. and Bryant, directed an expletive at Bryant, and stepped toward him, ignoring his command to stop. Following the first tasing and continuing through the second, Rudley further contravened Bryant's prior command by walking toward M.D.B. and Moore. Like Kelsay, Rudley may have seemingly posed little physical danger to the officers, shod as she was in high-heeled shoes. Based on Rudley's behavior and the information known to Bryant at the time, however, 'a reasonable officer in [Bryant]'s position could have believed that it was important to control the situation and to prevent a confrontation ... that could escalate.'. .Rudley's was not the case of an individual 'who did not resist arrest, did not threaten the officer, did not attempt to run from him, and did not behave aggressively towards him.'. . Nor was Rudley like the seat-belt-restrained passenger cowering in her automobile, as was the case in Brown v. City of Golden Valley, 574 F.3d 491, 499 (8th Cir. 2009). Rather, as in Kelsay, the scene was a tumultuous one involving seemingly aggressive and noncompliant behavior, circumstances which we have previously held rendered officers' uses of tasers reasonable. . . 'In light of these authorities, we cannot conclude that [Rudley] has identified "a robust consensus of cases" that placed the excessive force question "beyond debate" at the time of [the] alleged violation.'. .Finally, we conclude that Officer Oldham did not violate a clearly established right by handcuffing M.D.B.'s wrists behind his back. Although the precise timing of the handcuffing is not established by the video, Oldham arrived in the midst of a highly combative situation. While Bryant was engaged with Rudley, M.D.B. can be seen on the video physically wrestling with Moore. Oldham could have reasonably believed that M.D.B. presented a threat to him and his fellow officers, and he applied only a minimal degree of force. Rudley and M.D.B. cite no case holding that the use of a similar degree of force was unreasonable in circumstances similar to those here. The district court's order is reversed, and the case is remanded for the entry of summary judgment in favor of the officers.")

Murphy v. Engelhart, 933 F.3d 1027, 1029-30 (8th Cir. 2019) ("In these circumstances, accepting the facts of the takedown as Murphy describes them, we cannot conclude that Engelhart violated a 'clearly established' constitutional right when he threw or shoved Murphy to the ground. At the time of Murphy's injury, it was clearly established that an officer could not 'throw to the ground a nonviolent, suspected misdemeanant who was not threatening anyone, was not actively resisting arrest, and was not attempting to flee.'. . But in Carpenter v. Gage, we held that it was reasonable for a law enforcement officer to tase an uncooperative suspect who 'refused to offer his hands when ordered to do so' and physically resisted arrest. . . In Blazek v. City of Iowa City, when a belligerent occupant refused to 'stay seated as directed' while officers completed a search, the officers grabbed his arm, twisted it upward behind his back, threw him to the ground, jumped on his back, and handcuffed him. . . Though we held that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity for a subsequent injury, we also held: 'It is clear ... that if the officers had lifted the belligerent Blazek off his feet, thrown him to the ground, and jumped on his back to handcuff him, without causing the alleged [subsequent] injury ... then the officers would have acted reasonably or at least be entitled to qualified immunity.'. . In Ehlers v. City of Rapid City, which involved an incident before Murphy's injury, we held it was constitutional for a police officer to use a 'spin takedown' on a man who ignored twice-repeated instructions 'to put his hands behind his back.'. . This year, the Supreme Court vacated denial of qualified immunity to an officer who executed a takedown of a man who disobeyed the officer's command not to close an apartment door and then tried to 'brush past' the officer. City of Escondido v. Emmons, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 500, 502-04, 202 L.Ed.2d 455 (2019). In light of these authorities, we cannot conclude that Murphy has identified 'a robust consensus of cases' that placed the excessive force question 'beyond debate' at the time of Engelhart's alleged violation. . . Accordingly, Engelhart's takedown did not violate a clearly established constitutional right.")

Dollar Loan Ctr. of S. Dakota, LLC v. Afdahl, 933 F.3d 1019, 1024-26 (8th Cir. 2019) ("DLC's alleged constitutional claim is that Afdahl deprived it of a procedural due process right when Afdahl revoked DLC's money lending licenses on September 13, 2017, before holding a pre-deprivation hearing. In a qualified immunity analysis, 'a right is "clearly established" if the "contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right."'. . . .We disagree with the district court's conclusion that procedural due process requires more than what the Division did and DLC's right to a pre-deprivation hearing was clearly established by Freeman. The process and procedure employed by the Division is distinguishable from that utilized by the officials in Freeman such that a reasonable official in Afdahl's position would not be on notice that he was violating a clearly established right when he issued the combined cease and desist and revocation order in this case. . . .While a trial-like hearing was not conducted, due process has been described by the United States Supreme Court as a 'flexible' concept. . . In this case, there is no evidence that adverse administrative action against DLC's property interest was based on an erroneous factual basis. It was Afdahl's responsibility to make a legal interpretation regarding the lawfulness of DLC's new loan product. He did so only after an intense investigation allowing DLC's regional manager and counsel to participate in both onsite examinations and to respond to follow-up questions. Under these circumstances where DLC was on notice that the Division was investigating the lawfulness of its new loan product, DLC was afforded an opportunity to provide additional information addressing the Division's concerns, and the revocation order had no more of an effect on DLC's business than the simultaneously issued cease and desist order, we conclude that DLC has not shown a procedural due process violation. More importantly, qualified immunity is intended to give 'government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments, and [to] protect[ ] all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . Even if Afdahl should have done something more before taking adverse action against DLC's money lending licenses, he made a reasonable mistake in the exercise of his official duties. This is the type of mistake that the qualified immunity rule was intended to protect. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the complaint, we find DLC has failed to show a violation of a constitutional right that was clearly established. Afdahl is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Kelsay v. Ernst, 933 F.3d 975, 980-82 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2760 (2020) ("It was not clearly established in May 2014 that a deputy was forbidden to use a takedown maneuver to arrest a suspect who ignored the deputy's instruction to 'get back here' and continued to walk away from the officer. None of the decisions cited by the district court or Kelsay involved a suspect who ignored an officer's command and walked away, so they could not clearly establish the unreasonableness of using force under the particular circumstances here. . . . Decisions concerning the use of force against suspects who were compliant or engaged in passive resistance are insufficient to constitute clearly established law that governs an officer's use of force against a suspect who ignores a command and walks away. The Supreme Court recently vacated the denial of qualified immunity for an officer who executed a takedown of a man who posed no apparent danger but disobeyed the officer's command not to close an apartment door and then 'tried to brush past' the officer. City of Escondido v. Emmons, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503-04, 202 L.Ed.2d 455 (2019) (per curiam). On remand, the Ninth Circuit concluded that precedent involving force employed in response to passive resistance was not sufficiently on point to constitute clearly established law that governed the takedown at the apartment door. . . This court's precedent likewise did not clearly establish that Ernst was forbidden to perform a takedown when Kelsay walked away. . . . Although the principal dissent suggests that there is a factual dispute about whether Kelsay complied with Ernst's command by momentarily stopping and turning around, the relevant question is not whether Kelsay complied as a factual matter. The issue is whether a reasonable officer could have believed that Kelsay was not compliant. Whether the officer's conclusion was reasonable, or whether he was 'reasonably unreasonable' for purposes of qualified immunity, . . . are questions of law, not fact. They are matters for resolution by the court, not by a jury. And Ernst's conclusion that Kelsay failed to comply was objectively reasonable. A reasonable police officer could expect Kelsay to understand his command to 'get back here' as an order to stop and remain, not as a directive merely to touch base before walking away again. . . . The constitutionality of Ernst's takedown was not beyond debate, and he is thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Kelsay v. Ernst, 933 F.3d 975, 982, 985-87 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Smith, C.J., with whom Kelly, Erickson, and Grasz, JJ., join, dissenting), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2760 (2020) ("Our case law was sufficiently clear at the time Deputy Ernst forcefully arrested Kelsay to have put a reasonable officer on notice that the use of force against a non-threatening misdemeanant who was not fleeing, resisting arrest, or ignoring other commands violates that individual's right to be free from excessive force. . . . Brown, Shannon, Montoya, and Shekleton comprise our 'body of relevant case law,'. . . that made it sufficiently clear at the time of the incident to warn a reasonable officer that the use of force against a non-threatening misdemeanant who was not fleeing, resisting arrest, or ignoring other commands violates that individual's right to be free from excessive force. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Kelsay—which we are required to do at this stage of the litigation—she satisfies all of these criteria. . . . In summary, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Kelsay, a reasonable officer would have known based on our body of precedent that a full-body takedown of a small, nonviolent misdemeanant who was not attempting to flee, resisting arrest, or ignoring other commands was excessive under the circumstances.")

N.S. v. Kansas City Bd. of Police Commissioners, 933 F.3d 967, 970 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Here, the district court fell short in its threshold duty to make 'a thorough determination of [Thompson's] claim of qualified immunity.'. . In its summary-judgment order, the court did little more than summarize the parties' allegations and decide that the combination of a 'general ... right to be free from excessive force' and the presence of 'genuine issues of material fact[ ]' precluded summary judgment. . .Yet the Supreme Court has warned courts not to 'define clearly established law at [such] a high level of generality.'. . Although there need not be 'a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,' or else 'officers are entitled to qualified immunity.'. . '[O]utside [of] an obvious case,' the Court has explained, it is not enough 'to state that an officer may not use unreasonable and excessive force, deny qualified immunity, and then remit the case for a trial on the question of reasonableness.'. .The district court did no more than that here, so the case needs to go back for a second look. . . On remand, the court should begin by specifically identifying the plaintiff-friendly version of the disputed facts, rather than, as it did before, simply reciting the parties' general allegations. . . It must then evaluate whether Thompson, in light of all of the information available to him at the moment, violated clearly established law when he shot Stokes.")

Mogard v. City of Milbank, 932 F.3d 1184, 1189-90 (8th Cir. 2019) ("[W]hen Mogard complained to the chief and assistant chief about the features of his patrol car, he was acting 'pursuant to' his job duties, regardless of whether his job required him to report on the condition of the patrol cars. . . .Even if Mogard may have transformed unprotected speech pursuant to job duties into protected speech by speaking to community leaders, defendants could reasonably conclude that Mogard was speaking solely as an aggrieved police officer. . . .Van Vooren and Kettwig are entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established that Mogard's speech was constitutionally protected.")

Sandknop v. Missouri Dep't of Correction, 932 F.3d 739, 742 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Sandknop has not directed us to any case holding that an official violates a defendant's constitutional rights by making an erroneous statement of law to a state court. . . . If the state court erred in its legal determinations because it improvidently relied on a misreading of the law, the defendant's recourse was to appeal or seek a writ of mandamus. Sandknop's complaint does not contain sufficient allegations to overcome qualified immunity with regard to any statement the probation officer made to the state court before the court issued the order requiring Sandknop to be detained further. Nor does it provide any other reason that either the warden or the probation officer violated a clearly established constitutional right.")

K.W.P. v. Kansas City Public Schools, 931 F.3d 813, 822, 826-29 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Our sister circuits are divided on whether to apply T.L.O.'s reasonableness standard or the objective reasonableness standard set forth in Graham v. Connor, . . . to law enforcement seizures of students. [citing cases] Some courts have opted to apply both the Graham and T.L.O. standards in analyzing a claim of unreasonable seizure and excessive force. . . .In the present case, K.W.P. [a seven-year-old elementary school student] avers that we need not resolve whether the Graham or T.L.O. standard applies because 'the result in this case would be the same under either standard.'. . We agree but reach a different conclusion as to the result. We hold that, applying either the Graham or T.L.O. standard, and construing the facts in the light most favorable to K.W.P., neither Officer Craddock nor Principal Wallace violated K.W.P.'s right to be free from unreasonable seizure and excessive force. First, as to the initial handcuffing, unlike the calm, compliant children in Gray, E.W., and C.B. who did not engage in further disruptive behavior and posed no risks to anyone's safety, K.W.P.'s own admissions indicate that he attempted to flee from Officer Craddock upon his removal from the classroom and that his escape efforts posed a safety risk to himself. K.W.P. does not challenge as unlawful Officer Craddock's initial removal of him from the classroom for being disruptive. Once removed from the classroom, K.W.P. resisted Officer Craddock's directive for K.W.P. to accompany Officer Craddock to the office. . . .In applying the objective reasonableness standard to the undisputed facts, a reasonable officer could have concluded that K.W.P.'s admitted conduct constituted 'an act of violent resistance.'. . . Second, K.W.P. challenges as unlawful the 15 minutes that he was seated in the front office and handcuffed. Once again, applying either the Graham or T.L.O. standard, neither Officer Craddock nor Principal Wallace violated K.W.P.'s right to be free from unreasonable seizure and excessive force in the extended handcuffing. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to K.W.P., K.W.P. had stopped resisting by the time that he reached the front office, sat in a chair pursuant to Officer Craddock's commands, and did not attempt to leave. Nevertheless, the case remains distinguishable from other cases in which courts have found extended handcuffing violative of the Fourth Amendment. Here, K.W.P. remained handcuffed in the front office for only 15 minutes; by comparison, the student in C.B. remained handcuffed for 25 to 30 minutes, . . . and the student in Hoskins remained handcuffed for 45 minutes[.] . . Our conclusion that no constitutional violation occurred also rests on K.W.P.'s behavior justifying the initial handcuffing. Unlike the students in Gray, E.W., and C.B. who were complaint with the school resource officer from the outset of their encounter, K.W.P. had actively resisted Officer Craddock just prior to arriving to the front office. A reasonable officer could conclude that, based on K.W.P.'s recent resistance, keeping him in handcuffs for 15 minutes until a parent arrived was a reasonable course of action and was necessary to prevent K.W.P. from trying to leave and posing harm to himself. . . . Accordingly, we hold that, applying either the Graham or T.L.O. standard and viewing the facts in the light most favorable to K.W.P., neither Officer Craddock nor Principal Wallace violated K.W.P.'s right to be free from unreasonable seizure and excessive force and are therefore entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . .Alternatively, ' "even if the reasonableness of [Officer Craddock's and Principal Wallace's] actions was questionable," [K.W.P.] cannot "show that a reasonable [official] would have been on notice that [their] conduct violated a clearly established right."'. . . 'Our circuit subscribes to a broad view of what constitutes clearly established law; in the absence of binding precedent, a court should look to all available decisional law, including decisions of state courts, other circuits and district courts.'. . Here, K.W.P. relies on C.B. and Gray to show that it was clearly established in April 2014 'that a police officer's conduct in handcuffing a child constituted an obvious violation of the child's constitutional rights.'. . We reject the notion that these cases gave notice to Officer Craddock and Principal Wallace that their conduct violated K.W.P.'s constitutional rights. First, while the Eleventh Circuit decided Gray in 2006, the Ninth Circuit decided C.B. in October 2014—after the incident here occurred in April 2014. Therefore, C.B. could not have given Officer Craddock or Principal Wallace notice of their alleged unconstitutional conduct. . . Second, C.B. and Gray are distinguishable from the present case. In Gray, the Eleventh Circuit concluded that '[e]very reasonable officer would have known that handcuffing a compliant nine-year-old child for purely punitive purposes is unreasonable.'. . In C.B., the Ninth Circuit similarly concluded that '[i]t is beyond dispute that handcuffing a small, calm child who is surrounded by numerous adults, who complies with all of the officers' instructions, and who is, by an officer's own account, unlikely to flee, was completely unnecessary and excessively intrusive.'. . As explained supra, by K.W.P.'s own admission, he was not compliant; instead, he actively resisted Officer Craddock and attempted to get away from his grasp. This active resistance precipitated the handcuffing of K.W.P. and it was not for purely punitive reasons.")

Lewis v. City of St. Louis, 932 F.3d 646, 649 (8th Cir. 2019) ("The district court and Lewis characterize the clearly established right at issue as the right of a person not to be detained after charges against him have been dismissed. As a matter of abstract legal principle, this statement is unexceptionable. But as the Supreme Court and our court have cautioned on several occasions, 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality but must instead 'be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . So the relevant question is whether the law clearly establishes that Gardner, or someone in her office, must go beyond the filing of a nolle prosequi to ensure the release of those against whom no charges are pending. Lewis bears the burden of showing that the law is clearly established. . . . Lewis alleges in his complaint that Gardner has 'a responsibility to communicate the dismissal of criminal charges to' the state court, the city's sheriff's office, and 'to those with direct custody over people incarcerated by the City of St. Louis.' But, of course, we need not accept legal conclusions couched as factual allegations as true. . . Instead, Lewis must show that clearly established law imposed this duty on Gardner. He hasn't. Lewis has not offered a single authority purporting to place this responsibility with Gardner or her subordinates, as opposed to, say, the state court itself; it could just as well be that the state court clerk is responsible for giving notice of the dismissal to those who have custody of Lewis. We can hardly conclude, therefore, that Gardner violated Lewis's constitutional rights.")

Dillard v. City of Springdale, 930 F.3d 935, 942-45 (8th Cir. 2019) ("The appellees allege City and County law enforcement obtained information about Josh's abuse from the appellees and their family, promising them confidentiality. They allege the officials then released those law enforcement reports to the public. They allege they were minors at the time of the molestation and at the time the reports were created. They allege the reports contained graphic details of their incestuous sexual abuse. And, they allege the reports were insufficiently redacted, de facto revealing their names to the public. Finally, they allege the officials released the reports in an effort to promote the appearance of transparency. Therefore, the appellees have pleaded sufficient facts to meet Peffer's 'exacting standard.'. .The information released by the officials involved 'highly personal matters representing the most intimate aspect of human affair,'. . . and the appellees had a legitimate expectation of privacy in that information. Not only did police promise the appellees that the information would remain private, but Arkansas law also supported this expectation of privacy. . . In sum, the information was inherently private and is therefore entitled to constitutional protection. The appellees have stated a plausible claim for the violation of their constitutional right to confidentiality. . . .The question now before us, then, is whether our law was 'clearly established in a particularized sense,' that the officials' alleged conduct was unconstitutional. . . Namely, we must decide whether the law provided fair notice to the appellants that releasing details of minors' sexual abuse to a tabloid in a format predictably enabling the victims' identification was not only unadvisable, but also unlawful. We conclude that it did. Inexact boundaries are boundaries nonetheless. The particular facts alleged here are not near the periphery of the right to privacy but at its center. Certainly, allegations of incestuous sexual abuse implicate 'the most intimate aspects of human affairs' and are 'inherently private.'. . The content and circumstances of these disclosures do not just meet the standard of 'shockingly degrading or egregiously humiliating,' they illustrate them. . . And releasing insufficiently redacted reports detailing minors' sexual abuse to a tabloid, notwithstanding promises that these reports would remain private, is 'a flagrant breach of a pledge of confidentiality.'. . Despite not having had an informational privacy case with these same facts, our case law 'appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question,'. . . and the appellants' arguments to the contrary are unavailing. This is a case in which '[general] standards ... clearly establish[ed] the answer.'. . . Where, as here, we are not reviewing split-second, life-or-death decisions characteristic of excessive force cases, the range of reasonable judgments naturally narrows by virtue of the officials' increased opportunity for reasoned reflection. . . . We hold that the right of minor victims of sexual abuse not to have their identities and the details of their abuse revealed to the public was clearly established.")

Partridge v. City of Benton, Arkansas, 929 F.3d 562, 565-67 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Keagan was not suspected of a crime. He was not actively resisting arrest or attempting to flee. He was, however, armed, suicidal, and under the influence of cough syrup and possibly marijuana. Whether a reasonable officer could conclude he posed an immediate threat depends on the circumstances at the time of the shooting. Taking the facts in the complaint as true, 'Keagan simply began to move the gun away from his head,' 'was shot as he began to move the gun away from his head, per Ellison's orders to "drop the gun,"' and 'never pointed the gun at the officers.' On these facts, no reasonable officer could conclude that a compliant individual posed an immediate threat. . . .

Keagan's right to be free from excessive force under these circumstances was clearly established in October 2016. Taking the facts in the complaint as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in Keagan's favor, Ellison shot a non-resisting, non-fleeing minor as he moved his gun in compliance with commands to drop his gun. Under these circumstances, no reasonable officer could conclude Keagan posed an immediate threat of serious physical harm. The law was 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would understand that' shooting an individual in these circumstances is unlawful.")

Thurairajah v. City of Fort Smith, Arkansas, 925 F.3d 979, 983-85 (8th Cir. 2019) ("The disorderly conduct statute reads: 'A person commits the offense of disorderly conduct if, with the purpose to cause public inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm or recklessly creating a risk of public inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm, he or she makes unreasonable or excessive noise.' Ark. Code Ann. § 5-71-207(a)(2). Under the statute, the verbal content of Thurairajah's yell is irrelevant. . . The statute does not penalize offensive speech, only unreasonable or excessive noise. . . Arkansas courts have not previously concluded that a two-word yell could violate the disorderly conduct statute's unreasonable or excessive noise provision. To be sure, shouting can form the basis of disorderly conduct. Those cases where shouting was part of a scenario that resulted in a finding of disorderly conduct, however, involved extended loud shouting and disruptive behavior or amplified sound. As the district court noted, context matters in analyzing the facts. In no case, has a two-word unamplified outburst constituted disorderly conduct. . . Thurairajah's conduct may have been offensive, but it was not an unreasonable or excessive noise. Trooper Cross lacked even arguable probable cause for an arrest and thus violated Thurairajah's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure. . . . Thurairajah's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation was clearly established at the time of his arrest. '[T]he law is settled that as a general matter the First Amendment prohibits government officials from subjecting an individual to retaliatory actions ... for speaking out.'. . With limited exceptions not relevant here, even profanity is protected speech. . . Criticism of law enforcement officers, even with profanity, is protected speech.. . Accordingly, we hold that the district court did not err by denying qualified immunity to Trooper Cross for the First Amendment claim.")

Rochell v.City of Springfield Police Dept., 768 F. App'x 588, ___ (8th Cir. 2019) ("We conclude that the facts the district court found sufficiently supported at summary judgment gave rise to a Fourth Amendment violation because a police officer uses excessive force by pointing his service weapon at the head of a suspect who has dropped his weapon, has submitted to arrest, and no longer poses an immediate threat to the safety of officers or others. . . We further conclude that this right was clearly established in February 2016, when the incident underlying Rochell's claims occurred.")

Rochell v.City of Springfield Police Dept., 768 F. App'x 588, ___ (8th Cir. 2019) (Colloton, J., concurring) (not reported) ("In qualified immunity cases like this one, the plaintiff must establish that defendant's alleged conduct violated a clearly established right, and 'the clearly established right must be defined with specificity.' City of Escondido v. Emmons, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503 (2019).

'Use of excessive force is an area of the law in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case, and thus police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue.'. . On plaintiff Rochell's excessive force claim against defendant Ross, the district court acknowledged that there was no case in this circuit with the fact pattern alleged here, but nonetheless denied qualified immunity. Ross understandably objects on appeal that the district court failed to conduct its analysis at the proper level of specificity. After the briefs were filed in this case, however, a panel of this court decided Wilson v. Lamp, 901 F.3d 981 (8th Cir. 2018). Wilson held not only that pointing a firearm at a compliant suspect was unreasonable, but that the unreasonableness of that conduct was clearly established as of September 2014—more than a year before the incident in this case. The Wilson decision is debatable. Despite the Supreme Court's admonition to ask whether 'existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue,' Wilson relied on cases involving the use of physical force or violence against compliant subjects to conclude that the unreasonableness of pointing a gun was clearly established. . . But given Wilson's definition of what was clearly established law in 2014, I agree that the district court's order denying qualified immunity on the excessive force claim must be affirmed. Under the alleged facts, after all, Ross did not merely point a gun at a compliant Rochell; the claim is that he pressed his firearm behind Rochell's ear and said, 'I'll blow your fg brains out if you ever approach me like that again.' If it violated clearly established law for a defendant in Wilson simply to keep his gun pointed at a compliant subject, then it follows a fortiori that Ross's alleged action did too.")

Morgan v. Robinson, 920 F.3d 521, 523-27 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc) ("A panel of this court found that Morgan's termination 'violated a right secured by the First Amendment.'. . This court need not decide the issue because Robinson did not violate a 'clearly established statutory or constitutional right[ ] of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . .Nord was decided in June 2014. Robinson fired Morgan one month earlier. Thus, he did not have the benefit of the Nord decision to support his belief that he was not violating a clearly established right. Still, Nord supports Robinson. A clearly established right must be one that is 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . The facts here are similar to Nord. That decision held the law not clearly established in November 2010. Neither Morgan nor this court finds any intervening law that clearly established the law before his termination. . . Thus, Nord shows the constitutional question was not 'beyond debate' in May 2014. . . At the time of Morgan's termination, the law was not 'sufficiently clear' so that Robinson would have known that terminating him violated his First Amendment rights. . . Robinson is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Morgan v. Robinson, 920 F.3d 521, 527-29, 533-355 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Shepherd, J., with whom Kelly, J. and Erickson, J., join, dissenting) ("The majority's holding that Sheriff Robinson is entitled to qualified immunity rests on the impermissible factual finding that Robinson terminated Deputy Morgan because of the potentially damaging and disruptive consequences of Morgan's campaign speech. When viewed through the proper lens of a summary judgment appeal, the record does not support the majority's holding. Rather, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Deputy Morgan, as we must, Sheriff Robinson terminated Morgan's employment solely because of his personal objections to the content of Morgan's campaign speech without the reasonable belief that the statements would have a disruptive effect on the operation of the Sheriff's Department. I would therefore affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Robinson and I respectfully dissent. . . . Failing to remain faithful to these limits on our review of the facts and instead summarily and improperly weighing the evidence and finding critical facts in the light most favorable to Sheriff Robinson, the majority concludes that Sheriff Robinson terminated Morgan because he could have reasonably believed that Morgan's statements during the 2014 campaign for Sheriff of Washington County would be potentially damaging to and disruptive of the discipline and harmony of the Sheriff's Department. Such a conclusion can only be reached by accepting the Sheriff's post-hoc litigation position and improperly viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the Sheriff. . . . [B]ecause a rational jury could find that Morgan was terminated solely because Robinson was personally offended by Morgan's campaign speech, the Pickering balance falls sharply and overwhelmingly in favor of Morgan's right to comment on matters of public concern. Thus the statements are afforded First Amendment protection and I believe Morgan has sufficiently shown a violation of a protected constitutional right in the form of his termination for engaging in campaign speech. Thus, I easily conclude that Deputy Morgan satisfies the first part of the qualified immunity analysis. I also disagree with the majority's analysis and would conclude that it is clearly established that Sheriff Robinson could not terminate Deputy Morgan for exercising his First Amendment rights during the campaign. The majority, despite our directive to view the evidence in the light most favorable to Morgan, frames this inquiry as asking whether Sheriff Robinson could terminate Deputy Morgan for Morgan's campaign statements when Robinson believed the statements were potentially damaging and disruptive. The evidence, particularly when viewed with the applicable summary judgment standard, does not support the majority's formulation of the question as including Sheriff Robinson's belief that Morgan's statements would cause potential disruption. I believe this incorrect framing of the question leads to the majority's erroneous conclusion that the right was not clearly established; I address what I believe the proper inquiry to be: 'Could [Robinson] reasonably have believed, at the time he fired [Morgan], that a government employer could fire an employee on account of' the employee exercising his First Amendment right to free speech during a run for political office where that speech had no disruptive impact on office functioning? . . In my view, the answer to this question is an unequivocal 'no.'. . .In my view, it is clearly established that a public employee cannot be terminated for making protected statements during a campaign for public office where that speech has no demonstrated impact on the efficiency of office operations. . . .The Supreme Court has repeatedly expressed the importance of protecting First Amendment activity, especially in the context of elections. The majority's conclusion, which relies on a factually distinguishable case, sidesteps this precedent. I would conclude that it is clearly established that Sheriff Robinson could not terminate Deputy Morgan for speech made during a political campaign that related to the department operations and caused no disruption or other negative impact on the department.")

Calgaro v. St. Louis County, 919 F.3d 1054, 1059 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Calgaro . . . sued Johnson individually for damages on the ground that he violated her constitutional rights by denying access to educational records and excluding her from educational decisions. But it remains 'open to question whether and to what extent the fundamental liberty interest in the custody, care, and management of one's children mandates parental access to school records.'. . Nor is it clearly established that parents have a constitutional right to manage all details of their children's education or to obtain consultation with school officials on everyday matters. . . Because existing precedent does not clearly establish the rights that Calgaro asserts, Johnson is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hanson as Trustee for Layton v. Best, 915 F.3d 543, 548 (8th Cir. 2019) ("With respect to her excessive force claim, Hanson alleges the officers violated the Fourth Amendment by keeping Layton restrained in a prone position for an excessive length of time, causing his death. We first examine the clearly-established prong because it is dispositive. . . Because the plaintiff has the burden of demonstrating that the law confirming her constitutional right was clearly established, . . . Hanson must identify 'controlling authority' from the Supreme Court or our prior case law or 'a "robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority"' that places the constitutional question 'beyond debate.'. . In this case, she can do neither. This court has not deemed prone restraint unconstitutional in and of itself the few times we have addressed the issue. . . In Henderson v. Munn, we denied qualified immunity when, in addition to using prone restraint, a police officer pepper-sprayed an injured suspect. . . Under these cases, there is no clearly established right against the use of prone restraints for a suspect that has been resisting. The decisions of our sister circuits are similarly factually distinct. Mindful of the Supreme Court's repeated admonition against defining clearly established law 'at a high level of generality,'. . . we find that the fact-intensive qualified immunity analyses in comparable appellate cases have yet to produce a sufficiently particularized 'robust consensus,'. . . about prolonged prone restraint. . . Therefore, the right at issue is not clearly established, and the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Hanson's excessive force claim.")

Karels v. Storz, 906 F.3d 740, 746-47 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Blazek and Wertish do not establish that the slightest resistance justifies any subsequent use of force by an officer, as Storz seems to argue. They instead establish that an officer may use 'somewhat more force' on a 'passively resistant' suspect. The evidence here would support a finding that Karels was not 'passively resistant.' A jury could find that she did not have time to comply with Storz's command to put her hands behind her back before he used significant force against her. A jury could also consider Norlin's use-of-force review form, on which he did not check the box marked 'passive resistance' in describing Karels's actions. Whether a reasonable officer would have interpreted Karels as being resistant—either passively or actively—is a disputed question of fact that a jury must decide. As set forth above, a jury could find that Karels did not resist at all and that a reasonable officer would have known that she was not resisting. . .Viewing the facts in the appropriate light, several cases establish that every reasonable officer would have understood that he could not forcefully take down Karels—a nonviolent, nonthreatening misdemeanant who was not actively resisting arrest or attempting to flee—in the allegedly violent and uncontrolled manner that Storz did . . .To the extent Storz argues that these cases present different facts and circumstances, 'there is no requirement that [the plaintiff] must find a case where "the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,". . . so long as "existing precedent [has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate[.]"""")

Wilson v. Lamp, 901 F.3d 981, 990-91 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The officers' drawing and pointing of weapons as they approached the truck, which they reasonably believed was being driven by David, was not excessive. But Levi and M.W. say that the officers kept their weapons drawn and pointed at them throughout the incident even after they realized the driver was Levi, not David, the passenger was M.W., a child, and the officers had patted Levi down. . . On the facts here, the continuous drawing and pointing of weapons constitutes excessive-force. . . .Finally, the officers argue that the law is not clearly established, claiming that this court has not recognized excessive force under similar facts. To the contrary, an officer's 'use of force against a suspect who was not threatening and not resisting' is unreasonable. [collecting cases] The district court correctly concluded that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.")

Ross v. City of Jackson, Missouri, 897 F.3d 916, 922-23 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Ross, the officers saw the comment, discovered where Ross worked, and then went to his job site with the sole intent of placing him under arrest. Ross tried to explain what was meant by his comment and provide the officers with more context about the post, but the officers did not give him that opportunity until after he was booked at the police station. . . And, after interviewing Ross, officers indicated that they did not think the charges would stick, i.e., they did not believe he had truly made a 'terrorist threat.' Ross was nonetheless charged and held in custody for several days until he was able to post bail. In sum, it is beyond debate that—had the officers engaged in minimal further investigation—the only reasonable conclusion was that Ross had not violated § 574.115.1(3). . . We reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to the officers based on qualified immunity and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Neal v. Ficcadenti, 895 F.3d 576, 582 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Neal has provided adequate evidence that he neither posed a threat to anyone's safety nor resisted arrest at the time that Officer Ficcadenti executed the arm-bar takedown. We are satisfied that these facts, construed in a light most favorable to Neal, establish a violation of a constitutional right to be free from unreasonable and excessive force. . . We turn now to the question of whether or not the constitutional right that Officer Ficcadenti allegedly violated was clearly established as of June 6, 2012. We have said many times that '[t]he right to be free from excessive force in the context of an arrest is clearly established under the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures.'. . The 'salient question' is whether the state of the law at the time the force was exerted gave Officer Ficcadenti 'fair warning' that his alleged treatment of Neal was unconstitutional. . . In June 2012, the state of the law would have given a reasonable officer fair warning that using physical force against a suspect who was not resisting or threatening anyone was unlawful. . . .After construing the facts in a light most favorable to Neal, i.e. that he was fully compliant at the time that Officer Ficcadenti applied the arm-bar takedown maneuver on him, that conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right on June 6, 2012. The district court correctly concluded that this is one of those relatively rare cases in which a question of fact is presented for the ultimate finder of fact and qualified immunity does not apply.")

Dean v. Searcey, 893 F.3d 504, 518-19 (8th Cir. 2018) ("In both White and Winslow, we examined the deputies' actions and found that a jury could believe that they 'conducted a conscience-shocking reckless investigation ... that was used to box' Appellees in. . . And we held—relying on Supreme Court precedent and this Court's holding in Wilson v. Lawrence County, 260 F.3d 946 (8th Cir. 2001)—that the prohibitions against their actions were clearly established in 1989. The deputies argue that it was improper to rely on 'general statements of the law' in reaching the latter conclusion. But, Pauly explicitly reaffirmed that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning' so long as 'the unlawfulness ... [is] apparent.'. . There is no doubt that the conduct we described above and in prior opinions is (and was) unlawful. . . Indeed, 'if any concept is fundamental to our American system of justice, it is that those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from ... framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.'. . The jury was warranted in concluding that this is exactly what happened through the reckless investigation here. The prohibition on using official power to frame individuals is deeply embedded in the historical roots of due process. . . . The Supreme Court—long before 1989—recognized this as well. . .To put it simply, this is not a case like many Fourth Amendment cases, where the 'specificity of the rule is especially important' because 'officers will often find it difficult to know how' the Constitution applies in 'the precise situation encountered.'. . Instead, this is an ' "obvious case,"' where the 'unlawfulness of the [deputies'] conduct is sufficiently clear.'. . The evidence supports the conclusion that the deputies 'knowingly violate[d],'. . . the due process rights of the Appellees by applying 'systematic pressure' to implicate the Appellees and by 'purposefully ignor[ing]' exonerating evidence. . . The illegality of this was well-established long before 1989. Thus, our prior determination holds: qualified immunity does not shield the deputies.")

Cravener v. Shuster, 885 F.3d 1135, 1140-41 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Cravener argues his case is unique because he was not engaged in criminal activity, and thus the force greatly exceeded the need. True, Cravener's lack of criminal activity is an important consideration in the qualified immunity analysis. However, officers may seize a person 'in order to ensure the safety of the public and/or the individual, regardless of any suspected criminal activity.'. . Here, the deputies were called to the house to ensure Cravener's safety. This court has found no excessive force where the subject was not currently engaged in criminal activity or resisting arrest. . .Cravener also argues the deputies faced no imminent harm because Cravener was unarmed and was passively, not actively, resisting. Even if Cravener were passively resisting, this argument fails. Unarmed, passively resisting subjects can pose a threat necessitating the use of taser force. . . .Deputy Calvin also is entitled to qualified immunity based on the second inquiry because 'even if the reasonableness of [his] actions was questionable,' Cravener cannot 'show that a reasonable officer would have been on notice that the officers' conduct violated a clearly established right.'. . Because of the significant similarities between this case and De Boise—with no intervening Eighth Circuit case between 2008 and 2013—De Boise controls here. '[N]o reasonable officer, observing [Cravener's] behavior, would have understood the actions taken to be so disproportionate and unnecessary as to amount to a violation of [Cravener's] rights.'. .The district court erred in denying qualified immunity.")

Estate of Walker v. Wallace, 881 F.3d 1056, 1060-62 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The district court denied Wallace qualified immunity because, if the jury believed the plaintiffs' version of the facts, then the evidence 'could show that the consent was not voluntary.' True, but that is not the correct inquiry. The correct inquiry is whether, even if we construe the facts in a light most favorable to the plaintiffs, a reasonable official in Wallace's position would have known that he was violating the constitution when he searched the plaintiffs' house after receiving signed consent to do so in the particular circumstances. We believe that Wallace, at worst, made a bad guess in a gray area of the law—but the law gave him the breathing room to make such a guess. First, determining whether consent is voluntary requires a highly particular look at all the relevant circumstances. . . .Since questions of consent necessarily turn on the particular facts of a case, it may be hard to show that prior decisions should have put Wallace on notice that his search under the circumstances was unconstitutional or that every reasonable official in his position would have understood that he was violating a constitutional right. . . We do not mean that officials are always entitled to qualified immunity when dealing with questions of consent; it is easy to imagine facts that would alert a reasonable person that consent was not voluntarily given. We mean only to emphasize that officials should be given some leeway when acting in legally murky environments. We believe that both the plaintiffs and the district court defined the right in question here too generally. The plaintiffs focus on the presumptive unreasonableness of searching a house (whether for evidence of a crime or for building code violations) without a warrant. The district court began its analysis with the observation that a government official's warrantless entry into a house does not violate the Fourth Amendment when one voluntarily consents to the entry, only to note then that consent may not have been voluntarily given here. But 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality' and must be particularized to the facts of the case so that the unlawfulness of an official's actions are apparent. . . Context is critical in determining qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases. . . The first principles that the district court and the plaintiffs emphasized can only go so far. Nowhere do they identify any case applying these first principles in a context sufficiently similar to the situation in which Wallace found himself when he searched the plaintiffs' house. Though the plaintiffs need not provide a case directly on point, some existing precedent must place the question beyond debate, or the conduct must be so obviously unconstitutional that no precedent is needed. . . The plaintiffs have failed to carry their burden on this point. . . . A single case, which is not even a binding precedent in the district in which it was decided, seems hardly enough to count as one that establishes a clear legal principle. One swallow does not a summer make. For these reasons, the plaintiffs have not carried their burden to show that the unconstitutional nature of Wallace's conduct was clearly established. We therefore reverse and remand for further proceedings.")

Lyons v. Vaught, 875 F.3d 1168, 1173-76 & n.4 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Throughout this litigation, Lyons has conceded and the district court has acknowledged, correctly in our view, that his speech during the student appeal process was unprotected employee grievance. . . However, in denying defendants qualified immunity, the district court concluded that the meeting with Chancellor Morton was not 'part of [Lyons's] job duties,' that 'academic improprieties involving interscholastic athletes is an issue of public concern,' that Eighth Circuit cases prior to Garcetti 'clearly established that a public employee had a First Amendment right to speak on maters of a public concern so long as that speech was not part of the employee's job duties,' and that Garcetti did not change that law. We disagree. . . .Determining whether an employee's speech was pursuant to his official duties is a practical inquiry. . . . Here the central focus is whether it was clearly established that Lyons's speech at the meeting with Chancellor Morton was as a citizen, not a part-time lecturer. . . .Under Garcetti, 'a public employee speaks without First Amendment protection when he reports conduct that interferes with his job responsibilities, even if the report is made outside his chain of command.'. . Did Lyons transform what began as unprotected speech pursuant to his duties as a lecturer into protected speech by virtue of speaking more broadly about the issue to both the UMKC Chancellor and 'community leaders'? Perhaps. But Vaught and Bassa could reasonably conclude that Lyons spoke solely as an aggrieved lecturer in asking Chancellor Morton to investigate grading policies for student athletes. In these circumstances, Lyons has failed to show, using the particularized inquiry required, that his right to make this speech in these circumstances was clearly established. . . . Garcetti left open the question whether its holding would apply to 'speech related to scholarship or teaching.'. . In our view, this case does not involve speech related to scholarship or teaching. . . But in any event, the law is no more clearly established even if Garcetti is persuasive but not controlling precedent.")

Hansen v. Black, 872 F.3d 554, 559-60 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Even assuming a constitutional violation, Trooper Black is entitled to qualified immunity because his conduct did not violate a clearly established Fourth Amendment right. To avoid qualified immunity, Hansen must show that existing precedent placed Trooper Black's conduct 'beyond debate.'. . Hansen has not cited, and we have not found, any case concluding that an officer violated the Fourth Amendment when he shot and killed an unrestrained, unsupervised dog creating a serious risk to public safety and avoiding numerous attempts to control him without force.")

Hoyland v. McMenomy, 869 F.3d 644, 653-55 & n.4 (8th Cir. 2017) ("We hold that, under Minnesota law, it was not objectively reasonable for these officers to believe they had probable cause to arrest Hoyland for obstruction. This case is far removed from the examples of 'obstruction' described above. Here, Hoyland stood in his own lighted doorway, on his own property, some 30-40 feet from the officers and his wife. The officers almost immediately saw that he held a camera and not any kind of weapon in his hands. No more than twenty seconds elapsed from Hoyland's first words spoken from his doorway to McMenomy's shout of 'you are under arrest.'. . . However reasonable the command for Hoyland to go back inside may have been, his refusal to do so did not constitute obstruction. As Minnesota law makes abundantly clear, obstruction must be either physical obstruction or verbal conduct, such as fighting words, that has the effect of physically obstructing officers in the performance of their duties. Nowhere in Minnesota law does mere physical presence at a distance constitute obstruction. So arresting Hoyland for obstruction due to his continued presence in his doorway was unreasonable under state law. Even when we consider his verbal conduct, no reasonable officer could construe his shouting as 'physically obstructing or interfering' in the officers' performance of their duties. . . . The officers are therefore denied qualified immunity for Hoyland's Fourth Amendment claim. . . . As to whether it was objectively reasonable for the officers to believe that probable cause existed to seize Hoyland as he stood in his doorway, the dissent contends that the fact that the state prosecutor resisted dismissal of the charge of obstructing legal process against Hoyland 'is as significant as the decision of the state judge to dismiss the charge.' No authority is provided for this proposition and, indeed, it is the lack of neutrality and detachment that disqualifies prosecutors, who have a 'responsibility to law enforcement,' from a role in the ultimate probable cause determination.")

Hoyland v. McMenomy, 869 F.3d 644, 658-61 (8th Cir. 2017) (Colloton, J., dissenting) ("Notably absent from the majority opinion is any mention of the Supreme Court's several recent decisions reversing denials of qualified immunity by the courts of appeals. The Court explained that these opinions were necessary 'both because qualified immunity is important to society as a whole, and because as an immunity from suit, qualified immunity is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.'. . .The officers are entitled to qualified immunity on both claims if they had 'arguable probable cause' to make an arrest. The Fourth Amendment requires probable cause to arrest, but if police make an objectively reasonable mistake about the existence of probable cause, then they have 'arguable probable cause' and are immune from suit. . .A First Amendment retaliation claim fails if the police had arguable probable cause to arrest. . . .Viewing the situation more broadly, Hoyland's repeated argumentative refusals to comply with police commands at an active arrest scene also gave police at least arguable probable cause to believe that he violated § 609.50. Although the Minnesota Supreme Court wrote in response to a vagueness challenge that the statute is directed at 'physically obstructing or interfering' with an officer, . . . the few decisions applying the statute show that it encompasses violations that do not involve physical contact between an offender and a police officer. . . .We must address qualified immunity 'in light of the specific context of the case,'. . . yet there is no Minnesota court decision applying the statute to alleged obstruction by a third party at an active arrest scene. What constitutes obstruction of an officer may well be different at an active arrest scene than in the reception area at police headquarters. Hoyland refused seven times to comply with commands of police officers. It was reasonable to believe that his conduct substantially hindered the officers who were attempting to control the scene, by creating a new security concern and by preventing the officers from focusing their attention on the two suspects who were apprehended at Hoyland's residence after fleeing. Hoyland's persistence in refusing to comply supported an objectively reasonable belief in probable cause that he intentionally resisted or interfered. It was not beyond debate that the statute encompassed the interruptions and refusals directed at the desk officer in Occhino, and the loud and repetitive interruptions of the officers issuing citations in Hanson, but did not proscribe Hoyland's interruptions and distraction of police officers at an active arrest scene.")

Div. of Employment Sec. v. Bd. of Police Commissioners, 864 F.3d 974, 979 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Although Supreme Court precedent 'do[es] not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . 'Our prior cases have clearly established that use of [a] taser on a nonfleeing, nonviolent suspected misdemeanant [is] unreasonable.'. . Where a suspect is neither fleeing nor resisting arrest and does not pose a threat to the safety of the officers, it is 'unreasonable for [an officer] to use more than de minimis force against' the suspect. . . In light of Gurley's compliance with the officers' demands, it was therefore beyond debate at the time of the events in question that the officers could not reasonably use more than de minimis force against Gurley.")

Gerlich v. Leath, 861 F.3d 697, 708-09 (8th Cir. 2017) ("We conclude that it was clearly established at the time that ISU's [Iowa State University's] trademark licensing program was a limited public forum. Defendants argue that they did not violate clearly established law because at the time of this dispute the contours of the government speech doctrine were not clearly established. It was clearly established, however, that the government speech doctrine does not insulate a state actor from First Amendment scrutiny when the state has created a limited public forum for speech. . . . Like the university in Rosenberger, ISU was not engaging in government speech in this case because it had created a limited public forum to facilitate speech by private persons. . . Moreover, ISU's trademark licensing program was capable of accommodating a large number of student groups without defeating its essential function. . . Because ISU's trademark licensing program facilitated the speech of private persons and was capable of accommodating a large number of speakers, ISU's administration of that program was not government speech under clearly established law. The next question is whether at that time it was clearly established that a university may not discriminate on the basis of viewpoint in a limited public forum. It has long been recognized that if a university creates a limited public forum, it may not engage in viewpoint discrimination within that forum. . . . Given this history, plaintiffs' right not to be subjected to viewpoint discrimination while speaking in a university's limited public forum was thus clearly established at the times in question. Because defendants violated plaintiffs' clearly established First Amendment rights, the district court did not err by denying qualified immunity to defendants and granting plaintiffs summary judgment on their First Amendment claims.")

Gerlich v. Leath, 861 F.3d 697, 717 (8th Cir. 2017) (Loken, J., dissenting) ("Repeatedly, the Supreme Court has cautioned that 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality.' White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552 (2017) (quotations omitted). Rather, 'clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . In a public school or university setting, 'educators are rarely denied immunity from liability arising out of First-Amendment disputes. The rare exceptions involve scenarios in which a factually analogous precedent clearly established the disputed conduct as unconstitutional.'. . The court cites no case in which school officials administering a trademark licensing program violated, or were even accused of violating, the First Amendment by denying proposed uses of the school's registered trademark. This case presents two uncertain First Amendment issues that warrant qualified immunity: (1) whether a trademark licensing program that allows student groups to associate their messages with the university's symbol or logo is a form of government speech or a limited public forum; and (2) if the program is a limited public forum, whether administrators' decisions to restrict the licensing of designs associating the university with unsafe or illegal activities such as drug use constitute unlawful viewpoint discrimination or permissible content regulation.")

Perry v. Woodruff County Sheriff Dep't, 858 F.3d 1141, 1146 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Wolfe raises a two-fold challenge to our conclusion about the clearly established nature of the Fourth Amendment violation. She first claims that under White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548 (2017), it was not clearly established that she was prohibited from relying on Clark's judgments about the need to use force against Perry. Next, she asserts that Perry's claim founders on Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898 (8th Cir. 2011), because Perry only alleged de minimis injuries and under Pennycook, such injuries could not serve as the basis for excessive-force claims until 2011. Both her arguments are unavailing. In White, the Supreme Court held that '[c]learly established federal law does not prohibit a reasonable officer who arrives late to an ongoing police action ... from assuming that proper procedures ... have already been followed. No settled Fourth Amendment principle requires that officer to second-guess the earlier steps already taken by his or her fellow officers.'. . White is inapplicable to our case because it addresses a wholly different set of facts. As noted above, Wolfe was on the scene at the time of the incident and testified that she viewed the entire interaction between Perry and Clark. As a result, Smith governs this case, and Perry's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force was clearly established. Wolfe responds that even if she used excessive force against Perry, he suffered only de minimis injuries as a result of her conduct. In Pennycook, decided in 2011, we held for the first time 'that a citizen may prove an unreasonable seizure based on an excessive use of force without necessarily showing more than de minimis injury.'. . While it is true that a de minimis injury could not serve as the basis for an excessive-force claim in August 2009, the record indicates that Perry suffered more than de minimis injuries such that Pennycook does not apply.")

Williams v. Tucker, 857 F.3d 765, 770-71 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Tucker argues that even if he violated Jenkins' First Amendment right to support an electoral candidate, the contours of that right were not clearly established at the time of any such violation. Tucker frames the right at issue as the right to remain a full time court employee, but the issue is properly characterized as whether Tucker impermissibly retaliated against Jenkins by causing her to become a part time employee. It is clearly established 'that a government employer cannot take adverse employment actions against its employees for exercising their First Amendment rights' by participating in electoral activities. . . This right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.")

De La Rosa v. White, 852 F.3d 740, 745-47 (8th Cir. 2017) ("[I]n this case, the Fourth Amendment issue is whether an officer had reasonable suspicion justifying a warrantless investigative detention, rather than probable cause to arrest or search. Thus, Trooper White is entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable officer could have believed that he had a reasonable suspicion; in other words, if he had arguable reasonable suspicion. . . In this case, we find no controlling Eighth Circuit authority placing the question beyond debate, nor a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.' More recent Eighth Circuit decisions have distinguished Jones and Beck, the cases on which the district court primarily relied, in finding no Fourth Amendment violations, let alone violations of clearly established Fourth Amendment law. . . Rather than 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' favoring the district court's resolution of this difficult issue, our prior cases have found reasonable suspicion upholding the extension of traffic stops by officers relying on similar facts[.] [discussing cases] To be sure, on the merits, the existence of reasonable suspicion was a close question, because the facts on which Trooper White relied, taken together, did not raise as strong a suspicion of interstate drug trafficking as in prior cases such as Riley and Lebrun. But White relied on facts presenting substantial similarities with prior cases in which reasonable suspicion of drug trafficking was found and extension of a traffic stop was upheld. In recent years, the Supreme Court has repeatedly reversed decisions denying qualified immunity where lower courts 'misunderstood the "clearly established" analysis.' White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552 (2017). To avoid qualified immunity, De La Rosa must show a 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.' Here, there is no consensus to be found in the prior decisions that have resolved a fact-intensive Fourth Amendment issue under a governing standard that requires judges to 'allow[ ] officers to draw on their own experience and specialized training to make inferences from and deductions about the cumulative information available to them that might well elude an untrained person.' . . Trooper White is therefore entitled to qualified immunity from De La Rosa's damage claims.")

Ehlers v. City of Rapid City, 846 F.3d 1002, 1012 (8th Cir. 2017) ("The law did not clearly establish in December 2010 that the use of an arm bar in this context constitutes excessive force. Indeed, the only instance in which we have considered the merits of the use of an arm bar occurred after 2010 and concerned an arm bar as a takedown maneuver, not as a method of handcuffing a suspect. See Hicks v. Norwood, 640 F.3d 839, 842 (8th Cir. 2011). More broadly, we have held that officers may use force to handcuff a suspect who is resisting, even if that force causes pain. See, e.g., Blazek v. City of Iowa City, 761 F.3d 920, 924 (8th Cir. 2014) (analyzing the state of the law in 2009). The only cases Ehlers provides to support a finding of clearly established law concern the use of force against an individual who is not resisting. . . As discussed above, the officers reasonably interpreted Ehlers's behavior as resistance. The officers also reasonably considered Ehlers's free hand a potential threat. . . As a result, Ehlers's cases are inapposite. A reasonable officer would not have understood the action in question to constitute excessive force. . . Thus, the law was not clearly established, and Rybak is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jenkins v. Univ. of Minnesota, 838 F.3d 938, 947 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Swem does not dispute that the right to be free of sexual harassment in the workplace is clearly established, but asks us to take a very narrow view of the contours of that right here. He insists that a reasonable public official would not have known that his comments, 'void of any physical conduct,' could amount to sexual harassment. We find this argument unavailing. Our case law clearly establishes that physical contact is not required to make out a hostile-work-environment claim. . . We find that the right Swem violated was clearly established. Swem then argues that a reasonable official in his position would not have known the conduct was unlawful because he did not receive any sexual harassment training from UM and lacked specific knowledge of UM's sexual harassment policy. 'A reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.'. . A person such as Swem, who has had prior experience working with and supervising students, should be aware that sexual harassment violates a student's clearly established rights, even in the absence of specific training. . . Because we find that Jenkins has satisfied both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis, we agree with the district court that Swem was not entitled to qualified immunity or summary judgment on that basis.")

Gilmore v. City of Minneapolis, 837 F.3d 827, 834 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Because the law regarding warrantless misdemeanor arrests for offenses committed outside the presence of the arresting officer is not clearly established under the Fourth Amendment, the arresting officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Gilmore's constitutional claim.")

Stewart v. Wagner, 836 F.3d 978, 982-86 (8th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e note that, while a prosecutor's duty to disclose is absolute, to recover damages from other law enforcement officials for a Brady violation, a § 1983 plaintiff must prove the requisite mens rea. In denying investigators Wagner and Choate summary judgment on this claim, the district court adopted the amorphous 'bad faith' mens rea standard set forth in White v. McKinley, 519 F.3d 806, 814 (8th Cir. 2008), rather than the more precise standard adopted in our earlier, and therefore controlling, opinion in Villasana v. Wilhoit, 368 F.3d 976, 980 (8th Cir. 2004) – 'Brady ensures that the defendant will obtain relief from a conviction tainted by the State's nondisclosure of materially favorable evidence, regardless of fault, but the recovery of § 1983 damages requires proof that a law enforcement officer other than the prosecutor intended to deprive the defendant of a fair trial.' (Emphasis added.) The district court must apply this controlling standard when the issue again arises on remand, whether before, during, or after trial. . . .[A] § 1983 plaintiff's claim that he was arrested or prosecuted without probable cause, even if labeled a claim of malicious prosecution, 'must be judged' under the Fourth Amendment, not substantive due process. . . We recognized in Moran that additional considerations in a particular case may trigger substantive due process protection, like the impact of 'falsely-created evidence and other defamatory actions' on a public employee plaintiff's career, and the equal protection interest in not being investigated or punished on account of race, that were present in that case. . . But here, Stewart was not a public employee, race was not an issue, and the alleged fabricated evidence was only used in a probable cause statement. Thus, the general rule in Oliver applies, and the district court committed an error of law in not judging the actions of Selby and Wagner under the Fourth Amendment. . . .We note that the preliminary hearing at which Kimberling testified was nearly two months after charges were filed based on Wagner's probable cause statement. Stewart did not gain pretrial release or dismissal of the charges at that hearing, which strongly suggests that the presence of arguable probable cause was overwhelming. On this record, we conclude it was error to deny Prosecutor Selby qualified immunity on this claim because Stewart failed to present sufficient evidence that Wagner and Selby violated 'clearly established [Fourth Amendment] rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . .If this were an appeal from the denial of a motion to suppress or exclude the testimony of Parker and Pollard, or from the denial of a properly preserved federal habeas claim, we might well agree there is sufficient evidence of a Sixth Amendment violation under Kuhlmann to warrant a full trial of this claim. But this is the appeal from the denial of qualified immunity from a § 1983 claim. Neither the district court nor Stewart cited, and we have not found, a reported federal decision discussing the elements of a § 1983 Sixth Amendment claim based on use of a jailhouse informant's testimony at trial, and the proper application of qualified immunity principles to such a claim. The absence of such precedent is not dispositive but is clearly relevant. . . . The judgment of Wagner and Selby on this issue may have been wrong, but Kuhlmann and the earlier cases it applied create a very indistinct line between aggressive use of jailhouse informants that does and does not violate the Sixth Amendment rights of a defendant who has just been charged and invokes his right to counsel. And there were no § 1983 precedents giving these defendants 'fair and clear warning of what the Constitution requires,' . . . and therefore no 'existing precedent [that] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate[.]'. . In such circumstances, suppression, not § 1983 damage liability, is the appropriate remedy.")

Carter v. Huterson, 831 F.3d 1104, 1107-09 (8th Cir. 2016) ("In appealing the dismissal of his Fourth Amendment claim, Carter first contends that because he was a civilly committed individual rather than a pre-trial detainee or a prisoner, the defendants could not collect a blood sample to produce his DNA profile without first demonstrating individualized suspicion of criminal wrongdoing and acquiring a search warrant. However, we do not reach the question of whether the alleged warrantless collection of Carter's blood sample violated the Fourth Amendment because the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to this claim. Here, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to their alleged taking of Carter's blood sample because Carter has failed to demonstrate that, at the time of the events in question, civilly committed sexually violent predators maintained a clearly established right to be free from the warrantless drawing of a blood sample to produce a DNA profile. . . . First, we previously have held that civilly committed individuals 'retain the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches that is analogous to the right retained by pretrial detainees.' Beaulieu v. Ludeman, 690 F.3d 1017, 1028 (8th Cir. 2012). Shortly after our decision in Beaulieu, the Supreme Court held in Maryland v. King that the Fourth Amendment does not require authorities to obtain a warrant before conducting a mouth swab to obtain the DNA profile of a pretrial detainee. 569 U.S. ——, 133 S. Ct. 1958 (2013). Relying on these two cases, therefore, the defendants reasonably could have concluded that the Fourth Amendment does not prohibit the warrantless collection of a civilly committed person's DNA profile. Indeed, the defendants have shown that several of the same government interests identified in King reasonably could justify the DNA identification of a civilly committed sexually violent predator, including determining 'the [individual]'s future dangerousness' and the extent he might be 'inclined to flee' from confinement. . . Second, courts generally have recognized the collection of a blood sample as a minimally intrusive mechanism for obtaining information from individuals in state custody. . . .Given the state of the law at the time of the alleged events and his status as a civilly committed sexually violent predator, Carter did not have a 'clearly established' right to be free from the warrantless collection of his blood sample for the purpose of obtaining his DNA profile. . . As a result, the district court did not err when it found that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to this claim.")

Ingrassia v. Schafer, 825 F.3d 891, 899 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Defendants contend that, even if questions of material fact remain whether Ingrassia was denied adequate nutrition, the right to adequate nutrition was not clearly established, warranting qualified immunity. Defendants argue that appellate courts have not clearly defined adequate nutrition in the civil commitment context. At the time of the alleged violations, however, it was clearly established that a prisoner may properly allege a constitutional violation by demonstrating significant weight loss or other adverse physical effects from lack of nutrition. . . While there are contested issues of fact about Ingrassia's weight loss and caloric intake, his evidence established a significant weight loss tied to nutrition. Because the law was settled, the district court properly denied summary judgment to Englehart, Blake and Weinkein.")

Dadd v. Anoka Cty., 827 F.3d 749, 757 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Dadd arrived at the jail with instructions from his doctor in the form of a Vicodin prescription, and the deputies and the jail nurse ignored his complaints of pain and requests for treatment. When Dadd was prescribed additional medication by a jail doctor, he did not receive it. Moreover, the defendants had fair warning about the unconstitutionality of a failure to provide pain medication for serious dental conditions in particular. . . . Dadd's right to adequate treatment was clearly established, and the district court properly denied the defendants qualified immunity.")

Barton v. Taber, 820 F.3d 958, 968-70 (8th Cir. 2016) (Colloton, J. dissenting) ("It was clearly established in September 2011, at least under the law of the Eighth Circuit, that a law enforcement officer must not act with deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of an arrestee. . . But this is a broad general proposition. The issue here is whether the facts alleged, in the specific context of this case, show that only a plainly incompetent state trooper, or a trooper who knowingly violates the law, would have turned Barton over to the custody of the detention center without seeking medical attention. In other words, it must be clearly established that the complaint's allegations are sufficient to show that Barton suffered from an objectively serious medical need, and that Owens exhibited deliberate indifference (i.e., criminal recklessness) to that need by failing to seek medical attention. The complaint and relevant precedents do not support a denial of qualified immunity. . . .Owens knew that Barton was a drunk driver, and a reasonable state trooper with no medical training could have believed that his slurred speech, difficulty walking, inability to answer questions, and even temporary non-responsiveness were the results of intoxication that did not require immediate medical attention. On the facts alleged, it would not have been obvious to a layperson that Barton's symptoms exceeded those of acute intoxication. There is no allegation that Owens had any knowledge that Barton suffered from the heart condition that eventually caused his death. And there is no assertion that Owens knew how to distinguish symptoms of intoxication from those of an impending coronary. The district court thought Thompson v. King, 730 F.3d 742, 748 (8th Cir.2013), clearly established that Owens's conduct violated Barton's constitutional rights, but this conclusion was error. Assuming that controlling circuit precedent is a dispositive source of clearly established law, cf. Carroll v. Carman, —— U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350, 190 L.Ed.2d 311 (2014) (per curiam), Thompson was decided in 2013, two years after Barton's death in 2011, so it could not provide clearly established law for this incident. . . The court relies instead on McRaven v. Sanders, 577 F.3d 974 (8th Cir.2009), but the decision there on dissimilar facts did not put Owens on notice of a clearly established constitutional right in this case. The officers in McRaven knew that an arrestee had consumed a 'cocktail of potent drugs' under circumstances that "strongly suggested" they were not taken in prescribed dosages, yet they failed to seek medical attention when the arrestee exhibited extreme symptoms of drug intoxication. Unlike Owens, who was unaware of Barton's heart condition, the officers in McRaven had specific reason to believe that the offender suffered from a serious medical need—a drug overdose—that distinguished him from an arrestee who had consumed excessive amounts of alcohol. . . . More instructive is a decision that unfortunately was not cited by either party. In Martinez v. Beggs, 563 F.3d 1082 (10th Cir.2009), officers arrested a man named Ginn for public intoxication. The arresting officer reported that Ginn 'was unable to stand.' A witness testified that officers 'picked up' Ginn and 'dragged' him to a patrol car. The officer transporting Ginn to the detention center thought Ginn had 'passed out, like most of your drunks do' during a ride to the facility. At the detention center, Ginn could not walk in a straight line, and officers helped to support his weight. Ginn was placed in a cell. Three hours later, he died from a heart attack due to coronary artery disease. Ginn's estate sued the arresting officers, alleging that they knew that Ginn had consumed a large quantity of alcohol, could not walk without help, may have been unconscious for a short time, and was talking as if he were hallucinating. The plaintiff also sued two custodial officers, asserting that they knew Ginn was drunk, was too incoherent to be booked into jail, and had difficulty walking. The court affirmed a grant of summary judgment for the officers because there was insufficient evidence to show deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs:

[T]he sufficiently serious objective harm that Ginn faced was heart attack and death, and not acute intoxication.... The officers subjectively knew that Ginn was intoxicated, but there is no evidence to show that anyone would have known that Ginn would face an imminent heart attack or death, much less that the individual county defendants subjectively knew that Ginn was at risk of heart attack or death.

Id. at 1090.

So too here. Owens knew that Barton was a drunk driver, and Barton exhibited symptoms that a reasonable trooper could associate with acute intoxication. Owens had no reason to know that Barton suffered from an undiagnosed heart condition that would cause his death. Barton may have had an objectively serious medical need for treatment of his heart, but it was not a need to which Owens was deliberately indifferent under clearly established law on the facts alleged. I would therefore reverse the district court's order denying the motion to dismiss.") Mountain Pure, LLC v. Roberts, 814 F.3d 928, 935 (8th Cir. 2016) ("The employees finally assert that Roberts and Spradlin acted unreasonably in detaining them incommunicado by denying them access to telephones. Again they rely on Ganwich, in which the Ninth Circuit also concluded that qualified immunity did not apply because the officers there had denied employees telephone access during their detentions. . . The Ganwich court reasoned that based on the Supreme Court's decisions in Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 103 S.Ct. 1319, 75 L.Ed.2d 229 (1983) and Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 88 S.Ct. 1868, 20 L.Ed.2d 889 (1968), a reasonable official would have known that incommunicado detention 'was significantly more intrusive than was necessary for them to complete the search' of the employees' offices. . . We disagree. To conclude that official conduct violates clearly established rights, we must find some 'factual correspondence with precedent,' which requires a 'fact-intensive inquiry [that] must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . Neither Royer nor Terry involved factually similar circumstances to those in question here, and those cases do not support the conclusion that the agents violated the employees' clearly established rights. . . We thus conclude that the district court did not err in concluding that qualified immunity barred their unlawful detention claims.")

Bailey v. Feltmann, 810 F.3d 589, 593 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Bailey first argues that we should analyze his § 1983 claim against Feltmann for denial of medical care under the objective reasonableness standard of the Fourth Amendment. The Fourth Amendment governs an arrestee's claim alleging excessive use of force, Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 (1989), but this court has not resolved whether an arrestee's claim alleging denial of medical care is analyzed under the Due Process Clause or the Fourth Amendment. One recent decision, Carpenter v. Gage, 686 F .3d 644, 650 (8th Cir.2012), applied due process analysis to the claim of an arrestee, but the plaintiff there did not invoke the Fourth Amendment, and the issue was not joined. Earlier cases seem to imply—also without discussion of the Fourth Amendment—that the Due Process Clause may govern, e.g., Spencer v. Knapheide Truck Equip. Co., 183 F.3d 902, 905 & n. 3 (8th Cir.1999), and there is a conflict in authority elsewhere about how to evaluate this type of claim. Compare Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 530 (7th Cir.2011) (applying Fourth Amendment), with Barrie v. Grand Cty., 119 F.3d 862, 865–69 (10th Cir.1997) (applying Due Process Clause). For present purposes, it is enough to acknowledge that a right under the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable delay in medical care for an arrestee was not clearly established in March 2012. Neither the Supreme Court nor this circuit had announced such a right, and there is no uniform body of authority that might allow us to conclude that the right was clearly established. Nor was it clearly established that a standard of objective reasonableness applies under the Due Process Clause. Cf. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015). Feltmann is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Bailey's claim that Feltmann acted unreasonably, and the district court properly dismissed that portion of the complaint. We think it prudent to avoid addressing the proper constitutional standard unnecessarily. See Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020, 2031 (2011). Bailey argues in the alternative that Feltmann's decision to proceed to the jail rather than to a hospital exhibited deliberate indifference to his need for medical attention in violation of his clearly established constitutional rights under the Due Process Clause. Regardless of whether an 'unreasonable' decision to forego treatment would violate the Constitution, this court deemed it clearly established by 2008 that a pretrial detainee (or an arrestee, see Spencer, 183 F.3d at 905 n. 3) has a right to be free from deliberately indifferent denials of emergency medical care. See Thompson v. King, 730 F.3d 742, 750 (8th Cir.2013). Bailey's claim fails, however, because he has not produced sufficient evidence to support a finding that Feltmann violated that right.")

Wright v. United States, 813 F.3d 689, 696-99 (8th Cir. 2015) ("Recently, in Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, we determined that it was not clearly established in July 2009 that the use of a Taser resulting in only de minimis injury violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Despite a Taser's 'unique capability to cause high levels of pain without long-term injury, "we have not categorized the Taser as an implement of force whose use establishes, as a matter of law, more than de minimis injury."'. . In April 2009, when the events at issue in this case transpired, the state of the law was no different. . . . Therefore, the Marshals are entitled to qualified immunity on Wright's excessive force claim. The district court, despite the Marshals' failure to argue the clearly established issue, cited to our decision in Shekleton v. Eichenberger in support of the court's conclusion that the tasering of Wright was excessive force in violation of clearly established law at the time. . . .The facts in Shekleton are distinguishable from those in this case in that a Grand Jury had indicted Vinol Wilson for several felonies. . . He was considered armed and dangerous. In contrast, the suspect in Shekleton was arrested for public intoxication, a misdemeanor. . .. Thus, our holding in Shekleton does not change our finding that the state of the law in April 2009 was such that a reasonable officer would not have had fair warning that using a single Tazer shock against a suspected felon would have violated clearly established Constitutional rights. Accordingly, we hold that the Marshals are entitled to qualified immunity on Wright's excessive force claim because it was not clearly established in April 2009 that the use of a Tazer against a suspected armed and dangerous felon violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Wright was held for up to twenty minutes after the Marshals realized that he was not Vinol Wilson. Under the totality of circumstances, we conclude the delay in releasing Wright was reasonable. . . . The Fourth Amendment does not demand perfection from law enforcement officers; it only requires that their conduct be reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. The twenty-minute detention was not an unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment, and therefore the Marshals are entitled to summary judgment on Wright's claim for unreasonable seizure.")

Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, 800 F.3d 985, 990-91 (8th Cir. 2015) ("The issue in this case is whether McCallum, having justification to use some force to cause Hollingsworth to change into an orange jumpsuit, violated her clearly established rights by deploying the Taser rather than employing other means such as physical restraint and forcible removal of clothing. . . As we have explained in other decisions, it was an open question at the time of this incident in July 2009 whether a plaintiff must demonstrate greater than de minimis injury to establish an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment. . . The district court, citing a concession by Hollingsworth, concluded that her injuries were de minimis, and she does not dispute that point on appeal. Therefore, Hollingsworth can prevail only if it was clearly established in July 2009 that use of a Taser that caused de minimis injury violated the Fourth Amendment. Hollingsworth's claim founders on our decision in LaCross v. City of Duluth, 713 F.3d 1155 (8th Cir.2013). LaCross held that it was not clearly established in 2006 that an officer's use of a Taser that resulted in no lasting physical injuries or injuries requiring medical care nonetheless could be unreasonable because Tasers caused 'excruciating pain without lasting physical effects.'. . This court held that despite the Taser's unique capability to cause high levels of pain without long-term injury, 'we have not categorized the Taser as an implement of force whose use establishes, as a matter of law, more than de minimis injury.'. . We thus concluded it was not clearly established that an officer's use of a Taser, resulting in only de minimis injury, was an unconstitutional use of force. . . The law was not materially different in July 2009, so McCallum is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, 800 F.3d 985, 992-96 (8th Cir. 2015) (Kelly, J., concurring) ("I concur in the decision to affirm the judgment of the district court. I write separately for three reasons. First, to state clearly that, in my belief, Officer McCallum acted unreasonably in tasing Hollingsworth. Second, to highlight my concern that Hollingsworth did not, in fact, concede to the district court that she sustained merely de minimis injuries. And third, to explain that while I believe that at the time this event occurred in July 2009, it was clearly established that it was unlawful to use a Taser on an unarmed, secured, and nonthreatening misdemeanant, I recognize that I am constrained by this court's decision in LaCross, and thus I concur. . . .The majority allows that 'the actions of one or more officers might have been unreasonable' and does not elaborate further—instead reaching its decision on the second prong of the qualified immunity test. In my view Officer McCallum's actions were unreasonable. . . .As the court notes, the district court summarily concluded that Hollingsworth's injuries were de minimis by citing to a 'concession' made by Hollingsworth on this point. . . .Acknowledging that Eighth Circuit precedent may construe her injuries as de minimis does not constitute a concession that Hollingsworth agreed her injuries were de minimis, particularly when she goes on to argue for a change in the law. . . .It appears from her briefing, however, that Hollingsworth has abandoned any argument that her injuries were above and beyond the injuries alleged in LaCross, and thus I agree with the court that she is limited by our ruling in that case. . . .Finally, I write to express my belief that at the time of Hollingworth's tasing in July 2009, it was clearly established that it was unlawful to use a Taser on an unarmed, secured, and nonthreatening misdemeanant. Were I not constrained by precedent, I would decline to extend qualified immunity to Officer McCallum . . . . Each of these cases stands for the proposition that a reasonable officer would have known that the use of a Taser in circumstances similar to the one at present was clearly established as unlawful: Brown concerned events that took place in 2005, and Shekleton and DeBoise concerned separate events that took place in 2008. . . .These holdings, then, must be reconciled with Chambers, which holds that prior to 2012, arrestees did not have a clearly established right to be free from unreasonable force that resulted in merely de minimis injuries. Rather than ignoring these cases, I read Brown and Shekleton as support for the view that a Taser, when effectively used, typically results in more than de minimis injuries. . ..While I find this court's decision in LaCross to be at odds with much of our precedent outlined here, I recognize that its factual similarity to the case at hand, combined with the plaintiff's failure to plead specialized injury, forecloses the conclusion that Hollingsworth suffered greater than de minimis injuries. Thus, I concur in the decision of the court.")

Robinson v. Payton*,* 791 F.3d 824, 829-30 (8th Cir. 2015) ("We find that a reasonable official, standing in Trooper Condley's shoes, would not understand that what he is doing—restraining a hysterical individual on the scene and deciding not to leave the hysterical individual and intervene—violates clearly established law. Trooper Condley neither was plainly incompetent nor did he knowingly violate the law. His decision to stay with Eva and not to intervene did not transgress a bright line. If he left Eva, she could have and likely would have joined the altercation, possibly harming herself or others. . . . Because we do not find it would be clear to a reasonable officer, standing in the shoes of Trooper Condley, that his conduct was unlawful in the present case, Trooper Condley is entitled to qualified immunity. The district court's denial of qualified immunity is reversed.")

Robinson v. Payton, 791 F.3d 824, 831 (8th Cir. 2015) (Murphy, J., dissenting) ("Trooper Condley was present when Stevens first threatened to tase Matthew, then aimed the taser, and pulled its trigger. Condley did not say or do anything to deescalate the situation. He simply stood by and watched the deputies repeatedly tase the young man. . . Nor did he intervene after Matthew's mother was returned to the patrol car. There is no question that the law is 'clearly established that an officer who fails to intervene to prevent the unconstitutional use of excessive force by another officer may be held liable for violating the Fourth Amendment.'. . Also well established is that 'one who is given the badge of authority of a police officer may not ignore the duty imposed by his office and fail to stop other officers who summarily punish a third person in his presence or otherwise within his knowledge.'. . Important issues of disputed fact remain on this record as to whether Corporal Condley failed a clearly established duty by not intervening while officers Stevens and Payton fired multiple taser shocks into Matthew's body. The experienced trial judge's denial of qualified immunity should be affirmed.")

Story v. Foote, 782 F.3d 968, 970-73 (8th Cir. 2015) ("The Supreme Court never has resolved whether convicted inmates retain a Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches while in custody. The Court in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 99 S.Ct. 1861, 60 L.Ed.2d 447 (1979), assumed the point for the sake of analysis. . . In Hudson v. Palmer . . . the Court held that the Fourth Amendment did not apply to a search of a prison cell, reasoning that '[a] right of privacy in traditional Fourth Amendment terms is fundamentally incompatible with the close and continual surveillance of inmates and their cells required to ensure institutional security and internal order.'. . The Seventh Circuit, in the wake of Hudson, ruled that inmates retain no right under the Fourth Amendment against visual inspections by prison guards. Johnson v. Phelan, 69 F.3d 144, 146–47 (7th Cir.1995). This court, however, has said that 'prison inmates are entitled to Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches of their bodies,' Levine v. Roebuck, 550 F.3d 684, 687 (8th Cir.2008), and allowed a Fourth Amendment claim challenging strip searches to proceed in Seltzer–Bey v. Delo, 66 F.3d 961, 963 (8th Cir.1995). The Arkansas Supreme Court, as best we can tell, has never addressed the question. The Supreme Court recently has reserved judgment twice on the question whether decisions of a federal court of appeals are a source of clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity analysis. See Carroll v. Carman, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350, 190 L.Ed.2d 311 (2014) (per curiam); Reichle v. Howards, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2094, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012). Following the approach of the Court in those cases, we assume for the sake of analysis that our decisions clearly establish that a convicted inmate has rights under the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable searches of his body. . . .Here, Story alleges that officers conducted a visual body-cavity inspection when Story returned to the

Williams facility from outside the institution. Given what the Supreme Court and this court have said about the strong institutional interests in maintaining security, and about the reasonableness of visual body-cavity inspections when detainees enter a facility, Story's allegation of a body-cavity search by itself does not state a claim for the violation of a clearly established right. Story argues, however, that the manner in which this particular search was conducted violated the Fourth Amendment. He highlights an allegation that a female correctional officer was working in the master control room at the time of the search, and that she viewed the search on a video screen. He cites this court's statement—in a case about a strip search of an arrestee in a motel room—that 'strip searches should be conducted by officials of the same sex as the individual to be searched.' Richmond v. City of Brooklyn Center, 490 F.3d 1002, 1008 (8th Cir.2007). The search in this case, consistent with Richmond's general admonition, was conducted by male correctional officers. Story does not allege that the male officers knew that female officers would observe the video feed from the master control unit. In any event, the male officers did not violate Story's clearly established rights by conducting the inspection in a location where a female officer also may have viewed the search from the master control room through a video feed from a security camera. This court in Timm v. Gunter, 917 F.2d 1093 (8th Cir.1990), held that prison administrators did not violate the Fourth Amendment rights of inmates by allowing intermittent visual surveillance of male inmates by female guards while the inmates used showers and bathrooms or slept without clothing in their cells. Our opinion cited the 'rational connection between sex-neutral visual surveillance of inmates and the goal of prison security,' and observed that staffing adjustments (akin to removing female officers from the master control room during searches in this case) would interfere with equal employment opportunities for women and require significant expenditures by the prison. . . We also have held that the use of cameras to monitor activities from a control booth is reasonable, even when body-cavity searches are involved. . . In light of these precedents, it was not beyond debate that a reasonable correctional officer was forbidden to proceed with a visual body-cavity search in an area monitored by security cameras while a female officer was assigned to the master control unit. . . .We cannot say, however, that Foote's single alleged use of the term 'monkey,' even with its potential racial overtones, is sufficient to allege the violation of a clearly established right under the Fourth Amendment. Story cites no supporting case with analogous facts, and recent decisions rejecting Fourth Amendment claims based on verbal abuse alone militate against a conclusion that the alleged.")

Story v. Foote, 782 F.3d 968, 974-76 (8th Cir. 2015) (Bye, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority sua sponte raises qualified immunity, 'an affirmative defense that must be pleaded by a defendant official.'. . In the instant matter, the district court did not discuss qualified immunity and the correctional officers do not raise qualified immunity on appeal. The majority does not cite, and I have been unable to find, any cases where the Eighth Circuit sua sponte raised the affirmative defense of qualified immunity after the district court dismissed without mention of qualified immunity and the defendants failed to brief a qualified immunity defense on appeal. . . .It appears the majority's sua sponte qualified immunity ruling in this case is unique. Unlike before the district court, where the correctional officers had not been served or had an opportunity to respond, on appeal the correctional officers had the opportunity to brief any affirmative defenses they wished to raise. The correctional officers chose not to raise a qualified immunity defense. . . .Even if a qualified immunity defense were properly before this court, I would not find defendants entitled to qualified immunity at this time. . . .A correctional officer's power to strip search an inmate may be broad, but it is not unfettered. . . Second, a reasonable correctional officer would have known an overly-intrusive and unnecessary strip search was unconstitutional at the time Story was strip searched. It was clearly established law that unreasonable strip searches violate the Fourth Amendment. . . Perhaps after the completion of discovery and briefing by the parties, it will be appropriate to find the correctional officers entitled to qualified immunity against Story's claims; however, the time for such a finding is not now.")

Rodgers v. Knight, 781 F.3d 932, 939-42 (8th Cir. 2015) ("It was not clearly established that the officers, having developed probable cause for a concealed firearms offense, were required to investigate Greg's claim about a Florida permit; our precedent suggests the opposite. . . Although Greg reportedly informed different police officers about the Florida permit during a previous encounter in January 2011, there was no evidence that the arresting officers in August 2011 knew that information. Nor was it clearly established that probable cause was defeated by the 'dwelling unit' exception for carrying concealed weapons in Missouri. No court had construed the meaning of 'dwelling unit or ... premises over which the actor has possession, authority or control,'. . . and there was Missouri authority suggesting that 'a tenant does not have control of the common areas and thus does not possess them.'. . Officers reasonably could have believed that Greg was forbidden to carry a concealed weapon without a permit in common outdoor areas of the apartment complex. Therefore, officers are entitled to qualified immunity for recommending the firearms charge to county prosecutors. . . . As of 2011, an officer was entitled to qualified immunity against this type of retaliation claim if an arrest or prosecution was supported by probable cause. . . The qualified immunity extends further to an action based on at least 'arguable' probable cause. . . For reasons discussed in connection with Greg's Fourth Amendment claims, a reasonable officer in 2011 could have believed that there was probable cause to charge Greg with unlawful use of a firearm based on carrying a concealed weapon or unlawful possession of a firearm as a fugitive from justice. Therefore, the district court was correct to dismiss the First Amendment claims against the officers.")

Parker v. Chard, 777 F.3d 977, 981-82 (8th Cir. 2015) ("Based on White and J.L., it was not clearly established that Chard and Illetschko—having corroborated the running asserted in the eyewitness tip, and knowing shoplifting recently occurred—could not reasonably suspect Parker of shoplifting. '[W]hether or not the constitutional rule applied by the court below was correct, it was not beyond debate.'. . The officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Reeves v. King, 774 F.3d 430, 433 (8th Cir. 2014) ("We conclude a reasonable correctional officer in Lieutenant King's position would have known, based on Irving and Norman, labeling Reeves a snitch for reporting on a prison nurse who was bringing contraband into the prison would violate his constitutional right to protection from harm. Accordingly, the district court properly denied qualified immunity to Lieutenant King.")

Williams v. City of Alexander, Ark., 772 F.3d 1307, 1313 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Because a reasonable official would understand that including false information in and omitting relevant information from an affidavit in an effort to punish someone for supporting one's political opponent would constitute a violation of clearly established constitutional rights, Walters is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Bates v. Hadden, 576 F. App'x 636, 639 (8th Cir. 2014) ("In a pair of 2001 decisions, we observed that malicious prosecution is not a constitutional injury. . . Kurtz and Technical Ordnance raise a high hurdle for Bates's § 1983 malicious prosecution claim. . . . Our precedents dictate that Officer Hadden is entitled to qualified immunity as to Bates's malicious prosecution claim. No 'reasonable officials acting in [Officer Hadden's] position would ... have understood they were violating"' Bates's constitutional right against malicious prosecution because no such constitutional right had been clearly established.")

Meehan v. Thompson, 763 F.3d 936, 941, 946, 947 (8th Cir. 2014) ("We conclude that, at the time of Meehan's arrest, the law was not clearly established that a police officer could not constitutionally arrest an individual whom he reasonably believed to be moderately intoxicated and who would otherwise be left alone on a public roadway at night. Thompson asserts that his arrest of Meehan was a valid exercise of his role as a 'community caretaker.'. . We have recognized that it may be reasonable under the Fourth Amendment for a police officer, acting in his capacity as community caretaker, to seize an apparently intoxicated individual 'to ensure the safety of the public and/or the individual, regardless of any suspected criminal activity.'. . Such an arrest is reasonable 'if the "governmental interest in the police officer's exercise of [his] community caretaking function," ... outweighs "the individual's interest in being free from arbitrary government interference."'. . As we made clear in Winters, the primary governmental interest underlying the arrest of an intoxicated individual who is not suspected of criminal activity is a concern for safety. . . Meehan asserts that this interest does not justify her arrest because, under clearly established law, her apparent intoxication was too mild to support a reasonable inference that she was a danger to herself or others. We disagree. As we explain below, Thompson reasonably believed that Meehan was at least moderately intoxicated, and the law at the time of Meehan's arrest was not so clear that a reasonable officer would have known that he lacked probable cause to arrest a moderately intoxicated individual in lieu of leaving her alone on a public roadway at night. . . . Meehan also argued to the district court, and the district court concluded, that Thompson used excessive force in frisking Meehan. Meehan does not dispute that Thompson's frisk caused only de minimis injury. This fact is fatal to Meehan's excessive force claim because, at the time of her arrest, it was not clearly established that conduct by a police officer that caused only de minimis injury could constitute excessive force. We recognized for the first time in Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898 (8th Cir.2011), that police conduct that causes only de minimis injury could constitute excessive force. We noted, however, that it had previously 'remain [ed] an open question in this circuit whether an excessive force claim requires some minimum level of injury.'. . Chambers was handed down on June 6, 2011, more than a month after Meehan was arrested. Meehan thus cannot avail herself of the legal principle articulated in Chambers. Meehan argues, however, that the law was clearly established even before Chambers that de minimis injury could give rise to an excessive force claim. Meehan notes that Chambers was the result of an en banc rehearing granted in part because of the petitioner's assertion that the original panel's holding—that de minimis injury could not support an excessive force claim—conflicted with a 2010 Supreme Court case, Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010). Wilkins, however, dealt with a prisoner's right to be free from excessive force under the Eighth Amendment and did not clearly establish that de minimis injury could support an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment. Chambers's holding was not based on Wilkins but on an exhaustive study of case law, a study that no reasonable police officer should have been expected to conduct. . . Meehan does not point to any other specific case enunciating the principle that de minimis injury can give rise to an excessive force claim, nor can we find one. . . Because the law was not clear before Chambers that police conduct could constitute excessive force even if it caused only de minimis injury, Meehan's excessive force claim must fail.")

Jacobson v. McCormick, 763 F.3d 914, 917, 918 (8th Cir. 2014) ("In September 2009, a reasonable officer had a solid basis to believe that strip searching an arrestee was constitutional if there was reasonable suspicion that the detainee possessed contraband. . . The county's policy provided for strip searches based on reasonable suspicion. Jacobson was arrested for driving while impaired. He admitted that he recently smoked a bowl of marijuana, so there was also probable cause to believe that he recently had committed a controlled substance offense. Officers found no drugs in a traditional pat-down search of Jacobson's person while he was clothed. The question confronting the officers under county policy, therefore, was whether they had reasonable suspicion that Jacobson may have concealed contraband in a private area that could be viewed only through a strip search. Two circuits had held by 2009 that an arrest based on evidence that a person was under the influence of drugs did not provide reasonable suspicion for a strip search. . . . In 2009, this court had never addressed the constitutionality of a strip search premised on an arrestee's recent use of drugs, and a close reading of our precedent left open the possibility that drug-related offenses or conduct might give rise to reasonable suspicion.")

Blazek v. City of Iowa City, 761 F.3d 920, 924-26 (8th Cir. 2014) ("In our view, the narrower scope of qualified immunity urged by the partial dissenting opinion would impose an unreasonable burden on the police officers and cannot be squared with the more robust version of the doctrine espoused recently by the Supreme Court. Blazek must show that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates' a constitutional right, . . . and that the constitutional question was 'beyond debate.'. . We must not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality, since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.' Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S.Ct. 2012, 2023 (2014) . . . It is clear in light of Wertish that if the officers had lifted the belligerent Blazek off his feet, thrown him to the ground, and jumped on his back to handcuff him, without causing the alleged injury to his ankle or shoulder, then the officers would have acted reasonably or at least be entitled to qualified immunity. But the partial dissent would hold that if Blazek instead had one foot planted on the floor, and the torque of the throw to the ground caused his ankle to twist and fracture, then the officers are subject to suit and liability for damages. Similarly, an awkward landing that caused a separated shoulder would trigger liability, but a smoother alighting that resulted in ordinary bruising would not. And if the throw had caused merely a sprained ankle with no fracture, then who knows? Immunity from suit and liability for damages would depend on whether a reviewing judge later decides that use of the forceful throw allowed in Wertish caused an unacceptable degree of injury. Qualified immunity is designed to free police officers from the risk of suit and liability based on such fine distinctions. One can debate the Fourth Amendment ruling in Wertish,. . . but taking the decision as a given, it is unrealistic to expect a police officer, in the heat of the moment, to discern whether a particular ankle injury would result from a takedown or to plan a careful landing for the detainee's shoulder. The same goes for the force applied to Blazek's arms during the handcuffing. A reasonable officer reading the annals of the federal courts in 2009 would know that the technique like that applied here—where an officer 'grabbed plaintiff's arm, twisted it around plaintiff's back, jerking it up high to the shoulder'—was 'a relatively common and ordinarily accepted non-excessive way to detain an arrestee.'. . . Yet the partial dissent would hold that if the detainee complains of no pain during the incident, but discovers later that otherwise permissible 'twisting' of his arm upward and behind his back caused a tear in his rotator cuff, then the officers have violated a clearly established right and are subject to suit and liability for damages. It was not 'beyond debate' in 2009 that the constitutionality of the officers' actions here depended on whether their use of a 'common and ordinarily accepted' handcuffing method caused injury to the detainee's shoulder area. The officers' jerking of Blazek from the floor to his bed, however, presents a discrete use of force for consideration under the Fourth Amendment. At that point in the encounter, Blazek was handcuffed and under control. In his telling, Blazek was not resisting and posed no threat to the officers. He was not suspected of any serious offense; he was detained only because he was present at Feldhacker's residence and would not stay seated and identify himself when questioned. Nonetheless, the officers allegedly 'jerked' him up by the arms with sufficient force to cause serious injury to his shoulder area. It was clearly established in 2009 that when a person is subdued and restrained with handcuffs, a 'gratuitous and completely unnecessary act of violence' is unreasonable and violates the Fourth Amendment. . . Pepper spray administered in the face of a subdued arrestee . . . and handcuffs applied so tightly—despite repeated complaints of pain—that they broke the wrist of a compliant arrestee, . . . were known to violate the Fourth Amendment. There is no prior case involving Blazek's precise factual scenario, but he need not show that the 'very action in question has previously been held unlawful' to overcome qualified immunity, as long as the unlawfulness was apparent in light of preexisting law. . . Reasonable officers surely could bring Blazek up from the floor in some manner after he was handcuffed, and officers are not required to treat detainees as gently as possible. . . But Blazek's allegation is that the officers did more than lift him up roughly. If Blazek can prove at trial that he was subdued and compliant, but that the officers grabbed him by the arms and gratuitously 'jerked' him from the floor onto the bed, using enough violent force to cause significant injury, then we agree with the district court that a reasonable jury could find a violation of the Fourth Amendment. And the law was sufficiently developed to show that such a violation—allegedly involving

Blazek v. City of Iowa City, 761 F.3d 920, 926-31 (8th Cir. 2014) (Gruender, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in the court's opinion insofar as it affirms the denial of qualified immunity to Officers Santiago and Roth for their act of jerking Blazek from the floor and dismisses the appeal of Blazek's state-law claims. However, I respectfully dissent from the court's decision to grant qualified immunity to the officers for their use of force to handcuff Blazek, which a reasonable jury could conclude caused a separated shoulder, a torn rotator cuff, and a fractured ankle. . . .Considering the totality of the circumstances—including Officer Santiago's lack of suspicion that Blazek had committed a crime, the fact that Blazek was wearing a bath towel, the degree of Blazek's passive resistance, and the extent of his injuries—a reasonable jury could conclude that the officers' applications of force during the entire sequence of events—grabbing, twisting, throwing, jumping on, holding, and jerking—violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . This brings me to the legal issue on which the court and I disagree: whether the constitutional right implicated by Blazek's handcuffing was clearly established at the time of the incident. This determination requires discerning whether '[t]he contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . A plaintiff need not show that 'the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,'. . . but he must establish that the unlawfulness was apparent in light of preexisting law. . . . This circuit applies a 'flexible standard' in conducting this inquiry, 'requiring some, but not precise factual correspondence with precedent, and demanding that officials apply general, well-developed legal principles.'. . Judged by this standard, Officers Santiago and Roth violated a clearly established constitutional right. Kukla, a then-existing precedent in this circuit, and the analogous decisions of our sister circuits demonstrate as much. By distinguishing Kukla on its facts, . . . the court mandates too much factual correspondence between past cases and the present scenario. Kukla is far more analogous to this case than the court allows. . . .That the constitutional right at issue was clearly established is further supported by the then-existing views of our sister circuits. The First, Second, and Sixth Circuits have reached similar conclusions to that in Kukla, and the First Circuit even cited Kukla in doing so. . . . Notwithstanding Kukla and other analogous decisions, the court artificially separates an unbroken sequence of events that involved multiple applications of force—grabbing, twisting, throwing, jumping on, holding, and jerking—to grant qualified immunity for all but one of these uses of force. The court takes this step even though we cannot determine which use (or uses) of force caused Blazek to suffer a separated shoulder, a torn rotator cuff, and a fractured ankle. The court justifies its unusual bifurcation of this incident by concluding that of the applications of force at issue here, a reasonable officer would have understood that only one of them—the jerking—violates the Constitution. Because precedent clearly establishes that a reasonable officer would not draw this distinction, I respectfully dissent.")

Hemminghaus v. Missouri, 756 F.3d 1100, 1114 & n.12 (8th Cir. 2014) ("'At least five circuits have concluded that, because Pickering's constitutional rule turns upon a fact-intensive balancing test, it can rarely be considered "clearly established" for purposes of ... qualified immunity.'

Bartlett v. Fisher, 972 F.2d 911, 916 (8th Cir.1992). . . . This is not to say Pickering balancing never allows for clearly established law in the qualified immunity analysis.")

Nord v. Walsh County, 757 F.3d 734, 739, 743 (8th Cir. 2014) ("We begin with the first step of the qualified immunity inquiry. In this limited context, Wild concedes that Nord was terminated in violation of his First Amendment rights under the first prong of the investigation. Assuming, without holding, that this is true, we conclude that step one of the qualified immunity analysis has been sufficiently established for purposes of further inquiry. Despite this concession, Wild contends that given the circumstances of this dispute, qualified immunity nonetheless protects him because his act of terminating Nord did not violate a 'clearly established statutory or constitutional right[ ] of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . .Based upon the foregoing analysis, we conclude that use of the Pickering/Connick balancing test is clearly called for in this dispute. And, based upon the use of such test, we conclude (1) that at least some of Nord's campaign speech does not merit First Amendment protection; (2) that even if Nord's speech was fully protected by the Constitution, Wild could have reasonably believed that the speech would be at least potentially damaging to and disruptive of the discipline and harmony of and among co-workers in the sheriff's office and detrimental to the close working relationships and personal loyalties necessary for an effective and trusted local policing operation . . . and, the above-mentioned adverse employer-employee circumstance did not need to become manifest in order to be acted upon promptly by Wild. . . (3) that applying the second step of the qualified immunity inquiry, and considering North Dakota law and well-established state and federal jurisprudence, and especially the advice given by the Walsh County attorney and its human resources consultant, Sheriff Wild could have logically and rationally believed that his decision to terminate Nord was well within the breathing room accorded him as a public official in making a reasonable, even if mistaken, judgment under the circumstances. . . and thus (4) that Wild, as a matter of law, is entitled to qualified immunity to shield him from any liability claimed to have arisen through violation of the First Amendment as asserted by Nord.")

Nord v. Walsh County, 757 F.3d 734, 747-50 (8th Cir. 2014) (Shepherd, J., dissenting) ("Because the Pickering/Connick test informs the first step of the qualified immunity analysis and the majority has already acknowledged that the first step has been met, in my opinion, the majority erred in stating that 'we must determine whether or not Nord's particular speech was protected by the First Amendment,' ante at 5, and, thus, was mistaken in its conclusion that, under the Pickering/Connick balancing test, Nord's rights were not clearly established. Consistent with a proper qualified immunity framework, I would hold that Nord's First Amendment rights were clearly established and the qualified immunity defense fails. . . .Even if we were to consider Nord's positional status and apply the Elrod/Branti test instead, I find unpersuasive the majority's reliance on a Fourth Circuit case in determining that Nord holds a position of confidence. This court has acknowledged that although 'other circuits have determined that deputy sheriffs held policymaking positions and could be transferred for political reasons, ... these cases are not controlling here because they turned on state law provisions in different jurisdictions.'. . We have to look to the applicable state laws and the actual duties assigned to deputy sheriffs in Walsh County, North Dakota to determine whether political affiliation is essential to Nord's effective performance of his position as deputy sheriff. . .Here, Nord's duties included the routine tasks of general police work, prevention and detection of crime, protection of life and property, and the performance of duties as assigned. Nothing in the Walsh County Deputy Sheriff's job description empowers the deputy with any discretionary function nor can it be said, based on this job description, that the deputy sheriff ' "performs virtually all the duties attendant to the actual duties of the sheriff himself."'. . Viewing the deputy sheriff and sheriff's relationship in the abstract is insufficient to establish the type of relationship necessary under Elrod/Branti. . . .Nord was fired in violation of his First Amendment rights which were clearly established under the law. He did not hold a confidential or policymaking position, nor is political affiliation essential to the performance of his duties. Accordingly, the Appellants have failed to satisfy the elements of the qualified immunity defense.")

Edwards v. Byrd, 750 F.3d 728, 731 (8th Cir. 2014) ("The facts that the district court found to be supported by the record for the purpose of summary judgment would support a claim of excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . . The district court found for the purpose of summary judgment that, immediately before the guards entered Pod B, the plaintiffs were lying submissively, face-down, in the pod. The guards could see this through the window in the pod door. . . The plaintiffs did not resist or otherwise act aggressively. Nevertheless, the guards employed a flash-bang grenade in close quarters, kicked the compliant detainees, and shot them with bean-bag guns. These facts, if proved, could show that the guards did not apply this force in order to restore order or discipline but rather for the sole—and impermissible—purpose of inflicting unjustified harm on the detainees. At the time of the incident, it was clearly established that such conduct would violate the Eighth Amendment's proscription of cruel and unusual punishment.")

Ellis v. Houston, 742 F.3d 307, 325, 326 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Long before the actions of supervisors in this case, the Supreme Court had recognized employee rights to be free from racial harassment and retaliation in Jones, 541 U.S. at 383, and CBOCS, 553 U.S. at 451. In light of this preexisting law it was readily apparent that a 'continuous racially invidious climate' in a penitentiary, Snell, 782 F.2d at 1099, and undertaking 'systematic[ ]' retaliation following complaints, Kim, 123 F.3d at 1052, would violate clearly established rights. . . .The black officers presented evidence here that the Nebraska penitentiary's own administrative regulation 112.07 recognized that inflammatory racial comments and jokes violate employee rights. Any reasonable supervisor would have recognized that racial slurs and remarks like those used here would illegally affect the working environment. . . As in the prison in Snell, there is also evidence that conduct by the supervisors at the Nebraska penitentiary caused black guards to question whether white officers would come to their aid if they were in danger. . . The evidence in this case is nearly identical to that shown to violate the law in Allen, including black officers being monitored more closely than white employees and told not to congregate in the yard, receiving baseless citations, and being denied career advancement opportunities. . . .We conclude that existing precedent put the supervisors on notice that such actions would violate constitutional rights. A reasonable prison supervisor would have understood that permitting and participating in racially derisive remarks and assigning inferior work assignments would violate the black officers' rights under §§ 1981 and 1983. Based on the record evidence, Sergeant Miles has not shown that he is entitled to qualified immunity on the black officers' harassment claims, nor have Lieutenants Stoner and Haney shown they are entitled to qualified immunity on the retaliation claims of Officer Ellis.")

Spencer v. Jackson County Mo., 738 F.3d 907, 913 (8th Cir. 2013) ("The right of an inmate to file a lawsuit is well established, . . . as is an inmate's First Amendment right to access the prison grievance process . . . . Since Spencer has raised genuine issues of material fact as to whether defendants violated his First Amendment rights, the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the defendants was premature and must be reversed.")

Burton v. Arkansas Secretary of State, 737 F.3d 1219, 1236, 1237 (8th Cir. 2013) ("We have not yet addressed whether a plaintiff may bring a retaliation claim for complaining of discrimination 'under the guise of equal protection' pursuant to § 1983. . . . We conclude that the district court 'erred in denying [Chief Hedden] qualified immunity on [Burton's] equal protection claim for retaliation [under § 1983].'. . 'The right to be free from retaliation is clearly established as a first amendment right and as a statutory right under Title VII; but no clearly established right exists under the equal protection clause to be free from retaliation.'. . We have only recognized that '§ 1983 provides a vehicle for redressing claims of retaliation on the basis of the First Amendment.'. . 'Because no established right exists under the equal protection clause to be free from retaliation, we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity on [Burton's] equal-protection retaliation claim.'")

Scott v. Baldwin, 720 F.3d 1034, 1037 (8th Cir. 2013) ("The plaintiffs cite no authority that clearly required Baldwin to recalculate their release dates within a certain time. Under the circumstances, the law did not fairly warn him that the amount of time spent recalculating thousands of release dates, including the plaintiffs', recklessly disregarded their constitutional right to release. . . Because Baldwin's conduct was not clearly 'unlawful in the situation he confronted,' he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Roberts v. City of Omaha, 723 F.3d 966, 972-74 (8th Cir. 2013) ("The qualified immunity defense is available for ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims. See Gorman v. Bartch, 152 F.3d 907, 914 (8th Cir.1998); Lue v. Moore, 43 F.3d 1203, 1205 (8th Cir.1994). Therefore, the officers were entitled to summary judgment unless Roberts produced evidence showing the officers violated a clearly established right under these statutes. . . . Taking all disputed facts in Roberts's favor, nothing in the law clearly established the ADA and Rehabilitation Act applied to the undisputed circumstances of this case. No reasonable officer could have known the ADA and Rehabilitation Act imposed a duty on the officers to accommodate Roberts's disability while the officers were attempting to secure Roberts and take him into custody for his own safety and the safety of the officers and Roberts's family. . .The officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Roberts's ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims. . . . [On Fourth Amendment claim] The district court found a genuine dispute of material fact regarding whether Roberts posed an objectively reasonable threat of violence during the entire encounter. Some evidence intimates Officer Martinec fired his weapon at Roberts several times, paused, and fired several more times, possibly shooting Roberts in the back. We are bound by the district court's evidence-supported factual findings for purposes of Officer Martinec's appeal.")

S.L. ex rel. Lenderman v. St. Louis Metropolitan Police Dept. Bd. of Police Com'rs, 725 F.3d 843, 853, 854 (8th Cir. 2013) ("We conclude that conspiring to prevent a plaintiff from bringing a viable § 1983 action by covering up a false arrest . . . may amount to a violation of a clearly established right. . . .A reasonable officer would be aware that it is impermissible to assist in falsifying an arrest report or hinder an investigation into the underlying misconduct. Nor is this a circumstance in which officers unwittingly accepted a falsified arrest report or disclosed details of an investigation. Rather, Isshawn–O'Quinn instructed Lorthridge to fabricate portions of the report, resulting in her inserting a false witness, false place of arrest, and false incident summary. He then approved the modified report without question or comment. Drawing 'reasonable inferences in [S.L.'s] favor,'. . . the record similarly supports that Harris disclosed confidential information to Arnold in order to assist her in concealing facts sought by investigators. We conclude that the material facts identified by the district court and the record viewed in the light most favorable to S.L. would support a conclusion that Harris and Isshawn–O'Quinn conspired with Arnold and Lorthridge to prevent S.L. from filing a § 1983 action following her false arrest, which amounted to participation in a § 1983 conspiracy. The record at this stage is sufficient for a reasonable jury to find that Harris and Isshawn–O'Quinn violated S.L.'s clearly established constitutional rights, and the district court accordingly did not err in denying qualified immunity to them.")

Hess v. Ables, 714 F.3d 1048, 1052, 1053 (8th Cir. 2013) ("There are two primary obstacles to Lesher's capacity to serve as clearly established law for the purposes of this qualified immunity analysis. First, Lesher's holding establishes that a municipal employer cannot attempt to compel one of its employees to relinquish his Fourth Amendment rights. But as Hess concedes, it was a state trooper, not her employer the City, who requested the ostensibly unreasonable search. Second, there was no coercion under threat of termination; neither Lawson nor Ables ever threatened Hess in an attempt to convince her to voluntarily undergo an unconstitutional search. Although Lawson directed Hess to leave work and go to Trooper Chastain's office, Hess does not allege that Lawson told her to go to the police station and submit to a drug test or that Lawson warned her she would be fired if she refused such a test. Instead, it was only after Hess had refused the test that Lawson conferred with Ables and terminated Hess's employment. Hess argues that these differences are too minute to matter, but 'the right allegedly violated must be defined at the appropriate level of specificity.'. . While 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances,' prior cases must give officers 'fair warning that their alleged [conduct] was unconstitutional.'. . Lesher simply does not provide fair warning. In light of existing law on February 23, 2010, it would not have been clear to a reasonable official in the position of Lawson or Ables that it was unconstitutional to fire someone after she refused a state trooper's request to take a drug test for law enforcement purposes. Accordingly, we agree with the district court's conclusion. Even assuming the termination violated Hess's Fourth Amendment rights, it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that such an action was unconstitutional, and therefore the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity.")

Atkinson v. City of Mountain View, Mo., 709 F.3d 1201, 1212-14 (8th Cir. 2013) ("Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Atkinson, we decide the unlawfulness of Sanders' charging Atkinson 'would be clear to a reasonable officer' in Sanders' situation. . . . On August 31, 2007, Sanders had 'fair warning' that charging at a non-resisting individual without first identifying himself as a police officer was unconstitutional in the context of an arrest. . . .We doubt a reasonable officer in Sanders' position would have needed to 'consult[ ] a casebook,'. . . to recognize the unreasonableness of using enough force to cause three broken ribs, a punctured lung, and repeated pneumothorax against a man who was objectively using peaceful means to prevent a fight. . . Even if the conduct which cast Sanders in the role of 'irate' stranger was itself reasonable, a reasonable officer finding himself in that role would have sought to pacify—not escalate—the tense situation. A reasonable officer would recognize that his own conduct—shoving a father who was trying to extract his son from a fight and announcing 'I'm the motherf[——] er who says who does what around here'—directly contributed to the tense situation. But had Sanders perused the United States Reports on August 31, 2007, he would have discovered the Supreme Court's 1989 decision in Graham, showing his extreme use of force against Atkinson was unconstitutional. . . .The 'linchpin' of our decision is not that Sanders should have known the Fourth Amendment required him 'to identify himself as an officer before using force to carry out an arrest in public.'. . We deny Sanders qualified immunity because as in Gainor, Lambert, Kukla, and Samuelson, there is a genuine dispute of material fact whether any of the three Graham factors reasonably justified slamming Atkinson into the side of a truck with enough force to break three ribs and puncture a lung. Our emphasis on Sanders' failure to identify himself flows directly from Graham's third factor: it is convincing evidence that Atkinson was neither 'actively resisting arrest [n]or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . Had Sanders clearly identified himself and Atkinson still intervened or refused to return the cell phone, Sanders might reasonably expect Atkinson would 'actively resist[ ] arrest,'. . . But if Atkinson's account is accepted, then Sanders could not reasonably expect active resistance to an unidentified officer. It is not for us, at the summary judgment stage, to construe the evidence in Sanders' favor.")

Atkinson v. City of Mountain View, Mo., 709 F.3d 1201, 1219, 1220 (8th Cir. 2013) (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The doctrine of qualified immunity requires an exercise of judicial restraint that sometimes can be discomfiting. Even when a court believes that a defendant violated the constitutional rights of a plaintiff, the court is required to dismiss the plaintiff's claim if the unconstitutionality of the defendant's conduct was not clearly established. Perhaps this is an appropriate case in which to announce a rule that a police officer must identify himself before using more than de minimis force to complete an arrest, if it is reasonable to believe that self-identification would obviate the need to use force. . . . But the rule announced by the court today was not clearly established in 2007, and the putative unlawfulness of Sanders's action was not apparent under pre-existing law. . . I would affirm the judgment.")

Stickley v. Byrd, 703 F.3d 421, 423, 424 (8th Cir. 2013) ("Stickley broadly asserts that the denial of adequate toilet paper violated his constitutional rights. We must, however, review the totality of the circumstances at issue. . . Although Stickley exhausted his supply before receiving an additional roll the following week, he was not always without toilet paper. When he did run out of toilet paper, he was able to clean himself by taking a shower. The Seventh Circuit has concluded that a prisoner's deprivation of toilet paper for five days, though 'merit[ing] some management criticism,' did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. . . This holding is consistent with our precedent. . . We conclude that, given the amount of toilet paper afforded him, the limited time in which he went without toilet paper, and his ability to attend to his hygiene needs at those times, Stickley's constitutional rights were not violated by the denial of additional toilet paper. . . Whether the denial of a request for additional toilet paper or similar hygiene items might in some circumstances constitute a constitutional violation is a question we need not resolve today. We hold only that, in the circumstances presented in this case, the Defendants' refusal to grant Stickley's request for additional toilet paper did not violate any clearly established right. Accordingly, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Sutton v. Bailey, 702 F.3d 444, 449 (8th Cir. 2012) ("[T]he issue here is qualified immunity from Sutton's claims of inadequate pre-termination process. Appellants were aware of the University's grievance procedures, but they were not responsible for their adequacy. Appellants provided Sutton the essential elements of the pre-termination hearing Loudermill and our cases applying Loudermill required. It was reasonable for them to assume that Sutton, if he wished to contest the termination, would file a grievance and that the grievance procedures would comport with the minimum post-termination procedures that the Due Process Clause mandates. . . . Whether the University's post-termination process was so inadequate that due process required more than an informal pre-termination hearing is an uncertain issue that turns on 'a balancing of the competing interests at stake' in a particular case. . . Because the constitutional adequacy of post-termination procedures therefore cannot be assessed in a vacuum, the possible inadequacy of the post-termination procedures Sutton failed to invoke cannot, as a matter of law, be a proper basis for denying qualified immunity from individual-capacity damage claims based entirely on the alleged inadequacy of the pre-termination process the decision-makers provided.")

Winslow v. Smith, 696 F.3d 716, 738, 739 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Defendants do not dispute that the right to be free from the use of false evidence to secure a conviction was clearly established in 1989, nor could they. . . Instead, the parties dispute whether reasonable officers in 1989 should have known that recklessly investigating a crime violated clearly established law. We have previously addressed this issue in Wilson v. Lawrence County, 260 F.3d 946 (8th Cir.2001). In Wilson, the plaintiff brought a section 1983 civil rights action against law enforcement officials for their conduct in a murder investigation which led to his wrongful conviction. We affirmed the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the defendants, recognizing that 'the liberty interest involved ... is the interest in obtaining fair criminal proceedings.' Wilson, 260 F.3d at 956 n. 8. In Wilson, we noted such a right had previously been recognized in Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 87, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963), where suppression of exculpatory evidence violated due process, and Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. at 269, 79 S.Ct. 1173, where use of false evidence at trial violated due process. Wilson, 260 F.3d at 956 n. 8. As a result, '[l]aw enforcement officers, like prosecutors, have a responsibility to criminal defendants to conduct their investigations and prosecutions fairly.' Id. at 957. Here, the district court held that the right to be free from a reckless investigation was not clearly established in 1989. In reaching this result, the district court interpreted Wilson as not deciding whether a right to be free from reckless investigatory police work was clearly established in 1986 because the appellants '[did] not challenge the district court conclusion that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.' The district court is correct that in Wilson the appellants conceded that 'intentional acts of failing to investigate other leads would violate due process.' Wilson, 260 F.3d at 955. However, the appellants still argued that 'allegations or evidence of recklessness [were] insufficient to state a claim.' Id. We rejected their argument and held that the plaintiff's claim based on a reckless investigation in 1986 was actionable. Id. at 957. Pursuant to Wilson, then, a due process right against a reckless investigation was clearly established in 1986. As a result, Plaintiffs' right to be free from a reckless investigation was clearly established three years later in 1989.")

Williams v. Herron, 687 F.3d 971, 978 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Herron attempts to distinguish his case on appeal by arguing that we must limit our clearly established right analysis to cases involving section 1983 and qualified immunity; he further asserts that the type of claim brought by Williams has never given rise to section 1983 liability. We have previously held that section 1983 sexual-harassment claims are treated the same as sexual-harassment claims under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq. See Moore v. Forrest City Sch. Dist., 524 F.3d 879, 883 (8th Cir.2008); Weger v. City of Ladue, 500 F.3d 710, 717 n. 4 (8th Cir.2007); Tuggle v. Mangan, 348 F.3d 714, 720 (8th Cir.2003); see also Wright, 417 F.3d at 884–85 (listing cases). It should be no surprise that we apply the same treatment here, making Title VII sexual-harassment cases relevant to our determination. As explained above, a qualified-immunity analysis does not augment a plaintiff's burden to show her hostile-work-environment claim. Thus, because our claim analysis is the same regardless of whether qualified immunity is implicated, we may rely on cases not involving qualified immunity when determining whether a violation is clearly established.")

Burke v. Sullivan, 677 F.3d 367, 372 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Because the instant matter concerns a claim of qualified immunity, not a motion to suppress evidence, we need not reach the issue of whether the officers violated the dictates of the Fourth Amendment. . . .Based on the several facts known to the officers, it was reasonable for them to conclude their warrantless entry into Burke's home was lawful under either the emergency aid exception or the community caretaker exception. Jay had become highly intoxicated. Jay refused to leave the neighbor's party. Jay would not cooperate with Burke when she tried to take him home and was verbally abusive to Burke. Jay forcefully pushed Burke against a wall. Jay was involved in a physical altercation with one of the party guests, seriously biting him. Jay kicked and broke a table. Jay was known to use illegal drugs and may have been under the influence of illegal drugs. Jay went into Burke's house across the street immediately before the officers' arrival. There was no response when the officers attempted to contact Burke by knocking on her door, shouting, shining a flashlight inside, and telephoning the residence. Burke, who had been thrown against a wall by Jay, was now in the home alone with a violent suspect. When viewed collectively, these facts could lead a reasonable police officer to conclude there was either a threat of violence or an emergency requiring attention. . . . Contrary to Burke's assertion, Smith v. Kansas City, Mo. Police Department, 586 F.3d 576 (8th Cir.2009) does not dictate a different result. In Smith, we determined a police officer was not entitled to qualified immunity when the officer entered the home of an unarmed domestic violence suspect without a warrant. . . In reaching our decision, we gave significant weight to the fact the officer had no information any victim or potential victim was inside the home. . . In Burke's case, the officers had specific information a potential victim, Burke, was inside the home with Jay, the violent suspect, whose erratic behavior generated the domestic disturbance call. Jay had already been involved in violent encounters with Burke and LaRose. Given these facts, it was reasonable for the officers to conclude their warrantless entry into Burke's home was lawful. . . In addition, our court did not decide Smith until November 2009, over four months after the officers entered Burke's home. As such, Smith was not part of the established law when the officers entered Burke's home.")

Wagner v. Jones, 664 F.3d 259, 273-75 (8th Cir. 2011) ("The Supreme Court decided Rutan in 1990. Dean Jones does not contend that either the full-time or adjunct LAWR positions were policymaking or confidential positions and acknowledges that Wagner had a First Amendment right not to have her hiring decision based on her political beliefs and associations. Thus, Wagner has met her burden to prove that, at the time the hiring decisions were made, the law was clearly established that an employee seeking employment with the state cannot be denied a job based on her political associations or beliefs unless the position is a policymaking or confidential position. Because Wagner has shown that the First Amendment generally prohibits a state from basing its hiring decision on political beliefs or associations, the question now is 'whether a reasonable [dean] could have believed [not hiring Wagner] to be lawful, in light of clearly established law and the information [that the dean] possessed.'. . Dean Jones had several indications that Wagner's political beliefs and associations may have played a role in the faculty's hiring decisions. Only one law school faculty member out of 50 is a registered Republican. As dean, Dean Jones generally should have been aware of her faculty's point of view and its political tendencies. Associate Dean Andersen contacted Dean Jones before Wagner interviewed for the full-time position and relayed Wagner's concerns about whether her politics would make it difficult for her to be hired. Dean Jones apparently did nothing to ensure that the faculty did not impermissibly consider Wagner's politics in making its recommendation as to whom she should hire even though Dean Jones was present for the faculty discussion on January 25, 2007. After the faculty voted not to recommend Wagner for the full-time position, Associate Dean Carlson sent an e-mail to Dean Jones questioning whether Wagner's politics played a role in the faculty's vote and if Wagner's politics would play a role in voting on whether she could teach the summer LAWR program or serve as an adjunct. Dean Jones apparently completed no further investigation other than speaking to Associate Dean Carlson. More importantly, Dean Jones took no steps to ensure that the faculty did not take Wagner's political associations and beliefs into consideration when the faculty voted on whether to recommend her for an adjunct LAWR position. Dean Jones supported Wagner's serving as an adjunct instructor because she asked Janis to follow up with Wagner to determine whether she was interested in the adjunct position. But Dean Jones refused to hire Wagner and instead relied on the faculty's recommendations. Dean Jones did not provide Wagner with any explanation as to why she chose not to hire her for any of the adjunct positions. Dean Jones argues that the University has a standard policy for hiring law school faculty. The Committee receives the applications, screens the candidates, conducts the initial interviews, and then chooses candidates for a full-day interview. The faculty attends the job talk portion of the candidate's full-day interview and votes on whether to recommend hiring candidates to the dean. Dean Jones argues that as the dean, she has to hire the person whom the faculty recommends and that this has been the practice for the last 50 years. The district court found 'that Jones acted in strict conformity with longstanding hiring policy' and 'deans routinely and consistently exercised no independent personal judgment in making hiring decisions but acted entirely on the advice and recommendations of a Faculty Appointments Committee.' Wagner, however, presented evidence that at least one other dean in the past 50 years chose not to hire the person whom the faculty recommended. In her deposition, Dean Jones also conceded that she was free to refuse to hire the person recommended by the faculty and would do so in unusual circumstances . . . . Whether Dean Jones had the ability to hire Wagner absent the faculty's vote is a genuine issue of material fact that the jury, not the court, should decide. Furthermore, Dean Jones was notified that the 'process' may not have been working properly and the faculty may have violated the First Amendment, but she still made her hiring decision based solely on the faculty's suggestions. By her own admission, Dean Jones had the ability to hire someone whom the faculty had not recommended but chose not to do so. Dean Jones's conduct confirmed the faculty's recommendations, which a jury ultimately could conclude violated the First Amendment. Consequently, Dean Jones has not shown that a reasonable university dean in her position would have believed that failing to hire Wagner was lawful in light of clearly established law.")

Mathers v. Wright, 636 F.3d 396, 402 (8th Cir. 2011) ("[W]e conclude that it was clearly established that a school official may not treat a student differently from her similarly situated peers when such conduct exceeds the scope of professionally acceptable choices and stems from an improper personal motivation. This holding is consistent with decisions from other courts that have denied qualified immunity to a school official accused of discriminating against a student in the absence of a rational basis to do so. . . Our holding is narrow. Looking no further than the face of the complaint and accepting as true all allegations therein, we conclude that the allegations regarding Wright's treatment of J.S.J. state an equal protection violation, and we are satisfied that a reasonable teacher in Wright's position would recognize as much. Accordingly, Wright is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceeding.")

Doe v. Flaherty, 623 F.3d 577, 585 (8th Cir. 2010) ("It was clearly established at the time of the incident in this case that a supervisory school official with actual notice of ongoing sexual abuse against a student was required to take action to investigate and stop the abuse. The plaintiffs do not appear to argue that the notice standard under § 1983 is less stringent than actual knowledge, but to the extent that the issue is raised, no less stringent notice standard was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity in this circuit as of October 2006.")

Langford v. Norris, 614 F.3d 445, 461, 462 (8th Cir. 2010) ("In this case, it is plain that if Byus knew all the relevant facts about Langford's and Hardin's medical needs, the unlawfulness of failing to ensure that they received adequate treatment would have been apparent. The more difficult question centers on how much Byus actually knew about Langford's and Hardin's medical needs and the allegedly inadequate treatment they received. As we have said, we may take as given the facts that the district court assumed. . . But the only relevant fact identified in the magistrate judge's proposed findings and recommendations is that Byus sent letters to Langford and Hardin in which he acknowledged receiving letters from them. . . .The district court likely inferred that the letters from Langford and Hardin contained at least some description of their medical needs–Langford's stomach and back pain and Hardin's Charcot foot–and the perceived inadequacy of the treatment they had received to that point. . . . Considering these facts together, and drawing all reasonable inferences from them in favor of the plaintiffs, we are convinced that the constitutional right at issue was clearly established as of the time of the relevant conduct, such that a reasonable supervisory official would have known that his actions were unlawful. That is to say, a reasonable official standing in Byus's shoes would have understood that ignoring Langford's and Hardin's complaints about receiving deficient medical care contravened clearly established principles of Eighth Amendment jurisprudence.")

Morris v. Zefferi, 601 F.3d 805, 812 (8th Cir. 2010) ("We believe our decision in this case is controlled by the reasoning of *Nelson.*The district court did not err in finding the unconstitutionality of Zefferi's alleged conduct should have been obvious to Zefferi based both on common sense and prior general case law. . . Transporting a pretrial detainee in a small, unsanitary dog cage for ninety minutes, with no compelling urgency and other alternatives available, under the above precedent, sufficiently shows the possible infringement of a clearly established constitutional right to be free from improper punishment.")

Williams v. Jackson, 600 F.3d 1007, 1014 (8th Cir. 2010) ("Here, for purposes of our review, the allegations in the case involve the malicious and retaliatory exposure of inmates to an apparently intended harm without a penological purpose. . . . We do not believe that qualified immunity in this context hinges on the question of whether prior cases referenced the particular, technological manner in which force was applied. Similarly, we do not believe qualified immunity applies simply because the precise degree of harm likely to result was uncertain. As already discussed, the material inquiry is not the degree of harm, but rather, the degree of force applied and the reason for applying that force. . . .[R]easonable officers are on sufficient notice that they may not purposefully expose prisoners to potentially harmful radiation in the complete absence of a penological purpose. Importantly, the record here taken in a light most favorable to Williams shows just such a complete absence of a penological purpose in removing the shield and in failing to deactivate the light immediately upon removal of the shield. Given the reasonable inference that the officers acted maliciously in an effort to cause harm, and the allegations that an injury did result, the correction-officer defendants are not entitled to qualified immunityat this time. Similarly, in this case, the same rationale supports the denial of qualified immunity as to the related claim of deliberate indifference.”).

Heartland Academy Community Church v. Waddle, 595 F.3d 798, 807-09 (8th Cir. 2010) (“In response to Heartland’s jurisdictional challenge, the Officials try to couch their fact-intensive ‘I didn’t do it!’ defenses in the language of a purely legal argument. The Officials characterize the issue before us as whether the evidence Heartland adduced is sufficient to survive scrutiny under Fed.R.Civ.P. 56. The Officials stress they do not dispute Heartland’s evidence, but only challenge its sufficiency to establish violations of clearly established constitutional rights. We decline to elevate the form of the Officials’ argument over its substance. . . .The evidence Heartland presented to the district court–if believed–is so outrageous we are presented with a case in which the civil rights defendants acted in a ‘plainly incompetent’ manner or in ‘a knowing violation of a clearly established precedent.’. . We express no view as to the ultimate truth. But under the version of the facts we must accept as true for purposes of this interlocutory appeal, the Officials knowingly worked with one another to effect the mass removal of HCA students without court orders, with court orders based upon lies, or court orders devoid of probable cause. The Officials deprived Heartland of notice and an opportunity to be heard, and then tried to cover up the Officials’ wrongdoing– with false, misleading, and incomplete statements. All of Heartland’s relevant constitutional rights were clearly established on October 30, 2001. The state of the law on October 30, 2001, gave the Officials fair warning that effecting or at least conspiring to effect the mass removal of HCA students with bogus ex parte orders potentially would violate Heartland’s Fourteenth Amendment rights to family integrity, Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights to be free from unreasonable seizures, First and Fourteenth Amendment rights to free association, and Fourteenth Amendment rights to procedural due process. The Supreme Court has long recognized the constitutional rights the Officials allegedly infringed.”).

Rush v. Perryman, 579 F.3d 908, 914 (8th Cir. 2009) (“Rush’s right to a post-termination name-clearing hearing was clearly established. The district court did not err in denying the Board members’ summary judgment motion on qualified immunity grounds.”).

Bonner v. Outlaw, 552 F.3d 673, 679, 680 (8th Cir. 2009) (“Outlaw’s conduct violated Bonner’s clearly established rights because the law gave Outlaw ‘fair warning’ his conduct was unconstitutional. Over thirty years ago, the Supreme Court in Procunier declared that inmates have a due process right to notice whenever correspondence addressed to them is rejected. . . Outlaw argues he did not have fair notice Procunier applies to packages because Procunier only discussed letters, and he reasonably relied on 28 C.F.R. ‘ 540.13 to support his interpretation of Procunier. We believe, however, such an interpretation of Procunier strains credulity. The reasoning of Procunier clearly applies to all forms of correspondence, even if the decision only discussed letters. There is no valid reason for distinguishing between letters and packages: the inmate's liberty interest is the same and there is no additional administrative burden involved.").

Cross v. Mokwa, 547 F.3d 890, 896, 897 (8th Cir. 2008) ("These six plaintiffs allege that the police officers' actions at 3309 Illinois violated their First Amendment right to protest because the Building Code Violation Enforcement Plan was devised and executed as a prior restraint on protester activities. The district court denied the police officers qualified immunity on these claims, concluding that reasonable police officers should have known that 'selective and disproportionate use of police power to prevent the occurrence of a protest' would violate clearly established First Amendment rights, and that plaintiffs presented sufficient evidence that 'a person of ordinary firmness would be deterred by this State action.' We disagree. . . . Neither the court nor plaintiffs on appeal cite any authority for the proposition that a policeman's decision to enforce a traffic law or a provision of the housing code, for example, is unconstitutional if it can be shown that he has enforced that law in a 'selective' manner, not to retaliate for the violator's prior First Amendment protected activity, but to 'chill' future First Amendment activity that the violator may be contemplating. We have found no federal appellate case granting or upholding First Amendment relief on this ground. . . . At a minimum, it was not clearly established in 2003 that a police officer could be liable on a 'prior restraint' theory for making arrests that were supported by probable cause and then conducting a reasonable search and seizure of a condemned building. For these reasons, the district court's denial of qualified immunity from these First Amendment claims is reversed.").

Stufflebeam v. Harris, 521 F.3d 884, 887-89 (8th Cir. 2008) ("[T]he primary question, one not addressed by the district court or carefully analyzed by the parties on appeal, is whether Arkansas law permits a police officer to arrest a person for refusing to identify himself when he is not suspected of other criminal activity and his identification is not needed to protect officer safety or to resolve whatever reasonable suspicions prompted the officer to initiate an on-going traffic stop or Terry . . .stop. . . We conclude it does not. . . . Here, Harris acted contrary to the plain meaning of Rule 2.2(b) and the law of Arkansas as clearly established in Meadows by prolonging the detention and then arresting Stufflebeam, a passenger not suspected of criminal activity, because he adamantly refused to comply with an unlawful demand that he identify himself. . . . On this record, Officer Harris is not entitled to dismissal of Stufflebeam's claim, either on the merits or based on qualified immunity.").

Irving v. Dormire, 519 F.3d 441, 450 (8th Cir. 2008) ("An officer who acts so far beyond the bounds of his official duties that 'the rationale underlying qualified immunity is inapplicable' can have fair warning even if there is no factually similar case. . . It was clearly established by Burton that a guard is not permitted to threaten an inmate with death by means readily at hand. It should have likewise been clear that a guard may not threaten an inmate with death by means of arming, bribing, and inciting other inmates to accomplish that which the guard may not do directly. No reasonable prison guard would have believed that no constitutional right would be violated by such conduct, and thus the district court correctly denied qualified immunity to Brigance.").

Brown v. Fortner, 518 F.3d 552, 561 (8th Cir. 2008) ("We conclude that Fortner had 'fair warning' that driving recklessly while transporting a shackled inmate who had been denied the use of a seatbelt and ignoring requests to slow down violated the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. There is no question that it was clearly established that subjecting inmates to unreasonable and substantial risk of harm constituted a constitutional violation. . . While there are not any published cases from our circuit directly addressing deliberate indifference in the context of prisoner transportation, Morgan is on point. . . . The facts in Morgan that were sufficient to support a conclusion that an officer transporting an individual was deliberately indifferent are sufficiently similar to the conduct alleged of Fortner to make it clear to a reasonable officer that the conduct was unconstitutional. Moreover, even discounting Morgan's significance because it was unpublished, '"officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances."' . . Other cases addressing deliberate indifference to the safety of prisoners provided notice that the conduct engaged in by Fortner was unconstitutional, making the right clearly established.").

Duckworth v. St. Louis Metropolitan Police Dept., 2007 WL 2050857, at *5 (8th Cir. July 19, 2007) ("In the specific context of this case, the superiors were confronted with the situation where no female officers were working the night watch in District One. Captain Filla thought that Special Order 90-S-7 granted her authority to reassign Plaintiffs, as long as she had a 'sufficient justification.' . . . . Reasonable police administrators could believe that assigning female officers to the night watch was lawful.").

Lindsey v. City of Orrick, Missouri, 491 F.3d 892, 902 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Although neither the Supreme Court nor this court has considered a completely analogous case–one involving an employee's dismissal after speech alleging violations of open meetings law that is not our inquiry. In Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), the Supreme Court changed the clearly established law inquiry from a hunt for prior cases with precisely the same facts to asking whether the official had fair notice her conduct was unconstitutional.").

Richmond v. City of Brooklyn Center, 490 F.3d 1002, 1007, 1009 (8th Cir. 2007) ("The defendants do not dispute on appeal the jury's finding that Officer Bruce conducted the strip search in an unreasonable manner in violation of Richmond's Fourth Amendment rights. Therefore, we proceed directly to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, which asks whether the asserted constitutional right was clearly established. . . . In this case, the officers had reasonable suspicion that Richmond was concealing evidence on his person and were in a position to conduct a private, hygienic and non-abusive strip search on the spot, rather than risk Richmond disposing of the evidence during the course of his transportation to the police station. . . . No clearly established legal standards would have put a reasonable officer on notice that, in these particular circumstances, it was objectively unreasonable to lower the handcuffed arrestee's pants and boxer shorts to accomplish the strip search, rather than to risk loss of evidence by waiting until the arrestee was in an environment where handcuffs were not required.").

Clemmons v. Armontrout, 477 F.3d 962, 966 (8th Cir. 2007) ("We hold that, under the first prong of Saucier, Investigator Brooks did not violate Clemmons's constitutional rights, as Clemmons adduced no evidence that Brooks acted intentionally, recklessly, or in bad faith when he failed to disclose the IOC to the prosecutor and failed to investigate Clark's statement that Bagby murdered Johnson. While Clemmons argues that he demonstrated recklessness by providing evidence that Investigator Brooks received the IOC, failed to interview Clark, failed to interview other eyewitnesses, and failed to include the IOC to the prosecutor, he has offered no explanation for why these actions constitute recklessness as opposed to mere negligence. . . . As a matter of law, we conclude that the undisputed facts establish that Investigator Brooks's actions were not intentional or reckless. Mere negligence on Brooks's part by failing to disclose the IOC or investigating another lead is insufficient to deny him qualified immunity.").

Kahle v. Leonard, 477 F.3d 544, 554 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Without question, then, Kahle's constitutional right to be protected from being sexually assaulted by a guard was clearly established on December 14, 2002, as was the fact that a supervisor who was deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of such an assault could be held liable under § 1983. . . . Because a reasonable juror who accepted Kahle's version of the events could conclude that Malone violated Kahle's clearly-established constitutional rights by demonstrating deliberate indifference to a substantial risk that she would be seriously harmed by Leonard, the district court's denial of Malone's summary-judgment motion is AFFIRMED.").

Ambrose v. Young, 474 F.3d 1070, 1078 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Major Young was in charge of all inmate crews involved in the Sinai clean-up. As previously discussed, Major Young knew the dangling, live power line created a substantial risk of harm. Despite this known risk, Major Young told the inmates to stomp out a non-threatening fire within arms reach of an obviously unstable and live power line. . . .. It is well-established in this circuit that 'knowingly compelling an inmate to perform labor that is ... dangerous to his or her life or health' is a violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Ambrose, we therefore conclude Major Young's conduct was not 'objectively legally reasonable,'. . . and the district court properly denied Major Young qualified immunity.") Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, Minnesota, 429 F.3d 1168, 1174 (8th Cir. 2005) ("In this case, as in Kuha, the officer accompanied the dog, rather than allowing the dog to run loose. Keeping the dog on the lead gave the officer more control over the dog, but it also exposed the officer to greater risk. In both cases, the officer was running with the dog, at night, searching for a person who had fled and whose whereabouts were unknown. Szabla argues that this case is distinguishable from Kuha because Baker used a dog to track a person who may have fled because he was injured or ill, not because he wanted to evade the police. This distinction is indeed relevant to the Fourth Amendment reasonableness of Baker's use of the track command, but it does not demonstrate that any reasonable officer would have known on August 17, 2000, that a prior warning was constitutionally required in these circumstances. Baker is therefore entitled to summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity.").

Wright v. Rolette County, 417 F.3d 879, 887-89 (8th Cir. 2005) (Bye, J., concurring) ("I concur with the majority as to the facts as alleged by Ms. Wright, if proven true, could support a claim for sexual harassment, but not a claim for constructive discharge. I write separately in regards to section III.D.2 of the opinion, which discusses the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. The majority declares '[t]he right to be free of gender discrimination is clearly established.' This hasty resolution of the clearly established prong ignores the Supreme Court's pronouncements in Anderson v. Creighton. . .and Saucier v. Katz. . . . Although we do not require a precise factual analog to precedent, in light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness of specific conduct must be apparent to a reasonably competent official. . . The importance of this particularized inquiry cannot be discounted because it is the teeth of the qualified immunity defense. Without these teeth, the defense lacks the bite essential in promoting the compelling public policy objectives underlying it. . . . Our case law clearly establishes sexual innuendo or discriminatory conduct is pervasive or abusive when it is both frequent and severe. . . . That is not to say our case law is a model of clarity in the absence of frequent and severe discriminatory conduct. In fact, the line between merely offensive conduct and actionable sexual harassment is blurred where the harassment, though severe, occurs relatively infrequently, or where the complained of conduct, though frequent, is relatively innocuous. But the conduct at issue here is neither infrequent nor innocuous. Thus, if Ms. Wright's allegations turn out to be true, Sheriff Sims's conduct falls within the realm of frequent and severe sexual innuendo and outside the protection of the qualified immunity defense." [footnotes omitted]).

Davis v. Hall, 375 F.3d 703, 719 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Based on Slone and the law of other circuits . . . we have no difficulty concluding that Davis alleged the deprivation of a clearly established right and that a reasonable government actor would know that failing to respond to Davis's requests to be released in keeping with the court order that he possessed was unlawful.").

Burton v. Richmond, 370 F.3d 723, 730 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Assuming arguendo that plaintiffs have shown a constitutional violation, defendants are still entitled to qualified immunity if the alleged right at issue was not clearly established at the time of the complained-of conduct in 1985. . . We believe the constitutional right of children under DFS supervision, yet not within DFS custody, to be free from abuse in a court-ordered placement was not clearly established in 1985. Courts have split on whether children in the mid-1980s had a clearly established right to reasonable safety while placed in foster care after having been taken into state custody. [citing cases] Given the wide divergence of views on whether the right to protection from abuse was clearly established for children in state custody placed in foster care, we refuse to find that a right to protection while under state supervision, yet not in state custody, was clearly established in 1985. The District Court erred when it ruled that in 1985 plaintiffs had a clearly established constitutional right to be protected from abuse at the hands of a private individual while under state supervision yet not in state custody.").

Villasana v. Wilhoit, 368 F.3d 976, 978 (8th Cir. 2004) ("After substantial discovery, the district court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, concluding they are entitled to qualified immunity from these claims. The court reasoned that no case has extended liability under Brady to crime laboratory technicians and therefore Villasana failed to show 'that defendants had a clearly established obligation under Brady to disclose exculpatory or potentially exculpatory evidence to the prosecution or to the plaintiff.' Reviewing de novo the question whether the asserted federal right was clearly established, we agree.").

Kuha v. City of Minnetonka, 365 F.3d 590, 601, 602 (8th Cir. 2004) (amending and superceding original panel opinion on reh'g)("Kuha has alleged facts sufficient to survive summary judgment on his Fourth Amendment claim, which is based on the officers' failure to give a verbal warning prior to using a police dog to seize him. The second step of the qualified immunity inquiry will still shield the officers from suit, however, if their conduct was objectively legally reasonable in light of the information they possessed at the time of the alleged violation. . . . Kuha's right to a verbal warning in this case was not clearly established at the time of the seizure. Officers Anderson and Warosh were not on notice that it arguably was constitutionally impermissible to use a police dog against Kuha without a verbal warning under the circumstances of this case. . . . There are no cases from this circuit that mandate such a warning and a review of other circuits offers little guidance on the issue. In most of the published K-9 bite cases, the fighting issue is whether the initial decision to release the dog was objectively reasonable under the circumstances. . . . In those few cases turning on a failure to warn, significant factual differences weigh against charging Officers Anderson and Warosh with notice sufficient to warrant denial of qualified immunity. . . . An officer could conclude, as Officer Anderson testified in this case, that in situations where the location of the suspect is less evident, a warning would place the officers at undue risk from a hiding suspect. We cannot say that 'no reasonably competent officer' would have concluded otherwise. . . . Accordingly, Officers Anderson and Warosh are entitled to qualified immunity for their actions in this case.").

Lawyer v. City of Council Bluffs, 361 F.3d 1099, 1108 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Even if an Iowa court were to conclude later that conduct such as Timothy's does not violate the statute, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. Police officers are not expected to parse code language as though they were participating in a law school seminar, and a reasonable officer certainly could believe that Timothy's earnest efforts to induce Michael's defiance of a lawful command 'obstructed' the officer's duties. Given the lack of detailed judicial guidance on the interplay among the statutory terms 'obstruct,' 'resist,' and 'verbal harassment,' we conclude that the arrest of Timothy did not violate clearly established law.").

Moran v. Clarke, 359 F.3d 1058, 1061 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Appellants, especially as law enforcement officials, knew or should reasonably have known that the specific conduct outlined by Moran was unlawful. No reasonable official would believe it was permissible to hatch a plan to scapegoat an innocent officer for acts of police brutality against a developmentally disabled citizen. On April 14, 1997, and every day thereafter, such actions were clearly beyond the scope of Appellants' discretionary authority. . . . Appellants arguments based on Albright are unavailing. They argue that because the Supreme Court held in Albright that a substantive due process claim would not lie in a malicious prosecution claim, . . . they could not have been on notice that their conduct violated the Constitution. We disagree. As we explained in Moran I, Appellants' purported actions went well beyond the realm of malicious prosecution. . . 'Instead of simply allowing a weakly supported prosecution to proceed,' Moran asserts that Appellants engaged in a 'purposeful police conspiracy to manufacture ... false evidence.'").

Hawkins v. Holloway, 316 F.3d 777, 788 (8th Cir. 2003) ("Although the sheriff faults the district court for failing to cite to any case that is factually similar, it was not necessary for the court to do so because Sheriff Holloway's alleged conduct was so far beyond the bounds of the performance of his official duties that the rationale underlying qualified immunity is inapplicable. . . . . No reasonable official in the sheriff's shoes could have thought it within his duties to threaten his employees with deadly force.").

Hill v. McKinley, 311 F.3d 899, 904, 905 (8th Cir. 2002) ("Although we conclude that the facts establish a constitutional violation, we believe the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on the ground that their actions did not violate clearly established law. . . .[T]the relevant authority indicates that prisoners are entitled to very narrow zones of privacy, and circumstances may warrant the most invasive of intrusions into bodily privacy. In light of this authority, we cannot say as a matter of law that it was clearly established in 1996 that a highly intoxicated, loud and violent prisoner could not constitutionally be restrained naked outside the view of all but a small number of guards. Thus, the district court should have ruled that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on Hill's Fourth Amendment claim.").

Treats v. Morgan, 308 F.3d 868, 875 (8th Cir. 2002) ("At the time Treats was sprayed, the law was clearly established that correctional officers do not have a blank check to use force whenever a prisoner is being difficult. . . Prison regulations governing the conduct of correctional officers are also relevant in determining whether an inmate's right was clearly established. Hope, __ U.S. at __, 122 S.Ct. at 2517. The ADC regulations authorize use of pepper spray only when an inmate is threatening physical harm, refuses to produce an item, or refuses to relocate, . . and the regulations prohibit its use without warning, . . or as punishment. . . The ADC promulgated these rules to regulate the conduct of correctional officers, and Treats has presented evidence that appellants violated each of them.").

Meloy v. Bachmeier, 302 F.3d 845, 849 (8th Cir. 2002) ("We conclude Bachmeier's adherence to Dr. O'Neill's order that the prison need not provide Meloy a CPAP was objectively reasonable in light of the legal rules in place at the time of her adherence. Bachmeier had some medical training as a nurse, but she was functioning in an administrative role. Bachmeier was not responsible for examining Meloy or treating him herself. Although Meloy personally told Bachmeier about his condition and his need for a CPAP, Bachmeier relied on the opinion of prison doctors, who had more medical training, about the necessary treatment for Meloy's OSA. Bachmeier followed Dr. O'Neill's order that a CPAP was unnecessary, and followed the cardiologist's order that the prison should provide one. . . . . As for Bachmeier's liability in her role as a supervisor, we cannot say the law was clearly established that Bachmeier's failure to override Dr. O'Neill's treatment order constituted deliberate indifference to any Eighth Amendment violation by him. The law does not clearly require an administrator with less medical training to second-guess or disregard a treating physician's treatment decision. Because the law was not clearly established that Bachmeier was deliberately indifferent to Meloy's serious medical needs, Bachmeier is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Omni Behavioral Health v. Miller, 285 F.3d 646, 653, 654 (8th Cir. 2002) ("While there appears to be no reported case dealing with the precise situation before us, to find a right clearly established, 'it is not necessary that the Supreme Court has directly addressed the issue, nor does the precise action or omission in question need to have been held unlawful.' . . . However, there must be the 'requisite degree of factual correspondence' between the case at issue and previous cases. . . . The only cases that appear to be factually similar to this case involve lawsuits by parents claiming that their liberty interest in the care and custody of their children was violated by child abuse investigations. [citing cases] In each of these cases, the court held the state actor that was investigating child abuse was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The need to continually subject the assertion of this abstract substantive due process right to a balancing test which weighs the interest of the parent against the interests of the child and the state makes the qualified immunity defense difficult to overcome. Moreover, the requirement that the right be clearly established at the time of the alleged violation is particularly formidable. . . Applying the above analysis here, it is clear that the right to occupational liberty, to the extent that it exists at all in this context, does not include a right to be free from child abuse investigations.").

Foulk v. Charrier, 262 F.3d 687, 702 (8th Cir. 2001) ("By June of 1994, the law was well established that a malicious and sadistic use of force by a prison official against a prisoner, done with the intent to injure and causing actual injury, is enough to establish a violation of the Eighth Amendment's cruel and unusual punishment clause.").

Gorman v. Bartch, 152 F.3d 907, 915-16 (8th Cir. 1998) ("At the time of Gorman's arrest in May of 1992, Title II of the ADA had only been in effect for some four months. Despite the clear language of the statute, there was uncertainty about the extent of its coverage. There were no cases addressing its possible application to government agencies like police departments or to the transportation of arrestees. Although there were some cases applying the Rehabilitation Act to prisons, there were none dealing with facts similar to those alleged by Gorman. . . In the intervening years until the Supreme Court decided Yeskey, courts divided on the applicability of the ADA and Rehabilitation Act to state prisons. . . . Under the circumstances, it cannot be said that reasonable police officials in May of 1992 would have known that the actions alleged against the individual defendants in respect to the transportation of a disabled arrestee were subject to, and in violation of, Title II of the ADA or ' 504 of the Rehabilitation Act.").

Greer v. Shoop, 141 F.3d 824, 828 (8th Cir. 1998) ("We are of the view that the state-created danger theory was an emerging rule of law in this circuit in 1991. Therefore, we assume without deciding, based on the facts accepted for purposes of summary judgment, that Greer has sufficiently alleged a violation of Mora Greer's constitutional rights pursuant to the state-created danger theory. However, we are not convinced that the law was so clearly established in 1991 that a reasonable official under these factual circumstances would have known that his or her actions were violative of Mora Greer's constitutional rights. Although a precise factual correspondence with precedents has never been required for a constitutional right to be clearly established, Boswell v. Sherburne County, 849 F.2d 1117, 1121 (8th Cir.1988), when the distinguishing facts are such that they change the nature of the claim presented, they are relevant to that determination. In this case, the privacy issues that surround a person's medical condition, specifically when that person is HIV-positive or has AIDS, complicate the application of the state-created danger theory. See Iowa Code Ann. ' 141.23 (West, WESTLAW through 1991) (prohibiting non-consensual disclosure of a person's HIV-positive status). Because of those privacy concerns, we cannot say that in 1991, a reasonable official would have known that failing to inform Mora Greer of Stevens' HIV-positive status violated her due process rights. It is just as likely that a reasonable official would have thought that disclosing Stevens' HIV-positive status violated Stevens' right of privacy. Therefore, we hold that the contours of the state-created danger theory, as applied to the unique facts of this case, were not defined clearly enough in 1991 to remove the defendants' qualified immunity protection.").

Burnham v. Ianni, 119 F.3d 668, 675, 677 (8th Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("Because this case involves Ianni's suppression of plaintiffs' protected speech, plaintiffs have (at least for purposes of summary adjudication) sufficiently established a violation of a constitutional right . . . . Here, of course, we have long established, binding precedent totally supportive of plaintiffs' claims. The Supreme Court and this court have both clearly and directly spoken on the subject on numerous occasions and in years long prior to the 1992 censorship by Ianni. Accordingly, Chancellor Ianni's "not clearly established" claim must be rejected.").

Veneklase v. City of Fargo, 78 F.3d 1264, 1269 (8th Cir. 1996) (Veneklase I) ("[U]pon a careful reading of Frisby[v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988)], we do not find that its holding defined the outer parameters of 'focused' residential picketing. We hold that plaintiffs did not have a clearly established right on October 10, 1991, to picket in a route encompassing the Bovard residence and the two to three homes on either side of it. We further hold that the arrest of plaintiffs by the defendant officers was objectively reasonable in light of the legal rules in existence at the time the action occurred.").

Bills v. Dahm, 32 F.3d 333, 335 (8th Cir. 1994) ("To determine whether [plaintiff's] constitutional right to equal protection was violated ... we cannot begin with the generalized inquiry into whether the right to equal protection is clearly established. Instead, we must ask 'a more particularized' question ... namely, whether under the circumstances of this case he had a clearly established right.

In other words, we must determine whether he had a clearly established right to be offered the same opportunities [privilege of overnight child visitation] afforded prisoners confined within the Nebraska Center for Women.").

Sellers v. Baer, 28 F.3d 895, 900 (8th Cir. 1994) ("As was the case in Anderson, the plaintiffs here have stated the constitutional right allegedly violated at too high a level of generality. It is particularly important for a complaint alleging a violation of substantive due process to state with particularity the precise nature of the alleged violation. [cite omitted] The issue in this case for purposes of qualified immunity is whether reasonable officers in the position of [defendant officers] would have understood they were violating [decedent's] constitutional rights when they removed him from the fairgrounds, where he had been making a great nuisance of himself, and set him free in a parking lot, near a police station and behind a federal building, away from his companions, without funds, and in an intoxicated state, rather than retain custody and charge him with disorderly conduct.").

Grantham v. Trickey, 21 F.3d 289, 293 (8th Cir. 1994) ("Our cases recently have reached different conclusions on the question of when an individual's right to free speech in public employment is 'clearly established' for the purposes of qualified immunity. We have held that 'when Pickering's fact-intensive balancing test is at issue, the asserted First Amendment right "can rarely be considered 'clearly established' for purposes of the Harlow qualified immunity standard." '" cites omitted).

Bartlett v. Fisher, 972 F.2d 911, 918 n.3 (8th Cir. 1992) ("Factually analogous cases are highly relevant to the qualified immunity inquiry when the constitutional right in question is subject to a balancing test.").

Brown v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, No. 4:18 CV 1676 JMB, 2022 WL 1501368, at *4 (E.D. Mo. May 12, 2022) ("[T]he right to peacefully protest, verbally question police action, and engage in new-gathering activity in a public space without facing retaliation was clearly established at the time of the events of September 29, 2017. Nonetheless, Hayden and Olsten are entitled to qualified immunity because the undisputed facts show that they did not violate plaintiff's clearly established rights. . . .While it is undisputed that plaintiff engaged in protected activity and it is at least a question of fact whether pepper-spraying a person would chill such activity, . . . plaintiff has not shown that Olsten's or Hayden's actions (or lack of action) were motivated, even in part, by the exercise of her protected activity. There is no showing that 'defendant would not have taken the adverse action but for harboring retaliatory animus against the plaintiff because of [her] exercise of [her] First Amendment rights.'. . Put another way, plaintiff has presented no 'evidence of a causal connection between the constitutionally protective activity and the adverse action.'. . At most, plaintiff has shown that she was present and affected by pepper spray that Olsten directed at a group of persons. She has not shown that they were aware of her presence, that they objected in any way to her presence or her activities, and/or that they intentionally directed the pepper spray at her (or did nothing) because of her First Amendment activities. . . Thus, plaintiff cannot show that she was targeted because of her First Amendment activity. . . Accordingly, Olsten and Hayden are entitled to qualified immunity on Count I.")

Brown v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, No. 4:18 CV 1676 JMB, 2022 WL 1501368, at *5 (E.D. Mo. May 12, 2022) ("There is no evidence that would support a finding that plaintiff was seized by Olsten within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. There is no evidence that Olsten detained or arrested her. There is also no evidence that he directed her to stop or stay in place nor were there any barriers to her leaving the scene (which according to the videos she did without hindrance). . . Therefore, because there is no showing that Olsten violated her Fourth Amendment rights, she cannot prevail on an excessive force claim. Even if there was such a showing, those rights were not clearly established. In Quraishi, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals considered a claim that news reporters were subjected to excessive force and unreasonably seized when they were singled out and tear-gassed without warning and consequently dispersed. . . In concluding that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity on such a claim, the Court held that it is not clearly established that deploying tear gas is a seizure. . . The same conclusion can be reached in this case. Plaintiff has presented no Supreme Court authority or 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' demonstrating that it was clearly established in 2017 that deploying pepper-spray at a crowd of people is a constitutional violation. . . Accordingly, Olsten is entitled to qualified immunity on Count IV.")

Franks v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, No. 4:19 CV 2663 RWS, 2022 WL 1062035, at *8 (E.D. Mo. Apr. 8, 2022) ("To establish a Fourth Amendment violation, a plaintiff must demonstrate that 'a seizure occurred and the seizure was unreasonable.' [citing Quraishi] A seizure occurs when an officer 'restrains the liberty of an individual through physical force or show of authority.'. . An officer's use of force or show of authority must have been such that '"a reasonable person would have believed that [she] was not free to leave."'. . In determining whether a seizure occurred through a use of force, 'the appropriate inquiry is whether the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain.' Torres v. Madrid, 141 S.Ct. 989, 998 (2021). Here, the record does not support a finding that Franks was seized. There is no evidence that Officer Olsten ordered Franks to remain in place or that Franks was unable to leave the scene at any point. See Johnson v. City of Ferguson, 926 F.3d 504, 506 (8th Cir. 2019) (finding no seizure where plaintiff was not 'ordered to stop and to remain in place' and was 'able to leave the scene'). To the contrary, the evidence shows that Officer Olsten and the other officers did not attempt to make any arrests after Officer Olsten deployed pepper spray. . . There is also no evidence indicating that Officer Olsten deployed pepper spray with an intent to restrain Franks. According to Franks, Officer Olsten deployed pepper spray in retaliation against her for exercising her First Amendment rights. According to Officer Olsten, he deployed pepper spray to stop Brandy and to disperse the protestors. . . In either case, such a use of force is not a seizure. . . Because Franks must show that she was seized in order to establish a claim for excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment, and the record does not support a finding that Franks was seized, Officer Olsten is entitled to qualified immunity on Franks' excessive force claim. Furthermore, even if the record did contain evidence of a seizure under Torres, Officer Olsten would still be entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established in 2017 that use of pepper spray alone was a seizure. Cf. Quraishi, 986 F.3d at 840 (concluding it was not clearly established in 2014 that deploying tear-gas alone was a seizure). Accordingly, summary judgment will be granted to Officer Olsten on Count IV.")

Franks v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, No. 4:19 CV 2663 RWS, 2022 WL 1062035, at *9 (E.D. Mo. Apr. 8, 2022) (" '[A]n officer who fails to intervene to prevent the unconstitutional use of excessive force by another officer may be held liable for violating the Fourth Amendment.'. . The Eighth Circuit has not, however, recognized an officer's duty to intervene to prevent other constitutional violations. . . The Eighth Circuit has also held that 'there is no clearly established law regarding a duty to intervene outside of the excessive force context.'. . As discussed above, Officer Olsten is entitled to qualified immunity on Franks' excessive force claim because the record does not support a finding that Franks was seized, and it was not clearly established in 2017 that use of pepper spray alone was a seizure. Because a failure-to-intervene claim is dependent on an excessive force claim, Commissioner Hayden is entitled to qualified immunity on Franks' failure-to-intervene claim. To the extent that Franks' failure-to-intervene claim is based on Commissioner Hayden's alleged failure to intervene to prevent Officer Olsten from retaliating against her in violation of the First Amendment, Commissioner Hayden is entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established law regarding such a duty in 2017. Accordingly, summary judgment will be granted to Commissioner Hayden on Count V.")

Aldridge v. City of St. Louis, No. 4:18-CV-01677-SRC, 2022 WL 990643, at *11–15 (E.D. Mo. Mar. 31, 2022) ("Aldridge contends that Officer Olsten violated the Fourth Amendment by using excessive force. But objectively viewing the totality of the circumstances from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, 'in light of the facts and circumstances confronting him,'. . . and without the benefit of 20/20 hindsight, Graham, . . . the Court concludes that Olsten's use of pepper spray was reasonable, and thus he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The particular use of force that Officer Olsten deployed—here, a short burst of hand-held fog-canister pepper spray—also factors into the Court's analysis. . . As a tool of non-deadly force 'designed to be used as an alternative to physical contact (an intermediate option) between the officer and person(s) involved,'. . . the pepper spray performed its function of diffusing (and perhaps de-fusing) a threatening situation, without causing any (or at best anything but de minimis) physical injuries. The Court acknowledges that the Eighth Circuit has noted '[p]epper spray can cause more than temporary pain.'. . Aldridge himself does not allege any lasting physical injury, and for purposes of summary judgment does not attempt to prove any physical injury at all. . . Thus, Aldridge chose to leave the summary-judgment record devoid of whether and to what extent he may have experienced any physical injuries. . . . [T]he Court concludes that Officer Olsten's actions were not objectively unreasonable under the circumstances; he thus did not violate Aldridge's constitutional rights, and he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Even if the Court were to find that Officer Olsten violated Aldridge's constitutional rights when he used pepper spray to disperse the advancing protesters, the Court finds that the right was not clearly established at the time of the violation. Thus, even assuming a violation occurred, 'on these facts [Olsten] was at least entitled to qualified immunity.'. . . Unable to point to cases with similar facts, Aldridge argues instead that this case falls into the category of 'rare obvious cases,' and claims that he does not need to find an 'exact match' because 'a robust consensus of persuasive authority...clearly established that Officer Olsten violated Aldridge's First and Fourth Amendment constitutional rights.'. . According to Aldridge, the 'critical question is whether it was clearly established on September 29, 2017, that a police officer would violate the First and Fourth Amendments by gratuitously pepper spraying an individual who was not resisting arrest, not breaking any laws, but was merely protesting the police in a non-violent and non-threatening manner.'. .On the facts here—explained in detail above—the Court finds that this was not a 'rare obvious case' where the constitutional question is 'beyond debate.'. . And further, Aldridge's description of the 'critical question,' as he puts it, is not particularized to the facts of this case and is at a high level of generality. Aldridge himself may not have been 'resisting arrest,' or shouting threats like Brandy and other protesters, but the similarities to Aldridge's cited cases end there. On the facts here, an officer's use of pepper spray in these circumstances was not, as Aldridge claims, a 'gratuitous and completely unnecessary act of violence[.]'. . And the situation an officer in Aldridge's position faced here is unlike Treats v. Morgan, 308 F.3d 868, 874–75 (8th Cir. 2002), which involved an officer pepper spraying a lone inmate who posed no threat. Aldridge's other cases likewise are not particularized to the facts of this case—indeed, Aldridge himself does not claim otherwise, since he relies on the 'rare obvious case' exception. . . . In addition to the Court's conclusion that the officer's use of force in this situation was not objectively unreasonable, and that a constitutional violation did not occur, Aldridge has not met his burden to show that the right was clearly established.")

A.S. v. Lincoln County R-III School District, No. 4:19 CV 91 CDP, 2019 WL 6875560 (E.D. Mo. Dec. 17, 2019) ("The law is clearly established that students have First Amendment rights both on and off the school campus. But the law is not so clearly established regarding the degree of foreseeability or disruption to the school environment that must be shown under Tinker in order for school officials to limit a student's off-campus speech. . . Courts continue to face this difficult issue in protecting First Amendment values while being sensitive to a school administrator's need for a secure school environment. . . Given the uncertainty in this area of the law, I cannot conclude that any reasonable school administrator would have understood that she was violating a student's right to free speech by imposing punishment in the circumstances of this case. . . Lillard is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on A.S.'s First Amendment claim.")

Hyman v. Kirksey, No. 3:18-CV-230-DPM, 2019 WL 2323864, at *2 (E.D. Ark. May 30, 2019) ("The Court assumes, for purposes of the motion to dismiss, that Chief Kirksey suppressed the Hymans' speech. But the governing law wasn't clear enough when he did so for him to face a lawsuit for his actions. The Supreme Court hasn't yet spoken on this First Amendment issue. Two U.S. Courts of Appeals have. Davison, 912 F.3d at 666; Robinson v. Hunt County, Texas, 921 F.3d 440 (5th Cir. 2019). And only one District Court in the Eighth Circuit has addressed this type of claim. Campbell held that a state representative's Twitter account wasn't government speech. 367 F. Supp. 3d at 990-92. All these cases, though, were decided in 2019. Chief Kirksey deleted the Hymans' posts in April 2018. A handful of other District Courts have also wrestled with these First Amendment issues. E.g., McKercher v. Morrison, 2019 WL 1098935, at *4 (S.D. Cal. 8 Mar. 2019); One Wisconsin Now v. Kremer, 354 F. Supp. 3d 940 (W.D. Wis. 2019); Knight First Amendment Institute at Columbia University v. Trump, 302 F. Supp. 3d 541 (S.D.N.Y. 2018), appeal docketed, No. 18-1691 (2d Cir. 5 June 2018). The law is still percolating. The Court therefore cannot hold that the Hymans' right to be heard on the Department's Facebook page was clearly established in the spring of 2018. No binding precedent notified Chief Kirksey that selectively deleting citizens' posts from the interactive part of a Facebook page that invited public commentary clearly violated the First Amendment. The Hymans' federal and echoing state law claims against him fail as matter of law.")

Ivey v. Williams, No. CV 12-30 (DWF/TNL), 2019 WL 669805, at *4 (D. Minn. Feb. 19, 2019) ("Defendants argue further that the Kingsley analysis is not appropriate in the context of qualified immunity because the decision was released in 2015, while Defendants' alleged actions took place in 2011. . . They cite Hall v. Ramsey County to contend that the relevant question for excessive force in the context of qualified immunity is whether the plaintiff can demonstrate 'both that the official's conduct was conscience shocking, and that the official violated one or more fundamental rights that are deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition, and implicit in the concept of ordered liberty.'. . . The Court is unpersuaded. The Eighth Circuit applied the objective reasonableness standard to both qualified immunity and excessive force claims long before the Kingsley decision was released. See e.g., Wilson v. Spain, 20 F.3d 713, 716 (8th Cir. 2000) (asserting that "[t]he linchpin of qualified immunity is the objective reasonableness of the officer's actions; objective reasonableness is also applied in analyzing the merits of Fourth Amendment excessive-force claims); Nelson v. County of Wright, 162 F.3d 986, 989-990, 990 n.5 (8th Cir. 1998) (observing that the standard for determining qualified immunity is identical to the standard for deciding if the use of force was excessive and that both involve considerations of objective reasonableness). . . The Court finds that whether or not the Magistrate Judge relied on Kingsley, the objective reasonableness standard applies; because reasonable officers in Defendants' position would have likely understood that their conduct was violating Plaintiff's clearly established right to be free from excessive force, the Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Even if the 'shocks the conscience' standard applied, the result is the same. The Supreme Court has observed, the measure of what is conscience shocking is no calibrated yard stick,' but it does 'point the way.' . . Kingsley held that excessiveness is measured objectively and then identified various considerations to inform whether the governmental action was rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective. . . Therefore, 'Kingsley teaches that purposeful, knowing or (perhaps) reckless action that uses an objectively unreasonable degree of force is conscience shocking.'. . Here, a reasonable factfinder could conclude under both an objective reasonableness' or 'shocks the conscience' standard that Defendants' alleged actions were unnecessary and excessive, considering Plaintiff was already subdued and restrained when Defendants entered his room.")

Parada v. Anoka County, No. CV 18-795 (JRT/TNL), 2018 WL 3621210, at *5-6, *8 (D. Minn. July 30, 2018) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor the Eighth Circuit has expressly decided whether the Fourth Amendment 'permits a warrantless arrest for a misdemeanor when the alleged offense did not occur in the presence of the arresting officer.'. . Although the Eighth Circuit has not decided the issue, it has held that, '[b]ecause the law regarding warrantless misdemeanor arrests for offenses committed outside the presence of the arresting officer is not clearly established under the Fourth Amendment,' arresting officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . Because the law was not clear at the time of the arrest, the Court concludes that Oman is entitled to qualified immunity for any argument based on his lack of presence during Parada's commission of the crime. . . . The Court must decide whether it was clearly established at the time of the arrest that unreasonably prolonging a traffic stop and subsequently arresting someone under these circumstances violates the Fourth Amendment. Caballes and Rodriguez clearly establish that a seizure cannot extend beyond the time necessary to issue a traffic ticket. . . And while Parada cannot use Rule 6.01 to establish a Fourth Amendment violation, the Rule is evidence that Oman should know that a full custodial arrest is not necessary – and indeed not even allowed in Minnesota – to issue a citation for driving without a license. The Court concludes that Oman has not shown that he is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Parada's Fourth Amendment claim stemming from the initial arrest. The Court notes that this is the only Fourth Amendment theory that Parada can assert against Oman in his individual capacity. . . . Having established that Parada states a sufficient claim that her Fourth Amendment rights were violated, the Court must decide whether it was clearly established at the time of the arrest that law enforcement cannot detain an alien on suspicion of removability without probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed. It is clearly established that a warrantless arrest must be supported by probable cause of criminal activity, that unlawful presence is not a crime, and that an immigrant's possible removability is insufficient to give rise to probable cause. . . It is also clearly established that an ICE Detainer alone cannot support local law enforcement's continued detention of an alien. . . Oman cannot establish at this stage that he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ferguson v. Short, No. 2:14-CV-04062-NKL, 2017 WL 194282, at *4 (W.D. Mo. Jan. 17, 2017) ("Clearly, Defendants were on notice that it would be a constitutional violation to knowingly use fabricated evidence or unreliable evidence to convict a criminal defendant. But Defendants contend that they also had to know that falsifying evidence through one defendant to use against another defendant was unconstitutional. Qualified immunity, however, is intended to protect officers who do not know that they are doing something wrong. It is not intended to protect them if they knowingly do something wrong. Furthermore, to prove his fabrication claim, Ferguson must show that Defendants could foresee that their actions would injure Ferguson. It would be illogical to place that burden on Ferguson and then excuse the Defendants' actions because they didn't know the Court would find them responsible for their unconstitutional conduct under recognized common law standards.")

Ellington v. Piercy, No. 2:14-CV-04316-NKL, 2016 WL 2745868, at *6-7 (W.D. Mo. May 11, 2016) ("Having considered the precedent behind Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment allegations, the Court finds it 'beyond debate' that the erratic operation of a police vehicle—whether a car or a boat—can constitute an objectively unreasonable seizure. Eighth Circuit precedent has established that the manner in which an offer operates his vehicle may cause a Fourth Amendment violation. . . While the Eighth Circuit has not discussed Fourth Amendment seizures in the context of a water transport, Plaintiffs allege that Piercy drove at speeds exceeding 40 miles per hour across a crowded lake in a non-emergency situation. Such driving would bring Piercy's actions in line with those found unreasonable in Chambers: in both cases, a restrained suspect was subject to erratic driving, causing him physical injury. . . . The novel factual elements of Brandon's case—that he was being transported in a patrol boat across water and died by drowning—do not affect these underlying legal principles. The United States Supreme Court has 'expressly rejected a requirement that previous cases be "fundamentally similar."'. . Instead, because the central question of this inquiry is 'whether the state of the law at the time gave the officials fair warning their conduct was unlawful,' the 'contours of a right' may be sufficiently clear even if the factual situations are different. . . Although Piercy argues there is no clearly-established constitutional right where someone is 'improperly and incorrectly secured during transport over water after his arrest,'. . . Piercy does not show how the legal principles differ when a suspect is transported in a boat, as compared to cases where the suspect is transported in a car. The Court cannot say as a matter of law that 'a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was justified.'. .Consequently, Piercy had fair warning that his conduct was unlawful and cannot shield himself from Plaintiffs' Section 1983 claim alleging Fourth Amendment violations.")

Thomas v. Barze, 57 F. Supp. 3d 1040, 1068, 1071-75 (D. Minn. 2014) ("The Court concludes that here, where the idea and execution of the interview was entirely directed by the law enforcement officer rather than the school official, traditional Fourth Amendment principles, rather than the relaxed standards of TLO, apply. The Court will proceed to analyze the evidence in support of Thomas' unreasonable seizure and false arrest claims under traditional Fourth Amendment standards. However, to the extent that, for qualified immunity purposes, it was not clearly established in January 2012 that TLO would not apply in such circumstances in the Eighth Circuit, the Court also concludes that, even under TLO's relaxed standard, summary judgment for Barze and Mills would not be appropriate. . . .Having determined that a reasonable jury could conclude that Barze and Mills violated Thomas' rights under the Fourth Amendment, the Court must also consider whether those rights were clearly established in order to assess Barze's and Mills' claims that they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The officers should have known that a private meeting in an inner office which involved a pat-down at some point was excessively intrusive if the purpose of the meeting was to mentor Thomas or merely encourage him to not incite any potential fights. Even Matlock acknowledges that the 'mentoring' meeting turned wrong quickly, and a reasonable jury could conclude that the escalation was due to the officers', rather than Thomas', conduct. If that were the case, a reasonable officer should have known that such a seizure, which involved Thomas being placed into a choke hold, would not have been appropriate in scope given the initial fight-prevention rationale for the meeting. The Court therefore concludes that summary judgment for Barze and Mills on Thomas' claims for excessive force and false arrest is not appropriate and that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . .With regard to whether it was clearly established that not intervening would violate Thomas' constitutional rights, the Court concludes that any determination on whether intervention was warranted or necessary is contingent upon the jury's determination as to what was happening between Thomas and Barze, which is not yet determined. Given that Defendants have not moved for summary judgment on the excessive force claim against Barze, the Court takes the facts surrounding the physical altercation in a light most favorable to Thomas and concludes that a reasonable officer should have known to intervene and stop another officer from putting a student in a neck restraint or choke hold where such restraint was unprovoked. The Court therefore concludes that summary judgment on Thomas' excessive force claim against Mills is not warranted at this time and that Mills is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Robinson v. City of Minneapolis, 957 F.Supp.2d 1094, 1099 & n.3 (D. Minn. 2013) ("If Defendants caused Robinson only de minimis injuries, they are entitled to qualified immunity regardless of whether their use of force was justified ab initio.. . . Robinson argues that endorsing such a result will give police officers 'free license to rough up any suspect, regardless of the need to use force. That is hardly "reasonable" and thus contrary to the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against "unreasonable" seizures.'. . But 'roughing up' a suspect suggests causing far more than de minimis injury. And in any event, Robinson's concern is illusory. Chambers made clear, for conduct occurring after that case was decided, that the focus is on the force used and not its end result. . . Hence, officers cannot 'rough up' suspects with impunity going forward. A de minimis injury defense will shield officers from liability only for arrests occurring before June 6, 2011, the date Chambers was decided.")

R.S. ex rel. S.S. v. Minnewaska Area School Dist. No. 2149, 894 F.Supp.2d 1128, 1139, 1140 (D. Minn. 2012) ("The movement of student speech to the internet poses some new challenges, but that transition has not abrogated the clearly established general principles which have governed schools for decades. . . . The law on out-of-school statements by students can thus be summarized as follows: Such statements are protected under the First Amendment and not punishable by school authorities unless they are true threats or are reasonably calculated to reach the school environment and are so egregious as to pose a serious safety risk or other substantial disruption in that environment. R.S.'s Facebook wall postings were not true threats or threats of any kind. While her statements may have been reasonably calculated to reach a school audience, that possible fact is not sufficient to justify her punishment. The school defendants must also show that the statements posed a substantial disruptive effect. . . . [T]he general rule that schools may not regulate merely inappropriate out-of-school speech (as opposed to truly threatening or substantially disruptive speech) has been well-established for decades.")

Shepard v. Wapello County, 303 F.Supp.2d 1004, 1016 (S.D. Iowa 2003) ("At the time Sheriff Kirkendall discharged Shepard the applicable law was very well developed and gave one in Kirkendall's position 'fair warning' that discharging Shepard because he reported Craven's alleged misconduct and complained to a County Supervisor that the Sheriff's budget was inadequate would violate Shepard's rights under the First Amendment.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Manriquez v. Ensley, No. 20-16917, 2022 WL 3724101, at *4–6 & n.1 (9th Cir. Aug. 30, 2022) ("A reasonable officer should have noticed that the warrant authorized only the search of the motel room, not Manriquez's home.[1] [fn.1: The good-faith exception does not apply for that reason. . .The dissent suggests that the reasonableness standard for the good-faith exception is equivalent to our qualified immunity analysis. While there is admittedly substantial overlap between the two, the qualified immunity standard is more 'forgiving' than the requirements of the Fourth Amendment. . . For example, a court may hold that an officer's search does not fall within the good-faith exception based on analogous case law or even directly relevant authority from a sister circuit. But there still might not be 'clearly established' case law in our circuit to withstand qualified immunity. Cf. Jessop v. City of Fresno, 936 F.3d 937, 940 (9th Cir. 2019) (qualified immunity for officers who stole cash during a search because there is no clearly established law, even though their acts were "morally wrong" and unreasonable).] The wrinkle, however, is that a judge had orally authorized the search of Manriquez's home, even though the warrant was not physically amended to reflect that authorization. And Manriquez does not contend that the officers exceeded the scope of the search orally authorized by the judge. So the officers searched the home with the approval of an independent judiciary. But a facially deficient warrant may not be salvaged just because 'a [judge] authorized the search' or the search 'did not exceed the limits intended by the [judge].'. . The text of the Fourth Amendment requires the government to specify the place to be searched. . . And that requirement makes sense: the Fourth Amendment's particularity requirement curbs potential governmental abuse by informing people about the scope of the authorized search so that they can later challenge it. We thus hold that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment by relying on a facially deficient warrant in searching Manriquez's home. . . . Pointing to the Supreme Court's decision in Groh, . . . Manriquez argues Officers Lawrence and Ensley's conduct violated a right that was clearly established at the time the officers searched his home. In Groh, the Supreme Court held that officers who searched a plaintiff's home were not entitled to qualified immunity because the warrant failed to describe the items to be seized, a violation of clearly established law. . . . But the facts in Groh are distinguishable such that it could not have given clear notice to any reasonable officer that a search here would have been unconstitutional. First, the warrant in Groh was never valid because it never listed the things to be seized (and instead included the nonsensical reference to the property to be searched). . . The only way the officers could have remedied this deficiency was to contact a judge to approve the warrant. . . In contrast, the original warrant here was valid. The only issue is whether the court-approved amendment to the warrant was valid if the officers themselves did not make the ministerial change to the warrant. Put differently, unlike in Groh, where correcting the errors in the warrant would have required the officers to return to the judge, here the officers themselves could have validly corrected the warrant simply by adding the new location to it. That is a significant difference. Second, a lurking concern in Groh was that the judge who had approved the warrant may not have signed off on the full scope of items listed in the officers' warrant application. . . That problem does not present itself here. The recorded phone call leaves no doubt that the judge authorized Officers Lawrence and Ensley to search Manriquez's home in the manner it was searched. Under our qualified immunity doctrine, a right is 'clearly established' only if no 'reasonable officer' would believe that the challenged conduct was permissible. . . In our case, a reasonable officer could have believed—based on the lack of direct case law at the time—that he or she could execute a court-authorized search if: (1) the officer already has a valid warrant and (2) a judge orally authorized expanding the scope of that warrant, even if the officer forgot to mark that amendment in the warrant. In other words, a reasonable officer could have viewed physically amending a warrant as the sensible and preferred course of action—but not believe that his own error in failing to write down the court's amendment would prevent the warrant from being valid under the Fourth Amendment. . . We thus conclude that it was not clearly established then that the search of Manriquez's home violated the Fourth Amendment.")

Manriquez v. Ensley, No. 20-16917, 2022 WL 3724101, at *6-7 (9th Cir. Aug. 30, 2022) (Otake, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they searched Manriquez's home with a warrant that described a different location. But, as to the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry, I respectfully dissent. The Fourth Amendments particularity requirement is plain and clearly establishes the constitutional right; any reasonable officer would have understood that the failure to include the place to be searched on the warrant was constitutionally fatal. . . . I would conclude that Groh is indistinguishable in all material respects. As in Groh, here a neutral judge found there was probable cause to conduct the search. Likewise, the warrant here described with particularity only one of the two constitutional requirements. The warrant in Groh and the warrant here wholly failed to include the other constitutionally mandated description—the things to be seized in Groh and the place to be searched here. Groh thus forecloses the principle that close enough is good enough when a warrant completely omits one of the textual requirements in the Fourth Amendment.")

Garnier v. O'Connor-Ratcliff, 41 F.4th 1158, 1163, 1183-84 (9th Cir. 2022) ("The Garniers' claims present an issue of first impression in this Circuit: whether a state official violates the First Amendment by creating a publicly accessible social media page related to his or her official duties and then blocking certain members of the public from that page because of the nature of their comments. For the following reasons, we hold that, under the circumstances presented here, the Trustees have acted under color of state law by using their social media pages as public fora in carrying out their official duties. We further hold that, applying First Amendment public forum criteria, the restrictions imposed on the Garniers' expression are not appropriately tailored to serve a significant governmental interest and so are invalid. We therefore affirm the district court judgment. . . . . Until now, no Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court authority definitively answered the state action and First Amendment questions at issue in this case. '[A]bsent controlling authority,' 'a robust "consensus of cases of persuasive authority"' can clearly establish law for purposes of qualified immunity. . . But there was no such consensus here. At the time the Trustees blocked the Garniers from their pages in the fall of 2017, there were no court of appeals cases addressing similar facts. Only in the five years since the Trustees blocked the Garniers did four circuits decide cases concerning the First Amendment's application to the decisions of government officials to block members of the public from their government social media accounts. As discussed, applying similar modes of analysis, two of those circuits found First Amendment violations and one did not, while one circuit applied a different mode of analysis and found no violation. . . Whether or not those four cases (one vacated, see Biden v. Knight First Amend. Inst. at Colum. Univ., —— U.S. – ——, 141 S. Ct. 1220, 209 L.Ed.2d 519 (2021)), taken together, would constitute a sufficient consensus for qualified immunity purposes, the contours of the right asserted here were not at the time of the events in question '"sufficiently clear" that every "reasonable official would [have understood] that"' the actions taken violated that right. . . The Garniers attempt to avoid this conclusion by describing the right at issue in this case extremely generally, as the 'right to criticize public officials' free from retaliation. But the Supreme Court has exhorted us 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Given the novelty of applying the First Amendment and state action doctrines implicated here to the burgeoning public fora of social media, we cannot say that reasonable officials in the Trustees' position were on notice that blocking the Garniers from individual government officials' public social media pages could violate the First Amendment.") Seidner v. de Vries, 39 F.4th 591, 601-03 (9th Cir. 2022) ("[H]ere, we cannot say that a jury would be compelled to conclude that the way de Vries used his car to stop Seidner from fleeing was reasonable. A jury could conclude that de Vries should have taken additional steps to stop Seidner before using an intermediate level of force given Seidner's minor offense and the lack of any safety risk to de Vries or anyone else. It could also decide that cutting in front of de Vries quickly and denying him a chance to stop on his own was unreasonable under the circumstances. The balancing of competing interests simply does not clearly favor de Vries such that he is entitled to judgment as a matter of law on this issue; this is a decision for the factfinder. For all these reasons, we conclude that de Vries is not entitled to summary judgment on whether there was a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . Seidner . . . points to several cases that rely on Brower in holding that erecting a roadblock is a clearly established Fourth Amendment violation when it is likely to cause an unavoidable crash. . . . There are material differences between motorized and non-motorized vehicles. The most obvious difference is speed and its resulting consequence on impact. Motorized vehicles can go very fast, and high speeds were involved in the cases that Seidner cites. . . A bicycle cannot reach the same speeds, especially where a suspect is meandering in a residential area rather than racing or even riding on a roadway with vehicular traffic. The force from a bicycle with minimal weight that is traveling at relatively low speeds is also different from the force generated by a vehicle with significant weight that is traveling at high speeds. Of course, the vulnerability of a person riding a bicycle is greater as a general matter than a person enclosed in a vehicle that contains safety features like airbags and seatbelts. But all these variables demonstrate why a decision in one case often cannot clearly establish the nature of force used in a factually different case. . . In any event, Seidner has not cited, and we have not found, any case that squarely establishes 'beyond debate' that de Vries's actions constitute excessive force, . . . such that de Vries should have 'underst[oo]d that what he [wa]s doing [wa]s unlawful[.]". . Seidner's final argument, assuming Brower does not control, is that the law is clearly established that unnecessarily using deadly or significant force violates the Fourth Amendment. He cites Tennessee v. Garner . . . for support. . . .The Supreme Court has since noted that Garner's 'standards are cast at a high level of generality' and cautioned against using it to clearly establish the law in factually distinguishable situations. . . However de Vries's use of force in creating a roadblock is quantified, the law as it existed at the time of the incident did not clearly establish that his actions violated the Fourth Amendment.")

Seidner v. de Vries, 39 F.4th 591, 603-04, 609-11 (9th Cir. 2022) (Christen, J., concurring) ("I concur in the majority's decision to reverse the district court's judgment. Given the controlling standards for qualified immunity, the court correctly holds that no clearly established law would have provided adequate notice to a reasonable officer in Officer Jonathan de Vries's position that effectuating a traffic stop by sharply swerving a police vehicle into the path of Preston Seidner's bicycle constituted the use of deadly force. I write separately because it is important to establish that de Vries did employ this degree of force, and under the circumstances here, the force violated Seidner's constitutional rights. . . . The majority decides that de Vries used intermediate force rather than deadly force. I disagree. Under our precedent, swerving a vehicle to block the path of a moving cyclist without allowing sufficient distance for the cyclist to avoid a collision constitutes deadly force, because it undeniably involves the use of force that 'creates a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily injury.'. . But however this amount of force is characterized, the majority's concessions inescapably lead to the conclusion that the force de Vries used was constitutionally excessive on the facts of this case. . . . In sum, because Seidner disputes that he intended to flee and we construe disputed facts in the light most favorable to him, the most that can be said concerning this factor, even after considering the video evidence, is that Seidner was pedaling hard before the patrol car's lights were activated and he did not stop when the lights came on. Consideration of the offense(s) in this case did not justify the use of deadly force. . . . The circumstances surrounding Seidner's arrest were nothing like those in Abney or Coitrone. Far from weaving in and out of oncoming traffic on a motorcycle, exceeding the speed limit, and causing a chase that endangered other lives, Seidner was riding a bicycle on a well-lit deserted street, posing no safety threat to anyone. At the time de Vries stopped Seidner, it was clearly established that a seizure occurs when the government terminates freedom of movement through means intentionally applied. . . . On appeal, de Vries wisely abandons the argument that he did not intend to seize Seidner, but he continues to argue that the force he used was reasonable. I agree with the majority that we have no case law addressing the use of a police car to stop a bicycle, but we have an obligation to provide guidance where it is possible to do so, and I do not see room for debate about whether using an SUV to block the path of a bicycle, without allowing sufficient distance for the bike to avoid a collision, 'creates a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily injury.' I would so hold. I would also rule that de Vries's use of force was constitutionally excessive as a matter of law given application of the Graham factors to the surrounding circumstances. . . Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from the majority's Fourth Amendment excessive force analysis.")

David v. Kaulukukui, 38 F.4th 792, 802-04 (9th Cir. 2022) ("While Kaulukukui's arguments focus on whether a reasonable official could believe that the terms of a custody order are not affirmatively required to be included in a petition for a protective order, they do not address whether an official may reasonably believe she can deliberately conceal material custody information from a court for the purpose of depriving a custodial parent of her child. We conclude that any reasonable official would understand that the latter behavior—if proven—violates the law. As such, it is 'hardly conduct for which qualified immunity is either justified or appropriate.'. . . David sufficiently alleges that Kaulukukui participated in removing B.D. from her custody without a court order, placed B.D. in Keahiolalo's custody, and prevented David from having contact with B.D. or regaining custody. These allegations, if true, violate a clearly established constitutional right to familial association. Based on the allegations in the FAC, there was no reason, much less 'reasonable cause,' to believe that B.D. was in any 'imminent danger of serious bodily injury.'. . .Not only did Kaulukukui and the other Defendants remove B.D. and place her with someone they knew had no custodial rights without legal justification, David also alleges that they conspired to prevent her from filing a police report or otherwise having her claims regarding Keahiolalo's unlawful custody investigated. These allegations state a plausible claim for a violation of a clearly established constitutional right to familial association. . . .When the alleged events in this case occurred, the law clearly established that a parent and child's constitutional right to familial association is violated when a state official interferes with a parent's lawful custody through judicial deception. The law also clearly established that a state official cannot remove a child from a lawful custodial parent without consent or a court order unless the official has reasonable cause to believe that the child is in imminent danger and, even then, the scope and duration of the removal must be reasonable. Here, David has plausibly alleged that Kaulukukui violated these rights by deliberately failing to inform the family court of the Custody Order when assisting Keahiolalo in obtaining a TRO that prevented contact between David and B.D. and by assisting the other Defendants in removing B.D. from David's custody and separating them for 21 days. Kaulukukui may ultimately prove that David's allegations are false. But at the pleading stage, we must accept all well-pleaded factual allegations as true. . . As such, we conclude that Kaulukukui is not entitled qualified immunity at this early stage and affirm the district court's denial of her motion to dismiss.") Andrews v. City of Henderson, 35 F.4th 710, 719-20 (9th Cir. 2022) ("We hold that Blankenhorn clearly established—and thus 'put a prudent officer on notice'—that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by tackling and piling on top of a 'relatively calm,' non-resisting suspect who posed little threat of safety without any prior warning and without attempting a less violent means of effecting an arrest. . . As discussed above, these are the basic facts of this case when viewed in the light most favorable to Andrews. He was not fleeing, resisting arrest, or actively committing a crime, and the detectives knew that he was unarmed and specifically planned their tackle for that moment because of that knowledge. Accordingly, after Blankenhorn, it was 'beyond debate' that their actions were objectively unreasonable under the circumstances. . .The only relevant distinction between this case and Blankenhorn is the nature of the suspected crimes—trespass versus armed robbery. The detectives claim that this distinction warrants reversal because Blankenhorn is only factually similar when analyzed at an inappropriately 'high level of generality.'. . We reject this assertion. In both cases, the suspects posed no immediate threat to the officers or public safety when they were arrested. And other than the nature of the suspected crime, the facts of this case are either analogous to or more favorable to Andrews than the facts in Blankenhorn. For example, the suspect in Blankenhorn was 'rude, uncooperative, and verbally abusive' before his arrest. . . But here, Andrews had no interaction with the detectives before they tackled him so they had no sense of whether he would be cooperative or not. Accordingly, we hold that Blankenhorn involved sufficiently similar facts to 'move [this] case beyond the otherwise hazy borders between excessive and acceptable force.'. .This conclusion is further buttressed by our precedent clearly establishing that a suspect's previous violent conduct does not justify non-trivial force where the suspect poses no immediate safety threat. . . .In sum, it was clearly established before the events of this case that the Fourth Amendment prohibits multiple officers from physically tackling a 'relatively calm' suspect without providing any warning where the suspect is not posing an immediate danger to anyone, resisting arrest, or trying to flee unless the officers first attempt a less intrusive means of arrest.")

Hughes v. Rodriguez, 31 F.4th 1211, 1218-24 (9th Cir. 2022) ("While Scott involved dashcam video footage, courts have since applied its logic to other types of evidence capable of objectively disproving witness testimony. See Coble v. City of White House, 634 F.3d 865, 868–69 (6th Cir. 2011) (audio from dashcam footage); Curran v. Aleshire, 800 F.3d 656, 663 (5th Cir. 2015) (still photographs); McManemy v. Tierney, 970 F.3d 1034, 1038 (8th Cir. 2020) (taser log); White v. Georgia, 380 Fed. App'x 796, 797 (11th Cir. 2010) (uncontradicted medical testimony). As the Sixth Circuit concluded in Coble, there is 'nothing in the Scott analysis that suggests that it should be restricted to cases involving videotapes. The Scott opinion does not focus on the characteristics of a videotape, but on the "record."'. . We agree with the Sixth Circuit and find that, for purposes of ruling on a motion for summary judgment, a district court may properly view the facts in the light depicted by bodycam footage and its accompanying audio, to the extent the footage and audio blatantly contradict testimonial evidence. . . . [W]hile we view the facts blatantly contradicted by the bodycam footage in the light depicted by the videotape and its audio to conclude that Hughes did not attempt to surrender to the officers, we must view all other facts, including the allegation of the post-handcuff beating, in the light most favorable to Hughes. . . . The portion of Hughes's testimony that was not blatantly contradicted by the bodycam footage creates a triable issue of material fact as to whether Hughes was beaten and bitten after he was handcuffed in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . .While the initial use of the dog was clearly proportional to the threat posed by Hughes before he was handcuffed, whether the post-handcuff beating and dog-biting occurred, and whether it was proportional to the threat Officer Michael Rodriguez reasonably perceived by a handcuffed Hughes, are questions for the trier of fact. . . . [I]t is clearly established law that beating a handcuffed convict violates the Eighth Amendment. . . . And 'no particularized case law is necessary for a deputy to know that excessive force has been used when a deputy sics a canine on a handcuffed arrestee who has fully surrendered and is completely under control.'. . We hold that Officer Michael Rodriguez is not entitled to qualified immunity under § 1983 as to the claimed post-handcuff beating and dog-biting.")

Russell v. Lumitap, 31 F.4th 729, 738-45 (9th Cir. 2022) ("[T]he standard governing claims for inadequate medical care has changed since Russell's death. After our decision in Clouthier, the Supreme Court cautioned in Kingsley v. Hendrickson. . . that claims brought by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment should not necessarily be evaluated under the same standard as claims brought by convicted prisoners under the Eighth Amendment. . . Kingsley addressed a claim brought by a pretrial detainee that jail officers had used excessive force against him. . .The Court held that a defendant bringing such a claim need not show subjective deliberate indifference; he need only demonstrate 'that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . In Gordon v. County of Orange, we extended the Supreme Court's reasoning in Kingsley to claims for inadequate medical care brought by pretrial detainees. . . . Thus the subjective second prong of Clouthier has been replaced by an objective standard: A defendant can be liable even if he did not actually draw the inference that the plaintiff was at a substantial risk of suffering serious harm, so long as a reasonable official in his circumstances would have drawn that inference. Under this objective reasonableness standard, a plaintiff must 'prove more than negligence but less than subjective intent—something akin to reckless disregard.'. . . The primary issue in this case is the third prong of the Gordon test. As we explained, the subjective deliberate indifference prong of the Clouthier test that governed inadequate medical care claims at the time of Russell's death has since been replaced by Gordon's objective prong. An officer is entitled to qualified immunity unless the unlawfulness of his conduct was clearly established at the time that he acted . . . and the law at the time that the defendants acted was different than it is now. However, we held in Sandoval v. County of San Diego that 'when we assess qualified immunity for a claim of inadequate medical care of a pre-trial detainee arising out of an incident that took place prior to Gordon, we ... "concentrate on the objective aspects of the [pre-Gordon] constitutional standard" to evaluate whether the law was clearly established.'. . Thus, to determine whether the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, we do not consider whether they subjectively understood that Russell faced a substantial risk of serious harm. . . Rather, we conduct 'an objective examination of whether established case law would make clear to every reasonable official that the defendant's conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Applying Sandoval's approach here, to defeat qualified immunity the plaintiffs must show that, given the available case law at the time, a reasonable official, knowing what Dr. Le, Nurse Teofilo, Nurse Trout, and Nurse Lumitap knew, would have understood that their actions 'presented such a substantial risk of harm to [Russell] that the failure to act was unconstitutional.'. . Their 'actual subjective appreciation of the risk is not an element of the established-law inquiry.'. . . Like the plaintiffs in Plemmons, Tlamka, and Estate of Carter, Russell was displaying 'classic' and 'obviously severe'. . . symptoms of a heart attack. And like the officials in Tlamka, Dr. Le and the nurses halted treatment 'with no good or apparent explanation for the delay ....'. . . Dr. Le knew that the intervention plan under the Standardized Procedures for angina pectoris had been initiated when Russell was given a first dose of nitroglycerin, yet he did not recommend continuing this line of treatment—which called for the administration of up to two more doses of nitroglycerin within as little as five minutes after the first dose, and hospitalization. As in Clouthier, it should have been clear to Dr. Le that Russell was at severe risk based on Nurse Trout's call relaying his symptoms and the recommendation of the Standardized Procedures to hospitalize Russell under these circumstances. . . Unlike Simmons, it is reasonable to infer—and so, again, at this stage we must . . . that a reasonable person in Dr. Le's position would have been aware that the risk to Russell was 'imminent'. . . due to the severity and nature of the symptoms and the 'obvious'. . . nature of the risk, as demonstrated in part by the fact that the Standardized Procedures called for an immediate call to paramedics under these circumstances. Nevertheless, without explanation or examination, Dr. Le did not recommend that Nurse Trout conform her treatment to the Standardized Procedures. As in Ortiz, Dr. Le made his recommendation without examining his patient despite his knowledge of Russell's ominous symptoms, and disregarded a clear signal—the ineffectiveness of the dose of nitroglycerin—that Russell's condition was potentially fatal. . . While Dr. Le recommended Motrin and a mental-health screening, clearly established law at the time provided that Russell need not 'prove complete failure to treat' because 'access to medical staff is meaningless unless that staff is competent and can render competent care.'. . A reasonable jury could conclude that Dr. Le had been deliberately indifferent. Under these circumstances, taking the facts most favorably to the plaintiffs, Dr. Le could not have reasonably believed based on the clearly established law as it stood then that he could provide constitutionally adequate care without even examining a patient with Russell's symptoms who had not responded to a dose of nitroglycerin. Therefore, the district court was correct in denying summary judgment on qualified immunity to Dr. Le. . . . However, when Nurse Trout called Dr. Le and told him all of the symptoms that Russell had been experiencing, Dr. Le did not recommend hospitalizing him. Even though Russell was experiencing classic symptoms of a heart attack, Dr. Le recommended Motrin and a mental-health screening. No clearly established law would have put a reasonable nurse in Nurse Trout's position on notice that she could violate Russell's constitutional rights even while relying on Dr. Le's evaluation and recommendation. Therefore, Nurse Trout is entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity. A jury could not, on the facts pleaded, reasonably conclude that Nurse Trout was deliberately indifferent. Though perhaps she should have called paramedics, her having promptly called the physician on call and followed his instructions cannot be categorized as deliberate indifference. . . . Drawing all inferences in plaintiff's favor, a reasonable person in Nurse Lumitap's position would have inferred that Russell was at serious risk if not hospitalized. By the time she came on duty at 7:00 am, Dr. Le's advice was 5½ hours old and Russell's symptoms were much worse than when Dr. Le had been called. The record shows that, like Nurses Teofilo and Trout, Nurse Lumitap knew that Dr. Le had evaluated Russell over the phone and had not recommended hospitalization. However, Nurse Lumitap was responsible for Russell's care from around 7:00 am until 12:20 pm, between 5½ to 11 hours after Dr. Le had made his recommendation to administer Motrin. A reasonable factfinder could conclude that, after so much time had elapsed, and in the face of Russell's rapidly deteriorating condition, Nurse Lumitap was no longer in a position to reasonably rely on Dr. Le's recommendation from the night before without calling him again. She did not call for paramedics until Russell was unresponsive, and at no point did she call Dr. Le or any other physician for an updated recommendation in light of Russell's worsening symptoms. Her decision not to call Dr. Le (or whichever physician was then on call) at any point during that period suffices to raise a genuine dispute over whether it was clearly established that the care she provided was constitutionally adequate. Therefore, the district court was correct in denying qualified immunity to Nurse Lumitap. . . Although Nurse Trout is shielded by qualified immunity because her actions did not violate then-existing clearly established law, there is at least a genuine dispute of material fact over whether Dr. Le's and Nurses Teofilo's and Lumitap's conduct violated clearly established law as it then stood. Therefore, we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Nurse Trout, and we affirm its denial of qualified immunity to Dr. Le and Nurses Teofilo and Lumitap.")

Estate of Aguirre v. County of Riverside, 29 F.4th 624, 629-30 (9th Cir. 2022) ("Because the Najeras have presented facts sufficient to establish a Fourth Amendment violation, we consider the second prong of qualified immunity: whether the law was clearly established. The Supreme Court's recent decision in Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna is instructive. As the Court explained, in an 'obvious case,' the standards set forth in Graham and Garner, though 'cast "at a high level of generality,"' can 'clearly establish' that a constitutional violation has occurred 'even without a body of relevant case law.'. . This is one of those obvious cases. Deadly force is not justified '[w]here the suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others.'. . Assuming that Najera posed no immediate threat to Ponder or others at the time of his death, this 'general constitutional rule' applies 'with obvious clarity' here and renders Ponder's decision to shoot Najera objectively unreasonable. . . Although no 'body of relevant case law' is necessary in an 'obvious case' like this one, our precedents also put Ponder 'on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful.'. . We emphasize that only cases that predate the incident are relevant to the 'clearly established' inquiry. . . Two cases published about three years before the April 2016 incident, Hayes v. County of San Diego and George v. Morris, made 'clear to a reasonable officer' that a police officer may not use deadly force against a non-threatening individual, even if the individual is armed, and even if the situation is volatile. . . . Critical disputes of fact render summary judgment premature. We cannot assume the jury's role to resolve the disputed question whether Najera presented an immediate threat. Accepting Najera's version of the facts—as we must at this stage—the bedrock standards set forth in Graham and Garner and the factual similarity of Hayes and Morris put the officer's constitutional violation 'beyond debate.'. . We affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Ponder.")

Turner v. Johnigan, No. 20-55835, 2022 WL 823479, at *2 (9th Cir. Mar. 18, 2022) (not reported) ("Neither Mattos nor Meyers put Johnigan on notice that her taser use was excessive. Unlike both sets of circumstances presented in Mattos II, Turner: (1) was suspected of committing two serious felonies (attempted robbery and threatening to commit rape), . . .); (2) engaged in a scuffle with Officer Kong; and (3) continued to resist Kong and other officers, by holding a metal grate and pulling his arm away from them, until he was finally fully handcuffed. The facts in Meyers are closer to the circumstances presented by Turner's case, but Meyers is distinguishable because Turner had not submitted to being handcuffed when he was tased the final time. Given this case law, Turner did not meet his burden of establishing that existing controlling precedent, or precedent embraced by a 'consensus' of courts outside our circuit, squarely governed Johnigan's use of force. . . Nor is Johnigan's taser use so patently violative of constitutional rights that a reasonable officer would know without guidance from the courts that Johnigan's taser use was unconstitutional.")

Turner v. Johnigan, No. 20-55835, 2022 WL 823479, at *2-6 (9th Cir. Mar. 18, 2022) (Christen, J., concurring in the judgment) (not reported) ("I concur in the court's memorandum disposition reversing the district court's order denying Officer Stephanie Johnigan qualified immunity. In my view this is a very close call, but I conclude that no clearly established law at the time of Turner's arrest would have provided adequate notice to a reasonable officer in Johnigan's position that her taser use was excessive. I write separately because relevant case law has developed since Turner's arrest and most cases involving qualified immunity are decided in memorandum dispositions that rely on a lack of clearly established law and thus provide little guidance to trial courts. Absent mention of case law issued after the events in Turner's case, our memorandum disposition might convey an inaccurate picture of the current state of the law on a fact pattern that frequently arises in excessive force cases. . . .Johnigan activated her taser eleven times for a total of fifty-three seconds over a period of about two minutes and eight seconds, and the record shows that Johnigan used dart mode at least once. From the bodycam video it appears that Johnigan used drivestun mode the last three or four times she activated her taser. . . Whether Johnigan deployed her taser in dart mode or drivestun mode for applications two through eleven, there is no question the taser inflicted a significant degree of pain. . . . In this case, it is not clear that Turner was fully restrained prior to the final taser deployment, nor that he had stopped resisting. . . . By the time Johnigan tased Turner the final time, he was no longer holding the grate but he continued to resist the attempts to secure the second handcuff. Ninth Circuit case law makes clear that 'officers must reassess use of force in an evolving situation as the circumstances change.'. . I agree with the district court that questions of fact prevented entry of summary judgment on the reasonableness of Johnigan's use of force because it is not clear whether Turner was fully restrained when Johnigan deployed her taser the final time. . . Ninth Circuit case law relevant to this appeal has developed since Turner's arrest. [Judge discusses Jones v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't , 873 F.3d 1123 (9th Cir. 2017) and Hyde v. City of Willcox, 23 F.4th 863 (9th Cir. 2022).] Turner did not meet his burden of establishing that existing controlling precedent, or precedent embraced by a 'consensus' of courts outside our circuit, squarely governed Johnigan's use of force. . . I therefore concur in the court's conclusion that Johnigan is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Our case law clearly establishes that: (1) even if the use of intermediate force is justified at the outset of an officer's encounter with a suspect, that level of force may become excessive as circumstances change, Hyde, 23 F.4th at 871; (2) officers may not tase an individual who is fully restrained and not resisting, id. at 872; and (3) a suspect need not be handcuffed to be fully restrained, id. at 871–72.")

Turner v. Johnigan, No. 20-55835, 2022 WL 823479, at *2 (9th Cir. Mar. 18, 2022) (Zouhary, J., concurring in part) (not reported) ("I agree with the decision to reverse the district court denial of qualified immunity based on the 'clearly established' prong. However, I find that the force used in this case was excessive as a matter of law. I write separately to provide some context on the undisputed facts. . . .Turner was pinned facedown on the sidewalk by four officers, and two additional officers had hobbled his legs with a strap. A handcuff had been secured to his right wrist, and officers were holding onto his left arm as they worked to free his left-hand grip on the metal grate. Turner never attempted to get up or otherwise reacted violently, and there were no bystanders in the area. He made no threats or threatening movements toward officers. There was also no suspicion that he was armed or in danger of being able to grab a weapon. In all, the video corroborates the LAPD's own internal investigation, which determined that Turner was not 'violently resisting' and therefore Johnigan's taser usage was 'out of policy.' Importantly, at no point during this encounter did Johnigan -- or any other officer -- attempt to verbally engage Turner in an effort to convince him to calm down and release his left hand from the grate. Instead of deescalating the situation, Johnigan continued tasing Turner, even after it was clear he was not a threat. . . While true that some force here was reasonable, the force must be reasonable throughout the entire encounter. . . As additional officers arrived and Turner's ability to move decreased, the situation evolved -- the need for the use of force diminished. . . Exactly what took place during the initial taser burst may be in dispute. But the video evidence reveals that, at the time of Johnigan's second taser sequence, Turner's resistance had diminished considerably, and consisted only of holding onto the metal grate with his left hand. He was outnumbered, pinned facedown, and unable to move. By this point, Turner no longer posed a legitimate threat to the safety of officers or others, much less an 'immediate threat.'. . This Court has recognized that this is the most important factor in considering if force was constitutionally excessive. . . Because the video evidence resolves any material factual disputes, I find the force used during the final and separate taser sequence excessive as a matter of law.")

Wright v. Penzone, No. 20-16275, 2022 WL 819802, at *2 (9th Cir. Mar. 17, 2022) (not reported) ("The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Wright maintains that his right not to be punished as a pretrial detainee was clearly established, but the appropriate inquiry is whether it was clearly established that a substantive due process violation would result from Wright's confinement in Closed Custody in these circumstances. At the time of Wright's confinement, binding law from the Supreme Court and in the Ninth Circuit would not have given the defendants fair notice that their conduct would result in a substantive due process violation. Although Wright cites decisions of other circuits, we cannot say that those decisions placed the question 'beyond debate.'. . We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to these defendants in their personal capacities.")

Senn v. Smith, No. 21-35293, 2022 WL 822198 (9th Cir. Mar. 18, 2022) (not reported) ("In sum, every reasonable officer had notice at the time of the incident that, if reasonable alternatives are available, even in somewhat chaotic circumstances, he or she cannot pepper-spray a person who has committed no serious crime and who is not a threat to anyone's safety.")

Senn v. Smith, No. 21-35293, 2022 WL 822198 (9th Cir. Mar. 18, 2022) (not reported) (Bea, J., dissenting) ("I part ways with my colleagues on one issue: whether the applicable Fourth Amendment law was clearly established in 2016, the time of the protest at Portland City Hall. We have set a high bar for when a constitutional rule is clearly established. The constitutional rule must be fact-specific: Senn must point to 'prior case law that articulates a constitutional rule specific enough to alert [this defendant, Smith,] in this case that [his] particular conduct was unlawful.'. . And the constitutional rule must be clear: '[E]xisting precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . In my view, the law here fails both criteria. First, the legal rules the majority cites are not sufficiently specific. At a high level of generality, Ninth Circuit case law does speak to the individual legal issues in this case (i.e., what constitutes active resistance and what actions pose a threat to police officers). But the majority's cases are all factually distinguishable. Most notably, none involved the precise context at issue here: one police officer assessing in real-time whether a second officer was under threat from a protestor who reached out to grab the second officer's arm. . . .Second, and following from my first point, the constitutional rules here were not 'beyond debate.'. . In large part because of the factual distinctions between this case and the precedent cited by the majority, I see plenty of room for debate on the constitutional question here: whether, at the time of the 2016 protest, Senn had a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to not be pepper sprayed in this case's factual circumstances. All told, for the law here to be clearly established, Officer Smith must have been 'plainly incompetent' not to know that Senn poised no serious harm to the other officer and then to do what he did at Portland City Hall. . . In my view, Smith was not. He thus should benefit from qualified immunity's shield from liability. I respectfully dissent.")

AG Private Protection, Inc., No. 20-16428, 2021 WL 5600235, at *2-3 (9th Cir. Nov. 30, 2021) (not reported) ("Our analysis of reasonableness in Cortesluna v. Leon provides a useful comparison and was not addressed by the Supreme Court's recent reversal solely on the issue of whether the officer in Cortesluna violated clearly established law and thus is entitled to qualified immunity. . . In Cortesluna, we held that, '[t]aking Plaintiff's version of the facts as true,' an officer's use of intermediate force was unreasonable in a case in which the officer 'lean[ed] too hard on [the suspect's] back' while the suspect was prone, had been previously injured by other officers, and was 'not resisting' and 'no longer posed a risk.'. . The facts here are even more suggestive that Fliehr's tasering was unreasonable, given that the suspect in Cortesluna was shot by beanbag rounds and was undisputedly moving while 'lying face down on the ground.'. . . We conclude that, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, 'a reasonable officer would have had fair notice that the force employed was unlawful.'. . As our citations to Bryan, LaLonde, Johnson, Jones, and Guy make clear, it was clearly established at the time of these events that an officer has a significantly diminished interest in even the use of an intermediate level of force, such as a taser, after a suspect has been rendered helpless. In Jones, for example, we denied qualified immunity to an officer who applied 'continuous, repeated, and simultaneous tasings' to a suspect who posed no 'immediate or significant risk of serious injury or death to the officers.'. . If the jury concluded factually that Rushing did not pose an immediate threat because after being shot three times he laid still, face down, with his hands visible, in a pool of his own blood, any reasonable officer should have known that repeated tasings of Rushing violated clearly established law on excessive force.")

Ballou v. McElvain, 29 F.4th 413, 426-27 (9th Cir. 2022), amending opinion reported at 14 F.4th 1042 (9th Cir. 2021) ("Ballou contends that McElvain denied her promotion at least in part on account of her sex; the conduct she alleges falls squarely within the constitutional prohibition outlined in Lindsey and Bator. Given Lindsey and Bator, McElvain is not entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that he discriminatorily denied Ballou a promotion. . . . The actions alleged here are so closely analogous to those identified in Lindsey and so clearly covered by Bator's focus on promotion that any reasonable officer would recognize discriminatorily conducting an investigation to stall a promotion as unconstitutional under the two cases, read in combination. . . .McElvain is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that he encouraged and sustained discriminatory investigations into Ballou's workplace performance and thereby denied her promotion at least in part on the basis of sex. As Ballou's disparate treatment claim alleged that McElvain violated her clearly established rights under the Equal Protection Clause, McElvain is not entitled to qualified immunity on that claim.")

Melnik v. Dzurenda, 14 F.4th 981, 984-90 (9th Cir. 2021) ("We conclude that Defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity because Melnik had a constitutional right under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to be permitted to examine documentary evidence for use in the prison disciplinary hearing. We further conclude that this right was clearly established at the time when Melnik was denied access to the material. . . . Many courts have held that for the right articulated in Wolff to mean anything, a prisoner must also have the right to access evidence that he might use in preparing or presenting his defense. [collecting cases] . . . . Applying [the] first prong of the qualified immunity analysis to the facts of this case, we conclude that Melnik had a constitutional right to see the envelopes or copies of them, as they were evidence to be used in his prison disciplinary hearing. Melnik had a protected liberty interest at stake as he faced administrative segregation. . . He requested the evidence with sufficient clarity. No legitimate penological reason was identified to justify the denial of access. Melnik had a constitutional due process right that was violated, so Defendants cannot prevail on the first qualified immunity prong. . . . We conclude that his right to access that documentary evidence was clearly established and that the factors pointed to by Defendants did not make the right any less clear.")

Melnik v. Dzurenda, 14 F.4th 981, 990-93 (9th Cir. 2021) (Bennett, J., dissenting) ("I agree that prisoners in disciplinary proceedings now have a qualified right to access the prison's evidence against them. . . But in my view, that right was established in our circuit today—by the majority's opinion. Because defendants did not violate clearly established law, I would hold that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. I therefore respectfully dissent. . . . The Supreme Court has not clearly established a prisoner's right to access the evidence against him in a disciplinary proceeding. In Wolff v. McDonnell . . . the Court recognized that a prisoner facing disciplinary proceedings has the right to: (1) advanced written notice of the disciplinary charges; (2) an opportunity to call witnesses and present documentary evidence in his defense, consistent with institutional safety or correctional goals; and (3) a written statement by the factfinder of the evidence relied on and the reasons for the disciplinary action. . . Nowhere in Wolff did the Court decide that a prisoner must also have access to the prison's evidence against him. The majority suggests that Wolff implicitly recognized a prisoner's right to compile evidence in his defense. . . But I doubt a passing comment on the prison's ability to limit the compilation of evidence can constitute a clearly established right. . . .There are many published decisions that discuss the rights that Wolff did establish, such as the qualified right to call witnesses and present evidence. . . But there are no published cases that discuss whether the prison must disclose its evidence. Thus, it is hardly surprising that the majority cannot cite a single Supreme Court or Ninth Circuit case that establishes a prisoner's right to access the prison's evidence (let alone identify when that right was established in our circuit). . . Instead, every cited case either comes from out of circuit or concerns one of the expressly enumerated Wolff rights. Of course, 'we may look at unpublished decisions and the law of other circuits, in addition to Ninth Circuit precedent.'. . But even that persuasive authority is unclear. Our unpublished decisions are conflicted on whether a prisoner can compel the prison to disclose its evidence against him. . . And although the majority correctly notes that several other circuits have recognized that prisoners must be able to access the prison's evidence, the Fourth Circuit is only a recent member of that group. . . A qualified right of access to evidence is now clearly established in the Fourth Circuit, see Lennear v. Wilson, 937 F.3d 257, 269 (4th Cir. 2019), but that was not the case in 2015, when the Nevada prison officials denied Melnik access to the letter. . . . So, in sum, we have no Supreme Court and no Ninth Circuit precedent establishing the right. A majority of other circuits recognize the right, but as of 2015, at least one circuit had declined to do so. And our unpublished decisions conflict as to whether the right exists. Even if this precedent might suggest the right exists, the 'clearly established' inquiry asks whether the existence of the right has been placed beyond debate. I believe the precedent here falls far short of that standard. . . There are panels of our own circuit and a published decision from another circuit that disagree with the majority's opinion. In these circumstances, we cannot ask state officials to predict which decisions are right and which decisions are wrong. . . Nor is it fair to say that the defendants were on notice that the right was clearly established because the prison regulations require disclosure of evidence. . . . AR 707 is not descriptive of the prisoner's constitutional rights. . . AR 707 doesn't even align with the constitutional right as described in the majority's opinion, which allows the prison to limit disclosure for reasons other than confidentiality. . . Moreover, the rules and regulations concerning the disclosure of evidence often extend much further than the Constitution requires. . . Thus, AR 707 does not put officials on notice of a prisoner's constitutional right to disclosure of evidence against him. . . . A state official who looked at Wolff, then looked at our circuit's caselaw (or lack thereof), and then resorted to nonprecedential authority, would be left with at least some uncertainty about what the rule in our circuit was before today. The consequence of the majority's decision is that six Nevada officials will be personally liable for conduct that we have only now decided is unconstitutional. . . Thus, I respectfully dissent.")

Chavez v. Robinson, 12 F.4th 978, 1000 (9th Cir. 2021) ("Chavez has not identified any case holding that a convicted sex offender participating in a treatment program as a condition of probation or supervised release is entitled to counsel before complying with the requirement (typical of such programs) to admit the conduct underlying the conviction, even if such admission has the potential to prejudice a potential retrial after a successful appeal. Given that clearly established law must be 'particularized to the facts of the case,'. . . , we cannot say that Robinson and Moore were 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowingly violate[d] the law[.]'. . Accordingly, Robinson and Moore are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . We therefore affirm the dismissal of Chavez's right-to-counsel claim.")

Chavez v. Robinson, 12 F.4th 978, 1010-13 (9th Cir. 2021) (Berzon, J., concurring in part in the judgment and dissenting in part) ("Once it is established that Chavez has a cause of action under § 1983, it is clear that his claim is not barred by qualified immunity: Antelope 'clearly established' the constitutional right that Chavez alleges was violated. . . Again, Antelope held that 'revok[ing] ... supervised release as a result of [a criminal defendant's] refusal to disclose his sexual history without receiving immunity from prosecution ... violate[s] his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.'. . That is precisely what happened here. Chavez and was told to 'admit or go to jail.' When he declined to give details of his sexual history, he was, as promised, sent to jail. He was not offered immunity until after his second jail sanction, and he had until then no realistic opportunity to seek it. Any 'representation that Chavez would be given immunity' prior to that point, . . . is irrelevant; at the time he invoked his Fifth Amendment rights, Chavez had neither been offered nor 'receiv[ed] immunity from prosecution[.]'. . As Antelope's holding directly controls, there is 'clearly established law [that is] "particularized" to the facts of the case.'. . I would therefore hold that Chavez's Fifth Amendment claim may proceed. . . . With respect to Chavez's Sixth Amendment claim, it is not altogether clear whether the majority has ruled only that the claim is barred by qualified immunity or has instead reached the merits of the Sixth Amendment issue. To the extent the majority decides this question only on the grounds of qualified immunity, I agree that Chavez's Sixth Amendment claim (incorporated to the states via the Fourteenth Amendment, . . . is barred by qualified immunity, because it remains an open question whether Chavez was denied access to counsel at a 'critical stage' of his case. But to the extent that the majority indicates Chavez was not 'denied counsel on appeal' because he had access to counsel at other stages of his appeal or because the Sixth Amendment does not apply to supervised release proceedings, . . . the majority misconstrues the nature of Chavez's claim and of the Sixth Amendment's protections. I would therefore affirm on the Sixth Amendment issue only, and explicitly, on the ground that Chavez has not alleged a violation of a clearly established constitutional rule. Chavez asserts that Robinson and Moore violated his right to counsel by refusing to allow him to consult with his attorney when he was forced to decide whether to admit to his crimes as a part of his treatment program. Chavez contends that, because defendants forced him to 'admit or go to jail,' and admitting to the conduct underlying his convictions would have decimated his chances of winning a retrial, making it 'pointless to pursue an appeal,' he was effectively deprived of his right to be represented at a critical stage of his appeal—the decision whether to continue or to abandon his appeal. . . . Chavez's claim is that he was denied the right to consult with his counsel at a particularly critical moment—when Robinson and Moore demanded that he waive his Fifth Amendment privilege and make incriminating admissions regarding the conduct underlying his convictions. It is immaterial to that claim that he had access to counsel at other points during his appeal. The question, rather, is whether Chavez was denied counsel at a critical stage' of prosecution—any step of a criminal proceeding 'that h[olds] significant consequences for the accused.'. . That Chavez was represented 'during the appellate court's actual decisional process,'. . . is not dispositive of that question. . . . Whether Chavez was denied counsel at a 'critical stage' of his appeal when he was not permitted to consult with his attorney about whether to make the potentially self-incriminating statements is therefore an open question on the merits. . . . Nonetheless, it is not necessary for us to conduct this fact-specific analysis here, because, as the majority explains, neither Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470, 120 S.Ct. 1029, 145 L.Ed.2d 985 (2000), nor Cahill v. Rushen, 678 F.2d 791 (9th Cir. 1982), clearly establishes the right Chavez asserts, and thus his right-to-counsel claim is foreclosed by qualified immunity. I write separately, however, to emphasize that Chavez's right-to-counsel claim is foreclosed on this ground only. Neither the fact that he had counsel at other stages of his appeal nor the fact that the Sixth Amendment is inapplicable to supervised release proceedings has any bearing on his claim. For the foregoing reasons, I respectfully concur in the judgment as to the Sixth Amendment qualified immunity issue but dissent with regard to the Fifth Amendment § 1983 issue and the majority's reasoning on the Sixth Amendment question.")

Valenzuela v. City of Anaheim, No- 20-55372, 2021 WL 3362847, at * (9th Cir. Aug. 3, 2021) (not reported) ("Here, Anaheim police officers kept Valenzuela in multiple, extended choke holds even as he gagged, wheezed, turned purple, and screamed that he could not breathe—behavior we have previously identified as 'severe force 'capable of causing death or serious injury.'. . The officers did so even though the City's interest in such force was low: Valenzuela was not suspected of a serious crime, he was half-naked and visibly unarmed, and he was at times subdued, with two officers holding down his arms as the third kept him in a choke hold. Moreover, the officers placed Valenzuela in the restraint more times—and kept him there for longer—than their training permitted. . . . For the second prong, at the time of Valenzuela's encounter with officers on July 2, 2016, any reasonable officer would have been on 'clear notice that using deadly force in these particular circumstances would be excessive.'. . In 2003, we held that 'squeezing the breath from a compliant, prone, and handcuffed individual despite his pleas for air involves a degree of force that is greater than reasonable.'. . And in 2013, we reaffirmed our prior conclusion, from 2009, that 'it violate[s] clearly established law to use a choke hold on a non-resisting arrestee who had surrendered, pepper-spray him, and apply [severe] knee pressure on his neck and back.'. . Recently, we cited both Drummond and Barnard to deny qualified immunity to officers who 'seize[d] a non-resisting, restrained person by placing him in a chokehold.' Tuuamalemalo v. Greene, 946 F.3d 471, 479 (9th Cir. 2019) (per curiam). Both the Defendants and dissent attempt to distinguish the above cases based on Valenzuela's resistance. But they ignore the fact that by the time of the final hold, Valenzuela was subdued: He was lying on the ground with his arms pinned down by two officers, and he was kept in the choke hold for at least one minute despite the arm restraints. . . . In addition, none of the cases the Defendants cite regarding active resistance involve neck restraints or a similar use of force, and none resulted in the suspect's death. . . Finally, to the extent that training materials are also relevant to the inquiry, . . . the officers in this case were trained not to apply the carotid hold for longer than 30 seconds or attempt the hold more than twice within 24 hours, and they knew that an improper hold could lead to asphyxia or death. Nonetheless, they placed Valenzuela in three separate, extended holds within a 10-minute period.")

Valenzuela v. City of Anaheim, No- 20-55372, 2021 WL 3362847, at * (9th Cir. Aug. 3, 2021) (not reported) (Lee, J., dissenting) ("Valenzuela has not pointed to a single pre-July 2, 2016 single case that ' "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue' — i.e., whether the use of a neck restraint is unlawful when a suspect actively resists arrest. . . In all the cases cited by the majority, the suspect already had been restrained or had surrendered when the officers used a chokehold or similar restraint. . . . In contrast here, Valenzuela had neither surrendered nor was he handcuffed. Instead, he did not comply with the officers' orders and vigorously resisted being handcuffed or restrained. The video evidence reveals that officers immediately de-escalated and removed pressure from Valenzeula's chest and neck after handcuffing him. The majority opinion argues that the officers kept him in a neck restraint for at least a minute after he was 'already lying on the ground with his arms restrained by two officers during the final hold.' But we cannot isolate the final minute of the encounter from the four preceding it. In those four minutes, Valenzuela repeatedly refused to comply with officers' requests to stand down, managed to escape from two officers who were trying to hold him down, did not stop after being repeatedly tased, and dragged officers on a chase across a busy street. Notably, he resisted and escaped from multiple attempted neck restraints involving several officers and withstood several taser shocks. Given that backdrop, one of the officers continued to hold Valenzuela in a neck restraint while his two colleagues tried to handcuff him. And the moment they managed to put handcuffs on him, the officers released him. To be clear, none of these facts justify the police officers' excessive force. Valenzuela, a father of two, should not have died that day. Qualified immunity may sometimes lead to seemingly unjust results, but we are bound to follow it. And under our qualified immunity doctrine, we need to determine whether a right was 'clearly established' at that time such that a prior case ' "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue' in this case. . . And here, there was no prior case 'squarely govern[ing]' the officers' conduct as of July 2, 2016. . . I thus must respectfully dissent.")

Gordon v. County of Orange (Gordon II), 6 F.4th 961, 970-72 (9th Cir. 2021) ("Commonly, plaintiffs seek to define an allegedly violated constitutional right too broadly, while defendants do so too narrowly. The same occurred here with plaintiff arguing that Gordon 'had a clearly established right under the Due Process Clause to adequate medical care for his heroin withdrawal' and defendants framing the alleged violation as 'a difference of opinion' on the specific facts of this case. Neither articulation strikes the appropriate balance. However, the district court did not resolve the issue of defining the constitutional rights at issue. Instead, it merely distinguished plaintiff's authorities based on an erroneous understanding of the applicable standard. . . . The core of 'what is really being litigated' against Nurse Finley is whether she used the proper medical screening form to ensure the initiation of a medically appropriate protocol while Gordon was detained. . . Although we have not used those precise words in stating that a constitutional right exists, our precedent confirms that a pretrial detainee's right to proper medical screening was clearly established. . . . Almost twenty years ago, the Ninth Circuit in Gibson v. County of Washoe, 290 F.3d 1175, 1194–96 (9th Cir. 2002), overruled on other grounds by Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2016), determined that a jury could find a constitutional violation by an intake nurse who 'knew that [the plaintiff] was in the throes of a manic state' but 'fail[ed] to provide for the identification of [his urgent mental health] needs.'. . Gibson has been recognized for the proposition that the 'failure to medically screen new inmates may constitute deliberate indifference to medical needs.'. . . The principles drawn from Snow and Gibson, and by extension Liscio, demonstrate that, at a minimum, medical personnel at jail facilities are required to screen pretrial detainees for critical medical needs. Thus, at the time of the incident, Gordon had a clearly established constitutional right to have a proper medical screen conducted to ensure the medically appropriate protocol was initiated. . . As applied here, Finley acted as gatekeeper by serving as the screening nurse and was therefore responsible for identifying an inmate's urgent medical needs. Whether she failed to do so is properly considered under the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. Accordingly, the district court's grant of qualified immunity based on the clearly established prong is reversed as to Nurse Finley. Given that the County instituted two screening forms to ensure the initiation of a medically appropriate protocol, the case is remanded for a factual analysis of the remaining prong of the qualified immunity test.")

Shooter v. Arizona, 4 F.4th 955, 962-64 (9th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 898 (2022) ("In arguing that his due process rights to notice and a hearing were violated, Shooter relies on cases that arose in factual contexts that differ from the internal workings of a state legislature, thereby underscoring his failure to show 'clearly established law' that is '"particularized" to the facts of the case.'. . . .Because application of due process principles in the context of the internal operations of a state legislature raises distinctive concerns, the more general due process caselaw that Shooter invokes cannot be understood as having 'clearly established' that his rights were violated in connection with his expulsion. . . We turn, then, to caselaw specifically addressing the application of due process principles in the context of a legislative expulsion. The parties have not pointed us to any such case in this court or in the Supreme Court, and we have not located any such precedent. . . Given this absence of 'binding precedent,' we 'may look to decisions from the other circuits' to determine whether they reflect a 'consensus of courts' that can be said to clearly establish the relevant law. . . The relevant out-of-circuit precedent, however, falls far short of clearly establishing that the manner of Shooter's expulsion violated due process. The parties have identified only one circuit decision that has squarely addressed the merits of a federal procedural due process challenge to a legislative expulsion, and that decision rejected the claim. [citing Monserrate v. New York State Senate, 599 F.3d 148 (2d Cir. 2010)] . . . . We nonetheless need not and do not decide whether Shooter's due process claim has merit. For purposes of qualified immunity, it suffices to note that Monserrate certainly does not establish—much less place 'beyond debate'—the view that Shooter should prevail on his due process claim.")

Larios v. Lunardi, 856 F. App'x 704, ___ (9th Cir. 2021) ("The district court properly concluded that the law was not clearly established at the time of the events in question that a search or seizure of a personal cell phone pursuant to the workplace exception and workplace policy was unconstitutional. In short, applicable 'existing precedent' had not 'placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,'. . . and that any possible unlawfulness in defendant officials' actions was not 'apparent.'. . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the defendants. We need not, and do not, address whether the search and seizure in this case was constitutional.")

Larios v. Lunardi, 856 F. App'x 704, ___ (9th Cir. 2021) (Hunsaker, J., concurring) ("I question whether the workplace exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement applies to the search of an employee's personal cellphone where the employee has not relinquished his privacy interests in the cellphone by agreeing to give the employer access or by some other means. . . . Here, the relevant workplace policy did not give Larios's employer the right to access or search his cellphone. The policy provided only that work product is the employer's property even if located on a personal electronic device and must be turned over to the employer which can be done without subjecting an employee's personal electronic device, including a cellphone, to search by the employer. I agree, however, that the application of the workplace exception to an employee's personal cellphone is not clearly established. . . . I also agree that even if the workplace exception applies—the sole legal justification Defendants assert for their warrantless downloading of all the data on Larios's cellphone—and the scope of Defendants' download violated this exception, such violation was not clearly established for purposes of the qualified immunity analysis. But the outcome of this case would be different for me if this were a scope of search issue because the law is clear that an employer cannot rely on the workplace exception to conduct a search that does not correlate to the legitimate workplace objective of the employer's search. . . That is, if an employer has a justifiable basis to search an employee's personal cellphone for communications with one specific person, that does not give the employer the right to search everything else on the employee's cellphone while it is at it. But downloading all the data on Larios's cellphone is not a search issue in this case—it is a seizure issue. Larios's argument is that Defendants violated his Fourth Amendment rights by downloading the full contents of his cellphone, which the record shows Defendants then used to conduct limited searches tailored to the specific objective of their investigation—whether Larios was having improper communications with a confidential informant. Existing precedent does not clearly establish that a download, or seizure, of this breadth of data is unconstitutional in this context.")

Tobias v. Arteaga, 996 F.3d 571, 580-83, 585-86 (9th Cir. 2021) ("The district court correctly denied qualified immunity on Tobias's claim that the LAPD Detectives violated his Fifth Amendment right to counsel by continuing his custodial interrogation after he requested an attorney and then using the resulting confession against him in his criminal case. . . .Because it was clearly established at the time of Tobias's interrogation that the statement "Could I have an attorney? Because that's not me," was an unambiguous request for an attorney, . . . we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity on this claim. . . . [I]n Harrison we set down a bright-line rule: 'there are no circumstances in which law enforcement officers may suggest that a suspect's exercise of the right to remain silent may result in harsher treatment by a court or prosecutor.'. . Under this clearly established law, Detective Arteaga violated Tobias's Fifth Amendment rights with his repeated assertions that the court would consider Tobias a 'cold blooded killer' and 'might throw the book at [him]' if he did not confess. . . . Unlike Arteaga, who made the threats against Tobias, Detectives Cortina and Pere did not directly violate Harrison during Tobias's interrogation because they did not make threats of harsher punishment based on lack of cooperation. However, to the extent they were aware of the violation as it happened, they may have had a duty to intercede to stop the constitutional violation and would not be entitled to qualified immunity. By 2013, we had clearly established that 'police officers have a duty to intercede when their fellow officers violate the constitutional rights of a suspect or other citizen.'. . .This extended, overbearing interrogation of a minor, who was isolated from family and his requested attorney, comes close to the level of 'psychological torture' that we have held is not tolerated by the Fourteenth Amendment. . . However, Tobias's interrogation falls short of the behavior in Cooper and Crowe in one main respect: unlike those cases, Tobias's mistreatment lasted under two hours. . .We do not hold that 'hours and hours,'. . . of coercive questioning are required for an interrogation to 'shock[ ] the conscience[.]' . . But because the prior cases in which we found 'psychological torture' did involve hours of questioning, and because the officers' behavior towards Tobias was otherwise similar to—but not obviously worse than—the behavior in those cases, it was not clearly established that the offending tactics 'shocked the conscience' when used over a shorter period of time. Because controlling precedent does not establish 'beyond debate' that the officers' conduct violated the Fourteenth Amendment, they are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Tobias v. Arteaga, 996 F.3d 571, 590-91, 593-96 (9th Cir. 2021) (Collins, J., concurring in part, concurring in the judgment in part, and dissenting in part) ("Although Tobias was only 13 years old and his unequivocal request for counsel was improperly brushed aside, his early-evening interrogation lasted only approximately 90 minutes, involved no physical threats or abuse, and otherwise relied on interrogation techniques that cannot be said, either singly or in the combination presented here, to have violated then-clearly-established law (e.g., bluffing about the strength of the evidence the officers had, arguing that the courts would go easier on the suspect if he did not lie and instead told the truth about what he had done, and shaming the suspect for the effect a prosecution would have on his family). . . Despite the violation of Tobias's right to counsel, in my view Tobias has failed to show that, even considered as a whole, the detectives' conduct in the interrogation constituted impermissible coercion under clearly established law as it stood in 2012. . . . [T]he majority's argument today for extending the principles of Harrison to the different context presented here . . . is of no value in determining what was clearly established law in 2012. Because it would not have been clear to every reasonable officer in 2012 that a suspect could not be warned that continuing to lie during an interrogation could lead to harsher consequences, Detective Arteaga did not violate clearly established law and is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Second, in addition to extending the Harrison rule to a context in which it had not been applied pre-2012, the majority radically transforms that rule in a further respect that is unsupported by precedent. According to the majority, a violation of its broader Harrison rule is now per se 'unconstitutionally coercive.'. . This principle was not clearly established law in 2012; indeed, it was not the law at all until the majority announced this novel rule in its decision today. Harrison itself nowhere adopts the majority's per se rule requiring an automatic finding of involuntariness. On the contrary, it reiterated that the voluntariness inquiry turns on 'the totality of the circumstances' and requires a court to consider whether '"the government obtained the statement by physical or psychological coercion or by improper inducement so that the suspect's will was overborne."'. . The majority points to Harrison's statement that ' "there are no circumstances in which law enforcement officers may suggest that a suspect's exercise of the right to remain silent may result in harsher treatment by a court or prosecutor."'. . But the majority ignores the very next sentence of Harrison, which confirms that the court there was not creating a per se rule about voluntariness: '"The admissibility of a confession turns as much on whether the techniques for extracting the statements, as applied to this suspect, are compatible with a system that presumes innocence and assures that a conviction will not be secured by inquisitorial means as on whether the defendant's will was in fact overborne."'. . Harrison thus may have established a per se prophylactic rule about how officers should behave in an interrogation, . . . but Harrison made clear that voluntariness still had to be considered in light of all of the circumstances, and we proceeded to do just that in evaluating the voluntariness of Harrison's confession. . . The majority's clear misreading of Harrison as establishing an automatic rule of involuntariness was not the law in this circuit until the majority announced it today, and it certainly was not clearly established law in 2012. . . I agree with the majority's decision to reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity with respect to Tobias's substantive due process claim under the Fourteenth Amendment, but I reach that conclusion for somewhat different reasons than the majority. . . .Because controlling precedent does not establish 'beyond debate' that the detectives' conduct here shocks the conscience, . . . the detectives are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. I therefore concur in the majority's judgment reversing the denial of summary judgment as to this claim.") Benavidez v. County of San Diego, 993 F.3d 1134, 1151-53 (9th Cir. 2021) ("Because the district court examined whether there was a clearly established constitutional right at the time of Lisk and Jemison's actions through the lens of unconstitutional medical examinations on children in protective custody, it incorrectly concluded that Lisk and Jemison are entitled to qualified immunity. Lisk and Jemison are not entitled to qualified immunity for unconstitutional judicial deception. . . . Our precedent establishes the right to be free from judicial deception in child custody proceedings. [collecting cases] Prior cases establishing this right in the context of protective custody were decided well before the date of the alleged conduct in March 2016. Therefore, Lisk and Jemison had fair warning that material omissions and misrepresentations with a deliberate disregard for the truth to a juvenile court would violate the Constitution. . . . It was reasonably foreseeable that unconstitutional misrepresentations to the juvenile court would result in medical examinations on the Minors without their parents' knowledge or consent. Thus, a reasonable social worker would understand that providing false information concerning notification to parents when requesting a juvenile court order for a medical examination on minors in protective custody would violate or at least disregard a substantial risk of a violation of the Parents' rights. . . Lisk's and Jemison's misrepresentations to the juvenile court set in motion a path by which the Minors would be subjected to unconstitutional medical examinations. This scenario is comparable to an individual who provides false information to obtain a search warrant. . . Regardless of whether they were responsible for issuing or executing a warrant that resulted in an unconstitutional search, their judicial deception alone is sufficient to overcome their qualified immunity. . . Thus, Lisk and Jemison, through their alleged judicial deception, can be held liable for the unconstitutional medical examinations. We reverse the dismissal by the district court as to the claims against Lisk and Jemison and hold that Lisk and Jemison are not entitled to qualified immunity.") Rice v. Morehouse, 989 F.3d 1112, 1124-27 (9th Cir. 2021) ("There are several clear parallels in this case to the balance we struck in Bryan. First, Morehouse's and Shaffer's use of the take-down maneuver involved 'substantial' force that resulted in forcibly throwing Rice face-first to the pavement, similar to the non-lethal force in Bryan. Second, similar to Bryan, Rice's behavior did not constitute an immediate threat to the officers; his traffic violation did not support the use of a significant level of force; Rice's refusal to get out of his car did not constitute active resistance; and officers failed to attempt a less intrusive alternative. Finally, on balance, a reasonable jury could find that the state's minimal interest in the use of force against Rice did not justify the 'substantial force' used against him. . . . In sum, although there are material facts in dispute, when the facts are taken in the light most favorable to Rice, a jury could conclude that Morehouse and Shaffer used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Thus, we turn to the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . .The district court held that even if Morehouse and Shaffer used excessive force, they were entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, we consider whether Rice's right to be free from Morehouse's and Shaffer's substantial force in implementing the take-down 'was clearly established ... in light of the specific context of the case.'. . . Long before Rice's arrest, we clearly established one's 'right to be free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance.'. . . Cases like Deorle, Headwaters, Young, and Bryan—as summarized in Gravelet-Blondin and Nelson—sufficiently established the law before Rice's arrest in 2011. These cases form a 'body of relevant case law' that together place Morehouse's and Shaffer's use of substantial force against a passively resisting person 'beyond debate.'. . Accordingly, qualified immunity must be denied. Morehouse's and Shaffer's reliance on the Supreme Court's recent decision in Emmons is misplaced. In Emmons, the Supreme Court vacated our decision denying summary judgment and qualified immunity to an officer who, responding to a domestic abuse call, tackled Marty Emmons as he exited an apartment. . . In denying the officer qualified immunity, we said that the 'right to be free of excessive force was clearly established' at the time of Emmons's arrest in 2013. . . The Supreme Court rejected that formulation as 'far too general.'. . The Court acknowledged the right described in Gravelet-Blondin to be 'free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance,' but rejected that case law as inapposite because it involved uses of force 'against individuals engaged in passive resistance.'. . Accordingly, the Court remanded for us to consider whether the officer was entitled to qualified immunity. . . On remand, we continued to cite favorably our holding in Gravelet-Blondin. . . But to reconcile the Supreme Court's decision with Gravelet-Blondin—a case with which the Court did not take issue—we concluded that the Court 'must have concluded implicitly that [Emmons]'s actions involved more than passive resistance.'. . In particular, we noted the Supreme Court's emphasis that Emmons was a potential suspect (for domestic abuse) and was attempting to flee. . . That distinction was critical and led us to hold that Gravelet-Blondin (and the line of cases leading up to it) was not sufficiently on point regarding Emmons's take-down. . . We were otherwise unable to find a case sufficiently on point, and we held that the officer was thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . In contrast, here, taking Rice's version of the events as true, Rice was engaged in mere passive resistance. To be sure, Rice repeatedly declined to provide his license and other documents to Murakami and to exit his car. But Rice gave Murakami his name, rolled down the window, and attempted to gather his license before he was pulled out of his car. Rice also unlocked the car and did not physically resist arrest before he was taken to the ground. Although Rice was upset and insistent in wanting to speak with Murakami's supervisor, Rice did not swear or threaten any of the officers. Thus, like the plaintiff in Gravelet-Blondin—and unlike the plaintiff in Emmons—Rice was 'perfectly passive, engaged in no resistance, and did nothing that could be deemed particularly bellicose.'. . Accordingly, the line of cases discussed in Gravelet-Blondin clearly established the law long before Morehouse's and Shaffer's take-down of Rice. . . .Viewing the facts, as we must, in the light most favorable to Rice, we conclude that a reasonable jury could find that Rice engaged in passive resistance and that Morehouse's and Shaffer's take-down of Rice involved unconstitutionally excessive force. Furthermore, because the right to be free from 'the application of non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance' was clearly established before December 2011, Morehouse and Shaffer are not immune from suit.")

Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657, 671-78 (9th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 711 (2021) ("We begin with whether the shift in the legal framework governing Plaintiff's claims—from subjective deliberate indifference to objective unreasonableness—has any bearing on the qualified immunity analysis. The nurses argue, and the dissent agrees, that in determining whether the nurses are entitled to qualified immunity, we must apply all elements of an inadequate medical care claim exactly as they stood at the time of the incident at issue here, including the subjective deliberate indifference requirement. But we have already rejected this approach in Horton by Horton v. City of Santa Maria. 915 F.3d at 599–603. Under Horton, when we assess qualified immunity for a claim of inadequate medical care of a pre-trial detainee arising out of an incident that took place prior to Gordon, we apply the current objective deliberate indifference standard to analyze whether there was a constitutional violation. . . and 'concentrate on the objective aspects of the [pre-Gordon] constitutional standard' to evaluate whether the law was clearly established[.] . . .To fully understand Horton, we must first address Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043 (9th Cir. 2002). [court discusses Estate of Ford and Horton] The rule of Horton, aside from the fact that it is controlling precedent, makes sense. The purpose of determining whether there has been a constitutional violation has always been to 'further the development of constitutional precedent.'. . It would run counter to that goal to apply the pre-Gordon standard now, because 'no purpose would be served for future cases from delineating the application of that standard to the constitutional merits of this case.'. .Horton's recognition that the objective deliberate indifference standard applies even when the incident occurred pre-Gordon comports with the purpose underlying the clearly established law requirement. As the Supreme Court has explained, this requirement is designed to 'give[ ] government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments about open legal questions.'. .Because the premise of qualified immunity is that state officials should not be held liable for money damages absent fair warning that their actions were unconstitutional, the clearly established law standard 'requires that the legal principle clearly prohibit the [defendant's] conduct in the particular circumstances before him.'. . This inquiry is an objective one that compares the factual circumstances faced by the defendant to the factual circumstances of prior cases to determine whether the decisions in the earlier cases would have made clear to the defendant that his conduct violated the law. . . The focus is on the standards governing the defendant's conduct, not legal arcana. . . Consistent with this purpose, the qualified immunity analysis remains objective even when the constitutional claim at issue involves subjective elements. . . Thus, in the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference context, we have recognized that 'a reasonable prison official understanding that he cannot recklessly disregard a substantial risk of serious harm, could know all of the facts yet mistakenly, but reasonably, perceive that the exposure in any given situation was not that high. In these circumstances, he would be entitled to qualified immunity.'. . We are not aware of a single case in which we have examined the defendant's mental state in assessing the clearly established law prong of qualified immunity. Several other circuits have concluded, as we did in Horton, that because the clearly established law prong focuses objectively on whether it would be clear that the defendant's conduct violated the Constitution, lack of notice regarding the mental state required to establish liability has no bearing on the analysis. Take, for example, the Seventh Circuit's decision on remand from the Supreme Court in Kingsley itself. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828 (7th Cir. 2015) (per curiam) ("Kingsley II"). . . On remand, the Kingsley defendants advanced a view of qualified immunity similar to the one the nurses offer here. They argued that because the Supreme Court's decision had 'altered the substantive law of liability,' their liability should not be assessed under the new objective unreasonableness standard, which had not been clearly established at the time of the incident in the case. . .In addressing this argument, the Seventh Circuit first concluded that prior cases had clearly established that the force used by the officers was excessive—i.e., that their conduct was unlawful. . It then turned to the defendants' argument that they were nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity because the standard had changed from subjective awareness to objective unreasonableness during the course of the litigation. . . Rejecting this position, the Seventh Circuit explained that it 'would untether the qualified immunity defense from its moorings of protecting those acting in reliance on a standard that is later determined to be infirm.'. . Reliance interests were not implicated there, it said, because before and after the Supreme Court's decision, 'the standards for the amount of force that c[ould] be permissibly employed remain[ed] the same.'. . The Seventh Circuit concluded that to decide otherwise would require it 'to accept the dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose.'. . It declined to do so. . .Like the Seventh Circuit, the Sixth Circuit has rejected the argument that defendants facing claims of excessive force based on pre-Kingsley conduct are entitled to qualified immunity simply because it would not have been clear at the time of their unconstitutional conduct that any claims against them would be governed by an objective standard. Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 755–56 (6th Cir. 2018). . . The First and Fifth Circuits have reached similar conclusions. [citing cases] Rather than sticking to our settled approach, the dissent would, for the first time, drag a subjective element into the question of whether a defendant violated clearly established law. For example, the dissent concludes Nurse de Guzman is entitled to qualified immunity—regardless of whether it would have been clear to every reasonable nurse that his conduct was unlawful—because there is, supposedly, insufficient evidence that de Guzman subjectively understood that Sandoval faced a serious medical need. . . This radical reimagination of qualified immunity would produce results directly contrary to the purposes served by the doctrine—giving 'government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments about open legal questions,'. . . while at the same time ensuring that a plaintiff can recover damages from a defendant who acts so unreasonably in light of established case law that he is appropriately described as 'plainly incompetent[.]'. . Consider how the dissent's approach would play out in practice. Here, there is no dispute that the objective unreasonableness standard from Gordon governs the merits of Plaintiff's claims. Thus, had the nurses not raised a qualified immunity defense, presumably even the dissent would agree that objective unreasonableness alone would be sufficient to establish their liability. . . Yet the dissent would use qualified immunity, a defense designed 'to shield officials ... when they perform their duties reasonably,'. . . to require Plaintiff to satisfy a standard under which the nurses would be protected from liability—no matter how *un*reasonable their conduct—as long as they did not subjectively appreciate that their actions put Sandoval at a substantial risk of suffering serious harm. We cannot accept this extraordinary proposition, which would transform a defense that protects 'all but the plainly incompetent,' into one that provides immunity to defendants precisely because they were so incompetent that they did not understand the patent unreasonableness of their conduct as already established by law. . . The dissent's position might be justified if we could somehow conclude that the nurses relied on the subjective deliberate indifference standard in determining how to treat Sandoval. But to speak the thought is to recognize that it makes little sense. As the clearly established law prong of qualified immunity is typically applied, we impute to the defendant knowledge of the relevant case law governing his conduct. Thus, if there is binding precedent holding that a police officer may not use deadly force against an unarmed fleeing suspect, . . . future officers are expected to tailor their conduct accordingly. Those who fail to do so are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . They have received their 'fair notice' and squandered it. . . But how would an official who believes any claims against him would be tried under a subjective deliberate indifference standard act any differently than one who knows that an objective unreasonableness standard applies? It is not as if an individual can consciously control the extent to which he is subjectively aware of the wrongfulness of his conduct. It therefore seems likely that officials responsible for providing medical care to inmates will act in exactly the same manner after Gordon as they did before. They will provide the treatment they think necessary under the circumstances, mindful of what our cases dictate is appropriate conduct in different factual scenarios, and, in the event they subjectively believe the treatment they are providing is inadequate, they will, we would hope, adjust their conduct accordingly. It is true that after Gordon, state officials may now be held liable for providing inadequate medical care even when they were not subjectively aware of the unreasonableness of their conduct. But as the Seventh Circuit has explained, this change could affect an official's on-the-ground actions only if we were to assume that before Gordon, officials acted in reliance on the belief that as long as they were not subjectively aware that their conduct created a substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate, they could provide any level of medical care they so chose, no matter how obviously deficient. . . Like the Sixth and Seventh Circuits, we refuse to accept this 'dubious proposition.'. . In sum, as we previously concluded in Horton, when the governing law has changed since the time of the incident, we apply the current law to determine if a constitutional violation took place under the first prong of qualified immunity analysis, and the second prong remains what it has always been: an objective examination of whether established case law would make clear to every reasonable official that the defendant's conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted. . . We will approach our analysis accordingly. We have already determined that there is a triable issue of fact whether the nurses committed constitutional violations under the Gordon standard, which governs the violation prong of our qualified immunity analysis. . . We turn now to whether the right was clearly established at the time. . . Applying Horton's approach here, to defeat qualified immunity for the Officers, Plaintiff must show that, given the available case law at the time, a reasonable nurse, knowing what Llamado, Harris, and de Guzman knew, would have understood that failing to call paramedics (Llamdo and Harris), or failing to check on Sandoval for hours and failing to pass on information about his condition (de Guzman), 'presented such a substantial risk of harm to [Sandoval] that the failure to act was unconstitutional.'. . The nurses' actual subjective appreciation of the risk is not an element of the established-law inquiry. We conclude that Sandoval has demonstrated that the available law was clearly established as to the unreasonableness of the nurses' conduct.") Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657, 685-91 (9th Cir. 2021) (Collins, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 711 (2021) ("In reversing the judgment as to the Nurses, the majority applies the wrong legal standards to the qualified immunity inquiry and, as to Nurse de Guzman, reaches the wrong result. . . In opposing the Nurses' claim of qualified immunity, Plaintiff had to show that the Nurses violated clearly established law as it stood in 2014, when they acted. Because the then-controlling deliberate-indifference liability standards included a subjective element, Plaintiff therefore had to make a showing of subjective deliberate indifference to defeat qualified immunity, and she had to do so even though that subjective element of the test for liability has since been overruled. The majority errs—and expressly creates a circuit split—in reaching the oxymoronic conclusion that a county employee who did not even violate the law at the time he or she acted can nonetheless be said to have violated clearly established law at that time. . . . Because the qualified immunity issue turns on whether '"any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he [or she] was violating"' then-existing law, . . . and because then-existing law required subjective awareness of a serious medical need, . . . it follows that a nurse who, at the time, did not subjectively apprehend Sandoval's serious medical needs is entitled to qualified immunity. Put simply, a nurse who did not violate then-existing law cannot possibly be said to have violated clearly established law, and such a nurse is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Consequently, unless Plaintiff presented sufficient evidence to raise a triable issue with respect to (inter alia) a given nurse's subjective awareness of Sandoval's serious medical needs, that nurse would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . The majority nonetheless contends that the qualified immunity inquiry in this case is governed by a purely objective standard, viz., whether 'a reasonable nurse, knowing what Llamado, Harris, and de Guzman knew, would have understood that [his or her actions] "presented such a substantial risk of harm to [Sandoval] that the failure to act was unconstitutional."'. . According to the majority, the qualified immunity inquiry requires an exclusively objective focus that effectively shears off any subjective element of the previously existing liability standard. As explained above, this position cannot be correct, because it rests on the self-contradictory premise that one can violate the clearly established law at the time without even violating the law at the time. . . Although the majority argues that its position is required by Ninth Circuit precedent, its ruling here is both contrary to our caselaw and creates a split with at least three other circuits. . . . In addition to being inconsistent with our precedent, the majority's ruling creates a clear split with the decisions of at least three other circuits. Indeed, the majority opinion candidly acknowledges that the Third, Eighth, and Tenth Circuits have held that courts addressing comparable claims must 'apply a subjective framework for purposes of qualified immunity, even though it ha[s] since been replaced by an objective standard.'. . . Although the majority's position is directly contrary to that of the Third, Eighth, and Tenth Circuits, the majority claims that its approach is supported by the decisions of several other circuits. . . That is doubtful. Only two of these cases involved a claim of deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of a pretrial detainee, and the court in both cases applied the subjective test in addressing qualified immunity. Dyer v. Houston, 964 F.3d 374, 383–84 (5th Cir. 2020) (holding that confusion over the exact nature of the subjective element did not absolve the district court of having to decide whether the defendants were liable under the then-clearly established standards); Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 756–57 (6th Cir. 2018) (declining to disturb district court's denial of qualified immunity in light of its "finding of a genuine issue of material fact as to defendants' 'knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm' "). The majority instead cites the portion of Hopper that involved an excessive force claim, as well as two other decisions involving such claims. Hopper, 887 F.3d at 755–56; Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64 (1st Cir. 2016); Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828 (7th Cir. 2015) (decision on remand from the Supreme Court's Kingsley decision). The courts in all three of these cases dismissed the notion that any previously applicable subjective element of the excessive force test provided any basis for granting qualified immunity, and to that extent those cases bear some arguable similarity to the majority's conclusion here. . . But there is a critical difference between the role of the subjective element in an excessive force claim (in which the officer affirmatively applies force, . . . and a claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs (in which the official fails to act). In excessive force cases in which the objective component of the qualified immunity inquiry is met—meaning that the officer has applied an objective level of force that any reasonable officer would know is excessive—there are likely to be few, if any, cases in which the officer who is knowingly and affirmatively applying that force could plausibly assert that he did not simultaneously act with the requisite subjective intent of 'at least recklessness.'. . In other words, satisfying the objective standard for qualified immunity in such excessive force cases almost certainly means that the subjective element is met as well. By contrast, where the gravamen of the violation is a failure to act (as in the context of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs), the objective unreasonableness of a nurse's failure to detect a serious medical risk does not similarly lead to an inescapable conclusion that the nurse must have actually subjectively appreciated that risk. People can, and do, sometimes subjectively overlook what they should obviously detect. These three cases thus supply little support for the majority's sweeping rule that the qualified immunity inquiry is exclusively objective and requires courts to affirmatively and always disregard any subjective elements of the previously clearly established law. In all events, to the extent that these cases could be read to endorse the majority's flawed analysis, then they are wrong as well. . . Accordingly, each of the Nurses here is entitled to qualified immunity unless Plaintiff presented sufficient evidence to show (inter alia) that that Nurse was subjectively '"aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm [to Sandoval] exists,"' and that he or she actually '"dr[e]w the inference."'")

Richards v. Cox, 842 F. App'x 49, ___ (9th Cir. 2021) ("The Supervisor Defendants request qualified immunity here because, when Richards was shot in April 2015, no prior case law had specifically held that a birdshot policy combined with get-down orders violated the Eighth Amendment. But it has long been clearly established that prison officials may not act with deliberate indifference to inmate safety. . . And 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning[ ] and ... may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question[.]'. . No reasonable prison supervisor could believe that the Eighth Amendment permitted a policy in which bystander inmates are required to lie on the ground while correctional officers fire a 12-gauge shotgun loaded with birdshot directly at the ground in non-deadly situations—especially without considering the safety of the bystander inmates lying on the ground. . . The Supervisor Defendants' policy resulted in hundreds of metal pellets in each birdshot cartridge ricocheting and striking innocent bystanders lying on the ground. The Supervisor Defendants therefore had a 'fair warning' that their birdshot policy, combined with get-down orders, violated the Eighth Amendment. . . The district court did not err by denying the Supervisor Defendants summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Wright v. Beck, 981 F.3d 719, 736-37 (9th Cir. 2020) ("Although 'due process' has been castigated as 'cryptic' and 'abstract,'. . . its balustrades have been identified, time and again, as notice and an opportunity to be heard[.] . . As explained above, California courts have for decades observed this straightforward rule, which adds to our confidence that the law was clearly established. . .Further, unlike the mere general right to 'due process,'. . . or the abstract right to be free from 'excessive force,'. . . the right to notice is a specific, concrete guarantee that a person will be informed of the government's intent to deprive him or her of property before doing so. . . Any reasonable official would have thus known that deviating from this straightforward requirement—and indeed dispensing with it entirely—violates the right to due process. We are further convinced that the obligation to provide notice was clearly established given that Edwards was seeking ex parte permission to destroy the firearms—a permanent kind of deprivation. . . This makes Edwards's conduct even more egregious than the kind prohibited in Fuentes, in which the Court struck down state statutes authorizing the mere temporary deprivation of goods through an ex parte writ of replevin. . .Additionally, we conclude Edwards had fair notice that his conduct violated due process given that he acted in the complete absence of statutory authority. . . As we explained above, no statute authorized Edwards's decision to seek an ex parte application for permission to destroy Wright's property without notifying Wright of his intent to do so. If anything, the only express rule that applied made it clear that he needed to provide notice. . .Further, the obviousness of the constitutional violation is especially evident given the Ventura Court's September 2011 instruction to attempt to resolve the dispute informally and to return to court, if necessary. The record suggests that Edwards knew notice should have been provided; otherwise, he probably would not have told the court that Wright presented no proof of ownership or insinuated that Wright had abandoned his ownership claim. Thus, although we do not identify a case with the exact factual situation involved here, we conclude that in light of the precedent that did exist at the time Edwards filed an ex parte application for permission to destroy Wright's firearms, his actions fit within the 'obvious' situation. . . It appears obvious to us, even without a case addressing identical facts, that a state actor cannot unilaterally seek to destroy one's property without first providing the individual notice of the intent to do so. That is the only reasonable inference one can draw in light of Mullane and its progeny. Yet despite knowing that Wright had a pending claim of ownership, Edwards applied to the Los Angeles Court, without notice to Wright, for an order to destroy his property. We thus conclude that the due process right to notice, as alleged by Wright, was clearly established and, as a result, Edwards is not entitled to qualified immunity.") Rico v. Ducart, 980 F.3d 1292, 1298-1303 (9th Cir. 2020) ("Existing precedent does recognize general rights against excess noise and prison conditions that deprive inmates of 'identifiable human need[s],' such as sleep. . . But this is not the end of the analysis; we must consider the 'specific facts under review' here. . . . We go straight to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: whether existing precedent placed the question 'beyond debate' that every reasonable official would have understood that his specific actions violated a clearly established right. . . Rico alleges that creating excessive noise that deprives inmates of sleep for an extended period is a clearly established constitutional violation. However, the defendants in this case are entitled to qualified immunity because, on the specific facts presented here, every reasonable official would not have understood that how they performed the court-ordered Guard One checks violated the Constitution. . . Our mandate to examine the particular facts, including what caused Rico's alleged sleep deprivation, reveals that the challenged noise arose from activity that was inherently noisy in a facility the very construction of which made difficult quietly conducting round-the-clock welfare checks that defendants were ordered by the Coleman court to perform. . . Rico suggests that we need not focus on the factual specificity of precedent because the qualified immunity inquiry in Eighth Amendment cases differs from the inquiry in other types of cases, like those involving the Fourth Amendment. But we have clarified 'that the fact-specific, highly contextualized nature of the inquiry does not depend on which particular constitutional right a given plaintiff claims the officials have violated.'. . Existing caselaw did not provide insight into the lawfulness of creating noise while conducting court-ordered suicide-prevention welfare checks in a maximum security facility built of concrete, metal, and steel. Rico relies upon a single Ninth Circuit published opinion in Keenan. . . But even a cursory review of the facts in Keenan reveals how different that case is from this one: Keenan involved unrelenting noise caused by other inmates. . . . That case did not put 'beyond debate' the lawfulness of periodic noise resulting from court-ordered suicide-prevention checks and the immutable characteristics of a solitary confinement unit deliberately constructed in a maximum security prison not conducive to these kinds of activities. . . . Rico also relies on unpublished district court decisions. While 'unpublished decisions of district courts may inform our qualified immunity analysis ... it will be a rare instance in which, absent any published opinions on point or overwhelming obviousness of illegality, we can conclude that the law was clearly established on the basis of unpublished decisions only.'. . . Rico argues that dismissal at this stage is inappropriate because discovery is necessary to address factual questions including whether the checks were too loud for the inmates to sleep, whether officers caused noise through their 'sloppy implementation of the checks,' and whether the officers 'were doing the best they could under the circumstances.' We need not wait for the summary judgment stage; even taking every fact Rico pleads as true, under these circumstances, no reasonable officer would believe that creating additional noise while carrying out mandatory suicide checks for prisoner safety clearly violated Rico's constitutional rights. . . . Even if the Pelican Bay officials haphazardly implemented the Guard One system, no reasonable official in these circumstances would believe that creating additional noise while carrying out mandatory suicide checks for prisoner safety clearly violated Rico's constitutional rights. In circumstances like these, where the defendants were following court-ordered procedures to enhance inmate safety that are inherently loud, all Pelican Bay officials are entitled to qualified immunity from this civil rights suit. That portion of the district court's order denying qualified immunity on Rico's Eighth Amendment claim is REVERSED and the case is REMANDED for entry of an order of dismissal granting qualified immunity as to all remaining defendants.")

Rico v. Ducart, 980 F.3d 1292, 1304-07 (9th Cir. 2020) (Silver, District Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The first prong of qualified immunity analysis asks 'whether the official's conduct violated a constitutional right.'. . As the majority recognized, prisoners are entitled to 'identifiable human need[s], such as sleep.'. . Therefore, conditions of confinement depriving prisoners of sleep for an extended period violate the Constitution. According to the complaint, Rico was deprived of sleep for over a year, which establishes a viable claim for an Eighth Amendment violation. . . The second prong of the qualified immunity analysis requires determining whether every reasonable official would have known that depriving Rico of sleep for a year violated his rights. We have made clear both excessive noise and conditions causing sleep deprivation violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . The majority, however, has narrowed the 'clearly established' prong to determine whether '[e]xisting caselaw' addresses 'the lawfulness of creating noise while conducting court-ordered suicide-prevention welfare checks in a maximum security facility built of concrete, metal, and steel.'. . This approach is functionally equivalent to requiring 'a case directly on point,' something the Supreme Court has rejected. . . Thus, while identifying the appropriate 'level of generality' for existing precedent can be difficult, a greater level of generality is required here. . . I agree that this inquiry requires considering if existing precedent establishes the 'violative nature of ... particular conduct ... in light of the specific context of the case.'. . However, the clearly established prong of qualified immunity must be applied in a reasonable fashion, preventing liability where genuine uncertainty exists but allowing liability where no reasonable official could actually be confused. . . Basic and clearly necessary requirements, such as sleep, are not subject to debate. . . The majority does not dispute that sleep is one of life's necessities. . . . After defining the relevant right narrowly, the majority states that Guard One was 'inherently noisy' and 'the very construction' of the SHU 'made difficult quietly conducting round-the-clock welfare checks that defendants were ordered by the Coleman court to perform.'. . Ultimately, these facts may be established on summary judgment or at trial, but when reviewing a denial of a motion to dismiss, unless those facts are in the complaint or inferred in the plaintiff's favor, considering and relying on them on appeal is inappropriate. Rico's allegations thus describe an obvious deprivation of a constitutional right, which is sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss.")

Garcia by and through Walker v. McCann, No. 19-55022, 2020 WL 6268428, at *1 (9th Cir. Oct. 26, 2020) (not reported) ("Because the record is unclear on whether leaving the children in the home would have put them at risk of 'imminent danger of future harm,' the district court properly denied qualified immunity on this claim. . . Several facts, viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, undermine the reasonableness of a belief of exigency. First, the only reported incident of abuse in the home concerned Cassandra, not her sisters. . . Second, Cassandra reported that the incident occurred more than one month before the sisters' removal from the home, and there is no evidence that the abuse was recurring. . . As Defendants note, other facts may support a finding of exigency, including that it would have taken 24 to 72 hours to procure a warrant and that Defendants acted promptly after conducting their initial inquiry. As in Mabe, these factual disputes prevent the conclusion that, as a matter of law, imminent serious injury justified the warrantless removal of the sisters from their home. It is up to a jury to determine whether Defendants had 'reasonable cause to believe exigent circumstances existed.'. . Defendants invoke on appeal only the Supreme Court's warning, given in the context of excessive force cases, that we not define the law at too high a level of generality. . . In this case however we deal with a specific line of cases that provides 'clear notice of the law to social workers responsible for protecting children from sexual abuse and families from unnecessary intrusion.'. . Further, '[w]hile the Supreme Court has repeatedly admonished this court not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality, we need not identify a prior identical action to conclude that the right is clearly established.'. . Although there is no case with this precise set of facts, it has been well established since at least 2000 that social workers 'may remove a child from the custody of its parent without prior judicial authorization only if the information they possess at the time of the seizure is such as provides reasonable cause to believe that the child is in imminent danger of serious bodily injury and that the scope of the intrusion is reasonably necessary to avert that specific injury.'. . Defendants McCann and Escamillao-Huidor are not entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiffs' claim that the sisters should not have been removed without a warrant on the basis of a single assault that had been reported several days earlier, and had occurred months before the removal.")

Garcia by and through Walker v. McCann, No. 19-55022, 2020 WL 6268428, at *3-4 (9th Cir. Oct. 26, 2020) (not reported) (Collins, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority suggests that the Supreme Court's admonition against defining clearly established law at a high level of generality is limited to excessive-force cases, . . . but that is wrong. In fact, that same admonition has been given by the Court in a variety of cases under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (and even under 42 U.S.C. § 1985). [collecting cases] More importantly, this court has already applied this principle to the warrantless removal of children, the very issue before us. . . . Under Kirkpatrick, the inquiry must be framed as follows: Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity unless in 2013 (when Defendants acted) it was 'beyond debate that the confluence of factors' in this case 'would not support a finding of exigency.'. . The majority commits legal error in framing the qualified-immunity question at a higher level of generality than Kirkpatrick allows. Applying the correct qualified-immunity standards, I would reverse the denial of qualified immunity to McCann and Escamilla-Huidor. . . . Viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the evidence established that Defendants were aware of the following circumstances at the time that they acted: that a 16-year-old girl had reported to an initial social worker that her father had inappropriately fondled her while drunk and that her parents would regularly drink until vomiting, leaving her to care for her two- and ten-year-old sisters; that the initial social worker reported that the 16-year-old was tearful and unable to say if the inappropriate touching had happened previously or to her sisters; that the ten-year-old sister denied that sexual abuse had happened to her but confirmed that the parents would drink to the point of vomiting, although "not so much lately"; that, even though the 16-year-old later claimed that the incident with her father was an isolated accident, the initial social worker had found the 16-year-old's emotional earlier account (which professed uncertainty about other incidents) to be credible; and that a warrant would have taken at least 24 to 72 hours to obtain. I think that, under then-existing precedent in 2013, it 'was not beyond debate that the confluence of factors set forth above would not support a finding of exigency.'. . Put another way, it cannot be said that every reasonable social worker would have recognized in 2013 that these facts did not support a warrantless removal.")

Ventura v. Rutledge, 978 F.3d 1088, 1092 & n.1 (9th Cir. 2020) ("Omar was advancing with a knife toward a woman whom he had reportedly just assaulted. He ignored Officer Rutledge's repeated commands to stop and a warning that she would shoot. None of the cases Ventura cites involved an officer acting under similar circumstances as Officer Rutledge, and therefore, Ventura fails to show that it was clearly established that Officer Rutledge's actions amounted to constitutionally excessive force. . . .Ventura argues that there is a question of material fact as to whether Omar was 'walking normally,' whether he appeared to be brandishing his knife, and whether Andrade felt threatened. Resolution of these facts does not change our finding that Officer Rutledge did not violate clearly established law. It was not clearly established, in 2015, that fatally shooting a person, who was armed with a knife and advancing toward someone whom he had reportedly just assaulted, and who ignored multiple commands to stop and a warning that the officer would fire, constituted constitutionally excessive force, even if the decedent was 'walking normally,' did not appear to be 'brandishing' his knife, and the intended victim did not feel threatened.")

Tan Lam v. City of Los Banos, 976 F.3d 986, 1002-03 (9th Cir. 2020), cert. denied sub nom Acosta v. Lam, 142 S. Ct. 77 (2021) ("In sum, the district court properly denied the Rule 50(b) motion on qualified immunity as to Lam's Fourth Amendment claim. The law was clearly established at the time of the shooting that an officer could not constitutionally kill a person who did not pose an immediate threat. The law was also clearly established at the time of the incident that firing a second shot at a person who had previously been aggressive, but posed no threat to the officer at the time of the second shot, would violate the victim's rights. The facts as found by the jury adequately supported the conclusion that a Fourth Amendment violation had occurred. The district court was correct in denying qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . In short, the district court did not err in denying Acosta's Rule 50(b) motion challenging the jury's verdict on Lam's Fourth Amendment claim. The district court properly concluded that sufficient evidence supported the jury's conclusion that Acosta's use of deadly force was unreasonable, and the district court properly held that, given the jury findings, Acosta was not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Tan Lam v. City of Los Banos, 976 F.3d 986, 1011-13 (9th Cir. 2020) (Bennett, J., dissenting), cert. denied sub nom Acosta v. Lam, 142 S. Ct. 77 (2021) ("Lam must 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as Officer [Acosta] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. .Lam fails to meet this burden, as he does not identify a single case in which an officer acting under similar circumstances as Officer Acosta was found to have violated the Fourth Amendment. And under the Supreme Court's teachings, similar circumstances means similar to what happened here—a one-on-one confrontation, in a confined space, in which a suspect used a deadly weapon to wound a police officer, was not disabled by a first shot, and the deadly shot was fired very shortly after the first. Lam first argues that Officer Acosta violated clearly established law because Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), established 'that the use of deadly force against a non-threatening unarmed suspect is unreasonable.' But the Supreme Court has already explained that Garner "lay[s] out excessive-force principles at only a general level" and therefore, Garner "do[es] not by [itself] create clearly established law outside 'an obvious case.'" . . . Because Lam does not argue that this is an obvious case, his reliance on Garner is misplaced. . . . The differences between Hopkins and Deorle and this case 'leap from the page.'. . Neither case involved a solo officer in a confined space who, after having just been stabbed with a deadly weapon, had to make a quick judgment call on whether he should risk his life by waiting and seeing what would happen next or use deadly force. . .In sum, Lam identifies no clearly established law showing that every reasonable officer in Officer Acosta's position would have known that it was a Fourth Amendment violation to fire the second shot. Officer Acosta is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on the Fourth Amendment claim.")

Sampson v. County of Los Angeles, 974 F.3d 1012, 1020-22 (9th Cir. 2020) ("The district court granted Defendants qualified immunity, finding no binding case law clearly establishing that public officials outside of the law enforcement, prison, employment, or school contexts can be liable for retaliation under the First Amendment. We disagree. It was clearly established at the time of Defendants' conduct that the First Amendment prohibits public officials from threatening to remove a child from an individual's custody to chill protected speech out of retaliatory animus for such speech. . . . Capp is indistinguishable from the instant case. Here, too, Defendants knew or should have known that taking the serious steps of falsely accusing Sampson of neglect and abuse and convincing the juvenile court to temporarily remove H.S. from her custody, when Defendants would not have taken these steps absent their retaliatory intent, violates the First Amendment. Although Capp was decided in 2019, it held that the right at issue was clearly established by August 2015. . . Therefore, under Capp, Sampson's First Amendment right was clearly established on November 2015—the relevant date here. . . Defendants argue that Capp is distinguishable because it involves a biological parent. The fact that Sampson is H.S.'s court-appointed legal guardian, rather than her biological parent, does not mean that Defendants could have reasonably understood that threatening to remove H.S. from her custody in retaliation for her protected activity did not violate the First Amendment. . . To the contrary, Capp simply articulated, in the context of social workers, what is a longstanding, clearly established right under the First Amendment to be free from retaliation in the form of threatened legal sanctions and other similar means of coercion, persuasion, and intimidation. . . . [B]ecause the same clearly established right at issue in Capp is also at issue here, the cases that supported denial of qualified immunity in Capp also compel us to deny qualified immunity in the instant case. . . . In sum, because the First Amendment right to criticize official conduct of public officials without being subject to the threat of losing custody was 'clearly established' as of August 2015, when the events of Capp took place, we hold that the same right was clearly established when Defendants sought and obtained a warrant to remove H.S. from Sampson's custody in November 2015. Therefore, we vacate the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Defendants on Sampson's § 1983 claim for retaliation under the First Amendment, since Defendants were not so entitled.")

Sampson v. County of Los Angeles, 974 F.3d 1012, 1023-25 (9th Cir. 2020) ("Here, Sampson complains that Obakhume sexually harassed her by commenting on her appearance and marital status, urging her to end her marriage, inappropriately touching her, and attempting to coerce her into riding in his vehicle. The district court found the constitutional right not to be sexually harassed by public officials providing social services was not clearly established outside of the workplace or school contexts. . . Although we reluctantly agree that this right was not clearly established at the time of Obakhume's conduct, and therefore Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity in the instant case, we hold that the Equal Protection Clause protects the right to be free from sexual harassment at the hands of public officials providing social services. To ' "promote[ ] the development of constitutional precedent" in an area where [our] guidance is sorely needed,' we first address whether Sampson asserts a violation of a constitutional right. . . We have broadly held—on multiple occasions—that '[w]ell prior to 1988 the protection afforded under the Equal Protection Clause was held to proscribe any purposeful discrimination by state actors, be it in the workplace or elsewhere, directed at an individual solely because of the individual's [sex].'. . . Here, a male social worker subjected Sampson to sexualized comments and unwanted physical advances because she is a woman. The only difference with prior cases is that Sampson's harassment was at the hands of a social worker assigned to her case, rather than a coworker, supervisor, classmate, or teacher. That difference is inconsequential because the Equal Protection Clause prohibits public officials, including social workers like Obakhume, from 'deny[ing] to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.' . . Obakhume's conduct denied Sampson, because she is a woman, the right to seek legal guardianship of her niece and related services without being subjected to hostile sexual harassment. Simply put, if she were a man, Sampson would not have experienced this harassment in seeking services from Obakhume, and that discrepancy fundamentally offends the equality and fairness principles embodied in the Equal Protection Clause. . . . The right under the Equal Protection Clause to be free from sexual harassment by public officials in the workplace and school contexts is clearly established by our prior case law. . . However, as Sampson acknowledges, these cases are factually distinguishable, and we have never held that the Equal Protection Clause protects private individuals who suffer sexual harassment at the hands of public officials providing them with social services. Thus, we cannot say that the question raised by Sampson's claim was 'beyond debate' when the conduct as issue occurred here. . . Although we find that Sampson has plainly alleged a constitutional violation here, for purposes of analyzing qualified immunity, we must heed the Supreme Court's repeated admonitions 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,'. . . because 'doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced[.]". . Therefore, because we cannot find a case with sufficiently similar facts, we cannot say that Sampson's right to be free from sexual harassment at the hands of a social worker was clearly established under the Supreme Court's impossibly high bar. . . . Unfortunately, the Supreme Court's exceedingly narrow interpretation of what constitutes a 'clearly established' right precludes us from holding what is otherwise obvious to us—that the right of private individuals to be free from sexual harassment at the hands of public officials outside of the workplace and school contexts was clearly established under the Equal Protection Clause at the time of Defendants' conduct. Although we are prevented from denying qualified immunity in the instant case, we want to make it abundantly clear moving forward—if it was not already—that State public officials violate our Constitution's promise of equal protection when they sexually harass the people they serve.") Sampson v. County of Los Angeles, 974 F.3d 1012, 1025-28 (9th Cir. 2020) (Hurwitz, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I agree with my colleagues that Natia Sampson has plausibly alleged violations of both her First and Fourteenth Amendment rights. In a world in which the plain language of the statute controlled, that would end our analysis. But, of course, it does not. We must also parse the judge-made doctrine of qualified immunity, which is found nowhere in the text of § 1983. See Baxter v. Bracey, —— U.S. ——, 140 S. Ct. 1862, 1862–63, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2020) (Thomas, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari). And that doctrine requires—in this case and many others—the dismissal of facially plausible claims of constitutional violations because the right at stake was not 'clearly established' at the time of the violation. Until the Supreme Court revisits its qualified immunity jurisprudence, as a constitutionally 'inferior' court, U.S. Const. art. III, § 1, we must continue to struggle to apply it. I agree with Judge Murguia that the doctrine, however ill-conceived, bars Sampson's otherwise plausible equal protection claim, and therefore concur in Section IV.B of the majority opinion. But I am unable to reach a different conclusion as to Sampson's First Amendment retaliation claim, and therefore cannot join Section IV.A. . . . .To be sure, the Court has reiterated that a prior 'case directly on point' is not required, . . and that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances[.]' . . But much like Lucy of 'Charlie Brown' fame, the Court repeatedly yanks away the football when lower courts attempt to apply this language. . . Lower courts have been repeatedly rebuked for defining 'clearly established law at a high level of generality,'. . . and 'fail[ing] to identify a case' involving 'similar circumstances,'. . . 'controlling authority' or 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority[.]' . . . Thus, although stating that qualified immunity does not protect the 'plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law,'. . . the Court has protected wrongdoers unless the violated constitutional right was 'particularized,'. . . and defined 'on the basis of the specific context of the case[.] . . Although the Court has found this level of specificity 'especially important in the Fourth Amendment context,'. . . it has not yet limited the requirement to those claims. . . In the First Amendment context, for example, the Court has admonished that 'the right in question is not the general right to be free from retaliation for one's speech,' but 'the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory' act under the facts of the case. . . As a practical matter, therefore, we must identify a case substantially similar, or nearly identical in some contexts, to the one at hand to find 'clearly established' what otherwise would seem to be clear constitutional rights. . . . The 'clearly established' inquiry focuses on the judicial opinions extant at the time of the conduct at issue, not on how subsequent cases characterize pre-existing law. Decided years after the relevant conduct here, Capp is of no use. And, the other cases upon which the majority relies simply establish, in factual contexts quite different than the one at hand, the general principle that one has the right to be free from retaliation by public officials for her speech. . . Under the Supreme Court's jurisprudence, that is not enough.")

Sampson v. County of Los Angeles, 974 F.3d 1012, 1028-30 (9th Cir. 2020) (Zouhary, District Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("With respect to the First Amendment claim, I agree with Judge Murguia that the application of qualified immunity was improper. When the conduct at issue took place, it was clearly established that public officials may not threaten to remove a child from an individual's custody in retaliation for protected speech. I therefore join in Section IV.A of the opinion. As for the Equal Protection claim, I agree that Defendant Obakhume's alleged actions violated Sampson's constitutional right to be free of sexual harassment. However, I disagree that this right is not yet clearly established. . . . I understand my colleagues' reluctance to find this constitutional right clearly established in light of recent admonitions from the Supreme Court. True, we must 'not [ ] define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . But that is not this case. As an initial point, much of the Court's recent precedent cautioning against broadly defining constitutional rights dealt with excessive force. The Court has 'stressed that the specificity of the [right] is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context' because 'excessive force is an area of the law in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case, and thus police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue.'. . Such cases involve 'split-second judgments and implicate the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'. . Here, Obakhume had no quick decision to make—he allegedly undertook a persistent course of inappropriate conduct over several weeks. Context matters. The Supreme Court has noted that 'even though the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful ... officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . Thus, a factually identical scenario is unnecessary. Rather, we must determine whether the official had 'fair notice' that his actions were unconstitutional. . . This Circuit has repeatedly held that the right to be free of sexual harassment by public officials is clearly established in a variety of contexts, including prison, educational settings, and the workplace. [citing cases] These cases clearly define the law on sexual harassment in this Circuit: public officials cannot sexually harass others while on the job. This is true irrespective of whether the other person is a coworker, or a consumer of government services—who has no choice but to interact with the public official. Because existing cases place the unreasonableness of Obakhume's conduct 'beyond debate,'. . . he had 'fair notice' that his conduct was unlawful. Further, although the above case law clearly establishes Sampson's right, this is an 'obvious case'—meaning a case on all fours is unnecessary. . . Qualified immunity shields only those officials whose 'conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . Novelty of circumstance does not preclude liability. . . Taking Sampson's allegations as true, Obakhume's conduct is beyond the pale. . . Giving the Supreme Court's mandate a most narrow (and unrealistic) reading leads to a bizarre conclusion: Obakhume knew that he could not sexually harass others in his workplace if, and only if, they were employed by the County; but he was unaware (or confused or unsure) whether he could subject a client of his office to the same treatment. Although we clearly establish this right 'going forward,' there is no need to wait. The time is now. For this reason, I respectfully dissent from Section IV.B of the opinion.")

Reynaga Hernandez v. Skinner, 969 F.3d 930, 943-44 (9th Cir. 2020) ("Existing precedent forecloses Skinner's and Hernandez's arguments that Reynaga's right to be free from a Terry stop absent reasonable suspicion was not clearly established in these circumstances. Melendres clearly establishes the law that governs the Fourth Amendment right implicated by Reynaga's unlawful Terry stop. Skinner stopped Reynaga solely on the basis of Hernandez's statement that a witness had testified that Reynaga was 'not a legal citizen.' Melendres—which was decided in 2012, almost five years before Skinner stopped Reynaga—held that 'detaining individuals based solely on reasonable suspicion or knowledge that a person was unlawfully present in the United States' is not sufficiently 'premised on criminality' to be justified under Terry. . . Skinner detained Reynaga based solely on knowledge that he was unlawfully present in the United States. Reynaga's right to be free from detention absent reasonable suspicion in this context was clearly established at the time of the stop. . . . Neither are Skinner and Hernandez entitled to qualified immunity for Skinner's unlawful arrest of Reynaga. For the reasons discussed, Skinner arrested Reynaga when he handcuffed Reynaga and detained him in the patrol car. . . The Supreme Court and our own court long ago established an immigrant's right to be free from arrest absent probable cause that he has entered the country unlawfully. Officers may, during a justified Terry stop, question individuals 'about their citizenship and immigration status, and ... may ask them to explain suspicious circumstances, but any further detention or search must be based on consent or probable cause.'. .In Gonzales v. City of Peoria, published in 1983, we held that an individual's 'lack of documentation or other admission of illegal presence' does not, 'without more, provide probable cause of the criminal violation of illegal entry.'. . Arresting officials must 'be able to distinguish between criminal and civil violations and the evidence pertinent to each.'. . We re-emphasized this in Martinez-Medina, explaining that an immigrant's 'admission of illegal presence ... does not, without more, provide probable cause of the criminal violation of illegal entry,' which 'remain[ed], the law of the circuit, binding on law enforcement officers.'. . . Reynaga's right to be free from arrest absent probable cause that he entered the country unlawfully has been established since at least 2012, by which time we had published both Melendres and Martinez-Medina, and arguably as early as Gonzales, in 1983. . . We affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity for both Skinner and Hernandez. Skinner stopped and arrested Reynaga without reasonable suspicion or probable cause, respectively, and Hernandez integrally participated in his actions. Reynaga's right to be free from unlawful stops in this circumstance has been established since at least 2012, by which time both Melendres and Martinez-Medina were law of the circuit.") Fazaga v. Fed. Bureau of Investigation, 965 F.3d 1015, 1032-33, 1037-39 (9th Cir. 2020) (on denial of reh'g and reh'g en banc) ("[W]here the test for determining whether the right in question has been violated is framed as a standard, rather than a rule, officials are given more breathing room to make 'reasonable mistakes.'. . In those instances, we require a higher degree of factual specificity before concluding that the right is 'clearly established.' But where the right at issue is clear and specific, officials may not claim qualified immunity based on slight changes in the surrounding circumstances. . . To properly approach this inquiry, we consider separately three categories of audio and video surveillance alleged in the complaint: (1) recordings made by Monteilh of conversations to which he was a party; (2) recordings made by Monteilh of conversations to which he was not a party (i.e., the recordings of conversations in the mosque prayer hall); and (3) recordings made by devices planted by FBI agents in Fazaga's office and Abdel Rahim's house, car, and phone. . .We conclude that the Agent Defendants are entitled to dismissal on qualified immunity grounds of Plaintiffs' § 1810 claim as to the first two categories of surveillance. As to the third category of surveillance, conducted via devices planted in Abdel Rahim's house and Fazaga's office, Allen and Armstrong are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As of 2006 and 2007, however, no federal or state court decision had held that individuals generally have a reasonable expectation of privacy from surveillance in places of worship. Our court had declined to read Katz as established authority 'for the proposition that a reasonable expectation of privacy attaches to church worship services open to the public.'. . Noting that there was a lack of clearly established law so concluding, Presbyterian Church held that Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") officials were entitled to qualified immunity from a Fourth Amendment challenge to undercover electronic surveillance of church services conducted without a warrant and without probable cause. . . No case decided between Presbyterian Church and the incidents giving rise to this case decided otherwise. And no case decided during that period addressed circumstances more like those here, in which there are some specific manifestations of an expectation of privacy in the particular place of worship. Arguably pertinent was Mockaitis, but that case concerned the confession booth, not the church premises generally. . . The circumstances here fall between Presbyterian Church and Mockaitis, so there was no clearly established law here applicable. The Agent Defendants are thus entitled to qualified immunity as to this category of surveillance. . . . In sum, Plaintiffs allege a FISA claim against Allen and Armstrong for recordings made by devices planted by FBI agents in Abdel Rahim's house and Fazaga's office. As to all other categories of surveillance, the Agent Defendants either did not violate FISA; are entitled to qualified immunity on the FISA claim because Plaintiffs' reasonable expectation of privacy was not clearly established; or were not plausibly alleged in the complaint to have committed any FISA violation that may have occurred.")

Fazaga v. Fed. Bureau of Investigation, 965 F.3d 1015, 1059-60 (9th Cir. 2020) (on denial of reh'g and reh'g en banc) ("Abbasi makes clear that intracorporate liability was not clearly established at the time of the events in this case and that the Agent Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity from liability under § 1985(3). . . In Abbasi, men of Arab and South Asian descent detained in the aftermath of September 11 sued two wardens of the federal detention center in Brooklyn in which they were held, along with several high-level Executive Branch officials who were alleged to have authorized their detention. . . They alleged, among other claims, a conspiracy among the defendants to deprive them of the equal protection of the laws under § 1985(3). . . Abbasi held that, even assuming these allegations to be 'true and well pleaded,' the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on the § 1985(3) claim. . . It was not 'clearly established' at the time, the Court held, that the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine did not bar § 1985(3) liability for employees of the same government department who conspired among themselves. . . . The Court declined, however, to resolve the issue on the merits. . . Abbasi controls. Although the underlying facts here differ from those in Abbasi, the dispositive issue here, as in Abbasi, is whether the Agent Defendants could reasonably have known that agreements entered into or agreed-upon policies devised with other employees of the FBI could subject them to conspiracy liability under § 1985(3). At the time the Plaintiffs allege they were surveilled, neither this court nor the Supreme Court had held that an intracorporate agreement could subject federal officials to liability under § 1985(3), and the circuits that had decided the issue were split. . . There was therefore, as in Abbasi, no clearly established law on the question. As the Agent Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the § 1985(3) allegations in the complaint, we affirm their dismissal on that ground.")

Fazaga v. Fed. Bureau of Investigation, 965 F.3d 1015, 1061-62 & nn. 43, 44 (9th Cir. 2020) (on denial of reh'g and reh'g en banc) ("[I]t was not clearly established in 2006 or 2007 that covert surveillance conducted on the basis of religion would meet the RFRA standards for constituting a substantial religious burden on individual congregants. There simply was no case law in 2006 or 2007 that would have put the Agent Defendants on notice that covert surveillance on the basis of religion could violate RFRA. And at least two cases from our circuit could be read to point in the opposite direction, though they were brought under the First Amendment's Religion Clauses rather than under RFRA . . . . Vernon and Presbyterian Church were decided before the surveillance Plaintiffs allege substantially burdened their exercise of religion. Both cases cast doubt upon whether surveillance such as that alleged here constitutes a substantial burden upon religious practice. There is no pertinent case law indicating otherwise. It was therefore not clearly established in 2006 or 2007 that Defendants' actions violated Plaintiffs' freedom of religion, protected by RFRA. . . . These cases do not, however, entitle the Agent Defendants to qualified immunity as to claims involving intentional discrimination based on Plaintiffs' religion. As discussed in supra Part IV.B, those claims do not require that Plaintiffs show a substantial burden on the exercise of their religion. That principle was clearly established well before the events in this case. . . Thus, to the extent that Plaintiffs' religion-based Bivens claims may proceed, the Agent Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity for those claims.")

Stoddard-Nunez v. City of Hayward, 817 F. App'x 375 (9th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 308 (2021) ("At the time of the incident, it was clearly established that officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for shooting at an individual in a fleeing vehicle that does not pose a danger to them or to the public. . . Therefore, Officer Troche is not entitled to qualified immunity under Jessie's version of events, and we reverse the district court's grant of qualified immunity.")

Liberti v. City of Scottsdale, 816 F. App'x 89, ___ (9th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1387 (2021) ("No existing precedent would have given the officers notice that Officer Bailey's grabbing of Liberti's elbow in an attempt to get him to sit down or that the officers' additional attempts to subdue him when he fled were unconstitutional. These uses of force fall 'far from an obvious case in which any competent officer would have known [their uses of force] ... would violate the Fourth Amendment.'. . Likewise, there is no case that would establish that Officer Fernandez-Kafati's use of deadly force was obviously unconstitutional where: (1) Liberti had already fled from the officers and was not complying with their orders; (2) Liberti had a knife in his hand; (3) Officer Bailey's prior use of a Taser to subdue Liberti had proven ineffective; (4) Liberti was moving toward either Officer Fernandez-Kafati or the shopping center with a knife in hand; and (5) Officer Fernandez-Kafati was the only officer standing between Liberti and the rest of the open-air shopping center where members of the public were present. This keeps us from finding that the officers had 'fair and clear warning' that their actions were unconstitutional.")

Shay v. City of Huntington Beach, 816 F. App'x 47, __ (9th Cir. 2020) ("We . . .find that Officer Subia's conduct of pointing a Taser at Nathan's face, and threatening to use it if he did not comply, did not violate clearly established law. . . While the threat here may have been excessive, its unconstitutionality is not 'beyond debate.'. . Indeed, we afforded qualified immunity to an officer who used a Taser on a non-threatening suspect under the law applicable here in Thomas v. Dillard, 818 F.3d 864, 890–92 (9th Cir. 2016) (decided months after Officer Subia pointed the Taser at Nathan). Thus, the lack of precedent clearly establishing this conduct to be unconstitutional requires finding that Officer Subia is entitled to qualified immunity on this excessive force claim. The Shays have not provided a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances, as those here, was held to have violated the First or Fourth Amendment. Nor have they established this as a 'rare "obvious case"' where the Officers' conduct was clearly unlawful. . . The district court properly held that the Officers were entitled to qualified immunity.")

Wilk v. Neven, 956 F.3d 1143, 1150 (9th Cir. 2020) ("Any reasonable prison official in the defendants' position would know that the actions defendants took, and failed to take, violated the Eighth Amendment. None of the defendants can claim ignorance to a prisoner's right to be protected from violence at the hands of other inmates. That right has been clearly established since the Supreme Court's decision in Farmer v. Brennan in 1994. . . We have recently and explicitly held that it is clearly established that prison officials must 'take reasonable measures to mitigate the [known] substantial risk[s]' to a prisoner. . . Wilk's case does not involve the sort of 'novel factual circumstances' contemplated by Hope. . . Rather, the facts are 'materially similar' to previous cases.")

Hunter v. City of Federal Way, 806 F. App'x 518, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) ("A recent, chokehold-specific precedent confirms that Durell's chokehold violated Hunter's clearly established rights. Tuuamalemalo v. Greene observed that, at least as of January 25, 2014, '[t]here is a robust consensus among the circuits that the use of a chokehold on a non-resisting person violates the Fourth Amendment.' 946 F.3d 471, 477 (9th Cir. 2019) (per curiam). At some points, Tuuamalemalo frames its holding as covering chokeholds administered against 'non-resisting, restrained person[s].'. . Tuuamalemalo was 'restrained at the time of the chokehold, as the officers had 'pinn[ed] [Tuuamalemalo] to the ground' before the chokehold was applied. . . Here, Durell pushed Hunter against his car and put Hunter's arms behind his back before applying the chokehold, so Hunter was restrained when the chokehold was applied. And 'the [applicable] standard ... requires us to view the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. At this stage in the proceedings, we must assume that [Hunter] was not resisting when [Durell] used a chokehold on him.'. . Moreover, the plaintiff in Tuuamalemalo had previously been 'aggressive' with the officers who choked him, justifying a grant of qualified immunity for a punch thrown at him before the chokehold, . . . whereas Hunter never posed a threat of any kind. Durell's qualified immunity argument accordingly fails.")

Bennett-Martin v. Plasencia, 804 F. App'x 560, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) ("Because existing precedent does not place it 'beyond debate,'. . . that Officer Plasencia violated Bennett-Martin's constitutional rights, he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . The dissent argues that we construe the doctrine of qualified immunity too broadly and that Quiroga's rule that 'a violation of section 148(a)(1) requires more than mere noncooperation with an officer's orders, . . . gave Officer Plasencia 'fair warning' that violating Bennett-Martin's constitutional rights[.]. . We disagree. The Supreme Court 'has repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . And in the warrantless-arrest context, the Supreme Court has 'stressed the need to "identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment."'. . Accordingly, we decline to contravene the Supreme Court's repeated warnings by 'narrow[ing]' the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . Nor does our disposition 'send a signal to officers' that they can arrest 'young people' who provide their location to a parent. . . Rather, we merely hold that Bennett-Martin cannot recover compensatory and punitive damages from Officer Plasencia, because he could have reasonably believed there was probable cause to arrest Bennett-Martin for not complying with his orders during an investigation. We need not (and do not) decide whether Officer Plasencia lacked probable cause to arrest Bennett-Martin.")

Bennett-Martin v. Plasencia, 804 F. App'x 560, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) (Marbley, C.J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent from my colleagues on the issue of qualified immunity. I believe they construe the doctrine too narrowly and overlook an important collateral consequence of their decision. Therefore, I would reverse the district court's order granting summary judgment to Officer Jose Plasencia. As a threshold matter, the Supreme Court has recognized that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . In fact, the Court has 'expressly rejected a requirement that previous cases be fundamentally similar.'. . For this reason, the salient question for us is whether the state of the law on June 3, 2014 gave Officer Plasencia fair warning that his arrest of Ms. Amina Bennett-Martin for violating California Penal Code section 148(a)(1) was unconstitutional. . . I believe section 148(a)(1) itself, and the law surrounding that statue, were sufficiently clear to place Officer Plasencia on notice.")

J.P. by & through Villanueva v. County of Alameda, 803 F. App'x 106, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) ("Because no law clearly established that child welfare workers could be liable to a sibling who suffered no direct injury as a result of a state-created danger or special relationship, the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity.")

J.P. by & through Villanueva v. County of Alameda, 803 F. App'x 106, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) (Paez, J., dissenting) ("Ninth Circuit precedent clearly establishes that children 'ha[ve] a protected liberty interest in safe foster care placement once they [become] wards of the state.'. . The child welfare workers here were thus well on notice that they had an affirmative obligation to (i) 'safeguard [J.P.'s] wellbeing' after he was placed in their custody in foster care. . . and (ii) not act with deliberate indifference toward a known or obvious risk of danger[.] . . They overlooked these obligations when they allowed J.P. and his three-year-old sister to continue living in a foster home even after she had ingested methamphetamine there. . . And, contrary to the majority's position, J.P. did allege that he suffered a direct harm, even though he did not personally ingest methamphetamine; he claims that he suffered emotional distress as a result of losing his younger sister when she died from ingesting methamphetamine a second time at that home. . . I also disagree that it was not clearly established that the First Amendment protects cohabiting siblings from unwarranted government interference in their relationship. As the Supreme Court recognized almost forty years ago, childhood siblings share precisely the 'kind[ ] of highly personal relationship' that warrant a 'substantial measure of sanctuary from unjustified interference by the State.'. . .Our decision in Ward v. City of San Jose, 967 F.2d 280, 283 (9th Cir. 1991), does not compel us to hold otherwise. Ward held only that the Fourteenth Amendment right to familial association does not protect a relationship between adult siblings.")

Tobias v. East, 803 F. App'x 93, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) ("Although Tobias was only 13 years old and his unequivocal request for counsel was improperly brushed aside, his early-evening interrogation lasted only 90 minutes, involved no physical threats or abuse, and otherwise relied on interrogation techniques that cannot be said, either singly or in the combination presented here, to have violated clearly established law (e.g., bluffing about the strength of the evidence the officers had, arguing that the courts would go easier on the suspect if he confessed to what he had done, and shaming the suspect for the effect a prosecution would have on his family). Although the question is a close one in light of the patent violation of Tobias's right to counsel, in our view

Tobias has failed to show that the officers' conduct in the interrogation constituted impermissible coercion under clearly established law. . . . Here, the particular circumstances of the interrogation do not present the same sort of confluence of features that we have previously held to be coercive. . . On the contrary, they appear to be less coercive than other cases in which we have found that coercion had not been established. . . Because it would not have been apparent to any reasonable officer that the circumstances of this specific interrogation were unconstitutional, the officers were entitled to qualified immunity on Tobias's claim that the officers violated his Fifth Amendment right against compelled self-incrimination. . . .The district court also erred in denying qualified immunity to the detectives on the claim that the interrogation violated Tobias's Fourteenth Amendment right to substantive due process. . . Although this claim (unlike the Fifth Amendment claim) does not require a showing that the confession was used against Tobias, '[t]he standard ... is quite demanding," requiring something akin to 'police torture or other abuse' or comparable conduct that 'shocks the conscience.'. . For reasons similar to those discussed above with respect to Tobias's coerced confession claim, we conclude that, even construing the facts in the light most favorable to Tobias, he failed to show that any reasonable officer would have understood that the objective circumstances of the interrogation here met the demanding 'shocks the conscience' standard. The facts of this case are materially different from previous cases in which we have found a substantive due process violation for police conduct during an interrogation. . . . Because controlling precedent does not establish 'beyond debate' that the officers' conduct here shocks the conscience, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Tobias v. East, 803 F. App'x 93, ___ (9th Cir. 2020) (Wardlaw, J., dissenting in part) (not reported) ("I respectfully dissent from the majority's conclusion that the interrogation tactics used by Detectives Michael Arteaga, Jeff Cortina, and Julian Pere did not violate clearly established Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment law. . . The detectives in this case cursed at Art Tobias (then 13 years old), ignored his request for counsel, repeatedly told him that he looked like a 'cold-blooded killer,' falsely said that somebody had 'given him up,' shamed him for 'dragging [his] family into this,' promised him likely leniency if he confessed, and threatened him with a harsh sentence if he stayed silent. After more than an hour of this treatment, Tobias broke down and confessed to a murder he did not commit. 'It has ... long been established that the constitutionality of interrogation techniques is judged by a higher standard when police interrogate a minor.' Crowe v. Cty. of San Diego, 608 F.3d 406, 431 (9th Cir. 2010). In Crowe, we held that officers committed a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process violation when they 'cajoled, threatened, lied to, and relentlessly pressured' two young teenagers into falsely confessing. . . That is precisely what Detectives Arteaga, Cortina, and Pere did here. Crowe clearly established that the detectives' conduct violated the Fourteenth Amendment. And in light of Crowe, every reasonable officer would also have understood that the interrogation tactics here were unconstitutionally coercive, in violation of the Fifth Amendment. For these reasons, I would affirm the district court's conclusion that Detectives Arteaga, Cortina, and Pere are not entitled to qualified immunity on the coercive interrogation and substantive due process claims.")

Vazquez v. County of Kern, 949 F.3d 1153, 1164-66 (9th Cir. 2020) ("'Qualified immunity attaches when an official's conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . 'A clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right'. . . '[T]he clearly established right must be defined with specificity.'. . However, 'there can be the rare "obvious case," where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . Thus, '[w]hen a violation is obvious enough to override the necessity of a specific factual analogue, ... it is almost always wrong for an officer in those circumstances to act as he did.'. . Training materials and regulations are also relevant, although not dispositive, to determining whether reasonable officers would have been on notice that their conduct was unreasonable. . . . In this circuit, '[i]t is clearly established that the Fourteenth Amendment protects a sphere of privacy, and the most "basic subject of privacy ... the naked body."'. . Anderson also likely attended a PREA training. . . Under the PREA, sexual abuse includes '[v]oyeurism, which is defined as the inappropriate visual surveillance of a detainee for reasons unrelated to official duties.'. . Moreover, Kern County Juvenile Hall's policies require supervision of showers to be provided by staff of the same gender, and, absent exigent circumstances or incidental to a routine safety check, require that a ward be allowed to shower and perform bodily functions without nonmedical staff of the opposite gender from viewing them. Therefore, given that we have clearly recognized a Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily privacy, the Juvenile Hall administrative policies, and the training Anderson likely attended, he is not entitled to qualified immunity for Vazquez's Fourteenth Amendment bodily privacy claim. . . . 'Where guards themselves are responsible for the rape and sexual abuse of inmates, qualified immunity offers no shield.' . . 'In the simplest and most absolute of terms the ... right of prisoners to be free from sexual abuse [is] unquestionably clearly established [in the Ninth Circuit] ... and no reasonable prison guard could possibly [believe] otherwise.'. .Anderson argues that his alleged conduct—including sexual comments and contact—is not equivalent to the sexual abuse that we have found unconstitutional. Yet, in Fontana, we noted that the alleged similar conduct, was 'malum in se' and that '[n]o reasonable officer could believe that this conduct did not violate [the plaintiff's] constitutional rights.'. . Moreover, the Kern County Juvenile Hall policy prohibiting staff members from being alone in a room with minors absent an emergency as well as Anderson's likely PREA training provided him with notice that his alleged conduct was unreasonable. . . And, beyond the clearly established case law, training, and juvenile hall policies, it is 'obvious' that a juvenile corrections officer should not sexually harass or abuse a juvenile ward as it is always wrong for a juvenile corrections officer to engage in such conduct. . . Accordingly, we conclude that Anderson is not entitled to qualified immunity for Vazquez's bodily integrity or punishment claims.")

A.T. by and through L.T. v. Baldo, 798 F. App'x 80, __ (9th Cir. 2019) ("Relatively few cases have examined the contours of a student's right to be free from unreasonable seizures in the school setting. . . This is particularly true in the specific context at issue in this case: the use of physical restraints and seclusion by school officials to address the behavioral challenges posed by a severely emotionally disturbed student. The courts that have addressed this issue have concluded that, while students have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from arbitrary and excessive corporal punishment, . . . the use of physical restraints and seclusion in school settings—particularly in special education classrooms—is not necessarily unlawful. . . . [W]e hold that Appellants are entitled to qualified immunity because they did not violate clearly established law at the time of the alleged violations. It is not enough, as A.T. argues, that Appellants 'knew what they were doing was wrong and outside of [A.T.'s] IEP.' We have recognized that even public officials who know that what they are doing is 'morally wrong' are protected by qualified immunity, so long as 'they did not have clear notice that [their actions] violated the Fourth Amendment' or other applicable law. [citing Jessop] Likewise, '[p]edagogical misjudgments ... do not, without more, expose teachers to liability under the Fourth Amendment.'. .The district court mistakenly defined the right at issue in this case at too high a level of generality, citing the broad right of students 'to be free from unwarranted or unreasonable seizure at school.' This broad definition fails to address the specific context at issue in this case: the use of physical restraints and seclusion by school officials to address the challenges presented by a severely emotionally disturbed student whose behavior poses a safety threat to others. Furthermore, it fails to provide school officials clear notice of when the use of restraints and seclusions in this context transgresses what is lawful under the Fourth Amendment. Finally, in finding that Appellants violated this highly generalized right, the district court improperly relied on factors (such as the failure to hold IEP meetings) that have no bearing on whether Appellants had clear notice that physically restraining and secluding A.T. violated his constitutional rights. The real question in this case, framed at the appropriate level of specificity, is whether clearly established law (in 2006-2009) prohibited Appellants from using restraints and seclusion to address A.T.'s severe emotional and behavioral issues, including aggression toward staff and students, when the specific uses and durations of the restraints and seclusion were often in excess of what was prescribed in A.T.'s IEP. Because the answer to that question is no, even accepting the factual allegations in A.T.'s complaint, Appellants are entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of Saucier.") Tuuamalemalo v. Greene, 946 F.3d 471, 477 (9th Cir. 2019) ("Officer Greene does not dispute that, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Tuuamalemalo, his use of a chokehold violated the Fourth Amendment. Therefore, we turn to the second question: whether Greene's use of a chokehold violated a clearly established right 'in light of the specific context of the case.'. . .Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Tuuamalemalo, we conclude that Officer Greene violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law when he placed Tuuamalemalo in a chokehold and rendered him unconscious. Our decision in Barnard v. Theobald, 721 F.3d 1069 (9th Cir. 2013), squarely addressed the constitutionality of the use of a chokehold on a non-resisting person. In that case, officers placed the non-resisting, restrained plaintiff in a chokehold and then pepper sprayed him. . . We affirmed the jury's finding that the officers' use of force violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Even earlier, in Drummond ex rel. Drummond v. City of Anaheim, 343 F.3d 1052, 1059 (9th Cir. 2003), we had held that 'any reasonable person ... should have known that squeezing the breath from a compliant, prone, and handcuffed individual despite his pleas for air involves a degree of force that is greater than reasonable.' These cases are directly on point. Viewing Tuuamalemalo's version of the facts in the light most favorable to him, he was not resisting arrest when Officer Greene placed him in a chokehold. Further, there was little chance he could initiate resistance with five other officers fully restraining him and pinning him to the ground. Given the state of the law in our circuit, it was clearly established that the use of a chokehold on a non-resisting, restrained person violates the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on the use of excessive force. . . . Our circuit is not alone in reaching this conclusion. There is a robust consensus among the circuits that the use of a chokehold on a non-resisting person violates the Fourth Amendment. [collecting cases]")

Slater v. Deasey, 789 F. App'x 17, 21 & n.3 (9th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 550 (2020) ("We take seriously the Supreme Court's warning that '"clearly established law" should not be defined "at a high level of generality."'. . This case presents no such risk, as Drummond provides 'fair warning' to Defendants that their alleged actions were unconstitutional. . . In Drummond, we clearly established that 'squeezing the breath from a compliant, prone, and handcuffed individual ... involves a degree of force that is greater than reasonable.'. . There, officers placed body weight on the arrestee's back and neck while he was handcuffed and lying on his stomach. . . Here, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Slater was hogtied and placed on his stomach in the back of the police car, and the deputies applied pressure to his body during the second and third hobbling, after pressure was already applied to his shoulders in the prone position during the first hobbling. Deputy Gentry testified that he placed pressure on Slater's left rib area with his knee while applying the second hobble. Deputy Brandt, who arrived after the application of the first hobble, and who was positioned on the driver's side of the car, testified that he put his foot against Slater's shoulder to prevent Slater from sliding out of the car. Prior to closing the patrol car door, Deputy Brandt heard Slater make a spitting noise. Before long, Slater had vomited and largely stopped breathing. We conclude that the circumstances here are sufficiently analogous to Drummond such that Defendants were on notice that their use of force violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Drummond specifically involved officers squeezing the breath from an individual 'despite his pleas for air.' . . However, no court has interpreted Drummond to require a restrained suspect to 'plead for air' before receiving Fourth Amendment protection. [citing cases]")

Slater v. Deasey, 943 F.3d 898, 898-909 (9th Cir. 2019) (Collins, J., with whom Bea, Ikuta, and Bress, JJ., join, dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("In holding that the police officers in this case violated clearly established law when they restrained Joseph Slater in the back of a patrol car, allegedly causing his death, the panel continues this court's troubling pattern of ignoring the Supreme Court's controlling precedent concerning qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases. Indeed, over just the last ten years alone, the Court has reversed our denials of qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases at least a half-dozen times, often summarily. By repeating—if not outdoing—the same patent errors that have drawn such repeated rebukes from the high Court, the panel here once again invites summary reversal. I respectfully dissent from our failure to rehear this case en banc. Two particular features of the panel's decision underscore its neglect of binding Supreme Court authority. First, in addressing whether the relevant law was 'clearly established,' the panel disregarded the Court's clear instruction that, in Fourth Amendment excessive force cases, 'police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.'. . There is no such squarely governing precedent here, and the panel did not claim there was. Instead, the panel simply ignored Kisela (and all of our other recent reversals in Fourth Amendment qualified immunity cases) and denied qualified immunity based on its identification of a single Ninth Circuit decision—Drummond ex rel. Drummond v. City of Anaheim, 343 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2003)—that the panel concluded was 'sufficiently analogous' to this case. . . In applying this lesser 'sufficiently analogous' standard, the panel committed the very same error for which we were summarily reversed in Kisela. . . Second, the panel violated governing Supreme Court authority when it extracted from Drummond a 'clearly established' rule that is framed at a much higher level of generality than Drummond itself. As the Supreme Court has stated, with evident exasperation, '[w]e have repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Despite professing to '"hear the Supreme Court loud and clear,"'. . . the panel is jurisprudentially a bit deaf, because its decision here significantly raised the level of generality of the rule in Drummond, and in doing so, it overlooked critical differences between Drummond and this case. The Plaintiffs' claim in this tragic case is that, by using 'hobbles' (a form of restraining belt) to prevent Slater from moving around in the patrol car, and by applying brief incidental pressure to Slater while applying the hobbles, the officers caused him to suffer 'positional or restraint asphyxia,' resulting in his death. According to the panel, the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity for these actions because '[i]n Drummond, we clearly established that "squeezing the breath from a compliant, prone, and handcuffed individual ... involves a degree of force that is greater than reasonable."'. . But this statement literally elides critical differences between this case and Drummond by improperly using ellipses to generalize Drummond's much more specific holding that 'any reasonable person' should have known that 'squeezing the breath from a compliant, prone, and handcuffed individual despite his pleas for air involves a degree of force that is greater than reasonable.'. . That critical feature of Drummond is missing here: in this case, once the officers noticed that Slater appeared to be in trouble, they promptly summoned paramedics (who had examined Slater earlier and were still on the scene). Moreover, Drummond differs in a second crucial respect, inasmuch as the nature and extent of the force applied by the officers in the two cases are very different. While the two officers in Drummond literally 'squeez[ed] the breath' from Drummond by 'press[ing] their weight against his torso and neck, crushing him against the ground' for a 'substantial period of time,'. . . the specific challenged actions of the officers here did not involve any such direct, sustained compression with the officers' body weight. Instead, Plaintiffs claim that the manner in which the hobbles were applied put Slater in a position such that, coupled with the brief incidental pressure placed on his back during securing of the hobbles, he was at risk of 'positional or restraint asphyxia.' Given these significant distinctions, Drummond cannot be described as ' "squarely govern[ing]" the specific facts at issue.'. .Under the qualified immunity standards that have been clearly established by the Supreme Court, the district court's dismissal of this action should have been affirmed. I dissent from our failure to rehear this case en banc. . . . Although the Supreme Court has issued numerous opinions over the last ten years that have refined and limited what it means to say that a right was 'clearly established'for qualified immunity purposes, the panel largely ignored that case law. Instead, quoting from a 2003 decision of this court, the panel relied primarily on a more general proposition that qualified immunity turns on: 'whether the right was clearly established in light of the specific context of the case' such that 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . Applying that more general standard, the panel held that qualified immunity was inapplicable because 'the circumstances here are sufficiently analogous to Drummond such that Defendants were on notice that their use of force violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . The panel's analysis disregards the relevant qualified immunity standards as more specifically articulated in the Supreme Court's recent case law. Since our 2003 opinion in Drummond, the Supreme Court has issued no less than eight opinions reversing this court's denial of qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases—four of which were summary reversals. [citing cases] During that same time period, the Court has issued six more opinions reversing the other circuit courts' denial of qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases, and three of those were summary reversals. [citing cases] Given that the Supreme Court has thus issued a total of 14 opinions since 2003 reversing the circuit courts' denials of qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases, including seven summary reversals, the panel clearly erred when it disregarded much of what the Court said in those cases. This recent Supreme Court precedent has reiterated two important and closely related rules, and the panel violated both of them in its decision. The first of these rules is the more general principle—applicable to all qualified immunity cases—'that clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality.'. . Because an officer is entitled to qualified immunity unless then-existing precedent 'clearly prohibit[s] the officer's conduct in the particular circumstances before him,'. . . 'general proposition[s]' are 'of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established[.]'. . If it were permissible to generalize beyond the specific points established in the existing precedent, '"[p]laintiffs would be able to convert the rule of qualified immunity ... into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights."'. . This court has nonetheless routinely strayed from this rule, prompting the Supreme Court to admonish that it has ' "repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality."'. . In its amended memorandum disposition, the panel now at least pays lip service to this rule by quoting White's recitation of it, but the panel then still proceeds to flout that rule by relying on higher-level generalizations when defining the relevant clearly established law. . . The second rule that emerges from the Supreme Court's recent case law is a close corollary of the first, and it underscores the especially heightened need for specificity in the context of a Fourth Amendment excessive force case. . . Because '[u]se of excessive force is an area of the law "in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case," ... police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.'. . As this court recently emphasized in a published decision concerning qualified immunity in the Fourth Amendment context, 'we must locate a controlling case that "squarely governs the specific facts at issue," except in the "rare obvious case" in which a general legal principle makes the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct clear despite a lack of precedent addressing similar circumstances.'. . .This watered-down 'sufficiently analogous' test more closely resembles the standard that we applied in Kisela and that earned us a summary reversal by the Supreme Court. .

. Moreover, as set forth below, the panel's effort to stretch Drummond to cover the facts of this case violates both the Court's repeated admonition not to resort to higher levels of generality and the Court's insistence on identifying a controlling precedent that squarely governs the specific facts at issue. . . . The panel's broadening of Drummond confirms just how far the panel has departed from the controlling qualified immunity standards. The focus of the qualified immunity inquiry has to be on the specific actions of the officers, and whether the law clearly established that 'the Fourth Amendment prohibited the officer[s'] conduct in the situation [they] confronted.'. . But the panel's broadening of Drummond converts it into a rule about outcomes: if 'asphyxia' results, it does not matter whether it was caused by the officers' use of direct 'compression' (as in Drummond) or was caused by a collection of restraints, together with brief incidental compression (as in this case). However, the relevant question for qualified immunity is not what outcome occurred as a result of the officers' actions; the relevant question is what specific actions did the officers take. By ignoring all of these obvious differences between Drummond and this case, the panel has effectively applied an unstated but much broader rule that condemns a set of police restraints that are not covered by the requisite controlling precedent that 'squarely governs the specific facts at issue.'. . The panel's reasoning and result cannot be squared with the Supreme Court's demanding standards for defeating qualified immunity.")

Capp v. County of San Diego, 940 F.3d 1046, 1058-59 (9th Cir. 2019) ("In holding that Plaintiffs plead a plausible retaliation claim, we already determined that the threat of losing custody of one's children would ordinarily chill First Amendment activity. And it was clear at the time Firth acted that a government actor could not take action that would be expected to chill protected speech out of retaliatory animus for such speech. . . A reasonable official would have known that taking the serious step of threatening to terminate a parent's custody of his children, when the official would not have taken this step absent her retaliatory intent, violates the First Amendment. Because Plaintiffs have alleged that retaliatory animus was the but-for cause of Firth's conduct, Firth is not entitled to qualified immunity. Although we conclude at this early stage of the litigation that Firth is not entitled to qualified immunity, that does not necessarily mean that this case will progress to trial. 'Once an evidentiary record has been developed through discovery, defendants will be free to move for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.'")

Capp v. County of San Diego, 940 F.3d 1046, 1059-60 (9th Cir. 2019) ("Even if Plaintiffs had pleaded a plausible Fourth Amendment claim, Defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity because the right of minor children to be free from unconstitutional seizures and interrogations by social workers has not been clearly established. Plaintiffs rely on Greene v. Camreta, in which we held that social workers' seizure and interrogation of a child, absent a warrant, a court order, exigent circumstances, or parental consent, was unconstitutional. . . The Supreme Court, however, vacated this portion of Greene, and in so doing expressly acknowledged that '[t]he point of vacatur is to prevent an unreviewable decision "from spawning any legal consequences," so that no party is harmed by what we have called a "preliminary" adjudication.'. . Additionally, although we determined in Greene that a Fourth Amendment violation occurred in that case, we nevertheless held that the social worker defendants had qualified immunity because 'our precedent did not clearly establish that the in-school seizure of a student suspected of being the victim of child sexual abuse can be subject to traditional Fourth Amendment protections.'. . The Supreme Court specifically 'le[ft] untouched the Court of Appeals' ruling on qualified immunity and its corresponding dismissal of [plaintiff's] claim.'. . We are thus bound by Greene to conclude that the Fourth Amendment right Plaintiffs seek to vindicate was not clearly established.") Jessop v. City of Fresno, 936 F.3d 937, 940-43 (9th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2793 (2020) ("The City Officers insist that because they seized Appellants' assets pursuant to a valid warrant, they did not violate the Fourth Amendment. Appellants, by contrast, argue that the City Officers' alleged theft was an unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment. Although courts were formerly required to determine whether plaintiffs had been deprived of a constitutional right before proceeding to consider whether that right was clearly established when the alleged violation occurred, . . . the Supreme Court has since instructed that courts may determine which prong of qualified immunity they should analyze first. . . Addressing the second prong before the first is especially appropriate where 'a court will rather quickly and easily decide that there was no violation of clearly established law.'. . This is one of those cases. . . . We have never addressed whether the theft of property covered by the terms of a search warrant, and seized pursuant to that warrant, violates the Fourth Amendment. . . The only circuit that has addressed that question—the Fourth Circuit—concluded in an unpublished decision that it does. See Mom's Inc. v. Willman, 109 F. App'x 629, 636–37 (4th Cir. 2004). . . . Although we have not addressed this precise question, our decision in Brewster v. Beck is instructive. . . There, officers impounded the plaintiff's vehicle pursuant to a statute that authorized the seizure of vehicles when the driver had a suspended license. . . . Brewster's reasoning suggests that the City Officers' alleged theft of Appellants' property could also implicate the Fourth Amendment. Although the City Officers seized Appellants' money and coins pursuant to a lawful warrant, their continued retention—and alleged theft—of the property might have been a Fourth Amendment seizure because '[t]he Fourth Amendment doesn't become irrelevant once an initial seizure has run its course.'. . Brewster's facts, however, vary in legally significant ways from those in this case. Whereas Brewster concerned the government's impoundment of a vehicle, . . . Appellants argue that the City Officers stole their property. And while Brewster involved the seizure of property pursuant to an exception to the warrant requirement, . . . the City Officers seized Appellants' property pursuant to a warrant that authorized the seizure of the items allegedly stolen.Even if the facts and reasoning of Brewster would dictate the outcome of this case, however, it was not clearly established law when the City Officers executed the search warrant. The City Officers seized Appellants' property in 2013, but Brewster was not decided until 2017. For that reason, we need not decide whether the City Officers violated the Fourth Amendment. The lack of 'any cases of controlling authority' or a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' on the constitutional question compels the conclusion that the law was not clearly established at the time of the incident. . . Although the City Officers ought to have recognized that the alleged theft of Appellants' money and rare coins was morally wrong, they did not have clear notice that it violated the Fourth Amendment—which, as noted, is a different question. The Fourth Circuit's unpublished decision in Mom's—the only case law at the time of the incident holding that the theft of property seized pursuant to a warrant violates the Fourth Amendment—did not put the 'constitutional question beyond debate.'. . .Nor is this 'one of those rare cases in which the constitutional right at issue is defined by a standard that is so "obvious" that we must conclude ... that qualified immunity is inapplicable, even without a case directly on point.'. . We recognize that the allegation of any theft by police officers—most certainly the theft of over $225,000—is deeply disturbing. Whether that conduct violates the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures, however, would not 'be "clear to a reasonable officer."'. . Appellants have failed to show that it was clearly established that the City Officers' alleged conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, we hold that the City Officers are protected by qualified immunity against Appellants' Fourth Amendment claim. . . .We sympathize with Appellants. They allege the theft of their personal property by police officers sworn to uphold the law. If the City Officers committed the acts alleged, their actions were morally reprehensible. Not all conduct that is improper or morally wrong, however, violates the Constitution. Because Appellants did not have a clearly established Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from the theft of property seized pursuant to a warrant, the City Officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jessop v. City of Fresno, 936 F.3d 937, 943-44 (9th Cir. 2019) (Smith, J., specially concurring), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2793 (2020) ("Here, the City Officers obtained a warrant that authorized them '[t]o seize all monies ... or things of value furnished or intended to be furnished by any person in connection to illegal gambling or money laundering that may be found on the premises.' Accordingly, the warrant permitted the City Officers to seize the money and rare coins that Appellants argue the City Officers stole from them. Under the reasoning of the Supreme Court and several circuits cited above, therefore, Appellants' Fourth Amendment claim appears to fail. Because the City Officers' initial seizure of Appellants' property was lawful, and because a Fourth Amendment seizure is complete after the government has taken possession of the property, Appellants would not be able to state a Fourth Amendment claim against the City Officers for their theft of the property after its lawful seizure. As the opinion notes, Mom's Inc. v. Willman is the only decision to have held that the theft of property seized pursuant to a warrant violates the Fourth Amendment. . . There, the Fourth Circuit relied on United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 706 (1983) for the proposition that '[t]he Fourth Amendment regulates all [ ] interference' with a person's property interests, 'not merely the initial acquisition of possession.'. . .Although the question appears to have an obvious answer at first blush, it is not clear whether the theft of property seized pursuant to the warrant violates the Fourth Amendment. The Supreme Court was mindful of cases such as this when it admonished courts not to resolve 'difficult and novel questions of constitutional ... interpretation that will "have no effect on the outcome of the case."'. . We need not attempt to reconcile the conflicting case law. As the panel opinion acknowledges, the lack of clearly established law at the time of the incident compels the conclusion that the City Officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Santiago contends that Lee applies only to temporary dispossessions of property, not permanent ones. But the Seventh Circuit has suggested no such limitation to Lee's holding. Rather, in Lee, the court discussed intrusions into the 'constitutionally protected areas of the Fourth Amendment' more broadly. . . And it addressed situations analogous to the one faced by Santiago—where the government, 'by virtue of its authority to seize, effect[s] de facto forfeitures of property by retaining items indefinitely'—and indicated that 'due-process guarantees,' not the Fourth Amendment's protections, would prevent such permanent dispossessions of property. . . Nicholson v. City of Los Angeles, 935 F.3d 685, 692-96 (9th Cir. 2019) ("Plaintiffs contend that the unlawful shooting violated their substantive due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court denied Gutierrez qualified immunity because a jury could reasonably conclude that his conduct amounted to deliberate indifference. . . . We agree with the district court and hold that, viewing the totality of the evidence in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, the shooting violated Plaintiffs' due process rights. We do not discount the seriousness of the situation that Officer Gutierrez thought he observed: a person holding what appeared to be a gun standing near others who may have been in danger. But Sanders 'was not engaged in any threatening or menacing behavior, and he kept the airsoft gun securely pointed toward the ground.' The alleyway was near a school, and Plaintiffs were 'equipped with school uniforms and backpacks ... [appearing] to be minors on their way to school and not gang members.' Yet within seconds of observing the 'gun,' without consulting with his partner, Gutierrez rushed down the alleyway. As he ran, he fired his gun toward both Sanders, the perceived perpetrator of a possible crime, and innocent bystanders, with one bullet ultimately striking J.N.G. in the back. Under these circumstances, a rational finder of fact could find that Gutierrez's use of deadly force shocks the conscience and was unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . .We thus agree that application of the deliberate indifference standard is warranted under these circumstances. As the district court explained, in 'minimal information' situations, an officer must take some time to assess what is happening before employing deadly force. Holding otherwise would result in an 'intolerably high risk of a tragic shooting that may otherwise have been avoided by proper deliberation whenever practical.' As such, applying the deliberate indifference standard to Plaintiffs' version of the facts, we hold that Gutierrez's shooting violated their substantive due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . .Even if a constitutional violation occurred, qualified immunity nevertheless applies unless the violation was clearly established. Because no analogous case existed at the time of the shooting, we hold that the district court erred in denying Gutierrez qualified immunity for this claim. Kisela v. Hughes is instructive. . . . Here, Plaintiffs failed to identify any authority that rendered the contours of the substantive due process right at issue 'sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood he was violating it.'. . In their briefing, Plaintiffs cited cases establishing broadly that 'the Constitution protects a citizen's liberty interest in her own bodily security,' which define the right at much too high a level of generality to clearly establish a rule of conduct. . . They also discuss our 'state-created danger exception' cases, but these involve failures to act that lead to injuries from third parties, rather than affirmative actions by officers that directly cause injury to the plaintiff. . . These cases are too factually dissimilar to clearly establish a constitutional violation by an officer's accidental shooting of a bystander. At oral argument, Plaintiffs conceded that it was 'it was difficult to find a case that was squarely on point,' where a court found a constitutional violation in the context of a bystander shooting. Instead, the gravamen of Plaintiffs' analysis is that the use of deadly force against Sanders was likely unreasonable, relying principally on our cases analyzing Fourth Amendment claims of excessive force. E.g., Hughes v. Kisela, 862 F.3d 775, 789 (9th Cir. 2016), rev'd sub nom. Kisela v. Hughes, —– U.S. ——, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 200 L.Ed.2d 449 (2018); Emmons v. City of Escondido, 716 Fed.Appx. 724 (9th Cir. 2018), rev'd sub nom. City of Escondido v. Emmons, —– U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 500, 202 L.Ed.2d 455 (2019). . . While these cases may help to identify whether the use of force against Sanders amounted to a Fourth Amendment violation, they do not clearly establish that a shooting in these circumstances constitutes deliberate indifference to Plaintiffs. Sanders is not a plaintiff in this lawsuit, and Plaintiffs would not have standing to raise a Fourth Amendment claim on his behalf. . . The Fourth Amendment cases therefore do not clearly establish the contours of the Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights at hand. . .Because no binding circuit or Supreme Court precedent has established a substantive due process violation under comparable circumstances, the Fourteenth Amendment right at issue lacked 'contours ... sufficiently definite' to place the issue 'beyond debate.'. . We accordingly reverse the district court and remand for an entry of qualified immunity on this claim.")

West v. City of Caldwell, 931 F.3d 978, 983-87 (9th Cir. 2019), cert. denied sub nom West v. Winfield, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) ("[W]e assume without deciding that her consent for the police to 'get inside [her] house' was not voluntary. The remaining question is whether, in these circumstances, the lack of voluntariness was clearly established such that Richardson would have known that Plaintiff's consent was not voluntary. Those circumstances included: time passed between his threat to arrest Plaintiff for concealing Salinas' whereabouts and his request for consent, during which Richardson walked away from Plaintiff; Plaintiff nodded her assent when Richardson returned and asked her for 'permission to get inside [her] house' to arrest Salinas; Plaintiff handed Richardson her house key without being asked for it; Plaintiff knew that Salinas was a wanted felon; and Richardson did not threaten to arrest Plaintiff for withholding consent for the officers to enter her home. . . . Our research has uncovered no controlling Supreme Court or Ninth Circuit decision holding that 'an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Defendants] ... violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . Prior precedent must articulate 'a constitutional rule specific enough to alert these deputies in this case that their particular conduct was unlawful.' Sharp v. County of Orange, 871 F.3d 901, 911 (9th Cir. 2017). Given the factors that suggested voluntary consent, we hold that a lack of consent was not clearly established and that a lack of consent was not so obvious that the requirement of similar precedent can be overcome. Richardson is, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . .As with the other alleged constitutional violations, we assume without deciding that Defendants exceeded the scope of consent by employing tear gas canisters for their initial entry, which is the entry that damaged Plaintiff's house. The dissent goes to great lengths to argue that Defendants violated Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights because no reasonable person would have understood Plaintiff's consent to encompass shooting tear gas canisters into the house. But we do not dispute that point here. And, contrary to the dissent's characterization, we do not hold 'that a "typical reasonable person" consenting to an entry to look for a suspect could be understood by a competent police officer as consenting to damage to his or her home so extreme that [it] renders [the home] uninhabitable for months.'. . Rather, we assume that Defendants exceeded the scope of consent and address only whether clearly established law, defined at an appropriate level of specificity, 'placed the constitutionality of the officer's conduct "beyond debate."'. . The dissent never comes to grips with this legal standard. Once again, we conclude that no Supreme Court or Ninth Circuit case clearly established, as of August 2014, that Defendants exceeded the scope of consent. Defendants did 'get inside' Plaintiff's house, first with objects and later with people. Plaintiff never expressed a limitation as to time, place within the house, or manner of entry. Defendants did not, for instance, enter other buildings, exceed an expressed time limit, or enter for a different purpose than apprehending Salinas. To the extent that handing over the key implied that Plaintiff expected Defendants to enter through the front door, . . .Defendants did attempt to do that. The dissent argues that Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248, 251 (1991), 'clearly established that general consent to search is not without its limitations.'. . But in the Fourth Amendment context, the Supreme Court has warned us time and time again that we may not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . . Given that Defendants thought they had permission to enter Plaintiff's house to apprehend a dangerous, potentially armed, and suicidal felon barricaded inside, it is not obvious, in the absence of a controlling precedent, that Defendants exceeded the scope of Plaintiff's consent by causing the tear gas canisters to enter the house in an attempt to flush Salinas out into the open. Seevers and Winfield are, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . .Given the unusual circumstances of this case, the need for specificity of precedent in the Fourth Amendment context, and controlling cases establishing that officers can sometimes damage a home during a search without violating the occupant's Fourth Amendment rights, this is not an obvious case in which to deny qualified immunity without any controlling precedent clearly establishing that Defendants violated Plaintiff's rights.")

West v. City of Caldwell, 931 F.3d 978, 989-92 (9th Cir. 2019), cert. denied sub nom West v. Winfield, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) (Berzon, J., dissenting in part) ("Contrary to the majority's reading of West's consent—which quite frankly, borders on the fantastic—no 'typical reasonable person [would] have understood ... the exchange between ... [O]fficer [Richardson] and [West]' as permitting the throwing of destructive tear gas canisters into her house from the outside, before any officers even attempted to 'get inside [the] house and apprehend [Salinas].'. . Interpreting the exchange between West and Officer Richardson as permitting the SWAT attack on West's house as performed is patently unreasonable. Any reasonable officer would have known at the time that the search exceeded the scope of West's consent, for two principal reasons. First, West's consent quite obviously contemplated an entry by live human beings, not the tossing of incendiary objects into the house from the outside. . . . [I]n providing Officer Richardson with a key to her home when she consented to the search, West signaled that her consent was for a peaceful entry by actual persons, not a destructive assault on her home from the outside. . . . In short, despite the majority's attempt to distort West's consent, any 'typical reasonable person' would have understood the exchange as permitting a physical entry by actual persons only, in which officers would try to find Salinas in the house and arrest him there.Second, even if West consented to a plan that covered attacks on her house from the outside with dangerous objects, a reasonable officer would have known that, at some point, the destruction of property could exceed the scope of West's consent. . . . In concluding that the officers performed a search consistent with West's consent, the majority does what no court has before—it holds that a 'typical reasonable person' consenting to an entry to look for a suspect could be understood by a competent police officer as consenting to damage to his or her home so extreme that renders it uninhabitable for months. Aside from its complete implausibility as a matter of common experience, the majority's holding is likely to hamper legitimate law enforcement activity by making homeowners extremely reluctant to agree to consensual searches. . . The majority faults this dissent for not providing closely similar cases to guide the clearly established law inquiry with regard to the application of Jimeno's 'typical reasonable person' standard. . . But this case well illustrates that some police actions are so clearly unacceptable under the applicable standard that it is the absence of closely similar cases that is most telling. . . . Moreover, contrary to the majority's assumption, the scope of consent claim in this case is not akin to the various excessive force cases which have triggered the Supreme Court's repeated admonitions regarding the need for closely similar clearly established case law in qualified immunity cases. . . Unlike the many cases in which officers often face difficult split-second decisions and so need detailed instructions if they are to be held liable for constitutional violations, . . . the officers here had time to inform West of the dangerous nature of their intended activities before relying on her consent. The fact that they decided not to inform her in more detail could suggest that they anticipated that she would not agree to the search as performed—as she probably would not have—but proceeded anyway. Given the timing and extensive planning that went into the destructive search of West's home, the dynamic in a case such as this one is entirely different from that in usual excessive force cases, in which the Court has insisted on closely analogous case law for qualified immunity purposes. There will be, of course, cases in which it will not be clear to law enforcement officers whether the consent obtained reaches the activities undertaken, or in which the preplanned, and consented to, scheme goes awry for reasons beyond the officer's control. In such situations, insistence on affirmative guidance from closely similar cases makes sense before requiring the law enforcement defendants to pay for the plaintiff's injuries . . . But here, the destructive activities occurred at the outset of SWAT's execution of its scheme and as far as the tear gas itself was concerned, went exactly as planned (although Salinas did not emerge). Where, as here, there is simply no plausible possibility that a 'typical reasonable person' would have understood that West agreed to the destruction, the absence of case law approving similar actions on the grounds of general consent should be a sufficient basis to deny qualified immunity.")

Perez v. City of Roseville, 926 F.3d 511, 519-22 (9th Cir. 2019)("[E]ven assuming that Perez could establish at trial that she was fired, at least in part, because of her extramarital relationship with Begley, defendants are entitled to summary judgment under the second prong of the qualified immunity test, unless it is clearly established that a police department cannot constitutionally terminate a probationary officer due to an ongoing extramarital relationship with a married officer with whom she worked, where an internal affairs investigation found that the probationary officer engaged in inappropriate personal cell phone use in connection with the relationship while she was on duty, resulting in a written reprimand for violating department policy. . . In arguing that such a rule is clearly established, Perez relies on our decision in Thorne v. City of El Segundo, 726 F.2d 459 (9th Cir. 1983). . . .In sum, Thorne held that a police department may not make employment decisions based on sexual activities that are wholly irrelevant to a police department's legitimate concerns about the employee's work performance. But Thorne did not preclude consideration of relationships that occurred on duty, or relationships among officers that were ongoing and affected on-the-job performance or other legitimate interests of the Department such as community reputation and morale. . . Nor did it deal with probationary officers. Therefore, Thorne does not put beyond debate the question whether a police department can fire a probationary officer who is engaged in an ongoing relationship with another married officer and routinely makes personal calls and texts to that officer while she is supposed to be responding to calls for help, giving rise to legitimate concerns regarding efficiency, morale, and public perception. . . .Applying the Supreme Court's standard, we conclude that these precedents are not so clear that every reasonable official would understand that terminating Perez because of her ongoing extramarital relationship with Begley violated her constitutional right to privacy, given the evidence that the relationship caused Perez to engage in inappropriate personal cell phone use while on the job in violation of departmental policy.")

Emmons v. City of Escondido, 921 F.3d 1172, 1174-75 & n.1 (9th Cir. 2019) (on remand) ("Marty cited several cases that he believes clearly establish that Craig used excessive force. Those cases, however, do not present sufficiently similar factual circumstances to have 'placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . In several of the cases, the force used was significantly greater than the force used in this case or involved differently situated plaintiffs. . . . Although Marty posed no apparent danger to Craig, we are mindful of the Supreme Court's conclusion that a case involving police force employed in response to mere 'passive resistance' to police is not sufficiently on point to constitute clearly established law. Emmons, 139 S.Ct. at 503. The Court therefore must have concluded implicitly that Marty's actions involved more than passive resistance. Otherwise, the Court would not have vacated our decision in the face of our citation to Gravelet-Blondin, . . . in which we held that '[t]he right to be free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance was clearly established prior to 2008.' Given the Court's admonition, we are unable to find a case so precisely on point with this one as to satisfy the Court's demand for specificity. Officer Craig is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Because we hold that Craig is entitled to qualified immunity, we do not address whether he violated Mr. Emmons's constitutional rights. . . The Supreme Court has advised that 'lower courts "should think hard, and then think hard again," before addressing both qualified immunity and the merits of an underlying constitutional claim.'")

Easley v. City of Riverside, 765 F. App'x 282, ___ (9th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Bennett, J., with whom Bea, J., joins, dissenting) ("[T]he facts here do not present an obvious situation where every reasonable officer would know that his conduct violates the law. Here, the conduct involved a dangerous car chase followed by a foot chase in the dark. The pursuing officer, based on undisputed facts, reasonably perceived that the fleeing suspect was armed with a gun, and indeed, the suspect was actually armed with a gun. And the sudden gesture and motion—again, looking at the undisputed facts—was objectively threatening under the circumstances. A few seconds later, the officer shot the suspect. At best from Easley's perspective, this is one of those cases that falls within the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'. . In summary, Officer Macias's conduct, even when viewed in the light most favorable to Easley, did not violate clearly established law. No case identified by Easley comes close to the facts here. Thus, it is clear to me that the district court got it right. We have clear guidance and direction from the Supreme Court, as recent as this year, on qualified immunity. Indeed, the Supreme Court has given us repeated guidance and direction over an extended period of time regarding the correct formulation for defining clearly established law. . . I believe that faithfully applying the Supreme Court's guidance and direction here mandates affirmance. I also believe that the en banc majority's chosen course—not reaching the merits but nonetheless remanding the case for trial as if we had reversed on the merits—is a mistake. I therefore must respectfully dissent.")

Easley v. City of Riverside, 765 F. App'x 282, ___ n.7 (9th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Bennett, J., with whom Bea, J., joins, dissenting) ("Since 2011 the Supreme Court has disagreed with us six times because we incorrectly determined that the law was clearly established in the qualified immunity context. See Emmons, 139 S. Ct. at 502–04 (per curiam) (vacating our denial of qualified immunity because our "formulation of the clearly established right was far too general"); Kisela, 138 S. Ct. at 1153–55 (summary reversal order) (per curiam) (reversing our denial of qualified immunity because the alleged violation was "far from ... obvious" and the cases we relied upon did not clearly establish a violation because they were so factually different); City & Cty. of San Francisco, Cal. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1776–77 (2015) (reversing our denial of qualified immunity because the cases we relied upon did not clearly establish that the conduct at issue was unlawful because those cases were so factually different); Wood v. Moss, 572 U.S. 744, 748 (2014) (reversing our denial of qualified immunity because no clearly established law alerted Secret Service agents that they bore a First Amendment obligation to ensure groups with different viewpoints were at comparable locations to the President at all times); Stanton v. Sims, 571 U.S. 3, 9 (2013) (summary reversal order) (per curiam) (reversing our denial of qualified immunity because, in determining that the law was clearly established, we interpreted cases "far too broadly"); Ashcroft, 563 U.S. at 741 (reversing our denial of qualified immunity because "not a single judicial opinion had held" that the conduct at issue was unconstitutional).")

Advanced Building & Fabrication, Inc. v. California Highway Patrol, 918 F.3d 654, 660 (9th Cir. 2019) ("While the Supreme Court has cautioned against 'defin[ing] clearly established law at a high level of generality,'. . . Wilson held explicitly that officers may not simply 'bring members of the media or other third parties ... during the execution of a warrant unless it was 'in aid of the warrant's execution.'. . Ayers argues that Wilson is not sufficiently specific because that case involved reporters, not other government agents. He contends that his position as a government employee—one charged with inspecting business records—distinguishes him from the journalists at issue in Wilson. In fact, his liability under § 1983 is premised on this very distinction: private citizens (like reporters) are not ordinarily liable under § 1983 for their presence during the execution of a search warrant because they are not state actors. . . Wilson did not rest constitutionality on the third party's employer, but rather drew a bright line at whether their presence assisted execution of the warrant. The 'contours of the right' here were 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . And, although Ayers claims that he was 'acting at the direction of his supervisor,' he did not cite to any binding precedent holding that a supervisor's instruction would somehow obviate a clear constitutional violation. Accordingly, we find that Ayers's conduct violated Plaintiffs' clearly established rights under Wilson.")

Soler v. County of San Diego, 762 F. App'x 383, ___ (9th Cir. 2019) ("Banuelos is not entitled to qualified immunity because the right at issue was 'clearly established.'. . In Garcia v. County of Riverside, we concluded that an officer was not entitled to qualified immunity because, for these 'further investigation' cases, 'the standards for determining whether alleged police conduct violates the Fourteenth Amendment were clearly established.'. . Specifically, we explained that our decision in Rivera v. County of Los Angeles 'summarize[d] existing law' when it declared that 'officers violate the Fourteenth Amendment if they wrongly detain a person where "the circumstances indicated to [them] that further investigation was warranted."'. . Rivera and our other cases have simply applied this statement 'to different allegations by different plaintiffs' and 'do not make new law.'. . Thus, similar to the officer in Garcia, Banuelos is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

N.E.M. v. City of Salinas, 761 F. App'x 698, ___ (9th Cir. 2019) ("At the time of the shooting, it was clearly established that officers may not use deadly force against a person who is armed but cannot reasonably be perceived to be taking any furtive, harrowing, or threatening actions. . . This is true even in circumstances in which the suspect has allegedly 'committed a violent crime in the immediate past.'. . Accordingly, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity at this summary judgment stage. Again, our holding does not foreclose the jury from concluding otherwise after trial.")

Hines v. Youseff, 914 F.3d 1218, 1230-31, 1235-36 (9th Cir. 2019) ("Of course, we do not require that heightened exposure to Valley Fever must have been previously held unlawful. . . The qualified immunity analysis does not require a case on all fours. What matters is whether 'existing precedent ... placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,' not whether the debate has already taken place. . . An officer loses qualified immunity, even in novel factual circumstances, if he or she commits a 'clear' constitutional violation. . . This rule prevents absurd results. As then-Judge Gorsuch once explained, 'some things are so obviously unlawful that they don't require detailed explanation and sometimes the most obviously unlawful things happen so rarely that a case on point is itself an unusual thing. Indeed, it would be remarkable if the most obviously unconstitutional conduct should be the most immune from liability only because it is so flagrantly unlawful that few dare its attempt.'. . But this case does not involve a 'clear' or 'obvious' violation. The inmates must show that 'every reasonable official would [have understood]' that exposing them to a heightened risk of Valley Fever violated the Eighth Amendment. . . More specifically, they must show that no reasonable officer could have thought that free society tolerated that risk. . . They have not met that burden for two reasons: a federal court supervised the officials' actions, and there is no evidence that 'society's attitude had evolved to the point that involuntary exposure' to such a risk 'violated current standards of decency'. . .especially given that millions of free individuals tolerate a heightened risk of Valley Fever by voluntarily living in California's Central Valley and elsewhere. Those two facts mean that a reasonable official could have thought that he or she was complying with the Constitution. . . . In short, it was reasonable to exclude inmates based on medical conditions rather than based on race. Even if state officials should have been more aggressive in excluding inmates whose higher risk appeared to be on account of (or at least connected to) their race, that does not mean their conduct violated clearly established law. The inmates did not have a clearly established right to be segregated from certain Central Valley prisons based on their race. We therefore reverse the Jackson court's ruling on the equal protection claim. . . .We are sympathetic to the inmates' plight. Valley Fever is a serious and potentially fatal disease. When state officials know that inmates face a substantial risk of serious harm, the officials are constitutionally required to take reasonable steps to abate that risk. . . State officials cannot shut their eyes to inmate suffering; they are responsible for the safety of the people in their custody. . .But it would not have been 'obvious' to any reasonable official that they had to segregate prisoners by race or do more than the federal Receiver told them to do. So we conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. The rights that the inmates claim were not clearly established when the officials acted.")

Olivier v. Baca, 913 F.3d 852, 860-61 (9th Cir. 2019) ("Olivier has not demonstrated that the law regarding floor sleeping, in the context of exigent circumstances, was or is clearly established. Thompson v. City of Los Angeles, 885 F.2d 1439, 1448 (9th Cir. 1989), overruled on other grounds by Bull, 595 F.3d at 981, and Rutherford v. Pitchess, 457 F. Supp. 104, 109 (C.D. Cal. 1978), held that forcing detainees to sleep on the ground is a constitutional violation. However, those cases did not involve exigent circumstances, and thus any 'unlawfulness' cannot be said to have been 'apparent' to Baca in the context of the inmate disturbances at issue here. Olivier also cites Thomas to support his argument that it is clearly established that inmate processing should take no longer than twenty-four hours. . . Thomas, a district court decision, was not decided until over a year after the events at issue, so that case could not have 'placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate' at the time of Olivier's delay at the IRC. . . Additionally, Thomas explicitly recognized an exception to its general inmate processing guidelines for exigent circumstances such as civil disturbances.")

Scott v. County of San Bernardino, 903 F.3d 943, 950-51 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We do not diminish the seriousness of potential violence between students, or the need for conflict resolution in the educational setting. But '[s]ociety expects that children will make mistakes in school—and yes, even occasionally fight.' E.W. by and through T.W. v. Dolgos, 884 F.3d 172, 183 (4th Cir. 2018). Deputy Ortiz faced a room of seven seated, mostly quiet middle school girls, and only generalized allegations of fighting and conflict amongst them. Even accounting for what Deputy Ortiz perceived to be non-responsiveness to his questioning, the full-scale arrests of all seven students, without further inquiry, was both excessively intrusive in light of the girls' young ages and not reasonably related to the school's expressed need. Ironically, the primary instigator of the conflicts, L.V., was the only one released to a parent at the school campus. The foundation of T.L.O.'s special needs standard is reasonableness. . . An arrest meant only to 'teach a lesson' and arbitrarily punish perceived disrespect is clearly unreasonable under T.L.O. Under the circumstances of this case, we hold that the arrests of the students were unreasonable and in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . At the time of the students' arrest, it was clearly established that a police seizure at the behest of school officials must, at a minimum, be 'reasonably related to its purpose, and must not be "excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction."'. . . Defendants do not—and indeed, cannot—meaningfully contest Deputy Ortiz's motivation for the arrests, which he stated multiple times. No reasonable officer could have reasonably believed that the law authorizes the arrest of a group of middle schoolers in order to prove a point. . . . [N]othing in C.B. suggests that an officer may arrest an entire group of students to teach them a lesson or to 'prove a point.' While the officers in C.B. took the troubled student into custody in order to safely transport him into the care of a relative, here, in contrast, Deputy Ortiz admitted that he 'did not care' who was at fault in the alleged fighting and arrested all of the students in order to teach them a lesson. Under any standard, the arrests here were unreasonable, and the district court properly denied Deputies Ortiz and Thomas qualified immunity.")

Mellen v. Winn, 900 F.3d 1085, 1103-04 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We next must decide whether it was clearly established, in 1997, that police officers had a duty to disclose material impeachment evidence to prosecutors. This is not an open question in our Circuit. In Carrillo v. County of Los Angeles, we concluded that '[t]he law in 1984 clearly established that police officers were bound to disclose material, exculpatory evidence.'. . Carrillo cited approvingly United States v. Butler, 567 F.2d 885 (9th Cir. 1978) (per curiam), an even earlier case that concluded that police investigators violate Brady when they fail to disclose material impeachment evidence to prosecutors. . . . Carrillo also relied on Kyles, the case where the Supreme Court expressly extended Brady obligations to police officers. . . .Detective Winn offers no meaningful way to distinguish Carrillo, Butler, and Kyles, and we agree that these cases are controlling. We therefore reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment for Detective Winn on Mellen's § 1983 claim premised on a violation of her due process rights, and we remand for further proceedings.")

Rodriguez v. Swartz, 899 F.3d 719, 728-34 (9th Cir. 2018), cert. granted, judgment vacated and remanded in light of Hernandez v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735 (2020) ("Swartz filed this interlocutory appeal to challenge the district court's denial of qualified immunity. The United States filed an amicus brief that presented an argument that had not been made in district court: that Rodriguez lacks a Bivens cause of action for a Fourth Amendment violation. Though Swartz had not raised that argument in his opening brief on appeal, he adopted it in his reply brief. We affirm the district court's decision to let Rodriguez's Fourth Amendment claim proceed. . . . Based on the facts alleged in the complaint, Swartz violated the Fourth Amendment. It is inconceivable that any reasonable officer could have thought that he or she could kill J.A. for no reason. Thus, Swartz lacks qualified immunity. . . .[U]nlike the American agents in Verdugo-Urquidez, who acted on Mexican soil, Swartz acted on American soil. Just as Mexican law controls what people do there, American law controls what people do here. Verdugo-Urquidez simply did not address the conduct of American agents on American soil. Also, the agents in Verdugo-Urquidez knew that they were searching a Mexican citizen's property in Mexico, but Swartz could not have known whether J.A. was an American citizen or not. The practical concerns in Verdugo-Urquidez about regulating conduct on Mexican soil also do not apply here. There are many reasons not to extend the Fourth Amendment willy-nilly to actions abroad, as Verdugo-Urquidez explains. But those reasons do not apply to Swartz. He acted on American soil subject to American law. We recognize that on similar facts, the Fifth Circuit reached a contrary conclusion. But its reasoning was about the Fourth Amendment generally, including warrantless searches of those crossing the border and electronic surveillance of the border itself. The concerns in Verdugo-Urquidez were also specific to warrants and overseas operations. But this case is not about searches and seizures broadly speaking. Neither is it about warrants or overseas operations. It is about the unreasonable use of deadly force by a federal agent on American soil. Under those limited circumstances, there are no practical obstacles to extending the Fourth Amendment. Applying the Constitution in this case would simply say that American officers must not shoot innocent, non-threatening people for no reason. Enforcing that rule would not unduly restrict what the United States could do either here or abroad. So under the particular circumstances of this case, J.A. had a Fourth Amendment right to be free from the objectively unreasonable use of deadly force by an American agent acting on American soil, even though Swartz's bullets hit him in Mexico. Verdugo-Urquidez does not require a different conclusion. . . .Swartz argues that when he shot J.A., it was not clearly established that he could not shoot someone on the other side of the border. We cannot agree. 'The qualified immunity analysis ... is limited to the facts that were knowable to the defendant officers at the time they engaged in the conduct in question. Facts an officer learns after the incident ends—whether those facts would support granting immunity or denying it—are not relevant.'. . . When he shot J.A., Swartz could not have known whether the boy was an American citizen. Thus, Swartz is not entitled to qualified immunity on the bizarre ground that J.A. was not an American. For all Swartz knew, J.A. was an American citizen with family and activities on both sides of the border. Therefore, the question is not whether it was clearly established that aliens abroad have Fourth Amendment rights. Rather, it is whether it was clearly established that it was unconstitutional for an officer on American soil to use deadly force without justification against a person of unknown nationality on the other side of the border. Had there been a serious question about whether the Constitution banned federal officers from gratuitous cross-border killings, Tennessee v. Garner and Harris v. Roderick would have answered it. 'It does not take a court ruling for an official to know that no concept of reasonableness could justify the unprovoked shooting of another person.' Any reasonable officer would have known, even without a judicial decision to tell him so, that it was unlawful to kill someone—anyone—for no reason. . . .Rodriguez's complaint makes a persuasive case for murder charges. Indeed, the United States has indicted and tried Swartz for murder. We are unable to imagine a serious argument that a federal agent might not have known that it was unlawful to shoot people in Mexico for no reason. To be sure, Brosseau v. Haugen holds that the Fourth Amendment prohibition on excessive force is 'cast at a high level of generality.' That general prohibition clearly establishes a constitutional violation only 'in an obvious case.' But this is an obvious case. Unlike officers in other situations, Swartz did not have to determine how much force to use; he was not permitted to use any force whatsoever against someone who was innocently walking down a street in Mexico." [footnotes omitted])

Pike v. Hester, 891 F.3d 1131, 1141-42 (9th Cir. 2018) ("Hester first contends that no single case has held that 'a consensual K-9 sniff-sweep of a public employee's shared office' is unlawful. However, the justice court concluded the search was not consensual. The relevant question is whether a no-consent dog search of a public employee's office was clearly unlawful in 2011, when the search occurred. Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit precedent easily resolve that question in the affirmative. . . .The fact that Hester's search involved a dog does not affect that conclusion. In 2011, it was clearly established that dog sniff searches are exempt from Fourth Amendment protection only when the dog and accompanying officer are lawfully present. . . .Accordingly, it was clearly established in 2011 that a dog search of a public employee's private office violates the Fourth Amendment, absent consent. . . Hester's conduct violated Pike's clearly established right; therefore, he is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Daniels Sharpsmart, Inc. v. Smith, 889 F.3d 608, 617-18 (9th Cir. 2018) ("The district court was satisfied that, as it said, '[t]he extraterritorialty doctrine has been clearly established for decades.' No doubt that is so, but that is far from deciding that it was clearly established that application of the MWMA [Medical Waste Management Act] violated the doctrine. . . Certainly, the Department officials could not look at a decision dealing with the MWMA itself, and that statute at least injected some ambiguity into the equation when it declared that '[m]edical waste transported out of [California] shall be consigned to a permitted medical waste treatment facility in the receiving state.' Cal. Health & Safety Code § 118000(c). Of course, that does not say who must issue the permit to the facility, and a reasonable official, who is not knowledgeable about the arcane considerations lurking within dormant Commerce Clause doctrine, could reasonably, if erroneously, believe that the Department could control what was done with California waste in another state. . . As we see it, this area is complex and murky enough that it was improper to decide that Pilorin, Dabney, and Hilton could be mulcted with damages for their error. The district court erred in holding that they could be.")

Reese v. County of Sacramento, 888 F.3d 1030, 1037-40 (9th Cir. 2018) ("Here, the jury found Deputy Rose violated Reese's right to be free from excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Rose's entitlement to qualified immunity therefore turns on whether Reese's right was clearly established at the time of the incident in 2011. Joining other circuit courts from around the country, this Court recently determined that the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis is a matter of law to be decided by a judge. Morales v. Fry, 873 F.3d 817, 824–25 (9th Cir. 2017). . . . We recognized, however, that '[a] bifurcation of duties is unavoidable: only the jury can decide the disputed factual issues, while only the judge can decide whether the right was clearly established once the factual issues are resolved.'. . In arguing that his right to be free of excessive force under these circumstances was clearly established, Reese relies on the jury's answer to Question 14, their finding that it did not appear that Reese posed an immediate threat of death or serious physical injury to Rose at the time Rose fired his shot. Reese contends that by making this finding, the jury determined Rose violated Reese's clearly established right not to be subjected to deadly force when he posed no immediate threat to Rose or others. As Morales confirmed, however, the question of whether the right was clearly established is solely for the judge to decide, not the jury. . . Thus, although the jury's finding that Reese posed no immediate threat of death or serious physical injury to Rose addresses the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, it does not answer the purely legal question of whether the right was clearly established in this context. Therefore, the district court was within its authority to determine, as a matter of law, whether Deputy Rose was entitled to qualified immunity, even where a jury determined that he violated Reese's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . .We agree with the district court that Reese has not identified any sufficiently analogous cases showing that under similar circumstances, a clearly established Fourth Amendment right against the use of deadly force existed at the time of the shooting. The jury determined that when Reese answered the door to his apartment, he had a knife in his hand in an elevated position. Upon seeing Reese in the doorway with the knife, which was very close to where Rose was standing, Brown immediately fired a shot from his rifle at Reese, but missed. After Brown fired the shot, he saw Reese back into the apartment and drop the knife. Rose, who saw Reese when he first opened the door, lost sight of Reese when he backed up into his apartment and after Brown fired at him. Rose then advanced toward the doorway and was surprised to see Reese standing in the apartment. Rose stated that he could not see Reese's hands but upon seeing him, shot Reese in the chest from three to five feet away. Notably, while the jury found that Reese did not brandish the knife at Rose, they also found that at the time Rose fired his shot, he did not see Reese's hands. Although Reese goes to great lengths to remind this Court that we do not demand a case with 'materially similar' factual circumstances or even facts closely analogous to his case, Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002), none of Reese's cited cases demonstrate that the contours of his Fourth Amendment right were sufficiently clear such that 'any reasonable official in [his] shoes would have understood that he was violating it.'. . Critically, Reese points to no case that considered the relevant question whether Deputy Rose, having come within striking distance of a suspect who had held a knife a fraction of a second before, was objectively unreasonable in using deadly force before determining whether the suspect still possessed the knife. . . .Reese's reliance on our decision in Hughes v. Kisela, 862 F.3d 775 (9th Cir. 2016), only confirms that the law was not clearly established here. In Hughes, we reasoned that an officer's shooting of a plaintiff who was approaching a third party while holding a kitchen knife at her side violated the plaintiff's clearly established rights, where the facts viewed in the plaintiff's favor showed that she was not 'angry or menacing,' officers knew only that she has been using the knife to carve a tree, and the plaintiff did not understand orders to drop the weapon. . . After Reese's appeal was argued, the Supreme Court summarily reversed our decision in Hughes, concluding that it was 'far from an obvious case,' and that none of our precedents squarely governed the facts involved. Kisela v. Hughes, —— U.S. ——, 138 S.Ct. 1148, 1153, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2018). Given that Rose had greater reason to perceive a threat here, and no luxury of time or distance to discern whether Reese still posed such a threat, the Supreme Court's decision in Kisela v. Hughes further illustrates that Rose is entitled to qualified immunity. None of Reese's cases 'squarely govern' the situation that Rose confronted such that they would have given Rose clear warning that his use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable. . . Absent a showing by Reese that the right was clearly established at the time, Rose is entitled to qualified immunity on the Fourth Amendment excessive force claim. We therefore affirm the district court's ruling that Deputy Rose is entitled to qualified immunity on that claim.")

Thompson v. Rahr, 885 F.3d 582, 584, 586-90 (9th Cir. 2018) ("This appeal presents a question at the intersection of the Fourth Amendment and qualified immunity law. In the course of a felony arrest, may a police officer point a loaded gun at an unarmed suspect's head, where that suspect had already been searched, was calm and compliant, was watched over by a second armed deputy, and was seated on the bumper of a police cruiser 10–15 feet away from a gun found in the suspect's car? Because the facts are at this stage disputed, we take the facts in the light most favorable to the suspect. We hold that pointing a loaded gun at the suspect's head in these circumstances constitutes excessive force under the Fourth Amendment, but that the officers here are entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established at the time of the traffic stop. . . . [W]e conclude that Copeland's use of force in arresting Thompson was not objectively reasonable. Accepting Thompson at his word, as we are required to do at the summary judgment stage, Copeland pointed the gun at Thompson's head and threatened to kill him if he did not surrender. This type and amount of force can hardly be characterized as 'minor,' as the government contends. We have previously held, in the context of a residential confrontation, that 'pointing a loaded gun at a suspect, employing the threat of deadly force, is use of a high level of force.'. . With respect to the government's interests, Thompson was suspected of driving with a suspended license and violating the Uniform Firearms Act—potential crimes of low and moderate severity, respectively. The safety threat either to the officers or the public was relatively low. The government's claim that Thompson 'could have charged past Deputy Copeland and grabbed the revolver [in the back of the car] in a matter of seconds' is weak. Thompson would have had to travel 10–15 feet to his car to grab the gun or make any use of it. Thompson had no weapon and had already been searched. He was sitting on the bumper of a squad car, watched over by an armed deputy. He was not 'actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . He was 'compliant with the directions of law enforcement at all times.'. . Nor did the officers have 'reason to believe that he would resist or flee.'. . Reviewing the totality of the circumstances, the force used against Thompson was excessive when balanced against the government's need for such force. In the end, 'pointing guns at persons who are compliant and present no danger is a constitutional violation.'. . A jury could find that 'brandishing a cocked gun in front of [Thompson's] face' and threatening to kill him was unreasonable under these particular circumstances. . . We do not discount the concern for officer safety when facing a potentially volatile situation. But where the officers have an unarmed felony suspect under control, where they easily could have handcuffed the suspect while he was sitting on the squad car, and where the suspect is not in close proximity to an accessible weapon, a gun to the head constitutes excessive force. . . .Although the use of excessive force violated Thompson's constitutional rights, Copeland is entitled to qualified immunity because Thompson's right not to have a gun pointed at him under the circumstances here was not clearly established at the time the events took place. In arriving at this conclusion, we take careful note of recent Supreme Court precedent illuminating the reach and parameters of qualified immunity in the excessive force context. . . . Just last year, in a case addressing excessive force, the Supreme Court underscored that qualified immunity, when properly applied, protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . .Looking to the particular setup here, we cannot say that every reasonable officer in Copeland's position would have known that he was violating the constitution by pointing a gun at Thompson. Thompson's nighttime, felony arrest arising from an automobile stop, in which a gun was found, coupled with a fluid, dangerous situation, distinguishes this case from our earlier precedent. More specifically, Copeland was conducting a felony arrest at night of a suspect who was not handcuffed, stood six feet tall and weighed two hundred and sixty-five pounds, was taller and heavier than Copeland, and had a prior felony conviction for unlawfully possessing a firearm. Although Thompson was cooperative, the situation was still critical in terms of potential danger to the officers, especially given that a loaded gun was only 10–15 feet away. Copeland did not violate a 'clearly established' right as that concept has been elucidated by the Supreme Court in the excessive force context. . . In arguing that Copeland violated his clearly established rights, Thompson points to our earlier decisions in Robinson v. Solano Cty., 278 F.3d 1007 (9th Cir. 2002) (en banc), and Hopkins v. Bonvicino, 573 F.3d 752 (9th Cir. 2009). But neither of those cases involved a felony traffic stop with a firearm in proximity, nor did they feature facts sufficiently similar to the pattern we address here to put the constitutional question beyond debate as required to defeat qualified immunity. . . . After careful scrutiny of the record, we are not persuaded that Copeland was 'plainly incompetent' or that he 'knowingly violate[d] the law' when he acted as he did. . . .While Thompson fails to carry his burden that, in view of the safety concerns faced in this traffic stop, every reasonable police officer would have known that Copeland's conduct was unconstitutional under these circumstances, we acknowledge that the facts of this case are at the outer limit of qualified immunity's protection in the excessive force context. There can be little question that holding the gun in the low-ready alternative would have been a superior option for Copeland to use in the circumstances here, rather than pointing it at Thompson's head. In the face of the then-current law, there was not a clearly established constitutional violation. Going forward, however, the law is clearly established in this scenario.")

Thompson v. Rahr, 885 F.3d 582, 590-97 (9th Cir. 2018) (Christen, J., dissenting) ("The majority decides Deputy Copeland is entitled to qualified immunity on Lawrence Thompson's excessive force claim because Thompson's right not to have a gun pointed at his head was not clearly established in 2011, when the events of this case took place. This decision squarely conflicts with the clear directive our court issued in Robinson v. Solano County, a case involving facts that, if distinguishable at all, posed a greater threat to officer safety. We specifically took Robinson en banc 'to clarify the law of the circuit on the scope of qualified immunity for excessive force claims,' 278 F.3d 1007, 1009 (9th Cir. 2002) (en banc), and Robinson's holding was plain: an officer who points his gun at the head of an arrestee who is cooperative and unthreatening, outnumbered by police, and apparently unarmed, violates the Fourth Amendment. . . If the contours of this right were not clearly established before we decided Robinson, they most certainly were thereafter. . . Today's decision regrettably muddies Robinson's clear dictates, but it cannot overturn sixteen years of precedent. Because our three-judge panel is bound to abide by Robinson, I respectfully dissent. . . . Robinson was decided in 2002. It cannot be questioned that the rule from Robinson was clearly established when Thompson was arrested in 2011. Today, the court agrees that Deputy Copeland used unconstitutionally excessive force. It also agrees that, going forward, qualified immunity should not be available to officers who point guns at suspects under similar circumstances. Yet the court grants Deputy Copeland qualified immunity. It does so by concluding that, until now, the law had not made it clear to an officer in Deputy Copeland's position that pointing a gun at the suspect's head would constitute excessive force. The court offers two reasons for reaching this conclusion. Neither withstands scrutiny. First, the court likens Thompson's case to a traffic stop. That comparison would be apt if Thompson had been sitting in a car, because then a reasonable deputy might have feared that Thompson could reach a hidden weapon. But Thompson was outside of his car and well away from it, he had already been frisked, and he was under the guard of a second officer. The possibility of a secreted weapon did not justify pointing a gun at Thompson's head. The only other justification the court offers for granting qualified immunity is its suggestion that Robinson's case did not put Deputy Copeland on notice that threatening Thompson with lethal force would be excessive because, unlike Thompson, Robinson was 'approach[ing] from the area immediately surrounding ... his home' when officers pointed their guns at him. . . . Inevitably, there are minor factual differences between Robinson's case and Thompson's, but the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed that a plaintiff need not identify 'a case directly on point' for a right to be clearly established. . . . The question is whether existing precedent 'placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,'. . such that a reasonable officer in the defendant's position would have known his behavior was unlawful[.] . .Here, factual differences between Thompson's case and Robinson's only underscore the strength of Thompson's excessive force claim: Deputy Copeland himself patted down Thompson before he directed Thompson to sit on the bumper of the patrol car. Thompson's affect was calm, he was under the supervision of another officer, he was seated at least 10 to 15 feet away from the vehicle he had been driving—and at least that far from the gun on its rear floorboard. Like Robinson, Thompson was outnumbered by officers. He was apologetic and uncombative. There were 'no dangerous or exigent circumstances apparent at the time of the detention,'. . . nor any allegation that Thompson was behaving erratically. Robinson provided fair notice that pointing a gun at a suspect's head under these circumstances—where a fully compliant suspect is unarmed, outnumbered, and unthreatening—violates the Fourth Amendment. The court's effort to distinguish Robinson by suggesting that Robinson was anywhere near the curtilage of his home erodes our en banc effort to provide a clear standard for police officers. . . . Here, the court acknowledges that Thompson was 'under control' and 'not in close proximity to an accessible weapon.' . . . This court has seen an alarming number of officer shooting cases in recent years, many involving circumstances similar to those present here but with fatal results. Police departments are to be commended for acknowledging the problem and making efforts to address it, . . . as are Blue Ribbon commissions convened to determine how and why situations like this one too often escalate to involve the use or threatened use of deadly force, and to identify training tactics that reduce risks. . . Hopefully, this important work will continue. There will always be tension between protecting individual rights and allowing officers the flexibility they need to protect the public and themselves, but the court's job is to balance officers' use of force against intrusions on individuals' Fourth Amendment rights. . . The facts of this case cannot be meaningfully distinguished from those in Robinson, and we have already made the judgment that on these facts the balance tips in the suspect's favor. . . .Robinson recognized the critical distinction between pointing a gun at someone's head and holding it in the low-ready position. Deputy Copeland was justified in displaying some degree of force, but accepting the allegations in the complaint as true, he unquestionably used excessive force when he aimed his gun at Thompson's head and threatened that if Thompson moved, he'd be dead. Because that rule was clearly established long before Thompson was arrested, I respectfully dissent.") Bonivert v. City of Clarkston, 883 F.3d 865, 872-74, 879 (9th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he reasonableness standard governing violations of a Fourth Amendment right is distinct from the reasonableness standard governing whether the right was 'clearly established.'. . The former protects an officer who reasonably, but mistakenly, perceives facts that would have made his actions lawful had they been true. . . The latter, by contrast, goes further by acknowledging 'that reasonable mistakes can be made as to the legal constraints on particular police conduct.'. . Thus, even an officer who correctly perceives the facts establishing that his conduct was 'unreasonable' under the Fourth Amendment is entitled to immunity if he was mistaken 'as to what the law require[d]' under the circumstances, so long as the mistake was 'reasonable.'. . . Among constitutional rules, few are as well established, frequently applied, and familiar to police officers as the warrant requirement and its exceptions. Because there is no dispute that the officers failed to obtain a warrant before entering Bonivert's home, the entry was presumptively unreasonable. The officers argue that their entry was nevertheless justified by the three exceptions to the warrant requirement: consent, emergency aid, and exigent circumstances. Alternatively, the officers claim they are entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established law that these exceptions did not justify a warrantless entry under the circumstances. . . .This is not a case involving 'such an undeveloped state of the law' that qualified immunity is necessary to protect the officers from the special unfairness that results when they are 'expected to predict the future course of constitutional law.'. . Rather, it is one demanding 'knowledge of ... basic, unquestioned constitutional rights.'. . To the extent the officers were mistaken 'as to what the law require[d]' to justify a warrantless entry that evening, we conclude their mistake was not 'reasonable.'. . Taken in the light most favorable to Bonivert, the facts demonstrate that the officers violated Bonivert's constitutional right because no exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement justified the officers' entry into Bonivert's home. Additionally, the unlawfulness of the officers' entry under each exception was clearly established because it 'was apparent in light of pre-existing law. . . We explain our holding with respect to each exception below. . . .We recognize that police officers responding to reports of domestic violence are 'not conducting a trial, but' rather are 'required to make ... on-the-spot decision[s].'. . In this case, however, the facts of the situation did not entitle officers to 'disregard the overriding respect for the sanctity of the home that has been embedded in our traditions since the origins of the Republic.'. . The officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on Bonivert's warrantless entry claim because it was clearly established law, as of 2012, that neither consent, the emergency aid exception, nor the exigency exception justified the officers' warrantless entry.")

Kramer v. Cullinan, 878 F.3d 1156, 1164 (9th Cir. 2018) ("By the time of Kramer's termination, it was clearly established law that an employer charging an employee with fraud, dishonesty, or immorality is required under the Fourteenth Amendment to afford that employee a name-clearing hearing. . . However, that generalized statement of the law was not sufficient to put Dr. Cullinan on notice that her particular actions violated Kramer's constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, Kramer's reliance on Tibbets and Cox as 'clearly establishing' precedent is not persuasive. Those cases did not definitively place the question of whether the conditional language in the Miller Nash letter was stigmatizing 'beyond debate.'. . Indeed, as discussed, the language in the Letter is not similar to phrasing that we have found to be stigmatizing. The district court failed to identify, the parties have not cited, and we have not found a case where conditional language was determined to be stigmatizing. Neither has a case been referenced that found stigmatization in the absence of a charge of fraud, dishonesty, or immoral conduct. In this circumstance, Kramer has failed to place the stigmatizing nature of the Letter 'beyond debate.'. . Reliance on the broad principles espoused in Tibbets and similar cases clearly establishing the stigmatizing nature of charges of fraud, dishonesty, or immorality does not place the question in this case 'beyond debate' because the Letter did not charge Kramer with fraud, dishonesty or immorality. At worst, the Letter could plausibly be read to imply a breach of fiduciary duty. But no precedent has been brought to our attention clearly establishing a charge of breach of fiduciary duty as stigmatizing. The Supreme Court has cautioned us against defining clearly established law 'at a high level of generality.'. . In White, the Supreme Court overruled a decision of the Tenth Circuit denying qualified immunity where 'it failed to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . The Supreme Court reiterated that 'the clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . There is simply no clearly established law 'particularized to the [unique] facts of [this] case.'. . This is not a case where the stigmatizing nature of the charge is obvious as in Guzman . . . or Tibbetts. . .or Campanelli. . . or Vanelli. . . . Dr. Cullinan's conduct did not constitute such a run-of-the-mill Fourteenth Amendment violation. Instead, this case lacks an explicit charge of fraud, dishonesty, or immorality, militating against a conclusion that Dr. Cullinan's actions violated a 'clearly established' right.")

Frudden v. Pilling, 877 F.3d 821, 832 (9th Cir. 2017) ("While Barnette and the present case both involve public schools, 'Tomorrow's Leaders' is not analogous to the Pledge of Allegiance. The former is an anodyne phrase printed on a shirt or sweatshirt, while the latter is a compelled oral recitation pledging fidelity to national unity (in its current form, to national unity 'under God'). Further, while Wooley and the present case both involve printed words, the cases are not analogous. The motto 'Tomorrow's Leaders' has little if any substantive content and was displayed on a uniform only in a school setting. In contrast, 'Live Free or Die' has obvious political content and is publicly displayed everywhere a vehicle is driven. Thus, it can hardly be maintained that these two cases clearly establish that the motto 'Tomorrow's Leaders' violates the First Amendment. Stated otherwise, existing precedent had not 'placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'")

Dunlap v. Anchorage Police Dep't., 712 F. App'x 646, ___ (9th Cir. 2017) ("The legal framework governing the probable cause determination was contradictory and confusing, and the singular case on which Dunlap relies, De Nardo v. State, 819 P.2d 903 (Alaska Ct. App. 1991), does not resolve that confusion. For a right to be 'clearly established,' 'a case directly on point' is not required, 'but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . De Nardo did not place beyond debate the question of whether 'on the person' applies to concealed weapons located within easy reach, as De Nardo explicitly declined to define the 'outer boundaries' of 'on the person' and did not address the concealed weapons laws in a factual context similar to that of the instant appeal. . . Moreover, no case law or statutory definitions clarify how the combination of Alaska Statute 11.61.220 and Anchorage Municipal Ordinance 8.25.020 operate under the circumstances at issue here. . . Accordingly, Dunlap fails to carry his burden of demonstrating that the right allegedly violated was clearly established. . . The district court correctly held that Henry is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Entler v. Gregoire, 872 F.3d 1031, 1042-45 & n. 27 (9th Cir. 2017) ("It was . . . beyond cavil that Entler's grievances were the first requisite steps in the pursuit of civil litigation. . . The threat of civil litigation if a prisoner's complaints are not redressed is implicit in every grievance; explicitly articulating that threat as a precursor to initiating civil litigation does not suddenly make that threat more intimidating or coercive. Thus, in the analogous Title VII retaliation context, we noted—twenty years before Entler was punished—that '[w]e see no legal distinction to be made between the filing of a charge which is clearly protected, and threatening to file a charge.'. .We find the Gifford footnote persuasive since we see no material distinction between retaliation in the Title VII context and prisoner retaliation. . . The sanctity of a constitutional right is at least of equal moment as a statutory right. And even though, in the face of Ninth Circuit precedent, we need not resort to out-of-circuit caselaw, we note with approval two out-of-circuit district court cases involving prisoner litigation. . . .In essence, it is illogical to conclude that prison officials may punish a prisoner for threatening to sue when it would be unconstitutional to punish a prisoner for actually suing. Thus, once again, as we held in Hargis, ten years before Entler was sanctioned, a threat to sue—even if verbal—may not ipso facto rise to the level of coercion to support prison retaliation. . . Taking the complaint as true in the face of a 12(c) motion to dismiss on the pleadings, . . . we cannot conclude that a reasonable official would not have understood that disciplining Entler for threatening to file a civil suit was constitutionally impermissible. Therefore, on the papers before us, Appellees are not entitled to qualified immunity for Entler's threats to initiate civil litigation. . . .Included in the mix of infractions that caused Hearing Officer Jackson to sentence Entler to fifteen days of lost 'big yard' and gym time was Entler's threat to 'file criminal charges/arrest by sheriff.' We hold, as a matter of first impression in our circuit, that both the filing of a criminal complaint by a prisoner, as well as the threat to do so, are protected by the First Amendment, provided they are not baseless. . . Although we have not had occasion to opine on the foundational constitutional principle, we join our two sister circuits that have held that the filing of criminal complaints falls within the embrace of the First Amendment. [citing cases from 10th and 5th Circuits] It logically follows, therefore, just as with threats to file civil litigation, that the right to petition for the redress of grievances applies with equal force to threats to file criminal complaints. Therefore, the threat by a prisoner to file a criminal complaint, as well as the filing of the complaint, are both constitutionally protected conduct. . . . Although we hold that Entler's threat to file his criminal complaint was a constitutionally protected right, we are not convinced that at the time of the threat 'any reasonable official in [Appellees'] shoes would have understood that [they were] violating it, meaning that existing precedent ... placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . While it is true that where, as here, there is no binding Ninth Circuit precedent, we may 'look to whatever decisional law is available, including relevant decisions of other circuits, state courts, and district courts,'. . . , neither Meyer, Hylton, nor the three out-of-circuit prisoner cases hold that the threat to file a criminal complaint is constitutionally protected conduct. . . Unlike the threat to sue, therefore, there is neither Ninth Circuit precedent nor out-of-circuit authority addressing that issue, let alone a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'. . .Since the record does not support Entler's claim that he was retaliated against for filing a criminal complaint, we need not address whether qualified immunity would there attach.") Sharp v. Cty. of Orange, 871 F.3d 901, 910-13, 915-20 (9th Cir. 2017) ("Although unconstitutional, the arrest was not clearly proscribed by established federal law. The Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed that we examine 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established' by controlling precedent, not whether the conduct violates a general principle of law. . . Therefore, while Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797, 802 (1971), and Rivera v. County of Los Angeles, 745 F.3d 384, 389 (9th Cir. 2014), establish a general rule that an unreasonable mistake of identity renders an arrest unconstitutional, we cannot simply apply that general rule to the facts of this case. Except in the rare case of an 'obvious' instance of constitutional misconduct (which is not presented here), Plaintiffs must 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [defendants] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . In other words, Plaintiffs must point to prior case law that articulates a constitutional rule specific enough to alert these deputies in this case that their particular conduct was unlawful. To achieve that kind of notice, the prior precedent must be 'controlling'—from the Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court—or otherwise be embraced by a 'consensus' of courts outside the relevant jurisdiction. . . . It is true that in a sufficiently 'obvious' case of constitutional misconduct, we do not require a precise factual analogue in our judicial precedents. . . . But this obviousness principle, an exception to the specific-case requirement, is especially problematic in the Fourth-Amendment context. When a violation is obvious enough to override the necessity of a specific factual analogue, we mean to say that it is almost always wrong for an officer in those circumstances to act as he did. But that kind of categorical statement is particularly hard to make when officers encounter suspects every day in never-before-seen ways. There are countless confrontations involving officers that yield endless permutations of outcomes and responses. So the obviousness principle has real limits when it comes to the Fourth Amendment. . . With these observations in mind, we find this is not 'one of those rare cases' in which a violation was so 'obvious' that qualified immunity does not apply 'even without a case directly on point.'. . . The deputies subsequently detained Sharp III's in the patrol car after they discovered that he was not the warrant subject. . . .We hold that the categorical detention rule announced in Summers does not apply to arrest warrants, and because there were no particular circumstances justifying Sharp III's detention after learning he was not the arrest-warrant subject, we conclude that detention was unconstitutional as well. However, once again, it did not violate clearly established law because of the legal ambiguity existing at the time of the arrest as to whether the categorical Summers exception applied to arrest warrants. Thus, qualified immunity should have been granted. . . . We hold that the Summers exception, which hinged critically on the distinct nature of a search warrant, does not extend to arrest warrants. . . .Although there was no constitutional authority to detain Sharp III in the patrol car after discovering he was not the subject of the warrant, that particular detention was not clearly proscribed by established law. Except when there is an 'obvious' instance of constitutional misconduct, Plaintiffs must 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [defendants] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . Simply put, there is no such controlling case here that would alert these officers to the proper scope of Summers. . . .Plaintiffs have also failed to identify a case that pronounces a constitutional rule at a level of specificity sufficient to alert these deputies here that their conduct was unconstitutional in the specific circumstances they confronted. Nor is this a sufficiently 'obvious' case justifying departure from our requirement that there be some factually analogous judicial precedent. Thus, qualified immunity should have been granted. . . .Turning to the degree of force used, Plaintiffs point only to cases that establish the general framework for evaluating how much force is constitutionally excessive. See, e.g., Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 (1989). But that is not enough to defeat a qualified-immunity defense. We are aware of no controlling constitutional principle or judicial precedent that is specific enough to alert Deputy Anderson that the degree of force he used in these circumstances was unreasonable. Thus, qualified immunity was warranted. . . .Sharp III asserts a First Amendment claim based on the deputies' alleged retaliation against him for being argumentative. . . .While in the patrol car, Sharp III was visibly angry at the deputies, swore at them, and threatened to sue them. In response, Deputy Anderson told him, 'If you weren't being so argumentative, I'd probably just put you on the curb.'. . We conclude that Sharp III suffered unconstitutional retaliation that was clearly proscribed by established law. . . .This violation was clearly established by Ford v. City of Yakima, 706 F.3d 1188 (9th Cir. 2013). In that case, a police officer pulled over a driver who was blasting loud music, and because the driver would not stop 'running [his] mouth' and exhibited an uncooperative 'attitude,' the officer arrested him and booked him in jail—rather than merely issuing a citation. . .The officer repeated that he was arresting the man because the man would not 'shut up' and had 'diarrhea of the mouth.'. . On these facts, we found an unconstitutional retaliation. These facts are sufficiently analogous to the case before us to conclude that Deputy Anderson was on notice that his particular conduct was unconstitutional. Thus, qualified immunity was properly denied.") Sharp v. Cty. of Orange, 871 F.3d 901, 923-27 (9th Cir. 2017) (N.R. Smith, J., dissenting in part) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Sharp III, it is obvious that the deputies arrested Sharp III without probable cause. The facts in this case do not come close to meeting the probable cause standard. In an effort to avoid that uncomfortable truth, the Majority ignores the statements made by Deputies Anderson and Flores and analyzes this case as one of mistaken identity. . . But that theory crumbles when we view the facts in the light most favorable to Sharp III. Since the deputies had fair warning that their conduct violated Sharp III's Fourth Amendment rights when they arrested him without probable cause, they are not entitled to qualified immunity. The District Court was right; this claim should go to trial. . . . Based on Deputy Anderson's statement, the Majority concedes that the deputies failed to release Sharp III in retaliation for exercising his First Amendment rights. In contrast, when analyzing whether the continued detention violated Sharp III's Fourth Amendment rights, the Majority inexplicably ignores Deputy Anderson's statement. Instead, the Majority improperly concludes that the deputies may have reasonably but mistakenly believed that the exception in Summers applied to arrest warrants. However, the Majority's conclusion is possible only if we view the evidence in the light most favorable to the deputies. Thus, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Sharp III, the deputies continued Sharp III's arrest because he exercised his First Amendment rights. . . . Holding a suspect in custody for exercising his First Amendment rights is an obvious violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . .[In Duran v. City of Douglas, Ariz., 904 F.2d 1372 (9th Cir. 1990)], the court held that detaining an individual without probable cause for exercising First Amendment rights was an obvious violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . The import of Duran is clear: the deputies committed a clearly established violation of the Fourth Amendment when they kept Sharp III in custody for exercising his First Amendment rights. . . As a result, the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis does not provide immunity to the deputies. . . . In this case, the Majority agrees Sharp III was arrested, so the exception in Summers could never apply. While a mere detention can turn into a de facto arrest, . . . the Majority does not go there. Further, I am aware of no case in which an arrest turned into a mere detention. . . Consequently, Sharp III continued to be under arrest during his subsequent seizure in the patrol vehicle. Thus, Summers, even if it applied to arrest warrants, could never justify Sharp III's continued seizure. Since the language in Summers is categorical and clear, any reasonable officer would know this. . . .Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Sharp III, the deputies used considerable force against Sharp III. The deputies arrested Sharp III at gun point and used enough force to tear his rotator cuff. On the other hand, he had committed no crime. Deputy Flores conceded that the deputies arrested Sharp III because 'we were trying to just detain everybody[.]' Sharp III posed no immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others. Sharp III walked calmly toward the deputies and was fully compliant. He never resisted or attempted to evade arrest by flight. No reasonable officer would believe using force, let alone significant force, was lawful under these circumstances. None of the Graham factors were present. Since Deputy Anderson had fair warning that his use of force violated Sharp III's Fourth Amendment rights, he is not entitled to qualified immunity. The District Court was right; this claim should go to trial. . . . Contrary to precedent regarding qualified immunity, the Majority fails to view the facts in the light most favorable to Sharp III when analyzing these Fourth Amendment claims. Consequently, the Majority improperly grants the deputies qualified immunity for their initial arrest of Sharp III, their use of excessive force against Sharp III, their subsequent search of Sharp III, and their continued arrest of Sharp III. Instead, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Sharp III, the deputies are not entitled to qualified immunity for any of these constitutional violations. Thus, Sharp III's Fourth Amendment claims stemming from these violations should go to trial right along with Sharp III's claim of First Amendment retaliation. I dissent.") Shafer v. Cty. of Santa Barbara, 868 F.3d 1110, 1113, 1117-18 (9th Cir. 2017) ("The jury found that Deputy Padilla violated Shafer's Fourth Amendment constitutional right to be free from excessive force. The evidence adduced at trial was sufficient to sustain the jury's verdict. However, Deputy Padilla is entitled to qualified immunity, because, at the time this incident occurred, the law was not clearly established that an officer cannot progressively increase his use of force from verbal commands, to an arm grab, and then a leg sweep maneuver when a misdemeanant refuses to comply with the officer's orders and resists, obstructs, or delays the officer in his lawful performance of duties such that the officer has probable cause to arrest him in a challenging environment. . . . Defined at an appropriate level of specificity, the question at hand is whether an officer violates clearly established law when he progressively increases his use of force from verbal commands, to an arm grab, and then a leg sweep maneuver, when a misdemeanant refuses to comply with the officer's orders and resists, obstructs, or delays the officer in his lawful performance of duties such that the officer has probable cause to arrest him in a challenging environment. The answer is no. We are mindful of the Supreme Court's pronouncement in White v. Pauly that, to satisfy this step in the qualified immunity analysis, we generally must 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Deputy Padilla] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . We are aware of no such case. Shafer cites four cases with comparable degrees of force used by officers, but none of which involved a challenging environment or an act of physical resistance or obstruction by the arrestee. . . .Although we do not require a case to be 'on all fours,'. . . '[w]e cannot conclude ... in light of these existing precedents, that "every reasonable official would have understood ... beyond debate,"'. . . that Deputy Padilla's conduct in these circumstances constituted excessive force based on the cases cited by Shafer. In these cases, where there is a 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,'. . . such that the officer 'reasonably misapprehends the law governing the circumstances [ ]he confronted,' qualified immunity protects officers. . .Shafer's primary argument on appeal is that Deputy Padilla violated clearly established law, because he had no basis for using any force whatsoever. We disagree. The jury found that Deputy Padilla had probable cause to arrest Shafer for violations of California Penal Code section 148 for resisting, delaying, or obstructing an officer. This entitled Deputy Padilla to use some degree of force. . . Finally, Shafer argues that it is Deputy Padilla's burden to demonstrate that he did not violate Shafer's clearly established constitutional right. Again, we disagree. It is the plaintiff who 'bears the burden of showing that the rights allegedly violated were "clearly established."'. . Because Shafer fails to identify sufficiently specific constitutional precedents to alert Deputy Padilla that his particular conduct was unlawful, Deputy Padilla is entitled to qualified immunity.")

S.B. v. County of San Diego, 864 F.3d 1010, 1014-16 (9th Cir. 2017) ("Here, a reasonable jury could conclude that: (1) the three officers, responding to a call about a mentally ill and intoxicated individual 'acting aggressively,' entered Brown's house and saw that he had knives in his pockets; (2) after Brown complied with the officers' orders to kneel, Brown grabbed a knife with a six-to-eight-inch blade from his back pocket; (3) Moses shot Brown as soon as his hand touched the knife; (4) Brown was on his knees when he was shot; (5) when he grabbed the knife, Brown was approximately six to eight feet away from Vories; (6) Moses could not see the other officers at the time Brown grabbed the knife; (7) after Brown went for the knife, the officers did not order him to drop the knife or warn that he was about to be shot; and (8) Vories had a non-lethal option – a Taser gun. Viewing the facts in this light, Moses's use of deadly force was not objectively reasonable, and therefore violated Brown's Fourth Amendment right against excessive force. Our holding mirrors those in similar cases. . . .But that is not all. Under the second prong of the qualified immunity test, we decide if the alleged violation of Brown's Fourth Amendment right against excessive force 'was clearly established at the time of the officer's alleged misconduct.'. . . In analyzing this question, we acknowledge the Supreme Court's recent frustration with failures to heed its holdings. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts – and the Ninth Circuit in particular – not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Our court lacks a monopoly over such immunity missteps. When recently reversing the Tenth Circuit, the Supreme Court wrote: 'In the last five years, [the Supreme Court] has issued a number of opinions reversing federal courts in qualified immunity cases.' White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 551 (2017) (per curiam) (citing Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. at 1774 n.3 (collecting cases)). 'The Court has found this necessary both because qualified immunity is important to "society as a whole," and because as "an immunity from suit," qualified immunity "is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial."'.

. . We hear the Supreme Court loud and clear. Before a court can impose liability on Moses, we must identify precedent as of August 24, 2013 – the night of the shooting – that put Moses on clear notice that using deadly force in these particular circumstances would be excessive. General excessive force principles, as set forth in Graham and Garner, are 'not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning to officers,' but they 'do not by themselves create clearly established law outside an obvious case.'. . Instead, we must 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Moses] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . We cannot locate any such precedent. Our most similar case which pre-dates Moses's use of deadly force is Glenn, where officers fatally shot a suicidal and intoxicated individual in his driveway who did not comply with orders to put down a pocketknife. . . But in Glenn, the individual 'did not brandish [the pocketknife] at anyone, but rather held [it] to his own neck.'. . Brown's grabbing the knife from his pocket despite orders to place his hands on his head was more threatening. . . As such, the facts of Glenn are not sufficiently analogous to give Moses fair notice that it was objectively unreasonable to use lethal force against Brown. . . Plaintiffs argue that two district court decisions (within the Ninth Circuit but outside of California) provided clear warning to Moses. However, 'district court decisions – unlike those from the courts of appeals – do not necessarily settle constitutional standards or prevent repeated claims of qualified immunity.'. . Moreover, even if district court decisions could clearly establish the law for purposes of qualified immunity, the cases on which plaintiffs rely are insufficient. . . . We disagree with the district court that it was clearly established on August 24, 2013, that using deadly force in this situation, even viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, would constitute excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. . . The district court did not have the benefit of White, and the cases that plaintiffs cite do not satisfy White's exacting standard. Nor does this case involve an 'obvious' or 'run-of-the-mill' violation of the Fourth Amendment under Graham and Garner. . . Moses is therefore immune from liability under section 1983 for his use of deadly force, so we reverse the denial of summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment claim.")

Estate of Peterson v. Krueger, No. 14-35682, 2017 WL 1174402, at *1 (9th Cir. Mar. 30, 2017) (not reported) ("The United States Supreme Court recently reiterated 'the longstanding principle that "clearly established law" should not be defined "at a high level of generality."'. . '[T]he clearly established law must be "particularized" to the facts of the case.'. . The district court erred in failing to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as Krueger was held to have violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Instead, the district court relied on Munger v. City of Glasgow Police Department, 227 F.3d 1082 (9th Cir. 2000), Kennedy v. City of Ridgefield, 439 F.3d 1055 (9th Cir. 2006), and Patel v. Kent School District, 648 F.3d 965 (9th Cir. 2011), which lay out the state-created danger exception in markedly different circumstances and are applicable to this case only at a high level of generality. Accordingly, we conclude that summary judgment based on qualified immunity was warranted because the law was not clearly established at the time of the alleged conduct.")

Hardwick v. County of Orange, 844 F.3d 1112, 1117-20 (9th Cir. 2017) ("[T]he 'salient question' we must answer is 'whether the state of the law [as of February, 2000, when the conduct at issue allegedly occurred] gave [these social workers] fair warning' that their alleged use of perjured testimony and fabricated evidence in court in order to sever Preslie's familial bond with her mother was unconstitutional. . . .No official with an IQ greater than room temperature in Alaska could claim that he or she did not know that the conduct at the center of this case violated both state and federal law. The social workers in this case are alleged to have knowingly and maliciously violated the law in their attempt to sever Preslie's protected relationship with her mother. Perjury is a crime under both federal and California state law, as is the knowing submission of false evidence to a court. 18 U.S.C. § 1621; Cal. Penal Code § 118. Both crimes make no distinction between criminal and civil proceedings. This malicious criminal behavior is hardly conduct for which qualified immunity is either justified or appropriate. The doctrine exists to protect mistaken but reasonable decisions, not purposeful criminal conduct. As the Supreme Court repeated in Sheehan, officials who knowingly violate the law are not entitled to immunity. . . . Just as the Court in Hope used an ADOC regulation and a DOJ report to support its conclusion that the officials were on fair notice of the wrongfulness of their conduct, here, a pertinent state statute warns defendants in unmistakable language of the personal consequences of lies, perjury, and deception: the loss of immunity for such conduct. Furthermore, the statute focuses on behavior designed wrongfully to affect dependency proceedings in court, the citadel of Due Process. We believe this is the kind of case the Supreme Court had in mind in Hope when it talked about conduct so clearly and obviously wrong that the conduct itself unmistakably 'should have provided [defendants] with some notice' that their alleged conduct violated their targets' constitutional rights.")

Kirkpatrick v. County of Washoe, 843 F.3d 784, 792-93 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) ("In July 2008 it was well-settled that a child could not be removed without prior judicial authorization absent evidence that the child was in imminent danger of serious bodily injury. . . But the Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . . In 2008, it was not beyond debate that the confluence of factors set forth above would not support a finding of exigency. No Supreme Court precedent defines when a warrant is required to seize a child under exigent circumstances. And although the Supreme Court has assumed that circuit precedent can be a dispositive source of clearly established law, see id.; Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350 (2014); Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012), none of the cases from this court explain when removing an infant from a parent's custody at a hospital to prevent neglect, without a warrant, crosses the line of reasonableness and violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . In fact, very few cases from any circuit have addressed what constitutes exigent circumstances in a case that remotely resembles this one. . . No matter how carefully a reasonable social worker had read our case law, she could not have known that seizing B.W. would violate federal constitutional law. Without that fair notice, the social workers in this case are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Kirkpatrick v. County of Washoe, 843 F.3d 784, 798-800 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (Friedland, J., joined by Thomas, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I join the majority's opinion as to municipal liability but dissent from its affirmance of summary judgment on the claim against the individual defendants. An official is liable, and not entitled to qualified immunity, if her 'conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right.'. . The constitutional rule that B.W. could not be seized without a warrant absent imminent danger was clearly established, and it was equally clear that there was no imminent danger to B.W. On the Fourth Amendment claim against the social workers, I would therefore hold that summary judgment to Defendants should be reversed and Plaintiff's cross-motion for summary judgment should be granted. . . The majority correctly recognizes that the rule of law at issue here was clearly established at the time: '[A] child could not be removed without prior judicial authorization absent evidence that the child was in imminent danger of serious bodily injury.'. . . Although it is true that no binding authority has addressed this exact factual scenario, such specificity is not required for a constitutional obligation to be 'clearly established.'. . It was clearly established that a child could not be seized without a warrant absent imminent danger, and the inescapable conclusion to be drawn from this record is that no objective social worker could have believed—and indeed, these social workers did not believe—that B.W. was in imminent danger. It follows, therefore, that the social workers violated B.W.'s clearly established constitutional rights.")

Kirkpatrick v. County of Washoe, 843 F.3d 784, 800 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (Kozinski, J., joined by O'Scannlain, Rawlinson, and Bea, JJ., and Watford, J., joining with respect to Part 2, dissenting in part) ("For the reasons explained in my panel dissent, I agree that the social workers here are entitled to qualified immunity and join that part of the opinion. But I cannot agree that the social workers committed a constitutional violation, nor that the County can be liable for a policy of unconstitutional conduct under Monell. I therefore dissent from those portions of the opinion.")

Shepard v. Quillen, 840 F.3d 686, 693-94 (9th Cir. 2016) ("A prisoner's general right against retaliatory punishment was clearly established well before Wise transferred Shepard to administrative segregation in 2008. . . Nor was there any question that Shepard was engaged in protected conduct and that he was subject to the type of adverse action that would chill speech. . . But to overcome qualified immunity, Shepard must show that, as to the precise conduct at issue, 'existing precedent ... placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . Because the analysis of a retaliation claim is largely subjective, it's difficult to determine at the summary judgment stage whether a reasonable officer in Wise's position would have known he was violating the law. As we have explained, a jury could determine that Wise was motivated by retaliatory animus. But a jury could also conclude that Wise was relying on what he reasonably thought was a prison policy. In the latter circumstance he wouldn't have violated any right, let alone a clearly established one. But in the former, Wise would have been 'knowingly violat[ing] the law.'. . Nor, assuming Shepard's version of events is true, can Wise claim that he could have reasonably believed his conduct was lawful because he was advancing a legitimate penological goal by complying with section 3335. . . As we have explained, there's virtually no evidence that Shepard needed to be transferred out of the general population for his own safety or to preserve the integrity of an investigation. . .Wise argues that because section 3335 mandates placing a prisoner in administrative segregation following a complaint, he could not have been on notice that his conduct was unlawful; the dissent echoes Wise's reading of the regulation, dissent at 25. But the regulation does no such thing, . . . let alone authorize prison officials to retaliate against prisoners for complaining about officers. No reasonable prison official could read the regulation in that way, and Wise has offered no evidence that any other official did so[.]. . . Considering the substantial chilling effect that such a reading would have on the long established right of prisoners to seek redress of grievances, . . . this interpretation doesn't even 'pass[ ] the laugh test'; its illegality would be 'so obvious that any prison official involved in enforcing it should have known he was breaking the law.'. . In 2003, five years before the events at issue, we followed 'other circuits [in] holding that prison officials may not defeat a retaliation claim ... simply by articulating a general justification for a neutral process, when there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the action was taken in retaliation for the exercise of a constitutional right.'. . Those circuits have stated their rule even more bluntly, holding that the 'policy [against retaliation] applies even where the action taken ... would otherwise be permissible.'. . Accordingly, the contours of Shepard's right against retaliation were 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official' in Wise's position would have understood 'that what he [was] doing violate[d] that right.'. . Wise may have done just what Bruce prohibits. Resolution of the disputed factual issues is thus 'critical to a proper determination of [Wise's] entitlement to qualified immunity.'. .Shepard has established a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Wise retaliated against him. He has also shown that Wise isn't entitled to qualified immunity at this stage. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment in Wise's favor.")

Shepard v. Quillen, 840 F.3d 686, 696-98 (9th Cir. 2016) (Tallman, J., dissenting) ("In short, Lieutenant Wise received a complaint that one of his correctional officers had engaged in abusive misconduct. Knowing this, Lieutenant Wise made a judgment call: Shepard's continued presence in his housing unit 'present[ed] an immediate threat to [Shepard's] safety' and 'jeopardize[d] the integrity of an investigation' into Officer Quillen's alleged misconduct. . . Lieutenant Wise properly followed prison policy and transferred Shepard into administrative segregation in furtherance of those legitimate penological goals. A reasonable correctional supervisor would have done the same. . . .Even assuming Shepard has alleged facts that show a constitutional violation, Lieutenant Wise is still entitled to qualified immunity if the right at issue was not 'clearly established' at the time of the challenged conduct. . . A clearly established right is one that is 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Shepard can't meet that high burden here. The question we must answer is: would a reasonable prison official in Lieutenant Wise's position have known that placing Shepard in administrative segregation after a complaint of serious staff assault, as directed by a clearly legitimate prison regulation, was a violation of Shepard's constitutional rights? I am at a loss as to how the answer to this question can be anything but a resounding 'no.'The relevant prison regulation, § 3335, required Lieutenant Wise to transfer Shepard into administrative segregation following his complaint of serious staff misconduct if Lieutenant Wise determined that Shepard's personal safety was at risk or that Shepard's continued presence in the housing unit threatened the integrity of the resulting internal investigation. The record amply demonstrates why it was reasonable for Lieutenant Wise to transfer Shepard into administrative segregation for these legitimate reasons. Under these circumstances, a reasonable officer in Lieutenant Wise's position could not have known that complying with a mandatory prison regulation would be a violation of Shepard's constitutional rights. In concluding otherwise and second-guessing his decision, the majority subjects Lieutenant Wise to unnecessary 'harassment, distraction, and liability.'. . The Supreme Court has told us that qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . Lieutenant Wise's decision to transfer Shepard into administrative segregation falls squarely within the range of conduct that is protected by qualified immunity. The district court properly granted him the law's protection. My colleagues err in refusing to apply it.")

A.K.H. v. City of Tustin, 837 F.3d 1005, 1013-14 (9th Cir. 2016) ("It has long been clear that '[a] police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead.' Garner, 471 U.S. at 11. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, that is precisely what Officer Villarreal did here. We affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Pauluk v. Savage, 836 F.3d 1117, 1118-19, 1123-26 (9th Cir. 2016) ("This case lies at the intersection of two lines of authority—on the one hand, the state-created danger doctrine under which constitutional due process claims may be brought; on the other, the Supreme Court's decision in Collins v. City of Harker Heights, 503 U.S. 115 (1992), declining to find a general due process right to a safe workplace. We hold that Collins does not bar Plaintiffs' due process claim. Plaintiffs have stated a claim under the state-created danger doctrine, notwithstanding the fact that the danger at issue is a physical condition in the workplace. However, we reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment as to Wojcik and Savage, on the ground that the due process right asserted by Plaintiffs was not clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . The threshold question before us is whether Plaintiffs' claim under the state-created danger doctrine is foreclosed by Collins. We conclude that it is not. . . .Other courts agree that Collins does not foreclose application of the state-created danger exception in workplace safety cases. . . . To prevail on a state-created danger due process claim, a plaintiff must show more than merely a failure to create or maintain a safe work environment. First, a plaintiff must show that the state engaged in 'affirmative conduct' that placed him or her in danger. . . .Second, the state actor must have acted with 'deliberate indifference' to a 'known or obvious danger.'. . .Plaintiffs' evidence, if true, satisfies both elements of a state-created danger claim. First, Pauluk's 2003 transfer back to Shadow Lane was 'affirmative' conduct. Pauluk clearly did not want to return to Shadow Lane and was transferred 'involuntarily.' There is sufficient evidence in the record that either or both Wojcik and Savage were sufficiently involved in the decision to transfer that a reasonable jury could conclude they should bear some responsibility for that transfer. . . .Second, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Wojcik and Savage acted with deliberate indifference in exposing Pauluk to a known and obvious danger. Plaintiffs presented evidence that Wojcik and Savage were both aware of the CCHD's long and tortured history of pervasive mold problems in multiple buildings, including the Shadow Lane facility. . . .The core question in this appeal is whether Collins bars the application of the state-created danger doctrine in cases where the danger is a physical condition in the workplace. Because Wood did not involve a dangerous workplace, it does not speak to this question. Grubbs I presents a closer analogy to this case. However, as recounted above, the danger in Grubbs I was a human actor who posed a known threat. In contrast, Pauluk was not harmed by a human agent, but rather by a physical condition in the building where he worked. This case is factually very similar to Collins, where, as here, the danger was a physical danger in the workplace. For the reasons given above, we conclude that Plaintiffs have stated a claim despite the fact that Pauluk's injury was caused by physical conditions in the workplace. But, because the Supreme Court in Collins declined to find a due process violation in a case with very similar facts, we cannot say that Wojcik and Savage were 'on notice' that their conduct was unlawful under clearly established law.")

Pauluk v. Savage, 836 F.3d 1117, 1126 (9th Cir. 2016) (Murgia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I fully agree with the opinion's analysis as to the scope of this court's jurisdiction to review the district court's denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, and with its conclusion that the district court erred in denying qualified immunity to Wojcik and Savage. However, even accepting as true the plaintiffs' version of events, see Behrens v. Pelletier, 516 U.S. 299, 313 (1996), I respectfully disagree that the plaintiffs have presented a cognizable claim that Wojcik and Savage affirmatively acted with deliberate indifference to Pauluk's substantive due process rights under the state-created danger doctrine.")

Pauluk v. Savage, 836 F.3d 1117, 1132-34 (9th Cir. 2016) (Noonan, J., dissenting) ("Today, the majority holds that the state-created danger doctrine—a theory of constitutional harm whose contours have been 'clearly established' by at least nine published opinions of this court over the course of two decades—is no longer sufficiently 'clear' in light of a single case which addresses an unrelated legal theory. I respectfully dissent. . . .No basis exists to distinguish this case from Wood, Kennedy, or any other published opinion of this court upholding the applicability of the state-created danger doctrine. I would affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment. I therefore concur with the majority's conclusion that, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, they have shown a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment under the state created danger doctrine. . . .Pauluk's case therefore presents the precise facts that the Collins Court deemed were inapplicable to its analysis and holding. Accordingly, Collins does not counsel against affirming the district court here. Indeed, the majority appears to concede that Collins is distinguishable, but concludes that even assuming Pauluk has stated a constitutional violation, the factual circumstances of this case are simply too similar to the facts of Collins for the defendants to have been ' "on notice" that their conduct was unlawful under clearly established law.'. . The law governing the state-created danger doctrine is 'clearly established' by the controlling precedent discussed above such that 'any reasonable official in [defendants'] shoes would have understood that [they were] violating it.' City & Cty. of S.F. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765 (2015) (citations omitted). Indeed, in light of these cases, the constitutional question has been 'placed...beyond debate.'. . A case which presents some factual similarities but lacks any legal nexus to the state-created danger doctrine cannot revive that debate, nor can it serve to convolute what this court has defined with pellucid clarity. Collins does not control here. Accordingly, I dissent.")

Managed Protective Services, Inc. v. City of Mesa, 654 F. App'x 276, __ (9th Cir. 2016) ("[T]he district court erred in examining solely 'hot pavement' cases to determine whether the law was clearly established. That courts have resolved prior 'hot pavement' cases differently is not dispositive; law can be 'clearly established' even if 'there was no case on all fours prohibiting that particular manifestation of unconstitutional conduct.'. .Among other relevant principles, it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibits the continued use of force against an arrestee who is restrained and no longer resisting, see, e.g., LaLonde v. County of Riverside, 204 F.3d 947, 960–61 (9th Cir. 2000), and that ignoring an arrestee's complaints of pain violates the Fourth Amendment, see, e.g., Palmer v. Sanderson, 9 F.3d 1433, 1436 (9th Cir. 1993)")

Managed Protective Services, Inc. v. City of Mesa, 654 F. App'x 276, ___ (9th Cir. 2016) (Bea, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part) ("I respectfully dissent from the majority's decision to reverse the district court's grant of qualified immunity as to the excessive force claim. The district court did not err when it canvassed other hot surface cases to determine whether the officers' conduct here amounted to a clearly established violation of Simpson's constitutional right to be free from unreasonable seizure. In assessing qualified immunity, '[i]t is important to emphasize that this inquiry "must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition."'. . Broad general propositions can establish a 'clear' violation 'in an obvious case.'. . However, as the district court noted, this is not such a case. Federal courts have reached different results in cases involving detainees and hot surfaces. . . This body of case law 'undoubtedly show[s] that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case.'. . 'None of them squarely governs the case here; they do suggest that [the officers'] actions fell in the "hazy border between excessive and acceptable force."'. . Accordingly, I would affirm the district court's holding that hobbling Simpson on hot pavement to overcome his physical resistance to entering the squad car did not amount to a clearly established violation of his constitutional rights.")

Sialoi v. City of San Diego, 823 F.3d 1223, 1233-36 (9th Cir. 2016) ("In sum, once the officers determined that the item in G.S.'s hand was a toy, no officer of 'reasonable caution' would have had any reason to believe that G.S., T.O.S., and B.F. were the suspects the apartment manager described, or were otherwise engaged in unlawful activity. Accordingly, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the officers violated the constitutional rights of G.S., T.O.S., and B.F. when they arrested them. . . .It is true, as the defendants argue, that the officers found themselves in a potentially dangerous situation: they were in a high-crime area responding to a report of suspects with weapons. While these background circumstances are no doubt relevant to the question whether the officers' conduct was reasonable, they do not render it even 'reasonably arguable' that probable cause existed for the arrests of the young boys. Where no facts specific to the arrestees establish probable cause, officers may not rely on general background facts to immunize themselves from suit. . . . To repeat, the officers encountered not two black individuals but instead three Samoans wearing clothing that did not resemble the apartment manager's description. Before handcuffing the three boys and placing them in a police car, the officers knew that the item in G.S.'s hand was a mere toy, knew that none of the boys possessed a gun, and were aware of no other even remotely suspicious activity in which any of the boys had engaged or were engaging. For these reasons, no reasonable officer would have concluded that probable caused existed to arrest the teenagers, and we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity for their arrest. . . . We hold that, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the remaining plaintiffs, no reasonable officer would have thought it lawful to detain and search them. The defendants do not dispute that it has long been clearly established that it is unlawful to conduct an investigatory stop and search unsupported by reasonable suspicion. . . Once the officers discovered that the item in G.S.'s hand was a mere toy, the only fact that in any way suggested that the Sialoi family was involved in criminal activity was the sole circumstance of their presence outside an apartment building near which two armed suspects had earlier been spotted. Were this sufficient to establish reasonable suspicion, the police would be authorized to indiscriminately detain individuals in areas of expected criminal activity without any 'basis for suspecting that the particular person detained is engaged in criminal activity.'. . Accordingly, no reasonable officer would think that the location of the encounter alone could serve as the basis for reasonable suspicion. Furthermore, because the officers do not 'allege[ ] any specific facts' suggesting that any of the remaining plaintiffs possessed a weapon, 'we conclude that it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that [the] pat-down[s] ... [were] unlawful in this situation.'. . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity for the officers' seizure and search of the remaining plaintiffs.") Hamby v. Hammond, 821 F.3d 1085, 1091-95 & n.3 (9th Cir. 2016) ("In a nutshell, according to the Supreme Court, state officials are entitled to qualified immunity so long as 'none of our precedents "squarely governs" the facts here,' meaning that 'we cannot say that only someone "plainly incompetent' or who "knowingly violate[s] the law" would have ... acted as [the officials] did.'. .Before applying the above principles to Hamby's case, we must emphasize that the fact-specific, highly contextualized nature of the inquiry does not depend on which particular constitutional right a given plaintiff claims the officials have violated. In particular, Hamby—drawing on some recent statements from our court—suggests that the qualified-immunity inquiry in Eighth Amendment cases differs from the inquiry in other types of cases, such as those involving excessive force, where analogies to prior cases supposedly play a stronger role. That proposition is demonstrably untrue. Not only has the Supreme Court never suggested any such distinction, but several cases affirmatively repudiate it. Indeed, Taylor v. Barkes was an Eighth Amendment case—just like the present one—in which an inmate's estate alleged that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs. . . . Likewise, Wood v. Moss and Reichle v. Howards were First Amendment cases rather than Fourth Amendment ones. . . And yet the Supreme Court's analysis proceeded along the same lines. These cases make clear that the particular right at issue in no way changes the fact-specific, highly contextualized nature of the 'clearly established' analysis. . .Given the foregoing doctrine, the question in this case must be: viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Hamby, was it 'beyond debate,' at the time the prison officials acted, that their conduct violated the Constitution? If the answer is no—if the officials' actions did not clearly violate Hamby's rights under the Eighth Amendment—then the officials are entitled to qualified immunity, and summary judgment must be entered in their favor. . . . For purposes of determining qualified immunity, therefore, we must ask the narrower question:

viewing the evidence most favorably to Hamby, and given existing case law at that time, was it 'beyond debate' that the prison officials pursued a medically unreasonable course of treatment by declining to refer Hamby for a surgical evaluation? . . . Here, the answer is no, even if we assume that each of the officials Hamby sued was aware of his chronic pain. . . That is, in light of existing precedent and the specific facts of Hamby's case, it is at least debatable that the officials complied with the Eighth Amendment, because—to the extent they played any role in the decision to deny Hamby surgery for his umbilical hernia—the record makes clear that they did so based on legitimate medical opinions that have often been held reasonable under the Eighth Amendment. . . . At worst, the evidence in the record shows a difference of medical opinion amounting to possible negligence on the part of Drs. Hammond and Smith. . . . Hamby's argument misunderstands the sort of clarity a plaintiff must demonstrate in order to overcome a defense of qualified immunity. For starters, defining the relevant right as simply the right to be free from deliberate indifference 'is far too general a proposition to control this case.'. . To proceed in that manner is to neglect the dispositive question: whether these officials, on these facts, should have known that what they did violated the Eighth Amendment. In short, Hamby would have us repeat the same error the Supreme Court has time and again felt compelled to correct. Of course, it is true (as far as it goes) that a plaintiff need not find a case with identical facts in order to survive a defense of qualified immunity; obviously, one can imagine a situation where the officials' conduct is so egregious that no one would defend it, even if there were no prior holding directly on point. . . But it should be equally obvious that the farther afield existing precedent lies from the case under review, the more likely it will be that the officials' acts will fall within that vast zone of conduct that is perhaps regrettable but is at least arguably constitutional. So long as even that much can be said for the officials, they are entitled to qualified immunity. Such is the case here. Even when the facts are viewed most favorably to Hamby, they demonstrate that the prison officials acted on a bona fide medical opinion, and opted for a course of treatment held to be constitutional on numerous prior occasions. . . That is enough to shield them from damages liability.")

Hamby v. Hammond, 821 F.3d 1085, 1096-97 (9th Cir. 2016) (Gould, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur only in the result reached by the majority in Part IV. I respectfully dissent from the rest of the majority's opinion. We have long recognized: 'It is settled law that deliberate indifference to serious medical needs of prisoners violates the Eighth Amendment.'. .I do not say that Hamby showed deliberate indifference as a matter of law and could receive summary relief himself. But his evidence was sufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact on whether 'the course of treatment the doctors chose was medically unacceptable under the circumstances,' and whether they 'chose this course in conscious disregard of an excessive risk' to Hamby's health. . . This case should have gone to a jury as the trier of fact, with the guidance of correct jury instructions on deliberate indifference. It should not have been resolved by summary judgment of the district court. . . Nor should that summary judgment be affirmed by us. And so I dissent in the hope that a future court may correct the majority's error.")

Injeyan v. City of Laguna Beach, 645 F.3d 577, 580 (9th Cir. 2016) (Pregerson, J., dissenting) ("I dissent. Injeyan's claim of excessive force is not a carbon copy of Meredith, Hansen, Franklin, or Tekle. But these cases, when taken together, provide clear notice that the officer's conduct would run afoul of the law. . . Here, the officer was faced with seventy-two-year-old Marilyn Injeyan—a slight woman whom the officer had met the day before, who was not a suspect in the crime, and who readily submitted to the officer's authority to detain her. Yet, in the face of ready submission, the officer handcuffed Injeyan and wrenched her arms to such a degree that he tore her rotator cuffs. Any reasonable officer would have understood that such force in these circumstances was excessive. I understand that the Supreme Court has cautioned that we not define clearly established law at a high level of generality. But I am troubled that in a number of cases this caution has become an insurmountable barrier to many righteous claims.")

Garcia v. Cty. of Riverside, 817 F.3d 635, 642-44 (9th Cir. 2016) ("[A]n obvious physical discrepancy between a warrant subject and a booked individual, such as a nine-inch difference in height, accompanied by a detainee's complaints of misidentification, should prompt officers to engage in readily available and resource-efficient identity checks, such as a fingerprint comparison, to ensure that they are not detaining the wrong person. Here Plaintiff's claim of mistaken identity was not uncorroborated, because of the height and weight differences, and he also alleges that officers already had all the information they needed to differentiate him from the warrant subject. . . . Because we hold that Garcia has sufficiently pleaded a Fourteenth Amendment violation, whether Baca is entitled to qualified immunity depends on whether the right that Garcia asserts was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . Defendants contend that until Rivera, our cases have applied Baker unevenly and inconsistently. However, the holdings of Lee, Fairley, Rivera, and Gant are explained by differences in the facts, not by inconsistent statements of law. Rivera, decided after the district court's second order, summarizes existing law: officers violate the Fourteenth Amendment if they wrongly detain a person where 'the circumstances indicated to [them] that further investigation was warranted.'. . .In sum, at the time of Plaintiff's November 2012 incarceration, the standards for determining whether alleged police conduct violates the Fourteenth Amendment were clearly established. Baca is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

O'Brien v. Welty, 818 F.3d 920, 936 (9th Cir. 2016) ("In this case, the district court held that qualified immunity shielded defendants from suit because the FAC 'fail[ed] to set forth facts to show that any constitutionally protected right was infringed by any Defendant at any time.' As explained above, we disagree with the district court and hold that the FAC pleads a plausible First Amendment retaliation claim. The constitutional right to be free from retaliation was 'clearly established at the time of defendants' actions.'. . Retaliation for engaging in protected speech has long been prohibited by the First Amendment. . . We have previously made it clear that there is a right to be free from retaliation even if a non-retaliatory justification exists for the defendants' action. . . A reasonable official in defendants' shoes would thus have known that taking disciplinary action against O'Brien in retaliation for the expression of his views violated his First Amendment rights. Our denial of qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings does not mean that this case must go to trial. Once an evidentiary record has been developed through discovery, defendants will be free to move for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Reza v. Pearce, 806 F.3d 497, 506 (9th Cir. 2015) (order denying reh'g and reh'g en banc and amending opinion) ("On February 22, 2011, the date of the S.B. 1070 hearing, clearly established law held that an individual could protest in a limited public forum, but that the government could restrict the individual's speech to safeguard the purpose of the forum, as long as the restrictions were reasonable and viewpoint neutral. . . Our circuit's case law also unambiguously held that a government official could remove an individual from a limited public forum if the individual had actually disrupted proceedings. . . . Norse reaffirmed the fundamental principle that the government can remove an individual from a limited public forum only if the individual actually disrupts the proceedings. No cases, in the Ninth Circuit or otherwise, even remotely suggest that Norse's principle can be inverted to indefinitely ban an individual from a government building based on a single disruption of a hearing. . . . Thus, nothing in our caselaw suggests that Pearce could have reasonably believed that he could violate Norse and instead bar Reza from the building at a time when it is undisputed that he was not being disruptive. . . . We thus conclude that, when genuine disputes of fact are resolved in Reza's favor, Senator Pearce violated Reza's clearly established First Amendment rights and that the district court erred by granting summary judgment to Senator Pearce.")

Reza v. Pearce, 806 F.3d 497, 509-11 (9th Cir. 2015) (order denying reh'g and reh'g en banc and amending opinion) (Wallace, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (" I dissent from Part I of the majority opinion, which incorrectly holds that Senator Pearce 'violated Reza's clearly established First Amendment rights.' The Supreme Court has repeatedly cautioned courts-and our circuit in particular—'not [to] define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Rather than correct the course, as directed by the Supreme Court, in this case, the majority continues in the wrong direction and I therefore dissent. . . .[W]e need not even reach the question of whether Senator Pearce actually violated First Amendment law in this case by relying, as he could, on reports given to him by officers assigned to keep order, because there is no doubt that the senator did not violate 'clearly established' law at the time of the challenged conduct. At that time, not a single Supreme Court decision clearly established the right Reza now asserts. Implicitly acknowledging this fact, the majority focuses solely on Ninth Circuit law. After reviewing our law at the time, the majority concludes that '[n]o cases, in the Ninth Circuit or otherwise, even remotely suggest that Norse's principle can be inverted to indefinitely ban an individual from a government building based on a single disruption of a hearing.'. . But this answers the wrong question and is ultimately a red herring. The fact that no cases affirmatively permitted an official to ban an individual from a government building based on a single disruption (the majority's conclusion) is irrelevant for purposes of qualified immunity. Instead, the relevant question is whether any case expressly prohibited an official from banning an individual from a government building for a single disruption. None of our cases at the time of the hearing in question answered that question. . . . Maybe Senator Pearce made a mistake in banning Reza from the senate building. Perhaps the First Amendment should prohibit such a ban. But neither view should make any difference in this case because at the time of the challenged conduct Senator Pearce did not violate any 'clearly established' right. On this basis, I would hold that Senator Pearce is entitled to qualified immunity and would affirm the district court's summary judgment in his favor. The majority's holding to the contrary continues our unfortunate ignoring of the Supreme Court's repeated caution to 'avoid defining clearly established law at a high level of generality.' . . I therefore dissent from the holding reversing the district court's summary judgment in favor of Senator Pearce but concur in the remainder of the majority opinion.")

Jones v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 802 F.3d 990, 1004-08 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Were we faced with a social worker who detained a child without exigent circumstances, this case would fall neatly within our existing case law. . . .What makes this case more difficult is that Dr. Wang was a physician investigating child abuse, not a social worker, and the seizure occurred in a hospital. Therefore, the question presented by this case is whether these two facts—that Dr. Wang was a physician investigating abuse, not a social worker, and that G.J. was detained in a hospital following his parents' consent to hospitalization—sufficiently differentiate this case from our precedent in child abuse investigations such that our precedent does not clearly apply. We conclude that our case law provided fair warning to Dr. Wang that detaining G.J. would violate the Constitution. . . .Our recent decision in Kirkpatrick supports our conclusion that Dr. Wang's efforts to keep G.J. in the hospital—as described by the Joneses—violated clearly established law. . . .[O]ur case law prohibits an official from detaining a child before the official develops a reasonable belief that a risk of serious harm is imminent. It follows from this clearly established principle that an official may not detain a child merely in the hope that further investigation will turn up facts suggesting that exigent circumstances exist. We next turn to whether this case is distinguishable from the general rule because Dr. Wang is a physician investigating child abuse rather than a social worker. Dr. Wang insists that because she is a physician investigating the cause of serious injuries sustained by an infant, the constitutional standard that we have applied to social workers is not clearly established with respect to her. Again, we disagree. 'It is well-settled that the immunity to which a public official is entitled depends not on the official's title or agency, but on the nature of the function that the person was performing when taking the actions that provoked the lawsuit.'. . The appropriate frame for our analysis therefore focuses on what Dr. Wang did, not her title or person. . . . This case presents complex legal and factual issues. However, once the legal landscape is properly understood, the simplicity of the Joneses' claim underscores why the district court did not err when it denied Dr. Wang summary judgment. . . . It is clearly established law that a state actor may not remove a child from their parents' custody absent a court order or exigent circumstances. According to the Joneses, that is exactly what Dr. Wang did: she orchestrated G.J.'s hospitalization without sufficient evidence that G.J. was in imminent danger, implicitly coerced the Joneses to consent to that hospitalization, and ensured they could not remain alone with their child while Dr. Wang made the final decision whether to request a hospital hold. If the Joneses' version of events were believed, a rational juror could conclude that Dr. Wang knew she was violating the law. Dr. Wang knew she did not have sufficient evidence to detain G.J., yet a rational juror could find that she seized him anyway to further her investigation. The clear guidance our precedent provides to state officials investigating child abuse would put any reasonable state official in Dr. Wang's position on notice that such conduct violated G.J.'s and the Joneses' rights. Accordingly, because both prongs of the qualified immunity test were satisfied, the Joneses are entitled to attempt to prove their version of the facts to a jury and summary judgment was not appropriate.")

Jones v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 802 F.3d 990, 1009, 1011-12 (9th Cir. 2015) (McNamee, District Judge, dissenting) ("I find that Dr. Wang is entitled to qualified immunity because she did not violate either the Fourth Amendment or clearly established law. . . .In sum, 'there is a world of difference[]'. . . between a social worker removing young children without physical manifestations of abuse from their homes and Dr. Wang recommending hospital care to a nonverbal infant with textbook head and rib injuries suggesting serious child abuse. Given the unique situation presented in this case, a finding that 'every reasonable official [in Dr. Wang's situation] would have understood that what he is doing violated' a constitutional right is simply unsupported. . . .The lack of affirmative facts implicating Dr. Wang, the distinct circumstances of this case, and the cornucopia of child abuse investigation standards lead me to find that Dr. Wang is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . I share Judge Kozinski's concern that 'future babies will pay with their lives' due to the current trajectory of our qualified immunity case law. . . I also fear that today's decision will encourage state officials, particularly investigating doctors, to forgo medically reasonable tests and procedures before making life-altering accusations. I therefore respectfully dissent from the majority's opinion.")

Carrillo v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 798 F.3d 1210, 1218-28 & n.15 (9th Cir. 2015) ("The defendants do not dispute that the evidence allegedly withheld falls within Brady's scope, and we therefore do not address the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . Instead, we consider only the second prong: whether the officers would have understood they were violating the Supreme Court's 1963 decision in Brady by failing to disclose this evidence. We first address whether it was clearly established in 1984 that police officers as well as prosecutors were bound by Brady at all . . . and next whether the evidence allegedly withheld in these cases was clearly established to be Brady evidence. . . .The officers argue the law did not clearly establish that they were bound by Brady at all in 1984 and 1991. This contention lacks merit because it was clearly established well before the events in these cases that police officers were bound to disclose material and exculpatory evidence. . . .Just one year after Brady, the Fourth Circuit held police officers as well as prosecutors were bound to disclose material, exculpatory evidence . . . . [citing Barbee v. Warden, 331 F.2d 842, 846 (4th Cir.1964)]Requiring police officers as well as prosecutors to disclose material and exculpatory evidence follows logically from Brady's rationale. . . .This circuit adopted Barbee's logic well before the investigations here. In United States v. Butler, 567 F.2d 885, 891 (9th Cir.1978), we rejected the government's argument that no Brady violation occurred because investigative agents, and not the prosecutor, were responsible for the nondisclosure of promises made to certain prosecution witnesses. . . . Butler undisputably put police officers on notice that their failure to disclose Brady information would constitute a violation the defendant's constitutional rights. . . . Because 'clearly established law' includes 'controlling authority in [the defendants'] jurisdiction,' Butler clearly established in 1978 that police officers have a duty to disclose Brady material. . . The officers' attempts to circumvent Butler are unpersuasive. . . . [T]he officers argue the law did not clearly establish they were bound by Brady until the Supreme Court itself 'extended' Brady to police officers in Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 438 (1995). . . . But Kyles did not announce a new principle of law. In fact, Kyles itself rejected the state's argument that 'it should not be held accountable under Bagley and Brady for evidence known only to police investigators and not to the prosecutor,' explaining that '[t]o accommodate the State in this matter would ... amount to a serious change of course from the Brady line of cases.'. . .Furthermore, the vast majority of circuits to have considered the question have adopted the view that police officers were bound by Brady well before the Court decided Kyles. . . The Third Circuit alone has disagreed, concluding such an obligation was not clearly established until 'the Supreme Court ... settle[d] this matter' in Kyles, notwithstanding precedent in that circuit that a police officer's failure to disclose Brady evidence could be imputed to the prosecutor. . . . The First Circuit has also held police officers were not bound to affirmatively disclose Brady evidence until Kyles. See Drumgold v. Callahan, 707 F.3d 28, 43 (1st Cir.2013). But it distinguished the affirmative duty to disclose evidence from the duty not to deliberately suppress exculpatory evidence. Where the defendant police officer was alleged to have deliberately suppressed evidence, in violation of either Brady or Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103 (1934), the court concluded such conduct was clearly established as unlawful in 1989. . . . The defendants argue that the Third Circuit's decision created a circuit split on the issue and that, 'if judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.'. . . Although disagreement among circuit courts may imply a legal principle is not 'beyond debate,' and thus not clearly established, qualified immunity is not the 'guaranteed product of disuniform views of the law in the other federal, or state, courts, and the fact that a single judge, or even a group of judges, disagrees about the contours of a right does not automatically render the law unclear.' Safford Unified Sch. Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 378 (2009). More importantly, however, '[i]f the right is clearly established by decisional authority of the Supreme Court or of this Circuit, our inquiry should come to an end.'. . Only in the absence of binding precedent do we consider other sources of decisional law such as out-of-circuit cases. See Boyd v. Benton Cnty., 374 F.3d 773, 781 (9th Cir.2004). Because Butler unambiguously held due process is violated where a police officer fails to disclose material, exculpatory evidence, our inquiry is over. We hold that, at the time of the relevant events in these cases, circuit precedent clearly established that police officers were bound by *Brady'*s disclosure requirements. . . .Even though it was clearly established at the time of the investigations that police officers were bound to disclose Brady evidence, we must next consider whether every reasonable police officer would have understood the specific evidence allegedly withheld was clearly subject to Brady's disclosure requirements. . . . Here, the right being violated is, by its terms, significantly more specific than the 'extremely abstract' right of freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures. . . Brady defines the type of material the government is obligated to disclose concretely and specifically as 'favorable to the accused, either because it is exculpatory, or because it is impeaching.'. . Unlike the broad touchstone of 'unreasonableness,' the contours of a defendant's right to Brady material are focused and clear. . . .As in Tennison, law predating the investigations in both of these cases clearly established that the type of evidence allegedly withheld—including impeachment and alternative suspect evidence—fell within Brady's scope. The officers' assertions of qualified immunity, therefore, fail. . . .The law clearly established, well before the events in these cases, that police officers were bound by Brady and that the evidence allegedly withheld in these cases fell within Brady's scope. We therefore affirm the denial of qualified immunity in both cases and remand to the district court for further proceedings.")

Jones v. Williams, 791 F.3d 1023, 1034 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Here, there is at least an issue of material fact as to what a reasonable officer at the Penitentiary should have known on July 8, 2007. Several months before McBride ordered Jones to cook pork loins, the Penitentiary implemented a new policy providing that an inmate could opt out of handling pork on religious grounds. And Jones alleges that he told the officers in charge that he had the right to not handle pork. That some officers claim they were not personally aware of the policy change or Belleque's memo to Jones is not sufficient to show that Jones's right to avoid handling pork was not clearly established. In sum, viewing the record in the light most favorable to Jones, Appellees' conduct violated Jones's clearly established right to avoid handling pork on the basis of his religious beliefs. On this record, Appellees are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Walker v. Beard, 789 F.3d 1125, 1131 n.3, 1139 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Walker asserts claims for both damages and injunctive relief, but we consider only the mootness of the injunctive claims because Defendants are immune from liability for damages. Defendants are immune from Walker's official capacity damages claims under the Eleventh Amendment. See Will v. Mich. Dep't of State Police, 491 U.S. 58, 64–65 (1989); Holley v. Cal. Dep't of Corr., 599 F.3d 1108, 1111–12 (9th Cir.2010). Walker's personal capacity claims fail because Defendants plainly did not violate clearly established rights of which a reasonable person would (or should) have known, thus entitling Defendants to qualified immunity. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 232–33 (2009). . . .Walker successfully alleged a burden on his religious exercise under RLUIPA and the First Amendment, but the State has a compelling interest in avoiding unconstitutional racial discrimination, and subjecting Walker to integrated celling is the only possible means of furthering that interest. Accordingly, we conclude that Walker has failed to state claims under RLUIPA and the First Amendment; we further conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying leave to amend.")

Mikich v. City & Cnty. of San Francisco, 612 F. App'x 443, 445 (9th Cir. 2015) ("At the time of this event, it was clearly established law that, in order for a warrantless removal based on exigent circumstances to be lawful, a social worker 'must have reasonable cause to believe that the child is likely to experience serious bodily harm in the time that would be required to obtain a warrant.' Rogers v. Cnty. of San Joaquin, 487 F.3d 1288, 1294 (9th Cir.2007). No reasonable social worker could have concluded that AM was in imminent danger of serious bodily injury while she was in the hospital; the danger already identified as potentially warranting seizure would only materialize at the time of AM's discharge. Accordingly, because the danger would not have arisen in the time it would have taken Defendants to obtain a warrant, no reasonable social worker in Defendants' position would have believed it was lawful to remove AM without obtaining a warrant.")

Tatum v. Moody, 768 F.3d 806, 821 n.10 (9th Cir. 2014) ("Moody and Pulido do not independently appeal the denial of qualified immunity on the ground that even if the jury was properly instructed, 'the right at issue was [not] "clearly established" at the time of [their] alleged misconduct.'. . They have thus forfeited any such objection for failure to assert it 'specifically and distinctly' in their opening brief. . .Nor could Moody and Pulido have asserted that the right they violated was not clearly established. They concede 'that withholding exculpatory evidence may cause constitutional injury not only at the criminal trial, but during the pretrial stages of the criminal proceedings as well,' but they argue that this rule applies only if their conduct violates the standards set by the Fourth Amendment. Immunity, however, turns 'on an officer's duties, not on other aspects of the constitutional violation.' Stoot v. City of Everett, 582 F.3d 910, 927 (9th Cir.2009). Uncertainty regarding the procedural niceties of privately enforcing the relevant constitutional prohibition—including knowledge of the particular constitutional provision implicated by the violation—does not immunize state officials from liability. . . Where, as here, officers recognize that their conduct 'could ripen into' an actionable violation on the basis of subsequent contingencies beyond their control, they are not immune from suit. Stoot, 582 F.3d at 927. Commonsense confirms Moody and Pulido's concession that the withholding of exculpatory evidence can cause constitutional injury; that concession recognizes 'the almost tautological conclusion that an individual in custody has a constitutional right to be released from confinement after it was or should have been known that the detainee was entitled to release.'")

George v. Edholm, 752 F.3d 1206, 1220, 1221 (9th Cir. 2014) ("George has provided evidence that would support a jury conclusion that Freeman and Johnson gave false information to Dr. Edholm, and that this false information induced Edholm to perform unconstitutionally intrusive procedures that he would not otherwise have performed. '[E]very reasonable official would have understood' that conduct to violate the Fourth Amendment. . . We reach this decision based on Supreme Court precedent, 'cases of controlling authority in [the officers'] jurisdiction,' and 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'. . First, it was clearly established that a private citizen's search may be attributed to the police when the 'the private party act[s] as an instrument or agent of the Government' in conducting the search. . . That principle had been repeatedly and clearly applied to doctors' searches of suspects' bodies. . . No reasonable officer could have believed that he could avoid responsibility for an unconstitutional search by using deception to induce a private party to perform the search. The Supreme Court has deemed that principle so obvious as to be 'axiomatic.'. . Second, it was clearly established that a search of a patient's body must be reasonable. . . As we explained above, forced sedation, anoscopy, intubation, insertion of a nasogastric tube, and bowel evacuation are more intrusive than the stomach-pumping rejected in Rochin, and at least as intrusive as other searches characterized as highly invasive by courts across the country. . . Case law clearly established that the possibility that a baggie of drugs could rupture, standing alone, cannot justify a warrantless search as intrusive as that conducted here. . . Indeed, the California Supreme Court so held nearly thirty years before the search in this case.")

Grenning v. Miller-Stout, 739 F.3d 1235, 1241, 1242 (9th Cir. 2014) ("We conclude, based on the foregoing, that there are material issues of fact remaining as to the brightness of the continuous lighting in Grenning's SMU cell, as to the effect on Grenning of the continuous lighting, and as to whether the defendant officials were deliberately indifferent. . . .The district court did not consider the question of qualified immunity because it granted summary judgment to Defendants on the merits. We leave the issue of qualified immunity for the district court to determine in the first instance on remand. . . If the district court finds for Grenning on the merits of his Eighth Amendment claim, and if it finds that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, Grenning may still be entitled to injunctive relief. . . It is obvious from the record before us that prisoners at Airway Heights may be placed in the SMU for many reasons, and, so far as the record shows, Grenning is likely to remain a prisoner at Airway Heights for a sustained period. It thus appears that there is sufficient likelihood of Grenning being again confined in the SMU to preserve his claim for injunctive relief.") Grenning v. Miller-Stout, 739 F.3d 1235, 1242, 1243 (9th Cir. 2014) (Rawlinson, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent from the majority's failure to rule on the issue of qualified immunity in this case. We may affirm the district court's decision 'on any ground supported by the record.'. . And the record in this case supports affirming the grant of summary judgment in favor of the prison officials on the basis of qualified immunity. . . I agree that constant illumination of an inmate's sleeping quarters may constitute a serious deprivation of the right to shelter guaranteed by the Eighth Amendment in some circumstances. . . However, before denying qualified immunity to prison officials, we must determine whether the party asserting the injury has sufficiently alleged a constitutional violation, and whether the right violated was clearly established. . . We recently held that constant illumination of an inmate's cell is unconstitutional only if no penological justification is provided for such illumination. . . .By contrast, in this case, prison officials offered the following legitimate penological purposes for constant illumination:

• Offenders in the Segregation Management Unit (SMU) pose a greater security risk within the institution.
• Because of the greater security risk, inmates housed in the SITU are subjected to security checks every thirty minutes.
• Constant illumination allows staff to conduct security checks without disrupting offenders by turning on the lights every thirty minutes or by shining a flashlight into the inmate's cell.
• Constant illumination prevents inmates from observing the use of lights by correctional staff to assess their proximity.

As federal judges, we are in no position to second-guess the legitimacy of these proffered justifications. . . In my view, the presence of legitimate justifications for the constant illumination in the SMU sufficiently distinguishes this case from Keenan such that it would not be clear to a reasonable prison official that reliance on the proffered justifications for the use of constant illumination in the SMU would violate the Eighth Amendment. I would affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the prison officials on the alternative basis that they were entitled to qualified immunity.")

Gravelet-Blondin v. Shelton, 728 F.3d 1086, 1092-96 (9th Cir. 2013) ("Having concluded that Sgt. Shelton may indeed have used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment, we now consider whether the right to be free from such force was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . .The right to be free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance was clearly established prior to 2008. [Discussing Deorle, Nelson, and Headwaters] Though these cases do not concern tasers, they need not. As we explained in Deorle, '[i]t does not matter that no case of this court directly addresses the use of [a particular weapon]; we have held that "[a]n officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury."'. . Indeed, even absent taser-specific case law, three of our sister circuits have held that the law was clearly established, prior to 2008, that the use of a taser can in some instances constitute excessive force. . . .Still, relying on our grants of qualified immunity in Bryan and Mattos, Defendants argue that the law was insufficiently clear before 2010—when we first identified tasers in dart mode as an intermediate level of force, . . . to put Sgt. Shelton on notice that his use of a taser against Blondin was excessive. But this case is factually distinguishable from Bryan and Mattos in one critical respect: Blondin engaged in no behavior that could have been perceived by Sgt. Shelton as threatening or resisting. As a result, the use of non-trivial force of any kind was unreasonable. . . .Here, evaluating the situation from Sgt. Shelton's perspective, Blondin—who, unlike Bryan, Brooks, and Mattos, had no connection to the underlying crime—committed no act of resistance. He took no affirmative step to violate an officer order (Bryan), did not physically resist officers (Brooks), and neither made physical contact with an officer nor tried to interfere with efforts to arrest a suspect (Mattos). His momentary failure to move farther than thirty-seven feet away from officers arresting his neighbor, . . . after merely inquiring into what those officers were doing, can hardly be considered resistance. This is especially so given evidence that Blondin was visibly frozen with fear. . . .Having determined that the right to be free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in passive resistance was clearly established prior to 2008, we proceed to the second part of our constitutional inquiry, . . . considering a question that was not before us in Bryan or Mattos : whether it was clear in 2008 that using a taser in dart mode was non-trivial. . . . By 2008, the Tenth Circuit and a number of district courts had found taser use unconstitutionally excessive in some circumstances. Because '[a]bsent binding precedent, we look to all available decisional law, including the law of other circuits and district courts, to determine whether [a] right was clearly established,'. . . those decisions are relevant here. . . . We do not look to these cases to establish Blondin's right to be free from non-trivial force in response to his total lack of resistance—as discussed above, that right was established within our own circuit as early as 2001, such that, by 2008, it was 'beyond debate' that using non-trivial force in response to such passive bystander behavior would be unconstitutionally excessive. . . Instead, they support our determination that, though the specific level of force involved in using a taser was not clear until 2010, it was well known as of 2008 that a taser in dart mode constitutes more than trivial force. Sgt. Shelton is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.") Gravelet-Blondin v. Shelton, 728 F.3d 1086, 1101-05 (9th Cir. 2013) (Nguyen, J., dissenting) ("The majority goes badly astray because it loses sight of the specific context of this case and employs hindsight rather than viewing the scene through the eyes of a reasonable officer. Blondin interjected himself into a rapidly-evolving, highly volatile scene: officers struggling to restrain a combative, armed man in the process of trying to take his own life. At the time Blondin was tased, two loaded firearms were unsecured. Yet, at every turn, the majority attempts to minimize the precariousness of the situation, thinly splicing the facts to assess Blondin's conduct—and the reasonableness of the officers' response—in a vacuum. It is one thing to resolve disputed facts and inferences in Blondin's favor. But the majority goes well beyond this by choosing to ignore undisputed facts which do not favor Blondin's case. By discounting the danger and abstracting the qualified immunity inquiry, the majority's approach fails to accord appropriate deference to an officer's reasonable judgment exercised under exigent circumstances. Because the majority fails to follow the Supreme Court's dictate to assess the use of force 'from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight [,]' Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 396 (1989), I respectfully dissent. . . .Even if we assume that Sgt. Shelton's use of force was excessive, why wasn't his mistake reasonable? What precedent existed in May 2008 such that every reasonable officer would have understood that it was unlawful to tase Blondin for two seconds under these circumstances? Which case placed this constitutional question 'beyond debate' in 2008? . . . I don't know. Nor is it evident from the majority's opinion, which, rather than squarely addressing these questions, re-frames the inquiry instead. The issue here, the majority says, is whether 'the right to be free from non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance was clearly established prior to 2008.'. . This formulation is wrong in two respects. First, it contravenes the Supreme Court's instruction that the qualified immunity inquiry 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . Indeed, the Court has expressly taken us to task for failing in this regard. . . I recognize that the inquiry need not be so narrowly defined as to allow the officers to 'define away all potential claims.' . . However, by analyzing whether Blondin's right was clearly established without reference to the specific factual context, the majority not only brushes off the Supreme Court's instructions, it departs from the same cases upon which it goes on to rely. . . .Lastly, even if the majority is correct that we may look to cases which do not involve tasers, . . . framing our inquiry in terms of 'non-trivial force' still paints with too broad a brush. All 'non-trivial force' is not created alike. Here, specifically, the majority employs 'non-trivial force' to mean tasing someone for two seconds in dart mode. But 'non-trivial force' also covers, among other things, firing a lead-filled beanbag round into someone's face with enough force to gouge out their eye, fracture their cranium, and leave a lead shot embedded in their skull. See Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272, 1286 (9th Cir.2001). Any reasonable officer might know that the constitution would prohibit firing a lead-filled beanbag round into Blondin's face from short range. But tasing him for two seconds? That's a much closer call. Thus, in my view, asking whether law regarding the use of 'non-trivial force' was clearly established is not a fair benchmark by which to gauge an reasonable officer's understanding of the legality of his actions. Moreover, I fail to see how the cases relied upon by the majority made the 'contours [of Blondin's right] sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what [Sgt. Shelton did] violated that right.'. . While precedent need not be squarely on all fours, . . . we nevertheless require 'closely analogous pre-existing case law' to show that the law is clearly established. . . . Here, the cases which the majority concludes set forth clearly established law are far from closely analogous. . . .One final point. In three recent cases involving the use of tasers in dart mode, we granted officers qualified immunity upon concluding that the law was not sufficiently clear as of 2005 and 2006 to render the alleged constitutional violations clearly established. . . And, as the district court correctly recognized, '[b]y May 2008, the state of the law in this circuit was no clearer; no Supreme Court or Ninth Circuit opinion was issued in the interim.' The majority nevertheless asserts that Mattos, Brooks, and Bryan are distinguishable in 'one critical respect: Blondin engaged in no behavior that could have been perceived by Sgt. Shelton as threatening or resisting.'. . This assertion, however, is not only shaded with the benefit of hindsight, it is inconsistent with undisputed facts in the record. Blondin did engage in behavior that could have objectively been perceived as resisting, if not threatening: for fifteen seconds he refused to comply with officers' repeated orders to back away from a dangerous, volatile scene. Accordingly, Blondin's purported lack of resistance cannot justify departing from the holdings in Mattos, Brooks, and Bryan. . .In sum, I believe that the law did not clearly establish that Sgt. Shelton's conduct violated Blondin's constitutional rights. I therefore would affirm the district court's holding that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Blondin's excessive force claim.")

But see Gravelet-Blondin v. Shelton, 665 F. App'x 603, 605 (9th Cir. 2016) ('[T]he outcome of our earlier panel opinion does not control the outcome here. In our prior opinion reviewing the district court's grant of summary judgment for the defendants, we examined the discovery record and construed all factual disputes in Blondin's favor. . . Based on that record and the construction of facts in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, we held that a reasonable jury could conclude that Blondin's tasing and arrest violated the Fourth Amendment. . . But now, on appeal from a jury verdict in the defendants' favor, we review a different record—the facts revealed at trial—and this time we construe them in favor of the defendants—the opponents to the present motion. . . We also ask a different question: whether a reasonable jury could find that Blondin's tasing and arrest were not in violation of the Fourth Amendment. See Johnson v. Paradise Valley Unified Sch. Dist., 251 F.3d 1222, 1227 (9th Cir. 2001). We cannot reverse the jury's determination if it is supported by substantial evidence. . .Reviewing the record at trial in the light most favorable to the defendants, we conclude that there was substantial evidence to support a conclusion that Sergeant Shelton's use of the taser against Blondin was not excessive.")

A.D. v. California Highway Patrol, 712 F.3d 446, 454, 455 (9th Cir. 2013) ("By March 23, 2006—the day that Markgraf shot Eklund—it was clearly established that a police officer, who acts with the purpose to harm unrelated to a legitimate law enforcement objective, violates the rights protected by the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause. . . .Further, because we are confined to the jury's factual finding that Markgraf acted with a purpose to cause Eklund's death unrelated to any legitimate law enforcement objective, we are essentially compelled to deny Markgraf qualified immunity—it would be 'clear to a reasonable officer' that killing a person with no legitimate law enforcement purpose violates the Constitution. . . This is one of those rare cases in which the constitutional right at issue is defined by a standard that is so 'obvious' that we must conclude—based on the jury's finding—that qualified immunity is inapplicable, even without a case directly on point. . . .Applying the principles of al-Kidd and Anderson to this case, we could not say that it is clearly established law (for purposes of qualified immunity) that whatever 'shocks the conscience' violates due process. However, the Supreme Court has defined the law of due process that governed Markgraf's conduct with more particularity. A reasonable police officer in Markgraf's position would have known that acting with a purpose to harm unrelated to a legitimate law enforcement objective (such as arrest, self-defense, or the defense of others) violates due process. Where, as here, a jury has determined that the officer acted with such a purpose, we must conclude that he violated clearly established law and deny him qualified immunity.")

Ellins v. City of Sierra Madre, 710 F.3d 1049, 1064, 1066 (9th Cir. 2013) ("The district court held that even assuming a First Amendment violation, Defendants had 'no indication' that Diaz's conduct was unlawful. The district court reasoned that there was no case law that specifically held 'that a police officer suffers a First Amendment violation when a certifying officer delays approval of an application that requires a certification of the applicant's good moral character.' However, the district court framed the inquiry much too narrowly. The question is not whether an earlier case mirrors the specific facts here. Rather, the relevant question is whether 'the state of the law at the time gives officials fair warning that their conduct is unconstitutional.'. . Viewing Diaz's actions in the light most favorable to Ellins, we conclude that she acted unreasonably in light of clearly established law. . . . [I]n light of the Supreme Court's longstanding and unequivocal precedents protecting employee speech, we conclude that a reasonable official in Diaz's position would have known that delaying Ellins's application to the P.O.S.T. program because of his union activity, which resulted in a lower salary than that to which he otherwise would have been entitled, violated Ellins's First Amendment rights; that in leading a union vote Ellins acted as a private citizen addressing a matter of public concern; and that depriving Ellins of salary in retaliation for his protected speech was unconstitutional.")

Ellins v. City of Sierra Madre, 710 F.3d 1049, 1068 (9th Cir. 2013) (Rawlinson, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The majority relies primarily upon the Seventh Circuit's decision in Fuerst v. Clarke, 454 F.3d 770, 774 (7th Cir.2006), where the court held, without any analysis, that the employee's speech as a union representative was not made as a public employee. . .The two district court cases from district courts in D.C., Baumann v. District of Columbia, 744 F.Supp.2d 216, 224 (D.D.C.2010), and Hawkins v. Boone 786 F.Supp.2d 328, 335 (D.D.C.2011) simply parroted the Seventh Circuit's ruling in Fuerst, again without any analysis. I am not confident that reliance on these cases supports concluding that Ellins was speaking as a private citizen when he criticized Chief Diaz. There is no doubt in this Circuit that whether an employee speaks as a private citizen is a question of fact rather than an issue of law. . . The record in this case is devoid of any description of Ellins's job duties. . . For all we know, Ellins's job duties could encompass his union responsibilities. . . In sum, I agree with the majority that this case should be remanded. However, upon remand all questions of fact, including whether Ellins spoke as a public employee or as a private citizen, should be resolved by the factfinder. For that reason, I concur only in the judgment affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding for further proceedings.")

Maxwell v. County of San Diego, 708 F.3d 1075, 1082, 1083 (9th Cir. 2013) ("The Sheriff's officers found Kristin facing a preexisting danger from her gunshot wound. There is evidence they affirmatively increased that danger by preventing her ambulance from leaving. This arguably left Kristin worse off than if the ambulance had been allowed to bring her to an air ambulance that had advanced medical capabilities and was ready to fly her to a trauma center. The Sheriff's officers argue that our danger creation cases are distinguishable because they did not involve first responders securing a crime scene. But 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . The existence of a crime scene does not change our analysis. It was irrelevant to the delay of the ambulance. The ambulance contained no witnesses or evidence apart from the victim herself and her wounds. Lowell had confessed and was in custody. The Sheriff's officers had found the gun used in the crime. The crime scene was sealed. The Sheriff's officers also argue they lacked the mens rea to be held liable under § 1983, claiming the record does not show 'deliberate indifference ... to known or obvious dangers.'. . We reject the argument. It was obvious that delaying a bleeding gun shot victim's ambulance increased the risk of death. Finally, the Sheriff's officers appear to argue that the Maxwells must show that they acted with a 'purpose to harm' Kristin since this case involved a medical emergency calling for split-second decisions. . . This contradicts their earlier recognition that the appropriate standard is one of deliberate indifference. It also nonsensically suggests that a medical emergency faced by third parties justified the decision to prevent those parties from responding to that emergency.")

Maxwell v. County of San Diego, 708 F.3d 1075, 1083, 1084 (9th Cir. 2013) ("We note there are few cases discussing the reasonability of detaining witnesses solely for investigative purposes. In most cases, the lack of on-point precedent would compel us to grant qualified immunity. . . Nevertheless, 'in an obvious case, [general] standards can "clearly establish" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.' Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 199 (2004). This is an obvious case. Although detention of witnesses for investigative purposes can be reasonable in certain circumstances, such detentions must be minimally intrusive. . . .We conclude that the Sheriff's officers were on notice that they could not detain, separate, and interrogate the Maxwells for hours.")

Maxwell v. County of San Diego, 708 F.3d 1075, 1090, 1093 (9th Cir. 2013) (Ikuta, J., dissenting) ("The facts of this case are undeniably tragic. But despite the ill-fated sequence of events, the Sheriff's deputies who secured the crime scene did not 'violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known,'. . . by delaying the ambulance's departure for a few minutes, if at all, or detaining the Maxwells while they obtained and executed a search warrant for the Maxwells' home. Accordingly, qualified immunity protects all the deputies from suit for civil damages. . . .Instead of citing relevant case law, the majority makes the unsupported and conclusory statement that 'it was obvious' that the deputies violated Kristin's due process right to bodily security. . . But only in retrospect is it 'obvious' that the brief delay may have raised the risk that Kristin would die from her injuries. This very term, the Supreme Court reprimanded the Ninth Circuit for judging the reasonableness of officers' conduct 'with the 20/20 vision of hindsight' rather than 'from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene.'

Ryburn, 132 S.Ct. at 992(quoting Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 396–97 (1989)). . . . Contrary to the Court's direction, the majority's eyes here are focused on the rearview mirror. Given that Kristin's medical condition initially appeared stable and that paramedics were actively tending to her at the time of the alleged delay, the danger was not so obvious that a decision to briefly delay the ambulance shows deliberate indifference.")

Ford v. City of Yakima, 706 F.3d 1188, 1193-96 (9th Cir. 2013) ("In this Circuit, an individual has a right 'to be free from police action motivated by retaliatory animus but for which there was probable cause.' Skoog, 469 F.3d at 1235. That right was violated when the officers booked and jailed Ford in retaliation for his protected speech, even though probable cause existed for his initial arrest. Ford's criticism of the police for what he perceived to be an unlawful and racially motivated traffic stop falls 'squarely within the protective umbrella of the First Amendment and any action to punish or deter such speech ... is categorically prohibited by the Constitution.'. . .[T]he evidence must be sufficient to establish that the officers' desire to chill Ford's speech was a but-for cause of their conduct. In other words, would Ford have been booked and jailed, rather than cited and arrested, but for the officers' desire to punish Ford for his speech? . . . .Ford does not contend that police officers lacked probable cause to arrest him for violating the city noise ordinance. But Officer Urlacher's probable cause to arrest Ford does not necessarily mean that booking and jailing him was constitutional. . . While the issue of causation ultimately should be determined by a trier of fact, Ford has provided sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the officers' retaliatory motive was a but-for cause of their action, thus satisfying the causation element of a First Amendment retaliation claim for the purposes of qualified immunity. . . Taken in the light most favorable to Ford, the facts establish that the officers' alleged conduct violated his right to be free from police action motivated by retaliatory animus, even if probable cause existed for that action. . . . [T]his Court's 2006 decision in Skoog established that an individual has a right to be free from retaliatory police action, even if probable cause existed for that action. . . . Thus, Duran clearly established that police officers may not use their authority to punish an individual for exercising his First Amendment rights, while Skoog clearly established that a police action motivated by retaliatory animus was unlawful, even if probable cause existed for that action. The officers' conduct in this case falls squarely within the prohibitions of Duran and Skoog. While the precise issue of retaliatory booking and jailing has not been addressed in this Circuit, 'closely analogous preexisting case law is not required to show that a right was clearly established.'. . Duran addressed a retaliatory arrest and Skoog applied to a retaliatory search and seizure, but the unlawfulness of a retaliatory booking and jailing was nevertheless apparent from those cases. After Duran, any reasonable police officer would have known that it was unlawful to use his authority to retaliate against an individual because of his speech. Likewise, any reasonable police officer would have understood that Skoog's prohibition on retaliatory police action extended to typical police actions such as booking and jailing. Therefore, this case involved the kind of 'mere application of settled law to a new factual permutation' in which we assume an officer had notice that his conduct was unlawful. . . A reasonable officer would have understood that he did not automatically possess the authority to book and jail an individual upon conducting a lawful arrest supported by probable cause. Washington law clearly enumerates the limited factors that would allow a police officer to book and jail an individual who has been arrested for a misdemeanor. CrRLJ 2.1(b)(2). A reasonable officer would have been aware of the law governing his ability to book and jail an individual he lawfully has arrested. Moreover, a reasonable officer would have been aware that Washington law explicitly states that its rules 'shall not be construed to affect or derogate from the constitutional rights of any defendant.' CrRLJ 1.1. Thus, a reasonable police officer would have understood that he could not exercise his discretion to book an individual in retaliation for that individual's First Amendment activity.")

Ford v. City of Yakima, 706 F.3d 1188, 1197-1204 (9th Cir. 2013) (Callahan, J., dissenting) ("This case raises an issue of first impression. It is not a case of retaliatory arrest. Nonetheless, our review is informed by cases suggesting that, in order to state a claim for retaliatory arrest, a plaintiff must show a lack of probable cause for the arrest. See Reichle v. Howards, ––– U.S. ––––, ––––, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2095 (2012) (noting that evidence of probable cause "could be thought similarly fatal to a plaintiff's claim that animus caused his arrest, given that retaliatory arrest cases also present a tenuous causal connection between the defendant's alleged animus and the plaintiff's injury"). But see Skoog v. Cnty. of Clackamas, 469 F.3d 1221, 1232 (9th Cir.2006) (noting "that a plaintiff need not plead the absence of probable cause in order to state a claim for retaliation"). The police had probable cause to arrest Ford for violating the city noise ordinance and he does not argue otherwise. . . .Ford seeks monetary damages in an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 based on the assertion that the police officers violated his constitutional rights when, after detaining him for violating the city noise ordinance, they decided to book him based, in part, on his post-detention statements, rather than just issuing a ticket. . . .[H]ere we are concerned not with speech that might give rise to an arrest, but with speech made after a person has been lawfully detained. This is a critical distinction. It is well settled that once an individual is lawfully detained, his or her rights may be restricted for legitimate penological and custodial reasons. . . . Accordingly, Ford's case is analogous to the situation presented in Reichle, where the Supreme Court noted that 'the right in question is not the general rule to be free from retaliation for one's speech, but the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause.'. . The Court held that it 'has never held that there is such a right.' Id. Similarly, Ford has no right not to be booked based on his post-detention statements where the booking is supported by probable cause. . . .The Supreme Court expressed a preference for requiring the showing of the absence of probable cause and approvingly cited decisions by other circuit courts requiring a showing of a lack of probable cause. . . .Rather than focus on whether an officer's action had a chilling effect on the plaintiff, the proper inquiry under cases such as Reichle is whether the officer had probable cause to book the detained individual in light of his statements. In other words, did Ford's post-detention statements give the officers reason to believe that Ford might harm himself or others, injure property, or breach the peace? . . . . If the officer has probable cause to book a detained individual based, in part, on the person's post-detention actions or statements, there is no causation; and thus, there is no cause of action for violation of a constitutional right. See Hartman, 547 U.S. at 260. The reasons underlying the Supreme Court's opinion in Reichle also require a showing of a lack of probable cause in a § 1983 action based on the plaintiff's post-detention speech. Ford's claim of retaliation presents a 'tenuous causal connection between the defendant's alleged animus and the plaintiff's injury' similar to that presented in retaliatory prosecution and arrest cases. . . . [U]nlike probable cause for an arrest or for prosecution, for which there is considerable case law, there is little judicial guidance on how to evaluate an officer's decision to book a lawfully detained individual. Thus, requiring the pleading and proving of a lack of probable cause is necessary to shield officers from being second guessed in civil actions brought by those they lawfully detained. . . . [E]ven if the statement in Skoog that a plaintiff need not plead the absence of probable cause survives the Supreme Court's statement in Reichle that it 'has never recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause,' . . . here, the district court's finding that the officers' 'desire to cause the chilling effect' was not a 'but-for cause' of Ford's booking terminates the case, even under Skoog. . . . Even if I were to agree with the majority that Ford had a constitutional right not to have the officers consider his comments while he was detained, which I do not, I could not agree that this right was 'clearly established.' That is to say, the officers were not on notice that deciding to book Ford based, in part, on his comments while detained, violated his rights under the First Amendment. . . . [T]he extent to which Skoog itself clearly established a cause of action for alleged police retaliation despite the presence of probable cause for the officer's action is doubtful. The clarity of this rule is further muddied by the spirit, if not the holding, of the Supreme Court's subsequent opinion in Reichle, 132 S.Ct. 2088. . . . The majority states that police officers have been on notice since 1990 that it is unlawful to use their authority to retaliate against individuals for their protected speech. . . But all of the cases on which the majority relies concerned actions to arrest or to search based on individuals actions as free private persons. . . Had the officers initially detained Ford based on his speech, the majority's broad axiom might apply. But that is not what Ford alleges. He alleges only that the officers decided to book him instead of giving him a ticket based on what he said after he was legally detained. . . . Because an officer's use of a detained person's statements raise substantially different considerations from an officer's reactions to the statements of a free person, the cases cited by the majority did not reasonably put the officers on notice that in telling Ford that he had talked himself into jail, they were chilling Ford's constitutionally protected right to free speech. If we are going to impose such etiquette upon peace officers, we must first clearly so hold, and not expect them to glean such a 'vague' constitutional rule from Ninth Circuit cases that appear to be out of step, if not inconsistent, with recent Supreme Court decisions.") Chappell v. Mandeville, 706 F.3d 1052, 1064, 1065 (9th Cir. 2013) ("We conclude that the law did not clearly establish that the conditions that Chappell experienced constituted an 'atypical and significant hardship.' At the time of Chappell's contraband watch, we had explained that the 'atypical and significant hardship' is context-dependent and requires 'fact by fact consideration,' Keenan, 83 F.3d at 1089. We confirmed this only a year after the contraband watch took place, noting that '[t]here is no single standard for determining whether a prison hardship is atypical and significant' and that analysis under this standard requires 'case by case, fact by fact consideration.'. . . Indeed, we had noted prior to April–May 2002 that at least three factors from Sandin should be considered in each case: (1) whether the conditions of confinement 'mirrored those conditions imposed upon inmates in analogous discretionary confinement settings, namely administrative segregation and protective custody,' (2) the duration and intensity of the conditions of confinement; and (3) whether the change in confinement would 'inevitably affect the duration of [the prisoner's] sentence.'. .We are not aware of any court that, as of April–May 2002, had applied the Sandin test, or similar temporary, investigatory confinement, to hold that a contraband watch was an 'atypical and significant hardship' apart from the ordinary conditions of prison management. The only similar case in which we had considered a due process claim was Mendoza, where the prisoner had been placed on 'feces watch.'. . That case, however, was pre-Sandin and thus did not apply the "atypical and significant hardship" test. Id. Moreover, no other jurisdiction had applied the 'atypical and significant hardship' test to any factually similar cases before April–May 2002 either. Because there was no case law holding that contraband watch, or any similar regime, is an 'atypical and significant hardship,' and the 'atypical and significant hardship' test is so fact-specific, Mandeville and Rosario did not have fair notice on whether the conditions that Chappell experienced violated a state-created liberty interest that would trigger due process protections. Thus, Mandeville and Rosario are also entitled to qualified immunity on Chappell's due process claim.") Chappell v. Mandeville*,* 706 F.3d 1052, 1057-62 & n.4 (9th Cir. 2013) ("We hold that as of April–May 2002, when Chappell was placed on contraband watch, the law was not clearly established as to whether the conditions Chappell experienced—either in isolation or combination—violated the Eighth Amendment, made applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. . . .[O]ur case law did not clearly establish that in April–May 2002 that the constant illumination of Chappell's cell was unconstitutional. . . .Since, at the time Chappell's contraband watch took place, no court had ruled on whether contraband watch constitutes a legitimate penological purpose that would justify continuous lighting, and Chappell was subjected to continuous lighting for only seven days and did not claim that he was deprived of sleep or intentionally kept awake, Mandeville and Rosario did not have fair notice that their actions were unconstitutional. Given our decision in Keenan and the decisional law in other circuits, we have some doubt that the conditions that Chappell experienced under contraband watch even amounted to Eighth Amendment violation, but we do not reach this question since, at a minimum, the law was not clearly established that the contraband watch was unconstitutional and thus Chappell's Eighth Amendment claim can be resolved on qualified immunity grounds. . . . The law was not clearly established as of April–May 2002 with regards to mattress deprivation either. . . .Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Chappell, in addition to the continuous lighting and the mattress deprivation, Chappell alleged that he was taped into two pairs of underwear and jumpsuits, placed in a hot cell with no ventilation, chained to an iron bed, shackled at the ankles and waist so that he could not move his arms, and was forced to eat like a dog. The district court adopted the magistrate's finding that these conditions had the 'mutually enforcing effect of sleep deprivation that any reasonable officer would know comprised unconstitutional conditions of confinement.' We disagree. . . .[T]he focus of the inquiry under qualified immunity is whether the defendants had fair notice that their actions were unconstitutional. In April–May 2002, there were no cases in this jurisdiction that involved a contraband watch similar to the one that occurred here. . . .Because no court had held that conditions similar to those Chappell experienced were unconstitutional in the face of the important penological purpose of discovering contraband, we hold that Mandeville and Rosario are entitled to qualified immunity on Chappell's Eighth Amendment claim. . . .Because Mandeville and Rosario are entitled to qualified immunity, we do not consider whether these conditions amounted to an actual Eighth Amendment violation. Our holding is limited to a finding that the law was not clearly established as to whether the conditions that Chappell was subjected to, both in isolation and combination, violated the Eighth Amendment.")

Chappell v. Mandeville, 706 F.3d 1052, 1070, 1072 (9th Cir. 2013) (Berzon, J., dissenting in part) ("Whether constant illumination violates the Eighth Amendment in a particular case is a fact-specific inquiry. But contrary to the majority's suggestion, . . .officials do not enjoy qualified immunity simply because the precise facts at issue in their particular case have not been addressed previously. Officials can 'still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . If new facts alone triggered qualified immunity, then officials would rarely if ever be held accountable in cases involving 'fact-driven' claims, such as the Eighth Amendment claim at issue here. . . We therefore must begin with what was the clearly established Eighth Amendment law regarding prison conditions at the time of Chappell's contraband watch, and then proceed to determine whether a reasonable prison official could have considered the conditions of Chappell's contraband watch constitutional in light of those precedents. In April–May 2002, it was clearly established that it is unconstitutional to cause a prisoner harm by subjecting him to constant lighting. Keenan pronounced in 1996 that '[t]here is no legitimate penological justification for requiring [inmates] to suffer physical and psychological harm by living in constant illumination.'. . .A reasonable officer would have known that, in combination, the twenty-four-hour bright light, the absence of a mattress, and the extensive bodily restraints risked depriving Chappell of sleep, in violation of the Eighth Amendment.")

Jackson v. California Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, No. 12–15880, 2013 WL 681178, *1 (9th Cir. Feb. 26, 2013) (not published) ("At the time of the defendants' conduct in 2007, it was not clearly established that a cross-gender strip search in a non-emergency situation may be unreasonable. . . The fact that California law does not permit non-emergency cross-gender strip searches does not strip the defendants of their qualified immunity. . . Thus, because the state of the law in 2007 did not give the defendants fair warning of the potential unlawfulness of their conduct, they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Mueller v. Auker, 700 F.3d 1180, 1188 (9th Cir. 2012) ("[T]he district court stated that '[t]he Court's research, and the parties' briefing do not reveal any cases which have laid out the constitutional guidelines for resolving parental [non-religious] objections to medical treatment....' Five years later, the Muellers still have not provided us with any cases specific enough to the emergency room facts and circumstances of this case to advance their cause. We have not uncovered a decision identifying a Fourteenth Amendment violation 'on facts even roughly comparable to those present in this case.' Ryburn, 565 U.S. at ——, 132 S.Ct. at 990. Nowhere can we find any clearly established law which would have required a judicial hearing before Detective Rogers or the Department of Health and Welfare took the actions that they did when facing these dangers. . . . In effect, the Muellers ask us to repeat the analytical mistake we made in Brosseau, where we approached this issue based upon general tests and abstract constitutional propositions instead of focusing on the precise factual scenario confronted by the officers. . . .Idaho law permits a police officer to place a child in shelter care without a court order when necessary to prevent serious physical injury. . . . The Muellers' late assertion in their reply brief that this law is 'obviously unconstitutional' is of no help to them on this issue, because at the time the disputed decisions were made, no clearly established law existed to that effect. Moreover, the existence of a state statute authorizing an official's disputed conduct weighs in that official's favor, so long as the statute itself does not offend the Constitution, and I.C. § 16–1612 does not.")

Marsh v. County of San Diego, 680 F.3d 1148, 1159 (9th Cir. 2012) ("As already noted, this is the first case to address the federal privacy interest in death images. While we believe the right is sufficiently grounded in federal law, we can't fault a state actor for failing to anticipate our ruling. Because it wouldn't have been 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted,' . . . Coutler is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Karl v. City of Mountlake Terrace, 678 F.3d 1062, 1073-75 (9th Cir. 2012) ("We . . . consider whether existing law at the time of Caw's conduct in 2008 provided him 'fair notice' that the First Amendment prohibits retaliating against an employee for providing subpoenaed deposition testimony during another person's civil rights lawsuit. . . .Although there is no case in our circuit with the same facts as those presented here, a reasonable official in Caw's position would have known that it was unlawful to retaliate against an employee for providing subpoenaed deposition testimony in connection with a civil rights lawsuit alleging government misconduct. First, a reasonably competent official would have known that a public employee's subpoenaed deposition testimony addresses a matter of public concern when it is given in connection with a judicial or administrative proceeding involving allegations of 'significant government misconduct.'. . It has been clearly established since at least 2004 that judicial and administrative proceedings are matters of public concern when they seek to expose 'potential or actual discrimination, corruption, or other wrongful conduct by government agencies or officials.'. . Caw was therefore on notice that Wender's § 1983 action was a matter of public concern, for any reasonable official would know that unlawfully retaliating against a public employee for his protected speech activities constitutes 'significant government misconduct.' Furthermore, we have held that it was clearly established since at least 2007 that testifying pursuant to a subpoena in a judicial or administrative proceeding of public concern constitutes protected speech. . . Although none of our earlier cases specifically addressed subpoenaed deposition testimony as opposed to testimony in open court, our holdings have not been so narrowly cabined that Caw could reasonably have believed subpoenaed deposition testimony was excluded from the First Amendment's ambit of protection. . . Second, a reasonable official would also have known that a public employee's speech on a matter of public concern is protected if the speech is not made pursuant to her official job duties, even if the testimony itself addresses matters of employment. . . . Garcetti in no way altered Karl's clearly established First Amendment right to give subpoenaed deposition testimony in the Wender litigation in her capacity as a private citizen, without facing retaliation as a result. Finally, it was clearly established at the time of Caw's conduct that a subordinate officer can be liable under § 1983 for retaliating against an employee even if he also has legitimate, non-retaliatory motives. Under the 'mixed motive' analysis established by Mt. Healthy, the intensely fact-bound question is simply whether the employer 'would have reached the same [adverse employment] decision even in the absence of the [employee's] protected conduct.'. . Furthermore, we held in 1999 that 'a subordinate cannot use the nonretaliatory motive of a superior as a shield against liability if that superior never would have considered a dismissal but for the subordinate's retaliatory conduct.'. .Thus, the relevant principles were all clearly established long before the events in question, such that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violate[d]' Karl's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation.")

Henry A. v. Willden, 678 F.3d 991, 1000-03 (9th Cir. 2012) ("In this case, the district court's qualified immunity analysis was too narrow. The district court looked at Plaintiffs' detailed factual allegations and essentially determined that Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because the 'very action[s] in question' had not 'previously been held unlawful.'. . Instead, the district court should have (1) determined the contours of a foster child's clearly established rights at the time of the challenged conduct under the 'special relationship' doctrine of substantive due process, and (2) examined whether a reasonable official would have understood that the specific conduct alleged by Plaintiffs violated those rights. . . Using the correct analysis, we conclude that Plaintiffs have alleged violations of their clearly established constitutional rights, and the individual defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation. . . . Having examined the relevant contours of a foster child's clearly established due process rights to adequate safety and medical care, we conclude that a reasonable official would have understood that at least some of the specific conduct alleged by Plaintiffs violated those rights. . . . It may be that Plaintiffs cannot prove these allegations, or that they can only prove some of their less serious allegations, such as the failure to provide standardized periodic health screenings. If that turns out to be the case, the individual defendants can again raise the defense of qualified immunity at a later stage in the proceedings. . . But at this stage, when we accept as true all well pleaded facts in the complaint, Plaintiffs have alleged violations of their clearly established constitutional rights, and qualified immunity is not appropriate. We reverse the district court's dismissal of the damages claims in Count One. . . . We [also] reverse the district court's dismissal of Count Two for failure to state a claim under the state-created danger doctrine. Because Tamas also held that these rights were clearly established, we reject the district court's conclusion that qualified immunity provides an alternative ground for dismissal.")

Hunt v. County of Orange, 672 F.3d 606, 615, 616 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Hunt's First Amendment right to be free from demotion for campaigning against Carona was clearly established as of June 2006. . . . However, the critical question here is whether a reasonable official in Carona's position should have known that Hunt was not a policymaker whose political loyalty was important to the effective performance of his job. . . . We conclude, like the district court, that Carona could have reasonably but mistakenly believed that Hunt's demotion was not unconstitutional, given the unique nature of his job as Chief of Police Services for the City of San Clemente. Although Hunt's position had no department-wide policy-making responsibility, influence, or control, as the jury found, Hunt exercised discretion over the implementation of OCSD policy within San Clemente, influenced OCSD policy as it affected San Clemente, and formulated plans to implement OCSD policy in San Clemente. While Hunt had to secure authority before speaking with the public, when he did so, it was on behalf of the OCSD. We have carefully analyzed the development of the policymaker exception, its underlying purpose, the high burden on the government to prove that political fidelity was a necessary requirement of Hunt's job, and balanced the nine-factor Fazio analysis that requires a fact-dependent inquiry. Even if Carona engaged in the appropriate analysis and wrongly concluded that Hunt was a policy-maker such that demoting him was constitutional, we cannot say that he acted objectively unreasonably in concluding he could demote Hunt without violating his constitutional rights.")

Rosenbaum v. Washoe County, 663 F.3d 1071, 1076-79 & n.2 (9th Cir. 2011) ("In the context of an unlawful arrest, then, the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis can be summarized as: (1) whether there was probable cause for the arrest; and (2) whether it is reasonably arguable that there was probable cause for arrest–that is, whether reasonable officers could disagree as to the legality of the arrest such that the arresting officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Framing the reasonableness question somewhat differently, the question in determining whether qualified immunity applies is whether all officers would agree that there was no probable cause in this instance. See Ashcroft, 131 S.Ct. at 2083 (holding that an official is not entitled to qualified immunity where 'every reasonable official' would have understood that he was violating a clearly established right (emphasis added) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted)). . . . The Court uses the language 'all reasonable officers' or 'every reasonable officer' to explain that it must be clear that the conduct is unlawful; qualified immunity will attach whenever reasonable officers could disagree about whether the facts in the particular case give rise to probable cause. The law does not imply, however, that police officers are the ultimate arbiters of constitutional questions. The lawfulness of their conduct does not turn on whether all, or most, officers think that the law is clearly established. For example, if the Supreme Court has issued an opinion condemning racial profiling, but 90 percent of the police in a given geographic area think racial profiling is just fine, an officer would not be entitled to qualified immunity simply because his fellow officers disagree with a clear Supreme Court ruling. . . .This is not a case where courts disagree about the contours of a constitutional right or where officers may be confused about what is required of them under various circumstances. As our analysis establishes, the statute is unambiguous, and not susceptible to the reading that the county suggests. Therefore, no reasonable officer could believe that Rosenbaum's conduct violated this statute. Considering the facts in the light most favorable to Rosenbaum, all reasonably competent officers would have agreed that he was not committing a crime. There is no scalping law in Nevada; it is simply not a crime to sell tickets to a fair–even when the tickets were received for free. His t-shirt did not suggest fraud, nor were the ticket buyers duped by the sale. The district court's grant of summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity for an unlawful arrest is reversed.")

Heyne v. Metropolitan Nashville Public Schools, 655 F.3d 556, 568 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Taken as a whole, the Amended Complaint's factual allegations, which we must accept as true, plausibly suggest that Manuel's ability to impartially determine the appropriate discipline in relation to the September 5, 2008 incident had been manifestly compromised–by virtue of his knowledge of and expressed concern about student discipline statistics, his instructions to faculty and staff concerning discipline of African-American students, and his reaction to communications with the parents of D.A. These are the kinds of specific facts, indicating the presence of pre-existing bias, that this Court has recognized could give rise to a valid claim for infringement of the due process right to an impartial decisionmaker in the context of student discipline. . . Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to plaintiff Heyne, as we must, we conclude that a reasonable school official in Manuel's alleged position should have known that his impartiality was compromised and that his participation in the discipline decision-making process was not permissible. The impropriety of Manuel's alleged conduct in failing to disqualify himself should have been apparent based on Goss, Newsome, and other precedent directly on point. . . Heyne's right to an unbiased decisionmaker was thus clearly established when Manuel acted. . . Therefore, we hold that Heyne has stated a facially valid claim against Manuel under § 1983 for violating his right to procedural due process. The district court's denial of Manuel's motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity is AFFIRMED . . . . Read in the light most favorable to Heyne, the Amended Complaint contains well-pled factual allegations we must accept as true suggesting that Manuel suspended Heyne for ten days based in part on Heyne's race. Heyne's factual allegations state a plausible claim against Manuel for violation of his right to equal protection. . . Heyne's right not to be disciplined based on his race was clearly established at the time of Manuel's actions. . . Therefore, we hold that Heyne has stated a claim against Manuel under § 1983 for violating his right to equal protection. The district court's denial of Manuel's motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity is AFFIRMED.")

Dougherty v. City of Covina, 654 F.3d 892, 899, 900 (9th Cir. 2011) ("[W]hile the 'totality of circumstances' could, in some instances, allow us to find probable cause to search for child pornography, Officer Bobkiewicz's conclusory statement tying this 'subject,' alleged to have molested two children and looked inappropriately at others, to 'having in [his] possession child pornography' is insufficient to create probable cause here. . . . The law in this circuit had not been clearly established regarding whether allegations of sexual misconduct or molestation at a place of work provide probable cause to search a residence for child pornography in the absence of an explanation tying together the two crimes. Neither this court nor the Supreme Court has addressed this question. Further, as discussed supra, other Circuit Courts of Appeal have split on similar questions. . . Therefore, because the law was not clearly established at the time of the alleged events, the district court did not err in holding Bobkiewicz and the other police officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ammons v. Washington Dept. of Social and Health Services, 648 F.3d 1020, 1026-34 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Courts are given the discretion to decide 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.'. . Here, it is difficult to assess whether the facts alleged by Ammons establish the alleged constitutional violation without setting forth the governing law. Therefore, we first examine the clearly established law with respect to the alleged Fourteenth Amendment violation, and then determine whether the facts before us support such a violation. . . .[A]t the time the events alleged in this case took place, it was clearly established that LaFond and Webster, as state officials, had a duty to exercise professional judgment to provide safe conditions for Ammons and the other patients at CSTC. . . .In light of the clearly established law that hospital officials must provide safe conditions for involuntarily committed patients, we now examine the circumstances under which state hospital officials may be held responsible for failing to do so. . . . Youngberg and Neely serve as pre-existing, clearly established law as to what conduct supports infringement of the Fourteenth Amendment rights of involuntarily committed hospital patients. At the time of the alleged events, then, it was clear that the actions of LaFond and Webster violated the Constitution if they ran afoul of the objective Youngberg professional judgment standard as applied in Neely. . . . Under Neely, a jury could find that a reasonable administrator, exercising professional judgment with respect to providing safe conditions, would have taken Resident A's allegation into account when assigning and supervising staff members in cottages where female patients resided. While LaFond had no cause to discipline Grant, because he had been exonerated of the molestation charge, she certainly had reason, in light of her duties with respect to the safety of her patients, to manage and monitor his duties more carefully. Instead, LaFond allowed Grant to gain unfettered and unmonitored access to the female residents, and to spend time with them on a one-on-one basis. . . . We hold that, under the facts alleged and produced, LaFond's apparent inaction and poor supervision with respect to the safety of Ammons and the other female patients support a finding that she failed to exercise professional judgment, and thereby violated the Fourteenth Amendment."[footnotes omitted])

Gerhart v. Lake County, Mont., 637 F.3d 1013, 1025 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Gerhart's constitutional right not to be intentionally treated differently than other similarly situated property owners without a rational basis was clearly established at the time his permit application was denied. . . . Because Willowbrook clearly establishes Gerhart's constitutional right to not be intentionally treated differently than other similarly situated property owners without a rational basis, we conclude that the individual Commissioners are not entitled to qualified immunity on Gerhart's equal protection claim.") Clairmont v. Sound Mental Health, 632 F.3d 1091, 1110 (9th Cir. 2011) ("In Robinson, we held that, as early as 2005, it was clearly established that a public employee's voluntary testimony relating to discrimination was a matter of public concern. . . In light of our then existing case law, we conclude that, in 2007, it was clearly established that Clairmont's subpoenaed testimony related to an issue of public concern. In addition, as stated in Robinson, it was clearly established by 2005 that for a government employer's legitimate administrative interests to outweigh an employee's right to engage in protected speech, the disruption had to be 'real, not imagined.'. . .When we resolve all factual disputes and draw all reasonable inferences in Clairmont's favor, as we must, there is no support for Wilson's argument that Clairmont's testimony caused workplace disruption the quelling of which outweighed Clairmont's interest in engaging in protected speech. It was clearly established at the relevant time that Wilson's proffered evidence of disruption in the workplace was woefully insufficient.")

Tamas v. Department of Social & Health Services, 630 F.3d 833, 846, 847 (9th Cir. 2010) ("The Fourth Circuit in Doe held that its precedent did not clearly establish such a right because its prior cases did not involve foster children within the custody and control of the state when the state made foster care placement decisions. . . However, unlike the Fourth Circuit, we previously held in 1992 that '[o]nce the state assumes wardship of a child, the state owes the child, as part of that person's protected liberty interest, reasonable safety and minimally adequate care and treatment appropriate to the age and circumstances of the child.'. . We may also look to the law of other circuits to determine if a principle is clearly established. [collecting law of other circuits] Based on these cases, we conclude that it was clearly established in 1996 that Appellees had a protected liberty interest in safe foster care placement once they became wards of the state.")

Community House, Inc. v. City of Boise, Idaho, 623 F.3d 945, 968-70 (9th Cir. 2010) ("It is true that when reviewing a denial of qualified immunity, 'our appellate jurisdiction is limited to questions of law.'. . However, we have power to consider qualified immunity even where facts are disputed, so long as we 'assum[e] that the version of the material facts asserted by the non-moving party is correct.'. . We have made such an assumption and thus have jurisdiction to consider the second prong of Saucier's test. It would be quite incongruous if a public official's right to an immediate appeal from a denial of qualified immunity were to evaporate simply because the district court failed or chose not to complete the required Saucier analysis. . . . [E]ven if it was clearly established that the FHA applied to Community House, a reasonable official could not have known that the single-men-only policy violated the statute. It was not until the earlier appeal that we determined what types of justifications could validate a facially discriminatory, men-only policy–an issue already subject to a circuit split. Cmty. House I, 490 F.3d at 1050. The council members questioned the BRM regarding the policy, were assured that the women could stay at the City Light shelter and that it would be safer to house men and women in separate facilities, and even verified the BRM's claims of fewer police calls. These were reasonable actions, especially considering that this court later determined that a discriminatory policy based on legitimate, non-stereotypical safety concerns would in fact pass muster under the FHA.")

Dunn v. Castro, 621 F.3d 1196, 1205 (9th Cir. 2010) ("The right at issue here is not an abstract right to familial association. By so holding, the district court erred by defining the question at too high a level of generality and evaluating that question without regard to the relevant fact-specific circumstances. Like the Court in Overton, we do not hold or imply that incarceration entirely extinguishes the right to receive visits from family members. . . Nor do we deprecate the value of the relationship between Dunn and his children. The relationship between a father or mother and his or her child, even in prison, merits some degree of protection. The pertinent inquiry in this case, however, goes beyond an ordinary father's interest in sharing a relationship with his child. It is rather whether a reasonable officer could have believed that Dunn–a lawfully incarcerated prisoner who was reasonably believed to have engaged in improper conduct with a minor–could be temporarily deprived of his visitation privileges with his own children. That constitutional question 'is by no means open and shut.'. . At the time of the challenged restriction on Dunn's visitation privileges, federal courts had held that prisoners do not have an absolute right to visitation, as such privileges are necessarily subject to the prison authorities' discretion, provided their administrative decisions are tied to legitimate penological objectives. Thus, we conclude that the right of a prisoner to receive visits from his children in the factual circumstances of this case was not clearly established in 2004, when the restriction was imposed.") Crowe v. County of San Diego, 608 F.3d 406, 429-32 (9th Cir. 2010) (second amended opinion) ("In contrast to the facts in Chavez, the prosecution of Michael and Aaron did not cease with the boys' interrogations. Rather, the boys were indicted and the case against them continued for a year, up and until the eve of trial. During this time, statements obtained during the boys' interrogations were used in several pre-trial proceedings, including a 'Dennis H. Hearing,' the grand jury proceedings, and a '707 Hearing.' Following Stoot, we hold that the use of Michael's and Aaron's statements in the pre-trial proceedings gives rise to a Fifth Amendment cause of action. . . . In summary, we hold that a Fifth Amendment cause of action against the relevant defendants arose when Michael and Aaron's coerced statements were introduced against them during pre-trial proceedings. Further, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. In 1998, when defendants interrogated Michael and Aaron, the clearly established rule in this Circuit was that a § 1983 cause of action for a violation of the Fifth Amendment's Self-Incrimination Clause arose as soon as police employed coercive means to compel a statement. See Cooper, 963 F.2d at 1242; see also Stoot, 2009 WL 2973229, at *14-15) (denying qualified immunity for a similar claim). As such, defendants cannot claim the protection of qualified immunity. . . . [In addition] The interrogations violated Michael's and Aaron's Fourteenth Amendment rights to substantive due process. . . . Further, defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because it was clearly established, at the time of the boys' interrogations, that the interrogation techniques defendants chose to use 'shock the conscience.' Defendants had the benefit of this Court's holding in Cooper, as well as Supreme Court case law directing that the interrogation of a minor be conducted with 'the greatest care,' In re Gault, 387 U.S. at 55. Just as in Cooper, here, '[q]ualified immunity is manifestly inapplicable.'").

Edgerly v. City and County of San Francisco, 599 F.3d 946, 958, 959 (9th Cir. 2010) ("We conclude that the Officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for their alleged strip search of Edgerly by visually inspecting his genitalia or buttocks. As we explained above, without reasonable individualized suspicion, a strip search like that alleged here is unconstitutional. . . The law on this point was clearly established at the time of this search: we have previously held that it was clearly established in 1989 'that it is unlawful to strip search an arrestee brought to a jail facility on charges of committing a minor offense, unless the officer directing the search possesses "a reasonable suspicion that the individual arrestee is carrying or concealing contraband."'. . . Because Bull did not disturb our cases requiring individualized suspicion for strip searches of arrestees not classified for housing in the general jail population, Bull's overruling of Giles in no way affects our conclusion that the law was clearly established here. . . . In light of this clearly established law, no reasonable officer could have believed that the police station search, as described by Edgerly at trial, was lawful.").

Elliot-Park v. Manglona, 592 F.3d 1003, 1008, 1009 (9th Cir. 2010) ("The right to non-discriminatory administration of protective services is clearly established. . . Nevertheless, the officers argue that it wasn't clearly established that investigation and arrest are protective services. But the very purpose of section 1983 was to provide a federal right of action against states that refused to enforce their laws when the victim was black. It hardly passes the straight-face test to argue at this point in our history that police could reasonably believe they could treat individuals disparately based on their race. The officers argue that Elliott's equal protection rights weren't clearly established because she can't find a case similar to hers–like a sobriety check and arrest case or a traffic case–where the court found an equal protection violation. But there doesn't need to be a prior case with materially similar facts in order for a right to be clearly established. . . We have recognized the absurdity of requiring equal protection plaintiffs to find a case with materially similar facts. In Flores v. Morgan Hill Unified School District, we held that public school administrators who failed to respond to gay students' harassment complaints were not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Flores found that school administrators were on notice that they had to treat gay students the same as straight students based on a case holding that state employees in general can't irrationally discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation. . . The same holds true here. It's been long established that state employees can't treat individuals differently on the basis of their race. The three officers thus had a more than fair warning that failure to investigate and arrest Babauta because of race violated equal protection.")

Stoot v. City of Everett, 582 F.3d 910, 927 (9th Cir. 2009) (amended opinion)("At the time of the interrogation, Jensen was on notice under clearly established law that if he failed to provide Paul with appropriate Miranda warnings or physically or psychologically coerced a statement from Paul, the use of the confessions could ripen into a Fifth Amendment violation. That there was some uncertainty as to precisely what 'use' in a criminal case would suffice does not matter. Qualified immunity is accorded so that reasonable officers are not deterred in carrying out their duties vigorously. . .The qualified immunity evaluation must therefore focus on an officer's duties, not on other aspects of the constitutional violation. That the allegedly coerced confession did not 'ripen' into a Fifth Amendment violation until it was 'used' against Paul in a criminal case does not change this analysis, as Jensen had no reason to believe that the statements would not be used against Paul. . . . As we have already explained in Part B above, a properly-instructed jury could find that some 'use' of Paul's statements was reasonably foreseeable to Jensen at the time of the interrogation. We thus join the Second Circuit in holding that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity where '[a] reasonable fact finder could conclude that it was not reasonable for an officer to believe that it was constitutional to coerce a confession and then to hand that information to a prosecutor-without divulging the means by which the confession was acquired-for use in a criminal case.'").

Hopkins v. Bonvicino, 573 F.3d 752, 776 (9th Cir. 2009)(requirement that a police officer establish independent probable cause before taking individuals into custody solely on the basis of a citizen's arrest was not clearly established in 2003).

Tennison v. City and County of San Francisco, 570 F.3d 1078, 1093, 1094 (9th Cir. 2009) ("The Inspectors argue that, even if a constitutional right was violated, such a constitutional right was not clearly established in 1990. The Inspectors, however, define the right too narrowly. They argue that they did not have a duty to disclose a confession that was made after a guilty verdict was rendered, that was 'inherently unbelievable,' and that was given by someone who earlier had denied involvement in the murder. . . . The Inspectors received a Mirandized confession by someone who had been named by a reliable witness, known to the officers, who recounted events surrounding the murder in detail, and whose account contradicted that of the prosecution's witnesses. The evidence certainly 'undermines confidence in the outcome of the trial.'. .Thus, it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that such material should have been disclosed to the defense.").

Eng v. Cooley, 552 F.3d 1062, 1075, 1076 (9th Cir. 2009) ("The Defendants did not argue before the district court, and do not argue before this court now, that Eng's rights were not clearly established with respect to any speech not spoken pursuant to his official employment duties. Relying on Garcetti(decided in 2006), the Defendants assert only that 'the law was not clearly established [in 2001] as to the nature of First Amendment protection for public employee speech expressed pursuant to official job duties.' This observation is beside the point. Garcetti makes clear that if Eng's comments about the leaks to the IRS were spoken pursuant to his official job duties, then he cannot recover regardless of the state of the law in 2001, since there is no private First Amendment interest in 'speech that owes its existence to a public employee's professional responsibilities.'. . And if the statements were not spoken pursuant to Eng's job duties, the Defendants do not dispute that Eng's free speech interest was clearly established. Nor could they. Garcetti concluded only that 'work product' that 'owes its existence to [an employee]'s professional responsibilities' is not protected by the First Amendment. . . Prior to Garcetti, the Defendants therefore may have been uncertain whether the Task Force report itself was protected, but only insofar as they might reasonably have believed that it was protected when in fact it was not. There could be no confusion, however, that when Eng 'comment[ed] upon matters of public concern' 'as a citizen' and not pursuant to his job responsibilities, his speech was protected by the First Amendment–that rule had long been the law of the land. . . Thus, assuming Eng's version of the facts to be true, he had a clearly established right to comment on the leak to the IRS.. . . Geragos's and Eng's respective First Amendment interests in Geragos's speech to the press were also clearly established at the time of the alleged retaliation. The clarity of Geragos's interest in his own speech (regardless of Eng's standing to vindicate that interest) is beyond dispute. With respect to Eng's personal interest, by 2003, the right to retain and consult an attorney 'implicate[d] ... clearly established First Amendment rights of association and free speech.'. . It was also clearly established that 'an individual's First Amendment rights of association and free speech are violated when a police officer retaliates against her for retaining an attorney.'. . An individual's personal

First Amendment interest in his or her lawyer's speech on his or her behalf is a natural corollary of the First Amendment right to retain counsel. . . . Although we have not previously addressed a case precisely like this one, ' Aofficials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'". . . Because this case involved 'mere application of settled law to a new factual permutation,'. . . we conclude that Eng's personal First Amendment interest in Geragos's speech was clearly established by 2003. Denius, DeLoach, and Velazquez were sufficient to put the Defendants on notice of the common sense conclusion that the government may not retaliate against a public employee for speech spoken by the employee's lawyer on the employee's behalf.").

Foster v. Runnels, 554 F.3d 807, 815, 816 (9th Cir. 2009) ("There is no question that an inmate's Eighth Amendment right to adequate food is clearly established. . . .Cole nevertheless argues that her actions were reasonable and that because there is no Ninth Circuit authority on point, she had no way of knowing that her conduct was unlawful. These arguments are unavailing. . . . The decisions from this Circuit and others alerting prison officials of their obligations to provide inmates with nutritionally adequate meals on a regular basis should have given Cole sufficient notice of the contours of the Eighth Amendment right. Cole cannot seek shelter in the reasonableness of her actions on the basis of the July 27 memo outlining the in-cell feeding policy for Facility C. . . Indeed, the memo issued by the HDSP warden on September 12 suggests that forfeiture of meals or an activity for failing to remove coverings from all windows was never an official HDSP policy, but rather a measure temporarily implemented in Facility C. Furthermore, Cole's conduct was not reasonable because she took no other action to ensure that her obligation to provide Foster with meals was met. Consequently, she is not entitled to qualified immunity.") CarePartners, LLC v. Lashway, 545 F.3d 867, 883, 884 (9th Cir. 2008) ("[T]he assertion of an unsuccessful defense to a violation of a constitutional right does not render the right 'unsettled' or not 'clearly established.' Notwithstanding the fact that the Soranno's Gasco court did not make a specific holding regarding the application of the 'public concern' requirement and Pickering balancing test beyond the public employee context, that panel addressed a regulated entity's precise claim of retaliation by government officials as a result of the entity's owners' public comments and petition to the courts to challenge a regulatory act. The scope of the rights at issue here were particularized enough at the time of the violation to satisfy the Saucier test for 'clearly established' law. The State employees also argue that this court should not rely on Soranno's Gasco because that decision relied in part on a causation test from the public employee context, Mt. Healthy, 429 U.S. 274, 97 S.Ct. 568, 50 L.Ed.2d 471. Far from being persuasive, this tends to bolster the argument that the public concern should not be grafted onto the regulated entity context because the Soranno's Gasco court knew of the causation test and yet decided not to apply it to the regulated entity's retaliation claim. Finally, we reject any suggestion that the State employees could have believed, 'reasonably but mistakenly,' that their conduct did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. . . The speech and petition rights at issue have been clearly established in this circuit since 1989. At least at the summary judgment stage, absent some type of extraordinary showing that is not present here, a court could hardly find that the government officials 'reasonably but mistakenly' believed that they could retaliate against a regulated entity and its owners for exercising their First Amendment rights.").

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. Los Angeles County Sheriff Dept., 533 F.3d 780, 794 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Here, it was clear that the officers could not apply a time, place or manner restriction on speech to the Plaintiffs' activities around the school without advancing any significant state interest by doing so. But the officers could have made a reasonable mistake in believing that ' 626.8 applied to Plaintiffs' conduct and thus advanced a significant state interest. . .There was no case law determining whether ' 626.8 does or does not apply to the circumstances the officers faced. . . And, although we believe that our reading of the statute is one California courts would adopt, that conclusion is premised in part on the practice of avoiding unconstitutional interpretations of statutes, not solely on the language of the statute. Moreover, as we have noted, there is some question whether the heckler's veto consideration applies where the target audience consists of children. As far as we have been able to determine, there is no case law holding either that it does or that it does not. In these circumstances, we cannot conclude that the law was sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would know that it was unlawful to request the Plaintiffs to cease driving their truck around the area.")

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. Los Angeles County Sheriff Dept., 533 F.3d 780, 798 (9th Cir. 2008) ("The deputies cannot receive qualified immunity for their unreasonably lengthy detention of Kulas and Padberg. The deputies' constitutional duty to act diligently and pursue a means of investigation likely to confirm or dispel their suspicions quickly was clearly established on the date of the detention in this case. . .Moreover, it should have been readily apparent to a reasonable officer that ' 626.8 provided no basis for a detention, as no violation of the statute occurred unless the Plaintiffs stayed on the premises after being asked to leave.").

Fogel v. Collins, 531 F.3d 824, 833 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Although we have concluded that the officers violated the First Amendment when they arrested Fogel, impounded his van, and forced him to remove his message, we cannot say that existing precedents would have alerted the police officers that we would find a violation. . . . As the district court pointed out, in no case had a court held on identical or closely comparable facts that the speech was protected by the First Amendment. That is, in May 2004, when the officers acted, there was no reported case in which a person in the post-September 11 environment satirically proclaimed himself or herself to be a terrorist in possession of weapons of mass destruction. We do not, by our invocation of September 11, 2001, suggest that the First Amendment provides less protection than before September 11. Rather, we recognize that what might previously have been understood as relatively harmless talk might, in the immediate aftermath of September 11, have been understood to constitute a real threat.").

Beck v. City of Upland, 527 F.3d 853, 861, 864, 865, 870, 871 (9th Cir. 2008) ("In this instance, . . . the officers, relying on Smiddy I, maintain that they cannot be held liable for violating Beck's First or Fourth Amendment rights by arresting him, because an independent prosecutor authorized prosecution before the officers sought and obtained an arrest warrant. . . We disagree. . . . We see no reason to limit Hartman's probable cause requirement solely to First Amendment retaliatory arrest and prosecution cases. Rather, its logic extends to Fourth Amendment false arrest cases like Beck's, at least to the extent that the plaintiff must prove the absence of probable cause to rebut the presumption of independent prosecutorial judgment, when a prosecutor's actions are interposed between the actions of investigating officials and the arrest. Ordinarily, however, the plaintiff bears the burden of proving the absence of probable cause anyway in a Fourth Amendment false arrest case. Proving lack of probable cause is usually essential to demonstrating that the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights were violated. As a practical matter, consequently, Hartman will rarely add to the plaintiff's ultimate burden in a § 1983 false arrest case. . . . To summarize: We hold, first, that to the degree Smiddy I could be understood under our case law to apply to a First Amendment-based retaliatory arrest or prosecution cause of action, Smiddy I is inconsistent with Hartman and cannot stand. In such cases, we will not separately inquire, through application of a presumption or otherwise, into the prosecutor's actual state of mind. Instead, a showing of a 'retaliatory motive on the part of an official urging prosecution combined with an absence of probable cause supporting the prosecutor's decision' will suffice to rebut the presumption of regularity and settle the causation issue. . . Second, in any constitutional tort case, including Fourth Amendment-based cases, in which a prosecutor has instigated a prosecution, it is necessary, if not sufficient, that a plaintiff seeking to sue non-prosecutorial officials alleged to be responsible post-complaint for the arrest or prosecution show the absence of probable cause. . . . We have already explained that, on this summary judgment record, Beck was arrested in retaliation for his speech and that the arrest was without probable cause. Those explanations satisfy the first step of the qualified immunity inquiry with regard to the First and Fourth Amendment issues, and we will not repeat them here. . . All that remains is to determine whether the pertinent law was clearly established at the time of the incidents in this case. . . It was. Regarding the First Amendment cause of action: Arresting someone in retaliation for their exercise of free speech rights was violative of law clearly established at the time of Beck's arrest. . . . Regarding the Fourth Amendment cause of action: As we have discussed, the California courts limited ' 69 'threat' violations to threats of violence as early as 1984.").

Clement v. City of Glendale, 518 F.3d 1090, 1096 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Officer Young did not violate Clement's clearly established right by calling for her car to be towed. The constitutional requirement at issue–that pre-towing notice be given before a car with a valid PNO certificate may be removed from a parking lot matching the owner's address–was not clearly established at the time of Officer Young's actions. Neither the text of the Constitution nor our caselaw clearly spoke to the balance between the rights of citizens to predeprivation notice and the authority of police to enforce registration statutes. While due process generally requires notice before the government may deprive a citizen of his property, . . . our caselaw recognizes many exceptions. . . We have never held that municipalities must always notify vehicle owners before towing. In fact, our most recent decision involving municipal towing of unregistered vehicles– admittedly in a different context–found there to be no right to pre-deprivation notice. . . It would not have been unreasonable for Officer Young to have interpreted this caselaw as not requiring that notice be given before towing an unregistered vehicle with a valid PNO certificate. We affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of defendant Young.").

Inouye v. Kemna, 504 F.3d 705, 714 (9th Cir. 2007) (as amended) ("Having held, first, as we must under Saucier, that there was a constitutional violation on the facts alleged, we now turn to the question at the heart of the parties' dispute: was the pertinent Establishment Clause law 'clearly established' on this point such that a reasonable official would know that his or her conduct was illegal? . . .. We find that it was. The vastly overwhelming weight of authority on the precise question in this case held at the time of Nanamori's actions that coercing participation in programs of this kind is unconstitutional. . . . By 2001, two circuit courts, at least three district courts, and two state supreme courts had all considered whether prisoners or parolees could be forced to attend religion-based treatment programs. Their unanimous conclusion was that such coercion was unconstitutional.").

Porter v. Bowen, 496 F.3d 1009, 1026, 1027 (9th Cir. 2007) ("We conclude that the application of First Amendment doctrine to vote swapping was not clearly established in 2000 (or, indeed, until our decision today). First, no court had ever addressed the constitutionality of efforts to halt vote swapping when Jones threatened Appellants with prosecution. Jones therefore had no on-point decision to rely on when he received complaints about Appellants' websites. Second, although it is true that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances,'. . . this case does not involve the mere application of settled law to a new factual permutation. To the contrary, we have had to wrestle with difficult and unsettled questions about the First Amendment interests implicated by vote swapping and the weight of the countervailing interests asserted by the State. Finally, Jones was not the only Secretary of State to determine that vote swapping was illegal under state law; so too did his counterparts in Oregon and Minnesota, on grounds similar to those cited by Jones (though the Secretaries of State of Maine, Michigan and Nebraska reached the opposite conclusion). Taking these considerations into account, we hold that Jones is entitled to qualified immunity . He did not have 'fair warning' that his actions were unconstitutional,. . . nor would a 'reasonable official' in his position have understood that threatening the owners of vote-swapping websites with prosecution constituted a violation of the First Amendment . . . .")

Preschooler II v. Clark County School Bd. of Trustees, 479 F.3d 1175, 1182 (9th Cir. 2007) ("In light of the clear constitutional prohibition of excessive physical abuse of schoolchildren, and the heightened protections for disabled pupils, no reasonable special education teacher would believe that it is lawful to force a seriously disabled four year old child to beat himself or to violently throw or slam him. Existing law plainly prohibits excessive hitting, dragging or throwing of public school children.").

Morgan v. Morgensen, 465 F.3d 1041, 1043, 1045, 1046 (9th Cir. 2006) ("[W]e hold that, under certain circumstances, dangerous prison working conditions can give rise to an Eighth Amendment claim, not-withstanding the fact that the prisoner initially obtained his specific employment assignment through a voluntary application process within the prison system. We further hold that a prison official is not entitled to qualified immunity when he orders a prisoner to continue operating prison work equipment that the official has been warned and has reason to believe is unnecessarily dangerous. . . . Regardless of how a prisoner obtains his work, once he is employed and not in a position to direct his own labor, his supervisors are not free to visit cruel and unusual punishments upon him. Morgan did not apply to work with a dangerously defective printing press. . . . For our purposes, we conclude that the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Morgan, shows that Canady violated Morgan's constitutional right not to be compelled to perform work that endangered his health and caused undue pain. As an initial matter, Canady argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law, because at the time of the alleged violation, there existed no case law in this circuit, and there was a conflict among the other circuits, as to whether a prisoner could make out an Eighth Amendment violation when he alleges that a prison official compelled him to continue working with defective prison equipment. Canady argues that given the state of the law, he could not have known that he was violating Morgan's clearly established constitutional rights. Canady's view is not entirely correct. At the time of the alleged constitutional violation, there did exist a conflict among other courts as to whether a prisoner could make out an Eighth Amendment claim when he alleged that a prison official ordered him to work with prison equipment that the official has been told is dangerously defective. . . There was, however, case law within this circuit governing prison officials' conduct in the situation that Canady confronted.")

Sissoko v. Rocha, 440 F.3d 1145, 1167 (9th Cir. 2006) ("Rocha first contends that it was not clear that the Fourth Amendment applies to aliens whose presence here is unlawful. Although Rocha is correct that no Supreme Court case has squarely held that the Fourth Amendment applies to such aliens, . . . directly on-point Supreme Court case law is not required for a right to be 'clearly established.'. . Our own case law provided Rocha with 'fair and clear warning,'. . . that immigration officers dealing with aliens whose presence here may be unlawful must be solicitous of Fourth Amendment protections.").

Kennedy v. City of Ridgefield, 439 F.3d 1055, 1066 (9th Cir. 2006) ("It is beyond dispute that in September 1998, it was clearly established that state officials could be held liable where they affirmatively and with deliberate indifference placed an individual in danger she would not otherwise have faced. This court first recognized the theory of state-created danger liability almost ten years before the events in this case in Wood. . . We have explained before that the responsibility for keeping abreast of constitutional developments rests 'squarely on the shoulders of law enforcement officials. Given the power of such officials over our liberty, and sometimes over our lives, this placement of responsibility is entirely proper.'. . We conclude that no reasonable officer in Shields's position, knowing what he knew, could have concluded that Kennedy had no right not to be placed in physical danger by his deliberately indifferent action."), reh'g en banc denied, 440 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2006).

Kennedy v. City of Ridgefield, 439 F.3d 1055, 1068 (9th Cir. 2006) (Bybee, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("We have never before recognized a state-created danger cause of action on facts remotely analogous to these. In the sixteen years since we invented the state-created danger exception to DeShaney, we have approved it on fewer than five occasions. In these cases we have narrowly construed the exception to encompass only claims in which the government's act was directed toward a specific plaintiff, rather than the public at large; the government acted affirmatively, rather than simply failed to act; the government's act caused the harm, rather than merely increased the risk; and the government's action constituted deliberate indifference to the known or obvious danger, rather than mere negligence, or even gross negligence. Ignoring these elements, the majority today extends the state-created danger doctrine to a situation in which it cannot be said with any measure of confidence either that the government's act caused the plaintiff's harm or that the government acted with the requisite level of culpability. Even if I thought Officer Shields had violated our state-created danger gloss on the Due Process Clause, the violation was surely not so obvious that he should have known at the time that he was violating Kennedy's constitutional rights. Consequently, even assuming a constitutional violation, I would hold that Officer Shields is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity."), reh'g en banc denied, 440 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2006).

Atkins v. County of Riverside, No. 03-55844, 2005 WL 2219461, at *4 (9th Cir. Sept. 14, 2005) (not published) ("Miller is not entitled to qualified immunity as to the fabrication of evidence and Brady claims. . . Devereaux holds that the right not to be subjected to criminal charges on the basis of deliberately fabricated false evidence is 'clearly established.' . . And as for the Brady claim, a police officer in 1988 should have been aware of his obligation to not withhold exculpatory evidence. [citing cases] In addition, it seems sufficiently obvious that 'common sense' would instruct a police officer to not withhold exculpatory evidence.").

Meyers v. Redwood City, 400 F.3d 765, 774 (9th Cir. 2005) ("Even if we thought that the officers crossed a line established by Harris, the officers are surely entitled to qualified immunity because they could not have known that they were violating the Plaintiffs' 'clearly established' constitutional rights. . . Even with a copy of Harris in their back pockets, the officers could not have determined at what point in the middle of this messy repossession they deprived Meyers of her property without due process of law. Meyers may have every right to be unhappy with the situation, but the officers cannot be faulted for attempting to settle this late-night confrontation peacefully. In these circumstances, it would not 'be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'").

Johnson v. Hawe, 388 F.3d 676, 685 (9th Cir. 2004) (amended opinion on denial of reh'g) ("The principles of Flora and its progeny were well-established at the time of Johnson's arrest. At the very least, these cases stand for the following two propositions: (1) 'public officers performing an official function on a public thoroughfare in the presence of a third party and within the sight and hearing of passersby [do not] enjoy a privacy interest which they may assert under the statute'; and (2) the Privacy Act may not be 'transform[ed] ... into a sword available for use against individuals by public officers acting in their official capacity.'. . Any reasonable officer should have understood these rules to preclude Johnson's arrest under the circumstances. Although Flora involved officer statements made during an arrest, no subsequent authority limited its reach to those facts. Moreover, Flora's plain language suggests a broader application sufficient to preclude Chief Nelson from arresting Johnson for recording him during the performance of his official duties in public. Moreover, in light of the many Washington cases dealing with unlawful arrests under the Privacy Act, a reasonable police officer should have been aware of the 1998 Washington Attorney General's Opinion No. 11, which determines that communications over police dispatch radio are not private. . . Finally, even if these two points were not sufficiently clear to preclude Johnson's arrest, any reasonable officer should have known under the well-established precedent of Katz that there could be no reasonable expectation of privacy in the police radio transmissions which Chief Nelson knowingly exposed to the public through his open car windows. No exigent circumstances existed in this case that could justify a reasonable mistake on the part of chief Nelson. . . Therefore defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Kwai Fun Wong v. United States, 373 F.3d 952, 970, 976 (9th Cir. 2004) ("The INS officials do not contest that Wong was entitled to constitutional protections on her return despite her brief departure. They argue only that the extent of Wong's constitutional rights was not clearly established, because she was an alien lacking entry papers upon her return. As a result, the INS officials maintain, a reasonable official would not have known that Wong was entitled to the full panoply of protections offered by the Constitution. . . . Despite the limited scope of the officials' argument, we must address to some degree the extent of Wong's entitlement to constitutional rights. Saucier counsels that we must first determine whether a constitutional right has adequately been alleged by the plaintiff before turning to the 'clearly established' prong. . . . We therefore conclude that Wong's allegations of invidious discrimination are sufficient at this pleading stage to make out a Fifth Amendment discrimination claim arising out of the INS officials' actions with respect to revocation of Wong's temporary parole status and post-return rejection of her adjustment of status applications. . . . Because of the uncertainty surrounding the constitutional status of an alien in Wong's unusual position during the period after her return, we conclude that Wong has not alleged violations of clearly established law.").

Galvin v. Hay, 374 F.3d 739, 745-47 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Plaintiffs ask us to reverse the district court's ruling that, although Baugh held that it was constitutionally impermissible to require RWHP to promise not to engage in civil disobedience in return for a permit, the law on this issue was not clearly established at the time defendants acted. We decline to do so. We agree with the district court that, before Baugh, the contours of the constitutional right violated by the defendants' denial of the permit were not 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . Baugh was . . . the first case to consider whether a permit conditioned on an agreement to refrain from illegal activity imposes a valid time, place, and manner restriction in a public forum or, instead, an unconstitutional restriction on freedom of speech. . . .Baugh's conclusions have firm support in the case law relied upon. Nonetheless, there was no case at that juncture that had addressed the question whether conditioning a march permit on a promise to abide by the law when there was a history of organized civil disobedience by the same group along the same route is an insufficiently tailored manner restriction. The Park Police's determination to impose the condition, while mistaken under the First Amendment, was at the time (although it would not be now) a legal error that reasonable officials could make in light of then-existing precedents. Nor, as in Hope, where '[a]rguably, the violation was so obvious that [the Court's] own Eighth Amendment cases gave the respondents fair warning that their conduct violated the Constitution,' . . . was the invalidity of imposing the restriction at issue self-evident, even in the absence of 'fundamentally similar' precedents. . . An official charged with enforcing the trespassing law and faced with a group that had engaged in prior unlawful activity could well think that conditioning another permit on promises to refrain from unlawful acts would allow legal but not illegal activity and thus protect First Amendment rights. We conclude that the district court was correct in granting defendants' motion for summary judgment for the permit denial on the ground of qualified immunity.").

Walker v. Gomez, 370 F.3d 969, 977, 978 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Walker has not brought to our attention, and our independent research does not reveal, case law involving the particular circumstances presented by this case. The second prong of the Saucier inquiry operates at a high level of specificity. It is insufficient that the broad principle underlying a right is well-established. . . . While it is well-established that racial discrimination in the assignment of prison jobs is unconstitutional, . . . it has not been clearly established that such race-based differentiation is unconstitutional in the context of a prison-wide lockdown instituted in response to gang-or race-based violence. Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.").

Lee v. Gregory, 363 F.3d 931, 936 (9th Cir. 2004) ("[W]e do not determine whether Gregory knew or did not know he was causing the arrest of the wrong man when he turned the SDSO on to Julian. That is an issue reserved to the trier of fact at trial, if a trial takes place. We merely hold that the district court did not err in finding that the disputed facts, viewed in the light most favorable to Julian, create a triable issue of fact: whether Gregory knew he was causing the arrest of the wrong man. If established, such wrongful arrest would be sufficient to constitute a constitutional violation. We further hold that clearly established law provides notice to a reasonable officer that arresting a man pursuant to a facially valid warrant that the officer knows does not apply to the man arrested is unlawful. The district court correctly denied Gregory's motion for summary judgment made on qualified immunity grounds.").

Cox v. Roskelley, 359 F.3d 1105, 1113 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Defendants knew or should have known that there would be 'some public disclosure' of the charges contained in the termination letter of a public employee embroiled in a dispute of public interest. By 1998, it was clearly established that such public disclosure meant that the procedural protections of due process applied. . . . . In combination, Roth, Vanelli, Mustafa, Buxton, and the operation of Washington's public disclosure law preclude a viable 'head-in-the-sand' defense on the part of County officials. We reiterate that, even in the absence of a Ninth Circuit case directly on point, government officials may still be fairly warned of potential constitutional deprivations. . . Here, however, there is much more than Buxton; because of the public disclosure provisions of state law, our own cases such as Vanelli plainly informed Defendants of their obligations. . . Accepting as true Cox's assertion that the Notice of Termination in his personnel file contained stigmatizing information and, in light of Washington law mandating disclosure of all materials contained in an employee's personnel file, we hold that placement of the Notice of Termination in Cox's personnel file without a name-clearing hearing violated Cox's due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. We further hold that the contours of the right to a name-clearing hearing upon placement of stigmatizing material in a personnel file were clearly established, such that a reasonable official in these defendants' position would have known that his conduct was unlawful.").

Vance v. Barrett, 345 F.3d 1083, 1092, 1094 (9th Cir. 2003) ("The utter lack of precedent and standards is dispositive that the law concerning an unconstitutional condition predicated on a procedural due process claim in a prison setting was not clearly established. The prison officials are thus entitled to qualified immunity for Vance's unconstitutional conditions claims. . . .Although Vance's retaliation claim is similar to his unconstitutional condition claim, our past precedent is much more developed in this area.. . . .Although there was no precedent specifically on point for the due process claim, our precedent is clear that prison officials could not retaliate against inmates for the exercise of their constitutional rights.").

Serrano v. Francis, 345 F.3d 1071, 1080, 1081 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Serrano has alleged both that he possesses a protected liberty interest in his being free from restraint in a unit that is not designed for disabled persons and that Francis violated his constitutional right to have live witness testimony at the hearing. Accordingly, he has checked off the list both components of his claim for the purposes of the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . Thus, we proceed to the second Saucier prong–the 'purely legal' issue of whether the law at the time of the alleged constitutional violation was clearly established. . . We conclude that it was not. . . .this court has never before addressed the contours of the initial component of Serrano's claim–whether a disabled inmate's freedom from restraint in a facility that is not designed for disabled persons may, as a matter of law, constitute a protected liberty interest. . . . With regard to the conditions of administrative segregation for disabled inmates, the contours of the protected liberty interest have not been determined with sufficient specificity that Francis had fair warning that his levying of the punishment via failing to allow live witness testimony would deprive Serrano of his constitutional right to be free from this type of restraint. . . Although we need not look to a case with identical or even 'materially similar' facts to determine whether Francis had fair warning, . . . we note that no case in this circuit touches on the proper conditions for the liberty interest rights of disabled inmates in administrative segregation. We have discussed disabled inmates' rights in the context of Eighth Amendment claims [citing cases]. . . . And the Supreme Court has discussed disabled inmates' rights in the context of Americans with Disabilities Act claims.[citing Yeskey] But we have never discussed disabled inmates' rights in the context of claims involving protected liberty interests. . . . Although we note that the prison failed miserably in providing adequate facilities for the disabled Serrano during his spell in solitary confinement, we cannot hold Francis liable for a constitutional violation, the contours of which had never before been fleshed out. Those contours are fleshed out as of today. Accordingly, although we find deplorable the conditions under which Serrano was kept following Francis' decision, we will affirm the dismissal of the due process claim under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) on the basis of qualified immunity.").

Meredith v. Erath, 342 F.3d 1057, 1063 (9th Cir. 2003) ("At the time of the search, July 10, 1998, it was not clearly established in this (or any other) circuit that simply handcuffing a person and detaining her in handcuffs during a search for evidence would violate her Fourth Amendment rights. .. Our decision today makes it clear that such conduct, absent justifiable circumstances, will result in a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . [A] reasonable agent in Erath's position would have known, in July 1998, that to place and keep Bybee in handcuffs that were so tight that they caused her unnecessary pain violated her Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure.").

Martinez v. City of Oxnard, 337 F.3d 1091, 1091, 1092 (9th Cir. 2003) ("We return to this case following remand from the United States Supreme Court. In 2001, we affirmed the district court's grant of summary judgment denying qualified immunity to Sergeant Ben Chavez. Martinez v. City of Oxnard, 270 F.3d 852 (9th Cir.2001) ('Martinez I'). We entertained at that time only the interlocutory appeal from the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Chavez. The Supreme Court reversed our holding Chavez was not entitled to qualified immunity because Martinez had a Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination regardless of whether his statements were used against him in criminal proceedings, Chavez v. . Martinez, 123 S.Ct. 1994, 2001, 2007 (2003); however, the Court left open the possibility that Chavez's coercive interrogation of Martinez violated his then clearly established due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. Id. at 2008. We hold that, if the facts as alleged are proven true, it did. Accordingly, Chavez is not entitled to qualified immunity on Martinez's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim. . . .If Martinez's allegations are proven, it would be impossible not to be shocked by Sergeant Chavez's actions. A clearly established right, fundamental to ordered liberty, is freedom from coercive police interrogation.").

Bingham v. City of Manhattan Beach, 341 F.3d 939, 947, 948 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Schreiber contends that the district court failed properly to address the 'clearly established' prong. He posits a novel twist to the 'clearly established' inquiry, contending that because it is not clearly established that damages may be obtained under § 1983 for an unlawful traffic stop, qualified immunity should apply. This argument misunderstands the second part of the qualified immunity inquiry. The question is whether the constitutional right, not the right to damages under § 1983, is clearly established in law. . . . The qualified immunity cases are not concerned with whether there exists a body of case law known to the officer regarding whether or what type of damages are available for the violation of a person's constitutional rights. Rather, in determining whether qualified immunity is available, those cases merely inquire whether the right at issue was clearly established in law. It has been settled law since the 1970's that in order for a police officer to initiate an investigatory stop of a motorist, there must at least exist reasonable suspicion that the motorist is engaging in illegal activity. . . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's denial of Schreiber's motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds with respect to the traffic stop.")

Flores v. Morgan Hill Unified School District, 324 F.3d 1130, 1137 (9th Cir. 2003) ("As early as 1990, we established the underlying proposition that such conduct violates constitutional rights: state employees who treat individuals differently on the basis of their sexual orientation violate the constitutional guarantee of equal protection. . . It is not necessary to find a case applying the principle to a particular category of state officials, such as school administrators. The defendants were officers of the state who had fair warning that they could not accord homosexual and bisexual students less protection on account of such students' sexual orientation.").

Ganwich v. Knapp, 319 F.3d 1115, 1125 (9th Cir. 2003) ("It may be argued that judges should not expect police officers to read United States Reports in their spare time, to study arcane constitutional law treatises, or to analyze Fourth Amendment developments with a law professor's precision. We do not expect police officers to do those things. We do, however, expect officers to think twice before embarking on a course of conduct, such as the one here, that is unusual, unfair, and unduly coercive. When the officers seized the plaintiffs, with no probable cause to arrest them, and then used the threat of continued incommunicado detention to coerce them to submit to police interrogation, the officers exceeded the generous leeway that the qualified immunity doctrine allows.").

Franklin v. Fox, 312 F.3d 423, 443 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Although we are bound by the court's holding in Franklin v. Duncan that Franklin suffered a Sixth Amendment deprivation, we conclude that a reasonable official in Murray's position could have believed that his actions did not violate Franklin's Sixth Amendment rights. As the Supreme Court stressed in Saucier v. Katz, '[t]he concern of the immunity inquiry is to acknowledge that reasonable mistakes can be made.' 533 U.S. at 205. By virtue of the decisions in Franklin v. Duncan, it is now a matter of clearly-established law in this circuit that facilitation of an interrogation such as that provided by Murray is unlawful. At the time Murray acted, however, an official may have reasonably believed the opposite to be true.").

Rudebusch v. Hughes, 313 F.3d 506, 517, 518 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Although Rudebusch has established an equal protection violation, we must still ask whether a 'reasonable official' in Hughes' position 'would understand that what he is doing violates that right,' Saucier, 533 U.S. at 201, keeping in mind that 'officials will not be liable for mere mistakes in judgment, whether the mistake is one of fact or one of law.'. . With this perspective in mind, we conclude that Hughes is entitled to qualified immunity. Our conclusion rests on a single factor–timing. The law in this area was not clearly established at the time Hughes made his decision nor did Hughes have the benefit of post-decision analyses and information. We start with the proposition that at the time of the decision, the general rules were well enough established, for example, that the Fourteenth Amendment requires all racial classifications to survive strict scrutiny. . . But the specific contours of the law pertaining to pay equity were not well developed or sufficiently clear at the time.").

Cruz v. Kauai County, 279 F.3d 1064, 1069, 1070 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Dela Cruz has not met his burden of proving that the right allegedly violated here was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation. The right violated here, according to the complaint and evidence favorable to Dela , was the Fourth Amendment right not to have a prosecutor, in order to obtain a bail revocation, personally attest to a false statement of a biased source with no investigation of the statement's truth or falsity. Unfortunately for Dela Cruz, he has not cited any case that establishes such a right, nor is it self- evident. The situation is not one that appears to have been addressed, even tangentially, in the case law. . . .Because there was no clearly established right at the time Soong acted, an objectively reasonable person in Soong's position could not have known that he may have been acting in violation of Dela Cruz's rights by appending his own affidavit reciting the complaint of a third person to the bail revocation application, without having investigated the truthfulness of the third party's assertions. Consequently, Prosecutor Soong is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Devereaux v. Abbey, 263 F.3d 1070, 1074, 1075 (9th Cir. 2001) ("Undertaking the first step of the two-step qualified immunity inquiry, we are persuaded that there is a clearly established constitutional due process right not to be subjected to criminal charges on the basis of false evidence that was deliberately fabricated by the government. Perhaps because the proposition is virtually self-evident, we are not aware of any prior cases that have expressly recognized this specific right, but that does not mean that there is no such right. Rather, what is required is that government officials have 'fair and clear warning' that their conduct is unlawful.").

Navarro v. Block, 250 F.3d 729, 733, 734 (9th Cir. 2001) ("[T]he explicit holding of Trevino II is clear: local legislators who implement their state-created power to indemnify police officers from punitive damage awards in good faith on a discretionary, case-by- case basis are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .This much is clear after Trevino II and Cunningham: local legislators are not entitled to qualified immunity if they implement their state-created power to indemnify police officers from punitive damage awards in bad faith.").

Robinson v. Prunty, 249 F.3d 862, 867 (9th Cir. 2001) ("Robinson's evidence paints a gladiator-like scenario, in which prison guards are aware that placing inmates of different races in the yard at the same time presents a serious risk of violent outbreaks. The defendants' awareness of and indifference to this risk is demonstrated by the alleged frequency with which such outbreaks occur, by the alleged jokes made by the guards to Robinson before they released a Mexican-American inmate into the yard with him, and by the alleged fact that guards failed to intervene while Robinson was attacked by another inmate. We agree with the district court that if Robinson's gladiator-like scenario is true, then no reasonable prison official could have believed that his or her conduct was lawful. We therefore hold that the district court did not err in denying qualified immunity to the defendants.").

Cunningham v. Gates, 229 F.3d 1271, 1293 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Plaintiffs contend that since Trevino the law has been clearly established that a policy of indemnifying punitive damage awards violates constitutional rights. The Cunningham/Soly incident occurred nearly one year before we decided Trevino. As a matter of chronological necessity, it was not clearly established before or at the time of the Cunningham/Soly incident that voting to indemnify officers against punitive damage awards could violate constitutional rights. Thus, even assuming that these decisions somehow promoted the alleged use of excessive force in the Cunningham/Soly incident, the council members are clearly entitled to qualified immunity for lawsuits based on pre-Trevino decisions to indemnify officers against punitive damage awards.").

Devereaux v. Perez, 218 F.3d 1045, 1053, 1055 (9th Cir. 2000) ("After reviewing relevant case law, we conclude that there is no constitutional due process right to have child witnesses, in a child sexual abuse investigation, interviewed in a particular manner or pursuant to a certain protocol. Devereaux has failed to show that the state defendants violated a constitutional right that is sufficiently particularized so that a reasonable official would understand that any due process right was violated. . . . Here, the underlying substantive constitutional right–whatever that might be–must in some way balance the rights and interests of the legal guardians (whether parents or foster parents), the child, and the public. The need to subject this abstract substantive constitutional right to a balancing test which weighs the interest of a parent against the interests of the child and the state makes the qualified immunity defense difficult to overcome, especially in light of the requirement that the substantive constitutional right be 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation.").

Devereaux v. Perez, 218 F.3d 1045, 1060 (9th Cir. 2000)(Kleinfeld, J., dissenting) ("The basis for the majority decision, a requirement of case law telling social workers how to interview children in a sex abuse case, is . . . an excessive demand for specificity. Sometimes officials lack qualified immunity despite the absence of a case in point, as in Lanier, and sometimes they enjoy qualified immunity despite the presence of a case in point, where the law is undeveloped or conflicting. . .The test is not whether there is case law, but whether the conduct violates 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . . The presence or absence of case law bears on whether the right is clearly established, but is not necessarily determinative either way.").

Diruzza v. County of Tahama, 206 F.3d 1304, 1313, 1314 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Under Elrod and Branti, decided by the Supreme Court in 1976 and 1980, and under Ninth Circuit case law decided prior to 1995, it was clearly established that a non-policymaking public employee in a sheriff's office is protected from retaliation for the exercise of First Amendment rights. While neither the Supreme Court nor this court has previously ruled on deputy sheriffs in Tehama County, such a ruling is not necessary. . . . It was thus clearly established, at the time defendants acted, that deputy sheriffs were not per se policymakers in California. . . It was clearly established, as a matter of law, that the actual duties performed by a deputy sheriff determined whether he or she was a policymaker and therefore subject to partisan dismissal, or a non-policymaker and therefore protected from such dismissal.").

Diruzza v. County of Tahama, 206 F.3d 1304, 1318 (9th Cir. 2000) (O'Scannlain, J., dissenting) ("Despite the fact that the Supreme Court's reasoning in this area has shifted, that the circuits are split on the question, and that the four Article III judges who have examined the very question in this case are equally divided on whether the First Amendment protects DiRuzza's disloyalty, the court concludes that the Sheriff and Undersheriff could have known in 1995 that DiRuzza had a clearly established right not to be fired under these circumstances.").

LSO, Ltd. v. Stroh, 205 F.3d 1146, 1157, 1158, 1160 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Not surprisingly, the parties propose rather different formulations of the right at issue in this case. LSO contends that the right at issue is 'the right to be free from content-based discrimination.' The Officials state that the issue is whether there was law clearly establishing that they 'would violate LSO's freedom of expression by advising LSO of the existence of the ABC regulations, and further advising that said regulations apply to conduct on ABC-licensed premises.' LSO's proposed formulation is too general . . . . Likewise, the Officials' formulation is too particularized. . . . Our goal is to define the contours of the right allegedly violated in a way that expresses what is really being litigated. In this case we are not called upon to decide if, in 1997, the Government generally had the power to censor speech based on content, or whether an official generally could inform someone of the existence of a particular state law without violating the First Amendment. . . . Instead, the Officials argue that they could reasonably have believed in 1997 that liquor regulations were subject to an exception to the general rules of the First Amendment, such that LSO's right to display artwork that violated Section 143.4 on the premises of an ABC licensee was questionable. Thus, we are asked to decide whether, under the circumstances, it was clear that LSO had the right to exhibit non-obscene art on the premises of an ABC licensee free of interference from state officials, even though some of the art fell within the proscriptions of a state liquor regulation governing expressive content at licensed establishments. . . . We conclude that in 1997 no reasonable official could have believed that Section 143.4 could constitutionally be employed to impede LSO's right to display non-obscene art on the premises of an ABC licensee.").

South v. Gomez, No. 99-15976, 2000 WL 222611, at *1 (9th Cir. Feb. 25, 2000) (not reported) ("Battalino claims that he is entitled to qualified immunity because inmates suffering from gender dysphoria (more commonly known as transsexualism), such as South, have no clearly established right to female hormone therapy. Battalino attempts to define the right at issue too narrowly. Our precedents make clear that with respect to prisoner medical claims, the right at issue should be defined as a prisoner's Eighth Amendment right 'to officials who are not Adeliberately indifferent to serious medical needs.'". . . We have repeatedly rejected attempts by defendants to define the right allegedly violated with greater specificity.").

Schwenk v. Hartford, 204 F.3d 1187, 1203-05 (9th Cir. 2000) ("In Mitchell's view, he cannot be held liable under the GMVA unless there is a Ninth Circuit opinion (or, presumably, a Supreme Court opinion) holding: (1) that the statute in question is constitutional; and (2) that the statute applies specifically to the sexual assault on a male to female transsexual state prison inmate by a male prison guard. . . . Mitchell is not entitled to qualified immunity from Schwenk's GMVA claim on the basis of the absence of a court opinion confirming the statute's constitutionality. . . . [A]lthough we now hold that a violation of state laws regarding rape or sexual assault necessarily constitutes a violation of the GMVA regardless of the actor's motivation, state of mind or emotions, we also hold that the law regarding gender motivation and animus was not clearly established at the time of the assault. Accordingly, we find that Mitchell is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Schwenk's GMVA claim.").

Kelly v. City of Oakland, 198 F.3d 779, 784, 785 (9th Cir. 2000) ("A federal right to be free of same-sex harassment in the form of a hostile environment had not been established in the period 1989-1994. Consequently, neither Wirkkala nor the City can be held liable under § 1983 or § 1985. However, Kelly's case against McNab rested also on his claim that McNab bargained with him by offering a better official evaluation in return for sexual favors. Evidence of this bargaining was afforded by Kelly's testimony and was sufficient to prove quid pro quo harassment. . . The federal right to be free from such demeaning demands was clear without need for a specific holding by a court that such conduct violated an employee's civil rights. Where unlawfulness is apparent, qualified immunity does not exist.").

California Attorneys for Criminal Justice v. Butts,195 F.3d 1039, 1049, 1050 (9th Cir. 1999) ("The defendants next contend that their reliance on training and training materials entitles them to qualified immunity. The district court rejected this argument holding that 'following orders' will only insulate officers from liability when 'reliance is objectively reasonable.'. . . The fact that Los Angeles and Santa Monica may have trained their police to violate the rights of individuals does not provide any defense for these officers. Their policy contradicts the safeguards provided by Miranda, and, at the very least, is in direct conflict with Cooper. . . . Furthermore, training officers that inadmissible statements may nevertheless be used for impeachment purposes hardly sanctions this tactic of routinely and intentionally ignoring requests to speak to an attorney. For all of the reasons set forth in the preceding section of this opinion, a reasonable police officer should have known that this conduct was improper and violated the rights of McNally and Bey, whether or not the conduct was endorsed by training materials."), as amended on denial of reh'g and reh'g en banc (Jan. 8, 2000).

B.C. through Powers v. Plumas Unified School District, 192 F.3d 1260, 1268 (9th Cir. 1999) ("When the dog sniff in this case occurred, it was not clearly established that the use of dogs to sniff students in a school setting constituted a search. As such, the unlawfulness of defendants' conduct 'in light of preexisting law,' was not 'apparent.'").

Brewster v. Bd. of Ed. of Lynwood Unified School Dist., 149 F.3d 971, 983, 987 (9th Cir. 1998) ("[A]s is the case with respect to public-employee free speech claims, . . . because procedural due process analysis essentially boils down to an ad hoc balancing inquiry, the law regarding procedural due process claims 'can rarely be considered "clearly established" at least in the absence of closely corresponding factual and legal precedent.' [cites omitted] Indeed, without specific direction from cases applying it, the Mathews standard is perhaps even less amenable to the discovery of clearly established law than are the Pickering test and other multifactor balancing tests that arise in constitutional jurisprudence. . . . [N]owhere is the uncomfortable coexistence of balancing tests and Harlow's 'clearly established rights' standard more apparent than in this case, in which a plaintiff laid claim to two separate constitutional rights, each of which depends upon an ad hoc weighing of competing interests. Because we conclude that neither Brewster's First Amendment rights under Pickering nor his procedural due process rights under Mathews were 'clearly established,' as required by Harlow, the school officials are entitled to immunity from monetary damages.").

Moran v. State of Washington, 147 F.3d 839, 847 & n.5 (9th Cir. 1998) ("Because the underlying determination pursuant to Pickering whether a public employee's speech is constitutionally protected turns on a context-intensive, case-by-case balancing analysis, the law regarding such claims will rarely, if ever, be sufficiently 'clearly established' to preclude qualified immunity under Harlow and its progeny. We are certainly not the first to recognize this self-evident tenet of qualified immunity jurisprudence. . . . And today we join the chorus of voices from other circuits that have specifically observed the difficulty of finding clearly established law under Pickering. . . . We are certainly not endorsing a per se rule today; we recognize that there will be the occasional case in which existing case law is so closely on point that the law relating to a public-employee-speech claim might be said to be clearly established. Nor are we suggesting a formal evidentiary 'presumption' that somehow increases a public employee's burden of showing that the law under Pickering is clearly established in her favor. We are merely observing that, as a simple matter of logic, the context-specific, fact-intensive nature of the Pickering inquiry will generally preclude the law regarding public-employee-speech claims from being sufficiently clearly established to defeat qualified immunity.").

Watkins v. City of Oakland, 145 F.3d 1087, 1092-93 (9th Cir. 1998) ("Watkins argues that at the time of the incident the law governing the use of excessive force was clearly established. Officer Chew would confine the issue more narrowly to whether there was clearly established law at the time of the incident that the use of 'bite and hold' by police dogs constituted excessive force. Following our prior decision in Chew, we agree with appellants that Oakland's 'bite and hold' policy did not violate clearly established law concerning the use of excessive force at the time of the incident. . . . However, Watkins makes a different claim of excessive force than that described by Officer Chew. He argues that the duration and extent of force applied in effecting arrest after the officers caught up with Nero [the police dog] amounted to an unconstitutional application of force. . . . We agree that it was clearly established that excessive duration of the bite and improper encouragement of a continuation of the attack by officers could constitute excessive force that would be a constitutional violation. Therefore, we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Officer Chew on summary judgment.").

Oona, R.S., by Kate S. v. McCaffrey, 143 F.3d 473, 477 (9th Cir. 1998) ("In Petaluma, when we held that the school officials' duties were not clearly established in 1990, we noted the Supreme Court's 1992 Franklin decision and recognized that the result might well be different in a claim of immunity for conduct that occurred after Franklin was decided. Because Franklin was decided in February 1992, and the conduct here complained of began in October 1992, this is such a case. The holding adumbrated by the majority in Franklin is required today: Title VII standards apply to hostile environment claims under Title IX. We expressly recognized that hostile environments include peer harassment in Ellison v. Brady, 924 F.2d 872, 878 (9th Cir.1991). Accordingly, we hold that the defendants are not entitled to immunity for their failure to take steps to remedy the hostile environment created by the male students in Oona's class.").

Hyland v. Wonder, 117 F.3d 405, 411-12 (9th Cir. 1997), amended and reh'g en banc denied, 127 F.3d 1135 (9th Cir. 1997) ("Appellees insist that because there was no previous Ninth Circuit case involving a volunteer, no reasonable official would have known that the action of firing Hyland violated the First Amendment. The Supreme Court and our case law do not require that degree of specificity. . . . It was clearly established in 1988 that the government could not take action against an individual who. . . received a valuable benefit analogous to employment, because that individual exercised his First Amendment right to speak out on a matter of public concern.").

Somers v. Thurman, 109 F.3d 614, 622 & n.5 (9th Cir. 1997) ("[I]t is highly questionable even today whether prison inmates have a Fourth Amendment right to be free from routine unclothed searches by officials of the opposite sex, or from viewing of their unclothed bodies by officials of the opposite sex. Whether or not such a right exists, however, there is no question that it was not clearly established at the time of the alleged conduct. Because Somers's lawsuit seeks only monetary damages, not injunctive relief, we do not decide whether such a right exists. . . . This is not to say that an abusive cross-gender visual body cavity search was per se reasonable under the Fourth Amendment in 1993 or today. . . . [T]he purposeful subjection of prisoners to verbal assaults during strip searches performed by officials of the other sex serves no administrative purpose and might present a question under the Fourth Amendment. We need not wrestle with this question today because Somers' conclusory allegations fail to describe conduct that is sufficiently abusive to strip the officials of their qualified immunity.").

Blueford v. Prunty, 108 F.3d 251, 255 (9th Cir. 1997) ("To whatever extent it may be 'clear' today that a plaintiff may base a federal harassment claim on conduct perpetrated by a person of the same gender, courts were undecided on the issue at the time of [Defendant's] alleged conduct. Moreover, that [Plaintiff's] purported right existed is not the only reasonable conclusion one must have drawn from the extant authority.").

Carnell v. Grimm, 74 F.3d 977, 979 (9th Cir. 1996) ("[A]t the time of the alleged misconduct in this case, persons in custody had the established right to not have officials remain deliberately indifferent to their serious medical needs. The defendants argue that the right in question was phrased too broadly, and instead should be whether arrested rape victims have a clearly established right to receive immediate medical and psychological treatment. We do not agree.").

Kelley v. Borg, 60 F.3d 664, 666-67 (9th Cir. 1995) ("The magistrate judge in this case held that the right allegedly violated was a prisoner's right, under the Eighth Amendment, to have prison officials not be 'deliberately indifferent to serious medical needs.' . . . He further found that this right was clearly established. Appellants argue that the magistrate judge defined the right too broadly. They believe that the proper characterization of the right at issue is: '[D]id plaintiff, after complaining about foul smells, have a clearly established right, then or now, for defendant correctional officers to immediately remove him from his cell in the Security Housing Unit during a lock down, when they first were required to at least inform their superior officer that they needed to remove an inmate, be it any inmate, from his cell?' We believe that the magistrate judge correctly defined the right at issue. Appellants 'misapprehend the level of generality at which a law must be clearly established.' Appellants are correct that broad rights must be particularized before they are subject to the clearly established test. . . . What Appellants fail to realize, however, is that the right at issue in the present case has already been particularized. The magistrate judge did not ask whether the Eighth Amendment generally is clearly established. He asked whether Eighth Amendment rights in the prison medical context are clearly established. And he correctly found that they are. Under the Eighth Amendment, prisoners have a right to officials who are not 'deliberately indifferent to serious medical needs.'To hold that the magistrate judge should have defined the right at issue more narrowly, and included all the various facts that Appellants recited in their proposed definition, would be to allow Appellants, and future defendants, to define away all potential claims.").

Doe v. Petaluma School District, 54 F.3d 1447, 1451 (9th Cir. 1995) (not clearly established at time that school administrator had duty to prevent peer sexual harassment.).

Browning v. Vernon, 44 F.3d 818, 823 (9th Cir. 1995) ("[Defendants] argue for a rule where every violation of a duty must be litigated at least once in a case involving the exact factual circumstances as those presently involved before the official may be held liable for violating that duty. Anderson v. Creighton, however, holds that it is not necessary that a prior decision rule 'the very action in question' unlawful to deny a defendant the protection of qualified immunity.").

Grossman v. City of Portland, 33 F.3d 1200, 1209-10 (9th Cir. 1994) ("As with most legal matters, there are no absolutes here. On the one hand, an officer who acts in reliance on a duly-enacted statute or ordinance is ordinarily entitled to qualified immunity. [footnote omitted] On the other, as historical events such as the Holocaust and the My Lai massacre demonstrate, individuals cannot always be held immune for the results of their official conduct simply because they were enforcing policies or orders promulgated by those with superior authority. Where a statute authorizes official conduct which is patently violative of fundamental constitutional principles, an officer who enforces that statute is not entitled to qualified immunity. Similarly, an officer who unlawfully enforces an ordinance in a particularly egregious manner, or in a manner which a reasonable officer would recognize exceeds the bounds of the ordinance, will not be entitled to immunity even if there is no clear case law declaring the ordinance or the officer's particular conduct unconstitutional. [citing Chew] In the end, however, an officer who reasonably relies on the legislature's determination that a statute is constitutional should be shielded from personal liability.").

Franklin v. Foxworth, 31 F.3d 873, 879 (9th Cir. 1994) (Reinhardt, J., concurring) ("Specific precedent declaring the particular conduct involved unlawful is not required in order to foreclose a qualified immunity defense; rather, the 'law' in question need only be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would not fail to perceive it .... [E]ven in the absence of relevant case law, if the manner of implementation of an otherwise constitutional policy is not only unconstitutional but clearly so, the officer 'will be deemed to have violated "clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known."'quoting Chew and Harlow).

Chew v. Gates, 27 F.3d 1432, 1449-50 (9th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e do not mean to suggest...that officers will be entitled to qualified immunity if they authorize the use of a new weapon or tactic which violates constitutional norms, simply because there is no case stating that the specific weapon or tactic involved violates the Constitution... [I]f new weapons or tactics are sufficiently similar in design, purpose, effect, or otherwise to weapons or procedures that have been held unconstitutional, so that a reasonable officer would have known that a court's holding of unconstitutionality would be extended to the new weapon or tactic, then qualified immunity will not apply. Similarly, even if a policy is longstanding and no case has declared it unconstitutional, officers authorizing its continued use will not be entitled to qualified immunity after a case has authoritatively declared unlawful other procedures that are not 'meaningfully distinguishable.' ...Finally, we do not mean to suggest that all actions taken pursuant to a longstanding policy are necessarily immunized. An officer who unlawfully implements an official policy or ordinance in an egregious manner or in a manner which clearly exceeds the reasonable bounds of the policy is not entitled to qualified immunity, whether or not there is a case on point declaring such actions unconstitutional. . . [E]ven in the absence of relevant case law, if the manner of implementation of an otherwise constitutional policy is not only unconstitutional but patently so, the officer will be deemed to have violated 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'").

Figueroa v. United States, 7 F.3d 1405, 1413 (9th Cir. 1993) ("While we acknowledge that a broader understanding of deprivation of liberty may have emerged later . . . we hold that in 1987 there was no clearly established constitutional right not to be placed in a position of danger by a government employer absent some sort of governmental restriction on an individual's physical freedom to act to avert potential harm.").

Camarillo v. McCarthy, 998 F.2d 638, 640 (9th Cir. 1993) ("[Plaintiff] argues that it was clearly established at the time he was segregated in the HIV unit that prison inmates have First Amendment rights, including freedom of association. [Plaintiff] misconstrues the level of generality at which a law must be 'clearly established.' . . . . The relevant, properly particularized question, . . . is whether it was clearly established that inmates are entitled to be free of prison regulations that restrict their association with members of the general prison population.").

Johnson v. City of San Jose, No. 21-CV-01849-BLF, 2022 WL 799424, at *7-8 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 16, 2022) ("The Court finds that Nelson clearly established that firing a less lethal projectile that risked causing serious harm at an individual who was not an imminent threat to officers in the midst of an allegedly unlawful assembly, resulting in an injury restricting the movement of that individual, amounts to a seizure and an excessive use of force. . . Nelson is strikingly similar to this case. In both Nelson and this case, police confronted large crowds that they claimed needed to be dispersed. Officers were armed with less lethal weapons—pepperball guns in Nelson and 40 mm weapons in this case. Individuals were throwing water bottles at officers, although officers never saw the eventually injured plaintiff throw a bottle at them. A police officer then intentionally fired his less lethal weapon at the plaintiff, whose ability to move was immediately restricted by the impact of the weapon's projectile. The plaintiff suffered severe injuries, requiring multiple medical procedures and incurring permanent damage to their health. The Ninth Circuit in Nelson, published almost eight years prior to the protests at issue in this case, was quite clear: the actions of the police in Nelson 'unquestionably constituted a seizure under the Fourth Amendment' and 'the force used by the government was unreasonable and resulted in a violation of the Fourth Amendment.'. . Officer Adgar thus had 'fair notice that [his] conduct was unlawful.'. . Officer Adgar's efforts to avoid Nelson's clearly established law at this stage of the case are unavailing. Officer Adgar first zeros in on one factual distinction between Nelson and this case: that officers blocked the Nelson plaintiff's means of egress through the breezeway, rather than letting him go free as officers did here. . . The Court finds that this fact alone is insufficient to make this case different enough from Nelson at the pleading stage. The significant factual similarities between Nelson and this case put Officer Nelson 'on notice' that his conduct constituted a seizure and amounted to excessive force. Officer Adgar also argues that Nelson predates Torres, 'and so did not have occasion to apply its rule regarding an objectively manifested intent to seize.'. . Officer Adgar cites several out-of-circuit cases applying Torres, arguing that they indicate lack of clarity in the law and so preclude a finding that the law was clearly established in May 2020. . .Both arguments are unpersuasive. Torres post-dates the events of this case, and so could not have undermined Nelson's clearly established law at the time Officer Adgar acted. . . To the extent Officer Adgar argues that the Supreme Court's choice to take up and decide Torres itself indicates lack of clarity in the law, the Court declines to read the tea leaves as to why the Supreme Court agreed to hear a case. Because Nelson was the clearly established law in the Ninth Circuit at the time of the events of this case, the out-of-circuit cases cited by Officer Adgar (some of which also post-date Officer Adgar's actions) are inapposite. . . Accordingly, the Court finds that Officer Adgar is not entitled to qualified immunity at this juncture on Johnson's § 1983 claim for violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Because this finding is based solely on the allegations in Johnson's pleading, this finding is without prejudice to Officer Adgar raising a qualified immunity defense to this claim later in this case.")

Krivolenkov v. Ferrer, No. 3:20-CV-00759-MO, 2020 WL 6152360, at *5 (D. Or. Oct. 20, 2020) ("Even if Mr. Krivolenkov had adequately alleged a claim for a First Amendment violation, I also find that Trooper Ferrer meets the requirements for qualified immunity. As I previously stated, Plaintiff has a First Amendment right to videotape police officers. . . But as discussed above, Trooper Ferrer lawfully stopped and arrested Mr. Krivolenkov and was attempting to execute the lawful arrest when he knocked Mr. Krivolenkov's cell phone out of his hand, preventing him from filming. While Mr. Krivolenkov's First Amendment right to film was 'clearly established,' no case establishes that Trooper Ferrer's conduct here violated that right. I find that a reasonable officer in Trooper Ferrer's position could have deemed it lawful to do what he did in order to effectuate the arrest, entitling him to qualified immunity. Accordingly, I grant summary judgment in Defendants' favor on Mr. Krivolenkov's First Amendment claim.")

D.C. through Cabelka v. County of San Diego, No. 18-CV-13-WQH-MSB, 2020 WL 1674583, at *12 (S.D. Cal. Apr. 6, 2020) ("Based on the body of state-created danger caselaw, the Social Worker Defendants were on notice that placing and maintaining a foster child with a known history of sexually abusing his male foster siblings in a home with three young boys would violate the young boys' rights to due process. Based on the allegations at this stage in the proceedings, the Court concludes that the Social Worker Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity for the alleged violations of the Minor Plaintiffs' substantive due process rights.")

Acosta v. California Highway Patrol, No. 18-CV-00958-BLF, 2019 WL 2579202, at *10–13 (N.D. Cal. June 24, 2019) ("Turning to the parties' respective definitions of the right in question, Defendants argue that Officers Morasco and Bleisch are entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established that a constitutional violation arises when an officer uses 'deadly force to defend against a perceived threat when the officer is responding to a report of possible gunfire coming from a vehicle, and then is met immediately upon arriving to the scene by the sound of gunfire, even if the sound is caused by the vehicle backfiring.'. . On the other hand, Plaintiff frames the question as whether 'it was clearly established in the law that it is a Fourth Amendment violation for officers to fire their guns into a car without having seen a gun, without knowing who was in the car and without having given the occupant(s) a warning or the opportunity to cooperate, [i.e. to confront Plaintiff without proper planning after hearing sounds the officers thought were gunshots].'. . The Court finds each party's definition of the 'clearly established' right is properly 'particularized' to the facts of the instant action. . . On summary judgment, the right in question under the second prong of qualified immunity is framed by the plaintiff's version of the facts, not the defendant's. . . Here, however, in their respective definitions of the 'clearly established' right, the parties do not dispute what occurred leading up to the shooting. Plaintiff acknowledges that Officers Morasco and Bleisch were informed that 'gunshots "may" have been emanating from the vicinity of [Plaintiff's] car before they arrived on scene.'. . Plaintiff further acknowledges that in the moments before opening fire, Officers Morasco and Bleisch 'hear[d] two more sounds that they thought were gunshots.'. . . [T]here is no dispute that multiple officers and multiple civilian witnesses mistook the backfires for gunshots. As discussed below, under neither definition of the

'clearly established' right does Plaintiff point to any case in his favor even remotely close to these facts. As such, Officers Morasco and Bleisch are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Having considered Plaintiff's submissions, the Court finds that Plaintiff has failed to meet his burden of showing that the right in question was clearly established at the time of the shooting. Emmons v. City of Escondido, 921 F.3d 1172, 1174 (9th Cir. 2019). In fact, as pointed out by Defendants, in 2015, the Eighth Circuit held that two Kansas City police officers were entitled to qualified immunity under facts analogous to the facts of the instant action. See Ransom v. Grisafe, 790 F.3d 804, 812 (8th Cir. 2015). . . . Here, Officers Morasco and Bleisch heard a report of possible 'shots fired' or an 'explosion' originating from a vehicle, approached the vehicle that was pulled over to the side of the road with two rear lights visibly blinking, heard a loud sound and saw a puff of smoke emanating from the vehicle that the officers (and multiple others) mistook for gunfire, initially held fire and backed up, then upon hearing a second loud sound and seeing a second puff of smoke emanating from the vehicle about 10 seconds later that the officers (and multiple others) again mistook for gunfire, opened fire on the vehicle, in which Plaintiff was located. An officer familiar with the holding in Ransom would conclude the conduct here was proper; thus, the statutory or constitutional question faced was open to debate. . . In sum, in the context of prong two of qualified immunity and the facts of the instant action, Eighth Circuit case law appears to favor Defendants and U.S. Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit case law does not address the particular circumstances in this case. Accordingly, qualified immunity applies because at the time of the shooting, the law did not clearly establish that Officer Morasco and Bleisch's conduct-at-issue would violate a plaintiff's federal civil rights.")

Robinson v. County of Shasta, No. 214CV02910KJMKJN, 2019 WL 1931879, at *12–13 (E.D. Cal. May 1, 2019) ("Because resolving whether the asserted federal right was clearly established presents a pure question of law, the court draws on its 'full knowledge' of relevant precedent rather than restricting its review to cases identified by plaintiff. . . In so doing, the court 'first look[s] to binding precedent to determine whether a law was clearly established.'. . Ultimately, 'the prior precedent must be "controlling"—from the Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court—or otherwise be embraced by a "consensus" of courts outside the relevant jurisdiction.'. . The court analyzes the second qualified immunity prong by determining whether Matthew's right to be free from being repeatedly struck in the head with a metal cannister as hard as possible, while his arms were immobilized in Woods' bear hug, was 'clearly established' in July 2014. If so, Woods is not entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity. Here, having examined precedent that existed before the relevant date of July 2014, the court concludes that all reasonable officers would have understood it to be unlawful to repeatedly strike Matthew, who was approximately one hundred pounds lighter than Woods and had his arms restrained at his side in Woods' bear hug, with a pepper spray canister. It has been clearly established since at least 2007 that an officer may not punch an arrestee without provocation, placing Woods' conduct here soundly outside clearly established law.")

Redmond v. San Jose Police Dep't., No. 14-CV-02345-BLF, 2017 WL 5495977, at *11, *13 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 16, 2017) ("As of April 17, 2013, the date of the incident in question, the constitutional right to be free from retaliation while recording police activity in a public place was clearly established in the Ninth Circuit. Fordyce, 55 F.3d at 439. This is because the First Amendment protects a 'right to film matters of public interest.' Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436, 439 (9th Cir. 1995). A majority of other circuits agree. [citing cases] Therefore, on the day in question, Redmond had 'a clearly established right to record police officers carrying out their official duties.'. . Even crediting Defendants' contention that Officer Pfiefer had non-retaliatory justifications to arrest Redmond for her failure to obey his commands, the law is clearly established in the Ninth Circuit that there is a right to be free from retaliation even if the officer had probable cause to arrest. . . Accepting, as the Court must, Redmond's contention that Officer Pfiefer grabbed her phone and punched her in an attempt to stop her from recording, a reasonable officer would have known that he cannot retaliate against a citizen for recording the police in a public place, even if the officer was also acting to protect the safety of officers or to arrest her based on probable cause. . . In light of Fordyce, which Redmond relies on in her opposition, no reasonable officer under the circumstances would believe that Officer Pfiefer's alleged actions were lawful under the First Amendment. . . . According to Redmond, she was a bystander who was recording the police, from a safe distance, as they tackled and arrested her boyfriend. That Officer Pfiefer contends Redmond was 'a suspect' who was threatening as she approached the officers with her arm outstretched, presents a factual dispute for the jury to determine before qualified immunity can be resolved. Redmond's right to record the officers—under the circumstances that she testifies to—was clearly established. Accordingly, Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to the retaliation claim against Officer Pfiefer is DENIED.") Geier v. Davis, No. 16-CV-01980-JSC, 2017 WL 1133219, at *2 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 27, 2017) ("The Ninth Circuit recently held that the First Amendment prohibits prison officials from opening a prisoner's mail from his attorney outside of the prisoner's presence. Hayes v. Idaho Dept. Corrections, No. 14-35078, slip op. at 14, 2017 WL 836072 (9th Cir. Mar. 3, 2017) (agreeing with other circuits). The question, therefore, is whether that law was clearly established when Plaintiff's mail from his attorney was opened in November 2014 and June 2015. The answer is no. '[A] right is clearly established only if its contours are sufficiently clear that "a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right." In other words, "existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate."'. . . A court determining whether a right was clearly established looks to 'Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit law existing at the time of the alleged act.'. . In November 2014 and June 2015 there were no decisions from the United States Supreme Court or the Ninth Circuit holding that the opening or reading of mail from an attorney to a prisoner in the prisoner's absence violates the prisoner's First Amendment rights. . . . The Ninth Circuit did not resolve the question of whether that violated Plaintiff's First Amendment rights until this month. Although the issue had been resolved in other circuits, . . . a prison official working within the Ninth Circuit could reasonably think that whether the First Amendment required the inmate's presence when opening mail from the inmate's lawyer was not 'beyond debate' because the Ninth Circuit and Supreme Court did not require the inmate's presence either when opening mail from the inmate's attorney or from a court. Because the First Amendment right was not 'clearly established' in November 2014 and June 2015, Defendants are entitled qualified immunity on Plaintiff's First Amendment claim.")

Borges v. City of Eureka, No. 15-CV-00846-YGR, 2017 WL 363212, at *10 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 25, 2017) ("For the purposes of the qualified immunity analysis, defendants argue in their motion that, '[t]o the extent any [constitutional] violation is found to have occurred, such a violation would not have been clearly established and qualified immunity should apply.'. . Defendants offer no further support for this argument. However, in their supplemental briefing, defendants note that, 'particularly with respect to plaintiff's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment denial of medical care claims against the County [officers], the case law is not clearly established,' which the Court interprets as an attempt to support their earlier argument that there was no clearly established constitutional right that could have been violated. . .Defendants' arguments fail to persuade. While the legal standard to evaluate such conduct may be unclear, the nature of the constitutional violation is not. See Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002) (holding that the state of the law need only be sufficiently clear to give defendants fair notice their conduct was illegal). Here, just as in Castro, '[t]he contours of the right required only that the individual defendants take reasonable measures to mitigate the substantial risk to [the decedent].'. . Thus, the officers' obligations did not change, even though the court in Castro was (and is also here) applying a new, objective 'deliberate indifference' standard to the analysis of the Fourteenth Amendment claim. . .A reasonable officer would have known that ignoring serious signs of medical distress would violate a detainee's constitutional rights, regardless of which legal standard is ultimately applied to analyze the violation. Therefore, qualified immunity does not bar the claim against the County officers.")

Bremer v. Cty. of Contra Costa, No. 15-CV-01895-JSC, 2016 WL 6822011, at *6, *11 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 18, 2016) ("The Ninth Circuit has not yet addressed whether Kingsley's objective standard also applies to pretrial detainee's suicide claims; before Kingsley, it had left open the question of whether the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments required a different analysis in suicide claims. See Lolli, 351 F.3d at 419 n.6. In the papers, Defendants argued that the subjective standard applies and Plaintiff did not contend otherwise. But at oral argument, Plaintiff for the first time contended that the objective standard applies. . . .The Court need not decide whether the subjective or objective standard applies here as no reasonable jury could find the Individual Defendants were deliberately indifferent under either standard. . . .Even if the right at issue is stated broadly for the purposes of argument—i.e., the right of a suicidal pretrial detainee to be free from deliberate indifference by not being fed without constant monitoring—Plaintiff identifies no precedent clearly establishing it. In fact, Plaintiff does not cite a single case in their opposition to Defendants' qualified immunity argument. Nor did Plaintiff identify any authority at oral argument. The Court's own search did not reveal any cases, either. . . Because Plaintiff cannot show that David had a clearly established right to be constantly monitored when given food or otherwise, the deputies are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's Section 1983 claims.")

Engert v. Stanislaus Cnty., No. 1:13-CV-00126 LJO, 2015 WL 3609315, at *18 (E.D. Cal. June 8, 2015) ("The question is whether the present case and earlier cases are sufficiently similar that Paris and Glinskas would have had fair warning that their actions were unlawful. . . Here, the evidence, viewed in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs, reveals two officers who affirmatively cleared an unarmed civilian to participate in an eviction, despite the existence of information suggesting, among other things, that the occupant might be violent and might possess high-powered weapons. The Court finds that, taken together, Woods and Grubbs I put Defendants on notice that their conduct was potentially unlawful. These cases stand for the proposition that officials may not take affirmative actions to place a civilian into a dangerous situation where common sense indicates a high risk of serious harm. Here, if Plaintiffs' facts are accepted, Defendants did just that by inviting Engert to begin drilling the front door. Viewing the facts in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs, this case cannot meaningfully be distinguished from Woods and *Grubbs I.*Contrary to Defendants' assertions, this case does not present a mere 'qualm' with law enforcement strategy akin to that addressed in Johnson. There, the Ninth Circuit found the danger creation exception could not apply because there was no evidence of an affirmative act. . . Here, as discussed above, at least one additional affirmative act took place-inviting Engert to the door of the Property. Existing Ninth Circuit precedent put Paris and Glinskas on notice that this conduct could trigger Fourteenth Amendment liability. Paris's and Glinskas's motion for summary judgment that they are entitled to qualified immunity as to Plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment claim therefore is DENIED. This denial is without prejudice to appropriate post-trial motions, depending on factual findings by the jury.")

Nawabi v. Cates, No. 1:13-CV-00272-LJO-SA, 2015 WL 2414682, at *27-28 (E.D. Cal. May 20, 2015) ("The Court finds no binding precedent, and lower court cases are unclear, on when or if it would be a violation of an inmate's Eighth Amendment rights to be housed in an area where Valley Fever is prevalent. While Plaintiff alleges that he was subjected to Cruel and Unusual Punishment by being housed in areas where Valley Fever is prevalent, at least a million individuals live in the San Joaquin Valley and are exposed to Valley Fever. Similarly, tens of thousands of individuals live, work, and raise families in the areas that are the most endemic. Neither the State of California nor the federal government have implemented any standards or restrictions on exposure to Valley Fever. Similarly, there have been no recommendations issued to any sector of the general public to relocate out of the area. Prison officials could reasonably believe that since the government has not found it unsafe for non-imprisoned individuals to reside in areas in which Valley Fever spores are prevalent that it would not violate the Eighth Amendment to incarcerate inmates in these same areas. . . Finally, it is clear that even for those individuals that are at a higher risk from Valley Fever, exposure to Valley Fever is a risk that society tolerates. The Seventh Circuit found it would be inconsistent to find that prisoners are entitled to a healthier environment than substantial numbers of non-imprisoned Americans. . . More than half of the individuals who reside in the endemic areas belong to the racial groups which Plaintiff identifies as high risk. . .The Court finds that it is not beyond debate whether housing inmates in prisons in areas endemic for Valley Fever, a naturally occurring soil-borne fungus which can lead to serious illness, would violate their rights under the Eighth Amendment. . . For the reasons stated, the Court finds that the right alleged here is not clearly established. Defendants did not have fair notice that exposing inmates to an environmental risk of Valley Fever would violate the Eighth Amendment. . . Therefore, the Court finds that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's claims arising out of being housed at a prison where they were exposed to Valley Fever. . . It is recommended that Defendants' motions to dismiss on the ground that they are entitled to qualified immunity be granted.")

Garcia v. City of King City, No. 14-CV-01126-BLF, 2015 WL 1843944, at *3 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 8, 2015) ("Though the Court is unaware of a case in which a court expressly holds that a police chief cannot receive personal financial gain from the unconstitutional actions of his subordinates - unconstitutional actions he allegedly ratified and approved—'[c]ertain actions so obviously run afoul of the law that an assertion of qualified immunity may be overcome even though court decisions have yet to address "materially similar" conduct.' Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 753 (2002) (emphasis added). . . . The acts pled by Plaintiffs in the SAC so obviously run afoul of the law that Defendant Baldiviez would not be entitled to qualified immunity were they proven true. Any reasonable police officer, let alone the police chief, would have known that such conduct violates the Constitution.")

Am. Humanist Ass'n v. United States, 63 F.Supp.3d 1274, 1286-87 (D. Or. 2014) ("Defendants argue that they are unaware of any Supreme Court precedent or circuit court decision issued before or during the period where the alleged violation occurred that has held that Humanism is a religion for the purposes of the Establishment Clause, However, as noted above, the Supreme Court in Torcaso, referred to 'Secular Humanism' as a religion. . . Moreover, in McCreary County, Ky. v. American Civil Liberties Union of Ky., the Supreme Court said that the touchstone of the Establishment Clause was the 'principle that the First Amendment mandates government neutrality between religion and religion, and between religion and nonreligion.'. . Thus, whether Humanism is a religion or a nonreligion, the Establishment Clause applies. In addition, the Seventh Circuit has held that a prison violated inmates' constitutional rights when it refused to allow an Atheist study group on the grounds that it was not a religion. Kaufman v. McCaughtry, 419 F.3d 678 (7th Cir.2005). This year, the Seventh Circuit laid it out even more clearly, 'when making accommodations in prisons, states must treat atheism as favorably as theistic religion,' and that, '[w]hat is true of atheism is equally true of humanism, and as true in daily life as in prison.' Ctr. for Inquiry, Inc. v. Marion Circuit Court Clerk, 758 F.3d 869, 873 (7th Cir.2014). Although this decision was issued after the alleged violations occurred, the court does not find the Seventh Circuit's opinion to be revelatory or a departure from existing doctrine. Rather, the court simply summarized the law as it is commonly understood. Thus, the court finds that the right was clearly established and that defendants have not presented sufficient evidence to demonstrate that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Estate of Hernandez-Rojas ex rel. Hernandez v. United States, 62 F. Supp. 3d 1169, 1184 (S.D. Cal. 2014) ("In sum, the record shows that Vales was on notice that the use of a Taser as a pain compliance device on an individual who was already knocked to the ground, was handcuffed, and compliant had a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Vales had 'fair warning' that the force he used, multiple deployments of the Taser, was constitutionally excessive even absent a Ninth Circuit case presenting the same set of facts.")

Kirby v. City of East Wenatchee, No. 12–CV–190–JLQ, 2013 WL 2396008, *1, *2 (E.D. Wash. May 31, 2013) ("Defendants' Motion to Reconsider asks the court to re-think what it has already spent many hours on when it issued its ruling. First, Defendants contend that the Supreme Court decision authored by Justice Scalia in [al-Kidd] 'reformulated' the standard for the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis 'going from "a reasonable official standard to an "every reasonable official" rule.'. . Defendants suggest that this reformulation strengthens their position and was misapplied by the court. Notably, this court's decision quoted and applied the rule set forth in al Kidd. While it is not clear whether al Kidd actually changed any longstanding legal rules, if it did, it did so without comment. Confirming this court's belief that al Kidd did not alter the standard, the Supreme Court's more recent statement of the definition of 'clearly established' is as follows:

[t]o be clearlystablished, a right must be sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would [have understood] that what he is doing violates that right. In other words, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.... [T]he right allegedly violated must be established, not as a broad general proposition, but in a particularized sense so that the contours of the right are clear to a reasonable official.

Reichle v. Howards, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2093–94, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012) . . . The Reichle decision applies the 'a reasonable official' standard, whereas there is no further mention of the 'every reasonable official' language in the opinion. . . The court has applied the proper standard.")

Price v. City of Sutherlin, 945 F.Supp.2d 1147, 1157 (D. Or. 2013) ("While defendants are correct that, prior to the events in question, neither the Supreme Court nor the Ninth Circuit had fully examined an officer's use of a Taser, it was nonetheless clearly established that 'force is only justified when there is a need for force.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiff, a reasonable officer would have had 'fair warning' that the use of painful, albeit non-lethal, force to restrain or subdue a non-threatening, nonresistant, unarmed suspect was excessive. . . Therefore, defendants' motion is denied as to plaintiff's excessive force claim.")

De Contreras v. City of Rialto, 894 F.Supp.2d 1238, 1252, 1255, 1256 (C.D. Cal. 2012) ("The Supreme Court recently emphasized the high burden that must be met for a plaintiff to overcome qualified immunity, replacing Anderson's language of 'a reasonable official' with 'every reasonable official' and stating that 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2083 (2011) (emphasis added). The Supreme Court has also held that, 'in an obvious case, [the Graham standards for excessive force] can clearly establish the answer, even without a body of relevant case law' and that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.' Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 738, 741 (2002). . . . The Eleventh Circuit has recently held that police officers using a taser were not entitled to qualified immunity where no threat, or escape, was imminent. Fils v. City of Aventura, 647 F.3d 1272, 1289, 1292 (11th Cir.2011). Nevertheless, the Supreme Court's opinion in al-Kidd appears to require us to hold that because there was no established case law recognizing taser use as excessive in similar circumstances, immunity is required. . . . The incident at issue here occurred in August 2010, before the Ninth Circuit's final decisions in Bryan, Brooks, or Mattos, the cases providing the most extensive and recent guidance on tasers as a use of force. Hence, the Court finds that Lee is entitled to qualified immunity because the law regarding a second application of a taser, after a first application that was objectively reasonable, was not then clearly established. Specifically, it was not clearly established how firing a taser at a threatening suspect affects the degree of threat that every reasonable officer would perceive after that first tasing. In fact, despite the many ways in which multiple tasings, particularly in the incapacitating dart mode, would appear to shift the Graham balance to weigh against reasonableness, the Ninth Circuit has given this factor only brief consideration. . . . Of the more recent Ninth Circuit cases, only Brooks concerned multiple taser applications, and that was in the context of a taser in drive-stun mode. . . As the applicable law regarding the reasonableness of Lee's use of force was not clearly established at the time of the injury, Officer Lee is qualifiedly immune. In light of this finding, the Court declines to determine whether a jury could find reasonably that Lee violated De Contreras's Fourth Amendment rights. Therefore, the Court grants summary judgment in favor of Defendant Lee on De Contreras's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Jackson v. CDCR Employees, No. 1:07–cv–01414–LJO–SKO PC, 2012 WL 443850, at *9 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 10, 2012) ("The Ninth Circuit's most recent decision in Byrd represents a sharp departure from Somers, and reasonable government officials will be wise to note that departure. In as much as the Ninth Circuit has now held that non-emergency cross-gender strip searches are unconstitutional as a matter of law, it is perhaps only the unwise who will continue to risk participating in or permitting the practice of routine, non-emergency, cross-gender strip searches, regardless of prison staffing concerns, including equal employment opportunity concerns. Nevertheless, the Byrd decision was issued in 2011. In 2007, at the time of the events at issue here, Somers was controlling and directly on point with respect to routine body cavity searches of male inmates by female officers. The Court finds that in 2007, the pre-existing law did not give Defendants fair warning that it was unlawful to occasionally conduct routine cross-gender strip searches and it necessarily follows that it was not clearly established that the less direct participation of searching inmates' clothing and providing security coverage from the gun tower during these searches was unconstitutional. Accordingly, the Court finds that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim against them." footnotes omitted)

Brawley v. Washington, No. C09-5382RJB, 2010 WL 1816654, at *11, *12 (W.D. Wash. May 3, 2010) ("Plaintiff has made a sufficient showing that by April of 2007 shackling inmates while they are in labor was clearly established as a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Defendants admit that Washington Department of Correction's own policy prohibited it. Although not binding authority, the Eight Circuit recently held that a female inmate's 'protections from being shackled during labor had ... been clearly established by decisions of the Supreme Court and the lower federal courts before September 2003.' Nelson v. Correctional Medical Services, 583 F.3d 522, 533 (8th Cir.2009). . . . As in Nelson, a reasonable factfinder could determine from the record in this case that the Defendants were not facing an emergency situation but nevertheless 'subjected [the Plaintiff] to a substantial risk of physical harm, to the unnecessary pain caused by the [shackles] and the restricted position of confinement ... [and] created a risk of particular discomfort and humiliation,' such that qualified immunity should be denied.") Shilling v. Crawford, 536 F.Supp.2d 1227, 1234, 1235 (D. Nev. 2008) ("Despite a plaintiff's apparent ability to sue any person acting under color of state law, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit recently held RLUIPA does not permit claims against officials in their individual capacities because construing RLUIPA to allow such suits would raise serious constitutional concerns. Smith v. Allen, 502 F.3d 1255, 1275 (11th Cir.2007). The Eleventh Circuit noted that Congress passed RLUIPA pursuant to its under Article I of the Constitution. . . The Court reasoned that federal statutes enacted under the spending power, which condition receipt of federal funds on a state's adherence to certain conditions, cannot subject a non-recipient of federal funds, such as a state official acting in his individual capacity, to private liability for damages. . . Thus, the Court reasoned that, as spending power legislation, RLUIPA cannot reach state officials in their individual capacities. . . Because only suits against individuals in their personal capacities implicate qualified immunity, the Eleventh Circuit held that qualified immunity would have no application to RLUIPA claims. . . The Eleventh Circuit is the only Circuit Court of Appeals that squarely has addressed this issue. Other Circuit Courts of Appeals have assumed without discussion that RLUIPA permits suits against state officials in their personal capacities. [citing cases] Plaintiff has sued Defendants in their official and individual capacities. No law in this jurisdiction directly addresses Plaintiff's ability to sue Defendants in their individual capacities under RLUIPA. . . Under the Eleventh Circuit's analysis, Plaintiff would have no individual capacity claim. The Court need not decide this novel issue here, however, because even if Plaintiff could bring an individual capacity claim under RLUIPA, Defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . That an inmate has a constitutional right to 'food sufficient to sustain them in good health that satisfies the dietary laws of their religion' is clearly established in the Ninth Circuit. . . The issue here is whether Plaintiff had a clearly established right under RLUIPA to a kosher diet at HDSP, such that requiring him to transfer to a higher security prison to obtain the diet violated his clearly established right. Defendants offered Plaintiff a kosher diet at ESP in April 2004. Plaintiff has identified no law supporting the existence of a clearly established right to a dietary accommodation at a particular institution. Plaintiff also has failed to identify any controlling law as of April 2004 indicating Defendants' attempt to satisfy Plaintiff's request for a kosher diet by transferring him was unlawful under RLUIPA. In light of the lack of legal precedent on this issue, it would not have been clear to a reasonable official in April 2004 that offering Plaintiff a transfer to a higher security prison to accommodate his religious diet would violate Plaintiff's rights under RLUIPA. Defendants therefore are entitled to qualified immunity from Plaintiff's RLUIPA claim. Even if Plaintiff properly can assert a claim against Defendants in their individual capacities under RLUIPA, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity . This Court therefore will grant summary judgment in Defendants' favor.").

Thomas v. Baca, 2007 WL 2758741, at *15 (C.D. Cal Sept. 21, 2007) ("Although Rutherford and Thompson go far in establishing a clear right against floor-sleeping, Thompson involved an inmate who had neither bed nor mattress, and the court criticized that prison condition on Fourteenth Amendment grounds. Further, neither case speaks to the length of time LASD may allow inmates to wait to receive a bunk while still comporting with constitutional standards. Therefore, it was not unreasonable for Sheriff Baca to believe that the presence of a mattress cured any constitutional defect, and not to realize that floor-sleeping violated the Eighth Amendment as well as the Fourteenth. Accordingly, the Court finds that Sheriff Baca is entitled to qualified immunity and grants summary adjudication on that issue for Defendant in his individual capacity.")

Freitag v. California Dept. of Corrections, 2007 WL 1670307, at *5 (N.D. Cal. June 6, 2007) (on remand) ("Defendants. . . argue that Ceballos created such a change in the law that Defendants Ayers and Schwartz are entitled to qualified immunity on Freitag's First Amendment claim. The Court rejects this argument. . . The only rights at issue in this case that were not clearly established in light of Ceballos were a public employee's rights regarding speech made in the course of performing his or her official duties. Ceballos did not change the long-standing right of a public employee to speak out on matters of public concern as a citizen, as long as that right was not outweighed by the government's interests in suppressing such speech. . . Prior to Ceballos, there may have been some uncertainty regarding the legality of retaliating against a public employee who spoke as part of his or her official job responsibilities on a matter of public concern; however, there was no uncertainty–nor is there any now, following Ceballos–that a public employee speaking as a citizen on a matter of public concern is entitled to the protections of the First Amendment (unless the employer is justified in restricting such speech due to factors, such as disruption of the workplace, not present here). Ceballos did not establish a new right; it only narrowed the scope of an existing one. Freitag's First Amendment right to contact the director of the CDC, a state senator, and the Inspector General as a concerned citizen were clearly established during the relevant time period, and Defendants could not have reasonably believed that their actions against Freitag were lawful."), aff'd, 2008 WL 1734181 (9th Cir. Apr. 11, 2008).

Yezek v. Mitchell, No. C-05-03461 THE, 2007 WL 61887, at *8 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 8, 2007) ("Even if the stop is viewed purely from a reasonableness perspective, Plaintiffs have raised a triable issue of fact as to whether the length and scope of the stop were reasonable . . . . Although Plaintiffs argue that the Fourth Amendment standard was clearly established, . . . the Supreme Court's decision in Atwater has altered the legal landscape to some degree, and the court finds it was not clearly established that, in the course of a traffic stop based on probable cause, Mitchell could not prolong the stop to take the photographs, and Mitchell could have reasonably believed the photographs were lawful. . . Some Courts have held that since Atwater, arrested persons do not have to be released as quickly as possible, although detentions must remain reasonable. . . Because no Ninth Circuit case has directly addressed the impact of Atwater on reasonableness requirements for a traffic stop, under the circumstances of this case, Mitchell is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Walters v. County of Maricopa, No. CV 04-1920-PHX-NVW, 2006 WL 2456173, at *18 (D. Ariz. Aug. 22, 2006) ("[T]he Supreme Court's recent decision in Garcetti v. Ceballos, 126 S.Ct. 1951 (2006), does not retroactively make Walters' rights as of 2003 any less clearly established. As discussed above, this circuit accorded whistleblowers of all kinds clear First Amendment protection as of 2003. To be sure, Garcetti changes the law in this circuit, and if Romley acted today, he could persuasively argue that Walters's rights are not currently clearly established. But as noted above, the law has not changed enough to deprive Walters of First Amendment protection in this case. And although the policy of protecting officials from liability for their actions may suggest a different outcome where the law changes in a way favorable to defendants, the general touchstone for determining qualified immunity is fair notice . . . . Romley had fair notice in 2003 under Ninth Circuit precedent that retaliatory action based on Walters' good-faith whistleblowing was impermissible. The Supreme Court's overrule of Ceballos on the ground that Ceballos' particular job required the speech involved does not detract from the fair notice provided by those cases to Romley in 2003.").

Hepting v. AT & T Corp., No C-06-672 VRW, 2006 WL 2038464, at 30-34 (N.D. Cal. July 20, 2006) ("The court now determines whether the history of the alleged immunity and purposes of the qualified immunity doctrine support extending qualified immunity to AT & T. . . . AT & T contends that national security surveillance is 'a traditional governmental function of the highest importance' requiring access to the 'critical telecommunications infrastructure' that companies such as AT & T would be reluctant to furnish if they were exposed to civil liability. . . AT & T's concerns, while relevant, do not warrant extending qualified immunity here because the purposes of that immunity are already well served by the certification provision of 18 USC ' 2511(2)(a)(ii). . . . [T]he statutes in this case set forth comprehensive, free- standing liability schemes, complete with statutory defenses, many of which specifically contemplate liability on the part of telecommunications providers such as AT & T. . . . In sum, neither the history of judicially created immunities for telecommunications carriers nor the purposes of qualified immunity justify allowing AT & T to claim the benefit of the doctrine in this case. . . . The court also notes that based on the facts as alleged in plaintiffs' complaint, AT & T is not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to plaintiffs' constitutional claim, at least not at this stage of the proceedings. Plaintiffs' constitutional claim alleges that AT & T provides the government with direct and indiscriminate access to the domestic communications of AT & T customers. . . . In United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297, 92 S.Ct. 2125, 32 L.Ed.2d 752 (1972) (Keith), the Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment does not permit warrantless wiretaps to track domestic threats to national security, id at 321, reaffirmed the 'necessity of obtaining a warrant in the surveillance of crimes unrelated to the national security interest,' id at 308, and did not pass judgment 'on the scope of the President's surveillance power with respect to the activities of foreign powers, within or without this country,' id. Because the alleged dragnet here encompasses the communications of 'all or substantially all of the communications transmitted through [AT & T's] key domestic telecommunications facilities,' it cannot reasonably be said that the program as alleged is limited to tracking foreign powers. Accordingly, AT & T's alleged actions here violate the constitutional rights clearly established in Keith. Moreover, because 'the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,' AT & T cannot seriously contend that a reasonable entity in its position could have believed that the alleged domestic dragnet was legal. . . Accordingly, the court DENIES AT & T's instant motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity. The court does not preclude AT & T from raising the qualified immunity defense later in these proceedings, if further discovery indicates that such a defense is merited.").

Aguilera v. Baca, 394 F.Supp.2d 1203, 1218-21, 1229 (C.D. Cal. 2005) ("In light of Driebel, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs were not seized when they were ordered to remain at work to be questioned by ICIB investigators. First, no force was used: Plaintiffs were never handcuffed, physically restrained, or placed in a holding cell. Second, the show of force was distinctly benign: only two officers supervised Plaintiffs, and their supervision of Plaintiffs appears to have been intermittent and not particularly intrusive. For instance, Plaintiffs were permitted to talk to one another, use their cell phones, drink from the water foundation, and use the bathroom unaccompanied by an escort. Third, Plaintiffs retained possession of their LASD-issued equipment, including their guns. Under these circumstances, it cannot be concluded that Plaintiffs were arrested or seized. . . . Taken together, Garrity, Gardner, and Uniformed Sanitation Men establish several propositions. First, Garrity establishes that testimony given under the threat of discharge constitutes compelled testimony within the meaning of the privilege against self-incrimination and thus may not be used in a subsequent criminal prosecution. This is the so-called Garrity immunity which automatically attaches to compelled testimony. Second, Gardner and Uniformed Sanitation Men establish that a governmental employer may not get around the self-executing Garrity immunity by threatening to terminate an employee for refusing to waive her Garrity immunity prior to testifying. Third, both Gardner and Uniformed Sanitation Men make it clear that a governmental employer may terminate an employee for refusing to answer questions regarding the performance of her duties so long as the employer does not terminate or threaten to terminate the employee for refusing to waive her immunity. . . . In light of the teachings of Garrity, Gardner, and Uninformed Sanitation Men and such recent cases as Lingler, Hill, and Wiley, Plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment claim cannot stand. Plaintiffs were not compelled to answer Sgt. Kagy's questions or to waive their immunity. Since, as the Eighth Circuit has explained, the Fifth Amendment is violated 'only by the combined risks of both compelling the employee to answer incriminating questions and compelling the employee to waive immunity from the use of those answers,'. . . no Fifth Amendment violation occurred here. . . . Because Plaintiffs were not seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, Defendants did not violate Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights. Because Defendants did not compel Plaintiffs to waive their rights under the Fifth Amendment or attempt to use Plaintiffs' statements against them in a subsequent criminal case, Defendants did not violate Plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment rights. Finally, because Defendants' conduct did not shock the conscience or constitute coercive police conduct analogous to that at issue in Cooper, Defendants did not violate Plaintiffs' due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. Finally, because the law governing Defendants' conduct was not clearly established at the time, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity even if their conduct did violate Plaintiffs' rights."[footnotes omitted]).

Hillmon v. Alameida, No. F-03-6409 REC DLB P, 2005 WL 2030571, at *6 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 22, 2005) ("With respect to plaintiff's RLUIPA claim, as discussed, plaintiff's allegations are sufficient to state a claim for violation of RLUIPA. RLUIPA was enacted in 2000 and has not yet generated much case law. Given the very recent nature of the limited case law regarding RLUIPA, the court finds that plaintiff's right under RLUIPA to be exempted from the grooming policy based on his religious beliefs is not sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he was doing violated that right. . . Accordingly, the court recommends that defendants' motion for qualified immunity on plaintiff's damages claims under RLUIPA be GRANTED.").

Seidman v. Paradise Valley Unified School District No. 69, 327 F.Supp.2d 1098, 1120, 1121 (D. Ariz. 2004) ("The alleged violation in this case took place between August of 2002, when the Seidmans' submitted their tile application and March 6, 2002, when the tiles were repeatedly rejected and the school asked the Seidmans to alter the inscriptions to remove any religious expression. It was clearly established at the time of the violation that restrictions on speech in the context of a limited public forum must be both viewpoint neutral and reasonable in light of the purpose served by the forum. Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of the Univ. of Va., 515 U.S. 819, 829, 115 S.Ct. 2510, ___ (1995). The notion that speech discussing otherwise permissible subjects cannot be excluded from a limited public forum on the ground that the subject is discussed from a religious viewpoint was also a well-settled principle of law at the time of the alleged violation in this case. Good News Club, 533 U.S. at 108, 112, 121 S.Ct. 2093 (decided in 2001). Additionally, it had also been clearly established that, in the Ninth Circuit, the viewpoint neutrality analysis applies to nonpublic forum, school-sponsored speech as well as private speech in a limited public forum. [citing cases] However, this is a most general level of analysis. When these principles of law are applied to the facts of this particular case, it cannot be said that the law was clearly established. Due to the nature of the speech that was involved, the facts of this particular case could not fall within a murkier area of First Amendment jurisprudence. The Court itself had difficulty attempting to find the balance in this case between the school district's right to protect and maintain an educational environment suitable for elementary school children and the speaker's right to speak once the school had opened up the forum to certain forms of expression. It would be inappropriate 'to hold government officials to a higher level of knowledge and understanding of the legal landscape than the knowledge and understanding displayed by judges whose everyday business it is to decipher the meaning of judicial opinion.'. . Accordingly, the Court finds that the Individual Defendants are shielded by qualified immunity.").

Martiszus v. Washington County, 325 F.Supp.2d 1160, 1171, 1172 (D. Or. 2004) ("If there is one irreducible minimum in our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, it is that a police officer may not detain an individual simply on the basis of suspicion in the air. No matter how peculiar, abrasive, unruly or distasteful a person's conduct may be, it cannot justify a police stop unless it suggests that some specific crime has been, or is about to be, committed, or that there is an imminent danger to persons or property. Were the law any different–were police free to detain and question people based only on their hunch that something may be amiss–we would hardly have a need for the hundreds of founded suspicion cases the federal courts decide every year, for we would be living in a police state where law enforcement officers, not courts, would determine who gets stopped and when. No less well established is the principle that government officials in general, and police officers in particular, may not exercise their authority for personal motives, particularly in response to real or perceived slights to their dignity. Surely anyone who takes an oath of office knows–or should know–that much.").

Myers v. Baca, 325 F.Supp.2d 1095, 1115, 1116 (C.D.Cal. 2004) ("In arriving at the conclusion that the seizure of Plaintiffs was unreasonable, the Court relied most heavily on Ganwich. While Ganwich was very useful for purposes of this Court's Fourth Amendment analysis, Ganwich could not have informed Defendants as to the contours of Fourth Amendment law because the case was decided in 2003. However, in that the events in Ganwich took place in December 1999, the section of Ganwich addressing clearly established law speaks to the state of the law at the time of the facts giving rise to this case. . . Turning to Ganwich's discussion of clearly established law highlights the differences between Ganwich and this case. During the second prong of the Saucier test, the Ganwich court focused on the principle that officers may only seize a person absent probable cause in a criminal investigation 'in a handful of well-defined situations' and that this was clearly not one of those situations. . . . Conversely, the seizure in the instant case was not carried out in the context of a criminal investigation, nor was it pursuant to a criminal investigation and a search of the business premises authorized by a warrant. Thus, the legal principles upon which the Ganwich court found the officers' conduct to be in violation of clearly established law are inapposite to this case. As such, Ganwich does not illuminate the state of the law in October 2001 in a relevant manner. Even if Ganwich had been decided by October 2001, there are key differences between it and this case such that a reasonable officer would not have fair warning of whether Plaintiffs' seizure was reasonable. Once again, the seizure in Ganwich was pursuant to a criminal investigation and a search of the business premises authorized by a warrant. Additionally, the detainees in Ganwich were held completely incommunicado for the length of their detention, unlike Plaintiffs here who were allowed to make certain arrangements by telephone. Third, in Ganwich it was clear that police officers were seizing private citizens, unlike here where Defendants could reasonably have thought that they were acting in their capacities as persons of higher rank and that Plaintiffs chose to stay at the school out of a fear of losing their jobs rather than under threat of arrest and prosecution for criminal acts. This case did not provide a clear-cut constitutional violation, but only upon great reflection and analysis by the Court was that decision reached. The Court's extensive deliberation on the question of whether Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights were violated is relevant in that the 'analysis used to determine whether a plaintiff alleges a violation of a constitutional right is instructive in determining whether that right was clearly established.'. . Moreover, whereas in most qualified immunity inquiries, courts are dealing with variations of fact patterns that fit into a general paradigm of legal principles, this case presents a series of facts that span a wide range of legal principles in a manner that heretofore has not been definitively adjudicated. Indeed, to this Court's knowledge, no published case has dealt with an amalgamation of fact and law in a manner that could put a police officer on fair warning of a person's rights in such a situation. The Court acknowledges the ample body of Fourth Amendment caselaw regarding arrests and other seizures pursuant to criminal investigations, workplace detentions, and the detention of minors by school officials. However, while some of the legal principles set forth in those cases are implicated here, such principles can only be applied to the peculiar facts of this case through complex legal reasoning. The Court thus holds that a reasonable officer could have reasonably believed that a Fourth Amendment violation had not taken place. In sum, notwithstanding the Court's finding that when the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Plaintiffs were unreasonably seized, a reasonable officer, given the state of the law on October 19, 2001, could have reasonably but erroneously believed that Plaintiffs were not seized and that even if they were seized pursuant to a non-criminal internal investigation, such seizure was reasonable. Defendants receive the benefit of the doubt with respect to a reasonable mistake of law, and, therefore, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Lewis v. City of Edmond, No. 21-6081, 2022 WL 4282659, at *5–7 (10th Cir. Sept. 16, 2022) ("In this case, the district court contravened the settled principles the Supreme Court has instructed us time and time again to apply when a police officer raises the defense of qualified immunity in response to a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim. Simply put, none of the cases cited by the district court or Plaintiffs decided before April 29, 2019 'squarely governs,'. . . the case at bar or places the unconstitutionality of Defendant Scherman's use of force 'beyond debate[.]'. . . Nor has our independent research uncovered such a case. Moreover, we remain mindful that cases decided after Lewis's death are of 'no use in the clearly established inquiry.'. .Let us begin our comparison with prior precedent as it existed on April 29, 2019, by observing that this is not a case where an officer's alleged reckless conduct created the need to use deadly force against Lewis. . . So a case such as Allen v. Muskogee, 119 F.3d 837 (10th Cir. 1997), cited by both Plaintiffs and the district court, has no bearing on the outcome here. . . .Scherman undoubtedly was aware that Lewis, in his efforts to evade arrest, had broken into a residence that probably was not his own and was fleeing from Box, who was in hot pursuit. Unlike the facts of any decision we have encountered, Defendant Scherman entered the residence's front entrance shortly thereafter and observed Lewis actively battering Sergeant Box in the living room, a violent felony under Oklahoma law. . . .When Box disappeared from sight and Lewis turned his focus to Scherman, Scherman could reasonably presume Box at the very least had been rendered immobile if not seriously injured as a result of his encounter with Lewis. And Scherman knew Lewis had ignored Box's commands and was unaffected by Box's taser. . . . [T]he present case presents a situation where Defendant Scherman had good reason to believe Lewis in his attempts to evade arrest had battered Sergeant Box into submission before turning his attention to Scherman, all within a confined area. And Scherman knew all too well that verbal commands and force less lethal than a gun shot had been unsuccessful in stopping Lewis's rampage. When, after the first shot, Lewis continued to advance toward Scherman in this confined area, no prior decision placed 'beyond debate,' . . . the proposition that Scherman's subsequent shots in a 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' situation requiring a 'split-second' judgment constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . These prior cases on which Plaintiff relies do not 'squarely govern[ ]' the outcome here because none of them held an officer violated the Fourth Amendment while acting under circumstances similar to those Defendant Scherman faced. . . . The first important difference between our case and Ceballos is the district court found Sergeant Box acted reasonably when he initially approached Lewis. Unlike in Allen or Ceballos, the fact that Box and Scherman pursued Lewis into a house they saw Lewis physically break into did not unreasonably escalate the situation. A second difference is Defendant Scherman knew before drawing his firearm that Lewis (1) had not responded to non-lethal force, (2) had, by whatever means, rendered Box immobile, and (3) was committing a violent felony upon Box's person. A third difference is Scherman and Lewis were in a confined area making it difficult if not impossible for Scherman to retreat as Lewis advanced toward him while swinging his arms. We need not belabor the point. Neither the district court nor Plaintiffs have identified a precedent finding a Fourth Amendment violation under the circumstances Defendant Scherman faced in this case. None of the cases they identify provided fair notice to Defendant Scherman that his repeated use of lethal force was unconstitutional when Lewis approached Scherman in a 'small' hallway, 'mov[ing] his arms in a windmill motion' after Scherman has just observed Lewis 'pummeling Box until Box disappeared from Scherman's line of sight.'. . Accordingly, Plaintiffs have failed to meet their burden of showing the law was clearly established such 'that every reasonable [officer] would have understood' that the force Scherman used against Lewis was excessive under the circumstances presented.") Paugh v. Uintah County, No. 21-4067, 2022 WL 4093078, at *21-22 (10th Cir. Sept. 7, 2022) ("These cases are sufficiently analogous to the facts here to have placed the Individual Defendants on notice that disregarding Paugh's obvious and serious medical needs amounted to a constitutional violation. As noted in Prince, '[e]ach case involved the denial of medical attention to an individual in custody' who displayed a serious medical need. . . In addition, Al-Turki and Quintana involved a plaintiff with 'pre-existing medical conditions,' like Paugh. . . And most similar to Paugh's situation, Quintana involved an inmate exhibiting withdrawal symptoms, and the jail official knew about the inmate's condition. . . At bottom, the district court correctly found that the law was clearly established that when 'a detainee has obvious and serious medical needs, ignoring those needs necessarily violates the detainee's constitutional rights.'. . . In response, the Individual Defendants argue that the law is not clearly established for three reasons. . . . First, the Individual Defendants insist that a finding of clearly established law requires us to identify cases that involve 'alcohol withdrawal in jails, or at least some sort of withdrawal in jails.'. . But, as stated above, the relevant inquiry 'in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Thus, there need not be 'a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established.'. . . Thus, the lack of a case involving alcohol withdrawal does not preclude us from finding the law to be clearly established. . . . Next, the Individual Defendants argue that Sealock and Mata are applicable only to medical professionals, not jail officials. We disagree. . . . So 'it's not fatal that some of the cited opinions involved medical professionals.'. . . Finally, the Individual Defendants argue that if Sealock applies to non-medical professionals, it applies only to 'prison officials who take no action whatsoever.'. .Our decision in Estate of Jensen v. Clyde, 989 F.3d 848 (10th Cir. 2021) addressed this exact argument. There, a nurse argued, just as the Individual Defendants do here, that Mata, Sealock, and Quintana were inapplicable because 'unlike the defendants in those cases,' she 'did something to help' by providing an inmate with Gatorade. . .We rejected this argument. . . We held that Sealock provided sufficient notice to the nurse that in light of the inmate's serious symptoms, giving the inmate Gatorade instead of calling medical professionals violated the inmate's right to medical care. . . . So, as in Estate of Jensen, the law sufficiently notified the Individual Defendants that even with the little 'help' they provided Paugh, their actions (and inactions) would still violate his constitutional rights. At bottom, since at least 2014, the law has clearly established that 'when a detainee has obvious and serious medical needs, ignoring those needs necessarily violates the detainee's constitutional rights.'. . Thus, the Estate has satisfied the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. In sum, the Individual Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. So we affirm the district court's denial of the Individual Defendants' motion for summary judgment.")

McWilliams v. Dinapoli, 40 F.4th 1118, 1128, 1130 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Because claims of excessive force turn on the facts surrounding an officer's use of force, the court must specifically define a clearly established right. City of Escondido v. Emmons, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503, 202 L.Ed.2d 455 (2019). But a right may be clearly established even without 'a prior "case directly on point," so long as there is existing precedent that places the unconstitutionality of the alleged conduct "beyond debate."' . . .Our opinion in Casey v. City of Federal Heights put Mr. DiNapoli on notice that his alleged punches, tackling, and chokehold would have violated the Constitution. . . . Under Casey, officers must give a warning or a chance to submit to arrest before using violent force against suspected misdemeanants who are not violent, aggressive, or fleeing. So any officer in Mr. DiNapoli's situation should have known that punching and tackling Mr. McWilliams and using a chokehold, without a warning, would have violated the Constitution. We thus affirm the denial of qualified immunity.")

Irizarry v. Yehia, 38 F.4th 1282, 1294-96 (10th Cir. 2022) ("In May 2019, when the incident occurred, Mr. Irizarry had a clearly established right to film the traffic stop based on the persuasive weight of authority from six other circuits and our decision in Western Watersheds. Officer Yehia's obvious interference with that right, motivated by Mr. Irizarry's protected conduct, was a violation of clearly established law. . . . Although neither the Supreme Court nor the Tenth Circuit has recognized a First Amendment right to record the police performing their duties in public, we hold that the right was clearly established here based on the persuasive authority from six other circuits, which places the constitutional question 'beyond debate.'. . Our opinion in Western Watersheds also supports this conclusion. As we said in Ullery, 'In the absence of binding precedent specifically adjudicating the right at issue, the right may still be clearly established based on a "consensus of cases of persuasive authority" from other jurisdictions.'. . And the weight of authority from other circuits may clearly establish the law when at least six other circuits have recognized the right at issue. . . As discussed, the First, Third, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits have all concluded in published opinions that the First Amendment protects a right to film the police performing their duties in public. Four of those opinions—Fordyce, Glik, Fields, and Turner—involved facts materially similar to those here: the plaintiffs, like Mr. Irizarry, were attempting to film the police performing their official duties but were dissuaded from doing so either because they were arrested, detained, or physically deterred. . . Alvarez involved a pre-enforcement challenge to a statute that made it a felony to film police officers in public. All six decisions held there is a First Amendment right to film the police performing their duties in public, which clearly establishes the law in this circuit. Moreover, in Western Watersheds, we indicated, without reservation, that filming the police performing their duties in public is protected under the First Amendment. 869 F.3d at 1196 ("An individual who photographs animals or takes notes about habitat conditions is creating speech in the same manner as an individual who records a police encounter."). Although this statement, on its own, may be insufficient to satisfy prong two of qualified immunity, it supports the conclusion that a reasonable officer would have known there was a First Amendment right to film the police performing their duties in public. Finally, Mr. Irizarry's right to film the police falls squarely within the First Amendment's core purposes to protect free and robust discussion of public affairs, hold government officials accountable, and check abuse of power. . . We have no doubt that Mr. Irizarry had a clearly established First Amendment right to film the traffic stop in May 2019. . . . Officer Yehia argues that the right to film police officers performing their duties in public cannot be clearly established unless a previous Tenth Circuit case has already recognized the right. But we have repeatedly stated that 'the weight of authority from other courts can clearly establish a right.'. . And we have held that decisions from other circuits clearly established the law when at least six circuits had recognized the right at issue. . . Officer Yehia also argues that Frasier v. Evans, shows that the right to film police officers performing their duties in public was not clearly established as of May 2019. We disagree. In Frasier, the plaintiff filmed police officers arresting a suspect in 2014. . . After the arrest, officers allegedly intimidated the plaintiff and threatened to arrest him if he did not hand the video over to them. . . The plaintiff brought a § 1983 First Amendment claim against the officers, alleging that they retaliated against him for filming the suspect's arrest. . . We held the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because, when the incident occurred on August 14, 2014, the law was not clearly established that the First Amendment protected a right to record police officers performing their official duties in public. . . We rejected the plaintiff's argument that 'general First Amendment principles protecting the creation of speech and the gathering of news [ ] provide[d] clearly established law.'. . And we were not persuaded by the plaintiff's alternative argument that the weight of authority from other circuits clearly established the law. . . Although we assumed that, as of August 2014, four decisions—Alvarez, Glik, Smith, and Fordyce—recognized a right to film police performing their duties in public, we said those cases did not clearly establish the law in our circuit because our sibling circuits had 'disagreed regarding whether this purported First Amendment right to record was clearly established around August 2014.'. . Frasier does not undercut our clearly-established-law analysis for two reasons. First, the legal landscape has changed since August 2014 when the incident in Frasier occurred. Between August 2014 and May 2019, the Third and Fifth Circuits joined the four other circuits in concluding there is a First Amendment right to film the police performing their duties in public. . . And, as noted above, we have held that the weight of authority from other circuits may clearly establish the law when at least six other circuits have recognized the right at issue. See, e.g., Ullery, 949 F.3d at 1294. Second, when analyzing whether the weight of authority from other circuits clearly establishes the law in this circuit, we have said the relevant inquiry is whether there is consensus regarding the existence of the constitutional right at issue. . . Courts determine whether a constitutional right exists and whether it has been violated from holdings made at the first step of qualified immunity. . . As of May 2019, six circuits had determined that the First Amendment guarantees a right to film the police performing their duties in public. No other circuit has concluded otherwise. The substantial weight of this authority, along with our decision in Western Watersheds, would have put a reasonable officer in Officer Yehia's position on notice that Mr. Irizarry had a right to film the police conducting the traffic stop.")

C1.G on behalf of C.G. v. Siegfried, 38 F.4th 1270, 1279-80 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Because Plaintiff has properly pled a constitutional violation, individual Defendants at this time can only receive qualified immunity if their conduct was not clearly established as unlawful. . . The question is whether, by addressing 'the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint,' the reasonable school official would know that disciplining C.G. for posting offensive content online and off campus that did not target the school or its members was unlawful. . . For Plaintiff to show that the law was clearly established, there must be authority from the Supreme Court, the Tenth Circuit, or a clear majority of other circuit courts 'deciding that the law was as the plaintiff maintains.'. . As of September and October 2019, the Supreme Court had not yet addressed a case involving school regulation of online, off-campus speech. The Court did not consider this issue until Mahanoy, and it did not address the question of qualified immunity in that case because the school district was the only defendant. . . Before September 2019, this court had only addressed an online, off-campus speech case at a university. . . We found that it was not clearly established that a university student could not be expelled in part for online, off-campus speech. . .In November 2019, weeks after C.G.'s expulsion, we noted in Hunt v. Board of Regents of the University of New Mexico 'unmistakable gaps in the case law, including whether: (1) Tinker applies off campus; [and] (2) the on-campus/off-campus distinction applies to online speech.'. . We thus did not find it clearly established that a university could discipline a student for offensive online, off-campus speech. . . But in 2022, in Thompson v. Ragland, we determined that it was clearly established. . . that a university student could not be disciplined for 'express[ing] her displeasure with [a] professor' and 'suggest[ing] that her classmates leave "honest" end of term evaluations.'. . There, the student's speech could not be regulated on campus, so it was clearly established that regulating it off campus was unlawful. . . Because the district court did not address the question of qualified immunity, we remand for the district court to consider this issue in the first instance.")

Finch v. Rapp, 38 F.4th 1234, 1241-44 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Rapp argues the district court ignored video evidence that 'blatantly' contradicts the court's findings. . . But nothing in the video footage offered by Rapp indisputably contradicts the district court's findings that Finch's motions 'did not reasonably suggest he was attempting to draw a firearm' and Finch did not 'pose[ ] a threat of serious physical harm to others.' . . In the video, we see Finch raise his hands—but there is nothing that could 'blatantly contradict' the conclusion his actions were nonthreatening. . . . In determining whether the law was clearly established, the district court included 'inferences that Rapp could see Finch did not have a firearm, that Finch did not make any movement like he was drawing a firearm ... and [that] Finch made no motion indicating he was about to shoot.'. . The district court relied on four cases to determine that the right not to be subjected to deadly force was clearly established. . . Taken together, these cases establish a constitutional right so clearly established that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he [was] doing violates that right.'. . . To be sure, there is no case with identical facts to those here. But '[w]e do not think it requires a court decision with identical facts to establish clearly that it is unreasonable to use deadly force when the force is totally unnecessary to restrain a suspect or to protect officers, the public, or the suspect himself.'. . Taken together, the cases relied on by the district court establish that an officer, even when responding to a dangerous reported situation, may not shoot an unarmed and unthreatening suspect. . . A jury could find Rapp shot Finch even when a reasonable officer would have known Finch was unarmed and posed no threat. Thus, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Finch, Rapp violated clearly established law.")

Shaw v. Schulte, 36 F.4th 1006, 1017, 1020-21 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Considering the marginal deterrent effect of applying the exclusionary rule within the § 1983 context with the fact that not applying the rule would merely truncate the scope of a § 1983 action but not bar pursuit of the action, we agree with the seeming consensus in our sibling circuits that the exclusionary rule and fruit-of-the-poisonous-tree doctrine do not apply in the § 1983 context. . . Accordingly, Trooper Schulte is entitled to summary judgment on the portion of the Shaws' action seeking damages for their detention subsequent to the dog alert. . . . Mr. Bosire's theory for his claim is that Trooper Schulte had a duty to intervene and dissuade Trooper McMillan from holding Mr. Bosire until the K-9 unit arrived. In support of this theory and the viability of his claim against Trooper Schulte, Mr. Bosire cites Vondrak for the general proposition 'that all law enforcement officials have an affirmative duty to intervene to protect the constitutional rights of citizens from infringement by other law enforcement officers in their presence.'. . But we made this statement in the context of an excessive force claim. . . And where the intrusion and permanency of harm from the use of excessive force may exceed that from the relatively brief prolongation of a traffic stop, Vondrak does not clearly establish that an officer must intervene to prevent an illegal search and seizure. Accordingly, Mr. Bosire has not overcome the second prong of Trooper Schulte's qualified-immunity defense.")

Estate of Beauford v. Mesa County, Colorado, 35 F.4th 1248, 1269-70 (10th Cir. 2022) ("The district court concluded the Estate failed to identify 'a relevant case putting Deputy Dalrymple on notice that he needed to immediately call for help after seeing Mr. Beauford on the floor of his cell, which, as explained, was a common occurrence.'. . But, as we explained, the district court's framing was factually incomplete and thus misdirected the clearly-established-law inquiry. The relevant case here is not one that would have required Deputy Dalrymple to summon assistance immediately because Mr. Beauford was lying on the floor of his cell. Rather, the question is whether Deputy Dalrymple should have been on notice that the Constitution does not permit a ten-minute delay in seeking medical help for an inmate who he knows may not be breathing. Here, the contours of the right are clearly established such that any reasonable officer in the situation Deputy Dalrymple confronted at 12:15 a.m. would know that delay could violate the Constitution. [collecting cases] For these reasons, we also conclude the Estate has satisfied its burden on the second prong of the qualified immunity test—to show Deputy Dalrymple violated a clearly established constitutional right.")

Arnold v. City of Olathe, Kansas, 35 F.4th 778, 793-94 (10th Cir. 2022) ("For purposes of qualified immunity, a right is clearly established if it is confirmed by either Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit precedent that is directly on point, or if the weight of authority from other courts supports the plaintiff's contention. . . It is particularly important that a Fourth Amendment right be clearly established in a specific factual scenario because it can be difficult for an officer to determine how the prohibition against excessive force will apply in novel situations. . . A constitutional right is clearly established when every reasonable officer would have understood that his conduct violated that right. . . But it is important the right is not defined at 'too high a level of generality.'. . Unless existing precedent 'squarely governs' the specific facts at issue, the police officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Arnold relies on Allen, Hastings, Ceballos, and Sevier to argue that Howard had a clearly established right to be free from an unreasonable seizure even after hours of negotiations. He argues that the officers were on notice that their conduct was unconstitutional, claiming it is clearly established 'that an officer acts unreasonably when he aggressively confronts an armed and suicidal/emotionally disturbed individual without gaining additional information or by approaching him in a threatening manner.'. . But as we have already explained, the cases Arnold cites are distinguishable from the present case. In each case, only a few minutes separated the initial police action and the use of force. . . . Here, however, the police interaction with Howard lasted hours, not minutes. Extensive negotiations and intervening events occurred over the course of three hours, in contrast to the short timelines in the cases Arnold cites. Four cases that involved shootings from one to five minutes after officers arrived on the scene do not clearly establish that officers cannot confront a potentially armed suspect after hours of protracted negotiation. Additionally, the clearly established prong reinforces our holding that the officers did not recklessly create the need to use deadly force. Any reliance on Allen to determine whether the officers' conduct 'was reckless or that their ultimate use of force was unlawful' requires sufficient factual symmetry. . . The officers in Allen responded to a potential suicide call by sprinting toward a parked car, screaming at the suspect, and attempting to physically wrest a gun from his hands. . . The officers in this case, by contrast, conversed with Howard for many hours, engaged her from within the house at a safe distance, and did not yell until she threatened them with a gun. There is insufficient factual symmetry between the facts in Allen and the present case to clearly establish that the officers recklessly created the need to use deadly force. Lastly, Arnold argues it was clearly established that officers were required to consider Howard's mental status before using force. . . To be sure, a suspect's mental condition is a factor in determining the reasonableness of a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. . . But at the time of the shooting, there was no caselaw that would have put the officers on notice that they were violating a constitutional right by failing to consider her mental condition. Even assuming officers knew or should have known Howard had a bipolar disorder, they could not have known that they were required to consider her mental status. The Tenth Circuit published Ceballos in 2019, and the officers confronted Howard two years earlier, in 2017. No clearly established law applies to the facts of this case.")

George, on behalf of Bradshaw v. Beaver County, 32 F.4th 1246, 1250, 1258-59 (10th Cir. 2022) ("We treat jail-suicide claims, like Plaintiff's, as failures to provide medical care. Such claims require proof that a prison official acted with deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs, violating the Eighth, or Fourteenth, Amendment. Although Plaintiff proved that certain officers failed to follow Beaver County's suicide-prevention policy, the district court granted summary judgment (1) to the County because Plaintiff failed to show it employed an unconstitutional policy and (2) to Sheriff Noel and Corporal Rose because the law entitles them to qualified immunity. We exercise jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and affirm. . . . Whether Rose violated Bradshaw's constitutional rights by placing Bradshaw in a regular cell and failing to inform other officers of his suicide risk was not clearly established in June 2014. . . . Plaintiff contends she presented sufficient evidence from which a fact finder could determine that Rose knew Bradshaw presented a suicide risk and acted with deliberate indifference to that risk by placing him in a regular cell and failing to inform other officers of that suicide risk 'formally or otherwise.' But, on June 13−15, 2014, when the incident occurred, no Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court decision put Rose on notice that his conduct violated Bradshaw's constitutional rights. As of June 1, 2015, no Supreme Court decision established a right to the 'proper implementation of adequate suicide prevention protocols' or 'even discusse[d] suicide screening or prevention protocols.' Taylor v. Barkes, 575 U.S. 822, 826, 135 S.Ct. 2042, 192 L.Ed.2d 78 (2015) (per curiam). In Cox, we determined that 'an inmate's right to proper prison suicide screening procedures during booking ... was not clearly established in July 2009.'. . But even Cox did not establish in 2015 that Sheriff Glanz's conduct violated a constitutional right. 'There, we assumed the existence of a constitutional violation and held that the right at issue—"an inmate's right to proper prison suicide screening procedures during booking"—wasn't clearly established.'. . But Plaintiff argues Barrie. . . clearly established a suicidal pretrial detainee's right to reasonable safeguards against harming himself in 1997, long before Bradshaw's death in 2014. Barrie concerned a pretrial detainee's post-booking suicide in the county jail's 'drunk tank.'. . Grand County officers arrested Alan Ricks around 6:00 p.m. on October 26, 1991; at 7:30 p.m., they placed him in the drunk tank after booking and permitted him to keep his street clothes; and by 2:00 a.m., Ricks had hanged himself with his sweatpants draw cord. . . Ricks's estate and family members filed suit against the county and several county officials. . . We clarified that prisoners—pretrial detainees or postconviction inmates—have claims against their custodians for failure to provide adequate medical attention, including jail-suicide claims, only when the custodian knows of the risk involved and is deliberately indifferent to it. . . We determined that the defendants were not deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of suicide. . . and did not hold that the defendants' conduct violated Ricks's constitutional rights. Thus, Barrie did not clearly establish a right to proper implementation of prison-suicide-prevention protocols in this circuit. Plaintiff failed to carry her burden to point us to law clearly establishing that right, and, based on our review of the caselaw, circuit precedent did not clearly establish that right in June 2014. Thus, Rose's conduct did not violate clearly established law, and he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Heard v. Dulayev, 29 F.4th 1195, 1203-07 (10th Cir. 2022) ("In this case, Heard has failed to identify a sufficiently clear then-existing precedent that prohibited Dulayev from using a Taser where Heard rose to his feet and continued to take steps toward Dulayev, even after Dulayev had threatened the use of the Taser and repeatedly ordered Heard to stop. Heard principally relies on four Tenth Circuit cases to argue that Dulayev's actions amounted to a constitutional violation under clearly established law. But these cases do not establish a 'legal principle clearly prohibit[ing] [Dulayev's] conduct in the particular circumstances before him.'. . . . Initially, we note that unlike the officers in Casey and Cavanaugh, Dulayev did issue a warning that he would discharge his Taser if Heard did not 'Crawl out on [his] hands and knees.'. . And unlike the warning and immediate tasing in Emmett—which we deemed inadequate—Heard was aware of this warning as he responded, 'Don't tase me, man.'. . In fact, this exchange happened before Heard came out from behind the bushes, rose to his feet, and approached Dulayev. . . Moreover, Heard's actions were quite unlike the plaintiffs' in Casey, Cavanaugh, and Emmett. Heard did not follow Dulayev's orders—he rose to his feet after being told to crawl and he continued to walk toward Dulayev after being told to stop. . . . Additionally, the district court findings that Heard's body language was non-aggressive and non-threatening alone are not sufficient to equate this case to the circumstances faced by the officers in Casey, Cavanaugh, and Emmett. . . . None of the cases cited by Heard mirror the circumstances in this case, where Dulayev had ordered Heard to crawl, threatened the use of his Taser, and repeatedly ordered Heard to stop, and where Heard had continued to step toward Dulayev in close proximity. . . Accordingly, we reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment as to Dulayev and remand with instructions to grant Dulayev qualified immunity and enter judgment in Dulayev's favor.")

Prince v. Sheriff of Carter County, 28 F.4th 1033, 1048 (10th Cir. 2022) ("The facts of these four cases are sufficiently analogous to Bowker's situation to have placed all reasonable jail officials on notice that disregarding his severe symptoms amounted to a constitutional violation. . . Each case involved the denial of medical attention to an individual in custody, and three of the plaintiffs had pre-existing medical conditions like Bowker. . . Further, the medical conditions at issue in Olsen and McCowan, panic attacks and shoulder pain, were not nearly as severe as the symptoms Bowker suffered in the days leading up to his death. Given that it was clearly established in 2015 that ignoring an arrestee's shoulder pain violated the Fourteenth Amendment, Miller had notice that her deliberate indifference to Bowker's far more serious symptoms did as well. . . We therefore conclude that the district court erred as a matter of law in concluding that Miller did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. The district court did not consider Sealock, Olsen, or McCowan. Rather, it explained only its view that Miller did not completely deny medical care as did the defendant in Al-Turki, because she sent Bowker to the emergency room on three occasions. However, the district court failed to consider the complete denial of medical attention to Bowker's serious symptoms from June 12 until his death on June 30. The record reflects that during this period Bowker never received a medical evaluation and was not provided three of his medications, at least two of which were life-sustaining. Thus, the district court erred in determining that Miller's actions did not amount to a complete denial of medical care under Al-Turki. Bowker's constitutional right to be free from deliberate indifference to his serious medical conditions while in custody was clearly established at the time of the relevant events, and as noted above, the district court should not have granted summary judgment.")

Lennen v. City of Casper, Wyoming, No. 21-8040, 2022 WL 612799, at *9 (10th Cir. Mar. 2, 2022) (not reported) ("[R]eliance on Sevier and Allen is misguided. The Supreme Court recently ruled per curiam that the legal principle outlined in Sevier—that an officer's deliberate and reckless pre-seizure conduct can render a later use of force excessive—was 'merely noted in dicta' and '[t]o state the obvious, a decision where the court did not even have jurisdiction cannot clearly establish substantive constitutional law.' City of Tahlequah, Oklahoma v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 12 (2021) (per curiam). The Supreme Court further implied that any reliance on Allen to determine whether an officer's conduct 'was reckless or that [his] ultimate use of force was unlawful' required factual symmetry. . . In Allen, the officers responded to a potential suicide call by sprinting toward a parked car, screaming at the suspect, and attempting to physically wrest a gun from his hands. . . Here, in contrast, Officer Schlager responded to a call about an armed suspect who had assaulted a store clerk by attempting to engage Oneyear in conversation, retreating once Oneyear rapidly and aggressively advanced toward him while armed, and discharging his weapon only after he issued multiple warnings for Oneyear to drop his sword. Even if we assume that such a legal principle exists, there is no factual symmetry between Allen and the present case, which the concurrence acknowledges.")

Lennen v. City of Casper, Wyoming, No. 21-8040, 2022 WL 612799, at *10-13 (10th Cir. Mar. 2, 2022) (not reported) (Rosman, J., concurring) ("I respectfully concur in affirming the district court's grant of summary judgment, though not on the same ground as the majority. This appeal concerns the killing by police of Ms. Lennen's son—a 36-year-old dependent with a long history of mental health issues, including schizoaffective disorder. . . He often developed strong attachments to inanimate objects—most recently, a prop sword from the movie 'The Highlander,' which he had been dragging around and using as a walking stick. . . To be sure, the officers could not have known these things about him. Even so, the district court's sound sentiment bears repeating at the outset: 'The Court sympathizes with Ms. Lennen over the heartbreaking and far-too-early death of her son. Everyone involved or touched by this tragedy wishes the events would have played out differently.'. .Recall, the standard of review requires us 'to view the facts and draw reasonable inferences "in the light most favorable to the party opposing the [summary judgment] motion."'. . . Adhering to that standard, I cannot join the majority in affirming the district court on the ground that there was no constitutional violation. In my view, a reasonable jury could believe (1) Officer Schlager knew Mr. Oneyear was distraught or otherwise irrational; (2) Officer Schlager is at least partially responsible for creating the lethal situation; (3) Mr. Oneyear made no hostile motions with the sword; (4) he was not within striking distance; and (5)

he was not resisting arrest. With this view of the facts, I cannot say with any confidence, as the majority does, that Ms. Lennen would be unable to establish a constitutional violation. There is nonetheless a readily discernible ground for affirmance. The Supreme Court recently recognized that any constitutional violation in this case was not clearly established under our precedent. See City of Tahlequah v. Bond (Bond II), 142 S. Ct. 9 (2021). This court may address either prong of the qualified immunity test first. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009). It seems appropriate here—particularly where genuine disputes of fact undermine the conclusion that no constitutional violation occurred—to affirm the grant of summary judgment to the officers under the second prong of qualified immunity. . . . Ms. Lennen contends the district court erred in holding Sevier v. City of Lawrence, 60 F.3d 695 (10th Cir. 1995), and Allen v. Muskogee, 119 F.3d 837 (10th Cir. 1997), did not place the officers on notice their conduct violated the Constitution. According to Ms. Lennen, these cases clearly establish a constitutional violation here, where 'officers knowingly confronted a potentially irrational subject who was armed only with a weapon of short-range lethality and deliberately blocked his path giving themselves and their suspect merely seconds to react before killing him.'. . The Supreme Court's recent decision in Bond II forecloses Ms. Lennen's argument. . . In Bond II, officers shot an intoxicated man after they followed him into his ex-wife's garage, he grabbed a hammer, and then he took a stance as if he would throw it or charge at them. The Supreme Court concluded Sevier, Allen, and their progeny did not 'come[ ] close to establishing that the officers' conduct was unlawful.'. . First, the Court thought it 'obvious' that Sevier 'cannot clearly establish substantive constitutional law' because the general statement relied on was merely dicta in 'a decision where the court did not even have jurisdiction.'. . As for Allen, the 'officers in Allen responded to a potential suicide call by sprinting toward a parked car, screaming at the suspect, and attempting to physically wrest a gun from his hands.'. . According to the Court, the 'facts of Allen are dramatically different from the facts [of Bond II].'. . I must reach the same conclusion in this case. Allen's holding that officers act recklessly by sprinting at a suicidal person, screaming at him, and attempting to physically wrest a gun from his hands does not clearly establish that officers act recklessly by directly confronting an irrational person suspected of assault with a sword. The district court correctly concluded Sevier and Allen did not place the officers on notice that their conduct violated the Constitution, and its judgment must be affirmed.")

Thompson v. Ragland, 23 F.4th 1252, 1260-62 (10th Cir. 2022) ("We conclude that at the time of Ragland's letter to Thompson, the law was clearly settled that Thompson could not be disciplined for sending her email to fellow students, at least as the facts are alleged in the complaint. To be sure, we cannot point to a precedent with identical facts. But the law was clear that discipline cannot be imposed on student speech without good reason. And when, as here, that discipline takes the form of a prior restraint on student speech, the law is especially clear: such prospective, content-based restrictions 'carr[y] a presumption of unconstitutionality[.]'. . Ragland therefore bore a 'heavy burden' to justify imposing such limitations on Thompson's speech. . . He has provided no such justification. As we had occasion to recognize quite recently, 'conduct can sometimes violate a clearly established right even though the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful.'. . Of course, not every detail of the First Amendment law governing student speech is (or ever will be) settled. The recent Mahanoy Area School District decision by the Supreme Court acknowledged as much when it refrained from setting forth a comprehensive rule stating when schools can regulate off-campus speech. . . But a great deal is settled. And in any given case the unsettled contours of the law may be irrelevant. . . .[E]ven if Thompson's request that her classmates submit evaluations of Dr. Lazorski's class had played out on campus and in person, it still would have been clearly unlawful for Ragland to discipline Thompson and suppress her speech, as alleged in the complaint. If anything, the fact that Thompson's speech occurred off campus and online—reducing the speech-to-university nexus and thus MSU's power to regulate the speech—makes the alleged First Amendment violation clearer, not less clear. We note, however, that Ragland has not yet had an opportunity to present evidence that might justify his actions. Because the district court disposed of the case on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, Ragland has not even filed an answer. Our holding today is therefore limited. Ragland may be entitled to qualified immunity at the summary-judgment stage, when a clearer picture of what happened will have emerged.")

Sturdivant v. Fine, 22 F.4th 930, 939 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Even without a precedent involving similar facts, the Equal Protection Clause obviously prohibited an acting head coach from orchestrating a boycott based on a team member's race. . . Ms. Fine relies on the district court's statement that '[n]either party has set forth any framework for analyzing whether plaintiff's evidence is sufficient to establish a constitutional violation.' . . This reliance is misplaced, for the parties' lack of analysis about the applicable test does not trigger qualified immunity; what matters is whether the defendant's conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . The constitutional right here—protection from a racially motivated boycott—was clearly established. In acting as the coach, Ms. Fine had notice that our case law would prohibit exclusion of a team member based on race.")

Simpson v. Little, 16 F.4th 1353, 1366 (10th Cir. 2021) ("Cordova clearly established the law here. 'A clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . 'A Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point or the weight of authority from other courts can clearly establish a right,'. . . but a case directly on point is not required so long as 'existing precedent [has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate[.]". . Though the facts in Cordova and this case are not identical, the relevant question is whether Cordova provided 'fair warning' to a reasonable officer in Officer Little's position that his actions violated the Fourth Amendment. . . It did. Cordova clearly established that officers may not use lethal force against a driver who does not pose an immediate threat to officers or third parties. . . And as the district court determined, a reasonable jury could find that Mr. Simpson 'posed no immediate threat to Officer Little or others.'. . In the wake of Cordova, Officer Little was therefore on notice that such conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. Differences in the speeds at which the driver in Cordova and Mr. Simpson were traveling or the durations of the car chases do not alter this conclusion—'a prior case need not be exactly parallel to the conduct here for the officials to have been on notice of clearly established law.' Est. of Smart, 951 F.3d at 1168 (quotations omitted); see Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 739, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002).")

Crane v. Utah Department of Corrections, 15 F.4th 1296, 1310-12 (10th Cir. 2021) ("None of the cases adopts a blanket rule against punitive isolation of mentally ill inmates, or against the placement of such inmates in cells with tie off points. At most, they reiterate the principle articulated in this court's decision in Cox—prison officials are deliberately indifferent if they fail to take reasonable steps to protect a pre-trial detainee or an inmate from suicide when they have subjective knowledge that person is a substantial suicide risk. . . But we see nothing in these cases clearly establishing a constitutional right where the defendant lacks that subjective knowledge. To be sure, prison conditions may be so deficient that an inmate's constitutional rights are implicated, without regard to the inmate's mental health. . . But the clearly established law in this area is limited. This is because the facts of such cases vary significantly, and 'general statements of law ... provide fair warning that certain conduct is unconstitutional ... [only] if they "apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question."'. . Obvious cases are rare and inarguable. See, e.g., Taylor v. Riojas, —— U.S. ——, 141 S. Ct. 52, 53–54, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020) (per curiam) (stating general constitutional principles provided fair warning that confining an inmate in a cell covered in massive amounts of feces or forcing him to sleep naked in sewage was unconstitutional); Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730–35, 738, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002) (deeming the second instance of handcuffing a shirtless inmate to a hitching post for seven hours, in the sun, without bathroom breaks, and with minimal water, an "obvious" Eighth Amendment violation); Browder v. City of Albuquerque, 787 F.3d 1076, 1082–83 (10th Cir. 2015) (denying qualified immunity to a police officer who used his official squad car and activated its emergency lights to speed through city streets at more than sixty miles per hour and for over 8.8 miles, all for his personal pleasure rather than for official business, thereby causing a car crash, because his conduct was "so obviously unlawful"). The CUCF Defendants' actions—when viewed outside the context of this circuit's deliberate indifference standard as articulated in Cox, do not cross a clearly established constitutional line. Here, the facts are more analogous to cases where qualified immunity was granted. . . . Ms. Crane dismisses the requirement to identify existing precedent with high levels of factual similarity by emphasizing the Tenth Circuit 'has "adopted a sliding scale to determine when law is clearly established."'. . Under the sliding scale approach, '[t]he more obviously egregious the conduct ..., the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.'. .However, Ms. Crane provides no rationale for why the sliding scale should lower the level of factual similarity required here. She claims she has 'alleged particularly egregious conduct,'. . . so problematic that one 'cannot dispute the obvious cruelty of [the CUCF Defendants'] conduct[.]". . But Ms. Crane neither compares the facts here to cases where we used the sliding scale to lower the level of factual similarity required, nor cites any precedent deeming similar conduct obviously egregious. The cases she cites as supportive include arguably more egregious facts than those here. . . . And as previously discussed, the CUCF Defendants' actions do not rise to the level of egregiousness the Supreme Court and this court have declared obviously unlawful. Therefore, the sliding scale approach cannot save Ms. Crane's Eighth Amendment claims from the inability to locate a clearly established constitutional right. In summary, on appeal, Ms. Crane argues only that '[i]t was clearly established that subjecting a suicidal and intellectually disabled individual to these unusually harsh solitary confinement conditions was unconstitutional.'. . Yet, she fails to identify any precedent clearly establishing this theory. We therefore hold Ms. Crane has failed to satisfy the second requirement necessary to overcome qualified immunity, and accordingly, we do not evaluate the first prong of the qualified immunity test.") Ashaheed v. Currington, 7 F.4th 1236, 1243, 1246-49 (10th Cir. 2021) ("Although the court addressed only the second element of qualified immunity—clearly established law, we also address the first—constitutional violation—because Sergeant Currington argues it presents an alternative ground to affirm and because our discussion informs our analysis of clearly established law. . . . Sergeant Currington violated the Center's rules and burdened Mr. Ashaheed's religious exercise. As alleged, he engaged in intentional religious discrimination with anti-Muslim animus. His conduct went beyond the free exercise violation we found in Shrum. The SAC pled a constitutional violation. . . . The circumstances of each qualified immunity case remain relevant to whether a reasonable officer would be on notice that conduct is unconstitutional. But, as this listing of cases shows, ' "[g]eneral statements of the law" can clearly establish a right for qualified immunity purposes if they apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. .The Supreme Court also has said that courts may find a violation of a clearly established law when a defendant's conduct is so obviously unlawful that factually similar or identical precedent is unneeded. For example, in Taylor v. Riojas. . . the Court addressed an Eighth Amendment claim challenging conditions of confinement. Despite the lack of factually identical or similar precedent, the Court rejected qualified immunity for the defendant, reasoning that given 'the particularly egregious facts' and 'extreme circumstances' of Mr. Taylor's case, 'any reasonable officer should have realized that Taylor's conditions of confinement offended the Constitution.'. . When Sergeant Currington ignored the Center's religious exemption and forced Mr. Ashaheed to shave his beard, he violated clearly established law.We have said 'it is clearly established that non-neutral state action imposing a substantial burden on the exercise of religion violates the First Amendment.'. . As alleged, Sergeant Currington's actions went even further. He not only intentionally discriminated against Mr. Ashaheed's religion, but also did so with animus. And '[w]here governmental bodies discriminate out of 'animus' against particular religions, such decisions are plainly unconstitutional.'. . The foregoing free exercise law precepts were not too general to provide fair warning to a reasonable officer in Sergeant Currington's position. He did not have to resolve 'relevant ambiguities.'. . It was not difficult for him 'to determine how' these rules appl[ied] to the factual situation [he] confront[ed].'. . As the cases listed earlier show, defining clearly established law at this level of generality is not unusual when the unlawfulness of an action 'depends on the actors' unconstitutional motive.'. . Anti-Muslim animus is plainly an unconstitutional motive. Sergeant Currington's alleged actions and intent also present 'the rare obvious case, where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear.'. .Finally, a reasonable jury could find that the free exercise violation alleged here went further than the one in Shrum. There, even though the defendant's personnel actions did not violate the CBA and the plaintiff did not allege religious prejudice, we still found the 'constitutional violation was clearly established.'. . Here, Mr. Ashaheed alleged a policy violation and religious prejudice, placing the 'constitutional question' even further 'beyond debate.'. . The applicable law provided Sergeant Currington with unambiguous 'fair and clear warning.'. . The unlawfulness of his conduct was 'apparent.'. . Under the allegations in the SAC, Sergeant Currington committed a violation of clearly established Free Exercise Clause law.")

Ralston v. Cannon, No. 19-1146, 2021 WL 3478634, at *5 (10th Cir. Aug. 9, 2021) (not reported) ("The time period of the challenged action here—which provides the touchstone for assessing the substance of clearly established law—is from January 2, 2014 (when Mr. Cannon first denied Mr. Ralston's kosher diet request) to February 4, 2014 (when he granted it). We hold that, during this time period, the law was not clearly established that Mr. Cannon could be held liable for violating Mr. Ralston's free-exercise rights by acting without a discriminatory purpose. More specifically, the law was not clearly established that Mr. Cannon could be found liable for a free-exercise violation for denying Mr. Ralston a kosher diet—absent a showing that Mr. Cannon took this action for the purpose of discriminating on account of Mr. Ralston's religion (i.e., because of his religion). The relevant precedent did not put this 'constitutional question' regarding the requisite scienter, under the circumstances here, 'beyond debate.'. . And thus we cannot say that 'every reasonable official' in Mr. Cannon's position would have known that his decision to deny Mr. Ralston's request for a kosher diet—if free of discriminatory purpose—would violate the Free Exercise Clause.")

Janny v. Gamez, 8 F.4th 883, 914-16 (10th Cir. 2021) ("In February 2015, the time of the events at issue, a reasonable parole officer would have known that putting a parolee to the choice of participating in religious programming or returning to jail on a parole violation violated the Establishment Clause. . . .At both general and specific levels, then, the state of the law in February 2015 put Officer Gamez on notice that forcing Mr. Janny to a choice between participating in the Mission's Christian activities or violating parole was unconstitutional. At the general level, well before 2015, Supreme Court caselaw placed it 'beyond dispute' that the Establishment Clause bars the government from 'coerc[ing] anyone to support or participate in religion or its exercise.'. . . And at the specific level, Kerr, Warner, Inouye, and Jackson all applied this core principle to the prison and parole context, building up a significant body of appellate caselaw. . . . Most of the cases in the parole context have dealt with forced attendance at substance abuse rehabilitation programs—specifically, AA or NA—rather than forced attendance at religious programming as a condition of maintaining a residence of record while on parole. But this minor distinction cannot prevent a determination that the law was clearly established with respect to the actions taken by Officer Gamez. Our inquiry 'is not a scavenger hunt for prior cases with precisely the same facts.'. . And the alleged conduct here was even more patently unconstitutional than the conduct in the prior cases applying Lee to the parole context, given that Officer Gamez expressly put Mr. Janny to an unequivocally coercive choice (participate in religious activities or return to jail), and that the Program's Christian bible study and worship services were more overtly religious than the 'higher power' at the center of AA/NA recovery meetings.. . Because '"the state of the law" at the time of [the] incident provided "fair warning"' to Officer Gamez that his alleged conduct violated the Establishment Clause, . . . the district court erred in granting him qualified immunity from that claim.")

Janny v. Gamez, 8 F.4th 883, 917-18 (10th Cir. 2021) ("[I]t was established by 2015 that a state actor violates the Free Exercise Clause by coercing or compelling participation in religious activity against one's expressly stated beliefs. . . . Our conclusion that a reasonable official in Officer Gamez's shoes would have understood his conduct violated the Free Exercise Clause is bolstered by 'the specific context of the case.'. . This is not a Fourth Amendment challenge to an officer's split-second assessment of the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,' where defining clearly established law with 'specificity is especially important.' . . Rather, the contours of the constitutional transgression at issue were well defined . . . . This is therefore a case where 'a general rule will result in law that is not extremely abstract or imprecise under the facts ..., but rather is relatively straightforward and not difficult to apply.'. . And as a result, 'a case involving the same type of coercion ... is unnecessary to place the unconstitutionality of [Officer Gamez's] conduct "beyond debate."'. . . 'The Framers adopted the Religion Clauses in response to a long tradition of coercive state support for religion."'. . Because of this, the religion clauses express 'special antipathy to religious coercion.'. . On the averred facts, Officer Gamez forced Mr. Janny to choose between participating in Christian activities or returning to jail, over Mr. Janny's express objection. This clear violation of the fundamental anti-coercion precept enshrined in the First Amendment is enough to deny Officer Gamez qualified immunity from Mr. Janny's claims brought under both clauses.")

Duda v. Elder, 7 F.4th 899, 918-20 (10th Cir. 2021) ("The district court denied qualified immunity to Sheriff Elder on the reporting speech claim, finding Wulf clearly established the law. We affirm because Wulf is substantially similar to the facts of this case. Under Wulf, it was 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official [in Sheriff Elder's position] would have understood' that firing Mr. Duda based on his speech reporting misconduct at EPSO to The Independent was unconstitutional. . . . Because in both Wulf and this case the plaintiffs were terminated after reporting to a local newspaper about misconduct within a law enforcement agency, including sexual harassment directed at someone other than the plaintiff, there is 'substantial correspondence between the conduct in question' and Wulf, defeating qualified immunity for Sheriff Elder. . . Sheriff Elder's arguments to the contrary are without merit. . . . Here, Wulf placed the 'constitutional question beyond debate.'. . It put Sheriff Elder on notice that firing an employee for reporting to a local newspaper about sexual harassment and other misconduct at a law enforcement department is unconstitutional. Thus, Wulf—and not Lytle or Woodward—governs this case. We affirm the denial of qualified immunity to Sheriff Elder on the reporting speech claim.")

Williams v. Hansen, 5 F.4th 1129, 1133-35 (10th Cir. 2021) ("It was clearly established that the indefinite denial of any religious services would violate Mr. Williams's right to freely exercise his religious beliefs in the absence of a legitimate penological interest. . . . Under Yellowbear and Makin, Mr. Williams's constitutional right is clearly established. We do not need to decide whether a ban lasting only nine days could constitute a clearly established substantial burden. Even if it could not, dismissal for qualified immunity is unavailable when the complaint lacks enough detail to know how long the ban lasted. See Thomas v. Kaven, 765 F.3d 1183, 1196–98 (10th Cir. 2014). Here the complaint does not specify whether the ban lasted nine days, two weeks, a month, or six months. Because our case law clearly established a substantial burden from a ban lasting 30 days, the defendants are not entitled to dismissal based on qualified immunity. . . . For Mr. Williams, tobacco was an object needed for his religious services. And no one contests the sincerity of Mr. Williams's stated need. The defendants point out that the tobacco ban was limited to 30 days. So we must decide whether a 30-day ban on a religious object could violate a clearly established right. We answer 'yes' based on Makin v. Colorado Department of Corrections, 183 F.3d 1205 (10th Cir. 1999). There we held that the Constitution required the availability of meals at particular times during the month-long Ramadan fast. . . Denial of these meals would substantially burden the free exercise of religion even if prisoners could fast by saving their food from other meals. . . So it is clearly established that a partial denial of religious activities for 30 days could constitute a substantial burden.")

Dalton v. Reynolds, 2 F.4th 1300, 1311-12 (10th Cir. 2021) ("At the time of the Officers' conduct, it was clearly established in this circuit that it is unlawful to provide less police protection to a sub-class of domestic violence victims, like those whose assailants were police officers with whom they had been in a domestic relationship. We held in Watson that providing less police protection to victims of domestic violence than to victims of non-domestic violence can form the basis of an equal protection violation. . . . Despite this precedent, the Officers argue that in the absence of a Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court case identifying the specific sub-class of persons at issue here—namely, persons domestically abused by police officers with whom they had been in a domestic relationship—the Estate's equal protection claim must fail. They argue White v. Pauly, —— U.S. ––, 137 S. Ct. 548, 196 L.Ed.2d 463 (2017), demands a higher showing of factual similarity before a case clearly establishes that particular conduct violates a constitutional provision. But our circuit has clearly established precedent that police officers may not intentionally discriminate in providing police protection to domestic violence victims. . . . Here we have two factually similar cases, Watson and Price-Cornelison, which clearly established at the time of the Officers' conduct that providing less protection to domestic violence victims, or certain sub-classes of domestic violence victims, violates the Equal Protection Clause. These cases would put a reasonable officer on notice that it is unlawful to provide less police protection to victims of domestic violence whose assailants are police officers with whom they had been in a domestic relationship than is provided to victims without police assailants. . . In sum, the Estate has satisfied both prongs necessary to overcome the Officers' qualified immunity defense. Based on the facts found by the district court, the Officers violated Ms. Bascom's clearly established equal protection right to the same police protection as other domestic violence victims.")

Truman v. Orem City, 1 F.4th 1227, 1236-41 (10th Cir. 2021) ("Mr. Truman's allegations are sufficient to overcome the prosecutor's claim of qualified immunity. He plausibly alleges (1) the prosecutor's actions violated his constitutional right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer and (2) the right was clearly established at the time of the prosecutor's conduct. . . . Mr. Truman's allegations paint a picture of arbitrary executive action that shocks the conscience: the prosecutor intentionally presented false information to the medical examiner to get him to change Mrs. Truman's manner of death to homicide and then put the medical examiner on the stand to testify based on that false information in order to secure Mr. Truman's conviction. Accordingly, Mr. Truman sufficiently alleges the prosecutor's actions violated his constitutional due process right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer, satisfying the first requirement to overcome the presumption of qualified immunity. . . .We also conclude the right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer was clearly established at the time of the prosecutor's conduct. The constitutional violation at issue here was clearly established by our decision in Pierce in 2004. . . .The alleged facts in this case are obviously not identical to those in Pierce: prosecutor versus forensic analyst, incorrect dimension evidence versus faulty hair sample evidence. Even so, there are consistent factual strands running through these cases that put the prosecutor on notice that his alleged conduct violated Mr. Truman's constitutional rights. Just like in Pierce, Mr. Truman alleges that the prosecutor knowingly used false evidence to convict Mr. Truman and to deprive him of due process. Such consistency is enough to defeat qualified immunity. The same constitutional right at issue in Pierce is at issue in this case. Accordingly, the right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer was clearly established by Pierce at the time of the prosecutor's actions in 2013, satisfying the second requirement to overcome the presumption of qualified immunity. This is also an 'obvious case' of a constitutional violation. . . Any reasonable prosecutor understands that providing a medical examiner materially false information that influences his expert opinion as to whether a homicide occurred and then putting that medical examiner on the stand to testify based on that false information prevents a fair trial. . . Such conduct is 'obviously egregious,'. . . and so the 'unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even [if] existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . A recent Supreme Court case, Taylor v. Riojas, 141 S. Ct. 52 (2020) (per curium), is instructive. . . . The Supreme Court rejected the Fifth Circuit's finding of qualified immunity. The inmate in Taylor could not identify a case in which a court held that an inmate confined to extremely unsanitary cells for six days offends the Constitution. But the Supreme Court made clear that he did not have to. It explained that 'no reasonable correctional officer could have concluded that, under the extreme circumstances of this case, it was constitutionally permissible to house Taylor in such deplorably unsanitary conditions for such an extended period of time.'. . In support, the Court reasserted its holding in Hope v. Peltzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002), for the proposition that 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. .This proposition applies with equal force here. The right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer is a general constitutional rule identified in decisional law prior to the prosecutor's conduct. . . . Just like any reasonable correctional officer should understand the inmate in Taylor's conditions of confinement offended the Constitution, so too should any reasonable prosecutor understand that providing a medical examiner fabricated evidence and then putting him on the stand to testify based on that false information offends the Constitution.")

Huff v. Reeves, 996 F.3d 1082, 1088-90 (10th Cir. 2021) ("Childress would be highly relevant, indeed dispositive, if the evidence established that Trooper Reeves was shooting only at Norris and the wounds to Ms. Huff were just 'the unfortunate ... accidental effects of otherwise lawful conduct.'. . If, however, Reeves intentionally shot Ms. Huff (perhaps because he thought she was implicated in the robbery and murder), Childress is not in point. We therefore begin by addressing whether the record would support a jury finding that Reeves intentionally shot Ms. Huff. Concluding that there was sufficient evidence to support such a finding, we then turn to whether a shooting in that circumstance would violate Ms. Huff's rights under the Fourth Amendment and whether that law was clearly established at the time of the incident. The district court correctly observed that Reeves denied under oath that he saw Ms. Huff when he was firing his weapon. But that denial is not dispositive. The record contains ample evidence from which a jury could reasonably infer that Reeves saw and intentionally shot Ms. Huff after she exited the SUV. To begin with, the very fact that Ms. Huff was repeatedly struck by bullets from Reeves's gun strongly implies that she was in his line of sight. The shooting was in broad daylight. And the fact that she was struck by bullets so often (at least 10 times) makes it hard to believe that she was not being aimed at. Nor can her being struck so often be blamed on her proximity to Norris, who was struck only four times, compared to her 10. Ms. Huff testified at her deposition that she and Norris exited on opposite sides of the SUV and that she 'had [her] hands up and ran a short distance ... into the field' abutting Onapa Road. . . She said that she was 'running away from Cedric Norris' and 'never saw [him] again once he exited the vehicle.'. .Although circumstantial, the evidence described in the preceding paragraph is more than sufficient to permit a factfinder to reject Reeves's account. . . . Here, Ms. Huff testified that she raised her hands in surrender as she approached the officers when she was first shot. If her version of events is believed, she was not evading apprehension and she posed no threat to the officers or anyone else. Perhaps Reeves reasonably viewed the situation otherwise, viewing her as an accomplice to murder who was shooting at him. But that is a question for the jury. On facts that could reasonably be found by the jury, Reeves's shooting at Ms. Huff was contrary to clearly established Fourth Amendment law. We acknowledge that none of the above-cited cases addresses the precise set of facts now before us. But in our view 'existing precedent ... ha[s] placed the ... question beyond debate.'")

Frasier v. Evans, 992 F.3d 1003, 1013-23 & n.4 (10th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 427 (2021) ("We begin by reviewing the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the officers on Mr. Frasier's First Amendment retaliation claim. The court held that, although Mr. Frasier's alleged right to record the officers performing their official duties in public spaces was not clearly established at the time of the underlying events in August 2014, the officers nevertheless were not entitled to qualified immunity because the record supported a finding that the officers actually knew from their training that the right existed. . . .The officer defendants challenge the district court's denial of their qualified-immunity defense with respect to Mr. Frasier's First Amendment retaliation claim. They contend that the court should have granted them immunity once it held that judicial precedent did not clearly establish in August 2014 Mr. Frasier's alleged First Amendment right to record them performing their official duties in public spaces. We agree. More specifically, the district court erred in concluding that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity because they actually knew from their training that such a First Amendment right purportedly existed—even though the court had determined that they did not violate any clearly established right. There are two salient, independent grounds for concluding that the district court's ruling was wrong. First, and perhaps most significantly, a defendant's eligibility for qualified immunity is judged by an objective standard and, therefore, what the officer defendants subjectively understood or believed the law to be was irrelevant with respect to the clearly-established-law question. Second, judicial decisions are the only valid interpretive source of the content of clearly established law, and, consequently, whatever training the officers received concerning the nature of Mr. Frasier's First Amendment rights was irrelevant to the clearly-established-law inquiry. . . .Mr. Frasier contends nonetheless that the district court was right to deny the officers their defense because qualified immunity does not protect those who 'knowingly violate the law.'. . He further contends that we and other circuits have recognized that an officer does not warrant immunity under Harlow when he actually knew that he was violating the law, irrespective of whether the law was clearly established at the time. . . Like the district court, Mr. Frasier locates the origin of this somewhat novel interpretation of Harlow in Justice Brennan's concurrence in that case. . . We, however, reject the idea that Harlow permits an exception to its objective standard based on an official's subjective understanding or knowledge of the law. We note that 'a concurring opinion is not binding on us'—even one from a Supreme Court Justice—and, therefore, such an opinion is relevant only insofar as its analysis is 'persuasive.'. . And Justice Brennan's concurrence is not a persuasive reading of the scope of Harlow's holding. . . Mr. Frasier tells us that we—as well as other federal courts of appeals—have already adopted Justice Brennan's Harlow concurrence. In this connection, he particularly cites to Pleasant v. Lovell, 876 F.2d 787 (10th Cir. 1989), asserting that we 'specifically stated [in that case] that a "government official who actually knows that he is violating the law is not entitled to qualified immunity even if [his] actions [are] objectively reasonable."'. Although Mr. Frasier is correct that we used that language in Pleasant, he neglects to mention that it only appears in a parenthetical purporting to describe the holding of Justice Brennan's Harlow concurrence. . . . Therefore, Mr. Frasier's reliance on Pleasant is misguided. Furthermore, we also decline to follow the out-of-circuit caselaw that Mr. Frasier offers to us. Irrespective of whether he has accurately cited those decisions as supporting his argument that an official cannot receive qualified immunity when he actually knows he violated the law, we do not believe that those cases can cast any doubt on our baseline conclusion—firmly grounded in Supreme Court precedent—that qualified immunity 'attaches when an official's conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . . As for the second point, the district court was wrong to deny the officers qualified immunity based on their knowledge of Mr. Frasier's purported First Amendment rights that they gained from their training. Judicial decisions are the only valid interpretive source of the content of clearly established law; whatever training the officers received concerning the First Amendment was irrelevant to the clearly-established-law inquiry. . . Indeed, it is beyond peradventure that judicial decisions concretely and authoritatively define the boundaries of permissible conduct in a way that government-employer training never can. Thus, irrespective of the merits of the training that the officer defendants received concerning the First Amendment, it was irrelevant to the clearly-established-law inquiry here. The district court consequently erred in denying the officers qualified immunity based on the actual knowledge that they purportedly gained from such non-judicial sources. In conclusion, we hold that the district court applied an erroneous rationale in denying the officer defendants qualified immunity on Mr. Frasier's First Amendment retaliation claim. If the officers did not violate Mr. Frasier's clearly established First Amendment rights—and the district court itself said they did not—then the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. This is so, even if the officers subjectively knew—based on their training or from municipal policies—that their conduct violated Mr. Frasier's First Amendment rights. . . .Mr. Frasier contends that we should nevertheless affirm the district court's judgment denying qualified immunity to the officers on the alternative ground that his First Amendment right to record the officers performing their official duties in public spaces was actually clearly established in August 2014, even though the district court ruled to the contrary. . . . . We do not consider, nor opine on, whether Mr. Frasier actually had a First Amendment right to record the police performing their official duties in public spaces. . . We exercise our discretion to bypass the constitutional question of whether such right even exists. In doing so, we are influenced by the fact that neither party disputed that such a right exists (nor did the district court question its existence). . . And because we ultimately determine that any First Amendment right that Mr. Frasier had to record the officers was not clearly established at the time he did so, we see no reason to risk the possibility of 'glibly announc[ing] new constitutional rights in dictum that will have no effect whatsoever on the case.'. . . Mr. Frasier does not assert that any on-point Tenth Circuit authority provided clearly established law in August 2014 concerning his First Amendment retaliation claim, and we are not aware of any. Yet, Mr. Frasier argues that his right to record the police performing their official duties in public spaces was clearly established by two 'general constitutional rule[s] already identified in the decisional law.'. . He points in particular to two principles: (1) 'the creation and dissemination of information are speech within the meaning of the First Amendment,' and (2) '[n]ews gathering is an activity protected by the First Amendment.'. . . We find unpersuasive, however, Mr. Frasier's effort to show that these general principles clearly established a First Amendment right applicable to these circumstances, which involve the recording of police officers performing their official duties in public spaces. . . . Mr. Frasier's attempt to distill a clearly established right applicable here from the general First Amendment principles protecting the creation of speech and the gathering of news runs headfirst into the Supreme Court's prohibition against defining clearly established rights at a high level of generality. Mr. Frasier fails to demonstrate how the alleged unlawfulness of the officers' conduct in retaliating against him for recording them 'follow[s] immediately from' the abstract right to create speech and gather news. . . Furthermore, to the extent that Mr. Frasier relatedly asserts—referencing Hope v. Pelzer and its progeny—that these general constitutional principles apply to these facts 'with obvious clarity,'. . . such that reasonable officers in the defendants' positions would have known that their conduct was unlawful, his suggestion falls far from the mark. That is because Hope's holding historically has been applied to only the 'rare "obvious case,"'. . involving 'extreme circumstances,'. . . or 'particularly egregious' misconduct[.] . . Even a cursory consideration of these facts—in the light of cases like Taylor and Hope—makes clear that this is not such a rare case. . . . Mr. Frasier argues next that even if 'the well-established First Amendment protection provided to speech creation and newsgathering were too general to apply with obvious clarity to Defendants' conduct, the weight of authority from other Circuits clearly established [his] First Amendment right to record the Defendants.'. . He directs our attention in particular to four pre-August 2014 circuit court decisions: ACLU of Illinois v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583 (7th Cir. 2012); Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78 (1st Cir. 2011); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332 (11th Cir. 2000); and Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436 (9th Cir. 1995). Even if we assume that all four decisions—i.e., Alvarez, Glik, Smith, and Fordyce—clearly stand for the proposition that there is a First Amendment right to record the police performing their duties in public spaces, . . . those decisions do not indicate that this right was clearly established law in our circuit in August 2014. . . . And circuit judges have disagreed regarding whether this purported First Amendment right to record was clearly established around August 2014. . . .In other words, the out-of-circuit authorities appear to be split on the clearly-established-law question. And, in the teeth of this circuit split, we could not reasonably conclude that the 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts' has "found the law to be as [Mr. Frasier] maintains.'"'. . And, more specifically, the out-of-circuit authorities that Mr. Frasier cites do not convince us that, in August 2014, reasonable officers in the positions of the officer defendants here would have had 'fair notice that [their] conduct was unlawful.'. . . In conclusion, we hold that the district court erred in denying the officers qualified immunity with respect to Mr. Frasier's First Amendment retaliation claim. Irrespective of whether the officers subjectively knew from their training that Mr. Frasier possessed a First Amendment right to record them performing their official duties in public spaces, this right (which we assume to exist) was not clearly established law in August 2014 when they allegedly retaliated against Mr. Frasier for recording them. Accordingly, Mr. Frasier has not shouldered his burden on the second prong of the qualified-immunity standard (the clearly-established-law prong), and the officers are therefore entitled to judgment in their favor on this claim.")

Vette v. K-9 Unit Deputy Sanders, 989 F.3d 1154, 1171-72 (10th Cir. 2021) ("We . . . conclude that, under the totality of circumstances, Sergeant Sanders's alleged use of force against Mr. Vette—viz., striking him in the face and releasing a police dog to attack him after he was already apprehended—was objectively unreasonable. Accordingly, Sergeant Sanders violated Mr. Vette's right under the Fourth Amendment to be free from excessive use of force. . . .In December 2017, a reasonable officer would have been on notice that striking Mr. Vette in the face and releasing a dog to attack him, after he was already apprehended by two officers, was unconstitutional. Specifically, as of 2017, our precedent was clear 'that continued use of force after an individual has been subdued is a violation of the Fourth Amendment.'")

Crowson v. Washington County State of Utah, 983 F.3d 1166, 1183-84 (10th Cir. 2020) ("To conclude Mata put all reasonable doctors on notice that failing to obtain a test result violates an inmate's rights would place the notice at too high a level of generality. As discussed, Mata does not require testing and, consequently, Dr. LaRowe's conduct falls into a grey area created by the holdings of Estelle and Self on the one hand and Mata on the other. We therefore cannot conclude that every reasonable official would have known it was a violation of Mr. Crowson's constitutional rights to proceed with a diagnosis in the absence of blood test results. Rather, it fell within the realm of reasonable debate. . . .For purposes of our analysis, we assume Dr. LaRowe violated Mr. Crowson's Fourteenth Amendment rights by treating him for withdrawal without first obtaining the results from a previously ordered blood test. Because we have found no decisions from the Supreme Court or this court that clearly establish the unconstitutionality of such conduct, we conclude Dr. LaRowe is entitled to qualified immunity, and we reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment.")

Harris v. Mahr, 838 F. App'x 339, ___ (10th Cir. 2020) ("Even assuming without deciding that Plaintiffs had a plausible claim for violation of a constitutional right based on a failure to intervene, the constitutional right was not clearly established. . . Therefore, the denial of qualified immunity was error. . . .Plaintiffs claim that Sergeant Mahr failed to intervene in an unlawful entry and search of their apartment. To show that such a duty was 'clearly established,' they rely primarily on an excessive force case stating 'that all law enforcement officials have an affirmative duty to intervene to protect the constitutional rights of citizens from infringement by other law enforcement officers in their presence.' Vondrak v. City of Las Cruces, 535 F.3d 1198, 1210 (10th Cir. 2008) (quoting Anderson v. Branen, 17 F.3d 552, 557 (2d Cir. 1994)). Additionally, they also rely upon two unpublished decisions that apply the duty to intervene in unlawful entry cases. . . These cases, however, fail to show that the law was clearly established at the time of the incident. Although Vondrak recites a broad duty to intervene, it lacks any specificity, especially as to unlawful entry and search cases. The same is true of the case Vondrak relied upon. . . In Vondrak, we said that the duty to intervene applies to excessive force and unlawful arrests, as well as 'any constitutional violation [that] has been committed by a law enforcement official.'. . But it does not discuss unlawful entries or searches, thus making it a highly generalized statement. . . In Reid, this court found defendants liable for failing to intervene in an unlawful entry because they were 'present and heard the conversation between plaintiff and [the other officer]; yet they did not act to stop the allegedly unconstitutional action.'. . In this case, however, Sergeant Mahr was not alleged to be at the door with the searching officers and he previously told them not to enter the apartment without a warrant. These factual differences undermine Reid's ability to clearly establish the law, especially when considering the importance of the facts to a failure-to-intervene claim. . . .Given the lack of caselaw, Plaintiffs ultimately must contend that Sergeant Mahr's conduct was 'so obviously unconstitutional' that they do not need to identify an on-point case. . . Plaintiffs point to this court's 'sliding scale' approach where 'the more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.' . . Not only are the 'constitutional principles' surrounding a failure to intervene in an unlawful search unclear, but Plaintiffs acknowledge that Sergeant Mahr initially told APD officers not to enter the apartment without a warrant. His failure to take additional steps is not the type of 'egregious' conduct that warrants foregoing our traditional requirement of an on-point case. Finally, Plaintiffs argue that this court should reject the doctrine of qualified immunity altogether. Plaintiffs recognize that they failed to raise this argument in the district court but ask us to use our discretion to consider it on appeal. However, despite any difficulties the framework presents, we remain obligated to follow qualified-immunity precedents of the Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit. . .Therefore, we decline Plaintiffs' offer to upend the doctrine.")

Hubbard v. Nestor, 830 F. App'x 574, ___ (10th Cir. 2020) ("It was clearly established at the time of Defendants' conduct that the Fourteenth Amendment 'prohibits any punishment' of a pretrial detainee without due process. . . Importantly here, it was also clearly established that 'a showing of an expressed intent to punish on the part of detention facility officials'—standing alone—is sufficient to demonstrate 'the disability is imposed for the purpose of punishment.'. . This clearly established standard is sufficiently specific to have put Defendants on notice that their actions—intentionally punishing Plaintiff by placing him on disciplinary status or in disciplinary segregation without giving him an opportunity to be heard—violated his due process rights. The thrust of Defendants' counterargument is that this clearly established law is too general for them to have understood their conduct violated the Fourteenth Amendment. That is, Defendants contend they are entitled to qualified immunity because there is no Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point to inform them that their actions under these particular circumstances constituted unconstitutional punishment. But in doing so, Defendants fail to grapple with the district court's factual determinations that they intended to punish Plaintiff by placing him on disciplinary status or in disciplinary segregation. In light of these facts, which this court lacks authority to review, we have no trouble concluding a reasonable detention facility officer in Defendants' shoes would have known their actions violated Plaintiff's due process rights. We are thus unable to grant Defendants the immunity they seek.")

Brown v. Flowers, 974 F.3d 1178, 1186-87 (10th Cir. 2020) ("We conclude that Flowers violated a clearly established right. We have long held that nonconsensual, coerced sex between a jailer and an inmate violates the Constitution. . . And cases like Castillo, Barney, and Smith demonstrate that our caselaw does not distinguish between sexual abuse accomplished through physical and nonphysical coercion. . . Given the context of this case and the facts as we must construe them in this interlocutory appeal—the inherently coercive nature of prisons, Flowers giving Brown cigarettes, and Brown's testimony, including the fact that she was crying during the sex—existing caselaw made it 'clear to a reasonable officer that' Flowers's 'conduct was unlawful.'. . And considering the nature of the constitutional violation—where Flowers's use of force was in no way related to his duties as a jailer, as opposed to being at the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force'—a case involving the same type of coercion and evidence of lack of consent is unnecessary to place the unconstitutionality of Flowers's conduct 'beyond debate.'. . We therefore conclude that Flowers violated a clearly established right, and we affirm the district court.")

Mglej v. Gardner, 974 F.3d 1151, 1170-71 (10th Cir. 2020) ("[V]iewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Mglej, then, the lasting physical injury he suffered and the extreme prolonged pain inflicted on him is sufficient for Mglej to meet his burden of establishing an actual, non-de minimis injury to support an excessive force claim based on being handcuffed too tightly. . .

Furthermore, as the cases cited above indicate, such a Fourth Amendment violation was clearly established in August 2011. . . In particular, this court previously recognized, in 2008, that a claim that overly tight handcuffs caused permanent nerve damage was sufficient to establish a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim. . . The district court, therefore, did not err in denying Deputy Gardner qualified immunity on this excessive force claim. . . .In the district court, Deputy Gardner did not specifically challenge that this constitutional violation—malicious prosecution—was clearly established in August 2011. In any event, it was. In 2008, the Tenth Circuit stated that 'it of course has long been clearly established that knowingly arresting a defendant without probable cause, leading to the defendant's subsequent confinement and prosecution, violates the Fourth Amendment's proscription against unreasonable searches and seizures.'")

Emmett v. Armstrong, 973 F.3d 1127, 1134-37 (10th Cir. 2020) ("[A]lthough Officer Armstrong did not verbally identify himself as a police officer, because the totality of the circumstances show that it was objectively reasonable for Officer Armstrong to believe that Emmett knew he was a police officer, Emmett's arrest for interfering with a peace officer did not violate his Fourth Amendment rights. Because no constitutional right was violated, we need not determine whether that right was clearly established. . . . Our review of a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim looks at the facts and circumstances as they existed at the moment the force was used, while also taking into consideration the events leading up to that moment. . . .Taking all the facts in the light most favorable to Emmett, therefore, it was not objectively reasonable for Officer Armstrong to deploy his taser. . . . [T]he relevant inquiry is whether, in October of 2013, there were applicable Tenth Circuit cases putting Officer Armstrong on notice that using a taser without providing an adequate warning against a misdemeanant who had ceased actively resisting was unconstitutional. We conclude that there was Tenth Circuit precedent—Casey and Cavanaugh—putting Officer Armstrong on notice that his use of force was unreasonable.")

Contreras on behalf of A.L. v. Doña Ana County Bd. of County Commissioners, 965 F.3d 1114, 1115, 1120-22 (10th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1382 (2021) (Tymkovich, C.J., concurring) ("In my view, Ms. Contreras has failed not only to demonstrate the violation of a clearly established constitutional right, but also the violation of a constitutional right at all. . . . Although the corrections officers sought to protect A.L. from harm, it seems likely that negligence undermined their efforts. Negligence offers much cause for concern here; but precedent tells us it cannot elicit constitutional intervention. . . To be clear, the facility likely could have addressed the risk of detainee-on-detainee violence more effectively. But we must abide by the Supreme Court's mandate to assess both objective risk and subjective awareness of that risk. The subjective inquiry requires that we ask whether the officers knew of a substantial risk and consciously disregarded the dangers that risk posed to A.L. I cannot infer subjective knowledge of any substantial risk to A.L. from this record. And no evidence indicates the corrections officers manifested the requisite actual knowledge of this risk, in any event. I would accordingly conclude that Ms. Contreras has failed to carry her burden. . . . Even if we were to conclude a constitutional violation had occurred, the circumstances of this case nonetheless cannot satisfy the rigorous standards the Supreme Court has articulated for clearly established law. . . . Ms. Contreras frames the constitutional violation at a high level of generality: '[A] known but disregarded threat to an inmate's physical safety, combined with evidence of prior assaults and information about a specific threat can establish deliberate indifference.'. . As a threshold matter, I doubt this formulation can satisfy the rigorous standards for specificity required by the Supreme Court. . .But even if—for the sake of argument—we take this rule as given, the two Tenth Circuit authorities cited most extensively by Ms. Contreras, Berry v. City of Muskogee, 900 F.2d 1489 (10th Cir. 1990), and Howard v. Waide, 534 F.3d 1227 (10th Cir. 2008), do not yield fair notice of a constitutional violation in this case. . . . The out-of-circuit authorities cited by Ms. Contreras fare little better. . . . In sum, no authorities clearly establish a constitutional violation under these circumstances.")

Contreras on behalf of A.L. v. Doña Ana County Bd. of County Commissioners, 965 F.3d 1114, 1122-23 (10th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1382 (2021) (Carson, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("Make no mistake. We expect corrections officers to protect those under their supervision—especially children. The officers here—more attuned to a television show than the juveniles in their charge—allowed violent inmates to brutally assault A.L. I find their failure to protect A.L. inexcusable. But 42 U.S.C. § 1983 provides no remedy to Plaintiff for unprofessional or negligent conduct. Instead, Plaintiff may only recover against the officers if they violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . . I would not reach the constitutional question because, even if the officers violated A.L's constitutional rights, those rights were not clearly established. When our body of caselaw contains no case with remarkably similar facts, we look to a 'sliding scale' analysis to determine whether clearly established law prohibited an officer's conduct. . . Under the sliding scale, the worse the conduct given prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior caselaw to clearly establish the violation. . .Some recent decisions suggest the sliding scale approach may conflict with current Supreme Court authority, but no case has overruled it. . . .With no case overruling it, the sliding-scale approach lives in this Circuit. But that said, we must apply it cautiously as contemporary Supreme Court cases require an ever-increasing level of factual similarity for prior decisions to place a statutory or constitutional question beyond debate. . . . I view this case as exceedingly close on both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis. Ultimately, however, I conclude the precedents from this Circuit and the Supreme Court do not place the constitutional question beyond debate (even considering the sliding scale approach). Plaintiff's claims must therefore fail against the individual officers. So I join Chief Judge Tymkovich's opinion as far as it addresses the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis. Because I would not reach the constitutional question, I join neither Judge Baldock's nor Judge Tymkovich's well-presented analysis of that issue.")

Contreras on behalf of A.L. v. Doña Ana County Bd. of County Commissioners, 965 F.3d 1114, 1125, 1134-37 (10th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1382 (2021) (Baldock, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part) ("Corrections officers cannot absolutely guarantee the safety of those in their care. Nor does the Constitution sweep so broadly as to require every cell in a detention center to always remain locked for the protection of its guests. But after violent threats have been made by a group of particularly violent detainees, any reasonable official cognizant of his duty to protect would know that the failure to secure the control panel while a would-be assailant is outside his cell is objectively unreasonable. . . . Because Sergeant Luna's conduct was plainly incompetent, qualified immunity should afford him no shelter. . . . Given Sergeant Luna's knowledge of past incidents involving the control panel and the particular risk A.H. posed outside his cell—combined with all the other material facts in the record—Luna's mental state at the time of the attack is within the province of a jury, not this Court. For these reasons, I would conclude Plaintiff has carried her burden of demonstrating Sergeant Luna was deliberately indifferent to A.L.'s safety and violated his constitutional right to protection from violence. . . .This brings me to the second part of our qualified-immunity analysis. My colleagues conclude that Sergeant Luna is entitled to qualified immunity even if he violated the Constitution because A.L.'s asserted constitutional right was not clearly established at the time of the violation. Respectfully, I remain unpersuaded. . . . In every case, we first look for a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point to determine whether the legal rule under which a plaintiff seeks to hold a defendant liable is clearly established. . . Absent any such decision, we consider whether the clearly established weight of authority from our sister circuits holds the rule to be as the plaintiff maintains. . . Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court, however, has ever required 'the very action in question' to have 'previously been held unlawful.'. . .To be sure, prior decisions involving similar facts provide strong support for a conclusion that the law was clearly established. This is why, in most cases, 'like' decisions are necessary before we reach such a conclusion. They are not necessary in every case, however, because the Supreme Court has told us that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning' to reasonable persons. . . . While 'like cases' undoubtedly bear upon 'fair notice,' the relevant standard in ascertaining 'clearly established law' is the latter, not the former. The qualified-immunity standard simply does not call for a 'single level of [rule] specificity sufficient in every instance.' . . Rather, the precedent on which a court relies to conclude the law was clearly established need only 'be clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply.'. . Throughout the development of the 'clearly established law' standard, the Supreme Court has stressed that the specificity of the rule is especially important in Fourth Amendment cases. . . The concerns associated with defining clearly established law 'at a high level of generality' is most salient in the Fourth Amendment context due to the imprecise nature of the relevant legal standards and how such standards apply in rapidly evolving circumstances. . . This is particularly true in excessive force cases because 'officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.'. . Because every § 1983 case does not sit at one end of a spectrum or the other, we have recognized, based on what the Supreme Court has told us, that the degree of specificity required from prior caselaw depends on the character of the challenged conduct. . . .My colleagues' reservations about our sliding-scale approach comes as no surprise given the Supreme Court's recent qualified-immunity decisions. The Court's slew of per curiam reversals in the past five years—nearly all of which concern the use of excessive force—appears to have most circuit courts tiptoeing around qualified immunity's clearly established prong. But as Judge Carson recognizes: 'With no case overruling it, the sliding-scale approach lives in this Circuit.' . . Until either this Court or the Supreme Court sounds the death knell for our sliding-scale approach, we are bound to apply it rather than merely pay lip service to it. . .With this understanding of the applicable standard in mind, let's consider whether Sergeant Luna is entitled to qualified immunity. Four decades ago, this Court held that the Constitution imposes a duty on corrections officers to take reasonable measures to protect inmates under their charge from violence at the hands of other inmates. . . Then in Farmer, decided in 1994, the Supreme Court clarified the contours of this rule, holding that a breach of this duty violates the Constitution where a corrections officer 'knows that inmates face a substantial risk of serious harm and disregards that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it.'. . [T]he rule under which Plaintiff seeks to hold Sergeant Luna liable is just this: When a detention center officer knows a detainee faces a substantial risk of serious harm from another detainee yet fails to employ reasonable available measures to lessen the risk, the officer breaches his or her constitutional duty to protect the vulnerable detainee. But the fact a constitutional duty to protect arises in the face of an officer's knowledge does not mean it is necessarily clear in every case, or even most cases, what reasonable measures consist of or, in other words, what such duty to protect specifically requires of the officer. . . The salient question here is whether this rule was sufficiently specific in the factual context of this case to give Sergeant Luna fair warning that his failure to secure the control panel could give rise to constitutional liability. . . [court lays out facts of this case] What Sergeant Luna effectively contests is whether a reasonable corrections officer under these circumstances would have understood the state of the law on the morning of the attack required him to ensure the control panel was locked. The constitutional question here is beyond 'beyond debate.'. . . Put differently, this rule is sufficiently specific to have put Sergeant Luna on notice that his failure to ensure the control panel was secure violated A.L.'s constitutional right to protection from violence at the hands of J.V., J.S., and A.H. Because any reasonable corrections officer in Sergeant Luna's position would have known his conduct violated A.L.'s asserted right, Luna should not be entitled to qualified immunity.") Kapinski v. City of Albuquerque, 964 F.3d 900, 904-07, 910 (10th Cir. 2020) ("Qualified immunity is intended to give officials 'breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments.'. . It creates a framework intended to provide defendants with an ability to end suits early in litigation so that they, as public employees, may continue to go about their official business without the persistent threat of defending themselves in court. . . .Consistent with Hunter, our precedents confirm that where a § 1983 claim premises liability on an alleged Franks violation, courts may decide the probable cause question at the summary judgment stage. . . And indeed, they may do so without first characterizing ambiguous omitted material in plaintiff's favor. . . Thus, we decline Kapinski's invitation to treat his characterization of the video as the omitted material. Instead, the more appropriate approach is to simply assume that Detective Juarez included the video footage with all of its uncertainties and ambiguities as an attachment to the warrant affidavit. Viewing the amended warrant application in this way, we conclude that it supports probable cause for Kapinski's arrest and prosecution. . . . Kapinski argues the clearly established prong is satisfied by alleging 'critical information' was omitted from Detective Juarez's affidavit. . . Under this theory, the criticality of the omitted information need not be proven by reference to precedent; it is enough that the alleged omissions are the type of information that 'any reasonable person would have known ... was the kind of thing the judge would wish to know.'. . But this standard finds no support in our precedent, and its application fails to comport with the notion that 'qualified immunity protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . As we said in Harte v. Board of Commissioners, alleged reckless omissions in warrant affidavits require courts to examine existing law with a high degree of specificity. . . And, importantly, a critical distinction exists between deliberate falsehoods and reckless omissions when assessing whether a putative Franks violation is clearly established. . . Where intentional misstatements are concerned, our precedent clearly establishes that lying in a warrant affidavit is unconstitutional. . . Because there is 'little ambiguity as to what kind of conduct constitutes lying,' this general principle suffices to place the question beyond constitutional debate and put reasonable law enforcement officers on notice, even in the absence of factually analogous precedent. . . But where reckless omissions are alleged, significant ambiguity exists around how the law applies to a particular factual situation. . . That is, 'when determining whether an officer has recklessly disregarded the truth in a warrant application, the result depends very much on the facts of each case.'. . Thus, similar to excessive force claims, the context-dependent nature of Kapinski's reckless omission claim necessitates a factually analogous precedent to overcome the clearly established prong of qualified immunity. . .Kapinski fails to put forward any such precedent. Harte provides no support because there we held that only a theory of liability premised on an intentional misrepresentation in a warrant affidavit was clearly established.")

Corona v. Aguilar, 959 F.3d 1278, 1284-86 (10th Cir. 2020) ("As a general matter, this court's precedent does permit a police officer to 'ask for identification from passengers' in a lawfully stopped vehicle even when there is no particularized suspicion the passenger has engaged in or is engaging in criminal activity. . . The question before us, however, is not whether Defendant Aguilar violated the Fourth Amendment by asking Plaintiff to provide his ID. Defendant Aguilar's initial request for ID may have been lawful, but he could not—in the absence of 'reasonable suspicion of some predicate, underlying crime'—lawfully arrest Plaintiff for concealing identity based solely on his failure or refusal to identify himself. . . . In sum, the facts known to Defendant Aguilar when he demanded identification were insufficient to give rise to a particularized and objective basis for suspecting Plaintiff had committed any offense or was engaging in criminal activity. Without reasonable suspicion to believe Plaintiff had violated N.M. Stat. Ann. § 30–22–1(D) or committed some other predicate, underlying crime, Defendant Aguilar lacked probable cause to arrest Plaintiff for concealing identity. . . Thus, Plaintiff has carried his burden of showing Defendant Aguilar violated his Fourth Amendment right to be free from unlawful arrest. . . .Having concluded Plaintiff has satisfied the first step of our qualified-immunity inquiry, we must now consider whether Plaintiff's asserted Fourth Amendment right was clearly established on August 3, 2014, when Defendant Aguilar effected the challenged warrantless arrest. In concluding Plaintiff carried his burden of demonstrating the law was clearly established at the relevant time, the district court relied on our decision in Keylon v. City of Albuquerque, 535 F.3d 1210 (10th Cir. 2008). On appeal, Plaintiff likewise argues Keylon would have put a reasonable officer in Defendant Aguilar's position on adequate notice his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. We agree. . . .The circumstances at issue in Keylon are closely analogous to those at issue here. Keylon considered the same interplay between N.M. Stat. Ann. §§ 30–22–3 and 30–22–1(D) in the context of a § 1983 claim alleging unlawful arrest in violation of the Fourth Amendment. And in Keylon, this court determined materially similar conduct—that is, conduct involving neither physical resistance nor fighting words—neither constituted 'resisting, evading, or obstructing' law enforcement nor could justify a warrantless arrest for concealing identity. Keylon thus places the constitutional question regarding the illegality of Defendant Aguilar's conduct 'beyond debate.'")

Kalbaugh v. Jones, 807 F. App'x 826, ___ (10th Cir. 2020) ("Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, a reasonable jury could conclude that Defendants continued to beat Plaintiff after he was effectively subdued. And under the Graham factors this would be a violation of his constitutional rights. Although Plaintiff's crimes were significant (he had led officers on a high-speed chase, he had weapons on his person, and he ran from arresting officers), under his version of events — that he was trying to lie down with his hands out to show he was not resisting—he did not 'pose[ ] an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others[.]' . . Defendants are free to argue to a jury that Plaintiff was not subdued, but this disputed issue of material fact precludes summary judgment. Having concluded that Plaintiff established a constitutional violation, 'we next address whether—at the time of the events of this case—it was clearly established that [Defendants'] actions constituted excessive force.'. . .We have held that an officer violated clearly established law by shooting the victim after the officer had 'enough time to recognize and react to the changed circumstances and cease firing his gun.'. . Thus, 'it is clearly established that officers may not continue to use force against a suspect who is effectively subdued.'. . 'Force justified at the beginning of an encounter is not justified even seconds later, if the justification for the initial force has been eliminated.'. . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Defendants violated clearly established law if they continued beating Plaintiff after it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that he had been effectively subdued. We reverse the district court's order granting qualified immunity to Defendants on Plaintiff's excessive-force claim and remand for further proceedings.")

Estate of Smart by Smart v. City of Wichita, 951 F.3d 1161, 1170-77 (10th Cir. 2020) ("We . . . must assume for purposes of summary judgment that Mr. Smart was unarmed. . . Importantly, however, the assumption that Mr. Smart was unarmed does not resolve whether the officers violated his constitutional rights. The salient question is whether the officers' mistaken perceptions that Mr. Smart was the shooter were reasonable. . . .[B]ecause we assume for purposes of summary judgment that Mr. Smart was not the active shooter, the relevant question here is whether the officers acted reasonably in light of the mistaken perception that Mr. Smart was the active shooter. Several pieces of evidence, when construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, cast some doubt on the reasonableness of the officers' belief that Mr. Smart was an active shooter. . . . Considering all the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the jury could conclude that the officers unreasonably concluded that Mr. Smart was the active shooter. That is, the jury could conclude that the officers violated Mr. Smart's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. . . . The state of the law on March 10, 2012, did not provide fair warning to Officers Froese and Chaffee that it was unconstitutional for them to open fire on a fleeing person they (perhaps unreasonably) believed was armed in what they believed to be an active shooter situation. On this prong of the analysis, we assume that Mr. Smart was unarmed, and that Officers Froese and Chaffee were unreasonable to think otherwise. We nevertheless conclude that their decision to open fire on Mr. Smart did not violate clearly established law. . . .It is true that Zuchel and King both involve police shooting a suspect they mistakenly believed to be armed and dangerous. But neither provides meaningful guidance here. Unlike the officers in those cases, Officers Froese and Chaffee saw a suspect brandishing and firing a gun—although they may have been mistaken in identifying that suspect as Mr. Smart. And these events transpired in a large, chaotic crowd of potential victims. Thus, although Zuchel and King establish that officers can violate clearly established law by acting on a grossly mistaken belief that a suspect poses a deadly threat, neither case—nor any other Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court case our research has uncovered—would have given fair notice to officers deciding whether to engage a perceived active shooter in a crowded area. . . .The dissent cites several cases it argues 'clearly establish the unlawfulness of shooting a person who does not present a reasonable threat to the safety of officers or the public.'. . But none of these cases offers meaningful guidance to officers engaging a suspected active shooter because none of them involves the need to neutralize a hostile gunman surrounded by potential victims. . . .In summary, there is evidence from which the jury could conclude that the officers were mistaken in their belief that Mr. Smart was the active shooter. And there is also evidence from which the jury could conclude, with the benefit of hindsight, their mistake was not reasonable. But there is no clearly established law that establishes, under the unique facts presented during an active shooter situation, that the officers should have been on notice their actions were unconstitutional. . . . Construing the facts in favor of the plaintiffs, . . . we credit Officer Froese's testimony on this point and assume neither officer warned Mr. Smart before opening fire. Even so, no clearly established law required such a warning in this situation. . . . We have not previously had occasion to address whether officers must give a verbal warning before engaging a suspect in a situation involving, as this one did, an active shooter in a crowded public place. . . But other courts have not required such a warning when officers are faced with rapidly evolving circumstances involving deadly threats. . . . Because no relevant authority required the officers to give a warning under these circumstances, even assuming the officers failed to warn Mr. Smart before opening fire, we cannot conclude their failure to do so violated clearly established law. . . . Finally, the plaintiffs argue a reasonable jury could find that Officer Chaffee violated clearly established law by shooting Mr. Smart after it became clear he posed no threat. We agree and therefore reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment on this point with respect to Officer Chaffee. . . .[A] reasonable jury could conclude that Officer Chaffee violated Mr. Smart's right to be free from excessive force by firing the final shots at Mr. Smart after Officer Chaffee had had 'enough time ... to recognize and react to' the fact that Mr. Smart no longer posed a threat (if in fact he ever did pose a threat). . . Turning now to the second prong of qualified immunity, 'it is ... clearly established that officers may not continue to use force against a suspect who is effectively subdued.'. . . [T]he evidence here, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, would also allow a reasonable jury to conclude that Officer Chaffee should have reacted to the changed circumstances and stopped shooting. Because this version of events would involve a violation of clearly established law, the district court erred in granting summary judgment as to Officer Chaffee's final shots.") Estate of Smart by Smart v. City of Wichita, 951 F.3d 1161, 1178-85 (10th Cir. 2020) (Bacharach, J., dissenting) ("Mr. Marquez Smart, a young black man, was fatally shot five times in the back by Officers Froese and Chaffee. Under the plaintiffs' version of events, Mr. Smart was unarmed and nonthreatening as he was being chased. The district court nonetheless granted summary judgment to Officers Froese and Chaffee based on qualified immunity, holding that the Constitution did not clearly prohibit

• them from shooting an unarmed and nonthreatening man or • Officer Chaffee from shooting the man as he was lying face down on the street.

The majority reverses the second holding, but this reversal does not go far enough. The Constitution clearly prohibited both officers from shooting an unarmed individual posing no threat to anyone. I would thus reverse the grant of summary judgment to Officers Froese and Chaffee as to their use of deadly force during the chase. . . .Viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the evidence shows that Officers Froese and Chaffee used deadly force without a reasonable basis to believe that Mr. Smart had a gun or posed a danger to anyone. The district court and the majority thus properly acknowledge that the plaintiffs' version of events would entail a constitutional violation. But I would go further and regard this constitutional violation as clearly established. . . . The majority frames the issue based on the reasonableness of the officers' conduct rather than its egregiousness. Framing the issue this way, the majority twice acknowledges that a factfinder could justifiably determine that the officers had acted unreasonably in identifying Mr. Smart as the shooter. . . It's true that factual mistakes, as well as legal mistakes, may entitle an officer to qualified immunity. . . But the officers' alleged factual mistakes do not entitle them to summary judgment based on qualified immunity because a factfinder could appropriately conclude that those mistakes had been unreasonable. . . .Officers Froese and Chaffee repeatedly fired at Mr. Smart as they chased him, guns ablazing, with hundreds of innocent bystanders fleeing up and down the street. Given the rapidly moving crowd, a factfinder could reasonably conclude that the officers had unreasonably jeopardized not only Mr. Smart but also the hundreds of others. As they scurried in darkness, a misplaced gunshot could have killed someone else in the crowd. . . . Indeed, Officers Froese and Chaffee shot not only Mr. Smart but also four others (Darel Lucas, Rashayla Hamilton, Latyra James, and Tationa Nolen). . . .The majority acknowledges that a factfinder could regard the officers' mistakes as unreasonable. The majority nonetheless concludes that the plaintiffs failed to identify a precedent involving an active shooter. I respectfully disagree with the majority's reasoning and conclusion. Qualified immunity does not protect officers when the underlying 'right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the [officer's] shoes would have understood that he was violating it.'. . In my view, any reasonable official would have understood the illegality of unreasonably shooting a person who is unarmed, nonthreatening, and running away. The illegality is apparent from three precedents . . . .When read together, Garner, Carr, and Walker clearly establish the unlawfulness of shooting a person who does not present a reasonable threat to the safety of officers or the public. In all three cases, the officers shot someone who was neither wielding a gun nor threatening anyone's safety.

And Carr specifically noted that the violation was clearly established when the suspect had been shot multiple times, with all bullets entering the back of the body. . . Viewed favorably to the plaintiffs, the evidence shows that Officers Froese and Chaffee shot an unarmed man in the back multiple times even though he was unarmed and non-threatening. A reasonable officer would have known that this conduct violated a clearly established right under Garner, Carr, and Walker. Given these precedents, the sound of gunshots would not have caused reasonable police officers to think that they could unreasonably identify someone in the crowd as the shooter, chase him, and repeatedly fire at him in darkness as hundreds of others fled. The majority distinguishes Garner, Carr, and Walker, reasoning that they did not involve an active shooter. But the label 'active shooter' is problematic. An 'active shooter' is 'an individual [who] is actively engaged in killing or attempting to kill people with a firearm in a confined, populated area.'. . This definition arguably did not fit the situation when the officers opened fire on Mr. Smart. Officer Froese had thought that there were three shots; Officer Chaffee had thought that he heard four or five shots. But a factfinder could reasonably infer that once the gunshots began, the only gunshots had come from the officers rather than someone in the crowd. . . Given the reasonableness of this inference, the factfinder could justifiably find that the unknown shooter was no longer 'active' by the start of the chase. Irrespective of the label 'active shooter,' the majority concedes that a factfinder could justifiably find that the officers had unreasonably decided that Mr. Smart had a gun and that he had been the shooter. Given these concessions, how could reasonable police officers believe that the Constitution would permit them to fatally shoot someone without a reasonable belief that he had a gun, that he had been the shooter, or that he had done anything wrong? In my view, Garner, Carr, and Walker clearly establish that the Constitution does not permit a police officer to shoot a defenseless suspect without a reasonable belief that he was armed, that he was dangerous, or that he had committed any crime. . . A genuine factual dispute exists on the reasonableness of the officers' factual mistakes and their conduct. Because unreasonably chasing and shooting an unarmed person violates a clearly established constitutional right, I would reverse the award of summary judgment for Officer Froese and Officer Chaffee as to the use of deadly force during the chase.") McCowan v. Morales, 945 F.3d 1276, 1286, 1289 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Officer Moralez asserts that there is no prior Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit excessive force case involving an officer driving recklessly so that he knowingly tossed about the backseat of his patrol car a handcuffed but otherwise unrestrained arrestee. Therefore, Officer Moralez contends that he was not on notice that what he did (as McCowan has alleged it) violated the Fourth Amendment. But the relevant inquiry here, as this court explained in McCoy. . . is whether there were relevant Tenth Circuit cases giving Officer Morales notice that the gratuitous use of force against a fully compliant, restrained, and non-threatening misdemeanant arrestee was unconstitutional. There certainly were. We begin by determining the salient factual components of McCowan's claim. We find six: 1) McCowan was being arrested for a non-violent misdemeanor. 2) He was handcuffed behind his back, and not restrained by any seatbelt, rendering him vulnerable because he was incapable of protecting himself from the 'rough ride' to the police station. 3) He was compliant during the arrest and posed no threat to Officer Moralez or anyone else. 4) Officer Moralez knew of McCowan's extra vulnerability because of his pre-existing shoulder injury. 5) There was no law enforcement necessity nor reason even advanced for the 'rough ride' that resulted in McCowan being slammed from side to side in the police car. 6) McCowan contemporaneously and unmistakably complained of severe pain and injury during Officer Moralez's challenged conduct. Surely, if we can find precedent holding an officer liable where most of these salient facts are present, we can conclude that there was factually relevant precedent that put Officer Moralez on notice of the unconstitutionality of his behavior. Further, if we can find cases holding an officer was not entitled to qualified immunity on a lesser subset of these salient factors, then a fortiori those cases too should have advised Officer Moralez of the illegality of his behavior. Using that framework, we consider four Tenth Circuit cases applying the Supreme Court's Graham decision that McCowan argues reasonably should have advised Officer Moralez of the unconstitutionality of his behavior. . . . Based on these three cases—Weigel, Casey, and Dixon—this court determined in McCoy that it was clearly established in 2011—four years before the incident at issue in our case—that 'the Fourth Amendment prohibits the use of force without legitimate justification, as when a subject poses no threat or has been subdued." . . McCoy went on to note that 'Dixon and Casey involved' the use of excessive force—'beating, choking, and tasering'—in violation of the Fourth Amendment against 'plaintiffs who were not suspected of serious crimes, posed little to no threat, and put up little to no resistance.'. . Officer Moralez, then, was surely on notice in August 2015, when he arrested McCowan, that his gratuitous application of force to McCowan, a fully subdued, compliant and non-threatening misdemeanant arrestee, violated the Fourth Amendment. We, therefore, uphold the district court's decision to deny Officer Moralez qualified immunity from McCowan's excessive force claim based on the 'rough ride' he took in the back of Officer Moralez's patrol car.")

Bailey v. Twomey, 791 F. App'x 724, ___ (10th Cir. 2019) ("[T]he district court noted that Bailey failed to cite a case in which this court or the Supreme Court has held that the Fourth Amendment bars an officer from 'grabbing [an individual's] wrist and knocking [him or] her down after feeling [the individual] touch [the officer] from behind during the course of overseeing a tense domestic matter.'. . . In asserting she could satisfy the clearly-established-law requirement without first identifying 'a fact-specific[,] analogous case,' Bailey cites Casey v. City of Federal Heights, 509 F.3d 1278 (10th Cir. 2007), and Morris v. Noe, 672 F.3d 1185, 1197 (10th Cir. 2012). . . But Morris does not endorse the type of generalized approach to the clearly-established-law inquiry that Bailey asks us to apply here. Instead, as we recently explained, 'Morris constitutes an unremarkable, case-specific application of our view that "[t]he more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation."'. . In other words, Morris and Casey demonstrate that under certain circumstances, a plaintiff may be able to show the law is clearly established by identifying a previous case that is somewhat less 'particularized' to the facts of his or her case. . . But these cases do not negate the particularity requirement entirely. . . Likewise, although the Supreme Court has recognized that Graham's 'general rules' could potentially 'create clearly established law [in] an "obvious case,"' we have declined to apply this obvious-case exception in cases involving more egregious uses of force than the one at issue here. . . .In sum, this is not the type of 'obvious case' in which Graham's 'general rules' could potentially 'create clearly established law.'. . And Bailey does not identify a case in which this court or the Supreme Court has held that an officer acting under circumstances similar to those present here violated the Fourth Amendment. Nor does she demonstrate that 'the clearly established weight of authority from other courts shows 'the law to be as' Bailey 'maintains.'. . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's order dismissing Bailey's excessive-force claim on qualified immunity grounds.")

Crittenden v. City of Tahlequah, 786 F. App'x 795, ___ (10th Cir. 2019) ("Given the lack of symmetry between the facts at issue here and the facts in Estate of Booker, that decision did not put the individual officers on notice their actions ((1) failing to provide medical treatment or first aid to an individual with a gunshot wound to the head and (2) deciding to clear a chaotic and potentially dangerous scene before allowing EMS access) would violate the Constitution. . . .Ultimately, whether officers have a duty to provide medical care in circumstances like those in the instant case remains an open question in this circuit post-Meeks. Given the lack of citations to relevant authorities in the Estate's brief on appeal, it appears the question remains open in other circuits as well. Certainly, the highly contextual decision in Estate of Booker does not resolve these open questions one way or the other. Because the Estate has failed to carry its heavy burden of demonstrating the existence of clearly established law, the district court correctly concluded the individual officers were entitled to qualified immunity.") Singh v. Cordle, 936 F.3d 1022, 1034-36 (10th Cir. 2019) ("In our view, Provost Cordle was entitled to qualified immunity at the second step of Garcetti/Pickering. Under the facts that he could reasonably believe, the law was not clearly established that Plaintiff's binder constituted speech on a matter of public concern. 'Whether an employee's speech addresses a matter of public concern must be determined by the content, form, and context of a given statement, as revealed by the whole record.'. . Because Plaintiff's binder asserted that SLIM was a discriminatory workplace, at least some of it satisfied the content requirement. . . .It is not enough, however, that the public interest was part of the employee's motivation. In several cases we have described the relevant legal question as whether the employee's primary purpose was to raise a matter of public concern. . . . Provost Cordle is entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable administrator could have believed that Plaintiff was motivated primarily by personal grievance. This belief may have been wrong, but so long as the error was reasonable, he is immune. . . . As the district court explained, Plaintiff obtained help from an ombudsman and submitted the binder for the purpose of challenging the recommendations of Dean Alexander and the FPC that he not be reappointed. The opening sentence of the binder states that Plaintiff is filing a complaint against members of the FPC 'because of their unjust recommendation for my termination.'. . And the great bulk of the materials in the binder—such as reference letters and evaluations—are included to rebut the FPC's reasons for recommending his nonrenewal. Even the section of the binder about discrimination advanced Plaintiff's primary mission of convincing Cordle to reappoint him by discrediting the motives of his detractors. In short, (1) Cordle reasonably could have believed that Plaintiff's primary motive in submitting his binder was a personal grievance and (2) in light of our precedents it was not contrary to clearly established law to punish Plaintiff for such speech, even though the binder also addressed an issue of public concern. We conclude that Cordle is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Choate v. Huff, 773 F. App'x 484, ___ (10th Cir. 2019) ("Plaintiff does not identify a single case in which comparable conduct was found to constitute a constitutional violation. She cites to a case holding that law enforcement officers could be found liable for failing to intervene in other officers' use of excessive force. See Estate of Booker, 745 F.3d at 422. That case, however, involved an ongoing assault that lasted over the course of some minutes, during which time the non-participatory officers could have intervened to prevent or stop the assault. . . Plaintiff cites to no cases in which an officer was held liable for another officer's use of force where this use of force was sudden, unannounced, and short in duration. . . . Plaintiff has not identified any cases holding that an officer violates an individual's constitutional right to be free from excessive force simply by failing to restrain her or to engage in the dialogue that a defense expert, with the benefit of hindsight, believes might have prevented another officer's subsequent unannounced use of force. As Plaintiff has not satisfied her 'burden of identifying cases that constitute clearly established law on these facts,'. . . Officer Breneman is entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's claim of excessive force against him.")

A.N. by & through Ponder v. Syling, 928 F.3d 1191, 1196-99 (10th Cir. 2019) ("The district court held Plaintiffs sufficiently stated an equal protection claim because they alleged Defendants, intentionally and without a rational basis, differentiated between similarly situated juvenile arrestees, A.N. and other sixteen-and seventeen-year-old arrestees and arrestees younger than sixteen, in deciding whether to publicly disclose information regarding their arrest and delinquency even though New Mexico law prohibits the disclosure of such information for all children under the age of eighteen. . . Defendants did not dispute that this alleged conduct violated Plaintiffs' constitutional right to equal protection in their motion to dismiss or challenge the district court's ruling on this issue in its opening brief. . . Instead, Defendants contend only that it was not clearly established when they publicly disclosed A.N.'s confidential information in violation of New Mexico law that doing so would violate Plaintiffs' equal protection rights. We turn to that issue now. . . .Defendants' argument relies on the Supreme Court's decisions in Mullenix v. Luna and White v. Pauly, which they read as mandating that a constitutional right is only clearly established if there is 'a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit opinion finding a constitutional violation on facts similar to those alleged in the complaint.'. . Defendants base this reading on the Supreme Court's reiteration in Mullenix and Pauly that courts should not define clearly established law 'at a high level of generality' and should ensure that clearly established law is 'particularized to the facts of the case.'. . But Defendants ignore that the Court tempered this direction in Pauly by also acknowledging that clearly established general rules of law can provide notice of the unlawfulness of an official's conduct in appropriate circumstances. More specifically, the Court recognized in Pauly, as it has in decisions before and after it, that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning to officers' that their conduct violates a constitutional right, and that such statements provide the required notice when 'the unlawfulness' of their conduct is 'apparent' from the pre-existing law. . . In other words, '[g]eneral statements of the law can clearly establish a right for qualified immunity purposes if they apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . And this is so 'even though the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful.'. . We agree with the district court that the clearly established rule prohibiting intentional, arbitrary and unequal treatment of similarly situated individuals under the law applies with obvious clarity to Defendants' alleged actions and policy of discriminating between A.N. and other sixteen- and seventeen-year-old juvenile arrestees and younger juvenile arrestees in complying with New Mexico's laws prohibiting the public disclosure of juvenile arrest and delinquency information. This rule is not too general to define clearly established law because 'the unlawfulness' of Defendants' conduct 'follow[s] immediately from the conclusion' that this general rule exists and is clearly established. . . As a result, Defendants violated Plaintiffs' clearly established right to equal protection by their alleged actions. . . Furthermore, our conclusion that Plaintiffs' equal protection rights were clearly established is consistent with the purpose underlying the Supreme Court's statement of the 'clearly established law' standard in Mullenix and Pauly. As the Court explained in Pauly, the requirement that clearly established law be 'particularized to the facts of the case' is intended to prevent plaintiffs from 'convert[ing] the rule of qualified immunity into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.'. . This concern is particularly acute in Fourth Amendment cases, such as Mullenix and Pauly, because of the 'imprecise nature' of the relevant legal standards and the fact-intensive assessment required to determine whether a violation occurred. . . In contrast, the clearly established standard for determining whether an official has violated a plaintiff's right to equal protection under the law is not extremely abstract or imprecise under the facts alleged here, but rather is relatively straightforward and not difficult to apply. Stated differently, this general rule is sufficiently specific to have put Defendants on notice in this case that they would violate A.N.'s right to equal protection under the law if they intentionally and without a rational basis differentiated between her and similarly situated juvenile arrestees in applying New Mexico's laws against the disclosure of juvenile arrest and delinquency records. As a result, 'any reasonable official in [Defendants'] shoes would have understood that he was violating' Plaintiffs' equal protection rights . . . by these actions.") Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155, 1161-66 & n.3 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Even one who has been properly searched or seized by police authorities (say, arrested on probable cause), can claim that the search or seizure was unreasonable because of unreasonable treatment by officers in effecting the search or seizure. Typically, the mistreatment has been the use of excessive force; but 'the interests protected by the Fourth Amendment are not confined to the right to be secure against physical harm; they include liberty, property and privacy interests—a person's sense of security and individual dignity.' Holland ex rel. Overdorff v. Harrington, 268 F.3d 1179, 1195 (10th Cir. 2001) . . . . Bell and Blackmon are not entirely clear about whether a pretrial detainee could sustain a due-process claim for mistreatment without showing that the custodians intended their actions as punishment. Both opinions could be read as requiring an intent to punish the pretrial detainee although allowing such intent to be inferred from the absence of a legitimate purpose behind the offensive conduct. . . But the Supreme Court in Kingsley eliminated any ambiguity. Reviewing a claim of excessive force brought by a pretrial detainee, the Court declined to read Bell as meaning

'that proof of intent (or motive) to punish is required for a pretrial detainee to prevail on a claim that his due process rights were violated.'. . Rather, a pretrial detainee can establish a due-process violation by 'providing only objective evidence that the challenged governmental action is not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or that it is excessive in relation to that purpose.'[3] [fn3: The dissent argues that the proper approach to Fourteenth Amendment claims against executive action would be to determine whether the action shocks the conscience. Kingsley, however, is to the contrary for claims relating to the treatment of pretrial detainees.] In particular, there is no subjective element of an excessive-force claim brought by a pretrial detainee. . . . In our view, any reasonable adult in our society would understand that the involuntary exposure of an adult's nude body is a significant imposition on the victim. And law-enforcement officers in this circuit have been taught this lesson repeatedly. . . . All we need to take from these cases is a conclusion that was obvious without them: exposing a person's naked body involuntarily is a severe invasion of personal privacy. The conclusion that Defendants' alleged conduct constituted a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment readily follows. The only issue is whether the exposure of Plaintiff's body was 'not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or [was] excessive in relation to that purpose.'. . In our view, the facts alleged in the Complaint satisfy this condition. . . . We agree with the district court. It is common sense that acquiring some replacement clothing at a hospital would be at most a matter of minutes, and we can reasonably infer from the long delay in transporting Plaintiff that Defendants' actions were not based on a medical need so pressing that they could not spare a little time to obtain a dignified covering. . . . There remains the question whether Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. Was the law clearly established that their conduct (as alleged by Plaintiff) violated the Fourteenth Amendment? Ordinarily the answer is no unless there is precedent of the Supreme Court or of this court declaring that there would be a violation under closely similar facts. Fortunately, however, not every constitutional violation has factual antecedents. We can occasionally rely on the general proposition that it would be 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted ... even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . We must be careful not to do so when there are any relevant ambiguities, such as whether physical force is justified for a particular purpose or in a particular context, see Aldaba v. Pickens, 844 F.3d 870, 879 (10th Cir. 2016) (use of taser to subdue person needing medical care), or whether force used constituted deadly force, see Thomson v. Salt Lake County, 584 F.3d 1304, 1315–17 (10th Cir. 2009) (whether use of police dog constituted deadly force); Wilson v. City of Lafayette, 510 F. App'x 775, 778 (10th Cir. 2013) (Gorsuch, J.) (whether tasing amounted to use of deadly force). Here, however, there are no relevant ambiguities regarding the manner in which Defendants allegedly took Plaintiff from the police vehicle to his hospital room. The Fourteenth Amendment is violated if a pretrial detainee is subjected to 'a restriction or condition ... not reasonably related to a legitimate goal.' Bell, 441 U.S. at 539, 99 S.Ct. 1861; see Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2473–74. To be sure, some restrictions or conditions may be too insignificant to be the predicate for a Fourteenth Amendment violation. But common sense tells us that parading someone nude in public is not so insignificant, and the above-referenced Fourth Amendment jurisprudence makes the point crystal clear. . . . Bell in itself sufficed as clearly established law in that context. There is little subtlety in a standard requiring merely a rational relationship to a legitimate objective. In our view, Bell suffices here as well, particularly given the additional precedential authority of Blackmon. On one possible aspect of Plaintiff's claim, however, we do not think Defendants' actions were governed by clearly established law. To the extent that Plaintiff claims that his constitutional rights were violated by being chained in the hospital bed to which he was taken, we dismiss the claim as barred by qualified immunity. Given Plaintiff's status as one facing criminal charges, and the apparent risk he posed to himself, there was certainly a legitimate purpose for the constraints. Also, his nude body was presumably then exposed only to his hospital caregivers, who could best determine what, if any, garb or covering was appropriate for his treatment and care. Given the much more limited nature of Plaintiff's exposure, the legitimate reasons for the restraint, and the change in caretaker upon Plaintiff's delivery to the room, it is not obvious that Defendants denied him due process in the manner that they left him in the hospital bed.") Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155, 1166-71 & n.3 (10th Cir. 2019) (Tymkovich, C.J., dissenting) ("This case presents a classic variation on the theme that 'bad facts make bad law.' The experiences alleged by Mr. Colbruno, if inflicted with malice, would trouble anyone. If, on the other hand, deputies sought only to make the best of a bad situation in obtaining emergency medical care for him, few would be alarmed. In my view, Mr. Colbruno has not adequately alleged malicious conduct. Applying the appropriate legal framework under the Fourteenth Amendment, the deputies should therefore be entitled to qualified immunity. As the majority explains, Mr. Colbruno must allege some violation of a clearly established constitutional right. But the complaint fails to allege facts sufficient to state a claim for substantive due process under the Fourteenth Amendment, let alone one that was clearly established at the time of the events in question. . . . Mr. Colbruno alleges the deputies moved him from the ambulance bay to his hospital room without clothing or otherwise covering his body. This contention supports an inference of indifference or callousness, but no more. Mr. Colbruno does not allege any intent to humiliate or punish lay behind this decision. Nor does he contend the deputies prolonged his exposure to potential onlookers, either through needless delay or circuitous travel through the hospital. Nor, lastly, does he allege that anyone beyond hospital personnel witnessed any of these events. All of which presumably transpired within seconds. In short, as the complaint now stands, we know the deputies were responding to a medical emergency; we know Mr. Colbruno—after ingesting metal objects in the midst of a pyschotic episode—had soiled himself while in transit from pretrial detention to the hospital; and we know the deputies decided to rush him into the emergency room, unclothed. We do not know why they made the decisions they did; we do not know whether a suitable gown was readily available; and we do not know whether time was really of the essence. Perhaps further investigation prior to filing this lawsuit would have shed light upon some of these missing facts. Taken together, the answers to the questions could very well allow for a permissible inference of conscience-shocking conduct. . . But in the absence of such additional factual context, I would conclude the complaint fails to allege the requisite inference of malice that is necessary to conclude the deputies might have engaged in conduct that shocks the conscience. In sum, Mr. Colbruno has not adequately alleged a violation of his constitutional rights to substantive due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . .Given the limitations of the complaint, the majority acknowledges difficulty in identifying which constitutional provision should entitle Mr. Colbruno to relief. He alleged violations of both his Fourth Amendment right to be free of unreasonable searches and his Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily integrity. The district court, in turn, accepted the Fourth Amendment rationale and did not conduct an independent analysis of the Fourteenth Amendment claim. But because Mr. Colbruno was neither searched nor seized in any conventional sense, it is obvious—as explained above—that any relief must stem from the Fourteenth Amendment's protections against official misconduct; and not the Fourth Amendment's familiar assurances against unreasonable search or seizure. The majority understandably turns to a line of cases involving the rights of pre-trial detainees. Relying upon Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 535, 99 S.Ct. 1861, 60 L.Ed.2d 447 (1979), and Kingsley v. Hendrickson, —— U.S. ——, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015),[3] [fn.3: Because Kingsley was decided after the events alleged in the complaint, Bell remains the applicable Supreme Court precedent. Kingsley likewise addressed the state-of-mind requirement for an excessive-force claim brought under the Fourteenth Amendment. Because the complaint does not allege excessive force, the relevance of Kingsley—beyond its restatement of the general principles articulated in Bell—is not obvious.] . . . [T]he majority concludes '[a] detainee may not be punished prior to an adjudication of guilt in accordance with due process of law.'. . In Bell, the Supreme Court explained that—when a person is confined while awaiting trial—the government must respect the presumption of his innocence. Accordingly, only those restraints against liberty that advance legitimate institutional interests will be constitutionally permissible. But 'if a restriction or condition is not reasonably related to a legitimate goal—if it is arbitrary or purposeless—a court permissibly may infer that the purpose of the governmental action is punishment that may not constitutionally be inflicted upon detainees qua detainees.'. .The majority also points to a case not briefed by either party to apply the principles outlined in Bell. Relying on Blackmon v. Sutton, 734 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2013), the majority concludes Mr. Colbruno's treatment as detailed in his complaint was tantamount to punishment. . . .No matter how we analyze his claims, Mr. Colbruno has failed to allege the violation of a clearly established constitutional right. The Supreme Court has explained that '[a] clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Although we need not 'require a case directly on point,' it is nonetheless the case that 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . . The violation proposed by the majority—of a right to be free from 'a restriction or condition ... not reasonably related to a legitimate goal'. . . is far too broad. While I am certainly sympathetic to the privacy interests asserted by Mr. Colbruno, no precedential case has clearly established a constitutional violation at the appropriate level of specificity under the facts alleged here. To avoid this conclusion, the majority asserts the deputies' violation of Mr. Colbruno's rights was so obvious that we need not point to a closely aligned case. It is, of course, correct that some 'constitutional violation[s] may be so obvious that similar conduct seldom arises in our cases,' such that 'it would be remarkable if the most obviously unconstitutional conduct should be the most immune from liability only because it is so flagrantly unlawful that few dare attempt.'. . But this exception is exceedingly narrow, as we must effectively conclude 'our precedents render the legality of the conduct undebatable.'. . In its effort to clear this hurdle, the majority again looks to Blackmon. But the circumstances depicted there could not credibly alert the deputies of misconduct, absent some punitive intent. Whereas punishment sat at the center of the dispute in Blackmon, Mr. Colbruno has not alleged facts that would suggest the deputies intended to punish him; or, for that matter, any other state of mind that would meet the constitutional standard for egregiousness. And whereas at least one official in Blackmon engaged in repeated, systematic, and gratuitous misconduct, Mr. Colbruno details what would be—at most—a single discrete incident that lasted only for a matter of moments. In sum, absent plausible allegations of intentional and abusive misconduct, clearly-established law could not have alerted the deputies they were violating Mr. Colbruno's right to substantive due process. As troubling as these allegations—if true—would be, the complaint fails to tie the invasion of Mr. Colbruno's privacy to the constitutional requirement for intent.")

Crall v. Wilson, 769 F. App'x 573, ___ (10th Cir. 2019) ("It is not clearly established that entering a third party's residence to execute a valid arrest warrant against an individual 'temporarily staying' in the residence violates the third party's Fourth Amendment rights. It is clear that if the subject of an arrest warrant is merely a guest in a home, law enforcement may not enter without a search warrant or exigent circumstances. . . However, if the subject of the arrest warrant lives in the residence, law enforcement may enter to execute a valid arrest warrant without a search warrant or exigent circumstances. . . The facts alleged by Crall fall somewhere between these poles. . . . Crall has not come forward with case law clearly establishing that Thompson should have been treated as a guest rather than a resident. He does not provide any Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit authority addressing entry into an individual's residence where the subject of a valid arrest warrant is also temporarily staying. And his conclusory allegation that police knew or should have known Thompson did not live in the trailer does not overcome the fact that his amended complaint alleges Wilson knew Thompson was 'temporarily staying' in the trailer. . . .Crall fails to identify any precedent considering a similar fact pattern. Instead, he relies exclusively on the Graham factors, arguing this is such an 'obvious case' that the general standard clearly establishes that Wilson's conduct was unlawful. . . Wilson could have reasonably believed that use of a police dog was permissible. Our court has held in other circumstances that the use of police dogs does not constitute excessive force. . . And in this case, officers announced their presence in the home and Wilson loudly announced that he would deploy the dog if the occupant of the bedroom did not emerge. Officers could not see what the individual in the bedroom was doing, but had reason to think a person was in the room refusing to exit. We therefore reject Crall's argument that this presents an obvious case of excessive force.")

Ellison v. Ladner, No. 18-3080, 2019 WL 1502301 (10th Cir. Apr. 4, 2019) (not reported) ("The Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause protects individuals from governmental deprivations of liberty 'without due process of law.'. . As a matter of procedure, due process requires 'the opportunity to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner.'. . The Kansas Supreme Court concluded, as a matter of first impression in Kansas, that the lengthy delay in bringing Ellison to trial in the civil-commitment proceeding violated his procedural-due-process rights. In reaching this decision, the Kansas Supreme Court did not identify a single Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case finding a procedural due process violation in the civil-commitment context, and the cases it did identify—from two states and the Ninth Circuit—do not clearly establish the due process violation Ellison asserts. . .On appeal, Ellison admits he cannot point to a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case where a state attorney denied due process to a KSVPA detainee, but he argues that he need show only that his right to the KSVPA's procedural protections was clearly established. Ellison misunderstands the particularity with which the right must be established. . . He must identify a case where a government official acting under similar circumstances was held to have violated the Fourteenth Amendment. . . In other words, Ellison must identify a Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court case in which a state attorney in a civil commitment proceeding was held to have violated procedural due process for her role in prolonged detention without trial after a probable cause determination. He has, admittedly, not done this.")

Butler v. Board of County Commissioners for San Miguel County, 920 F.3d 651, 665-69 (10th Cir. 2019), reh'g en banc denied, 924 F.3d 1326 (10th Cir. 2019) (Lucero, J., dissenting) ("I would hold that Butler's testimony was on a matter of public concern. Further, I would hold that Butler's First Amendment right to testify in a child custody proceeding without suffering employer retaliation was clearly established. Lane explained that the form and context of ... speech—sworn testimony in a judicial proceeding—fortify th[e] conclusion' that such speech is a matter of public concern. . . Moreover, the Colorado General Assembly's pronouncements on the importance of child welfare in divorce proceedings render obvious the fact that child custody disputes are matters of public concern. . . .The majority does not cite a single case from this circuit in which sworn testimony in judicial proceedings is so personal in nature as to overwhelm the strong presumption, created by both the form and context of the speech, towards treating such speech as involving matters of public concern. . . .Finally, I would also hold that Butler's constitutional right to testify in child custody judicial proceedings without incurring employer retaliation was clearly established. Generally, '[f]or a right to be clearly established there must be Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court precedent close enough on point.'. . But 'in an obvious case' more general 'standards can clearly establish the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'. . In the vernacular, if the constitutional violation is plain, it is unnecessary to resort to such granular detail as to require another case involving a 'purple cow.'. . Butler's claims present such an obvious case. Accordingly, the general standards articulated by the Supreme Court in Lane clearly establish Butler's First Amendment right to testify in a judicial proceeding free from employer retaliation. In Lane, the Court expressly held that speech proffered as testimony in a judicial proceeding 'fortif[ies]' the conclusion that such speech raises a matter of public concern. . . This Supreme Court pronouncement clearly establishes a strong presumption that truthful testimony is not a purely private matter. And in light of Colorado's explicit statements of policy that child custody presents a matter of public concern, . . . it should be clear to any reasonable official that testimony in child custody proceedings does not overcome that presumption.")

Board of County Commissioners for San Miguel County, 924 F.3d 1326, 1326-28, 1330 (10th Cir. 2019) (Lucero, J., joined by Briscoe, Phillips, and McHugh, JJ., dissenting from the denial of en banc rehearing) ("The proposition that the custody of a child does not ultimately involve a matter of public concern is untenable, particularly so given the statutes and precedents of the state of Colorado, which expressly and dispositively announce the public policy of the state as being directly to the contrary. The further proposition that local governments may sanction employees for testifying on such matters in the public courts and tribunals of this circuit is a dangerous and highly corrosive precedent—the adversary system depends on free and open adjudication in which parties have a right to call witnesses to testify on their behalf and witnesses, be they public or private employees, have the right and duty to testify when called in the open courts of our circuit. The precedent announced by this panel, which allows local governments to interfere with both the rights of litigants and witnesses and in which the local government has no concern, must not be allowed to stand. There is an existing circuit split on the extent to which the constitution protects sworn testimony in judicial proceedings. To date, the Court has elected to resolve the issue by its 2014 decision in Lane v. Franks, 573 U.S. 228, 134 S.Ct. 2369, 189 L.Ed.2d 312 (2014). That case mandates that 'the form and context of the speech—sworn testimony in a judicial proceeding—fortify th[e] conclusion' that such speech involves 'matters of significant public concern.'. . Lane protects such speech. The panel acknowledges that holding in Lane, but concludes that the child custody proceedings at issue were not 'of interest or concern to the community at large.'. . In other words, the panel concludes that the content of Butler's speech in child custody proceedings is so personal in nature as to overwhelm the presumption that such speech raises a matter of public concern. . . I respectfully, but most assuredly, dissent from the unwillingness of my en banc colleagues to correct this error. . . . Our sibling circuits, the Third and the Fifth, have adopted an absolute rule that the First Amendment protects all testimony in judicial proceedings as raising a matter of public concern. See Green v. Philadelphia Hous. Auth., 105 F.3d 882, 887 (3d Cir. 1997); Johnston v. Harris Cty. Flood Control Dist., 869 F.2d 1565, 1578 (5th Cir. 1989). Even those circuits that reject the per se rule recognize the powerful presumption towards treating sworn testimony in a judicial proceeding as raising a matter of public concern. [noting cases from Second and Seventh Circuits] The panel opinion places our circuit at odds with this vast body of caselaw, granting neither absolute protection nor even the presumption of protection for sworn and truthful testimony in judicial proceedings. . . . Despite Colorado's numerous express statements to the contrary, the panel nonetheless concludes the strong presumption towards treating testimony in a judicial proceeding as a matter of public concern is overcome in the context of character testimony in a child custody proceeding. The holding in this case renders hollow not only the First Amendment's protections for well over one hundred thousand public employees in our circuit, but also the right to call and confront witnesses and fundamental principles of due process. These constitutional protections are the bedrock upon which the sanctity of the judiciary rests.")

Estate of Ceballos v. Husk, 919 F.3d 1204, 1215-20 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Here, Ceballos is able 'to identify a [prior] case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as Officer [Husk] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . That case is Allen v. Muskogee, 119 F.3d 837, 839-41 (10th Cir. 1997). . . . The circumstances at issue in Allen are closely analogous to those at issue here. Officer Husk shot and killed an emotionally distraught Ceballos within a minute of arriving on scene. Under the Estate's version of the facts—which Husk accepts as true for purposes of this appeal—Husk approached Ceballos quickly, screaming at Ceballos to drop the bat and refusing to give ground as Ceballos approached the officers. In fact, the circumstances in Allen actually provide stronger justification for the police shooting at issue there. Allen was armed with a weapon—a gun—capable of harming someone from a much greater distance and with greater lethal potential than Ceballos's baseball bat (or at worst, his pocket knife). Further, unlike this case where there were no members of the public in the area when officers approached Ceballos, in Allen, the officers had to tell bystanders to get back as officers approached Allen's car. In Allen, then, there was arguably a more compelling reason for officers to take precipitous action and ultimately to use fatal force than is presented in our case. Nevertheless, the Tenth Circuit held in Allen that the officers were not entitled to summary judgment on the issue of whether they violated Allen's constitutional rights. That case, then, was sufficient, a fortiori, to put Officer Husk on notice that his actions (as we must accept them here) violated Ceballos's Fourth Amendment rights. Our conclusion, that Allen put Husk on notice that his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment, is bolstered by Tenth Circuit cases decided both before and after Allen. . . . Neither Sevier, decided on jurisdictional grounds, nor the unpublished decision in Hastings, by themselves created the clearly established law that would have put an objective officer in Husk's position that his conduct in approaching and shooting Ceballos was unconstitutional. . . But Sevier and Hastings strengthen our conclusion that, in light of Allen, a reasonable officer in Husk's position would have known that his conduct (viewed in the light most favorable to Ceballos) violated his Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . . The facts here, as we must accept them, made clear that the responding officers knew Ceballos's capacity to reason was diminished, whatever the underlying reason might have been—mental health problems, emotional distress, drunkenness, or drugs. The dispatcher described Ceballos to the responding officers as 'acting crazy,' drunk, and possibly on drugs. . . When officers arrived, they saw Ceballos pacing in his driveway, swinging a bat and yelling at no one in particular. Ceballos's two companions had told the officers that 'Ceballos was not acting right and might be on drugs.'. . One of the responding officers recognized that Ceballos 'didn't seem right.'. . In light of all that, a jury might reasonably find that an objective officer in Husk's position should have recognized that as well and would have taken those facts into account before provoking a fatal encounter. These facts are sufficient for Allen to provide clearly established guidance to an objective officer in Husk's position. . . .[T]he mere possibility that Ceballos might have presented a threat to the general public, had he left his driveway, does not weigh heavily on Officer Husk's side. . . . We conclude, then, that this court's decision in Allen adequately notified Officer Husk that his conduct in confronting Ceballos (as we accept the facts here) violated the Fourth Amendment. We, therefore, affirm the district court's decision to deny Officer Husk qualified immunity. . . . At pages —— – ——, the dissent addresses a possible argument to defeat qualified immunity that was not raised by the plaintiff—that the officer's conduct was so obviously unconstitutional that it is not necessary for the plaintiff to show clearly established existing law prohibiting such conduct. Although we agree that argument is a potential ground for defeating qualified immunity, . . . we do not address this argument because the plaintiff did not assert it. . . . Here, the legal right at issue is clear—that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment when his or her reckless or deliberate conduct results in the need for lethal force or when the officers rely on lethal force unreasonably as a first resort in confronting an irrational suspect who is armed only with a weapon of short-range lethality and who has been confined on his own property. Allen clearly established that constitutional right. . . .For all of these reasons, we respectfully disagree with the dissent's analytical framework and the conclusion the dissent reaches. Instead, we conclude, based on the facts as they are presented to us here on this interlocutory appeal, that the Tenth Circuit decision in Allen would have put a reasonable officer on notice that the reckless manner in which Husk approached Ceballos and his precipitous resort to lethal force violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law.")

Estate of Ceballos v. Husk, 919 F.3d 1204, 1227-32 (10th Cir. 2019) (Bacharach J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("For the sake of argument, we can assume that Officer Husk recklessly or intentionally created the need to use deadly force. Even with this assumption, Officer Husk would enjoy qualified immunity for his conduct leading to the use of force unless his conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right. The plaintiffs rely on three opinions to show that Officer Husk violated a clearly established constitutional right: Hastings v. Barnes, 252 F. App'x 197 (10th Cir. 2007) (unpublished), Sevier v. City of Lawrence, 60 F.3d 695 (10th Cir. 1995), and Allen v. Muskogee, Okla., 119 F.3d 837 (10th Cir. 1997). . . . Although some similarities exist between Allen and our case, the conduct in the two cases was substantially different. As in Allen, the officer here was called to respond to a report of a disturbed man with a weapon outside a home. Unlike the suspect in Allen, however, Mr. Ceballos was mobile and over 100 yards away from the officers, presenting an opportunity to flee or enter another home in the neighborhood. And when Mr. Ceballos entered the garage, disappearing from view, the officers might reasonably have thought that he was retrieving a gun or other weapon. . . These possibilities were absent in Allen. As Mr. Ceballos's disturbance continued, it diverged further from the situation discussed in Allen. There the suspect was sitting in a car and made no threatening gestures until the officers initiated physical contact. . . Here, however, it was Mr. Ceballos who initiated the showdown with police officers. After swinging a baseball bat, he walked directly toward the officers, disobeying commands and openly challenging the officers with his bat in hand. Perhaps if Allen were read broadly, the factual differences between Allen and our case could be considered immaterial. But a competent officer, making a split-second decision about how to respond to a suspect, could reasonably have interpreted Allen more narrowly and viewed the factual differences as material. . . .As in Apodaca, the governing precedent (Allen) can be read broadly or narrowly. We have distinguished Allen four times in cases upholding qualified immunity after police shootings. [citing cases] Given these five opinions and similar factual distinctions between our own case and Allen, Officer Husk's use of force did not reflect plain incompetence or a knowing violation of the law. . . So his decision to confront Mr. Ceballos did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. . . . The Supreme Court addressed similar facts in Kisela v. Hughes[.] There a police officer shot a suspect who had reportedly acted erratically and was carrying a kitchen knife about six feet away from her roommate amid a heated disagreement. . . The Supreme Court held that the police officer was entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Here, as in Kisela, the police officer had only seconds to assess the risk. In Kisela, as here, the suspect had a weapon other than a gun. And in both cases, the suspects ignored police commands to drop the weapon. These circumstances led the Supreme Court in Kisela to conclude that a reasonable police officer could have perceived an immediate threat.")

Cummings v. Dean, 913 F.3d 1227, 1239-45 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Here, our analysis focuses on the clearly-established-law prong, and we conclude that Plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate that Director Dean violated their clearly-established rights; consequently, Director Dean prevails on his qualified-immunity defense. Because we need not do so, we do not reach the first prong of the qualified-immunity standard—that is, whether Director Dean's conduct in failing to set prevailing rates actually violated Plaintiffs' substantive due-process rights. . . . [T]he Court has 'repeatedly told [lower] courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . '[D]oing so avoids the crucial question [of] whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.'. . . In this connection, it bears underscoring that the federal right allegedly violated must have been 'clearly established at the time of the defendant's unlawful conduct.'. . .In furthering the protective aims of qualified immunity, it is important that courts be especially sensitive to the need to ensure 'a substantial correspondence between the conduct in question and prior law allegedly establishing that the defendant's actions were clearly prohibited,' . . . where the legal standards of liability under the prior law are broad and general or depend on a balancing of discrete and sometimes opposing interests. . . . The legal standard governing liability under the rubric of substantive due process evinces these attributes. Specifically, the standard for liability for a violation of a person's substantive due-process rights is broad and general. . . . Furthermore and relatedly, consideration of whether a person's substantive due-process rights have been infringed 'requires a "balancing [of the person's constitutionally protected] interests against the relevant state interests."'. . .Thus, in our assessment here of whether Director Dean's conduct violated Plaintiffs' clearly-established substantive due-process rights, we must be especially sensitive to whether existing relevant precedents at the time he acted 'squarely govern[ed],'. . . 'the particular circumstances that he ... faced,'. . . and demonstrated that the 'violative nature of the particular conduct is clearly established.'. . .Neither the district court nor Plaintiffs have identified any case from the Supreme Court or this court finding a defendant liable under federal law in factually similar circumstances, i.e., where a public official in the same or similar position as Director Dean was held liable under federal law for failing to set rates for wages and fringe benefits (or for similar items) in apparent contravention of state law that required him to do so. Given that Plaintiffs bear the burden of presenting such a case to overcome qualified immunity, . . . this failure proves fatal to their position. . . . Because Plaintiffs have offered no authority clearly establishing that Director Dean violated their substantive due-process rights under federal law by failing to discharge his state-law obligation under the Act to publish CBA-based rates for wages and fringe benefits, we conclude that Director Dean is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Doe v. Woodard, 912 F.3d 1278, 1292-99 (10th Cir. 2019), cert. denied sub nom. I.B. v. Woodard, 139 S. Ct. 2616 (2019) ("We . . . have not established whether the special needs doctrine permits a social worker to search a child, such as by removing clothing and/or taking photographs, to investigate a report of suspected abuse. . . .Other circuits have split on whether a social worker's examination of a child upon suspicion of abuse requires a warrant or qualifies for the special needs doctrine. [collecting cases] We limit our qualified immunity analysis, as the district court did, to whether the Does can satisfy the second prong of qualified immunity—that is, whether they can show that any Fourth Amendment violation was based on clearly established law. . . .The Does have not cited a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision specifically holding that a social worker must obtain a warrant to search a child at school for evidence of reported abuse. Instead, they argue that (a) only a warrant could have justified the search of I.B. because the special needs doctrine did not apply, or (b) even if the special needs doctrine did apply, Defendants' conduct violated the Fourth Amendment reasonableness standards for a special needs search. The Does have not met their burden of showing clearly established law on either ground. . . .Based on our previous review of the case law and discussion below, we conclude that neither the Supreme Court nor this court had previously decided that the special needs exception does not apply to warrantless social worker searches for suspected child abuse. Nor was the weight of authority from other circuits clearly established. We therefore hold that, when the search occurred in this case, there was no clearly established law that a warrant was required. . . . Four circuits have rejected the special needs doctrine as an exception to the warrant requirement and two have approved it for searches like the one here. This does not amount to a 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts,'. . . such that this 'statutory or constitutional question [is] beyond debate.'. . .We have shown that in December 2014 the law did not clearly establish that a warrant was required to justify Ms. Woodard's search. This is so because the law did not clearly establish that Ms. Woodard could not rely on the special needs exception to justify the search. . .Despite appearing to agree with the foregoing, the dissent contends the search violated clearly established Fourth Amendment requirements even assuming the special needs doctrine applied. We disagree for two related reasons—(1) the cases it relies on are factually distinguishable from this case, and (2) Supreme Court precedent calls for factually similar cases to constitute clearly established law. We respond to the dissent to address whether it was clearly established that the special needs doctrine's reasonableness standards were not met in this case. . . . Neither Safford or Dubbs served to clearly establish that Ms. Woodard's search of I.B. was not reasonably related in scope to the circumstances—suspected child abuse. The dissent correctly states that the searches in all three cases involved the children's 'intimate areas,' but the purpose and circumstances of the search for suspected child abuse in this case differed too much for Dubbs and Safford to have guided Ms. Woodard with clearly established law. Unlike the dissent, therefore, we do not see how a reasonable social worker in Ms. Woodard's position would, based on these cases, know that her search of I.B. violated the requirements for the special needs exception or the basic protections of the Fourth Amendment. . . . As we have shown, the facts in this case differ markedly from the facts in the cases the dissent attempts to use for clearly established law. Second, the dissent's reliance on these cases runs counter to the Supreme Court's repeated instruction that 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality but 'must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . The Court has stressed that the rule's high 'degree of specificity' is 'especially important in the Fourth Amendment context.'. . The dissent contends that the clearly established 'particular rule' in December 2014. . . was that a search 'needed to be "justified at its inception and reasonably related in scope to the circumstances that justified the interference in the first place[.]"' . . But this minimal Fourth Amendment standard applies to all searches. It is not particularized to the facts of this case. The dissent therefore attempts 'to define clearly established law at a high degree of generality' contrary to the Supreme Court's instruction. . . Even if Dubbs and Safford offer plausible authority to support a special needs Fourth Amendment violation here, whether they supply clearly established law is at most debatable, and to be clearly established, '"existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate."' . . . To the extent the Does attempt to argue that this is the rare alleged violation of minimal Fourth Amendment standards that is so 'obvious' that a factually similar case is unnecessary for the clearly established law standard, . . . this argument fails. '[T]his is not an obvious case where a body of relevant case law is not needed.'. .In summary, the Does have not shown that Ms. Woodard's search violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law. We affirm the district court's conclusion that the Defendants, including supervisors, were entitled to qualified immunity and that the Fourth Amendment claims should be dismissed.")

Doe v. Woodard, 912 F.3d 1278, 1302, 1305 (10th Cir. 2019), cert. denied sub nom. I.B. v. Woodard, 139 S. Ct. 2616 (2019) (Briscoe, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part) ("I agree with the majority that it is not clearly established that a social worker investigating an allegation of child abuse must obtain a warrant before searching a child. But, as the majority acknowledges, uncertainty about whether Ms. Woodard was required to obtain a warrant does not fully dispose of I.B.'s Fourth Amendment claim. . . '[T]he Does could still attempt to show that Ms. Woodard's search failed to meet clearly established minimal Fourth Amendment reasonableness standards applicable to special needs searches.'. . The majority concludes that the Does have not made this showing because the law is not clearly established; in the majority's view, the cases applying the special needs exception to a search of the intimate areas of a child's body are too factually dissimilar from Ms. Woodard's search of I.B. . . I disagree. Even assuming the special needs exception applied, it was clearly established in December 2014 that Ms. Woodard's search of I.B.'s intimate areas—a search that Ms. Woodard conducted without parental consent or a specific suspicion that evidence of abuse would be found—was unconstitutional. Any reasonable person would have known, based on Dubbs v. Head Start, Inc., 336 F.3d 1194 (10th Cir. 2003), cert. denied, 540 U.S. 1179, 124 S.Ct. 1411, 158 L.Ed.2d 79 (2004), and Safford Unified Sch. Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 129 S.Ct. 2633, 174 L.Ed.2d 354 (2009), that Ms. Woodard's search violated the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, I would reverse the district court's dismissal of the Does' Fourth Amendment claims against April Woodard, Christina Newbill, Shirley Rhodus, and Richard Bengtsson in their individual capacities, and remand for further proceedings. . . . The legal principle controlling the constitutionality of Ms. Woodard's search of I.B. is clearly established because Dubbs and Safford are 'particularized to the facts of [this] case.'. . Both cases analyze the search of the intimate areas of a child's body under the special needs exception, which is the issue presented here. In both cases, the searches were justified by the state's interest in child welfare—identifying physical and developmental impediments' in Dubbs. . . and preventing students from distributing medications in Safford. Both searches were conducted by multiple adults, on school property, without parental notification, consent, or presence. In both Dubbs and Safford, the searches violated the Fourth Amendment. This 'precedent [is] clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the [Does] seek[ ] to apply,'. . . namely that Ms. Woodard's search needed to be 'justified at its inception and reasonably related in scope to the circumstances that justified the interference in the first place[.]'. . Given their factual similarities to the search at issue here, Dubbs and Safford 'obviously resolve whether the circumstances ... confronted' by Ms. Woodard satisfied the special needs exception. . .The majority concludes that the searches at issue in Dubbs and Safford are too dissimilar from Ms. Woodard's search of I.B. for Dubbs and Safford to be clearly established law. . . I do not think that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity based on the factual differences between Dubbs, Safford, and Woodard's search of I.B. '[T]here does not have to be "a case directly on point[;]" existing precedent must [have] place[d] the lawfulness of the particular [action] "beyond debate."'. . At the very least, Safford clearly established the legal principle that, under the special needs exception, a government official's search of a child's body must be 'reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place.'")

Leiser v. Moore, 903 F.3d 1137, 1139-45 (10th Cir. 2018) ("We express no view on whether Plaintiff's constitutional rights were violated. We can resolve this appeal by considering only the clearly-established prong of the qualified-immunity defense. . . . In two published opinions this circuit has held that government disclosure of an individual's personal medical information violated the Constitution. . . . Plaintiff quite reasonably argues that these two precedents from our circuit, as well as a few similar decisions by other circuits, clearly establish the law supporting his constitutional claim in this case. But we are not persuaded. One reason is that there are factual differences between the precedential cases and the one before us. When our precedents were decided, the stigma of HIV was enormous. . . .A diagnosis of cancer is not nearly as opprobrious as a diagnosis of HIV was then. A further distinction is that the disclosure in this case had a plausible positive purpose—to encourage the support of family and friends—as opposed to the hostile purposes in our precedents. . . .The second reason is the difference in governing law: the development—or, perhaps more precisely, the clarification—of the relevant constitutional law by the Supreme Court in the interval between our precedents and this case. As we proceed to explain, our precedents relied on a reasonable misreading of two Supreme Court opinions as establishing a right to informational privacy. More recently, however, the Supreme Court has made clear that the existence of such a right is an open question and it has not abandoned a third precedent which suggests that any right to informational privacy is limited. . . . [I]n recent years the Supreme Court has significantly elaborated on the applicable law, raising serious doubts about the assumptions of governing law on which we relied in our precedents on the disclosure of private medical information. . . . [I]t can no longer be said in the context of government disclosure of information that '[t]here is no dispute that confidential medical information is entitled to constitutional privacy protection.'. . The Supreme Court has stated that this is an open question—it has never held that there is a constitutional right to prevent government disclosure of private information. This is not to say that our precedents on this issue are incorrect or that they have been overruled. That is a matter we need not decide on this appeal. The question before us is only whether the law is clearly established that government disclosure to family and friends that a prisoner is suffering from cancer violates the prisoner's constitutional rights. Even if we assume that the disclosures in A.L.A. and Herring were unconstitutional, it is certainly unclear how far those opinions should be extended when we do not know the doctrinal boundaries of the protection against government disclosure. . . . We cannot say that it is clearly established that this court, in light of NASA 's characterization of Whalen and Nixon as expressing only dicta, would reject the kind of distinction between diseases that the Second Circuit expressed in Matson. In short, in our view clearly established law does not support Plaintiff's constitutional claim.")

Grissom v. Roberts, 902 F.3d 1162, 1170-72 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Where Grissom fails is in not providing clearly established law to support his claim. There is a great hurdle in his path, and he has not persuaded us that he surmounted it. That hurdle is this court's decision in his earlier challenge to his solitary confinement. In Grissom II, 524 F. App'x. 467, we affirmed the district court's summary judgment (based on its analysis of the DiMarco factors) rejecting his claim that his solitary confinement from June 2005 to the time of our decision had violated his right to due process. In particular, we held that his solitary confinement did not infringe a protected liberty interest. . . True, our prior opinion was not published precedent of this circuit. But, as explained above, even an unpublished opinion can demonstrate that the law was not clearly established at the time the opinion was issued, at least within the circuit of the court issuing the opinion, and particularly when considering qualified immunity for the same conduct impacting the same plaintiff. The question before us therefore boils down to whether something significant has happened since our opinion was filed. One matter of significance would be Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit precedent postdating our prior decision that has now clearly established law that had not been previously so established. But Grissom points to no such recent authority. Similar significance could attach to a substantial change in the facts concerning Grissom's solitary confinement between his prior appeal and this case. We therefore examine whether any of the facts relevant to the DiMarco factors are different. . . . Given Grissom's failure to point to any controlling Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit precedent that would change the established law since his prior appeal, and his failure to point to any factual changes since that appeal that would be decisive under clearly established law, we are compelled to hold that the Prison Officials are entitled to qualified immunity on his due-process claim.")

Halley v. Huckaby, 902 F.3d 1136, 1144-47, 1149-51 (10th Cir. 2018) ("If a plaintiff demonstrates the officials violated a clearly established right, we consider a third question: 'whether extraordinary circumstances—such as reliance on the advice of counsel or on a statute—so prevented the official from knowing that his or her actions were unconstitutional that he or she should not be imputed with knowledge of a clearly established right.'. .We apply this standard to J.H.'s unlawful seizure and interference with familial relationship claims in turn. . . .We first consider whether J.H. has adequately shown a constitutional violation—one of the requirements in the qualified immunity analysis. We turn next to the second question: whether the law was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . .[A]lthough there is clearly 'no "social worker" exception to the Fourth Amendment,'. . . we have not definitively decided what Fourth Amendment standard governs when social workers seize a child at school, rather than at home. In Hunt, we declined to decide precisely 'what Fourth Amendment test is most appropriate' when social workers seize a child at school. . . . Here, the officials took J.H. from school to a safe-house. They did not take J.H. from his home. As explained in Hunt, it has long been clearly established that any seizure at school without judicial authorization had to at least be reasonable under the minimal Terry reasonable-suspicion standard. In other words, the officials at least needed to have a reasonable suspicion of an imminent threat to the safety of the child. . . . It may very well constitute a best practice to interview a child at the safe-house during school hours once seizing the child is justified in the first place. Unless officials have judicial authorization, however, they cannot seize a child without at least having reasonable suspicion of imminent danger. . . . It was clearly established at the time of the seizure in this case that a social worker needs at least reasonable suspicion of abuse in order to seize a child at school. . . . This rule is sufficiently specific to constitute clearly established law placing officials on notice that the seizure here violated the Fourth Amendment. . . And even if it is a general rule of law, it applies here with obvious clarity. . . .Since the undisputed evidence at this stage supports Chief Goerke's claim that he merely relied on the DHS officials' directions, we conclude Chief Goerke is entitled to qualified immunity. Generally, '[a] police officer who acts "in reliance on what proves to be the flawed conclusions of a fellow police officer may nonetheless be entitled to qualified immunity as long as the officer's reliance was objectively reasonable."'. . And J.H. provides no cases clearly establishing that officers cannot rely on DHS officials just as much as on fellow officers. Chief Goerke thus did not violate clearly established law by relying on DHS officials' instructions without conducting his own investigation. . . .With no clearly established law to the contrary, we conclude Goerke's actions were a reasonable response to what he could have assumed to be an adequately supported child welfare investigation.")

Halley v. Huckaby, 902 F.3d 1136, 1156-58 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[As to the familial association claim,] [w]e need not decide whether the record here demonstrates a constitutional violation. Even if the officials did violate J.H.'s substantive due process rights, we conclude the right was not clearly established, and so the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. In particular, we find J.H. has not shown that reasonable officials would have known that the short seizure here would constitute an unwarranted interference with a family relationship—the second part of our test for substantive due process familial association claims. . . . As earlier explained, '[t]o determine whether the right was clearly established, we ask whether "the contours of a right are sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right."'. . In making this determination, we are mindful of two pitfalls. We can neither require too much factual similarity between an existing case and the case at hand, nor too little. There 'need not be a case precisely on point.'. . But at the same time, 'it is a "longstanding principle that clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality."'. . And while general statements of law can sometimes provide fair warning that certain conduct is unconstitutional, they only do so if they 'apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . 'General legal standards therefore rarely clearly establish rights.'. .The facts here do not meet this high bar. Even if the officials had the requisite intent—thus satisfying the first part of our test—their actions still must constitute an undue burden on J.H.'s right of familial association. We are not aware of a case from our court or the Supreme Court clearly establishing that the short seizure and interview here would unduly burden J.H.'s relationship with his family members. . . . Aside from Roska and Malik, J.H. has not pointed to any other cases that could clearly establish the right at issue here. J.H. need not provide a case with exactly the same facts, of course. But he has not provided a case with even remotely similar facts. Nor has he shown that our general statements of law in this area demonstrate the unconstitutionality of the officials' actions here with 'obvious clarity.'. . Indeed, our general rule that interference with family relationships cannot be 'unduly burdened' is too general a proposition to have clearly established the alleged violation here. The officials would not have known that taking J.H. from school for a short interview would necessarily constitute an 'undue burden' or 'unwarranted intrusion' into a family relationship. . . . Having found that 'existing precedent' did not place the 'constitutional question beyond debate,' we hold that Huckaby and Deputy Calloway are entitled to qualified immunity for the Fourteenth Amendment claims against them. . . It would not have been clear at the time that the balance between the interview's interference in J.H.'s family relationship and the officials' health and safety concerns made their actions so burdensome to the family relationship as to violate substantive due process rights.")

Rife v. Jefferson, 742 F. App'x 377, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("[A] panel of this court has already held that, based on the relevant 'universe of facts,' Jefferson, Willis, and Dale violated the Fourteenth Amendment by displaying deliberate indifference to Rife's serious medical needs. . . Thus, the lone question before us in this appeal is whether the law was clearly established at the time of that violation. . . .In determining whether the law was clearly established, we ask whether Rife has 'identif[ied] an on-point Supreme Court or published Tenth Circuit decision; alternatively, "the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as [he] maintains."' . . Of course, this isn't to say that Rife must direct us to a case that is 'exactly on point.'. . . '[B]ut existing precedent must have placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . And to do that, a previous decision must be ' "particularized" to the facts of the case' before us. . . In other words, to demonstrate the law was clearly established, Rife must identify a case in which a defendant 'acting under similar circumstances as' Jefferson, Willis, and Dale 'was held to have violated' the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments. . . Thus, our task is to examine the cases that the district court relied on below and those that Rife cites on appeal and ask whether any of those cases satisfy this test. . . . In undertaking this inquiry, we first address whether Rife has identified a case that clearly establishes Jefferson's conduct violated the Fourteenth Amendment. We then turn to the question of whether he has identified such a case vis-à-vis Willis and Dale. . . . According to Rife, 'there are obvious parallels between Garcia and the case at bar.' . . We don't necessarily disagree. But Rife overlooks a critical distinction between the two cases: Garcia involved a finding of municipal liability. . . .To the extent that Olsen, 312 F.3d 1304, also involved a finding of municipal liability, we reach the same conclusion. . . . [I]f anything, the case against Jefferson is stronger than was the plaintiff's case against the arresting officer in Olsen. Here, in addition to verbally informing Jefferson about those aspects of his condition that weren't necessarily subject to 'notice[ ] by an outsider,' Olsen, 312 F.3d at 1317—including, critically, heart and chest pain—Rife also displayed readily discernable signs that he needed medical care as the result of his motorcycle accident. . . . Thus, we conclude that at the time of the alleged constitutional violation, existing circuit precedent would have 'put a reasonable official' in Jefferson's position 'on notice that his conduct was unlawful.'. . But this conclusion doesn't necessarily resolve the clearly-established question. That's because Jefferson asserts that '[e]ven assuming' there exists 'on-point circuit precedent involving materially similar facts to this case and finding that the defendant ... violated the Constitution, this [c]ourt's other precedents are so favorable to Jefferson's position that the law would still be unclear due to apparent contradictions in the precedent.'. .In support, Jefferson cites a series of cases in which we have held that medical professionals didn't violate the Constitution by misdiagnosing prisoners. . . . Jefferson's reliance on this line of authority is misplaced. As even he acknowledges, we held in Rife I that the 'specialized' deliberate-indifference standards that apply to medical professionals don't apply to 'laypersons such as [Jefferson].'. . And although Jefferson asserts that '[t]his development was unforeseen because neither this [c]ourt nor any other court of appeals had previously made such a distinction,' he fails to identify any cases holding that a layperson may successfully assert a misdiagnosis defense to a deliberate-indifference claim. Indeed, we expressly noted the dearth of such cases in Rife I. . . Thus, contrary to Jefferson's assertions, none of the misdiagnosis cases he cites 'would have indicated to a reasonable officer' in Jefferson's position that his 'conduct did not violate the Constitution.'. . The same is true of the cases from outside our circuit that Jefferson cites in his brief. According to Jefferson, 'it is difficult to see how even an on-point circuit precedent could render the law "clearly established" if the same conduct in another circuit would be constitutional.'. . But even assuming the cases Jefferson cites suggest that other circuits might reach a different conclusion about the constitutionality of Jefferson's conduct in this case, 'the decisions of one circuit court of appeals are not binding upon another circuit.'. . Thus, to the extent that Jefferson suggests another circuit's cases can disestablish the clearly established law of this circuit, we disagree. . . And in this circuit, it has been clearly established for more than a decade that when an arrestee not only informs an arresting officer of the internal symptoms of a serious medical condition but also displays outward signs of the need for medical attention, the arresting officer violates the Fourteenth Amendment by failing to seek such care. . . Accordingly, Jefferson isn't entitled to qualified immunity, and we therefore affirm the district court's order denying his motion for summary judgment. . . . [With respect to defendants Willis and Dale] [w]hether Olsen's individual-individual liability discussion clearly establishes as much is a closer question. Like the plaintiff in Olsen, Rife verbally informed Willis and Dale of his internal discomfort: he 'repeatedly complain[ed] of stomach pain' as Willis and Dale were moving him to the holding cell. . . .Nevertheless, we cannot say that Olsen places the constitutional question here 'beyond debate.'. . Recall that when they booked him into the jail, Willis and Dale didn't know (or even have reason to suspect) that Rife had been thrown from his motorcycle, let alone that he might have suffered any internal injuries as a result. That's because when Jefferson delivered Rife to the jail for booking, 'no one mentioned the motorcycle accident or said that [Rife] might have been injured.'. . Thus, Willis and Dale knew only that Rife was suffering from stomach pain—a common malady that doesn't necessarily require any sort of immediate medical intervention. And we simply cannot say that Olsen would place every reasonable official in Willis' and Dale's position on notice that every detainee who entered the jail complaining of stomach pain (even 'considerable' stomach pain, Rife I, 854 F.3d at 652 n.58), was constitutionally entitled to immediate medical treatment for that ailment. More importantly, unlike the arresting officer in Olsen—who apparently ignored the plaintiff's condition completely—Willis placed Rife on medical observation, a designation that 'required jail personnel to check on [Rife] every [15] minutes.'. . In light of this proactive conduct, we hold that Olsen doesn't place 'beyond debate' the question of whether Willis and Dale were deliberately indifferent to Rife's serious medical needs. . . Thus, we agree with Willis and Dale: the district court erred in defining the right at issue here at too 'high [a] level of generality.'. . That is, the district court characterized the law as clearly established without first 'identify[ing] a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Willis and Dale] was held to have violated the [Eighth or Fourteenth] Amendment.'. . But that doesn't necessarily mean we must reverse. On appeal, Rife cites two additional cases in support of his assertion that Willis and Dale violated his clearly established rights: Mata, 427 F.3d 745, and Sealock, 218 F.3d 1205. Yet in arguing that Mata and Sealock would have put reasonable officials in Willis and Dale's position on notice that their conduct violated his Fourteenth Amendment rights, Rife doesn't discuss the facts of either case. Thus, he necessarily fails to demonstrate that either case is '"particularized" to the facts' present here. . . Nevertheless, we have sua sponte reviewed the facts of both cases, and we find them distinguishable. . . . In short, neither the cases the district court relied on below nor any of the cases that Rife cites on appeal clearly establish that Willis and Dale violated Rife's Fourteenth Amendment rights. . .Accordingly, because Willis and Dale are entitled to qualified immunity, we reverse the portion of the district court's order denying their motion for summary judgment.")

Bailey v. Indep. Sch. Dist. No. 69 of Canadian Cty. Oklahoma, 896 F.3d 1176, ____ (10th Cir. 2018) ("The district court concluded that McDaniel was entitled to qualified immunity because Bailey's letters did not address a matter of public concern, and therefore Bailey had not adequately stated a violation of his First Amendment rights. As discussed above, we disagree with that conclusion. However, to defeat qualified immunity, Bailey must do more than establish that McDaniel violated his constitutional rights. . . He must also show that the constitutional right at issue was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . .A general test defining the elements of a constitutional violation, such as the Garcetti/Pickering test, will not provide clearly established law in anything but 'an obvious case.'. . As described above, we hold that a sentencing decision is a matter of public concern for the purposes of the First Amendment. But this proposition was not clearly established in our circuit at the time McDaniel acted. Bailey has cited the Garcetti/Pickering test and an Eighth Circuit case with facts similar to this one. . . He also relies on the Supreme Court's decision in Cox Broad. Corp., which concerned whether a state may sanction the truthful publication of judicial records. . . These cases are insufficient to demonstrate the existence of clearly established law. In other words, they would not give a reasonable official in McDaniel's position particularized notice that his termination of Bailey for writing letters to a sentencing judge would violate Bailey's First Amendment rights. Therefore, McDaniel is protected by qualified immunity.")

Moya v. Garcia, 895 F.3d 1229, 1250-51 (10th Cir. 2018) (McHugh, J., concurring in the result in part and dissenting in part), amended opinion on denial of rehearing en banc, cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 1323 (2019) ("In my view, the complaint plausibly alleges that Sheriff Garcia, Warden Caldwell, and Warden Gallegos violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. But I recognize that conclusion is not foretold. No opinion from this court or the Supreme Court has ever clearly established that a jailer violates the Constitution by detaining an individual lawfully arrested in anticipation of an untimely scheduled arraignment. That principle of law, to be sure, is clearly established in at least two of our sister circuits, but that is not enough for the law to be clearly established here. I would thus affirm the district court's order insofar as it dismissed Plaintiffs' claims against the sheriff and wardens on the basis of qualified immunity, and so I partially concur in the majority's result. But because municipalities are not entitled to qualified immunity, I would reverse and remand to the district court for further proceedings against the County.")

N.E.L. v. Douglas County, Colorado (N.E.L. I), 740 F. App'x 920, ___ n.18 (10th Cir. 2018) ("N.E.L. and M.M.A. assert that the district court incorrectly concluded that clearly established law is proved when the plaintiff proffers case law with closely analogous facts. They contend that the appropriate test for proving clearly established law is found in Hope v Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 739–40 (2002), which they argue requires plaintiffs to proffer case law that 'only provide[s] "fair warning" that an officer's conduct would violate the constitution.'. . But as we have noted, Hope v. Pelzer appears to have fallen out of favor, yielding to a more robust qualified immunity. See Aldaba v. Pickens, 844 F.3d 870, 874 n.1 (10th Cir. 2016) (citing Mullenix, 136 S. Ct. at 308, 312 (2015)).")

Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d 1116, 1120-27 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[W]hen a defendant asserts a qualified-immunity defense at summary judgment, we require the plaintiff 'to shoulder' a heavy two-part burden to survive the defendant's assertion. . . First, '[t]he plaintiff must demonstrate on the facts alleged ... that the defendant violated his [or her] constitutional or statutory rights.'. . Second, the plaintiff must demonstrate 'that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged unlawful activity.'. Here, the district court ruled that Perry made both of these showings. Specifically, it ruled that on the facts as alleged, Perry demonstrated (1) Durborow violated her Fourteenth Amendment right as 'a female inmate to be protected from sexual assault' and (2) that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Critically, Durborow opts not to dispute the district court's ruling that he violated Perry's constitutional rights. Instead, he focuses solely on the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. That is, Durborow argues only that even assuming Perry demonstrated a constitutional violation, he is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity because, as of February 25, 2013, no 'clearly established law ... would ... have put a reasonable official in [his] position on notice that his supervisory conduct' violated Perry's constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, the only question before us in this appeal is whether the district court erred in ruling that the law was clearly established. Nevertheless, we begin by sketching the general contours of the constitutional inquiry to provide a framework for our subsequent discussion of the clearly-established analysis. . . . [T]o satisfy the first prong of the qualified-immunity test in this case, Perry had to demonstrate that Durborow personally violated her constitutional rights. . . To do that here, Perry had to 'show an "affirmative link" between' Durborow and the rape. . . And to demonstrate such an 'affirmative link,'. . . Perry had to establish '(1) personal involvement; (2) causation, and (3) state of mind[.]'. . . For the reasons discussed above, we assume that Perry successfully demonstrated Durborow personally violated her Fourteenth Amendment rights under this framework. Nevertheless, Durborow is entitled to qualified immunity unless Perry can also show that the law was clearly established at the time of the constitutional violation. . . . Critically, just as the constitutional-violation question in this case didn't turn on whether Clements violated Perry's constitutional rights by raping her, the clearly-established-law question doesn't turn on whether existing precedent would have put a reasonable detention officer in Clements' position on notice that raping Perry would violate her constitutional rights. Instead, to satisfy the second part of the qualified-immunity test in the context of Perry's supervisory-liability claim against Durborow, Perry must show that as of February 25, 2013, 'clearly established law ... would ... have put a reasonable official in [Durborow's] position on notice that his supervisory conduct would' violate Perry's constitutional rights. . . In other words, Perry must 'identify a case where an offic[ial] acting under similar circumstances as [Durborow] was held to have violated' the Constitution. In ruling that Perry made this showing, the district court first cited Durborow's knowledge that male detention officers were routinely entering the female pod in violation of the Jail's emergencies-only policy. The court then cited Durborow's knowledge that the Jail's surveillance system didn't monitor the female pod's individual cells, its showers, or its mechanical room. And the court reasoned that the existence of these known 'blind spots' allowed male detention officers who entered the female pod in violation of the Jail's emergencies-only policy to remain there for substantial periods of time 'without surveillance.'. . Taken together, the district court said, these circumstances 'gave rise to an increased risk of sexual assault of female inmates' such that 'a reasonable jury could find that Durborow was deliberately indifferent to the[ir] health and safety,' in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . And because 'it is clearly established that a prison official's deliberate indifference to sexual abuse by prison employees violates' the Constitution, the district court reasoned, Durborow wasn't entitled to qualified immunity. . . But as Durborow points out, the district court cited only two cases to support this conclusion . . . The court cited Cox for the threshold principle that a 'plaintiff must show that the constitutional right was clearly established when the conduct occurred.'. . And it cited Keith II for the general proposition that 'it is clearly established that a prison official's deliberate indifference to sexual abuse by prison employees violates the Eighth Amendment.'. . We agree with Durborow that these statements of law define the right at issue here at an unacceptably 'high level of generality.'. . . [B]efore the district court could determine the law was clearly established, it had to 'identify a case where an offic[ial] acting under similar circumstances as [Durborow] was held to have violated' the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments under a theory of supervisory liability. . . Cox is not such a case. . . .Nor is Keith II, which we decided almost four years after Perry alleges Clements raped her. . . . True, we stated in Keith II that it has been clearly established since 2007 that inmates have a constitutional right 'to be free from attack by' prison employees and 'to expect reasonable protection from [prison] officials ... and a reasonable response when sexual misconduct occur[s].'. .But in determining whether Durborow was entitled to qualified immunity, the district court should have looked to the ' "particularized" ... facts' of the cases upon which Keith II relied in reaching that conclusion, not to Keith II's 'general statements of the law.'. . Accordingly, to the extent the district court failed to tether its clearly-established analysis to the ' "particularized" ... facts' of any case decided before February 25, 2013, the district court erred. . . . On appeal, Perry cites additional cases not relied upon by the district court and argues these cases would have put a reasonable official in Durborow's position on notice that his conduct in this case violated the Constitution. . . .[I]n each of these cases [Tafoya, 516 F.3d 912, Gonzales, 403 F.3d 1179, and Lopez, 172 F.3d 756], the defendant-supervisors weren't just aware of the risk that such assaults might occur. Instead, in each of these cases, the defendants were aware that those known risks had, in fact, already previously materialized. Here, on the other hand, the district court declined to credit Perry's assertions that Durborow was aware of any previous sexual assaults at the jail as of February 25, 2013. . . .Thus, in the absence of any finding by the district court that Durborow was aware of at least one previous assault at the Jail, neither Tafoya, 516 F.3d 912, Gonzales, 403 F.3d 1179, nor Lopez, 172 F.3d 756, were sufficient to 'place[ ] the ... constitutional question' in this case 'beyond debate.'. . In reaching this conclusion, we do not mean to suggest that '[a] prior case' must have 'identical facts' before it will put reasonable officials on notice that their specific conduct is unconstitutional. . . And we recognize that there are indeed factual similarities between this case and Tafoya. In particular, the defendants in both cases were sheriffs who knew of blinds spots in their jails' video surveillance systems and also knew that male officers were violating policies designed to restrict their contact with female inmates. . . Nevertheless, the fact that Durborow was unaware of any previous sexual assaults at the Jail remains a critical distinction. And in light of this distinction, Tafoya wouldn't have 'put a reasonable official in [Durborow's] position on notice that his supervisory conduct' in this case—which amounted to knowingly allowing the Jail's male detention officers to enter the female pod in violation of policy and without adequate supervision and monitoring—violated the Constitution. . . In short, the district court erred in concluding that the law was clearly established without first 'identify[ing]' in its order 'a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Durborow] was held to have violated' the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments. . . And in the absence of a finding that Durborow was aware of any previous incidents of sexual assault at the Jail, none of the cases that Perry identifies on appeal 'place[ ] the ... constitutional question' in this case 'beyond debate' either. . . Accordingly, Durborow is entitled to qualified immunity. We therefore reverse the district court's order denying Durborow's motion for summary judgment and remand with directions to enter summary judgment in his favor.")

Stevenson v. Cordova, 733 F. App'x 939, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("Turning to Eighth Amendment case law, we have not found a Supreme Court decision or a published Tenth Circuit case that is sufficiently on point. . . Nor have other circuit court decisions addressed a correctional officer's use of a taser in sufficiently analogous circumstances such that the constitutional question is beyond debate.")

Matthews v. Bergdorf, 889 F.3d 1136, 1152-53 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Plaintiffs state a cause of action against caseworkers Feather and Schraad-Dahn under the state-created danger exception. This leaves us with the question of whether the law surrounding the state-created danger exception as applied to the alleged facts was clearly established at the time of the two caseworkers' purported malfeasance. To show the law was clearly established, 'the plaintiff does not have to show the specific action at issue had been held unlawful;' rather the alleged unlawful 'conduct must have been apparent in light of preexisting law.'. . In 2001, we held a state caseworker could be held liable under the state-created danger exception for instructing a mother to stop making abuse allegations against the children's father. . . We reasoned that by actively discouraging the mother from reporting suspected wrongdoing, the caseworker increased the children's vulnerability to their father's abuse. . .We see little distinction between the affirmative act of instructing an individual to cease reporting evidence of abuse as occurred in Currier and the affirmative act of warning an individual so that the latter might cover up evidence of abuse as alleged here. . . Both acts effectively impede access to protective services, and perhaps additional sources of assistance, otherwise available to the victims. . . After we decided Currier in 2001, the law was well established in the Tenth Circuit such that a reasonable caseworker cognizant of the law would have understood the following: A caseworker's affirmative actions allegedly designed to shield and protect the Matthews in light of repeated child abuse and neglect referrals could give rise to constitutional liability under the state-created danger exception. Thus, the district court properly denied caseworker Feather's and Schraad-Dahn's defense of qualified immunity on this particular claim. For the reasons stated, however, the district court erred in denying the remaining named caseworkers qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' state-created danger claims. . . . Today we have pronounced no new law; we have done nothing more than apply binding precedent. To allow Plaintiff's complaint to proceed on claims that have no basis in constitutional jurisprudence would thwart the aims of qualified immunity and impose excessive discovery costs on Defendants absent legal justification.")

McCoy v. Meyers, 887 F.3d 1034, 1048-54 & n.22 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Even if Mr. McCoy was, as he maintains, lying face down with his hands behind his back and with several officers pinning him, . . . a reasonable officer in the Appellees' position could conclude that he was not subdued when the allegedly excessive force occurred. Under these circumstances, the preexisting precedent would not have made it clear to every reasonable officer that striking Mr. McCoy and applying a carotid restraint on him violated his Fourth Amendment rights. The cases cited by Mr. McCoy—Dixon, Casey, and Weigel—involved force used on individuals who either did not pose a threat to begin with or were subdued and thus no longer posed any threat. . . .Based on the foregoing, Mr. McCoy has failed to show clearly established law prohibiting the Appellees' pre-restraint use of force. . . . Although Dixon, Casey, and Weigel are not factually identical to this case, they nevertheless made it clear that the use of force on effectively subdued individuals violates the Fourth Amendment. In light of those cases, it should have been obvious to the Appellees that continuing to use force on Mr. McCoy after he was rendered unconscious, handcuffed, and zip-tied was excessive. Dixon, Casey, and Weigel clearly establish that the Fourth Amendment prohibits the use of force without legitimate justification, as when a subject poses no threat or has been subdued. . . .And in light of Dixon, Casey, and Weigel, the violation in this case is not necessarily 'rare' but is 'apparent.'. . Finally, this court's later decisions, though not controlling, accord with our clearly established law determination here. . . In Perea, for example, we relied primarily on Dixon in holding that it was 'clearly established [on March 21, 2011] that officers may not continue to use force against a suspect who is effectively subdued.'. . Likewise, in Estate of Booker, we relied on Weigel, Casey, and out-of-circuit cases in holding that it was clearly established on July 8, 2010 that officers may not use force—namely, pressure on back, tasering, and neck restraint—'on a person who is not resisting and who is restrained in handcuffs.'. . .In sum, qualified immunity applies (1) to Mr. McCoy's claims based on the pre-restraint force, due to the lack of clearly established law, but (2) not to the claims based the post-restraint force, which violated Mr. McCoy's clearly established right to be free from continued force after he was effectively subdued. . . . In Casey, this court adopted a 'sliding scale' approach to clearly established law in the excessive force context. . . We have since stated that 'our sliding-scale approach may arguably conflict with recent Supreme Court precedent on qualified immunity.' Lowe v. Raemisch, 864 F.3d 1205, 1211 n.10 (10th Cir. 2017). We do not rely on the sliding scale here and thus need not decide its validity. And nothing in recent Supreme Court precedent questions our merits holding in Casey, which—along with Dixon and Weigel—should have put the Appellees on notice that the post-restraint force was excessive.")

Doe v. Hutchinson, 728 F. App'x 829, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("Hutchinson relies heavily on White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548 (2017), which stated it was 'again necessary to reiterate the longstanding principle that clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality' but instead 'particularized to the facts of the case.'. . That case reversed a decision of this court denying qualified immunity to officers because it 'failed to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [defendants] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . It held that 'general statements of the law' are not sufficient to 'create clearly established law outside an obvious case.'. .We have previously held 'the law holding that sexual harassment is actionable as an equal protection violation has long been clearly established.'. . In Sh.A., defendant was a fifth-grade teacher who repeatedly touched two boys in his class. . . We rejected the defendant's argument that he was entitled to qualified immunity because 'the contours of an equal protection claim by a student on the basis of sexual harassment by a teacher were [not] clearly established in 1997 and 1998 when the conduct at issue took place,' holding that 'a reasonable teacher would have known in the spring of 1997 that sexual harassment which gives rise to a violation of equal protection in the employment context will also do so in the teacher-on-student context.'. . Hutchinson argues that because the facts alleged in the complaint differ from those at issue in Sh.A., which involved physical touching, he is entitled to qualified immunity under Pauly. But Sh.A. did more than hold that the facts presented violated plaintiffs' equal protection rights, it clearly established the proposition that 'sexual harassment which gives rise to a violation of equal protection in the employment context will also do so in the teacher-on-student context.'. . At the time of Hutchinson's alleged conduct, we had repeatedly held in the employment context that sexual harassment was an actionable equal protection theory. . . And we had applied that rule to hostile environment claims, explaining that '[t]he law on discrimination arising from a hostile environment in the workplace is well established,' having been fleshed out by numerous decisions from the Supreme Court and this court with respect to § 1983 and Title VII. . . Accordingly, the question is not whether the facts of Sh.A. were sufficiently similar to those alleged in Doe's complaint, but whether our case law would make it clear to reasonable officials that Hutchinson's alleged conduct created a hostile environment. We have already concluded that Doe's allegations sufficiently allege a pervasively hostile environment. The law was clearly established that Hutchinson's full course of conduct may be considered, including statements that were not explicitly gender-based and those made to others of which Doe was aware. . . As was the proposition that we must consider context including 'the ages of the harasser and the victim.'. . Moreover, our hostile environment jurisprudence includes many cases not involving physical contact. . . In light of the foregoing, we conclude that any reasonable high school teacher would have understood that the conduct alleged created a hostile environment in violation of Doe's equal protection rights.")

Sandberg v. Englewood, Colorado, 727 F. App'x 950, 963 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Sandberg does not cite to any Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court case addressing whether a person who is the subject of the police action has a First Amendment right to record police activities. Rather, as with his Second Amendment argument, he urges us to look to an alleged 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts [that] found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.'. . It is true that the First, Third, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits have all held that 'the First Amendment protects the act of photographing, filming, or otherwise recording police officers conducting their official duties in public.' [collecting cases] Yet, these cases do not provide Sandberg with a clearly established weight of authority for two reasons. First, some of them post-dated the May 14, 2014 events in this case. . . Second, the cases are factually distinguishable. All of the cases Sandberg cites only involve a bystander or third party recording the police, and do not involve the person who is the subject of the police action. . . Sandberg does not point to a case in which the videographer was also the subject of the police action. As such, it was not clearly established that officers violate the First Amendment when they prevent a person who is the subject of the police action from filming the police. The district court correctly granted Johnson and Fieger qualified immunity on Sandberg's First Amendment claim.")

Knopf v. Williams, 884 F.3d 939, 946-47, 949-51 & n.10 (10th Cir. 2018) ("The following considers only the second requirement to overcome qualified immunity —whether the law was clearly established—and determines the district court erred in denying Mayor Williams summary judgment. Mr. Knopf did not meet his burden of showing that any violation of the First Amendment he may have suffered was based on clearly established law. . . .The district court's discussion of the second qualified immunity prong consisted only of the general statement that 'it is clearly established that a public employer cannot retaliate against an employee for exercising their First Amendment right to free speech.'. . Mr. Knopf relies on the district court's statement and similarly argues that at the time of his dismissal, it was clearly established that a public employer cannot retaliate against an employee for speaking on matters of public concern. . . But these are general statements of law. As the Supreme Court has cautioned, we must not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . These statements merely repeat the generic Garcetti/Pickering standard— 'the First Amendment protects a public employee's right ... to speak as a citizen addressing matters of public concern.'. . Instead, for Mr. Knopf to meet his burden, 'the clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . .The key question is whether Mayor Williams 'reasonably [could] have believed, at the time he fired [Mr. Knopf], that a government employer could fire an employee on account of" speech stemming from almost 30 years of high-level involvement with an ongoing project. . . Mr. Knopf has not shown that such a belief was unreasonable based on then-existing law. Because it would not have been 'beyond debate' to a reasonable official that Mr. Knopf's email exceeded the scope of his official duties, . . . Mayor Williams is entitled to qualified immunity on the particular facts of this case. . . . The dissent's approach to qualified immunity analysis under the first element of Garcetti/Pickering runs counter to precedent. Instead of 'identify[ing] a case where an [official was] acting under similar circumstances,'. . . the dissent 'would apply clearly established general principles derived from Supreme Court precedent—from Lane v. Franks . . . and Garcetti . . . to determine whether the government employee's speech fell outside the scope of his job duties.'. . The dissent fails to cite a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case supporting its approach. . . .The dissent's lens, which is limited to Lane and Garcetti, should widen to consider relevant 'Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision[s], or the weight of authority from other courts' in determining whether clearly established law applies to this case. . . .The dissent also suggests, again without precedent, that the first step of Garcetti/Pickering warrants different treatment than other qualified immunity cases because of its focus on the plaintiff-employee's speech as opposed to the defendant-official's conduct. . . But we rarely focus on one party's conduct in qualified immunity analysis. . . The question here, as in other contexts, considers the conduct of both parties: would a reasonable person in Mayor Williams's position have understood Mr. Knopf to have spoken outside his official duties? . . . . Based on the foregoing opinion and Judge Briscoe's concurrence, this court reverses the district court's denial of qualified immunity on Mr. Knopf's First Amendment retaliation claim. . . . Our 'sliding scale' approach to qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment excessive force cases comes closest to supporting the dissent's approach, but not nearly close enough. Under that approach, we have stated that '[t]he more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing [Fourth Amendment] constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.' Casey v. City of Fed. Heights, 509 F.3d 1278, 1284 (10th Cir. 2007). But see Lowe v. Raemisch, 864 F.3d 1205, 1211 (10th Cir. 2017) (stating that "our sliding-scale approach may arguably conflict with recent Supreme Court precedent on qualified immunity"). Here, it is far from obvious that Mr. Knopf's communication at issue occurred outside his official duties. See Concurrence at —— ("[I]t is a close question" whether "Mr. Knopf's email did not fall within the scope of his official duties as a City employee").") Knopf v. Williams, 884 F.3d 939, 951, 954-57 (10th Cir. 2018) (Briscoe, J., concurring) ("I agree with Judge Matheson that 'Knopf did not meet his burden of showing that any violation of the First Amendment he may have suffered was based on clearly established law.'. . But I also conclude, as a preliminary matter, that Knopf failed to establish that defendant Williams violated his First Amendment rights by declining to reappoint him. . . .In the end, although it is a close question, I agree with the district court that Knopf's email did not fall within the scope of his official duties as a City employee. Thus, I conclude that the district court did not err in analyzing the first step of the Garcetti/Pickering framework. . . .I conclude, contrary to the determination made by the district court, that the interests expressed by Williams and the City were significant enough to outweigh Knopf's interest in speaking to Boal. Consequently, I conclude that Knopf failed to establish that Williams violated his First Amendment rights by failing to reappoint him as City Planner. . . .In denying summary judgment in favor of Williams, the district court also concluded that Knopf established that the law applicable to his First Amendment retaliation claim was clearly established at the time that Williams decided not to reappoint him as City Planner. Judge Matheson concludes, and I agree, that the district court erred in reaching this conclusion. . . .As discussed above, it is a very close question whether, under step one of the Garcetti/Pickering framework, Knopf's email was made pursuant to his official duties or was, instead, a matter of private speech. The difficulties posed by that analysis highlight why it may not have been clearly established in late 2015 that Knopf's email constituted protected First Amendment speech, rather than simply work-related speech. Moreover, Knopf has not pointed to any case that is remotely factually similar from 2015 or before, i.e., a case in which a court held that a similar email constituted protected First Amendment speech by a public employee. . . Thus, I conclude that it was entirely reasonable for Williams to 'believe that, as a legal matter, [Knopf] w[as] speaking in [his] capacity as [an] employee[ ] of the [City]' rather than as a private citizen. . . Likewise, Knopf has not pointed to a single case that is remotely factually similar in terms of discussing whether a public employee can be terminated (or not reappointed) in response to having sent an email to another public employee regarding a matter of public concern. Thus, again, he has failed to demonstrate that it was clearly established, in late 2015 or early 2016, that it was unconstitutional for a supervisor to terminate a subordinate for having sent an email like the one that Knopf sent. In short, Knopf has failed to identify clearly established law that is 'particularized' to the facts of his case. . . That is because, as of late 2015 and early 2016, the outcome of the Pickering balancing test, as applied to the facts presented in this case, did not place 'beyond debate' the questions of whether Knopf spoke as a private citizen when he sent his email and, in turn, whether it was proper for Williams to discipline Knopf for sending the email. . . Consequently, Williams was entitled to qualified immunity from Knopf's First Amendment retaliation claim.") Knopf v. Williams, 884 F.3d 939, 957-63 & n. 3, 967 (10th Cir. 2018) (Ebel, J., dissenting) ("Plaintiff Paul Knopf claims his government boss, Evanston's Mayor Kent Williams, declined to reappoint Knopf as City planner in retaliation for Knopf engaging in speech protected by the First Amendment. I would affirm the district court's decision to deny the Mayor qualified immunity from Knopf's damages claim at the summary-judgment stage of this litigation. My conclusion is contrary to both of the other opinions in this case. I would, in particular, not require for purposes of the qualified-immunity analysis that Knopf identify factually on-point precedent that clearly established that the speech in which Knopf engaged—sending an email to the City attorney expressing concern about the possible misuse of City money in a greenway development project—fell outside the scope of Knopf's job duties as City planner, which is the first prong of the Garcetti/Pickering. . . test. This initial predicate inquiry in the five-part Garcetti/Pickering analysis that applies to Knopf's First Amendment claim turns, not on the defendant's alleged misconduct, but instead on the legal question of the precise and nuanced job duties required of Evanston's planner. There was only one Evanston planner with Knopf's job duties and responsibilities, so to require him to come up with preexisting precedent clearly establishing his job duties is not only impractical—it is in fact not possible. Requiring Knopf to come up with such precedent before he can defeat a qualified-immunity defense is to tell Knopf, and countless other government employees with unique jobs, that they have been disenfranchised from being able to assert their constitutional rights—here, First Amendment rights—against their employer. A government employee like Knopf will rarely, if ever, be able to identify a prior Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case holding that a person with his particular job title and his same accompanying duties, engaging in the same speech under similar circumstances, was acting beyond the scope of his unique job duties. Instead, I would apply clearly established general principles derived from Supreme Court precedent—from Lane v. Franks. . . and Garcetti . . . to determine whether the government employee's speech fell outside the scope of his job duties. Of course, on the other four Garcetti/Pickering inquiries, I do agree that there has to be prior factually relevant precedent to defeat qualified immunity. But I believe that requirement is satisfied here. . . .Contrary to both my colleagues in the majority opinion, I conclude that, although there must be a prior case that clearly establishes the First Amendment violation under Garcetti/Pickering's factors two through five, I would not require a prior case that clearly establishes, at the first Garcetti/Pickering inquiry, that an employee in Knopf's position would have been speaking outside the scope of his job duties when he sent an email to the City attorney, another City department head, complaining about the possible misuse of city money in a development project that the person in Knopf's position was not overseeing. . . .I conclude, as the district court did, that Knopf sufficiently established a First Amendment claim that, on the merits, was sufficient to survive the Mayor's summary-judgment motion. The qualified-immunity question, which I address next, is whether Knopf's claimed First Amendment violation was clearly established at the time the Mayor refused to reappoint Knopf City planning director. . . .Although, as just mentioned, ordinarily to defeat a qualified-immunity defense, the plaintiff must identify a case clearly establishing the unconstitutional nature of the defendant government official's challenged conduct, I would not require, as the majority does, that Knopf locate a factually on-point case clearly establishing that a city department head, like Knopf, would be acting outside the scope of his job duties, analogous to Knopf's employment responsibilities, if he sent an email to the City attorney, a co-equal city department head, complaining about the misuse of city money in a development project that the person in Knopf's position was not overseeing. The fact of the matter is that a senior government employee will rarely, if ever, be able to find such a close factually analogous prior case addressing whether a person with his same job title and responsibilities, employed by the same employer or one with a closely similar job description and employment duties and reporting responsibilities, engaging in the particular speech at issue, was acting outside the scope of his or her official or ordinary job responsibilities as those job responsibilities were both legally and factually applied to this particular plaintiff. Even if a plaintiff-employee could somehow find a prior case addressing the job responsibilities of his exact or closely comparable government position, whether speech undertaken in a particular case fell outside his job duties as applied would still turn on myriad details unique to a given case—including not only the plaintiff-employee's (1) official job duties, but also (2) the informal customs developed around the performance of those duties and (3) further nuances involving, for example, the plaintiff-employee's understanding from his supervisors of how and what exactly the plaintiff's job entails in the particular factual scenario presented. It will be virtually impossible for any plaintiff-employee to find such a closely analogous prior Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case, unless the prior case happened to involve this same plaintiff or, at the very least, involved another employee of the same government employer with a similar job description who chose a closely similar route to protest a similarly serious transgression of government law and ethics. That is just not a realistic possibility. To require the plaintiff to find such a directly analogous prior case would essentially grant all government employers qualified immunity on any employee's First Amendment claim at the first Garcetti/Pickering prong before even getting to the substance of the alleged wrongdoing. It is not surprising, then, that Knopf could not cite to any prior Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case with closely analogous facts addressing whether a government employee was acting outside the scope of his job duties. That should not be fatal to Knopf's First Amendment retaliation claim. Nor do I think such a close factually analogous case is required at this first step in the Garcetti/Pickering analysis. The usual qualified-immunity inquiry—asking whether 'at the time of the [official's] conduct, the law was sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would understand what he is doing is unlawful,'. . . focuses on the defendant government official's conduct. In contrast, the inquiry at the first step of the Garcetti/Pickering analysis focuses instead on whether the plaintiff-employee's speech fell within that employee's job duties. That question presents a legal determination. Although the second and third Garcetti/Pickering inquiries are also legal questions, this first prong presents a very different inquiry. . . That first inquiry may turn, at least in part, on legal authorities such as government regulations or job descriptions setting forth the employee's job responsibilities and authority to act for his government employer. To remain true to the purpose of the qualified-immunity analysis, of course, it must be clear to a reasonable person in the defendant government official's position that the plaintiff-employee was acting outside his job duties. But who better to make that determination, which is typically a sui generis legal question, . . . than the court in the unique context of the case before it? . . . .Here, as in these other cases [discussed], it was clearly established at the time that the Mayor declined to reappoint Knopf that a government employee's speech made outside the scope of his job duties was protected by the First Amendment. And the Supreme Court's clearly established principles for making that determination, set forth in Garcetti and Lane and applied by prior Tenth Circuit cases, provide sufficient guidance for us to determine whether it was clear to a reasonable government employee that the plaintiff employee's speech was constitutionally protected because it fell outside his job duties. That was enough to satisfy the first Garcetti/Pickering inquiry under the qualified-immunity analysis. Applying these clearly established principles here, then, it would have been clear to a reasonable person in the Mayor's position that Knopf sent his email outside the scope of his job duties. The Mayor would, or should, have been aware that Knopf had no official duties as to the phase of the greenway development project that was the subject of the email, and that he did not have general oversight responsibilities for the department head involved in that phase of the project. The Mayor also would, or should, have been aware that Knopf sent the email to someone outside Knopf's chain of command, the City attorney. In fact, this was one of the Mayor's primary complaints about Knopf's email, that it bypassed the Mayor, who was Knopf's supervisor. Moreover, the Mayor would, or should, have been aware that any citizen with concerns over the misuse of City money in the greenway development project could have sent such an email to the City attorney expressing those concerns. Further, the Mayor knew or should have known that the underlying allegations of financial favoritism had been discussed at a public city council meeting. The facts that Knopf did not make his concerns public and that the email concerned information that Knopf may have acquired because of his government job do not preclude the conclusion that sending that email was outside the scope of Knopf's job duties. . . .I conclude, contrary to both the majority and the concurrence, that Knopf has established a First Amendment violation of his right to free speech sufficient to defeat summary judgment, has shown that it was clear to a reasonable person in the Mayor's position that Knopf's email fell outside the scope of Knopf's ordinary job responsibilities, and that the First Amendment violation was otherwise clearly established at the time the Mayor refused to reappoint Knopf City planning director. On that basis, I would affirm the district court's decision to deny the Mayor's summary judgment motion asserted he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Scott v. Mid-Del Sch. Bd. of Educ., 724 F. App'x 650, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("In Garcia, elementary-school officials administered two beatings to a nine-year-old girl, immobilizing her and using a paddle that was split into two pieces so that 'when it hit, it clapped and grabbed,' and resulted in severe injuries. . . Similarly here, Ms. Scott alleged that Mr. McGuire caused numerous physical injuries to B.P. by hitting him with the bathroom-stall door and pushing him back against the stall. She further alleged that Mr. McGuire blocked B.P. in the stall and cursed and bullied him while he was in the vulnerable position of having his pants down. Although the facts of Garcia are not identical to those here, 'we do not require plaintiffs to produce a factually identical case, but allow some degree of generality in factual correspondence.' Armijo ex rel. Chavez v. Wagon Mound Pub. Sch., 159 F.3d 1253, 1260 (10th Cir. 1998). At the Rule 12(b)(6) stage, the district court found that the complaint stated a claim of conscience-shocking behavior by Mr. McGuire. Mr. McGuire's alleged conduct sufficiently resembles the conduct we held unconstitutional in Garcia such that 'a reasonable official in [his] position would have known that [his] actions violated [B.P.'s] clearly established right,' T.D., 868 F.3d at 1213. He was therefore not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings.")

Poore v. Glanz, 724 F. App'x 635, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("[W]e reject the argument that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because this court has not previously held that the precise combination of policies implemented by Glanz constituted deliberate indifference. We have recognized 'it is clearly established that a prison official's deliberate indifference to sexual abuse by prison employees violates the Eighth Amendment.'. . And because 'a prison official's failure to protect an inmate from a known harm may constitute a constitutional violation,' we have further held it to be clearly established that inmates possess 'a constitutional right to expect' that jail officials will 'reasonabl[y] protect[ ]' them from such abuse. . . Principles regarding supervisory liability in this context are also firmly established. In Dodds, we explained that 'the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity inquiry asks whether the contours of the right the plaintiff claims the defendant violated are sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . We concluded it was 'clearly established by 2007 that officials may be held individually liable for policies they promulgate, implement, or maintain that deprive persons of their federally protected rights.'. . We have held corrections supervisors liable for failing to protect inmates from sexual abuse from staff on several occasions. . . .[D]efendants correctly point out that other facts not present in this case supported a finding of deliberate indifference in Keith I, Tafoya, and Keith II. But the qualified immunity analysis is not 'a scavenger hunt for prior cases with precisely the same facts'; the relevant inquiry is 'whether the law put officials on fair notice that the described conduct was unconstitutional.'. . 'We cannot find qualified immunity wherever we have a new fact pattern.'. . Although each of the conditions identified by Poore taken individually would not constitute a clearly established violation of Poore's Eighth Amendment rights, the confluence of factors in this case impels us to affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity. . . A reasonable official in Glanz's position, who had his subjective knowledge of the dangers posed by conditions in the north wing, would have been on fair notice that his conduct was unlawful.")

Marin v. King, 720 F. App'x 923, (10th Cir. 2018)) ("Plaintiffs cite no authority—from the Supreme Court, our circuit, or any other circuit—demonstrating it was clearly established that such a statement made to an affiant by a private citizen volunteer, not employed or paid by any government entity, can serve as a basis for a Franks violation, even when the individual acted under color of state law for purposes of § 1983. Instead, the federal cases Plaintiffs cite to—Kennedy, DeLeon, Wapnick, Calisto, and Pritchard—all involved paid city employees with delineated investigatory roles. Accordingly, these cases do nothing to establish that a reasonable individual in Ms. Ferguson's or Dr. Norris's position on the Task Force, as a private citizen without law enforcement training or training regarding constitutional rights, would have recognized that he or she was violating Plaintiffs' constitutional rights by making knowingly and intentionally, or recklessly, false statements to Mr. Salas. And, within the context of qualified immunity, the burden falls squarely on the plaintiff to identify case law demonstrating that a defendant's conduct violated clearly established law such that a reasonable person in the defendant's position would have known she was violating the plaintiff's rights. . . In an attempt to overcome the absence of case law establishing that a private citizen volunteer commits a constitutional violation by providing a false statement that is later innocently incorporated into a search warrant affidavit, Plaintiffs contend that a reasonable jury could find Ms. Ferguson and Dr. Norris were not merely citizen advisors but acted as law enforcement officers. Plaintiffs cite, among other things, evidence that Ms. Ferguson requested insignia that would show the 'law enforcement' capacity of the Task Force members; that Ms. Ferguson was the Task Force's 'coordinator'; and that Dr. Norris was the Task Force's 'forensic veterinarian.' They also cite evidence indicating that neither Mr. Salas nor Ms. Ferguson viewed Ms. Ferguson's role as merely advisory. But Plaintiffs' argument that a jury could conclude that Ms. Ferguson and Dr. Norris were law enforcement officers runs contrary to language in Plaintiffs' complaint relative to Plaintiffs' supervisor liability claim against Mr. King and Mr. Suttle. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that 'King and Suttle knew that Ferguson was not a peace officer, a law enforcement officer of any other sort, held no public office, and had had no training in law enforcement or the constitutional rights of citizens.'. .And, once again, Plaintiffs provide no federal authority for the proposition that private citizens—who are not employed or compensated by the state and who do not receive any law enforcement training or training on constitutional rights—can be considered law enforcement officers. Indeed, our review of federal law has not yielded any authority treating a private citizen volunteer as a law enforcement officer for purposes of assessing a qualified immunity defense.")

Pauly v. White, 874 F.3d 1197, 1211, 1213-14, 1222-23 (10th Cir. 2017) (Pauly III), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 2650 (2018) ("After reading plaintiffs' brief in opposition to the officers' petition for certiorari and plaintiffs' supplemental brief to us after the Supreme Court vacated our judgment, we are convinced that we misstated the facts in Pauly I. Originally, we had the following view of Officer White's role in the altercation: 'Officer White did not participate in the events leading up to the armed confrontation, nor was he there to hear the other officers ordering the brothers to "Come out or we're coming in." Almost immediately upon Officer White's arrival, one of the brothers shouted "We have guns."' Pauly I, 814 F.3d at 1076 (internal citations omitted). But this was not an accurate portrayal of the events that unfolded on that rainy night in rural New Mexico almost six years ago. Unfortunately, we were misled by defendant's briefs on appeal. . . From the beginning, defendants framed the case as one where Officer White entered the situation without participation in, or knowledge of, the alleged reckless conduct of the officers that escalated into a gunfight, and plaintiffs responded accordingly. Our review of the record on remand shows otherwise. It turns out that if the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, Officer White's reckless or deliberate conduct unreasonably created a need for him to shoot Samuel Pauly. . . . [C]ontrary to our determination in Pauly I, . . . we are now persuaded a reasonable jury could find that Officer White participated in the events leading up to the armed confrontation and heard the other officers threaten the brothers by saying, 'Come out or we're coming in.'. . A reasonable jury could thus conclude that Officer White acted recklessly by precipitating the need to use deadly force. . . .As we explained above, in Pauly I we analyzed Officers Mariscal and Truesdale together while analyzing Officer White separately because we thought the facts warranted it. . . Although we now recognize that a reasonable jury could find Officer White's pre-seizure conduct to be just as reckless as Officers Mariscal and Truesdale, we still believe the facts warrant a separate qualified immunity analysis because Officer White is the only officer who actually shot Samuel Pauly. . . .Turning to this case, we look first to Officer White, as he is the one who actually 'seized' Samuel Pauly by shooting him. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, the district court determined that the brothers were in their home when Officers Mariscal and Truesdale—and Officer White shortly thereafter—approached their house while it was dark and raining and, without knocking on the door, made threatening comments about intruding into the home. In response, the brothers shouted 'We have guns,' hoping to scare off their perceived home invaders, and all three officers took cover. In particular, Officer White took cover behind a rock wall approximately fifty feet away from the house. Samuel Pauly opened the window of his home and pointed his gun aimlessly into the dark in the direction of Officer White. Within five seconds of Samuel pointing his gun out of the window, Officer White shot Samuel in the heart without first identifying himself or warning Samuel to put down his weapon. To analyze the reasonableness of Officer White's actions, we turn to the ubiquitous three factor test from Graham v. Connor. . . .Based on the record in the present case, viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, Officer

White did not have probable cause to believe there was an immediate threat of serious harm to himself or to Officer Mariscal. This is especially true considering Officer White may have participated in the reckless conduct that lead to his perceived need to shoot Samuel Pauly. Thus, Officer White's use of deadly force was not objectively reasonable and violated Samuel Pauly's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. . . .The district court relied on Allen, 119 F.3d at 841, in concluding that Officer White had violated clearly established law. It stated that '[s]ince 1997, it has been clearly established in the Tenth Circuit "that an officer is responsible for his or her reckless conduct that precipitates the need to use force."'. . . But this statement suffers from the same lack of specificity as does the general propositions from Graham and Garner that 'use of force is contrary to the Fourth Amendment if it is excessive under objective standards of reasonableness,' which, by itself, 'is not enough.'. . The statement in Allen, that the reasonableness inquiry includes an evaluation of an officer's actions leading up to the use of force, is absolutely relevant in determining whether a police officer acted unreasonably in effecting a seizure, as we illustrated above. But it cannot alone serve as the basis for concluding that an officer's particular use of excessive force was 'clearly established,' Pauly II, 137 S.Ct. at 552. Accordingly, Allen is of little help in this case because the facts are completely different. Because there is no case 'close enough on point to make the unlawfulness of [Officer White's] actions apparent,' Pauly I, 814 F.3d at 1091 (Moritz, J., Dissenting) (alteration in original) (quoting Mascorro, 656 F.3d at 1208), we conclude that Officer White is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Officer White is entitled to qualified immunity because his alleged use of excessive force was not clearly established in the circumstances of this case. It therefore cannot serve as the basis of liability for Officers Mariscal and Truesdale. . . And neither Officer Mariscal nor Truesdale committed a constitutional violation in his own right. Thus, there is no basis for holding either of them liable under § 1983. Accordingly, we REVERSE the district court's denial of summary judgment to Officers Mariscal, Truesdale, and White, and REMAND with instructions to enter judgment in favor of each officer.")

Pauly v. White, 874 F.3d 1197, 1219 n.7 (10th Cir. 2017) (Pauly III), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 2650 (2018) ("[T]he concept that pre-seizure conduct should be used in evaluating the reasonableness of an officer's actions is not universally held among other circuits. See, e.g., Schulz v. Long, 44 F.3d 643 (8th Cir. 1995) (holding that evidence of pre-seizure conduct was irrelevant to reasonableness); Cole v. Bone, 993 F.2d 1328, 1333 (8th Cir. 1993) (same); Carter v. Buscher, 973 F.2d 1328, 1332 (7th Cir. 1992) (same); Greenidge v. Ruffin, 927 F.2d 789, 792 (4th Cir. 1991) (same). The Supreme Court very recently had an opportunity to resolve this issue but declined to do so[.] [referencing language in Mendez] Thus, at least for now, Sevier and Allen remain good law in this circuit.")

Pauly v. White, 874 F.3d 1197, 1223 (10th Cir. 2017) (Pauly III) (Moritz, J., concurring), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 2650 (2018) ("I agree with the majority that White is entitled to qualified immunity because the contours of the constitutional right at issue aren't clearly established. . . But unlike the majority, I would decline to address the constitutional question.")

Brown v. City of Colorado Springs, 709 F. App'x 906, ___ (10th Cir. 2017) ("Brown asks us to do exactly what the Supreme Court has told us not to do—define clearly established law based on Graham and Garner. . . The Supreme Court rejected this same argument in Pauly, declaring that 'Garner and Graham do not by themselves create clearly established law.'. .The district court properly recognized that 'there is no precedent for the claims in this case.'. . In the Supreme Court's words, '[t]his alone should have been an important indication' that officers didn't violate a clearly established Fourth Amendment right. . . Just as the plaintiff in Pauly had failed to show that an 'officer acting under similar circumstances as [the officer-defendant] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment,' Brown has failed to cite a case holding that an officer acting under similar circumstances as presented here had violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Instead, Brown relies on cautionary language from flashbang cases to show that the officers in this case violated a clearly established Fourth Amendment right when they detonated an explosive device while executing an arrest warrant. For a variety of reasons, we are unpersuaded that those cases provide Brown much help. . . .Brown cannot show any Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point or that the clearly established weight of authority from other circuits prohibited the officers' conduct in this case. . . Thus, we must reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the Defendants on Brown's individual-capacity claims.")

Malone v. Bd. of County Commissioners, 707 F. App'x 552, ___ (10th Cir. 2017) (" 'For the law to be "clearly established," there ordinarily must be a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit opinion on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other circuits must point in one direction.'. . The Supreme Court has warned not to define a clearly established right 'at a high level of generality.'. . Instead, 'the clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . 'This is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful, but it is to say that in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.'. . 'A clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . 'Such specificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context, where the Court has recognized that it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'. . For example, in Mullenix, an excessive-force case, the Supreme Court rejected as too general the 'rule that a police officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing felon who does not pose a sufficient threat of harm to the officer or others.'. . Instead, the relevant inquiry into whether the law at issue there was clearly established had to incorporate the particular facts presented in that case, asking: whether it was clearly established that the use of deadly force against 'a reportedly intoxicated fugitive, set on avoiding capture through high-speed vehicular flight, who twice during his flight had threatened to shoot police officers, and who was moments away from encountering an officer' violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Mullenix also cited to Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 199-200 (2004) (per curiam), in which the Supreme Court framed the question as 'whether it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibited the officer's conduct in the "situation [she] confronted": whether to shoot a disturbed felon, set on avoiding capture through vehicular flight, when persons in the immediate area are at risk from that flight.'. . .Applying the Supreme Court's guidance here, the parties do not cite, nor could we find, any Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case that is sufficiently close factually to the circumstances presented here to establish clearly the Fourth Amendment law that applies to our case. The cases Malone mentions in his brief are not sufficiently analogous.")

T.D. v. Patton, 868 F.3d 1209, 1212-13 (10th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 1270 (2018) ("We agree with the district court that Ms. Patton violated T.D.'s substantive due process right by knowingly placing T.D. in a position of danger and knowingly increasing T.D.'s vulnerability to danger. . . She recommended to the juvenile court that T.D. be placed and remain in Mr. Duerson's temporary custody despite her admitted concerns about T.D.'s safety in the home, her knowledge of Mr. Duerson's criminal history that included a conviction for attempted sexual assault against a minor in his care, and notice of evidence that Mr. Duerson was potentially abusing T.D. She failed to inform the juvenile court about her concerns and knowledge of Mr. Duerson's criminal history and made her affirmative recommendations out of fear of being fired. . . . Ms. Patton acted recklessly and in conscious disregard of a known and substantial risk that T.D. would suffer serious, immediate, and proximate harm in his father's home. Her conduct, taken as a whole, shocks the conscience and thus amounts to a substantive due process violation under the Fourteenth Amendment. Based on the facts and legal determination in this court's Currier decision, a reasonable official in Ms. Patton's shoes would have understood she was violating T.D.'s constitutional rights. In both Currier and here, county social workers removed children from their mothers' homes and placed them in their fathers' homes, where the children were abused. The social workers in both cases failed to alert the juvenile court of relevant facts undermining the fathers' fitness as caretakers and recommended that the fathers assume custody of the children—despite being on notice that the fathers' homes were places of danger. And, in both cases, the social workers failed to investigate whether the fathers were abusing their children, despite being on notice of evidence suggesting abuse. Ms. Patton's conduct sufficiently resembles the conduct we held unconstitutional in Currier such that a reasonable official in her position would have known that her actions violated T.D.'s clearly established right. She was therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Starrett v. City of Lander, 699 F. App'x 805, ___ (10th Cir. 2017) ("On appeal, Mrs. Starrett has offered no case to meet her burden of showing that the law was clearly established that she was entitled to resist Sergeant Romero's attempt to follow Mr. Starrett into the house to retrieve his shoes by shutting the door and telling him he could not enter because he did not have a warrant. Nor has she pointed us to any case that 'squarely governs the case here[.]'. . Instead, she relies on three older Supreme Court cases stating there is a common-law right to resist an unlawful arrest. . . But that right 'has given way in many jurisdictions to the modern view that the use of force is not justifiable to resist an arrest which the actor knows is being made by a peace officer, although the arrest is unlawful.' . . In any event, none of the cases is sufficiently 'particularized to the facts of [this] case[.]'. .We conclude that, given the 'unique set of facts and circumstances' this case presents, . . . Sergeant Romero and Officer Ramsey had arguable probable cause to arrest Mrs. Starrett for interference under Wyo. Stat. Ann. § 6-5-204(a). The district court therefore properly determined that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the unlawful arrest claim. . . . As in the district court, Mrs. Starrett has on appeal failed to 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Officer Ramsey] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . Instead, she outlines Graham's general excessive-force principles. But the Graham factors 'do not by themselves create clearly established law,'. . . and, given the unique circumstances here, '[t]his is not a case where it is obvious that there was a violation of clearly established law under ... Graham.'. . We therefore conclude that Officer Ramsey was entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive-force claim.")

Apodaca v. Raemisch, 864 F.3d 1071, 1074-79 (10th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 5 (2018) ("We conclude that even if the alleged prohibition on outdoor exercise had violated the Eighth Amendment, the underlying constitutional right would not have been clearly established. The right would not have been clearly established because existing precedent would have left the constitutional question within the realm of reasonable debate. The underlying right turns on our opinion in Perkins. But Perkins can be read either expansively or narrowly. Under an expansive reading, Perkins would squarely prohibit the alleged denial of outdoor exercise for eleven months. But, under a narrow reading, Perkins would apply only to denials of out-of-cell exercise—a situation not present here. We need not decide which reading is correct. Because Perkins is ambiguous, our opinions do not clearly establish that an eleven-month deprivation of outdoor exercise would violate the Eighth Amendment. . . .A constitutional right is clearly established when a Tenth Circuit precedent is on point, making the constitutional violation apparent. . . This precedent cannot define the right at a high level of generality. . . Rather, the precedent must be particularized to the facts. . . But even when such a precedent exists, subsequent Tenth Circuit cases may conflict with or clarify the earlier precedent, rendering the law unclear. See Lane v. Franks, 134 S. Ct. 2369, 2382-83 (2014). A precedent is often particularized when it involves materially similar facts. . . But the precedent may be adequately particularized even if the facts differ, for general precedents may clearly establish the law when the defendant's conduct '"obvious[ly]"' violates the law. . . Thus, a right is clearly established when a precedent involves '"materially similar conduct"' or applies '"with obvious clarity"' to the conduct at issue. . . .The plaintiffs allege a deprivation of the right to exercise outdoors for roughly eleven months. For the sake of argument, we may assume that this deprivation would violate the Eighth Amendment. Even with this assumption, the warden and director would enjoy qualified immunity because the underlying constitutional right had not been clearly established. Roughly three decades ago, we recognized a consensus in the case law regarding the importance of outdoor exercise for prisoners: 'There is substantial agreement among the cases ... that some form of regular outdoor exercise is extremely important to the psychological and physical well being of inmates ....' Bailey v. Shillinger, 828 F.2d 651, 653 (10th Cir. 1987) (per curiam). But we also made clear that a denial of outdoor exercise does not per se violate the Eighth Amendment. . .In the absence of a per se violation, courts must examine the totality of the circumstances. Perkins v. Kan. Dep't of Corr., 165 F.3d 803, 810 n.8 (10th Cir. 1999). These circumstances include the length of the deprivation. . . .The plaintiffs rely on our published opinion in Perkins v. Kansas Department of Corrections. In Perkins, a prisoner invoked the Eighth Amendment, alleging a continuing inability to exercise outside of his cell for more than nine months. . . The district court dismissed the claim, and we reversed. . . In reversing, we expressed our holding in terms of the denial of 'outdoor exercise.'. . But, as noted above, the plaintiff in Perkins had alleged the inability to exercise not only outdoors but also anywhere outside of his cell. . .The resulting issue is whether our holding was • expansive, prohibiting the extended denial of exercise outdoors or

• narrow, prohibiting only the extended denial of exercise outside of the cell.
The plaintiffs embrace the expansive interpretation of Perkins. . . . The warden and director embrace the narrow interpretation of Perkins, insisting that it applies only to deprivations of out-of-cell exercise. This interpretation also appears reasonable based on the content of Perkins and the later unpublished opinion in Ajaj v. United States, 293 F. App'x 575 (10th Cir. 2008). . . .[A] narrow interpretation is supported by our unpublished opinion in Ajaj, where we held that a year-long deprivation of outdoor exercise did not violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . If Perkins is read broadly, Ajaj might appear to conflict with Perkins. . . Which reading of Perkins is correct? We need not decide that today. For now, it is enough to conclude that the question is within the realm of reasonable debate, for Perkins can be read either expansively or narrowly. . . .At a minimum, Perkins would not render the warden and director 'plainly incompetent' for failing to recognize a constitutional prohibition against an eleven-month ban on outdoor exercise. Perkins's ambiguity means that our circuit has not clearly established a right to outdoor exercise over an eleven-month period. As a result, the warden and director are entitled to qualified immunity.") Lowe v. Raemisch, 864 F.3d 1205, 1208-12 & n.10 (10th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 5 (2018) ("The law is clearly established when a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit precedent is on point or the alleged right is clearly established from case law in other circuits. . . The precedent is considered on point if it involves '"materially similar conduct"' or applies '"with obvious clarity"' to the conduct at issue. Because the prior case must involve materially similar conduct or apply with obvious clarity, qualified immunity generally protects all public officials except those who are '"plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law."' Mr. Lowe's claim involves the disallowance of exercise outdoors rather than outside of his cell. In precedential opinions, we have reached four conclusions on the constitutionality of denying outdoor exercise to inmates:

1. The denial of outdoor exercise could violate the Eighth Amendment 'under certain circumstances.'
2. The denial of outdoor exercise does not create a per se violation of the Eighth Amendment.
3. Restricting outdoor exercise to one hour per week does not violate the Eighth Amendment.
4. The denial of outdoor exercise for three years could arguably involve deliberate indifference to an inmate's health under the Eighth Amendment.
These conclusions permit reasonable debate on the constitutionality of disallowing outdoor exercise for two years and one month. We have said that denying outdoor exercise could violate the Constitution under some circumstances, but we have not defined those circumstances. Thus, the constitutional inquiry would depend on a case-by-case examination of the totality of circumstances. . . .[W]e lack any on-point precedent regarding the constitutionality of disallowing outdoor exercise for a period approximating two years and one month. . . .Even when no precedent involves facts 'materially similar' to ours, the right can be clearly established if a precedent applies with 'obvious clarity.'. . When the public official's conduct is egregious, even a general precedent would apply with obvious clarity. . . .Even in the absence of egregious conduct, the constitutional violation may be so obvious that similar conduct seldom arises in our cases. . . .Ultimately, we consider whether our precedents render the legality of the conduct undebatable. Aldaba v. Pickens, 844 F.3d 870, 877 (10th Cir. 2016).[10] [fn. 10: We have described these principles in terms of a sliding scale. . . But our sliding-scale approach may arguably conflict with recent Supreme Court precedent on qualified immunity. See Aldaba v. Pickens, 844 F.3d 870, 874 n.1 (10th Cir. 2016). The possibility of a conflict arises because the sliding-scale approach may allow us to find a clearly established right even when a precedent is neither on point nor obviously applicable. . . We need not decide today whether our sliding-scale approach conflicts with Supreme Court precedent. As explained in the text, the defendants lacked clearly applicable precedents showing whether denial of outdoor exercise for two years and one month was sufficiently serious to violate the Eighth Amendment.] On this record, however, the deprivation of outdoor exercise for two years and one month would not have obviously crossed a constitutional line. Thus, the underlying right was not clearly established and the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Qualified immunity is unavailable to officials who 'knowingly violate the law.'. . Mr. Lowe applies this principle, arguing that the two officials knew that they were violating the law because a district court had already found a constitutional violation based on similar conditions at the same prison. . . We reject this argument based on a key factual distinction with the prior district court case, a conflict with Supreme Court precedent, and the existence of an erroneous assumption. First, the deprivation in the district court's earlier case spanned twelve years. Anderson v. Colorado, 887 F. Supp. 2d 1133, 1138 (D. Colo. 2012). Here the alleged deprivation was far shorter: two years and one month. Second, the Supreme Court rejected a nearly identical argument in Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731 (2011). There the Court concluded that a district court opinion, which identified the same defendant (Attorney General Ashcroft) and said that his actions were unconstitutional, did not clearly establish the underlying right because a district court's holding is not controlling in any jurisdiction. . .Third, Mr. Lowe assumes that a defendant's knowledge affects the availability of qualified immunity. We reject that assumption, for there is a single standard: 'whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that the alleged conduct "was unlawful in the situation he confronted."' If this standard is met, the defendant would be either plainly incompetent or a knowing violator of the law. . . For these reasons, the district court's Anderson ruling does not preclude qualified immunity.") [footnotes omitted]

Sause v. Bauer, 859 F.3d 1270, 1274-75 (10th Cir. 2017) ("[W]e assume that the defendants violated Sause's rights under the First Amendment when, according to Sause, they repeatedly mocked her, ordered her to stop praying so they could harass her, threatened her with arrest and public humiliation, insisted that she show them the scars from her double mastectomy, and then 'appeared ... disgust[ed]' when she complied—'all over' a mere noise complaint. . . But this assumption doesn't entitle Sause to relief. Instead, Sause must demonstrate that any reasonable officer would have known this behavior violated the First Amendment. . . Sause argues she can make this showing because it was clearly established that she had a 'right to pray in the privacy of

[her] home free from governmental interference,' at least in the absence of 'any legitimate law enforcement interest.'. . Alternatively, she asserts, '[t]he right to be free from official retaliation for exercising one's First Amendment rights [was] also clearly established.'. .We don't disagree with Sause's articulation of these general rights. But the Supreme Court has repeatedly and consistently warned us 'not to define clearly established law at [this] high level of generality.'. . Instead, '[t]he dispositive question is "whether the violative nature of [the defendants'] particular conduct is clearly established."'. . In other words, 'the clearly established law must be "particularized" to the facts of the case.'. . Thus, before we may declare the law to be clearly established, we generally require (1) 'a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point,' or (2) a showing that 'the clearly established weight of authority from other courts [has] found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.'. .Here, Sause doesn't identify a single case in which this court, or any other court for that matter, has found a First Amendment violation based on a factual scenario even remotely resembling the one we encounter here—i.e., a scenario in which (1) officers involved in a legitimate investigation obtain consent to enter a private residence and (2) while there, ultimately cite an individual for violating the law but (3) in the interim, interrupt their investigation to order the individual to stop engaging in religiously-motivated conduct so that they can (4) briefly harass her before (5) issuing a citation. In other words, 'this case presents a unique set of facts and circumstances.'. . And '[t]his alone' provides 'an important indication ... that [the defendants'] conduct did not violate a "clearly established" right.'"), cert. granted and judgment reversed by Sause v. Sause v. Bauer, 859 F.3d 1270, 1279-80 (10th Cir. 2017) (Tymkovich, C.J., concurring) ("I fully join in Judge Moritz's opinion and agree that the officers' conduct here did not violate clearly established First Amendment precedent. I write separately to emphasize that Ms. Sause's allegations fit more neatly in the Fourth Amendment context. And, I must add, either the officers here acted with extraordinary contempt of a law abiding citizen and they should be condemned, or, if Ms. Sause's allegations are untrue, she has done the officers a grave injustice by manufacturing such reprehensible conduct. . . .If true, Ms. Sause's allegations are inconsistent with any legitimate law enforcement purpose capable of justifying a continuing police intrusion in her home. The officers deny the alleged conduct, although we assume for purposes of a motion to dismiss that the allegations are true. And we do not know whether the district court would find a constitutional violation in these circumstances or, if so, whether any violation would be clearly established. But Ms. Sause did not make a Fourth Amendment claim on appeal and has only appealed the First Amendment cause of action. I agree First Amendment law is not clearly established for the reasons articulated by Judge Moritz in her well-written opinion."), cert. granted and judgment reversed by Sause v. Pompeo v. Bd. of Regents of the University of New Mexico, 852 F.3d 973, 990 (10th Cir. 2017) ("In assessing defendants' claims of qualified immunity, we are mindful of the Supreme Court's admonition to 'define the clearly established right at issue on the basis of the specific context of the case.' . . Pompeo claims a right to use language in a course assignment that her professors found to be inflammatory without being criticized or pressured to make revisions. Because we conclude that such a right is not clearly established, the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of defendants is AFFIRMED.")

Garcia v. Escalante, 678 F. App'x 649, ___ (10th Cir. 2017) ("[A]kin to White, 'this case presents a unique set of facts and circumstances,'. . . that 'alone' should be 'an important indication' to us that Defendants' conduct did not run afoul of clearly established law[.] . . .In sum, guided by Mullenix and its progeny, we adhere to our view that there is no clearly established law that would have put Defendants—like 'every objectively reasonable officer,' Aldaba, 844 F.3d at 877, in a similar position—on notice in March 2009 that their arrest and prosecution of Plaintiff for possessing hydrocodone without a valid prescription was lacking in probable cause, and therefore violative of the Fourth Amendment, notwithstanding Plaintiff's presentation to them of a thirteen- or fourteen-month-old prescription.")

Vogt v. City of Hays, Kansas, 844 F.3d 1235, 1240-42, 1247-48 (10th Cir. 2017), cert. dismissed as improvidently granted, 138 S. Ct. 1683 (2018) ("Following Chavez, a circuit split developed over the definition of a 'criminal case' under the Fifth Amendment. The Third, Fourth, and Fifth Circuits have stated that the Fifth Amendment is only a trial right. . . .In contrast, the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits have held that certain pretrial uses of compelled statements violate the Fifth Amendment. . . .Different approaches have emerged because the Chavez Court declined to pinpoint when a 'criminal case' begins. . . Like the Supreme Court, we have not yet defined the starting point for a 'criminal case.'. . .Like the Supreme Court, we have declined until now to unequivocally state whether the term 'criminal case' covers pretrial proceedings as well as the trial. Precedents like Stover provide conflicting signals without squarely deciding the issue. Nonetheless, today's case requires us to decide whether the term 'criminal case' covers at least one pretrial proceeding: a hearing to determine probable cause. . . .To decide this issue, we join the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits, concluding that the right against self-incrimination is more than a trial right. . . .Until today, the applicability of the Fifth Amendment to pretrial proceedings remained unsettled, for the Supreme Court had declined to decide 'the precise moment when a "criminal case" commences'. . . and we had declined to decide whether the Fifth Amendment applied to pretrial proceedings. . . And outside our circuit, courts had disagreed about the applicability of the Fifth Amendment to pretrial proceedings. . . Thus, when the police officers acted, they could not have known that the Fifth Amendment would be violated by the eventual use of the compelled statement to develop investigatory leads, initiate a criminal investigation, bring charges, or support the prosecution in a probable cause hearing. As a result, the alleged constitutional violation was not clearly established. In similar circumstances, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals took a different approach. That court interpreted the Fifth Amendment to apply in a pretrial hearing to determine whether to release or detain the defendant. . . This interpretation required the court to determine whether a police detective enjoyed qualified immunity after compelling a statement that was later used in a hearing to determine release or detention. . . To decide qualified immunity, the court considered the underlying purpose of qualified immunity, which was to prevent deterrence of reasonable officers trying to carry out their duties. . . This purpose led the court to 'focus on [the] officer's duties, not on other aspects of the constitutional violation.'. . Focusing on the officer's duties, the court declined to permit qualified immunity because the police detective had been on notice that coercion of a confession could ripen into a Fifth Amendment violation. . . And once the police detective coerced a confession and turned it over to the prosecutor, the detective's role in the constitutional violation was complete. . . Thus, the Ninth Circuit did not tarry over whether the detective would have known which uses would violate the Fifth Amendment; he knew all along that coercing a confession could lead to a Fifth Amendment violation. . . As a result, the Ninth Circuit determined that the detective was not entitled to qualified immunity. . .We respectfully disagree with this approach. The Ninth Circuit appeared to acknowledge that its test would allow police officers to incur personal liability for contributing to a constitutional violation that had not been clearly established. . . But qualified immunity protects officers from liability when the misconduct did not violate a clearly established right. . . The four police officers allegedly compelled a statement used before trial but not in an actual trial. Until now, the precedents had not clearly determined whether these uses would have violated the Fifth Amendment. Thus, even if the police officers could have anticipated the eventual use in a probable cause hearing, they could not have known that this use would violate the Fifth Amendment. Thus, we reject the approach taken in the Ninth Circuit. . . .Because it was not clearly established in 2013 or 2014 that the pretrial use of Mr. Vogt's statements would violate the Fifth Amendment, the four police officers are entitled to qualified immunity.") Browder v. Casaus, 675 F. App'x 845, ___ (10th Cir. 2017) ("As we noted in Browder I, no one contends that Casaus acted with the specific intent to harm—the high end of culpability. . . We further recognized that a jury might ultimately conclude that his actions in '[s]peeding and jumping red lights' amounted to nothing more than negligence, below the level of culpability. . . But on the facts alleged in the complaint, applying the middle, deliberate-indifference standard, we held a jury might also conclude that speeding through city streets for almost 9 miles 'through eleven city intersections and at least one red light—all for [Casaus's] personal pleasure, on no governmental business of any kind' showed a 'conscious contempt of the lives of others' sufficient to shock the conscience and state a substantive due process claim. . . .In Browder I, we found the law clearly established that a police officer could be liable 'for driving in a manner that exhibits "a conscience-shocking deliberate indifference" to the lives of those around him.'. . And Browder I's general statement is entirely consistent with Supreme Court precedent, which has broadly characterized the risks posed by speeding police officers as encompassing 'all those within stopping range, be they suspects, their passengers, other drivers, or bystanders.'. . Accordingly, we agree with the district court that, in order to show Casaus violated their Fourteenth Amendment rights, the Browders had to show only that Casaus acted with deliberate indifference to the risk his conduct posed to the motoring public in general—not to Lindsay and Ashley specifically. . . . Casaus attempts to resurrect his Browder I argument that, at the time of the accident, it wasn't clearly established that the commission of a traffic infraction by an officer in a police car could amount to a constitutional violation. But in Browder I, we held it was clearly established that Casaus's alleged conduct—speeding and running a red light for no law enforcement reason—could give rise to a substantive due process claim. . . Unwilling to let this argument go, Casaus points out that Browder I relied for this proposition on Lewis, where the Supreme Court 'expressly noted when a private person suffers a serious physical injury "due to a police officer's intentional misuse of his vehicle" a viable due process claim can arise.'. . Casaus suggests the term 'misuse' isn't defined and could include negligent conduct. Consequently, Casaus reasons, a reasonable officer couldn't be expected to know what type of misuse of a police vehicle could give rise to a constitutional claim. While this argument suffers from numerous flaws, . . . we need not expansively consider them. The bottom line is that we've already held that extant authority 'was more than enough to make clear to any reasonable officer in 2013 (the time of the accident) that the conduct alleged here could give rise to a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . That holding is both the law of the case and binding circuit precedent. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's denial of Casaus's motion for partial summary judgment.")

Muhammad v. Hall, 674 F. App'x 810, 813 (10th Cir. 2017) ("We agree with the district court. Assuming (without deciding) that Ms. Muhammad's reports and prior litigation qualified as constitutionally protected activity, the facts set forth in the second amended complaint show that Ms. Hall was ready and willing to hire Ms. Muhammad, but was prevented from doing so by her superior. Thus, the second amended complaint does not plausibly establish that Ms. Hall caused Ms. Muhammad to suffer an injury or that Ms. Hall was motivated to do so by retaliation. This court has not yet decided whether a subordinate employee can be liable for First Amendment retaliation when he or she merely acts at the direction of a superior who desires to retaliate. See Trant v. Oklahoma, 754 F.3d 1158, 1170 n.5 (10th Cir. 2014) (stating that '[w]e have never held that true subordinate employees may be liable for First Amendment retaliation claims' and declining to decide the issue). . . Further, the other circuits are not of one mind. Compare King v. Zamiara, 680 F.3d 686, 696 (6th Cir. 2012) ('Individuals who aid in the implementation of an adverse action at the instructions of a superior will be liable along with their superior if they knew or should have known that the adverse action was unlawful.'), with Johnson v. Louisiana, 369 F.3d 826, 831 (5th Cir. 2004) ('[O]nly final decision-makers may be held liable for First Amendment retaliation employment discrimination under § 1983.'). Because Ms. Muhammad did not establish the Worrell elements, we need not decide the question here. . . But this lack of precedent also means that the law is not clearly established, so that Ms. Hall would be entitled to the protection of qualified immunity on this claim.").

Big Cats of Serenity Springs, Inc. v. Rhodes, 843 F.3d 853, 864, 868-69 (10th Cir. 2016) ("If we were writing on a blank slate, we might be persuaded that Bivens is a relic of another era, and that Congress is perfectly capable of policing federal misconduct. But given our case law, Supreme Court precedent, and the factual context present here, we are constrained to find that Big Cats may proceed. Big Cats alleges a garden-variety constitutional violation (hardly a new context), the regulatory scheme is plainly unavailable to remedy the alleged misconduct, and no special factors place AWA inspectors outside Bivens. We therefore agree with the district court that Big Cats' Bivens claim may go forward unless the inspectors are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Because we see no meaningful difference between the Colonnade inspection scheme and the one here, reasonable APHIS inspectors should have known they could not forcibly enter a business facility to perform an inspection, absent a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement. Big Cats alleges facts showing that the agents cut the locks to conduct a non-emergency inspection where the regulations did not provide for forcible entry. The law is clearly established that inspection officials cannot enter business premises without a warrant in those circumstances.")

Keith v. Koerner, No. 15-3219, 2016 WL 7176605, at *12-13 (10th Cir. Dec. 9, 2016) ("[A]t the time of the constitutional violation in October 2007, it was clearly established that Ms. Keith not only had a right to be free from attack by Mr. Gallardo, she also had a constitutional right to expect reasonable protection from TCF officials such as Warden Koerner and a reasonable response when sexual misconduct occurred. And Ms. Keith presented sufficient evidence that these clearly established rights were violated. She presented evidence of inappropriate behavior by Mr. Gallardo, systemic problems within the maintenance program, and misconduct throughout the facility. To be sure, the misconduct fell along a broad spectrum, ranging from undue familiarity to confirmed sexual assault. But we must consider the totality of the circumstances, including all instances of employee misconduct. Moreover, we must consider the evidence of limited investigation and lax discipline for both undue familiarity and sexual misconduct, evidence which supports an inference that a culture existed where TCF employees faced no real consequences for misconduct. Importantly, the evidence includes the inadequate investigation of the sexual misconduct allegations against Officers Bohn and Templeton, and the slack discipline imposed on Officer Bohn. In other words, viewing the evidence as a whole, a reasonable jury could conclude that Warden Koerner created an atmosphere where policies were honored only in the breach, and, as a result, he failed to take reasonable measures to ensure inmates were safe from the risk of sexual misconduct by TCF employees. Because Ms. Keith possessed a clearly established constitutional right and presented evidence of a constitutional violation by Warden Koerner, summary judgment was inappropriate on qualified-immunity grounds.")

Gutierrez v. Cobos, 841 F.3d 895, 903-07 (10th Cir. 2016) ("As in Smith and Rojas, we conclude the district court properly granted summary judgment. "This isn't to say [Plaintiffs] lacked (or possessed) a meritorious case," but "clients ... are usually bound by their lawyers' actions—or, as here, inactions." Smith, 707 F.3d at 1162. Plaintiffs failed to carry their burden of showing that Deputy Maynes violated clearly established federal law because their counsel did not make any legal argument in the district court to rebut qualified immunity. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on Count III. . . .Plaintiffs dispute the hot-pursuit exception applies here. They argue Deputy Maynes had probable cause to suspect Ms. Gutierrez of only misdemeanor offenses. . . and they contend '[p]robable cause to arrest for a misdemeanor, by itself, does not justify warrantless entry into a home under the hot pursuit exception.'. . Further, they argue that, as of 2009, it was clearly established that 'a police officer could not enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit of a suspected misdemeanant.'. . We reject this argument because the law is unsettled even now as to whether an officer's hot pursuit of a misdemeanor suspect into a home violates the Fourth Amendment. In Stanton v. Sims, 134 S. Ct. 3 (2013) (per curiam), the Supreme Court explained that 'federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit of that suspect.'. . In reversing the Ninth Circuit's decision to deny qualified immunity to an officer on this issue, the Court emphasized that its earlier cases had not decided this question. . . And the Court pointedly declined to express any view on the constitutionality of warrantless entries made in hot pursuit of misdemeanor suspects. . . As for Tenth Circuit authority, Plaintiffs cite Mascorro v. Billings, 656 F.3d 1198 (10th Cir. 2011), and although they acknowledge a 2011 decision cannot serve as clearly established law in 2009, Plaintiffs nevertheless appear to argue that Mascorro's discussion of 'serious offenses' and its citation to an earlier case, Bledsoe v. Garcia, 742 F.2d 1237 (10th Cir. 1984), supply the clearly established law they need. . . We disagree. . . . Mascorro . . . requires a 'serious offense' along with other exigent circumstances, but Mascorro did not define 'serious offense' or establish that warrantless entries made in hot pursuit of all misdemeanor suspects necessarily violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . Neither Mascorro nor Bledsoe can do the work Plaintiffs need to meet their burden, and they cite no other hot-pursuit cases. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Deputy Maynes on Count I because Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that it was 'beyond debate,'. . . in 2009 that the Constitution prohibited a warrantless entry based on hot pursuit in the circumstances presented here. . . . Plaintiffs alleged that Deputy Maynes violated Ms. Flores's Fourth Amendment rights in two respects. First, in Count III, Plaintiffs alleged Deputy Maynes used excessive force against Ms. Flores. But, as already discussed, the district court granted summary judgment to Deputy Maynes on this claim, and on appeal Plaintiffs waived review of the excessive force claim as to Ms. Flores . . . . Second, in Count II, we understand Plaintiffs to allege that Deputy Maynes unreasonably seized Ms. Flores when he tased her because, irrespective of the amount of force used, he had no legal justification to seize her at all. They argue any seizure of Ms. Flores was unreasonable because she 'was not suspected of committing any crimes.'. . .On Count II, we must again affirm the grant of summary judgment. Plaintiffs failed to show the law was clearly established in 2009 that a tasing under these circumstances was a seizure, and we therefore need not address whether Deputy Maynes had the reasonable suspicion or probable cause necessary to seize Ms. Flores. . . . Plaintiffs do not cite authority that clearly establishes Ms. Flores was seized. Although they cite several taser cases, . . . these cases concerned excessive force claims and did not establish that the tasing of Ms. Flores necessarily constituted a seizure. Plaintiffs not only failed to provide legal authority showing it was clear in 2009 that a tasing under these circumstances was a seizure, they did not even provide general authority showing when other methods of police restraint constitute seizures in like circumstances. . . . At oral argument, Plaintiffs candidly acknowledged they did not cite a case establishing when use of a taser effects a seizure. . .We do not and need not decide here whether Ms. Flores was seized. Because Plaintiffs did not proffer clearly established authority that Ms. Flores was seized, they did not carry their burden to rebut qualified immunity on this illegal seizure claim.") Vasquez v. Lewis, 834 F.3d 1132, 1137-39 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Currently, twenty-five states permit marijuana use for medical purposes, with Colorado, Alaska, Oregon, Washington, and Washington, D.C. permitting some recreational use under state law. . . Thus, the Officer's reasoning would justify the search and seizure of the citizens of more than half of the states in our country. It is wholly improper to assume that an individual is more likely to be engaged in criminal conduct because of his state of residence, and thus any fact that would inculpate every resident of a state cannot support reasonable suspicion. Accordingly, it is time to abandon the pretense that state citizenship is a permissible basis upon which to justify the detention and search of out-of-state motorists, and time to stop the practice of detention of motorists for nothing more than an out-of-state license plate. And we cannot think of a scenario in which a combination of otherwise innocent factors becomes suspicious because the individual is from one of the aforementioned twenty-five states or the District of Columbia. Even under the totality of the circumstances, it is anachronistic to use state residence as a justification for the Officers' reasonable suspicion. Absent a demonstrated extraordinary circumstance, the continued use of state residency as a justification for the fact of or continuation of a stop is impermissible. . . .In sum, Vasquez's conduct does not create reasonable suspicion. What we have here is a driver traveling from Colorado to Maryland, on a major interstate; in an older car despite owning a newer car; with blankets and a pillow obscuring items in the back seat; who did not have items visible that an officer expected to see; and who was and continued to be nervous when pulled over by officers late at night. Such conduct does not raise an inference of reasonable suspicion. Thus, we conclude that the Officers violated Vasquez's Fourth Amendment rights in searching his car. . . We next turn to whether it was clearly established, at the time of the incident, that the Officers' actions violated Vasquez's constitutional rights. . . . We have previously held, under strikingly similar circumstances, that an officer—in fact, one of the officers before us now—did not have reasonable suspicion to further detain a defendant after issuing a speeding warning. . . . In both cases, Jimerson detained an individual because: he thought the car was unusual (Vasquez's older car and Wood's rented car); the car had 'unusual' but typical items in it (Vasquez's items covered by blankets and Wood's trash wrappers and maps); and the driver was nervous, leaving a drug source state, and passing through Kansas. The facts of these cases are almost indistinguishable. The district court erred in concluding that the differences between Wood and this case were significant. . . Wood 'place[s] the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate' and provides 'contours [that] are sufficiently clear that a reasonable offic[er] would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Thus, at the time of the detention, it was clearly established that the Officers did not have reasonable suspicion based upon the articulated circumstances.")

Vasquez v. Lewis, 834 F.3d 1132, 1140-42 (10th Cir. Aug. 23, 2016) (Tymkovich, C.J., dissenting) ("This case presents a close call on reasonable suspicion. But the essence of qualified immunity is to give government officials protection in resolving close calls in reasonable ways. Because the majority employs a divide-and-conquer analysis specifically rejected by the Supreme Court and because Vasquez cannot identify clearly established law necessary to overcome qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent. . . .Vasquez points to no Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case with sufficiently analogous facts. He and the majority rely on a case where we held the police lacked reasonable suspicion where the driver 'had fast food wrappers and other trash in his car, he had open maps out, he misidentified the place where he picked up his rental car, and he described somewhat expensive travel plans despite being temporarily employed.'. . I disagree that Wood clearly defines the absence of reasonable suspicion here, especially given the multiple times we have affirmed district court decisions finding reasonable suspicion while citing and distinguishing Wood. . . .Most notably, the two cases differ in the degree of unusual travel plans. The court in Wood declined to give any weight to Wood's 'unusual' travel plans—driving a rental car from Sacramento to Topeka. . . . Vasquez's travel plans are sufficiently distinct as to allow a reasonable officer to be more suspicious. Vasquez asserted he was moving, but no items in his car aligned with his story. Vasquez was driving in the middle of the night, apparently sleeping in his car. Vasquez was driving a newly-purchased twenty-year-old car, despite owning a new car, and had a flimsy, even implausible, explanation as to why. . . Because reasonable officers may differ regarding whether Vasquez's detention violated the Fourth Amendment, I would affirm the district court's finding of qualified immunity.")

Culver v. Armstrong, 832 F.3d 1213, 1217-20 (10th Cir. 2016) ("In this case, we exercise our discretion and proceed directly to the qualified immunity standard's second inquiry. We need not go so far as the district court and decide (1) whether Defendant had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff, i.e., whether a constitutional violation occurred. Rather, we need only decide (2) whether an officer in the situation Defendant confronted could have reasonably believed he had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff, i.e., whether the constitutional right was clearly established in the factual context of this case. . . . Plaintiff seriously misunderstands the nature of our qualified immunity inquiry. He tells us the law was clearly established at the time of his encounter with Defendant because a warrantless arrest absent probable cause has been unlawful from time immemorial. . . . Simply to say the law has long recognized one's right to be free from arrest absent probable cause casts way too high a level of generality over our inquiry. . . .That Defendant cited Plaintiff for public intoxication alone is inconsequential. We measure probable cause against an objective standard. That an officer may not have subjectively believed probable cause existed to arrest a suspect for a certain crime does not preclude the Government from justifying the suspect's arrest based on any crime an officer could objectively and reasonably have believed the suspect committed. . . .The facts of this case, when considered together with the Wyoming Supreme Court's construction of Wyo. Stat. Ann. § 6-5-204(a) in Tillett and Newton, arguably were sufficient to warrant a prudent officer in believing Plaintiff had committed or was committing the criminal offense of 'interfer[ing] with ... a peace officer while engaged in the lawful performance of his official duties' in violation of Wyoming law. And this means that at the time of his encounter with Defendant, the law was not clearly established in Plaintiff's favor, such that a reasonable officer would have known that seizing Plaintiff was against the law.")

Wright v. Collison, 651 F. App'x 745, 748-49 (10th Cir. 2016) ("We dispose of the claims against Sheriff Stanley on the clearly-established-law prong. '[W]e inquire whether, under [Mr. Wright's] version of the facts, then-extant clearly established law would have given Sheriff [Stanley] fair warning that he could be held liable for his conduct under a supervisory-liability theory for violating [Mr. Wright's due-process] rights.'. . .Although Sheriff Stanley argued that Mr. Wright had not presented evidence that the suggested remedies were feasible (and Mr. Wright has not disputed that a sheriff was required to take all prisoners brought for booking), the district court said it should not weigh the evidence on the matter. It concluded that Sheriff Stanley's supervisory conduct could be considered unconstitutional because it was clearly established that 'prison officials have a duty to protect prisoners from violence at the hands of other prisoners.'. . But the law governing a sheriff's obligations in these circumstances was not clearly established. The issue is whether case law existing as of August 2011 would alert any reasonable sheriff that he had a constitutional duty to reduce overcrowding by any of the measures suggested by Mr. Wright. But neither Mr. Wright nor the district court has cited such case law. Sheriff Stanley is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Wright v. Collison, 651 F. App'x 745, 750 (10th Cir. 2016) ("At the time of Mr. Wright's beating, the law was clearly settled that prison authorities had a constitutional obligation to act to protect a prisoner who had been plausibly threatened with serious harm by fellow inmates. . . A defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity simply because the threat and the surrounding circumstances in his or her case are not identical to those in any precedent. If the evidence reveals that the threat of serious injury is plausible, the duty to protect is clear. As for whether Officers Collison and Cannon acted with deliberate indifference, we believe that a reasonable juror could believe that their decision to put Mr. Wright in the cell, rather than keeping him in their custody while deciding where best to place him, showed not just negligence but the requisite recklessness. We therefore affirm the court's denial of the qualified-immunity motions by Officers Collison and Cannon.")

Columbian Fin. Corp. v. Stork, 811 F.3d 390, 393 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Columbian Financial alleged violation of a clearly established right to procedural due process when commission officials seized the bank's assets and placed them under FDIC receivership without a predeprivation hearing or a prompt postdeprivation hearing. In our view, Ms. Stork and Mr. Thull enjoy qualified immunity on this claim because the alleged conduct would not have violated a clearly established constitutional right. Thus, we agree with the district court's decision to dismiss the claims for damages against Ms. Stork and Mr. Thull.")

Sanchez v. Hartley, 810 F.3d 750, 760-61(10th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e conclude that the defendants should have realized that the knowing or reckless use of a false confession to institute legal process would violate a clearly established constitutional right. The purported uncertainty did not involve the constitutionality of the conduct; instead, the purported uncertainty involved whether the violation would

• constitute malicious prosecution or false imprisonment and
• involve the Fourth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment's right to procedural due process.

In our view, the defendants misread our precedents, which by 2009 had clearly recognized malicious-prosecution claims under the Fourth Amendment after the initiation of a legal process resulting in an unreasonable seizure. . . The district court properly held that Mr. Sanchez had adequately alleged the violation of a clearly established constitutional right. As a result, we uphold the denial of the defendants' motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.")

See also Sanchez v. Hartley, No. 13-CV-1945-WJM-CBS, 2017 WL 4838738, at *22–23, *30 (D. Colo. Oct. 26, 2017) ("The Court is fully aware of the Supreme Court's recent emphasis on defining clearly established rights with specificity, see, e.g., White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552 (2017), but the specificity Dickson seeks is absurd. Pierce established as of 2004 that a government official responsible for investigating a crime can be liable for malicious prosecution if that official knowingly or recklessly supplies false evidence against the accused. Dickson cannot reasonably claim that he needed further notice specifically that he could be liable even where other police officers, the prosecutor, the judge, etc., could have discovered for themselves that he introduced false evidence into the investigation. . . In short, no Defendant can claim qualified immunity in this case if there is a genuine dispute of fact over whether that Defendant subjectively formed the opinion, or recklessly disregarded a serious suspicion, that Sanchez's confession was false. Stated somewhat differently, is there enough evidence from which a reasonable jury could agree with Sanchez that a particular Defendant has been lying about his or her state of mind since 2009? The Court must keep this question in mind for the remainder of its analysis. The Court now turns to the elements of Sanchez's claim that Defendants have variously challenged. . . .Sanchez has shown he is prepared to introduce competent evidence of the six factual scenarios that the Tenth Circuit endorsed as sufficient to establish knowledge or reckless disregard. The Tenth Circuit has further established that knowledge or reckless disregard in these circumstances would strip an official of qualified immunity. . . Thus, the qualified immunity question as to each Defendant turns on genuine disputes of material fact that a jury must resolve, and this case must accordingly be set for trial.")

Henderson v. Glanz, 813 F.3d 938, 953 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Ms. Henderson has provided no authority clearly establishing that an officer violates the Eighth Amendment when that officer, as here with DO Thomas, has no subjective knowledge of risk of assault to an inmate, leaves to attend to a medical emergency, and does so believing the inmate is in a locked room under the guard of another officer. Moreover, although DO Thomas may have violated Jail policy by leaving the medical unit in the care of only DO Johnson, Ms. Henderson offers no authority to show this was a clearly established constitutional violation. Because Ms. Henderson has not carried her burden to show violation of a clearly established constitutional right, the district court erred in denying DO Thomas qualified immunity.") Callahan v. Unified Gov't of Wyandotte Cty., 806 F.3d 1022, 1027-30 (10th Cir. 2015) ("We have discretion to decide which prong of the qualified immunity analysis to address first. . . Because we conclude that Plaintiffs have not carried their burden in showing that the law was clearly established, it is unnecessary to address whether Defendants had probable cause. In this circuit, to show that a right is clearly established, the plaintiff must point to 'a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.'. . The law is also clearly established if the conduct is so obviously improper that any reasonable officer would know it was illegal. . . Without such conduct, case, or consensus, we may not second-guess judgments of law enforcement with the benefit of hindsight. Plaintiffs and the district court confounded this inquiry by engaging in generic, overbroad, and conclusory analyses on the question of clearly established law. Both assert that the law was clearly established that an officer must have probable cause to make a warrantless arrest.

Of course it was. But such a sweeping pronouncement of the law could not put Defendants on fair notice that their conduct was illegal. Presenting the issue so broadly is at odds with the Supreme Court's consistent admonishment 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Though 'a case directly on point' is not required, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The proper and properly-focused inquiry is whether the law was clearly established that an officer could not arrest an entire small group when he knows some unidentifiable members, if not all members, of that group have committed a crime. This question of probable cause in multi-suspect situations is far from beyond debate. Plaintiffs and the district court relied upon Ybarra v. Illinois to remind us that probable cause must be particularized to the individual who is searched or seized. . . Indeed, Ybarra may have served as a case on point if Maryland v. Pringle—which the district court appears to have overlooked in its clearly established law analysis—had never been decided. But Pringle makes the question debatable at the very least, and therefore precludes a finding that the law was clearly established. . . .Before we hold officers liable, we must ensure that they were fairly put on notice that their actions were unlawful. The contours of the law must be sufficiently drawn so that a reasonable officer knows when he is acting outside of those lines—the law must be clearly established. That was simply not the case here. Though Ybarra requires particularized probable cause, Pringle raises questions regarding how that requirement is satisfied in multi-suspect situations. The officer in Pringle knew a crime had been committed but could not identify the perpetrator. He was presented with three suspects, none of whom were independently suspected prior to the stop. Evidence of a "common enterprise" existed, and so the officer could reasonably infer that all present were involved in the crime. In such a scenario, the Supreme Court seemed satisfied that Ybarra's particularized probable cause requirement was met. . . But what if there were ten passengers, not three? What if the suspects were in a house, not a car? What if they were engaged in theft, not drug dealing? The Court did not establish a clear standard for applying Pringle beyond its specific facts. But neither are the facts of this case so distinct from Pringle that an officer could not reasonably assume it applied. Simply put, Pringle's application to this case is debatable. . .We cannot ask officers to make a legal determination—that law professors probably could not agree upon—without any guidance from the courts and then hold them liable for guessing incorrectly. Qualified immunity exists to prevent exactly that. Plaintiffs offer us no other case on point to establish that Defendants violated their clearly established rights by arresting the entire unit.")

Toler v. Troutt, 631 F. App'x 545, 547-48 (10th Cir. 2015) ("We disagree with the district court's framing of what had to be clearly established. In stating that deliberate indifference to an inmate's medical needs is a clearly established constitutional violation, . . . the district court's parameters were overly broad. If such a general statement of the constitutional violation that must be clearly established were sufficient, qualified immunity would almost never be granted. In this case, the proper inquiry is whether it was clearly established that Dr. Troutt's conduct—prescribing a medication in treating Mr. Toler's medical condition that was different than the medication recommended by consulting physicians—was deliberately indifferent to Mr. Toler's medical needs. Not only was this not clearly established, but the law was clearly established to the contrary.

. . . Alloway, which the magistrate judge relied on to establish the predicate constitutional violation, offers no support for a clearly-established-law argument. In addition to being a single nonprecedential decision of a panel of our court, it is distinguishable from the situation here because it involved a complete denial of medication, as opposed to the substitution of alternative medicines as in this case, and applied a forgiving abuse of discretion standard to the granting of injunctive relief. . . . The bottom line is that Mr. Toler identifies no decision clearly establishing the proposition that exercising medical judgment in prescribing one course of treatment over another constitutes deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. He cannot identify such precedent because our controlling precedent clearly establishes the law to the contrary.")

Maresca v. Bernalillo Cnty., 804 F.3d 1301, 1310-12 (10th Cir. 2015) ("The arrests at issue here were not supported by probable cause because Fuentes lacked an objectively reasonable basis to believe that the Marescas' truck was stolen. An unreasonable mistake of fact cannot furnish probable cause. . . .Moreover, in determining whether there is probable cause, officers are charged with knowledge of any 'readily available exculpatory evidence' that they unreasonably fail to ascertain. . . .In this case, such readily available exculpatory evidence included the stolen-vehicle description already on Fuentes's computer screen before the arrest, which did not match the Marescas' truck in style, make, model, year, color, license plate number, or registration status; and the corrective information that dispatch presumably would have provided had Fuentes waited for verification, in accordance with her training. These steps were not taken. . . .The sole basis for arresting the Marescas was Fuentes's mistaken and unreasonable belief that their truck was stolen. That belief arose because Fuentes mistyped the Marescas' license plate number into her computer, thereby triggering the stolen vehicle report. We do not hold that a mere typing error in entering a license plate number would make it unreasonable for the officer to rely on the result of the database inquiry. In the often unpredictable and fast-paced context of traffic stops, we cannot require perfection—only reasonable behavior. Our conclusion that it was unreasonable for Fuentes to arrest the Marescas is based upon all the circumstances of the case and, in particular, Fuentes's failure to use readily available information—already on the computer screen in front of her and from the dispatcher—to verify that the Marescas' vehicle was reported stolen before arresting them. . . .Every application of the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard is fact-dependent, and the myriad circumstances officers confront do not lend themselves to bright-line rules. Thus, we do not suggest that an officer must always double-check a database hit or await confirmation from dispatch that the hit is accurate. There are undoubtedly circumstances that would justify a reasonably prudent officer's decision to bypass such steps. However, in the circumstances of this case, which did not suggest any likely threat to the arresting officers or any need for immediate action preventing verification, a reasonable officer would be expected to confirm the accuracy of her information in light of the disparity between the vehicle described on the stolen vehicle report and that driven by the Marescas. In fact, Fuentes could have detected her error by merely reading (or rereading) the computer screen right in front of her that reported the database result. . . . Therefore, the undisputed facts establish that Fuentes violated the Fourth Amendment when she arrested the Marescas without probable cause. And it was clearly established, at the time of this arrest, that an officer must have probable cause to arrest an individual, and the officer must reasonably investigate readily available exculpatory evidence 'before invoking the power of warrantless arrest and detention.'. . We therefore conclude that Fuentes is not entitled to qualified immunity on the Marescas' unlawful arrest claim, and, to the contrary, the Marescas are entitled to summary judgment against Deputy Fuentes on that claim.")

Maresca v. Bernalillo Cnty., 804 F.3d 1301, 1315-16 (10th Cir. 2015) ("[W]e reject the officers' argument that the Marescas' excessive force claim fails as a matter of law because any injuries the Marescas suffered were 'de minimis.' As an initial matter, it is not clear that a § 1983 excessive force claim raising excessive force issues beyond mere handcuff use would fail at the summary judgment stage if the plaintiff alleged and submitted evidence of only de minimis injury. . . . Generally, since Cortez, the Tenth Circuit has required a showing of more than de minimis injury only in Fourth Amendment excessive force cases based on handcuffing. . . Here, however, we need not decide whether the Marescas need to show more than de minimis injury because the Marescas presented evidence that each of them suffered psychological and emotional injury that significantly exceeded any de minimis requirement. . . .Under Cortez, we must consider whether the Marescas have an excessive force claim that is separate from and in addition to their unlawful arrest claim. The reasonableness of the force used during an arrest ordinarily involves questions of fact for the jury. . . That is the case here. Because there are genuine disputes of facts that are material to the question of whether the deputies used excessive force to arrest the Marescas—including whether the deputies pointed their weapons at members of the Maresca family and whether the deputies made nine-year-old M.M. lie on the highway with her hands behind her back—summary judgment is not appropriate on this claim for any party.")

[See also United States v. Rodella, 804 F.3d 1317, 1327-29 (10th Cir. 2015)([T]his court's post-Cortez cases reflect the view that the holding in Cortez is limited to handcuffing cases. . . Moreover, the Supreme Court's decision in Wilkins v. Gaddy . . . effectively rebuts any assertion that Cortez's 'de minimis injury' requirement is applicable beyond handcuffing-only cases. . . . Notably, the Eighth Circuit has applied Wilkins to Fourth Amendment excessive force claims generally, while carving out a narrow exception for handcuffing-only claims. Specifically, in Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898 (8th Cir.2011), the Eighth Circuit rejected the notion 'that evidence of only de minimis injury necessarily forecloses a claim of excessive force under the Fourth Amendment.'. . . The Eleventh Circuit has also applied the holding in Wilkins to an excessive force claim brought under the Fourth Amendment. . . . In light of the authorities discussed above, we reject the central premise of Rodella's argument, i.e., that there is a de minimis injury requirement for Fourth Amendment excessive force claims in cases which involve more than handcuffing. . . As a result, we conclude Rodella's challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence underlying his conviction for violating 18 U.S.C. § 242 is without merit.")]

Arden v. McIntosh, 622 F. App'x 707, 711 (10th Cir. 2015) ("[W]e examine the state of the law in August 2010 to determine whether it was clearly established that in serving a community caretaking function, a police officer was prohibited from removing firearms from the home of the suicidal homeowner. Deputy Bondell was faced with the following circumstances: a 911 emergency call reported a suicidal party/drug overdose; she arrived to find Mr. Arden in his bedroom, incoherent and unresponsive to the point of needing help to walk to the ambulance, so he could be taken to the hospital where he was placed on a mental health hold; she observed several firearms in plain sight, some in Mr. Arden's bedroom within his reach; and she was aware that Mr. Arden had attempted suicide just ten days earlier. We have found no authority clearly establishing that firearms may not constitutionally be removed from a residence under these circumstances. . . Therefore, we conclude that a reasonable officer could believe that she was authorized to remove the firearms temporarily. This is sufficient to establish Deputy Bondell's qualified-immunity defense as a matter of law.")

McInerney v. King, 791 F.3d 1224, 1238 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Although there is no Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court precedent dealing with the exact factual scenario we have here, 'there will almost never be a previously published opinion involving exactly the same circumstances,' and '[w]e cannot find qualified immunity wherever we have a new fact pattern.'. . To be sure, 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . Simply put, Officer King had fair notice that his conduct in entering Ms. McInerney's house without a warrant was unlawful. Moreover, based on the existing case law at the time of Officer King's warrantless entry—both those cases finding exigent circumstances and those holding such circumstances were not present—it was clearly established that the circumstances he confronted did not constitute exigent circumstances. Finally, it was clearly established that officers may not create exigent circumstances to justify their actions. Thus, the district court erred in granting Officer King summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Waugh v. Dow, 617 F. App'x 867, 878-79 (10th Cir. 2015) ("The law governing the constitutional assessment of Deputy Dow's conduct, as to both the state-created danger theory and the deliberate-indifference standard for actions taken with time for actual deliberation, was clearly established at the time of the operative events—as evident from the precedent cited throughout this decision. While none of this precedent involved a citizen-assistance situation like that here, '[a] previous decision need not be materially factually similar or identical to the present case; instead, the contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . And this circuit has noted that 'the more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.'. . Applying these standards to the record developed thus far, we agree with the district court that a reasonable officer in Deputy Dow's position would have understood that his conduct—involving the creation of, and a conscience-shocking deliberate indifference to, a substantial risk of serious and immediate harm to Mr. Waugh—violated Mr. Waugh's constitutional rights.")

Browder v. City of Albuquerque, 787 F.3d 1076, 1082-83 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Having determined that, taking the facts alleged as true, Sergeant Casaus violated the constitutional rights of Ashley and Lindsay Browder one more question still remains: were those rights clearly established at the time at issue in this case such that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he [was] doing' violated them? . . . Unless we can say so much, Sergeant Casaus rightly reminds us, he remains entitled to qualified immunity, whatever he may have done. In deciding the 'clearly established law' question this court employs a 'sliding scale' under which 'the more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.'. .. After all, some things are so obviously unlawful that they don't require detailed explanation and sometimes the most obviously unlawful things happen so rarely that a case on point is itself an unusual thing. Indeed, it would be remarkable if the most obviously unconstitutional conduct should be the most immune from liability only because it is so flagrantly unlawful that few dare its attempt. . . . Ours is perhaps a case along these lines. We've encountered plenty of cases involving officers responding to emergency calls who unintentionally cause traffic accidents. But we haven't encountered many cases involving deadly traffic accidents with officers speeding on their own business—presumably (hopefully) because such things happen rarely. Even so, the Supreme Court and this court have both spoken unmistakably to this situation. In Lewis, the officer was using his police car to respond to an emergency and the Court held he didn't violate the Constitution. But the Court also expressly noted when a private person suffers a serious physical injury '"due to a police officer's intentional misuse of his vehicle"' a viable due process claim can arise. . . As early as 1996, this court warned that an officer who kills a person while speeding at 60 miles an hour on surface streets absent any emergency and in violation of state law invites a Fourteenth Amendment claim. Williams v. City and County of Denver, 99 F.3d 1009 (10th Cir.1996), vacated, 140 F.3d 855 (10th Cir.1997). Though this court eventually vacated the Williams panel decision and remanded the case for reconsideration in light of Lewis, the result proved the same in the end precisely because Lewis itself made the same point the Williams panel had. See Williams v. City and County of Denver, Civ. Act. No. 90 N 1176, at 16 (D.Colo. Sept. 28, 1999). Indeed, in Green this court noted Williams's warning with approval. 574 F.3d at 1298 n. 5. And it proceeded to hold that, as of 2006, it was clearly established 'a police officer could be liable under the Fourteenth Amendment' for driving in a manner that exhibits 'a conscience-shocking deliberate indifference' to the lives of those around him. . . Taken collectively, we believe all this was more than enough to make clear to any reasonable officer in 2013 (the time of the accident) that the conduct alleged here could give rise to a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment.")

Quinn v. Young, 780 F.3d 998, 1007-14 (10th Cir. 2015) ("[T]he salient Fourth Amendment questions presented are (1) whether the Officers possessed probable cause to arrest Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez for committing larceny in this sting operation; and (2) whether extant clearly established law in July of 2010 would have placed a reasonable, similarly situated police officer on notice that no probable cause existed for the warrantless arrests in this sting operation—more specifically, that no probable cause existed that Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez intended to permanently deprive another of property. As our qualified-immunity jurisprudence permits us to do, we exercise our discretion to proceed straight to the latter question and resolve this claim on the clearly-established-law prong of our qualified-immunity test. . . That is, without deciding whether the Officers violated Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights by effecting the arrests at issue, we conclude that any constitutional violation would not have been apparent based on the clearly established law existing at that time. It follows ineluctably that the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim. . . .Our qualified-immunity conclusion is predicated upon the specific factual context of the Officers' conduct—a larceny sting operation—which presents a set of 'circumstance[s] unique in itself' under extant clearly established law. . . As we detail below, Plaintiffs have not directed us to any clearly established law involving such sting operations or an analogous law-enforcement setting, nor did the district court rely on any such law. This caselaw void is significant and ultimately determinative because we cannot confidently conclude that a reasonable officer engaged in a sting operation, such as the one here, would have had fair warning based on the holdings of non-sting cases regarding the quantum and quality of proof necessary to establish probable cause for a larceny offense, especially with respect to a suspect's specific intent—that is, the intent to permanently deprive another of property. We are not alone among the circuit courts in recognizing that sting operations present unique questions relating to suspect culpability, particularly regarding the question of intent. . . .Ultimately, having carefully reviewed the specific non-sting authorities that Plaintiffs identify here, and upon which the district court relied, we determine that the Officers would not have had fair warning that their arrests of Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez were lacking in probable cause, including regarding the intent element. In other words, in the context of the Tact Plan's backpack sting operation, we conclude that no constitutional violation would have been apparent to the Officers based on the extant clearly established law. As explained below, the district court's clearly-established-law analysis was conducted at too high a level of generality—both with respect to our caselaw and with respect to New Mexico law. And Plaintiffs' attempt to bolster the district court's analysis through further authorities is unavailing. In sum, because the district court did not rely upon, and Plaintiffs have not identified, any extant clearly established law that would have given the Officers fair warning that they lacked probable cause to effect arrests of Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez in their larceny sting operation, we conclude that the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity and the district court erred in finding to the contrary. . . .At bottom, by relying upon Keylon in such a general sense, the district court committed error. . . Keylon provides negligible support for the proposition that the law was clearly established that arresting Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez in this backpack sting operation would violate their Fourth Amendment rights to be free from unlawful seizure. . . . Accordingly, for the reasons stated herein, we must reject the district court's generalized clearly-established-law analysis. Putting a finer point on the matter, we cannot agree with the district court's conclusion that Keylon or Miller could 'be said to arguably place the [O]fficers on notice that their actions were unconstitutional[]'. . . when they arrested Mr. Quinn and Ms. Gonzalez in this larceny sting operation. . . . Even putting aside the truth that there are no cases in the extant clearly established law that precisely correspond to the facts of the instant case—involving a larceny sting operation—Plaintiffs cannot overcome the fact that there are no cases within the relevant temporal period that even slightly resemble these facts. And we know from our precedent that the correspondence must be 'substantial.'. . Therefore, Plaintiffs' reliance on Lawmaster as support for a generalized clearly-established-law analysis—of the type the district court undertook here—is unavailing.")

Seifert v. Unified Gov't of Wyandotte Cnty./Kansas City, 779 F.3d 1141, 1150-52, 1159 (10th Cir. 2015) ("We hold that under Lane v. Franks, 134 S.Ct. 2369 (2014), Plaintiff's testimony was protected by the First Amendment; that there is a triable issue of fact about whether Plaintiff was removed from investigations and had his commission revoked because of his testimony in Bowling; and that the Unified Government is potentially liable because the actions of Sheriff Ash represented municipal policy. On the other hand, we hold that Sheriff Ash and Undersheriff Roland are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's § 1983 claim because when they acted the law was not clearly established that Plaintiff's testimony was protected by the First Amendment. . . .[T]he Court [in Lane] did not hold that all testimony is protected. It did not address 'whether truthful sworn testimony would constitute citizen speech under Garcetti when given as part of a public employee's ordinary job duties.'. . . Here, Plaintiff's testimony was protected speech. It concerned his work but was not part of it. Although Defendants assert that testifying was a routine part of Plaintiff's job as a reserve deputy, they cite no supporting evidence. And the testimony he gave at the Bowling trial was nothing like the routine testimony of law-enforcement agents in support of criminal prosecutions. Plaintiff testified for a private party, not his public employer; in a civil lawsuit, not a criminal prosecution; against law-enforcement entities, not for them; and in compliance with a subpoena, not an employer mandate. His testimony was not among 'the type of activities that [he] was paid to do.'. . .Was the law clearly established in 2009 and 2010, when Ash and Roland committed the alleged misconduct, that testimony by a law-enforcement officer about matters observed while on duty could be protected by the First Amendment? We think not. The Supreme Court did not address the specific issue before Lane was handed down in June 2014, neither did we, and in 2010 other circuits were divided. [collecting cases] And Lane held that the individual defendant in that case was entitled to qualified immunity because 'no decision of this Court was sufficiently clear to cast doubt' on controlling lower-court precedent. . . We hold that Ash and Roland did not have 'reasonable warning that [their] conduct ... violated constitutional rights' and are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ragsdell v. Reg'l Hous. Alliance of La Plata Cnty., 603 F. App'x 653, 655-56 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor our court has ever applied the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause to unequal treatment based on a failure to accommodate an employee's disability. To the contrary, both courts have suggested that the Equal Protection Clause does not apply in these circumstances. For example, the Supreme Court has observed that '[i]f special accommodations for the disabled are to be required, they have to come from positive law and not through the Equal Protection Clause.'. . And, we have rejected an equal protection claim by a disabled job applicant, reasoning that 'nothing in the United States Constitution requires the City to accommodate [the disabled applicant's] condition.'. . Other courts have reached similar conclusions. . .In the absence of precedential or widespread support, Ms. Lopez lacked notice of a constitutional requirement to accommodate Mr. Ragsdell's disability. . . .For the sake of argument, we may assume that Ms. Lopez's conduct was irrational and violated Mr. Ragsdell's right to equal protection. But, these assumptions would not preclude qualified immunity, for Mr. Ragsdell 'must do more than simply allege the violation of a general legal precept' such as the rational-basis standard for equal protection. . . He must also show that existing law would have alerted Ms. Lopez to the unlawfulness of her actions. . . .Against the existing legal backdrop, Ms. Lopez would have had little reason to expect a court to regard denial of accommodation to Mr. Ragsdell as unconstitutional under the rational-basis standard.")

McDonald v. Wise, 769 F.3d 1202, 1215 (10th Cir. 2014) ("Mayor Hancock. . .was in a position to provide due process, and the right to a name-clearing hearing in these circumstances is a clearly established constitutional right. See Wisconsin v. Constantineau, 400 U.S. 433, 437 (1971). ("Where a person's good name, reputation, honor, or integrity is at stake because of what the government is doing to him, notice and an opportunity to be heard are essential."). Thus, Mayor Hancock is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Al-Turki v. Robinson, 762 F.3d 1188, 1195(10th Cir. 2014) ("We are unpersuaded by Defendant's [prison nurse] argument that facts unknown to her at the time of her conduct can now insulate her actions from liability because these then-unknown facts do not precisely align with the facts of previous Tenth Circuit cases. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Defendant violated clearly established law by choosing to ignore Plaintiff's repeated complaints of severe abdominal pain and requests for medical assistance, thus completely denying him any medical care 'although presented with recognizable symptoms which potentially create[d] a medical emergency.'")

Van De Weghe v. Chambers, 569 F. App'x 617, 619, 620 (10th Cir. 2014) ("[E]ven if the officers and prosecutor had probable cause for thinking him guilty of evidence tampering, Mr. Van De Weghe insists they didn't have probable cause to believe he'd committed some of the other crimes he was charged with—including theft and perjury. But even if we assume this is just as Mr. Van De Weghe alleges, he still faces a problem. He still has not identified any clearly established law suggesting that a claim for malicious prosecution lies when one charge is supported by probable cause but other simultaneous charges arising from the same set of facts are not. Put differently, he hasn't borne his burden of demonstrating that the law is clear that an individual may pursue a claim for malicious prosecution when at least some of the charges against him were supported by probable cause. The failure to carry that burden is fatal to his claim. . . Though this court bears no obligation to conjure arguments for the parties, as it happens our own research has turned up little that might've helped Mr. Van De Weghe carry his burden anyway. The Third Circuit has expressly held that probable cause to pursue one charge 'preclude[s] the plaintiff from proceeding with [a] malicious prosecution claim with respect to any' other charge brought simultaneously against her and arising from the same set of facts. . . True, at least two other circuits disagree, reasoning that 'when it comes to prosecution, the number and nature of the charges matters'—extra charges may impose extra costs and each may be attacked separately. . . But this court hasn't definitively spoken to the question either way. We have case law suggesting that a malicious prosecution claim arises when 'there was no probable cause to support the ... prosecution,' a formulation that at least arguably leans the Third Circuit's way. . . But in an unpublished decision we seem to have assumed something closer to the Second and Seventh Circuit's view, though without acknowledging or considering the split of authority. . . In these circumstances—without a binding opinion from the Supreme Court, with uncertain signals in this court, and with other courts unmistakably divided—it becomes difficult to conjure how Mr. Van De Weghe might have cleared the 'clearly established law' hurdle even if he had tried.")

Estate of Booker v. Gomez, 745 F.3d 405, 427-29, 434 (10th Cir. 2014) ("[A] reasonable jury could conclude that the Defendants' use of substantial pressure on Mr. Booker's back, a two-minute carotid hold on his neck, and a taser while Mr. Booker was subdued and struggling to breathe in a prone position demonstrated the requisite level of culpability for a due process violation. We hold that the Plaintiffs met their burden to show the Defendants violated Mr. Booker's constitutional rights because a reasonable jury could conclude the Defendants engaged in excessive force in violation of the Due Process Clause. . . .We have therefore 'adopted a sliding scale to determine when law is clearly established' in which '[t]he more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.'. . . Defendants assert that Plaintiffs cannot rely on Fourth Amendment case law to show that any violation of Mr. Booker's constitutional rights was clearly established. They argue the 'Plaintiffs failed to identify any due process case involving a use of force in a correctional setting that would have put any of the deputies on notice that the force that was used—either individually or collectively—was unconstitutional.'. .The Defendants are mistaken. As noted above, Fourth Amendment case law addressing whether force is 'reasonable' is relevant to the first due process excessive force factor: the relationship between the amount of force used and the need presented. . . Cases finding force to be unreasonable necessarily imply that the use of force was disproportionate to the need presented. Indeed, the Graham Fourth Amendment excessive force factors are consistent with the disproportionate force analysis under the Fourteenth Amendment: (1) the severity of the offense, (2) whether the subject posed an immediate threat to the safety of officers or others, and (3) whether the subject resists officers. . . .Here, despite any uncertainty about which constitutional amendment governs the Plaintiffs' excessive force claim, the 'legal norms' underlying the three—factor due process analysis-proportionality, injury, and motive—were clearly established at the time of Mr. Booker's death. Weigel (pressure on back), Casey (taser), and the weight of authority from other jurisdictions (neck restraint). . . put Defendants on notice that use of such force on a person who is not resisting and who is restrained in handcuffs is disproportionate. . . .Mr. Booker was handcuffed, prone on his stomach, and not resisting while much of the disproportionate use of force occurred. We conclude not only that a reasonable jury could find the Defendants violated Mr. Booker's due process right, but also that this right was clearly established at the time of their conduct. We therefore affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment on Plaintiffs' excessive force claim. . . .Here, the contours of the right are clearly established such that any reasonable officer in the Defendants' position (and with their training) would have known that failing to check Mr. Booker's vital signs, perform CPR, or seek medical care for three minutes when he was limp and unconscious as a result of the Defendants' use of force could violate the Constitution. . . .In light of the foregoing, any reasonable officer in the Defendants' position—having rendered Mr. Booker unconscious by use of force with at least a two-minute carotid neck hold, roughly 140 pounds of pressure on his back, and an eight-second taser stun—should have known that failing to check Mr. Booker's vitals or seek immediate medical attention could evince deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. Accordingly, the conduct alleged by the Plaintiffs—if proven at trial and accepted by the jury—violated clearly established law.")

Cillo v. City of Greenwood Village, 739 F.3d 451, 466 (10th Cir. 2013) ("We . . . hold that the individual defendants are not entitled to summary judgment based on the second requirement for § 1983 qualified immunity because Sgt. Cillo's First Amendment right to associate with a Union was a clearly established right at the time of his termination.")

Panagoulakos v. Yazzie, 741 F.3d 1126, 1129-31 (10th Cir. 2013) ("As the 'clearly established' prong resolves this case, we begin with it. . . .All roads lead to the same conclusion in this case; we need address only one. Even assuming arguendo that clearly established law demonstrated that Officer Yazzie no longer had probable cause to detain Panagoulakos after her review of the protective order. . . , Panagoulakos would still bear the burden of showing that clearly established law imposed a duty on Officer Yazzie to release him. In other words, Panagoulakos must show that, even though probable cause supported his initial arrest, clearly established law gave fair warning to Officer Yazzie that following her review of the protective order it was her constitutional duty to release him. There is only one standard to which the parties point that could impose such a duty. In Thompson v. Olson, the First Circuit held that 'following a legal warrantless arrest based on probable cause, an affirmative duty to release arises only if the arresting officer ascertains beyond a reasonable doubt that the suspicion (probable cause) which forms the basis for the privilege to arrest is unfounded.'. . For Panagoulakos to prevail, the Tenth Circuit must have adopted the Thompson standard, and it must be clearly established that the Thompson standard required his release under these facts. . . Quite to the contrary, we have never applied the Thompson standard in a published opinion. . . . Nor has the 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts' imposed a duty to release under these circumstances. . . A handful of other courts have adopted some form of the Thompson standard. [collecting cases] But those courts do not represent the 'clearly established weight of authority of other courts.'. . The majority of courts have never imposed such a duty, much less under circumstances similar enough to make 'the contours of the right ... sufficiently clear that a reasonable official' in Officer Yazzie's position would understand that her actions violated that right. . .In short, Officer Yazzie is entitled to qualified immunity because no clearly established law imposed on her a duty to release Panagoulakos following his lawful arrest after the traffic stop.")

Panagoulakos v. Yazzie, No. 13–2003, 2013 WL 6698134, *5-*8 (10th Cir. Dec. 20, 2013)(Holloway, J., dissenting) ("It is clear, in my view, that there was no probable cause for Officer Yazzie to file a criminal complaint against Mr. Panagoulakos, the Plaintiff, after Officer Yazzie had reviewed the protective order which she quite mistakenly believed provided such probable cause. . .The majority's holding that the officer is entitled to qualified immunity for her mistake of law is contrary to our precedents, most notably Courtney v. Oklahoma, 722 F.3d 1216, 1223 (10th Cir.2013). Accordingly, I respectfully dissent. . . .Defendant Yazzie was tasked with taking Plaintiff to the police station and with examining the protective order to see if Plaintiff was in violation of the law for being in possession of a firearm. It is undisputed that the order did not forbid Plaintiff from possessing a firearm. Defendant Yazzie, however, did not know the law and erroneously believed that all persons subject to protective orders are forbidden from possessing firearms. Finding no affirmative statement in the protective order to authorize Plaintiff's firearm possession, Defendant Yazzie did not merely fail to release Plaintiff, she took affirmative steps to insure his continued detention, which led directly to his being held in jail for eleven days on the completely invalid charge of violation of a protective order by possession of a firearm. The majority duly notes this act by Officer Yazzie, but its analysis completely ignores it. . . . In another recent case, our court addressed this issue in a case with closely analogous facts and held that an officer should have been denied qualified immunity for the continued detention of the plaintiff when facts learned during the initial detention would have made it clear to a reasonable officer in the defendant's position that she 'lacked lawful authority to extend the stop.' Courtney v. Oklahoma, 722 F.3d 1216, 1223 (10th Cir.2013). . . .Similarly, here a reasonable officer would have known that there was no probable cause to believe that Mr. Panagoulakos had committed the offense of possession of a firearm in violation of a protective order. . . .The magistrate judge here went on to consider whether Officer Yazzie might nevertheless be entitled to qualified immunity, focusing on whether the officer's mistake of law was one that could be considered reasonable. . Because the requirements of both state and federal law were clear and unambiguous, and both had been established law 'for a long time,' the court held that the mistake was not reasonable. . . . Further, '[t]he face of the actual Order of Protection vitiated the probable cause that existed at the time of Plaintiff's initial arrest, and Plaintiff was therefore unlawfully detained.'. .For these reasons, I am convinced that the district court was correct not only in denying Officer Yazzie's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, but also in granting partial summary judgment in favor of Mr. Panagoulakos on his claim that his Fourth Amendment rights were violated by Officer Yazzie.") Blackmon v. Sutton, 734 F.3d 1237, 1239-43 (10th Cir. 2013) ("The jurisprudential terrain between arrest and conviction remains today only partially charted. Over the last several decades, the Supreme Court has elaborated in considerable detail the standards of care prison administrators must satisfy to avoid inflicting 'cruel and unusual' punishment on convicted prisoners in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . The Court has, as well, expounded on what force officers may and may not use to effect an arrest consistent with the Fourth Amendment and its prohibition of 'unreasonable searches and seizures.'. . But at least so far the Court has done comparatively little to clarify the standards of care due to those who find themselves between these stools—held by the government after arrest but before conviction at trial. . .We know that after the Fourth Amendment leaves off and before the Eighth Amendment picks up, the Fourteenth Amendment's due process guarantee offers detainees some protection while they remain in the government's custody awaiting trial. . . But we do not know where exactly the Fourth Amendment's protections against unreasonable searches and seizures end and the Fourteenth Amendment's due process detainee protections begin. Is it immediately after arrest? Or does the Fourth Amendment continue to apply, say, until arraignment? Neither do we know with certainty whether a single standard of care applies to all pretrial detainees—or whether different standards apply depending where the detainee stands in his progress through the criminal justice system. Might, for example, the accused enjoy more due process protection before a probable cause hearing than after? All these questions remain very much in play. . .The defendants make much of these lingering questions, going so far as to suggest they preclude the possibility they could have violated the clearly established legal right of any pretrial detainee in 1997, the time of the events in question in this lawsuit. But that argument proves a good deal too much. In the defendants' world, officials who engaged in sadistic and malicious conduct in 1997 would have violated the defined rights of convicted inmates, but the same conduct would not have violated the rights of pretrial detainees because of the comparative ambiguity surrounding their rights. Though the law of pretrial detention may not have been precise in all its particulars in 1997, though it may remain comparatively ambiguous today, things have never been quite as topsy turvy as that. Pretrial detainees are not men without countries, persons without any clearly defined legal rights. By 1997, it was beyond debate that a pretrial detainee enjoys at least the same constitutional protections as a convicted criminal. . . Conduct that violates the clearly established rights of convicts necessarily violates the clearly established rights of pretrial detainees. By 1997, it was clearly established as well that prison officials run afoul of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments when they exhibit 'deliberate indifference' to a convicted inmate's 'serious medical needs.'. . It was clearly established, too, that Estelle's standard gives way to a more onerous test when 'guards use force to keep order.'. . In deference to the need to maintain order in a prison environment, liability will not attach in these particular circumstances unless the challenged force is 'applied ... maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.'. .Neither is this the end to what we know with certainty about the state of the law in 1997 regarding pretrial detainees. By then the Supreme Court had held that the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of due process prohibits any punishment of those awaiting trial. Punishment may be constitutionally acceptable for persons convicted of crimes—at least so long as it doesn't amount to 'cruel and unusual' punishment as defined by Estelle and Hudson. But punishment is never constitutionally permissible for presumptively innocent individuals awaiting trial. . . Where exactly do we draw the line between what does and doesn't constitute 'punishment'? Historically, the government has enjoyed the authority to detain until trial those defendants who pose a flight risk. And no doubt those who find themselves detained in this manner experience a great many restrictions on their liberty—restrictions many of us would regard as punishment in themselves. But when do these restrictions pass, as a matter of law, from constitutionally acceptable to constitutionally impermissible? Bell tells us the answer turns on the answers to two questions. First, we must ask whether an 'expressed intent to punish on the part of detention facility officials' exists. . . If so, liability may attach. If not, a plaintiff may still prove unconstitutional punishment by showing that the restriction in question bears no reasonable relationship to any legitimate governmental objective. . . .With these (clearly established) legal principles in hand, we can now turn to Mr. Blackmon's primary complaint: the many hours he spent shackled to the Pro–Straint chair. The district court analyzed his claim under Hudson's demanding Eighth Amendment 'malicious and sadistic' test for cruel and unusual punishments—and, even then, it found that Mr. Blackmon succeeded in stating a triable claim. We don't need to travel so far, however, to reach the same destination. While Hudson forbids a certain class of punishments for convicted prisoners (cruel and unusual ones), Bell forbids punishment altogether for pretrial detainees like Mr. Blackmon. And there is ample evidence in this case that the defendants at least sometimes used the Pro–Straint chair to punish their young charge. To be very clear, we do not doubt that the defendants often had a legitimate (nonpunitive) purpose for using the chair, or that its use was often reasonably related to that purpose. While awaiting trial—on charges of rape that were eventually thrown out—Mr. Blackmon was deeply distraught. The eleven-year-old attempted suicide and repeatedly banged his head dangerously against walls. No one disputes that the defendants had a legitimate interest in restraining him from these attempts at self-harm. Neither do we understand Mr. Blackmon to suggest that the use of restraints like the Pro–Straint chair is never a reasonable way to achieve this legitimate purpose. Indeed, we are confident Mr. Blackmon remains alive today thanks to the intervention of facility staff and they are due no small measure of credit for that. The problem is that the factual record in this case points in more than one direction. Much of it suggests that the defendants usually used the restraint chair in a reasonable effort to prevent Mr. Blackmon from killing or seriously injuring himself. But viewing the record in the light most favorable to Mr. Blackmon as we must, it also suggests the defendants sometimes shackled him with the express purpose of punishing him, in clear violation of Bell's first test. At least one defendant allegedly instructed others—openly—to use the chair as 'punishment.' The record evidence suggests the possibility, too, that on other occasions officials shackled Mr. Blackmon without any legitimate penological purpose, in clear violation of Bell's second test. Sometimes, Mr. Blackmon alleges, he was shackled to the chair for long stretches when there was no hint he posed a threat of harming himself or anyone else. Other times, Mr. Blackmon was placed in the chair because of a legitimate threat of self-harm but then arguably kept there for extensive periods after any threat of self-harm had dissipated. On one occasion, too, the boy was stripped out of his clothes and forced to wear a paper gown while restrained in the chair. All of this, says Mr. Blackmon's expert, left him with severe mental health problems. And in none of these instances does the record appear to reveal a legitimate penological reason for the defendants' actions. The district court held that facts like these preclude the entry of qualified immunity at summary judgment and we cannot disagree. By 1997, the defendants were on notice that they could not use restraints with the express purpose of punishing or without some legitimate penological purpose in mind. Yet the record here suggests they may have used restraints in both forbidden ways at least some of the time. In fact, as the district court observed, by 1997 this court had already held that the use of force without any 'disciplinary rationale' runs afoul even of the Eighth Amendment's protections for convicted prisoners. . . Under Bell and the Fourteenth Amendment, surely no less could have been said by then for pretrial detainees.")

Esparza v. Bowman, No. 12–2140, 2013 WL 1760932, *5 & n.5 (10th Cir. Apr. 25, 2013) ("Chief Bowman remains entitled to qualified immunity unless Mrs. Esparza can show that her First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory arrest was clearly established at the time of her arrest. We conclude she has. 'The freedom of individuals verbally to oppose or challenge police action without thereby risking arrest is one of the principal characteristics by which we distinguish a free nation from a police state.'. . Indeed, there can be no doubt that 'the First Amendment prohibits government officials from subjecting an individual to retaliatory actions, including criminal prosecutions, for speaking out.' Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 256 (2006). Consequently, accepting the facts as found by the district court on summary judgment, Mrs. Esparza has submitted sufficient evidence to overcome Chief Bowman's assertion of qualified immunity. Based on the evidence submitted thus far, we conclude that Mrs. Esparza has satisfied her burden to allege a violation of her clearly established right to be free from retaliatory arrest. . . . The Supreme Court's decision in Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012) does not alter our analysis because the evidence before the district court was sufficient to show that Mrs. Esparza's arrest was not otherwise supported by probable cause.")

Schwartz v. Booker, 702 F.3d 573, 587, 588 (10th Cir. 2012) ("Booker and Peagler assert entitlement to qualified immunity because no Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case has ever 'held that a government employee[,] who was not involved in limiting an individual's liberty, has a constitutional duty to protect that individual,' and, therefore, 'Ms. Booker [and] Ms. Peagler did not have "fair warning" that their alleged conduct could result in liability.'. . Booker and Peagler's argument broadly is one of 'the level of generality at which the constitutional right must be "clearly established."'. . They do not dispute that case law has clearly established that foster children have a Fourteenth Amendment constitutional right to be reasonably safe while in the State's custody. . . Rather, they contend that because no case law explicitly delineates their interpretation of the special-relationship exception—an argument contrary to their previous assertion that the case law explicitly requires such participation—the law was not clearly established. Booker and Peagler's argument is untenable. . . . Since 1985, case law in this circuit and the established weight of authority has clearly established that state officials could violate foster children's substantive due process rights if they knew of an asserted danger to a foster child or failed to exercise professional judgment with respect thereto. Booker and Peagler's singular argument regarding the construction of the special relationship doctrine does not negate that the contours of foster children's constitutional rights were clearly delineated in this circuit as well as other circuits. Accordingly, reasonable DHS officials overseeing the cases of foster children were on notice that such conduct would violate a foster child's constitutional right. . . Consequently, it was apparent, in light of pre-existing law, to a reasonable official in Booker's and Peagler's positions that failing to investigate the child abuse referrals and dismissing Chandler's case without investigation was an abdication of duty that would violate Chandler's substantive due process right to be reasonably safe from harm as a foster child.")

Stewart v. Beach, 701 F.3d 1322, 1330-33 (10th Cir. 2012) ("Stewart argues that Judge Robinson's definition of the constitutional right at issue was too narrow. Again, Judge Robinson's definition was 'whether it was clearly established that [Beach and Wilson] violated [Stewart's] First Amendment free exercise right by requiring him to cut his hair for security reasons.'. . Stewart asserts that the Supreme Court and the Tenth Circuit emphasize a broader standard and advocates for Judge Belot's definition: 'the right to reasonably exercise one's religion in prison[.]'. . . We disagree with Stewart's contention that a broader standard is necessary. . . . For example, in Reichle v. Howards, the Supreme Court recently reiterated its long-held view that 'the right allegedly violated must be established, not as a broad proposition, but in a particularized sense so that the contours of the right are clear to a reasonable official.'. . Applying this test to the free-speech claim before it, the Court concluded that 'the right in question is not the general right to be free from retaliation for one's speech, but the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause.'. .So too here, Judge Robinson's formulation of the First Amendment free-exercise right at issue is more specific—to be free from having to cut one's hair for prison security reasons based on one's sincerely held religious beliefs. We might add that cutting is apparently required because Stewart's hair could not be combed out. . .. The additional level of specificity is helpful to focus on case law that would have given Beach and Wilson 'reasonable warning that the conduct then at issue violated constitutional rights.'. . Contrary to Stewart's suggestion, a more precise definition does not lead to an overreliance on factual similarity but to a proper reliance. . . Applying Stewart's formulation would encompass a very broad spectrum of conduct directed at prisoners and result in the examination of cases that would not have given Beach and Wilson the requisite warning under the facts of this case. . . .In the absence of controlling authority, we may conclude that a constitutional right is clearly established if there is a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'. . To that end, we have reviewed all of the extra-circuit cases Stewart has identified, as well as those cases Judge Robinson discussed in her order. We agree with Judge Robinson's conclusion that they cut both ways. In some cases, courts have found that prison regulations requiring haircuts or prohibiting beards violate a prisoner's free exercise rights. [collecting cases] In other cases, courts have found that such regulations did not offend the First Amendment because the regulations were reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. [collecting cases] . . . In sum, from our survey of these cases, the most we can say is that Beach and Wilson had warning that enforcement of a grooming policy that required hair be capable of being combed out (or cut) might violate Stewart's free exercise right if the policy was not reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. But we cannot say that it was clearly established that their enforcement of the KDOC policy violated Stewart's constitutional rights. We therefore conclude that Beach and Wilson are entitled to qualified immunity on Stewart's First Amendment claim.")

Brown v. Montoya, 662 F.3d 1152, 1171 (10th Cir. 2011) ("Although Gwinn did not specifically resolve what level of procedural protections are due before a person may be directed to register as a sex offender outside of prison, its holding that an inmate is entitled to certain minimal procedural protections before being classified as a sex offender in prison clearly establishes that directing a person to register as a sex offender outside of prison triggers at least that level of process. Mr. Brown alleges that Officer Montoya did not provide him with any process, much less the level of procedural protections owed to a prison inmate before being classified as a sex offender. Accepting as true Mr. Brown's allegation that Officer Montoya had no factual basis to believe that his victim was a minor, it should have been apparent to a reasonable officer that classifying Mr. Brown as a sex offender violated his clearly established procedural due process right.")

Koch v. City of Del City, 660 F.3d 1228, 1241, 1246 (10th Cir. 2011) ("For the purposes of our qualified immunity inquiry, therefore, the relevant question is this: Could a reasonable officer in Officer Beech's position have believed that Ms. Koch had a legal obligation to answer questions about Ms. Lance's whereabouts, such that refusal to answer would constitute obstruction? Put another way, was it clearly established that Ms. Koch had a right not to answer these questions? . . . . As discussed above, at the time of Ms. Koch's arrest, there was neither Supreme Court nor Tenth Circuit precedent, nor clearly established weight of authority from other courts, recognizing a right to refuse to respond to an officer's questions during a Terry stop. A reasonable officer could therefore believe that, under the circumstances of this case, Ms. Koch was required to answer questions regarding Ms. Lance's whereabouts, and that her refusal to do so constituted a willful delay or obstruction of an officer's duty. Accordingly, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment in favor of Officer Beech on his qualified-immunity defense to Ms. Koch's false-arrest claim. We emphasize that our conclusion is specific to the facts of this case. We hold only that in this case, a reasonable officer could believe that Ms. Koch had information regarding Ms. Lance's location, that under the circumstances Ms. Koch was required to convey this information, and thus that her refusal to do so constituted obstruction. Summary judgment was therefore appropriate.")

Mascorro v. Billings, 656 F.3d 1198, 1208, 1209 (10th Cir. 2011) ("The constitutional right was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity if it would have been clear to a reasonable officer at the time the officers entered the Mascorro house that their entry was unlawful under the circumstances presented. . . For a right to be clearly established there must be Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court precedent close enough on point to make the unlawfulness of the officers' actions apparent. . . In the alternative, 'the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.'. .Relevant precedent clearly prohibits police from routinely entering a person's home to effectuate a warrantless arrest (even if the officers have probable cause to believe the person committed a felony), . . . and a minor offense does not permit warrantless entry into the home except in the most extraordinary of circumstances. . . . Our focus must be on whether an exception to bedrock constitutional principles clearly exists. There appears to be no relevant precedent announcing such an exception in cases such as this. While hot pursuit of a felon might be sufficient, neither the Supreme Court nor this Court . . . has ever found an entry into a person's home permissible based merely on the pursuit of a misdemeanant; additional circumstances have always dictated the result. . . . No reasonable officer would have thought pursuit of a minor for a mere misdemeanor traffic offense constituted the sort of exigency permitting entry into a home without a warrant.")

Tiscareno v. Anderson, 639 F.3d 1016, 1022-24 (10th Cir. 2011), reh'g granted and opinion vacated in part by Tiscareno v. Anderson 2011 WL 1549519 (10th Cir. Apr. 26, 2011) (not reported) ("Beyond police officers, we have extended Brady obligations to other personnel in the police department who are actively involved in a particular investigation. . . We have never addressed the question of whether someone like Anderson, the head of a child services agency, is subject to Brady duties. Courts examining somewhat similar situations have generally refused to deem social workers or child services agencies subject to Brady's requirements. . . . Although in a criminal prosecution, intent of the prosecutor and the investigative team is irrelevant, in a § 1983 context, all that is clearly established is that an investigator must not knowingly or recklessly cause a Brady violation. . . Turning to the facts of this case, we must determine if Tiscareno has alleged facts sufficient to show that Anderson violated any clearly established principle. Even a generous reading of the case law fails to establish clearly that Anderson's actions amounted to a constitutional deprivation. Several factors distinguishing this case from our past precedent make this apparent. First, Tiscareno does not allege that Anderson or DCFS actually participated in the investigation. . . In cases in which courts have held investigative agents and agencies are subject to Brady, the agent or agency has been involved in the 'particular' investigation. . . But Tiscareno alleges that Anderson is liable for failing to investigate and for improperly delegating DCFS's investigative responsibility to the doctors with whom DCFS worked. Further, Tiscareno does not allege that Anderson acted recklessly or in bad faith. . . Absent a specific reckless or intentional act on Anderson's part to withhold exculpatory evidence from the prosecutor and thus the defendant, we may not conclude that he violated clearly established law. . . . Anderson is entitled to qualified immunity because he acted reasonably in light of clearly established law. It was not clearly established at any time during the investigation of N.M.'s abuse that a child services agency, under state reporting requirements, had a duty pursuant to Brady to unearth, or train others to reveal, exculpatory evidence.")

Clark v. Wilson, 625 F.3d 686, 691, 692 (10th Cir. 2010) ("Although Sandin addresses liberty interests, we interpret it to extend the same analysis to protected property interest inquiries. . . We have since applied the Sandin analysis beyond the context of prison conditions. In Steffey v. Orman, for example, we held that a prisoner did not have a protected property interest in a money order sent to him by another prisoner's mother. . . . Because it is based on the 'legitimate expectations' methodology expressly abrogated by Sandin, Gillihan's holding that prisoners have a protected property interest in the funds in their prison trust accounts is no longer good law and, hence, not 'clearly established' in this circuit. . . As in Steffey, we cannot find Clark had a protected property interest in the frozen funds without first applying the Sandin test to his claim. But we have never before addressed the question of whether freezing a prison account in response to a garnishment summons imposes an atypical and significant hardship on an inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. Neither did any Supreme Court decision on point or clearly established authority from other circuits exist at the time of Wilson's actions. . . In sum, because neither the Supreme Court nor any court of appeals had applied Sandin's 'atypical and significant hardship' test to the freezing of a prison account by 2007, Wilson did not violate a clearly established constitutional right and hence is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Mink v. Knox, 613 F.3d 995, 1011 (10th Cir. 2010) ("[I]t was clearly established in this circuit that speech, such as parody and rhetorical hyperbole, which cannot reasonably be taken as stating actual fact, enjoys the full protection of the First Amendment and therefore cannot constitute the crime of criminal libel for purposes of a probable cause determination.").

Brammer-Hoelter v. Twin Peaks Charter Academy, 602 F.3d 1175, 1186, 1187 (10th Cir. 2010) ("More than twenty years ago, we held in Luethje that a school's interest in efficient functioning does not justify a broad ban on the discussion of 'school problems' with anyone except the school's principal. The minor differences between the ban in Luethje and the ban in this case–the distinction between 'school problems' and, in this case, the broader category of 'school matters,' and the addition in Luethje of one individual with whom these matters could be discussed–only make the unlawfulness of this ban more apparent. Although Defendants have asserted one governmental interest that the defendants in Luethje did not assert, an interest in deterring the disclosure of confidential student information, we are not persuaded that a reasonable official would conclude that this interest alone would justify almost the same restraint that we found unconstitutional in Luethje, particularly where this interest could easily be satisfied by a less sweeping restraint on speech. We therefore hold that Dr. Marlatt is not entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that her directives constituted an illegal prior restraint on speech.").

Brammer-Hoelter v. Twin Peaks Charter Academy, 602 F.3d 1175, 1186, 1188 (10th Cir. 2010) ("In this case, a reasonable administrator could have concluded from our preexisting precedent that each meeting by school employees to discuss various school-related matters would be considered a 'single instance of speech' and should be analyzed as a whole to determine whether it was protected by the First Amendment. Further, because the vast majority of speech that occurred at each meeting was unprotected speech relating to personal disputes with the school's administration and other matters of solely internal significance, . . . we conclude controlling precedent would not have put a reasonable administrator on notice that the speech at each meeting, viewed in the aggregate, was protected by the First Amendment. We therefore hold Dr. Marlatt is entitled to qualified immunity because the protected nature of Plaintiffs' speech was not clearly established at the time she took the alleged retaliatory actions.").

Benshoof v. Layton, No. 09-6044, 2009 WL 3438004, at *4 (10th Cir. Oct. 27, 2009) ("It does not appear that this court has considered a case in which an inmate was placed in a cell with hundreds of fire ants and, while suffering numerous painful stings, was refused a transfer and effective means of eradicating the pests for six days. But such a high degree of factual similarity is not required to conclude that the law was clearly established . . . .[T]his court held in Ramos v. Lamm that 'a state must provide an inmate with shelter which does not cause his degeneration or threaten his mental and physical well being.' 639 F.2d 559, 568 (10th Cir.1980). Thus, prison officials must provide living space with 'reasonably adequate ventilation, sanitation, bedding, hygienic materials, and utilities.' Id. Ramos is sufficient to put a reasonable officer on notice that it would be unconstitutional to house an inmate in a cell containing a swarm of stinging insects and to refuse the inmate either a transfer to another cell or any effective means of eradicating the infestation.").

Green v. Post, 574 F.3d 1294, 1305 n. 10 (10th Cir.2009) (discussing how unpublished opinions cannot constitute clearly established precedent in the Fourth and Tenth Circuits, but may be used in the Sixth and Ninth Circuits).

Cassady v. Goering, 567 F.3d 628, 643, 644 (10th Cir. 2009) (unlawfulness of overbroad, general search warrant, that authorized seizure of all possible evidence of any crime prohibited by law of any jurisdiction, and not just of suspected narcotics activity that caused officer to apply for search warrant, was clearly established at time, and no reasonable officer could have believed that warrant was valid)

Wilkins v. DeReyes, 528 F.3d 790, 805, 806 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Under the version of facts presented by Plaintiffs and accepted by the district court on summary judgment, the officers intentionally coerced matching false statements, and a reasonable officer should have known no probable cause existed without the statements. The officers are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity on the malicious prosecution claim.")

Price-Cornelison v. Brooks, 524 F.3d 1103, 1114, 1115 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Watson . . . was sufficient to put Brooks on notice that providing Price-Cornelison less police protection than other domestic violence victims because she is a lesbian would deprive her of equal protection of the law, at least in the absence of an articulated rational governmental reason for such discrimination. This is true even assuming that Brooks was acting according to a County policy of affording less police protection to lesbian victims of domestic violence, because Watson would have put Brooks on notice that applying such a policy could result in a constitutional violation. . . . In any event, Brooks does not argue here that he is entitled to qualified immunity because he was following official policy, nor does he attempt to argue that there is a rational basis for such a policy; instead, he denies that there is such a policy.")

Milligan-Hitt v. Board of Trustees of Sheridan County School Dist. No. 2, 523 F.3d 1219, 1233 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Plaintiffs acknowledge the import of our ruling in Jantz, but argue that it became clear as early as 1996 that 'government action that discriminates against homosexuals can[not] pass muster under the Equal Protection Clause merely because the community may disapprove of homosexuality," . . . when the Supreme Court decided Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996). We do not think Romer's holding was so clear, and do not think it clearly overruled Jantz's holding that municipal officials may sometimes defer to community standards when discriminating on non-suspect grounds.").

Gruenwald v. Maddox, No. 07-3245, 2008 WL 1766890, at *5 (10th Cir. Apr. 17, 2008) ("The court is mindful that correctional officers have a significant responsibility in instituting order and discipline in our nation's prisons. Nevertheless, this responsibility does not come with the attendant right to use prisoners as personal punching bags. There no doubt may be times when prisoners agitate correctional officers or act in an otherwise unruly fashion. However, the Eighth Amendment demands that correctional officers respond to such incidents in a fashion that is appropriate for the situation. Because Gruenwald's allegations demonstrate that the officers violated his Eighth Amendment rights, the court has little difficulty in concluding that his claims clear the second hurdle of the qualified immunity analysis as well. . . . We conclude that it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in the shoes of Buchanan, Maddox, or Myers, that the malicious and sadistic infliction of pain exhibited in this case was unlawful.").

Archuleta v. Wagner, 523 F.3d 1278, 1285, 1286 (10th Cir. 2008) ("The arrest warrant gave Deputy Mandelko cause for processing and detaining Ms. Archuleta, but whether a strip search is permissible is a separate inquiry based on whether a detainee will be placed in the general prison population and whether the officer has reasonable suspicion that a detainee has hidden drugs, contraband, or weapons. . . In this case, Ms. Archuleta was not placed in the general prison population and a reasonable officer could not have suspected Ms. Archuleta of harboring a weapon. The arrest warrant itself could not provide Deputy Mandelko with reasonable suspicion for a strip search. . . . Ms. Archuleta thus has satisfied the first step of the two-step qualified-immunity inquiry by demonstrating that her constitutional rights were violated. We now consider whether those rights were clearly established at the time of the search. . . . [A] detainee who is not placed in the general prison population cannot be strip searched if the searching officer does not at least have reasonable suspicion that the detainee possesses concealed weapons, drugs, or contraband. As Ms. Archuleta alleges she never intermingled with the general prison population and we have held Deputy Mandelko could not have had reasonable suspicion that Ms. Archuleta possessed a weapon based upon the allegations in the complaint, we hold that the law in these circumstances was clearly established.").

Mecham v. Frazier, 500 F.3d 1200, 1206 (10th Cir. 2007) ("Mecham cites to an unpublished opinion from this circuit, Martinez v. New Mexico Dep't of Public Safety, 47 F. App'x 513 (10th Cir.2002), to support her position that, at the time of her arrest, the law was clear that the force used in her case was excessive. In Martinez, officers used mace on a suspect who had already been removed from her car and handcuffed. Under these specific circumstances, the court found the use of mace was not reasonable as a matter of law since the suspect was already out of the car, handcuffed, and no longer a danger to herself or others. The circumstances facing the officers in Mecham's case were quite different. The pepper spray here was used to subdue and remove an uncooperative and unresponsive, belligerent traffic violator from the car she still controlled, not to further incapacitate an already subdued suspect. An unpublished opinion, moreover, even if the facts were closer, provides little support for the notion that the law is clearly established on this point.")

Meyer v. Bd. of County Com'rs of Harper County, Oklahoma, 482 F.3d 1232, 1242 (10th Cir. 2007)("[W]e reject the district court's conclusion that evidence of deliberately submitting false information to influence Western State to admit the plaintiff is irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis. We do not, of course, disagree with the general point that subjective good faith or bad faith of government actors is ordinarily irrelevant to the objective inquiry whether a reasonable officer would have realized that his conduct was unlawful. . . .But deliberate misconduct is something different. It is clearly relevant to the objective inquiry. In short, a reasonable officer would know that he cannot rely on deliberate falsehoods to establish probable cause to deprive a person of her liberty. We held in Snell v. Tunnell, 920 F.2d 673, 698-699 (10th Cir.1990), that officials who relied on false information to obtain a search warrant for the home of foster parents were not entitled to qualified immunity. The district court found Snell irrelevant because it did not involve a mental health detention. That focus was much too narrow. Instead, the broader principle is directly relevant here, and Snell is not the only case in which we have enunciated the broader principle. Put most directly, 'conduct [may be] so bad that case law is not needed to establish that this conduct cannot be lawful.' Vinyard v. Wilson, 311 F.3d 1340, 1350 (11th Cir.2002). We have cited that language with approval and have also noted that '[t]he more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation.'").

Casey v. West Las Vegas ISD, 473 F.3d 1323, 1333, 1334 (10th Cir. 2007) ("It has long been established law in this circuit that when a public employee speaks as a citizen on matters of public concern to outside entities despite the absence of any job-related reason to do so, the employer may not take retaliatory action. . . . The advice Ms. Casey directed to the Board, as her supervisor, is no longer viable as a basis for a First Amendment retaliation claim after Garcetti. Ms. Casey's indirect report to federal Head Start officials likewise implicated responsibilities she held by virtue of her administration of a federally funded program and thus cannot supply the basis for a First Amendment claim. But we find different in character Ms. Casey's statements to the New Mexico Attorney General regarding alleged violations of the Open Meetings Act, violations that she had no apparent duty to cure or report and which were not subject to her control. We hold that, even after Garcetti, a claim based on these statements remains legally viable, and we remand the matter for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.").

Suasnavas v. Stover, 196 F. App'x 647, 2006 WL 2458678 , at *9 (10th Cir. 2006) ("Lastly, we also agree with the district court that the Luethjes have alleged sufficient facts to show a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. Although Trujillo did not explicitly recognize a right of familial association between grandparents and grandchildren, we made it clear in Trujillo that the right of familial association extends beyond the context of 'parent, spouse, or child,'. . . and we cited specific legal authority recognizing the importance of the familial relationship between grandparents and grandchildren . . . . In addition, Trujillo clearly recognized the paramount importance of the parent/child relationship, even if the child is an adult. We therefore believe that Trujillo gave defendants 'fair warning that their [alleged] conduct was unconstitutional.'").

Gomes v. Wood, 451 F.3d 1122, 1136, 1137 (10th Cir. 2006) ("As of April 2000, we had announced the emergency circumstances exception to the notice and hearing requirement, see Hollingsworth, 110 F.3d at 739, and we had had two occasions to apply that standard: in Hollingsworth itself and in Malik, 191 F.3d at 1315. However, in neither case was their any evidence whatsoever of an immediate threat. . . . Moreover, as of April 2000, we had not yet identified as an important consideration the time available to state officials to seek and obtain judicial authorization for the removal without jeopardizing the safety of the child. Nor had we held that the reasonable suspicion standard applies to the determination of whether emergency circumstances exist. Additionally, we had stated that 'considerable deference should be given to the judgment of responsible government officials in acting to protect children from perceived imminent danger or abuse.'. . In applying that case law to the circumstances confronted by the defendants, we conclude that 'officers of reasonable competence could disagree' as to whether there were emergency circumstances justifying the removal of Rebekah without a hearing.")

Hill v. Fleming, No. 04-1166, 2006 WL 856201, at *6 (10th Cir. Apr. 4, 2006) (not published) ("The law on whether certain adverse conditions of confinement create a liberty interest continues to develop, as evidenced by the Supreme Court's recent decision in Wilkinson v. Austin. In *Wilkinso*n, the Court determined the government created a liberty interest subject to procedural due process protections when officials placed an inmate indefinitely in a super-max prison where almost all human contact was prohibited and which made him ineligible for parole. . . Obviously, the duration and conditions of Mr. Hill's administrative detention were not as onerous, nor was the duration of his sentence affected. More importantly, for the purpose of determining qualified immunity, the prison officials in Mr. Hill's case did not have the benefit of the 2005 Wilkinson decision or any of its implications on prisoners' liberty interests at the time of Mr. Hill's confinement. Thus, based on the wealth of cases considered, the established law at the time of Mr. Hill's confinement would not put prison officials on notice of a liberty interest created by the type of deprivation presented, including the 399-day duration or other conditions of his confinement.").

Moore v. Guthrie, 438 F.3d 1036, 1042, 1043 (10th Cir. 2006) ("We have identified the 'classic' danger creation case to be Wood v. Ostrander, 879 F.2d 583 (9th Cir.1989), where police officers impounded the plaintiff's car and abandoned her in the middle of the night in a high crime area where she was raped. . . This is a narrow exception, . . . which applies only when a state actor 'affirmatively acts to create, or increases a plaintiff's vulnerability to, danger from private violence,' Currier v. Doran, 242 F.3d 905, 923 (10th Cir.2001). It does not apply when the injury occurs due to the action of another state actor. In the instant case, since Plaintiff was injured by a Simunition bullet fired by a fellow police officer and not a private third party, the danger creation doctrine is inapplicable. Plaintiff also contends that he has sufficiently pleaded a violation of his right to bodily integrity under the 'special relationship' doctrine. The special relationship doctrine is another exception to the general principle that government actors are not responsible for private acts of violence. . . As just discussed, however, because this case does not involve a private act of violence by a third party, this theory is also inapplicable to the facts alleged by Plaintiff. More importantly, we have specifically held that the special relationship doctrine is not triggered in an employment relationship, which is presumed consensual. . . Last, it should be noted that, even if either the danger creation or special relationship theory were applicable, it would not relieve Plaintiff of his duty to allege actions that shock the conscience. As required under the second prong to defeat a qualified immunity defense, Plaintiff argues that his violated right was clearly established at the time of his injury. . . . Although Plaintiff does not need to find a case with an identical factual situation, he still must show legal authority which makes it 'apparent' that 'in the light of pre-existing law' a reasonable official, in Chief Guthrie's position, would have known that having police officers wear riot helmets rather than Simunition face masks would violate their substantive due process right of bodily integrity. . . First, as discussed earlier, the Supreme Court has only recognized a right to bodily integrity under the Fourteenth Amendment in very limited circumstances, not including working in a safe environment. Second, courts have declined to find a violation of substantive due process in circumstances similar to, or more shocking than, that alleged by Plaintiff. Therefore, we cannot say that it was clearly established that Chief Guthrie and the City of Evans violated Plaintiff's constitutional right to bodily integrity by requiring him to wear his riot helmet during training.").

Maldonado v. City of Altus, 433 F.3d 1294, 1315, 1316 (10th Cir. 2006) ("We have already held that Plaintiffs have produced sufficient evidence to sustain claims that they were denied statutory rights under §1981 and constitutional equal protection. Accordingly, we must address whether the rights at issue had been clearly established by 2002, when the English-only policy was adopted. Assessing whether a right has been clearly established depends substantially upon the level of generality at which the relevant 'legal rule' is to be identified. For example, the right to due process of law is quite clearly established by the Due Process Clause, and thus there is a sense in which any action that violates that Clause (no matter how unclear it may be that the particular action is a violation) violates a clearly established right. Much the same could be said of any other constitutional or statutory violation. But if the test of 'clearly established law' were to be applied at this level of generality, it would bear no relationship to the 'objective legal reasonableness' that is the touchstone of Harlow. . . . Plaintiffs have not called to our attention, nor have we found, any cases from either the Supreme Court or this circuit establishing the right to speak a foreign language in the workplace. Further, published authority from other circuit courts suggests that English-only rules as applied to bilingual speakers are generally not discriminatory. . . Thus, we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the individual defendants on Plaintiffs' claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The individual defendants are likewise entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1981.").

Beedle v. Wilson, 422 F.3d 1059, 1071 (10th Cir. 2005) ("In sum, we do not agree with the district court's ruling that at the time the Hospital brought its suit for libel against Mr. Beedle, it was not clearly established that the Hospital was a governmental entity. Our cases had made clear that a public trust hospital in Oklahoma is deemed a governmental entity for § 1983 purposes. Similarly, as discussed in the previous section, ample authority had made clear that the filing of a malicious libel action by a governmental entity against a citizen contravenes the First Amendment of the United States Constitution. These two series of cases demonstrate it was clearly established when the Hospital filed its suit against Mr. Beedle that the Hospital was a governmental entity barred from bringing a malicious libel action. Consequently, the district court erred in dismissing the claims against Mr. Wilson and Mr. King in their individual capacities on qualified immunity grounds.").

Smith v. Wampler, Nos. 01-1455 / 01-1481, 2004 WL 1752377, at *4, *5 (10th Cir. Aug. 5, 2004) (unpublished) ("Here, Smith has not alleged Wampler pointed his firearm at him; instead he claims Wampler physically threatened to hit him with a pistol. Threatening to hit someone with a pistol is significantly different than pointing the pistol at them. However, Wampler did much more than merely hold his firearm in a fashion ready for immediate use. The physically threatening gesture was accompanied by racial epithets and threats to reincarcerate Smith while Smith was on the floor, handcuffed, and making no attempt to resist. Even though Smith's criminal activity was severe (drug possession and possible distribution), the totality of the circumstances demonstrates Wampler's conduct was not reasonable. . . . Having concluded Wampler's conduct constituted an unreasonable seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment, we now turn to whether the law at that time, based on these facts, clearly established a constitutional violation. It did not. Smith urges a generalized analysis. He maintains the standard–that an officer's actions in executing a search must be reasonable–was clearly established in 1994, therefore, Wampler's conduct was unreasonable and he should have known it violated the constitution. That argument strikes us as a tautology and not particularly helpful because it tends to fuse or combine the separate qualified immunity inquiries: (1) whether there has been a violation of a specific constitutional right; and (2) whether the law clearly established the officer's conduct was impermissible at the time of the violation. . . . [T]he appropriate question here is whether a reasonable officer in late December 1994, under the facts described, would have known the physical and psychological intimidation of Smith was unreasonable, and thus unconstitutional. Wampler would not have reasonably known his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. In Holland, we adopted other circuits' rationale in holding that pointing a firearm at a non-threatening, non-resistant person during a search was excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . In Holland and the cases cited therein, the conduct considered was the threat of deadly harm, a significantly different threat than the force in this case. Smith claims Wampler threatened to hit him with a pistol, not that Wampler pointed the firearm at him. This difference, standing alone, is sufficient to show that the law established in 1994 was unclear and not universally applicable to the factual situation here.").

Pierce v. Gilchrist, 359 F.3d 1279, 1297-1300 (10th Cir. 2004) ("In response to the district court's denial of qualified immunity, Dr. Gilchrist argues that there are no 'actual specific details of concrete cases which indicate' that her alleged conduct violated clearly established law. . . Dr. Gilchrist points to factual differences between her alleged conduct and the facts of the cases cited by the district court and concludes that these distinctions prevent those cases from clearly establishing the law as applied to her conduct. . . . Dr. Gilchrist overemphasizes the degree of specificity required of prior cases to clearly establish the law. . . . Hope thus shifted the qualified immunity analysis from a scavenger hunt for prior cases with precisely the same facts toward the more relevant inquiry of whether the law put officials on fair notice that the described conduct was unconstitutional. . . . The degree of specificity required from prior case law depends in part on the character of the challenged conduct. The more obviously egregious the conduct in light of prevailing constitutional principles, the less specificity is required from prior case law to clearly establish the violation. . . . No one could doubt that the prohibition on falsification or omission of evidence, knowingly or with reckless disregard for the truth, was firmly established as of 1986, in the context of information supplied to support a warrant for arrest. . . . We have no doubt that, in light of these holdings, an official in Dr. Gilchrist's position in 1986 had "fair warning" that the deliberate or reckless falsification or omission of evidence was a constitutional violation–even though the arrest had already occurred. There is no moral, constitutional, common law, or common sense difference between providing phony evidence in support of an arrest and providing phony evidence in support of continued confinement and prosecution. Even if there were no case directly on point imposing liability on officials whose falsification of evidence occurred at the post-arrest stage, an official in Dr. Gilchrist's position could not have labored under any misapprehension that the knowing or reckless falsification and omission of evidence was objectively reasonable. Qualified immunity is designed to protect public officials who act in good faith, on the basis of objectively reasonable understandings of the law at the time of their actions, from personal liability on account of later-announced, evolving constitutional norms. Dr. Gilchrist's alleged misconduct did not stem from a miscalculation of her constitutional duties, nor was it undertaken in furtherance of legitimate public purposes that went awry. Rather, as alleged, Dr. Gilchrist engaged in a deliberate attempt to ensure the prosecution and conviction of an innocent man. Such conduct, if it can be proven at trial, violated Mr. Pierce's constitutional rights with 'obvious clarity.'").

SH.A., as Parent and Next Friend of J.A. v. Tucumcari Municipal Schools, 321 F.3d 1285, 1288, 1289 (10th Cir. 2003) ("Mr. Dominguez concedes, as he must, that the law holding that sexual harassment is actionable as an equal protection violation has long been clearly established. . . However, he maintains that the court erred in drawing upon the standard set out in employment cases and applying it to teacher-on- student sexual harassment. He argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because no opinion by the Tenth Circuit had announced the standard applicable to this particular type of sexual harassment, nor had the weight of authority from other circuits done so. Mr. Dominguez' argument asks this court to require exact correspondence between prior cases and the instant facts. Significantly, we rejected a similar argument made by the defendants in Johnson, the case relied upon by the district court. . . . . In light of Johnson and Franklin, we conclude that a reasonable teacher would have known in the spring of 1997 that sexual harassment which gives rise to a violation of equal protection in the employment context will also do so in the teacher-on-student context.").

Johnson v. Martin, 195 F.3d 1208, 1218 (10th Cir. 1999) ("We therefore conclude that, during the period of time that Mr. Martin allegedly engaged in the acts of sexual harassment, a public official's reasonable application of the prevailing law would lead him to conclude that to abuse any one of a number of kinds of authority for purpose of one's own sexual gratification (including the abuse of the authority granted a municipal building inspector) would violate the Equal Protection Clause. . . .As a result, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law regarding sexual harassment of nonemployees was not clearly established during the period from October 1994 to January 1996.").

Murrell v. School District No. 1, Denver, 186 F.3d 1238, 1251 (10th Cir. 1999) ("The School District asserts the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because there has previously been no case holding an individual school employee liable for sexual harassment under the Fourteenth Amendment. This argument carries the concept of 'clearly established' to an extreme we decline to adopt. We have never said that there must be a case presenting the exact fact situation at hand in order to give parties notice of what constitutes actionable conduct. Rather, we require parties to make reasonable applications of the prevailing law to their own circumstances. . . .[T]he fact that we have said other supervisory municipal employees may be held liable under the Fourteenth Amendment for deliberate indifference to the discriminatory conduct of third parties was sufficient to make apparent the unlawfulness of such deliberate indifference by a school employee exercising supervisory authority over students.").

Sutton v. Utah State School for the Deaf and Blind, 173 F.3d 1226, 1241 (10th Cir. 1999) ("We are satisfied that a supervisor's liability for failing to train subordinates or to implement a policy to prevent a sexual assault on a severely disabled child like James was clearly established as of February 1995 when the instant assault occurred. Applying the Supreme Court's reasoning in Canton, the Tenth Circuit has clearly established that a supervisor may be individually liable for failing to adopt or implement policy or training of subordinates to prevent deprivations of constitutional rights. . . While here the assault was committed by a private actor, the Tenth Circuit has also clearly established that a state official may be liable for the violence committed by private actors under the 'danger-creation' doctrine. . . . Therefore, the contours of the right, which plaintiff-appellant asserts was violated, were clearly established as of February 1995 and the defense of qualified immunity fails.").

Lee v. Waters, No. 98-6160, 1999 WL 41949 (10th Cir. Feb. 5, 1999) (unpublished) ("The Prison Litigation Reform Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1997e, requires the court to dismiss any § 1983 claim regarding prison conditions if it 'seeks monetary relief from a defendant who is immune from such relief.' 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(c)(1). In this case, the defense of qualified immunity, asserted by the defendants in their motion to dismiss, or in the alternative for summary judgment, supports the district court's entry of judgment in favor of the defendants. . . . Because there is no clearly established right to attend a disciplinary hearing when such competing concerns exist, i.e., no unqualified right to attend a disciplinary hearing, by conducting the hearings in Mr. Lee's absence after he refused to comply with this condition, prison officials did not violate a clearly established due process right of which a reasonable person would have known.").

Brasko v. City of Caney, Nos. 97-3027, 97-3047, 97-3029, 97-3046, 1997 WL 759093, at *3 (10th Cir. Dec. 9, 1997) (unpublished) ("It is clearly established in this circuit that '[a]n allegation of sexual harassment is actionable under § 1983 as a violation of the Equal Protection Clause.'. . . As the city council members point out, however, there is no factually identical authority establishing the liability of an individual city council member for failure to act on a city employee's claim of sexual discrimination. Thus, the question we must decide is whether it was clearly established 'within a sufficiently analogous factual setting' that the individual city council members would have understood that their failure to act would violate plaintiffs' rights. . . . This law, permitting liability of an employer for an employee's alleged wrongdoing, was not sufficiently particularized for individual city council members to be held liable for the alleged sexual harassment by an employee, who apparently does not work directly for the city council. No authority indicates an appropriate response by individual city council members to an employee's complaints to them of sexual harassment. Thus, it was not clear that reasonable city council members with knowledge of the alleged harassment would understand that their individual failure to act could violate plaintiffs' equal protection rights such that they could be held individually liable.").

Clanton v. Cooper, 129 F.3d 1147, 1156-57 (10th Cir. 1997) ("[W]e do not think that Clanton's failure to cite cases clearly establishing the unconstitutionality of knowingly transmitting false information over the NCIC computer system is fatal to her claim. The purpose of the requirement that the law be 'clearly established' before its violation may waive qualified immunity is to insure that officials may reasonably anticipate when their actions might give rise to liability for damages. . . . In the present case, we think that the knowing transmission of false statements over the NCIC computer system, in order to cause unjustifiedly extended incarceration of a suspect, is sufficiently similar to the swearing knowingly (or with reckless disregard of the truth) of false information in a warrant application, proscribed by Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154, 98 S.Ct. 2674, 57 L.Ed.2d 667 (1978), that a reasonable official would have known it to be illegal. We therefore hold that Cooper enjoyed no qualified immunity to engage in such activity.").

Lawmaster v. Ward, 125 F.3d 1341, 1351 (10th Cir. 1997) ("While qualified immunity was meant to protect officials performing discretionary duties, it should not present an insurmountable obstacle to plaintiffs seeking to vindicate their constitutional rights. Therefore, while it is true there are no decisions expressly prohibiting officers from leaving guns submerged in water or prohibiting officers from leaving cigar or cigarette ashes in a home, it is well established the Fourth Amendment is in place to preserve the sanctity of the home to the largest extent consistent with the reasonable exercise of law enforcement duties. . . Concomitantly, the law is well established officers may only engage in conduct that reasonably furthers the purpose for which they are in the home; those officers who execute a warrant in an unreasonable manner violate the Constitution. . . . We conclude no reasonable officer in the position of the Agents in this case would believe that leaving a gun submerged in a water bowl, and leaving ashes in bedding was reasonably necessary to the search for a machine gun and parts.").

Foote v. Spiegel, 118 F.3d 1416, 1425, 1426 (10th Cir. 1997) ("It was clearly established in May 1994 that a strip search of a person arrested for driving while under the influence of drugs but not placed in the general jail population is not justified in the absence of reasonable suspicion that the arrestee has drugs or weapons hidden on his or her person. . . . The belief that Foote had drugs hidden in a body cavity because she was suspected of driving while under the influence of drugs, when no drugs had been found in her vehicle, on her passenger, or in a pat-down search, was unreasonable.").

Mick v. Brewer, 76 F.3d 1127, 1136 (10th Cir. 1996) ("Our observation in [United States v.] Merkley that '[t]here are no hard-and-fast rules regarding the reasonableness of force used during investigatory stops,' Merkley, 988 F.2d at 1063, merely illustrates that the excessive force inquiry requires the court to determine 'whether the officers' actions are "objectively reasonable" in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them.' [citing Graham] We therefore conclude the district court did not err by ruling that the law governing excessive force cases was clearly established on June 18, 1992.").

Liebson v. New Mexico Corrections Dep't, 73 F.3d 274, 278 (10th Cir. 1996) ("While the facts of this case need not precisely mirror those addressed in prior precedent in order to preclude qualified immunity , [cite omitted], Ms. Liebson must demonstrate a substantial correspondence between the conduct in question and prior law establishing that defendants' actions were clearly prohibited. [cite omitted] Under the facts alleged by Ms. Liebson, we cannot conclude that extension of the custodial relationships addressed in DeShaney to Ms. Liebson's employment situation was sufficiently obvious to put a reasonable state official on notice that his conduct was constitutionally proscribed.").

Trigalet v. Young, 54 F.3d 645, 648 (10th Cir. 1995) ("We have found no opinion decided between 1986 and 1990 holding that an officer could be held liable under section 1983 to a third party injured as a result of police chasing a fleeing felon.").

Pallotino v. City of Rio Rancho, 31 F.3d 1023, 1026 (10th Cir. 1994) ("[T]here is no clearly established right, under the Fifth Amendment, to ignore police requests at the scene of an investigation for a witness's name and address.").

Lankford v. City of Hobart, 27 F.3d 477, 480 (10th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e hold that on May 22, 1989, with this court's opinion in Starrett v. Wadley, . . . it became clearly established that sexual harassment can constitute a violation of equal protection and give rise to an action under 42 U.S.C. 1983.").

Calhoun v. Gaines, 982 F.2d 1470, 1475 (10th Cir. 1992) ("The standard adopted by this Court requires that there be some, but not necessarily precise, factual correspondence between previous cases and the case at bar. . . In essence, this standard requires officials to know well developed legal principles and to relate and apply them to analogous factual situations.").

Jantz v. Muci, 976 F.2d 623, 629 (10th Cir. 1992) ("Examining the case law as it existed in 1988, we do not find a clearly established line of authority proscribing an adverse action against civilian job applicants based on homosexual or perceived homosexual orientation."), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 2445 (1993).

Floberg v. Oklahoma Dept. of Corrections, 962 F.2d 17 (10th Cir. 1992) (Table) (although right of access to courts was established, it was not clear that policy of initiating disciplinary actions against employees who refused to sign polygraph waivers was in violation of right . . . .").

Snell v. Tunnell, 920 F.2d 673 (10th Cir. 1990) (In this circuit, precise factual correlation between then-existing law and case at hand is not required. . . . government officials expected to relate established law to analogous factual settings).

Washington v. City of Wichita, No. 21-1189-DDC-KGG, 2022 WL 3594587, at *11–16 (D. Kan. Aug. 23, 2022) ("Our Circuit repeatedly has emphasized that 'the Fourth Amendment excessive-force inquiry is not limited to' the 'precise moment that lethal force was used.'. . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, a reasonable jury could find that, unlike the other officers, Officer Kreifels recklessly escalated a non-lethal situation to a lethal one. Officer Kreifels knew merely that plaintiff reportedly had violated a no-contact order and was running from officers in an empty field. He nevertheless drove onto the field on a 'collision course' with plaintiff, immediately drew his gun, and ran after him. Then, after plaintiff stopped running, turned towards Officer Kreifels, extended his arms to his side (beginning to comply with commands), and moved his arms in front of him, Officer Kreifels shot him—all in 26 seconds. The court understands that Officer Kreifels testified that he observed plaintiff grabbing at his waistband multiple times. But a reasonable jury could conclude that if Officer Kreifels thought plaintiff was carrying a firearm at his waistband as he ran away, a reasonable officer in his position—responding only to non-violent misdemeanors—wouldn't charge towards plaintiff with his gun drawn. Also, a reasonable jury could find this view of the evidence appealing where, as here, plaintiff was in an empty field and the nearest officers were several yards away. . . Thus, Officer Kreifels's choices about how to respond to this situation bear on the answer to the question whether his eventual use of deadly force 26 seconds later was reasonable. . .In the end, the second Graham factor is riddled with difficult fact issues. The summary judgment standard requires the court to view the facts in plaintiff's favor. And, applying that standard, the court finds that a reasonable jury could conclude that a reasonable officer in Kreifels's position would have perceived plaintiff was unarmed and didn't endanger the lives of officers or others nearby. The court apprehends that these movements occurred under circumstances that were 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving[,]' which required Officer Kreifels to make a 'split-second judgment[ ]' about the need for deadly force. . . And, in the moment, Officer Kreifels didn't have the benefit of reviewing still frames of events that transpired in just seconds. The court recognizes that it can't view these facts 'with 20/20 vision of hindsight' but instead must consider them 'from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene[.]'. . Nevertheless, viewing the facts and drawing rational inferences in plaintiff's favor, there's a triable issue whether Officer Kreifels reasonably perceived plaintiff pointing a deadly weapon at him—particularly where the video is inconclusive, and the gloss Officer Krieffels imposed on it now differs from the story he recited just hours after the shooting. From these facts, the court can't conclude—as a matter of law— that it was reasonable for Officer Kreifels to perceive plaintiff pointing a gun at him, thus justifying the use of deadly force. . . .After considering all three Graham factors, the court finds that the first and second factors favor plaintiff, and the third factor favors Officer Kreifels. These factors and the totality of the circumstances preclude the court from finding on summary judgment—as a matter of law—that Officer Kreifels's use of deadly force was reasonable under the summary judgment facts here, and thus didn't violate plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights. . . More specifically, construing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, a reasonable jury could find from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, that the totality of the circumstances didn't support probable cause to believe that plaintiff had committed severe crimes or that he posed a threat of serious physical harm to Officer Kreifels or others. So, the court can't conclude—as a matter of law—that Officer Kreifels was justified in his use of force. The court thus finds Officer Kreifels isn't entitled to summary judgment in his favor on his qualified immunity defense under the first prong of the analysis, i.e., that no constitutional violation occurred. . . .Officer Kreifels alternatively argues that, even if the summary judgment facts present a triable issue whether he violated plaintiff's constitutional right against excessive force, he's entitled to summary judgment for an independent reason. He argues that the asserted constitutional right was not clearly established when he shot plaintiff on July 14, 2019. Thus, he contends, the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis bars plaintiff's § 1983 claim against him. The court disagrees. . . .Having found a triable issue whether it was reasonable for Officer Kreifels to conclude that plaintiff was armed and threatening, the court must define the clearly established right using the summary judgment facts viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff. That is, the court must determine whether it was clearly established that an officer cannot use deadly force on a suspect who: is located in an open, unconfined area; reportedly had committed only non-violent misdemeanors; had turned to face an officer and extended his arms to his side and then in front of him as the officer commanded him to get his hands up. . . The court concludes that Tenth Circuit case law on July 14, 2019 clearly established this principle. Plaintiff cites many cases to carry his burden of showing that Officer Kreifels violated clearly established law. Some of these are inapposite, but three directly apply. The court discusses each one, in turn, below. . . . . Since the Supreme Court's decision in Bond, our Circuit has held that any 'reliance on Allen to determine whether the officers' conduct "was reckless or that their ultimate use of force was unlawful" requires sufficient factual symmetry.'. . Fully mindful of this admonition, the court concludes that this case—though not identical to Allen—has sufficient factual symmetry with the facts in Allen. . . . Unlike the officers in Bond, Officer Kreifels didn't engage plaintiff in conversation, nor calmly follow him, nor keep his gun holstered until he perceived a deadly threat. Instead, under plaintiff's view of the facts, he did the opposite. He drove into an empty field on a 'collision course' with plaintiff, drew his gun immediately, ran after him, and fired within seconds of plaintiff turning around, extending his arms to his side, and moving them in front of him. The court is mindful that the Supreme Court and the Tenth Circuit have admonished district courts to discern factual symmetry. But, again, the court is convinced that Allen applies with sufficient factual symmetry here—especially because Castle v. Carr, and the clearly established case law discussed in Finch v. Rapp, combine with Allen to show that Officer Kreifels's actions, when viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, violated clearly established law. Thus, Officer Kreifels isn't entitled to qualified immunity.") Parsons v. Velasquez, 551 F.Supp.3d 1085, ____ & n.137 (D.N.M. 2021) ("Although a plaintiff asserting a violation of a clearly established right must in most circumstances point to a case that is sufficiently factually similar, the Supreme Court has recently clarified that this is not always required. [citing Taylor v. Riojas] The Supreme Court, in a short per curiam opinion, suggested an objective, 'no reasonable correctional officer' standard when it held that 'no reasonable correctional officer could have concluded that, under the extreme circumstances of this case, it was constitutionally permissible to house [the plaintiff] in such deplorably unsanitary conditions for such an extended period of time.'. . . For decades, lower courts have tried diligently and faithfully to follow the unwritten signals of superior courts. . . One such unwritten signal is that 'a

nigh identical case must exist for the law to be clearly established.'. . As numerous Courts of Appeals have recently noted, however, Taylor clarifies that it is no longer the case that an almost-identical case must exist. [collecting cases] There are, therefore, two possible interpretations of Taylor. First, Taylor could simply clarify that the holding in Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. at 741 -- that identifying an earlier case with ' "fundamentally similar" facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established,' but that it is 'not necessary to such a finding' -- is still good law even though it has fallen out of favor among lower courts. This reading of Taylor would mean there is a narrow exception to the standard requirement that a plaintiff identify an earlier case on point that only applies in case with 'extreme circumstances' or 'particularly egregious' facts. Second, Taylor could mean that a court must now ask whether the conduct at issue was particularly egregious such that no reasonable officer could have concluded that their actions are constitutional, and, if so, then there does not need to be a case clearly establishing the law. Most Courts of Appeals have adopted the second interpretation. Nonetheless, there is confusion both between and within the Courts of Appeals about Taylor's scope. [comparing cases] Since Taylor, courts have asked not just whether the law was clearly established through a factually similar case from that Circuit or from the Supreme Court, but also whether the conduct at issue was 'particularly egregious' such that 'no reasonable officer could have concluded that' their actions were constitutionally permissible. . . In other words, in addition to asking whether the officer was theoretically on notice that they were acting unlawfully,[137] [fn 137: The Court notes that one of the most basic premises of the law of qualified immunity -- that an officer is aware either actually or potentially that their conduct is unlawful because they know the holdings of both watershed constitutional decisions and the lower court decisions that apply them -- does not hold up to empirical scrutiny. See Joanna C. Schwartz, Qualified Immunity's Boldest Lie, 88 U. Chi. L. Rev. 605, 610 (2021) (finding that although police departments do regularly inform officers about 'watershed' decisions, officers are 'not regularly informed about court decisions interpreting those decisions in different factual scenarios -- the very types of decisions that are necessary to clearly establish the law about the constitutionality of uses of force').] the court must also ask whether the conduct at issue was 'particularly egregious' -- an apparently objective question. . . .[court discusses treatment of Taylor by Circuits] Most relevant here, the Tenth Circuit also has not given Taylor consistent treatment. For example, the Tenth Circuit treated Taylor as an example of the rule of United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259 (1997), that a 'general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful,' if it gives 'fair and clear warning' that the conduct violates the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . . In Frasier v. Evans, however, the Tenth Circuit wrote that 'under certain "extreme circumstances" general constitutional principles established in the caselaw may give reasonable government officials fair warning that their conduct is constitutionally or statutorily unlawful.'. . . More recently, the Tenth Circuit held that even without a prior precedent clearly establishing the law, it was '"obvious"' that a prosecutor providing materially false information to a medical examiner that influences his expert opinion whether a homicide occurred -- and then putting that medical examiner on the stand to testify about that false information -- is ' "obviously egregious."'. . . This treatment of Taylor does not just ask about the relationship between a 'general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law' and whether it applies with 'obvious clarity' to the conduct, . . . but instead focuses on the objective 'particularly egregious' standard, which applies even without any general constitutional principles that courts have already promulgated, because 'no reasonable officer' could have concluded the conduct to be lawful[.] . . The Court does its best [to] follow diligently and faithfully the unwritten signals of superior courts, but, here, the signals are not clear. . . The Court will therefore proceed with both lines of analysis. An officer therefore is entitled to qualified immunity unless a plaintiff can demonstrate: (i) that the defendant's actions violated his or her constitutional or statutory rights; and (ii) that the right was clearly established either (a) by a factually similar Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case on point . . . or, in rare cases, by 'general constitutional principles,' . . . at the time of the alleged misconduct, or (b) because the conduct was 'particularly egregious' such that 'any reasonable officer should have realized' it was unlawful[.]")

Quintana v. City and County of Denver, No. 20-CV-0214-WJM-KLM, 2021 WL 2913044, at *2–3 (D. Colo. July 12, 2021) ("Plaintiff contends that the Individual Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity based on the Supreme Court's recent decision in Taylor v. Riojas. . . and McCoy v. Alamu[.] . . According to Plaintiff, 'the Supreme Court is telegraphing to lower courts' through these cases 'that qualified immunity should be decided on a "reasonable officer" standard.'. . Defendants respond that 'it is undisputed that Taylor and McCoy do not alter the clearly established standard' and that these cases 'have no impact on the Court's prior ruling that Plaintiff failed to show that the law was clearly established as to her 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claims.'. . The Court agrees. In Taylor, the Supreme Court determined that the Fifth Circuit erred in granting qualified immunity to officers in an Eighth Amendment case where prisoners were housed in cells 'teeming with human waste' for six days. . . The Court concluded that when '[c]onfronted with the particularly egregious facts of this case, any reasonable officer should have realized that Taylor's conditions of confinement offended the Constitution' and that the case cited by the Fifth Circuit in determining that the law was not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity was 'too dissimilar, in terms of both conditions and duration of confinement, to create any doubt about the obviousness of Taylor's right.'. .Likewise, in McCoy, the Fifth Circuit determined that a correctional officer who sprayed a prisoner in the face with a chemical agent without provocation was entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established that a 'single spray stepped over the de minimis' use of force line. . . The Court vacated and remanded McCoy to the Fifth Circuit 'for further consideration in light of Taylor....' . . . Contrary to Plaintiff's assertion, the Court does not read either Taylor or McCoy as fundamentally altering the qualified immunity analysis, namely that it is a plaintiff's burden to demonstrate that the right was clearly established at the time of the conduct at issue to overcome qualified immunity. . . Instead, Taylor and McCoy appear to be in line with the Supreme Court's prior rulings that '[a] general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful.' Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002). Plaintiff has still failed to come forward with cases demonstrating that the 'violative nature [the Individual Defendants'] particular conduct is clearly established.'. . Nor has she come forward with any Fourth Amendment cases that apply with obvious clarity to the specific facts of this case. Accordingly, because Plaintiff has not demonstrated that she can overcome the Individual Defendants' qualified immunity defense, the Court concludes that it would be futile to allow Plaintiff to add a Fourth Amendment claim against the Individual Defendants. This portion of the Motion is therefore denied.")

Estate of Roemer v. Shoaga, No. 14-CV-01655-PAB-NYW, 2019 WL 4645441, at *7-9 (D. Colo. Sept. 24, 2019) ("White and Perry illustrate the level at which district courts must define a plaintiff's constitutional rights for purposes of the qualified immunity analysis. Applying that guidance in this case, the relevant inquiry is not whether Roemer had a clearly established Eighth Amendment right to be protected from attack by another inmate. Rather, to overcome defendant's qualified immunity defense, plaintiff must show that it was clearly established at the time of Mr. Roemer's murder that a prison official, presented with an inmate having a demonstrated history of violence in prison but no disciplinary infractions in over ten years, acts with deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm by failing to recommend the inmate's placement in administrative segregation. . . Farmer is insufficient, standing alone, to satisfy this burden. As the court noted in Perry, Farmer merely 'set forth the appropriate framework for determining whether a prison official's deliberate indifference violates the Eighth Amendment.'. . It did not 'apply that framework to the facts of the case,' but 'remanded the constitutional question to the lower court for resolution.'. . In other words, the Supreme Court in Farmer did not decide whether the defendants acted with deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm by placing the plaintiff, a transgender inmate, in general population at a high security federal prison. . . Even if Farmer did resolve the ultimate constitutional question, the case involved materially different facts from the ones here. In Farmer, the prison officials allegedly acted with deliberate indifference by placing the plaintiff in general population at a high security prison despite knowing that her status as a transgender inmate would make her particularly vulnerable to sexual violence. . . Here, in contrast, the asserted risk of harm did not arise from any particular vulnerability of Mr. Roemer, but from Mr. Farley's history of violence in prison. Thus, this case involves a distinct inquiry into whether, and in what circumstances, the Eighth Amendment requires an inmate with a history of violence to be placed in administrative segregation for the protection of other inmates. Given these factual differences, and Farmer's procedural posture, Farmer would not have made clear to a reasonable prison official in defendant's position that the failure to recommend Mr. Farley's placement in administrative segregation would constitute a violation of Mr. Roemer's Eighth Amendment rights. . . .While there are other Tenth Circuit cases involving Eighth Amendment claims arising from inmate-on-inmate assaults, those cases are materially distinguishable from this one because they involved (1) direct threats to the victim leading up to the assault [collecting cases], (2) victims who, due to some personal characteristic or membership in a group, were particularly vulnerable to attack by other inmates [collecting cases], or (3) perpetrators with a more recent history of violent or disruptive behavior. [collecting cases] Notably, none of these cases address the situation in which an inmate with a violent past, but who has not committed a disciplinary infraction in over ten years, is placed in general population with a cellmate with whom the inmate has no history of being incompatible. The weight of authority from other circuits does not support the denial of qualified immunity. In Shauf, the district court held that case law from other circuits was sufficient to show that a prison official violated the plaintiff's clearly established rights by withholding information regarding a recent instance of violence by another inmate and allowing that inmate to be transferred to medium security, where he assaulted the plaintiff. . . Shauf and the cases it cites are materially distinguishable from this case because none involve the double celling of an inmate with no documented instances of violence for over a decade. [collecting cases]") Ganley v. Jojola, 402 F.Supp.3d 1021, 1095 n.38 (D.N.M. 2019) ("The Court further notes that the Supreme Court's qualified immunity jurisprudence 'effectively eliminate[s] § 1983 claims by requiring an indistinguishable case and by encouraging courts to go straight to the clearly established prong. . . Such de facto rigidity has led Professor Karen Blum of Suffolk University Law School to conclude that the Supreme Court's approach to qualified immunity has

(1) stifled the development of constitutional standards while creating a confusing and divisive debate about what constitutes 'clearly established' law; (2) imposed substantial burdens and costs on the litigation of civil rights claims by encouraging multiple and often frivolous or meritless interlocutory appeals; and (3) resulted in judges displacing jurors as fact finders. Karen M. Blum, Qualified Immunity: Time to Change the Message, 93 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1887, 1891 (2018)(citing Nelson v. City of Albuquerque, 283 F. Supp. 3d at 1107 n.44). Professor Blum is not alone. The Honorable Robert W. Pratt, senior United States District Judge for the United States District Court for the Southern District of Iowa, sitting by designation, has likewise noted that 'because every individual case will present at least nominal factual distinctions[,] ... [i]f precisely identical facts were required, qualified immunity would in fact be absolute immunity for government officials.'. . Moreover, the Honorable Jack B. Weinstein, senior United States District Judge for the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, has also criticized the doctrine on the same grounds, and, in Thompson v. Clark, No. 14-CV-7349, 2018 WL 3128975 (E.D.N.Y. June 11, 2018), Judge Weinstein devotes significant discussion to highlighting concerns he and others have regarding the Supreme Court's qualified immunity jurisprudence. . . Although the Court agrees ithat such criticism is warranted, and would, if the Court were writing on a clean slate, minimize the expansion of the judicially created clearly established prong so that it does not eclipse the congressionally enacted § 1983 remedy, as a district court, the Court is bound to apply faithfully and honestly controlling Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit precedent, and it will do so here.")

Hernandez v. Parker, No. 217CV01218KRSGJF, 2018 WL 6441030, at *6–7 (D.N.M. Dec. 7, 2018) ("To survive summary judgment, the Estate must establish that Hernandez's rights under the Fourth Amendment were so clear as of August 31, 2016 'that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . It is incumbent upon the plaintiff to identify 'a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case that is sufficiently on point,' or cite a 'weight of authority from other courts,'. . . in which the officer 'was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.' . . A plaintiff may not rely on cases that frame Fourth Amendment prohibitions in the abstract such as the right to be free from excessive force; the Supreme Court requires a judicial decision 'particularized to the facts of the case' and capable of giving an officer 'fair and clear warning' that his conduct is unconstitutional in the context he faces. . . This standard ensures that officers do not hesitate, risking their lives or others' for fear of civil liability arising from reasonable mistakes in view of 'the sometimes hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'. .The Estate has not carried its burden. Casey v. City of Federal Heights, 509 F.3d 1278 (10th Cir. 2007), to which the Estate points, involved the tasering of man whose crime was to carry a file from a courthouse. At most, Casey can be used here for the general proposition that the use of force must be reasonable in effecting an arrest. . . Contrary to the Estate's argument, the Tenth Circuit's decision in Zia Trust Co. ex rel. Causey v. Montoya, 597 F.3d 1150 (2010), would not have placed Sheriff Parker on notice that his bumping of the Lincoln violated Hernandez's Fourth Amendment rights. Montoya was not a pursuit case; a police officer shot into a van when the vehicle, stuck on a pile of rocks at the time, lurched forward. As with Casey, the utility of Montoya is limited to a more general Fourth Amendment edict: any use of force must be reasonable, which is insufficient to satisfy the clearly-established prong. Although Cordova v. Aragon, 569 F.3d 1183, 1189 (10th Cir. 2009), the Estate's next citation, did involve a car pursuit, the distinguishing feature of that case from this one is plain: 'This is not a case of ramming. Officer Aragon shot Mr. Cordova in the back of the head while he was driving[.]'. . Thus, Cordova is of limited value in this context, especially where extant Supreme Court authority more squarely applies and concludes no constitutional violation occurred. . . In sum, even if the Estate had shown a technical violation of the Constitution, Sheriff Parker would be entitled to quailed immunity on the clearly established prong of the analysis.")

Manzanares v. Roosevelt County Adult Det. Ctr., 331 F.Supp.3d 1260, 1294 n.10 (D.N.M. 2018) ("If a district court in New Mexico is trying -- as it does diligently and faithfully -- to receive and read the unwritten signs of its superior courts, it would appear that the Supreme Court has signaled through its per curiam qualified immunity reversals that a nigh identical case must exist for the law to be clearly established. As former Tenth Circuit judge, and now Stanford law school professor, Michael McConnell, has noted, much of what lower courts do is read the implicit, unwritten signs that the superior courts send them through their opinions. . . Although still stating that there might be an obvious case under Graham that would make the law clearly established without a Supreme Court or Circuit Court case on point, . . . the Supreme Court has sent unwritten signals to the lower courts that a factually identical or a highly similar factual case is required for the law to be clearly established, and the Tenth Circuit is now sending those unwritten signals to the district courts[.] . . . Factually identical or highly similar factual cases are not, however, the way the real world works. Cases differ. Many cases have so many facts that are unlikely to ever occur again in a significantly similar way. . . The Supreme Court's obsession with the clearly established prong assumes that officers are routinely reading Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit opinions in their spare time, carefully comparing the facts in these qualified immunity cases with the circumstances they confront in their day-to-day police work. It is hard enough for the federal judiciary to embark on such an exercise, let alone likely that police officers are endeavoring to parse opinions. It is far more likely that, in their training and continuing education, police officers are taught general principles, and, in the intense atmosphere of an arrest, police officers rely on these general principles, rather than engaging in a detailed comparison of their situation with a previous Supreme Court or published Tenth Circuit case. It strains credulity to believe that a reasonable officer, as he is approaching a suspect to arrest, is thinking to himself: 'Are the facts here anything like the facts in York v. City of Las Cruces?' Thus, when the Supreme Court grounds its clearly-established jurisprudence in the language of what a reasonable officer or a 'reasonable official' would know, . . . yet still requires a highly factually analogous case, it has either lost sight of reasonable officer's experience or it is using that language to mask an intent to create 'an absolute shield for law enforcement officers,' Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S.Ct. at 1162 (Sotomayor, J. dissenting). The Court concludes that the Supreme Court is doing the latter, crafting its recent qualified immunity jurisprudence to effectively eliminate § 1983 claims against state actors in their individual capacities by requiring an indistinguishable case and by encouraging courts to go straight to the clearly established prong. . . The Court disagrees with the Supreme Court's approach. The most conservative, principled decision is to minimize the expansion of the judicially created clearly established prong, so that it does not eclipse the congressionally enacted § 1983 remedy. As the Cato Institute noted in a recent amicus brief, 'qualified immunity has increasingly diverged from the statutory and historical framework on which it is supposed to be based.' Pauly v. White, No. 17-1078 Brief of the Cato Institute as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners at 2, 2018 WL 1182773 (U.S. Supreme Court, filed Mar. 2, 2018)( )("Cato Brief"). 'The text of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 ... makes no mention of immunity, and the common law of 1871 did not include any across-the-board defense for all public officials.' Cato Brief at 2. 'With limited exceptions, the baseline assumption at the founding and throughout the nineteenth century was that public officials were strictly liable for unconstitutional misconduct. Judges and scholars alike have thus increasingly arrived at the conclusion that the contemporary doctrine of qualified immunity is unmoored from any lawful justification.' Cato Brief at 2. See generally William Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 Cal. L. Rev. 45 (2018)(arguing that the Supreme Court's justifications for qualified immunity are incorrect). Further, as Justice Clarence Thomas has argued, the Supreme Court's qualified immunity analysis 'is no longer grounded in the common-law backdrop against which Congress enacted [§ 1983], we are no longer engaged in interpret[ing] the intent of Congress in enacting the Act.' Ziglar v. Abbasi, —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 1871, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017)(Thomas, J., concurring). . . .The judiciary should be true to § 1983 as Congress wrote it. Moreover, in a day when police shootings and excessive force cases are in the news, there should be a remedy when there is a constitutional violation, and jury trials are the most democratic expression of what police action is reasonable and what action is excessive. If the citizens of New Mexico decide that state actors used excessive force or were deliberately indifferent, the verdict should stand, not be set aside because the parties could not find an indistinguishable Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court decision. Finally, to always decide the clearly established prong first and then to always say that the law is not clearly established could be stunting the development of constitutional law. . . And while the Tenth Circuit -- with the exception of now-Justice Gorsuch, see Shannon M. Grammel, Justice Gorsuch on Qualified Immunity, Stan. L. Rev. Online (2017) -- seems to be in agreement with the Court, see, e.g., Casey, 509 F.3d at 1286, the Supreme Court's per curiam reversals appear to have the Tenth Circuit stepping lightly around qualified immunity's clearly established prong, see, e.g, Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d

The City of Colorado Springs*, 709 Fed.Appx. 906, 915–16 (10th Cir. 2017), and willing to reverse district court decisions should the district court conclude that the law is clearly established, but see Matthews v. Bergdorf, 889 F.3d 1136, 1149-50 (10th Cir. 2018)(Baldock, J.)(holding that a child caseworker was not entitled to qualified immunity, because a caseworker would know that 'child abuse and neglect allegations might give rise to constitutional liability under the special relationship exception'); McCoy v. Meyers, 887 F.3d 1034, 1052-53 (10th Cir. 2018)(Matheson, J.)(concluding that there was clearly established law even though the three decisions invoked to satisfy that prong were not 'factually identical to this case,' because those cases 'nevertheless made it clear that the use of force on effectively subdued individuals violates the Fourth Amendment'). Harper v. Tirello, No. 16-CV-0121-CVE-FHM, 2018 WL 3040891, at *5-8 (N.D. Okla. June 19, 2018) ("In Kingsley, the Supreme Court held that the same objective-reasonableness standard that applies in Fourth Amendment excessive-force claims also applies in Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims asserted by pretrial detainees. . . Thus, the same need for specificity, i.e., the need for existing precedent that squarely governs the specific facts at issue, exists in the Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force context. . . .On this record, the situation defendants confronted was one that required them to extract from a jail cell a pretrial detainee who (1) had been classified as an 'assault risk' based on his behavior during his stay in the jail, (2) had just caused a disruption in a common area of the jail, precipitating a lock down, (3) refused to comply with defendants' repeated verbal orders to get on the ground, and (4) had no apparent physical disabilities that would prevent him from complying with those orders. Harper fails to cite any existing case law clearly establishing that Pirtle's use of a Taser in this situation was unlawful. . . . Because Harper failed to meet his burden to demonstrate that the defendants' conduct in this case violated clearly established law, all four defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as to Harper's Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claim.")

McHenry v. City of Ottawa, No. 16-2736-DDC-JPO, 2017 WL 4269903, at *9 (D. Kan. Sept. 26, 2017) ("Here, the court characterizes the right at issue as a right to be free from deadly force when a suspect did not show his hands after officers had received a report that the suspect possessed a gun, but the officers were 30 yards away in protected positions, Mr. Jennings did not charge the officers, Mr. Jennings was known to the officers to be suicidal, and Mr. Jennings did not threaten anyone. As demonstrated by the case law outlined above, Mr. Jennings had a clearly established right to be free from excessive force under these circumstances. Because the Complaint alleges a constitutional violation of clearly established law, Count I sufficiently alleges a violation of § 1983.")

Jackson v. City of Wichita, Kansas, No. CV 13-1376-KHV, 2017 WL 106838, at *13-15 & n.39 (D. Kan. Jan. 11, 2017) ("Defendants assert that even if Martin and Knowles may have violated a constitutional right, the right was not clearly established on July 10, 2012. . . The Court agrees. Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity if their conduct 'does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.' White v. Pauly, No. 16-67, 580 U.S. ——, 2017 WL 69170, at *4 (Jan. 9, 2017) (quoting Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 308 (2015)). . . .At the status conference on December 20, 2016, the Court expressed its inclination to deny defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' claims under Section 1983, both on the substantive issue and the question of qualified immunity. In light of White, which the Supreme Court decided just two days ago, the Court now reaches a different conclusion on the issue of qualified immunity. . . .Plaintiffs assert that under Tenth Circuit law, reasonable officers would have understood that defendants could not use lethal force 'where a person is not suspected of any crime, is only holding a knife, not a gun, and initially did not even have the knife in her hand until the officers escalated the situation, and the suspect was not charging the officers and made no slicing or stabbing motions towards him [sic], and did not threaten the officers.'. . In support of their argument, plaintiffs cite Zuchel v. City & County of Denver, Colo., 997 F.2d 730 (10th Cir. 1993), and Walker v. City of Orem, 451 F.3d 1139 (10th Cir. 2006). . . The facts of those cases, however, are not sufficiently analogous to put defendants on fair notice that it was objectively unreasonable to use lethal force in the facts of this case. . . . Unlike decedent in Zuchel, Karen Jackson clearly held a knife and refused repeated police commands to stop and drop the knife. Moreover, Karen Jackson used the knife to violently stab herself—which especially in light of her refusal to drop the knife and stop approaching the officers, could lead a reasonable officer to believe that she would use the weapon against them. . . .Far from clarifying the issue, excessive force cases which involve suspects with knives reveal a 'hazy legal backdrop' against which defendants acted. . . .Many facts in this case are similar to Larsen. While Karen Jackson had not threatened violence against others, she had used the knife to stab herself several times—which showed a potential to use the knife violently. The officers responded to a call at night. When they arrived, they encountered an individual with a knife. They repeatedly told her to put down the knife. It was a large knife. Karen Jackson refused to cooperate with repeated orders to drop the weapon. Although Karen Jackson held the knife at waist level and not above her shoulder, she pointed the knife toward the officers. Karen Jackson continued approaching the officers with the knife and after she stopped, she took another step toward the officers. The distance between Karen Jackson and the officers was about 15 feet. As noted, in Larsen, the Tenth Circuit agreed with the district court that as a matter of law, the officer's use of deadly force was objectively reasonable. . . The Tenth Circuit found that the facts presented a 'prototypical case' in which police officers were 'forced to make split-second judgments,' and that even if the officer's assessment of the threat was mistaken, it was not objectively unreasonable. . . In light of this precedent and its similarity to the facts of this case, plaintiffs cannot show that the asserted right was clearly established under Tenth Circuit law. In other words, under the facts of this case and in light of the Tenth Circuit ruling in Larsen, a reasonable officer in defendants' position could have believed that his or her conduct was legally justified. In short, whether a reasonable officer confronted with the same circumstances would have probable cause to believe that he or she faced an immediate threat of serious physical harm—and would be justified in responding by lethal force—is 'far from beyond debate.'. . Plaintiffs assert that the law is clearly established that defendants 'cannot create a situation where force is allegedly needed and then claim the protections of qualified immunity.'. . Plaintiffs lay out excessive force principles at a general level, however, and do not point to pre-existing law that makes apparent the unlawfulness of defendants' conduct in this case. . . Although their argument is not clear, plaintiffs apparently assert that the law clearly established that Martin and Knowles could not unreasonably escalate the situation by 'pulling their guns and yelling at Karen [Jackson] even though they both knew that she was "mental" and ... was not suspected of a crime.'. . Plaintiffs point to no case law which clearly establishes such a proposition on particularized facts similar to this case. . . On this record, plaintiffs have not shown that settled Fourth Amendment law prohibited defendants from drawing their weapons and ordering Karen Jackson to put down her knife. Because the law did not establish 'beyond debate' that defendants' actions were unconstitutional, they are entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claims.")

Richard v. City of Wichita, No. 15-1279-EFM-KGG, 2016 WL 5341756, at *6 (D. Kan. Sept. 23, 2016) ("Defendants . . . argue that qualified immunity shields the individual officers from liability under § 1983. 'Although summary judgment provides the typical vehicle for asserting a qualified immunity defense, [the Court] will also review this defense on a motion to dismiss.'. . But by asserting a qualified immunity defense in a 12(b)(6) motion, Defendants subject themselves to a more challenging standard of review. . . To overcome Defendants' claim of qualified immunity, Plaintiff must plausibly allege that (1) Defendants deprived Stacy of a constitutional right; and (2) the right was clearly established at the time. . . As noted above, Plaintiff has stated a plausible claim that Defendants violated Stacy's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. So the only determination left for the Court is whether that right was clearly established. . . . The inquiry is not whether the general right to be free from excessive force is clearly established; rather, the inquiry is whether the right was clearly established under the particular facts of the case. . . The Court must not be too general. Instead, it must determine 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. .Here, the particular conduct alleged by Plaintiff is that Defendants recklessly or deliberately created an unnecessary need for lethal force. Numerous Tenth Circuit cases have held that such conduct can constitute a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Accordingly, Plaintiff has alleged that the officers violated a clearly established constitutional right. Defendants' motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds is denied.")

Williams v. Miller, No. 15-CV-0028-JED-FHM, 2016 WL 4537750, at *7-8 (N.D. Okla. Aug. 30, 2016) ("Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, TCSO's policies and procedures do not authorize Defendant's conduct. Plaintiff was not behaving dangerously or violently during the incident, and Plaintiff was showing his hands in surrender when Defendant stunned him with a Taser. . . . In summary, Plaintiff controverts many of Defendant's material facts and asserts that Defendant stunned him with a Taser although he was not acting aggressively or posing a threat. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the Court concludes that the Graham factors, as reemphasized in Kingsley, weigh in favor of Plaintiff. Therefore, based on the evidence presented in the summary judgment record, a reasonable jury could find that Defendant's actions violated Plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . .Having concluded that Defendant's use of a Taser violated the Constitution, the Court next determines whether it was clearly established, prior to May 17, 2014, that using a Taser to compel compliance from a pretrial detainee who is neither acting aggressively nor actively resisting efforts to restrain him constitutes a violation of the detainee's constitutional rights. After reviewing the state of the law in the Tenth Circuit, as well as the 'weight of authority from other courts,'. . . the Court concludes that it was. . . .Here the law at the time of the incident put Defendant on notice that using a Taser to coerce compliance with a command from a detainee who was not acting aggressively and whom the officer had not attempted to restrain in any other manner was a violation of that detainee's constitutional rights.")

Estate of Redd v. Love, No. 2:11-CV-00478-RJS, 2015 WL 8665348, at *14 (D. Utah Dec. 11, 2015) ("Here, the court cannot conclude it was clear to every reasonable officer on June 10, 2009, that it would be unlawful to deploy twelve SWAT-like agents and an unarmed cultural specialist to execute a warrant, and then call an additional nine federal personnel to help search a home and catalog evidence. As stated above, the Estate cites, and the court has found, no case—in the Tenth Circuit or otherwise—on point. But because a case on point is not required, the court examines two analogous Tenth Circuit cases addressing the reasonableness of a decision to deploy a SWAT team to execute a warrant to determine whether it would have been apparent to every reasonable officer that a violation occurred here on the facts presented in light of preexisting law in this Circuit. [Court examines Holland and Whitewater] Against this backdrop, it would not have been clear to every reasonable officer in Agent Love's position that his conduct amounted to a constitutional violation. That the facts here differ from those in Holland—namely, that Dr. Redd was charged with a nonviolent crime and has no known history of violence—does not mean it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that a different result on the constitutional question would follow in this case. The Holland court did not suggest it would have held differently if the suspect was charged with a nonviolent crime and had no history for violence. Nor did the Holland court indicate how it would have held if there was a need to collect a large amount of evidence, as was the case here. And in Whitewater, the court made no mention of those factors in arriving at its decision. Instead, the Whitewater court focused its analysis on the Holland rule. Although it is unpublished and non-precedential, Whitewater, if anything, shows Agent Love did not violate Dr. Redd's constitutional rights, because, as in Whitewater, there is no evidence that Agent Love deployed SWAT-like agents knowing they would use excessive force, intending to cause harm, or with instructions to use excessive force. Qualified immunity operates 'to protect officers from the sometimes hazy border between excessive and acceptable force ... to ensure that before they are subjected to suit, officers are on notice their conduct is unlawful.'. Here, not every reasonable officer would have been on notice that it would be unlawful to deploy twelve SWAT-like agents and a cultural specialist to execute a warrant and then call nine additional agents to help search a home and catalog substantial physical evidence for a nonviolent offense at the home of a nonviolent person. Agent Love is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Herrera v. Santa Fe Public Schools, 956 F.Supp.2d 1191, 1194, 1256 (D.N.M. 2013) ("Although the Court finds that Romero requesting that ASI New Mexico guards perform pat-down searches of all of the Capital High Prom attendees violated the Plaintiffs' constitutional rights, the Plaintiffs' right to be free from these suspicionless pat-down searches was not clearly established at the time of the Prom in April, 2011. Additionally, with respect to C. Herrera's § 1983 claim, although there is a genuine issue of fact whether Romero saw the ASI New Mexico guard require C. Herrera to lift her dress, and expose her bare leg, above her knee, even if Romero did see that conduct, it was not clearly established in April, 2011, that a school search to that extent violated C. Herrera's constitutional rights. . . . The Court concludes that it was not clearly established at the time of the prom in April, 2011, that ordering suspicionless pat-down searches for all prom attendees violated the Plaintiffs' constitutional rights.")

Kerns v. Board of Com'rs of Bernalillo County, 888 F.Supp.2d 1176, 1236 (D.N.M. 2012) (Browning, J.) ("In the end, and at least for the foreseeable future, it may be difficult for plaintiffs in § 1983 cases to overcome qualified immunity defense in exigent circumstances cases. Like in baseball, ties go to the runner, see Coleman v. McLaren, 631 F.Supp. 749 (N.D.Ill.1985)("In the legal version of baseball's 'ties go to the runner,' the party that fails to satisfy its burden of proof (here plaintiff) must lose."); in the exigent circumstances area, ties and even close calls go to the police, or other government official. Only the most extreme cases will go to the jury. Perhaps this is what the Supreme Court intended, however, when it said: 'Qualified immunity ... protects "all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law."' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2085 (quoting Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. 335, 341, 106 S.Ct. 1092, 89 L.Ed.2d 271 (1986)). Despite the broad language of § 1983, all other innocent citizens will be without a remedy when their constitutional rights—less well-established—are violated.")

Zamora v. City of Belen, 383 F.Supp.2d 1315, 1336 (D.N.M. 2005) ("[E]ven assuming Valdez' actions constituted a constitutional violation, Valdez is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity because a reasonable investigating officer would not have known that–after disclosing all relevant evidence to the prosecuting attorney–he had an independent duty to present such evidence to the grand jury. Zamora provides no case–Tenth Circuit or otherwise–to support his legal theory. Having no case law to the contrary, and concluding that, based on the law at the time the action occurred, a reasonable officer would have not known such conduct violated the law, Valdez is entitled to qualified immunity on Zamora's malicious prosecution claim.")

Sanders v. Bd. Of County Commissioners of Jefferson County, 192 F. Supp.2d 1094, 1123 (D. Colo. 2001) ("None of these cases, nor, indeed, any other reported cases of which I am aware involve issues of police conduct during a school shooting of the horrific magnitude as Columbine. As the Tenth Circuit teaches, however, 'a precise factual correlation' is not required. . . Of significance, though, is the police involvement in the Kneipp and Ross cases. In both cases, the victim suffered physical harm as a result of the affirmative acts of the police officers. I conclude that as of April 20, 1999, the 'danger-creation' jurisprudence was clearly established in the Tenth Circuit and in sister circuits so that, in light of Plaintiffs' well pleaded allegations, reasonable officers in the Command Defendants' position would have understood that their actions violated Mr. Sanders constitutional right to substantive due process. Thus, at this Rule 12 stage, it is premature to grant qualified immunity to the Command Defendants as to Claim One. . . . Given the unparalleled and unimaginable events at Columbine, the question is a close one. Again however, the facts need not precisely mirror the facts of a precedent setting case . . . . Under the unique circumstances of the case, the alleged unlawfulness was apparent in light of existing law. I conclude that Uhlrig and Armijo define the contours of the special relationship doctrine in the Tenth Circuit sufficiently so that reasonable officers in the Command Defendants' position would have understood that their actions violated Mr. Sander's constitutional right to substantive due process. Consequently, in light of Plaintiff's well-pleaded allegations, I will deny the Command Defendants qualified immunity as to Claim Two.").

Guseman v. Martinez, 1 F. Supp.2d 1240, 1258 (D. Kan. 1998) ("At the time of this incident it was not clearly established that this method of restraint could violate the Fourth Amendment. Plaintiffs cite no case holding such conduct to be a constitutional violation and, in fact, Phillips and Cottrell found similar conduct to be lawful under the Fourth Amendment. The court rejects plaintiffs' argument that the officers are not entitled to immunity because they should have known that the use of such 'deadly force' was unlawful. Almost any type of force can cause death in aberrant circumstances. The limits on the use of 'deadly force' under the Fourth Amendment, however, apply only to 'that force which is reasonably likely to cause death.' . . .That cannot be said of the prone method of restraint even though it has the potential to cause death in certain circumstances. There is no evidence that the probability of death is so high as to be considered 'likely' when such restraint is used. . . . Given the state of the law, a reasonable officer in the defendants' position could have believed their conduct to be lawful.").

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Maisonet v. Commissioner, ADOC, No. 22-10023, 2022 WL 4283560 (11th Cir. Sept. 16, 2022) (not reported) ("Maisonet has not come close to demonstrating that his exclusion from Ray and Woods's executions violated his rights under clearly established law. He has not offered a single case in any jurisdiction showing that a minister has a freestanding Free Exercise right, independent of the prisoners, to enter a prison to conduct a religious exercise. Much less has he offered any cases demonstrating that a non-prison employee might have a freestanding right to be in an execution chamber, perhaps the most sensitive of prison contexts. Nor is there a 'broader, clearly established principle' that demonstrates that Maisonet's rights were violated. . . .As a final effort to overcome qualified immunity, Maisonet argues that—at least for Ray's execution—the law was clearly established by this Court's initial stay of Ray's execution on the grounds that the policy likely violated Ray's rights under the Establishment Clause. Ray v. Comm'r, Alabama Dep't of Corr., 915 F.3d 689 (11th Cir. 2019), vacated sub nom Dunn v. Ray, 139 S. Ct. 661 (2019). It should go without saying that a single subsequently vacated stay holding that a policy likely violated one person's rights under the Establishment Clause does not clearly establish that the same policy violated another, differently situated person's rights under the Free Exercise Clause.")

Robinson v. Sauls, No. 21-11280, 2022 WL 3754543, at *7-10 (11th Cir. Aug. 30, 2022) ("Ms. Robinson largely concedes that the three Task Force officers acted reasonably in firing the first shots: the evidence showed that her son pointed a gun at them. . . Instead she asserts that the three officers used excessive force by continuing to shoot. She argues that the evidence, viewed in her favor, shows that the officers continued shooting at Mr. Robinson after he fell and could no longer hold a gun. In addition, she contends that the video evidence shows the officers used excessive force after the flashbang exploded. We examine these arguments in turn. . . . Applying the Garner factors to the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Ms. Robinson, we conclude that she met her summary-judgment burden to show that her son suffered a Fourth Amendment violation. Although the use of deadly force against Mr. Robinson initially was justified, 'the level of force that is reasonable may change during the course of a police encounter.'. . On balance, the Garner factors support the conclusion that Officer Doyle by himself or together with Officer Heinze used excessive force after the flashbang exploded. . . . Having concluded a jury could find that Officers Doyle and Heinze used excessive force after the flashbang explosion, we move to whether the two officers violated Mr. Robinsons clearly established rights. A right is clearly established when it is 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . .[W]e conclude that shooting an unconscious suspect was clearly unlawful in August 2016, when the shooting in this case occurred. It would have been clear to any reasonable officer that such conduct would constitute excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . If, in Hunter, the officers second round of gunfire was conduct that lay 'so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits,'. . . we see no reason why shooting an unconscious Mr. Robinson would not also be an obvious use of excessive force. Therefore, we conclude that Officers Doyle and Heinze are not entitled to qualified immunity on the shots that were fired after the flashbang exploded.")

Richmond v. Badia, No. 20-14337, 2022 WL 3581305, at *7 (11th Cir. Aug. 22, 2022) ("First, a 'broader, clearly established principle' in our caselaw gave Badia fair warning. . . We have 'repeatedly ruled that a police officer violates the Fourth Amendment, and is denied qualified immunity, if he or she uses gratuitous and excessive force against a suspect who is under control, not resisting, and obeying commands.'. . It is true that most of these decisions were concerned with gratuitous use of force on handcuffed suspects, but we have already held that 'the same rationale applies to the use of gratuitous force when the excessive force is applied prior to the handcuffing[.]'. . And we have applied that rationale to deny qualified immunity when the police have unnecessarily thrown non-resisting, unhandcuffed suspects on the ground. . . Here, Richmond was under control, not resisting, and obeying commands when Badia used force. Indeed, Badia confirms that during their two-minute conversation, Richmond 'just stood there.' And Richmond was obviously restrained when he was on the floor, but Badia torqued his wrist, nonetheless. Second, Badia was on notice that his conduct was unlawful under the 'obvious-clarity' test. For the obvious clarity standard to be met, an officer's conduct must be of a nature that every reasonable officer would have known the conduct was unlawful. . . The obvious clarity test may be met when an officer's conduct is over-reactive and disproportionate relative to the response of the apprehended person. . .We have applied the obvious clarity test to deny qualify immunity under similar circumstances. Two precedents are particularly compelling: Gray v. Bostic, 458 F.3d 1295, 1304 (11th Cir. 2006) and Patel v. City of Madison, 959 F.3d 1330, 1343–44 (11th Cir. 2020).")

Richmond v. Badia, No. 20-14337, 2022 WL 3581305, at *10–12 (11th Cir. Aug. 22, 2022) (Branch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Because Badia's first use of force was not unconstitutional, neither was his second use of force—responding to Richmond knocking his hand away by arm-barring him and pushing him to the floor. As the Supreme Court repeatedly reminds us and our sister Circuits, chief among the relevant facts in an excessive force claim is whether the suspect was actively resisting at the time. . . Richmond's resistance allowed Badia to escalate his use of force against him. . . . Moreover, even if Badia had used excessive force at any point during his encounter with Richmond, Richmond's claim would still fail because Richmond cannot prove the second requirement to defeat qualified immunity—that, at the time of the altercation, Badia's use of force constituted a clearly established violation of the Fourth Amendment right against the use of excessive force. . . '[Q]ualified immunity operates to ensure that before they are subjected to suit, officers are on notice their conduct is unlawful.'. . 'A right may be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes in one of three ways: (1) [Eleventh Circuit or Supreme Court] case law with indistinguishable facts clearly establishing the constitutional right; (2) a broad statement of principle within the Constitution, statute, or case law that clearly establishes a constitutional right; or (3) conduct so egregious that a constitutional right was clearly violated, even in the total absence of case law.'. . I agree with the majority that the first option does not apply here—there is no Eleventh Circuit or Supreme Court case law with indistinguishable facts clearly establishing that Badia's conduct was unconstitutional. Thus, the majority turns to the second option, asserting that its broad proposition—'a police officer violates the Fourth Amendment, and is denied qualified immunity, if he or she uses gratuitous and excessive force against a suspect who is under control, not resisting, and obeying commands'—was clear and specific enough to give 'every objectively reasonable government official facing the[se] circumstances' notice that Badia's use of force was unreasonable. . . I disagree. As an initial matter, the Supreme Court prohibits us from denying qualified immunity based on such a broad framing of a clearly established principle. As the Supreme Court has warned us time and again in numerous per curiam opinions, a statement of law that clearly establishes a constitutional right should not be overbroad. . . Recently in Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, the Supreme Court emphasized that finding a clearly established principle for a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim is exceedingly difficult. . . . The same day the Supreme Court issued Rivas-Villegas, it also decided City of Tahlequah, Oklahoma v. Bond, which held that a clear principle of law 'that deliberate or reckless preseizure conduct can render a later use of force excessive' is 'much too general to bear on whether the officers' particular conduct here violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . Yet, a year later, the majority in this case announces a similarly general principle—that 'a police officer violates the Fourth Amendment, and is denied qualified immunity, if he or she uses gratuitous and excessive force against a suspect who is under control, not resisting, and obeying commands'—which is no more specific than City of Tahlequah's general statement of principle that the Supreme Court found was overbroad. Absent a clear statement of law, Badia did not have notice that his conduct was unlawful. Turning to the third option, the majority also holds that Officer Badia had notice that his use of force was unconstitutional because his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment with 'obvious clarity.' Again, I disagree. For an officer's actions to violate the Constitution with 'obvious clarity,' the 'words of the pertinent ... federal constitutional provision'—here, the Fourth Amendment—must be 'specific enough to establish clearly the law applicable' to the officer's conduct. . . In fact, the Supreme Court has found a constitutional violation under the 'obvious clarity' test only when '[c]onfronted with ... particularly egregious facts' that 'any reasonably officer' would 'realize[ ] ... offended the Constitution.' Taylor v. Riojas, —— U.S. ——, 141 S. Ct. 52, 54, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020). In United States v. Lanier, the Supreme Court provided extreme hypotheticals of 'welfare officials ... selling foster children into slavery' and officers beating a suspect to obtain a confession as conduct that would violate the Constitution with 'obvious clarity.'. . see also Hope, 536 U.S. at 745, 122 S.Ct. 2508 (holding that handcuffing a prisoner to a hitching post in a painful position with limited access to water and bathroom facilities obviously violated the Eighth Amendment and the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity); Taylor, 141 S. Ct. at 54 (holding that it was obviously clear that holding a prisoner naked, in a cell covered in feces, including inside the water faucet, was unconstitutional). In stark contrast, in this case, the force used against Richmond during the execution of a lawful investigation into a potential crime both before and after he hit Officer Badia's hand away was minor, not 'egregious.' These incidents certainly did not violate the Fourth Amendment with obvious clarity.")

Davis v. Waller, 44 F.4th 1305, 1315-19 (11th Cir. 2022) ("To the extent Davis suggests that deadly force may never be used against an innocent victim, we can find no case asserting that proposition so categorically. . . And we decline to do so today. Each case turns on its peculiar facts and circumstances. The application of deadly force may be reasonable when it prevents an even graver and more imminent danger to the officers and to the public. . . Nor, on these facts, were the officers required first to issue a warning before using lethal force. Officers are required to give a warning before using deadly force if a warning is feasible. The critical inquiry is feasibility. . . . Browder and Waller say a warning was not feasible because '[t]he situation was happening so fast that the officers could not safely expose themselves.'. . Nothing in the record controverts this obvious conclusion. To require an officer to give a warning before firing a shot would have forced the officer to place himself in the immediate path of an oncoming 84,000-pound truck or the path of a potential bullet. Neither reason nor case law requires that decision. . . . But even if we were to assume that the officers' actions somehow were unreasonable -- and we do not -- they did not violate clearly established law. To offer a case with materially similar facts, Davis proffers Vaughan and Morton[.] . . But Vaughan is not materially similar for the reasons we have already described, and it does not clearly establish the right Davis asserts. Nor does Morton. There, the police shot a driver who, when viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, sat stationary in his car with his hands raised before he was struck. . . Furthermore, the officer had no reason 'to believe that Morton was a threat to anyone.'. . In sharp contrast, here, the officers had ample reason to believe that Davis was driving the logging truck at them with Arnold in control. These cases are worlds apart. Morton cannot create clearly established law for the conduct these officers faced. Neither Vaughan nor Morton would have placed the officers on notice that they could not lawfully discharge their weapons in this case. . . . The officers made the split-second decision to shoot in a tense and deadly crucible, balancing the harm posed to Davis against the imminent danger posed to them and to unknown civilians on the public roads. . . What happened to Mr. Davis was tragic and almost unimaginable, but we cannot say that the officers' conduct was unreasonable. Nor can we find any clearly established law that would have fairly put them on notice that they could not use deadly force. . . . [E]ven if we could break the fast-unfolding events sequentially into two discrete stages -- a proposition we reject on the facts as they've been presented -- because the final event unfolded so quickly, the officers' conduct still did not violate any clearly established law. The cases cited by Davis all assume that the officer knew the plaintiff posed no danger. The facts say otherwise here, and the problem for Davis is that we can find no clearly established law, even remotely similar, that would have given Officer Waller fair notice that it was unreasonable to use deadly force. . . .William Arnold put Donald Davis, the officers, and the public in grave and imminent danger. Police officers like Browder and Waller may use deadly force to dispel a threat (and, here, an imminent one) of serious physical harm or death or to prevent the escape of a very dangerous suspect who threatens that harm. Browder and Waller made the difficult, but altogether reasonable, decision that Arnold and the logging truck had to be stopped -- and, tragically, that meant stopping Davis, too.")

Davis v. Waller, 44 F.4th 1305, 1319-20, 1324 (11th Cir. 2022) (Jill Pryor, J., concurring) ("I concur in almost all of the majority opinion, which thoughtfully analyzes the difficult issues in this tragic case. I write separately only to say that I would analyze defendant Paul Waller's final shot differently. Construing the facts of this case in the light most favorable to plaintiff Don Davis—a hostage who was shot as police tried to apprehend a violent suspect—I conclude that Waller's final shotgun blast violated Davis's constitutional right to be free from the unreasonable use of deadly force. Thus, I disagree with the majority's decision in Part II.E of the opinion that there was no constitutional violation. But I concur in Part II.E's conclusion that Waller did not violate any clearly established law and therefore was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Notwithstanding my disagreements with the majority opinion, I concur that Waller is entitled to qualified immunity because I am confident that the majority opinion reaches the correct result. We largely lack guidance in what constitutes reasonable use of deadly force when hostages or innocent bystanders are caught in the crossfire between the police and a gunman. Therefore, I cannot say that Waller violated any clearly established law by firing his weapon after his fellow officers stopped firing theirs. . . Having concluded that Waller violated Davis's constitutional rights by using deadly force unreasonably, I would resolve this case on the lack of clearly established law alone.")

Wade v. Daniels, 36 F.4th 1318, 1324-28 (11th Cir. 2022) ("We need not address the Heck issue because even accepting Wade's version of the facts, and even assuming that Daniels's use of deadly force was unreasonable, the unlawfulness of his conduct was not clearly established at the time. Wade cites only Mercado v. City of Orlando, 407 F.3d 1152, 1161 (11th Cir. 2005), to support his argument that Daniels violated a clearly established right, and that case is readily distinguishable. . . . There are several notable differences between Mercado and this case. First, Mercado was not suspected of any crime, whereas Wade was wanted for a grave crime: the murder of an 18-month-old child. Second, there was no indication in Mercado that anyone felt threatened by Mercado, whereas the investigators here had heard Belk say that she was afraid. And most importantly, the weapon in Mercado was a knife, not a gun. As we have recognized, 'a person standing six feet away from an officer with a knife may present a different threat than a person six feet away with a gun.'. . Given these material differences, Mercado did not clearly establish that an officer uses excessive force by shooting a suicidal individual who is holding a gun. Daniels is thus entitled to qualified immunity on Wade's excessive force claim against him. . . . Because Jones was close enough to pistol-whip Wade right after he tried to sit up, a jury could reasonably infer that he was close enough to hear Wade say that he needed to sit up so that he could breathe. And regardless, striking Wade in the head with a pistol was disproportionate to any need to restrain Wade given his condition. Finally, the pistol-whip significantly injured Wade because it struck him in the head, chipping his tooth and cutting his face and mouth. Given the circumstances, Jones's pistol-whip was an unreasonable, 'gratuitous use of force' against a non-resisting suspect. . . Having determined that Jones's pistol-whip violated Wade's Fourth Amendment right to be free of excessive force, we turn to whether that right was clearly established at the time. Wade identifies three factually analogous cases. . . . The district court distinguished these cases by assuming that Wade was resisting or being uncooperative when he removed Beach's hands from his head. In so doing, the district court failed to view the facts in the light most favorable to Wade and draw reasonable inferences in his favor. Viewing the facts through the appropriate lens, Jones could not have reasonably believed that Wade was resisting when he tried to sit up after communicating that he needed to do so to breathe. And because 'a handcuffed, non-resisting [suspect's] right to be free from excessive force was clearly established' at the time, . . . Jones is not entitled to qualified immunity on Wade's excessive force claim against him. . . . Wade argues that Daniels, Jones, and Wilson violated his Fourteenth Amendment rights by delaying in seeking medical treatment for his gunshot wounds for four minutes. We agree. There is no question that the investigators knew that Wade had been shot in the head and that a substantial risk of serious harm existed. And viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Wade, a jury could reasonably conclude that the investigators were deliberately indifferent to that harm. . . .Even though Wade met his burden that Daniels, Jones, and Wilson violated Wade's Fourteenth Amendment rights, we conclude that there was no established law on how long before officers must request medical care for a suspect that has been shot to constitute deliberate indifference. Although it is clearly established that an officer cannot ignore an individual's serious medical condition, . . . we have not drawn a bright-line rule on how long before officers must seek medical care for a suspect that has been shot to constitute deliberate indifference[.]. . In Valderrama, after considering all the facts of the case, we found that Valderrama proved a deliberate indifference claim because the officers 'delayed Valderrama's medical care for more than ten minutes for no good or legitimate reason.'. . We specifically noted that 'a three and half minute delay standing alone may be insufficient to establish deliberate indifference.'. . Accordingly, Daniels, Jones, and Wilson did not have fair warning that their four minute delay in not requesting medical care after a shooting involving a suspect could rise to a deliberate indifference claim. . . Thus, Daniels, Jones, and Wilson are entitled to qualified immunity on Wade's deprivation of medical care claim.")

Wade v. Daniels, 36 F.4th 1318, 1330-31, 1346 (11th Cir. 2022) (Lagoa, J., concurring in part and in the result) ("The majority correctly concludes that Investigator Daniels is entitled to qualified immunity for his actions but reaches this conclusion based on a determination that Investigator Daniels did not violate Wade's clearly established rights. It is not necessary to decide this claim on the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis because, as a threshold matter and as discussed above, Investigator Daniels did not use objectively unreasonable force against Wade. I would therefore affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to Investigator Daniels by holding that his use of force was not excessive. I therefore concur in the result only as to this claim. Finally, while I concur in the result of the majority's holding that Investigators Daniels, Jones, and Kerry Wilson are entitled to qualified immunity on Wade's deliberate indifference claim on the basis that 'there was no established law on how long before officers must request medical care for a suspect that has been shot to constitute deliberate indifference,'. . . I respectfully disagree with the majority's conclusion that a jury could infer deliberate indifference by Investigators Daniels, Jones, and Kerry Wilson regarding Wade's medical deprivation claim. I do so for several reasons. First, both Wade and the majority opinion fail to judge each defendant separately and on the basis of what that defendant knew. . . Second, a de novo review of the record establishes that there was not a four-minute delay from the shooting of an armed suspect to the calling of an ambulance. However, even accepting as true that a four-minute delay had transpired from the time of the shooting to the calling of the ambulance, Wade presented no evidence from which a jury could infer that Investigators Daniels, Jones, or Wilson exhibited deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. . . .I concur only in the result of the majority's affirmance of Wade's medical deprivation claim against Investigators Daniels, Jones, and Wilson. For the reasons stated, I respectfully disagree with the majority's determination that a reasonable jury could conclude Investigators Daniels, Jones, and Wilson acted with deliberate indifference. Additionally, I concur only in the result as to Wade's excessive force claim against Investigator Daniels. While the majority reaches the conclusion that Investigator Daniels is entitled to qualified immunity for his actions based on a determination that Investigator Daniels did not violate clearly established rights, I would instead affirm the grant of qualified immunity by holding that Investigator Daniels' use of force was not excessive under the facts of this case, which involved an armed and dangerous fugitive. I concur in full, however, in the majority's decision to reverse the district court's order granting Investigator Jones qualified immunity on Wade's excessive use of force claim and in the majority's decision to affirm the district court's order denying Wade's motion for leave to add Investigator Beach as a defendant.")

Thompson v. Sheriff of Indian River County, Florida, No. 21-13393, 2022 WL 1124801 (11th Cir. Apr. 15, 2022) (not reported) ("Thompson has not shown that the officers' acts were violations of clearly established law. In determining whether a right is clearly established, we ask 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Legal precedent can show that a right is clearly established, but not just any case will do—the plaintiff must 'point to a materially similar case decided at the time of the relevant conduct by the Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the relevant state supreme court.'. . Thompson does not do so. Instead he offers a single Tenth Circuit case as proof that the right the detectives allegedly violated was clearly established. See United States v. Mesa-Rincon, 911 F.2d 1433 (10th Cir. 1990). Thompson argues that the fact that other jurisdictions have found United States v. Mesa-Rincon persuasive should be enough to elevate it to 'clearly established' status. But Thompson's view is not the law. Our precedent is clear: if there is no United States Supreme Court, Eleventh Circuit, or Florida supreme court case on point, the law is not clearly established. . .Thompson further argues that the officers' conduct 'so obviously violated the Constitution' that he need not point to a factually similar precedent. In rare cases, a plaintiff may establish that an officer's behavior was so egregious that he 'had to know he was violating the Constitution even without caselaw on point.'. . For example, we have sometimes denied qualified immunity to police officers who inflicted serious physical injury on secured, nonthreatening arrestees, even when no prior case law closely matched the specific facts at issue. . . Here no such egregious behavior is alleged. The detectives conducted their investigation in accordance with the law as a reasonable officer would understand it. They obtained a warrant and sought legal advice from an assistant state attorney about the proper scope of surveillance. Nothing alleged by Thompson suggests that they 'had to know' their actions were unlawful. We hold that Detectives Dean and Scott are entitled to qualified immunity. Because we conclude that Thompson's Fourth Amendment rights were not clearly established here, we need not ask whether the officers actually violated them.")

Ingram v. Kubik, 30 F.4th 1241, 1253-54 (11th Cir. 2022) ("The facts that made the force used in Mercado excessive obtain here. In Mercado, we rejected '[t]he defendants[']claim that the use of force [was] justified because suicidal subjects sometimes make erratic moves that can jeopardize the safety of the officers on the scene.'. . Despite the subject's being armed and not under control, we reasoned that there was 'no indication that [the subject] made any threatening moves toward the police,' and that he 'was not actively resisting arrest,' 'struggl[ing] with the police,' or 'posing an immediate threat to [them]' before an officer used seriously injurious, lethal force. . . Most of these facts were true of Ingram. But unlike the subject in Mercado, Ingram behaved less erratically, was compliant, was not an immediate threat to himself or to the deputies, and was known to be unarmed. Our precedents clearly established that Kubik could not use grossly disproportionate, gratuitous, and seriously injurious force against a non-resisting, compliant, and docile subject like Ingram. Ingram was unarmed. He posed no threat to Kubik. He had his hands over his head. And he reiterated that he would cooperate with any arrest. When Kubik body slammed Ingram headfirst without warning and caused a severe neck injury, that force was 'utterly disproportionate to the level of force reasonably necessary' in that circumstance. . .To be sure, Ingram behaved erratically when he ran into the cotton field. But using seriously injurious force against 'even a previously fractious arrestee' is unlawful if at the time of arrest he 'was offering no resistance at all.'. . And it is of no moment that Ingram was not yet under physical control in that circumstance. . . Kubik's headfirst body slam was a 'gratuitous use of force' against someone who was 'not resisting arrest' that our precedents have established 'constitutes excessive force.'. . We conclude that 'our case law bars [Kubik's] alleged actions with sufficient clarity to put any reasonable officer on notice' that the use of seriously injurious force against a compliant, docile, non-resisting, and unarmed subject like Ingram 'constituted excessive force.'. . Kubik is not entitled to qualified immunity based on these allegations.")

Powell v. Snook, 25 F.4th 912, 922-25 (11th Cir. 2022), pet. for cert. filed, No. 21-1559 (U.S. June 9, 2022) ("Sharon Powell frames her appeal in a way that asks us to focus on the third Garner factor, the feasibility of a pre-deadly force warning. Or as she'd call it, the right to such a warning. But we have never held that an officer must always warn a suspect before firing. As we have just noted, we have rejected exactly that kind of 'inflexible rule.'. . And rightfully so. Plaintiffs frequently cite Garner for the broad principle that a warning is always required before deadly force may be used, but Garner does not mandate that. Garner does not say 'always.' Garner says 'where feasible.'. . Not only that, but Garner involved a fleeing non-dangerous suspect in a non-violent crime. . . ; it did not involve an armed man facing an officer and raising a pistol, a circumstance that put would put any reasonable officer in fear for his life. From Officer Snook's perspective, the relevant one for assessing the reasonableness of the force, . . . he and his fellow officers had responded to a 911 report of domestic violence involving multiple gunshots and expected to find a suspect who had been violent before. A man came out into the driveway after midnight holding a pistol in his right hand. After nine seconds of walking, during which he carried the pistol but kept it pointed at the ground, the man stopped and faced the walkway leading up to his front door, where Snook was positioned in the dark. While facing Snook, the man started to raise the pistol. Only a very short time, about one second, passed between the man starting to raise his pistol and Snook firing. Powell contends that a warning was required before Snook fired, either in the seconds her husband was walking out onto the driveway or in the single second between when her husband began to raise his pistol and when Snook fired. But three of the decisions on which Powell relies for that conclusion contain the most critical factual difference: none of them involved an officer faced with an armed suspect who was raising his firearm in the officer's direction. . . . While it's clear that in some circumstances an officer must warn before using deadly force where it's feasible to do so, . . . decisions addressing how soon an officer is required to give a warning to an unarmed suspect do not clearly establish anything about whether or when a warning is required for armed suspects raising a firearm in the direction of an officer. . . There is no obviously clear, any-reasonable-officer-would-know rule that when faced with the threat of deadly force, an officer must give an armed suspect a warning at the earliest possible moment. . . Instead, what's clearly established is that it 'is reasonable, and therefore constitutionally permissible, for an officer to use deadly force when he has probable cause to believe that his own life is in peril.'. .When David Powell started to raise his pistol while facing in Officer Snook's direction, Snook had the authority to use deadly force. . . It would not be clear and obvious to any reasonable officer that a warning was required in the 17.8 seconds between when David Powell pushed his garage door button and raised his loaded pistol in Snook's direction. A reasonable officer could have decided, as Snook did, that the safest thing to do as David came out of his garage with a pistol at his side was to wait and see what he did with the pistol before Snook drew attention to himself and potentially escalated the situation by shouting a warning. . . In hindsight, that decision may have been a mistake. But, of course, we 'do not view an officer's actions with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . Qualified immunity leaves 'room for mistaken judgments.'. .Whether analyzed under the specific facts of prior decisions or under the narrow obvious clarity exception, '[i]nstead of clearly establishing the law against [Snook], binding precedent clearly establishes it in his favor. . . An officer in Snook's position during the rapidly unfolding events on that dark night reasonably could have believed that the man raising a pistol in his direction was about to shoot him, and our precedent establishes he could 'respond with deadly force to protect himself.'. . Snook didn't have to wait until David Powell fired his gun to return fire in self-defense. . . Warnings are not always required before the use of deadly force. . . And as we've explained, giving a warning in the seconds before David raised his gun wasn't a clearly established requirement, . . . and giving a warning in the one second between David raising his gun and Snook firing wasn't feasible. . . .Because Sharon Powell has not identified case law with materially similar facts or with a broad statement of principle giving Snook fair notice that he had to warn David Powell at the earliest possible moment and before using deadly force, she has not met her burden of showing qualified immunity is not appropriate. . . She has not shown that Snook's actions were unreasonable for qualified immunity purposes. As we have said before, '[t]he shooting ... was tragic, as such shootings always are, but tragedy does not equate with unreasonableness' under clearly established law.")

Washington v. Durand, 25 F.4th 891, 903 (11th Cir. 2022) ("Washington . . . cannot prove that her right was clearly established. A right is clearly established only if 'the state of the law on the date of the alleged misconduct,'. . . 'makes it obvious that the defendant's acts violated the plaintiff's rights in the specific set of circumstances at issue[.]'. . Washington cannot 'identify' a 'controlling case or robust consensus of cases,'. . . from the Supreme Court, this Circuit, or the Georgia Supreme Court where a suspect's in-person retraction of an earlier photo identification negated the original identification or caused probable cause to dissipate. . . And it follows from our conclusion that there was probable cause that 'existing precedent' did not place the question of whether Howard violated her constitutional rights 'beyond debate.'")

T.R. by and through Brock v. Lamar County Board of Education, 25 F.4th 877, 886-88 (11th Cir. 2022) ("In addition to erring in finding that there was no clearly established law that rendered this search unjustified at its inception under the first prong of T.L.O., the district court further erred in finding that there was no clearly established law that rendered this search unreasonable in its scope under the second prong. The case on point for the reasonableness in scope of a strip search of a student is our decision in D.H. Although, there, we concluded that the strip search was justified at its inception under prong one because there was evidence that students were hiding drugs under their clothes, it was not reasonable in scope under prong two because the school official required the student to strip in front of his peers. . . While the district court recognized that D.H. was the most analogous precedent for T.R., it found that it did not clearly establish that the school officials' actions in this case were unconstitutional. This conclusion was based on an improperly narrow reading of D.H. The district court read our decision in D.H. to only establish that a strip search is unconstitutional when done in the presence of the student's peers. However, we noted in D.H. that the 'measures adopted' in a strip search must be 'reasonably related to the objectives of the search and not excessively intrusive.'. . In D.H., we found that the decision by the school official to have the student remove all of his clothing 'bore no rational relationship to the purpose of the search itself.'. . Thus, D.H. clearly establishes that the actions taken by a school official in a strip search must be rationally related to the purpose of the search, which in this case would be finding marijuana. Here, there are two facts that establish this search was not reasonable in scope. First and foremost, school officials strip searched T.R. twice. Not only did they not have reasonable suspicion to strip search T.R. the first time, but the school officials also clearly had no basis to strip search T.R. a second time after the first search yielded nothing. T.R. did not leave the counselor's office in between the searches, so there is no basis to conclude that she might have acquired marijuana in that time. Thus, asking T.R. to strip naked a second time 'bore no rational relationship to the purpose of the search itself.'. .Second, T.R. alleged that the first search was conducted in front of an open window in the counselor's office. The open window was in the office's door, which led to a public hallway. Although the Defendants dispute this fact in their brief, we view the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff at the summary judgment stage. Even though, luckily, no students or other school officials saw T.R. while she was being strip searched, that is ultimately beside the point. The presence of a window made it possible that someone could see T.R. in this vulnerable position. This possibility would have made the actual search much more frightening, as T.R. had no way of knowing if someone would walk by. Thus, conducting the search in front of an open window to a public hallway 'unnecessarily subjected [T.R.] to a significantly higher level of intrusion.'Accordingly, we conclude that the district court erred in finding that D.H. was distinguishable enough from this case that the Defendants were not on notice of a constitutional violation. D.H. clearly established that when a school official makes the strip search more intrusive than necessary, the search is unconstitutional. Although there were no students present in the room during the strip search, as was the case in D.H., we do not think that is a material difference that would shield the Defendant's actions in this case. As the Supreme Court noted in Mullenix v. Luna, for a clearly established right in the context of qualified immunity, '[w]e do not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . We think that our precedent in D.H. puts the constitutional question in this case 'beyond debate' where school officials, conducting a strip search, unnecessarily subject the student 'to a significantly higher level of intrusion,' the search is unreasonable in its scope. . . Therefore, the district court erred in finding that D.H. was not analogous precedent in this case that provided a clearly established example of a constitutional violation in the context of a strip search of a student. In sum, we conclude that both Safford and D.H. provide 'case law with indistinguishable facts clearly establishing the constitutional right,'. . . and the district court erred in finding to the contrary in this case. Although we find that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the Defendants' conduct was unreasonable under clearly established law, our analysis does not end there. In addition to finding that the right was clearly established, we must also 'determine[ ] whether the [Defendants'] conduct amounted to a constitutional violation.'. . The district court did not address this issue, but instead granted summary judgment in favor of the Defendants because the law was not clearly established. We conclude that a factfinder could find the Defendants' conduct constituted a constitutional violation, as demonstrated in our 'clearly established' analysis above. As discussed, the school officials' strip search was unreasonable at its inception under the first prong of T.L.O. because the school officials did not have 'reasons to suspect the drugs presented a danger or were concealed in [T.R.'s] underwear.'. . The strip search was also unreasonable in its scope under the second prong of T.L.O. because the school officials' decision to strip search T.R. twice and in front of an open window 'exposed [T.R.] to an unnecessary level of intrusion that rendered the search excessive in scope, and, therefore, unconstitutional.'. . Since the Defendants' actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, we conclude that the Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. Thus, the district court erred in granting summary judgment in favor of the Defendants on T.R.'s Fourth Amendment claim. Accordingly, we reverse and remand to the district court on T.R.'s 42 U.S.C. § 1983 unreasonable search and seizure claim.")

Johnson v. City of Miami Beach, 18 F.4th 1267, 1273-75 (11th Cir. 2021) ("Here, viewing the evidence and the videos in the light most favorable to Johnson, a reasonable jury could find that at the time Aguila entered the holding cell and forcibly struck him, (1) Johnson's arrest was effected; (2) Johnson was fully secured, as he was far enough inside the holding cell that Officer Mejia could have slid the door closed without incident; (3) Johnson was not moving, resisting, or otherwise posing a threat to Mejia or any other officer; (4) Johnson was not attempting to flee; and (5) Defendant Aguila had no need to use any force against Johnson. The Graham factors weigh in Johnson's favor. A reasonable jury thus could find that Defendant Aguila used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment when he entered the holding cell and forcibly struck Johnson, who was then secure, not resisting, and not a safety threat to any officers. . . . In two recent decisions, the Supreme Court reversed the denial of qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment excessive force cases. City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 595 U.S. ——, —— S.Ct. ——, —— L.Ed.2d ——, 2021 WL 4822664 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021); Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 595 U.S. ——, —— S.Ct. ——, —— L.Ed.2d ——, 2021 WL 4822662 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021). In doing so, the Supreme Court in both decisions emphasized that 'specificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context, where it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'. . .As explained above, at the time of Defendant Aguila's conduct on March 24, 2017, our circuit case law clearly established that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment when he uses gratuitous force against an arrestee who is fully secured, not resisting arrest, and not posing a safety threat to the officer. [noting cases] . . . . These cases are binding, materially similar precedent that would put a reasonable officer on fair notice that it was unlawful to strike Johnson after his arrest was effected, he was fully secured inside a holding cell, and he was not resisting or attempting to flee. Specifically, an objectively reasonable officer would have known on March 24, 2017, that it was clearly unlawful to gratuitously and forcibly strike an arrestee who was fully secured, not resisting, not posing a safety threat, and not attempting to flee. See Hadley, 526 F.3d at 1330; Lee, 284 F.3d at 1198; City of Tahlequah, —— U.S. at ——, —— S.Ct. at ——, 2021 WL 4822664, at *2.")

Goldring v. Henry, No. 19-13820, 2021 WL 5274721, at *5 (11th Cir. Nov. 12, 2021) (not reported) ("As an initial matter, we reject the notion that if probable cause existed for at least one of the charges, then the officers may avoid a malicious-prosecution claim. Our decision in Williams makes clear that the 'any-crime' rule—under which officers are insulated from false-arrest claims as long as probable cause exists to arrest the suspect for some crime—does not apply in the malicious-prosecution context. . . Rather, arguable probable cause must exist for each of the charged crimes: here, jaywalking and trafficking in cocaine. . . . To sum up, Goldring offered summary judgment evidence in support of every element of her section 1983 malicious prosecution claim. She offered proof that the officers initiated a criminal prosecution against her that terminated in her favor by intentionally lying in the warrant application that she had jaywalked, in violation of the Fourth Amendment, which resulted in a seizure that couldn't be justified without legal process. Because 'the law is clearly established that the Constitution prohibits a police officer from knowingly making false statements in an arrest affidavit about the probable cause for an arrest in order to detain a citizen if such false statements were necessary to the probable cause,'. . . Goldring 'established a genuine dispute over whether the officers violated [her] clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment' as to her seizure for jaywalking[.] . . The district court correctly concluded that the officers weren't entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the case.")

Sosa v. Martin County, Florida, 13 F.4th 1254, 1266-76 (11th Cir. 2021), rehearing en banc granted and opinion vacated by Sosa v. Martin County, Florida, 21 F.4th 1362 (11th Cir. 2022) ("Claims of overdetention under § 1983 can arise under the Fourth Amendment's right to be free from detention without probable cause or under the Fourteenth Amendment's substantive due-process right to be free from continued detention after it should have been known that the detainee was entitled to release. . . Here, the claim arises under the Fourteenth Amendment. That is so because Sosa asserts that even if a valid warrant supported his arrest, he had the right to be free from continued detention once the deputies knew there was a serious risk Sosa was misidentified as the target of the warrant but continued to detain him, anyway. . . Proving a violation requires a plaintiff to establish that the defendant was deliberately indifferent to his due-process rights. . . To satisfy that standard, a plaintiff must show three things: (1) the defendant's subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm in the form of continued detention even after the plaintiff had a right to be released; (2) disregard of that risk; and (3) disregard by conduct that is more than mere negligence. . . . We think Sosa has alleged sufficient facts to bring his case squarely within the ambit of Cannon. Like Parrott, Sosa has alleged that he repeatedly advised deputies, including those at the jail on the date of his arrest, that he was not the wanted person. Notably, he also informed them that he had previously been mistakenly arrested by the Martin County Sheriff's Department on the wanted Sosa's warrant and that he and the wanted Sosa had different birthdates, Social Security numbers, and other identifying information, including a difference in height, weight, and tattoos (the wanted Sosa had one, while Sosa did not). In fact, Sosa asserted that on that same day, he 'explained this in detail to a Martin County deputy named Sanchez as well as some other Martin County jailers and employees in the booking area, who took down his information and claimed they would look into the matter.' In assessing these allegations at the motion-to-dismiss stage, we must make every reasonable inference from the alleged facts in favor of the plaintiff. And when we do that here, these allegations sufficiently establish that Sanchez and other deputies at the jail had enough information to know (1) that a substantial possibility existed that Sosa was not the wanted Sosa and (2) that they had the means readily available to rapidly confirm Sosa's identity. Yet they took no action for three days and nights while Sosa sat in jail. Finally, after Sosa spent three nights in jail, an unnamed deputy followed up on the information Sosa had provided them. And when an unidentified deputy did so by taking Sosa's fingerprints—a standard police tool long used by every U.S. police force—that deputy was easily and quickly able to confirm that Sosa was not the wanted Sosa. . . Under these circumstances, Sanchez's and the other deputies' failure to act for three days and nights to verify that Sosa was the wanted Sosa is reminiscent of Collins's failure to take any steps to identify Parrott as Mann in Cannon. We said in Cannon that 'Collins' failure to take any steps to identify [Parrott] as the wanted fugitive was sufficient to raise a question of fact as to his deliberate indifference toward [Parrott's] due process rights.'. . Sanchez's and the other deputies' failure for three days and nights to undertake any steps to confirm Sosa's identity as the wanted Sosa, despite having information indicating he was not, is no less sufficient to support Sosa's claim that these defendants were deliberately indifferent towards Sosa's due-process rights. Defendants-Appellees and the Dissent contend that Baker . . . requires a different answer. We disagree. . . .Our colleague reads [Baker] to stand for the proposition that, no matter the circumstances, three days' detention can never amount to an unconstitutional deprivation of liberty without due process of law, as long as the person was detained on a valid warrant. We respectfully disagree . . . . In Baker, Linnie was arrested within two months of the issuance of the warrant by another county in his same state, and his brother had set him up so the state would think it was looking for Linnie. That is a very different situation from the one we have here, where Sosa was arrested 26 years after the warrant issued, in a state halfway across the country from where the warrant issued, and no one made any effort to fool the detaining officers into thinking Sosa was the wanted Sosa. A 26-year-old warrant issued five states and almost 1,400 miles away from the arrest location—particularly for an individual with such a common name as David Sosa. . .inherently raises more identity questions than a two-month-old warrant issued in the much less common name of Linnie McCollan, from the same state as the arrest location. . . Not only that, but to state the obvious, 2018, when Sosa was detained, was not 1972, when Linnie was detained. The technology law-enforcement officers used every day in 2018 remained entirely the stuff of science fiction in 1972. . . . [W]e also note that Baker involved facts distinguishable in another way as well. As Justice Blackmun explained in his concurrence (and unlike here), the deputies who left Linnie in jail for days without checking into his claims at all were not named as defendants. . . Rather, the sheriff was the sole defendant. And he had not 'turned a deaf ear to [Linnie's] protests.' Rather, he had 'checked the files and released [Linnie] as soon as [he] became aware of [Linnie's] claim.'. . Indeed, Justice Blackmun noted, 'there [was] no indication that [the sheriff] was aware, or should have been aware, either of the likelihood of misidentification or of his subordinates' action[s].'. . And of course, in the absence of personal participation or a causal connection between a supervisor's actions and the misdeeds of those she supervises, § 1983 does not allow for supervisors in their individual capacity to be held vicariously liable for the unconstitutional acts or omissions of their subordinates. . .Justice Blackmun also observed that the Court's opinion did not 'foreclose the possibility that a prisoner in [Linnie's] predicament might prove a due process violation by a sheriff who deliberately and repeatedly refused to check the identity of a complaining prisoner against readily available mug shots and fingerprints.'. . . Consistent with these reasons for why Baker does not govern Sosa's situation, we interpreted Baker in Cannon as not precluding a jury from finding that Parrott's Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated when Deputy Collins held Parrott for seven days without taking steps to identify her as the wanted fugitive, even though he could have easily and readily ruled her out just by obtaining information directly from Parrott (instead of from the NCIC report on Mann). . . Sosa's case raises the same problem. He alleges that Sanchez and the other deputies at the jail did nothing to resolve the identity dispute for three days and nights while he sat in jail. And they did not act, even though Sosa repeatedly and insistently advised them of the Martin County Sheriff's Department's prior mistaken arrest of him on the same warrant and of the differences between himself and the wanted Sosa—and even though a quick, easy, and readily available comparison of Sosa's fingerprints to those of the wanted Sosa would have cleared up the entire problem immediately (as it ultimately did when an unidentified deputy finally did get around to printing Sosa and comparing his prints to the wanted Sosa's). So Baker does not allow for the conclusion that the deputies here did not violate Sosa's Fourteenth Amendment substantive-due-process right. . . . Because we conclude that Sosa sufficiently alleged that Sanchez and the other deputies at the jail violated his Fourteenth Amendment due-process right, we next consider whether that right was clearly established when the alleged violation occurred. . . . Here, 'a broader, clearly established principle ... control[s] the novel facts.' . . . Based on Cannon, Sanchez and the other deputies who failed to take any steps to identify Sosa as the wanted Sosa were on notice that completely shirking their responsibilities—over a period of three days—while a potentially misidentified, innocent person was imprisoned could constitute deliberate indifference and violate the detainee's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due-process rights. . . Because Cannon made it clear that an officer's 'failure to take any steps to identify' a detainee as the target of warrant is unconstitutional, Deputy Sanchez and the other deputies at the jail are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . For these reasons, we reverse the district court's dismissal of Sosa's overdetention claim and remand for further proceedings.")

Sosa v. Martin County, Florida, 13 F.4th 1254, 1279, 1281-82, 1286, 1288 (11th Cir. 2021) (Luck, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), rehearing en banc granted and opinion vacated by Sosa v. Martin County, Florida, 21 F.4th 1362 (11th Cir. 2022) ("The district court dismissed David Sosa's Fourth Amendment false arrest claim against Deputy Killough, his Fourteenth Amendment overdetention claim against Deputy Sanchez, and his Monell liability claim against the sheriff and the county for failing to institute policies and train deputies to prevent false arrests and overdetentions. The majority opinion affirms the dismissal of Sosa's false arrest and Monell claims and reverses the dismissal of his overdetention claim. I agree we should affirm the dismissal of Sosa's false arrest and Monell claims. But, because Sosa has not alleged a violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, I would also affirm the dismissal of his overdetention claim. As to that part of the majority opinion, I respectfully dissent. . . . Given the Supreme Court's certainty, I think we are bound to conclude that Sosa's three-day detention on a facially valid warrant, despite his repeated claims of mistaken identity, did not and could not amount to a deprivation of his liberty without due process. Sosa, like Linnie, was arrested on a facially valid warrant. Sosa, like Linnie, repeatedly protested his innocence. Sosa's jailer, like Linnie's sheriff, didn't investigate the mistaken identity claim for three days. And Sosa's jailer, like Linnie's sheriff, could easily have determined that he had the wrong person in custody by doing a simple identification match. Taken together, the Supreme Court concluded that these facts did not allege a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . The majority opinion gives six reasons why Baker is distinguishable from the facts of this case. None of them are persuasive. . . .Baker held that, for the three days that Linnie was in custody, so long as the arrest was made on probable cause and he was accorded a speedy trial, the sheriff was not required to investigate independently Linnie's mistaken-identity claim. . . But Baker acknowledged the '[o]bvious[ ],' that Linnie 'could not be detained indefinitely in the face of repeated protests of innocence even though the warrant under which he was arrested and detained met the standards of the Fourth Amendment.'. . And the Baker Court 'assume[d]' that 'mere detention pursuant to a valid warrant but in the face of repeated protests of innocence will after the lapse of a certain amount of time deprive the accused of "liberty ... without due process of law."'. . But a detention of only three days over a long weekend 'does not and could not amount of such a deprivation.'. . Because Sosa was held for the same three days that Linnie was held, Baker controls. . . . Critically, in none of our cases discussing Baker's holding did we mention New Year's weekend, the suspect's name, the warrant's age, fingerprint technology, or Justice Blackmun's concurring opinion. . . . Unlike Parrott, Linnie and Sosa were both only held for three days (and they were held on a facially valid warrant). . . . As the Baker Court explained, 'we are quite certain that a detention of three days over a New Year's weekend does not and could not amount to such a deprivation.'. . The majority opinion rightly reminds us that a holding can reach no further than the facts and circumstances presented to the court. . . For that reason, Cannon is limited to cases where the arrestee is held on an invalid warrant and where she is held for at least seven days. That's how we've understood Cannon. . . . Under Baker, Sosa's three-day detention on a facially valid warrant did not violate his due process rights. Because we are bound by Baker, I would affirm the district court's dismissal for Deputy Sanchez on Sosa's overdetention claim.")

Wade v. United States, 13 F.4th 1217, 1224-30 (11th Cir. 2021) ("Captain Lewis argues that, even if the undisputed facts are construed in a light most favorable to Wade, those undisputed facts distinguish this case from Aldridge and, thus, the district court erred in denying him qualified immunity on the ground that Captain Lewis's conduct violated clearly established law. In other words, Captain Lewis's appeal 'concerns only the application of established legal principles to a given set of facts.'. . Accordingly, we have jurisdiction over Captain Lewis's appeal. . . . Here, because the district court determined that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, we address only the question of whether a right was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct. Under the clearly established prong, the dispositive question is whether the law at the time of the challenged conduct gave the government official fair warning that his conduct was unconstitutional. . . . Several critical facts materially distinguish this case from Aldridge. First, the nature of the injuries is different. In Aldridge, the plaintiff suffered an injury to his head—one of the most sensitive areas of the human body—whereas here, Wade suffered an injury to his hand. Considering that both cuts were about the same size, the injury to a bodily extremity, such as

Wade's hand, is less serious than the injury in Aldridge. Second, there is a substantial difference between what the defendants observed about the plaintiff's wound in each case. In Aldridge, the defendants observed that the plaintiff continued to bleed for two-and-a-half hours while in their custody. Thus, their awareness of the seriousness of the injury increased over time and was readily apparent. Here, all that can be said is that Captain Lewis was aware that Wade's hand was still bleeding during a brief 10-minute escort to the SHU, at which point he left Wade in the custody of other personnel. . . That is to say, Captain Lewis did not have the benefit of extended observation like the defendants in Aldridge. Third, the quantity of blood is different. Although Wade testified that he told Captain Lewis that he was 'leaking' an indeterminate amount of blood 'all over' and leaving a 'path of blood' as they walked, Wade has never alleged that the blood soaked his clothing or pooled on the floor of the SHU cell, as was the case in Aldridge. To the contrary, by Wade's own admission, the blood was 'tapering off' almost immediately after he and Captain Lewis completed their 10-minute walk to the SHU. Perhaps most importantly, it is undisputed that Captain Lewis left the SHU shortly after Wade arrived there and, thus, Captain Lewis did not observe a puddle of blood—a puddle that Wade never alleges even existed. . . 'Critical to our decision in [Aldridge] was that the plaintiff's cut bled continuously [for over two hours], causing blood to pool on the plaintiff's clothing and the floor.'. . Those facts are critical also to our decision today because they are noticeably absent here. Fourth, and finally, Captain Lewis left Wade under the supervision of other personnel who were equipped to treat Wade. Shortly after Captain Lewis and Wade reached the cell, other USP-Atlanta officers arrived, removed Wade's handcuffs, and took custody of him. Wade's holding cell was no more than three feet from the medical exam room where medical staff rendered medical care to SHU inmates. These circumstances stand in stark contrast to those in Aldridge, when the defendants were informed that the plaintiff required medical attention at a different location—a hospital—but ignored that need for two-and-a-half hours. . . Taking all these important factual distinctions together, we have no difficulty concluding that it would not have been clear to an objectively reasonable officer in Captain Lewis's situation that his conduct violated clearly established law. . . .Wade argues that, even apart from Aldridge, the law was clearly established at a higher level of generality. Specifically, he submits that on the date of his injury, it was clearly established that '[u]nder the Eighth Amendment, prisoners have a right to receive medical treatment for their illnesses and injuries.'. . By pointing to 'a broader, clearly established principle that should control the novel facts of the situation,' Wade has the burden of showing that the broad principle established 'with obvious clarity that in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness of the official's conduct is apparent.'. . Wade cannot meet his burden here. Nothing about this case suggests that it is 'obvious' that Captain Lewis violated Wade's 'right to receive medical treatment for [his] ... injur[y],'. . . when he escorted Wade for 10 minutes to the SHU cell located three feet from a medical examination room and left him in the custody of other officers. . . In determining whether the law was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, we have explained that 'judicial precedents are tied to particularized facts,'. . . and '[m]inor variations between cases may prove critical[.]'. . Thus, district courts are obliged to analyze carefully whether 'preexisting law dictates, that is, truly compels, the conclusion for all reasonable, similarly situated public officials that what Defendant was doing violated Plaintiffs' federal rights in the circumstances.'. .

Here, the district court failed to undertake this careful analysis, and Aldridge does not clearly establish that Captain Lewis violated Wade's constitutional right. Accordingly, Captain Lewis is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Wade v. United States, 13 F.4th 1217, 1230-31 (11th Cir. 2021) (Tjoflat, J., concurring) ("I agree with the court that defendant Lewis is entitled to qualified immunity, but I write separately to highlight why we have jurisdiction over this appeal and to suggest that the qualified immunity analysis is simpler than the court suggests. . . . [T]he court distinguishes Aldridge on four grounds to hold that the right was not clearly established here. I agree that Lewis is entitled to qualified immunity, but I write separately to highlight the fact that Lewis's role in this incident as reflected in the record is what best differentiates this case from that of the liable officers in Aldridge. Facially, there are some similarities between Aldridge and this case. The plaintiffs in both cases sustained bleeding injuries and went without medical assistance for hours in officers' custody. See Aldridge v. Montgomery, 753 F.2d 970, 971 (11th Cir. 1985) (per curiam). The court differentiates this case from Aldridge on four grounds: 1) The plaintiff in Aldridge had a head injury while Wade suffered a hand injury; 2) the defendants in Aldridge observed the plaintiff bleeding for two hours while Lewis's walk with Wade only lasted ten minutes; 3) the plaintiff in Aldridge bled more than Wade; and 4) the defendants in Aldridge neglected to take the plaintiff to the hospital for over two hours while Lewis left Wade under the supervision of other officers who could treat Wade. While I appreciate the court's thorough analysis of Aldridge, this case can be distilled to one simple point. The key difference between these cases in my estimation is not necessarily where the injury was or how much the inmate bled over the course of the day, but instead who is being sued and under what theory of law. Wade is not suing the officers who kept him in custody for hours without medical treatment, like the plaintiff in Aldridge. He is suing Lewis, who escorted him from the dining hall area to the SHU, located right next to the medical unit, where Lewis then handed Wade over to other officers. Narrowing our focus from the time Lewis entered the scene to the time he left Wade in other officers' custody, the time period for which there is an utter lack of evidence in the record, we have no facts from which to draw inferences in Wade's favor. There is no evidence in the record that Lewis did anything more than escort Wade to the SHU. The dialogue between the two on the walk as reflected in the record certainly does not indicate that Lewis violated a clearly established right. And Wade has pointed to no other case to establish that Lewis is not entitled to qualified immunity. Lewis is entitled to qualified immunity, not because this case is so much different from Aldridge on the facts, but because there are no facts in the record suggesting that this particular defendant is liable.") Bradley v. Benton, 10 F.4th 1232, 1240-44 (11th Cir. 2021) ("[F]or the purposes of our analysis, we assume that Officer Benton fired his taser while Robinson was atop the wall, temporarily paralyzing him and causing him to fall, break his neck, and die. We are tasked with deciding whether Officer Benton's use of force in this context—shooting a taser aimed at a person on top of an eight-foot wall who was unarmed and not suspected of committing any particular crime—was excessive. We have little trouble in concluding that this use of force was excessive. . . .

[T]aking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, Officer Benton knew that he was using deadly force when he tased Robinson on top of the wall. He had been trained that a person who is tased will experience 'neuromuscular incapacitation' and will be paralyzed from pain for around five seconds; more than enough time for Robinson to lose his balance and fall from atop the wall. In his deposition, Officer Benton was asked if he understood department policy that a taser 'should not be used when the risk of falling would likely result in death, for example, on a roof or next to a swimming pool.' He replied that he did. He was then asked if he agreed that it was 'not appropriate' to use a taser 'if someone is at an elevated height[.]' He replied, 'I agree.' Cf. Lombardo v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, —— U.S. ——, 141 S. Ct. 2239, 2241, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2021) (when deciding whether to grant summary judgment on an excessive force claim, relevant facts include departmental instructions and other well-known police guidance). Accordingly, considering the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, Officer Benton applied force that he knew created a substantial risk of serious bodily harm or death. . . . Accepting the plaintiffs' version of the facts as true, Robinson posed no threat of serious physical harm to anyone. Nor was he suspected of committing a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm. He was not even the suspect of the traffic stop; the vehicle was owned and driven by Sims. Nevertheless, Officer Benton applied deadly force without warning to prevent Robinson's escape on foot. Under these circumstances, Officer Benton's use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable. . . . The Supreme Court has held that the existence of materially similar caselaw is 'especially important in the Fourth Amendment context.'. . To defeat a qualified immunity defense without a materially similar precedent on point, a Fourth Amendment plaintiff must show that an officer's 'conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official.'. . She 'must show that the official's conduct "was so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that [the official] had to know he was violating the Constitution even without caselaw on point."'. . This case passes both tests: the right in question was clearly established by a materially similar precedent and was obviously clear in any event. First, there is a materially similar precedent: Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 105 S.Ct. 1694, 85 L.Ed.2d 1 (1985). There, the Supreme Court held that a police officer used excessive force when he shot an unarmed burglary suspect to stop him from fleeing on foot. . . The Supreme Court has cautioned us against relying on the holding of Garner to the extent that holding is 'cast at a high level of generality.'. . But we are concerned with Garner's analogous facts, not Garner's high-level holding. Garner clearly established that an officer cannot use deadly force to stop an unarmed man who is not suspected of committing a violent crime from fleeing on foot. That is precisely what happened in Garner and that is precisely what happened in this case. Accordingly, Garner put Officer Benton on notice that he could not use deadly force to stop Robinson from running away on foot. . . . Unlike the suspect in Harper, Robinson was neither armed nor suspected of committing a violent crime. But, despite lacking these justifications, Officer Benton used the same significant degree of force against Robinson that the officers used in Harper. Accordingly, our nonbinding opinion in Harper does not support Officer Benton's position. Second, we would conclude that the use of force here was obviously unconstitutional even absent a case directly on point. Robinson posed no immediate threat to Officer Benton. He never tried to harm any of the officers, nor did he make any threatening movements or gestures. The officers also had no reason to think he posed a threat to anyone in the apartment complex, which he had just left. He was not suspected of committing a crime involving the infliction of serious physical harm. He was not even the suspect of the traffic stop, which was conducted on the suspicion that Sims was driving with an illegal tag. Yet, without any warning, Officer Benton applied deadly force to prevent Robinson's escape from the traffic stop on foot. We conclude that no reasonable officer could have believed that the application of deadly force was warranted under these circumstances.")

Fuqua v. Turner, 996 F.3d 1140, 1150-53 (11th Cir. 2021) ("On appeal, Collier defends the District Court's conclusion that he is entitled to qualified immunity on two alternative grounds. First, Collier argues the District Court correctly concluded that given the administrative nature of the search, it was not clearly established that he needed Fuqua's consent to justify the warrantless search. Second, he argues that even if it were clearly established that he needed consent, he would still be entitled to qualified immunity because Fuqua failed to show that he did not have consent to search The Pig or Fuqua's private bedroom therein. We do not decide whether the District Court correctly concluded that the administrative nature of the inspection obviated the need for a warrant or consent because we believe a reasonable officer in Collier's position could have believed he had consent. We affirm the District Court's conclusion that Collier was entitled to qualified immunity on that basis. . . . Although it is difficult to tell, Fuqua appears to challenge both Collier's search of The Pig and of Fuqua's bedroom within The Pig. The first question is whether Collier introduced sufficient evidence for us to conclude that a reasonable officer could have thought his search of The Pig justified by virtue of Collier's free and voluntary consent. If so, the question becomes whether a reasonable officer could have understood the scope of consent to extend to Fuqua's bedroom. We answer each question in turn and ultimately answer both in the affirmative. It follows that Collier was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [W]e have a fairly defined picture of when law enforcement officers have effective consent to search private residences for evidence of criminal activity. We know that the mere failure to object to an officer's entry into the home does not constitute valid consent to the entry, but that some affirmative indication, even if non-verbal, that the officers are welcome to enter may be enough. We also know that an officer cannot procure valid consent by force or intimidation, whether verbal or physical. Finally, we know what factors might tip the determination one way or the other: how many officers are present; whether the officers are armed, whether the arms are visible, and whether they are drawn; whether the agents explain the purpose of the search; and whether the homeowner actively aided the officers in searching his home. Less clear, though, is how these principles map onto the context of the present case, which differs from the foregoing cases in at least three significant respects. First, the officer here is a deputy fire marshal rather than a conventional law enforcement officer. Second, the purpose of the search—at least facially—was to uncover violations of the fire code rather than evidence of criminal activity. And third, the premises searched here were a public establishment that was part of a highly regulated industry and the private bedroom within that public establishment. Even if Collier's conduct would have violated Fuqua's Fourth Amendment rights under the principles applicable to law enforcement officers conducting traditional law enforcement searches of standalone private dwellings, Fuqua has not directed us to any cases that would put an officer on clear notice that those principles apply in the same way within the quite different context in which Collier acted.") Crocker v. Beatty, 995 F.3d 1232, 1240-43 (11th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 845 (2022) ("Under this Court's precedent, a right can be clearly established in one of three ways. Crocker must point to either (1) 'case law with indistinguishable facts,' (2) 'a broad statement of principle within the Constitution, statute, or case law,' or (3) 'conduct so egregious that a constitutional right was clearly violated, even in the total absence of case law.'. . Although we have recognized that options two and three can suffice, the Supreme Court has warned us not to 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . For that reason, the second and third paths are rarely-trod ones. . . And when a plaintiff relies on a 'general rule[ ]' to show that the law is clearly established, it must 'appl[y] with obvious clarity to the circumstances.'. . . The district court held that Beatty was entitled to qualified immunity because the law underlying Crocker's First Amendment claim wasn't clearly established. We agree. Crocker's contrary argument appears to be of the Path-2 variety—i.e., a contention that a 'broad statement of [First Amendment] principle' in our caselaw clearly established his right to photograph the accident scene. For that proposition, he first points to our three-paragraph opinion in Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332 (11th Cir. 2000). There, we said that '[t]he First Amendment protects the right to gather information about what public officials do on public property, and specifically, a right to record matters of public interest.'. . In particular, we held that the plaintiffs there 'had a First Amendment right, subject to reasonable time, manner and place restrictions, to photograph or videotape police conduct.'. . So far, so good—that's certainly a 'broad statement.' But in our view, it is decidedly not 'obvious' that Smith's 'general rule applies to the specific situation in question' here. . . To borrow the district court's phrasing, Crocker was 'spectating on the median of a major highway at the rapidly evolving scene of a fatal crash.' In that 'specific situation,' we don't think it would be obvious to every reasonable officer that Smith gave Crocker the right to take pictures of the accident's aftermath. . . .The dissent concludes otherwise on the ground that 'the broad pronouncement in Smith underscores the right's general applicability.'. . And so, as the dissent reads Smith, the 'right to record police activity' may be 'limited only by "reasonable time, manner and place restrictions."'. . Because the dissent finds no such restrictions in the record here, it would 'hold that Mr. Crocker's First Amendment right to record the fatal car crash was clearly established' by Smith. . . A couple of responses. First, there is the Supreme Court's oft-repeated instruction 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . With that negative injunction comes a positive command to ask 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . And we must answer that question 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. .Second, we think that one of the few contextual clues Smith did leave behind counsels against reading it to have clearly established the law for the purposes of this case. Specifically, Smith's reference to 'reasonable time, manner and place restrictions' (which the dissent echoes) calls to mind either 'a traditional public forum—parks, streets, sidewalks, and the like'—or a 'designated public forum'—i.e., a place made a public forum by government action. . . Smith's allusion to these restrictions indicates that the plaintiffs there attempted to film police activity while in a public forum of some sort—Smith would seem to be a First Amendment anomaly otherwise. Needless to say, I-95's median isn't a public forum of any stripe. It's not clear to us, then, that Smith's (and the dissent's) time-place-and-manner gloss even applies here. . . To be clear, though, the question isn't whether Smith might imply to us some kind of public-forum predicate; rather, we must ask whether every reasonable police officer in Beatty's position would have known that Crocker had a right to record the accident's aftermath, subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. . . We don't think so. Subject to exceptions not relevant here, Florida law prohibits individuals from parking on the side of a 'limited access facility' like I-95 . . . or walking on the same[.] When Beatty seized his phone, Crocker was arguably in violation of both prohibitions. The dissent's Smith-based argument implies that, in addition to banning individuals from parking or walking on interstates, Florida must also craft separate time, place, and manner restrictions governing the speech of people who break those laws. That seems odd to us—and at the very least not obviously correct. . . . For the foregoing reasons, we hold that Smith's rule didn't apply with 'obvious clarity to the circumstances,'. . . and, therefore, that Beatty is entitled to qualified immunity on Crocker's First Amendment claim.")

Crocker v. Beatty, 995 F.3d 1232, 1259-61 (11th Cir. 2021) (Martin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 845 (2022) ("The majority says the law underlying Mr. Crocker's First Amendment claim was not clearly established at the time Deputy Beatty seized his phone. . . Specifically, the majority opinion says this Court's opinion in Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332 (11th Cir. 2000), does not obviously apply to the facts here. . . But I think the majority cabins Smith too narrowly. In my view, Smith clearly establishes that Mr. Crocker had a right to photograph the accident scene and I would therefore reverse the grant of qualified immunity to Deputy Beatty on this claim. . . . It is true that Smith does not detail the specific facts presented there. . . But for me, the lack of factual detail does not do away with the right Smith announced. To the contrary, the broad pronouncement in Smith underscores the right's general applicability. Smith says there is 'a First Amendment right ... to photograph or videotape police conduct.'. . This statement is unambiguous and not couched in specifics that limit its application. Instead, the right is limited only by 'reasonable time, manner and place restrictions.'. . And the contours of the right announced in Smith do not require such precise definition. Unlike findings about the use of excessive force, for example, it is usually easy enough to know whether a plaintiff was recording police activity. Indeed, a number of district courts within this Circuit have relied on Smith to determine, in distinct factual contexts, that the right to record police activity is clearly established. . . I thus read Smith to clearly establish a general rule that the First Amendment protects a person's right to record police conduct—subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. . . . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Mr. Crocker, he was photographing police conduct. When Deputy Beatty seized his phone, Mr. Crocker was photographing the scene of a fatal car accident and the emergency response, including police activity, surrounding it. This record reveals no 'reasonable time, manner and place restrictions,' limiting Mr. Crocker's speech here. . . Permissible time, place, and manner restrictions are content-neutral restrictions on First Amendment conduct that are supported by a substantial government interest and do not unreasonably limit alternative avenues of communication. . . They are, by their nature, rules, not discretionary enforcement decisions by individual police officers. . . Again, this record suggests no such rules were in place here. And indeed, accepting Mr. Crocker's allegations as true, even Deputy Beatty understood that Florida's statutes regarding limited access facilities did not bear on Crocker's First Amendment activity. Mr. Crocker says when he asked Deputy Beatty whether it was illegal to photograph the scene, Beatty replied 'no, but now your phone is evidence of the State.' The right to record police activity is important not only as a form of expression, but also as a practical check on police power. Recordings of police misconduct have played a vital role in the national conversation about criminal justice for decades. I read today's opinion to parse this critical right too narrowly. I would hold that Mr. Crocker's First Amendment right to record the fatal car crash was clearly established and reverse the grant of qualified immunity to Deputy Beatty.")

Crocker v. Beatty, 995 F.3d 1232, 1252 (11th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 845 (2022) ("Until recently, we'd never even 'directly confronted a "hot car" case ....' Patel, 969 F.3d at 1182. Our one-time paucity of hot-car caselaw makes it tough for Crocker to win. Not even Patel—whose constitutional claim was much stronger—could overcome qualified immunity. . . And frankly, we can't see how Crocker's claim could succeed where Patel's failed. Crocker says that the clearly established law here comes from our decision in Danley v. Allen, 540 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2008). We considered and rejected the analogy between Danley and hot-car cases in Patel, . . . and we do so again today. In Danley, a prisoner was pepper-sprayed in a poorly-ventilated cell, and although officials allowed him a brief shower, that proved ineffective—Danley ultimately spent 12 or 13 hours stuck 'in pepper-spray vapor in a poorly ventilated cell.'. . The use of force in Danley was 'altogether different' from the force used in Patel. . . So too here. Like Patel before him, Crocker also points to Danley's citation of Burchett v. Kiefer, 310 F.3d 937 (6th Cir. 2002). Burchett was another hot-car case, and there, the Sixth Circuit held that confining an arrestee 'for three hours in ninety-degree heat with no ventilation violated his Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizures.'. . To the extent Crocker contends that Danley's citation of Burchett made Burchett part of our caselaw, we reject that incorporation-by-citation argument just as we did in Patel. . . Because Crocker's Fourteenth Amendment claim fails on the merits—and because the law underlying that claim wasn't clearly established, in any event—we hold that the district court correctly granted summary judgment for Deputy Beatty.")

Crocker v. Beatty, 995 F.3d 1232, 1265-66 (11th Cir. 2021) (Martin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 845 (2022) ("Finally I address whether, at the time of Mr. Crocker's arrest, it was clearly established that Deputy Beatty's conduct violated the Fourteenth Amendment. The majority gets it right here, as in Patel v. Lanier County, 969 F.3d 1173, 1184–88 (11th Cir. 2020), in saying that the mere act of detaining Mr. Crocker in the back seat of a hot car for approximately 30 minutes was not clearly established as amounting to objectively unreasonable force. . . However, Patel did not present the question of whether it was clearly established that prolonged detention in a hot car for the express purpose of inflicting punishment amounted to excessive force under Bell's subjective test. 'Where the official's state of mind is an essential element of the underlying violation,' as it is under Bell, 'the [official's] state of mind must be considered in the qualified immunity analysis or a plaintiff would almost never be able to prove that the official was not entitled to qualified immunity.'. . Here, Mr. Crocker presented evidence sufficient to raise a dispute of fact as to whether Deputy Beatty locked him in the back of a hot patrol car with the express intent of punishing him. Since Mr. Crocker has established a genuine issue of material fact about whether Deputy Beatty acted with express intent to punish, Beatty is not entitled to qualified immunity. We have held that 'Bell's prohibition on any pretrial punishment, defined to include conditions imposed with an intent to punish,' should make it 'obvious to all reasonable officials' that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits imposing detention conditions with the express goal of punishment. . . . Based on this rationale, McMillian held that it was clearly established that placing a pretrial detainee on death row for the express purpose of punishing him violated the Fourteenth Amendment even though there was 'no case with facts similar to McMillian's allegations.'. . The imposition of restrictive conditions with the express goal of punishment was sufficient to put the officers in McMillian on notice that their actions violated the Fourteenth Amendment. So too here. At the time of Mr. Crocker's arrest, it was clear enough that police officers may not intentionally expose pretrial detainees to extreme environmental conditions for the sole purpose of causing suffering. This 'broad statement of principle' clearly established Mr. Crocker's right to be free of intentionally inflicted punishment. . . And it should have been 'obvious' to Deputy Beatty that the Constitution prohibited him from intentionally turning off his air conditioning and leaving Mr. Crocker in the back of his hot patrol car with the sole purpose of causing him to suffer. . . I would therefore hold that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment to Deputy Beatty on this claim. I respectfully dissent.")

Helm v. Rainbow City, Alabama, 989 F.3d 1265, 1272-78 (11th Cir. 2021) ("The principle that an officer must intervene when he or she witnesses unconstitutional force has been clearly established in this Circuit for decades. . . When an officer witnesses another officer's excessive use of force and makes 'no effort to intervene and stop the ongoing constitutional violation[,] ... [the witnessing officer] is no more entitled to qualified immunity than [the officer using force].'. .Here, because no dispute exists that the officers were acting within the scope of their discretionary authority, we proceed to the next steps of the qualified immunity analysis, i.e., whether the officers in question violated the constitutional rights of T.D.H. or Helm and, if so, whether decisions of the Supreme Court, this Court, or the relevant state supreme court—in this case, the Alabama Supreme Court—clearly established that it was a violation. . . . None of the cases Officer Morris relies on are on all fours with this case. Unlike in Callwood, Buckley, and Lewis, it is undisputed here that at least four adult men were holding down T.D.H.—a teenage female—as she continued suffering from grand mal seizures. And resolving disputed factual issues in T.D.H.'s favor, she was not resisting, kicking, spitting, or biting. She was therefore 'fully secured' and 'completely restrained.' Similarly, unlike in Estate of Hill, T.D.H. was not combative, posed no threat to others, and, to the extent she posed a risk to herself, that risk could have been managed by simply holding her head to prevent injury from her uncontrollable movements—the technique doctors had taught her family and that her younger sister used before T.D.H. was carried out to the lobby. Officer Morris's use of his taser in drive stun mode, which is meant only to inflict pain, while four men held her down was unnecessary to alleviate T.D.H.'s medical condition or facilitate medical care. . . . Similar to the plaintiff in Oliver, T.D.H. was not suspected of a crime, posed no danger, did not act belligerently or yell at the officers, and did not disobey or resist the officers. . . T.D.H. had the misfortune of suffering a grand mal seizure in a public venue. Officer Morris's use of his taser on T.D.H. three separate times, while T.D.H. was held down by four men while suffering a grand mal seizure, 'was grossly disproportionate to any threat posed and unreasonable under the circumstances.'. . When viewed in the light most favorable to T.D.H., no reasonable officer in this situation would believe that the use of a taser against T.D.H. was necessary. Moreover, a jury could find that Officer Morris's repeated tasings of T.D.H. amounted to excessive force. . . We therefore conclude that on this summary judgment record T.D.H. has established a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Officer Morris argues that he was confronted with unique circumstances 'in the specific medical-emergency context,' and thus there was no 'controlling' authority establishing that his actions were unlawful. Based on our precedent, we find this argument unpersuasive. . . . As discussed above, in Oliver, this Court held that an officer's use of his taser on the plaintiff was so 'utterly disproportionate ... that any reasonable officer would have recognized that his actions were unlawful.'. . The plaintiff in that case 'was not accused of or suspected of any crime, let alone a violent one; he did not act belligerently or aggressively; he complied with most of the officers' directions; and he made no effort to flee.'. . Based on the facts viewed in the light most favorable to T.D.H., Oliver is materially indistinguishable from this case. . . . However, even if no preexisting case fits the facts of this case, Officer Morris's actions fall within the narrow 'obvious clarity' exception to establish a violation of clearly established rights. Under the 'obvious clarity' exception, this Court looks to the officer's conduct and 'inquires whether that conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to [the officer], notwithstanding the lack of fact-specific case law.'. . Officer Morris deployed his taser on a teenage girl three times as she lay immobilized on the floor with at least four to five adult men holding down her arms and legs while she suffered a medical emergency—a grand mal seizure. She was not suspected of committing a crime, and she posed no threat to others. This is one of those cases that lies at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits. Tasing an individual once (let alone three times) when the individual poses no threat to the officers or others and is experiencing a medical emergency goes so far beyond the sometimes-blurred border between reasonable and unreasonable force that 'qualified immunity will not protect [an officer] even in the absence of case law.'. . .Put simply, the record presents genuine disputed issues of material fact regarding how the events unfolded and whether, during that timeframe, Chief Carroll and Officers Kimbrough and Gilliland were close enough to see Officer Morris's use of excessive force and then attempt to intervene. Because a reasonable jury could find these Defendants failed to intervene in the use of excessive force by Officer Morris, despite having the opportunity to do so, we affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment on Counts Eight, Eleven and Twelve (in part). . . Finally, Officer Gilliland argues that the district court should have conducted an officer-specific analysis to determine whether his failure to intervene violated clearly established law. He claims a lack of controlling authority that would have put him on notice that, under the unique circumstances of this case, he should have intervened. However, as this Court expressed in Priester, '[t]hat a police officer had a duty to intervene when he witnessed the use of excessive force and had the ability to intervene was clearly established in February 1994.'. . Moreover, in cases where the use of force is declared clearly unconstitutional, the officers that failed to intervene are 'no more entitled to qualified immunity than [the officer using force].'. . Once this Court establishes that the use of force is not entitled to qualified immunity and other officers could have intervened but did not, the Court does not conduct a separate clearly established analysis pertaining to each officer's failure to intervene. . . We note, as well, that Officer Morris tased T.D.H. not once or twice, but three times, and there is no indication that Officer Gilliland orally told Officer Morris not to use the taser.")

Teel v. Lozada, 826 F. App'x 880, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) (per curiam), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 77 (2021) ("Under the unique circumstances here, it would be obviously clear to any reasonable officer that the display of force was excessive. As in Mercado, when the evidence is viewed and inferences are drawn in favor of Dr. Teel, 'this is one of the cases that lie so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of case law.'. . 'We have repeatedly held that police officers cannot use force that is wholly unnecessary to any legitimate law enforcement purpose.'. .Officer Lozada's use of force was wholly unnecessary to any legitimate purpose here. As we have explained, Mrs. Teel was not suspected of committing any crime. . . She was suicidal; the purpose of the family's 911 call was to keep her alive, and that should have been the purpose of Officer Lozada's interaction with her given his testimony that he believed her to be a threat only to herself. . . Yet Officer Lozada drew his gun even before he encountered Mrs. Teel, pointed the gun at her before she came near him, and fired at her without warning. Mrs. Teel was not pointing the knife at Officer Lozada or charging at him. By his own testimony she was coming toward him slowly, and he had the opportunity to retreat beyond her reach but simply chose to shoot her instead. Moreover, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Dr. Teel, Officer Lozada had time to warn Mrs. Teel, or even to direct her clearly to disarm herself but failed to do so. . . Given these facts, we conclude that Officer Lozada did not need 'case law to know that by intentionally shooting [Mrs. Teel three times], he was violating [her] Fourth Amendment rights.'. .Officer Lozada notes that he was trained on a '21-foot rule scenario,' in which a charging attacker with a knife could cover 21 feet in the time it would take to draw a firearm. . . He suggests that it cannot be clearly established that the use of a firearm within the range of 21 feet would be excessive force. Even assuming the rationale for this 21-foot rule is accurate, it is inapplicable here. Officer Lozada testified that in the training scenario, the person armed with a knife is 'running towards' the officer. . . Mrs. Teel, who was bleeding profusely from cuts in her arms and neck, was walking gradually—not running—toward Officer Lozada, so any conclusions we could draw about a charging assailant do not apply here. In this case, '[q]ualified immunity does not apply at the summary judgment stage given the light in which we must view the evidence now.'. . Although Officer Lozada 'may yet prevail on [qualified immunity] grounds at or after trial on a motion for a judgment as a matter of law,'. . . Dr. Teel is entitled to a trial on his excessive force claim.")

Cantu v. City of Dothan, 974 F.3d 1217, 1230-35 (11th Cir. 2020) ("This is not a case in which the suspect aggressively or violently fought against being arrested. To be sure, Lawrence did resist being handcuffed and taken into custody. He wrestled with the officers, broke free twice, and ran around the car as they chased him. But resisting arrest alone is not enough to justify the use of deadly force. . . Especially not when the resistance is non-violent, as it was in this case. Lawrence never threw any punches, never kicked any of the officers, never hit any of them, never tried to get one of their firearms, and never physically or verbally threatened to harm them. He never even cursed, at them or otherwise, until he lay mortally wounded on the pavement. Sergeant Woodruff's use of deadly force against Lawrence was unreasonable, and therefore, a violation of the Fourth Amendment unless she had probable cause to believe at the time she shot him that he posed a threat of serious physical harm or death to the one or more of the officers. . . She has put forward only one theory about that, which is that when she shot Lawrence, he had already gained control of the taser and could have used it to incapacitate one or more officers, then could have taken a service pistol from one of them, and then could have used that weapon to shoot one or all of them. Because the case is here on summary judgment, the question is whether there is a genuine issue of material fact about that; if so, the reasonableness of the use of deadly force must be presented to a jury. There is a genuine issue of material fact. As we have explained, in light of the dash camera video recording, a jury could reasonably find that at the time Woodruff shot Lawrence he did not have control of the taser, that Woodruff and Skipper had control of it, or at least they were preventing Lawrence from exercising control. . . Viewing the video in the light most favorable to Cantu, Lawrence put his hand on the taser, or grabbed at it, as a defensive maneuver in an effort to prevent Woodruff from shocking him more with it. While he and Woodruff were struggling over the taser, Skipper reached in to grab the taser while Woodruff still had her hand on it, and it was then that Woodruff immediately let go of the taser, drew her gun, and shot Lawrence without warning as he was being held by Officer Rhodes. In that way, the officers' account of the facts — that Lawrence took the taser away from Woodruff and was controlling it when she shot him — is inconsistent with the video, or at least with a reasonable interpretation of the video. A jury could also reasonably find that there was no real threat that Lawrence, even if he already had control of the taser or was gaining control of it, could have used the taser to disable an officer and take control of a service pistol and use it to shoot one or more of the three officers. It is undisputed that the taser was not in prong mode, which is the mode designed to incapacitate. It had been converted to drive stun mode, which is designed to inflict pain and generally does not incapacitate. Woodruff knew the taser was in drive stun mode. Knowing that, a reasonable officer in her position would also have known that if Lawrence had gotten control of the taser and used it against Rhodes it was unlikely to incapacitate him. After all, Woodruff had just tased Lawrence at least twice in the abdomen, and that had not incapacitated him. Not only that but three officers were present during the incident. So even if Lawrence had somehow broken loose from Officer Rhodes' hold, had succeeded in pulling the taser away from Woodruff and Skipper, and had set about to tase one of the officers with it, and had somehow disabled that officer, and then had taken the officer's firearm from its holster, there is no reason to believe that Lawrence would not have been shot by an officer before he could do all of that. Both Rhodes and Woodruff were armed. The video shows that it took Woodruff only three seconds to draw her weapon and shoot Lawrence once she let go of the

taser or of his hand or arm that had a partial hold on the taser. There is no reason Woodruff could not have done the same thing and done it as quickly if Lawrence had gotten the taser and set about to get Rhodes' firearm, or why Rhodes could not have shot Lawrence if he had obtained the taser and set about to get Woodruff's firearm. And it is undisputed that Sergeant Woodruff gave Lawrence no warning before she shot him. . . .In excessive force cases, the Supreme Court has cautioned against relying on its Garner and Graham decisions for clearly established law, because 'following the lead of the Fourth Amendment's text, [those decisions] are cast at a high level of generality.'. . That said, with extreme factual circumstances, a pre-existing decision with material similarity is not always necessary to clearly establish the applicable law. . . Even without a close fit, a plaintiff with a Fourth Amendment claim can clear the clearly established law hurdle and defeat a qualified immunity defense by 'showing that the official's conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official.'. . To do that in an excessive force case, 'a plaintiff must show that the official's conduct "was so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that [the official] had to know he was violating the Constitution even without caselaw on point."'. . That means, as the Supreme Court recognized in the Hope decision, that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . The question remains the same: Did the defendant have fair warning when she engaged in the conduct giving rise to the claim that the conduct was unconstitutional?. . . The Supreme Court's Hope decision laid the groundwork for the 'obvious clarity' exception — if 'exception' is the proper word for it. . . . We recognize that the Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized that the clearly established law standard is a demanding one. . . And to keep the standard demanding, the obvious clarity exception must be kept narrow. . . This Court has followed those directions to keep the standard demanding and the exception to it narrow. But the exception does exist and, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff as required at this juncture, the use of lethal force was so obviously excessive that any reasonable officer would have known that it was unconstitutional, even without pre-existing precedent involving materially identical facts. As we have explained earlier in this opinion, Lawrence was not committing a dangerous felony, or even a non-dangerous one. He was just trying to drop off at an animal shelter a stray dog he had found in a parking lot earlier that day. The underlying crime for which he was being arrested was, at worst, driving without a license, the maximum punishment for which is a $100 fine. The only flight he engaged in was running around his car on two occasions when he managed to break loose from the officers who were trying to handcuff him. He did resist being handcuffed and arrested, but not violently. He never punched, hit, or kicked any of the officers or attempted to do so. He never tried to harm any of them in any way. While being held by an officer who outweighed him by 75 pounds, another officer tased him at least twice in the abdomen. When he grabbed at the taser in an attempt to avoid being tased again, he and two of the three officers struggled over it, but Lawrence never gained control of it. At that point the officer who had been tasing him let go of the taser, drew her firearm, and fatally shot him without warning, all in the space of three seconds. She fired her pistol so suddenly that the other two officers initially did not know what had happened and thought that they had been shot. This fatal shooting 'lies so obviously at the

Williams v. Aguirre, 965 F.3d 1147, 1168-70 (11th Cir. 2020) ("Williams contends, and we agree, that under his version of the facts the officers violated his clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment. More than three decades before the officers accused Williams of attempted murder, the Supreme Court held that a search warrant was void when an officer's lie was necessary for the warrant to establish probable cause. . . By the time of Williams's detention, we had concluded that 'the law [is] clearly established ... that the Constitution prohibits a police officer from knowingly making false statements in an arrest affidavit about the probable cause for an arrest in order to detain a citizen ... if such false statements were necessary to the probable cause.'. . This prohibition applies when an arrest affidavit 'is insufficient to establish probable cause' without an officer's false statement, . . . unless the seizure could have been supported as a warrantless arrest[.] . . . And it extends to any officer 'who provided information material to the probable cause determination.'. . To be sure, our precedents on malicious prosecution were unsettled when the officers accused Williams, but those doctrinal tensions concerned only the relationship between Fourth Amendment violations and malicious prosecution, the vehicle that we have held controls liability for these violations. . . We have never wavered about the prohibition of misstatements in warrant applications. . . . Our prohibition of intentional, material misstatements in warrant applications has long been a cornerstone of this Court's jurisprudence on the validity of warrant-based seizures. . . In the light of this uncontroverted and well-established rule, we readily conclude that 'every reasonable official would interpret [our precedents] to establish' that intentional, material misstatements in warrant applications violate the Constitution. . . . A reasonable jury could find that the officers' accusations that Williams pointed a gun at them were intentionally false, and if we delete those false accusations from the warrant applications, no facts remain to support probable cause for attempted murder. So under Williams's version of events, the officers 'knowingly [made] false statements in an arrest affidavit about the probable cause for an arrest in order to detain' Williams, and those 'false statements were necessary' for the affidavit to prove probable cause. . . Because Williams has established a genuine dispute over whether the officers violated his clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the suit. Notwithstanding the ambiguity in our standard of malicious prosecution, Williams had a clearly established right to be free from a seizure based on intentional and material misstatements in a warrant application. And if the jury credits Williams's version of events, the officers' conduct violated that right.")

Hooks v. Brewer, 818 F. App'x 923, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) ("[W]hile it is clearly established that an officer may not recklessly make material misstatements and omissions in a warrant affidavit, . . . we must determine it was clearly established that Brewer's conduct violated these principles[.] . . That typically means that binding precedent controls the case, but such precedent need not be identical—it must only 'squarely govern' our case. . . Plenty of authority does. Misstatements and omissions in affidavits pierce qualified immunity only when the 'new affidavit' lacks even arguable probable cause. . . This not-quite-probable-cause standard turns on whether 'under all of the facts and circumstances, an officer reasonably could—not necessarily would—have believed that probable cause was present.'. . But it also requires us to consider whether an officer 'in the same circumstances and possessing the same knowledge' as Brewer could have thought there was a significant chance that Hooks had methamphetamine in his home. . . If factual questions remain about the information Brewer 'possessed or could have possessed' we cannot conclude arguable probable cause existed because we cannot say that an officer with the same information as Brewer could think probable cause existed. . . And those are things we do not know. . . . In short, we accept plaintiff's story and answer the pure legal question of whether that version amounts to a violation of clearly established law. . . In this context, a defendant does not violate clearly established law if he has arguable probable cause. But that turns on circumstances the defendant faced and knowledge the defendant had. And because those things are not clear, we cannot grant summary judgment to Brewer.")

King v. Pridmore, 961 F.3d 1135, 1143-47 (11th Cir. 2020) ("King contends that the officers forced him to 'work' for them under threat of false criminal charges and physical violence. For our analysis, we will assume, arguendo, that it would indeed violate the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments if the officers had made such threats. But that begs the question: is there evidence they actually did that? . . . .In short, based on the facts as taken from King's own deposition testimony, the officers didn't violate the Thirteenth or Fourteenth Amendment. Nevertheless, as will be seen next, we don't have to (so we don't) hang our hat solely on that peg of the analysis. . . . King agrees that there is no materially similar case on point, so the first method is out. Consequently, the question is whether this case falls under the second or third methods to establish that the law at issue was clearly established. The second and third methods are known as 'obvious clarity' cases. . . 'They exist where the words of the federal statute or constitutional provision at issue are so clear and the conduct so bad that case law is not needed to establish that the conduct cannot be lawful, or where the case law that does exist is so clear and broad (and not tied to particularized facts) that every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the official's conduct did violate federal law when the official acted.'. . In Dukes v. Deaton, 852 F.3d 1035 (11th Cir. 2017), we conflated the two methods and referred to them together as a 'narrow exception.'. . Cases that fall under this narrow exception are rare and don't arise often. . . In light of the rarity of obvious clarity cases, if a plaintiff cannot show that the law at issue was clearly established under the first (materially similar case on point) method, that usually means qualified immunity is appropriate. . . . We have no difficulty concluding that this is not the sort of case that would justify applying the rare and narrow exception to requiring a plaintiff to identify a materially similar case on point. Again, sandwiched in between telling King that they were going to 'throw some charges' on him if he didn't help with the ruse, and that they were going to tow his girlfriend's car and they didn't know when or how he would be able to get it back, the officers told him '[if] you gonna start fking us over, we'll fk over you.' It cannot be maintained that all objectively reasonable officers in their position would have known—with obvious clarity—that what they said, in context, would necessarily be understood as a threat of false criminal charges and physical violence in violation of the Constitution. While King may have subjectively interpreted the officers' words to that effect, that is categorically not the standard that we must apply. . . In summary, even if the officers violated the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments (and, as discussed earlier, we do not believe they did), those rights were not so clearly established that all objectively reasonable officers in their position would have known that what they said to King violated the Constitution's prohibition against involuntary servitude or its 'nebulous' doctrine of substantive due process.")

Anderson on behalf of MA v. Vazquez, 813 F. App'x 358, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) ("By the time of this incident in 2014, this Court had some precedent about the constitutionality of using a K-9 to apprehend a suspect. In Preister v. City of Riviera Beach, we concluded (without similar precedent) that an officer was unentitled to qualified immunity from a claim for excessive force when the officer had ordered his dog to attack a burglary suspect -- and allowed the dog to bite repeatedly the suspect for at least two minutes -- after the suspect had submitted immediately to the officers and complied with the officers' orders to get on the ground. . . In Crenshaw v. Lister, we concluded that an officer acted objectively reasonably when he used a K-9 to apprehend an armed robbery suspect who had fled violently from police, crashing his car into a marked police car and then ran into dense woods at night. . . Then, in Edwards v. Stanley, we determined that the initial use of a K-9 to track and to subdue a fleeing suspect who had committed 'a non-serious traffic offense' was constitutionally reasonable, but that permitting the K-9 to then attack the suspect for five to seven minutes constituted excessive force. . .While these cases provide some guidance about the unlawful use of K-9 force, the circumstances presented in this appeal are far different from the circumstances involved in Priester, Crenshaw, and in Edwards. Most important -- unlike the circumstances in Priester and in Edwards that led to the conclusion that the officer's use of force was unconstitutionally excessive, nothing in this record evidences that Officer Vasquez permitted Ares to attack M.A. for an unduly prolonged period. To the contrary, the entire incident here lasted only thirty to forty seconds; and Officer Vasquez immediately issued the command for Ares to let go as soon as Officer Vasquez saw that M.A. had been caught. Plaintiff correctly concedes that no binding precedent existed in 2014 that involved circumstances factually similar to the pertinent circumstances presented in this case. Plaintiff contends, instead, that Officer Vasquez's conduct -- given the state of the law generally -- constituted an 'obvious' Fourth Amendment violation. We reject this argument. The Supreme Court has stressed repeatedly that the 'clearly established' standard requires a 'high degree of specificity.'. . Specificity is particularly important in Fourth Amendment cases, where -- given the many variables confronting an officer on the scene that must be considered -- it is often difficult for officers to predict on the spot how the pertinent legal doctrine (here, excessive force) will apply in the precise factual situation arising before them. . . We have recognized a rare 'narrow exception' to the general rule requiring particularized case law to establish clearly the law: the obvious violation. Still, facts and context dictate case outcomes: not general legal propositions. This 'narrow exception' applies in circumstances where an 'official's conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of caselaw.'. . For an official to lose protection under qualified immunity, in some way the 'pre-existing law must dictate, that is, truly compel (not just suggest or allow or raise a question about), the conclusion for every like-situated, reasonable government agent that what defendant is doing violates federal law in the circumstances....'. . . The law beforehand must give genuine notice. Nothing about the pre-existing law tied to the Fourth Amendment's prohibitions, especially with the use of K-9s to apprehend suspects, came close to compelling the definite conclusion for every reasonable police officer that Officer Vasquez's use of force was constitutionally unreasonable under the circumstances presented to him in this case.")

Vielma v. Gruler, 808 F. App'x 872, __ (11th Cir. 2020) ("Here, Plaintiffs claim that the injured and murdered victims' Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights were violated when, upon hearing the gunshots, Officer Gruler failed to immediately reenter the club to attempt to disarm or shoot Mateen. . . . As the district court correctly observed, Plaintiff's entire claim against Officer Gruler boils down to an argument that the Due Process Clause imposes an affirmative duty on police officers to protect individuals from private acts of violence. But that is precisely the argument that the Supreme Court rejected in DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services, which held that, outside the custodial context, . . . 'a State's failure to protect an individual against private violence simply does not constitute a violation of the Due Process Clause.'. . . Even were we today to announce, as a new principle, a rule holding that a police officer on a security detail outside a private establishment has a constitutional duty to forego other potential responses and that he must instead immediately enter the establishment in an effort to neutralize a shooter, Plaintiffs would still be unable to defeat Officer Gruler's qualified immunity defense. This is so because a police officer, like all individual state actors, enjoys this immunity absent the existence of legal precedent that clearly alerts the officer to the constitutional requirement that the officer act in the way that the plaintiff alleges he should have behaved. A constitutional right is not clearly established unless existing precedent places the 'constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The most common way for a plaintiff to show that a right is clearly established is to 'point to a case with "materially similar" facts decided by the Supreme Court, the Court of Appeals, or the highest court of the relevant state.'. . Absent such a case, a plaintiff can rely on 'general statements of the law' only in an 'obvious case' where those general rules would have given officers 'fair and clear warning' of their constitutional duties in the specific situation at issue. . . Plaintiffs have failed to cite any case addressing materially similar facts that clearly establishes the existence of the duty that Plaintiffs assign to Officer Gruler. This is not surprising, given the holding by the Supreme Court in DeShaney that contradicts Plaintiffs' contention. Plaintiffs allege that Officer Gruler violated the victims' substantive due process rights by failing 'to enter the club immediately after the shooting began to neutralize [the] Shooter,' when he knew that the victims faced a serious risk of harm and 'were not lawfully permitted to be armed.' Yet, Plaintiffs have not identified any caselaw addressing active-shooter threats. Instead, they rely on two district court cases that they admit 'involved deliberate indifference to medical needs' rather than deliberate indifference to harm inflicted by a third party. Setting aside the fact that these district court cases are inapposite, . . . they are necessarily insufficient for Plaintiffs' purposes because only 'the binding precedent set forth in the decisions of the Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the highest court of the state' can demonstrate a clearly established right. . . Because Plaintiffs failed to identify a clearly established constitutional right that would have required Officer Gruler to immediately reenter the nightclub to attempt to neutralize the shooter, the district court did not err in granting the officer qualified immunity and dismissing the claim against him.")

Alston v. Swarbrick, 954 F.3d 1312, 1319-21 (11th Cir. 2020) ("According to Alston, Swarbrick arrested him based merely on him refusing to answer questions and spouting obscenities while walking away. But by 2011, it was clearly established that words alone cannot support probable cause for disorderly conduct—including profanity regarding police officers. . . Under those facts, no reasonable officer in Swarbrick's position could have believed there was probable cause to arrest Alston under the Florida disorderly conduct statute. Therefore, the district court improperly concluded that Swarbrick was entitled to qualified immunity on that basis. . . .We conclude that, under Alston's version of the facts, Swarbrick did not possess arguable probable cause for arresting Alston under the resisting without violence statute. At the time of the arrest it was clearly established that, as with the disorderly conduct statute, 'mere words' would not suffice to provide probable cause for resisting without violence. . . And under Alston's version of the facts, he did not physically obstruct Swarbrick's path or otherwise prevent him from conducting his investigation as to Q.D.B. . . . Alston merely declined to cooperate or provide useful information. His failure to answer Officer Swarbrick's questions—and even his profanity-laced response—were not even arguably sufficient to support probable cause under § 843.02. . . Because Officer Swarbrick lacked arguable probable cause to arrest Alston under this (or any other) statute, Alston's false arrest claim must proceed. . . . Alston alleges a three-to-five minute period during which Officer Swarbrick continuously used pepper spray on his face while he lay on the ground helplessly. Under this Circuit's caselaw, such a prolonged use of pepper spray on a non-resisting and handcuffed detainee would violate the detainee's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . Of course, the finder of fact may ultimately disbelieve Alston's testimony and conclude that the alleged period of prolonged pepper spraying did not occur. Nonetheless, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Alston, he has at least presented a genuine dispute of material fact regarding Swarbrick's use of force as to that period of pepper spraying, and thus, granting summary judgment in favor of Swarbrick was improper.")

Quinette v. Reed, 805 F. App'x 696, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) ("In this Circuit, '[t]he precise point at which a seizure ends (for purposes of the Fourth Amendment coverage) and at which pretrial detention begins (governed until conviction by the Fourteenth Amendment) is not settled.' Hicks v. Moore, 422 F.3d 1246, 1253 n.7 (11th Cir. 2005). We need not delineate that point now, because even though the district court concluded that the Fourteenth Amendment applied, Quinette has pled facts that support a violation of either the Fourth or the Fourteenth Amendment. In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, the Supreme Court clarified that to prove an excessive force claim in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, a 'pretrial detainee must show only that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . This objective reasonableness standard mirrors the standard an arrestee must meet to plead a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . So we turn to the question of whether Reed's force was objectively reasonable. . . .Reed's application of a two-handed shove to a non-resistant detainee, with sufficient force to knock that detainee to the ground and to break his hip, constituted unreasonable force in violation of Quinette's constitutional right under the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment. . . .We have said that law is clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity where '"Y Conduct" is unconstitutional in "Z Circumstances."'. . Hadley established that a single blow—'Y Conduct' — is unconstitutional where a detainee is non-resistant— 'Z Circumstances.' Here, too, there was a single blow to a non-resistant detainee. Given this clearly established law, no objectively reasonable officer in Reed's position would think it lawful to shove a non-resisting detainee to the ground. Because we conclude that Hadley and Danley put Reed on notice that his conduct violated Quinette's constitutional right, it is unnecessary for us to explore whether the conduct was egregious enough to fall within the parameters of the 'obvious clarity rule.'")

Toole v. City of Atlanta, 798 F. App'x 381, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("'[W]hen an officer has arguable probable cause to arrest, he is entitled to qualified immunity both from Fourth Amendment claims for false arrest and from First Amendment claims stemming from the arrest.'. . But as we have already explained, here Zorn did not have arguable probable cause to arrest Toole, so he isn't automatically entitled to qualified immunity on Toole's First Amendment claim. Eleventh Circuit precedent holds that individuals have 'a First Amendment right, subject to reasonable time, manner and place restrictions, to photograph or videotape police conduct,'. . . as well as to engage in lawful protests[.] . . Additionally, we've established that law enforcement officers may not arrest an individual as a way 'to thwart or intrude upon First Amendment rights otherwise being validly asserted.'. .Toole was engaging in constitutionally protected activities—namely, protesting and filming police conduct—at the time of his unlawful arrest. . .Toole alleges that Zorn's actions were aimed at preventing him from continuing to film police activity. . . . So, reading the facts in Toole's favor, he was engaging in protected First Amendment activities when Zorn unlawfully arrested him to stop him from filming police activities. Thus, Zorn violated Toole's First Amendment rights. . . .Reading the facts in Toole's favor, he was unlawfully arrested without arguable probable cause while engaging in protected First Amendment conduct—protesting and filming police activities—specifically to stop him from doing so. Zorn, therefore, violated Toole's clearly established First Amendment rights and isn't entitled to qualified immunity.")

Young v. Brady, 793 F. App'x 905, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("After a careful review of the facts—and after construing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff—we affirm the district court's decision. While arguable reasonable suspicion sets a low bar, we cannot say that Brady's actions here cleared it. . . . [W]e conclude that Brady violated Young's constitutional rights—specifically, Young's rights under the Fourth Amendment—when he seized him. . . . Based on the totality of the circumstances, we conclude that Officer Brady did not have arguable reasonable suspicion that Young was engaged in illegal palmetto berry harvesting. Young's location in a general region of the state during the quarter of the year in which certain illegal activity takes place, coupled with an unfurled sleeping bag in the back of his truck, did not provide Brady with specific and articulable facts that supported his suspicion. . . . Refusal to answer an officer's questions does not, without more, establish reasonable suspicion. . . .Here, based on the totality of the circumstances, we cannot say that Young's short travel from the parking lot under the bridge in Sidney Lanier Park to a nearby parking lot created arguable reasonable suspicion. . . . After concluding that Brady violated Young's constitutional rights, we reach the second step of our qualified immunity analysis, where we question whether these rights were clearly established at the time of the violation. . . .Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Young, Brady did not have arguable reasonable suspicion to conduct a Terry stop. A reasonable official at the scene would not have believed that illegal palmetto berry harvesting, or any other crime, was occurring based on Young sitting in his parked car in a public park with a sleeping bag on his truck bed and then, after waving away the approaching officer, driving away, slowly, to another parking lot not more than several hundred feet away in the same park. Therefore, Brady violated Young's Fourth Amendment right to leave a police encounter and not be stopped without reasonable suspicion. Furthermore, such a right was clearly established at the time because, even though there is no caselaw directly on point with the facts of this case, the general principle that a person can walk away from a mere police encounter is established by the caselaw, clearly applies here, and would give fair notice to Brady that Young waving him away and driving off was not enough to establish reasonable suspicion.")

Carruth v. Bentley, 942 F.3d 1047, 1059 (11th Cir. 2019) ("If the question is one of first impression, the defendants are almost certainly entitled to qualified immunity, since there is rarely a clearly established violation of law in the absence of supporting case law. Carruth cites to no case, and we can find none, in which this Court or the Supreme Court has approved a class of one equal protection theory that involved regulatory decisions remotely similar to those made by the Alabama Credit Union Administration in this case. Nor has he cited to any case indicating that a plaintiff may use an earlier version of himself as a comparator to prove a class of one claim. Since there is no clearly established law establishing that Carruth's alleged differential treatment violated the Equal Protection Clause, Bentley and Byrne are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Minnifield v. City of Birmingham Dep't of Police, 791 F. App'x 86, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("The district court assumed that Officer Minnifield asserted the right to be free from racial discrimination and retaliation in the workplace. However, this formulation was too broad. Defining the law at this 'high level of generality' for qualified immunity purposes is discouraged by the Supreme Court. . . The proper inquiry is whether it was clearly established law that failing to recommend an employee for a lateral transfer to a position (offering the same pay but more prestige) is an adverse employment action for purposes of disparate treatment and retaliation claims. This formulation 'particularizes' the question to the circumstances and answers whether then-existing law put Sergeant Boackle on 'fair notice' that his actions violated Officer Minnifield's rights. . . The law did not clearly establish that Sergeant Boackle's conduct constituted an adverse employment action, under either the disparate treatment or retaliation standard. Existing law does not place the question of whether a supervisor's refusal to recommend someone for a lateral transfer, like the one at issue here, is an adverse employment action 'beyond debate.'. . Nor did the law 'truly compel' the conclusion that it is. . . Officer Minnifield clearly wanted a K-9 position, pursued one tenaciously, and was unhappy that he was not successful. However, even after assuming disputed facts in his favor, we are left with only prestige as a material difference between the position he had and the position he sought. . . Officer Minnifield has pointed us to no authority that clearly establishes that denial of a transfer to a job that is materially similar in all respects but prestige is an adverse employment action.")

Bailey v. Swindell, 940 F.3d 1295, 1298, 1302-03 (11th Cir. 2019) ("Even assuming that Swindell had probable cause, he crossed what has been called a 'firm' and 'bright' constitutional line, and thereby violated the Fourth Amendment, when he stepped over the doorstep of Bailey's parents' home to make a warrantless arrest. . . . The bottom line, post-Payton: Unless a warrant is obtained or an exigency exists, 'any physical invasion of the structure of the home, by even a fraction of an inch, [is] too much.'. . .Because Swindell can point to no exigency, he violated the Fourth Amendment when he crossed the threshold to effectuate a warrantless, in-home arrest. . . .Here, though, Swindell crossed a constitutional line that—far from being hazy—was 'not only firm but also bright.'. . That line—no warrantless in-home arrests absent exigent circumstances—was drawn unambiguously in Payton, traces its roots in more ancient sources, and has been reaffirmed repeatedly since. . . And to be clear, Swindell can't point to Santana as a source of uncertainty in the law. The defendant in McClish ruined that chance; he made the same 'What about Santana?' argument, and we indulged it there, 483 F.3d at 1243, but in so doing we expressly rejected it on a going-forward basis[.] . . . Finally, to the extent that any ambiguity remained, we expressly reiterated McClish's holding in Moore, explaining—in terms that apply here precisely—that a warrant (or exception) is always required for a home arrest 'even if the arrestee is standing in the doorway of his home when the officers conduct the arrest.'. . Because Swindell violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law, he is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Coffman v. Battle, 786 F. App'x 926, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("The law of this Circuit gave Battle fair warning that his conduct was unconstitutional. As a panel of this Court observed in May 2019, '[i]t was more than ten years ago now that this Court held, in no uncertain terms, that "[w]hen jailers continue to use substantial force against a prisoner who has clearly stopped resisting—whether because he has decided to become compliant, he has been subdued, or he is otherwise incapacitated—that use of force is excessive."'. . Given the vintage of this settled legal principle, which dates to well before July 2016 when the events at issue in this case occurred, we easily conclude that Battle violated clearly established law by tightening Coffman's left wrist restraint and then tasing Coffman twice in quick succession while he was secured to a restraint chair in a suicide cell. Because every reasonable official would know that the use of such substantial force on a restrained detainee violated the Fourteenth Amendment, we hold that the district court did not err in rejecting Battle's qualified immunity defense.")

Ellison v. Hobbs, 786 F. App'x 861, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("Ultimately, we need not resolve the probable cause issue because, in any event, Ellison has not identified any prior case, and we have found none, that provided fair warning to the defendants that, under the particularized facts they faced, their conduct violated Ellison's Fourth Amendment rights. Ellison cites no case where a court concluded that emergency medical personnel responding to a 911 emergency call for medical assistance violated the rights of a patient, who was incapable of making an informed decision about her health, by restraining that patient and transporting her to a general hospital for evaluation by a physician. . . Therefore, there is no clearly established law that would have put a reasonable officer, paramedic, or EMT on notice that the actions the defendants took to restrain and transport Ellison to the hospital violated Ellison's Fourth Amendment rights.")

Croland v. City of Atlanta, 782 F. App'x 753, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("At the time of Plaintiff's arrest in 2014, the law was clear that yelling about police harassment in front of a crowd -- by itself -- was not enough to give rise to probable or arguable probable cause to arrest. The Supreme Court made clear that a person may not be charged with a criminal offense for the use of spoken words alone, unless those words rise to the level of 'fighting words: words 'which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace.'. . .Given the assumed facts, we accept that summary judgment based on qualified immunity is not demanded at this stage in the proceedings.")

O'Kelley v. Craig, 781 F. App'x 888, ___ (11th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2641 (2020) ("[A]s to the initial shooting by Deputy Curran, the allegations in the complaint indicate that Harley approached the fence as part of a ruse engineered by Curran—for the purpose of drawing Harley closer to a spot where Curran could get a good shot—so the deputy's decision to fire upon Harley with beanbag rounds cannot be justified as a split-second response to a perceived threat. Considering the totality of the circumstances, it was not reasonable for the Deputies to believe that they 'faced an emergency that justified acting without a warrant.'. . We therefore conclude Plaintiffs plausibly established that the Deputies violated Harley's constitutional rights when, in the absence of a warrant or exigent circumstances, they seized him within the curtilage of his home and entered the curtilage for the apparent purpose of conducting an arrest. Because this conduct was unlawful, 'there [wa]s no basis for any threat or any use of force.'. . So we vacate the dismissal of Plaintiffs' § 1983 unlawful-seizure claim against the Deputies and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. . . We also conclude that clearly established law as of October 24, 2015, put the Deputies on notice that their conduct was unlawful. 'The touchstone of qualified immunity is notice.'. . .In Moore, decided on October 15, 2015, we held that 'an officer may not conduct a Terry-like stop in the home in the absence of exigent circumstances,' consent, or a warrant. . . Thus, binding precedent clearly established, at the time of the encounter on October 24, 2015, that a seizure or entry within the home without a warrant or exigent circumstances violates the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures. And the parameters of the exigent-circumstances doctrine were well-established before then, including, as relevant here, that circumstances do not qualify as exigent unless 'the police reasonably believe an emergency exists which calls for an immediate response to protect citizens from imminent danger.'. .Here, no reasonable officer could believe that he or she 'faced an emergency that justified acting without a warrant.'. . Based on the factual allegations in the complaint, which we must accept as true, this was not a situation where it would be 'difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine'—here exigent circumstances—would apply. . . There are no facts alleged in the complaint indicating that, notwithstanding Harley's possession of a firearm, this was an 'emergency situation[ ] involving endangerment to life.'. .

Accordingly, qualified immunity is not appropriate at this stage, though the Deputies are free to raise the defense again in a motion for summary judgment.") Piazza v. Jefferson Cty., Alabama, 923 F.3d 947, 950, 955-57 (11th Cir. 2019) ("After the officers attempted three times to pull Hinkle into his new cell, Dukuzumuremyi fired his taser, hitting Hinkle on the left side of his chest just above his heart. As a result of that taser shock—which lasted 5 seconds—Hinkle fell to the floor on his right side and urinated on himself. Dukuzumuremyi then ordered Hinkle to roll over to be handcuffed, but Hinkle remained unresponsive. Eight seconds after the end of the first shock, and while Hinkle still lay motionless (and wet) on the ground, Dukuzumuremyi tased him again, this time on the front left side of his neck. Shortly after the second shock, Hinkle went into cardiac arrest. He was taken to the emergency room, where he was pronounced dead. . . . At the end of the day the question before us is this: Is it excessive to tase for a second time a man who, as a result of an initial shock, is lying motionless on the floor and has wet himself, and who presented only a minimal threat to begin with? Undoubtedly, yes. We hold that, based on the allegations in Hunter's complaint, the force used against Hinkle was excessive, and thus unconstitutional. . . . The critical question is whether the law gave the officer 'fair warning' that his conduct was unconstitutional. . . . Here, it certainly did. It was more than ten years ago now that this Court held, in no uncertain terms, that '[w]hen jailers continue to use substantial force against a prisoner who has clearly stopped resisting—whether because he has decided to become compliant, he has been subdued, or he is otherwise incapacitated—that use of force is excessive.'. . And Danley was no innovation; for decades our decisions have embraced and reiterated the principle that an officer may not continue to use force after a detainee has clearly stopped resisting. . . . Again, although Kingsley changed the nature of the inquiry—by dropping the requirement that a plaintiff prove the officers' subjective malicious intent—it did not change the law with respect to the objective reasonableness of using force against unresisting subjects. . . . To be clear, it is no answer to say that Danley involved pepper spray, Skrtich kicks and punches, Williams four-point restraints, etc.—and that none of those cases concerned the use of a taser specifically. It's true, of course, that to defeat qualified immunity a rule must be specific enough that an act's unlawfulness 'follow[s] immediately from the conclusion that the rule was firmly established[.]'. . But we have never suggested that the longstanding prohibition on a jail officer's use of force on an incapacitated detainee turns on as fine a point as the particular weapon deployed. And indeed, in the analogous Fourth Amendment context, we have flatly rejected that very distinction—in a case involving a taser, no less. In Fils v. City of Aventura, we considered allegations that police officers had impermissibly tased a non-violent, unresisting suspect. . . In finding the law prohibiting the tasing clearly established, we relied on one case holding that an officer had used excessive force when he pepper-sprayed a secured suspect in the face as she sat shackled in the backseat of his cruiser, . . . another holding that an officer had used excessive force when he punched a handcuffed and unresisting plaintiff in the stomach, . . . and yet another holding that an officer had used excessive force when he sicced his police dog on a suspect who was lying still on the ground[.] . . . We emphasized that '[a]lthough none of these cases involved tasers,' there was 'no meaningful distinction under these circumstances' between the use of a taser on an unresisting suspect and the use of pepper spray, fists, or police dogs. . . So too here. There is 'no meaningful distinction' between pepper spray to an unresisting detainee's face, a kick to his gut, or a taser to his chest and neck. The crucial question is whether the law gave Dukuzumuremyi 'fair warning' that his conduct—tasing an already-tased, incapacitated, incontinent, and unresisting detainee—violated the Fourteenth Amendment. In the light of our use-of-force precedent, we have no trouble concluding that it did. . .Accordingly, we hold that Deputy Dukuzumuremyi's second taser shock violated Hunter's clearly established Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force and that the district court therefore correctly rejected Dukuzumuremyi's qualified-immunity defense.")

Q.F. v. Daniel, 768 F. App'x 935, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("The defendants argue that the district court erred in concluding that the complaint plausibly alleged that the defendants knew the risk that a high inmate-to-guard ratio and inadequate classification or segregation posed to inmates like Q.F. Initially, the defendants assert that the complaint does not allege that any of the defendants participated in, encouraged, witnessed, were present during, or were informed of the assaults on Q.F. Moreover, the defendants argue that prior assaults and unrest at Eastman were not sufficiently connected to Reginald Patton and his gang to establish that they understood the risk those specific individuals posed to Q.F. As at Eastman, the defendants' interpretation of their obligations under the Eighth Amendment falls short. We do not require a plaintiff to allege that prison officials knew of, participated in, encouraged, or witnessed a particular assault to defeat qualified immunity. . . Likewise, 'prison official[s] [cannot] escape liability for deliberate indifference by showing that ... [they] did not know the complainant was especially likely to be assaulted by the specific prisoner who eventually committed the assault.'. . Here, Q.F. alleges that the conditions at Eastman—namely insufficient staffing, classifying, and segregating—created a known risk of inmate-on-inmate violence for all inmates, that the risk was realized by way of assaults and riots, and that Q.F. fell victim to such violence due to the defendants' failure to reasonably respond. The defendants also argue that the complaint does not allege that the defendants understood the general risk that inmate-on-inmate violence posed to the inmates at Eastman. The district court noted that the MOU, although not in force at the time of the alleged constitutional violations, informed the defendants that Eastman was understaffed and that high inmate-to-guard ratios increase the risk of inmate-on-inmate violence. The district court also pointed to multiple audits of Eastman—performed in 2010 and 2011—to show that the defendants knew Eastman was not properly classifying and segregating inmates and that improper classification or segregation increases the risk of inmate-on-inmate violence. We agree with the district court. The complaint contains sufficient facts, if proven, to show that the defendants knew that the conditions at Eastman posed a serious risk of inmate-on-inmate violence to Q.F. In addition to the MOU and two audits cited by the district court, the defendants' supervisory positions suggest, at least by inference, that the defendants were aware of the staffing, classification, and segregation issues at Eastman. . . In our view, the complaint also alleges sufficient facts to show that the risk of inmate-on-inmate violence at Eastman was 'obvious.'. . In short, it alleges almost-daily assaults, specific instances of violence, and at least six riots occurring at Eastman between May of 2010 and July of 2011. . . . Q.F.'s allegations span three hundred and ninety four paragraphs, painting the picture of an entirely out-of-control juvenile detention facility. The allegations include physical assaults, sexual abuse, and riots so unrestrained that the DJJ had to call in outside law enforcement to regain authority. . . In short, the DJJ and the defendants 'stripped [inmates like Q.F.] of virtually every means of self-protection and ... let the state of nature take its course.'. . The defendants' failure was not unknowing, and it was not reasonable. We hold that the complaint plausibly alleges that the defendants subjectively knew that Q.F. faced a substantial risk of assault by another inmate and unreasonably disregarded that known risk. At the Rule 12(b)(6) stage, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Although the complaint made the required showing that the defendants violated Q.F.'s Eighth Amendment rights, 'qualified immunity will still attach unless that right was clearly established at the time.'. . .The constitutional violations alleged in this case occurred while Q.F. was incarcerated at Eastman between May of 2010 and June of 2011. More than 15 years earlier, the Supreme Court held that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment by ignoring a known risk that an inmate would be assaulted by other inmates. . . In another case, we held that, in 2010, it was clearly established that the Eighth Amendment protected inmates from prison officials' indifference to a known risk of inmate-on-inmate violence. . . Based on these cases, the constitutional right that the defendants allegedly violated was clearly established when Q.F. was confined at Eastman.")

Sebastian v. Ortiz, 918 F.3d 1301, 1311-12 (11th Cir. 2019) ("[O]ur case law is clear that serious and substantial injuries caused during a suspect's arrest when a suspect is neither resisting an officer's commands nor posing a risk of flight may substantiate an excessive force claim. Although we have never addressed a claim factually identical to Sebastian's, Smith established that if an arrestee demonstrates compliance, but the officer nonetheless inflicts gratuitous and substantial injury using ordinary arrest tactics, then the officer may have used excessive force. . . .Even though this Court has not addressed a similar fact pattern where substantial injuries were inflicted on an individual with no preexisting sensitivity by handcuffing alone, our case law bars Lieutenant Ortiz's alleged actions with sufficient clarity to put any reasonable officer on notice that this conduct constituted excessive force. 'Graham dictates unambiguously that the force used by a police officer in carrying out an arrest must be reasonably proportionate to the need for that force,'. . . and under the unusual facts alleged by Sebastian we have no doubt that the force was objectively disproportionate and altogether gratuitous. We do not mean to give law enforcement officers pause each time they employ handcuffs in the heat of an arrest, and only the most exceptional circumstances will permit an excessive force claim on the basis of handcuffing alone. The peculiar facts of this case, not least the reapplication of excessively tightened cuffs after Sebastian first complained and the five-hour period Sebastian spent restrained in the cuffs at the station after his arrest, cross over 'the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force' such that any reasonable officer would know he had violated the Constitution. . . Taking the allegations in the complaint as true, the district court did not err by refusing to dismiss the complaint and in holding that Lieutenant Ortiz was not entitled to qualified immunity[.]")

Hall v. McGhee, 762 F. App'x 837, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("We have routinely held that the application of gratuitous force against a suspect who is compliant and already handcuffed is excessive, even if there is no visible or compensable injury. . . However, the application of de minimis force, without more, will not support a claim for excessive force. . . We have found force not to be de minimis where a handcuffed plaintiff's head was slammed against the trunk after she had been secured, the plaintiff was punched in the stomach while handcuffed and not resisting, and the plaintiff, while handcuffed, was kicked and beat until unconscious. . . In these cases, the force used and the injury inflicted were severe. In contrast, here the only claim is that Deputy Sheriff Jackson pressed a taser against Mr. Hall's and Mr. Reuben's temples. There is no allegation that Deputy Sheriff Jackson activated the taser or used the taser to cause any injury to Mr. Hall or Mr. Reuben. Thus, as our decisions in Hadley . . . and Slicker . . . and Lee . . . involved the actual use of force, we cannot find that these cases would place Deputy Sheriff Jackson on notice that merely threatening to use force, without effectuating it, was clearly unlawful. The use of force by Deputy Sheriff Jackson was, at the most, de minimis. The district court did not err in granting summary judgment to Deputy Sheriff Jackson on these claims.")

Echols v. Lawton, 913 F.3d 1313, 1324-25 (11th Cir. 2019) ("[A] clearly established violation of state law cannot put an official on notice that his conduct would also violate the Constitution because 'section 1983 protects only against violations of federally protected rights.'. . . Although Lawton clearly would have had fair notice that his alleged writing constituted libel per se under state tort law, he would not have understood that his alleged libel would have violated the First Amendment. No controlling precedent put Lawton's alleged violation beyond debate. . . . Echols also relies on the broader principle 'that the act of retaliation for the exercise of constitutional rights is clearly established as a violation,' but this general principle is too broadly stated to control our inquiry. . . . True, 'it is "settled law" that the government may not retaliate against citizens for the exercise of First Amendment rights.'. . But that general principle does not resolve with 'obvious clarity' that defamation may constitute retaliation in violation of the First Amendment. . . Echols also fails to persuade us that Lawton's conduct 'so obviously violate[d] the [C]onstitution that prior case law is unnecessary.' . . . Lawton's conduct does not fall within this 'narrow category.' As we have explained, our sister circuits are divided over whether an official's defamatory speech is actionable as retaliation under the First Amendment. It has certainly not been obvious to the federal courts that an official's defamatory speech lies at the core of what the First Amendment prohibits. . . So we cannot say that it would have been 'readily apparent' to every reasonable official that Lawton's alleged defamation violated the First Amendment. . . Critics of the doctrine of qualified immunity condemn 'letting [an] official duck consequences for bad behavior.' Zadeh v. Robinson, 902 F.3d 483, 498 (Willett, J., concurring dubitante) (5th Cir. 2018); William Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 Calif. L. Rev. 45 (2018). And we too condemn Lawton's alleged conduct. But the Supreme Court has long ruled that qualified immunity protects a badly behaving official unless he had fair notice that his conduct would violate the Constitution, District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 589–91 (2018); Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1152 (2018), though at least one justice may harbor doubts, see Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1872 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and in the judgment) ("In an appropriate case, we should reconsider our qualified immunity jurisprudence."). 'Because the Constitution's general provisions can be abstract,' fair notice protects an official from 'liab[ility] for conduct that [he could] reasonably believe[ ] was lawful.' Aaron L. Nielson & Christopher J.

Walker, A Qualified Defense of Qualified Immunity, 93 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1853, 1873 (2018). So even when an official behaves badly, 'qualified immunity gives government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments about open legal questions.'")

Johnson v. Houston County, Georgia, 758 F. App'x 911, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) (not reported) ("In evaluating the constitutionality of conditions of pretrial detention, we 'must decide whether the disability is imposed for the purpose of punishment or whether it is but an incident of some other legitimate governmental purpose.'. . . [I]t was clearly established that subjecting a pretrial detainee to more restrictive conditions of confinement solely for the purpose of punishment violated clearly established law. . . . For the reasons explained earlier—namely, that Hays forfeited this issue on appeal—we do not revisit the district court's determination that a reasonable jury could infer that Hays intended to punish Johnson by keeping him in the more restrictive conditions of administrative segregation. And we conclude that if a jury found such an intent to punish, there is likewise 'no question' that Hays violated clearly established law.")

Robinson v. Lambert, 753 F. App'x 777, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("At the time of the alleged conduct, the standard for excessive force was 'whether that force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline or maliciously or sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.'. . But the factors used to assess whether force was excessive were the same. . . It is well established in our case law that an officer cannot continue to use force after there is no longer a need for it. . . .And we have made clear that if a detainee stops resisting, the use of force is no longer justified. . . . We find that this well-established principle applies to this case with obvious clarity. Based on Robinson's version of the facts, he was pinned against the wall with his arms behind his back while Officers Lambert and Peterkin pushed him back and forth for approximately 30 to 45 seconds. At no point during this interaction did he resist. After Robinson had been pinned against the wall for at least 30 seconds without resisting, any objectively reasonable officer would know that Robinson had been subdued. The continued use of force became unnecessary and unjustified. But Lambert proceeded to push Robinson face-down on the desk, and then shove him with enough force to break his arm. Based on then current law, this gratuitous display of force allows us to 'draw a reasonable inference' that Lambert acted with 'the very purpose of causing harm' and was consequently excessive. . . . We conclude that Lambert's use of force was a clearly established violation of Robinson's constitutional right. The law provided that the continued use of force after there is no longer a need for it is excessive. And the law provided that threatening to cause further injury indicates sadistic intent. Coupling Lambert's continued use of force after Robinson was subdued with his threat to inflict further injury, it is plain as a matter of obvious clarity that Lambert used force 'maliciously and sadistically with the very purpose of causing harm.'. .Thus, he is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

J W by & through Tammy Williams v. Birmingham Bd. of Educ., 904 F.3d 1248, 1259-63 (11th Cir. 2018) (per curiam) ("We need not decide whether the Fourth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment governs the students' decontamination claims to resolve the SROs' qualified immunity arguments. Assuming that those claims are properly brought under the Fourth Amendment, and that the SROs violated the Fourth Amendment by not adequately decontaminating the students, the relevant law was not clearly established at the time of the SROs' conduct. . . .The question for us, therefore, is whether the 'state of the law' in 2009, 2010, and 2011 'gave the [SROs] fair warning that their ... treatment of [the students]' as to decontamination 'was unconstitutional.'. . The students rely on our 2008 decision in Danley to argue that their right to adequate decontamination was clearly established. . . . Danley certainly holds that, under certain circumstances in a prison setting, an officer violates the Fourteenth Amendment if he does not timely and adequately decontaminate (or provide timely and adequate decontamination services to) a prisoner who is suffering from the prolonged effects of an incapacitating chemical spray. For a couple of reasons, however, we do not believe that Danley provided fair and clear notice to the SROs that their decontamination efforts (or lack thereof) violated the students' Fourth Amendment rights. . . . The district court, we think, understandably determined that the SROs did not engage in best practices, and that they could have done more for the students in their decontamination efforts. But assuming that their failure to go further violated the Fourth Amendment, the rights of the students to be decontaminated to the degree demanded were not clearly established under the circumstances presented. . . . Alternatively, the students argue that the SROs' conduct was 'so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force' that they had to have known that they were violating the Constitution even in the absence of 'fact-specific case law.'. . Although we empathize with the students, two of whom vomited after being sprayed with Freeze +P, we are not persuaded by their argument. The students' complaint is that the SROs did not do enough to decontaminate them. Again, we agree with them, and with the district court, that the SROs did not do all that they could have done. They did not, for example, provide the students with access to water to wash or shower. But it is not fair to characterize the SROs' conduct as the complete failure to take any decontamination action at all. The SROs provided the students with some fresh air or air conditioning following the use of Freeze +P, and the students were seen by paramedics who chose not to administer treatment (and who on two occasions told the students not to put water on their faces). For purposes of qualified immunity, it is not insignificant that the methods used by the SROs—passage of time, exposure to fresh air, and evaluation by paramedics—were at least partially consistent with their training and, at least to some degree, with the instructions provided by Aerko International, the manufacturer of Freeze +P. Again, assuming that the SROs fell short of the Fourth Amendment minimum, they were not faced with an "obvious clarity" scenario. Recognizing that cases from other lower federal courts cannot create clearly established law for qualified immunity purposes, we note, as well, that the other chemical spray cases we have found—mostly in the prisoner/denial of medical care context—have arisen in different factual scenarios and do not set out definitive or minimum constitutional standards for the decontamination of those who suffer from exposure. So, even if we could look outside the Eleventh Circuit and the Alabama Supreme Court, the published case law would not have provided the SROs with 'obvious clarity' about the purported unconstitutionality of their conduct.")

Glasscox v. City of Argo, 903 F.3d 1207, 1216-20 (11th Cir. 2018) ("Applying the Graham factors to the evidence viewed in Mr. Glasscox's favor yields only one possible conclusion: that he was no longer resisting at least after the second taser shock and was attempting to comply with commands; thus, Officer Moses's repeated firing of his taser, which caused Mr. Glasscox injury, 'was wholly unnecessary, and grossly disproportionate to the circumstances.'. . As our precedent makes clear, '[t]he use of a taser beyond the arrestee's complete physical capitulation repeatedly in a short period where an arrestee was mostly cooperative and made no attempt to flee would be excessive.'. . This is such a case. Mr. Glasscox stopped his truck; turned it off; held his hands where Officer Moses could see them; removed his seatbelt at the officer's command; at least after the second taser shock, made no attempt to resist or flee; and repeatedly voiced his intention to cooperate. Yet Officer Moses tased him again and again. And as to Officer Moses's argument that Mr. Glasscox's failure to get out of the truck quickly put him in danger from nearby traffic, the additional, rapid deployments of the taser under these circumstances only prolonged Officer Moses's exposure to that danger. Under the circumstances as construed in Mr. Glasscox's favor, any reasonable officer in Officer Moses's position would have believed that continued taser shocks were unnecessary; a jury could find that Officer Moses's repeated tasing of Mr. Glasscox amounted to excessive force. . . Having concluded that Mr. Glasscox has at this stage shown that Officer Moses used excessive force under the circumstances, we address whether a reasonable officer in Officer Moses's circumstances would have had fair warning that repeatedly deploying his taser, when Mr. Glasscox was not resisting and was attempting to comply with the officer's commands, was unconstitutionally excessive. . . .The crucial question here is whether the state of the law gave police officers 'fair warning' that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . . [W]e conclude that it was clearly established on the date of Mr. Glasscox's arrest that the repeated tasing of a suspect who had ceased any resistance was unlawful. . . Oliver and Smith together dictate this result. We address these authorities in turn. . . . In light of this clearly established law, no objectively reasonable officer in Officer Moses's position could have thought it was lawful to use a taser repeatedly on an arrestee who was not resisting, even if that arrestee had previously offered resistance and was not yet restrained. Oliver settled any question whether repeated taser deployment could constitute excessive force even if an earlier deployment was justified. And Smith removed any doubt that an officer's use of substantial force on an arrestee who, although not yet restrained, had ceased any resistance or threatening behavior, is excessive. Together, Smith and Oliver clearly establish that the repeated tasing of a subdued arrestee who has ceased any resistance or threatening conduct is excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Alternatively, under the unusual circumstances of this case, it would be obviously clear to any reasonable officer that the display of force was excessive. It is clear from precedent that 'gratuitous use of force when a criminal suspect is not resisting arrest constitutes excessive force.'. . . Accepting the evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. Glasscox, we conclude that, because Officer Moses used gratuitous and excessive force on an arrestee who was not resisting arrest, 'no particularized preexisting case law was necessary for it to be clearly established that what [Officer Moses] did violated [Mr. Glasscox's] constitutional right to be free from the excessive use of force.'. . . Officer Moses may have been justified in deploying his taser to subdue Mr. Glasscox, who had just led him on a high speed chase for several miles on the interstate. But instead of using the taser on Mr. Glasscox and then giving him time to respond to orders, Officer Moses issued repeated taser shocks in rapid succession. Mr. Glasscox, helpless to comply or stop the taser shocks, cried out and writhed in pain and during the brief intervals between shocks told the officer that he would comply. We hold, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. Glasscox, that Officer Moses's repeated deployment of the taser amounted to excessive force prohibited by the Fourth Amendment. Because our law clearly established that such a use of force was excessive, the district court properly denied qualified immunity.")

Cozzi v. City of Birmingham, 892 F.3d 1288, 1297-98 (11th Cir. 2018) ("Considering now the totality of the circumstances, we ask 'whether reasonable officers in the same circumstances and possessing the same knowledge as [Thomas] could have believed that probable cause existed to arrest' Cozzi. . . We need not decide whether the evidence Thomas possessed—the statements of two tipsters that Cozzi resembled the perpetrator shown in the Crime Stoppers video, confirmation that the informant had accurately provided Cozzi's address and a description of his vehicle, and a plastic bag with 32 pills found inside Cozzi's home—was sufficient to establish arguable probable cause because we must also consider the information tending to exculpate Cozzi that was available to Thomas when he made the arrest. Thomas had been told the readily verifiable exculpatory fact that the perpetrator's multiple tattoos did not match Cozzi's single tattoo. And setting aside the 32 pills we have already discussed, the search of his residence had failed to turn up even arguable evidence of the robberies. Of course, 'a police officer is not required to explore and eliminate every theoretically plausible claim of innocence before making an arrest,' but the officer may not turn a blind eye to evidence suggesting that a suspect is innocent by 'choos[ing] to ignore information that has been offered to him or her' or by 'elect[ing] not to obtain easily discoverable facts.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Cozzi, Thompson told Thomas that Cozzi could not have been the perpetrator because Cozzi did not have multiple tattoos like the perpetrator in the photograph. . .Despite having been given plainly exculpatory and easily verifiable information, Thomas did not look at Cozzi's tattoo before arresting him. Under our precedent, this failure was unreasonable. . . .With Cozzi handcuffed and standing right outside the house when Thompson told Thomas about the tattoo discrepancy, Thomas 'unreasonably disregarded' evidence establishing that Cozzi was not the perpetrator of the crimes. . .Under the totality of the circumstances, Thomas therefore lacked arguable probable cause to arrest Cozzi. Because Cozzi was arrested without arguable probable cause, '[t]he second qualified immunity inquiry is, in the context of this case, straightforward: our binding precedent clearly established, at the time of [Cozzi's] arrest, that an arrest made without arguable probable cause violates the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures.'. . In arresting Cozzi without arguable probable cause, Thomas violated clearly established law and thus is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Saunders v. Sheriff of Brevard County, 735 F. App'x 559, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) (Martin, J., dissenting in part) ("Oberist Saunders filed suit against officials at the Brevard County Jail on account of the squalid conditions he was forced to live in while imprisoned there. Rather than allow Mr. Saunders to present his evidence to a jury, my colleagues in the majority rely on the doctrine of qualified immunity to end his case here. This case involves the denial of basic human necessities, which is a well-established constitutional right, even for prisoners. Our Circuit precedent, properly applied, would give Mr. Saunders an opportunity to redress the harms inflicted on him. My review of the record reveals that Mr. Saunders has substantiated two independent Eighth Amendment violations that should survive summary judgment. The first is based on Corporal Wright's deliberate indifference to the unsanitary conditions in the acute pod where Mr. Saunders was housed for at least 69 days. The second is based on Corporal Wright's deliberate indifference to Mr. Saunders's panic attack and self-harming behavior on August 3, 2008. The District Court denied qualified immunity to Corporal Wright, and I think it was right to do so. I therefore dissent from the opinion issued by my colleagues reversing the District Court decision in this regard. . . .Under Baird and Novak, a reasonable officer in Corporal Wright's position would have known that the unsanitary conditions in the acute pod violated the Eighth Amendment. . . It's true that neither Baird nor Novak involved the precise circumstances at issue here. But '[e]xact factual identity with a previously decided case is not required.'. .Despite certain factual differences between the facts in Baird and Novak and the facts here, this precedent made clear that two specific aspects of the unsanitary conditions in the acute pod constituted unconstitutional conditions. . . First, Novak noted that 'proximity to human waste' often constitutes a 'deprivation of basic elements of hygiene' in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . Mr. Saunders has shown that he was directly exposed to human waste and other bodily fluids for extended periods of time, including where he slept and ate. Second, this Court expressly held that conditions lacking 'the provision of hygiene items[ ] violate[ ] the minimal standards required by the Eighth Amendment.'. . The record here shows that the jail prohibited inmates in the acute pod from having many basic 'hygiene items,' including toothbrushes, toothpaste, eating utensils, clean sleeping mats, and most importantly hand soap. . . . In sum, Baird, Brooks, and Novak gave Corporal Wright 'fair warning' that the unsanitary conditions of the acute pod—particularly the combination of proximity to human waste and the lack of hand soap—violated Mr. Saunders's Eighth Amendment rights. . . Because Corporal Wright's Eighth Amendment violation was clearly established, he is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The majority assures us that it 'take[s] no particular pleasure,' in the outcome of this case, . . .but we are judges, whose job demands application of the constitutional principles, not expressions about our feelings. And the majority opinion is mistaken when it declares 'we have no other choice' but to foreclose this suit. . . This court can recognize the flagrantly unconstitutional conditions of confinement, and in fact is obligated to do so. Instead, the majority opinion downplays the conditions Mr. Saunders faced, describing them as 'troubling' and 'unpleasant.'. . These adjectives do not accurately describe the gratuitous cruelty Mr. Saunders endured at the Brevard County Jail. Our Constitution does not turn a blind eye to these types of conditions, and neither should we.")

Benjamin v. City of Miami, 727 F. App'x 635, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) (Granting qualified immunity on motion to dismiss where "[Plaintiff] alleged that [Detective] violated his right to due process when he misadvised him of his right to counsel, refused to notify him that [lawyer] was present at the police station and wanted to speak with him, and lied to [lawyer] about his potential client's interrogation and whereabouts." Court concluded it was not clearly established that such conduct "shocked the conscience" for purposes of substantive due process claim.)

Crocker v. Beatty, 886 F.3d 1132, 1136-38 (11th Cir. 2018) ("Beatty contends that the 'nature of cell phones' leads to easily-destroyed evidence that disappears quickly. This, according to him, is itself sufficient reason to find exigent circumstances here. Taken to its logical conclusion, his interpretation would permit police officers to seize now-ubiquitous cell phones from any person, in any place, at any time, so long as the phone contains photographs or videos that could serve as evidence of a crime—simply because the 'nature' of the device used to capture that evidence might result in it being lost. Not so. The Fourth Amendment draws a line well short of this awesome breadth of government power that no court, to our knowledge, has come close to recognizing. The Constitution requires Beatty's argument to fail. . . .The right to be free from warrantless seizures of personal property, absent an applicable exception, was clearly established to the point of obvious clarity in 2012. . . The exigent circumstances exception was similarly clearly established at the time of the Crocker-Beatty confrontation. . . Beatty's argument, however, is that the application of this exception to the seizure of cell phones—in particular, Internet-connected smart phones like Crocker's iPhone—was not clearly established in 2012. But this argument asks far too much. The novelty of cutting-edge electronic devices cannot grant police officers carte blanche to seize them under the guise of qualified immunity. This is not how our analysis operates. Even in 'novel factual situations,' we must deny qualified immunity when clearly established case law sends the 'same message' to reasonable officers. . . Our case law has sent a consistent message, predating 2012, about the warrantless seizure of personal property and how exigent circumstances may arise. The technology of the iPhone simply does not change our analysis. To hold otherwise would deal a devastating blow to the Fourth Amendment in the face of sweeping technological advancement. These advancements do not create ambiguities in Fourth Amendment law; the principles remain as always. Because of this, Beatty is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Gates v. Khokhar, 884 F.3d 1290, 1296-1304 (11th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 807 (2019) ("Fair warning is most commonly provided by materially similar precedent from the Supreme Court, this Court, or the highest state court in which the case arose. . . However, a judicial precedent with identical facts is not essential for the law to be clearly established. . . Authoritative judicial decisions may 'establish broad principles of law' that are clearly applicable to the conduct at issue. . . And occasionally, albeit not very often, it may be obvious from 'explicit statutory or constitutional statements' that conduct is unconstitutional. . . In all of these circumstances, qualified immunity will be denied only if the preexisting law by case law or otherwise 'make[s] it obvious that the defendant's acts violated the plaintiff's rights in the specific set of circumstances at issue.'. .A defendant who asserts qualified immunity has the initial burden of showing he was acting within the scope of his discretionary authority when he took the allegedly unconstitutional action. . . Assuming the defendant makes the required showing, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to establish that qualified immunity is not appropriate by showing that (1) the facts alleged make out a violation of a constitutional right and (2) the constitutional right at issue was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . .Even without actual probable cause, however, a police officer is entitled to qualified immunity if he had only 'arguable' probable cause to arrest the plaintiff. . . Moreover, when an officer has arguable probable cause to arrest, he is entitled to qualified immunity both from Fourth Amendment claims for false arrest and from First Amendment claims stemming from the arrest. . . .Whether an officer has probable cause or arguable probable cause, or neither, 'depends on the elements of the alleged crime and the operative fact pattern.'. . The rationale behind qualified immunity is that an officer who acts reasonably should not be held personally liable merely because it appears, in hindsight, that he might have made a mistake. The concept of arguable probable cause therefore allows for the possibility that an officer might 'reasonably but mistakenly conclude that probable cause is present.'. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, we think Defendants had actual probable cause to arrest Plaintiff for violating Georgia's mask statute. But even assuming they lacked actual probable cause, these officers clearly had arguable probable cause. . . . The Georgia Supreme Court has instructed that, in assessing whether a mask-wearer acts with the requisite criminal intent, one must consider the surrounding circumstances. See Miller, 260 Ga. at 674, 398 S.E.2d 547; Daniels, 264 Ga. at 463–64, 448 S.E.2d 185. Given the circumstances of this case, an objectively reasonable officer in Defendants' position could have believed that Plaintiff was either actually trying to intimidate or reasonably would have known that his conduct would provoke a reasonable apprehension that he was doing so, which is, in relevant part, the intent element imported into the statute by the Georgia Supreme Court in Miller and Daniels for purposes of sustaining a conviction. Like some other protesters, Plaintiff was wearing a mask that covered his entire face, and thus concealed his identity, during this night-time protest. That conduct might be sufficient by itself to suggest an intent to intimidate. But there is more: the calculus changed dramatically when the police repeatedly asked the masked protesters to remove their masks, else be arrested. Notwithstanding this command, Plaintiff nonetheless persisted, in what could reasonably be perceived as defiance of this lawful order by the police. A reasonable officer could infer that Plaintiff intended to intimidate based on such conduct, or, at the least, infer that Plaintiff could reasonably foresee that his behavior would be viewed as intimidating. . . . That Plaintiff now alleges he did not hear Whitmire's warnings to remove his mask is immaterial. For purposes of our qualified immunity analysis, 'we look only to whether a reasonable officer, knowing what [Defendants] knew at the time, objectively could have believed probable cause existed.'. . Here, over a loud speaker, the police issued multiple warnings directing protestors to remove their masks. Given all the surrounding circumstances, an objective officer could reasonably have interpreted Plaintiff's refusal to comply with multiple orders to remove his mask as a gesture intended to intimidate. . . . In concluding that arguable probable cause to arrest was lacking, the district court relied on Plaintiff's allegation that he never intended to intimidate anyone through his wearing of the V for Vendetta mask. Ergo, the court concluded, arguable probable cause evaporated. This approach was error. It is not Plaintiff's post-hoc explanation of his actions that counts. What matters is what a reasonable police officer under the circumstances could infer from those actions. A reasonable officer could infer that, in disobeying Whitmire's commands to remove his mask, Plaintiff actually intended to intimidate or, at the least, acted with 'reasonable foresight' that his conduct would do so. . . . In short, and for all of the above reasons, we conclude that Defendants, at the very least, had arguable probable cause to arrest Plaintiff for violation of the mask statute. We disagree with the district court's conclusion to the contrary. . . .Reframing the analysis to conform with the direction of the Supreme Court, the dispositive question is whether it was already clearly established, as a matter of law, that at the time of Plaintiff's arrest, an objective officer could not have concluded reasonably that probable cause existed to arrest Plaintiff under the particular circumstances Defendants confronted. . . Again, resolution of the clearly-established test does not depend on whether a judge might decide later that probable cause was lacking in fact. Instead, the test asks whether already existing law was so clear that, given the specific facts facing this particular officer, one must conclude that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates' the Constitutional right at issue. . . That judges disagree about a constitutional issue is itself evidence that a right is insufficiently clearly established for purposes of denying qualified immunity. . . Plaintiff does not cite, and we have not found, any already existing law that clearly established—beyond debate—the unlawfulness of an arrest under the circumstances present here. . .And that is not surprising, given our conclusion that, at the very least, Defendants arguably had probable cause to arrest. Because we conclude—as a matter of law—that Defendants violated no already clearly established right, we thus conclude that the district court erred in denying Defendants' motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's denial of that motion.")

Gates v. Khokhar, 884 F.3d 1290, 1305-09 (11th Cir. 2018) (Kathleen Williams, DJ, dissenting in part), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 807 (2019) ("Although I agree that official immunity warrants dismissal of the state-law claims against Appellants, I do not agree that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Gates's federal claims. More specifically, I believe that Gates has adequately pled that Appellants lacked actual or arguable probable cause to arrest him for wearing a Guy Fawkes mask during an admittedly peaceful protest in downtown Atlanta. Therefore, I would affirm the district court's finding that Gates's First and Fourth Amendment claims should survive a motion to dismiss. . . . Even assuming that the 'clearly established right' must be defined more narrowly than an 'arrest without probable cause ... violates the Fourth Amendment,' the specific right at issue here—whether individuals can be subject to arrest for wearing a mask during a peaceful protest—was 'clearly established' at the time of Gates's arrest. This Circuit has unambiguously held that '[our] [d]ecisions ... have put police officers on notice for decades that protestors present on public property have a First Amendment right to peacefully express their views, in the absence of narrowly tailored ordinances restricting the time, place, or manner of the speech.'. . .But even beyond the clearly established right to peacefully protest that is set out in the First Amendment, it would be unreasonable for the officers to believe that the Anti–Mask Act was intended to cover the type of protected speech at issue here. As the Miller court declared in defending the constitutionality of the Anti–Mask Act twenty years ago, '[i]t would be absurd to interpret the statute to prevent non-threatening political mask-wearing.'. . . Thus, under any reading of what constitutes a clearly established right, there can be no doubt that 'every reasonable official would have understood' that if Gates was engaging in 'non-threatening political mask-wearing,' there was no probable cause for arrest under the Anti–Mask Act and the officers cannot be shielded from suit by qualified immunity. . . .There can be no doubt that the order to remove the masks was directed at what would be constitutionally-protected expression. . . unless it was brought outside the ambit of the First Amendment through some exception—here, the threat of violence or intimidation that was criminalized by the Anti–Mask Act. . . As discussed above, the record at this juncture does not demonstrate that such a threat existed at the time the order was given, and so there was no legal basis for ordering Gates to remove his mask. . .To the contrary, the order itself constituted an impermissible incursion on Gates's right to free speech, and, as the Supreme Court explained in Wright v. State of Ga., 373 U.S. 284, 292, 83 S.Ct. 1240, 10 L.Ed.2d 349 (1963), '[o]bviously, ... one cannot be punished for failing to obey the command of an officer if that command is itself violative of the Constitution.' See also Brown v. State of La., 383 U.S. 131, 141, 86 S.Ct. 719, 15 L.Ed.2d 637 (1966). To say that arguable probable cause arose when the police ordered Gates to remove his mask even if he was not violating the Anti–Mask Act prior to the order being given, would render Fourth and First Amendment protections meaningless: A Fourth Amendment claim cannot be defeated because a citizen continues to engage in protected political speech in contravention of an order she has no lawful obligation to obey. And her non-criminalized, peaceful self-expression cannot be characterized as 'threatening' and stripped of constitutional protection simply because a police officer orders her to stop. In sum, nothing in the complaint or attached documentation supports a finding that a reasonable officer could have believed that Gates's conduct evidenced an intent to threaten or intimidate, as required under the Anti–Mask Act. The complaint alleges that Gates was wearing a mask 'to express himself' during a 'peaceful protest' in downtown Atlanta, and that he was improperly arrested after the police gave an 'unconstitutional ... order' to remove his mask and he did not do so. The arrest report attached to the complaint similarly states that 'Mr. Gates was arrested for wearing a mask' while participating in a protest, with no mention of threats or intimidation. Based on these allegations, it is clear that Gates's behavior is a far cry from the 'terrorization by masked vigilantes' that the Anti–Mask Act was designed to prevent. Miller, 260 Ga. at 672, 398 S.E.2d 547. Instead, the record describes the type of 'non-threatening political speech' that has unambiguously qualified as protected expression since the Miller decision in 1990. For that reason, I respectfully dissent.")

Brand v. Casal, 877 F.3d 1253, 1264-65, 1269-70 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Just like the officer in Fils, Deputy Pardinas tased Mrs. Brand even though she was not violent or aggressive and was not resisting arrest. So in the same way we did in Fils, we again recognize that our law was clearly established that the use of a taser under such circumstances was excessive force. . . The District Court therefore properly denied Deputy Pardinas qualified immunity on the Brands' excessive force claim. . . . Rettele gave law enforcement officers fair warning that they cannot force an arrestee to expose her intimate body parts 'longer than necessary to protect their safety.'. . This is exactly what these deputies did to Mrs. Brand. In light of Rettele's statement that involuntary exposure becomes unreasonable 'once the police [are] satisfied that no immediate threat [is] presented,'. . . a reasonable officer in the defendants' position would have known that forcing Mrs. Brand to expose her breasts for over an hour, when it was entirely unnecessary to protect the officers' safety, violated the Fourth Amendment. . . .Given these explanations and articulations of the right to bodily privacy, no reasonable officer would have concluded that the constitutional principle of Rettele turned on whether the couple in that case was forced to show their genitals rather than only the woman's breasts. . . Forcing a woman to expose either body part against her will is a 'degrading and humiliating method[ ]' of conducting a seizure, which the Fourth Amendment protects against. . . . A reasonable officer would have known that subjecting Mrs.

Brand to the indignity of exposing herself to countless strangers for an extended period of time—for no legitimate law-enforcement purpose—violated those constitutional protections. We conclude, therefore, that the defendants' violation of Mrs. Brand's right to bodily privacy was clearly established. We affirm the District Court's denial of qualified immunity on the Brands' bodily-privacy claim.")

Salter v. Mitchell, 711 F. App'x 530, ___ (11th Cir. 2017) ("At the time of Salter's suicide, decisional precedent had clearly established that a jailer acts with deliberate indifference if he has subjective knowledge of a strong likelihood that an inmate would attempt suicide and deliberately fails to take any action to prevent that inmate's suicide. . . Ms. Salter has not met her burden of pointing to any case law that says 'beyond debate' that jail staff is not allowed to rely on a general practitioner's determination about an inmate's mental health. The facts here do not show that Defendants violated clearly established law nor that they acted with deliberate indifference while monitoring Salter on a health watch. Therefore, the judgment of the district court is reversed and remanded with instructions to find that the three Defendants are protected under the law of qualified immunity from suit and liability under the facts of this case.")

Gaines v. Wardynski, 871 F.3d 1203, 1207-14 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Because the district court here defined "clearly established law" at too high a level of generality, we reverse. . . .For purposes of this appeal, we will accept as true that Dr. Wardynski passed Gaines over for promotion because her father had criticized him and the Board about a matter of public concern and that doing so violated her First Amendment rights (the first prong). . . This case turns on whether those rights were 'clearly established' by controlling law when Dr. Wardynski did what he did (the second prong). . . .The second and third methods [set out in Vinyard for determining whether law is "clearly established"] are generally known as 'obvious clarity' cases. . . They exist where the words of the federal statute or constitutional provision at issue are 'so clear and the conduct so bad that case law is not needed to establish that the conduct cannot be lawful,' or where the case law that does exist is so clear and broad (and 'not tied to particularized facts') that 'every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the official's conduct did violate federal law when the official acted.'. . Cases do not often arise under the second and third methods.. . . .Because failing to promote an employee after her father had criticized her employer is not so egregious as to violate the First Amendment on its face with respect to her constitutional rights, and because there are no 'broad principles' in case law clearly establishing that every reasonable official in that situation would know that the challenged conduct would violate her First Amendment rights, this is not one of the rare and exceptional 'obvious clarity' cases. . . Thus, we will focus our attention on the remaining (first) method to establish fair warning. . . . As noted, to establish fair warning under this method, plaintiff may point to prior case law (from the Supreme Court of the United States, the Eleventh Circuit, or the highest court in the relevant state) that is 'materially similar. . . .This court has stated many times that ' "if case law, in factual terms, has not staked out a bright line, qualified immunity almost always protects the defendant."'. . It is particularly difficult to overcome the qualified immunity defense in the First Amendment context. . . .In sum, at the time relevant to this case, it was not clearly established that it would violate an employee's free speech rights to take adverse action because her father had engaged in protected speech. It might be fair to say in that situation that the employer knew or should have known that he was violating the father's First Amendment rights. . . However, it was not clearly established under the controlling law that it 'would violate the constitutional rights of the [employee].'. . Thus, Dr. Wardynski was entitled to qualified immunity (and summary judgment) on the freedom of speech claim. . . .The question in this case is not whether there is a First Amendment right to intimate association; there is. Nor is the question whether a public employee can be subjected to an adverse employment action for exercising that right; she can't. Nor is the question whether the employee will prevail if the adverse action infringed on her right to intimate association; she will. The question we are called to decide is more narrow: was it clearly established in 2013 (by the U.S. Supreme Court, this court, or the Supreme Court of Alabama) that it would violate the right to freedom of intimate association to take an adverse action against an employee whose father publicly criticized her employer? None of the circuit cases that Gaines has cited involved the same or similar facts. . . . Ultimately, counsel for Gaines had to concede at oral argument that 'there certainly are no cases that we've cited dealing with the protection of a child from retaliation based upon the conduct of a parent.' In the absence of any controlling case involving that situation on sufficiently similar facts, Dr. Wardynski did not have notice and 'fair warning' that he was violating Gaines's right to freedom of intimate association. Accordingly, Dr. Wardynski was entitled to qualified immunity, and summary judgment should have been granted on that claim as well. . . . Because the case law that Gaines has relied upon was not particularized to the facts of the case, but rather it merely set out First Amendment principles at a high level of generality, it was not 'apparent' that passing her over for promotion based on things her father said would violate her constitutional rights. Thus, Dr. Wardynski is entitled to qualified immunity on both the freedom of speech claim and the freedom of intimate association claim.") Woodyard v. Alabama DOC, 700 F. App'x 927, 932-33 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Some of our sister circuits' decisions suggest that Woodyard's report to Leggett might be enough to show that Leggett had subjective knowledge of the risk Woodyard faced. . . But in determining whether a particular constitutional violation is clearly established, we look to our own binding precedent, the binding precedent of the Supreme Court, and the binding precedent of the 'highest court in the state where the action is filed.'. . And no decision from the United States Supreme Court, this Court, or the Alabama Supreme Court clearly established that the information available to Leggett was sufficient to apprise him of the risk Woodyard faced and require him to take preventative action. . . .In Rodriguez the officers were aware of both the threats made against the inmate and the gang-related nature of those threats. The assault in this case was not gang-related. All Leggett was aware of was Anderson's threats, Anderson's drunkenness, and the fact that Anderson and Woodyard had an argument a few minutes before Woodyard spoke to Leggett. A reasonable officer could conclude that, because of the violence associated with gangs and the lack of gang involvement in the dispute between Anderson and Leggett, this situation was different from the one the officers in Rodriguez faced. A gang's threat to kill someone for leaving the gang (or really for almost any other reason) could reasonably be considered more credible than a drunk inmate's threat to kill someone because they didn't hand over 'goods.' That distinction is enough to prevent Rodriguez from clearly establishing that Leggett's conduct was unconstitutional. . . .Until binding precedent clarifies the circumstances in which threats between inmates are sufficient to allow the jury to impute knowledge of such risks to an officer, we cannot say that in the circumstances of this case a refusal to act on a threat (or threats accompanied by drunkenness) amounted to a clearly established constitutional violation. For those reasons, the district court did not err by granting summary judgment to Leggett on Woodyard's failure to prevent claim.")

Johnson v. Conway, 688 F. App'x 700, 706, 709, 707 n.2 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Here, like the district court, albeit for different reasons, we do not reach the question of whether Johnson's constitutional rights were violated because he has not shown that the detention officers violated a clearly established right. . . . It bears repeating that 'generally no bright line exists for identifying when force is excessive; we have therefore concluded that unless a controlling and materially similar case declares the official's conduct unconstitutional, a defendant is usually entitled to qualified immunity.'. . No 'materially similar case' declares the detention officers' conduct unconstitutional, and the broad principles of law on which Johnson relies do not apply with 'obvious clarity' to the specific situation facing the detention officers. . . Because Johnson has not shown that the detention officers violated a clearly established right in the specific context of this case, we affirm the grant of qualified immunity to Revels, Bailey, and Davis. . . .Kingsley was decided after the incident giving rise to this case and so is not directly relevant to the inquiry of whether the law was 'clearly established at the time of the misconduct.'. . For this inquiry we look to our pre-existing law, which applied the subjective-malice standard abrogated by Kingsley. . . The district court concluded that, because the evidence was insufficient to meet the subjective standard (and therefore to prove a constitutional violation under the prior precedent), the officers could not have been on notice that their conduct was unlawful. Appearing to concede that he cannot meet the subjective-malice standard, Johnson contends that Kingsley 'did nothing to change the standard of conduct for detention officers' and that pre-existing law in this Circuit clearly established an objective standard of conduct that applies with obvious clarity in this case. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 832–33 (7th Cir. 2015) (holding that "before and after the Supreme Court's decision in [Kingsley], the standards for the amount of force that can be permissibly employed remain the same"). For instance, since before the time of this incident, as both parties appear to agree, this Circuit applied the same objective factors to Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims as the Supreme Court articulated in Kingsley. See Cockrell v. Sparks, 510 F.3d 1307, 1311 (11th Cir. 2007). Likewise, the broad principles of law articulated in Ort, Danley, and Williams, are largely the same as those articulated in Kingsley. Accordingly, we assume without deciding that Johnson is correct that an objective standard of conduct was clearly established by pre-existing case law. Cf. Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2474–75 (explaining that "the use of an objective standard adequately protects an officer who acts in good faith"). It makes no difference to the ultimate outcome, however, because Johnson has not shown that the broad principles of law on which he relies clearly established the objective unreasonableness of the detention officers' conduct, nor has he shown that the evidence is sufficient to meet the subjective 'malicious or sadistic' standard.")
'malicious or sadistic' standard.")

Crews v. Paine, 686 F. App'x 540, 546 (10th Cir. 2017) ("Neither the district court nor Officer Crews cite any authority holding an unbiased decisionmaker personally liable under § 1983 for an adverse action allegedly traceable to another's improper animus. Indeed, such a holding would appear contrary to basic limits on personal liability under § 1983, which, eschewing principles of respondeat superior, make 'each Government official ... only liable for his or her own misconduct.'. . In any event, given the absence of precedent clearly establishing personal liability under § 1983 based on a cat's paw theory, Chief Eaton would be entitled to qualified immunity from liability on the basis of such a theory. See, e.g., Estate of B.I.C. v. Gillen, 761 F.3d 1099, 1104 (10th Cir. 2014) (summary judgment on basis of qualified immunity required when theory of liability relied on by plaintiff was not clearly established).")

Stephens v. DeGiovanni, 852 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2017) ("In deciding whether an officer is entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the question of whether the force used by the officer in the course of an arrest is excessive is a ' "pure question of law,"' decided by the court. . . . Under Stephens's version of the events at the time of his encounter with Deputy DeGiovanni, he had complied with all Deputy DeGiovanni's investigation questions and was not resisting or attempting to flee. Deputy DeGiovanni had no reason to use the force he did on Stephens that resulted in severe and permanent physical injuries as well as psychological trauma. Under the objective-reasonableness standard of Graham, '[a]n officer will be entitled to qualified immunity if his actions were objectively reasonable—that is, if a reasonable officer in the same situation would have believed that the force used was not excessive.'. . 'No reasonable police officer could believe that' the force Deputy DeGiovanni exerted on compliant, non-resisting Stephens, evidenced by his severe, permanent injuries, 'was permissible given these straightforward circumstances.'. . . Stephens's arrest injuries are particularly compelling, because, as eyewitness Greenwood averred, Stephens was cooperating by responding to all Deputy DeGiovanni's inquiries and not resisting whatsoever, not even raising his voice. Instead of the similar-case method for resolving Fourth Amendment, excessive-force cases, this case requires the obvious-clarity-method analysis, based on Deputy DeGiovanni's objectively unreasonable, excessive force in arresting Stephens on misdemeanor charges. . . . On these obvious-clarity facts, 'no particularized preexisting case law was necessary for it to be clearly established that what [Deputy DeGiovanni] did violated [Stephens's] constitutional right to be free from the excessive use of force' in his arrest. . .We vacate the judge's order granting summary judgment to Deputy DeGiovanni on Stephens's excessive-force claim and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. . . .Accepting Stephens's version of the events involved in his arrest, this is an obvious-clarity case under the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court and our circuit for a § 1983 Fourth Amendment, excessive-force claim. While we affirm the denial of Stephens's claim of false arrest because of his nolo contendere plea, we vacate the grant of summary judgment to Deputy DeGiovanni on Stephens's excessive-force claim.")

Young v. Borders, 850 F.3d 1274, 1275, 1280-87 (11th Cir. 2017) (Hull, J, joined by Tjoflat, J., concurring in the denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 640 (2018) ("Although orders denying rehearing en banc also have no precedential effect, our colleagues have written two lengthy dissents to this order denying rehearing en banc. Two of the original panel members now write to explain the errors in those dissents. First, although the district court ruled that Deputy Sylvester's conduct violated no 'clearly established law' as of July 15, 2012, the dissents fail to identify any cases with facts similar to the undisputed facts here, much less any similar cases where an officer was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment. [citing White v. Pauly] Second, the dissents omit key, undisputed facts in their recitations of what defendant Deputy Sylvester saw, was told, and then did on this night when he tragically shot and killed Mr. Scott, an innocent young man. Here are the complete facts that show what happened that summer night and why the panel properly found no reversible error in the district court's qualified immunity ruling. . . . The district court concluded that Sylvester was not required to wait and see what might happen if he did not stop Mr. Scott[.] . . . The district court concluded that Deputy Sylvester's split-second decision to use deadly force was objectively reasonable under the total circumstances—a reasonably perceived imminent threat of serious physical harm—and was not a constitutional violation. . . . Although the district court ruled on the constitutional violation issue, our panel did not need to decide it. This is because the district court also concluded that '[e]ven if ... Sylvester violated Scott's constitutional rights ... by using excessive force, Sylvester would be entitled to qualified immunity because he violated no clearly established right.'. . The panel simply and correctly found 'no reversible error in the district court's ultimate qualified immunity rulings.' At a minimum, no clearly established federal law as of July 15, 2012[3] gave fair and clear notice to Deputy Sylvester that his conduct in these unique circumstances was objectively unreasonable and unlawful, and thus 'no reversible error' was shown. We explain why the district court did not err on the clearly established prong. . . .In the last five years, the Supreme Court has issued a number of opinions reversing federal courts that denied qualified immunity, often because they applied the clearly established analysis at too high a level of generality and without regard to the particular facts of prior case law. . . . In White, the Supreme Court reiterated 'the longstanding principle that "clearly established law" should not be defined "at a high level of generality."'. . . The Supreme Court explained that federal courts that relied on Graham, Garner, and their circuit court progeny, instead of identifying a prior case with similar circumstances, have 'misunderstood' the 'clearly established' analysis because those excessive force cases do not create clearly established law outside of an 'obvious case'. . . .Like White, '[t]his is not a case where it is obvious that there was a violation of clearly established law under Garner and Graham' because 'this case presents a unique set of facts and circumstances,' which is 'an important indication' that Deputy Sylvester's 'conduct did not violate a "clearly established" right.'. . With the help of hindsight, the dissents impermissibly second-guess Sylvester's split-second decision to use deadly force. The dissents define clearly established federal law at too high a level of generality, in contravention of the Supreme Court's precedent requiring a case with particularized and similar factual circumstances in order to create 'clearly established' federal law. . . . Although identical facts are not required, there still must be particularized facts that made clear to Deputy Sylvester that his force action was unlawful. . . . Here, the panel was required to find 'no reversible error' because there is no prior case with facts remotely similar, much less particularized facts similar, to the facts in this case. More importantly, even the contours of the law in this type of unusual factual situation were not sufficiently clear such that a reasonable officer, in Defendant Sylvester's situation, would understand that what he is doing violates clearly established federal law. . . . Taken together, what these two prior cases (cited by the dissent) [Lundgren and Menuel] do illustrate is the wide variety of difficult and complex facts in excessive force cases. These two cases, however, do not closely, or even similarly, resemble the facts of this case, which means qualified immunity protects Deputy Sylvester. . . . This is a difficult and unique case that is not answered by either our precedent or Supreme Court precedent. To find Sylvester's use of force objectively unreasonable, that conclusion must 'follow immediately' from the principles of our past precedents. . . That is not the case here. The panel's unpublished, non-precedential affirmance of the district court's qualified immunity ruling is not incongruous with this Circuit's precedent in excessive force cases. En banc consideration is thus not necessary to 'maintain uniformity of the court's decisions' under Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 35. . . .We need not decide whether Deputy Sylvester's conduct before the door opened violated the Constitution because no clearly established federal law gave Sylvester fair and clear notice that his conduct constituted an illegal search. . . .In this case, Deputy Sylvester stood on the ground immediately surrounding the stoop to Apartment 114 as he knocked on the front door. Under a Fourth Amendment analysis, Sylvester entered the curtilage of Mr. Scott's home without a warrant, and his conduct at the door took place in a constitutionally protected area. . . The question becomes whether his conduct fell within the knock and talk exception to a warrantless search. . . .Once again, we need not decide the constitutional violation issue. At a minimum, no clearly established federal law on July 15, 2012 gave fair and clear notice to Sylvester that his conduct before the door opened was an illegal search. 'Our Court looks only to binding precedent—cases from the United States Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, and the highest court of the state under which the claim arose—to determine whether the right in question was clearly established at the time of the violation.'. . In doing so we also only look at the state of the law on the date of the challenged conduct. . . The dissent does not cite any Supreme Court, binding Eleventh Circuit, or Florida Supreme Court case that would have put Deputy Sylvester on fair and clear notice that the time and manner of his approach on July 15, 2015 was illegal. Instead, relying on cases from other circuits, the dissent argues that it is clearly established federal law that Deputy Sylvester's behavior was 'a raid' and exceeded the scope of the permissible knock and talk exception because it was 1:30 a.m., he unholstered his weapon, and he knocked so loudly. In those cases, however, the officers made warrantless entries using a coercive show of force. In contrast, the officers' actions here are dissimilar and do not rise to the level of a 'show of force' found impermissible in those other cases. . . . In conducting its qualified immunity analysis, the district court's decision viewed the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs. When there were disputes in the record, it accepted the plaintiffs' version of these tragic facts as true. The district court thoroughly and diligently reviewed the facts and legal issues in this case. At a minimum, the district court committed 'no reversible error' because no clearly established federal law gave clear and fair notice that Deputy Sylvester's conduct was unlawful. The panel's affirmance is not en banc worthy under Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 35.")

Young v. Borders, 850 F.3d 1274, 1291-92, 1294-1300 (11th Cir. 2017) (Martin, J., with whom Wilson, Rosenbaum, and Jill Pryor, JJ., join, dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 640 (2018) ("Although the Supreme Court recently reminded us that 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality,' it also restated the exception to this rule: 'general statements of the law' can still create clearly established law in 'obvious case[s].' White v. Pauly . . . We have said that officials need only have 'reasonable warning' that their conduct violated constitutional rights. . . . Contrary to what the District Court found, there were two clear constitutional violations here. First, the reflex shooting and killing of Mr. Scott, as he opened the door to his house then tried to step back inside, was manifestly unreasonable under these circumstances. Second, the aggressive police tactics that led to this tragedy far exceeded the scope of a consensual, information-gathering 'knock and talk.' By accepting these violations as business as usual, the panel opinion weakens core constitutional rights and gives dangerous guidance to police officers. . . . [W]hen viewed together, Lundgren and Menuel demonstrate the straightforward line courts observe, with people holding a gun in their own house as a constitutionally guaranteed tool of self-defense on one side, . . . and people who go beyond that to menace police with their gun on the other. . . . On the facts as we must view them here, Mr. Scott was on the right side of this line because he did not threaten the officers with his gun. He merely held it pointing safely at the ground while he was in his own home, and he had even started to retreat. Deputy Sylvester immediately reacted by rapidly firing six bullets at Mr. Scott, killing him practically the moment he opened the door. Under our caselaw, this was not even close to reasonable. . . .Any ambiguity surrounding the fact of Mr. Scott's retreat should have been resolved in favor of the plaintiffs. . . It is the job of a jury to decide why Mr. Scott was backing inside his home. So too must a jury decide whether Deputy Sylvester's subjective belief was objectively reasonable. . . . The officers in Mr. Scott's case try to shoehorn their tactics into the knock and talk exception, saying that they only intended to ask for information as visitors, and they would have left Apartment 114 if no one had answered. The District Court and the panel accepted these statements and, in the process, rejected the plaintiffs' claims. But the facts, properly viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, tell a very different story. Unlike consensual visitors, the officers: (1) approached Mr. Scott's home at 1:30 a.m.; (2) tactically surrounded the only exit; (3) drew loaded guns; and (4) repeatedly slammed on the door without identifying themselves. . . In circumstances like these, the implied consent underlying the knock and talk exception disappears, because no 'background social norms' could possibly validate the officers' conduct. To the contrary, American social norms and laws empower people to protect themselves from armed intrusions into their homes. . . The officers here weren't ready to talk with Mr. Scott—they were ready for a raid. . . .The concurrence's claim that these officers, who tactically surrounded Mr. Scott's home with their guns loaded, were there to greet Mr. Scott and chat, . . . is flatly inconsistent with its other claim that the officers were entitled to conclude that the armed motorcyclist may have been inside Apartment 114. . . The concurrence tries to have it both ways: for the excessive-force violations, it says the officers had every reason to think there was an armed and dangerous criminal in Apartment 114. Then for the knock and talk violation, it says the officers were just there for a friendly talk with people who 'were not suspects.'. . Which is it? The combination of police tactics used here is egregious. As far as I can tell, no Court of Appeals has reviewed a knock and talk case involving all the aggressive tactics used here, namely: (1) approaching well after midnight; (2) taking tactical positions to the sides of a home's only exit; (3) drawing guns; and (4) forcefully knocking without identifying themselves. . . . Although there are court rulings addressing different aspects of the behavior here, I found no case in which law enforcement did all of these things at once. The concurrence says I have not cited cases that are factually similar to this one. . . There are not a lot of cases like this, and I hope that is because police don't often shoot and kill innocent people who answer a knock at their door. It is the job of this Court to identify cases in which unconstitutional police tactics led to the senseless loss of life, and then let juries sort out how things went wrong. . . .I appreciate that police must make difficult decisions in tense situations. And that is why qualified immunity often shields them from suit. But there are limits to this doctrine. When police clearly violate a person's constitutional rights, as here, it is our role to confront that violation of the law and to ensure as best we can that it is not repeated. I don't believe the panel's summary affirmance performed that role. Instead, it gave a pass as reasonable to the actions of police in surrounding a randomly selected home in the dead of night, occupied by someone not a suspect; drawing loaded weapons; pounding on the door until the beleaguered occupant opened it; and then shooting him on sight, only because he was holding a gun. If these actions are constitutional, as the panel suggests, then the Second and Fourth Amendments are having a very bad day in this Circuit.")

Young v. Borders, 850 F.3d 1274, 1300-02 (11th Cir. 2017) (Jill Pryor, J., with whom Wilson, Martin, and Rosenbaum, JJ., join, dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 640 (2018) ("I join in full Judge Martin's thorough and thoughtful dissent. I write separately to add an observation about the incentives we create for police officers, and the guidance we provide for district courts, when we cloak fast-acting officers with qualified immunity based on unreasonably escalated circumstances that they alone create. . . .Deputy Sylvester and his fellow officers created a situation in which anyone they would confront behind that door would feel panicked. There was absolutely no objectively reasonable justification for this escalation by the officers, as Judge Martin explains in her dissent. The district court nonetheless held, based on the 'totality of the[se] circumstances,' that 'it was not unreasonable for Sylvester to believe that his life was in danger in the instant the door opened and to immediately take action in self-defense.'. . The panel, without any additional explanation, agreed. I cannot. When police unilaterally manufacture alarm and urgency that the situation at hand clearly does not warrant, the law does not—and must not—grant them qualified immunity for a deadly split-second decision. To be sure, in analyzing an officer's entitlement to qualified immunity we must view the situation from the eyes of a reasonable officer 'on the scene who is hampered by incomplete information and forced to make a split-second decision between action and inaction,' Crosby v. Monroe Cty., 394 F.3d 1328, 1334 (11th Cir. 2004) (emphasis added), in 'circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving,' Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 397 (1989). But here, Deputy Sylvester almost certainly would have avoided a forced split-second deadly decision had he and his fellow officers not unreasonably contrived the tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving circumstances at Mr. Scott's door. . . . We have never before held that police can, without justification, provoke a panic, and then hide behind it by claiming that 'everything happened fast.'. . Nor should we now. Deputy Sylvester and his fellow officers say they were approaching Mr. Scott as a member of the community, not as a known criminal or even a suspect or person of interest. Indeed, in Deputy Sylvester's own words, the officers merely intended to 'knock[ ] on that door .... to get information.'. . The mere fact that Mr. Scott answered the door with a lawfully carried gun at his side could not reasonably have changed the officers' approach once they laid eyes on him. Instead of setting up such a show of force that the neighbors perceived the event as a raid and then reacting immediately to the sight of Mr. Scott with the use of deadly force, reasonable officers should have proceeded slowly and deliberately with their original plan. The panel stamps a seal of approval on the district court's theory that, because everything happened so fast, the officers' actions were reasonable. I am deeply troubled by an analysis that rewards officers with qualified immunity when they move faster, rather than slower, in circumstances that do not in and of themselves warrant a vertiginous tactical approach. It simply cannot be that where, as here, the facts we must credit demonstrate that the officers alone created urgency and escalated the situation to an approach akin to a raid, without any reasonable justification, those very circumstances entitle the officers to qualified immunity. . . Respectfully, I dissent from the denial of rehearing en banc.")

May v. City of Nahunta, 846 F.3d 1320, 1329-32 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Having determined that Officer Allen is entitled to qualified immunity on the issue of whether the seizure was justified at its inception, we now address whether the manner of the seizure was unreasonable. Because we determine that questions of fact exist with respect to whether the seizure was conducted in an extraordinary manner, unusually harmful to May's privacy interests, . . . we conclude that the district court erred in granting Officer Allen qualified immunity for his conduct during the seizure. . . .Officer Allen arrived at May's home to assist EMTs in responding to a 911 call. Based on the EMTs' statements to Officer Allen, the government interest was the promotion of safety, the elimination of self-harm, and the investigation of mental-health concerns. Balancing the government interest against May's interest in bodily sanctity and personal security, we conclude that Officer Allen's actions exceeded the scope of the underlying justification and that he failed to use reasonable means to rectify the situation. Thus, while Officer Allen had at least arguable probable cause to seize and transport May to the hospital for evaluation, the manner in which he chose to do so was unreasonable, thereby violating May's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . [I]t was clearly inappropriate for a male officer to lock himself in a room with a woman in a state of undress under the circumstances, particularly after she asked him to leave. . . .Our final inquiry concerns whether, under the circumstances, May's right to be free from a seizure in which she was compelled—by threat of deadly force—to disrobe in front of a male police officer, with whom she remained alone in a locked room for twenty minutes, was clearly established on August 3, 2011. We conclude that it was. . . . Applying the obvious clarity test to May's version of the facts, we hold that an objectively reasonable officer would have known to refrain from engaging in degrading and humiliating methods when preparing to transport a person of the opposite gender for a psychological evaluation. Given our prior holding that searches performed in an 'abusive fashion' may violate the Constitution, Evans, 407 F.3d at 1281, an objectively reasonable officer would have known that, under the circumstances, it was unreasonable to use the threat of deadly force to compel a female civilian to disrobe in that manner. Indeed, if established, Officer Allen's conduct is representative of the type of unnecessarily invasive and demeaning intrusion that is undoubtedly within the sphere of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits.")

Bailey v. Wheeler, 843 F.3d 473, 481 n.8, 484-86 (11th Cir. 2016) ("We agree with Wheeler's implicit concession that Bailey alleged sufficient facts to show that he engaged in protected speech when he complained to his chief, and again in his termination appeal, that Douglas County law-enforcement officers were involved in racial profiling and other inappropriate and unconstitutional conduct. The Supreme Court has emphasized that public employees do not forfeit all their First Amendment rights by simple virtue of their public employment. . . Clearly, if officers are systematically violating minority citizens' constitutional rights, that is a matter of public concern. Nor does it matter that Bailey expressed concerns related to law enforcement when he was an officer or that he did so to his chief, instead of publicly. . . Indeed, law-enforcement officers are 'members of a community most likely to have informed and definite opinions' on appropriate law-enforcement conduct. . . For this reason, 'it is essential that they be able to speak out freely on such questions without fear of retaliatory dismissal.'. . Rather, the 'controlling factor' is whether the public employee made his expressions pursuant to his specific job duties. . . If he did not, he engaged in protected speech. Here, nothing in the record demonstrates that one of Bailey's duties as a police officer was to report unconstitutional conduct by not only Police Department officers but also Sheriff's Office deputies. . . .We have said that a plaintiff may show that 'the contours of the right were clearly established in [one of three] ways.'. . First, a plaintiff may identify a materially similar case from relevant precedent. . .When a plaintiff proceeds in this way, we consider 'whether the factual scenario that the official faced is fairly distinguishable from the circumstances facing a government official in a previous case.'. .Second, a plaintiff may rely on a 'broader, clearly established principle [that] should control the novel facts [of the] situation.'. . We have explained that when a plaintiff proceeds in this way, he must show that case law established the principle with 'obvious clarity ... so that every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the official's conduct did violate federal law when the official acted.'. . This category also applies when '[t]he reasoning, though not the holding of prior cases ... send[s] the same message to reasonable officers in novel factual situations.'. . .Finally, a plaintiff may satisfy the 'clearly established' requirement when the defendant's conduct 'lies so obviously at the very core of what the [First Amendment] prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of case law.'. . Similarly, we recognize the obvious-clarity exception where conduct is 'so bad that case law is not needed to establish that the conduct cannot be lawful.'. . Here, the reasoning of Bennett and the broad principle it establishes should have put Wheeler on notice that he could not potentially endanger Bailey's life in retaliation for Bailey's exercise of his First Amendment rights. But even if it did not, we think the conduct alleged in this case is so egregious that Wheeler did not need case law to know what he allegedly did was unlawful. . . .If a law-enforcement officer may not issue $35 in parking tickets or use his position to harass and intimidate individuals in retaliation for exercising their First Amendment rights, a law-enforcement officer certainly may not use his position to potentially seriously endanger a person's life in retaliation for exercising First Amendment rights. We think that is obvious under the case law. But even if it were not, it is certainly obvious, as a general proposition and without reference to case law, that issuing the BOLO Wheeler issued in this case, under the circumstances that existed at the time, allegedly in retaliation for Bailey's speaking up about alleged civil-rights abuses, clearly violated Bailey's First Amendment rights.

Law-enforcement officers are sworn to protect and defend the lives of others. It is completely antithetical to those sworn duties for a law-enforcement officer to use his position to harness the power of an entire county's law-enforcement force to teach a lesson to—and potentially very seriously endanger—someone who had the temerity to speak up about alleged abuses. For these reasons, we agree with the district court's assessment that the operative complaint sufficiently alleges that Wheeler violated Bailey's clearly established constitutional right. So we affirm the district court's denial of Wheeler's motion to dismiss the § 1983 claim. 'Once a government is committed to the principle of silencing the voice of opposition, it has only one way to go, and that is down the path of increasingly repressive measures, until it becomes a source of terror to all its citizens and creates a country where everyone lives in fear.' President Harry S. Truman, Special Message to the Congress on the Internal Security of the United States (Aug. 8, 1950). Our First Amendment demands that a law-enforcement officer may not use his powerful post to chill or punish speech he does not like. If he does so, he may not hide behind the veil of qualified immunity.")

Shuford v. Conway, 666 F. App'x 811, 817 & n.1 (11th Cir. 2016) (per curiam) ("Kingsley's 2015 ruling requiring a pretrial detainee to show that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable, came after the incidents that are the subject of this suit, so it does not govern our 'clearly-established' analysis here. However, since before the time of these incidents, this Circuit applied the same objective factors to Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims as the Supreme Court articulated in Kingsley. . . See Cockrell v. Sparks, 510 F.3d 1307, 1311 (11th Cir. 2007) (per curiam). . . . We agree with what the Seventh Circuit noted on remand in Kingsley—that the Supreme Court's holding only eliminated the requirement that a plaintiff show the official acted with subjective malice, not 'the standard[ ] for the amount of force that can be permissibly employed.' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 832–33 (7th Cir. 2015). '[B]efore and after the Supreme Court's decision in this case, the standards for the amount of force that can be permissibly employed remain the same .... the law clearly established that the amount of force had to be reasonable ....'(emphasis in orginal). . . . And in any event, the Supreme Court reminded us that the central holding of Kingsley— that 'a pretrial detainee can prevail by providing only objective evidence'— had been the law since Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 99 S. Ct. 1861 (1979).")

Shuford v. Conway, 666 F. App'x 811, 817-18 (11th Cir. 2016) (per curiam) ("A plaintiff can show the constitutional right violated was clearly established in three different ways: (1) case law with indistinguishable facts clearly establishing the constitutional right; (2) a broad statement of principle within the Constitution, statute, or case law that clearly establishes a constitutional right; or (3) conduct so egregious that a constitutional right was clearly violated, even in the total absence of case law. . . . These plaintiffs have made their showing by way of the second category. We have long made clear that '[p]rison officials step over the line of constitutionally permissible conduct if they use more force than is reasonably necessary in an existing situation.' Ort v. White, 813 F.2d 318, 325 (11th Cir. 1987). Ort also established that a constitutional violation 'occurs in this context where prison officers continue to employ force or other coercive measures after the necessity for such coercive action has ceased.'. . More recently in 2008, we held that '[w]hen jailers continue to use substantial force against a prisoner who has clearly stopped resisting—whether because he has decided to become compliant, he has been subdued, or he is otherwise incapacitated—that use of force is excessive.' Danley v. Allen, 540 F.3d 1298, 1309 (11th Cir. 2008). . . .Plaintiffs' version of the facts applied to the principles from our longstanding precedent demonstrate a violation of clearly established law sufficient to pass the summary judgment stage. . . Again, the RRT [Rapid Response Team] entered the plaintiffs' cells at a time when they were not resisting or displaying any sort of threatening behavior. Despite the fact that the need for force had completely subsided, the RRT deployed substantial force against the plaintiffs. This violated plaintiffs' constitutional rights under the law clearly established by the Supreme Court and this Circuit at the time. The law therefore gave 'fair warning' to defendants 'that their conduct crossed the line of what is constitutionally permissible.'. . We therefore reverse the district court's finding that the alleged violation was not 'clearly established.'") Jacoby v. Baldwin County, 666 F. App'x 759, 764-66 (11th Cir. 2016) ("The standard we previously used to determine whether a defendant used excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment — which required the plaintiff to show that the defendant applied the force 'maliciously or sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm,' see Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265, 1271 (11th Cir. 2005) — has been abrogated by Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. —, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). In that opinion, the Supreme Court held that 'a pretrial detainee must show only that the force ... used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . As a result, we proceed with the Fourteenth Amendment violation inquiry of the qualified immunity analysis under Kingsley's objective unreasonableness standard. The evidence construed in Jacoby's favor shows that after he was pepper sprayed, his face was rubbed in pepper spray on the floor, washed with water for two to three seconds and then he was left alone in the restraint chair for more than eight hours while still in his pepper-sprayed clothes. During that time he urinated on himself and cried for help because he burned from his pepper-sprayed and urine-soaked clothing. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Jacoby, as we must at this stage, there is a genuine issue of material fact about whether Rowell and Keers' actions were objectively unreasonable and in violation of Jacoby's Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . Rowell and Keers contend that even if there is a question of fact about whether they violated Jacoby's constitutional rights, they are still entitled to qualified immunity because the alleged unlawfulness of their conduct was not clearly established at the time it occurred. While Kingsley's objective unreasonableness standard governs the existence of a constitutional violation, that decision was issued after the restraint chair incident took place, so it plays no part in our determining whether the unlawfulness of Rowell and Keers' conduct was clearly established at the time it occurred. . . Instead, in order to determine whether the clearly established requirement is met in this case, we look to pre-Kingsley case law, which applied the old 'sadistic or malicious' standard for excessive force. Our analysis here is governed by our decision in Danley v. Allen, 540 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2008), overruled on other grounds as recognized in Randall v. Scott, 610 F.3d 701, 709–10 (11th Cir. 2010). In the Danley case, the defendant-officers sprayed the plaintiff with pepper spray for three to five seconds, pushed him into a small, poorly ventilated cell, and closed the door. . . After twenty minutes (ten of which the plaintiff spent begging to be let out), the jailers removed him from the cell, allowed him to take a two minute shower, and then placed him in a larger, but still poorly ventilated, group cell. . . The plaintiff continued to suffer from the pepper spray's effects and eventually 'almost blacked out' from breathing difficulties. . . After at least twelve hours of suffering, the plaintiff was released from the jail. . . This Court held that the officers' use of force against the Danley plaintiff was excessive and in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, noting that '[w]hen jailers continue to use substantial force against a prisoner who has clearly stopped resisting — whether because he has decided to become compliant, he has been subdued, or he is otherwise incapacitated — that use of force is excessive.'. . And when an inmate has stopped resisting 'there is no longer a need for force, so the use of force thereafter is disproportionate to the need.'. . The Danley decision's legal principle that jailers cannot continue to use force against a compliant inmate clearly established the unlawfulness of Rowell and Keers' alleged conduct. . . The facts as they stand at this point in the proceedings are that Rowell and Keers left Jacoby unattended in the restraint chair after pepper-spraying him, rubbing his face in pepper spray on the floor, and providing clearly inadequate decontamination. They left him there for more than eight hours in his pepper-sprayed and urine-soaked clothes with no opportunity for relief. . . Those circumstances create a fact question about whether there was an excessive continuation of the use of force after Jacoby was already subdued or restrained, and our decision in Danley clearly establishes the right to be free from that kind of excessive force. The district court erred in granting summary judgment to Rowell and Keers on Jacoby's excessive force claims against Rowell and Keers.")

McBride v. Houston County Health Care Authority, 658 F. App'x 991, 999-1000 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Next, we must decide whether McBride's constitutional right was clearly established at the time of Johnson's conduct; if not, Johnson is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .There are three ways in which [the plaintiff] may show that the right violated was clearly established: (1) case law with indistinguishable facts clearly establishing the constitutional right; (2) a broad statement of principle within the Constitution, statute, or case law that clearly establishes a constitutional right; or (3) conduct so egregious that a constitutional right was clearly violated, even in the total absence of case law. . . This case falls into the second category: The broad principles of our case law clearly establish the constitutional right violated. [collecting cases] As discussed above, viewing the evidence in McBride's favor, her condition—a headache and sore throat so painful that McBride had been unable to eat or drink for days and a serious rash resulting in the skin on McBride's lips peeling off—along with her screaming for help, indicated the need for medical care which Johnson failed to provide. Reasonable jailers would have been aware that Johnson's conduct as described here violated clearly established constitutional rights. Accordingly, the district court did not err in denying Johnson's motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds.")

Bratt v. Genovese, 660 F. App'x 837, __ (11th Cir. 2016) ("We are . . . not persuaded by George's reliance on Coffin v. Brandau. 642 F.3d 999 (11th Cir. 2011). In Coffin, we considered whether the law was clearly established that Fourth Amendment protection extended to open and attached garages for qualified-immunity purposes. . . Coffin does not address George's problem of whether a warrantless entry into a residence for the purposes of a misdemeanor arrest is authorized by § 901.15(1). But McClish v. Nugent does. 483 F.3d 1231 (11th Cir. 2007). In McClish, we held that arresting someone inside his or her home without a warrant violates the Fourth Amendment even if probable cause exists, when exigent circumstances do not also exist. . . Under McClish, the law had been clearly established at the time of Bratt's arrest, and the district court did not err in denying qualified immunity to George on summary judgment.")

Jacoby v. Baldwin County, 835 F.3d 1338, 1345-46 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Bell effectively creates a two-part test. First, a court must ask whether any 'legitimate goal' was served by the prison conditions. Second, it must ask whether the conditions are 'reasonably related' to that goal. And, to defeat Sheriff Mack's claim of qualified immunity, Mr. Jacoby must point to precedent that would give Sheriff Mack 'fair warning' that these requirements would not be met under the conditions of confinement Mr. Jacoby says he experienced. . . We hold that Mr. Jacoby has failed to make this showing. He has pointed to no caselaw clearly establishing that putting him in a cell with two other inmates was unconstitutional punishment in violation of Bell. To the contrary, in Bell itself the Supreme Court held that 'double-bunking' (placing two inmates in a cell intended for one) does not constitute punishment. . . Neither has Mr. Jacoby pointed to any caselaw clearly establishing that having to sleep on a mattress on the floor violated his constitutional rights. In fact, in Hamm, this Court held that '[t]he fact that [a pretrial detainee] temporarily had to sleep upon a mattress on the floor or on a table is not necessarily a constitutional violation.'. . .Taken in the light most favorable to him, Mr. Jacoby's allegations establish that he was temporarily forced to sleep on a mattress on the floor near the toilet. . . His circumstances are not enough like those described in Chandler, Brooks, and Jordan for those cases to clearly establish that his conditions of confinement were unconstitutional. We therefore affirm the District Court's ruling on Mr. Jacoby's substantive due process claim.")

Carollo v. Boria, 833 F.3d 1322, 1334-35 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Against the backdrop of this Circuit's precedents and the Supreme Court's guidance in Pickering and Garcetti, we conclude that reasonable public officials would have known at the time of Carollo's termination that it violated the First Amendment to terminate a colleague for speaking about matters of public concern that are outside the scope of his ordinary job responsibilities. Carollo has plausibly pled that at least some of his speech was about matters of public concern and outside the scope of his ordinary job responsibilities, and with respect to the remainder of his speech, we are remanding to the district court to permit Carollo to amend his poorly-drafted complaint to cure the defects that we identify. . . The district court therefore did not err in concluding that Carollo's First Amendment right to such speech was clearly established at the time of his termination.")

Bussey-Morice v. Kennedy, 657 F. App'x 909 (11th Cir. 2016) (Bussey II) ("Here, we find that the alleged illegality of Kennedy's actions and the other officers' inactions were not clearly established at the time of the incident. So we do not decide whether a constitutional violation took place. . . .First, we agree with the district court that no decision from the United States Supreme Court, this Court, or the Florida Supreme Court has clearly established that use of pressure-point techniques, use of an officer's knee to hold an individual's head in place, or placing a pillowcase over an individual's head, constitutes excessive force under circumstances sufficiently similar to this case. While Bussey-Morice cites a number of cases in support of her argument to the contrary, none of these cases contain the necessary factual proximity that is required to satisfy the analogue test for whether a right is clearly established. . . .Nor do any of the other cases on which Bussey-Morice relies regarding the established unlawfulness of Kennedy's conduct bear enough factual similarity for us to find for Bussey-Morice under the first test. Consequently, Bussey-Morice had to demonstrate that this case presents one of those rare circumstances in which, as a matter of obvious clarity, Kennedy's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. We find that she cannot. . . . In light of the fact that so many of Kennedy's actions were both measured to the degree of resistance exhibited and authorized as acceptable methods of police practice, we cannot find, that as a matter of obvious clarity, Kennedy violated Bussey's Fourth Amendment rights.")

D.H. by Dawson v. Clayton County Sch. Dist., 830 F.3d 1306, 1318-20 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Simply put, while McDowell's decision to strip search D.H. was justified at its inception, his decision to force D.H. to stand fully nude in front of his peers made the search excessive in scope. There was no exigency that prevented McDowell from asking D.H. to pull his waistband away from his body, from taking D.H. to a private place, or from excusing the other students to an area outside of his office. . . . Because McDowell violated D.H.'s constitutional rights, we next examine whether clearly established law put McDowell on notice that he was doing so. . . .Viewing all reasonable inferences in favor of D.H., we conclude that a reasonable official in McDowell's position would not have believed that requiring D.H. to strip down to his fully naked body in front of several of his peers was lawful in light of the clearly established principle that a student strip search, even if justified in its inception, must be 'reasonably related to the objectives of the search and not excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction.'. . .Accordingly, we affirm the district court's denial of McDowell's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . . Whether D.H. pulled the waistband of his underpants away from his body or completely removed his underpants is a genuine issue of material fact for a jury to decide. If McDowell instructed D.H. to pull down his underpants, and D.H. did so, then McDowell violated a constitutional right under clearly established law and is liable under § 1983. However, if McDowell only instructed D.H. to pull the waistband of his underpants briefly away from his body and did not otherwise indicate to D.H. that he had to strip fully nude, then McDowell did not violate a clearly established constitutional right and is entitled to qualified immunity against D.H.'s § 1983 claim. Because a genuine issue of material fact exists, the district court erred in granting D.H's motion for partial summary judgment as to liability and leaving only damages for trial. . . .Should the jury find that D.H. merely pulled the elastic waistband of his underpants away from his body at McDowell's direction, then McDowell is entitled to qualified immunity. However, should the jury find that D.H. pulled his underpants down to his ankles at McDowell's direction, then McDowell is liable under § 1983 and the jury should also determine damages.")

Ziegler v. Martin County. Sch. Dist., 831 F.3d 1309, 1324-25 (11th Cir. 2016) ("We now hold, when government officials need to conduct breathalyzer or urine tests on students, the testing must be accomplished in a reasonably expeditious time period; once exonerated by the test, the student must be free to go. Like urine testing for drugs, breathalyzer testing for alcohol must be conducted quickly before the alcohol or drugs physiologically dissipate in the student's system. . . .When a student is tested as alcohol or drug free, there is no justification for continuing to detain the student with such definitive exculpatory evidence. We conclude each student from the party bus who tested alcohol free reasonably should have been free to leave without being detained until all the students had been tested. . . . Detaining a student after he or she was found to be alcohol free was not 'reasonably related' to the reason for the detention 'in the first place' of determining if the student passengers on the party bus had been drinking. . . . Clearly, the individual School Defendants, Laws, Iuliucci, Kane, and Officer Brush were acting within the scope of each's respective authority at JBHS in the search of the party bus, which led to the subsequent detention of all the students on the bus for breathalyzer testing for alcohol, the crux of the Students' case. At oral argument, their counsel conceded he did not know of any case directly on point, where students were detained for a breathalyzer or drug test and, although tested alcohol or drug free, had to remain until all students were tested. We have not found such a case either. On the facts of this case, the individual School Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, because there was no binding clearly established law. . . at the time to inform them they had violated the party-bus students' Fourth Amendment rights by continuing to detain them after they were breathalyzed and found to be alcohol free.")

Bowen v. Warden Baldwin State Prison, 826 F.3d 1312, 1324-25 (11th Cir. 2016) ("[T]he administrator alleges that Deputy Warden Underwood and Officer Davis were actually aware of a substantial and seemingly conspicuous risk posed to Mr. Bowen by allowing him to remain in the small cell with Merkerson. . . Even assuming that these defendant officials were unaware of Mr. Bowen's removal request or Merkerson's mother's warning, this lack of awareness does not serve to negate or even to discount the facts they allegedly did know. We conclude, therefore, that the administrator has set forth in his second amended complaint sufficient facts showing that Deputy Warden Underwood and Officer Davis were both 'aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exist[ed], and ... also dr[e]w the inference.'. . Because this was the sole disputed element of his claims against these defendants, dismissal was inappropriate. . . .Deputy Warden Underwood and Officer Davis were therefore on notice in March 2010 that 'the law of this Circuit, as expressed in Cottone, clearly established that the defendants' total failure to investigate—or take any other action to mitigate—the substantial risk of serious harm that [Merkerson] posed to [Mr. Bowen] constituted unconstitutional deliberate indifference to [Mr. Bowen's] Eighth Amendment rights.'. . . These defendants therefore are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings.")

Davila v. Marshall, 649 F. App'x 977, 982 (11th Cir. 2016) ("While a case need not be 'on all fours, with materially identical facts' in order to preclude qualified immunity, it does need to give the officials 'reasonable warning that the conduct at issue violated constitutional rights.'. . Neither City of Hialeah nor Cruz did that. And Davila has not pointed to any other precedent that clearly established that prison officials were required to hand over his Spanish language bible without delay, or that they were compelled to provide him his other four bead necklaces. He has therefore not met his burden of showing that Marshall and Durden were not entitled to qualified immunity. The district court did not err in granting Marshall and Durden summary judgment based on qualified immunity with respect to Davila's First Amendment claim.")

Taylor v. Taylor, 649 F. App'x 737, 746-47 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Here, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Ms. Taylor, Deputy Taylor, during the course of a permissible arrest, grabbed Ms. Taylor without warning, slammed her against a patrol car several feet away, causing her head to hit the car first, and then handcuffed her. Ms. Taylor suffered a spiral fracture in her hand and bruising to her hand, forearm, right upper eyelid, and chest. Although the injury Ms. Taylor suffered was more severe than the injury in Nolin, the amount and type of force used in both cases is similar. Significantly, Ms. Taylor has not responded to Deputy Taylor's assertion that Nolin is on point. And we see nothing in the record to distinguish Nolin. Accordingly, we are constrained to conclude that, under our precedent, the force used to subdue and arrest Ms. Taylor was not excessive. . . [E]ven if we were to conclude that Deputy Taylor used objectively unreasonable, and more than de minimis, force against Ms. Taylor, she still bears the burden of overcoming the defense of qualified immunity by showing that Deputy Taylor had adequate notice that his conduct was unlawful. . . We are unable to conclude that she has. Ms. Taylor has not identified a case with a materially similar factual scenario that supports her position. . . Indeed, Nolin is the case with the most similar facts that we have found, and it is plainly unfavorable to her. Given the similarity of Nolin, Ms. Taylor also cannot show that a broader, clearly established principle applies with 'obvious clarity' to the particular factual situation faced by Deputy Taylor, or that the conduct at issue so obviously violated the Constitution that existing case law is unnecessary. . . As a result, Ms. Taylor has not shown that Deputy Taylor violated a clearly established right.")

Maldonado v. Unnamed Defendant, 648 F.3d 939, 955-56 (11th Cir. 2016) ("The judge did not err in concluding the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity concerning the May 26, 2011, incident. Maldonado is correct the right of prison inmates to be free from retaliation for filing grievances concerning the conditions of their confinement is clearly established. . . But he failed to show that Corporal Kennard had violated that right by pepper-spraying him on May 26, 2011. . . Maldonado contended he was pepper-sprayed in retaliation for attempting to initiate a sexual harassment investigation against another officer. Yet, he testified Corporal Kennard escorted him into his cell after he had refused to obey an order to lock down, and, while inside the cell, 'a few words [were] said,' and that was when Corporal Kennard pepper-sprayed him. . . Consequently, under Maldonado's own version of the facts, it is not clear Corporal Kennard pepper-sprayed Maldonado in retaliation for his attempt to file a grievance or to subdue him and obtain his compliance with the officer's orders. Maldonado therefore did not show no reasonable officer would have taken the same action as Corporal Kennard under the circumstance; consequently, qualified immunity applies. . . In contrast is the December 23, 2010, incident as to entitlement to qualified immunity. Maldonado's account of the event alleges, after placing him in the restraint chair and rendering him defenseless, Officers Ramsey and Maher threatened Maldonado would regret bringing any lawsuits against them, then beat him, broke his finger, and burned him with a lighter. Maldonado acknowledged he was removed from his cell after jamming his cell door in violation of jail rules but contended he did not physically resist the officers, and his injuries were sustained after he was placed in the restraint chair, when officers would have no disciplinary reason for using force against him. Based on this account of the facts, Maldonado showed Officers Ramsey and Maher violated his clearly established rights by retaliating against him for engaging in protected conduct. . . Therefore, the officers were not entitled to summary judgment on this claim, based on qualified immunity; we reverse the district judge's granting summary judgment on this claim.")

Perez v. Suszczynski, 809 F.3d 1213, 1222-23 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Suszczynski was thus on fair notice at the time of the shooting from both the Supreme Court and Eleventh Circuit that the use of deadly force has constitutional limits, and that his use of deadly force would be justified only if a reasonable officer in his position would believe Arango posed an immediate threat of serious physical harm. Under the Estate's version of events, these circumstances did not exist: witnesses for the Estate testified in their depositions that Arango was subdued, unarmed, and not resisting arrest when Suszczynski fatally shot him. In fact, the facts alleged reflect behavior so inherently violative of the Fourth Amendment that it should be obvious to any reasonable officer that this conduct was unlawful. The unprovoked shooting of a compliant individual is 'conduct [that] lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct [should have been] readily apparent to the official.'. . Indeed, this conduct lies 'so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that [Suszczynski] had to know he was violating the Constitution.'. . Even in the absence of the aforementioned precedent, the unlawfulness of Suszczynski's alleged actions would be apparent to any reasonable officer—the deadly force used was 'grossly disproportionate.'. . Accordingly, qualified immunity does not apply.")

Claridy v. Golub, 632 F. App'x 535, 569-70 (11th Cir. 2015) ("Assuming, as the district court did, that Plaintiff was lying face-down on the sidewalk, with his hands behind his back and submitting to arrest, all of the relevant factors suggest that Defendant's second use of the taser against him was unreasonable. The crime for which Plaintiff was being arrested was not serious. . . Plaintiff did not present a threat to Defendant or anyone else as he lay face-down on the sidewalk with his hands behind his back. Finally, according to Plaintiff, he was not resisting and had submitted to arrest when Defendant discharged his taser a second time. We agree with the district court that the use of the taser under these circumstances would violate the Fourth Amendment. . . .In several decisions issued prior to this incident in May 2009, we held that the 'gratuitous use of force when a criminal suspect is not resisting arrest' is unreasonable and violates the Fourth Amendment. . . .These cases gave Defendant fair warning that the second tasing, which allegedly occurred while Plaintiff was lying face-down on the sidewalk, complying with Defendant's instruction to put his hands behind his back, and submitting to arrest for, at most, a minor offense, was unconstitutional. Thus, construing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity on the § 1983 claim.")

Moore v. Pederson, 806 F.3d 1036, 1048-55 (11th Cir. 2015) ("It is true that as of November 15, 2008, when the incident in this case occurred, the law was clearly established in this Circuit that an officer may not conduct a warrantless arrest without both probable cause and either exigent circumstances or consent. . . And here, Pederson had no warrant, and he similarly lacked exigent circumstances and consent. But, as discussed above, none of the cases that stand for the principle that a warrantless arrest may not be conducted in the home without both probable cause and either exigent circumstances or consent involved a Terry stop. When an officer lawfully conducts a Terry stop, Fla. Stat. § 843.02 authorizes the officer to arrest a person who refuses to provide identification in response to requests. . . Neither exigent circumstances nor probable cause is necessary. So Pederson suggests that, had he been correct in thinking that he could execute a valid Terry stop in the home, he would not have needed either exigent circumstances or consent to effect the arrest of Moore, even though he had to reach into Moore's home. . . . We need not determine whether Pederson's theory on this particular issue is correct because, in any case, we cannot find that, at the time of the events in this matter, the law was clearly established with respect to the bounds of consent to enter the home for the purpose of effecting an arrest. We recognize, of course, the clearly established general proposition that consent is not freely and voluntarily given when a person merely acquiesces to a claim of lawful authority. . . But '[o]bvious clarity cases' are 'rare.'. . To rely on that "narrow exception," we must find that the officer's acts were 'so egregious that preexisting, fact-specific precedent was not necessary to give clear warning to every reasonable ... officer that what the defendant officer was doing must be "unreasonable" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.'. . Here, we cannot do that. . . .[U]nder McClish, a reasonable officer would not be on clear notice before today that Moore's actions did not constitute the type of 'surrender' that can qualify as consent for the purpose of entering a home to effect an arrest. . . . [B]efore today, a reasonable officer could have understood Moore's actions in turning around and presenting his hands in response to the officer's instructions as surrender, and consequently, as consent under McClish. . . . To be clear, for the reasons we have already described, we strongly reject any suggestion that a person 'surrenders' and therefore 'consents' to arrest in his home simply because he recognizes the officer's authority or 'submit[s] to' or 'acquiesce[s]' in the arresting officer's commands or because he does not close the door of his home in response to an officer's announcement that he is under arrest. Today we clearly establish as the law of this Circuit that merely following an officer's commands—without any separate affirmative act or speech demonstrating voluntary and free consent—does not constitute 'surrender' and therefore consent to an officer's entry into the home to effect the arrest. Nor does failure to close the door. But we have 'emphasized that fair and clear notice to government officials is the cornerstone of qualified immunity.'. . And in light of McClish and Berkowitz, we cannot say that, as of November 15, 2008, Pederson had 'fair and clear notice' that a person does not 'surrender' and therefore consent to entry of his home for purposes of effecting an arrest, by 'acquiesc[ing]' in or 'submit[ting] to' the arresting officer's announcement that he is under arrest and by turning around and presenting hands for cuffing in response to instructions to do just that (and not closing the door of his home instead). As a result, qualified immunity shields Pederson from liability for his wrongful entry into Moore's home to arrest him. . . .Because the law was not clearly established until today that Pederson lacked probable cause to arrest Moore since he could not conduct a Terry-like stop in the home absent exigent circumstances, and further, because the law was not clearly established until today that Moore's actions in acquiescing to Pederson's instructions did not amount to consent to enter the home, the district court properly granted Pederson qualified immunity. . . .Home may be where the heart is, . . . but it cannot be where the government is—at least for purposes of conducting a Terry-like stop, in the absence of exigent circumstances. Today we clearly establish this as the law in this Circuit. But since the law was not clearly established on this point when Pederson engaged in the Terry-like stop of Moore while Moore was in his home, the district court did not err when it granted qualified immunity to Pederson on this issue. The district court likewise did not err in granting qualified immunity to Pederson regarding his arrest of Moore while Moore was in his home. The law was not clearly established at the time of the arrest that Moore's compliance with Pederson's demands that he turn around and present his hands for cuffing did not constitute consent.")

Moore v. Pederson, 806 F.3d 1036, 1055-58 & n.5 (11th Cir. 2015) (Proctor, District Judge, concurring) ("Let me be very clear. I agree that Pederson could not have lawfully executed a Terry stop in this case, at least while Moore was inside his home. Likewise, I agree that Moore, standing inside his home, was free to decide not to answer the Deputy's questions. . . Finally, I also agree that it was unlawful for Pederson to have arrested Moore. But that is not all this case involves. . . . On this unique set of facts, the primary question for us to consider is whether a reasonable officer would understand that reaching across the threshold to arrest Moore in the course of what Pederson erroneously believed to be a Terry stop violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . .It is unreasonable to expect a police officer to synthesize cases and extract from them purely legal principles untethered to the facts with which he is confronted. . . But that is exactly the standard to which the dissent holds Pederson. In my view, the two cases relied upon by the dissent on the issue of the warrantless arrest are not sufficiently similar to this case to put Pederson on notice that he was violating clearly established law. . . .It should not be lost on us that the three judges on this panel have differing views of how the qualified immunity calculus should play out under these facts. If three judges, reviewing a grant of qualified immunity in the district court, have approached this question so differently, what chance did Pederson have (as he stood outside Moore's door that night) to determine that clearly established law precluded Moore's arrest? . . . . Indeed, in fairness, we should expect law enforcement officers to know less about the law than judges. Deputy Pederson was not plainly incompetent and did not knowingly violate the law. He is entitled to qualified immunity in this case.")

Moore v. Pederson, 806 F.3d 1036, 1059-62 (11th Cir. 2015) (Martin, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part) ("I believe that the cases the Majority relies on to identify a Fourth Amendment violation clearly established it. The distinctions the Majority attempts to draw between our Circuit precedent and Mr. Moore's case are, in my view, foreclosed by our precedent or require us to find facts favorable to the officer seeking a judgment in his favor, which we are not permitted to do. . . . McClish draws a clear line: police may not reach through the doorway of a home to execute a warrantless arrest. Deputy Pederson crossed this line when he reached into Mr. Moore's home to arrest him. . . . The question of whether an arresting officer can infer implied consent to enter a home to make an arrest was not left open by McClish. It was expressly answered in the negative. . . . The Majority is right to point out that we must determine whether a constitutional rule is clearly established 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . But the rule that an officer may not infer consent to reach into a home to execute an arrest is not a broad general proposition. . . . McClish held that reaching into a suspect's home to arrest him is an unlawful physical intrusion. As in McClish, Deputy Pederson here 'violated [Mr. Moore]'s Fourth Amendment rights by reaching through [Mr. Moore]'s open doorway to effect the arrest when [Mr. Moore] was standing near the doorway but fully within the confines of his home.'. . .The Majority holds that 'the law was not clearly established until today that Moore's actions in acquiescing to Pederson's instructions did not amount to consent.'. . For the reasons I have set out above, I believe our consent precedent clearly foreclosed the distinction the Majority makes here. But even if implied consent were a basis for extending qualified immunity to Deputy Pederson, this distinction is irrelevant unless we also assume the fact that Deputy Pederson could have inferred consent from Mr. Moore's reaction to his commands. . . .Construing the evidence in Mr. Moore's favor, as we must, there is no basis for finding 'both the existence of consent and that the consent was not a function of acquiescence to a claim of lawful authority but rather was given freely and voluntarily.'. . When it decides this case based on what an objectively reasonable officer might have inferred from Mr. Moore's conduct, the Majority neglects the requirement that '[t]he evidence of the non-movant is to be believed' and that 'all justifiable inferences ... be drawn in his favor.'. . So even if I accepted, as the Majority does, that qualified immunity for Deputy Pederson turned on whether an officer could have objectively inferred consent, his version of the facts as the non-movant would require sending Mr. Moore's case back for a trial.For both of these reasons, I respectfully dissent from the opinion of the Majority.") Brooks v. Warden, 800 F.3d 1295, 1303-04, 1306-07 (11th Cir. 2015) ("Brooks alleges that Powell refused to allow Brooks to lower the waist-chains that bound him so that he could use the toilet while in the hospital. As a result, Brooks was forced to defecate into his jumpsuit and sit in his own feces for two days during his three-day hospital stay. Brooks also alleges that Powell refused to allow the nurses to clean Brooks or offer him an adult diaper, and that Powell and the other guards laughed at Brooks and mocked him throughout the ordeal. These serious allegations state an Eighth Amendment violation under our caselaw. . . .Indeed, every sister circuit (except the Federal Circuit) has recognized that the deprivation of basic sanitary conditions can constitute an Eighth Amendment violation. . . .Having determined that Powell's alleged conduct violated the Eighth Amendment, we turn to whether the Eighth Amendment right at issue 'was clearly established such that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . . The district court found 'no clearly established law' warned Powell that his alleged actions constituted an Eighth Amendment violation. But both Baird and Novak (neither mentioned by the district court) should have been sufficient to put Powell on notice. Baird recognized that Eighth Amendment violations can arise from 'conditions lacking basic sanitation,' including inadequate provision of hygiene items such as toilet paper. .. Novak noted that 'deprivation of basic elements of hygiene' was a 'common thread' running through prison conditions cases, including several involving proximity to human waste. . . It's true that neither case involved the precise circumstances at issue here. . . . . Baird and Novak, together, would have provided 'fair and clear warning' that Brooks's alleged treatment would violate the Eighth Amendment. . .What's more, a reasonable official should not have needed Baird or Novak to know that Powell's alleged actions violated Brooks's Eighth Amendment rights. This is the 'rare case[ ] of "obvious clarity,"'. . . in which 'conduct is so egregious that no prior case law is needed to put a reasonable officer on notice of its unconstitutionality[.]'. . Forcing a prisoner to soil himself over a two-day period while chained in a hospital bed creates an obvious health risk and is an affront to human dignity. Laughing at and ridiculing an inmate who is forced to sit in his own feces for an extended period of time is not merely unreasonable, but an act of 'obvious cruelty.'. . Any reasonable officer should have known that such conduct was at war with the command of the Eighth Amendment. Although qualified immunity is a 'muscular doctrine,' it cannot save Powell here.")

Hill v. Cundiff, 797 F.3d 948, 979 (11th Cir. 2015) ("The district court also erred in granting summary judgment to Assistant Principal Dunaway on Doe's § 1983 equal protection claim. The district court found Dunaway was entitled to qualified immunity because it could not identify sufficiently similar case law involving a sexual harassment sting operation. This was error. Drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Doe, Dunaway acquiesced to and ratified Teacher's Aide Simpson's plan to send Doe alone into a bathroom with a known sexual harasser and have Doe pretend to initially welcome the harasser's sexual advances. It is not surprising the district court could not find similar case law. That is because 'every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances' would know this irresponsible plan violated the Equal Protection Clause. . . We therefore reverse.")

Watkins v. U.S. Postal Employee, 611 F.3d 549, 553(11th Cir. 2015) (per curiam) ("Watkins has made no supportable allegations that any constitutional right to sing in the lobby of a post office was clearly established at the time of the incident. Instead, Watkins's refusal to stop singing may be fairly classified as disruptive. According to his complaint, Watkins was singing while in the service line and while White was attempting to assist him. Refusing service to a disruptive customer does not violate any clearly established and obvious federal law; nor were White's actions so clearly violative of the Constitution that White had to know that her response was impermissible regardless of prior case law. . . Thus, as an independent and additional basis for affirming the district court, we find that White was protected by qualified immunity and appropriately dismissed as a defendant. . .There is no support for the assertion that Watkins had a First Amendment right to sing any sort of song in the post office lobby while standing in the service line. . . In sum, while singing in the rain may result in a glorious feeling, singing in the post office is not a constitutional right. We affirm the district court.")

Valderrama v. Rousseau, 780 F.3d 1108, 1122-23 (11th Cir. 2015) ("In Gee we recognized that a brief delay in the treatment of apparently mild injuries does not constitute deliberate indifference. . . The facts of this case are fundamentally different from the facts in Gee. Here, there is evidence that Mr. Valderrama's injuries were life-threatening, that Detective Rousseau and Sergeant Smith subjectively knew that he needed medical treatment, and that the delay at issue was two to five times longer than the delay in Gee. Given these differences, Gee does not control or foreclose us from concluding it was clearly established that Sergeant Smith and Detective Rousseau acted with deliberate indifference. Additionally, were the jury to find that Sergeant Smith delayed seeking care and lied about Mr. Valderrama's injuries so that she and Detective Rousseau could craft a story to justify the shooting, then our prior case law clearly establishes that delay caused for this reason constitutes deliberate indifference. We have explained that when officials 'ignore without explanation a[n arrestee's] serious condition that is known or obvious to them, the trier of fact may infer deliberate indifference.'. . Here, the officers did more than 'ignore without explanation' a serious medical need—they acted with apparent self-interest, and one lied about the nature of Mr. Valderrama's life-threatening injuries. Any reasonable officer in the same circumstances and possessing the same knowledge would have known that police officers cannot seek to protect themselves from the potential legal and professional ramifications of injuries inflicted by one of the officers while an arrestee bleeds through his clothing from a gunshot wound. . . .In conclusion, Mr. Valderrama has presented facts from which a jury could find that Sergeant Smith and Detective Rousseau acted with deliberate indifference. Moreover, it is clearly established law that the officers' conduct constituted deliberate indifference. We thus agree with the district court that Sergeant Smith and Detective Rousseau are not entitled to qualified immunity from Mr. Valderrama's deliberate indifference claims and affirm the district court's decision.")

Berry v. Leslie, 767 F.3d 1144, 1147, 1150, 1152, 1154, 1160, 1161 (11th Cir. 2014) ("We first held nineteen years ago that conducting a run-of-the-mill administrative inspection as though it is a criminal raid, when no indication exists that safety will be threatened by the inspection, violates clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. See Swint v. City of Wadley, 51 F.3d 988 (11th Cir.1995). We reaffirmed that principle in 2007 when we held that other deputies of the very same Orange County Sheriff's Office who participated in a similar warrantless criminal raid under the guise of executing an administrative inspection were not entitled to qualified immunity. See Bruce v. Beary, 498 F.3d 1232 (11th Cir.2007). Today, we repeat that same message once again. We hope that the third time will be the charm. . . .The sole question that we address on this appeal is whether the district court correctly concluded that Vidler and Leslie are not entitled to qualified immunity on summary judgment. . . .[T]he plaintiffs contend that the search of Strictly Skillz, which they allege was undertaken with an inordinate display of force, failed to conform to the Fourth Amendment's requirement for reasonableness. Because we have twice held, on facts disturbingly similar to those presented here, that a criminal raid executed under the guise of an administrative inspection is constitutionally unreasonable, we agree. . . .Because the facts of this case—when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs—adequately establish that the 'inspection' of Strictly Skillz amounted to an unconstitutional search and that the unconstitutionality of such a search was clearly established at the time that the search was executed, the plaintiffs have met their burden, and the district court properly determined that qualified immunity is inappropriate at this juncture. . . .Where, as alleged here, officers participate in a search that was clearly established to be illegal from its inception, they are simply not entitled to qualified immunity any more than an officer who enters and searches a person's home without a warrant or an applicable warrant exception. This is not a case where a group of officers entered a location to execute a validly obtained search warrant, and, without the approval of the other officers participating in the authorized search, one or two officers went off on an unconstitutional frolic of their own. Here, the entire search itself was unlawful from the beginning, and Vidler and Leslie, who fully participated in it, could reasonably be found to have violated the rights of all of the barbers searched and all of the barbers with a Fourth Amendment interest in Strictly Skillz's space, regardless of what each officer did one on one to each particular plaintiff barber. Each officer's discrete actions in what was clearly an unlawful search from the outset are not the focus of our inquiry here. Rather, the conduct under scrutiny is the officers' core participation in the warrantless search itself. . . Vidler and Leslie were not alleged to have engaged in segregable conduct outside of the clearly unlawful search that was otherwise occurring while they happened to be present and engaging in lawful activity. Instead, Vidler and Leslie were entrenched participants in the warrantless search, which, from the start, violated the Fourth Amendment. It has long been clearly established that a warrantless administrative inspection must be narrowly tailored to the administrative need that justifies it. Here—where the authorized purpose of the inspection was simply to check for barbering licenses and sanitation violations, and there is no indication that the defendants had any reason to believe that the inspection would be met with violence—the manner in which the supposed inspection of Strictly Skillz was undertaken was unreasonable from its inception and was, in fact, a search. Our cases and those of the Supreme Court have long and repeatedly put officers on notice of these facts.")

Calderin v. Miami-Dade Police Dep't, 600 F. App'x 691, 695-96 (11th Cir. 2015) ("W]hether Calderin was resisting or evading arrest also fits nicely into the analysis contained in Mercado. In Mercado, as is the case here, the plaintiff failed to comply with instructions from the officers. . . In some ways, failing to comply with officer instructions may be considered resisting arrest or at least akin to it. Nonetheless, we held that the plaintiff 'was not actively resisting arrest' and noted the fact that he did not struggle with the officers. . . Similarly, here, we cannot say that Calderin was resisting arrest, even though he was not complying with officer instructions. With two of the governmental interest factors weighing heavily against Officer Schottenheimer and another barely, if at all, weighing in his favor, the balance between the intrusion and the governmental interest tips the scale against Officer Schottenheimer. His initial firing of his weapon was an unreasonable use of force under the circumstances. The same can be said of the subsequent shots fired during Calderin's flight because, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Calderin, Officer Schottenheimer knew that Calderin was unarmed after the first shot and did not pose a threat of immediate harm to others. . . Therefore, Officer Schottenheimer violated Calderin's constitutional right to be free from unreasonable seizures. . . We must now determine whether the right Officer Schottenheimer violated was clearly established. A right is clearly established where there exists 'a materially similar case that has already decided that what the police officer was doing was unlawful.'. . We have already discussed Mercado, which we decided approximately six years before the shooting here. The facts of that case were sufficiently similar to put Officer Schottenheimer on notice that his conduct would violate Calderin's constitutional right. In fact, Mercado is nearly indistinguishable on the material facts. Calderin's right, then, was clearly established when Officer Schottenheimer violated it.")

Berry v. Leslie, 767 F.3d 1144, 1164 (11th Cir. 2014) (Pryor, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I part ways with the majority because it conflates two distinct questions: whether a search violates clearly established law, and who can sue whom on the basis of that violation. The majority relies on Swint's conclusion that the officers in Swint knew the planned raid violated 'clearly established Fourth Amendment rights,' to draw the unrelated conclusion that mere participation in such a raid is enough to expose any officer to liability to any plaintiff. . . But the central issue in Swint was whether the officers would have been on notice that the raid violated clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. The answer to that question does not establish whose Fourth Amendment rights they violated. Perhaps for that reason, neither the district court in its order nor the barbers in their brief even cite to Swint at all. That is, the decision that the majority cites as clearly establishing what these individual officers should have known was never even mentioned by either the learned district judge or the plaintiffs' own counsel. Because Durant, Trammon, and Anderson failed to prove a causal link between Deputy Leslie's conduct and their constitutional deprivations, I respectfully concur in part and dissent in part. I would reverse the denial of summary judgment for the claims brought by Anderson, Durant, and Trammon against Leslie and render partial summary judgment in his favor.")

Brannon v. Finkelstein, 754 F.3d 1269, 1278, 1279 (11th Cir. 2014) ("In the context of a First Amendment retaliation claim, we have recognized that a defendant 'will only rarely be on notice that his actions are unlawful' because applying the Pickering balancing 'involves legal determinations that are intensely fact-specific and do not lend themselves to clear, bright-line rules.' Maggio v. Sipple, 211 F.3d 1346, 1354 (11th Cir.2000) (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted). Likewise, in determining contested issues of causation, the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity '[w]here the facts assumed for summary judgment purposes ... show mixed motives (lawful and unlawful motivations) and pre-existing law does not dictate that the merits of the case must be decided in plaintiff's favor.' Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1535 (11th Cir.1996). As we have noted earlier, when Brannon's work was reduced following his testimony at the Aleman hearing, the Public Defender's office simultaneously drastically reduced its overall budget for hiring expert witnesses like Brannon. The evidence also suggests that while Brannon's referrals dropped in absolute terms, his proportional share of the Public Defender's office's work remained constant. And it is not disputed that, when Finkelstein removed Brannon from the wheel rotation system, Brannon had recently and publicly expressed his ill-will towards the Public Defender's office. Brannon was thus susceptible to cross-examination on the subject whenever he testified on a Public Defender's client's behalf, which in turn could compromise the effectiveness of his testimony. Under the specific facts and circumstances of this case, in which there exists evidence of both lawful and unlawful motivations for Finkelstein's actions, 'pre-existing law does not dictate that the merits of the case must be decided in [Brannon's] favor.' Id. Thus Finkelstein is entitled to qualified immunity in his individual capacity on the retaliation claim.")

Gennusa v. Canova, 748 F.3d 1103, 1113, 1114 (11th Cir. 2014) ("It has long been clear that the electronic interception of oral conversations constitutes a search under the Fourth Amendment. . .

It has also long been clear that in ordinary criminal cases the warrantless interception of private phone calls violates the Fourth Amendment because it infringes the reasonable expectation of privacy of the conversants. . . And, finally, it has long been clear that even in sensitive cases involving domestic threats to national security law enforcement officials need a warrant before electronically intercepting private communications. . . The cases establishing these principles—Berger, Katz, U.S. District Court, and Mitchell—and their reasoning, see Hope, 536 U.S. at 743, made it obvious and apparent to any reasonable law enforcement official in June of 2009 that the Fourth Amendment requires that a warrant be secured before non-custodial privileged communications between attorneys and their clients—communications which are normally entitled to be kept confidential as a matter of law—can be electronically monitored, intercepted, or recorded. That the attorney-client conversations here took place inside an interview room at a sheriff's office does not mean that Det. Marmo and Sgt. Canova lacked clear notice that their warrantless electronic surveillance was illegal. As the Supreme Court has explained, '[o]fficials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances," as long as the "state of the law [at the relevant time] gave [them] fair notice that their [actions] w[ere] unconstitutional,'. . . and that is the case here. Although locale can matter, . . . it is not dispositive. . . . Here Mr. Studivant had not been arrested, and his liberty had not been curtailed in any way. His status therefore did not result in a diminished expectation of privacy. . . . The district court therefore correctly held that Det. Marmo and Sgt. Canova were not entitled to qualified immunity for their warrantless monitoring and recording of the privileged attorney-client conversations between Mr. Studivant and Ms. Gennusa.")

Caldwell v. Warden, FCI Talladega, 748 F.3d 1090, 1100-03 (11th Cir. 2014) ("[A]t this summary judgment juncture, the defendants do not dispute the objective component of the second element of Caldwell's claim. That is, the defendants do not dispute that—if they had actual, subjective knowledge that Caldwell faced a substantial risk of serious harm from inmate Pinson—their alleged failure to make any attempt, or take any action, to minimize that risk and their returning Caldwell, almost immediately, back into the locked cell with inmate Pinson was objectively unreasonable. Nor do the defendants dispute that—if they had such subjective knowledge of the risk that Caldwell faced—the third element—causation—is satisfied. Stated more simply, the only part of plaintiff Caldwell's deliberate indifference claim that the defendants contest is the subjective component of the second element: whether there is sufficient evidence from which a jury could find that the defendants actually (subjectively) knew that Caldwell faced a substantial risk of serious harm from inmate Pinson. . . .A reasonable jury could infer from these facts that the defendants actually knew that Caldwell faced a substantial risk of serious harm from inmate Pinson. . . . [A] jury need not infer that the defendants intended that inmate Pinson harm Caldwell or that they actually believed that inmate Pinson would harm Caldwell. It is enough that a jury be able to infer from the evidence that the defendants actually knew of a substantial risk that inmate Pinson would seriously harm Caldwell. . . .Because the record contains sufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury could find the subjective element of Caldwell's Eighth Amendment failure-to-protect claim, the district court erred in granting the defendants' motion for summary judgment on that basis. . . .The only remaining issue relevant to the defendants' qualified immunity defense is whether, by September 9, 2009, preexisting law clearly established that the defendants' conduct violated the Eighth Amendment. . . .Prior to the conduct in this case, this Court already clarified that a prison guard violates a prisoner's Eighth Amendment right when that guard actually (objectively and subjectively) knows that one prisoner poses a substantial risk of serious harm to another, yet fails to take any action to investigate, mitigate, or monitor that substantial risk of serious harm. . . .Here, similar to the case in Cottone, there was a known, violent inmate (Pinson) who was housed in a separate unit for violent and disruptive inmates and who had already threatened his cellmate's (Caldwell's) safety through the intentional and dangerous act of setting their shared, locked cell on fire. And, almost immediately after Caldwell was rescued from that fiery cell, Caldwell specifically told the defendants that he feared that his life was in danger if he was returned to the locked cell with inmate Pinson. Armed with actual, subjective knowledge of inmate Pinson's prior violence before coming to the SMU, inmate Pinson's recent violence against plaintiff Caldwell, and Caldwell's reported fear of being placed in a small, locked cell with inmate Pinson again, the defendants—like the defendants in Cottone—took no action. . . . When viewed in plaintiff Caldwell's favor, the facts show that, shortly after extinguishing a sizeable cell fire, the defendants simply locked Caldwell back in the cell with inmate Pinson and walked away. By the time of the fire and assault in September 2009, the law of this Circuit, as expressed in Cottone, clearly established that the defendants' total failure to investigate—or take any other action to mitigate—the substantial risk of serious harm that inmate Pinson posed to plaintiff Caldwell constituted unconstitutional deliberate indifference to Caldwell's Eighth Amendment rights. Thus, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity at this summary judgment stage. We have not forgotten that the facts and reasonable inferences set forth and analyzed in this opinion are presented in the light most favorable to plaintiff Caldwell. We are aware that Caldwell may not be able to prove such facts to the satisfaction of the jury and that the jury may elect not to draw inferences from the circumstantial evidence in Caldwell's favor. Nevertheless, at this summary judgment stage, and given plaintiff Caldwell's version of the events, the defendants have not shown that they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Kothmann v. Rosario, 558 F. App'x 907, 912 (11th Cir. 2014) ("As discussed above, by 1986, it was well settled in this Circuit that intentionally refusing to provide medically necessary treatment constitutes deliberate indifference and violates the Eighth Amendment. . . As also discussed, we accept as true the complaint's allegations that Rosario knew hormone treatment to be the accepted, medically necessary treatment for Kothmann's GID. Thus, at the time of Kothmann's incarceration in 2010, the state of the law was sufficiently clear to put Rosario on notice that refusing to provide Kothmann with what she knew to be medically necessary hormone treatments was a violation of the Eighth Amendment.")

Gilmore v. Hodges, 738 F.3d 266, 277-81 (11th Cir. 2013) ("A constitutional violation may be clearly established either by similar prior precedent, or in rare cases of 'obvious clarity.' With either method, the touchstone is whether the right would be apparent to a reasonable officer. Under the first approach, we look only to binding precedent—holdings of cases drawn from the United States Supreme Court, this Court, or the highest court of the state where the events took place. . .

.The Plaintiffs claim that the officers had fair notice that failing to provide Weinberg with hearing aid batteries was unconstitutional, because precedents from this Court have held that the deprivation of a medical device necessary to remedy a serious medical condition violates the Constitution. See Farrow, 320 F.3d at 1246–48 (dentures); Newman, 503 F.2d at 1331 (eyeglasses and prostheses). The problem with the Plaintiffs' position is that it is stated far too generally and at a very high order of abstraction. The qualified immunity inquiry 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . An official's awareness of an abstract right 'does not equate to knowledge that his conduct' may infringe that right. . . Hearing loss that can be remedied with a hearing aid has never previously been held to be a serious medical need by the Supreme Court, this Court, or the Florida Supreme Court. . . .Though we now hold that significant and substantial hearing loss that can be remedied by a hearing aid is a serious medical need, our preexisting case law did not provide Defendants with fair warning that their actions violated Weinberg's constitutional rights. While vision and hearing impairments each can cause substantial harm, the nature of those harms and the capacity to discern them may not be the same. A finding that vision impairment may give rise to a serious medical need does not lead ineluctably to the same answer for hearing loss. . . .[W]ithout any prior binding case law classifying hearing loss that can be remedied with a hearing aid as a serious medical need, we cannot say that the state of the law put Hodges and Newsome on fair notice that their failure to provide Weinberg with hearing aid batteries was unlawful. Nor is this a case where the officers' conduct 'so obviously violates the constitution that prior case law is unnecessary.'. . Obvious clarity cases are 'rare,'. . . and present a 'narrow exception' to the general rule of qualified immunity. . . . These obvious clarity cases take two forms. First, a broad statement of legal principle announced in case law may be sufficient if it establishes the law ' "with obvious clarity" to the point that every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the official's conduct did violate federal law when the official acted.'. . Alternatively, obvious clarity is recognized if the conduct is 'so bad that case law is not needed to establish that the conduct cannot be lawful.'. . Plaintiffs do not point to any general principle announced in Eleventh Circuit, U.S. Supreme Court, or Florida Supreme Court case law that clearly applies to the failure to provide hearing aid batteries. (Nor indeed has any circuit court of appeals ever held in a published opinion that substantial hearing loss amounts to a serious medical need for purposes of deliberate indifference qualified immunity analysis.) While this Court recognized a violation when inmates were deprived of dentures in Farrow and eyeglasses and prostheses in Newman, these cases stopped short of stating a general principle applicable to all medical devices, including hearing aids. The first obvious clarity exception does not apply. Equally inapplicable here, the second obvious clarity exception is relevant only when conduct is so egregious that no prior case law is needed to put a reasonable officer on notice of its unconstitutionality. . . . We hold that a pretrial detainee who suffers from substantial hearing loss that may be remediated by a hearing aid may state a claim for deliberate indifference to a serious medical need under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment if an officer on notice intentionally ignores the untreated condition. Not all hearing loss is a serious medical need, not all hearing loss creates a substantial risk of harm, not all hearing loss can be remediated by a hearing aid, and not all officials will know of an inmate's condition or its extent. However, accepting Defendants' concessions, Weinberg sufficiently established at the summary judgment stage that his substantial hearing loss was a serious medical need, and that Hodges and Newsome were aware of his condition and refused to provide him with the hearing aid batteries he needed to be able to hear. Thus, put differently, Weinberg's account would have been enough to take that issue to a jury. But in the absence of any clearly established law on the matter, the officers were nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity, and the judgment of the district court is therefore AFFIRMED.")

Wilkerson v. Seymour, 736 F.3d 974, 978-80 (11th Cir. 2013) ("Obviously, probable cause and arguable probable cause may differ, but it is tautological that a constitutional arrest must be based on a reasonable belief that a crime has occurred, rather than simply unwanted conduct. . . . Although qualified immunity protects officers who are reasonably mistaken that a crime has been committed, it does not insulate officers from liability for arrests where it is clear that the conduct in question does not rise to the level of a crime, under the facts known at the time. . . To hold otherwise would eviscerate the concept of probable cause and would permit officers to arrest disagreeable individuals who may be exercising their constitutionally protected rights to free speech, albeit in a loud manner. Officers need not have actual probable cause to make an arrest, and an arrest may be for a different crime from the one for which probable cause actually exists, . . . but arguable probable cause to arrest for some offense must exist in order for officers to assert qualified immunity from suit. . . . Jones did not preclude all failure to intervene claims against a present, but non-arresting, officer in false arrest cases. Although not made explicit in Jones, we based our different holdings as to the non-arresting officer on both the degree of participation in the arrest and the amount of information available to the non-arresting officer, because a non-arresting officer does not have a duty to investigate the basis of another officer's arrest. . . Additionally, with respect to the second aspect of the claim, we rejected the argument that one officer 'is somehow charged with presuming that [the arresting officer] must have put the alleged false confession in the arrest affidavit' or that he 'was required to undertake an investigation of the arrest affidavit to determine what [the arresting officer] was doing and what [he] put in the arrest affidavit to continue Jones's detention.'. . What is made explicit in Jones is that a participant in an arrest, even if not the arresting officer, may be liable if he knew the arrest lacked any constitutional basis and yet participated in some way. . . . These facts are therefore substantially different from those in Jones where the non-arresting officer participated in the transportation, arrest, and report, while fully aware, based on his personal observations, that the basis for the arrest was fabricated. . . As Sergeant Parker was permitted to rely upon the account of Officer Seymour, which did not raise any obvious concerns as to the existence of probable cause, he is entitled to qualified immunity from Wilkerson's false arrest claim. There is no constitutional requirement for a supervising officer to complete a full on-scene investigation of the basis for an arrest for conduct he did not observe. Accordingly, the district court's denial of his motion for summary judgment was in error.")

Leslie v. Hancock County Bd. of Educ., 720 F.3d 1338, 1349 (11th Cir. 2013) ("No clearly established law bars the termination of a policymaking or confidential employee for speaking about policy. The correct application of the Pickering balance to a policymaking or confidential employee who speaks about policy is not established with [such] obvious clarity by the case law [ ] that every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the official's conduct did violate federal law when the official acted. . . The members of the Board are entitled to qualified immunity in their individual capacities if Leslie and Richardson were policymaking employees who spoke about policy.")

Cooper v. Rutherford, 503 F. App'x 672, 674-77 (11th Cir. 2012) (per curiam) ("With regard to both the unreasonable seizure claim and the substantive due process claim, . . . our analysis begins and ends with the clearly established prong. Assuming, without deciding, that Officer Black committed a constitutional violation, Appellees have not demonstrated that Black's conduct violated clearly established law. . . Appellees have not provided us with any cases suggesting that Black's alleged conduct violated the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendments. Therefore, Appellees have not carried their burden of showing that the alleged constitutional violations were clearly established under prevailing United States Supreme Court, Florida Supreme Court, or Eleventh Circuit law. . . . Regarding the Fourth Amendment unreasonable seizure claim, Appellees point to two cases, Brendlin v. California . . . and Vaughan v. Cox, . . . that they believe clearly establish that the events on March 26, 2010, amount to a seizure for the purposes of the Fourth Amendment. However, the facts underpinning those cases are not materially similar to the case at bar and neither clearly establishes that a Fourth Amendment seizure occurred. In Brendlin, the Supreme Court merely held that when officers stop a car during a routine traffic stop, the driver and passengers alike are seized. . . .The Supreme Court never mentioned the use of deadly force, hostages, innocent bystanders, or any other facts that are remotely similar to the case at bar. Therefore, even if the Supreme Court intended Brendlin to apply to the events that took place in this case, it could not have provided Officer Black with fair notice that a seizure was taking place and thus cannot be used to satisfy the requirement that the law be clearly established. . . . Meanwhile, this court in Vaughan certainly clearly established that if a passenger-suspect is shot by a bullet intended to stop his fleeing during a chase with police officers, then he is seized for purposes of Fourth Amendment analysis. . . However, this court just as clearly acknowledged the difference between the events in Vaughan and the exact situation in this case—when an innocent bystander or hostage is accidentally shot by police officers chasing a fleeing suspect. . . Therefore, preexisting case law does not clearly establish that Appellees were seized when Officer Black's bullet accidentally struck them during the confrontation with the armed bank robber. Nor is this a case involving an instance in which 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law ... appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question[.]'. . The existing case law regarding whether Appellees were seized for the purposes of the Fourth Amendment is far from settled, as evidenced by the varying decisions from our sister circuits analyzing similar situations. [citing cases] Moreover, even if we determine that it is clearly established that Appellees were seized for the purposes of the Fourth Amendment, we are unaware of any case that clearly establishes that Officer Black's actions were constitutionally unreasonable. The district court determined that the other officers who fired their weapons acted reasonably because the use of deadly force against the fleeing armed bank robber was appropriate, see Robinson v. Arrugueta, 415 F.3d 1252, 1255 (11th Cir.2005), and they only fired between four and six times. However, the district court also found that Officer Black was unreasonable for firing 24 times. We agree that deadly force against the armed robber was appropriate, but we cannot find a single case in this circuit or from the Supreme Court that clearly establishes that a large number of shots fired makes a reasonable use of deadly force unreasonable. In fact, this court recently held that '[a] police officer is entitled to continue his use of force until a suspect thought to be fully armed is "fully secured."'. .Once the car started moving forward, Officer Black was faced with the choice of either allowing the suspect to escape with multiple hostages and perhaps leading police on a high speed chase through the busy streets of Jacksonville or ensuring that the suspect could not leave the Wendy's parking lot. We cannot say that it is clearly established he made the wrong choice and committed a constitutional violation. Because 'preexisting law [did not] provide [Black] with fair notice that' firing 24 shots was unreasonable in these circumstances, he is entitled to qualified immunity as to Appellees' Fourth Amendment claim for unreasonable seizure. . . . For the same reasons Officer Black is entitled to qualified immunity for Appellees' Fourth Amendment claims, he is also entitled to qualified immunity for the Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claims. If Officer Black's actions did not constitute a seizure of Appellees, then the non-custodial nature of the interaction precludes liability unless Officer Black's actions were 'arbitrary or conscience shocking.'. . Again, assuming without deciding that Officer Black violated Appellees' constitutional rights, we conclude that it was not clearly established that his actions violated the Substantive Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . There is no case law from this circuit or the Supreme Court that clearly established that Officer Black's actions shock the conscience. Therefore, we conclude that he is entitled to the defense of qualified immunity as to Appellees' substantive due process claims.")

Doe v. Braddy, 673 F.3d 1313, 1318-20 (11th Cir. 2012) ("A decision about a substantive due process violation requires an exact examination of the circumstances. For substantive due process purposes, we have never addressed the question of harm caused to a person situated as John Doe was situated: one in no custodial relationship with the state—in the specific context of a third-party minor injured by another child in an adoptive home setting. But we have said that, if the plaintiff alleging the rights violation is in no custodial relationship with the state, then state officials can violate the plaintiff's substantive due process rights only when the officials cause harm by engaging in conduct that is 'arbitrary, or conscious shocking, in a constitutional sense.'. . .For qualified immunity purposes in this case, the federal law applicable to the specific circumstances of this case was not close to established clearly at the pertinent time. The general legal propositions discussed above about substantive due process and non-custodial relationships are vague in themselves, and more so in their possible application to the circumstances of a case like this one, involving, among other things, an adoptive home setting and a victim not in the custody of the government. Moreover, qualified immunity's 'clearly established' test does not operate at a high level of generality. . . .In no way did Waddell—an opinion cited by Plaintiffs—clarify or particularize the liability standard (even roughly) for a case of this kind. [footnote omitted] Waddell explicitly declined to declare the precise liability standard to be employed in non-custodial substantive due process cases even of the kind presented in Waddell. So, Waddell, like the other decisions Plaintiff cites, cannot apply to the facts of this case with 'obvious clarity' and, therefore, is incapable of having provided the social workers 'fair warning' of the alleged unlawfulness of their acts. And all the child-injury cases cited by Plaintiffs are too readily distinguishable, involving children injured while in state custody and, thus, cannot provide 'fair warning' in the particular circumstances of this case: a child injured while not in state custody. . . .This case is not the rare case where the officials' conduct was so egregious that the officials should have known their acts were contrary to federal constitutional commands, even in the absence (as is true here) of relevant case law. Such cases are 'exceptional' and 'rarely arise.'. . .To rule against the individual defendants in this case would definitely break new ground. The contours of John Doe's claimed due process right were not at all clear in the circumstances, and the alleged unlawfulness (under the preexisting federal law) of the social workers' acts was far from obvious. [footnote omitted] No truly relevant case law applied with 'obvious clarity' to what the social workers were doing. The preexisting law gave no 'fair warning' of the alleged unlawfulness (under federal law) of their acts in advance of their acts. Given the circumstances, the developed federal law at the time stopped well short of clearly establishing the unlawfulness of the social workers' conduct. So under the law, the individual defendants have the right to immunity.")

Pourmoghani-Esfahani v. Gee, 625 F.3d 1313, 1318 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Questions of deliberate indifference to medical needs based on claims of delay are complicated questions because the answer is tied to the combination of many facts; a change in even one fact from a precedent may be significant enough to make it debatable among objectively reasonable officers whether the precedent might not control in the circumstances later facing an officer. No preexisting law clearly established that an approximately two-to-five-minute delay of medical care–either while Plaintiff moved from the waiting room to her cell or then while the cellmate waited for a guard to respond to her signaling–is a constitutional violation, especially with facts like this case. . . Plaintiff acknowledges that no precedent supports her position but still contends that the law was, at the pertinent time, already clearly established because the violation was so obvious that every objectively reasonable officer in Defendant's position would have known that what Defendant did following the struggle was not enough. . . The constitutional violation of deliberate indifference was not obvious given the preexisting law, even if we are mistaken in concluding that the Constitution's prohibition of deliberate indifference was not violated at all.")

Camp v. Correctional Medical Services, Inc., 400 F. App'x 519, 2010 WL 4058138, at *1 (11th Cir. Oct. 18, 2010) ("Even after Hope,. . . it is not enough to defeat a qualified immunity defense that under the facts of the case the Pickering . . . balance tilts in favor of the plaintiff's free speech. Instead, the balance must tilt decidedly in favor of the plaintiff's speech in order for the defendants to have fair and clear notice that they were violating the plaintiff's constitutional rights.")

Bryant v. Jones, 575 F.3d 1281, 1309 (11th Cir. 2009) ("[A] right may be clearly established irrespective of whether courts have specifically deemed the cause of action as being available under a particular legal theory. Accordingly, the question is not whether a reasonable officer would know that a discriminatory retaliation claim was available under Title VII or § 1981; rather, the salient question is whether the state of the law at the time provided officials fair warning that their discriminatory retaliatory conduct was unlawful. . . Furthermore, even if Drew's misguided interpretation of the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity test was correct, it is well-established in this circuit that claims for retaliation are cognizable pursuant to § 1981.")

Bryant v. Jones, 575 F.3d 1281, 1300 (11th Cir. 2009) ("Because a reasonable official would have known that discriminating against county managers on account of their race was unlawful, the district court ruled correctly in denying the defendants qualified immunity.").

H.A.L. ex rel Lewis v. Foltz, 551 F.3d 1227, 1231, 1232 (11th Cir. 2008) ("In Taylor v. Ledbetter, 818 F.2d 791 (1987) (en banc), we decided that a foster child can state a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 cause of action under the Fourteenth Amendment if the child is injured after a state employee is deliberately indifferent to a known and substantial risk to the child of serious harm. . . In some circumstances, we accept that the constitutional rule identified in Taylor can give a fair warning to foster-care workers. Although the injury sustained in Taylor was a beating-induced coma and the injury here is sexual abuse and although other unimportant differences exist, we accept that Taylor clearly established decisional law that applied, at the pertinent time, with obvious clarity to Defendants in this case–assuming that the true facts are the same as those alleged–and that Defendants had fair warning that their conduct (doing nothing to protect the children, given the circumstances) violated clear federal law. Defendants can therefore be held personally liable for the childrens' injuries. On the alleged facts, no reasonable person in Defendants' place could have believed that, by doing nothing to protect the children, they could carry out their duties consistently with the Constitution. Defendants contend that they should be afforded qualified immunity because their knowledge of D.C.'s and R.S.'s sexual aggression was not tantamount to knowing subjectively that D.C. and R.S. actually were sexually abusing H.A.L., J.H.L., and S.L.L. Plaintiffs were sexually abused. But in the light of Taylor, the issue here is not whether Defendants actually knew or drew the inference that Plaintiffs were sexually abused: it is whether Defendants–who could have (among other things) removed Plaintiffs from the Shick home– actually knew, and were deliberately indifferent to, a substantial risk of Plaintiffs being sexually abused in the Shick home.").

Battle v. Webb, No. 08-12696, 2008 WL 4772098, at *3 (11th Cir. Oct. 31, 2008) ("The Groh decision issued in 2004. Prior to that date, the case law of this circuit did not clearly establish that Webb's conduct was improper. . . Thus, at the time Webb searched Battle's business, the existing case law arguably permitted Webb's conduct. The warrant in Battle's case incorporated Webb's affidavit and Webb explained that he did not leave a copy of the affidavit at the time of the search due to confidentiality concerns. In light of the case law at the time of the search, we cannot conclude that the rights were clearly established.").

Battiste v. Sheriff of Broward County, 2008 WL 63700, at *2 (11th Cir. Jan. 7, 2008) ("Although government officials may be liable for a failure to train subordinates under some circumstances, the plaintiff cites no case, and we have found none, that would have given an official fair warning that a police chief, faced with past unjustified arrests by his department at public protests, must train 'borrowed' law enforcement officers from other jurisdictions to arrest only upon probable cause. Because Chief Timoney did not have fair warning that his failure to train borrowed officers violated the Constitution, he is entitled to qualified immunity on Count XIV as well.")

Al-Amin v. Smith, 511 F.3d 1317, 1330-36 (11th Cir. 2008) ("Applying Turner's factors to this case, we conclude that our well-established law in Taylor and Guajardo-that inmates have a constitutionally protected right to have their properly marked attorney mail opened in their presence-is not changed by Turner and remains valid, well-established law. . . . Given this Court's precedent in Taylor, Guajardo, and Lemon, we conclude that: (1) a reasonable official would have known in 2004-05 that opening properly marked, incoming attorney mail outside the inmate's presence is unlawful and unconstitutional; and (2) Turner did not change our well-established law in that regard. Al-Amin would be home free on his access-to-courts claim but for the Supreme Court's actual injury decision in Casey. . . . Subsequent to Taylor, Guajardo, and Lemon, the Supreme Court clarified that 'actual injury' is a constitutional prerequisite to an inmate's access-to-courts claim. . . . Because Al-Amin has not shown the requisite actual injury, the district court erred in denying defendants qualified immunity on Al-Amin's access-to-courts claim. . . . Because Al-Amin has stated a free speech violation and because actual injury is not a constitutional prerequisite to a free speech claim, the only remaining question is whether Al-Amin's free speech right to have his attorney mail opened only in his presence was clearly established at the time of defendants' conduct. . . . Defendants argue that they did not have 'fair warning' that opening mail from Karima outside Al-Amin's presence was a free speech violation and that, therefore, they are entitled to qualified immunity on Al-Amin's free speech claim. . . Defendants stress that our binding precedent in Taylor, Guajardo, and Lemon was based on the constitutional right to access the courts, not the right to free speech, and thus Al-Amin's free speech right was not clearly established. The question becomes whether, for qualified immunity purposes, defendants have 'fair warning' when reasonable officials know that their precise conduct (opening an inmate's attorney mail outside his presence) is unlawful and a constitutional violation, but they do not know that it violates not only one constitutional right (the right to court access), but also a second constitutional right (the right to free speech). . . . . The problem with defendants' argument is that the 'clearly established' inquiry for qualified immunity focuses on the defendant's conduct and whether given a particular factual situation, a reasonable official would know his conduct was unlawful and unconstitutional. . . We have never required that, in order for an official to know his conduct is unlawful, a reasonable official must be able to cite by chapter and verse all of the constitutional bases that make his conduct unlawful. Rather, what courts have said is that a high degree of factual similarity with conduct previously held unlawful and unconstitutional is required to give a reasonable official fair and clear warning (or notice) that his particular conduct is unlawful and unconstitutional. . . . In this case, exact factual identity exists between prior case law and defendants' factual conduct. Specifically, our precedent, as discussed above, clearly establishes that a prison official violates an inmate's constitutional rights when the official opens attorney mail outside the inmate's presence. . . Thus, we conclude that defendants had fair and clear notice that opening Al-Amin's attorney mail outside his presence was unlawful and violated the Constitution.").

Goebert v. Lee County, 510 F.3d 1312, 1331 (11th Cir. 2007) ("Like the jail administrator in Carswell, Captain Weaver had reason to know that Goebert, a pretrial detainee, had a serious medical problem that needed attention, but he chose to do even less than the defendant official in Carswell did. Weaver chose to disbelieve, without investigation, everything Goebert said simply because she was an inmate, and his reply to her complaint misstated the jail's policy on medical procedures to her. Telling an impoverished inmate that she cannot have the medical care she direly needs to save the life of her child unless she can pay for it is as bad or worse than yelling into a crowded room for someone else to get her to a doctor. A reasonable corrections officer would have known that this conduct was unlawful. Weaver is not entitled to qualified immunity . The district court should not have granted summary judgment in his favor.")

Griffin Industries, Inc. v. Irvin, 496 F.3d 1189, 1208, 1209 (11th Cir. 2007) ("In Vinyard v. Wilson, 311 F.3d 1340 (11th Cir.2002), we considered three ways in which the law could be clearly established. First, conduct may be clearly established as illegal through explicit statutory or constitutional statements. Id. at 1350. Second, certain 'authoritative judicial decision[s]' may establish broad principles of law that are clearly applicable in a variety of factual contexts going beyond the particular circumstances of the decision that establishes the principle. Id. at 1351. Third, and most common, is the situation where case law previously elucidated in materially similar factual circumstances clearly establishes that the conduct is unlawful. Id. at 1351-52. None are applicable. The first category is inapplicable because the Equal Protection Clause would not have provided the defendants with fair warning under these circumstances. Under well-established qualified immunity doctrine, the Fourteenth Amendment's broad command that no state shall 'deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws' may, as it does here, simply operate at too high a level of generality. . . . The second category, 'authoritative judicial decisions,' is also inapplicable. In Vinyard, we described this second category as involving 'precedents [that] are hard to distinguish from later cases because so few facts are material to the broad legal principle established in these precedents.' . . Olech and Executive 100 are not such cases. The legal principle established in Olech and, less explicitly, in Executive 100–that the Fourteenth Amendment forbids the denial of equal protection even when the plaintiff is only a 'class of one'–is certainly broad. This principle does not, however, fit Vinyard's definition of a precedent that is 'hard to distinguish from later cases because so few facts are material to the broad legal principle.' . . To the contrary, as our substantive analysis shows, the precise facts of a case are critical in evaluating a 'class of one' claim. This leaves only the third category, cases where binding precedent 'has said that "Y Conduct" is unconstitutional in "Z Circumstances."'. . This is the most common scenario, because 'most judicial precedents are tied to particularized facts and fall into this category.' . .In the third category, the inquiry is whether the facts of a previous case are 'fairly distinguishable' from the case before the court . . . Olech and Executive 100 are 'fairly distinguishable' from the present case.").

Watts v. Florida Intern. University, 495 F.3d 1289, 1300 (11th Cir. 2007) ("The factual circumstances of this case are unusual. There were no decisions in 1997 addressing the free exercise rights of graduate students in a practicum. Watts seems to have admitted as much because he urged us to craft a new constitutional standard for precisely this situation, explaining that applying either employee speech or student speech cases to student internships is like trying to put 'the proverbial square peg in a round hole.' To decide unusual cases courts sometimes have to cut down pegs and bore out holes, but when such carpentry is necessary qualified immunity is appropriate. Because the individual defendants were not on notice that they were violating Watts' clearly established constitutional rights, the district court correctly granted them summary judgment in their individual capacities.").

Epps v. Watson, 492 F.3d 1240, 1245, 1246 (11th Cir. 2007) ("Prior to Epps' termination, we issued Terry. Although in the context of a sheriff's office instead of a tax commissioner, Terry's premise clearly established that 'the limited and defined role[ ] [a clerk] tend[s] to play do[es] not support the need for political loyalty to the individual sheriff.'. . 'Although the facts of the case are not identical,' as here Epps was a clerk under the Tax Commissioner and not a sheriff, Terry's 'premise has clear applicability in this case.'. . We find that Watson did have 'fair notice' that such alleged conduct is unconstitutional, as the law here was 'clearly established.'")

Andujar v. Rodriguez, 486 F.3d 1199, 1205 (11th Cir. 2007) ("Andujar has not cited, and we have not found, a case holding that the Constitution requires a paramedic who has treated a detainee's immediate medical needs to transport the detainee to a medical facility for non-urgent treatment rather than release the detainee to police officers for booking, relying on the police officers to later transport the detainee for further treatment. Thus, there was no factually similar caselaw that would have put Newcomb and Barea on notice that their conduct violated the Constitution. Moreover, while there was caselaw establishing the general legal proposition that a government official who intentionally delays providing medical care to an inmate, knowing that the inmate has a serious medical condition that could be exacerbated by delay, acts with deliberate indifference, . . . we cannot say that this general rule applied 'with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'").

Porter v. White, 483 F.3d 1294, 1306-08 & n.11 (11th Cir. 2007) ("We hold that the no-fault standard of care Brady imposes on prosecutors in the criminal or habeas context has no place in a § 1983 damages action against a law enforcement official in which the plaintiff alleges a violation of due process. . . . Although our binding precedent in McMillian establishes that the correlative duty on the part of law enforcement officials is to turn over exculpatory evidence to the prosecution, . . . neither McMillian nor any other binding precedent . . . elaborates on the scope of that duty. For example, although McMillian did hold that the law was clearly established as of 1987 and 1988 that a police officer had a duty not to intentionally withhold exculpatory evidence from the prosecution, . . . the opinion did not address whether less-than-intentional conduct on the part of a police officer would violate the duty. . .Thus, it is for the alleged breach of this correlative duty–Fairbanks's duty as a law enforcement official to turn over exculpatory evidence to the prosecution–and the loss of liberty resulting therefrom, that Porter must be deemed to be seeking compensation in this case. We address as a matter of first impression whether Porter must demonstrate that Fairbanks acted with a level of culpability consisting of more than mere negligence. . . . On the authority of Daniels and Cannon, we hold that mere negligence or inadvertence on the part of a law enforcement official in failing to turn over Brady material to the prosecution, which in turn causes a defendant to be convicted at a trial that does not meet the fairness requirements imposed by the Due Process Clause, does not amount to a 'deprivation' in the constitutional sense. Thus, a negligent act or omission cannot provide a basis for liability in a § 1983 action seeking compensation for loss of liberty occasioned by a Brady violation. . . . We conclude below that the evidence in this case would, at best, support only an inference of mere negligence on the part of Fairbanks; therefore, like the Court in Daniels, we have no reason to consider whether, in the context of a claim like Porter's, 'something less than intentional conduct, such as recklessness or Agross negligence," is enough to trigger the protections of the Due Process Clause.'").

Mathews v. Crosby, 480 F.3d 1265, 1275 (11th Cir. 2007) ("Crosby argues that even if Mathews can establish a constitutional violation, Crosby is protected by qualified immunity because Mathews has failed to show that it was clearly established at the time of the beatings that a warden could face liability under § 1983 predicated on his failure to take reasonable steps in the face of a history of widespread abuse or his adoption of custom or policies which resulted in deliberate indifference. We disagree. By 1999, it was clearly established that a warden, the person charged with directing the governance, discipline, and policy of the prison and enforcing its orders, rules, and regulations would bear such liability.").

Valdes v. Crosby, 450 F.3d 1231, 1244 (11th Cir. 2006) ("Crosby argues that even if Mario Valdes established a constitutional violation, he is protected by qualified immunity because while it may have been clearly established that Valdes' constitutional rights would be violated if he were beaten to death by guards using excessive force, it was not clearly established at the time of Valdes' death that a warden could face liability under § 1983 predicated on his failure to take reasonable steps in the face of a history of widespread abuse or his adoption of custom or policies which result in deliberate indifference. We disagree. At the time of Valdes' death in 1999, it was clearly established that a warden, the person charged with directing the governance, discipline, and policy of the prison and enforcing its orders, rules, and regulations, would bear such liability.")

Tinker v . Beasley, 429 F.3d 1324, 1327-31 (11th Cir. 2005) ("The circumstances under which coercive interrogation that does not result in a confession or other self-incrimination may constitute a violation of substantive due process rights is an issue of first impression for our circuit. . . . The Supreme Court and our circuit have offered scant guidance as to what conduct shocks the conscience. . . .Tinker argues that, because the conduct of which she complains would be a constitutional violation in a criminal procedure context, it is also necessarily a conscious-shocking constitutional violation in the context of substantive due process. Beasley and Watson correctly respond that the two inquiries focus on different questions. The coerced-confession inquiry looks at the state of mind of the suspectB'whether [a suspect's] will was overborne' by the totality of the circumstances surrounding the giving of a confession. . . The shocks-the-conscience inquiry, in contrast, looks at the objective unreasonableness of the officers' conduct. Because we are making the second of the two inquiries, we must focus on Beasley and Watson's conduct asking only whether this particular conduct–falsely informing a suspect about the status of her legal representation in the context of an otherwise already coercive interrogation–shocks the conscience. Although this is arguably a close case in that it implicates Tinker's right to counsel, . . Beasley and Watson were trying to solve a murder and bank robbery case in which Tinker had been named by a deceased victim as the shooter. When Tinker asked for her attorney, the officers falsely told her that he had abandoned her, convinced her to sign a waiver-of-rights form, and proceeded to interrogate her multiple times over the course of three days. Although the bank teller's identification of Tinker later proved to have been made in error, the officers were justified in believing they had the right person in custody at the time of the interrogation. Accordingly, although this situation presents slightly 'more egregious' circumstances than those described in Moran, we are not prepared to find the officers' conduct 'sufficiently arbitrary for constitutional recognition as a potentially viable substantive due process claim.' . . This case falls more in line with those cases in which police misconduct is untoward and upsetting, and yet does not rise to a level that shocks the conscience. . . . Accordingly, we reverse the order of the district court and find officers Beasley and Watson are entitled to qualified immunity as to Tinker's § 1983 substantive due process claim.")

Akins v. Fulton County, 420 F.3d 1293, 1305, 1306 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Plaintiffs argue that Poole v. Country Club of Columbus, Inc. provides fair warning that Gates's actions constituted constructive discharge. . . The district court held, to the contrary, that Poole cannot serve as fair warning because it merely held that a reasonable jury could find that the plaintiff had suffered constructive discharge, not that those acts actually constituted a constructive discharge. In categorically holding that Poole cannot serve as fair warning of the unlawfulness of a defendant's conduct, the district court erred. The practical effect of our holding in Poole is that the facts of the case constitute constructive discharge as a matter of law. Of course, based on the posture of the case, these facts were viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. This does not alter the effect of the holding: that the facts of Poole, if believed, constitute constructive discharge. A holding by this Court that a particular set of facts raises a question of material fact sufficient to preclude summary judgment serves as fair warning to officials. . . Because Gates's conduct occurred after we issued the opinion in Poole, and because the facts in that case are so similar to the ones we consider here with respect to Akins and Blount, Gates was on notice that his acts would constitute constructive discharge. With respect to Revell, however, her claim must fail because neither this Circuit nor the Supreme Court has yet to recognize the claim of 'constructive transfer' as an adverse employment action. Therefore, Gates was not put on notice that his actions would violate clearly established law. Thus, Gates is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Revell's claim of First Amendment retaliation.").

Bennett v.Hendrix, 423 F.3d 1247, 1255, 1256 (11th Cir. 2005) ("We conclude that the law was clearly established at the time of the defendants' alleged actions that retaliation against private citizens for exercising their First Amendment rights was actionable. This Court and the Supreme Court have long held that state officials may not retaliate against private citizens because of the exercise of their First Amendment rights.. . .Because this Court has held since at least 1988 that it is 'settled law' that the government may not retaliate against citizens for the exercise of First Amendment rights, . . . we hold that the defendants were on notice and had 'fair warning' that retaliating against the plaintiffs for their support of the 1998 referendum would violate the plaintiffs' constitutional rights and, if the plaintiffs' allegations are true, would lead to liability under § 1983.").

Cook v. Gwinnett County School District, 414 F.3d 1313, 1320 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Thus, under the facts as found by the district court at summary judgment, Cook's interests in promoting safety and improving the competency, management, and organization of district bus drivers far outweighed the scant evidence that the district proffered in support of its workplace efficiency argument. We therefore conclude that the Pickering balance tilted conclusively in favor of Cook such that the defendants had fair and clear warning that their actions were unconstitutional . . . Moreover, after Hope v. Pelzer. . . we have emphasized that 'general statements of the law are perfectly capable of giving clear and fair warning to officials even where the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful.'").

Williams v. Consolidated City of Jacksonville, 381 F.3d 1298, 1298, 1299 (11th Cir. 2004) (Wilson, J., concurring in denial of reh'g en banc) ("I respectfully write a brief response to my colleagues who have dissented from the denial of rehearing en banc. This was a qualified immunity case. The opinion . . . concludes that Rayfield Alfred, Fire Chief for the Consolidated City of Jacksonville, Florida, was entitled to qualified immunity when he postponed creating four new captain positions, based allegedly on the premise that the next available candidates on the eligibility list were white males. . . . First, I agree with Judge Tjoflat that Fire Chief Alfred's conduct in Williams violated the constitutional rights of the plaintiffs. While the opinion recognizes that the action taken in this case was significantly different from the type of discriminatory conduct our Circuit has previously found unlawful, the opinion states unequivocally that a decision not to create new jobs, based solely on the race and gender of the next eligible applicants, in the absence of an affirmative action plan, violates the Equal Protection Clause. . . .Where I disagree with the dissenters, however, is whether clearly established law had placed Alfred on notice of this misconduct so as to strip him of his entitlement to qualified immunity. No Eleventh Circuit or Supreme Court authority would have established to Chief Alfred that he could not hold up on creating new jobs until there was a more diverse applicant pool. . . . [N]o case existed in 1999 that clearly established the unconstitutionality of the conduct in Williams. Until Williams, we had not yet dealt with a situation in which a decision-maker opted not to create entirely new jobs on the basis of race. In fact, as far as I am able to determine, no Circuit has to date. In addition, in Williams, the parties never even reached the point where an actual employment decision as to hiring or firing could have been made; the captain positions simply had not been created. Eleventh Circuit case law in no way previously had proscribed such conduct. Thus, while I agree fully with Judge Tjoflat that Alfred's conduct was unconstitutional, it certainly had not been clearly established as unconstitutional at the time in question. Consequently, en banc review was unnecessary.").

Williams v. Consolidated City of Jacksonville, 381 F.3d 1298, 1306, 1307 (11th Cir. 2004) (Tjoflat, J., dissenting from denial of reh'g en banc) ("In Hope v. Pelzer, the Supreme Court declared that we had placed a 'rigid gloss on the qualified immunity standard' that was 'not consistent with [its] cases .'. . Our post-Hope decisions demonstrate that we have not yet achieved a consensus on what the elusive phrase 'clearly established' means. In particular, we do not have a unified standard on how to interpret our holding in Vinyard v. Wilson. . . that 'some broad statements of principle in case law are not tied to particularized facts and can clearly establish law applicable in the future to different sets of detailed facts.' This case is the perfect vehicle for explaining the reach of this crucial holding in Vinyard. Consequently, if reheard en banc, this case would have had enormous precedential value and could dramatically clarify the law to the benefit of future parties and panels. In this particular case, the exact qualified immunity standard we apply is not important. Alfred's behavior was so patently unconstitutional, so clearly prohibited by precedent, that he could not expect immunity under any reasonable standard. However we choose to interpret the phrase 'clearly established law,' even a brief consideration of Alfred's acts reveal them to be beyond the bounds of constitutional propriety. The hair that the panel sought to split–that no previous case had involved an employer declining to create a new position on racial grounds. . .is unpersuasive. The panel's approach requires a degree of specificity in precedent that none of our prior opinions demands and that effectively eviscerates our circuit's repeated condemnation of all racial discrimination and race-based decisionmaking in public employment. . . . . Furthermore, if the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity test is interpreted unduly strictly, it will effectively prevent further development of wide areas of constitutional law. An attorney deciding whether to represent the victim of a constitutional violation will be extremely reluctant to bring a case when there is no precedent squarely on point. If an unreasonably high 'clearly established' hurdle precludes many cases involving arguable constitutional violations from being brought, then the stream of precedents recognizing certain governmental acts as constitutional violations will dry up. This, in turn, will further reduce the number of 'clearly established' constitutional violations, which will further reduce the number of § 1983 cases brought, and the cycle will continue.").

Williams v. Consolidated City of Jacksonville, 381 F.3d 1298, 1308 (11th Cir. 2004) (Barkett, J., dissenting from denia l of reh'g en banc) ("I agree with Judge Tjoflat that en banc review is warranted in this case. Under the panel's own analysis, its qualified immunity holding cannot be reconciled with the Supreme Court's decision in Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002). In Hope, the Court found that our circuit's 'rigid gloss on the qualified immunity standard,' which required that the facts of previous cases be 'materially similar' to those of the case under review, was 'not consistent with [the Supreme Court's] cases. . . Intentional governmental discrimination solely on the basis of race has been held to violate the Equal Protection Clause since long before the events that gave rise to this case. The panel found as much in holding in the first instance that a decision not to create new positions that is based solely upon the race and gender of the next eligible candidates for promotion, in the absence of a valid affirmative action plan, violates the Equal Protection Clause. . . Once committed to the proposition that Chief Alfred's action, although 'significantly different than the types of discriminatory employment actions we formerly found unlawful,' was 'essentially an intentionally discriminatory race-and-gender-based employment decision,' . . . Hope requires that we consider his action to be a violation of clearly established law.").

Kesinger ex rel Kesinger v. Herrington, 381 F.3d 1243, 1250 (11th Cir. 2004) ("We have found no preexisting case law involving materially similar facts that would give a reasonable police officer fair and clear warning that shooting a crazed man, intent upon causing harm to himself and others, including the officer who had retreated as far as possible, and has acted in self defense, violated the Constitution. . . Here Herrington acted in self defense. He did not violate the Constitution or any clearly established law. He is entitled to qualified immunity.").

O'Rourke v. Hayes, 378 F.3d 1201, 1210 & n.4 (11th Cir. 2004) ("Hayes . . . had the benefit of not only Steagald but *Pembau*r itself. Thus, his conduct was clearly established as unconstitutional not only by the reasonably specific Fourth Amendment principles articulated in the cases discussed above, but by the factually indistinguishable case of Pembaur. [footnote] Either of these separate theories would have been enough for us to conclude that his conduct was 'clearly established' as unconstitutional. We also hasten to add that Pembaur is eerily on point to a degree of specificity that far transcends the minimum threshold a plaintiff must meet to demonstrate that a constitutional right is 'clearly established' based on a factually indistinguishable case. . . The simple fact that he had an arrest warrant for Brown did not authorize him to enter the office where O'Rourke worked.").

Magluta v. Samples, 375 F.3d 1269, 1283 (11th Cir. 2004) ("In the instant case, we conclude that ample federal law existed at the time of the challenged conduct to give fair warning to the defendants that it was unconstitutional to hold Magluta in solitary confinement for 500 days for the purpose of punishment and with virtually no procedural protection in the form of periodic reviews.").

Holloman ex rel. Holloman v. Harland, 370 F.3d 1252, 1277, 1278 (11th Cir. 2004) ("This circuit was recently chastised by the Supreme Court for taking an unwarrantedly narrow view of the circumstances in which public officials can be held responsible for their constitutional violations. . . The law of this circuit used to be that a government actor could be denied qualified immunity only for acts that are 'so obviously wrong, in light of the pre-existing law, that only a plainly incompetent officer or one who was knowingly violating the law would have done such a thing.' [citing Lassiter] The Supreme Court, specifically citing Lassiter (along with a handful of other Eleventh Circuit cases), held that '[t]his rigid gloss in the qualified immunity standard ... is not consistent with [the Supreme Court's] cases.' . . . Hope reminds us that we need no longer focus on whether the facts of a case are 'materially similar to prior precedent.' . . . Since Hope, many of our cases have applied its standard to the exclusion of our earlier, more rigorous doctrinal tests. [citing cases] Turning to Holloman's claims, we find that, as of May 16, 2000, the Tinker-Burnside standard was clearly established and sufficiently specific as to give the defendants 'fair warning' that their conduct was constitutionally prohibited. We do not find it unreasonable to expect the defendants–who hold themselves out as educators–to be able to apply such a standard, notwithstanding the lack of a case with material factual similarities.").

Holloman ex rel. Holloman v. Harland, 370 F.3d 1252, 1302, 1303 (11th Cir. 2004) (Wilson, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority holds that Holloman's constitutional right to put his fist in the air during the recitation of the Pledge is clearly established because the Tinker-Burnside standard was 'sufficiently specific' to give the defendants fair warning. . . I respectfully disagree with both the majority's analysis and conclusion.. . . The Tinker-Burnside test is whether the student expression 'materially and substantially interfere[s] with the requirements of appropriate discipline in the operation of the school.'. . [T]eachers cannot be expected to readily determine what conduct falls within the Court's definition of 'material and substantial interference with appropriate discipline.'. . Reasonable people certainly can disagree about how the Court will apply such a general standard, especially to the facts of the instant action. . . . I do not think that the balancing test we use in our Free Speech cases established with 'obvious clarity' that a student can raise his fist in the air during the curriculum portion of the school day. . . . In the alternative, the majority states that Holloman's right to raise his fist in the air during the Pledge is clearly established under Barnette. . . . Barnette holds that a student cannot be compelled to speak. Barnette says nothing about a student's right to speak. Holloman 'spoke' by raising his fist. Thus, Barnette is not relevant to this inquiry. For the reasons that I articulated above for why I believe Holloman's expression is distinguishable from the expression in Tinker and Burnside, I would hold that the law was not clearly established that Holloman had a right to raise his fist in the air during the recitation of the Pledge in class.")

Ray v. Foltz, 370 F.3d 1079, 1082, 1083 (11th Cir. 2004) ("We reject defendants' argument that 'Taylor merely generally establishes that a foster child's constitutional rights may be violated,' while not making it 'apparent that any specific conduct violates a foster child's constitutional rights.' Even were the facts of Taylor not substantially similar to those here, see Hope v. Pelzer, . . .Taylor clearly established that foster children have a liberty interest, pursuant to the substantive due process clause of the fourteenth amendment, in being free from the type of abuse inflicted upon R.M. Although R.M. was not reduced to a coma as was the child in Taylor, his injuries were sufficiently similar that no reasonable argument can be made that Taylor did not put defendants on notice that deliberate indifference to the risk of this harm would subject them to potential liability. . . .Thus, there can be no question under the facts alleged, that the injuries sustained by R.M. violated his well-established constitutional right in this circuit to be reasonably safe in his foster home. Nevertheless, the Rays cannot proceed upon this allegation alone. The law also requires that the Rays be able to claim that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the violation of this right. . . . The Rays must be able to allege that the defendants had actual knowledge that R.M. was being abused (or at substantial risk of being abused) or that they deliberately chose not to learn of the abuse. In the absence of such allegations, the Rays have not stated a claim under Section 1983.")

Durruthy v. Pastor, 351 F.3d 1080, 1092-94 (11th Cir. 2003) ("The fact that Pastor may have violated an internal guideline may subject her to internal sanction, but it does not undermine objective facts–the Plaintiff was walking in the middle of a busy intersection at a chaotic time with specific knowledge that the police were trying to clear that street, and he was not required to be in the street–that otherwise establish probable cause, let alone arguable probable cause. Simply put, the internal guideline does not convert an illegal act suddenly into a legal one. Moreover, even though we believe Pastor had probable cause to arrest Durruthy for violating Fla. Stat. ' 316.130, she would also be 'entitled to qualified immunity if there was [even] arguable probable cause for the arrest.' Jones, 174 F.3d at 1283 (emphasis added). Here, Pastor was faced with making a close call on a difficult day, under chaotic circumstances. She had no knowledge that Durruthy previously had been allowed, by unknown officers and under unspecified conditions, to shoot pictures in the street. A reasonable officer could have believed, in light of the information Pastor possessed, that she had probable cause. . . . We add that even if Durruthy had actually alleged the violation of a constitutional right, such a violation was not clearly established. . . . Durruthy also claims that Pastor used excessive force when she arrested him. . . .Here, even if the force applied by Pastor in effecting the arrest– forcing Durruthy down to the ground and placing him in handcuffs–was unnecessary, plainly it was not unlawful. The amount of force used was de minimus. . . . Notably, Durruthy had not been restrained at the time the force was applied, distinguishing the instant case from two cases on which the district court relied.").

Durruthy v. Pastor, 351 F.3d 1080, 1095, 1099 (11th Cir. 2003) (Stahl, J., dissenting) ("Whether under a standard of probable cause or arguable probable cause to arrest, the facts of this case, made all the more apparent and troubling by videotape evidence of the arrest, preclude any notion that Officer Pastor, or any reasonable police officer, could have believed that probable cause to arrest existed. Qualified immunity is inappropriate here, especially at the summary judgment stage. . . . The unique facts here on their own establish the egregiousness and illegality of Officer Pastor's conduct. Pastor 'did not need specific case law to give her fair warning that an arrest in these circumstances could violate Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights.' Durruthy, 235 F.Supp.2d at 1298. The majority opinion sets the bar prohibitively high and tips the balance contemplated by qualified immunity away from the Constitution. Aggrieved individuals will have less incentive to challenge unwarranted and unconstitutional government actions because monetary compensation for their harms is unavailable. In the end, unconstitutional government action is more likely to go unchallenged and unchanged. That is our ultimate concern.").

Kirkland v. Greene County Bd. of Educ., 347 F.3d 903, 905 (11th Cir. 2003) ("Notwithstanding that his actual conduct may have violated the Constitution, Morrow argues that at the time of the incident the right to be free from corporal punishment was not clearly established. Morrow misses the point. The issue here is not whether any corporal punishment violates the Constitution, but whether the nature and extent of the force applied here was constitutional.

Although Neal elaborated upon our case law after this incident occurred, the Supreme Court had already held that the deliberate infliction of physical pain by school authorities as punishment for misconduct implicated Fourteenth Amendment liberty interests. [citing Ingraham v. Wright] Similarly, the Supreme Court of Alabama had already noted that 'the infliction of corporal punishment in public schools is a deprivation of substantive due process when it is arbitrary, capricious, or wholly unrelated to the legitimate state goal of maintaining an atmosphere conducive to learning.' [citing C.B. v. Bobo, 659 So.2d 98, 103 ("la.1995)]").

Grayden v. Rhodes, 345 F.3d 1225, 1245, 1248, 1249 (11th Cir. 2003) ("In light of the Supreme Court's decision in West Covina, a reasonable code enforcement officer could readily have concluded that Rhodes was under no obligation to provide notice, pre- deprivation or otherwise, of the tenants' right to challenge the condemnation decision because the remedial procedure available to the tenants was established by a published, generally available source,§30A.11 of the City Code. . . . At the time of eviction in June 2000, a reasonable code enforcement officer could reasonably have concluded, in light of West Covina, that§30A.11 of the Orlando City Code, a publicly available document, placed the tenants on notice of their right to challenge Rhodes' condemnation decision. [footnote omitted] Although we conclude in Part A that this case is distinguishable from West Covina and warrants a different outcome, we cannot say that a reasonable code enforcement officer would have believed in June 2000 that the law clearly entitled the plaintiffs to notice above and beyond that already provided in§30A.11 of the City Code.").

Grayden v. Rhodes, 345 F.3d 1225, 1251, 1257 (11th Cir. 2003) (Birch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (Relying on both Vinyard and Lanier and concluding "Under Mullane, 'X Conduct' is the case-specific civil deprivation of substantial property rights, permanently and irreversibly, without prior, personal notice 'reasonably certain to inform those affected,' whose identity and whereabouts are known, even in the case where the substance and frequency of the proceedings are published by statute and publicly promulgated. 'X Conduct' is also what happened here: the drumhead condemnation of, and eviction from, house and home with minimal, and questionable, statutory notice that assaults the letter and spirit of the uncompromising demands in Mullane, Schroeder, Memphis Light, Mennonite, and Tulsa, all of which apply in this case with 'obvious clarity.''" Rhodes is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Snider v. Jefferson State Community College, 344 F.3d 1325, 1328-30 (11th Cir. 2003) ("Although this Court (1997) and the Supreme Court (1998)–during the time in which the alleged harassment was occurring–had concluded that a same-sex sexual harassment claim was actionable under Title VII against a private employer, this precedent could not fairly put Defendants on notice that their alleged conduct clearly violated a federal constitutional right. . . . Although some people may well have reasonably guessed earlier that same-sex sexual harassment was a violation of the Equal Protection Clause, the answer was debatable, not free from cloudiness and truly settled, before our 2003 decision–with its six-page explaining opinion–in Downing, . . .and officials cannot be 'expected to predict the future course of constitutional law.'. . Neither the Supreme Court's decision in Oncale, . . nor our decision in Fredette,. . . provided clear notice to government officials that same-sex sexual harassment violated the Equal Protection Clause. [footnote omitted] . . . We cannot say that the Equal Protection Clause or case law before Downing provided Defendants with fair and clear warning that a male supervisor sexually harassing male employees would violate the employees' federal constitutional rights. Although officials, when the preexisting law applies with obvious clarity, can be put on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances, we stress that officials cannot be 'expected to predict the future course of constitutional law.' . . . Because the pre-existing case law available to Defendants at the time of the alleged harassment did not make apparent that the Equal Protection Clause protected against same-sex sexual harassment, Defendants are entitled to immunity.").

Snider v. Jefferson State Community College, 344 F.3d 1325, 1331-33 (11th Cir. 2003) (Barkett, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("[T]here is no difference between the scope of Title VII and the scope of the Equal Protection Clause concerning intentional discrimination in the form of disparate treatment in the public workplace. . . . For this reason, once Title VII was clarified as proscribing intentional same-sex sexual harassment, a reasonable official was given fair notice that such conduct in the public workplace also violated the Equal Protection Clause. . . .Therefore, to the extent that the Plaintiffs' claims are predicated on sexually harassing conduct that occurred prior to May 22, 1997 (the date we issued Fredette), I agree with the majority that the law at that time concerning same-sex sexual harassment in public employment was sufficiently unsettled that the Defendants are shielded by the doctrine of qualified immunity. However, I would remand to the district court for further proceedings as to any claims alleged to have arisen after our decision in Fredette, when a reasonable official in the Defendants' position was given fair notice that the conduct alleged here violated the Equal Protection Clause.").

Vaughan v. Cox, 343 F.3d 1323, 1331-33 (11th Cir. 2003) ("[W]e simply cannot conclude as a matter of law that a reasonable jury could not find that Deputy Cox's actions were unreasonable under the standards for using deadly force articulated in Garner. Accordingly, we conclude under the first prong of the Saucier analysis that Vaughan has alleged facts which could support a jury's finding that Cox violated Vaughan's Fourth Amendment rights. Thus, the district court erred in granting the Defendants summary judgment on the ground that no Fourth Amendment violation occurred. The issue is one for the jury. . . . Having concluded that the facts alleged could establish a constitutional violation, we now turn to the second prong of the Saucier analysis and ask whether it would have been clear to an objectively reasonable officer that Deputy Cox's conduct was unlawful. . . .In determining whether the contours of a constitutional right are clearly established, we examine cases that announce general constitutional rules and cases that apply those rules to factual circumstances to determine if a reasonable public official, who is charged with knowledge of such decisions, would have understood the constitutional implications of his conduct. With regard to this inquiry, the Supreme Court in Hope cautioned that we should not be unduly rigid in requiring factual similarity between prior cases and the case under consideration. The 'salient question,' the Court said, is whether the state of the law gave the defendants 'fair warning' that their alleged conduct was unconstitutional. . . . As noted above, the constitutionality of a police officer's use of deadly force is evaluated in light of Garner. . .In contrast, the standard for determining whether an officer who may not have been constitutionally permitted to use deadly force should still be entitled to qualified immunity is distinct, albeit similar. . .Under that standard, an officer will be entitled to qualified immunity if he had 'arguable probable cause' to employ deadly force; in essence, we decide whether 'the officer reasonably could have believed that probable cause existed' to use deadly force. . . . Taking the facts as alleged by Vaughan, an objectively reasonable officer in Deputy Cox's position could not have believed that he was entitled to use deadly force to apprehend Vaughan and Rayson. Under Garner, a police officer can use deadly force to prevent the escape of a fleeing non-violent felony suspect only when the suspect poses an immediate threat of serious harm to police officers or others. In this case, the danger presented by Vaughan and Rayson's continued flight was the risk of an accident during the pursuit. Applying Garner in a common-sense way, a reasonable officer would have known that firing into the cabin of a pickup truck, traveling at approximately 80 miles per hour on Interstate 85 in the morning, would transform the risk of an accident on the highway into a virtual certainty. The facts of this case bear out these foreseeable consequences. Thus, Deputy Cox is not entitled to summary judgment, on qualified immunity grounds, regarding Vaughan's § 1983 claim predicated on the Fourth Amendment. But Cox is not foreclosed from asserting a qualified immunity defense at trial. If the jury were to accept Cox's version of the facts, the qualified immunity analysis would be changed. If Rayson and Vaughan's collision with Cox's cruiser was not accidental, or if Rayson intentionally swerved towards Cox's cruiser, the jury could conclude that Cox had probable cause to believe that Rayson had 'committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm.'. . And, under those facts, the risk presented by Cox's allowing Rayson and Vaughan's flight to continue is starkly different. Rather than the simple risk of an unintended accident, Cox may have been faced with the danger of intended harm brought about by Vaughan and Rayson. Cox may seek special interrogatories to the jury to resolve factual disputes going to the qualified immunity defense.").

Williams v. Consolidated City of Jacksonville, 341 F.3d 1261, 1270-73 (11th Cir. 2003) ("In this case, the Equal Protection Clause on its face was not enough to put Chief Alfred on notice that his actions were unlawful; therefore, we turn to case law to determine whether it was clearly established in 1999 that Chief Alfred's actions were unconstitutional. . . .Although in some cases we have relied upon that broad equal protection principle to clearly establish the unlawfulness of intentionally discriminatory employment actions, . . . on the unique facts of this case, that broad principle did not clearly and fairly warn Chief Alfred that a decision not to create new positions that were proposed by a subordinate official was unlawful. . . . Accordingly, we must consider whether our precedent was similar enough to put Chief Alfred on notice that his actions were unlawful. . . .Chief Alfred did not make a decision concerning an existing or viable position. Instead, the decision at issue was whether to create four permanent high-level positions in the fire department as proposed by a subordinate official–a decision that involves the core structure of the fire department. As we find this distinction significant, we conclude that the above case law did not put Chief Alfred on notice that it was unconstitutional to make a decision not to create four new high-level positions as proposed by a subordinate official based solely upon the race or gender of the next eligible candidates. Although we recognize that under Hope the exact unlawful action at issue need not have been resolved by previous case law, . . . we find it significant that the actions at issue in this case took place in a markedly different context than the other cases . . . . Specifically, all of the cases discussed above dealt with typical employment decisions that were made concerning an existing vacancy or a viable position. The decision at issue here, however, was whether or not to create four new high-level positions. . . . Although intentional race- and gender- based discrimination is unlawful, none of the cases set forth by the plaintiffs fairly and clearly put Chief Alfred on notice that the decision at issue in this case was unlawful."), reh'g en banc denied, Williams v. Consolidated City of Jacksonville, 381 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2004).

Omar ex rel Cannon v. Lindsey, 334 F.3d 1246, 1249, 1250 (11th Cir. 2003) (per curiam) ("Defendants assert that they are entitled to qualified immunity unless the allegations in the instant case are essentially indistinguishable from the facts of Taylor. They contend that Eleventh Circuit decisional law has repeatedly emphasized that a government actor does not have adequate notice that her conduct is wrongful unless precedent with an identical fact-pattern has unambiguously declared it to be so. . . Unsurprisingly, this stringent test was satisfied only in the rarest of circumstances, and § 1983 litigants in the Eleventh Circuit have generally found qualified immunity to be a nearly insuperable obstacle. This, however, is no longer the law. Last spring, the Supreme Court handed down a decision that clarifies how a court is to determine whether a particular right was 'clearly established' for the purposes of a qualified immunity analysis. In Hope v. Pelzer, 122 S.Ct. 2508 (2002), the Supreme Court overruled the Eleventh Circuit, holding that its exacting qualified immunity doctrine was too strict. . . . [T]he Supreme Court ruled that salient cases like Gates v. Collier, 501 F.2d 1291 (5th Cir.1974), furnished the guards with sufficient notice even though the facts in Gates were not perfectly congruent with the facts in Hope. This analytical flexibility reflects a deeper elaboration of what the Supreme Court meant in United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 271 (1997) when it wrote that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning.' The germane issue in a qualified immunity analysis, in other words, is not whether there is factually identical precedent but, instead, whether 'in light of preexisting law the unlawfulness [of the alleged conduct is] apparent.' . . . Defendants, in essence, are in the awkward position of arguing that even though they were idle while Plaintiff was subjected to obscene abuse, including being maced and starved, they would have stepped in had the mother begun to pound him into a permanent coma because, after all, beating toddlers into a coma is what the constitution, as explicated by Taylor, prohibits. . . .As the Supreme Court explained in Hope, however, our constitutional jurisprudence is not so bereft of good sense and flexibility that decisions in one case do not apply under similar but nevertheless different facts in another. Assuming the factual allegations of Plaintiffs complaint to be true, the Court concludes that Plaintiff had a 'clearly established' right not be brutalized the way in which he alleges he was, and, therefore, that Defendants cannot assert a defense of qualified immunity at this stage.").

Cottone v. Jenne, 326 F.3d 1352, 1360 (11th Cir. 2003) ("[J]ust as there was no supervision of known violent inmates in LaMarca and Hale, in this case guards D'Elia and Williams did not monitor and supervise Charles, a known violent inmate who posed a substantial risk of serious harm to the other inmates. . . . We conclude that prior factually similar case law gave fair and clear warning to D'Elia and Williams that it was their duty to monitor and to supervise known violent inmates who posed a substantial risk of serious harm to other inmates. . . . . The law of this circuit 'clearly establishes' that their total failure to monitor a known violent inmate housed in Unit 1, a housing unit for mentally ill inmates, constitutes unconstitutional deliberate indifference to Cottone's Fourteenth Amendment rights. Thus, given the plaintiffs' version of the events, defendants D'Elia and Williams are not entitled to qualified immunity at this Rule 12(b)(6) stage.").

Thomas v. Roberts, 323 F.3d 950, 953-56 (11th Cir. 2003) ("Plaintiffs appear to argue that T.L.O.'s balancing test should have put Defendants on notice that a 'strip search' would be unlawful. If the salient question is whether T.L.O. gave the defendants 'fair warning' that a 'strip search' of an elementary school class for missing money would be unconstitutional, then the answer must be 'no.' T.L.O.'s balancing test will, in most instances, call for school officials to speculate as to whether a court applying the balancing test to specific facts would find a search unreasonable. As this court has noted, where the applicable legal standard is a highly general one, such as 'reasonableness,' preexisting caselaw that has applied general law to specific circumstances will almost always be necessary to draw a line that is capable of giving fair and clear notice that an official's conduct will violate federal law. . . .The facts of T.L.O. are so different from the facts in this case that T.L.O. offers little guidance: Defendants could not have compared their situation with the situation in T.L.O. and found that the comparison fairly and clearly warned that a "strip search" of this kind would be unconstitutional. . . . Plaintiffs cite to Wilson v. Layne . . . Plaintiffs insist that 'consensus or persuasive authority' from other circuits may create clearly established law. Plaintiffs then direct us to six opinions from other circuits that deal with strip searches. [footnote omitted] As we have stated, only Supreme Court cases, Eleventh Circuit caselaw, and Georgia Supreme Court caselaw can 'clearly establish' law in this circuit. . . . Factually similar cases are not always necessary to establish that a government actor was on notice that certain conduct is unlawful. If the plaintiff in a § 1983 action can show that 'the official's conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of caselaw,' then the official is not entitled to qualified immunity. [citing Mattox] This exception is a narrow one, applying only when the conduct in question is so egregious that the government actor must be aware that he is acting illegally. . . . While we have found this 'strip search' of the students absent particularized suspicion to be unconstitutional, we do not believe that the search is conduct so egregious that the unconstitutionality of it would be readily apparent to Defendants absent clarifying caselaw. . . . In conclusion, while Hope admonishes us to be less rigid when evaluating caselaw to determine whether a public official had fair warning that his actions would be unlawful, nothing in Hope changes the outcome of this case.").

Willingham v. Loughnan, 321 F.3d 1299, 1300-04 (11th Cir. 2003) ("The Supreme Court decision in Hope v. Pelzer . . . did not change the preexisting law of the Eleventh Circuit much. [FN1] [In footnote 1, the Court explained that "[t]he Supreme Court's decision in Hope definitely did change the law of the Circuit some. . . . In cases like Hope, the law of the Circuit is not now what it was."] So, the result in this case, which is a case that has been remanded to us from the Supreme Court for reconsideration in the light of Hope, remains the same. We have reconsidered our previous decision. We conclude the law still demands that the individual defendants be protected by the defense of qualified immunity. . . . In many–if not most–instances, the apparency of an unlawful action will be established by (if it can be established at all) preexisting caselaw which is sufficiently similar in facts to the facts confronting an officer, such that we can say every objectively reasonable officer would have been on "fair notice" that the behavior violated a constitutional right. . . . It is not news to us that official conduct may be so egregious that further warning and notice beyond the general statement of law found in the Constitution or the statute or the caselaw is unnecessary; when we first decided this case, we did not believe that precedents with materially similar facts are always needed to overcome the defense of qualified immunity. . . . The Supreme Court, in Hope, cautions against a 'rigid gloss on the qualified immunity standard' that would require materially similar, preexisting cases in all circumstances when the qualified immunity defense is to be overcome. . . Such a 'rigid gloss' would be in variance with the law of the Supreme Court and the law of this Circuit. We have denied qualified immunity in the absence of precedents with similar facts. [reviewing cases] . . . . The specific question before us here is whether, considering the pertinent facts, the Officer Defendants violated federal law that was already clearly established in 1987, by shooting Plaintiff within a 'split second' after she attempted to kill one officer and assaulted another. . . . In accord with Hope, we have considered again whether, in the light of general constitutional rules on deadly force that had already been identified in the decisional law, this use of deadly force would have been seen as plainly unlawful by all objectively reasonable officers; and the answer is "no" given the circumstances, including that the shooting occurred within a split second of an attempted murder on a fellow officer. No general decisional rules applied with obvious clarity to these circumstances in such a way as to give fair notice that what these defendants were doing clearly violated federal law. And, as was the situation with our earlier decision, Plaintiff has pointed us to no case of the Supreme Court, Eleventh Circuit, or the Supreme Court of Florida which had already decided that the use of deadly force on a Plaintiff–(1) who had just attempted to murder one police officer and assaulted another, (2) who was not under police control, and (3) was close by a source of weapons–was unconstitutional. Our earlier conclusion remains unaffected by the Supreme Court's decision in Hope. We must still conclude the Officer Defendants are entitled to the defense of qualified immunity. We reinstate our prior opinion and judgment and supplement our earlier discussion of qualified immunity with this opinion." [footnotes omitted]).

Holmes v. Kucynda, 321 F.3d 1069, 1078, 1081 (11th Cir. 2003) ("As the Supreme Court recently clarified in Hope, the fact pattern of prior cases used to show that a right is clearly established need not be 'fundamentally similar' or even 'materially similar' to the facts alleged. . . Rather, 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.' . . Thus, the nub of the inquiry is whether 'the state of the law [at the time of the alleged violation]' gave the officials 'fair warning that their [acts were] unconstitutional.' .

. . This circuit's case law has clearly established that '[m]ere presence at the scene of a crime, without more, does not support a finding of probable cause to arrest.'[citing cases]").

Vinyard v. Wilson, 311 F.3d 1340, 1350-55 & n.27 (11th Cir. 2002) ("Prior to Hope, this Court en banc in Marsh likewise emphasized that "fair and clear notice to government officials is the cornerstone of qualified immunity." Marsh, 268 F.3d at 1031 (emphasis added). Moreover, the Supreme Court in Saucier and Hope, as well as this Court en banc in Marsh, explained that such fair and clear notice can be given in various ways. . . . First, the words of the pertinent federal statute or federal constitutional provision in some cases will be specific enough to establish clearly the law applicable to particular conduct and circumstances and to overcome qualified immunity, even in the total absence of case law. This kind of case is one kind of 'obvious clarity' case. For example, the words of a federal statute or federal constitutional provision may be so clear and the conduct so bad that case law is not needed to establish that the conduct cannot be lawful. . . . Second, if the conduct is not so egregious as to violate, for example, the Fourth Amendment on its face, we then turn to case law. When looking at case law, some broad statements of principle in case law are not tied to particularized facts and can clearly establish law applicable in the future to different sets of detailed facts. . . . But for judge-made law, there is a presumption against wide principles of law. And if a broad principle in case law is to establish clearly the law applicable to a specific set of facts facing a governmental official, it must do so 'with obvious clarity' to the point that every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the official's conduct did violate federal law when the official acted. . . . Third, if we have no case law with a broad holding of 'X' that is not tied to particularized facts, we then look at precedent that is tied to the facts. That is, we look for cases in which the Supreme Court or we, or the pertinent state supreme court has said that 'Y Conduct' is unconstitutional in 'Z Circumstances.' We believe that most judicial precedents are tied to particularized facts and fall into this category. When we have written of the circumstances of two cases as being materially different, we are saying the same thing for which the Supreme Court–and sometimes this Court–has used a different phrase: 'distinguishable in a fair way,' in Saucier . . . and 'fairly distinguishable,' in Pace v. Capobianco, 283 F.3d 1275, 1283 (11th Cir.2002). . . When fact-specific precedents are said to have established the law, a case that is fairly distinguishable from the circumstances facing a government official cannot clearly establish the law for the circumstances facing that government official; so, qualified immunity applies. On the other hand, if the circumstances facing a government official are not fairly distinguishable, that is, are materially similar, the precedent can clearly establish the applicable law. . . . For the first and second type of notice or warning, Hope instructs that '[a]lthough earlier cases involving Afundamentally similar" facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established, they are not necessary to such a finding.' . . . For the third type of notice or warning, the Supreme Court in Hope explained that '[i]n some circumstances ... a very high degree of prior factual particularity may be necessary.' . . . The Supreme Court opinion at times speaks of Hope as an 'obvious clarity' case in the manner of United States v. Lanier . . . The Hope Court decision relied heavily on Gates v. Collier. Given the dearth of limiting facts in Gates, Hope appears to be a preexisting case law decision where the facts in Hope were not fairly distinguishable from those in Gates v. Collier. Few (or perhaps no) facts set out in Gates limit the scope of the Gates principle that handcuffing prisoners to fixed objects for punishment for long periods violates the Constitution . . . . Although the 'obvious clarity' standard is often difficult to meet, we conclude that the law in 1998 was clearly established that Stanfield's conduct, as Vinyard describes it, during the jail ride violated an arrestee's constitutional rights. Considering Vinyard's version of the events, no factually-particularized, preexisting case law was necessary for it to be very obvious to every objectively reasonable officer facing Stanfield's situation that Stanfield's conduct during the jail ride violated Vinyard's constitutional right to be free of the excessive use of force. To be more specific, no objectively reasonable police officer could believe that, after Vinyard was under arrest, handcuffed behind her back, secured in the back seat of a patrol car with a protective screen between the officer and the arrestee, an officer could stop the car, grab such arrestee by her hair and arm, bruise her and apply pepper spray to try to stop the intoxicated arrestee from screaming and returning the officer's exchange of obscenities and insults during a short four-mile jail ride." [footnotes omitted]).

Rodriguez v. Farrell, 280 F.3d 1341, 1349, 1350 (11th Cir. 2002) ("Assuming, arguendo, that Sgt. Farrell and Officer Szczepanski's mistaken arrest of Rodriguez was unreasonable in the constitutional sense and that Rodriguez, thus, has stated a claim for unconstitutional arrest, the constitutional violation–at the time of the arrest–was not already clearly established: Rodriguez cited to no case (nor can we find one) in this Circuit or from the United States Supreme Court or Florida Supreme Court that has ever held an officer, under any set of circumstances, liable for misidentifying an arrestee when executing a valid arrest warrant. . . . At the time of the pertinent arrest, no precedent had decided that an officer committed a constitutional violation by mistakenly executing a valid arrest warrant against the wrong person. Closer to the point, no precedent had decided that the nighttime arrest, in conjunction with a traffic stop, of a person–who had been riding in an automobile in which unlawful drugs were being carried, and who was admittedly within five inches of the height of a fugitive for which a valid warrant for arrest (for offenses including a drug offense) was in existence and known to the arresting officers–violated the Federal Constitution when the arrested person shared with the fugitive (1) similar birth dates, social security numbers, addresses, birth places and tattoos as well as (2) the identical name, sex, race and age. . . Therefore, we conclude that, if Sgt. Farrell's and Officer Szczepanski's mistake in arresting Rodriguez was not, as a matter of law, a 'reasonable' one, it was, at least, an arguably reasonable one in the light of the unsettled, preexisting law.").(emphasis in original), pet. for reh'g and suggestion for reh'g en banc denied, 290 F.3d 1276 (11th Cir. 2002).

Skrtich v. Thornton, 280 F.3d 1295, 1304, 1305 (11th Cir. 2002) ("The defendant-officers contend that because there is no case addressing excessive force used in the context of a cell extraction, prison guards are completely insulated from federal liability for any and all excessive force used in cell extractions. The fact that the beating took place in the context of a cell extraction does not materially distinguish this case from our precedent. The facts, viewed in the light most favorable to Skrtich, demonstrate that Skrtich was incapacitated by the shock from the electronic shield. The argument that beating a prisoner for noncompliance with a guard's orders after the prisoner had ceased to disobey or resist turns the "clearly established law" of excessive force on its head and changes the purpose of qualified immunity in excessive force cases from one of protection for the legitimate use of force into a shield for clearly illegal conduct. The law of excessive force in this country is that a prisoner cannot be subjected to gratuitous or disproportionate force that has no object but to inflict pain. Whitley, 475 U.S. at 320-21. This is so whether the prisoner is in a cell, prison yard, police car, in handcuffs on the side of the road, or in any other custodial setting. . . The use of force must stop when the need for it to maintain or restore discipline no longer exists. Id. Long before the defendants acted, the law was clearly established that correctional officers could not use force maliciously or sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.").

Rowe v. Fort Lauderdale, 279 F.3d 1271, 1280 n.10 (11th Cir. 2002) ("Case law is not always necessary to clearly establish a right. A right may be so clear from the text of the Constitution or federal statute that no prior decision is necessary to give clear notice of it to an official. . . Also, a general constitutional rule set out in preexisting case law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific circumstances facing the official. . . The official's conduct may be so egregious that an objective and reasonable official must have known it was unconstitutional even without any fact-specific caselaw on point. . . Such exceptions are rare, however. The general rule is that '[g]eneral propositions have little to do with the concept of qualified immunity. If case law, in factual terms, has not staked out a bright line, qualified immunity almost always protects the defendant.' . . This case, where Rowe is alleging that Lazarus's actions constituted 'malicious prosecution,' falls squarely within the general rule. Rowe can only prove that Lazarus's actions violated Rowe's clearly established rights by pointing us to case law that was extant at the time of Lazarus's acts, which concluded that conduct 'materially similar' to Lazarus's violated a federal right.").

Marsh v. Butler County, 268 F.3d 1014, 1031-34(11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("When looking at the preexisting case law, courts, dealing with qualified immunity defenses, must always keep in mind the great distinction between following a precedent and extending a precedent. Two sets of circumstances may be 'nearly' the same, but 'nearly' can make a great legal difference at the edge. Because fair and clear notice to government officials is the cornerstone of qualified immunity, courts must diligently analyze the preexisting case law to determine whether it really did provide plain notice to every reasonable government official that the pertinent conduct, in the specific circumstances, would clearly violate preexisting federal law. . . . When the facts of previous precedents are necessary to give clear warning that certain conduct in specific circumstances will violate federal law, we must look at the facts in the precedent and at the facts that confronted the government official in the case before the court. The two sets of facts must be materially similar. For qualified immunity purposes, a preexisting precedent is materially similar to the circumstances facing an official when the specific circumstances facing the official are enough like the facts in the precedent that no reasonable, similarly-situated official could believe that the factual differences between the precedent and the circumstances facing the official might make a difference to the conclusion about whether the official's conduct was lawful or unlawful, in the light of the precedent. Thus, every fact need not be identical. But minor variations in some facts (the precedent lacks an arguably significant fact or contains an additional arguably significant fact not in the circumstances now facing the official) might be very important and, therefore, be able to make the circumstances facing an official materially different from the preexisting precedents, leaving the law applicable–in the circumstances facing the official–not clearly established when the defendant official acted. To apply properly this 'materially similar' principle, the court, surveying the relevant area of law, must discern the facts that were material to the federal law violation in similar preexisting cases. [footnote omitted] These facts then must be compared to the facts alleged in the case before the court. If there is an absence of a fact (or the presence of an additional fact) in the case before the court, the court must determine whether that fact might make a difference to any reasonable official who had to determine whether his conduct violated federal law in the circumstances in the immediate case. If the court determines that the variance might make a difference, the precedent–when factual particularity is needed to establish the law–cannot clearly establish the law applicable to the circumstances facing the defendant. . . . We conclude, considering the preexisting case law of this circuit (which had cases with very similar facts) and of the Supreme Court (which made it plain that lack of physical injury did not mean that no Eighth Amendment violation had been established), that no reasonable sheriff could have concluded that the alleged conditions at the Jail failed to pose a substantial risk of serous harm, although no serious injury was alleged to have occurred at the Jail before the injuries suffered by Plaintiffs. That the alleged jail conditions posed no substantial risk of serious harm is incapable of being convincingly argued, considering the preexisting law.).

Marsh v. Butler County, 268 F.3d 1014, 1039, 1040 (11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("Considering the absence of preexisting precedent dealing with the release of sick or injured inmates, we must conclude that a reasonable sheriff, in July 1996, could determine that the fact of his having a policy of releasing sick or injured inmates–that is, giving inmates their liberty–could make all the difference on whether a medical-needs-related violation of the Federal Constitution would arise for the sick or injured inmates. Not only was the legal landscape, in July 1996, totally barren of cases deciding that giving a sick or injured prisoner his liberty would violate his federal rights, . . . the only case to our knowledge that had earlier discussed the pertinent legal point reached the opposite conclusion. . . . The decided cases, preexisting the inmate release underlying this suit, said that the decisive fact which obligated a prison official to provide medical care to a prisoner is the fact of the prisoner's involuntary confinement, confinement that prevented the prisoner from obtaining care from other sources. By releasing a prisoner (for example, at a public place), a sheriff can enable the prisoner to obtain care from other sources (something that eventually happened in this very case). A reasonable Sheriff in 1996 could believe that releasing sick and injured inmates was lawful. The 'fact of confinement' in the preexisting cases limited the duty of jailers and–more important for qualified immunity purposes–removed the power of the preexisting precedents to put sheriffs on fair and clear notice that releasing injured prisoners certainly would constitute deliberate indifference to an inmate's serious medical needs.").

Lewis v. McDade, 250 F.3d 1320, 1321 (11th Cir. 2001) (denying petition for rehearing en banc) (Edmondson, J., and Dubina, J., concurring) ("No party or judge has presented us with a materially similar case that would have put Defendant on clear notice that his behavior– in the light of the fact that the female employees (now Plaintiffs) willingly participated in the mutual teasing and joking that constituted the sexual conduct in the office–violated the Constitution. When, as here, the legal consequences of a set of facts is unclear under the preexisting law at the time of the event, qualified immunity applies.").

Lewis v. McDade, 250 F.3d 1320, 1322, 1333 (11th Cir. 2001) (denying petition for rehearing en banc) (Barkett, J., dissenting) ("In finding that no pre-existing case was sufficiently similar, the court takes the clearly established inquiry to a level of specificity that runs afoul of the Supreme Court's holdings in Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640, 107 S.Ct. 3034, 97 L.Ed.2d 523 (1987), and United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 267, 269 (1997) . . . . Although manifestations of sexual harassment may differ, its purpose and intent is readily discernible from a range of acts that need not be explicitly catalogued or itemized in order to put any reasonable person on notice that the conduct constitutes sexual harassment. . . .It is . . . ludicrous to hold that a reasonable district attorney would not know that, inter alia, throwing coins down his female employees blouses and photographing their buttocks constitutes sexual harassment unless a pre-existing case had found identical conduct unconstitutional.").

Chesser v. Sparks, 248 F.3d 1117, 1123 (11th Cir. 2001) ("Chesser cites no case, and our independent research has uncovered none, holding that a statement such as Chesser's, made in the same or similar context, satisfies the first prong of the Pickering test. [footnote omitted] Because 'case law, in factual terms, has not staked out a bright line,' Post v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 7 F.3d 1552, 1557 (11th Cir.1993), indicating that Chesser's speech was a matter of public concern, a reasonable government official in Sparks's position would have had no reason to believe that the Constitution protected Chesser's statement that the County's refusal to pay overtime wages would violate the FLSA.").

Denno v. School Board of Volusia County, 218 F.3d 1267, 1274, 1275 (11th Cir. 2000) ("The instant case involves display of the Confederate flag during school hours and on school premises. We do not believe that it would be unreasonable for a school official to believe that such displays have uncivil aspects akin to those referred to in Fraser, in that many people are offended when the Confederate flag is worn on a tee-shirt or otherwise displayed. . . We cannot conclude that only a plainly incompetent school official would have viewed the instant circumstances as implicating legitimate school functions relating to civility, and thus subject to the school's authority under the more flexible Fraser standard to balance the freedom of one student to advocate unpopular and controversial views at school against the school's countervailing interest in teaching students the boundaries of socially appropriate behavior. . . . The balancing analysis under the Fraser standard would be analogous to that discussed by this court in a case involving a public employer's discharge of an employee because of the employee's comments to the press on matters of public concern. . . . Similarly, we cannot conclude that a Fraser balancing of the circumstances in the instant case would lead to the inevitable conclusion that the individual defendants here violated the First Amendment rights of the students. We cannot conclude that the prohibition of the displays of the Confederate flag in this case are 'so obviously wrong, in the light of pre-existing law, that only a plainly incompetent officer or one who was knowingly violating the law would have done such a thing.'").

Priester v. City of Riviera Beach, 208 F.3d 919, 926-28 & n.6 (11th Cir. 2000) ("In the context of Fourth Amendment excessive force claims, we have noted that generally no bright line exists for identifying when force is excessive; we have therefore concluded that unless a controlling and materially similar case declares the official's conduct unconstitutional, a defendant is usually entitled to qualified immunity. . . . A narrow exception exists to the rule requiring particularized case law to establish clearly the law in excessive force cases. When an excessive force plaintiff shows "that the official's conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of caselaw," the official is not entitled to the defense of qualified immunity. . . . Although the clearly-excessive-even-in-absence-of-case-law standard is a difficult one to meet, we think that, on the facts of this case, the law was clearly established in February 1994 (the date that this incident occurred) that what Defendant Wheeler did violated Plaintiff's constitutional rights. The Defendants' version of the facts and Plaintiff's version were not similar, but were sharply at odds on almost every important point. The jury accepted Plaintiff's version. . . . On Plaintiff's version of the facts, which we must accept, Defendant Wheeler ordered and allowed his dog to attack and bite Plaintiff; threatened to kill Plaintiff when Plaintiff kicked the dog in an effort to resist the unprovoked attack; and let the dog attack Plaintiff for at least two minutes. Considering these facts, no particularized preexisting case law was necessary for it to be clearly established that what Defendant Wheeler did violated Plaintiff's constitutional right to be free from the excessive use of force. No reasonable police officer could believe that this force was permissible given these straightforward circumstances. . . . Cushing observed the entire attack and had the time and ability to intervene, but he did nothing. No particularized case law was necessary for a reasonable police officer to know that, on the facts of this case and given that the duty to intervene was clearly established, he should have intervened. . . . . We do not decide today that qualified immunity could never protect a defendant that a jury has found used excessive force. We simply say that, on these facts, no reasonable officer could have concluded that the amount of force used was reasonable.").

Maggio v. Sipple, 211 F.3d 1346, 1354, 1355 (11th Cir. 2000) ("Because the analysis of First Amendment retaliation claims under the Pickering-Connick test 'involve[s] legal determinations that are intensely fact-specific and do not lend themselves to clear, bright-line rules ... a defendant in a First Amendment suit will only rarely be on notice that his actions are unlawful.' [citing Martin v. Baugh] To establish that the defendant was on notice, the plaintiff must 'either produce a case in which speech materially similar to [hers] in all Pickering-Connick respects was held protected, ... or show that, on the facts of [her] case, no reasonable person could believe that both prongs of the test had not been met.'").

Kyle K. v. Chapman, 208 F.3d 940, 943 (11th Cir. 2000) ("Defendants in this case are not decision makers as defined in Youngberg. Instead they are the direct care workers whose primary responsibility is carrying out the directions of the officials who determine patient care. Plaintiffs have cited no case in which non-professionals such as these defendants were held to have violated the rights alleged. Whether the Youngberg standards should apply to non-professionals may be arguable, but with no clearly established law to that effect, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.").

McElligott v. Foley, 182 F.3d 1248, 1260 (11th Cir. 1999) ("Well before the actions here, we established the Eighth Amendment principles that govern this case. Indeed, virtually all the precedents cited to support our conclusion that there was sufficient evidence for a jury to conclude that Dr. Foley and Wagner were deliberately indifferent to Elmore's serious medical needs were decided before this case arose. Given the abundance of caselaw from our circuit defining the parameters of deliberate indifference, we cannot say that defendants lacked fair warning that their conduct violated the Eighth Amendment.").

Sanders v. Howze, 177 F.3d 1245, 1249, 1250 (11th Cir. 1999) ("The core qualified immunity issue in this case is whether, prior to November 8, 1989, case law of this circuit had 'clearly established' the federal statutory or constitutional rights of a suicidal jail inmate vis a vis his jailers in a concrete factual context so as to make it obvious to a reasonable jailer that his actions violate federal law. . . . We disagree with the district court's analysis. Indeed, the statements made in the district court's opinion are mere conclusory statements or 'sweeping propositions of law' which instruct a government actor not to be 'deliberately indifferent' without defining that term or providing the requisite guidance to him for stripping him of qualified immunity. . . . When considering whether the law is clearly established, the specific facts of the cases relied upon as precedent are important. . .The facts need not be the same as the facts of the immediate case but they do need to be materially similar. Public officials are not obligated to be creative or imaginative in drawing analogies from previously decided cases.").

Jones v. Cannon, 174 F.3d 1271, 1286 (11th Cir. 1999) ("While officers have been subject to liability for failing to intervene when another officer uses excessive force, . . . there is no previous decision from the Supreme Court or this Circuit holding that an officer has a duty to intervene and is therefore liable under the circumstances presented here. There is no controlling authority clearly establishing that once a police officer knows another officer has fabricated a confession in a police report for a warrantless arrest, that police officer has a constitutional duty to intervene to stop the other officer's conduct.").

Moniz v. City of Ft. Lauderdale, 145 F.3d 1278, 1282-83 (11th Cir. 1998) ("[A]ccepting as true Moniz's assertion that appellant Donisi informed him that he had recommended two of the top five scoring African-American candidates for promotion in order to increase the number of African-American sergeants, a justification consistent with the promotional goal articulated in the consent decree, appellants are entitled to qualified immunity unless Moniz can demonstrate that appellants should have known, based on clearly established law as of 1993 and 1995, the years in which the challenged promotions were awarded, that their use of race as a factor in making promotions consistent with the consent decree was unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . We are aware of no legal authority –and Moniz points to none–that would have put appellants on notice that their consideration of race as a factor in making promotion decisions consistent with a consent decree the validity of which remained unchallenged would violate Moniz's equal protection rights.").

Ensley v. Soper, 142 F.3d 1402, 1406 (11th Cir. 1998) ("Any case law that a plaintiff relies upon to show that a government official has violated a clearly established right must pre-date the officer's alleged improper conduct, involve materially similar facts, and 'truly compel' the conclusion that the plaintiff had a right under federal law.").

Martin v. Baugh, 141 F.3d 1417, 1420 (11th Cir. 1998) ("Because both prongs involve legal determinations that are intensely fact-specific and do not lend themselves to clear, bright-line rules, it is nearly impossible for a reasonable person to predict how a court will weigh the myriad factors that inform an application of the Pickering-Connick test. . . Consequently, a defendant in a First Amendment suit will only rarely be on notice that his actions are unlawful. Unless the plaintiff can either produce a case in which speech materially similar to his in all Pickering-Connick respects was held protected . . . or show that, on the facts of his case, no reasonable person could believe that both prongs of the test had not been met, he cannot defeat a defense of qualified immunity.").

Gold v. City of Miami, 138 F.3d 886, 888 (11th Cir. 1998) (Barkett, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) ("Under Lanier's fair warning standard, the police officers are not entitled to qualified immunity in this case. First, at the time of Gold's arrest, the Supreme Court had specifically held that speech critical of police officers is constitutionally protected. Second, . . . the Florida Supreme Court had specifically reversed, as violative of the First Amendment, disorderly conduct convictions of defendants who had not only used expletives, but also made threatening comments to police officers–conduct far more egregious than Gold's. Finally, every other circuit that has addressed the issue of qualified immunity in a situation similar to that present here has had no trouble concluding that a police officer is not entitled to qualified immunity in these circumstances.").

Badia v. City of Miami, 133 F.3d 1443, 1446 (11th Cir. 1998) ("[I]t is not clearly established in this Circuit that an EEOC charge and a federal court complaint involving an otherwise purely personal matter are speech on a matter of public concern that are entitled to First Amendment protection.").

Smith v. Mattox, 127 F.3d 1416, 1419-20 (11th Cir. 1997) ("Fourth Amendment jurisprudence has staked no bright line for identifying force as excessive. Thus, unless a controlling and factually similar case declares the official's conduct unconstitutional, an excessive-force plaintiff can overcome qualified immunity only by showing that the official's conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of caselaw. . . . [A]ssuming as we must that Smith was offering no resistance at all, the considerable effort and force inferable from the grunt, Smith's sensation of a blow, and the broken arm was obviously unnecessary to restrain even a previously fractious arrestee. We thus conclude that this case falls within the slender category of cases in which the unlawfulness of the conduct is readily apparent even without clarifying caselaw. This does not mean, of course, that Mattox will not ultimately be entitled to immunity. If a jury, for example through special interrogatories, indicates that it believes Mattox's testimony that Smith continued to resist arrest until his arm was broken, it will be appropriate for the district court to revisit the issue whether Mattox's force was patently unreasonable.").

Jones v. City of Dothan, 121 F.3d 1456, 1459, 1460 (11th Cir. 1997) ("The magistrate judge's qualified immunity analysis falls short of the fact-intensive inquiry that the qualified immunity standard demands. . . . Rather than basing its analysis solely on a general proposition, the magistrate judge should have applied the facts of this case and asked whether, as of February 11, 1994, it was clearly established that it was unconstitutional for officers to patdown a man suspected of repeatedly harassing a woman and chasing her from her place of employment where the officers neither handcuffed nor placed the man in a patrol car, and where the officers expected to remain in the man's presence pending identification by the victim.").

Gold v. City of Miami, 121 F.3d 1442, 1446 (11th Cir. 1997) ("Given that what constitutes legally proscribed disorderly conduct is subject to great subjective interpretation of specific facts–for example, the words used, the tone used, the decibels used, and the reaction of onlookers–we are constrained to conclude that a reasonable officer in the same circumstances and possessing the same knowledge as the officers in this case could have reasonably believed that probable cause existed to arrest Gold for disorderly conduct. The evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Gold, reflects that Gold twice used profanities in a loud voice, in a public place, and in the presence of others. At the time, no cases clearly established that those actions did not constitute legally proscribed disorderly conduct.").

Lancaster v. Monroe County, 116 F.3d 1419, 1426 (11th Cir. 1997) (law was clearly established that "sheriffs and jailers cannot place or keep a chronic alcoholic in jail without any medical supervision, when the defendants are aware that the alcoholic is suffering from a severe form of alcohol withdrawal.").

Jenkins v. Talladega City Bd. of Educ., 115 F.3d 821, 823, 825 n.3, 828 (11th Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("The principles of qualified immunity set out in Lassiter . . . continue to be the guiding directives for deciding cases involving the question of a state actor's entitlement to qualified immunity in this circuit. . . . Our job . . . is to decide a narrow legal issue in light of our binding circuit precedent: on May 1, 1992, the date on which the relevant conduct at issue in this case occurred, was the law clearly established such that all reasonable teachers standing in the defendants' place reasonably should have known that the search to locate allegedly stolen money violated Jenkins' and McKenzie's Fourth Amendment rights? Applying the principles explicitly stated in Lassiter, we conclude that, at the time these events took place, the law pertaining to the application of the Fourth Amendment to the search of students at school had not been developed in a concrete, factually similar context to the extent that educators were on notice that their conduct was constitutionally impermissible. . . . The dissent contends that the Supreme Court's recent decision in United States v. Lanier . . . calls into question our conclusion that T.L.O., while establishing general principles that necessarily must govern any Fourth Amendment analysis of a school search, did not explicitly apply those principles to specific facts such that the defendants–and any reasonable individuals faced with the same circumstances–should have known that their conduct in this case violated clearly established constitutional norms. Lanier, however, is entirely consistent with both the reasoning and result reached by our court in this case. . . . It is true that the Court described the appropriate standard as being whether the unlawfulness is apparent in light of preexisting law. Although this circuit has elaborated and said that 'preexisting law must dictate, that is, truly compel (not just suggest or allow or raise a question about)' the unlawfulness of the challenged conduct, Lassiter, 28 F.3d at 1150, we do not believe that our elaboration indicates a standard substantively different from that of the Supreme Court. The Court in Lanier does not address or alter in any way our understanding of the underlying purpose or legal framework with respect to qualified immunity; rather, the Court's holding equates the standard of specificity required to provide fair warning in a criminal context under ' 242 with that required to clearly establish the law for purposes of civil liability. . . . [A]lthough general principles of law can provide fair warning, they do not necessarily provide such warning unless the constitutional rule at issue may be applied 'with obvious clarity.' As acknowledged by the dissent, the question is whether T.L.O. established 'with obvious clarity' that the school search at issue was unconstitutional. Put simply, we do not think this is an 'easy' case, nor do we view T.L.O. as applicable to the instant facts 'with obvious clarity.'").

Jenkins v. Talladega City Bd. of Educ., 115 F.3d 821, 827 n.4 (11th Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("The Supreme Court in Lanier simply did not address the extent to which decisions of the "lower courts" must, should, or may be considered in deciding whether a constitutional right has been clearly established, nor did it identify any impropriety in considering only the decisions of the circuit or highest court of the state in which the relevant events took place. We therefore do not construe Lanier as being in conflict with our precedent regarding the relevant decisional law to which we must look in analyzing a claim of qualified immunity.").

Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1536-37 (11th Cir. 1996) ("To prevail on a claim about family privacy, parents need to prove that a state actor interfered with a protected liberty interest without sufficient justification. This constitutional tort requires no element of intent. . . . Violations of the right to family association are determined by a balancing of competing interests. . . So, state officials who act to investigate or to protect children where there are allegations of abuse almost never act within the contours of 'clearly established law.'").

Riley v. Newton, 94 F.3d 632, 637 (11th Cir. 1996) ("Our case law does not speak to whether a joint investigation which culminates in the military person arresting a civilian is a violation of the Posse Comitatus Act. Assuming, however, that a willful use of a military person to make an arrest would be a violation of the Act under the plain words of the statute, . . . no case law makes it clear that Glisson could be said to have wilfully used Newton to make an arrest. . . . Absent case law defining "wilful use" as the failure to prevent military personnel from making arrests when participating in a joint investigation, Glisson cannot be said to have violated clearly established law.").

Cooper v. Smith, 89 F.3d 761, 765 (11th Cir. 1996) ("In this qualified immunity context, we then have to determine whether the inevitable conclusion of the Pickering balance is that Cooper's discharge was unlawful. . . . An analysis of the case law reveals that it was clearly established at the time Smith refused to renew Cooper's commission that it was a violation of Cooper's First Amendment rights to take adverse action against him for cooperating with an official law enforcement investigation.").

McMillian v. Johnson, 88 F.3d 1554, 1565 (11th Cir. 1996) ("We do not view the absence of a case factually similar to the extraordinary allegations in this case as an indication that the law was not clearly established that confining a pretrial detainee on death row to punish him is unconstitutional. Bell's prohibition on any pretrial punishment, defined to include conditions imposed with an intent to punish, should have made it obvious to all reasonable officials in [each defendant's] place that holding McMillian on death row to punish him before he was tried violated McMillian's due process rights.").

Suissa v. Fulton County, 74 F.3d 266, 270 (11th Cir. 1995) (per curiam) ("Our focus must . . . be a narrow one: whether the law was clearly established at the time of Hubbard's alleged actions that an unsuccessful attempt to influence speech violates the First Amendment. The facts of the speech retaliation cases involve retaliation after speech occurs, which is not 'materially similar' to unsuccessful attempts to prevent or influence protected speech. [cite omitted] Both situations involve speech and the First Amendment, but that is far too general a level of abstraction for qualified immunity purposes.").

Dolihite v. Maughon, 74 F.3d 1027, 1041 (11th Cir. 1996) ("Although Romeo establishes that the involuntarily civilly committed have certain due process rights and that those rights are at least as extensive as the rights of the criminally institutionalized, that broad legal truism is insufficient to clearly establish the law for purposes of overcoming the appellants' qualified immunity claims in this case.").

Pickens v. Hollowell, 59 F.3d 1203, 1206 (11th Cir. 1995) ("The merits question . . .is whether it violates the Fourth Amendment for law enforcement officers to arrest based upon a warrant supported by probable cause if they know that the statute of limitations period has run. But this case is not here for a review on the merits; it is here for a review of the district court's qualified immunity ruling. The qualified immunity issue is whether . . . the law was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment forbade an arrest based upon an otherwise valid warrant if the arresting officers knew the statute of limitations period had run.").

Swint v. City of Wadley, 51 F.3d 988, 1001 (11th Cir. 1995) ("This Court has recently joined the First, Sixth and Ninth Circuits in purporting to narrow the scope of Graham, by holding 'that a non-seizure Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim of excessive force survives Graham.' [citing Wilson v. Northcutt] However, ... [a]t the time of these raids, the law was not clearly established that excessive force in connection with a search violated not only the Fourth Amendment but also the Due Process Clause.").

Rodgers v. Horsley, 39 F.3d 308, 311 (11th Cir. 1994) ("The question in this case is not whether, in general, involuntarily committed patients have a legally cognizable interest under the Fourteenth Amendment to safe conditions. They do. Instead, the question in this case, as in all qualified immunity cases, is fact specific: in May 1991, was it clearly established in this circuit that it was unconstitutional for a mental institution to fail to supervise a patient for fifteen minutes in the smoking room, when she was on close watch status for a health problem, when the institution had a history of some 'sexual contact' involving patients other than plaintiff but no history of rape for the past twelve years, where a previous patient who was to be similarly monitored disappeared, apparently escaped through a bathroom window, and fell to her death on a ledge below, and where the plaintiff had never before complained of unwanted sexual contact from either the patient accused, any other patient, or any member of the staff? The answer is 'NO.'").

Alexander v. University of North Florida, 39 F.3d 290, 291-92 (11th Cir. 1994) ("As we explained in [Lassiter], qualified immunity for government officials is the rule, liability and trials for liability the exception . . . . Plaintiffs rely mainly on the decision in Cornelius v. Town of Highland Lake . . . to satisfy the burden. . . . Cornelius, at most, creates some ambiguity about whether a state may owe a duty of protection to someone outside the traditional custodial relationship. But, nothing in Cornelius comes close to the 'clearly established' standard required to overcome the qualified immunity defense in this case. . . . In addition, no case has been called to our attention in which neither the assailant nor the victim was in custody and in which the special duty to protect has been found and applied to support liability.").

Spivey v. Elliott, 29 F.3d 1522, 1527 (11th Cir. 1994) ("There are no bright lines here. Because no reported case addressed this kind of residential school, the district court and the parties were forced to interpret analogous cases. The district court held that no liberty interest was implicated. On the other hand, we hold that our analysis leads us to an opposite conclusion. Where there is so much room for differing interpretations, we cannot say the contours of the right were clearly established. In Taylor, we extended the right held by involuntarily committed mental patients to involuntarily placed foster children. In a circumstance such as this where an eight-year-old hearing impaired child is in the State's care 24 hours a day five days a week, the facts are sufficiently analogous to Taylor to create a relationship between the child and the State such that the State has a duty to protect the child from harm. While it is logical to extend the analysis in Taylor to these facts, we cannot say that the extension was so obvious as to put the defendants on notice of potential wrongdoing. Because this right was not clearly established . . . the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Lassiter v. Alabama A & M University, Bd. of Trustees, 28 F.3d 1146, 1149-50 (11th Cir. 1994) (en banc) ("For the law to be clearly established to the point that qualified immunity does not apply, the law must have earlier been developed in such a concrete and factually defined context to make it obvious to all reasonable government actors, in the defendant's place, that 'what he is doing' violates federal law. [citing Anderson] Qualified immunity is a doctrine that focuses on the actual, on the specific, on the details of concrete cases. The most common error we encounter, as a reviewing court, occurs on this point: courts must not permit plaintiffs to discharge their burden [footnote omitted] by referring to general rules and to the violation of abstract 'rights' .... For qualified immunity to be surrendered, pre-existing law must dictate, that is, truly compel (not just suggest or allow or raise a question about), the conclusion for every like-situated, reasonable government agent that what defendant is doing violates federal law in the circumstances.").

Harris v. Coweta County, 21 F.3d 388, 394 (11th Cir. 1994) ("The contours of unreasonable delay in providing treatment for serious medical needs were defined with enough particularity to allow a reasonable sheriff with Sheriff Hammett's information to understand whether his actions were lawful. Under the clearly established legal norms, a reasonable sheriff would have known that delaying prescribed treatment for a serious medical need for several weeks for a nonmedical reason may violate an inmate's constitutional rights.").

Adams v. St. Lucie County Sheriff's Department, 998 F.2d 923 (11th Cir. 1993) (per curiam) (en banc), adopting dissenting opinion of Judge Edmondson, 962 F.2d 1563, 1575-76 (11th Cir. 1992) ("Because plaintiff has failed to produce clearly established law showing that the police in 1985 would reasonably know they were 'seizing' decedent by ramming the fleeing car, defendants are entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds . . . . Even if I assumed that the law in 1985 clearly established that striking a car constituted a seizure, I would still conclude that defendants were due qualified immunity because plaintiff has produced no case law to support the idea that the method of seizure was unreasonable within the context of the Fourth Amendment and the facts of this case.").

Carter v. City of Montgomery, 473 F.Supp.3d 1273, ____ & n.7 (M.D. Ala. 2020) ("A defense attorney may not absent himself from a critical stage in his client's proceedings. . . Case law has settled that point. . . No reasonable attorney could believe that he adequately represented his client by absenting himself from a hearing at which a court jailed his client. Although no case in this Circuit has held an attorney liable under parallel facts, Mr. Carter need not point to fact-bound case precedent when cases have clearly established the broader right to counsel. . . And to the extent that Mr. Kloess's reply brief can be read to argue that existing case law has not clearly established a public defender's liability for depriving a defendant of his right to counsel, such an argument misses the point. Qualified immunity analysis asks if a right has been clearly established not if another court has applied the same remedy to vindicate a violation of that right. That distinction accords with qualified immunity's core rationale — preventing public officials from discharging their duties with undue timidity. The doctrine avoids chilling a public official taking acts that might violate another's rights. When, however, an action will violate another's rights, tort liability should deter a public official from taking that action regardless of whether the official is certain that he can be sued. The immunity is qualified and not absolute precisely because public officials should exercise restraint before knowingly violating a clearly established right. Mr. Kloess is not entitled to qualified immunity because his actions, if proven, violated clearly established law. . . . Mr. Carter argues that public defenders are not the type of public officials whom qualified immunity shields. The Court need not answer whether a public defender may claim qualified immunity in these circumstances; assuming the doctrine applies, Mr. Kloess's actions violated Mr. Carter's clearly established Sixth Amendment rights.")

Howard v. Wilkinson, No. 617CV1473ORL40GJK, 2018 WL 1583638, at *7-8 & n.6 (M.D. Fla. Apr. 2, 2018) ("The Officer Defendants next argue that there 'was no clearly established law proscribing a takedown of a resisting detainee.'. . They insist that, in the aftermath of the Kingsley decision clarifying the elements of a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim, there was 'a dearth of on-point factual law in the pretrial detainee context' informing officers of what they can and cannot do. . .That is, in the absence of opinions applying Kingsley in factually similar cases, there was no 'clearly established' use of force law the Officer Defendants could have violated. This argument is, of course, absurd. 'For a constitutional right to be clearly established, its contours "must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right."'. . Even in novel factual circumstances, 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law....' . . . So a right can be clearly established before a Court speaks directly to the precise factual circumstances. At the time of the incident, the Eleventh Circuit had firmly established the right of a non-resisting individual to (i) be free from being pepper sprayed gratuitously, and (ii) not be slammed head first into a hard floor. . . Furthermore, the Officer Defendants overstate the 'upheaval' in use of force caselaw occasioned by the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley. . . That case merely eliminated the requirement imposed by several Circuit Courts—including the Eleventh—that plaintiffs prove an officer's subjective awareness that their use of force was unreasonable to make out an excessive force claim. . . It did not otherwise abrogate the decisional excessive force law in this Circuit. In light of the continued viability of excessive force cases pre-dating Kingsley, a reasonable official occupying the Officer Defendants' position would understand that their actions violated Mr. Howard's Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . This conclusion is fortified by the extreme force alleged in the Complaint and lack of a compelling justification to use such force. . . .It is worth noting that the allegations of the Complaint might plausibly state a claim for excessive use of force under the pre-Kingsley Eleventh Circuit law, which required that officials act 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . In such an inquiry, Fennell instructed courts to consider factors similar to the Kingsley factors. . . ("[1] the need for the application of force; [2] the relationship between the need and the amount of force that was used; [3] the extent of the injury inflicted upon the prisoner;

[4] the extent of the threat to the safety of staff and inmates; and [5] any efforts made to temper the severity of a forceful response."). That is to say, even under pre-Kingsley law (which was more favorable to officer-defendants), reasonable officials in the Officer Defendants' shoes would have been on notice that their conduct violated Mr. Howard's Fourteenth Amendment rights. The Court therefore has no difficulty finding that they would have been on notice post-Kingsley.")

Esposito v. Stone, No. 8:14-CV-2414-T-33EAJ, 2015 WL 5440599, at *8-9 (M.D. Fla. Sept. 15, 2015) (Applying the Kingsley factors, "[t]he Court has determined that a reasonable jury could find that a constitutional violation occurred. The next inquiry is whether the constitutional violation was clearly established. In determining whether a right is clearly established, '[t]he relevant, dispositive inquiry ... is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . .The Eleventh Circuit has explained, 'Claims involving the mistreatment of arrestees or pretrial detainees in custody are governed by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause instead of the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause, which applies to such claims by convicted prisoners.'. . 'However, the applicable standard is the same, so decision law involving prison inmates applies equally to cases involving arrestees or pretrial detainees.'. .These cases uniformly hold that gratuitous use of force against an individual who is not resisting is excessive. [collecting cases] After considering the numerous authorities explaining that police officers may not punch non-resisting arrestees and that unnecessary and gratuitous use of force is unconstitutional, and considering the evidence in the light most favorable to Esposito, the Court must conclude that the constitutional violation alleged was clearly established. Defendants' motion for summary judgment, including Defendants' request for qualified immunity, is accordingly denied. In denying summary judgment, the Court underscores that its analysis is based on the version of the facts set forth by Esposito, which drastically and irreconcilably clashes with the version of the facts described by the Defendant Officers.")

Evans v. Bayer, 684 F.Supp.2d 1365, 1374-77 (S.D. Fla. 2010) ("Regardless of the standard used, Evans's speech falls under the wide umbrella of protected speech. It was an opinion of a student about a teacher, that was published off-campus, did not cause any disruption on-campus, and was not lewd, vulgar, threatening, or advocating illegal or dangerous behavior. Therefore, the Court finds that Evans had a constitutional right. The next inquiry is whether it was a clearly established right. . . . Bayer argues that there is no established rule on student internet speech. This confusion certainly exists as to a number of questions (e.g., whether the speech was on campus or off; and the level of disruption or distraction tolerable). . . . Bayer relies on Doninger v. Niehoff, 527 F.3d 41 (2d Cir. 2008), and Kubany v. The School Board of Pinellas County, 839 F.Supp. 1544 (M.D. Fla. 1993), for the proposition that the right was not clearly established. However, these cases involved off-campus conduct that resulted in disruption on-campus. While they establish certain parameters of unprotected speech, the speech at issue here is categorically different. . . . While the controlling precedent may be unclear, this confusion cannot save Bayer when his actions do not even comport with the requirements for the regulation of on-campus speech. . . . [T]he Court finds

Mobley v. Manahugh, No. 8:07-cv-1833-T-33EAJ, 2009 WL 4562175, at *5, *6 (M.D. Fla. Dec. 2, 2009) ("Mobley alleges that Mark Montague and Michael Spirk unlawfully entered and searched his motel room on May 5, 2003. Mobley's claims have no merit because the protection of qualified immunity applies regardless of whether the government official's error is a mistake of fact, mistake of law, or a mistake based on mixed questions of law and fact. [citing Groh v. Ramirez] In 2003, the controlling law held that a co-occupant did not have the authority to consent to the search of premises that were jointly controlled or occupied if the target of the search was present and non-consenting. . . Here, the Defendants were mistaken about the facts and law in that they believed that a co-occupant could consent to a search over the objection of a present and non-consenting occupant. There is no evidence in this case that the Defendants intentionally and knowingly violated the law May 5, 2003. Moreover, there is no evidence, such as omitting or secreting Mobley's denial of consent, which lends itself to any suggestion the Defendants acted in bad faith. Defendants believed that Ms. Ramos could legally give consent to search the motel room and that she did so. . . . Qualified immunity still shields an officer from suit, even when a decision is constitutionally deficient, where an officer reasonably misapprehends the law governing the circumstances. . . The Defendants misapprehended the law regarding whether Ms. Ramos had the authority to consent but are still entitled to qualified immunity.").

Foster v. Raspberry, No. 4:08-CV-123 (CDL), 2009 WL 2355854, at 6-8 (M.D. Ga. July 29, 2009) ("The qualified immunity question presented in this case is whether Fourth Amendment law 'clearly established' that a strip search of a student for an iPod-without individualized suspicion-was unconstitutional. . . . . The Court finds that the Eleventh Circuit's decision in Thomas put Defendants on notice that the search of King violated King's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . One may ask: if the defendants in Redding were entitled to qualified immunity because the law on student strip searches was not clearly established until Redding was decided in 2009, then why are Defendants here not also entitled to qualified immunity for this search that occurred in 2007? The Court finds that the law in the Eleventh Circuit was clearly established in 2007 and that Redding, at least insofar as the Eleventh Circuit is concerned, did not change that. The controlling law at the time of this search was the Eleventh Circuit's holding in Thomas. The existing Eleventh Circuit precedent was not divergent. In the Eleventh Circuit, an intrusive search of a student over a non-dangerous item without individualized suspicion is a direct violation of that student's constitutional rights under the T.L.O. standard. Redding did not change this clearly established Eleventh Circuit law. In fact, it essentially confirmed what the Eleventh Circuit had held in Thomas. Therefore, at the time of the search here, it was clearly established that such strip searches were unconstitutional in this Circuit and Redding did not alter that established precedent. The reason the defendants in Redding were entitled to qualified immunity is that the law in the Ninth Circuit was not as clear at the time of the Redding search. . . . .The Court finds that in the Eleventh Circuit, Thomas was sufficiently on point to put school officials on notice that a search of the type allegedly conducted here was a violation of a student's constitutional rights under the Fourth Amendment. Redding did not announce a new legal principle, at least not for the Eleventh Circuit; rather it essentially confirmed what was already the clearly established law in this Circuit.").

Buckner v. Shetterley, No. 3:06-CV-79 (CDL), 2008 WL 5234279, at *2, *3 (M.D. Ga. Dec. 15, 2008) ("The Court finds that Eleventh Circuit precedent establishes, with obvious clarity, that a government official is prohibited from intentionally providing false information to law enforcement without probable cause and thereby directly causing a Fourth Amendment violation. The 'federal right to be free from prosecutions procured by false and misleading information' is well-established in the Eleventh Circuit. [citing cases] Defendant seeks to distinguish these cases by pointing to the fact that Defendant is not a law enforcement official. . . .The jury in this case found that Defendant intentionally provided false information to the police without probable cause, and as a direct result, Plaintiff suffered a violation of her Fourth Amendment rights. Under these circumstances, the Court finds that existing case law provided Defendant with ample warning that her conduct would violate Plaintiff's constitutional rights.").

H.Y. ex rel. K.Y. v. Russell County Bd. of Educ., 2007 WL 1128890, at *13 (M.D. Ala. Apr. 16, 2007) ("To the extent that Defendants try to distinguish Thomas, those efforts are unavailing. Their contention that no student was required to remove his or her clothing is inaccurate. As stated previously, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, all of the Plaintiffs were required to lift their shirts and most of them were required to drop their pants. Defendants did not have individualized suspicion. At the time of the strip searches, the object of the search was twelve dollars. The strip searches here were similar to those in Thomas. To be sure, there are factual differences. The searches here were not conducted in groups of four or five, no student in this case dropped his or her underwear, and the students in Thomas were in fifth grade while the students here were in seventh grade. Despite the factual differences, the Court concludes that the facts of this case are similar enough to those of Thomas to give Defendants fair warning that the strip searches they conducted violated the Fourth Amendment. To grant qualified immunity under these circumstances would be to return to the 'materially similar' standard that the Supreme Court rejected in Hope.").

Rauen v. City of Miami, No. 06-21182-CIV, 2007 WL 686609, at *19 , *20 (S.D. Fla. Mar. 2, 2007) ("In Counts Seven, Nine, Eleven, and Thirteen of the TAC, Plaintiffs allege that specific Individual Defendants directed the use of the police skirmish line to suppress protest of the FTAA meetings, resulting in violations of Plaintiffs' First Amendment rights. The Individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity unless their actions violated clearly established federal law. . . . In this case, Plaintiffs allege that they were peacefully protesting, Rauen on the grass near the Bayfront Amphitheater and Hartman on the east side of Biscayne Boulevard, when they were confronted by the skirmish line, struck with less lethal weapons, and forced to discontinue their protest. . . Plaintiffs allege that the Individual Defendants directed the unlawful activity of the skirmish line officers in order to suppress constitutionally-protected expressive activity. . . Taking Plaintiffs' allegations as true, clearly established federal law, at the time of the FTAA protests, made clear that the government's activity in suppressing peaceful protest in a public forum, in the absence of a compelling government interest in doing so, . . . was a violation of Plaintiffs' First Amendment rights. . . . Defendants frame the issue as whether it was clearly established that it was 'unconstitutional to use less-than-lethal weapons to disperse a crowd at a large public demonstration.'. . .Framing the issue in this manner does not compel a different result. First, the fact that less lethal weapons were used is irrelevant in the First Amendment context. Plaintiffs allege that Defendants infringed their First Amendment rights by forcing them to discontinue expressing themselves via peaceful protest. The method by which Defendants allegedly did this is irrelevant. Second, the text of the First Amendment does not contain an exception for large gatherings of people. . . Defendants had no rational reason to believe that they were entitled to violate the First Amendment's protections simply because many protestors, as opposed to one or a few, were present. . . The fact that Defendants acted in the context of a large demonstration does not alter the clearly established law set forth above. Defendants were aware, or should have been aware, that Plaintiffs were entitled to exercise their right to peacefully protest in the absence of a compelling government interest in quashing their protest. The mere fact that a large number of people are gathered does not constitute a 'compelling government interest' in limiting the First Amendment rights of the people present at the protest; to hold otherwise would be to eviscerate the First Amendment's protections. Because it was clearly established that Defendants could not constitutionally suppress the peaceful protests of Plaintiffs and others in a public forum in the absence of a compelling government interest, and because Defendants have not argued that such an interest existed, the undersigned finds that the Individual Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on Counts Seven, Nine, Eleven, and Thirteen of the TAC.").

Brown v. Smith, No. 5:05-CV-475 (DF), 2006 WL 1890192, at *7, *8 (M.D. Ga. July 10, 2006) ("Here, as in LaMarca, Plaintiffs allege that Defendant improperly and inadequately trained and supervised his staff, failed to investigate incidents of alleged sexual assaults, and granted staff virtually unrestricted access to inmates, thereby creating a permissive environment which allowed ill-intentioned staff members to prey on female inmates. While the two cases are not factually indistinguishable, the facts of LaMarca and the facts in the instant case are sufficiently similar to have made Defendant aware of the minimum constitutional standards for jail administration before his alleged constitutional violations. Although the sexual assaults at issue in LaMarca were committed by inmates against fellow inmates, and the sexual assaults here were allegedly committed by jailers against inmates, this distinction only strengthens the Court's opinion that Defendant had adequate notice that his failure to address reports of sexual misconduct by his employees could subject him to individual liability under § 1983. After the Eleventh Circuit recognized in LaMarca that a prison supervisor can be held liable for his failure to train and supervise his employees to prevent inmate violence, any reasonable prison or jail supervisor would conclude that his failure to implement training and supervisory measures to prevent sexual assaults by his own employees could also subject him to supervisory liability under § 1983. In sum, the Court finds that LaMarca made it apparent that a prison supervisor's failure to respond to numerous reports signaling an atmosphere within the prison that subjected inmates to the continuous threat of violence, including sexual assault, was unlawful, and could subject him to supervisory liability under § 1983. Accordingly, the Court concludes that the Plaintiffs' allegations against Defendant, if proven, will establish a violation of clearly established law.").

Phillips v. Irvin, No. 05-0131-WS-M, 2006 WL 1663677, at *15 n.38 (S.D. Ala. June 14, 2006) ("Vinyard and Lee are hardly unique in the landscape of Eleventh Circuit jurisprudence. To the contrary, other Eleventh Circuit decisions have either found excessive force violations or denied qualified immunity where law enforcement officers have engaged in unnecessary use of force after arresting and subduing a suspect. [citing cases] Upon reviewing this body of precedent, one court has astutely observed that '[c]ases in which the language of the Fourth Amendment itself has been sufficient to put the officer on notice that his conduct was in violation of the law appear to be cases involving the use of significant force after an arrestee has been subdued. For example, beating a suspect, kicking a suspect, or slamming the head of a suspect [into] the ground is conduct which deprives the law enforcement officers of qualified immunity when the suspect was handcuffed and did not struggle or resist the officers in any way and did not attempt to flee.' Johnson v. Wright, 423 F.Supp.2d 1242, 1258 (M.D.Ala.2005) (citation omitted). This case fits neatly within that paradigm. Thus, as of March 2003, it was clearly established in the Eleventh Circuit that the use of significant force against a compliant, non-resistant arrestee who had already been subdued and handcuffed was unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment.").

Johnson v. City of Clanton, Alabama, No. 2:04-CV-117-F, 2005 WL 1618556, at *11 (M.D. Ala. July 7, 2005) ("Cases in which the language of the Fourth Amendment itself has been sufficient to put the officer on notice that his conduct was in violation of the law appear to be cases involving the use of significant force after an arrestee has been subdued. . . . In light of the allegations in this case, the Court is persuaded that Wright and Olgilvie had fair warning that the conduct in which they were allegedly engaged violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibitions on excessive force. Moreover, the Court finds that at this stage in the litigation it cannot say that based on the facts as alleged and the reasonable inferences from those facts, a reasonable officer could have believed that he had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff. Arrest without probable cause is a violation of clearly established law under the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, Wright and Olgilvie are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage in the litigation and their motions to dismiss on that ground must be denied.")

Braswell v. Bd. of Regents of the University System of Georgia, 369 F.Supp.2d 1371, 1378-80 (N.D. Ga. 2005) ("Until recently, in the Eleventh Circuit, the rule was that a plaintiff must show that the federal right in question has been defined by prior cases with 'concrete circumstances' and 'materially similar' facts. . . This stringent requirement was satisfied only in the rarest of circumstances, making qualified immunity a 'nearly insuperable obstacle' in the Eleventh Circuit. . . In Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), the Supreme Court rejected the 'materially similar' facts test developed by the Eleventh Circuit to determine whether a right is clearly established. . . . The Court described the 'materially similar' facts test as a 'rigid gloss on the qualified immunity standard [that] is not consistent with our cases.' . . .Thus, the Supreme Court rejected the Eleventh Circuit's 'materially similar' facts test in favor of a 'fair warning' test. In the wake of Hope, the Eleventh Circuit has given texture to the requirement that an official must have fair warning that his action violates a claimant's rights. In Vinyard v. Wilson, 311 F.3d 1340, 1349-55 (11th Cir.2002), the Court of Appeals identified three categories of cases in which the unlawfulness of an official's conduct is deemed clearly established: (1) where specific words in the federal statute or constitutional provision render the law applicable to the challenged conduct; (2) where judicial decisions clearly apply to a wide variety of factual circumstances; and (3) where precedents involve materially similar facts. . . As the first two categories suggest, a plaintiff may overcome the qualified immunity defense without relying on fact-specific case law when a preexisting constitutional rule applies with 'obvious clarity' to the conduct in question. . . . Even since Hope, courts have been hesitant to hold that the case-by-case First Amendment retaliation analysis espoused in Pickering and Connick applies with obvious clarity to a defendant's conduct. . . Here, where Braswell was terminated in response to her self-serving, insubordinate and unnecessarily harmful prepared statement, Pickering and Connick do not apply with 'obvious clarity' to preclude her termination. Braswell has failed to cite any Eleventh Circuit or United States Supreme Court case which would have given the Defendants reasonable notice that, taking into consideration the context, content, and forum of Braswell's speech, terminating her would subject the Defendants to section 1983 liability for retaliatory discharge. Consequently, Adams, Crumley and Evans are entitled to qualified immunity as to Braswell's claim of retaliatory discharge.").

Calhoun v. Thomas, 360 F.Supp.2d 1264, 1278, 1279 (M.D. Ala. 2005) ("Thus, even more so than in Hope, it does not take hindsight or tortured reasoning to arrive at the conclusion that relevant case law indicates that the use of force in this case was clearly established to be unconstitutional at the time the events allegedly occurred. Thomas and Wheeler's conduct in this case is not comparable to a split-second decision where an officer is physically threatened. They had Calhoun alone in an interrogation room, handcuffed and legcuffed, when they allegedly maliciously assaulted him not to restrain or subdue him, but for the very purpose of forcing him to make a statement, and to punish him for a robbery and shooting of which he had not yet been accused. . . . . The only genuine legal issue with respect to Calhoun's excessive-force claim is whether Calhoun was protected by the Fourth Amendment, as an arrestee, or the Fourteenth Amendment, as a pretrial detainee, at the moment the force was allegedly inflicted. This marginal uncertainty as to Calhoun's legal status during the events in question does not entitle Thomas and Wheeler to qualified immunity. Even if they mistakenly believed that Calhoun was protected under the Fourteenth Amendment at the time the force was inflicted and not the Fourth Amendment, as this court has concluded, their actions still violated clearly established law. Taken as true, Calhoun's version of events indicates that Thomas and Wheeler explicitly told him they were going to make him miserable until he gave them a statement about the robbery and shooting, and told him they wanted him to suffer. There is no question that by such statements and actions, they indicated an express desire to punish Calhoun. . . . [T]he abundance of Eleventh Circuit and Supreme Court case law compels the conclusion that, adopting Calhoun's version of events as true, Sheriff Thomas and Deputy Wheeler violated his clearly established constitutional right, regardless of whether that right is identified as a Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures or a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process right. Even if Calhoun was in fact protected under the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Fourth Amendment at the time the alleged events occurred–or even if the officers themselves were unclear as to Calhoun's legal status–qualified immunity is inappropriate under the circumstances alleged.").

Hershell Gill Consulting Engineers, Inc. v. Miami-Dade County, 333 F.Supp.2d 1305, 1336, 1337 (S.D. Fla. 2004) ("It is fair to say, I think, that there is significant internal disagreement among the judges in the Eleventh Circuit about what Hope means. Some cases state that Hope is nothing more than a blip on the radar screen of qualified immunity, and suggest that the Eleventh Circuit's prior jurisprudence was not out of step with Supreme Court decisions. [citing Willingham] Other cases describe Hope as a sea change in Eleventh Circuit qualified immunity law. [citing Holloman ex rel. Holloman] Fortunately, this is not a case where post-Hope conflicts in Eleventh Circuit law affect the result. Even under the most narrow reading of Hope, it is easy to conclude that the Commissioners are not entitled to qualified immunity. The Commissioners had before them at least three cases that gave them fair warning that their applications of the MWBE programs to A & E contracts were unconstitutional: Croson, Adarand, and ECA. Each held that affirmative action programs like the MWBE programs could not be enacted or maintained without a strong basis in evidence of discrimination (or a sufficient probative basis of discrimination for gender-conscious remedies).")

Alderman v. McDermott, No. 6:03CV41ORL22KRS, 2004 WL 1109541, at *13, *15 (M.D. Fla. Apr. 27, 2004) ("This Court's research reflects no materially similar case finding that an undercover law enforcement officer's intentional ramming of a non-fleeing suspected misdemeanant's vehicle without warning, causing it to crash, constitutes an unreasonable seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment. [footnote omitted] Nevertheless, the Court finds that if the facts alleged here are true, then they present one of those exceptional circumstances where the law enforcement officer's 'conduct 'was so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that [the official] had to know he was violating the Constitution even without caselaw on point.' . . . In concluding that Officer McDermott is not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, this Court notes that he is not foreclosed from raising the defense at trial. . . If the jury accepts his version of the facts–that the collision was the result of negligence or intentional conduct on the part of Mr. Alderman–then qualified immunity would bar Mr. Alderman's claim under § 1983. At trial, Officer McDermott 'may seek special interrogatories to the jury to resolve factual disputes going to [his] qualified immunity defense.'") .

Golthy v. Alabama, 287 F.Supp.2d 1259, 1266, 1267 (M.D. Ala. 2003) (Given DeShaney and its progeny, which establish that there is no duty to protect the public from assaults by third parties, and cases such as White, in which this rule was applied to employers, the court must conclude that this case falls within the third category of 'fair warning' analysis described [in Vinyard] and even if the Individual Defendants violated the constitution, they were not given fair warning that their conduct was violative of the constitution. Further, the Title VII precedent governing harassment by third parties which creates a hostile work environment would not have given the Individual Defendants fair warning that their failure to prevent a physical attack by a non-employee violated Freddie Golthy Jr.'s constitutional rights. [citing Snider] Consequently, even if there were a constitutional violation for intent to discriminate by an employer in failing to respond to threats of violence from a non-employee, the Individual Defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity because they did not have fair warning that the failure to respond to this type of harassment was a constitutional violation.").

Gaines v. Choctaw County Commission, 242 F. Supp.2d 1153, 1165, 1166 (S.D. Ala. 2003) ("In Vinyard, the Eleventh Circuit identified three methods by which the law may be clearly established. 'First, the words of the pertinent federal statute or federal constitutional provision in some cases will be specific enough to establish clearly the law applicable to particular conduct and circumstances even in the total absence of case law.' . . Second, in some instances, judicial decisions may set forth a statement of principal not tied to particular facts with such ' Aobvious clarity" to the point that every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the official's conduct did violate federal law when the official acted.' . . Third, if there is no obvious clarity from either constitutional, statutory or judicial authority, then cases involving materially similar facts may establish a bright line of appropriate conduct. . . The case at hand falls into the middle category. There need not be materially similar cases on point because the specific legal principles are clear. The Eleventh Circuit set forth the applicable general principle in Adams v. Poag: 'Our cases have consistently held that knowledge of the need for medical care and an intentional refusal to provide that care constitutes deliberate indifference.' . . Even viewed in the abstract, without benefit of prior application to similar facts, the principle applies with obvious clarity here because the Sheriff's alleged conduct is so egregious. The Sheriff knew that Rowe, whom the Sheriff arrested in the hospital while he was being treated for renal failure and pneumonia, had a serious medical condition. Indeed, the Sheriff removed Rowe from the hospital against the advice of his physician. To make matters worse, the Sheriff provided no medical care to the decedent for days, if not weeks, despite the family's appeals. When treatment was provided at a local clinic, the Sheriff again ignored medical advice to hospitalize Rowe. No reasonable person in the Sheriff's position could have believed taking a seriously ill person out of the hospital, placing him in jail without medical care and refusing to readmit him to the hospital was appropriate conduct. Even if the general principle were not sufficiently clear, the Eleventh Circuit has stated the principle even more narrowly, making it unmistakably obvious that the Sheriff's alleged conduct was unlawful. In Lancaster the court cited an earlier decision, Morrison v. Washington County, 700 F.2d 678 (11th Cir.1983), for the proposition that '"the removal of [the] seriously ill patient from a hospital and his confinement in a jail with no medical facilities under the observations of untrained personnel" amounted to deliberate indifference.'").

Randles v. Hester, No. 98CV1214, 2001 WL 1667821, at *6, *7 (M.D. Fla. June 27, 2001) (not reported) ("The instant case differs from Hope in two significant ways. First, review of pertinent case law preceding the complained of events establishes that there are materially similar cases which proscribe the exposure of inmates to infectious disease or threat of future ills. . . . The second important aspect that distinguishes this case from Hope v. Pelzer, supra, lies in the difference between cases involving disciplinary action and cases involving conditions of confinement. In Hope, the Eleventh Circuit stressed the necessity of finding a materially similar case which could serve as a bright line rule against which the defendant's disciplinary actions could be measured for reasonableness. In this respect, when the complained of actions fall within the realm of punishment, as opposed to conditions of confinement, it is crucial to find factually similar cases in order to judge the reasonableness of the nature and manner of the punishment; that is, a bright-line test must be met. In the context of exposure to a substantial risk of harm to an inmate's health as a result of general prison conditions . . ., the courts have found it unnecessary for a prisoner plaintiff to point to 'a prior case holding the very action in question to be unlawful.' . . . . Notwithstanding the absence of a factually identical case involving deliberate indifference to an inmate's forced exposure to contaminated blood, the Court concludes that Plaintiff's allegations qualify this case as one fitting into that 'slender category of cases' where the prison official's conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the Eighth Amendment prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was or should have been readily apparent to the official. See Priester v. City of Riviera Beach, 208 F.3d 919, 926 (11th Cir.2000); Smith v. Maddox, 127 F.3d 1416, 1419 (11th Cir.1997). This case evidences a situation where there exists a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful. Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603 (1999). Given the holdings of Estelle v. Gamble, Farmer v. Brennan, Powell v. Lennon, Helling v. McKinney, Gates v. Collier, and Hutto v. Finney, supra, all of which were cases decided well before the acts Plaintiff complains of, the Court finds that Plaintiff's right not to be forcibly exposed to a substantial risk of harm due to dangerous and potentially fatal blood borne contagion without available protective clothing and equipment was a clearly established federal right of which a reasonable person would have known.").

McCall v. Dep't of Human Resources, 176 F. Supp.2d 1355, 1369 (M.D. Ga. 2001) ("In *Taylor, the Eleventh Circuit held that deliberate indifference by state officials to the safety and welfare of a child in foster care constitutes a violation of the child's substantive due process rights and is actionable under § 1983. Thus, the law that Plaintiff accuses Defendants Almand, Mitchell, and Gibson of violating has been clearly established since 1987, which was well before the conduct at issue in this case occurred. . . Moreover, the complaint satisfies the Eleventh Circuit's heightened pleading standard because it alleges facts in sufficient detail for the Court to conclude that the facts of this case are materially similar to the facts of *Taylor. Consequently, the Court finds that pre-existing law (Taylor) establishes a bright-line rule that truly compels the conclusion that all reasonable officials in the circumstances confronted by Defendants Almand, Mitchell, and Gibson should have known that their conduct would violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. If, after discovery or at trial, Plaintiff cannot prove that Defendants Almand, Mitchell, and Gibson acted with deliberate indifference to Rayshom's safety and welfare, then they will be entitled to qualified immunity. At this stage of the proceedings, however, Plaintiff has adequately alleged facts that, if proved, indicate that Defendants Almand, Mitchell, and Gibson are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Conner v. Tate, 130 F. Supp.2d 1370, 1378, 1379 (N.D. Ga. 2001) ("The Eleventh Circuit's insistence on factually similar case law clearly outlining the constitutional or statutory rights involved is important because qualified immunity is most often analyzed in the context of constitutional violations. When constitutional violations are at issue there is generally no clear text from which an officer could know if his actions are unlawful. For instance, the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures has almost no practical significance until a court delineates what is reasonable. It is in this context that the Eleventh Circuit, through the doctrine of qualified immunity, protects officials who are not clearly outside the bounds of constitutional law. The Court feels, however, that the present case is different. Here a statutory violation is alleged, and the plain meaning of the statute leads to a clear result. The Wiretap Act prohibits disclosure of the contents of illegally obtained communications. 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(c). This is precisely the conduct which Plaintiff alleges the individual Defendants engaged in. The Court is required to accept all allegations in the Complaint as true when evaluating the Defendants' Motion for Partial Judgment on the Pleadings. Although there is no case in the Eleventh Circuit which specifically holds that when police officers disseminate the contents of an illegally obtained electronic communication they have violated the Federal Wiretap Act, the Court holds that the statute itself qualifies as clearly established law. The individual Defendants are not, therefore, at this stage of the litigation entitled to the qualified immunity defense.").

VII. ROLE OF THE JUDGE/JURY

SUPREME COURT

James v. Bartelt, 142 S. Ct. 4 (2021) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) ("On May 24, 2011, Willie Gibbons was shot and killed by a police officer. It is undisputed that the officer who shot him knew that Gibbons suffered from a mental illness and that he was holding a gun to his own temple. It is also undisputed that Gibbons never threatened the officer in any way and that the encounter was over within seconds, leaving Gibbons fatally wounded. The remaining facts surrounding his tragic death are disputed, including whether Gibbons' right arm was by his side or raised in surrender, whether the officer instructed Gibbons to drop the weapon or spoke unintelligibly, and whether the officer gave Gibbons a chance to comply or opened fire immediately. In light of these substantial disputes of material fact, the District Court declined to grant qualified immunity to the officer on summary judgment. The Third Circuit took a different view of the facts, reversing and granting qualified immunity. For the reasons ably set forth by Judge McKee in his dissent from denial of en banc review, the Third Circuit erred by improperly resolving factual disputes in respondent's favor and by overlooking binding precedent to conclude that he did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. See Gibbons v. New Jersey State Police, 969 F.3d 419 (2020). I add only that qualified immunity properly shields police officers from liability when they act reasonably to protect themselves and the public. [citing White v. Pauly and Plumhoff v. Rickard] It does not protect an officer who inflicts deadly force on a person who is only a threat to himself. That proposition is so 'apparent' that any reasonable officer is surely 'on notice' that such a use of force is unlawful. [citing Hope v. Pelzer] I would grant the petition and summarily reverse the Third Circuit's judgment. I respectfully dissent from the Court's failure to do so.")

Salazar-Limon v. City of Houston, Tex., 137 S. Ct. 1277, 1278 (2017) (Alito, J., with whom Thomas, J. joins, concurring in the denial of certiorari) ("[T]his Court applies uniform standards in determining whether to grant review in cases involving allegations that a law enforcement officer engaged in unconstitutional conduct. We may grant review if the lower court conspicuously failed to apply a governing legal rule. . . The dissent cites five such cases in which we granted relief for law enforcement officers, and in all but one of those cases there was no published dissent. . . The dissent has not identified a single case in which we failed to grant a similar petition filed by an alleged victim of unconstitutional police conduct. As noted, regardless of whether the petitioner is an officer or an alleged victim of police misconduct, we rarely grant review where the thrust of the claim is that a lower court simply erred in applying a settled rule of law to the facts of a particular case. . . The case before us falls squarely in that category. This is undeniably a tragic case, but as the dissent notes, . . . we have no way of determining what actually happened in Houston on the night when Salazar–Limon was shot. All that the lower courts and this Court can do is to apply the governing rules in a neutral fashion.")

Salazar-Limon v. City of Houston, Tex., 137 S. Ct. 1277, 1278-79, 1281-83 (2017) (Sotomayor, J., with whom Ginsburg, J., joins, dissenting from the denial of certiorari) ("Just after midnight on October 29, 2010, a Houston police officer shot petitioner Ricardo Salazar–Limon in the back. Salazar–Limon claims the officer shot him as he tried to walk away from a confrontation with the officer on an overpass. The officer, by contrast, claims that Salazar–Limon turned toward him and reached for his waistband—as if for a gun—before the officer fired a shot. The question whether the officer used excessive force in shooting Salazar–Limon thus turns in large part on which man is telling the truth. Our legal system entrusts this decision to a jury sitting as finder of fact, not a judge reviewing a paper record. . . . . Three Terms ago, we summarily reversed the Fifth Circuit in a case 'reflect[ing] a clear misapprehension of summary judgment standards.'[citing Tolan v. Cotton] This case reflects the same fundamental error. I respectfully dissent from the Court's failure to grant certiorari and reverse. . . .The question before the lower courts was whether the facts, taken in the light most favorable to Salazar–Limon, entitled Thompson to judgment on Salazar–Limon's excessive-force claim. . . Although such cases generally require courts to wade through the 'factbound morass of "reasonableness,"'. . . here the question whether Thompson's use of force was reasonable turns in large part on exactly what Salazar–Limon did in the moments before Thompson shot him. Indeed, the courts below needed to ask only one question: Did Salazar–Limon turn and reach for his waistband, or not? If he did, Thompson's use of force was reasonable. If he did not, a jury could justifiably decide that the use of force was excessive. Given that this case turns in large part on what Salazar–Limon did just before he was shot, it should be obvious that the parties' competing accounts of the event preclude the entry of summary judgment for Thompson. Thompson attested in a deposition that he fired his gun only after he saw Salazar–Limon turn and 'ma [k]e [a] motion towards his waistband area.'. . Salazar–Limon, by contrast, attested that Thompson fired either 'immediately' or 'seconds' after telling Salazar–Limon to stop—and in any case before Salazar–Limon turned toward him. . . These accounts flatly contradict each other. On the one, Salazar–Limon provoked the use of force by turning and raising his hands toward his waistband. On the other, Thompson shot without being provoked. It is not for a judge to resolve these 'differing versions of the truth' on summary judgment . . .; that question is for a jury to decide at trial. The courts below reached the opposite conclusion only by disregarding basic principles of summary judgment. The District Court reasoned that Salazar–Limon 'offered no controverting evidence' against Thompson's testimony that he turned and reached for his waistband before he was shot, . . . and the Fifth Circuit similarly reasoned that Salazar–Limon had not 'submitted any other controverting evidence' regarding that fact. . . . This is plainly wrong. Salazar–Limon's own testimony 'controverted' Thompson's claim that Salazar–Limon had turned and reached for his waistband. The sworn testimony of an eyewitness is competent summary judgment evidence. And Salazar–Limon's testimony 'controverted' Thompson's; indeed, the two contradict one another in every material way. Salazar–Limon needed no other evidence to defeat summary judgment. . . .This is not a difficult case. When a police officer claims that the victim of the use of force took some act that would have justified that force, and the victim claims he did not, summary judgment is improper. The Fifth Circuit's decision should be reversed. Only Thompson and Salazar–Limon know what happened on that overpass on October 29, 2010. It is possible that Salazar–Limon did something that Thompson reasonably found threatening; it is also possible that Thompson shot an unarmed man in the back without justification. What is clear is that our legal system does not entrust the resolution of this dispute to a judge faced with competing affidavits. The evenhanded administration of justice does not permit such a shortcut. Our failure to correct the error made by the courts below leaves in place a judgment that accepts the word of one party over the word of another. It also continues a disturbing trend regarding the use of this Court's resources. We have not hesitated to summarily reverse courts for wrongly denying officers the protection of qualified immunity in cases involving the use of force. See, e.g., White v. Pauly, 580 U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 548, 196 L.Ed.2d 463 (2017) (per curiam); Mullenix v. Luna, 577 U.S. ——, 136 S.Ct. 305, 193 L.Ed.2d 255 (2015) (per curiam); Taylor v. Barkes, 575 U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 2042, 192 L.Ed.2d 78 (2015) (per curiam); Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 348, 190 L.Ed.2d 311 (2014) (per curiam); Stanton v. Sims, 571 U.S. ——, 134 S.Ct. 3, 187 L.Ed.2d 341 (2013) (per curiam). But we rarely intervene where courts wrongly afford officers the benefit of qualified immunity in these same cases. The erroneous grant of summary judgment in qualified-immunity cases imposes no less harm on '"society as a whole[.]"'. . than does the erroneous denial of summary judgment in such cases. We took one step toward addressing this asymmetry in Tolan. . . We take one step back today. I respectfully dissent.") Tolan v. Cotton, 134 S. Ct. 1861, 1866-68 (2014) ("Courts have discretion to decide the order in which to engage these two prongs. . . But under either prong, courts may not resolve genuine disputes of fact in favor of the party seeking summary judgment. See Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 195, n. 2, 125 S.Ct. 596, 160 L.Ed.2d 583 (2004) (per curiam); Saucier, supra, at 201; Hope, supra, at 733, n. 1. This is not a rule specific to qualified immunity; it is simply an application of the more general rule that a 'judge's function' at summary judgment is not 'to weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter but to determine whether there is a genuine issue for trial.'. . Summary judgment is appropriate only if 'the movant shows that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'. . In making that determination, a court must view the evidence 'in the light most favorable to the opposing party.'. . Our qualified-immunity cases illustrate the importance of drawing inferences in favor of the nonmovant, even when, as here, a court decides only the clearly-established prong of the standard. In cases alleging unreasonable searches or seizures, we have instructed that courts should define the 'clearly established' right at issue on the basis of the 'specific context of the case.'. . Accordingly, courts must take care not to define a case's 'context' in a manner that imports genuinely disputed factual propositions. . . In holding that Cotton's actions did not violate clearly established law, the Fifth Circuit failed to view the evidence at summary judgment in the light most favorable to Tolan with respect to the central facts of this case. By failing to credit evidence that contradicted some of its key factual conclusions, the court improperly 'weigh[ed] the evidence' and resolved disputed issues in favor of the moving party[.] . . . Considered together, [the] facts lead to the inescapable conclusion that the court below credited the evidence of the party seeking summary judgment and failed properly to acknowledge key evidence offered by the party opposing that motion. And while 'this Court is not equipped to correct every perceived error coming from the lower federal courts,'. . . we intervene here because the opinion below reflects a clear misapprehension of summary judgment standards in light of our precedents. . .The witnesses on both sides come to this case with their own perceptions, recollections, and even potential biases. It is in part for that reason that genuine disputes are generally resolved by juries in our adversarial system. By weighing the evidence and reaching factual inferences contrary to Tolan's competent evidence, the court below neglected to adhere to the fundamental principle that at the summary judgment stage, reasonable inferences should be drawn in favor of the nonmoving party. Applying that principle here, the court should have acknowledged and credited Tolan's evidence with regard to the lighting, his mother's demeanor, whether he shouted words that were an overt threat, and his positioning during the shooting. This is not to say, of course, that these are the only facts that the Fifth Circuit should consider, or that no other facts might contribute to the reasonableness of the officer's actions as a matter of law. Nor do we express a view as to whether Cotton's actions violated clearly established law. We instead vacate the Fifth Circuit's judgment so that the court can determine whether, when Tolan's evidence is properly credited and factual inferences are reasonably drawn in his favor, Cotton's actions violated clearly established law. . . .The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Thomas v. Nugent, 539 F. App'x 456, 461 (5th Cir. 2013) ("Thomas asserts that just as in Newman, the Graham excessive-force factors clearly establish the answer in this case such that a body of relevant case law is unnecessary. But as with Bryan, Newman is also distinguishable from the facts of this case. In Newman, the suspect had committed no crime, posed no threat to anyone's safety, and did not resist the officers or fail to comply with a command. . .In fact, the plaintiff claimed he was tasered repeatedly despite never being given any command by the officers . . . . In contrast, Pikes was arrested pursuant to an active felony warrant, attempted to evade arrest, was subdued only through the threat of deadly force, and did not comply with the officers' repeated requests to cooperate in effectuating the arrest. Thus, this case does not provide an 'obvious' example of excessive force such that Thomas satisfied her burden to demonstrate that Officer Nugent's use of force was unreasonable under clearly established law."), cert. granted, 134 S. Ct. 2289 (2014), vacated and remanded in light of Tolan v. Cotton, 134 S. Ct. 1861 (2014) (per curiam).

See also Dawson v. Anderson County, Tex., 566 F. App'x 369 (5th Cir. 2014), infra, pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 769 F.3d 326 (5th Cir. 2014).

In Hunter v. Bryant, 502 U.S. 224, 228 (1991) (Per Curiam), the Supreme Court reversed a judgment of the Ninth Circuit denying qualified immunity to federal agents who had arrested, without probable cause, someone they suspected of threatening the President's life. In criticizing the approach taken by the Ninth Circuit, the Court noted:

> The Court of Appeals' confusion is evident from its statement that '[w]hether a reasonable officer could have believed he had probable cause is a question for the trier of fact, and summary judgment...based on lack of probable cause is proper only if there is only one reasonable conclusion a jury could reach.' . . . This statement of law is wrong for two reasons. First, it routinely places the question of immunity in the hands of the jury. Immunity ordinarily should be decided by the court long before trial.... Second, the court should ask whether the agents acted reasonably under settled law in the circumstances, not whether another reasonable, or more reasonable, interpretation of the events can be constructed five years after the fact.

Scott v. Harris, 127 S. Ct. 1769, 1776 & n.8 (2007) ("The question we need to answer is whether Scott's actions were objectively reasonable. . . . JUSTICE STEVENS incorrectly declares this to be 'a question of fact best reserved for a jury,' and complains we are 'usurp[ing] the jury's factfinding function.' . . At the summary judgment stage, however, once we have determined the relevant set of facts and drawn all inferences in favor of the nonmoving party to the extent supportable by the record, . . . the reasonableness of Scott's actions–or, in JUSTICE STEVENS' parlance, '[w]hether [respondent's] actions have risen to a level warranting deadly force,' . . . is a pure question of law.") (emphasis original).

Scott v. Harris, 127 S. Ct. 1769, 1784, 1785 (2007) (Stevens, J., dissenting) ("Whether a person's actions have risen to a level warranting deadly force is a question of fact best reserved for a jury. . . Here, the Court has usurped the jury's factfinding function and, in doing so, implicitly labeled the four other judges to review the case unreasonable. . . .In my judgment, jurors in Georgia should be allowed to evaluate the reasonableness of the decision to ram respondent's speeding vehicle in a manner that created an obvious risk of death and has in fact made him a quadriplegic at the age of 19.").

Brosseau v. Haugen,125 S. Ct. 596, 598, 601-04 (2004) (per curiam) (Stevens, J., dissenting) (" In my judgment, the answer to the constitutional question presented by this case is clear: Under the Fourth Amendment, it was objectively unreasonable for Officer Brosseau to use deadly force against Kenneth Haugen in an attempt to prevent his escape. What is not clear is whether Brosseau is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity because it might not have been apparent to a reasonably well trained officer in Brosseau's shoes that killing Haugen to prevent his escape was unconstitutional. In my opinion that question should be answered by a jury. . . .[T]he Court's search for relevant case law applying the Garner standard to materially similar facts is both unnecessary and ill-advised. [citing Hope and Lanier] Indeed, the cases the majority relies on are inapposite and, in fact, only serve to illuminate the patent unreasonableness of Brosseau's actions. Rather than uncertainty about the law, it is uncertainty about the likely consequences of Haugen's flight–or, more precisely, uncertainty about how a reasonable officer making the split-second decision to use deadly force would have assessed the foreseeability of a serious accident–that prevents me from answering the question of qualified immunity that this case presents. This is a quintessentially 'fact-specific' question, not a question that judges should try to answer 'as a matter of law.' . . .Although it is preferable to resolve the qualified immunity question at the earliest possible stage of litigation, this preference does not give judges license to take inherently factual questions away from the jury. . . The bizarre scenario described in the record of this case convinces me that reasonable jurors could well disagree about the answer to the qualified immunity issue. My conclusion is strongly reinforced by the differing opinions expressed by the Circuit Judges who have reviewed the record. . . .The Court's attempt to justify its decision to reverse the Court of Appeals without giving the parties an opportunity to provide full briefing and oral argument is woefully unpersuasive. If Brosseau had deliberately shot Haugen in the head and killed him, the legal issues would have been the same as those resulting from the nonfatal wound. I seriously doubt that my colleagues would be so confident about the result as to decide the case without the benefit of briefs or argument on such facts. . . At a minimum, the Ninth Circuit's decision was not clearly erroneous, and the extraordinary remedy of summary reversal is not warranted on these facts. . . . In sum, the constitutional limits on an officer's use of deadly force have been well settled in this Court's jurisprudence for nearly two decades, and, in this case, Officer Brosseau acted outside of those clearly delineated bounds. Nonetheless, in my judgment, there is a genuine factual question as to whether a reasonably well-trained officer standing in Brosseau's shoes could have concluded otherwise, and that question plainly falls with the purview of the jury.").

D.C. CIRCUIT

Robinson v. Pezzat, 818 F.3d 1, 9, 11 (D.C. Cir. 2016) ("[W]e think it quite obvious that the uncorroborated nature of Robinson's testimony had nothing at all to do with the question before the district court: did Robinson present a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Wrinkles posed an imminent threat to Pezzat's safety? Corroboration goes to credibility, a question for the jury, not the district court. Perhaps a jury will disbelieve Robinson because her testimony was uncorroborated, but at this stage of the litigation, the district court must 'believe[ ]' her testimony and must not make '[c]redibility determinations.'. . . A jury could regard the years-old veterinary report and Wrinkles' barking at the police—as would most any self-respecting dog—to be of limited probative value to the question of exactly what happened when Pezzat opened the bathroom door. If the jury believed Robinson's testimony that Wrinkles was lying down, it could reasonably conclude that the dog acted aggressively toward Pezzat only after being shot. Finally, a jury could either credit Robinson's testimony that the dog ran up the stairs to escape McLeod or conclude that Wrinkles' behavior after being shot was of limited probative value. To sum up, then, viewing the facts and all reasonable inferences most favorably to Robinson, we believe that a jury could conclude that Pezzat acted unreasonably in shooting Wrinkles. Summary judgment was therefore inappropriate.")

Flythe v. D.C., 791 F.3d 13, 18-22 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("Although deciding deadly force cases typically requires that we 'slosh our way through the factbound morass of reasonableness,'. . . here we need consider only one question: What happened when Tremayne Flythe turned to face Officer Eagan? If, as Officer Eagan claims, Flythe attacked him with a knife, then Eagan reasonably responded to an imminent threat. . . But if, as Ms. Flythe contends, Tremayne obeyed Officer Eagan's command to 'stop' and turned around to surrender, then Eagan's actions were patently unreasonable. . . On this question, we may affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment only if, after viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Ms. Flythe and drawing every reasonable inference in her favor, we can say that no rational trier of fact could disbelieve Officer Eagan's account. . . . An African proverb teaches that only when lions have historians will hunters cease being heroes. Put another way, history is usually written by those who survive to tell the tale, and in this case the only survivor is Officer Eagan. Tremayne Flythe is dead and, although several witnesses observed the two men face each other, none can testify as to exactly what happened between them. Under these circumstances, where 'the witness most likely to contradict [the officer's] story—the person [he] shot dead—is unable to testify,' courts, as the Ninth Circuit has explained, 'may not simply accept what may be a self-serving account by the police officer.'. . Instead, courts must 'carefully examine all the evidence in the record ... to determine whether the officer's story is internally consistent and consistent with other known facts.'. . Courts 'must also look at the circumstantial evidence that, if believed, would tend to discredit the police officer's story, and consider whether this evidence could convince a rational factfinder that the officer acted unreasonably.'. . Every circuit to have confronted this situation—where the police officer killed the only other witness to the incident—follows this approach. For example, the Seventh Circuit has explained that '[t]he award of summary judgment to the defense in deadly force cases may be made only with particular care where the officer defendant is the only witness left alive to testify.'. . Accordingly, 'a court must undertake a fairly critical assessment of the forensic evidence ... to decide whether the officer's testimony could reasonably be rejected at a trial.'. . In this case, record evidence casting doubt on Officer Eagan's testimony abounds. Indeed, in several significant respects Eagan's testimony conflicts with that of every other witness, as well as the physical evidence. . . . That an individual at one point posed a threat does not grant officers an irrevocable license to kill. Justification for deadly force exists only for the life of the threat. As the Supreme Court has explained, 'police officers are justified in firing at a suspect in order to end a severe threat to public safety ... until the threat has ended.'. . Here, the threat to Vazquez had ended by the time Eagan confronted Flythe, and Eagan never claimed that he viewed Flythe as an immediate threat. . . .Accordingly, whether Eagan acted reasonably does turn on whether, as he alleges, Flythe attacked him with a knife. And given all of the evidence discussed above—the inconsistencies between Eagan's testimony and the testimony of other witnesses, the physical evidence, and the evidence raising questions about Eagan's personal credibility—and drawing all inferences in Ms. Flythe's favor, we believe that a reasonable jury could conclude that Tremayne Flythe never threatened Officer Eagan with a knife. True, a jury could also conclude that he did, but '[c]redibility determinations, the weighing of the evidence, and the drawing of legitimate inferences from the facts are jury functions, not those of a judge ... on a motion for summary judgment.'. . We shall therefore reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to Officer Eagan.")

Lash v. Lemke, 786 F.3d 1, 6-7 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("Lash insists, relying on Tolan, that we cannot define the 'context' for this case by concluding as a matter of law that he was resisting arrest. Doing so, he argues, would 'import[ ] genuinely disputed factual propositions' into the qualified immunity analysis, exactly as Tolan forbids us to do. . . We disagree: Here, there is no genuine dispute regarding Lash's conduct. Multiple videorecordings of the episode make perfectly clear that Lash resisted the officers' efforts to arrest him. He pulled his arms free from the officers' efforts to restrain them twice in succession. The first of these, Lash argues in his affidavit, was no more than a natural reaction to being seized when he did not know who had seized him. But Lash does not even acknowledge, much less attempt to justify, the second occasion on which he pulled away. Much worse, Lash further claims that as soon as he realized that officers were trying to arrest him he immediately acquiesced and allowed them to put his arms behind his back. And in his brief he insists that the officers 'began to place [his arms] behind his back' while he 'continued to insist he had done nothing wrong.' But it is plain from multiple videorecordings that each of these claims is a 'visible fiction.'. . Even when each of Lash's arms was firmly held by a uniformed USPP officer, Lash continued to resist, straining to remain upright despite the officers' efforts to destabilize him and force him to the ground. Nor did Lash allow the officers to move his arms behind his back before handcuffing him. His arms remained extended even as the officers attempted to restrain him and were never pinned until after Lemke used her Taser. Just as in Scott, the video record here makes the normal factual solicitude for the nonmovant at summary judgment both unnecessary and inappropriate. No matter what Lash claims now, we know to a certainty that he resisted arrest because we can see him doing so. . . .The videorecordings in the record provide us all we need to determine what a reasonable officer would have known at the scene. And we do not hesitate to conclude from the videorecording that there is 'no genuine issue of material fact' regarding Lash's active resistance.")

Pitt v. District of Columbia, 491 F.3d 494, 509, 510 (D.C. Cir. 2007) ("We reverse the district court's order insofar as it grants the defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law on the plaintiff's claim for arrest without probable cause under § 1983. In this case, the district court erred by considering the jury verdict from the common law false arrest claims in its qualified immunity analysis. As explained above, whether a right is 'clearly established'–that is, whether an objectively reasonable officer would have believed his conduct to be lawful, in light of clearly established law–is a question of law that must be resolved by the court, not the jury. We reverse the district court on this issue and remand for a determination of whether the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the § 1983 false arrest claims.").

Polk v. District of Columbia, 121 F. Supp.2d 56, 65 (D.D.C. 2000) ("The court is mindful that qualified immunity is an issue that should be decided as a matter of law at the earliest possible stage of a case. . . Where the qualified-immunity issue centers on whether a violation of rights has occurred at all, or on whether the rights allegedly invaded were clearly established at the time the alleged violation occurred, the Court is confronted with a pure issue of law that it may resolve at the earliest possible stage of litigation. . . Where, however, the applicability of qualified immunity 'turns on the facts known by the public officials at the time of the challenged conduct,' and there is a genuine dispute with respect to the existence of such facts or the defendants' knowledge thereof, the issue of qualified immunity is subject to determination by the factfinder at trial.").

FIRST CIRCUIT

Underwood v. Barrett, 924 F.3d 19, 20-21 (1st Cir. 2019) (per curiam) ("The district court conceded that the video evidence was 'compelling,' but opted to reject the teaching of Scott, explaining that it preferred the contrary view expressed in both Justice Stevens's Scott dissent, see id. at 395 (Stevens, J., dissenting) (opining that the Court improperly 'usurped the jury's factfinding function'), and in what the district court described as an 'academic consensus' favoring the dissent. In so proceeding, the district court failed to fulfill its obligation to follow the law as set forth in controlling precedent. . . Because the denial of the qualified immunity defense was predicated on this error of law, it is appealable. . . We therefore vacate the district court's denial of the motion for summary judgment, and remand the case to another district court judge for further proceedings consistent with the law.")

Begin v. Drouin, 908 F.3d 829, 834-35 (1st Cir. 2018) ("Whether an immediate threat exists is a question of fact for the jury as long as the evidence is sufficient to support such a finding. . . In this case, the district court determined that the evidence could support a jury finding 'that Plaintiff did not pose an immediate threat to Defendant Drouin and the others who were present.' That determination -- that the evidence was sufficient to support a jury verdict on an issue of fact -- is not a ruling that we can review on this interlocutory appeal. . . . The conclusion that a jury could find here the absence of the immediate threat necessary to make a shooting constitutional does not by itself mean that a jury could also find Drouin liable. Police officers do not have the luxury of calmly considering the circumstances they face as if they were jurors or judges. . . . Drouin therefore cannot be held liable, even if Begin's rights were in fact violated, unless the right implicated was 'clearly established' and the plaintiff can 'show that an objectively reasonable officer would have known that [her] conduct violated the law.'. . . What the law does or does not clearly establish for purposes of assessing a qualified immunity defense is itself a question of law. . . So while we do not reconsider the facts as found by the district court or as otherwise viewed favorably to the plaintiff, we do consider afresh, and without deference to the district court,

Ciolino v. Gikas, 861 F.3d 296, 298-306 (1st Cir. 2017) ("We are faced with the question of whether to sustain the district court's post-verdict denial of qualified immunity to Sergeant Gikas. . . We affirm. The jury found that Gikas violated Ciolino's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. Responding to special questions on the verdict form, the jury also found that Ciolino failed to comply with police orders and taunted K-9 dogs immediately prior to his arrest and that Gikas had probable cause to arrest Ciolino on the night in question. The jury did not answer one of the special questions, which asked whether Ciolino was 'inciting the surrounding crowd immediately prior to his arrest.' The district court then denied Gikas's post-verdict motion for judgment as a matter of law, rejecting Gikas's argument that he was entitled to qualified immunity. We agree with the district court that a reasonable officer in Gikas's position would have understood that Gikas's actions violated Ciolino's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . . In this case, the jury has already found that Gikas violated Ciolino's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. Gikas has not challenged the sufficiency of the evidence supporting that verdict, either in his post-verdict motion in the district court or before us. As a result, we address the second prong: whether the right that Gikas violated was 'clearly established' at the time Gikas acted. . . 'The second prong, in turn, has two elements: "We ask (a) whether the legal contours of the right in question were sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would have understood that what he was doing violated the right, and (b) whether in the particular factual context of the case, a reasonable officer would have understood that his conduct violated the right."'. . The first element of prong two is easily satisfied. The legal contours of Ciolino's right were clear and a reasonable officer would have had 'clear notice' of it. . . . Gikas focuses his argument on the second element of prong two: whether a reasonable officer would have understood that Gikas's actions were unconstitutional under the particular circumstances he confronted. . . . We agree with the district court that a reasonable officer in Gikas's position 'would have understood that what he [wa]s doing violate[d]' Ciolino's Fourth Amendment right. . . . The record before us does not support Gikas's argument that he had to make a split-second judgment and that the atmosphere outside the Club was so highly combustible that he had to arrest Ciolino as he did. The video, although it captures only 24 seconds, refutes Gikas's argument. Notably, the video shows that Sergeant Pickles, the officer whose dog Ciolino taunts just before the arrest, barely reacts to Ciolino's behavior and certainly does not treat Ciolino as a threat. Nor do the other officers on the scene. And no officer on the scene testified that Ciolino was posing an immediate threat of violence and had to be removed. Even Gikas himself testified that he did not perceive Ciolino as an active threat; rather, his goal in removing Ciolino forcibly from the sidewalk was to prevent Ciolino from having an 'opportunity to [incite] the crowd,' which 'could instigate a larger problem.'. . .Finally, we reject Gikas's argument that he acted in a manner consistent with his training and police protocol when he took Ciolino to the ground with force. . . Gikas testified at trial that he had been taught to employ 'open-hand' techniques to subdue arrestees who have refused to obey verbal commands and that he used such a technique on Ciolino, rather than a more extreme use of force, after perceiving that Ciolino had refused police instructions to 'move along' and to leave the K-9 dogs alone. If anything, Gikas's actions appear to be contrary to the training he says he received on the spectrum of police responses. A reasonable officer might well have laid hands on Ciolino, either to arrest him or to remove him, but would have used a less aggressive technique, such as seizing and securing Ciolino's hands, rather than taking the actions Gikas did. The record contains no evidence that Gikas was trained to 'jump[ ] immediately to the extreme end of the "open-hand" force category,'. . . rather than to control Ciolino with a less forceful technique. Nor is there any evidence that Gikas was trained to regard a disobeyed order to 'move along' as equivalent to a disobeyed order to submit to arrest. . . Gikas gave Ciolino no warning at all that he was under arrest before Gikas decided to use force.We conclude, as did the district court, that Gikas's actions not only violated Ciolino's Fourth Amendment right but also fell outside the 'margin of error,' . . . that qualified immunity provides.")

Fernandez-Salicrup v. Figueroa-Sancha, 790 F.3d 312, 326 (1st Cir. 2015) ("[T]here are genuine disputes over material facts which prevent us from evaluating whether Rosado violated Fernández's rights. Those same disputed facts also prevent us from evaluating the qualified immunity question. Even assuming probable cause for Fernández's arrest was lacking, thus satisfying the first requirement for qualified immunity, we would then look to whether the right was 'clearly established' at the time of the violation. There is little question that it is clearly established law that an individual cannot be arrested absent probable cause. . . However, whether or not a reasonable officer, similarly situated, would have understood that Rosado's actions violated this right is a fact-intensive question. It involves understanding what Rosado knew as she approached the gate and exactly what transpired upon Fernández opening it. These are questions for a factfinder, and until they are answered, we are unable to determine, as a matter of law, whether Rosado's 'conduct was "so deficient that no reasonable officer could have made the same choice[ ] under the circumstances."'. . Accordingly, the district court's entry of judgment against Rosado on Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment unconstitutional arrest claim must be reversed and remanded for trial.")

Cortes-Reyes v. Salas-Quintana, 608 F.3d 41, 51 n.10 (1st Cir. 2010) ("The district court erroneously submitted the question of qualified immunity to the jury. Whether defendants are entitled to qualified immunity 'is a legal question for the court to decide.' Rodríguez-Marín, 438 F.3d at 83. The jury's role is to 'determine any preliminary factual questions' so that the court can determine the 'legal issue of the official's reasonableness.'")

Rodriguez-Marin v. Rivera-Gonzalez, 438 F.3d 72, 83, 84 (1st Cir. 2006) ("An official is entitled to qualified immunity unless (1) 'the plaintiffs' allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation,' (2) 'the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation,' and (3) 'a reasonable [official], similarly situated, would understand that the challenged conduct violated that established right.' . . The first two prongs of this test are questions of law for the court to decide. . . The third prong is also a question of law, but factual questions, to the extent they are antecedent to this determination, must be determined by a jury. . . While preliminary factual questions regarding qualified immunity are sent to the jury, the legal question of the availability of qualified immunity is 'ultimately committed to the court's judgment.' . . Defendants first contend that the district court erred in failing to instruct the jury on qualified immunity. Defendants, however, are not entitled to a jury instruction regarding qualified immunity, since it is a legal question for the court to decide. . . Defendants are entitled to have a jury determine any preliminary factual questions, but defendants have not stated, either at trial or on appeal, precisely what factual questions would need to be resolved before the court could determine the legal issue of the official's reasonableness. In finding that defendants politically discriminated against plaintiffs, the jury found that defendants intentionally violated plaintiffs' constitutional rights. Thus, it appears that any factual finding the jury could make would not benefit defendants. We find no error.").

Acevedo-Garcia v. Monroig, 351 F.3d 547, 563 (1st Cir. 2003) ("The availability of qualified immunity after a trial is a legal question informed by the jury's findings of fact, but ultimately committed to the court's judgment. Indeed, we have recognized that a certain flexibility exists in the procedures and that in any event the judge is certainly not obliged to submit the ultimate issue to the jury. . . Accordingly, there was no error, let alone plain error, in the district court's refusal to submit the proposed qualified immunity instructions to the jury.").

Kelley v. LaForce, 288 F.3d 1, 7 & n.2, 8, 9 (1st Cir. 2002) (correcting and superceding decision at 279 F.3d 129) ("Although '[w]e recognize that the immunity question should be resolved, where possible, in advance of trial,' pre-trial resolution sometimes will be impossible because of a dispute as to material facts. . . In such a case, the factual issues must be decided by the trier of fact . . . thereby precluding summary judgment. . . Only after the facts have been settled can the court determine whether the actions were objectively reasonable so as to fall under the qualified immunity umbrella. . . . The reasonableness of the officers' conduct, in this case, turns on the officers' knowledge. If the police knew that Kelley was the owner of the Pub, then their action might have amounted to a confiscation of property without any process. . . However, if the police reasonably believed LaForce to be the owner, then their action might not have been unreasonable. . . In sum, assuming, but not deciding, that the appellants adequately alleged a violation of a clearly established due process right, the district court was faced with a material factual dispute as to whether the defendants' conduct was reasonable so as to entitle them to immunity. This factual dispute needed to be resolved by a trier of fact and was an inappropriate matter for summary judgment. . . . . We have previously noted that the Supreme Court has not clearly indicated whether the judge may act as fact-finder when there is a factual dispute underlying the qualified immunity defense or whether this function must be fulfilled by a jury.")

Ringuette v. City of Fall River, 146 F.3d 1, 6 (1st Cir. 1998) ("Something of a 'black hole' exists in the law as to how to resolve factual disputes pertaining to qualified immunity when they cannot be resolved on summary judgment prior to trial. To avoid duplication, judges have sometimes deferred a decision until the trial testimony was in or even submitted the factual issues to the jury.").

Swain v. Spinney, 117 F.3d 1, 10 (1st Cir. 1997) ("We recognize that the immunity question should be resolved, where possible, in advance of trial. . . . There are . . . factual issues, potentially turning on credibility, that must be resolved by the trier of fact. Only after the resolution of these conflicts may the trial court apply the relevant law on objective reasonableness.").

St. Hilaire v. City of Laconia, 70 F.3d 20, 24 n.1 (1st Cir. 1995) ("While this court has not had the occasion to explore fully the allocation of functions between judge and jury where facts relevant to the immunity defense are in dispute, we have said that 'we doubt the Supreme Court intended this dispute to be resolved from the bench by fiat. . . . The precise question of whether the judge may intercede and play that fact finder role appears not to have been clearly decided by the Supreme Court. Some courts, consonant with the Seventh Amendment, have preserved the fact finding function of the jury through special interrogatories to the jury as to the disputes of fact, reserving the ultimate law question to the judge.").

Hegarty v. Somerset County, 53 F.3d 1367, 1373-74 (1st Cir. 1995) ("[T]he qualified immunity inquiry takes place prior to trial. . . and requires no factfinding, only a ruling of law strictly for resolution by the court. Thus, under the policy-driven 'objective legal reasonableness' analysis governing our inquiry, even expert testimony relating to appropriate police procedures in the circumstances confronting the officers may not afford certain insulation against summary judgment in the 'qualified immunity' context.").

Lowinger v. Broderick, 50 F.3d 61, 66 n.7 (1st Cir. 1995) ("[T]his case does not present the scenario of the 'rare case' described in Prokey v. Watkins, . . . in which a determination of qualified immunity as a matter of law, after assuming all facts in a plaintiff's favor, is 'impossible' due to conflicting evidence as to the 'underlying historical facts.' . . . . Here, there is no dispute about what [defendant] knew at the time but, rather, the dispute is over whether his perception was accurate. Only the former is relevant to the qualified immunity analysis.").

Tatro v. Kervin, 41 F.3d 9, 15 (1st Cir. 1994) ("[T]he court explicitly told the jury that finding lack of probable cause to arrest, and the use of excessive force, was not sufficient to find for [Plaintiff] unless they found that the arrest was made clearly without probable cause, and clearly with excessive force. The court explained to [Plaintiff's] counsel upon counsel's objection that it was embellishing the traditional language because 'I think this is how qualified immunity, if you will survives.' The court added: [']I don't think we put to the jury the issue of qualified immunity, but that concept survives. And I think it survives in this guise. It's not simply the question whether there was probable cause or not. It's, the question is whether the reasonable police officer would know that there was not probable cause and went ahead anyway and arrested him.['] The court responded similarly after [Plaintiff's] counsel objected to the 'clearly with excessive force' instruction: '[T]his is how they get their benefit, if you will, of qualified immunity. It has to be clear to the officers that what they're doing is not authorized by the situation.'. . . If the court was placing some element of qualified immunity into the jury instructions, this was not the proper time or manner to do it. Qualified immunity, which is a question of law, is an issue that is appropriately decided by the court during the early stages of the proceedings and should not be decided by the jury. [cites omitted] The language of the court's instructions and the court's explanation for that language appear very similar to the standard for qualified immunity.").

Prokey v. Watkins, 942 F.2d 67 (1st Cir. 1991) ("Whether...a reasonable policeman, on the basis of the information known to him, could have believed there was probable cause is a question of law, subject to resolution by the judge not the jury....Nevertheless, if what the policeman knew prior to the arrest is genuinely in dispute, and if a reasonable officer's perception of probable cause would differ depending on the correct version, that factual dispute must be resolved by a fact finder.").

Charron v. County of York, No. 2:18-CV-00105-JAW, 2020 WL 1868767, at *44 (D. Me. Apr. 14, 2020) ("In support of his position, Mr. Charron quotes the First Circuit in B.C.R. Transport as stating that 'whether or not probable cause exists in any given case invariably depends on the particular facts and circumstances of that case, a question to be resolved by the trier of fact.'. . Taken to an extreme, this language would mean that a civil action against a police officer alleging a lack of probable cause would always have to be decided by a jury. Since B.C.R. Transport, however, the First Circuit has explained that 'when the underlying facts claimed to support probable cause are not in dispute, whether those "raw facts" constitute probable cause is an issue of law' for the court to decide. . .In contrast, when 'these facts are in reasonable dispute, the fact-finder must resolve the dispute.' Holder, 585 F.3d at 504. The First Circuit has held that 'what the police knew at the moment of the arrest, the source of their knowledge, and the leads that they pursued or eschewed' are material facts that, if not in dispute, ordinarily make the probable cause to arrest question 'amenable to summary judgment.'. . The First Circuit in Acosta also limited its holding in B.C.R. Transport that 'the issue of probable cause was for the jury' due to the particular facts and circumstances of the case, calling the holding 'the exception, not the rule.'. . Here, since none of the material facts is in dispute, the question of probable cause is 'amenable to summary judgment.'")

Winfield v. Keefe, 357 F.Supp.3d 90, __ (D. Mass. 2019) ("This is a jury case, triable as of right to a duly qualified jury under the Seventh Amendment. It is the jury's conclusions, not mine, that matter. See generally Dan M. Kahan, David A. Hoffman & Donald Braman, Whose Eyes Are You Going to Believe? Scott v. Harris and the Perils of Cognitive Illiberalism, 122 Harv. L. Rev. 837 (2009). While it would be facile to rule that no reasonable jury could find for Marie Winfield, it would be wrong. The summary judgment standard bears repeating here: this Court may not act as a trier of fact, but rather must 'draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the nonmoving party, and ... not make credibility determinations or weigh the evidence.'. . Thus, all inferences must be drawn in the light most favorable to Winfield, as opposed to the video itself as urged by defendants, because the video capturing the events outside the lobby is ambiguous. . . Winfield has put forth enough evidence, as the non-moving party, to establish a genuine issue of material fact that needs resolution by a jury at trial. For purposes of the qualified immunity analysis at summary judgment, the issue is properly defined as: whether Winfield has the right to be free of the defendants' use of force by their pushing Winfield with as much force as possible and as hard as they could to her car, causing her injury, after two and one-half hours of cajoling her to leave the police station building, and her refusing to leave after being ordered to leave by police. Winfield points to no First Circuit authority directly supporting such a 'clearly established' right. Nevertheless, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Winfield, as this Court must, her claim comes within the ambit of First Circuit jurisprudence. [citing cases] While 'not every push or shove rises to the level of a constitutional violation,'. . were the Winfields to be believed, reasonable officers in the defendants' positions should have understood that their actions infringed her rights by pushing her 'using as much force as possible' and 'as hard as they could' and causing injury. . . Accordingly, the Court DENIES qualified immunity and summary judgment on so much of Winfield's federal and state claims for excessive force as pertains solely to events once she left the police station through her being driven away in the family car. In all other respects summary judgment is ALLOWED for the defendants on the ground of qualified immunity.")

Hutchins v. McKay, No. 3:16-CV-30008-MAP, 2018 WL 443446, at *5 (D. Mass. Jan. 16, 2018) ("Resolution of whether McKay and Romero made a reasonable mistake of fact when they entered the street-level door to 53 Daytona Street -- like assessments of reasonableness generally -- must await development at trial and resolution by the jury, or possibly the court. A factfinder may conclude that the officers' mistake was not reasonable, or that the officers, contrary to their testimony, entered the kitchen from the second-floor landing without authorization, an act that could not be dismissed as a mistake. These issues must await further proceedings. . . . Defendants' contention that the officers, to the extent that they violated Plaintiff's constitutional rights, enjoyed the protection of qualified immunity will not wash, for two reasons. . . First, if the officers merely made a reasonable mistake of fact -- and this question must await trial -- they have no need of qualified immunity. They committed no violation of the Fourth Amendment, period. On the other hand, if their mistake is found to be not reasonable, then their entry through the street-level door into Plaintiff's dwelling constituted a violation of clearly established Fourth Amendment law. No principle of qualified immunity will protect them.")

Rodriguez v. Sancha, No. CV 12-1243(PAD), 2016 WL 1247208, at *11-12 (D.P.R. Feb. 24, 2016) ("The Court should deny a defendant qualified immunity if: (1) the facts a plaintiff has either alleged or shown establish a violation of a constitutional right; and (2) the constitutional right at issue was clearly established at the time of the defendant's alleged violation. . . Clearly established, in turn, means that the contours of the right are sufficiently clear such that 'a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . That is, 'a right is clearly established if, at the time the defendant acted, he was on clear notice that what he was doing was unconstitutional.'. . Only if it is determined that the law was clearly established should the court address 'the particular conduct in question,'. . . to decide whether an objectively reasonable official would have believed that his conduct was lawful 'in light of clearly established law and the information the official possessed at the time of his allegedly unlawful conduct.'. . Determining reasonableness, however, is more problematic, because while the first part of the inquiry deals with abstract legal rules, the final step depends on the facts of a given case. . . The standard is an objective one, that is, whether it was clear to an objectively reasonable official situated similarly to Defendants, that the actions taken (or omitted) contravened the clearly established right. . . Based on the analysis above, the question would be whether Defendants would have reasonably understood that failure to train the officers in the PRPD could lead to a violation of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. While the answer to that question is a possible yes, reasonableness is a question of fact for the jury to analyze. . . In such a case, the factual issues must be decided by the trier of fact, thereby precluding summary judgment. Qualified immunity in the instant case should therefore be denied without prejudice, so Defendants may raise the defense again at the trial, where the Court will resolve the issue of qualified immunity after the return of a verdict.")

Wilson v. Dunford, No. Civ.A. 02-CV10250GAO, 2004 WL 883404, at *1 (D. Mass. Apr. 16, 2004) ("Over the objections of both parties, I submitted the issue of qualified immunity to the jury. I did so because I considered the issue of the 'objective reasonableness' of the defendant's belief that his actions did not violate the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights was one that the jury ought to decide. In other words, I considered the parties' difference as to whether the belief was objectively reasonable to be a 'factual' dispute. In coming to this conclusion, I was conscious of the admonition in Swain v. Spinney, 117 F.3d 1, 9-10 (1st Cir.1997), that the qualified immunity inquiry is 'highly fact specific.' Thus, I concluded that the jury ought not only to resolve any subsidiary factual issues, but ought also to decide whether the defendant's conclusion that his actions were lawful under the circumstances was 'objectively reasonable.' Upon reconsideration and review of relevant case law, I conclude this was error. The cases repeatedly emphasize that the issue of 'objective reasonableness' is one for the court to decide as a matter of law. . . The 'factual disputes' that are appropriate for the jury apparently relate (the cases are a bit opaque on this question) to the circumstances in which the defendant acted. In this case, there was no material factual issue in the evidence about the underlying factual circumstances relevant to the issue of qualified immunity.").

Suboh v. Borgioli, 298 F.Supp.2d 192, 199, 200 (D. Mass. 2004) ("At the summary judgment stage, this Court ruled–and the First Circuit affirmed–that Borgioli was not entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. . . Qualified immunity did not, however, completely fall out of the case once the First Circuit affirmed that it was not warranted on summary judgment. On the contrary, to the extent that there were still facts in dispute that were arguably determinative as to whether a reasonable officer would have believed (erroneously), like Borgioli, that no process of any sort was due to Suboh, Borgioli still had the affirmative defense of qualified immunity available to him. . . Rather than putting the question of reasonableness directly to the jury, however, this Court instead should have asked the jury to resolve any remaining relevant factual disputes bearing on reasonableness, and then ruled on the ultimate question of qualified immunity itself. . . . As such, this Court's charge to the jury–essentially importing a reasonableness test into Suboh's burden of showing that her procedural due process rights were violated–was erroneous in two respects. The issue of reasonableness was relevant only to the question of qualified immunity, a question of law for the Court (not the jury) on which Borgioli (not Suboh) bore the burden of proof.").

Howes v. Hitchcock, 66 F. Supp.2d 203, 211 (D. Mass. 1999) ("The First Circuit has consistently maintained that, in regard to the issue of qualified immunity, 'the objective reasonableness determination is for the judge to make, and not for the jury.'" [citing Hall v. Ochs, 817 F.2d 920, 924 (1st Cir.1987), Prokey, and Tatro]).

Natal v. City of New Bedford, 37 F. Supp.2d 74, 75, 76 (D. Mass. 1999) ("Turgeon seeks summary judgment on grounds that (1) his use of deadly force was reasonable, and (2) he is entitled to qualified immunity. While the first is a defense to liability and the second a defense to suit, both inquiries entail essentially the same analysis. . . If, however, this Court grants Turgeon's summary judgment motion on the issue of liability rather than qualified immunity, Natal's claims against the City, Tierney, and Benoit are moot. See City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 799 (1986) (holding that municipal and supervisory liability are "quite beside the point" when no constitutional injury has occurred at the hands of the police officer). Accordingly, this Court first considers the issue of liability on the merits.").

Medeiros v. Dracut, 21 F. Supp.2d 82, 86, 87 (D. Mass. 1998) ("Summary judgment motions in the qualified immunity context raise a complex question as to the appropriate roles of judge and jury. The ultimate question of qualified immunity is one of law and should be decided by the court. . . At the same time, factual disputes over the precise circumstances an officer faced–disputes ordinarily resolved by a jury at trial– surely affect the ultimate question of whether a reasonable police officer could have believed his actions were in accord with a plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . The First Circuit has acknowledged the dilemma where facts relevant to the immunity defense are in dispute. . . Nevertheless, where there are no disputed issues of material fact relevant to immunity, the First and other Circuits appear to preserve for the court the ultimate question of the reasonableness of an officer's actions.").

SECOND CIRCUIT

Walker v. Schult, 45 F.4th 598, 618-21 (2d Cir. 2022) ("In the present case, the district court appears to have assumed that the jury's verdict established that Walker's Eighth Amendment rights had been violated. . . The jury had indeed been instructed that it could return a verdict in Walker's favor if it found that a defendant or defendants had 'deprived him of minimal civilized measures of life necessities':

Prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they deprive an inmate of his basic human needs, such as food, clothing, medical care, sleep, and safe and sanitary living conditions. For the purposes of the Eighth Amendment, Mr. Walker can demonstrate the deprivation of a Constitutional right by showing that he was incarcerated in cell 127 in the Mohawk B unit at FCI Ray Brook under conditions that posed a substantial risk of serious damage to his health and safety or that the conditions which he was forced to endure deprived him of minimal civilized measures of life necessities.

. . . But, while the jury was thus instructed as to the law, its job was simply to find the facts; and the district court, in describing the evidence in its posttrial Rule 50 ruling, lost sight of the jury's actual and implied factual findings. . . . [T]he jury found as facts only that Walker suffered mental or emotional injury because of 'overcrowding/lack of space' and 'threats of violence/lack of safe living conditions.' . . And despite those 'threats,' any actual violence and deprivation of safety were unrealized, as the jury had found that Walker did not prove physical injury. . . .As discussed in Part II.A. above, 'overcrowding' itself, i.e., 'confin[ing] cellmates too closely,' does not violate the Eighth Amendment unless it is accompanied by some treatment that 'deprive[s] inmates of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities.'. . '[O]nly those deprivations denying "the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities[ ]" ... are sufficiently grave to form the basis of an Eighth Amendment violation.'. . Walker has not called to our attention any Supreme Court case--and we know of none--in which the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment was held to have been violated by prison overcrowding alone. . . .In sum, to the extent that the district court concluded that Walker established an Eighth Amendment violation based not solely on overcrowding and its attendant decrease in safety from violence but also on deprivations of such basic necessities as sleep, ventilation, or sanitary living space, the court impermissibly relied on its own view of the facts, and thereby invaded the province of the jury. To the extent that the court instead did not rely on facts beyond the jury's findings of overcrowding and the attendant decrease in safety, those factual findings by the jury should also have informed the legal determination by the district court as to whether Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. In light of the authorities discussed above, the jury's findings were insufficient to support a conclusion that Walker was deprived of the minimal civilized measure of life's basic necessities. It may be that the findings that the (unrealized) threat of violence and the constant anxiety as to lack of safety resulting from the undisputed overcrowding--here lasting for some $2^{1}/_{2}$ years--which led the jury to find that Walker had suffered mental or emotional injury, were sufficient to warrant a decision that Walker was subjected to cruel and unusual psychological punishment, thereby warranting an award of nominal damages. But we need not resolve that question, because we see no authorities that clearly established such a legal principle. In the absence of clearly established law to inform Defendants that their conduct in not moving Walker to another cell in an overcrowded prison violated Walker's rights under the Eighth Amendment, Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity from his claims for damages, including for nominal damages.")

Scism v. Ferris, No. 21-2622-CV, 2022 WL 289314, at *2 (2d Cir. Feb. 1, 2022) (not reported), pet. for cert. filed, No. 21-2622 (Apr. 29, 2022) ("We . . . agree with the District Court that summary judgment must be denied. Although the question of qualified immunity cannot be resolved at this stage, Ferris will have the opportunity to pursue this argument as the case proceeds to trial. We note that although the jury must resolve the factual disputes concerning both excessive force and qualified immunity, 'the qualified immunity issue is a question of law better left for the court to decide.'. . If the jury finds that Ferris used excessive force against Scism, 'the court should then decide whether [Ferris] is entitled to qualified immunity,' aided by interrogatories that present the key factual disputes to the jury.")

Grant v. Lockett, No. 19-1558, 2021 WL 5816245, at *5–6 (2d Cir. Dec. 8, 2021) (not reported) ("Defendants . . . contend that the district court erred in refusing to submit their requested interrogatories to the jury and in submitting the ultimate question of qualified immunity to the jury. We review a district court's refusal to provide special interrogatories for abuse of discretion. . . Similarly, '[d]ecisions as to the format and language to be used in a special verdict form are committed to the trial court's discretion.'. . An error in the trial court's 'instructions and interrogatories is a ground for reversal only if it was prejudicial to the [complaining party]' and not simply harmless. . .We have previously outlined the proper allocation of duties between judge and jury as part of the qualified immunity inquiry. If there is a dispute as to the material facts, any 'factual questions must [first] be resolved by the factfinder.'. . 'Once the jury has resolved any disputed facts that are material to the qualified immunity issue, the ultimate determination of whether the officer's conduct was objectively reasonable is to be made by the court.'. . In view of this delicate division of responsibilities, we have consistently recommended the use of special interrogatories in the qualified immunity context. . . Here, the district court declined to submit Defendants' proposed special interrogatories to the jury and instead tasked the jury with determining whether each of Lockett and Montalto had 'prove[n] by a preponderance of the evidence that it was objectively reasonable for him to believe that his actions were not violating plaintiff Alonzo Grant's right to be free from' excessive force or false arrest. . . Given the various disputed issues of fact in this case, it may have been preferable for the district court to submit special interrogatories to the jury. . . But the district court acted within its discretion in declining to do so because it could 'discern from the general verdict how the jury may have resolved' the disputed issues. See Jones [v. Treubig], 963 F.3d at 232–33; Henry v. A/S Ocean, 512 F.2d 401, 408 (2d Cir. 1975) ("[W]here a jury must make a finding on a certain issue in order to reach its verdict, failure to submit a special interrogatory on that issue is not reversible error."). Defendants provide no factual predicate under which they would be entitled to qualified immunity despite the jury's findings. Nor can we identify one. The district court did, however, abuse its discretion in submitting the ultimate question of qualified immunity to the jury. The district court's question to the jury closely parallels one we have deemed for the court rather than the jury. . . Nevertheless, Defendants were not prejudiced by this error. Even if the district court had properly reserved the ultimate legal decision for itself, the facts the jury necessarily found in rendering its decision foreclosed any argument that it was objectively reasonable for Defendants to believe that their actions did not violate Alonzo's rights. . . We therefore decline to vacate the judgment on this ground.")

Edwards v. Quiros, 986 F.3d 187, 195 (2d Cir. 2021) ("Quiros once again claims he is entitled to qualified immunity, as he did in seeking summary judgment. But we rejected essentially the same argument at an earlier stage of this litigation. . . and we have no new reason to grant qualified immunity to Quiros now. The disputed issues of fact that remained after our prior decision have now been resolved against him by the jury. The jury reasonably determined, upon sufficient evidence, that Quiros knowingly violated Edwards's clearly established right to meaningful exercise under the circumstances and lacked a sufficient justification for doing so. We will not disturb the jury's finding that Quiros was not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jones v. Treubig, 963 F.3d 214, 230-35 (2d Cir. 2020) ("The Supreme Court has made clear that '[t]he protection of qualified immunity applies regardless of whether the government official's error is a mistake of law, a mistake of fact, or a mistake based on mixed questions of law and fact.'. . . However, qualified immunity only protects 'reasonable mistakes.'. . . Here, after finding in a special interrogatory that Jones was not resisting arrest at the time of the second tasing, the jury also found that Lt. Treubig believed that Jones was resisting arrest. . . The jury was not asked, however, whether that mistaken belief was reasonable. Instead, the district court, in its post-trial Rule 50 decision, independently concluded that Lt. Treubig 'reasonably believed that the plaintiff was still actively resisting arrest when he cycled the taser the second time,' . . . without any additional findings by the jury in the special interrogatories to support the reasonableness determination. That was error. As a threshold matter, we have explained that the reasonableness of a mistake of fact regarding the use of force does not pertain to the ultimate qualified immunity determination, but rather whether there was a constitutional violation in the first instance—which is 'step one' of the Saucier inquiry. . . This question is in contrast to an officer's mistaken belief about the legality of the conduct, which is analyzed at 'step two' in the Saucier framework. . . And, importantly, disputed material issues regarding the reasonableness of an officer's perception of the facts (whether mistaken or not) is the province of the jury, while the reasonableness of an officer's view of the law is decided by the district court. . . . Although it is the jury's province to resolve the reasonableness of an officer's perception of the facts that confronted him, we recognize that those same facts, or some portion thereof, can also sometimes be critical in deciding the qualified immunity analysis at step two of Saucier. Put another way, the reasonableness of a particular mistake of fact may dictate whether any reasonable officer would have understood that his conduct was unlawful. In situations where the court may not be able to discern from the general verdict how the jury may have resolved a particular disputed issue that is a dispositive part of the step-two Saucier analysis, it is necessary (as the district court did here) to ask additional questions to the jury through special interrogatories. . . Jones argues that, in finding in his favor on the excessive force claim, the jury necessarily implied that it found unreasonable any mistaken belief by Lt. Treubig about the facts (including additional resistance after the first taser) that allegedly prompted him to re-cycle the taser. Jones further asserts that any conceivable doubt about the jury's view on the reasonableness of Lt. Treubig's beliefs was eliminated by its award of punitive damages which required the jury to conclude, at the very least, Lt. Treubig acted with 'reckless disregard' for Jones's constitutional rights. . . In the proceedings below, Jones thus objected to the district court even posing questions on this issue to the jury in the form of special interrogatories following the jury's general verdict in Jones's favor on the excessive force claim. . . Jones's argument goes too far. In particular, Jones overlooks the fact that the jury was considering multiple uses of force by Lt. Treubig as part of one excessive force claim (i.e., an initial tasing and a re-cycling of the taser), and the jury's general verdict against Lt. Treubig did not necessarily find that both acts violated the Fourth Amendment. Similarly, even assuming the general verdict against Lt. Treubig related to the second tasing, we would still not necessarily know from the general verdict how the jury resolved particular disputed issues, including the reasonableness of Lt. Treubig's belief that Jones was resisting arrest after the first tasing. For example, based upon the general verdict alone, the jury could have concluded that Lt. Treubig reasonably believed Jones was continuing to resist arrest, but that the re-cycling of the taser was an unreasonable amount of additional force given the level of resistance. Here, for purposes of determining whether Lt. Treubig should have known that he violated clearly established law under Tracy as it relates to the second tasing, the critical issues at step two of Saucier are whether: (1) Jones was still resisting arrest at that time, or (2) even if Jones was no longer resisting arrest at that point, Lt. Treubig reasonably believed he was still resisting. Thus, in order to ensure that the jury decided both of those issues against Lt. Treubig within its general verdict, it was entirely appropriate to utilize special interrogatories to address those precise questions. As to the first issue, the jury's special interrogatory made clear that the jury concluded that Jones was not resisting arrest at the time of the second tasing. However, as to the second issue regarding any reasonable mistaken belief as to that fact, the question was incorrectly phrased to the jury. The jury was asked, 'Did Lieutenant Treubig believe that the plaintiff was resisting arrest when Lieutenant Treubig used the taser the second time?'. . Although the jury answered affirmatively to that question, such an answer is insufficient to shield Lt. Treubig with qualified immunity because his subjective mistake of fact, like a mistake of law, must be reasonable. . . Thus, the jury should have been asked, 'Did Lieutenant Treubig reasonably believe that the plaintiff was resisting arrest when Lieutenant Treubig used the taser the second time?'. . . .Because qualified immunity is an affirmative defense, '[t]o the extent that a particular finding of fact is essential to a determination by the court that the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity, it is the responsibility of the defendant to request that the jury be asked the pertinent question.'. . Having agreed to submit the non-pertinent question to the jury, Lt. Treubig cannot then have the district court, in addressing a Rule 50 motion, usurp the jury's role by substituting its own finding on the pertinent question. . . In other words, in light of Jones's testimony that he offered no resistance after the first tasing because he was on the ground with his arms spread, the district court could only find that Lt. Treubig's mistaken belief regarding continued resistance was reasonable by construing the conflicting evidence in the light most favorable to Lt. Treubig rather than Jones, which the district court was not permitted to do. . .Accordingly, given the absence of any finding by the jury as to the reasonableness of the mistaken factual belief by Lt. Treubig regarding resistance by Jones after the first tasing, and given that a jury could find such a mistaken belief unreasonable when the facts are construed most favorably to Jones, any such mistake cannot be a proper basis for affording Lt. Treubig qualified immunity on the Rule 50 motion.") Adamson v. Miller, No. 18-3443, 2020 WL 1813545, at *2–3 (2d Cir. Apr. 9, 2020) (not reported) ("The central dispute on this claim is a factual one: whether Adamson was placed in a chokehold and punched. A genuine issue as to that material fact would be sufficient to defeat summary judgment under either constitutional standard. . . Adamson adduced no admissible evidence supporting his version of events apart from his own deposition testimony and affidavit. . . However, rather than assessing whether Adamson's own testimony would, if credited, support a jury verdict in his favor, the district court only considered whether Adamson's testimony was corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses. After noting that none of the other witnesses testified to seeing Adamson in a chokehold, the court concluded that 'the witness testimony in this case does not show a genuine issue for trial because the testimony is not actually in conflict.'. .

This was error. By omitting Adamson's own testimony from its analysis, the district court failed to 'view the evidence in the light most favorable' to Adamson and to 'favor [him] with all reasonable inferences.'. . Nor could the district court have properly disregarded Adamson's testimony on the ground that it was simply incredible. '[I]t is undoubtedly the duty of district courts not to weigh the credibility of the parties at the summary judgment stage.'. . And Adamson's testimony, although not corroborated by other evidence, was not 'contradictory and incomplete,' nor was it 'so replete with inconsistencies and improbabilities that no reasonable juror' could credit it. . . To the contrary, Adamson has consistently asserted for the past ten years that he was placed in a chokehold and punched during the lineup. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Adamson, as we must at the summary judgment stage, we conclude that a reasonable jury could credit his version of events. We further conclude that a reasonable jury could find that placing Adamson in a chokehold and punching him was an excessive use of force, whether judged against the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment standards. We therefore vacate the district court's order insofar as it granted summary judgment to defendants on this claim.")

Outlaw v. City of Hartford, 884 F.3d 351, 356, 367-72 (2d Cir. 2018) ("On the cross-appeal, we conclude that Allen's contentions are without merit given that, as qualified immunity is an affirmative defense, the burden was on Allen to prove by a preponderance of the evidence any factual predicates necessary to establish that defense; that in order to avoid having the court instruct the jury that he had that burden, Allen chose not to have submitted to the jury the fact questions as to which he now wants favorable answers presumed; that the jury's answers to the interrogatories accompanying its verdict did not imply the factual findings that Allen imputes to the jury; and that the pertinent factual findings by the district court are not inconsistent with the jury's answers to questions that were posed. . . .Qualified immunity is an affirmative defense on which the defendant has the burden of proof. See, e.g., Gomez v. Toledo, 446 U.S. 635, 640, 100 S.Ct. 1920, 64 L.Ed.2d 572 (1980); Rogoz v. City of Hartford, 796 F.3d at 247. 'To the extent that a particular finding of fact [i]s essential to an affirmative defense, ... it [i]s incumbent on [the defendant] to request that the [factfinder] be asked the pertinent question.' Kerman, 374 F.3d at 120. . . Usually, if a jury trial has been properly demanded, the factfinder for such questions will be a jury. . . . The jury may be asked to make its findings by answering special interrogatories. . . When such interrogatories are used, of course, the court will need to give the jury proper 'instructions and explanations,'. . . to enable the jury to make its findings in accordance with, inter alia, the proper allocation of the burden of proof. However, the parties may agree to forgo their Seventh Amendment rights, either entirely or with respect to specified issues. . . . These rules mean that the parties, directly or through their attorneys, are allowed to agree to forgo their Seventh Amendment rights on specified factual questions and have those questions decided by the court. . . . In the present case, the district court properly, and without objection, charged the jury as to, inter alia, what it must find Outlaw had proven by a preponderance of the evidence in order to return verdicts in his favor on his claims of excessive force in violation of the federal and state constitutions. . . . We presume, absent any indication to the contrary, that the jury followed the court's instructions, and that the jury, having found that Allen intentionally or recklessly subjected Outlaw to force that was 'excessive,' did not then conclude that so much of the force as was excessive was justified. . . . Allen argues that the jury must have found justification for the total amount of force he used because, he says, '[t]he only reasonable interpretation of the jury finding Officer Allen liable for excessive force and at the same time not liable for assault is that Officer Allen reasonably believed the force was necessary to protect himself, Detective Gordon, or third parties from the Plaintiff's use or imminent use of force'. . . and that it was 'very wrong' for 'the District Court [to] ma[k]e findings of fact in contravention of the jury's finding that Officer Allen believed force was necessary to prevent harm to himself, another officer, or a third party'. . . . This argument is factually, doctrinally, and logically flawed. The factual flaw is, of course, that there were no jury findings as to Outlaw's conduct or Allen's beliefs. The jury was not asked whether Outlaw used force, or threatened force, or appeared to do so. The jury was not asked what Allen saw or believed. The doctrinal flaw is that what Allen himself 'believed' is not a consideration in determining qualified immunity for a federal constitutional violation but rather is an element only in the state-law concept of justification[.]. . . As discussed above, the federal standard for qualified immunity is what a reasonable officer in Allen's position would have believed, not what Allen himself believed. . . . A third logical flaw inheres in Allen's total disregard of the principle that, as to the facts necessary to establish his entitlement to qualified immunity, he had the burden of proof. . . .Allen does not suggest that he made any principled attempt to have questions as to facts that could show his entitlement to qualified immunity submitted to the jury. To the contrary, although the transcript of the charge conference indicates that defendants initially wanted to have the jury asked some questions of that nature, the transcript also makes clear, as indicated in Part I.C. above, that defense counsel made a strategic choice to forgo submission of such questions to the jury. The apparent reason was that the district court stated—properly—that as to any such questions the court would have to instruct the jury that the burden of proof as to those matters was on the defendants, and that defense counsel preferred not to have the jury so instructed. Since the court insisted that the jury be instructed properly, defense counsel proposed that no such questions be submitted to the jury and that all of the requisite factual determinations be made by the court. Outlaw, who bore no responsibility for seeing that a sufficient record was created for an affirmative defense, expressly consented. Thus, as defendants wished, questions with regard to 'qualified immunity for federal claims' and 'qualified immunity for state law claims' were deleted . . . all mentions of the concept of a qualified immunity defense were deleted . . . and an explanation that as to some issues in the case the plaintiff does not have the burden of proof was deleted[.]. . As to the entirety of the qualified immunity defense, defense counsel said, 'Your Honor has that on your lap, period'. . . and the court accordingly made findings as to facts about which the jury was deliberately not asked. We cannot allow Allen now to put words in the jury's mouth. While Allen argues that, in asking the court to make factual findings, he did not consent to have the court make findings inconsistent with those made by the jury, that argument is inconsequential. The jury made none of the factual findings he wishes to impute to it. Finally, we note that Allen makes no attempt to argue that the evidence at trial was insufficient to support the district court's factual findings. Ironically, he argues that 'there was no finding by the jury that it necessarily believed' the various witnesses' 'testimony concerning [Outlaw's] version of the facts'. . . . However, in contrast to the lack of any instructions to the jury on defendants' qualified immunity defense, the jury was instructed that '[i]n order for the plaintiff to establish [that he was deprived of a constitutional right], he must show ... by a preponderance of the evidence,' inter alia, 'that the defendants committed the acts alleged by the plaintiff.'. . The jury so found with respect to Outlaw's constitutional claims. In sum, we conclude that Allen's arguments that the jury necessarily made factual findings that (a) would entitle him to qualified immunity, and (b) were contrary to the posttrial factual findings made by the court, are meritless. The jury made no findings, express or implicit, as to whether Allen carried his burden of establishing any factual predicate for his defense. The court, having been asked by the parties to make findings of fact with respect to the qualified immunity defense, had the authority to make credibility assessments and draw such inferences as it believed appropriate. Its findings of fact, described in Part I.C. above, are amply supported by the trial record. We affirm so much of the judgment as awarded Outlaw damages against Allen.")

Grice v. McVeigh, 873 F.3d 162, 169, 173-76 (2d Cir. 2017) (Parker, J., dissenting) ("The majority, by granting qualified immunity to Sergeant Anthony McVeigh and Officer Frank Farina of the Greenburgh, New York police department, absolves them of the arrest of Gregory Grice. Grice was an indisputably innocent 16-year old young man who was arrested while standing at a location where he had every right to be and doing what he had every right to do. The majority mischaracterizes Grice's detention as a Terry stop. It was no such thing: it was an arrest and the facts that we are obligated to accept for purposes of this appeal establish that there was no probable cause for the arrest. Because McVeigh and Farina are not entitled to qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent. . . . Once we assume for purposes of this appeal Grice's version of the facts, we are dealing with a record that establishes the following. (i) Grice was at all times where he had every right to be and was doing what he had every right to do; (ii) Grice had evidence, previously accepted by the police, which established his innocence and that evidence was made available to McVeigh at the outset of the encounter; (iii) Grice never engaged in any threatening, unsafe, or suspicious behavior, and was at all times calm and cooperative; (iv) Grice never trespassed, nor did McVeigh or Farina have any first-hand basis to conclude that he did; (iv) yet, once it became clear that Grice posed no terrorist threat, McVeigh told the MTA police that he saw Grice trespassing. The majority in large part ignores these elements of Grice's story, and turns instead to the contradictory version presented on appeal by McVeigh and Farina. The majority, without discussion, condones this bait-and-switch. I would not. . . Turning to the merits, I agree that McVeigh had sufficient suspicion for a Terry stop and, indeed, he would have been derelict had he not inquired as to what Grice may have been doing. But Grice's detention was not a Terry stop, but an arrest. . . . [I]f a generalized fear of terrorism coupled with the possession of a cell phone is sufficient to justify an arrest, then our Fourth Amendment is in real jeopardy. . . . In any event, the fact that some terrorists use cell phones is beside the point. McVeigh should have easily and quickly determined that Grice was a train buff, not a terrorist. As we have seen, Grice had on his person correspondence with the police corroborating his explanation of what he was doing. Notwithstanding our law that handcuffing is the 'hallmark of an arrest,' the majority concludes that Grice's handcuffing did not constitute an arrest because 'McVeigh's intent [was] to handcuff Grice for protection rather than pursuant to arrest.'. . None of this is correct. Because McVeigh lacked probable cause to arrest Grice, he had no legal right in these circumstances to handcuff Grice for Grice's protection. And because McVeigh had no basis whatever to believe that Grice was either armed or dangerous, he had no right to handcuff Grice for McVeigh's protection. Handcuffs are not a tool that police officers can casually use whenever they choose. Their use is not justified because it is a easy or convenient way for the police to go about their business. As our case law makes clear, handcuffing is a significant intrusion on a citizen's dignity and liberty. . . .The majority rests its opinion entirely on its conclusion that Grice was the subject of a valid Terry stop supported by reasonable suspicion. Because it concluded Grice was not arrested—a necessary element of Grice's claims for false arrest, failure to intervene, and supervisory liability—it felt no need to assess whether McVeigh and Farina had probable cause, the other core question underlying Grice's claims. I need engage no prolonged discussion on this question because my views make clear that I would easily conclude that McVeigh and Farina lacked probable cause to arrest Grice. I would therefore send each of Grice's claims to a jury. . . .At a trial, McVeigh and Farina could well be exonerated by a jury that has been presented with the relevant facts. A jury could conclude that, given the circumstances the officers faced, they acted appropriately. Juries very frequently reach just this result. But where, as here, the record is pock-marked with contradictions, whether the officers are entitled to exoneration should be determined by a jury selected from the community the officers are committed to serve and not by judges dealing with a record such as this one.")

Estate of Jacquez v. City of New York, 706 F. App'x 709, ___ (2d Cir. 2017) ("The district court's special interrogatories were not erroneous. . . Despite Appellants' argument that they were 'sandbagged,'. . . the district court informed the parties of its intent to provide the jury with special interrogatories at a pre-trial conference, and again on the first day of trial. Much of the testimony at trial discussed the events leading up to the final shot. It was reasonable for the district court to ask the jury specific factual questions the answers to which would assist the district court in determining whether Flores was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the final shot. Whether Jaquez was pushing himself off the floor and holding a knife at the time of the final shot were plainly relevant to the question of whether Flores acted reasonably in shooting him again. Submitting these interrogatories to the jury did not mislead the jury or inadequately inform it of the law. The district court did not exceed the bounds of its discretion in issuing these special interrogatories.")

Callahan v. Wilson, 863 F.3d 144, 149-52 (2d Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 161 (2018) ("Defendants-Appellees suggest that Rasanen may no longer control in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S. Ct. 2012 (2014). . . . Plumhoff did not, however, involve any claim of instructional error, nor does the opinion alter the authorities on which Rasanen relied regarding the appropriate jury charge concerning the fatal shooting of suspects in the circumstances presented here. In particular, Plumhoff involved an application of Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007), which was decided several years before Plumhoff and was discussed at length in Rasanen[.] . . .Nor does the Supreme Court's recent decision in County of Los Angeles v. Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539 (2017), undermine Rasanen's holding as to the requirements for a jury charge in the type of excessive force case presented here. . . . Importantly, Garner articulated the probable cause requirement for police shooting cases upon which this Court relied in Rasanen. . . Thus, as relevant here, we conclude that neither Plumhoff nor Mendez overrules Rasanen, which remains the controlling law of this Circuit. Defendants do not attempt to distinguish Rasanen on the facts, which is unsurprising given the similarity between the circumstances of the shooting in that case and the underlying facts here. Accordingly, we are bound to follow Rasanen in this case. . . . Unlike in Rasanen, the charge here did refer to the probable cause necessary for an officer to reasonably use deadly force. But the instruction did not track the language from Rasanen, and we conclude that it is materially different from the language we approved there, even with the reference to 'probable cause.' In Rasanen, we held that the jury 'must' be instructed that the use of deadly force is 'unreasonable unless the officer had probable cause to believe that the suspect posed a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or to others,' 723 F.3d at 334 (emphasis added); here, the jury was instructed that an officer 'may use deadly force ... if' the officer has the requisite probable cause[.] . . . Although these two formulations both refer to the probable cause requirement for the use of deadly force, they are not functionally equivalent. In Rasanen, we explicitly distinguished between the permissive 'may/if' language and the restrictive 'unless/only' language by reference to the New York State Police administrative manual before the jury in that case. . . The relevant provision in that manual used nearly identical language to the charge here, stating: 'A[n officer] may use deadly physical force against another person when they reasonably believe it to be necessary to defend the [officer] or another person from the use or imminent use of deadly physical force.'. . . In concluding that this formulation did not correctly instruct the jury, we explained that the problem with the 'may/if' language is that it 'is not framed in exclusive and restrictive terms.'. . That formulation was insufficient because it did not convey that an officer's use of deadly physical force is reasonable, and therefore legally permissible, only in a specific circumstance. . .Thus, the charge given to the jury here—which used the same permissive 'may/if' language that we specifically rejected in Rasanen—was deficient. This error in the formulation of the specific deadly force instruction was compounded by the balance of the charge regarding excessive force, which further weakened the probable cause requirement. . . .Even though the jury was told that Officer Wilson would have been permitted to use deadly force if he had probable cause to believe that Callahan posed a significant threat of death or serious injury, our required charge is more demanding; under Rasanen, such probable cause is the only situation in which Wilson was permitted to use deadly force, and the jury must be so instructed.") Callahan v. Wilson, 863 F.3d 144, 154-56 (2d Cir. 2017) (Raggi, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 161 (2018) ("At the outset, I recognize that this panel is bound by Rasanen's holding that in a civil action against a police officer for the unconstitutional use of deadly force, a district court cannot charge a jury that the standard for assessing the officer's use of such force is simply 'reasonableness.' Rather, the court must charge that the constitutional use of deadly force requires the officer to have had probable cause to believe that the person killed posed a significant threat of death or serious injury to the officer or to others. . . I note only that Rasanen continues to set this court apart from our sister circuits, which construe the Supreme Court's decision in Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007), to 'abrogate' the use of any special standards for deciding when the use of deadly force is constitutionally excessive and to 'reinstate[

] "reasonableness" as the ultimate—and only—inquiry.' [collecting cases] Moreover, since Rasanen, the Supreme Court has reiterated that the 'settled and exclusive framework' for analyzing claims of excessive force is 'reasonableness.'. . Insofar as neither Mendez nor Plumhoff spoke to the issue of how juries should be charged in excessive force cases, the majority concludes that they do not overrule Rasanen. . . But neither did Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), or O'Bert ex rel. O'Bert v. Vargo, 331 F.3d 29 (2d Cir. 2003)—the cases on which Rasanen relied to identify a probable-cause charging requirement—speak to jury charges. Indeed, Garner arose in the context of a bench trial, and the issue in O'Bert was the denial of summary judgment to a defendant who invoked qualified immunity to avoid trial. . . I do not pursue the matter further, however, because even following Rasanen's holding, as this panel must, I would not identify charging error in this case. The jury instructions on the reasonable use of deadly force in Rasanen failed to make any mention of a need for probable cause to believe that the suspect posed a significant threat of death or serious physical injury. . . By contrast, the district court here cited such probable cause as the only example of when an officer might permissibly use deadly force:

A police officer is entitled to use reasonable force. A police officer is not entitled to use any force beyond what is necessary to accomplish a lawful purpose. Reasonable force may include the use of deadly force.

A police officer may use deadly force against a person if a police officer has probable cause to believe that the person poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.

App'x 605 (emphasis added). The majority nevertheless concludes that this charge is constitutionally inadequate because the jury could have construed 'may,' in the italicized text, as merely illustrative and, therefore, thought that deadly force might also be 'reasonable' in other circumstances where the cited probable cause was lacking. . . I cannot agree.")

Figueroa v. Mazza, at 825 F.3d 89, 100, 108 (2d Cir. 2016) ("When a plaintiff alleges that a law enforcement officer's official conduct renders him personally liable in damages, our inquiry is not whether the officer should have acted as he did. Nor is it whether a singular, hypothetical entity exemplifying the 'reasonable officer'—a creature akin to the 'reasonable man' of the law of torts, . . .would have acted in the same way. It is instead whether any reasonable officer, out of the wide range of reasonable people who enforce the laws in this country, could have determined that the challenged action was lawful. . . . Turning to the facts before us, we conclude that Samuel's failure-to-intervene claims—even assuming that the assault lasted less than twenty seconds—were for the jury to decide. Taking into account all the circumstances and viewing them favorably to Samuel, as required in reviewing a trial court's decision to override the role assigned to the jury, we cannot hold that the assault occurred so quickly that the defendant officers lacked time to intercede as a matter of law. Samuel testified that, at the time he was assaulted, he was sitting in the back of a police cruiser and Failla and Chan were sitting in front. . . Nothing in the record suggests that they would have for any reason found it difficult to reach into the backseat, exit the vehicle to assist Samuel, or communicate with the officer who committed the assault. Yet—according to Samuel's testimony—both officers sat passively through the entire event. . . In light of the officers' placement relative to Samuel, the apparent absence of any obstacles that might have hindered their ability to intercede, and the assault's stated duration, a reasonable juror could infer that defendants became, by their inaction, 'tacit collaborator[s]' in the unlawful conduct alleged. In sum, in entering judgment for defendants on Samuel's failure-to-intervene claims, the District Court erred by engaging in improper fact-finding and by misapplying the relevant legal standard. As to those claims, the judgment will be vacated and the cause remanded.")

Brown v. City of New York, 798 F.3d 94, 102-03 (2d Cir. 2015) ("The officers could be entitled to a summary judgment only if there existed a per se rule that an arrestee's refusal to submit to the easy application of handcuffs always permitted police officers to use substantial force, including taking a person to the ground and incapacitating her with pepper spray, to accomplish handcuffing. We know of no such rule. Indeed, by focusing only on resistance to the arrest, such a rule would disregard the three-factor analysis that the Supreme Court required in Graham. Even resistance sufficient to result in conviction for resisting arrest does not preclude a finding of 'excessive force in effectuating the arrest.'. . Here, on the undisputed facts, even shaded with the officers' account of the episode, no reason appears why, with Brown standing, each officer could not have simply held one of her arms, brought it behind her, and put handcuffs on her wrists. Or they could have simply surrounded her, at least for a few moments, making it clear that she could not leave until she submitted to handcuffing. . .We do not mean to imply that the availability of a less aggressive way of accomplishing an arrest necessarily means that the technique that was used is thereby shown to have been excessive. Police officers must be entitled to make a reasonable selection among alternative techniques for making an arrest. But when the amount of force used by two police officers involves taking a 120–pound woman to the ground and twice spraying her directly in the face with pepper spray, the availability of a much less aggressive technique is at least relevant to making the ultimate determination of whether excessive force was used. The assessment of a jury is needed in this case. Even though most of the facts concerning the application of force are undisputed, a jury will have to decide whether Fourth Amendment reasonableness was exceeded when Brown was taken to the ground after refusing to put her hands behind her back and when officers struggled with her on the ground and used pepper spray to accomplish handcuffing. And even if Brown's unwillingness, while standing, to offer her hands for handcuffing and, while on the ground, to offer her left arm to complete the handcuffing is found to be resisting arrest, that non-threatening form of resistance would be only one factor to be considered along with the minor nature of the disorderly conduct violation, the absence of actual or threatened harm to the officers, and the degree of force, including taking her to the ground and twice applying pepper spray. . . . The continuum along which the excessiveness of force in making an arrest is assessed is not marked by visible signposts. A court's role in considering excessive force claims is to determine whether a jury, instructed as to the relevant factors, could reasonably find that the force used was excessive. In this case, the majority and the dissent differ on that legal issue. That division, not uncommon in cases considering the sufficiency of evidence, leaves the factual determination of excessiveness to a jury, whose collective common sense, informed by their life experiences, may well exceed that of all the members of this panel.")

Rogoz v. City of Hartford, 796 F.3d 236, 249-50 (2d Cir. 2015) ("In addition to making a credibility determination and resolving against Rogoz the material factual issue of whether Watson had identified himself to Rogoz as a police officer, the district court failed in other respects to view the record in the light most favorable to Rogoz….Viewed in [the light most favorable to Rogoz], there was no resistance by Rogoz to the officers' orders, no history of crimes of violence, and no disobedience; he was entirely compliant; he was already subdued. . . . The court also failed to view the evidence in the light most favorable to Rogoz in analyzing the amount of force that was employed against him. In discussing excessive force principles, the court referred neither to any break or fracture of any of Rogoz's bones, nor to any violent conduct such as a jump onto Rogoz's back. . . . Having framed the issue as whether '[s]ome degree of force' and 'plac [ing]' 'weight' on a suspect's back could be reasonable, the court found that Watson was entitled to qualified immunity on the basis that the law was not clearly established that such force would violate a suspect's rights under the Fourth Amendment. However, actions by officers far less extreme than jumping on the back of a prone and compliant suspect, and apparently resulting in injuries far less serious than broken spines and ribs, had long been held sufficient to support a Fourth Amendment claim of use of excessive force. . . . Finally, had the district court properly disregarded defendants' contention that Watson had identified himself to Rogoz as a police officer in the Lawrence Street area—as it was required to do on a summary judgment motion, since a jury would be entitled to discredit such trial testimony by Watson—the court could not have found that the law was insufficiently clear for Watson to know he was violating Rogoz's Fourth Amendment rights. Without Watson's identifying himself as an officer, there was no evidence whatever that Rogoz had disobeyed any police order or had in any way resisted arrest.")

Simpson v. City of New York, 793 F.3d 259, 269 (2d Cir. 2015) ("On the facts viewed in the light most favorable to Ms. Simpson, a passenger was stuck on the lift at the front of the bus. The bus driver directed the crowd, which included Officer Nelson and Ms. Simpson, to 'Go around, go around' to the back entrance of the bus, and he opened the back doors. Ms. Simpson and the other passengers then moved to the back entrance and boarded. Once on the bus, Ms. Simpson waited in line behind other passengers to swipe her MetroCard. Officer Nelson stopped Ms. Simpson, ordered her not to pay her bus fare, and demanded that she follow him off the bus. On these facts, no reasonable officer could have concluded that Ms. Simpson intended to commit theft of services any more than a reasonable officer could have concluded that a person at the grocery store directed to a checkout counter and waiting in line to pay for produce intended to commit petit larceny. Add to this scenario the reasonable inference that Officer Nelson (1) was upset by having been rebuffed and (2) was merely demonstrating his dominance, and any pretense of reasonableness flies out the window. Because the facts bearing on whether Officer Nelson is entitled to qualified immunity are in dispute, the grant of summary judgment on that basis is vacated.")

Jackson v. City of New York, 606 F. App'x 618, 620 n.2 (2d Cir. 2015) ("Because Jackson did not object to the district court's decision to charge the jury on qualified immunity—either below or on appeal—any such argument is waived or at least forfeited. See Local Union No. 38, Sheet Metal Workers' Int'l Ass'n v. Pelella, 350 F.3d 73, 87 (2d Cir.2003) (waiver); Presidential Gardens Assocs. v. U.S. ex rel. Sec'y of Hous. & Urban Dev., 175 F.3d 132, 141 (2d Cir.1999) (forfeiture). We express no view as to the propriety of that procedure here. Compare Stephenson v. Doe, 332 F.3d 68, 81 (2d Cir.2003) (observing that "ultimate legal determination of whether qualified immunity attaches to a law enforcement agent's actions is a question of law better left for the court to decide" (internal quotation marks omitted)), with Taravella v. Town of Wolcott, 599 F.3d 129, 135 (2d Cir.2010) (noting that qualified immunity presents "mixed question of law and fact," and "[a]lthough a conclusion ... as a matter of law may be appropriate where there is no dispute as to the material historical facts, if there is such a dispute, the factual question must be resolved by the factfinder" (emphasis added) (internal quotation marks omitted)).")

Henry v. Dinelle, 557 F. App'x 20, 22 (2d Cir. 2014) ("Henry claims that the district court erred by instructing the jury on qualified immunity, and by including an interrogatory on the verdict form relating to qualified immunity. But Henry himself asked the court to give the jury a qualified immunity instruction, and specifically approved the qualified immunity instructions that the court gave. By requesting and approving the qualified immunity instruction, Henry invited the errors of which he now complains. He therefore cannot challenge them on appeal.")

Rasanen v. Doe, 723 F.3d 325, 333 (2d Cir. 2013) ("In a case involving use of force highly likely to have deadly effects, an instruction regarding justifications for the use of deadly force is required. . . . Although the Supreme Court's decision in Scott clarified that a special instruction based on Garner is not necessary (or even appropriate) in all deadly-force contexts, we have since made clear that this limitation does not apply in the original Garner context: the fatal shooting of an unarmed suspect.")

Rasanen v. Doe, 723 F.3d 325, 340, 344 (2d Cir. 2013) (Raggi, J., dissenting) ("Following Scott, two of our sister circuits have rejected challenges to jury charges in deadly force cases that relied only on 'the general rubric of reasonableness.' Noel v. Artson, 641 F .3d 580, 587 (4th Cir.2011); see Acosta v. Hill, 504 F.3d 1323, 1324 (9th Cir.2007) (concluding that requirement of 'deadly force instruction' in addition to 'excessive force instruction based on the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard' was 'explicitly contradict[ed]' by and 'clearly irreconcilable with' Scott (internal quotation marks omitted)). In reaching a different conclusion here, the majority creates an unwarranted circuit split. . . .In sum, Garner, O'Bert, Scott, and Terranova do not make it clear and obvious that juries in all excessive force shooting cases must be charged that there is a probable cause precondition to the use of deadly force. Thus, the district court's asserted failure to give such a charge in this case cannot be deemed plain error.")

Terranova v. New York, 676 F.3d 305, 307-09 (2d Cir. 2012) ("During trial, the district court originally proposed to give instructions to the jury that included a separate 'deadly force' charge with regard to the factors outlined by the Supreme Court in Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), as preconditions to the lawful use of deadly force. However, the district court ultimately removed that instruction, concluding that, under Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007), it was inappropriate to instruct the jury on the Garner factors in cases with dissimilar facts. The resulting jury instructions informed the jurors that they were to decide whether the force used was objectively reasonable and specified the various factors that might affect that determination, such as the severity of the violation, the threat posed by the appellants, whether the appellants attempted to evade the police, and what other options, if any, were available to the Troopers. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the Troopers. Appellants then filed motions for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and for a new trial, which were denied. This appeal followed. . . . [A]bsent evidence of the use of force highly likely to have deadly effects, as in Garner, a jury instruction regarding justifications for the use of deadly force is inappropriate, and the usual instructions regarding the use of excessive force are adequate. . . . The present matter is easily distinguishable from Garner given the type of force used—a traffic stop as opposed to firing a gun aimed at a person. While a traffic stop poses some risks, it is designed only to apprehend suspects and, here, prevent injury to other motorists as well as appellants. It is not designed to achieve those goals by seriously injuring the suspects. The appropriate inquiry is, therefore, whether the force used was objectively reasonable. The absence of a deadly force instruction neither misled the jury nor left them uninformed as to the applicable law.")

Weather v. City of Mount Vernon, 474 F. App'x 821, 2012 WL 1193673, at *1-*4 (2d Cir. Apr. 11, 2012) (not published) ("The district court, following the procedure set forth in Stephenson v. Doe, 332 F.3d 68, 81 (2d Cir.2003), asked the jury questions relevant to qualified immunity via special interrogatories. On the basis of the jury's answers to those special interrogatories, it denied qualified immunity to Marcucilli. . . .The majority of appellants' arguments rest on the contention that Weather's constitutional rights were not violated by Marcucilli's use of force. But such contention is largely foreclosed by the jury's verdict, which found that Weather 'proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant, Sergeant Marcucilli, intentionally or recklessly applied excessive force on Mr. Weather on January 12, 2007 in a manner that was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances.' Only an appeal from the denial of a motion under Fed. R. Civ. Pro. 50 to set aside the verdict would theoretically avail appellants on this prong. Such a standard is high, however . . . . We have here a well-developed factual record and special interrogatories which indicate that Marcucilli did not 'reasonably believe that a reasonably prudent police officer would have acted ...' Oliveira, 23 F.3d at 648–49. Appellants point to no evidence in the record which support a finding that a reasonable officer in Marcucilli's position would not have known that his behavior was unlawful. Further, all of the circumstances which appellants point out as evidence that supported Marcucilli's use of force were either expressly or implicitly rejected by the jury, whose findings were amply supported by the trial evidence. The law protecting a person against excessive force in this situation is clearly established. Weather was breaking no law, was not resisting arrest, and was not placing himself or others in danger. No reasonable officer would believe that 'twisting Mr. Weather's arm behind his back and pushing or shoving him into the brick wall outside the school' was a lawful use of force in this circumstance, and appellants point us to no cases that indicate otherwise. Further, as the district court wrote on this point that 'no evidence was presented at trial to suggest that Sergeant Marcucilli made a mistake regarding his legal obligations such that would excuse his actions.' Any 'belief that his conduct was lawful' would not be reasonable, given the facts found by the jury.")

Lore v. City of Syracuse, 670 F.3d 127, 148, 161, 162 (2d Cir. 2012) ("As to Guy, the jury found that he made negative comments about Lore to news reporters; that he was aware at that time that Lore had filed an EEOC complaint; that Guy's comments constituted materially adverse employment action; that Lore's discrimination complaints were a motivation for Guy's acts of retaliation; and that as a result of his retaliatory acts, Lore suffered actual damages in the amounts of $100,000 for harm to her reputation and $150,000 for pain, suffering, and emotional distress. . . . However, the jury answered 'Yes' to the question of whether Guy was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Over Lore's objection, the district court instructed the jury on federal law principles governing public officials' entitlement to qualified immunity with respect to Lore's § 1983 claims, and the Verdict Form included a question to be answered, if the jury found that Guy retaliated against Lore, as to whether Guy was entitled to qualified immunity. Lore contends that the ultimate question of Guy's entitlement to qualified immunity was a legal question for the court, not a question for the jury, and that the court should have ruled, based on the jury's factual findings, that Guy was not entitled to immunity. We agree in part. Once any material factual questions had been answered by the jury, the ultimate matter of Guy's entitlement to qualified immunity should have been determined by the court. Bearing in mind that the claims submitted to the jury against Guy were both those asserted under § 1983 for violation of Lore's First Amendment right to file grievances and complain of discrimination and those asserted under the HRL, we conclude that the court should have determined that Guy (a) was entitled to qualified immunity on the § 1983 claim but (b) did not establish his state-law entitlement to immunity for violation of the HRL. . . . Here, questions as to what situation confronted Guy, what acts he performed, and his motivation in performing those acts were questions of fact; they were to be—and were—answered by the factfinder. In light of those factual findings, the question of whether it would be clear to a reasonable public official, engaging in that conduct in that situation, that his conduct was unlawful was a question of law. We conclude that although the district court properly put the fact questions to the jury, it erred in having the jury decide the ultimate legal question, in light of the facts established, of whether Guy, in his personal capacity, was entitled to qualified immunity. That legal question should have been answered by the court.")

Tracy v. Freshwater, 623 F.3d 90, 98, 99 (2d Cir. 2010) ("Unquestionably, infliction of pepper spray on an arrestee has a variety of incapacitating and painful effects . . .and, as such, its use constitutes a significant degree of force. Accordingly, a number of our sister circuits have made clear that it should not be used lightly or gratuitously against an arrestee who is complying with police commands or otherwise poses no immediate threat to the arresting officer. [citing cases] Here, if a jury credited Tracy's version of the events and determined that Freshwater applied pepper spray after Tracy had already been handcuffed and was offering no physical resistance of police commands, it might well conclude that the use of that pepper spray was unreasonable under the circumstances. The district court thus erred in taking that issue away from a jury at the summary judgment stage.")

Aczel v. Labonia, 584 F.3d 52, 54-58 (2d Cir. 2009) ("With the consent of the parties, the court distributed to the jurors a special verdict form, in accordance with Rule 49(b)(1), Fed.R.Civ.P. This was in the form of a questionnaire, which asked the jurors to answer specific factual questions from which the ultimate verdict and judgment might be derived. In Part A, as to each of Plaintiff's claims, the form asked whether Plaintiff had proved the facts necessary to establish a violation of his rights. As to each claim of violation of a federal constitutional right that the jury found Plaintiff had established, the form asked whether Defendant had proved entitlement to qualified immunity. . . . [The jury] exonerated Labonia on every claim except use of excessive force, answering 'Yes' to question A2, thus indicating its finding that Labonia violated Plaintiff's right under the Fourth Amendment to be free of excessive force. As to this claim, however, the jury also answered question A2(a) stating that Labonia 'proved ... entitlement to qualified immunity by proving [his] reasonable and objective belief that the force used was reasonable under the circumstances at the time of the arrest.' Consistent with the instruction to answer question B 1 on proximately caused damages if the jury gave a 'Yes' answer to any question in Part A, the jury entered $12,078.61 as the 'amount of compensatory damages [Plaintiff has] proved were proximately caused by' Labonia's wrongful acts. . . . The jury, however, found facts which entitled Defendant to qualified immunity. Unless some flaw in the proceedings necessarily invalidated that finding, the district court acted within its discretion in relying on it to grant judgment to Defendant. . . . The crucial finding was of facts that entitle Lebonia to immunity. If the jury's findings to that effect are credited, under Harlow they mandate judgment in favor of Defendant, regardless of whether Defendant violated Plaintiff's rights and caused him damages. . . .The finding that Labonia's use of excessive force caused damage to Aczel in the amount of $12,078.61 did not contradict the finding of facts which entitled Libonia to immunity from judgment. They addressed different issues. . . . If the jury's award of damages may represent a desire on the jury's part to make an award of damages that was not justified by the law or the court's instructions, there is no impropriety or abuse of discretion in the district court's striking of the illegal award and entering judgment in favor of the defendant based on the jury's finding of entitlement to qualified immunity.").

Higazy v. Templeton, 505 F.3d 161, 170 (2d Cir. 2007) ("The matter of whether a right was clearly established at the pertinent time is a question of law. In contrast, the matter of whether a defendant official's conduct was objectively reasonable, i.e., whether a reasonable official would reasonably believe his conduct did not violate a clearly established right, is a mixed question of law and fact. . . . Moreover, '[a]lthough a conclusion that the defendant official's conduct was objectively reasonable as a matter of law may be appropriate where there is no dispute as to the material historical facts, if there is such a dispute, the factual questions must be resolved by the factfinder.' . . 'Though Aimmunity ordinarily should be decided by the court," that is true only in those cases where the facts concerning the availability of the defense are undisputed; otherwise, jury consideration is normally required....' Oliveira v. Mayer, 23 F.3d 642, 649 (2d Cir.1994).").

Zellner v. Summerlin, 494 F.3d 344, 368 (2d Cir. 2007) ("Once the jury has resolved any disputed facts that are material to the qualified immunity issue, the ultimate determination of whether the officer's conduct was objectively reasonable is to be made by the court. . . . To the extent that a particular finding of fact is essential to a determination by the court that the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity, it is the responsibility of the defendant to request that the jury be asked the pertinent question.").

Husain v. Springer, 494 F.3d 108, 131-34 (2d Cir. 2007) ("The state of the law in Spring 1997 was such that, when President Springer nullified the election in response to the content published in the College Voice, it was clear that her actions violated the First Amendment rights of the student journalists. There can be no question that a reasonable official in President Springer's position should have been aware that the College Voice was a public forum, limited only with respect to the speakers who could participate and not with regard to the subject matters on which the newspaper could discuss, and thereby entitled to protection under Supreme Court law governing such fora. . . . [A]lthough no court had specifically held at the time that the nullification of an election on the basis of views expressed by a student newspaper violated the First Amendment where such nullification chilled future speech, the 'unlawfulness' of Springer's actions was 'apparent' 'in the light of pre-existing law.' . . . Because President Springer's conduct violated clearly established law, she is entitled to qualified immunity only if it was objectively reasonable for her to believe that her actions were lawful at the time she nullified the election. . . . Defendants assert that President Springer decided to nullify the election because she believed doing so was necessary to vindicate Election Rules 2 and 5. Although we, like the district court, conclude that those rules did not justify Springer's conduct, it is possible that a jury might find that it was 'objectively reasonable' for Springer, at the time she acted, to believe that her nullification was the lawful implementation of these content-neutral election rules. But, while such a conclusion by a jury may be permissible, it nonetheless is inappropriate for a court, at the summary judgment stage, to find that Springer is entitled to qualified immunity on this basis. . . . [E]ven if there were no factual dispute regarding President Springer's reliance on the election rules, it would still be inappropriate to resolve the qualified immunity question on summary judgment. We noted that a jury might find that it was objectively reasonable for Springer to believe that a nullification of the election on the basis of the election rules was lawful, because such nullification involved only the enforcement of content-neutral regulations. But a reasonable jury could equally well conclude the opposite, i.e., that any reliance on the rules was not an objectively reasonable basis for nullification of the election.")

Husain v. Springer, 494 F.3d 108, 135-37 (2d Cir. 2007) (Jacobs, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in the majority's result insofar as it affirms the dismissal of some claims, but I dissent insofar as it reverses the grant of qualified immunity. I concede that this short opinion of mine does not consider or take into account the majority opinion. So I should disclose at the outset that I have not read it. I suppose this is unusual, so I explain why. . . . This is a case about nothing. Injunctive relief from the school's election rules is now moot (if it was ever viable); and plaintiffs' counsel conceded at oral argument that the only relief sought in this litigation is nominal damages. Now, after years of litigation over two dollars, the majority will impose on a busy judge to conduct a trial on this silly thing, and require a panel of jurors to set aside their more important duties of family and business in order to decide it. . . . President Springer's decision to re-run the election was (to apply the governing standard) not unreasonable in light of clearly established law. . . . [I]t cannot be said that in 1997 there was a clear line between [i] a viewpoint-based reprisal against a campus newspaper and [ii] the implementation of neutral and constitutional election standards. In any event, a school administrator should not have to become a constitutional-law professor in order to save herself from personal liability when giving a needed lesson in fair play.").

Nov. 21, 2008) (in case very similar to Husain, President of University is denied qualified immunity because she "has not sustained her burden of proof of showing that her action to nullify the Spring 1998 election was objectively reasonable in light of the legal rules under the First Amendment that were clearly established at that time.")]

McClellan v. Smith, 439 F.3d 137, 149 (2d Cir. 2006) ("The District Court generally failed to heed the rule that resolution of genuine factual issues is inappropriate on motions for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . The District Court's finding that '[t]he variations in [Smith's] testimony all arise from the detailed, fast-moving series of events' involving Smith and McClellan cannot serve to validate Smith's version of the events.").

Kent v. Katz, 125 F. App'x 334, ___ (2d Cir. 2005) ("Plaintiff's second argument is that qualified immunity should have been decided by the court as a matter of law and not been given to the jury. We have indicated, though have not definitively held, that the ultimate question on qualified immunity should be resolved by the court as it is a question of law. See, e.g., Stephenson v. Doe, 332 F.3d 68, 80 n. 16 (2d Cir.2003) . . . Insofar as the defense in this case was that it was reasonable for defendant to believe his conduct was lawful because the conduct (the relevant wrist-hold restraining maneuver) was consistent with his police training, the jury was required to make the factual determination whether defendant in fact believed his conduct to be consistent with his training. Thus, even if the ultimate legal decision had been left to the Court, the jury's factual finding that defendant's actions were consistent with his police training (and that he believed them to be consistent) indicates that those actions would not be found 'clearly unlawful.'").

Kerman v. City of New York (Kerman IV), 374 F.3d 93, 111, 112, 117, 119, 120 (2d Cir. 2004) ("In sum, in remanding for trial in Kerman II, we implicitly held that it was sufficiently clear in light of preexisting law that Kerman had a right not to be detained or involuntarily hospitalized by an officer who (on Kerman's version of the facts) did not know, and who patently ignored opportunities to determine, the seriousness of Kerman's condition and whether he was dangerous to himself or others. In light of the Kerman II decision, it was not open to the district court to decide on remand that that right was not clearly established. . . . In short, neither Blissett nor Oliveira allows a district court to grant judgment as a matter of law on essentially the same record on which this Court has ruled that summary judgment is inappropriate because there exist factual issues that must be tried. . . . In sum, we agree with Kerman's contentions that the district court's ruling that Crossan was entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law was contrary to the law of this case as established in Kerman II. And to the extent that the court's immunity rulings were based on the court's own factual findings that the jury neither made nor would have been compelled to make, the rulings infringed Kerman's Seventh Amendment right to have the facts found by a jury. . . . We conclude that when the law-of-the-case doctrine precludes the granting of a motion for judgment as a matter of law on a given issue prior to submission of the case to the jury because the appellate court has held, on substantially the same evidentiary record, that as to that issue there are questions of fact that must be resolved by the jury, it would be inappropriate to conclude that a party's failure to make such a motion prior to submission of the case to the jury constituted a waiver of its right to request judgment in its favor after the jury has returned a verdict and has resolved the pertinent factual disputes in its favor. Here, where the record at trial was virtually the same as the record before this Court in Kerman II, . . .judgment as a matter of law prior to jury findings of fact was precluded by our decision in Kerman II, and we thus reject the contention that Crossan waived his defense by failing to make a motion for the forbidden relief. This conclusion does not, however, mean that there was not a waiver of a different sort, for Crossan, who had the burden of proving his defense of qualified immunity, failed to ask that the jury be given interrogatories that were sufficiently specific to permit it to resolve the factual disputes that were material to his defense. Although, . . .the ultimate question of whether a defendant official is entitled to qualified immunity is one for the court, when the relevant factual disputes have been resolved by a jury the court must base its legal ruling on the facts as found by the jury. . . . At the new trial, however, no precise questions as to the actual events and circumstances were submitted to the jury. . . . Crossan pursued his qualified immunity defense simply by requesting that the jury be asked to make a finding as to whether his decision to detain and hospitalize Kerman was supported by probable cause. The district court likewise, in colloquy with counsel, identified the only factual question to be put to the jury on Crossan's qualified immunity defense as whether Crossan had '[p]robable cause to send [Kerman] to the hospital.' . . Accordingly, the court gave no other instruction with respect to qualified immunity. The jury was asked, in accordance with Fed.R.Civ.P. 49(b), to answer the 17 interrogatories described in Part I.E. above and to return a 'general verdict'. . . Those interrogatories, which were 'approved by both sides[']counsel,' . . . made no distinction between Crossan's position as to immunity on the seizure and false imprisonment claims and his position as to the merits of those claims. . . . In the circumstances of this litigation, if the requisite fact questions had been submitted to the jury, and if the jury had answered them favorably to Crossan, the district court would then have had the authority, despite the absence of a Rule 50 motion, to make the ultimate legal determination of whether Crossan was entitled to qualified immunity on the Fourth Amendment claim, or whether there was privilege on the state-law claims, based on the jury's factual findings. To the extent that a particular finding of fact was essential to an affirmative defense, however, it was incumbent on Crossan to request that the jury be asked the pertinent question. Not having made such a request, Crossan was not entitled to have the court, in lieu of the jury, make the finding. The material factual issues as to Crossan's defenses not having been resolved by the jury, we reverse the district court's ruling that Crossan's decision to detain and hospitalize Kerman was protected by privilege or qualified immunity.").

Cowan ex rel Estate of Cooper v. Breen, 352 F.3d 756, 764, 765 (2d Cir. 2003) ("As the case proceeds to trial, it should be noted that although the factual disputes in the instant case that must be resolved by the jury go both to the excessive force and to the qualified immunity questions, the qualified immunity issue is 'a question of law better left for the court to decide,' Warren, 906 F.2d at 76. Thus, if the jury finds that Breen used excessive force against Cooper, the court should then decide whether Breen is entitled to qualified immunity. Stephenson, 332 F.3d at 80. Because this determination relies on the resolution of questions of fact, we recommend, as we did in Stephenson, that interrogatories on the key factual disputes be presented to the jury. . . Answers to questions such as whether Cooper drove her car towards Breen, whether Breen was in the zone of danger, and if so, whether he safely could have gotten out of the way, may not only help focus the jury's attention on the excessive force aspect of the inquiry, but also may help the court resolve the ultimate question of whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer in Breen's position that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.").

Stephenson v. Doe, 332 F.3d 68, 78-81 & n.16 (2d Cir. 2003) ("In this case, despite apparent agreement during the proceedings that the qualified immunity issue would be decided by the court if the jury found excessive force through the use of special interrogatories, the judge submitted both issues to the jury in his charge. But there was no basis by which the jury could assess whether qualified immunity attached to Dingler's use of excessive force. The jury was not presented with any evidence or instructions or even argument about possible ambiguities in the law with respect to the circumstances in this case or about Dingler's state of knowledge about the law, presumably because the parties believed that the court would submit specific interrogatories and decide qualified immunity itself as it had indicated that it would. . . . Rather, the jury was repeatedly told that the excessive force instruction represented 'clearly established law.' On excessive force, the court specifically instructed the jury that the use of deadly force to effect arrest was unlawful unless an officer had probable cause to believe, in light of all the facts known by and confronting him, that the suspect posed a serious physical threat to him or to others and sufficient warnings were given. The court later emphasized that this law was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. Under those instructions, the jury returned a verdict of liability on excessive force, apparently crediting Stephenson's account that he was not given adequate warning and was unarmed and fleeing when he was shot and rejecting Dingler's testimony that he believed Stephenson was armed and that his own life was in danger. Yet under the same "clearly established law," the jury nevertheless found that Dingler was also entitled to qualified immunity. Conceding at least an apparent inconsistency, Dingler argues that the excessive force and qualified immunity inquiries are distinct, and that this Court should reconcile the jury's findings based on the record. According to Dingler, the jury may have believed that Stephenson did not objectively pose a threat of harm to Dingler but that Dingler's subjective belief of threatened harm was a mistake of fact that, in view of the evidence, the jury credited as reasonable. . . . [A]s the Supreme Court clarified in Saucier, claims that an officer made a reasonable mistake of fact that justified the use of force go to the question of whether the plaintiff's constitutional rights were violated, not the question of whether the officer was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The qualified immunity inquiry, by contrast, concerns an 'officer's mistake as to what the law requires' and acknowledges that 'reasonable mistakes can be made as to the legal constraints on particular police conduct.' . . Accordingly, we conclude that the qualified immunity verdict is legally inconsistent with the verdict on excessive force and should not stand. . . . It appears to us, particularly given the absence of evidence, instruction or argument submitted to the jury on the qualified immunity issue, that the instructions on excessive force and qualified immunity conveyed the same concept for both so that the jury in effect was told to decide twice what an objectively reasonable police officer would do in the situation that Dingler faced. . . . We do not suggest that allowing a jury to decide both the excessive force and the qualified immunity issues will always throw doubt on the validity of the jury's verdict. But on this record, we believe that it does . . . . It is at least questionable, however, whether as a general matter in the context of an excessive force claim a jury should decide the ultimate issue of qualified immunity, in addition to the factual disputes that may bear on the issue. It seems to us that a jury would have a difficult time making that legal determination, especially without an evidentiary hearing on the state of the law at the time of the alleged violation. . . . [U]nder all the circumstances we reluctantly remand this case for a new trial despite the burden this places on the parties and the court. . . . On remand, the district court should substantially follow the procedure it outlined, and the parties agreed to, during precharge conferences. The court should charge the jury on excessive force, but not on qualified immunity. If the jury returns a verdict of excessive force against Dingler, the court should then decide the issue of qualified immunity. [footnote omitted] We have said that the ultimate legal determination of whether qualified immunity attaches to a law enforcement agent's actions is 'a question of law better left for the court to decide.' [citing Warren] We have recognized that qualified immunity is in essence a legal decision whether on the basis of the law as it existed at the time of the particular incident, the lawfulness of the officer's conduct was reasonably clear or was a matter of doubt. Juries are hardly suited to make decisions that require an analysis of legal concepts and an understanding of the inevitable variability in the application of highly generalized legal principles. Moreover, such an analysis would seem to invite each jury to speculate on the predictability of its own verdict. . . We realize, however, that there may be factual disputes overlapping the excessive force and qualified immunity issues that the jury must find. . . . We believe that use of special interrogatories in this case resolves the difficulty of requiring the jury to decide 'what the facts were that the officer faced or perceived' and requiring the court to make the ultimate legal determination of whether qualified immunity attaches on those facts. . . . Therefore, if there is a retrial and if Dingler asserts a qualified immunity defense that depends on disputed factual issues, it will be helpful to focus the jury's attention both in the charge and by use of a few pointed interrogatories on the key factual disputes that may affect the resolution of the qualified immunity issue, such as whether Dingler gave warnings to Stephenson, whether Stephenson was armed with a weapon, and whether Dingler actually believed Stephenson was armed.").

[cite omitted] Significantly, the trial before the District Court revealed some factual disputes concerning various aspects of the encounter between the police and the plaintiffs . . . . As explained above, Theodat's and Crooms's accounts were diametrically opposed. By finding that Crooms had falsely arrested Theodat, the jury necessarily credited Theodat's version of events and discredited Crooms's. Under Theodat's version of events, it was not objectively reasonable for Crooms to believe that probable cause existed, and reasonably competent officers could not disagree as to whether the probable cause test was met. Under that version, Theodat was merely greeting a friend when Crooms arrived, not smoking marijuana, not holding a marijuana cigarette, and not littering. Further, the fact that the jury awarded punitive damages against Crooms is a strong indicator that qualified immunity is inappropriate here. . . For these reasons, special interrogatories would not have proven useful in this case.") Collado v. City of New York, 396 F.Supp.3d 265, ___ (S.D.N.Y. 2019) ("On November 1, 2018, the jury returned a unanimous verdict finding by a preponderance of the evidence that Connolly 'used excessive force against John Collado.'. . . After the verdict was taken, the parties were given an opportunity to address the jury again, and the jury was asked to answer special interrogatories. . . The jury answered the special interrogatories as follows:

1. Did John Collado choke Det. Connolly?
Answer: No.
2. Was Mr. Collado choking Det. Connolly when the shot was fired?
Answer: No.
3A. Did Det. Connolly shout 'police' out on the street?
Answer: Yes.
3B. If yes, did Det. Connolly do so repeatedly?
Answer: No.
4. Did Mr. Batista punch or push Det. Connolly after Mr. Collado intervened?
Answer: No.
. . . . There remained the question of qualified immunity. The parties had agreed that this was an issue for the Court and not for the jury. . . These post-trial motions followed. . . . Whether a right was clearly established is a question of law, and whether a defendant's conduct was objectively reasonable, that is, whether a reasonable officer would have reasonably believed that his conduct did not violate a clearly established right, is a mixed question of law and fact. . . Where the material facts are in dispute, 'the factual questions must be resolved by the factfinder,'. . . and only after the factfinder has determined the facts may the court then 'make the ultimate legal determination of whether qualified immunity attaches on those facts[.]'. . The use of special interrogatories 'may not only help focus the jury's attention on the excessive force aspect of the inquiry, but also may help the court resolve the ultimate question of whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer in [the officer's] position that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Qualified immunity is an affirmative defense as to which the defendant bears the burden of proof. . . . [T]he question presented was whether it was objectively reasonable for a police officer in Connolly's position to believe that Collado posed an immediate and significant threat of death or serious injury to him or others, such as to justify the use of deadly force in self-defense. This question was put to the jury, as the jury was instructed as follows:

To determine whether defendant used excessive force, you must determine whether defendant's use of force against Mr. Collado was reasonable, that is, whether a reasonable officer would have employed the same degree of force in addressing the situation, taking into account the totality of the circumstances known to the officer on the scene at the time. The use of deadly force is unreasonable unless the officer reasonably believes that the individual in question poses an immediate and significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.

. . . . Moreover, the jury was provided with instructions on the factors relevant to its determination of the reasonableness of the use of deadly force, including 'the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether [the suspect] is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.'. . The jury answered the question by finding that Connolly used excessive force. Inherent in its verdict are the further findings that (1) a reasonable officer in the circumstances would not have employed deadly force in self-defense, and (2) a reasonable police officer would not have believed Collado posed an immediate and significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others. In addition, the entire thrust of Connolly's argument at trial was that he was being choked by Collado to the point where he was in fear of his life; the jury squarely rejected that contention, finding explicitly, in its answers to the special interrogatories, that (3) Collado did not choke Connolly, and (4) Batista did not punch or push Connolly after Collado intervened, and finding implicitly that (5) Connolly was not in fear of his life. And the jury further found, at least implicitly, that (6) Connolly shot Collado without giving any warning. . . These findings were supported by the evidence -- the testimony of the eyewitnesses, the videos of the scene, and the medical evidence. To the extent Connolly testified to the contrary, the jury simply did not believe him. Rather, the jury found that Connolly shot and killed, without reasonable justification, someone who was trying to intervene to break up a fight. In these circumstances, and in light of the jury's findings, Connolly is not protected by qualified immunity.") Nelson v. County of Suffolk, No. 12CV5678DRHAKT, 2019 WL 3976526, at *3, *6-9 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 22, 2019) ("Having heard three days of testimony, the jury returned a verdict in favor of Plaintiff. Specifically, the jury found in favor of Plaintiff on his federal § 1983 and state law claims for false arrest (1) against Hudson for the periods (a) beginning from the time Rivera returned from the Ultra Diamonds store to when the officers were informed that the missing bracelet had been found and (b) from that latter point until Nelson's arraignment and (2) against Rivera for the periods (a) beginning from the time Nelson arrived at the precinct until Rivera returned to the precinct from the Ultra Diamonds Store, (b) from Rivera's arrival at the precinct until the officers were informed the bracelet had been found, and (c) from that latter point until Nelson's arraignment. The jury also found in Plaintiff's favor on his federal and state law claims for malicious prosecution, as well as his claims for denial of due process/fair trial and failure to intervene. Subsequent to their verdict, the jury answered special interrogatories posed to them at Defendants' request in connection with their claim for qualified immunity. The jury responded yes to the following two questions:

1. Have the defendants shown by a fair preponderance of the evidence that Kassandra Messina dictated the written statement dated November 17, 2011 to Detective Rivera?
2. Have the defendants shown by a fair preponderance of the evidence that Detective Rivera watched the security video on November 17, 2011?
The following questions were answered in the negative:
1. Have the defendants shown by a fair preponderance of the evidence that Detective Rivera placed a call to the Suffolk County District Attorney's Office on the morning of November 18, 2011 and advised them that the bracelet had been found?
2. Have the defendants shown by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the District Attorney's Office knew before the Plaintiff was arraigned that the bracelet had been found? . . . . Preliminarily, the Court notes that contrary to the suggestion in the excerpt above, the jury made no finding that the security video confirmed Messina's statement. . . In fact, there was no request by Defendants that such a question be put to the jury. Nor was there a request to ask the jury to determine whether Rivera influenced what Messina put in her statement. . . Absent that information, among others, the Court must construe the evidence in favor of Plaintiff and such a construction does not permit the conclusion that there was arguable probable cause. . . As set forth earlier, a reasonable jury could conclude (and the instant jury apparently did conclude) that the surveillance video does not support that there was a piece of jewelry on the counter or that if there was a piece of jewelry on the counter not visible because Messina was blocking it that Nelson's hand came near enough to that portion of the display counter to take it. That conclusion either alone or together with the other circumstances, such as Nelson 'oddly' coming down to the police station on his own, supports that no reasonable police officer could believe, albeit mistakenly, that there was probable cause to arrest Nelson for theft of the bracelet. For all the reasons set forth above, Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on either the false arrest or the malicious prosecution claim. . . . Based on the jury's answers to the special interrogatories, it is clear the triers of fact concluded that Defendants did not take appropriate steps to ensure that Nelson was released, and the prosecution discontinued. The jury found that the officers did not call the Suffolk County District Attorney's Office on the morning of November 18, 2011 and advise that office that the bracelet had been found and further that the District Attorney's Office did not know before Plaintiff was arraigned that the bracelet had been found. No reasonable officer could believe that the failure to timely pass on such critical information was lawful. . . Additionally, according to the Defendants' testimony, rather than take a statement from Messina at the store, interrupting her work for only a short period of time, they acceded to her request to come down after work to give a follow-up statement. In other words, they put the Ultra Diamonds store's ability to conduct business without even a short interruption over securing the freedom of a wrongly charged individual. Finally, Defendants did not request any questions be put to the jury regarding whether, having been advised of that the bracelet was found, they could have secured Nelson's release and/or prevented the continuation of the proceedings against him. As noted earlier, the jury could reasonably reject Defendants' testimony . . . on credibility grounds, that there was nothing they could do to stop the prosecution once they placed Nelson under arrest. The jury could have concluded that Defendants had sufficient time prior to Nelson's arraignment to advise the prosecution of the misplaced jewelry being found. . . Alternatively, given the testimony of former ADA Ross (the ADA at Nelson's arraignment) that he did not have the power to prosecute or decline to prosecute until the arraignment as it is at that point a court has jurisdiction . . . , the jury could have concluded that control of the prosecution had not passed from the police to the District Attorney. . . Finally, the jury could have found, and apparently did so find based on their verdict in Plaintiff's favor on the denial of a fair trial/due process claim, that Hudson and Rivera misled the DA's office by indicating that the video caught Nelson in the commission of a crime. . . Accordingly, the Rule 50 motion premised on the assertion that Defendants' are entitled to qualified immunity on the claims for false arrest and malicious prosecution claim is denied.")

Watson v. Grothkopp, No. 115CV01356BKSDEP, 2019 WL 3431104, at *4 n. 6 (N.D.N.Y. July 30, 2019) ("Defendant has not raised any issue regarding the Court's decision not to give the jury the special interrogatories proposed by Defendants. . . The Court declined to give the proposed interrogatories because the questions would not resolve disputes of material fact that would aid in the qualified immunity determination. See, e.g., Alla v. Verkay, 979 F. Supp. 2d 349, 370 (E.D.N.Y. 2013) (declining to give special interrogatories where 'even affirmative responses would have been insufficient to give rise to qualified immunity').")

Girbes-Pierce v. City of New York, No. 16-CV-7510 (JLC), 2019 WL 1522631, at *2-7 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 9, 2019) ("On October 31, 2018, after nearly six hours of deliberation, the jury returned a unanimous verdict in favor of Girbes-Pierce on his excessive force claim against Sikorski, but not as to Rule. . . The jury awarded Girbes-Pierce no compensatory damages, but instead gave him $1.00 in nominal damages and no punitive damages. . . At that point in the trial, the Court introduced the concept of qualified immunity to the jury and stated: 'even though [ ] you have found that [Girbes-Pierce] has proven his claim for excessive force as against Officer Sikorski, Officer Sikorski still may not be liable to [Girbes-Pierce] if he is entitled to what is called qualified immunity ....'. . . The Court further explained that the question of qualified immunity was one for the Court to decide but that the jury played a role in its determination. Specifically, the jury was instructed that it would be presented with a series of factual questions, known as special interrogatories, and its responses would aid the Court in its legal determination regarding qualified immunity. . . The Court submitted special interrogatories to the jury the following day to develop the factual record and aid the Court in its determination as to whether Sikorski was entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. The first special interrogatory asked: 'What act or acts of excessive force did you find that defendant Sikorski committed in this case?' to which the jury responded: 'Pepper-spraying plaintiff when he was already confined.'. . In light of this response, the Court submitted seven additional special interrogatories to the jury. The interrogatories and jury responses are reproduced below:

The jury hereby unanimously makes the following findings:

1. Prior to using any force against plaintiff, did defendant Sikorski reasonably believe that plaintiff pushed Lieutenant Rule on September 2, 2015?

YES X NO _____
2. Prior to using any force against plaintiff, did defendant Sikorski reasonably believe that plaintiff refused to cooperate with police officer instructions on September 2, 2015?
YES X NO _____
3. Prior to using any force against plaintiff, did defendant Sikorski reasonably believe that plaintiff was attempting to escape from him on September 2, 2015?
YES X NO _____
4. Did defendant Sikorski reasonably believe that plaintiff resisted his attempts to handcuff him on September 2, 2015?
YES X NO _____
5. Did defendant Sikorski reasonably believe that plaintiff kicked a police officer on September 2, 2015?
YES _____ NO X
6. Did defendant Sikorski reasonably believe that plaintiff was flailing his arms during his attempts to handcuff him on September 2, 2015?
YES X NO _____
7. Before pepper spray was used, did defendant Sikorski reasonably believe that plaintiff was trying to get off the ground on September 2, 2015?
In sum, the jury found that prior to using any force, Sikorski reasonably believed that Girbes-Pierce pushed Rule, refused to cooperate with police officer instructions, and attempted to escape. . . It also found that Sikorski reasonably believed that Girbes-Pierce flailed his arms and resisted his attempts to handcuff him. . . However, the jury did not find that Sikorski reasonably believed that Girbes-Pierce kicked a police officer or was trying to get off the ground before he was pepper-sprayed. . . . Sikorski argues he is entitled to qualified immunity because 'it was objectively reasonable for [him] to pepper spray [Girbes-Pierce] under the circumstances that he faced and/or controlling precedent did not clearly establish the specific right at issue in this case.'. . . In this relatively straightforward excessive force case, the jury had to determine whether defendants' use of force against Girbes-Pierce during his arrest was reasonable under the circumstances. It resolved this question by finding that Sikorski's use of pepper spray against Girbes-Pierce 'when he was already confined' was unreasonable. Thus, the jury has already determined that Sikorski violated a constitutional right. The only remaining question for the Court is whether the right the jury found to have been violated was 'clearly established' such that it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted. The Court finds that at the time of the incident, on September 2, 2015, it was clearly established law that an officer uses excessive force when he pepper-sprays an arrestee who is already 'confined.'. . 'Unquestionably, infliction of pepper spray on an arrestee has a variety of incapacitating and painful effects, and, as such, its use constitutes a significant degree of force.'. . 'Accordingly, ... it should not be used lightly or gratuitously against an arrestee who is complying with police commands or otherwise poses no immediate threat to the arresting officer.'. . In the Second Circuit, it is clearly established that using significant force, including the significant force of pepper spray, 'against arrestees who no longer actively resisted arrest or posed a threat to officer safety' is a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . Here, the jury explicitly found that Sikorski pepper-sprayed Girbes-Pierce 'when he was already confined.'. . This is consistent with Sikorski's testimony that after Girbes-Pierce had been forced to the ground, both defendants had a hold on him with their hands, and at different points in time used their knees and weight to hold him down. . . The jury also found that Sikorski did not reasonably believe that Girbes-Pierce was trying to get off the ground before he was pepper-sprayed. . . Although the jury also found that Sikorski reasonably believed Girbes-Pierce pushed Rule, attempted to escape, refused to comply with instructions, resisted attempts to handcuff him, and flailed his arms during the attempts to handcuff him at certain points in time during the incident, . . . the Court must construe the evidence in the light most favorable to Girbes-Pierce 'as the party in whose favor the jury found on the [excessive force] claim[ ] and as the party against whom judgment [is being] sought as a matter of law.'. . In doing so, the evidence suggests that while Girbes-Pierce was uncooperative and resistant during the earlier stages of the incident, defendants eventually gained control of Girbes-Pierce and Sikorski pepper-sprayed him after he had already been physically restrained—after he was forced to the ground, after Sikorski and Rule had a hold on him with their weight, hands, and knees, and when he was not trying to get off the ground. There is no basis in the record to find that Girbes-Pierce was actively resisting arrest or posed a threat to defendants at the time when Sikorski pepper-sprayed him. While it is true that Girbes-Pierce was pepper-sprayed before he was handcuffed, handcuffing was not required for the jury to have reached an excessive force verdict. Indeed, in Garcia v. Dutchess Cty., the court considered the situation of a plaintiff who, like Girbes-Pierce, 'was on the ground but not yet handcuffed' when significant force was used. . . Under these circumstances, the court in Garcia found that 'it was a Fourth Amendment violation to use significant force against arrestees who no longer actively resisted arrest or posed a threat to officer safety, regardless of whether that significant force emanated from a pepper spray canister or the trigger of a taser.'. . . Based on the standards discussed above, no reasonable officer could have believed that he was entitled to use pepper spray gratuitously against an arrestee who was restrained and no longer actively resisting arrest. Existing precedent places the unlawfulness of pepper-spraying an arrestee who is already 'confined' beyond debate. Given that Sikorski violated Girbes-Pierce's clearly established right to be free from the excessive force of pepper spray when he was already confined, such that it would be clear to a reasonable officer that this conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted, Sikorski is not entitled to qualified immunity on Girbes-Pierce's excessive force claim.") Grant v. City of Syracuse, 357 F.Supp.3d 180, ___ (N.D.N.Y. 2019) ("'Whether a defendant officer's conduct was objectively reasonable is a mixed question of law and fact.'. . 'The ultimate question of whether it was objectively reasonable for the officer to believe that his conduct did not violate a clearly established right, i.e., whether officers of reasonable competence could disagree as to the lawfulness of such conduct, is to be decided by the court.'. .If there is no dispute as to the material historical facts, the matter of whether the officer's conduct was objectively reasonable is an issue of law to be determined by the court. . . '[I]f there is such a dispute,' however, 'the factual questions must be resolved by the factfinder.'. . Although the Second Circuit recommends the use of special interrogatories to assist a court determine the disputed facts, there is no requirement that they be used. . .In his testimony, Officer Lockett cited certain primary factors that he claimed gave him probable cause to arrest Mr. Grant for Domestic Disorderly Conduct - yelling at his wife, swearing, gesticulating with his hands and slamming the front door as he exited. The Grants testified that while Mr. Grant was speaking loudly, he was not yelling or violently moving his arms, and while he opened the front door with force, it hit the handrail causing the loud noise. . . In making its determination in finding liability against Officers Lockett and Montalto concerning Mr. Grant's false arrest § 1983 claim, the jury credited Mr. Grant's version of a fairly binary choice of presented facts. Given this determination of the disputed facts, the jury, and the Court, concluded that it was not objectively reasonable for Officers Lockett and Montalto to believe that their conduct did not violate Mr. Grant's clearly established rights, and therefore, they were not entitled to qualified immunity with regards to Mr. Grant's false arrest claims. Similarly, Officer Lockett was the only witness to testify that while he attempted to place Mr. Grant in handcuffs while on the stairs of the residence, Mr. Grant turned around and grabbed Officer Lockett in a bear hug. A multitude of witnesses, including uninterested witnesses, testified consistently that Lockett grabbed Mr. Grant from behind on the stairs and continued to strike him while Mr. Grant was not resisting on the ground, including Stephanie Grant, Alonzo Grant Jr., Sherrell Grant, Corey McMullin and Sharon Hayes. Given the jury's credence to such testimony, the jury, and the Court, concluded that it was not objectively reasonable for defendants to believe that their conduct did not violate Mr. Grant's clearly established right to be free of excessive force. . . Therefore, they were not entitled to qualified immunity with regards to Mr. Grant's excessive force claims and a new trial is not warranted.")

Gibbs v. City of Bridgeport, No. 3:16-CV-635 (JAM), 2018 WL 4119588, at *6-8 (D. Conn. Aug. 29, 2018) ("If there is fundamental uncertainty about what the officer or an objectively reasonable officer would have realized or 'processed,' then the proper course is for there to be evidence presented at trial on this issue so that the jury may make appropriate factual determinations and so that the Court in turn may reconsider the issue of qualified immunity in light of the jury's factual determinations. . . . I understand Detective Borona's insistence that he did not know that Stukes had dropped the gun at the time that he fatally shot him, but I must evaluate whether the other evidence of record is enough to raise a genuine fact issue about what in fact Detective Borona knew. . . . Because Stukes retained the rifle in his hands as he raced toward the street corner, he remained a threat notwithstanding the fact that he was now fleeing and with his back to Detective Borona. It is clear to me that Detective Borona did not violate the Fourth Amendment when he fired his first shot at Stukes. . .But the same can't be said about Detective Borona's second shot. It was fired after Stukes dropped the rifle and—viewing the facts as I must in the light most favorable to plaintiff—after Detective Borona knew that Stukes had dropped the rifle. Although Detective Borona maintains he could not and did not see Stukes drop the rifle, the video does not conclusively establish what he could or could not see, much less does it establish what he actually saw and realized. What the video shows is Detective Borona advancing at least a car's length down the sidewalk right next to where the rifle lay before then firing the second and fatal shot. True enough, the video does not show Detective Borona looking down toward the rifle before he took his second shot. But it does show that very soon after the second shot he stopped the pursuit and turned to look at the rifle on the ground. His actions are arguably consistent with his knowing beforehand that the rifle had been dropped there. For that matter, it took another 30 seconds after Detective Borona fired the second shot for him to use his radio to call for help or reinforcements and despite the fact that—as the video shows—Stukes continued to run away even after Detective Borona shot him a second time. This delay in alerting other police units supports an inference that Detective Borona knew that Stukes was unarmed and no longer posed an immediate continuing danger. All in all, a genuine fact issue remains about whether Detective Borona knew that Stukes had dropped the rifle. To the extent that Detective Borona might suggest there were other reasons to believe Stukes was dangerous even without the rifle, the evidence is scant and readily contestable on this point as well. Because there is a genuine fact issue about whether Detective Borona had probable cause to believe that Stukes was armed or imminently dangerous at the time that he shot him for a second time, it follows that a genuine fact issue remains for trial about whether Detective Borona used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment.")

Ortiz v. City of New York, No. 15CV2206(DLC), 2018 WL 1989595, at *8–9 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 27, 2018) ("For the reasons discussed above, the request for qualified immunity is unnecessary here. If the jury had found that Ortiz was credible, and that Vasquez viciously and without provocation attacked him from behind, injuring his knee and sending him to the ground, then Vasquez would not be entitled to qualified immunity for such conduct. Any reasonable officer in that situation would have understood that such conduct violated Ortiz's rights. But, the defendants succeeded in proving that that sequence of events did not occur. Accordingly, the only evidence regarding force that remains available for consideration is the force that Vazquez (and Hanna) used as they restrained Ortiz while waiting for the arrival of the ambulance. That force was minimal and entirely reasonable. Placing their hands on his shoulders and moving Ortiz to a seated position on the ground did not constitute an excessive use of force, and plaintiff's counsel does not argue otherwise. Nor, of course, do such limited actions by the officers explain the serious knee injury that Dr. Dassa described to the jury. There is simply a complete absence of evidence as to how Ortiz injured his knee, once the jury rejected his description of Vasquez' unprovoked attack on him. Accordingly, if it were necessary to reach the issue of qualified immunity, Vazquez has shown that he would be entitled to qualified immunity because a reasonable officer confronted with a very intoxicated Ortiz would have been entitled to use the force exerted by Vasquez (and Hanna) to restrain Ortiz. This use of force was objectively reasonable and Vazquez did not violate Ortiz's clearly established rights. Plaintiff argues that Vazquez waived any qualified immunity defense. He did not. Defendants explicitly reserved the right to submit a proposed charge on qualified immunity and to submit proposed special interrogatories on the qualified immunity defense. . . Vazquez has argued, at every turn, that he is entitled to qualified immunity. He has not waived his argument. Finally, Ortiz argues that the Rule 50 motion should have included a more expansive description of the qualified immunity request. With respect to specificity, the requirement is simply that the qualified immunity defense be explicitly articulated. See, e.g., Provost v, City of Newburgh, 262 F.3d 146, 161-62 (2d Cir. 2001). Defendants met this requirement. In their Rule 50 motion, defendants stated, on the record, that they sought judgment as a matter of law on qualified immunity grounds. They renewed that motion after the jury returned its verdict. . .Defendants' January 12, 2018 motion for judgment as a matter of law is granted.")

Gerskovich v. Iocco, No. 15 CIV. 7280 (RMB), 2017 WL 3236445, at *7 & n.11 (S.D.N.Y. July 17, 2017) ("To be clear, the Court is not here ruling whether or not qualified immunity is a defense to Plaintiff's retaliation claim. While the Court recognizes that the qualified immunity issue should be resolved relatively early in the proceedings, material issues of fact presented here (related to probable cause to arrest) must first be resolved by the jury.[11] [fn. 11: The Court intends to resolve the qualified immunity issue soon after the jury has determined whether or not the Defendants had probable cause to arrest the Plaintiff. See Golodner v. City of New London, 443 Fed.Appx. 622, 624 (2d Cir. 2011) ("[T]he existence of probable cause is a complete defense to a claim of retaliatory arrest.").] . . . That is, whether or not Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity against Plaintiff's retaliation claim is contingent upon how the jury resolves the issues of where Plaintiff was standing, what he was doing (e.g. being disorderly or photographing the demonstration), and whether he had been asked to leave the premises. The threshold (or preliminary) question is whether Captain Iocco had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff. If the jury were, for example, to decide that Defendants had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff, Plaintiff's retaliation claim would, as noted at footnote 11, likely become moot for the reason that 'the existence of probable cause is a complete defense to a claim of retaliatory arrest.'. . If the jury were to decide that Defendants did not have probable cause to arrest Plaintiff, it would then be appropriate further to examine Plaintiff's First Amendment claim, including the issue of Defendants' qualified immunity.")

Daniel v. Rivera, No. 14-CV-00259 (PKC), 2016 WL 5947289, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 13, 2016) ("After reviewing the evidence, the Court concludes that there are genuine issues of material fact in dispute as to the reasonableness of Officer Rivera's use of force. Critical to Officer Rivera's motion are the video recordings of the foot pursuit, which he contends unequivocally show that immediately before each time he discharged his weapon, K.C. 'bladed' his body, which made it appear as if K.C. was about to fire his imitation handgun. . . Rivera specifically testified that K.C.'s 'shoulders were both pretty much bladed in my direction with his hands up.'. . While the video shows that K.C. turned his head to look back at the officers in pursuit on several occasions, the extent to which K.C. 'bladed' his body towards Officer Rivera, if at all, is a matter open to reasonable interpretation. . . Viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to K.C., a reasonable jury could conclude that K.C.'s motions did not pose an immediate risk of harm to Officer Rivera or others.")

Bombard v. Volp, 2:13-CV-58, 2014 WL 4411601, *9 (D. Vt. Sept. 8, 2014) ("In this case, questions of fact remain as to whether Bombard was fleeing arrest, whether he should have heard Officer Volp's warnings, or whether he ever acknowledged Officer Volp's presence. As discussed previously, a reasonable factfinder could also conclude that Bombard did not present a danger to himself or others. It is undisputed that Bombard was shot in the head. If it was not reasonable for Officer Volp to believe that Bombard (1) presented a danger and (2) was resisting arrest, it is clearly established that he should not have utilized a Taser shot to the head to bring a running suspect into custody. . . It was also objectively unreasonable for Officer Volp to believe that his conduct was lawful. . . . Here, the same factual disputes with regard to reasonableness on the constitutional claim bar summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . The Court therefore declines to grant summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, and Officer Volp's motion for summary judgment is DENIED.")

Sterlin v. City of New York, No. 11 Civ. 0715(JPO), 2014 WL 2560595, *3-*5 (S.D.N.Y. June 6, 2014) ("Even if a plaintiff can demonstrate that a police officer arrested him without probable cause, the officer is not liable if it was objectively reasonable for the officer to believe that he did have probable cause. . . This qualified immunity standard is known as 'arguable probable cause,' and it protects officers from personal liability where, although the officer made the wrong call, he was making a close call and he acted reasonably under the circumstances. . . The objective reasonableness of an officer's conduct is a mixed question of law and fact-if there is disagreement about what the officer knew or did, that question must be resolved by the jury. Zellner, 494 F.3d at 371 (quoting Kerman v. City of New York, 374 F.3d 93, 109 (2d Cir.2004)). There is disagreement in this case over what Sergeant Panopoulos knew when he directed Captain Cody and Lieutenant Phelan to arrest Sterlin. Panopoulos claims that he saw Sterlin exchange a small object for cash on Amsterdam Avenue between 102nd and 103rd Streets. Sterlin claims that Panopoulos did not see anything of the sort; rather, in the vicinity of the block where Panopoulos claimed to be watching, Sterlin merely walked down the street. A jury would be entitled to credit Sterlin's testimony over Panopoulos's. If they did, Panopoulos would be liable for false arrest, and he would not be entitled to qualified immunity. The Court would hold that Panopoulos lacked arguable probable cause to arrest Sterlin. No reasonable officer could conclude that Sterlin's conduct, as Sterlin described it, constituted probable cause for arrest. Therefore, what Panopoulos observed Sterlin do on Amsterdam Avenue between 102nd and 103rd Streets is a genuinely disputed material fact underlying Sterlin's false arrest claim. The Court denies summary judgment on the federal and state false arrest claims against Panopoulos. . . . As is the case with a false arrest claim, even if a police officer's use of force is objectively unreasonable, he is entitled to qualified immunity if the law did not give him 'fair warning' that his conduct was unconstitutional. . . Courts must define 'clearly established' rights (rights of which officers have fair warning) on the basis of the specific context of a use of force, not as general rules governing when an officer may strike a blow. . . The question is whether 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . But when deciding a summary judgment motion, 'courts must take care not to define a case's "context" in a manner that imports genuinely disputed factual propositions.' Tolan, 2014 WL 1757856 at *4 (per curiam) . . .A reasonable jury could find that Sterlin did not resist arrest in any way, and that, in the absence of such resistance, Captain Cody and Lieutenant Phelan used excessive force by handcuffing Sterlin and then throwing him into the back of their SUV. This conclusion is supported by Sterlin's testimony and photographs showing bruising on his upper arms. Even if Cody and Phelan believed that Panopoulos witnessed Sterlin make a hand-to-hand drug sale, this crime is not violent, and it is not otherwise serious enough to merit throwing a sixty-three-year old man into an SUV, while he was handcuffed, because his limited mobility kept him from climbing into the SUV himself. Sterlin posed no threat to the officers-again, he was handcuffed, and there was no indication that he would try to hurt them. Nor was there any indication that he would attempt to flee. Sterlin complied with all of the officers' directions. Under these circumstances, if Cody and Phelan truly threw Sterlin into the back of their SUV while he was handcuffed, they would not be entitled to qualified immunity. No reasonable officer could believe that this was a reasonable use of force under the circumstances. The officers were on fair notice that, when an older man with limited mobility makes a small-time drug sale, and there is no indication that he intends to become violent or flee, it is unreasonable to pick him up and throw him into a car while he is handcuffed in a manner that causes bruising. The factual dispute over whether the officers threw Sterlin into the SUV, and whether he was acting in a manner that justified that use of force, is therefore a dispute that is material to the excessive force claims against Cody and Phelan.")

Alla v. Verkay, 979 F. Supp. 2d 349, 370 (E.D.N.Y. 2013) ("Special interrogatories are vehicles to allow the jury to resolve 'key factual disputes' bearing on the legal determination of qualified immunity. Cowan ex rel. Estate of Cooper v. Breen, 352 F.3d 756, 765 (2d Cir.2003). The Court had no duty to present interrogatories to the jury that were undisputed and could only confuse or mislead the jury. The Court also declined to present the proposed interrogatories to the jury because even affirmative responses would have been insufficient to give rise to qualified immunity. Though it was reasonable for Verkay to believe that Gad Alla was a suspect in the stabbing, that belief on its own did not justify the punch. At least four officers were present in the room; Gad Alla was greatly outnumbered. The officers provided highly inconsistent and at times incredible testimony about the actions leading up to Verkay's punch. Further, there was absolutely no testimony that Gad Alla took any actions that resembled reaching for a weapon. Moreover, as noted, by finding that the second arrest was not supported by probable cause, the jury necessarily credited Gad Alla's testimony that he was compliant during the first arrest. Verkay argues that his second proposed interrogatory would have shown whether the jury believed Verkay's account (that Gad Alla was not yet handcuffed when punched) or Gad Alla's account (that he was already handcuffed when punched). But, as Gad Alla's counsel pointed out, the poorly phrased question would not actually resolve the issue. If the jury had answered in the affirmative, the Court would have had to assess qualified immunity guided only by a finding that Verkay had used some amount of force before the handcuffing. Such a finding may well have been based on Verkay's own testimony that he grabbed Gad Alla's arm and pushed him, and would not, therefore, necessarily mean that Verkay punched Gad Alla before Gad Alla was handcuffed. Verkay made no attempt to clarify the proposed interrogatory, perhaps hoping that the ambiguity would strengthen his case. Since Verkay's proposed interrogatories would not, even if answered in his favor, have supplied a factual predicate for qualified immunity, the Court's decision not to submit them to the jury does not entitle Verkay to a new trial.")

Kogut v. Cnty. of Nassau, 06-CV-6695 JS WDW, 2013 WL 3820826, *15 (E.D.N.Y. July 22, 2013) ("[A]lthough there is somewhat of a split of authority, . . . the better course of action is for the Court to decide qualified immunity as a matter of law after the jury has resolved the factual issues in dispute [citing Lore v. City of Syracuse and Warren v. Dwyer].

Terranova v. Torres, 603 F.Supp.2d 630, 631, 632 & n.3 (S.D.N.Y. 2009) (Young, J., D. Mass., sitting by designation) ("The reasonableness of the Officers' conduct, at the summary judgment stage, is 'a pure question of law' once the court has 'determined the relevant set of facts and drawn all inferences in favor of the non-moving party to the extent supportable by the record.'[citing Scott v. Harris] . . . . The problem, of course, is that the drawing of reasonable inferences and the evaluation of the reasonableness of the Officers' conduct are matters constitutionally for the jury. Evaluating such matters at the summary judgment stage has led at least one prominent critic to question the constitutionality of summary judgment. Suja Thomas, Why Summary Judgment is Unconstitutional, 93 Va. L.Rev. 139 (2007). Still, it must be that there is some state of facts so clear that no reasonable jury could do aught but recognize it. The Supreme Court apparently thought it had such a case in Scott, 'the only case in which the Supreme Court has invoked brute sense impressions to justify its decision.' Dan M. Kahan, David A. Hoffman, and Donald Braman, Whose Eyes are You Going to Believe? *Scott v. Harris*and the Perils of Cognitive Illiberalism, 122 Harv. L.Rev. 837, 903 (2009). As these authors point out, 'a form of judicial humility,' i.e., a generous acceptance of a wide range of jurors' perceptions, id. at 905, is the best way to make this work. I try to exercise such humility in ruling on every motion for summary judgment. See Arthur Miller, The Pre-Trial Rush to Judgment, 78 N.Y.U. L.Rev. 982 (2003). . . .Although a jury may ultimately reject the Motorcyclists' version of events and find that the Officers acted reasonably, summary judgment is inappropriate where, as here, there are genuine issues of material fact surrounding the reasonableness of the seizure.")

Bradley v. Jusino, No. 04 Civ. 8411, 2008 WL 417753, at *4, *5 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 14, 2008) ("Although there may have been substantial evidence supporting the jury's determination that Jusino was entitled to qualified immunity , the Court erred in submitting the question of qualified immunity to the jury. Under the Second Circuit's decision in Stephenson v. Doe, 332 F.3d 68 (2d Cir.2003), and its progeny, Jusino's qualified immunity defense was a question of law for the Court to resolve. . . . Although the Second Circuit has not explicitly ruled that the issue of qualified immunity must always be resolved by the court, precedent in this circuit offers strong support for the conclusion that the issue is most appropriately left for the court to determine after the jury has found all material facts. . . . Although Stephenson involved excessive force, rather than false arrest, its reasoning is directly applicable. Therefore, as a special interrogatory was not used in the initial trial in this case, and such factfinding by the jury is required in order for the Court to properly rule upon the qualified immunity issue, the Court must retry the false arrest claim in addition to the qualified immunity defense. As the Stephenson court concluded, there is a high likelihood of confusion, as well as 'a risk that the effect of having an Aout" (by finding qualified immunity) affected the care with which the jury conducted' its inquiry of the underlying claim. . . Therefore, upon retrial, the jury will be presented with specific interrogatories for resolution of any contested material facts pertaining to the false arrest claim, and based on the jury's responses, the Court will resolve the issue of the qualified immunity defense.").

Lee v. McCue, 2007 WL 2230100, at *3, *4, *6 (S.D.N.Y. July 25, 2007) ("The plaintiff argues that defendants have waived the qualified immunity defense by failing to submit any proposed special findings or interrogatories to be answered by the jury that would serve as a factual predicate for a post-verdict decision on the legal question of qualified immunity . In Kerman III, the Second Circuit reversed the district court's post-verdict grant of qualified immunity to the defendant police officer where the jury found that the officer lacked probable cause, and no special interrogatories had been submitted to the jury to elicit factual findings that would enable the court to resolve the qualified immunity motion. 374 F.3d at 118-120. The Kerman III court found that the defendant's failure to submit special interrogatories to the jury constituted an effective waiver of the qualified immunity defense. Id. See also Matthews v. City of New York et al., 2006 WL 842392 (E.D.N.Y. March 27, 2006). Other courts have similarly suggested that when unresolved factual disputes prevent an early disposition of the qualified immunity defense, the better practice is for a jury to decide what facts the officer faced or perceived on special interrogatories, and for the court to make the ultimate legal determination of whether qualified immunity attaches on those facts. See Stephenson v. Doe, 332 F.3d 68, 81 (2d Cir.2003); Warren v. Dwyer, 906 F.2d 70, 76 (2d Cir.1990). It is also undoubtedly the defendant's burden to request special interrogatories that would elicit the necessary factual findings from the jury. Matthews, 2006 WL 842392 at *8, n. 3.Defendants failed to follow the procedures that were set out in Kerman III and subsequent cases when they did not request the submission of special interrogatories to the jury. However, the Second Circuit's decision in Kerman III does not appear to preclude the court from ruling on defendants' motion, as long as the ruling is based on the plaintiff's version of the facts elicited at trial. This I intend to do. . . . Since the defendants never submitted any proposed special interrogatories to the jury with respect to what Officer McCue and Sergeant Manganiello faced or perceived on the morning of May 7, 2003, this court told the parties that the defendants' post-verdict request for qualified immunity had to be based exclusively on the plaintiff's version of the facts, i.e, the plaintiff's trial testimony. Although the jury was not compelled to credit every aspect of Mr. Lee's testimony in reaching its verdict, the defendants never made any attempt to ascertain, for purposes of their post-trial qualified immunity motion, which parts of the plaintiff's testimony, if any, the jury might have disbelieved. The court is therefore constrained by Rule 50, as it was prior to the trial by Rule 56.1. to decide defendants' motion based on the plaintiff's version of the facts, and to draw all available inferences in the plaintiff's favor. . . . The inquiry thus properly framed, the court is compelled to deny defendants' post-verdict motion for judgment as a mailer of law on the grounds of qualified immunity . The plaintiff's version of the facts at trial–the only version of the facts that is relevant for purposes of this motion–did not differ in the any material regard from the one presented at the summary judgment stage. . . . Accepting the plaintiff's version of the facts as true, as this court must on the defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law, no reasonably competent police officer could find that there was arguable probable cause to arrest the plaintiff for either harrassment or the obstruction of governmental administration. Indeed, given the nearly identical nature of the plaintiff's testimony al trial and the testimony in the record at the summary judgment stage, this court is barred from finding otherwise.")

Blake v. City of New York, 2007 WL 1975570, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. 2007) ("The Second Circuit disfavors sending the qualified immunity issue to the jury because it is a complex, purely legal question that is likely to cause confusion. . . . In accordance with the procedures outlined in Cowan and Stephenson, the Court will charge the jury on excessive force but not qualified immunity . The Court will submit special interrogatories to the jury on the central factual issues in this case. If the jury determines that the officers used excessive force, and if Defendants then renew their motion for qualified immunity , the Court will determine as a matter of law whether qualified immunity attaches based on the answers to the special interrogatories.").

Matthews v. City of New York, No. CV-02-715 (CPS), 2006 WL 842392, at *8 & n.3 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 27, 2006) ("In order to preserve a qualified immunity defense, defendant Royall should have requested special interrogatories. However, as was the case in Kerman, the only questions submitted to the jury were questions of liability, '[a]nd to the extent that the court's immunity rulings [would be] based on the court's own factual findings that the jury neither made nor would have been compelled to make, the rulings [would] infringe[ ] [plaintiff]'s Seventh Amendment right to have the facts found by a jury.'. . Here, defendant Royall did not request that the jury be asked to respond to factual interrogatories about the events that had transpired that day, nor did he set forth interrogatories in his proposed verdict form. The fact that Royall failed to request the appropriate factual interrogatories precludes me from granting the relief he now requests. I conclude that defendant Royall 'effectively waived' the defense of qualified immunity. Accordingly, the jury's verdict against defendant Royall on plaintiff Kevin Matthews's false arrest and malicious prosecution claims stands. . . [W]hile it is for the Court to make the ultimate legal determination of whether a right was clearly established and whether a reasonable officer would have known he was acting unlawfully, that determination can only be made on the facts found by the jury, and it is the defendant's burden to request special interrogatories to elicit those factual findings.").

Lovelace v. City of New York, No. 02-CV-5398(FB)(JMA), 2005 WL 552387, at *4, *5 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 9, 2005) (not reported) ("Whether an officer's conduct was objectively reasonable, 'i.e., whether a reasonable official would reasonably believe his conduct did not violate a clearly established right, is a mixed question of law and fact.' . . Where material facts are in dispute, and 'contrasting accounts present factual issues as to the degree of force actually employed and its reasonableness, a defendant is not entitled to judgment as a matter of law on a defense of qualified immunity. . . Given the factual disputes in the present case regarding who initiated the use of force and the amount of force used, a grant of summary judgment based on qualified immunity is inappropriate. Instead, the issue of qualified immunity should be determined at trial." [citing Stephenson v. Doe and Warren v. Dwyer]).

THIRD CIRCUIT

Jefferson v. Lias, 21 F.4th 74, 79-80 (3d Cir. 2021) ("In viewing the record in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, as we must do at summary judgment, combined with our presumption that the 'reasonableness' of an officer's use of force is typically best left to a jury to determine, we are not persuaded that the District Court's conclusion here was proper. For instance, upon reviewing the video footage, a jury could very well accept Lias's and the District Court's contention that Jefferson 'straightened out to avoid hitting Officer Lias's police cruiser' in a matter of 'mere seconds.'. . However, it could also determine that Lias was not in danger of being struck by Jefferson's car as Jefferson was in the course of passing him, and that Lias's decision to shoot through Jefferson's driver's side window was not justified by any objective threat that Jefferson posed to him or others in the area. . . . Just like in Abraham, the District Court here engaged in an analogous weighing of the evidence in determining that Jefferson 'presented a danger to those in the area' based on his escape. . . We see no reason to depart from the standard course established by our precedent in this case. As we decided in Abraham, a jury ought to have the opportunity to make factual determinations regarding Officer Lias's decision to employ deadly force against Jefferson.")

Santini v. Fuentes, 795 F.3d 410, 420 (3d Cir. 2015) ("[M]aterial factual disputes exist as to whether Santini's constitutional rights were violated. The existence of those disputes compels us to find that the District Court's grant of summary judgment was inappropriate, as was its denial of Santini's motion to reconsider that decision. [citing Curley] We also find that those factual issues must be resolved by a jury, not a judge. . . We accordingly vacate in part the decisions of the District Court and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this Opinion.")

Curley v. Klem, 499 F.3d 199, 208-11 & n.12 (3d Cir. 2007) (Curley II) ("The point of immunity is to protect someone from the burden imposed by litigation itself. It is supposed to be 'an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability....' . . . Hence, the Supreme Court has instructed that '[i]mmunity ordinarily should be decided by the court long before trial.'. . .That is well and good when there are no factual issues in a case, but often the facts are intensely disputed, and our precedent makes clear that such disputes must be resolved by a jury after a trial. . . . The fundamental challenge lies in the nature of the questions that compose the test. Since they are mixed questions of law and fact, one is left to ask who should answer them. As we noted in Curley I, '[a] disparity of opinion exists among our sister circuits as to whether a judge or jury should make the ultimate immunity determination.'. . The First, Fourth, Seventh, and Eleventh Circuits have all indicated that qualified immunity is a question of law reserved for the court. The Fifth, Sixth, Ninth, and Tenth Circuits have permitted the question to go to juries. Precedent from the Second and Eighth Circuits can be viewed as being on both sides of the issue, with the evolution being toward reserving the question for the court. . . . . Our precedents too have evolved. Our recent precedents say that the court, not a jury, should decide whether there is immunity in any given case. . . . [T]he Carswell approach, despite its limitations, . . . appears to have taken root and to represent the pattern and practice both in our Circuit and much of the rest of the country. We therefore take the opportunity to reiterate and clarify a central message from that case: whether an officer made a reasonable mistake of law and is thus entitled to qualified immunity is a question of law that is properly answered by the court, not a jury. . . When a district court submits that question of law to a jury, it commits reversible error. . . . When the ultimate question of the objective reasonableness of an officer's behavior involves tightly intertwined issues of fact and law, it may be permissible to utilize a jury in an advisory capacity, . . . but responsibility for answering that ultimate question remains with the court." [footnotes omitted])

Curley v. Klem, 499 F.3d 199, 212 n.14 (3d Cir. 2007) (Curley II) ("We note that in the Supreme Court's recent decision in Scott, 127 S.Ct. 1769 (2007), the Court stated that, because the case 'was decided on summary judgment, there [had] not yet been factual findings by a judge or jury....' Id. at 1774 (emphasis added). Without wanting to read too much into that statement, since it may refer to nothing more than a case in which the parties waive any right to a jury, it appears the Court at least contemplated a circumstance where a judge may resolve factual issues. Certainly the dissent in Scott was concerned about judicial fact finding.").

Curley v. Klem, 499 F.3d 199, 214 (3d Cir. 2007)(Curley II) ("Confusion between the threshold constitutional inquiry and the immunity inquiry is also understandable given the difficulty courts have had in elucidating the difference between those two analytical steps. . . At the risk of understating the challenges inherent in a qualified immunity analysis, we think the most helpful approach is to consider the constitutional question as being whether the officer made a reasonable mistake of fact, while the qualified immunity question is whether the officer was reasonably mistaken about the state of the law.")

Curley v. Klem, 499 F.3d 199, 224-26 (3d Cir. 2007) (Curley II) (Roth, J., dissenting) ("'Objective reasonableness' can be a jury issue to the extent it applies to the question of whether, as a factual matter, a violation was committed. However, 'objective reasonableness' is most definitely not a jury issue to the extent it applies to the question of whether, as a legal matter, a right was clearly established. Whether a right was clearly established is the 'key immunity question'; we have never permitted a jury to answer that question. Indeed, we never would have said so because determining whether a right is clearly established–which requires a review of the applicable case law–is clearly outside the expertise of the jury. There is simply nothing in Sharrar or Karnes that permits submission of the ultimate question of qualified immunity , i.e., Saucier step two, to the jury. . . . . Courts, including this one, create confusion by talking about 'objective reasonableness' in the Fourth Amendment context without specific reference to either Saucier step one or two. The use of the term 'objective reasonableness' without reference to factual or legal reasonableness is what has made this area of the law so confusing and it is why our precedents appear at times to say contradictory things with regard to the respective roles of judge and jury in determining objective reasonableness. I will try to clarify matters. If there are no disputed material facts, the court must determine the objective reasonableness of a mistake of fact (here, whether it was objectively reasonable for Klem to mistake Curley for the perpetrator). However, if there are triable issues of material fact, the jury must determine the objective reasonableness of that mistake of fact. With regard to the objective reasonableness of a mistake of law (here, whether it was objectively reasonable for Klem to believe that the law permitted him to use of deadly force against Curley in the situation at hand), the court should always determine this issue, because doing so requires a review of case law, which is not a task appropriate for the jury. . . . If there are no disputed material facts, the court should make this determination as soon as possible. However, if factual disputes relevant to this legal analysis do exist, the court will have to postpone making this determination until the jury resolves all the relevant factual disputes, because determining what actually happened is a prerequisite to determining whether the law clearly established that a particular action was permitted or prohibited by the Fourth Amendment under those circumstances. . . . After the jury resolves these relevant fact disputes, presumably through the use of special interrogatories, . . . the court is then capable of deciding whether or not the law clearly permitted or prohibited the conduct constituting the constitutional violation.").

Harvey v. Plains Township Police Department, 421 F.3d 185, 194 n.12 (3d Cir. 2005) ("The parties appear to be in disagreement over the proper role of the jury in qualified immunity determinations. Although the courts of appeals are not unanimous on this issue, this Court has held that 'qualified immunity is an objective question to be decided by the court as a matter of law.' [citing Carswell] 'The jury, however, determines disputed historical facts material to the qualified immunity question.'. . . 'A judge may use special jury interrogatories, for instance, to permit the jury to resolve the disputed facts upon which the court can then determine, as a matter of law, the ultimate question of qualified immunity.'. . At this stage, however, the summary judgment standard requires the Court to resolve all factual disputes in Harvey's favor and grant her all reasonable inferences, obviating any need to look to a jury.").

Carswell v. Borough of Homestead, 381 F.3d 235, 242, 243 (3d Cir. 2004) ("The importance of the factual background raises the question of whether the decision as to the applicability of qualified immunity is a matter for the court or jury. The Courts of Appeals are not in agreement on this point. We held in Doe v. Groody, 361 F.3d 232, 238 (3d Cir.2004), that qualified immunity is an objective question to be decided by the court as a matter of law. . . The jury, however, determines disputed historical facts material to the qualified immunity question. See Sharrar v. Felsing, 128 F.3d 810, 828 (3d Cir.1997). District Courts may use special interrogatories to allow juries to perform this function. See, e.g., Curley, 298 F.3d at 279. The court must make the ultimate determination on the availability of qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . Several other Courts of Appeals have adopted a standard similar to ours. [footnote citing cases] In contrast, other Courts of Appeals have held that District Courts may submit the issue of qualified immunity to the jury.[footnote citing cases]").

Curley v. Klem, 298 F.3d 271, 278 (3d Cir. 2002) (Curley I) ("We note that the federal courts of appeals are divided on the question of whether the judge or jury should decide the ultimate question of objective reasonableness once all the relevant factual issues have been resolved. . . . . We addressed the issue in Sharrar, in which we observed that the "reasonableness of the officers' beliefs or actions is not a jury question," 128 F.3d at 828, but qualified that observation by later noting that a jury can evaluate objective reasonableness when relevant factual issues are in dispute, id. at 830-31. This is not to say, however, that it would be inappropriate for a judge to decide the objective reasonableness issue once all the historical facts are no longer in dispute. A judge may use special jury interrogatories, for instance, to permit the jury to resolve the disputed facts upon which the court can then determine, as a matter of law, the ultimate question of qualified immunity.").

Gruenke v. Seip, 225 F.3d 290, 299, 300 (3d Cir. 2000) ("The evaluation of a qualified immunity defense is appropriate for summary judgment because the court's inquiry is primarily legal: whether the legal norms the defendant's conduct allegedly violated were clearly established. . . Nevertheless, some factual allegations, such as how the defendant acted, are necessary to resolve the immunity question. . . . [T]his admittedly fact-intensive analysis must be conducted by viewing the facts alleged in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . . Finally, when qualified immunity is denied, any genuine disputes over the material facts are remanded, to be settled at trial.").

Sharrar v. Felsing, 128 F.3d 810, 826-28 (3d Cir. 1997) ("We have recently noted the 'tension ... as to the proper role of the judge and jury where qualified immunity is asserted.'. . . To some extent that tension may be attributable to our effort to comply with the Supreme Court's instruction that qualified immunity defenses be resolved at the earliest possible point in the litigation while recognizing the difficulty in applying that instruction in situations where there are disputes of relevant fact. . . . A review of our opinions in the last three or four years discloses that we have not always followed what appears to be the Supreme Court's instruction that the reasonableness of an official's belief that his or her conduct is lawful is a question of law for the court, although other courts have interpreted the opinion in that way. . . . We do not suggest that there may never be instances where resort to a jury is appropriate in deciding the qualified immunity issue. . . . We thus hold, following the Supreme Court's decision in Hunter, that in deciding whether defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity it is not only the evidence of 'clearly established law' that is for the court but also whether the actions of the officers were objectively reasonable. Only if the historical facts material to the latter issue are in dispute, as in Karnes, will there be an issue for the jury. The reasonableness of the officers' beliefs or actions is not a jury question, as the Supreme Court explained in Hunter.") The court indicated, however, that where there was a factual dispute to be resolved by the jury, the jury should decide the issue of objective reasonableness as well. 128 F.3d at 830, 831.

Sherwood v. Mulvihill, 113 F.3d 396, 401 n.4 (3d Cir. 1997) ("As we recently noted, tension exists as to the proper role of the judge and jury where qualified immunity is asserted. . . The Supreme Court has held that the application of qualified immunity is a question of law. Siegert, 500 U.S. at 232. In contrast, the existence of probable cause to support a warrant, when raised in a section 1983 action, is a question of fact. . . This may prove problematic in attempting to resolve immunity issues in the early stages of litigation where a genuine and material factual dispute exists concerning probable cause.").

Karnes v. Skrutski, 62 F.3d 485, 491 (3d Cir. 1995) ("While the qualified immunity defense is frequently determined by courts as a matter of law, a jury should decide disputed factual issues relevant to that determination.").

Taylor v. Ambrifi, No. 115CV03280NLHKMW, 2018 WL 3377155, at *3 (D.N.J. July 11, 2018) ("In this case, the Court must deny summary judgment and employ the special interrogatory procedure for the jury to resolve the disputed facts regarding Plaintiff's excessive force claims against Ambrifi and Harris. Ambrifi and Harris relate entirely different scenarios from that proffered by Plaintiff, and Plaintiff has provided sufficient evidence, by way of eye witness testimony and video recordings, which if believed by a jury, would cast doubt on the reasonableness of Ambrifi's and Harris's actions. Thus, after a jury has answered special interrogatories regarding what occurred between Plaintiff and Ambrifi, and what occurred between Plaintiff and Harris, the Court will then determine whether each of the officer's use of force was objectively reasonable in order to ultimately determine whether either of them is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Berry v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 14-2608, 2016 WL 2939502, at *4-5 (E.D. Pa. May 20, 2016) ("The survival of Plaintiff's excessive force claim depends on whether it was objectively reasonable for Officer Boone to believe that the use of deadly force was necessary to prevent Berry from causing serious bodily injury to Officer Bellon or others. . . Several factual narratives could be consistent with the surveillance video. (Slow Motion Video.) These factual disputes bear directly on the reasonableness of the perceived threat. Therefore, a jury must resolve the question of whether Officer Boone violated Berry's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Even when a plaintiff can show a violation of constitutional rights, qualified immunity may shield an officer from trial. . . In the second step of the Saucier analysis, courts must consider whether the right violated was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . . Since the Third Circuit's 1999 decision in Abraham, the contours of the right to be free from the use of excessive force have been clear. . . Therefore, in this case, the same disputed facts that preclude summary judgment on the first Saucier prong make qualified immunity inapposite here. If, as Plaintiff argues, Officer Boone shot Berry without a reasonable belief that deadly force was necessary to prevent serious injury to Officer Bellon, he would not be entitled to qualified immunity, because a reasonable officer in Officer Boone's position would have known that these actions violated a constitutional right.")

Brandt v. Monte, No. 06-0923, 2009 WL 235417, at *8, *9, *12 (D.N.J. Jan. 29, 2009) ("To determine whether a reasonable official would know that his conduct was unlawful, the Court must decide whether the official could have made a reasonable mistake of law, and if not, whether he could have made a reasonable mistake of fact. [citing Pearson v. Callahan and Curley v. Klem] Here, Plaintiff alleges that he was forcibly medicated pursuant to an emergency declaration in the absence of an emergency to induce his consent. The Court must therefore decide, given the circumstances confronting the Ancora Defendants, (1) whether they could reasonably have believed that issuing the Emergency Certificate as a pretext was lawful, and if not, (2) whether they could reasonably have believed that Plaintiff presented a genuine emergency. . . . As to the first inquiry, the Court holds that no reasonable person in the Ancora Defendants' position could have believed that issuing the Emergency Certificate pretextually, in the absence of a genuine emergency, was lawful. . . . The second inquiry–whether the Ancora Defendants made a reasonable mistake of fact–presents a more difficult question. Regardless of whether Plaintiff actually presented an emergency, the Court must decide whether an objective person in the Ancora Defendants' position reasonably could have believed, given the circumstances before them, that Plaintiff presented an emergency. . . . Although fact-specific, the Third Circuit has held that this is a legal determination to be made by the Court, based on an analysis of the 'totality of the circumstances.'. . . Confronted with conflicting evidence, the Court is at a loss in determining what actually occurred in the treatment team meeting. . . . As the decision of whether the Ancora Defendants reasonably perceived an emergency is contingent upon the credibility-centered factual determination of what circumstances they confronted, the Court cannot decide the legal issue without first resolving the factual dispute. In these cases, the Third Circuit has instructed that District Courts may 'utilize a jury in an advisory capacity, but responsibility for answering th[e] ultimate question remains with the court.'. . . This suggests that the Court may resolve the mistake-of-fact question in one of three ways: (1) present special interrogatories to the jury (in an advisory capacity) at the conclusion of trial, (2) hold a pretrial hearing before an advisory jury, which would answer special interrogatories, or (3) hold a pretrial hearing at which the parties would present more evidence to the Court, with the Court as factfinder (for the sole purpose of resolving qualified immunity. The Court notes that the latter two options have the advantage of resolving this matter before trial, so the Ancora Defendants, if held to be qualifiedly immune, would not undergo the burdens of defending against these claims at trial. See Curley, 298 F.3d at 278 (noting the "imperative [of] decid[ing] qualified immunity issues early in the litigation"). However, the Court is mindful that holding a 'mini-trial' before a specially empaneled advisory jury would impose a new set of burdens on the litigants. Thus, the Court will allow the parties to confer and decide jointly which of these procedures shall be used.").

Kelly v. Rogers, No. 1:07–cv–1573, 2012 WL 2153796, *1 n.2 (M.D. Pa. June 13, 2012) ("The sole dispute in this action was whether qualified immunity applied to Defendant's conduct. Because the Court is not empowered to resolve the factual disputes underlying the qualified immunity determination, and because a jury is not entitled to make the ultimate finding on qualified immunity, the Court determined that a trial solely for the purpose of resolving the disputed questions of fact, followed by the Court resolving the qualified immunity question based on those facts, was the correct procedure.")

Boone v. Pennsylvania Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, No. 1:CV-04-0588, 2006 WL 1620222, at *7 (M.D. Pa. June 8, 2006) ("Defendants next argue that the court's denial of their request for a supplemental qualified immunity instruction constituted prejudicial error. Defendants cite to Harvey v. Plains Township Police Department, 421 F.3d 185, 194 n. 12 (3d Cir.2005) as support for the premise that the issue of reasonableness, with respect to whether Mr. Nasuti and Secretary Schmerin would reasonably have known that the right at issue was a clearly established one, should have been submitted to the jury. However, Defendants' interpretation incorrectly interprets the language of Harvey regarding the role of a jury in qualified immunity determinations. The Harvey court noted that, although it was drawing a factual inference in favor of the plaintiff for purposes of summary judgment, that disputed material fact should be left to the jury to consider at trial. . . However, the fact left to the jury was not the legal concept of reasonableness of the police officer defendant's action for immunity purposes, but whether the police officer in fact acted in the manner alleged– specifically whether the police officer ordered the landlord to open the door prior to the search in question. . . Harvey contains the well-settled principle that ' Aqualified immunity is an objective question to be decided by the court as a matter of law."' . . Moreover, the Harvey court clearly made a reasonableness decision once it had drawn the factual inference required. . . There were no historical facts material to the qualified immunity issue disputed in the instant case. Therefore, the court correctly declined to give a qualified immunity instruction.")

Brooks v. Price, No. Civ.A. 02-230-KAJ, 2003 WL 22768704, at *1 (D.Del. Nov. 17, 2003) ("The defendant, though he raised qualified immunity as an affirmative defense in his Answer. . . , did not at any point ask the court for a ruling on the defense and has chosen this last moment to raise the issue by seeking jury instructions that would put the question of immunity before the jury. . . The plaintiff has objected, arguing that the defendant has waived any claim to qualified immunity by failing to raise the matter by dispositive motion prior to the deadline for such motions set in the court's scheduling order. . . The defendant responds that he is not required to raise the matter by dispositive issue, that application of the doctrine may involve questions of fact which are reserved for the jury, and that he should therefore be permitted to place the question of immunity before the jury. . . . [D]espite the defendant's decision to forego seeking an early ruling on the defense, it remains a bar to liability if the proper factual predicate has been laid. . . . The defendant is wrong, however, in believing that the question can be placed before the jury. The question is one for the court.").

Hill v. Algor, 85 F. Supp.2d 391, 401 (D.N.J. 2000) ("Generally, the applicability of qualified immunity is a question of law. . . However, where factual issues relevant to the determination of qualified immunity are in dispute, the Court cannot resolve the matter as a question of law.").

Doherty v. Haverkamp, No. 93-5256, 1997 WL 297072, *7 (E.D. Pa. May 28, 1997) (not reported) ("The determination of the ultimate liability question on which plaintiff bears the burden of proof. . . likewise depends upon the objective reasonableness of the arrest or investigatory stop at issue. Consequently, the determination of whether defendants have proved that they are protected by qualified immunity is often quite close to, if not co-extensive with, the factual/legal question of whether liability for a Constitutional violation may be imposed upon defendant(s). In the context of qualified immunity, the issue of the objective reasonableness of a defendant's conduct may be determined as a matter of law if there are no disputed issues of material fact concerning the indicia of probable cause, or if it is clear that a reasonably well-trained officer, possessed of the information available to the defendant, would have believed that he had probable cause to detain or arrest under the circumstances. . . As noted, however, where there are disputed issues of fact concerning the information possessed by the arresting officer which impacts the objective reasonableness of relying thereon, or disputed issues of fact concerning information developed during an investigatory stop which impacts whether probable cause to stop or arrest continued for the duration of the detention, the question whether the arresting officer is protected by qualified immunity, like the ultimate question of liability, is a matter for the factfinder.").

Zimmerman v. York, No. Civ.A. 94-4076, 1998 WL 111808, *9 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 9, 1998) (not reported) ("In Sharrar, the court noted that Third Circuit jurisprudence has not, in the past, been entirely clear with respect to when this issue should likewise be decided as a matter of law. . . [T]he Court of Appeals has now specifically stated, however, that the objective reasonableness of an officer's conduct is likewise an issue of law for the Court, unless 'the historical facts material to [that] issue are in dispute.'. . Here, as noted, the circumstances leading to plaintiff's arrest were described with rather remarkable consistency by all of the witnesses to the incident, including plaintiff himself. In this case, therefore, it is appropriate to determine, as a matter of law, whether defendant York's conduct was objectively reasonable.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Knibbs v. Momphard, 30 F.4th 200, 216-23 (4th Cir. 2022), pet. for cert. filed, No. 22-8 (June 28, 2022) ("[S]pecial difficulties can arise during summary judgment" in use of deadly force cases like this one because Deputy Momphard 'has killed the only other potential witness' that can directly refute his account of what happened on the porch. . . Without Mr. Knibbs' account, it can 'be easy to overvalue the narrative testimony of [Deputy Momphard] and to undervalue potentially contradictory physical evidence.'. . We are therefore mindful of Rule 56's demand 'to avoid simply accepting [Deputy Momphard's] self-serving statements and ... consider all contradictory evidence.'. . A holistic review of the record reflects at least two genuinely disputed and material facts: (1) whether Knibbs aimed his gun at Deputy Momphard; and (2) whether Deputy Momphard was 'readily recognizable as a law enforcement officer' on Knibbs' porch. . . . Our application of these basic summary judgment standards lays the groundwork for our disagreement with our dissenting colleague. Without citation to Rule 56 or the record, the dissent accepts essentially all of Deputy Momphard's self-serving assertions and reads the record in the light most favorable to him, the party moving for summary judgment. . . . Accepting the Estate's version of events, as we must at this stage, Knibbs was shot inside his own home while holding a loaded shotgun that was not aimed at Deputy Momphard. There is no record evidence that Knibbs, while holding his shotgun, made any furtive movement towards Deputy Momphard that would indicate his intent to cause physical harm. Further, as noted above, it is debatable whether Deputy Momphard was readily recognizable as a law enforcement officer in the middle of the night on Knibbs' unlit porch. These contested material facts, when viewed in their totality, bear a strong resemblance to our previous rulings in Cooper, Hensley, and Betton—all of which held that a police officer used unconstitutionally excessive force in shooting a man holding a firearm on his own property who was neither pointing the weapon at the officer nor giving some other indicator of an immediate intent to harm. . . . These cases substantially inform our analysis here. Under the Estate's evidence, (which, again, we are required to credit at this stage), Knibbs 'never pointed the [shot]gun at anyone.'. . So, '[i]f a jury credited [this] evidence, it could conclude that [Deputy Momphard] shot [Knibbs] only because he was holding a gun, although he never raised the gun to threaten [him].'. . The use of deadly force is not justified as a matter of law in these circumstances. 'Instead, deadly force may only be used by a police officer when, based on a reasonable assessment, the officer or another person is threatened with the weapon.'. . Accepting the Estate's evidence, a reasonable juror could conclude that Knibbs made no such threats to Deputy Momphard, rendering the use of deadly force unconstitutionally excessive. . . . We do not mean to say that an officer must wait until a gun is pointed at him before he is entitled to use deadly force when other factors (like furtive movement) indicate an imminent threat to life. To the contrary, '[t]his Circuit has consistently held that an officer does not have to wait until a gun is pointed at the officer before the officer is entitled to take action.'. . But there is a line that our case law has drawn between lawfully possessing a firearm for self-defense in one's own home, and possessing a firearm (or other object) in a manner that objectively threatens an officer's life or the life of another person. Under the totality of the circumstances as proffered by the Estate, a reasonable officer would have recognized that there was no imminent threat to his life simply because Knibbs refused to drop a loaded shotgun that he was pointing safely towards the ceiling while standing inside his own home peering onto his unlit porch to investigate a nocturnal disturbance. . . . Our core disagreement with the district court and our dissenting colleague on this issue is not caused by our alleged failure to analyze the totality of the circumstances. . . We instead analyze a different totality of disputed facts altogether. The material underlying factual issues—whether Deputy Momphard was readily recognizable as a law enforcement officer and whether Knibbs aimed his gun at Deputy Momphard—are disputed at the summary judgment stage. Because Deputy Momphard is the moving party, we are constrained to assume that the jury will not credit his evidence and will instead accept the Estate's proffered evidence on disputed fact questions. But the dissent, like the district court, contravenes Rule 56 by accepting Deputy Momphard's self-serving statements and reading the evidence in the light most favorable to him. . . Viewing this case in the light most favorable to the Estate, there is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to find that Knibbs never pointed his weapon at Deputy Momphard or made any furtive movements, thereby rendering unjustified the deadly force used against Knibbs. The district court therefore erred in finding that there were no genuine issues of disputed material fact, and ultimately erred in finding that Deputy Momphard's use of force was reasonable as a matter of law at this stage in the proceedings.")

Stanton v. Elliott, 25 F.4th 227, 233-38 (4th Cir. 2022) ("Stanton brings an excessive-force claim under the Fourth Amendment. In such cases, we use an objective reasonableness test to determine whether excessive force was used. . . When deadly force is used, we have a more specific test for objective reasonableness. In those cases, we consider whether the hypothetical reasonable officer in that situation would have had 'probable cause to believe that the suspect pose[d] a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.'. . That determination must focus on the moment that deadly force was used, not the whole episode. . . And the justification for deadly force can fall away in seconds. . . In questioning the split-second decisions of police officers, we must avoid hindsight bias and try to place ourselves in the heat of the moment. . .That is the substantive law. Then, we view that excessive-force claim through the lens of the affirmative defense of qualified immunity. When a qualified-immunity defense is raised, we apply a two-step test. We must determine, first, whether the facts viewed in Stanton's favor make out a violation of his father's constitutional rights, and second, whether that violated right was clearly established at the time. . . . With deadly force cases, special difficulties can arise during summary judgment. Often, the officer has killed the only other potential witness. Courts should be careful at summary judgment to avoid simply accepting an officer's self-serving statements and must consider all contradictory evidence. . . . We begin with the story as Trooper Elliott tells it. If we take him at his word, we may not find a constitutional violation at all, let alone a clearly established one. A police officer need not wait for a suspect to shoot before using deadly force. . . And an officer need not see the weapon in a suspect's hands to find him objectively dangerous. . . So if the question before us was whether—given the split-second nature of the decision—Trooper Elliott reasonably believed that Crumbley might have a weapon and might shoot, then we may well find qualified immunity. Crumbley was erratic that day; he had threatened to shoot the troopers multiple times; he had swung a shovel at the troopers; and the troopers knew that Crumbley had a gun on the property and was inclined to use it. With all that as context, Elliott may have made an objectively reasonable decision to react with deadly force to Crumbley's abrupt hand movements. . . But we cannot simply accept the trooper's statements as true given potentially contradictory physical evidence, . . . and Elliot's testimony here is at least in tension with some other evidence. So we must determine whether a jury might reasonably reject the officer's testimony at trial considering that evidence. Start with the obvious: Crumbley was shot in the back. Trooper Elliott says he started shooting when Crumbley turned toward him and began to raise his hands, and that the shot in the back must have happened because Crumbley continued to turn as the shooting went on. The shot in the back does not out-and-out refute that story, . . . but it does draw it into question. Another explanation of that fact is that Trooper Elliott shot Crumbley while his back was turned. . . The shot in the hand also complicates Trooper Elliott's narrative. He says that Crumbley was shot while turning from right to left and raising his hands. And we know from the autopsy report that one of the bullets went through the back of his right hand. If both those things are true, it is hard to conceive of a variation of events where Crumbley was hit before turning his back. [court discusses different possibilities] We could go on with other variations; surely there are others. But the point is that Trooper Elliott's story is not unquestionably true given the placement of the wounds. So a reasonable jury, even without expert testimony, might consider these questions and determine that not just one but two shots struck the victim while his back was turned. We also know that nothing was found in the couch—not drugs, not a gun, nothing. And the couch lacked cushions to hide anything in. Why stop at that couch if there is nothing in it? That is not much, especially given Crumbley's erratic behavior that day, but perhaps it undermines, at least a little, Trooper Elliott's claim that Crumbley stopped at the couch. Trooper Elliott also missed three of his five shots. That too may not tell us much, given the foot chase and the distance between him and Crumbley—we do not expect perfect marksmanship—but it is some small piece of evidence drawing Trooper Elliot's account in question because it is harder to shoot a moving target. All this physical evidence may not necessarily refute Trooper Elliott's story, but it might be reasonably arranged by a jury into a different version of events that does. Beyond the physical evidence, a reasonable jury's doubt based on the physical evidence might find support in possible inconsistencies and omissions in Trooper Elliott's story. . . . Taken as a whole, the totality of the evidence presented here creates a genuine fact question about whether Elliot's story is true or whether Crumbley was shot while running away. And if the jury finds that Crumbley was shot in the back while unarmed and running away, that would violate his clearly established rights. . . Because there is a genuine dispute of fact here that might prove a violation of a clearly established right, there cannot be summary judgment on qualified immunity for Trooper Elliott. We do not suggest that Stanton should win this case, only that the district court erred in granting summary judgment. . . . Trooper Elliot tells a story that, if true, may not amount to a constitutional violation. Crumbley was unpredictable that day, and he was loudly threatening to shoot the troopers. He said he had a gun somewhere. So it was reasonable for Trooper Elliott to expect violence when Crumbley had abruptly began to raise his hands after losing the troopers for long enough to have gotten hold of a weapon. But the evidence here, especially the shot in the back, suggests another possible story, a story where there is no turn, there is no abrupt hand movement, and where a fleeing, unarmed man was shot in the back. The evidence here is enough to present a genuine dispute of material fact, and if a jury looks at this record, hears this testimony, and finds that Crumbley was indeed shot in the back while unarmed and running away, that would violate a clearly established right. So granting summary judgment on qualified immunity was improper.")

Gordon v. Schilling, 937 F.3d 348, 362-63 (4th Cir. 2019) ("[T]he defendants contend that they are entitled to qualified immunity on Gordon's Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claims and that the district court has already ruled in that regard. The defendants, however, misread the Opinion. The court did not determine whether the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the deliberate indifference claims. Here, we conclude, as previously explained, that factual disputes exist as to whether the defendants contravened Gordon's Eighth Amendment rights. See Willingham v. Crooke, 412 F.3d 553, 560 (4th Cir. 2005) ("[T]o the extent that a dispute of material fact precludes a conclusive ruling on qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, the district court should submit factual questions to the jury and reserve for itself the legal question of whether the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity on the facts found by the jury.").")

Harris v. Pittman, 927 F.3d 266, 271, 275-76, 280-82 (4th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 1550 (2020) ("[W]e vacated the grant of summary judgment and remanded with instructions 'to determine, in the first instance, if construing the salient facts in the light most favorable to Harris, Pittman is entitled to qualified immunity.'. . On remand, the district court again granted summary judgment to Pittman. This time, the court assumed that Pittman was standing over Harris when he fired the final shots. But even under those circumstances, the court held, his use of force was objectively reasonable as a matter of law. That the final shots were (by assumption) fired while Pittman was standing over Harris, the court reasoned, did not render them unreasonable, given record evidence 'that the shots were fired in rapid succession' and the preceding 'relentless' attacks on Pittman by Harris, 'even after [Harris was] struck by a taser.' . . And '[n]otably,' the court concluded, 'from the location of [Harris's] wounds, it appears that Pittman intended his shots only to disable [Harris].'. . Because Harris's own assertions did not establish a constitutional violation, the court held, Pittman was entitled to summary judgment under the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. And in any event, the court continued, Pittman would be entitled to summary judgment under the second prong, because even if Harris could establish a violation of his Fourth Amendment right to be free of excessive force, that right was not clearly established with the requisite specificity at the time of the incident. . . . The only issue on appeal is whether, at this early stage of the litigation and before a jury has had a chance to assess witness credibility and other evidentiary issues, it can be said that Pittman is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. We conclude that genuine factual disputes bearing directly on Pittman's qualified immunity defense preclude the award of summary judgment, and therefore reverse the judgment of the district court. . . .On appeal, Pittman does not defend the district court's answer to the question we posed in our mandate: 'whether, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Harris (i.e., Harris was lying on the ground when Pittman, still on top of him, fired the final shots), a reasonable officer would have probable cause to believe that Harris posed a significant threat of death or serious physical injury,' Harris, 668 F. App'x at 487. Instead, he rejects the premise – and with it, our mandate – arguing for the first time that Harris's account should not be credited on summary judgment, primarily because it is 'blatantly contradicted by the record' and thus fails to create a genuine dispute of fact under Scott v. Harris[.]. . . Even if this argument were not foreclosed by the mandate rule that precluded Pittman from raising it before the district court, . . . we would find it unpersuasive. . . .As we have clarified, Scott is the exception, not the rule. It does not 'abrogate the proper summary judgment analysis, which in qualified immunity cases "usually means adopting ... the plaintiff's version of the facts."'. . . Summary judgment is proper under Scott only when there is evidence – like the videotape in Scott itself – of undisputed authenticity that shows some material element of the plaintiff's account to be 'blatantly and demonstrably false.'. . . In sum, under Brockington, as well as Waterman, the facts alleged by Harris, taken in the light most favorable to him, would allow a reasonable jury to find a violation of his constitutional rights, satisfying the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . That leaves us with the district court's alternative holding, under the second prong of the analysis: that even if Pittman could be found to have violated Harris's right to be free of excessive force, Pittman is entitled to qualified immunity because that right was not 'clearly established' with sufficient specificity at the time of the incident. . . We disagree. The cases on which we rely above, laying out the rule that governs here, were decided in 2005 (Waterman) and 2011 (Brockington), before the 2012 events of this case. Since 2005, it has been established that 'an imminent threat of serious physical harm to an officer is not sufficient to justify the employment of deadly force seconds after the threat is eliminated if a reasonable officer would have recognized when the force was employed that the threat no longer existed.' Waterman, 393 F.3d at 482 (emphasis added). Six years later, in Brockington, we held that the Waterman rule was sufficiently specific to 'clearly establish[ ]' the right of a suspect, once shot by an officer and lying wounded on the ground, not to be shot again. Brockington, 637 F.3d at 508. And although an exact factual match is not required to overcome a qualified immunity defense, . . . Brockington certainly comes close: Under Brockington, it is clear that even a police officer who has just survived a harrowing encounter that necessitated the use of deadly force to extricate himself may not continue to use deadly force once he has reason to know that his would-be assailant is lying on the ground wounded and unarmed[.] This is not a case, in other words, in which an officer would be required to reason backward from case law 'at a high level of generality' to determine whether his conduct violated a constitutional right. . . Here, 'pre-existing law makes the unlawfulness' of the conduct in question – as alleged by Harris, and drawing all reasonable inferences in Harris's favor – ' "apparent."'. . In so holding, we are cognizant of the reality that 'police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments – in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving[.]'. . This is a case in point; even on Harris's account, and certainly on Pittman's, Officer Pittman was faced with a genuine and no doubt terrifying threat to his safety during his struggle with Harris. We do no more today than reiterate what this court repeatedly has held: that even where deadly force initially is justified by a significant threat of death or serious physical injury, a police officer may not continue to employ deadly force when the circumstances change so as to eliminate the threat. Applying that principle to this case, we conclude that Pittman is not entitled to qualified immunity on summary judgment. This conclusion, of course, does not mean that Harris 'will prevail if the action is tried on the merits[.]'. . That decision is not ours – or the district court's – to make at this juncture. Instead, we hold only that there remain genuine disputes of material fact bearing on Pittman's qualified immunity defense, and that summary judgment therefore is not appropriate on this record.")

Harris v. Pittman, 927 F.3d 266, 282-87 (4th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 1550 (2020) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) ("This dispute began when Herman Harris fled from Officer Zachary Pittman, after repeatedly being told to stop. Pittman caught up to Harris at the edge of a tree line and both men fell many feet down into the woods. In the ensuing struggle, the suspect fought off a taser and repeatedly struck Pittman. As Harris later admitted in a guilty plea for this assault, he tried to shoot Pittman in the head with Pittman's gun. Both men sustained serious injuries. When the altercation ended, Officer Pittman's face was lacerated, his hands were bleeding, taser wire covered the forest floor, and parts of Pittman's uniform and gun holster were destroyed. Harris was shot multiple times. Only a few minutes passed between the time that Officer Pittman first announced his presence and the time he emerged injured from the woods. The majority shaves this incident oh so fine, parsing and segmenting the encounter almost second by second, ultimately finding that Pittman's efforts to save his life in the final moments of the altercation were excessive. Sadly for the majority, the action here spun by; the struggle allowed the combatants no time for a coffee break. In the majority's view, if a suspect lands a punch in one moment, drags you to the ground the next, and goes for your gun a second later, a reasonable officer must shed any attempt to preserve his own life if, in the course of the ongoing fight, the officer gains so much as a fleeting advantage. It was much to be hoped that the majority would understand the difference between a struggle in which life and death hinged on an instant and the leisured contemplation brought to events years later. To the best of my knowledge, the majority was not present at the scene. The majority was not tumbling down a wooded ravine in the dark of night. The majority was not alone, fighting a person who had disregarded clear warnings, fled arrest, fought through a taser, and tried to grab its gun. The majority did not struggle to regain its weapon while lying beaten and bloodied on the ground. And the majority did not fear for its life when that weapon was ultimately used to stop the assault. The law of qualified immunity does not allow us to ignore the serious and ongoing threat faced by Officer Pittman. Although I may never understand the risks that officers face in the service of public safety, settled law requires that I try. Because I cannot see how Pittman's actions were in any way unreasonable, I respectfully dissent. My esteemed colleagues in the majority are surely right in one respect. Police officers do overreach. And when they do, the law must hold them to account. . . . Four years ago, the Supreme Court noted how often it is called upon to reverse federal courts that deny qualified immunity in excessive force cases: 'Because of the importance of qualified immunity 'to society as a whole,' the Court often corrects lower courts when they wrongly subject individual officers to liability.'. . The Court's view on the importance of qualified immunity has not wavered. Each year, it has continued to issue opinions, often per curiam, reversing a denial of qualified immunity in an excessive force suit. [collecting cases] In some cases, lower courts erred by defining the constitutional right at such a high level of abstraction that no conduct whatsoever was protected by the immunity. . . At other times, courts have erred in applying the immunity standard, either by assessing the officer's conduct without regard to the facts on the ground, see, e.g., Kisela, 138 S. Ct. at 1153, or wrongfully finding a 'genuine' dispute of fact, see, e.g., Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 127 S.Ct. 1769, 167 L.Ed.2d 686 (2007). The Supreme Court has been forced into the fray to prevent the total erosion of qualified immunity. At some point a pattern of Court decisions becomes a drumbeat, leaving one to wonder how long it will take for the Court's message to break through. Perhaps the Court's patience on this point is endless, because, golly, it has been so sorely tried. The failings that have been so routinely documented by the Supreme Court rear their head once again. The majority has used the summary judgment standard once more to eviscerate qualified immunity protections. In the majority's hands, every dispute becomes genuine and every fact becomes material. Qualified immunity fades to the end of every discussion, its values reserved for lip service until little enough is left. The result? The majority has ignored Supreme Court precedent, somehow finding Pittman's actions to save his own life something our Constitution cannot condone. . . .This case comes to us at the summary judgment stage and a suit can only proceed if some material fact is 'genuinely' disputed. Although it may not be clear from reading the majority opinion, awards of pre-trial dismissals are crucial to the utility of any immunity. The Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized that qualified immunity 'is an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability; and like an absolute immunity, it is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.'. . . If a case goes to trial when a valid basis for summary judgment exists, the entire purpose of the immunity is thwarted. The majority belies all of this teaching in repeatedly referring to this case as at an 'early stage of the litigation,'. . . thereby betraying its view that these sorts of cases should be resolved at a later, rather than earlier, point in time. But the more litigation the merrier is not at all what qualified immunity is about. . . .To be sure, there are prior cases in this circuit in which a use of force was reasonable one moment but was unreasonable in the next. See Brockington v. Boykins, 637 F.3d 503 (4th Cir. 2011); Waterman v. Batton, 393 F.3d 471, 476 (4th Cir. 2005). From these cases it is evident that, as a general matter, an officer's use of force must be examined at the moment it takes place. The district court did not disagree with that proposition, nor do I. What mattered in our prior cases, however, and what ought to matter here, is whether the risk facing the officer was still present when force was used. In Waterman, officers continued to fire on a car after the 'vehicle passed the officers,'. . . while the officer in Brockington fired additional gunshots after the plaintiff 'fell off the porch onto the concrete backyard below,' 637 F.3d at 507. Neither case bears any resemblance to the one here. In this case, Pittman was in an isolated patch on a dark night. He was indisputably facing a man who had struggled to grab his weapon, sought by his own admission to shoot him in the head, fought through taser wire, ignored an order to 'get down, get down,' and had earlier disregarded clear warnings to stop. There was no break in the action. Pittman could well and reasonably believe that he was faced with a mortal threat and he was permitted to respond accordingly. It may be that one day this court will openly announce what is implicit here: a rule of constitutional law that subjects a police officer to liability for trying to save his life. I rather doubt, however, that our founding document forces officers to play roulette with their own existence. All we have ever needed to resolve this case is the recognition that no such unfeeling rule currently exists. Qualified immunity shields all but those are 'plainly incompetent or ... knowingly violate the law,'. . . and Officer Pittman is clearly not deserving of either label. He has violated no clearly established right, or any other right for that matter, and he is entitled to immunity. Interactions between citizens and police continue on edge, and minority communities and neighborhoods have justly felt that race brings with it an unwarranted presumption of wrongdoing. The Fourth Amendment, invaluable as it is, is but an imperfect check on the invisible hand of discriminatory enforcement. These grievances are now rightly garnering increased attention, but attention to one side of a fraught equation raises the risk that the other side will be neglected. And there is another side. 'Nationwide, interest in becoming a police officer is down significantly.' See Tom Jackman, Who Wants to be a Police Officer? Job Applications Plummet at Most U.S. Departments: Perceptions of Policing, Healthy Economy Contribute to Decreased Applications at 66 Percent of Departments, Wash. Post (Dec. 4, 2018) ("Recently, [Chuck Wexler, head of the Police Executive Research Forum,] asked a roomful of chiefs to raise their hands if they wanted their children to follow them into a law enforcement career. Not one hand went up."). While this drop has many causes, unwarranted disrespect for the police profession is surely one. Police work, like the calling of many a skilled tradesman, has often been handed down through the generations in America, but self respect depends in part upon societal respect, and that for officers is sadly ebbing. Court decisions that devalue not only police work but the very safety of officers themselves risk severing those bonds of generational transmission that have so sustained the working classes of our country. It is a shame, because professional police work helps to bridge the gulf between the haves and have nots in a community and protects our most vulnerable and dispossessed populations. Law must sanction officers who would abuse their power or disregard controlling law; it should not scare off those who worry that no matter what they do or whom they protect, they cannot avoid suits for money damages. When Officer Pittman emerged from that tree line, 'gasping for air and ... in physical pain,'. . he ought to have been greeted with respect. Instead he has been pulled from one fight and thrust into another, this time in a courtroom. The district court in this case applied our precedent faithfully and the officer here showed conspicuous courage. I cannot join a decision that engineers such a perverse punishment for his actions and tells future officers that they cannot preserve their very lives without having their conduct assessed through the uncomprehending lens of hindsight. The second-guessing will have no end. If not now, never.")
