Sepulveda-Villarini v. Department of Educ. of Puerto Rico, 628 F.3d 25, 29, 30 (1st Cir. 2010) ("We think that the district court demanded more than plausibility. Each set of pleadings includes two significant sets of allegations. First, for a period of four or five school years the school administration provided the reduced class size in response to the respective plaintiff's request, supported by some sort of medical certification attesting to its legitimacy. In each complaint, those years of requested accommodation are put forward as establishing, in effect, a base-line of adequacy under the statute in response to an implicit acknowledgment that a statutory disability required the provisions that were made. Second, each set of pleadings describes changed facts beginning in the 2007-08 year, in which instructions from the defendant Secretary resulted in raising the class size to 30 (with a young team teacher to share the load with Sepúlveda). Each complaint alleges that the plaintiff's emotional and physical health subsequently deteriorated to the point of requiring treatment, and each concludes that assigning 30 pupils was less than reasonable accommodation under the statute. . . . We . . . see the trial judge's call for allegations explaining 'how' class size was significant and the change in size was actionable as a call for pleading the details of medical evidence in order to bolster the likelihood that a causal connection will prove out as fact. It may even be read as an expression of skepticism that medical evidence would support the causal claim that increased class size damaged health. But Twombly cautioned against thinking of plausibility as a standard of likely success on the merits; the standard is plausibility assuming the pleaded facts to be true and read in a plaintiff's favor. . . . A plausible but inconclusive inference from pleaded facts will survive a motion to dismiss, and the fair inferences from the facts pleaded in these cases point to the essential difference between each of them and the circumstances in Twombly, for example, in which the same actionable conduct alleged on the defendant's part had been held in some prior cases to be lawful behavior. . . . We therefore vacate the portion of the order in each case that found the complaint inadequate to state a Title I violation, and inadequate to state a Rehabilitation Act claim for the same reason.")

Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 273-75 & n.7(1st Cir. 2009) ("[A]nalyzing the pleadings under Iqbal, we hold that the allegations of the complaint do not allege a sufficient connection between the Mayor and the alleged conscience-shocking behavior–the killing of the seized pets–to state the elements of a substantive due process violation.. . . The purported liability of the Mayor for damages for substantive due process violations does not involve a policy of the Municipality for which he is responsible, nor does it rest on his personal conduct. Instead, the allegations against the Mayor are that he promulgated a pet policy for the public housing complexes and was present at and participated in one of the raids. This level of involvement is insufficient to support a finding of liability. . . . Plaintiffs complaint identifies no policy which authorized the killing of the pets, much less one which the Mayor authorized. Second, the complaint does not allege that the Mayor was personally involved in any conscience-shocking conduct during the raids. . . .A government official who himself inflicts truly outrageous, uncivilized, and intolerable harm on a person or his property may be liable; but there is no claim in this complaint the Mayor himself inflicted such harm. . . The allegations against the Mayor thus do not establish that his involvement was sufficiently direct to hold him liable for violations of the plaintiffs' substantive due process rights.

Nor do the allegations make out a viable case for supervisory liability, such that the Mayor could, on these pleadings, be held responsible for violations of the plaintiffs' substantive due process rights committed by subordinate municipal employees or workers from ACS. . . . Some recent language from the Supreme Court may call into question our prior circuit law on the standard for holding a public official liable for damages under § 1983 on a theory of supervisory liability. . . We need not resolve this issue, however, because we find that the plaintiffs have not pled facts sufficient to make out a plausible entitlement to relief under our previous formulation of the standards for supervisory liability. . . . Here, the Mayor's promulgation of a pet policy that was silent as to the manner in which the pets were to be collected and disposed of, coupled with his mere presence at one of the raids, is insufficient to create the affirmative link necessary for a finding of supervisory liability, even under a theory of deliberate indifference. The Mayor is entitled to qualified immunity on the pleadings on the Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claims.")

Thomas v. Rhode Island, 542 F.3d 944, 949 (1st Cir. 2008) ("[E]ven if the probable cause theory of the appellants were properly before us, we would reject it. The vague references in the complaint to acts of the defendants that 'are illegal' and 'without lawful authority' were insufficient to apprise defendants that the appellants were asserting a more particular claim that there was a lack of probable cause for the arrests. As we have stated, '[n]otice pleading rules do not relieve a plaintiff of responsibility for identifying the nature of her claim.'. . Our precedent is clear that courts 'must always exhibit awareness of the defendant's inalienable right to know in advance the nature of the cause of action being asserted against him,' because such notice is '[a] fundamental purpose of pleadings under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.'. . Here, the generality of the complaint's language did not afford defendants such notice with respect to the probable cause claim.").

Solomon v. Dookhan, No. 13–10208–GAO, 2014 WL 317202, *7, *8 (D. Mass. Jan. 27, 2014) [O'Toole, J. (adopting Magistrate Judge Sorokin's R & R) ("[T]he fact that Keenan is alleged by Solomon to have engaged in unconstitutional misconduct, and then to have engaged in further misconduct in an immunized capacity (i.e., his grand jury testimony) does not serve to immunize him retroactively with respect to the earlier acts. . . It is also potentially evidence with respect to the allegation plausibly made in the Amended Complaint that Keenan colluded with Dookhan and the ADA, intending to frame Solomon, which would also state a claim for violation of his due process rights. Even where Brady is not implicated, state actors nevertheless violate an accused's due process rights when they engage in a 'deliberate deception.'. . As in Limone, Solomon's allegations here are broader than a Brady claim. . . . Solomon alleges not that Keenan merely disposed of the tested substance, but then was otherwise an unwitting collateral victim of Dookhan's misconduct. Rather, he plausibly alleges that Keenan, along with Dookhan, knowingly sought Solomon's wrongful conviction by: failing to provide the field test materials; attempting to intimidate Solomon's counsel; seeking an indictment of Solomon on the felony charge; and offering false (albeit immunized) testimony and evidence to the grand jury.")

Brace v. Massachusetts, 673 F.Supp.2d 36, 42, 43 (D. Mass. 2009) ("[T]he heightened 'plausibility' pleading standard first articulated in Twombly and then re-stated in Iqbal might not be as universal as Plaintiff's counsel seemed to contend at oral argument. Regardless of the actual reach of Twombly and Iqbal, and even assuming, arguendo, that the heightened pleading standard applies, Plaintiff in this case has pled sufficient facts to survive Defendant Frey's motion to dismiss. As to the first element needed to establish a violation of Ms. Brace's rights under the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, there is little question that Plaintiff's complaint establishes that Ms. Brace's condition while she was in custody constituted a serious medical need. Similarly, Plaintiff's complaint contains enough factual detail to plausibly support a claim that Defendant Frey might have exhibited deliberate indifference to this serious medical need. The complaint alleges that Defendant Frey observed Ms. Brace while she was in obvious medical distress, which would establish that she was subjectively aware of the substantial risk of serious harm. The complaint also avers that Defendant Frey did take the minimal step of making a phone call to the medical unit about Ms. Brace's condition, which is enough to establish that she in fact did actually draw the inference that a risk of harm existed. Given Plaintiff's factual allegations about Defendant Frey's role in the events of August 20, 2005, it is plausible that Plaintiff could establish that Defendant Frey's failure to take any further action could constitute deliberate indifference. The complaint here does not begin and end with a conclusory recitation of the legal elements that must be proved. Rather, Plaintiff has cited to enough specific alleged acts or omissions by Defendant Frey that might support a claim under the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, especially given the limited access to information that Plaintiff has had prior to taking discovery in this case.").

Chao v. Ballista, 630 F.Supp.2d 170, 177-79 & n.2 (D. Mass. 2009) ("Plausibility, as the Supreme Court's recent elaboration in Ashcroft v. Iqbal makes clear, is a highly contextual enterprise–dependent on the particular claims asserted, their elements, and the overall factual picture alleged in the complaint. . . .Allegations become 'conclusory' where they recite only the elements of the claim and, at the same time, the court's commonsense credits a far more likely inference from the available facts. . .This analysis depends on the full factual picture, the particular cause of action, and the available alternative explanations. Yet in keeping with Rule 8(a), a complaint should only be dismissed at the pleading stage where the allegations are so broad, and the alternative explanations so overwhelming, that the claims no longer appear plausible. . . .Together, [the] factual allegations [of the complaint] raise the plausible inference that, given their supervisory duties and security responsibilities, the Defendants failed to adequately train, supervise, or investigate Ballista's year-long sexual encounters with Chao. They encompass also a failure to adopt policies and procedures within the DOC that would have prevented the sexual abuse alleged in the complaint. . . . Given the public attention devoted to sexual abuse in prisons writ large, and the repetitive, long-lasting abuse alleged in this case, it is a fair inference from the pleadings that prison officials–including Commissioner Dennehey–were deliberately indifferent to the risks and reality of this abuse. . . . Notably, the state of mind required to make out a supervisory claim under the Eighth Amendment–i.e., deliberate indifference–requires less than the discriminatory purpose or intent that Iqbal was required to allege in his suit against Ashcroft and Mueller. . . Together with the other contextual factors discussed above, what qualifies as a fair or credible inference from the facts alleged in the pleadings must be calibrated accordingly.. . . While the Defendants' personal involvement will be further tested at the summary judgment stage, Chao's claims have met the crucial threshold of plausibility and survive the Defendants' Motion to Dismiss.")

Farrah v. Gondella , No. 07-12075-RGS, 2008 WL 2788090, at *3, *4 (D. Mass. July 16, 2008) (not reported) ("In Blodgett's view, the supervisory claim is pled so broadly that it would allow civil rights plaintiffs to sweep any superior officer into the ambit of liability simply by using catch-phrases like "knew or should have known" and "failed to act." Blodgett contends that plaintiff is attempting to bootstrap allegations regarding Blanchard's past conduct into the claim of supervisory liability without pleading any link between the alleged conduct and Blodgett personally. According to Blodgett, Twombly requires more. Blodgett may in this regard place too much weight on Twombly, but there is another consideration. Rule 8 requires a civil rights plaintiff (as it does plaintiffs generally) to set forth factual allegations with respect to each material element necessary to warrant relief, including 'who did what to whom, when, where, and why.' Educadores Puertorriqueños en Accíon v. Hernández, 367 F.3d 61, 68 (1st Cir.2004) (affirming the application of Rule 8 to civil rights actions, but rejecting a 'heightened pleading standard'). . . . Plaintiff's supervisory claim against Blodgett, as currently pled, skirts perilously close to an unadorned theory of vicarious liability, a tort concept that has no application in a section 1983 context. . . .While a civil rights plaintiff need not plead encyclopedic facts in order to adequately state a supervisory liability claim, the facts pled should be sufficient to cross the rim of the speculative into the realm of the plausible. This is particularly true where the supervisor against whom the claim is brought is an elected official whose duties run well beyond oversight of one of many components of a government office owing manifold duties to the general public. Perhaps the court is mistaken in permitting plaintiff a second chance as against Blodgett, but at this stage of the proceedings, the rules are appropriately plaintiff-friendly, and Blodgett has not (as yet) raised a claim of qualified immunity. The court will permit plaintiff to conduct discovery from Blodgett limited solely (and strictly) to the issues of: (1) his authority to discipline members of the Drug Task Force for alleged misconduct; and (2) his knowledge of any propensity by Blanchard (or others) to use excessive force.").

Brown v. Sweeney, 526 F.Supp.2d 126, 129, 130 (D.Mass. 2007) ("The United States Supreme Court is the flagship of a vast fleet of courts. Where, as here, it makes a course correction after sailing on a particular tack for a long period of time, it has the right to expect that each of the subordinate units will keep station on the flag, make the identical course correction, and sail on the new course in perfect alignment. At least that is the theory. Here, of course, the metaphor breaks down. Decisions of the Supreme Court do not come with precise orders, such as 'alter course three degrees to starboard.' Rather they carefully decide the specific controversy before the Court and explain the grounds of such decision. Given our strong stare decisis tradition, however, every such decision implicitly carries a signal much like Nelson's famous 'England expects ...' flag hoist at Trafalgar, i.e. 'that every man shall do his duty' and so we all shall ... at least insofar as we can make out the signal. There is some merit to an argument limiting the reach of Bell Atlantic to its antitrust subject matter. Professor Erwin Chermerinsky suggested such a limitation in addressing the District of Massachusetts Judicial Conference in June 2007. The Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic noted the imperative of dismissing antitrust claims before embarking your expensive discovery. . . Such an argument is supported by the more recent Supreme Court decision in Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007). The Supreme Court, in Erickson, addressed a claim for a section 1983 violation and stated that '[s]pecific facts are not necessary.' . . To make matters more confusing, the authority cited for the proposition is Bell Atlantic, with an internal quotation citing Conley. . . . Bell Atlantic, when read together with Erickson, and in light of the cases that have addressed this issue, appears neither to be confined to antitrust cases nor to impose a significantly heightened pleading standard. . . The use of the Bell Atlantic language and standard in Erickson implies that recognizing a heightened (or different) pleading standard only for antitrust cases and therefore distinguishing Bell Atlantic on its antitrust subject matter ought fail. . . Still, Erickson is instructive in analyzing a motion to dismiss after Bell Atlantic. In Erickson, the Supreme Court held that a section 1983 claim alleging deliberate indifference to serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment was properly pled where '[t]he complaint stated that [the doctor's] decision to remove petitioner from his prescribed hepatitis C medication was Aendangering [his] life"' and that 'this medication was withheld Ashortly after" petitioner had commenced a treatment program that would take one year, that he was Astill in need of treatment for this disease," and that the prison officials were in the meantime refusing to provide treatment.'. . These generalized factual allegations were deemed sufficient and demonstrate that a liberal pleading standard as to the 'grounds' of a claim remains. . . The decision in Bell Atlantic, therefore, is properly read as undermining only those claims that rest exclusively on conclusory or merely speculative assertions.").

SECOND CIRCUIT

Willey v. Kirkpatrick, 801 F.3d 51, 68 (2d Cir. 2015) ("[W]e find erroneous each of the three apparently independent grounds given by the district court for dismissing Willey's claim for unsanitary conditions of confinement. The first two aim to set a minimum duration and minimum severity of an exposure for it to reach the level of a constitutional violation. We agree that there are many exposures of inmates to unsanitary conditions that do not amount to a constitutional violation, but we reject the district court's conclusion that there is any bright-line durational requirement for a viable unsanitary-conditions claim. Nor is there some minimal level of grotesquerie required, which goes unmet by an inmate's accumulating human waste that fills a toilet but does not 'overflow[ ] into his cell.'. . Instead, our decisions and those of other circuits evaluate the product of these two components—whether exposure to human waste is cruel and unusual depends on both the duration and the severity of the exposure. . . . The severity of an exposure may be less quantifiable than its duration, but its qualitative offense to a prisoner's dignity should be given due consideration. Here, the district court's analysis did not appear to consider the effect that the cell shields would have in exponentially amplifying the grotesquerie of the odor of the accumulating waste. Another relevant consideration increases the severity of Willey's second alleged exposure, which the district court did not discuss. Over those fourteen days in a filthy cell, Willey alleges that he was kept naked and without access to clothing. We do not mean to set out any precise formula—we do not say, for example, that this 14–day exposure without clothing was more or less grave than the later 28–day exposure with clothing—but any analysis must consider both the duration and the severity of an inmate's experience of being exposed to unsanitary conditions. Finally, the district court's imposition of a third requirement—that an inmate 'claim[ ] that he suffered sickness or other ill effects' to establish a violation, J.A. 676—fares no better. Although the seriousness of the harms suffered is relevant to calculating damages and may shed light on the severity of an exposure, serious injury is unequivocally not a necessary element of an Eighth Amendment claim. . . Even if such harm were required, Willey plainly alleged that his mental-health problems and attempted suicide followed the campaign of retaliation of which the unsanitary conditions of his confinement were a prominent part. For these reasons, independent of the reaching of grounds not raised by the movants without notice and an opportunity to respond, we vacate the dismissal of Willey's claim for unsanitary conditions of confinement.")

Crawford v. Cuomo, 796 F.3d 252, 254 (2d Cir. 2015) ("We write today to clarify the rule set forth in Boddie: A corrections officer's intentional contact with an inmate's genitalia or other intimate area, which serves no penological purpose and is undertaken with the intent to gratify the officer's sexual desire or to humiliate the inmate, violates the Eighth Amendment. Moreover, we recognize that sexual abuse of prisoners, once passively accepted by society, deeply offends today's standards of decency. The proper application of the rule in Boddie must reflect these standards. By alleging that Officer Prindle fondled their genitals for personal gratification and without penological justification, Crawford and Corley stated a cognizable Eighth Amendment claim.")

Dolan v. Connolly, 794 F.3d 290, 292, 295 (2d Cir. 2015) ("We hold that action as a member of an ILC, i.e. the filing or voicing of grievances on behalf of a prison population, qualifies as constitutionally protected conduct under the First and Fourteenth Amendments and that retaliation for such conduct is therefore actionable under Section 1983. . . . While we harbor some skepticism as to whether the complaint, as it stands, adequately pleads a factual basis from which to infer a causal connection between Dolan's protected conduct and the adverse actions allegedly taken by (at least) some defendants, reading the pro se complaint and opposition papers liberally, we cannot conclude that amendment would be futile.")

Drimal v. Tai, 786 F.3d 219, 223-24 (2d Cir. 2015) ("The district court's rulings on the pleadings and on qualified immunity suffer from two deficiencies. First, the district court erred in finding Drimal's complaint sufficient to plead a violation of Title III because Drimal simply asserted in a conclusory fashion that intercepting marital telephone calls violated Title III without any reference to the duty to minimize. Second, in evaluating defendants' claims of qualified immunity, the district court ruled on all the defendants as a single group instead of evaluating Drimal's claims against each defendant individually. Accordingly, we vacate the district court's denial of the motion to dismiss and direct the dismissal of the complaint with leave to replead under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a)(2) because it appears that amending the complaint would not be futile. . . .In assessing the complaint, the district court read the minimization requirement into the plaintiff's allegations that defendants 'unlawfully' listened to her calls and required no greater specificity as to the facts alleged. However, a simple allegation that defendants behaved 'unlawfully,' unsupported by any factual detail, is precisely the type of legal conclusion that a court is not bound to accept as true on a motion to dismiss, and the district court erred in doing so here.")

Nielsen v. Rabin, 746 F.3d 58, 64 (2d Cir. 2014) ("'Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief ... requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense' Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 679. We would love to live in a world where it is implausible for a doctor to disregard her oath and refuse to treat a patient she believed had attacked a female officer—just as we would love to live in a world where it is implausible for an employer to be so irrational as to refuse to hire a qualified applicant because of the applicant's skin color. Unfortunately, we do not. . .Taking the allegations in Nielsen's complaint and his opposition brief as true, Nielsen can plausibly allege that Dr. Rabin acted with a sufficiently culpable state of mind. . . If Nielsen's complaint were amended to include the allegations in his opposition to the motion to dismiss, the complaint would sufficiently set forth the mental state element of his deliberate indifference claim. Thus, amendment would not be futile. We therefore REVERSE the decision to deny leave to amend and REMAND to the District Court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Nielsen v. Rabin, 746 F.3d 58, 64-67 (2d Cir. 2014) (Jacobs, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. It is common ground that Nielsen's initial complaint was properly dismissed. It alleged that he received minimal medical treatment for serious injuries after police officers informed his treating physicians that Nielsen had attacked two of the officers. . .The majority and I agree that these allegations, even if proven, cannot sustain a Fourteenth Amendment due process claim for deliberate indifference. . .The holding of the majority is that an amended complaint would survive if augmented by two incremental allegations made in Nielsen's opposition to the motion to dismiss: that the officers accompanying Nielsen told Dr. Rabin that (1) one of the officers Nielsen attacked was a woman, and (2) Nielsen 'should be ignored and left alone.' I am of the view that these two allegations do not render plausible the claim that Dr. Rabin withheld medical services from a patient with serious visible injuries. . . It is implausible that a doctor would neglect a patient at the request of a malicious policeman. In any event, the claim is defeated by a review of the medical file (attached as an exhibit to the declaration of counsel in support of Dr. Rabin's motion to dismiss). It reflects that Nielsen did not report symptoms indicative of serious injury, that Nielsen was examined by multiple medical professionals, that some treatment was administered, that what was done reflected a medical consensus, and that Nielsen was told to return for follow-up attention. The claim thus becomes that two doctors violated their oaths and that a nurse falsely reported that Nielsen was in a low level of pain at the time of discharge, all at the behest of police officers who told the doctors that their patient should be neglected. This claim, which is absurd, is easily classed as implausible. . . .The majority opinion reflects two fallacies that are indulged with some frequency in our opinions. First, there is insufficient appreciation that this section 1983 action is a personal claim against the individual assets of Dr. Rabin, and that the defense costs of such a claim alone can wipe out a college fund or equity on a home. . . The plausibility test in cases such as this is a safeguard against a financial injustice that can often outweigh the harm claimed by a plaintiff. True, some or many defendants are indemnified by employers or insurers (though insurance may not cover intentional acts); but such an arrangement would be dehors the record, and may not be considered by us in deciding whether a claim survives through the expense of discovery and extended motion practice. See Gonzalez v. City of Schenectady, 728 F.3d 149, 162 n. 6 (2d Cir.2013). Second, the majority's ruling on plausibility unintentionally implies a certain disrespect for the ethics of doctors and nurses. The majority deems it plausible that each of these medical professionals (and all of them together) would allow a patient's suffering to go unabated at the say-so of policemen expressing hostility to a person in custody. We would never deem such dereliction plausible if alleged against a lawyer.")

Walker v. Schult, 717 F.3d 119, 126, 128, 130 (2d Cir. 2013) ("Walker plausibly alleged that his conditions of confinement at FCI Ray Brook deprived him of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and subjected him to unreasonable health and safety risks. He alleged that for approximately twenty-eight months, he was confined in a cell with five other men, with inadequate space and ventilation, stifling heat in the summer and freezing cold in the winter, unsanitary conditions, including urine and feces splattered on the floor, insufficient cleaning supplies, a mattress too narrow for him to lie on flat, and noisy, crowded conditions that made sleep difficult and placed him at constant risk of violence and serious harm from cellmates. Based on these allegations, we conclude that Walker has plausibly alleged cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . .In dismissing Walker's complaint, the district court improperly 'assay[ed] the weight of the evidence,'. . . and failed to draw all reasonable inferences in Walker's favor. For example, the district court found that Walker's failure to indicate 'the exact extent or duration of [his] exposure to unsanitary conditions' was fatal to his Eighth Amendment claim. Similarly, the court held that Walker's allegations of inadequate ventilation were insufficient because he did not provide any details about the temperatures in his cell. Such detailed allegations, however, are not required for a pro se complaint to survive a motion to dismiss. Moreover, Walker alleged that he was placed in the six-man cell on November 18, 2008 and was still there when he filed his complaint on March 16, 2011. He also alleged that it was so hot during the summer that he had difficulty breathing, and it was so cold during the winter that ice formed inside the cell windows. Drawing all reasonable inferences in Walker's favor, these allegations plausibly alleged that the conditions persisted for twenty-eight months and that the temperatures were extreme enough to state an Eighth Amendment claim. . . .In so holding, we reaffirm that each prisoner complaint alleging a constitutional violation must be carefully analyzed in light of the particular facts contained therein. Here, the specific facts in Walker's complaint plausibly alleged a violation of the Eighth Amendment. But each complaint is different, and courts have the power and duty to dismiss complaints that contain only conclusory, frivolous, or implausible allegations.")

Ruston v. Town Bd. for Town of Skaneateles, 610 F.3d 55, 59, 60 (2d Cir. 2010) ("District courts in our Circuit differ as to the impact of this pleading standard on a 'class of one' equal protection claim. . .This uncertainty is attributable to the tension between [i] this Court's decision in DeMuria v. Hawkes, 328 F.3d 704, 707 (2d Cir.2003), which held under a now-obsolete pleading standard that a 'class of one' claim is adequately pled ('albeit barely' so) even without specification of others similarly situated, and [ii] the Supreme Court's recent clarifications, which require that a complaint allege facts sufficient to establish 'a plausible claim for relief[.]'. . . We hold that the pleading standard set out in Iqbal supersedes the 'general allegation' deemed sufficient in DeMuria, 328 F.3d at 707. Under Iqbal, factual allegations must be sufficient to support necessary legal conclusions. . . . The Rustons' complaint fails to allege facts that 'plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief.' As to the Town defendants, the Rustons' argument appears to be that the Town refused to consider their application while considering applications submitted by those similarly situated. However, the Rustons do not allege specific examples of the Town's proceedings, let alone applications that were made by persons similarly situated. The equal protection claim as to the Town defendants therefore fails for lack of factual allegations to support the legal conclusion. As to the Village, the Rustons argue that other, similarly situated properties were allowed to connect to the Village's sewer system. The Rustons do identify several properties that allegedly were allowed to connect to the Village's sewer system, all of them individual homes or businesses that (like the Rustons' land) were outside the Village but within the Town. We credit, as we must, the factual allegations that these other properties received sewer access while the Rustons' property did not. Nevertheless the complaint fails to state a claim that would support relief. . . . None of these properties is similar to the Rustons' proposed 14-home development, let alone so similar that no rational person could see them as different. . . .As the Rustons fail to allege that properties sufficiently similar to theirs were treated more favorably by either the Village or the Town, they have failed to state a 'class of one' equal protection claim.") Arista Records, LLC v. Doe 3, 604 F.3d 110, 120, 121 (2d Cir. 2010) ("The Twombly plausibility standard, which applies to all civil actions, see Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1953, does not prevent a plaintiff from pleading facts alleged 'upon information and belief' where the facts are peculiarly within the possession and control of the defendant, see, e.g., Boykin v. KeyCorp, 521 F.3d 202, 215 (2d Cir.2008), or where the belief is based on factual information that makes the inference of culpability plausible, see Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949 . . . . Concluding that the complaint before it failed to state a plausible claim, the Twombly Court stated that '[i]n reaching this conclusion, we do not apply any "heightened" pleading standard,' id. at 569 n. 14 (emphasis added). Rather, it emphasized that its holding was consistent with its ruling in Swierkiewicz that 'a heightened pleading requirement,' requiring the pleading of ' "specific facts" beyond those necessary to state [a] claim and the grounds showing entitlement to relief,' was 'impermissibl[e],' Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570. . . . Nor did Iqbal heighten the pleading requirements. Rather, it reiterated much of the discussion in Twombly and rejected as insufficient a pleading that the Iqbal Court regarded as entirely conclusory. Accordingly, although Twombly and Iqbal require ' Afactual amplification [where] needed to render a claim plausible,"'. . . we reject Doe 3's contention that Twombly and

Shomo v. State of New York, 374 F. App'x 180, ___ (2d Cir. 2010) (not published) ("Appellant, pro se, appeals from the order of the United States District Court for the Western District of New York (Arcara, C.J.), sua sponte dismissing Appellant's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 complaint with leave to amend, pursuant to Rules 8 and 10 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e). . . . We conclude that, under either an abuse of discretion or de novo standard, the district court erred in dismissing Appellant's complaint, even with leave to amend, because many of Appellant's claims, if true, would be actionable under the Eighth Amendment, the Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12101 et seq. ("ADA"), and section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 794. While the district court afforded Appellant the opportunity to amend his complaint, Appellant's complaint was not so deficient as to require its dismissal at such an early stage of litigation. The jurisprudence involving Rule 8, traced from our decision in Salahuddin through the Supreme Court's recent Iqbal decision, is difficult to apply to the dismissal of a complaint containing too much detail, especially where the complaint is filed by a pro se litigant. . . . Notably, even after Twombly, where a litigant is proceeding pro se, courts remain 'obligated' to construe pro se complaints liberally. . . . Notwithstanding the length and detail of Appellant's complaint, his claims enunciate recognizable unconstitutional behavior. The day-to-day events described by Appellant concern the activities of his daily living: his need to be fed, bathed, and aided with toileting. While citing to numerous federal statutes (a practice not uncommon for pro se litigants), Appellant's claims centered around his disability and the alleged deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. He then amplified these claims, as required under Twombly and Iqbal, by making specific references to events that he claimed were evidence of such deliberate indifference. Insofar as he cited multiple civil rights statutes, '[t]he failure in a complaint to state a statute, or to cite the correct one, in no way affects the merits of a claim. Factual allegations alone are what matters.' Albert v. Carovano, 851 F.2d 561, 571 n. 3 (2d Cir.1988). In fact, while not a model of clarity, Appellant's complaint is neither 'unintelligible' nor 'a labrynthian prolixity of unrelated and vituperative charges that defied comprehension.'").

Turkmen v. Ashcroft, 589 F.3d 542, 546, 547 (2d Cir. 2009) ("We could undertake to decide whether the challenged claims satisfy the pleading standard of Twombly and Iqbal; however, in the circumstances of this case–where plaintiffs have already announced their intent to file a Fourth Amended Complaint to preserve for the putative class the claims asserted only by the settling plaintiffs-we think it better to vacate that portion of the district court's order denying dismissal of the conditions of confinement claims on the ground that an outdated pleading standard was applied, and to remand the case for further proceedings consistent with the standard articulated in Twombly and Iqbal. It may be that the district court will grant plaintiffs leave to file the proposed Fourth Amended Complaint to satisfy the heightened pleading standard. . . . If the district court denies leave to file the proposed Fourth Amended Complaint, it should evaluate the sufficiency of the Third Amended Complaint in light of the settlement and the heightened pleading standard. The district court can then address whether, under Twombly and Iqbal, the Third Amended Complaint fails to state a claim, or inadequately alleges the personal involvement of the moving defendants, or entitles the moving defendants to qualified immunity with respect to the conditions of confinement claims. At this stage of proceedings, we do no more than vacate the order denying the motions to dismiss with respect to the conditions of confinement claims, and remand to the district court for further proceedings.").

Boykin v. KeyCorp, 521 F.3d 202, 213-16 (2d Cir. 2008) ("We agree with the Iqbal panel's conclusion that Twombly focused on the plausibility of the complainant's claim for relief, although Iqbal does not offer much guidance to plaintiffs regarding when factual 'amplification [is] needed to render [a] claim plausible.' . . We need not locate the outer bounds of Twombly's new standard for assessing pleadings under Rule 8(a) here, because no amplification was necessary in this case. After Twombly, the Supreme Court issued another decision addressing the sufficiency of a pleading under Rule 8(a), but this time specifically for a complaint filed pro se. See Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007) (per curiam). The Court reversed the Tenth Circuit's dismissal of a prisoner's Eighth Amendment claim, holding that the court of appeals had 'depart[ed] from the liberal pleading standards' of Rule 8(a). . . The Court reiterated that '[s]pecific facts are not necessary,' and that the complainant 'need only Agive the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests."' . . But Erickson also emphasized that the court of appeals' departure from Rule 8(a)'s liberal pleading standard was particularly unwarranted because the complainant was pro se . . . . Twombly and Erickson explicitly disavow that Rule 8(a) requires any plaintiff–let alone a pro se plaintiff–to plead 'specific facts.' . . Moreover, as Boykin correctly observes, the names and records, if any, of persons who were not members of the protected classes and were more favorably treated in the loan application process is information particularly within KeyBank's knowledge and control. Pleading on the basis of information and belief is generally appropriate under such circumstances. . . . Boykin is correct that she did not need to allege discriminatory animus for her disparate treatment claim to be sufficiently pleaded. There is no heightened pleading requirement for civil rights complaints alleging racial animus . . . and this Court has found such claims sufficiently pleaded when the complaint stated simply that plaintiffs 'are African-Americans, describe[d] defendants' actions in detail, and allege[d] that defendants selected [plaintiffs] for maltreatment Asolely because of their color."'. . We have upheld the vitality of this principle since Twombly. . . Here, it is sufficient that Boykin's complaint states that she 'is an African American female,' describes KeyBank's actions with respect to her loan application and alleges that she 'was treated differently from similarly situated loan applicants ... because of her race, sex, and the location of the property in a predominantly African-American neighborhood.' In sum, Boykin's allegations, taken as true, indicate the possibility of discrimination and thus present a plausible claim of disparate treatment. The complaint gives KeyBank notice of Boykin's claim and the grounds upon which it rests that is sufficient to satisfy Rule 8(a). We emphasize that we are expressing no opinion regarding the merits of Boykin's claim. And that is precisely the point: even after Twombly, dismissal of a pro se claim as insufficiently pleaded is appropriate only in the most unsustainable of cases. The merits of a claim like Boykin's, which on its face presents a plausible allegation of disparate treatment, should be tested on summary judgment.").

In re Elevator Antitrust Litigation, 502 F.3d 47, 50 (2d Cir. 2007) ("A narrow view of Twombly would have limited its holding to the antitrust context, or perhaps only to Section 1 claims; but we have concluded that Twombly affects pleading standards somewhat more broadly. [citing Iqbal]").

Brown v. City of N.Y., No. 13-CV-06912, 2017 WL 1390678, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 17, 2017) ("Brown contends that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple gave gang members special privileges and responsibilities at GMDC. But Brown has not pled any specific facts that, if accepted as true, would establish that these defendants created this policy or allowed it to continue under their watch. For example, Brown does not allege that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple instructed specific correction officers to behave this way, nor does Brown claim that Laboriel, O'Connell, Beltz, and Skepple learned of and ignored specific instances of correction officers condoning attacks by the Bloods. The complaint's conclusory statements that these defendants' created an unconstitutional policy are thus insufficient to demonstrate their personal involvement in this case. . . . Brown's allegations about the false reports, though, are sufficient to establish the personal involvement of Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple. Brown contends that Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz and Captain Skepple authored false reports, and that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, and Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz 'signed off' on false reports prepared by others. . . Defendants cite the Second Circuit's decision in Williams v. Smith, 781 F.2d 319, 324 (2d Cir. 1986) for the proposition that 'the creation of an inaccurate report alone' does not constitute a constitutional violation. . . Here, however, Brown alleges not only that the incident reports were inaccurate, but also that the Individual Defendants who authored and reviewed them did so to retaliate against him for his complaint about CO James. Although 'a prison inmate has no general constitutional right to be free from being falsely accused in a misbehavior report,' the creation of a false report can infringe on an inmate's constitutional rights when it is used to retaliate against him for exercising a constitutional right. . . Since the complaint here plausibly suggests that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple had a retaliatory motive, the court cannot dismiss Brown's § 1983 claims against them for lack of personal involvement.")

Doe v. New York, No. 10 CV 1792(RJD)(VVP), 2012 WL 4503409, *10-*12 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2012) ("[I]f defendants admittedly promulgated written policies which limited or denied altogether Hepatitis treatment for symptomatic inmates who specifically requested treatment—or, as in several cases, whose treating physicians did so—it is certainly plausible that defendants had an unwritten policy to withhold diagnoses and treatment from asymptomatic inmates who did not request testing or treatment. Additionally, courts in this Circuit have repeatedly declined to dismiss allegations concerning similar instances of failing to inform inmates of their Hepatitis diagnosis over long periods of time, including pursuant to policies nearly identical to those alleged by plaintiffs in this case. . .The Court accordingly rejects defendants' plausibility challenge. . . .Thus although plaintiffs' claims against Governor Pataki in his individual capacity may proceed based on his alleged role in creating the Hepatitis policy, plaintiffs' claims brought pursuant to Section 1983 against all individually named DOCS officials are dismissed for failure to adequately allege personal involvement under Section 1983. The fatal flaws identified by the Court may be readily remedied, at least as to some of the individual DOCS defendants. Accordingly, plaintiffs may amend their complaint with respect to these defendants within thirty days of the date of this Order.")

Bradley v. Rell, No. 1:07-CV-0148 (GTS/RFT), 2010 WL 1257868, at *5 (N.D.N.Y. Mar. 26, 2010) ("As have other Circuits, the Second Circuit has recognized that the clarified plausibility standard that was articulated by the Supreme Court in Twombly governs all claims, including claims brought by pro se litigants (although the plausibility of those claims is to be assessed generously, in light of the special solicitude normally afforded pro se litigants). . . It should be emphasized that Fed.R.Civ.P. 8's plausibility standard, explained in Twombly, was in no way retracted or diminished by the Supreme Court's decision (two weeks later) in Erickson v. Pardus, in which (when reviewing a pro se pleading) the Court stated, "Specific facts are not necessary" to successfully state a claim under Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2). . .That statement was merely an abbreviation of the often-repeated point of law–first offered in Conley and repeated in Twombly–that a pleading need not 'set out in detail the facts upon which [the claim is based]' in order to successfully state a claim. . . That statement did not mean that all pleadings may achieve the requirement of 'fair notice' without ever alleging any facts whatsoever. Clearly, there must still be enough fact set out (however set out, whether in detail or in a generalized fashion) to raise a right to relief above the speculative level to a plausible level.").

Valenti v. Massapequa Union Free School Dist., No. 09-CV-977 (JFB)(MLO), 2010 WL 475203, at *4 n.5 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 5, 2010) ("The recent Supreme Court decisions in Iqbal and Twombly do not obviate this standard. Indeed, the Court in Twombly explicitly reaffirmed Swierkiewicz. 550 U.S. at 570 (citing Swierkiewicz, 534 U.S. at 508); see also Boykin v. Key Corp., 521 F.3d 202, 213 (2d Cir.2008) (noting that the Twombly Court "affirmed the vitality of Swierkiewicz"); Gilman v. Inner City Broadcasting Corp., No. 08 Civ. 8909(LAP), 2009 WL 3003244, at 3 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 18, 2009) (" Iqbal* was not meant to displace Swierkiewicz's teachings about pleading standards for employment discrimination claims because in Twombly, which heavily informed Iqbal, the Supreme Court explicitly affirmed the vitality of Swierkiewicz.").").

Kregler v. City of New York, No. 08 Civ. 6893(VM), 2009 WL 2524628, at 7-9, *12 (S.D.N.Y Aug. 17, 2009) ("Fundamentally, the 'plausibility' standard that the Supreme Court articulated in Twombly and Iqbal reflect [sic] one judicial means to part the wheat from the chaff in assessing the sufficiency of pleadings. Yet, as the case at hand illustrates and the law reports amply record, the problem persists, a sign of an intrinsic tension built into the federal rules. Whether in their factual allegations as originally crafted, or upon being granted leave to replead deficient claims, seasoned plaintiffs' counsel know to charge the pleadings with enough adjectives that reverberate of extreme malice, improper motives, and bad faith to raise factual issues sufficient to survive a dispositive motion, thus securing a hold on the defendant strong enough for the duration, however long and costly the ultimate resolution of the claim be. In practical terms, the philosophy of pleading that these rules embody, a one-rule-fits-all principle, defines the scope of the problem engendered by its unintended outcomes. . . . In consequence, the Court's Rule 12(i) hearing represented an effort to employ an infrequently used procedure to bring about speedier and better-informed resolution of a motion to dismiss involving serious accusations of violations of constitutional rights leveled against high-ranking government officials. This endeavor accords with guidance by the Supreme Court and the Second Circuit instructing district courts to exercise their broad discretion to guard public officials from being 'subjected to unnecessary and burdensome discovery or trial proceedings.'. . . As scheduled, the hearing was limited to two threshold issues raised in Defendants' objections to the pleadings in the Amended Complaint: the absence of sufficient allegations of personal involvement by various individual defendants in making the decision to reject Kregler's application, and lack of a causal connection between Kregler's endorsement of Morgenthau and the rejection of his application for appointment as a City Marshal. These questions constitute fundamental aspects of a sufficient claim of First Amendment retaliation, and are thus decisive in any review of whether the pleadings, as amplified by the pertinent record of the preliminary hearing, satisfy the Twombly/ Iqbal plausibility standard. To summarize its purpose and scope, Rule 12(i) authorizes the Court to conduct a preliminary hearing to consider and decide before trial a motion raising any defense listed in Rule 12(b)(1)-(7). See Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(i). As appropriate, the Court may use that procedure to determine jurisdictional as well as other threshold issues. . . . Here, on repleading to address deficiencies in the original complaint, Kregler described the threshold issues either in conclusory terms or with generalized allegations which still require substantial inferential leaps to make his claims plausible, rather than with well-pleaded facts that, accepted as true, plausibly suggest Defendants' retaliatory misconduct as the likely explanation for their rejection of Kregler's application. The Rule 12(i) hearing, even limiting the Court's consideration solely to Kregler's testimony on direct and cross-examination, confirms the Court's finding in this regard. . . . In terms of time, it took approximately five months from the Court's preliminary decision to order the Rule 12(i) hearing to the disposition of the case by the instant ruling. Thus, the Court was able to resolve this matter in a far shorter time than would have been required if it had denied Defendants' original motion to dismiss by reason of the closeness of the call at the initial review and thereby permitting the litigation to proceed into lengthier discovery and probably more time-consuming summary judgment motions– a process which, given the type of case involved, in this District would ordinarily consume as much as two years of litigation to conclude with the Court's determination.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

Garrett v. Wexford Health, No. 17-3480, 2019 WL 4265187, at *16-19 (3d Cir. Sept. 10, 2019) ("In assessing whether a pleading satisfies Rule 8, there is no bright-line rule to be applied. 'Inevitably, the sufficiency of a complaint must be determined on a case-by-case basis.'. . The circumstances surrounding the particular pleading, including the nature of the action, the sort of relief being sought, the availability of information, and other practical considerations must guide the inquiry into whether the litigant's statement of his claim qualifies as 'short and plain.'. .We first consider Rule 8's 'shor' statement requirement. Certainly, there can be no single 'proper length' for stating a particular claim. The level of factual detail will vary with the complexity of the claim asserted. . . But a district court acts within its discretion when it dismisses an excessively prolix and overlong complaint, particularly where a plaintiff declines an express invitation to better tailor her pleading. . . . Paying heed to the foregoing principles, the Seventh Circuit has held that a district court abuses its discretion when a pro se complaint is dismissed 'merely because it contains repetitious and irrelevant matter,' so long as that 'disposable husk [surrounds] ... a core of proper pleading.'. . Similarly, the Second Circuit has held that dismissal of pro se complaints 'is usually reserved for those cases in which the complaint is so confused, ambiguous, vague, or otherwise unintelligible that its true substance, if any, is well disguised.'. . It is apparent that the District Court abused its discretion in ordering dismissal here. The claims in Garrett's pro se FAC are sufficiently 'short' and 'plain,' and the FAC adequately puts a number of the defendants on notice of Garrett's claims and makes a sufficient showing of enough factual matter (when taken as true) to plausibly suggest that Garrett can satisfy the elements of his § 1983 claims. . . .In conclusion, there are claims in Garrett's pro se FAC against the Corrections Defendants that satisfy the 'short and plain statement' requirement. . . While the complaint is far from perfect, we cannot agree with the Magistrate Judge's assessment, adopted by the District Court, that 'Plaintiff's factual and legal allegations are, to a substantial extent, incomprehensible' and that the FAC contains 'virtually no detail as to who did what and when.'. .We are always mindful that the abuse of discretion standard of review is highly deferential. And we are not unsympathetic to the difficulties and frustrations the Magistrate Judge experienced in managing a case that involved various iterations of a complaint. Yet we simply cannot conclude that the District Court's sweeping dismissal of all the claims in the FAC was a proper exercise of discretion. We will therefore vacate and remand the matter for further proceedings.")

Hildebrand v. Allegheny County, No. 13–1321, 2014 WL 2898527, *11 (3d Cir. June 26, 2014) ("The District Court erred by applying Iqbal and Twombly to Hildebrand's pleading of the conditions precedent to filing suit under the ADEA. Iqbal and Twombly interpreted Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a), which governs the standard for pleading a claim for relief. The pleading of conditions precedent is governed by Rule 9(c), not Rule 8(a). Neither Iqbal nor Twombly purport to alter Rule 9. We see no indication that those cases sought to override the plain language of Rule 9(c), and we therefore conclude that the pleading of conditions precedent falls outside the strictures of Iqbal and Twombly.")

Lawal v. McDonald, 546 F. App'x 107, 113, 114 (3d Cir. 2014) ("As the District Court observed, the repeated and collective use of the word 'Defendants' 'fail[ed] to name which specific Defendant engaged in the specific conduct alleged.'. . As a result, the Amended Complaint is ambiguous about each Defendant's role in the operation and whether he committed the act himself or supervised other agents in doing so. In using the collective 'Defendants,' Plaintiffs alleged that each of the Defendants: (a) directed the PPA to send the letters to Plaintiffs advising them that they were entitled to a refund, to be picked up at the PPA facility; (b) attacked each driver, throwing him against a wall and handcuffing him; (c) was told by Plaintiffs that Plaintiffs were citizens; (d) interrogated each Plaintiff for more than one hour; (e) acknowledged to each Plaintiff that he 'had been mistakenly detained,' but (f) told them they were not permitted to leave; (g) held the Plaintiffs for several additional hours; and (h) prohibited them from speaking or standing. There is a serious question as to whether it is plausible that each of the three defendants committed all of the acts ascribed to them, particularly given the number of other individuals brought to the facility during the operation and the affidavits submitted with Defendants' motion to dismiss. . . In light of these ambiguities, the Amended Complaint may fail to meet Iqbal's directive that 'a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. .Moreover, given the very narrow potential claim upon which relief may be granted, it is difficult for Defendants to determine which of them are alleged to have held or directed others to hold Plaintiffs after their U.S. citizenship was verified and they were no longer suspected of violating the immigration laws. To the extent Plaintiffs seek to proceed on a theory of supervisory liability, the pleading likely requires further factual assertions linking the direction or act of an individual defendant to the alleged unconstitutional conduct. . .Thus, to resolve the ambiguity regarding the precise actions each individual Defendant allegedly took, we will provide Plaintiffs a final opportunity to file a pleading that provides the factual enhancements that specify the acts each individual Defendant . . . allegedly took, explains whether each Defendant personally engaged in the acts or if the actions were taken at the specific Defendant's direction, and includes facts concerning the reasonableness of Plaintiffs' detention. Of course, such a pleading must comply with Fed.R.Civ.P. 11. If Plaintiffs choose to file a Second Amended Complaint, the District Court will be free to entertain another motion to dismiss before permitting any discovery and determine whether Plaintiffs have alleged facts that demonstrate a specific Defendant plausibly engaged in an unreasonable seizure after they verified Plaintiffs' citizenship status, and, even if sufficiently alleged, whether the specific Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.")

James v. City of Wilkes-Barre, 700 F.3d 675, 680-682 (3d Cir. 2012) ("Mrs. James's assertion that she 'justifiably and reasonably believ[ed] herself compelled by law' to comply with Officer Marshall's request does not alter our conclusion. . . . By crediting these allegations, the District Court assumed that Mrs. James was 'compelled' to accompany her daughter to the hospital. This was error because whether she was in fact 'compelled' to do so is a legal conclusion. At the motion to dismiss stage, we accept as true all factual assertions, but we disregard threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, legal conclusions, and conclusory statements. . . Although Mrs. James asks us to accept as fact her assertion that she 'justifiably and reasonably believ[ed] herself compelled by law,' in reality it is a legal conclusion artfully pleaded as a factual assertion, which is not entitled to a presumption of truth. . . As far as relevant factual averments go, the Complaint pleads only that the officers 'insisted' that one parent accompany Nicole. As we have explained, insistence alone is insufficient to constitute a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. . . . The only fact that might point toward a seizure is Officer Marshall's threat that Mr. and Mrs. James would be charged with assisted manslaughter if they prevented Nicole from going to the hospital and she actually committed suicide. But that threat was not made in connection with Mrs. James's decision to accompany Nicole to the hospital; rather, it was made in the context of the parents agreeing to send Nicole to the hospital in the first place, which does not implicate a restriction on Mrs. James's freedom of movement. . . .For the reasons stated, we hold that Mrs. James was not seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Having found no constitutional violation, we hold that Officer Marshall is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Bistrian v. Levi, 696 F.3d 352, 368-71(3d Cir. 2012) ("After stripping away conclusory allegations not entitled to the presumption of truth, we conclude that Bistrian states a plausible failure-to-protect claim against the ten Prison Management Defendants, Lts. Rodgers and Robinson, and Sr. Officer Bowns based on Bistrian's placement in the recreation yard with Northington and his gang. First, Bistrian alleges that putting him in a locked recreation area with Northington et al. posed a substantial risk of serious harm because (a) Northington and others knew of Bistrian's cooperation with prison officials plus (b) Northington had a violent criminal past and had previously threatened to attack Bistrian in the recreation yard because of that cooperation. Second, Bistrian alleges that officials were deliberately indifferent to the obvious risk posed because they made no attempt to prevent his placement in the yard with Northington despite the fact that he (Bistrian) repeatedly advised the officials responsible for the photocopying operation of the threats Northington and others made. Third, Bistrian pleads causation: Northington and two other inmates violently attacked him on June 30, 2006 in the recreation yard because he cooperated with prison officials, not for some other reason. We consider the supporting factual allegations in further detail. . . . [T]he alleged number of tortfeasors in this case does not undermine the plausibility of the underlying torts. In Young v. Quinlan, we allowed an inmate's failure-to-protect claim to proceed past summary judgment when, among other things, he claimed to have 'told [ten named prison officials] several times that he was concerned for his safety and needed to be placed in protective custody,' and each of these ten officials had failed to respond reasonably to stop the assaults by other inmates. . . Here too the fact that Bistrian claims to have specifically warned eight officials of the risks he faced does not transform his allegations into impermissible 'group pleading.'. . . In sum, Bistrian has stated a plausible claim that thirteen officials violated their constitutional duty to protect him from inmate violence by being deliberately indifferent to the risk posed by his placement in the recreation yard with Northington and others who knew of his prior complicity with prison authorities. If this claim fails to survive a motion to dismiss, little does.")

Green v. New Jersey, No. 12–1517, 2012 WL 3641995, *1, *2 (3d Cir. Aug. 27, 2012) (not published) ("We agree with the District Court that, as drafted, the complaint fails to state a claim on which relief may be granted. To avoid dismissal, a complaint's '[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.'. . The complaint 'must not be "so undeveloped that it does not provide a defendant the type of notice of claim which is contemplated by [Fed.R.Civ.P. 8]"'. . . Green's complaint fails to satisfy these standards. . . Nevertheless, prior to dismissing a pro se complaint under § 1915(e), a District Court must give the plaintiff an opportunity to amend his pleading to cure the defect unless such an amendment would be inequitable or futile. . . The District Court neither informed Green that he could amend his complaint, nor did it determine that any amendment would be inequitable or futile. On the current record, we cannot exclude the possibility that Green, who is litigating his case pro se, might plead additional facts in an amended complaint that will state a claim for relief. Thus, while we express no view as to whether Green will ultimately plead any meritorious claims, we conclude that the District Court erred in dismissing the complaint without providing Green leave to amend. Accordingly, we will summarily vacate the District Court's order dismissing the case with prejudice and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Burtch v. Milberg Factors, Inc., No. 10-2818, 2011 WL 5027511, at *5 (3d Cir. Oct. 24, 2011)("To determine the sufficiency of a complaint under Twombly and Iqbal, we must take the following three steps: First, the court must 'tak[e] note of the elements a plaintiff must plead to state a claim.' Second, the court should identify allegations that, 'because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth.' Finally, 'where there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement for relief.'")

Argueta v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 72, 74-77 (3d Cir. 2011) ("[W]e assume for purposes of this appeal that a federal supervisory official may be liable in certain circumstances even though he or she did not directly participate in the underlying unconstitutional conduct. The District Court specifically concluded that a Fourth Amendment claim does not require a showing of a discriminatory purpose and that Plaintiffs could therefore proceed under a 'knowledge and acquiescence' theory. Plaintiffs acknowledge that the 'terminology' used to describe 'supervisory liability' is 'often mixed.'. . They contend that a supervisor may be held liable in certain circumstances for a failure to train, supervise, and discipline subordinates. . . . We accordingly stated in a § 1983 action that '[p]ersonal involvement can be shown through allegations of personal direction or of actual knowledge and acquiescence.' Rode v. Dellarciprete, 845 F.2d 1195, 1207 (3d Cir.1988). . . We further indicated that a supervisor may be liable under § 1983 if he or she implements a policy or practice that creates an unreasonable risk of a constitutional violation on the part of the subordinate and the supervisor's failure to change the policy or employ corrective practices is a cause of this unconstitutional conduct. . . . Having addressed the legal elements that a plaintiff must plead to state a legally cognizable claim, we turn to the remaining steps identified by Iqbal: (1) identifying those allegations that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to any assumption of truth; and (2) then determining whether the well-pleaded factual allegations plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief. . . We acknowledge that Plaintiffs filed an extensive and carefully drafted pleading, which certainly contained a number of troubling allegations especially with respect to alleged unconstitutional behavior on the part of lower-ranking ICE agents. Plaintiffs are also correct that, even after Iqbal, we must continue to accept all factual allegations as true, construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and then determine whether a reasonable inference may be drawn that the defendant is liable for the alleged misconduct. . . .[W]e ultimately conclude that, like Iqbal, Plaintiffs failed to allege a plausible Bivens claim against the four Appellants. Initially, certain allegations in the Second Amended Complaint were conclusory in nature and merely provided, at best, a 'framework' for the otherwise appropriate factual allegations. . . For instance, the broad allegations regarding the existence of a 'culture of lawlessness' are accorded little if any weight in our analysis. . . We further note that the relevant counts in the pleading contained boilerplate allegations mimicking the purported legal standards for liability, which we do not assume to be true. We also must reject certain broad characterizations made by the District Court, which were not supported by either the actual factual allegations in the Second Amended Complaint or reasonable inferences from such allegations. Most significantly, the District Court went too far by stating that Myers and Torres 'worked on these issues everyday.'. . Turning to the non-conclusory factual allegations in the Second Amended Complaint, we begin with the critical issue of notice. Plaintiffs did reference an impressive amount of documentation that allegedly provided notice to Appellants of their subordinates' unconstitutional conduct. However, these alleged sources of notice were fatally flawed in one way or another. Broadly speaking, we must point out the typical 'notice' case seems to involve a prior incident or incidents of misconduct by a specific employee or group of employees, specific notice of such misconduct to their superiors, and then continued instances of misconduct by the same employee or employees. The typical case accordingly does not involve a 'knowledge and acquiescence' claim premised, for instance, on reports of subordinate misconduct in one state followed by misconduct by totally different subordinates in a completely different state. . . . Second, we observe that allegations specifically directed against Appellants themselves (unlike the allegations directed at the agents who actually carried out the raids) described conduct consistent with otherwise lawful behavior. . . In other words, a federal official specifically charged with enforcing federal immigration law appears to be acting lawfully when he or she increases arrest goals, praises a particular enforcement operation as a success, or characterizes a home entry and search as an attempt to locate someone (i.e., a fugitive alien). In fact, the qualified immunity doctrine exists to encourage vigorous and unflinching enforcement of the law. . . .We also agree with Appellants' assertion that Plaintiffs themselves did not really identify in their pleading what exactly Appellants should have done differently, whether with respect to specific training programs or other matters, that would have prevented the unconstitutional conduct. . . . We also cannot overlook the fact that Appellants themselves occupied relatively high-ranking positions in the federal hierarchy. . . .[T]he context here involved, at the very least, two very high-ranking federal officials based in Washington D.C. who were charged with supervising the enforcement of federal immigration law throughout the country (as well as two other officials responsible for supervising such enforcement throughout an entire state). . . . [W]e wish to emphasize that our ruling here does not leave Plaintiffs without any legal remedy for the alleged violation of the United States Constitution. Chavez, Galindo, and W.C. are still free to pursue their official capacity claims for injunctive relief against any further intimidation or unlawful entry into their home. Also, we do not address Plaintiffs' individual capacity claims for damages against the lower-ranking ICE agents named in the Second Amended Complaint.") Santiago v. Warminster Tp., 629 F.3d 121, 128-34 & n.8, n.10 (3d Cir. 2010) ("While we conclude that the Third Amended Complaint can be read as alleging liability based on the Supervising Officers' own acts, we will nevertheless affirm the District Court's ruling because those allegations fail to meet the pleading requirements set forth by the Supreme Court in Twombly and *Iqbal. . . . [A]ny claim that supervisors directed others to violate constitutional rights necessarily includes as an element an actual violation at the hands of subordinates. In addition, a plaintiff must allege a causal connection between the supervisor's direction and that violation, or, in other words, proximate causation. . . . Therefore, to state her claim against Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly, Santiago needs to have pled facts plausibly demonstrating that they directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in a manner that they 'knew or should reasonably have known would cause [Alpha Team] to deprive [Santiago] of her constitutional rights.'. . .As to her claim against Lt. Springfield, Santiago must allege facts making it plausible that 'he had knowledge of [Alpha Team's use of excessive force during the raid]' and 'acquiesced in [Alpha Team's] violations.'. . . Numerous courts, including this one, have expressed uncertainty as to the viability and scope of supervisory liability after Iqbal. . . . Because we hold that Santiago's pleadings fail even under our existing supervisory liability test, we need not decide whether Iqbal requires us to narrow the scope of that test. . . . Santiago alleges that the plan developed and authorized by Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly 'specifically sought to have all occupants exit the Plaintiff's home, one at a time, with hands raised under threat of fire, patted down for weapons, and then handcuffed until the home had been cleared and searched.' Because this is nothing more than a recitation of what Santiago says the Alpha Team members did to her, it amounts to a conclusory assertion that what happened at the scene was ordered by the supervisors. While the allegations regarding Alpha Team's conduct are factual and more than merely the recitation of the elements of a cause of action, the allegation of supervisory liability is, in essence, that 'Murphy and Donnelly told Alpha team to do what they did' and is thus a 'formulaic recitation of the elements of a [supervisory liability] claim,' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct.. at 1951 (internal quotation marks omitted)–namely that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed others in the violation of Santiago's rights. Saying that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly 'specifically sought' to have happen what allegedly happened does not alter the fundamentally conclusory character of the allegation. . . Our conclusion in this regard is dictated by the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal. . . . In short, Santiago's allegations are 'naked assertion[s]' that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in the allegedly excessive manner that they did and that Lt. Springfield acquiesced in Alpha Team's acts. As mere restatements of the elements of her supervisory liability claims, they are not entitled to the assumption of truth. However, it is crucial to recognize that our determination that these particular allegations do not deserve an assumption of truth does not end the analysis. It may still be that Santiago's supervisory liability claims are plausible in light of the non-conclusory factual allegations in the complaint. We therefore turn to those allegations to determine whether the claims are plausible. . . . In summary, the allegations against Alpha Team are that the officers ordered everyone to exit the house one at a time; that Santiago exited first under threat of fire; that Santiago was patted down in a demeaning fashion, found to be unarmed, and subsequently handcuffed; that the remaining occupants of the home then exited, some of whom were handcuffed while others were not; that Santiago's daughter was coerced into consenting to a search of the home; and that Santiago was left restrained for thirty minutes while her home was searched, during which time she had a heart attack. The question then becomes whether those allegations make it plausible that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in a manner that they 'knew or should reasonably have known would cause [Alpha Team] to deprive [Santiago] of her constitutional rights,'. . . or that Lt. Springfield 'had knowledge [that Alpha Team was using excessive force during the raid]' and 'acquiesced in [Alpha Team's] violations.'. . . [T]here is no basis in the complaint to conclude that excessive force was used on anyone except Santiago. Even if someone else had been subjected to excessive force, it is clear that the occupants were not being treated uniformly. Thus, Santiago's allegations undercut the notion of a plan for all occupants to be threatened with fire and handcuffed. While it is possible that there was such a plan, and that Alpha Team simply chose not to follow it, 'possibility' is no longer the touchstone for pleading sufficiency after Twombly and *Iqbal. Plausibility is what matters. Allegations that are 'merely consistent with a defendant's liability' or show the 'mere possibility of misconduct' are not enough. . . Here, given the disparate treatment of the occupants of the home, one plausible explanation is that the officers simply used their own discretion in determining how to treat each occupant. In contrast with that 'obvious alternative explanation' for the allegedly excessive use of force, the inference that the force was planned is not plausible. Where, as here, an operation results in the use of allegedly excessive force against only one of several people, that use of force does not, by itself, give rise to a plausible claim for supervisory liability against those who planned the operation. To hold otherwise would allow a plaintiff to pursue a supervisory liability claim anytime a planned operation resulted in excessive force, merely by describing the force used and appending the phrase 'and the Chief told them to do it.' Iqbal requires more. . . . We next ask whether the allegation that Lt. Springfield was placed in charge of the operation, coupled with what happened during the operation, makes it plausible that Lt. Springfield knew of and acquiesced in the use of excessive force against Santiago. Again, we conclude that it does not. The complaint implies but does not allege that Lt. Springfield was present during the operation. Assuming he was present, however, the complaint still does not aver that he knew of the allegedly excessive force, nor does it give rise to the reasonable inference that he was aware of the level of force used against one individual. . . . In sum, while Santiago's complaint contains sufficient allegations to show that the Supervising Officers planned and supervised the operation and that, during the operation, Alpha Team used arguably excessive force, her allegations do nothing more than assert the element of liability that the Supervising Officers specifically called for or acquiesced in that use of force. . . . The Third Amended Complaint was filed after the close of discovery. Consequently, there is no reason to believe that Santiago's conclusory allegations were simply the result of the relevant evidence being in the hands of the defendants. Under *Iqbal, however, the result would be the same even had no discovery been completed. We recognize that plaintiffs may face challenges in drafting claims despite an information asymmetry between plaintiffs and defendants. Given that reality, reasonable minds may take issue with Iqbal and urge a different balance between ensuring, on the one hand, access to the courts so that victims are able to obtain recompense and, on the other, ensuring that municipalities and police officers are not unnecessarily subjected to the burdens of litigation. . . The Supreme Court has struck the balance, however, and we abide by it.")

West Penn Allegheny Health System, Inc. v. UPMC, 627 F.3d 85, 98 (3d Cir. 2010) ("The District Court opined that judges presiding over antitrust and other complex cases must act as 'gatekeepers,' and must subject pleadings in such cases to heightened scrutiny. The District Court's gloss on Rule 8, however, is squarely at odds with Supreme Court precedent. Although Twombly acknowledged that discovery in antitrust cases 'can be expensive,' . . . it expressly rejected the notion that a ' "heightened" pleading standard' applies in antitrust cases. . . and Iqbal made clear that Rule 8's pleading standard applies with the same level of rigor in ' "all civil actions[]"'. . . . It is, of course, true that judging the sufficiency of a pleading is a context-dependent exercise. . . Some claims require more factual explication than others to state a plausible claim for relief. . . For example, it generally takes fewer factual allegations to state a claim for simple battery than to state a claim for antitrust conspiracy. . . But, contrary to the able District Court's suggestion, this does not mean that Twombly's plausibility standard functions more like a probability requirement in complex cases. We conclude that it is inappropriate to apply Twombly's plausibility standard with extra bite in antitrust and other complex cases.")

In re Insurance Brokerage Antitrust Litigation, 618 F.3d 300, 319 n.17 (3d Cir. 2010 ("Although Fowler v. UPMC Shadyside, 578 F.3d 203 (3d Cir.2009), stated that Twombly and Iqbal had 'repudiated' the Supreme Court's earlier decision in Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002), see Fowler, 578 F.3d at 211, we are not so sure. Clearly, Twombly and Iqbal inform our understanding of Swierkiewicz, but the Supreme Court cited Swierkiewicz approvingly in Twombly, see 550 U.S. at 555-56, 127 S.Ct. 1955, and expressly denied the plaintiffs' charge that Swierkiewicz 'runs counter' to Twombly's plausibility standard, id. at 569-70, 127 S.Ct. 1955. As the Second Circuit has observed, Twombly 'emphasized that its holding was consistent with [the Court's] ruling in Swierkiewicz that "a heightened pleading requirement," requiring the pleading of "specific facts beyond those necessary to state [a] claim and the grounds showing entitlement to relief," was "impermissibl[e]."' Arista Records, 604 F.3d at 120 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (alterations in Arista Records).) In any event, Fowler's reference to Swierkiewicz appears to be dicta, as Fowler found the complaint before it to be adequate. 578 F.3d at 212; see also id. at 211 ('The demise of Swierkiewicz, however, is not of significance here.')").

Fowler v. UPMC Shadyside, 578 F.3d 203, 209, 210 (3d Cir. 2009) ("Standards of pleading have been in the forefront of jurisprudence in recent years. Beginning with the Supreme Court's opinion in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), continuing with our opinion in Phillips, supra., and culminating recently with the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1955, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), pleading standards have seemingly shifted from simple notice pleading to a more heightened form of pleading, requiring a plaintiff to plead more than the possibility of relief to survive a motion to dismiss. . . . The Supreme Court's opinion in Iqbal extends the reach of Twombly, instructing that all civil complaints must contain 'more than an unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation.'. . Therefore, after Iqbal, when presented with a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, district courts should conduct a two-part analysis. First, the factual and legal elements of a claim should be separated. The District Court must accept all of the complaint's well-pleaded facts as true, but may disregard any legal conclusions. . . Second, a District Court must then determine whether the facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient to show that the plaintiff has a 'plausible claim for relief.'. . Inasmuch as this is an employment discrimination case, we asked the parties to comment on the continued viability of the Supreme Court's decision in Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002). In Swierkiewicz, the Supreme Court held that a complaint alleging unlawful employment discrimination did not have to satisfy a heightened pleading requirement. The complaint in that case was said to be sufficient because it 'detailed the events leading to [the plaintiff's] termination, provided relevant dates, and included the ages and nationalities of at least some of the relevant persons involved with his termination.'. . The Supreme Court in Swierkiewicz expressly adhered to Conley's then-prevailing 'no set of facts' standard and held that the complaint did not have to satisfy a heightened standard of pleading. . . Swierkiewicz and Iqbal both dealt with the question of what sort of factual allegations of discrimination suffice for a civil lawsuit to survive a motion to dismiss, but Swierkiewicz is based, in part, on Conley, which the Supreme Court cited for the proposition that Rule 8 'relies on liberal discovery rules and summary judgment motions to define disputed facts and issues and to dispose of unmeritorious claims.'. .We have to conclude, therefore, that because Conley has been specifically repudiated by both Twombly and Iqbal, so too has Swierkiewicz, at least insofar as it concerns pleading requirements and relies on Conley. . . The demise of Swierkiewicz, however, is not of significance here. We had already extended our holding in Phillips, to the employment discrimination context. In Wilkerson v. New Media Technology Charter School, Inc., 522 F.3d 315 (3d Cir.2008), a terminated charter-school teacher brought an action claiming that she was fired for retaliation and her religious beliefs. The teacher pleaded that she was fired because of her ' AChristian religious beliefs," her refusal to engage in the Alibations ceremony," and her Acomplaints related to the ceremony."'. . We held that the 'plausibility paradigm announced in Twombly applies with equal force to analyzing the adequacy of claims of employment discrimination.'").

Wilkerson v. New Media Technology Charter School Inc., 522 F.3d 315, 322 (3rd Cir. 2008) ("Today, we extend our holding in Phillips to the employment discrimination context. The plausibility paradigm announced in Twombly applies with equal force to analyzing the adequacy of claims of employment discrimination.").

Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 515 F.3d 224, 230-34 (3rd Cir. 2008) ("What makes Twombly's impact on the Rule 12(b)(6) standard initially so confusing is that it introduces a new 'plausibility' paradigm for evaluating the sufficiency of complaints. At the same time, however, the Supreme Court never said that it intended a drastic change in the law, and indeed strove to convey the opposite impression; even in rejecting Conley's 'no set of facts' language, the Court does not appear to have believed that it was really changing the Rule 8 or Rule 12(b)(6) framework. . . . In determining how Twombly has changed this standard, we start with what Twombly expressly leaves intact. The Supreme Court reaffirmed that Fed.R.Civ.P. 8 ' Arequires only a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief," in order to Agive the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests,"' and that this standard does not require 'detailed factual allegations.' . . . [T]he Twombly decision focuses our attention on the 'context' of the required short, plain statement. Context matters in notice pleading. Fair notice under Rule 8(a)(2) depends on the type of case–some complaints will require at least some factual allegations to make out a 'showing that the pleader is entitled to relief, in order to give the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.' Twombly, 127

S.Ct. at 1964. Indeed, taking Twombly and the Court's contemporaneous opinion in Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007), together, we understand the Court to instruct that a situation may arise where, at some point, the factual detail in a complaint is so undeveloped that it does not provide a defendant the type of notice of claim which is contemplated by Rule 8. . . . The second important concept we take from the Twombly opinion is the rejection of Conley's 'no set of facts' language. In rejecting the Conley language, the Supreme Court was careful to base its analysis in pre-existing principles. . .The Court emphasized throughout its opinion that it was neither demanding a heightened pleading of specifics nor imposing a probability requirement. . . Indeed, the Court cited Twombly just days later as authority for traditional Rule 8 and 12(b)(6) principles. See Erickson, 127 S.Ct. at 2200. Thus, under our reading, the notice pleading standard of Rule 8(a)(2) remains intact, and courts may generally state and apply the Rule 12(b)(6) standard, attentive to context and an showing that 'the pleader is entitled to relief, in order to give the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.' Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1964. . . . The more difficult question raised by Twombly is whether the Supreme Court imposed a new 'plausibility' requirement at the pleading stage that materially alters the notice pleading regime. . . The answer to this question is difficult to divine. Numerous references to 'plausibility' in Twombly seem to counsel reliance on the concept as a standard for notice pleading. . . . Yet, the Twombly decision repeatedly indicated that the Court was not adopting or applying a 'heightened pleading standard.'. . . The issues raised by Twombly are not easily resolved, and likely will be a source of controversy for years to come. Therefore, we decline at this point to read Twombly so narrowly as to limit its holding on plausibility to the antitrust context. Reading Twombly to impose a 'plausibility' requirement outside the § 1 context, however, leaves us with the question of what it might mean. 'Plausibility' is related to the requirement of a Rule 8 'showing.' In its general discussion, the Supreme Court explained that the concept of a 'showing' requires only notice of a claim and its grounds, and distinguished such a showing from 'a pleader's Abare averment that he wants relief and is entitled to it.'" Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1965 n. 3. . . . The Supreme Court's Twombly formulation of the pleading standard can be summed up thus: 'stating ... a claim requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest' the required element. Id. This 'does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage,' but instead 'simply calls for enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of' the necessary element. . . . That is to say, there must be some showing sufficient to justify moving the case beyond the pleadings to the next stage of litigation. The complaint at issue in this case clearly satisfies this pleading standard, making a sufficient showing of enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest the required elements of Phillips' claims.").

Mitchell v. Township of Willingboro Municipality Government, 913 F.Supp.2d 62, 67, 68, 72 (D.N.J. 2012) ("The Third Circuit has cautioned against dismissing a case based on qualified immunity on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion because 'it is generally unwise to venture into a qualified immunity analysis at the pleading stage as it is necessary to develop the factual record in the vast majority of cases.' Newland v. Reehorst, 328 F. App'x 788, 791 n. 3 (3d Cir.2009). While the issue of whether a right is clearly established and whether a reasonable officer could have believed his actions were lawful are questions of law for the court to decide, the Court does not consider facts outside the pleadings in assessing these issues. The Third Circuit has clearly held that 'qualified immunity will be upheld on a 12(b)(6) motion only when the immunity is established on the face of the complaint.' Thomas v. Independence Township, 463 F.3d 285, 291 (3d Cir.2006). In this case, the court confirms its previous holding that the Plaintiff has sufficiently pled a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights by Defendant Perez. . . Plaintiff's complaint alleges that Officer Perez received a 9–1–1 dispatch call to pull over a blue Honda Accord with no license plates that had been speeding down a nearby road. Plaintiff alleges his car was a green Honda Accord with a Pennsylvania license plate and that he was not committing any traffic violations at the time he was pulled over by Officer Perez. Plaintiff further argues his Honda Accord had a rear Pennsylvania license plate and that Pennsylvania does not require a license plate on the front of the car. Plaintiff maintains Defendant Perez used the 9–1–1 dispatch call as a pretext to make the stop and Plaintiff avers the only reason he was pulled over was because he is an African American male. This sufficiently alleges a deprivation of a constitutional right and plausibly states a claim under the Fourth Amendment. With regard to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, it is well established that an officer must have an articulable and reasonable suspicion that the driver has committed a motor vehicle offense in order to conduct an investigatory stop. . . Defendant Perez does not argue that Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights in this case were not clearly established. Consequently, the Plaintiff's complaint satisfies the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. Therefore, the court concludes it is inappropriate to dismiss this case on qualified immunity grounds at the pleading stage. Here, the immunity is not established on the face of the complaint. The Plaintiff adequately alleges a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights and these rights were clearly established at the time of the incident. . . . Therefore, since the law was clear at the time of the incident that reasonable suspicion was required to conduct an investigatory stop, Defendant Perez can be granted qualified immunity only if his conduct in stopping Plaintiff's car was a violation a reasonable officer could have committed. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff as the non-moving party, the court concludes a reasonable officer would not have conducted an investigatory stop of the Plaintiff in this situation and a jury could conclude reasonable suspicion did not exist.")

Zenquis v. City of Philadelphia, 861 F.Supp.2d 522, 529 (E.D. Pa. 2012) ("To support the inference of an agreement among the officer defendants and the private individuals who assaulted him, Zenquis relies principally on the allegation that the private individuals 'had spoken to at least one or more of the individual [police] defendants, and were told ... that they should detain [Zenquis] and that they would be permitted to use force against [Zenquis].'. . This is consistent with and buttressed by the allegations, earlier in the amended complaint, that at least some of the officer defendants were canvassing the Kensington neighborhood for several hours prior to the assault, advising private citizens (including both the perpetrators of the alleged assault and others) to use force to detain Zenquis. . . Finally, the amended complaint alleges that 'civilians who spoke with the individual defendants ... received the clear message from the officers that they would be free to assault the plaintiff with impunity.'. . .Taken together, these allegations are adequate to state a claim for conspiracy. According to the complaint, the private individuals who assaulted Zenquis were urged by the police to do so, were told they could use force to do so, and understood this to mean that they could assault Zenquis "with impunity." That is a sufficient basis, at the pleading stage, to ground an inference that there was an agreement between at least some of the officer defendants and the private actors to violate Zenquis's Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizure. In context, it is not implausible that the police would commit themselves to such an agreement during the frenetic search for a suspect wanted for a sensational crime; the plausibility of the conspiracy allegation is further bolstered by the allegation that the police licensed similar behavior in capturing the actual rapist the following day. At the very least, Zenquis has put the defendants on notice of the nature of the conspiracy claim with sufficiently detailed factual allegations to justify discovery.")

Morris v. Philadelphia Housing Authority, No. 10-5431, 2011 WL 1661506, at 3-5 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 28, 2011) ("District Court Judges have experienced difficulty in interpreting the Supreme Court's intent in Twombly and Iqbal. Particularly in the civil rights context, in Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, the Supreme Court specifically held that notice pleading under Rule 8 was proper. . . The difficulty in following Leatherman is that its holding appears to be significantly undermined by Iqbal, yet Leatherman is not cited in either the majority or dissenting opinions of Iqbal. Further, before Twombly and Iqbal, the Third Circuit expressly held that the complaint in a civil rights case is subject to the liberal notice pleading standard of Rule 8(a). . . The Third Circuit has not yet issued a precedential opinion squaring its holding in Evancho with those of Twombly and Iqbal. but it did discuss the implications of Twomblv in Phillips, a § 1983 case. . . The undersigned, formerly a member of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules, knows that many practitioners and judges share in the confusion resulting from *Iqbal'*s seemingly strong requirement of factual pleadings in the absence of any specific overruling of prior cases allowing traditional notice pleading. The Court concludes that notice pleading is still the rule, because Rule 8 is still in effect, but that the concept of notice pleading has changed and must be accompanied by either factual or legal assertions satisfying the elements of the claims made. . . In other words, 'notice pleading' now requires 'notice' of at least those facts necessary to raise an inference that Plaintiff has a claim. . . .The plausibility standard calls for enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of the necessary elements of the claims. . . . Plaintiff's Complaint in its current form does not raise this reasonable expectation.")

RHJ Medical Center, Inc. v. City of DuBois, 754 F.Supp.2d 723, 731 -733 (W.D. Pa. 2010) ("While the Third Circuit has not definitively resolved this issue, a number of district courts within the Third Circuit, . . . as well as other Courts of Appeals . . . have applied the Iqbal standard to motions filed under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c). This Court is inclined to agree, though this decision will have several consequences that may not have been discussed elsewhere. For decades, granting a motion for judgment on the pleadings was only appropriate where the movant 'clearly establishes that no material issue of fact remains to be resolved and that he is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'. . Generally, federal courts were reluctant to grant a Rule 12(c) Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings, because it provides for summary disposition of a party's claim on the merits before discovery. . . These prior standards mirrored the previous notice pleading standard articulated in Conley . . . but Iqbal changed the game. . . Iqbal effected not only motions to dismiss, but has also impacted motions for judgments on the pleading, and imported the higher burden of 'plausibility.' Applying the Iqbal standard will likely make it tougher for complaints to survive motions under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c). Yet, to do otherwise would frustrate Iqbal In many cases, motions filed under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c) and 12(b)(6) are complimentary and largely interchangeable–the key difference being that the right to file motions under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) is waived if an answer is filed. A plaintiff should not be able to benefit from a weaker standard and higher probability of success under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c) than he would under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(6). The burden of proof on the Plaintiff should increase at each stage of litigation. . . . Iqbal has also impacted the manner in which courts must assess subject matter jurisdiction, even when considering a motion for judgment on the pleadings. Historically, when considering whether to dismiss a case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(1), the Court generally 'must accept the allegations in the complaint as true and determine whether they are sufficient to invoke its jurisdiction.'. . Now, the Plaintiff 'has the burden of establishing that subject matter jurisdiction exists within the parameters of the "plausibility" standard established by Twombly and Iqbal when confronted with Defendant's 12(b)(1) motion to dismiss.'").

Major Tours, Inc. v. Colorel, 720 F.Supp.2d 587, 605, 606 (D.N.J. 2010) ("The Complaint contains abundant allegations of racially-motivated discrimination, which are summarized at the beginning at the first paragraph: 'Because of Plaintiffs' race, Defendants and their associates have targeted their buses for improper, illegal, and unreasonably burdensome stops, inspections, and seizures.' (Compl.¶ 1) Plaintiffs allege, among other things, that Defendants and their agents gathered near certain casinos known to have primarily African American clienteles in order to stop buses in a racially discriminatory manner (Id. ¶ 26); that Defendants exercised their discretion with racially discriminatory intentions, targeting Plaintiffs' buses for towing because of Plaintiffs' race (Id. ¶ 30); and that Defendants often require Plaintiffs–on account of their race–to have their buses towed away (Id. ¶ 34). Each of these is a specific allegation of a discriminatory act taken for racially discriminatory reasons, and supported by further allegations of white owned buses being subjected to differential treatment. Defendants maintain that these statements are too conclusory, but they are not. . . . Unlike the defendants in *Iqbal, Defendants in this case have offered no nondiscriminatory reason for any of the racially discriminatory behavior specifically alleged in the Complaint, nor is there any obvious nondiscriminatory explanation for the disparate treatment alleged by Plaintiffs. There is no obvious and lawful purpose that explains, for example, why inspectors would target casinos frequented by African Americans for bus safety inspections, or why they would permit white operated buses to repair violations on-site while requiring Plaintiffs to be towed. Rule 8 does not require plaintiffs who are pleading a pattern of racially discriminatory conduct to include all of the evidence that suggests that the conduct was a result of racially discriminatory intentions rather than the byproduct of some legitimate purpose. . . . Instead, they must simply allege enough facts to nudge the claim into the realm of the plausible. Therefore, the factual allegations in the current complaint regarding racially discriminatory purpose are sufficiently concrete with respect to the investigator defendants.")

Southersby Development Corp. v. Borough of Jefferson Hills, No. 09-208, 2010 WL 1576465, at *4 (W.D. Pa. Apr. 20, 2010) ("The Defendants initially challenged the sufficiency of the substantive due process claim made in Southersby's original Complaint. Before those first Motions to Dismiss could be considered, Southersby filed the Amended Complaint (Doc. 21), adding four paragraphs clearly intended to rectify any deficiencies in pleading the 'shocks the conscience' requirement: 22. Defendants' unequal and unlawful actions ... were motivated by bias against the plaintiff as a non-resident developer and intended to financially injure plaintiff in retaliation for exercising its constitutionally-protected right to contest Jefferson Hill's [sic] attempts to charge and collect certain legal escrow fees and storm and sanitary sewer tap fees relative to the development of Patriot Pointe. 23. Upon information and belief, McVicker and other agents of Jefferson Hills have personal or business relationships with land developers or individuals who reside in the Borough and who stand to gain a profit or benefit from the failure of the Patriot Pointe development or from the plaintiff [halting] further land development. 24. The defendants engaged in corruption and self-dealing such that their unlawful actions ... were motivated by an intent to harm the plaintiff and interfere with the development of Patriot for the purpose of benefitting, financially or otherwise, the defendants or resident land developers or individuals associated with the defendants, by deterring the plaintiff from seeking to develop other land within the Borough and causing the failure or foreclosure of Patriot Pointe. 38. Defendants' arbitrary and irrational actions ... involve corruption, self-dealing, gross abuse of official power, and interference with constitutionally protected activities of the plaintiff, and are so egregious that it shocks the conscience.The Defendants contend that these modifications, even considered against the background of the remaining allegations, constitute unsubstantiated conclusions that do not meet the Twombly/ Iqbal / Fowler plausibility standard. Thus, they say, Southersby has failed to allege conduct sufficiently egregious to shock the conscience, and its substantive due process claim fails. The Court agrees. Surviving a motion to dismiss requires more than raising a possibility of unlawful action. 'Where a complaint pleads facts that are merely consistent with a defendant's liability, it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief.'. . Though Fed.R.Civ.P. 8 'makes a notable and generous departure from the hyper-technical, code-pleading regime of a prior era, ... it does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions.'. . Measured against this standard, Southersby's allegations fall short. It is as though Southersby had stated that it is a cold day in Pittsburgh, without providing a basis for its conclusion. How do we know it is cold? Are passersby wearing heavy coats and turning up their collars? Is there snow in the air or frost on the windows? Similarly, here, Southersby states, without supporting facts, that the Defendants engaged in 'corruption' and 'self dealing,' two of the factors identified in Eichenlaub that may amount to 'conscience shocking' behavior. The allegations in the Amended Complaint raise, at most, the possibility of corruption and self dealing. The same is true with respect to facts regarding the Defendants' interference with other of Southersby's constitutional rights. . . As a result, it is impossible for the Court to find plausible the assertion of conscience shocking behavior. . . . Here, just as in Eichenlaub, the facts alleged support a claim based on improper motive, but are insufficient to state a substantive due process claim.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Clatterbuck v. City of Charlottesville, 708 F.3d 549, 560 (4th Cir. 2013) ("It is not implausible that the City singled out requests for immediate donations in an attempt to target the particular nuisance of beggars' speech but allow other types of solicitation to continue. We find Appellants' allegation a reasonable one, and must accept it as true at this stage. . . Thus, we find that Appellants have nudged their claim that the City enacted a content-based regulation, which is not the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling government interest, across the line from conceivable to plausible.")

De'lonta v. Johnson, 708 F.3d 520, 524-26 (4th Cir. 2013) ("De'lonta contends she has stated a valid constitutional claim because the Appellees' 'denial of consideration for sex reassignment surgery, when viewed against the backdrop of her medical history and circumstances, constitutes a deliberate indifference to her serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment.'. .Appellees counter that De'lonta's complaint fails to satisfy Twombly's plausibility requirement. While conceding that De'lonta's need for protection from self-mutilation is a serious medical need, Appellees assert that because De'lonta has never been prescribed sex reassignment surgery, she cannot allege that sex reassignment surgery is a serious medical need for the purposes of the Eighth Amendment. . . .Applying this two-prong Eighth Amendment standard, we first resolve that De'lonta has alleged an objectively serious medical need for protection against continued self-mutilation. . . .Next, we conclude that De'lonta's complaint sufficiently alleges Appellees' deliberate indifference to her serious medical need, and consequently, that the district court's dismissal was in error. . . .De'lonta alleges that, despite her repeated complaints to Appellees alerting them to the persistence of her symptoms and the inefficacy of her existing treatment, she has never been evaluated concerning her suitability for surgery. Instead, despite their knowledge that De'lonta's therapy sessions with Psychologist Lang actually provoked her 'overwhelming' urges to self-castrate, VDOC's medical staff's only response to De'lonta's requests for surgery was a 'request that you continue to work with Ms. Lang in individual therapy at this time.' These factual allegations, taken as true, state a plausible claim that Appellees 'actually kn[e]w of and disregard[ed]' De'lonta's serious medical need in contravention of the Eighth Amendment. . . .We wish to be clear about our holding. We hold only that De'lonta's Eighth Amendment claim is sufficiently plausible to survive screening pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915A. We do not decide today the merits of De'lonta's claim. Nor, for that matter, do we mean to suggest what remedy De'lonta would be entitled to should she prevail. In our view, the answers to those questions have no bearing on whether De'lonta has stated a claim that Appellees have been deliberately indifferent to her serious medical need by refusing to evaluate her for surgery, consistent with the Standards of Care.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 385, 386 (4th Cir. 2013) ("The district court opined that Mr. Tobey's complaint 'is devoid of any facts suggesting that [Appellants]—neither of whom are law enforcement officers with the power of arrest—made any such assertion or otherwise indicated to the RIC police that Plaintiff should be arrested.'. . The district court further noted that 'Plaintiff's counsel conceded that the Complaint "doesn't say directly that [Plaintiff's arrest] was at the instruction of the TSA."'. . Fortunately for Mr. Tobey, he was not required to state these precise magical words in order to plausibly plead that Appellants caused his arrest. The Supreme Court reiterated in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly that a 'formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.'. . Allegations have facial plausibility 'when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. .As the Supreme Court explained, Section 1983 (and by association Bivens) anticipates that a government official will be 'responsible for the natural consequences of his actions.'. . It is an undoubtedly natural consequence of reporting a person to the police that the person will be arrested; especially in the scenario we have here, where TSA and RIC police act in close concert. So long as Mr. Tobey's complaint rendered it plausible that Appellants helped effectuate his arrest, the district court should have factored the arrest into its decision as to whether Mr. Tobey alleged plausible Bivens claims against Appellants. When looking at Mr. Tobey's complaint and drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor, it is logical to assume that Appellants had a hand in his arrest. Mr. Tobey announced to Appellants his desire to peacefully protest TSA screening measures, and at that point, Appellants 'radioed for assistance.' Immediately thereafter, RIC police 'seized and handcuffed' Mr. Tobey from behind without further inquiry. It is reasonable to infer that whatever Appellants told RIC police caused Mr. Tobey's arrest. This inference is bolstered by the fact that Appellants silently stood by and watched RIC police arrest Mr. Tobey. The fact that Appellants do not have the power of arrest does not hurt Mr. Tobey, but helps him, as one can infer that Appellants radioed RIC police to arrest Mr. Tobey as they could not do it themselves. It may bear out after further discovery that Appellants radioed for assistance for innocuous reasons. It may also bear out that Appellants indicated to RIC police that they should arrest Mr. Tobey. Mr. Tobey's complaint raises a plausible inference that Appellants caused his arrest, and thus it was improper for the district court to find otherwise at the 12(b)(6) phase of litigation. The district court should have considered the entire course of events up to arrest when deciding whether to dismiss Mr. Tobey's Bivens actions against Appellants.") Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 402, 403 (4th Cir. 2013) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) ("Tobey's suit fails for another, independent reason, and in rejecting this reason, the majority manages to flout a second body of Supreme Court precedent. In a recent line of decisions, the Court has held that a plaintiff must allege enough factual content in his complaint to render his legal claim for relief 'plausible on its face' in order to survive a motion to dismiss under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). . . Tobey's complaint falls well short of this requirement, for it conclusorily asserts that defendants engaged in viewpoint discrimination without pleading so much as a single factual allegation that supports this conclusion. In short, by announcing a near-categorical rule that every complaint survives a motion to dismiss, the majority proceeds as if Twombly and Iqbal were purely advisory. The rules of pleading assume particular importance in the context of a damages action against a public official, especially one alleging that the official acted with an impermissible motive. The doctrine of qualified immunity and the rules of pleading are therefore mutually reinforcing: the former ensures that officials cannot be subjected to damages suits for making close judgment calls where the governing law was unclear, while the latter ensure that this defense cannot be defeated by a bare allegation of impermissible motive. . . . In light of these principles, it becomes clear that Tobey's complaint fails to allege a 'plausible' claim of viewpoint discrimination against defendants. . . . Tobey's allegation of viewpoint discrimination is barely distinguishable from the allegation of religious and racial discrimination that the Supreme Court rejected as conclusory in Iqbal. . . . Stripped of the conclusory allegation of viewpoint discrimination, Tobey's First Amendment claim 'stops well short of the line between possible and plausible.'")

Brown v. North Carolina Dept. of Corrections, 612 F.3d 720, 722-24 (4th Cir. 2010) ("Brown's complaint alleges the following facts. On May 9, 2008, an ACI staff member instructed him to enter the 'Housing Block' to retrieve a number of cleaning supplies. The staff member gave the instruction despite having knowledge that another inmate in the Housing Block harbored a grudge against Brown. While gathering the cleaning supplies, Brown was assaulted and brutally beaten by that inmate. As a result of that assault, a steel plate was inserted into Brown's jaw and he received 'ongoing' medical care for 'permanent' injuries. Brown's complaint further alleges that Officer Simms was in 'the Block' when the assault occurred, that Officer Teague observed the assault, and that the 'staff officers in question were [n]egligent and placed [Brown] in a dangerous and vulnerable position.' In an administrative grievance form attached to his complaint, Brown specified that Officer Winkler was the staff member who was aware of the other inmate's grudge against Brown but nonetheless sent him to pick up cleaning supplies. The administrative grievance form also alleges that Officer Teague admitted to Brown that he witnessed the assault but chose not to intervene. . . . The state contends that no reasonable person could infer from the complaint that Officer Simms knew of the assault in time to intervene, yet deliberately and indifferently failed to do so. We disagree with that reading of the record. Brown's complaint alleges that Officer Simms was in 'the Block' when the assault occurred. A reasonable person could infer from that statement that Officer Simms was aware of the attack, and that his failure to intervene represented deliberate indifference to a serious risk of harm. Similarly, Brown's complaint states that 'staff members' were aware of the other inmate's grudge, that the staff members knew there were prior problems between that inmate and Brown, and that they placed Brown 'in a [d]angerous and vulnerable position.' Because there were only three ACI correction officers designated in the complaint, it is reasonable to assume that Brown was naming Officer Simms when he described the staff members who were deliberately indifferent to the serious harm posed by his fellow inmate. Accordingly, the district court should not have dismissed Brown's claim against Officer Simms.")

Francis v. Giacomelli, 588 F.3d 186, 192 n.1 (4th Cir. 2009) ("The standard that the plaintiffs quoted from Swierkiewicz . . . was explicitly overruled in Twombly.")

Francis v. Giacomelli, 588 F.3d 186, 192-94 (4th Cir. 2009) ("[T]he 'notice pleading' characterization may itself be too simplistic, failing to recognize the many other provisions imposing requirements that permit courts to evaluate a complaint for sufficiency early in the process. Rule 8 itself requires a showing of entitlement to relief. Rule 9 requires that allegations of fraud, mistake, time, place, and special damages be specific. Rule 11 requires that the pleading be signed and provides that the signature 'certifies' (1) that the claims in the complaint are not asserted for collateral purposes; (2) that the claims asserted are 'warranted'; and (3) that the factual contentions 'have evidentiary support.' And Rule 12(b)(6) authorizes a court to dismiss any complaint that does not state a claim 'upon which relief can be granted.' The aggregation of these specific requirements reveals the countervailing policy that plaintiffs may proceed into the litigation process only when their complaints are justified by both law and fact. In recent years, with the recognized problems created by 'strike suits,'. . . and the high costs of frivolous litigation, the Supreme Court has brought to the forefront the Federal Rules' requirements that permit courts to evaluate complaints early in the process. [discussing Twombly and Iqbal] With these principles in hand, we now turn to the complaint in this case to determine whether, on its face, it states a plausible claim for relief. . . . Count I of the complaint, where the plaintiffs most fully articulate a claim, alleges that members of the Baltimore City Police Department, under the direction of Mayor O'Malley and City Solicitor Tyler, 'broke into and entered' the Police Commissioner's offices, seized personal property, and 'detained, held in custody and seized' the Police Commissioner and his deputies while ordering them to 'surrender their weapons, badges, identification cards' and similar property–all without the benefit of criminal charges or a warrant. The complaint concludes that this conduct violated the plaintiffs' Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures. Considered in their context, these allegations describe the conduct of Mayor O'Malley taken in furtherance of his decision to terminate the plaintiffs' employment, directing members of the Baltimore City Police Department to seize police department property and escort the plaintiffs from the police building. . . . Taking the facts in the complaint as true, we agree with the district court that Count I nonetheless fails to set forth a plausible claim for relief. While the Commissioner and his deputies conclusorily alleged that the searches and seizures violated their constitutional rights because no charges had been filed against them, nor had any warrant issued, their complaint did not allege that the defendants were engaged in a law-enforcement effort. Indeed, the facts show to the contrary, that the defendants' actions against the plaintiffs were employment actions based on the Mayor's perceived right to fire the Police Commissioner without cause, as stated in the Memorandum of Understanding between Commissioner Clark and Baltimore City.).

McLean v. U.S., 566 F.3d 391, 399, 400 (4th Cir. 2009) ("Although the Supreme Court has subsequently made clear that the factual allegations in a complaint must make entitlement to relief plausible and not merely possible, see Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 554-63 (2007), '[w]hat Rule 12(b)(6) does not countenance are dismissals based on a judge's disbelief of a complaint's factual allegations,' Neitzke, 490 U .S. at 327; see also Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556. 'District court judges looking to dismiss claims on such grounds must look elsewhere for legal support.' Neitzke, 490 U.S. at 327. '[A] well-pleaded complaint may proceed even if it strikes a savvy judge that actual proof of the facts alleged is improbable and that a recovery is very remote and unlikely.' Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556. . . Neitzke makes clear that a dismissal for frivolousness is of a qualitatively different character than a dismissal for failure to state a claim. As a result, our holding today should not be read to indicate that a dismissal for frivolousness that is rendered without prejudice should avoid a strike designation.").

Ray v. Amelia County Sheriff's Office, 302 F. App'x 209, 2008 WL 5155257, at *1 (4th Cir. Dec. 9, 2008) ("The district court erred in dismissing Ray's ADEA claim based upon its finding that her own complaint produced a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for the defendants' termination of her employment that rebutted her prima facie case, while failing to demonstrate that the reasons stated in her own complaint were a pretext for discrimination. Ray was not required to plead specific facts establishing a prima facie case of discrimination in her complaint, let alone to plead facts showing that the non-discriminatory reason for termination suggested by her own complaint was pretextual. Ray was required only to state her claim so as to give the defendants fair notice of its nature and the grounds upon which it rests, with enough factual allegations to state a claim to relief that is plausible, not merely speculative. Ray alleges in her complaint that she is a member of a protected class (she is forty-five years old), she suffered an adverse employment action (her employment was terminated), and she was replaced by a substantially younger employee who is less qualified for the position than Ray. Ray states several possible reasons for the termination of her employment that are related to her age: Sheriff Jimmy E. Weaver's desire to have younger-looking employees at the front of the Amelia County Sheriff's Office; Weaver's desire to hire a replacement who was less familiar with official policies and procedures; and a problem with Ray's desire to utilize her accrued annual leave benefits. Taken together, these allegations provide the defendants with fair notice of the nature of her claim and the grounds upon which it rests, and state a claim to relief that is plausible, not merely speculative. Although Ray's complaint indicates that there were other ostensible reasons why her employment was terminated, the inclusion of those stated reasons in her complaint does not establish at the pleadings stage that she is not entitled to relief on her stated discrimination claim.").

In re Mills, 287 F. App'x 273, 2008 WL 2937850, at *6 (4th Cir. July 29, 2008) ("Mills' argument on appeal is simply that the allegations in the complaint, even if taken as true, are too vague and conclusory to demonstrate the violation of constitutional rights. . . We disagree. A complaint need only give 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.' Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2). . . There is no heightened pleading standard for qualified-immunity cases.").

Giarratano v. Johnson, 521 F.2d 298, 304, 305 (4th Cir. 2008) ("Giarratano's complaint alleges that '[t]he exclusion of inmates from the protections of the Freedom of Information Act is not rationally related to any legitimate government interest.' This conclusory assertion is insufficient to overcome the presumption of rationality that applies to the VFOIA prisoner exclusion. . . Thus, the district court's dismissal of the facial challenge was appropriate. The conclusion that dismissal is appropriate comports with Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (2007), which requires pleading 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'. . In Twombly, the Supreme Court, noting that 'a plaintiff's obligation to provide the Agrounds" of his Aentitlement to relief" requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do,' id. at 1964-65, upheld the dismissal of a complaint where the plaintiffs did not 'nudge [ ] their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . Here, Giarratano's conclusory allegation about the lack of a rational relationship between VFOIA's prisoner exclusion and any legitimate state interest is insufficient . . . to plausibly state a claim for relief in light of the strong presumption in favor of the legislation's rationality and the readily apparent justification for the legislation. . . . In holding that Giarratano could not meet his burden, the district court cited a variety of rational reasons for the VFOIA prisoner exclusion. . . . Giarratano, on the other hand, failed to allege any set of facts that would indicate the classification at issue violated any fundamental rights, was irrational, or otherwise failed to serve a legitimate state interest. Simply put, Giarratano has alleged no facts to support a claim much less a 'plausible' claim.").

Mitchell v. Lewis, C/A No. 0:11–2860–CMC–PJG, 2012 WL 137471, at *5 n.4 (D.S.C. Jan. 4, 2012) ("The Supreme Court in Iqbal, and the Fourth Circuit in Trulock, addressed pleading standards in the procedural context of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. However, this court finds that those standards also apply in the court's initial screening of a complaint pursuant to §§ 1915(e)(2) and 1915A, since Iqbal discusses the general pleading standards of Rule 8, which apply in all civil actions. . . Moreover, §§ 1915(e)(2) and 1915A(b) permit sua sponte dismissal of a complaint that fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, which is essentially the same standard found in Rule 12(b)(6).")

Williams v. Family Service of Roanoke Valley, No. 7:09cv00227, 2009 WL 3806333, at *5, *6 (W.D. Va. Nov. 13, 2009) ("Ms. Williams believes that her supervisors intended for her reassignment to be permanent and an effort to force her to retire, and she believes that they were motivated to discriminate against her on account of her age and race. Her personal beliefs and speculation, however, are no substitute for proof. At the pleading stage, it is necessary to state a plausible claim for relief that raises the right to recover beyond the speculative level. Stripped of its speculation and personal belief, Ms. Williams' complaint shows only this: she was performing satisfactorily, her supervisors asked her to work temporarily as a receptionist with no loss of pay or benefits because of a legitimate need, a younger white female was to cover for her temporarily, and another employee that was approximately Williams' age voluntarily resigned. These facts fall far short of raising a plausible claim for relief that discriminatory animus motivated an adverse employment action. In short, nothing Ms. Williams has said in her pleadings, or in open court in support of her pleadings, and ultimately her claim, raises her right to relief above the speculative level. In reaching this conclusion, the court notes that it does not view this as a technical pleading failure that disadvantages a pro se plaintiff. To the contrary, the Court has assumed the veracity of her relevant factual allegations, including her amplification of them in open court, and concluded that they do not 'plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950.")

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Arnold v. Williams, 979 F.3d 262, 267-69 (5th Cir. 2020) ("This immunity-from-suit interest does not require that the plaintiff's original complaint exceed the short-and-plain-statement standard of Rule 8. . . Rather, 'a plaintiff seeking to overcome qualified immunity must plead specific facts that both allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the harm he has alleged and that defeat a qualified immunity defense with equal specificity.'. .

That is, a plaintiff must plead qualified-immunity facts with the minimal specificity that would satisfy Twombly and Iqbal. Furthermore, if the defendant first raises qualified immunity, the district court, ' "may [then] in its discretion, insist that a plaintiff file a reply tailored to [the defendant's] answer [or motion to dismiss] pleading the defense of qualified immunity."'. . In this case, Arnold broadly addressed qualified immunity in his original complaint by alleging that Deputy Williams "knowingly violated" "clearly established law." Williams explicitly raised qualified immunity in his memorandum in support of his motion to dismiss, but the district court did not require Arnold to file a Schultea reply tailored to the defense of qualified immunity. In his memorandum in opposition to the motion to dismiss, Arnold addressed qualified immunity, albeit in a merely conclusory fashion: 'The Court should find that qualified immunity does not apply to this case.' In dismissing Arnold's unreasonable-search and unreasonable-seizure claims, the district court did not determine if Williams is entitled to qualified immunity on those claims. Rather, it granted 12(b)(6) dismissal because it concluded that Arnold did not plausibly allege a search or seizure. . . . At the 12(b)(6) stage of litigation, it is inappropriate for a district court to weigh the strength of the allegations. . . Instead, the district court must simply decide if the complaint plausibly alleges a claim for relief. . . By stating a Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 and stating facts that make plausible an unreasonable search, Arnold meets the minimal pleading standard necessary to survive a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on that claim, at least as to the two § 1983 elements set forth in Gomez. He has not done so for his unreasonable-seizure claim. Ordinarily, after determining that a plaintiff had plausibly alleged constitutional violations, we would turn to the qualified-immunity analysis. . . Here, however, 'the district court found the complaint deficient on its face and never reached' qualified immunity. . . 'Because as a general rule, we do not consider an issue not passed upon below, we remand for the district court to decide in the first instance whether [qualified immunity] defeats' Arnold's unreasonable-search claim. . . We therefore reverse the dismissal of the unreasonable-search claim and remand for the district court to consider qualified immunity before proceeding to the merits of the case.")

Shaw v. Villanueva, 918 F.3d 414, 418-19 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Shaw's unadorned allegations are similarly conclusory. He has pleaded no specific facts showing that Villanueva and Ebrom misdirected Sotelo into issuing the arrest warrant. And so he has not established the exception to the independent-intermediary doctrine. In other words, his allegations are all broth and no beans. Finally, Shaw contends that Deputy Phillips doctored the complaint affidavit because it contained two unfavorable details absent from Mutz's statement. But that's irrelevant here. The Supreme Court held in Iqbal that 'vicarious liability is inapplicable to Bivens and § 1983 suits.'. . And thus in deciding qualified immunity for Villanueva and Ebrom, we do not concern ourselves with Phillips. . . Besides, Shaw has not appealed Phillips' qualified immunity. In sum, the independent-intermediary doctrine applies, meaning Villanueva and Ebrom are entitled to qualified immunity from Shaw's false-arrest claim. . . .Post-Iqbal, formulaic recitations or bare-bones allegations will not survive a motion to dismiss. Given the thinness of Shaw's allegations, Villanueva and Ebrom are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Lincoln v. Turner, 874 F.3d 833, 839 n.11 (5th Cir. 2017) ("Many difficulties of determining the adequacy of pleadings could be avoided by the district court's ordering a plaintiff to 'file a reply tailored to an answer pleading the defense of qualified immunity.' Schultea v. Wood, 47 F.3d 1427, 1433–34 (5th Cir. 1995). See also Anderson v. Valdez, 845 F.3d 580, 590 (5th Cir. 2016) (noting that when a defendant asserts a qualified immunity defense, the court must first "apply[ ] [the] general pleading standard to the complaint" and "may [then], in its discretion, insist that a plaintiff file a reply"). The district court may require particularized pleading of facts responsive to the defendant's plea of immunity. Officer Turner filed a Motion to Dismiss and, in the Alternative, for a Rule 7(a) Reply to Immunity Defense. The district court granted the motion to dismiss without ordering a Rule 7 reply.")

Doe v. United States, 831 F.3d 309, 321 (5th Cir. 2016) ("In this appeal, we set aside the objective 'clearly established law' requirement, which is traditionally confined to the qualified immunity context. The analytical task before us today is to determine whether the complaint contains sufficient factual information showing that the same ICE officials under scrutiny in Robertson acted with deliberate indifference in relation to the transport policy violations and detainees' safety. . . We are mindful of our prior conclusion that the plaintiffs sufficiently pled that these officials 'had actual knowledge' of transport policy violations and of the transport policy's 'assault-preventing objective.'. . Thus, the specific question is whether that information alone renders the officials' alleged culpability greater than 'gross negligence,' or whether more is required to make a plausible assertion that the officials knew of a 'substantial risk of serious harm' and consciously disregarded it. . . A complaint must include 'facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face' to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. . . We agree with the Government that some of our other conclusions in Robertson are relevant to that determination. For example, we discussed that the plaintiffs' complaint did not include 'any concrete facts betray[ing] a heightened risk of sexual assault during ... transports ....' Robertson, 751 F.3d at 391. The plaintiffs do not allege that ICE officials knew of prior incidents of sexual assaults connected with detainee transports, of detainee 'fears' of sexual assault during transport, or of Dunn's crimes '(in time to prevent them).'. . There also is no claim that ICE officials knew 'of Dunn's dangerous proclivities.'. . The detention center's history of sexual assault, moreover, consists primarily of the 2007 incident between a detainee and guard which was unrelated to detainee transport. . . The guard's employment was terminated. . . In short, the plaintiffs failed to plead that ICE officials were aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that known violations of the transport policy created a 'substantial risk' that detainees would be sexually assaulted. . . Our ruling should not be interpreted as setting a standard that requires 'a completed attack or confirmed potential victims or aggressors' to make a successful deliberate indifference claim. . . Still, mere knowledge of another party's contractual violation is not enough to allege culpability beyond gross negligence in this case. . . We have held that 'observ[ing] questionable behavior' and an awareness of lack of 'compliance' with the terms of a settlement agreement were not enough to show deliberate indifference. . . The plaintiffs have not plausibly asserted that ICE officials acted with deliberate indifference. We affirm the district court's dismissal of the plaintiffs' FTCA claims against the United States.")

Williams-Boldware v. Denton County, Tex., 741 F.3d 635, 643, 644 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Williams–Boldware did not plead this cause of action with the requisite specificity to defeat a motion to dismiss based upon qualified immunity. 'One of the most salient benefits of qualified immunity is protection from pretrial discovery, which is costly, time consuming, and intrusive.' . . Before allowing discovery in a matter where qualified immunity is alleged, the district court must first find 'that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome' a qualified immunity defense. . . Here, Williams–Boldware's failure to promote claim did not plead facts that would overcome a qualified immunity defense because her allegations are conclusory statements based almost wholly upon speculation. . .Williams–Boldware speculates that Susan declined to recommend or approve her for more challenging assignments, but provides no facts to support her allegation. She also speculates that Cary Piel and Ryan Calvert were involved in selecting misdemeanor prosecutors for coveted assignments, but provides no factual support for that allegation. Most notably, Williams–Boldware failed to even allege that she applied for a promotion and was rejected. Under certain circumstances, a failure to promote claim is viable even when the employee never applied for a position. . . However, the employee must demonstrate that applying 'would have been a futile gesture.' . . Williams–Boldware made no such showing. Because Williams–Boldware failed to plead facts sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss on her failure to promote claim, the district court did not err by denying discovery and dismissing the suit against the Individual Defendants.")

Rogers v. Boatright, 709 F.3d 403, 408, 409 (5th Cir. 2013) ("The district court erred in sua sponte dismissing at the initial screening stage Rogers's claim that Jose Garcia acted with deliberate indifference to his safety. Rogers alleged in his complaint that he was not provided with a seatbelt and that he could not protect himself when the prison van stopped abruptly because he was shackled in leg irons and handcuffs. He alleged that Jose Garcia knew that other prisoners had been injured when the prison van in which they were riding stopped abruptly. Notwithstanding that knowledge, Garcia drove the van recklessly and Rogers sustained serious injuries when Garcia had to brake suddenly to avoid hitting another vehicle. . . .Rogers alleged that he sustained a serious injury because Jose Garcia operated the prison van recklessly, knowing that there was a substantial risk that Rogers would be injured if the van stopped abruptly because Rogers was shackled in leg irons and handcuffs and was not provided with a seatbelt. Rogers's allegation that Jose Garcia told another officer that other inmates similarly had been injured the prior week and during other incidents, which 'happen [ ] all the time,' states more than mere negligence. Garcia's alleged statement, if true, is sufficient to demonstrate that he knew of the risk to Rogers. . . Rogers has a nonfrivolous argument that Jose Garcia violated his Eighth Amendment right to freedom from cruel and unusual punishment by acting with deliberate indifference to his safety. . . Thus, the district court abused its discretion in sua sponte dismissing this claim against Jose Garcia at the initial screening stage and before the filing of any responsive pleadings, and we remand for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.")

Rogers v. Boatright, 709 F.3d 403, 411, 412 (5th Cir. 2013) (Edith H. Jones, J., dissenting) ("With due respect to my colleagues, I dissent from the holding that Rogers' conclusory statements about reckless driving by Officer Jose Garcia suffice to plead an Eighth Amendment claim for deliberate indifference. My concerns may be easily listed. First, there is no constitutional requirement that inmates be buckled with seatbelts during transportation. Nearly all courts have rejected such claims, because the use of seatbelts on shackled prisoners presents inevitable, non-trivial security concerns for other passengers and the guards. . .Second, this prisoner's allegations of 'reckless driving' are factually insufficient to meet the demanding constitutional standard and pleading requirements. To establish deliberate indifference, the prisoner must show that the prison official knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to inmate health or safety. . . The prisoner must show both that the official was aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm existed and that the official actually drew the inference. . . The prisoner's pleadings, moreover, must allege 'sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim for relief that is plausible on its face.'. . Rogers' allegations of Garcia's excessive speed, reckless driving, and darting in and out of traffic are conclusory, because he was seated in the back of a prison van, where his view of surrounding traffic had to be obstructed: the majority explain that he was seated perpendicular to oncoming traffic. Unlike the prisoner in the Brown case, relied on by the majority, he neither requested a seatbelt nor urged Jose Garcia to drive slower or more carefully. That Garcia 'recklessly' caused the collision is even more doubtful, as Rogers states in his appellate brief that 'Garcia was forced to slam on the transport van's brakes to avoid rear-ending a vehicle stopped in the freeway early morning traffic.' Taking this statement as an addendum to Rogers's pleadings, two implications are possible. Either Garcia, even though negligent in his driving, responded to an unusual, unanticipated situation, negating the inference that he knew a serious risk of substantial harm to Rogers existed; or Rogers's allegations lack sufficient factual detail from which an inference of recklessness can fairly be drawn. Similarly lacking are factual allegations that Garcia was actually aware of a substantial risk of serious harm to Rogers in these circumstances. The only alleged corroboration to Rogers' conclusion is Garcia's statement that prisoners have been injured during transportation in other instances. This statement, however, says nothing about whether Garcia was the driver on those occasions, nothing about whether actual reckless driving occurred, nothing about the type or extent of injuries sustained, nothing about driving conditions, and nothing about the use of seatbelts. Thus, I disagree that Garcia's statement can be taken to indicate the heightened state of culpability inherent in a constitutional violation. . . . Lack of seatbelts alone, as the majority concede, does not pose 'an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.' Further, because all driving in the congested and unpredictable traffic of the Houston metropolitan area poses some risk, the line between negligence and unconstitutional deliberate indifference must be securely drawn so that the Constitution does not simply become a 'font of tort law.'. . The only way to preserve this distinction is to insist on careful factual allegations. Third, the majority's reliance on Brown is misplaced for two reasons. First, allegations of reckless driving were supported in that case by facts. The facts were that the convoy drove at speeds up to 75 miles per hour; the guards had refused multiple requests for seatbelts as the prisoners were being loaded into the vans; the guards 'taunted' the inmates about safety concerns; the vans followed each other too closely; the vans were passing other cars when road signs 'suggested otherwise.'. . No such facts are pled by Rogers.

. . . The majority's decision to allow this complainant to proceed is unfortunate, but Rogers must prove far more to overcome Garcia's likely defense of qualified immunity and actually sustain his assertions of a constitutional violation.")

Wilson v. Birnberg, 667 F.3d 591, 599, 600 (5th Cir. 2012) ("Wilson alleged that Birnberg intentionally deprived him of ballot access by, as the complaint states, 'rejecting Wilson's application out of retaliation for Wilson's exercise of free speech.' Specifically, Wilson claimed that during a prior election he had distributed flyers critical of the successful Democratic mayoral candidate, Annise Parker. This is 'factual content' supporting Birnberg's liability 'for the misconduct alleged.'. . The election for which Wilson was denied a place on the ballot was a primary to select the Democratic Party's nominee for Harris County Commissioner's Court, Precinct No. 4. Birnberg chairs the Harris County Democratic Party and the county seat is Houston. There were no other Democratic candidates. Wilson filed his application for candidacy in the last hour of the last possible day, which meant that had his filing been accepted, he would have become the Democratic Party nominee by default. The facts pled are that a political-party chairman denied an application on an improper basis in order to prevent a critic of the mayor from receiving her party's nomination. 'The plausibility standard [for a complaint] is not akin to a "probability requirement"....' . . . Rule 12(b)(6) does not permit us to affirm the district court's dismissal of this claim unless we determine 'it is beyond doubt' that Wilson 'cannot prove a plausible set of facts' to support his allegations.")

Rhodes v. Prince, 360 F. App'x 555, 559, 560 (5th Cir. 2010) ("Our inquiry 'is an objective one, asking whether a reasonable person in the position of [Rhodes] would believe he was the subject of a criminal or an administrative investigation by the department.'. . The question is fact-intensive. . . Rhodes points us to the events of December 9, 2003 to establish a Fourth Amendment violation. We must first, however, identify the allegations in his complaint that are entitled to a presumption of truth. . . Rhodes alleges that Defendant Roach 'intentionally and falsely arrested' him, 'when he knew such conduct was a violation of [his] Fourth Amendment right to be free from unlawful search and seizures,' and that Defendant Roach did so with the support of the other Defendants. Because an 'arrest' is a legal conclusion under the Fourth Amendment and a necessary element of a false arrest claim, . . .Rhodes's allegation of 'arrest' is 'nothing more than a Aformulaic recitation of the elements" of a constitutional ... claim .... and [is] not entitled to be assumed true.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1951 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555). Rhodes describes Defendant Roach's questioning as an 'interrogation.' 'Interrogation' is a word with mixed connotations in the law, typically used to describe the questioning of a person while in custody. . . . Rhodes's use of 'interrogation' to describe the questioning by Defendant Roach does not necessarily equate to an arrest because, absent facts indicative of a Fourth Amendment seizure, Rhodes's description amounts to little more than a matter of word choice, without additional legal weight. Cf. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1951. Some of the alleged facts in Rhodes's Rule 7(a) reply are, however, entitled to a presumption of truth. Rhodes alleges that on December 4, 2003, Defendants Krohn, Carroll, and Roach notified him that he was a suspect in the burglary, and that he asserted his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent. Defendant Roach advised Rhodes that he would head a criminal investigation into the matter. The Department then informed Rhodes that he was subject to an internal affairs investigation, placed him on administrative leave and conducted an interview on the matter. Rhodes further alleges that he was fingerprinted and palm printed 'without consent' before Defendant Roach questioned him. Rhodes alleges that the questioning lasted approximately two hours. Although it is not clear from the Rule 7(a) reply, Rhodes's counsel appears to have been present during the questioning. Viewing the pleadings in the light most favorable to Rhodes, we find that he has not sufficiently pled that he was 'seized' under the Fourth Amendment. The district court required Rhodes to come forward with sufficient factual allegations in his Rule 7(a) reply to overcome the Defendants' claim to qualified immunity. . . Rhodes thus had the burden to demonstrate that an objective person would not have felt free to leave the exchange with Defendant Roach. . . Rhodes has not carried his burden. Significantly, Rhodes never alleged that he appeared at the Eastside Police Station involuntarily or felt that he was being detained. Rhodes also does not allege any show of force by the police. The taking of fingerprints and palm prints traditionally accompany an arrest, but standing alone, they do not suffice to establish an arrest. Rhodes was aware of both the criminal and administrative investigations and, in his Rule 7(a) reply, Rhodes had the burden to distinguish between his compliance with workplace obligations and a show of police force sufficient to demonstrate a Fourth Amendment arrest. . . Rhodes failed to do so. Even viewing the pleadings in the light most favorable to Rhodes, we find that a reasonable person would have felt free to leave the encounter. Thus, Rhodes has not sufficiently alleged that he was 'seized' under the Fourth Amendment.").

Floyd v. City of Kenner, La., No. 08-30637, 2009 WL 3490278, at *2 & n.2, *4 (5th Cir. Oct. 29, 2009) (unpublished) ("Caraway, Congemi, Cunningham, and Deroche have asserted a qualified immunity defense. In reviewing those claims, we are guided both by the ordinary pleading standard and by a heightened one. . . We emphasize that this heightened pleading standard applies only to claims against public officials in their individual capacities. The Supreme Court's decision in Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics and Intelligence Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163 (1993), made clear that a heightened pleading standard was inapplicable to suits against municipalities. Further, the heightened standard is inapplicable to claims against public officials in their official capacity, for we have 'explained that official-capacity lawsuits are typically an alternative means of pleading an action against the governmental entity involved....' Baker v. Putnal, 75 F.3d 190, 195 (5th Cir.1996). . . . Schultea explained that, once a defendant asserts the defense of qualified immunity, a district court may order the plaintiff to submit a reply after evaluating the complaint under the ordinary pleading standard. . . We held that more than mere conclusions must be alleged, stating specifically that 'a plaintiff cannot be allowed to rest on general characterizations, but must speak to the factual particulars of the alleged actions, at least when those facts are known to the plaintiff and are not peculiarly within the knowledge of defendants.'. . 'Heightened pleading requires allegations of fact focusing specifically on the conduct of the individual who caused the plaintiff's injury.'. . . In Schultea, we adopted the rationale that, 'in some cases, such as in search cases, probable cause and exigent circumstances will often turn on facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants. And if there are conflicts in the allegations regarding the actions taken by the police officers, discovery may be necessary.'. . Here, the Defendants ask us to accept that Deroche entered the property for the sole purpose of determining if relief items were present. At the time, Deroche alleged he entered because of the alarm. Floyd asserts that Deroche knew that Floyd was not misappropriating relief items; instead, the entry into the property was all about embarrassing Floyd because of his past run-ins with then-Chief of Police Congemi. This is the type of conflict that warrants discovery. The district court should not have dismissed the claim.").

Floyd v. City of Kenner, La., No. 08-30637, 2009 WL 3490278, at *6 (5th Cir. Oct. 29, 2009) ("Floyd does not complain that Caraway himself filed the alleged unlawful affidavit in support of the warrants. Instead, he claims that Caraway, in his capacity as chief investigator, directed and approved the applications filed by Cunningham. This is an alleged Fourth Amendment violation under Franks, as we stated in addressing the claim against Cunningham. 'Because vicarious liability is inapplicable to ... § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. Liability under Section 1983 for a supervisor may exist based either on personal involvement in the constitutional deprivation or 'a sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation.' Thompkins v. Belt, 828 F.2d 298, 304 (5th Cir.1987). We must determine whether Floyd alleged the 'factual particulars' necessary to state a valid Fourth Amendment claim against Caraway. . .The relevant allegation is that Caraway 'participated in, approved and directed' the filing of false and misleading affidavits. In analyzing the issue, we turn to the Supreme Court's recent decision in Iqbal. . . . Certainly our precedents have acknowledged that some limited discovery may at times be needed before a ruling on immunity is proper. As an example, we referred to 'search cases, [because] probable cause and exigent circumstances will often turn on facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants.'. . In such a case, 'if there are conflicts in the allegations regarding the actions taken by the police officers, discovery may be necessary.'. . The importance of discovery in such a situation is not to allow the plaintiff to discover if his or her pure speculations were true, for pure speculation is not a basis on which pleadings may be filed. Rule 11 requires that any factual statements be supported by evidence known to the pleader, or, when specifically so identified, 'will likely have evidentiary support' after discovery. Fed.R.Civ.P. 11(b)(3) (emphasis added). There has to be more underlying a complaint than a hope that events happened in a certain way. Instead, in the 'short and plain' claim against a public official, 'a plaintiff must at least chart a factual path to the defeat of the defendant's immunity, free of conclusion.' Schultea, 47 F.3d at 1430. Once that path has been charted with something more than conclusory statements, limited discovery might be allowed to fill in the remaining detail necessary to comply with Schultea. . . Under these standards, Floyd's allegations against Caraway amount to nothing more than speculation. The conclusory assertion that Caraway 'participated in, approved and directed' the filing of false and misleading affidavits is consistent with finding a constitutional violation, but it needed further factual amplification. See Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949. Floyd might not know everything about what occurred, but the bare allegation does not make it plausible that he knows anything. Unlike his allegations against Cunningham, this bare assertion does not provide any detail about what Caraway, as chief of investigations, did to seek to control Cunningham's filing of an affidavit. Put differently, the conclusion presents nothing more than hope and a prayer for relief. An example of a situation that falls squarely within the kind of case justifying limited discovery is discussed in a recently released but non- precedential opinion by a panel of this court. Morgan v. Hubert, No. 08- 30388, 2009 WL 1884605 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009). In Morgan, a plaintiff who was in protective custody before Hurricane Katrina was transferred to a general prison population following the storm. . . After being beaten and stabbed, the plaintiff filed a Section 1983 suit against the prison warden. . . The complaint presented sufficient detail to demonstrate a highly plausible allegation of an Eighth Amendment violation. . . The events cited were so clear, the practical effects of such conduct so obvious, that the defendants' responsibility under Section 1983 for the plaintiff's harm simply needed the detail that limited discovery would either provide or deny. . . Unlike in Morgan, Floyd has shown nothing in his complaint to indicate a basic plausibility to the allegation. His Section 1983 claim premised on a Fourth Amendment violation therefore fails.").

Morgan v. Hubert, 335 F. App'x 466, No. 08-30388, 2009 WL 1884605, at *5, *6 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009) ("In his amended complaint and reply, Morgan alleges the following facts regarding Hubert's personal actions: (1) that Hubert created policies that placed Morgan in substantial risk of harm; (2) that he failed adequately to house, feed, and provide medical care for inmates evacuated from OPP, and particularly failed to provide protection to inmates in protective custody and to provide medical care to those assaulted; (3) that Hubert knew or should have known that transfers from OPP would include prisoners in protective custody; (4) that Hubert knew or should have known of the need to segregate these prisoners; (5) that Hubert failed to follow the policies he had in place for the segregation and protection of prisoners, and that he failed to ensure that his staff followed the policies; (6) in the alternative that Hubert failed to enact any policies and was thus deliberately indifferent to Morgan's rights; and (7) that Hubert had a personal duty to create and implement these policies or to oversee those who created and implemented the policies. The difficulty with these allegations is that they fail to state specifically such important facts as when Hubert knew of the transfers and what his policies were regarding them, including the handling of prisoners in protective custody. See Schultea, 47 F .3d at 1434 (requiring the plaintiff to support a Aclaim with sufficient precision and factual specificity to raise a genuine issue as to the illegality of defendant's conduct at the time of the alleged acts" (emphasis added)). The time line from Hubert's planning for the hurricane to Morgan's arrival at EHCC is crucial to the deliberate indifference analysis, directly bearing on Hubert's knowledge of the events. The failure of specificity is no fault of Morgan's, however, because he has not yet had the benefit of discovery, and is bound by Rule 11 to allege only those facts for which he has or will likely have evidentiary support. As we said in Schultea, we do not require a plaintiff to plead facts 'peculiarly within the knowledge of defendants,' id. at 1432, and the facts omitted fall squarely within that category. We are mindful that the protection afforded by qualified immunity applies to the lawsuit itself, and not merely to liability, and thus the issue should be resolved as early as possible. . .Thus, we are reluctant to allow the case to proceed to full discovery with important questions regarding qualified immunity left unanswered. Schultea points the way forward. We noted there the district court's ability to tailor discovery to the defense of qualified immunity: 'The district court may ... limit any necessary discovery to the defense of qualified immunity.' 47 F.3d at 1434. Such a course is called for here. Because key facts are unknown, and because these facts are solely within Hubert's possession, we do not consider the parties' remaining arguments regarding deliberate indifference. Instead, we vacate the district court's denial of qualified immunity and remand for discovery limited to that issue. We instruct the district court to carry the issue of qualified immunity and decide it anew once that discovery is complete. Additional facts establishing the time line are particularly important when evaluating the second prong of the qualified immunity test-the reasonableness of Hubert's actions in light of the clearly established constitutional right. While the fact of Hurricane Katrina is unquestionably relevant to this inquiry, so too are the facts noting when Hubert learned of impending transfers and what steps he took to prepare for them. Several days of notice versus hours or even minutes of notice greatly changes the reasonableness calculus. Under such circumstances, remand for limited discovery is appropriate."). [See also Morgan v. Hubert, 459 F. App'x 321 (5th Cir. 2012) (holding that because warden was not deliberately indifferent, warden was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim.]

Mohamed for A.M. v. Irving Indep. Sch. Dist., 252 F.Supp.3d 602, ___ (N.D. Tex. 2017), aff'd, ___ F. App'x ___ (5th Cir. 2019) ("The threshold question that the court must decide is whether, viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the Complaint sufficiently alleges that Principal Cummings violated A.M.'s constitutional right to equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment. If the allegations fail to state a claim for an underlying constitutional violation, Principal Cummings is entitled to qualified immunity without the necessity that the court reach the other aspects of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . .Viewing all well-pleaded allegations as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Plaintiff, the court determines that the Complaint fails to plead facts from which the court can reasonably infer that Principal Cummings's complained-of conduct was motivated by unlawful racial or religious animus. To the extent the Complaint alleges that Principal Cummings intentionally discriminated against A.M. based on his race or religion, the allegations are wholly conclusory and fail to 'raise a right to relief above the speculative level...[even] on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true (even if doubtful in fact).'. . The Complaint contains no factual allegation that supports a showing that Principal Cummings removed A.M. from the classroom, ordered him to write a statement, or decided to temporarily suspend him from McArthur, based on his religion or race. Plaintiff's reliance on nothing more than conclusory, speculative, and sweeping allegations of constitutional violations and intent is insufficient to overcome Principal Cummings's qualified immunity defense. . . .Further, the Complaint fails to state an equal protection violation against Principal Cummings because it does not allege that he treated A.M. differently than other similarly situated students, and that the unequal treatment was based on religion or race. . . .Finally, allegations that the IISD has a pattern of disciplining African–American students more harshly than other students, that the IISD generally had an anti-Muslim bias, that Principal Cummings was aware of TEA reports reflecting such disparity, or that other school officials displayed racial animus, are insufficient as a matter of law to impute liability to Principal Cummings. To overcome Principal Cummings's qualified immunity defense, Plaintiff must, at a minimum, allege facts from which the court may infer that Principal Cummings was himself personally motivated by discriminatory animus. . . . Even assuming that Plaintiff had met the threshold requirement of alleging an underlying constitutional violation, the court concludes that Principal Cummings is, nevertheless, entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiff has failed to allege facts from which the court can conclude that Principal Cummings acted in an objectively unreasonable manner. Principals are responsible for the safety of students and others on campus and, as part of that responsibility, often have to make decisions quickly and with little information. The court acknowledges that A.M. repeatedly stated that the device in question was an alarm clock and not a bomb; however, in light of well-documented incidents in this country of students bringing weapons and other prohibited devices to school, one in Principal Cummings's position cannot rely on or accept such assertions without at least conducting some level of investigation or sufficient inquiry to ensure that the device does not pose a risk to the safety of students and others on campus. . . .A principal's fate is not so hapless that, on the one hand, by not taking action he is faced with the gruesome prospect of death or serious injury of persons had the device actually been a bomb and exploded; and, on the other hand, he is faced with a federal lawsuit for denial of a student's constitutional rights because the device turned out not to be a bomb. Woe unto the principal who fails to act on a potential threat that later becomes a reality! To hold Principal Cummings, or any other administrator, to this standard places him between the dreaded Scylla and Charybdis. . . As earlier stated, qualified immunity is designed to protect from civil liability 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . Principal Cummings's alleged conduct falls into neither category. The court simply cannot go so far as to say, based on the allegations presented, that Principal Cummings was 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowingly violate[d] the law' or A.M.'s constitutional rights. Moreover, the Complaint contains no allegations from which the court can reasonably infer that Principal Cummings would have acted differently if the student bringing the device to school and showing it to others in violation of a teacher's orders had been non-African American or non-Islamic. For these reasons, the allegations in the Complaint regarding Principal Cummings are inadequate to overcome his defense of qualified immunity. Accordingly, the court will grant Principal Cummings's Motion to Dismiss based on qualified immunity.")

Huff v. Refugio County Sheriff's Dept., No. 6:13–CV–00032, 2013 WL 5574901, *2, *3 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 9, 2013) ("Defendants take the principle requiring a plaintiff to identify individual conduct attributable to each public official too far. That rule typically results in dismissals when individual policymakers are named as defendants without any allegation about their specific role in formulating the challenged policy. . . .Here we are not dealing with allegations against policymakers, but allegations that two individuals had direct involvement in applying excessive force. The allegation is that both were present in the cell when the force was applied. This is more than sufficient at the pleading stage, even under the heightened standard applied to public officials sued in their individual capacity. . . Discovery can flesh out the remaining detail of which officer slammed Huff to the floor and which officer brought his arm behind his back.")

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Small v. Brock, 963 F.3d 539, 541-43 (6th Cir. 2020) ("We thus hold that a prisoner states an Eighth Amendment claim by alleging that, without provocation, a prison official threatened the prisoner's life on multiple occasions and took concrete steps, such as aggressively brandishing a deadly weapon, to make those threats credible. . . .Of course, our holding does not mean that Small's right was clearly established for the purpose of qualified immunity. But we need not resolve the issue of qualified immunity in this appeal. Although the dissent points to several out-of-circuit cases holding that a court may sua sponte dismiss a prisoner or indigent plaintiff's claim at any time if it believes that the claim is barred by qualified immunity, such a rule has yet to be adopted in this circuit. . . . In any event, we think that the approach taken by the Ninth Circuit strikes the right balance between screening for meritless claims and fidelity to the rules of pleading. . . . Under that approach, a court 'may [sua sponte] dismiss a [prisoner's] claim on qualified immunity grounds ... , but only if it is clear from the complaint that the plaintiff can present no evidence that could overcome a defense of qualified immunity.'. . That is so because '[p]ro se complaints frequently lack sufficient information for a judge to make a qualified immunity determination without the benefit of a responsive pleading or discovery.'. . Such is the case here: Small has a non-frivolous argument that his asserted right was clearly established based on our sister circuits' longstanding recognition of that right. . . It is thus for the district court to determine in the first instance whether Brock is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Small v. Brock, 963 F.3d 539, 544 (6th Cir. June 26, 2020) (Thapar, J., dissenting) ("The allegations in this case are troubling. But the Constitution is not a one-size-fits-all remedy for every injury. And in fact, the Constitution and federal law often limit our authority to address certain injuries. . . .[T]here's little doubt that the alleged constitutional violation here wasn't clearly established and thus that the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. The majority opinion acknowledges as much but still remands the case to the district court. And for what purpose? Just so that the defendant can file a motion to dismiss, which the district court will (almost certainly) grant and our court will (almost certainly) affirm. . . .[T]he majority notes that Small has a 'non-frivolous argument' that the alleged violation in this case was clearly established based on out-of-circuit precedent. But the PLRA doesn't just bar 'frivolous' claims; it bars all claims that 'fail[ ] to state a claim upon which relief may be granted' or 'seek[ ] monetary relief from a defendant who is immune from such relief.'")

Johnson v. Moseley, 790 F.3d 649, 654-57 (6th Cir. 2015) ("There can be no doubt that the Sixth Circuit recognizes a 'constitutionally cognizable claim of malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment.'. . 'Yet, that is not enough.'. . To avoid the qualified immunity defense, plaintiff was required to plead facts making out a violation of a constitutional right clearly established in a 'particularized sense.' That is, the right said to have been violated must be defined 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . Although neither plaintiff nor the district court has defined the right to freedom from malicious prosecution in such a particularized sense, both have relied on our analysis in Sykes v. Anderson. Indeed, Sykes is instructive. In Sykes, we recognized that a showing of 'malice' is not necessarily essential to a malicious prosecution claim under the Fourth Amendment. . . But we also observed that the requisite participation in the decision to prosecute after probable cause has ceased to exist must amount to 'aiding' the decision in more than a passive or neutral way. . . And there must be some element of blameworthiness or culpability in the participation—albeit less than 'malice.' That is, truthful participation in the prosecution decision is not actionable. . . The requisite blameworthiness was made out in Sykes by evidence that both defendant officers testified for the prosecution and each made false statements, made flagrant misrepresentations, or failed to disclose key items of evidence. . .We further clarified the point in Robertson, 753 F.3d at 617, holding that even false testimony is not actionable as malicious prosecution unless deliberate-i.e., given with knowledge of, or reckless disregard for, its falsity. . . Even more recently, the rule was succinctly stated in Newman v. Township of Hamburg, 773 F.3d 769 (6th Cir.2014). A police officer violates a suspect's clearly established right to freedom from malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment 'only when his deliberate or reckless falsehoods result in arrest and prosecution without probable cause.'. . Again, we see that a defendant's participation must be marked by some kind of blameworthiness, something beyond mere negligence or innocent mistake, to satisfy the elements of a malicious prosecution claim under the Fourth Amendment. . . . [A]lthough the district court noted that plaintiff's allegations lacked details, it accepted them as sufficient to meet the notice pleading requirements of Rule 8(a) and warrant further discovery proceedings. Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a). Despite the insufficiency of plaintiff's allegations, the court withheld dismissal based on the possibility that discovery might disclose specific facts substantiating the claim. This ignores the fact that plaintiff, having sued defendant officers for violation of his civil rights, to overcome their assertion of qualified immunity, was obliged to allege facts describing how each defendant's conduct violated a federally protected right under clearly established law. . . Because, as explained above, plaintiff's complaint does not set forth facts meeting this requirement, the claim is subject to dismissal. To be clear, we are not enforcing a 'heightened pleading requirement' that would run afoul of Crawford–El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998); see Goad v. Mitchell, 297 F.3d 497, 501–04 (6th Cir.2002). Rather, consistent with Crawford–El's admonition that 'firm application of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is fully warranted' where qualified immunity is asserted, we enforce the non-controversial requirement that plaintiff 'put forward specific, nonconclusory factual allegations' establishing a cognizable injury in order to withstand a prediscovery motion to dismiss. . . The district court's ruling that plaintiff is entitled to discovery notwithstanding his conclusory allegations flies in the face of qualified immunity's purpose of resolving insubstantial claims as early as possible so as to avoid unnecessarily subjecting government officials to the disruptive burdens of litigation. . . The court's ruling, allowing plaintiff to conduct discovery that may uncover substantiating facts, also undercuts counsel's Rule 11 obligation to conduct a reasonable investigation and uncover evidentiary support for fact allegations before filing the complaint. Fed.R.Civ.P. 11(b)(3). Had counsel undertaken such an investigation and uncovered facts facially substantiating the malicious prosecution claims—facts inadvertently omitted from the original complaint—counsel would naturally have moved the district court for leave to amend the complaint so as to augment the allegations. That counsel made no such motion is telling. And no less telling is it that plaintiff's appellate briefing is also devoid even of argument attempting to put flesh on his 'bare bones' allegations. He maintains simply that his allegations, conclusory though they be, are sufficient. We are not persuaded.")

Shively v. Green Local Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., 579 F. App'x 348, 354 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Given the number and variety of ways the Shivelys allege they contacted school officials, the Shivelys notification of police, medical care professionals, and the guidance counselor, and the Superintendent's knowledge of the ongoing harassment, the complaint plausibly alleges that Brown, Miller, and Wells, as the Principals and Assistant Principal of schools attended by T.S., knew about the ongoing student-on-student bullying and, given their positions of authority, were involved in making decisions regarding how it would be addressed. This conclusion is also supported by the procedural posture of this case, where litigation has continued during the pendency of this appeal and Brown, Miller, and Wells are proper Defendants before this court on the Shivelys' state-law claims. We conclude that the district court did not err in finding that the Shivelys' complaint meets the standard necessary to comply with Rule 8. See Iqbal, 556 U.S at 683–84.")

LaFountain v. Harry, 716 F.3d 944, 951(6th Cir. 2013) ("Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a), '[a] party may amend its pleading once as a matter of course within 21 days after serving it' and, '[i]n all other cases, ... [t]he court should freely give leave [to amend] when justice so requires.' In McGore, however, we held that, when the Prison Litigation Reform Act requires dismissal of a prisoner's claim, a district court cannot grant leave to amend. . . .Every other circuit to have reached the issue disagrees.[collecting cases] Meanwhile, in Jones v. Bock, 549 U.S. 199, 127 S.Ct. 910, 166 L.Ed.2d 798 (2007), the Supreme Court held that 'the PLRA's screening requirement does not—explicitly or implicitly—justify deviating from the usual procedural practice beyond the departures specified by the PLRA itself.'. . The Court reasoned that, 'when Congress meant to depart from the usual procedural requirements, it did so expressly.'. . Jones controls here. The PLRA's screening requirements—28 U.S.C. §§ 1915A(b)(1) & 1915(e)(2)(B); 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(c)(1)—say nothing about whether a district court can allow a prisoner to amend his complaint. Thus, McGore is flatly inconsistent with Jones. We therefore overrule McGore; and we hold, like every other circuit to have reached the issue, that under Rule 15(a) a district court can allow a plaintiff to amend his complaint even when the complaint is subject to dismissal under the PLRA.")

Marcilis v. Township of Redford, 693 F.3d 589, 596, 597 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Though we have not yet addressed this issue in a published opinion, we have found, in an unpublished opinion, that a complaint failed where a plaintiff 'did not allege that particular defendants performed the acts that resulted in a deprivation of [plaintiff's] constitutional rights. This is a requirement in Bivens actions such as this one.'. . .The complaint mentions Doyle and Livingston only in paragraph six, for the purposes of identifying them as employees of the Drug Enforcement Administration. Otherwise, the complaint makes only categorical references to 'Defendants.' We conclude that the district court did not err in dismissing the claims against Doyle and Livingston for failing to 'allege, with particularity, facts that demonstrate what each defendant did to violate the asserted constitutional right.'")

Davis v. Prison Health Services, 679 F.3d 433, 439, 440 (6th Cir. 2012) ("[E]ven if Davis had failed to include allegations about similarly-situated prisoners, his complaint still should not have been dismissed at the pleadings stage. [citing Swierkiewicz] Davis's complaint. . .contains allegations that, if accepted as true, would constitute direct evidence that his removal from the public-works program was improperly motivated by anti-gay animus. By dismissing his claim because he had purportedly failed to identify any similarly situated prisoners, the district court mistakenly required Davis 'to plead more facts than he may ultimately need to prove to succeed on the merits if direct evidence of discrimination is discovered.' . . In sum, Davis has alleged sufficient facts that, accepted as true, state a plausible claim for relief. Accordingly, Davis 'deserves a shot at additional factual development, which is what discovery is designed to give him.' Fabian v. Fulmer Helmets, Inc., 628 F.3d 278, 281 (6th Cir.2010). Dismissal under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1915(e)(2), 1915A and 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(c) for failure to state a claim was improper.")

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. Napolitano, 648 F.3d 365, 378, 379 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Plaintiffs have failed to state a claim against Defendants, in either their official or individual capacities, under the First Amendment. To the extent Plaintiffs seek to challenge the constitutionality of the alleged RWE Policy, Plaintiffs have failed to plausibly allege the existence of such a policy. And to the extent Plaintiffs seek to challenge the alleged retaliation by Defendants on account of Plaintiffs' protected activities, Plaintiffs' allegations are likewise deficient. Plaintiffs have failed to plausibly allege that any actions by Defendants injured Plaintiffs in a way that would deter a person of ordinary firmness from further participation in constitutionally protected activity. Nor have Plaintiffs plausibly alleged that any adverse action by Defendants was motivated at least in part by Plaintiffs' constitutionally protected activity.")

New Albany Tractor, Inc. v. Louisville Tractor, Inc., 650 F.3d 1046, 1050, 1051, 1053 (6th Cir. 2011) ("This new 'plausibility' pleading standard causes a considerable problem for plaintiff here because defendants Scag and Louisville Tractor are apparently the only entities with the information about the price at which Scag sells its equipment to Louisville Tractor. This pricing information is necessary in order for New Albany to allege that it pays a discriminatory price for the same Scag equipment, as required by the language of the Act. This type of exclusive distribution structure makes it particularly difficult to determine whether discriminatory pricing exists. Before Twombly and Iqbal, courts would probably have allowed this case to proceed so that plaintiff could conduct discovery in order to gather the pricing information that is solely retained within the accounting system of Scag and Louisville Tractor. It may be that only Scag and Louisville Tractor have knowledge of whether Scag exercises control over the terms and conditions of Louisville Tractor's sales to retailers, including the retail operations of Louisville Tractor. The plaintiff apparently can no longer obtain the factual detail necessary because the language of Iqbal specifically directs that no discovery may be conducted in cases such as this, even when the information needed to establish a claim of discriminatory pricing is solely within the purview of the defendant or a third party, as it is here. . . .By foreclosing discovery to obtain pricing information, the combined effect of Twombly and Iqbal require plaintiff to have greater knowledge now of factual details in order to draft a 'plausible complaint.'. . Without discovery, pricing information or any fact that would support an allegation of illegal economic collusion becomes far harder to obtain. Under the new Twombly standard set forth by the Supreme Court in an antitrust case, even though a complaint need not contain detailed factual allegations, its '[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true.'. . In this case that means, as the district court held, that plaintiff must allege specific facts of price discrimination even if those facts are only within the head or hands of the defendants. The plaintiff may not use the discovery process to obtain these facts after filing suit. The language of Iqbal, 'not entitled to discovery,' is binding on the lower federal courts. . . . Without discovery, the plaintiff may have no way to find out the facts in the hands of competitors, but Iqbal specifically orders courts, as quoted above, to refuse to order further discovery. If the plaintiff should be able to find out the facts it needs to state a claim, it will have to file another complaint. For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the judgment of the district court.")

Frank v. Dana Corp., 646 F.3d 954, 961 (6th Cir. 2011) ("In the past, we have conducted our scienter analysis in section 10(b) cases by sorting through each allegation individually before concluding with a collective approach. . . However, we decline to follow that approach in light of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Matrixx Initiatives, Inc. v. Siracusano, __ U.S. __, 131 S.Ct. 1309, __ L.Ed.2d __ (2011). There, the Court provided for us a post-Tellabs example of how to consider scienter pleadings 'holistically' in section 10(b) cases. . . Writing for the Court, Justice Sotomayor expertly addressed the allegations collectively, did so quickly, and, importantly, did not parse out the allegations for individual analysis. . . This is the only appropriate approach following Tellabs's mandate to review scienter pleadings based on the collective view of the facts, not the facts individually. . . Our former method of reviewing each allegation individually before reviewing them holistically risks losing the forest for the trees. Furthermore, after Tellabs, conducting an individual review of myriad allegations is an unnecessary inefficiency. Consequently, we will address the Plaintiffs' claims holistically.")

Rondigo, L.L.C. v. Township of Richmond, 641 F.3d 673, 683, 684 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Although plaintiffs' amended complaint contains 250 paragraphs and occupies 54 pages, it contains precious little factual support for the theory that the state defendants' more favorable treatment of Minard demonstrates they were victims of unlawful discrimination. Although plaintiffs conclusorily allege that Minard is similarly situated, exhibits attached to their complaint substantiate undisputed and facially legitimate reasons for the state defendants' complained-of actions in regulating plaintiffs' compost operation at 32 Mile Road–reasons that appear to be unique to that property. Although plaintiffs make various allegations that the state defendants, acting in concert with Richmond Township and its residents, have been unfairly demanding in their enforcement of agricultural and environmental standards, no inference of unlawful discrimination can legitimately arise where the only asserted comparable, Minard, is shown by plaintiffs' own pleadings to be dissimilarly situated in several relevant respects. In short, plaintiffs' allegations that Minard is similarly situated and that his more favorable treatment by defendants evidences unlawful discrimination are exposed as little more than 'legal conclusions couched as factual allegations' and need not be accepted as true under Rule 12(b)(6) scrutiny. . . Plaintiffs' factual allegations fail to 'raise the right to relief above the speculative level.'. . They fail to warrant a 'reasonable inference that [defendants are] liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . When the allegations are viewed in light of the exhibits attached to the complaint, they fall far short of making out a 'plausible claim of entitlement to relief' under either equal protection theory. . . As such, plaintiffs' 'insubstantial' equal protection claim was ripe for dismissal under the doctrine of qualified immunity at the earliest possible stage in the litigation. . . The district court's contrary ruling is based in part on a failure to apply the Supreme Court's teaching in Twombly and Iqbal. The district court expressly recognized the applicability of Twombly, recognized that legal conclusions need not be accepted as true, and recognized that the complaint must set forth 'some factual basis' for the claims asserted. Yet, the court accepted plaintiffs' alleged legal conclusions that Minard was similarly situated and that they were treated differently because of gender-based discrimination without requiring supporting factual allegations. . . . Nothing but legal conclusions suggests that the state defendants acted with unlawful discriminatory animus. . . . Based on the foregoing analysis, we conclude the district court erred by denying the state defendants' motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. The factual allegations in the complaint, viewed in conjunction with the exhibits attached to the complaint, are insufficient to make out a valid equal protection claim under the 'plausibility standard' prescribed by the Supreme Court in Twombly and Iqbal.") Hill v. Lappin, 630 F.3d 468 (6th Cir. 2010) (holding that the Twombly/ Iqbal plausibility standard applies to dismissals of prisoner cases for failure to state claim under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1915A(b)(1) and 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii)).)

Nali v. Ekman, 355 F. App'x 909, 2009 WL 4641737, at *3 (6th Cir. Dec. 9, 2009) ("In order to plead a cognizable § 1985 claim, Nali must allege specific facts that, taken together, plausibly suggest that (1) two or more individuals 'conspire[d] ... for the purpose of depriving [him] of the equal protection of the laws,' (2) they acted to further that conspiracy and (3) he was injured as a result. . . As the magistrate and district court recognized, Nali failed to plead sufficient facts to state a cognizable Equal Protection Clause claim. In connection with this requirement, he alleged that '[d]efendants' motives were racially based [and] supported by animosity towards plaintiff.' But, as the Supreme Court recently held, a complaint that includes conclusory allegations of discriminatory intent without additional supporting details does not sufficiently show that the pleader is entitled to relief. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1950-51 (2009). Nali's claim can survive only if he pleaded facts supporting that conclusion. He has not done so. The fact that 'defendants are caucasian' and that Nali 'is non-caucasian' does not by itself show that defendants were motivated to discriminate against him on the basis of his race or ethnicity. Although Nali adds that 'no one else was ticketed' for similar conduct (being in the chow hall at the wrong time), that fact does not show discrimination unless accompanied by some evidence that the people not disciplined were similarly situated and of a different race, see Coker v. Summit County Sheriff's Dept., 90 F. App'x 782, 790 (6th Cir.2003) (unpublished disposition)–facts he does not allege in his complaint. The district court properly dismissed this claim.").

In re Travel Agent Com'n Antitrust Litigation, 583 F.3d 896, 912-15 (6th Cir. 2009)(Merritt, J., dissenting) ("The Supreme Court majority has made clear that it is not making a major change in the law of pleading with Twombly and its progeny. . . As with any other new, general legal standard, the nature and meaning of the newly modified standard can be understood and followed only by analyzing how the standard is applied in actual cases like this case. Here my colleagues have seriously misapplied the new standard by requiring not simple 'plausibility,' but by requiring the plaintiff to present at the pleading stage a strong probability of winning the case and excluding any possibility that the defendants acted independently and not in unison. My colleagues are requiring the plaintiff to offer detailed facts that if true would create a clear and convincing case of antitrust liability at trial without allowing the plaintiff the normal right to conduct discovery and have the jury draw reasonable inferences of liability from strong direct and circumstantial evidence. . . . The antitrust cases decided in both courts of appeals and district courts since Twombly and Iqbal are few, and most of the cases decided by district courts have yet to reach the courts of appeals. . . The uniformity needed for the rule of law and equal justice to prevail is lacking. This irregularity may be attributed to the desire of some courts, like my colleagues here, to use the pleading rules to keep the market unregulated, while others refuse to use the pleading rules as a cover for knocking out antitrust claims. . . . There are many, including my colleagues, whose preference for an unregulated laissez faire market place is so strong that they would eliminate market regulation through private antitrust enforcement. Using the new Twombly pleading rule, it is possible to do away with price fixing cases based on reasonable inferences from strong circumstantial evidence.").

Hensley Mfg. v. ProPride, Inc., 579 F.3d 603, 609 n.4 (6th Cir. 2009) ("The Supreme Court has recently clarified that its decision in Twombly'expounded the pleading standard for Aall civil actions,"' despite the fact that Twombly itself arose in the context of an antitrust suit. . . The Court's decision in Iqbal made clear that the Twombly standard is not limited to 'sprawling, costly, and hugely time-consuming' litigation, Twombly, 550 U.S. at 560 n. 6,dispelling such speculation by courts both within and outside this circuit.").

National Business Development Services, Inc. v. American Credit Educ. and Consulting, Inc.., 299 F. App'x 509, 2008 WL 4772074, at *2, *3 (6th Cir. Oct. 31, 2008) ("Plaintiff asked this court to determine whether Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 2200 (2007), rather than Bell Atlantic, should be used to determine the specificity with which a complaint must be filed. Plaintiff specifically asserted that Erickson, which was issued by the Supreme Court after Bell Atlantic, set forth a more liberal standard. The district court correctly applied Bell Atlantic, as the facts of the instant case are more akin to those at issue in Bell Atlantic. Erickson concerned a pro se litigant, 'and "a pro se complaint, however inartfully pleaded, must be held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers."' . . Bell Atlantic, however, concerned an anti-trust matter, where the case emphasized the heightened possibility for abuse among lawsuits of this specie. . . . Copyright infringement, like anti-trust actions,lends itself readily to abusive litigation, since the high cost of trying such a case can force a defendant who might otherwise be successful in trial to settle in order to avoid the time and expenditure of a resource intensive case. Therefore, greater particularity in pleading , through showing 'plausible grounds,' is required.").

Back v. Hall, 537 F.3d 552, 558 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Hall and Schrader separately argue that Back has failed to establish a prima facie case of political-affiliation dismissal. Were this appeal before us in the context of the denial of a summary judgment motion, we might entertain their argument. But it is not. Because we are at the pleading stage of this case, and because there is no 'heightened pleading requirement ... for civil rights plaintiffs in cases in which the defendant raises the affirmative defense of qualified immunity,' . . . Back was not required to plead her prima facie case . . . . But for now, at the pleading stage, it suffices that Back alleged that she 'was terminated by defendants Hall and Schrader by reason of her political affiliation as a Democrat.'").

Lambert v. Hartman, 517 F.3d 433, at 439, 440, 442, 445, 446 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Although the factual allegations in a complaint need not be detailed, they 'must do more than create speculation or suspicion of a legally cognizable cause of action; they must show entitlement to relief.' League of United Latin Am. Citizens v. Bredesen, 500 F.3d 523, 527 (6th Cir.2007) (emphasis in original) (citing Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1964-65 (2007)). . . . [T]his court has recognized an informational-privacy interest of constitutional dimension in only two instances: (1) where the release of personal information could lead to bodily harm (Kallstrom), and (2) where the information released was of a sexual, personal, and humiliating nature (Bloch). . . . Lambert's first argument is a request for us to adopt a new approach to assessing informational privacy claims– one that does not require the court to first determine whether the privacy interest implicates a fundamental right. The reasonable-expectation-of-privacy standard that Lambert proposes is in many ways similar to the more fluid approach that other circuits have adopted for assessing claims of informational privacy. . . . Employing this standard, Lambert argues that she has a reasonable expectation of privacy in her Social Security number, and that the district court therefore erred in failing to balance that interest against the Defendants' interest in publishing unredacted public records on the internet. Lambert is of course correct in pointing out that both Congress and the courts have recognized the privacy interest in one's Social Security number. . . . The Sixth Circuit, however, has developed and applied a different approach to assessing informational privacy claims. As discussed above, that approach requires that the asserted privacy interest implicate a fundamental right. . . . We are bound by those decisions unless this court sitting en banc or the Supreme Court holds otherwise, and Lambert's argument must fail for that reason. . . . Lambert has undoubtedly shown that, as a policy matter, the Clerk's decision to provide unfettered internet access to people's Social Security numbers was unwise. This much is evidenced by the fact that the Defendants have subsequently removed the citations in question from the website and changed the local rules to better protect sensitive personal information. But to constitutionalize a harm of the type Lambert has suffered would be to open a Pandora's box of claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 , a step that we are unwilling to take. . . . Indeed, absent a showing of an infringement of a right that is 'fundamental or implicit in the concept of ordered liberty,' this court's precedents bar an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 from proceeding any further.").

Midwest Media Property, L.L.C. v. Symmes Tp., Ohio, 503 F.3d 456, *472 & n.3 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Admittedly, the notice pleading requirement was amended slightly by the Supreme Court's recent decision in Bell Atlantic Co. v. Twombly, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), which held that 'a plaintiff's obligation to provide the Agrounds" of his Aentitlement to relief" requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do....' . . . Twombly does not apply here, however, because Plaintiff has coupled its allegations with facts which suggest that Defendant has deprived it of its alleged right to post signs. . . . Twombly involved a claim under ' 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, which requires the plaintiff to prove that the defendants engaged in a 'contract, combination ... or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce.'. . Rather than alleging that such collusion existed, however, the Twombly plaintiff merely alleged that the defendants were operating their businesses in a manner which is consistent with collusion, and then invited the courts to conclude that a conspiracy must follow from this circumstantial evidence. . . . The Supreme Court held that, under ' 1 of the Sherman Act, a 'bare assertion of conspiracy' is not sufficient to state a claim. . . Instead, the Twombly plaintiff was also required to plead facts which 'raise[ ] a suggestion' of actual collusion. . . In other words, Twombly was a case where the plaintiff invoked a statute banning collusion, but failed to actually state any facts suggesting collusion. This stands in stark contrast to the instant case. Here, Plaintiff alleges a violation of the First Amendment's Free Speech Clause, and supports its allegation with specific examples of instances where the challenged regulations denied it the ability to speak freely. Plaintiff expressly states that it has been unable to post signs '[a]s a result of the Township's enforcement of its Sign Regulations.'. . It cites nine specific examples where it was denied its alleged rights as a direct result of the Township's denial of Plaintiff's applications to post signs.").

Association of Cleveland Fire Fighters v. City of Cleveland, Ohio, 502 F.3d 545, 548 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The Supreme Court has recently clarified the law with respect to what a plaintiff must plead in order to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007). The Court stated that 'a plaintiff's obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.'. . Additionally, the Court emphasized that even though a complaint need not contain 'detailed' factual allegations, its '[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true.'. . In so holding, the Court disavowed the oft-quoted Rule 12(b)(6) standard of *Conley v. Weisbarth v. Geauga Park Dist., 499 F.3d 538, 542 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Iqbal thus held that Twombly's plausibility standard did not significantly alter notice pleading or impose heightened pleading requirements for all federal claims. Instead, Iqbal interpreted Twombly to require more concrete allegations only in those instances in which the complaint, on its face, does not otherwise set forth a plausible claim for relief. . . see also Collins v. Marva Collins Preparatory Sch., No. 1:05cv614, 2007 WL 1989828, at *3 n.1 (S.D.Ohio July 9, 2007) (noting that eight federal district courts in the Sixth Circuit have thus far applied Twombly in the manner described in Iqbal, while only one has restricted Twombly to the antitrust-conspiracy context).Ultimately, as explained below, our disposition of Weisbarth's claim does not depend upon the nuances of Twombly's effect on the dismissal standard. We therefore need not resolve the scope of that decision here.").

Lindsay v. Yates, 498 F.3d 434, 440 n.6 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Swierkiewicz was discussed extensively by the dissent in the Supreme Court's recent decision in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007). Twombly addressed requirements for pleading an antitrust claim under ' 1 of the Sherman Act. The dissent argued that the Twombly majority had devised a 'new pleading rule' that called into question the continued vitality of Swierkiewicz. 127 S.Ct. at 1974 (Stevens, J., dissenting). Because the Supreme Court majority distinguished Swierkiewicz and nowhere expressed an intent to overturn it, we have no basis for concluding that Swierkiewicz is no longer good law. Moreover, although this case does not present the question of

if, or exactly how, Twombly has changed the pleading requirements of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a), we note that in Erickson v. Pardus, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 167 L.Ed.2d 1081 (2007), decided after Twombly, the Supreme Court reaffirmed that Rule 8(a) 'requires only a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.'").

Although these Forms 'illustrate the simplicity and brevity,' Fed.R.Civ.P. 84, that the Rules formerly contemplated, the allegations as set forth in Forms 11 and 15 would surely fail as 'legal conclusions [of negligence and conversion] couched as factual allegation [s],' under Twombly and Iqbal.").

Bell v. City of Cleveland, 548 F.Supp.2d 444, 448-50 (N.D. Ohio 2008) ("In an excessive force action, involving the question of qualified immunity , the officer's intent or motive is not determinative. . .Rather, the issue regarding Officer Delvecchio will be the objective legal reasonableness of his action in view of the circumstances he confronted, assessed in light of clearly established legal rules. . . Thus, Crawford-El and Goad are inapposite, and do not support the application of Rule 7(a) to require a reply in this case. . . Delvecchio's motion seeks to move the complaint beyond the 'short and plain statement' requirements of Civil Rule 8(a). . . He requests that the court order a reply which sets forth 'specific facts (not conclusory allegations) that demonstrate a genuine issue of fact regarding Officer Delvecchio's right to qualified immunity at this time.'. . Essentially, Delvecchio seeks to impose a summary judgment standard under Rule 56 onto the initial pleadings of this case. Moreover, Delvecchio implies that the complaint is insufficient in that it does not reflect the version of facts as set forth in his answer. . . The court reads the complaint as alleging specific facts, not merely conclusory allegations. . . While those alleged facts are (not surprisingly) contested at this early stage of the litigation, it is not accurate to say that the complaint contains merely 'conclusory allegations.'. . [T]he allegations of the complaint in this case are specific in setting forth a factual scenario (albeit contested) of the shooting. . . The Supreme Court has consistently rejected heightened pleading standards not required by the Federal Rules themselves. Last year, the Court rejected the Sixth Circuit's requirement that prisoners plead and demonstrate exhaustion in complaints under the Prison Litigation Reform Act. . . . Although the court must look to the complaint when evaluating an assertion of qualified immunity in an excessive force action, 'there is no heightened pleading requirement for such claims.' . . . In summary, Crawford-El and Goad do not support the application of Rule 7(a) to require a reply in this case.").

Rice v. Wells Fargo Home Mortg., 2007 WL 4126525, at *4 (E.D.Mich. Nov. 19, 2007)("The Sixth Circuit has not expressly ruled on the scope of Twombly, but several cases have mentioned it. On August 15, 2007, the Sixth Circuit noted that in Erickson v. Pardus, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 167 L.Ed.2d 1081 (2007), decided after Twombly, the Supreme Court reaffirmed that Rule 8(a) 'requires only a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.' Lindsay v. Yates. . . .. Lindsay, however, did not require that the court decide the question of if or how Twombly changed the pleading requirements of Fed. R. Civ. Pro. 8(a). On August 24, 2007, the Sixth Circuit noted the uncertainty of Twombly' s effect. Weisbarth v. Geauga Park District, 499 F.3d 538, 2007 WL 2403659 at *3 (6th Cir. August 24, 2007). On August 28, 2007, the Sixth Circuit applied, without comment, the standard from Twombly. League of United American Citizens v. Bredesen, 500 F.3d 523, 2007 WL 2416474 at *2 (6th Cir. August 28, 2007). On September 25, 2007, the Sixth Circuit applied Twombly, which it found 'requires that the factual allegations of a complaint Abe enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level."'Association of Cleveland Fire Fighters v. City of Cleveland, Ohio, 502 F.3d 545, 2007 WL 2768285 at *3, (6th Cir. September 25, 2007) while the dissent argued that Twombly did not alter the federal pleading requirements.").

Carrasquillo v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:10-CV-219, 2010 WL 3893616, at *2 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 27, 2010) ("Although the plaintiff's complaint sets forth sparse factual allegations, the Iqbal standard does not require more to survive a motion to dismiss. The facts Carrasquillo alleges sufficiently support his wrongful arrest and imprisonment claims at this stage of litigation. Carrasquillo correctly points out that much of the information demanded by the defendants' motion rests in their own hands. Without further discovery, this Court will not require the plaintiff to allege with detail the methodology the defendants used to conduct their investigation, the manner by which that investigation unfolded, or the precise role each defendant played in the investigation and arrest. Similarly, this Court will not require detailed factual allegations regarding the existence and validity of an arrest warrant still undisclosed to the plaintiff. Though Rule 8 'does not unlock the doors of discovery', neither does it require plaintiffs to allege facts that only discovery could reveal. In addition, if this Court accepts Carrasquillo's allegations as true, which it must in evaluating a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, it is plausible that the plaintiff has suffered false arrest and imprisonment. The plaintiff states that he was arrested, briefly jailed, and released without charge. All parties identify the plaintiff's 17-year-old son as the correct target of the arrest. According to the plaintiff, he was 44 years old at the time of his arrest. The plaintiff also says that he repeatedly asserted his innocence during the arrest. . . and that he repeatedly identified himself. . . . Taken as true, these facts could plausibly suggest either that probable cause did not support the arrest, or that the defendants incorrectly executed a warrant against someone they could not reasonably mistake for 17-year-old Nelson Carrasquillo, Jr.").

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Felton v. City of Chicago, 827 F.3d 632, 635-37 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Felton's allegations—that when he fled officers along an expressway, they chased him, rammed his car, and used stun guns on him—were not frivolous. . . If the judge dismissed the suit as factually frivolous, he abused his discretion. A claim is legally frivolous if it is 'based on an indisputably meritless legal theory.'. . Felton's theory is familiar: he says officers used excessive force in arresting him, which violates the Fourth Amendment (applicable to the states through the Fourteenth). As an initial matter, Felton's suit would lack 'even an arguable basis in law' if his injuries were self-inflicted and the officers caused him no harm. That may be what the district judge concluded after reading the newspapers. But when screening for frivolousness, 'the complaint is the entire record of the case.'. . The 'frivolousness determination, frequently made sua sponte before the defendant has even been asked to file an answer, cannot serve as a factfinding process for the resolution of disputed facts.'. . Felton says the judge relied on the newspapers to dismiss his suit. And though the City did not file a brief, it sent a letter to the court, agreeing with Felton that the district court dismissed the suit 'based on the court's independent research into newspaper accounts of the underlying incident.' If the judge did so, that is unjustifiable, no matter how deferential our review. In our analysis, we credit Felton's allegation that the officers caused his injuries. Felton argues that the legal viability of his suit depends on facts that could not have been determined at the screening stage. For example, he asks 'whether the police were justified in chasing [him] in the first place.' But that's irrelevant because 'pre-seizure conduct is not subject to Fourth Amendment scrutiny.' Carter v. Buscher, 973 F.2d 1328, 1332–33 (7th Cir. 1992); see also California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621, 626–27 (1991). . . Felton also questions whether the officers had 'some other purpose,' aside from stopping his flight. But the Fourth Amendment analysis is objective, so the officers' intentions do not matter. . . Objectively, at least one part of Felton's complaint was legally viable: his allegation that he was shot by multiple stun guns. Nothing in the complaint says that this happened during the car chase. A reasonable inference is that it happened afterward. And nothing in the complaint says whether Felton was subdued, passively resisting, or actively resisting at the time. Discovery may reveal that he was actively resisting, but at the screening stage the judge was required to draw the reasonable inference that Felton was subdued or only passively resisting. In that case, shooting him with stun guns could violate clearly established law. . . Dismissing these allegations as frivolous was an abuse of discretion. As to the legal effect of Felton's allegations that officers rammed his car, the parties were correct to focus on the objective dangerousness of the car chase. Officers are allowed to end a highly dangerous car chase by ramming the fleeing car. . . But, as Felton stresses, the complaint does not say that the chase was dangerous. Felton's chase might have been like O.J. Simpson's: low-speed, on a deserted expressway, with officers following at a safe distance. If Felton posed no danger but officers rammed his car, a Fourth Amendment claim would not be frivolous. . . It might be fair to say that a car chase along an expressway is usually dangerous, so the inference that the chase was O.J.like is not reasonable. And if the chase in this case was not dangerous, Felton should have said that in his complaint. But even if that was the case, when a plaintiff—especially a pro se plaintiff—fails to state a claim in his first complaint, he should ordinarily be given a chance to amend. . . And because Felton's stun gun allegations stated a claim, the case must be returned to the district court. Because Felton did not name the specific officers involved in his arrest, he must amend his complaint, so he will have the opportunity to add detail to his car chase allegations. On remand, the parties should know that in Scott v. Harris, the Supreme Court refused to accept the non-movant's version of the facts at summary judgment because that version was clearly contradicted by a video of the chase. . . If video exists that clearly contradicts Felton's story, an early and cost-efficient motion for summary judgment might be appropriate. Of course, as the Scott dissent noted, . . . video may not tell the whole story and reasonable people can sometimes draw different conclusions from the same video. If the defendants move for summary judgment, the parties should know that Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56(d) allows non-movants to argue that further discovery is necessary to resolve the motion.")

Herron v. Meyer, 820 F.3d 860, 863-64 (7th Cir. 2016) ("If Meyer set out to punish Herron for his grievances, then a price has been attached to speech. The district court thought otherwise in part because Herron had not attached his grievances to the complaint, but that was not necessary; a complaint narrates a claim and need not supply the proof. That comes later. . . And if, as we doubt, an amendment to the complaint was required, the district court should have allowed it rather than dismissing the claim. . . Whether a penalty has been attached to protected speech is potentially more difficult. Many decisions assume that essentially everything a prisoner says in the grievance system—if not everything a prisoner says to a guard—is protected by the First Amendment. See, e.g., DeWalt v. Carter, 224 F.3d 607, 618 (7th Cir.2000); Pearson v. Welborn, 471 F.3d 732, 741 (7th Cir.2006). These decisions do not discuss a parallel line of cases about grievances that public workers make about the conditions of their employment. That line of cases attempts to distinguish statements on topics of public importance (protected) from personal gripes (unprotected) and statements that disrupt the workplace (also unprotected). . . The decisions in the prison-grievance line do not explain why the First Amendment offers greater protection to prisoners than to public employees. We do not get into that here, because the subject has not been addressed in the briefs. It is enough to flag the subject as worth attention, either in some future litigation or in this case if, contrary to our expectations, the First Amendment theory turns out to matter. The judgment of the district court is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Childress v. Walker, 787 F.3d 433, 440-41 (7th Cir. 2015) ("[A]llegations that a prison administrator knew that the conditions of a prisoner's mandatory release included a ban on computer-related material, but nevertheless instituted, condoned, or willfully turned a blind eye to a practice that placed computer-related material among prisoners' possessions, state a claim for relief under the Eighth Amendment. These are the precise allegations that Mr. Childress sets forth in his complaint. He alleges that there is a regular practice of placing computer disks with inmates' property. . . Moreover, he alleges that prison administrators knew of this practice and knew that this practice put at least some recently released prisoners in jeopardy of losing their freedom, but nevertheless did not alter, change, or otherwise intervene to prevent the harm. Specifically, on his return to BMRCC in November 2010, Assistant Warden Bates admitted to Mr. Childress that two other inmates had been re-incarcerated on the basis of 'the same policies, practice, and procedures regarding floppy disk[s] associated with institutional programs being placed in the outgoing property of inmates by IDOC Employees.'. . . To survive dismissal, a plaintiff's complaint 'need only "give the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests."'. . Here, Mr. Childress alerts Assistant Warden Bates to his claim and to the basis of that claim: Assistant Warden Bates, as 'Assistant Warden of Programs,'. . was familiar with the practices of the Lifestyle Redirection Program; he knew that the practices of the Lifestyle Redirection Program, or of similar programs, were causing recently released inmates to lose their freedom, but did nothing to prevent this harm; indeed he 'continued to adhere to[ ] and follow these same policies, practices, and procedures all to the detriment and deprivation of the plaintiff[']s Constitutional Rights.'. .These allegations satisfy the notice pleading requirement of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2).")

Adams v. City of Indianapolis, 742 F.3d 720, 733 (7th Cir. 2014) ("For all its heft, the amended complaint alludes to disparate impact in wholly conclusory terms. In several places the complaint uses the words 'disproportionate' and 'impermissible impact' and other synonyms, but those are bare legal conclusions, not facts. We reiterate that '[t]hreadbare recitals of the elements of the cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice' to state a plausible claim for relief. . . Moreover, '[t]his is a complex discrimination claim, and we have observed that under Iqbal and Twombly, "[t]he required level of factual specificity rises with the complexity of the claim."'. . In a complex disparate-impact case like this one, we would expect to see some factual content in the complaint tending to show that the City's testing process, or some particular part of it, caused a relevant and statistically significant disparity between black and white applicants for promotion. The amended complaint contains no factual allegations of this sort. We are told that the promotion-testing process during this period had several component parts, but the plaintiffs do not identify which part they are attacking. Perhaps they could try to demonstrate that the different elements of the testing process are not capable of separation for analysis, see 42 U.S.C. § 2000e–2(k)(1)(B)(i); this flaw alone might not be fatal. The far more serious problem is the complete lack of factual content directed at disparate-impact liability. There are no allegations about the number of applicants and the racial makeup of the applicant pool as compared to the candidates promoted or as compared to the police or fire department as a whole. There are no allegations about the racial makeup of the relevant workforce in the Indianapolis metropolitan area or the supervisory ranks in the police and fire departments. There are no factual allegations tending to show a causal link between the challenged testing protocols and a statistically significant racial imbalance in the ranks of sergeant, lieutenant, or captain in the police department or battalion chief, lieutenant, or captain in the fire department. Disparate-impact plaintiffs are permitted to rely on a variety of statistical methods and comparisons to support their claims. At the pleading stage, some basic allegations of this sort will suffice. But the amended complaint contains no allegations of the kind, nor any other factual material to move the disparate-impact claims over the plausibility threshold. Accordingly, these claims were properly dismissed on the pleadings.")

Turley v. Rednour, 729 F.3d 625, 651, 652 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Twombly and Iqbal direct us to consider whether the plaintiff's claims are plausible. However, it is important to keep in mind that even after Twombly and Iqbal, pro se complaints like Turley's are to be construed liberally. See, e.g., Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 93–94 (2007) (per curiam); Munson v. Gaetz, 673 F.3d 630, 632–33 (7th Cir.2012). Here, Turley survives dismissal because his claims are plausible and his complaint sets out more than conclusory statements. . . Turley argues that frequent lockdowns for substantial periods of time have deprived him of exercise and caused him various health issues. The State's response is that Turley has failed to allege a constitutionally sufficient injury, especially since no individual lockdown exceeded 90 days, and the defendants were not deliberately indifferent to Turley's or the other inmates' situation. The district court dismissed this claim because it thought that Turley had not listed specific periods of confinement, but this conclusion is incorrect. The State relies heavily on Pearson v. Ramos, 237 F.3d 881, 886 (7th Cir.2001), for the notion that there exists an ironclad rule that a denial of yard privileges shorter than 90 consecutive days cannot be the basis for an Eighth Amendment claim. However, the State has misconstrued this rule. In Pearson, we stated that we thought 'it a reasonable rule that a denial of yard privileges for no more than 90 days at a stretch is not cruel and unusual punishment.'. . However, we were careful to explain that the 'norm of proportionality' would guide the acceptable duration of lockdown. Even a lockdown not exceeding 90 days could violate that norm if it were 'impos [ed] ... for some utterly trivial infraction of the prison's disciplinary rules.'")

Luevano v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 722 F.3d 1014, 1021-25 & n.5, 1027, 1028 (7th Cir. 2013) ("IFP plaintiffs have the same right as other plaintiffs to amend a timely filed complaint at least once as a matter of course pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a) and to make further amendments with leave of court. The only difference regarding IFP and fee-paying plaintiffs arises in section 1915(e), which directs courts to screen all complaints filed with requests to proceed IFP and provides that 'the court shall dismiss the case at any time' if, among other things, the action is frivolous or malicious or 'fails to state a claim on which relief may be granted....' 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2). If a district court's sua sponte dismissal in such cases were without leave to amend, we would face serious questions about fair access to the courts. Without at least an opportunity to amend or to respond to an order to show cause, an IFP applicant's case could be tossed out of court without giving the applicant any timely notice or opportunity to be heard to clarify, contest, or simply request leave to amend. . . . District courts must allow IFP plaintiffs leave to amend at least once in all circumstances in which such leave would be granted to feepaying plaintiffs under Rule 15(a). . . . We therefore join the majority of other circuits in interpreting section 1915(e) not only to permit granting IFP plaintiffs leave to amend complaints dismissed for failure to state a claim but also to require granting IFP plaintiffs leave to amend their complaints at least once when Rule 15(a) would allow amendment in the case of fee-paying litigants. . . .We have previously recognized an additional interpretive question regarding section 1915's use of the word 'case,' leaving as an open question whether or not section '1915(e)(2)'s requirement that "the case" be dismissed necessitates the dismissal of the entire action or merely the complaint....' Furnace v. Bd. of Trustees of Southern Illinois Univ., 218 F.3d 666, 669 (7th Cir.2000). Today we also resolve that issue: Section 1915 requires the district court to dismiss only the complaint, not the entire action, and the court should grant leave to amend in all cases in which a fee-paying plaintiff would enjoy leave to amend under Rule 15(a). . . . On the merits, we conclude that the district court erred in dismissing Luevano's original complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. . . .The original complaint stated claims for relief. As a preliminary matter, the pleading standards for pro se plaintiffs are considerably relaxed, Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 94 (2007) (per curiam), even in the wake of Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). . . . Neither Iqbal nor Twombly overruled Swierkiewicz, and it is our duty to apply the Supreme Court's precedents unless and until the Supreme Court itself overrules them.")

Engel v. Buchan, 710 F.3d 698, 699, 708-10 (7th Cir. 2013) ("A Bivens cause of action is available for violations of Brady. Although the Supreme Court has cautioned against extending Bivens to new contexts, this case meets the Court's requirements for doing so and is materially indistinguishable from Bivens itself. And Engel's complaint contains enough factual specificity to state a plausible claim for violation of his due-process rights under Brady. Because the Brady obligation was well established at the time of the events at issue here (Buchan does not argue otherwise), qualified immunity does not apply. . . . [S]haky or no, Bivens remains the law, and we are not free to ignore it. As recently as last year, the Supreme Court reaffirmed the standards for resolving new Bivens questions. Minneci, 132 S.Ct. at 621. Applying those standards here, we conclude, consistent with our decision in Manning I, that a Bivens cause of action is available for a Brady violation committed by a federal law-enforcement agent in connection with a state criminal prosecution. . . . Buchan also argues that even if Engel has a cause of action under Bivens, qualified immunity applies because the complaint does not contain sufficiently specific factual allegations to plausibly state a claim for violation of Engel's due-process rights. . . . It is beyond dispute that the Brady right was well established at the time of the events set forth in Engel's complaint. . . Buchan does not argue otherwise. Instead, he maintains that Engel's complaint lacks sufficient factual content to state a claim for a Brady violation under the pleading standard announced in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). . . .Buchan argues that Engel makes only conclusory allegations with respect to his central claim of wrongdoing—as, for example, when he alleges that '[a]ll of the evidence introduced against Plaintiff at his trial was the product of intentional misconduct by the Defendants, who fabricated evidence, manipulated witnesses, and withheld exculpatory evidence.' Were this the entirety of the factual allegations in the complaint, Buchan might have a point. . . .But Iqbal makes clear that 'legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint' so long as they are 'supported by factual allegations,'. . . and that is the case here. Read as a whole, Engel's complaint easily contains enough specific factual allegations to state a plausible claim for violation of his due-process rights under Brady. [court reviews factual allegations] These allegations, read in context with the rest of the complaint, surpass the plausibility threshold of Twombly and Iqbal.")

Richards v. Mitcheff, 696 F.3d 635, 638 (7th Cir. 2012) ("This suit. . . could not properly be dismissed under either Rule 12(b)(6) or Rule 12(c). The claim is sound in theory (see Farmer and Gamble); the complaint's allegations make an eighth-amendment recovery plausible. Indiana allows tolling because of physical incapacity—and, far from pleading that he was capable of suing throughout the two years after his first surgery, Richards pleaded incapacity, again plausibly. The district judge had this to say: 'Richards' explanations for the delay are unpersuasive.' That's it. No other analysis. The court did not identify a legal obstacle to the suit; the judge just deemed the allegations 'unpersuasive.' But a judge cannot reject a complaint's plausible allegations by calling them 'unpersuasive.' Only a trier of fact can do that, after a trial. For their part, defendants seem to be unaware that state law supplies the principles of tolling in litigation under § 1983; neither of the two briefs filed by appellees mentions Indiana's tolling rules. We appreciate the judicial desire to resolve cases as swiftly as possible. Litigation is costly for both sides, and a doomed suit should be brought to a conclusion before costs are needlessly run up. Twombly designed its plausibility requirement as a partial antidote to the high costs of discovery and trial. But neither Twombly nor Iqbal has changed the rule that judges must not make findings of fact at the pleading stage (or for that matter the summary-judgment stage). A complaint that invokes a recognized legal theory (as this one does) and contains plausible allegations on the material issues (as this one does) cannot be dismissed under Rule 12. See Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007). Judges should respect the norm that complaints need not anticipate or meet potential affirmative defenses. If the facts are uncontested (or the defendants accept plaintiffs' allegations for the sake of argument), it may be possible to decide under Rule 12(c); if the parties do not agree, but one side cannot substantiate its position with admissible evidence, the court may grant summary judgment under Rule 56. But this case has not reached the stage where Richards's allegations of physical incapacity are put to the test. Once Richards has had an opportunity to produce evidence material to the tolling question, its sufficiency under Indiana law can be tested by a motion for summary judgment. Before proceeding further, however, the district court should consider carefully whether to assist Richards in finding a lawyer who can muster the facts and, if necessary, secure medical experts.")

Norfleet v. Walker, 684 F.3d 688, 691 (7th Cir. 2012) ("There are unanswered questions about the statutory claim, and if the plaintiff were represented we might deem the complaint insufficient under the enhanced pleading standard imposed by Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 680–81 (2009). But as a pro se (as well as a prisoner and thus severely limited in his ability to conduct the kind of precomplaint investigation required by Iqbal), the plaintiff has pleaded enough to avert dismissal.")

Geinosky v. City of Chicago, 675 F.3d 743, 745 n.1, 748 n.3 (7th Cir. 2012) ("The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). A motion under Rule 12(b)(6) can be based only on the complaint itself, documents attached to the complaint, documents that are critical to the complaint and referred to in it, and information that is subject to proper judicial notice. . . .A plaintiff, however, has much more flexibility in opposing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion and in appealing a dismissal. A party appealing a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal may elaborate on his factual allegations so long as the new elaborations are consistent with the pleadings. . . In the district court, too, a party opposing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion may submit materials outside the pleadings to illustrate the facts the party expects to be able to prove. . . . In the turmoil concerning civil pleading standards stirred up by Ashcroft v. Iqbal . . .and Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly . . . a plaintiff who is opposing a Rule 12(b)(6) or Rule 12(c) motion and who can provide such illustration may find it prudent to do so. (It may also be prudent to explain to the district court that the materials are being submitted for illustrative purposes and should not be used to convert the motion into a Rule 56 motion for summary judgment.) . . . . Even in a case where a plaintiff would need to identify a similarly situated person to prove his case, like the McDonald case cited by the district court on this point, we see no basis for requiring the plaintiff to identify the person in the complaint. McDonald was decided on summary judgment, not on the pleadings. . . Rule 8(a)(2) requires only 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.' Even the more demanding pleading requirements under Iqbal and Twombly do not require a plaintiff to identify specific comparators in a complaint.")

McCauley v. City of Chicago, 671 F.3d 611, 616-19 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Though the district court's analysis was faulty, the equal-protection claim against the City was properly dismissed. To state a Monell claim against the City for violation of Mersaides's right to equal protection, McCauley was required to 'plead[ ] factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference' that the City maintained a policy, custom, or practice of intentional discrimination against a class of persons to which Mersaides belonged. . . He did not meet this burden. . . . We have interpreted Twombly and Iqbal to require the plaintiff to 'provid[e] some specific facts' to support the legal claims asserted in the complaint. . . The degree of specificity required is not easily quantified, but 'the plaintiff must give enough details about the subject-matter of the case to present a story that holds together.'. . The required level of factual specificity rises with the complexity of the claim. . . . This case is more like Brooks than Swanson. Many of the alleged 'facts' are actually legal conclusions or elements of the cause of action, which may be disregarded on a motion to dismiss. . . For example, McCauley alleges that the City 'has an unwritten custom, practice and policy to afford lesser protection or none at all to victims of domestic violence' and that '[t]here is no rational basis' for this purported policy. Similarly, McCauley alleged the following:

[The City], through its agents, employees and/or servants, acting under color of law, at the level of official policy, practice, and custom, with deliberate, callous, and conscious indifference to McCauley's constitutional rights, authorized, tolerated, and institutionalized the practices and ratified the illegal conduct herein detailed, and at all times material to this Complaint, [the City] had interrelated de facto policies, practices, and customs.

These are the legal elements of the various claims McCauley has asserted; they are not factual allegations and as such contribute nothing to the plausibility analysis under *Twombly/Iqbal.*Once the legal conclusions are disregarded, just one paragraph of factual allegations remains:

Defendant violated McCauley's constitutional rights under 42 U.S .C. § 1983 by:

a. failing to provide adequate security and promptly arrest Martinez;

b. failing to promulgate any policy to ensure the prompt arrest of individuals guilty of violating protective orders;

c. maintaining a policy or custom of failing to timely arrest violators of protective orders;

d. maintaining a custom and practice of failing to adequately train officers concerning the necessity of promptly arresting individuals guilty of violating protective orders;

e. maintaining a policy or custom of failing to have safeguards in place to ensure that violators of protective orders were timely arrested;

f. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect to verify whether someone who is arrested for domestic violence is on parole;
g. failing to have a custom, practice and policy to communicate with state officials and law enforcement officials regarding domestic violence arrests;
h. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect in order to communicate with parole agents on domestic violence arrests;
i. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect to verify whether an arrestee of a domestic violence offense is on parole prior to issuing an order of protection; and
j. maintaining a custom, practice and policy of ignoring the seriousness of domestic violence arrests.
McCauley maintains that these allegations are sufficient to state a Monell equal-protection claim against the City. We disagree. In order to state a facially plausible equal-protection claim under Monell, the factual allegations in McCauley's complaint must allow us to draw the reasonable inference that the City established a policy or practice of intentionally discriminating against female victims of domestic violence in the provision of police protection. That is, McCauley needed to allege enough 'by way of factual content to "nudg[e]" his claim of purposeful discrimination "across the line from conceivable to plausible."' Because the Equal Protection Clause is 'concerned ... with equal treatment rather than with establishing entitlements to some minimum of government services, [it] does not entitle a person to adequate, or indeed to any, police protection.'. . . 'On the other hand, selective withdrawal of police protection, as when the Southern states during the Reconstruction era refused to give police protection to their black citizens, is the prototypical denial of equal protection.'. . The allegations in the paragraph quoted above do not plausibly suggest that the City maintained a policy or practice of selective withdrawal of police protection. To the contrary, the complaint alleges that the City failed to have particularized practices in place for the special protection of domestic-violence victims. In essence, the complaint alleges that the City failed to promulgate specific policies for this particular class of crime victims, not that the City denied this class of victims equal protection. At most, the factual allegations in the complaint plausibly suggest the uneven allocation of limited police-protection services; they do not plausibly suggest that the City maintained an intentional policy or practice of omitting police protection from female domestic-violence victims as a class. Just as in Brooks, McCauley's factual allegations are entirely consistent with lawful conduct–here a lawful allocation of limited police resources. . . And the complexity of McCauley's equal-protection claim distinguishes this case from Swanson.")

McCauley v. City of Chicago, 671 F.3d 611, 620, 622-25, 627-29 (7th Cir. 2011) (Hamilton, J., dissenting in part) ("I agree with my colleagues that plaintiff has failed to state a claim against defendant Walker. I respectfully dissent from the rejection of plaintiff's equal protection claim against the City of Chicago. I am skeptical about plaintiff's ability to prove the claim, but his complaint should be sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, even under the new and subjective pleading standards announced in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). I explain first my skepticism, then some of the problems raised by Iqbal, and finally why the complaint should survive the motion to dismiss. Mr. McCauley's suit seeks to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection requirements on the decisions of a major city police force about how to allocate its resources. Plaintiff's only viable equal protection theory is that the Chicago police department made a deliberate decision to minimize the police protection available to victims of domestic violence, and that the police did so because of an intentional animus against women, who make up the vast majority of adult victims of domestic violence. . . . As a subordinate federal court, it is our responsibility to do our best to apply the law as stated in Iqbal. My colleagues do so here, and the Iqbal standard is clearly decisive for the panel majority. The problem here is that it also our responsibility to do our best to apply other Supreme Court decisions involving pleading standards, including Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163 (1993); Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007); and Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506 (2002), as well as the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as adopted by the Court and approved by Congress, and the form pleadings that are part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and that were also approved by the Court and Congress. Iqbal is in serious tension with these other decisions, rules, and forms, and the Court's opinion fails to grapple with or resolve that tension. I do not believe it is an exaggeration to say that these decisions, rules, and forms simply conflict with Iqbal. As a result of this unresolved tension, since Iqbal was decided, the lower federal court decisions seeking to apply the new 'plausibility' standard are wildly inconsistent with each other, and with the conflicting decisions of the Supreme Court. . . .First, Iqbal's reasoning and holding conflict with Rule 9(b), which requires that a party alleging fraud or mistake 'state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake.' As for other states of mind, however, the rule provides: 'Malice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind may be alleged generally.'. . . Second, Iqbal conflicts with other recent Supreme Court decisions. Iqbal did not overrule or question a number of the Court's prior cases on notice pleading. . . . Third, Iqbal conflicts with the form complaints approved by the Supreme Court and Congress as part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Rule 84 provides that the forms in the appendix 'suffice under these rules and illustrate the simplicity and brevity that these rules contemplate.' Iqbal did not purport to overrule or amend Rule 84 or the forms, but it is difficult to reconcile the new 'plausibility' standard with those forms. Many of the approved forms require virtually no explanation of the underlying facts as long as the defendant is informed of the event or transaction that gave rise to the claim, according to the broad notice purpose of the rules. . . . Unless one can plausibly explain away the tension between Iqbal and Rule 9(b) and the Rule 84-endorsed form complaints, then Iqbal conflicts with the Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2071 et seq., and the prescribed process for amending the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. . . . Fourth, Iqbal's reliance on the fact/conclusion dichotomy is highly subjective, and returns courts to the long disapproved methods of analysis under the regime of code pleading. . . . Iqbal's reliance on the fact/conclusion dichotomy makes the difference indeterminate. Application of the dichotomy is leading to judge-specific and case-specific differences in outcome that confuse everyone involved. . . . Fifth, Iqbal's reliance on 'judicial experience and common sense' invites the highly subjective and inconsistent results that have been observed. The Iqbal concept of plausibility is 'context-specific.'. . As a practical matter, the concept invites district judges to exercise their individual views of the likely merits of the case at the outset, when the only information available is the complaint. Worse still, an uncritical reading of the Court's 'obvious alternative explanation' reasoning seems to invite judges to weigh competing explanations for alleged conduct and dismiss cases merely because they believe one explanation over another. . . In application, this standard bears a striking resemblance to the most stringent pleading requirement in American civil law, for pleading scienter in securities fraud claims, pursuant to the specific direction of Congress in the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act. See 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(b)(2) (requiring plaintiff to 'state with particularity facts giving rise to a strong inference that the defendant acted with the required state of mind'); accord, Tellabs, Inc. v. Makor Issues and Rights, Ltd., 551 U.S. 308, 323-24 (2007) (explaining that a 'strong inference' must be 'cogent and compelling, thus strong in light of other explanations' for the defendant's actions). Congress has not imposed such a demanding standard for pleading in any other context–including civil rights and employment discrimination cases, which often turn on whether a defendant's explanation for a decision is legitimate or merely a pretext covering for unlawful bias. Rule 9(b) and the Supreme Court decisions in Swierkiewicz and Leatherman permit plaintiffs to plead intent generally, meaning without the sort of specifics required under the PSLRA. But if the Iqbal pleading standard is applied in the district court, plaintiffs who already face the uphill battle of proving secret intent must now contend with the possibility of pre-discovery dismissal whenever the alleged pretext asserted by defendants in their motion to dismiss sounds plausible to the common sense of the particular judge. The potential harm of Iqbal in this context is that outcomes will vary based on how different judges view the plausibility of, for example, a police policymaker harboring and acting on improper motives toward women who complain of domestic violence. . . . In the face of all these problems, what are the lower federal courts to do? . . . . The first thing we can do is recognize the uncertainty that litigants, their lawyers, and district courts now face. As a result of that uncertainty, the courts of appeals should insist that in all but the most unusual situations, a party whose pleading is dismissed based on the Iqbal plausibility standard should be entitled to an opportunity to amend the pleading after the court has made its decision. . . . We should exercise caution to avoid punishing parties for imperfect predictions as to how the subjective and inconsistent Iqbal standard might be applied in their case. . . .But where that approach is not enough to resolve the case, I believe we must take care not to expand Iqbal too aggressively beyond its highly unusual context–allegations aimed at the nation's highest-ranking law enforcement officials based on their response to unprecedented terrorist attacks on the United States homeland–to cut off potentially viable claims. Iqbal exemplifies the old adage about hard cases. The failure of the Supreme Court to address all of the law that would conflict with broad application of the case should weigh heavily against that broad application, at least until the Supreme Court provides clearer guidance about how to reconcile Iqbal with its prior cases, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and their accompanying forms. Reading the present complaint as a whole, plaintiff McCauley has alleged the particulars of a plausible Monell claim. As the majority points out, McCauley has alleged the elements of such a claim using the relevant legal language. While some of these statements are conclusory in nature, they serve to notify defendants and the court of the type of claim being brought. There can be no doubt that the complaint provides sufficient notice of the circumstances that gave rise to the claims. McCauley made factual allegations that Chicago police failed to arrest Martinez despite knowledge of his harassment and violations, ¶ 25, and that this failure resulted from a custom of untimeliness and indifference with regard to the seriousness of domestic violence, ¶ 125(c) and (j). McCauley alleges 'deliberate indifference' generally, see ¶ 126, but elsewhere describes numerous specific failures to act that are factually consistent with such an intent. See, e.g., ¶ 51. It is difficult to imagine what more McCauley might allege on the crucial question of intent without reciting a list of specific states of mind that Chicago police policy-makers might have. We did not require such a recital in Swanson and we should not do so here. By extending Iqbal to dismiss plaintiff McCauley's equal protection Monell claim against the City of Chicago, the majority runs afoul of Leatherman, Rule 9(b), and the form complaints approved by the Supreme Court and Congress as part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Perhaps the Supreme Court majority intended Iqbal to work such a revolution in federal civil practice, but if so, the Court failed to grapple with the conflicts and did not express any direct rejection of these other governing sources of law. Under these circumstances, therefore, I would reverse the dismissal of plaintiff's equal protection claim against the City of Chicago and give him an opportunity to pursue discovery. Even if I agreed that the current version of the complaint failed to state a claim, I would remand with instructions to give plaintiff an opportunity to file an amended complaint to try to comply with the new and uncertain standards of Iqbal.")

In re Text Messaging Antitrust Litigation, 630 F.3d 622, 625-27, 629 (7th Cir. 2010) ("The interlocutory appeal that we are asked to authorize in this case does not seek to overturn any findings of fact. The defendants are arguing rather that even if all the factual allegations of the complaint are true, the complaint is insufficiently plausible to satisfy *Twombly. They are asking us to apply a legal standard–the pleading standard set forth in Twombly –to a set of factual allegations taken as true for purposes of the appeal. . . . [W]hen the question presented by an appeal is whether Twombly requires dismissal of a complaint, the concerns underlying that decision argue for empowering the district court and the court of appeals to authorize an interlocutory appeal. *Twombly, even more clearly than its successor, *Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009), is designed to spare defendants the expense of responding to bulky, burdensome discovery unless the complaint provides enough information to enable an inference that the suit has sufficient merit to warrant putting the defendant to the burden of responding to at least a limited discovery demand. When a district court by misapplying the Twombly standard allows a complex case of extremely dubious merit to proceed, it bids fair to immerse the parties in the discovery swamp–'that Serbonian bog ... where armies whole have sunk' (Paradise Lost ix 592-94)–and by doing so create irrevocable as well as unjustifiable harm to the defendant that only an immediate appeal can avert. Such appeals should not be routine, and won't be, because as we said both district court and court of appeals must agree to allow an appeal under section 1292(b); but they should not be precluded altogether by a narrow interpretation of 'question of law.'. . . [I]n this case there is no question of hunting through a record or immersing ourselves in a complicated contract, and moreover we do have a question of the meaning of a common law doctrine–namely the federal common law doctrine of pleading in complex cases, announced in *Twombly. Decisions holding that the application of a legal standard is a controlling question of law within the meaning of section 1292(b) are numerous. . . . Not that routine applications of well-settled legal standards to facts alleged in a complaint are appropriate for interlocutory appeal. But Twombly is a recent decision, and its scope unsettled (especially in light of its successor, Iqbal –from which the author of the majority opinion in Twombly dissented; and two of the Justices who participated in those cases have since retired). This court has only twice discussed the application of Twombly to antitrust violations, and in both cases only in passing. . . Pleading standards in federal litigation are in ferment after Twombly and Iqbal, and therefore an appeal seeking a clarifying decision that might head off protracted litigation is within the scope of section 1292(b). . . The previous cases do not address the relation of Twombly to the standards for interlocutory appeals under that section, and that is a further novelty that justifies the conclusion that the appeal presents a genuine question of law. So we grant the application for interlocutory appeal, and, since the merits of the appeal have been fully briefed in the parties' submissions and would not, we think, be illuminated by oral argument, we proceed to the merits. . . . [W]e agree with the district judge that the complaint alleges a conspiracy with sufficient plausibility to satisfy the pleading standard of Twombly.. . . The Court said in Iqbal that the 'plausibility standard is not akin to a "probability requirement," but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully.'. . This is a little unclear because plausibility, probability, and possibility overlap. Probability runs the gamut from a zero likelihood to a certainty. What is impossible has a zero likelihood of occurring and what is plausible has a moderately high likelihood of occurring. The fact that the allegations undergirding a claim could be true is no longer enough to save a complaint from being dismissed; the complaint must establish a nonnegligible probability that the claim is valid; but the probability need not be as great as such terms as 'preponderance of the evidence' connote. The plaintiffs have conducted no discovery. Discovery may reveal the smoking gun or bring to light additional circumstantial evidence that further tilts the balance in favor of liability. All that we conclude at this early stage in the litigation is that the district judge was right to rule that the second amended complaint provides a sufficiently plausible case of price fixing to warrant allowing the plaintiffs to proceed to discovery.")

Atkins v. City of Chicago, 631 F.3d 823, 832 (7th Cir. 2011) ("So suppose some of the plaintiff's factual allegations are unrealistic or nonsensical and others not, some contradict others, and some are 'speculative' in the sense of implausible and ungrounded. The district court has to consider all these features of a complaint en route to deciding whether it has enough substance to warrant putting the defendant to the expense of discovery. . . or, in a case such as this (like Iqbal itself), burdening a defense of immunity. . . We are left in darkness as to whether the plaintiff is actually alleging that Atkins was denied food or water for four days, or for a lesser, but still constitutionally significant, length of time. The plaintiff's lawyer has had four bites at the apple. Enough is enough. . . All this is apart from the futility of the suit. Atkins is the only witness for the plaintiff, and Atkins is dead. His widow would be happy to testify to what he told her had happened to him, but her testimony would be inadmissible hearsay. There is no other evidence to support the charge of unconstitutional conditions of confinement, and no suggestion that any defendants, or other members of the prison staff, are prepared to support the plaintiff's version of the facts–or, should we say, any one of the plaintiff's versions. The district court was correct to dismiss the suit.")

Bausch v. Stryker Corp., 630 F.3d 546, 558, 561 (7th Cir. 2010) ("There are no special pleading requirements for product liability claims in general, or for Class III medical device claims in particular. The federal standard of notice pleading applies, so long as the plaintiff alleges facts sufficient to meet the new 'plausibility' standard applied in Iqbal and *Twombly. . . In applying that standard to claims for defective manufacture of a medical device in violation of federal law, moreover, district courts must keep in mind that much of the product-specific information about manufacturing needed to investigate such a claim fully is kept confidential by federal law. Formal discovery is necessary before a plaintiff can fairly be expected to provide a detailed statement of the specific bases for her claim. Accordingly, the district court erred in this case by dismissing plaintiff's original complaint and by denying her leave to amend her complaint. . . . As Judge Melloy noted in Medtronic Leads: 'If plaintiffs must allege that the defendant violated a particular FDA-approved specification before discovery, then it is difficult to appreciate how any plaintiff will ever be able to defeat a Rule 12(b)(6) motion.' [In re Medtronic, Inc., Sprint Fidelis Leads Products Liability Litigation, 623 F.3d 1200, 1212 (8th Cir.2010) (Melloy, J., dissenting)] We think Judge Melloy said it well in suggesting that, in analyzing the sufficiency of pleadings , 'a plaintiff's pleading burden should be commensurate with the amount of information available to them.' Id. Here, Bausch pled sufficiently given the amount of information to which she had access.") Swanson v. Citibank, N.A., 614 F.3d 400, 403-05 (7th Cir. 2010) ("The question with which courts are still struggling is how much higher the Supreme Court meant to set the bar, when it decided not only Twombly, but also Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). This is not an easy question to answer, as the thoughtful dissent from this opinion demonstrates. On the one hand, the Supreme Court has adopted a 'plausibility' standard, but on the other hand, it has insisted that it is not requiring fact pleading, nor is it adopting a single pleading standard to replace Rule 8, Rule 9, and specialized regimes like the one in the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act ("PSLRA"), 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(b)(2). . . . As we understand it, the Court is saying . . . that the plaintiff must give enough details about the subject-matter of the case to present a story that holds together. In other words, the court will ask itself could these things have happened, not did they happen. For cases governed only by Rule 8, it is not necessary to stack up inferences side by side and allow the case to go forward only if the plaintiff's inferences seem more compelling than the opposing inferences. . . The Supreme Court's explicit decision to reaffirm the validity of Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506 (2002), which was cited with approval in Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556, indicates that in many straightforward cases, it will not be any more difficult today for a plaintiff to meet that burden than it was before the Court's recent decisions. A plaintiff who believes that she has been passed over for a promotion because of her sex will be able to plead that she was employed by Company X, that a promotion was offered, that she applied and was qualified for it, and that the job went to someone else. That is an entirely plausible scenario, whether or not it describes what 'really' went on in this plaintiff's case. A more complex case involving financial derivatives, or tax fraud that the parties tried hard to conceal, or antitrust violations, will require more detail, both to give the opposing party notice of what the case is all about and to show how, in the plaintiff's mind at least, the dots should be connected. . .

. Swanson's complaint identifies the type of discrimination that she thinks occurs (racial), by whom (Citibank, through Skertich, the manager, and the outside appraisers it used), and when (in connection with her effort in early 2009 to obtain a home-equity loan). This is all that she needed to put in the complaint.")

Swanson v. Citibank, N.A., 614 F.3d 400, 407-12 (7th Cir. 2010) (Posner, J., dissenting in part) ("I join the majority opinion except with respect to reversing the dismissal of the plaintiff's claim of housing discrimination. I have difficulty squaring that reversal with Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009), unless Iqbal is limited to cases in which there is a defense of official immunity– especially if as in that case it is asserted by very high-ranking officials (the Attorney General of the United States and the Director of the FBI)– because the defense is compromised if the defendants have to respond to discovery demands in a case unlikely to have merit. . . . The majority opinion does not suggest that the Supreme Court would limit Iqbal to immunity cases. . . . There is language in my colleagues' opinion to suggest that discrimination cases are outside the scope of Iqbal, itself a discrimination case. The opinion says that 'a plaintiff who believes that she has been passed over for a promotion because of her sex will be able to plead that she was employed by Company X, that a promotion was offered, that she applied and was qualified for it, and that the job went to someone else.' Though this is not a promotion case, the opinion goes on to say that 'Swanson's complaint identifies the type of discrimination that she thinks occurs (racial), by whom (Citibank, through Skertich, the manager, and the outside appraisers it used), and when (in connection with her effort in early 2009 to obtain a home equity loan). This is all that she needed to put in the complaint.'. . . Suppose this were a promotion case, and several people were vying for a promotion, all were qualified, several were men and one was a woman, and one of the men received the promotion. No complexity; yet the district court would "draw on its judicial experience and common sense," Ashcroft v. Iqbal, supra, 129 S.Ct. at 1950, to conclude that discrimination would not be a plausible explanation of the hiring decision, without additional allegations. This case is even stronger for dismissal because it lacks the competitive situation–man and woman, or white and black, vying for the same job and the man, or the white, getting it. . . . There is no allegation that the plaintiff in this case was competing with a white person for a loan. It was the low appraisal of her home that killed her chances for the $50,000 loan that she was seeking. . . . The Supreme Court would consider error the plausible inference in this case, rather than discrimination. . . . The majority opinion relies heavily on Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N .A., 534 U.S. 506 (2002) [but] Swierkiewicz is distinguishable. . . . Title VII cases are not exempted by Swierkiewicz from the doctrine of the Iqbal case. Iqbal establishes a general requirement of 'plausibility' applicable to all civil cases in federal courts. . . . But when a bank turns down a loan applicant because the appraisal of the security for the loan indicates that the loan would not be adequately secured, the alternative hypothesis of racial discrimination does not have substantial merit; it is implausible. Behind both Twombly and Iqbal lurks a concern with asymmetric discovery burdens and the potential for extortionate litigation . . . . In most suits against corporations or other institutions, and in both Twombly and Iqbal–but also in the present case–the plaintiff wants or needs more discovery of the defendant than the defendant wants or needs of the plaintiff, because the plaintiff has to search the defendant's records (and, through depositions, the minds of the defendant's employees) to obtain evidence of wrongdoing. With the electronic archives of large corporations or other large organizations holding millions of emails and other electronic communications, the cost of discovery to a defendant has become in many cases astronomical. And the cost is not only monetary; it can include, as well, the disruption of the defendant's operations. If no similar costs are borne by the plaintiff in complying with the defendant's discovery demands, the costs to the defendant may induce it to agree early in the litigation to a settlement favorable to the plaintiff. It is true, as critics of Twombly and Iqbal point out, that district courts have authority to limit discovery. . . But especially in busy districts, which is where complex litigation is concentrated, the judges tend to delegate that authority to magistrate judges. And because the magistrate judge to whom a case is delegated for discovery only is not responsible for the trial or the decision and can have only an imperfect sense of how widely the district judge would want the factual inquiry in the case to roam to enable him to decide it, the magistrate judge is likely to err on the permissive side. "One common form of unnecessary discovery (and therefore a ready source of threatened discovery) is delving into ten issues when one will be dispositive. A magistrate lacks the authority to carve off the nine unnecessary issues; for all the magistrate knows, the judge may want evidence on any one of them. So the magistrate stands back and lets the parties have at it. . . . . This structural flaw helps to explain and justify the Supreme Court's new approach. It requires the plaintiff to conduct a more extensive precomplaint investigation than used to be required and so creates greater symmetry between the plaintiff's and the defendant's litigation costs, and by doing so reduces the scope for extortionate discovery. . . . The plaintiff has an implausible case of discrimination, but she will now be permitted to serve discovery demands that will compel elaborate document review by Citibank and require its executives to sit for many hours of depositions. . . . The threat of such an imposition will induce Citibank to consider settlement even if the suit has no merit at all. That is the pattern that the Supreme Court's recent decisions are aimed at disrupting. We should affirm the dismissal of the suit in its entirety.") Santiago v. Walls, 599 F.3d 749, 758, 759 (7th Cir. 2010) ("Mr. Santiago alleged that he submitted a grievance to Warden Walls's office, asking that the inmate with whom he was being housed be placed on his enemy list and that he be given a cell change. The grievance claimed that the prison officials were following a practice of placing him in cells with inmates with whom there was bound to be a confrontation. He further alleged that the Warden 'knew or should have known' that Castro was dangerous. We think that this allegation is sufficient, at the pleading stage, to state a claim that Warden Walls actually knew or consciously turned a blind eye toward an obvious risk. Mr. Santiago cannot know for certain what Warden Walls knew without discovery. Consequently, the district court should not have dismissed this count of the complaint. The dissent suggests two infirmities with Mr. Santiago's pro se complaint. First, it would require a much greater level of specificity in both the complaint and in the appended grievance form. With respect to the grievance, neither this court nor any other American court has imposed the requirements of fact or code pleading on such a document. The purpose of a grievance is, quite simply, to advise prison management of a situation that could harm the good order and discipline of the institution so that remedial steps can be taken by the officer who is responsible for such remedies. Here, the warden was informed that personnel under his command were undermining the good order and discipline of the institution by placing Mr. Santiago in situations where violence was inevitable. Although the dissent apparently takes the contrary view, we believe that any warden worth his or her salt would consider such an allegation sufficient to commence an aggressive investigation. Most wardens would not fail to meet their responsibilities simply because the complaining prisoner, while alleging retaliation, failed to name names. The maintaining of prison discipline does not depend on prisoners naming names. To the extent that the dissent is asserting that the complaint itself lacked sufficient specificity, it is asking for a return to the days before the Supreme Court eliminated that impermissible gloss on the Federal Rules in Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 113 S.Ct. 1160, 122 L.Ed.2d 517 (1993). It is clear that this complaint conforms to the standards set out by the Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007) and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009).").

Cooney v. Rossiter, 583 F.3d 967, 971 (7th Cir. 2009) ("The Court's specific concern in Bell Atlantic was with the burden of discovery imposed on a defendant by implausible allegations perhaps intended merely to extort a settlement that would spare the defendant that burden. In Iqbal it was with the inroads into the defense of official immunity–which is meant to protect the officer from the burden of trial and not merely from damages liability–that allowing implausible allegations to defeat a motion to dismiss would make. Smith v. Duffey, 576 F.3d 336, 339-40 (7th Cir.2009). Thus, as the Court said in Iqbal, 'determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will ... be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense.' 129 S.Ct. at 1950 . . . In other words, the height of the pleading requirement is relative to circumstances. We have noted the circumstances (complexity and immunity) that raised the bar in the two Supreme Court cases. This case is not a complex litigation, and the two remaining defendants do not claim any immunity. But it may be paranoid pro se litigation, arising out of a bitter custody fight and alleging, as it does, a vast, encompassing conspiracy; and before defendants in such a case become entangled in discovery proceedings, the plaintiff must meet a high standard of plausibility.").

Brooks v. Ross, 578 F.3d 574, 581 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Any doubt that Twombly had repudiated the general notice-pleading regime of Rule 8 was put to rest two weeks later, when the Court issued Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 93 (2007). . . . This court took Twombly and Erickson together to mean that 'at some point the factual detail in a complaint may be so sketchy that the complaint does not provide the type of notice of the claim to which the defendant is entitled under Rule 8.'. . This continues to be the case after Iqbal. That case clarified that Twombly's plausibility requirement applies across the board, not just to antitrust cases. In addition, Iqbal gave further guidance to lower courts in evaluating complaints. . .We understand the Court in Iqbal to be admonishing those plaintiffs who merely parrot the statutory language of the claims that they are pleading (something that anyone could do, regardless of what may be prompting the lawsuit), rather than providing some specific facts to ground those legal claims, that they must do more. These are the plaintiffs who have not provided the 'showing' required by Rule 8. So, what do we take away from Twombly, Erickson, and Iqbal? First, a plaintiff must provide notice to defendants of her claims. Second, courts must accept a plaintiff's factual allegations as true, but some factual allegations will be so sketchy or implausible that they fail to provide sufficient notice to defendants of the plaintiff's claim. Third, in considering the plaintiff's factual allegations, courts should not accept as adequate abstract recitations of the elements of a cause of action or conclusory legal statements.").

Burks v. Raemisch, 555 F.3d 592, 593 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Plaintiffs need not lard their complaints with facts; the federal system uses notice pleading rather than fact pleading. See Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007). Knowledge and intent, in particular, need not be covered in detail; Fed.R.Civ.P. 9(b) provides that '[m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind may be alleged generally.' It is enough to lay out a plausible grievance. A prisoner's statement that he repeatedly alerted medical personnel to a serious medical condition, that they did nothing in response, and that permanent injury ensued, is enough to state a claim on which relief may be granted–if it names the persons responsible for the problem. Doing nothing could be simple negligence, but it does not stretch the imagination to see that it might also amount to deliberate indifference.").

Tamayo v. Blagojevich, 526 F.3d 1074, 1082, 1083, 1085, 1090, 1091 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Since Bell Atlantic, we cautiously have attempted neither to over-read nor to under-read its holding. We have stated that the Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic 'retooled federal pleading standards,' and retired 'the oft-quoted Conley formulation.'. . We also have cautioned, however, that Bell Atlantic 'must not be overread.'. . Although the opinion contains some language that could be read to suggest otherwise, the Court in Bell Atlantic made clear that it did not, in fact, supplant the basic notice-pleading standard. . . . The task of applying Bell Atlantic to the different types of cases that come before us continues. In each context, we must determine what allegations are necessary to show that recovery is 'plausible.'. . For complaints involving complex litigation–for example, antitrust or RICO claims–a fuller set of factual allegations may be necessary to show that relief is plausible. . . The Court in Bell Atlantic wished to avoid the 'in terrorem' effect of allowing a plaintiff with a 'largely groundless claim' to force defendants into either costly discovery or an increased settlement value. . . . [W]e conclude that Ms. Tamayo's complaint included enough facts in support of a claim of sex discrimination under Title VII and the Equal Pay Act to survive dismissal at this stage of the proceedings. . . . Similarly, we conclude that Ms. Tamayo's complaint alleged enough facts to state a claim for retaliation. . . .The pleading standard is no different simply because qualified immunity may be raised as an affirmative defense. . . . In any event, the right to be free from sex discrimination is clearly established. Taking all facts pleaded in Ms. Tamayo's complaint as true, the defendants violated a clearly established constitutional right; therefore, a grant of qualified immunity is inappropriate at this point in the proceedings.").

Limestone Development Corp. v. Village of Lemont, Ill., 520 F.3d 797, 803, 804 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Under Bell Atlantic, the complaint in a potentially complex litigation, or one that by reason of the potential cost of a judgment to the defendant creates the 'in terrorem' effect against which Blue Chip warned, must have some degree of plausibility to survive dismissal. It is true that the narrowest holding in Bell Atlantic is merely that an antitrust complaint charging an agreement between firms not to compete must contain 'enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made.... An allegation of parallel conduct and a bare assertion of conspiracy will not suffice.'. .The Court was concerned lest a defendant be forced to conduct expensive pretrial discovery in order to demonstrate the groundlessness of the plaintiff's claim. . . But the concern is as applicable to a RICO case, which resembles an antitrust case in point of complexity and the availability of punitive damages and of attorneys' fees to the successful plaintiff. RICO cases, like antitrust cases, are 'big' cases and the defendant should not be put to the expense of big-case discovery on the basis of a threadbare claim. Bell Atlantic must not be overread. The Court denied 'requir[ing] heightened fact pleading of specifics,' 127 S.Ct. at 1974; 'a complaint ... does not need detailed factual allegations.' . . Within weeks after deciding Bell Atlantic, the Court reversed a Tenth Circuit decision for requiring fact pleading . Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007) (per curiam). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, had complained that he had Hepatitis C, that he was on a one-year treatment program for it, that shortly after the program began the prison officials withheld treatment, and that his life was in danger as a result. That was the context in which the Court said that 'specific facts' need not be pleaded. . . A complaint must always, however, allege 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face,'. . . and how many facts are enough will depend on the type of case. In a complex antitrust or RICO case a fuller set of factual allegations than found in the sample complaints in the civil rules' Appendix of Forms may be necessary to show that the plaintiff's claim is not 'largely groundless.' Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 515 F.3d 224, 231-32 (3d Cir.2008). If discovery is likely to be more than usually costly, the complaint must include as much factual detail and argument as may be required to show that the plaintiff has a plausible claim.")

Airborne Beepers & Video, Inc. v. AT&T Mobility LLC, 499 F.3d 663, 667 (7th Cir. 2007) ("In Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, . . . the Supreme Court wrote that '[w]hile a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, ... a plaintiff's obligation to provide the Agrounds" of his Aentitle[ment] to relief" requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do....' . . . Two weeks later the Court clarified that Twombly did not signal a switch to fact- pleading in the federal courts. See Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007). To the contrary, Erickson reaffirmed that under Rule 8'[s]pecific facts are not necessary; the statement need only Agive the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'". . . Taking Erickson and Twombly together, we understand the Court to be saying only that at some point the factual detail in a complaint may be so sketchy that the complaint does not provide the type of notice of the claim to which the defendant is entitled under Rule 8.").

Padron v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., No. 10 C 6656, 2011 WL 1760229, at *4 (N.D. Ill. May 9, 2011) ("Notwithstanding the facial inadequacy of Counts I through III, Plaintiffs argue that those counts should not be dismissed because of 'informational asymmetry' favoring Defendant. Plaintiffs claim that Defendant possesses the facts that Plaintiffs need to plead their case and that Plaintiffs are powerless to obtain information without access to the discovery process. Plaintiffs contend that as pro se complainants who do not speak English and who are unfamiliar with the legal process, they have little choice but to rely on the EEOC's investigation and findings, much of which is redacted. According to Plaintiffs, if Defendant's motion to dismiss is granted, 'informational asymmetry' unfairly would protect the Defendant from liability. Plaintiffs also rely on In re Text Messaging to support their informational asymmetry argument. There, the court recognized that discovery could reveal 'the smoking gun or bring to light additional circumstantial evidence that further tilts the balance in favor of liability.' In re Text Messaging, 630 F.3d at 629 (emphasis added). However, the court made that statement after determining that the plaintiffs already had alleged sufficient circumstantial evidence to infer plausibly that the defendants engaged in price fixing. . . The court found that circumstantial evidence was sufficient at the pleading stage and noted that direct evidence could emerge during discovery. . . As discussed above, Plaintiffs have not already alleged circumstantial evidence that plausibly gives rise to an inference of discriminatory practices by Defendant. Therefore, In re Text Messaging is distinguished and does not support Plaintiffs' argument that discovery should be permitted. I also note that Plaintiffs have not established the existence or extent of any purported 'informational asymmetry.' Plaintiffs worked for Defendant for between five and six years. They had opportunity to observe Defendant's practices and discuss with other co-workers the terms and conditions of their employment. Presumably, such experiences prompted Plaintiffs to file EEOC charges in the first place. Yet, Plaintiffs allege few facts based on their tenure working for Defendant. Moreover, Plaintiffs could have performed an investigation to obtain additional information about Defendant's practices. Although Defendant may have exclusive access to certain types of evidence, Plaintiffs had their own ways of collecting information that could make their claims plausible. Yet, such facts are not pleaded in their complaint. Defendant argues that Plaintiffs' complaint is precisely what Twombly sought to guard against: conclusory allegations made in the hope of obtaining discovery that potentially could support Plaintiffs' claim. Defendant is correct that preventing meritless lawsuits and needless, costly discovery was an important concern in Twombly. . . The Court stated that 'it is no answer to say that a claim just shy of a plausible entitlement to relief can, if groundless, be weeded out early in the discovery process.'. . If courts granted discovery in those circumstances, risk-averse defendants would settle even weak claims before subsequent proceedings could dispose of them. . . Twombly discourages correcting perceived informational asymmetry through discovery, which is the approach advocated by Plaintiffs. Accordingly, Counts I through III are dismissed.")

Santana v. Cook County Bd. of Review, No. 09 C 5027, 2011 WL 1549240, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 25, 2011) ("Before Iqbal our own Court of Appeals, in Airborne Beepers & Video, Inc. v. AT & T Mobility LLC, 499 F.3d 663, 667 (7th Cir.2007) described Twombly and Erickson as establishing 'only that at some point the factual detail in a complaint may be so sketchy that the complaint does not provide the type of notice of the claim to which the defendant is entitled under Rule 8.' And more recently Brooks v. Ross, 578 F.3d 574, 581 (7th Cir.2009) has confirmed that the Airborne Beepers reading of pleading law post-Twombly and post-Erickson remains accurate after Iqbal. Brooks, id. describes Iqbal as 'admonishing those plaintiffs who merely parrot the statutory language of the claims that they are pleading (something that anyone can do, regardless of what may be prompting the lawsuit), rather than providing some specific facts to ground those legal claims, that they must do more.' Familiar Rule 12(b)(6) principles–still operative under the new pleading regime–require this Court to accept as true all of Santana's well-pleaded factual allegations, with all reasonable inferences drawn in his favor (Christensen v. County of Boone, 483 F.3d 454, 457 (7th Cir.2007)(per curiam)). . . . With no plausible claim having been alleged by Santana after his fifth effort to do so, the figurative severance of the 4AC and cauterization of the fatal wound, both accomplished by this opinion, have to preclude any hydra-like effort by his counsel to grow still another head through a fifth amended complaint. Enough is enough. Defendants are entitled to a judgment as a matter of law on all of Santana's claims. Their Rule 12(b)(6) motion is granted, and this action is dismissed with prejudice.")

Kitchen v. Burge, 781 F.Supp.2d 721, 728, 734, 735, 738 (N.D. Ill. 2011) ("Bryne is not alleged to have directly participated in Kitchen's torture. Rather, the complaint simply alleges that Byrne was Burge's 'right hand man,' and that, like Burge, Bryne 'engaged in a pattern and practice of torture and brutality himself, and also supervised, encouraged, sanctioned, condoned and ratified brutality and torture by other detectives, including the Police Officer Defendants named herein.'. . These generic and conclusory allegations are not sufficient to assert a claim against Byrne. Accordingly, I grant the officer defendants' motion to dismiss Byrne from the complaint. . . . Given the nature of the information that the municipal defendants are alleged to have suppressed, the possibility of establishing a causal link with Kitchen's incarceration is at least minimally plausible. For example, Martin is alleged to have hindered OPS investigations into Burge's and others' use of torture at Area 2 and 3 Headquarters; and when findings of torture were made, Shines attempted to 'secret' or suppress them. Although none of the suppressed information had specifically to do with Kitchen's case, it is not unreasonable to infer that awareness of other instances of torture could have drawn attention to the problem more generally, causing Kitchen's case to come to light sooner. In Daley's case, however, judicial experience and common sense do not permit such a reasonable inference based on Daley's decision to promote Dignan, for example, or to provide Burge's legal defense. For these reasons, Daley's motion to dismiss Count I is granted. . . .The Seventh Circuit has made clear that conspiracy claims under § 1983 are not subject to a heightened pleading standard. See, e.g., Srivastava v. Cottey, 83 Fed. App' x. 807, 810 (7th Cir.2003). Rather, a complaint need only provide 'notice of time, scope, and parties involved.' Id. Kitchen's complaint easily satisfies this requirement. Defendants argue that Kitchen's § 1985 and § 1986 conspiracy claims fail because there must be an underlying predicate violation of constitutional rights. As already explained, Counts I and IV are sufficient to state a claim. Defendants also argue that plaintiff has failed to allege an 'underlying equal protection claim or any specific facts tying Defendant Officers to any racially motivated intent to deprive Plaintiff of his equal protection rights.' The complaint alleges that the conspiracy was formed 'with the knowledge and purpose of depriving Plaintiff, who is African-American, and numerous other African American torture victims of the equal protection of the laws and/or of equal privilege and immunities under the law, and with racial animus toward the Plaintiff and the other victims of this racially motivated conspiracy.'. . Accordingly, I deny the defendants' motions to dismiss Count V.")

Wiek v. Keane, No. 09 CV 920, 2010 WL 1976870, at *3 (N.D. Ill. May 12, 2010) ("Wiek's amended complaint sets forth the following well-pleaded facts: (i) that the officers entered his home without a warrant, (ii) conducted a search and (iii) placed him under arrest. Nevertheless, the Defendants contend that because Wiek did not allege that the officers entered his home without probable cause, exigent circumstances, or his consent, he failed to state a claim under § 1983. The Court is persuaded that Wiek's amended complaint rises above speculation and states more than naked assertions or conclusions of law. Unlike in his original complaint, Wiek now alleges that the officers entered his home without a warrant and conducted a search. . . He further alleges that the officers then placed him under arrest and transported him to the police station. . . The core of the Fourth Amendment is the fundamental concept that any governmental invasion into one's home or expectation of privacy must be strictly circumscribed. . . As a result, warrantless searches of one's home are presumptively unconstitutional, absent consent or exigent circumstances. . . Wiek does not bear the burden of showing a lack of probable cause or exigent circumstances. . . In addition, the circumstances of this case justify a relatively low pleading standard. This case is not as factually complex as Twombly or Iqbal. As a result, the pleading standard is not as high as what the courts used in those cases. . . Additionally, in a case such as this, Wiek may not be aware of any viable reasons that the officers had for their conduct. As such, Wiek may not be able to assert any more facts. Consequently, despite the fact that Wiek has set forth notably sparse allegations even in his amended complaint, the Court denies the Defendants' motion to dismiss Wiek's § 1983 claim against the officers.")

McDaniel v. Elgin, No. 209-CV-119, 2010 WL 339082, at *4 (N.D. Ind. Jan. 22, 2010) ("Here, Plaintiff has made specific factual allegations that he was subjected to repeated, consistent sexual harassment, including unwelcome touching of his person, by his supervisor, Harvey, and that this has created a 'hostile work environment.' McDaniel alleges that after refusing Harvey's advances, his work was 'scrutinized down to the letter,' he was threatened with 'work-ups', that he was looked over for raises and promotions, and that his employment was terminated. These factual allegations stand in contrast to the'[t] hreadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action' that amount to 'legal conclusions' that concerned the Supreme Court in Iqbal. Rather than merely making bare-boned assertions that he was 'harassed' or suffered an 'adverse employment action,' McDaniel has provided specific factual detail that would support a plausible inference of unlawful discrimination. He noted that he was inappropriately touched and that he suffered adverse treatment as a result of his gender. This is all that is required by McDaniel at this early stage of the litigation. Similarly, McDaniel has provide sufficient factual material to support a plausible inference that he was improperly subjected to unlawful retaliation in response to his filing a complaint with the Indiana Human Rights Commission and giving his deposition in another matter where Elgin is the defendant. Again, these are specific, factual allegations, not mere legal conclusions. McDaniel has alleged that he was fired in retaliation for these activities and that is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the Rule 8 pleading standard as described in Iqbal. This is not to say that McDaniel's allegations are to be believed or that there is sufficient evidence to successfully resist a motion for summary judgment. Rather, McDaniel has pleaded sufficient specific factual matter that satisfies the relatively low hurdle required by the Rule 8 liberal pleading standard and therefore dismissal of Plaintiff's claims is not warranted.").

Kyle v. Holina, 09-cv-90-slc, 2009 WL 1867671, at *1 (W.D. Wis. June 29, 2009) ("I agree with defendants that my conclusion must be revisited in light of Iqbal, which extended the pleading standard enunciated in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), to encompass discrimination claims and implicitly overturned decades of circuit precedent in which the court of appeals had allowed discrimination claims to be pleaded in a conclusory fashion. . . . Under the Supreme Court's new standard, an allegation of discrimination needs to be more specific.")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Faulk v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 30 F.4th 739, 746-48 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Faulk argues the district court properly denied Wood's motion to dismiss, permitting Faulk to pursue discovery and Wood to renew his arguments at the summary judgment stage. There are two serious flaws in this analysis. First, it is contrary to controlling Supreme Court precedent. In Twombly, a complex antitrust conspiracy case, the Court squarely rejected this contention, adopting a more rigorous plausibility pleading standard[.] . . . In Iqbal, the Court was emphatic in applying this rule in § 1983 qualified immunity cases[.] . . . [A]pplying this principle is particularly appropriate in this case. At the district court's direction, Faulk was permitted to engage in extensive discovery to replace John Doe Defendants with named defendants who participated in the alleged First and Fourth Amendment violations. As a result, Faulk added new defendants identified as members of the 'arrest team' and specific allegations of the roles played by many of the initial defendants. But as to Wood, all Faulk could factually allege in 332 paragraphs was that he was working on September 17 and took custody of Faulk's bicycle. Requiring Wood to devote time to multi-party discovery in which Faulk fishes for something more to tie him to the 'kettle plan' is precisely what Iqbal precludes. After substantial discovery and access to evidentiary proceedings in Ahmad, Faulk's lengthy FAC lacks a factual basis to infer that Officer Wood was personally involved in the constitutional violations alleged in Counts I and II. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's denial of Officer Wood's motion to dismiss these claims. . . .[T]he FAC does not contain specific and plausible allegations linking Wood to the overt acts that Count V alleges defendants committed against Faulk -- unlawful kettling and unlawful seizure, arrest without probable cause, use of excessive force, and detention for thirteen hours. What Count V adds are allegations that Wood 'agreed to participate' in violations of his civil rights and 'shared the conspiratorial objectives' to punish Faulk and other victims of the illegal kettling plan 'because Defendants believed the group to be protesting police brutality.' We conclude these allegations do not state a plausible claim of civil conspiracy against Officer Wood. 'Without some further factual enhancement [a naked assertion of conspiracy] stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of "entitement to relief."'. . Nor does the FAC 'contain any factual allegation sufficient to plausibly suggest [Wood's] discriminatory state of mind.'. . Without factual enhancement, these naked allegations are 'merely legal conclusions.'. . A conspiracy claim 'requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made.'. . Wood is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Whitney v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 887 F.3d 857, 860 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The district court correctly concluded that the complaint fails to allege facts establishing the subjective prong of the deliberate indifference claim. The incorporated medical examiner's report mentions that an unnamed medical practitioner at the Justice Center knew that Whitney was having suicidal thoughts, but nowhere does the complaint allege that this information was relayed to Sharp. The complaint contains a legal conclusion that Sharp was deliberately indifferent but fails to make any allegation about Sharp's knowledge. This conclusory statement does not save the complaint absent any allegation of knowledge.")

Hager v. Arkansas Dept. of Health, 735 F.3d 1009, 1015 (8th Cir. 2013) ("Hager relies primarily on Swierkiewicz. However, her complaint has far fewer factual allegations than the complaint there. In Swierkiewicz, the complaint for age and nationality discrimination alleged: the plaintiff was demoted and replaced by a younger employee of the employer's nationality; the replacement was inexperienced; in promoting the younger, inexperienced employee, the employer wanted to 'energize' the department; the employer excluded and isolated plaintiff from business decisions and meetings; plaintiff sent a memo outlining his grievances and tried to meet with the employer to discuss his discontent; and plaintiff was fired. . .Hager makes only two conclusory allegations of gender discrimination: (1) she 'is a victim of gender discrimination;' and (2) she 'was discharged under circumstances summarily [sic] situated nondisabled males ... were not.' She does not allege any gender-related comments or conduct before her termination. . . She also does not allege facts showing that similarly situated employees were treated differently. . .In sum, Hager does not state a § 1983 claim for gender discrimination. Hager's allegation that she is the victim of gender discrimination fails to give Dr. Zohoori fair notice of the claim and the grounds upon which it rests. . . Hager's conclusory assertion that she was discharged under circumstances similarly situated men were not imports legal language couched as a factual allegation and fails to raise a right to relief above the speculative level. . . The district court erred in denying Dr. Zohoori's motion to dismiss the § 1983 claim.")

Hamilton v. Palm, 621 F.3d 816, 817, 818 (8th Cir. 2010) ("The only element of this claim here at issue is whether Hamilton's complaint sufficiently alleged that the Palms were his employers. Thus, we must consider how the general principles of Twombly and Iqbal apply to the pleading of a recurring common law issue–whether a party was an employee or an independent contractor at the time in question. We conclude that, to answer this question, we need look no further than Rule 84 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which provides, 'The forms in the Appendix [to the Rules] suffice under these rules....' The rules referred to obviously include Rule 8(a)(2). The Appendix includes Forms 11-13, which set forth prototypes of various negligence complaints. Form 13, entitled 'Complaint for Negligence Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act,' includes the following allegation: '4. During this work, the defendant, as the employer, negligently put the plaintiff to work....' (Emphasis added.) The district court considered Form 13 irrelevant because it applies to F.E.L.A. claims by railroad workers. But that overlooks Form 13's broader significance. As incorporated by Rule 84, Form 13 makes clear that an allegation in any negligence claim that the defendant acted as plaintiff's 'employer' satisfies Rule 8(a)(2)'s notice pleading requirement for this element. Here, consistent with Form 13, Hamilton alleged that he was 'employed' by the Palms. Rule 84 and Form 13 may only be amended 'by the process of amending the Federal Rules, and not by judicial interpretation.' Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 515, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002) (quotation omitted), distinguished in Twombly, 550 U.S. at 569-70. Therefore, the district court erred in concluding that Hamilton's allegation of employee status, however facially conclusory it might appear to be in the abstract, failed to satisfy Rule 8(a)(2).")

Gregory v. Dillard's, Inc., 565 F.3d 464, 473 (8th Cir. 2009) ("Even before the Supreme Court's recent decision in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (2007), we held that a civil rights complaint 'must contain facts which state a claim as a matter of law and must not be conclusory.'. .Twombly confirmed this approach by overruling Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41 (1957), and establishing a plausibility standard for motions to dismiss. . . After Twombly, we have said that a plaintiff 'must assert facts that affirmatively and plausibly suggest that the pleader has the right he claims ..., rather than facts that are merely consistent with such a right.' Stalley v. Catholic Health Initiative, 509 F.3d 517, 521 (8th Cir.2007); see Wilkerson v. New Media Tech. Charter Sch., 522 F.3d 315, 321-22 (3d Cir.2008). While a plaintiff need not set forth 'detailed factual allegations,' Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1964,or 'specific facts' that describe the evidence to be presented, Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 2200 (2007) (per curiam), the complaint must include sufficient factual allegations to provide the grounds on which the claim rests. . . A district court, therefore, is not required 'to divine the litigant's intent and create claims that are not clearly raised,' Bediako, 354 F.3d at 840, and it need not 'conjure up unpled allegations' to save a complaint. Rios v. City of Del Rio, 444 F.3d 417, 421 (5th Cir.2006) (internal quotation omitted).").

Brown v. City of Ferguson, Mo., No. 4:15CV00831 ERW, 2015 WL 4393960, at *3 (E.D. Mo. July 16, 2015) ("Defendants' Motion to Dismiss regarding Plaintiffs' Equal Protection claims will be denied. The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects against discrimination on the basis of race. . . Plaintiffs' must include allegations of intentional discrimination showing discriminatory racial purpose to establish a violation. . . 'When the claim is selective enforcement of traffic laws or a racially-motivated arrest, the plaintiff must normally prove that similarly situated individuals were not stopped or arrested in order to show the requisite discriminatory effect and purpose.'. . Plaintiffs included numerous allegations supporting their claims Defendant City violated the Equal Protection Clause. Although Plaintiffs did not use the exact phrase 'similarly situated individuals,' they did include several allegations stating African–Americans were treated differently than others. . . Additionally, Plaintiffs specifically alleged Defendant City's actions were driven by intentional discrimination. . . Plaintiffs have sufficiently pled a violation of the Equal Protection Clause; Defendants' Motion to Dismiss on this point will be denied. . . . In their complaint, Plaintiffs have included allegations Defendant Wilson deprived them of their right to a familial relationship with their son. . . Plaintiffs also alleged Defendant

Wilson's conduct shocked the conscience of the community, and Defendant Wilson acted with deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of Plaintiffs and their son. . . Although the Court may later determine Plaintiffs' claimed liberty interest is neither an interest deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition nor clearly established, and thus find qualified immunity to apply,[4] Plaintiffs have included sufficient allegations to satisfy the pleading standard in FRCP 8(a)(2).")

Zumwalt v. City of Wentzville, No. 4:10CV561RWS, 2010 WL 2710496, at *8, *9 (E.D.Mo. July 7, 2010) ("Defendants have apparently confused the plausibility standard of Twombly and *Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009) with the fact pleading standard used in the Missouri state courts. . . . Neither Twombly nor Iqbal changed the Rule 8 pleading notice pleading requirement to fact pleading. Specific facts are not necessary; the plaintiff must only allege facts sufficient to give fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests. . . In this case, Zumwalt alleges he was elected to the Local 1032 bargaining unit team. On July 6, 2009, as a Local 1032 representative, Zumwalt met in the union's initial bargaining session with the City and its agents, servants and employees. On August 3, 2009, the bargaining team again met with the City. Zumwalt alleges that on August 6, 2009, he was notified in writing that an off-duty Foristell police officer had filed a complaint against him regarding an incident that occurred on August 1, 2009. Zumwalt also alleges that city personnel actively procured the filing of a formal complaint against him. He believes their decision to do so was based on his status as a "vocal advocate" for collective bargaining rights and his position as a member or Local 1032's bargaining team. Based on the timing of the complaint against Zumwalt in relation to his collective bargaining negotiation activities, I find it is plausible that the reason the city employees actively procured or solicited the off-duty officer to file a complaint against Zumwalt was his participation in the collective bargaining negotiations.")

Arias v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Div. of Dept. of Homeland Sec, Civ. No. 07-1959 ADM/JSM, 2008 WL 1827604, at *14 (D. Minn. Apr. 23, 2008) (not reported) ("The Court rejects the City Defendants' argument that the potential availability of a qualified immunity defense imposes a heightened pleading requirement on Plaintiffs.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Disability Rights Montana, Inc. v. Batista, 930 F.3d 1090, 1101 (9th Cir. 2019) ("This case is controlled by the Supreme Court's decisions in Brown v. Plata and in Farmer v. Brennan. Under Brown v. Plata, an Eighth Amendment claim is made out if prisoners with serious mental illnesses face a substantial risk of serious harm, and this is met with deliberate indifference to their condition. This makes good sense because once persons are incarcerated, they can no longer see to their own medical needs. In these circumstances, the state, which incarcerated them and limited their ability to seek care for themselves, stands in a unique relation that requires it to provide necessary medical care and protect against serious medical risks. Under Farmer, a prisoner meets the first prong of the test for cruel and unusual punishment if he or she can show that prison policies or practices pose a 'substantial risk of serious harm.' The second prong is met upon showing of deliberate indifference, which, as Farmer makes clear, is shown adequately when a prison official is aware of the facts from which an inference could be drawn about the outstanding risk, and the facts permit us to infer that the prison official in fact drew that inference, but then consciously avoided taking appropriate action. Here, the facts alleged are adequate to support the claim that has been asserted under these principles. Iqbal and Twombly require only that a plausible claim be alleged, not that it can be proven with certainty. Enough facts are plausibly alleged in the complaint so that this matter should not have been dismissed without further process. We reverse the district court's judgment and remand to a different district court judge for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Byrd v. Phoenix Police Dep't, 885 F.3d 639, 642 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We disagree with the district court that the allegation that the officers 'beat the crap out of" Byrd was 'too vague and conclusory' to support a legally cognizable claim. Byrd's use of a colloquial, shorthand phrase makes plain that Byrd is alleging that the officers' use of force was unreasonably excessive; this conclusion is reinforced by his allegations about the resulting injuries.")

Rosati v. Igbinoso, 791 F.3d 1037, 1039-40 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Rosati's complaint plausibly alleges that she has severe gender dysphoria, citing repeated episodes of attempted self-castration despite continued hormone treatment. . . Rosati also alleges that the medically accepted treatment for her dysphoria is SRS, supporting that allegation with copious citations to the World Professional Association for Transgender Health ("WPATH") Standards of Care. . . Rosati plausibly alleges that prison officials were aware of her medical history and need for treatment, but denied the surgery because of a blanket policy against SRS. Indeed, the state acknowledged at oral argument that no California prisoner has ever received SRS. . . .Even absent such a blanket policy, Rosati plausibly alleges her symptoms (including repeated efforts at self-castration) are so severe that prison officials recklessly disregarded an excessive risk to her health by denying SRS solely on the recommendation of a physician's assistant with no experience in transgender medicine. . . .Although Rosati lacks a medical opinion recommending SRS, she plausibly alleges that this is because the state has failed to provide her access to a physician competent to evaluate her. . . .We express no opinion on whether SRS is medically necessary for Rosati or whether prison officials have other legitimate reasons for denying her that treatment. But, like other courts that have considered similar actions, we hold that the allegations in Rosati's complaint are sufficient to state a claim.")

Knapp v. Hogan, 738 F.3d 1106, 1110, 1111 (9th Cir. 2013) ("We hold that dismissals following the repeated violation of Rule 8(a)'s 'short and plain statement' requirement, following leave to amend, are dismissals for failure to state a claim under § 1915(g). While past cases have found that this type of strike is accrued by a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal, they do not hold that this is the only possible way. . . We find the reasoning of the Seventh Circuit to be persuasive: after an incomprehensible complaint is dismissed under Rule 8 and the plaintiff is given, but fails, to take advantage of the leave to amend, 'the judge [is] left with [ ] a complaint that, being irremediably unintelligible, [gives] rise to an inference that the plaintiff could not state a claim.' See Paul v.

Marberry, F .3d 702, 705 (7th Cir. 2011). When a litigant knowingly and repeatedly refuses to conform his pleadings to the requirements of the Federal Rules, it is reasonable to conclude that the litigant simply cannot state a claim. Such a narrow expansion of the definition of 'failure to state a claim' beyond Rule 12(b)(6) dismissals is fully in harmony with the purposes of the Prison Litigation Reform Act. . . .Complaints that are filed in repeated and knowing violation of Federal Rule 8's pleading requirements are a great drain on the court system, and the reviewing court cannot be expected to 'fish a gold coin from a bucket of mud.'. .Knapp accrued two strikes for the Ninth Circuit dismissals, and three additional strikes for the district court dismissals. He has more than met the requirement for a revocation of in forma pauperis status under the Prison Litigation Reform Act.")

Panagacos v. Towery, Nos. 11–35527, 11–35538, 2012 WL 6573787, *1, *2 (9th Cir. Dec. 17, 2012) (not reported) ("The TAC alleges that Towery infiltrated plaintiffs' peaceful anti-war protest group in order to spy on and disrupt plaintiffs' activities. The TAC alleges, for example, that Towery identified plaintiffs to others in order to facilitate their arrest without probable cause. Rudd allegedly directed Towery's efforts and compiled Towery's intelligence in reports that he disseminated to other government actors. Both men allegedly coordinated with law-enforcement agencies to plan and implement strategies designed to silence the protestors. The district court correctly determined that these allegations are plausibly supported by sufficient factual detail and must be presumed true. See Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. The TAC gives examples of specific times and places that Towery spied on plaintiffs' meetings. It alleges that defendants met with specifically identified law-enforcement officers and agencies, and identifies specific time frames when these meetings occurred. These factual allegations are sufficient to 'give fair notice and to enable the opposing party to defend itself effectively.' Starr v.. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1216 (9th Cir.2011). As the district court noted, Towery and Rudd's direct involvement in information gathering and reporting distinguishes this case from Iqbal, where conclusory allegations about the high-level government defendants' involvement were 'not entitled to be assumed true.'. . Plaintiffs have pled a plausible violation of their clearly established First Amendment rights. Plaintiffs have alleged that defendants 'deterred or chilled the plaintiff's political speech' and that such deterrence motivated defendants' conduct. . . As a result of defendants' information sharing and coordination with local law enforcement, plaintiffs were allegedly arrested without probable cause. These arrests allegedly disrupted plaintiffs' peaceful protests and deterred their political speech. The TAC's allegations also support a plausible inference that defendants were motivated by an impermissible intent to disrupt plaintiffs' speech activities. Given plaintiffs' strong anti-war message and defendants' alleged illegal actions in purposefully facilitating a campaign of false arrests, it is plausible that Towery and Rudd were motivated by a desire to silence the protesters and not just by a desire to protect military shipments. . . Finally, it is clearly established that intentionally enabling arrests without probable cause in order to suppress speech violates the First Amendment. . .Plaintiffs have also pled plausible violations of their clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. It is clearly established that facilitating arrests without probable cause violates the Fourth Amendment. See, e.g., Beck, 527 F.3d at 863–64. The district court also correctly determined that the TAC's allegations that Towery coordinated with local police to covertly break into a private listserve plausibly describe an unconstitutional search.")

Lacey v. Maricopa County, 693 F.3d 896, 924 (9th Cir. 2012) (en banc) ("Given the detail in the complaint and the seriousness of the allegations, we are reluctant to dismiss the false arrest claim against Arpaio on the basis of the pleadings. Iqbal demands more of plaintiffs than bare notice pleading. . . , but it does not require us to flyspeck complaints looking for any gap in the facts. Lacey has spun a long and sometimes repetitive narration of Arpaio's determination to silence the New Times by any means necessary. It is a short step to infer that Arpaio was well aware of the flaws in Wilenchik's prosecution, but welcomed the excuse to have Lacey and Larkin arrested immediately, even if he lacked probable cause. We think this is all Iqbal requires at this stage.")

Wilhelm v. Rotman, 680 F.3d 1113, 1121, 1122 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Plaintiff filed his complaint pro se. 'We construe pro se complaints liberally and may only dismiss a pro se complaint for failure to state a claim if it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.' Silva v. Di Vittorio, 658 F.3d 1090, 1101 (9th Cir.2011) (internal quotation marks omitted). Iqbal did not alter the rule that, 'where the petitioner is pro se, particularly in civil rights cases, [courts should] construe the pleadings liberally and ... afford the petitioner the benefit of any doubt.' Hebbe v. Pliler, 627 F.3d 338, 342 (9th Cir.2010) (internal quotation marks omitted).")

Henry A. v. Willden, 678 F.3d 991, 1003-05 (9th Cir. 2012) ("[T]he State defendants argue that plaintiffs have failed to state a claim against them for supervisory liability. We recently reaffirmed that a plaintiff may state a claim under § 1983 against a supervisor for deliberate indifference. Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011). . . . After thoroughly examining the plaintiffs' complaint, we agree that there are few specific allegations against the State defendants. Most of the allegations in the complaint simply reference 'Defendants,' without specifying whether the conduct at issue was committed by the named State officials, County officials, or the 'John Doe' supervisors or caseworkers. . . .The allegations that do expressly reference the State defendants are too general to state a claim for supervisory liability. In Starr v. Baca, the plaintiff alleged that Sheriff Baca himself had been given clear notice by the Department of Justice of the specific unconstitutional conditions in the jails; that the Sheriff received numerous reports documenting inmate violence caused by the unconstitutional conduct of his deputies; and that the Sheriff ultimately acquiesced in these constitutional violations. . . In contrast, the allegations here claim that the agencies directed by Willden and Comeaux have oversight responsibility for Clark County's foster care system and are required to ensure that Clark County is complying with state and federal law. The complaint also alleges that all of the defendants had knowledge of independent reports documenting the systemic failures of foster care in Nevada. But it does not allege that Willden or Comeaux had any personal knowledge of the specific constitutional violations that led to Plaintiffs' injuries, or that they had any direct responsibility to train or supervise the caseworkers employed by Clark County. The allegations that come closest to pleading personal involvement by Willden and Comeaux concern the failure to provide medical records to the children and their foster parents in order to facilitate their medical care. . . .When read together, these allegations suggest that there may be a causal connection between the State defendants' failure to share these medical records and the injuries suffered by plaintiffs such as Henry, who received a dangerous combination of prescription drugs because his medical records were not given to his treatment providers. But even if the complaint in its current form fails to state a claim against the State officials for substantive due process violations, the district court abused its discretion by failing to give the plaintiffs an opportunity to amend their complaint. . . . Here, Plaintiffs offered to amend their complaint if necessary in their response to the motion to dismiss, but the district court did not grant leave to amend and did not provide any reasons for its decision. As we have already concluded, the complaint adequately pleads violations of Plaintiffs' clearly established substantive due process rights, and it plausibly suggests an entitlement to relief from at least some of the defendants. Where the complaint falls short in some places is tying its factual allegations to particular defendants. But this type of deficiency can likely be cured by amending the complaint, and there is certainly no evidence to suggest that allowing amendment would be futile. Therefore, on remand, Plaintiffs should be given an opportunity to amend their substantive due process claims. We note that in any future proceedings in the district court, each defendant's liability must be analyzed individually using the proper standard, whether that individual is a line-level caseworker, a supervisory official, or a municipality.")

Cafasso, U.S. ex rel. v. General Dynamics C4 Systems, Nos. 09-16181, 09-16607, 09-177102011 WL 1053366, at *4 & n.6 (9th Cir. Mar. 24, 2011) ("Until now, we have not had occasion explicitly to confirm that Iqbal's plausibility requirement applies to claims subject to Rule 9(b). We have, however, said that 'complaints alleging fraud must comply with both [Federal Rules of Civil Procedure] 8(a) and 9(b).'. . Because Rule 8(a) requires the pleading of a plausible claim, Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949- 50, we hold that claims of fraud or mistake–including FCA claims–must, in addition to pleading with particularity, also plead plausible allegations. . . Iqbal and its 'plausibility' standard have been the subject of serious and thoughtful criticism. . . Also, at least one state court has disagreed with the wisdom of Iqbal and declined to adopt its plausibility standard for state court pleadings. McCurry v. Chevy Chase Bank, FSB, 233 P.3d 861, 863-64 (Wash. 2010). Nonetheless, pleading requirements for the federal courts have departed from the traditional Rule 8 standard under Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 47-48 (1957); under Iqbal, the pleading standard has changed and plausibility is required.")

Hydrick v. Hunter, 669 F.3d 937, 939-42 (9th Cir. 2012) (on remand from the Supreme Court for reconsideration in light of Ashcroft v. Iqbal) ("As discussed in more detail below, after reviewing the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal, the parties' supplemental briefs, and our court's recent decision in Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011), we now hold that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' claims for money damages. The conclusory allegations in Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint are insufficient to establish Defendants' individual liability for money damages. Our holding, however, is limited. Qualified immunity is only an immunity from a suit for money damages, and does not provide immunity from a suit seeking declaratory or injunctive relief. . . Accordingly, on remand, the Plaintiffs may proceed with their claims for declaratory and injunctive relief. . . .As discussed in greater detail below, in the case before us, the factual allegations in Plaintiffs' complaint resemble the 'bald' and 'conclusory' allegations in Iqbal, instead of the detailed factual allegations in Starr. . . Accordingly, Plaintiffs pleaded insufficient facts to establish 'plausible' claims against the Defendants in their individual capacities and the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The Plaintiffs' complaint proceeds under two theories of liability against the Defendants in their individual capacities. Plaintiffs allege that the Defendants are: (a) liable for their own conduct because they created policies and procedures that violated the Plaintiffs' constitutional rights; and, (b) liable because they were deliberately indifferent to their subordinates' constitutional violations. . . Plaintiffs' allegations fail to state claims against Defendants in their individual capacities under either theory of liability. Plaintiffs' complaint is based on conclusory allegations and generalities, without any allegation of the specific wrong-doing by each Defendant. For example, Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim alleges that Defendants' 'policies, practices and customs subject [Plaintiffs] to unreasonable searches; searches as a form of punishment; degrading public strip searches; improper seizures of personal belongings; and the use of unreasonable force and physical restraints.' But there is no allegation of a specific policy implemented by the Defendants or a specific event or events instigated by the Defendants that led to these purportedly unconstitutional searches. Plaintiffs' remaining claims suffer from the same infirmities. Plaintiffs' First Amendment retaliation claim alleges that 'Defendants have personal knowledge of retaliation against [the Plaintiffs] for participation in lawsuits, but Defendants' policies, practices and customs permit and encourage retaliation.' But there is no allegation of a specific policy or custom, nor are there specific allegations regarding each Defendant's purported knowledge of the retaliation. The remainder of Plaintiffs' claims are likewise devoid of specifics. The absence of specifics is significant because, to establish individual liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, 'a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. Even under a 'deliberate indifference' theory of individual liability, the Plaintiffs must still allege sufficient facts to plausibly establish the defendant's 'knowledge of' and 'acquiescence in' the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates. Starr, 652 F.3d at 1206–07. In short, Plaintiffs' 'bald' and 'conclusory' allegations are insufficient to establish individual liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.")

Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1215-17 (9th Cir. 2011), reh'g en banc denied by Starr v. County of Los Angeles, 659 F.3d 850 (9th Cir. 2011) and cert. denied by Baca v. Starr, 132 S. Ct. 2101 (2012) ("The juxtaposition of Swierkiewicz and Erickson, on the one hand, and Dura, Twombly, and Iqbal, on the other, is perplexing. Even though the Court stated in all five cases that it was applying Rule 8(a), it is hard to avoid the conclusion that, in fact, the Court applied a higher pleading standard in Dura, Twombly and Iqbal. The Court in Dura and Twombly appeared concerned that in some complex commercial cases the usual lenient pleading standard under Rule 8(a) gave too much settlement leverage to plaintiffs. That is, if a non-specific complaint was enough to survive a motion to dismiss, plaintiffs would be able to extract undeservedly high settlements from deep-pocket companies. In Iqbal, by contrast, the Court was concerned that the usual lenient standard under Rule 8(a) would provide too little protection for high-level executive branch officials who allegedly engaged in misconduct in the aftermath of September 11, 2001. To the extent that we perceive a difference in the application of Rule 8(a) in the two groups of cases, it is difficult to know in cases that come before us whether we should apply the more lenient or the more demanding standard. But whatever the difference between these cases, we can at least state the following two principles common to all of them. First, allegations in a complaint or counterclaim must be sufficiently detailed to give fair notice to the opposing party of the nature of the claim so that the party may effectively defend against it. Second, the allegations must be sufficiently plausible that it is not unfair to require the opposing party to be subjected to the expense of discovery. . . . Viewed in the light of all of the Supreme Court's recent cases, we hold that the allegations of Starr's complaint satisfy the standard of Rule 8(a). We do not so hold merely because Starr's complaint, like the complaint in Erickson, alleges deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. Rather, we so hold because his complaint complies with the two principles just stated. First, Starr's complaint specifically alleges numerous incidents in which inmates in Los Angeles County jails have been killed or injured because of the culpable actions of the subordinates of Sheriff Baca. The complaint specifically alleges that Sheriff Baca was given notice of all of these incidents. It specifically alleges, in addition, that Sheriff Baca was given notice, in several reports, of systematic problems in the county jails under his supervision that have resulted in these deaths and injuries. Finally, it alleges that Sheriff Baca did not take action to protect inmates under his care despite the dangers, created by the actions of his subordinates, of which he had been made aware. These allegations are neither 'bald' nor 'conclusory.'. . Rather, they are sufficiently detailed to give notice to Sheriff Baca of the nature of Starr's claim against him and to give him a fair opportunity to defend against it. . . . Second, the factual allegations in Starr's complaint plausibly suggest that Sheriff Baca acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates, and was thereby deliberately indifferent to the danger posed to Starr. There is no 'obvious alternative explanation,' within the meaning of Iqbal, for why Sheriff Baca took no action to stop his subordinates' repeated violations of prisoners' constitutional rights despite being repeatedly confronted with those violations, such that the alternative explanation requires us to conclude that Starr's explanation 'is not a plausible conclusion.'. . If there are two alternative explanations, one advanced by defendant and the other advanced by plaintiff, both of which are plausible, plaintiff's complaint survives a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). Plaintiff's complaint may be dismissed only when defendant's plausible alternative explanation is so convincing that plaintiff's explanation is implausible. The standard at this stage of the litigation is not that plaintiff's explanation must be true or even probable. The factual allegations of the complaint need only 'plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief.'. . As the Court wrote in Twombly, Rule 8(a) 'does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage; it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence' to support the allegations. . . Starr's complaint satisfies that standard. . . . We hold that the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal did not alter the substantive requirements for supervisory liability claims in an unconstitutional conditions of confinement case under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments where deliberate indifference is alleged. We further hold that Starr has sufficiently alleged under Rule 8(a) a supervisory liability claim of deliberate indifference against Sheriff Baca. We therefore reverse the district court's dismissal of Starr's claim against Sheriff Baca and remand for further proceedings.")

Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1218, 1219, 1221 (9th Cir. 2011) (Trott, J., dissenting), reh'g en banc denied by Starr v. County of Los Angeles, 659 F.3d 850 (9th Cir. 2011) and cert. denied by Baca v. Starr, 132 S. Ct. 2101 (2012) ("Alleging that the Sheriff 'could' have known, 'should' have known, and 'should' have become aware is tantamount to admitting that Starr had no facts to support his allegations. The test that governs this case consists of two words, not one. Indifference is not enough. For indifference to be actionable, it must be deliberate. Starr's conclusory allegations amount to no more than formulaic flak fired into the sky in an attempt to bring down the squadron leader. When we cease to look at the Los Angeles Sheriff's Department (LASD) as an abstraction and look at the reality, we see good reasons for requiring facts before permitting lawsuits against the Sheriff himself: the agency is gigantic. The LASD is the largest Sheriff's Department in the world. It covers 3,171 square miles, 2,557,754 residents, and by contract 42 of the 88 incorporated cities in Los Angeles County. The Department employs 8,400 law enforcement officers and 7,600 civilians and is responsible for 48 courthouses and 23 substations. The Men's Central Jail alone houses a revolving population of 5,000 inmates. In addition, the Department operates the Twin Towers Correctional Facility, the Mira Loma Detention Facility, the Pitchess Detention Center, and the North County Correctional Center. Persons charged with or convicted of crimes are in over one hundred different locations. The layers of administration and management between what happens in a jail are many and they are complex. To infer that specific incidents which occur in a jail are necessarily known by the Sheriff is to engage in fallacious logic. This complexity does not absolve the Department of responsibility for respecting the constitutional rights and general well-being of its charges, but it does show how inappropriate it is to sue the Sheriff individually unless in terms of causation the Sheriff can be personally tied to the actionable behavior at issue. Just being a disappointing or even an insufficiently engaged public servant is not enough. Those issues are for the ballot box and the County Board of Supervisors, not the courts. . . . The days of pleading conclusions without factual support accompanied by the wishful hope of finding something juicy during discovery are over. Wisely, we have moved up judgment day to the complaint stage rather than bog down the courts and parties with pre-summary judgment combat. This conclusion, of course, does not leave Starr without redress. He may sue the Sheriff in his official capacity, which is the same as suing the County of Los Angeles and the Sheriff's Department, and he may pursue his lawsuit on the ground of official policy or longstanding custom and practice–but he may not sue the Sheriff individually just because he is the Sheriff.")

Hebbe v. Pliler, 627 F.3d 338, 342 & n.7 (9th Cir. 2010) ("Because Hebbe is an inmate who proceeded pro se, his complaint 'must be held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers,' as the Supreme Court has reaffirmed since *Twombly. See Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 94 (2007) (per curiam). Iqbal incorporated the Twombly pleading standard and Twombly did not alter courts' treatment of pro se filings; accordingly, we continue to construe pro se filings liberally when evaluating them under Iqbal. . . . We therefore join the five other circuits that have determined that pro se complaints should continue to be liberally construed after Iqbal.

See McGowan v. Hulick, 612 F.3d 636, 640-42 (7th Cir.2010); Bustos v. Martini Club Inc., 599 F.3d 458, 461-62 (5th Cir.2010); *Casanova v. While the standard is higher, our 'obligation' remains, 'where the petitioner is pro se, particularly in civil rights cases, to construe the pleadings liberally and to afford the petitioner the benefit of any doubt.' Bretz v. Kelman, 773 F.2d 1026, 1027 n. 1 (9th Cir.1985) (en banc).").

Krainski v. Nevada ex rel. Board of Regents of Nevada System of Higher Educ., 616 F.3d 963, 969 (9th Cir. 2010) ("Krainski failed to allege in her complaint or at oral argument any facts suggesting that any of the officers had a reason to suspect the falsity of the statements made by the victim and two other university employees; instead, she merely alleged in a conclusory fashion that the officers 'knew, or should have known, that the allegations ... were false' and that they failed to conduct an adequate investigation. The record does not contain any information that would create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the officers had facts sufficiently detailed to cause a reasonable person to believe a crime had been committed and that Krainski was the perpetrator. We conclude that qualified immunity applies, as 'a reasonable police officer could have believed that his or her conduct was lawful' when arresting a suspect following a report from two university employees and a student alleging an attack. We thus affirm the district court's dismissal of Krainski's Amendment Fourth cause of action against the UNLV Employees based on the defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity.").

Krainski v. Nevada ex rel. Board of Regents of Nevada System of Higher Educ., 616 F.3d 963, 972 (9th Cir. 2010) (B. Fletcher, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The district court erred by dismissing Krainski's Fourth Amendment claim and abused its discretion by dismissing the complaint without leave to amend. I therefore respectfully dissent from the portion of the majority's opinion that affirms the district court's decision in those respects. If the UNLV police officers who arrested Krainski knew or should have known that the allegations against her were false, the police officers would have violated the Fourth Amendment's clearly established prohibitions. . .The majority, however, deems Krainski's Fourth Amendment claim too conclusory to survive. Krainski's complaint is more than 'legal conclusions' or a 'recital[ ] of the elements of a cause of action,' Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 1950 (2009), because she alleges more than simply that UNLV police lacked probable cause to arrest her. She alleges in some detail the factual circumstances under which the arrest took place. . . She also alleges facts that explain why the police lacked probable cause– namely, that the police 'knew, or should have known, that the allegations [against her] were false.' That allegation is enough to satisfy Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) and to survive a motion under Rule 12(b)(6). The Supreme Court has expressly approved as adequate an analogous complaint alleging negligence. Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 513 n. 4 (2002) (quoting Fed.R.Civ.P. app. Form 9 (2000)). . . . Krainski has adequately stated a claim for a violation of the Fourth Amendment.").

Alvarez v. Hill, 518 F.3d 1152, 1159 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Appellees' rigid insistence that RLUIPA claims must be specifically pled in the plaintiff's complaint is without support in our precedent and frankly puzzling in view of the lenience traditionally afforded pro se pleadings and of RLUIPA's manifest purpose of protecting 'institutionalized persons who are unable freely to attend to their religious needs.' . . The 'simplified pleading standard applies to all civil actions, with limited exceptions' provided for by rule or by statute. . . Accordingly, we hold that RLUIPA claims need satisfy only the ordinary requirements of notice pleading , and that a complaint's failure to cite RLUIPA does not preclude the plaintiff from subsequently asserting a claim based on that statute. Under this pleading standard, it is sufficient that the complaint, alone or supplemented by any subsequent filings before summary judgment, provide the defendant fair notice that the plaintiff is claiming relief under RLUIPA as well as the First Amendment.").

Walker v. Wechsler, No. 116CV01417JLTPC, 2016 WL 5930420, at *2 (E.D. Cal. Oct. 12, 2016) ("While 'plaintiffs [now] face a higher burden of pleadings facts ...,' . . . the pleadings of pro se inmates and detainees are still construed liberally and are afforded the benefit of any doubt. Hebbe v. Pliler, 627 F.3d 338, 342 (9th Cir. 2010). . . . If he chooses to file a first amended complaint, Plaintiff should endeavor to make it as concise as possible. He should merely state which of his constitutional rights he feels were violated by each named defendant and its factual basis. Plaintiff need not and should not cite legal authority for his claims in a first amended complaint. His factual allegations are accepted as true and need not be bolstered by legal authority at the pleading stage. If Plaintiff files a first amended complaint, his factual allegations will be screened under the legal standards and authorities stated in this order.")

Sablan v. A.B. Won Pat Intern. Airport Authority, Guam, Civil No. 10-00013, 2010 WL 5148202, at *4 (D. Guam Dec. 9, 2010) ("Now, when evaluating employment discrimination complaints in the context of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, district courts in the Ninth Circuit are proceeding on the premise that although it may not be necessary that the complaint have facts constituting all the elements of a prima facie in order to survive the motion to dismiss, those elements are nonetheless relevant to the court's analysis of the sufficiency of the complaint. [collecting cases] Common to all these cases is the recognition that although the elements of a prima facie employment discrimination case constitute 'an evidentiary standard, not a pleading requirement' (Swierkiewicz, 534 U.S. at 514), Twombly and Iqbal have indisputably pushed pleading standards a bit back in the direction of fact pleading. Courts therefore must look at a complaint in light of the relevant 'evidentiary standard,' in order to decide whether it 'contain [s] sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face."'. . The idea, then, is not that Swierkiewicz has been overruled, but rather that, after Twombly and Iqbal, an employment discrimination plaintiff must get closer to alleging a prima facie case than was necessary a few years ago.")

Microsoft Corp. v. Phoenix Solutions, Inc., 741 F.Supp.2d 1156, 1159 (C.D. Cal. 2010) ("This Court agrees with the Federal Circuit and those district courts that have held that a party alleging direct infringement need only comply with Form 18. A patentee 'need only plead facts sufficient to place the alleged infringer on notice as to what he must defend.'. . This Court additionally reasons that minimal pleading of direct infringement is sufficient because this Court requires the prompt filing of infringement contentions, which put the party accused of infringement on detailed notice of the basis for the allegations against it. Correspondingly, the Court finds that a declaratory judgment claim of no direct infringement need only plead facts to put the patentee on notice and need not be subject to the heightened pleading standards of Twombly and Iqbal.. . . All other claims, counterclaims and affirmative defenses in a patent case are subject to the requirements of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Twombly and Iqbal, except for inequitable conduct.")

Lucas v. City of Visalia, No. 1:09-CV-1015 AWI DLB, 2010 WL 2867287, at *4, *5 (E.D. Cal. July 21, 2010) ("If Lucas intends to allege a manufacturing defect, he must identify/explain how the taser weapon either deviated from Taser Int.'s intended result/design or how the taser weapon deviated from other seemingly identical taser models. . . A bare allegation that the taser weapon had 'a manufacturing defect' is an insufficient legal conclusion. *Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949-50. If Lucas intends to allege a design defect claim, he should identify which design defect theory he wishes to utilize. Under the consumer expectations test, Lucas 'should describe how the [taser weapon] failed to meet the minimum safety expectations of an ordinary consumer' of taser weapons… Under the risk-benefits test, Lucas should allege that the risks of the design outweigh the benefits, and then 'explain how the particular design of the [taser weapon] caused [Lucas] harm.'. .Again, a bare allegation that the taser weapon suffered from a 'design defect' is an insufficient legal conclusion…Dismissal of tenth cause of action is appropriate because the complaint contains no factual allegations that identify what aspect of the subject taser's design and manufacture made it defective. Since it is not clear that amendment would be futile, the Court will dismiss the SAC with leave to amend.")

Ernst v. Cate, No. 1:08-cv-01940-OWW-GSA, 2009 WL 3818227, at *4 (E.D. Cal. Nov. 13, 2009) ("Plaintiff's second cause of action is the only claim in which plaintiff contends that the defendants, including Cate, acted intentionally. First, plaintiff alleges, 'The defendants decided to punish [plaintiff] for the crime he was convicted of by placing him in his wheelchair, unrestrained, in a van traveling 70 miles per hour, and then applying the brakes' (doc. 16, & 33). Later, plaintiff claims, 'Defendants discriminated against plaintiff because of his disability-willfully and indifferently ignored his need to be restrained within the van transporting him to a facility he needed to visit for medical reasons' (doc. 16, & 36). Because plaintiff provides no factual support for these legal conclusions, he fails to satisfy the pleading standards set forth in Iqbal and Twombly. Although a court evaluating a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss is instructed to assume the truth of all factual allegations of the plaintiff and the reasonable inferences to be drawn from them, it need not accept as true unreasonable inferences or conclusory allegations masquerading as facts. . . .That the CDCR Secretary and Assistant Director acted in concert with two corrections officers 'to punish [plaintiff] for the crime he was convicted of by placing him in his wheelchair, unrestrained, in a van traveling 70 miles per hour, and then applying the brakes' strains credulity. Similarly, the underlying facts offer nothing to suggest that Cate 'discriminated against plaintiff because of his disability-willfully and indifferently ignored his need to be restrained within the van transporting him to a facility he needed to visit for medical reasons.'").

Doe ex rel. Gonzales v. Butte Valley Unified School Dist., No. CIV. 09-245 WBS CMK, 2009 WL 2424608, at *8, *9 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 6, 2009) ("Although Iqbal' s majority opinion itself did not intimate any seachange, jurists and legal commentators have observed that the decision marks a striking retreat from the highly permissive pleading standards often thought to distinguish the federal system from " 'the hyper-technical, code-pleading regime of a prior era,' 129 S.Ct. at 1949. . .Prior to Iqbal, many courts–including this court and, apparently, the Supreme Court itself–read Rule 8 to express a 'willingness to Aallow [ ] lawsuits based on conclusory allegations ... to go forward,"'. . . . Indeed, for over half a century, district courts had been instructed that the 'short plain statement' required by Rule 8 'must simply Agive the defendant fair notice of what the plaintiff's claim is and the grounds upon which it rests."'. . . Now, however, even the official Federal Rules of Civil Procedure Forms, which were touted as 'sufficient under the rules and ... intended to indicate the simplicity and brevity of the statement which the rules contemplate,' Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 84, have been cast into doubt by Iqbal. . . Accordingly, although the court will grant in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court will also permit plaintiff leave to amend. Plaintiff, however, is admonished to thoroughly and carefully set forth his allegations in any subsequent amended complaint, as both judicial resources and fairness to defendants preclude unlimited opportunities to amend the pleadings.").

Ibrahim v. Department of Homeland Sec., No. C 06-00545 WHA, 2009 WL 2246194, at *10 (N.D. Cal. July 27, 2009) ("Ibrahim has not pleaded that defendants took action because of and not merely in spite of her being Muslim and a Malaysian citizen. That plaintiff was Muslim and detained is not enough to draw an inference of discrimination under the Iqbal standard. No additional facts, such as derogatory statements, are alleged. Accordingly, as pled, the discrimination claims against San Francisco officers or Bondanella are insufficient. A good argument can be made that the Iqbal standard is too demanding. Victims of discrimination and profiling will often not have specific facts to plead without the benefit of discovery. District judges, however, must follow the law as laid down by the Supreme Court. Yet, the harshness is mitigated here. Counsel for the San Francisco defendants and Bondanella admit that plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim can go forward. This means that discovery will go forward. During discovery, Ibrahim can inquire into facts that bear on the incident, including why her name was on the list. If enough facts emerge, then she can move to amend and to reassert her discrimination claims at that time.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Matthews v. Bergdorf, 889 F.3d 1136, 1144-45, 1149-50 (10th Cir. 2018) ("In its order denying the caseworkers' motion to dismiss, the district court opined that the caseworkers, rather than making any individualized arguments, 'collectively' asserted the defense of qualified immunity. . . The caseworkers, according to the court, argued only that the complaint's factual allegations were not 'conscience shocking.'. . Therefore, instead of asking whether the complaint stated a claim under the special relationship exception as to each caseworker, the district court only asked whether the complaint alleged 'any possible claims' that shocked the conscience. . . .The district court's approach constituted error because it shifted the burden to the caseworkers to establish their entitlement to qualified immunity. Perhaps the advocacy of the caseworkers' trial counsel in the district court was less than stellar. But where multiple state actors raise a qualified immunity defense in a motion to dismiss, 'good as to one, good as to all' is never the proper approach to adjudicating the sufficiency of the complaint. . . . Before a court may undertake the proper analysis, the complaint must 'isolate the allegedly unconstitutional acts of each defendant'; otherwise the complaint does not 'provide adequate notice as to the nature of the claims against each' and fails for this reason. . . Here, the caseworkers' assertion of qualified immunity in their motion, an assertion they made multiple times therein, gave rise to a presumption that they were immune from suit. . . This presumption operated such that when the caseworkers raised the defense of qualified immunity, the burden shifted to Plaintiffs to demonstrate the complaints' factual allegations established their right to recover against each caseworker. . . If Plaintiffs then failed to establish either prong of the qualified immunity analysis as to any caseworker, that caseworker was entitled to prevail on his or her defense. . . In sum, the burden was on Plaintiffs to overcome the presumption of immunity that arose as to each individual caseworker once the caseworkers raised the qualified immunity defense. Pahls tells us exactly this. There we explained that to state a viable § 1983 claim and overcome a qualified immunity defense, plaintiffs 'must establish that each defendant ... [violated] plaintiffs' clearly established constitutional rights.... Plaintiffs must do more than show ... that "defendants," as a collective and undifferentiated whole, were responsible for those violations.'. . What this means for our purposes is that every named Plaintiff had the burden of adequately pleading every element of his or her claim under the special relationship exception—including the existence of a special relationship between himself or herself and the State—against one or more named caseworkers. Whether a plaintiff has adequately pled a special relationship with the State should be the first inquiry in cases like this. 'The existence of the special relationship is the pivotal issue.'. . In its absence, an ODHS caseworker cannot be held liable under the special relationship exception to a Plaintiff suffering injuries at the hands of Jerry and Deidre Matthews—no matter how shocking the complaint's factual allegations. . . .Discovery may proceed on Plaintiff M.S.'s claim against Defendant Bergdorf because in 2005 the law was well established such that a reasonable caseworker cognizant of the governing law would have understood Bergdorf's failure to protect M.S. in light of child abuse and neglect allegations might give rise to constitutional liability under the special relationship exception. . . Thus, the district court properly denied caseworker Bergdorf's defense of qualified immunity as to M.S.'s particular claim against her. To the extent the complaint otherwise purports to state any cause of action under the special relationship exception, however, the district court, for the reasons stated, erred in denying the caseworkers qualified immunity.") requirements of Gee in his complaint, i.e., that he did not include facts showing the regulations restricting his ability to pray Jumu'ah were not related to a legitimate penological interest. We agree with this analysis as applied to Mr. Ghailani's First Amendment claim. However, Mr. Ghailani also pled that the restriction on his ability to pray was a violation of RFRA. The district court erred in applying the same pleading requirement to the RFRA claim as it did to the constitutional religious freedom claim. . . . Because the Turner standard does not apply to a RFRA claim, a prisoner-plaintiff clearly need not plead facts showing 'that the actions of which he complains were not reasonably related to legitimate penological interests,' as Gee required for First Amendment claims. Accordingly, while the district court properly dismissed Mr. Ghailani's First Amendment claim alleging that the prison violated his free exercise rights by not allowing him to pray Jumu'ah, it erred in dismissing his RFRA claim. Moreover, just as Mr. Ghailani did not need to plead facts showing the government lacked a legitimate penological interest, he also did not need to plead facts showing that the restrictions were not in 'furtherance of a compelling governmental interest' and were not 'the least restrictive means of furthering that compelling governmental interest.' 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb-1(b)(1)-(2). Subsection (b) of RFRA is an 'affirmative defense,' and 'the burden is placed squarely on the Government by RFRA.'")

Vega v. Davis, 572 F. App'x 611, 618-19 (10th Cir. 2014) ("In his response brief, the plaintiff essentially argues that the warden could be liable for any suicide by a mentally ill person in the Control Unit because of his knowledge that there were mentally ill people in the Control Unit that were not receiving mental health services. However, the complaint's only non-conclusory fact supporting the inference that Davis knew about the lack of treatment in the Control Unit was his single visit there. Although it is certainly possible that on his tour he witnessed enough in the Control Unit to make it obvious that there was a systematic denial of mental health care, we conclude from our 'judicial experience and common sense' that a single visit does not 'plausibly suggest' that Davis knew enough to be deliberately indifferent to Control Unit inmates. . . . Certainly, there is much in this complaint that, if true, is deeply concerning. However, we are counseled by Iqbal to remember that 'each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.'. . The fact that allegations in this complaint, if true, expose significant shortcomings in the treatment of mentally-ill prisoners at ADX cannot negate that requirement.")

Kansas Penn Gaming, LLC v. Collins, 656 F.3d 1210, 1219, 1220 (10th Cir. 2011) ("[I]n the wake of Twombly and Iqbal, and consistent with our cases establishing a more refined analytical framework for class-of-one claims, we must apply the plausibility standard with care. As at least one circuit has found, in light of Iqbal, a generalized pleading in the mold of Olech is no longer sufficient to state a class-of-one claim. Ruston v. Town Bd. for Town of Skaneateles, 610 F.3d 55 (2d Cir.2010), cert. denied, 131 S.Ct. 824 (2010). In that case, for example, the Second Circuit upheld the dismissal of plaintiffs' claim against the defendant town, for failure to set out specific examples of similarly situated individuals and differing treatment. . . We likewise dismissed a class-of-one claim on similar grounds in an unpublished but representative opinion. See Glover v. Mabrey, 384 F. App'x 763, 778 (10th Cir.2010) ("[Plaintiff] has failed to allege, as it must, the identity or characteristics of other, similarly situated contractors and how those similarly situated contractors were treated differently."). . . With these principles in mind, and consistent with our holdings in Robbins, 519 F.3d at 1247, 1253 and Smith, 561 F.3d at 1098, plaintiffs must offer enough specific factual allegations to 'nudge[ ] their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . . As we discussed above, after Twombly and Iqbal, it is insufficient to simply allege that other, unidentified properties have 'comparable' or 'similar' conditions–the claim must be supported by specific facts plausibly suggesting the conditions on the properties and the properties themselves are similar in all material respects. These cursory allegations are inadequate to support any class-of-one claim. But they are particularly problematic here, where the complaint addresses the inherently subjective and individualized enforcement of health and safety regulations. Unlike Olech, this is not a case where the regulatory decision is a simple, one-dimensional inquiry, resolved with a tape measure. Rather, Kansas Penn challenges an act of regulatory enforcement that implicates a 'multiplicity of relevant (nondiscriminatory) variables,' 'from the relative culpability of the defendants to the optimal deployment of prosecutorial resources,' making it 'correspondingly more difficult to bring an equal protection claim.'. . Because Kansas Penn has failed to allege facts suggesting that other property owners were similarly situated in all material respects, the district court did not err in dismissing the complaint.")

Gee v. Pacheco, 627 F.3d 1178, 1185,1186 (10th Cir. 2010) ("Although the plausibility standard has been criticized by some as placing an improper burden on plaintiffs, denying them proper access to the courts, that criticism ordinarily would not apply to the restrictions on prisoner complaints described above. One of the chief concerns of critics is that plaintiffs will need discovery before they can satisfy plausibility requirements when there is asymmetry of information, with the defendants having all the evidence. But prisoners claiming constitutional violations by officers within the prison will rarely suffer from information asymmetry. Not only do prisoners ordinarily know what has happened to them; but they will have learned how the institution has defended the challenged conduct when they pursue the administrative claims that they must bring as a prerequisite to filing suit. . . Of course, if the complaint alleges that the prisoner received no explanation in the grievance process (or was coerced into not pursuing a grievance), the claim that an officer's conduct lacked justification may become plausible. To be sure, a pro se prisoner may fail to plead his allegations with the skill necessary to state a plausible claim even when the facts would support one. But ordinarily the dismissal of a pro se claim under Rule 12(b)(6) should be without prejudice, . . . and a careful judge will explain the pleading's deficiencies so that a prisoner with a meritorious claim can then submit an adequate complaint[.]")

Mink v. Knox, 613 F.3d 995, 1002 (10th Cir. 2010) (amended complaint "plausibly asserted the requisite casual connection between [prosecutor's] conduct and the search and seizure that occurred at [plaintiff's] home.")

Smith v. U.S., 561 F.3d 1090, 1104, 1105 (10th Cir. 2009) ("To state an Eighth Amendment Bivens claim, Smith had to allege that each defendant official. . . acted with deliberate indifference–that he or she both knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to inmate health or safety. . . . As the litigation progresses, it is possible the government will produce evidence showing that some or all of the individual defendants did not know that the 1994 Ramsey-Schilling survey disclosed the presence of asbestos in the closet, or more generally, that an individual defendant did not know of the presence of asbestos in the closet, based on simple lack of knowledge or intervening circumstances. However, these are matters to be determined at a later point in this case. Smith has satisfied the standard enunciated in Robbins–the defendants are on fair notice of who is alleged to have done what to whom, Robbins, 519 F.3d at 1249–as to all defendants named in their individual capacities other than Alberto Gonzales and H. Lappin (the director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons).").

Choate v. Lemmings, Nos. 07-7099, 07-7100, 08-7010, 2008 WL 4291199, at *5 (10th Cir. Sept. 22, 2008) (not reported) ("The Supreme Court made clear in Gomez that there is no basis for imposing on a § 1983 plaintiff the obligation to anticipate and plead around the qualified immunity defense. . . More recently, in the wake of Crawford-El v.. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998), this court specifically rejected a heightened pleading standard for civil rights plaintiffs facing the immunity defense. See Currier v. Doran, 242 F.3d 905, 916-917 (10th Cir.2001). A § 1983 complaint needs but two allegations to state a cause of action: (1) that the plaintiff was deprived of a federal right; and (2) that the person who deprived him acted under color of state law. . . Moreover, these allegations need not be pled with specificity. All that is required are 'sufficient facts, that when taken as true, provide plausible grounds that discovery will reveal evidence to support plaintiff's allegations.'").

Briggs v. Johnson, No. 07-6037, 2008 WL 1815721, at *4-*6(10th Cir. Apr. 23, 2008) (not published) ("Construing his complaint in the light most favorable to him, Briggs has alleged that Defendants, Jean Bonner, and Carla Lynch, acting in concert, instructed at least one person to cease reporting ongoing abuse perpetrated against Kelsey. Clearly, this conduct was directed specifically at Kelsey, not the public at large. Further, it is evident from a reading of the entire complaint that Kelsey's guardian, her paternal grandmother, was involved in reporting that Kelsey was being abused during her unsupervised visits with Smith. As we recognized in Currier, the act of instructing individuals to cease reporting abuse has the effect of impeding access to protective services or other sources of assistance otherwise promptly available to the victim at the time of the abuse. . . Thus, if true, Defendants' actions imposed an immediate threat of harm to Kelsey which was limited in range and duration. Accordingly, we conclude Briggs has sufficiently alleged that Defendants created or increased Kelsey's vulnerability to abuse by their alleged act of discouraging the reporting of additional incidents of abuse. . . . Briggs's complaint differs from the complaint we concluded was insufficient in a recent case also involving allegations of substantive due process violations by state employees. See Robbins, 2008 WL 747132, at *5-*8. In contrast to the complaint in Robbins, Briggs's allegation that Defendants discouraged the reporting of additional incidents of abuse is specific enough to give Defendants fair notice of the grounds on which he claims entitlement to relief. Based on this allegation, the district court had no difficulty applying Currier to determine that the constitutional right asserted was clearly established. . . . We affirm the denial of Defendants' motion to dismiss to the extent they assert an entitlement to qualified immunity on Briggs's danger creation claim predicated on their act of discouraging the reporting of additional incidents of abuse.")

VanZandt v. Oklahoma Dept. of Human Services, 276 F. App'x 843, 2008 WL 1945344, at *3 (10th Cir. May 5, 2008) ("This Court, in Robbins, stated that plausibility serves two purposes: (1) to weed out claims that, absent additional pleadings, do not have a reasonable prospect of success, and (2) to inform the defendants of the actual grounds of the claim against them. . . A court, therefore, must review a complaint with these purposes in mind. Not surprisingly, the Twombly Court is critical of complaints that do not mention specific times, places or people involved. . . This Court also acknowledged that the degree of specificity necessary to establish plausibility and fair notice is dependant on the context of the case involved. . . Although we apply the same standard in evaluating dismissals in qualified immunity cases as to dismissals generally, complaints in § 1983 cases against individual government actors pose a greater likelihood of failures in notice and plausibility because they typically include complex claims against multiple defendants. . . The Twombly standard has greater 'bite' in these contexts, 'reflecting the special interest in resolving the affirmative defense of qualified immunity Aat the earliest stage of a litigation.'". . Therefore, in § 1983 cases, a plaintiff must 'make clear exactly who is alleged to have done what to whom, to provide each individual with fair notice as to the basis of the claims against him or her....'. . . Of course, neither Twombly nor Robbins requires, and we do not demand, the sort of specificity required in claims subject to Fed.R.Civ.P. 9(b). . . . To carry their burden, plaintiffs under the Twombly standard must do more than generally use the collective term 'defendants.'. . This Court, in Robbins, placed great importance on the need for a plaintiff to differentiate between the actions of each individual defendant and the actions of the group as a whole. . . This is because the purposes of plausibility, notice and gatekeeping, are best served by requiring plaintiffs to directly link an actual individual with the alleged improper conduct.").

Robbins v. Oklahoma, 519 F.3d 1242, 1247-50 (10th Cir. 2008) ("We are not the first to acknowledge that the new formulation is less than pellucid. See Iqbal v. Hasty, 490 F.3d 143, 157 (2d Cir.2007) (referring to the 'conflicting signals' in the Twombly opinion); Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 2008 WL 305025, at *3 (3d Cir. Feb. 5, 2008) (calling the opinion 'confusing'). As best we understand it, however, the opinion seeks to find a middle ground between 'heightened fact pleading ,' which is expressly rejected . . . and allowing complaints that are no more than 'labels and conclusions'or 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action,' which the Court stated 'will not do.' . . The most difficult question in interpreting Twombly is what the Court means by 'plausibility.' The Court states that the complaint must contain 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.' . . But it reiterates the bedrock principle that a judge ruling on a motion to dismiss must accept all allegations as true and may not dismiss on the ground that it appears unlikely the allegations can be proven. . . . Thus, 'plausible' cannot mean 'likely to be true.' Rather, 'plausibility' in this context must refer to the scope of the allegations in a complaint: if they are so general that they encompass a wide swath of conduct, much of it innocent, then the plaintiffs 'have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.' . . The allegations must be enough that, if assumed to be true, the plaintiff plausibly (not just speculatively) has a claim for relief. . . This requirement of plausibility serves not only to weed out claims that do not (in the absence of additional allegations) have a reasonable prospect of success, but also to inform the defendants of the actual grounds of the claim against them. 'Without some factual allegation in the complaint, it is hard to see how a claimant could satisfy the requirement of providing not only 'fair notice' of the nature of the claim, but also 'grounds' on which the claim rests.' . . . The Twombly Court was particularly critical of complaints that 'mentioned no specific time, place, or person involved in the alleged conspiracies.' . . . The Third Circuit has noted, and we agree, that the degree of specificity necessary to establish plausibility and fair notice, and therefore the need to include sufficient factual allegations, depends on context: 'Context matters in notice pleading . Fair notice under Rule 8(a)(2) depends on the type of case....' [citing Phillips] . . . . The context of this case is a claim of qualified immunity by state officials or employees who were sued for damages in their personal capacity for injuries to a child inflicted by a third party. . . .To 'nudge their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible,' Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1974, in this context, plaintiffs must allege facts sufficient to show (assuming they are true) that the defendants plausibly violated their constitutional rights, and that those rights were clearly established at the time. . . . Although we apply 'the same standard in evaluating dismissals in qualified immunity cases as to dismissals generally,'. . . complaints in § 1983 cases against individual government actors pose a greater likelihood of failures in notice and plausibility because they typically include complex claims against multiple defendants. The Twombly standard may have greater bite in such contexts, appropriately reflecting the special interest in resolving the affirmative defense of qualified immunity 'at the earliest possible stage of a litigation.'. . . Given the complaint's use of either the collective term 'Defendants' or a list of the defendants named individually but with no distinction as to what acts are attributable to whom, it is impossible for any of these individuals to ascertain what particular unconstitutional acts they are alleged to have committed. . . . In addition to the failure of Count I to satisfy the standard of fair notice required by Rule 8, the plaintiffs do not allege facts sufficient to render their [state-created-danger and equal protection] claim[s] plausible.")

Dorf v. City of Evansville, No. 11–CV–351–S, 2012 WL 1440343, at *4, *5 & n.2 (D. Wyo. Apr. 22, 2012) ("In noting that Plaintiff's allegations are made 'upon information and belief,' the Court does not suggest that such allegations made are improper under Iqbal and Twombly. As the Sixth Circuit recently observed, the plausibility standard of Iqbal and Twombly:

> does not prevent a plaintiff from pleading facts alleged upon information and belief where the facts are peculiarly within the possession and control of the defendant or where the belief is based on factual information that makes the inference of culpability plausible.

Arista Records, LLC v. Doe 3, 604 F.3d 110, 120 (2d Cir.2010) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). Here, however, even though Plaintiffs' allegations are made 'upon information and belief,' there is simply no 'factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . Nor is the nature of Officer Pena's alleged prior misconduct a matter that is 'peculiarly within the possession and control' of defendants.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

McCullough v. Finley, 907 F.3d 1324, 1333-35 (11th Cir. 2018) ("The jailees allege that the mayor and chiefs, government officials 'at the highest level,'. . . created and implemented an unlawful scheme and intentionally subjected them to that scheme, but Iqbal illustrates why the jailees are 'armed with nothing more than conclusions[.]. .Substitute the mayor for the attorney general and the chiefs for the FBI director in Iqbal, and the comparison is uncanny. Like the complaint in Iqbal, which labeled the attorney general as the 'principal architect' and the FBI director as the 'instrument[ ]' behind an unlawful detention policy, the jailees' complaint alleges that the mayor 'adopted' and the chiefs 'administered' an unlawful scheme to increase municipal revenue. The complaint in Iqbal alleged that the attorney general and the FBI director 'knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject [Iqbal] to harsh conditions of confinement as a matter of policy.'. . Similarly, the jailees allege that the mayor and chiefs 'adopted, ratified[,] and administered policies, practices[,] or customs' that were 'part of a scheme designed to increase municipal budgets ... through imprisonment for nonpayment [of fines] ... and the use of coerced jail labor.' And the jailees allege that the mayor and chiefs acted 'intentionally and unlawfully,' as well as 'recklessly, wantonly, willfully, maliciously, or in bad faith.' We must discard the conclusory allegations that the mayor and chiefs created and implemented a scheme. As the Supreme Court has explained, allegations that government officials were the 'principal architect' and instrument[ ]' behind an unlawful policy, without supporting allegations, are conclusory. The allegations that the mayor 'adopted' and the chiefs 'administered' an unlawful scheme to increase municipal revenue, without more, are 'not entitled to be assumed true.'. . And the allegations that the mayor and chiefs intended to subject jailees to the scheme are conclusory. The district court ruled that the jailees' allegations are 'very much tied to bad faith,' but it ignored that these allegations merely recite the legal elements that the jailees must establish to overcome state-agent immunity. . . The jailees cannot overcome the mayor's and chiefs' immunity with conclusory allegations that 'carry no weight.'. .The absence of allegations about any individual acts of the mayor or chiefs reinforces the conclusory nature of the jailees' complaint. The jailees allege that the mayor and chiefs are 'individually liable for their acts or omissions,' but the complaint fails to 'provid[e] the facts from which one could draw such a conclusion.'. . The complaint alleges the mayor's and chiefs' names and titles, but nothing about 'the significance of their titles, their individual roles in the [scheme], their personal interactions or familiarity with [jailees], their length of service, their management policies, or any other characteristics that would bear on whether they knew about' the scheme that they allegedly operated. . . We cannot even infer from the complaint when either chief was in office. Nor can we infer that the mayor or chiefs were ever present in a municipal courtroom when jailees were sentenced or in a municipal jail when jailees were forced to work. After we discard conclusory allegations, the second step in our evaluation of a complaint is to assume that any remaining factual allegations are true and determine whether those allegations state a plausible claim. . . To state a plausible claim, factual allegations must 'allow[ ] the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . That is, a complaint must contain factual allegations that are 'enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.'. . Factual allegations, although consistent with a plaintiff's theory, may fail to state a plausible claim 'given more likely explanations.'. . The jailees argue that their complaint contains 'great factual detail,' but we disagree. After discarding their conclusory allegations, we struggle to find factual allegations left in the complaint, and the few factual allegations that remain do not state a plausible claim. The jailees allege that the City of Montgomery collected more fines and court costs than the City of Huntsville, which has a similar population, but even if true, the difference in municipal revenues does not 'nudge[ ] [the jailees'] claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . Perhaps there is more crime in Montgomery. This lone factual allegation does not support a plausible inference of a scheme by the mayor and chiefs, 'given more likely explanations' for the difference in municipal revenues. . . The alleged difference in revenues fails to raise the jailees' 'right to relief above the speculative level.'. .The jailees' complaint contains factual allegations about misconduct in the municipal court, but as we explained, that misconduct concerns judicial acts. And any connection between the judicial acts and the mayor and chiefs is 'too chimerical to be maintained.'. . The jailees do not allege that the mayor or chiefs presided over any proceedings in which they could have informed a defendant of his rights, appointed counsel, or considered alternative sentences. And certainly, the mayor and chiefs did not sentence jailees to sit-out their fines. No factual allegations in the complaint plausibly connect the mayor or chiefs to these judicial acts, and without any 'factual enhancement,' the complaint 'stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility.'")

Carollo v. Boria, 833 F.3d 1322, 1330, 1332 (11th Cir. 2016) ("It is not appropriate at the motion to dismiss stage for us to interpret the Municipal Charter's ambiguous job description for the City Manager. . . Discovery will illuminate exactly which laws Carollo had the responsibility to enforce or administer and, in fact, enforced or administered in the ordinary course of his job responsibilities. Nonetheless, with respect to the only question before us under Rules 8(a) and 12(b)(6) — whether, taking the factual allegations in the complaint as true, the complaint states a claim — we find it plausible under Iqbal and Twombly that Carollo spoke as a citizen and not pursuant to his ordinary job duties as City Manager when he made statements to law enforcement and other agencies about how Boria and Ruiz violated Florida's campaign finance laws. . .Carollo's status as a supervising public official does not alter our conclusion that he has plausibly alleged that he spoke as a citizen about violations of Florida's campaign finance laws. . . . Under these circumstances, we believe that justice requires giving Carollo an opportunity to file an amended complaint that resurrects those portions of his complaint that we dismiss by pleading facts that support the claim — if true — that he spoke as a citizen and not pursuant to his ordinary job responsibilities. The district court should then proceed directly to discovery, which will reveal, among other things, what precisely were Carollo's ordinary job responsibilities. Indeed, each of the relevant cases from the Supreme Court and this Circuit to undertake Garcetti's 'practical inquiry' concerning whether a plaintiff spoke pursuant to ordinary job responsibilities or as a citizen did so at the summary judgment stage or later in the life of the case.")

Hoefling v. City of Miami, 811 F.3d 1271, 1276 (11th Cir. 2016) ("We expressly held in Randall, and reaffirm today, that 'whatever requirements our heightened pleading standard once imposed have since been replaced by those of the Twombly–Iqbal plausibility standard .... [which] applies to all civil actions....' . . . Accordingly, the district court should not have placed a 'heightened pleading' burden on Mr. Hoefling for his § 1983 claims.")

Weiland v. Palm Beach Cnty. Sheriff's Office, 792 F.3d 1313, 1321-28 (11th Cir. 2015) ("T.D.S. was this Court's first shot in what was to become a thirty-year salvo of criticism aimed at shotgun pleadings, and there is no ceasefire in sight. . .Some of our shooting, which has mostly been done with nonlethal dicta, has at times been nearly as lacking in precision as the target itself. At times we have used the term 'shotgun pleading' to mean little more than 'poorly drafted complaint.'. . In the hope that we could impose some clarity on what we have said and done about unclear complaints, we have examined more than sixty published decisions issued since the T.D.S. decision in 1985. One thing we looked for is how many types of shotgun pleadings have been used, wittingly or unwittingly, by attorneys and litigants. [court discusses four categories of shotgun pleadings] [W]e conclude that the district court abused its discretion when it dismissed Weiland's count one and count three claims against Fleming and Johnson on the ground that those counts did not comply with Rules 8(a)(2) and 10(b). In concluding that the court should not have dismissed those two counts, we are not retreating from this circuit's criticism of shotgun pleadings, but instead are deciding that, whatever their faults, these two counts are informative enough to permit a court to readily determine if they state a claim upon which relief can be granted. The district court implicitly recognized as much when it observed in the orders dismissing counts one and three that they actually do state claims upon which relief can be granted. Whether those observations are correct is a question to which we now turn. . . . Deputies Johnson and Fleming did not argue in their motion to dismiss Weiland's third amended complaint, or in their brief to this Court, that they are entitled to qualified immunity. We limit our analysis to whether the allegations in Weiland's complaint are sufficient to state a claim upon which relief can be granted without regard to the qualified immunity defense. . . .Construing the allegations in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, as we are required to do, count one alleges that Deputy Johnson shot Weiland without warning when he was not posing a threat to the deputies or anyone else; that while he was on the ground bleeding from the gunshot wound and not offering any resistance or threat, Deputy Fleming tasered Weiland; and that while he was on the ground seriously injured by both the shooting and the tasering and not offering any resistance or threat, both deputies beat him without cause. Count one states an excessive force claim upon which relief can be granted against both deputies. . . . Weiland claims that he was detained improperly and prosecuted for charges based on evidence fabricated by the deputies and lies contained in their police reports. . . . Because count three specifies a causal connection between the alleged cover up and the specific deprivation of Weiland's constitutional rights, it sufficiently alleges 'an underlying actual denial of his constitutional rights,' which is required to state a claim for conspiracy under § 1983. . . For these reasons, we will reverse the part of the district court's judgment dismissing count three as to Deputy Johnson and Deputy Fleming.")

were deliberately indifferent or their actions constituted or resulted in deliberate indifference carry no weight. Similarly, by alleging Appellants 'knew or should have known' of a risk, Franklin has merely recited an element of a claim without providing the facts from which one could draw such a conclusion. The district court found these allegations sufficient. Had the district court followed the Supreme Court's 'twopronged approach' of first separating out the complaint's conclusory legal allegations and then determining whether the remaining well-pleaded factual allegations, accepted as true, 'plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief,' the insufficiency of Franklin's allegations would have been obvious. . . .Stripping away Franklin's conclusory allegations leaves only a handful of properly pleaded facts—specifically, (1) that Gay verbally harassed Franklin and told her 'there is nothing you can do,' (2) that Gay sexually assaulted Franklin, (3) that Gay had previously sexually assaulted another female detainee, and (4) that Gay had previously had sexual relations with a third female detainee. Given only these facts, Franklin's complaint is insufficient to state a plausible claim that each of the Supervisory Defendants should have known of a substantial risk that Gay would sexually assault Franklin, much less that each defendant was subjectively aware of the risk and knowingly disregarded it. Franklin states that Sheriff Curry 'failed to promulgate, to adopt, to implement or to enforce policies, rules, or regulations to safeguard female inmates,' but she does not describe any of the policies that were in place, the sort of policies that should have been in place, or how those policies could have prevented Gay's harassment. Similarly, Franklin alleges the names and titles of the other Supervisory Defendants. . . but alleges nothing about the significance of their titles, their individual roles in the jail, their personal interactions or familiarity with Gay, their length of service, their management policies, or any other characteristics that would bear on whether they knew about but were deliberately indifferent to Gay's conduct and the risk he posed. . . From Franklin's allegations, a finder of fact could not even conclude that all of the Defendants were ever in the jail, much less that each of their individual actions constituted deliberate indifference to the risk Gay would abuse Franklin. Subjecting Appellants to the full 'panoply of expensive and time-consuming pretrial discovery devices,'. . . and forcing them to defend this action based on Franklin's inadequate allegations not only runs counter to the general rules of pleading, it also undermines qualified immunity's fundamental purpose of protecting 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law' from the costs of suit.")

AFL-CIO v. City of Miami, 637 F.3d 1178, 1186 (11th Cir. 2011) ("The plaintiffs have made conclusory statements that they were deprived of property without due process, but this is not even a 'formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action.'. . Nothing in the complaint–directly, inferentially, or otherwise–says how Florida's procedures for recovering wrongfully taken property violated due process, or that the plaintiffs even attempted to use those procedures. Nor do the plaintiffs allege that the defendants' pre-deprivation procedures, if they were even required, were somehow inadequate. Given the absence of any information in the complaint about a material element of their claim, the plaintiffs have failed to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.")

Randall v. Scott, 610 F.3d 701, 708 n.2, 709 (11th Cir. 2010) ("We now say explicitly what Keating implied: whatever requirements our heightened pleading standard once imposed have since been replaced by those of the Twombly-Iqbal plausibility standard. . . . Thus, like complaints in all other cases, complaints in § 1983 cases must now '"contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain a recovery under some viable legal theory."' . . . While Swann, GJR, and Danley reaffirm application of a heightened pleading standard for § 1983 cases involving defendants able to assert qualified immunity, we agree with Randall that those cases were effectively overturned by the Iqbal court. Pleadings for § 1983 cases involving defendants who are able to assert qualified immunity as a defense shall now be held to comply with the standards described in Iqbal.")

Harrison v. Benchmark Electronics Huntsville, Inc., 593 F.3d 1206, 1214, 1215 (11th Cir. 2010) ("The district court concluded that Harrison failed to plead his medical inquiry claim in his complaint, a determination Harrison contests on appeal. We only require that a plaintiff provide 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that [he] is entitled to relief.' Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2). 'The point is to Agive the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests."'. . . Harrison satisfied our liberal pleading standard. His complaint alleged that BEHI questioned him about his seizures following a pre-employment drug test, and he claimed damages for these allegedly prohibited medical inquiries. Thus, BEHI had fair notice that Harrison sought relief under ' 12112(d)(2), and his allegations, which specifically referred to pre-employment medical inquiries, were more than speculative. . . To the extent that the district court concluded otherwise, it erred.")

Harper v. Lawrence County, Ala., 592 F.3d 1227, 1234, 1235 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Here, there are two main ways Plaintiff alleges Defendants knew of Harper's serious medical needs. First, Plaintiff claims that they 'had full knowledge that Harper was an alcoholic who would experience delirium tremens (DT's) due to alcohol withdrawal if left untreated,' because he had been arrested before and placed in the Lawrence County Jail on various alcohol-related charges. Compl. at 8. She also alleges that during the course of one or more of his prior arrests Harper 'informed the defendants that he had a history of seizures due to alcohol withdrawal.' Id. at 9. However, these allegations do not meet the Rule 8 standard, much less the heightened pleading standard. Plaintiff did not offer any facts to suggest why these Defendants in particular (a sheriff, two jail administrators, and two jailers) would know of Harper's specific medical history, nor did she offer any specific facts regarding Harper's past arrests. Moreover, even if those Defendants did know of Harper's history of alcoholism and/or past alcohol-related arrests, they would still have needed to know that Harper was in serious need of medical attention during the time period in question, April 24, 2007 to April 28, 2007. In our view, Plaintiff does not 'raise [her] right to relief above the speculative level' in this instance. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. Second, Plaintiff claims Defendants were aware of Harper's condition because of his symptoms and behavior at the jail. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that several days after his initial incarceration Harper was hallucinating, slurring his words, physically weak, and incoherent. According to the Complaint, Reed and/or Robinson told both Taylor and Fike that Harper was displaying erratic and strange behavior. Compl. at 7-8. The Complaint also alleges that other inmates informed Reed and Robinson that Harper was acting strangely, losing his balance, and had urinated on himself. Id. at 9. Based on these allegations we hold that Plaintiff adequately alleged Reed and Robinson had 'actual knowledge' of the risk of serious harm to Harper if left untreated. However, the Complaint does not allege how the other three Defendants, Sheriff Gene Mitchell and administrators Kenneth Mitchell and Brown, could possibly have had such actual knowledge. Thus, the court should have dismissed the 'personal participation' claims as to those three Defendants based on qualified immunity, and we reverse the district court's order in that respect.").

Amnesty Intern., USA v. Battle, 559 F.3d 1170, 1179, 1180 (11th Cir. 2009) ("Since Leatherman, this court has determined that heightened pleading still applies where the defendants are individuals for whom qualified immunity may be available. . . .Here, the district court conflated the issues of satisfying the heightened pleading with the need to overcome qualified immunity. To satisfy even the heightened pleading standard for § 1983 claims, Amnesty need plead only 'some factual detail' from which the court may determine whether Defendants' alleged actions violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . The heightened pleading standard does not require a complaint to cite cases demonstrating that the defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he complaint makes clear Amnesty's allegation that its First and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated because it was unable to have a successful protest rally and unable to pass out Amnesty literature as a result of Defendants' creation of a police cordon. These facts provide sufficient detail for Defendants to understand what alleged rights were violated (the right to hold a peaceful protest with an audience and the right to pass out leaflets) and which of their actions allegedly violated those rights (Defendants' actions ordering their subordinates to create a police cordon which interfered with the rally and the distribution of leaflets). These facts also provide enough information for the court to determine whether those facts indeed set out a violation of rights and whether those rights were clearly established when these incidents occurred.").

A.P. ex rel. Bazerman v. Feaver, 293 F. App'x 635, 2008 WL 3870697, at *10 (11th Cir. Aug. 21, 2008) ("While Rule 8 allows a plaintiff a great deal of latitude in the manner in which a complaint presents a claim, . . .this court has implemented more stringent pleading requirements in § 1983 actions in which qualified immunity is likely to be raised as a defense. . . . This heightened specificity is necessary so that the court has sufficient factual allegations to allow it to assess whether a defendant's actions violated a clearly established right. . . If it is impossible to make this determination from the face of the plaintiff's complaint, the purpose of the qualified immunity defense– shielding government officials from the demands of defending oneself from damages suits–may well be frustrated.").

Davis v. Coca Cola Bottling Co. Consol., 516 F.3d 955, 974 n.43 (11th Cir. 2008) ("We understand Twombly as a further articulation of the standard by which to evaluate the sufficiency of all claims brought pursuant to Rule 8(a). In that case, the Court retired the oft-cited standard that 'a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond a doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief,' Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 45-46, 78 S.Ct. 99, 102, 2 L.Ed.2d 80 (1957), saying it 'is best forgotten as an incomplete, negative gloss on an accepted pleading standard: once a claim has been stated adequately, it may be supported by showing any set of facts consistent with the allegations in the complaint.' Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1969. The main Rule 8(a) standard now seems to be whether the 'allegations plausibly suggest[ ] ([and are] not merely consistent with)' a violation of the law.").

Weissman v. National Ass'n of Securities Dealers, Inc., 500 F.3d 1293, 1309 n.6 (11th Cir. 2007) (Tjoflat, J., dissenting) ("Although I believe Weissman's complaint is due to be dismissed on absolute immunity grounds under even the basic Rule 8 pleading standard, I would suggest that our explicit heightened pleading requirement for some § 1983 suits might properly be applied in the SRO [Self Regulating Organization] immunity context, as well. A few words about heightened pleading may be helpful here. The panel in Swann read the Supreme Court's decision in Leatherman as having abrogated two of our earlier decisions suggesting a broad application of the heightened pleading requirement in § 1983 cases. . . In describing the effect of Leatherman on our circuit's precedent, Swann purported to limit the application of heightened pleading to only those cases in which qualified immunity is a potential defense. . . To be sure, Leatherman abrogated our heightened pleading precedent to the extent that our cases applied the more stringent standard to claims against municipalities. I do not believe, however, that Leatherman precludes the application of a heightened pleading requirement in absolute immunity cases.").

Washington v. Albright, 814 F.Supp.2d 1317, 123, 1324 (M.D. Ala. 2011) (After setting out history of "heightened pleading standard" in Eleventh Circuit, court goes on : "Further muddying the waters, is the fact that decisions since Randall have not uniformly rejected heightened pleading in § 1983 cases. A number of courts within the Eleventh Circuit have relied upon Randall and held that there is no longer any heightened pleading standard for § 1983 claims against individuals entitled to qualified immunity. [collecting cases] However, at least one panel decision from the Eleventh Circuit decided after Randall makes no mention of it and employs the heightened pleading standard. See, e.g., Heflin v. Miami-Dade County, 393 F. App'x 658, 659-60 (11th Cir.2010). This Court is persuaded that the appropriate course is to follow the holding of Randall and reject heightened pleading. The Court notes that this may not be a case in which the applicable standard makes a difference. For the reasons set forth below, the Court finds that Washington's pleading fails to satisfy the pleading standards announced in Iqbal, Twombly, and their progeny. Logically, if the pleading is insufficient to me[e]t that lesser standard, it would also be insufficient under the heightened pleading standard which this Court declines to apply in this case.")

Pressley v. Madison, No. 2:08-CV-0157-RWS, 2009 WL 3878260, at *2, *3 (N.D. Ga. Nov. 17, 2009) ("Plaintiff sues Joel Robinson, a former Barrow County Sheriff, and three officials of the Barrow County Jail (the Jail)–Captain Mike Katsegianes, Sergeant M. Walker, and Officer Connor. ("m.Compl.& 3.) Plaintiff presents the following allegations. On January 2, 2007, she was transferred from state prison to the Jail, where Officer Connor removed her hijab in the presence of several men, in violation of Plaintiff's Muslim religious beliefs and practices. Officer Connor then told Plaintiff that 'she is not allowed to cover her hair in the jail, even for prayer.' Plaintiff claims that without her hij ab she cannot 'practice Islam through 5 daily obligatory prayers, for which her hair must be covered.' When Plaintiff grieved this alleged violation, Captain Katsegianes informed her that she did 'not have the right to wear anything that is or could be a safety or security issue.' Plaintiff's hij ab was not returned to her until she was transferred back to state prison on January 4, 2007. (Id. & IV.) Plaintiff alleges that the four named Defendants violated her rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutional Persons Act (RLUIPA), the First Amendment's Free Exercise Clause, and the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. (Id.) Plaintiff seeks an injunction to prohibit Barrow County Jail from depriving Muslim women of their hij abs and also seeks several million dollars in damages. (Id. & V.) . . . . Court finds that Plaintiff has alleged a viable cause of action under § 1983 based on the deprivation of her hijab at the Barrow County Jail. That claim is ALLOWED TO PROCEED as in any other civil action. However, because Plaintiff has not set forth any action taken by Joel Robinson in violation of her legal rights, Mr. Robinson is DISMISSED from this action.").

Frye v. Escambia County Bd. of Educ., No. 08-0340-WS-N, 2009 WL 3336917, at *1 (S.D. Ala. Oct. 13, 2009) ("The plaintiff does not directly address this standard but instead insists the complaint satisfies Rule 8 as construed by the Supreme Court in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). . . The heightened pleading requirement, however, does not spring from Rule 8 but from the needs of individual governmental defendants for sufficient information to allow them to effectively assert qualified immunity (which is immunity from suit, not merely from judgment) at the outset of litigation. . . Although the Supreme Court has repeatedly questioned the imposition of pleading requirements in excess of those inherent in Rule 8, . . . the Eleventh Circuit continues to enforce its heightened pleading requirement. . .The plaintiff's invocation of Rule 8 is thus unresponsive to the defendants' challenge.").

Rhodes v. MacDonald, No. 4:09-CV-106 (CDL), 2009 WL 2997605, at *4 (M.D. Ga. Sept. 16, 2009) ("For a complaint to be facially plausible, the Court must be able 'to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged' based upon a review of the factual content pled by the Plaintiff. . . The factual allegations must be sufficient 'to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.' Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555 (2007). Plaintiff's complaint is not plausible on its face. To the extent that it alleges any 'facts,' the Complaint does not connect those facts to any actual violation of Plaintiff's individual constitutional rights. Unlike in Alice in Wonderland, simply saying something is so does not make it so. The weakness of Plaintiff's claim certainly weighs heavily against judicial review of the deployment order, and in fact, would authorize dismissal of Plaintiff's complaint for failure to state a claim.").

Glenn v. Brumby, No. 1:08-CV-2360-RWS, 2009 WL 1849951, at *3 n. 2 (N.D. Ga. June 25, 2009) ("The Court notes that Defendants contend a higher pleading standard applies to § 1983 cases like the one before the Court, but Plaintiff is correct that the Eleventh Circuit has rejected such a pleading requirement and has clarified that to the extent that such a requirement still exists, it applies only in cases where qualified immunity is an available defense.")

Burge v. Ferguson, No. 8:07-cv-2217-T-23MSS, 2008 WL 5246306, at *3 (M.D. Fla. Dec. 16, 2008) ("Although controversial, the heightened pleading requirement permits a potentially immune defendant to frame a fact-specific qualified immunity defense at an early stage and enables the court to conduct the fact-specific inquiry contemplated by Saucier v. Katz, 533 U .S. 194 (2001). Absent a heightened pleading requirement, a meaningful Saucier inquiry is often impossible. Accordingly, some courts rejecting a heightened pleading requirement as inconsistent with Rule 8(a)'s notice pleading standard have adopted a rule that effectively reproduces the requirement. See, e.g., Thomas v. Independence Twp., 463 F.3d 285, 300-302 (3d Cir.2006); cf. Schultea v. Wood, 47 F.3d 1427, 1433-34 (5th Cir.1995).")

Pete's Towing Co. v. City of Tampa, Fla., No. 8:08-cv-209-T-23EAJ, 2008 WL 4791821, at *3 (M.D. Fla. Brown v. Pastrana, No. 08-20631-CIV., 2008 WL 4097615, at *5 n.2 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 4, 2008) ("The Jones v. Bock, Twombly and Erickson Courts have once again reiterated, as the Supreme Court unanimously held in Leatherman, Swierkiewicz, and Hill, that adopting a different and more onerous pleading standard in particular types of cases should be done through established rulemaking procedures, and not on a case-by-case basis by the courts. . . . Some district courts in the Eleventh Circuit continue to apply a 'heightened pleading' standard, justifying its use on the flawed premise that the Supreme Court specifically ruled that district courts may not impose a heightened pleading requirement for claims pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against municipal entities but declined to reach the issue of whether a similar holding was warranted in such cases against individual government entities. . . The 'flaw' in this logic is the fact that the Supreme Court has not indicated that qualified immunity might warrant an exception to the general approach, the explicit disclaimer of a heightened pleading standard in Twombly, and Erickson's reversal of the Tenth Circuit's use of a heightened pleading standard in case against individual state actors who might be entitled to qualified immunity.") Fleming v. Barber, No. 3:07cv279/MCR/MD, 2008 WL 2790194, at *3 (N.D. Fla. July 17, 2008) ("The Supreme Court has stated that a heightened pleading standard–which requires the facts of a claim to be alleged with some specificity–contravenes the notice pleading requirements set forth in Fed.R.Civ.P. 8. . . . Nonetheless, with respect to claims brought pursuant to § 1983, this circuit has recognized that a heightened pleading requirement in fact is applicable. . . In particular, this circuit has consistently held that the decision in Leatherman does not apply to defendants who may be entitled to qualified immunity . . . In such cases, 'more than mere conclusory notice pleading is required.... [A] complaint will be dismissed as insufficient where the allegations it contains are vague and conclusory.'")

Walling v. City of Largo 2008 WL 2782687, at *4 (M.D. Fla. July 16, 2008) ("Plaintiff alleges that Bell Atlantic raises a clear question of the Eleventh Circuit's position with regard to heightened pleading standards and that this question has not been addressed by the Eleventh Circuit subsequent to the Bell Atlantic ruling. . . Plaintiff relies primarily on Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) as support for his argument that he has plead sufficient facts to state a claim. . . . This Court finds that it is not clear that the Eleventh Circuit has upheld a heightened pleading requirement for Section 1983 claims. Thus, this Court finds a heightened pleading standard an improper lense through which to analyze the First Amended Complaint.")

Bouyer v. Rounsoville, No. 1:08-CV-0856-RWS, 2008 WL 2787484, at *4 (N.D. Ga. Although the Eleventh Circuit has not explicitly adopted a heightened pleading requirement, it does require a plaintiff to include 'key factual details' in alleging the existence of a similarly-situated person. . . . To the extent the Second Circuit has determined otherwise, the Court must disregard its reasoning in favor of binding case law from the Eleventh Circuit.").

I. Note: Motion to Dismiss v. Summary Judgment Standard

SUPREME COURT

Sause v. Bauer, 138 S. Ct. 2561, 2563 (2018) (per curiam) ("As the case comes before us, it is unclear whether the police officers were in petitioner's apartment at the time in question based on her consent, whether they had some other ground consistent with the Fourth Amendment for entering and remaining there, or whether their entry or continued presence was unlawful. Petitioner's complaint contains no express allegations on these matters. Nor does her complaint state what, if anything, the officers wanted her to do at the time when she was allegedly told to stop praying. Without knowing the answers to these questions, it is impossible to analyze petitioner's free exercise claim. In considering the defendants' motion to dismiss, the District Court was required to interpret the pro se complaint liberally, and when the complaint is read that way, it may be understood to state Fourth Amendment claims that could not properly be dismissed for failure to state a claim. We appreciate that petitioner elected on appeal to raise only a First Amendment argument and not to pursue an independent Fourth Amendment claim, but under the circumstances, the First Amendment claim demanded consideration of the ground on which the officers were present in the apartment and the nature of any legitimate law enforcement interests that might have justified an order to stop praying at the specific time in question. Without considering these matters, neither the free exercise issue nor the officers' entitlement to qualified immunity can be resolved. Thus, petitioner's choice to abandon her Fourth Amendment claim on appeal did not obviate the need to address these matters.")

Moore v. Hartman, 388 F.3d 871, 876 (D.C. Cir. 2004) ("[A]lthough the inspectors conceded in the appeal from their motion to dismiss that Moore's claim stated a violation of clearly established law, they are free to assert qualified immunity now: the 'legally relevant factors bearing upon the [qualified immunity] question will be different on summary judgment than on an earlier motion to dismiss,' because the court now conducts the immunity inquiry based on 'the evidence before it,' rather than the pleadings."), rev'd on other grounds, 126 S. FIRST CIRCUIT

Eves v. LePage, 927 F.3d 575, 582-83 & n.5 (1st Cir. 2019) ("The Supreme Court has long established that, when sued in their official capacities, government officials are immune from damages claims unless '(1) they violated a federal statutory or constitutional right, and (2) the unlawfulness of their conduct was "clearly established at the time."'. . . A decision of qualified immunity on a motion to dismiss is appropriate here. . . . We reject Eves's contention that qualified immunity should be decided at a later stage of litigation, not on a motion to dismiss. That would turn well-settled precedent on its head. The Supreme Court has repeatedly 'stressed the importance of resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage [of the] litigation.'. . The Court has affirmed the dismissal of multiple First Amendment claims on the basis of qualified immunity. . . We have as well.")

Velez-Rivera v. Agosto-Alicea, 437 F.3d 145, 151 (1st Cir. 2006) ("Plaintiffs allege that the district court applied the heightened pleading standard in two separate instances. First, when it granted summary judgment for Agosto because Pena had failed to allege any material fact showing 'deliberate indifference,' an element of 'supervisory liability.'. . Second, when the district court found that Agosto was protected under the doctrine of qualified immunity because his actions with regard to Velez were 'objectively reasonable.' We see no evidence that the heightened pleading standard was applied. Under the overruled standard, the district court would have required heightened specificity at the pleading stage, which did not occur in this case. By contrast, the district court correctly applied the appropriate standard of review to defendants' summary judgment motion when it found no genuine issue as to any material fact. The court's analysis of supervisory liability and qualified immunity relied upon the appropriate standards because, although specificity is not required at the pleading stage, it is required at the summary judgment stage. Swierkiewicz specifically distinguished the two doctrines, explaining that '[t]his simplified notice pleading standard relies on liberal discovery rules and summary judgment motions to define disputed facts and issues and to dispose of unmeritorious claims.' . . In other words, notice pleading is sufficient for a claim to survive a motion to dismiss, but plaintiffs bear a heavier burden at the summary judgment stage.").

Jenkins v. City of Taunton, No. CV 15-10003-MBB, 2018 WL 326462, at *5 (D. Mass. Jan. 8, 2018) ("[A]lthough mindful that qualified immunity is an immunity from suit as well as monetary damages, the denial of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage does not foreclose the responding officers from raising the defense in a post-trial motion based on the facts in evidence at trial. . . Thus, the responding officers retain the ability to move for judgment as a matter of law before the case is submitted to the jury and after a verdict based on qualified immunity in order to avoid any monetary damages. . . ' "[O]nce trial has been had, the availability of official immunity"' is ascertained based on ' "the trial record, not the pleadings nor the summary judgment record."'")

Sabir v. Williams, 37 F.4th 810, 822-23 (2d Cir. 2022) ("The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly ... stressed the importance of resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation.'. . 'But there is an obvious, if rarely expressed, corollary to that principle: The immunity question cannot be resolved before the earliest possible stage, i.e., prior to ascertainment of the truth of the plausible factual allegations on which a finding of qualified immunity is premised.'. . The wardens chose to press their qualified immunity defense at the pleadings stage, and they therefore must face the 'more stringent standard applicable to this procedural route.' McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 436 (2d Cir. 2004). 'Not only must the facts supporting the defense appear on the face of the complaint [or the evidence in its attachments], but ... the motion may be granted only where it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim that would entitle him to relief.'. . On a motion to dismiss, the plaintiffs are 'entitled to all reasonable inferences from the facts alleged, not only those that support [their] claim, but also those that defeat the immunity defense.'. . For this reason, we have explained that 'advancing qualified immunity as grounds for a motion to dismiss is almost always a procedural mismatch.' [citing Chamberlain] Although it is possible for a qualified immunity defense to succeed on a motion to dismiss, . . . such a defense 'faces a formidable hurdle ... and is usually not successful[.]'. . A reasonable officer should have known, based on clearly established law, that denying a Muslim inmate the ability to engage in group prayer without any justification or compelling interest, as alleged in the SAC, violates RFRA.")

Chamberlain for the Estate of Chamberlain v. City of White Plains, 960 F.3d 100, 107-14 (2d Cir. 2020) ("Based on the facts alleged and otherwise before the district court, viewed in the light most favorable to Appellant, we conclude that a reasonable, experienced officer would not have determined there was probable cause to believe that Chamberlain needed urgent medical attention.

The officers outside of his apartment knew that the Life Alert system had been activated accidentally. . . The Life Aid operator informed the police dispatcher that Chamberlain was not in need of medical assistance. And Chamberlain himself firmly and repeatedly informed the officers that he had not called for help and was not in need of assistance of any kind, let alone urgent medical aid. . . . These facts as alleged in the complaint and related documents, and viewed in the light most favorable to Appellant, give rise to the plausible inference that the officers knew that Chamberlain was not in need of urgent medical assistance but chose to enter his home anyway. . . . Again emphasizing that our decision is based only on the facts as we must view them at this stage of the proceedings, we conclude that a reasonable, experienced officer would not be justified in believing that entry into the apartment was necessary. We therefore vacate that portion of the judgment of the district court dismissing the unlawful entry claim. . . . To be sure, qualified immunity should be resolved 'at the earliest possible stage in litigation.'. . But there is an obvious, if rarely expressed, corollary to that principle: The immunity question cannot be resolved before the 'earliest possible stage,'. . . i.e., prior to ascertainment of the truth of the plausible factual allegations on which a finding of qualified immunity is premised. And since qualified immunity is an affirmative defense that is typically asserted in an answer, . . . as a general rule, 'the defense of qualified immunity cannot support the grant of a [Rule] 12(b)(6) motion[.]'. . . Thus, a qualified immunity defense presented on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion 'faces a formidable hurdle ... and is usually not successful.'. . Otherwise, plaintiffs alleging a violation of their constitutional rights would face a heightened pleading standard under which they must plead not only facts sufficient to make out their claim but also additional facts to defeat an assertion of qualified immunity. . . . Put another way, advancing qualified immunity as grounds for a motion to dismiss is almost always a procedural mismatch. . . The defendants do not clear this high bar. The law was clearly established at the time of entry that a warrantless entry into a private dwelling, absent exigent circumstances, is unlawful. . . It was further established that a warrantless entry in response to a medical concern is unlawful absent probable cause to believe that a person inside is in immediate danger. . . The officers were responding to a 911 call at a location that was the source of prior EDP calls. They could hear Chamberlain yelling things that indicated that he was in psychological distress, but they had no information suggesting he was in physical danger. As pleaded, the Life Aid operator informed the dispatcher that Chamberlain's medical alert had been triggered accidentally. Chamberlain repeatedly told the officers that he did not call the police. Both Chamberlain and the Life Alert operator told the officers that Chamberlain was not in need of medical assistance. Further, despite now asserting that Chamberlain needed urgent medical aid, the officers ultimately opened the apartment door bearing no medical equipment but instead with a Taser and guns drawn. It was also clearly established at the moment of entry that an uncorroborated 911 call—like the initial, later withdrawn, call to police by Life Aid—reporting that a mentally ill person was in distress is insufficient support for probable cause to believe there is a medical exigency. . . Here, not only was the emergency call from Chamberlain's apartment uncorroborated by Chamberlain or anyone else with firsthand knowledge of his condition, . . . it was later expressly retracted by the Life Aid operator who initiated the call to police. Viewed in the light most favorable to Appellant, therefore, the facts as alleged are sufficient to overcome the defendants' assertion of a qualified immunity defense, at least until further facts are submitted on a motion for summary judgment or at trial. Police perform dangerous and challenging work for the public benefit, often under perilous circumstances. Qualified immunity reflects the recognition that, in order to ensure public safety, police officers require sufficient protection to enable them to perform their duties without fear of unwarranted private litigation. . . . [I]t may well be that the defendant police officers in this case are ultimately entitled to immunity, indeed, at the 'earliest possible stage in litigation.'. . But today is not that day. . . Here, Appellant has plausibly alleged that the officers' warrantless entry into Chamberlain's home was not justified by exigent circumstances and was, therefore, a violation of his clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment. Since the officers' qualified immunity defense is not clearly established by allegations in the Amended Complaint as augmented by the relevant recordings, . . . the district court erred in applying it in the context of the Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. We therefore vacate the judgment of the district court with respect to the qualified immunity defense asserted by defendants Carelli, Hart, Demchuk, Fottrell, and Martin related to the unlawful entry claims. . . . Our review of Appellant's excessive force claim against Officer Martin is limited to whether the district court correctly concluded on a motion to dismiss, and reaffirmed on a motion for summary judgment, that Officer Martin, the defendant who deployed beanbag shots against Chamberlain, was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to his use of non-lethal force. . . . That said, because we have vacated the district court's grant of defendants' motion to dismiss the claim for unlawful warrantless entry, we also vacate the court's determination that Officer Martin was entitled to qualified immunity for his use of the beanbag shotgun. It is not clear to us whether, and if so, to what extent, the district court's determination that Appellant failed to plead a cause of action for unlawful entry—a decision we now reverse—affected the court's analysis of the legitimacy of the police actions as they entered the apartment. . . We therefore remand the excessive force claim against Officer Martin so the district court may determine in the first instance at the appropriate stage of the proceedings whether Officer Martin is entitled to qualified immunity for his use of the beanbag shotgun in light of the totality of circumstances, including the officers' warrantless entry and the justifications therefor, which must be further developed. The officers' unlawful entry into Chamberlain's apartment, if borne out by proven facts, may affect the balancing of factors bearing on whether the officers' use of force was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances.")

Garcia v. Does, 779 F.3d 84, 93-97 (2d Cir. 2015) ("Plaintiffs were part of a large group that had gathered on a vehicular ramp approaching the Bridge and on the street behind it, locations generally reserved for vehicular traffic, making it impossible for vehicles to proceed. They do not challenge the conclusion that it would be reasonable for a police officer to infer that plaintiffs either intended to block traffic on the Bridge as part of their protest, or at a minimum were aware of a 'substantial and unjustifiable risk' that they were doing so. . . Rather, they contend that reasonable officers in defendants' position would also have been aware, or should have been aware, that plaintiffs had a reasonable belief that they had been authorized to cross the Bridge on the vehicular roadway, based on the fact that police officers who had been blocking their progress subsequently retreated and 'led the march across the bridge,' which they construed as 'an actual and apparent grant of permission to follow.'. . We are not concerned with whether plaintiffs'

asserted belief that the officers' behavior had given them implied permission to violate traffic laws otherwise banning pedestrians from the roadway would constitute a defense to the charge of disorderly conduct; that issue would be presented to a court adjudicating the criminal charges against plaintiffs. Instead, we are faced with the quite separate question of whether any such defense was so clearly established as a matter of law, and whether the facts establishing that defense were so clearly apparent to the officers on the scene as a matter of fact, that any reasonable officer would have appreciated that there was no legal basis for arresting plaintiffs. . .We cannot answer that question in the affirmative. . . .It cannot be said that the officers here disregarded known facts clearly establishing a defense. In the confused and boisterous situation confronting the officers, the police were aware that the demonstrators were blocking the roadway in violation of § 240.20(5). They were also certainly aware that no official had expressly authorized the protesters to cross the Bridge via the roadway. To the contrary, the officers would have known that a police official had attempted to advise the protestors through a bullhorn that they were required to disperse. While reasonable officers might perhaps have recognized that much or most of the crowd would be unable to hear the warning due to the noise created by the chanting protesters, it was also apparent that the front rank of demonstrators who presumably were able to hear exhibited no signs of dispersing. The Complaint and videotapes are devoid of any evidence that any police officer made any gesture or spoke any word that unambiguously authorized the protesters to continue to block traffic, and indeed the Complaint does not allege that any of the plaintiffs observed any such gesture. . . . Most importantly, no plaintiff alleges in the Complaint that he or she heard any statement from any police officer authorizing the protestors to cross the Bridge via the vehicular roadway, or observed any unambiguous indication from any police officer inviting the protesters to cross the Bridge in that manner. Nor is any such statement or gesture recorded in the videotapes submitted by the parties and incorporated into the Complaint by reference. Indeed, most of the plaintiffs allege that they did not see anything the police officers did, and simply 'followed the march' as it proceeded across the Bridge. . . Plaintiffs nevertheless insist that, by ceasing to block the demonstrators' advance and instead turning and walking toward the Brooklyn side of the Bridge, the officers implicitly gave them permission to proceed. That action, however, is inherently ambiguous. It is certainly true that, by removing themselves from the demonstrators' path, police 'allowed' the protesters to advance, in the sense that they stopped physically blocking them. But such an action does not convey, implicitly or explicitly, an invitation to 'go ahead.' The failure of a thin line of police officers to physically impede a large group that—based on the actions of those immediately on the front line—would reasonably be understood to be intent on advancing across the Bridge even absent permission does not suggest that those officers understood that the conduct they had ceased physically blocking was lawful, or had been affirmatively authorized by the police. . .Even conceding that a majority of police officers would not reasonably have understood the retreat as inviting the demonstrators to enter the roadway, plaintiffs suggest that we cannot dismiss the Complaint so long as any officer who participated in the arrests may reasonably have anticipated some protestors to reasonably interpret it as such. The essential flaw in plaintiffs' logic, and in that of the prior panel opinion, is the extent to which it requires police officers to engage in an essentially speculative inquiry into the potential state of mind of (at least some of) the demonstrators. Neither the law of probable cause nor the law of qualified immunity requires such speculation. Whether or not a suspect ultimately turns out to have a defense, or even whether a reasonable officer might have some idea that such a defense could exist, is not the question. . . An officer still has probable cause to arrest, and certainly is entitled to qualified immunity, so long as any such defense rests on facts that are so unclear, or a legal theory that is not so clearly established, that it cannot be said that any reasonable officer would understand that an arrest under the circumstances would be unlawful. . . On the face of the Complaint, the officers were confronted with ambiguities of fact and law. As a matter of fact, the most that is plausibly alleged by the Complaint and the supporting materials is that the police, having already permitted some minor traffic violations along the marchers' route, and after first attempting to block the protesters from obstructing the vehicular roadway, retreated before the demonstrators in a way that some of the demonstrators may have interpreted as affirmatively permitting their advance. Whether or not such an interpretation was reasonable on their part, it cannot be said that the police's behavior was anything more than—at best for plaintiffs—ambiguous, or that a reasonable officer would necessarily have understood that the demonstrators would reasonably interpret the retreat as permission to use the roadway. As a matter of law, Cox establishes that, under some circumstances, demonstrators or others who have been advised by the police that their behavior is lawful may not be punished for that behavior. The extent of that principle is less than clear, and we need not decide here how far it might extend. It is enough to say that no clearly established law would make it 'clear to a reasonable officer,'. . .that it would be unlawful to arrest individuals who were in prima facie violation of a straightforward statutory prohibition because those individuals may have believed, based on inferences drawn from ambiguous behavior by the police, that they were authorized to violate the statute. . . .Finally, plaintiffs argue that the Complaint may not be dismissed on the pleadings on qualified immunity grounds. It is certainly true that motions to dismiss a plaintiff's complaint under Rule 12(b)(6) on the basis of an affirmative defense will generally face a difficult road. . . .But that does not mean that qualified immunity can never be established at the pleading stage. To the contrary, every case must be assessed on the specific facts alleged in the complaint. The Supreme Court has made clear that qualified immunity can be established by the facts alleged in a complaint, see Wood v. Moss, —— U.S. ——, 134 S.Ct. 2056 (2014), and indeed, because qualified immunity protects officials not merely from liability but from litigation, that the issue should be resolved when possible on a motion to dismiss, 'before the commencement of discovery,'. . . to avoid subjecting public officials to time consuming and expensive discovery procedures. In this case, the facts alleged in the Complaint, and those depicted in the videos, do not bear out plaintiffs' legal conclusion that the officers' actions constituted 'an actual and apparent grant of permission' to the demonstrators to utilize the roadway. . . Still less do those facts plausibly describe a situation in which reasonable officers would have clearly understood that their actions were interpreted by the demonstrators as a grant of permission, such that arresting the demonstrators would violate clearly established law. Accordingly, dismissal of the Complaint is required.")

Velez v. Levy, 401 F.3d 75, 101 (2d Cir. 2005) ("We emphasize that this qualified immunity determination is made in view of the procedural posture of this case. Though Levy is not, as a matter of law, entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings, a factual basis for qualified immunity may arise as the proceedings develop. It may be, after discovery, that Velez cannot adduce the facts necessary to show that Levy based his actions 'on irrational and non legitimate considerations and pressures and having no rational [connection] to a legitimate state purpose,' as she alleges in her complaint. But the plaintiff's assertions that they were so based are not merely conclusory, as can be seen from the Board of Education's findings, attached to the complaint, which state that the Chancellor's decision was 'arbitrary and capricious' and 'irrational,' given that the investigation was 'grossly flawed' and 'could not rationally be relied upon.' At this stage of the case, we therefore cannot say that, as to the procedural due process claim, qualified immunity based on the Chancellor's good faith is appropriate.").

McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 436 (2d Cir. 2004) ("[W]e see no reason why even a traditional qualified immunity defense may not be asserted on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion as long as the defense is based on facts appearing on the face of the complaint. . . . Of course, a defendant presenting an immunity defense on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion instead of a motion for summary judgment must accept the more stringent standard applicable to this procedural route. Not only must the facts supporting the defense appear on the face of the complaint, . . . but, as with all Rule 12(b)(6) motions, the motion may be granted only where 'it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim that would entitle him to relief.'. . Thus, the plaintiff is entitled to all reasonable inferences from the facts alleged, not only those that support his claim, but also those that defeat the immunity defense. On the other hand, with a motion for summary judgment adequately supported by affidavits, the party opposing the motion cannot rely on allegations in the complaint, but must counter the movant's affidavits with specific facts showing the existence of genuine issues warranting a trial. . . A party endeavoring to defeat a lawsuit by a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim faces a 'higher burden' than a party proceeding on a motion for summary judgment.").

Butler v. Hesch, No. 1:16-CV-1540, 2018 WL 922187, at *18 (N.D.N.Y. Feb. 15, 2018) ("On a motion to dismiss, however, a qualified immunity defense based on arguable probable cause ' "faces a formidable hurdle ..." and is usually not successful.' Field Day, LLC v. Cnty. of Suffolk, 463 F.3d 167, 191-92 (2d Cir. 2006) (quoting McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 434 (2d Cir. 2004)). This case is no exception. In support of qualified immunity, Defendants merely summarize their version of the facts and assert that their actions were objectively reasonably and not patently incompetent. At the summary judgment stage, they will have the opportunity to try to demonstrate this by submitting evidence showing that reasonably competent officers in their situation could have at least disagreed on whether probable cause existed. Based solely on the complaint, however, the Court cannot conclude that this must have been the case.")

Marlin v. City of New York, No. 15 CI V. 2235 (CM), 2016 WL 4939371, at *1, *6, *16-17 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 7, 2016) ("Because Defendants have also brought a motion for summary judgment dismissing the complaint on the ground of qualified immunity, the Plaintiff has been deposed, in order to fully flesh out his story. To the extent that the deposition testimony elicited Plaintiff's version of the events pleaded in the FAC, it is deemed true for purposes of this pre-answer motion for summary judgment. Stephenson v. John Doe 332 F.3d 68 (2d Cir. 2003); see Individual Practices and Procedures for Judge McMahon, Rule IV.E.3. It seems that a number of questions were put at the deposition seeking to undermine the truth of what Plaintiff asserted. That is all very well and good, but as will be discussed below, it is irrelevant to a qualified immunity motion made at this early stage of proceedings. At this pre-answer stage, a court considering a motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity properly takes the plaintiff's story as true and asks whether a reasonable police officer standing in the shoes of each of the defendants could have thought that his actions, as described by the plaintiff, were constitutionally compliant. This is not the time for asserting that Plaintiff's story is not true, or that things did not happen as Plaintiff described them, or for establishing that the police officers did nothing wrong (which the City has a lamentable habit of confusing with qualified immunity). . . . In deciding the issue of qualified immunity, 'the defendants' version of the facts is absolutely irrelevant.' . . Accordingly, this Court does not take testimony from defendants or otherwise consider their version of events. . . Pursuant to this Court's Individual Rules, when any defendant raises a qualified immunity defense, I insist that the plaintiff amplify the 'short, plain statement' in the complaint with testimony that fully fleshes out his story. For purposes of this aspect of the motion (which is really a motion for summary judgment), the Court relies on evidence in the FAC as amplified by Plaintiff's deposition testimony. Time and time again, this Court finds that municipal defendants conflate qualified immunity with arguments relating to the merits of a claim. In many cases, defendants file a notice of motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity and proceed to make arguments for dismissal of Plaintiff's claims that have nothing to do with qualified immunity. For instance, defendants may argue that the plaintiff fails to plead facts sufficient to make out a constitutional violation, or that things did not happen in quite the way the Plaintiff says they did. The instant motion raising the qualified immunity defense is no exception. Thus, the Court finds it necessary to remind Defendants that an official is often entitled to dismissal or summary judgment 'not because of qualified immunity, but because he did nothing wrong.'. . And indeed, as we shall see, only one of plaintiff's many claims is dismissible on the ground of qualified immunity. . . .In the excessive force context, the analysis required to determine whether an officer deserves qualified immunity converges with the analysis used to determine whether force was excessive under the Fourth Amendment: both inquiries hinge on a determination of objective reasonableness. . . Both analyses require asking: 'Whether in the particular circumstances faced by the officer, a reasonable officer would believe that the force was lawful.'. .In cases involving the 'sometimes hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,' it may be appropriate to afford the defendants an 'extra layer of protection.'. . This is not one of those 'hazy' cases. No reasonable officer could possibly believe that he needed to use so much force to subdue a non-resisting arrestee as to dislocate and fracture his elbow, causing long-lasting damage. Taking Plaintiff's account of events as true, Defendants' pre-answer motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity is denied.") Higginbotham v. City of New York, 105 F.Supp.3d 369, 375 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("On a motion to dismiss. . . a qualified immunity defense based on arguable probable cause ' "faces a formidable hurdle ..." and is usually not successful.' Field Day, LLC v. Cnty. of Suffolk, 463 F.3d 167, 191–

92 (2d Cir.2006) (quoting McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 434 (2d Cir.2004)). This case is no exception. In support of qualified immunity, the defendants merely summarize their version of the facts and assert that 'the officers were objectively reasonable and patently not incompetent.'. . At the summary judgment stage, they will have the opportunity to try to demonstrate this by submitting evidence showing that reasonably competent officers in their situation could have at least disagreed on whether probable cause existed. Based solely on the complaint, however, the Court cannot conclude that this must have been the case. Because the complaint plausibly alleges that there was no probable cause to arrest Higginbotham for a violation of any of the four statutes suggested by the defendants, and because the defendants are not at this stage entitled to qualified immunity, Higginbotham has adequately stated a section 1983 false arrest claim.")

But see Higginbotham v. Sylvester, No. 14-CV-8549 (PKC), 2016 WL 6496253, at *3–5 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 2, 2016) ("All fact discovery has been completed and the determination of whether probable cause existed is ripe for determination. . . The summary judgment record includes the size of Higginbotham and his camera, the dimensions of the phone booth, and a visual depiction of the crowd surrounding the phone booth. The Court concludes that probable cause existed to arrest Higginbotham pursuant to New York Penal Law §§ 120.20. . . The undisputed facts surrounding Higginbotham's ascent of the phone booth demonstrate that a person of reasonable caution would infer that Higginbotham acted recklessly in creating a substantial risk of serious physical injury to another person. It can reasonably be inferred that Higginbotham was aware of the risk of climbing atop the phone booth based on the fact that he was only able to do so by first climbing on top of police barricades. . . Higginbotham was also aware of the large crowd that was tightly packed around the phone booth in question when he climbed to the top of it. . . Indeed, the video recording and pictures of Higginbotham atop the phone booth show that protestors and other camerapersons stood directly below Higginbotham while he filmed from above. . . Nevertheless, Higginbotham climbed more than seven feet above the tightly-packed crowd and filmed the protest, all while balancing a 30-pound camera on his shoulder. . . And because Higginbotham had climbed atop of the phone booth once before, he knew that the roof was not flat, but curved. . . Based on Higginbotham's position above the crowd atop a phone booth with a curved roof, probable cause existed for a reasonable person to believe that Higginbotham consciously disregarded the risk of losing his balance and falling or dropping his camera from more than seven feet in the air. . . .Because the Court concludes that there was probable cause for Higginbotham's arrest, 'a fortiori, [defendants] would be entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.'. . However, even if probable cause was lacking, defendants would nevertheless be entitled to qualified immunity. Officers are entitled to qualified immunity for false arrest claims if they can establish that they had '"arguable probable cause" to arrest the plaintiff.'. . Here, the evidence is sufficient to support a finding of arguable probable cause to arrest Higginbotham pursuant to New York Penal Law § 120.20. That is to say, it was objectively reasonable for the arresting officers to believe that probable cause existed, or at the very least, for officers of reasonable competence to disagree on whether probable cause existed.")

Bonilla v. City of York, No. 1:14-CV-2238, 2015 WL 1525483, at *7 (M.D. Pa. Apr. 2, 2015) ("The present case is one of the 'vast majority of cases' in which a determination of qualified immunity is inappropriate at the pleading stage. When viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the complaint alleges a plausible violation of Bonilla's Fourth Amendment rights through the use of excessive force. As this court has previously stated, 'the protections of the Fourth Amendment are sufficiently clear that [the officers] should have known that shooting [the decedent] to death violated those protections.' Williams, 30 F.Supp.3d at 314. The question therefore becomes, once again, whether the officer responsible for firing the fatal shot was objectively reasonable in doing so. Because there are unresolved issues of historical fact material to the reasonableness of Officer Roosen's and Officer Jordan's actions, including if and when they knew Bonilla was unarmed or had surrendered, it is premature at the motion to dismiss stage for the court to determine that either Officer Roosen or Officer Jordan is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.)

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Thorpe v. Clarke, 37 F.4th 926, 930-31 (4th Cir. 2022) ("Even if they committed the violations, Defendants posit, case law that existed in 2012, when their latest solitary-confinement program went into effect, simply did not put them on notice that either the conditions themselves or the procedures used to decide who belongs in them violated the Constitution. The problem for Defendants, however, is that they invoke qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss, before any of the evidence is in. And on the facts Plaintiffs have pleaded, Defendants cannot succeed: On the Eighth Amendment charge, Plaintiffs have adequately alleged—even by Defendants' own measure—that Defendants knew the harms long-term solitary confinement causes and disregarded them. But qualified immunity does not protect knowing violations of the law. . . As to the Fourteenth, Plaintiffs suggest Defendants violated even the most foundational due process guarantees: notice and an opportunity to respond. Defendants cannot meaningfully argue they did not know due process requires at least that much. . . Defendants' contentions boil down to disagreements over the facts: what they knew and when, and what procedures they offered in practice. But at this stage, we take Plaintiffs' allegations as true and affirm the district court's denial of the motion to dismiss.")

Graves v. Lioi, 930 F.3d 307, 317-18 (4th Cir. 2019) ("It cannot be put more plainly: we previously considered whether Robinson's allegations stated a claim against Lioi because we were considering only the district court's decision to deny a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). Now, we are reviewing whether Robinson's evidence supports a claim against Lioi and Russell because we are considering the district court's decision to grant a motion for summary judgment under Rule 56(a). . . . Ulike the first time this case came before us, we are no longer obliged to accept Robinson's allegations as true. While Robinson is still entitled to have the record viewed in the light most favorable to her, we can no longer simply accept her characterizations of what occurred. Now that the parties have completed discovery, we have a 'fully-developed record' to apply 'to those allegations upon a motion for summary judgment,'. . . and Robinson must present more than a 'scintilla' of evidence to support her allegations[.] . . There is also nothing remarkable in concluding that some plaintiffs whose claims survive a motion to dismiss are unable to meet their burden to survive summary judgment. . . .Discovery produced substantially different facts than Robinson alleged in her Complaint which requires us to alter our understanding of the factual underpinnings of Robinson's claim for purposes of summary judgment. Based on this divergence, the law-of-the-case doctrine does not constrain our review of how the governing legal principles apply to Robinson's claim. At bottom, the evidence that Robinson marshaled during discovery demonstrates that Russell and Lioi's conduct cannot support a state-created danger substantive due process claim and that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Cloaninger ex rel. Estate of Cloaninger v. McDevitt, 555 F.3d 324, 331 (4th Cir. 2009) ("The procedural framework for evaluating a claim of qualified immunityis therefore clear: when the defendant in a § 1983 action raises a qualified immunity defense, the court ordinarily assesses whether the plaintiff's complaint states sufficient factual allegations that, if true, show a violation of clearly established constitutional rights. To do so, the plaintiff's complaint must allege conduct a reasonable officer would know to be unlawful. However, when there has been discovery and the defendants challenge through a motion for summary judgment the sufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence to support the allegations of his complaint, including his description of their conduct, an evaluation of the complaint's sufficiency is unnecessary and may unduly prolong the defendants' entanglement in litigation if the court can determine that the plaintiff's evidence does not support his allegations. In that circumstance, the familiar standard for summary judgment under Rule 56 applies.").

Doe v. Montgomery County Board of Education, No. CV 21-0356 PJM, 2021 WL 6072813, at *16 (D. Md. Dec. 23, 2021) ("While this is yet another close call, the Court concludes that neither Defendant Crouse nor Defendant Sullivan is entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation. The determination of whether it was objectively reasonable to conclude that as school officials, knowing what they knew, and failing to do what they were specifically supposed to do, they were not required to provide protection against sexual assault by one or more students against the students on school property requires a closer examination of the knowledge Defendants Crouse and Sullivan actually possessed in 2017 and 2018. . . The question of whether Defendants Crouse and Sullivan are entitled to qualified immunity, therefore, is not ripe for decision at this stage of the proceedings. The Court believes it would more properly be addressed on summary judgment.")

Quigley v. City of Huntington, W. Virginia, No. 3:17-CV-01906, 2017 WL 4998647, at *6 (S.D.W. Va. Nov. 2, 2017) ("The United States Supreme Court has made clear that a ruling on qualified immunity should be made early in the proceedings. . . Qualified immunity acts 'as an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.'. . Therefore, the entitlement to the immunity is 'effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.'. .But where qualified immunity is presented in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, 'the defense faces a formidable hurdle and is usually not successful.'. . Only if the plaintiff fails to state a plausible claim on its face, may a Court dismiss a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). . . But the Court will not dismiss a complaint where the plaintiff supplies sufficient detail regarding the claim to demonstrate a 'more-than-conceivable chance of success on the merits.'. . Applying that standard to this case, it must be apparent on the face of the complaint that the officer is entitled to qualified immunity. But, from the facts alleged, Plaintiff could plausibly demonstrate the officer violated a clearly established right, and thus is not entitled to the protective cloaking of qualified immunity, at this stage. This does not mean, however, that Plaintiff's objection is correct. Plaintiff's contention that qualified immunity should be denied as a matter of law fails to persuade this Court. Consistent with the applicable standard for a motion to dismiss, this Court has assumed the factual allegations in Plaintiff's complaint are true. To rule, as Plaintiff wants, that, based upon that assumption of truth, the officer is stripped of his qualified immunity protection would be a fool's errand. That simply would not comport with the sound reasoning and judgment that is required of this Court.").

Ristow v. Hansen, No. 17-50121, 2018 WL 671150, ___ n.12 (5th Cir. Feb. 1, 2018) (not reported) ("Ristow insists that the officers should not be allowed to raise a qualified immunity defense in their motion to dismiss, but instead must wait to raise that defense until they file their answer. We have previously urged that '[q]ualified immunity questions should be resolved "at the earliest possible stage in litigation."'. . According to this principle, the district court was correct in addressing the officers' claims to qualified immunity at this stage in the litigation. See, e.g., Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 683 (5th Cir. 2017) (addressing qualified immunity defense raised in a motion to dismiss).")

Castillo v. City of Weslaco, 369 F.3d 504, 506, 507 (5th Cir. 2004) ("The Supreme Court has recognized that the second step of the Harlow test is different at the summary judgment stage than it is when the defendant asserts qualified immunity after the initial pleadings. [citing Behrens] 'At the earlier stage, it is the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized....' . . . On summary judgment, 'the plaintiff can no longer rest on the pleadings' and the court must look 'to the evidence before it (in the light most favorable to the plaintiff) in conducting the Harlow inquiry.' . . . Consequently, the court must highlight evidence that, if interpreted in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, identifies conduct by the defendant that violated clearly established law. . . By outlining this factual scenario the court does not make a determination that the alleged conduct occurred. Rather, it concludes that there is evidence in the record that, when interpreted in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, establishes conduct by the defendant that violated clearly established law. . . Ordinarily the district court in denying the summary judgment motion will outline 'the factual scenario it believes emerges from viewing the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable' to the plaintiff. . . It will also highlight the evidence in the record supporting its conclusions, and it will determine whether the defendant's conduct, as outlined in the factual scenario, was 'objectively reasonable' in light of the relevant clearly established law. . . In cases where the district court failed to outline the relevant factual scenario and the evidence in the record establishing the relevant conduct, the Supreme Court has authorized 'the court of appeals [to] undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.'. . We, however, have determined that there is another option in these situations. In certain cases, rather than combing through the record ourselves and concluding what factual scenario the district court likely assumed in applying the Harlow test, we will remand to the district court so that it can outline the factual scenario it assumed in making its decision. . . Although we are not required to make such a remand, in some cases it may provide a 'more efficient alternative.' . . In this case, the district court did not outline the factual scenario it assumed in construing the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable to the Officers. In fact, it appears that it rested its ruling solely on the allegations made by the Officers in their Third Amended Complaint. This would be improper in light of the Supreme Court's instructions in Behrens. Considering it is not clear that the district court assumed a factual scenario supported by summary judgment evidence in applying the Harlow test, and if it did, what that factual scenario is, the more 'efficient alternative' in this case is to remand to the district court for it to outline the factual scenario it assumed in making its decision."), on remand to Castillo v. City of Weslaco, 2004 WL 2402439 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 10, 2004), vacated and remanded, 388 F.3d 464 (5th Cir. 2004).

Alfred v. Collins, No. Civ.A. H-03-2904, 2006 WL 492355, at *9 n.6 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 28, 2006) ("There is an implicit divergence of authority in this Circuit about the procedure for assessing the first prong of a qualified immunity defense in response to a summary judgment motion. Many appellate panels state that the issue is whether the plaintiff has 'alleged' facts establishing a constitutional violation, thus suggesting that the district court should not consider uncontroverted evidence presented by a defendant in the summary judgment motion. The Linbrugger case is the only case the Court can locate in which the issue is addressed. It is possible that the terminology focusing on what the plaintiff 'alleges' stems from the early practice that qualified immunity would be addressed on motions to dismiss. 'Qualified immunity is "an entitlement not to stand trial or face the other burdens of litigation."' . . Courts are to make the qualified immunity analysis 'early in the proceedings so that the costs and expenses of trial are avoided where the defense is dispositive.'. . Nevertheless, as a practical matter, defendants often, in an effort to develop the facts in the hopes of obtaining favorable rulings on the second qualified immunity prong, willingly engage in discovery and then seek qualified immunity rulings through summary judgment motions.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Myers v. City of Centerville, Ohio, 41 F.4th 746, 756-59 (6th Cir. 2022) ("[I]n punting a decision on qualified immunity, the district court effectively denied it—as it unlocked discovery without answering the 'threshold immunity question.'. . We therefore have jurisdiction to review that order. Myers says that's wrong, but for a different reason. Citing Johnson v. Jones, . . . he argues we lack jurisdiction because the district court, in his view, found 'that the factual record [wa]s insufficient for a determination at this stage of the proceedings.' True, Johnson held that a denial of a summary-judgment motion raising qualified immunity is not immediately appealable if it 'determines only a question of "evidence sufficiency," i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.'. . But Johnson does not logically extend to the pleadings stage, a stage at which the court must assume all well-pleaded facts as true. . . Because all facts are assumed as true, it follows that 'there cannot be any disputed questions of fact' when deciding a motion for judgment on the pleadings. . . Johnson's bar is thus not triggered, . . . and that's so despite the district court's expressed reasons for denying the motion—because 'our review solely involves applying principles of law to a given and assumed set of facts[.]' Our authority to review the defendants' qualified-immunity defense is therefore clear. And that review extends to the merits-based, legal question of whether Myers engaged in constitutionally protected speech (the only element the defendants challenge now) and thereby plausibly alleged a First Amendment retaliation claim. . . . Though we cannot know for sure, it's a fair guess that the district court relied on Wesley's assertion (adopted by Buddenberg) 'that "it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity."'. . The court erred by doing so. We held, long before Buddenberg and Wesley, that district courts have 'a duty to address' qualified immunity when it is 'properly raised prior to discovery.'. . After all, qualified immunity shields government defendants not merely from liability, but also from litigation and discovery, because '[i]nquiries of this kind can be peculiarly disruptive of effective government.'. . Buddenberg and Wesley could not have disturbed that long-settled precept, . . . so they could not (and do not) give license to deny qualified immunity, without a reasoned opinion, whenever the defense is raised in a Rule 12 motion. However, as we recently explained in Crawford, Wesley does have a point: analyzing the second prong of qualified immunity—whether the alleged constitutional violation is clearly established—'is sometimes difficult' on the pleadings, since that 'inquiry may turn on case-specific details that must be fleshed out in discovery.'. . Still, that 'is only a "general preference," not an absolute one.'. . In some cases, the clearly established prong may be determined on the pleadings. Indeed, Buddenberg itself determined, on appeal from the denial of a motion to dismiss raising qualified immunity, that the plaintiff's 'right to report public corruption, unethical conduct, and sex-based discrimination within her workplace was clearly established.'. . More importantly, Crawford made crystal clear that that general preference does not at all cover qualified immunity's first prong—whether the complaint plausibly alleged a constitutional violation. . . Put differently, if the complaint fails to allege facts plausibly showing the violation of a constitutional right (regardless of whether that right was clearly established), granting qualified immunity is appropriate on the pleadings. . . The assertion of qualified immunity, by itself, does not change that. So, in this case, as in every other case in which a defendant timely raises qualified immunity, the district court was required to determine whether Myers plausibly alleged a constitutional violation and, if so, whether that right was clearly established. . . But we need not vacate the district court's order and remand because, based on our de novo review of the pleadings, we answer both of those questions in the affirmative.")

Bell v. City of Southfield, Michigan, 37 F.4th 362, 363-64 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Before we get to the facts, we must address a threshold legal question. For an appeal from a motion to dismiss, we ordinarily stay within the four corners of the complaint to determine whether the plaintiff has stated a plausible claim for relief. . . So can we consider the police officers' dash-cam video footage here? Yes. In qualified-immunity cases, we've previously considered videos at the motion-to-dismiss stage. . . And for good reason. Qualified immunity isn't just a defense to liability—it's immunity from the costs and burdens of suit in the first place. . . If officers are entitled to qualified immunity and don't receive it at the earliest possible stage, then they lose its protections for as long as they continue to litigate. . . So when uncontroverted video evidence easily resolves a case, we honor qualified immunity's principles by considering the videos. Plus, the videos here are already in the record. Indeed, the plaintiff's complaint implicitly relies on the videos by recounting facts that could only be known to him by watching the videos. Thus, it makes little sense to waste time and effort by ignoring the videos' contents. . . That said, our use of the videos is limited at this stage. If there is a factual dispute between the parties, we can only rely on the videos over the complaint to the degree the videos are clear and 'blatantly contradict[ ]' or 'utterly discredit[ ]' the plaintiff's version of events. . . Otherwise, we must accept the plaintiff's version as true. . . This all makes sense—if the indisputable video evidence contradicts Bell's pleadings, his allegations are implausible.")

Kenjoh Outdoor, LLC v. Marchbanks, 23 F.4th 686, 695 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Kenjoh argues that it is generally inappropriate to grant qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage. Kenjoh is correct that some of our caselaw has suggested a presumption against granting qualified immunity on a motion to dismiss. But we recently clarified the scope of this 'presumption' in Crawford. . . As we said, any presumption only has bite when the 'clearly established' inquiry turns on 'case-specific details that must be fleshed out in discovery.'. . But if the complaint is 'distinguishable from our past cases on its face,' it will not survive a motion to dismiss. . . Kenjoh's complaint need not proceed to discovery. After all, it is easily distinguishable from our past caselaw. That is because it asks us to apply the prior restraint doctrine to commercial speech, which we haven't done. All in all, we will do here what the Supreme Court did in al-Kidd. We will 'affirm[ ] the application of qualified immunity' because it is 'apparent from the complaint that the law was not clearly established because "not a single judicial opinion" ha[s] held the official's action unconstitutional.'")

Crawford v. Tilley, 15 F.4th 752, 763-66 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Admittedly, we sometimes state that 'it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.'. . And the district court here cited this proposition four times. But that general statement is at best imprecise. To be fair, most statements of this proposition are careful to explain that its application rests on qualified immunity's clearly established prong. . . And that's correct but the specificity of our opinions varies. So we clarify below. It is true that courts, including ours, have suggested a basic incongruity between pleading requirements under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8, which require only that a plaintiff state a claim, and affirmative defenses, like qualified immunity. . . The idea is that a plaintiff is generally not required to negate an affirmative defense in a complaint. . . But as we have noted, the validity of such defenses may be apparent from the face of the complaint, rendering a motion to dismiss appropriate. . . This is, after all, how we normally adjudicate other affirmative defenses on motions to dismiss. . . The larger point though is that this possible incongruity does not justify a special rule or presumption against granting motions to dismiss that applies specifically for qualified immunity. . . Indeed, the Supreme Court has consistently stated that one of the goals of qualified immunity is not only to help defendants avoid unnecessary trials but also to allow defendants to avoid pre-trial discovery where the lawsuit is 'insubstantial.'. . And for avoiding pretrial discovery, 'a motion to dismiss is conclusive as to this right.'. . Moreover, in Harlow, the Court reformulated the qualified immunity test by eliminating the subjective-good-faith requirement precisely because that requirement was permitting some qualified immunity cases to advance further than they should. . . Finally, if there is a procedural incongruity here, the Supreme Court has not recognized it. Or, at least, the Court has not hesitated to affirm the dismissal of a lawsuit on qualified immunity grounds without mentioning any presumption against doing so. . . Now, what about applying the two-part inquiry itself: does either prong support a general preference to not grant motions to dismiss on qualified immunity? Here, it seems apparent, and consistent with our cases, that no such preference applies to the violation-of-a-constitutional-right prong. After all, asking whether there was a violation of a constitutional right resembles the Rule 12(b)(6) question—has the plaintiff pleaded facts that state a claim for relief in the complaint? More importantly, in Iqbal itself, which, along with Twombly, . . . are the leading cases on Rule 12(b)(6), the Supreme Court affirmed the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint on qualified immunity because it failed to establish a plausible claim. . . And, as noted above, nowhere did the Supreme Court suggest that it was inappropriate to dismiss a complaint on qualified immunity or that there should be a presumption against it. If there were a presumption or preference against dismissing the case, we would expect the Court to at least acknowledge it. Common sense also proves the point. Imagine a conditions-of-confinement case identical to the one we face here. But—unlike Erwin—imagine that the hypothetical state defendant moved to dismiss under 12(b)(6) without raising qualified immunity. We would apply Iqbal to that motion. So it would be nonsensical, and even ironic, to enforce a presumption against dismissing the same complaint simply because the defendant has raised qualified immunity as an affirmative defense. In other words, § 1983 complaints are subject to the same federal rules as any other complaint. 'No heightened pleading requirement applies to our review of a motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity.'. . This reluctance to dismiss cases on qualified immunity might have more vitality in the clearly established context, which Iqbal did not cover. But even there, the inquiry is nuanced. Dismissing for qualified immunity on this ground is sometimes difficult because the clearly established inquiry may turn on case-specific details that must be fleshed out in discovery. . . This is a natural development because the application of qualified immunity today can turn on minute factual distinctions. . . At the same time, we are cognizant of the Supreme Court's admonition that we not let a plaintiff allege rights at such a high level of abstraction that his claim always survives. . . . So a complaint distinguishable from our past cases on its face will not often survive a motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds. This is especially true where granting relief to the plaintiff can only be done by recognizing a novel constitutional right. . . . Dawn's complaint, all told, must clear three hurdles. First, she must allege that someone Erwin oversees violated Marc's constitutional rights. Second, she must allege 'active unconstitutional behavior' by Erwin. And third, she must allege that the 'active unconstitutional behavior' was both a cause in fact and a proximate cause of the violation of Marc's rights. Dawn has not carried this burden here. Her amended complaint fails both to allege any 'active unconstitutional behavior' by Erwin and to explain how this behavior proximately caused Marc's injuries. Thus, Erwin is entitled to qualified immunity on the constitutional violation prong.")

Koch v. Ohio, No. 20-3334, 2021 WL 2221644, at *5 (6th Cir. June 2, 2021) (not reported) ("Koch is correct that the fact-intensive nature of a qualified immunity defense often makes 12(b)(6) dismissal on qualified immunity grounds inappropriate, Wesley v. Campbell, 779 F.3d 421, 433 (6th Cir. 2015), but we have upheld such dismissals when the 'complaint establishes the defense.' Siefert v. Hamilton County, 951 F.3d 753, 762 (6th Cir. 2020). This is such a case. Even if Koch's allegations are true and we assume they state a retaliation claim, Koch cites no case that would have put Meyer on notice that failing to open an inspector general investigation into Koch's complaints would violate the Constitution, and we are aware of no such case.")

Moderwell v. Cuyahoga County, Ohio, 997 F.3d 653, 660-61, 663, 665 (6th Cir. 2021) ("[W]hen 'no reasonable correctional officer could have concluded' that the challenged action was constitutional, the Supreme Court has held that there does not need to be a case directly on point. [citing Taylor v. Riojas] . . . Although a defendant's 'entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point, that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.'. . 'The reasoning for our general preference is straightforward: "Absent any factual development beyond the allegations in a complaint, a court cannot fairly tell whether a case is 'obvious' or 'squarely governed' by precedent, which prevents us from determining whether the facts of this case parallel a prior decision or not" for purposes of determining whether a right is clearly established.'. . Therefore, 'it is generally inappropriate for a ... court to grant a [12(c) motion for judgment on the pleadings] on the basis of qualified immunity.'. . . This Court's usual practice of waiting until summary judgment to resolve qualified immunity issues has particular import in this case for another reason. In addition to shielding government officials from liability for civil damages, qualified immunity is also 'a limited "entitlement not to stand trial or face the other burdens of litigation."'. . The desire to shield government officials from 'broad discovery,'. . . is the basis for such a defendant's entitlement to have qualified immunity 'resolved at the earliest possible point[.]'. . But this 'concern [is] irrelevant here.'. . Because Plaintiff's deliberate indifference claims against the Corrections Defendants rely on the same factual predicate as the excessive force claims, denying qualified immunity at this stage will not impose any additional discovery burdens. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's decision to allow Plaintiff's excessive force claims against the Corrections Defendants to proceed to discovery. . . . [T]he Executive Defendants argue that, assuming the sufficiency of Plaintiff's allegations, they did not violate any clearly established law. However, 'ample case law teaches that deliberate indifference toward a detainee's suicidal tendencies is a violation of Constitutional rights.'. . 'At the time of this incident, ... [Johnson] had a clearly established right not to be deprived of food.'. . He also had a clearly established right to not be housed in an overcrowded facility. . . Whether this, or other, precedent clearly established a right that was violated by the Executive Defendants requires factual development regarding the exact circumstances faced by the Executive Defendants, what actions they took, what they knew when taking the alleged unconstitutional actions, and with what intent they acted. . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's decision to deny judgment on the pleadings on Plaintiff's deliberate indifference claims against the Executive Defendants.")

Hart v. Hillsdale County, Michigan, 973 F.3d 627, 642 (6th Cir. 2020) ("If the officers had reason to question the database's reliability or if a reasonably well-trained officer would have caught its error immediately, then it was clearly established that the officers could not rely exclusively on that database to establish probable cause. To the extent the officers argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they were 'simply following orders,' we rejected that argument in Bunkley v. City of Detroit, 902 F.3d 552, 562 (6th Cir. 2018). There, as here, the officers who claimed to be following orders made mistakes of their own. . . The City and County Defendants here similarly failed to perform any investigation or ask any questions that could have confirmed whether Hart was required to register even though, drawing all inferences in Hart's favor, Defendants were statutorily mandated to ask those questions, were on notice of the risk of error, and were aware of the materially different requirements for homeless offenders. . . The Supreme Court has instructed that, in performing Fourth Amendment qualified immunity analysis, we must confine ourselves to 'the situation [the officer] confronted,' carefully considering the 'particular factual context[ ]' at issue. . . That is hard to accomplish at the motion to dismiss stage. 'Absent any factual development beyond the allegations in a complaint, a court cannot fairly tell whether a case is "obvious" or "squarely governed" by precedent, which prevents us from determining whether the facts of this case parallel a prior decision or not.'. . On the false arrest claims, Hart has plausibly alleged a violation of his clearly established constitutional rights. Remand for factual development is necessary.")

Hart v. Hillsdale County, Michigan, 973 F.3d 627, 646-47, 652-53 (6th Cir. 2020) (Readler, J., dissenting) ("According to the complaint, the Michigan State Police, in conjunction with a retained private data firm, made a grave mistake. Michigan law put the State Police singularly in charge of the State's Sex Offender Registration database, with inferior law enforcement officials to rely upon the information stored therein. . . Unfortunately, the State Police failed to update their database to account for a change in Michigan law that removed Anthony Hart's registration requirements. As a result of that oversight, Hart was erroneously listed in the database as being subject to reporting requirements, erroneously instructed by the State Police to register with local officials, and thus erroneously detained by local officers in Hillsdale for failing to honor his registration commitments. . . Similarly fooled by the State Police's error were the prosecutor, the state court, and even Hart's attorney. Regrettably, Hart served 19 months in prison before the error was spotted by prison officials. The gravity of this error is clear. But so too should be the conclusion that the local Hillsdale officers (perhaps unlike the State Police) are entitled to qualified immunity. Our cases absolve officers of liability where they rely upon information transmitted from other officers (in this case, superior officers). And the majority opinion does not cite any clearly established law holding, 'beyond debate,' that the local officers should have second guessed their superiors in the State Police at the time of Hart's arrests. . . . One might fairly expect a live dispute over whether the State Police violated any constitutional right owed to Hart. After all, its error, in conjunction with that of its private vendor, allegedly caused Hart to continue to register with local officials, registrations he admits he failed to honor. . . .The legal question posed here—whether officers act recklessly by failing independently to verify information in an authoritative police database—may also be resolved on the pleadings. Accepting as true Hart's factual allegations, the local officers acted reasonably in relying on the state database, and the lack of clearly established law to the contrary supports granting qualified immunity on Hart's claims. . . .At worst, the officers here were negligent in not independently investigating Hart's legal status. But the majority opinion identifies no state or federal rule that required them to do so. . . Nor, at all events, did the officers violate any purportedly clearly established constitutional right. Hart must fairly allege a constitutional right defined by then-existing precedent that is 'clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply,'. . . thus putting the question 'beyond debate.'. . The majority opinion's first salvo is to say this case is not suitable for resolution at the motion to dismiss stage. To be sure, at this stage we must assume Hart's allegations as true. But even then, Hart is not absolved of his duty to plead facts that, when assumed as true, would be sufficient to state a claim for which relief may be granted. True, Wesby was decided past the Rule 12(b) stage (and in the officers' favor, it should be noted, on the issue of qualified immunity). . . But that does not mean cases can never be resolved then, especially one (like Hart's) that turns on a straight-forward legal question. Perhaps, as the majority opinion next contends, 'there does not have to be a case directly on point' to overcome qualified immunity. If so, Hart typically must still identify a 'body of relevant case law' squarely aligned with his Fourth Amendment-inspired legal theory. . . The majority opinion says that body of law is exemplified by Bunkley v. City of Detroit, 902 F.3d 552 (6th Cir. 2018). But Bunkley turned on instances of repeated, intentional misconduct, something the majority opinion acknowledges Hart has not sufficiently alleged.")

Marvaso v. Sanchez, 971 F.3d 599, 610 (6th Cir. 2020) ("'[A]n officer cannot rely on a judicial determination of probable cause if that officer knowingly makes false statements and omissions to the judge such that but for these falsities the judge would not have issued the warrant.'. . That is precisely the situation that Plaintiffs allege here. And yet, in his motion to dismiss, Sanchez simply asserted that he relied on the warrant in good faith and did not make any materially false statements or omissions. But that argument has nothing to do with the sufficiency of Plaintiffs' complaint or adequacy of their allegations regarding Sanchez's bad faith. Instead, to the extent that Sanchez seeks to argue that Plaintiffs cannot demonstrate a genuine factual dispute on this issue, he can make that argument in a motion for summary judgment once discovery has occurred. . . In short, Sanchez's motion to dismiss did not challenge the sufficiency of Plaintiffs' allegations, and if construed as a motion for summary judgment, it was premature. Sanchez is not entitled to qualified immunity at this time.")

Marvaso v. Sanchez, 971 F.3d 599, 611-14 (6th Cir. 2020) (Nalbandian, J., dissenting) ("Even taking Plaintiffs' factual allegations as true, Sanchez, Adams, and Reddy, Jr. are entitled to qualified immunity. Plaintiffs also fail to adequately plead their § 1983 conspiracy claim. Thus, I dissent. . . . Even after removing the assertions Plaintiffs claim Sanchez falsified, and adding the facts he allegedly omitted, the affidavit still supports a finding of probable cause. . . . [B]ecause there was probable cause for the search warrant even without Sanchez's alleged falsities and omissions, it cannot be said that 'but for these falsities the judge would not have issued the warrant.'. . There is thus no constitutional violation. And with no constitutional violation, Sanchez is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The majority says this presents fact-intensive questions and requires factual development beyond what's in the complaint, and that we should thus wait until summary judgment to decide these claims. . . But this isn't a factual question. We accept the facts in Plaintiffs' complaint as true and look only to whether those facts amounted to a clearly established constitutional violation when they occurred. . . And that's a question of law, which is why we can review it on an interlocutory appeal. . . No discovery or further factual development can cure Plaintiffs' failure to plead 'the violation of a right so clearly established that a reasonable official would necessarily have recognized' it. . . So Adams and Reddy, Jr. are entitled to qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage of this case.")

In re Flint Water Cases, 960 F.3d 303, 321-25, 330, 332 (6th Cir. 2020) ("This case is a consolidated class action in the In re Flint Water Cases litigation. . . The only claim before us on appeal is Plaintiffs-Appellants' 42 U.S.C. § 1983 substantive due process claim for deprivation of bodily integrity. The Putative Class includes Flint residents and businesses, but only Flint residents are parties to this appeal. The Defendants include City and State officials, the City of Flint, and private engineering firms, but only the government defendants are parties to this appeal. . . . Under the collateral order doctrine, we have jurisdiction over the City and State officials' interlocutory appeals of the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the extent they raise legal questions. . . The collateral order doctrine also provides us with jurisdiction over the City of Flint's and Governor Whitmer's interlocutory appeals from the district court's denial of Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity. . . Some (but not all) Defendants-Appellants were parties to the Guertin appeal and were denied qualified immunity in that case. . . . The Defendant-Appellant City and State officials argue that qualified immunity shields them from suit. We review de novo a district court's decision to deny qualified immunity. . . . In Guertin, we held that City and State officials' role in creating, sustaining, and covering up the Flint Water Crisis violated Flint residents' right to bodily integrity, Guertin, . . . and that this right was clearly established at the time[.]. . . Critically, this case comes to us at the motion to dismiss stage. The allegations in the Complaint must be taken as true. . . Some judges of this court have even noted that, because the facts at this stage are yet undeveloped, 'it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity. Although an officer's entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point, that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.'. . With these principles in mind, Plaintiffs-Appellees have plausibly alleged that Defendants-Appellants violated their right to bodily integrity. . . . All of the Defendant-Appellant City Officials argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they acted based on professional opinions from MDEQ officials and private engineering firms. . . . At this stage, we must credit Plaintiffs' allegation that the Defendant-Appellant City Officials had independent knowledge that the Flint River water was causing a public health crisis—regardless of what the MDEQ or the engineering firms reported. . . . The Defendant-Appellant State Officials sued in their individual capacities are Governor Snyder and Treasurer Dillon. We have not had the opportunity previously to address their conduct. We hold that Plaintiffs-Appellees plausibly allege a constitutional violation as to Snyder, but we refrain from deciding this question for Dillon until the district court has an opportunity to reconsider in light of Brown v. Snyder (In re Flint Water Cases), No. 18-cv-10726, 2020 WL 1503256, at *9 (E.D. Mich. Mar. 27, 2020). . . .Snyder's alleged role in creating, failing to mitigate, and covering up the crisis plausibly demonstrates deliberate indifference.")

Siefert v. Hamilton County, 951 F.3d 753, 761-62 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 896 (2020) ("Like in our sister circuits, here it is 'generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.'. . But this is only a 'general preference,' not an absolute one. . . Defendants may raise the qualified immunity defense in response to a 12(b)(6) motion because it is 'an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.'. . That is why some claims must 'be resolved prior to discovery.'. . Thus, despite the general preference to save qualified immunity for summary judgment, sometimes it's best resolved in a motion to dismiss. This happens when the complaint establishes the defense. . . So we ask whether the complaint plausibly alleges 'that an official's acts violated the plaintiff's clearly established constitutional right.'. . If, taking all the facts as true and reading all inferences in the plaintiff's favor, the plaintiff has not plausibly showed a violation of his clearly established rights, then the officer-defendant is entitled to immunity from suit.")

Novak v. City of Parma, 932 F.3d 421, 426 (6th Cir. 2019) ("On both the facts and the law, specificity is our guiding light. But we must also be mindful of the stage of the proceedings. This case reaches us early, after a motion to dismiss. And while we always hope to resolve qualified immunity claims at the earliest possible point in the litigation, we cannot resolve such claims when we need more factual development to do so.") Cahoo v. SAS Analytics Inc., 912 F.3d 887, 907 (6th Cir. 2019) ("The Court appreciates that an 'officer's entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point....'. . . But this Court has repeatedly stated that the earliest possible point for evaluating a qualified immunity defense 'is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.'. . If Plaintiffs hope to survive a motion for summary judgment, they will need to provide evidence to support their allegations, particularly in regards to the actions taken by each Individual Agency Defendant. But at this early stage, the Court finds that Plaintiffs' well-pleaded facts sufficiently allege that each Individual Agency Defendant violated Plaintiffs' clearly-established due process rights by implementing, overseeing, and continuing to enforce a government program that substantially interfered with Plaintiffs' property interests, despite knowing that the program rendered an exceptionally high percentage of invalid fraud determinations. For these reasons, the Court finds that qualified immunity does not shield the Individual Agency Defendants at this stage of the litigation with respect to Plaintiffs' due process claim.")

Osberry v. Slusher, 750 F. App'x 385, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he Officers—not Osberry—filed the motion for judgment on the pleadings. We review de novo a judgment on the pleadings, using the same standard as a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). . . This means that 'all well-pleaded material allegations of the pleadings of the opposing party must be taken as true.'. . Here, Osberry is the party opposing the motion—so we construe the complaint in the light most favorable to Osberry, accept her allegations as true, and draw all reasonable inferences in her favor. . . In contrast, we do not accept the Officers' allegations as true. But at oral argument, the Officers asked us to accept some allegations in the answer as true because Osberry's complaint fails to contradict all the Officers' counter-allegations. For example, Osberry's complaint is silent on whether there was an 'active crime scene'—which the Officers first raised in their answer. The Officers' argument lacks any merit. Under Rule 7(A), a 'plaintiff is not required to reply to affirmative defenses or new matter appearing in the answer.'. . And under Rule 8(b)(6), where new allegations are in a pleading to which no responsive pleading is required, the court must consider the new allegations as denied. . . In other words, because Osberry did not have to respond to the Officers' answer, we must assume that Osberry denies any new allegations in the answer. And when considering the Officers' motion, we rely on the general Rule 12 standard. . . .Here, our review of the video tracks the district court's finding that the video does not 'so blatantly and conclusively contradict' the allegations in the complaint that 'no reasonable jury could find in [Osberry's] favor.'. . For example, the video does not conclusively show that Osberry resisted arrest, hit the Officers, or that she—and not the Officers—provoked the brief scuffle. Likewise, the video does not necessarily show an 'active crime scene' or 'a barricaded subject.' There are no police vehicles, no caution tape, and no blockades or barriers visible in the video that would suggest that Osberry was in an active crime scene. Indeed, the presence of other individuals and vehicles, including several people riding bicycles nearby, would suggest the opposite. And while the presence of many police officers may suggest an ongoing investigation, as could Officer Frysinger instructing Osberry that 'you need to leave this is a crime scene,' these facts alone do not 'utterly discredit' Osberry's version of the arrest. In sum, at this stage, we can rely on the well-pleaded allegations in the complaint and leave further evaluation of the video to either the district court at summary judgment or the jury at trial. This is consistent with our previous warnings 'that it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.'. . Instead, we clarified that '[a]lthough an officer's entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point, that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.'. . This is especially true where, as is the case here, 'the fact-intensive nature of the applicable tests make it "difficult for a defendant to claim qualified immunity on the pleadings before discovery."'")

Osberry v. Slusher, 750 F. App'x 385, ___ n.2 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Our ability to consider video evidence at the pleading stage apparently finds its roots in Rule 10(c), which instructs that '[a] copy of a written instrument that is an exhibit to a pleading is a part of the pleading for all purposes.' Fed. R. Civ. P. 10(c) (emphasis added). See also Weiner v. Klais & Co., 108 F.3d 86, 89 (6th Cir. 1997) (explaining that Rule 10(c) allows a court to consider 'certain pertinent documents' as part of the pleadings); Brownmark Films, LLC v. Comedy Partners, 682 F.3d 687, 691 (7th Cir. 2012) (explaining that it would make 'eminently good sense' to extend the Rule 10(c) incorporation-by-reference doctrine to videos). This case, however, does not require us to determine the appropriateness (or limits) of reviewing videos under Rule 10 and Rule 12. See, e.g., Aimee Brown, Comment, Pleading in Technicolor: When Can Litigants Incorporate Audiovisual Works Into Their Complaints?, 80 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1269, 1278–1306 (2013).")

Wesley v. Campbell, 779 F.3d 421, 428 (6th Cir. 2015) (Wesley II) ("Before proceeding to the merits of the motion to dismiss, we note a critical threshold error in the district court's opinion. Instead of the 'plausibility' standard our precedent clearly requires, the district court improperly held Wesley to a novel and significantly higher standard. The district court determined—indeed, emphasized—that Wesley was required to make 'a substantial showing that the defendant stated a deliberate falsehood or showed reckless disregard for the truth' in order to survive Rule 12 dismissal. . . Such a 'substantial' pleading burden at the Rule 12 stage is plainly inappropriate in light of Iqbal and Twombly—cases that the district court cited but failed to apply—as well as this circuit's settled precedent. The district court's error apparently stems from its reliance on Vakilian v. Shaw, 335 F.3d 509, 517 (6th Cir.2003), a case that does speak of the 'substantial showing' plaintiffs must make when faced with dismissal. Vakilian, however, is a summary judgment case, as is every other case cited by the district court in support of its 'substantial showing' standard. . . Other than the district court's own decision, no published opinion within the Sixth Circuit has ever imported Vakilian's 'substantial showing' language into the Rule 12 context. At oral argument before this court, Rigney conceded that Vakilian's 'substantial showing' standard was inappropriate at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage. We agree. Moreover, review of the pleadings and applicable case law leaves us convinced that Wesley has satisfied his initial pleading burden.")

Walker v. Louisville/Jefferson County Metro Government, No. 3:21-CV-161-DJH-LLK, 2022 WL 301687, at *12-14 (W.D. Ky. Feb. 1, 2022) ("Walker claims that Hankison, Mattingly, Cosgrove, Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell violated the knock-and-announce requirement by failing to announce before entering Taylor's apartment, although he concedes that the officers knocked. . . Mattingly and Cosgrove argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they announced and had a valid no-knock warrant, which permitted their entry without knocking and announcing. . . Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell contend that they 'were not present at the scene when the events took place.'. . Walker has plausibly alleged that the officers failed to announce when executing the warrant. . . Despite Taylor asking the individuals knocking to identify themselves, the officers failed to respond or otherwise announce their presence. . . Walker has also plausibly alleged that the officers listed in his complaint, including Mattingly, Cosgrove, Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell, were part of the entry team executing the warrant . . . and members of an entry team can be liable for a failure to knock and announce. . . Whether the officers acted reasonably under the totality of the circumstances in anticipating exigent circumstances is a question of fact. . . Neither 'the presence of drugs alone' nor the mere possibility of evidence destruction vitiates the knock-and-announce requirement. Moreover, the issuance of a no-knock warrant does not end the reasonableness inquiry. . . As set forth in Walker's complaint, the officers did not anticipate exigent circumstances when they executed the warrant because they planned to knock and announce, believing that Taylor, who had no criminal history, would be home alone and that her residence was 'a soft target.' . . Because Walker plausibly alleges that there were no exigent circumstances justifying the officers' failure to announce, the defendants' motions to dismiss must be denied as to Count II. . . .Walker claims that the officers, who were in plain clothes, failed to announce when they entered Taylor's apartment and thus created a dangerous situation that led to his single shot at the officers. . . Walker further alleges that Mattingly and Cosgrove returned fire at Taylor and Walker, despite Cosgrove's inability to clearly see them. . . Walker distinguishes the officers' failure to announce upon entry from their failure to announce when they knocked. . . The Sixth Circuit has stated that 'where "the events preceding the shooting occurred in close temporal proximity to the shooting, those events have been considered in analyzing whether excessive force was used."'. . Mattingly and Cosgrove, citing Chappell v. City of Cleveland, 585 F.3d 901, 914 (6th Cir. 2009), argue that their decisions upon entry are 'irrelevant' to the excessive-force analysis, making their return of fire reasonable and entitling them to qualified immunity. . . Yet their reliance on Chappell is misplaced. . . In Chappell, the court did not consider the officers' unlawful entry because the entry did not happen simultaneously with or mere moments before the shooting, as it did here. . . Rather, the excessive-force claim stemmed from the officers' entry into an upstairs bedroom after their entry into the residence from the downstairs front door. . . And notably, Chappell involved a motion for summary judgment, not a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. . .The Court acknowledges that '[a] different Fourth Amendment violation cannot transform a later, reasonable use of force into an unreasonable seizure.' Cty. of Los Angeles v. Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539, 1544 (2017). But Walker alleges a failure-to-knock-and-announce claim separate from the excessive-force claim, which stems from the officers' failure to announce upon entry. . . Here, the officers' failure to announce upon entry occurred either simultaneously with or mere seconds before the shooting. . . Under the facts alleged, whether Mattingly and Cosgrove acted reasonably and thus are entitled to qualified immunity cannot be resolved at the motion-to-dismiss stage. . .In reaching this conclusion, the Court heeds the Sixth Circuit's admonition against ' "resolv[ing] a Rule 12(b)(6) motion on qualified immunity grounds" because development of the factual record is frequently necessary to decide whether the official's actions violated clearly established law.'. . 'Although an officer's "entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point," that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.'. . Notably, Mattingly and Cosgrove have cited no Sixth Circuit case where the court granted a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on an excessive-force claim based on qualified immunity when the defendants were accused of discharging a firearm at the plaintiff. . . . Here, additional factual development is necessary to determine whether Mattingly and Cosgrove are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Walker asserts that Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell should be held liable for failing to identify themselves upon entry and for failing to intervene when Mattingly, Hankison, and Cosgrove shot at him. . . Walker does not claim that Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell discharged their firearms. . . Therefore, Walker's excessive-force claim against these defendants depends on their failure to intervene when other officers shot at him. . . Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell argue that they 'did not discharge[ ] their weapons' and thus cannot be found liable for the other officers' alleged use of excessive force. . . These defendants, however, fail to address their alleged failure to intervene. . . And contrary to their assertion, they can be held liable for other officers' use of excessive force if they '(1) "observed or had reason to know that excessive force would be or was being used, and (2) ... had both the opportunity and the means to prevent the harm from occurring."'. . . Taking all facts in the complaint as true, as the Court is required to do at this stage, the Court finds that Walker has plausibly alleged that Jaynes, Mattingly, Goodlett, and Nobles obtained a warrant to search Taylor's apartment that was invalid. Huckelberry, Phan, and Burbrink, however, are entitled to qualified immunity for the constitutionally defective warrant. Walker has also plausibly alleged that Mattingly, Cosgrove, Hoover, James, Nobles, Campbell, and Hankison . . . failed to announce before entering Taylor's apartment and that Mattingly and Cosgrove used unreasonable and excessive force against him. Because Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell do not address Walker's allegation that they failed to intervene when the other officers allegedly used excessive force, this claim against them also survives.")

Hoskins v. Knox County, Kentucky, No. CV 17-84-DLB-HAI, 2018 WL 1352163, at *19–20 (E.D. Ky. Mar. 15, 2018) ("[T]he Supreme Court has repeatedly 'stressed the importance of resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation.'. . The Sixth Circuit, however, has clarified that only truly 'insubstantial claims against government officials should be resolved ... prior to broad discovery,' Johnson, 790 F.3d at 653, and has cautioned that 'it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.' Wesley, 779 F.3d at 433. Thus, '[a]lthough an officer's entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point, that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.'. . With respect to the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis, the KSP Defendants have not argued that the constitutional rights allegedly violated were not clearly established at the time of the Defendant Officers' actions. Nor could they. At the time of Plaintiffs' arrest and pretrial detention, they had a clearly established right to be free from malicious prosecution and fabricated evidence under the Fourth Amendment. . . Therefore, despite the lack of any developed argument, the Court assumes that the Defendants' qualified-immunity argument rests on the first prong—whether the facts alleged make out a constitutional violation. As this Court has explained in detail above, the Plaintiffs have sufficiently stated plausible claims for malicious prosecution, fabrication of evidence, supervisor liability, failure to intervene, and conspiracy under § 1983. Accordingly, the KSP Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hanson v. LeVan, 967 F.3d 584, 591-92, 597-98 (7th Cir. 2020) ("The district court's remark—that whether LeVan will be entitled to qualified immunity on a further-developed record 'cannot be resolved on the pleadings'—merely acknowledges the different standards that apply to a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss and a Rule 56(a) motion for summary judgment. As we've already mentioned, before discovery begins, a defendant asserting qualified immunity is entitled to dismissal if the allegations in the complaint fail to state a claim of a clearly established right having been violated. . . After discovery, however, the defendant asserting qualified immunity is entitled to summary judgment if the evidence fails to demonstrate a genuine factual issue about the characteristics of the employee's position or whether the defendant committed the alleged acts. . . In this way, while qualified immunity may not entitle a defendant to dismissal on the pleadings, qualified immunity may entitle the defendant to summary judgment later on. And because each determination is conclusive as to the defendant's right to avoid the burdens of pretrial discovery and trial, a denial of qualified immunity can be a 'final decision' at both stages of the litigation. . . . LeVan's disagreement with the assumed context here illustrates the mismatch between the 12(b)(6) plausibility standard and the often fact-intensive nature of qualified-immunity inquiries. . . But that incongruity does not justify heightening the pleading standard, which imposes on the plaintiffs no obligation to initially 'anticipate and overcome a defense of qualified immunity' in their complaint. . . The plausibility standard, which leads us to take as given the plaintiffs' allegations about the nature of their positions, is why 'a complaint is generally not dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6) on qualified immunity grounds.'. . And it is why the plaintiffs' First Amendment claims should not be dismissed on qualified-immunity grounds here. . . .LeVan is correct that political-patronage dismissals overall comprise a 'somewhat murky area of the law,'. . . and that the clearly established' inquiry 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. .But LeVan did not face 'an undeveloped state of the law' regarding political-patronage dismissals. . . Nor did he align his conduct with court holdings that the Milton Township Deputy Assessor position falls within the Elrod-Branti exception. . . No case 'directly on point' was required for the relevant right to have been clearly established. . . The context LeVan faced was whether to fire, on political-patronage grounds, low-level employees (as opposed to cabinet-level advisors) who performed clerical and professional work involving no political discretion. And when LeVan dismissed the plaintiffs, the law was clear that a position lacking the features of a policymaking role—such as significant political discretion or cabinet-level advisory functions—falls under the Elrod-Branti rule, not the exception. . .We thus think it 'sufficiently clear' that—taking as given the plaintiffs' well-pleaded allegations that the positions occupied a low rung of the bureaucratic latter and lacked policymaking authority—every reasonable official would have understood that firing the plaintiffs because of their political affiliation violates their First Amendment rights. . . To be clear, LeVan may be entitled to qualified immunity on a motion for summary judgment, at which time the plaintiffs' well-pleaded allegations are not taken as true. But that is a matter different from the one before us now.")

Denwiddie v. Mueller, 775 F. App'x 817, ___ (7th Cir. 2019) ("The district court erred in determining that no clearly established law was violated because Denwiddie 'had not carried her burden to rebut' the officers' qualified immunity defense. There is no duty to plead around a qualified immunity defense. . . And '[b]ecause a qualified immunity defense so closely depends on the facts of the case, a complaint is generally not dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6) on qualified immunity grounds.'. . When qualified immunity is raised in a motion to dismiss, 'it is the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized for "objective legal reasonableness."'. . We take care to follow the Supreme Court's admonition not to define the constitutional rights in question at too high a level of generality. . . The rights must be described with adequate specificity, but there need not be a case directly on point so long as existing precedent is sufficiently analogous as to place the officers on notice that their conduct was unlawful. . .It was clearly established in October 2014 that the search and seizure that Denwiddie described in her complaint and elaborated on in her response to the motion to dismiss were unlawful. Ignoring key facts when obtaining a search warrant, executing an overly broad warrant, destroying the homeowner's property, and permanently seizing private, legal property, are objectively unreasonable. . . It is possible that none of these things happened, but that is a question of proof, which comes later.")

Reed v. Palmer, 906 F.3d 540, 549-551, 553-54 (7th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he district court acted prematurely in deciding Palmer's entitlement to qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage. The court found that, during the time period alleged in the complaints, no law clearly established 'what the [C]onstitution requires of a government official in [Palmer's] position under similar circumstances.' Palmer's position is determined with reference to the well-pleaded factual allegations in plaintiffs' complaints, which are taken as true and considered in the light most favorable to plaintiffs on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. . . According to the complaints, Palmer contracted with the state of Wisconsin to place juveniles, including plaintiffs, in the Copper Lake facility. The complaints further allege that both plaintiffs were in Palmer's custody pursuant to state court orders. Moreover, Palmer monitored and received reports concerning Reed's and Ray-Cluney's conditions of confinement at Copper Lake. Based on these reports, plaintiffs allege Palmer 'knew or should have known of the systemic and excessive use of isolation cells at Copper Lake,' and '[d]espite such knowledge, Palmer failed to remove the Iowa girls placed at Copper Lake and acted with deliberate indifference in doing so.' These allegations are sufficient to withstand a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged that their constitutional rights were violated through excessive use of isolation cells at Copper Lake. Supreme Court precedent is not clear about whether state juvenile detention facility conditions should be judged under the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause or the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . In a case over forty years ago, we applied the Eighth Amendment's cruel and unusual punishment standard to evaluate the use of corporal punishment and tranquilizing drugs at a juvenile correctional institution. . . . Meanwhile, other circuits have applied the Fourteenth Amendment's 'more protective' Due Process Clause in evaluating juvenile detention center conditions. . . . At the time plaintiffs were allegedly in Palmer's custody, isolation of pre-trial juvenile detainees not 'reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective,' Bell, 441 U.S. at 539, 99 S.Ct. 1861, could rise to the level of a constitutional violation. Here, plaintiffs' complaints plausibly allege that they were kept in isolation at Copper Lake for excessive amounts of time. Caselaw clearly establishes that such conduct could violate the Fourteenth and/or the Eighth Amendment. On the present record, however, it is impossible to determine whether such a constitutional violation occurred in plaintiffs' cases. We know the respective complaints allege plaintiffs spent an inordinate amount of time at Copper Lake in isolation. However, we do not know the reasons behind their seclusion. We therefore cannot evaluate, under the Fourteenth Amendment, whether Palmer—or the other defendants—acted reasonably pursuant to a 'legitimate governmental objective or instead unlawfully 'punished' plaintiffs. . . Nor can we determine, under the Eighth Amendment, whether Palmer had a 'sufficiently culpable state of mind.'. . . Such a result does not condemn the district court to unnecessary litigation or impede Palmer's potential right to be free from suit. The district court has a variety of means ... to move the case incrementally forward in order to address the qualified immunity issue at the earliest possible stage.'. . For instance, '[t]he Rule 12(e) motion for a more definite statement is perhaps the best procedural tool available to the defendant to obtain the factual basis underlying a plaintiff's claim for relief.'. . Alternatively, if additional evidence is needed to develop the factual record, the district court may 'limit the timing, sequence, frequency, and extent of that discovery under Rule 26.'")

[While the following case involved a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii), the reasoning would clearly apply to dismissal of a prisoner's complaint where dismissal is based on the grounds that the plaintiff "seeks monetary relief against a defendant who is immune from such relief." 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(iii).]

Coleman v. Labor & Indus. Review Comm'n of Wisconsin, 860 F.3d 461, 465-66, 470-71, 474-75 (7th Cir. 2017) ("[M]ay an Article I judge dismiss an action for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted, if that dismissal is part of the initial screening that occurs in IFP cases and thus takes place before the defendants are served? Although the statute does not say this in so many words, we have understood section 1915(e) to 'direct [ ] courts to screen all complaints filed with requests to proceed IFP.' Luevano v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 722 F.3d 1014, 1022 (7th Cir. 2013). It instructs 'the court' to 'dismiss the case at any time' if, among other things, the action 'fails to state a claim on which relief may be granted.' 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii). The magistrate judge in our case followed that command and entered a final judgment for the as-yet-unserved defendant. We must decide whether this was permissible. . . .[A]lthough the consent requirement is carved in stone, the identity of 'the parties' whose permission section 636(c)(1) demands is less clear. Is it all of the parties? Some of the parties? Only any party who must be before the court for purposes of the ruling in question? The circuits have come to different conclusions about this question, and unfortunately, so have we. The Fifth Circuit, in Neals v. Norwood, 59 F.3d 530, 532 (5th Cir. 1995), and our opinion in Hains v. Washington, 131 F.3d 1248, 1249 & n.2 (7th Cir. 1997) (per curiam), take the position that an unserved defendant is not one of the 'parties' for purposes of section 636(c)(1), and thus the defendant's consent is not required in order to permit a magistrate judge to issue a dispositive order when screening a complaint for IFP purposes. On the other side, the Eighth Circuit, in Henry v. Tri-Services, Inc., 33 F.3d 931, 933 (8th Cir. 1994), and our court in Geaney v. Carlson, 776 F.2d 140, 142 (7th Cir. 1985), hold that the magistrate cannot finally dispose of the case, on screening or otherwise, without the defendant's consent. No matter what the rules concerning consent are, there is a substantial role for the magistrate judge to play in the screening process. Under the rule of Neals and Hains, the magistrate judge enters a final judgment on the case, while under the approach of Henry and Geaney, he evaluates the complaint, takes any nondispositive actions that are appropriate (e.g., further investigation of indigence), and recommends an action for the district court. . . If the action recommended is dismissal, the district court can enter that final judgment (after considering any properly filed objections) without bothering the defendants. Under either view, to the extent that section 1915(e)(2) involves nondispositive issues, such as the truthfulness of the allegation of poverty, nothing in the Magistrate Judges' Act prevents the magistrate judge from resolving the issue. That is because a conclusion that the plaintiff is not indigent does not foreclose further legal proceedings—it just means that the plaintiff must pony up the required filing fee. . . . The conclusion we draw is that a dismissal under section 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii) for failure to state a claim is covered by the language in the Magistrate Judges Act that prevents the district court from designating a magistrate judge to 'hear and determine' a motion 'to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.' 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(A). That rule is not absolute, however. It yields when, as section 636(c)(1) puts it, the magistrate judge is acting with 'the consent of the parties.' Packed into that short phrase are two questions: what does it take to signify consent, and which parties (one, some, or all) have to consent? Typically, both parties file written consents to the magistrate judge's jurisdiction and the case proceeds without a hitch. And as Judge Posner's dissent emphasizes, consent need not be explicit. No dispute there: consent may be implicit, as the Supreme Court recognized in Roell v. Withrow, 538 U.S. 580, 586–91, 123 S.Ct. 1696, 155 L.Ed.2d 775 (2003). But even implicit consent requires some action from the party whose consent must be found. . . . With the idea of presumed consent out of the way, the question remains whether the statute permits the consent of only one party. We think not. To begin with, that is not what the statute says; it speaks instead of the consent of the 'parties,' plural. The Commission sees no problem in the use of the plural: at the time of screening, it notes, only one party has come before the court. It should be enough, the Commission says, to obtain only the consent of the party that is actually present. This would require us to treat the unserved defendant as a nonparty to the case for this purpose. Such a step would ignore the general use of the term 'parties' throughout the rules of civil procedure. At the time of filing any civil complaint, only one party is ever before the court. . . .The fact that it is the plaintiff who commences the suit does not mean that the other parties named in the complaint do not count as 'parties' prior to service of process. And our case differs in one critical respect from the hypotheticals that concern Judge Easterbrook. . . All of his examples involve a case that has at least one plaintiff and at least one defendant. And in all of his examples, at least one plaintiff and one defendant have consented to the authority of the magistrate judge. That is the crucial element missing here: in our case, only one side of the 'v' has consented to the magistrate judge, and under the statute, that is not enough. . . .This court, unfortunately, has not been consistent in its approach to the issue we have been discussing. . . . We see no principled way of reconciling Geaney and Hains, even though Hains dealt with the prisoner-specific section 1915A, whereas Coleman's case was dismissed under section 1915(e). The relevant language and structure of these two statutes are identical. . . . In the end, Hains stands alone in this circuit. Our consistent emphasis on the importance of consent strongly supports Geaney's analysis. . . We conclude that Geaney, Brook, and Stevo are more consistent with the language of the statute and better respect the constitutional line between Article III judges and other adjudicators. We thus overrule Hains. Because this resolves an internal circuit conflict and overrules one case, we have circulated this opinion to all judges in regular active service. See Cir. R. 40(e). A majority of the judges did not wish to hear this case en banc. Judge Easterbrook, joined by Judge Sykes, voted in favor of an en banc hearing. Judge Posner dissents on the merits. As we stressed earlier, this does not mean that the work of the magistrate judge in this type of case is wasted. The role of the magistrate judges in conducting screening of prisoner and in forma pauperis actions is of great assistance to the district court. But unless all parties to the action have consented to the magistrate judge's authority to resolve the case finally, the role of the magistrate judge must parallel that of the bankruptcy judges after Stern. Rather than entering final judgments, they must 'issue proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law to be reviewed de novo by the district court.'. . We realize that this adds one extra step, but it is not a particularly burdensome one, and it does not mean that parties in the Commission's position must be served before the case can be resolved. It just means that the district judge must enter any post-screening orders that dispose of the entire case. Fears that the district court judges will drown beneath a deluge of IFP applications are overblown. The Stern dissent expressed similar fears, but this has not come to pass. . . The magistrate judges' screening is among those 'additional duties as are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.'")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Thunderhawk v. Morton County, No. 20-3052, 2022 WL 2441323, at *1–2 (8th Cir. July 5, 2022) ("In its 101-page opinion and order, the district court devoted less than 3 pages to the qualified immunity analysis. As to the first prong, the district court determined that 'the Plaintiffs have alleged facts showing violations of their constitutional right to speech,' and, as to the second prong, the district court stated that 'whether the law was clearly established so that a reasonable official would know he or she was violating the constitutional rights of another ... appears to be the biggest contention between the parties.' . . Instead of deciding the clearly established prong, however, the district court stated that this case is an example of why 'qualified immunity is often best decided on a motion for summary judgment when the details of the alleged deprivations are more fully developed.' . . As the United States Supreme Court has noted, 'when qualified immunity is asserted at the pleading stage, the precise factual basis for the plaintiff's claim or claims may be hard to identify' and 'the answer [to] whether there was a violation may depend on a kaleidoscope of facts not yet fully developed. . . 'While a district court may address the prongs in any order, it "may not deny qualified immunity without answering both questions in the plaintiff's favor."'. . The district court's failure to answer the clearly established inquiry was thus erroneous. Defendants urge us to conduct the clearly established inquiry in the first instance as it involves a purely legal question. We decline to do so without the benefit of the district court's analysis. . . We therefore remand to the district court with instructions to conduct the requisite clearly established analysis.")

NINTH CIRCUIT

Sabra v. Maricopa County Community College Dist., 44 F.4th 867, 892-93 (9th Cir. 2022) ("It is true that resolving claims of qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage can sometimes present 'special problems for legal decision making,'. . . particularly when we are 'aided only by the skeletal ... factual picture sketched out in the complaint[.]' . . Thus, it is understandable that district courts sometimes delay a decision on qualified immunity until the parties have had the opportunity to develop a more comprehensive factual record. . .In this case, though, there are two unique features that obviate the concern over resolving qualified immunity claims prior to discovery. First, Plaintiffs attached substantial documentary evidence to their Complaint, including the allegedly offending slides; the assigned reading excerpt from Future Jihad; screenshots of the full end-of-module quiz; the World Politics course syllabus; screenshots of Sabra's correspondence with Damask following his completion of the quiz; and screenshots of the College's statement posted to Instagram. We therefore have access to the allegedly offending course material that forms the sum and substance of Plaintiffs' claims, as well as other materials that serve to contextualize Plaintiffs' factual allegations. These are precisely the materials that ordinarily would have been produced in discovery. Second, Damask's World Politics course was a self-guided course administered entirely online. The PowerPoint slides, assigned readings, and end-of-module quizzes made up the entirety of the course. There were no lectures, discussion groups, or other pedagogical components beyond the materials described in the Complaint. In other words, we have before us the universe of evidence we might wish to consider in resolving Damask's claim of qualified immunity. Discovery would not serve to sharpen our understanding of the factual picture in this case. Even if discovery somehow were to produce additional relevant evidence, it is difficult to conceive of evidence that would alter the result in this case. As discussed, we have found no cases that would have put Damask on notice that his conduct might be unconstitutional under the circumstances here. No matter what we might learn in discovery, then, Damask would still be shielded by qualified immunity. . . Postponing our qualified immunity decision until the summary judgment stage would only consume additional time, expense, and judicial resources, without any realistic possibility that the outcome would change.")

Sabra v. Maricopa County Community College Dist., 44 F.4th 867, 897 (9th Cir. 2022) (Bress, J., dissenting) ("The majority bestows qualified immunity on Professor Damask based on a minimal record that raises more questions than it answers, even though we have repeatedly held that granting qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage and without discovery is disfavored.")

B.Q. through Rodriguez-Q., No. 19-56348, 2020 WL 6112498 (9th Cir. Oct. 16, 2020) (not reported) ("Because qualified immunity is 'an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability,'. . . the Supreme Court has directed courts to resolve such questions 'at the earliest stage of litigation possible[.]' Defendants can raise qualified immunity immediately, and district courts may grant a motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds if the record supports such a ruling. . .Here, by addressing qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage, the district court appropriately resolved the question at the earliest stage of the litigation possible. Appellant cites no precedent supporting his argument that district courts are not allowed to do so.")

Hernandez v. City of San Jose, 897 F.3d 1125, 1137-38 (9th Cir. 2018) (" 'Whatever the merits of the decision[s] in [Wood and Kennedy], the differences [in the facts of those] case[s] and [this] case ... leap from the page.' [citing Kisela] Without more, Wood and Kennedy did not place these Officers on notice that their actions were unlawful 'in light of the specific context of [this] case.'. .But the Attendees have also cited Johnson, a case that clearly establishes the state-created danger doctrine applies to the crowd-control context. . . .Based on the allegations in the FAC, which we take as true at this stage of the proceedings, we also find that this is 'one of those rare cases' in which the constitutional violation 'is so "obvious" that we must conclude ... qualified immunity is inapplicable, even without a case directly on point.'. . Here, the Attendees allege the Officers shepherded them into a violent crowd of protesters and actively prevented them from reaching safety. The Officers continued to implement this plan even while witnessing the violence firsthand, and even though they knew the mob had attacked Trump supporters at the Convention Center earlier that evening, and that similar, violent encounters had occurred in other cities. Viewed in the light most favorable to the Attendees, these allegations establish 'with obvious clarity' that the Officers increased the danger to the Attendees and acted with deliberate indifference to that danger, pursuant to the state-created danger doctrine. . . We therefore hold 'that the operative complaint alleges facts that allow us "to draw the reasonable inference that the [Officers are] liable for the misconduct alleged,"'. . and that the district court properly denied the Officers qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings. This, of course, 'does not mean that th[e] case must go to trial,'. . . or that the Officers are now precluded from ever asserting a claim for qualified immunity in this litigation. As we have noted time and again, '[o]nce an evidentiary record has been developed through discovery, [the Officers] will be free to move for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.'")

Keates v. Koile, 883 F.3d 1228, 1234-35, 1237-38, 1240 (9th Cir. 2018) ("This appeal raises an additional wrinkle because the district court granted the motion to dismiss largely on the ground that defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. Determining claims of qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage raises special problems for legal decision making. . . On the one hand, we may not dismiss a complaint making 'a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'. . But on the other hand, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity so long as 'their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . The Supreme Court has emphasized that this is a low bar, explaining that '[q]ualified immunity gives government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments about open legal questions.'. . .Balancing these competing rules, when a district court dismisses a complaint for failure to state a claim based on a qualified immunity defense, we consider whether the complaint alleges sufficient facts, taken as true, to support the claim that the officials' conduct violated clearly established constitutional rights of which a reasonable officer would be aware 'in light of the specific context of the case.'. . If the operative complaint 'contains even one allegation of a harmful act that would constitute a violation of a clearly established constitutional right,' then plaintiffs are 'entitled to go forward' with their claims. . .But our decision at the motion-to-dismiss stage sheds little light on whether the government actors might ultimately be entitled to qualified immunity 'were the case permitted to proceed, at least to the summary judgment stage' and the court is presented with facts providing context for the challenged actions. . . Because the operative complaint here was dismissed on qualified immunity grounds, we must determine whether Keates and A.K.'s complaint pleads a plausible claim that withstands a qualified immunity defense. . . .In sum, our case law clearly establishes that the rights of parents and children to familial association under the Fourteenth, First, and Fourth Amendments are violated if a state official removes children from their parents without their consent, and without a court order, unless information at the time of the seizure, after reasonable investigation, establishes reasonable cause to believe that the child is in imminent danger of serious bodily injury, and the scope, degree, and duration of the intrusion are reasonably necessary to avert the specific injury at issue. . . . [B]ased solely on the facts alleged in the complaint construed in favor of Keates and A.K., a reasonable official in Koile's position would know the available information did not establish reasonable cause to believe that A.K. was in imminent danger of attempting to commit suicide, or that it was necessary to separate her from her mother, transfer her to ABHS, and continue to detain her after medical professionals at ABHS concluded she was a low suicide risk. Therefore, we conclude that the operative complaint alleges facts that allow us 'to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . The district court therefore erred in dismissing the familial association claim against Koile and Pender on the basis of qualified immunity. However, '[o]ur denial of qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings does not mean that this case must go to trial.'. . As we have previously noted, '[o]nce an evidentiary record has been developed through discovery, defendants will be free to move for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.'")

Butler v. San Diego District Attorney's Office, 370 F.3d 956, 958, 964 (9th Cir. 2004) ("We hold that the district court applied an incorrect evidentiary standard in denying summary judgment. It incorrectly understood the law to require it to assume that factual allegations in a plaintiff's § 1983 complaint are true when a defendant moves for summary judgment based on official immunity. Based on that understanding of the law, the district court did not rule on the admissibility of evidence proffered by plaintiffs at summary judgment, but rather simply assumed that the factual allegations in the complaint were true without regard to whether they had evidentiary support. The district court was misled by a brief (and incorrect) statement by this court in Fletcher v. Kalina, 93 F.3d 653, 654 (9th Cir.1996), and a repetition of that statement by the Supreme Court on review of our decision in Kalina v. Fletcher, 522 U.S. 118, 122 (1997). We hold that these brief statements were inadvertent and erroneous statements of the law. A correct statement of the law is that when a defendant makes a properly supported motion for summary judgment based on official immunity, the plaintiff has an obligation to produce evidence of his or her own. In such a case, the district court is not required (or even allowed) simply to assume the truth of challenged factual allegations in the complaint. In other words, a motion for summary judgment based on official immunity is governed by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56, just like all motions for summary judgment in civil suits in federal district court. . . . Thus, in the usual case where a defendant asserts an official immunity defense, the district court first decides whether the facts alleged in the complaint, assumed to be true, yield the conclusion that the defendant is entitled to immunity. This is the analysis under Rule 12(b)(6) on a motion to dismiss. If, taking the facts as stated in the complaint, the defendant is entitled to immunity, no discovery should be permitted and the case should be dismissed. . . If a plaintiff passes this initial hurdle, he or she is entitled to enough discovery to permit the court to rule on a defendant's subsequent summary judgment motion brought under Rule 56. . . . The Supreme Court has clearly, and repeatedly, admonished that official immunity is immunity from suit rather than merely immunity from liability. . . It would therefore be extremely odd if, in ruling on a defendant's motion for summary judgment based on official immunity, a district court were required to assume that the allegations in plaintiff's complaint are true. If that were the law, the defendant would effectively be deprived of the protection afforded by a motion for summary judgment, and would be given only the protection afforded by a motion to dismiss. That is, the defendant would always be obliged to go to trial if the plaintiff's allegations (as distinct from the plaintiff's evidence) would overcome a claim of official immunity. If this were the law, a defendant moving for summary judgment based on official immunity would have to go to trial more, rather than less, often than a defendant moving for summary judgment on some other basis. Given that the very purpose of official immunity is to provide immunity from trial, this cannot be the law. . . . Because the district court misunderstood the evidentiary standard in ruling on defendants' motions for summary judgment based on official immunity, we vacate the district court's ruling and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. We recognize that the district court's misunderstanding of the evidentiary standard may have led it to be more restrictive in the discovery it allowed to plaintiff than it would have been if it had properly understood the standard, and that the court may have led plaintiffs to seek to discover and introduce less evidence than they otherwise would have done. We leave it to the district court on remand to allow additional discovery, if appropriate, based on the evidentiary standard plaintiff must meet in responding to a properly supported motion for summary judgment.").

Thompson v. Lampert, No. CV-02-135-HU, 2004 WL 1673102, at *15 n.3 (D. Ore. July 27, 2004) ("While the qualified immunity cases indicate that the first inquiry as to whether a constitutional right has been violated is based on a review of the facts alleged taken in the light most favorable to plaintiff, this does not mean that the court's analysis of a qualified immunity defense in the context of a summary judgment motion is limited to the allegations in the complaint or those put forth only by the plaintiff. . .Rather, the inquiry is whether upon review of the evidence in the record, there is a disputed issue of fact. If so, Saucier requires that the court conduct the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis assuming the truth of the facts as alleged by the plaintiff and in a light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . . If, however, the record reveals only undisputed facts and those facts do not support a constitutional violation, the inquiry ends.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Thompson v. Ragland, 23 F.4th 1252, 1256 (10th Cir. 2022) ("The procedural posture of the qualified-immunity inquiry may be critical. Because they turn on a fact-bound inquiry, 'qualified immunity defenses are typically resolved at the summary judgment stage' rather than on a motion to dismiss. . . . On a motion to dismiss, 'it is the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized for [constitutionality].'")

Myers v. Brewer, 773 F. App'x 1032, ____ (10th Cir. 2019) ("'Asserting a qualified immunity defense via a Rule 12(b)(6) motion . . . subjects the defendant to a more challenging standard of review than would apply on summary judgment.'. . 'At the motion to dismiss stage, it is the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized for objective legal reasonableness.'. . We evaluate '(1) whether the facts that a plaintiff has alleged make out a violation of a constitutional right, and (2) whether the right at issue was clearly established.'")

IV. STATE OF MIND AND QUALIFIED IMMUNITY

D.C. CIRCUIT

Daugherty v. Sheer, 891 F.3d 386, 390-92 (D.C. Cir. 2018) ("Regardless of whether a court expressly has declared certain conduct unlawful, a government official is not entitled to qualified immunity where 'every "reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates th[e] right."'. . Accordingly, 'we look to cases from the Supreme Court and this court, as well as to cases from other courts exhibiting a consensus view—if there is one.'. . The proponent of a purported right has the 'burden to show that the particular right in question ... was clearly established' for qualified-immunity purposes. . . .In their claim now on appeal, Daugherty and LabMD assert that Sheer and Yodaiken violated their rights by prosecuting an enforcement action in retaliation for Daugherty's speech, despite the undisputed data-security breach underlying the FTC's investigation and regardless of ultimate control over the decision to bring a complaint residing with the FTC board. Because no such right was clearly established, Sheer and Yodaiken are immune from this suit. . . .Our task, then, is to determine whether there is a clearly established right to be free from an enforcement action where retaliatory motive was allegedly present, but was not plausibly alleged to be the but-for cause of the enforcement. . . . Supreme Court precedent shows that there is no such clearly established right. If anything, the leading cases cut the other way: they show that retaliatory motive does not automatically imbue the conduct in question with an unconstitutional air, where the official's actions have a legitimate basis. . . .Because the FTC enforcement action against LabMD had an alternative cause—the undisputed data-security breach by which the 1718 File was publicly available from a LabMD computer—the alleged actions by Sheer and Yodaiken did not violate Daugherty's or LabMD's clearly established rights, even assuming retaliatory motive. Sheer and Yodaiken accordingly are entitled to qualified immunity, and the District Court's decision concluding otherwise is REVERSED.")

Richardson v. D.C., 322 F. Supp. 3d 175, 184-86 (D.D.C. 2018) ("It may seem odd to speak of qualified immunity in the context of the Eighth Amendment. After all, to hold an officer liable for deliberate indifference, a court must find that the officer disregarded a risk of harm that he subjectively knew about. Moreover, it was clearly established in Farmer v. Brennan that disregarding a risk of inmate-on-inmate sexual assault amounts to unconstitutional deliberate indifference. So if the record were to support a jury finding that Warden Smith disregarded the risk that an inmate like Richardson might be assaulted if placed in a cell with a heterosexual male, wouldn't the record necessarily also support a finding that Smith violated clearly established law? Not necessarily. Farmer put correctional officers on notice that they cannot house together a transgender female inmate who they know faces a particularly high risk of assault with a male inmate. . . But the case leaves open what exactly a higher-level supervisor or policymaker must do when dealing not with particularized evidence of risk, but rather with the ever-present, generalized risk of sexual assault that transgender inmates face at the hands of their cellmates. In other words, Farmer does not hold that transgender female inmates, notwithstanding their own housing preferences, may never be celled with male inmates. In fact, Farmer says nothing whatsoever about general procedures for housing transgender inmates. And, equally importantly, Farmer laid down a principle that officers who reasonably respond to known risks cannot be held liable for deliberate indifference, . . . which leaves open the possibility that an official's unreasonable response was not clearly unreasonable under existing law. The Supreme Court's unanimous decision in Taylor v. Barkes . . . helps explain why Farmer's holding—clear as it may be with respect to certain conduct—does not automatically vitiate Smith's immunity here. In Barkes, the widow of a former inmate who committed suicide in prison had sued the commissioner of the state department of corrections and the prison's warden. . . She claimed that the officials had displayed deliberate indifference toward his risk of suicide 'by failing to supervise and monitor the private contractor that provided the medical treatment—including the intake screening—at the [prison].'. . The court of appeals had found that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on her Eighth Amendment claim because, at the time of the inmate's death, there were cases on the books putting officers on notice that they could not behave with reckless indifference to a particular inmate's known 'vulnerability to suicide.'. . The Supreme Court disagreed. In its view, those prior decisions did not clearly establish the unlawfulness of the officials' purported conduct—failing to implement adequate screening procedures—because the cases 'did not say ... that detention facilities must implement procedures to identify such vulnerable inmates, let alone specify what procedures would suffice.'. . By the same token, Farmer does not dictate the outcome here. The clearly established right to be free from deliberate indifference to sexual assault does not mean that it is clearly established what procedures a supervisor must put in place to prevent assault. And the Court finds that, as a matter of undisputed fact, Warden Smith's actions did not violate clearly established Eighth Amendment law. It is undisputed that Smith played a limited role in the chain of events that led to Richardson's purported assault. He testified that he did not participate in creating or implementing the two policies that Richardson takes issue with—the one that allowed transgender inmates to be housed in the general male prison population, . . . or the one that presumptively double-celled inmates, including transgender inmates, absent a specific finding that they belonged in protective custody[.]Richardson identifies no evidence undermining that testimony, and indeed she concedes that the policies were instituted not by Smith, but by the Department's Director. . . . Nor is there any evidence suggesting that Smith selected Glover as Richardson's cellmate or was aware of Richardson's concerns about Glover, which she claims to have expressed to several prison guards after being moved into his cell. Rather, the record, read in the light most favorable to Richardson, supports the following narrative with respect to Warden Smith's state of mind: Smith knew that, pursuant to Department of Corrections policy, an inmate could circumvent the Transgender Housing Committee's hearing process by signing a form agreeing to be housed according to her birth sex. . . Smith could override any initial determination related to housing—including the inmate's election of birth-sex housing—by making a recommendation to the Director in writing. . . Smith also knew that any transgender female inmate who was housed in the general male population would presumptively be double-celled based on a suicide-prevention policy instituted by the Director. . . Smith could register disagreement with that policy but could not unilaterally change it. . . A jury could also infer that Smith knew generally that transgender female inmates—particularly those exhibiting traditionally feminine characteristics—faced a higher risk of sexual assault when celled with male inmates. There is no evidence, however, that Smith had any information indicating that Richardson faced a particularly high risk of abuse. Nor is there evidence that Smith knew that Glover, beyond his substantial criminal history, posed an especially high threat of sexual assault. Obviously, Richardson need not point to a case finding liability under that exact set of facts in order to overcome qualified immunity. . . But she still must persuade the Court that, in 2014, Smith was on clear notice that the foregoing conduct and associated state of mind amounted to a constitutional violation. She cites no authority, nor is the Court is aware of any, that provided such notice. The right to be free from deliberate indifference to the risk of assault does not necessarily imply that Smith needed to categorically prevent transgender female inmates from being celled with male inmates who exhibited no particularized red flags when it came to sexual violence. And an officer in Smith's position could reasonably—not necessarily correctly, but reasonably—believe that the D.C. jail's system for housing transgender inmates properly balanced inmate safety against avoiding mandatory isolation of transgender inmates, especially because it is undisputed that the double-celling policy was enacted to mitigate the risk of suicide. Smith is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Richardson's Eighth Amendment claim against him in his individual capacity.")

FIRST CIRCUIT

Jordan v. Town of Waldoboro, 943 F.3d 532, 547-49 (1st Cir. 2019) ("Having concluded that a jury could find that Officer Hesseltine and Chief Labombarde violated Jordan's constitutional rights to be free from unreasonable search and seizure and false arrest, we turn to these two defendants' contention that we should affirm on the alternative grounds that they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . We have already concluded that the officers violated a federal constitutional right, so the sole question is whether the unlawfulness of their conduct was 'clearly established at the time.'. . . As the defendants correctly conceded at oral argument, the law clearly prohibited officers from 'us[ing] deliberately falsified allegations to demonstrate probable cause.'.

. Despite this concession, the defendants' brief could be read to argue that -- even assuming Hesseltine and Labombarde deliberately included falsehoods in the warrant affidavit -- they are entitled to qualified immunity unless Jordan can show that any reasonable officer would have understood that, absent the falsehoods, probable cause would not have existed. We must disagree. . . The aim of the doctrine of qualified immunity 'is to avoid the chilling effect of second-guessing where the officers, acting in the heat of events, made a defensible (albeit imperfect) judgment.'. . There is no good reason to provide such protection to an officer who deliberately paints a misleading picture of the facts in order to procure a warrant. Whether or not it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that the false picture was necessary to establish probable cause, it certainly would be clear to any law enforcement officer that trying to mislead the judicial officer in seeking a warrant is highly improper. . . .[O]n this record we consider the cumulative impact of what jurors might find to be a deliberate attempt to convey a knowingly false picture by combining a falsehood and two omissions in an effort to secure a warrant. So we are confident that the requirements for establishing a constitutional violation in this case provide sufficient protection for the officers so as to render any further qualified immunity analysis unnecessary. We therefore decline to affirm the judgment on qualified immunity grounds.")

Martinez-Velez v. Rey-Hernandez, 506 F.3d 32, 46 (1st Cir. 2007) ("[I]n political discrimination cases–where wrongful motive is an element of the claim–the case law has regularly rejected this objective-reasonableness argument.")

Rosario-Urdaz v.Velazco, 433 F.3d 174, 178 & n.2, 179 (1st Cir. 2006) ("Traditionally–search and seizure is the best example–the Supreme Court has said that private motive is irrelevant if the defendant had objective probable cause or, for qualified immunity purposes, a reasonable officer might have so believed, even if wrongly. . . By contrast, in cases involving first amendment rights, some of our decisions have left open the possibility that an objectively reasonable action could still be denied qualified immunity if improperly motivated. [citing Mihos and Tang] . . . . These cases note, without resolving, the tension between specific-intent constitutional violations and the requirement that qualified immunity be decided on a purely objective basis. . . . In all events, even if the existence of a political motivation underlying an objectively reasonable employment decision were enough to preclude qualified immunity, Rosario-Urdaz must make a threshold showing that she was adversely affected by these personnel decisions. . . .The personnel decisions of which Rosario-Urdaz complains do not rise to this level.").

Tejada-Batista v. Morales, 424 F.3d 97, 102 , 103 (1st Cir. 2005) ("[T]he problem in this case is not one of a single actor with multiple motives, but of sequential actors having different motives–the first actor's motive being unlawful and the second actor's motive at least permissible. In such a case, the first actor may be (and here was) a but-for cause of the firing. The question is whether the intervening step–a final decision maker acting on a permissible ground–should as a matter of policy (not lack of causation) insulate the wrongdoer from liability. We have found only a few circuits that have addressed this sequence-of-actors issue in the present context, and they are nominally in conflict. [citing cases] The interplay between qualified immunity and First Amendment violations is a difficult subject, partly because the former normally employs an objective standard and the latter–in contrast to the ordinary Fourth Amendment claim– turns heavily upon motive. This does not mean that qualified immunity can never succeed in a First Amendment case, see Dirrane v. Brookline Police Dept., 315 F.3d 65, 69-71 (1st Cir.2002), but only that the opportunities may be narrowed. On appeal, appellants' brief describes qualified immunity doctrine in general terms but makes no effort to apply it to the facts of this case. An argument not seriously developed in the opening brief is forfeit,. . .and that rule certainly applies in this case. Given that the jury almost surely found that appellants' purpose was improper retaliation, it is not clear how a qualified immunity defense could easily have prevailed.")

Tejada-Batista v. Morales, 424 F.3d 97, 105-08 (1st Cir. 2005) (Carter, J., dissenting) ("[T]he conduct and motivation of Ms. Morales and Mr. Alverez cannot be, as a matter of law, any part of a legally sufficient causative factor in Secretary Fuentes' employment action. Even though the evidence might be construed to establish that their termination recommendations were potentially driven by some unconstitutional motivation, they cannot be liable under section 1983 without some evidence of causation between that motivation and the decision by Secretary Fuentes to discharge the Plaintiff. . . . .Without at least being able to impute appellants' unlawful motives to Secretary Fuentes, those wrongful motives cannot be found to be a motivating factor in the adverse employment action. . . . As a matter of law, there simply cannot be any causal link here between any supposed improper motives of the minions and the discharge implemented by Secretary Fuentes' solitary decision to discharge plaintiff for a proper, stated reason. . . . Webber v. International Paper Co., 417 F.3d 229 (1st Cir.2005). . . . is a clear application of the Mt. Healthy rule requiring the presence of causational linkage between the conduct of those who are found to harbor discriminatory motivation and the making of the actual, challenged employment decision. It is, I suggest, not proper for this panel to depart from this holding. In this Circuit, each panel of the Court is bound by prior panel decisions directly on point. . . The seminal holding of Webber, for present purposes, is that where the evidence fails to show that the final decision-maker is influenced adversely by the motivation of lower level actors, the type and level of causation required by Mt. Healthy is absent and must be recognized. A).

Mihos v. Swift, 358 F.3d 91, 103-07(1st Cir. 2004) ("Given the importance of Swift's motivation for firing Mihos for his vote, we must pause to address Swift's argument in her brief that 'the state of mind of the public official is not relevant to the question of qualified immunity,' citing to Harlow v. Fitzgerald. . . . This argument, along with citations to Harlow, is often made in First Amendment retaliation cases when defendants raise the qualified immunity defense. We are mindful that the Supreme Court in Harlow changed qualified immunity doctrine to emphasize the objective, not subjective, nature of that inquiry. However, Harlow does not stand for the proposition that inquiries into defendants' subjective motivation is inappropriate in the first step of the qualified immunity analysis in assessing whether an intent-based constitutional violation has been alleged. . . . Harlow, then, did not affect the first step of the qualified immunity analysis: whether plaintiff's allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation. Certain constitutional violations, including First Amendment retaliation claims, include defendant's motivations as a foundational element of the tort: Mihos's First Amendment retaliation claim 'has no meaning absent the allegation of impermissible motivation.' . . . While the Supreme Court has removed from the qualified immunity analysis inquiries into whether a defendant knew that he was violating plaintiff's constitutional rights or acted maliciously to that end, this jurisprudence has not suggested that the 'objectification' of the qualified immunity inquiry somehow removes the intent element in the 'subset of constitutional torts [in which] motivation or intent is an element of the cause of action .' . . . In Crawford-El v. Britton. . . the Supreme Court confirmed that although Harlow eliminated inquiries into the defendant's subjective state of mind in the third step of the qualified immunity analysis, it did not eliminate inquiries into the defendant's subjective state of mind in the first step of the qualified immunity analysis when plaintiff alleges an intent-based constitutional tort. . . . With its careful attention to the ways in which trial courts can control the examination of an official's state of mind pre-trial, the Supreme Court acknowledged in Crawford-El that the adoption of an objective standard for qualified immunity in Harlow did not foreclose all state of mind inquiries during the pre-trial consideration of qualified immunity when state of mind is an element of the constitutional tort. Swift misreads Harlow in asserting that its reformulation of the qualified immunity defense makes her motivation in firing Mihos irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis. Therefore, if the qualified immunity defense proffered in her motion to dismiss does not identify proper grounds apart from motive for dismissing the case, and if the thrust of her motion to dismiss is simply to deny that she acted with the constitutionally proscribed motive, she is unlikely to succeed." [footnotes omitted]).

Orekoya v. Mooney, 330 F.3d 1, 11(1st Cir. 2003) ("Orekoya next erroneously argues that Judge Young could not have granted qualified immunity because 'national origin discrimination precludes the availability of qualified immunity as a defense,' citing to DiMarco-Zappa v. Cabanillas, 238 F.3d 25, 31, 37 (1st Cir.2001). The assertion is flatly wrong. DiMarco applied the usual rules of qualified immunity and concluded, on the facts there, that immunity was not available. There is no per se rule that national origin discrimination is exempt from qualified immunity analysis.").

Tower v. Leslie-Brown, 326 F.3d 290, 296 (1st Cir. 2003) ("Certainly, the unlawfulness of entering a person's home to effectuate a warrantless arrest in the absence of exigent circumstances was clearly established at the time of Tower's arrest in January 2001. . . But the qualified immunity inquiry demands that we ask a second, more specific question: would a reasonable officer have known that it was unlawful to enter the home under the specific circumstances faced? . . Maine law largely answers this question. By statute, an arresting officer 'need not have the warrant in [his] possession at the time of the arrest.' Me. R.Crim. P. 4(c)(3). It is uncontested that Peary was told by a court employee that a valid warrant had issued. The district court concluded, as do we, that it was reasonable for defendants to rely on the representation of a district court official, and that a reasonable actor would have believed that the warrant had issued. The Towers argue that the district court improperly failed to engage in an analysis of the defendants' subjective intent and absence of 'good faith.' In evaluating the officer's conduct, 'we do not focus on the official's subjective state of mind, such as bad faith or malicious intention ... we [must instead] make an objective analysis of the reasonableness of conduct in light of the facts actually known to the officer and not consider the individual officer's subjective assessment of those facts. Nor are actual motives for conduct to be considered in evaluating a qualified immunity defense.' Sheehy v. Town of Plymouth, 191 F.3d 15, 19 (1st Cir.1999) (internal quotations omitted) (quoting Floyd v. Farrell, 765 F.2d 1, 4-6 (1st Cir.1985)); see also Harlow, 457 U.S. at 818, 102 S.Ct. 2727. Because objectively reasonable officers would not have known they were violating the Towers' Fourth Amendment rights by entering their home, the defendants enjoy qualified immunity.").

Tang v. State of Rhode Island, 120 F.3d 325, 327, 328 (1st Cir. 1997) ("We think that the Harlow-Anderson objective test does not automatically resolve a qualified immunity defense in favor of the defendant in a case of alleged racial discrimination or retaliation. The essence of such claims, or at least one standard version, is that official actions that might otherwise be defended as reasonable become illegitimate when taken out of racial bias or in revenge for a prior complaint. . . . To employ a wholly objective test would wipe out many, if not most, of these claims. The objective test focuses on the reasonableness of the official's conduct independent of motive. It is rarely going to be manifestly unreasonable, judged apart from motive, to assign particular tasks to an employee, move her file cabinet, alter her parking arrangements or do most of the things of which Tang complains. But because of special constitutional or statutory protections, some motives can convert relatively minor slights into causes of action. . . . An unresolved tension exists between such specific-intent torts and the objective Harlow-Anderson qualified immunity test. That test was designed to meet, not claims of racial bias or retaliation, but rather ill- founded allegations that an official action was "malicious" or taken "in bad faith"– characterizations that defeated qualified immunity at common law. . . In all events, the circuit courts have almost uniformly refused to apply a strictly objective test of qualified immunity in racial and retaliation cases.")

Broderick v. Roache, 996 F.2d 1294, 1297-98 (1st Cir. 1993) (holding that the district court did not err in taking into consideration defendant's intent in course of qualified immunity analysis, where state of mind was an essential component of plaintiff's underlying constitutional claim).

Feliciano-Angulo v. Rivera-Cruz, 858 F.2d 40, 46 (1st Cir. 1988) ("Harlow will not bar inquiry into a defendant's state of mind when the applicable law makes the defendant's state of mind . . . an essential element of plaintiff's constitutional claim.).

Facey v. Dickhaut, No. CA 11-10680-MLW, 2014 WL 8105164, at *21-22 (D. Mass. Sept. 30, 2014) ("Some courts have found that the qualified immunity analysis and the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference analysis fold into each other, reasoning that a reasonable officer would know that conduct amounting to deliberate indifference violates the Eighth Amendment. [collecting cases] However, neither the First Circuit nor the Supreme Court has decided whether qualified immunity poses a discrete question from deliberate indifference. Assuming, without deciding, that the question of whether a prison official's conduct violates 'clearly established law' for purposes of qualified immunity is a question distinct from whether the officer acted with deliberate indifference under the Eighth Amendment, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a reasonable official in the defendants' position would have known that his conduct violated the plaintiff's clearly established Eighth Amendment rights. As of 2010, when Facey was attacked, it was clearly established that prison officials violate a prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights when they knowingly place him at a substantial risk of attack from other inmates. [citing cases] Most significantly, in 1994, in Farmer, 511 U.S. at 842–44, the Supreme Court held that prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they knowingly place a prisoner in a setting that puts the prisoner at a substantial risk of violent assault from another inmate. . . . Like Farmer, Facey has presented evidence that would allow a reasonable jury to find that the defendants knowingly placed him at a substantial risk of being attacked by other inmates and that they violated Facey's clearly established Eighth Amendment rights. Therefore, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Thayer v. Dion, No. 2: 09-cv-00435-DBH, 2010 WL 4961739, at * 16 (D. Me. Nov. 30, 2010) ("I agree with the defendants that there is a potential for an entitlement to qualified immunity under the Fourth Amendment standard even though there is sufficient evidence to warrant a trial on the Saucier v. Katz-esque [footnote omitted]excessive force claim in the absence of the immunity defense. [footnote omitted] However, it baffles me how a court could reach a conclusion that even though there was sufficient evidence that the force was applied impermissibly because it was motivated by a desire to punish or was malicious or sadistic the defendants are still entitled to summary judgment because 'the contour of the right' was not sufficiently clear and objectively a reasonable officer would not have understood that applying force to punish contravened the clearly established law. . . . The defendants' argument on this score comes very close to a suggestion that given the misbehavior of Thayer, they thought a reasonable officer would think he or she could get away' with the application of a little punitive, rights-violating force.")

Hrichak v. Kennebec County Sheriff, No. 06-59-B-W, 2007 WL 1170778, at 6-8 (D.Me. Apr. 18, 2007) ("[T]he defendants argue that the absence of probable cause for an arrest is a required element of a claim alleging retaliatory arrest, just as it is for a claim alleging retaliatory prosecution as indicated in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, __, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 1706-07 (2006). . . . There is a Circuit split on the question of whether or not, what is now the Hartman rule, of pleading and proving the absence of probable cause applies to retaliatory arrests. [citing cases] I am simply not convinced that the rationale of Hartman applies to a claim such as Hrichak's against the arresting officers involved in a spur-of-the-moment, warrantless arrest. . . . Even if Pion and Durham, under one version of the facts, were motivated by a desire to retaliate against Hrichak because of his threat to complain to federal authorities, they still claim they are entitled to qualified immunity for their actions because of the probable cause for the arrest. . . . . Tatro v. Kervin, 41 F.3d 9 (1st Cir.1994) and the 'but-for' test has been the clearly established law regarding retaliatory arrests in this circuit for over ten years. . . . As explained above, if the court considers the deposition testimony cited in his memorandum, there is a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether there was violation of a clearly established constitutional right. The difficult analysis occurs under the third prong of the First Circuit qualified immunity standard as it requires the court to determine whether 'it would have been clear to an objectively reasonable official, situated similarly to [these defendants], that the actions taken or omitted contravened the clearly established right.'. . Thus, I find myself in the uncomfortable situation of assessing whether a police officer who under one version of the facts made a decision to arrest an individual because he wanted to prevent that individual from exercising his First Amendment rights, acted as an objectively reasonable police officer given the indisputable probable cause for the arrest. . . . .The propriety of conferring Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982) qualified immunity in this sort of 'intent-based' constitutional tort is anything but clear based upon the majority opinion in Crawford-El. . . . I conclude however, under the facts and circumstances of this case, even if there is some evidence which would support a finding of improper motive, given the indisputable probable cause for the arrest and subsequent guilty plea by Hrichak, Pion and Durham are entitled to qualified immunity.").

See also Ligeri v. Rhode Island , 2007 WL 3072061, at *9 (D.R.I. Oct. 19, 2007) ("In Tatro v. Kervin, 41 F.3d 9, 18 (1st Cir.1994), the First Circuit opined on the standard of proof in a § 1983 action alleging First Amendment violations by a police officer. It held that the plaintiff in such a case 'need only show that the officer's intent or desire to curb the [protected] expression was the determining or motivating factor in making the arrest, in the sense that the officer would not have made the arrest "but for" that determining factor.' . . . The Cranston Defendants also neglect to address the application to this case of the Supreme Court's holding in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 255-56 (2006), that a plaintiff in a § 1983 retaliatory prosecution claim must prove a lack of probable cause. In Hrichak v. Kennebec County Sheriff, No. 06-59-B-W, 2007 WL 1229404 (D. Me. April 24, 2007), the District Court considered the question of whether the Hartman probable cause rule extended to a claim of First Amendment retaliatory arrest. The Court noted that the First Circuit had not yet addressed the question and that there is currently a Circuit split on the question. Id. at *7 (collecting cases). The Cranston Defendants have simply not sufficiently addressed any of the legal issues arising out of Plaintiff's First Amendment retaliation claim. An additional complicating issue is that Plaintiff's claim is one for a retaliatory ticket rather than a retaliatory arrest or criminal prosecution. The bottom line is that the Cranston Defendants have not adequately briefed the issue and thus have not met their burden under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) of demonstrating a failure to state a claim.")

Pelletier v. Magnusson, 195 F. Supp.2d 214, 241 (D. Me. 2002) ("Because the deliberate indifference standard is subjective, asking whether the defendant consciously disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm, . . . it cannot be said that should Pelletier demonstrate that the defendants acted with a deliberate indifference to Ronald's medical care and physical safety that the defendants nonetheless reasonably believed that their conduct was lawful.").

SECOND CIRCUIT

Frierson v. Reinisch, 806 F.App'x 54, __ (2d Cir. 2020) ("Defendants fault the District Court for denying them qualified immunity based on the presence of disputed facts concerning Defendants' subjective motivations for banning Frierson. Citing the Supreme Court's decision in Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998), Defendants assert that subjective motives are 'simply irrelevant to th[e] qualified immunity defense.'. . Accordingly, Defendants contend, it made no difference to the merits of their immunity defense whether the ban was motivated by a (legitimate) desire to protect the players' safety or an (unlawful) intent to punish Frierson for expressing negative views about Coach Bearup. In so arguing, Defendants misunderstand Crawford-El and its progeny. As we explained in Locurto v. Safir, '[i]n the usual case where intent is not an element [of the plaintiff's constitutional claim], ... the qualified immunity doctrine focuses only on whether the government official's actions were objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law, without regard for possible subjective malice.'. . But where a specific illegal intent is an element of the plaintiff's claim, factual disputes over whether the defendant acted with that intent will preclude the district court from granting qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. . . To hold otherwise, we observed, 'would effectively immunize all defendants in cases involving motive-based constitutional torts, so long as they could point to objective evidence showing that a reasonable official could have acted on legitimate grounds.'. . Frierson's First Amendment claim in this case is a motive-based constitutional tort. . . That is, whether the ban violated his First Amendment rights turns on whether Defendants imposed the ban to punish Frierson for expressing dissatisfaction about Coach Bearup or for a viewpoint-neutral reason. . . Accordingly, the District Court correctly concluded that Defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity at summary judgment in light of the unresolved factual disputes over Defendants' motivation for banning Frierson from future sporting events.")

Hogan v. Fischer, 738 F.3d 509, 515, 516 (2d Cir. 2013) ("Assuming, as we must, that the factual allegations of the complaint are true, three prison officials wearing masks approached Hogan's cell and proceeded to spray him with a mixture of feces, vinegar, and 'some type [of] machine oil.' The substance burned Hogan's eyes and left Hogan with other physical injuries. We are unwilling to accept, as a matter of law, the proposition that spraying an inmate with a mixture of feces, vinegar, and machine oil constitutes a de minimis use of force. . . .Moreover, even if we were to assume arguendo that the physical force allegedly used was de minimis—though it was not—spraying an inmate with vinegar, excrement, and machine oil in the circumstances alleged here is undoubtedly 'repugnant to the conscience of mankind' and therefore violates the Eighth Amendment. . . .We therefore hold that the district court erred in concluding that the prison officials' alleged use of force was de minimis and not of the sort repugnant to the conscience of mankind. . . The conduct alleged in Hogan's complaint is undoubtedly a form of cruel and unusual punishment proscribed by the Eighth Amendment.")

DiStiso v. Cook, 691 F.3d 226, 240, 241, 245-50 (2d Cir. 2012) ("Since Gant, it has been clearly established law in this circuit that claims of intentional race discrimination can be based on the 'deliberate indifference' of school boards, administrators, and teachers to invidious 'harassment, in the school environment, of a student by other children or parents.' Gant ex rel. Gant v.

Wallingford Bd. of Educ., 195 F.3d at 140 (holding that 'only deliberate indifference to such [racial] harassment can be viewed as [intentional] discrimination by school officials themselves'). . . . Consistent with our obligation to consider a qualified immunity defense 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition,'' Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. at 201, we separately consider the claims that defendants Uccello and Cook were indifferent to racial name-calling directed at Nicholas in kindergarten and the claims that all defendants were indifferent to racially motivated physical misbehavior directed at Nicholas in both kindergarten and first grade. We conclude that qualified immunity is not available to defendants Uccello and Cook in the first context on the evidentiary record set forth by the district court. We conclude, however, that qualified immunity is available as a matter of law in the second context. . . . In sum, there are disputed issues of fact as to each element of plaintiff's claims that Uccello and Cook were deliberately indifferent to kindergarten students' repeated use of racial epithets to belittle Nicholas. Because the district court found the record evidence sufficient to allow each of those elements to be decided in favor of plaintiff, and because we must accept that sufficiency determination on this appeal, Uccello and Cook are not entitled to judgment on the ground of qualified immunity. . . . We reach a different conclusion with respect to plaintiff's claims that defendants were each deliberately indifferent to students' racially motivated physical misbehavior toward Nicholas. In so doing, we identify legal error in the district court's analysis, which appears not to have meaningfully distinguished the second element of a deliberate indifference claim as established by Gant, i.e., a defendant's actual knowledge of student-on-student racial harassment, see Gant ex rel. Gant v. Wallingford Bd. of Educ., 195 F.3d at 141 & n. 6, from the first element, i.e., students' racial harassment of a peer, see id. at 141. Rather, the district court largely elided consideration of the actual knowledge element by relying on an assumption as to the racial harassment element that is not clearly established in law: that evidence of student-on-student racial harassment in any respect can, without more, support an inference that any further student misbehavior directed to the same peer is also racially motivated. That assumption gave rise to another, also not clearly established in law: that evidence of a school official's knowledge of the initial racial harassment is enough, by itself, to permit a finding of his actual knowledge that any further misbehavior was also racially motivated. As we will explain herein, this mistakenly transformed the actual knowledge requirement established by Gant into an imputed knowledge requirement, and imputed knowledge is insufficient as a matter of law to support a claim for deliberate indifference. Where, as in this case, the subsequent misbehavior is of a type routinely engaged in by school children of the age at issue without regard to motivation, there must be some objective evidence linking initial racially hostile acts to such subsequent misbehavior to support a finding that a school official has actual knowledge that the latter behavior, like the former, is racially motivated. . . . To date, no Supreme Court or Second Circuit law clearly establishes that evidence of prior racial name-calling by unidentified kindergarten or first-grade students suffices to demonstrate that any subsequent physical misbehavior directed at the same classmate is also racially motived. Indeed, we conclude that something more is necessary to support an inference that a teacher or school official actually knew such subsequent misconduct was racially motivated. . . . In sum, because the record evidence is insufficient, as a matter of law, to support a finding that Uccello actually knew that her kindergarten students' routine physical misbehavior toward Nicholas was racially motivated, Uccello is entitled to an award of summary judgment based on qualified immunity for this part of plaintiff's deliberate indifference claim. . . . For the same reasons already discussed with respect to Uccello and Couture, see supra Part II.D.2.a.(1), no clearly established law permits an inference that Cook had actual knowledge that the complained-of physical misbehavior toward Nicholas in kindergarten or first grade was racially motivated in the absence of some objective evidence connecting the latter misbehavior to the earlier racial name-calling. . . . Because plaintiff's claims of deliberate indifference to physical misbehavior fail at the actual knowledge step of Gant analysis, we need not consider defendants' arguments for qualified immunity based on the final, reasonable response, element of a deliberate indifference claim. . . Any such inquiry would of course require us to assume that plaintiff could prove both that the physical misbehavior was racially motivated and that defendants had actual knowledge of that fact.")

Reuland v. Hynes, 460 F.3d 409, 419, 420 (2d Cir. 2006) ("Because previous cases have recognized and defined the First Amendment right of public employees to be free from retaliation for speech on matters of public concern with reasonable clarity, Hynes would be entitled to qualified immunity only if it was objectively reasonable for him to believe that he could demote an assistant district attorney for making a hyperbolic statement regarding the crime rate without violating that right. . . . Because it would not have been objectively reasonable for Hynes to believe he could demote Reuland in retaliation for his hyperbolic statement to New York magazine, and he did not request that the jury decide if he was motivated by disruption rather than retaliation, Hynes is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Reuland v. Hynes, 460 F.3d 409, 421 (2d Cir. 2006)(Winter, J. dissenting) (" I respectfully dissent. A prosecutor's statement to a magazine about homicide rates within his jurisdiction is not protected by the First Amendment when it was admittedly false, admittedly made without any belief of a basis in fact, and made to promote sales of the prosecutor's novel. . . . Labeling false speech 'hyperbole' does not render it protected. A government employee who purposefully or recklessly misinforms the public about a fact specifically related to his area of employment responsibility in order to profit monetarily should not be rewarded by a money judgment from a federal court when he is demoted. Established First Amendment doctrine provides no support for placing the mantle of victimhood upon such an employee.").

Mandell v. County of Suffolk, 316 F.3d 368, 385 (2d Cir. 2003) ("Where specific intent of a defendant is an element of plaintiff's claim under clearly established law, and plaintiff has adduced sufficient evidence of that intent to defeat summary judgment, summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is inappropriate. . . In the present case retaliatory intent is an element of plaintiff's claim, and we have already noted that plaintiff's evidence of retaliatory animus is sufficient to make defendants' motivation a triable issue of fact. Until that issue is resolved by a factfinder, therefore, the retaliation claim against defendant [police commissioner] cannot be dismissed on qualified immunity grounds.").

Locurto v. Safir, 264 F.3d 154, 168, 169 (2d Cir. 2001) ("Defendants further urge upon us that subjective intent is per se irrelevant to the inquiry into objective reasonableness. But this argument betrays a fundamental misconception of the application of the qualified immunity doctrine to constitutional claims for which intent is an element. In the usual case where intent is not an element, bare allegations of malice coupled with otherwise legitimate government action do not yield a viable constitutional claim. In such a case, the qualified immunity doctrine focuses only on whether the government official's actions were objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law, without regard for possible subjective malice. . . But where a more specific intent is actually an element of the plaintiff's claim as defined by clearly established law, it can never be objectively reasonable for a government official to act with the intent that is prohibited by law.").

Sheppard v. Beerman (Beerman II), 94 F.3d 823, 828 (2d Cir. 1996) ("Sheppard asserts that qualified immunity is not available where he has alleged that Beerman had an actual unconstitutional motive in firing him. To a limited extent, we agree. Contrary to the district court's decision, the employer's actual (subjective) motive is not irrelevant in a qualified immunity inquiry. Rather, where the subjective state of mind of the actor is part of the constitutional mix, we have developed a rule that balances the interests of the official claiming immunity against the interests of the employee asserting unconstitutional motive: Upon a motion for summary judgment asserting a qualified immunity defense in an action in which an official's conduct is objectively reasonable but an unconstitutional subjective intent is alleged, the plaintiff must proffer particularized evidence of direct or circumstantial facts ... supporting the claim of an improper motive in order to avoid summary judgment. [citing Blue] This standard allows an allegedly offending official sufficient protection against baseless and unsubstantiated claims, but stops short of insulating an official whose objectively reasonable acts are besmirched by a prohibited unconstitutional motive.").

Blue v. Koren, 72 F.3d 1075, 1083-84 (2d Cir. 1995) ("The so-called heightened standard has been applied to address the problem of applying the test of "objective reasonableness" prescribed in Harlow [cite omitted] in circumstances where the constitutional claim asserted contains a subjective component. . . . By imposing that standard, courts have sought to reconcile the goal that led to the adoption of the objective test–permitting the dismissal of insubstantial claims involving objectively reasonable official conduct–with the goal of allowing plaintiffs to present claims that depend upon proof of unconstitutional motive. We believe that imposition of a similar standard is an appropriate way to accommodate these competing interests. . . . We agree that plaintiffs must offer specific evidence of improper motivation, but confess considerable doubt as to whether the "heightened" standard is really heightened or is simply an application of the rule that conclusory assertions are insufficient to defeat a motion for summary judgment. [cite omitted] When such a motion is based on assertion of qualified immunity, the first issue is whether a clearly established right is at stake. [cite omitted] If it is, the court must then address whether the conduct was objectively reasonable. If not, the motion must be denied. If the conduct was objectively reasonable, a conclusory proffer of an unconstitutional motive should not defeat the motion for summary judgment. The reasonableness of the conduct is itself substantial evidence in support of the motion and requires in response a particularized proffer of evidence of unconstitutional motive. . . . Accordingly, whether the description heightened is accurate or not, we hold: upon a motion for summary judgment asserting a qualified immunity defense in an action in which an official's conduct is objectively reasonable but an unconstitutional subjective intent is alleged, the plaintiff must proffer particularized evidence of direct or circumstantial facts . . . supporting the claim of an improper motive in order to avoid summary judgment. In our view, the particularized evidence of improper motive may include expressions by the officials involved regarding their state of mind, circumstances suggesting in a substantial fashion that the plaintiff has been singled out, or the highly unusual nature of the actions taken.").

Ismael v. Charles, No. 1:18-CV-3597-GHW, 2020 WL 4003291, at *10 (S.D.N.Y. July 15, 2020) ("The inquiry into whether Sampson, Caruso, and Charles acted maliciously and sadistically is subjective. '[S]ubjective motive plays no part in the qualified immunity inquiry.'. . And when a 'specific intent is actually an element of the plaintiff's claim as defined by clearly established law, it can never be objectively reasonable for a government official to act with the intent that is prohibited by law.'. . So 'a plaintiff need only show particularized evidence of direct or circumstantial facts supporting his claim of unconstitutional motive in order to survive a motion for summary judgment on the defense of qualified immunity.'. . Ismael has met that burden because he has shown facts adequate to raise a dispute about whether Sampson, Caruso, and Charles acted maliciously or sadistically. And there are disputed issues of fact about what took place during the Main Intake Incident. Ismael testified that the officers punched him and bent his hands at the wrist after he was restrained. Ismael also testified that the officers slammed him onto the gurney with excessive force. If true, that is circumstantial evidence that supports Ismael's claim that the officers acted maliciously and sadistically. That is enough to preclude the officers' qualified immunity defense. At bottom, this case reflects the principle that 'granting summary judgment against plaintiffs on excessive force claims is rarely appropriate.'. . As in many—perhaps most—excessive force cases, questions of fact pervade the record on this motion. And those questions must be resolved by the jury.")

Williams v. Koenigsmann, No. 03 Civ. 5267(SAS), 2004 WL 315279, at *6 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 18, 2004) ("Suffice it to say that this is not a case where qualified immunity is an appropriate defense. The right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment is a clearly established constitutional right and this Court cannot find, as a matter of law, that it was objectively reasonable for defendants to believe that withholding pain medication and treatment did not violate that right. Defendants either were deliberately indifferent to plaintiff's serious medical needs or they were not. Qualified immunity simply does not come into the picture.").

Rodriguez v. Ghoslaw, No. 98 CIV. 4658(GEL), 2001 WL 755398, at *8, *9 (S.D.N.Y. July 5, 2001) (not reported) ("A conscientious and diligent public officer should not have to fear that his objectively reasonable decisions will subject him to burdensome litigation, and the risk of actual liability, based on the attribution of subjective bad motives inferred from the testimony of hostile parties. Accordingly, the proper inquiry is whether it was objectively reasonable, under the circumstances facing Ghoslaw, for a corrections officer to decide to refrain from immediate action to separate the fighting inmates. If it was, an officer who chose that course of action should be protected from suit by qualified immunity, even if the particular officer might be found by a jury, if the case were tried, to have acted from unconstitutional motives. . . . [C]ertainly, it would not have been 'clear to a reasonable officer that [waiting for backup before attempting to separate struggling inmates] was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' [citing Saucier] The only factual issue for a jury to resolve in assessing whether the action violated the constitution would be not the reasonableness of Ghoslaw's actions, but whether the apparent reasonableness of Ghoslaw's conduct masked a nefarious motive for inaction. While the defendant's motive is crucial to finding a violation of the Eighth Amendment, it is irrelevant to the issue of qualified immunity. The availability of qualified immunity turns upon the objective reasonableness of Ghoslaw's decision to wait for backup, an issue which may be resolved as a matter of law on summary judgment.")

THIRD CIRCUIT

Monteiro v. City of Elizabeth, 436 F.3d 397, 404, 405 (3d Cir. 2006)("Thus, if Perkins-Auguste acted with an intent to suppress Monteiro's speech on the basis of viewpoint, she violated clearly established law and is not entitled to qualified immunity. In cases in which a constitutional violation depends on evidence of a specific intent, 'it can never be objectively reasonable for a government official to act with the intent that is prohibited by law .' Locurto v. Safir, 264 F.3d 154, 169 (2d Cir.2001). Accordingly, the District Court did not err in holding that whether Perkins-Auguste's conduct violated clearly established law depended upon her motivation for ejecting Monteiro from the meeting. Furthermore, it was not error to submit this question to the jury because there was sufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude that Perkins-Auguste acted with a motive to suppress Monteiro's viewpoint. Although qualified immunity is a question of law determined by the Court, when qualified immunity depends on disputed issues of fact, those issues must be determined by the jury. . . . Motive is a question of fact that must be decided by the jury, which has the opportunity to hear the explanations of both parties in the courtroom and observe their demeanor. . . Monteiro adduced sufficient evidence at trial from which a reasonable jury could conclude that Perkins-Auguste acted with a motive to suppress Monteiro's speech based upon his opposition to the budget.").

Monteiro v. City of Elizabeth, 436 F.3d 407-12 (3d Cir. 2006) (Fisher, J., dissenting) ("The majority characterizes the jury's finding of improper intent as the dispositive inquiry in assessing both the existence of a constitutional violation and entitlement to qualified immunity. This reflects, in my view, a fundamental misunderstanding of the relationship of motive to the First Amendment and the doctrine of qualified immunity. I respectfully dissent. . . . The second stage of the qualified immunity analysis is whether, given the existence of a constitutional violation, a reasonable person should have recognized it under 'clearly established' law. The hypothetical 'reasonable person' is an objective observer, who is aware of the facts known to the official but possesses an independent knowledge of governing legal precepts. . . . Subjective intent plays a limited role in this analysis. It is considered as an element of the underlying claim when the right at issue is predicated on the official's motive, but the presence of improper motive does not preclude qualified immunity. Grant v. City of Pittsburgh, 98 F.3d 116, 124 (3d Cir.1996). An official who has committed a constitutional violation, even one evincing improper intent, will nevertheless be immune from liability if an objective observer in the same position, given the same facts and knowing of the official's improper motive, would not have recognized a constitutional violation under clearly established law. . . The opinion of the majority defines the right at issue in this case too broadly. It states that a public official in Perkins-Auguste's position 'must conform her conduct to the requirements of the First Amendment' and that 'viewpoint-based restrictions violate the First Amendment.' Maj. Op. at 16. These platitudes bear no relationship to the particular circumstances of this case and do little to define the standard governing Perkins-Auguste's conduct. . . The majority cites to no cases discussing whether and when a member of a legislative body may be removed from a public meeting. This failure is understandable, given the dearth of precedent on the issue. . . . I cannot conclude, on this backdrop, that a reasonable official in Perkins-Auguste's position should have realized that her conduct exceeded constitutional bounds. There is no doubt that Monteiro was being disruptive during the meeting and failed to comply with Perkins-Auguste's rulings. . . . His conduct was, in short, antithetical to the legitimate goals of the forum. A reasonable official in the same position as Perkins-Auguste could have concluded, under existing caselaw, that the decision to remove Monteiro was constitutionally justified, regardless of her actual underlying intent. . . She is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . This conclusion does not cast doubt on the jury's verdict, or its findings that Perkins-Auguste was motivated by a desire to retaliate against Monteiro and that a constitutional violation did occur. That an official is granted qualified immunity does not mean that he or she acted laudably or even constitutionally. To the contrary, an official may act in a morally and legally culpable fashion and yet be entitled to immunity if an objective observer, in the same position, would not have recognized a constitutional infringement . . . The mantle of qualified immunity will be denied to a public official only when a reasonable person in the same situation would have recognized a constitutional infringement. Perkins-Auguste's conduct, even if violative of Monteiro's civil rights, was not so patently unconstitutional under existing caselaw as to deny her immunity. The majority concludes to the contrary. It does so based on a fundamental misinterpretation of the relationship of subjective intent to the First Amendment and the doctrine of qualified immunity. This error will, I fear, have unfortunate ramifications for our jurisprudence in these fields. I respectfully dissent.").

Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 (3d Cir. 2001) ("We have determined, however, that the plaintiffs have raised a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Burley was deliberately indifferent. Because deliberate indifference under Farmer requires actual knowledge or awareness on the part of the defendant, a defendant cannot have qualified immunity if she was deliberately indifferent; a reasonable YDC worker could not believe that her actions comported with clearly established law while also believing that there is an excessive risk to the plaintiffs and failing to adequately respond to that risk. Conduct that is deliberately indifferent to an excessive risk to YDC residents cannot be objectively reasonable conduct.").

Larsen v. Senate of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 154 F.3d 82, 94, 95 (3d Cir. 1998) ("The qualified immunity analysis requires a determination as to whether reasonable officials could believe that their conduct was not unlawful even if it was in fact unlawful. . . In the context of a First Amendment retaliation claim, that determination turns on an inquiry into whether officials reasonably could believe that their motivations were proper even when their motivations were in fact retaliatory. Even assuming that this could be demonstrated under a certain set of facts, it is an inquiry that cannot be conducted without factual determinations as to the officials' subjective beliefs and motivations, and thus cannot properly be resolved on the face of the pleadings, but rather can be resolved only after the plaintiff has had an opportunity to adduce evidence in support of the allegations that the true motive for the conduct was retaliation rather than the legitimate reason proffered by the defendants. . . . In reaching this result we are not suggesting that a bare allegation of retaliatory motive necessarily is sufficient to defeat an assertion of qualified immunity as to a retaliation claim. In some circumstances, the legitimate basis for the actions might be so apparent that the plaintiff's allegations of retaliatory motive could not alter the conclusion that under the circumstances alleged in the pleadings, the defendants would have been compelled to reach the same decision even without regard for the protected First Amendment activity.").

Grant v. City of Pittsburgh, 98 F.3d 116, 124 (3d Cir. 1996) ("The City Defendants claim that under Harlow their subjective 'political or personal motives' are irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis. The plaintiffs counter that the City Defendants' formulation of the qualified immunity standard would effectively prevent any plaintiff whose constitutional claim has as an essential element the state of mind of the public officials from ever getting past qualified immunity. Although we have not directly addressed this issue, . . . several of our sister circuits have. Those courts have held, with virtual unanimity, that, despite the broad language of Harlow, courts are not barred from examining evidence of a defendant's state of mind in considering whether a plaintiff has adduced sufficient evidence to withstand summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity, where such state of mind is an essential element of the constitutional violation itself. . . . We therefore join our sister circuits in adopting the narrower view of Harlow. Accordingly, in evaluating a defense of qualified immunity, an inquiry into the defendant's state of mind is proper where such state of mind is an essential element of the underlying civil rights claim.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Thorpe v. Clarke, 37 F.4th 926, 933-41 (4th Cir. 2022) ("Defendants rightly observe that we assess clearly established law at the time the wrong is committed, . . . and in that way, Porter could not strip them of immunity for acts committed before 2019. But they misapprehend the nature of the Eighth Amendment inquiry and with it, Porter's import. Eighth Amendment liability comes into play only where a corrections officer appreciates the harm confinement conditions impose yet chooses to disregard it—but qualified immunity does 'not allow the official who actually knows that he was violating the law to escape liability for his actions.' . . Because Plaintiffs have adequately pleaded Defendants' deliberate indifference, the district court correctly denied qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage. And Porter only buttresses that holding as it helps illustrate that the harm to Plaintiffs was 'obvious'—to explain, that is, why Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged' just such indifference. . . . Here, the Eighth Amendment prohibits only intentional conduct: a minimum of '"deliberate indifference" to inmate health or safety' is required. . . That means correction officers 'must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists' and actually 'draw the inference' before liability attaches. . . It follows that when 'plaintiffs have made a showing sufficient to' demonstrate an intentional violation of the Eighth Amendment, 'they have also made a showing sufficient to overcome any claim to qualified immunity.' Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 n.15 (3d Cir. 2001). '[T]he two inquiries effectively collapse into one.' Delgado-Brunet v. Clark, 93 F.3d 339, 345 (7th Cir. 1996). Dismissal, in other words, remains improper so long as the officers' mental state remains genuinely in issue. That is why, in Ortiz v. Jordan, the Supreme Court declined to grant qualified immunity to officers accused of disregarding prisoner safety where the evidence at trial showed the officers were 'adequately informed' of the danger to Ortiz and could have 'distance[d] Ortiz from the assailant.'. . The controversy here follows the Ortiz blueprint to a tee. Hard as Defendants try to portray their arguments as questioning clearly established law, 'the pre-existing law [is] not in controversy': It has long been established that 'prison official[s] may be held liable for deliberate indifference to a prisoner's Eighth Amendment right to protection against [inhumane conditions] while in custody if the official knows that the inmate faces a substantial risk of serious harm and disregards that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it.'. . What Defendants actually demur is that they did not know, until this Court's decision in Porter, that the solitary-confinement conditions they promulgated posed 'a substantial risk of serious harm' in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . They may well end up on the winning side of that argument after the evidence comes in, but for now, these 'fact[ual]' issues compel us to move this case forward, . . . unless Defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity appears on 'the face of the complaint[.]'. . . Defendants advance no argument to defeat these long-accepted pleading practices. They ask instead that we shift frames and focus not on their mental state but on the first, objective prong of the Eighth Amendment analysis. They suggest we apply qualified immunity to just that prong, hold that it was not clearly established by 2012 that long-term isolation violated the Eighth Amendment, and dismiss the case before ever reaching the subjective prong. But such a dissociative approach misconceives the purpose of the objective prong and would crumble foundational qualified-immunity precepts . . . . Defendants' arguments were presumably inspired by how courts analyze qualified immunity in the Fourth Amendment context. . . . That a reasonable corrections officer might not have known, before Porter, that isolation tends to cause severe injuries, simply does not bear on whether these officers observed the injuries these Plaintiffs have pleaded and drew appropriate inferences as to what caused those injuries. We recognize the Ninth Circuit takes a different tack, applying qualified immunity separately to each Eighth Amendment prong. . . But the court's analysis fails to persuade us. . . . An officer, the court believes, 'could know all of the facts yet mistakenly, but reasonably' 'draw the inference' that no substantial risk of serious harm exists. . . That conclusion is at odds with itself. To be deliberately indifferent, an officer must not only know of the confinement conditions but also accurately assess the risk that those conditions deprive a prisoner of minimal civilized necessities. . . . Beyond these conceptual inconsistencies, the Ninth Circuit's approach writes the subjective inquiry out of the Eighth Amendment and with it, all assessment of Defendants' conduct. It thus unravels qualified immunity's very justification, like a loose stitch unravels the entire garment. . . So, we side instead with the Third, Seventh, and Eighth Circuits and decline to grant qualified immunity on just the first, objective prong where Plaintiffs satisfactorily plead Defendants' deliberate indifference because Defendants 'could not believe that [their] actions comported with clearly established law while also believing that there is an excessive risk to the plaintiffs and failing to adequately respond to that risk.'. . Reframing the argument yet again, Defendants additionally object we cannot define prisoners' rights at too-high a level of generality. It is not enough, Defendants insist, to say the law clearly prohibited a knowing disregard of a serious injury: 'To be clearly established,' the law 'must be sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates' the Eighth Amendment. . . And, according to Defendants, no reasonable officer would have understood that until Porter decided isolation alone can cause severe injury. This argument suffers from the same flaw as Defendants' call to sever the two Eighth Amendment prongs: It overlooks the fact that Eighth Amendment liability hinges on whether an officer deliberately ignores the harms confinement conditions cause. As we have posited in the related context of excessive-force claims under the Eighth Amendment, 'because an officer necessarily will be familiar with his own mental state, he "reasonably should know" that he is violating the law if he acts with a prohibited motive.'. . . [W]hile the Court has regularly insisted on highly particularized law in the Fourth Amendment context, it has not done the same with Eighth Amendment claims. . . . Insistence on finding precedent that held the same exact confinement conditions invalid also transforms the objective prong into something that it is not. The Eighth Amendment 'does not prohibit cruel and unusual prison conditions.'. . It asks instead whether the conditions of confinement inflict harm that is, objectively, sufficiently serious to deprive a prisoner of minimal civilized necessities. . . . Defendants cannot protect themselves based on the failure of other plaintiffs in other cases to demonstrate severe enough harm when in this case, Plaintiffs have adequately pleaded both that they suffered extreme injuries and that Defendants were aware of them. The district court was right to deny immunity and give Plaintiffs the opportunity to prove Defendants deliberately inflicted the harm. For qualified immunity cannot shield them if they did.") Brooks v. Johnson, 924 F.3d 104, 115-20 & n.6 (4th Cir. 2019) ("In sum, whether or not the first use of the taser, standing alone, would give rise to any inference of malice, a reasonable jury viewing the three shocks together – three uses of an instrument designed to inflict excruciating pain in under 70 seconds – could infer 'wantonness in the infliction of pain," intended not to restore order and induce compliance, but to punish Brooks for his belligerence. . . .Here, we hold only that it is for a jury to decide whether the degree of force used against Brooks was disproportionate to the need for his picture in a way that could raise an inference of impermissible '[p]unitive intent[.]'. . . [B]ecause this case arises under Whitley's subjective standard, we have no occasion to consider whether a hypothetical and objectively reasonable officer could have used a taser against Brooks – once, twice, or three times – in order to compel his compliance with the Detention Center's photograph policy. . . The only question here is whether these officers actually did use force to induce compliance, or whether, as Brooks alleges, they used force 'wantonly' and 'maliciously' for the purpose of punishing him. Because the record contains evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer a malicious and therefore excessive use of force, the district court erred in deciding this question as a matter of law. . . . The officers contend that qualified immunity attaches because there are no cases from the Supreme Court or our circuit finding an Eighth Amendment violation under circumstances sufficiently analogous to those presented here and, as a result, Brooks's right to be free from Sergeant Johnston's multiple uses of a taser was not 'clearly established.'. . We note at the outset that this is the unusual qualified immunity case in which we are dealing with a constitutional violation that has 'wrongful intent' as an element. . . If Johnston violated Brooks's rights, that is, then she did so because she used force in subjective bad faith, maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . That state of mind is relevant to the qualified immunity analysis, as we have explained: Because 'the case law is intent-specific,' clearly establishing that the bad faith and malicious use of force violates the Eighth Amendment rights of prison inmates, a corrections officer who acts with that culpable state of mind reasonably should know that she is violating the law . . . . Like other circuits, we long have recognized the 'special problem' raised when the objective qualified immunity standard is applied to an Eighth Amendment violation that requires wrongful intent in the form of 'deliberate indifference' to a prisoner's medical needs. See Rish v. Johnson, 131 F.3d 1092, 1098 n.6 (4th Cir. 1997); see also Cox, 828 F.3d at 238 n.4 (collecting cases). Thompson [v. Virginia, 878 F.3d 89 (4th Cir. 2017)] makes clear that the same issue arises with respect to Eighth Amendment excessive force claims, which likewise require wrongful intent. . . . [T]he defendants in this case cannot establish a lack of 'fair notice' that the use of a taser against Brooks – assuming, as we do for purposes of this alternative argument, that a jury finds that Johnston acted with wrongful and malicious motive – constituted excessive force under the Whitley standard. At the time of the events in question, it was clearly established that a corrections officer's use of force in bad faith – not to preserve order or induce compliance, but to punish through the 'wanton infliction of pain' – violates an inmate's Eighth Amendment right. . . Johnston also would have had the benefit of cases from this circuit making clear, at a high 'level of specificity,'. . . that her multiple uses of a taser against Brooks, under the circumstances of this case, could give rise to an inference of 'wanton[ ] punish[ment],'. . . in violation of Whitley's subjective component. . . . In short, we find that Johnston was on 'fair notice' of Brooks's right not to be subjected to excessive force in the form of the wanton infliction of pain, intended to punish rather than to induce compliance. Accordingly, the defendants are not entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds on this basis, as they argue in the alternative on appeal. We therefore vacate the district court's grant of summary judgment for the defendants.")

Scinto v. Stansberry, 841 F.3d 219, 236 n.9 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Although we need not reach the issue here, we note once again the 'special problem' of ' "applying an objective qualified immunity standard in the context of an Eighth Amendment claim that is satisfied only by a showing of deliberate indifference"-that is, a knowing violation of the law.'. .Some Circuits have resolved this problem by concluding that qualified immunity is unavailable when the plaintiff presents a genuine dispute of material fact regarding the defendant's deliberate indifference. The Seventh Circuit, for example, has held that the subjective prong of the Farmer test and the objective, clearly established prong of the qualified immunity test 'effectively collapse into one' when the plaintiff raises genuine factual disputes regarding the defendant's deliberate indifference. Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir. 2002). That court explained that when a plaintiff raises genuine disputes of fact on Farmer's subjective prong, 'a defendant may not avoid trial on the grounds of qualified immunity' even though qualified immunity protects covered government officials from suit, not merely from liability. . . see also, e.g., Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 n.15 (3d Cir. 2001) ("[T]o the extent that the plaintiffs have made a showing sufficient to overcome summary judgment on the merits [of their deliberate indifference claim], they have also made a showing sufficient to overcome any claim to qualified immunity."). But see Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1049–50 (9th Cir. 2002) (rejecting the view that the deliberate indifference and clearly established inquiries merge).")

Cox v. Quinn, 828 F.3d 227, 238 n.4 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Although we need not reach the issue here, we note that some courts have concluded that it is not necessary to consider the objective reasonableness prong of the qualified immunity inquiry at all when summary judgment is denied on deliberate indifference. See, e.g., Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir. 2002); Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 n.15 (3d Cir. 2001). Prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment through deliberate indifference if they are aware of a substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate, Farmer, 511 U.S. at 837, yet disregard that risk by taking action that they know to be inappropriate, Parrish, 372 F.3d at 303. In other words, for purposes of deliberate indifference, the Eighth Amendment violation must have been committed knowingly. As we have noted in the past, 'applying an objective qualified immunity standard in the context of an Eighth Amendment claim that is satisfied only by a showing of deliberate indifference' — that is, a knowing violation of the law — presents a 'special problem.' Rish v. Johnson, 131 F.3d 1092, 1098 n.6 (4th Cir. 1997). Accordingly, some of our sister circuits have concluded that deliberately indifferent conduct can never be objectively reasonable for purposes of qualified immunity. See Walker, 293 F.3d at 1037 (holding that deliberate indifference and qualified immunity inquiries 'effectively collapse into one' and that '[i]f there are genuine issues of fact concerning' a defendant's deliberate indifference, the 'defendant may not avoid trial on the grounds of qualified immunity'); Beers-Capitol, 256 F.3d at 142 n.15 ('Conduct that is deliberately indifferent to an excessive risk to [juvenile detention center] residents cannot be objectively reasonable conduct.'). But see Estate of Ford v.Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1049–50 (9th Cir. 2002) (rejecting approach that 'collapses the deliberate indifference part of the constitutional inquiry into the qualified immunity inquiry').")

Williams v. Hansen, 326 F.3d 569, 581 (4th Cir. 2003) ("[W]e are dealing with an alleged equal protection violation predicated on the circumstance that Hansen caused only black officers to be initially interviewed with respect to possible discrimination. In applying Anderson we recognize that cases need not be identical for a public officer to be charged that on the basis of precedent he should have recognized that his conduct violated a right that was clearly established. . . But still it would be a remarkable extension of equal protection principles to hold that the very act of questioning the members of a racial group as to whether they perceived discrimination against the members of that group was in itself unlawful. We are not aware of any case from the Supreme Court or this court that comes close to making such a holding and, in fact, the plaintiffs and the amici curiae do not supply us with any from other jurisdictions. In the circumstances, we cannot reasonably hold that Hansen objectively should have known that his conduct was unlawful when he directed Moyd and Shambley to question only black officers about discrimination against blacks. A reasonable person in Hansen's position was entitled to obtain his legal guidance from law books rather than a crystal ball. Thus, the equal protection right that plaintiffs advance was not clearly established when Hansen directed that the black officers be interviewed and he is entitled to summary judgment on this ground . . . .").

Williams v. Hansen, 326 F.3d 569, 587 (4th Cir. 2003) (King, J., dissenting) ("When Hansen instituted this investigation almost a quarter of a century after the Supreme Court rendered its decision in Arlington Heights, it was eminently well established that a facially neutral administrative action that is undertaken with an intent to discriminate against a particular racial group is forbidden by the Constitution. Accordingly, the district court did not err in denying Hansen qualified immunity from the plaintiffs' equal protection claims. . . . [A] reasonable person in Hansen's position could make no mistake that to adopt with discriminatory animus a facially neutral policy that subjected all and only the African- Americans in his Department to investigation, would be to violate the equal protection rights of the targeted officers.").

Pritchett v. Alford, 973 F.2d 307, 315 (4th Cir. 1992) ("Illegal motive on the officer's part need not also be shown...to defeat a qualified immunity defense to a Fourth Amendment claim which itself has no motive element.").

Blankenship v. Warren County, Va., 918 F. Supp. 970, 975-76 (W.D. Va. 1996) ("The instant civil action alleges that the Sheriff impermissibly terminated the plaintiff based upon gender-based animus, and consideration of the Sheriff's subjective motivation is an integral component to the plaintiff's claim. The Sheriff is not entitled to a dismissal based upon the defense of qualified immunity at this stage in the proceeding. . . . The court believes that where the substantive claim requires inquiry into the subjective motivation of the public official, then a defense on the ground of qualified immunity is best decided on a motion for summary judgment after full discovery has been completed.").

Harris v. Wood, No. CIV A 92-0108, 1994 WL 162556, *5 (W.D. Va. April 22, 1994) (not reported) ("In Collinson, Judge Phillips acknowledged the difficulty encountered by other courts in applying the objective component of the test for qualified immunity because a First Amendment claim turns on both the defendant's subjective intent and on the objective reasonableness of his beliefs. Id. at 1001. The court agrees with Plaintiffs that a genuine issue of material fact surrounds [defendant's] motive in discharging Plaintiffs and that the parties disagree as to the reasons behind the decision. Plaintiffs have provided specific evidence of Defendant's improper motive, and Defendant has failed to convince this court that he would have made the decision regardless of Plaintiffs' speech. Consequently, resolution of this issue shall be in the hands of the reasonable fact-finder. . . .").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Oliver v. Arnold, No. 20-20215, 2021 WL 5917124, at *11-14 (5th Cir. Dec. 15, 2021) (Elrod, J., joined by Jones, Smith, Duncan, Engelhardt, and Wilson, JJ., dissenting from the denial of en banc rehearing) ("Can a teacher in the Fifth Circuit be held liable for money damages for giving an in-class writing assignment? Until now, no. The district court, the panel majority, and the concurring opinion do not identify a single case where this has happened before—not in the Fifth Circuit, not anywhere else. Yet somehow each finds a way to deny Arnold qualified immunity. Federal judges should not be in the business of policing the lesson plans of public-school teachers. But even when we must, qualified immunity should protect a teacher who (until now) could not have known that his conduct violated a student's constitutional rights. Thus, I respectfully dissent. . . . Importantly and problematically, the panel majority rested its conclusion on the district court's finding a factual dispute about Arnold's 'impure motive' in giving this assignment. . . But for qualified-immunity purposes, 'a particular defendant's subjective state of mind has no bearing on whether that defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.' Thompson v. Upshur County, 245 F.3d 447, 457 (5th Cir. 2001). Granted, under some circumstances we do consider subjective intent, like with race discrimination or First Amendment retaliation claims. Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 373 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc). But as those examples indicate, we do so when an official's subjective state of mind is an element of the claim—for race discrimination, motive is key; for First Amendment retaliation, adverse action must be because of the plaintiff's protected speech. But in determining whether speech was compelled in violation of the First Amendment, motive is irrelevant. To establish that her speech was compelled in violation of the First Amendment, Oliver does not have to show that Arnold intended to make her pledge loyalty to America. . . The focus of our inquiry is not the teacher's motive, but the student's compelled act. . . Otherwise, the vindication of a student's constitutional rights hinges on a teacher's earnestness rather than the objective reasonableness of the teacher's actions. True, this approach provides Oliver a short-term win: She may proceed to trial on her claims. But in the long-run, students lose. Because a student must now prove her educator's 'impure motive,' a student is much less likely to prevail at the end of the day. . . Our sister circuits have wisely steered clear of this improper-motive path. In the Fourth Circuit, a teacher can require a student to write out the Five Pillars of Islam so long as the student is not required to 'profess or accept the tenets of Islam.' Wood v. Arnold, 915 F.3d 308, 319 (4th Cir. 2019). In the Third Circuit, a teacher may force a student to 'speak or write on a particular topic even though the student may prefer a different topic,' provided that the teacher does not 'demand that a student profess beliefs or views with which the student does not agree.' C.N. v. Ridgewood Bd. of Ed., 430 F.3d 159, 187 (3d Cir. 2005). And in the Ninth Circuit, a teacher can make a student 'write a paper from a particular viewpoint, even if it is a view-point with which the student disagrees, so long as the requirement serves a legitimate pedagogical purpose.' Brown v. Li, 308 F.3d 939, 953 (9th Cir. 2002). . . . In the meantime, teachers in the Fifth Circuit are left in the lurch. How are they to know whether their lesson plans conflict with 'fixed star[s]' in our 'constitutional constellation'? Read at the interstellar level of generality, qualified immunity provides no safe harbor. I respectfully dissent from the denial of en banc rehearing.")

Oliver v. Arnold, No. 20-20215, 2021 WL 5917124, at *14, *18 (5th Cir. Dec. 15, 2021) (Duncan, J., joined by Jones (except part III), Smith, Elrod, Engelhardt, and Wilson, JJ., dissenting from denial of en banc rehearing) ("In our circuit, public school teachers can make students pledge allegiance to Mexico but can't make students write down our own pledge. The first assignment is a 'cultural and educational exercise,' Brinsdon v. McAllen Indep. Sch. Dist., 863 F.3d 338, 349 (5th Cir. 2017), but the second is a compelled patriotic statement forbidden by the First Amendment. Oliver v. Arnold, 3 F.4th 152, 159–60 (5th Cir. 2021). A teacher who gives the first assignment merits qualified immunity, but a teacher who gives the second will have to convince a jury he had a 'pedagogical purpose.'. . I assume the reverse is also true. So, a teacher can make students pledge allegiance to the American Flag as a 'cultural and educational exercise' but can't make students write down the Mexican pledge if he wants to promote el Patriotismo. Our law in this area is, in other words, a dumpster fire. We should have taken this case en banc to put it out. Then we could have addressed in a more coherent way how the First Amendment applies to student speech and public school curricula, an important and developing field. . . For reasons that baffle me, a majority of my colleagues declines the opportunity. . . . Here, the panel accepts an unprecedented application of Barnette that warps the compelled speech doctrine, splits with another circuit, and sets up federal judges and juries as arbiters of whether teachers should pay damages for giving 'non-pedagogical' assignments. A majority of the court unwisely declines to stop this misbegotten experiment in its tracks. I respectfully dissent from denial of en banc rehearing.")

Heaney v. Roberts, 846 F.3d 795, 802 n.3 (5th Cir. 2017) ("Roberts argues that the district court was wrong to assume, as a factual matter, that Roberts acted with improper motive because the 'test for the application of qualified immunity does not involve a look into the subjective intent of the official, but instead looks at what a reasonable official would know or think.' The Supreme Court addressed the issue of unconstitutional motive in Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998). The Court explained that 'although evidence of improper motive is irrelevant on the issue of qualified immunity, it may be an essential component of the plaintiff's affirmative case.' Id. at 589. While Roberts is correct that qualified immunity presents a question of law to be determined by the court, 'when qualified immunity depends on disputed issues of fact, those issues must be determined by the jury.' Monteiro v. City of Elizabeth, 436 F.3d 397, 405 (3d Cir. 2006). Indeed, Crawford-El recognized that that there is a 'wide array of different federal law claims for which an official's motive is a necessary element' and that there should be no heightened burden on plaintiffs at the summary judgment phase to prove improper motive.")

Lauderdale v. Texas Dept. Of Criminal Justice, Institutional Div., 2007 WL 4465204, at *6 (5th Cir. Dec. 21, 2007) ("Given that actionable sexual harassment under title VII must be 'objectively ... offensive,' . . . such behavior cannot be 'objectively reasonable' for purposes of the qualified immunity inquiry. Thus, qualified immunity can never offer protection for sexual harassment because, if it is actionable at all, the harassment is by definition objectively offensive and unreasonable, and qualified immunity protects only the 'objectively reasonable,' County of Comal, 400 F.3d at 289 (citing Hare, 135 F.3d at 325). Because we have already determined that Arthur's alleged behavior is actionable under title VII and § 1983, we have necessarily determined that such behavior was objectively offensive and, therefore, not objectively reasonable. Thus, he is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 372, 373 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc) ("We close our discussion of qualified immunity by noting that, contrary to the position asserted by the Police Officials, the district court's review of the reasons for the Police Officials' boycott does not mean that the lower court, or this court, has engaged in a 'subjective' analysis of the type condemned in Harlow. The Police Official's position, apparently, is that they are entitled to qualified immunity as long as there exists some conceivable set of reasons that would have made their actions appropriate. Such factual scenarios doubtless exist. It would have been permissible for the Police Officials to pull their students out of Kinney's and Hall's classes if (for instance) the Police Officials learned that the instructors were unskilled. Therefore, the Police Officials suggest, we necessarily engage in a forbidden 'subjective' inquiry if we take cognizance of a genuine dispute over the reasons for their actions against the instructors. What the defendants' approach would mean, of course, is that there can never be liability for any violation for which the elements include the official's intent or reasons for action. Most § 1983 claims do not include such an element, but First Amendment retaliation claims do: The First Amendment protects employees only from 'termination because of their speech on matters of public concern,'. . . not from termination simpliciter. Similarly, the Constitution forbids officials from discriminating on the basis of race only when their discrimination is intentional. . . In such cases, reading Harlow as forbidding all discussion of intent would allow the qualified immunity defense to preclude recovery even when the law was clearly established, for plaintiffs would be barred from proving an essential legal element of their case.").

Cantu v. Jones, 293 F.3d 839, 845 (5th Cir. 2002) (To extent that jury determined that prison officials had deliberately allowed another prisoner to escape and to perpetrate assault upon plaintiff in retaliation for his act of filing complaints about certain guards, officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from civil rights liability.)

Thompson v. Upshur County, 245 F.3d 447, 459, 460 (5th Cir. 2001) ("At the outset, we highlight the importance of appreciating the difference between the objective reasonableness standard for qualified immunity set forth in Part II, supra, and the subjective deliberate indifference standard for section 1983 liability set forth in Part IV, supra. These standards are often confused. See Hare III, 135 F.3d at 327- 28. Examples of behavior that does (and does not) constitute deliberate indifference are relevant in assessing the scope of clearly established law and, therefore, are relevant in determining whether the defendants' actions were objectively reasonable. Id. However, when the defendant moves for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, it is the plaintiff's burden to demonstrate that all reasonable officials similarly situated would have then known that the alleged acts of the defendants violated the United States Constitution. . . . That is different from the burden of establishing a genuine issue as to the defendant's deliberately indifferent subjective state of mind.When assessing the scope of clearly established law for step two, it is necessary to articulate the asserted constitutional right more specifically.").

Jacobs v. West Feliciana Sheriff's Dep't, 228 F.3d 388, 394 (5th Cir. 2000) ("In Hare III, we explained the somewhat confusing relationship between the deliberate indifference and objective reasonableness standards . . . . [W]e are to determine whether, in light of the facts as viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the conduct of the individual defendants was objectively unreasonable when applied against the deliberate indifference standard.").

Mendenhall v. Riser, 213 F.3d 226, 231 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[W]e are compelled by our case law that clearly dictates subjective intent, motive, or even outright animus are irrelevant in a determination of qualified immunity based on arguable probable cause to arrest, just as an officer's good intent is irrelevant when he contravenes settled law.").

Tompkins v. Vickers, 26 F.3d 603, 607 (5th Cir. 1994) ("Every Circuit that has considered the question has concluded that a public official's motive or intent must be considered in the qualified immunity analysis where unlawful motivation or intent is a critical element of the alleged constitutional violation." citing cases).

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Bishop v. Hackel, 636 F.3d 757, 772 (6th Cir. 2011) ("A government official performing a discretionary function is entitled to qualified immunity on summary judgment unless the facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, would permit a reasonable juror to find that: (1) the defendant violated a constitutional right; and (2) the right was clearly established. . . An inmate's right to be free from violence at the hands of other prisoners was clearly established at the time of the alleged constitutional violation. . . Thus, the main issue in this case is whether any of the Deputies violated Bishop's constitutional rights. To raise a cognizable constitutional claim for deliberate indifference to an inmate's safety, an inmate must make a two-part showing: (1) the alleged mistreatment was objectively serious; and (2) the defendant subjectively ignored the risk to the inmate's safety. . . Bishop was young, small, and mentally ill; and he was incarcerated with Floyd, who was jailed for violent felonies including sexual assault. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Bishop, he raises an issue of fact as to whether the alleged mistreatment was objectively serious. Because Bishop raises an issue of fact as to whether Stanley subjectively ignored a risk to his safety, the district court's denial of qualified immunity to him is AFFIRMED. However, because Bishop fails to raise an issue of fact as to whether Harrell, Anderman, or Cantea subjectively ignored a risk to his safety, the district court's denial of qualified immunity to them is REVERSED.")

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. City of Springboro, 477 F.3d 807, 831 n.16 (6th Cir. 2007) ("As a general rule, a claimant cannot defeat qualified immunity merely by leveling 'bare allegations of malice' against government officials. . . However, 'an essential element of some constitutional claims is a charge that the defendant's conduct was improperly motivated.' Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 588 (1998). Where improper motivation constitutes an element of the claim–as in the case of Plaintiffs' First Amendment retaliation claims–and the claimant has shown all other elements, a question of fact remains as to the official's intent, thereby precluding summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. Post Crawford-El, it remains an open question whether inquiry into motive 'unrelated to the knowledge of the law' in the Fourth Amendment context can similarly be taken to preclude summary judgment. Because we need not explore Defendants' motivations in detaining Plaintiffs to find that Defendants do not merit the protection of qualified immunity, we leave that question for another day.").

McKee v. Turner, No. 96-3446, 1997 WL 525680, *4 (6th Cir. Aug. 25, 1997) (unpublished) (concluding "that Farmer's deliberate indifference analysis precludes the application of qualified immunity to this case.").

Wright v. Jefferson County Police Department, 14 F.3d 603 (Table), 1993 WL 503748, *3 (6th Cir. 1993) ("The subjective views of the officers are irrelevant for purposes of determining qualified immunity to a section 1983 action based on an unreasonable search and seizure. However, when intent is an element of the substantive claim, the court must examine the officer's intent under a qualified immunity analysis to determine if he has violated 'clearly established' law. . . . Plaintiff's allegation that the officers impounded his van in violation of his equal protection rights requires an analysis of the officers' intent when they impounded the van because intent is an element of an equal protection violation.").

Taylor v. Hughes, 26 F.4th 419, 430 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Th[e] parallelism between suppression in the criminal context and liability in the civil context makes sound sense here. An officer who procures a warrant in violation of Franks cannot conduct a search in good faith reliance on the validity of that warrant: inherent in a Franks violation is a finding that the officer knows—or at least reasonably should know—that the warrant is not valid. Here, Officer Hughes violated Franks by guessing at Taylor's address. As such, he reasonably should have known that the warrant was invalid for failure to 'particularly describ[e] the place to be searched.'. . Under these circumstances, it is no stretch to say that 'the affidavit [was] so plainly deficient' that Officer Hughes 'should not have applied for the warrant.'. . He is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity for the search on the basis of his good-faith reliance on the warrant.")

Riccardo v. Rausch, 375 F.3d 521, 526 (7th Cir. 2004) (amending and superseding prior opinion) ("The first two matters (the objective and subjective components of the eighth amendment) are for the jury in the first instance, with appellate review limited to the question whether any reasonable juror could have found that the requisite level of risk existed, and that Rausch knew it. Immunity, however, is a matter of law for the court, to be decided without deference to the jury's resolution–and preferably before the case goes to the jury. . .The district court brushed aside Rausch's invocation of immunity, writing that a guard cannot benefit from immunity if the action taken was not a reasonable response to a risk actually foreseen. That approach, which merges immunity and the merits, is incompatible with Saucier and its predecessors. . . . Immunity protects officials who act at the 'hazy border' . . . between the lawful and the forbidden. That Rausch may have overstepped the line does not mean that every reasonable officer would have been bound to know that Rausch acted improperly. We need not pursue the immunity defense, however, because Saucier calls on appellate courts to address the merits first . . . and Rausch is entitled to prevail outright: no reasonable juror could have concluded, on this record, that Rausch actually recognized that placing Garcia and Riccardo together exposed Riccardo to substantial risk..").

Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir. 2002) ("[A] plaintiff claiming an Eighth Amendment violation must show the defendant's actual knowledge of the threat to the plaintiff's health or safety, the defendant's failure to take reasonable measures, and the defendant's subjective intent to harm or deliberate indifference. . . If there are genuine issues of fact concerning those elements, a defendant may not avoid trial on the grounds of qualified immunity.")

Hill v. Shelander, 992 F.2d 714, 717 (7th Cir. 1993) ("[D]espite Harlow's focus on a purely objective inquiry, the plaintiff must be afforded an adequate opportunity to establish intent when it is an element of the alleged constitutional violation. . . . Because [plaintiff] has thus asserted a constitutional claim requiring proof of intent, he must adduce specific factual support for his allegation of bad intent to survive a motion for summary judgment.").

Fiorenzo v. Nolan, 965 F.2d 348, 351-52 (7th Cir. 1992) ("In Wade v. Hegner. . . we held that Harlow requires the district court to conduct a two-part analysis when state of mind is at issue: '(1) Does the alleged conduct set out a constitutional violation? and (2) Were the constitutional standards clearly established at the time in question? ' Id. at 70. Intent is relevant to the first inquiry.").

Auriemma v. Rice, 910 F.2d 1449, 1453 (7th Cir. 1990) (en banc) ("[W]hen intent is crucial to a party's claim...the court's consideration of intent is relevant to the determination of whether a constitutional violation exists but not in deciding if the constitutional standard was clearly established.").

Olech v. Village of Willobrook, No. 97 C 4935, 2002 WL 31317415, at *23, *24 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 10, 2002) (not reported) ("[T]he law establishing class of one equal protection claims was clearly established in 1995. At the time of the alleged actions, both the United States Supreme Court and the Seventh Circuit had held that a municipality could violate an individual's equal protection rights by intentional and different treatment of others who are similarly situated. . . The only question is whether the clearly established right in this Circuit required actions motivated by ill will before a constitutional violation could be established. Although the Supreme Court cases established a 'basic intent' standard, Esmail interpreted those cases to require 'ill will.' However, as explained above, there are disputed fact questions that require a trial on the issue of ill will. Thus, even if the law in 1995, read most favorably to defendants, required ill will as part of a class of one equal protection claim, there is evidence for which a jury could find ill will. Qualified immunity could not be granted at this time because to do so would require the Court to resolve fact questions that are for the jury. . . The only remaining question . . .is whether Saucier applies to this case, as defendants claim (i.e., defendants argue they are entitled to qualified immunity if their decisions were based on 'reasonable mistakes'). We find that the 'reasonable mistake' exception carved out in Saucier cannot be used to establish qualified immunity at this time. If a jury finds intentional 'ill will' based on the disputed issues outlined above, then there can be no 'reasonable mistake' defense to support a qualified immunity defense. Thus, since we have found that there are genuine issues of material fact on the ill will issue, we must find that the defendants' reasonable mistake argument cannot support a qualified immunity defense at this time.").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Jackson v. Gutzmer, 866 F.3d 969, 976-78 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Qualified immunity is an affirmative defense governed by an objective standard in which 'the defendant's subjective intent is simply irrelevant.'. . 'The immunity standard in Harlow itself eliminates all motive-based claims in which the official's conduct did not violate clearly established law.'. . Thus, just as an arresting officer with probable cause to arrest for a particular violation is entitled to qualified immunity even if that was not his motive at the time of arrest, . . . Gutzmer is entitled to qualified immunity if the totality of the circumstances justified use of the restraint board even if Gutzmer erred in believing Jackson was self-injurious when placed on the board. In addition, the district court erred in construing Walker as equating 'punishment' of an inmate with an excessive use of force. 'The punishment of incarcerated prisoners ... effectuates prison management and prisoner rehabilitative goals.... Discipline by prison officials in response to a wide range of misconduct falls within the expected perimeters of the sentence imposed by a court of law.' . . A typical punishment for inmate misconduct is punitive segregation, as in Sandin. But here, because of Jackson's prior misconduct, he was already in the most segregated living unit in the Minnesota prison system. If Jackson's additional misconduct on May 13, 2014 warranted additional discipline, no Eighth Circuit case, and certainly no Supreme Court case, has ever held that such 'punishment' violates the Eighth Amendment. Turning to the merits of the alleged Eighth Amendment violation, the issue of intent that is an element of Jackson's claim is whether undisputed facts establish that force was applied 'in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline,' or whether Lt. Gutzmer applied force 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . We have jurisdiction to review whether, viewing the facts in the summary judgment record most favorably to Jackson, he 'identif[ied] affirmative evidence from which a jury could find that [he] carried his ... burden of proving' that Gutzmer's actions reflected a malicious and sadistic motive. . . This issue turns on consideration of far more than whether use of the restraint board was unreasonable because Jackson was not self-injurious.

. . As in Burns, we conclude that Jackson presented no evidence whatsoever that Gutzmer's actions 'evinced such wantonness with respect to the unjustified infliction of harm as is tantamount to a knowing willingness that it occur.'. . Jackson argues that, when he was placed on the restraint board, there was no longer a risk of self-injurious behavior, so the evidence demonstrates that Gutzmer placed Jackson on the restraint board 'as punishment for seeking medical attention,' thereby violating the Eighth Amendment. But punishing an inmate 'to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security' does not violate the Eighth Amendment . . . unless the punishment or force used is 'repugnant to the conscience of mankind,'. . . like the 'degrading and dangerous' hitching post restraint at issue in Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 745, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002). Nor is there evidence of prior contacts or relations between Jackson and Gutzmer that would be specific evidence of a malicious motive to harm. . . For these reasons, we conclude that we have jurisdiction over this appeal and the denial of qualified immunity to Lt. Gutzmer must be reversed because the record fails to establish the alleged Eighth Amendment excessive force violation.")

Cullor v. Baldwin, 830 F.3d 830, 837-39 (8th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e have yet to address a deliberate-indifference claim, as in the present case, in which an inmate alleges that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his objective medical need for dental care by failing to address a shortage of dentists in the prison, thereby subjecting the inmate to needless pain. Other courts, however, have addressed similar claims and granted qualified immunity to prison officials. [surveying cases] For purposes of this appeal, we will assume that Cullor suffered from an objectively serious medical need. . . But Cullor has failed to establish that Director Baldwin and Dr. Deol deliberately disregarded his need for dentures. . . .Contrary to Cullor's argument, this is not a case in which the defendants are attempting to use costs as a reason for denying constitutionally required medical care. . . .Nor does Cullor dispute that Dr. Deol always offered the maximum salary permitted and sought an increased salary for new dentists with special skills. In that way, Dr. Deol and Director Baldwin 'neither created the ... shortage of dentists nor the general issues with recruitment and retention.'. . As a result, we hold that Director Baldwin and Dr. Deol are entitled to qualified immunity on Cullor's deliberate-indifference claim.")

Borgman v. Kedley, 646 F.3d 518, 523, 524 (8th Cir. 2011) ("Arguable probable cause exists even where an officer mistakenly arrests a suspect believing it is based in probable cause if the mistake is 'objectively reasonable.'. . . Kedley's subjective motivations in arresting Borgman are irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis. . . For that reason, even if Kedley had been subjectively motivated to arrest her for refusing to sign the readvisement form, it would not affect the arguable probable cause analysis.")

Gardner v. Board of Police Com'rs, for Kansas City, Mo., 641 F.3d 947, 953 (8th Cir. 2011) ("Given th[e] legal landscape, we think it was not clearly established as of September 2007 that an officer in Missouri could effect a seizure under the Fourth Amendment without subjectively intending to do so. Ritchie was therefore not on clear notice that he must conform his conduct–including conduct that was a foreseeable consequence of his medical condition–to a rule that might result in liability under the Fourth Amendment for actions that he did not subjectively intend. He is entitled to qualified immunity if the state of the law did not allow him reasonably to anticipate that his conduct may give rise to liability for damages. . . For these reasons, we conclude that the district court erred in denying Ritchie's motion for summary judgment on Gardner's Fourth Amendment claim without considering Ritchie's subjective intent. The district court should determine whether the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Gardner, would support a finding by a reasonable jury that Ritchie subjectively intended to effect a seizure of Gardner by firing his weapon. If not, then Ritchie is entitled to qualified immunity. The portion of the district court's order denying Ritchie's motion for summary judgment on the § 1983 claim is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.").

Mathers v. Wright, 636 F.3d 396, 401 (8th Cir. 2011) ("Wright complains that the district court erred in emphasizing her subjective intent in its qualified immunity analysis, particularly with respect to its finding of malice. The subjective intent of the actor is generally irrelevant to the objective reasonableness test at the heart of the qualified immunity analysis. . . Here, however, the actor's subjective intent is relevant to determine whether the mistreatment was intentional, as required to state a cognizable class-of-one claim. . . To the extent that the district court considered Wright's subjective intent, it did so in determining whether a constitutional violation occurred, not whether the right at issue was clearly established. Accordingly, Wright's objection that the district court improperly emphasized subjective intent fails.")

McClendon v. Story County Sheriff's Office, 403 F.3d 510, 515 (8th Cir. 2005) ("An officer's subjective intent is irrelevant to the question of whether her or his conduct violated a constitutional right by exceeding the scope of a warrant. Indeed, an officer's subjective intent is never relevant under a Fourth Amendment analysis, so long as an objective basis for the seizure exists. . . Yet, the district court found a genuine issue as to whether a constitutional violation occurred based solely on the Defendants' possible subjective intent. . . Even if we assume, arguendo, that McCaskey and Rogers seized the entire herd solely to punish McClendon for attempting to thwart the seizure, this cannot negate the uncontested fact that two professionals, Dr. Houlding and Nicole Snider, recommended removal of all the horses. On this basis alone, the decision of the district court warrants reversal.").

Coleman v. Parkman, 349 F.3d 534, 538 n.2 (8th Cir. 2003) (noting "the difficulty courts have experienced when evaluating Saucier's second step in deliberate indifference cases. E.g., Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1049-1053 (9th Cir.2002); Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir.2002); see, e.g., Jacobs v. West Feliciana Sheriff's Dep't, 228 F.3d 388, 394 (5th Cir.2000).").

Thomas v. Talley, 251 F.3d 743, 746 (8th Cir. 2001) ("The Supreme Court has recently made it clear . . . that the subjective intent that Harlow eliminated from consideration differs from intent that is 'an essential component of [a] plaintiff's affirmative case,' Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 589 (1998). In considering a qualified immunity defense, a court cannot disregard evidence of the intent that is an element of the plaintiff's case because if it did so the plaintiff could not show that the defendant violated clearly established law. . . Because evidence of improper motive is an essential component of Mr. Thomas's affirmative case, we conclude that when ruling on Captain Talley's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the district court was indeed required to consider the evidence of Captain Talley's intent to discriminate.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Yoshikawa v. Seguirant, 41 F.4th 1109, 1118-20 (9th Cir. 2022) ("We have long held that a public official is not entitled to qualified immunity in a § 1981 case if he is accused of intentional racial discrimination. . . .Seguirant argues that we have granted qualified immunity to officials alleged to have acted with racial animus. But the single case Seguirant cites, Wong v. United States, 373 F.3d 952 (9th Cir. 2004), only reinforces the district court's decision here. Wong involved an immigration official who allegedly discriminated against a non-admitted alien when considering whether to parole the alien into the United States. Neither we nor the Supreme Court had ever ruled on whether such foreign nationals at the border had equal protection rights. . . We concluded that Wong's allegations were sufficient to state a discrimination claim under the Fifth Amendment, but we then held the 'constitutional uncertainty regarding race discrimination against nonadmitted aliens' was 'not sufficiently clear' that a reasonable border official would have recognized the Constitution's application 'with regard to immigration-related decisions.'. . Accordingly, although the complaint did state a constitutional violation, there was sufficient legal debate on the applicability of the Fifth Amendment in such a situation prior to the panel's decision that a reasonable immigration officer might not have known that Wong had equal protection rights at all. . . Not only, then, did our decision in Wong close this narrow gap by providing clarity on the question, but it also demonstrated the very limited circumstances under which a person acting under color of law could commit a constitutional violation based on intentional discrimination yet still receive qualified immunity. No reasonable government official would believe that a homeowner or contractor in Hawai'i lacked constitutional rights under the standard set in Wong. . . Seguirant raises a slightly different claim to qualified immunity. He points out that the McDonnell Douglas test has been used as a framework for analyzing § 1981 claims in the employment context. Seguirant argues that there is a circuit split over the applicability of the fourth element of the test in non-employment cases. . . Because there is a circuit split, he claims that there is no clearly established law, and he is entitled to qualified immunity. We are not persuaded by this argument. First, for the reasons we have explained, Yoshikawa has adequately pled a violation under color of law of a clearly established right—the right to be free from racial animus in public decisions—under the Fourteenth Amendment. That is sufficient to deny Seguirant qualified immunity. But, second, we are not persuaded that the McDonnell Douglas test is the proper measure of a § 1981 claim at the motion to dismiss stage. Even accepting Seguirant's claim that there is a circuit split over the proper McDonnell Douglas standard in this context, his argument is irrelevant to qualified immunity. In Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., the Supreme Court held that 'under a notice pleading system, it is not appropriate to require a plaintiff to plead facts establishing a prima facie case' under McDonnell Douglas. . . The McDonnell Douglas test 'is an evidentiary standard, not a pleading requirement' and is therefore both inapposite to claim sufficiency and inappropriate to apply at the motion to dismiss stage. . . Following Swierkiewicz, we have made clear that the evidentiary strictures of McDonnell Douglas do not determine the sufficiency of a § 1981 claim. . . Simply put, invoking McDonnell Douglas at this stage created unnecessary confusion over the clearly established law test for qualified immunity. As an evidentiary standard, the McDonnell Douglas factors do not determine whether a defendant's conduct violated a clearly established right; instead, they are used only as a potential means to determine whether a plaintiff has created a triable dispute of fact regarding discriminatory intent. . . . We think McDonnell Douglas is inapplicable in the qualified immunity context for another reason. The purpose of the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is to ensure that public officials are on full notice that their conduct violates the Constitution, and that they acted in spite of that. . . The McDonnell Douglas test is not suited to that purpose. As an evidentiary framework, it guides the litigants in preparing their case. Nothing in that test is designed to put officials on notice of what the Constitution demands. . . . Put another way, the disagreement over the fourth prong of the McDonnell Douglas test does not represent a circuit split on 'an issue so central to the cause of action alleged, [that] a reasonable official lacks the notice required before imposing liability.'. . Thus, while the district court erred by applying McDonnell Douglas, it correctly determined that the complaint stated a claim for racial discrimination under § 1981 based upon actions—intentional discrimination in the enforcement of building codes, evidenced by statements asserting racial animus as the but-for cause of the official's actions—that a reasonable government official would have known violated clearly established constitutional and statutory rights.")

Rodriguez v. County of Los Angeles, 891 F.3d 776, 796-97 (9th Cir. 2018) ("The deputies who used tasers. . . contend that they are entitled to qualified immunity because the law governing the use of tasers was not clearly established in 2008. We disagree. 'An officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury.'. . This statement applies with particular strength in the context of the Eighth Amendment. A plaintiff cannot prove an Eighth Amendment violation without showing that force was employed 'maliciously and sadistically' for the purpose of causing harm. . . Even if particularized notice, specific to tasers, were needed at the time Deputies Sanford, Vazquez, and Delgado acted, . . . controlling circuit and Supreme Court case law provided it. [collecting cases] Deputies Sanford, Vazquez, and Delgado argue that limits on the proper use of tasers were still unclear as of 2008, relying on two Fourth Amendment cases decided after the cell extractions at issue in this case: Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc), and Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805 (9th Cir. 2010). Mattos and Bryan clarified the circumstances under which taser use would violate the Fourth Amendment and granted qualified immunity to the officers who acted without the benefit of this clarification. . . However, the deputies' argument fails to acknowledge the respective standards for Fourth and Eighth Amendment violations. . . We determine whether the Fourth Amendment has been violated by assessing the objective reasonableness of the force used, balancing the degree of intrusion against the government's interest. . . By contrast, subjective intent is critical in an Eighth Amendment analysis. More than de minimis force applied for no good faith law enforcement purpose violates the Eighth Amendment. . . Objective reasonableness may inform the Eighth Amendment inquiry, providing evidence of good faith or of malice. . . But once a jury has determined on the basis of sufficient evidence that 'prison officials maliciously and sadistically use[d] [more than de minimis] force to cause harm, contemporary standards of decency,' and thus the Eighth Amendment, 'always are violated.'. . Here, the evidence amply supported the jury's finding that the deputies acted maliciously and sadistically.")

Chism v. Washington State, 661 F.3d 380, 393 & n.15 (9th Cir. 2011) (amending panel opinion and denying reh'g en banc) ("In light of Branch, Liston, and Hervey, we conclude that 'every "reasonable official would have understood"' that the Chisms had a constitutional right to not be searched and arrested as a result of judicial deception. . . We therefore hold that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In judicial deception cases, our qualified immunity analysis at the summary judgment stage is swallowed by the question of reckless or intentional disregard for the truth. . . We have explained that this 'merger' is sensible because 'no reasonable officer could believe that it is constitutional to act dishonestly or recklessly with regard to the basis for probable cause in seeking a warrant. Accordingly, should a factfinder find against an official on this state-of-mind question, qualified immunity would not be available as a defense.'").

Norse v. City Of Santa Cruz, 629 F.3d 966, 974, 977 (9th Cir. 2010) (en banc) ("A mayor's entitlement to qualified immunity for ejecting a person from a city council meeting 'depends on whether a reasonable person in his position, acting on his information and motivated by his purpose, would have known that ejecting [the attendee] violated his clearly established rights.'. . The DVDs show triable issues of fact as to whether Norse was impermissibly ejected because of his viewpoint rather than his alleged disruptiveness. . . . In this case, we are dealing with city officials who ejected one individual from City Council meetings. . . . [T]he decisions to expel Norse were administrative, not legislative, so the defendants are not entitled to absolute immunity.")

Norse v. City Of Santa Cruz, 629 F.3d 966, 979 (9th Cir. 2010) (en banc) (Kozinski, CJ., joined by Reinhardt, J., concurring) ("I join Judge Thomas's opinion because it's clearly right. I write only to observe that, even after the procedural irregularities that deprived Norse an opportunity to present evidence, it's clear that the council members aren't entitled to qualified immunity. In the Age of YouTube, there's no need to take my word for it: There is a video of the incident that I'm 'happy to allow ... to speak for itself.' Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 378 n.5 (2007); see http://www.youtube.com/watch?v' ZOssHWB6WBI (last visited Nov. 16, 2010). This video (also found in the record) clearly shows that Norse's sieg heil was momentary and casual, causing no disruption whatsoever. It would have remained entirely unnoticed, had a city council-man not interrupted the proceedings to take umbrage and insist that Norse be cast out of the meeting. Councilman Fitzmaurice clearly wants Norse expelled because the 'Nazi salute' is 'against the dignity of this body and the decorum of this body' and not because of any disruption. But, unlike der Führer, government officials in America occasionally must tolerate offensive or irritating speech.")

Prison Legal News v. Lehman, 397 F.3d 692, 703 (9th Cir. 2005) ("The district court correctly held that the DOC regulation prohibiting mail that could create a risk of violence and physical harm to any person is constitutional on its face. . .The question presented in this case is whether the prison officials applied this rule in a fashion that is unconstitutional. Because we must, for purposes of this appeal, accept the facts as laid out by PLN, we cannot determine on this record whether the prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity. PLN contends that the DOC's policy was applied by the prison officials in a manner that singled out PLN for discriminatory treatment, while allowing other publishers to deliver similar material. PLN challenges the DOC's refusal to deliver more than one hundred specific legal documents. PLN suggests that the real motive of the prison officials who prevented third-party legal materials from being delivered was to suppress materials that embarrass the DOC and educate inmates on how to file their claims. Although an improper motive ordinarily will not defeat a request for qualified immunity, . . . if the policy were applied in a discriminatory fashion based on the content of the material, this would clearly violate PLN's First Amendment rights. . . Accordingly, we hold that the prison officials are not entitled to qualified immunity regarding PLN's claim that they violated its constitutional rights in banning the receipt of the third-party legal materials.").

Covington v. Fairman, No. 03-17003, 03-17004, 2004 WL 2823307, at * 6, *7 (9th Cir. Dec. 9, 2004) (Brunetti, J., dissenting) (not published) ("Because I do not believe that the extraction officers used excessive force in violation of Covington's Eighth Amendment rights, the supervisors therefore cannot be held liable.. . . Even if I assume that under the facts of this case all Defendants engaged in conduct that violated Covington's Eighth Amendment rights, all Defendants would still be entitled to qualified immunity under the second step of Saucier. . . . I do not dispute that as of September 2, 1998, it was clearly established that a wanton beating by a prison official amounted to a violation of a prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. However, under this step, the inquiry is whether it was clearly established that the force applied during a cell extraction under these circumstances would have been known by a reasonable officer to be wanton and unnecessary. While it was clearly established in September 1998 that prisoners were entitled to be free from wanton beatings, it was equally clearly established in September 1998 that at times prison officials may have to apply force to prisoners in order to restore or maintain discipline. . . It was certainly not clearly established at this time that kicking and punching during a cell extraction, especially when the use of force was necessary, would be characterized as a wanton beating and an Eighth Amendment violation. Under the circumstances detailed above, a reasonable officer would have believed that force was necessary and lawful to extract Covington from his cell. A reasonable officer would also suspect that this force might include punching and kicking. Importantly, the extraction officers did not use weapons such as tasers or guns to subdue Covington. Further evidence that the force applied was reasonable under the circumstances is that the injuries resulting from these punches and kicks were very minor. Under the Hudson and Whitley parameters, which allow prison officials certain leeway in order to maintain prison discipline, I cannot conclude that the extraction officers acted unreasonably and beyond those parameters. . . .The majority relies on Covington's allegations that he was repeatedly hit in his groin to bolster the conclusion that the force applied was excessive. However, neither the Supreme Court nor this court have ever held that a prison official's punching or kicking in the groin is a per se Eighth Amendment violation. Indeed, this conduct must be considered in light of the entire factual context. The groin allegations occurred in the heat of a cell extraction, with punches and kicks inevitably flying. The panel may decide today that that type of force should never be allowed. However, we have yet to reach such a conclusion. Because the officers were not put on notice that any physical force applied to the groin would be considered per se excessive force, the officers were reasonable in their actions. . . . Even if I were to agree that some of the minimal force used in this cell extraction was unnecessary, the conduct of the extraction officers and the supervisors demonstrates that they acted in good faith and any mistake made by the officers as to the amount of force necessary was reasonable, in light of all of the circumstances. By the time the extraction officers entered the cell, events had escalated such that it was probable that force would be used to remove Covington from the cell. Force was in fact used, but Covington's injuries suggest it was minimal and did not exceed the amount that was necessary. If there was some punching or kicking that could conceivably be considered excessive, this conduct would be a reasonable mistake made in the furtherance of restoring discipline and was not done to maliciously harm Covington.").

Torres v. Runyon, No. 02-15273, 2003 WL 22598339, at *1, *2 (9th Cir. Nov. 6, 2003) (unpublished) ("In a recent case, Marquez v. Gutierrez, supra, we applied Saucier to an excessive use of force claim and underscored the significance of analyzing the constitutional right apart from qualified immunity. . . Specifically, even if Torres might establish an excessive use of force, Runyon still may be entitled to qualified immunity for reasonable conduct under the circumstances he faced. . . . Accepting Torres' version of the facts, which placed him on the ground as a victim of other inmates' assaults, a reasonable fact finder might view Runyon's use of deadly force against Torres as an act that violated Torres' Eighth Amendment right. . . However, there is no evidence that Runyon knew Torres nor carried any animus toward him. At most, Runyon may have been negligent in shooting the wrong person. But we need not resolve this issue because we find Runyon's conduct was reasonable under the following analysis. . . . From his viewpoint in the observation tower, Runyon believed that the inmates on the ground were defenseless as they received kicks and blows from other inmates. And the evidence is uncontradicted that Runyon aimed at and intended to shoot the inmate whom he saw kicking an unconscious inmate to death, whether or not he hit the wrong person or was mistaken about which person was hit. . . . We cannot say that Runyon's conduct was unreasonable under the circumstances. Therefore, Runyon is entitled to qualified immunity from the Torres estate's claims arising out of the prison yard shooting.")

Marquez v. Gutierrez, 322 F.3d 689, 692, 693 (9th Cir. 2003) ("To shoot a passive, unarmed inmate standing near a fight between other inmates, none of whom was armed, when no inmate was in danger of great bodily harm, would inflict unnecessary and wanton pain. . . Even though there would be a constitutional violation if Marquez were to prove the facts that he posits, Gutierrez may nevertheless be entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable officer could have believed his conduct was lawful. . . . Marquez argues that a prison official cannot act maliciously and sadistically while, at the same time, reasonably believing that his actions conform to clearly established law. However, this argument is the same argument that the Supreme Court rejected in Saucier, and that we rejected in Estate of Ford. . . . Accordingly, Gutierrez's claim of qualified immunity is not defeated simply because a triable issue of fact exists as to whether his decision to shoot Marquez was malicious. Even if Gutierrez's beliefs that Marquez was involved in the kicking incident and that Perez was in danger of serious harm were mistaken, he can still be entitled to qualified immunity. A reasonable official standing where Gutierrez was standing–that is, in a tower located 360 feet away from the disturbance–could perceive that both Marquez and another inmate were kicking Perez and threatening Perez with serious injury or death, and that Perez was not capable of protecting himself, even if no kick was actually administered by Marquez. The scenario may look different when gauged against the "20/20 vision of hindsight," but we must look at the situation as a reasonable officer in Gutierrez's position could have perceived it. . . In that light, we believe that a reasonable officer could believe that shooting one inmate in the leg to stop an assault that could have seriously injured or killed another inmate was a good faith effort to restore order, and thus lawful.").

Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1045 (9th Cir. 2002) (Hamilton has been undermined by Saucier; AEven though the constitutional issue turns on the officers' state of mind (here, deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm), courts must still consider whether–assuming the facts in the injured party's favor–it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful.")

Clement v. Gomez, 298 F.3d 898, 906 (9th Cir. 2002) (" The general law regarding the medical treatment of prisoners was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . Furthermore, it was also clearly established that the officers could not intentionally deny or delay access to medical care. . . While a resolution of the factual issues may well relieve the prison officials of any liability in this case, if the prisoners' version of the facts were to prevail at trial, a jury might conclude that the officers were deliberately indifferent to such needs during the four-hour period after the incident. Various supervisory officials may also have been deliberately indifferent to obvious risks of injury. Under such circumstances, the officials' actions are not protected by qualified immunity.").

Butler v. Elle, 281 F.3d 1014, 1024 (9th Cir. 2002) ("[O]ur cases effectively intertwine the qualified immunity question (1) whether a reasonable officer should have known that he acted in violation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights with (2) the substantive recklessness or dishonesty question. This merger is ultimately appropriate because, as Branch and Hervey recognize, no reasonable officer could believe that it is constitutional to act dishonestly or recklessly with regard to the basis for probable cause in seeking a warrant. Accordingly, should a factfinder find against an official on this state-of-mind question, qualified immunity would not be available as a defense. On the other hand, should the fact-finder find at trial in the officer's favor, i.e., that he did not act dishonestly or recklessly, that officer's conduct would not have violated any clearly established statutory or constitutional rights. In this regard, because the two issues merge, there need be no separate inquiry at trial, and no discrete instructions, on whether Elle is entitled to qualified immunity. If he was reckless or deceitful in preparing the warrant affidavit, then he both violated Butler's rights and is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Meeks v. Gomez, No. 96-15625, 1997 WL 51518, at *2 (9th Cir. Feb. 21, 1997) (unpublished) ("A public official cannot both be 'deliberately indifferent'. . . and at the same time reasonably believe that his conduct conforms to clearly established law. . . . The district court correctly concluded that the existence of a triable issue of fact as to deliberate indifference precluded granting defendants' motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds.").

Alexander v. City and County of San Francisco, 29 F.3d 1355, 1364 (9th Cir. 1994) ("Defendants have not shown that a reasonable officer could have believed that entry with intent to arrest would not violate clearly established law. Thus summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity would be inappropriate if the intent was to arrest or if facts as to intent are in dispute. A genuine dispute exists as to whether or not defendants ordered the storming of the house primarily for the purpose of arresting [decedent]. The fact that this dispute turns on an essentially subjective element (the officers' purpose), while qualified immunity involves an inquiry into 'objective reasonableness' does not mean that qualified immunity is any more or less available in this context than it would otherwise be. . . In short, the factual issues in this case must be decided by a jury before any determination of qualified immunity can be made.").

Hamilton v. Endell, 981 F.2d 1062, 1066 (9th Cir. 1992) ("A finding of deliberate indifference necessarily precludes a finding of qualified immunity; prison officials who deliberately ignore the serious medical needs of inmates cannot claim that it was not apparent to a reasonable person that such actions violated the law.").

Vaden v. Summerhill , No. CIV S-06-1836 GEB KJM P, 2008 WL 4370061, at *10 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 24, 2008) ("Because the point at which a risk to an inmate becomes a substantial risk of serious harm for Eighth Amendment purposes is ill-defined and because St. Andre's actions fall into this hazy area, he is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Coyle v. Cambra, No. C 02-1810 SBA PR, 2005 WL 2397517, at *15 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 27, 2005) ("Plaintiff alleges that Defendants were responsible for the over six-month delay in his receiving an orthopedic consultation, in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. Although the law was clearly established that delay and interference with medical care can violate an inmate's Eighth Amendment rights, the law does not specifically state the exact amount of delay that would rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. . . . And though it is not necessary to find a case with the exact same fact pattern (e.g., six-month delay in receiving an orthopedic consultation) to hold that Defendants breached a clearly established duty, more specificity as to the amount of delay in receiving an orthopedic consultation must be shown, before the Court could find that Defendants violated clearly established law. Applying Estate of Ford here, it would not have been clear to a reasonable prison official that a six-month delay in Plaintiff receiving an orthopedic consultation would expose Plaintiff to a substantial risk of serious harm. The circumstances in the instant case include a temporary suspension of the Orthopedic Specialty Clinic, however, reasonable alternatives were available for Plaintiff's routine medical care, including specialty medical care through the use of Telemedicine. Therefore, a reasonable prison officer would not necessarily have drawn the inference that Plaintiff would not be able to receive adequate medical care with the aforementioned plan for emergency medical care that was implemented in place of the Orthopedic Specialty Clinic. Because the law did not put Defendants on notice that their conduct would be clearly unlawful, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is appropriate.").

Moreno v. City of Sacramento, No. CIV-S-01-0725DFLDAD, 2005 WL 2016910, at *3, *4 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 19, 2005) ("[D]efendants argue that even though the Ninth Circuit found violations of clearly established constitutional law, that does not foreclose a finding by the court that a reasonable officer would not understand that his conduct violated the law on the specific facts presented in this case. . . Additionally, they assert that the individual defendants' personal knowledge of the relevant law is pertinent to this qualified immunity inquiry. . .They seek to introduce additional testimony from Pino, Vanella, and Fernandez on the following topics: (1) their general reliance on the city attorney for their knowledge of the law; (2) their efforts to keep up with developments in the law; and (3) their understanding and reading of the relevant case law. Defendants' arguments are premised on a misunderstanding of the qualified immunity inquiry. The qualified immunity analysis contains only two steps: (1) was there a constitutional violation? and (2) if so, was the violation clearly established? . . . Although defendants correctly note that a court must analyze whether a reasonable officer would understand that his actions were unconstitutional on the facts of the present case, that inquiry is subsumed within the 'clearly established' analysis. As the Supreme Court has held, 'the relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . Therefore, when the Ninth Circuit held that the constitutional violations were clearly established, it found that a reasonable officer, confronted with the alleged facts of this particular case, would be on notice that his actions were unconstitutional. Accordingly, defendants' assertion that a reasonable officer would not have understood that his actions were unconstitutional on the specific facts is foreclosed by the Ninth Circuit's ruling. Defendants' request for additional testimony is equally misplaced. The qualified immunity analysis is objective, not subjective. . . . Thus, the individual defendants' personal knowledge of the law and their efforts to stay abreast of changes in the law is irrelevant to this constitutional inquiry. In fact, the Supreme Court rejected a subjective component of the qualified immunity inquiry for the very purpose of preventing the need for testimony from individual officers as to their state of mind, subjective motivation, and knowledge of the law.").

Nelson v. California DOC, No. C 02-5476 SI(PR), 2004 WL 569529, at 8-10 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 18, 2004) ("Applying Estate of Ford here, it would not have been clear to a reasonable prison official when the risk of harm from being required to live in and exercise in just underwear-changed from being a risk of some (or even any) harm, to a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate's health. Although the law was clearly established that depriving an inmate of outdoor exercise on a long-term basis violated the Eighth Amendment, and although the law was clearly established that depriving an inmate of adequate clothing violated the Eighth Amendment, the law was not very well fleshed out on amount of clothing required to avoid an Eighth Amendment violation. Although the court earlier in this decision found that requiring an inmate to live in his underwear for five months was sufficiently serious to establish the first prong of an Eighth Amendment claim, the court recognizes the dearth of authority on the specific point of how much clothing must be given to an inmate. . . . A reasonable prison official understanding that he could not be deliberately indifferent to a serious risk to inmate health could know that Nelson spent five months in no clothes other than boxer shorts and a t-shirt and know that he had only those clothes to wear when he exercised in the occasionally cold weather but reasonably perceive that Nelson's exposure to any harm was not that high when (1) Nelson spent the vast majority of his time in a climate- controlled environment, (2) Nelson was allowed, but not required, to go outside for an exercise period for up to 3-1/2 hours at a time, (3) the temperature was in the 34-50 degree range on some days, (3) notwithstanding his complaints that it was cold and he was in bad health, Nelson continued to choose to go outside for the exercise period even though he had the option to remain indoors. . . . The information available to defendants did not make it so clear that Nelson would be in pain or face a serious risk to his health while inside his cell or during the six hours of exercise each week that no reasonable officer would have let him remain in just his underwear. Because the law did not put defendants on notice that their conduct would be clearly unlawful, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is appropriate").

Mooring v. San Francisco Sheriff's Dep't., 289 F.Supp.2d 1110, 1120 (N.D. Cal. 2003) ("Applying Estate of Ford here, it would not have been clear to a reasonable prison official when the risk of harm from housing an inmate in a cell containing Soreno gang members when the inmate said he had 'gang affiliation' concerns but did not identify himself as a Norteno gang member specifically and was not known to the official to be from the Norteno gang changed from being a risk of some (or even any) harm, to a substantial risk of serious harm from one of those inmates. A reasonable prison official understanding that he could not recklessly disregard a serious risk to inmate safety could know that Mooring said he had gang affiliation concerns and objected to the cell placement but reasonably perceive that Mooring's exposure to any harm was not that high when there was no evidence of a specific threat from the inmates in cell E to Mooring. Because the law did not put Gonzalez on notice that his conduct would be clearly unlawful, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is appropriate. . . Gonzalez met his burden of proof in his moving papers. Mooring did not introduce evidence to show the existence of a genuine issue of fact on the defense. Gonzalez is entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the qualified immunity defense.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Gamel-Medler v. Almaguer, 835 F. App'x 354, ___ & n.7 (10th Cir. 2020) ("In their motions for summary judgment, neither Almaguer nor Robertson argued that assuming a jury could conclude they subjected Gamel-Medler to differential treatment with a discriminatory purposes they could, nonetheless, not be held liable because the law is not clearly established. . . . It is not surprising Defendants did not make such an argument. '[Q]ualified immunity protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . A constitutional right is clearly established if it is 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Assuming, as specifically determined by the district court, a jury could find Defendants denied Gamel-Medler police protection afforded to other residents of Hitchcock because Gamel-Medler's son is African American, it cannot be argued that a reasonable officer would not be aware such conduct is at odds with the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection. . . Because Gamel-Medler must prove purposeful (i.e., intentional) discrimination to state a viable claim, the need for a factually symmetrical case to put Defendants on notice their conduct violates the law is reduced. . . Thus, absent some set of extenuating facts, none of which were alleged in this case, a general proposition will often be enough to render the legal right clearly established in cases such as the instant case. See Brown v. Flowers, No. 19-7011, 2020 WL 5509683 at *4-5 (10th Cir. Sept. 14, 2020) (discussing this concept at length).")

Cox v. Glanz, 800 F.3d 1231, 1248-54 (10th Cir. 2015) ("The requisite showing of an 'affirmative link' between a supervisor and the alleged constitutional injury has '[come] to have three related prongs: (1) personal involvement, (2) sufficient causal connection, and (3) culpable state of mind.'. .Admittedly, '[t]he contours of ... supervisory liability are still somewhat unclear after [the Supreme Court decided] Iqbal, which "articulated a stricter liability standard for ... personal involvement."'. . . Our clearly-established-law analysis centers on whether the controlling cases 'show that [Sheriff Glanz] took the alleged actions with the requisite state of mind.' . . This state of mind '"can be no less than the mens rea required" of [any of his] subordinates [i.e., Jail employees] to commit the underlying constitutional violation.'. . Importantly, as our discussion of the pertinent governing caselaw . . . demonstrates, this is a particularized state of mind: actual knowledge by a prison official of an individual inmate's substantial risk of suicide. . . .Our review of relevant caselaw postdating Hocker and Barrie indicates that the foregoing state of the law in our circuit—which required prison officials to possess knowledge that a specific inmate presents a substantial risk of suicide—had not changed in material respects by July 2009. We are not aware of any controlling Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decisions that directly answer this clearly-established-law inquiry. However, our view of the requirements of the clearly established law extant when Mr. Jernegan committed suicide (July 2009) does find some support in the Supreme Court's recent decision in Taylor v. Barkes, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 2042 (2015) (per curiam), where the Court resolved a deliberate-indifference dispute on the clearly-established-law prong of the qualified-immunity standard. There, the Court held that, as of November 2004, there was no clearly established 'right' of an inmate to be adequately screened for suicide. . . The Taylor Court emphatically stated that '[n]o decision of this Court even discusses suicide screening or prevention protocols.'. . Taylor teaches us that, as of November 2004, there was no constitutional right to such screening or protocols. . .Consequently, in November 2004, a jail's nonexistent or deficient suicide-screening measures would not have necessarily indicated that an individual prisoner's suicide was the product of deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment. In light of Taylor, our reading of the contours of the law a short five years later should not be surprising. That is, irrespective of the alleged deficiencies in the Jail's suicide-screening protocols, in order for any defendant, including Sheriff Glanz, to be found to have acted with deliberate indifference, he needed to first have knowledge that the specific inmate at issue presented a substantial risk of suicide. Moreover, though not dispositive, our limited corpus of nonprecedential jail-suicide decisions supports our reading of the state of the law when Mr. Jernegan committed suicide. . . .At bottom, when confronting individual-capacity § 1983 claims, our 'focus must always be on the defendant—on the ... injury he inflicted or caused to be inflicted, and on his motives. This is because § 1983 isn't a strict liability offense.'. . As noted, Sheriff Glanz had no personal interaction with Mr. Jernegan or direct and contemporaneous knowledge of his treatment in July 2009. Therefore, insofar as he had knowledge sufficient to form the requisite mental state, it would have had to necessarily come from his subordinates, notably Ms. Taylor or Ms. Sampson. Because they did not possess such knowledge, the conclusion inexorably follows that Sheriff Glanz could not have possessed such knowledge. Accordingly, though we have not ignored Ms. Cox's strong assertions regarding the systemic failings of the Jail's mental-health screening and treatment protocols, which quite understandably troubled the district court, we conclude that Ms. Cox has nevertheless failed to establish that Sheriff Glanz acted as to Mr. Jernegan with the requisite mental state to constitute deliberate indifference. In other words, she has not carried her burden regarding the essential subjective component of the deliberate-indifference standard. In sum, for the reasons stated, we cannot conclude that Sheriff Glanz's conduct constituted an Eighth Amendment violation under the law that was clearly established at the time of Mr. Jernegan's death. Therefore, Ms. Cox cannot satisfy the clearly-established-law component of the qualified-immunity standard. We must accordingly reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the Sheriff on Ms. Cox's individual-capacity claim under § 1983.")

Shrum v. City of Coweta, Oklahoma, 449 F.3d 1132, 1145 (10th Cir. 2006) ("Chief Palmer does not dispute that it was clearly established that non-neutral state action imposing a substantial burden on the exercise of religion violates the First Amendment. If Officer Shrum's factual allegations are correct–that he was singled out precisely because of Chief Palmer's knowledge of his religious commitment–then Chief Palmer's claim of qualified immunity must fail. Only if the finder of fact ultimately concludes, as a matter of fact, that Chief Palmer had a neutral basis for his personnel actions, does he have a defense. This is thus a case where the claim of qualified immunity collapses into the merits. The district court was correct to hold that it should proceed to trial on the free exercise claim.").

Mimics v. Village of Angel Fire, 394 F.3d 836, 848 (10th Cir. 2005) ("In the context of a summary judgment motion on a qualified immunity defense to a claim involving the defendant's state of mind, the defendant must first show that the challenged conduct was objectively reasonable. . . Because this court has determined that there is evidence Hasford's entries into MIMICS on December 20, 1996 and January 16, 1997 were not objectively reasonable, we need not conduct any further analysis. Construing the evidence in the Wildgrubes' favor, as we must do on summary judgment, Hasford has failed, at least at this point in the proceedings, to establish that he is entitled to qualified immunity on the Wildgrubes' First Amendment claim.").

Beard v. City of Northglenn, 23 F.3d 110, 114-15 (10th Cir. 1994) (White, Associate Justice (Ret.)) ("If the court had addressed itself to the proper Fourth Amendment question, it would have found its resolution of that question would have also dictated its conclusion on the second portion of the qualified immunity test. If, after all, a claimant is able to prove the necessary deliberate falsehood or reckless disregard to impeach a facially valid warrant, the reasonableness inquiry has to be resolved against the defendant since no reasonably competent officer could believe an arrest legal where it was his deliberate or reckless deception that led the magistrate into issuing the warrant. Conversely, if a plaintiff cannot prove a Fourth Amendment violation, there is no need to proceed any further; the case ends in defendant's favor. It is clear from this analysis that the trial court's conclusion that the officers violated appellant's Fourth Amendment rights and still acted reasonably is untenable. To reach such a conclusion under the correct Fourth Amendment standard would require a court to hold the knowing or reckless disregard of the truth in an arrest affidavit–the ultimate act of unreason– reasonable as a matter of law.").

Gallegos v. City and County of Denver, 984 F.2d 358, 363-64 (10th Cir. 1993) ("The 'objective reasonableness' standard set forth in Harlow often rests on a determination of whether the defendant's conduct can be traced to the subjective element of impermissible motive or intent."), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 2962 (1993).

Estate of Roemer v. Shoaga, No. 14-CV-01655-PAB-NYW, 2019 WL 4645441, at *5 (D. Colo. Sept. 24, 2019) ("Some courts have determined that the deliberate indifference part of an Eighth Amendment claim and the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis collapse because 'deliberately indifferent conduct can never be objectively reasonable for purposes of qualified immunity.' [citing cases from 3d, 4th, 7th Circuits] However, this is not the law in the Tenth Circuit. See, e.g., Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d 1116, 1122, 1127 (10th Cir. 2018) (assuming that the plaintiff had successfully demonstrated that the defendant had acted with deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm, but concluding that the contours of the plaintiff's constitutional right were not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation); accord Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1045 (9th Cir. 2002) (holding that, even when "the constitutional issue turns on the officers' [deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm], courts must still consider whether – assuming the facts in the injured party's favor – it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful").")

Estate of Dixon v. Bd. of Cty. Commissioners of Crowley Cty., No. 15-CV-02727-NYW, 2017 WL 1684134, at *3 (D. Colo. May 3, 2017) ("Nor does the court's ruling on the Motions to Dismiss otherwise dispose of the qualified immunity analysis on summary judgment. The qualified immunity inquiry at the motion to dismiss phase and at the summary judgment phase are separate and distinct—notably, Plaintiffs carry different burdens. On a motion to dismiss, the court determines whether the complaint's factual allegations state a plausible constitutional claim, not whether the complaint contains all the necessary factual allegations to sustain a conclusion that Defendants violated clearly established law. See Robbins v. Oklahoma, 519 F.3d 1242, 1249 (10th Cir. 2008). At summary judgment, 'the record must clearly demonstrate the plaintiff[s] ha[ve] satisfied [their] heavy two-part burden,' i.e., that Defendants violated Mr. Dixon's clearly established constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, the court's conclusion at the motion to dismiss phase that dismissal is not warranted based on the pleadings does not necessarily translate into a determination that Plaintiffs have carried their burden to overcome qualified immunity on summary judgment.")

Richard v. City of Wichita, No. 15-1279-EFM-KGG, 2016 WL 5341756, at *6 (D. Kan. Sept. 23, 2016) ("The Court takes these three cases with similar facts to show that the question of reasonableness is a very fact-specific inquiry. As alleged, the instant case is a close one. And usually in close cases such as this, reasonableness is properly a question for a jury. . . In Allen, Hastings, and Bleck, the Tenth Circuit determined whether summary judgment was appropriate. But here, Defendants are not arguing that this close case should be decided in their favor on summary judgment. Rather, they are arguing that Plaintiff fails to state a plausible claim upon which relief can be granted. Accordingly, their motion must be denied. Stacy was emotionally disturbed and considering suicide. His wife had called for help. He was alone in the house. Officers entered his home and issued forceful commands. It is plausible that these commands caused Stacy to become more distressed. Stacy was not suspected of committing a crime, and he did not pose any immediate danger to others when he was alone in his house. Given these facts, Plaintiff has stated a plausible claim for relief. The Court recognizes that Defendants may have colorable arguments as to why their actions were reasonable, but these arguments do not belong in a 12(b)(6) motion. They are better suited for a motion for summary judgment or a jury determination.")

Freeman v. Knight, No. 04CV00148MSKPAC, 2005 WL 1896245, at *4 (D. Colo. Aug. 8, 2005) ("The 'clearly established' prong of the analysis is often described as inquiring whether a 'reasonable official would understand' that his or her behavior violated the constitution. . . In this Court's view, this description of the test has resulted in imprecise analysis, as it suggests that the focus of the analysis is on the official's subjective or objective state of mind. This is incorrect. The 'clearly established' prong does not actually examine state of mind; rather, it merely inquires whether, at the time of the challenged act, there was binding legal authority recognizing the existence of a constitutional right in the particular circumstances.").

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Jackson v. Cowan, No. 19-13181, 2022 WL 3973705, at *9 n.6 (11th Cir. Sept. 1, 2022) (not reported) ("Previously in this circuit, qualified immunity was not available as a defense to § 1985(3) claims. See Burrell v. Bd. of Trs. of Ga. Mil. Coll., 970 F.2d 785, 794 (11th Cir. 1992). Subsequently, however, the Supreme Court has applied qualified immunity to § 1985(3) claims. See Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1869 (2017) ("Petitioners are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3)."); see also Chua v. Ekonomou, 1 F.4th 948, 956 (11th Cir. 2021) (recognizing that the Supreme Court in Ziglar abrogated *Burrell*s holding that "qualified immunity does not apply to a claim brought under [§] 1985(3)").")

Chua v. Ekonomou, 1 F.4th 948, 956 (11th Cir. 2021) ("Although we held in Burrell v. Board of Trustees of Georgia Military College that qualified immunity does not apply to a claim brought under section 1985(3), 970 F.2d 785, 794 (11th Cir. 1992), the Supreme Court recently abrogated that holding in Ziglar v. Abbasi, —— U.S. ——, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1869, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017) (holding that petitioners were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to claims brought under section 1985(3)).")

Patel v. Lanier County, Georgia, 969 F.3d 1173, 1185-86 (11th Cir. 2020) ("The usual rule in a qualified-immunity case is that, in addition to proving a constitutional violation, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the law underlying his claim was 'clearly established' at the time of the incident in question. . . It is true, as Patel says, that in Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1321–22 (11th Cir. 2002), and Fennell, 559 F.3d at 1216–17, we articulated a sui generis exception to that general rule for Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. But that exception was justified only by an idiosyncrasy of those claims—an idiosyncrasy that, with respect to those arising under the Fourteenth Amendment, Kingsley eliminated. As a result, Patel can no longer rely on our previous holdings but, rather, must prove that his right not to be subjected to prolonged detention in the hot transport van was clearly established. . . . The Johnson/Fennel exception rested entirely on the 'extreme' subjective-intent element of Eighth and (then) Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. Kingsley, though, expressly eliminated any subjective element for such claims arising under the Fourteenth Amendment—at least as to the excessiveness of the force. . . . In so doing, the Supreme Court likewise eliminated the justification for the Johnson/Fennel exception itself—effectively undermining that special rule 'to the point of abrogation,' at least as to Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims.")

Mitchell v. City of Jacksonville, 734 F. App'x 649, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("To the extent Defendants argue they are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's race discrimination claim because a reasonable official under the circumstances could have believed that Defendants' conduct was lawful, we have jurisdiction to review that legal issue on appeal. Viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, . . . the record establishes that Plaintiff was treated less favorably than his non-minority co-workers. Plaintiff has also proffered some evidence that his treatment was racially motivated. Defendants, on the other hand, contend that a lawful basis existed for utilizing a liaison to communicate with Plaintiff: that it was 'easier' for Chief Loput. That Defendants may have acted, in part, with discriminatory motive does not necessarily defeat their entitlement to qualified immunity. See Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1534-35 (11th Cir. 1996). When improper motive is part of the underlying constitutional tort -- and where evidence exists of mixed motives -- a defendant is still entitled to qualified immunity if 'the record indisputably establishes that the defendant in fact was motivated, at least in part, by lawful considerations.' Stanley v. City of Dalton, 219 F.3d 1280, 1296 (11th Cir. 2000) (emphasis in original). Here, the record does not establish 'indisputably' that Defendants' conduct was in fact motivated at least in part by their proffered reason. Instead, evidence in the record demonstrates that the use of a 'liaison' to communicate within a single division was atypical and that the use of a lower-ranking 'liaison' to relay orders to a higher-ranking officer would violate the JFRD's chain-of-command policy. We also note that Defendants have proffered no legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for the other conduct alleged by Plaintiff: that Chief Loput avoided one-on-one contact with Plaintiff, excluded Plaintiff from a department-wide email, assigned Plaintiff menial tasks, and denied Plaintiff's travel leave. At this stage in the proceedings, the district court concluded properly that Defendants were unentitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's claim for race discrimination. Because Defendants' remaining arguments on appeal attack the sufficiency of the evidence supporting Plaintiff's substantive claims for race discrimination and retaliation -- and are not pertinent to the core qualified immunity analysis -- we lack jurisdiction to consider them in this interlocutory appeal.")

Joseph v. Gee, No. 17-12185, 2018 WL 345323, at *1 (11th Cir. Jan. 10, 2018) (not reported) ("Officers Echenique, Clark, Jones, and Chester moved to dismiss Mr. Joseph's second amended complaint, arguing that it failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, and that they were entitled to qualified immunity. The officers appeal the district court's denial of these motions. Upon de novo review, . . . and after careful consideration of the record and the parties' briefs, we vacate the orders denying the officers' motions to dismiss and remand to the district court. The district court's orders denying the officers' motions state that the motions were denied because '[i]t is premature to determine ... whether [the officers] are entitled to Qualified Immunity based on the facts of this case. The Court finds that discovery is needed to make this determination.'. . This was error. As we recently explained, the district court's order requiring discovery 'before the court ruled on the immunity defenses is ... inconsistent with [our] decisions which establish that immunity is a right not to be subjected to litigation beyond the point at which immunity is asserted.'. . When presented with the officers' motions to dismiss, both our precedent and precedent from the Supreme Court instruct the district court to analyze whether, taking Mr. Joseph's allegations as true, the second amended complaint asserted a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. . . Because the district court failed to conduct this analysis, we vacate its orders on the officers' motions to dismiss and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Wall-DeSousa v. Florida Dep't of Highway Safety and Motor Vehicles, 691 F. App'x 584, 592-93 & n.5 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Here, the allegations of the second amended complaint, taken with the text of the November 5, 2014 letter canceling the Wall-DeSousas' driver's licenses based on § 741.212, show substantial lawful intent without ruling out some unlawful intent, too. It is undisputed that, at the time of the November 5, 2014 letter, the enforcement of § 741.212 was not enjoined. Florida law did not recognize out-of-state same-sex marriages and driver's licenses based on the Wall-DeSousas' out-of-state marriage license. Once enforcement of § 741.212 was enjoined on January 6, 2015, the requested driver's licenses were issued shortly thereafter. . .Given our precedent, the circumstances alleged, and the state of the Florida law at the time, we cannot say that the district court erred in dismissing this case against the defendants based on qualified immunity. . . This is not a case where no legitimate reason in fact motivated the defendants' conduct. Importantly too, at the time of the conduct here, it was not clearly established federal law that the defendants could not act as they did. . . .The dissent suggests that a partial lawful motivation can never be decided on a motion to dismiss. But this ignores the allegations in the Wall-DeSousas' second amended complaint, the text of the defendants' letter which is properly before the Court (see n.3, infra), and the fact that § 741.212 remained the law at the time the letter was sent. Although qualified immunity defenses are sometimes resolved at the summary judgment stage, district courts may grant motions to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity if the undisputed facts in the plaintiffs' own complaint show that the defendants acted lawfully. . .The dissent suggests that the Wall-DeSousas need discovery. But the text of the letter is evidence of at least one of the defendants' motivations. . . And even if the Wall-DeSousas could show an improper motive too in discovery, here we have assumed that fact in the Wall-DeSousas' favor.")

Wall-DeSousa v. Florida Dep't of Highway Safety and Motor Vehicles, 691 F. App'x 584, 594 (11th Cir. 2017) (O'Malley, J., dissenting) ("Reading Foy broadly would effectively immunize all defendants who luck into lawful post-hoc explanations for otherwise illegally-motivated behavior. Even where flagrant smoking guns exist, plaintiffs will never be able to discover them. And where, by sheer providence, the plaintiffs already have a smoking gun in hand, how can they use it to rebut a motion to dismiss if its contents are disputed? . . . I acknowledge wholeheartedly that the Wall-DeSousas' complaint is not a model of clarity, replacing concrete and particularized allegations with conclusory generalities. Had the district court rejected their complaint as failing outright to provide 'sufficient factual matter' to satisfy the straightforward requirements of Iqbal and Twombly, I would have few qualms in affirming. . . By relying instead on Foy, the district court's analysis begins a dangerous practice, which today's opinion ratifies. I respectfully dissent.")

Brown v. Davis, 684 F. App'x 928, ___ (11th Cir. 2017) ("In the employment discrimination context, the 'clearly established' requirement provides that a state official 'can be motivated, in part, by a dislike or hostility toward a certain protected class to which a citizen belongs and still act lawfully' where 'the record shows they would have acted as they, in fact, did act even if they had lacked discriminatory intent.' Rioux v. City of Atlanta, 520 F.3d 1269, 1283 (11th Cir. 2008) (quoting Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1534 (11th Cir. 1996)). 'Unless it, as a legal matter, is plain under the specific facts and circumstances of the case that the defendant's conduct—despite his having adequate lawful reasons to support the act—was the result of his unlawful motive, the defendant is entitled to immunity.' Foy, 94 F.3d at 1535. 'Where the facts assumed for summary judgment purposes in a case involving qualified immunity show mixed motives (lawful and unlawful motivations) and pre-existing law does not dictate that the merits of the case must be decided in plaintiff's favor, the defendant is entitled to immunity.' Id.")

Jackson v. Humphrey, 776 F.3d 1232, 1241-42 (11th Cir. 2015) ("The District Court should have granted the Corrections officials' motion for summary judgment on Mrs. Jackson's claims. Here, the Corrections officials made just one decision with respect to Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges, the decision found in the July 19, 2012 letters. With respect to this decision, the Corrections officials' entitlement to the protections of qualified immunity should have been determined 'at the time' that they sent the letters to Mr. and Mrs. Jackson. . . This is the case even though the decision, like many decisions made by public officials, had consequences in the future. The purpose for qualified immunity is to permit officials to act without fear of harassing litigation as long as they can reasonably anticipate before they act whether their conduct will expose them to liability. . . . Thus, the entitlement to the protections of qualified immunity is judged based on the facts and the law present at the time that public officials make their decisions and does not take into account later facts or changes in the law. [citing cases] Therefore, the District Court erred in its characterization of the Corrections officials' decision to terminate Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges as having 'continued [to] den[y Mrs. Jackson] visitation long after the end of the hunger strike.' Rather, the record establishes that the decision to terminate. . . Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges was lawfully made when the letters were sent on July 19, 2012, and that the Corrections officials were therefore entitled to qualified immunity from suit for their decision. Accordingly, the Corrections officials are entitled to qualified immunity for both the period during the hunger strike and for the period after the hunger strike ended.")

Jackson v. Humphrey, 776 F.3d 1232, 1244-45 (11th Cir. 2015) (Hinkle, District Judge, concurring) ("On the primary opinion's view of the facts, the Corrections officials revoked Ms. Jackson's visitation privileges for both a lawful motive (preventing the security risk and harm to the institution that come with hunger strikes) and an unlawful motive (punishing Ms. Jackson for free speech for reasons unrelated to security and institutional harm). The primary opinion says, '[T]he law of this Circuit is that, where, as here, the facts assumed for summary judgment show both a lawful and unlawful motivation for the decision made by a government official, the official is entitled to qualified immunity.' For this proposition the primary opinion cites Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1535 (11th Cir.1996). Another case supporting the statement is Stanley v. City of Dalton, Ga., 219 F.3d 1280 (11th Cir.2000). This indeed seems to be the law of the circuit. But it should not be. In a proper case, when it makes a difference, the issue should be revisited. . . .In my view, summary judgment is improper when (1) a plaintiff asserts that an officer took action based on a factor that, as a matter of clearly established law, could not constitutionally be considered, and (2) the record presents a genuine dispute over whether that prohibited factor was a but-for cause of the officer's challenged action. In asserting the contrary, Foy and Stanley confuse the subjective standard that governs the merits (what was the officer's actual motivation for taking the challenged action?) with the objective standard that applies to qualified immunity (would a reasonable officer have known that taking action for that reason was unconstitutional?). An officer's actual thought process does not always line up with what a reasonable officer could have thought. None of this calls into question the primary opinion's conclusion that the Corrections officials are entitled to summary judgment here. The record establishes without genuine dispute that in prohibiting Ms. Jackson from visiting her husband, the Corrections officials were motivated at least in part by legitimate concern for institutional security and resources. No clearly established law suggested that acting on that basis was unconstitutional. On this record, a reasonable jury could find that Ms. Jackson's protected activities were a motivating factor in the decision to prohibit her from visiting, but a reasonable jury could not find that her protected activities were a but-for cause of the decision.")

Jackson v. Humphrey, 776 F.3d 1232, 1245-47 (11th Cir. 2015) (Martin, J., dissenting) ("The majority awards qualified immunity to three Georgia Department of Corrections officials for their complete and permanent termination of Delma Jackson's visitation privileges with her inmate husband. The officials first revoked Mrs. Jackson's privileges based on her purported role in a prison hunger strike. But they did not restore her privileges when the strike ended on July 26, 2012. Neither did they reinstate her privileges when they returned visitation privileges to all others who had been denied visitation for the same reason. Indeed, by all accounts they have not restored her privileges to this day, nearly thirty months later. Because I am convinced that any stated legitimate penological purpose for revoking her privileges vanished sometime after the end of the hunger strike, and because qualified immunity cannot extend to protect the officials if their sole remaining motivation was to retaliate against Mrs. Jackson for her protected speech, I respectfully dissent. I am not persuaded by the majority's conclusion that our qualified immunity analysis can only look to the initial revocation communicated by the July 19, 2012 revocation letters. Specifically, I reject the idea that we are permitted to consider only the July 19, 2012 communication of the decision (which did not include an end-date for the action, as required by GDOC operating procedures), and must ignore the ongoing impact of that decision which still prevents Mrs. Jackson from seeing her husband now almost three years later. While certainly we must consider the letters, Mrs. Jackson's First Amendment retaliation claim is not so limited. As the District Court correctly noted, Mrs. Jackson challenged the permanent suspension of her privileges. The officials have the authority at any point to reinstate Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges. Their continued failure to do so perpetuates the permanent suspension and should be considered as part of the qualified immunity analysis. The District Court was right in observing that the officials did not offer any valid motivation for the permanent suspension of Mrs. Jackson's privileges once the hunger strike ended. The officials returned visitation privileges to every other prison visitor whose rights had been revoked during the hunger strike. They suggest that Mrs. Jackson's privileges were not restored due to incomplete paperwork. But even if that were true, Mrs. Jackson made clear her request to be able to visit her husband when she sought an injunction for reinstatement of her privileges nearly a year before her husband was allegedly given the proper paperwork. The officials knew then that Mrs. Jackson wanted her privileges back, but did not reinstate them. The majority points out that qualified immunity is 'judged based on the facts and the law present at the time that public officials make their decisions,' not 'tak[ing] into account later facts or changes in the law.'. . While that may be true, all the cases they rely upon stand for the unremarkable principle that an officer who performs a single act which does not violate the law when performed, will not be stripped of that immunity just because of a later change in the law. . . I do not read those holdings to apply here so as to prevent us from considering the officers' ongoing decisions to revoke and refuse to reinstate Mrs. Jackson's privileges. Neither do those cases stop us from evaluating whether the scope of the deprivation was reasonable at the time it was made. The majority acknowledges that a decision that would warrant qualified immunity at the time it is made can have ongoing consequences. . . And I understand that qualified immunity can attach to inaction just as it does to actions. . . Our precedent does not require us to turn a blind eye when defendants' ongoing inaction causes harm, especially where, as here, it was the same defendants' earlier action that created the harm in the first place. Our analysis should begin anew once changing circumstances do away with the justification first given. . . . Even if the majority were correct that the officials 'made just one decision with respect to Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges, the decision found in the July 19, 2012 letters,'. . . I would not hold that the decision is entitled to complete qualified immunity. The letters imposed a permanent revocation of Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges. GDOC Standard Operating Procedures require notice of the 'reason for and length of the [revocation].' The officers' stated reason for revocation was related to the hunger strike, but the letters contained neither a date on which the revocation would end nor a statement that the privileges would be reinstated when the hunger strike was over. In light of those facts, I do not believe that defendants have offered a lawful motive for the breadth of the letters for purposes of qualified immunity. I would affirm the District Court's partial grant of qualified immunity.")

Sherrod v. Johnson, 667 F.3d 1359, 1364 (11th Cir. 2012) ("A proper analysis of Johnson and Crutchfield's entitlement to qualified immunity is not whether they knew that terminating Sherrod in retaliation for protected speech was lawful, but rather whether terminating him based upon all the information available to them at the time, to include any knowledge of his protected speech, was objectively reasonable. See Stanley, supra, at 1294. In Foy, we noted that the presence of a jury issue about a defendant's improper intent does not necessarily preclude qualified immunity. Foy, 94 F.3d at 1533. . . .The facts in the record show lawful justifications for recommending Sherrod's termination. On May 16, 2002, Plaintiff received an unsatisfactory evaluation at Olympic Heights from Vice–Principal Christine Hall, with seven areas of concern. As a result, Sherrod was placed on a remedial teaching performance plan. While at Roosevelt Middle School, Crutchfield began to receive complaints from parents about excessive work assignments and deviations from the curriculum. Further, on one occasion, Crutchfield observed unsupervised students standing outside Sherrod's classroom. After consulting with Sherrod, Crutchfield gave him another unsatisfactory evaluation. Plaintiff failed to present any precedent, and the Court is aware of none, to suggest that a reasonable principal and superintendent armed with the knowledge they possessed, to include the unsatisfactory performance reviews, would know they could not recommend and/or adopt a recommendation to terminate Sherrod. Accordingly, Johnson and Crutchfield are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Danley v. Allen, 540 F.3d 1298, 1308, 1309 (11th Cir. 2008) ("Although the initial pepper spraying itself was not excessive force, this is not a case in which a jailer simply sprayed an inmate who had repeatedly failed to obey commands. Danley's complaint groups together the initial spraying and the subsequent twenty-minute confinement as a single instance of excessive force. Although less common than the direct application of force, subjecting a prisoner to special confinement that causes him to suffer increased effects of environmental conditions–here, the pepper spray lingering in the air and on him–can constitute excessive force. . . . Reading the complaint in the light most favorable to Danley, the pepper spray had its intended effect; it disabled Danley before the jailers pushed him back into the small cell. Given that he was disabled, there was no need for the jailers to continue using force after spraying him. The use of force in the form of extended confinement in the small, poorly ventilated, pepper spray filled cell, when there were other readily available alternatives, was excessive. . . . Having established a constitutional violation, the next step in the qualified immunity analysis usually is to determine whether the right was clearly established. . . However, we have held that 'there is no room for qualified immunity ' in Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment excessive force cases because they require a subjective element that is 'so extreme' that no reasonable person could believe that his actions were lawful. . . As a result, we conclude that the district court did not err by denying the defendants' motions to dismiss Danley's excessive force claim on qualified immunity grounds.").

Rioux v. City of Atlanta, 520 F.3d 1269, 1282-85 (11th Cir. 2008) ("If the trier of fact believed Rioux's showing of pretext, and disbelieved Appellees' proffered legitimate reason, then a violation of the Equal Protection Clause would be shown. The 'other' evidence from which a jury might infer discriminatory animus on the part of Rubin and COO Young, which we have summarized above, constitutes that showing by Rioux, at the summary judgment stage, of the violation of a constitutional right. The trial court below addressed the next step in the qualified immunity analysis by noting that there was no real dispute that the right to be free from employment discrimination was clearly established at the time of Rioux's demotion. As a general principle, we can all agree with that statement. . . . However, the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis asks the question 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.' . . . Rioux must demonstrate at this step in the qualified immunity analysis that a reasonable fire chief and a reasonable chief operating officer of a city would know that demoting a high-ranking, subordinate, discretionary officer in the factual circumstances presented here violated clearly established law. . . And it is this that he cannot show. . . . The events of May 2, 2004 are largely undisputed, and the results of the OPS and Law Department investigations confirmed that Rioux violated department rules. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Rioux, Appellees had adequate lawful reasons to support their decision to demote Rioux, and may have had improper race-based motives to take the challenged action as well. What Rioux has presented, then, is a 'mixed-motives' case, which is governed by the analysis set out in Foy. . . . Tracking the reasoning used in Foy to reverse the denial of summary judgment where qualified immunity was interposed as a defense, here no jury could find that it would have been unlawful for a fire chief and the city's chief operating officer to do as Appellees did if they had lacked discriminatory intent. . . No jury could find that a reasonable fire chief and chief operating officer would never have demoted Rioux but for a discriminatory intent. . . The record here, as in Foy, undisputably establishes that Appellees were motivated at least in part by lawful justifications, supported by the independent investigations conducted by OPS and the Law Department, investigations which these two decisionmakers were not a part of and which there is no evidence they manipulated.. . . . The Foy analytical framework was applied in Stanley to a mixed motives case, following the Supreme Court pronouncement in Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998). In Crawford-El, the Court rejected a rule that would have required a heightened burden of proof from plaintiffs in unconstitutional-motive cases. . . The Crawford-El decision did not address how courts should apply the objective reasonableness test after a plaintiff creates a jury question on improper motive, where improper motive is an element of the claim, as it is here. Stanley concluded that Foy was the correct approach and remained the law of this circuit. . . And so Stanley reiterated that a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity only where 'the record undisputably establishes that the defendant in fact was motivated, at least in part, by lawful considerations.' . . . Because pre-existing law did not provide fair warning to Appellees that demoting Rioux under these circumstances would violate clearly established federal law, Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity . . . . If Rioux had presented his claims under the provisions of Title VII, he would be entitled to have his claims of discrimination heard by a jury. The result we reach here is compelled by the remedy Rioux chose, that is, section 1983 claims against individual decisionmakers rather than his employer, for which the law recognizes the right to qualified immunity. Again, because Rioux has not been able to present any evidence that Appellees' decisions were not motivated, at least in part, by lawful justifications, Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity.")

McMillan v. DeKalb County, Georgia, No. 05-17110, 2006 WL 3204829, at *2, *3 (11th Cir. Nov. 6, 2006) (not published) ("Drew misapprehends the analytical framework applicable to qualified immunity in mixed motive cases. The district court observed correctly that the right to be free from racial discrimination in the public workplace was a clearly established constitutional right of which a reasonable official would have known. The district court also recognized correctly that the payroll abuse attributed to Plaintiff could objectively justify Plaintiff's termination. Qualified immunity was denied at this stage because the pretrial record failed to establish that Drew's termination decision indisputably was actually motivated at least in part by the payroll incident. Drew takes issue with the district court's conclusions on the evidentiary sufficiency of her lawful motives. We have jurisdiction to review evidentiary sufficiency issues when core qualified immunity issues also are raised. . . Viewing the pre-trial record in the light most favorable to Plaintiff–as we and the district court are required to do–the record fails to show indisputably that Drew was motivated (at least in part) by the legitimate reason she proffered.")

Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265, 1273, 1274 (11th Cir. 2005) ("'[A]n official acts with deliberate indifference when he intentionally delays providing an inmate with access to medical treatment, knowing that the inmate has a life-threatening condition or an urgent medical condition that would be exacerbated by delay.' . . This general statement of law ordinarily does not preclude qualified immunity in cases involving a delay in medical treatment for a serious injury. The cases are highly fact-specific and involve an array of circumstances pertinent to just what kind of notice is imputed to a government official and to the constitutional adequacy of what was done to help and when. Most cases in which deliberate indifference is asserted are far from obvious violations of the Constitution. But the assumed circumstances here are stark and simple, and the decisional language from cases such as Lancaster obviously and clearly applies to these extreme circumstances: the officers knew Haggard was unconscious and not breathing and–for fourteen minutes–did nothing. They did not check Haggard's breathing or pulse; they did not administer CPR; they did not summon medical help. Given these circumstances, we conclude that the Officers were fairly warned by our case law and that the Officers' total failure to address Haggard's medical need during the fourteen-minute period violated Haggard's constitutional rights, which violation should have been obvious to any objectively reasonable correctional officer.").

Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265, 1274, 1275 (11th Cir. 2005) (Edmondson, C.J., concurring) ("I concur in the judgment. And I concur in the opinion; I believe it accurately presents the current law of the Circuit. I write separately to say that I question whether the law of this Circuit on Eighth Amendment claims of excessive force is correct. Briefly stated, I am inclined to believe that the excessive-force tort created by the Eighth Amendment has an important objective element: The correctional officer's physical conduct (force) used must be objectively unreasonable under the circumstances. So, if the conduct (force) is not outside of the borders of objectively reasonable conduct given the circumstances, the prisoner's Eighth Amendment right would not be violated no matter what the particular officer's subjective state of mind might be. Put differently, the constitutional tort–I suspect–requires objectively unreasonable action (force) plus a subjective, bad faith motive or intent to cause unnecessary suffering. If the officer's act in applying force is objectively reasonable, no need would exist to consider state of mind. Because I am inclined to believe an Eighth Amendment violation based on excessive force requires objectively unreasonable force, I expect that the defense of qualified immunity can apply in cases based on Eighth Amendment excessive force claims. If the force used was not force that the preexisting law had clearly established to be unreasonable given the circumstances, the defendant correctional officer seemingly should be entitled to the defense of qualified immunity on that account. After all, qualified immunity is available in most constitutional torts, including other kinds of excessive force cases. Correctional officers are due considerable deference in how they deal with violent inmates. Our Circuit's law makes it too hard for correctional officers–who have a tough (at times, dangerous) job and are surrounded by hostile witnesses–to avoid suit and trial because our law focuses on the particular correctional officers' subjective motive or intent. I stress that I do not believe that the Supreme Court's decisions compel our Circuit's law to be as it seems to be now. The question I raise here was not briefed in this case. I am also uncertain that, if the Circuit's law operated in the way that I think is likely more correct, the result for this appeal would be different on the excessive force claim. Therefore, I see no point in elaborating or sharpening or finalizing my views at this time; it seems prudent to wait for a case where we have pertinent briefing and where the outcome would doubtlessly be impacted and then to test in that context the ideas advanced for consideration today. But I do hope that this Court and the Bar will keep the ideas that I have raised today under active review. In some cases, I am pretty sure the outcome would be affected if the law of excessive force under the Eighth Amendment was set out differently than we seem to do now, that is, if we took a tack giving real attention to an objective element (unreasonable force) as well as the subjective mental element.").

Snow v. City of Citronelle, 420 F.3d 1262, 1270 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Snow, a jury could find that Chennault subjectively believed that there was a strong risk that Poiroux would attempt suicide and deliberately did not take any action to prevent her suicide. Those facts, if found by a jury, would establish a constitutional violation. Because, at the time of Poiroux's death, it was clearly established that an officer's deliberate indifference to the risk of serious harm to a detainee is a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, the district court erroneously granted summary judgment on Snow's claim against Chennault.").

Carter v. Galloway, 352 F.3d 1346, 1350 n.10 (11th Cir. 2003) ("The district court also addressed Defendants' qualified immunity defense. Because Plaintiff's deliberate indifference claim fails, Defendants have no need for qualified immunity. If Plaintiff has stated a good deliberate indifference claim, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for the law was not clearly established in Plaintiff's favor.")

Bogle v. McClure, 332 F.3d 1347, 1356 (11th Cir. 2003) ("Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the Librarians, the record evidence does not undisputably indicate that Appellants were in fact motivated, at least in part, by objectively valid reasons. Therefore, Appellants were not entitled to qualified immunity under Foy.").

Skrtich v. Thornton, 280 F.3d 1295, 1301 (11th Cir. 2002) ("In this Circuit, a defense of qualified immunity is not available in cases alleging excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, because the use of force 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm' is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution by the Supreme Court decisions in Hudson and Whitley. See Johnson v. Breeden, __ F.3d __ (11th Cir.2002). There is simply no room for a qualified immunity defense when the plaintiff alleges such a violation. Id. The only question, then, is whether the plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss or a motion for summary judgment. If he has done so, that is the end of the inquiry.").

Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1321, 1322 (11th Cir. 2002) ("We are aware of Saucier v. Katz . . . but think that case is distinguishable, because it did not involve a constitutional tort with a subjective intent element. Instead, Saucier involved a Fourth Amendment claim of use of excessive force against an arrestee, and such claims are purely objective. They turn solely on the objective reasonableness of the amount of force used in the circumstances, regardless of the intent or other subjective state of mind of the defendant officer. . . It makes perfect sense to conclude, as the Supreme Court did in Saucier, that with such claims the merits issue and the qualified immunity issue are distinct, so that the existence of a valid Fourth Amendment excessive force claim is not inconsistent with qualified immunity. In other words, a defendant officer could use force in making an arrest that is later judged to be excessive enough that it violates the Fourth Amendment, but if prior decisions did not clearly establish that the use of that amount of force in those circumstances was constitutionally excessive, the defendant officer would be entitled to qualified immunity. That is what Saucier holds. It is different with claims arising from the infliction of excessive force on a prisoner in violation of the Eighth Amendment Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. In order to have a valid claim on the merits of excessive force in violation of that constitutional provision, the excessive force must have been sadistically and maliciously applied for the very purpose of causing harm. Equally important, it is clearly established that all infliction of excessive force on a prisoner sadistically and maliciously for the very purpose of causing harm and which does cause harm violates the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. So, where this type of constitutional violation is established there is no room for qualified immunity. It is not just that this constitutional tort involves a subjective element, it is that the subjective element required to establish it is so extreme that every conceivable set of circumstances in which this constitutional violation occurs is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution by the Supreme Court decisions in Hudson and Whitley. This is a different situation entirely from the one in Saucier, . . . where the Supreme Court said that, 'neither respondent nor the Court of Appeals has identified any case demonstrating a clearly established rule prohibiting the officer from acting as he did, nor are we aware of any such rule.'").

Marsh v. Butler County, 268 F.3d 1014, 1031 n.8 (11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("In Hill v. DeKalb Regional Yourth Detention Center, 40 F.3d 1176, 1186 (11th Cir.1994), we see some dicta: 'a finding of deliberate indifference necessarily precludes a finding of qualified immunity'. We reject that dicta because it incorrectly jumbles the merits of an Eighth Amendment violation with the separate concept of an immunity defense.").

Stanley v. City of Dalton, 219 F.3d 1280, 1296 & n.26 & n.29 (11th Cir. 2000) ("We conclude that Chadwick is due qualified immunity under Foy. A defendant is entitled to qualified immunity under the Foy rationale only where, among other things, the record indisputably establishes that the defendant in fact was motivated, at least in part, by lawful considerations. . . . In this case–viewing the record in the light most favorable to Stanley, as we must at the summary judgment stage–we can say that the record undisputably establishes (a) that objectively valid reasons did exist for the step Chadwick took, and (b) that Chadwick was motivated, at least in part, by these lawful considerations. Thus, even at the summary judgment stage, we can say that this case is undisputably one of mixed motives. Therefore, Foy commands qualified immunity on mixed-motive grounds in this case. . . .Crawford-El did not separately propose its own analysis for unconstitutional-motive cases, much less reject the kind of analysis we used in Foy. And, because Foy is based on well-settled principles of summary judgment and qualified immunity, we think that the approach taken in Foy is consistent with the Supreme Court's words and holding in Crawford-El. We, therefore, conclude that Foy remains the law of this Circuit. . . . We emphasize that it is not sufficient for Chadwick to establish that there exists a lawful basis for a reasonable police chief to have terminated Stanley. Rather, in order for the Foy analysis to apply, Chadwick himself must have been actually motivated, at least in part, by that lawful basis.").

Macuba v. DeBoer, 193 F.3d 1316, 1321 n.8 (11th Cir. 1999) ("The parties devote significant space in their briefs to the Supreme Court's recent decision in Crawford-El v. Britton, . . .which rejected a requirement that a plaintiff in a § 1983 case produce clear and convincing proof of improper motive when motive is an essential element of the constitutional claim. The apparent disagreement between the parties is whether, after Crawford-El, a district court may consider a government official's intent or motive in determining if the official is entitled to qualified immunity, when the claim is for First Amendment retaliation. We have not decided what effect, if any, Crawford-El has on our holdings, such as Mencer v. Hammonds, 134 F.3d 1066, 1070-71 (11th Cir.1998), and Walker v. Schwalbe, 112 F.3d 1127, 1132-33 (11th Cir.1997), which concluded that a district court should consider, for qualified immunity purposes, evidence of improper motive, but only when motive is part of the constitutional claim. We decline to address this issue here because, even if Macuba has shown that appellants dislike him, he has not produced sufficient evidence to establish they caused him not to be hired.").

Brown v. Cochran, 171 F.3d 1329, 1333 (11th Cir. 1999) ("The dispute lies in whether a reasonably objective trier of fact could find racial animus on Cochran's part in light of all the facts. In other words, the issue is whether or not Brown has created a genuine issue of fact that Cochran acted out of racial animus and that Cochran's proffered reason (Brown's poor performance record) was merely a pretext for discrimination. After reviewing the record, we are persuaded that Brown has not created a genuine issue of fact in this regard, and that a trier of fact would find Cochran's actions objectively reasonable. Therefore we conclude that Brown has failed to establish a deprivation of a constitutional right at all, and a fortiori has not established a violation of any clearly established constitutional right.").

Johnson v. City of Ft. Lauderdale, 126 F.3d 1372, 1379-80 (11th Cir. 1997) ("The holding in Foy rested primarily on the existence of an indisputable and adequate lawful motive on the part of the social service employees such that reasonable officials would disagree as to the legality of their conduct in light of the Mt. Healthy and Arlington Hts. doctrines. Here, the transcripts of the disciplinary hearings against Johnson offer conclusive support for the defendants' claimed adequate lawful motives for demoting and discharging Johnson. . . . Even assuming that the defendants acted with some discriminatory or retaliatory motives in demoting and discharging Johnson, the law did not clearly establish that a reasonable official faced with the same evidence of disobedience and deception should not have disciplined Johnson in the same manner. We therefore reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment on Johnson's § 1981 and § 1983 claims. . . . We do not, however, reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment on Johnson's § 1985(3) claim. . . . We have squarely held that qualified immunity is not available as a defense to a § 1985(3) claim, see Burrell v. Board of Trustees of Ga. Military College, . . .and are not swayed by the defendants' argument that Burrell is no longer legally viable in light of Lassiter . . . . Lassiter does not undermine Burrell's central rationale: that the narrow intent element of § 1985(3) erects a significant hurdle for § 1985(3) plaintiffs, thereby obviating the need for granting public officials qualified immunity with respect to a § 1985(3) claim.").

Walker v. Schwalbe, 112 F.3d 1127, 1132 (11th Cir. 1997) ("Defendants are correct that there is generally no subjective component to qualified immunity analysis and that the test is based on objective legal reasonableness. . . However. . . [w]here the official's state of mind is an essential element of the underlying violation, the state of mind must be considered in the qualified immunity analysis or a plaintiff would almost never be able to prove that the official was not entitled to qualified immunity. We hold, as every Circuit that has considered this issue has held, that where subjective motive or intent is a critical element of the alleged constitutional violation the intent of the government actor is relevant. . . . Defendants argue that denial of qualified immunity here would be equivalent to the court's holding that once an employee has engaged in First Amendment speech he may no longer be punished for valid reasons. This argument misses the point. An employee may still be punished for valid reasons. However, when the employee can establish a genuine issue of material fact that the true reason for the punishment was actually the speech, then the case must go to trial.").

Walker v. Schwalbe, 112 F.3d 1127, 1137 n.3 (11th Cir. 1997) (Birch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I note that our precedent is ambiguous regarding the correct analytical framework in a qualified-immunity context when intent is an element of the cause of action. Compare McMillian, 88 F.3d 1554, in which the court assumed, for purposes of qualified-immunity analysis, that the defendants possessed an intent to punish the plaintiff, regardless of possible evidence of a lawful motive on the part of the defendants, with Foy, 94 F.3d at 1534-35 ('[W]hen an adequate lawful motive is present, that a discriminatory motive might also exist does not sweep qualified immunity from the field ... Unless it, as a legal matter, is plain under the specific facts and circumstances of the case that the defendants' conduct–despite his having adequate lawful reasons to support the act–was the result of his unlawful motive, the defendant is entitled to immunity.'). There are other contexts in which the role of evidence of subjective intent of a state actor complicates the qualified-immunity question. Some courts have found, for instance, that a finding of a genuine issue of fact with respect to a defendant's subjective intent necessarily precludes entitlement to qualified immunity when the claim advanced is deliberate indifference to medical needs under the Eighth Amendment. [citing cases] The claim of deliberate indifference obviously is not at issue in this case. An examination of this claim does serve to highlight, however, the unsettled state of the law as it pertains to the court's basis for jurisdiction–as well as its analytical approach– in qualified-immunity cases when subjective intent is raised as a disputed predicate question of fact.").

McMillian v. Johnson, 101 F.3d 1363, 1368-69 (11th Cir. 1996) (On Petition For Panel Rehearing and Suggestion of Rehearing en banc) (Propst, Senior District Judge, specially concurring) ("Since this case, unlike Jenkins and Wright, implicates subjective intent or motive, the issue remains as to how such intent claims are to be considered during the course of a qualified immunity analysis. . . . An issue is whether claims involving subjective intent are appropriate for summary judgment based upon qualified immunity if a legitimate motive is simply posited. I find it difficult to see how such cases can be determined at the summary judgment stage if there is any substantial evidence of an illegal motive in view of the established law which precludes a trial court's making credibility determinations, weighing the evidence, and interfering with a jury's drawing of legitimate inferences from the evidence. . . . I suggest that the qualified immunity issues cry out for further en banc consideration, especially as to the claims involving intent or motive as an element vis a vis those which do not.").

Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1533-35 & n.9 (11th Cir. 1996) ("Our former decisions . . . must not be understood to rule out qualified immunity wherever discriminatory intent appears in the summary judgment record even if discriminatory intent is an element of the underlying constitutional tort. Qualified immunity is too important a right of public servants and too important a public policy to be nullified so easily. The Supreme Court has not instructed us to drop qualified immunity . . . from cases in which discriminatory intent is an element of the underlying tort. . . . So, whenever a public officer is sued for money damages in his individual capacity for violating federal law, the basic qualified immunity question looms unchanged: Could a reasonable officer have believed that what the defendant did might be lawful in the circumstances and in the light of the clearly established law? . . . . [S]tate officials act lawfully despite having discriminatory intent, where the record shows they would have acted as they, in fact, did act even if they had lacked discriminatory intent. [citing Mt. Healthy v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 286-87 (1979)] The Mt. Healthy doctrine is part of the law and, when the concept is presented by a defendant's argument, must not be overlooked in the qualified immunity analysis. . . . One trigger to the doctrine's application depends upon whether the record establishes that the defendant, in fact, did possess a substantial lawful motive for acting as he did act. At least when an adequate lawful motive is present, that a discriminatory motive might also exist does not sweep qualified immunity from the field even at the summary judgment stage. Unless it, as a legal matter, is plain under the specific facts and circumstances of the case that the defendant's conduct–despite his having adequate lawful reasons to support the act–was the result of his unlawful motive, the defendant is entitled to immunity. Where the facts assumed for summary judgment purposes in a case involving qualified immunity show mixed motives (lawful and unlawful motivations) and pre-existing law does not dictate that the merits of the case must be decided in plaintiff's favor, the defendant is entitled to immunity. . . . Here the record, in fact, shows substantial lawful intent, while not ruling out some unlawful intent, too. Unlike McMillian and Ratliff (which involved pointed district court fact findings–that we did not review–about the intent of the defendants and in which the Mt. Healthy doctrine was not discussed), we are deciding the qualified immunity question based on circumstances which include indisputable and sufficient lawful motivations on the part of Defendants.").

McMillian v. Johnson, 88 F.3d 1554, 1566 (11th Cir. 1996) ("Like every other circuit that has considered the issue, we have held that intent or motivation may not be ignored when intent or motivation is an essential element of the underlying constitutional violation." citing Edwards v. Wallace Community College, 49 F.3d 1517, 1524 (11th Cir.1995)).

Ratliff v. DeKalb County, Ga., 62 F.3d 338, 341 (11th Cir. 1995) ("In considering a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the Supreme Court has held that courts should pay no attention to the subjective intent of the government actor. [citing Harlow] Harlow was intended to make a fundamental change in the law of immunity. And the strict meaning of the words used in Harlow for the immunity standard would protect public officials from personal liability when the pertinent substantive law makes the official's state of mind an essential element of the alleged constitutional violation. Despite Harlow's words, we have said that in one kind of qualified immunity case–where discriminatory intent is an element of the tort–intent remains relevant. [footnote and cites omitted] We are bound by our earlier holding that, in qualified immunity cases, intent is a relevant inquiry if discriminatory intent is a specific element of the constitutional tort; and, we follow that rule here.").

Hansen v. Soldenwagner, 19 F.3d 573, 578 (11th Cir. 1994) ("For qualified immunity purposes, the subjective motivation of the defendant-official is immaterial . . . . Harlow's objective standard would be rendered meaningless if a plaintiff could overcome a summary judgment motion based on qualified immunity by injecting the defendant's into the pleadings.").

Wilhite v. Parker, No. 7:20-CV-00847-KOB, 2022 WL 3718502, at *3–4 (N.D. Ala. Aug. 29, 2022) ("At least one district court in this circuit has recently pointed out the significant tension between Skrtich's bright-line rule and Supreme Court precedent on qualified immunity, which may call for a more fact-specific analysis of whether the particular type and extent force at issue has been 'clearly established' as unconstitutional. . . Judge Mizelle aptly notes that the Supreme Court has held that defendants in an excessive force case 'may nevertheless be shielded from liability' if they 'did not violate clearly established [law].'. . And Judge Mizelle also correctly observes that Skrtich's rule 'assumes that all Eighth Amendment excessive force cases are so similar that no court need ever consider whether the law is clearly established as applied to the particular facts,' whereas 'the Supreme Court has held that the clearly-established-law inquiry must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. .This court adds that the Supreme Court has nevertheless rejected a requirement that facts be 'fundamentally similar' or even 'materially similar' to past cases for law to be clearly established, holding instead that 'the salient question' is whether existing law 'gave [Defendants] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [Plaintiff] was unconstitutional.'. . This court shares the concerns that Judge Mizelle raises in Stalley but is bound by Skrtich's bright-line rule and therefore applies it. As a result, '[t]he only question ... is whether the plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss or a motion for summary judgment,' . . . and the court now turns to that question.")

Crowley v. Scott, No. 5:14-CV-326 (MTT), 2016 WL 2993174, at *7 (M.D. Ga. May 23, 2016) ("It is undisputed that Scott was acting within his discretionary authority, and the Court has concluded that a reasonable jury could find that Scott violated Crowley's constitutional rights by using excessive force. Thus, Scott is entitled to qualified immunity only if the law was not clearly established that his conduct was unlawful. To overcome Scott's qualified immunity defense, Crowley cites the former rule for Fourteenth Amendment excessive force cases: a plaintiff can overcome the defense of qualified immunity simply by establishing the violation of his constitutional rights. . . This was the rule because 'the subjective element required to establish [a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim was] so extreme that every conceivable set of circumstances in which this constitutional violations occurs is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution.'. . However, because the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley eliminated the subjective element in Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims, a plaintiff asserting the claim must establish a constitutional violation and that the defendant violated clearly established law. . .

Scott argues 'the law was not clearly established that the amount of forced used was excessive in response to the resistance [Crowley] offered in response to the directions Scott had given him.'. . At the time of the events in this case, the law was clearly established that a handcuffed, non-resisting, and otherwise compliant person has a 'right to be free from excessive force.'. . Therefore, if a jury credits Crowley's version that Scott used a leg sweep while Crowley was handcuffed, non-resistant, and otherwise not creating the disturbance that Scott described, then no reasonable officer in Scott's position could have believed that Scott's use of force was lawful. . . . Accordingly, Scott is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

V. DISCOVERY

In some cases, limited discovery may be needed on the qualified immunity issue to properly establish the contours of the right in question. A court may defer its decision on the immunity question, allow limited discovery to achieve the requisite factual development and decide the issue on summary judgment.

In Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998), the Court noted:

> Discovery involving public officials is indeed one of the evils that Harlow aimed to address, but neither that opinion nor subsequent decisions create an immunity from all discovery. Harlow sought to protect officials from the costs of 'broad-reaching' discovery. . . and we have since recognized that limited discovery may sometimes be necessary before the district court can resolve a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.

523 U.S. at 593 n.14.

But see Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1953, 1954 (2009) ("We decline respondent's invitation to relax the pleading requirements on the ground that the Court of Appeals promises petitioners minimally intrusive discovery. That promise provides especially cold comfort in this pleading context, where we are impelled to give real content to the concept of qualified immunity for high-level officials who must be neither deterred nor detracted from the vigorous performance of their duties. Because respondent's complaint is deficient under Rule 8, he is not entitled to discovery, cabined or otherwise.").

D.C. CIRCUIT

Hinojosa v. Livingston, No. 14-40459, 2015 WL 7422990, at *3-6, *9-11, *14 (5th Cir. Nov. 18, 2015) ("[T]o determine whether we have jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal, we must determine whether the district court's order complied with our precedent for issuing such orders. . . First, the district court must determine 'that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity.'. . . When reviewing a complaint that meets this standard, the district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling and order limited discovery if 'the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts."'. . Such a discovery order must be 'narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.'. . .We first ask whether the complaint pleads facts that, if true, would permit the inference that Defendants are liable under § 1983 for an Eighth Amendment violation and would overcome their qualified immunity defense. We conclude that it does. . . .Here, the complaint alleges an Eighth Amendment violation. The complaint alleges that Defendants subjected Hinojosa to dangerous heat conditions in conscious disregard of the serious risk that the heat posed for prisoners who, like Hinojosa, suffered from certain medical conditions, took certain medications, and had recently been transferred from air-conditioned jails to non-climate-controlled facilities. . . . Prison officials cannot escape liability in a conditions-of-confinement case like this one by arguing that, while they allegedly were aware of and consciously disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm to a discrete class of vulnerable inmates, they were not aware that the particular inmate involved in the case belonged to that class. . . . In sum, then, the complaint adequately alleges an Eighth Amendment violation based on Hinojosa's conditions of confinement. . . . Having determined that the complaint's factual allegations, if true, would establish Defendants' liability for an Eighth Amendment violation and overcome a qualified immunity defense, we next ask whether further clarification of the facts was necessary for the district court to rule on the qualified immunity defense. We easily conclude that it was. When reviewing a well-pleaded complaint and a defendant's motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity, a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling and order limited discovery when 'the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts."'. . In other words, a district court may elect the defer-and-discover approach 'when the defendant's immunity claim turns at least partially on a factual question' that must be answered before a ruling can issue. . . Here, the district court held that it was unable to rule on Defendants' qualified immunity claim because factual development was needed as to their 'knowledge, actions, omissions and/or policies in regards to TDCJ prison operations in times of extreme heat.'. . .The factual questions of what Defendants knew, when they knew it, and whether they investigated and considered possible remedial measures, are undoubtedly necessary to answer before determining whether Defendants acted reasonably in light of clearly established law. Of course, as detailed above, Defendants' knowledge is central to the deliberate indifference element of Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment claim. However, their knowledge is also highly relevant to qualified immunity, because it bears heavily on the reasonableness of their actions. . . . The reasonableness analysis must be different from the deliberate-indifference analysis, because '[o]therwise, a successful claim of qualified immunity in this context would require defendants to demonstrate that they prevail on the merits, thus rendering qualified immunity an empty doctrine.'. . 'In light of these complexities, we have observed that "[a]dditional facts ... are particularly important when evaluating the [reasonableness] prong of the qualified immunity test."'. . That holds true in this case. The district court did not err in determining that factual development was needed to rule on Defendants' qualified immunity defense. . . Our foregoing discussion establishes that the district court was empowered to defer its qualified immunity ruling and issue a discovery order. However, the breadth of the ordered discovery is critically important. Qualified immunity is immunity not only from judgment, but also from suit .

. . . We therefore must determine whether the discovery that the district court ordered was "narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim." Id. (quoting Lion Boulos, 834 F.2d at 507–08). While this presents a somewhat close question, we conclude that the district court's discovery order was appropriately tailored. . . . Because, as set forth above, the district court's order complies with our precedent, we DISMISS this interlocutory appeal for want of jurisdiction. We express no opinion on how the district court should rule on Defendants' qualified immunity defense.")

Navab-Safavi v. Glassman, 637 F.3d 311, 317, 318 (D.C. Cir. 2011) ("Having established that the complaint set forth a violation of right requiring a Pickering balancing against the appellants' assertion of qualified immunity, we now face a question similar to that determined by the Fifth Circuit in Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337 (5th Cir.2004): That is, given the function of qualified immunity in protecting government officials against not only civil liability, but the burden of litigation, did its assertion by the appellants require the district court to terminate the litigation at the motion stage without further resolution of the factual questions underlying the determination of the Pickering balance? Upon review of the record, we conclude as did the district court that it is not possible to determine at this stage as a matter of law that Navab-Safavi has not alleged a violation of clearly established law. . . .[W]here the interests underlying the Pickering balancing are as fact-dependent as those in this case, the district court appeared to correctly determine that this decision could not be made at the 12(b)(6) stage and should properly await some evidentiary development. We do not suggest that the determination can never be made on allegations–the relative weight of governmental interest and established constitutional rights on other facts may often be quite evident from the pleadings–but only that it cannot be done on the record before the court in this case.")

FIRST CIRCUIT

Irish v. State of Maine (Irish I), 849 F.3d 521, 523-29 (1st Cir. 2017) ("As to qualified immunity, we recognize the Supreme Court's admonitions that it is 'an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability,' and should thus be decided early in litigation. . . But we are reluctant to make law in the absence of more facts. We thus send the case back to the district court for some development of facts material to those issues. We vacate the district court's ruling as to the individual defendants and remand the case with instructions that the parties be permitted to conduct discovery on relevant facts. The discovery should include facts on whether there was any departure from established police protocol or training on, inter alia, the manner in which the police should notify the accused of allegations filed against him or her; what exactly the State Police officers knew about the risk that Lord posed to Irish and when exactly they knew it; and what message they left for Lord. Whether or not the officers followed proper procedure and how much they knew about the attendant risks of leaving a casual voice message, in turn, may bear on the questions of whether Irish has a due process claim that can withstand a 12(b)(6) motion and whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .At least eight sister circuits have recognized the existence of the state-created danger theory. . . While this circuit has discussed the possible existence of the state-created danger theory, we have never found it applicable to any specific set of facts. In addition to alleging a sufficient state-created danger, the plaintiff must meet 'a further and onerous requirement' to prove a substantive due process violation: " 'The state actions must shock the conscience of the court.'. . To meet this standard, the state actions must be 'so egregious, so outrageous, that it may fairly be said to shock the contemporary conscience.'. . Although the circumstances of each case impact whether the state action at issue meets this standard, 'where actors have an opportunity to reflect and make reasoned and rational decisions, deliberately indifferent behavior may suffice.'. . Finally, we 'may elect first to address whether the governmental action at issue is sufficiently conscience shocking' before considering the state-created danger element. . . .In our view, the bare-bones nature of the complaint and the record at this early stage of litigation makes vacating the appropriate course. To be sure, our concern is not that the State Police sought to interview Lord for 'his side of the story.' Nor is our concern that they identified Irish as the complainant. After all, even had they not identified her by name, her identity might have been clear to Lord, given the one-on-one nature of the crime of rape. What we do question, however, is whether there are standard police protocols that were violated when the officers decided not to be present when they alerted Lord to Irish's allegations but instead opted to leave Lord a voice message on his phone -- notwithstanding Irish's specific warning that such notification would 'incite Lord to terrible violence.' Assuming the voice message was left on Lord's cell phone, it is likely that he received immediate notification and was left free to immediately do violence. And given the timeline presented in Irish's complaint, the police had apparently not taken any prior steps to evaluate Irish's allegations or Lord's propensity for violence before leaving him the voice message. Or if they did, the actions are not documented in the record. Neither party at oral argument could provide any detail on acceptable police procedures or training, if any, on how and when to notify the accused of the allegations that have been filed against him or her under similar circumstances. Our developing caselaw in this area helps explain why we pause. . . .[B]ased on this record, we do not know the steps, if any, that officers should take when they have reason to believe that an alleged perpetrator is violent and is likely to retaliate against a victim who reports such serious crimes. And as Stamps and Marrero-Rodríguez illustrate, violation of protocol and training is relevant both to the substantive due process and qualified immunity inquiries. Beyond the dearth of facts on police procedure and training, the record also offers no facts on exactly what the officers knew about the veracity of the allegations that Irish had made, about Lord's propensity for violence, and about the risk that Lord would act on that propensity to harm Irish. . . .If discovery reveals that the officers' actions violated accepted norms of police procedure or that they acted despite foreseeing the harm to Irish, it may strengthen the plaintiffs' argument that the officers exacerbated the danger that Lord posed. It may also directly speak to whether the officers acted in deliberate indifference to Irish's safety, so much so that their conduct shocks the conscience. By contrast, if discovery reveals that no protocols were violated, then the plaintiffs may have a harder time surviving a 12(b)(6) motion. While the fact that the officers did not take further discretionary steps to ensure Irish's safety may amount to negligence, mere negligence would be insufficient to maintain a claim of substantive due process violation. . . Similarly, if no or few protocols were violated, then the officers' chance of successfully asserting qualified immunity may increase, as a reasonable officer may not have known that acting in line with their own standard procedures and training would violate a private citizen's constitutional rights. . . But we cannot reach any of these conclusions without a fuller development of the facts. We vacate the district court's ruling as to the individual defendants and remand the case with instructions for discovery not inconsistent with this opinion.")

Hegarty v. Somerset County, 25 F.3d 17, 18 (1st Cir. 1994) ("On May 9, 1994, we entered an order granting the officers' emergency request to stay district court discovery pending their appeal of the denial of qualified immunity. The request was granted 'pending further order of this court.' We now elaborate the basis for our May 9 order and extend the stay of discovery pending our determination of these appeals. A qualified immunity defense is an immunity from suit and the rationale for allowing an immediate appeal from the denial of qualified immunity is that the immunity from suit is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial ... The immunity from suit includes protection from the burdens of discovery. 'Until this threshold immunity question is resolved, discovery should not be allowed.'... We recognize that Harlow's reference to staying discovery was in the context of the district court's resolution of the immunity question. But in light of the Court's later determination that a denial of qualified immunity is entitled to immediate appellate review, . . . we believe that the stay of discovery, of necessity, ordinarily must carry over through the appellate court's resolution of that question, so long as the appeal is non-frivolous. The rationale for staying discovery applies with no less force while the appeal, to which the officers are entitled, proceeds. It is important to note what is not involved here. As the officers concede, the district court, prior to its ruling on the issue of qualified immunity, properly ordered some discovery limited to that issue . . . . What the district court thereafter authorized, and what we have stayed pending these appeals, is more extensive discovery directed at the merits of the case.").

Drewniak v. U.S. Customs & Border Protection, No. 20-CV-852-LM, 2021 WL 260399, at *2–4 (D.N.H. Jan. 26, 2021) ("First, the court notes that mere invocation of qualified immunity does not necessitate a stay regardless of the contours in which the defense is raised. To the contrary, although qualified immunity seeks to 'protect officials from the costs of "broad-reaching" discovery ... limited discovery may sometimes be necessary before the district court can resolve' the qualified immunity issue. . . Here, Qualter does not explain why a stay is necessary in light of the precise qualified immunity defense he raises; he merely argues that, because he has raised qualified immunity, the proceedings must be stayed. . . Second, Drewniak's complaint states both a claim for damages against Qualter in his individual capacity and a claim for injunctive and declaratory relief against Garcia and CBP. Neither Garcia—sued in his official capacity alone—nor CBP are entitled to qualified immunity. . .Most courts confronting cases raising both individual and official capacity claims have denied broad requests to stay all discovery on the basis that the individual capacity claim may be subject to qualified immunity. . . Indeed, the First Circuit has acknowledged the 'powerful policy reasons why discovery should not be halted' upon invocation of qualified immunity when a plaintiff pursues both equitable and monetary relief. . . Furthermore, when a plaintiff brings both monetary and equitable claims, any benefit from staying discovery 'would be totally illusory, because in most cases the scope of discovery as to the injunctive claim is practically the same as that involved in proving damages.'. .Third, even when a qualified immunity defense is raised as to an individual capacity claim, limited discovery may still be permissible as to that claim. . . That is especially true when the immunity is raised in a motion for summary judgment. . . Here, Qualter seeks both dismissal of the complaint as well as summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . In support of his motion for summary judgment, he has provided a statement of material facts supported by 'declarations' from himself and Garcia. . . Qualter argues that he is entitled to summary judgment because he reasonably believed that immigration enforcement was the primary purpose of the traffic checkpoint where Drewniak was stopped. Specifically, he states that he 'knew that the operations plan for this checkpoint underwent legal sufficiency review by the Office of the Assistant Chief Counsel' and that the checkpoint had been 'approved by ... [U.S. Border Patrol] Headquarters.'. . It would be unfair to allow Qualter to argue that he reasonably relied on the legal opinion of others without giving Drewniak the opportunity to explore the opinions he claims to have relied on. . . For these reasons, Qualter's invocation of qualified immunity does not warrant the broad stay requested. . . However, the court recognizes that, in order to preserve the effectiveness of Qualter's qualified immunity defense, Qualter may seek a protective order if Drewniak engages 'in any discovery that [is] oppressive, unnecessary or disruptive of' his functions as a public official.")

Estate of Rahim by Rahim v. United States, 506 F.Supp.3d 104, ___ (D. Mass. 2020) ("What the law does or does not clearly establish for purposes of assessing qualified immunity is a question of law. . . But factual issues are an inherent part of the analysis; the Supreme Court has instructed courts that 'the dispositive question is "whether the violative nature of [the] particular conduct is clearly established,"'. . . and that the 'inquiry "must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition[.]"'. . In a case like this one, where the court has found the facts on summary judgment insufficient to determine exactly what the particular conduct was, let alone whether it violated Rahim's constitutional rights, the court cannot fairly rule on the immunity defense. . . Summary judgment is therefore premature. Defendants may renew their motions after Plaintiff has had an adequate opportunity to conduct limited discovery that is narrowly tailored to uncover facts that the court needs to rule on the issue of qualified immunity.")

Castro v. United States, 34 F.3d 106, 112 (2d Cir. 1994) ("Where the claimant's description of the events suggests that the defendants' conduct was unreasonable, and the facts that the defendants claim are dispositive are solely within the knowledge of the defendants and their collaborators, summary judgment can rarely be granted without allowing the plaintiff an opportunity for discovery as to the questions bearing on the defendants' claims of immunity.").

Golio v. City of White Plains, No. 06 CIV. 1691 CM/GAY, 2006 WL 3199140, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 2, 2006) ("In short, this is the rare case in which the fact record needs to be more fully developed before the court can rule on the question of qualified immunity in the context of the false arrest claim against Officer Suggs. The motion is denied with leave to renew, either at the close of discovery or at trial.").

Burns v. Citarella, 443 F.Supp.2d 464, 468, 469 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) ("Plaintiff claims that she is unable to fully and effectively oppose defendants' motion for summary judgment in the absence of discovery–in particular, the opportunity to depose the individual defendants. Accordingly, plaintiff asserts that the present motion should be either stayed until discovery is completed or treated as a Rule 12 motion to dismiss. The court rejects this contention. . . . In keeping with the Supreme Court's observation that, in deciding the issue of qualified immunity, the court must assume plaintiff's version of the facts to be true (rendering defendants' story irrelevant), . . . this Court's Individual Practice Rules require that any defendant claiming qualified immunity (1) file a pro forma motion for summary judgment on that sole ground with his answer; (2) depose the plaintiff and file papers in support of the motion within thirty days thereafter; and (3) obtain a decision on the motion before conducting any further discovery. . . Granting plaintiff discovery about defendants' version of events before deciding the motion is not consistent with the goal of 'resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation,' by assuming plaintiff's version of the facts to be true.")

Elmaghraby v. Ashcroft, No. 04 CV 1409 JG SMG, 2005 WL 2375202, at *13, *21 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 27, 2005) ("In sum, Crawford-El, Swierkewicz, and McKenna suggest the following principles when evaluating qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage: (1) a complaint must meet Rule 8(a)'s requirements: fair notice of the claims asserted and the grounds upon which they rest; (2) the plaintiff is entitled to all reasonable inferences from the facts alleged in the complaint, including those that defeat the immunity defense; (3) where there is a factual dispute bearing on the qualified immunity question, that dispute should be resolved at the earliest opportunity; and (4) to resolve such a dispute, it may be appropriate to limit discovery in scope (to issues that bear on the qualified immunity defense) and manner. . . . The issue of qualified immunity should be addressed at the earliest appropriate stage. Where, as here, there are factual disputes that bear on the availability of the defense, discovery may be structured accordingly. . . The personal involvement, if any, of the non-MDC defendants should be the subject of the initial stage of discovery. Accordingly, discovery concerning Ashcroft, the FBI Defendants (Mueller, Maxwell, and Rolince), and the BOP Defendants (Sawyer, Cooksey, and Rardin) will be generally limited to inquiries into their involvement in the alleged denials of due process. Appropriate topics will include whether the individual defendant participated in the creation and implementation of the policy or policies under which plaintiffs were detained, whether he or she had knowledge of the conditions under which plaintiffs were detained, and the defendant's involvement in or knowledge of the clearance process and the alleged bypassing of BOP procedures for challenging administrative segregation of pretrial detainees.").

Torres v. Village of Sleepy Hollow, 379 F.Supp.2d 478, 484 n. 4 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (S.D.N.Y. 2005) ("Under this Court's rules, the plaintiff is deposed before a rule 12(c) motion on qualified immunity grounds is made, so that the plaintiff's complete story–not just the minimal allegations required of a pleader under Fed.R.Civ.P. 8–is before the Court. No other discovery (including depositions of the defendants) is permitted prior to the determination of the qualified immunity motion, however, because none would be relevant at the commencement of the lawsuit, when the Supreme Court and the Second Circuit require this issue to be decided.")

Williams v. County of Sullivan, 157 F.R.D. 6, 9 (S.D.N.Y. 1994) ("Neither the reasonableness of ... the defendants' conduct in light of information available to them nor the liability of each defendant can be resolved until all material issues of fact pertaining to these matters have been fleshed out. [cite omitted] A stay of all discovery under such circumstances is inconsistent with expeditious adjudication of the issue of qualified immunity .... Discovery dealing with the most obviously pertinent sources of information can be permitted to proceed initially, holding in abeyance questions regarding controverted further discovery until the results of initial discovery are known.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

P.F. v. Mendres, 21 F. Supp.2d 476, 483, 484 (D.N.J. 1998) ("We do not perceive our conclusion to be inconsistent with the Supreme Court's mandate that the immunity issue be resolved at the earliest possible stage of the litigation. The Court's opinion in Crawford-El indicates approval of the possibility that limited discovery may be necessary where the underlying substantive legal theory requires the Court to engage in some factual analysis to determine whether the defendant's conduct rises to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . In light of our conclusion that we cannot resolve the immunity issue at this juncture, we must next address how this particular litigation should proceed. The Supreme Court's opinion in Crawford-El teaches that we may tailor discovery narrowly and dictate the sequence of discovery so as to protect the defendant's immunity defense. . . . We must make it clear that this initial discovery phase is limited only to gathering information which bears upon our qualified immunity inquiry. In the context of this case, the initial discovery will be limited to gathering information pertaining to the inquiry that we must undertake in determining if defendant's conduct rises to the level of a constitutional violation of the plaintiffs' right to privacy. . . [O]nce this information is gathered, defendant may file a motion for summary judgment which raises the immunity defense again in light of the factual development gained through this initial discovery phase. Accordingly, we will deny the motion to dismiss without prejudice to the defendant's right to assert a qualified immunity defense in a properly supported motion for summary judgment.").

Raynor v. Pugh, 817 F.3d 123, 130 n.5 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Raynor also argues that the district court erred in denying him any discovery. Generally, a court should not grant summary judgment when, as here, outstanding discovery requests on material issues exist. See Ingle ex rel. Estate of Ingle v.

Yelton, 439 F.3d 191, 196–97 (4th Cir.2006). The district court stayed Raynor's discovery requests pending resolution of Pugh's qualified immunity defense, in accord with Crawford–El v. Britton. See 523 U.S. 574, 598, 118 S.Ct. 1584, 140 L.Ed.2d 759 (1998). But, without ruling on the (meritless at this stage) qualified immunity claim, the court granted summary judgment on evidentiary grounds, faulting Raynor for 'not provid[ing] any evidence, other than his own affidavit, to support his allegations.' In so doing, the court erred. On remand the district court should permit appropriate discovery before entertaining any additional motions for summary judgment.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 389 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Based on Mr. Tobey's complaint, it is unclear whether Appellants' behavior was reasonably motivated by Mr. Tobey's 'disruptive' conduct or unreasonably motivated by his protected protest. What is reasonable in this context, therefore, requires greater factual development and is better decided once discovery has been conducted. See Martin, 980 F.2d at 952; DiMeglio v. Haines, 45 F.3d 790, 795 (4th Cir.1995) ("[W]here there is a material dispute over what the defendant did ... it may be that the qualified immunity question cannot be resolved without discovery .").")

McMillian v. Wake County Sheriff's Dept., No. 10-1576, 2010 WL 4366478, at *3, *4 (4th Cir. Oct. 28, 2010) (unpublished) ("McMillian has consistently asserted that, after he was handcuffed and subdued, Defendants knocked him to the ground, repeatedly struck him, and kneed him in the head, causing his eye to bleed and injury to his neck. In granting summary judgment to Defendants, the district court accepted Defendants' assertions that they handcuffed McMillian due to his disruptive conduct, and that their use of force was limited to accomplishing that objective. Neither the magistrate judge nor the district court squarely addressed McMillian's allegation that the complained-of use of force occurred after he was handcuffed. Accepting McMillian's allegations and evidence as true, as we must at this procedural juncture, see Jones v. Buchanan, 325 F.3d 520, 524 n. 1 (4th Cir.2003), we conclude the district court erred in finding there was no issue of material fact as to the need for the use of force and the extent of force Defendants used. Crediting McMillian's version of the events, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that knocking down, punching, and kicking an arrestee while he is in handcuffs are actions taken in good faith to restore order. . . Adjudication of this issue is complicated by the fact that the district court denied McMillian's repeated requests for discovery of any videotapes and photographs from the night in question. We review the denial of a request for discovery for an abuse of discretion. . . McMillian has steadfastly maintained that the jail's surveillance cameras captured the events at issue. The court denied McMillian's request for discovery of any such evidence, finding it was not relevant to Defendants' assertion of qualified immunity. We disagree. In evaluating whether a police officer is entitled to qualified immunity, the district court must assess whether there was a constitutional violation. . . Certainly, evidence that would have confirmed (or dispelled) McMillian's allegations pertaining to the events that form the subject of this lawsuit is highly probative of that issue. . . Because we conclude the denial of McMillian's discovery requests substantially prejudiced him, we hold the district court abused its discretion in denying these requests. For these reasons, we conclude the district court's grant of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity was premature, particularly in light of the erroneous evidentiary ruling. Accordingly, we vacate the district court's order granting Defendants summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Ingle v. Yelton, 439 F.3d 191, 195, 196 (4th Cir. 2006) ("In holding that the defendant officers were entitled to qualified immunity, the district court relied almost exclusively on the officers' assertions that Christopher aimed his weapon at them. Ingle, of course, has no way to directly contradict the officers' statements. Because this is a deadly force case, 'the witness most likely to contradict [the officers'] story–the person shot dead– is unable to testify.'. . In such circumstances, 'a court must undertake a fairly critical assessment of the forensic evidence, the officer's original reports or statements and the opinions of experts to decide whether the officer's testimony could reasonably be rejected at a trial.' . . . Given the facts of this case, the district court could not conduct a thorough assessment of the officers' statements without allowing discovery as to whether videotapes exist and, if so, what they depict. Ingle presented compelling reasons to allow the requested discovery. She alleged that the officers' account–that the decedent aimed the gun at them through the open window of the truck–conflicts with the physical evidence suggesting that the window was closed when the officers shot it out. She even submitted an expert affidavit concluding that the 'shards of glass visible around the entire perimeter of the driver's side window' constitute 'proof that the driver's window was broken when the window was in a complete rolled-up position.' The State Bureau of Investigation echoed that view in its report on the incident, noting that the window was 'in an upward position' when it was shot out. Moreover, Ingle presented a plausible argument that such videotapes may actually exist. She asserted, and defendants' counsel confirmed at oral argument, that the APD instituted a policy of installing cameras in its vehicles in April 2001, several months before the shooting. While it may be that at the time of the shooting no cameras had yet been installed or were operative in any of the six APD vehicles at the scene, or the three additional APD vehicles located along Holiday Inn Drive, this policy clearly distinguishes Ingle's Rule 56(f) motion from cases where 'the evidence sought was almost certainly nonexistent or was the object of pure speculation.'").

Ingle v. Yelton, 2008 WL 398327, at *3 (4th Cir. Feb. 14, 2008) ("[T]he defendants and APD provided numerous affidavits, depositions, and evidence of two thorough investigations. All evidence confirmed that the APD had not produced a videotape and did not possess one. We cannot conclude that the district court abused its discretion in limiting discovery at this point and denying Ingle's motion to compel.") DiMeglio v. Haines, 45 F.3d 790, 795 (4th Cir. 1995) ("A district court may deny a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity and allow discovery to proceed only if it has addressed the threshold immunity question, and concluded (1) that the plaintiff alleged a violation of a clearly established right, but (2) that there existed a material factual dispute over what actually occurred, and (3) under the defendant's version, a reasonable official could have believed that his conduct was lawful. In instances where there is a material dispute over what the defendant did, and under the plaintiff's version of the events the defendant would have, but under the defendant's version he would not have, violated clearly established law, it may be that the qualified immunity question cannot be resolved without discovery. In such circumstances, it simply may be impossible to protect the defendant from all of the burdens that attend the pretrial process. Of course, after discovery and upon a proper motion, the district court may reconsider the question of qualified immunity.")

Doe v. Montgomery County Board of Education, No. CV 21-0356 PJM, 2021 WL 6072813, at *16-17 (D. Md. Dec. 23, 2021) ("Defendants have asked the Court to stay the issuance of a scheduling order in the entire case, pending resolution of their Motion to Dismiss Counts VIII through X. . . Defendants do so, suggesting that, if the Court denies dismissal of the § 1983 Counts against them on qualified immunity (which the Court has done), Defendants may immediately note an appeal to the Fourth Circuit under the collateral order doctrine. . . Defendants suggest that if, on appeal, the Fourth Circuit determines that Defendants Crouse and Sullivan are in fact entitled to qualified immunity, it is highly likely that the extent of discovery in the case would be less. Additionally, say Defendants, a stay of discovery would facilitate opportunities to engage in meaningful settlement negotiations. . . Plaintiffs oppose a stay of discovery and accuse the Defendants of using all means at hand to delay the litigation. . . More to the point, they argue that a stay of discovery would interfere with development of the remaining claims other than the § 1983 claims and would jeopardize evidence-gathering activities. . . The Court agrees with Plaintiffs. The power of a district court to stay trial proceedings is discretionary and 'the power to stay proceedings is incidental to the power inherent in every court to control the disposition of the causes on its docket with economy of time and effort for itself, for counsel, and for litigants.'. . . Regardless of whether Defendants ultimately appeal the issue of § 1983 qualified immunity with respect to Defendants Crouse and Sullivan, the Court sees no reason why discovery cannot go forward on Plaintiffs' other claims. Even if Defendant Crouse and/or Defendant Sullivan are found to be entitled to qualified immunity, the factual basis of the other remaining claims would not be affected. Those claims involve facts, witnesses, and circumstances virtually identical with those relevant to the § 1983 claims. Judicial economy would be served by the case going forward on the non-§ 1983 claims right away; there would be no hardship or inequity to Defendants if it does; and the potential prejudice to Plaintiffs is that their much broader case will be prejudiced until any appeal by Defendants is decided, presumably several months from now. Accordingly, the Motion to Stay is DENIED.")

H.H. v. Chesterfield County School Bd., 2007 WL 4246487, at *5 (E.D.Va. Nov. 29, 2007) ("Having determined that plaintiffs' complaint does allege the violation of a constitutional right, and that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, the Court now must inquire as to whether any facts material to defendants' claim of qualified immunity are in dispute. The parties dispute whether defendants kept H.H. restrained in her wheelchair for long periods of time, and this disputed issue of material fact is central to defendants' qualified immunity claim. The Fourth Circuit has held that 'ordering discovery on the issue of immunity ... [is] well within the discretion of the district court.' American Civil Liberties Union, Inc. v. Wicomico County, 999 F.2d 780, 787 (4th Cir.1993). The Court finds that it must permit plaintiffs to conduct discovery to obtain the facts from Moffett and Minguzzi necessary to resolve the disputed issue of material fact before it can rule on defendants' qualified immunity claim. Accordingly, the Court will deny defendants' motion for protective order.").

Delph v. Trent, 86 F. Supp.2d 572, 575-77 (E.D. Va. 2000) ("[T]here is a complex intersection between qualified immunity and supervisory liability. If a plaintiff can establish the requisite indifference in the face of a policy or widespread and pervasive abuses caused by a policy, the plaintiff may hold the responsible official liable in a supervisory capacity. However, if the official can respond that a reasonable person would not have known of the effects of the policy or that the policy violated clearly established laws, then that official is entitled to qualified immunity from suit. . . . To permit the plaintiff to seek discovery would expose an official to the types of abuses qualified immunity was intended to prevent. . . .[T]he Court has constructed two hurdles the plaintiff must overcome to win the right to discovery. First, the trial court must insure that plaintiff has alleged a cognizable injury with sufficient specificity that officials are not subject to burdensome or unnecessary discovery. . . The trial court may require the plaintiff to make specific factual allegations or may grant motions by defendant for more definite statements under Rule 12(e). Second, once plaintiff has made a sufficient allegation, the trial court must then resolve the threshold issue of immunity before proceeding to discovery. In doing so, the trial court must determine whether the officials violated clearly established law, assuming the plaintiff's allegations as true. If so, plaintiff may be entitled to discovery, subject to the discretion of the trial court and the limits of Rule 26. . . . After he receives the requested information, plaintiff will either be able to establish supervisory liability or he will not find sufficient proof of widespread abuse. If plaintiff cannot prove supervisory liability, there is no need to reach the issue of qualified immunity and plaintiff's action may be dismissed. If plaintiff can prove supervisory liability, then the Court may proceed to determine defendants' qualified immunity defense.").

Carswell v. Camp, 37 F.4th 1062, 1064-69 (5th Cir. 2022), pet. for reh'g en banc filed July 15, 2022 ("The individual defendants moved to dismiss under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), asserting qualified immunity. On January 25, 2021, the district court denied that motion and entered its 'standard QI scheduling order.' That order is the subject of this appeal. It provided, in relevant part:

> Any pending motions to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity are denied without prejudice. See Shultea v. Wood, 47 F.3d 1427, 1431–34 (5th Cir. 1995) (en banc) (qualified immunity must be raised by filing answer). Any defendant desiring to assert qualified immunity who has not already done so by way of answer must file an answer asserting qualified immunity within 14 days of the date of this Order. Except as set forth below, all party discovery is stayed as to any defendant who asserts qualified immunity. Discovery is not stayed as to a defendant asserting qualified immunity as to that person's capacity as a witness to the extent that there is any other defendant not asserting qualified immunity.

The individual defendants complied with the order and filed answers and affirmative defenses. But they also noticed an immediate appeal of the scheduling order. Carswell moved to dismiss the appeal for lack of jurisdiction, arguing the scheduling order was not an appealable collateral order because the district court had not ruled on qualified immunity. . . . We have jurisdiction over the scheduling order here because the district court refused to rule on qualified immunity 'at the earliest possible stage of the litigation.'. . Defendants asserted qualified immunity in their motion to dismiss. That motion was the earliest possible opportunity for the district court to resolve the immunity question. It declined to do so. Instead, it required defendants to assert their qualified immunity defense by way of answer. And it postponed ruling on the immunity issue until summary judgment. That 'effectively ... denied [defendants] the benefits of the qualified immunity defense' and 'vest[ed] this court with the requisite jurisdiction to review the discovery order.'. . We review the scheduling order for abuse of discretion. . . We hold the district court abused its discretion by deferring its ruling on qualified immunity and subjecting the immunity-asserting defendants to discovery in the meantime. . . Where public officials assert qualified immunity in a motion to dismiss, a district court must rule on the immunity question at that stage. It cannot defer that question until summary judgment. Nor can it permit discovery against the immunity-asserting defendants before it rules on their defense. . . . It's true that, a long time ago, we authorized discovery in violation of these rules. For example, we once authorized a 'narrow exception to the general rule that qualified immunity should be decided as early in the litigation as possible.'. . We described that 'narrow exception' as 'a careful procedure,' which permitted a district court to 'defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.'. . We required the district court to first find that the plaintiff has pleaded 'facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity.'. . If it still found itself 'unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts,'. . . then we allowed the district court to order discovery 'narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim,' Wicks, 41 F.3d at 994 (quoting Lion Boulos, 834 F.2d at 507–08). Call it 'careful,' or call it 'narrow'; either way, today we call Lion Boulos and its progeny overruled. The Supreme Court has now made clear that a plaintiff asserting constitutional claims against an officer must survive the motion to dismiss (and the qualified immunity defense) without any discovery. Our prior decisions to the contrary are overruled. . . . Iqbal squarely repudiated our 'careful procedure' for allowing tailored discovery before a district court rules on an official's motion to dismiss. When defendants assert qualified immunity in a motion to dismiss, the district court may not defer ruling on that assertion. It may not permit discovery—'cabined or otherwise'—against immunity-asserting defendants before it has determined plaintiffs have pleaded facts sufficient to overcome the defense. . . The rule is that 'a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity should be determined at the earliest possible stage of the litigation'—full stop. . . Although our court previously carved out a 'narrow exception' to this rule, . . . we now make clear the rule admits of no exceptions. It does not matter that, after Twombly and Iqbal, we sometimes recited our 'careful procedure' for premature discovery. [collecting cases] None of those cases considered whether and to what extent our 'careful procedure' could be squared with Twombly and Iqbal, and therefore, none of those cases bind us under the rule of orderliness. . . Today, we consider that previously unresolved question and hold that Lion Boulos and its progeny have been overruled. . . . The district court declined to rule on qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage. It deferred answering that question until the summary-judgment stage. That is, ipso facto, a refusal to rule at the earliest possible stage in litigation. It does not matter that the court promised to rule promptly once it arrived at the next stage of litigation. . . Carswell next defends the scheduling order because it stayed discovery as to qualified immunity. Specifically, the court stayed 'all party discovery ... as to any defendant who asserts qualified immunity,' but not 'as to a defendant asserting qualified immunity as to that person's capacity as a witness to the extent that there is any other defendant not asserting qualified immunity.' So the district court would have allowed Carswell to proceed with discovery on her Monell claim, including by noticing depositions for all eight of the individual defendants asserting qualified immunity. Iqbal squarely forecloses that, too. . . . [T]he Court ruled out even 'minimally intrusive discovery' against official defendants before a ruling that plaintiff had met his burden to overcome the qualified immunity defense at the pleading stage. . . Carswell responds that 'Monell discovery presents no undue burden to the Individual Defendants because they would be required to participate as witnesses in discovery even if they had not been named as defendants.'. . We disagree for three reasons. First, there are significant differences between naming an individual defendant and then deposing him in two capacities (one personal and the other Monell/official) and not suing the individual and deposing him only in his Monell/official capacity. The former puts the individual's own money on the line. And the dual-capacity defendant must be particularly careful in a deposition about how his answers can be used against him in not one but two ways. So the stakes differ substantially. Carswell cannot elide these differences by saying the defendant would have to testify either way. Second, it's no answer to say the defendant can be deposed twice—once on Monell issues (before the district court adjudicates the immunity defense) and once on personal-capacity issues (afterwards). It only exacerbates the burdens of litigation to make a defendant sit for two depositions instead of one. And it turns qualified immunity on its head by doubling the 'heavy costs' of litigation. . . Third, Carswell conceded at oral argument that bifurcation of discovery would radically complicate the case. Carswell suggested that a special master could be appointed to police the Monell/official-capacity depositions so that no party could cross the line into personal-capacity questions before the district court adjudicated the immunity defense. But the very fact that Carswell can foresee the need for a special master proves that bifurcated discovery imposes unreasonable burdens on the defendants. . . . That the scheduling order here is 'standard' in qualified immunity cases tells us nothing about whether it correctly understands the governing law. Today we clarify the governing law. And we trust that will harmonize our circuit's discovery practices with the Supreme Court's instructions. . . Finally, Carswell argues that any error in the district court's scheduling order is harmless because she has clearly stated plausible claims sufficient to defeat the individual defendants' assertion of qualified immunity in their motion to dismiss. But all agree the district court has not yet ruled on that question. We decline to do so in the first instance.") Hutcheson v. Dallas County, Texas, 994 F.3d 477, 481 (5th Cir. 2021) ("Because Hutcheson 'was not in the midst of harming other individuals and because his resistance was mostly passive, the officers were entitled to use only a proportional amount of force.'. . The video shows the officers

using only the force necessary to restrain Hutcheson, rather than striking or using other force against him. . . Moreover, the fact that they tried to restrain Hutcheson gently before grabbing him and placing him on the floor weighs in favor of the reasonableness of their actions. . . It follows that the plaintiffs do not raise a dispute of material fact whether the officers used unreasonable force to restrain a resisting suspect. Therefore, the plaintiffs cannot satisfy the first step of the QI inquiry. The district court properly granted summary judgment as to excessive force. . . .The plaintiffs appeal the denial of limited discovery. In QI cases, we use a two-step procedure 'under which a district court may defer its [QI] ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.'. . First, the court determines whether the pleadings 'assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of [QI].'. . Second, if the pleadings assert such facts, the district court issues a narrowly tailored discovery order 'to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.'. . We review for abuse of discretion the decision whether to permit limited discovery on QI. . . The plaintiffs assert that the district court erred in denying limited discovery. They contend that there is some uncertainty surrounding Hutcheson's death, particularly because the video does not include any sound. Thus, plaintiffs aver that limited discovery could provide evidence that might contradict the defendants' account. In the interest of garnering such evidence, the motion for discovery included three interrogatories and two production requests, all with the goal of gaining access to witnesses, including their testimony, that the county might have collected. Before limited discovery is permitted, a plaintiff seeking to overcome QI must assert facts that, if true, would overcome that defense. . . It is not enough broadly to seek information that might impeach the defendants' version of events. Thus, the plaintiffs faltered at the first step of our two-step procedure. . . Moreover, they failed to identify any questions of fact that the court must resolve before determining QI, thereby failing the second step. . . The district court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for limited discovery.") Converse v. City of Kemah, Texas, 961 F.3d 771, 780 n.8 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Though not the basis of our ruling, we note that the district court seems to have confused our procedure regarding limited discovery in qualified immunity cases. . . Here, the district court initially 'den[ied] the Defendants' Rule 12(b)(6) motion on the issue of the qualified immunity,' explained that it was 'unable to rule on the qualified immunity defense ... without further clarification of the facts,' and ordered limited discovery. Despite Defendants' suggestion that the fact issues that remained after limited discovery should be resolved on a motion for summary judgment, the court directed Plaintiffs to file an amended complaint and Defendants to file a motion to dismiss. The court explained its understanding that Fifth Circuit caselaw allowed the limited discovery so that plaintiffs could sufficiently plead their case and 'get ... past 12(b)(6), if you can,' and therefore a motion for summary judgment was not appropriate after limited discovery. A motion for summary judgment is, however, perfectly appropriate after limited discovery. See Schultea v. Wood, 47 F.3d 1427, 1433-34 (5th Cir. 1995) (en banc) (noting that after allowing limited discovery, "the court can again determine whether the case can proceed and consider any motions for summary judgment under Rule 56"); Griffin v. Edwards, 116 F.3d 479 (5th Cir. 1997) (affirming the denial of a motion to dismiss "without prejudice to the rights of the public defendants to move for summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity at a later date, after such limited discovery as the district court may deem necessary to determine whether a genuine issue exists as to the illegality of the public defendants' conduct").")

Collie v. Barron,747 F. App'x 950, ___ (5th Cir. 2018) (per curiam) ("Contending that the district court abused its discretion in denying him the opportunity to take discovery before it entered summary judgment, Collie decries that practice. He fears it will furnish 'rogue officers and poorly managed police departments' a 'virtual how-to booklet' to shield themselves from accountability. Collie asserts other Fort Worth Police officers had more information about the events that took place before Officer Barron shot Collie. Thus, discovery would have permitted him to prove Officer Barron either knew or should have known Collie did not fit the description of the robbery suspects and could not be the armed suspect. As relevant here, the goals of qualified immunity counsel no more than a minimum of necessary discovery before the court determines whether the defense attaches: 'Until this threshold immunity question is resolved, discovery should not be allowed.'. . This court has previously recognized '[o]ne of the most salient benefits of qualified immunity is protection from pretrial discovery.'. . The Supreme Court has emphatically directed, 'qualified immunity is an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.'. .Collie's position fails in several ways – beginning with the fact that he failed to preserve this argument for appeal. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56(d) requires a non-movant to present affidavits and evidence if he feels he needs discovery to properly defend against a summary judgment motion. . . Collie never sufficiently invoked Rule 56(d) in the trial court. Further, '[w]hen a defendant pleads the defense of qualified immunity, the district court may ban discovery at this threshold pleading stage and ... need not allow any discovery unless it finds that plaintiff has supported his claim with sufficient precision and factual specificity to raise a genuine issue as to the illegality of defendant's conduct at the time of the alleged acts.'. . Here, the parties' competing evidence convinced the court that Collie could not overcome the defense of qualified immunity. The court did not abuse its discretion or misapply the law when denying additional discovery.")

Patel v. Texas Tech University, No. 17-11234, 2018 WL 3045463, at *1 (5th Cir. June 19, 2018) (not reported) (" '[T]his court has established a careful procedure under which a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.' Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 648 (5th Cir. 2012). The plaintiff 'must plead specific facts that both allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the harm he has alleged and that defeat a qualified immunity defense with equal specificity.'. . 'After the district court finds a plaintiff has so pled, if the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts," it may issue a discovery order "narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim."'. . 'An order that simultaneously withholds ruling on a qualified immunity defense while failing to constrain discovery to develop claimed immunity is by definition not narrowly tailored.'. .It appears that the district court did not follow this court's 'careful procedure.' The record shows that the court held that the qualified immunity defense had been improperly raised in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, and should instead be raised in a later motion for summary judgment. Whether this decision intimated further that Appellants' motion was not well taken, because Plaintiff sufficiently carried his pleading burden, we cannot discern. In any event, the district court further failed 'to constrain discovery to develop claimed immunity' after apparently refusing to pass on qualified immunity in the first instance. . . The record, in sum, does not demonstrate that the court followed the procedures laid out in Backe v. LeBlanc and Lion Boulos v. Wilson. It must do so on remand.")

Bustillos v. El Paso Cty. Hosp. Dist., 891 F.3d 214, 223 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Both motions for protective orders noted that the Doctors had asserted qualified immunity. 'One of the most salient benefits of qualified immunity is protection from pretrial discovery ....' Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 648 (5th Cir. 2012). Thus, '[b]efore allowing discovery in a matter where qualified immunity is alleged, the district court must first find "that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome" a qualified immunity defense.'. . Because Bustillos' claims could not overcome the clearly-established prong of the qualified immunity defense, the district court did not err by declining to grant Bustillos' discovery requests.")

Randle v. Lockwood, 666 F. App'x 333, ___ & nn. 5, 6 (5th Cir. 2016) ("The district court's failure to address the question of qualified immunity violated the tenet that '[q]ualified immunity questions should be resolved "at the earliest possible stage in the litigation."'. . Regardless of the pleading standard applicable to Randle's claims, the district court was required to address whether the jailers were entitled to qualified immunity because the jailers asserted this defense in both their motions to dismiss and their objections to the magistrate judge's report and recommendation. By failing to address qualified immunity, the district court's order undercuts the doctrine of qualified immunity's goal of shielding public officials from 'unwarranted demands customarily imposed upon those defending a long drawn out lawsuit.'. . As a result, the jailers will likely be exposed to 'costly, time-consuming, and intrusive' pre-trial discovery before Randle is required to demonstrate that his allegations defeat the jailers' qualified immunity defense. . . . While the district court's order did not explicitly allow any discovery, discovery is the next logical step in the litigation process following the denial of a motion to dismiss. And the magistrate judge's report explicitly references the need for discovery before 'passing on the merits' of Randle's claim. Therefore the district court's denial of the motions to dismiss, if left undisturbed, is likely to lead to discovery. . . . For these reasons, we conclude that the district court erred by failing to address the jailers' qualified immunity defense when denying their motions to dismiss. . . . Nor does the district court's order satisfy the narrow exception to the general rule that qualified immunity should be decided as early in the litigation as possible. Under this exception, 'a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of [the qualified immunity] defense.'. . But in order to properly defer the decision on qualified immunity, the district court must follow the 'careful' two-step procedure that we have established. . . First, it must 'determine "that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity."'. . Second, if the district court finds a plaintiff has so pleaded, it can then 'defer its qualified immunity ruling and order limited discovery if "the court remains unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts."' Here, the district court did not complete either step of this procedure.")

Mendez v. Poitevent, 823 F.3d 326, 336-37 (5th Cir. 2016) ("Plaintiffs also contend that the district court abused its discretion in ruling on defendants' motions for summary judgment before discovery, implicitly denying plaintiffs' request for a continuance to conduct discovery. Plaintiffs bore a heavy burden below because they sought discovery 'to disprove the applicability of an immunity-derived bar to suit because immunity is intended to shield the defendant from the burdens of defending the suit, including the burdens of discovery.'. . Courts are authorized under Rule 56(d) to defer ruling on a summary judgment motion and allow discovery, but 'Rule 56 does not require that any discovery take place before summary judgment can be granted.'. . And under Rule 56(d), deferring summary judgment and ordering discovery is appropriate only if the 'nonmovant shows by affidavit or declaration that, for specified reasons, it cannot present facts essential to justify its opposition.'. . A party 'may not simply rely on vague assertions that additional discovery will produce needed, but unspecified, facts.'. . Plaintiffs' affidavit here fell short. Plaintiffs' counsel alleged that they had no opportunity to depose Poitevent and the witnesses to the shooting. In support of the motion, counsel asserted that '[t]he testimony of these witnesses and others bear[s] upon the acts and omissions of Taylor Poitevent, and the reasonableness of his conduct in shooting Juan Mendez, Jr.' But plaintiffs did not identify below any reason why it could not obtain the testimony of the witnesses to the shooting through, for example, affidavits; indeed, plaintiffs submitted a declaration from one of them. And the witnesses' accounts were already incorporated into the record through the Texas Rangers' investigation report. In addition, Poitevent himself submitted his own testimony. Plaintiffs presented no reason why either Poitevent's affidavit or the witness accounts in the investigation report were insufficient, and their contention that summary judgment was inappropriate before they were able to depose Poitevent is unsupported. . . Plaintiffs did not, moreover, identify specific facts below that would alter the district court's analysis. . . Instead, they vaguely assert before this court that deposing the witnesses would have 'permitted [plaintiffs] to further discover the facts from the witnesses who saw the scuffle.' In other words, plaintiffs did not demonstrate below 'how the additional discovery [would] likely create a genuine issue of material fact.'. . Instead, the result of the discovery they sought was 'wholly speculative.'. .We thus hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in implicitly denying plaintiffs' motion for a continuance to conduct discovery.")

Zantiz v. Seal, 602 F. App'x 154, 159-63 (5th Cir. 2015) ("We generally lack jurisdiction to review discovery orders. . . But we have jurisdiction to review certain discovery orders in cases involving the qualified immunity defense. . . In particular, we have jurisdiction to review such a discovery order if the district court does not first determine whether the plaintiff's pleadings, taken as true, are sufficient to overcome the qualified immunity defense. . . We also have jurisdiction to consider a discovery order that has not been 'narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.'. . We review such orders for abuse of discretion. . . We have jurisdiction to review such an order if it does not follow the two-step procedure that we have mandated in qualified immunity cases. . . First, the district court must determine that the plaintiff's well-pleaded facts, taken as true, would overcome the qualified immunity defense. . . Second, 'if the court remains unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts, it may issue a discovery order narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.'. . Such an order must 'identify any questions of fact [the district court] need[s] to resolve before it would be able to determine whether the defendants [are] entitled to qualified immunity.'. . We conclude that we have jurisdiction to review the discovery order here because it did not fulfill either step of this analysis. First, the order did not explicitly hold that Zantiz's pleadings, taken as true, overcame the qualified immunity defense. While some of the language in the discovery order implies that the magistrate judge thought that the pleadings overcame the qualified immunity defense, we have held that this holding must be made explicitly. . . The discovery order also fails the second step of Zapata. Even a 'limited discovery' order does not satisfy the second step if 'he district court [does] not identify any questions of fact it need[s] to resolve before it would be able to determine whether the defendants [are] entitled to immunity.'. . Here, the discovery order fails under this standard because it does not identify the questions of fact that needed to be resolved before the qualified immunity issue could be addressed. Thus, we conclude that the magistrate judge abused his discretion in issuing a discovery order that did not perform either of the steps described in Zapata.")

Doe v. Robertson, 751 F.3d 383, *7 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Plaintiffs claim that assessing the Service Agreement violations in isolation is not our task, as discovery has not been taken. In Plaintiffs' view, focusing solely on the contractual violations presumes that no other evidence could support their Bivens claim. Plaintiffs accordingly assert that they have a 'right to seek discovery ... to build the necessary record in the case at hand.' Plaintiffs misunderstand our standard of review at the motion to dismiss stage. We recognize that the question of whether an official 'had the requisite knowledge of a substantial risk is a question of fact' generally best resolved by discovery and fact-finding, should a claim survive a motion to dismiss. . . But here, at the motion to dismiss stage, we are tasked with deciding whether Plaintiffs have stated a plausible 'claim upon which relief can be granted.'. . In so doing, we cannot accept Plaintiffs' invitation to apply the 'no set of facts' test, which the Supreme Court has firmly rejected. Twombly . . . . It is, of course, conceivable that some set of facts could make Plaintiffs' claim plausible. Hypothetically, for example, Robertson and Rosado might have known of Dunn's dangerous proclivities, or they might have ignored contemporaneous distress calls from victims of or witnesses to the assaults. But 'a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions' cannot 'unlock the doors of discovery.'. . Here, Plaintiffs have proffered a legal conclusion that Robertson and Rosado were deliberately indifferent, and for the reasons detailed above, their factual allegations, even assumed as true, do not make this conclusion plausible. . . Accordingly, the Complaint gives Plaintiffs no right to discovery.")

Morgan v. Hubert, 335 F. App'x 466, 2009 WL 1884605, at *5, *6 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009) ("The failure of specificity is no fault of Morgan's, however, because he has not yet had the benefit of discovery, and is bound by Rule 11 to allege only those facts for which he has or will likely have evidentiary support. As we said in Schultea, we do not require a plaintiff to plead facts 'peculiarly within the knowledge of defendants,'. . . and the facts omitted fall squarely within that category. We are mindful that the protection afforded by qualified immunity applies to the lawsuit itself, and not merely to liability, and thus the issue should be resolved as early as possible. . .Thus, we are reluctant to allow the case to proceed to full discovery with important questions regarding qualified immunity left unanswered. Schultea points the way forward. We noted there the district court's ability to tailor discovery to the defense of qualified immunity . . . . Such a course is called for here. Because key facts are unknown, and because these facts are solely within Hubert's possession, we do not consider the parties' remaining arguments regarding deliberate indifference. Instead, we vacate the district court's denial of qualified immunity and remand for discovery limited to that issue. We instruct the district court to carry the issue of qualified immunity and decide it anew once that discovery is complete.") [See also Morgan v. Hubert, 459 F. App'x 321 (5th Cir. 2012) (holding that because warden was not deliberately indifferent, warden was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim.]

Dreyer v. Yelverton, No. 07-10970, 2008 WL 3911072, at *5 (5th Cir. Aug. 25, 2008) ("Contrary to Dreyer's assertions, Schultea does not expressly preclude a district court's rendering summary judgment without discovery. Dreyer is correct, however, that district courts may be required to allow discovery before ruling on a summary-judgment motion. On the other hand, it is incumbent upon counsel to properly move, under Rule 56(f), for such discovery. Restated, 'if a party cannot adequately defend [against a summary-judgment] motion, Rule 56(f) is his remedy'. Washington v. Allstate Ins. Co., 901 F.2d 1281, 1285 (5th Cir.1990) (citations omitted). But, 'Rule 56(f) does not require that any discovery take place before summary judgment can be granted.' Id.")

Hinojosa v. Johnson, No. 07-20030, 2008 WL 1924216, at *6 n.12 (5th Cir. May 1, 2008) ("Although qualified immunity is immunity from suit, including discovery, discovery may proceed against a government official where 'the plaintiff's allegations state a claim of violation of clearly established law,' Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 526 (1985), as long as such discovery is ' Anarrowly tailored" to the question of qualified immunity.' Maxey by Maxey v. Fulton, 890 F.2d 279, 283 (10th Cir.1989).").

Alice L. v. Dusek, 492 F.3d 563, 565 (5th Cir. 2007) ("Dusek argues that her appeal of the district court's denial of qualified immunity is so broad as to divest the district court of jurisdiction to compel her compliance with discovery requests made related to the Title IX claims against Eanes ISD. We disagree. . . . Even though the factual basis of the Title IX claims and the § 1983 claim overlap, the claims are legally distinct–notably, Dusek does not and cannot assert qualified immunity from the Title IX claim against Eanes ISD. To the extent that Dusek is subject to discovery requests on claims for which she does not or cannot assert qualified immunity, such discovery requests do not implicate her right to qualified immunity . The district court may compel discovery disclosures related to the plaintiffs' Title IX claims because doing so does not interfere with any aspect of Dusek's appeal.").

Heitschmidt v. City of Houston, 161 F.3d 834, 840 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Heitschmidt argues on appeal that he should have been allowed limited discovery before the district court granted defendant's motion for qualified immunity. The district court dismissed Heitschmidt's claims on the basis that his pleadings did not state facts sufficient to overcome the qualified immunity defense. Qualified immunity is a defense from both liability and suit. . . Our Court has held that '[e]ven limited discovery on the issue of qualified immunity must not proceed until the district court first finds that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity.' . . Heitschmidt's motion for limited discovery was denied before the district court's decision on the defendants' motion to dismiss. There was, therefore, no error in that decision. Now that Heitschmidt's pleadings have been judged adequate to at least potentially state a claim, however, discovery can proceed on remand. We do not hold that Heitschmidt will eventually be able to establish a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights, but rather, that his pleadings are sufficient to create that possibility. . . Should further discovery lead to the conclusion that there is no genuine issue of fact which could support such a claim, there will be no procedural or substantive barrier to the filing of a motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity.").

Lion Boulos v. Wilson, 834 F.2d 504, 507, 508 (5th Cir.1987), overruled by Carswell v. Camp, 37 F.4th 1062 (5th Cir. 2022) (overruling Lion Boulos and its progeny), pet. for reh'g en banc filed July 15, 2022 ("Harlow, Mitchell and Jacquez make clear that qualified immunity does not shield government officials from all discovery but only from discovery which is either avoidable or overly broad. Discovery designed to flesh out the merits of a plaintiff's claim before a ruling on the immunity defense or discovery permitted in cases where the defendant is clearly entitled to immunity would certainly fall within this category. Immediate appeal would lie from these orders because Mitchell, Harlow and Jacquez require that immune defendants be exempt from avoidable, burdensome pretrial matters. However, a second class of discovery permitted before a ruling on a defendant's motion to dismiss does not encroach upon his qualified immunity claim. Discovery orders entered when the defendant's immunity claim turns at least partially on a factual question; when the district court is unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts; and which are narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim are neither avoidable nor overly broad. Such orders are not immediately appealable. The instant case falls within the latter category, not the former.").

Doe v. City of Austin, No. 1:22-CV-00299-RP, 2022 WL 4234954, at *7–8 (W.D. Tex. Sept. 14, 2022) ("[T]he Court finds that a stay of discovery against the City is appropriate because Doe's Monell claims against the City are inextricably intertwined with her claims against Dodds. Her claims against the City are predicated on constitutional violations allegedly committed by Dodds. To defend against Doe's allegations that the City's policies and procedures was the moving force behind Dodds' constitutional violations, the City will need discovery from Dodds and likely must depose him. Conversely, in order for Doe to prove that the City is liable under Monell, she must first demonstrate that Dodds committed a constitutional violation, and that the constitutional violation was caused by the City's policies. Because the Court has granted a stay of discovery as to Dodds, neither party will be able to obtain the necessary discovery to prove or disprove their claims and defenses. Accordingly, the Court finds that a stay of all discovery directed at both the City and Dodds is appropriate pending the outcome of Dodds' criminal proceedings. . . The Fifth Circuit's decision in Carswell v. Camp, 37 F.4th 1062 (5th Cir. 2022), supports this conclusion. In Carswell, the district court declined to rule on the qualified immunity defense at the motion to dismiss stage and entered a scheduling order permitting certain discovery of the individual defendants in their capacity as witnesses to the actions of other defendants not asserting qualified immunity. The Fifth Circuit held that the district court abused its discetion by deferring its ruling on individual officers' entitlement to qualified immunity. . . The court rejected the plaintiff's argument that the scheduling order was proper because it stayed discovery as to issues of qualified immunity while allowing discovery on the Monell claims, reasoning that 'bifurcation of discovery would radically complicate the case' and impose unreasonable burdens on the defendants. . . For these reasons, the Court finds that good cause exists to stay all discovery in this case pending completion of Dodds' criminal proceedings.") Coones v.Cogburn, No. 1:22-CV-090-H, 2022 WL 3701173, at *2–4 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 26, 2022) ("Qualified immunity has historically protected public officials from the burdens of suit, including 'pretrial discovery which is costly, time-consuming, and intrusive.'. . Still, until recently, courts maintained that a defendant asserting a qualified-immunity defense at the pleading stage cannot circumvent all discovery—only discovery that is 'avoidable or overly broad.'. . For instance, when a plaintiff pled facts in her complaint that, if true, could defeat a qualified-immunity defense, but the court needed further factual clarification before resolving a motion to dismiss, it could allow narrow discovery surrounding just those facts relevant to immunity. . . Courts invoked this 'careful procedure' to ensure that only plaintiffs who had stated a plausible claim for relief could subject an immunity-asserting public official to the burdens of discovery. . .Careful or not, the Fifth Circuit eliminated this procedure in Carswell. . . It held that 'a plaintiff asserting constitutional claims against an officer must survive the motion to dismiss (and the qualified immunity defense) without any discovery.'. . This rule 'admits of no exceptions,' forbidding even 'minimally intrusive discovery' unless and until a court determines the plaintiff has overcome the qualified-immunity defense at the pleading stage. . . It is not enough, according to Carswell, to stay discovery only as it relates to the issue of qualified immunity; all discovery must wait until resolution of the motion to dismiss. . . This is because qualified immunity should protect a defendant not just from liability, but from suit itself. . . Coones's motion to compel discovery cannot stand in light of Carswell. The defendants have filed motions to dismiss, each asserting the defense of qualified immunity. . . Coones has not responded to those motions, and the Court certainly has not made any determination concerning their merits. Because the Court has not yet decided whether Coones has alleged facts in her complaint to overcome the qualified-immunity defense as to each defendant, under Carswell, the outcome is clear: no discovery can be permitted at this stage. Coones argues that the Court should grant her motion because her requests would only minimally burden the defendants, while enabling her to formulate a complaint that best achieves full and fair recovery. . . But the strict language of Carswell preempts the Court from considering her argument, whether under a preliminary-injunction or good-cause analysis. Neither framework applies to a motion to compel discovery before a court has ruled on the merits of a motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. Rather, Carswell controls. Coones tries to distinguish her case by noting that Carswell did not involve discovery needed for the plaintiff to bring her claims in the first place. . . Coones is correct. In Carswell, the plaintiff sought to depose immunity-asserting defendants in their capacities as witnesses in other actions, and her ability to bring those actions did not depend on completing the depositions. . . But the Carswell court did not concern itself with the stakes of the requested discovery. In fact, just the opposite: the Fifth Circuit declared that the rule against discovery before resolution of qualified immunity at the pleading stage 'admits of no exceptions.'. . It thus expressly overruled the line of cases allowing for even narrowly tailored discovery at that point in the proceedings. . . This Court understands Coones's fear of losing her chance to be heard if the statute of limitations runs before she can obtain records that might implicate others in her son's death. Unfortunately, no matter the purpose or extent of the discovery she seeks at this stage, Carswell bars it. Lastly, Coones seems to suggest that because the Fifth Circuit ordered a response to the plaintiff's petition for en banc review of Carswell, this Court should not apply its holding here. . . But only the Fifth Circuits granting of a rehearing en banc provides grounds for vacating the panel opinion and staying the judgment of the court. . .Here, the Fifth Circuit has not granted the petition for such a hearing. . . In fact, no judge has called for a vote on the matter. . . The Fifth Circuit merely directed the defendant to respond to the plaintiff's petition for en banc review. . . Unless and until the Fifth Circuit grants the petition, Carswell retains its precedential value. . . Thus, it applies here. . . .The Fifth Circuit held in Carswell that a plaintiff may not seek discovery while a defendants motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity remains pending. This rule expressly applies to these facts. Defendants Cogburn, Baker, and Cueto have each asserted a qualified-immunity defense in their respective motions to dismiss. The Court has not yet resolved the motions to dismiss. Therefore, under Carswell, the Court cannot grant Coones any discovery at this time. While the Court recognizes that Coones may lose her opportunity to bring claims against other parties when the statute of limitations runs, she had nearly two years to pursue her claims. For one reason or another, she filed a complaint only recently. Had the Court received earlier notice of the suit, and thereby more time to address the outstanding motions to dismiss, perhaps Coones might have ultimately obtained the discovery she seeks. But that did not happen. And this Court cannot ignore current Fifth Circuit precedent. Coones's motion to compel is therefore denied.")

In re Flint Water Cases v. Earley, 960 F.3d 820, 824-25, 828, 830 (6th Cir. 2020) ("The district court recognized that the state defendants must be treated as though they are immune from the claims brought against them until they have exhausted their opportunities to appeal the district court's denial of their motions to dismiss based on immunity. . . Accordingly, the district court issued a stay with respect to 'discovery on claims for which they continue to litigate the issue of immunity.'. . Thus, the court ruled, 'the state and MDEQ defendants will not be subjected to discovery with respect to the sole allegation against them, which is that they violated plaintiffs' right to bodily integrity, until they have exhausted their opportunities to pursue their qualified immunity claim on appeal.'. . The state defendants' request for a stay of discovery was partly denied in the sense that the state defendants would 'be treated as non-parties pending the outcome of their qualified immunity appeals.'. . That meant that they could be subject to discovery requests only as non-party fact witnesses regarding wholly separate claims against other defendants. The district court explained that, '[i]f the state and MDEQ defendants are eventually dismissed as a result of their pending appeals, they will still be required to respond to discovery as a non-party.'. . Discovery from the state defendants as non-party fact witnesses therefore was 'inevitable.'. . . We disagree with Snyder and Dillon that the district court's 'non-party' versus 'party' distinction is meaningless, or that it permits an end-run around their entitlement to immunity. The district court was clear that no party may seek discovery from the state defendants on the particular claim that they continue to litigate with respect to immunity. . . If these non-party depositions turn out to be a ruse—as Snyder and Dillon assert that they are—Snyder and Dillon are free to object and move for a protective order at the district court level as issues arise. It is inappropriate for us, however, to issue a prophylactic order to stop these depositions from going forward based on hypothetical horrors before a single problematic question has been asked. For all these reasons, we conclude that Snyder and Dillon are not likely to succeed on their appeal from the district court's order denying them a protective order. . . . The critical difference between Skousen/Everson and this case is that Skousen and Everson concerned a district court's delay in ruling on a motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity. The district courts temporarily denied the defendants' summary judgment motions to permit additional discovery—but we authorized the appeal because that decision operated, for our purposes, as a denial of summary judgment on the question of qualified immunity. Thus, the orders at issue in Skousen and Everson fall into Sinclair's second bucket for the types of rulings that are eligible for immediate interlocutory appeal. The orders in those cases were not discovery orders. The collateral order doctrine is already an exception to the general finality rule. Snyder and Dillon are not entitled to appeal any number of discovery matters that they believe have some impact on their immunity interest. We can only imagine the deluge of appeals that would descend upon us if standard discovery orders could so easily be rebranded as final judgments. Finally, we underscore that the district court's discovery order fully takes into account the need for a pause in discovery regarding the claim on which Snyder and Dillon assert qualified immunity, and it orders limited discovery as non-party fact witnesses regarding other claims in the litigation. The district court took the state defendants' immunity seriously. If the noticing parties fail to comply with the district court's order by pressing an inappropriate line of questioning, Snyder and Dillon may assert their objections in the district court. But ordering Snyder and Dillon to comply with discovery requests as non-party fact witnesses to events regarding wholly separate claims against different defendants does not, in the abstract, interfere with their immunity. We reject Snyder's and Dillon's attempt to dress up the district court's discovery order as an implicit denial of qualified immunity. We accordingly DISMISS for lack of jurisdiction their appeal No. 20-1352.")

Robertson v. Lucas, 753 F.3d 606, 623, 624 (6th Cir. 2014) ("In the context of qualified immunity, deferential review of a district court order limiting discovery is imperative. . . .Discovery is disfavored in this context, but 'limited discovery may sometimes be necessary before the district court can resolve a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.' Crawford–El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 593 n. 14, 118 S.Ct. 1584, 140 L.Ed.2d 759 (1998). In Crawford–El, after noting the 'many options' a district court judge has in conducting discovery in a qualified immunity case, the Supreme Court explained: 'Of course, the judge should give priority to discovery concerning issues that bear upon the qualified immunity defense, such as the actions that the official actually took, since that defense should be resolved as early as possible.'. .Appellants assert that the district court erred when it permitted the appellants to depose certain appellees but limited the depositions to the qualified immunity issue. The district court, after briefing on the issue, authorized three-hour depositions of Verhiley, Cross, Mayer, Faith, Metcalf, and two non-defendant law enforcement officers. This was after appellees had voluntarily disclosed a tremendous number of documents. . . .The district court followed the Supreme Court's dictates on discovery in qualified immunity cases precisely. . . .Because a plaintiff cannot sustain a § 1983 or Bivens claim without a showing of personal responsibility on the part of the defendant, . . . appellants' Fourth Amendment claims—and the accompanying qualified immunity defenses—turned in large part on the individual actions of the defendants in this case. The same is true for the alleged Brady violations. Finally, as to appellants' argument that the conspiracy claims necessitated information about the wider investigation, no conspiracy can exist without the appellees' participation. The district court therefore did not err when it limited discovery to information pertaining to appellees' conduct.")

Reilly v. Vadlamudi, 680 F.3d 617, 628 (6th Cir. 2012) ("The district court understandably struggled with granting Defendants immunity at an early stage in the litigation. However, as previously emphasized, the purpose of qualified immunity is 'to ensure that insubstantial claims against government officials are resolved at the earliest possible stage in litigation.'. . For that reason, district courts in some cases 'will be able to establish entitlement to qualified immunity ... even before discovery.'. . This is one of those cases. A thorough review of the pleadings reveals that Dr. Vadlamudi and nurse Payne may have been negligent in diagnosing or treating Plaintiff. However, neither negligent medical care, nor the delay in providing medical care, can rise to the level of a constitutional violation absent specific allegations of sufficiently harmful acts or omissions reflecting deliberate indifference.").

Alspaugh v. McConnell, 643 F.3d 162, 168 (6th Cir. 2011) ("We . . . note that it is not proper to grant summary judgment without giving Alspaugh an opportunity to engage in discovery merely because the state defendants asserted qualified immunity as a defense. While we held in Summers v. Leis, 368 F.3d 881, 886 (6th Cir.2004), that a district court must address the question of qualified immunity prior to discovery, we did not hold that any time qualified immunity is asserted it is proper to dismiss on that ground prior to allowing any discovery. Rather, we merely instructed the district court to scrutinize the plaintiff's complaint to determine whether a violation of a clearly established constitutional right was alleged. . . In Adams v. Metiva, 31 F.3d 375, 387 (6th Cir.1994), we made clear that where the issue of qualified immunity turns on contested issues of fact, its determination is not one for summary judgment.")

Short v. Oaks Correctional Facility, No. 03-2089, 2005 WL 1002011, at *5 (6th Cir. Apr. 29, 2005) (unpublished) ("The plaintiff in Skousen failed to respond to the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity and failed to file a Rule 56(f) affidavit explaining her inability to file affidavits in opposition to the defendants' motion. Faced with similar circumstances in the present case, the district court found that there were no facts material to Plaintiff-Appellant's claims that were genuinely at issue and, therefore, it was proper to consider the motions prior to discovery.").

Summers v. Leis, 368 F.3d 881, 886, 887(6th Cir. 2004) ("This Court has held on multiple prior occasions that, when faced with a motion based on qualified immunity, a district court can not avoid ruling on the issue. . . In the case of Skousen v. Brighton High School, we concluded that a district court committed legal error in dismissing a motion for summary judgement based on qualified immunity solely because discovery was not complete . . . We held that, because the defense of qualified immunity is a threshold question, if the defense is properly raised prior to discovery, the district court has a duty to address it. . . Rather than dismiss the [summary judgment] motion because discovery was not complete, the district court was required to determine–prior to permitting further discovery–whether [Plaintiff's] complaint alleged the violation of a constitutional right at all, and if so, whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . Only after the court inquires into whether any facts material to Plaintiff's claims are genuinely at issue, and only upon a finding that material facts are in fact in dispute is a court at liberty to hold a motion for summary judgment in abeyance pending additional discovery. . . Because the order denying summary judgment was premised on the legal question of qualified immunity rather than the existence of a genuine issue of material fact, the Court retained jurisdiction and found that an interlocutory appeal was proper. . . As mentioned above, the district court's denial of Leis's summary judgment motion was based on an apparent belief that any decision regarding qualified immunity was premature and should await the close of discovery. When a motion for summary judgment is filed, the party opposing the motion may, by affidavit, explain why he is unable to present facts essential to justify the party's opposition to the motion. . . The burden is on the party seeking additional discovery to demonstrate why such discovery is necessary. . .In this instance, in order to adequately oppose Leis's motion for summary judgment, Summers should have filed a Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(f) affidavit explaining his need for additional discovery.")

Wallin v. Norman, 317 F.3d 558, 563, 564 (6th Cir. 2003) ("This court has recently held that a district court's failure to rule on a motion for summary judgment until discovery was complete was legal error. [citing Skousen v. Brighton High School] Even though the defendants are free to renew their motion later, they would in the meantime be forced to go through a large part of the litigation process that the qualified immunity doctrine seeks to avoid. By failing to elaborate on why further discovery was necessary to properly decide the motion, the district court erroneously denied the defendants the benefit of their defense from suit (if that defense is, indeed, meritorious). We therefore conclude that the district court's refusal to address the merits of the defendants' motion based on qualified immunity was a conclusive determination for the purpose of allowing an interlocutory appeal. . . . Pursuant to Rule 56(f), a party opposing a motion for summary judgment is allowed to state that he or she is unable to present facts essential to justify the party's opposition. In that situation, the district court may permit further discovery so that the nonmoving party can adequately oppose the motion for summary judgment. But it is up to the party opposing the motion to state why more discovery is needed. . . . Wallin did not file such an affidavit. In its absence, there is no justification for the district court's blanket statement that a motion for summary judgment will be premature until the close of discovery.").

Skousen v. Brighton High School, 305 F.3d 520, 527 (6th Cir. 2002) ("The district court's failure to rule on the merits of Rambo's summary judgment motion was legal error. Rather than dismiss the motion because discovery was not complete, the district court was required to determine–prior to permitting further discovery–whether Skousen's complaint alleged the violation of a constitutional right at all, and if so, whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. At that point, the court should have turned to the question of whether any facts material to Skousen's claims were genuinely at issue, an inquiry that required the court to review the motion and its supporting documents as well as the plaintiff's opposition and its supporting documents. Only then, and only on a finding that material facts were in dispute, was the court at liberty to hold the motion in abeyance pending discovery.").

Mcmillen v. Windham, No. 3:16-CV-558-CRS, 2018 WL 652830, at *2–3 (W.D. Ky. Jan. 31, 2018) (Federal Magistrate Judge Colin Lindsay) ("The Court acknowledges the position taken by Movants and the language in the Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit decisions that they cite. Indeed, the Sixth Circuit has stated broadly that '[t]he entitlement to qualified immunity involves immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.'. . 'The philosophy behind the doctrine of qualified immunity "is a desire to avoid the substantial costs imposed on government, and society, by subjecting officials to the risks of trial."'. . 'Thus, when a defendant seeks dismissal on the basis of qualified immunity, "[a] stay of discovery is properly granted until the issue of immunity is resolved.. . .While cognizant of that background, the Court emphasizes that it is not required to grant Movants' motion to stay. As the Sixth Circuit has noted, 'its prior holdings should not be interpreted as standing for the proposition that "any time qualified immunity is asserted it is proper to dismiss on that ground prior to allowing any discovery."'. . 'Thus, discovery may be permitted, even where qualified immunity is raised, if it is appropriate to frame the immunity issue.'. . In a 2013 decision from this district, Locke v. Mooney, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102473 (W.D. Ky. July 22, 2013), for example, the Court permitted limited discovery when a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity was pending. . . . In Locke, the Court also permitted discovery to proceed on certain other claims that would survive regardless of the resolution of the motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity. . . In this case, the Court is persuaded that discovery should not be stayed pending resolution of Movants' motion to dismiss. As Plaintiffs emphasize, arguments regarding qualified immunity are typically resolved at the summary judgment stage, rather than by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. . . In this case, Movants seek to resolve the issue through a motion to dismiss and argue that the qualified immunity issue is solely a question of law that does not require any discovery. Plaintiffs, on the other hand, argue in response to the motion to stay that qualified immunity is a fact-intensive issue that turns on the particular circumstances of each case. . . This argument is consistent with Plaintiffs' position in response to the motion to dismiss, in which they argue that the motion to dismiss should be converted to a motion for summary judgment and more discovery permitted prior to resolving the qualified immunity issue. . . Moreover, while they argue that discovery should be stayed, Movants concede that they served written discovery requests on Plaintiffs and participated in a deposition of Plaintiffs' expert witness. . . Based on the foregoing, the Court concludes that Movants are more amenable to participating in discovery during the pendency of their motion to dismiss than they profess to be in the motion to stay.")

Doe v. Ohio State Univ., No. 2:15-CV-2830, 2016 WL 6581843, at *14 (S.D. Ohio Nov. 7, 2016) (" 'Although an officer's "entitle[ment] to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point," that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.' Wesley v. Campbell, 779 F.3d 421, 433–34 (6th Cir. 2015) . . . The concern at the Rule 12 stage is whether the plaintiff has alleged 'facts which, if true, describe a violation of a clearly established statutory or constitutional right of which a reasonable public official, under an objective standard, would have known.' Kennedy v. City of Cleveland, 797 F.2d 297, 299 (6th Cir. 1986). Even if the plaintiff has done so, the defendant may still be entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity 'if discovery fails to uncover evidence sufficient to create a genuine issue as to whether the defendant in fact committed those acts.'. . Doe cites a Fifth Circuit case for authority that 'a district court "may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.' Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 648 (5th Cir. 2012). The Sixth Circuit has not been explicit, like the Fifth Circuit has, about adopting a plan of narrowly tailored discovery to determine the issue of qualified immunity, but such a plan is consistent with the purposes of qualified immunity, namely, that 'insubstantial claims against government officials be resolved....at the earliest possible stage in litigation.'. . But whether the Court defers its ruling or simply denies Defendants' motion to dismiss, the Court will not make a final ruling on the issue of qualified immunity until after limited discovery. Here, the Court will grant in part and deny in part the motion to dismiss and permit limited discovery. If discovery fails to uncover sufficient evidence that the Administrators violated Doe's due process rights, then the Administrators may be entitled to qualified immunity.")

Instead, Porter asks that the court allow him to proceed to engage in discovery relating essentially to all issues in this litigation. . . . . For these reasons, the motion for leave to permit discovery is DENIED, and all discovery in this matter is STAYED until the court decides the issue of qualified immunity.")

Hagan v. City of Cleveland, 2007 WL 893825, at 6-8 (N.D. Ohio Mar. 22, 2007) ("Thus, the court finds that 'limited discovery' is necessary before the merits of Franko's motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds can be resolved. . . The Supreme Court has instructed that such discovery should be tailored specifically to the question of the officer's qualified immunity. . . The court should limit discovery to those issues that bear upon the qualified immunity defense, 'such as the actions that the official actually took.'. . . The constitutional violation alleged here is excessive (deadly) force, not an improper pursuit, nor an arguably ill-advised decision to enter a building in pursuit, without backup assistance. . . . Here, the crime suspected by the police was possession or sale of drugs, and Renshaw was apparently attempting to evade further investigation or arrest by flight. What is contested is whether Renshaw posed an immediate threat to the safety of Officer Franko, or whether he was actively resisting arrest, at the time of their confrontation on the apartment building stairway. No eyewitnesses (other than Franko) to the shooting itself are known to exist. The specific discovery as sought by Hagan cannot be characterized as 'limited.' Although Hagan acknowledges that an investigation into the shooting resulted in a Use of Deadly Force Investigation Team report, Hagan apparently seeks to reconstruct that entire investigation step-by-step. Thus, he seeks to depose at least 23 individuals, but only after 'complete responses to interrogatories and document requests because that information will be used during the depositions.'. . . Hagan acknowledges that he has already received relevant evidence from the defendants through an open records act request. . . . The court finds that limited discovery into facts underlying the assertion of qualified immunity is appropriate. That discovery shall be limited to that evidence which would directly relate to the disputed events on the stairway that led to Renshaw's death. In other words, discovery shall be limited to that which would shed light on the factual basis supporting (or not) Officer Franko's assertion of the necessity of the use of force at that point, such as the forensic evidence, the autopsy, evidence that would indicate the location of the parties at the time of the shooting, and so forth. Hagan is directed to narrow his discovery requests in light of this ruling, and to propound such amended requests to the defendants.").

O'Neil v. Kiser, Civil No. 03-CV-10001-BC, 2005 WL 579719, at *3, *4 (E.D. Mich. Mar. 8, 2005) ("It is true that the purpose of the qualified immunity defense is to protect government officials from 'the broad-ranging discovery that can be peculiarly disruptive of effective government.'. . However, the issue of qualified immunity requires an exploration of the contours of the constitutional rights in issue in the context of the specific facts of the case. . . Those questions, in turn, will involve exploration of 'the circumstances with which the official is confronted, and often on the information that he possesses.'. . The critical inquiry is 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation confronted.'. .All the dimensions of that 'situation,' therefore, are the proper subject of discovery. . . .The matter has been referred to the magistrate judge for pretrial case management, where it soon will return. The Court has no doubt that the magistrate judge is more than equal to the task of managing discovery within the proper framework as outlined by circuit precedent.").

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Hansen v. Cannon, No. 01-3076, 2001 WL 1637660, at *2 (7th Cir. Dec. 18, 2001) (Not published) ("On appeal the Hansens first argue that the district court improperly stayed discovery pending the outcome of the defendants' motions for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. As the district court observed, one purpose of qualified immunity is to protect public officials from 'broad-ranging discovery' that can be 'peculiarly disruptive of effective government.' . . . But qualified immunity does not shield public officials from discovery entirely. If the Hansens' allegations stated a claim that the defendants violated a clearly established law, and the parties disagreed as to what actions the law enforcement officers took, discovery may be appropriate for the limited purpose of addressing the issue of qualified immunity.")

Trombetta v. Bd. of Education, Proviso Township High School District 209, No. 02 C 5895, 2004 WL 868265, at 2-5 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 22, 2004) ("In their present motion, the District and Jackson seek reconsideration of the Court's denial of their motions in limine nos. 4 and 10. In those motions, defendants sought an order barring questioning of any School Board members at trial regarding their motivations for what they characterize as the reorganization (plaintiff characterizes it as a termination of his employment) on the grounds of legislative immunity from suit, as well as any comment about those motivations by Trombetta or his attorneys (motion # 4), and any reference to their motives regarding the 'termination' (motion # 10). . . . Defendants' request to preclude any inquiry or mention of their motives amounts to a request for entry of summary judgment. Were the Court to grant what defendants request, the case would be over. A claim of retaliation for the exercise of First Amendment rights requires the plaintiff to prove that he suffered adverse action because of his exercise of protected rights, or, to put it another way, that 'the defendants' actions [were] motivated by [the plaintiff's] constitutionally protected speech.'. . The plaintiff cannot conceivably prevail without introducing evidence of, and arguing, the motivation of those who made the decision he attacks–in this case, Superintendent Jackson, Mayor Serpico, and the Board as a whole. Thus if defendants prevail on their motion for reconsideration, they are entitled to judgment in their favor. This request amounts to a motion for summary judgment which is not made in timely fashion. . . . There is another significant reason why defendants' claim is without merit. The District and Jackson argue that the Board members' legislative role entitles them to a testimonial privilege against inquiry about their reasons for acting. Even were this a viable claim, it is beyond question that the Board members have waived any such privilege. Each of the Board members appeared, without objection, for a deposition (nearly a year ago) and testified fully and completely about all of the events surrounding the termination / reorganization, including inquiries about their motives in acting as they did. If a testimonial privilege existed, it existed when the depositions were taken. Yet the Board members testified at their depositions about their reasons for acting, and they made no effort to seek a protective order barring inquiries about their reasons for acting as they did. . . . Finally, other than citing a plethora of cases, most of them either state-law decisions or non-controlling decisions of other district courts, defendants have made no effort to focus the Court in on any cases like this one in which the decision under attack is an employment-related decision by a public body and the plaintiff's claim is one that, as noted earlier, requires inquiry into the motivating factors for the decision. Based on our quick review, most of the cases appear to concern zoning matters, not the termination of a person's employment. If the purported evidentiary privilege proposed by the District and Jackson barred inquiry into the motivations of the members of a public entity that made employment decisions, it effectively would amount to a grant of immunity not just to the entity's individual members, but to the entity as a whole. If accepted, this would not only contravene Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622 (1980), in which the Supreme Court held that municipal bodies sued under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 are not entitled to the immunities from suit available to government officials, but would also effectively abrogate prohibitions against employment discrimination (Title VII, the ADEA, the ADA) for any municipal body whose "legislative" members are given decision making authority over employment matters. Defendants have marshaled no support for such a sweeping rule.").

Kaufman v. Saari, 889 F. Supp. 1105, 1113 (E.D. Wis. 1995) ("The plaintiffs state that they have been prevented from engaging in discovery due to stays on discovery imposed by the court prior to resolution of the issue of qualified immunity. They contend that summary judgment is inappropriate because they have not had an opportunity to engage in discovery . . . . The plaintiffs ignore the instruction of the Supreme Court in Mitchell v. Forsyth that the doctrine of qualified immunity is intended to protect government officials from the burdens of litigation and the corresponding burden of discovery where a plaintiff has failed sufficiently to demonstrate a violation of clearly established law. [cite omitted] While I found the allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint sufficient to meet the minimal pleading standards imposed by Rule 8(a), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, I reserved judgment on the question of qualified immunity. The limited information presented by the plaintiffs in response to the defendant's motion shows that their claims are the type of 'insubstantial claims' which should be resolved under the doctrine of qualified immunity prior to the commencement of discovery. [cite omitted] The plaintiffs are expected to have some factual support for their claims prior to commencing their action.").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Johnson v. Moody, 903 F.3d 766, 772-74 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized that qualified immunity is an immunity from suit that should be resolved 'at the earliest possible stage in litigation' to ensure that insubstantial damage claims against government officials are resolved 'prior to discovery.'. . When plaintiff has asserted a § 1983 claim requiring proof of wrongful motive, and defendant asserts a pre-discovery claim of qualified immunity, the district court 'may insist that the plaintiff put forward specific, nonconclusory factual allegations that establish improper motive,' 'should give priority to discovery concerning issues that bear upon the qualified immunity defense,' and has 'broad discretion to tailor discovery narrowly and to dictate the sequence of discovery.'. . . To defeat a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the plaintiff must put forth facts showing that the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right, and that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . The district court has discretion to decide 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.'. . Thus, when Defendants moved for summary judgment based on qualified immunity for Moody and Mathis, supported by their testimony at the state court suppression hearing and the state court's finding—however limited—of no bad faith, Plaintiffs were required to respond with affirmative evidence of bad faith if bad faith was an essential element of their Count I claims. . . . Here, in response to Defendants' qualified immunity motion, Plaintiffs presented no evidence tending to refute or contradict Defendants' strong evidence from the state court proceedings that their conduct in investigating C.P.'s serious allegation of sexual misconduct, however questionable or incomplete, was not conscious-shocking behavior as a matter of law. Rather, Plaintiffs asked the district court to defer ruling on qualified immunity until after they subjected Moody and Mathis to extensive, burdensome discovery. The district court did not abuse its discretion in denying this request, consistent with the teaching of Crawford-El v. Britton and other Supreme Court and circuit court precedents. Based on the summary judgment record, the district court concluded, as Pearson v. Callahan expressly authorized, that Moody and Mathis were entitled to qualified immunity from the Count I claims, not simply because the law was not clearly established, but because their conduct in investigating did not violate Johnson's constitutional rights. This ruling was consistent with our decision in Akins v. Epperly, and Plaintiffs do not challenge it on appeal. Evidence that investigators ignored factual inconsistencies in the evidence, negligently failed to look into leads, and did not question the alleged victim's credibility is insufficient to establish that they investigated in a reckless, conscience-shocking manner. . . . Plaintiffs did not request additional discovery focused on the qualified immunity issue. The district court's determination that Plaintiffs presented no evidence refuting Defendants' showing of no bad faith or conscience-shocking investigation was essential in resolving the threshold qualified immunity issue. And that determination proved to be fatal to all of Plaintiffs' claims against the City and the Police Department Defendants as a matter of law. Plaintiffs requested time to conduct wide-ranging discovery into all aspects of the investigation and numerous Police Department policies. But they made no showing (i) that any sought-after facts are essential to resist summary judgment on any of their claims, or (ii) that any such evidence actually exists. Therefore, the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying Plaintiffs' Rule 56(d) request to defer its ruling until additional discovery was completed and in granting summary judgment dismissing all claims.")

Janis v. Biesheuvel, 428 F.3d 795, 800, 801 (8th Cir. 2005) ("Janis further argues that she could prove that a genuine issue of material fact exists if she is permitted to engage in discovery. Qualified immunity is an immunity from suit, not simply from liability. . .Its purpose is to 'avoid Asubject[ing] government officials either to the costs of trial or to the burdens of broad-reaching discovery" in cases where the legal norms the officials are alleged to have violated were not clearly established at the time.'. . Accordingly, '[u]nless the plaintiff's allegations state a claim of violation of clearly established law, a defendant pleading qualified immunity is entitled to dismissal before commencement of discovery.'. . Janis claims to be seeking the following additional information: 1) what was demonstrated by the tape recordings of radio traffic between the people involved in the incident; 2) what the officers remember regarding the incident that is not contained in the police reports; 3) what Richards stated to officers at the scene; 4) what movements Richards made within his vehicle other than grabbing the steering wheel; 5) how long it took for officers to remove Richards; 6) whether the other officers involved remember the incident the same way as the two primary two officers; 7) what the training of each involved officer was; and 8) whether these officers required to participate in additional training because of other past incidents of excessive force. However, Janis already possessed police reports of the incident, a transcript of the radio traffic between a highway patrol trooper who was involved in the pursuit and the dispatcher, and the daily activity report from the Fall River County Dispatcher. Janis also had affidavits from both officers involved in removing Richards from his vehicle. Finally, Janis had a videotape from one of the officers' vehicles that provided a partially obstructed view of the events that transpired when Richards was pulled over. Thus, the district court reasonably concluded that Janis already had much of the information she might have found with further discovery. Accordingly, Janis failed to meet her burden of establishing that the amount of force used was objectively unreasonable. Therefore, the officers' actions do not constitute a violation of a constitutional right.")

Lovelace v. Delo, 47 F.3d 286, 287 (8th Cir. 1995) ("[I]f the plaintiffs' allegations state a claim of violation of clearly established law and the parties disagree as to what actions the law enforcement officers took, discovery may be appropriate for the limited purpose of addressing the issue of qualified immunity.").

McCabe v. Macaulay, 450 F.Supp.2d 928, 935, 936 (N.D. Iowa 2006) ("In sum, for the court to make a determination as to whether the Individual Federal Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, Plaintiffs are entitled to know what facts the Individual Federal Defendants were presented with at the time of Plaintiffs' arrests. . . The mere fact that the Individual Federal Defendants have asserted a qualified immunity defense does not completely eviscerate the Plaintiffs' right to conduct discovery. . . For the defense of qualified immunity to have meaning, however, discovery in this case must be narrowly tailored to only those facts essential to deciding whether the Individual Federal Defendants are entitled to that defense. . . . For example, in granting Plaintiffs' Rule 56(f) Motion, the court does not grant Plaintiffs the right to conduct far-reaching discovery to pursue their theory that a nationwide conspiracy existed within the highest levels of the Secret Service to suppress dissent at President Bush's re-election rallies. Whether or not such a conspiracy existed is immaterial to the qualified immunity defense presently before the court. . . Accordingly, the court shall grant in part Plaintiffs' Rule 56(f) Motion. Plaintiffs are entitled to limited discovery, that is, to know the circumstances surrounding their arrests, insofar as those facts might reveal what information the Individual Federal Defendants possessed at the time each acted. . . In other words, only discovery that is 'essential' to resolve the Individual Federal Defendants' qualified immunity defenses shall be permitted.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Costa v. County of Ventura, 680 F. App'x 545, ___ (9th Cir. 2017) ("The district court abused its discretion by denying all discovery after the defendants' assertion of qualified immunity. '[L]imited discovery, tailored to the issue of qualified immunity, will sometimes be necessary before a district court can resolve a motion for summary judgment.' Moss v. U.S. Secret Serv., 572 F.3d 962, 973 (9th Cir. 2009) (first citing Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 646 n.6 (1987); then citing Crawford–El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 593 n.14 (1998) (plurality opinion)). Specifically, if the actions alleged by the plaintiff are such that no reasonable officer could have believed them lawful, and if the officer alleges that she took actions different from those alleged by the plaintiff, 'then discovery may be necessary before [the plaintiff]'s motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds can be resolved.' Anderson, 483 U.S. at 646 n.6. Here, the Estate alleged the violation of a clearly established right under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, namely the excessive force allegedly used by an officer, who the Estate claims shot Costa while Costa was immobilized by the officer's dog. This version of events conflicts with the officer's declaration that the dog did not succeed in immobilizing Costa. The district court denied the Estate the opportunity to conduct discovery, then granted summary judgment based on exhibits tendered by the defendants. In particular, it relied on the officer's affidavit and the unsworn interview of the other eyewitness. Under Anderson, the defendants' claim of qualified immunity did not prohibit the district court from allowing the Estate to obtain discovery. The district court therefore abused its discretion by precluding the Estate from taking the depositions of the only living individuals who witnessed the shooting and instead relying exclusively on the defendants' declarations supporting their version of the events. At a minimum, the denial of such discovery deprived the Estate of any opportunity to test the defendants' declarations through depositions, and it thereby prejudiced the Estate.")

Committee for Immigrant Rights of Sonoma County v. County of Sonoma, No. C 08-4220 PJH, 2009 WL 2382689, at *27, *28 (N.D. Cal. July 31, 2009) ("The parties argue at length about the applicability of Iqbal to this case in general and to discovery in particular. As should be apparent from the court's citation to Iqbal throughout this order, the court finds that notwithstanding the factual distinctions, the Supreme Court's latest pronouncement on pleading standards applies to this case, just as does Twombly. A quick Westlaw search reflects that Iqbal has been cited nearly 1000 times by district and appellate courts in the few months since its issuance, so the court's conclusion is no stretch. There is little case law, however, in the wake of Iqbal elucidating the relationship between the adequacy of the pleadings and the plaintiff's right to engage in discovery and the court has not yet determined exactly how it will apply the reasoning of that case to this and the hundreds of other pending cases on the court's docket. For now the court relies on Rule 26(c) under which County Defendants have brought their motion for a protective order, while looking to Iqbal for guidance. In attempting to reach an appropriate balance the court has considered several factors. Like Iqbal, this case raises significant issues of qualified immunity. Given that the purpose of a qualified immunity defense is not only to permit the accused government official to avoid liability, but also to free that official from the disruptions, inconvenience and expense of discovery, a goal that would be defeated if discovery were permitted. The court has already found that qualified immunity is a viable defense for the individual federal defendants and County defendants have indicated an intent to raise the defense after the claims are clarified in an amended complaint. On the other hand, this case, unlike Iqbal involves, in addition to government officials, government agencies which are not subject to qualified immunity. Given the sheer scope of the claims and the rulings in favor of plaintiffs that the court has made in this order, it is unlikely that this case will be entirely disposed of on any number of motions to dismiss. Thus, discovery is inevitable. On balance, the court finds that good cause exists to impose a limited stay of discovery. Thus, County Defendants' motion for a protective order is granted and plaintiffs' motion to compel is denied. County defendants need not respond to the outstanding discovery and no new discovery may be propounded pending plaintiffs' filing of the first amended complaint and County Defendants' response. Following the court's review it will be determined whether discovery should proceed against either the government agencies or the individual defendants or both.").

Tubar v. Clift, No. C05-1154JCC, 2006 WL 521683, at 2-4 (W.D. Wash. Mar. 2, 2006) ("The seemingly broad prohibition on discovery announced in Harlow has not gone unqualified, however. First, qualified immunity is available only to individual government officials, not governmental entities. . . Second, where there is a dispute as to both the reasonableness of the official's actions and the factual characterization of those actions, the U.S. Supreme Court has acknowledged that a plaintiff may be permitted to carry out a limited amount of discovery 'tailored specifically to the question of [an official's] qualified immunity.'[citing Anderson] In effect, the defense of qualified immunity only protects government officials from 'broad-reaching' discovery. . . With respect to the first and second categories of discovery requests that Defendants seek to stay, the Court finds that Defendant Clift is entitled to protection against discovery requests propounded to him personally. However, because there appears to be a factual dispute as to the underlying events in this case, Defendant Clift should be required to answer any discovery seeking information relating to the actual events giving rise to his qualified immunity defense. Therefore, Clift individually is required to provide responses to requests for written discovery and documents if those requests specifically relate to the parties' factual disputes concerning the shooting incident at issue in the present case. Further, Defendant Clift may be deposed, but the scope of the deposition must be strictly limited to questioning regarding the events giving rise to his qualified immunity defense. Any discovery that is outside this limited inquiry will be stayed. . . The Court must undertake a more detailed analysis with respect to the written discovery requests propounded to Defendant City. At the outset, the Court notes that Defendants' motion to stay has been filed on behalf of both Officer Clift and the City. However, Defendant City is not permitted to assert a defense of qualified immunity and is accordingly not entitled to a stay of discovery on the written discovery enumerated in the motion, even if such requests seek personal information concerning Defendant Clift . . . . Although the Court is mindful of the various policy justifications for the Harlow rule, the Court does not read Harlow so broadly as to necessarily prohibit any and all discovery relating to a government official asserting a defense of qualified immunity. . . . Accordingly, a stay on Plaintiff's written discovery requests to Defendant City merely because the information concerns Defendant Clift would exceed the proper reach of a stay justified by Defendant Clift's assertion of qualified immunity in this case. Defendant City argues, however, that certain items of discovery directed to it can only be answered by Defendant Clift and that the mere fact that Plaintiff has directed discovery to the City in name only should not undermine Defendant Clift's protection from discovery in this matter. . . This argument has merit, because allowing such conduct would circumvent the policy underlying Harlow. Accordingly, the Court finds that Defendant City is required to answer Plaintiff's requests for written discovery. However, in keeping with the protection from discovery of Defendant Clift himself, the Court makes the following exception to the City's requirement to answer discovery. To the extent that an answer to any of Plaintiff's requests (1) legitimately would require Defendant Clift's personal knowledge or consultation of documents exclusively under his control, and (2) bears upon matters beyond an inquiry into the actual events giving rise to the qualified immunity defense, Defendant City need not include that information in its responses. However, as to requests that do bear upon the actual events giving rise to the qualified immunity defense, Defendant City must provide answers, even if such answers require consulting Defendant Clift, because Defendant Clift is not protected from such discovery. Further, in the event that Defendant Clift's qualified immunity defense is denied, Defendant City will be required to supplement its responses in accordance with the discovery rules. The limited stay on discovery ordered here is not an invitation for Defendants to avoid legitimate discovery requests by trumpeting Defendant Clift's qualified immunity defense. Accordingly, Defendants are advised to review written discovery responses to ensure that they are consistent with the dictates of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 26(g) and 37(g).").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Stonecipher v. Valles, 759 F.3d 1134, 1148, 1149 (10th Cir. 2014) ("The Stoneciphers make one last procedural argument. They contend the district court abused its discretion when they were denied the opportunity for additional discovery before it granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment. . .But because qualified immunity protects against the burdens of discovery as well as trial, a district court may stay discovery upon the filing of a dispositive motion based on qualified immunity. . . The court may grant pre-discovery summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity if the plaintiffs cannot explain 'how discovery will enable them to rebut a defendant's showing of objective reasonableness.'. . If, however, the district court determines it cannot rule on the immunity defense without clarifying the relevant facts, the court 'may issue a discovery order narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.'. .The district court concluded, and we agree, that Valles possessed arguable probable cause for the arrest and charging decision. The Stoneciphers do not explain how discovery would enable them to rebut this showing. In their reply brief, the Stoneciphers mention that discovery would allow them to obtain the complete correspondence between Valles and Jennings, but they do not explain how this material would rebut the finding of arguable probable cause. . . Both Valles and Jennings averred that Jennings independently reviewed Mr. Stonecipher's file. Because the Stoneciphers do not explain how discovery will allow them to rebut the finding of objective reasonableness, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment for the defendants without allowing for discovery.")

Jones v. Hernandez, 2007 WL 4269052, at *3, *4 (10th Cir. Dec. 6, 2007) ("While a ruling on qualified immunity 'should be made early in the proceedings,' . . . discovery as to evidence central to the qualified immunity analysis must be allowed. . . On the record before the district court, there was doubt as to whether the scoring protocol employed by the interview panel was subjective or objective. The district court should not have granted summary judgment while that factual dispute was still unresolved. . . . For the same reason, the court's dismissal of Ms. Jones' claims against Sheriff Hernandez was erroneous. Ms. Jones has alleged and may be able to prove that she had a property interest in promotion, based on a nondiscretionary mode of selection. Ms. Jones' claims against Sheriff Hernandez cannot be resolved in his favor as a matter of law, but require factual development, along with the claims against the other defendants.").

Mee v. Ortega, 967 F.2d 423, 430 (10th Cir. 1992) (factual disputes required more development before district court could rule on qualified immunity).

Lewis v. City of Ft. Collins, 903 F.2d 752, 754, 758 (10th Cir. 1990) ("Qualified immunity is not a shield from all discovery. . . In some cases, discovery may be necessary to determine whether the defendants' challenged conduct violated clearly established law and thus, whether defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. However, until the threshold immunity question is determined, discovery shall be limited to resolving that issue alone. [cites omitted] Based on the record before us, the order of the district court does not limit discovery to the resolution of the qualified immunity issue. As such, defendants have been denied their entitlement to be free from the burden of overbroad discovery. Accordingly, we have jurisdiction over this appeal. . . . Liberal application of rule 56(f) should not be allowed to subvert the goals of Harlow and its progeny. [cite omitted] Accordingly, in response to a summary judgment motion based on qualified immunity, a plaintiff's 56(f) affidavit must demonstrate 'how discovery will enable them to rebut a defendant's showing of objective reasonableness' or, stated alternatively, demonstrate a 'connection between the information he would seek in discovery and the validity of the [defendant's] qualified immunity assertion.' [cite omitted] To that end, it is insufficient for the party opposing the motion to merely assert that additional discovery is required to demonstrate a factual dispute or 'that evidence supporting a party's allegation is in the opposing party's hands.'" [cites omitted]).

Encinias v. New Mexico Corrections Department, No. CV 21-1145 KG/SCY, 2022 WL 2341629, at *2 (D.N.M. June 29, 2022) ("[T]he Supreme Court has instructed that all discovery should be stayed upon the assertion of qualified immunity, even for those defendants not asserting the defense. . . .In addressing the same argument as the one Plaintiff presently raises, Judge Sweazea held that '[t]he Court is bound by Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit precedent that requires a stay of all discovery when a qualified immunity defense is raised, and standard practice in this District is to stay discovery—as to all defendants—when the defense of qualified immunity has been raised.' Mathis v. Centurion Corr. Healthcare of New Mexico, LLC, No. 1:22-CV-20 JCH/KRS, 2022 WL 1987713, at *1 (D.N.M. June 6, 2022) (citing Higgins v. Saavedra, 2017 WL 1437317, at *1 (D.N.M.)). The Court agrees with this assessment.")

Estate of McClain v. City of Aurora, Colorado, No. 20-CV-02389-DDD-NRN, 2021 WL 307505, at *2–4 (D. Colo. Jan. 29, 2021) ("There are certain circumstances when discovery is permissible despite an assertion of qualified immunity, including cases alleging official-capacity claims, requests for injunctive (as opposed to monetary) relief, and claims against entities, not individuals. . . Additionally, permitting discovery up until the point that qualified immunity is raised may be appropriate, particularly when the defense is not advanced until the filing of a motion for summary judgment. . .The Court finds that a balance of the above factors does not favor a stay in this matter. The individual Defendants' mere assertion that they are entitled to qualified immunity does not end the analysis. Even when qualified immunity is raised, courts in this District generally disfavor a stay of all discovery. . . . I note that discovery will continue against the Defendant entity, the City of Aurora, for whom the defense of qualified immunity is not available. The individual Defendants would likely be witnesses with respect to the claims against the City of Aurora and will be deposed in any event. It makes no sense to have the individual Defendants be deposed as witnesses now, only to be re-deposed as parties later in the event their qualified immunity defenses are unsuccessful. Furthermore, the String Cheese factors weigh in favor of proceeding with discovery. . . . The plaintiffs here are family members of a dead young man. Elijah McClain's family deserves answers to the questions of why he died and whether anyone or any entity is to be held to account. The wheels of justice turn slowly in any event, but issuing the requested stay would cause those wheels to simply grind to a halt, delaying for months or even years the process of answering those important questions. . . . In short, 'Defendants have established no particularized facts that demonstrate they will suffer a clearly defined and serious harm associated with moving forward with discovery.'. .Proceeding with discovery also promotes the Court's interest in efficiently managing its docket. Finally, the interests of persons not parties to the civil litigation and the public interest are not harmed by moving forward with the case. To the contrary, the Court can take judicial notice that this case has received widespread attention locally, state-wide, and nationally. The public, too, has a strong interest in knowing the answers to the same difficult questions being posed by Mr. McClain's family. It is not in the interest of the public or in the interest of justice to 'put on the back burner' discovery in a case that raises significant questions about the City of Aurora's policing and paramedic practices. It may be that there is nothing constitutionally wrong with the conduct that eventually led to Mr. McClain's death. If so, then the public will be better served by knowing that hard reality, as fairly determined by the judicial process, sooner rather than later. In short, a stay of discovery is not appropriate in this case.")

Lowery v. County of Riley, 2008 WL 3562061, at *1, *2 (D. Kan. Aug. 12, 2008) ("There are three alternatives available to the Court concerning the scheduling of discovery in this case while awaiting a ruling by the Supreme Court on a Petition for Writ of Certiorari: (1) allow only discovery on the Monell claims to proceed; (2) stay all discovery; or (3) allow all discovery to proceed. The alternative to allow only Monell discovery presents problems that the Court has previously discussed. It would be very difficult, if not impossible, to delineate precisely the scope of any discovery that could take place during pendency of the Petition for Writ of Certiorari on the Monell claims so that it did not include evidence related to the qualified immunity claims Defendants are attempting to vindicate. . . It was this blurred line between discovery related to Monell claims and discovery related to the Defendants' qualified immunity claims which concerned the Court during the Tenth Circuit appeal. As previously stated in the December 27, 2007 Memorandum and Order, if the Court were to allow 'limited' discovery to proceed (only on the Monell claims), there was a very real possibility that there would be a duplication of discovery in the future, particularly if the decision denying qualified immunity were affirmed. This would be both expensive and inefficient. Defendants argue that this fact justifies the second alternative– the continued stay of all discovery in this case pending decision by the U.S. Supreme Court. The Court might agree had there been a dissenting opinion in the Tenth Circuit appeal or some indication that the decision by the Tenth Circuit was in conflict with those of other circuits or was a case of first impression. None of these circumstances are present in this case. There was no dissenting opinion, and only one judge out of the thirteen judges who considered the Petition for Rehearing En Banc voted to grant the motion. Nothing in the Tenth Circuit opinion indicates that it presents a case of first impression on a unique issue of law or that it is contrary to decisions of other circuits. While this is no guarantee that the Supreme Court will deny a petition for certiorari, it is a major indication of the difficulty Defendants face in convincing the Supreme Court that discretionary review is justified in this case. . . Thus, the present circumstances are significantly different than they were at the time this court previously refused to allow discovery to proceed during the Tenth Circuit appeal.Considering all the facts, the Court believes that the third alternative is the appropriate result. It is now time to move forward and complete all discovery so that there will be no further delays in setting a trial on the merits of Plaintiffs' claims. The case has been on file since March 2004, and Defendants have had ample opportunity to make their case for a finding of qualified immunity on the major claims brought by Plaintiffs. While there is still a chance that Defendants will prevail on their claim of qualified immunity in the Supreme Court, weighing that chance against the continued delay to Plaintiffs from their day in court leads the Court to deny the motion for any continued stay of discovery.").

Howse v. Atkinson, No. Civ.A. 04-2341GTV-DJW, 2005 WL 994572, at *2 (D. Kan. Apr. 27, 2005) (not reported) ("The Court recognizes that staying discovery as to all Defendants has consequences to Plaintiff in that there are risks that witnesses' memories will fade, witnesses may relocate, and documents may get misplaced or destroyed. The Court, however, finds that in this case the risk is slight because Defendants are only seeking to [sic] a temporary stay of discovery until the Court rules on the Motion to Dismiss, filed on February 25, 2005 and fully briefed on April 11, 2005. The Court finds that Defendant KUPI would be prejudiced from having to proceed with bifurcated discovery while the Court resolves the immunity issues raised by Defendants Atkinson and Hagedorn. The Court further finds that bifurcation of discovery would be inefficient. Although Defendant KUPI has not asserted an immunity defense that would warrant staying discovery pending a ruling on a dispositive motion, the Court finds that the risk of prejudice to Defendant KUPI from proceeding with bifurcated discovery while the Motion to Dismiss is pending outweighs any risk of prejudice to Plaintiff from a temporary stay of discovery as to all parties.")

Rome v. Romero, 225 F.R.D. 640, 643, 644 (D. Colo. 2004) ("Although the Supreme Court recognizes that a well-supported claim of qualified immunity should shield a defendant from 'unnecessary and burdensome discovery,' Crawford-El, 523 U.S. at 598, invocation of the defense is not a bar to all discovery. . . . Even where a qualified immunity defense is asserted, some limited discovery is still permitted. As the Supreme Court in Crawford-El observed, qualified immunity does not protect an official from all discovery, but only from that which is 'broad-reaching.' . . Limited discovery may be necessary when the doctrine is asserted in a motion for summary judgment on contested factual assertions. . . . A plaintiff faced with a defense of qualified immunity in a motion for summary judgment may also be entitled to conduct discovery to explore facts essential to justify opposition to the motion as provided for by Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(f). . . . In addition, discovery up to the point when the qualified immunity issue is presented for adjudication may be appropriate. The protection of the governmental actor is best served when the issue of qualified immunity is raised at the earliest possible stage of the litigation. . . Because the official controls when the issue is presented for adjudication, he cannot be said to be unduly burdened if he foregoes an opportunity to address the issue prior to the commencement of discovery, and instead waits to assert it until some point later in the litigation. In such circumstances, it may be appropriate to stay discovery only after the official presents the issue, and to require responses to existing discovery requests. . . .The foregoing discussion explores the type of discovery that the individual Defendants should be protected against: namely, discovery requests (i) directed against the individual Defendants, (ii) in support of a claim for monetary damages,[footnote omitted] (iii) which seek information other than that relating to disputed factual issues regarding the actual events giving rise to the qualified immunity defense. By contrast, discovery requests directed at the institutional Defendants; relating to any claim for declaratory or injunctive relief; or seeking information regarding the individual Defendants' version of the incidents in question are properly made, notwithstanding the pendency of the Motion for Summary Judgment.").

Sonnino v. University of Kansas Hospital Authority, 220 F.R.D. 633, 639 (D. Kan. 2004) ("In this case, the Individual Hospital Defendants have filed neither a motion to dismiss nor a motion for summary judgment. They have only raised qualified immunity as a defense in their answer to Plaintiff's Complaint. . . By failing to assert the defense in a dispositive motion, the Individual Hospital Defendants have failed to place the issue of qualified immunity before the Court. While the Court recognizes that defendants are generally entitled to have the Court determine the issue of qualified immunity prior to their being subjected to discovery, they must take the necessary steps to bring the issue before the Court for resolution. Defendants are not entitled to an indefinite suspension of discovery while they ponder whether and when to file a motion to dismiss or for summary judgement. . . . In light of the above, the Court overrules the qualified immunity objections that the Individual Hospital Defendants have asserted in response to many of Plaintiff's discovery requests."), reconsidered in part, 221 F.R.D. 661 (D. Kan. 2004).

Quinn v. City of Kansas City, No. Civ.A. 98-2236-KHV, 1998 WL 919129, at *2, *3 (D.Kan. Nov. 6, 1998) (unpublished) ("[W]hile qualified immunity is a powerful defense in other contexts, in excessive force cases the substantive inquiry is the inquiry that decides whether the qualified immunity defense is available to the government actor. . .If plaintiff alleges that police used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment, the qualified immunity inquiry becomes indistinguishable from the merits of the underlying claim. Whether police used excessive force in a case under Section 1983 has always been seen as a factual inquiry best answered by the fact finder.").

Van Deelen v. City of Eudora, No. 96-4040-SAC, 1997 WL 445821, at *2, *3 (D. Kan. May 8, 1997) (not reported) ("The defendant Diehl offers no authority for his argument that he cannot be compelled to participate in discovery as a witness to the claims against the other defendants. His protection from discovery extends only to the claims which are brought against him and to which he has properly asserted an immunity defense. Diehl does not contest the magistrate judge's finding that his deposition 'is necessary in order to complete discovery against the other defendants.'. . Consequently, the magistrate judge correctly permitted the deposition of Diehl to proceed as to the claims against the other defendants. The magistrate judge also allowed the deposition to 'include the claims against Diehl since these claims may be factually intertwined with the other claims.' The defendant Diehl does not contest the possibility of a factual relationship between the claims against him and the claims against the other defendants. Diehl simply sets up his right to avoid discovery on claims against him until the district court finally resolves his immunity defenses. In Diehl's opinion, any intrusion denies him immunity. In this situation, the district court would agree that the deposition of the party asserting an immunity defense generally should proceed subject to the following conditions. The witness may be asked questions which relate to matters that are relevant to the claims against the other defendants or which are likely to lead to matters that are relevant to the claims against the other defendants. The witness may not be asked questions which do not satisfy either of the above relevance standards and which are related to the claims which the witness has asserted an immunity defense. The magistrate judge here avoided this more involved approach in favor of permitting Diehl's deposition to proceed without a subject-matter limitation but with a time limitation. The magistrate judge balanced the interests of the other parties against the interests of Diehl in avoiding discovery. The magistrate judge found that a deposition limited to two hours was a minor intrusion to Diehl in contrast to the other parties' interests in moving the litigation forward on the other claims.The district court finds that the magistrate judge did not clearly err in allowing Diehl's deposition to proceed on certain conditions.").

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Estate of Todashev by Shibly v. United States, 815 F. App'x 446, ___(11th Cir. 2020) ("Plaintiff has explained, with as much specificity as he can, the informational disparity that renders him unable to adequately respond to the motion. Indeed, Plaintiff has offered what may well be the most recognized reason why a party should be given the shelter of Rule 56(d) from a pre-discovery motion for summary judgment: '[T]he key evidence lies in the control of the moving party.'. . . And this is especially true in a deadly force case, where 'the witness most likely to contradict the officers' story—the person shot dead—is unable to testify.'. . . With regard to the district court's grant of summary judgment to McFarlane, we vacate the judgment as premature. We express no opinion on the district court's substantive ruling based upon the facts presented to it. Nor do we endorse Plaintiff's suggestion that he should be allowed full discovery before the district court reconsiders the qualified immunity issue. We leave the scope of the appropriate discovery to the discretion of the district court on remand.")

R.F.J. v. Fla. Dep't of Children & Families, 743 F. App'x 377, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("Brady and Perry argue that the district court erred by deferring its ruling on their qualified-immunity defenses until after discovery is completed. . . We agree. Qualified immunity is not a last exit before liability. Instead, qualified immunity is a right to be free from litigation altogether once the defense is established. . . . Otherwise, parties could be required to expend significant time, money, and energy only to go 90 miles down the road of a dead-end drive. . . The district court's deferral of its decision violates these principles. And it is not in keeping with our prior precedent in Howe. Like in this case, the district court in Howe delayed ruling on the officers' qualified immunity and directed them to commence discovery. . . We vacated that order and directed the district court to resolve the immunity defense 'before requiring that the parties litigate Howe's claims any further.'. . .Although we understand the district court's decision below, given the flurry of facts from outside the complaint, Brady and Perry are entitled to a ruling sooner rather than later. Consequently, we must vacate the district court's order of November 18, 2016, and remand for the district court to take one of two actions: (1) enter a substantive ruling on Brady's and Perry's pending motion to dismiss or (2) grant Plaintiffs' motion for leave to file a third amended complaint. . . and deny as moot Brady's and Perry's pending motion to dismiss. Should the district court make the latter choice and should Brady and Perry again move to dismiss on qualified-immunity grounds, the district court should resolve those motions before requiring the parties to litigate the claims any further.")

Howe v. City of Enterprise, 861 F.3d 1300, 1302-03 (11th Cir. 2017) ("In the present case, the district court's order not only reserved ruling on the defendants' claims to immunity until after Howe filed a second amended complaint, it also instructed the parties to confer and develop their Rule 26(f) report. Under Rule 26(f), the parties must confer and develop a proposed discovery plan, and '[i]n conferring, the parties must consider the nature and basis of their claims and defenses and the possibilities for promptly settling or resolving the case ....' . . . The part of the order requiring the parties to confer and discuss settlement before the court ruled on the defendants' motion to dismiss on immunity grounds is inconsistent with our decision in Bouchard Transportation. And the part of the order requiring the parties to develop their Rule 26(f) report before the court ruled on the immunity defenses is also inconsistent with Bouchard Transportation and other decisions which establish that immunity is a right not to be subjected to litigation beyond the point at which immunity is asserted. The district court's order of March 31, 2016, is vacated except to the extent that it denies without prejudice the motion to dismiss on immunity grounds and directs Howe to amend his complaint again. After Howe has filed his second amended complaint, the defendants may file another motion to dismiss that includes assertions of immunity from suit. . . If they do so, the district court should decide those immunity issues before requiring that the parties litigate Howe's claims any further.")

S.D. v. St. Johns County School Dist. No., 3:09-cv-250-J-20TEM, 2009 WL 4349878, at 1-4 (M.D. Fla. Nov. 24, 2009) ("In Iqbal, the primary issue resolved by the Supreme Court related to the pleading requirements under Rule 8 and Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, not whether discovery must be stayed pending a motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds. [discussing Iqbal, Siegert, Harlow, Mitchell, Anderson] The Court notes that the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals has used language that discovery should be delayed 'if possible' while dispositive motions are resolved to decrease costs to the litigants and save judicial resources. [discussing Eleventh Circuit cases] In the instant matter, unlike many of the aforementioned cases (if not all), the dispositive motion by the lead defendant, St. Johns County School District, has been resolved against it. Thus, the case will proceed. While the defense of qualified immunity with respect to the Individual Defendants have not yet been resolved, their knowledge of the underlying facts regarding this case would appear relevant to the claim against the School District. . . . Although the Court acknowledges that discovery should likely be stayed in situations where the granting of the motion to dismiss could dispose of the entire action, the facts that pertain to the instant matter are unique in the sense that Plaintiffs' claims against the School District have survived the motion to dismiss stage of the proceedings . . . . Unless the Court stays all discovery, the Individual Defendants will nevertheless be subject to pretrial discovery as fact witnesses. . . . [T]he Court will amend its Order to the extent that any discovery sought from the Individual Defendants shall be limited to factual issues relevant to the suit against the School District. Discovery of facts relevant only to individual liability as to the named Individual Defendants is premature at this juncture; therefore, the Individual Defendants shall not be subject to such discovery. . . unless their motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity grounds is denied.").

Martinez v. McCord, No. 1:06-CV-636-WKW, 2008 WL 2003789, at *6 n.9 (M.D. Ala. May 8, 2008) ("The court is mindful of the broad scope of qualified immunity and frequently faces pre-discovery motions to dismiss in § 1983 cases involving law enforcement actions. As the Eleventh Circuit has acknowledged in dicta, it is important to 'purs[ue] discovery to a reasonable extent so as to permit appropriate factual showings [because] anything less may result in grants of summary judgment solely because of inadequate discovery.'. . With that in mind, however, the court is vested with 'broad discretion to tailor discovery narrowly and to dictate the sequence of discovery,' and expects to hear motions to 'limit the time, place, and manner of discovery, or even bar discovery altogether on certain subjects,' . . . so as to ' Aprotect [ ] the substance of the qualified immunity defense."')

Marshall v. West, 2007 WL 1540231, at *9 (M.D. Ala. May 24, 2007) ("[T]he critical question is whether West and/or Hutson were aware of facts which arguably would have justified a reasonable suspicion of illegal activity. . . Plaintiff essentially has argued that, without the benefit of discovery, it is impossible for him to allege those facts because he does not know what, if any, information Defendants possessed when they initiated the traffic stop. . . . Given the unique circumstances of this case, the court finds that it is appropriate to deny the motion to dismiss because the qualified immunity inquiry turns on facts which are within the knowledge and control of Defendants. . . . No proper purpose would be served by penalizing Plaintiff and dismissing his claim prior to discovery because he failed to plead facts of which he says he is unaware. As recited in the margin, other courts have denied qualified immunity at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage on similar grounds.[collecting cases]").

K.M. v. Alabama Department of Youth Services, 209 F.R.D. 493,495 (M.D. Ala. 2002) ("The defendants [argue] that the claims against all of the defendants are so intertwined that allowing discovery to proceed against one is tantamount to allowing discovery to proceed against them all. According to the defendants, to preserve their immunity, should that immunity be found to exist on appeal, requires the prohibition of all discovery for all defendants during the pendency of the appeal. The court agrees that the discovery stay should generally extend to all discovery in this case, as there is no ascertainable line between that discovery needed in the case of the claims against Ziegler and Aseme and the claims of the other defendants. However, there is also equity in saying that this discovery stay should not result in unfair prejudice to the rights of the plaintiffs and their claims against Ziegler and Aseme, from the loss of records or witnesses occasioned by the delay on appeal by the other defendants. . . Therefore, some leeway is appropriate to give the plaintiffs the assurance that this passage of time will not irrevocably prejudice their claims against the non-appealing defendants. They should be allowed to collect limited information in order to identify potentially critical witnesses and to preserve documents that may well be central to their litigation as to the non-appealing defendants. Because the parties are in the best position to advise the court as to how to achieve this goal with the interest of all taken into consideration, the court will order that the parties confer and submit to the court a joint "preservation" plan that satisfies the goals expressed in this order.").

VI. WHEN IS RIGHT "CLEARLY ESTABLISHED?"

A. What Law Controls?

U.S. SUPREME COURT

Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7-9 (per curiam) (granting certiorari and reversing) ("Even assuming that controlling Circuit precedent clearly establishes law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde did not give fair notice to Rivas-Villegas. He is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]his is not an obvious case. Thus, to show a violation of clearly established law, Cortesluna must identify a case that put Rivas-Villegas on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful. Cortesluna has not done so. Neither Cortesluna nor the Court of Appeals identified any Supreme Court case that addresses facts like the ones at issue here. Instead, the Court of Appeals relied solely on its precedent in LaLonde. Even assuming that Circuit precedent can clearly establish law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde is materially distinguishable and thus does not govern the facts of this case. . . . On the facts of this case, neither LaLonde nor any decision of this Court is sufficiently similar. For that reason, we grant Rivas-Villegas' petition for certiorari and reverse the Ninth Circuit's determination that Rivas-Villegas is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

City of Escondido, Cal. v. Emmons, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503-04 (2019) (per curiam) ("Under our cases, the clearly established right must be defined with specificity. 'This Court has repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . That is particularly important in excessive force cases . . . . In this case, the Court of Appeals contravened those settled principles. The Court of Appeals should have asked whether clearly established law prohibited the officers from stopping and taking down a man in these circumstances. Instead, the Court of Appeals defined the clearly established right at a high level of generality by saying only that the 'right to be free of excessive force' was clearly established. With the right defined at that high level of generality, the Court of Appeals then denied qualified immunity to the officers and remanded the case for trial. . . Under our precedents, the Court of Appeals' formulation of the clearly established right was far too general. To be sure, the Court of Appeals cited the Gravelet–Blondin case from that Circuit, which described a right to be 'free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance....'. . . Assuming without deciding that a court of appeals decision may constitute clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity, . . . the Ninth Circuit's Gravelet–Blondin case law involved police force against individuals engaged in passive resistance. The Court of Appeals made no effort to explain how that case law prohibited Officer Craig's actions in this case. That is a problem under our precedents. . . .The Court of Appeals failed to properly analyze whether clearly established law barred Officer Craig from stopping and taking down Marty Emmons in this manner as Emmons exited the apartment. Therefore, we remand the case for the Court of Appeals to conduct the analysis required by our precedents with respect to whether Officer Craig is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1153 (2018) ("The Court of Appeals made additional errors in concluding that its own precedent clearly established that Kisela used excessive force. To begin with, 'even if a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established law in these circumstances, it does not do so here.'")

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 591 n.8 (2018) ("We have not yet decided what precedents--other than our own-- qualify as controlling authority for purposes of qualified immunity. See, e.g., Reichle v. Howards, 566 U. S. 658, 665-666 (2012) (reserving the question whether court of appeals decisions can be 'a dispositive source of clearly established law'). We express no view on that question here. Relatedly, our citation to and discussion of various lower court precedents should not be construed as agreeing or disagreeing with them, or endorsing a particular reading of them. See City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U. S. ___, ___, n. 4 (2015) (slip op., at 14, n. 4). Instead, we address only how a reasonable official 'could have interpreted' them. Reichle, supra, at 667.")

Taylor v. Barkes, 135 S. Ct. 2042, 2044-45 (2015) (per curiam) ("No decision of this Court establishes a right to the proper implementation of adequate suicide prevention protocols. No decision of this Court even discusses suicide screening or prevention protocols. And 'to the extent that a "robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority"' in the Courts of Appeals 'could itself clearly establish the federal right respondent alleges,'. . . the weight of that authority at the time of Barkes's death suggested that such a right did not exist. [collecting cases] The Third Circuit nonetheless found this right clearly established by two of its own decisions, both stemming from the same case. Assuming for the sake of argument that a right can be 'clearly established' by circuit precedent despite disagreement in the courts of appeals, neither of the Third Circuit decisions relied upon clearly established the right at issue.")

> See also Weishaar v. County of Napa, No. 14-CV-01352-LB, 2016 WL 7242122, at *11 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 15, 2016) ("Combining all this — the general rules on qualified immunity, the Supreme Court's decision in Taylor, and the Ninth Circuit's in Van Orden — the pivotal question in this case might be phrased thus:

On the 'particular facts' of this case, in this 'specific context,' did Mr. Foster pose a 'serious risk of suicide' so that any 'reasonable,' 'competent' officer would have known that they could not be 'deliberately indifferent' to his plight, and that by failing to do more than they did to protect him from suicide — because what is in question is 'the violative nature of [the defendants'] particular conduct,' Hamby, 821 F.3d at 1091 — they were clearly violating his constitutional rights? Viewing the evidence most favorably to the plaintiff, the court thinks that a jury question exists on this point. A reasonable juror could conclude that Mr. Foster presented a 'serious risk of suicide,' which would have triggered the 'clearly established right' that the Ninth Circuit recognized in Van Orden. On the one hand, when asked directly, Mr. Foster repeatedly denied being suicidal. . . On the other, one of Mr. Foster's intake forms related that, after being arrested, he told the transporting officers that 'he wished he would die.'. . Prison officials also knew that he had a history of psychiatric illness, for which he was then on medication, and that he had previously attempted suicide. . . The court cannot summarily hold Commander Wilson immune on these facts. The question must be put to the fact-finder. The court thus declines to grant summary judgment to Commander Wilson on the ground that she is qualifiedly immune from suit. The court recognizes that this holding reflects a tension in the law. On the one hand, in Taylor the Supreme Court has said that, at the time of Mr. Foster's death in November 2012, through to June 1, 2015 (when Taylor was released), nothing in its precedent established a clear constitutional right to suicide-screening or -prevention protocols. Taylor, 135 S. Ct. at 2044 45. On the other hand, in a decision that followed Taylor by about a month, the Ninth Circuit held that, since 'at least' 2005, there has been a clearly established constitutional right that protects inmates from deliberate indifference when they present a serious risk of suicide. Van Orden, 609 F. App'x at 475. This would suggest that if inmates exhibit a serious suicide risk, then they have a constitutional right guaranteeing that corrections officers attend to their needs. As precedent stands, reading both Taylor and Van Orden, this court holds that a reasonable jury could find that Mr. Foster presented a 'serious risk of suicide' that triggered his 'clearly established right' to something more than 'deliberate indifference.'")

City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Calif. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1776 (2015) ("[E]ven if 'a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established federal law in these circumstances,' Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350, 190 L.Ed.2d 311 (2014) (per curiam), it does not do so here.")

Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350 (2014) ("Here the Third Circuit cited only a single case to support its decision that Carroll was not entitled to qualified immunity—Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 318 F.3d 497 (C.A.3 2003). Assuming for the sake of argument that a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established federal law in these circumstances, see Reichle v.

Howards, 566 U.S. ——, ——, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2094, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012), Marasco does not clearly establish that Carroll violated the Carmans' Fourth Amendment rights.")

Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012) ("Assuming arguendo that controlling Court of Appeals' authority could be a dispositive source of clearly established law in the circumstances of this case, the Tenth Circuit's cases do not satisfy the 'clearly established' standard here.")

Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 615, 616 (1999) (The Court concluded general Fourth Amendment principles did not apply with obvious clarity to the officers' conduct in this case. Furthermore, A[p]etitioners [had] not brought to [the Court's] attention any cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which they [sought] to rely, nor [had] they identified a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.").

United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 269 (1997) [Note: case involved criminal prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 242] ("[I]n applying the rule of qualified immunity under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and Bivens . . . we have referred to decisions of the Courts of Appeals when enquiring whether a right was 'clearly established.'. . . Although the Sixth Circuit was concerned, and rightly so, that disparate decisions in various Circuits might leave the law insufficiently certain even on a point widely considered, such a circumstance may be taken into account in deciding whether the warning is fair enough, without any need for a categorical rule that decisions of the Courts of Appeals and other courts are inadequate as a matter of law to provide it.").

Elder v. Holloway, 114 S. Ct. 1019, 1023 (1994) ("Whether an asserted federal right was clearly established at a particular time, so that a public official who allegedly violated the right has no qualified immunity from suit, presents a question of law, not one of 'legal facts.' [cites omitted] That question of law, like the generality of such questions, must be resolved de novo on appeal. [cite omitted] A court engaging in review of a qualified immunity judgment should therefore use its 'full knowledge of its own [and other relevant] precedents.'").

D.C. CIRCUIT

Bame v. Dillard, 637 F.3d 380, 384, 386 (D.C. Cir. 2011) ("In this case the principle of constitutional avoidance counsels that we turn directly to the second question. As the Court recognized in Pearson itself, 'There are cases in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.'. . This is such a case. Therefore the first and, as it happens, only question we address is whether it was clearly established in September 2002 that strip searching an arrestee before placing him in a detention facility without individualized, reasonable suspicion was unconstitutional. To answer this question, 'we look to cases from the Supreme Court and this court, as well as to cases from other courts exhibiting a consensus view,' Johnson v. District of Columbia, 528 F.3d 969, 976 (D.C.Cir.2008)–if there is one. . . . We conclude the law in 2002 did not clearly establish that strip searching all male arrestees prior to placement in holding cells at the Superior Court violated the Fourth Amendment. The governing precedent was then, as it is now, Bell v. Wolfish, and nothing in Bell requires individualized, reasonable suspicion before strip searching a person entering a detention facility. . . . We are aware of no Supreme Court case . . . that suggests a reasonable officer could not have believed his actions were lawful despite a consensus among the courts of appeals when a precedent of the Supreme Court supports the lawfulness of his conduct. A different reading of Bell by the several circuits to have considered the issue before 2002 could not 'clearly establish' the unconstitutionality of strip searches in this context. That Powell and Bull came down after 2002 is of no moment; those opinions simply accord with our own understanding that Bell did not establish the unconstitutionality of a strip search under conditions like those present here. . . . Because there was in 2002 no clearly established constitutional prohibition of strip searching arrestees without individualized, reasonable suspicion, we need not consider whether Dillard had individual suspicion as to each of the plaintiffs.")

Dormu v. District of Columbia, Civil Action 08-00309(HHK), 2011 WL 2632330, at *8 (D.D.C. June 7, 2011) ("This case presents the question of whether, at the time of Dormu's arrest, an individual had a clearly established right to be free from a police officer's injury-inducing application of handcuffs after the individual complained that the cuffs were too tight. Neither the D.C. Circuit nor the Supreme Court have specifically addressed this question. The consensus among other courts, however, is overwhelming. Almost every Court of Appeals has held that overly tight handcuffing can constitute excessive force, where the handcuffing has resulted in injury or where an individual complains about the overly-tight cuffing. [collecting cases] Thus, it was clearly established at the time of Dormu's arrest that he had the right to be free from injury-inflicting handcuffing where Dormu complained about the tightness of the cuffs.")

Afifi v. Lynch, 101 F.Supp.3d 90, (D.D.C. 2015) ("The Court finds that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on both of the plaintiff's Bivens claims because, as discussed more fully below, neither the Fourth Amendment nor First Amendment rights he seeks to vindicate in this suit were clearly established at the time and in the place where the challenge conduct occurred. . . . The plaintiff argues that at the time the individual defendants employed the GPS device, such warrantless use was deemed unconstitutional by this Circuit in United States v. Maynard, 615 F.3d 544, 555–56 (D.C.Cir.2010) . . . . The plaintiff also notes that for purposes of the qualified immunity analysis, a court ordinarily looks to 'cases of controlling authority in [its] jurisdiction.'. . As a result, the plaintiff argues that the individual defendants' warrantless use of a GPS device was squarely in violation of binding Circuit precedent and therefore violated clearly established law. This argument ignores two salient features of the present dispute. First, the Circuits were split regarding the constitutionality of the warrantless use of a GPS device at the time of the conduct at issue. . . Second, the warrantless use of a GPS device was lawful under Ninth Circuit precedent at the time of its use in the present case. In other words, the individual defendants' warrantless use of the GPS device was valid in California, the jurisdiction in which the individual defendants used the GPS device. . . Thus, not only were the Circuits split at the time of the individual defendants' conduct, but the conduct was lawful in the jurisdiction in which it occurred. Both factors favor the grant of qualified immunity to the individual defendants. . . . To avoid the implication of the Circuit split, the plaintiff seizes upon Youngbey v. March for the proposition that '"[i]n determining whether the legal rules at issue are clearly established,"' a court must look only to cases of controlling authority in its own jurisdiction. . . Yet, Youngbey did not address the issue of qualified immunity where the defendants acted in a jurisdiction different from the forum of the lawsuit. In such situations, '[w]hen faced with inconsistent legal rules in different jurisdictions, national officeholders should be given some deference for qualified immunity purposes, at least if they implement policies consistent with the governing law of the jurisdiction where the action is taken.'. . Indeed, the Supreme Court has described the refusal to grant qualified immunity as 'especially troubling' where a defendant's actions 'were lawful according to courts in the jurisdiction where he acted.'. . A contrary rule would permit plaintiffs to forum shop and might otherwise deter 'national officeholders ... from full use of their legal authority.'. . Such deterrence warrants 'caution by the Judicial Branch' in refusing to grant qualified immunity, 'particularly in the area of national security.'. . Applying these principals to the present case, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as their actions, in following the binding precedent of the relevant jurisdiction, were not 'plainly incompetent' and did not violate clearly established law. . . .The plaintiff has failed to cite a single case from any Circuit holding that the warrantless use of a GPS device violates an individual's First Amendment rights. To be sure, the qualified immunity analysis does not require a 'case directly on point,' Al–Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083, but a court must take caution in properly defining the scope of the right violated . . . . In this regard, the plaintiff's silence is telling as 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. .The plaintiff's inability to cite a single case in support of his contention that the warrantless use of a GPS device violated his First Amendment rights dooms his claim. . .The Court need not decide whether the individual defendants' warrantless use of a GPS device violated the plaintiff's First Amendment rights because the law regarding the issue was not clearly established at the time of the conduct. . . As a result, qualified immunity shields the individual defendants from the plaintiff's First Amendment Bivens claim.")

FIRST CIRCUIT

Irish v. Fowler (Irish II), 979 F.3d 65, 76-80 (1st Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 74 (2021) ("A rule is clearly established either when it is 'dictated by "controlling authority" or "a robust 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'". . A 'robust consensus' does not require the express agreement of every circuit. Rather, sister circuit law is sufficient to clearly establish a proposition of law when it would provide notice to every reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful. . . '[T]he salient question ... is whether the state of the law [at the time of the defendants' conduct] gave [them] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [the plaintiffs] was unconstitutional.' [citing cases, including Hope v. Pelzer and Taylor v. Riojas] The Supreme Court has established that cases involving materially similar facts are not necessary to a finding that the law was clearly established. . . The circuits have followed that rule. . . A defendant's adherence to proper police procedure bears on all prongs of the qualified immunity analysis. . . When an officer violates the

Constitution, state law, of course, provides no refuge. A lack of compliance with state law or procedure does not, in and of itself, establish a constitutional violation, but when an officer disregards police procedure, it bolsters the plaintiff's argument both that an officer's conduct 'shocks the conscience' and that 'a reasonable officer in [the officer's] circumstances would have believed that his conduct violated the Constitution.'. . The defendants' main argument is that because this circuit to date has not recognized the state-created danger doctrine, the law was not clearly established. That is simply incorrect. The Supreme Court has stated that clearly established law can be dictated by controlling authority or a robust consensus of persuasive authority. . . The widespread acceptance of the state-created danger theory, described above, was sufficient to clearly establish that a state official may incur a duty to protect a plaintiff where the official creates or exacerbates a danger to the plaintiff. The defendants' reliance on Soto v. Flores, 103 F.3d 1056 (1st Cir. 1997), is also misplaced. In Soto, this court concluded that the state-created danger doctrine was not clearly established. . . The broad acceptance of the doctrine 'militate[d] in favor of finding that there [was] clearly established law in this area,' but two circumstances prevented the court from holding that the law was clearly established. . . First, the court noted that at the time of the defendants' conduct in Soto, the First Circuit had never 'discuss[ed] the contours of [the state-created danger] doctrine.'. . Second, the court relied on the fact that while the Third Circuit had then recently 'comprehensively described' the state-created danger theory, the history of the doctrine was 'uneven,' and that only 'more recent judicial opinions ... ha[d] begun to clarify the contours' of the doctrine. . . All of this had changed by the time Detective Perkins left the voicemail for Anthony Lord. By July 2015, this court had discussed the state-created danger doctrine at least a dozen times, even if it had never found it applicable to the facts of a specific case. And our sister circuits' law developed as well in the decades since Soto. The officers argue that because the Fifth and Eleventh Circuits have rejected the state-created danger doctrine, . . .the doctrine cannot be clearly established. Again, as a proposition of law this is wrong. A circuit split does not foreclose a holding that the law was clearly established, as long as the defendants could not reasonably believe that we would follow the minority approach. . . After Rivera, the defendants could not reasonably have believed that we would flatly refuse to apply the state-created danger doctrine to an appropriate set of facts. Rivera was a critical warning bell that officers could be held liable under the state-created danger doctrine when their affirmative acts enhanced a danger to a witness. This court did not simply dismiss Rivera's claim without analysis, as would have been appropriate if the state-created danger doctrine could never apply to any set of facts in this circuit. Instead, Rivera outlined the elements of the state-created danger doctrine and performed a nuanced analysis of why each particular action of the defendants was not the type of affirmative act covered by the doctrine. . . Rivera warned that if an officer performed a non-essential affirmative act which enhanced a danger, a sufficient causal connection existed between that act and the plaintiff's harm, and the officer's actions shocked the conscience, the officer could be held liable for placing a witness or victim in harm's way during an investigation. Defendants also argue that they are immune from suit because no factually similar cases alerted them that their conduct was impermissible. This too is incorrect. As we have just said, a general proposition of law may clearly establish the violative nature of a defendant's actions, especially when the violation is egregious. . . Not only is the argument wrong, but its premise is wrong; there are factually similar earlier cases. Both were decided after Soto. . . . The plaintiffs allege that the defendants, even in the face of Irish's expressed fear that Lord would react violently, contacted him in a manner that a reasonable jury could find notified him that Irish had reported him to the police. The plaintiffs also allege that the defendants failed to convey her request for protection to their superiors for several hours and further failed to inform her in a timely fashion that the request had been denied. A jury could also conclude that the defendants played a role in the decision to withdraw all resources from the area without telling the plaintiffs that they had done so, thereby allowing the plaintiffs to believe more protection was available than was actually true. Finally, the defendants' apparent utter disregard for police procedure could contribute to a jury's conclusion that the defendants conducted themselves in a manner that was deliberately indifferent to the danger they knowingly created, and that they thereby acted with the requisite mental state to fall within the ambit of the many cases holding that a violation of the Due Process Clause requires behavior that 'shocks the conscience.'. . Whether the jury will or should conclude as much is, of course, not a question for this court, but it was clearly established in July 2015 that such conduct on the part of law enforcement officers, if it occurred, could give rise to a lawsuit under § 1983.")

Alfano v. Lynch, 847 F.3d 71, 76, 79 (1st Cir. 2017) ("In applying the test for clearly established law, the focus must be on federal precedents. . . Courts may consider state precedents, though, to the extent that they analyze the relevant federal issue. . . . Federal courts of appeals typically look only to precedents from the United States Supreme Court, federal appellate courts, and the highest court of the state in which a case arises to gauge whether a particular right is clearly established. . . . To say more about the clearly established nature of the law would be to paint the lily. We hold that, in July of 2014, controlling and persuasive authority combined to give a reasonable officer fair and clear warning that the Fourth Amendment required probable cause to take an individual into protective custody, handcuff him, transport him to a police station miles away, and confine him in a jail cell")

McCue v. City of Bangor, 838 F.3d 55, 61-65 (1st Cir. 2016) ("After reviewing de novo all of the magistrate judge's determinations, the district court adopted the Recommended Decision in full. This appeal followed. The only issue before us is the pretrial denial of qualified immunity as to the plaintiff's allegation that the officers used excessive force after McCue had ceased resisting, as well as the corresponding denial of immunity under the MTCA for the state law assault claim. . . . Johnson and its progeny foreclose assertion of appellate jurisdiction over the defendants' interlocutory appeal. The magistrate judge's opinion, fully affirmed by the district court, denied summary judgment precisely '[b]ecause the record includes factual disputes regarding Plaintiff's claim that Defendants used excessive force after Mr. McCue allegedly ceased resisting.'. . In particular, the record contains facts that, when viewed most favorably to the plaintiff, could support a finding that McCue stopped resisting at some point during his encounter with the officers, and that the officers should have realized that he had stopped resisting, but that the officers 'continued to exert significant force ... no longer necessary to subdue Mr. McCue or to reduce the threat that he posed to himself or others.'. . And they continued to use such force after McCue told them that they were hurting his neck. In light of these remaining factual issues, we cannot assume jurisdiction over the defendants' interlocutory appeal. Maintaining that they do not dispute the facts for the purposes of their appeal, the defendants argue that we have appellate jurisdiction notwithstanding the district court's identification of material factual disputes. They repeatedly assert that they construe the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and that even so construed, 'the videotape evidence conclusively establishes that there is at most a timeframe of 66 seconds for which the trial court could have concluded that Mr. McCue may have stopped resisting arrest and the Defendants may have continued to apply force.' They further argue that 'this momentary continuance of force' for up to 66 seconds did not violate McCue's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure. Plaintiff disagrees and says that the record supports a finding that 4 minutes and 25 seconds is the true period involved. As a matter of law, our circuit has assumed interlocutory appellate jurisdiction where the defendant 'accepted as true all facts and inferences proffered by plaintiffs, and [where] defendants argue[d] that even on plaintiffs' best case, they [we]re entitled to immunity.' Mlodzinski, 648 F.3d at 28. Even 'a defendant who concedes arguendo the facts found to be disputed is not barred by Johnson from taking an interlocutory appeal on a legal claim that the defendant is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on facts not controverted.' . . But this avenue is not available to the defendants here because, contrary to their protests, they have not in fact accepted the version of the facts most favorable to the plaintiff. In at least four different places in their brief, the defendants stress that, construing the Car 22 video in the most plaintiff-favorable light, there was at most 66 seconds in which they might have continued to apply force after McCue had stopped resisting. The defendants appear to have arrived at this number by misconstruing a statement of fact by the magistrate judge. Explaining why Blanchard punched McCue's lower back, buttocks, or thigh region after the officers had secured both his wrists and ankles, the magistrate judge observed that Blanchard might have done so because McCue 'squeezed' Blanchard's injured hand 'extremely hard' or, alternatively, in order to 'facilitate bringing together Mr. McCue's ankles and wrists to complete the five-point restraint.'. . The defendants inaccurately characterize this observation, asserting that the magistrate judge found that Blanchard could have punched McCue because 'McCue was resisting the Defendants' efforts to put him in a five-point restraint.' Pinpointing this moment when Blanchard punched McCue as the last moment in which the magistrate judge found that McCue had resisted, the defendants count 66 seconds from that point to the point when McCue is lifted off the ground. This insistence on 66 seconds both mischaracterizes the magistrate judge's statements about the facts and fails to present those facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. First, neither reason that the magistrate judge cited to account for Blanchard's punch (to prevent McCue from squeezing his hand or to facilitate the five-point restraint) necessarily equates to resistance by McCue. At this point, McCue's wrists and ankles had already been cuffed, thus minimizing his range of movements and the danger that he posed to his own and others' safety. Simply put, there is no indication in the Recommended Decision that the hand squeeze should be construed as continued resistance, much less resistance justifying the force used. The defendants' inference as such, of course, also demonstrates their failure to accept the version of facts most favorable to the plaintiff. Second, our independent assessment of the Car 22 video, construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, discredits the defendants' 66-seconds theory. . .The video, from 2:18 to 2:22, captures McCue resisting detainment by kicking his legs, thrashing his torso, and shouting an expletive at the officers. In contrast, from 2:22 until the officers lift him off the ground at 7:08, McCue periodically growls and makes other noises but does not kick or thrash his body again. He also complains that the officers are hurting his neck, but we cannot ascertain from the video if the officers adjusted their positions in response. Viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, McCue's noises and slight movements after the 2:22 mark -- and even his squeezing of Blanchard's hand – 'may not constitute resistance at all, but rather a futile attempt to breathe while suffering from physiological distress.'. . In short, McCue's movements after 2:22 of the Car 22 video are not dispositive of whether he continued resisting. And from this perspective, there could be close to five minutes -- not 66 seconds -- during which the officers continued to exert force on a nonresisting McCue. Because the defendants have not, in fact, accepted the plaintiff's best version of the facts, we hold that there remains a genuine dispute of fact that precludes appellate jurisdiction over the denial of summary judgment. Finally, this factual dispute is material to the question on the merits. Depending on the amount of time for which the officers exerted force on McCue after he had ceased resisting, a jury could find that the officers' actions were unconstitutional under law that was clearly established in September 2012, the month of McCue's fatal encounter with the officers. The defendants argue that they should win because there was no clearly established law on this point. They are wrong. We 'adhere[ ] to a two-step approach to determine whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.' Stamps v. Town of Framingham, 813 F.3d 27, 34 (1st Cir. 2016). First, we ask whether the facts as alleged by the plaintiff make out a violation of a constitutional right. If so, we next ask whether that right was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation. . . In determining whether the law was clearly established, we 'ask "whether the legal contours of the right in question were sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would have understood that what he was doing violated the right," and then consider "whether in the particular factual context of the case, a reasonable officer would have understood that his conduct violated the right."'. . Here, we focus on the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis. This circuit has recognized that a 'First Circuit case presenting the same set of facts' is not necessary to hold that defendants 'had fair warning that given the circumstances, the force they are alleged to have used was constitutionally excessive.'. . We have also looked to the case law of sister circuits in determining whether a right was clearly established. . . Even without particular Supreme Court and First Circuit cases directly on point, it was clearly established in September 2012 that exerting significant, continued force on a person's back 'while that [person] is in a face-down prone position after being subdued and/or incapacitated constitutes excessive force.' Weigel v. Broad, 544 F.3d 1143, 1155 (10th Cir. 2008) (quoting Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893, 903 (6th Cir. 2004)). At least four circuits had announced this constitutional rule before the events in question here. . . .[A]s the abundant case law demonstrates, a jury could find that a reasonable officer would know or should have known about the dangers of exerting significant pressure on the back of a prone person, regardless of any lack of formal training. In sum, the disputed factual issue -- when McCue ceased resisting and for how long after that moment the officers continued to apply force on his back -- is material to the question of whether qualified immunity is proper.")

Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 270, 271 (1st Cir. 2009) ("An individual's interest in his pet cat or dog does fall within the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable seizures, though we have not addressed the question before. . . . We reject the Mayor's argument that this law was not clearly established because this court had not earlier addressed the questions of effects and seizure. Against the widespread acceptance of these points in the federal circuit courts, the Mayor's argument fails. These are principles of law, and the law was sufficiently recognized by courts to be clearly established. . . . We cannot say on the basis of the pleadings alone that an objective official in the Mayor's position, as a matter of law, would have reasonably concluded his actions in implementing and executing the pet policy were not a violation of the Fourth Amendment. The district court was correct to deny the Mayor qualified immunity on the Fourth Amendment claims based on the pleadings.")

Starlight Sugar, Inc. v. Soto, 253 F.3d 137, 143-45 (1st Cir. 2001) ("When determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, state, as well as federal, decisions can be considered. . . . In turning to both the state and federal case law in this instance, we find a potential conflict. In Trailer Marine, as noted, we held that the dormant Commerce Clause applies to Puerto Rico; the Puerto Rico Supreme Court took a different view in the R.C.A. case. . . . We conclude that the applicability of the dormant Commerce Clause to Puerto Rico is disputed, and, thus, appellees' attendant constitutional right is not clearly established. Our holding is consistent with and respects the role of state systems in identifying and defining federal constitutional rights on a parallel basis with the federal courts with ultimate supervisory authority to harmonize any potential conflicts residing in the United States Supreme Court.").

Hatch v. Dep't for Children, Youth and Their Families, 274 F.3d 12, (1st Cir. 2001) ("To determine the contours of a particular right at a given point in time, an inquiring court must look not only to Supreme Court precedent but to all available case law.").

Brady v. Dill, 187 F.3d 104, 115 (1st Cir. 1999) ("The Supreme Court recently held that an asserted right was not clearly established where the plaintiffs were unable to cite 'any cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which they [sought] to rely,' and equally failed to 'identif[y] a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.' [citing Wilson] The Wilson Court's reasoning is perfectly tailored to the circumstances here. Thompson, which represents the governing law of this circuit, plainly did not render the troopers' actions unlawful, and the tenuous status of Gay falls far short of the 'persuasive authority' that Wilson envisions.").

Lynch v. City of Boston, 180 F.3d 1, 13, 14 (1st Cir. 1999) ("We assume, without deciding, that the opportunity to serve as a volunteer could constitute the type of valuable governmental benefit or privilege the deprivation of which can trigger First Amendment scrutiny. . . .However, neither the Supreme Court nor this court has ever held that the rule forbidding denial of valuable governmental benefits in reprisal for protected speech announced in Perry v. Sindermann and its progeny extends to the denial of non-compensated positions on voluntary boards. Scant authority in support of such an extension of the doctrine currently exists. Lynch relies primarily upon a Ninth Circuit decision in which the court, applying its own precedents, held that volunteer status is a valuable governmental privilege that cannot be denied on the basis of protected speech. See Holland v. Wonder, 972 F.2d 1129, 1135 (9th Cir.1992). . .A single decision from another court of appeals applying its own precedents is plainly insufficient to meet the requirement 'that in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent' to a reasonable government official.").

El Dia, Inc. v. Rossello, 165 F.3d 106, 110 n.3 (1st Cir. 1999) ("[W]e are not inclined to adopt either a hard-and-fast rule that precedent from another circuit is always determinative of whether a law is clearly established . . . or a rule that such precedent is always irrelevant . . . . Among other factors, the location and level of the precedent, its date, its persuasive force, and its level of factual similarity to the facts before this Court may all be pertinent to whether a particular precedent 'clearly establishes' law for the purposes of a qualified immunity analysis." citing Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1049 (8th Cir.1989).).

Karmue v. Remington, No. 17-CV-107-LM-AKJ, 2020 WL 1290605, at *9-10 (D.R.I. Mar. 18, 2020) ("The critical question for the qualified immunity analysis in Mr. Karmue's case, with respect to the deliberate indifference claim this court identified as Claim 1, is whether it was clearly established in April 2015 within the First Circuit that it would violate the Constitution to subject an inmate to a significant risk of serious harm to fail to fasten the seatbelt of a handcuffed and shackled inmate in a transport van. There is neither First Circuit nor Supreme Court precedent on that issue. During the relevant time period, even as to inmates who are shackled and handcuffed, courts have concluded that, without more, the failure to provide seatbelts in transport vans did not violate any federal constitutional right. . . . The specific circumstances that attended Mr. Karmue's transport, however, as alleged in the Second Amended Complaint include operative facts that this court described, but did not reiterate when it summarized Claim 1, namely, that the defendant transport officer drove recklessly and that Mr. Karmue's request to be seatbelted was denied. . . Those allegations, if ultimately shown to be true, would affect the result of the qualified immunity analysis. None of the appellate court cases cited by defendants concern reckless driving and circumstances where the inmate asked to be seatbelted. . . . There is a consensus of persuasively reasoned federal appellate court cases that have addressed the question which have held that qualified immunity is not available with respect to the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claims of handcuffed and shackled inmates who have been transported unseatbelted in a van driven recklessly. [collecting cases] . . . . Under the circumstances alleged by Mr. Karmue's verified second amended complaint regarding the officers' reckless driving and refusal to seatbelt Mr. Karmue, with knowledge that he could not brace himself in the event of a sudden stop, defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the case. The court thus denies the pre-discovery motion for summary judgment based on the affirmative defense of qualified immunity as to Claim 1.")

Masonoff v. Dubois, No. CIV.A.94-10133-RCL, 2004 WL 2137369, at *8 (D. Mass. Sept. 17, 2004) ("Here, the plaintiffs seek redress for the defendants' failure to maintain reasonably adequate, non-toxic, and sanitary means to dispose of human waste. The right to 'adequate and hygienic means to dispose of [a prisoner's] bodily wastes' was clearly established at the time of the violation, which began. . . in 1991. . . Although I can find no First Circuit authority holding unlawful the precise conduct at issue in this case, the First Circuit long ago held that 'the prison administration must see to it that unsanitary conditions do not continue unabated [just] because the conditions were first caused by the inmates themselves.'. . Furthermore, a chorus of courts in other jurisdictions had held by 1991 that prisons must provide reasonably sanitary facilities, especially when the inmates are confined for long periods of time. . . . By 1983, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts had held that when prisoners must 'eat and sleep next to buckets into which they must urinate and defecate,' the prison conditions, including the procedure for emptying the buckets, constituted cruel and unusual punishment. . . The Supreme Court of the United States had also made it clear that the conditions of confinement may not deprive inmates of 'the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities.' . . Consequently, I think it too plain to be reasonably questioned that, by 1991 it was clearly established that reasonably adequate 'sanitation is one of the basic human needs guaranteed by the [E]ighth [A]mendment.'").

Rodriguez Esteras v. Solivan Diaz, 266 F. Supp.2d 270, 282 (D.P.R. 2003) ("In light of the near unanimity among the Circuits and the factual support found in the persuasive authority, we believe that a reasonably prudent state actor would have realized that failing to divulge exculpatory evidence at the arraignment and other preliminary hearings, thereby causing the detention of a criminal defendant, would violate the Fourth Amendment. Since the parameters of the right to be free from malicious prosecution were sufficiently clear at the time of the alleged incident, Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Soto v. Bzdel, 223 F.Supp.2d 332, 333 (D. Mass. 2002) ("This court does not believe that the Hope elaboration, recently echoed by the First Circuit in Suboh v. District Attorney's Office of the Suffolk District, 298 F.3d 81, 92-94 (1st Cir.2002), so fundamentally changes the qualified immunity analysis as to necessitate a different result here. First, unlike the situation in Hope, the facts alleged by Plaintiff do not form the basis of an 'apparent' constitutional violation. Second, the court neither now nor at the time it issued its summary judgment decision believes that the 'state of the law' in October of 1999 gave Defendants 'fair warning' that their alleged treatment of Plaintiff 'was unconstitutional.' In reaching this conclusion, the court did not rigidly confine itself, as Plaintiff contends, to either 'published precedent on all fours' or even to cases with 'materially similar' facts. . . In addition to addressing cases having facts similar to the case at bar, the court, as indicated, considered whether there was 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.' . . The court also examined case law which was indirectly on point and still found scant support for Plaintiff's position. . . Finally, the court specifically addressed the affidavit of the clerk- magistrate of the Northampton District Court, urged upon the court again, and found it wanting. . . The court determined that the affidavit, while informative as to the system concerning recalled warrants, insufficiently demonstrated that any constitutional right was clearly established in October of 1999. . . Unfortunately for him, Plaintiff's preference that the 'state of the law' be statutory, not constitutional, cannot win the day.").

Rodriguez v. Penobscot County Jail, No. 00-253-B-S, 2001 WL 376453, at 3-5 (D. Me. Apr. 11, 2001) (not published) ("The First Circuit has yet to address whether the Sandin analysis applies to pre-trial detainees. The Ninth and the Seventh Circuits have concluded that Sandin does not apply to disciplinary procedures of pre-trial detainees when disciplinary segregation is the imposed punishment. In those cases the liberty interest in not being punished without the full procedural protections requires adherence to rigorous procedures. [citing cases] Other circuits, albeit in unpublished opinions, have determined that the Sandin analysis is appropriate to apply to pretrial detainee complaints concerning disciplinary sanctions. [citing cases] While such cases have questionable value as precedent on the underlying issue of whether or not Sandin should be applied to pretrial detainees, they do form the basis for determining the first element of the defendants' asserted claim of qualified immunity. The law in this regard is not clearly established. . . . Given the lack of 'clearly established' post-Sandin case-law regarding the procedural due process issues raised by Rodriguez and the clear First Circuit precedent which authorizes reasonable disciplinary sanctions against pre-trial detainees, Defendants in this case are entitled to qualified immunity as to any civil damage claim").

Jones v. Treubig, 963 F.3d 214, 236-37 & n.13 (2d Cir. 2020) ("It was clearly established at the time of the incident here that, under the Fourth Amendment, the reasonableness of the amount of force used is assessed 'at the moment' the force is used. . . Thus, any reasonable officer would have understood in April 2015 that, if he or she has an opportunity to re-assess a situation after firing a taser, any additional force (such as re-cycling the taser) must be justified under the Fourth Amendment based upon the totality of the circumstances that existed at the time of the re-assessment. This fundamental Fourth Amendment rule of law was not only clear at the time of Lt. Treubig's conduct from Supreme Court cases and this Court's decisions, but also was reinforced by a compelling consensus of cases in our sister circuits, including cases where courts held that additional tasing(s) in a rapidly evolving situation could violate the Fourth Amendment if the prior tasing(s) of the suspect would have been sufficient in light of the circumstances. [collecting cases] . . . .Although Lt. Treubig objects to reliance on cases outside this Circuit for purposes of the qualified immunity, we have previously held that '[e]ven if this or other circuit courts have not explicitly held a law or course of conduct to be unconstitutional, the unconstitutionality of that law or course of conduct will nonetheless be treated as clearly established if decisions by this or other courts "clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue."'. . Therefore, we are permitted to consider this consensus of authority outside the Circuit although, as noted above, we conclude that the right was clearly established by Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent independent of this consensus of other circuits.")

Sanchez v. Bonacchi, 799 F. App'x 60, __ (2d Cir. 2020) ("In denying qualified immunity, the District Court held in part that, 'because Defendant essentially testified that he knew [conducting a manual cavity search] violated Plaintiff's rights, Defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity.'. . By relying on Bonacchi's subjective intent or belief as to the state of the law to determine whether he was entitled to qualified immunity, the District Court erred. . .We nonetheless affirm the District Court's denial of judgment as a matter of law because this Court's binding opinion in Sloley v. VanBramer, 945 F.3d 30 (2d Cir. 2019), compels that result. Under Sloley, as of 2013, when the search at issue in this case occurred, it was clearly established that a 'visual body cavity search conducted as an incident to a lawful arrest for any offense must be supported by a specific, articulable factual basis supporting a reasonable suspicion to believe the arrestee secreted evidence inside a body cavity.'. . A manual body cavity search, which is more intrusive than a visual search, must at minimum be supported by the same reasonable suspicion as a visual cavity search.")

Sloley v. VanBramer, 945 F.3d 30, 33-34, 37-43 (2d Cir. 2019) ("We vacate in part and hold that visual body cavity searches must be justified by specific, articulable facts supporting reasonable suspicion that an arrestee is secreting contraband inside the body cavity to be searched. Moreover, because this requirement was established by sufficiently persuasive authority, it was 'clearly established' for purposes of a qualified immunity defense by New York state police officers at the time Eric searched Sloley. . . .[W]e have held that the Fourth Amendment 'requires an individualized "reasonable suspicion that a misdemeanor arrestee is concealing weapons or other contraband based on the crime charged, the particular characteristics of the arrestee, and/or the circumstances of the arrest" before she may be lawfully subjected to a strip search.'. . The VanBramers are correct that neither we nor the Supreme Court have ever squarely held that a similar reasonable suspicion requirement applies to visual body cavity searches of persons arrested for felony offenses. Balancing the degree to which visual body cavity searches 'intrude[ ] upon an individual's privacy' against 'the degree to which [they are] needed for the promotion of legitimate governmental interests,'. . . we now hold that such searches do require reasonable suspicion. In other words, a visual body cavity search conducted as an incident to a lawful arrest for any offense must be supported by 'a specific, articulable factual basis supporting a reasonable suspicion to believe the arrestee secreted evidence inside a body cavity.'. . .To be sure, the type of crime for which someone is arrested may play some role in the analysis of whether a visual body cavity search incident to that arrest is supported by reasonable suspicion. But that role has nothing to do with a categorical distinction between felonies and misdemeanors. Rather, the question is whether the criminal conduct for which a person was arrested speaks to the likelihood that he or she secreted contraband inside a body cavity. . . . In short, we have previously held that strip searches conducted incident to a misdemeanor arrest must be supported by reasonable suspicion. . . . We clarify today that that rule applies equally to visual body cavity searches incident to all arrests and hold that such searches must be based on reasonable suspicion to believe that the arrestee is secreting evidence inside the body cavity to be searched. . . . At the time of the search at issue here, this Court had not yet held that visual body cavity searches incident to a felony arrest must be supported by reasonable suspicion. Nevertheless, we have little trouble concluding that that requirement would have been sufficiently clear to a reasonable New York state police officer in the VanBramers' position. . . . We have, at times, suggested that the proper inquiry is whether 'the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit [has] affirmed the rule.'. . However, that is not the only way in which a right may be 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes. In addition to being 'dictated by controlling authority,' a right may be 'clearly established' if it is supported by 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'. . The rule must be more than merely 'suggested by then-existing precedent.'. . Rather, the 'decisions by this or other courts' must 'clearly foreshow a particular ruling.'. . . Here, every reasonable officer in the VanBramers' position as New York State Troopers would have known that visual body cavity searches conducted incident to any arrest must additionally be supported by 'a specific, articulable factual basis supporting a reasonable suspicion to believe the arrestee secreted evidence inside a body cavity' and must be conducted in a reasonable manner. . . This Court has been previously unpersuaded that existing Supreme Court precedent, Second Circuit precedent, and the above-cited body of district court decisions are sufficient to have made it 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes that visual body cavity searches incident to felony arrests require reasonable suspicion. . . What tips the balance in this case, however, is the decision of the New York Court of Appeals, five years before the search at issue in this case took place, holding that the Fourth Amendment requires visual body cavity searches conducted incident to any lawful arrest. . . to be supported by 'a specific, articulable factual basis supporting a reasonable suspicion to believe the arrestee secreted evidence inside a body cavity'—the very rule we adopt today. . . The VanBramers' ask our decision in Gonzalez to carry more weight than it can bear. There, we held that it was not clearly established that an officer must have reasonable suspicion before conducting a visual cavity search incident to a felony arrest. . . However, that holding was based, at least in part, on the observation that 'Hall was decided after the search at issue in [that] case,'. . . and for that reason Gonzalez is not a basis for upholding a qualified immunity defense for a search conducted after Hall. Gonzalez also noted that 'not one case cited in Hall said that an officer needs particular, individualized facts to conduct a visual body cavity search.'. . Even if true, that circumstance is not a basis for disregarding the authoritative effect of a decision of New York's highest court on the availability of a qualified immunity defense for a New York state police officer. The VanBramers cannot draw the conclusive support they seek from a case regarding the state of the law in 2006 when the search at issue in Gonzalez took place, . . . because the legal landscape was different in 2013 when the search here took place. To be clear, we need not and do not decide whether a decision of a state court, standing alone, would necessarily suffice to defeat a Section 1983 defendant's claim to qualified immunity in every case. Nevertheless, '[s]tate court decisions, like the decisions of other federal lower courts, are relevant and often persuasive' authority on the 'clearly established' issue. . . Nor do we hold that Hall would necessarily tip the balance against finding qualified immunity if this case involved officers from different states in our Circuit. . . In this case, however, Hall is not just persuasive authority in this Court; it has been binding authority for the VanBramers since 2008. At the time Eric conducted the visual body cavity search of Sloley in 2013, the VanBramers—New York State Troopers—were already forbidden as a matter of federal constitutional law as interpreted by the New York Court of Appeals—the highest court in their state—from conducting suspicionless visual body cavity searches incident to felony arrests.

Thus, had they discovered evidence during the course of a suspicionless visual body cavity search incident to arrest, that evidence would have been subject to suppression on Fourth Amendment grounds in any corresponding state criminal proceeding. . . We therefore do not hesitate to conclude that they were 'on notice their conduct [was] unlawful.'. . We pause to address the dissent's misplaced concern that our reliance on the caselaw of the highest court of New York will inhibit police activity by forcing police officers to be attentive to the federal law of constitutional rights as developed in both state and federal courts. It is beyond doubt that police officers frequently have difficult jobs. But if the dissent were right, then state police officers could disregard the decisions of state supreme courts without any fear of being held accountable through a § 1983 action. This is inconsistent with our cases, which hold that courts can look to state court decisions to determine if a federal right has been clearly established. . . And in conjuring up a fictitious world where police proceed as unlicensed attorneys, the dissent overlooks that it is already the job of state police officers to follow the federal constitutional rules articulated by the supreme court of their state.") Sloley v. VanBramer, 945 F.3d 30, 47-50 (2d Cir. 2019) (Jon O. Newman, J., concurring) ("In dissent, Judge Jacobs contends that the majority opinion permits a decision of New York's highest court, People v. Hall, 10 N.Y.3d 303, 856 N.Y.S.2d 540, 886 N.E.2d 162 (2008), to establish federal law for purposes of a New York state police officer's qualified immunity defense. Judge Jacobs also apprehends that the majority's ruling will oblige police officers to 'keep ahead of trends in federal constitutional law ....'. . . I concur in Judge Pooler's opinion and add these words to point out that the majority considers Hall important to our ruling but by no means the sole basis for deciding that the New York officer, arresting a person for a felony, should have known that he must have reasonable suspicion to conduct a visual body cavity search. I also seek to allay the unwarranted concern about police officers' difficulty in understanding the constitutional limits on their conduct. The majority announces no general rule that the requirements of federal law, for purposes of a qualified immunity defense to a claim of unconstitutional police misconduct, can be established by a state court decision. The decision of the New York Court of Appeals in Hall is enlisted as part of the guidance available to the New York state police officer in this case because of the following unusual combination of circumstances that existed prior to the visual body cavity search he conducted:

(1) The Supreme Court acknowledged 34 years before the search in this case that visual body cavity searches 'instinctively give us the most pause.'. . . (2) The unconstitutionality of a visual body cavity search without reasonable suspicion had been firmly established in this Circuit for those arrested for misdemeanors . . . . (3) The distinction between misdemeanors and felonies was highly unlikely to be considered by a police officer hurriedly deciding to make a visual body cavity search of a person arrested for a misdemeanor. . . (4) The seriousness of the assault that a visual body cavity search inflicts on personal dignity had been repeatedly recognized in federal law[.] . . . (5) New York's highest court had instructed New York state police officers that a visual body cavity search of all persons arrested requires reasonable suspicion 'supported by a specific, articulable factual basis[.]'. . . (6) Decisions of New York's Appellate Division had reinforced the ruling in Hall. . . (7) District courts in this Circuit had understood that a visual body cavity search requires reasonable suspicion. . . Although these courts do not establish federal law for purposes of qualified immunity, their consistency contributes to the conclusion that the requirement of reasonable suspicion for visual body cavity searches was established prior to VanBramer's search. The combination of these circumstances, not the Hall decision alone, clearly establishes that reasonable suspicion is required for a visual body cavity search of a person arrested for a felony. At a minimum, these circumstances clearly foreshadow the requirement, and we have ruled that a constitutional limitation on police conduct can be clearly established for purposes of a qualified immunity defense if 'decisions by this or other courts "clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue."'. . Judge Jacobs suggests that New York police officers will have to 'anticipate new law.' Not so. Once the highest court of New York ruled that a police officer may conduct a visual body cavity search only if the officer has reasonable suspicion 'that the arrestee has evidence concealed inside a body cavity,'. . . all New York police officers were on notice of their legal obligations concerning visual body cavity searches. Whether or not VanBramer could anticipate that this Court would rule, under the particular circumstances outlined in Judge Pooler's opinion, that reasonable suspicion as a requirement for visual body searches of those arrested for felonies was sufficiently established, or at least foreshadowed, to defeat a qualified immunity defense under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, he was on notice that reasonable suspicion was required. It would be fanciful to think that he said to himself, 'I know that New York's highest court has ruled that I need reasonable suspicion, but I will go ahead without such suspicion because I am not sure that a federal court will rule that the federal right not to be subjected to a body cavity search without reasonable suspicion has been clearly established.'. . . Judge Jacobs expresses concern that under the majority's ruling police officers 'would need to keep ahead of trends in federal constitutional law as developed in state courts as well as in federal courts.'. . But the only state court decisions the majority opinion charges VanBrmer or any reasonable New York State police officer with an obligation to follow are decisions of New York courts, which he is obliged to follow no matter how we rule. And though it is concededly unusual to rule that reasonable police officers in Connecticut and Vermont are not subject to the same federal requirement as reasonable New York police officers, I see no reason to impose on them a requirement influenced in significant part, but not exclusively, by a decision of New York's highest court. . . . For all of these reasons, I concur in Judge Pooler's opinion, ruling that a remand to resolve a factual dispute is required in order to determine whether VanBramer is shielded by qualified immunity from liability for conducting a visual body cavity search of Maximillian Sloley without reasonable suspicion that narcotics were concealed within his body.") Sloley v. VanBramer, 945 F.3d 30, 50-52 (2d Cir. 2019) (Jacobs, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. I would affirm the grant of qualified immunity to New York State Trooper Eric VanBramer, who conducted a body-cavity search when the plaintiff was arrested for a felony offense. Federal constitutional law recognizes that a body-cavity search requires reasonable suspicion if a person is arrested for a misdemeanor[.] . . . .There is thus an express distinction between misdemeanors (and other minor offenses) and felonies. . . . [I]f Hall can make the difference to clearly establish the Fourth Amendment right that Sloley contends was violated, then federal constitutional law can be made clearly established by state courts. Moreover, it would follow that clearly established federal constitutional law can differ state-by-state within the same circuit. That is not contested by the majority. . . . Splits could thus be opened state-by-state within this Circuit on issues of federal constitutional law. I don't see how that can be; and I see no explanation in the majority opinion beyond the shrug that such a 'strange' result is 'simply a quirk of our federal system[.]'. . . But Hall—which of course is not a decision of the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit—cannot plausibly make federal constitutional law, let alone clearly establish it. . . . To maintain qualified immunity, officers need to know only the settled precepts of federal constitutional law. In order to decide what every police officer should know, the majority opinion splices together: a federal circuit court opinion that goes the other way, a state court opinion, several trial court opinions, and whatnot. If the majority opinion were the law, officers would need to keep ahead of trends in federal constitutional law as developed in the state courts as well as in the federal courts. . . and because the majority opinion shores up its argument with trial court opinions, officers would need to follow developments in the trial courts as well as in the appellate courts: I don't know what my colleagues think police do all day. The majority has it backwards. The better an officer understands federal constitutional law, the less plausible it would seem to her that settled federal constitutional law could vary in the several states of a single circuit. Certainly, it is news to me. It is hard enough for police to ascertain settled federal constitutional law; it is surely harder to anticipate new law; but it is simply impossible to anticipate error. So a police officer who understood the concept of clearly established federal constitutional law would have no notice that it could be one thing in New York and something else in Connecticut and Vermont. Even among persons trained in the law, few would think that. . . . If the majority's error prospers, police will have to follow federal constitutional developments in the state courts as well as the federal courts, and apply a learned distinction between state court rulings that are based on the federal Constitution and those that are based on state law. It may be thought that any confusion will be a benign limitation on the police; but it is by no means always good to inhibit police conduct, and it is an error for federal courts to restrict police conduct by imposing liability on individual officers unless the federal Constitution is unambiguously violated. That is not my opinion; that is Supreme Court law. . . The majority's idea that federal law can be clearly established state-by-state, or even circuit-by-circuit, is conceptually flawed because federal constitutional law is national and uniform. A circuit court ruling that a principle is clearly established is not pronouncing on local or regional constitutional law; it reflects the understanding of that circuit as to the clear establishment of that law nationwide. That is why a circuit split on what is clearly established becomes a problem for the Supreme Court to resolve. . . If federal constitutional law is deemed to be made or settled in the courts of each state, the federal constitution will mean different things in different places within each jurisdiction of a single circuit: a kind of circuit splinter.") Garcia v. Does, 779 F.3d 84, 95 n.12 (2d Cir. 2015) ("Plaintiffs also cite two out-of-circuit cases denying qualified immunity to officers who arrested protesters after arguably sanctioning their traffic violations through their own directives. See Vodak v. City of Chicago, 639 F.3d 738, 743–44 (7th Cir.2011); Buck v. City of Albuquerque, 549 F.3d 1269, 1283 (10th Cir.2008). We have not been altogether unequivocal as to the relevance of out-of-circuit cases in our assessment of whether a right is clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity. Compare, e.g., Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 105 (2d Cir.2010) ("Even if this or other circuit courts have not explicitly held a law or course of conduct to be unconstitutional, the unconstitutionality of that law or course of conduct will nonetheless be treated as clearly established if decisions by this or other courts clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue, even if those decisions come from courts in other circuits.") (internal quotation marks omitted), with Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 255 (2d Cir.2006) ("When neither the Supreme Court nor this court has recognized a right, the law of our sister circuits and the holdings of district courts cannot act to render that right clearly established within the Second Circuit."). But we need not resolve that tension here, because the out-of-circuit precedent cited by plaintiffs has not placed the question at issue in this case 'beyond debate.'. . Extending Cox beyond its due process holding, and agreeing on neither the constitutional right at stake nor its contours, Vodak and Buck—even assuming arguendo that their holdings might otherwise be relevant in the specific factual context of this case—do not foreshadow the law of which a reasonable officer in this circuit should be aware.")

Terebesi v. Torreso, 764 F.3d 217, 231 & n.12 (2d Cir. 2014) ("To determine whether the relevant law was clearly established, we consider the specificity with which a right is defined, the existence of Supreme Court or Court of Appeals case law on the subject, and the understanding of a reasonable officer in light of preexisting law. . . Even if this Court has not explicitly held a course of conduct to be unconstitutional, we may nonetheless treat the law as clearly established if decisions from this or other circuits ' "clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue."'. . . We do not think that, as some decisions in this Circuit have suggested, '[o]nly Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent existing at the time of the alleged violation is relevant in deciding whether a right is clearly established.' Moore v. Vega, 371 F.3d 110, 114 (2d Cir.2004) (emphasis added) (citing Townes v. City of New York, 176 F.3d 138, 144 (2d Cir.1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 964). (The author of this opinion was a member of the panel in Moore.) Townes correctly stated that we consider "whether the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit had affirmed the existence of the right," Townes, 176 F.3d at 144, but the opinion also made clear that, "[e]ven in the absence of binding precedent, a right is clearly established if the contours ... are sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right." Id. (citing Anderson, 483 U.S. at 640) (internal quotation marks and brackets omitted). Though not directly binding on this Court, the decisions of other circuits may reflect that the contours of the right in question are clearly established.")

Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 105 (2d Cir. 2010) ("Even if this or other circuit courts have not explicitly held a law or course of conduct to be unconstitutional, the unconstitutionality of that law or course of conduct will nonetheless be treated as clearly established if decisions by this or other courts 'clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue,' Varrone v. Bilotti, 123 F.3d 75, 79 (2d Cir.1997) (internal quotation marks omitted), even if those decisions come from courts in other circuits, see, e.g., id.; Weber v. Dell, 804 F.2d 796, 801 n. 6, 803-04 (2d Cir.1986) (relying on decisions by seven other circuits finding similar searches unconstitutional, even though this Circuit had not yet reached the issue, in concluding that the defendant was not entitled to immunity), cert. denied, 483 U.S. 1020 (1987).")

Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 254, 255 (2d Cir. 2006) ("At the time of Pabon's Hepatitis C treatment, it was clearly established that the Fourteenth Amendment confers the right to refuse medical treatment. . . The concomitant right to medical information was not clearly established, however, because neither this court nor the Supreme Court had recognized such a right at that time. Thus, no official would have been aware that the failure to provide Pabon with such information as a reasonable patient would find necessary to make an informed decision regarding treatment was a violation of his substantive due process rights. We do not agree with Pabon that White, Benson, and Clarkson render this right to medical information clearly established. When neither the Supreme Court nor this court has recognized a right, the law of our sister circuits and the holdings of district courts cannot act to render that right clearly established within the Second Circuit.").

Hanrahan v. Doling, 331 F.3d 93, 98 n.6 (2d Cir. 2003) ("We note that the extent to which district court decisions may be taken into account in evaluating whether a right is clearly established for qualified immunity purposes is far from clear.")

Anobile v. Pelligrino, 303 F.3d 107, 125, 126 (2d Cir. 2002) ("We believe that the issue presented in this case, whether dormitories located on the premises of a highly regulated business deserve the same Fourth Amendment protections afforded to private residences, was hardly clearly established in December 1997. At the time of the search, competing Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent potentially applied to this issue. On one hand, some cases hold that warrantless administrative searches are permissible where the regulatory scheme concerns an important government interest, and the scheme provides notice to the proprietors of commercial premises of the likelihood of searches. . . On the other hand, some cases hold that homes, and even private rooms, are accorded the highest Fourth Amendment protections. . . As of the time of the search at issue, no decision of this Court had addressed, even generally, the permissibility of searching residential rooms on the grounds of a highly regulated commercial enterprise. We therefore agree with the district court that the law governing the searches of dormitories on racetrack grounds was not clearly established at the time of this search.").

African Trade & Information Center, Inc. v. Abromaitis, 294 F.3d 355, 361 (2d Cir. 2002) ("[T]he question before us is whether, as of September 1998, a bidder or applicant for a new government contract who lacked a preexisting commercial relationship with the government had a clearly established right not to be denied the contract in retaliation for his or her protected speech. Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has yet addressed that question, and thus the right asserted by plaintiffs has not been established by decisions of those courts. This is not necessarily an insurmountable barrier to a finding that the right exists, as the Supreme Court has left open the possibility that a right may be 'clearly established' by decisions of other lower courts. . . Although we have consistently held that our own decisions may support the existence of the right in question, as we recently observed in Poe v. Leonard, 282 F.3d 123 (2d Cir.2002), our decisions send conflicting signals as to whether the decisions of other circuits may do so as well. . . We need not resolve the issue in this case because the right has not been clearly established by any court.").

Poe v. Leonard, 282 F.3d 123, 142 n.15 (2d Cir. 2002) ("It is unclear the extent to which we may rely on the case law of other circuits to determine whether the law was clearly established. The Supreme Court cases, Anderson and Harlow, from which the 'clearly established' rule derives do not provide a clear answer, as the Anderson Court does not discuss the issue, 483 U.S. at 639-40, and the Harlow Court expressly avoids deciding the question, see Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 n. 32 (1982). Our opinions have differed on this issue. [citing cases] . . . . Given that the factual situation presented here is unusual in the sense that Pearl was not performing the police functions we usually encounter in such cases and that Leonard, who is indirectly implicated in Pearl's violation, is the individual whose understanding needs to be evaluated, we rely primarily on our cases to ascertain whether the law was clearly established but discuss other circuits' cases because they are instructive.").

Charles W. v. Maul, 214 F.3d 350, 353, 360, 361 (2d Cir. 2000) ("A right may be said to be clearly established when it has been recognized either by the Supreme Court or by the applicable Circuit Court. Whether a right recognized only by a trial court or by a state court is clearly established presents a closer question. . . . The district court held that a single state trial court decision can 'clearly establish' the relevant constitutional right in a case such as this one. It reasoned that when the government defendants are the very ones who litigated and lost the relevant state court case, they should not later be permitted to plead ignorance of its holding. We see no need to reach this somewhat problematic question. . . . Although Ritter defined a right with reasonable specificity, the right it posited was at odds with this Circuit's applicable law. In claiming the existence of a constitutional right, plaintiff may not exploit a lower state court opinion–inconsistent with this Circuit's precedent–as clearly establishing that right sufficient to deprive state officials, regardless of the level of their positions, of a qualified immunity defense. As a consequence, the right upon which McGhie relies can not be said to have been clearly established. We therefore dismiss McGhie's equal protection claim against defendant Sarkis.").

Russell v. Selsky, 35 F.3d 55, 60 (2d Cir. 1994) ("We conclude that in the absence of Supreme Court or Second Circuit precedents prescribing a right to have separate review and hearing officers in a state prison disciplinary hearing, there is no such clearly established right . . . .").

Jermosen v. Smith, 945 F.2d 547, 550 (2d Cir. 1991) ("In determining whether a particular right was clearly established at the time defendants acted, this Court has considered three factors: (1) whether the right in question was defined with 'reasonable specificity'; (2) whether the decisional law of the Supreme Court and the applicable circuit court support the existence of the right in question, and (3) whether under preexisting law a reasonable defendant official would have understood that his or her acts were unlawful.").

Soto v. City of New York, No. 12-CV-6911 RA, 2015 WL 3422155, at *3 n.1 (S.D.N.Y. May 28, 2015) ("There does not appear to be Supreme Court precedent directly on point and, to date, the Supreme Court has left open the question of whether, in the absence of controlling Supreme Court precedent, controlling circuit precedent constitutes clearly established federal law. See Sheehan, 2015 WL 2340839, at *9 (citing Carroll v. Carman, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350 (2014) (per curiam)). The Second Circuit, however, has instructed courts to 'look to Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent existing at the time of the alleged violation.' Garcia, 779 F.3d at 92 (quoting Okin v. Vill. of Cornwall–On–Hudson Police Dep't, 577 F.3d 415, 433 (2d Cir.2009)). Moreover, the ' "absence of a decision by [the Second Circuit] or the Supreme Court directly addressing the right at issue will not preclude a finding that the law was clearly established" so long as preexisting law "clearly foreshadow[s] a particular ruling on the issue."' Id. (quoting Tellier v. Fields, 280 F.3d 69, 84 (2d Cir.2000)).")

Franklin v. County of Dutchess, 225 F.R.D. 487, 494 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) ("The Second Circuit has held that the law cannot be 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes by district court opinions, but only by the decisions of the applicable circuit court or the Supreme Court. . . Therefore, this Court's decision in Murcia is not sufficient to put Sheriff Anderson on notice, as of the date of that decision, that the indiscriminate strip searching of newly-arrived felony detainees was unlawful, nor is the law 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes. That being so, I conclude that, until the Court of Appeals clearly extends the reach of Weber/Walsh/Wachtler/Shain I to a new class of persons–felony detainees– reasonable law enforcement officials in Sheriff Anderson's position could come to different conclusions about what the law permits with respect to on-arrival strip searches of such individuals. Thus, to the extent that Ramona Franklin seeks to hold the sheriff liable for enforcing a policy that required the strip searching of accused felons who arrived at the DCJ, the Sheriff is entitled to qualified immunity.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

James v. New Jersey State Police, 957 F.3d 165, 170 (3d Cir. 2020), reh'g and reh'g en banc denied sub nom Gibbons v. New Jersdy State Police, 969 F.3d 419 (3d Cir. 2020), cert. denied sub nom James v. Bartelt, 142 S. Ct. 4 (2021) ("For qualified-immunity purposes, 'clearly established rights are derived either from binding Supreme Court and Third Circuit precedent or from a "robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals."'. . So we first look to factually analogous precedents of the Supreme Court and the Third Circuit. . . Then, we examine persuasive authorities, such as our nonprecedential opinions and decisions from other Courts of Appeals. . . We may consider all relevant cases under this inquiry, not just those cited by the parties. [citing Elder v. Holloway]")

Randolph-Ali v. Minium, 793 F. App'x 146, ___ (3d Cir. 2019) ("We acknowledge that the Ninth Circuit had held, prior to August 2014, that officers employed excessive force when they used a taser without warning on a potential domestic abuse victim whose 'crime, if any, was minimal,' who 'posed no threat to the officers,' who 'minimally resisted [her husband's] arrest while attempting to protect her own body and to comply with [an officer's] request that she speak to him outside, and [who] begged everyone not to wake her sleeping children.'. . The facts in Mattos, however, are distinguishable from those presented here. The officer in Mattos used the taser in 'dart mode,' which constitutes an intermediate, significant level of force, while Detective Minium tased Randolph-Ali in 'drive stun' mode, which causes incapacitating pain, but does not paralyze the entire body. . . In addition, Randolph-Ali refused to comply with Detective Minium's demand that she allow him inside to search for the suspect. By contrast, the plaintiff in Mattos 'was attempting to comply with [a police officer's] request to speak with her outside when she got physically caught in the middle between [another police officer] and [her husband].'. . Finally, Randolph-Ali's crime was not 'minimal.' Instead, she was arrested for, inter alia, endangering the welfare of children, obstructing the administration of law, resisting arrest, and disorderly conduct. Under these circumstances, we conclude that there is no consensus of authority that Detective Minium's actions under the particular circumstances of this case implicated a clearly established constitutional right. Accordingly, we will affirm the District Court's judgment.")

Hubbard v. Taylor, 538 F.3d 229, 236, 238 (3d Cir. 2008) (Neither the Supreme Court nor the Third Circuit has "established a right of pretrial detainees to be free from triple-celling or from sleeping on a mattress placed on the floor. . . . In the absence of direct authority from the Supreme Court or this Court, the Defendants in this case were not obliged to familiarize themselves with, and adhere to, the decisions of district courts outside their jurisdiction when the very court to whose jurisdiction they were subject repeatedly approved of their practices at Gander Hill.").

Williams v. Bitner, 455 F.3d 186, 194 (3d Cir. 2006) ("In sum, we hold that the Prison Officials are not entitled to qualified immunity from Williams's First Amendment claim. Although we had not yet addressed the issue raised here at the time of the incident, the Fifth, Seventh, and Eighth Circuits had addressed First Amendment claims similar to Williams's and held that prison officials must respect and accommodate, when practicable, a Muslim inmate's religious beliefs regarding prohibitions on the handling of pork. Moreover, decisions from the Supreme Court and this Court support the principles underlying the right asserted by Williams. We therefore conclude that the state of the law at the time the violation occurred gave the Prison Officials 'fair warning' that their alleged treatment of Williams was unconstitutional.").

Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 321 (3d Cir. 2001) ("District court opinions may be relevant to the determination of when a right was clearly established for qualified immunity analysis. [footnote surveying circuits in terms of weight afforded district court opinions in clearly-established-law analysis] However, in this case, the absence of binding precedent in this circuit,. . . the doubts expressed by the most analogous appellate holding, together with the conflict among a handful of district court opinions, undermines any claim that the right was clearly established in 1995.").

Pro v. Donatucci, 81 F.3d 1283, 1291-92 (3d Cir. 1996) ("We agree with the district court that Pro's right to respond to the subpoena without fear of retaliation was clearly established at the time Donatucci acted. . . . Bieregu [v. Reno, 59 F.3d 1445, 1459 (3d Cir. 1995)]found law to be clearly established despite a circuit split, as long as 'no gaping divide has emerged in the jurisprudence such that defendants could reasonably expect this circuit to rule' to the contrary. . . Thus, the split between the Courts of Appeals for the Fifth and the Fourth [footnote omitted] Circuits at the time of Donatucci's actions does not preclude our deciding that Pro's right to respond to the subpoena was clearly established.").

Brown v. Grabowski, 922 F.2d 1097, 1118 (3d Cir. 1990) ("We believe that Thurman,. . . a lone district court case from another jurisdiction, cannot sufficiently have established and limned the equal protection rights of a domestic violence victim . . . to enable reasonable officials to '"anticipate [that] their conduct [might] give rise to liability for damages."' [cites omitted]).

Brothers v. Lawrence County Prison Bd., 2008 WL 146828, *13 & n.10 (W.D.Pa. Jan.14, 2008) ("Defendants argue that the law of the United States Supreme Court and the Third Circuit did not clearly establish that Plaintiff had a First Amendment right not to be strip searched by a female nor was any other constitutional right not to undergo a cross gender strip search clearly established. The Defendants appear to assume, at least in part, that when this court conducts a clearly established analysis, the only proper precedent to look to is that emanating from either the Supreme Court or from within the Third Circuit. However, this court is not convinced that there are such limitations. [reviewing cases] In light of this, and in light of the fact that the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit held as early as 1999 in Moore v. Carwell, 168 F.3d 234 (5th Cir.1999), that a cross gender strip search could violate the constitution where no exigent circumstances required a cross gender, as opposed to a same gender strip search, Defendants have not carried their burden at this stage to show the law was not clearly established. . . . .Because the Defendants relied upon their mistaken view of the proper analysis to be undertaken to find 'clearly established' they simply stated that there were no Supreme Court or Third Circuit cases establishing the right not to be stripped searched. Now that they are relieved of their mistaken belief, any denial of their motion to dismiss based upon a claim of qualified immunity is without prejudice to them reasserting their qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, by making the argument that they are entitled to qualified immunity based on the state of the law even outside this Circuit. It may be that the Fifth Circuit's decision in Moore v. Campbell is aberrational, or that there is a great deal of conflicting Circuit Court opinion but this will be for the Moving Defendants to ferret out, not this court.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Latson v. Clarke, 794 F. App'x 266, ___ (4th Cir. 2019) ("Although no longer good law, . . . at the time of Latson's incarceration (2014–2015) we had held that long-term solitary confinement did not violate the Eighth Amendment. . . Latson argues that MCTC staff nevertheless had fair notice of the unconstitutional nature of solitary confinement as applied to prisoners with mental disabilities, given a handful of district court opinions from outside this Circuit. [citing cases] The argument fails. These decisions simply do not represent an 'overwhelming consensus' of persuasive authority that clearly established and gave fair notice of an Eighth Amendment violation, particularly due to our contrary circuit authority at the time of the alleged violation. See Booker v. S.C. Dep't of Corr., 855 F.3d 533, 545 (4th Cir. 2017). Accordingly, notwithstanding the dreadful conditions imposed on Latson, we can only conclude that MCTC staff are entitled to qualified immunity.") Booker v. South Carolina DOC, 855 F.3d 533, 539-46 (4th Cir. 2017), cert. denied¸ 138 S. Ct. 755 (2018) ("The Supreme Court, in an opinion authored by Chief Justice Rehnquist, articulated that courts may rely on 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority' to determine whether a 'reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.'. . Since Wilson, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed that 'qualified immunity is lost when plaintiffs point either to "cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident" or to "a consensus of cases of persuasive authority."'. . . And in evaluating whether a right is clearly established in a given circuit, the Supreme Court has looked to precedent from other circuits. [citing Pearson and Brosseau] . . . . At the outset, we preempt a possible point of confusion—Booker did not allege in his complaint that he has an absolute right to file prison grievances pursuant to the First Amendment. Rather, Booker alleged that he has a First Amendment right to be free from retaliation when he does file a grievance pursuant to an existing grievance procedure. . . More particularly, Booker asserts that this right is rooted in the First Amendment's Petition Clause, which guarantees individuals the right 'to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.'. . Booker contends that an inmate's right to petition is violated when he is retaliated against for filing a grievance. . . . Booker's detailed factual allegations and his reference to the First Amendment provide a more-than-sufficient basis for us to analyze whether the right was clearly established under the Petition Clause. . . .The clearly established inquiry asks whether the state of the law gave a reasonable prison official 'fair warning' that retaliating against an inmate who files a prison grievance was unconstitutional. It is 'well established' in this Circuit that a 'public official may not misuse his power to retaliate against an individual for the exercise of a valid constitutional right.'. . . Thus, if an inmate exercises his First Amendment right when he files a prison grievance, retaliation against him for doing so is unconstitutional. The pertinent question in this appeal, then, is whether it was clearly established that an inmate exercises a First Amendment right to petition for redress of grievances when he files a prison grievance. Framed differently, we must determine whether it was clearly established that an inmate's right to petition is violated when he is retaliated against for filing a grievance. . . . Adams [v. Rice, 40 F.3d 72 (4th Cir. 1994)] establishes a clear rule: inmates have no constitutional entitlement or due process interest in access to a grievance procedure. An inmate thus cannot bring a § 1983 claim alleging denial of a specific grievance process, for example. But Adams is entirely silent on the issue in this case—whether an inmate's First Amendment right is violated when he is retaliated against for submitting a grievance pursuant to an existing grievance procedure. That a prison is not required under the Constitution to provide access to a grievance process does not mean that prison officials who retaliate against inmates for filing grievances do not violate the Constitution. . . .The Eighth Circuit is not alone in finding that although inmates do not have a constitutional entitlement to and/or due process interest in accessing a grievance procedure, they have a First Amendment right to be free from retaliation when they do file. [collecting cases from other Circuits] In short, Adams concerns whether inmates have a constitutional entitlement to or liberty interest in accessing grievance procedures. It says nothing about whether a prison official violates an inmate's First Amendment rights by retaliating against the inmate for submitting a grievance. Therefore, contrary to Appellees' suggestion, Adams does not speak to the right at issue. As such, neither party has cited cases from courts of controlling authority—the Supreme Court, this Court, or the Supreme Court of South Carolina—that explicitly address an inmate's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation for filing a prison grievance. . . .We therefore agree with the district court's conclusion that no published decision from the Supreme Court, this Court, or the Supreme Court of South Carolina squarely addresses whether filing a grievance is protected First Amendment conduct. The district court, after determining there were no binding cases that squarely established the specific First Amendment right, concluded that the right was not clearly established. . . But the clearly established inquiry was not complete: as this Court has stated, and as Booker recognizes, the 'absence of controlling authority holding identical conduct unlawful does not guarantee qualified immunity.'. . The district court failed to consider whether, despite the lack of directly on-point, binding authority, the right was clearly established based on general constitutional principles or a consensus of persuasive authority. We now proceed to that task. . . .In the absence of controlling authority that specifically adjudicates the right in question, a right may still be clearly established in one of two ways. A right may be clearly established if 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law [ ] appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . A right may also be clearly established based on a ' "consensus of cases of persuasive authority" from other jurisdictions.'. . Here, Booker argues that his First Amendment right was clearly established in both ways. Arguably, the prohibition on retaliating against inmates for filing grievances was obviously unconstitutional given longstanding principles articulated in controlling authority. It is beyond dispute that prison officials cannot retaliate against inmates for exercising a constitutional right. . . And Booker presents a logical and compelling argument that, in light of binding Supreme Court precedent, he exercised his constitutional right to petition the government for redress of grievances when he filed an administrative grievance seeking redress for what he believed was the improper handling of his legal mail. . . In addition to Supreme Court precedent, this Court has long held that prison officials may not retaliate against prisoners for exercising their right to access the courts, . . . which is a component of the right to petition for redress of grievances [.] . . . Given the close relationship between an inmate filing a grievance and filing a lawsuit—indeed, the former is generally a prerequisite for the latter—our jurisprudence provided a strong signal that officials may not retaliate against inmates for filing grievances. Regardless of whether Booker's right was obvious or 'manifestly apparent' from broader principles in the decisional law, we find that it was clearly established based on a robust 'consensus of persuasive authority.' The Second, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, Eleventh, and D.C. Circuits have all recognized in published decisions that inmates possess a right, grounded in the First Amendment's Petition Clause, to be free from retaliation in response to filing a prison grievance. . . .The Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, Eleventh, and D.C. Circuits have likewise recognized that inmates possess a First Amendment petition right to be free from retaliation for filing grievances. [collecting cases] Even more, the Third, Fifth, and Tenth Circuits have recognized an inmate's right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance under the First Amendment (albeit without referencing a particular clause). [collecting cases] Given the decisions from nearly every court of appeals, we are compelled to conclude that Booker's right to file a prison grievance free from retaliation was clearly established under the First Amendment. Consistent with fundamental constitutional principles and common sense, these courts have had little difficulty concluding that prison officials violate the First Amendment by retaliating against inmates for filing grievances. Rarely will there be such an overwhelming consensus of authority recognizing that specific conduct is violative of a constitutional right. The unanimity among our sister circuits demonstrates that the constitutional question is 'beyond debate,' and therefore we find that the right at issue was clearly established. . . . Our 'conclusion that "a reasonable person would have known," Harlow [v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 (1982)], of the violation is buttressed by' the South Carolina Department of Correction's internal policies. . . Although officials 'do not lose their qualified immunity merely because their conduct violates some statutory or administrative provision,'. . . the Supreme Court has analyzed prison regulations in combination with case law to determine whether an individual had fair warning[.] [citing Hope] Here, the SCDC's detailed policy document concerning the 'Inmate Grievance System'. . .expressly provides that '[n]o inmate will be subjected to reprisal, retaliation, harassment, or disciplinary action for filing a grievance or participating in the resolution of a grievance.'. . The record further indicates that this prohibition was communicated to prison officials. . . . Again, the fundamental inquiry for purposes of qualified immunity is whether a reasonable official in Jones's position had 'fair warning' that the alleged conduct was unconstitutional. . . The unequivocal language of SCDC's own policies provides additional support for our finding that Jones had such warning here. In sum, given the authority discussed above, we conclude that a reasonable prison official had fair warning that retaliating against an inmate who filed a prison grievance was unlawful. Because an inmate's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance was clearly established, we find that Appellees are not entitled to qualified immunity on that basis and therefore the district court erred in granting their motion for summary judgment.")

Booker v. South Carolina DOC, 855 F.3d 533, 547-53 (4th Cir. 2017) (Traxler, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 755 (2018) ("Relying on decisions from other circuits, the majority concludes that a prisoner's right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance was clearly established in 2010, when the actions giving rise to this lawsuit took place. Even assuming that that right may have been clearly established in other circuits, the case law from this circuit in 2010 could reasonably be understood as foreclosing that claim. See Adams v. Rice, 40 F.3d 72 (4th Cir. 1994). Because the controlling law in this circuit did not put the prison officials on notice that their conduct violated Booker's constitutional rights, I believe the prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent. . . . I do not disagree that the weight of authority outside this circuit holds that the First Amendment is violated when prison officials retaliate against an inmate for filing a grievance under an established grievance system. Where I disagree with the majority is in its conclusion that case law from this circuit was silent on the relevant First Amendment question. In my view, this court's decision in Adams v. Rice could reasonably be understood as holding that an inmate's use of a prison grievance system does not implicate the First Amendment and that grievance-based retaliation against the inmate likewise does not implicate the First Amendment. Because Adams can reasonably be understood to permit the actions of the prison officials at issue in this case, the majority erred by looking outside the circuit to conclude otherwise. . . .[I]f filing a grievance implicates no constitutional right, then retaliation against the inmate because of the grievance does not violate the Constitution. . . . I simply see no basis for concluding, as the majority apparently does, that the act of filing a grievance -- an act that is not constitutionally protected -- somehow imbues the filing with constitutional protections. Accordingly, it seems to me that this court's decision in Adams affirmatively closes the door to the retaliation claim being asserted here. . . .In my view, Adams directly, though not explicitly, forecloses Booker's retaliation claim. But even if the distinction between this case and Adams that the majority apparently embraces were viable, a reasonable prison official could still conclude that the actions alleged in this case were permissible under this court's decision in Adams. . . . I therefore believe that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .In Adams, this court held that 'there is no constitutional right to participate in grievance proceedings.' 40 F.3d at 75 (emphasis added). Because inmates participate in grievance proceedings by filing a grievance, our decision in Adams must be understood as holding that inmates have no constitutional right to file a grievance. The filing of a grievance therefore implicates no constitutional right of the inmate and cannot support a retaliation claim against prison officials. . . .Adams is binding authority that directly rejects the constitutional right asserted in this case. The majority errs by ignoring Adams and relying instead on out-of-circuit cases that are inconsistent with our holding in Adams in order to declare that an inmate's right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance was clearly established. Accordingly, for the foregoing reasons, I believe that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, and I therefore respectfully dissent from the majority's contrary conclusion.")

Owens by and through Owens v. Lott, 372 F.3d 267, 279, 280 (4th Cir. 2004) ("Whether a right has been specifically adjudicated or is manifestly apparent from broader applications of the constitutional premise in question, we look ordinarily to 'the decisions of the Supreme Court, this court of appeals, and the highest court of the state in which the case arose.'. . When there are no such decisions from courts of controlling authority, we may look to 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority' from other jurisdictions, if such exists. . . There is no controlling authority that informs our analysis in this case. As we have already noted, the Supreme Court has not addressed the circumstances, if any, under which an 'all persons' provision in a search warrant is constitutional, . . . nor has this court done so. The vast majority of the decisions from other jurisdictions considering the validity of 'all persons' warrants–mostly state decisions–conclude that a search warrant authorizing the search of 'all persons' found on the premises does not violate the Fourth Amendment per se. Beyond that broad conclusion, however, courts impose different requirements for what is necessary to sustain the validity of such a warrant. . . . Moreover, these decisions provide no clear view, let alone a consensus, regarding what factors are most significant in deciding whether sufficient probable cause exists to support the search of 'all persons' found in a private residence being searched for drugs. . . . We conclude that at the time of the search, the law was not sufficiently clear to strip defendants of qualified immunity.")

Rogers v. Pendleton, 249 F.3d 279, 287, 288 (4th Cir. 2001) ("In determining whether a right is clearly established, we may rely upon cases of controlling authority in the jurisdiction in question, or a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.' Wilson, 526 U.S. at 617. While a consensus of cases of persuasive authority may clearly establish a right for qualified immunity purposes, the inverse is also true: if there are no cases of controlling authority in the jurisdiction in question, and if other appellate federal courts have split on the question of whether an asserted right exists, the right cannot be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes. . . Therefore, having determined that the United States Supreme Court has, in Oliver and Dunn, established the right to be free of searches of the curtilage based merely on reasonable suspicion, we must survey the cases cited by the officers to determine whether these cases could cause a reasonable officer to believe that the search planned by the officers in this case was constitutional. . . . Because the officers do not claim to have had a warrant, exigent circumstances, or probable cause, it follows that their contemplated search was illegal, and it was plainly so based upon clearly established law at the time of the search.").

Snyder v. Ringgold, 133 F.3d 917 (Table), 1998 WL 13528, *3 (4th Cir. Jan. 15, 1998) ("The right for which plaintiff contends has not been clearly established by specific adjudication. No Supreme Court or Fourth Circuit case has held that reporters have a constitutional right of equal or nondiscriminatory access to government information that need not otherwise be made available to the public. In fact, the district court opinion below relied only on three, relatively old federal district court decisions and one state court of appeals decision in support of its holding that Ringgold had violated Snyder's First Amendment rights. . . .On appeal, the plaintiff has cited cases from the First, Second, and District of Columbia Circuit Courts of Appeals that consider issues that she believes to be analogous to the issue in this case. . . . The plaintiff's resort to these out-of-circuit cases merely underscores the lack of Fourth Circuit and Supreme Court law establishing the right for which she contends.").

Nerio v. Evans, 974 F.3d 571, 575 & n.2 (5th Cir. 2020) ("We cannot find a case that would've given Evans 'fair notice' that his conduct might be unconstitutional. . . Therefore, Appellant Nerio has not shown that the violative nature of Evans's particular conduct was clearly established at the time of the arrest. . . . Although we know the Supreme Court's decisions can clearly establish the law, the Supreme Court has never held that our decisions can do the same. See Wesby, 138 S. Ct. at 591 n.8 ("We have not yet decided what precedents—other than our own—qualify as controlling authority for purposes of qualified immunity.").")

Marks v. Hudson, 933 F.3d 481, 486 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Because nonprecedential opinions do not establish any binding law for the circuit, Light-Age, Inc. v. Ashcroft-Smith, 922 F.3d 320, 322 n.1 (5th Cir. 2019), they cannot be the source of clearly established law for qualified immunity analysis. Certainly, though, to the extent any of those opinions are restating what was clearly established in precedents they cite or elsewhere, the unpublished opinions can properly guide us to such authority.")

Delaughter v. Woodall, 909 F.3d 130, 138-40 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Here, Dr. Nipper determined in 2011 that Delaughter requires hip replacement and reconstructive surgery. No party points to evidence that any medical professional has disagreed with Dr. Nipper. Thus, Delaughter's claim arises from the fact he has yet to receive a prescribed course of treatment; it does not arise from his subjective opinion of the sufficiency of his medical treatment that is either contradicted or unsupported by medical professionals. Second, it is not clear that Dr. Nipper's cancellation of Delaughter's surgery and UMMC's failure to accept Delaughter as a patient were medical-judgment decisions. Indeed, Delaughter claims these decisions were made because MDOC refuses to pay for his surgery. If so, the delay could under certain circumstances 'evince a wanton disregard for [a] serious medical need[ ].'. . . Factual disputes about the reason for the delay prevent us from determining whether Hatten violated Delaughter's constitutional rights. . . . Having established that summary judgment on the first prong was incorrect, we turn to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. Delaughter bears the burden of pointing out the clearly established law and raising a fact issue as to its violation. . . Clearly established law is determined by 'controlling authority—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority—that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.'. . This means 'the contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right,' although it is not necessary for controlling precedent to have held that the official's exact act was unlawful. . . The central concern is whether the official has fair warning that his conduct violates a constitutional right. . . Delaughter claims it is clearly established that an unjustified delay in obtaining necessary reconstructive surgery for a prisoner violates the Eighth Amendment rights of the prisoner. In support, Delaughter points to three of our unpublished cases in which we concluded that an unjustified delay in surgery could constitute deliberate indifference. . . As we have noted, it is clearly established that delaying medical care can constitute an Eighth Amendment violation if the prison official 'knows that [the] inmate[ ] face[s] a substantial risk of serious harm and disregards that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it,' and the delay results in substantial harm. . . This precedent, combined with the cases cited above, which specifically address delays of surgical procedures, constitutes a combination of precedential authority and a robust consensus of unpublished authority, and convinces us that Hatten had fair warning that an unjustified delay in surgery is unconstitutional. See Cooper, 844 F.3d at 525 n.8 (noting that although an unpublished case may not create clearly established law, it may be used to illustrate clearly established law). Therefore, if the fact issues under prong one were resolved in Delaughter's favor, Hatten's conduct would violate clearly established law and he would not be entitled to qualified immunity. Thus, we reverse the district court's ruling and remand the claims against Hatten for further proceedings.")

Vincent v. City of Sulphur, 805 F.3d 543, 548-51 (5th Cir. 2015) ("The cited cases, however, do not reflect clearly established law in this circuit under these facts. . .Although the Supreme Court decisions amply support the proposition that there is a general right to go to or remain on public property for lawful purposes, none comes near the level of specificity needed to put 'beyond debate' the related but distinct proposition that a person under investigation for threatening deadly violence against city officials has a right to notice and a hearing before being banned from entering city buildings. . . None of the Supreme Court cases mirrors the facts or the district court's legal reasoning—in fact, none of them addresses an Eldridge-type procedural-due-process claim at all. The cases from the Sixth and Eleventh Circuits and the Texas intermediate court come somewhat closer—they at least address procedural-due-process claims in the context of the right to enter or remain on government property. But two out-of-circuit cases and a state-court intermediate appellate decision hardly constitute persuasive authority adequate to qualify as clearly established law sufficient to defeat qualified immunity in this circuit. A review of the decisions on which the district court relied demonstrates their insufficiency for a 'clearly established' finding. . . . The district court also relied on three out-of-jurisdiction lower-court decisions to support its conclusion that the procedural-due-process right was clearly established. Unlike the Supreme Court cases cited above, those three cases—two from our sister circuits and one from an intermediate Texas state court—do deal specifically with procedural due process in the context of the right to go about lawfully in public areas. And Kennedy, . . . even goes so far as to find that a procedural-due-process right in this context is clearly established. But those decisions, taken together, cannot support a finding of a clearly established right here. First, two cases from other circuits and one from a state intermediate court do not, generally speaking, constitute persuasive authority defining the asserted right at the high degree of particularity that is necessary for a rule to be clearly established despite a lack of controlling authority. In any event, those three cases address matters that are sufficiently legally or factually distinguishable as to make a finding of clearly established law improper. . . .In summary, as we have explained, the alleged constitutional right was not clearly established, so the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. We need not reach the question whether the officers in fact committed a procedural-due-process violation. We therefore REVERSE the order denying summary judgment and REMAND for further proceedings as needed.")

Breen v. Texas A & M University, 485 F.3d 325, 339, 340 (5th Cir. 2007) ("Applying the principles of McClendon to this case, we conclude that the state-created danger theory was not clearly established law in this circuit, with respect to the specific facts here or otherwise, by November 18, 1999, and, accordingly, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from plaintiffs' section 1983 claims. . . . .In light of this court's historical reticence towards adopting the state-created danger theory. . . neither this court's discussions of the theory nor our sister circuits' adoption of it convinces us that a reasonable official in any of the defendants' shoes would have had fair notice on or before November 18, 1999 that his conduct with respect to the danger created by the Texas A & M bonfire stack could violate the students' constitutional rights. Because this court's pre-November 1999 decisions evince substantial uncertainty as to the existence of even the general right that the plaintiffs claim has been violated, those decisions cannot be said to have given defendants fair warning that any of their actions or omissions with respect to the 1999 Texas A & M bonfire construction could violate the affected students' constitutional rights. Moreover, similar to the situation in McClendon, any consensus of the other federal circuits in adopting various formulations of the state-created danger theory is insufficient for this court to find that the theory was clearly established in this circuit as applied to these cases. Although a majority of federal circuits had approved of the state-created danger theory in a general sense by November 18, 1999, there was not a consensus among those courts as to the contours of the underlying substantive due process right, . . . and the plaintiffs have not pointed to (and this court has not found) any pre-collapse cases in which an appellate court applied the state-created danger theory on facts even remotely analogous to the facts of these cases. Accordingly, we find that the adoption of the state-created danger theory in other circuits before November 1999 was insufficient to give the University officials fair notice that their conduct violated the students' constitutional rights.").

McClendon v. City of Columbia (McClendon II), 305 F.3d 314, 329-31 (5th Cir. 2002) (en banc)("[L]anguage in Wilson clearly suggests that, in the absence of directly controlling authority, a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' might, under some circumstances, be sufficient to compel the conclusion that no reasonable officer could have believed that his or her actions were lawful. . . . Because the Supreme Court's method of analysis in Wilson is inconsistent with the rule predicated in Shipp, Shipp's statement that 'we are confined to precedent from our circuit or the Supreme Court' in analyzing whether a right is clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis, see 234 F.3d at 915, is overruled. . . . As we have recognized on numerous subsequent occasions, our decision in Salas did not address the viability of the state-created danger theory or define the contours of an individual's right to be free from state-created dangers. . . . Salas simply held that, even under the most expansive articulations of the state-created danger doctrine sanctioned by other courts at that time, the plaintiffs had not stated a cognizable claim. This discussion in Salas would not have provided a reasonable officer with 'fair warning' that creating or increasing a danger to a known victim with deliberate indifference towards that victim violates the victim's substantive due process rights. Furthermore, our Salas decision was certainly insufficient to provide a reasonable officer with 'fair warning' that Detective Carney's particular actions in loaning Loftin a gun would violate McClendon's substantive due process rights. Turning to the law of our sister circuits, we note that six circuits had sanctioned some version of the state-created danger theory in July of 1993, at the time of Detective Carney's allegedly unlawful actions. . . . Moreover, as McClendon correctly points out, no circuit had explicitly rejected the state-created danger theory in July of 1993. While both of these factors are relevant to our determination whether there was a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' sufficient to provide Detective Carney with 'fair warning' that his acts were unlawful, the mere fact that a large number of courts had recognized the existence of a right to be free from state-created danger in some circumstances as of July, 1993 is insufficient to clearly establish the unlawfulness of Detective Carney's actions. The Supreme Court has recognized on numerous occasions that the operation of the 'clearly established' standard depends substantially upon the level of generality at which the relevant legal rule is defined.").

Doe v. State of Louisiana, 2 F.3d 1412, 1416 n.8 (5th Cir. 1993) ("In examining preexisting law, [a]s a general proposition, we will not rigidly define the applicable body of law in determining whether relevant legal rules were clearly established at the time of the conduct at issue. [citations omitted]. Relying solely on Fifth Circuit and Supreme Court cases, for example, would be excessively formalistic, but they will loom largest in our inquiries. In determining what the relevant law is, then, a court must necessarily exercise some discretion in determining the relevance of particular law under the facts and circumstances of each case, looking at such factors as the overall weight of authority, and the status of the courts that render substantively relevant decisions, as well as the jurisdiction of the courts that render substantively relevant decisions." [quoting Melear v. Spears, 862 F.2d 1177, 1184 n. 8 (5th Cir.1989)]).

Strickland v. City of Crenshaw, Miss., 114 F. Supp. 3d 400, 417-18 (N.D. Miss. 2015) ("[T]he court concludes that plaintiffs have presented insufficient authority to 'clearly establish' the parameters of any permissible 'pointing of weapons' at occupants of a home during the execution of a search warrant, so as to overcome the qualified immunity defense raised by each individual defendant in this case. As quoted above, plaintiffs cite a single decision from a different circuit, Holland v. Harrington, 268 F.3d 1179, 1192–93 (10th Cir.2001) on this issue, but this is plainly insufficient to clearly establish the law in this regard. . . Plaintiffs' reliance upon a single decision from another circuit is particularly lacking in light of the fact that the Supreme Court has stated that, to overcome a qualified immunity defense, the defendant must have violated 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . While it may be rather fictional to assume that officers would even be aware of Fifth Circuit authority on this issue, plaintiffs have a particularly poor argument on this point in relying on a single decision from another circuit. Some indication of the quantum of authority which might suffice in this regard can be gleaned from recent U.S. Supreme Court precedent, where the Court has suggested that either a decision from that Court or a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals' would be necessary to 'clearly establish the federal right respondent alleges' in qualified immunity cases. . .Clearly, a single decision from one circuit court does not constitute a 'robust consensus' among the federal circuits, and plaintiffs have therefore failed to 'clearly establish' the parameters of the legal duty which they claim was violated in this case. Even assuming that there are other federal circuits which reached a similar result as the Tenth Circuit in Holland, it is clear that, in the qualified immunity context, plaintiffs have the burden of finding and citing that authority, and they have failed to do so. It appears likely to this court that any 'robust consensus' of federal appellate authority which might arise on this issue would need to take account of a number of difficult factors to ensure that the rights of plaintiffs and police officers are appropriately balanced. Courts would likely have to grapple, for example, with the seeming ease with which fact issues in this regard could be manufactured, if it were sufficient for a plaintiff to allege that a gun was pointed at him or a family member and that an emotional injury resulted. Indeed, it is difficult to discern how fact issues in this regard could ever be found lacking in such a legal context, if a plaintiff simply offered his own self-serving testimony in this regard. In the court's view, courts seeking to establish standards in this context would also likely need to consider the issue of whether an officer in question had reason to have drawn his weapon at all. In cases where an officer had such a reason (as when executing a search warrant of a suspected drug dealer's house), then it should seemingly be much more difficult for plaintiffs to establish that his actions in 'pointing' his weapon in a particular direction were objectively unreasonable than if he had no good reason to have pulled his weapon at all. That brings this court to a final weakness in plaintiffs' qualified immunity arguments. As discussed previously, the Supreme Court in Anderson v. Creighton emphasized that a central part of the qualified immunity analysis involves determining whether a reasonable officer in the position of the defendant could have believed that his actions were lawful. . .This necessarily requires the plaintiff to demonstrate that the specific circumstances which the officer encountered would have led a reasonable officer to understand that his actions were unlawful, in light of clearly established authority of which a reasonable officer would have known. In their arguments quoted above, plaintiffs do not offer either sufficient factual context or legal arguments to allow this court to make a determination in this regard, with regard to Linzy or any of the other defendants. Indeed, plaintiffs' qualified immunity arguments as a whole are quite brief and conclusory and do not reflect the facts that 1) they have the burden of proving that qualified immunity is inapplicable and 2) they are seeking to impose the expense and stress of trial upon officers whom the law does not lightly consider to be either 'plainly incompetent' or willful constitutional violators. In light of the foregoing, the court finds plaintiffs' proof and arguments insufficient to overcome a qualified immunity defense, and defendants' motion to dismiss the excessive force claims asserted against them will therefore be granted.")

Davis v. Southerland, No. Civ.A. G-01-720, 2004 WL 1230278, at *6 (S.D. Tex. May 21, 2004) ("The Circuit has not merely declined to recognize the state-created danger theory of substantive due process; it has scrupulously avoided it for more than ten years. The Fifth Circuit's reluctance to adopt the state-created danger theory is therefore not a mere neutral factor to be considered against the general consensus among other circuits, but a caution that the Fifth Circuit might not join that consensus. [footnote omitted] This Court therefore most respectfully concludes that the state-created danger theory of substantive due process was not clearly established at the time of Defendants' Bonfire-related activities. Because Plaintiffs' theory had not been adopted as a viable avenue to a substantive due process claim, a reasonable school official would not have been aware that the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause provided a constitutional right to be free from state-created danger, much less than an injury caused by a school administrator's failure to exercise control over an activity such as Bonfire would violate that right. Accordingly, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Young v. Kent County Sheriff's Department, No. 21-1222, 2022 WL 94990, at *5 (6th Cir. Jan. 10, 2022) (not reported) ("As set forth in Guy, a reasonable officer would have been on notice in February 2019 that using a chemical agent on a subdued, partially incapacitated detainee who did not comply with officer's orders would amount to constitutionally excessive force. Defendants argue that because Guy is an unpublished case, it cannot be binding authority that puts officers on notice of a clearly established right. However, we agree with the district court that 'binding authority' is not required to overcome qualified immunity. 'Clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity 'means there must either be "controlling authority or a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority."'. . In addition, 'an action's unlawfulness can be "clearly established" from direct holdings, from specific examples describing certain conduct as prohibited, or from the general reasoning that a court employs.'")

Young v. Kent County Sheriff's Department, No. 21-1222, 2022 WL 94990, at *8 (6th Cir. Jan. 10, 2022) (Murphy, J., dissenting) (not reported) [N]o case of ours clearly established that their split-second decision to deploy pepper spray and a taser on an inmate who had caused a disturbance in a jail was unreasonable under the circumstances. . . My colleagues cite only one jail-specific case holding that an officer used excessive force: Guy v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville & Davidson County, 687 F. App'x 471 (6th Cir. 2017). . . . Guy does not rebut Jourden's and Clark's qualified-immunity defense. To begin with, I question whether we can rely on this unpublished decision at all to show that the law clearly prohibited the deputies' conduct. Other circuit courts have noted that '[u]npublished cases ... do not serve as binding precedent and cannot be relied upon to define clearly established law.'. . That is because another panel of our court could simply refuse to follow Guy at a later date in a published decision. . . How can Guy 'clearly establish' anything for officers if it does not clearly establish anything for us?")

Rhodes v. Michigan, 10 F.4th 665, 674, 679-83 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Eighth Amendment claims predicated on dangerous prison working conditions are reviewed under the same deliberate-indifference standard as other conditions-of-confinement challenges. Applying the standard here, we conclude that the evidence, when viewed in the light most favorable to Rhodes, makes out a violation of the Eighth Amendment by both Jones and McPherson. . . . The instability of the heavy laundry carts and lack of any safety device to prevent tipping posed a serious danger to the laundry porters standing below, who are expected to control the carts with nothing but their hands. The testimony of the witnesses to Rhodes's accident—including Jones and McPherson themselves—acknowledging that handling the laundry carts was dangerous confirms that Rhodes's work as a laundry porter entailed an objectively substantial risk of serious harm. . . . Here, the inquiry should focus on whether, at the time of Rhodes's incident, it was clearly established that the Eighth Amendment's conditions-of-confinement protections applied to prison work conditions, such that a reasonable prison official would know that they would violate a prison worker's constitutional rights by knowingly or recklessly disregarding a known excessive risk to the prison worker's health and safety in that environment. This approach is neither too general (as it would be if the right were defined as 'the right to be free of cruel and unusual punishments' or 'the right against prison officials' deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm') nor overly specific (as it would be if the right were defined as 'the right not to have a prison official recklessly fling a 400-pound laundry cart onto a prison laundry porter'). . . . With the right defined, there remains the question of whether it was clearly established as of October 15, 2015. . . . Although the Supreme Court has broadly pronounced that the Eighth Amendment requires prison officials to 'take reasonable measures to guarantee the safety of the inmates,'. . . it has not specifically applied the Eighth Amendment's deliberate-indifference standard to a claim predicated on unsafe working conditions. Thus, Rhodes relies on lower-court precedent to demonstrate that Jones and McPherson violated her clearly established Eighth Amendment rights. Rhodes immediately finds strong support for her position in our sibling circuits, concentrating on precedent from the Eighth and Ninth Circuits that holds that a prison official's deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of significant harm to prison workers constitutes a violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . . The Eighth and Ninth Circuits are far from alone in their holdings. . . . [A]t least five federal courts of appeals have all held that prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment where they disregard a known risk to the prison worker's health and safety in the course of their work, thereby displaying deliberate indifference. These decisions came well before Rhodes was injured on October 15, 2015, and Jones and McPherson have pointed to absolutely no authority suggesting that these cases are inconsistent with Supreme Court or other circuit-court precedent. . . .In cases like this one, where an array of our sibling circuits have acted in concert on an issue, we have not hesitated to hold that out-of-circuit precedent has clearly established a constitutional right. . . Indeed, our own cases foreshadowed this circuit's agreement with the Second, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth Circuit's lockstep approach to Eighth Amendment claims predicated on unsafe prison-working conditions. Consistent with the Supreme Court's broad declarations that the Eighth Amendment requires prison officials to 'take reasonable measures to guarantee the safety of the inmates,'. . . we have applied the Eighth Amendment deliberate-indifference standard to a wide assortment of conditions-of-confinement claims[.] . . And although we have not yet applied the standard to a case involving unsafe prison-working conditions in a published decision, we have in unpublished opinions. . . . Together with our cases, the on-point precedent from the Second, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth Circuits, clearly established Rhodes's asserted Eighth Amendment right prior to October 15, 2015. Although none of those cases precisely dealt with factual scenarios where a prison official flung a 300–400-pound laundry cart at an unprepared prison worker, the out-of-circuit cases uniformly held liable prison officials exhibiting deliberate indifference to a known risk in an assortment of prison workplaces. This was sufficient to put a reasonable prison official on notice that their recklessly disregarding a known risk to a prison worker's safety would not just be irresponsible, but would violate that person's right to be free from 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain' under the Eighth Amendment. . . Accordingly, the district court erred in granting summary judgment in favor of Jones and McPherson on Rhodes's Eighth Amendment claims.") Rhodes v. Michigan, 10 F.4th 665, 689-95 (6th Cir. 2021) (Thapar, J., dissenting) ("The majority ignores the fact that Rhodes was not compelled to work as a laundry porter. By doing so, the majority strains the deliberate-indifference standard beyond its logical limits. But that's just the first misstep. The majority next falters by denying qualified immunity for Jones and McPherson. It is not clearly established law that a workplace injury can amount to an unconstitutional punishment just because it happened in prison. Thus, qualified immunity should shield Jones and McPherson. As state officials, prison guards are immune from an inmate's claim for money damages unless their conduct violated 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . A right is clearly established if it is 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . To defeat the immunity bar, a plaintiff must identify a Supreme Court case or a published opinion from our circuit that recognizes a rights violation on similar facts. Unpublished orders are not enough since they carry only persuasive authority. . . The only exception is when a rights violation is so obvious that any reasonable official would understand what the law forbids without the benefit of a court case. . . .The majority concedes that no cases from our circuit clearly establish the rights violation alleged here. . . That alone should weigh heavily in our analysis. . . Yet the majority plows on, relying on a handful of cases from other circuits. But even these cases miss the mark. Each of them, like Estelle and Farmer, involves a prison guard who ordered an inmate into a dangerous situation. That compulsion is missing here. And that should be enough to end the matter. . . . In short, nothing in the record supports the conclusion that Rhodes was compelled to work in a dangerous environment. Even on the day of the accident, the record shows that the guards didn't order Rhodes to unload a single laundry bin. While all acknowledge that the laundry detail was dangerous, Rhodes volunteered for the position just like an ordinary worker. And she could and did recover just like any worker. Simply put, absent any evidence that Rhodes was forced into a dangerous circumstance because she was a prisoner, the guards' conduct does not constitute punishment. . . .Though neither original meaning nor current precedent consider Rhodes's injury punishment, Rhodes could still seek damages just like any other Michigan employee. She did, and she recovered for her injury. But by the majority's lights, the Eighth Amendment transforms prisons into a place where employees get rights above and beyond those of ordinary workers. That was not the meaning of the Eighth Amendment at the Founding. And it is not the meaning today. . . In the last forty years, the Supreme Court has given the Eighth Amendment an expansive reading that goes beyond what its text and history can sustain. But even those decisions appear restrained compared to the majority's innovation. By holding that a reckless workplace injury becomes a constitutional violation when (and only when) it takes place within a prison, the majority accelerates our doctrine's departure from the Punishments Clause's original meaning. I respectfully dissent.")

Ashford v. Raby, 951 F.3d 798, 801, 803-04 (6th Cir. 2020) ("[E]ven if Raby's use of force was unreasonable, Ashford still can't recover unless its unreasonableness was 'clearly established at the time.'. . That's a tough standard. How tough? Well, Ashford must show that 'then-existing precedent' put the illegality of Raby's conduct 'beyond debate.'. . The law must have been so clear that every reasonable officer in Raby's shoes would have recognized that the force used was excessive—and not just in the abstract but in the precise situation Raby was facing. . . That means that Ashford must point to precedent finding a Fourth Amendment violation in similar circumstances or (failing that) show that this is 'the rare "obvious case"' in which no precedent is needed. . . So can Ashford show that Raby violated his clearly established rights? He cannot. . . . At the very least, Raby's choice to deploy the dog was not 'plainly incompetent' and did not violate clearly established law. . . Ashford can point to no binding authority holding that deploying a police dog in similar circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Indeed, most of this circuit's excessive-force precedents involving police dogs find no violation at all. . . . Ashford cites only two out-of-circuit cases to show that Raby should have known his use of force was unreasonably prolonged. . . But as a threshold matter, our sister circuits' precedents are usually irrelevant to the 'clearly established' inquiry. The only exception is for 'extraordinary' cases where out-of-circuit decisions 'both point unmistakably to' a holding and are 'so clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt' regarding that holding. . . . This general rule against out-of-circuit authority makes perfect sense. Why? Because at its heart, the 'clearly established' requirement comes down to fair notice. . . Reasonable officers in this circuit will pay attention to this court's caselaw. After all, that's the law that governs their actions. But we can't expect officers to keep track of persuasive authority from every one of our sister circuits. . . They spend their time trying to protect the public, not reading casebooks. . . . In the end, nothing about Raby's use of Ruger to seize Ashford violated clearly established law. Thus, Raby is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Brown v. Battle Creek Police Dep't., 844 F.3d 556, 566-67, 572 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Based on the precedent set forth by a large number of this Court's sister circuits, we hold that as a matter of first impression there is a constitutional right under the Fourth Amendment to not have one's dog unreasonably seized. . . .As to Defendants' argument that it was not clearly established in 2013 that the seizure of a dog was a Fourth Amendment event, we hold that Defendants had reasonable notice that unreasonably shooting Plaintiffs' dogs would constitute the 'seizure' of an 'effect' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Every circuit that has considered this issue has concluded that the unreasonable killing of a dog constitutes an unconstitutional 'seizure' of personal property under the Fourth Amendment. . . .The Supreme Court and this Circuit have yet to decide this issue. Nevertheless, given the fact that every sister circuit that has confronted this issue has concluded that an individual has a property right in their dog, and that a district court within this Circuit has concluded the same, we hold that this right was clearly established in 2013 when the conduct in this action occurred. Therefore, we must next determine whether the seizures of the two dogs in the instant case were reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . .[T]he standard we set out today is that a police officer's use of deadly force against a dog while executing a warrant to search a home for illegal drug activity is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment when, given the totality of the circumstances and viewed from the perspective of an objectively reasonable officer, the dog poses an imminent threat to the officer's safety. . . .Similar to Altman, the officers here confronted two large pit bulls for the first time in an unsupervised environment where they were unleashed and in an enclosed space with the officers. Given Jones' criminal history, gang affiliations, the types of drugs he was suspected of distributing, the fact that the officers had no time to plan for the dogs, in addition to the officers' unrebutted testimony that the dogs either lunged or were barking aggressively at the officers, the nature and size of the dogs, the fact that the dogs were unleashed and loose in a small residence, all culminate into a finding that the officers acted reasonably when they shot and killed the two dogs. Viewing the facts and all reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, we find that a jury would conclude that Officer Klein, Officer Young, and Officer Case acted reasonably in shooting and killing Plaintiffs' dogs. Summary judgment was therefore appropriate.")

Hall v. Sweet, 666 F. App'x 469, ___ & n.9 (6th Cir. 2016) ("A single district court opinion is not enough to pronounce a right is clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. While a district court opinion may be persuasive in showing there is a clearly established right—perhaps by exposing a trend in non-precedential case law—it is not controlling on its own. . . . The same is true in other circuits. [collecting cases]; but see Tarabochia v. Adkins, 766 F.3d 1115, 1125 (9th Cir. 2014) ("[i]n the absence of binding precedent clearly establishing the constitutional right, we look to whatever decisional law is available including decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts") (internal quotations removed). . . .Further, even were we to consider O'Donnel, the proposition for which plaintiffs cite the case was extinguished by this circuit's directly contrary holding in Andrews. It cannot be said O'Donnel placed a constitutional question 'beyond debate' when later, in Andrews, this circuit found the very same question did not have a clear answer. In short, decisions from this court stand for the proposition that, between 2008 and 2011, it was not clearly established in any district of this circuit that the Fourth Amendment applied to social workers conducting a search of a home relating to the wellbeing of children. . . This uncertainty in whether the Fourth Amendment applies to investigations related to child wellbeing contributes to a finding that defendants were not on clear notice whether their conduct violated the law.")

Hall v. Sweet, 666 F. App'x 469, ___ (6th Cir. 2016) (White, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (not published) ("I disagree with the majority's conclusion that the law was not clearly established as to whether social workers are subject to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirements. The majority correctly identifies Andrews as the controlling precedent on this issue. There, this court reaffirmed that to determine whether there was a clearly established right, 'a district court looks to binding precedent by the Supreme Court, its court of appeals or itself.' Andrews v. Hickman Cty., Tenn., 700 F.3d 845, 862 n.7 (6th Cir. 2012). '[W]e look first to decisions of the Supreme Court, then to our own decisions and those of other courts within the circuit, and then to decisions of other Courts of Appeal.'. . As the majority notes, the Western District of Michigan, where this case originated, held in 2004 that 'the Fourth Amendment applies to [social workers], as it does to all other officers and agents of the state[.] ... There is ... no social worker exception to the strictures of the Fourth Amendment.' . . Since O'Donnel predated the challenged searches, it is sufficient to create a clearly established constitutional right in this context. This is especially true considering many other circuits had already decided that social workers are not exempt from the Fourth Amendment. [collecting cases] This large body of circuit authority, coupled with at least one case from the Western District of Michigan, clearly established at the time of the searches that social workers are subject to the Fourth Amendment's strictures. Because the second search violated Hall's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights, I would affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity as to that search and remand for further proceedings.")

Brent v. Wenk, 555 F. App'x 519, 526, 527 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Collectively, Andrews and Kovacic indicate that before this court decided Andrews in 2012, a social worker entering a home without a warrant did not violate clearly established law, but a social worker removing a child without a warrant did. Brent does not allege that his children were removed in violation of the Fourth Amendment; he instead challenges the warrantless entry into his home. Andrews therefore controls this case, meaning that the social workers are entitled to qualified immunity on Brent's Fourth Amendment claim. Brent does not challenge this interpretation of Andrews, but instead argues that Andrews was wrongly decided. He relies on decisions of district courts within this circuit and the decisions of other circuits to establish that there has never been a social-worker exemption to the Fourth Amendment. Brent's argument is without merit. First, Andrews belies Brent's argument by holding that there was no clearly established law regarding a social worker exemption in 2008, when the events in Andrews took place. And Brent cites no case that would indicate a change in this circuit's law between 2008 and 2010, when the events of this case took place. Second, and relatedly, '[w]hen determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established, we look first to decisions of the Supreme Court, then to our own decisions and those of other courts within the circuit, and then to decisions of other Courts of Appeal.' Andrews, 700 F.3d at 853. Brent's reliance on district court cases within this circuit and on the law of other circuits is therefore unavailing. Because our circuit in Andrews held that there was no clearly established law regarding the Fourth Amendment's applicability to social workers in 2008, that determination controls this case. We therefore reverse the judgment of the district court and grant the social workers qualified immunity on Brent's Fourth Amendment claims.")

Toms v. Taft, 338 F.3d 519, 527 n.5 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Although courts engaging in qualified immunity analyses often consider only case law when determining whether the right at issue was clearly established, the Supreme Court in Hope also considered a Department of Justice report and an Alabama Department of Corrections regulation in deciding whether the officials were on notice that their conduct violated the plaintiff's rights. . . In this case, therefore, while not dispositive, it is appropriate to consider the ODRC's policy, on which Brigano apparently relied, that 'all preparatory obligations, such as securing a marriage license, are the sole responsibility of the couple to wed,' in determining whether he knowingly violated plaintiffs' rights.").

Heggen v. Lee, 284 F.3d 675, 687 (6th Cir. 2002) ("Defendant's reliance on Cope is misplaced. This Court in Cope expressly stated that the parties had pointed to no law from the Sixth Circuit or the United States Supreme Court that would have put the county clerk on notice that her actions were unconstitutional. Defendant is foreclosed from arguing the same in the instant case because of Hall. The record shows that the actual duties of deputies in Hopkins County are essentially the same type of nonpolicymaking duties performed by the plaintiff in Hall. It is undisputed that Defendant informed Plaintiffs that they would not be rehired in late December 1998, more than a year after Hall was decided in October 1997. We believe that the right of these Plaintiffs to be free from patronage dismissals was 'sufficiently clear,' such that after Hall, a reasonable official would have understood that taking such an action against them for political reasons was unconstitutional.").

Risbridger v. Connelly, 275 F.3d 565, 569, 572 (6th Cir. 2002) ("A right is clearly established if there is binding precedent from the Supreme Court, the Sixth Circuit, the district court itself, or other circuits that is directly on point. . . . . Given the Supreme Court's express reservation of the question of whether a Fourth Amendment right to refuse to provide identification during a valid Terry stop renders invalid an arrest that is based on probable cause to believe the individual has violated a presumptively valid state or local law, as well as the lack of clear precedent from our circuit, we join the Seventh, Eighth, and Tenth Circuits and find that the contours of such a right were not sufficiently clear that the unlawfulness of plaintiff's arrest must have been apparent at the time.").

Williams v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 24 F.3d 1526, 1537 (6th Cir. 1994) ("The First and Fifth Circuits have indicated in dicta without discussion that they would apply Loudermill to demotions. . . Two published opinions of district courts from other circuits have balanced the competing interests and found that a tenured public employee is entitled to a Loudermill hearing before being demoted. . . Therefore, the only authorities that clearly recognize a right to predemotion notice and hearing are the two district court opinions. . . . These decisions are not 'so clearly foreshadowed by' Loudermill or opinions in this circuit 'as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that' not giving a tenured employee notice and hearing before a demotion would violate the employee's due process rights.").

Long v. Norris, 929 F.2d 1111 (6th Cir. 1991) (look first to decisions of Supreme Court, then to decisions of this court and other courts within circuit, and finally to decisions of other circuits).

Ohio Civil Service Employees Association v. Seiter, 858 F.2d 1171, 1177 (6th Cir.1988) ("[I]n the ordinary instance, to find a clearly established constitutional right, a district court must find binding precedent by the Supreme Court, its court of appeals or itself. In an extraordinary case, it may be possible for the decisions of other courts to clearly establish a principle of law. For the decisions of other courts to provide such 'clearly established law,' these decisions must both point unmistakably to the unconstitutionality of the conduct complained of and be so clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that his conduct. . . would be found wanting.").

Stewart v. City of Memphis, No. 2:16-CV-02574-SHM, 2019 WL 332812, at *10–12 (W.D. Tenn. Jan. 25, 2019), aff'd, 788 F. App'x 341 (6th Cir. 2019) ("The Court has a duty to conduct its own review of relevant precedent to determine whether an asserted right was clearly established. See Elder v. Holloway, 510 U.S. 510, 516 (1994); DiLuzio v. Village of Yorkville, 796 F.3d 604, 608 (6th Cir. 2015). Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights is not to the contrary. 858 F.3d 988, 993 (6th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff in Arrington-Bey sued officers who had arrested her mentally ill son for taking him to jail instead of a hospital. . . The court found that, under the facts confronting the officers, there was no clearly established right for someone like plaintiff's son to be taken to a hospital. . . The court noted that it could have ruled against plaintiff solely because she had failed to cite a case that clearly established the asserted right. . . However, the court came to its decision only after conducting an independent review of the law. . . Any language suggesting that a court can rely only on the cases a plaintiff cites would be dicta. To the extent Schilling argues for a broader application of Arrington-Bey, an application that would require Plaintiffs to cite a specific case under all circumstances, his argument is inconsistent with Elder v. Holloway. There, the Supreme Court rejected the principle that a court must decide whether a constitutional right was clearly established by relying solely on cases plaintiffs cite. . . In Elder,

the court reviewed a rule the Ninth Circuit had adopted in qualified immunity cases: the appellate court must disregard relevant legal authority not presented to, or considered by, the district court. . . Rejecting that rule, the Elder Court held that, 'review of qualified immunity dispositions is to be conducted in light of all relevant precedents, not simply those cited to, or discovered by, the district court.'. . Elder instructs a circuit court deciding whether a constitutional right was clearly established to 'use its "full knowledge of its own [and other relevant] precedents."'. . Elder rejected the notion that a circuit court can rest solely on cases plaintiffs cite to it or cases cited to or considered by the district court. That rule applies in the first instance in the district court. Whether a right was clearly established is a question of law. . . Like all questions of law, a district court's analysis is not limited to the precise contours of a plaintiff's legal argument. District courts, like circuit courts, have a duty to undertake their own review of 'all relevant precedents.'. . Plaintiffs do indeed have the burden of establishing that Schilling is not entitled to qualified immunity. Meeting that burden does not require Plaintiffs to cite a specific case showing that Stewart's constitutional right was clearly established. . . . Bouggess is factually similar to this case, although the facts are not identical. In Bouggess, a suspect physically struggled with an officer, broke free, ran about ten feet, and was shot three times in the back. . . The suspect did not bite the officer, twist his genitals, or do anything similarly combative. . . In Carden, 699 F. App'x at 498, a unanimous panel held that Bouggess clearly established that a constitutional violation occurred under facts substantially identical to, and in a number of ways more serious than, the facts in this case. An officer volunteered to assist a man stopped on the side of the road tending to a flat tire. . . The man declined. . . The officer ran the license plate and saw that it did not match the vehicle registration. . . When the officer approached again, the man punched twice at the officer and ran. . . The officer tackled the man and a struggle ensued. . . During the struggle, the two exchanged punches and the man repeatedly grabbed for the officer's gun. . . The officer used his taser, but it did not subdue the man. . . The officer eventually became entangled in the taser wires and suffered shocks. . . The man then got on top of the officer. . . The man did not reach for the officer's gun from that position. . . The man let go of the officer, stood up, turned away from the officer, and started to flee. . . The man 'made it about one step' before the officer shot him in the back. . . The man died of his wounds. . . The court held that the officer's actions violated the man's clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force because 'the law at the time of the encounter clearly established that deadly force would be excessive if used against an unarmed, fleeing felon who the officer lacked probable cause to believe posed a threat of serious physical harm.'. . The court in Carden held that the man did not pose a serious threat of harm to the officer when the officer shot him. A fortiori, Stewart did not pose a serious threat of harm to Schilling when Schilling shot him. The man in Carden was significantly more violent than the Court must assume Stewart was. The difference of shot location –-back versus front and side –-is not material. Physical distance is the more relevant factor in determining whether someone is a greater or lesser threat. The physical distances in this case and Carden were virtually the same. Carden's reading of Bouggess and application of Bouggess to the Carden facts establish that Stewart's constitutional right to be free of excessive force was clearly established. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Schilling violated Stewart's clearly established

Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. He is not entitled to qualified immunity. Schilling's Motion for Summary Judgment is DENIED.")

XXL of Ohio, Inc. Commerce v. City of Broadview Heights, No. 1:01CV2514, 2003 WL 23219809, at *44 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 24, 2003) (not reported) ("In the instant case, qualified immunity cannot protect the mayor and city council members of Broadview Heights from liability. On January 21, 2000 the Federal District Court for the Northen District of Ohio issued its decision in North Olmsted. XXL offers evidence to support, and defendants do not deny, that attorneys for Broadview Heights drew defendants' attention to the decision in North Olmsted and warned that the decision indicated that Broadview Heights' sign code was problematic. The city began issuing citations to XXL for violations of the sign ordinance on August 20, 2000. Any reasonable official in the position of the mayor and city council members of Broadview Heights would have known in light of North Olmsted that enforcement of Broadview Heights' sign ordinance against XXL violated XXL's clearly established rights under the First Amendment.").

Coy v. Bd. of Education of the North Canton City Schools, 205 F. Supp.2d 791, 805, 806 (N.D. Ohio 2002) ("The defendants say that because neither the Sixth Circuit nor courts within the Sixth Circuit have addressed the issue of student websites and the First Amendment, the constitutional right at issue was not clearly established. . . . The Court disagrees. As discussed above, Tinker applies to this case. The Sixth Circuit has discussed and applied Tinker on numerous occasions. . . . And while the Sixth Circuit has not directly dealt with the issue of a student website and the First Amendment, other courts have. . . . Once it is determined that the right is clearly established, the Court must determine whether the plaintiffs have alleged facts supported by sufficient evidence to indicate Stanley's and Shoup's actions were objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established constitutional right. . . . As discussed above, there are material issues of genuine fact as to the motivation behind Stanley's and Shoup's decision to discipline Jon Coy. Therefore, the Court holds that Defendants Stanley and Shoup are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 551-52 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Clark's right to be free from deliberate indifference to his risk of suicide while he was in custody was clearly established at the time of his death in 2012. . . .Walker responds to this substantial body of case law in several ways. First, he argues that it is 'doubtful' whether circuit precedent can clearly establish law for purposes of qualified immunity. He cites two Supreme Court cases, but both cases leave this question unanswered. See Taylor v. Barkes, 579 U.S. —, —, 135 S. Ct. 2042, 2045 (2015); City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U.S. —, —, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1776 (2015). Other Supreme Court cases indicate circuit precedent is adequate for these purposes. See, e.g., Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 617 (1999) ("Petitioners have not brought to our attention any cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which they seek to rely."). In addition, we have exercised this authority for decades, including in this specific context of prison and jail suicides. See Hall, 957 F.2d at 404–05; see also Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751, 762 (7th Cir. 2016). We see no reason to depart from these precedents.")

Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751, 762 & n.28 (7th Cir. 2016) ("In conducting the clearly established inquiry, our first task is to consider controlling Supreme Court and Seventh Circuit precedent. . . Our earlier discussion makes evident that the precedent of the Supreme Court and of our court certainly did not provide adequate guidance to permit the defendants to understand their responsibilities in the face of the tangle of overlapping laws and regulations that Wisconsin had created. . . We therefore must 'cast a wider net' and look to whether 'all relevant case law' demonstrates "such a clear trend ... that we can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by a controlling precedent was merely a question of time.'. . In this respect, Mr. Werner identifies a line of Wisconsin state court decisions. . . .We are not alone in looking to trends in the decisional law of other jurisdictions once we are satisfied that controlling precedent in our own circuit does not clearly establish a particular legal right. [collecting cases]") Sutterfield v. City of Milwaukee, 751 F.3d 542, 551, 573-79 (7th Cir. 2014) ("It will no doubt be frustrating to Sutterfield and to the reader that we do not reach firm conclusions as to the merits of all of the claims she has asserted and instead, like the district court, resolve the case in part based on the doctrine of qualified immunity. We recognize the significant role that resolving the merits of each claim plays in the development of precedent and clarifying the boundaries of constitutional rights. . . But given the importance of the interests at stake, the lack of clarity in the case law, and the shallowness of the briefing as to the alternatives available to the police on the facts presented here, we believe that the tentative nature of some of our analysis is appropriate. . . .Sutterfield contends that because Wisconsin precedent would not bind this court on the merits of her claims, and because in particular we, in contrast to the Wisconsin courts, have refused to extend the community caretaking doctrine to anything but automobile searches, the Wisconsin cases are irrelevant in terms of whether the defendants have qualified immunity. Not so. Although it is true that in this court, the Wisconsin cases have persuasive value only on the merits of Sutterfield's federal claims, they remain relevant as to what the defendants might have thought the law, including the federal constitution, permitted them to do in executing the emergency statement of detention. Federal courts do not possess exclusive authority to decide Fourth Amendment issues; state courts resolve such issues every day. . . In the absence of a controlling decision by the United States Supreme Court, the Wisconsin cases are thus as relevant as our own precedents in evaluating what a Milwaukee police officer might have thought the law permitted in responding to a report that the occupant of a private dwelling was in danger of harming herself. . . . Although our decision in Pichany refused to extend the community caretaking exception recognized by the Supreme Court in Cady beyond the automobile context, Wisconsin courts have given the exception a much broader reach. They have relied on the community caretaking doctrine to justify warrantless entries into the home when the police have reason to believe that the occupant may be injured or otherwise in danger of harm. . . . Based on these decisions, the officers who forcibly entered Sutterfield's home could have believed that their entry was justified by the community caretaking doctrine as understood and applied by the Wisconsin courts. . . .The decision to forcibly open and search the locked compact disc case discovered in the course of the protective sweep presents a closer question in terms of the officers' qualified immunity, just as it does on the merits of Sutterfield's Fourth Amendment claim. No Wisconsin case that has been cited to us or that we have found has relied on the community caretaking doctrine to justify any search of the premises more intrusive than the sort of limited, protective sweep envisioned by Buie—that is, a search of places within the home that another person might be found. . .The gun, having been secured within a locked, opaque case, obviously was not in plain view, in contrast to the drugs found in both Horngren and Pinkard. Opening the case was a substantial step beyond the standard protective sweep, and constituted a more substantial intrusion on Sutterfield's privacy interests in her personal effects. . . . [T]he defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for the warrantless entry into Sutterfield's home, the search of the locked compact disc case, and the temporary seizure of the gun found inside of the case. The police were faced with a difficult situation in which they had reason to believe, based on her physician's report, that Sutterfield might pose a danger to herself, they were implementing an emergency detention of her person for evaluation pursuant to section 51.15, and they were logically attempting to find the firearm they had reason to believe Sutterfield possessed and to secure that firearm while Sutterfield was undergoing a mental health evaluation. Notwithstanding the uncertainty as to which legal framework best applies to the warrantless actions of the police in these circumstances, the police could have believed that Wisconsin precedents, if not the federal cases, authorized them to take these actions in order to protect Sutterfield's wellbeing as well as the well-being of anyone else, including her son, who might have access to her home in her absence. . . .Based on the Supreme Court's decision in Brigham City and this court's decision in Fitzgerald, we conclude that the warrantless entry into Sutterfield's home was justified. Under the circumstances confronting the defendant police officers, they had an objectively reasonable basis for believing that Sutterfield posed an imminent danger of harm to herself; the circumstances thus constituted an emergency which dispensed with the need for a warrant under the exigent circumstances exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement. Alternatively, even if the entry into Sutterfield's home was inconsistent with the Fourth Amendment, a reasonable person would not have known that the entry violated Sutterfield's clearly established rights; the officers would therefore be entitled to qualified immunity on the unlawful entry claim. Similarly, although we have assumed arguendo that both the search of the compact disc case in Sutterfield's home and the seizure of the (lawfully-possessed) gun found inside of that case were contrary to the Fourth Amendment, we conclude that the defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the unlawful search and seizure claims.")

Burgess v. Lowery, 201 F.3d 942, 944-46 (7th Cir. 2000) ("Even if our court had decided that strip searches of prison visitors were unconstitutional in the absence of reasonable suspicion, there might be enough doubt about the soundness of the decision, whether in light of decisions by other circuits before or after our decision or of intimations in Supreme Court decisions not squarely on point that our view might be erroneous, to justify the state in believing that the plaintiff's right was not yet 'clearly established' within the meaning of the cases on immunity. . . The Fifth Circuit has held the contrary, Brady v. Fort Bend County, 58 F.3d 173, 175 (5th Cir.1995); Boddie v. City of Columbus, 989 F.2d 745, 748 (5th Cir.1993), but with all respect we cannot believe that its view is correct. Suppose the only relevant case the Fifth Circuit had decided was very old, and every other circuit since had rejected the position taken in the Fifth Circuit's decision. It would be odd in such circumstances to suppose that right clearly established even in the Fifth Circuit, given that courts can and not infrequently do overrule decisions that seem clearly out of step with the rest of the legal universe. Equally, however, the absence of a decision by the Supreme Court or this court cannot be conclusive on the issue whether a right is clearly established in this circuit. There might be no decision in either court simply because the existence of the right was so clear, as a matter of the wording of a constitutional or statutory provision or decisions in other circuits or in the state courts, that no one thought it worth while to litigate the issue. . . To rule that until the Supreme Court has spoken, no right of litigants in this circuit can be deemed established before we have decided the issue would discourage anyone from being the first to bring a damages suit in this court; he would be certain to be unable to obtain any damages. . . . .The test, formulated with particular application to this case, ought to be whether a reasonable official in the position of these defendants, considering all relevant sources of guidance to the law, might have thought it reasonably possible that this court or eventually the U.S. Supreme Court would hold that strip searches of prison visitors are proper even without reasonable suspicion.").

McDonald v. Haskins, 966 F.2d 292, 294 (7th Cir. 1992) (plaintiff could rely on precedent from Third Circuit).

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Lane v. Nading, 927 F.3d 1018, 1022-24 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Even assuming that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment by failing to knock and announce their presence before entering Lane's dwelling, it was not clearly established in January 2015 that failing to knock and announce before entering the dwelling of a parolee was unlawful. That is because neither the Arkansas Supreme Court, this Court, nor the U.S. Supreme Court had spoken on the specific issue of whether the knock-and-announce requirement applies to parolees. Moreover, there existed no 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' addressing the issue at the time the officers entered Lane's dwelling. Lane essentially argues that a robust consensus of persuasive authority had established by January 2015 that the knock-and-announce requirement applies to parolees. To support his argument, he cites the Seventh Circuit's Green v. Butler decision, . . . a pair of district-court decisions, . . . and an intermediate appellate-court decision out of California. . . We disagree. It is true that the cases Lane cites generally hold that an officer must knock and announce his presence before entering a parolee's dwelling. However, we do not consider a consensus based on the decision of a single circuit and a handful of lower courts to be 'robust.' [collecting cases] . . . . While we recognize that Samson does not address the issue of whether the knock-and-announce rule applies to parolees, it certainly stands for the proposition that parolees may be treated differently than non-parolees for some Fourth Amendment purposes. Given that proposition and the fact that the Supreme Court decided Samson after the Seventh Circuit decided Green, we hold it would not have been clear to every reasonable officer in the defendant officers' positions that failing to knock and announce his presence before entering and searching Lane's hotel room violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Because the law was not clear, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jacobson v. McCormick, 763 F.3d 914, 918 (8th Cir. 2014) ("To overcome qualified immunity, a plaintiff typically must identify either 'cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident' or 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.' Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 617 (1999). Neither criterion is satisfied here. . . . In our view, two decisions from other circuits did not place the issue beyond debate, and a reasonable correctional officer in Minnesota could have believed—like the district court in this very case—that Jacobson's admission that he recently smoked a bowl of marijuana gave reasonable suspicion to believe that he could be secreting contraband in private areas of his body. McCormick and Voltaire are thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Galarnyk v. Fraser, 687 F.3d 1070, 1076 (8th Cir. 2012) ('In McCabe, we held the '[l]ack of probable cause is a necessary element of' a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim. . . In Reichle v. Howards. . . the Supreme Court determined 'two federal law enforcement agents [were] immune from suit for allegedly arresting a suspect in retaliation for his political speech, when the agents had probable cause to arrest the suspect for committing a federal crime.' The Supreme Court concluded 'that, at the time of [the defendant's] arrest [in 2006], it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could violate the First Amendment.'. . The Supreme Court declined to decide 'whether a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim may lie despite the presence of probable cause to support the arrest,'. . . leaving our conclusion in McCabe intact. Accordingly, the district court did not err in holding the presence of probable cause to arrest Galarnyk for trespass defeated Galarnyk's First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim.')

Irving v. Dormire, 519 F.3d 441, 451 (8th Cir. 2008) ("It is true that we have on occasion afforded the protection of qualified immunity in situations in which a split of authority exists on the constitutional question at issue. . . . Nevertheless, and notwithstanding the lack of a decision squarely on point within our circuit, we conclude that, given the clear weight of authority in the circuits that have ruled on the question, Brigance was on fair notice that to falsely label an inmate a snitch is to unreasonably subject that inmate to the threat of a substantial risk of serious harm at the hands of his fellow inmates. After all, who better knows the opprobrium and consequent effect thereof that attaches to the label of snitch than those who work daily within the inmate population. Thus, we hold that a reasonable prison guard in Brigance's position would have known that to label Irving a snitch would violate his constitutional right to protection from harm.").

Hill v. McKinley, 311 F.3d 899, 910 (8th Cir. 2002) (Hansen, J. , dissenting) ("In examining our own case law, as well as that of the Supreme Court and other circuits, I conclude that at the time of Ms. Hill's arrest and detention, the officers had 'fair warning' that their treatment of Ms. Hill was unconstitutional.").

Turner v. Arkansas Insurance Dep't., 297 F.3d 751, 758 (8th Cir. 2002) ("When making the determination of whether the law was 'clearly established' at the time the alleged violation occurred, we are obligated to include the decisions of the district courts. . . A thorough review of these decisions show that the overwhelming majority of cases reaching the issue concluded that an employee's at-will status did not preclude the maintenance of an action under ' 1981. . . . This leads us to the question whether one Supreme Court case, which strongly implies that Turner's position is the correct one, plus two courts of appeals cases and fifteen district court opinions that expressly state that Turner's position is the correct one, is enough to show the law in question was 'clearly established.' We hold that it does. Determining whether the law is 'clearly established' is not a precise science. The determination is, however, a balancing of all available precedential decisional law on point, with the greatest effect given to decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Next, we look within our own circuit, and where there is no law on point we then canvass the other courts of appeals, the district courts, and state courts, [footnote omitted] giving each decision on point its requisite weight. In our view, the fact that two circuit cases and fifteen district court cases directly support a proposition and the Supreme Court implicitly supports that same position is sufficient to demonstrate that the law was 'clearly established' as of September 23, 1999.").

Turner v. Arkansas Insurance Dep't., 297 F.3d 751, 758 (8th Cir. 2002) (Bye, J., dissenting) ("The court deduces 'clearly established' law from a Supreme Court decision overruled by Congress, four evenly-divided circuit court decisions, and fifteen district court decisions against four. The court's approach (and its nose count) conflict with earlier cases in our circuit, and I can only wonder what the government and municipal lawyers practicing in our circuit will take from this case.").

Vaughn v. Ruoff, 253 F.3d 1124, 1129, 1130 (8th Cir. 2001) ("We subscribe to a broad view of the concept of clearly established law, and we look to all available decisional law, including decisions from other courts, federal and state, when there is no binding precedent in this circuit. . . Even in the complete absence of any decisions involving similar facts, a right can be clearly established if a reasonable public official would have known her conduct was unconstitutional. . . . We have not found any cases with facts similar to those in this case. This does not, however, carry the day for Ruoff. Numerous pre-1994 cases show that minimum procedures regularly precede state compelled sterilizations, and some clearly establish that pre-sterilization procedures are constitutionally required. [citing cases from other jurisdictions]. . . Furthermore, any reasonable social worker–indeed, any reasonable person, social worker or not–would have known that a sterilization is compelled, not voluntary, if it is consented to under the coercive threat of losing one's children, and hence unconstitutional.").

Buckley v. Rogerson, 133 F.3d 1125, 1129-31 (8th Cir. 1998) ("[Defendant] bears the burden of proving that this right [a constitutional right to specific medical approval of segregation and restraint for prison mental patients] was not clearly established. As we have noted in previous cases, this court has taken a 'broad view' of what constitutes clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity." Court relies on federal district court decisions from Missouri, Michigan and New York to find right clearly established.).

Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1049 (8th Cir. 1989) (taking into consideration identity of a court, its geographical proximity, dissemination of information within the pertinent profession and frequency of similar litigation when determining whether reasonable official would be aware of the law).

Konop v. Northwestern School District, 26 F. Supp.2d 1189, 1194-96, 1201 (D.S.D. 1998) ("The defendants assert, and correctly so, that there is apparently no case decided by the United States Supreme Court, by the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, by any District Court in the Eighth Circuit, or by the South Dakota Supreme Court involving strip searches in a school setting. They then argue that the law in the Eighth Circuit therefore cannot be 'clearly established.' Defendants rely on Jenkins By Hall v. Talladega City Board of Education . . . in arguing that the law can be clearly established in the District of South Dakota only by decisions from the United States Supreme Court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, U.S. District Courts in the District of South Dakota, or the South Dakota Supreme Court. The Court rejects this contention, relying on Eighth Circuit precedent. [citing Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1049 (8th Cir.1989)] . . . . Taking the argument of defendants to its logical conclusion would tell us that there must be factual identity between a prior case and the case under consideration. This would result in 'absolute immunity', not 'qualified immunity.' In other words, any school official would receive one 'bite of the apple', regardless of the nature of the conduct. . . . The implication of Lanier is that to possibly establish civil rights liability (i.e. to 'get past' the qualified immunity defense and to allow the jury as the finder of the facts to decide the facts), there must be 'fair warning' of the constitutional right or rights and there is no requirement that this warning be found in prior Supreme Court precedent or factually similar precedent elsewhere. Lanier also stands for the proposition that general principles of law can provide fair warning. . . . Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment right to be free of unreasonable searches in the school setting was clearly established at the time of the searches. . . T.L.O. established in 1985 that a search in the school setting must be justified and reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which are claimed to have justified the search. . . . T.L.O. has been applied time and time again and certain rules are clear: (1) a strip search is not justified absent individualized suspicion unless there is a legitimate safety concern (e.g.weapons); (2) school officials must be investigating allegations of violations of the law or school rules and only individual accusations justify a strip search; and (3) strip searches must be designed to be minimally intrusive, taking into account the item for which the search is conducted. The reasonableness standard set forth in T.L.O. was clearly established and should have been applied by defendants. It was in fact applied time after time by various Circuit and District Courts to factual scenarios having some similarity to the present case.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Ballentine v. Tucker, 28 F.4th 54, 64-67 (9th Cir. 2022) ("To determine if a right was clearly established, '[t]he relevant inquiry is whether, at the time of the officers' action, the state of the law gave the officers fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional.'. . Accordingly, we look to the state of the law that concerned conduct at the time of the challenged police action. At the outset, Detective Tucker argues that the law was not clearly established at the time of his conduct in 2013 because the Supreme Court's decision in Nieves did not clarify the appropriate standard for First Amendment retaliation claims until 2019. But a right can also be clearly established by this circuit's precedent. . . Contrary to Detective Tucker's characterization of Plaintiffs' claims, Plaintiffs did not merely 'describe the "clearly established" right in general terms like "retaliatory law enforcement action."'. . Rather, Plaintiffs defined the right as 'the right to be free from retaliatory law enforcement action even when probable cause existed for that action.'. . In so doing, Plaintiffs defined the right as we did in Skoog and Ford.. . . Thus, at the time of Detective Tucker's conduct in July 2013, binding Ninth Circuit precedent gave fair notice that it would be unlawful to arrest Plaintiffs in retaliation for their First Amendment activity, notwithstanding the existence of probable cause. . . . Detective Tucker argues that our decision in Acosta, 718 F.3d at 806, created uncertainty as to the state of the law. But Detective Tucker misunderstands Acosta. There, police arrested Acosta in January 2006 for violating a municipal ordinance prohibiting disorderly conduct at city council meetings. . . We correctly concluded that 'at the time of the Council meeting,' there was no clearly established right to be free from a retaliatory arrest otherwise supported by probable cause. . . Since Acosta only addressed the state of the law in January 2006, it has no effect on the state of the law in July 2013, the time of Detective Tucker's conduct. Neither Skoog nor Ford had any place in the Acosta inquiry. In contrast, by the time of Detective Tucker's conduct in 2013, Skoog had clearly established the right. That the decision in Acosta was issued in 2013 is therefore irrelevant because the decisive inquiry is the state of the law at the time of the challenged conduct. . . . Finally, Detective Tucker argues that the facts of then-existing case law are distinguishable from the facts of this case. But '[a] right can be clearly established despite a lack of factually analogous preexisting case law, and officers can be on notice that their conduct is unlawful even in novel factual circumstances.' . . . By the time of Detective Tucker's conduct, Ninth Circuit precedent had long provided notice to officers that 'an individual has a right to be free from retaliatory police action, even if probable cause existed for that action.'. . Detective Tucker's belief that his conduct was not unlawful because he thoroughly investigated and made the decision to arrest after lesser alternatives failed does not vitiate such notice. A reasonable officer in Detective Tucker's position had fair notice that the First Amendment prohibited arresting Plaintiffs for the content of their speech, notwithstanding probable cause. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to Detective Tucker.")

DePaul Industries v. Miller, 14 F.4th 1021, 1029 (9th Cir. 2021) ("We have explained that '[w]e have been somewhat hesitant to rely on district court decisions' as clearly establishing law for purposes of qualified immunity. . . This case validates our hesitancy to rely on district court decisions for the qualified immunity analysis. In sum, DePaul has not provided any precedent addressing Oregon's QRF ["qualified nonprofit agency for individuals with disabilities"] statute or anything closely related. While a case need not be 'directly on point' to put 'the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,'. . . all of the cases relied on by DePaul and the district court are too far from 'on point. There is simply no precedent 'clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply.'. . We hesitate to opine further about the meaning of Oregon's QRF statute without additional guidance from Oregon courts. But we need not do so to resolve Miller's appeal. As Miller observes, 'until the district court's orders in this case, no court had ever interpreted Oregon's QRF statute to create a protected property interest.' Given the dearth of law on this issue, we conclude that the property right asserted by DePaul was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.")

Gordon v. County of Orange (Gordon II), 6 F.4th 961, 969 (9th Cir. 2021) ("The plaintiff 'bears the burden of showing that the rights allegedly violated were clearly established.'. . However, because resolving whether the asserted federal right was clearly established presents a pure question of law, we draw on our 'full knowledge' of relevant precedent rather than restricting our review to cases identified by the plaintiff. . . Ultimately, 'the prior precedent must be "controlling"—from the Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court—or otherwise be embraced by a "consensus" of courts outside the relevant jurisdiction.'")

Hines v. Youseff, 914 F.3d 1218, 1229-30 (9th Cir. 2019) ("The inmates' alleged constitutional right would be 'clearly established' if 'controlling authority or a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' had previously held that it is cruel and unusual punishment to expose prisoners to a heightened risk of Valley Fever. . . But no such precedent exists. The inmates argue that several of our memorandum dispositions clearly establish their right to not face an unreasonable risk of Valley Fever. But memorandum dispositions do not establish law. . .They are, at best, persuasive authority. And more importantly, none of the cited memorandum dispositions held that inmates have an Eighth Amendment right to not be exposed to a heightened risk of Valley Fever. . .The inmates also point us to unpublished district court decisions about Valley Fever exposure. We have previously said that unpublished district court decisions 'may inform our qualified immunity analysis.'. . But we have also noted that 'it will be a rare instance in which, absent any published opinions on point or overwhelming obviousness of illegality, we can conclude that the law was clearly established on the basis of unpublished decisions only.'. . And at most, the cited district court opinions show that the law was developing—not that it was already clearly established. . .We therefore conclude that when the officials acted, existing Valley Fever cases did not clearly establish that they were violating the Eighth Amendment.")

Moonin v. Tice, 868 F.3d 853, 868, 870, 872 , 875 (9th Cir. 2017) ("We first look to binding precedent to determine whether a right is clearly established. . . 'In the absence of binding precedent clearly establishing the constitutional right, "we look to whatever decisional law is available,"' including relevant decisions of other circuits, state courts, and district courts. . . As an initial matter, it was clear in 2011 that some of the speech impacted by Tice's edict was protected by the First Amendment. As early as Pickering, it was clear that employees' opinions about the proper way to administer government agencies, when conveyed in that employee's capacity as a private citizen, constituted protected speech. . . Controlling precedent also made clear in 2011 that it was generally unconstitutional to punish a police officer for speaking out about malfeasance or mismanagement in the department. . . Tice was therefore clearly on notice that a policy precluding all sorts of speech by officers, to whomever communicated, about the K9 program was subject to limits imposed by the First Amendment. Moreover, it was abundantly clear in 2011 that ex ante restrictions on employee speech are more constitutionally problematic than after-the-fact decisions to punish a particular employee for his speech. . . Without more, the marriage of these two precepts in large part resolves this case. Tice's policy was written so broadly as to promise punishment for some speech that, as of 2011, clearly received constitutional protection. In light of the Supreme Court's emphasis on identifying clearly established law '"particularized" to the facts of the case,'. . . however, we consider in detail cases addressing analogous employer prior restraints on speech. These cases demonstrate that the First Amendment right Tice violated was clearly established at the time he sent his email. . . . Controlling case law addressing flat prohibitions on employee speech is, and was in 2011, limited. But Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit precedent emphatically signaled that a policy prohibiting public discussion of matters of public concern by employees of a particular government program, without a countervailing showing of substantial workplace disruption, was much too broad to be constitutional. . . . Because there is limited controlling precedent on point, we turn to persuasive authority. . . We conclude that persuasive cases addressing more closely analogous regulations would have made reasonable government officials quite aware, had they any doubt, that Tice's edict ran afoul of the First Amendment. . . .In short, a 'robust consensus' of prior cases made clear at the time Tice issued his edict that an employer ordinarily. . . may not prohibit its employees from all public discussion relating to a particular department or government program. . . Tice's policy did just that, making punishable any direct communication 'regarding the [NHP] K9 program or interdiction program,' with no attempt to tailor the speech restrictions to NHP's legitimate interests. Accordingly, we hold that Tice is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Government employers have significant and legitimate interests in managing the speech of their employees, particularly where the employees' speech pertains to their work. And policies explaining how sensitive information ordinarily should be handled benefit both employers and employees. We make clear today, however, that a public employer generally may not subject all employee speech regarding a particular government program—whether fact or opinion, and whether liable to disrupt the workplace or not—to a blanket ban. A government employer's policies imposing prior restraints on their employees' speech as citizens on matters of public concern must bear a 'close and rational relationship' to the employer's legitimate interests, and the broad policy Tice announced did not meet this standard. This conclusion was compelled by prior case law at the time Tice sent his missive. We therefore hold that Tice is not entitled to qualified immunity[.]")

Jones v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 802 F.3d 990, 1005 n.6 (9th Cir. 2015) ("The dissent suggests that our cases, such as Rogers, Mabe, and Wallis, cannot furnish clearly established law because other circuits disagree with them. . . However, this court regularly finds a principle to be clearly established based solely on its own decisions. See Kirkpatrick, 2015 WL 4154039, at *9–*10 (finding an infant's right not to be seized from his mother's custody at the hospital clearly established based on Rogers); Rogers, 487 F.3d at 1297 (finding the law governing removal of children from the home without judicial authorization clearly established based on Mabe, Wallis, and Ram v. Rubin, 118 F.3d 1306 (9th Cir.1997)). We must continue to rely on our own cases to determine whether the law is clearly established until this court sitting en banc or the Supreme Court tells us that we may not.")

Carrillo v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 798 F.3d 1210, 1221 n.13 (9th Cir. 2015) ("In recent cases, the Supreme Court has assumed for the sake of argument without explicitly holding that 'controlling Court of Appeals' authority could be a dispositive source of clearly established law.' Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012); see also Carroll v. Carman, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350 (2014). None of these cases has overruled Hope or called its exclusive reliance on circuit precedent into question.")

Prison Legal News v. Lehman, 397 F.3d 692, 701, 702 (9th Cir. 2005) ("In determining whether PLN's rights in this case were clearly established, and whether a reasonable person would have known his or her actions violated these rights, we may look at unpublished decisions and the law of other circuits, in addition to Ninth Circuit precedent.").

Boyd v. Benton County, 374 F.3d 773, 781-83 (9th Cir. 2004) ("The Supreme Court has provided little guidance as to where courts should look to determine whether a particular right was clearly established at the time of the injury. . . In the Ninth Circuit, we begin our inquiry by looking to binding precedent. . . If the right is clearly established by decisional authority of the Supreme Court or this Circuit, our inquiry should come to an end. On the other hand, when 'there are relatively few cases on point, and none of them are binding,' we may inquire whether the Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court, at the time the out-of-circuit opinions were rendered, would have reached the same results. . . Thus, in the absence of binding precedent, we '"look to whatever decisional law is available to ascertain whether the law is clearly established" for qualified immunity purposes, "including decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts."'. . In October 1997, neither the Supreme Court nor this Circuit had provided any guidance as to when the use of flash-bangs constitutes a Fourth Amendment violation. Thus, we must ask whether, despite the absence of binding precedent, there was sufficient non-binding authority to place the officers on notice that using a flash-bang in these circumstances would be excessive. By October 1997, two circuit courts and one state court had addressed the use of flash-bangs within the context of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Taken together, Baker, Garner, and Myers, in October 1997, failed to provide the officers in this case with the requisite level of guidance to put them on notice that using the flash-bang in these circumstances violated Boyd's Fourth Amendment rights. In fact, Baker, Garner, and Myers all hold that the use of flash-bang devices was reasonable under their respective facts. . . . In sum, we conclude that without any guidance from this Circuit and an absence of non-binding authority that otherwise clearly establishes the right, the officers here were not put on sufficient notice that using a flash-bang in these circumstances was unconstitutional.").

Bahrampour v. Lampert, 356 F.3d 969, 977 (9th Cir. 2004) ("When Mr. Bahrampour's subscription to the Green Lantern comic book was rejected in January 2000, there was no appellate decision that held that restrictions on the receipt of bulk mail were unconstitutional. One federal district court decision from a different district had held that a similar regulation was unconstitutional. Two unpublished decisions from the United States District Court for the District of Oregon, however, had held that the ODC bulk mail regulations at issue were constitutional. Thirteen months after ODC rejected the Green Lantern comic book, we held that prohibiting inmates' receipt of non-profit bulk mail was unconstitutional, noting that '[t]he speech at issue is core protected speech, not commercial speech or speech whose content is objectionable on security or other grounds.' We also held in Prison Legal News that '[b]ecause the contours of [the constitutional right at issue] were not sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he [was] doing violate[d] that right, the law in this case was not clearly established.'. . . Reasonable prison officials would have no basis for assuming that regulations prohibiting bulk mail were unconstitutional in the face of two district court decisions from the district in which the prison is located which had concluded that the precise regulations at issue were not unconstitutional. The fact that there was a conflict in the views of district court judges on the issue demonstrates that the constitutionality of the regulations was not clearly established until this court held, eighteen months later, that prohibiting the receipt of commercial bulk mail is unconstitutional. The district court did not err in its determination that the prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity because prison inmates had no clearly established right to receive commercial bulk mail at the time of the rejection of the Green Lantern comic book subscription." [internal citations omitted])

Rivero v. City and County of San Francisco, 316 F.3d 857, 864, 865 (9th Cir. 2002) ("We now hold that it was clearly established in 1993 that state employees could not cause the termination of a two-year for-profit government contract in retaliation for the contracting party's exercise of his First Amendment rights to speak out on a matter of public concern. Although we had not specifically held prior to 1993 that such a contract was a 'valuable governmental benefit' for purposes of First Amendment retaliation law, a reasonable person would have known from Pickering, Perry and Hyland I that this was the law in this circuit. . . . [T]he fact that there was a circuit split does not mean that the law was not clear in this circuit prior to the Court's decision in Umbehr. It was clear, and the Supreme Court's decision in Umbehr merely confirmed what was already the law in this circuit. The issue is not what the law was or might have been in other circuits in 1993. It is, rather, what the 'controlling authority in [the defendants'] jurisdiction[was] at the time of the incident.'").

Sorrels v. McKee, 290 F.3d 965, 970, 971 (9th Cir. 2002) ("The existence of binding precedent holding unconstitutional a prison policy requiring inmates to pay for publications received would easily dispose of prong two. The law would be clearly established and defendants' qualified immunity defense would fail. However, neither the district court, nor the parties, nor our own research has unearthed Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court caselaw on point predating our 1999 decision in Crofton v. Roe. We next look to the decisions of our sister Circuits, district courts, and state courts. . . However, either Washington's policy was unique among state prisons, or no other state's prisoners had seen fit to challenge similar policies, as there appear to be no published decisions on point prior to 1999 in any jurisdiction, at any level, concerning the constitutionality of a prison regulation requiring inmates to pay for publications they receive. Still this does not end our inquiry. In deciding the second prong of qualified immunity, '[i]t is not necessary that the alleged acts have been previously held unconstitutional, as long as the unlawfulness [of defendants' actions] was apparent in light of preexisting law' . . . In other words, while there may be no published cases holding similar policies constitutional, this may be due more to the obviousness of the illegality than the novelty of the legal issue. . . . Considering the complete lack of published decisions on point and the fact that defendants reasonably could have believed that the 'no gift publication' policy was constitutional, it cannot be said that the law was clearly established until we decided Crofton v. Roe in 1999. Sorrels also urges us to consider two unpublished district court decisions in determining whether the law was clearly established . . . . We have held that unpublished decisions of district courts may inform our qualified immunity analysis. See Prison Legal News v. Cook, 238 F.3d 1145, 1152 (9th Cir.2001) (relying on unpublished district court cases). The district court rulings in Ocanaz and Spalding do not change our conclusion that the law was not clearly established. At most, they show that the law was in the process of becoming established. This is not surprising, as it will be a rare instance in which, absent any published opinions on point or overwhelming obviousness of illegality, we can conclude that the law was clearly established on the basis of unpublished decisions only.").

Carey v. Nevada Gaming Control Board, 279 F.3d 873, 881, 882 & n.8 (9th Cir. 2002) ("As discussed above, there are two Ninth Circuit cases directly on point, Lawson and Martinelli, which unambiguously hold that compelling an individual to identify himself during a Terry stop violates the Fourth Amendment. Those cases invalidated state statutes that authorized arrests based on the detained individual's refusal to identify himself. In addition, Lawson and Martinelli are in accord with Supreme Court pronouncements on this issue. . . . Based on the foregoing, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Spendlove's position would have known that Carey had a clearly established Fourth Amendment right not to identify himself, and that the Nevada statutes at issue, like the statutes in Lawson and Martinelli, were unconstitutional to the extent they allowed Carey to be arrested for exercising his rights. . . . We note that some federal courts in other circuits have concluded there is no clearly established right to refuse to identify oneself during an investigative stop. [citing cases] These courts relied on the fact that the Supreme Court has twice declined to decide whether a person can be compelled to identify himself during a lawful investigatory stop. If we had only the Supreme Court's precedents to guide us, we might also conclude that the right was not clearly established. However, unlike our sister circuits, we have the benefit of two precedents on point in our own circuit, in addition to Supreme Court dicta that supports these precedents. We think this is sufficient to clearly establish the right in our circuit."). [But see Hiibel v. Nevada, 59 P.3d 1201 (Nev. 2002) (holding same Nevada statute did not violate constitutional right to privacy]

P.B. v. Koch, 96 F.3d 1298, 1304 (9th Cir. 1996) ("In light of the Supreme Court's holding that students are protected from unjustified intrusions on personal security and out-of-circuit cases holding that arbitrary corporal punishment is unconstitutional, no reasonable principal could think it constitutional to intentionally punch, slap, grab, and slam students into lockers.").

Romero v. Kitsap County, 931 F.2d 624 (9th Cir. 1991) (in absence of binding precedent, court should look at all available decisional law, including decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts).

TENTH CIRCUIT

Frey v. Town of Jackson, Wyoming, 41 F.4th 1223, 1235 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Plaintiff must show that clearly established First Amendment law prohibits the force applied against him under the circumstances. In other words, Plaintiff must show that it was clearly established at the time of the incident that the force Karnes used would 'chill a person of ordinary firmness' from engaging in protected speech. In his attempt to do so, Plaintiff cited in his opening brief only one case about retaliatory use of force—Youngblood v. Qualls, 308 F. Supp. 3d 1184 (D. Kan. 2018). A single case from a district court does not show the 'weight of authority' required to clearly establish law.")

McWilliams v. Dinapoli, 40 F.4th 1118, 1128 (10th Cir. 2022) ("We've held that a right is clearly established when a reasonable officer would have recognized the unconstitutionality of the conduct based on existing precedent. . . Despite our holdings, Mr. DiNapoli argues that only Supreme Court opinions can clearly establish a right, citing Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, ––– U.S. ––––, 142 S. Ct. 4, 8, 211 L.Ed.2d 164 (2021) (per curiam). Rivas-Villegas assumed without deciding that circuit precedent can clearly establish law. . . This assumption conforms to our precedents, which state that our own case law can clearly establish a constitutional right. . . So when the Supreme Court made a similar assumption in District of Columbia v. Wesby, . . . we rejected the argument that Mr. DiNapoli makes here. See Ullery v. Bradley, 949 F.3d 1282, 1292 (10th Cir. 2020) (noting that our precedents, other circuits' decisions, and dicta from Supreme Court opinions all showed that circuit precedent can clearly establish rights). We thus consider whether our precedent or Supreme Court caselaw clearly established the constitutional right.")

Irizarry v. Yehia, 38 F.4th 1282, 1294-96 (10th Cir. 2022) ("In May 2019, when the incident occurred, Mr. Irizarry had a clearly established right to film the traffic stop based on the persuasive weight of authority from six other circuits and our decision in Western Watersheds. Officer Yehia's obvious interference with that right, motivated by Mr. Irizarry's protected conduct, was a violation of clearly established law. . . . Although neither the Supreme Court nor the Tenth Circuit has recognized a First Amendment right to record the police performing their duties in public, we hold that the right was clearly established here based on the persuasive authority from six other circuits, which places the constitutional question 'beyond debate.'. . Our opinion in Western Watersheds also supports this conclusion. As we said in Ullery, 'In the absence of binding precedent specifically adjudicating the right at issue, the right may still be clearly established based on a "consensus of cases of persuasive authority" from other jurisdictions.'. . And the weight of authority from other circuits may clearly establish the law when at least six other circuits have recognized the right at issue. . . As discussed, the First, Third, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits have all concluded in published opinions that the First Amendment protects a right to film the police performing their duties in public. Four of those opinions—Fordyce, Glik, Fields, and Turner—involved facts materially similar to those here: the plaintiffs, like Mr. Irizarry, were attempting to film the police performing their official duties but were dissuaded from doing so either because they were arrested, detained, or physically deterred. . . Alvarez involved a pre-enforcement challenge to a statute that made it a felony to film police officers in public. All six decisions held there is a First Amendment right to film the police performing their duties in public, which clearly establishes the law in this circuit. Moreover, in Western Watersheds, we indicated, without reservation, that filming the police performing their duties in public is protected under the First Amendment. 869 F.3d at 1196 ("An individual who photographs animals or takes notes about habitat conditions is creating speech in the same manner as an individual who records a police encounter."). Although this statement, on its own, may be insufficient to satisfy prong two of qualified immunity, it supports the conclusion that a reasonable officer would have known there was a First Amendment right to film the police performing their duties in public. Finally, Mr. Irizarry's right to film the police falls squarely within the First Amendment's core purposes to protect free and robust discussion of public affairs, hold government officials accountable, and check abuse of power. . . We have no doubt that Mr. Irizarry had a clearly established First Amendment right to film the traffic stop in May 2019. . . . Officer Yehia argues that the right to film police officers performing their duties in public cannot be clearly established unless a previous Tenth Circuit case has already recognized the right. But we have repeatedly stated that 'the weight of authority from other courts can clearly establish a right.'. . And we have held that decisions from other circuits clearly established the law when at least six circuits had recognized the right at issue. . . Officer Yehia also argues that Frasier v. Evans, shows that the right to film police officers performing their duties in public was not clearly established as of May 2019. We disagree. In Frasier, the plaintiff filmed police officers arresting a suspect in 2014. . . After the arrest, officers allegedly intimidated the plaintiff and threatened to arrest him if he did not hand the video over to them. . . The plaintiff brought a § 1983 First Amendment claim against the officers, alleging that they retaliated against him for filming the suspect's arrest. . . We held the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because, when the incident occurred on August 14, 2014, the law was not clearly established that the First Amendment protected a right to record police officers performing their official duties in public. . . We rejected the plaintiff's argument that 'general First Amendment principles protecting the creation of speech and the gathering of news [ ] provide[d] clearly established law.'. . And we were not persuaded by the plaintiff's alternative argument that the weight of authority from other circuits clearly established the law. . . Although we assumed that, as of August 2014, four decisions—Alvarez, Glik, Smith, and Fordyce—recognized a right to film police performing their duties in public, we said those cases did not clearly establish the law in our circuit because our sibling circuits had 'disagreed regarding whether this purported First Amendment right to record was clearly established around August 2014.'. . Frasier does not undercut our clearly-established-law analysis for two reasons. First, the legal landscape has changed since August 2014 when the incident in Frasier occurred. Between August 2014 and May 2019, the Third and Fifth Circuits joined the four other circuits in concluding there is a First Amendment right to film the police performing their duties in public. . . And, as noted above, we have held that the weight of authority from other circuits may clearly establish the law when at least six other circuits have recognized the right at issue. See, e.g., Ullery, 949 F.3d at 1294. Second, when analyzing whether the weight of authority from other circuits clearly establishes the law in this circuit, we have said the relevant inquiry is whether there is consensus regarding the existence of the constitutional right at issue. . . Courts determine whether a constitutional right exists and whether it has been violated from holdings made at the first step of qualified immunity. . . As of May 2019, six circuits had determined that the First Amendment guarantees a right to film the police performing their duties in public. No other circuit has concluded otherwise. The substantial weight of this authority, along with our decision in Western Watersheds, would have put a reasonable officer in Officer Yehia's position on notice that Mr. Irizarry had a right to film the police conducting the traffic stop.")

George, on behalf of Bradshaw v. Beaver County, 32 F.4th 1246, 1258 n.4 (10th Cir. 2022) ("The Supreme Court has left open whether only its precedent may clearly establish law. See D.C. v. Wesby, —— U.S. ——, 138 S. Ct. 577, 591 n.8, 199 L.Ed.2d 453 (2018) ("We have not yet decided what precedents—other than our own—qualify as controlling authority for purposes of qualified immunity."); Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, —— U.S. ——, 142 S. Ct. 4, 8, 211 L.Ed.2d 164 (2021) (per curiam) ("Even assuming that Circuit precedent can clearly establish law for purposes of § 1983, LaLonde is materially distinguishable and thus does not govern the facts of this case."). Yet 'we do not think only Supreme Court precedents are relevant in deciding whether a right is clearly established.' Ullery v. Bradley, 949 F.3d 1282, 1292 (10th Cir. 2020).")

Swanson v. Griffin, No. 21-2034, 2022 WL 570079, at *1-4 & n.2 (10th Cir. Feb. 25, 2022) (not reported) ("Mr. Swanson commenced an action alleging Mr. Griffin's Facebook profile was a public forum and Mr. Griffin had engaged in viewpoint discrimination, in violation of the First Amendment. Mr. Griffin filed a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss raising a qualified immunity defense. The district court denied the motion, relying on out-of-circuit authority to conclude the law clearly established that (1) social media platforms are entitled to the same First Amendment protection as other public speech platforms and (2) a government official censoring speech violates the speaker's First Amendment rights. We reverse. The Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed lower courts not to define rights at a high level of generality when considering a qualified immunity defense. Furthermore, two of the three out-of-circuit cases relied on by Mr. Swanson are off-point, and a single out-of-circuit case is not capable of clearly establishing a proposition of law. . . . To demonstrate that the law is clearly established under the 'weight of authority' approach, a plaintiff must identify more than 'a handful of decisions from courts in other circuits that lend support to his claim.'. . While 'the Supreme Court has "repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,"' it has also explained that ' "officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'". . But more recent Supreme Court case law remarks that 'the clearly established law must be 'particularized' to the facts of the case.'. . And plaintiffs may not identify their claim through 'extremely abstract rights' because this would 'convert the rule of qualified immunity into a rule of virtually unqualified liability.'. . Ultimately, we must assess whether 'existing precedent [has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . . We conclude Mr. Swanson did not carry his burden on the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis. While Mr. Swanson has identified some generally applicable rules of law, Mr. Swanson has not identified a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case addressing a set of facts sufficiently similar to those surrounding Mr. Griffin's Facebook profile. Furthermore, although Mr. Swanson attempts to rely on out-of-circuit authority to demonstrate that the right he asserts is clearly established under the weight of authority approach, only one of the three out-of-circuit decisions is potentially on-point. But a plaintiff's identification of a single out-of-circuit case is not sufficient to satisfy the weight of authority approach. . . . Mr. Swanson, critically, has not identified law clearly establishing when an individual government official's social media profile becomes a public forum. The Supreme Court has not addressed this question. . . . Nor has Mr. Swanson identified any decision by this court addressing this question. Rather, Mr. Swanson relies upon three out-of-circuit cases: (1) Davison v. Randall, 912 F.3d 666 (4th Cir. 2019); (2) Robinson v. Hunt Cnty., 921 F.3d 440 (5th Cir. 2019); and (3) Knight First Amendment Institute at Columbia University v. Trump, 928 F.3d 226 (2d Cir. 2019). We discuss each in turn. [court distinguishes Davison and Robinson] Finally, Mr. Swanson relies upon the Second Circuit's decision in Knight First Amendment Institute. We need not analyze whether this decision is on-point with the facts alleged in Mr. Swanson's complaint. This is because a single out-of-circuit case does not satisfy the weight of authority approach for demonstrating the law is clearly established. . . Accordingly, even assuming the Second Circuit decision is on-point, Mr. Swanson has not carried his burden on the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis.[2] [fn.2: Even if we had concluded Davison shared a sufficient nexus of facts with the allegations in Mr. Swanson's complaint, two out-of-circuit decisions—Davison and the Second Circuit's decision in Knight First Amendment Institute—would not amount to a sufficient body of out-of-circuit case law to satisfy the weight of authority approach.") Crane v. Utah Department of Corrections, 15 F.4th 1296, 1305-07 (10th Cir. 2021) ("Ms. Crane contends that 'placing the seriously mentally ill in solitary confinement can constitute deliberate indifference.'. . That is, she argues there is a clearly established constitutional right of all seriously mentally ill inmates not to be placed in solitary confinement. In support, Ms. Crane cites four district court cases from outside this circuit. Even if they were controlling, these cases do not carry the weight she places upon them. . . .These cases share a common theme. They stand for the proposition that isolating mentally ill inmates in conditions that seriously and predictably exacerbate their mental illness is cruel and unusual when the official has subjective knowledge of both the mental illness and the impact of isolation. Although these trial court decisions may portend future legal developments, they do not constitute clearly established law capable of overcoming qualified immunity here. District court cases lack the precedential weight necessary to clearly establish the law for qualified immunity purposes. . . .And Ms. Crane cites no on-point decisions from this circuit or the Supreme Court, nor decisions from any other circuit court, that hold punitive isolation of mentally ill inmates violates the Eighth Amendment in the absence of knowledge that a specific inmate is suicidal. Thus, the CUCF Defendants' general use of punitive isolation to discipline prisoners who happen to be mentally ill does not violate clearly established law. . . . Ms. Crane . . . argues that 'housing seriously mentally ill prisoners at risk of suicide in cells that facilitated hanging constituted deliberate indifference.'. . However, she does not support this claim with any precedent from the Supreme Court or this circuit—which is ordinarily required to demonstrate a right is clearly established. . . And even the out-of-circuit cases she cites do not stand for the proposition asserted. Specifically, the cited cases do not clearly establish that confining suicidal inmates in cells that facilitate hanging is unconstitutional per se. Rather, these cases stand for a more limited proposition that does not expand the right recognized by this circuit's deliberate indifference jurisprudence. Namely, as we explained in Cox v. Glanz, prison officials are deliberately indifferent if they fail to take reasonable steps to protect a pre-trial detainee or an inmate from suicide when they have subjective knowledge that person is a substantial suicide risk.")

Crane v. Utah Department of Corrections, 15 F.4th 1296, 1317, 1320-21 (10th Cir. 2021) (Bacharach, J., concurring) ("We stated in Cox v. Glanz that our precedents had long held that prison officials incur liability for deliberate indifference if they know 'that a specific inmate presents a substantial risk of suicide' and disregard that risk. . . The majority does not consider this theory because Ms. Crane did not cite Cox in her opening brief. . . This omission bears significance to the majority, which states that 'the plaintiff bears the burden of citing to us what he thinks constitutes clearly established law.'. . But the plaintiff bears the burden only to present an argument for a clearly established right. Ms. Crane did that. . . . Even the defendants acknowledge Ms. Crane's reliance on cases providing liability under the Eighth Amendment for a prison suicide when the official knows and disregards 'a substantial and significant risk that the defendant may imminently seek to commit suicide.'. . Regardless of whether Ms. Crane cited Cox for this argument, we must consider the applicable case law. [citing Elder v. Holloway] So I would consider Ms. Crane's theory of deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of suicide. . . . In my view, we should consider all of the pertinent case law, including our recognition of a sliding scale and Cox. But reasonable prison officials might regard long stints of solitary confinement as constitutional even for a mentally ill prisoner. Given the lack of a judicial consensus in 2014, how could a prison official have regarded a possible constitutional violation as obvious? And in my view, Ms. Crane failed to allege that any of the individual defendants recognized a substantial suicide risk. So she did not state a claim that would trigger liability under Cox.")

Williams v. Hansen, 5 F.4th 1129, 1133 (10th Cir. 2021) ("Our review is not limited to the opinions cited by Mr. Williams. In determining whether a right is clearly established, we are conducting de novo review of a legal issue, which requires consideration of all relevant case law. Elder v. Holloway, 510 U.S. 510, 516, 114 S.Ct. 1019, 127 L.Ed.2d 344 (1994); see also Cortez v. McCauley, 478 F.3d 1108, 1122 n.19 (10th Cir. 2007) (en banc) ("While it is true that Plaintiffs should cite to what constitutes clearly established law, we are not restricted to the cases cited by them.").")

Estate of Smart by Smart v. City of Wichita, 951 F.3d 1161, 1183 n.2 (10th Cir. 2020) (Bacharach, J., dissenting) ("Mr. Smart did not present this case law when arguing the clearly established prong in district court. But 'appellate review of qualified immunity dispositions is to be conducted in light of all relevant precedents, not simply those cited to, or discovered by, the district court.' Elder v. Holloway, 510 U.S. 510, 512, 114 S.Ct. 1019, 127 L.Ed.2d 344 (1994). So we must consider these opinions.")

Ullery v. Bradley, 949 F.3d 1282, 1290-94, 1298-1301 (10th Cir. 2020) ("Because the sexual misconduct alleged here is unquestionably 'repugnant to the conscience of mankind[,]'. . it is unsurprising Defendant has elected not to challenge the district court's conclusion regarding the existence of a constitutional violation. To be sure, Defendant's alleged actions—(1) approaching Plaintiff from behind and forcibly pressing his genitals into her buttocks while lasciviously moaning 'mmmmmm' in her ear; (2) purposefully and knowingly using physical force against Plaintiff by touching her breasts; and (3) forcibly grabbing and fondling Plaintiff's crotch without her consent—are each sufficiently serious to satisfy the Eighth Amendment's objective component and without any penological justification. Given the factual circumstances of this case, any one of these three alleged uses of force, even when viewed in isolation, deeply offends contemporary standards of decency and therefore violates the Eighth Amendment. . . Despite the intolerable conduct at issue, Defendant is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity unless Plaintiff has carried her burden of showing the law was clearly established. For the reasons discussed below, we conclude Plaintiff has, for all relevant purposes, satisfied this burden. . . .Specifically, the clearly established weight of persuasive authority in our sister circuits as of August 11, 2015, would have put any reasonable corrections officer in Defendant's position on notice his alleged conduct would violate the Eighth Amendment. Because Plaintiff's asserted right to be free from sexual abuse was clearly established at the relevant time, Defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Relying on a footnote in Wesby, Defendant argues only the Supreme Court can clearly establish law in the particular circumstances of a case. . . While Wesby may have suggested this is an open question, we do not think only Supreme Court precedents are relevant in deciding whether a right is clearly established. [referencing Wilson v. Layne] In recent years, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed that 'qualified immunity is lost when plaintiffs point either to "cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident" or to "a consensus of cases of persuasive authority."'. . Following the Supreme Court's lead, nearly all of our sister circuits, like us, consider both binding circuit precedent and decisions from other circuits in determining whether the law is clearly established. [collecting cases] . . . . Defendant's argument therefore conflicts with Supreme Court authority, our precedents, and the decisions of our sister circuits. Limiting the source of clearly established law to only Supreme Court precedents also is unwarranted and impractical given the current state of the doctrine. Such a restriction would transform qualified immunity into an absolute bar to constitutional claims in most cases—thereby skewing the intended balance of holding public officials accountable while allowing them to perform their duties reasonably without fear of personal liability and harassing litigation. . . Accordingly, Defendant's position is untenable. . . . Neither the district court nor Plaintiff have identified any case from the Supreme Court or this court squarely addressing whether Defendant's alleged conduct violates the Eighth Amendment. Our clearly-established-law inquiry, however, does not end here. Despite the lack of on-point, binding authority addressing the issue, we must now consider whether the right was clearly established based on either a consensus of persuasive authority or general constitutional principles. . . In the absence of binding precedent specifically adjudicating the right at issue, the right may still be clearly established based on a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' from other jurisdictions. . . Plaintiff argues the clearly established weight of out-of-circuit authorities would have put any reasonable corrections officer in Defendant's position on notice his conduct violated the Constitution. Accordingly, we now proceed to examine the relevant decisions of our sister circuits addressing the right of inmates under the Eighth Amendment to be free from sexual abuse. . . .The consensus of persuasive authority from our sister circuits since August 11, 2015, places the constitutional question in this case 'beyond debate.'. . The Second, Seventh, Eighth, and Ninth Circuits have all held—in published decisions involving materially analogous facts—sexual abuse of the nature alleged here violates the Eighth Amendment. Even more, the Third and Sixth Circuits have recognized an inmate's right to be free from sexual abuse under the Eighth Amendment was clearly established at the time of Defendant's unlawful conduct. . . .Given the persuasive authority in the Second, Third, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, and Ninth Circuits, we are compelled to conclude Plaintiff's right to be free from sexual abuse was clearly established under the Eighth Amendment. Following Crawford I, no 'reasonable [corrections] officer, looking at the entire legal landscape at the time of the [alleged sexual misconduct], could have interpreted the law as permitting' Defendant's actions. . . If Defendant did not 'knowingly violate the law' when he sexually abused Plaintiff, which we doubt is the case here, then he is 'plainly incompetent.'. . Either way, qualified immunity affords Defendant no shelter for the alleged constitutional violations he committed after August 11, 2015. . . . In sum, persuasive out-of-circuit authority addressing the constitutional right in question was not divided or otherwise unclear following the Second Circuit's decision in Crawford I. Defendant violated clearly established Eighth Amendment law by: (1) approaching Plaintiff from behind and forcibly pressing his genitals into her buttocks while lasciviously moaning 'mmmmmm' in her ear; (2) purposefully and knowingly using physical force against Plaintiff by touching her breasts; and (3) forcibly grabbing and fondling Plaintiff's crotch without her consent. Moreover, based on the consensus of persuasive authority addressing the right in question, any one of these three uses of force on its own—regardless of whether Plaintiff's allegations are viewed in isolation or as a pattern of pervasive sexual abuse—violated clearly established law. Defendant does not point to a single decision from this circuit or a published opinion from one of our sister circuits—and we have found none—shedding doubt on our conclusion today. Rather, the unanimity among our sister circuits since Crawford I demonstrates the constitutional question here is 'beyond debate.'. . As for any sexual misconduct which occurred before August 11, 2015, we cannot agree with Plaintiff that Defendant's alleged actions so obviously violated the Eighth Amendment there is no need for case law clearly establishing the point. Before the Second Circuit's decision in Crawford I, it was not beyond debate Defendant's alleged conduct satisfied the Eighth Amendment's objective component. . . Contrary to Plaintiff's argument, the allegations in Boddie are quite similar to the allegations here. A reasonable officer could therefore have believed based on Boddie, which was widely followed until recent years, that the sexual abuse at issue—even if it might subject Defendant to criminal or tort liability—did not violate the Eighth Amendment. . . We recognize our parsing of the relevant case law and time period may appear unduly formalistic considering the despicable nature of Defendant's alleged misconduct. But this is the task required of us under the qualified-immunity precedents we are obligated to follow. And while Plaintiff asks us to reject the current qualified-immunity framework as unconstitutional, her competent counsel is well-aware it is not this appellate court's place to issue such edicts. We, of course, decline to do so here. Nevertheless, after August 11, 2015, any reasonable corrections officer would have known Defendant's alleged conduct violated the Eighth Amendment based upon the consensus of persuasive circuit authority addressing the right in question. . . As we explained above, any constitutional violations Defendant committed before April 10, 2016, fall outside the applicable statute of limitations. Because all actionable constitutional violations in this case—that is, those occurring within the two-year limitation period—would necessarily have occurred after August 11, 2015, the law was clearly established for all relevant purposes here. Accordingly, Defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Grissom v. Roberts, 902 F.3d 1162, 1168 (10th Cir. 2018) ("The role of an unpublished nonprecedential opinion in this enterprise depends on whether the opinion is being used to show that the plaintiff's proffered proposition is clearly established law or to show that the proposition is unsettled. We have held that '[a]n unpublished opinion ... provides little support for the notion that the law is clearly established on [a] point.'. . But an unpublished opinion can be quite relevant in showing that the law was not clearly established. If we make the collegial, and quite legitimate, assumption that panels of this court render reasonable decisions, we would be hard pressed to say that a proposition of law was clearly established at a time when an unpublished opinion by a panel of this court said the opposite. To do so we would have to say that the panel's decision was contrary to clearly established law at the time it was rendered. Our assumption does not require us to credit the unpublished opinion as being correct, only as being debatably correct. And there is perhaps a more important reason to presume that an unpublished decision was not contrary to clearly established law at the time. The purpose of the qualified-immunity test is to limit liability to those public officials who are 'plainly incompetent or ... knowingly violate the law.'. . This purpose would be ill served if liability were imposed on an official for conduct that had been held to be lawful, even in an unpublished opinion, by the federal appellate court with jurisdiction over the conduct, at least in the absence of later contrary authority issued before the official acted. Could we properly say that an official was plainly incompetent for taking guidance from an unpublished appellate opinion? . . . The argument favoring consideration of an unpublished opinion is particularly compelling if the same alleged victim and same defendant conduct are involved.")

Grissom v. Roberts, 902 F.3d 1162, 1174-75 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Grissom alleges he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment because (1) 20 years in solitary created a substantial risk of serious harm, and (2) the defendants knew of but disregarded that harm. Pointing to various academic literature and government reports (both domestic and international), he appeals to us to recognize '[s]ociety's evolving standards of decency.'. . To overcome the defense of qualified immunity, however, Grissom must point to clearly established law. . . That, he has failed to do. He states, 'A growing number of courts have concluded denying the basic human needs of social interaction and environmental stimulation can violate the Eighth Amendment, especially when the deprivation lasts for years.'. . But the cited courts are four federal district courts, none from this circuit. That does not suffice to clearly establish the law. . . Indeed, the most recent relevant decision by this court is an unpublished opinion rejecting an Eighth Amendment claim brought by a prisoner who had been in solitary confinement for 30 years under conditions not markedly different from those here. See Silverstein v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 559 F. App'x 739, 741 (10th Cir. 2014). . . .Grissom, similar to the prisoner in Silverstein, has regularly communicated with other inmates and staff and has been afforded regular exercise (including outdoor recreation) and regular access to reading materials and to medical and mental-health care. We conclude that the Prison Officials are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Sandberg v. Englewood, Colorado, 727 F. App'x 950, 961-62 (10th Cir. 2018) ("There is no case from the Tenth Circuit or the Supreme Court holding that Heller's articulation of a right to keep and bear arms inside the home must necessarily extend to a right to keep and bear arms outside the home. If anything, we have indicated the Second Amendment has some limitations when applied to conduct outside the home. . . In response to the paucity of authority on point from this court or the Supreme Court, Sandberg directs us to Justice Thomas's dissent from the denial of certiorari in Peruta v. California, 137 S. Ct. 1995 (2017). In Peruta, a litigant asked the Court to address whether a local municipality may place restrictions on firearm possession, such as requiring a particularized reason for a concealed carry permit. The Court declined to hear the case. . . Justice Thomas and Justice Gorsuch dissented, with Justice Thomas writing that he believes '[t]he most natural reading of [the Second Amendment] encompasses public carry.'. . Yet, a dissent from a denial of certiorari is not binding authority that would create clearly established law. Further, the dissent in Peruta was issued more than three years after the events of this case. Therefore, the dissent in Peruta does not clearly establish that as of May 14, 2014, a citizen had an absolute right to openly carry a firearm in public. Without a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case on point, Sandberg relies upon the Seventh Circuit's opinion in Moore v. Madigan, 702 F.3d 933 (7th Cir. 2012). In Moore, two separate plaintiffs sought declaratory and injunctive relief against the application of an Illinois statute that prohibited the carrying of a firearm in many public places. . . Relying on its interpretation of Heller and McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. 742 (2010), the Seventh Circuit held that '[t]he Supreme Court has decided that the [Second A]mendment confers a right to bear arms for self-defense, which is as important outside the home as inside,' because the Second Amendment is focused on 'promot[ing] self-defense.'. . Of the cases Sandberg cites, Moore is the only circuit court opinion to hold that the Second Amendment guarantees a citizen the right to carry a firearm in public. Other circuits have stated the same principle in dicta, but have not articulated the rule in a holding. [collecting cases] We conclude that Moore does not provide a 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts.'. . That one other circuit has issued an opinion which would support Sandberg's claim does not in itself create a clearly established weight of authority. . . Instead, this court generally looks to whether a 'majority of courts' have adopted the rule in question, thereby making it 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer' would understand the rule and be expected to apply it. . . Thus, when the events at issue in this case occurred it was not clearly established that the Second Amendment guaranteed a citizen the right to openly carry a firearm in public without risk of facing police action. The district court did not err in dismissing Sandberg's Second Amendment claim.")

Leek v. Miller, 698 F. App'x 922, 928-29 (10th Cir. 2017) ("We address whether the asserted right—a protected property interest in prison accounts triggering procedural due process—was clearly established. In Clark, this circuit held that the atypical-and-significant-hardship evaluation announced in Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472 (1995), applied 'to protected property interest inquiries.'. . In doing so, we overruled an earlier case holding that prisoners have a protected property interest in the funds in their prison trust accounts. . . Consequently, the Gillihan holding 'is no longer good law and, hence, not "clearly established" in this circuit.'. .After Clark, in several unpublished decisions this circuit found it unnecessary to resolve whether a prisoner has a protected property interest in his prison accounts. [collecting decisions] As these cases demonstrate, the law in this circuit is not clearly established whether a prisoner has a protected property interest in his prison accounts. Mr. Leek relies on a case from the Third Circuit holding 'the Department of Corrections' assessment of [the prisoner's] institutional account constituted the deprivation of a protected property interest for purposes of procedural due process.' Burns v. Penn. Dep't of Corr., 544 F.3d 279, 291 (3d Cir. 2008). 'Normally, a single recent case from one circuit is not sufficient to make the law clearly established in another circuit.' Woodward v. City of Worland, 977 F.2d 1392, 1397 (10th Cir. 1992) . . . Mr. Leek has not cited any Supreme Court or published Tenth Circuit case, or case law from any circuits other than the Third Circuit, to support his constitutional claim. Therefore, we conclude that the district court properly granted summary judgment on qualified-immunity grounds.")

Mayfield v. Bethards, 826 F.3d 1252, 1259 (10th Cir. 2016) ("[E]ven assuming more specificity is needed, the clear weight of authority from other jurisdictions provided Deputy Bethards adequate notice that the conduct here implicated the Mayfields' Fourth Amendment rights. See Thomas, 765 F.3d at 1194 (stating that a right is clearly established "if the clearly established weight of authority from other courts shows that the right must be as the plaintiff maintains" (internal quotation marks omitted)). Indeed, seven federal circuits had addressed the issue prior to Detective Bethards's conduct, each holding that killing a pet dog is a Fourth Amendment seizure.")

Van Deelen v. Johnson, 497 F.3d 1151, 1158, 1159 (10th Cir. 2007) ("We believe Mr. Van Deelen has overcome both qualified immunity hurdles. As we have already indicated, Mr. Van Deelen has alleged facts from which a reasonable jury could (though need not necessarily) conclude that a violation of the First Amendment took place. And the right at issue–to petition the government for the redress of tax grievances–has been with us and clearly established since the Sons of Liberty visited Griffin's Wharf in Boston. Defendants respond by pointing us again to the line of cases from Kansas district courts . . . arguing that it 'muddied the water' sufficiently that a reasonable official would not have known that private citizens have a First Amendment right to petition on private as well as public matters. But every case discussing the public concern test in the Supreme Court has made pellucid that it applies only to public employees. . . The same is true of our own precedent. . . And none of our published opinions concerning the right of petition by private citizens has even hinted at a public concern requirement. . . The same is true of our sister circuits. . . Reliance on district court and unpublished decisions in the face of such uniform governing authority from the Supreme Court, as well as this circuit and every other circuit to have addressed the question, is not sufficient to avoid liability . . . .Put simply, and taking as true Mr. Van Deelen's version of the facts as we must, we hold (unremarkably, we think) that a reasonable government official should have clearly understood at the time of the events at issue that physical and verbal intimidation intended to deter a citizen from pursuing a private tax complaint violates that citizen's First Amendment right to petition for the redress of grievances.").

Gonzales v. City of Castle Rock, 366 F.3d 1093, 1117, 1118 (10th Cir. 2004) (en banc) ("In the instant case, we cannot hold that a reasonable officer would have known that a restraining order, coupled with a statute mandating its enforcement, would create a constitutionally protected property interest. No Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case has so held. Nor have we found any other circuit court cases addressing this specific question. Somewhat analogous cases from the Sixth and Eleventh Circuits have held that comprehensive state child welfare statutes created liberty interests in personal safety and the freedom from harm which gave rise to procedural due process protections. . .Likewise, two district courts, addressing facts similar to those in the present case, held that protective orders or their supporting statutes created a property interest in enforcement. . . Nevertheless, this precedent is insufficient to clearly establish the law for this circuit. Officers Ahlfinger, Brink and Ruisi are thus entitled to the affirmative defense of qualified immunity."), rev'd on other grounds, Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales, 125 S. Ct. 2796 (2005).

Roska v. Peterson, 304 F.3d 982, 998, 1000 (10th Cir. 2002) ("Defendants are quite correct that there is no case directly on point, either in the Supreme Court or in this circuit. As we noted above, however, this is unnecessary. [citing Hope] A requirement of a case that is directly on point would quickly transform the qualified immunity standard into an absolute immunity standard in the vast majority of cases. . . Instead, we recognize that if the authority from other courts is heavily weighted toward plaintiff's interpretation, or if it is clear that doctrine points toward plaintiff's interpretation, we will still hold that the law was clearly established. . . . [W]e conclude that it was clearly established in May 1999 that the warrantless, no-knock entry into the Roska home, the warrantless seizure of Rusty, and the removal of Rusty without pre-deprivation procedures violated the Constitution.").

Herring v. Keenan, 218 F.3d 1171, 1176, 1178, 1179 (10th Cir. 2000) ("A plaintiff need not demonstrate that the specific conduct in this case had previously been held unlawful, so long as the unlawfulness was 'apparent.'. . . A plaintiff may satisfy his or her burden by showing that there is a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit opinion on point, or that his or her proposition is supported by the weight of authority from other courts. . . . while Eastwood, Lankford, and Mangels indicate that under some circumstances, a release of personal information regarding a person by a government officer may violate a constitutionally protected right to privacy, none of the cases discuss the question whether the right to privacy protects a probationer who may be HIV positive from a limited disclosure by his or her probation officer to persons whom the probation officer believed might be affected by their contact with the probationer. The cases, therefore, did not clearly establish such a right in 1993. . . . The plaintiff asserts that no less than seven federal courts outside of the Tenth Circuit have 'recognized the existence of a constitutionally protected privacy interest in maintaining the confidentiality of an individual's HIV status.' None of these cases, however, address the question we must decide. . . . None of the cases identified by the plaintiff involved a limited disclosure by a probation officer to a probationer's sister and restaurant employer of voluntarily exposed information that the probation officer believed was necessary to protect them from the possibility of an inadvertent exposure to HIV. Though a plaintiff is not required to show that the specific conduct was previously found to have been held unlawful, there must be a substantial correspondence so that the unlawfulness was apparent. . . In the present case, the plaintiff has shown that there is 'a clearly established right in the abstract' to privacy from disclosure of personal information by government officials. . . The plaintiff has not shown, however, that the district court cases cited amount to a sufficient weight of authority establishing a clearly established right of privacy in this case. The plaintiff has further failed to demonstrate that the contours of that right were sufficiently clear in late 1993 so that a reasonable probation officer would understand that he or she could not disclose to a probationer's close relative or restaurant employer that the probationer had tested positive to HIV. The plaintiff has failed to demonstrate a substantial correspondence between Keenan's disclosures and conduct that has been held to violate the right to privacy in prior decisions.") .

Herring v. Keenan, 218 F.3d 1171, 1181, 1182, 1186 n.8 (10th Cir. 2000) (Seymour, Chief Judge, dissenting) ("In holding that a probationer's constitutional privacy right to non-disclosure of his confidential medical information by his probation officer was not clearly established in late 1993, the majority extrapolates from the Supreme Court's bare holding in Griffin v. Wisconsin, . . . without addressing the underlying analysis and reasoning used therein, ignores other circuit precedent on point, and requires an inappropriately exacting factual similarity between prior cases and the case at bar. In my judgment, at the time of the events at issue, the law was clear that Mr. Herring enjoyed constitutional privacy protection against involuntary disclosures of personal information because there was no legitimate governmental interest in the disclosure, and Ms. Keenan's disclosure of such information was objectively unreasonable. For these reasons, I respectfully dissent. . . . To demonstrate a clearly established right, a plaintiff need not identify a case holding unconstitutional the exact conduct in question. Rather, 'this circuit requires only Asome but not precise factual correspondence."' . . . While the majority gives lip service to this standard, it then turns Griffin on its head and rejects Mr. Herring's claim because he has not cited a federal court of appeals case with exactly the same type of plaintiff and defendant, and precisely the same type of disclosure. In so doing, the majority relieves government officials of their 'incumbent' duty 'to relate established law to analogous factual settings.'").

Anaya v. Crossroads Managed Care Systems Inc., 195 F.3d 584, 595 (10th Cir. 1999) ("[B]y 1995, when the alleged conduct occurred, six circuits had considered the issue; all of them definitively held that probable cause is required for civil seizures of persons premised on self-protection or protection of the public; the earliest of those decisions dates back to 1971 . . . The weight of authority was strong enough in light of the well-established principles of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, to find the right was 'clearly established.' Furthermore, when considered in terms of whether a reasonable official would know what he is doing violates a right, it seems incredible to suggest that officers, well aware of the restrictions on their ability to deprive persons of liberty without probable cause, would not know that detaining for 'potential' intoxication infringes a constitutional right.").

Guffey v. Wyatt, 18 F.3d 869, 872 (10th Cir. 1994) ("While defendant contends that state decisional law is relevant to the qualified immunity inquiry, the role of state law remains unsettled. . . . [W]e note because state courts seldom examine federal constitutional claims, few federal courts have found state decisional law to be dispositive. . . . Accordingly, in the face of Supreme Court precedent articulating substantive constitutional rights, the defendant's claim these two Oklahoma cases somehow obscured otherwise clearly established law is simply not persuasive.").

Medina v. City and County of Denver, 960 F.2d 1493, 1498 (10th Cir. 1992) ("In determining whether the law was clearly established, we bear in mind that allegations of constitutional violations that require courts to balance competing interests may make it more difficult to find the law 'clearly established' when assessing claims of qualified immunity ....Ordinarily, in order for the law to be clearly established, there must be a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains. Our analysis leads us to conclude that it was not clearly established in 1986 (1) that recklessness could give rise to liability under section 1983 or (2) that a police officer could be liable under section 1983 for an injury caused not by the officer but by a suspect being chased by the officer.").

Patrick v. Miller, 953 F.2d 1240, 1249 (10th Cir. 1992) ("The law may be found to be clearly established by reference to decisions from other circuits....We consider the law to be 'clearly established' when it is well developed enough to inform the reasonable official that his conduct violates that law.").

Compare Wood v. Ostrander, 879 F.2d 583 (9th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 938 (1990) (relied on analogous precedent in Seventh Circuit, White v. Rochford, 592 F.2d 381 (7th Cir. 1979), to find right clearly established) and Hilliard v. City and County of Denver, 930 F.2d 1516 (10th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 656 (1991) (two cases from other circuits did not "clearly establish" that personal security guarantee was viable in noncustodial setting).

Conner v. Rodriguez, 891 F.Supp.2d 1228, 1238, 1239 & n.9 (D.N.M. 2011) ("After evaluating the Henry and Torres cases, the Court acknowledges that the Fourth and Ninth Circuits have concluded that conduct similar to Defendant's could potentially violate the Fourth Amendment. However, these two circuit decisions do not suffice to clearly establish that Defendant's conduct violated Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights. . . As an additional, and purely factual matter, the Court notes that the mistake made by Defendant and those of the officers in Purnell and Torres are not entirely equivalent. Tasers and pistols, as the circuit courts observed, have significant shape, feel, and operational differences; Defendant's two shotguns were the same model of Remington shotguns, and functioned in the exact same way. In the other two cases, neither situation was particularly high-stress or dangerous, while Defendant was involved in a high-speed chase with a felon who had already been shot by police, had assaulted police officers with his vehicle, and was known to be armed and to have a mental imbalance. Thus even if the Fourth and Ninth Circuit cases applied strictly as precedent, Defendant would still likely be owed qualified immunity, because an application of the legal tests used by those two circuits, the facts in this case likely would come out the other way. . . . These two cases do not suffice to show that 'the clearly established weight of authority from other courts' agrees with them. . . Instead, if there is any weight of authority, it appears still to lean in the opposite direction: that unintentional negligent conduct cannot establish a Fourth Amendment claim. The Court finds this result amenable to the purposes of qualified immunity. In light of the public interest of having officials who are free to vigorously carry out their duties without the need to look over their shoulders at the looming specter of personal liability, an official should be shielded from the imposition of personal liability for an honest, yet sloppy and negligent mistake made during the course of a tense and highly stressful police confrontation. . . . Because the law was not clearly established at the time of the events in question that unintentionally but negligently discharging a lethal shotgun instead of a less-lethal shotgun violated Plaintiff's rights, Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.") Prison Legal News v. Simmons, No. Civ.A. 02-4054-MLB, Civ.A. 00-3370-MLB, Civ.A. 01-3017-MLB, 2005 WL 3118043, at 7-9 (D. Kan. Nov. 22, 2005) ("[T]he question of whether a right is clearly established in the Tenth Circuit in an interesting one. All the Tenth Circuit cases to address this question in the last decade agree that the law is clearly established when there is a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case on point. . . By contrast, there has been a change in the language used to describe the standard to be applied when neither a Supreme Court case nor a Tenth Circuit case addresses the matter. The original standard was first articulated in Medina v. City and County of Denver, 960 F.2d 1493 (10th Cir.1992), where the court said, > Ordinarily, in order for the law to be clearly established, there must be a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.

. . . In the years following Medina, this statement was frequently quoted as the proper standard to apply when determining whether a right was clearly established. . . Then, in Murrell v. School District No. 1, Denver, Colo., 186 F.3d 1238 (10th Cir.1999), the circuit purported to quote the operative language from Medina; however, there was an apparent misquote, and the language in the standard was changed to read,

> In order for the law to be clearly established, 'there must be a Supreme Court or other Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other circuits must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.' [citing Medina]

. . . Read literally, the emphasized language shrinks the scope of the 'clearly established' inquiry from looking at the weight of authority from 'other courts' to looking only at the weight of authority from 'other circuits.' Since Murrell was issued, subsequent opinions from the Tenth Circuit have been inconsistent in the language used. Some opinions use the language from Murrell. . . Conversely, other Tenth Circuit opinions have continued to use the language from Medina. . . Analysis of the post-Murrell cases that used the Medina 'other courts' language shows that they not only quoted the broader language, but applied it as well. . . . Taken collectively, the court concludes that the Tenth Circuit never intended Murrell to change the standard for determining when a right is clearly established in the absence of controlling Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit authority. Given that Murrell purported to quote Medina, but inserted an error into the quote, along with the fact that Murrell never discussed changing the Medina standard, the court finds that the misquote was merely a scrivener's error. This conclusion is bolstered by the fact that subsequent cases from our circuit occasionally look beyond other circuit courts when evaluating whether a right was clearly established. That conclusion notwithstanding, the fact that this error has not been discussed in a reported case from the Tenth Circuit suggests that the error may not be very significant. In other words, although the circuit may be willing to consider cases from courts beyond the federal appellate courts, the focus should normally be on cases decided by other circuits. Thus, a district court may consider any source of judicial precedent, state or federal, when making the clearly established inquiry in the absence of controlling authority; however, as a practical matter, it will require far fewer circuit court cases to make a right clearly established than it will district court or even state court cases. Moreover, this approach is only sensible in light of the controlling inquiry in all qualified immunity cases–'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer [in the defendant's position] that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . The court finds that it is not reasonable to expect police officers and prison guards to stay abreast of the latest opinions out of federal district courts and state courts outside of their own jurisdiction. While a growing multitude of rulings from these lower courts might ultimately suffice to clearly establish a right not passed upon by the circuit courts, this would be a rarity. Even one or two cases from other circuits should not normally be sufficient to make a right 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes unless the right is so patently obvious that the only reason it has not been recognized by more federal appellate courts is because it has never been litigated.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Jackson v. McCurry, 762 F. App'x 919, ___ (11th Cir. 2019) ("Riley held only that the exception to the warrant requirement for searches incident to arrest does not extend to searches of information contained in cellphones, and T.L.O. held that '[t]he warrant requirement ... is unsuited to the school environment,'. . . so there is room for a reasonable school official to conclude that Riley has no application to school searches. And in the light of the permissible disagreement about the implications of Riley for school searches, we cannot say that Oates was 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowingly violate[d] the law.'. . Jackson also cites a pair of out-of-circuit district-court opinions, see Gallimore v. Henrico Cty. Sch. Bd., 38 F. Supp. 3d 721 (E.D. Va. 2014), Klump v. Nazareth Area Sch. Dist., 425 F. Supp. 2d 622 (E.D. Pa. 2006), and an opinion from one of our sister circuits, G.C. v. Owensboro Pub. Sch., 711 F.3d 623 (6th Cir. 2013), but these decisions cannot clearly establish that Oates's conduct was unlawful. As we have repeatedly explained, 'a district court case cannot clearly establish the law for qualified immunity purposes.'. . Nor can a decision from one of our sister circuits do so.")

Benjamin v. City of Miami, 727 F. App'x 635, 639 (11th Cir. 2018) ("Federal courts may rely on a state court decision to decide whether a plaintiff has demonstrated a violation of his clearly established rights. . . But for this reliance to be proper, the state court decision must pertain to a violation of federal law. . . Since Haliburton's due process holding was expressly confined to state law, it cannot clearly establish a federal due process right.")

Rachel v. City of Mobile, Ala., 112 F. Supp. 3d 1263, 1281-83 (S.D. Ala. 2015), aff'd sub nom. Rachel v. McCann, 633 F. App'x 784 (11th Cir. 2016) (affirming denial of qualified immunity as to claim that officers repeatedly kicked and beat Rachel while he lay prone and non-resisting on ground) ("The plaintiff asserts that McCann and Jackson 'provoked a violent situation' by needlessly approaching a person known to be emotionally disturbed, 'essentially precipitating the violence instead of heading it off.'. . The Court need not consider whether such conduct would reflect a constitutional violation, because the plaintiff has failed to show it was clearly established before May 2012 that such conduct would violate Greg's constitutional rights. The plaintiff does not suggest that the very language of the Fourth Amendment clearly establishes that provoking a confrontation with an emotionally disturbed felon is unconstitutional. Instead, she asks the Court to look to Ninth Circuit precedent indicating that such conduct can be unconstitutional. . . 'Our Court looks only to binding precedent—cases from the United States Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, and the highest court of the state under which the claim arose—to determine whether the right in question was clearly established at the time of the violation.'. . .The plaintiff also discusses several Eleventh Circuit cases discussing the use of excessive force in effecting an arrest, . . . but none of them speak to the constitutionality of the antecedent act of approaching the suspect or 'provoking' a confrontation. . . Finally, the plaintiff repairs to Hope v. Pelzer, . . . which she believes stands for the proposition that 'fair warning could come from ... non-decisional authority,' such that, '[w]here an officer, by training and by internal policy, is advised as [to] the potential danger of a particular type of excessive force, they are on notice that their conduct violates clearly established law.'. . . It is true that the Hope Court stated that, 'in light of binding Eleventh Circuit precedent, an Alabama Department of Corrections (ADOC) regulation, and a DOJ report informing the ADOC of the constitutional infirmity in its use of the hitching post, we readily conclude that the respondents' conduct violated' the petitioner's clearly established constitutional rights. . . But the Supreme Court did not say or suggest that a plaintiff can meet her burden of demonstrating the existence of a clearly established constitutional right by relying on 'nondecisional authority.'. . .In short, the Hope Court's discussion of non-decisional authority does not support the proposition that such authority can carry a plaintiff's burden of showing the violation of a clearly established constitutional right in the absence of any decisional authority doing so. Certainly nothing in Hope can be construed as overriding the Eleventh Circuit rule that constitutional rights can be clearly established only by binding precedent, . . . or by the very words of a statute or constitutional provision. . . Within the past few days, the Supreme Court has plainly torpedoed the plaintiff's argument. The plaintiff in City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, —– U.S. ——–, 135 S.Ct. 1765, 191 L.Ed.2d 856 (2015), supported her Fourth Amendment claim with expert testimony that the defendant law enforcement officers 'fell short of their training by not using practices designed to minimize the risk of violence when dealing with the mentally ill.'. . The Court canvassed the case law and concluded that 'the officers' failure to accommodate [the plaintiff's] illness [did not] violat[e] clearly established law.'. . The Court then rejected the plaintiff's reliance on her expert's opinion: 'Even if an officer acts contrary to her training, however, ... that does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted.'. . There thus can be no doubt that training and policy cannot substitute for appropriate judicial precedent in the 'clearly established' analysis. In summary, McCann and Jackson are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to any claim of excessive force based on provocation.")

Williams v. Hudson, 602 F. App'x 769, 772-73 (11th Cir. 2015) ("In the light most favorable to Mrs. Williams, the evidence fails to show that the Officers violated a clearly established constitutional right of Mrs. Williams. In Coffin v. Brandau, we determined that entry into an open garage can constitute a search under the Fourth Amendment under certain circumstances. . . We also determined that, prior to the date Coffin was decided, this right was not clearly established. . . The incident in this case occurred prior to our decision in Coffin. However, clearly established law may differ from state to state. . . Coffin involved an incident in Florida. This case involves an incident in Georgia. Thus, we are bound by our determination in Coffin that this right was not clearly established in 2010 under Eleventh Circuit law or United States Supreme Court law, but we must determine whether this right was clearly established under Georgia Supreme Court law. Mrs. Williams only cites one Georgia Supreme Court case on this issue. See Landers v. State, 250 Ga. 808 (Ga.1983). The question in Landers was whether a warrant for the search of a dwelling allowed for the search of a vehicle on a neighboring lot. . . The case does not address the issue before us, and Mrs. Williams has failed to demonstrate that the Officers violated a clearly established constitutional right. The district court properly concluded that the Officers were entitled to qualified immunity on the illegal search claim.")

Trammell v. Thomason, 335 F. App'x 835, 2009 WL 1706591, at *5-*7 & n.7 (11th Cir June 18, 2009) ("Trammell argues that he is not required to point to 'materially similar' case law from this circuit after the Supreme Court's decision in Hope, 536 U.S. at 739. We cannot agree. Hope states that a plaintiff need not point to a prior case holding that the exact conduct in question was impermissible. It is silent in regard to the issue of whether case law from another circuit alone may be sufficient to put an officer on notice of the impermissibility of his conduct. Accordingly, we remain bound by our circuit law on this issue. . . . While there was case law in July of 2003 from the Fourth Circuit finding a constitutional violation where a police dog similarly trained was released without an adequate warning, . . . we have found no case from our Court, the Supreme Court of the United States, or the Supreme Court of Florida which so holds. . . . We are unpersuaded that Dorough's conduct lies so far beyond the border of permissive and excessive conduct that every reasonable officer in Dorough's position would have concluded that his behavior was unlawful. Accordingly, we will affirm the District Court's determination that Dorough is entitled to qualified immunity for his conduct in allegedly releasing Yacco without a warning.").

Grayden v. Rhodes, 345 F.3d 1225, 1251 n.4 (11th Cir. 2003) (Birch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("It is true that thus far we look only to our own precedent and the decisions of the United States Supreme Court and the supreme court of the relevant state in this Circuit to determine whether law is clearly established. . . Language in a number of fairly recent Supreme Court opinions, however, has signaled a different approach. [citing Hope, Wilson, Lanier, Elder, Anderson] Under 'current American law,' the rule in Memphis Light is unmistakable. Sister courts have held that those summarily evicted through condemnation procedures are entitled to contemporaneous notice of their right to appeal.").

Cagle v. Sutherland, 334 F.3d 980, 989, 990 n.15 (11th Cir. 2003) (per curiam) ("Because we presume that Jailer Cole was aware of Butler's suicide threats, we must look to see whether Jailer Cole's acts were deliberately indifferent to this risk. We conclude that–under the facts of this case–Jailer Cole's allowing one hour and forty minutes to elapse between jail checks was not deliberately indifferent. [The consent decree] required the jailor to check the cells every hour. But [consent decree] did not establish a constitutional right to hourly jail checks, and [decree] was not focused on preventing suicide. . . . Even if Jailer Cole had violated the Constitution, he likely would be entitled to qualified immunity, having violated no clearly established constitutional rights. We are not aware of any of our cases or any case from the United States or Alabama Supreme Courts that would have put Jailer Cole on notice that his acts, given the circumstances, were clearly unconstitutional. [Consent decree] does not do the job; a consent decree like Praytor cannot establish constitutional rights, and obviously it cannot clearly establish constitutional rights. A precedent with materially similar facts is not always required; but for a federal right to be clearly established, the applicable law 'Amust be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'" . . . Here, if Jailer Cole examined the precedents he could reasonably conclude that his conduct–monitoring via TV cameras (and visiting the cell, at least once, during each hour of the night) an inmate who had been stripped of his belt, shoelaces and so on and confined in a stripped cell–was reasonable and was not nearly deliberately indifferent.").

Vinyard v. Wilson, 311 F.3d 1340, 1348 & n.11 (11th Cir. 2002) ("While the parties do not cite and we have not located Supreme Court, Eleventh Circuit, or Georgia Supreme Court decisions regarding pepper spray use in the course of an arrest, other courts have addressed its use. Courts have consistently concluded that using pepper spray is excessive force in cases where the crime is a minor infraction, the arrestee surrenders, is secured, and is not acting violently, and there is no threat to the officers or anyone else. . . . Although we cite and examine other circuits' and district courts' decisions under the first prong of Saucier, we point out that these decisions are immaterial to whether the law was 'clearly established' in this circuit for the second prong of Saucier.").

Marsh v. Butler County, 268 F.3d 1014, 1033 n.10 (11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("When case law is needed to 'clearly establish' the law applicable to the pertinent circumstances, we look to decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, and the highest court of the pertinent state. . . We do not understand Wilson v. Layne, . . . to have held that a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' from other courts would be able to establish the law clearly. . . Each jurisdiction has its own body of law, and splits between jurisdictions on matters of law are not uncommon. We do not expect public officials to sort out the law of every jurisdiction in the country.")

Gonzalez v. Lee County Housing Authority, 161 F.3d 1290, 1301-03 (11th Cir. 1998) ("Ordinarily, a plaintiff who seeks to overcome a state official's affirmative defense of qualified immunity must cite case law, in force at the time of the defendant's actions, that would have made it absolutely clear that the defendant's conduct violated federal law. There is no case from the U.S. Supreme Court, this Circuit, or the relevant state Supreme Court, that would have established that a person violates section 3617 by firing an employee for refusing to discriminate against potential tenants on the basis of race. . . . The absence of such a case is not fatal to Gonzalez's claim, however, because this case differs from the typical qualified immunity case in which the plaintiff sues a public official pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and asserts the violation of some (often generally worded) constitutional right. Although the assertion of such broadly conceived rights, without the benefit of sufficiently illuminating case law, may fail to overcome the hurdle of qualified immunity, . . . we have acknowledged the possibility that some federal statutory provisions will be sufficiently clear on their own to provide defendants with fair notice of their obligations under the law. . . . Section 3617 provides just such an explicit statement of what the Fair Housing Act demanded of the defendant in this case. Section 3617 renders it unlawful to 'interfere with any person ... on account of his having aided or encouraged any other person in the exercise or enjoyment of ... any right granted or protected by section 3603, 3604, 3605, or 3606 of this title.' Section 3604, in turn, bars racial discrimination in the 'terms, conditions, or privileges of sale or rental of a dwelling, or in the provision of services or facilities in connection therewith....' 42 U.S.C. § 3604(b). Section 3617, read in conjunction with section 3604, therefore, straightforwardly states the unsurprising (and presumably uncontroversial) proposition that the Fair Housing Act prohibits 'interfering' with any person because she 'aided or encouraged' another person's exercise of her right to rent property free from racial discrimination. Any reasonable public official, having read the plain terms of this statute, certainly would have understood that federal law makes it unlawful to terminate an employee for refusing to discriminate against potential tenants on the basis of race. To the extent any federal statute, standing alone, can provide a potential defendant with concrete notice, 'that is, truly compel (not just suggest or allow or raise a question about), the conclusion for every like-situated, reasonable government agent that what

[she] is doing violates federal law,' we believe that section 3617 provides such notice in the circumstances of this case. . . . Alternatively, even if a public official credibly could argue that the language of the statute provided insufficient notice, its implementing federal regulation, adopted in 1989, removes all doubt about whether federal law makes it illegal to fire an employee for refusing to discriminate on the basis of race. . . . A public official forfeits qualified immunity by violating the clear command of a federal regulation that, like section 100.400(c)(3), reinforces a statute and thus helps to provide the basis for a cause of action.").

Hamilton v. Cannon, 80 F.3d 1525, 1532 & n.7 (11th Cir. 1996) ("It would take much creativity and imagination to glean from the factually distinguishable cases upon which the plaintiffs rely a clearly established rule of law that an unsuccessful, negligent, or reckless rescue attempt, or interference with a bystander's rescue attempt, amounts to a constitutional violation. We decline to exercise such creativity and imagination, because qualified immunity doctrine prohibits it. . . . The case that most strongly lends support to plaintiffs' position is the Seventh Circuit decision in Ross v. United States. . . . However, even if Ross were indistinguishable, Seventh Circuit decisions can not clearly establish the law for purposes of qualified immunity in this circuit.").

Kelly v. Curtis, 21 F.3d 1544, 1551 n.6 (11th Cir. 1994) ("By distinguishing these two out-of-circuit decisions that [plaintiff] has cited, we do not mean to imply that the law can be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes by non-binding precedent. See Hansen v. Soldenwagner, 19 F.3d 573, 578 n. 6 (11th Cir.1994) ("[T]he case law of one other circuit cannot settle the law in this circuit to the point of it being 'clearly established.'"). Even if out-of-circuit decisions could clearly establish the law in this Circuit, a distinguishable, non-binding case does not clearly establish anything.").

Hansen v. Soldenwagner, 19 F.3d 573, 576 (11th Cir. 1994) ("Because Pickering requires a balancing of competing interests on a case-by-case basis, our decisions tilt strongly in favor of immunity by recognizing that only in the rarest of cases will reasonable government officials truly know that the termination or discipline of a public employee violated 'clearly established' federal rights.").

Fortner v. Thomas, 983 F.2d 1024, 1028 (11th Cir. 1993) ("The nonexistence of a decision specifically addressing the alleged right is a significant consideration in determining whether the right is clearly established . . . . In addition the existence of Supreme Court cases or cases in this circuit that recognize the alleged right is particularly important in determining whether the law is sufficiently clear to a reasonable official.").

Courson v. McMillian, 939 F.2d 1479, 1498 n.32 (11th Cir. 1991) ("[C]learly established law in this circuit may include court decisions of the highest state court in the states that comprise this circuit as to those respective states, when the state supreme court has addressed a federal constitutional issue that has not been addressed by the United States Supreme Court or the Eleventh Circuit.").

B. Defining the Contours of the Right

U.S. SUPREME COURT

Cope v. Cogdill, 142 S. Ct. 2573, 2576 (2022) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) ("No reasonable officer would have stood and watched as a detainee strangled himself to death when a simple, safe, and patently obvious response was available and in fact required by jail policy and Laws' specific training. Laws' failure to call emergency medical services was an inexplicable and unreasonable decision that, under any standard, clearly constituted deliberate indifference to Monroe's life-or-death medical needs. Accordingly, Laws was not entitled to qualified immunity. The Fifth Circuit's conclusion that respondents Cogdill and Brixey were entitled to qualified immunity is equally erroneous. It is undisputed that these respondents were aware of Monroe's risk of suicide. Brixey and Cogdill knew Monroe had twice attempted suicide by strangulation just the day before, that he had expressed a desire to kill himself when he was admitted to the jail, and that he had attempted suicide on another occasion two weeks earlier. Placing him alone in a cell containing a readily accessible ligature, a 30-inch telephone cord, violated the Constitution in a manner that would have been 'obvious' to any reasonable officer. . . That decision violated Cogdill's training as to the risks of placing suicidal detainees in isolation cells. It also broke with the Texas Commission on Jail Standards' guidance, which specifically warned of the dangers telephone cords posed to suicidal inmates and advised that telephone cords should be 12 inches or shorter. Respondents Brixey and Cogdill were not entitled to qualified immunity for their deliberate indifference to the risks to which they subjected Monroe. . . This Court cannot and should not correct every error that comes before it. But 'summary dispositions remain appropriate in truly extraordinary cases involving categories of errors that strike at the heart of our legal system.'. . This is such a case. It involves a mother seeking some measure of recompense for the tragic and unnecessary death of her son. On the uniquely troubling facts of this case, a jury should decide whether Cogdill and Brixey acted with deliberate indifference for housing Monroe in a cell with an instrument that predictably facilitated his suicide, and whether Laws likewise was deliberately indifferent for watching Monroe strangle himself but failing to contact emergency services promptly. I respectfully dissent from the Court's refusal to summarily reverse.")

Ramirez v. Guadarrama, 142 S. Ct. 2571, 2572-73 (2022) (Sotomayor, J., joined by Breyer, J., and Kagan, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) ("For the reasons ably set forth by Judge Willett, I would summarily reverse the Fifth Circuit's grant of qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage, a stage at which petitioners' well-pleaded allegations must be accepted as true. According to those allegations, the officers elected to use force knowing that it would directly cause the very outcome they claim to have sought to avoid. That is, to prevent Olivas from lighting himself on fire and burning down the house, the officers tased Olivas just after they were warned that it would light him on fire. This Court's precedent establishes that 'the "reasonableness" of a particular seizure depends not only on when it is made, but also on how it is carried out.'. . Using deadly force that does no more than knowingly effectuate the exact danger to be forestalled is clearly unreasonable under this standard. While 'this Court is not equipped to correct every perceived error coming from the lower federal courts,' it has deemed intervention appropriate where a Court of Appeals decision reflects a misapprehension of the standard for assessing excessive force claims at the stage of the litigation concerned. [citing Tolan v. Cotton] Factual development may reveal a different story, but, as relevant now, Ramirez and her family have plausibly alleged that the officers they called to prevent their husband and father's death instead used excessive force that predictably caused his death and the loss of their home. Under this Court's precedents, that claim is entitled to proceed to discovery to determine whether the family is entitled to some recompense for their unnecessary losses. I respectfully dissent.")

City of Tahlequah, Oklahoma v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 10-12 (2021) (granting certiorari and reversing) ("We need not, and do not, decide whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment in the first place, or whether recklessly creating a situation that requires deadly force can itself violate the Fourth Amendment. On this record, the officers plainly did not violate any clearly established law. The doctrine of qualified immunity shields officers from civil liability so long as their conduct 'does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.' Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U. S. 223, 231 (2009). As we have explained, qualified immunity protects '"all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law."'. . We have repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality. . . It is not enough that a rule be suggested by then-existing precedent; the 'rule's contours must be so well defined that it is "clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted."'. . Such specificity is 'especially important in the Fourth Amendment context,' where it is 'sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'. . The Tenth Circuit contravened those settled principles here. Not one of the decisions relied upon by the Court of Appeals—Estate of Ceballos v. Husk, 919 F. 3d 1204 (CA10 2019), Hastings v. Barnes, 252 Fed. Appx. 197 (CA10 2007), Allen, 119 F. 3d 837, and Sevier v. Lawrence, 60 F. 3d 695 (CA10 1995)—comes close to establishing that the officers' conduct was unlawful. The Court relied most heavily on Allen. But the facts of Allen are dramatically different from the facts here. The officers in Allen responded to a potential suicide call by sprinting toward a parked car, screaming at the suspect, and attempting to physically wrest a gun from his hands. . . Officers Girdner and Vick, by contrast, engaged in a conversation with Rollice, followed him into a garage at a distance of 6 to 10 feet, and did not yell until after he picked up a hammer. We cannot conclude that Allen 'clearly established' that their conduct was reckless or that their ultimate use of force was unlawful. . . .Neither the panel majority nor the respondent have identified a single precedent finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances. The officers were thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7-9 (per curiam) (granting certiorari and reversing) ("Even assuming that controlling Circuit precedent clearly establishes law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde did not give fair notice to Rivas-Villegas. He is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]his is not an obvious case. Thus, to show a violation of clearly established law, Cortesluna must identify a case that put Rivas-Villegas on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful. Cortesluna has not done so. Neither Cortesluna nor the Court of Appeals identified any Supreme Court case that addresses facts like the ones at issue here. Instead, the Court of Appeals relied solely on its precedent in LaLonde. Even assuming that Circuit precedent can clearly establish law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde is materially distinguishable and thus does not govern the facts of this case. . . . On the facts of this case, neither LaLonde nor any decision of this Court is sufficiently similar. For that reason, we grant Rivas-Villegas' petition for certiorari and reverse the Ninth Circuit's determination that Rivas-Villegas is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Taylor v. Riojas, 141 S. Ct. 52, 53-54 (2020) (per curiam) ("Petitioner Trent Taylor is an inmate in the custody of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice. Taylor alleges that, for six full days in September 2013, correctional officers confined him in a pair of shockingly unsanitary cells. . . . The first cell was covered, nearly floor to ceiling, in ' "massive amounts" of feces': all over the floor, the ceiling, the window, the walls, and even ' "packed inside the water faucet."'. . Fearing that his food and water would be contaminated, Taylor did not eat or drink for nearly four days. Correctional officers then moved Taylor to a second, frigidly cold cell, which was equipped with only a clogged drain in the floor to dispose of bodily wastes. Taylor held his bladder for over 24 hours, but he eventually (and involuntarily) relieved himself, causing the drain to overflow and raw sewage to spill across the floor. Because the cell lacked a bunk, and because Taylor was confined without clothing, he was left to sleep naked in sewage. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit properly held that such conditions of confinement violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. But, based on its assessment that '[t]he law wasn't clearly established' that 'prisoners couldn't be housed in cells teeming with human waste' 'for only six days,' the court concluded that the prison officials responsible for Taylor's confinement did not have ' "fair warning" that their specific acts were unconstitutional.'. .The Fifth Circuit erred in granting the officers qualified immunity on this basis. 'Qualified immunity shields an officer from suit when she makes a decision that, even if constitutionally deficient, reasonably misapprehends the law governing the circumstances she confronted.'. . But no reasonable correctional officer could have concluded that, under the extreme circumstances of this case, it was constitutionally permissible to house Taylor in such deplorably unsanitary conditions for such an extended period of time. . . The Fifth Circuit identified no evidence that the conditions of Taylor's confinement were compelled by necessity or exigency. Nor does the summary-judgment record reveal any reason to suspect that the conditions of Taylor's confinement could not have been mitigated, either in degree or duration. And although an officer-by-officer analysis will be necessary on remand, the record suggests that at least some officers involved in Taylor's ordeal were deliberately indifferent to the conditions of his cells. . . Confronted with the particularly egregious facts of this case, any reasonable officer should have realized that Taylor's conditions of confinement offended the Constitution. . . We therefore grant Taylor's petition for a writ of certiorari, vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. It is so ordered.") [Justice Thomas dissented without comment or opinion]

Taylor v. Riojas, 141 S. Ct. 52, 56 (2020) (Alito, J., concurring in the judgment) ("While I would not grant review on the question the Court addresses, I agree that summary judgment should not have been awarded on the issue of qualified immunity. We must view the summary judgment record in the light most favorable to petitioner, and when petitioner's verified complaint is read in this way, a reasonable fact-finder could infer not just that the conditions in the cells in question were horrific but that respondents chose to place and keep him in those particular cells, made no effort to have the cells cleaned, and did not explore the possibility of assignment to cells with better conditions. A reasonable corrections officer would have known that this course of conduct was unconstitutional, and the cases on which respondents rely do not show otherwise.")

[Compare Thomas v. Blackard, 2 F.4th 716, 720-22 (7th Cir. 2021) ("Thomas's assertions of feces-covered walls, a lack of hot water, hundreds of dead flies in his bed, and a mattress covered in human waste no doubt establish a material dispute on the objective prong of an Eighth Amendment claim. Indeed, these purported cell conditions are not far from the 'deplorably unsanitary conditions' decried in Taylor. 141 S. Ct. at 53. But that is not the end of the matter. Unlike in Taylor, Thomas failed to point to evidence that prison officials responded with deliberate indifference to the abysmal cell conditions. . . To the contrary, the record shows that officials reacted reasonably: Thomas promptly received a new, unsoiled mattress, several cups of disinfecting solvent to clean the walls, and gloves to remove the dead flies from his bunk bed. As for his complaint that his cell lacked hot water, Pontiac officials provided him with three hot showers per week while awaiting repair of the faucet. On this record, no reasonable jury could conclude these officials responded with deliberate indifference to Thomas's cell conditions. . . .The conditions of confinement Thomas encountered at Pontiac are troubling. But prison officials took steps to address the inadequacies. Because Thomas has not produced evidence of deliberate indifference by Blackard and Punke, we AFFIRM.")]

City of Escondido, Cal. v. Emmons, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503-04 (2019) (per curiam) ("Under our cases, the clearly established right must be defined with specificity. 'This Court has repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . That is particularly important in excessive force cases . . . . In this case, the Court of Appeals contravened those settled principles. The Court of Appeals should have asked whether clearly established law prohibited the officers from stopping and taking down a man in these circumstances. Instead, the Court of Appeals defined the clearly established right at a high level of generality by saying only that the 'right to be free of excessive force' was clearly established. With the right defined at that high level of generality, the Court of Appeals then denied qualified immunity to the officers and remanded the case for trial. . . Under our precedents, the Court of Appeals' formulation of the clearly established right was far too general. To be sure, the Court of Appeals cited the Gravelet–Blondin case from that Circuit, which described a right to be 'free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance....'. . . Assuming without deciding that a court of appeals decision may constitute clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity, . . . the Ninth Circuit's Gravelet–Blondin case law involved police force against individuals engaged in passive resistance. The Court of Appeals made no effort to explain how that case law prohibited Officer Craig's actions in this case. That is a problem under our precedents. . . .The Court of Appeals failed to properly analyze whether clearly established law barred Officer Craig from stopping and taking down Marty Emmons in this manner as Emmons exited the apartment. Therefore, we remand the case for the Court of Appeals to conduct the analysis required by our precedents with respect to whether Officer Craig is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1152-54 (2018) (per curiam) ("Here, the Court need not, and does not, decide whether Kisela violated the Fourth Amendment when he used deadly force against Hughes. For even assuming a Fourth Amendment violation occurred—a proposition that is not at all evident—on these facts Kisela was at least entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Where constitutional guidelines seem inapplicable or too remote, it does not suffice for a court simply to state that an officer may not use unreasonable and excessive force, deny qualified immunity, and then remitthe case for a trial on the question of reasonableness. An officer 'cannot be said to have violated a clearly established right unless the right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it.' [citing Plumhoff] That is a necessary part of the qualified-immunity standard, and it is a part of the standard that the Court of Appeals here failed to implement in a correct way. Kisela says he shot Hughes because, although the officers themselves were in no apparent danger, he believed she was a threat to Chadwick. Kisela had mere seconds to assess the potential danger to Chadwick. He was confronted with a woman who had just been seen hacking a tree with a large kitchen knife and whose behavior was erratic enough to cause a concerned bystander to call 911 and then flag down Kisela and Garcia. Kisela was separated from Hughes and Chadwick by a chain-link fence; Hughes had moved to within a few feet of Chadwick; and she failed to acknowledge at least two commands to drop the knife. Those commands were loud enough that Chadwick, who was standing next to Hughes, heard them. This is far from an obvious case in which any competent officer would have known that shooting Hughes to protect Chadwick would violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . [N]ot one of the decisions relied on by the Court of Appeals—Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (C.A.9 2001), Glenn v. Washington County, 673 F.3d 864 (C.A.9 2011), and Harris v. Roderick, 126 F.3d 1189 (C.A.9 1997)—supports denying Kisela qualified immunity." [majority discusses and distinguishes Deorle, Glenn, and Harris])

Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1155, 1158-62 (2018) (per curiam) (Sotomayor, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., dissenting) ("Officer Andrew Kisela shot Amy Hughes while she was speaking with her roommate, Sharon Chadwick, outside of their home. The record, properly construed at this stage, shows that at the time of the shooting: Hughes stood stationary about six feet away from Chadwick, appeared 'composed and content,' . . . and held a kitchen knife down at her side with the blade facing away from Chadwick. Hughes was nowhere near the officers, had committed no illegal act, was suspected of no crime, and did not raise the knife in the direction of Chadwick or anyone else. Faced with these facts, the two other responding officers held their fire, and one testified that he 'wanted to continue trying verbal command[s] and see if that would work.'. . But not Kisela. He thought it necessary to use deadly force, and so, without giving a warning that he would open fire, he shot Hughes four times, leaving her seriously injured. If this account of

Kisela's conduct sounds unreasonable, that is because it was. And yet, the Court today insulates that conduct from liability under the doctrine of qualified immunity, holding that Kisela violated no 'clearly established' law. . . I disagree. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Hughes, as the Court must at summary judgment, a jury could find that Kisela violated Hughes' clearly established Fourth Amendment rights by needlessly resorting to lethal force. In holding otherwise, the Court misapprehends the facts and misapplies the law, effectively treating qualified immunity as an absolute shield. I therefore respectfully dissent. . . .Rather than defend the reasonableness of Kisela's conduct, the majority sidesteps the inquiry altogether and focuses instead on the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . To be ' "clearly established" ... [t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . That standard is not nearly as onerous as the majority makes it out to be. As even the majority must acknowledge, . . . this Court has long rejected the notion that 'an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful[.]'. . '[O]fficials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . At its core, then, the 'clearly established' inquiry boils down to whether Kisela had 'fair notice' that he acted unconstitutionally. . .The answer to that question is yes. This Court's precedents make clear that a police officer may only deploy deadly force against an individual if the officer 'has probable cause to believe that the [person] poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.'. . It is equally well established that any use of lethal force must be justified by some legitimate governmental interest. . . Consistent with those clearly established principles, and contrary to the majority's conclusion, Ninth Circuit precedent predating these events further confirms that Kisela's conduct was clearly unreasonable. . . Because Kisela plainly lacked any legitimate interest justifying the use of deadly force against a woman who posed no objective threat of harm to officers or others, had committed no crime, and appeared calm and collected during the police encounter, he was not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he majority asserts that Hughes was 'within striking distance' of Chadwick, . . but that stretches the facts and contravenes this Court's repeated admonition that inferences must be drawn in the exact opposite direction, i.e., in favor of Hughes. [citing Tolan] The facts, properly viewed, show that, when she was shot, Hughes had stopped and stood still about six feet away from Chadwick. Whether Hughes could 'strik[e]' Chadwick from that particular distance, even though the kitchen knife was held down at her side, is an inference that should be drawn by the jury, not this Court. . . . Both Curnow and Harris establish that, where, as here, an individual with a weapon poses no objective and immediate threat to officers or third parties, law enforcement cannot resort to excessive force. . . . If all that were not enough, decisions from several other Circuits illustrate that the Fourth Amendment clearly forbids the use of deadly force against a person who is merely holding a knife but not threatening anyone with it. [collecting cases] In sum, precedent existing at the time of the shooting clearly established the unconstitutionality of Kisela's conduct. The majority's decision, no matter how much it says otherwise, ultimately rests on a faulty premise: that those cases are not identical to this one. But that is not the law, for our cases have never required a factually identical case to satisfy the 'clearly established' standard. . . It is enough that governing law places 'the constitutionality of the officer's conduct beyond debate.'. . Because, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Hughes, it is

'beyond debate' that Kisela's use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable, he was not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . .For the foregoing reasons, it is clear to me that the Court of Appeals got it right. But even if that result were not so clear, I cannot agree with the majority's apparent view that the decision below was so manifestly incorrect as to warrant 'the extraordinary remedy of a summary reversal.'. . . The relevant facts are hotly disputed, and the qualified-immunity question here is, at the very best, a close call. Rather than letting this case go to a jury, the Court decides to intervene prematurely, purporting to correct an error that is not at all clear. This unwarranted summary reversal is symptomatic of 'a disturbing trend regarding the use of this Court's resources' in qualified-immunity cases. . . As I have previously noted, this Court routinely displays an unflinching willingness 'to summarily reverse courts for wrongly denying officers the protection of qualified immunity' but 'rarely intervene[s] where courts wrongly afford officers the benefit of qualified immunity in these same cases.'. . see also Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful? 106 Cal. L. Rev. 45, 82 (2018) ("[N]early all of the Supreme Court's qualified immunity cases come out the same way—by finding immunity for the officials"); Reinhardt, The Demise of Habeas Corpus and the Rise of Qualified Immunity: The Court's Ever Increasing Limitations on the Development and Enforcement of Constitutional Rights and Some Particularly Unfortunate Consequences, 113 Mich. L.Rev. 1219, 1244–1250 (2015). Such a one-sided approach to qualified immunity transforms the doctrine into an absolute shield for law enforcement officers, gutting the deterrent effect of the Fourth Amendment. The majority today exacerbates that troubling asymmetry. Its decision is not just wrong on the law; it also sends an alarming signal to law enforcement officers and the public. It tells officers that they can shoot first and think later, and it tells the public that palpably unreasonable conduct will go unpunished. Because there is nothing right or just under the law about this, I respectfully dissent.")

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 589-91 & n.7 (2018) ("Our conclusion that the officers had probable cause to arrest the partygoers is sufficient to resolve this case. But where, as here, the Court of Appeals erred on both the merits of the constitutional claim and the question of qualified immunity, 'we have discretion to correct its errors at each step.'. . We exercise that discretion here because the D. C. Circuit's analysis, if followed elsewhere, would 'undermine the values qualified immunity seeks to promote.'. . .We continue to stress that lower courts 'should think hard, and then think hard again,' before addressing both qualified immunity and the merits of an underlying constitutional claim. . . We addressed the merits of probable cause here, however, because a decision on qualified immunity alone would not have resolved all of the claims in this case. . . . The 'clearly established' standard also requires that the legal principle clearly prohibit the officer's conduct in the particular circumstances before him. The rule's contours must be so well defined that it is 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' Saucier v. Katz, 533 U. S. 194, 202 (2001). This requires a high 'degree of specificity.' [citing Mullenix] We have repeatedly stressed that courts must not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality, since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.' [citing Plumhoff] A rule is too general if the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct 'does not follow immediately from the conclusion that [the rule] was firmly established.' [citing Anderson] In the context of a warrantless arrest, the rule must obviously resolve "whether 'the circumstances with which [the particular officer] was confronted . . . constitute[d] probable cause.'". . We have stressed that the 'specificity' of the rule is 'especially important in the Fourth Amendment context.' [citing Mullenix] Probable cause 'turn[s] on the assessment of probabilities in particular factual contexts' and cannot be 'reduced to a neat set of legal rules.'. . . Given its imprecise nature, officers will often find it difficult to know how the general standard of probable cause applies in 'the precise situation encountered.' [citing Ziglar] Thus, we have stressed the need to 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances . . . was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.' [citing Pauly] While there does not have to be 'a case directly on point,' existing precedent must place the lawfulness of the particular arrest 'beyond debate.' [citing al-Kidd] Of course, there can be the rare 'obvious case,' where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances. [citing Brosseau] But 'a body of relevant case law' is usually necessary to ' 'clearly establish' the answer' with respect to probable cause. . .Under these principles, we readily conclude that the officers here were entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The officers found a group of people in a house that the neighbors had identified as vacant, that appeared to be vacant, and that the partygoers were treating as vacant. The group scattered, and some hid, at the sight of law enforcement. Their explanations for being at the house were full of holes. The source of their claimed invitation admitted that she had no right to be in the house, and the owner confirmed that fact. Even assuming the officers lacked actual probable cause to arrest the partygoers, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because they 'reasonably but mistakenly conclude[d] that probable cause [wa]s present.'. . Tellingly, neither the panel majority nor the partygoers have identified a single precedent--much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases--finding a Fourth Amendment violation 'under similar circumstances.'. . And it should go without saying that this is not an 'obvious case' where 'a body of relevant case law' is not needed. . . The officers were thus entitled to qualified immunity.") Hernandez v. Mesa, 137 S. Ct. 2003, 2007 (2017) ("With respect to petitioners' Fifth Amendment claim, the en banc Court of Appeals found it unnecessary to address the Bivens question because it held that Mesa was entitled to qualified immunity. In reaching that conclusion, the en banc Court of Appeals relied on the fact that Hernández was 'an alien who had no significant voluntary connection to ... the United States.'. . It is undisputed, however, that Hernández's nationality and the extent of his ties to the United States were unknown to Mesa at the time of the shooting. The en banc Court of Appeals therefore erred in granting qualified immunity based on those facts. . . 'The doctrine of qualified immunity shields officials from civil liability so long as their conduct "does not violate clearly established ... constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known."'. . The 'dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . The qualified immunity analysis thus is limited to 'the facts that were knowable to the defendant officers' at the time they engaged in the conduct in question. White v. Pauly, 580 U.S. ——, ——, 137 S.Ct. 548, 550, 196 L.Ed.2d 463 (2017) (per curiam). Facts an officer learns after the incident ends—whether those facts would support granting immunity or denying it—are not relevant. Mesa and the Government contend that Mesa is entitled to qualified immunity even if Mesa was uncertain about Hernández's nationality and his ties to the United States at the time of the shooting. The Government also argues that, in any event, petitioners' claim is cognizable only under the Fourth Amendment, and not under the Fifth Amendment. This Court declines to address these arguments in the first instance. The Court of Appeals may address them, if necessary, on remand.")

Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1868-69 (2017) ("To be sure, this Court has not given its approval to [the intracorporate-conspiracy] doctrine in the specific context of § 1985(3). . . There is a division in the courts of appeals, moreover, respecting the validity or correctness of the intracorporate-conspiracy doctrine with reference to § 1985 conspiracies. . . Nothing in this opinion should be interpreted as either approving or disapproving the intracorporate-conspiracy doctrine's application in the context of an alleged § 1985(3) violation. The Court might determine, in some later case, that different considerations apply to a conspiracy respecting equal protection guarantees, as distinct from a conspiracy in the antitrust context. Yet the fact that the courts are divided as to whether or not a § 1985(3) conspiracy can arise from official discussions between or among agents of the same entity demonstrates that the law on the point is not well established. When the courts are divided on an issue so central to the cause of action alleged, a reasonable official lacks the notice required before imposing liability. See Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 618, 119 S.Ct. 1692, 143 L.Ed.2d 818 (1999) (noting that it would be "unfair" to subject officers to damages liability when even "judges ... disagree"); Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658, 669–670, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012) (same). In addition to the concern that agents of the same legal entity are not distinct enough to conspire with one another, there are other sound reasons to conclude that conversations and agreements between and among federal officials in the same Department should not be the subject of a private cause of action for damages under § 1985(3). . . .These considerations suggest that officials employed by the same governmental department do not conspire when they speak to one another and work together in their official capacities. Whether that contention should prevail need not be decided here. It suffices to say that the question is sufficiently open so that the officials in this suit could not be certain that § 1985(3) was applicable to their discussions and actions. Thus, the law respondents seek to invoke cannot be clearly established. It follows that reasonable officers in petitioners' positions would not have known with any certainty that the alleged agreements were forbidden by law. . . Petitioners are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3).")

White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 551-53 (2017) (per curiam) ("Officer White did not violate clearly established law on the record described by the Court of Appeals panel. . . . In the last five years, this Court has issued a number of opinions reversing federal courts in qualified immunity cases. See, e.g., City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U. S. ___, ___, n. 3 (2015) (slip op., at 10, n.3) (collecting cases). The Court has found this necessary both because qualified immunity is important to '"society as a whole,"'. . . and because as '"an immunity from suit,"' qualified immunity '"is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial,"' Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U. S. 223, 231 (2009). Today, it is again necessary to reiterate the longstanding principle that 'clearly established law' should not be defined 'at a high level of generality.' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U. S. 731, 742 (2011). As this Court explained decades ago, the clearly established law must be 'particularized' to the facts of the case. . . Otherwise, '[p]laintiffs would be able to convert the rule of qualified immunity . . . into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.'. . The panel majority misunderstood the 'clearly established' analysis: It failed to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as Officer White was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment. Instead, the majority relied on Graham, Garner, and their Court of Appeals progeny, which—as noted above—lay out excessive-force principles at only a general level. Of course, 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning' to officers, United States v. Lanier, 520 U. S. 259, 271 (1997), but 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent,' Anderson v. Creighton, supra, at 640. For that reason, we have held that Garner and Graham do not by themselves create clearly established law outside 'an obvious case.' Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U. S. 194, 199 (2004) (per curiam); see also Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U. S. ___, ___ (2014) (slip op., at 13) (emphasizing that Garner and Graham 'are "cast at a high level of generality"'). This is not a case where it is obvious that there was a violation of clearly established law under Garner and Graham. Of note, the majority did not conclude that White's conduct—such as his failure to shout a warning—constituted a run-of-the-mill Fourth Amendment violation. Indeed, it recognized that 'this case presents a unique set of facts and circumstances' in light of White's late arrival on the scene. . . This alone should have been an important indication to the majority that White's conduct did not violate a 'clearly established' right. Clearly established federal law does not prohibit a reasonable officer who arrives late to an ongoing police action in circumstances like this from assuming that proper procedures, such as officer identification, have already been followed. No settled Fourth Amendment principle requires that officer to second-guess the earlier steps already taken by his or her fellow officers in instances like the one White confronted here. On the record described by the Court of Appeals, Officer White did not violate clearly established law. The Court notes, however, that respondents contend Officer White arrived on the scene only two minutes after Officers Truesdale and Mariscal and more than three minutes before Daniel's shots were fired. On the assumption that the conduct of Officers Truesdale and Mariscal did not adequately alert the Paulys that they were police officers, respondents suggest that a reasonable jury could infer that White witnessed the other officers' deficient performance and should have realized that corrective action was necessary before using deadly force. . . This Court expresses no position on this potential alternative ground for affirmance, as it appears that neither the District Court nor the Court of Appeals panel addressed it. The Court also expresses no opinion on the question whether this ground was properly preserved or whether—in light of this Court's holding today—Officers Truesdale and Mariscal are entitled to qualified immunity. For the foregoing reasons, the petition for certiorari is granted; the judgment of the Court of Appeals is vacated; and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. It is so ordered.") White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 553 (per curiam) (2017) (Ginsburg, J., concurring) ("I join the Court's opinion on the understanding that it does not foreclose the denial of summary judgment to Officers Truesdale and Mariscal. See 814 F. 3d 1060, 1068, 1073, 1074 (CA10 2016) (Court of Appeals emphasized, repeatedly, that fact disputes exist on question whether Truesdale and Mariscal 'adequately identified themselves' as police officers before shouting 'Come out or we're coming in' (internal quotation marks omitted)). Further, as to Officer White, the Court, as I comprehend its opinion, leaves open the propriety of denying summary judgment based on fact disputes over when Officer White arrived at the scene, what he may have witnessed, and whether he had adequate time to identify himself and order Samuel Pauly to drop his weapon before Officer White shot Pauly.")

City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Cal. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1775-78 (2015) ("The real question. . . is whether, despite these dangerous circumstances, the officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they decided to reopen Sheehan's door rather than attempting to accommodate her disability. Here we come to another problem. San Francisco, whose attorneys represent Reynolds and Holder, devotes scant briefing to this question. Instead, San Francisco argues almost exclusively that even if it is assumed that there was a Fourth Amendment violation, the right was not clearly established. This Court, of course, could decide the constitutional question anyway. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 242, 129 S.Ct. 808, 172 L.Ed.2d 565 (2009) (recognizing discretion). But because this question has not been adequately briefed, we decline to do so. . . Rather, we simply decide whether the officers' failure to accommodate Sheehan's illness violated clearly established law. It did not. To begin, nothing in our cases suggests the constitutional rule applied by the Ninth Circuit. The Ninth Circuit focused on Graham v. Connor,. . . but Graham holds only that the ' "objective reasonableness"' test applies to excessive-force claims under the Fourth Amendment. . . That is far too general a proposition to control this case. 'We have repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Qualified immunity is no immunity at all if 'clearly established' law can simply be defined as the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. Even a cursory glance at the facts of Graham confirms just how different that case is from this one. That case did not involve a dangerous, obviously unstable person making threats, much less was there a weapon involved. There is a world of difference between needlessly withholding sugar from an innocent person who is suffering from an insulin reaction. . . and responding to the perilous situation Reynolds and Holder confronted. Graham is a nonstarter. Moving beyond Graham, the Ninth Circuit also turned to two of its own cases. But even if 'a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established federal law in these circumstances,' Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. —— —, —— (2014) (per curiam) (slip op., at 4), it does not do so here. The Ninth Circuit first pointed to Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (C.A.9 2001), but from the very first paragraph of that opinion we learn that Deorle involved an officer's use of a beanbag gun to subdue 'an emotionally disturbed' person who 'was unarmed, had not attacked or even touched anyone, had generally obeyed the instructions given him by various police officers, and had not committed any serious offense.'. . The officer there, moreover, 'observed Deorle at close proximity for about five to ten minutes before shooting him' in the face. . . Whatever the merits of the decision in Deorle, the differences between that case and the case before us leap from the page. Unlike Deorle, Sheehan was dangerous, recalcitrant, law-breaking, and out of sight. The Ninth Circuit also leaned on Alexander v. City and County of San Francisco, 29 F.3d 1355 (C.A.9 1994), another case involving mental illness. There, officials from San Francisco attempted to enter Henry Quade's home 'for the primary purpose of arresting him' even though they lacked an arrest warrant. . . Quade, in response, fired a handgun; police officers 'shot back, and Quade died from gunshot wounds shortly thereafter.'. . The panel concluded that a jury should decide whether the officers used excessive force. The court reasoned that the officers provoked the confrontation because there were no 'exigent circumstances' excusing their entrance. . .Alexander too is a poor fit. As Judge Graber observed below in her dissent, the Ninth Circuit has long read Alexander narrowly. . . Under Ninth Circuit law. . . an entry that otherwise complies with the Fourth Amendment is not rendered unreasonable because it provokes a violent reaction. . . Under this rule, qualified immunity necessarily applies here because, as explained above, competent officers could have believed that the second entry was justified under both continuous search and exigent circumstance rationales. Indeed, even if Reynolds and Holder misjudged the situation, Sheehan cannot 'establish a Fourth Amendment violation based merely on bad tactics that result in a deadly confrontation that could have been avoided.'. . Courts must not judge officers with 'the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . When Graham, Deorle, and Alexander are viewed together, the central error in the Ninth Circuit's reasoning is apparent. The panel majority concluded that these three cases 'would have placed any reasonable, competent officer on notice that it is unreasonable to forcibly enter the home of an armed, mentally ill suspect who had been acting irrationally and had threatened anyone who entered when there was no objective need for immediate entry.'. . But even assuming that is true, no precedent clearly established that there was not 'an objective need for immediate entry' here. No matter how carefully a reasonable officer read Graham, Deorle, and Alexander beforehand, that officer could not know that reopening Sheehan's door to prevent her from escaping or gathering more weapons would violate the Ninth Circuit's test, even if all the disputed facts are viewed in respondent's favor. Without that 'fair notice,' an officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Nor does it matter for purposes of qualified immunity that Sheehan's expert, Reiter, testified that the officers did not follow their training. . . .Even if an officer acts contrary to her training, however, (and here, given the generality of that training, it is not at all clear that Reynolds and Holder did so), that does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted. Rather, so long as 'a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was justified,' a plaintiff cannot 'avoi[d] summary judgment by simply producing an expert's report that an officer's conduct leading up to a deadly confrontation was imprudent, inappropriate, or even reckless.'. . Considering the specific situation confronting Reynolds and Holder, they had sufficient reason to believe that their conduct was justified. Finally, to the extent that a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' could itself clearly establish the federal right respondent alleges, . . . no such consensus exists here. . . .In sum, we hold that qualified immunity applies because these officers had no 'fair and clear warning of what the Constitution requires.'. . Because the qualified immunity analysis is straightforward, we need not decide whether the Constitution was violated by the officers' failure to accommodate Sheehan's illness. * * * For these reasons, the first question presented is dismissed as improvidently granted. On the second question, we reverse the judgment of the Ninth Circuit. The case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

[Note: The Court dismissed the writ of certiorari on the question of whether Title II applies to "on-the-street responses to reported disturbances" as "improvidently granted." See King v. Hendricks County Commissioners, 954 F.3d 981, 988-89 (7th Cir. 2020) ("Whether Title II applies to law enforcement investigations and arrests, and if so to what extent, is an open question in this circuit. Our fellow circuits are split. [collecting cases] The Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide this issue in City & County of San Francisco, Cal. v. Sheehan, . . . but it dismissed the question as improvidently granted after San Francisco changed its argument after the Ninth Circuit's decision and before the Supreme Court could rule. . . Like the First Circuit in Gray, we may assume without deciding that Title II applies to the officers' interaction with Bradley. We also may assume that Hendricks County could be held vicariously liable under Title II for Hays's actions, and that 'deliberate indifference' is the appropriate standard by which to analyze the institutional defendants' conduct. No matter, because in order to prevail on his claims King must show that '"but for" [Bradley's] disability, he would have been able to access the services or benefits desired.'. . King's evidence falls short on that critical point. The police responded promptly to Bradley's call for assistance, and there is no competent evidence contradicting Hays's account that he shot Bradley because Bradley ran at him with a knife. We have been given no reason to believe that Hays's response would have been different had someone not suffering from a mental illness done the same thing, and King does not propose anything that Hays should have done differently to accommodate Bradley's mental illness. Hays's 'failure to disarm, or take the decedent under control, was not because he was inadequately trained to deal with disabled individuals, but because the decedent threatened him with a deadly weapon before he could subdue him.'. . 'Thus, if the decedent was denied access to medical services it was because of his violent, threatening behavior, not because he was mentally disabled.'"); Clark v. Colbert, 895 F.3d 1258, 1265 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[W]e have never squarely held the ADA applies to arrests. See J.H. ex rel. J.P. v. Bernalillo Cty., 806 F.3d 1255, 1260–61 (10th Cir. 2015); cf. Gohier, 186 F.3d at 1221 (noting, in dicta, that the arrest context is not categorically beyond the ADA's scope). Likewise, we have never held a municipality incurs liability under the ADA for failing to adequately train its employees. See J.V. ex rel. C. v. Albuquerque Pub. Sch., 813 F.3d 1289, 1297 (10th Cir. 2016). . . But we need not confront either of those open questions to resolve this appeal, as Clark has failed to rebut the district court's conclusion that the ADA does not transfer liability through the Broken Arrow officers to the Wagoner County Board in this case."); Haberle v. Troxell, 885 F.3d 170, 178-82 (3d Cir. 2018) ("As a threshold matter, we consider whether the ADA applies when police officers make an arrest. Although the question is debatable, we think the answer is generally yes. . . . The first question, then, is whether arrestees can be 'qualified individuals' under the ADA, and the best response is that they can, for there is nothing to categorically exclude them from the statute's broad coverage. . . . The second question is whether arrestees may have disabilities covered by the ADA, and the answer to that is clearly 'yes.'. . .Saving the third qualifying question for last, we next note that the fourth requirement, that the claimant has been excluded from a service, program, or activity or discriminated against by reason of his disability, is also one that can be satisfied in the context of an arrest. If the arrestee's 'disability "played a role in the ... decisionmaking process and ... had a determinative effect on the outcome of that process[,]"' i.e., if the arrestee's disability was a 'but for' cause of the deprivation or harm he suffered, then the fourth element of an ADA claim has been met. . . .The most controversial question pertinent to whether the ADA applies when police officers are making arrests comes in the context of the statute's third requirement. We must consider whether arrests made by police officers are 'services, programs, or activities of a public entity,' or alternatively, whether police officers may be liable under the ADA for 'subject[ing a qualified individual] to discrimination' while effectuating an arrest. . . . [C]ourts across the country are divided on whether police fieldwork and arrests can rightly be called 'services, programs, or activities of a public entity....'. . .Fortunately, we do not need to resolve that issue in this case, because § 12132 is framed in the alternative and we can look instead to the second phrase, namely, to whether the arrestee was 'subjected to discrimination' by the police. . . .The 'subjected to discrimination' phrase in Title II is 'a catch-all phrase that prohibits all discrimination by a public entity, regardless of the context.'. . .It follows, then, that police officers may violate the ADA when making an arrest by failing to provide reasonable accommodations for a qualified arrestee's disability, thus subjecting him to discrimination. Given that catchall, we believe that the ADA can indeed apply to police conduct during an arrest. That conclusion, which is suggested by the wide scope of the ADA's text, has support from our sister circuits. See, e.g., Sheehan, 743 F.3d at 1217 ("Title II of the [ADA] applies to arrests."); Roberts v. City of Omaha, 723 F.3d 966, 973 (8th Cir. 2013) ("[T]he ADA ... appl[ies] to law enforcement officers taking disabled suspects into custody."). Even though there is some disagreement concerning the point during a law enforcement encounter at which the ADA applies to police conduct, no court of appeals has held that the ADA does not apply at all. See, e.g., Hainze v. Richards, 207 F.3d 795, 801 (5th Cir. 2000) (holding "that Title II does not apply to an officer's on-the-street responses to reported disturbances or other incidents ... prior to the officer's securing the scene and ensuring that there is no threat to human life"); Gohier v. Enright, 186 F.3d 1216, 1221 (10th Cir. 1999) ("[A] broad rule categorically excluding arrests from the scope of Title II ... is not the law."). . . . Even though the ADA generally applies in the arrest context, Haberle's claim for money damages against the Borough fails as a matter of law because she has not adequately pled that the Borough acted with deliberate indifference to the risk of an ADA violation. She seeks compensatory damages from the Borough under the ADA, but that remedy is not available absent proof of 'intentional discrimination.' S.H. ex rel. Durrell v. Lower Merion Sch. Dist., 729 F.3d 248, 261 (3d Cir. 2013) ("[C]laims for compensatory damages under ... § 202 of the ADA also require a finding of intentional discrimination."). To prove intentional discrimination, an ADA claimant must prove at least deliberate indifference, . . . and to plead deliberate indifference, a claimant must allege '(1) knowledge that a federally protected right is substantially likely to be violated ... and (2) failure to act despite that knowledge.'. . Haberle, however, fails to allege that the Borough was aware that its existing policies made it substantially likely that disabled individuals would be denied their federally protected rights under the ADA. . . . She relies on general allegations that the Borough has 'a history of violating the civil rights of residents[,]'. . offering only hazy support for that statement. Even if she could ultimately prove a generalized history of civil rights violations, that would not necessarily demonstrate 'a pattern of past occurrences of injuries like the plaintiff['s.]. . .Because those other vaguely referenced violations have not been adequately alleged to be 'similar to the violation at issue here, they could not have put [the Defendant] on notice' that policies, practices, and procedures had to be changed. . . Nevertheless, with respect to that defect, Haberle should be given an opportunity to amend her complaint, if possible, to salvage her ADA claim against the Borough, since this failure in her complaint is not one as to which we can say definitively that amendment would be futile. . . .Haberle likewise fails to allege that the risk of harm was 'so great and so obvious,' as to obviate the need for her to allege facts pertaining to the Borough's knowledge. . . At most, she claims that the Borough's conduct falls 'beneath the nationally recognized standards for police department operations' with regard to those with mental illness. . . But, assuming that is true, falling below national standards does not, in and of itself, make the risk of an ADA violation in such circumstances 'so patently obvious that a [municipality] could be held liable' without 'a pre-existing pattern of violations.'")

Haberle v. Troxell, 885 F.3d 170, 183-86 (3d Cir. 2018) (Greenaway, Jr., J., concurring) ("I join the majority opinion and agree that Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) applies to arrests when the arrestee is 'subjected to discrimination' by the police. . . However, I would also hold that—based on the text of Title II, the Department of Justice's interpretations of Title II, and the Supreme Court's holding in Pa. Dep't of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 118 S.Ct. 1952, 141 L.Ed.2d 215 (1998)—that arrests constitute 'services, programs, or activities of a public entity' under the ADA. 42 U.S.C. § 12132. . . .[T]he majority's holding only allows an arrestee to succeed on an ADA claim if he or she can prove discrimination by a public entity, leaving open the question of whether an arrestee can recover under the ADA for being 'denied the benefits of the services, programs, or activities of a public entity.' 42 U.S.C. § 12132. This is significant because '[c]ases charging discrimination are uniquely difficult to prove and often depend upon circumstantial evidence.'. .In my estimation, the statutory text of the ADA makes clear that arrests can qualify as a 'service[ ], program[ ], or activit[y]' of the police, and I therefore see no reason to hang a cloud of doubt over an arrestee's right to recovery under this alternate theory. . . .[T]he majority is reluctant to determine whether an arrest qualifies as a service, program, or activity under Title II because—according to it—this is an issue that 'courts across the country are divided on ....'. . . Two of our sister circuits have addressed this precise issue to date. In Sheehan v. City and Cty. of S.F., the Ninth Circuit held that arrests are covered by Title II because '[t]he ADA applies broadly to police "services, programs, or activities."'. . Conversely, the Fourth Circuit in Rosen v. Montgomery Cty. Md. concluded that arrests are not services, programs, or activities because '[t]he terms "eligible" and "participate" imply voluntariness on the part of an applicant who seeks a benefit from the State.' 121 F.3d 154, 157 (4th Cir. 1997)

(quoting Torcasio v. Murray, 57 F.3d 1340, 1347 (4th Cir. 1995)). The Supreme Court, however, squarely rejected Rosen's reasoning in Yeskey. . . Accordingly, '[c]ourts across the country have called Rosen's holding into question in light of the Supreme Court's decision in [Yeskey].' Seremeth v. Bd. of Cty. Comm'rs Frederick Cty., 673 F.3d 333, 337 (4th Cir. 2012) (collecting cases). . . Indeed, in Seremeth, the Fourth Circuit declined to rely on Rosen and held that Title II applies to police interrogations based on the phrase 'services, programs, or activities' in addition to the catch-all antidiscrimination phrase. . . We therefore need not be troubled by declining to follow Rosen and its logic. Rather, we should be cognizant that no court of appeals has held that arrests are not 'services, programs, or activities of a public entity,' 42 U.S.C. § 12132, since the Supreme Court decided Yeskey twenty years ago. . . .The statutory text, the Department of Justice's interpretations of the text, and the Supreme Court's broad interpretation of the ADA in Yeskey establish that arrests are 'services, programs, or activities of a public entity' under Title II. 42 U.S.C. § 12132. I therefore see no reason to be less than plain that an arrestee with a disability has two paths to vindicate his or her disability rights.")

Hamilton Cty., Ohio, 870 F.3d 471, 489-90 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor this circuit has squarely addressed whether Title II of the ADA applies in the context of an arrest. Nancy Roell urges us, however, to adopt the reasoning of several of our sister circuits that have found Title II applicable to law-enforcement activities, including arrests. A few opinions have indeed indicated that arrestees might be able to bring cognizable claims under Title II. But, in doing so, they have also noted that the exigent circumstances inherent in an arrest inform the reasonable-accommodation analysis. [collecting cases] We need not decide whether Title II applies in the context of arrests because, even if Nancy Roell's failure-to-accommodate claim is cognizable, Hamilton County is entitled to summary judgment based on the facts of this case. This circuit has previously held that 'the "determination of what constitutes reasonable modification is highly fact-specific, requiring case-by-case inquiry."'. . Deputies Alexander, Dalid, and Huddleston unquestionably faced exigent circumstances while attempting to restrain and arrest Roell. As detailed above, they responded to an unsecured scene to find an individual who had committed, at the very least, a series of property crimes and who posed a continuing threat to the deputies and to others. In fact, almost immediately after the deputies arrived, Roell swiftly approached them brandishing a hose with a metal nozzle and a garden basket. The deputies, in other words, were required to make a series of quick, on-the-spot judgments in a continuously evolving environment. Nancy Roell's proposed accommodations—that the deputies use verbal de-escalation techniques, gather information from the witnesses, and call EMS services before engaging with Roell—were therefore 'unreasonable ... in light of the overriding public safety concerns.'. . In the context of the exigent circumstances surrounding Roell's arrest, Nancy Roell cannot make out a viable ADA claim under her failure-to-accommodate theory. Nor has she presented any evidence that Hamilton County intentionally discriminated against Roell based on his disability. The district court therefore did not err in granting summary judgment in favor of Hamilton County on Nancy Roell's ADA claim.")

Even Hainze v. Richards, the sole case cited by the Defendants in support of their proposition that Officers Koval and Galpin were not required to consider ADA compliance before acting, acknowledges that police actions must, at some point, begin to comply with ADA requirements. . . Plaintiff further alleges that Chief Campbell was 'on notice ... that a significant number of individuals arrested or otherwise detained by officers under [his] employ are either mentally ill or appear to be so' and that it 'was foreseeable to the Chief that police officers would routinely confront' such individuals, . . . but that the Defendants nonetheless 'offer no training on how to make reasonable accommodations' for individuals protected by the ADA with whom officers come into contact[.] . . .Without yet deciding the precise scope of the ADA's requirements in this situation, the Court finds that Plaintiff has pled facts which render plausible her allegation that Mr. Reyes suffered a violation of his right to a reasonable accommodation of his disability because of an alleged failure to train and despite Defendants' knowledge of the need for such training. Therefore, Count Three states a claim of ADA violation sufficient to survive the motion to dismiss stage."); Taylor v. Ambrifi, No. 115CV03280NLHKMW, 2018 WL 3377155, at *5 (D.N.J. July 11, 2018) ("The Third Circuit recently clarified, 'Even though there is some disagreement concerning the point during a law enforcement encounter at which the ADA applies to police conduct, no court of appeals has held that the ADA does not apply at all.' Haberle v. Troxell, 885 F.3d 170, 181 (3d Cir. 2018). . . .Here, the Court will deny without prejudice Defendants' motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's ADA violation claims for two reasons. First, despite Defendants' arguments to the contrary, a police officer and a municipality may violate a person's rights under the ADA during a law enforcement encounter, and such a claim is actionable in this Circuit. Second, the factual basis for Plaintiff's ADA claims is the same as for his constitutional violation claims. Because a jury must assess the facts to determine what occurred during Plaintiff's encounter with Ambrifi, along with Delanco Township's training practices of its officers, the Court cannot conclude as a matter of law whether Defendants violated the ADA on the present record. Defendants, however, may renew their motion on Plaintiff's ADA claims at the appropriate time during or after trial, if appropriate."); McHenry v. City of Ottawa, No. 16-2736-DDC-JPO, 2017 WL 4269903, at *12-13 (D. Kan. Sept. 26, 2017) ("Defendants contend that the ADA does not apply in situations where police officers face violent conduct. . . No Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit precedent addresses this question directly. . . Every circuit that has reached this issue has held that an arrest is a public benefit that falls within the scope of the ADA. See, e.g., Sheehan v. City & Cty. of S.F., 743 F.3d 1211, 1231–32 (9th Cir. 2014) (cataloging cases), rev'd on other grounds, 135 S. Ct. 1765 (2015). The difference among the circuits is the rule that applies to when exigent circumstances exist. Most circuits hold that an exigency is a circumstance that courts must take into account when deciding which reasonable accommodations a public entity must make. See, e.g., Bircoll v. Miami-Dade Cty., 480 F.3d 1072, 1084 (11th Cir. 2007). The Fifth Circuit takes a different approach, holding that the ADA does not apply to police officers making an on-the-street response until they have secured the scene. Hainze v. Richards, 207 F.3d 795, 801 (5th Cir. 2000) (holding ADA did not apply to an officer encounter where the individual was walking towards an officer with a knife and did not drop the knife when told to do so). The Sixth Circuit also follows a slightly different path, holding a disabled individual's disability was not the cause of an officer shooting. Thompson v. Williamson Cty., Tenn., 219 F.3d 555, 558 (6th Cir. 2000). Instead, the Sixth Circuit reasoned, the individual's failure to disarm was the cause. Id. Our court has faced this question in a case where an individual approached officers while holding a knife. Sudac v. Hoang, 378 F. Supp. 2d 1298, 1306 (D. Kan. 2005) (granting summary judgment). These circumstances led the officers to shoot the individual. . . Judge Lungstrum reasoned that the officers did not owe an ADA duty to accommodate the individual in this situation because of the threatening manner he presented. . . He thus applied the logic of Hainze and Thompson. . . . The court finds Sudac persuasive and concludes that it applies the rule that our Circuit, if faced with the question, would adopt. The court thus holds that the ADA applies to arrests unless an exigency exists. Applying that rule here, plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts that, if supported by evidence and accredited by the factfinder, could support a finding that Mr. Jennings did not present an imminent threat to himself or others. These allegations prevent the court from granting a Motion to Dismiss the ADA claim against Ottawa and Franklin County."); Adle, on behalf of Gerken v. Maine State Police Dep't, No. 1:15-CV-458-NT, 2017 WL 3902859, at *16-21 (D. Me. Sept. 6, 2017) ("On the undisputed facts, Mr. Gerken had established himself as an unusually resilient individual. After pepper spray, Taser fire, an attempt by a game warden to wrest the knife from his grip, a blast from a fire hose, and being shot, Mr. Gerken still had hold of the knife. The light in the woods was dimming. Sgt. Grass was less than thirteen feet from Mr. Gerken. Despite orders to stop moving and stay down, the officers saw Mr. Gerken sitting up and making a lunging motion with the knife. The situation had been unfolding quickly, and now each officer was called on to make a split-second judgment. All three officers made the decision to shoot until Mr. Gerken was incapacitated. . . Under Berube, the law was established that an officer need not perfectly calibrate the amount of force required to protect himself in an emergency situation. On these facts, under this law, the Plaintiff has not shown that no reasonable officer, confronted with this situation, would have made the same choice that Sgt. Grass, Sgt. Shead, and Det. Mitchell each made. Accordingly, I find that the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claims under § 1983. . . . There is division within the Circuits over whether Title II of the ADA applies at all to encounters with violent, mentally ill individuals. The Fifth Circuit has held that:Title II does not apply to an officer's on-the-street responses to reported disturbances or other similar incidents, whether or not those calls involve subjects with mental disabilities, prior to the officer's securing the scene and ensuring that there is no threat to human life. Hainze v. Richards, 207 F.3d 795, 801 (5th Cir. 2000). In contrast, the Fourth Circuit takes the view that exigent circumstances factor into whether the requested modification is reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. Waller ex rel. Estate of Hunt v. Danville, 556 F.3d 171, 175 (4th Cir. 2009); . . . cf. Bircoll v. Miami-Dade Cty., 480 F.3d 1072, 1085 (11th Cir. 2007) (holding exigent circumstances surrounding an arrest "go more to the reasonableness of the requested ADA modification than whether the ADA applies in the first instance," where a nonviolent, deaf individual requested an accommodation); Gohier, 186 F.3d at 1221 ("[A] broad rule categorically excluding arrests from the scope of Title II ... is not the law."). As for controlling authority on the question, the Supreme Court has yet to decide the issue. . . The First Circuit noted in 2006 that '[i]t is questionable whether the ADA was intended to impose any requirements on police entering a residence to take someone into protective or other custody beyond the reasonableness requirement of the Fourth Amendment.'. . Courts within this District have long referred to an 'exigent circumstances exception' or have followed Hainze. [collecting cases] Regardless of whether there is a per se rule that the ADA does not apply in exigent circumstances or whether exigency is one factor among many to determine whether a requested accommodation is reasonable, the threshold question is whether exigent circumstances existed. The Plaintiff argues that exigent circumstances did not exist leading up to the execution of the tactical plan and that the MSP's militaristic response unreasonably exacerbated Mr. Gerken's mental health crisis. The Plaintiff's experts opined that, under the totality of the circumstances, the collective law enforcement conduct. . . caused Mr. Gerken's condition to deteriorate and ultimately led to his death. . . . On the facts before me, taken in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, no reasonable juror could conclude that the situation faced by the MSP did not involve exigent circumstances and a threat to human safety. The MSP did not have the option of packing up and going home when it got dark. There is no dispute that Mr. Gerken was armed with a knife, that he was disturbed, that he had earlier told an 8-year-old to stop looking at him or he would kill her, that he had refused to drop the knife for the first responders, that he had resisted Sgt. Dunham's attempt to disarm him, and that he had withstood pepper spray and an attempt to Taser him. Except for the odd outburst, Mr. Gerken remained unresponsive, for over six hours of attempted negotiations, and he never once let go of the knife. It is undisputed that shortly before the tactical plan was executed, Mr. Gerken said, 'I will cut you' as he waved his knife in the air. Although the Plaintiff points out that everybody was safe as long as Mr. Gerken lay on the ground, no one knew if and when Mr. Gerken would get up. To say that Mr. Gerken might still be there today if the police had not used the fire hose is speculative. On these facts, no reasonable juror could conclude that there was no exigency. Many of the Plaintiff's accommodations were tried without success or rejected as unworkable. There is no dispute that negotiations extended over six hours. The Plaintiff offers no facts to suggest that lights were available that could have effectively lit the forest and allowed for further negotiations. . . . Even under the totality of the circumstances test set forth in Waller, the record indicates that the officers on the scene provided Mr. Gerken with reasonable accommodations. . . The MSP conducted a lengthy, personalized negotiation by experienced officers. The officers shifted away from negotiations only when they perceived an increased risk to themselves and the public. As discussed above, Sgt. Grass's decision to use the fire hose as an alternative, non-lethal tool was objectively reasonable in these circumstances. Once Mr. Gerken rose to his feet and began to run, knife in hand toward Det. Mitchell's advance, exigent circumstances certainly curtailed any duty to accommodate Mr. Gerken's disability."); Williams v. City of New York, 121 F.Supp.3d 354, 364-65 & n.12, 369-71 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("There is no dispute that Plaintiff is a qualified individual with a disability. . . or that the City is a public entity and is subject to the ADA and Rehabilitation Act. The City concedes that NYPD actions fall within the scope of Title II of the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act generally but argues that 'on the street' interactions between police officers and 'qualified individuals with a disability' are excluded from coverage until the crime scene has been secured and the arrestee has been transported to the stationhouse. . . In other words, the City argues that the NYPD bears no burden to provide any accommodation to disabled individuals until after the individual has been arrested and booked. The City advances two theories to support its position: first, 'on-the-street encounters' are not covered 'services, programs, or activities;' and, second, exigent circumstances and overriding public safety concerns make it unreasonable to require police officers to accommodate disabled individuals before making an arrest. . . The City's crabbed interpretation of Title II's coverage of police activity simply does not comport with the language of Title II and its implementing regulations, particularly in light of the remedial purpose of the statute and the weight of authority that has considered the issue. . . .The Second Circuit has yet to address the question whether and to what extent Title II of the ADA applies during an on-the-street interaction leading to an arrest. . . The Supreme Court granted certiorari in City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Cal. v. Sheehan, 135 S.Ct. 702 (2014), to consider the question whether Title II of the ADA applies 'to an officer's on-the-street responses to reported disturbances or other similar incidents ... prior to the officer's securing the scene and ensuring that there is no threat to human life,' 135 S.Ct. 1765, 1773 (2015). The Court dismissed the question presented as improvidently granted, however, because the petitioner, respondent, and United States as amicus curiae all conceded on the merits that 42 U.S.C. § 12132 applies to arrests. . . The issue, therefore, remains undecided. . . .The City argues that a plaintiff has no remedy under § 1983 for alleged violations of Title II of the ADA because Congress adopted a comprehensive private remedial scheme that displaced private rights of action under § 1983. . . Because the remedial scheme of Title II of the ADA derives from the same source as the remedial scheme of Title IX, the Supreme Court's conclusion that parallel and concurrent § 1983 claims and implied private causes of action are available under Title IX applies with equal force to Title II of the ADA. Accordingly, a plaintiff can bring a cause of action under § 1983 to enforce rights protected by Title II of the ADA."); Lookabill v. City of Vancouver, No. 13-5461 RJB, 2015 WL 4623938, at *8-9 (W.D. Wash. Aug. 3, 2015) ("The principle case that Plaintiffs rely upon, Sheehan v. City and Cnty. of San Francisco, 743 F.3d 1211 (9th Cir.2014), was before the U.S. Supreme Court in 2015. City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Calif. v. Sheehan, ––U.S. ––––, ––––, 135 S.Ct. 1765, 1772, 191 L.Ed.2d 856 (2015). (In Sheehan, the Ninth Circuit held that the ADA applies to arrests.) The Sheehan defendants initially requested certiorari on the question of whether the ADA 'requires law enforcement officers to provide accommodations to an armed, violent, and mentally ill suspect in the course of bringing the suspect into custody,' arguing that there was a split in the circuits as to whether the ADA applies to arrests. City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Calif. v. Sheehan, ––U.S. ––––, ––––, 135 S.Ct. 1765, 1772, 191 L.Ed.2d 856 (2015). The U.S. Supreme Court 'dismissed' [sic] the question, holding that certiorari was improvidently granted because the defendants failed to brief the question to the Court (arguing instead that under 28 C.F.R. §§ 35.139(a) and 35.104, 'a person who poses a direct threat or significant risk to the safety of others is not qualified for accommodations under the ADA') and failed to adequately raise that new issue in the Ninth Circuit. Id. The ADA claim was remanded to the Ninth Circuit and the Ninth Circuit remanded the ADA claim to the district court. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit's holding in Sheehan, that the ADA applies to arrests, is still binding on this Court. . . . The City also advances the same argument here that the Sheehan defendants raised with the Supreme Court, but the Supreme Court did not reach. It argues that Mr. Lookabill was not a 'qualified individual with a disability' requiring accommodation. . . .In the circumstances presented here, Mr. Lookabill was not a 'qualified individual with a disability' because he posed a 'direct threat' to the 'health or safety of others.' The officers were called to the scene to deal with Mr. Lookabill, who appeared to be intoxicated and had threatened people with a gun. He was armed, non-compliant, and acting erratically. He begged the police to come get the gun from him and then would ask them to shoot him. He threatened to shoot himself. Mr. Lookabill would say he wanted to be a policeman but then would scream obscenities at them. Mr. Lookabill kept 'target glancing' the officers. All present were aware he had military training and had served in Iraq. Further, the undersigned has already held that '[a]t the time they opened fire, the officers had probable cause to believe that Mr. Lookabill posed an immediate threat to the officers or others. Mr. Lookabill moved quickly and deliberately for his gun without provocation. He had been repeatedly warned not to do so by several policemen with their guns drawn.'. . Mr. Lookabill posed a significant threat to the officers, other civilians, and to himself. He was not a qualified individual with a disability under the ADA. Plaintiffs argue that certain accommodations should have been implemented, for example that the officers should not have ordered Mr. Lookabill to the ground, but should have him 'put his hands above his head and turn around' and that the officers should not have been positioned so closely to Mr. Lookabill, and that way would not have felt threatened. Plaintiff does so without any evidence to support these suppositions. Aside from bare assertions, Plaintiffs fail to show that these actions would have mitigated the risk posed by Mr. Lookabill when the officers encountered him or afterward. There is no showing that any modification of policy, practice, or procedure or the provision of auxiliary aids or services would have mitigated the risk. 28 C.F.R. § 35.139(b). In addition to failing to show that Mr. Lookabill was a 'qualified individual with a disability,' Plaintiffs failed to show that the officers' alleged discrimination or failure to accommodate was 'by reason of" his disability."); Jones v. Lacey, No. 14-CV-10384, 2015 WL 3579282, at *17 n.1 (E.D. Mich. June 5, 2015) ("Defendants do not appear to dispute that the ADA applies to Lacey's conduct during this incident. Stanton v. Sims, 134 S. Ct. 3, 5, 7 (2013) (per curiam) ("There is no suggestion in this case that Officer Stanton knowingly violated the Constitution; the question is whether, in light of precedent existing at the time, he was 'plainly incompetent' in entering Sims' yard to pursue the fleeing Patrick. . . The Ninth Circuit concluded that he was. It did so despite the fact that federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit of that suspect. . . .To summarize the law at the time Stanton made his split-second decision to enter Sims' yard: Two opinions of this Court were equivocal on the lawfulness of his entry; two opinions of the State Court of Appeal affirmatively authorized that entry; the most relevant opinion of the Ninth Circuit was readily distinguishable; two Federal District Courts in the Ninth Circuit had granted qualified immunity in the wake of that opinion; and the federal and state courts of last resort around the Nation were sharply divided. We do not express any view on whether Officer Stanton's entry into Sims' yard in pursuit of Patrick was constitutional. But whether or not the constitutional rule applied by the court below was correct, it was not 'beyond debate.' al–Kidd, supra, at ——, 131 S.Ct., at 2083. Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074, 2084, 2085 (2011) ("A Government official's conduct violates clearly established law when, at the time of the challenged conduct, '[t]he contours of [a] right [are] sufficiently clear' that every 'reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . We do not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate. . . The constitutional question in this case falls far short of that threshold. At the time of al-Kidd's arrest, not a single judicial opinion had held that pretext could render an objectively reasonable arrest pursuant to a material-witness warrant unconstitutional. . . . [Ashcroft] deserves qualified immunity even assuming. . . that his alleged detention policy violated the Fourth Amendment.")

Weise v. Casper, 131 S. Ct. 7, 7, 8 (2010) (Ginsburg, J., joined by Sotomayor, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) ("I cannot see how reasonable public officials, or any staff or volunteers under their direction, could have viewed the bumper sticker as a permissible reason for depriving Weise and Young of access to the event. Nevertheless, the Court of Appeals held respondents entitled to qualified immunity because 'no specific authority instructs this court ... how to treat the ejection of a silent attendee from an official speech based on the attendee's protected expression outside the speech area.' 593 F.3d 1163, 1170 (C.A.10 2010). No 'specific authority' should have been needed. . . . I see only one arguable reason for deferring the question this case presents. Respondents were volunteers following instructions from White House officials. The Volunteer Protection Act of 1997, 111 Stat. 218, 42 U.S.C. § 14501 et seq., had respondents invoked it in the courts below, might have shielded them from liability. Federal officials themselves, however, gain no shelter from that Act. Suits against the officials responsible for Weise's and Young's ouster remain pending and may offer this Court an opportunity to take up the issue avoided today.")

Safford Unified School Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 129 S. Ct. 2633, 2643, 2644 (2009) ("[T]he T.L.O. concern to limit a school search to reasonable scope requires the support of reasonable suspicion of danger or of resort to underwear for hiding evidence of wrongdoing before a search can reasonably make the quantum leap from outer clothes and backpacks to exposure of intimate parts. The meaning of such a search, and the degradation its subject may reasonably feel, place a search that intrusive in a category of its own demanding its own specific suspicions. . . . T.L.O. directed school officials to limit the intrusiveness of a search, 'in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction,'. . . and as we have just said at some length, the intrusiveness of the strip search here cannot be seen as justifiably related to the circumstances. But we realize that the lower courts have reached divergent conclusions regarding how the T.L.O. standard applies to such searches. [collecting cases] We think these differences of opinion from our own are substantial enough to require immunity for the school officials in this case. We would not suggest that entitlement to qualified immunity is the guaranteed product of disuniform views of the law in the other federal, or state, courts, and the fact that a single judge, or even a group of judges, disagrees about the contours of a right does not automatically render the law unclear if we have been clear. That said, however, the cases viewing school strip searches differently from the way we see them are numerous enough, with well-reasoned majority and dissenting opinions, to counsel doubt that we were sufficiently clear in the prior statement of law. We conclude that qualified immunity is warranted.").

Safford Unified School Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 129 S. Ct. 2633, 2644 (2009) (Stevens, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("This is, in essence, a case in which clearly established law meets clearly outrageous conduct. . . .The strip search of Savana Redding in this case was both more intrusive and less justified than the search of the student's purse in T.L.O. Therefore, while I join Parts I-III of the Court's opinion, I disagree with its decision to extend qualified immunity to the school official who authorized this unconstitutional search.").

Brosseau v. Haugen, 125 S. Ct. 596, 598, 599 (2004) (per curiam) ("We express no view as to the correctness of the Court of Appeals' decision on the constitutional question itself. We believe that, however that question is decided, the Court of Appeals was wrong on the issue of qualified immunity. . . Graham and Garner, following the lead of the Fourth Amendment's text, are cast at a high level of generality. . . . Of course, in an obvious case, these standards can 'clearly establish' the answer, even without a body of relevant case law. [citing Hope v. Pelzer]. . . . The present case is far from the obvious one where Graham and Garner alone offer a basis for decision. . . . We therefore turn to ask whether, at the time of Brosseau's actions, it was ' "clearly established"' in this more ' "particularized"' sense that she was violating Haugen's Fourth Amendment right. . . The parties point us to only a handful of cases relevant to the 'situation [Brosseau] confronted': whether to shoot a disturbed felon, set on avoiding capture through vehicular flight, when persons in the immediate area are at risk from that flight. . . .These three cases taken together undoubtedly show that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case. None of them squarely governs the case here; they do suggest that Brosseau's actions fell in the ' Ahazy border between excessive and acceptable force."' . . The cases by no means 'clearly establish' that Brosseau's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment.").

Groh v. Ramirez, 124 S. Ct. 1284, 1293, 1294 (2004) ("Given that the particularity requirement is set forth in the text of the Constitution, no reasonable officer could believe that a warrant that plainly did not comply with that requirement was valid. . . . [E]ven a cursory reading of the warrant in this case–perhaps just a simple glance–would have revealed a glaring deficiency that any reasonable police officer would have known was constitutionally fatal.")

Hope v. Pelzer, 122 S. Ct. 2508, 2514-18 (2002) ("We agree with the Court of Appeals that the attachment of Hope to the hitching post under the circumstances alleged in this case violated the Eighth Amendment. . . . In assessing whether the Eighth Amendment violation here met the Harlow test, the Court of Appeals required that the facts of previous cases be ' 'materially similar' to Hope's situation.' . . This rigid gloss on the qualified immunity standard, though supported by Circuit precedent, [footnote omitted] is not consistent with our cases. . . . Our opinion in Lanier . . . makes clear that officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances. Indeed, in Lanier, we expressly rejected a requirement that previous cases be 'fundamentally similar.' Although earlier cases involving 'fundamentally similar' facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established, they are not necessary to such a finding. The same is true of cases with 'materially similar' facts. Accordingly, pursuant to Lanier, the salient question that the Court of Appeals ought to have asked is whether the state of the law in 1995 gave respondents fair warning that their alleged treatment of Hope was unconstitutional. . . . The use of the hitching post as alleged by Hope 'unnecessar[ily] and wanton [ly] inflicted pain,' . . . and thus was a clear violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . Arguably, the violation was so obvious that our own Eighth Amendment cases gave the respondents fair warning that their conduct violated the Constitution. Regardless, in light of binding Eleventh Circuit precedent, an Alabama Department of Corrections ("DOC) regulation, and a DOJ report informing the ADOC of the constitutional infirmity in its use of the hitching post, we readily conclude that the respondents' conduct violated 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . . [F]or the purpose of providing fair notice to reasonable officers administering punishment for past misconduct, [there is no] reason to draw a constitutional distinction between a practice of handcuffing an inmate to a fence for prolonged periods and handcuffing him to a hitching post for seven hours. The Court of Appeals' conclusion to the contrary exposes the danger of a rigid, overreliance on factual similarity. . . . The obvious cruelty inherent in this practice should have provided respondents with some notice that their alleged conduct violated Hope's constitutional protection against cruel and unusual punishment. Hope was treated in a way antithetical to human dignity–he was hitched to a post for an extended period of time in a position that was painful, and under circumstances that were both degrading and dangerous. This wanton treatment was not done of necessity, but as punishment for prior conduct. Even if there might once have been a question regarding the constitutionality of this practice, the Eleventh Circuit precedent of Gates and Ort, as well as the DOJ report condemning the practice, put a reasonable officer on notice that the use of the hitching post under the circumstances alleged by Hope was unlawful. The 'fair and clear warning,' . . . that these cases provided was sufficient to preclude the defense of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. . . .We did not take, and do not pass upon, the questions whether or to what extent the three named officers may be held responsible for the acts charged, if proved. Nothing in our decision forecloses any defense other than qualified immunity on the ground relied upon by the Court of Appeals.").

Saucier v. Katz, 121 S. Ct. 2151, 2156 (2001) ("The relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.").[See discussion of Saucier, infra]

Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. 335, 341 (1986) (qualified immunity protects "all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law").

United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 269-72 (1997) [Note: case involved criminal prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 242] ("Nor have our decisions demanded precedents that applied the right at issue to a factual situation that is 'fundamentally similar' at the level of specificity meant by the Sixth Circuit in using that phrase. To the contrary, we have upheld convictions under § 241 or § 242 despite notable factual distinctions between the precedents relied on and the cases then before the Court, so long as the prior decisions gave reasonable warning that the conduct then at issue violated constitutional rights. [citing cases] But even putting these examples aside, we think that the Sixth Circuit's 'fundamentally similar' standard would lead trial judges to demand a degree of certainty at once unnecessarily high and likely to beget much wrangling. This danger flows from the Court of Appeals' stated view . . . that due process under § 242 demands more than the 'clearly established' law required for a public officer to be held civilly liable for a constitutional violation under § 1983 or Bivens. [cites omitted] This, we think, is error. In the civil sphere, we have explained that qualified immunity seeks to ensure that defendants 'reasonably can anticipate when their conduct may give rise to liability,'. . . by attaching liability only if '[t]he contours of the right [violated are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' [citing Anderson] So conceived, the object of the 'clearly established' immunity standard is not different from that of 'fair warning' as it relates to law 'made specific' for the purpose of validly applying § 242. The fact that one has a civil and the other a criminal law role is of no significance; both serve the same objective, and in effect the qualified immunity test is simply the adaptation of the fair warning standard to give officials (and, ultimately, governments) the same protection from civil liability and its consequences that individuals have traditionally possessed in the face of vague criminal statutes. To require something clearer than 'clearly established' would, then, call for something beyond 'fair warning.' This is not to say, of course, that the single warning standard points to a single level of specificity sufficient in every instance. In some circumstances, as when an earlier case expressly leaves open whether a general rule applies to the particular type of conduct at issue, a very high degree of prior factual particularity may be necessary. . . But general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and in other instances a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though 'the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful,'. . . . In sum, as with civil liability under § 1983 or Bivens, all that can usefully be said about criminal liability under § 242 is that it may be imposed for deprivation of a constitutional right if, but only if, 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [under the Constitution is] apparent,' [citing Anderson] Where it is, the constitutional requirement of fair warning is satisfied.").

Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640 (1987) ("The 'contours' of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.....in light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.")

D.C. CIRCUIT

Johnson v. District of Columbia, 927 F.3d 539, 546 (D.C. Cir. 2019) ("'Although the Supreme Court's decisions do "not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established," for purposes of qualified immunity, "existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate."'. . Much turns, then, on the level of generality at which the relevant decisions establish the pertinent right. . . A plaintiff may be unable to overcome qualified immunity if the precedents define the right abstractly rather than in a manner 'particularized to the [pertinent] facts.'. .Johnson's claim falls short on that ground. Months before his initial parole hearing, the Supreme Court recognized that '[t]he presence of discretion does not displace the protections of the Ex Post Facto Clause.'. . But that broadly framed principle would not have put a reasonable officer on adequate notice that the specific violation alleged here—denying a presumption of suitability in the face of essentially unfettered discretion to depart from the presumption—would entail a significant risk of a longer term of incarceration so as to violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. Indeed, Garner itself acknowledged that determining the Ex Post Facto consequences of any particular change is a 'question of particular difficulty when the discretion vested in a parole board is taken into account.'. . Neither Johnson nor his amicus identifies any contemporaneous precedent establishing the contours of the claimed right with the requisite specificity.")

Hedgpeth v. Rahim, 893 F.3d 802, 807-11 (D.C. Cir. 2018) ("Although there is a dearth of decisions interpreting D.C.'s public intoxication law in relevant respects, decisions from other courts applying comparable public-intoxication laws in similar circumstances support the reasonableness of the officers' belief of probable cause. . . We therefore conclude that the officers could have reasonably believed Hedgpeth was intoxicated and posed a danger to himself or others. As a result, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Hedgpeth's claim of an unlawful arrest. . . .Here, the district court considered the reasonableness of Officer Rahim's use of a forcible takedown maneuver under the assumed facts to be a close question, in light of, among other things, the misdemeanor nature of the suspected offenses. The court, though, did not decide that underlying Fourth Amendment question, instead concluding that Officer Rahim is entitled to qualified immunity. We agree. Even if there is a genuine dispute about the reasonableness of an officer's use of force, he is protected by qualified immunity unless his force violated clearly established law. . . . The pertinent question here is whether 'any competent officer,' in light of '[p]recedent involving similar facts,'. . . would consider it unlawful to use a takedown maneuver against a suspect who was shouting repeatedly and belligerently at the officers, who refused their orders to put his hands behind his back, and who had been described by a person with him as 'hard to handle.' We conclude that this is not 'an obvious case in which any competent officer would have known that' the use of a takedown maneuver in those circumstances 'would violate the Fourth Amendment.'. . . This does not mean an officer invariably has authority to forcibly take down a suspect in the course of a routine arrest. But here, in light of the circumstances of this case and the applicable precedent, this case is not one in which 'the right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it.'. . That conclusion is fortified by decisions from other courts sustaining an arresting officer's use of an analogous level of force against a noncomplying suspect.")

Corrigan v. District of Columbia, 841 F.3d 1022, 1034-38 (D.C. Cir. 2016) ("Because the Supreme Court's reasoning in Cady focused on attributes unique to vehicles, some circuits have confined the community caretaking exception to automobiles. See, e.g., Ray v. Twp. of Warren, 626 F.3d 170, 177 (3d Cir. 2010); United States v. Bute, 43 F.3d 531, 535 (10th Cir. 1994); United States v. Erickson, 991 F.2d 529, 532 (9th Cir. 1993); United States v. Pichany, 687 F.2d 204, 207–09 (7th Cir. 1982). The Fifth and Eighth Circuits have extended the exception to warrantless searches of the home, see United States v. York, 895 F.2d 1026, 1029 (5th Cir. 1990); United States

v. Quezada, 448 F.3d 1005, 1007–08 (8th Cir. 2006), but the authorized scope of the searches has been quite limited. The Sixth Circuit appears to have equivocated. Compare United States v. Rohrig, 98 F.3d 1506, 1521–25 (6th Cir. 1996), with Goodwin v. City of Painesville, 781 F.3d 314, 331 (6th Cir. 2015) and United States v. Williams, 354 F.3d 497, 508–09 (6th Cir. 2003). Neither this court nor the D.C. Court of Appeals has held that the community caretaking exception applies to a home. United States v. Proctor, 489 F.3d 1348, 1353 (D.C. Cir. 2007); Hawkins v. United States, 113 A.3d 216, 222 (D.C. 2015). The instant case does not require the court to decide whether the community caretaking doctrine applies to a home because even assuming it may, the officers point to no authority as would justify the EOD [Explosive Ordnance Disposal Unit] search. In cases where this doctrine justified a warrantless search of a home, the police officers were presented with circumstances requiring immediate action if they were to fulfill their caretaking function, and the ensuing searches were characterized by brevity and circumspection. . . Here, the MPD had been on the scene for five hours and fully secured the area prior to the EOD entry and search, and Corrigan was in MPD custody after surrendering peacefully. There was ample time and opportunity for the MPD to investigate further and, as appropriate, to seek a search warrant. Yet, instead of doing so, the officers conducted another, more invasive search of Corrigan's home. . . . [U]pon viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Corrigan as the non-movant, . . . we conclude that the officers fail to demonstrate that the extensive EOD search of Corrigan's home was justified by any plausible exigency. And assuming, without deciding, that the community caretaking doctrine applies to a home, the officers lacked probable cause to believe that there was a risk to the community demanding the kind of swift, warrantless response that doctrine would authorize. We therefore hold that the EOD search violated Corrigan's rights under the Fourth Amendment. . . .For the brief and limited warrantless ERT 'sweep' of Corrigan's home, the officers had a sufficiently reasonable basis for believing there was probable cause to look for a potentially injured and incapacitated person as to entitle them to qualified immunity. . . .Although a close question, the information known to Glover suggested that a reasonable officer on the scene could have believed that there was probable cause to order a brief "sweep" to check whether the ex-girlfriend was injured and remained incapacitated inside Corrigan's home. . . Consistent with that belief, the ERT 'sweep' was limited to spaces large enough to contain an individual, . . . and thus was not more intrusive than necessary to address the claimed exigency. By contrast, based on the facts known to the officers at the time, no reasonable officer could have believed that an exigency continued to exist as would justify a second warrantless break in of Corrigan's home to search for explosives. The evidence shows only that the MPD officers were presented with a potentially suicidal military veteran who possessed 'military items' and had IED training, but no information about actual or reported threats by him to others, much less that he had IED materials at home or would commit suicide in a manner that threatened others. . . .The unfocused nature of the EOD search underscores its patent unreasonableness, both in terms of its scope and the lack of a reasonable basis for it. . . .Clearly established law foreclosed the broad and invasive search that was executed. And even assuming, without deciding, that the community caretaking doctrine could justify the warrantless search of a home, it cannot shield the officers from liability. It is clearly established that this doctrine encompasses only police searches that are occasioned by, and strictly circumscribed by, the need to perform caretaking functions 'totally divorced from the detection, investigation, or acquisition of evidence related to' a crime. . . That is, the police must be lawfully inside a home for a reason unrelated to ferreting out crime. . . . Finally, the wide berth for reasonableness that the Supreme Court has accorded officers involved circumstances in which they must make split second judgments. . . . In Corrigan's case, the MPD had more than five hours, between the Fifth District's officers' arrival on the scene and the MPD's first contact with Corrigan himself, to gather information about a possible threat and apply for a warrant upon probable cause. . . . The more intrusive EOD search was conducted after the ERT 'sweep' revealed no injury to others or suspicious items in plain view. Corrigan had peacefully submitted to MPD custody. As such, this was not a case in which officers had to make a split-second decision that, judged with the benefit of hindsight, is revealed to be mistaken. . . Rather, this is a case in which officers disregarded the long-established 'basic principle of Fourth Amendment law that searches and seizures inside a home without a warrant are presumptively unreasonable.'. . They thereby contravened established law clearly putting them on fair notice that warrantless searches of a home based on an exception to the warrant requirement must be supported by a reasonable belief based on objective facts and narrowly circumscribed to the specific exigency claimed. Our dissenting colleague parts company with our analysis only as to qualified immunity. As to that issue she acknowledges that 'there can be "an obvious case" where a more generalized test of a Fourth Amendment violation "clearly establish[es]" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law' articulated at a high level of specificity. . . This is that 'obvious case.' A few clear propositions, all well established at the time of the search, admit of no relevant legal uncertainty in the context the EOD faced: The Fourth Amendment prohibits warrantless searches of a home, . . .unless an exception to the warrant requirement applies, . . . the exigent circumstances exception requires 'genuine exigency,'. . . and the community caretaking exception, which no binding precedent has applied to the search of a home, is, in any event, limited to police functions that are 'totally divorced' from criminal investigation[.]. . . As general as these propositions may be, their application here is straightforward, implicating no 'hazy border' between acceptable and unacceptable conduct by trained law enforcement officers. . . . Nothing in Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 308 (2015), where the police were attempting to execute an arrest warrant, calls our conclusion into doubt. . . . Given the lack of any exigency in the instant case, Mullenix, like the entire run of recent cases granting qualified immunity, is relevant only insofar as it reinforces the familiar, objective immunity standard that we apply.") Corrigan v. District of Columbia, 841 F.3d 1022, 1039-47 (D.C. Cir. 2016) (Brown, J., dissenting) ("As Law and Order reminds us every evening, the police are the ones 'who investigate crime.' Nowadays, though, we demand much more from them. The series of unfortunate events presented by Matthew Corrigan's lawsuit is distressing, and I agree with the conclusion that the second search of Corrigan's apartment violated the Fourth Amendment. Nevertheless, given the varied role played by police officers, and its effect on the standard Corrigan must meet to pierce the officers' qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent. . . .Properly applied, the qualified immunity analysis shows the officers' initial actions were not only responsible, but commendable. When the officers' actions transgressed the Fourth Amendment, Corrigan's rights were protected by the district court granting his motion to suppress and entering a nolle prosequi on all charges against him. Now, when Corrigan seeks half-a-million dollars in a § 1983 lawsuit, a different issue is in play: whether controlling law was 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what [t]he[y] [did] violate[d]' Corrigan's Fourth Amendment rights. . . The court concludes it was, but I am at a loss to understand how this holding can be squared with the simple fact that neither the Supreme Court's precedent, nor ours, nor a robust consensus of our sister circuits clearly answered the legal questions faced by the officers in this case. There is much on which the majority and I agree. Under the circumstances of this case, the first search was permissible; the second search was not; and the information the police garnered from the first search and further investigation changed the calculus. However, on the question of how these issues impact the scope of qualified immunity, we part company. First, by imposing an artificially high burden on police conduct in exigent circumstances, the court conflates the 'probable cause' normally required to search a person's home and the 'objectively reasonable basis' used to evaluate intrusions based on exigent circumstances. . . .This conflation signals the majority opinion's fundamental flaw: grafting general Fourth Amendment standards from the criminal investigation context on to the exigency context. Related to this first problem is the second—and more significant—issue with today's opinion: The metric for measuring what law is 'clearly established' is more protean than my colleagues concede. . . .The standard for law to be 'clearly established' is quite demanding. The Supreme Court's most recent pronouncement on the issue confirms '[a] clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right. We do not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate. Put simply, qualified immunity protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law. . . . The source of 'clearly established' law is quite constrained as well. Controlling precedent from the Supreme Court, the applicable state supreme court, or from the applicable circuit court, constitutes 'clearly established' law—but it is unclear what else, if anything, does. . . .If there is no controlling authority in the plaintiff's jurisdiction at the time of the incident, 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' 'is necessary' to show 'clearly established' law. . . This makes sense. It is simply not reasonable to ask police departments around the country to keep abreast of every circuit court's latest 'clearly established' pronouncement and parse its application to the myriad factual permutations officers encounter on a daily basis. . . Accordingly, the Supreme Court is circumspect about the use of out-of-circuit cases to compose 'clearly established' law. Since al-Kidd, it is only assumed for sake of argument that 'a right can be "clearly established" by circuit precedent despite disagreement in the courts of appeals.' See Taylor v. Barkes, 135 S. Ct. 2042, 2045 (2015) (per curiam); City & Cnty. of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1776 (2015); Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350 (2014) (per curiam); Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012). . . .Finally, characterizing the appropriate law as 'clearly established' is quite exacting. . . .To be sure, there can be 'an obvious case' where a more generalized test of a Fourth Amendment violation ' "clearly establish[es]" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'. . But, that circumstance is inapposite when a case is 'one in which the result depends very much on the facts.'. . In that latter circumstance, a more 'particularized' inquiry into the applicable law is required. . . There, we ask whether a prior case 'squarely governs the case here,' not whether a prior case puts this one in a 'hazy border' between acceptable and unacceptable conduct[.] . . . Behavior on the border is still behavior protected by qualified immunity. . . . The majority cites no Supreme Court case and no D.C. Circuit case squarely governing Corrigan's claim. Indeed, the majority all but concedes there is no such case when justifying its review of both the 'constitutional violation' and 'clearly established' prongs of the qualified immunity analysis; doing so 'to avoid "leav[ing] the standards of official conduct permanently in limbo."'. . The majority finds 'clearly established' law by reasoning the facts of this exigent circumstances case back to the general principles of warrantless home searches in the criminal investigation context. This is inappropriate in Corrigan's case, where the officers were not searching for criminal activity but responding to a potentially-suicidal suspect with 'military items.'. . But even if this was appropriate, the majority's analysis rests on 'legal facts,' not law. . . The facts aid the analysis, but only to the extent they are closely aligned (or are obviously distinguishable from) controlling authority or persuasive authority. The 'clearly established' inquiry is its own question, not a rehash of the facts giving rise to a constitutional-rights violation. . . The factual regurgitation is telling, however, because it confirms Corrigan's claim is one where the existence of 'clearly established' law 'depends very much on the facts of [this] case.'. . 'Clearly established' law in this context thus depends upon a prior case 'squarely govern[ing]' this one. . . Since the majority can point to no clearly analogous case prohibiting the officers' conduct, that should end the inquiry. . . . At the time—with no Supreme Court or D.C. Circuit case squarely governing the emergency situation faced here—a reasonable officer could read Mora, Sutterfield, and Hendrix and conclude that the warrantless searches conducted in Corrigan's apartment might be within the realm of the officer's authority to abate public safety concerns posed by possession of military equipment by an individual with IED training. This is so even as the second search was a 'substantial step beyond the standard protective sweep.'. . . But determining whether the law was 'clearly established' is not an exercise in Monday-morning quarterbacking—law enforcement officers should not be subject to personal liability simply because the judiciary has not precisely defined the rules of the road. . . .It is therefore insufficient to apply, retrospectively, criminal investigation limitations on police conduct to the exigent circumstances context simply because these limitations have long existed in the investigatory context. Ultimately, the court's analysis rests on the 'Fourth Amendment standard' of reasonableness. . . The 'inquiry' of 'objective reasonableness' as to a Fourth Amendment violation, however, 'is not as forgiving as the one employed in the distinct context of deciding whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity for a constitutional or statutory violation.' . . The fact that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment in searching Corrigan's apartment a second time without a warrant is, for purposes of finding the 'particular' issue faced by the officers answered by 'clearly established' law, a non sequitur. What "every reasonable" official would have understood to be 'clearly established' in case law is not the same question as what is 'objectively reasonable' for purposes of determining a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . It does not take six pages to explain why law is 'clearly established' unless the case is 'one in which the result depends very much on the facts.'. . . But the majority will not—and indeed, cannot—admit this. If the majority did admit this, it would then have to concede no case 'squarely governed' at the time the officers entered Corrigan's apartment. . . . We do not need to make 'bad law' just because 'bad facts' are often accused of doing so. There is much to regret about the procedures police continued to pursue here—especially in light of the many observations and revelations which objectively decreased the imminence of any dire threat. Good intentions, however, are no substitute for good reasons. 'Because of the importance of qualified immunity to society as a whole, the [Supreme] Court often corrects lower courts when they wrongly subject individual officers to liability.'. . Indeed, if this decision were affirmed by the Supreme Court on the ground that the officers violated clearly established law, it would mark the first time in more than a decade that the Supreme Court has ruled in favor of a § 1983 plaintiff on the question. See Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 565 (2004); Hope, 536 U.S. at 745–46. Yet the Supreme Court's exacting standard to identify 'clearly established' law does not play even a supporting role in the court's analysis, which, at most, strings together generalized statements and some out-of-circuit cases, affixes the label 'clearly established' onto the newfangled 'rule' drawn from them, and then employs this 'rule' to deny qualified immunity. If we want to join the game of second-guessing first responders, we will find ourselves at the end of a long queue. But flouting the clear trend of controlling authority is both unwarranted and unwise, so I respectfully dissent.")

Dukore v. D.C., 799 F.3d 1137, 1144-45 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("In reviewing a grant of qualified immunity, we must consider the right asserted 'not as a broad general proposition, but in a particularized sense so that the contours of the right are clear[.]'. . So the right we must consider in this case is 'not the general right to be free from retaliation for one's speech,' but rather 'the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause.'. . The Supreme Court has 'never held that there is such a right.'. . Nor was there in February 2012 (nor is there now) any settled consensus view in this court or other federal courts of appeals such that 'the statutory or constitutional question' has been placed 'beyond debate.' . . Quite the opposite, in July 2011, this court recognized that the federal courts of appeals were split on whether a plaintiff claiming retaliatory arrest had to show that the arrest lacked probable cause, and expressly declined to take sides. See Moore, 644 F.3d at 423 n. 8. That means that, at the time of the arrests in this case, precedent in this and other circuits was either inconclusive or actively in conflict on whether the existence of probable cause precluded an arrest from being deemed 'retaliatory.' That is a far cry from placing the question beyond debate. Dukore and Canavan argue that the right to be free from retaliation under the First Amendment is clearly established. And they argue that the only confusion in the law concerned retaliatory prosecutions, as discussed in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 164 L.Ed.2d 441 (2006). Dukore and Canavan further contend that any ripples of uncertainty generated by Hartman in other jurisdictions did not unsettle this circuit's law, because we have recognized that 'retaliatory arrest and retaliatory prosecution are distinct constitutional violations[.]' Moore v. Hartman, 704 F.3d 1003, 1004 (D.C.Cir.2013). The absence of confusion in this jurisdiction, they conclude, left as governing law for the officers the clearly established background right to be free from retaliation under the First Amendment. That argument turns the qualified immunity burden upside down. It is Dukore's and Canavan's burden to show that the particular right in question—narrowly described to fit the factual pattern confronting the officers . . . was clearly established. It was not the District's burden to show that the right had been called into question. The generality of Dukore's and Canavan's constitutional principle and the widespread instability in the law on the precise question of probable-cause arrests prevent them from discharging that duty.)

Doe v. D.C., 796 F.3d 96, 104-05 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("The parties do not dispute that in an exigency the state may, consistent with the Constitution, seize children without a court order or a pre-deprivation hearing. But the precise contours of when an exigency exists to justify removal without a warrant or pre-deprivation hearing are not settled, as the other Circuits' varied formulations demonstrate. Given the uncertainty regarding when exactly an exigency exists and the lack of our own controlling precedent, the law in question was not 'clearly established' at the time of the seizure. The individual defendants are thus entitled to qualified immunity as the district court held.")

Fox v. Gov't of D.C., 794 F.3d 25, 30-31 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("Certainly, a plausible argument can be made that the officer's conduct in the present case crossed that constitutional line. That, however, is not good enough to pierce the officer's claim of qualified immunity. Under Saucier and Pearson and their progeny, the piercing requires a violation of a constitutional right clearly established at the time of the incident. Not only has Mrs. Fox not established that her right not to be seized in the circumstances of this case was 'clearly established,' she did not even argue this matter in her opening brief. As also noted above, where a litigant has forfeited an argument by not raising it in the opening brief, we need not reach it. In short, we need not decide the constitutional issue because Mrs. Fox has not properly brought it before us. Given the circumstances of Mrs. Fox's alleged seizure, nothing in her brief shows that existing precedent has placed her Fourth Amendment right beyond debate. . . Consequently, Mrs. Fox has not shown that Officer Boyd violated her clearly established Fourth Amendment right when he ordered her to get out of the car and put her hands on the hood during her husband's traffic stop.")

Mpoy v. Rhee, 758 F.3d 285, 293-95 (D.C. Cir. 2014) ("Mpoy argues . . . that the context of the statement suggests he was speaking as a citizen rather than an employee because he sent the email outside the 'chain of command'—by sending it directly to Chancellor Rhee rather than to his principal's immediate superiors. As noted above, we held in Winder that 'a public employee speaks without First Amendment protection when he reports conduct that interferes with his job responsibilities, even if the report is made outside his chain of command.'. . But granting that whether speech is made inside or outside a chain of command may be a contextual factor in determining whether the employee made it to report interference with his job responsibilities, . . . there is little doubt that Mpoy was using the email to Rhee as an internal channel through which he could, in his capacity as a teacher, report such interference. . . . Accordingly, we conclude that, under the Winder test, Mpoy's email constituted employee speech unprotected by the First Amendment. . . Winder, however, is not the last word on this subject. In June of this year, the Supreme Court decided Lane v. Franks, in which it held that the First Amendment 'protects a public employee who provided truthful sworn testimony, compelled by subpoena,' at least where testifying was outside the scope of the employee's 'ordinary job responsibilities.' . . . In so holding, the Court focused particularly on the nature of compelled testimony. . . Moreover, because it was 'undisputed that Lane's ordinary job responsibilities did not include testifying in court proceedings,'. . . the Court, as in Garcetti, had no occasion to consider how the scope of such responsibilities should be determined in other circumstances. As a consequence, Lane does not directly or necessarily contradict Winder's application of Garcetti. . . Nonetheless, it is possible that Winder's broad language, interpreting Garcetti as leaving an employee unprotected when he reports conduct that 'interferes with his job responsibilities,'. . . could be in tension with Lane's holding that an employee's speech is unprotected only when it is within the scope of the employee's 'ordinary job responsibilities,'. . . or 'ordinary job duties[]'. . . . In particular, the use of the adjective 'ordinary'—which the court repeated nine times—could signal a narrowing of the realm of employee speech left unprotected by Garcetti. Neither Garcetti nor any other previous Supreme Court case had added 'ordinary' as a qualifier. . . But we need not resolve that question today. As the Court noted in Lane—and went on to hold in that case—even if speech is protected by the First Amendment, a court must dismiss claims against a government official in his personal capacity if the official is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In Lane, the Court found that precedent in the Eleventh Circuit, in which the case was brought, 'did not preclude [the defendant] from reasonably holding that belief. And no decision of this Court was sufficiently clear to cast doubt on the controlling Eleventh Circuit precedent.'. . As we held in Part II.B, under this circuit's Winder test, Mpoy's email constituted unprotected employee speech. (And no Supreme Court case at the time 'cast doubt' on that precedent.) A fortiori, the defendants could reasonably have believed that they could fire Mpoy on account of that email. . .Indeed, even if we are wrong in concluding as a matter of law that the email 'report[ed] conduct that interfere[d] with his job responsibilities,'. . . it surely would not have been unreasonable for the defendants to believe that it did, and hence that it was lawful to fire Mpoy under Winder. There is one further wrinkle to consider. The question under the qualified immunity doctrine is whether the official violated a right that was 'clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct,' and thus whether the defendants 'could reasonably have believed, at the time [they] fired' Mpoy that his speech was unprotected. . . Winder was decided approximately a year after the defendants fired Mpoy, and hence could not itself have been the basis for reasonable belief on the part of the defendants. But Winder said that the test it was articulating was the consistent holding of 'our cases applying Garcetti,'. . . and all of the cases Winder cited were decided before Mpoy was fired. Accordingly, because this court read its preexisting law as yielding the test we announced in Winder, it could not have been unreasonable for the defendants to do so as well. Presswood and Rhee are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Amobi v. District of Columbia Dept. of Corrections, 755 F.3d 980, 993 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (" '[M]alicious prosecution is actionable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 to the extent that the defendant's actions cause the plaintiff to be unreasonably "seized" without probable cause, in violation of the Fourth Amendment." Pitt, 491 F.3d at 511. Nevertheless, because the relevant conduct at issue in this case occurred before we issued our decision in Pitt [v. District of Columbia, 491 F.3d 494 (D.C. Cir. 2007)], clearly establishing malicious prosecution as a violation of constitutional rights, qualified immunity is appropriate here.")

Moore v. Hartman, 704 F.3d 1003, 1004 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (per curiam) ("The Supreme Court has directed this court to determine whether our decision in Moore v. Hartman, 644 F.3d 415

(D.C.Cir.2011) ("Moore V "), holding that 'probable cause is not an element of the First Amendment right allegedly violated' in a retaliatory prosecution suit, id. at 423, remains good law in light of Reichle v. Howards, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012). There, in examining whether the law governing retaliatory arrest claims was clearly established in the Tenth Circuit in 2006, the Court expressly declined to decide whether the absence-of-probable-cause requirement identified in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 265–66, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 164 L.Ed.2d 441 (2006), is 'best read as defining the scope of the First Amendment right or as simply establishing a prerequisite for recovery.' Reichle, 132 S.Ct. at 2096 n. 6. Instead, the Court hinged its decision in Reichle on the fact that Hartman unsettled Tenth Circuit precedent that had conflated retaliatory arrest and retaliatory prosecution claims. See id. at 2094–96. Because it was uncertain whether the Tenth Circuit's retaliatory arrest law remained clearly established, the defendants in Reichle were entitled to qualified immunity. The Court in Reichle was thus agnostic on the issue central to our holding in Moore V. Because retaliatory arrest and retaliatory prosecution are distinct constitutional violations and because the precedent in this Circuit clearly established in 1988, when the challenged conduct by the Postal Inspectors took place, the contours of the First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory prosecution, nothing in Reichle changes our conclusion that the absence-of-probable-cause requirement is not 'an element of a First Amendment retaliation violation.' Moore V, 644 F.3d at 424. If the Postal Inspectors believe that the Court in Reichle meant to decide what it refused to decide in Hartman and bring to a halt this three decades old case involving evidence that, unlike in Reichle where probable cause was conceded, 'comes close to the proverbial smoking gun,' Moore v. Hartman, 388 F.3d 871, 884 (D.C.Cir.2004) (" Moore III "), they are free to once again petition for certiorari and ask the Supreme Court if it wishes to end this saga.")

Moore v. Hartman, 704 F.3d 1003, 1004 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (Kavanaugh, J., dissenting) ("In its recent decision in Reichle v. Howards, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012), the Supreme Court indicated that it is not clear whether the absence-of-probable-cause requirement identified in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 252, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 164 L.Ed.2d 441 (2006), is 'best read as defining the scope of the First Amendment right or as simply establishing a prerequisite for recovery.' Reichle, 132 S.Ct. at 2096 n. 6. Because the First Amendment law on this point is not clear, the defendants in this case cannot be said to have violated 'clearly established' First Amendment law. Therefore, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, and the suit may not proceed. I respectfully dissent.")

> [Post-mortem on Moore: Moore v. Hartman, No. CV 92-2288, 2015 WL 1812852, at *90-91 (D.D.C. Apr. 17, 2015) ("After a 'herculean effort,' see Moore V, 644 F.3d at 427, and a 'procedural history portending another Jarndyce v. Jarndyce,' Hartman, 547 U.S. at 256, 126 S.Ct. 1695, the plaintiff received his days in court. While the plaintiff's claims may have been sufficient to survive the pleadings, the trial evidence revealed the plaintiff's claims to lack any persuasive force. . . .In sum, rather than produce a smoking gun, the plaintiff's trial evidence produced much hot air that was insufficient to sustain his claims. As a result, and for the reasons explained above, the Court again—as two other Judges on this Court previously held—denies the plaintiff's FTCA claim and enters judgment in favor of the United States. As a consequence of the plaintiff's failed FTCA claim, the plaintiff's request for a new trial on his Bivens claim is rendered moot. In any event, having received one jury trial on his claim for retaliatory inducement to prosecution, the plaintiff presents no grounds that would justify a second jury trial. Thus, even if the plaintiff's Bivens claim were not otherwise barred, the plaintiff would not be entitled to a new trial.

As the Supreme Court noted over sixty years ago, '[t]here must be an end to litigation someday....' Ackermann v. United States, 340 U.S. 193, 198, 71 S.Ct. 209, 95 L.Ed. 207 (1950). While this has no doubt been a long and arduous journey for the plaintiff, the journey was no shorter or any easier for the defendants. For the past twenty-five years, this litigation has cast a shadow over the careers, retirements, and estates, of the Postal Inspectors targeted by the plaintiff in this suit—only to have their long ago actions and motives vindicated at trial by two separate fact-finders. At trial, the plaintiff requested approximately one-quarter billion dollars in damages, an 'astronomical' award based on his inflated career aspirations and the profound sense of wrong the plaintiff believes himself to have suffered for what he discounts as merely 'look[ing] like we made some bad decisions on people.'. . Having examined the totality of the evidence presented at trial, the plaintiff not only made 'bad decisions,' but those bad decisions helped fund a corrupt scheme that cost taxpayers millions of dollars. The indictment at issue in this case was not premised on retaliation or malice, but resulted from a diligent and comprehensive investigation following the corrupt payments back to their source. In this case, the evidence led directly to the plaintiff. For the reasons set forth above, the plaintiff's claims are denied. An appropriate Order accompanies this Memorandum Opinion.")]

Atherton v. District of Columbia Office of the Mayor, 706 F.3d 512, 515, 516 (D.C. Cir. 2013) ("We agree with the District Court in substance. Assuming arguendo that Mathews requires a judicial determination and formal process prior to dismissal from a grand jury, no reasonable official in Appellees' position would have understood those requirements to be 'clearly established' as a constitutional matter. . . . Here, the procedural due process owed a grand juror seems as unclear today as it was over a decade ago when Atherton was dismissed from jury service on April 11, 2001. The parties have cited no cases directly on point and this Court has found just one of passing resemblance.") International Action Center v. United States, 365 F.3d 20, 25 (D.C. Cir. 2004) ("It does no good to allege that police officers violated the right to free speech, and then conclude that the right to free speech has been 'clearly established' in this country since 1791. Instead, courts must 'define the right to a degree that would allow officials Areasonably [to] anticipate when their conduct may give rise to liability for damages"....' The district court ruled that the MPD supervisors were not entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiffs' inaction theory because plaintiffs had alleged that 'it was 'highly likely,' given the circumstances at the Navy Memorial on January 20, 2001, that the MPD officers would violate citizens' constitutional rights.' . . But applying a basis for liability at such a level of generality – a duty dependent upon 'the circumstances of the case' or arising 'from the surrounding circumstances' – is not faithful to the teaching of the Supreme Court in Anderson or this court in Butera.").

Butera v. District of Columbia, 235 F.3d 637, 647, 652, 654 (D.C. Cir. 2001) ("Under the first stage of the Wilson inquiry–whether the plaintiff has asserted the relevant constitutional rights at the appropriate level of specificity–we conclude, consistent with the Supreme Court's instructions in Anderson and Wilson, that the district court erred by defining the constitutional rights as Eric Butera's right to life, bodily integrity, personal security, and personal privacy, and as Terry Butera's 'liberty interest' in the companionship of her son. Although courts have acknowledged the existence of these general rights in certain circumstances, . . . they are overly broad where a qualified immunity defense is asserted. Applying the standards of Wilson and Anderson, we conclude that the relevant inquiries are (1) whether Eric Butera has a constitutional right to protection by the District of Columbia from danger that it created or enhanced that resulted in harm by third parties, and (2) whether Terry Butera has a liberty interest in the society and companionship of her independent adult child. This narrower definition of the rights allows a reasonable police officer to anticipate whether his actions amount to a constitutional violation. . . . Upon examining relevant case law on the 'State endangerment' exception to DeShaney, we conclude that, in December 1997, Eric Butera's constitutional right to protection by the District of Columbia from third-party violence was not clearly established within the meaning of Anderson. . . . Terry Butera's claim of a constitutional right to the companionship of her 31-year-old son has a more difficult hurdle to overcome: It fails the first prong of the Wilson test. The Supreme Court has not spoken to the precise issue, and the precedent in this and nearly all of the other circuits suggests that no such right exits.").

Harris v. District of Columbia, 932 F.2d 10 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (Rejecting argument that Estelle v. Gamble, Revere v. Massachusetts Gen. Hosp., and Youngberg v. Romeo, created clearly established right to medical care for someone taken into police custody for purpose of obtaining medical care, but not formally committed, either by conviction, involuntary commitment, or arrest, to the charge of the District).

Black Lives Matter D.C. v. Trump, 544 F.Supp.3d 15, 47 (D.D.C. 2021) ("Having found a plausible allegation of a constitutional violation, the Court must consider whether the right alleged to be violated was clearly established at the time. No doubt, the general right to be free from retaliation for protected speech is clearly established. . . But the Supreme Court has held that such a formulation draws the question at too high a level of generality. . . The appropriately tailored question is whether a peaceful protestor has the right to be free from government violence in retaliation for the message of their protest. The Court finds that every reasonable officer would have been aware of such a right on June 1, 2020. . . In Quraishi v. St. Charles County, Missouri, 986 F.3d 831 (8th Cir. 2021), the Eighth Circuit decided a case highly analogous to this one and held that a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' clearly established that deploying a tear-gas canister without warning at peaceful reporters at a police brutality protest violated the right to be free from First Amendment retaliation. . . So too here. Even if the case law were insufficient to provide notice, though, the right to be free from government violence for the peaceful exercise of protected speech is so fundamental to our system of ordered liberty that it is 'beyond debate.'. . Taking the facts as alleged, this is the 'rare obvious case where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even [if] existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . As noted above, the parties will have the opportunity to attempt to prove and rebut their claims at the discovery stage. And record evidence gathered during discovery will shed light on whether the defendants had a legitimate, non-retaliatory justification for their actions on June 1, 2020. At this early stage, taking the alleged facts as true, the plaintiffs have alleged enough to overcome qualified immunity and survive the motions to dismiss.")

Black Lives Matter D.C. v. Trump, 544 F.Supp.3d 15, 48-49 (D.D.C. 2021) ("The plaintiffs also bring Fourth Amendment claims against the D.C. and Arlington defendants for unreasonable seizures conducted with excessive force. The plaintiffs have not, however, pointed to a violation of any clearly established Fourth Amendment right that can overcome the defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the officers attacked and improperly dispersed the protesters—they did not restrain them or attempt to seize them in place. . . Indeed, quite the opposite was true—the officers attempted to cause the protestors and fleeing crowd to leave their location, rather than cause them to remain there. . . And the plaintiffs allege that they all did in fact leave Lafayette Square. . . These alleged facts lie in stark contrast to the Supreme Court's recent holding that 'the application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure even if the person does not submit and is not subdued.' Torres v. Madrid, 141 S. Ct. 989, 1003 (2021) (emphasis added). One could make the argument that, although the plaintiffs were not physically restrained, their freedom of movement was restrained because the defendants sought to route them in certain directions. But even assuming that the plaintiffs were seized by being forced to leave Lafayette Square, the plaintiffs have not pointed to a case clearly establishing that attempting to move members of a crowd (rather than keep them in a location) can constitute a seizure. And where assessing qualified immunity in the context of the Fourth Amendment, the Supreme Court has repeatedly 'stressed the need to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. .In an effort to ground their claim in relevant precedent, the plaintiffs point out that 'Supreme Court and Circuit precedent hold[s] that even a momentary limitation of a person's freedom of movement is a seizure if it results from means intentionally applied.'. . But this frames the issue at far too high a level of generality, which the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed against. . . The relevant question is not whether a momentary use of force can constitute a seizure—of course, it can—but whether the use of tear gas to move members of a crowd can constitute a seizure. Because the plaintiffs have pointed to no case clearly establishing an answer to that question, the defendant officials are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Goolsby v. D.C., 317 F.Supp.3d 582, ___, ____ (D.D.C. 2018) ("Both sets of individual defendants have argued that their actions are protected by qualified immunity. As to the Officers, the Court agrees in full and will dismiss the section 1983 claims against them. But as to the Dispatchers, the Court concludes that a genuine issue of material fact precludes summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment claims and that Goolsby has pled an alternative Fifth Amendment theory. . . .In sum, case law suggests that, at the very least, a reasonable officer could have believed that he could permissibly temporarily detain Goolsby since he matched the suspect from a 911 call seeming to report criminal activity and fled when ordered to stop by the police. . . . Finally, a reasonable officer, having observed Goolsby flee, could have believed that he could place Goolsby in handcuffs during the detention without turning the Terry stop into a full-blown arrest requiring probable cause. . . .As with the false arrest claims, Goolsby points to no specific cases with similar facts to rebut the Officers' assertion of qualified immunity. Rather, his primary argument is that 'a reasonable officer would have known that applying any force would be excessive because there was not even a reasonable suspicion to justify an investigatory stop.'. . But as noted, Goolsby has pled that the Officers reasonably believed they were responding to an attempted robbery. As a result, they could have reasonably believed they could temporarily detain Goolsby. And even if that conclusion were erroneous, the simple fact that a detention was impermissible does not automatically make the use of force to effectuate that detention excessive. . . .As to the level of force itself, the Court takes as true the facts as pled by Goolsby. According to his complaint, the officers 'violently slamm[ed] [him] to the ground and twist[ed] [his] arm to a gut-wrenching degree while [he] screamed in pain.'. . While this issue presents a somewhat closer question than in the false arrest claims, the Court ultimately concludes that qualified immunity is appropriate here, too. For one, Goolsby nowhere points to a case with similar facts holding the officers used excessive force. This disregards the Supreme Court's counsel that in the context of excessive force claims, 'police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.'. ._. And this omission is particularly problematic since the level of force, as pled, does not rise to the level that the Supreme Court or the D.C. Circuit has clearly established as a constitutional violation, namely the use of force after an individual has already been placed in handcuffs or otherwise subdued. . . . Nor does Goolsby point to cases from other courts of appeals that would suggest any injury here clearly rendered the use of force excessive. Given this absence of cases with similar facts indicating force similar to that used here resulting in 'severe injuries' was excessive, any constitutional violation was not clearly established. To conclude, the Officers' conduct alleged here falls within a gray area between clearly-sanctioned uses of force from cases such as Wasserman, Oberwetter, and Scott and clearly-excessive uses of force from cases such as Johnson. As such, and given the similarity of these facts to those in Wasserman and Scott, a reasonable officer could have concluded the use of force alleged here was reasonable. The Court therefore must accord the Officers qualified immunity for their alleged conduct. . . . Since the Dispatchers are not alleged to have authorized the Officers' conduct or approved of it—indeed, they were not physically present during any of the events that occurred and have no supervisory or other authority over the Officers—the argument is simply that the Dispatchers' affirmative act of providing false or misleading information to the Officers set in effect a chain of events leading to Goolsby being unlawfully arrested and subjected to excessive force. . . The Dispatchers respond that they should be granted summary judgment because their actions are protected by qualified immunity. . . In their view, no cases put them on notice that 'in providing incorrect information to police officers [they] could be held liable for the constitutional torts of the officers.'. . The Court ultimately concludes that qualified immunity is appropriate as to Goolsby's excessive force claims against the Dispatchers, but that a genuine issue of material fact precludes summary judgment as to his false arrest claims. . . .Beginning with the false arrest claims, the Court will again start with the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: whether any violation by the Dispatchers was clearly established. Goolsby once more cites no relevant cases, here ones involving dispatchers held liable for false arrest under section 1983. The only relevant court of appeals decisions the Court is aware of—all of which reviewed summary judgment grants to dispatchers—held the dispatcher not liable because he acted negligently or within the scope of his discretion. . . . That said, though neither side points to it, there is a common law tradition—albeit one that does not specifically involve dispatchers—that suggests a scenario under which a violation might be clearly established. The Supreme Court has recognized that when section 1983 was passed, 'the generally accepted rule was that one who procured the issuance of an arrest warrant by submitting a complaint could be held liable if the complaint was made maliciously and without probable cause.'. . This is in line with the general tort law principle that one who instigates a false arrest, such as by directing a police officer to arrest someone without any suspicion of wrongdoing, is also liable for false arrest or imprisonment. . . Combined, these rules would seem to put any reasonable dispatcher on notice that certain kinds of false reports might violate the Fourth Amendment, namely maliciously misleading police officers without suspicion of wrongdoing in a manner that leads to another's detention. . . In light of this legal background, the Court concludes that a genuine issue of material fact precludes summary judgment at this juncture. . . . The most natural explanation for the erroneous information passed along is simply negligence or confusion on the part of the dispatcher. But it could also be the case that the dispatcher intentionally misdirected the patrol officers for some nefarious purpose. . . . Since the dispatcher's mental state is relevant to whether a section 1983 claim has been stated or a clearly established violation occurred, the current factual record yields a genuine issue of material fact that precludes summary judgment at this juncture. . . . Goolsby also raises excessive force claims against the Dispatchers. As with the false arrest claim, Goolsby cites no case law that has ever found a dispatcher liable for a police officer's use of force. Nor is the Court aware of any. While the cases discussed above might support possible false arrest claims against the Dispatchers, they provide no indication that the Dispatchers might be liable for excessive force claims. In the absence of any case law suggesting that a dispatcher can be held liable for a police officer's use of excessive force, the Court concludes that any constitutional violation here is not clearly established. Dismissal of the excessive force claims against the Dispatchers is thus appropriate on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Young v. D.C., 107 F.Supp.3d 69, 80 (D.D.C. 2015) ("In this case, the plaintiff has not alleged that any requests from medical personnel to remove any restraints were made, let alone ignored by the police, or that the restraints applied to the plaintiff hindered his medical treatment or exacerbated any pain he suffered. Without deciding whether the use of handcuffs and shackles on a pretrial detainee, who has been shot by the police and is being treated at the hospital, amounts to a due process violation on these bare allegations, the Court concludes that the absence of a clear legal consensus on the constitutionality of such restraints in these circumstances leads inexorably to the conclusion that defendant Powell is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim set out in Count II.")

Kenley v. D.C., 83 F.Supp.3d 20, 39 (D.D.C. 2015) ("Plaintiff . . . has not cited any cases in which the Supreme Court or the D.C. Circuit has addressed police officers' constitutional duty under the Due Process Clause to disclose exculpatory information to the prosecution long before trial. Looking to other circuits, in fact, it appears that there is disagreement about whether the due-process rights articulated in Brady are implicated at all where plaintiffs were not convicted in their criminal cases – e.g., if they were acquitted at trial or if the charges were dismissed prior to trial. [citing cases and Michael Avery, Paying for Silence: The Liability of Police Officers Under Section 1983 for Suppressing Exculpatory Evidence, 13 Temp. Pol. & Civ. Rts. L.Rev. 1, 2 (2003)] The Court is, consequently, not persuaded that there was a clearly established due-process right under which police officers who were aware of potentially exculpatory information had to disclose it to the prosecution when the case was first papered or within a short time after. The officers, therefore, are immune from any Fifth Amendment claim based on their nondisclosure.")

Patterson v. United States, 999 F.Supp.2d 300, (D.D.C. 2013) ("Given the clearly established law that governs free speech and permissible arrests for disorderly conduct, and also taking the facts alleged in Patterson's complaint as true and drawing all inferences in Patterson's favor, . . . no reasonable officer could conclude that Patterson's conduct was likely to produce violence or otherwise cause a breach of the peace, as required to justify either punishing his speech under the First Amendment or arresting him for disorderly conduct. . .There is a significant body of jurisprudence that addresses the confluence of these First and Fourth Amendment violations in the context of arrests for disorderly conduct under the D.C.Code, and these cases outline the parameters of permissible police action in circumstances that are similar to those at issue here. . . . In short, because no reasonable officer could conclude that there was probable cause to believe that Patterson was committing disorderly conduct on the facts as alleged in the complaint, the complaint ably supports the claim that Patterson was arrested in retaliation for his protected speech and that the individual officers therefore violated Patterson's clearly established First and Fourth Amendment rights. . . Consequently, the individual defendants have not satisfied Saucier's qualified immunity test. . . .Undaunted, the individual defendants strenuously dispute the 'clearly established' nature of Mr. Patterson's alleged First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory arrest under the circumstances presented in the complaint. . . But this argument plainly puts the cart before the horse because the constitutional right that Defendants deem unclear and unestablished is the right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause. . . Plaintiffs make no such allegation here, and Defendants do not address whether the right to be free of retaliatory arrest in the absence of probable cause is clearly established. Moreover, as explained above, it is clear from the D.C. Circuit's Dellums opinion that the right to be free from a retaliatory arrest in the absence of probable cause is clearly established in this jurisdiction. In other words, in the D.C. Circuit, a police officer is unquestionably on notice that arresting a speaker solely based on the content of his speech and without probable cause to believe that he has committed a crime is a violation of the First Amendment.")

Shaw v. District of Columbia, 944 F.Supp.2d 43, 57-59 (D.D.C. 2013) ("In the end, the ultimate question for purposes of qualified immunity is whether a reasonable officer would have known that the searches of plaintiff were unreasonable. Based on the alleged facts, which must at this stage be accepted as true, the Court concludes that a reasonable officer would have known that a cross-gender search of a female detainee by male USMS employees that included intimate physical contact, exposure of private body parts, and verbal harassment, all in front of male detainees and male USMS employees in the absence of an emergency, was unreasonable. . . . Accordingly, the Court concludes that plaintiff has alleged a violation of clearly established Fourth Amendment rights and, therefore, that the USMS defendants are not entitled to have those claims dismissed on the ground of qualified immunity. . . . Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because plaintiff's due process right not to be held in the alleged conditions of confinement is not clearly established. Specifically, defendants rely on the absence of any cases specifically holding that a female transgender detainee has the right not to be held with male detainees or otherwise treated as if she were male. . . .Defendants' arguments again miss the significance of the fact that plaintiff is legally a female and that defendants are alleged to have known that. Thus, the absence of transgender cases is not itself dispositive. . . . [A]s with the Fourth Amendment claim, plaintiff's 'clearly established' rights include the same rights as any other female detainee. Accordingly, the cases involving the sexual harassment of female prisoners are not, as defendants suggest, 'irrelevant.' And those cases establish that a female detainee has the right not to be sexually harassed, verbally or physically, by other detainees or guards. . . . Considering the allegations in the complaint, applicable MPD policies, and existing caselaw, the Court concludes that a reasonable officer would know that treating a female detainee as plaintiff was treated (i.e. holding her with male detainees and otherwise treating her as if she were male) exposed her to a substantial risk of serious harm. . . and, therefore, would know that those actions violated her constitutional rights.")

Brown v. Short, 729 F.Supp.2d 125, 141 (D.D.C. 2010) ("[A]t the time of the search at issue, the law was clearly established that strip searches of arrestees charged with minor offenses would, absent individualized suspicion, be held unreasonable under Bell even where the arrestee was to be intermingled with the general prison population and especially where the official conducting the search did not take reasonable efforts to protect the privacy of the party being searched. Thus, it should have been "clear to a reasonable [official]" that a partial strip search of Ms. Brown, a detainee charged only with civil contempt, without individualized suspicion, and without regard to her privacy, would be considered unreasonable under Bell.").

In re Iraq and Afghanistan Detainees Litigation, 479 F.Supp.2d 85, 108 -109 (D.D.C.,2007) ("Determining whether the defendants' acts violated clearly established constitutional rights need not require extended explication in this case because, as discussed at some length above, Supreme Court precedent at the time the plaintiffs were injured established that the Fifth Amendment did not apply to nonresident aliens outside the sovereign territory of the United States. . . . The plaintiffs seek to avoid this result by recasting the issue as whether it was clearly established that torture was unlawful, not whether it was clearly established that the constitutional right existed. . . But the cases make clear that what must be 'clearly established' is the constitutional right. . . . At the time the defendants committed the alleged violations, no constitutional right could be invoked by the plaintiffs; as a result, no reasonable official could have understood that what he was doing violated the Fifth Amendment as it applied to them, regardless of whether the defendants' conduct otherwise was illegal under some other source of law. Similarly, it also was not clearly established that the Eighth Amendment applied to nonresident aliens who were detained by the military but never convicted of a crime.").

Freeman v. Fallin, 310 F.Supp.2d 11, 15, 16 (D.D.C. 2004) ("In their motion, the defendants contend that '[i]t was not clearly established during 1999-2000[ ] that manipulation of random drug testing procedures to gather evidence of alleged drug use in criminal proceedings was a Fourth Amendment violation.' . . . Specifically, the defendants argue that there is no case law addressing whether manipulation of random drug testing procedures violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . The court concludes that there is no intervening change of law, new evidence, or need to correct a clear error or prevent manifest injustice that would warrant granting the defendants' motion. . . At the time of the defendants' alleged actions in 1999-2000, there was no question that agencies could subject federal employees engaged in certain safety-sensitive tasks to suspicionless drug testing under the 'special needs' doctrine. . . At the same time, the Supreme Court had made clear through a string of decisions issued in 1989, 1995, and 1997 that special-needs testing could not be undertaken for purposes of criminal prosecution. . . . The defendants argue, however, that this case law does not define the constitutional right at the 'appropriate level of specificity.' . . . Accepting the plaintiffs' allegations as true, the court concludes that here, the state of the law certainly would have given the defendants fair warning that their actions were unconstitutional. . . In its string of decisions, the Court–whose binding precedent clearly 'establishes' the law–made clear that the special-needs doctrine permits suspicionless drug testing of certain employees by agencies as long as the testing is performed for reasons unrelated to law enforcement.").

Polk v. District of Columbia, 121 F. Supp.2d 56, 69, 71 (D.D.C. 2000) ("Although no reported case has addressed the precise conduct at issue here, Lanier indicates that the law nonetheless may be 'clearly established' if general statements of Fourth Amendment law gave fair and clear warning to Det. Valdes that he could not delegate his authority to detain a suspect. . . . In the instant case, there can be little doubt that the Constitution forbids police officers to share their authority to conduct searches and seizures with unauthorized civilians. . . . The court determines that it would not be unfair to hold Det. Valdes liable for allegedly deceiving the plaintiffs into believing his companion was an officer, and having perpetuated this fraud, allowing the civilian to detain one of the plaintiffs.").

United States v. Edelin, 76 F. Supp.2d 1, 4 (D.D.C. 1999) ("[E]ven if a court was to find 'perp walks' unconstitutional, the defendant would still have to show the law to have been clearly established at the time of his booking in order to overcome the government officials' qualified immunity. In Wilson, although the Supreme Court agreed with the Ayeni court that the practice of 'media ride-alongs' was unconstitutional, it abrogated the Ayeni court's holding that the government was liable for its actions. . . The Supreme Court found that the government officials were entitled to qualified immunity because the law regarding 'media ride-alongs' was not clearly established prior to the Supreme Court ruling. . . Given that the Supreme Court found the law pertaining to 'media ride-alongs' to be uncertain at the time of the defendant's booking in January of 1999, it stands to reason that the law regarding 'perp walks', as an extension of that law, was also not clearly established. Therefore, the government officials would most likely be entitled to qualified immunity for their actions with regard to the defendant.").

French v. Merrill, 15 F.4th 116, 130-36 (1st Cir. 2021) ("While the officers' conduct does not involve the gathering of evidence from the curtilage of French's home with the help of a dog, it does plainly demonstrate that, if we consider their actions as a whole, they exceeded the scope of the implicit social license that authorized their presence on French's property. Despite obvious signs that the occupants of the home were aware of and did not want to receive visitors -- their refusal to answer the door upon Morse and Gray's initial knock and Gray's second knock, and their swift covering of windows and turning off lights in response to that second knock -- the police doubled down on their efforts to coax French out of the home. Any reasonable officer would have understood that their actions on the curtilage of French's property exceeded the limited scope of the customary social license to 'approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.'. . Indeed, Officer Morse revealed such an understanding when he observed that French was not likely to come to the door upon another attempt and that the officers should secure a warrant. Yet, the officers disregarded Morse's advice and reentered the curtilage without a warrant. . . .We are not concerned only with the number of officers present or the hour, location, or length of the attempted knock and talks. Instead, we are focused on the legal principle at the core of Jardines -- the scope of the implied license to enter the curtilage -- and the application of that principle to the conduct of the officers in totality. Here, as in Jardines, the officers had their feet 'firmly planted on the constitutionally protected extension of [the] home' and their activity was therefore limited to that which was implicitly authorized (absent explicit consent) by the homeowner. . . . Far from engaging only in conduct that a homeowner might reasonably expect from a private citizen on their property -- that is, again, approaching the door, knocking promptly, and leaving if not greeted by an occupant -- the officers reentered the property four times and took aggressive actions until French came to the door so that the officers could pursue their criminal investigation. By so doing, the officers engaged in precisely the kind of warrantless and unlicensed physical intrusion on the property of another that Jardines clearly established as a Fourth Amendment violation. Hence, the officers violated clearly established law and are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . There are two major problems with the dissent. It goes to great lengths to make an exigent circumstances argument that the appellees never make. It also fails to address the principle at the heart of Jardines: the scope of the knock and talk exception to the warrant requirement is controlled by the implied license to enter the curtilage. . . .The dissent claims that Jardines cannot have clearly established the unlawfulness of the officers' conduct in this case because the Court's reasoning in Jardines was dependent upon the fact that the officers entered the property with a drug-sniffing dog 'to gather information on the curtilage, not to speak with a resident.' According to the dissent, because the officers in this case entered the property with an intent to speak to French and not to engage in a search with a drug-sniffing dog, Jardines is inapposite. . . . [T]he constitutional violation in Jardines was the officers' 'physical[ ] ent[rance] and occup[ation]' on the curtilage of Jardines' home 'to engage in conduct not explicitly or implicitly permitted by the homeowner.'. . Because there was no explicit permission by Jardines, the Court reasoned that the officers' permission to enter the property was authorized by an implicit social license -- informed by 'the habits of the country' -- to enter the property of another and seek to speak with an occupant. . . That license, the Court explained, has both a physical and a purpose-based limitation. . . . The Court concluded that the officers abided by the terms of the physical scope of the license -- their activities on the property were limited to areas that a member of the public might be expected to visit. However, the officers in Jardines exceeded the limited purpose authorized by the license through their conduct. They did so by seeking evidence of drugs with the help of a trained, drug-sniffing dog. That the precise manner in which the officers in this case exceeded the scope of the implied license differs from that in Jardines is inconsequential. The officers in this case, like the officers in Jardines, in the absence of any license to do so, 'physically intrud[ed]' on a suspect's property repeatedly and engaged in intrusive conduct that no reasonable visitor could have understood as impliedly authorized by a resident. . . . [W]e conclude that, viewing the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable to French, Officers Morse and Gray violated French's Fourth Amendment rights by exceeding the lawful bounds of a warrantless 'knock and talk.' We further conclude that the unlawfulness of the officers' conduct was clearly established at the time by the principles of law set forth in Florida v. Jardines.") French v. Merrill, 15 F.4th 116, 136-37, 142-48 (1st Cir. 2021) (Lynch, J., dissenting in part) ("I join the majority opinion as to the affirmance of summary judgment arising from claims about the February arrest of Christopher French. I strongly dissent from the reversal of the grant of qualified immunity to Officers Gray and Morse as to the September 14 incident. In my view, the majority is wrong that Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1 (2013), which concerned officers' entry onto private property for the purpose of using a drug-sniffing dog on the curtilage of the house, clearly established the purported illegality of the officers' conduct in knocking at French's home on September 14, 2016. The doctrine of qualified immunity has sometimes been abused, but the majority's denial of qualified immunity here is flatly contrary to Supreme Court and circuit law and creates a circuit split. Moreover, this unfortunate ruling will disincentivize police from taking action after persons of any gender have credibly alleged that they have been threatened and are frightened by former romantic partners. . . .French and the majority argue that Jardines itself clearly established that the officers' conduct on September 14, 2016, violated French's constitutional rights. I disagree for several reasons. First, the holding of Jardines is not applicable here because the facts are entirely distinct, and Jardines' reasoning relied on facts not present here. Second, as made clear by Supreme Court and circuit court decisions published after Jardines, Jardines' general discussion of the knock and talk exception was not adequately specific to clearly establish the purported illegality of the officers' conduct here. Finally, the majority seems to posit that the officers' actions somehow forced French to come to the door. . . . In the instant case, it is undisputed that the officers were knocking on the door to try to speak with French, not to search the property, as in Jardines. Jardines is not about the limitations, if any, on the duration or location of a knock and talk license to contact the resident of a home, and thus could not clearly establish the purported illegality of the officers' conduct. . . Jardines also did not concern a situation in which the officers had to act quickly to ensure the safety of a victim or prevent the destruction of evidence. . . Nor did Jardines discuss how the analysis might change when officers are investigating a crime for which state law authorizes a warrantless arrest. . . .Subsequent decisions from the Supreme Court and from our sister circuits make clear that the purported illegality of the officers' actions -- including knocking at the window, knocking multiple times, and knocking late at night -- was not clearly established by Jardines' general rule. . . .The majority's entire approach to qualified immunity runs counter to both the Supreme Court's and this circuit's precedents. The 'clearly established' inquiry is not supposed to entail elucidating an abstract principle from a single case and asking how a reasonable officer would have applied that principle in a given situation. Rather, it requires asking whether the constitutionality of the official's behavior was placed 'beyond debate' by existing precedent. . . The inquiry requires 'specificity,' particularly in Fourth Amendment cases. . . The majority makes clear that it is not concerned with what it views as trivial details like 'the number of officers present or the hour, location, or length of the attempted knock and talks.' It should be. In ignoring the specifics of the case and the very real questions left open by Jardines to reach its decision, the majority defines clearly established law at the 'high level of generality' the Supreme Court has expressly foreclosed. . . The need for swift action also distinguishes this case from Jardines and undercuts the majority's argument that general principles of Jardines clearly established the purported illegality of the officers' conduct. . . .The majority's decision, in my view, disincentivizes police from acting on and taking seriously the complaints of persons of any gender who credibly seek law enforcement help when they have been threatened by former romantic partners. I cannot agree that Jardines was sufficiently analogous to place the legality of these officers' actions 'beyond debate.' In my view, under controlling Supreme Court precedent, the only correct result here is the affirmance of the grant of qualified immunity to these officers. The officers here acted reasonably in making repeated efforts to reach French where he was acting erratically and Nardone explained that the danger to her would increase as French was given more time to break into and read the contents of her phone. The officers knew French was awake despite the time, and it was a rational choice in a multi-tenant apartment for the officers to knock on French's bedroom window to try to speak to him. Nothing in Jardines or any other case clearly established that these actions violated the Fourth Amendment. I dissent.")

Merrill, 24 F.4th 93, 93-95 (1st Cir. 2022) (Lipez, J., joined by Thompson, Kayatta, and Barron, JJ., responding to dissents from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("Contrary to the depiction of the facts that our dissenting colleagues promote and rely upon, this case does not involve an imminent risk of physical harm to an intimate partner. As the majority opinion explains in detail, the woman who summoned the police was at her own home, at a different location, when the events at issue transpired. . . Hence, there is simply no equivalence between what occurred in this case and the facts of the two recent Supreme Court cases cited by the joint dissent, in which law enforcement officers were entitled to qualified immunity for 'actions taken while dealing with situations of intimate partner violence.' Dissent of JJ. Lynch and Howard (citing City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9 (2021) (per curiam); Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4 (2021) (per curiam)). We are mindful of the troubling relationship and threatening behavior that provides the backdrop for this case. But, in the proceedings below and on appeal, there was never a claim by the officers that they confronted circumstances requiring split-second decision-making. The depiction of an episode of imminent, physical, intimate partner violence has been and continues to be a construct of the joint dissent. Indeed, at one point, an officer proposed returning to the police station so that he could apply for a warrant. . . The officers chose not to take that step, and neither the defendants nor the record suggest that their choice was based on the risk of any harm that could occur in the interim. We do not disagree with our dissenting colleagues' observation that the doctrine of qualified immunity 'recognizes that it is difficult for officials to anticipate how relevant legal doctrines will apply in various situations absent specific guidance from courts.' But this case simply does not give rise to the questions concerning the knock-and-talk exception posited by our colleagues: 'whether knocking multiple times might be acceptable, whether knocking at a window instead of a door in a multi-tenant apartment is permissible, or how much time must pass between unsuccessful knock and talks before attempting again.' A reasonable officer might well be uncertain about the propriety of these or similar scenarios. Here, however, the officers engaged in conduct that blatantly transgressed the limited social license clearly delineated by Justice Scalia. Jardines thus leaves no uncertainty about the unlawfulness of their conduct. . . . It is important to recognize the competing interests at stake. To be sure, we must be mindful of the difficulties faced by police officers in performing their duties and the need to protect them from liability for judgments that are reasonable, even if mistaken. We fully agree with the joint dissent about the importance of freeing officers to make such judgments in the context of imminent threats of intimate partner violence when such circumstances are present. But we cannot forget the important constitutional protection that the warrant requirement affords to individuals in their homes -- the location that is 'first among equals' in the realm protected by the Fourth Amendment. . . The knock-and-talk exception is a carefully circumscribed, clearly articulated departure from the warrant requirement. Here, no reasonable officer could have mistakenly believed that the repeated, escalating intrusions at French's home were permitted by the knock-and-talk exception. In sum, the majority's decision adheres to the Supreme Court's precedent on both qualified immunity and the knock-and-talk exception to the warrant requirement. No further review is warranted.")

French v. Merrill, 24 F.4th 93, 95-98 (1st Cir. 2022) (Lynch, J., joined by Howard, C.J., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("We dissent from the denial of en banc review by our colleagues in the majority. The denial of further review by the full en banc court compounds the error of the panel majority opinion's refusal to adhere to binding precedent from the Supreme Court, this court, and other circuits. The panel majority opinion creates a departure from Supreme Court law, and thus this case is worthy of Supreme Court review. Fuller discussion of these issues can be found in Judge Lynch's dissent from the panel majority opinion. French v. Merrill, 15 F.4th 116, 136 (1st Cir. 2021) (Lynch, J., dissenting in part). The panel decision and the denial of en banc review frustrate the very purposes for which qualified immunity was created. Qualified immunity serves the important purpose of freeing government officials to act without fear of liability when they make reasonable decisions in the course of their duties. . . This doctrine recognizes that it is difficult for officials to anticipate how relevant legal doctrines will apply in various situations absent specific guidance from courts. . . While government officials must conform their conduct to the Constitution, the law of qualified immunity prohibits the imposition of penalties on them for their reasonable conduct, especially when there is no clear guidance from the courts as to the contours of the constitutional right at issue. Nothing in Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1 (2013) put the officers in this case on notice that their actions were in violation of any clearly established rule. . . . In Jardines, the Supreme Court held that police use of a drug-sniffing dog to inspect the curtilage of a person's home constitutes a search under the Fourth Amendment. . . The Court briefly discussed the knock and talk exception to the warrant requirement, noting that it is coextensive with the implied license for visitors 'typically' to 'approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.'. . This discussion of the 'typical[ ]' knock and talk does not set forth with any kind of specificity the parameters of a permissible knock and talk. It provides a framework for how to consider what might or might not be allowed under the knock and talk exception, but it provides no settled answer to questions such as whether knocking multiple times might be acceptable, whether knocking at a window instead of a door in a multi-tenant apartment is permissible, or how much time must pass between unsuccessful knock and talks before attempting again. Reasonable police officers (and judges) could read Jardines and disagree about the answers to these questions. The constitutionality of these questions is therefore hardly 'beyond debate,' as the Supreme Court has instructed that they must be. . .Further, the panel majority violates two other rules about qualified immunity: that the qualified immunity inquiry must be focused on the specific context of the case and that it must focus on what the officers knew at the time. . . . Not only did the officers in this case lack notice of the purported unconstitutionality of their knock and talk, but the context of the case and the information known to the officers render their actions more, not less, reasonable. . . . Within the last few months, the Supreme Court has twice reaffirmed the importance of the principle that clearly established law for qualified immunity purposes must be defined with specificity. See City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 11 (2021) (per curiam) ("We have repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality."); Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 8 (2021) (per curiam) ("[T]o show a violation of clearly established law, [the plaintiff] must identify a case that put [the defendant] on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful."). In both of these cases, the Supreme Court unanimously reversed denials of qualified immunity to law enforcement regarding actions taken while dealing with situations of intimate partner violence. . . These recent Supreme Court decisions send an unmistakable signal that the proper course of action in this case would have been to affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity. For many years, police departments gave threats of this sort a low priority or ignored them altogether. . . . Under the majority's decision, these police officers, who should be commended for taking the victim's concerns seriously and acting promptly, are now being penalized for a reasonable decision made in the course of the investigation. This decision will disincentivize police from taking decisive action in such cases for fear of liability -- precisely what qualified immunity was created to avoid. . . .For the foregoing reasons, we dissent and urge further review.")

French v. Merrill, 24 F.4th 93, 98 (1st Cir. 2022) (Gelpi, J., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("I respectfully dissent from the denial of en banc review by the Court. This case raises a question of exceptional importance regarding the Fourth Amendment and the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . Ultimately, the Court's opinion will impact how police officers in all five First Circuit jurisdictions respond to critical and time-sensitive situations such as that involving the female victim and her former partner here. As such, I believe this case is suited for review by the full Court.")

Lachance v. Town of Charlton, 990 F.3d 14, 20-28 (1st Cir. 2021) ("In determining whether the unlawfulness of officers' conduct was clearly established, 'the salient question ... is whether the state of the law [at the time of the officers' conduct] gave [them] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [the plaintiff] was unconstitutional.'. . The answer to that question is 'yes' when: (1) the law was 'clear enough that every reasonable official would [have] interpret[ed] it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply'; and (2) '[t]he rule's contours [were] so well defined that it [would have been] clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . The rule establishing the conduct's illegality must be 'dictated by [either] "controlling authority" or "a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority,"' the latter of which 'does not require the express agreement of every circuit' but rather some sister circuit law can suffice. . . In the Fourth Amendment context, the '[s]pecificity' of the rule set forth in such precedent 'is especially important,' because it can be 'difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine,' such as excessive force, 'will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'. . Of course, prior cases with materially similar facts are not necessary to clearly establish conduct's illegality; a 'general constitutional rule' located in prior authority can suffice to defeat qualified immunity even in 'novel factual circumstances.'. . But that is true only in an 'obvious case,'. . . where 'any reasonable officer should have realized that [the conduct at issue] offended the Constitution[.]'. . As such, 'relevant case law,' where 'an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment,' is 'usually necessary' to overcome officers' qualified immunity. . . . The district court . . . found that 'it was clearly established that [Lachance] had a constitutional right to be free from an officer kneeling on his back after he had been restrained,' but that there were fact issues that bore on whether a reasonable officer would have understood that his conduct violated that right, namely whether an officer kneeled on Lachance's back at all and, if so, for how long. However, the court found that it was not clearly established that the push, even assuming it was carried out with a lot of force, violated the Constitution under the circumstances. The court noted that Lachance failed to point to any controlling or persuasive case law to show that his right to be free from such force was clearly established, although the court identified one out-of-circuit case that might support his position. .

. . In fact, the court added, in-circuit case law 'suggests that forcefully pushing a resistant plaintiff to the ground is not excessive[.]' There may be some tension in our cases about how to analyze multiple-force scenarios. [discussing Jennings and Alexis] We have found no circuit that is completely averse to applying a segmented approach where it makes sense. [collecting circuit cases using segmented approach] It seems to us that the segmented approach is also consistent with Supreme Court precedent. In Graham, the Court made clear that the reasonableness of a use of force is to be determined 'at the moment' that the force was applied. . . It explicated that the reasonableness inquiry depends on 'the facts and circumstances confronting' the officer in 'a particular situation,' which facts and circumstances are 'often ... tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.'. .. Put differently, '[e]xcessive force claims ... are evaluated for objective reasonableness based upon the information the officers had when the conduct occurred.'. . Such language seems to favor a segmented approach, at least when circumstances relevant to the reasonableness inquiry changed between one use of force and another. . . After all, if the reasonableness of an officer's use of force depends on the information available to that officer under a particular set of circumstances, which appear to have meaningfully changed between one use of force and another, then it only makes sense to consider those uses separately. . . Here, there was clearly a change in circumstances between the push and the kneel that was relevant to the reasonableness inquiry. Before the push, Lachance was still standing and actively attempting to make his way outside, and he had been resisting the officers' efforts to stop him by issuing instructions, grabbing his arms, and redirecting him. After the push, Lachance was on the floor with visible bruising on his back and, although he was flailing his arms and legs, may have been attempting simply to stand up (as opposed to going outside) when an officer kneeled on his back to keep him down. On these facts, it made sense for the district court to segment its analysis. . . .Proceeding to analyze the push separately from the kneel, we conclude that the push was not a clearly established violation of Lachance's right to be free of unreasonable seizures. Lachance argues that the Graham factors are lopsided in his favor and that this is sufficient to show that his right was clearly established. But it is well-established that the Graham factors, while instructive, are not exhaustive of the totality of the circumstances that must be considered in each excessive force case. . . Moreover, the Graham test is geared toward criminal suspects as opposed to persons who are suspected only of experiencing a medical emergency for which they require aid. See Estate of Hill by Hill v. Miracle, 853 F.3d 306, 313 (6th Cir. 2017). . . .Lachance cites a number of purportedly factually analogous cases, but none are materially similar enough to have provided reasonable officers under the circumstances with fair warning that they would violate Lachance's rights by pushing him in the manner that the defendant officers did. He cites as controlling authority our decision in Ciolino, . . . but that decision could not have clearly established his right as of the date of the push in January 2014. . . The same is true of most of the decisions that Lachance relies on. . . . Here, Lachance posed a risk of serious physical harm to himself were he permitted to stumble outside to a steep, icy stairway. Moreover, whereas in those cases the plaintiffs at no point resisted the officers, here Lachance clearly did by continuing toward the door even after they grabbed his arms and repeatedly told him to stop walking. . . Therefore, Lachance has failed to meet his burden of showing that the defendants violated his clearly established rights. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the defendants as to the push.")

Irish v. Fowler (Irish II), 979 F.3d 65, 76-80 (1st Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 74 (2021) ("A rule is clearly established either when it is 'dictated by "controlling authority" or "a robust 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'". . A 'robust consensus' does not require the express agreement of every circuit. Rather, sister circuit law is sufficient to clearly establish a proposition of law when it would provide notice to every reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful. . . '[T]he salient question ... is whether the state of the law [at the time of the defendants' conduct] gave [them] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [the plaintiffs] was unconstitutional.' [citing cases, including Hope v. Pelzer and Taylor v. Riojas] The Supreme Court has established that cases involving materially similar facts are not necessary to a finding that the law was clearly established. . . The circuits have followed that rule. . . A defendant's adherence to proper police procedure bears on all prongs of the qualified immunity analysis. . . When an officer violates the Constitution, state law, of course, provides no refuge. A lack of compliance with state law or procedure does not, in and of itself, establish a constitutional violation, but when an officer disregards police procedure, it bolsters the plaintiff's argument both that an officer's conduct 'shocks the conscience' and that 'a reasonable officer in [the officer's] circumstances would have believed that his conduct violated the Constitution.'. . The defendants' main argument is that because this circuit to date has not recognized the state-created danger doctrine, the law was not clearly established. That is simply incorrect. The Supreme Court has stated that clearly established law can be dictated by controlling authority or a robust consensus of persuasive authority. . . The widespread acceptance of the state-created danger theory, described above, was sufficient to clearly establish that a state official may incur a duty to protect a plaintiff where the official creates or exacerbates a danger to the plaintiff. The defendants' reliance on Soto v. Flores, 103 F.3d 1056 (1st Cir. 1997), is also misplaced. In Soto, this court concluded that the state-created danger doctrine was not clearly established. . . The broad acceptance of the doctrine 'militate[d] in favor of finding that there [was] clearly established law in this area,' but two circumstances prevented the court from holding that the law was clearly established. . . First, the court noted that at the time of the defendants' conduct in Soto, the First Circuit had never 'discuss[ed] the contours of [the state-created danger] doctrine.'. . Second, the court relied on the fact that while the Third Circuit had then recently 'comprehensively described' the state-created danger theory, the history of the doctrine was 'uneven,' and that only 'more recent judicial opinions ... ha[d] begun to clarify the contours' of the doctrine. . . All of this had changed by the time Detective Perkins left the voicemail for Anthony Lord. By July 2015, this court had discussed the state-created danger doctrine at least a dozen times, even if it had never found it applicable to the facts of a specific case. And our sister circuits' law developed as well in the decades since Soto. The officers argue that because the Fifth and Eleventh Circuits have rejected the state-created danger doctrine, . . .the doctrine cannot be clearly established. Again, as a proposition of law this is wrong. A circuit split does not foreclose a holding that the law was clearly established, as long as the defendants could not reasonably believe that we would follow the minority approach. . . After Rivera, the defendants could not reasonably have believed that we would flatly refuse to apply the state-created danger doctrine to an appropriate set of facts. Rivera was a critical warning bell that officers could be held liable under the state-created danger doctrine when their affirmative acts enhanced a danger to a witness. This court did not simply dismiss Rivera's claim without analysis, as would have been appropriate if the state-created danger doctrine could never apply to any set of facts in this circuit. Instead, Rivera outlined the elements of the state-created danger doctrine and performed a nuanced analysis of why each particular action of the defendants was not the type of affirmative act covered by the doctrine. . . Rivera warned that if an officer performed a non-essential affirmative act which enhanced a danger, a sufficient causal connection existed between that act and the plaintiff's harm, and the officer's actions shocked the conscience, the officer could be held liable for placing a witness or victim in harm's way during an investigation. Defendants also argue that they are immune from suit because no factually similar cases alerted them that their conduct was impermissible. This too is incorrect. As we have just said, a general proposition of law may clearly establish the violative nature of a defendant's actions, especially when the violation is egregious. . . Not only is the argument wrong, but its premise is wrong; there are factually similar earlier cases. Both were decided after Soto. . . . The plaintiffs allege that the defendants, even in the face of Irish's expressed fear that Lord would react violently, contacted him in a manner that a reasonable jury could find notified him that Irish had reported him to the police. The plaintiffs also allege that the defendants failed to convey her request for protection to their superiors for several hours and further failed to inform her in a timely fashion that the request had been denied. A jury could also conclude that the defendants played a role in the decision to withdraw all resources from the area without telling the plaintiffs that they had done so, thereby allowing the plaintiffs to believe more protection was available than was actually true. Finally, the defendants' apparent utter disregard for police procedure could contribute to a jury's conclusion that the defendants conducted themselves in a manner that was deliberately indifferent to the danger they knowingly created, and that they thereby acted with the requisite mental state to fall within the ambit of the many cases holding that a violation of the Due Process Clause requires behavior that 'shocks the conscience.'. . Whether the jury will or should conclude as much is, of course, not a question for this court, but it was clearly established in July 2015 that such conduct on the part of law enforcement officers, if it occurred, could give rise to a lawsuit under § 1983.")

Roy v. Correct Care Solutions, LLC, 914 F.3d 52, 72-73 (1st Cir. 2019) ("Supervisors like Ross and Bouffard are liable under the Equal Protection Clause for a hostile work environment created by their subordinates in state government only if their 'link' to the unlawful harassment was one of '"supervisory encouragement, condonation, or acquiescence," or "gross negligence amounting to deliberate indifference."' Lipsett v. University of Puerto Rico, 864 F.2d 881, 902 (1st Cir.1988) (quoting Bohen v. City of East Chicago, 799 F.2d 1180, 1189 (7th Cir. 1986)). Two First Circuit cases apply this principle. In the single case finding supervisory liability under § 1983 for sexual harassment, the defendants knew of severe abuse but failed even to investigate. . . In the other case, which found no supervisor liability, the defendant, the harasser's supervisor, at first discouraged the plaintiff from filing a formal complaint but then actively encouraged her to do so. . . Ross and Bouffard's conduct falls somewhere between these guideposts. Complaints against Snow and Parrow were investigated and addressed while complaints about Turner, DeGuisto, and officers' retaliatory behavior were not. '[A]s is common where there is a lack of precedent, this is not a case in which a reasonable officer must have known that he was acting unconstitutionally.'. . Ross and Bouffard also receive qualified immunity from the First Amendment retaliation claim because reasonable officials could have believed that revoking Roy's security clearance would not violate the Constitution. To show a First Amendment violation, one thing Roy must demonstrate is that she was speaking as a private citizen on a matter of public concern. . . Complaints like Roy's made to supervisors and public officials about sexual harassment and safety at public agencies can be protected citizen speech on matters of public concern. . . But we cannot say that a reasonable official must have known that Roy's complaints were constitutionally protected. Significantly, Roy only complained internally. And, although the Supreme Court has established that form is never 'dispositive' of the public concern question, . . . it has sometimes seen a plaintiff's failure 'to inform the public' about her concerns as cutting against First Amendment protection[.] . . . Reasonable officials in Ross and Bouffard's positions, then, could have deemed Roy's complaints unprotected. As a result, even if Roy could ultimately make out a First Amendment violation, the defendants receive qualified immunity.") Escalera-Salgado v. United States, 911 F.3d 38, 40-42 (1st Cir. 2018) ("The district court's qualified immunity analysis relied upon our circuit's oft-repeated assumption 'that Puerto Rico tort law would not impose personal liability' in tort actions 'where the officers would be protected in Bivens claims by qualified immunity.'. . This assumption was never based on Puerto Rican authority expressly embracing the 'clearly established' inquiry employed in Bivens cases. Rather, the assumption was based on a 'parallel' between Puerto Rico's tort law and federal qualified immunity principles. . . . We need not decide in this case whether our repeated assumption concerning the availability of a qualified immunity defense in an FTCA action arising in Puerto Rico is correct. Escalera makes no argument that the district court erred by assuming the defense to be applicable. Instead, Escalera argues that the district court erred in concluding that the officers did not violate clearly established law. . . Turning our attention to that argument, we ask whether the officers' actions 'violate[d] clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . In assessing whether an official's conduct violated clearly established law, we typically reason by analogy, asking whether there is any prior case in which the use of force was deemed unlawful under circumstances reasonably similar to those present in the case at hand. . . . When a defendant invokes qualified immunity, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the defense is inapplicable. See Rivera-Corraliza v. Morales, 794 F.3d 208, 215 (1st Cir. 2015). Here, then, Escalera had the burden to identify 'controlling authority or a robust consensus of persuasive authority such that any reasonable official in the defendant's position would have known that the challenged conduct is illegal in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.'. . .Escalera failed to compare his shooting to the facts of a single case in which an officer's use of force was held to be constitutionally excessive. Nor is this a case in which the HSI officers' conduct was self-evidently unlawful. The officers had ample reason to suspect danger: (1) They had been warned that Escalera was a gang leader and had guns in the apartment; (2) No one answered the door when beckoned; (3) Escalera did not comply with police commands to show his hands and to remain still; and (4) Escalera 'lifted his shirt, reached for his waistband, and moved for cover behind a bedroom wall.' Escalera's best point is that the officers did not actually see a weapon or the 'bulge' of an apparent weapon. But he cites no case law clearly establishing that actually seeing a weapon is the sine qua non of reasonableness in circumstances such as those presented here -- where the officers were forewarned that Escalera might well be armed and dangerous, and where Escalera's behavior would lead almost anyone to believe he was reaching for a weapon. The district court therefore did not err in dismissing Escalera's claim on the clearly-established step of qualified immunity analysis.")

Begin v. Drouin, 908 F.3d 829, 835-36 (1st Cir. 2018) ("In determining whether an objectively reasonable police officer would have thought it lawful to shoot Begin, a crucial consideration is the exact number and location of the Riverview employees relative to Begin at the moment Drouin fired. . . Neither party points us to testimony by Begin or the Riverview employees clearly locating themselves on a diagram of the room, nor even describing narratively with any precision exactly where they were at the time of the shooting. Drouin reports seeing only one person other than Begin in the waiting area as she reached the entrance, and that was the person who then proceeded to back away from Begin. The size of the room itself, we are not told. On appeal, Drouin simply asserts that the others were 'within striking distance of Begin,' but that is wishful gloss that claims no support in the district court's Rule 56 assessment of the undisputed facts. The district court did find that there was evidence the Riverview personnel were in 'close proximity' to both Drouin and Begin, but that no one was 'between' Drouin and Begin when Begin raised the knife, and that no one faced any immediate threat from Begin. Does this mean only that no one was in the direct line of fire? Or does it mean that no one was in the room between Begin and Drouin as she stood with gun drawn facing him standing stationary in front of his chair? Given the unchallengeable Rule 56 finding that a jury could find that Begin posed no immediate threat to anyone but himself, and given the ambiguous record concerning precisely where each person stood at the moment Drouin decided to fire, we have no choice but to assume that Begin could not have reached out and stabbed anyone first without advancing as many as twenty feet toward the barrel of Drouin's raised gun. This reading of the ambiguous record on interlocutory review provides an unwelcoming backdrop for Drouin's immunity defense. Indeed, nowhere in her sixty-one pages of briefing does Drouin claim that a reasonable officer would have fired were she twenty feet away from Begin with all of the Riverview employees aside or behind her, or otherwise similarly removed from Begin, and Begin offering no hint of an advance. Rather, Drouin predicates most of her argument upon her preferred, but presently unacceptable, spin on the record as locating 'three people ... within striking distance of Begin.' Our review of our own case law suggests why Drouin never argues that she can prevail even if no one was closer to Begin than she was. In our 2017 decision in McKenney, we considered the state of the law as it was clearly established as of April 2014, approximately nine months before the events at the heart of this case transpired. . .We determined that 'well-settled precedents' addressed 'the lawfulness of using deadly force against an individual who was suicidal, armed, slow in gait, some distance away from the officer, and had received no commands or warnings for several minutes.'. . . Of course no two cases are identical. But a case need not be identical to clearly establish a sufficiently specific benchmark against which one may conclude that the law also rejects the use of deadly force in circumstances posing less of an immediate threat.

. . We must assume on the record in this case that Drouin knew that Begin was intent on harming himself, that he threatened no one else by word or movement, and that he had not received any warning or order from Drouin. While Begin was closer to Drouin (twenty feet) than McKenney was to the officer who shot him (sixty-nine feet), Begin had a knife while McKenney had a gun. We think that an objectively reasonable officer would regard a knife at twenty feet as posing no greater threat to an armed police officer than does a gun at sixty-nine feet. Nor do the facts here otherwise render Begin more threatening than McKenney. So, given that the law at the time the officer in McKenney fired clearly established that that shooting was unlawful on the plaintiff's version of the facts, then the facts here -- as we must assume them to be -- also support such a finding.") Hill v. Walsh, 884 F.3d 16, 19-23 (1st Cir. 2018) ("Because the law on the emergency aid exception to the warrant requirement was not clearly established at the time of the incident, we uphold the district court's entry of judgment based on qualified immunity. We also take this opportunity to clarify our circuit's emergency aid doctrine: officers seeking to justify their warrantless entry need only demonstrate '"an objectively reasonable basis for believing" that "a person within [the house] is in need of immediate aid."'. . . They do not need to establish that their belief approximated probable cause that such an emergency existed. We thus modify our previous pronouncements in United States v. Martins, 413 F.3d 139 (1st Cir. 2005), and its progeny. . . . The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the ground that they did not violate the Fourth Amendment. We affirm on the basis that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity and no claim is stated against the City. . . .Here, the officers allege that they entered 3 Eldridge Street because (1) they received a section 35 warrant of apprehension for Matthew, which was issued by a judge who determined that 'there [were] reasonable grounds' to believe Matthew would not appear for his civil commitment hearing, and, importantly, that 'any further delay in the proceedings would present an immediate danger to [his] physical well-being,' Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 123, § 35; (2) the warrant stated '3 Eldridge Street,' in its subject line; (3) Officers Henault and Enos thought that they saw a person inside 3 Eldridge Street, whom they believed -- but could not confirm without entry -- was Matthew; and (4) a door to the home was unlocked, and the officers assumed the door would have been secured if the house was unoccupied. There is no clearly established law on point. The Supreme Court has never addressed whether a section 35 warrant -- or any warrant to compel attendance at a civil commitment hearing, for that matter -- is sufficient to justify the police's warrantless entry into the home pursuant to the emergency aid exception. We have also never had the occasion to consider section 35 warrants in this context. . . The district court also aptly pointed to a second wrinkle: this court's language and the test adopted by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts disagree as to the government's burden of proof under the emergency aid exception. . . We take this opportunity to clarify our circuit law. In light of the Supreme Court's most recent decision on the emergency aid exception, Michigan v. Fisher, we hold that the government need not show probable cause, only 'an objectively reasonable basis' for believing that a person inside the home is need of immediate aid . . . in order to effectuate a warrantless entry. This basis need not 'approximate probable cause.'. . .We offer this clarification to bring our case law in line with Supreme Court precedent. The Court's choice of language is instructive. It used 'objectively reasonable basis' for the officers' belief; it did not use the familiar tests of 'reasonable suspicion' or 'probable cause.' At least two of our sister circuits have also so concluded. See United States v. Toussaint, 838 F.3d 503, 508-09 (5th Cir. 2016) (adopting the "objectively reasonable basis" standard); Schreiber v. Moe, 596 F.3d 323, 330 (6th Cir. 2010) (same). . . .The Hills' only rejoinder is that regardless of the contours of the emergency aid exception, it was not 'objectively reasonable' for the officers to believe that Matthew was inside 3 Eldridge Street. They argue that the face of the section 35 warrant clearly indicated that Matthew was 'CURRENTLY AT MORTON HOSPITAL,' a fact the officers would have 'reasonably known' or 'discover [ed],'. . . had any of them read the warrant carefully, or had Officer Henault reviewed the police blotter, or had Officers Marques or Lavoie verified Matthew's location when radioed. But hindsight is twenty-twenty. The officers' actions do not establish that the decision to enter the home was not objectively reasonable at that time. Given Matthew's history of overdosing and resisting the police, the subject line of the warrant (3 Eldridge Street), and the appearance of a person inside the home, a reasonable officer could have reasonably concluded that her entry was lawful pursuant to the emergency aid exception. We cannot say no reasonable officer would have thought the entry constitutional. And where there is reasonable debate about the constitutionality of the officers' actions, there is qualified immunity.") Perry v. Spencer, 751 F.App'x 7 (2018), rehearing en banc granted and opinion withdrawn, 21 F.4th 207 (2022) ("Perry claims that defendants violated his right to procedural due process by confining him in the SMU without adequate justification, opportunity to be heard, meaningful periodic review, or avenue for appealing his placement. He contends that the stated reasons for his placement in the SMU were used as a pretext for indefinite confinement in restrictive segregation, and that the periodic reviews by defendants were perfunctory. To prevail on this claim, Perry must demonstrate (1) that defendants deprived him of a cognizable liberty interest, (2) without constitutionally sufficient process. . . Inmates do not have a protected liberty interest in avoiding restrictive conditions of confinement unless those conditions ' "impose[ ] atypical and significant hardship on the inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life."'. . . As the Court recognized in Wilkinson, however, 'the Courts of Appeals have not reached consistent conclusions for identifying the baseline from which to measure what is atypical and significant in any particular prison system.'. . The Wilkinson Court found it unnecessary to define 'atypical and significant hardship' because it found that the conditions in that case met that standard 'under any plausible baseline.'. . .In 2012, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court considered whether ten months in the SMU at SBCC on awaiting action status satisfied the 'atypical and significant hardship' standard. LaChance v. Commissioner of Correction, 463 Mass. 767, 776-77 (2012). Noting that the restrictive conditions in the SMU were substantially similar to those described in Wilkinson, and far more restrictive than the conditions in the general population unit, the SJC concluded that the ten-month period of confinement was sufficient to satisfy the standard and implicate a protected liberty interest subject to due process protections, and further held that the interest attaches after ninety days. . . However, the Court acknowledged that it was announcing a new rule, and that up to that point, no federal or state court decision had clearly articulated the point at which a liberty interest in avoiding segregated confinement arose. . .Noting that Perry was released from the SMU just after LaChance was decided, the district court here reached the same conclusion as the SJC, and found that defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because it would not have been obvious to prison officials in 2010 whether or at what point Perry's confinement in the SMU on awaiting action status became 'atypical and significant.' We agree. While the restrictive conditions in the SMU were substantially similar to those described in Wilkinson, other circumstances were arguably distinguishable and, while a number of courts had, prior to 2010, held that periods of solitary confinement shorter than Perry's were sufficient to give rise to a liberty interest, . . . other courts had found comparable periods insufficient. . . Given the varying approaches to measuring atypicality and the absence of any bright-line rule or consensus as to what combination of conditions and duration of confinement in administrative segregation was sufficient to implicate a liberty interest and trigger due process, or at what point that interest arose, the contours of the liberty interest were not sufficiently defined as to place the constitutional question 'beyond debate[.]'. . Further, even assuming that defendants should have known that due-process requirements attached to Perry's placement in the SMU at some point during his extended period of confinement, the level of process due in the circumstances was not clearly established. In Wilkinson, the Supreme Court endorsed 'informal, nonadversary procedures' consistent with those set forth in Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebraska Penal & Corr. Complex, 442 U.S. 1 (1979), and Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460 (1983), where the liberty interest in avoiding indefinite placement in a supermax prison was at stake. . . . Perry asserts that the periodic reviews were perfunctory, noting that he received the same boilerplate notice at every review, and suggests that they were pretextual, as he was never interviewed in connection with any investigation into his STG status, was not advised of its progress or outcome, and was not told when or why his status shifted from awaiting action pending investigation to awaiting action pending out-of-state placement. In LaChance, the SJC concluded that these procedures were insufficient to provide meaningful review and safeguard the inmate's interest in avoiding arbitrary confinement in severe conditions, and held that segregated confinement on awaiting action status for longer than 90 days required notice of the basis for the placement, a hearing at which the inmate could contest the asserted rationale for the placement, and a post-hearing written notice explaining the reviewing authority's decision. . . But the SJC acknowledged that it was announcing these requirements for the first time, and Perry was released into the general population shortly after that decision issued. Perry suggests that, even if defendants could not have been expected to anticipate the precise requirements outlined in LaChance, it was clearly established after Wilkinson that the 'informal, adversary procedures' required where an inmate's interest in avoiding atypical and significant hardship was at stake had to include some sort of meaningful periodic review. But Wilkinson did not set any standards for such review in this context. . . . In the absence of any authority more specifically defining the review requirements in these circumstances, Perry cannot show that no official could reasonably have believed the review was adequate. . . . In sum, at the time Perry was confined in the SMU on awaiting action status, it was not clearly established whether or at what point a protected liberty interest arose, and the procedural protections required in that circumstance had been defined only at a high level of generality. Defendants were therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

McKenney v. Mangino, 873 F.3d 75, 81-83 (1st Cir. 2017) ("[D]efendants who invoke our limited power of interlocutory review to redress denials of qualified immunity must be prepared to accept the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and 'develop the argument that, even drawing all the inferences as the district court concluded a jury permissibly could, they are entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'. . In other words, an appellant must explain why he is entitled to qualified immunity even if one assumes that the district court properly analyzed the facts. . . .Here, the defendant concentrates on the second step of the qualified immunity paradigm and faults the district court for failing to identify a sufficiently similar case that would have served to place him on notice that his use of deadly force violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law. . . In his view, the contours of the relevant Fourth Amendment law were so blurred at the time that he shot McKenney that he is deserving of qualified immunity. We have jurisdiction to consider this purely legal asseveration. . . Jurisdiction notwithstanding, this argument lacks force. Although the district court frankly acknowledged that it could not find '[a] case presenting a nearly identical alignment of facts,'. . . such an exacting degree of precision is not required to thwart a qualified immunity defense. To be sure, 'the clearly established law' employed in a qualified immunity analysis 'must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . This instruction fits hand in glove with the Supreme Court's warning that, when dealing with qualified immunity, we should not over-rely on precedents that are 'cast at a high level of generality.'. . . Even so, there need not be 'a case directly on point' to satisfy the second step of the qualified immunity paradigm. . . The test is whether existing case law has 'placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . In some cases, 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . What counts is whether precedents existing at the time of the incident 'establish the applicable legal rule with sufficient clarity and specificity to put the official on notice that his contemplated course of conduct will violate that rule.'. .The Court's landmark decisions in Graham and Garner, which articulate generalized standards for excessive force liability under the Fourth Amendment, 'do not by themselves create clearly established law outside an obvious case.'. . But taking the facts and the reasonable inferences therefrom in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the threat presented lacked immediacy and alternatives short of lethal force remained open. Seen in that light, this was a case in which the feasibility of a more measured approach was apparent. Moreover, the district court did precisely what the Supreme Court has instructed courts to do: it focused on 'the specific context of the case.'. . With that context in mind, it relied on well-settled precedents addressing the lawfulness of using deadly force against an individual who was suicidal, armed, slow in gait, some distance away from the officer, and had received no commands or warnings for several minutes. . . We conclude, without serious question, that the precedents identified by the district court and those discussed supra gave the defendant fair warning that, if the facts were as the plaintiff claimed them to be, his use of deadly force against McKenney offended clearly established Fourth Amendment law—and an objectively reasonable officer would have realized as much. Therefore, the district court properly concluded that the absence of a precedent on all fours was not dispositive.")

Morse v. Cloutier, 869 F.3d 16, 27-30 (1st Cir. 2017) ("Given the two determinations we have thus far reached — that the district court's exigent circumstances assessment is unreviewable at this juncture and that Morse (unlike the suspect in Santana) was not in a public place at the critical time — we hold that the facts, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, make out a violation of a constitutional right. . . Accordingly, we proceed to the next step of the qualified immunity paradigm and consider whether the applicable law was so clearly established that no reasonable officer would have entered the plaintiffs' home without a warrant. . . .Payton and its progeny clarify a matter of Fourth Amendment law that Joyce, which relied on the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity paradigm, left unaddressed: namely, the doorway arrest exception recognized in Santana does not apply in a case in which a door was never opened, the person behind the door (screen door though it was) was first observed by law enforcement while he was behind that door, and no exigent circumstances existed. Of greater relevance here, this steadily growing stockpile of precedent makes pellucid that Payton, by 2009, constituted both a firm line and a bright line. Put simply, it constituted clearly established law. That clearly established law was sufficient to give reasonable police officers fair and clear warning that using force to enter the plaintiffs' home to effectuate Morse's arrest — without either a warrant or a reasonable basis for believing that exigent circumstances existed — would violate his Fourth Amendment rights. The fact that the Supreme Court has not yet considered the precise factual scenario that the defendants faced does not demand a different conclusion. After all, the Court has recognized that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning.'. . The Court added that 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . This is such a case. In all events, this case differs in material respects from Joyce. At the very least, those distinctions should have signaled to reasonable officers that their conduct did not fall within the same zone of uncertainty identified in Joyce. . . .The short of it is that the situation that existed when Morse closed the interior door to his home was such that a reasonable police officer, in the absence of exigent circumstances, should have realized that forcibly breaking into the house without any sort of warrant would offend Morse's Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure inside his own home. Merely because arrests near doorways may present close calls in some cases does not mean that they present close calls in all cases. Here, the defendants invite us, in effect, to cheapen the currency of Payton and its progeny and to award them qualified immunity. In the circumstances of this case, honoring their request would require us to 'disregard the overriding respect for the sanctity of the home that has been embedded in our traditions since the origins of the Republic.'. . We thus decline the defendants' invitation. Morse was subjected to a warrantless arrest inside his home, and we agree with the district court that, on this scumbled record, the officers involved in that arrest are not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage.")

López-Erquicia v. Weyne-Roig, 846 F.3d 480, 484-87 (1st Cir. 2017) ("The preferred approach is to decide the merits question first, reaching the reasonableness question only if the merits question is resolved against the defendant. . . In this case, though, we face an unusual twist: in her answer to the complaint, Weyne admitted that party affiliation was not an appropriate requirement for López's position. Hence, the district court deemed the merits question 'uncontested.' And on appeal, while protesting that she could not have conceded a point of law, Weyne offers no developed argument for why that is so. Like the district court, then, we also treat the merits question as 'uncontested.' This concession nevertheless does little to narrow the scope of our inquiry. To answer the reasonableness question-whether a reasonable official at the time could have understood López's job to be unprotected--we pretty much have to run through the entire merits analysis anyhow. We do so not to answer the uncontested merits question, but rather to see how close a question it is. Furthermore, the test we apply in assessing the closeness of the question 'is objective, rather than subjective; we focus on what a reasonable [official] could have believed, not on allegations about what [the official] actually believed.'. . Though qualified immunity does not shield 'the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law,'. . . an official cannot 'fairly be said to "know" that the law forbade conduct not previously identified as unlawful[.]' . . . With this twist explained, we turn to examining López's job to see how a reasonable official could have viewed it. . . .We need not precisely locate López's AFSI Director position on the spectrum established by the foregoing precedent. Rather, we need determine only whether that precedent 'placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate,' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 741 (2011), i.e., whether it clearly established the position's constitutionally protected status. . . .To be sure, López's position was not classified as a trust position, and 'a legislature's classification system is ... entitled to some deference.'. . Nevertheless, our precedent makes clear that '[a]ctual functions of the job ... control' our analysis. . . Here, those actual functions preclude us from finding that a reasonable official, even one familiar with the law, . . . would have found it clear that López's position fell inside the First Amendment's protective ambit. That, in turn, means that Weyne is immune to a federal claim for damages under § 1983, even if the reorganization was targeted at López because of her political affiliation.")

Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64, 70-73 (1st Cir. 2016) ("The Supreme Court has historically reserved the question of whether the Fourth Amendment standard of objective reasonableness or a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process standard requiring a defendant to have a 'sufficiently culpable state of mind,' . . . applies to persons who have been arrested but who are not yet 'pretrial detainees' because they have not yet gone before a magistrate judge for a probable cause hearing. . . At the time of the district court's decision, other circuits were split over this question. [collecting cases]The First Circuit has not yet answered the question, although some district courts within the First Circuit have applied the majority rule. . . Since then, the Supreme Court has held that the appropriate standard for a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim is simply objective reasonableness. . . . Since Kingsley has extended the objective reasonableness standard for use of force from the arrest stage through the probable cause hearing, whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment standard applies presents less of a problem in cases like this one than before. In this case, the district court 'identif[ied] the specific constitutional right allegedly infringed by the challenged application of force,'. . . as the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable seizures. The parties do not challenge that holding, and we have no reason to do so as the alleged use of excessive force here occurred while Officers Pérez and Rivera were transporting Rojas to the police station and then to a jail cell. Given these facts, and given the authority favoring the application of the Fourth Amendment to similar factual scenarios, we apply the Fourth Amendment standard to Rojas's excessive force claim. . . . Since there is sufficient evidence to make out an excessive force claim, Pérez is not entitled to qualified immunity on the first ground. Nor is Officer Pérez entitled to qualified immunity on the 'clearly established' ground. The district court stated in a footnote that Defendants may be entitled to qualified immunity because it was unclear in 2007 which constitutional standard governed arrestees' excessive force claims in the First Circuit. We are not persuaded. The main difference between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment excessive force standards prior to Kingsley was whether, in retrospect, we inquire into an officer's subjective mindset. However, at their core, both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments are concerned with whether an officer's actions depart from what a reasonable officer would do, and whether those actions serve some legitimate governmental purpose. . . A reasonable officer faced with the question of what to do with Rojas would have known that using more force than necessary violated both of those standards and therefore a clearly established constitutional rule to use force in the way that the officers here appear to have done. Here, during the entire time period in which the officers are alleged to have applied excessive force to Rojas (i.e., from Rojas's arrest to his death in the holding cell), Rojas was handcuffed and did not pose a great physical threat to the officers. The record suggests that Rojas initially appeared paranoid, screaming incoherently, and that, while handcuffed, he attempted to resist being transported to the police station and being incarcerated. There is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to conclude that the officers used force that resulted in disproportionately severe injuries to Rojas—e.g., multiple lacerations, contusions, and abrasions throughout his body—and ultimately in his death. We therefore conclude that, regardless of whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment applied after his arrest, a reasonable officer would have known that using force in the way that the officers here appear to have done in the particular factual circumstances that they encountered violated Rojas's constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, Pérez is not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.") Matalon v. Hynnes, 806 F.3d 627, 634-36 (1st Cir. 2015) ("Although we do not decide the question, we assume, favorably to O'Neill, that the community caretaking exception may apply to warrantless residential searches. Even on this favorable assumption, O'Neill's claim founders. In MacDonald—the case upon which O'Neill primarily relies—local police responded to a telephone call from a person concerned that her neighbor's door was open though he was not home. . . Unable to contact the resident, the police entered the home and, once inside, found evidence of marijuana cultivation. . .We concluded that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because their entry into the home was arguably within the scope of the community caretaking exception. . .Wresting from their contextual moorings our statements in MacDonald that the doctrine was 'nebulous' and surrounded by 'rampant uncertainty,'. . . O'Neill submits that this lack of certitude shields her actions. But this uncertainty does not assist O'Neill's cause: while the parameters of the community caretaking exception are nebulous in some respects (such as whether the exception applies at all to residential searches), the heartland of the exception is reasonably well defined. Some attempts to invoke the exception plainly fall outside this heartland. This is such a case. As we explain below, a reasonable officer standing in O'Neill's shoes should have known that her warrantless entry was not within the compass of the community caretaking exception and, thus, that her intrusion into the plaintiff's home abridged his constitutional rights. . . .Here, the record establishes beyond hope of contradiction that O'Neill was engaged in a quintessential criminal investigation activity—the pursuit of a fleeing felon in the immediate aftermath of a robbery—when she ordered the search of the plaintiff's home. O'Neill testified at trial that she arrived at the plaintiff's residence after being directed there by a witness to the crime and that she believed the suspect had fled into the dwelling. Thus, her actions fall far beyond the borders of the heartland of the community caretaking exception. . . . In sum, the contours of both the plaintiff's right to enjoy the sanctity of his home and the heartland of the community caretaking exception were sufficiently clear to alert O'Neill that her plan of action—a warrantless entry—would infringe the plaintiff's constitutional rights. Put another way, an objectively reasonable officer should have known that a warrantless entry into the plaintiff's home could not be effected on the basis of the community caretaking exception. Though the precise dimensions of the community caretaking exception are blurred, that circumstance does not mean that every attempt to resort to the exception must be regarded as arguable. . . What matters here is that the exception is sufficiently defined to place O'Neill's conduct well outside its heartland and, thus, to render qualified immunity inapplicable. . . . We summarize succinctly. In the circumstances of this case—where the officer was indisputably engaged in an ongoing criminal investigation when the warrantless search occurred—the community caretaking exception does not apply. There was no lack of clarity on this point at the time the search took place. Consequently, a reasonable officer in O'Neill's position should have known that her intrusion into the plaintiff's home would transgress his constitutional rights. She was, therefore, not entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court appropriately denied O'Neill's motion for judgment as a matter of law.")

Morales v. Chadbourne, 793 F.3d 208, 215-17 (1st Cir. 2015) ("It was thus clearly established well before Morales was detained in 2009 that immigration stops and arrests were subject to the same Fourth Amendment requirements that apply to other stops and arrests—reasonable suspicion for a brief stop, and probable cause for any further arrest and detention. Moreover, there could be no question in 2009 that detention authorized by an immigration detainer would require more than just reasonable suspicion. Although the line between an arrest that requires probable cause and a temporary detention for interrogation which does not is not always clear, pre–2009 cases did clearly show that 48 hours of imprisonment—which is what the detainer requests, see 8 C.F.R. § 287.7(d)—falls well on the arrest side of the divide. . . . .Based on the 'robust consensus of cases [and] persuasive authority' discussed above, al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2084, it is beyond debate that an immigration officer in 2009 would need probable cause to arrest and detain individuals for the purpose of investigating their immigration status.")

[See also Morales v. Chadbourne, 235 F. Supp. 3d 388, 400–01 (D.R.I. 2017) ("The fact that there is not a case precisely on point to provide notice that, in order for an officer's reliance on information in a database to be deemed objectively reasonable, he is obligated to conduct such an electronic search thoroughly, keeping in mind the limitations inherent in such databases does not automatically qualify Agent Donaghy with immunity. . . .A recent United States Supreme Court decision does not change that axiom. Relying on long-standing authority, the Supreme Court ruled last week that '[o]f course, "general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning" to officers, but "in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent."' [citing White v. Pauly] The Court has already determined that Agent Donaghy did not have probable cause to issue the detainer for Ms. Morales. . . . Agent Donaghy turns the focus of his argument on the fact that in 2009, there were no published cases holding that an officer did not have probable cause to issue a detainer after a fruitless search of an electronic database for immigration information. Essentially, he argues that he could not have known in 2009 that he should not have relied on the database. In taking this position, he places the blame on the database itself (and, as to INFACTS, on the state law enforcement officers who maintain it) and argues that it was reasonable for him to rely on the information (or lack thereof) contained in the database. . . . Agent Donaghy is not entitled to qualified immunity because it was not objectively reasonable for him to assume or to draw an inference from the INFACTS database that Ms. Morales was not a citizen because the citizenship field was blank. As for the second database, Agent Donaghy testified that he knew CIS was incomplete and that he knew it was possible that Ms. Morales could have naturalized under her maiden name. Moreover, it was also not reasonable to assume that his failure to find a match in CIS using her married name meant that she was not a citizen. It is undisputed that ICE expected its agents to search by social security numbers when they are available; Agent Donaghy had her social security number and he did not use it to determine Ms. Morales' status. . . . It was most certainly beyond debate in 2009 that an ICE officer should not issue a detainer without probable cause, see Morales II, 793 F.3d at 216–17, and should not conduct an investigation that was so obviously deficient. His act in issuing the detainer without probable cause after a clearly insufficient search was obviously unconstitutional. The cases that Agent Donaghy cites where a court allowed qualified immunity when an officer relied on incorrect, as opposed to incomplete information in a database is [sic] not persuasive. . . A database search is only successful and its results are only reliable under a probable cause analysis if the information contained in the database is complete and if the search is thorough and based on available identifiers. ICE statistics from 2009 show that Agent Donaghy personally issued 77 detainers, 31 of which were later cancelled and only 2 led to an individual being taken into ICE custody. According to Director Chadbourne, a cancelled detainer indicates that the individual subject to the detainer is either a United States citizen or a lawful permanent resident. In other words, almost 50% of the detainers he issued that year were ultimately erroneous. Agent Donaghy cannot argue that his unlawful behavior would not have been apparent to an objectively reasonable officer. Where an individual's liberty is at stake, a 50/50 success rate is not acceptable. Agent Donaghy's conduct in issuing a detainer on an obviously incomplete investigation was unlawful and that unlawfulness would have been apparent to an objectively reasonably officer. . . He is not entitled to qualified immunity.") and Morales v. Chadbourne, 235 F. Supp. 3d 388, 407–08 (D.R.I. 2017) ("Director Wall is entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable corrections director in May 2009 would not have understood that his conduct violated Ms. Morales' constitutional rights. In light of that definition, the Court looks at the law and policy in May 2009 to determine whether Director Wall would have been on notice that his conduct in honoring the ICE detainer constituted an unlawful seizure. It is important to note at the outset that even Ms. Morales concedes that RIDOC officials are not equipped or required to make citizenship and/or removability determinations. Her position seems inconsistent with her argument that Director Wall and/or his corrections employees should have independently assessed Ms. Morales' citizenship both when she was processed initially at the ACI on the state charges and when she returned from court, held solely on the ICE detainer, to somehow ensure that the detention was constitutional. And while the law across the circuits is clear today that the RIDOC was not required to detain Ms. Morales pursuant to the ICE investigatory detainer, it was not so clearly established in 2009 such that Director Wall acted unreasonably in honoring the detainer. See Orellana v. Nobles Cty., No. CV 15–3852 ADM/SER, 230 F.Supp.3d 934, 939–41, 2017 WL 72397, at *4 (D. Minn. Jan. 6, 2017) (legality of ICE detainers has shifted, citing several 2014 court decisions that held a detainer was a mere request rather than a mandatory requirement); Galarza v. Szalczyk, Civil Action No. 10–cv–06815, 2012 WL 1080020 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 30, 2012), vacated and remanded by Galarza v. Szalczyk, 745 F.3d 634 (3d Cir. 2014); Rios–Quiroz v. Williamson Cty., TN, No. 3–11–1168, 2012 WL 3945354 (M.D. Tenn. Sept. 10, 2012). The Court has previously found, and the First Circuit confirmed, that there could be no question in 2009 that immigration detainers had to be issued based on probable cause. Morales II, 793 F.3d at 211. Therefore, when the State was confronted in 2009 with an ICE-issued detainer, it would have been reasonable for it to assume that ICE had probable cause to issue it. Director Wall has consistently maintained and the facts established that he believed that RIDOC's long-standing policy of honoring ICE detainers was legal and not capable of violating any individual's constitutional rights. Moreover, in 2009 it was reasonable to assume that honoring the ICE detainer was mandatory. This is especially true here where the language of the detainer itself, citing federal law, stated that it was mandatory. See 8 C.F.R. § 287.7 (section "requires that you detain the alien for a period not to exceed 48 hours ... to provide adequate time for DHS to assume custody of the alien."). Indeed, before 2009, most state and local law enforcement in New England, honored ICE detainers without independently assessing probable cause, and it was ICE's expectation that the states would hold individuals when ICE issued a detainer. . . Therefore, the Court finds that it was reasonable for Director Wall and RIDOC to conclude in 2009 that the ICE detainer it received was valid, supported by probable cause, and mandatory. His 'reasonable, although mistaken, conclusion about the lawfulness of [his] conduct' does not subject him to personal liability. . . . In light of the facts and the law, the Court finds that based on the totality of the circumstances and undisputed facts, Director Wall is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")]

Gericke v. Begin, 753 F.3d 1, 5-10 (1st Cir. 2014) ("The issue before us is whether it was clearly established that Gericke was exercising a First Amendment right when she attempted to film Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop. If she was not exercising a First Amendment right, or, on her facts, a reasonable officer could have concluded that she was not, then the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . On appeal, the officers argue both that there was no First Amendment right to film law enforcement officers during the late-night traffic stop, when Hanslin had a gun and Kelley faced two cars and four individuals, and that, even if such a right existed, it was not clearly established at the time of the traffic stop in this case. . . .Gericke attempted to videotape Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop of Hanslin. Thus, the threshold question here is whether the occasion of a traffic stop places Gericke's attempted filming outside the constitutionally protected right to film police that we discussed in Glik. It does not. . . .A traffic stop, no matter the additional circumstances, is inescapably a police duty carried out in public. Hence, a traffic stop does not extinguish an individual's right to film. This is not to say, however, that an individual's exercise of the right to film a traffic stop cannot be limited. . . .The circumstances of some traffic stops, particularly when the detained individual is armed, might justify a safety measure—for example, a command that bystanders disperse—that would incidentally impact an individual's exercise of the First Amendment right to film. Such an order, even when directed at a person who is filming, may be appropriate for legitimate safety reasons. However, a police order that is specifically directed at the First Amendment right to film police performing their duties in public may be constitutionally imposed only if the officer can reasonably conclude that the filming itself is interfering, or is about to interfere, with his duties. Glik's admonition that, '[i]n our society, police officers are expected to endure significant burdens caused by citizens' exercise of their First Amendment rights' will bear upon the reasonableness of any order directed at the First Amendment right to film, whether that order is given during a traffic stop or in some other public setting. . . .Importantly, an individual's exercise of her First Amendment right to film police activity carried out in public, including a traffic stop, necessarily remains unfettered unless and until a reasonable restriction is imposed or in place. . . . Such a restriction could take the form of a reasonable, contemporaneous order from a police officer, or a preexisting statute, ordinance, regulation, or other published restriction with a legitimate governmental purpose. Under Gericke's version of the facts, no such restriction was imposed or in place. . . According to Gericke, she immediately complied with all police orders: she returned to her car with her camera when Sergeant Kelley asked her to do so, he never ordered her to stop filming, and once she pulled into the parking lot, he never asked her to leave the scene. Therefore, under Gericke's version of the facts, her right to film remained unfettered, and a jury could supportably find that the officers violated her First Amendment right by filing the wiretapping charge without probable cause in retaliation for her attempted filming. . . .Gericke's attempt to film Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop was unmistakably an attempt to film a law enforcement officer in the discharge of his duties in a public space. Therefore, as the events in Glik occurred well over two years before the events here, Gericke's right to film the traffic stop was clearly established unless it was reasonably restricted. Under Gericke's account, no order to leave the area or stop filming was given. Hence, we need not analyze whether a reasonable officer could have believed that the circumstances surrounding this traffic stop allowed him to give such an order. That hypothetical scenario involving a possible restriction on the right to film is irrelevant to this interlocutory appeal. In the absence of a reasonable restriction, it is self-evident, based on first principles, that Gericke's First Amendment right to film police carrying out their duties in public remained unfettered. . . Under Gericke's account, she was permissibly at the site of the police encounter with Hanslin. It would be nonsensical to expect Gericke to refrain from filming when such filming was neither unlawful nor the subject of an officer's order to stop. In the absence of such restrictions, a reasonable police officer necessarily would have understood that Gericke was exercising a clearly established First Amendment right. . . .Under Gericke's version of the facts, where there was no police order to stop filming or leave the area, a jury could supportably find that the officers violated her First Amendment right by filing the wiretapping charge against her because of her attempted filming of Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop. It was clearly established at the time of the stop that the First Amendment right to film police carrying out their duties in public, including a traffic stop, remains unfettered if no reasonable restriction is imposed or in place. Accordingly, we hold that the district court properly denied qualified immunity to the officers on Gericke's section 1983 claim that the wiretapping charge constituted retaliatory prosecution in violation of the First Amendment.")

Rollins, 982 F.3d 813, 832-34, 836 (1st Cir. 2020) ("The logic that Glik and Gericke relied on in setting forth that encompassing description of First Amendment-protected recording of police supplies strong support for understanding it to encompass recording even when it is conducted 'secretly,' at least as Section 99 uses that term. To understand why, one need only consider the Hyde dissent's example of the recording of the beating of Rodney King. Like the many recordings of police misconduct that have followed, the recording in the King case was made from a location unlikely to permit it to qualify as recording conducted in 'plain sight' of those recorded, just as the dissent in Hyde emphasized. But, as recent events around the nation vividly illustrate, such undetected recording can itself serve 'a cardinal First Amendment interest in protecting and promoting "the free discussion of governmental affairs,"' and 'not only aids in the uncovering of abuses ... but also may have a salutary effect on the functioning of government more generally.'. .In fact, as the Martin Plaintiffs point out, audio recording of that sort can sometimes be a better tool for '[g]athering information about' police officers conducting their official duties in public, and thereby facilitating 'the free discussion of governmental affairs' and 'uncovering ... abuses,' than open recording is. . . That is not only because recording undertaken from a distance -- and thus out of plain sight of the person recorded -- will often be the least likely to disrupt the police in carrying out their functions. It is also because recording that is not conducted with the actual knowledge of the police officer -- even if conducted proximate to the person recorded -- may best ensure that it occurs at all, given the allegations that the Martin Plaintiffs set forth about the resistance from official quarters that open recording sometimes generates. In sum, a citizen's audio recording of on-duty police officers' treatment of civilians in public spaces while carrying out their official duties, even when conducted without an officer's knowledge, can constitute newsgathering every bit as much as a credentialed reporter's after-the-fact efforts to ascertain what had transpired. The circumstances in which such recording could be conducted from a distance or without the officers' knowledge and serve the very same interest in promoting public awareness of the conduct of law enforcement -- with all the accountability that the provision of such information promotes -- are too numerous to permit the conclusion that recording can be prohibited in all of those situations without attracting any First Amendment review. We thus hold that the Martin Plaintiffs' proposed recording constitutes a type of newsgathering that falls within the scope of the First Amendment, even though it will be undertaken secretly within the meaning of Section 99. . . .That such recording qualifies as a species of protected newsgathering does not mean that Section 99's criminal bar against it necessarily violates the First Amendment. We cautioned in Glik that the right to record that was recognized there 'is not without limitations.'. . We thus must determine whether the 'limitations' that Section

99 imposes on this type of recording -- conducted secretly as it will be -- comport with the First Amendment. Glik had 'no occasion to explore those limitations' because the audio recording of the officers at issue there occurred 'peaceful[ly],' from a 'comfortable' distance, in a 'public space,' and in a manner that did 'not interfere with the police officers' performance of their duties.'. . But, although Glik made clear that such peaceable open recording -- which captured an 'arrest on the Boston Common' -- was 'worlds apart' from the recording of a 'traffic stop,'. . . Gericke explained that the distinct concerns about public safety and interference with official duties implicated by such a stop did not, without more, 'extinguish' the right we recognized in Glik. . . In fact, although Gericke recognized that the circumstances of a given police encounter 'might justify a safety measure' that could incidentally constrain citizens' right to record, it held that 'a police order that is specifically directed at the First Amendment right to [record] police performing their duties in public may be constitutionally imposed only if the officer can reasonably conclude that the [recording] itself is interfering, or is about to interfere, with his duties.'. .Gericke did recognize that the government might choose to regulate such recording in a more general, ex ante manner. But, it concluded that the government would need a 'legitimate governmental purpose' to impose a limitation of that sort. . . Thus, in light of Glik and Gericke, we must decide whether either the Commonwealth's interest in prohibiting conduct that 'interfere[s]' with police officers' ability to carry out their duties or some other 'legitimate governmental purpose' justifies Section 99's ban on the secret, nonconsensual audio recording of police officers discharging their official duties in public spaces. . . . [W]e conclude that the District Court rightly determined that, even though intermediate scrutiny does not require that a measure be the least restrictive means of achieving the government's interests, Section 99 is not narrowly tailored to further either of the identified governmental interests -- namely, preventing interference with police activities and protecting individual privacy -- notwithstanding their importance.")]

Hernandez-Cuevas v. Taylor, 723 F.3d 91, 97 n.7 (1st Cir. 2013) (Hernandez I) ("Though the question of whether the Fourth Amendment provides substantive protection during the pretrial period is a question of first impression in this circuit, it cannot be seriously argued that an objectively reasonable officer in Martz and Taylor's position would have been ignorant of the fact that fabricating evidence was constitutionally unacceptable. Indeed, we have previously concluded that it is 'self-evident' that 'those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from deliberately fabricating evidence and framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.' Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 44–45 (1st Cir.2004) (concluding that 'the right not to be framed by law enforcement agents was clearly established in 1967').")

Drumgold v. Callahan, 707 F.3d 28, 43 & n.10 (1st Cir. 2013) ("The essence of Callahan's argument is that the affirmative disclosure obligation Brady imposed on prosecutors in 1963 was not expanded to include law enforcement officers until Kyles was decided in 1995. That is true, so far as it goes. . . As we have said, though, this case also involves the deliberate suppression aspect of Brady. There can be no doubt that, under the line of cases running from Mooney and Pyle to Brady, the law was firmly settled at the time of Drumgold's criminal trial that a law enforcement officer may not deliberately suppress material evidence that is favorable to a defendant. . . Moreover, to the extent that Callahan acted deliberately, a reasonable officer in his position plainly would have appreciated the wrongfulness of his conduct. Callahan claims that a reasonable officer would not have recognized the evidence in question as material because Drumgold's lawyer had not bothered to cross-examine another prosecution witness, Travis Johnson, on the fact that the district attorney's office paid for his accommodations during the criminal trial. However, Johnson had to travel to Boston from another state to testify, and the benefits he received were tailored to facilitate his appearance at the trial. By contrast, viewed in the light most favorable to Drumgold, see Walden, 596 F.3d at 52, the benefits Evans received had little to do with ensuring his availability to testify or, for that matter, his safety as a cooperating witness. Evans was permitted to remain in the Howard Johnson hotel for eight months, he was free to come and go as he pleased, and no one monitored his whereabouts. A reasonable officer would have discerned the difference between the open-ended benefits Evans received and the far more limited benefits Johnson received. As a result, there is no basis for awarding Callahan judgment as a matter of law on qualified immunity grounds. . . . We do not mean to suggest that a law enforcement officer can be liable today in a damages action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 only for deliberately suppressing evidence. Non-disclosure with a less culpable state of mind might suffice. . . This is a difficult question that has engendered a range of views. [collecting cases] We do not reach this question here. Our holding is limited to the law as it was clearly established in 1989, when Callahan engaged in the conduct at issue here.")

San Geronimo Caribe Project, Inc. v. Acevedo-Vila, 687 F.3d 465, 499-501 (1st Cir. 2012) (Lipez, J., concurring) ("The qualified immunity inquiry in the context of a procedural due process claim cannot turn on whether it was clear that the circumstances fit the mold of Zinermon rather than Parratt–Hudson. The constitutional violation at issue is the denial of predeprivation process, and to assess the reasonableness of the defendant's conduct, we logically must focus on the clarity of the law concerning the plaintiff's entitlement to a hearing. It has been clearly established for more than a half-century that 'a deprivation of life, liberty, or property [ordinarily must] "be preceded by notice and opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case."'. . . Hence, if we had determined that any of the defendants in this case had violated SGCP's due process rights by failing to hold a meaningful hearing before suspending their permits, the only basis for qualified immunity should be the defendant's reasonable uncertainty about whether the circumstances presented an 'extraordinary situation[ ]' in which a valid governmental interest justified postponing the hearing until after the challenged action. . . Uncertainty about the applicability of Parratt–Hudson is irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis because the Parratt–Hudson has nothing to do with the rationale for protecting officials from damages liability: to eliminate the risk that, in areas where the law is not clearly established, officials will refrain from independently acting in the public interest for fear of being sued. . . In sum, the qualified immunity doctrine in the procedural due process context must be applied consistently with its purpose to shield well-meaning and reasonable public officials from the burden of damages while holding accountable those officials who 'exercise power irresponsibly,' Glik, 655 F.3d at 81. The Parratt–Hudson doctrine itself denies a federal remedy to individuals harmed by the random and unauthorized conduct of state actors; the uncertainty surrounding the doctrine's scope should not be used to further extend the immunity of rogue state officials. . . . Under standard qualified immunity principles, the only pertinent question when an unconstitutional denial of predeprivation process has occurred is whether the defendant should have known that the Constitution required such predeprivation process.")

Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78, 85, 88 (1st Cir. 2011) ("In summary, though not unqualified, a citizen's right to film government officials, including law enforcement officers, in the discharge of their duties in a public space is a basic, vital, and well-established liberty safeguarded by the First Amendment. Accordingly, we hold that the district court did not err in denying qualified immunity to the appellants on Glik's First Amendment claim. . . . Simply put, a straightforward reading of the statute and case law cannot support the suggestion that a recording made with a device known to record audio and held in plain view is 'secret.' We thus conclude, on the facts of the complaint, that Glik's recording was not 'secret' within the meaning of Massachusetts's wiretap statute, and therefore the officers lacked probable cause to arrest him. Accordingly, the complaint makes out a violation of Glik's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .The presence of probable cause was not even arguable here. The allegations of the complaint establish that Glik was openly recording the police officers and that they were aware of his surveillance. For the reasons we have discussed, we see no basis in the law for a reasonable officer to conclude that such a conspicuous act of recording was 'secret' merely because the officer did not have actual knowledge of whether audio was being recorded. We thus agree with the district court that, at this stage in the litigation, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity from Glik's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Decotiis v. Whittemore, 635 F.3d 22, 30-38 (1st Cir. 2011) ("At the time of the district court's order, this Court had not yet had occasion to consider the application of Garcetti, and particularly the question of what it means to speak 'pursuant to' one's employment duties. We recently considered the application of Garcetti in two cases, Foley v. Town of Randolph, 598 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2010), and Mercado-Berrios, 611 F.3d 18, both of which inform the analysis. . . . The instant case presents what may be a not uncommon scenario: a public employee who is hired to perform certain specific functions believes her employer is not complying with the law and suggests to constituents a method to exert pressure on the public agency to encourage compliance. The question presented by such a case is: when does the public employee take off her employee hat and put on her citizen hat? . . .Although no one contextual factor is dispositive, we believe several non-exclusive factors, gleaned from the case law, are instructive: whether the employee was commissioned or paid to make the speech in question, Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 421; the subject matter of the speech, id. at 421 (citing Givhan v. W. Line Consol. Sch. Dist., 439 U.S. 410, 414 (1979)); whether the speech was made up the chain of command, see id. at 420; whether the employee spoke at her place of employment, see Brammer-Hoelter v. Twin Peaks Charter Acad., 492 F.3d 1192, 1205 (10th Cir.2007); whether the speech gave objective observers the impression that the employee represented the employer when she spoke (lending it "official significance"), Foley, 598 F.3d at 7-8 & n.9; whether the employee's speech derived from special knowledge obtained during the course of her employment, see Williams v. Dallas Ind. Sch. Dist., 480 F.3d 689, 694 (5th Cir.2007); and whether there is a so-called citizen analogue to the speech, Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 423. . . .In short, while we cannot conclusively say that Plaintiff's speech was made as a citizen, the scope of our review on a motion to dismiss does not demand as much; it is sufficient that the complaint alleges facts that plausibly set forth citizen speech. See Sepulveda-Villarini v. Dep't. of Educ. of P.R., 628 F.3d 25, 30 (1st Cir.2010) (Souter, J.) ("A plausible but inconclusive inference from pleaded facts will survive a motion to dismiss...."). We conclude that Decotiis has surmounted this bar, and therefore the district court's dismissal for failure to state a claim was in error. . . . At the time of Whittemore's alleged retaliatory action, the Supreme Court's decision in Garcetti was the only controlling case in the First Circuit, and even Garcetti stated that its analysis was not to be mistaken for 'a comprehensive framework for defining the scope of an employee's duties in cases where there is room for serious debate.'. . There were no decisions in this circuit explaining the scope of a public employee's employment duties and what it means to speak pursuant to those duties, nor was there a body of decisions from other circuits that could be said to have put Whittemore on clear notice. Even though the broad constitutional rule, as set forth in Garcetti, may have been clearly established, the contours of the right were still cloudy. . . . Furthermore, though we conclude that Decotiis stated a plausible claim for relief, the district court's opinion was a well-reasoned exposition reflecting a thoughtful analysis of the law as it existed at the time. This lends support to the conclusion that the state of the law at the time of the alleged constitutional violation was not clear enough in the circuits generally, and in this circuit particularly, to put Whittemore on fair notice that her actions constituted a constitutional deprivation. . . . We therefore hold that regardless of whether Whittemore did in fact violate Plaintiff's First Amendment rights, which is yet to be determined, a reasonable person in Whittemore's position could have believed that she was not violating Decotiis's constitutional rights by not renewing her contract. As such, qualified immunity is available to Whittemore in her individual capacity.")

Mosher v. Nelson, 589 F.3d 488, 495, 496 (1st Cir. 2009) ("For purposes of qualified immunity, we must decide, given the state of the law in 2004, whether a reasonable official in Nelson's position, with his knowledge of the circumstances that existed in Max 2 when Burns killed Mosher, would have understood that the practice of allowing patients to visit in other patients' rooms following morning count presented a substantial risk of serious harm to the patients. The district court concluded that, given the circumstances in Burrell, the law was not clearly established that failure to change the visiting practice would constitute a violation of Mosher's constitutional rights. The district court held that Nelson was entitled to qualified immunity. We agree. No case had held that the same circumstances that occurred at BSH or materially similar circumstances constituted a Fourteenth Amendment violation. In addition, the cases addressing a detainee's right to be free of punishment before conviction did not clearly apply to the circumstances that existed in Max 2 in August of 2004. It was not clearly established law that in the absence of a history of violence or individualized threats, a prison official's failure to discontinue a long practice of a brief period of unsupervised visits was deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm to a patient. A reasonable official in Nelson's place, given the circumstances and the legal standard, could have believed that allowing the practice to continue would not lead to events that would violate a patient's rights. Therefore, Nelson is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Lopez-Quinones v. Puerto Rico Nat. Guard, 526 F.3d 23, 27, 28 (1st Cir. 2008) ("The crucial question here is whether a reasonable official acting at the time of Lopez' termination should have known on what side of the Elrod/Branti line Lopez' own position fell. . . Largely for prudential reasons, the test is not subjective but asks what a reasonable official would have thought. . . On the present facts, this is a close call but the issue is treated as one of law, . . . and, in disagreement with the able district judge, we believe that as the law stood when the decision was made a reasonable official could (albeit mistakenly) have deemed Lopez outside Elrod/Branti's protection. . . . Those reading our past decisions like Duriex-Gauthier could reasonably have believed that in general, middle managers with impressive sounding titles and duties were generally outside the protected category. . . . . Some of our precedents may suggest that even if an official has significant policymaking responsibility, he is still protected unless it is also established that the policy judgments are those for which 'partisan' political motivations or judgments are appropriate . . . . [B]y contrast, other language from our case law indicates that involvement in policy or matters implicating political disagreement is sufficient. . . It is conceivable that there are rare cases where the distinction might matter-say, a high official whose duties were nonetheless entirely technical. . . But for the most part policymaking is in the nature of things the basis for preserving the right of the democratic political process to operate; civil service protections can be afforded by statute but the Constitution does not require them. The reference to 'partisan' politics comes from Branti but it is far from clear that it comprised a separate test. . . And for his part, plaintiff has not cited any analogous First Circuit cases that would have put defendants on notice of jeopardy. Given past precedent, we cannot say it was clearly established that Lopez, a director of a significant unit within the Puerto Rico National Guard, was insulated from political dismissal. Accordingly, while Lopez may seek injunctive relief for his termination, he may not obtain monetary relief from the individual defendants in their personal capacities.").

DeMayo v. Nugent, 517 F.3d 11, 18, 19 (1st Cir. 2008) ("The district court essentially mandated that, to avoid dismissal, DeMayo find a case involving a violation of an individual's constitutional rights under the exact same set of circumstances. The proper inquiry is more abstract: whether Nugent and Lugas were on notice that 'police officers need either a warrant or probable cause plus exigent circumstances in order to make a lawful entry into a home.' Kirk v. Lousiana, 536 U.S. 635, 638 (2002); see also Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 590 (1980) ("[T]he Fourth Amendment has drawn a firm line at the entrance to the house. Absent exigent circumstances, that threshold may not reasonably be crossed without a warrant."). In our view, the 'firm line' drawn by Kirk and Payton provided Nugent and Lugas with sufficient notice that their entry into DeMayo's home was in violation of clearly established law. The defendants contend that the doctrine of exigent circumstances is an expanding area of law, the contours of which are not clearly established. The fact that the doctrine of exigent circumstances is evolving, however, does not necessarily mean that every situation implicating the subject touches upon the supposed nebulous borderline of acceptable conduct. Regardless of whether the outer boundaries of the doctrine are clearly defined, the defendants' conduct fell squarely outside the realm of legitimate uncertainty. . . . As explained above, the record is utterly bereft of specific facts that could have justified the officers' entry. Thus, without disputing the premise, it is a non sequitur for Nugent and Lugas to argue that because the precise quantum or nature of evidence that gives rise to exigent circumstances is not fully fleshed out in the case law, they are entitled to qualified immunity. Law enforcement officers may not violate constitutional rights, then expect qualified immunity when a court refuses to craft an unprecedented exception to a clearly established rule of law. . . . In this situation, there were no factual ambiguities or close calls that would render the defendants' conduct objectively reasonable.").

Jordan v. Carter, 428 F.3d 67, 74-76 (1st Cir. 2005) ("If we simply considered whether the law clearly established that a public employer may not penalize an employee for speech about a matter of public concern, it would be beyond debate that ample legal precedent existed to guide appellant's conduct. But using such a broad formulation to deny immunity is precisely what we have been told not to do. . . Appellant, however, urges us to award him immunity based on a similarly generic argument. He emphasizes the abundant case law recognizing that it is rare for immunity to be denied when the constitutional right at issue involves weighing various factors. . . . Appellant claims that this cannot be the rare case because the complaint depicts disciplinary conduct imposed for a mixture of protected and unprotected speech, a combination that would engender uncertainty in any attempt to balance interests. . . . Although Dirrane also presented an appeal of a motion to dismiss, it provides limited support for appellant's immunity request. We described the complaint there as 'very lengthy,'. . . and we noted allegations detailing the statements that plaintiff made, to whom, and, at least to some extent, their timing. We have none of those particulars here. Appellant could have, but did not, move for a more definite statement. See Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(e); Educadores Puertorriquenos En Accion v. Hernandez, 367 F.3d 61, 67 (lst Cir.2004). We therefore cannot eliminate the possibility that the facts once developed will show a violation of clearly established law. As we have intimated above, if plaintiffs' criticism consisted of serious expressions of concern, voiced in an appropriate manner, about the effect of their supervisors' poor performance on public safety or other public matters, and appellant's retaliation was primarily aimed at silencing their criticism for his own advantage, precedent would have clearly established that the balance of interests tipped decisively in plaintiffs' favor. Appellant is thus not entitled to immunity based on prong two. . . In the third step of the qualified immunity analysis, we consider whether an objectively reasonable officer in the defendant's position would have understood his action to violate the plaintiff's rights. . . At this stage, as we have noted, the record requires us to look upon plaintiffs' speech as significantly involving matters of public concern. Similarly, we must assess and balance the interests of the parties, favoring plaintiffs in our reading of the allegations. And, since appellant concedes that the allegations establish that plaintiffs' speech was the motivating factor for imposing sanctions, the required inquiry leads to but one result. We cannot award immunity to appellant on the basis that a reasonable officer would not have realized the impropriety of his conduct. . . . We are fully aware that the doctrine of qualified immunity is intended to protect government officials not only from personal liability but also from the burdens of litigation, see Saucier, 533 U.S. at 200-01, and that immunity is often appropriate in cases involving public employee speech. It is not an automatic entitlement, however, and a court may not cut off a plaintiff's claims based simply on the odds. Here, the record is insufficiently developed to permit a reasoned assessment of either the speech or conduct at issue, and we accordingly must draw all inferences in the plaintiffs' favor. From that perspective, we conclude that the district court properly denied appellant's motion for dismissal of the individual claims based on the defense of qualified immunity. We do not mean to imply any likely outcome as this case further proceeds.")

Torres-Rivera v. O'Neill-Cancel, 406 F.3d 43, 54, 55 (1st Cir. 2005) ("O'Neill focuses on the second step in the analysis, and he argues that in August 1998 there was no clearly established duty for officers to intervene in situations of excessive use of force by other officers except those involving an actual arrest or pretrial detention. . . This argument is simply wrong. Davis and the case law do not distinguish an officer's duty to intervene during an 'investigatory stop' from that during an arrest or pre-trial detention. The Fourth Amendment duty applies here where Ernid was seized. . . . In keeping with these principles, no reasonable officer would have concluded that this stop was outside of these Fourth Amendment obligations. . . . Further, the alternate basis of joint participant liability in the failure to intervene claim against O'Neill was clearly established in 1998. . . . O'Neill does not make any argument that this theory of liability was unclear at the time of the beating. O'Neill is not entitled to qualified immunity because the law was clearly established in 1998 that an officer in O'Neill's circumstances had a duty to intervene.").

Burke v. Town of Walpole, 405 F.3d 66, 85-88 (1st Cir. 2005) ("Uniquely among the defendant police officers, Trooper McDonald argues that he had no constitutional duty to disclose exculpatory evidence to anyone because he was neither an affiant for the arrest warrant nor technically an arresting officer (merely a searching officer). Thus, we must ask 'whether the state of the law at the time of the putative violation afforded [Trooper McDonald] fair warning that his ... conduct was unconstitutional.'. . Just as a police officer who seeks an arrest warrant despite the lack of probable cause may not 'excuse his own default by pointing to the greater incompetence of [a] magistrate' who erroneously issues a warrant, [citing Malley], a police defendant who acts intentionally or with reckless disregard for the truth may not insulate himself from liability through the objectively reasonable conduct of other officers. . . Thus, Trooper McDonald's argument that he had no constitutional duty to disclose exculpatory evidence to anyone prior to Burke's arrest because he was neither an affiant for the arrest warrant nor technically an arresting officer is unavailing. However Trooper McDonald chooses to characterize or minimize his role, the summary judgment record establishes that he was centrally involved in the collection of evidence to be used to secure an arrest warrant for Burke. . . At the time of Burke's arrest, his constitutional right to be free from arrest pursuant to a warrant that would not have issued if material exculpatory evidence had been provided to the magistrate was clearly established, as was Trooper McDonald's concomitant constitutional duty of full disclosure of exculpatory information to fellow officers seeking warrants based on probable cause. . . . When viewed in Burke's favor, the facts in the record reveal that Trooper McDonald knew the DNA analysis had excluded Burke as a suspect on the morning of December 10, but failed to communicate that information to the officers preparing applications for search and arrest warrants despite his awareness of their ongoing preparation and ample opportunity to communicate the newly acquired information. . . . Given the clearly established prohibition on material omissions by officers central to an investigation from an arrest warrant application, and given Trooper McDonald's knowledge of the crucial facts, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that a reasonable, similarly situated officer would feel free to communicate only inculpatory bite mark evidence to fellow officers seeking warrants on probable cause while withholding his knowledge of directly contradictory DNA results. Accordingly, Trooper McDonald was not entitled to a favorable summary judgment ruling on his qualified immunity defense.").

Wagner v. City of Mount Holyoke, 404 F.3d 504, 509 (1st Cir. 2005) ("The general right invoked by Wagner–to engage in speech on matters of public concern without retaliation–was clearly established prior to 1994. But qualified immunity requires that the general right be placed in a reasonably specific context; and given the facts surrounding Wagner's discipline, this is not a case in which reasonable officers, in light of clearly established law, 'must have known that [they were] acting unconstitutionally.' . . To the contrary, Wagner's broad range of complaints (some consisting of unprotected and antagonistic speech), coupled with his disregard of confidentiality protocols and his disobedience in following the department's chain of command, would have permitted a reasonable superior officer to believe that he was entitled to discipline Wagner regardless of the content of his speech, consistent with the protections of the first amendment. Even if this reasoning were mistaken, it would not have been egregiously so and, accordingly, qualified immunity is available.")

Whalen v. Massachusetts Trial Court, 397 F.3d 19, 27, 28 (1st Cir. 2005) ("We believe an objectively reasonable Massachusetts official could have drawn the conclusion–albeit incorrectly–that a budget-driven layoff effectuated by reference to performance is nonetheless a budget-driven layoff, and thus exempt from the procedural requirements applicable to terminations for cause. Although we have now clarified that due process requires that an employee who holds a property right in his job be given notice and opportunity to respond whenever he is terminated in a 'person-directed rather than position-directed personnel action[ ],' . . . a reasonable official could have taken into account the possibly (and ultimately) temporary nature of Whalen's termination and the financial crisis that triggered it to conclude that the Loudermill line of cases was not implicated. Certainly, in terms of future employment, a budgetary layoff is likely to have less drastic consequences than a classic termination-for-cause; an official focusing on the "layoff" label and the nature of the harm, against the backdrop of the "reorganization exception," reasonably may have miscalculated in weighing the competing interests. . . . In sum, because we believe an objectively reasonable official in the defendants' position would not necessarily have understood that his action violated the plaintiff's rights, we hold that the district court properly granted qualified immunity to the individual defendants.").

Whalen v. Massachusetts Trial Court, 397 F.3d 19, 30 (1st Cir. 2005) (Stahl, J., dissenting) ("At the time Whalen was targeted for layoff based on performance-related factors, the law was such that a reasonable officer, when selecting an employee for removal based on such factors, was on notice that such an employee was entitled to due process. The fact that budgetary constraints prompted the officials to evaluate Whalen's performance is irrelevant–even in this 'novel factual circumstance[ ],' the 'officials [were] still on notice' that Whalen was entitled to some form of due process as soon as factors other than seniority were considered in his being selected for removal. . . . In their search through our precedent for a perfect factual match to the facts of this case, my brethren ignore the Supreme Court's clear direction in Hope v. Pelzer that '[a]lthough earlier cases involving 'fundamentally similar' facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established, they are not necessary to such a finding.' Id. Indeed, this same error was made by four members of this court sitting en banc in Savard v. Rhode Island, 338 F.3d 23 (1st Cir.2003) (en banc) (opinion of Selya, J.), when this Court evenly divided over the propriety of such a search for the perfect precedential match. The proper inquiry is 'whether the state of the law [at the time of the action] gave [Appellees] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [Whalen] was unconstitutional.' . . And here, the answer is unequivocally yes.").

Riverdale Mills Corp. v. Pimpare, 392 F.3d 55, 66 (1st Cir. 2004) ("The district court below erred by posing the second prong as whether 'the law regarding the necessity for a search warrant is clear.'. . This is too abstract an inquiry, at either the first or the second prong. . . The proper question is whether an officer on October 21, 1997, should have understood based on prior law that it was unlawful, without a warrant or consent, to take industrial wastewater from underneath a manhole cover on a privately-owned street, but headed irretrievably to a public sewer 300 feet away. . . .The law did not clearly establish any such Fourth Amendment right. We have found no court decisions holding that there is a reasonable expectation of privacy in industrial wastewater on its way to a public sewer. The law goes the other way. . . The most obvious analogy, as we have noted, is between solid waste left out for the trash collector, for which there is usually no reasonable expectation of privacy, and liquid waste flowing into the public sewer system. . . . Even if Riverdale had a reasonable expectation of privacy in its wastewater at Manhole 1, prior law would not have put an officer on notice that producers of industrial wastewater located underneath a manhole on a private street but headed for a public sewer 300 feet away enjoyed a reasonable expectation of privacy in the wastewater. The officers are entitled to immunity on the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis as well." [footnotes omitted]).

Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 46-48(1st Cir. 2004) ("The appellants resist this impressive array of authority on two fronts. First, they accuse the plaintiffs and the district court of having defined the right in question too broadly. In their view, modeling the right as a right to be free from a contrived conviction–a right not to be framed by the government–casts too wide a net. They suggest instead that the plaintiffs' allegations should be squeezed into a more circumscribed mold and read as setting forth a Brady violation. . . Having erected this straw man, the appellants then shred it: although Brady was decided prior to 1967, they assert that it was not clearly established then (indeed, it may not be clearly established today) that the duties imposed by Brady apply to law enforcement officers under circumstances in which the prosecutor is unaware of the contrivance. . . . It is certainly true that the manner in which a right is defined can make or break a qualified immunity defense. Courts must be careful not to permit an artful pleader to convert the doctrine of qualified immunity into a hollow safeguard simply by alleging a violation of an exceedingly nebulous right. . . . . Courts must be equally careful, however, not to permit a defendant to hijack the plaintiff's complaint and recharacterize its allegations so as to minimize his or her liability. Here, the amended complaints, fairly read, are not susceptible to the appellants' animadversions. The right defined by the plaintiffs and recognized by the district court does not even approach the level of generality thought to be impermissible. . . . Nor does the plaintiffs' inability to identify a pre-1967 scenario that precisely mirrors the scandalous facts of this case ensure the success of the appellants' claims of qualified immunity. There is no requirement that the facts of previous cases be materially similar to the facts sub judice in order to trump a qualified immunity defense. . . General statements of the law are capable of conveying fair warning. . . It follows logically that, in some situations, 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . . We conclude, without serious question, that Mooney and its pre-1967 progeny provided reasonable law enforcement officers fair warning that framing innocent persons would violate the constitutional rights of the falsely accused.")

Mihos v. Swift, 358 F.3d 91, 110 (1st Cir. 2004) ("Given the facts alleged in the complaint, as described in Part I.A. supra, we have no trouble finding that a reasonable official similarly situated to Swift would have known that terminating Mihos for his vote violated his constitutional rights. Taking the allegations in the complaint as true, Mihos exercised his best judgment as to the proper course of action, cast his vote, and was fired in retaliation for that vote for reasons unrelated to legitimate governmental interests. No reasonable public official could have failed to realize that a member of a public instrumentality cannot be terminated on such grounds for voting on matters of public concern within his authority.").

Fabiano v. Hopkins, 352 F.3d 447, 457, 458 (1st Cir. 2003) ("The nature of Fabiano's First Amendment claim makes it extremely difficult for him to prove that this right was clearly established at the time his employment was terminated. 'Because Pickering's constitutional rule turns upon a fact-intensive balancing test, it can rarely be considered 'clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity. . . The facts of this case do not present the sort of unusual circumstances that would support the finding of a clearly established right notwithstanding Pickering. As we noted supra, there is a very close question as to whether Fabiano's allegations made out a constitutional claim. Fabiano's supervisors had, on at least one formal occasion, stated a basis for distrusting his judgment, . . . and were reasonably concerned about the potential conflict of interest (and the appearance of such conflict) that his Zoning Board lawsuit entailed. We cannot say that they knew or should have known that firing Fabiano under these circumstances was unlawful. Accordingly, we conclude that Joyce and Hopkins are entitled to qualified immunity on Fabiano's First Amendment claims.").

Acevedo-Garcia v. Monroig, 351 F.3d 547, 563, 564 (1st Cir. 2003) ("Defendants contend that the court erroneously characterized the 'constitutional right' at issue as plaintiffs' right not to be discriminated against on the basis of their political beliefs during the implementation of the layoff plan. They decry the excessive abstractness of this 'right,' citing language from the Supreme Court's decision in Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635 (1987). . . . It is difficult to divine from defendants' briefs how they would articulate the right at issue–the pertinent discussion is geared exclusively to demonstrating the absence of any clearly established rule regulating the implementation of seniority-based layoff plans. Of course, this approach commits the Anderson fallacy in reverse by construing the relevant rights/rules with such specificity that the predictably scant jurisprudence on point would never satisfy the 'clearly established' threshold. In the end, their argument is unavailing. The clearly established law both in this circuit and beyond precludes government officials from discharging civil or 'career' employees for politically-motivated reasons.").

Savard v. State of Rhode Island, 338 F.3d 23, 27, 28, 30, 32, 33 (1st Cir. 2003) (evenly divided en banc opinion) (Selya, J., joined by Boudin, Lynch, and Howard, JJ.) ("We acknowledge that strip searches are intrusive and degrading (and, therefore, should not be unreservedly available to law enforcement officers). The Roberts decisions exemplify this thinking; they hold unequivocally that the ACI's policy of strip-searching persons arrested for non-violent, non-drug-related misdemeanors, in the absence of particularized suspicion, violated the Constitution. . . The questions on which this appeal turns, therefore, involve the second and third branches of the qualified immunity algorithm. We must determine whether the law was clearly established, prior to March 17, 2000, to the effect that prison officials need at least reasonable suspicion before subjecting misdemeanant arrestees to strip searches when introducing them into the general population of a maximum security prison, and whether a reasonable prison official, situated similarly to the defendants, would have understood at that time that the policy in place at the ACI transgressed the Constitution. . . . In conducting our appraisal, we have endeavored to take into account all the decisional law, in and out of our own circuit, that was on the books at the time of the events in question. . . . In the end, we recognize that both Swain and Arruda offer valuable insights, but that neither is a very exact match. While Swain makes clear that strip searches ought not lightly to be indulged, the factual context of the case presented rather minimal security concerns. And while Arruda makes clear that institutional security needs may require intrusive measures in a maximum security setting, that case dealt not with persons arrested for relatively innocuous misdemeanors, but, rather, with hardened criminals. So long as the facts in these cases are distinguishable in a fair way from the facts at hand–and we believe that they are–then neither of them can be said to have clearly established the law for purposes of a qualified immunity determination in the instant case. . . . The plaintiffs . . . go beyond Swain and Arruda in an effort to convince us that reasonable correctional officials should have realized the unconstitutionality of the ACI's strip search policy prior to March 17, 2000. They point to a line of cases stating that blanket strip searches of misdemeanant arrestees, conducted without particularized suspicion, are unconstitutional. . . . The short of the matter is that, throughout the last quarter of the twentieth century, courts had pursued two divergent lines of precedent. This case, as we said in Roberts II, 239 F.3d at 111, fell along neither axis, but, rather, into the tenebrous middle. We are mindful that there is a distinction for qualified immunity purposes between an unconstitutional but objectively reasonable act and a blatantly unconstitutional act. . . Here, the lack of any direct precedent and the undulating contours of the law during the relevant period combine to persuade us that the constitutional violation was not obvious; the defendants reasonably could have thought, prior to Roberts I, that there was room in the law for the ACI's strip search policy. . . . Our brethren suggest that we require an exact match with the facts of previously decided cases before we will deny a defendant the shield of qualified immunity. That is simply not so. What is so is that '[t]he meaning of reasonableness [of a search] for Fourth Amendment purposes is highly situational' and requires 'a balancing of the need to search against the invasion which the search entails.'. . The cases that our brethren cite in an effort to show that reasonable suspicion was clearly established as a condition precedent to a strip search of a person in custody are no more on point than the cases, cited above, that authorize various exceptions to that generality. Given this cacophony of voices, a reasonable prison official, faced with the novel factual situation that confronted those who were in charge of the ACI, had no way of knowing which voice should guide him in drawing the Fourth Amendment balance. It is the absence of clear guidance, not the absence of a perfect precedential match, that makes qualified immunity appropriate here.").

Savard v. State of Rhode Island, 338 F.3d 23, 41, 42 (1st Cir. 2003) (evenly divided en banc opinion) (Bownes, J., joined by Coffin, Torruella, and Lipez, JJ.) ("We are deeply troubled by the weight our colleagues give to our statement in Roberts II that institutional security concerns in this case 'fall somewhere between' those exhibited in Swain and Arruda. 239 F.3d at 111. Our colleagues describe this statement as an acknowledgment that the ACI's strip search policy fell into a 'gray area' of the law. We respectfully disagree. The Roberts II statement merely recognizes the obvious: that the facts of the present case fall somewhere between those of Swain and Arruda. Such an observation is not surprising. Indeed, most cases will fall somewhere between Swain and Arruda because those two cases represent the opposite ends of the spectrum. Swain was a case involving an arrestee who was placed in a cell in a local police station. In contrast, Arruda involved extraordinarily violent convicted felons who were confined to a special security section of a maximum security prison. What our colleagues have done is to construe a dictum probably intended to soften criticism of the prison officials into a sweeping carte blanche, protecting officials for a wide swath of conduct elsewhere long since forbidden. Placing so much weight on the Roberts II statement runs the risk of creating an impenetrable defense for government officials. Our colleagues' reliance on the Roberts II statement implies that qualified immunity will only be denied in this circuit when the facts of the case at bar are the same as those in previously decided cases. This risk is compounded by our colleagues' statement that Swain could not give the defendants fair warning because it is not 'a very exact match' to the facts of this case. Such reasoning flouts the Supreme Court's holding in Hope v. Pelzer . . . .In short, they reject Swain as giving 'clear guidance' because of factual differences, while claiming allegiance to Hope's ruling that 'fundamentally similar' facts are not necessary. This seems to us an attempt to have it both ways. Our colleagues may well be correct that the strip search policy at issue in this case, and others like it, are 'dead and buried.' But their qualified immunity analysis will live on; it will undoubtedly be used in future cases involving other important constitutional rights.").

Dwan v. City of Boston, 329 F.3d 275, 280-82 (1st Cir. 2003) ("Given the objective circumstances of this case, we see nothing unreasonable about the actions taken by the defendants. It is beyond dispute in this case that unidentified policemen on the scene badly beat a black undercover police officer, mistakenly believing him to have shot another policeman, and it is almost certain that some of the other officers present knew who had done it, denied having knowledge, and supported each other's stories. The individual defendants, to their credit, were trying to penetrate this familiar wall of silence and bring the wrongdoers to justice. Dwan may or may not have had such knowledge. But what the defendants knew was that he had told a story as to why he did not see what happened, admittedly supported by one of Dwan's fellow officers but contradicted in substance by two others (who had no obvious motive to lie), and Dwan then declined to testify about the matter before a grand jury without immunity. On this basis, the defendants were perfectly entitled to begin an investigation into whether Dwan's original claims constituted false reporting and other violations of departmental regulations. Nor was there anything unreasonable in placing him on administrative leave with pay pending this investigation even though this meant he was not eligible for extra duty which would have meant more pay. Administrative leave, for one reasonably suspected of serious misconduct, is a routine measure–here mitigated by continued pay. That Dwan suffered some disadvantage–as does any innocent citizen who is lawfully but mistakenly arrested–does not make it a constitutional violation. . . . Because the individual defendants did not violate Dwan's Fifth Amendment rights, the first prong of the Saucier inquiry is decisive in their favor. And, as to the second prong, a violation of the Fifth Amendment in these circumstances is not 'clearly established' or readily apparent. Whether a Fifth Amendment right exists in the 'abstract'–as it obviously does–is not the question. . . Thus, there is qualified immunity here even if we are wrong in finding that Dwan's constitutional rights were not violated.").

Suboh v. District Attorney's Office of the Suffolk District, 298 F.3d 81, 90, 93, 94 (1st Cir. 2002) ("The district court based its ruling on an abstract right to 'familial integrity' inherent in the substantive component of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . There is a danger in the use of broad abstract terms such as 'familial integrity'. The Supreme Court has warned against using generalized definitions of constitutional rights in the qualified immunity setting. . . . Articulating the right as one of 'familial integrity' casts too broad a net. The inquiry into whether a right is clearly established 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.' . . . The constitutional right at issue here is the right to procedural and substantive due process before the state takes a child away from his or her parent. . . . One tried and true way of determining whether this right was clearly established at the time the defendants acted, is to ask whether existing case law gave the defendants fair warning that their conduct violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . This inquiry encompasses not only Supreme Court precedent, but all available case law. . . A parent's liberty interest in the care and custody of her child was established long before the facts of this case arose. . . . We have no doubt that there is a clearly established constitutional right at stake, although we have found no case exactly on all fours with the facts of this case. The difference in contexts in which the right is discussed in the case law does not mean such a right does not exist.").

Hatch v. Dep't for Children, Youth and Their Families, 274 F.3d 12, 21-25 (1st Cir. 2001) ("The Court has not had occasion to formulate the contours of the constitutional rule under which a state official lawfully may take temporary custody of a child during an investigation of abuse or neglect, nor has this court dealt definitively with the issue. Other courts have grappled with it, however, and most of them have concluded that a case worker–we use that term generically–may place a child in temporary custody when he has evidence giving rise to a reasonable and articulable suspicion that the child has been abused or is in imminent peril of abuse. . . . . We hold . . . that the Constitution allows a case worker to take temporary custody of a child, without a hearing, when the case worker has a reasonable suspicion that child abuse has occurred (or, alternatively, that a threat of abuse is imminent). It follows, therefore, that a parent's right to the care, custody, and control of a minor child is inviolate unless a case worker has such a suspicion. In this instance, the appellant's complaint (though it unsuccessfully espouses a broader statement) sufficiently identifies this clearly established constitutional right. Thus, the appellant satisfies the first prong of the tripartite test. . . . We now must determine whether the contours of the constitutional right that we have identified–a parent's right to custody in the absence of a case worker's reasonable suspicion of child abuse–were clearly established at the time of the critical events. . . The appellant contends that the right here was sufficiently defined at the time of Brown's actions. Brown disagrees, maintaining that our previous decisions, e.g., Watterson, 987 F.2d at 8; Frazier, 957 F.2d at 930-31, highlight the amorphous nature of the constitutional interest involved and thus compel the conclusion that the contours of the right were not clearly established. The critical inquiry here is whether the dimensions of the right were sufficiently well-defined that a reasonable official would have understood that his actions violated that right. . . This does not mean that a court must already have outlawed similar conduct; the test is satisfied if, viewed in the light of preexisting jurisprudence, the unlawfulness of the conduct is apparent. . . . To determine the contours of a particular right at a given point in time, an inquiring court must look not only to Supreme Court precedent but to all available case law. . . . Several years elapsed between the dates on which Frazier and Watterson were decided and the date on which Brown took temporary custody of the appellant's son. During that interval, an emerging body of decisional law outside our own circuit has shed a brighter light on the contours of the constitutional right asserted by the appellant. Although our sister circuits have reached different conclusions on the constitutional standard to be applied when a state actor takes a child into temporary custody, those decisions share a common denominator: at an irreducible minimum, a case worker must have no less than a reasonable suspicion of child abuse (or imminent danger of abuse) before taking a child into custody prior to a hearing. . . . Recent district court decisions have hewed to the same line. . . Given the widespread agreement that has developed as to the applicable legal regime, we conclude that, in the spring of 2000, an objectively reasonable case worker surely would have believed that taking temporary custody of a child prior to a hearing would violate the parents' interest in the child's care, custody, and control if he acted without a reasonable suspicion of child abuse (actual or imminent). That conclusion has important implications for this case: since clearly established law gave reasonable warning to Brown that he risked liability for violating the appellant's constitutional rights if he took custody of John without a reasonable basis for his suspicions of child abuse, the appellant has survived the second step of our inquiry. . . . While the first two steps in the qualified immunity pavane deal with abstract legal principles, the final step deals with the facts of the particular case. The question here is whether Brown had reliable information, sufficient to support a reasonable suspicion of abuse, when he removed John from his father's custody. . . . We hold that the information known to Brown when he took temporary custody of John met both the qualitative and quantitative requirements of the reasonable suspicion standard. . . Consequently, the appellant falters at the third step of the qualified immunity inquiry.").

Davis v. Rennie, 264 F.3d 86, 114 (1st Cir. 2001) ("The question is whether it would be clear to a reasonable supervising nurse or mental health worker who saw another MHW use excessive force against a patient that he or she had a legal duty to intervene. . . . The cases involving police and prison guards clearly established at least the same duty for mental hospital staff at a state institution. . . . Nurse Wiegers's argument that she had no duty to intervene because Plesh, a security officer, was also present draws too fine a distinction between the facts here and existing case law. [citing Lanier] As we have said, Nurse Wiegers could have tried to stop Bragg by calling out rather than physically intervening. As Bragg's supervisor, she had the responsibility to do so, and it is reasonable to expect her to have known that.").

Brady v. Dill, 187 F.3d 104, 115 (1st Cir. 1999) ("To determine a defendant's eligibility for qualified immunity, courts must define the right asserted by the plaintiff at an appropriate level of generality and ask whether, so characterized, that right was clearly established when the harm-inducing conduct allegedly took place. . .This does not mean that a right is clearly established only if there is precedent of considerable factual similarity. . . It does mean, however, that the law must have defined the right in a quite specific manner, and that the announcement of the rule establishing the right must have been unambiguous and widespread, such that the unlawfulness of particular conduct will be apparent ex ante to reasonable public officials.")

Rivera-Ramos v. Roman, 156 F.3d 276, 279-81 (1st Cir. 1998) ("This court has made it crystal clear, on a number of occasions, that identifying some abstract constitutional right extant at the time of the alleged violation does not itself show that the conduct alleged is a violation of 'clearly established' law. Instead, the focus must be upon the particular conduct engaged in by (or attributed to) the defendants; immunity is forfeited only if a reasonable official would clearly understand that conduct to be a violation of the Constitution. The need to focus on specific facts is so well- settled that the issue need not be discussed further. . .The closest First Amendment precedents are Supreme Court cases, circa the 1960s, that involved government action taken against individuals because of their supposed radical political beliefs or associations. These cases involve employment as a school teacher or state-university faculty member, admission to the bar, and even nonsensitive work in a defense plant. These cases provide general language helpful to the plaintiffs, but none of them involves constitutional standards for the denial or revocation of a gun dealer license. Assuming that police officer defendants 'caused' the license revocation or weapons seizure, the Supreme Court cases as of 1969-70 clearly forbade such action based on anyone's general beliefs that Puerto Rico should have independence, or on their membership in organizations devoted to securing such independence by peaceful means. Conversely, we do not think that it would have been a violation of 'clearly established law' for police officers to have sought to deny or revoke a firearms dealer license to individuals who had expressed a commitment to violence and who were members of an organization that was reasonably perceived to be committed to violence. . . In sum, we conclude that the district court's denial of qualified immunity rested upon a mistakenly abstract view of what is clearly established law and that the case must be remanded for further consideration of the qualified immunity issue consistent with this opinion.").

Camilo-Robles v. Hoyos, 151 F.3d 1, 5, 6 (1st Cir. 1998) ("We have not had occasion to address the question whether, to be liable under section 1983, a supervisor must have violated an independent, 'clearly established' right, or whether a supervisor may be liable based only on his proximity to a subordinate's violation of a 'clearly established' right. Other circuits, however, have addressed this interplay between the 'clearly established' requirement and supervisory liability. We follow their lead and adopt an approach that comports with the core principle of qualified immunity by protecting supervisory officials from suit when they could not reasonably anticipate liability. When a supervisor seeks qualified immunity in a section 1983 action, the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is satisfied when (1) the subordinate's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by his subordinates in that context. . . . In other words, for a supervisor to be liable there must be a bifurcated 'clearly established' inquiry–one branch probing the underlying violation, and the other probing the supervisor's potential liability.").

See also Doan v. Bergeron, No. 15-CV-11725-IT, 2016 WL 5346935, at *8-9 (D. Mass. Sept. 23, 2016) ("When a plaintiff seeks to hold liable a defendant based on his supervisory role over others who allegedly violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights, the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is satisfied when (1) the subordinate's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by his subordinates in that context. In other words, for a supervisor to be liable there must be a bifurcated 'clearly established' inquiry—one branch probing the underlying violation, and the other probing the supervisor's potential liability. . . As to the first step of the 'clearly established' inquiry, the violations of Gallagher's subordinates—CPS and the Bristol County Sheriff's Office defendants—were violations of clearly established constitutional rights. Doan's right to be free from involuntary medication—implicated by the allegations that CPS defendants gave Doan Haldol even though she was incapable of giving informed consent and they did not have a court order to do so, . . . was clearly established, as the Supreme Court has stated that prisoners 'possess[ ] a significant liberty interest in avoiding the unwanted administration of antipsychotic drugs.'. . Doan's right to be free from harm—implicated by Gallagher's failure to protect Doan from the involuntary medication of Haldol—was also clearly established in Supreme Court case law. . . .As to the second step of the analysis, it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for the violations of his subordinates in this context, where Gallagher was alleged to have known about the constitutional violations. A supervisor can be liable for the actions of his subordinates if he or she 'is on notice' to 'ongoing violations' and 'fails to take corrective action.'. . Here, Doan has alleged that Gallagher was aware of the ongoing constitutional violations that she was suffering, had the power to alleviate those violations by relocating Doan, but failed to take corrective action. Gallagher relies on cases from other circuits holding that non-medical jail or prison officials such as Gallagher are entitled to rely on the expertise of medical personnel. See Arnett v. Webster, 658 F.3d 742, 755 (7th Cir. 2011) (stating that "if a prisoner is under the care of medical experts, a non-medical prison official will generally be justified in believing that the prisoner is in capable hands"); Spruill v. Gillis, 372 F.3d 218, 236 (3d Cir. 2004) (same). However, 'non-medical officials can be chargeable with ... deliberate indifference where they have a reason to believe (or actual knowledge) that prison doctors or their assistants are mistreating (or not treating) a prisoner.' Arnett, 658 F.3d at 755. This is what Doan alleges; that Gallagher knew that CPS was involuntarily medicating Doan and failed to take any corrective action. Accordingly, Gallagher is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.")

Roldan-Plumey v. Cerezo-Suarez, 115 F.3d 58, 65, 66 (1st Cir. 1997) ("In earlier political discrimination cases, we found defendants entitled to qualified immunity because their allegedly unconstitutional actions took place prior to the development of clearly established law in this area. [cites omitted] This case is different. Appellees discharged Roldan on May 6, 1994. The contours of the law regarding discharge based on party affiliation grew much clearer in the late 1980s and early 1990s. By 1993, this circuit had decided two waves of political discrimination cases. At the time appellees discharged Roldan, this circuit's law regarding discharge based on political discrimination was indeed clearly established. To be sure, the law may still be blurred around the edges. But this is not a borderline case. In determining entitlement to the qualified immunity defense in the political discrimination context, we look only to the inherent duties of a position and ask whether the defendant could reasonably believe the position in question was one that '"potentially concerned matters of partisan political interest and involved at least a modicum of policymaking responsibility, access to confidential information, or official communication."'").

Joyce v. Town of Tewksbury, 112 F.3d 19, 22 (1st Cir. 1997) (en banc) (per curiam) ("The Supreme Court cases, with Steagald at one pole and Santana at the other, do not definitively resolve our own case. Even a quick review of lower court cases reveals that there is no settled answer as to the constitutionality of doorway arrests. [citing cases] Circuit court precedent is also divided, with some decisions helpful to the police in this case and others less so. Given the unsettled state of the law, we have no hesitation in concluding that the officers in this case are protected by qualified immunity which protects public officials against section 1983 liability so long as they acted reasonably.").

Joyce v. Town of Tewksbury, 112 F.3d 19, 26 (1st Cir. 1997) (en banc) (Seyla, J., dissenting) ("In sum, I believe that the officers' entry into a third party's home in the absence of consent, a search warrant, or exigent circumstances plainly violated Steagald and thus violated the homeowner's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. [cite omitted] By hedging on this point, the en banc court not only denies the plaintiff her day in court but also invites the proliferation of such incidents. Since we will be seen as sanctioning that which we are unwilling to condemn, I respectfully dissent.").

Soto v. Flores, 103 F.3d 1056, 1065 (1st Cir. 1997) ("While this history would appear to militate in favor of finding that there is clearly established law in this area, in 1991 the First Circuit had not yet addressed the issue of state-created dangers. . . . Of course, a violation of clearly settled law may be found even where the Supreme Court and the circuit in question have not specifically addressed the question. . . However, we cannot extract a clearly established right from a somewhat confusing body of caselaw through the use of hindsight, or 'permit claims of qualified immunity to turn on the eventual outcome of a hitherto problematic constitutional analysis.'" citing Martinez-Rodriguez).

St. Hilaire v. City of Laconia, 70 F.3d 20, 27-28 (1st Cir. 1995) ("Plaintiff contends that in executing a search warrant, the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against 'unreasonable searches' requires the police to identify themselves as police and state their purpose. . . . It falls to the court to determine whether this right allegedly violated was 'clearly established' at the time of the incident. . . . Plaintiff relies on the Supreme Court's recent decision in Wilson v. Arkansas, 115 S.Ct. 1914 (1995), which held that the reasonableness of the search of a dwelling depended in part on whether law enforcement officers announced their presence and authority prior to entering, thus incorporating the common law 'knock and announce' rule into the Fourth Amendment. Assuming arguendo that the Wilson rule supports plaintiff's case, [footnote omitted] plaintiff's argument succeeds only if Wilson merely restated what was already clearly established constitutional law at the time of the shooting in 1990. . . . Plaintiff's argument fails because at the time of the shooting the notice requirement was not clearly of constitutional dimension.").

Martinez-Rodriguez v. Colon-Pizarro, 54 F.3d 980, 988 (1st Cir. 1995) ("When used in [qualified immunity] context, the phrase 'clearly established' has a well-defined meaning. It denotes that at the time the challenged conduct occurred the contours of the right were sufficiently plain that a reasonably prudent state actor would have realized not merely that his conduct might be wrong, but that it violated a particular constitutional right. The inquiry into the nature of a constitutional right for the purpose of ascertaining clear establishment seeks to discover whether the right was reasonably well settled at the time of the challenged conduct and whether the manner in which the right related to the conduct was apparent. In mounting this inquiry, courts may neither require that state actors faultlessly anticipate the future trajectory of the law. . .nor permit claims of qualified immunity to turn on the eventual outcome of . . . problematic constitutional analysis.")

Cohen v. City of Portland, No. 2:21-CV-00267-NT, 2022 WL 1406204, at *9–10 (D. Me. May 4, 2022) ("As the First Circuit has explained, 'judges must "not ... define clearly established law at a high level of generality" .... Rather, a "more particularized" inquiry is required.'. . Here, the Defendants define the right at issue in Irish as 'implicat[ing] police decisions that created a risk to a witness in criminal case,' whereas they define the right at issue in this case as 'involv[ing] police decisions as to how to carry out a rescue of a civilian who has waded into frigid waters after assaulting another person ... without endangering the lives of rescue personnel.'. . As the First Circuit has warned, however: [J]ust as a court can generalize too much, it can generalize too little. If it defeats the qualified-immunity analysis to define the right too broadly (as the right to be free of excessive force), it defeats the purpose of § 1983 to define the right too narrowly (as the right to be free of needless assaults by left-handed police officers during Tuesday siestas). Belsito Commc'ns, 845 F.3d at 23 n. 9 (quoting Hagans v. Franklin Cnty. Sheriff's Off., 695 F.3d 505, 508–09 (6th Cir. 2012)). To define the right at issue here so narrowly would arguably tread dangerously close to undermining the purpose of § 1983. Moreover, Irish itself does not support as limited a definition as the Defendants suggest. In Irish, the court emphasized that what was clearly established was the state-created danger theory itself, the doctrine holding 'that a state official may incur a duty to protect a plaintiff where the official creates or exacerbates a danger to the plaintiff.'. . And, as the Irish court clarified, even absent factually similar cases, 'a general proposition of law may clearly establish the violative nature of a defendant's actions, especially when the violation is egregious.'. . I am satisfied at this early stage in the litigation that Irish's general proposition of law clearly establishes the violative nature of Giroux's actions. Finally, the fact that officers violated state law or official procedure can lend support to a finding that a reasonable officer would have known the conduct violated constitutional rights. . . Although I do not know at this stage the policies and procedures of the Fire Department (Giroux's employer), I am hopeful that more discovery can shed light on this issue. The motion to dismiss Count X is denied.")

Baker v. Goodman, No. 2:19-CV-00251-JAW, 2022 WL 580471, at *26-31 (D. Me. Feb. 25, 2022) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, the question presented is whether a reasonable officer in Sgt. Goodman's position would have understood that he violated the Fourth Amendment by using deadly force against a seemingly intoxicated individual holding a gun who was approximately 114 feet away from the officer; who had been warned earlier to drop his gun and did not respond in any way to the warnings; had previously waved the weapon around but had not pointed it at the officers or members of the public, had not threatened anyone with the gun or made any sudden moves; remained in the same place throughout the duration of the event; and who was bent over, looking down, and facing away from the officer at the time he was shot. . . . In light of the case law available at the time of Mr. Baker's death, there was a 'controlling consensus' that under the circumstances, again viewed in the light most favorable to the nonmovants, Sgt. Goodman's exercise of force violated Mr. Baker's Fourth Amendment rights. Taking the evidence in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, it is 'clearly established' that it is unreasonable and in violation of the Fourth Amendment for an officer to fire on an armed, immobile person who is not using his weapon in a threatening manner. . . . Furthermore, a factfinder could reasonably conclude that the threat Mr. Baker posed at the moment he was shot did not justify the use of deadly force. Mr. Baker never threatened the officers or members of the public, he was not a suspect for the commission of any crimes, he was not engaged in any altercation with others, and members of the public were not attempting to get away from Mr. Baker. . . . In the absence of undisputed evidence that Mr. Baker threatened the officers or members of the public, Mr. Baker's possession of the weapon alone is not enough to justify Sgt. Goodman's use of deadly force. It is well established that 'the mere possession of a [deadly weapon] by a suspect is not enough to permit the use of deadly force.. .. Instead, deadly force may only be used by a police officer when, based on a reasonable assessment, the officer or another person is threatened with the weapon.'. . Although Sgt. Goodman repeatedly told Mr. Baker to put down his weapon, and Mr. Baker failed to respond in any way, such a failure to respond is not per se reasonable grounds for using deadly force when the plaintiff is intoxicated or experiencing a mental health event. . . Here, Sgt. Goodman was on notice that Mr. Baker appeared intoxicated, the record shows that Mr. Baker took a drink of alcohol prior to being shot, and Mr. Baker was standing in a hunched position which a jury could reasonably interpret as being consistent with intoxication. Both parties agree that at some point after Sgt. Goodman's arrival, but before Sgt. Goodman and Officer Knutson took up their position next to the pick-up truck, Mr. Baker was 'brandishing the rifle' and was holding the rifle with the barrel facing into the Subway restaurant. . . However, Mr. Baker later put the gun down against the wall of the Subway restaurant, and then subsequently picked it up again, at which point the parties dispute how Mr. Baker was holding the gun and where the barrel was pointed. . . Even if Sgt. Goodman had been justified in shooting Mr. Baker when the barrel of the gun was pointed into the restaurant, a reasonable factfinder could conclude that, upon picking up the gun once again, Mr. Baker was not holding it in a threatening manner (as discussed above) and, as a result, Sgt. Goodman was no longer justified in shooting Mr. Baker. . . Thus, it was clearly established at the time of Mr. Baker's death that Sgt. Goodman did not have license to shoot Mr. Baker if the perceived threat justifying deadly force had passed. . . . The Court does not diminish that Sgt. Goodman was faced with an unknown and potentially serious situation in a public place, and that Mr. Baker was carrying a weapon that looked like a rifle. The Court is also sensitive to the admonition of the United States Supreme Court that '[t]he calculus of reasonableness must embody allowance for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments - - in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving - - about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.'. .However, here the Court is not acting as a factfinder. Instead, on the record before the Court, and in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, 'Graham [v. Connor], supra and [Tennessee v.] Garner, [471 U.S. 1 (1985)] stand for the proposition that a person has a constitutional right not to be shot unless an officer reasonably believes that he poses a threat to the officer or someone else.'. . Here, the Plaintiffs have raised genuine issues of material fact that preclude a conclusion that at the time Sgt. Goodman shot him, Chance Baker posed such a threat. Although Sgt. Goodman subjectively believed that he, other officers, and the public were at risk, the Court must view the reasonableness of his use of force through an objective lens. . . Based on the Court's analysis and in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, it was clearly established at the time of Mr. Baker's death that Sgt. Goodman's action violated Mr. Baker's Fourth Amendment rights. Sgt. Goodman is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity. As the Court's analysis reveals, here 'the legal question of immunity turns on which version of the facts [the Court] accept[s]' which means that summary judgment is inappropriate.") enforcement until 1995. . . Where deliberate suppression is involved, however, the First Circuit has explained that '[t]here can be no doubt that, under the line of cases running from Mooney and Pyle to Brady, the law was firmly settled [by 1989] that a law enforcement officer may not deliberately suppress material evidence that is favorable to a defendant.'. .Because Plaintiff is asserting that Garvin, Roach, and Guillermo deliberately suppressed evidence, summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is inappropriate. It was clearly established by 1994 that police officers cannot deliberately suppress material evidence, and to the extent they acted deliberately, 'a reasonable officer in [their] position plainly would have appreciated the wrongfulness of his conduct.'. . Roach's, Guillermo's, and Garvin's arguments assume that the Bonifacio Report was not material because the crimes were not similar and that they had no duty to disclose such information. As explained above, however, questions of fact regarding the exculpatory nature of the report, as well as the other allegedly suppressed evidence which these defendants have not addressed, still remain. Accordingly, Garvin, Guillermo, and Roach are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Massachusetts ex rel. Powell v. Holmes, 546 F.Supp.3d 58, __ (D. Mass. 2021) ("More than thirty years ago, the First Circuit found that it had 'long been "clearly established" that due process safeguards must be afforded' when 'persons are deprived of property interests.' Amsden v. Moran, 904 F.2d 748, 752 (1st Cir. 1990) (citing Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693, 711 (1976); Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 569-70 (1972)). Indeed, Holmes and O'Connor offer no argument to the contrary. Furthermore, no reasonable officer would have understood that their conduct as alleged in the complaint—disposing of plaintiff's guns and other items without notice, opportunity to be heard, or adequate state-law remedies—would come close to satisfying due-process requirements.")

Weichel v. Town of Braintree, No. 1:20-CV-11456-IT, 2021 WL 1948096, at *6 (D. Mass. May 14, 2021) ("Although Whelan argues that the First Circuit did not recognize a malicious prosecution cause of action under the Fourth Amendment until 2013 and that this entitles him to qualified immunity, the question is not whether the cause of action existed but whether the alleged conduct was prohibited. As the court has determined that the law clearly established that the conduct underlying Weichel's malicious prosecution was prohibited, Whelan is not entitled to qualified immunity based on Weichel's allegations. The failure to intervene claim is a different matter. As the court noted, while the First Circuit has not limited failure-to-intervene claims, nor has it explicitly required officers to intervene—other than in excessive force cases—when an individual's constitutional rights are being violated. As a result, it was not clearly established in 1980 that Whelan had a duty to intervene, and he is therefore entitled to qualified immunity as to that claim.")

Bradley v. Cicero, No. CV 18-30039-MGM, 2021 WL 294286, at *4–5 (D. Mass. Jan. 28, 2021) ("Although the issue of qualified immunity is clearly waived, the court addresses the underlying merits because they relate to another asserted ground for a new trial, one based on erroneous jury instructions, which is discussed later. Defendants' argument rests on the state of the law regarding pat frisks under the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution and Article 14 of the Massachusetts Declaration of Rights, both of which protect against unreasonable searches and seizures. In a decision issued a month before trial in this case, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts noted its past articulations of the pat frisk standard had not always been clear, possibly causing confusion. Commonwealth v. Torres-Pagan, 138 N.E.3d 1012, 1016–17 (Mass. 2020). . . Defendants argue Torres-Pagan, then, stands for the fact that the particular pat frisk standard requiring reasonable belief a person is armed and dangerous (as opposed to reasonable concern for officer safety) was not clearly established at the time of the incident in August 2015, and qualified immunity applies to Defendants. Plaintiff argues any possible confusion could have been only with respect to the state law standard under Article 14, and not with respect to the federal law standard under the Fourth Amendment as articulated by the Supreme Court in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968). The court agrees that the federal standard for pat frisks was clearly established and controlled by Supreme Court precedent at the time of the incident. But, in addition, the court views the state law standard to have been clearly established notwithstanding the language in Torres-Pagan. The Supreme Judicial Court has consistently stated that the state standard is consistent with that of Terry. In 1969, the Supreme Judicial Court acknowledged in Commonwealth v. Matthews, 244 N.E.2d 908 (Mass. 1969) that a 'State is free to develop its own law of search and seizure to meet the needs of local law enforcement .... "It may not, however, authorize police conduct which trenches upon Fourth Amendment rights, regardless of the labels which it attaches to such conduct."'. . It recognized Terry requires a police officer to have reason to believe an individual is armed and dangerous in order to conduct a lawful pat frisk. . . And as it stated in Torres-Pagan, the Supreme Judicial Court never intentionally strayed from that standard. . . Furthermore, even when potential confusion was developing in state court decisions, the law as applied aligned with the federal standard of armed and dangerous. In the cases the Supreme Judicial Court calls out as inaccurately stating the standard, the analysis was still ultimately grounded in the question of a suspect being armed. . . . Although there have been a few Supreme Judicial Court which inaccurately stated the standard and the court appreciates Defendants' arguments regarding confusion, the court finds the law was clearly established at the time of the incident at issue here. Specifically, that law was that a pat frisk is unconstitutional without an officer's reasonable belief a person is armed and dangerous as set out in Terry, the state standard follows the federal standard and, moreover, the state standard is necessarily constrained by the limits of what is permissible under the Federal Constitution.")

Nasir v. Town of Foxborough, No. 19-CV-11196-DJC, 2020 WL 1027780, at *7-8 (D. Mass. Mar. 3, 2020) ("[T]the First Circuit has recognized that the 'scope and boundaries of the community caretaking exception [to the warrant requirement] are nebulous' and thus police action pursuant to the function may permit a finding of qualified immunity. MacDonald v. Town of Eastham, 745 F.3d 8, 14 (1st Cir. 2014). Nevertheless, the Nasirs' Section 1983 claim survives because although the Officers' entry into the home and detention of the Nasirs may be protected by qualified immunity—or is otherwise unactionable, . . . the Officers' participation in an unlawful taking is not. Qualified immunity protects officers assigned to a civil standby in monitoring a private repossession where the reasonable officer in his position would not have known that his action constituted invalid participation in a taking. . . As such, where officers, without a court order, participate in the repossession of property whose ownership is in dispute, they are entitled to qualified immunity when they are presented evidence of ownership and/or otherwise conduct and investigation so as to support a reasonable belief that the taking was lawful. . . . As alleged here, the Nasirs repeatedly objected to Ansari-Nasir and her family's removal of certain items. . . and immediately tried to report stolen items after the incident. . . . [I]n face of an active dispute of ownership, in the absence of a court order. . . and without extrinsic evidence supporting one party's claim to property over others'—it was unreasonable for the Officers to believe they were participating in a lawful repossession.")

Allende v. Comm'r, New Hampshire Dep't of Corr., No. 19-CV-208-JD, 2019 WL 5905818, at *4 (D.N.H. Nov. 12, 2019) ("The Second Circuit long ago recognized the First Amendment right of Rastafarian prisoners to wear their hair in dreadlocks. See Benjamin v. Coughlin, 905 F.2d 572, 576-77 (2d Cir. 1990); Michel v. Manna, 2017 WL 1381859, at *4 (N.D.N.Y. Jan. 17, 2017) (Rastafarian prisoner's right to wear dreadlocks clearly established). Other courts, however, have not recognized that right. See Luther v. White, 2019 WL 511795, at *13 (W.D. Ky. Feb. 8, 2019) (citing cases and holding that it was not clearly established in January of 2017 that prison grooming standards banning dreadlocks violated the free exercise clause of the First Amendment). In December of 2012, the Tenth Circuit considered whether it was clearly established that a prison grooming policy, which required hair to be able to be combed out, would violate First Amendment free exercise rights. Stewart v. Beach, 701 F.3d 1322, 1333 (10th Cir. 2012). The Tenth Circuit concluded that the law was unsettled and, therefore, not clearly established. There is no Supreme Court case or First Circuit case on point. In 2011, the First Circuit held that enforcement of the New Hampshire State Prison's policy restricting facial hair did not violate the free exercise clause of the First Amendment. Kuperman v. Wrenn, 645 F.3d 69, 77 (1st Cir. 2011). Given the state of the law in March of 2017, it was not clearly established that enforcement of the New Hampshire State Prison's hair grooming policy would violate a prisoner's First Amendment free exercise right. The defendants sued in their individual capacities in Claim One are entitled to qualified immunity and the claim is dismissed.")

Taylor v. Moore, 383 F.Supp.3d 91, __ (D. Mass. 2019) ("The parties provide dueling First Circuit cases as to whether it was clearly established at the time of the incident, in 2014, that Moore's single use of a taser when a subject refused to be handcuffed violated Taylor's constitutional rights. Taylor relies primarily on Parker v. Gerrish, which the First Circuit decided in 2008. . . .The First Circuit held then 'that the police officer could be found to have violated the Fourth Amendment by tasing an unarmed suspect who, in the course of an arrest, "present[ed] no significant active resistance or threat" at the time of the tasing.'. .Defendants argue that Parker is inapplicable to the present case, and that the First Circuit's recent decision in Gray v. Cummings should guide the Court. . . . On these facts, the First Circuit held that a reasonable jury could find it was an excessive use of force for an officer to use a taser once, in drive-stun mode, to quell a nonviolent, mentally ill individual who was resisting arrest. . . However, the court granted the officer qualified immunity, reasoning that '[b]ased on the body of available case law, ... an objectively reasonable police officer in May of 2013 could have concluded that [his actions], did not violate the Fourth Amendment.'. . In distinguishing Parker, the court stated that Gray was 'a horse of quite a different hue' because there was 'no indication [in Gray] that [the patient], despite ample opportunity to do so, ever complied with [the officer's] command to put her hands behind her back.'. . Whereas in Parker, it appeared as if the plaintiff was in the process of complying by releasing his wrist to be cuffed, in Gray, '[e]ven when [the officer] warned [the patient] that she would be tased, she did not comply but, rather, continued cursing and told him to "do it."'. . Defendants argue Gray indicates Moore would have not known in 2014 that his use of a taser on Taylor violated her Fourth Amendment rights. . . But in so arguing, Defendants fail to view the totality of the facts in the light most favorable to Taylor. Defendants assert that even on the ground, Taylor was resisting arrest and refused to put her flailing hands behind her back, while Taylor states that she could not comply because she was unable to move while prone, on the street, with Moore's knee pinned on her back in a full body mount. Moreover, she claims Moore used excessive force when he 'slammed' her body to the ground and then repeatedly pushed her head into the ground, causing a concussion, even after she agreed to do whatever Moore wanted. These are exactly the kind of fact disputes meant for trial. Additionally, the record indicates that Moore simply told Taylor to 'shut up' or be tased, but tasing someone for 'insolence' qualifies as a clearly established constitutional violation under Parker, while tasing someone for failing to comply with a direct order to put her hands behind her back shields Moore from liability under Gray. Finally, it was clearly established in 2010 that 'slamming' a slightly built, non-violent drunk driver into the ground when she was not given an opportunity to submit is a constitutional violation. . . Because of the unresolved factual disputes regarding Moore's use of force, the claim of qualified immunity is denied without prejudice to its being reasserted at trial after resolution of factual questions. . . The Court denies Defendants' motion for summary judgment on Count I.") Abdul-Hasib v. National Railroad Passenger Corp., No. CV 18-10933-RGS, 2019 WL 2266870, at *3 (D. Mass. May 28, 2019) ("As the Supreme Court has reminded us, because of the fact-intensive nature of the inquiry, when it comes to excessive force claims, the qualified immunity doctrine does have special bite. . . Seizing on this caution, defendants, citing Kisela, argue that Officer Smith is entitled to qualified immunity. However, Kisela and Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 311 (2015) (per curiam) (cited in Kisela), are cases involving the use of deadly force and have little relevance to this garden variety excessive force claim. It is true that to defeat a claim of qualified immunity, the precedent invoked 'must be clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply.'. . The case that comes the closest to providing support for Officer Smith is City of Escondido v. Emmons, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503 (2019) (per curiam) (finding no clearly established rule prohibiting the 'takedown' of a person engaged in the misdemeanor offense of resisting a police officer). However, the issue here is not the takedown of Abdul-Hasib, but what happened next. In the context of this case, it has long been clear that there is no justification for the use of disproportionate force by police in the course of making a routine arrest. That a genuine dispute of fact exists over the amount of force used by Officer Smith to restrain Abdul-Hasib once he was pinned to the ground is enough to preserve the excessive force claims under § 1983 and the MCRA.")

Doe on behalf of B.G. v. Boston Public Schools, No. 17-CV-11653-ADB, 2019 WL 1005498, at *7 (D. Mass. Mar. 1, 2019) ("Plaintiff correctly points out that the right to bodily integrity is clearly established, and it is beyond dispute that, by October 2014, a consensus of persuasive authority clearly established that state officials could be held liable where they affirmatively and with deliberate indifference placed an individual in danger that he or she would not otherwise have faced. . . The Supreme Court, however, instructs that ' "clearly established law" should not be defined "at a high level of generality."'. . While qualified immunity does not require 'a case directly on point' for law to be clearly established, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . As discussed supra, the constitutional violation adequately pleaded is that, by delaying or suppressing the filing of 51A Reports concerning sexual assaults perpetuated on minor children, Gavins was deliberately indifferent to acts of sexual assault perpetrated on B.G. and A.R. by A.J. in violation of their substantive due process right to bodily integrity. Gavins would not be entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable school principal, between October 2014 and October 2016, would have known that delaying or suppressing the filing of 51A Reports was deliberately indifferent in the situations that she encountered. The Court finds that, irrespective of whether the conduct alleged is reprehensible or the harm tragic, Plaintiffs have not met their burden to show that the existing case law clearly established that the conduct at issue violated B.G.'s and A.R.'s constitutional rights. . . . While 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances,' . . . as discussed supra, the First Circuit has never found the state-created danger theory applicable to any specific set of facts, let alone in the context of peer-on-peer harassment. Further, Plaintiffs have not set forth, and this Court has been unable to identify, a consensus of persuasive authority establishing, beyond debate, that Gavins' actions were clearly unconstitutional at the time that B.G. and A.R. were victimized. Thus, although common sense and professional ethics might seem sufficient to establish that a school principal should have known not to delay or suppress the filing of 51A Reports, the law requires more. More specifically, to deny Gavins the protections of qualified immunity, the Court must find that prohibition to be clearly set forth in existing case law. Because the Court has been unable to find a consensus of authority establishing that affirmative acts by school officials that lead to or enhance the danger of peer-on-peer sexual assault violate students' due process right to bodily integrity, the Court must find that she is entitled to qualified immunity and dismiss Count I on that basis.")

Quinn v. US Prisoner Transport Inc., No. 2:18-CV-00149-DBH, 2019 WL 257980, at *11-13 (D. Me. Jan. 17, 2019) ("Decisions related to the conditions under which a prisoner is transported as part of the extradition process are not discretionary decisions within the scope of absolute immunity afforded prosecutors. . . .In this case, Defendant allegedly chose to use private contractors to transport Plaintiff, rather than public employees. Although there are few cases that directly address public officials' screening, training, and supervisory duties with respect to contractors, as opposed to employees, the lack of a specific case involving a public official's responsibility for a private contractor's alleged constitutional deprivations during the transport of prisoners is not dispositive of the qualified immunity issue. . . At the time the Transport Defendants transported Plaintiff to Maine, the law was clearly established that Transport Defendants' alleged conduct was in violation of Plaintiff's constitutional protections. In fact, at this stage of the proceedings, Defendant does not challenge Plaintiff's assertion that the Transport Defendants' performance was constitutionally deficient. The central question as to Defendant Robinson is whether the law was clearly established that a governmental official, such as Defendant Robinson, alleged to be involved in the transport decision, is absolved of responsibility for assuring that during transport, the treatment of the prisoners satisfied basic constitutional requirements, by simply contracting with a third-party to transport the prisoners, without an assessment of and regardless of the quality of the services provided by the third-party. . . . [T]he law was clearly established at the time of Plaintiff's transport to Maine, a government official responsible for the safety and well-being of prisoners, cannot abdicate that responsibility by contracting with a third-party. Necessarily, therefore, if a government official is aware or obviously should have been aware that the third-party's practices present a genuine risk of a constitutional deprivation, but the official does not take readily available measures to mitigate the risk, the government official can be legally responsible for the deprivation. Plaintiff has alleged such facts in this case. Contrary to Defendant's argument, therefore, the relevant law was clearly established at the time Plaintiff was transported to Maine.")

Cosenza v. City of Worcester, Massachusetts, No. CV 18-10936-TSH, 2019 WL 78997, at *7–12 & n.5 (D. Mass. Jan. 2, 2019) ("[T]he First Circuit has instructed that 'where the answer to the first prong of the immunity question may depend on the further development of the facts, it may be wise to avoid the first step.'. . . Accordingly, I will begin my assessment of the qualified immunity question with the second prong of the analysis. The Supreme Court has explicitly held that unduly suggestive identification proceedings resulting in an unreliable identification of the criminal defendant violate due process. . . . Several courts have found police not entitled to immunity after utilizing suggestive procedures that precure false identifications. [collecting cases] Thus, I find that the first aspect of the second prong is met—it was clearly established at the time Plaintiff's investigation took place that he was constitutionally protected against unduly suggestive identification procedures. Plaintiff argues because it was clearly established that unnecessarily suggestive identification procedures were unconstitutional at the time of Plaintiff's case, our job is done for the purposes of this motion. 'This formulation of the inquiry, however, is not sufficiently specific. An affirmative answer to [whether Plaintiff was protected against unduly suggestive identification procedures], though accurate, would state an abstract principle of law, disassociated from the facts of the case.'. . Indeed, the second aspect of the prong requires this Court to inquire whether a reasonable defendant would have understood whether his particular conduct violated Plaintiff's rights. In other words, would a reasonable officer had known the identification procedures allegedly utilized were unduly suggestive. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Thus, the dispositive question is 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. .Under this second aspect, I again find that Plaintiff's right was clearly established. Defendants argue that their identification procedures were only found unnecessarily suggestive by the Superior Court based on new state procedures promulgated after Plaintiff's conviction and not clearly established constitutional precedent. It follows, according to Defendants that there was no clearly established law to put Defendants on notice that their conduct was unlawful. Further, Plaintiff has not cited, nor has this court identified, any case that would deem the identification procedures utilized in Plaintiff's case unnecessarily suggestive under federal law. . . However, Plaintiff alleges in his Amended Complaint that 'during the identification procedure, when conferring with M.H. about Plaintiff's photograph, Defendants Hazelhurst and Doherty told M.H. Plaintiff's name, and they told her that he lived in her complex.'. . In addition, 'Defendants Hazelhurst and Doherty suggested to M.H. that she should identify Plaintiff as her attacker during the identification procedure.' . . While the Court is unaware of any caselaw explicitly holding this type of procedure is unnecessarily suggestive, the First Circuit has held that when an officer's conduct is so clearly unconstitutional, no precedent directly on point is necessary to provide adequate notice to a reasonable officer. . . I find that the coerciveness of Defendants' suggestion that M.H. identify Plaintiff so patently evident that a reasonable officer should have been on notice that it was unlawful. Thus, it was clearly established that the unnecessarily suggestive identification procedures were unconstitutional at the time of Plaintiff's conviction. Further, it is patently obvious that a reasonable officer would have understood that the practices utilized by Defendants fell within the scope of this proscribed conduct. Therefore, Defendants are not shielded from liability by qualified immunity. . . . Defendants argue that the caselaw demonstrates Plaintiff's right was not clearly established and they are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. However, the courts in Rodriguez-Mateo and Echavarria focused their attention on whether the cause of action and not the underlying right was clearly established. I respectfully disagree with the reasoning of those courts as the relevant inquiry is whether the underlying right was clearly established at the time of Plaintiff's malicious prosecution. As the court in Davis v. Murphy recognized, 'there is a difference between articulating a precise cause of action that a plaintiff may bring and establishing that certain conduct violates the Constitution.' 2018 WL 1524532, at *9 (D. Mass. Mar. 28, 2018); see also King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 580 n.4 (6th Cir. 2017) (distinguishing 'recognition of § 1983 claims from ... articulation of whether a given right is clearly established ' (emphasis in original)); Fields v. Wharrie, 740 F.3d 1107, 1114 (7th Cir. 2014) ('[W]hen the question is whether to grant immunity to a public employee, the focus is on his conduct, not on whether that conduct gave rise to a tort in a particular case.'). Accordingly, I must assess whether Plaintiff's right to be free from malicious prosecution was clearly established in 2000. I find that it was. . . .Defendants' again argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity. According to Defendants, a claim for failure to intervene has been clearly established in the context of an excessive use of force but not for failure to intervene in a different due process violation. Defendants are correct that 'First Circuit cases have primarily, if not exclusively, concerned allegations of failure to intervene in the excessive force context.'. . On the other hand, the First Circuit has not 'explicitly limit[ed] failure-to-intervene claims to excessive force cases' and 'occasionally described actionable failure to intervene claims in terms that could encompass a broad range of constitutional rights.'. . Plaintiff again contends that Defendants' reasoning circumvents the relevant inquiry. In Plaintiff's view, a failure to intervene claim is merely a pathway to liability. According to Plaintiff, the relevant inquiry is whether the underlying right was clearly established. As discussed above, Plaintiffs underlying constitutional rights that were allegedly violated were indeed clearly established at the time of his prosecution. The First Circuit, however, seems to have suggested that the duty to intervene in the context at issue must have also been clearly established. In Torres-Rivera, for instance, the First Circuit held that an officer was not entitled to qualified immunity in the excessive force context that 'the law was clearly established in 1998 that an officer in O'Neill's circumstances had a duty to intervene.'. . This language implies that not only must the underlying right be clearly established but also the duty for an officer to intervene in the relevant circumstances. . . Therefore, like the court in Echavarria, I find that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to intervene claim in a constitutional violation because that violation was not the excessive use of force. . . . It may seem inconsistent that the Court finds qualified immunity unavailable to Defendants for Plaintiff's malicious prosecution claim but available here. In both circumstances, Plaintiff rightly argued that an underlying, and clearly established constitutional right was violated. For Plaintiff's malicious prosecution claim, however, what was missing was merely the cause of action. Thus, a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct violated Plaintiff's rights. In the context of the failure to intervene, however, not only was a pathway to liability potentially absent but also a clearly established duty to intervene. Therefore, it would not be sufficiently clear to a reasonable officer that his omission in failing to intervene would constitute a violation of Plaintiff's clearly established underlying right.")

Davis v. Murphy, No. 13-CV-11900-IT, 2018 WL 1524532, at *9 (D. Mass. Mar. 28, 2018) ("Qualified immunity focuses on the particular conduct at issue. If courts have held 'certain conduct is a constitutional violation under facts not distinguishable in a fair way from the facts presented in the case at hand, the officer would not be entitled to qualified immunity based simply on the argument that courts had not agreed on one verbal formulation of the controlling standard.' Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 204, 202-203 (2001). This means there is a difference between articulating a precise cause of action that a plaintiff may bring and establishing that certain conduct violates the Constitution. See King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 580 n.4 (6th Cir. 2017) (distinguishing "recognition of § 1983 claims from . . . articulation of whether a given right is clearly established"); see also Estate of Booker v. Gomez, 745 F.3d 405, 428 (10th Cir. 2014) (holding right to be free from excessive force was clearly established despite uncertainty about whether claim arose under Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, or Fourteenth Amendment). While courts have struggled at times to identify the precise cause of action for malicious prosecution, it has long been established that a police officer violates the Constitution by intentionally or recklessly making false statements in, or omitting true exculpatory statements from, materials submitted to a magistrate in support of probable cause. See Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154, 171 (1978). Hernandez-Cuevas recognized that no reasonable officer 'would have been ignorant of the fact that fabricating evidence was constitutionally unacceptable.'. . As of 2004, the First Circuit had held that it is 'self-evident' that 'those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from deliberately fabricating evidence and framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.'. . Such conduct did not first become unconstitutional in 2004. Limone even held that 'the right not to be framed by law enforcement agents was clearly established in 1967.'. . 'The "dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted."' Hernandez v. Mesa, 137 S. Ct. 2003, 2007 (2017) (per curiam) (quoting Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202 (2001)). Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Davis, McManus knew Sheridan was setting up Davis and even watched this setup occur on video. Then, despite knowing Sheridan's narrative was false, McManus presented it to a magistrate to secure a criminal complaint and to a grand jury to secure an indictment. If these facts are true, no reasonable officer in 2010 would think such conduct was lawful. Of course, it remains in dispute whether this is what occurred. A jury could find McManus did not act with such knowledge or recklessness. But McManus has not shown that, as a matter of law, his conduct did not violate a clearly established right. Accordingly, he is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

"Mere violations of state law do not, of course, create constitutional claims."'. . Where, as here, Plaintiff has failed to satisfy her burden to identify controlling or persuasive precedent that clearly established the constitutional right to equal protection she claims was violated by the individual defendants, they are protected by qualified immunity.") Echavarria v. Roach, No. 16-CV-11118-ADB, 2017 WL 3928270, at *8, *11 (D. Mass. Sept. 7, 2017) ("The individual defendants also contend that the malicious prosecution claim is barred by qualified immunity, and they appear to be correct. In Hernandez-Cuevas v. Taylor, the First Circuit chronicled the long history of cases that addressed whether the Constitution affords a right to be free from malicious prosecution. . . The court went on to hold that the Fourth Amendment guarantees the right to be free from malicious prosecution, and thus 'ma[de] explicit what has long been implicit in our case law.'. . Prior to the Hernandez-Cuevas decision, the First Circuit had described it as an ' "open question whether the Constitution permits the assertion of a section 1983 claim for malicious prosecution on the basis of an alleged Fourth Amendment violation,"' and accordingly, held that '[s]uch uncertainty in the legal landscape entitles state actors to qualified immunity.'. . Since the Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution was not clearly established until 2013, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from Plaintiff's § 1983 claim that Defendants engaged in malicious prosecution of him in violation of his constitutional rights in or before 1996. . . . Defendant Cooney additionally implies that he is entitled to qualified immunity from the failure to intervene claim because the right was not clearly established in cases not involving excessive force. Plaintiff responds that failure to intervene is a pathway to liability, not the underlying constitutional violation, and it is the constitutional right itself that must be clearly established at the time of the deprivation. While this theory has its merits, the First Circuit has reasoned in the excessive force context that 'the law was clearly established in 1998 that' an officer who was a bystander 'had a duty to intervene' where another officer was using excessive force. . . Thus, it appears that the duty to intervene itself must be clearly established. . . . As discussed supra, within the First Circuit, it remains uncertain whether an officer has a duty to intervene in cases that do not concern excessive force. Accordingly, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the failure to intervene claim.")

Thomas v. Town of Chelmsford, No. 16-11689-PBS, 2017 WL 3159979, at *14–15 (D. Mass. July 25, 2017) ("In recent years, the Supreme Court has published a number of per curiam reversals of denials of qualified immunity, emphasizing that 'clearly established law' should not be defined 'at a high level of generality.'. . While it does not require 'a case directly on point' for law to be clearly established, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The question is 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,'. . . and it must be answered 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition[.] . . .Two constitutional violations adequately pleaded against the individual defendants are: (1) violation of the First Amendment by public school teachers by singling out and mocking a student in front of a class, giving him an unjustifiably low grade, or giving him mean looks on multiple occasions in retaliation for that student having previously made a report of student-on-student sexual assault, and (2) violation of the First Amendment by public school administrators by ignoring a student's reports of bullying by other students and teachers, in retaliation for that student having previously made a report of student-on-student sexual assault. With respect to the first theory, the case law is clear that the teachers' harassment against a student in retaliation for reporting a sexual assault is impermissible retaliation in violation of the student's First Amendment rights. See, e.g., Seamons v. Snow, 84 F.3d 1226, 1238–39 (10th Cir. 1996) (holding that student's reporting of sexual hazing was entitled to First Amendment protection, and school officials were not entitled to qualified immunity when they punished him by throwing him off the football team). The second theory is harder because the parties have cited no case law directly on point that supports the theory that deliberate indifference by school officials to sexual harassment and bullying by fellow students can be a retaliatory adverse action under the First Amendment. In other words, it is not clear under the existing case law whether inaction can be an adverse action rising to the level of retaliation in violation of the First Amendment. Accordingly, the Court finds that qualified immunity applies to the claim that Dean Doherty, Superintendent Tiano, Principal Caliri, and A.D. Moreau engaged in First Amendment retaliation against Matthew by taking no action in response to his complaints about harassment by other students. The Court denies qualified immunity for the claim that Siragusa, Kender, and Cole engaged in First Amendment retaliation against Matthew by themselves harassing Matthew following the Camp Robindel incident.")

Goodhile v. Gribbons, 186 F. Supp. 3d 4, 13 (D. Mass. 2016) ("As explained above, the facts present a colorable claim that Gribbons violated Mr. Goodhile's constitutional rights by using unreasonable force. The issue is whether the legal contours of the right were sufficiently clear, and whether the violation would have been clear to a reasonable officer under the circumstances. . . The pertinent question in this regard is whether prior existing case law or general Fourth Amendment principles gave Gribbons notice that it was unconstitutional for a police officer to repeatedly strike an unresponsive seventy-six-year-old man who was holding a sheathed knife and who had not been accused of committing a crime. . . The First Circuit has held that a reasonable officer who has been trained on a use-of-force continuum does not need prior case law on point to recognize that it is unconstitutional to use substantial force on an individual who does not pose a significant threat. . .Here, Gribbons was operating with the benefit of a use-of-force protocol to be applied to situations involving resisting suspects. This policy provided guidance for reasonable behavior and cited to Graham v. Connor, . . . the case in which the Supreme Court established the applicable standard for Fourth Amendment excessive force claims. According to the policy, an officer is not entitled to use a baton on a suspect unless the suspect is assaultive, meaning that the suspect is engaged in behavior that is 'likely to result in bodily harm to the member, to others at the scene or to the suspect himself.'. . Considering the facts as alleged by Plaintiff, Gribbons's conduct departed from this standard. Accordingly, he is not entitled to qualified immunity. Thus, I find that Gribbons is not entitled to summary judgment on count III. Based on the record before me, a rational jury could conclude that Gribbons's conduct was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances, in violation of Mr. Goodhile's Fourth Amendment rights. A jury could further find that a sensible officer would have known that his behavior was unreasonable and in violation of applicable law.")

Sanchez v. Mitchell, No. CV 16-10415-LTS, 2016 WL 6780289, at *2 (D. Mass. Nov. 15, 2016) ("Sanchez's damages claims against Defendants in their individual capacities fail to overcome qualified immunity. . . .Here, the law has not been clearly established that Defendants cannot restrict an inmate's access to a religious diet under the First Amendment. The First Circuit has not spoken. Cases from other circuits indicate that reasonable restrictions on an inmate's access to religious diets are acceptable, particularly where the inmate has not complied with procedures that call into question the sincerity of his belief. . . Additionally, the law has not been clearly established that Defendants cannot restrict an inmate's access to a religious diet under RLUIPA. Other courts have recognized that the law in this area is not well settled and that courts have disagreed on what RLUIPA requires. . . In short, '[i]t seems unlikely that claims on the current theory of denial of a religious diet due to claimed disciplinary infractions would be considered a violation of a clearly established right, particularly since this is a claim that appears to be the subject of an emerging circuit split.' Denson v. Gelb, Civ. A. No. 14-14317-DPW, 2015 WL 4271481, at *3 (D. Mass. July 13, 2015). Thus, Sanchez's claims for monetary damages against Defendants in their individual capacities fail.")

Mattei v. Dunbar, 217 F.Supp.3d 367, 379-81 (D. Mass. 2016) ("[W]hile there is not First Circuit law on point, other circuits have recognized that the denial of good-time credits can form the basis of a retaliation claim under § 1983 when done in retaliation for the exercise of constitutional rights. . . Finally, prior to the alleged retaliatory act, it was also well-established that mere threats of retaliation can violate First Amendment rights. . . . Thus, a reasonable official would have understood that soliciting another inmate to physically harm Mattei in retaliation for filing grievances violated his First Amendment rights even though no actual physical harm resulted. . . .The First Circuit has not yet directly addressed the question whether § 1997e(e) precludes compensatory damages in § 1983 actions raising constitutional claims. . . However, most circuits have held that § 1997e(e) does apply to § 1983 actions alleging constitutional violations, so that Mattei cannot recover damages for mental or emotional injuries resulting from constitutional violations absent a showing of physical injury. . . Because the statutory language '[n]o Federal civil action'—does not allow for exceptions, this Court concludes that § 1997e(e) precludes compensatory damages for mental and emotional injuries absent a showing of physical injury, regardless of whether the claims at issue are of a constitutional nature or not. Mattei, therefore, cannot recover compensatory damages for mental or emotional injuries suffered as a result of his alleged First Amendment violation. That, however, does not end the inquiry. Section 1997e(e) does not preclude either nominal damages or punitive damages. . . Nominal damages are appropriate to vindicate certain constitutional rights absent any showing of actual injury. . . In other words, nominal damages vindicate the deprivation of a constitutional right itself, not any specific injury suffered as a result. Thus, nominal damages are not claims for mental or emotional injury and are therefore not barred by § 1997e(e). Punitive damages, too, are unrelated to claims for mental or emotional injury. . . Claims for punitive damages are premised on the nature of the constitutional violations itself rather than on the nature of the injury inflicted. Such claims serve to punish and deter egregious constitutional violations; they are not claims based on mental or emotional injury and are therefore no precluded by § 1997e(e). . . Thus, to the extent Mattel's pro se complaint can be read to include requests for nominal and punitive damages, he may be legally entitled to relief.")

Holloman v. Clarke, No. 14-12594-NMG, 2016 WL 5339721, at *2–3 (D. Mass. Sept. 22, 2016) ("[C]ases before 2012, when the conduct here allegedly occurred, clearly establish that an officer has a duty to intervene when another officer uses excessive force against a pretrial detainee. . . Even though the Supreme Court held in 2015 that the Fourteenth Amendment objective standard applies to pretrial detainees in excessive force cases, both the Fourteenth Amendment and the standard for failure to intervene turn on the reasonableness of the circumstances. As a result, the standard was clearly established in 2012. . . Because Holloman has alleged a constitutional violation that was clearly established at the time of the alleged conduct of Ferrarra and Maine, they are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Doe v. Town of Wayland, 179 F.Supp.3d 155, 170-71 (D. Mass. 2016) ("Following the Supreme Court's admonition in Mullenix, the Court examines whether Moskowitz-Dodyk's particular conduct regarding her repeated encouragement of a friendship between Coe and Philip violated John's constitutional rights, as clearly established between 1998 and 2000. Without ascending to too-high levels of abstraction, the First Circuit's most apposite discussion of the state-created danger doctrine was the 1999 case Hasenfus, in particular its discussion of the factually-similar Armijo. And the same dicta which enabled this Court to hold that John suffered a constitutional rights violation also provides enough flexibility to preclude finding sufficient clarity to overcome Moskowitz-Dodyk's qualified immunity. Hasenfus specifically mentioned that 'the facts in [Armijo] go a step beyond the typical endangerment cases cited by the Tenth Circuit, cases that involve manifestly outrageous behavior by the authorities certain to cause harm.'. . This distinguishing of Armijo from 'typical endangerment cases,' combined with the expressed equivocation on Armijo's correctness, . . . underscore, at least within the First Circuit between 1998 and 2000, that the law did not clearly establish that Moskowitz-Dodyk acted unconstitutionally towards John. A reasonable officer could read that portion of Hasenfus and conclude that Moskowitz-Dodyk's conduct was not unlawful. . . . In opposition, John first argues that, for several decades, courts have recognized a right to bodily integrity, that sexual abuse infringes this right, and that state-created dangers may violate the Fourteenth Amendment. . . As discussed, however, these broad statements discuss Fourteenth Amendment rights at too high a level of generality. . . John next cites Billingsley v. Franklin Area Sch. Dist., C.A. No. 11-160, 2012 WL 259992 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 27, 2012) as an example of a court denying qualified immunity when a defendant "gave a known perpetrator of sexual abuse access to" the victim plaintiff. . . However, Billingsley relied exclusively on Third Circuit case law, and thus did not face anything similar to Hasenfus's ambiguous dicta. . . Accordingly, it has little persuasive value here.)

Morse v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts Executive Office of Pub. Safety Dep't of State Police, 123 F.Supp.3d 179, (D. Mass. 2015) ("A reasonable juror could conclude that seizing Charles Morse at gunpoint and detaining Lesa Morse with handcuffs was unreasonable under the circumstances. . . Nonetheless, the Court finds that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim because Plaintiffs' rights, in the context of this specific case, were not clearly established. . . . Charles Morse's asserted right is the right to not be handcuffed at gunpoint while under arrest for serious crimes. Lesa Morse's asserted right is the right of an innocent bystander to not be handcuffed while officers effect the arrest of another individual in the residence. Yet Plaintiffs cite no cases that would have given Defendants clear notice that the specific type of force used against each Plaintiff was unconstitutional, and the Court is aware of none. To the contrary, case law suggests that aiming guns at Morse during his arrest at least arguably fell within the realm of reasonableness. . . Lesa Morse was handcuffed by Sergeant Cloutier due to concerns about officer safety after she began yelling and did not obey commands to hang up the phone. . . Again, cases suggest that such a use of force was at least arguably reasonable. . . Accordingly, the Court must apply qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' excessive force claim. . . The Court underscores that this finding applies only to the use of force employed by Defendants after they entered the home, which Plaintiffs assert gives rise to a constitutional violation independent from the warrantless entry and arrest. For the reasons stated above, Plaintiffs' claims of a Fourth Amendment violation will survive summary judgment based on the warrantless entry and arrest."), aff'd on other grounds, 2017 WL 3667648 (1st Cir. Aug. 25, 2017)

Johnson v. Han, No. CV 14-CV-13274-IT, 2015 WL 4397360, at *6-8 (D. Mass. July 17, 2015) ("O'Brien further argues that Counts I through IV should be dismissed under the doctrine of qualified immunity because there is no clearly established law that supervisors violate a criminal defendant's constitutional rights by allowing subordinates to withhold exculpatory evidence and to fabricate inculpatory evidence, or by failing to train and supervise their subordinates in conducting drug-analysis tests and disclosing results. . . . Prior to 2009, it was clearly established by the First Circuit that a police officer could not withhold exculpatory evidence. . . The prohibition on fabricating inculpatory evidence was also well-established before 2009. . . The First Circuit has not expressly ruled that it is clearly established that a state-employed chemist similarly cannot withhold exculpatory evidence from prosecutors or present false inculpatory evidence at trial. However, in 2005 the First Circuit held that '[t]he intentional or reckless fabrication of inculpatory evidence or omission of material exculpatory evidence by a forensic examiner in support of probable cause may amount to a constitutional violation.' See Burke v. Town of Walpole, 405 F.3d 66, 89 (1st Cir.2005). The court sees no reason to distinguish between a forensic report used to support probable cause and a drug-analysis report used to support conviction. . . This court has similarly held that it was clearly established before 2009 that a forensic analyst could not withhold exculpatory information. . . Other Courts of Appeals have held the same. [collecting cases] Accordingly, the court finds that a reasonable state-employed chemist would have known in 2009 that she had a duty not to withhold exculpatory test results and that she could not knowingly present fabricated evidence of guilt in support of a criminal defendant's conviction. Even if such a rule was not established in case law, the court further finds that this rule is an obvious extension of the principle that a police officer cannot withhold exculpatory evidence or fabricate inculpatory evidence. . . Accordingly, the court reaches the same conclusion under either method of demonstrating that a law is clearly established. Having found the law proscribing a state-employed lab chemists from withholding exculpatory evidence and presenting fabricated evidence of guilt to be clearly established, the court must determine if, in 2009, a reasonable supervisor would understand that she 'would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by her subordinates in that context.'. . Although the court has not identified extensive case law expressly treating supervisory liability in this context, the court finds that no reasonable supervisor could fail to grasp that liability would attach for exhibiting deliberate indifference towards the falsification and withholding of evidence by her subordinates. The prohibition of such unconstitutional behavior applies with obvious clarity to the acts of supervisors who condone or deliberately turn a blind eye to these acts.")

Cavanagh v. Taranto, 95 F.Supp.3d 220, 234-39 (D. Mass. 2015) ("Although the right Cavanagh alleges is clearly established, to avoid qualified immunity the bounds and contours of a violation of that right must also be sufficiently clear such that no reasonable official could believe that the conduct of these officers at the time constituted deliberate indifference and therefore a violation of Ms. Scopa's constitutional right. . . . Under this standard, the question is whether any reasonable officer in the position of each of the defendants at the time would have reasonably believed that 'his actions, or willful failure to act, amounted to 'deliberate indifference' to the serious risk' that Ms. Scopa would harm herself. . . I consider each of the identified violations—viewing the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff—in turn. . . . Cavanagh has not adduced any evidence that would permit a reasonable fact-finder to conclude that these defendants had actual knowledge of Ms. Scopa's risk of suicide or were willfully blind to that risk. Under these circumstances, a reasonable official in the shoes of these defendants would not believe that his or her failure to identify Ms. Scopa as presenting a risk of harming herself constituted a violation of her constitutional right. . . .A reasonable officer under the circumstances here would understand that cell checks are for the purpose of ensuring inmate safety, but would be unaware that Ms. Scopa had any suicidal predisposition and would not be looking for specific signs of self-harm. . . .A reasonable officer in Coppinger's position would not necessarily think that his failure to take action in response to the looped shoelace was 'so inadequate as to shock the conscience' or in reckless disregard of Ms. Scopa's safety and therefore would rise to the level of a violation of Ms. Scopa's right. . . Accordingly, at the time of Ms. Scopa's death it was not 'beyond debate' that failing to take action in response to viewing a looped shoelace on the floor of a detainee's cell, absent any other indicators of suicidal tendencies, was so clear a violation of the detainee's Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment right that 'every "reasonable official would have understood"' that this inattention violates that right.")

Cocroft v. Smith, 95 F.Fupp.3d 119, 127-28 (D. Mass. 2015) ("Officer Smith argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because the right to be free from a retaliatory arrest was not clearly established at the time. It is true that Cocroft asserted that Officer Smith arrested her in retaliation for exercising her First Amendment rights. On this issue, Officer Smith may very well be correct that it is an unsettled question of law whether a retaliatory arrest otherwise supported by probable cause is unlawful. However, the Court need not resolve this question because the jury found for Officer Smith on Cocroft's retaliatory arrest claim. Therefore, the Court will focus on Officer Smith's argument that he is entitled to qualified immunity on Cocroft's claim that her arrest was not supported by probable cause. Officer Smith argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim because a reasonable officer in his position would have believed that probable cause existed to believe that Cocroft committed the crime with which she was charged—disorderly conduct, or that she had committed the crime of interfering with a police officer in the exercise of his duties. The doctrine of qualified immunity protects a state actor from liability for damages under section 1983 as long as his conduct did not violate clearly established constitutional or federal statutory rights. The official's actions are gauged by a standard of objective reasonableness. To obtain the benefit of qualified immunity, a police officer need not follow an unquestionably constitutional path. The case at hand exemplifies this point; where, as here, a section 1983 action rests on a claim of false arrest, the qualified immunity standard is satisfied 'so long as the presence of probable cause is at least arguable.'. . . In the preceding section, I found that there are no grounds to disturb the jury's finding that Cocroft's arrest was unlawful, i.e ., that Officer Smith lacked probable cause to arrest her for committing a crime. I find that the presence of probable cause for the arrest is not arguable. Furthermore, a reasonable officer in Officer Smith's position would have known that his conduct violated Cocroft's rights. Accordingly, Officer Smith is not entitled to qualified immunity.") Meagher v. Andover Sch. Comm., 94 F.Supp.3d 21, 42-44 (D. Mass. 2015) ("Although this court finds that McGrath deprived Meagher of her right of free speech, it concludes that the contours of this right were not clearly established at the time of Meagher's termination. Therefore, McGrath is immune from liability under the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . .This court finds that a reasonably competent official in McGrath's position could have believed that she was not violating the First Amendment by terminating Meagher under the circumstances of this case. As an initial matter, there is no dispute that McGrath obtained the advice of counsel before she decided to terminate the plaintiff's employment. . . More importantly, at the time of the termination in 2012, the Supreme Court had not had occasion to clarify 'the scope of a public employee's employment duties and what it means to speak pursuant to those duties' following its decision in Garcetti. . . As evidenced by the differing interpretations given by the plaintiff and defendants in this case to the post-Garcetti decisions, the parameters of the First Amendment privilege remained murky. . . It was not until 2014, when the Supreme Court decided Lane, that the Court explained that 'the mere fact that a citizen's speech concerns information acquired by virtue of his public employment does not transform that speech into employee—rather than citizen—speech[,]' and that the 'critical question' for purposes of the First Amendment analysis 'is whether the speech at issue is itself ordinarily within the scope of an employee's duties, not whether it merely concerns those duties.'. . Moreover, both before and after Lane, as the First Circuit has emphasized, each case must turn on the specific factual context in which the speech at issue was made. . . Therefore, 'the contours of the [First Amendment] right were still cloudy' and not clearly established at the time of the events in question in this case. . . Even if this court were to assume that no reasonable official could have believed that Meagher was speaking pursuant to her official duties as a teacher, McGrath would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the outcome of the balancing of interests in this case, as required by the Supreme Court in Pickering, 'was not so clear as to put all reasonable officials on notice that firing [Meagher] would violate the [Constitution].'. . As the First Circuit has cautioned, '[b]ecause Pickering's constitutional rule turns upon a fact-intensive balancing test, it can rarely be considered clearly established for qualified immunity purposes.'. . Consequently, it is 'only in the extraordinary case' that qualified immunity will not apply. . . This is not such a case. . . . Accordingly, this court finds that McGrath could have reasonably determined that Meagher's actions were disruptive to the operation of the school system, and

'could have reasonably concluded that firing [the plaintiff] would not violate her First Amendment rights.'. . Therefore, McGrath is entitled to qualified immunity.")

O'Connor v. Spain, 84 F.Supp.3d 60, 66-67(D. Mass. 2015) ("[T]his Court finds that a reasonable official in Defendant's position could have believed that suspending Plaintiff for her comments did not violate her constitutional rights. The legal contours of the First Amendment rights of a public employee are, for better or worse, inherently murky. In Decotiis, for example, the First Circuit observed that the cases governing whether public employees speak as private citizens 'reveal the muddiness of this area of the law,' and concluded that it was not clearly established that Plaintiff's criticism of her employer was protected speech. . . Plaintiff does not cite a single case that would have put Defendant on notice that suspending Plaintiff for her election-related comments violated the First Amendment, and this Court is aware of none. The boundary between speaking as a private citizen and a public employee has not been drawn with such certainty that it clearly protects Plaintiff's right to endorse municipal election candidates while at work. This conclusion gains further support in the context of this specific case. Defendant was told by multiple individuals that Plaintiff had expressed her support for certain candidates by making an announcement in the dining room at the Senior Center during work hours. . . At least one senior told Defendant that she felt Plaintiff was telling the seniors how to vote. . . In an effort to be thorough and deliberate in his response, Defendant appointed the Chief of Police to investigate the complaints. The investigator concluded that Plaintiff did in fact make statements in support of certain candidates while on the job, and that the majority of those present believed Plaintiff was trying to influence their votes. . . A reasonable town manager could conclude from the available information that Plaintiff's speech was not protected because she was not speaking as a private citizen, and because the town has a significant interest in preventing its employees from using their official positions to endorse candidates in municipal elections. Indeed, this result is all but compelled by the totality-of-the-circumstances and interest-balancing nature of the First Amendment test for public employees. . . . Because a reasonable town manager could conclude that suspending Plaintiff would not violate her free speech rights, Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. Therefore, no material fact dispute exists that would preclude summary judgment on Plaintiff's § 1983 claim against Defendant in his individual capacity.")

Williams v. City of Brockton, 59 F.Supp.3d 228, 243-44 (D. Mass. 2014) ("At the time of the alleged violations, it was 'clearly established in this circuit and the Supreme Court' that 'retaliatory action in employment, involving a public employee's speech on a question of public concern' constituted a violation of the First Amendment. . . Therefore, the individual Police Defendants have not established that they are immune from liability on Williams' surviving claims against them under the doctrine of qualified immunity.") Baggett v. Ashe, CA 11-30223-MAP, 2014 WL 4252442, *12, *13 (D. Mass. Aug. 26, 2014) ("At the time of this constitutional violation, clearly established law prohibited a male officer from viewing a female inmate during a strip search. Cookish, 945 F.2d at 447. It was also plainly unconstitutional to require a female inmate to expose herself, particularly to the extreme degree required during a strip search, in the presence of a male officer. Cofield, 391 F.3d at 337. Given these cases, any reasonable official would have recognized the unreasonableness of requiring a female inmate to strip in the presence of a male officer holding a video camera and pointing it at her. The unconstitutionality of such a policy was, quite simply, 'a foregone conclusion.' Bonitz, 804 F.2d at 173 n. 10. Given the clarity of the law at the time the policy was put in place, a reasonable official would have been properly on notice that the policy would inevitably result in an unconstitutional search. Moreover, even if the state of the law were ambiguous—which it was not—this policy was so clearly 'antithetical to human dignity' that qualified immunity would still be inappropriate. Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002). Any reasonable official viewing the policy would have concluded that it had the potential to humiliate and demean the female inmates. However sincere Defendants' attempts to comply with the law may have been, it was unreasonable for them to neglect the obvious ramifications of their policy. Ultimately, a reasonable individual in Defendants' position could not have concluded that permitting male officers to videotape female inmates during strip searches—even if the officers looked away—was constitutional. Therefore, Defendants are not entitled to the protections of qualified immunity, and Plaintiff is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.")

Jones v. Han, 993 F.Supp.2d 57, 65-67 (D. Mass. 2014) ("State drug analysts are as much an arm of the government as are police officers, and can also inflict constitutional injury if they fail to disclose material exculpatory or impeachment information to the prosecution. Therefore, it seems clear that defendants can be found liable for failing to provide exculpatory or impeachment information to the prosecutor for disclosure to the defendant. The alleged exculpatory or impeachment evidence in this case concerns the reliability of the testing performed by Dookhan. Dookhan testified at plaintiff's trial. Plaintiff alleges that Dookhan's supervisors, including defendants, knew that she often tested up to five times more samples per month than other chemists; that they were aware of complaints about Dookhan from Peter Piro and Michael Lawler; and that they ignored the fact that Dookhan circulated several different versions of her resume within the office. None of that information was disclosed to plaintiff during his criminal prosecution. Assuming the facts alleged in the complaint are true, defendants knew about material impeachment evidence concerning Dookhan and failed to disclose it to the prosecutor in plaintiff's case. The complaint therefore states a claim under § 1983. . . Defendants nonetheless contend that the complaint should be dismissed because they are entitled to qualified immunity . . . .The complaint here alleges that defendants knew that Dookhan performed five times as many tests as other chemists, that they had received complaints that she forged quality-control tests, and that they ignored the fact that she circulated different copies of her resume. An objectively reasonable crime-laboratory supervisor would have understood that such information should be reported to prosecutors, because fabricated or unreliable drug-analysis results would affect the outcomes and, indeed, the basic fairness, of the affected criminal cases. At the very least, an objectively reasonable laboratory supervisor would have done something to investigate the alleged irregularities to see if there was a problem to disclose. As alleged by plaintiff, the 2010 audit of Dookhan's work was insufficient to address those issues because, among other things, it did not include re-testing of samples. As noted, no case law directly on point has imposed civil liability on state laboratory officials for Brady violations. However, '[i]t follows logically that, in some situations, "a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question."'. . It was well-established that a police officer could be held liable for not disclosing exculpatory information. It would have been obvious that the same principle would extend to state drug-laboratory chemists and supervisors. Accordingly, defendants were on reasonable notice that the information they knew about Dookhan should have been disclosed. . . Defendants are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings. In the context of a motion to dismiss, the Court must accept the plausible factual allegations in the complaint as true. . . The complaint alleges that defendants knew about serious concerns over the accuracy of Dookhan's chemical testing and did not disclose that information to prosecutors in his case. That is sufficient to defeat a claim of qualified immunity at the pleadings stage.")

Jones v. Han, 993 F.Supp.2d 57, 69 (D. Mass. 2014) ("Defendants contend they are entitled to qualified immunity as to plaintiff's claims for supervisory liability under § 1983. 'When a supervisor seeks qualified immunity in a § 1983 action, the "clearly established" prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is satisfied when (1) the subordinate's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by his subordinates in that context.'. .Again, although there is no direct authority for holding state crime laboratory supervisors liable for their deliberate indifference to constitutional violations by their subordinates, the constitutional rights and supervisory liability doctrine that underlie plaintiff's claims are clearly established. . . The qualified immunity analysis here therefore turns on whether, in the particular circumstances confronted by defendants, they should have reasonably understood that their conduct jeopardized the constitutional rights of criminal defendants subject to the laboratory testing procedures. . .Reasonable officials in defendants' position, as alleged in the complaint, would have known their conduct could violate a criminal defendant's rights to due process and a fair trial. Assuming the allegations in the complaint are true, defendants were 'put on notice of behavior which was likely to result in the violation of the constitutional rights of citizens.'. . Whether plaintiff can prove those claims is a question for another day.")

Solomon v. Dookhan, No. 13–10208–GAO, 2014 WL 317202, *10, *11 (D. Mass. Jan. 27, 2014) (O'Toole, J. (adopting Magistrate Judge Sorokin's R & R) ("In Hernandez–Cuevas, the First Circuit explicitly joined with those circuits employing the constitutional approach, and held that a plaintiff may bring a malicious prosecution claim under § 1983 if he or she can establish that the defendant (1) caused (2) a seizure of the plaintiff pursuant to legal process unsupported by probable cause, and (3) criminal proceedings terminated in the plaintiff's favor. . . Although it did so in 2013, the Court nevertheless noted that

'[t]his holding makes explicit what has long been implicit in our case law. In the past we have held that 'some truths are self-evident.... [I]f any concept is fundamental to our American system of justice, it is that those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from deliberately fabricating evidence and framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.'

Id. at 100 (quoting Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 44–45 (1st Cir.2004)).
Although qualified immunity presents a legal issue, courts analyzing the issue must be careful 'not to permit a defendant to hijack the plaintiffs complaint and recharacterize its allegations so as to minimize his or her liability.'. . A fair reading of the Amended Complaint is that Solomon alleges that Keenan joined with Dookhan and others in a scheme to falsify evidence, destroy and withhold exculpatory evidence, obstruct justice and offer false testimony. At no point could a reasonable police officer have believed that such conduct would be permissible. Qualified immunity does not bar any of the claims asserted against Keenan.")

Abrami v. Town of Amherst, No. 09–30176–DPWJ, 2013 WL 3777070, *8, *9 (D. Mass. July 16, 2013) ("The contours of an officer's authority and a suspect's rights in the context of a doorway seizure are not well defined. Some courts, for example, have found that a suspect opening the door to the police does not relinquish his right of privacy in the home unless he acquiesces in detention, while others have found that acquiescence is not required. . . Some courts have also indicated that a suspect's rights may differ when the door is opened to law enforcement, as opposed to a lay invitee. . . But the various approaches to doorway seizures only serve to reinforce that Abrami's rights, when he voluntarily presented himself to Humber through the doorway, were not clearly established. Indeed, the substantial uncertainty surrounding doorway seizures has formed the basis for qualified immunity in the past. . .I conclude that, on the facts most favorable to Abrami, Humber mistook the extent to which Abrami had relinquished his expectations of privacy in the home (and effectively consented to entry) merely by voluntarily coming to the door and placing himself in public view. . .But Humber's mistake was reasonable, given the considerable uncertainty surrounding the rights of suspects engaged in doorway interactions with law enforcement—with respect to their Fourth Amendment protection against both an arrest or investigatory seizure and any accompanying entry into the home. Moreover, Humber accompanied his reasonable mistake about the extent to which Abrami had forfeited his expectations of privacy with the proportionally modest entry of requiring that the door to the apartment remain open while he conducted an investigatory doorway seizure. Humber is thus entitled to qualified immunity. On this basis, summary judgment must enter on the aspects of Count I alleging unlawful entry, as well as those alleging that Abrami's arrest was unlawful as a result of any such entry.")

Walker v. Jackson, 952 F.Supp.2d 343, (D. Mass. 2013) ("The Walkers seek to hold the defendants liable for failing to intervene to prevent Officer Jackson's allegedly unreasonable search. But the court has not found any cases holding officers liable in analogous circumstances. Indeed, the cases within the First Circuit deal almost exclusively with the failure to intervene in the use of excessive force. . . Nevertheless, this court cannot definitively conclude that a claim alleging a failure to intervene in an unreasonable search fails to state a constitutional violation. Other circuits addressing failure to intervene claims have described liability in more general terms. According to the Second Circuit, 'An officer who fails to intercede is liable for the preventable harm caused by the actions of the other officers where that officer observes or has reason to know:

(1) that excessive force is being used; (2) that a citizen has been unjustifiably arrested; or (3) that any constitutional violation has been committed by a law enforcement official.'. . But even when courts define liability more broadly, the facts of the cases tend to involve acts of excessive force or unlawful arrest. . . It is therefore unclear whether liability may be imposed for failing to intervene in an unreasonable search. It is plain, however, that the contours of the constitutional right were not sufficiently clear to give the defendants notice that their conduct in this case was unconstitutional. The court has not found any support for the proposition that allowing a fellow officer to enter a residence and participating in the subsequent search constitutes a claim for failure to intervene. Accordingly, the court agrees that the defendants have qualified immunity as to Count II.")

Holder v. Town of Newton, No. 09-cv-341-JD, 2010 WL 5185137, at *6, *7 (D.N.H. Dec. 15, 2010) ("Courts that have considered the issue have determined in similar circumstances that a right of individuals to possess and bear firearms for private civilian purposes, as opposed to military purposes, was not clearly established before 2008, when the Supreme Court decided District of Columbia v. Heller, 128 S.Ct. 2783, 2799 (2008)). See, e.g., Emerson v. City of New York, 2010 WL 2910661, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. July 19, 2010); Cardenas v. City of Chicago, 2010 WL 2609866, at *7, n. 8 (N.D. Ill. June 25, 2010) (citing cases). . . . Therefore, to the extent Holder could show that Streeter and Jewett violated his Second Amendment rights, which has not been established in this case, they are protected by qualified immunity.")

Vendouri v. Gaylord, No. 10-cv-277-SM, 2010 WL 4261233, at *5 (D.N.H. Oct. 26, 2010) ("In this case, the right at issue is not the general parental right to direct the upbringing and education of her child. Defined at the appropriate level of specificity, the right at issue here is the claimed right of a noncustodial parent to be notified by her child's school whenever the child is dismissed from school to the parent who has been awarded legal and physical custody by a court of competent jurisdiction (or that parent's appropriate representative). None of the relevant Supreme Court opinions, nor controlling decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, establishes such a right. James, the opinion on which Vendouri relies, was decided after the conduct Vendouri complains of and identifies a significantly narrower parental right than the one Vendouri claims the school defendants violated in this case. . . Moreover, James holds that at the time of the conduct underlying that case, the right of a noncustodial parent to be notified of an actual legal transfer of custody was not clearly established. If the narrow right at issue in James was not clearly established when the school defendants engaged in the conduct Vendouri challenges, then the broader right on which Vendouri bases her claim was not clearly established either.")

Oxley v. Penobscot County, No. 09-cv-21-B-W, 2010 WL 582222, at *12 (D. Me. Feb. 12, 2010) ("My reading of the cases is to the effect that arrestees subject to a temporary seizure at a jail who will not be joining the prison population are entitled to the same Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures as any other arrestee, and that officers cannot manipulate the standard simply by processing or booking an arrestee at a facility that houses others for penological purposes. I arrive at this conclusion by reading existing caselaw, beginning with Bell v. Wolfish.. . . I am persuaded that a reasonable officer in Ms. Kelleher's position could reasonably have believed that a strip search in a private setting by officers of the same sex as Ms. Oxley would not violate the constitution because contraband was discovered on the person of Ms. Oxley's traveling companion at the jail and because Ms. Oxley was being processed in the county jail pending release on bail. . . . A reasonable officer in her position could have believed that the jail environment and presence of contraband on Ms. Hughes was minimally sufficient to justify the search in question.").

Toro v. Murphy, No. 07-11721-PBS, 2009 WL 5064575, at *6, *7 (D. Mass. Dec. 17, 2009) ("The crucial question in this case is whether the unlawfulness of Murphy's conduct would have been apparent to a reasonable officer in the same position. This demands an analysis of the laws concerning materiality that existed at the time of Murphy's alleged withholding. At that time, evidence was material if it [sic] 'the omitted evidence create[d] a reasonable doubt that did not otherwise exist.' United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 112-13, 96 S.Ct. 2392, 49 L.Ed.2d 342 (1976). . . . At the time of the Plaintiff's criminal trial, the Agurs standard required timely disclosure of exculpatory evidence if, 'on consideration of the entire record, the evidence is capable of creating a reasonable doubt that would not otherwise exist.'. . In addition, this duty was extended to the police officers who investigated the case. Commonwealth v. Redding, 382 Mass. 154, 157, 414 N.E.2d 347, 348 (1980) ("The police are also part of the prosecution, and the taint on the trial is no less if they, rather than the State's Attorney, were guilty of nondisclosure.") (internal citations omitted). . . . The Agurs standard was sufficiently specific to 'clearly establish' the right to exculpatory evidence regarding alternative suspects. The big question is whether a reasonable officer in Murphy's position in 1981 would have believed that the evidence of an alternative suspect should have been turned over. Murphy himself has admitted, through deposition testimony, that if he had the report, it should have been turned over as both exculpatory and material. . . . In these circumstances, Murphy is not protected by qualified immunity.").

Bowler v. Town of Hudson, 514 F.Supp.2d 168, 183 (D. Mass. 2007) ("Plaintiffs argue that the First Amendment right of the high school students to engage in non-disruptive speech was clearly established, and that the individual defendants should have known that censorship of HSCCA posters was unconstitutional under Tinker and Fraser. The First Amendment jurisprudence governing a school's regulation of student access to violent speech on the internet with the benign intent to protect students from images which may be upsetting and psychologically damaging is not settled, as is indicated by the fractured decisions in Pico regarding the role of the subjective intent for the censorship and the uncertain status of the 'right to be left alone' under Harper. Given the Court's own difficulty in determining whether a First Amendment violation occurred in this case, the Court cannot find that the First Amendment rights in this case were 'clearly established' in order to defeat the individual defendants' claim of qualified immunity .The Court also finds no evidence that a similarly situated official would have acted differently. The plaintiffs do not dispute that the videos linked by the HCSSA website were upsetting, . . .and plaintiffs do not otherwise challenge the blocking of access to the URL on HHS computers by Technology Director Ms.

Schuck. It is understandable that, after limiting access to the URL on HHS computers, a reasonable school administrator would proceed to remove the URL from the Club's posters. Qualified immunity contemplates such errors and mistakes. . . Finally, and curiously, plaintiffs have not argued against qualified immunity for the individual school administrators on the ground that they were impermissibly motivated to punish the Club's speech because of its content. . . . As a result, the Court similarly considers abandoned any claim that the individual defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because of their impermissible motivation. The Court thus ALLOWS summary judgment as to the qualified immunity of the individual defendants.").

Mongeau v. City of Marlborough, 462 F.Supp.2d 144, 153 (D. Mass. 2006) ("In the immediate case, Mongeau may have a viable claim that his constitutional rights were violated. As discussed, the First Circuit has left the door slightly ajar in substantive due process claims in land-use actions involving allegations of corruption or bribery. Given that the First Circuit has explicitly refused to decide whether such an allegation can make out a section 1983 claim, such a right is not 'clearly established.' Consequently, as counterintuitive as it may seem, Reid is entitled to qualified immunity even if he required mitigation payments in order to grant a permit. This is the logical conclusion that must follow from Harlow and the First Circuit opinions discussing section 1983 in the context of land-use disputes. This qualified immunity follows in the wake of the First Circuit's express reluctance to recognize any type of section 1983 claim in this particular context.").

Charles v. City of Boston, 365 F.Supp.2d 82, 89 (D. Mass. 2005) ("Bogdan's related qualified immunity argument must also fail because it turns on the absence of a clearly established duty for him to disclose directly to a defendant, which is not the constitutional breach that Charles is alleging. Bogdan's duty to disclose Brady information to the prosecutor was clearly established at the time of his investigation into the 1980 rapes (not to mention his duty–unquestionably well-established–to testify truthfully on the stand). Thus, if the qualified immunity question is 'whether a reasonable official could have believed his actions were lawful in light of clearly established law and the information the official possessed at the time of the allegedly unlawful conduct,' . . . the answer is an unequivocal 'no.' Bogdan, an experienced crime lab technician, must have known of his legal obligation to disclose exculpatory evidence to the prosecutors, their obligation to pass it along to the defense, and his obligation not to cover up a Brady violation by perjuring himself. That there is no statutory or common law rule explicitly proscribing such conduct–no case that says 'a crime lab technician whose tests go a long way to exculpating the defendant must disclose that to the prosecutor and cannot lie about them on the stand'–does not mean that Bogdan's behavior is immunized. Some acts are unlawful on their face.").

King's Grant Inn v. Town of Gilford, No. Civ.03-249-SM, 2005 WL 361547, at *4, *5 (D.N.H. Feb. 16, 2005) (not reported)("The general principle stated in Shuttlesworth, however, is too abstract for useful application in considering qualified immunity. See Riverdale Mills, 392 F.3d at 66 ("The district court below erred by posing the second prong as whether 'the law regarding the necessity for a search warrant is clear."). Rather, the proper question here is whether a local government official, in April, May, and June of 2003, should have understood, based on established law, that it was unlawful to deny a request for an exotic dancing permit based upon the applicant's having a 'significant history' of violating alcoholic beverage control laws. . . . When the constitutional right at issue here is properly cast, it becomes apparent that the right was not clearly established. The selectmen made their permit decisions pursuant to an ordinance that had not, to that point, been challenged on constitutional grounds. And, the ordinance was adopted pursuant to the implicit mandate of a state statute, requiring that holders of liquor licenses may 'provide entertainment and dancing ... provided they have received written authorization by the town or city.'. . At the time the individual defendants denied plaintiff's permit applications, no decisional law was in place describing the permissible bases on which written authorization for entertainment and dancing in establishments licensed to serve liquor might, constitutionally, be either granted or withheld. Moreover, neither the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit nor the United States Supreme Court has resolved a case sufficiently similar to this one to provide clear notice that defendants' denial of plaintiff's permit applications amounted to a denial of First Amendment rights. The general principle established in Shuttlesworth was applied, by the Eleventh Circuit, in a somewhat similar factual setting, as described earlier. But, it is not at all clear that the opinion in Fly Fish, constitutes 'a consensus of persuasive authority elsewhere[.]'. . . It cannot be said, then, that the constitutional right at issue here, properly framed, was clearly established in federal decisional law. Finally, the third permit denial (on June 2, 2003) took place after the New Hampshire Superior Court had held that the Inn was not likely to succeed on the merits of its First Amendment claim. At the very least, then, on that occasion, defendants' reliance on the decision of the New Hampshire Superior Court, particularly given the absence of specific federal precedent, was not unreasonable, and did not result in forfeiture of their qualified immunity. Because the contours of the legal right defendants violated were not clearly established at the time they acted, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from personal liability, and they are entitled to partial summary judgment on that point.").

McIntyre v. United States, No. CIV.A.01-CV-10408-RC, 2004 WL 2230406, at *17, 23-25 (D. Mass. Sept. 30, 2004) ("[W]hen plaintiffs allege that, in disclosing the informant status of McIntyre to Bulger and Flemmi, Connolly acted affirmatively to put the life of McIntyre in jeopardy, they have sufficiently alleged a violation by Connolly of McIntyre's substantive due process right to be protected from the danger of the government's own creation. But the plaintiffs argue in vain when they assert that the 'state-created danger' theory, or the 'constitutional duty not to affirmatively abuse governmental power so as to create danger to individuals and render them more vulnerable to harm,'. . . was clearly established at the time Bulger and Flemmi are alleged to have murdered McIntyre. Soto v. Flores forecloses this argument . . . The defense of qualified immunity applies unless the law is clearly established either by materially similar precedent or by general legal principles that apply with obvious clarity to the facts of the case. . . Under the facts as alleged by the plaintiffs, it cannot be doubted that Connolly violated the substantive due process rights of McIntyre. In fact, because Connolly allegedly participated in and/or aided and abetted the murder of McIntyre, the right in question might be characterized as the right not to be murdered by the government. As so characterized, the right is clearly established by the words of the Fifth Amendment itself. . . But, even if the right is characterized as a right not to be murdered by a private actor where a government actor aided, abetted, collaborated or conspired with the private actor to accomplish the murder, the right was clearly established before McIntyre was murdered. The fact that there is no case proclaiming the existence of the right under factual circumstances like those presented by the case before me does not preclude a determination that the right was clearly established. The Supreme Court has rejected the notion that the determination of whether a constitutional right is clearly established requires that a court find that the facts before it are fundamentally similar to a previous case declaring the right. . . . Based on these principles, I hold that in 1984, the substantive due process right to not be murdered by a private actor where a government actor aided, abetted, collaborated or conspired with the private actor to accomplish the murder was clearly established. Although in 1984 the courts had not addressed factual circumstances 'fundamentally similar' to those alleged by the plaintiffs in this case, 'in the light of pre-existing law, the unlawfulness' of Connolly's conduct was 'apparent.' . . The text of the Fifth Amendment provided the general prohibition against the government's depriving citizens of life. It was also clearly established in 1984 that constitutional violations can be effectuated by private actors acting in concert with government actors. . . . Although none of the parties have addressed the issue, I also hold that, based on the plaintiff's allegations, it was reasonable for Connolly to have been aware that his conduct violated McIntyre's clearly established right to be free from government-involved murder. There are no allegations supporting a conclusion that Connolly made a reasonable mistake as to what the law required, . . . that he was reasonably ignorant of crucial facts, . . .or that any other circumstance existed that would have made it unreasonable for Connolly to appreciate that his conduct was unconstitutional.")

Hudson v. Maloney, 326 F.Supp.2d 206, 210-12 (D. Mass. 2004) ("That the plaintiffs clearly identified viable and pertinent constitutional rights in their Complaint under the First and Fourteenth Amendments is not seriously contested by defendants. . . . Consequently, it is to the second step of the Saucier test that the court turns: would a reasonable prison administrator when confronted, in September of 2002, at the latest, with plaintiffs' demands for Halal meals prepared by Muslim inmates, have determined that a clearly established right was being invoked. Here, it is important not to confuse the general with the particular and to frame the issue precisely. In September of 2002, a reasonable prison official would have known that a prisoner's right to the free exercise of his religion, so long as it did not compromise institutional security, was clearly established, and further that this right encompassed a diet consistent with the prisoner's sincere religious beliefs. . . Rather, the precise question that would have been asked is whether the law had clearly established a Muslim inmate's right to a particular dietary ingredient (Halal meal), prepared in a particular way (by other Muslim inmates), or whether it was sufficient for prison authorities to provide an alternative diet (vegetarian or pork-free) that was 'consistent' with the teachings of the inmate's faith, if not every aspect of his belief. In consulting the decisions of courts that had considered the issue before September of 2002, [footnote omitted] a reasonable prison official would have learned that the vast majority of these courts had determined that a prison permissibly discharged its constitutional duty to respect the dietary beliefs of Muslim inmates by offering an alternative, pork-free diet, and more broadly, that the law permitted prison authorities to limit the dietary options available to prisoners in the interests of reducing the costs and burdens entailed in accommodating the smorgasbord of food-related religious beliefs likely to be encountered in a prison population. . . . In light of this legal precedent, no reasonable prison official would have concluded that Muslim inmates had an established right to Halal meals prepared by other Muslim inmates or that prison administrators did not have broad discretion in the matter of prison dietary alternatives.").

Quiles v. Kilson, 337 F.Supp.2d 224, 231(D. Mass. 2004) ("In the instant case, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the strip searches conducted. It is possible that the plaintiffs' allegations about the City's practice of strip searching, if true, would establish a constitutional violation. The law at the time of this alleged violation, however, was not clear because the First Circuit had not yet decided Swain. The law does not require state actors to 'carry a crystal ball' as to what the future trajectory of the law will be. . . The defendants cannot be expected to have known that the searches, made pursuant to a valid warrant and a City policy with respect to strip searching, violated the law. The individual defendants are, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the inside plaintiffs.[footnote omitted] With respect to the outside plaintiffs, the question of qualified immunity is more problematic. The searches themselves were questionable because if the defendants were not in the Apartment, they were almost certainly illegal. The 'all persons' warrant applied only to the persons in the Apartment. There is nothing in the affidavit or elsewhere to suggest that children were involved in selling drugs at 7 Congress Street. If they were not in the Apartment, there was no probable cause to search the outside plaintiffs. Unlike the law with respect to strip searching, which was unclear at the time of the incident, the law relating to probable cause was clear. An objectively reasonable officer should have known that it violated the Fourth Amendment rights of the outside plaintiffs to search them if they were not originally inside the Apartment. The individual defendants are not, therefore, entitled to a qualified immunity defense with respect to the outside plaintiffs.").

Suboh v. Borgioli, 298 F.Supp.2d 192, 205, 206 (D. Mass. 2004) ("In its opinion on this case, the First Circuit ruled that it was clearly established as of 1998 that 'a state official could not effectively resolve a disputed custody issue between a parent and another without following any due process procedures at all[.]' . . . It then indicated that the relevant question, in determining whether Borgioli was entitled to qualified immunity, was whether 'a reasonable officer could have concluded on the facts before him that the Kandys had undisputed custody of the child, despite Suboh's claims, and so no process of any sort was due before the child could be released to the Kandys.'. . By framing the issue in such a way, the First Circuit necessarily reduced the scope of facts determinative to the qualified immunity analysis. Were there, for example, a genuine dispute as to whether Suboh told Borgioli that she was Sofia's biological mother or that she wanted custody of her daughter, the jury would indeed be needed to resolve these crucial questions. To the extent that the determinative facts were unclear or disputed prior to the trial, however, that dispute was resolved by Borgioli's own trial testimony. As noted above, on the stand Borgioli testified that Suboh told him that she was Sofia's biological mother, that she had not signed any papers giving custody of Sofia to her parents, and that she wanted to regain custody of her daughter. Regardless of the apparent credibility or lack thereof of Suboh's statements, [footnote omitted] the Court fails to see how any reasonable officer could not have, at a minimum, concluded that there were indeed competing claims to Sofia's custody such that he simply could not decide the dispute himself. Borgioli argues that 'there was certainly a hotly contested factual dispute as to what [he] knew at various points in his investigation,'. . . but it is undisputed that the crucial piece of information–that Suboh was claiming to be Sofia's biological mother and was asserting a right to custody of her daughter–was known to Borgioli when he decided to place Sofia in the custody of the Kandys. Accordingly, at this point, there are simply no remaining factual disputes that a jury needs to resolve for the Court to be able to rule on qualified immunity, given Borgioli's own testimony. In such a circumstance, it is appropriate for the Court to rule on qualified immunity straightaway, . . and that is what the Court has done here. Given the Court's determinations that (1) the undisputed facts of this case establish that Suboh's procedural due process rights were violated by her failure to receive any hearing attendant to the loss of custody of her daughter; and (2) the undisputed facts demonstrate that Borgioli is not entitled to qualified immunity, the scope of the new trial is necessarily limited. All that remains for the new trial is the important question of what– if any–damages were proximately caused by Borgioli's violation of Suboh's procedural due process rights.").

Pliakos v. City of Manchester, No. 01-461-M., 2003 WL 21687543, at *13, *14 (D.N.H. July 15, 2003) (unpublished) ("A difficult question is presented in this case regarding the level of specificity with which it is appropriate to define the constitutional right plaintiff claims was violated. All can agree that the right not to be subjected to 'unreasonable' or 'excessive' force during the course of an arrest was, when Pliakos was taken into custody, clearly established. . . . If the constitutional right plaintiff claims was infringed must necessarily be defined more precisely, it is far less clear that such a right was 'clearly established' at the time of Pliakos's arrest. . . . Except for Pliakos's predisposition to positional asphyxia (due to, among other things, obesity, acute cocaine intoxication, cardiac hypertrophy, and his violent struggle), he likely would have suffered no lasting adverse effects from his brief detention on his stomach. Reduced to its essence, then, the question presented is whether Pliakos had a clearly established right not to be restrained in the manner (and for the duration) that he was, in light of the risk factors he presented with regard to positional asphyxia (some of which were obvious and others of which were unknown to the officers). . . . The case precedent discussed above does not establish a constitutional right not to be handcuffed in a prone position if one presents some of the risk factors for positional asphyxia. In fact, many of the courts that have confronted this relatively rare situation have specifically concluded, under circumstances very much like those presented in this case, that there is no such constitutional right at all, much less a 'clearly established' right. See, e.g., Phillips, supra; Cottrell, supra. Necessarily, then, an objectively reasonable police officer, presented with the violent circumstances that confronted the defendants on October 13, 1999, would not have realized that restraining Pliakos in the manner (and for the period of time) that defendants did would amount to a violation of his clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure or the use of excessive force.").

Demers v. Leominster School Department, 263 F. Supp.2d 195, 208 (D. Mass. 2003) ("Because I determined that Michael's constitutional rights were not infringed by the actions of the School Officials, no reasonable government official in the Defendants' shoes would have believed that he or she was violating Michael's rights by suspending him because of the drawing and note. Michael had a record of emotional disturbances and school behavioral problems, some which involved violence or aggression toward others. It was not clearly established at the time that Michael was suspended that disciplining a student, who made a violent and threatening drawing, violated that student's constitutional rights. Finally, there is limited case law on the issue of school violence in this Circuit, which lends further credence to conclude that this area of the law is unsettled. . . Therefore, the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Aceto v. Kachajian, 240 F. Supp.2d 121, 126, 127 (D. Mass. 2003) ("In sum, the Court holds that on May 23, 2000, it was clearly established under published caselaw that when a non-threatening, non-flight-risk, cooperating arrestee for a minor crime tells the police she suffers from an injury that would be exacerbated by handcuffing her arms behind her back, the arrestee has a right to be handcuffed with her arms in front of her even if the injury is not visible. If the Court assumes Aceto's account of the facts to be true, any reasonable officers confronting Aceto's situation would have known that handcuffing her arms behind her back was unlawful excessive force.").

Soto v. Bzdel, 214 F. Supp.2d 69, 75-77 (D. Mass. 2002) ("In the court's opinion, a plaintiff may state a constitutional claim if, while a police officer is making an arrest pursuant to a warrant, the officer fails to release the plaintiff after the officer receives information upon which to reasonably conclude that the warrant had been recalled. Thus, viewing the facts here in a light most favorable to Plaintiff–particularly the fact that Plaintiff made Defendants aware of the Notice of Recall, but that Defendants chose not to look at that notice–the court finds, for present purposes, that Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that he was unreasonably 'seized' in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . With regard to the second and, in effect, the third questions, Plaintiff asserts that the law was 'clearly established' at the time of the incident that Fourth Amendment seizures must be conducted in a reasonable manner. That may be true as a general proposition. . . However, as the First Circuit has explained, 'the inquiry whether the right at issue [is] clearly established properly focuses not upon the right at its most general or abstract level, but at the level of its application to the specific conduct being challenged.' Singer v. State of Me., 49 F.3d 837, 845 (1st Cir.1995) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted). . .[T]he court must answer the second question in the qualified immunity analysis in the negative. Plaintiff has 'not brought to [the court's] attention any cases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which [he] seek[s] to rely,' nor has he 'identified a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.' . . It need hardly be said, therefore, with regard to the third question that no objectively reasonable officer in October of 1999 would have believed that disregarding Plaintiff's Notice of Recall and arresting him based on information from the WMS [Warrant Management System], as did Defendants, was [un]lawful in light of clearly established law. . . . [E]ven though Defendants may well have been cavalier in dealing with Plaintiff, and thus might lose were the court to consider the merits, they cannot reasonably be charged with knowing that they were violating a clearly established right. This ought not hold true in the future. Presently, however, Defendants fall under the umbrella of qualified immunity and the court will grant them summary judgment on Counts I and IV." [footnotes omitted]).

Moreta-Ramirez v. Lemert, 156 F. Supp.2d 138, 142 (D.P.R. 2001) (Clearly, the duty to disclose established by Brady, is imposed on the prosecution. Brady does not express a view as to the duty of police officers to disclose exculpatory evidence. . . In fact, the existence of a constitutionally-derived liability on the part of police officers for failure to disclose and the contours of such liability are not clearly established.").

Reid v. Simmons, 163 F. Supp.2d 81, 96, 97 (D.N.H. 2001) ("In summary, because it was not clearly established in 1987 that a police officer's failure to disclose potentially, though not obviously, exculpatory impeachment material (particularly that which was generated in unrelated investigations) would constitute a discrete and actionable violation of the defendant's constitutional right to due process (independent of the Brady violation which is, of course, caused by the prosecutor's failure to turn over such information), Simmons is entitled to qualified immunity. He is also entitled to the protections afforded by qualified immunity because an objectively reasonable police officer in his situation in 1987, looking forward before Reid's criminal trial, would not have appreciate[d] the potentially material and exculpatory nature of the investigative reports in question. So, even if Simmons did fail to disclose the reports, he cannot be charged with having understood that such a failure would violate federal law by depriving Reid of his right to due process and a fair trial.").

Greenleaf v. Cote, No. CIV. 98-250-B, 2000 WL 863217, at *3 & n.3 (D. Me. March 3, 2000) ("greeing with courts in Konop and Sostarecz that students had clearly established right to be free from unreasonable search of belongings by school officials; disagreeing with Jenkins v. Talladega City Bd. of Ed., 115 F.3d 821 (11th Cir. 1997)).

Grendell v. Gillway, 974 F. Supp. 46, 52 (D. Me. 1997) ("[A]lthough the Court is mindful that the First Circuit has never held verbal threats or harassment to constitute conscience-shocking behavior, the Court is equally mindful that abhorrent conduct is still abhorrent even though it has not been subject to judicial determination. For these reasons, the Court finds that, lack of direct precedent notwithstanding, Gillway's alleged conduct is shocking to the conscience and violative of Grendell's substantive due process rights. Since the Court finds that Grendell has alleged that Gillway violated a constitutional right, it is now appropriate to turn to the issue of qualified immunity and, consequently, the question of whether this right was clearly established at the time Gillway acted. . . .The Court is persuaded that Grendell's right to be free from behavior that is shocking to the conscience was clearly established at the time of Gillway's alleged conduct and therefore holds that Gillway is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Simply because there is no clearly defined case law condemning certain conduct does not mean police officers should be free to engage in such conduct, no matter how offensive or destructive to a fair and just society that conduct may be, and then hide behind the shield of qualified immunity. The Court is convinced, therefore, that even in the absence of precedent, conduct that shocks the conscience is so patently egregious that the constitutional right it violates is necessarily clearly established and that a reasonable officer should know that his conduct violates that right.").

Ferreira v. Dubois, 963 F. Supp. 1244, 1258 (D. Mass. 1996) ("[I]t was not clearly established that procedural due process afforded an inmate/defendant the right to have interpreter services for a non-English speaking inmate/witness at a prison disciplinary hearing. Nor was it clearly established that an inmate/defendant had a right to require the hearing officer to query the inmate/ witness as to his ability to speak and/or comprehend English. ").

SECOND CIRCUIT

National Rifle Association of America v. Vullo, No. 21-636-CV, 2022 WL 4372194, at *12-13 (2d Cir. Sept. 22, 2022) ("[E]ven assuming the NRA sufficiently pleaded that Vullo engaged in unconstitutionally threatening or coercive conduct, we conclude that Vullo is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established and any First Amendment violation would not have been apparent to a reasonable official at the time. While it was clearly established, as a general matter, that 'the First Amendment prohibits implied threats to employ coercive state power to stifle protected speech,'. . . the contours of that right were not so 'sufficiently clear' that a reasonable official in the circumstances here would have understood that what she was doing violated that right. . . The right alleged to have been violated 'must have been "clearly established" in a more particularized, and hence more relevant, sense.'. . The violation must have been apparent in light of pre-existing case law for qualified immunity to be denied. . . Here, the various cases addressing the issue did not provide clear and particularized guidance but involved very different circumstances and much stronger conduct. The cases do not clearly establish that Vullo's statements in this case were unconstitutionally threatening or coercive. . . The NRA has not cited, and we are not aware of, any case analogous to this one, where a government official has been held to have violated the First Amendment by making statements like those in the Guidance Letters and Press Release, which use only suggestive language and rely on the power of persuasion. In the Guidance Letters, Vullo commends DFS-regulated entities for their commitment to corporate social responsibility and for being 'key players in maintaining and improving public health and safety in the communities they serve.'. . In the Press Release, she praises businesses for 'lead[ing] the way and bring[ing] about the kind of positive social change needed to minimize the chance that we will witness more of these senseless tragedies.'. . Moreover, the Press Release states that the Governor was 'directing the Department of Financial Services to urge insurers and bankers' to assess the risks of doing business with gun promotion groups, . . . not to investigate or take any enforcement action against them. It certainly was not clearly established at the time that any of these statements would violate the First Amendment, and indeed, as discussed above, many cases emphasized the right of government officials to speak, to take and express views, and to try to persuade. Furthermore, as the district court acknowledged, we have never held that nonthreatening government speech becomes threatening simply because the speaker oversaw an earlier, legitimate law enforcement investigation, and we decline to do so today. As for the Consent Decrees and Lloyd's meetings, the NRA similarly has not cited, and we are not aware of, any case like this one, where a government official makes purportedly threatening statements urging an entity to cut ties with what is essentially its accomplice during an ongoing, legitimate investigation into serious misconduct, where the investigation results in consent decrees, and where the entities admit to violations of the law and agree to millions of dollars in fines and other significant relief. Moreover, assuming Vullo offered to go easy on Lloyd's if it severed ties with the NRA, we have never held that law enforcement officials may not offer leniency in exchange for help advancing their policy goals, especially when those policy goals aim to minimize the influence of a noncompliant business partner that has repeatedly violated the law. And again, as noted, DFS explicitly permitted Lloyd's (and the other entities) to continue doing business with the NRA. Qualified immunity balances the need to hold public officials accountable when they exercise their power irresponsibly with the need to shield officials from harassment, distraction, and liability when they perform their duties responsibly. . .The Complaint's factual allegations show that, far from acting irresponsibly, Vullo was doing her job in good faith. She oversaw an investigation into serious violations of New York insurance law and obtained substantial relief for the residents of New York. She used her office to address policy issues of concern to the public. Even assuming her actions were unlawful, and we do not believe they were, the unlawfulness was not apparent by any means. Accordingly, even assuming the NRA plausibly alleged a First Amendment violation, Vullo would be protected by qualified immunity in any event.")

Walker v. Schult, 45 F.4th 598, 618-21 (2d Cir. 2022) ("In the present case, the district court appears to have assumed that the jury's verdict established that Walker's Eighth Amendment rights had been violated. . . The jury had indeed been instructed that it could return a verdict in Walker's favor if it found that a defendant or defendants had 'deprived him of minimal civilized measures of life necessities':

Prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they deprive an inmate of his basic human needs, such as food, clothing, medical care, sleep, and safe and sanitary living conditions. For the purposes of the Eighth Amendment, Mr. Walker can demonstrate the deprivation of a Constitutional right by showing that he was incarcerated in cell 127 in the Mohawk B unit at FCI Ray Brook under conditions that posed a substantial risk of serious damage to his health and safety or that the conditions which he was forced to endure deprived him of minimal civilized measures of life necessities.

. . . But, while the jury was thus instructed as to the law, its job was simply to find the facts; and the district court, in describing the evidence in its posttrial Rule 50 ruling, lost sight of the jury's actual and implied factual findings. . . . [T]he jury found as facts only that Walker suffered mental or emotional injury because of 'overcrowding/lack of space' and 'threats of violence/lack of safe living conditions.' . . And despite those 'threats,' any actual violence and deprivation of safety were unrealized, as the jury had found that Walker did not prove physical injury. . . .As discussed in Part II.A. above, 'overcrowding' itself, i.e., 'confin[ing] cellmates too closely,' does not violate the Eighth Amendment unless it is accompanied by some treatment that 'deprive[s] inmates of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities.'. . '[O]nly those deprivations denying "the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities[ ]" ... are sufficiently grave to form the basis of an Eighth Amendment violation.'. . Walker has not called to our attention any Supreme Court case--and we know of none--in which the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment was held to have been violated by prison overcrowding alone. . . .In sum, to the extent that the district court concluded that Walker established an Eighth Amendment violation based not solely on overcrowding and its attendant decrease in safety from violence but also on deprivations of such basic necessities as sleep, ventilation, or sanitary living space, the court impermissibly relied on its own view of the facts, and thereby invaded the province of the jury. To the extent that the court instead did not rely on facts beyond the jury's findings of overcrowding and the attendant decrease in safety, those factual findings by the jury should also have informed the legal determination by the district court as to whether Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. In light of the authorities discussed above, the jury's findings were insufficient to support a conclusion that Walker was deprived of the minimal civilized measure of life's basic necessities. It may be that the findings that the (unrealized) threat of violence and the constant anxiety as to lack of safety resulting from the undisputed overcrowding--here lasting for some $2^{1}/_{2}$ years--which led the jury to find that Walker had suffered mental or emotional injury, were sufficient to warrant a decision that Walker was subjected to cruel and unusual psychological punishment, thereby warranting an award of nominal damages. But we need not resolve that question, because we see no authorities that clearly established such a legal principle. In the absence of clearly established law to inform Defendants that their conduct in not moving Walker to another cell in an overcrowded prison violated Walker's rights under the Eighth Amendment, Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity from his claims for damages, including for nominal damages.")

Sabir v. Williams, 37 F.4th 810, 824-25 (2d Cir. 2022) ("We reject the wardens' argument that Salahuddin's holding is an 'abstract legal principle' that 'cannot establish law for purposes of qualified immunity.'. . There are, of course, some contexts in which a higher degree of specificity is required to establish the law for purposes of qualified immunity than in others. For example, the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of 'unreasonable searches and seizures' is an 'abstract right[ ]' because 'it may be difficult for an officer to know whether a search or seizure will be deemed reasonable given the precise situation encountered.'. . No such concerns are present here. Based on RFRA's requirements, it is not 'difficult for an [official] to know whether' an unjustified substantial burden on religious exercise 'will be deemed reasonable.'. . . [I]f an official substantially burdens a sincere religious exercise but cannot point to evidence that the application of the burden was in service of any interest—let alone a compelling one—the official has violated RFRA. Thus, the wardens are not entitled to dismissal of the SAC on the basis of qualified immunity because our case law, in conjunction with the text of RFRA, clearly established at the time of the events at issue that substantially burdening Sabir's and Conyers's religious exercise with no justification, as was alleged by the plaintiffs, violated RFRA.")

Washington v. Napolitano, 29 F.4th 93, 98-99 (2d Cir. 2022), pet. for cert. filed, No. 22-80 (U.S. July 25, 2022) ([W]e hold that, if a police officer finds an individual's statements regarding his lack of intent to commit a crime to be credible in light of the totality of the circumstances, or if (at the very least) such exculpatory statements could materially impact the probable cause determination by a neutral magistrate judge, that officer cannot then use the incriminating portions of those statements as the foundation for probable cause in an arrest warrant affidavit for that individual, while either knowingly or recklessly concealing from the judge that credibility assessment (if it has been reached) and/or the exculpatory details of those statements. It is clearly established in this Circuit that such a concealment, which deprives the judge of material information that could impact the probable cause determination, would not be protected by qualified immunity.")

Torcivia v. Suffolk Cty., New York, 17 F.4th 342, 367-68 (2d Cir. 2021) ("We agree with the District Court that Torcivia has identified no Second Circuit or Supreme Court precedent that 'clearly established' that by failing to discharge him for roughly sixteen hours for emergent mental health evaluation, allowing him first to return to sobriety and possibly keeping him for a few hours after he was medically cleared to be discharged, the State Defendants or Intern Smith violated Torcivia's constitutional rights. . . On the contrary, we have rejected unlawful seizure claims made by plaintiffs detained for longer periods of time than Torcivia. . . Torcivia argues that in so detaining him, the State Defendants and Intern Smith violated New York state law and that accordingly, they violated a clearly established federal constitutional right. Even assuming that these defendants did violate state law as he contends, Torcivia's argument fails. 'Our precedents have firmly established that the mere violation of a state law does not automatically give rise to a violation of federal constitutional rights.'. .Because Torcivia has not shown that the State Defendants or Intern Smith violated a clearly established constitutional right by failing to discharge him for evaluation and because this factor is dispositive, no further analysis is necessary. We affirm the District Court's order granting summary judgment in favor of the State Defendants and Intern Smith on Torcivia's § 1983 claim.")

Horn v. Stephenson, 11 F.4th 163, 171-73 (2d Cir. 2021) ("Stephenson does not dispute that Walker clearly established the duty of police to share with the prosecutor any Brady evidence that is favorable to the accused. Nor does he contest in this appeal that the GRC Reports were material and exculpatory. He presses a qualified immunity defense on the sole basis that Walker does not apply to a firearms examiner employed by the State Police Laboratory. We disagree and conclude that a police forensic examiner, whether an analyst or technician fulfilling any of the roles associated with forensic analysis, in 1999 reasonably would have understood that he or she was required to turn over exculpatory information to the prosecutor. . . . As an employee of a division of the Connecticut State Police whose principal function was to assist law enforcement in carrying out its investigative efforts, Stephenson reasonably would have understood himself to be a member of the police to whom Brady applies. That Stephenson was a technical specialist, and not a sworn officer, does not place him beyond the scope of Walker. It is well settled that the absence of precedent involving 'fundamentally similar' facts is not fatal to a finding that the law is clearly established. . . '[T]he salient question ... is whether the state of the law ... gave [the defendant] fair warning that [his] alleged treatment of [the plaintiff] was unconstitutional.'. . Here, no reasonable police forensic examiner would have understood Walker to turn on the distinction between sworn and unsworn police officers advanced by Stephenson. . . . Our conclusion, based on Walker, that Brady applies to forensic examiners in state crime laboratories is reinforced by decisions of our sister circuits that by 1999 had reached the same conclusion. [noting cases from 5th and 10th Circuits] This pattern of decisions is not undermined by the single, Eighth Circuit case cited by Stephenson for support. . . In Villasana v. Wilhoit, the crime laboratory technician concealed reports from the prosecutor in accordance with agency policy. . . Focusing on the issue of fault, the court concluded that the technician was entitled to qualified immunity because 'there [wa]s no evidence the defendants acted in bad faith, that is, engaged in "a conscious effort to suppress exculpatory evidence."'. . Nowhere in Villasana did the court hold or suggest that Brady is limited to certain subgroups of police officers. To the contrary, it assumed that state crime laboratory technicians have a constitutional duty not to withhold exculpatory information intentionally.")

Wagschal v. Skoufis, 857 F. App'x 18, __ (2d Cir. 2021) ("Even assuming that, after Knight's vacatur, it would remain clearly established that a public official's use of Facebook's tools to hide specific comments on the official's public page violates the First Amendment, such a rule was not clearly established in 2018 by Knight or any other decision from our Court or the Supreme Court. In so commenting, we take heed of the Supreme Court's caution against determining what constitutes 'clearly established law' at too high a level of generality. . . The 'hide comments' feature limits the user's interaction on Facebook in a different, and less substantial, way than does the blocking at issue in Knight. Blocking a person on Twitter may well frustrate his or her ability to follow along with and engage in an online discussion, while hiding a comment on Facebook merely shields the comment from viewing by the general public. . . Whether hiding comments in this manner would place an unconstitutional burden on speech was not a question addressed by Knight, in which we dealt with the President's use of the blocking function on Twitter. . . Skoufis is therefore also entitled to qualified immunity with regard to Wagschal's damages claim arising from his temporarily hidden comments.")

Ketcham v. City of Mount Vernon, 992 F.3d 144, 151-52 (2d Cir. 2021) ("While the absence of serious injury is certainly a matter that the jury can consider in assessing both the reasonableness of the force and potential damages from any misconduct, a district court should not grant summary judgment on this basis alone. Additionally, there is presumably no proper law enforcement justification for deliberately pushing a restrained individual's head into a car's hard, metal doorframe. Thus, if a jury credits Ketcham's testimony that Patterson deliberately slammed his head into the car's doorframe despite him being restrained and not resisting, that force would be excessive. Regardless of the extent of Ketcham's injuries, the infliction of harm against a restrained and unresisting suspect is excessive force, and such conduct would violate the Fourth Amendment. As an alternative basis for upholding the district court's decision, Appellees argue that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. To demonstrate entitlement to qualified immunity, the officers must show that their actions did not violate clearly established law, or that it was objectively reasonable for them to believe that their actions did not violate such law. . .The district court did not address this argument. Because we conclude that reasonable officers would not disagree as to the illegality of the alleged handcuffing conduct, qualified immunity is rejected in that respect. . . The established law of this Circuit makes clear that the excessive tightening of handcuffs after an explicit verbal complaint of pain is made violates the Fourth Amendment. . . Accordingly, it would be unreasonable for officers to believe that ignoring Ketcham's cries to loosen the over-tight, non-double-locked restraints did not violate clearly established law. If credited by a jury, Ketcham's testimony indicates Patterson did just that. We therefore reject his qualified immunity defense as to the handcuffing allegations. We reach the same conclusion with regard to the alleged head-slamming conduct. By March 2017, it was 'clearly established by our Circuit caselaw that it is impermissible to use significant force against a restrained arrestee who is not actively resisting.'. . . Therefore, accepting as true Ketcham's testimony that Patterson 'slammed [his] head into the car's door frame' despite being restrained and physically docile, . . . we must reject Patterson's qualified immunity defense in this respect as well.")

Vasquez v. Maloney, 990 F.3d 232, 238-43 (2d Cir. 2021) ("Law that was clearly established in January 2015 put the Officers on notice that their detention of Vasquez was unconstitutional. . . .On this record, the Officers did not satisfy even the low threshold that would satisfy either justification for an investigative Terry stop. That is, they offered no specific and articulable facts—at all—supporting an inference that Vasquez was (1) involved in or (2) wanted in connection with a crime. . . .[T]he Officers seek to justify their seizure of Vasquez based solely on Detective Cruz's recollection of Vasquez and his previous arrests by Clarkstown police, and Detective Cruz's uncorroborated belief that 'there might be' a warrant for Vasquez's arrest. . . But, absent any basis in articulable facts, speculation that a warrant 'might' be outstanding is the quintessential 'inchoate and unparticularized suspicion or "hunch,"'. . . and here it was readily dispelled by the dispatcher's report that there was no outstanding warrant. . . . Since Terry, it has been clearly established that when an officer can point to no facts at all to justify a hunch, the detention violates the Fourth Amendment. The Officers suggest that our decision in United States v. Santa, 180 F.3d 20 (2d Cir. 1999), supports their claim to qualified immunity. . . . Santa offers no safe harbor for the Officers. In that case, the officers articulated a specific fact—a computer record of an outstanding warrant which they first checked and confirmed—on which they reasonably relied, even though that record turned out to be erroneous. Here, by contrast, the Officers do not claim to have relied on anything, not even one officer's faulty memory of an outstanding warrant, in seizing and detaining Vasquez. Absent any articulation of a factual basis for a belief that a warrant existed, Santa offers their position no support. . . The Officers further contend that denying them qualified immunity amounts to a requirement that 'police exhaust all available means of technology to determine whether an arrest warrant was open before conducting a basic safety search.'. . But the problem here is not so much that the police failed to confirm the existence of a warrant; it is that, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Vasquez, they did not even purport to have any basis for believing that there was a warrant outstanding for his arrest in the first place.

. . .In sum, we hold that it was clearly established law in January 2015 that an officer's unconfirmed hunch that an arrest warrant might possibly exist, coupled with nothing more than the officer's recognition of a suspect from prior arrests, does not constitute reasonable suspicion justifying a Terry stop or frisk. Accordingly, at this stage and on the limited factual record before us, the Officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for their detention and frisk of Vasquez.")

Gerard v. City of New York, 843 F. App'x 380, ___ (2d Cir. 2021) ("We need not, and exercise our discretion not to, decide whether Detective Bia's alleged conduct would have given rise to a constitutional violation, in part because the record is murky on what precisely Gerard alleges Detective Bia did with his gun and what circumstances confronted Detective Bia at the time of the alleged incident. . . Drawing all inferences in favor of Gerard and assuming, for purposes of this appeal only, that Detective Bia brandished his gun and threatened to shoot Gerard when he volubly refused to comply with the court order, Detective Bia was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . It is clearly established that the use of deadly force against an unarmed, non-dangerous person is unconstitutional. . . This Court has also held that verbal harassment, absent 'any appreciable injury,' cannot support an excessive force claim. . . But neither the Supreme Court, nor this Court, has clearly established that a verbal threat combined with a display of a firearm, without any physical contact, constitutes excessive force, much less when it is directed at an uncooperative detainee who is loudly and profanely resisting a court order.")

Hurd v. Fredenburgh, 984 F.3d 1075, 1089-90, 1092 (2d Cir. 2021) ("It was not clearly established during the period of Hurd's prolonged detention that an inmate suffers harm of a constitutional magnitude under the Eighth Amendment when they are imprisoned past their mandatory conditional release date, nor was it clearly established that an inmate has a liberty interest in mandatory conditional release protected by the Fourteenth Amendment's substantive due process clause. Hurd nevertheless urges us to find that these rights were clearly established because they follow from existing precedent. For his Eighth Amendment claim, Hurd relies on Sample, 885 F.2d 1099, Calhoun, 999 F.2d 647, Sudler v. City of New York, 689 F.3d 159 (2d Cir. 2012), and Francis, 942 F.3d 126. These cases confirm a uniform legal principle that no federal, state, or local authority can keep an inmate detained past the expiration of the sentence imposed on them. But in the qualified immunity analysis, the Supreme Court has admonished that rights should not be defined at a high level of generality and instead must be 'particularized to the facts of the case.'. . None of the cases upon which Hurd relies addresses a conditional release scheme, let alone one in which an inmate is entitled to mandatory release prior to the expiration of their maximum sentence. More to the point, none of them confirm that prolonging an inmate's detention past their conditional release date might violate the inmate's rights under the Eighth Amendment. . . . It was clearly established that New York State could not detain Hurd past the expiration of his maximum sentence, but it was not clearly established that once Hurd's conditional release date was approved, continued detention beyond that date qualifies as a constitutional harm for Eighth Amendment purposes. . . . As for his substantive due process claim, Hurd admits that no decision has held that imprisonment past a mandatory conditional release date violates the Fourteenth Amendment's substantive protections. He nevertheless argues that 'such a conclusion follows inescapably from the procedural due process cases, as a prisoner must have such a right once state officials have actually granted him discretionary early release.'. . We disagree. The substantive due process analysis differs from procedural due process; and it is not the case that one must follow from the other. And for the same reasons that our precedents do not dictate the outcome of his Eighth Amendment claim, Hurd's liberty interest in conditional release does not obviously follow from the procedural due process cases upon which Hurd relies. Fredenburgh is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Hurd's Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims.")

Hayes v. Dahlke, 976 F.3d 259, 276 n.8 (2d Cir. 2020)("Dahlke alternatively argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because 'it was objectively reasonable to believe that the thorough search Hayes described did not violate the Eighth Amendment.'. . We disagree. Although there is clearly a factual dispute as to whether Dahlke ever engaged in the conduct alleged by Hayes, there can be no doubt that the illegality of such conduct was clearly established by Crawford the year before the frisk took place. See 796 F.3d at 254 ("A correction[ ] officer's intentional contact with an inmate's genitalia or other intimate area, which serves no penological purpose and is undertaken with the intent to gratify the officer's sexual desire or to humiliate the inmate, violates the Eighth Amendment.").")

Pourkavoos v. Town of Avon, 823 F. App'x 53, ___ (2d Cir. 2020) ("[W]e have cautioned against 'convert[ing] the fair notice requirement into a presumption against the existence of basic constitutional rights.'. . In Edrei, we held that our rule was clearly established 'that using force in a crowd control context violates due process' and as such that it was sufficient to put police officers on notice of the unlawful nature of using a 'long-range acoustic device' that could produce volumes unsafe for human ears during a protest. . . To hold otherwise, we explained, would be akin to 'saying police officers who run over people crossing the street illegally can claim immunity simply because we have never addressed a Fourteenth Amendment claim involving jaywalkers.'. . So too here. Our precedent establishes, and it should come as no surprise, that officers may not knowingly omit information likely to influence a judge or a prosecutor's probable cause determination.")

Booker v. Graham, 974 F.3d 101, 106-07 (2d Cir. 2020) ("We may 'grant qualified immunity on the ground that a purported right was not "clearly established" by prior case law, without resolving the often more difficult question whether the purported right exists at all.'. . . We need not reassess the legitimacy of Defendants' penological interest in the lockdown, the reasonableness of the lockdown restrictions, or the feasibility of alternative means by which Defendants could have accommodated Booker's observance of Ramadan. Instead, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Defendants on the alternative basis of qualified immunity—i.e., because there was no clearly established law requiring the accommodation of inmates' religious practices during a prison lockdown. . . . [W]e have never held that a prison has an obligation to provide religiously compliant meals during a facility-wide, safety-motivated lockdown. Nor have we held that a prison must accommodate group prayers or religious bathing rituals under such circumstances. Indeed, Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent make clear that 'a generally applicable policy will not be held to violate a plaintiff's right to free exercise of religion if that policy "is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.". . Federal law does not provide any clearly established right of an inmate confined to the SHU to attend group prayer, and New York law actually prohibits it.")

Liberian Community Ass'n of Connecticut v. Lamont, 970 F.3d 174, 187-91 (2d Cir. 2020) ("Boyko and the Mensah-Siehs—the only Appellants seeking damages—advance three legal bases for their claim: substantive due process, procedural due process, and the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable seizures. We discuss only whether, at the time of Dr. Mullen's alleged conduct, it was clearly established that her conduct ran afoul of these constitutional protections.[15] [fn. 15: Appellants urge us to 'address the merits of the constitutional issue even if the Court were to conclude that Dr. Mullen's conduct is shielded by qualified immunity.'. .Yet the Supreme Court has cautioned us to 'think hard, and then think hard again, before turning small cases into large ones.'. . While there are circumstances in which discretion is properly exercised to address step one of the qualified immunity analysis even when qualified immunity is appropriate at step two, this is not such a situation.] . . . . Taking a generalized statement like that found in Project Release or Jones as evidence of a 'clearly established rule' in the context of quarantines conflicts with the Supreme Court's directive that we should not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Quarantines against infectious disease, involving different public safety concerns and implicating different liberty interests, are simply not sufficiently analogous to civil commitment of the mentally ill to clearly establish applicable due process constraints. . . . In sum, there was by no means a 'robust consensus' on the proper standard for analyzing quarantine claims at the time of the conduct at issue here. . . To the extent the substantive due process restrictions articulated by Appellants existed then, they were 'at best undeveloped.'. . That district courts in this Circuit (Best and Shinnick, specifically) have employed different analyses only further 'demonstrates that the law on the point [was] not well established.'. .In such circumstances, where the precedent is simply not 'clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply,'. . . the qualified immunity bar applies. As the Supreme Court has recognized, public officials cannot be expected 'to predict the future course of constitutional law' based on their reading of a handful of non-precedential opinions. . . . Neither civil commitment law nor other infectious disease cases had clearly articulated the substantive due process standard Appellants urge should have governed Dr. Mullen's actions. Accordingly, the district court did not err in affording qualified immunity as to this claim.")

Liberian Community Ass'n of Connecticut v. Lamont, 970 F.3d 174, 191-93 (2d Cir. 2020) ("The inquiry into the existence of a procedural due process right is guided by the three-factor balancing test enunciated in Mathews v. Eldridge[.] . . At the start, because that analysis entails balancing multiple factors, procedural due process, 'unlike some legal rules, is not a technical conception with a fixed content unrelated to time, place and circumstances.'. . Rather, 'due process is flexible and calls for such procedural protections as the particular situation demands.'. . 'Given this flexible, context-dependent approach, it will be a rare case in which prior precedents have definitively resolved a novel claim of procedural due process. That makes particularly fertile ground for qualified immunity, given that state officials can be liable only for violations of rights that have been established "beyond debate" and with "particular[ity]" by existing constitutional precedents.'. .Again, Appellants and the dissent rely almost exclusively upon cases imported from the civil commitment context or upon Connecticut state law. But as already explained, the civil commitment cases are insufficiently analogous to clearly establish the procedural rights Appellants urge us to adopt in this case. . . . And '[a] violation of state law neither gives plaintiffs a § 1983 claim nor deprives defendants of the defense of qualified immunity to a proper § 1983 claim.'. .Indeed, we have been unable to find—and Appellants do not identify—any cases articulating federal procedural due process protections in the quarantine context. The most analogous case, Greene v. Edwards, 164 W. Va. 326, 327–29, 263 S.E.2d 661 (1980) (per curiam), held that due process guarantees certain procedural rights—including adequate notice, a right to counsel, and an elevated burden of proof—when the state seeks to involuntarily confine an individual with tuberculosis. . . .And cases from both the Supreme Court and our Court make clear that the federal procedural due process guarantee does not require state officials to inform individuals of all the procedural guarantees they enjoy under state law. . . . While the full panoply of their rights under state law was not immediately conveyed to them in writing, nor was a hearing convened, Appellants point to no case that clearly establishes that Dr. Mullen violated the Constitution by failing to undertake these measures.")

Liberian Community Ass'n of Connecticut v. Lamont, 970 F.3d 174, 193-94 (2d Cir. 2020) ("Appellants have cited no case in which a court has invalidated a quarantine order under the Fourth Amendment. And although they characterize their quarantines as 'scientifically unjustified,' . . . a number of factors could support a determination that the quarantines were at least arguably reasonable as a matter of Fourth Amendment law. . . . Put simply, it was not clearly established that it was unreasonable, pursuant to the Fourth Amendment, for Appellees to quarantine individuals traveling from a nation suffering from an Ebola epidemic for the duration of the disease's incubation period. And in such circumstances, Dr. Mullen is entitled to qualified immunity. To be clear, we need not and do not reach the merits of Appellants' constitutional claims. We conclude simply that the district court did not err in determining that no clearly established law existed at the time of Dr. Mullen's actions such that every reasonable official would have known that her conduct fell outside the boundaries of due process and Fourth Amendment constraints. No significant precedent had previously articulated the requirements of substantive due process, procedural due process, or the Fourth Amendment in the quarantine or infectious diseases contexts, as urged by Appellants here. In such circumstances, the district court properly concluded that Dr. Mullen is entitled to qualified immunity.") Liberian Community Ass'n of Connecticut v. Lamont, 970 F.3d 174, 194, 198-200 (2d Cir. 2020) (Chin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("As we have seen most strikingly with the current epidemic, the government surely has a compelling interest in preventing the spread of disease. At the same time, however, the government's power to protect the community may not be exercised in an unreasonable or arbitrary manner. While intrusions on personal liberties will of course be necessary to safeguard public health and safety, they must be based on scientific and not political considerations. In my view, plaintiffs-appellants Ryan Boyko and Laura Skrip and Louise Mensah-Sieh, Nathaniel Sieh, and their children (collectively, "plaintiffs") plausibly alleged that defendant-appellee Dr. Jewel Mullen, then-Commissioner of Public Health, violated their constitutional rights by ordering them, in connection with the Ebola outbreak in 2014, into quarantine for two weeks in the case of Boyko and Skrip and three weeks in the case of the Mensah-Sieh family, when quarantine was not scientifically or medically warranted or justified. Moreover, in my view, plaintiffs plausibly alleged violations of clearly established rights such that, at the pleadings stage of the case, it was error for the district court to dismiss these claims based on qualified immunity. Accordingly, I would reverse as to plaintiffs' claims for damages. . . . In short, in my view the complaint alleges, plausibly and with great detail, that Dr. Mullen and the other state officials infringed on plaintiffs' fundamental right to liberty, without justification or individualized consideration, when alternative, less restrictive measures were available to protect the public health and safety. . . . As discussed above, in my view the facts alleged in the complaint make out a violation of plaintiffs' rights to substantive and procedural due process. Similarly, in my view these rights were clearly established when Dr. Mullen and the other state officials required plaintiffs to be quarantined. I believe it was error for the district court, on a motion to dismiss when it should have assumed the factual allegations of the complaint to be true, to sustain the affirmative defense of qualified immunity as a matter of law. The district court held that Dr. Mullen's actions did not violate clearly established law because there is no case law regarding an individual's substantive and procedural due process rights in a quarantine scenario, and that, in any event, quarantine here was 'objectively reasonable.'. . As discussed above, however, there are some quarantine and other isolation cases, as well as other analogous cases, including, for example, civil commitment cases dealing with compulsory confinement to protect public safety. And while it may be true that there have been few epidemic cases over the years, the Supreme Court has noted that a 'general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though "the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful."'. . The general constitutional rules discussed above are beyond debate. Freedom from physical restraint is a fundamental liberty interest that cannot be infringed upon by the government unless the restriction is narrowly tailored to further a compelling state interest and less restrictive alternatives to accomplish that goal are not available. . . Moreover, even assuming some ambiguity in the case law, the Connecticut statute -- which incorporates due process protections -- applies with obvious clarity here, as the statute specifically provides that quarantine may be ordered only if necessary to protect the public health, and only if quarantine is the least restrictive alternative available. The complaint alleges in great detail that, given the nature of Ebola, the CDC, scientists, and health experts uniformly agreed that quarantine was not necessary for individuals like plaintiffs, who were asymptomatic and who were no-risk or low-risk for Ebola exposure, and that less restrictive alternatives, such as active monitoring, were available to protect the public. Hence, the complaint plausibly alleges that it was not objectively reasonable for Dr. Mullen and the other state officials to order plaintiffs into quarantine, and to have done so without proper notice or individualized assessment or other procedural safeguards. Finally, I note that the complaint plausibly alleges that the Connecticut officials did not act in good faith, as they purportedly imposed quarantine on plaintiffs not based on scientific or medical reasons but for political reasons. The complaint alleges that Dr. Mullen and other state officials knew that quarantine was not necessary to protect the public health. But in October 2014, the Governor of Connecticut was 'actively campaigning to be reelected ... [and p]ublic polling and media accounts at the time described the gubernatorial race as extremely close.'. . The Connecticut officials adopted a policy, as the Governor's office apparently touted, that was 'more stringent' than guidelines issued by the CDC, one that mandated quarantine even for asymptomatic individuals, when quarantine was not scientifically justified. . . The complaint alleges that the state officials ordered plaintiffs to be quarantined and then continued them in quarantine, even though they knew plaintiffs did not present a risk to public health, because of 'sensationalist news accounts [that] stoked public fear that travelers might bring Ebola across the ocean to [Connecticut].'. .These allegations, in my view, are plausible. Accordingly, I dissent from the majority's affirmance of the district court's dismissal of plaintiffs' claims for damages.")

Lennox v. Miller, 968 F.3d 150, 156-58 (2d Cir. 2020) ("Officer Clarke asserts he is entitled to qualified immunity because his actions, even viewed in the light most favorable to Lennox, did not violate 'clearly established' law. The operative question thus becomes whether it was clearly impermissible on July 22, 2016 under the circumstances presented for a police officer to use the force that a jury could find Officer Clarke used—that is, when the handcuffed arrestee was not actively resisting arrest—to take down that arrestee, kneel on top of her with his full body weight, and slam her head into the ground. Courts are cautioned not to define clearly established law at 'a high level of generality,' and 'police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue.'. .That is not to say that there must be 'a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, but 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . Years before the incident at issue here, we took note of the 'well established' principle 'that the use of entirely gratuitous force is unreasonable and therefore excessive.'. . . .And we have not limited potential findings of excessive force to situations where officers were using equipment like pepper spray or tasers. . . On July 22, 2016, it was therefore clearly established by our Circuit caselaw that it is impermissible to use significant force against a restrained arrestee who is not actively resisting. . . As Muschette suggests, and as we have recently explained in great detail in Jones v. Treubig, this is true despite differences in the precise method by which that force was conveyed. Because a reasonable jury could find that the force used by Officer Clarke was significant and that Lennox was not resisting when such force was used, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that Officer Clarke did not violate clearly established law. The district court thus properly denied Officer Clarke qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings, and we affirm this denial without expressing a view as to Officer Clarke's ultimate entitlement to judgment in his favor after factual disputes are resolved. . . . Even assuming that Officer Miller observed Officer Clarke's use of force, there is no evidence in the record that would suggest he had a realistic opportunity to intervene that he then disregarded. Nor do we know of any clearly established law that would require him to abandon his crowd control duties and intervene to stop Officer Clarke's use of force. Thus, Officer Miller was entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, and we reverse the judgment as to him.")

Elder v. McCarthy, 967 F.3d 113, 131 (2d Cir. 2020) ("We established in Kingsley that a hearing officer is required to identify the witnesses an inmate seeks to call using 'readily available' prison records, . . . even where the inmate cannot 'identify [the witnesses] by name[.]'. . . Kling made a paltry effort to do so. Nor does he argue that he was somehow reasonably ignorant that those records existed. In light of our guidance in Kingsley, Kling's ineffectual efforts to identify Elder's requested witnesses were not 'objectively reasonable.' Kling is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Vega v. Semple, 963 F.3d 259, 273-81 (2d Cir. 2020) ("The Defendants in this appeal have staked their defense on the second step. For the purposes of their motion to dismiss in the District Court, the Defendants merely asserted that they had not violated any clearly established law; they did 'not disput[e] ... that the plaintiffs' alleged conditions of confinement at Garner ... amounted to or could amount to a constitutional violation.'. . Accordingly, the District Court considered only the second step—whether the right was clearly established at the relevant times pleaded in the complaint. Like the District Court, our inquiry is only as to whether the Defendants violated clearly established law. . . . Though the rule is stated simply enough, the application of the rule often presents challenges. As Dean John C. Jefferies, Jr. has commented, 'determining whether an officer violated "clearly established" law has proved to be a mare's nest.'. . Defining the precise right at issue poses a 'chronic difficulty' for courts. . . By framing the relevant right too narrowly, we may unduly permit officials to escape liability; by framing the relevant right too generally, however, we risk allowing plaintiffs 'to convert the rule of qualified immunity ... into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.' On the one hand, 'the clearly established right must be defined with specificity.'. . Indeed, the Supreme Court instructs courts that '[t]he dispositive question is whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,' and that '[t]his inquiry must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . On the other hand, the Supreme Court has also emphasized that, while the 'contours of the right must be sufficiently clear[,]' that 'is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.'. .In attempting to determine the right at issue here, the District Court turned to a Supreme Court case decided in 1993, Helling v. McKinney. . . . The District Court concluded that Helling established a prisoner's right to be free from toxic environmental substances that, like ETS, posed an unreasonable risk of some future harm. Accordingly, the District Court denied Defendants qualified immunity for conduct alleged to have occurred after Helling, decided on June 18, 1993, finding the right to be clearly established as of that date. On de novo review, we hold the same: as of June 18, 1993, reasonable officials were on notice that deliberate indifference to Plaintiffs' excessive exposure to radon, then a known toxic environmental substance, violated their Eighth Amendment right. Reasonable officials had such 'fair notice' as of that date because of Helling's clear pronouncement: inmates exposed to toxic substances did not need to wait to get sick to file a lawsuit; they did not need to wait, in other words, for 'tragic event' to occur. . . Rather, they could bring a claim under the Eighth Amendment as soon as an 'unreasonable risk of serious damage to ... future health' existed. . . But in what context would a reasonable official know that right to be violated? This court has stated that 'after Helling it was clearly established that prison officials could violate the Eighth Amendment through deliberate indifference to an inmate's exposure to levels of ETS that posed an unreasonable risk of future harm to the inmate's health.'. . Put another way, as of 1993, no reasonable prison official could be unaware that deliberate indifference to levels of ETS that posed an unreasonable risk of future harm to the inmate's health was a Constitutional violation. But what about radon exposure? Were the 'contours of the right' in Helling 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would understand' that deliberate indifference to radon exposure 'violates that right' as well? The answer is 'yes.' As the District Court concluded: '[i]f anything, knowing or reckless exposure of prisoners to radon, given the facts alleged by Plaintiffs, is more obviously unconstitutional than exposure of prisoners to ETS was in 1993.'. . The District Court reached this conclusion because, while the dangers of ETS were still being debated in 1993, 'radon in 1993 had already five years earlier been identified "as a human carcinogen by the International Agency for Research on Cancer ... and added by Congress that same year to the Toxic Substances Control Act."'. . . If a reasonable officer was aware of the future risk of ETS by that point, then surely a reasonable officer would have been aware of the future risk of a known carcinogen like radon. . . .Taking the allegations as true, we conclude that the mitigation effort implemented was not a reasonable measure taken to abate the risk of excessive radon exposure in the cell block; instead, the allegedly excessive radon in the cell block went unattended. A conscious decision not to address a known risk of excessive radon exposure, as described by Plaintiffs, would violate clearly established law for all the reasons we have expressed above. . . . First, Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity on the basis that no binding decision discusses the constitutional implications of radon exposure to inmates. Essentially, they argue that qualified immunity must be granted absent binding precedent that addresses the very same carcinogen in this case. The argument is not compelling. The Supreme Court has held that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . We have repeatedly rejected this type of argument, . . . and we do so once more today. . . Defendants next argue that the District Court erred by relying on statutes, not case law, in partially denying qualified immunity. We disagree. While '[o]fficials sued for constitutional violations do not lose their qualified immunity merely because their conduct violates some statutory or administrative provision,' . . . we have previously held that 'we may examine statutory or administrative provisions in conjunction with prevailing circuit or Supreme Court law to determine whether an individual had fair warning that his or her behavior would violate the victim's constitutional rights.'. . The District Court did not rely exclusively on any alleged violation of statutes or regulations to determine that Defendants had violated clearly established rights. Rather, the District Court relied on the binding case law in Helling and this Circuit's decision in LaBounty v. Coughlin, recognizing a prisoner's right to be free from exposure to friable asbestos, . . . to establish the contours of the right. In conjunction with those cases, it referred to regulations and statutes provided in the complaint to bolster the conclusions that radon is a dangerous carcinogen; that society is unwilling to tolerate the risks accompanying certain levels of radon exposure; and that such risks are—and have been since 1988—well known. Both the Supreme Court and this Court have similarly considered statutes as part of the qualified immunity analysis. . . Moreover, our decision also relies on our binding decisional law in Warren v. Keane, which held that, after Helling, it was 'clearly established' that defendants could violate the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights by exposing them to unreasonable levels of ETS with deliberate indifference. . . .Third, Defendants argue that the denial of their qualified immunity motion is inconsistent with the Supreme Court's decision in Taylor v. Barkes. . . We think that Taylor is distinguishable and does not preclude our ruling on qualified immunity. [court discusses Taylor] . . . Just as important as what the Supreme Court did conclude in Taylor is what it did not conclude. It did not conclude that it would have been reasonable for the prison guards to completely forego suicide-prevention screening—to simply not act at all. Nor did it conclude that it would have been consistent with clearly established law for the prison guards to forego preventive measures if they were aware that an inmate posed a suicide risk—to operate in a state of knowing indifference. And so, the Supreme Court did not address the distinct possibility that complete inaction in the face of a risk to a prisoner's health—or complete indifference to that risk once it was known—could be unreasonable, in violation of a prisoner's clearly established constitutional rights. With that in mind, we see no difficulty in appreciating the difference between the present appeal and Taylor. In this case, Plaintiffs have alleged that prior to 2014, Defendants failed to take any steps to mitigate the substantial risk of excessive radon exposure. . . Unlike Taylor, where there was a risk-mitigation system in place that allegedly should have been better, the Plaintiffs here complain that Defendants took no action whatsoever. Worse still, Plaintiffs here plausibly allege that Defendants had knowledge of the radon exposure risk and still failed to act. Taylor granted immunity to prison guards who took some effort to remediate the health risks of the prisoners they oversaw; but it hardly stands for the principle that prison guards are immune even where no action is taken, especially when a health risk is known. . . In sum: Plaintiffs have alleged that from Garner's inception, Defendants had knowledge of an unreasonable risk of serious harm to the inmates' health, namely excessive radon exposure, and that Defendants were deliberately indifferent in failing to take any reasonable steps (including testing and mitigation) to abate this risk. . . On the basis of these allegations, accepted as true, we conclude that a failure to take any steps to abate the risk of excessive radon exposure violated Plaintiffs' clearly established right to be free from deliberate indifference to exposure to excessive radon gas, a toxic substance that poses a serious health risk—a right clearly established in Helling.")

Jones v. Treubig, 963 F.3d 214, 224-28, 230, 236, 240 (2d Cir. 2020) ("The Second Circuit has set forth the procedure by which district courts should resolve disputes on factual issues at trial that are relevant to the qualified immunity analysis. In particular, '[i]f there are unresolved factual issues which prevent an early disposition of the defense [of qualified immunity], the jury should decide these issues on special interrogatories.'. . . The first step of the qualified immunity test—namely, whether the defendant violated a statutory or constitutional right—was determined by the jury in this case, which found that Lt. Treubig used excessive force against Jones in violation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. As stated above, Lt. Treubig does not appeal this finding. Accordingly, our task here is to determine whether the right at issue was 'clearly established'—that is, whether 'it was objectively reasonable for [Lt. Treubig] to believe [his] acts did not violate those rights.'. .Before the incident at issue here in April 2015, it was clearly established in this

Circuit that it is a Fourth Amendment violation for a police officer to use significant force against an arrestee who is no longer resisting and poses no threat to the safety of officers or others. . . .Notwithstanding that the focus of this appeal is the use of a taser, not pepper spray, we have warned that '[a]n officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury.'. . .It follows then that, after Tracy, any reasonable officer would understand that, because it violated clearly established law to use pepper spray against a non-resisting and non-threatening individual, the same would be true for the use of a taser. . . .In other words, the explicit focus of Tracy's Fourth Amendment analysis was on the officer's significant use of force in a gratuitous and excessive manner during an arrest, rather than the particular mode of that force. Therefore, following Tracy, it was clearly established that an officer's significant use of force against an arrestee who was no longer resisting and who posed no threat to the safety of officers or others—whether such force was by pepper spray, taser, or any other similar use of significant force—violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . [W]e now turn to whether the right articulated in Tracy was clearly established in the more particular context in which the challenged conduct regarding the taser occurred in this case. . . . With respect to the second tasing cycle, the district court concluded that 'there is nothing in the cases from the Supreme Court or the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit that gave "fair warning" that the second use of the taser was unconstitutional at the time of the plaintiff's arrest.'. .As discussed below, in reaching this conclusion, the district court erroneously relied upon a factual finding—namely, that Jones was continuing to resist after the first tasing—that was rejected by the jury in a special interrogatory and is inconsistent with the trial evidence as construed most favorably to Jones, which is the applicable standard on a Rule 50 motion. Moreover, the district court relied upon the fact that '[t]he jury found that Lt. Treubig believed—although incorrectly—that the plaintiff was resisting arrest and that the second use of the taser was needed to gain control of the plaintiff's arms.'. . A mistake of fact, however, in the absence of an additional jury finding that the mistake was reasonable (when there are disputed material facts on that question) is insufficient to support an officer's claim that he is entitled to qualified immunity, and no such finding of reasonableness was made by the jury here. Similarly, for the reasons provided below, the fact that the re-cycling of the taser followed in rapid succession after the first tasing and that Jones was unhandcuffed at the time of the re-cycled taser does not undermine our qualified immunity analysis in this case. For the reasons explained below, we hold that, after considering the jury's factual findings in the special interrogatories and construing the evidence regarding the remaining factual disputes most favorably to Jones, Lt. Treubig's second use of the taser under the particular circumstances he confronted violated clearly established law. . . .Not only was there evidence in the record to support that Jones was no longer resisting arrest at the time of second tasing, but the jury made that specific factual finding in a special interrogatory. . . . [O]ur qualified immunity analysis must assume that, even though Jones may have been resisting arrest during the initial parts of the police encounter up to the time of the first tasing, when Lt. Treubig re-cycled his taser and sent another electric shock through Jones, he was no longer trying to get off the ground, no longer actively resisting arrest, and no longer posing a threat to the police officers. Instead, construing the evidence most favorably to Jones, at that point, he was face down on the ground with his arms spread. On those facts, no reasonable officer could believe that the use of the taser a second time against Jones was lawful. . . . [W]here such an opportunity to re-assess reasonably exists, officers must consider whether additional force is necessary under the circumstances confronting the officer—a point made clear under the circumstances in Tracy. . . . Notwithstanding the fact that Lt. Treubig's two uses of the taser occurred in rapid succession, there was clear evidence that he had enough time to re-assess the situation between the first and second use of the taser. . . . In sum, upon a review of the relevant legal authority, we hold that it was clearly established as of April 2015 that a police officer cannot use significant force, such as a taser, against an individual who is no longer resisting or posing a threat to the officers or others. In light of the jury's findings and viewing the record on the remaining factual disputes in the light most favorable to Jones, we must assume for the qualified immunity analysis that Jones was subdued when Lt. Treubig re-cycled his taser, in that Jones was no longer resisting arrest or posing a threat to the officers or others, but rather lying face down on the ground with his arms spread. No qualified immunity can thus exist on those facts. As a result, we reverse the district court's grant of judgment as a matter of law, and instruct that the jury verdict against Lt. Treubig should be reinstated.")

McCray v. Lee, 963 F.3d 110, 119-20 (2d Cir. 2020) ("The operation of the 'clearly established' standard 'depends substantially upon the level of generality at which the relevant "legal rule" is to be identified.'. . To deny qualified immunity, '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . But this does 'not' mean that the official enjoys immunity 'unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.'. .In this Circuit the rights of prisoners to a meaningful opportunity for physical exercise had been clearly established nearly three decades before the events of which McCray complains. . . . [T]he district court defined the right to a meaningful opportunity for physical exercise at an unduly narrow level of specificity, stating that defendants here would be entitled to qualified immunity 'because there is no clearly established constitutional right to a prison yard without naturally accumulating ice or snow during winter months.'. . But the right to a meaningful opportunity for physical exercise is not confined to a particular season; although not constant, the right is ongoing. The right need not be described with specific references to the weather or characteristics of the seasons of the year in order for a reasonable prison official to understand that climatic features may necessitate responsive measures to ensure that the right to a meaningful opportunity for physical exercise not be denied.")

Barnes v. Fedele, 813 F. App'x 696, ___ (2d Cir. 2020) ("Nuttall relies primarily on White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 551 (2017), which he argues changed the law after our last remand and required there to be 'clearly established' precedent showing that an official violated the law before he can be stripped of qualified immunity. . . We disagree. White did not change the law; it merely 'reiterate[d] the longstanding principle that clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality.'. . Here, the law is and has been specific and clear: Prison officials may only abridge a prisoner's free exercise rights if doing so is 'reasonably related to some legitimate penological interests.'. .Importantly, Nuttall was the only Defendant involved in creating the Directive, yet he did not provide a declaration explaining the penological purpose behind its creation. Indeed, he did not provide any declaration. Nevertheless, the district court imputed the penological interest articulated by Chappius onto Nuttall. . . This was error, as nothing in the record sets forth Nuttall's motivation or thinking. As we indicated when this case was last before us, the analysis for the Defendants who merely applied the Directive is different than the analysis for the Defendant who implemented it. . . It is possible, after all, that Chappius's 'understanding' of the policy, . . . was not aligned with Nuttall's reason for signing the Directive. Accordingly, on the record before us, Nuttall is not entitled to summary judgment.")

Mudge v. Zugalla, 939 F.3d 72, 78-82 (2d Cir. 2019) ("The plaintiff has failed to establish that the right to the meaningful use of his teaching license was clearly established at the time. He has also failed to demonstrate that the defendants' conduct was sufficiently stigmatizing under clearly established law so as to give rise to a 'stigma-plus' claim. We therefore reverse the judgment and remand the case with instruction to the district court to enter summary judgment in favor of the defendants. . . . Multiple district and state courts have expressed the view that New York State recognizes that a teaching-license holder is entitled to a 'meaningful opportunity' to seek employment pursuant to that license, and that denial of such an opportunity constitutes a constructive revocation without due process. . . . The plaintiff contends that the defendants violated his procedural due process rights by denying him a meaningful opportunity to seek employment pursuant to his teaching license. . .Assuming arguendo that a constitutional violation did, in fact, take place, the plaintiff has failed to establish that the right was clearly established at the time of the defendants' conduct. The constitutional right to the meaningful use of a teaching license has not been recognized by the Supreme Court or by this Court; it has, as noted, been adopted by federal-district and state courts only. In the qualified immunity context, that is insufficient to constitute 'clearly established' law. . . And although state law may create property interests, it cannot, of its own force, create a clearly established substantive federal constitutional right. . . Because the plaintiff has failed to establish that the defendants violated his clearly established due process right, the district court erred in denying the defendants qualified immunity as to that claim and declining to grant summary judgment with respect to it. . . .The defendants also argue that the district court erred in denying them qualified immunity as to the plaintiff's "stigma-plus" claim. Here too, we agree with them. . . .Again, the plaintiff may or may not have made out a constitutional claim, but he has in any event failed to establish that the defendants' conduct violated a clearly established right. At the time of the defendants' alleged violation, at least, it was not clearly established that notice of the mere existence of an internal investigation into a license holder's behavior, without some detail as to the possible misconduct being investigated, could give rise to a stigma-plus claim. . . The plaintiff has demonstrated at most that the defendants interfered with his relationship, actual and potential, with a single employer: Middleburgh. That falls decidedly short of demonstrating under clearly established law that the defendants created a significant roadblock to his ability to practice his profession. . . .Thus, even if Mudge had shown facts making out a stigma-plus claim, it was objectively reasonable for the defendants to conclude, in light of then existing law, that their conduct was lawful at the time they engaged in it. The defendants are, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity as to the plaintiff's stigma-plus claim and summary judgment in the defendants' favor on that claim should, on remand, be granted too.")

Brandon v. Kinter, 938 F.3d 21, 39 & n.14 (2d Cir. 2019) ("It is clearly established law in our Circuit that 'to deny prison inmates the provision of food that satisfies the dictates of their faith does unconstitutionally burden their free exercise rights.'. . The defendants contend, however, that the law was not clearly established as to how many religiously compliant meals must be denied before the prisoner's religious beliefs are substantially burdened. Assuming arguendo that this is so, the argument cannot save them. As discussed above, a genuine dispute of material fact exists as to the number of noncompliant meals that Brandon was served. Based on the evidence in the record, a reasonable jury could find that Brandon was denied 63 religiously appropriate meals. And the defendants make no argument that a reasonable officer would have believed that 63 noncompliant meals was not a substantial burden. . . .The defendants may, of course, still argue at trial that they reasonably believed that the meals actually did not contain pork. But because genuine disputes exist as to the facts underlying such a defense, we cannot grant summary judgment to the defendants on such a ground. We today also hold that even the 10 meals that concededly contained pork violated Brandon's rights. Given the material dispute as to the number of pork-containing meals that were served to Brandon, we need not today decide what number of meals would constitute a sufficiently clear violation of Brandon's rights as to preclude a qualified immunity defense.")

Naumovski v. Norris, 934 F.3d 200, 218-19 (2d Cir. 2019) ("To the extent the District Court relied on our recent en banc decision in Zarda v. Altitude Express, Inc. in recognizing Naumovski's arguable sexual orientation discrimination claims, . . . it erred for at least two reasons. First, Zarda specifically addressed the question of whether Title VII prohibits sexual orientation discrimination. It did not address whether the Constitution prohibits sexual orientation discrimination. Thus, Zarda is only 'clearly established law' for statutory sexual orientation discrimination claims under Title VII. It does not, however, 'clearly establish' constitutional (i.e. § 1983) sexual orientation discrimination claims. Second, even if it were reasonable for the District Court to interpret Zarda as establishing a sexual orientation discrimination claim under the Constitution, . . . the conduct at issue in this case predated the issuance of the Zarda decision. Prior to Zarda, our Court had expressly declined to recognize sexual orientation discrimination claims under Title VII, much less the Constitution. . . Thus, if anything, the 'clearly established law' at the time Defendants terminated Naumovski's employment was that sexual orientation discrimination was not a subset of sex discrimination. Insofar as the District Court relied on Zarda, therefore, Defendants were surely entitled to qualified immunity. . .Nor could the District Court rely on freestanding constitutional principles separate from Zarda. To date, neither this court nor the Supreme Court has recognized § 1983 claims for sexual orientation discrimination in public employment. Moreover, when the conduct in this case occurred, neither of the Supreme Court's landmark same-sex marriage cases—United States v. Windsor. . . and Obergefell v. Hodges. . .—had been decided. It was, therefore, not yet clear that all state distinctions based on sexual orientation were constitutionally suspect. . .Thus, even if it is possible today that sexual orientation discrimination in public employment may be actionable under § 1983, at the time of the challenged conduct here such a constitutional prohibition was not yet 'clearly established.' Accordingly,

Mara v. Rilling, 921 F.3d 48, 72, 76-81 (2d Cir. 2019) ("Even if the facts admitted any ambiguity as to Mara's arrest status on January 2, 2013, which we conclude they do not, police officers aware of the totality of circumstances just detailed—particularly, Mara's agreement to a police meeting and the officers' express statement to Mara that he was always free to leave the interview—could reasonably have believed that Mara would not have understood himself to be under arrest at the interview and, therefore, that probable cause was not required to speak with him. Certainly no clearly established law would have compelled 'every reasonable officer' to have concluded otherwise in the context described. . . Accordingly, as a matter of law, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Mara's federal and state claims of unlawful arrest on January 2, 2013. . . .We conclude that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Mara's federal and state claims of unlawful arrest and/or malicious prosecution stemming from the February 2013 arrest warrant because (1) the Kazmierczak photo identification was not, in fact, so defective as to require deletion from a corrected Rilling affidavit; (2) with that eyewitness identification included, the affidavit clearly states probable cause to arrest Mara for the Blackman assault, even if Mara's statements are deleted; and (3) with probable cause thus established, it cannot be said that every reasonable officer would conclude that Mara could not lawfully be arrested or prosecuted as a result of the February 2013 arrest warrant. . . . To the extent he complains that his statements were used to support an arrest warrant that would otherwise have lacked probable cause, his claim would appear to invoke the Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizures. We need not pursue the question of how the Fourth and Fifth Amendments might interact in such circumstances. . . For reasons discussed in the immediately preceding point of this opinion, we conclude that, even when Mara's statements are deleted from the warrant application, the remaining facts, specifically, eyewitness Kazmierczak's identification of Mara as Blackman's assailant, convincingly established probable cause for his arrest. Thus, because Mara can demonstrate no Fourth or Fifth Amendment injury from the use of his statements in a warrant affidavit otherwise supported by probable cause, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on his coerced self-incrimination claim. . . . In sum, because Mara's interrogation cannot be characterized as brutal or extreme, he cannot show a violation of substantive due process or state tort law, much less show that established precedent would have required every reasonable officer to have recognized such violations. Accordingly, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on these claims.")

Mitchell v. City of New York, No. 18-588, 2019 WL 409441 (2d Cir. Jan. 31, 2019) (not reported) ("The only truly distinguishing fact between this case and Wesby is that in Wesby, the police officers made more of an effort to determine if the house was truly abandoned. . . That is not enough of a difference to deny the City Defendants qualified immunity. Wesby emphasized that qualified immunity is appropriate unless a court can 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. . The case need not be directly on point, 'but the existing precedent must place the lawfulness of the particular arrest beyond debate.'. . Thus, there must be a 'body of relevant case law [that] clearly establish[es] the answer with respect to probable cause.'. . Plaintiffs identify no such case here.")

Kaminsky v. Schriro, 760 F. App'x 69, ___ (2d Cir. 2019) ("Even if the area was curtilage, the officers' belief that the area in which they waited was not curtilage was reasonable. At the time of the incident in question, the principal authority for classifying an area proximate to a house as curtilage or not was United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294, 107 S.Ct. 1134, 94 L.Ed.2d 326 (1987), which sets out a highly fact-specific four-factor test. . . . In a careful and thorough opinion, the experienced district court analyzed the Dunn factors and concluded that the area where the officers stood was not curtilage. Kaminsky cites no authority, extant at the time of the incident, sufficiently analogous to the specific facts of this case to have required a reasonable officer to reach a contrary conclusion. To the extent that cases post-dating the incident, such as Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1, 133 S.Ct. 1409, 185 L.Ed.2d 495 (2013), United States v. Alexander, 888 F.3d 628 (2d Cir. 2018), and Collins v. Virginia, —— U.S. ——, 138 S.Ct. 1663, 201 L.Ed.2d 9 (2018), can be argued to call the district court's analysis into question in any way, the officers cannot be expected to have anticipated such developments. The district court's decision at a minimum establishes that a reasonable officer in 2011 could reasonably have concluded that the area in question was not curtilage.")

Gorman v. Rensselaer County, 910 F.3d 40, 46-47 (2d Cir. 2018) ("Here, the district court granted defendants qualified immunity on summary judgment based on the 'context' of Gorman's statement 'as revealed by the whole record.'. . . We agree: the context was a volatile, intra-family feud that embroiled Patricelli and the Gorman siblings. That context indicates that the speech 'primarily concern[ed] an issue that [was] personal in nature,'. . . 'was calculated to redress [Gorman's] personal grievances' against Patricelli, and had no 'broader public purpose[.] . . It was score-settling, and had small practical significance to the public. Accordingly, at the time of the alleged violations, a reasonable officer would not have known that it was clearly established law that Gorman's speech constituted a matter of public concern. The Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Gorman's First Amendment retaliation claim.")

Gorman v. Rensselaer County, 910 F.3d 40, 48 (2d Cir. 2018) (Droney, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part) ("The majority concludes that Sergeant Patricelli and the other officers are entitled to qualified immunity for retaliating against Gorman after Gorman reported Patricelli's misuse of a confidential law enforcement database. Patricelli's misuse of that database violated not only the New York Division of Criminal Justice Services' written policies, but also New York criminal laws. Officer Gorman reported Patricelli's misconduct to the state authorities responsible for the database and, based on their recommendation, then to the state prosecutor. The retaliation and harassment by Patricelli and the other individual defendants that followed included threats and physical abuse of Gorman. Because it was well-established at the time that misuse of such a law enforcement database was of significant public concern, the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. I therefore dissent.")

Shannon v. Venettozzi, 749 F. App'x 10, __ (2d Cir. 2018) ("Shannon first argues that Officer McTurner's alleged conduct in 2011 was objectively unreasonable and therefore violated his Eighth Amendment rights. We agree that it was objectively unreasonable for a correctional officer to behave as alleged in light of our current standards of decency. As we recognized in Crawford, in 2015, the Eighth Amendment is violated by even a single instance of '[a] corrections officer's intentional contact with an inmate's genitalia or other intimate area' when such contact 'serves no penological purpose and is undertaken with the intent to gratify the officer's sexual desire or humiliate the inmate.'. . But Shannon's legal claim arises from events predating Crawford by four years. Although the conduct alleged in the amended complaint is reprehensible both then and now, when it occurred in 2011, our precedent did not establish that such conduct was clearly unconstitutional. Rather, in Boddie, we had held that a 'small number of incidents in which [the plaintiff] allegedly was verbally harassed, touched, and pressed against without his consent' was not sufficient to state a claim. . . And, prior to our decision in Crawford, district courts had routinely interpreted Boddie to mandate the dismissal of similar claims at the pleading stage. . . In line with this conclusion, we recently affirmed the district court's grant of qualified immunity in Crawford itself, explaining that '[a]t a minimum, any constitutional distinction between [Crawford's] case and Boddie was not clearly established" in 2011, when the conduct in Crawford, too, allegedly occurred. See Crawford v. Cuomo, 721 F. App'x 57, 59 (2d Cir. 2018) (summary order). The same is true here. We therefore affirm the District Court's grant of Officer McTurner's motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds.")

Colvin v. Keen, 900 F.3d 63, 75-76 (2d Cir. 2018) ("The Defendants were entitled to summary judgment unless there was clearly established law to the effect that Colvin's speech was on a matter of public concern. There is no clearly established law to that effect. The speech of a public employee is addressed to a matter of public concern where it can be 'fairly considered as relating to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community.'. . To qualify, the speech must have 'a broader public purpose' and not be merely 'calculated to redress personal grievances.'. . In determining whether speech addresses a matter of public concern, we examine the 'content, form, and context of a given statement.'. .The precedents do not show a 'clearly established' law favoring Colvin on this question. This court has found, on the one hand, that speech debating issues of discrimination, speech seeking relief from 'pervasive or systemic misconduct' by public officials, and speech that is "part of an overall effort to correct allegedly unlawful practices or bring them to public attention' all go to matters of public concern. . . By contrast, we have found speech that 'concerns essentially personal grievances' does not qualify as speech on a matter of public concern[.] . . We have also reasoned that speech is not on a matter of public concern where it has 'no practical significance to the general public[.]'. . It is true that, under certain circumstances, we have found speech to be on a matter of public concern where it sought to 'vindicate ... constitutional rights ... in the face of alleged police misconduct.'. . In Golodner, we reasoned that 'it is axiomatic that misconduct within a police department implicates a matter of public concern.'. . In that case, however, the speech at issue related to alleged policies and patterns of police misconduct that 'raise[d] serious constitutional concerns.'. . Colvin's speech, by contrast, was not addressed to misconduct at all. Colvin merely identified herself as an attorney, told her co-worker and the police officers that she wanted to get her co-worker an attorney and union representative, and advised her friend not to say anything until such representatives arrived. Colvin said nothing to indicate that Ms. Buch's arrest was constitutionally improper. . . Since her speech was not addressed to police misconduct at all, much less to the sort of pattern of misconduct alleged in Golodner, Golodner does not clearly establish that Colvin's speech was on a matter of public concern.")

Berg v. Kelly, 897 F.3d 99, 112-13 (2d Cir. 2018) ("Police officers charged with protecting the President . . . might have reasonably believed that they could temporarily deny freedom of movement to persons on the scene, perhaps even until the President had departed. In short, while the present record does not permit us to conclude, as a matter of law, that the Officers' actions went no further than the special need to protect the President warranted, no then clearly established law would have alerted reasonable officers that their actions did not fall within the special needs exception. Nor is a different conclusion warranted because the police did not deny all pedestrians and traffic movement to the same degree as the protesters. Reasonable officers might have been particularly alert to risks posed by the Occupy Wall Street protesters, whose professed intent was to '#OccupyObama.'. . That a reasonable officer might objectively think that OWS protesters would not leave the area upon release but, rather, would attempt to approach or gain access to the hotel and the President found some support in other OWS protesters' actions only weeks earlier in shutting down the Brooklyn Bridge. . . In sum, in the absence of clearly established law prohibiting the challenged detentions in the circumstances presented, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . The OWS protesters also assert that they were unlawfully detained for the duration of the President's visit in retaliation for exercising their First Amendment rights. Because the Officers have qualified immunity from suit based on their temporary detention of the protesters, these claims also fail. In Singer v. Fulton County Sheriff, 63 F.3d 110, 120 (2d Cir. 1995), we concluded that 'if [an] officer either had probable cause or was qualifiedly immune from subsequent suit (due to an objectively reasonable belief that he had probable cause), then we will not examine the officer's underlying motive in arresting and charging the plaintiff.' The same reasoning applies to qualified immunity based on an objectively reasonable belief of special needs. We have determined above that officers in the position of protecting the President, as here, would have an objectively reasonable belief under the circumstances that the special needs presented in this case justified their limited detention of the protesters. Our rationale in Singer thus accords the Officers qualified immunity from the protesters' retaliation claims.")

Simon v. City of New York, 893 F.3d 83, 88, 97 (2d Cir. 2018) ("We conclude that, with the facts taken in the light most favorable to Simon, the defendants violated the Fourth Amendment. A warrant must be executed in conformity with its terms. . . Here, the warrant required the defendants to produce Simon to court on August 11, 2008, at 10:00 a.m., but they instead detained her for 18 hours over August 11 and 12, occasionally interrogated her about a crime, and never presented her to a judge. We further conclude that the unlawfulness of the defendants' conduct was clearly established when they acted. This is an uncommon '"obvious case"' in which 'the unlawfulness of the [defendants'] conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . No officer who is executing a warrant that requires that a prospective material witness be brought before a judge at a fixed date and time to determine whether the witness should be detained can reasonably believe that she is free instead to detain and interrogate the witness for hours on end outside of court supervision. . . . Miller, O'Rourke, and Yanez–Marquez, when considered in light of this Court's decisions explaining that an officer executing a warrant must generally comply with its terms, . . . might be thought to 'clearly foreshadow' our ruling today, which would likewise be sufficient to conclude that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . But we need not decide whether these out-of-circuit authorities clearly foreshadow today's decision. This is one of the uncommon ' "obvious case[s]"' in which 'the unlawfulness of the [defendants'] conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . .We conclude, with the First Circuit, that this Fourth Amendment violation is so obvious that it violated clearly established law despite the lack of binding authority directly on point.")

Edrei v. Maguire, 892 F.3d 525, 539-44 (2d Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 2614 (2019) ("[F]or purposes of 'clearly established law,' we apply the Fourteenth Amendment analysis from Glick, not the Supreme Court's 2015 decision in Kingsley. We begin with the delicate task of defining the right at issue. . . . Here, defendants' frame the question as 'whether the officers violated the Fourteenth Amendment by using the LRAD 100X to aid in moving protesters to the sidewalks after the protest became obstructive and potentially violent.' . . This framing puts not one but two thumbs on the scale in favor of defendants. First, it focuses on the officers' professed objective—moving protesters onto the sidewalk—while ignoring the degree of force that the officers allegedly used. Second, it recasts the protest as 'violent,' a characterization that, based on plaintiffs' allegations and the scene captured in the videos, is at best arguable. . .Perhaps this is an inference that a factfinder might ultimately make, but at this stage we must draw all inferences in favor of the plaintiffs, not the defendants. . . . [A]ccepting the facts alleged by the plaintiffs, the question here is whether, in 2014, non-violent protesters and onlookers, who officers had not ordered to disperse, had a right not to be subjected to pain and serious injury that was inflicted to move them onto the sidewalks. Preliminarily, we address whether this conduct alleges a Fourteenth Amendment violation under the legal standard applicable in 2014. Although our earlier discussion drew on Kingsley, the result is the same under Glick's parallel factors. To repeat, this Court's longstanding test for excessive force claims teaches that force must be necessary and proportionate to the circumstances. . . . Would reasonable officers have known that subjecting non-violent protesters to pain and serious injury simply to move them onto the sidewalks violated the Fourteenth Amendment? Defendants insist that the circumstances before them were too dissimilar from then-existing precedents to provide this notice. They raise two principal arguments. Neither withstands scrutiny. First, the defendants deny that it was clearly established in December 2014 that using force in a crowd control context violates due process. In their view, because this Court has not applied 'substantive due process principles to crowd control,' the officers lacked notice that the right against excessive force applies to non-violent protesters. . . But that is like saying police officers who run over people crossing the street illegally can claim immunity simply because we have never addressed a Fourteenth Amendment claim involving jaywalkers. This would convert the fair notice requirement into a presumption against the existence of basic constitutional rights. Qualified immunity doctrine is not so stingy. . . Training our focus on controlling authority, we see that this Court has repeatedly emphasized that officers engaging with protesters must comply with the same principles of proportionality attendant to any other use of force. . . . Both Parmley and Amnesty America gave the defendants fair warning that the prohibition on excessive force applies to protesters. This is true even though both those cases arose under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Shifting attention from the protesters to the technology at issue, defendants' second argument is that, at the time of the events, the Fourteenth Amendment did not apply to LRADs. . . . [N]ovel technology, without more, does not entitle an officer to qualified immunity. . . . Given our call for common sense in the face of new technology, defendants cannot credibly complain they lacked notice that the proscription on excessive force applied to acoustic devices. . . . Even though sound waves are a novel method for deploying force, the effect of an LRAD's area denial function is familiar: pain and incapacitation. . . . Using common sense, any reasonable officer with knowledge of the LRAD's operations would understand that the area denial function represents a 'significant degree of force.'. . To recap, assuming the truthfulness of the allegations in the complaint, and drawing all reasonable inferences in plaintiffs' favor, the defendants knew or should have known that the area denial function could cause serious injury. When engaging with non-violent protesters who had not been ordered to disperse, no reasonable officer would have believed that the use of such dangerous force was a permissible means of moving protesters to the sidewalks. Whatever legitimate interest the officers had in clearing the street, the use of sound capable of causing pain and hearing loss in the manner alleged in the complaint was not rationally related to this end. We therefore conclude that the district court properly denied the defendants' motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. . . . Our decision regarding the defendants' use of the LRAD is a narrow one. We do not hold that the Fourteenth Amendment bars law enforcement from using LRADs. To the contrary, we are confident that, in appropriate circumstances, following careful study and proper training, LRADs can be a valuable tool for law enforcement. Their usefulness as a long-range communications device is plain. We also think that, under certain conditions, an LRAD that is properly calibrated might be a lawful means of ordering (or perhaps even compelling) protesters to disperse. We merely hold (1) that, on the allegations before us, which we must accept as true, the plaintiffs have stated a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim and (2) that purposefully using the LRAD in a manner capable of causing serious injury to move non-violent protesters to the sidewalks violated law that was clearly established as of 2014. We are also mindful that the complaint before us is just one side of the story, told from the perspective of the plaintiffs. But courts and juries must assess excessive force claims from 'the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, including what the officer knew at the time, not with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . It follows that, once the allegations are tested by evidence, particularly evidence about what the officers saw and knew, the defendants may yet be entitled to qualified immunity. We can envision various factual showings that would change the calculus. One key variable is the state of unrest at the protest. The evidence may show that the defendants observed a more violent scene than is portrayed in the complaint and incorporated videos. Another key consideration is how the LRAD was used, most notably the volume of the device and its proximity to protesters and passersby. And, third, as Kingsley acknowledges, much hinges on what the defendants knew. Perhaps the defendants had not seen the report on the Model 3300 and lacked knowledge of the LRAD's harmful effects. The complaint alleges that the NYPD 'has not properly trained its officers' on LRAD use and acknowledges that Department's use of force protocols 'do not account for LRAD use.'. . So perhaps the defendants had received training but reasonably believed that they were not using the device in an unsafe or gratuitous manner. Any one of these non-exhaustive factors could warrant a reappraisal of qualified immunity.")

Monaco v. Sullivan, 737 F. App'x 6, __ (2d Cir. 2018) ("The district court held that Monaco failed to make an adequate showing to survive summary judgment on either the objective or the subjective prongs. When assessing the subjective prong, the district court applied Caiozzo, where we held that a plaintiff must show 'that the government-employed defendant disregarded a risk of harm to the plaintiff of which the defendant was aware.'. . Monaco failed to meet this standard, the court concluded, because the record contained no evidence suggesting that Packard knew that his failure to prescribe Lithium posed a threat to Monaco. On appeal, Monaco does not dispute that he would not meet the Caiozzo test. He instead points out that this Court overruled Caiozzo. In Darnell, decided a year after the district court's decision in this case, we held that a plaintiff can meet the subjective prong of the deliberate indifference test as long as the defendant 'should have known' that his action 'posed an excessive risk to [the plaintiff's] health or safety.'. . Monaco therefore argues on appeal that we should vacate the district court's grant of summary judgment because it applied the now-defunct Caiozzo standard, and a jury could reasonably conclude that Packard acted recklessly under Darnell. We disagree. Assuming arguendo that Monaco is correct that Packard's failure to prescribe Lithium was reckless, Packard would still be entitled to qualified immunity. Darnell was decided in 2017 and thus could not have clearly established that reckless medical treatment amounts to deliberate indifference at the time Packard treated Monaco. Indeed, before Caiozzo, we had never decided this issue at all. . . Because Packard did not violate clearly established law when he treated Monaco in 1998, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment on this claim.")

Montero v. City of Yonkers, New York, 890 F.3d 386, 394, 398-403 (2d Cir. 2018) ("We conclude that the district court correctly held that the existence of a civilian analogue is not dispositive of whether a public employee spoke as a private citizen, but it is merely a factor the court could consider as part of the inquiry into whether the public employee's speech was made pursuant to his ordinary employment-related responsibilities. We nevertheless find that the district court erred in ruling that Montero's speech was not protected because it was tangentially related to his job responsibilities. That fact is not dispositive as a matter of law. It is clear from the pleadings that Montero's union remarks did not fall within his responsibilities as a police officer, and he therefore made these remarks as a private citizen. Because at least some of Montero's remarks addressed a matter of public concern, moreover, we vacate and remand the district court's judgment dismissing Montero's First Amendment retaliation claim as to defendant Olson. We affirm the district court's dismissal of the claims against defendants Moran and Mueller for a different reason: their alleged acts were protected by the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . . We conclude that Montero sufficiently pled that his union remarks cannot be considered 'part-and-parcel of his concerns about his ability to properly execute his duties.'. . The 'critical question under Garcetti is whether the speech at issue is itself ordinarily within the scope of an employee's duties, not whether it merely concerns those duties.'. . Montero made his remarks as union vice president, a role in which he was not required to serve. . . .Nevertheless, Montero would have us go further and decide categorically, as some circuits have, that when a person speaks in his or her capacity as a union member, he or she speaks as a private citizen. . . .While we therefore decline to decide categorically that when a person speaks in his capacity as a union member, he speaks as a private citizen, we conclude that, under the facts of this case as set out in the amended complaint, when Montero spoke in his capacity as a union member, he spoke as a private citizen. This was because, taking the amended complaint's allegations as true, Montero spoke in his role as a union officer, and his union speech was not composed of statements made as a 'means to fulfill' or 'undertaken in the course of performing' his responsibilities as a police officer. . . Consequently, he engaged in citizen speech for purposes of the First Amendment. . . .At this stage in the proceedings, we cannot say that Montero's union remarks about how reductions in police manpower might reduce public safety and his call for a vote of no-confidence in Commissioner Hartnett were solely 'calculated to redress [his] personal grievances' against Olson and his allies. . . Nor, despite the City defendants' contentions otherwise, do we find it critical to this inquiry that Montero made his remarks at a non-public meeting. . . We therefore conclude that Montero has sufficiently pled that his criticism of cuts in police manpower at the June 2010 union meeting and his call for a no-confidence vote in Police Commissioner Hartnett at the February 2011 union meeting qualified as statements on matters of public concern. . . .Defendants Moran and Mueller argue that even if Montero's speech was constitutionally protected and they took adverse employment actions against him for this speech, they are, even on the present state of the proceedings, entitled to qualified immunity. We agree. . . . It is true that at the time Moran and Mueller allegedly retaliated against Montero, we had stated in Weintraub that the 'lack of a citizen analogue [was] "not dispositive" in [that] case.'. . As detailed above, the role of a citizen analogue in determining whether one speaks as a citizen remained murky, however, and we had expressed no view as to its role in protecting union speech outside the context of a union grievance. . . Thus, we had not made clear that, under the circumstances as alleged in the amended complaint, Montero spoke in his capacity as a private citizen. On appeal, Montero contends, once again, that Clue 'clearly establishe[s]' that a person's union activity criticizing management is categorically protected by the First Amendment. . . But, as noted above, Clue was decided before Garcetti, and focused solely on whether the union plaintiffs had spoken on a matter of public concern. . . After Garcetti, it is clear that courts must determine both whether the plaintiff spoke on a matter of public concern and whether he or she spoke as a private citizen. Moreover, in Weintraub, we plainly rejected the notion that one is necessarily speaking as a private citizen when acting in his or her union capacity. Because the specific question of whether the plaintiff's alleged union remarks were protected by the First Amendment was not beyond debate at the time of Moran and Mueller's alleged retaliation against Montero, nor does Clue hold otherwise, we conclude as a matter of law that under the claims as pled by Montero, these defendants are protected from liability by qualified immunity.")

Hancock v. County of Rensselaer, 882 F.3d 58, 61, 69 (2d Cir. 2018) ("[W]e find that even individuals with non-stigmatizing medical conditions have a right to privacy in their medical records, even if their interest in privacy might be less. We REMAND this case back to the district court for further proceedings consistent with this analysis, including a consideration of whether qualified immunity might apply. . . .Because the district court found that Appellants did not have claims under the Fourteenth Amendment, it did not have to pass on whether the individual Appellees were entitled to qualified immunity from those claims. In remanding the case, we instruct the court to determine whether Mahar, Hetman, and/or Young are entitled to it. . . We note that on a summary judgment motion, facts are to be interpreted most favorably to non-movants, i.e. Appellants in this case. We have just discussed how their version of the facts plausibly alleges a violation of a constitutional right. That leaves only the question of whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, keeping in mind that qualified immunity law does not require a case on point concerning the exact permutation of facts that state actors confront in order to establish a clear standard for their behavior.")

Crawford v. Cuomo, 721 F. App'x 57, ___ (2d Cir. 2018 ("Plaintiffs first argue that the violative nature of Prindle's conduct was clearly established by Boddie v. Schnieder, where we stated that 'sexual abuse of a prisoner by a corrections officer may in some circumstances violate the prisoner's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment.'. . This argument is not persuasive. Although Boddie held that inmate sexual abuse could, in principle, violate the Eighth Amendment, it concluded that a 'small number of incidents in which [the plaintiff] allegedly was verbally harassed, touched, and pressed against without his consent' were insufficient to state a claim. . . Contrary to plaintiffs' argument, the allegations we considered in Boddie are quite similar to the allegations here. A reasonable officer could therefore have believed that the sexual abuse here alleged, even if it might violate state criminal law or subject him to tort liability, did not violate the Eighth Amendment. At a minimum, any constitutional distinction between this case and Boddie was not clearly established in March 2011. . . .Plaintiffs next argue that, in 2011, out-of-circuit authorities 'clearly foreshadow[ed]' our holding in Crawford I that Prindle's actions violated the Constitution. . . We disagree. Although some other courts had described an inmate's right to be free of sexual abuse in admirably clear, broad terms, . . . '[t]he dispositive question is whether the violative nature of the particular conduct is clearly established,'. . . and out-of-circuit authority was, at the time, sharply divided on whether abuse comparable to Prindle's was cruel and unusual.") Almighty Supreme Born Allah v. Milling, 876 F.3d 48, 56-59 (2d Cir. 2017) ("[W]e agree with the district court that Allah's substantive due process rights were violated when he was assigned to Administrative Segregation in October 2010 while a pretrial detainee. Although prison officials are to be afforded deference in matters of institutional security, such deference does not relieve officials from the requirements of due process or permit them to institute restrictive measures on pretrial detainees that are not reasonably related to legitimate governmental purposes. . . Here, in assigning Allah to Administrative Segregation in October 2010, prison officials made no individualized assessment whatsoever of the risk that Allah posed to institutional security. Instead, they placed Allah in Administrative Segregation solely on the basis of his prior assignment to (and failure to complete) the Administrative Segregation program during a prior term of incarceration, consistent with their practice of doing so for any such inmate, unless he or she had nearly completed all three phases of the program or more than five years had elapsed since the inmate's prior term of incarceration. . . That practice may serve as a useful rule of thumb for determining when an inmate who has previously been identified as a security risk is sufficiently rehabilitated, such that prison officials may want to consider whether he or she should re-enter the general prison population. We do not quarrel with the proposition that such rules of thumb may often be appropriate in guiding the many day-to-day decisions that prison officials must make to safeguard institutional security. But when such rules of thumb are applied inflexibly to justify severe restrictions on pretrial detainees at the expense of any meaningful consideration of whether those restrictions are justified by a legitimate governmental purpose, due process concerns come into play. Here, prison officials adhered reflexively to a practice that did not allow for individualized consideration of Allah's circumstances and that required him to be placed in Administrative Segregation regardless of his actual threat, if any, to institutional security. On that basis, Allah was isolated in his cell for up to 23 hours a day; required for months to wear restraints whenever out of his cell, including when showering; allowed very limited opportunities to see his family; and subjected to the numerous other restrictions described above. . . .We agree that Wolfish and its progeny put prison officials on notice that pretrial detainees have a substantive due process right not to be subjected to restrictions amounting to punishment. But just as '[t]he general proposition, for example, that an unreasonable search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment is of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,'. . . the general principle articulated in Wolfish does not clearly establish that a substantive due process violation would result from Allah's placement in Administrative Segregation based solely on his prior assignment to (and failure to complete) that program. Nor does Allah identify any other case law that would have placed Defendants on notice that their conduct violated substantive due process.")

Almighty Supreme Born Allah v. Milling, 876 F.3d 48, 60, 62-63 (2d Cir. 2017) (Pooler, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part, and dissenting from the judgment) ("I concur with the majority's holding that Allah's constitutional rights were violated when prison officials failed to consider whether he posed a risk to the institution before placing him in extended solitary confinement. I would additionally hold, however, that the restraints imposed in this case were unconstitutional as a response to the minimal infraction Allah committed. And I would not afford the defendants qualified immunity for having imposed the restraints. . . . In light of the similarity of Allah's conditions to the Supreme Court's example in Wolfish, and in light of the lack of legitimate government interest in instituting those conditions, I would not afford the defendants qualified immunity. Accordingly, I dissent from the portion of the majority's opinion granting immunity to the officials and from its disposition reversing the judgment below.")

Brown v. City of New York, 862 F.3d 182, 190-92 (2d Cir. 2017) ("On the uncontested facts and the two facts that it presumed in Brown's favor, the District Court held that the officers were shielded from liability by their qualified immunity. We agree. As instructed by the Supreme Court, we are 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,'. . . and we consider, as we must, the particular circumstances in which the force was used in effecting Brown's arrest. The force applied, which was the repeated use of pepper spray, the kicking of Brown's legs out from under her to bring her to the ground, and Plevritis's using his hand to push Brown's face onto the pavement, occurred after Brown refused to comply with the instructions to place her hands behind her back for handcuffing. During her noncompliance with the instructions, she was warned prior to each application of the pepper spray. The issue presented, therefore, is whether, under clearly established law, every reasonable officer would have concluded that these actions violated Brown's Fourth Amendment rights in the particular circumstance presented by the uncontested facts and the facts presumed in Brown's favor. Here, those circumstances involved a person's repeatedly refusing to follow the instructions of police officers who were attempting to apply handcuffs to accomplish an arrest. No precedential decision of the Supreme Court or this Court 'clearly establishes' that the actions of Naimoli or Plevritis, viewed in the circumstances in which they were taken, were in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The excessive force cases on which Brown relies do not suffice for this purpose. . . .There is some tension in this Court's case law concerning whether out-of-circuit precedent can ever clearly establish law in this Circuit. Compare Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 255 (2d Cir. 2006), with Garcia v. Does, 779 F.3d 84, 95 n.12 (2d Cir. 2015). Even assuming that such precedent may suffice in certain circumstances, however, we conclude that no such circumstances exist in this case. This is not a case, for example, 'where the law was established in three other circuits and the decisions of our own court foreshadowed' the establishment of the rule of law on which Brown seeks to rely. . . Similarly, we must reject Brown's argument that summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds was improper because the officers allegedly violated the New York City Police Department Patrol Guide directive not to use pepper spray from a distance of less than three feet. Our presuming in Brown's favor the disputed fact as to the distance the officers maintained, as the District Court did, does not change our conclusion. Brown is unable to demonstrate that any administering of pepper spray at a distance of as short as one foot upon an uncooperative arrestee violated 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment law against excessive force. Brown argues that the two officers 'were not entitled to qualified immunity since they violated clearly established law by using substantial and unnecessary force to arrest Ms. Brown when she posed no threat to the officers or others, and there were less aggressive techniques to arrest her for a noncriminal and slight offense.'. . . Her argument is grounded in the Graham factors, but this Court already has concluded that these factors 'would seem to point toward a determination of excessive force,'. . . in concluding that a jury possibly could find the force used against Brown to have exceeded that permitted under the Fourth Amendment. Her positing that she posed no threat and that less forceful methods existed to accomplish her arrest is not directed to the inquiry we must make as to qualified immunity. Again, that inquiry is whether every reasonable police officer would view the force used by Naimoli and Plevritis, in the circumstances in which that force was applied, as excessive according to clearly established law.")

Johnson v. Perry, 859 F.3d 156, 175-77 (2d Cir. 2017) ("Johnson has not called to our attention any case in which a parent has been held to have a First Amendment right to unlimited access to school property. Given the responsibility of school officials to prevent 'the kind of boisterous and threatening conduct' that would interrupt the 'peace and quiet' and 'disturb[ ] the tranquility' required for the academic aspects of a school's functions, . . . we cannot conclude that a parent has a general and unlimited First Amendment right of access to school property. To the extent that Perry banned Johnson from Capital Prep property for purposes other than attendance at sporting events, we conclude that Perry should have been granted summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity for that aspect of Johnson's First Amendment claim. . . . As indicated in Part II.C. above, unless there is a clear and present danger of disruptions such as disorder, riot, obstruction of the event, or immediate threat to public safety, the school may regulate access to its gymnasium when it is being used as a limited public forum only if its restrictions are reasonable and viewpoint-neutral. The version of the events proffered by Johnson, with the record taken in the light most favorable to him, would permit a rational juror to find that Perry's ban of Johnson from Capital Prep basketball games was neither viewpoint-neutral nor reasonable. The jury could permissibly find that Perry had repeatedly bullied JD, that Perry had falsely denied bullying her and maligned her, and that Johnson had vehemently complained of the bullying and the falsehoods. The jury could further infer that Johnson presented no threat of disruption or of harm to anyone--nor even any specter of intimidation, his daughter having already withdrawn from the varsity team before imposition of the ban--and that Perry's motive in banning Johnson from the Capital Prep limited public forum was to punish him for having expressed his views that Perry had engaged in bullying and falsification. . . . We also conclude, in light of the authorities discussed in Part II.C. above, that the right not to be excluded, based on viewpoint differences or because of possible annoyance, from sports events to which the public was invited was clearly established. Perry's motion for summary judgment was properly denied as to this aspect of Johnson's First Amendment claim. . . Finally, we can see no basis for Perry's claim of qualified immunity with respect to his ban against Johnson's attendance at school sports events held beyond school property. First, the distinction between school regulations applicable on school property and those targeting events beyond school property is one that other Circuits, in assessing whether school authorities' restrictions violated First Amendment rights, had found important, and indeed dispositive. . . .Second, the state championship basketball game from which Perry had Johnson removed was held not only off Capital Prep property but in a stadium at the Mohegan Sun casino, a venue that was privately owned. Persons attending sports events there are invitees of the owner. 'First Amendment protections ... are especially strong where an individual engages in speech activity from his or her own private property,' Papineau, 465 F.3d at 56, or on private property on which the individual is an invitee.")

Estate of Devine v. Fusaro, 676 F. App'x 61, (2d Cir. 2017) ("Even when we view the record in the light most favorable to the Estate, we conclude, as the district court did, that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because the asserted right, i.e., Devine's right to be free from less-than-lethal force in the circumstances, was not clearly established in the described circumstances. As the district court observed, three undisputed facts support that conclusion: (1) the police used force designed to be less-than-lethal, rather than deadly; (2) they used such force against a man reasonably believed to be suicidal and armed with a loaded gun while occupying public property; and (3) they used such force only after several hours of a standoff and negotiations that had not convinced Devine to surrender his gun. . . .We accept as true the Estate's assertion that an interval of several minutes passed between the two rounds of rubber baton projectiles fired by Defendants, during which Devine stated, '[W]hat are you doing? ... You guys are going to make me do this[.]'. . But the Estate points to no law clearly establishing that, following such a statement, the firing of a second round of rubber batons in a less-than-lethal manner violated Devine's clearly established constitutional right to be free from excessive force. We acknowledge the tragic circumstances of this case; nevertheless, because the law afforded the defendant officers no 'fair and clear warning' that their conduct might violate Devine's constitutional rights, we affirm the qualified-immunity-based judgment.") Garnett v. Undercover Officer C0039, 838 F.3d 265, 268, 274-80 & n.6 (2d Cir. 2016) ("In Ricciuti, we held that, even if there is probable cause to arrest a defendant, an officer who subsequently fabricates that defendant's confession 'and forwards that information to prosecutors ... violates the accused's constitutional right to a fair trial, and the harm occasioned by such an unconscionable action is redressable in an action for damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.'. . This case calls for us to consider whether Ricciuti requires the same result when the fabricated information at issue is the officer's own account of his or her observations of alleged criminal activity which he or she conveys to prosecutors. We hold that it does. . . .The instant case presents this court with an important legal question: whether Ricciuti's holding—that a Section 1983 plaintiff may sue for denial of the right to a fair trial based on a police officer's fabrication of information—applies when the information fabricated is the officer's own account of his or her observations of alleged criminal activity, which he or she then conveys to a prosecutor. We answer that question in the affirmative, while emphasizing the essential limiting principles encompassed by the Ricciuti standard. . . . Ricciuti's reasoning applies as much to a situation where, as here, the falsified information was the officer's account, conveyed to prosecutors, of what he heard the defendant say or do during the alleged offense, as it did in Ricciuti, where the officer was describing what he heard the defendant say during an interview after his arrest. UC 39 makes two arguments against relying on Ricciuti. First, UC 39 argues that Ricciuti does not control this case because Ricciuti addressed only whether qualified immunity was available to police officers who willfully fabricated evidence, rather than the merits of Ricciuti's denial of the right to a fair trial claim. . . Second, UC 39 argues that falsification of evidence has always been addressed under the auspices of false arrest and malicious prosecution claims under the Fourth Amendment. UC 39 maintains that application of a denial of the right to a fair trial claim to falsified evidence would upset the balance between liability and probable cause developed in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. On the first point, UC 39 is incorrect that Ricciuti's holding is limited to the question of immunity. In Ricciuti, the panel held that fabrication of evidence violated a 'clearly established constitutional right[ ]' and thus the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. . . Thus, in order to find that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity, the panel necessarily also held that the officers' conduct in fabricating Ricciuti's supposed 'confession' violated a clearly established constitutional right, the right to a fair trial. . . .Whether this right is rooted in the Sixth Amendment or Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, or both, is an issue we need not decide because the constitutional harm resulting from the falsified information at issue is in any event redressable in an action for damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . .In short, a Section 1983 claim for the denial of a right to a fair trial based on an officer's provision of false information to prosecutors can stand even if the officer had probable cause to arrest the Section 1983 plaintiff. . . .First, claims alleging the denial of a right to a fair trial based on fabricated information are redressable under the Constitution, regardless of which constitutional provision provides the basis for the claim—'[c]ertain wrongs affect more than a single right and, accordingly, can implicate more than one of the Constitution's commands.'. . .Second, probable cause, which is a Fourth Amendment concept, should not be used to immunize a police officer who violates an arrestee's non-Fourth Amendment constitutional rights. . . .Third and lastly, any limitation of false information allegations to false arrest and malicious prosecution claims would ignore the collateral consequences that are associated with fabricated information even if the officer had probable cause for the initial arrest. . . .Although we hold that any information fabricated by an officer can serve as the basis of a claim for a denial of the right to a fair trial, we acknowledge concerns raised by the City of New York ("City") about attaching liability for false information to an officer's account of his or her own observations of an alleged criminal activity giving rise to an arrest. For example, the City posits that an affirmance of Ricciuti would lead to the retrial of every unsuccessful state prosecution as a federal Section 1983 action and would turn an individual's resentment at being prosecuted into allegations of fabrication against police officers. The City cautions that such retrials would impose burdens on society by chilling the work of honest officers and by diverting energy away from general policing and towards defensive litigation. This court does not take those concerns lightly. Nonetheless, the City's proposed distinction between fabricated testimony about what an officer claims to have seen during a 'buy and bust' and fabricated testimony about a purported confession is incoherent. The court's holding in Ricciuti covers 'false information,'. . . not merely false information about confessions. The information fabricated by Lieutenant Wheeler in Ricciuti, exactly like the fabricated information at issue here, is nothing more or less than a false account of something the officer claimed to have seen or heard the defendant say, which he forwarded to prosecutors and to which he would be expected to testify at trial. That the officer here fabricated testimony about what he heard in a bodega, rather than what he heard in a police station during an interview, cannot conceivably make a difference. Having considered the City's policy arguments, we find that the standard outlined in Ricciuti places appropriate limitations on the availability of a claim for denial of the right to a fair trial based on fabrication of information by a police officer which serve to address the City's fears. As the jury was properly instructed here, the standard in Ricciuti restricts fair trial claims based on fabrication of information to those cases in which an (1) investigating official (2) fabricates information (3) that is likely to influence a jury's verdict, (4) forwards that information to prosecutors, and (5) the plaintiff suffers a deprivation of life, liberty, or property as a result. . . In order to succeed on a claim for a denial of the right to a fair trial against a police officer based on an allegation that the officer falsified information, an arrestee must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the officer created false information, the officer forwarded the false information to prosecutors, and the false information was likely to influence a jury's decision. . . These requirements all provide necessary limits on the reach of a denial of a fair trial claim based on false information. In particular, the requirements that the information be both false and likely to influence a jury's decision constrain the types of information that can serve as the basis for a denial of the right to a fair trial claim. Ricciuti has been the law for nearly twenty years, without the dire results that the City predicts from the perfectly routine application of its principles to the facts here. Experience thus suggests that the limiting principles of Ricciuti have proven effective to date in restricting claims for a denial of the right to a fair trial against police officers on the basis of false information. The court thus embraces the limiting principles inherent in the Ricciuti standard while affirming that Ricciuti's holding applies to falsified information contained in an officer's account of his or her observations of alleged criminal activity which he or she conveys to prosecutors.")

Vill. of Freeport v. Barrella, 814 F.3d 594, 609 & n.57 (2d Cir. 2016) ("[W]e reject Hardwick's qualified-immunity argument, which contends—rather incredibly—that it was 'objectively reasonable' for him to believe in 2010 that federal law did not forbid discrimination based on Hispanic ethnicity. . . . This case presents many knotty legal and factual issues. For purposes of qualified immunity, however, the question is simple. The jury found that Hardwick appointed Bermudez rather than Barrella because the former was 'a White person of Hispanic origin' and the latter was 'a White person of Italian origin.'. .Would a reasonable official in Hardwick's position have known that such intentional discrimination against non-Hispanic whites violated Barrella's rights under federal antidiscrimination law?[57] [fn 57 Importantly, Hardwick does not argue that the law was not clearly established with respect to when intentional racial discrimination might be permissible. For instance, he does not claim that he gave preference to a Hispanic as part of an arguably lawful affirmative-action program, or that he was attempting to appeal to Hispanic voters. . . Accordingly, we consider qualified immunity with respect to 'unjustified' racial discrimination only.] The answer is plainly yes. As Hardwick acknowledges, a right is clearly established if 'the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit has recognized the right.'. .Under that standard, it has been clear since the Reagan Administration that § 1981 bars employers from discriminating based on Hispanic ethnicity or lack thereof. . . Indeed, defendants manage to obscure the clarity of established law only by failing to cite Albert v. Carovano in any of the four briefs they collectively submitted, despite the District Court's citation of that case in its opinions below. . . The most charitable reading of Hardwick's assertion of qualified immunity is that the law was unsettled with respect to Title VII. But Title VII is irrelevant to Hardwick's personal liability, which stems solely from § 1981. . . And in any event, it has long been obvious under Title VII that employers may not discriminate based on Hispanic ethnicity, even if it has not hitherto been clearly established that such discrimination would constitute discrimination on the basis of race. . . In short, we conclude that the District Court correctly denied defendants' pre-and post-verdict motions for judgment as a matter of law pursuant to Rule 50.")

Mangino v. Inc. Vill. of Patchogue, 808 F.3d 951, 953, 956-59 & n.10 (2d Cir. 2015) ("The principal question presented is whether, in August 2005, there was a clearly established right to be free from abuse of process under New York law even where probable cause existed. We conclude that there was not. . . . 'The existence of probable cause will defeat ... a First Amendment claim that is premised on the allegation that defendants prosecuted a plaintiff out of a retaliatory motive, in an attempt to silence [him].' Fabrikant v. French, 691 F.3d 193, 215 (2d Cir.2012); see also Hartman v. Moore . . . . Here, as the District Court correctly found, . . . probable cause existed with respect to each of the criminal summonses issued to Mangino. . . . We turn next to Mangino's argument that the District Court erred in dismissing his abuse-of-process claim, which dismissal we also review de novo. . . The basis for this dismissal was the District Court's determination that Nudo was entitled to qualified immunity because, under New York law, 'although there was a clearly established right to be free from malicious abuse of process at the time of the alleged conduct'—that is, in August 2005—'it was not clearly established that such a claim [could] exist even when probable cause existed for the issuance of the [summonses].'. . . We agree. There has been considerable confusion within our Circuit regarding whether probable cause is a complete defense to a claim of abuse of process under New York law. . . . We need not, and do not, resolve this confusion here, as its very existence establishes that Nudo is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .This appeal 'presents the legal possibility that law, which may have once been clear [for purposes of qualified immunity], can become unclear later.'. . Which is to say, it may be the case that, under this Circuit's interpretation of New York law, the existence of a right to be free from abuse of process even where probable cause existed was incontrovertible in 1963, when Weiss was decided, but had been called into question by 1988, when PSI Metals was decided, or 2005, when the alleged conduct occurred. No matter-'[t]he nature of the law is not always to move from unsettled to settled. Although one of our decisions may not be expressly overruled, later cases ... may bring its reasoning or holding into such doubt that the elements set out in the case are no longer clearly established....'").

Morse v. Fusto, 804 F.3d 538, 547, 550 (2d Cir. 2015) ("Notwithstanding the legally permissible one-sided nature of grand jury proceedings, everyone possesses the additional and distinct 'right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer acting in an investigating capacity.'. . This right was violated, Morse contends, when the defendants knowingly created false or misleading billing summaries that were determined to be material to the grand jury's decision to indict. We conclude that the omissions in this case were properly considered under the rubric of Zahrey, under which government officials may be held liable for fabricating evidence through false statements or omissions that are both material and made knowingly. . . . Having concluded that the defendants' falsifications constituted a violation of Morse's constitutional rights, we must next determine whether the falsifications violated clearly established law that sufficiently warned the defendants that their conduct was unconstitutional. We conclude that they did. . . . We conclude that the right in question was clearly established such that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. Although there is no prior decision of ours precisely equating the fraudulent omission of factual information from a document with the affirmative perpetration of a falsehood, Ricciuti and its progeny, including Zahrey, clearly establish that 'qualified immunity is unavailable on a claim for denial of the right to a fair trial where that claim is premised on proof that a defendant knowingly fabricated evidence and where a reasonable jury could so find.'. . As discussed in detail above, because there is no plausible legal distinction between misstatements and omissions that we can perceive in this context, we conclude that it was not 'objectively legally reasonable' for the defendants in this case to believe that it was permissible for them to knowingly make material omissions in the creation of the billing summaries, thereby knowingly altering evidence during a criminal investigation.")

Edwards v. Arnone, 613 F.3d 44, 46 (2d Cir. 2015) ("The district court in this case described the right at issue as one 'to recreate free from restraints' and held that, as a matter of law, such a right was not clearly established. . . We disagree, however, and conclude that the district court erred in finding that no clearly established right was implicated because the court defined the scope of the relevant right too narrowly. . . .Taken together, our earlier decisions have clearly established a right for inmates to have some meaningful opportunity for exercise, unless the prison has a legitimate safety justification and has adequately considered feasible alternatives. As such, the district court erred by defining the scope of the right at issue too narrowly and by concluding that no right implicated in this case is clearly established. . . . The defendants nevertheless press that, even if the district court did not consider the adequacy of the safety justification, we should affirm because, at the time of the defendants' actions, 'there was no decisional law requiring that inmates in [Phase I of Administrative Segregation] exercise without handcuffs and leg restraints.'. . But 'the absence of legal precedent addressing an identical factual scenario does not necessarily yield a conclusion that the law is not clearly established.'. . Under existing clearly established case law, a reasonable juror may conclude that reasonable officers would agree that fully restraining inmates during out-of-cell exercise without an adequate safety justification is unconstitutional. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to the defendants without first considering whether disputed issues of fact precluded summary judgment with respect to the adequacy of the defendants' proffered safety justification for the exercise-restraint policy imposed on Edwards. We therefore vacate the judgment and remand for the district court to consider in the first instance the adequacy of the safety justification for the imposition of this policy on Edwards.")

Gardner v. Murphy, 613 F. App'x 40, 42, 43 (2d Cir. 2015) ("Here, the defendants argue that all reasonable jurors would agree that the prison officials acted reasonably in permitting Gardner to exercise only while handcuffed behind his back. We disagree. Of particular relevance on this interlocutory appeal are the district court's conclusions that questions of fact remained as to whether the plaintiff had some meaningful opportunity to engage in exercise and whether the defendants had an adequate safety justification for their imposing restraints on Gardner's exercise. Because we lack jurisdiction to resolve the adequacy of the plaintiff's opportunity for exercise or the defendants' safety justification, . . .the question we must confront on this appeal narrows considerably: We must decide solely whether reasonable jurors could disagree about whether it would have been objectively reasonable for the defendants to believe that they would not violate Gardner's clearly established constitutional rights by requiring him to be handcuffed behind his back during exercise, absent an adequate safety justification for the restraints. The defendants argue that reasonable officials could debate the legality of the conduct now at issue because neither the Supreme Court nor this Court 'has held that requiring an inmate to recreate in restraints for security reasons is unconstitutional.'. . We are unpersuaded for several reasons. First, the defendants' argument assumes that there is in fact a valid safety rationale, which we must assume is not true for purposes of this appeal. Second, the defendants' position defines the scope of the right too narrowly. We have recognized that a restriction on the meaningful opportunity to exercise must be based on a valid security exception. . . Here, it is undisputed that while in Phase I of the Administrative Segregation Program, Gardner was permitted to attend outdoor recreation only while handcuffed behind his back. Such a restriction may be found to infringe an inmate's right to a meaningful opportunity to exercise, and, if so, must be justified by a valid security concern. Accordingly, if it finds unpersuasive a proffered safety justification, a reasonable jury could readily conclude that a corrections official acted unreasonably by permitting an inmate to exercise only in restraints. . . . [A]s we have noted previously, 'the absence of legal precedent addressing an identical factual scenario does not necessarily yield a conclusion that the law is not clearly established.'. . Accordingly, we hold that under existing clearly established case law, a reasonable jury may conclude that reasonable officers would agree that handcuffing inmates behind their backs during their out-of-cell exercise without an adequate safety justification is unconstitutional. We therefore cannot conclude on this interlocutory appeal that the district court erred in denying summary judgment to the defendants.") Golodner v. Berliner, 770 F.3d 196, 205-07 (2d Cir. 2014) ("Few issues related to qualified immunity have caused more ink to be spilled than whether a particular right has been clearly established, mainly because courts must calibrate, on a case-by-case basis, how generally or specifically to define the right at issue. . . In a sense, we must apply the Goldilocks principle. If the right is defined too narrowly based on the exact factual scenario presented, government actors will invariably receive qualified immunity. If, on the other hand, the right is defined too broadly, the entire second prong of qualified immunity analysis will be subsumed by the first and immunity will be available rarely, if ever. . . Since neither result maintains the delicate balance 'between the interests in vindication of citizens' constitutional rights and in public officials' effective performance of their duties' that lies at the heart of qualified immunity, Davis v. Scherer, 468 U.S. 183, 195 (1984), we must chart a middle course. Our definition must be 'particularized' in the sense that '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right. This is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful, but it is to say that in light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.'. . Once we identify the right at issue we look to whether the Supreme Court or this Court had articulated that right with adequate specificity at the time of the retaliatory actions. . . Here, the determinative question is whether Berliner and Myers could reasonably have believed-based on the law as it existed in the second half of 2009—that the First Amendment did not prevent them from discontinuing the City's existing relationship with an independent contractor on account of a lawsuit the contractor filed against the City alleging an unconstitutional dual-arrest policy and police misconduct. . . As an initial matter, 'the First Amendment right of public employees to be free from retaliation for speech on matters of public concern' is beyond debate. . . Next, as discussed at length above, the speech at issue has nothing to do with personal employee grievances related to Golodner's conditions of employment and extends well into the realm of public concern.

This conclusion is firmly supported by the relevant jurisprudence in place in 2009. . . Next, although the right at issue is most often raised in the context of a government official firing an employee in retaliation for his or her speech, any attempt to distinguish the case on appeal from those cases based on Golodner's status as a contractor is vitiated by the Supreme Court's 1996 decision in Board of County Commissioners v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668 (1996). . . Finally, it was clearly established that a complaint may constitute a form of speech for First Amendment purposes. . . Based on the relevant case law at the time of the individual defendants' alleged retaliatory actions, we have no trouble concluding that the constitutional right implicated here was clearly established.")

Harris v. O'Hare, 770 F.3d 224, 241 (2d Cir. 2014) ("Because the police officers lacked a warrant or probable cause plus exigent circumstances to invade Plaintiffs' curtilage, and because Defendants cannot offer any other basis on which the officers' intrusion would be lawful, we conclude that Defendants violated Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights. We also hold that Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity for this violation because, under the undisputed facts, it would not have been objectively reasonable for them to have believed that their conduct was lawful.")

Raspardo v. Carlone, 770 F.3d 97, 114-15 (2d Cir. 2014) ("Although we have long recognized that Title VII-based hostile work environment claims by government employees are actionable under § 1983, . . . we have not specified in our prior decisions the role of individual responsibility required for a defendant in a § 1983 case involving claims of sex-based harassment by multiple defendants, nor have we charted supervisory liability in this context. This case demonstrates how hostile work environment claims that may readily be brought against employers under Title VII do not always fit easily within the context of individual liability under § 1983. The Title VII framework often requires courts to consider the workplace conduct of multiple employees and supervisors in determining whether the plaintiff has experienced a hostile work environment. . . . Section 1983, however, applies by its terms only to individual 'persons' responsible for violating plaintiffs' rights. . . In order to overcome a government official's claim to qualified immunity and 'establish individual liability under § 1983, a plaintiff must show ... that the defendant caused the plaintiff to be deprived of a federal right.'. . If a defendant has not personally violated a plaintiff's constitutional rights, the plaintiff cannot succeed on a § 1983 action against the defendant. Our few prior decisions addressing multi-defendant § 1983 hostile work environment cases have denied qualified immunity to defendants whose conduct, considered alone, was sufficiently severe or pervasive to alter the conditions of the plaintiff's employment. . . .Thus, our prior cases have established only that when a plaintiff alleges that multiple individual defendants have engaged in uncoordinated and unplanned acts of harassment, each defendant is only liable under § 1983 when his own actions are independently sufficient to create a hostile work environment. We therefore cannot say that it is clearly established law that an individual defendant has violated a plaintiff's equal protection rights if he has not personally behaved in such a way as to create an atmosphere of severe or pervasive harassment. Accordingly, absent such behavior, an individual defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Terebesi v. Torreso, 764 F.3d 217, 232, 233 (2d Cir. 2014) ("At least two circuits and one decision from the District of Connecticut have suggested that the decision to employ a tactical team may violate the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on excessive force. [citing cases] The district court referred to these decisions in denying summary judgment on this issue. . . In November 2012—after the district court's decision in this case, but before the appeal was briefed—a panel of this Court determined that 'there was no "clearly established" right in this Circuit to be free from the deployment of a police SWAT team.' Fortunati v. Vermont, 503 F. App'x 78, 81 (2d Cir.2012) (non-precedential summary order). . . . We agree that there is no clearly established right in this Circuit to be free from the deployment of a tactical team in general. . . . It is difficult to ask that a police officer identify clearly established law that three judges of this Court could not find. We therefore reverse the decision of the district court insofar as it denied qualified immunity to Chief Solomon for his decision to call out a tactical team in connection with the search of Terebesi's home.")

Gonzalez v. City of Schenectady, 728 F.3d 149, 160-62 & n.6 (2d Cir. 2013) ("The officers do not dispute that the search violated Gonzalez's right to be free from unreasonable searches; their position is that the right violated was not clearly established. We need not determine whether the facts alleged make out a violation of a constitutional right prior to determining whether that right was clearly established. . . This is especially true here, where the issue was not fully briefed by the government. . . Defendants–Appellees are not liable under § 1983 unless the right at issue was clearly established, meaning that '[t]he contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . At the time of the search, we had never held that the Fourth Amendment is violated by a suspicionless search (strip search or visual body cavity search) of a person arrested for felony drug possession. Although we have repeatedly held that the police may not conduct a suspicionless strip or body cavity search of a person arrested for a misdemeanor, reasonable officers could disagree as to whether that rule applied to those arrested for felony drug crimes, given the propensity of drug dealers to conceal contraband in their body cavities. . . Judge McMahon (who seems to have had a full share of these cases) has repeatedly emphasized that we have never applied the rule from Weber and Shain to searches of suspects arrested for felony drug crimes. . . The New York Court of Appeals' decision in People v. Hall, 10 N.Y.3d 303 (2008), does not support the view that the search of Gonzalez violated a clearly established federal constitutional rule. Hall was decided after the search at issue in this case. It is not a ruling of the Supreme Court or this Court. . . .While we can expect police officers to be familiar with black-letter law applicable to commonly encountered situations, they cannot be subjected to personal liability under § 1983 based on anything less. There are so many permutations of fact that bear upon the constitutional issues of a search: the arrest can be for a misdemeanor or a felony, for a drug offense or not; the search can be a strip search, a visual body cavity search, or a manual one; the person arrested can be headed to the general prison population or a single cell; the place of the search can be private or less than private; the impetus for the search can be a tip, or the policeman's observations or experience or hunch, or the neighborhood, or a description, or some or all of the above; and other considerations as well. The policeman is not expected to know all of our precedents or those of the Supreme Court, or to distinguish holding from dicta, or to put together precedents for line-drawing, or to discern trends or follow doctrinal trajectories. Otherwise, qualified immunity would be available only to a cop who is a professor of criminal procedure in her spare time. The police cannot be expected to know such things at risk of personal liability for the policeman's savings, home equity, and college funds. And such personal liability is the only kind of liability imposed by § 1983 (absent a Monell claim). That tells us something about the threshold of liability in these cases. . . . The premise—that a suit against an individual government employee is in substance a suit against his employer—is wrong. Doubtless in some political subdivisions of this Circuit the government supplies defense counsel and pays the judgment if an officer is personally liable under § 1983. But this Circuit includes scores of counties and hundreds of towns and municipalities; and there are thousands of political subdivisions in the nation. Not all of them will indemnify their employees for § 1983 judgments; many cannot even afford to furnish a defense; some can barely keep the school open. . . .We conclude that a reasonable officer—even one familiar with the cases described above—would not have understood that conducting an otherwise suspicionless visual body cavity search of a person arrested for a felony drug offense was unlawful; the defendants in this case are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.") Gonzalez v. City of Schenectady, 728 F.3d 149, 164-71 (2d Cir. 2013) (Pooler, J., dissenting) ("Here, the relevant question is whether the heightened standard for an anal body cavity search of a felony arrestee was clearly foreshadowed by this Circuit or the Supreme Court, at the time of Gonzalez's search in 2006. . . .Regardless of whether the Supreme Court or this Circuit directly held this rule, it was undoubtedly foreshadowed previous to Gonzalez's arrest, thus, I must disagree with the majority's conclusion in Part III. . . .Despite Supreme Court precedent and over two decades of this Circuit's case law rejecting cavity searches, the district court stated and Appellees still contend that the rule was not clearly established until Hall, 10 N.Y.3d at 310–11. . . Regardless of Hall, the rule established therein was already clearly suggested by the Supreme Court and presaged by this Circuit. As the majority states, 'we have repeatedly held that police may not conduct a suspicionless strip or body cavity search.' Even if no federal case prior to Hall stated the rule as explicitly applying to felony arrestees, the waterfall of decisions from Schmerber to Weber to Shain to Murcia made Hall's and Sarnicola's ultimate results a fait accompli—as reflections of this Circuit's developing case law. In addition, even Appellees are in accord with the district court and the New York Court of Appeals, recognizing that the rule on searches was 'evolving' in this direction. . . We have held that such foreshadowing requires the rule to be deemed clearly established. . . Accordingly, where the Supreme Court and this Court clearly foreshadowed a ruling on the issue, and other courts have also acknowledged this outcome, we should conclude that the rule was clearly established. . . .Moreover, even accepting that the strip search of the defendant was in accordance with police procedure, that, too, does not excuse police who should have known that to perform a strip search of the defendant absent reasonable suspicion was unjustified. . . .Accordingly, where the unlawfulness was 'apparent,'. . . and the searching officers suspicion was based on 'vague' information, an objectively reasonable person in the officer's position should have known that this conduct was unreasonable and qualified immunity should therefore not apply.")

Spavone v. New York State Dept. of Correctional Services, 719 F.3d 127, 138 (2d Cir. 2013) ("Simply put, the record reveals no basis on which to conclude that Fischer and Joy could not reasonably have believed, as Joy has affirmed, that the mental health needs of DOCS inmates were being met 'in the correctional facility setting through the comprehensive services provided by OMH.' This conclusion means that a reasonable public official in the position of Fischer or Joy could reasonably have believed there was a rational basis for distinguishing between leaves of absence for the treatment of mental illness as opposed to other sorts of illness. And this conclusion, in turn, entitles Fischer and Joy to qualified immunity.")

Vincent v. Yelich, 718 F.3d 157, 166-70 (2d Cir. 2013) ("[W]e conclude that Earley I itself, in June 2006, clearly established that the administrative imposition of PRS terms not imposed by the court is unconstitutional. We conclude further, that as to Annucci—the only defendant discussed in plaintiffs' briefs on appeal—the dismissals as a matter of law on the basis of qualified immunity on the present record were inappropriate. . . . Earley I dealt with the AEDPA principle that a federal court may not grant habeas unless the state court's adjudication of the claim was 'contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States,' 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(1). It was in that context that Earley I ruled that the federal-law principle that punishment for a crime could not properly be imposed administratively but could only be imposed by the court had been clearly established by the United States Supreme Court in Wampler . . . That AEDPA question is not the same as whether a federal right is clearly established for purposes of denying an official qualified immunity: The conclusion that a 'legal proposition was "clearly established" for purposes of its application by professional state court judges does not require a conclusion that it was "clearly established" in the qualified immunity context, which governs the conduct of government officials who are likely neither lawyers nor legal scholars.'. . We thus ruled in Scott that Earley I's holding did not mean that the Wampler principle that there was a right not to be subjected to administratively imposed PRS was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. . . .Earley I itself, however, in dealing with the precise conduct at issue in the present cases—the administrative imposition of PRS on a prisoner who has not had that condition imposed on him by the sentencing court—applied Wampler and plainly held such an imposition of PRS to be unconstitutional. . . . We conclude that Earley I itself clearly established that where the court has not included PRS in a defendant's sentence, DOCS may not add that term without violating federal law. . . . State court decisions that rejected Earley I's holding could not disestablish the federal right to due process for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis. . . Because Earley I's explicit ruling that 'New York's Department of Correctional Services has no ... power to alter a sentence' clearly established the contour of the right plaintiffs seek to vindicate, our inquiry ends there.") Bailey v. Pataki, 708 F.3d 391, 404-07 (2d Cir. 2013) ("We have already determined that there is sufficient evidence in the record to support, as a matter of law, the plaintiffs' procedural due process claims. We therefore turn to the question of whether the right at issue was clearly established. In answering that question, we look to whether (1) the right was defined with reasonable clarity, (2) the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit has confirmed the existence of the right, and (3) a reasonable defendant would have understood from the existing law that his conduct was unlawful. . . We have further held that where the law was established in three other circuits and the decisions of our own Court foreshadowed the right, the law was sufficiently 'well established' that its violation stripped the defendant of his immunity. . . .We ultimately agree with the district court that 'the basic proposition that due process requires a predeprivation hearing unless there is an immediate danger to society' was well established prior to 2005. . . Despite the litany of cases cited by the defendants to suggest that due process tolerates civil commitment of inmates without either notice or a hearing, each of those cases involved critical factors not present here. In none of the cases was a civil commitment effected without notice or a predeprivation hearing where the inmate was safely confined, and, indeed, where the standard the inmate met was not one of immediate and acute dangerousness but rather potential recidivism five, ten, or fifteen years after his release. . . The defendants offer no Supreme Court or Second Circuit precedent for the proposition that due process is satisfied if an individual in the plaintiffs' position has the opportunity to request a hearing after he has been labeled an SVP and civilly committed. Except for emergent or otherwise unusual circumstances, such as where an emergency makes it necessary for the State to act immediately to avoid imminent harm to the person being restrained or to the public, or where predeprivation process is highly impracticable, the Supreme Court has long held that 'the Constitution requires some kind of a hearing before the State deprives a person of liberty.'")

Looney v. Black, 702 F.3d 701, 710 (2d Cir. 2012) ("We do not doubt that Looney's interest in his continued full-time employment was important, or that he has felt the negative effects of being deprived of his pension and health care benefits. Unfortunately, however, Looney's interest in these items does not suffice to guarantee them constitutional protection as property rights to which he has any procedural entitlement. . . We therefore conclude that Looney has not adequately alleged a constitutionally protected property interest in his full-time employment. Accordingly, the District Court erred in determining that Black was not entitled to qualified immunity as to Looney's procedural due process claim.")

Looney v. Black, 702 F.3d 701, 713 (2d Cir. 2012) ("It is true that Looney alleges that his supervisor, in admonishing him for this alleged speech, requested that he refrain from discussing matters 'outside [Looney's] job duties.'. . It is also alleged that his speech regarded an 'outside agency enforcing a cease and desist order against Town residents.'. . But '[f]ormal job descriptions often bear little resemblance to the duties an employee actually is expected to perform, and the listing of a given task in an employee's written job description is neither necessary nor sufficient to demonstrate that conducting the task is within the scope of the employee's professional duties for First Amendment purposes.' Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 424–25. Similarly, whether 'speech was unprotected does not rest on the fact that [the] speech was made in the workplace as opposed to elsewhere.'. .The face of Looney's complaint alleges nothing more than a vague set of circumstances regarding speech which necessarily 'owed its existence' to Looney's role as Building Official. . . Because the speech at issue is alleged to have been made in the course of Looney's official duties, he has not adequately alleged that such speech is entitled to First Amendment protection.")

Looney v. Black, 702 F.3d 701, 713 (2d Cir. 2012) (Droney, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent from the majority's resolution of both the due process and First Amendment claims. I cannot conclude that the allegations in Looney's complaint call for qualified immunity and warrant dismissal at this juncture. As to Looney's procedural due process claim, the allegations of the representations and conduct by defendant First Selectman Black and the other Town officials, and the importance of the salary and benefits to Looney, are sufficient to show that he had a property right to full-time employment protected by procedural due process during his four-year statutory term as a Building Official. As to Looney's First Amendment retaliation claim, the allegations in the complaint sufficiently demonstrate that Looney's speech was made as a private citizen and on a matter of public concern. Although discovery may uncover facts to the contrary, it would be premature to conclude otherwise on a motion to dismiss. Accordingly, I would affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity.") Fabrikant v. French, 691 F.3d 193, 213, 214 (2d Cir. 2012) ("The due process right asserted by Fabrikant—her right not to have her dogs sterilized by the SPCA, at least without some form of process, prior to being sent to foster homes while she was awaiting trial in state court on animal abuse charges—is not a right that was 'clearly established' at the time of defendants' challenged actions in 2002. Nor has the right achieved that status today. It was not then, and is not now, 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood' that spaying or neutering Fabrikant's dogs following their seizure from her home violates a clearly established due process right. . . Fabrikant cites no binding precedent that comes close to establishing that the asserted due process right was clearly established in 2002. . . In fact, she appears to concede that no such binding authority exists; instead, she argues that we should extend existing precedent to prohibit defendants' behavior and to find that the due process right that she has asserted on this appeal was clearly established in 2002. That argument, however, is foreclosed by Reichle and other recent Supreme Court jurisprudence, which recognizes that although '[w]e do not require a case directly on point, ... existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2083 (2011). Here, as in Reichle and al-Kidd, the question 'falls far short of that threshold.'").

McGarry v. Pallito, 687 F.3d 505, 511-14 (2d Cir. 2012) ("Because the Thirteenth Amendment 'denounces a status or condition, irrespective of the manner or authority by which it is created,' Clyatt v. United States, 197 U.S. 207, 216 (1905), institutions housing pretrial detainees are not exempt from the Amendment's scope. . . . McGarry's allegations state a claim under the Thirteenth Amendment. He alleges that his work in the prison laundry was compelled and maintained by the use and threatened use of physical and legal coercion. He supports his allegations with well-pleaded facts that the defendants threatened to send him to 'the hole' if he refused to work and that he would thereby be subjected to 23 hour-per-day administrative confinement and shackles. These allegations plausibly allege 'threat of physical restraint or physical injury' within the meaning of Kozminski. . . Likewise, McGarry also plausibly alleges facts supporting his assertion that defendants coerced him through legal process by threatening him with DRs, which are alleged to be taken into consideration when making recommendations for a release date and, therefore, lengthen any period of incarceration. . . .[I]t is clearly established that a state may not 'rehabilitate' pretrial detainees. The Supreme Court has unambiguously and repeatedly held that a state's authority over pretrial detainees is limited by the Constitution in ways that the treatment of convicted persons is not. . . .This Court also has held that, while the State has legitimate interests in the health, safety, and sanitation of the correctional facility and its inhabitants, where pretrial detainees are concerned, those interests do not include rehabilitation. . . In light of this authority, it was clearly established that prison officials may not rehabilitate pretrial detainees, and it was not 'objectively reasonable' for defendants to conclude otherwise. . . . We are prepared to continue to assume that correctional institutions may require inmates to perform personally related housekeeping chores such as, for example, cleaning the areas in or around their cells, without violating the Thirteenth Amendment. However, on a motion to dismiss, 'it is the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized for objective legal reasonableness.'. . As such, we look to the complaint to determine if, at the pleading stage, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. It is clearly established that requiring hard labor of pretrial detainees—persons not 'duly convicted'—violates the Thirteenth Amendment. See U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1. Reviewing the allegations of the complaint in the light most favorable to McGarry, we conclude that a pretrial detainee's compelled work in a laundry for up to 14 hours a day for three days a week doing other inmates' laundry cannot reasonably be construed as personally related housekeeping chores and that officers of reasonable competence could not disagree on these points. . . Accordingly, we conclude that, at this stage of the proceeding, defendants have not demonstrated that they are entitled to qualified immunity.") Southerland v. City of New York, 680 F.3d 127, 160 (2d Cir. 2012), reh'g en banc denied, 681 F.3d 122 (2d Cir. 2012) ("The fact that Tenenbaum changed the legal 'rubric' applicable to the Southerland Children's constitutional claim—from substantive due process to illegal seizure—however, is not alone determinative of whether the constitutional rights implicated in the Children's seizure were clearly established prior to the time of the seizure. It would be inappropriate, we think, to afford Woo qualified immunity on the Southerland Children's claim solely because, two years after the events in question, we shifted the constitutional label for evaluating that claim from the Fourteenth to the Fourth Amendment. . . What matters is whether an objectively reasonable caseworker in Woo's position would have known that removing a child from his or her home without parental consent, circumstances warranting the removal, or court order would violate a constitutional right—not whether the caseworker would have known which constitutional provisions would be violated if the caseworker proceeded to act in a particular way. . . . Although the standard for determining whether the circumstances justify seizure of a child without judicial authorization or parental consent under the Fourth Amendment was not established by 1997 and, as we have pointed out, remains unsettled to this day, the Children's right not to be taken from the care of their parent without court order, parental consent, or emergency circumstances was firmly established, albeit under a procedural due process framework. . . Regardless of whether probable cause or exigent circumstances must be established to justify a warrantless seizure for Fourth Amendment purposes, the existence of emergency circumstances sufficient to justify removal of the Southerland Children in a manner comporting with their due process rights would also certainly suffice to justify their removal in a manner comporting with their Fourth Amendment rights barring unreasonable seizure. To that extent, at the time of the events in this case, the Southerland Children's Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable seizure were clearly established. In light of this determination, the next question the Court must address is whether 'it was objectively reasonable for [Woo] to believe [that his] acts did not violate th[e Childrens' clearly established] right [ ],' Holcomb, 337 F.3d at 220, not to be taken from the care of their parent without court order, parental consent, or emergency circumstances. Once again, for the purposes of the qualified immunity analysis, the legal origin of the right is not determinative. If Woo has established that he was objectively reasonable in believing that he did not violate the Children's right to be free from unwarranted seizure without exigent circumstances, court order, or parental consent, then he is protected against their Fourth Amendment seizure claim, no matter the standard used to determine liability on this claim on the merits. For the same reasons as in our procedural due process analysis—that we cannot conclude as a matter of law on the current record that it would have been objectively reasonable for Woo to believe that his actions did not violate the Children's constitutional right not to be removed from their home barring exigent circumstances—we cannot conclude as a matter of law that Woo must prevail on the 'objectively reasonable' inquiry as to the violation of the children's Fourth Amendment illegal seizure claims. . . Thus, qualified immunity is unavailable to Woo at this stage on the current record.")

Nagle v. Marron, 663 F.3d 100, 115, 116 (2d Cir. 2011) ("In the present case, Appellees do not argue that Nagle did not have a clearly established right not to suffer adverse employment actions in retaliation for her protected speech. Rather, they argue that it is not clearly established that speech protected at one time 'remains protected when discovered years later' in a 'geographically remote community.' Appellees cite no cases suggesting that First Amendment protection wanes over time. More importantly, they point to no basis on which a reasonable official might conclude that it would so wane, thereby permitting the official to retaliate for the speech. As we have previously observed, there are material questions of fact in this case as to whether the complained-of tenure decision was made in retaliation for Nagle's speech. But assuming, as we must, that this causation question is decided against Appellees at trial, no reasonable official could think that such speech-retaliatory conduct was constitutionally permissible based simply on the passage of time. Insofar as Appellees mean to rest on the cases cited by the district court in its discussion of this issue, we note that none of those cases held, or even supported the conclusion, that First Amendment protection deteriorates over time and space. On the contrary, every case the district court cited held or assumed that earlier expressive acts could give rise to a claim of retaliation. . .

. It is true that no case in our Circuit has specifically held that First Amendment protection does not grow weaker over time and space. But as the Supreme Court has explained, 'the very action in question' need not have been the subject of a holding in order for a right to be clearly established. . . . Fried and Castar knew or should have known that retaliation for protected speech would violate an employee's First Amendment rights, and they had no reason to think that speech protected in Virginia in 2004 would not be protected in New York in 2007. We therefore hold that, based on the record on appeal, neither Fried nor Castar are subject to qualified immunity from Nagle's suit." footnotes omitted)

Jackler v. Byrne, 658 F.3d 225, 241-43 (2d Cir. 2011) (on prong one of qualified immunity, holding officer's claim that he was retaliated against for his refusal to obey supervisors' instructions to retract truthful report relating to another officer's use of excessive force and file a false report was not controlled by Garcetti and was within the scope of First Amendment protection; on prong two, leaving qualified immunity question for resolution by district court after issues of fact resolved by jury, but noting that "[a]ny uncertainty [in circuit's prior clearly established law] introduced by Garcetti and Weintraub, which were not decided until after defendants' retaliation against [plaintiff] . . . would not entitle defendants to qualified immunity because the availability of that defense depends on whether the unlawfulness of their conduct was apparent in light of ' "pre-existing law."')

Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 107 (2d Cir. 2010) ("In the presence of a statute that requires all sentences for certain crimes to be accompanied by mandatory PRS [Post Release Supervision], and New York cases that routinely upheld the administrative imposition of that PRS, we conclude that it was not clearly established for qualified immunity purposes prior to Earley that the administrative imposition of PRS violates the Due Process Clause.")

Manganiello v. City of New York, 612 F.3d 149, 165 (2d Cir. 2010) ("In the present case, given the jury's findings that Agostini misrepresented the evidence to the prosecutors, or failed to pass on material information, or made statements that were false, and engaged in such misconduct knowingly, and given the ample evidentiary support for those findings, the district court correctly concluded that no reasonable officer could have believed Agostini's actions to be lawful. Agostini's motion for judgment as a matter of law based on qualified immunity was properly denied.")

Okin v. Village of Cornwall-On-Hudson Police Dept., 577 F.3d 415, 434, 435, 437 (2d Cir. 2009) ("The issue in this case is whether defendants were on notice that their affirmative interactions with an individual accused of domestic violence, their failure to arrest the accused individual, and their disregard of established procedures for responding to domestic violence incidents, which were reasonably likely to encourage the accused individual to believe that he would not be arrested, punished, or otherwise interfered with while engaging in domestic violence, would contribute to the vulnerability of the complainant by emboldening her abuser, thereby giving rise to a substantive due process violation. . . . We . . . find that the state-created danger theory, at the time of defendants' actions here, clearly established that police officers are prohibited from affirmatively contributing to the vulnerability of a known victim by engaging in conduct, whether explicit or implicit, that encourages intentional violence against the victim, and as that is the substantive due process violation alleged here, qualified immunity does not apply. Together, Dwares and Hemphill stand for the proposition that police officers may not engage in conduct that encourages or condones a private actor's infliction of intentional violence . . . . In sum, the rule drawn from Dwares, although its application was not clearly established under the circumstances in Pena, applied with 'obvious clarity' to Okin's case. . . We conclude that the state of the law in 2001 to 2003 gave defendants fair warning that police conduct that encourages a private citizen to engage in domestic violence, by fostering the belief that his intentionally violent behavior will not be confronted by arrest, punishment, or police interference, gives rise to a substantive due process violation, and that defendants, if found liable, would not be entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hartline v. Gallo, 546 F.3d 95, 102 & n.5, 103 (2d Cir. 2008) ("Ultimately, if the facts of this case amount to reasonable suspicion, then strip searches will become commonplace. Given the uniquely intrusive nature of strip searches, as well as the multitude of less invasive investigative techniques available to officers confronted by misdemeanor offenders, that result would be unacceptable in any society that takes privacy and bodily integrity seriously. . . . We note that this case presents a markedly different set of circumstances than those addressed by the standard of the 'special needs' of penal or other institutions to conduct strip searches by reason of the presence of a larger, or dangerous, or vulnerable population, where introduction of secreted contraband from the outside raises a substantial risk of harm. See N.G. v. Connecticut, 382 F.3d 225, 234-37 (2d Cir.2004); Covino v. Patrissi, 967 F.2d 73, 76-80 (2d Cir.1992). No such special needs exist where, as here, an arrestee is taken to an empty cell for purposes of an evidentiary search, subsequent booking, and release. . . . Defendants do not dispute that for more than twenty years this Court has held that a misdemeanor arrestee may not be strip searched in the absence of individualized reasonable suspicion that she is secreting contraband. . . . It is true that this Court has never decided a case with facts just like those now before us. However, we have also never decided a case suggesting that a strip search on these facts would be constitutionally permissible. Thus, we are comfortable concluding that in the absence of indicia that this Court has found to support individualized reasonable suspicion in the past, a reasonable jury might determine that Defendants were acting in a fashion that clearly violated Hartline's Fourth Amendment rights. . . Defendants are therefore not entitled to summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity.").

Higazy v. Templeton, 505 F.3d 161, 174 (2d Cir. 2007) ("The objective prong of the qualified immunity test asks whether an officer in Templeton's shoes would have known that he was violating the right in question. We believe that a reasonable jury could conclude that he would. For the purposes of our inquiry here, we conclude that when the facts are cast in the light most favorable to Higazy, an officer in Templeton's shoes would have understood that the confession he allegedly coerced from Higazy would have been used in a criminal case against Higazy and that his actions therefore violated Higazy's constitutional right to be free from compelled self-incrimination.")

Russo v. City of Bridgeport, 479 F.3d 196, 208, 209, 211, 212 (2d Cir. 2007) ("Today, we hold that the right mentioned in Baker and enunciated in the above cited cases protected Russo from a sustained detention stemming directly from the law enforcement officials' refusal to investigate available exculpatory evidence. The Bridgeport police officers retained sole custody of the videotape evidence–and stored it in an improper manner–for a full 68 days after Russo alerted them that examining the pictures of the perpetrator for tattoos could exonerate Russo. They did this after intentionally misstating that the robber had tattoos. Moreover, their failure to perform the simple task of checking the tape resulted in all of Russo's 217-day incarceration. We must clarify the source of this right, however. Although Justice Blackmun in Baker–and several circuits including our own in Satchell–have suggested that the right was rooted in substantive due process, we now conclude, in light of more recent guidance from the Supreme Court, that the right should instead be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. . . . . We therefore treat Russo's claim as being based on the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable seizures. And, doing so, we conclude, in light of (1) the length of time of Russo's wrongful incarceration, (2) the ease with which the evidence exculpating Russo–which was in the officers' possession– could have been checked, and (3) the alleged intentionality of DePietro's and Borona's behavior, that Russo has sufficiently alleged that he was unreasonably seized. In other words, the evidence Russo has proffered suffices to prevent summary judgment on Russo's claim of a Fourth Amendment violation by DePietro and Borona. . . . Based on our determination that a reasonable factfinder could conclude that DePietro and Borona's conduct violated Russo's Fourth Amendment rights, we move to the second step of the Saucier inquiry and assess whether these officers are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . First, Russo had a clearly-established constitutional right to be free from prolonged detention caused by law enforcement officials' mishandling or suppression of exculpatory evidence in a manner which 'shocks the conscience.' . . Today we have clarified that Russo's claim should be 'treated under the Fourth Amendment,' . . . rather than under substantive due process. But this clarification is of no consequence to the question of whether the right was clearly established, because the proper inquiry is whether the right itself–rather than its source–is clearly established.").

Jones v. Parmley, 465 F.3d 46, 57-61(2d Cir. 2006) ("Defendants concede that plaintiffs had a constitutional right to protest but instead argue that the contours of the right were not sufficiently clear because of the absence of decisional law supporting the existence of a right to continue with a demonstration after some of the participants create a public safety hazard.' While we recognize that to be clearly established, the right 'must have been recognized in a particularized rather than a general sense,'. . . we disagree for the reasons that follow with defendants' contention that the right at issue in this case was too general to be clearly established. Defendants misapprehend the nature of the inquiry here. They essentially argue that we should find qualified immunity unless a Supreme Court or Second Circuit case expressly denies it, but that standard was rejected by the Supreme Court in favor of one in which courts must examine whether in 'the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [is] apparent.'. .As we established in the previous section, the Supreme Court has long applied the 'clear and present danger' test to protest cases to determine when police interference is constitutional. . . . In the protest context, the Supreme Court has already well articulated the contours of the right and made clear that the police may not interfere with demonstrations unless there is a 'clear and present danger' of riot, imminent violence, interference with traffic or other immediate threat to public safety. . . . Taken as a whole, the facts as alleged by plaintiffs reveal an orderly, peaceful crowd, the overwhelming majority of whose members had not entered the I-81 roadway. Given the above, it is clear to this Court that a reasonable factfinder could determine under plaintiffs' version of events that the demonstration did not constitute a 'clear and present danger' and thus that the NYSP's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right to protest. . . . Here, defendants concede that they issued no dispersal order and instead stood in a 'skirmish line,' waited thirty-five seconds, and then charged into the crowd, arresting protesters indiscriminately. . . In the end, the district court properly concluded that the facts as alleged by plaintiffs demonstrate that defendants violated plaintiffs' clearly established First Amendment rights 'of which a reasonable person would have known.'")

Pena v. DePrisco, 432 F.3d 98, 115 (2d Cir. 2005) ("Although it is a close question, we think that the substantive due process violation that the plaintiffs allege here was not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. Dwares did not address, let alone decide, whether repeated inaction on the part of government officials over a long period of time without an explicit statement of approval, might effectively constitute such an implicit 'prior assurance' that it rises to the level of an affirmative act. Dwares also did not indicate whether government officials may implicitly send a message of official sanction by engaging in related misconduct themselves or by participating in or tolerating such a practice. And Dwares did not expressly address the question of the scienter required for section 1983 liability. The rule of law that we draw from Dwares today was not 'clearly established' at the time of the conduct in question here. . .We therefore conclude that the pre-accident individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as to the substantive due process claims. Insofar as the complaints alleged such substantive due process violations against them, they should have been dismissed.").

Huminski v. Corsones, 396 F.3d 53, 88, 89, 92, 93 (2d Cir. 2005) (as amended on rehearing) ("We have pointed out at some length why it is clear to us that Huminski had a personal right of access to the Rutland courts. We have also noted, however, that we can find no Supreme Court or previous Second Circuit authority that actually decides this issue and thereby establishes that the First Amendment right of access to judicial proceedings or courthouses is violated when one identified person, rather than the public or press at large, is excluded from judicial proceedings. . . .The defendants therefore are not liable for damages to Huminski for their violation of his First Amendment right of access and, to that extent, the district court erred in denying their motion for summary judgment. . . .The Notices Against Trespass in effect prohibit indefinitely any and all expressive activity in which Huminski might want to engage in and around Rutland state courthouses. These notices are thus pervasive enough to be viewed as creating a 'First-Amendment-Free Zone' for Huminski alone in and around the Rutland courts. The defendants' singling out of Huminski for exclusion, thereby permitting all others to engage in similar activity in and around the courts, suggest to us that the trespass notices are not reasonable. . . . Our review thus suggests to us that the defendants violated Huminski's First Amendment right of free expression by issuing the trespass notices. The defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity with regard to this claim because this right was clearly established at the time that the defendants issued the trespass notices.").

Palmer v. Richards, 364 F.3d 60, 67, 68 (2d Cir. 2004) ("Whether Palmer's liberty interest was clearly established depends, in turn, on whether the duration and conditions of Palmer's confinement in SHU not only infringed a liberty interest, but also were of such a degree that an officer in Richards's position should have known, in light of Sandin and the law of this Circuit, that Palmer's liberty interests were at stake. . . . . The same factual question that prevents us from determining whether Palmer's liberty interest was infringed by his SHU confinement also prevents us from deciding whether Richards is entitled to qualified immunity. Given the state of the record, it is impossible to conclude that Palmer endured merely the normal SHU conditions that we have surveyed in our previous cases; instead, it is possible that Palmer endured unusually harsh SHU conditions that constituted an 'atypical and significant deprivation' under Sandin, in which case Palmer's right to due process protections was clearly established. Richards made no effort before the district court to demonstrate what Palmer's conditions were, content to rest on the argument that 'since plaintiff served only 77 days in SHU, no liberty interest is implicated.' We had repeatedly held, prior to Palmer's disciplinary hearing in August 2000, that SHU confinements shorter than 101 days would deprive a prisoner of a liberty interest–and thus trigger due process rights–if the conditions of confinement were severe enough. . . Our decisions, therefore, 'clearly foreshadow' a finding that Palmer's liberty interests could have been infringed, entitling him to hearing procedures that conform to due process, . . . although we cannot conclude as much without knowing more about the conditions of his confinement. Richards, therefore, did not carry his burden on summary judgment to show, on the undisputed facts, that no clearly established right of Palmer's was infringed.").

Cobb v. Pozzi, 363 F.3d 89, 111 (2d Cir. 2004) (as amended) ("The defendants argue that the equal protection principles articulated in Olech were not clearly established law at the time of the alleged unconstitutional conduct at issue in this appeal and that they should therefore be shielded from that claim on the grounds of qualified immunity. They also contend that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they treated the defendants in a manner that was objectively reasonable. We reject each of these arguments. First, the law pertaining to 'class of one' equal protection claims was clearly established in 1999 (i.e. when the events at issue here took place). . . . As the Supreme Court underscored in Olech, the Court has long 'recognized successful equal protection claims brought by a Aclass of one," where the plaintiff alleges that she has been intentionally treated differently from others similarly situated and that there is no rational basis for the difference in treatment.' . . . The defendants nonetheless contend that the specific contours of a 'class of one' equal protection claim were modified when the Supreme Court decided Olech in 2000 such that the standards for this type of claim could not have been 'clearly established' in 1999. However, in African Trade & Info. Ctr., where the plaintiffs brought a 'class of one' equal protection claim premised on conduct that had taken place in 1998, we explained that '[i]f plaintiffs had alleged that [the defendant's conduct] ... was wholly arbitrary, or irrational, they would have alleged a violation of a clearly established constitutional right.' . . Because that is the type of 'class of one' equal protection claim with which the district court charged the jury at the close of the trial, there can be little doubt in the wake of our decision in African Trade & Info. Ctr. that the relevant standards for the particular Olech-based equal protection claim advanced at trial were clearly established even with respect to conduct that pre-dated Olech.")

Blouin v. Spitzer, 356 F.3d 348, 361 (2d Cir. 2004) ("Blouin has not demonstrated that clearly established federal law barred the defendants from effectuating the state's interest in prolonging the life of one of its citizens, whatever its quality.").

Ford v. McGinnis, 352 F.3d 582, 597, 598 (2d Cir. 2003) ("We agree with the district court's discussion of qualified immunity insofar as it found that the constitutional right at issue is clearly established. . . Defendants argue that the specific right at issue has not been clearly established, as this Court has never held that 'prison officials were obligated to provide an inmate with an Eid-ul-Fitr meal.' We, however, have clearly established that a prisoner has a right to a diet consistent with his or her religious scruples . . . . Defendants are correct that we have never had occasion to recognize a prisoner's right to the Eid ul Fitr feast in particular, but courts need not have ruled in favor of a prisoner under precisely the same factual circumstance in order for the right to be clearly established. . . We find that prior cases make it sufficiently clear that absent a legitimate penological justification, which for present purposes we must assume defendants were without, prison officials' conduct in denying Ford a feast imbued with religious import was unlawful. [footnote omitted] We part company with the district court, however, over the reasonableness of defendants' belief that they did not violate Ford's constitutional rights. The district court held that it was 'objectively reasonable for defendants to rely on' the advice of the DOCS religious authorities to conclude that the postponed Eid ul Fitr feast did not retain religious significance. . . Whether the prison officials, with or without the counsel of the religious authorities, thought that the Eid ul Fitr feast was not religious is beside the point. [footnote omitted] Despite the fact that all the religious authorities testified to their belief that the postponed Eid ul Fitr was without religious significance, the proper inquiry was always whether Ford's belief was sincerely held and 'in his own scheme of things, religious.' . . We do not suggest that religious authorities can never be employed in assisting prison officials in making that determination, but the religious authorities' opinions that a particular practice is not religiously mandated under Muslim law, without more, cannot render defendants' conduct reasonable.").

Patel v. Searles, 305 F.3d 130, 139, 140 (2d Cir. 2002) ("Having found that the right to intimate association extended to Patel's family relationships, we must still determine, in this specific factual context, whether defendants' actions violated a clearly established 'constitutional right[ ] of which a reasonable person would have known.' . . . . In this regard, defendants point out that even in the more common fact pattern of a child abuse investigation, our precedents have not delineated the exact boundaries of associational rights, making it difficult for social workers to know when their actions are unconstitutional. . . Similarly, since neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has ever ruled upon a fact pattern similar to the one now before us, the officers maintain that they, like the social workers in Wilkinson, had no reasonable basis to conclude that their alleged actions violated the Constitution. Defendants' contentions are not without merit. Yet, at the pleading stage of this litigation, we are unable to conclude that it is 'beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.' Conley, 355 U.S. at 45-46. Plaintiff has alleged sufficiently serious misconduct that were we to reverse the district court, it would be equivalent to holding that the right to intimate association does not impose any clearly established limits on the tactics that a police officer may use in the course of an investigation. . . . As a consequence, we do not think it would be objectively reasonable for the police to engage in an extended public and private defamatory misinformation campaign to destroy a family, hoping that those tactics might produce incriminating leads in a murder investigation.").

Poe v. Leonard, 282 F.3d 123, 126 (2d Cir. 2002) ("We hold that in order for a supervisor to be held liable under section 1983, both the law allegedly violated by the subordinate and the supervisory liability doctrine under which the plaintiff seeks to hold the supervisor liable must be clearly established. By 1993, it was clearly established that a police officer violates a person's Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily privacy when that officer views, photographs or otherwise records another's unclothed or partially unclothed body, without that person's consent. By 1993, it was also clearly established that a supervisor could be liable if he had actual or constructive notice that it was highly likely his subordinate, while on duty, might violate another's right to privacy in his or her unclothed body, but the supervisor deliberately or recklessly disregarded that risk by failing to take reasonable action to prevent such a violation, and that failure caused the constitutional injury to the plaintiff.").

Shain v. Ellison, 273 F.3d 56, 66 (2d Cir. 2001) ("[I]t was clearly established in 1995 that persons charged with a misdemeanor and remanded to a local correctional facility like NCCC have a right to be free of a strip search absent reasonable suspicion that they are carrying contraband or weapons.")

Kerman v. City of New York (Kerman II), 261 F.3d 229, 237 (2d Cir. 2001) ("We find that at the time of the officers' conduct in this case no clearly established law prohibited a warrantless entry into an apartment on the ground of exigent circumstances based solely on an anonymous 911 call. Therefore, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to all nine defendant police officers with regard to defendants' entry into Kerman's apartment.").

Johnson v. Newburgh Enlarged School District, 239 F.3d 246, 253 (2d Cir. 2001) ("Bucci's reliance on the absence of Supreme Court or Second Circuit precedent expressly holding students have a substantive due process right, as he puts it, 'not to be struck by a teacher' construes the right too narrowly. In Rodriguez, decided one year before Bucci's alleged attack on T.J., we held that individuals possess a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process right 'in the non-seizure, non-prisoner context' to be free from excessive force employed by government actors acting under the color of government authority. . . . To the extent that no case applying this right in the educational setting has previously arisen in our circuit, we view this unremarkable absence as a strong indication that the right to be free from excessive force is so well-recognized and widely observed by educators in public schools as to have eluded the necessity of judicial pronouncement. . . . [W]e believe that for claims based on intentionally tortious harmful conduct employed in the absence of any legitimate government interest, the requisite degree of particularity is lessened. Such conduct in the 'non-seizure, non-prisoner context' by any government actor under any circumstances is unjustifiable and, therefore, no additional situation-specific 'contouring' of the right to be free of excessive force is required. Accordingly, we hold that the right to be free of excessive force as announced by this court in Rodriquez was sufficiently concrete to put Bucci on notice that he could not use intentionally harmful force in the absence of a legitimate and discernible government aim.").

Ford v. Moore, 237 F.3d 156, 163 n.4 (2d Cir. 2001) ("The application of qualified immunity law to supervisory liability claims presents important and unresolved questions. What law must be 'clearly established' to defeat a qualified immunity defense: the law violated by the subordinates, or the supervisory liability doctrine under which the plaintiff hopes to hold the defendant liable, or both? And what must be 'objectively unreasonable': the subordinates' acts, or the supervisor's failure to act, or both? These questions have gone largely unexplored. The First Circuit, in a thoughtful opinion, recently appeared to conclude that a court should examine whether the constitutional right allegedly violated by the subordinates and the plaintiff's supervisory liability theory are clearly established, and if they are, then move on to evaluate the supervisor's objective liability in failing to act. See Camilo-Robles v. Hoyos, 151 F.3d 1, 8 (1st Cir.1998). This Circuit has not explicitly discussed the issue, but has at least once used a rule different from the First Circuit's, looking to the clarity of the law allegedly violated by the subordinates, and then moving on to the objective reasonableness of the defendant's actions. [citing cases] Because we hold that Lt. Moore is entitled to qualified immunity under even the narrow rendering of the doctrine favorable to the Plaintiff (one in which only the law violated by the subordinates must be clearly established, and only the supervisor's acts must be objectively unreasonable), we leave this matter to be resolved another day.").

Zahrey v. Coffey, 221 F.3d 342, 344, 349, 356, 357 (2d Cir. 2000) ("We hold that there is a constitutional right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer acting in an investigatory capacity, at least where the officer foresees that he himself will use the evidence with a resulting deprivation of liberty. We also believe that this right was clearly established in 1996, when Coffey's alleged misconduct occurred. . . .It is arguable that in this case the right should be identified as the right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of any governmental misconduct occurring in the investigative phase of a criminal matter. A right defined that broadly, however, would cover too much ground because some investigative actions, though fairly labeled as "misconduct," might not merit condemnation as a denial of due process. On the other hand, the right need not be identified at such a level of particularity as to focus only on fabrication of evidence by a prosecutor acting in an investigating capacity. . . . We think the right at issue in this case is appropriately identified as the right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer acting in an investigating capacity. . . . Although no prior decision has found a violation by an investigating prosecutor of the right not to be deprived of liberty on the basis of fabricated evidence, the cases in which such claims have been made reveal some support for Zahrey's position. . . . Anderson instructs . . . that for a right to be clearly established for purposes of a qualified immunity defense, the precise conduct at issue need not previously have been ruled unlawful. . . We think the right at issue in this case should not be defined at such a level of particularity as to be limited to a right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of an investigating prosecutor's fabrication of evidence. The right is appropriately identified as the right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of any government officer's fabrication of evidence. That right was clearly established in 1996, when Coffey's alleged acts occurred . . . .").

Lauro v. Charles, 219 F.3d 202, 216 (2d Cir. 2000) ("There are . . . differences between Ayeni and this case that, we believe, render the likeness between the two less than obvious. Thus, the police action in Ayeni was a search, while in this case it was a seizure. More importantly, the search in Ayeni invaded a private home, an area that has traditionally been given the highest degree of protection by the Fourth Amendment . . . , while the seizure in this case infringed Lauro's personal privacy in the course of detention by the police, a situation in which the privacy protections of the Fourth Amendment must often yield to law enforcement needs. . . . For purposes of determining whether the rule we announce today was clearly established by Ayeni, these are significant distinctions. . .In light of Wilson's admonition that the particular right must be defined with specificity, we are not prepared to say that a reasonable police officer should clearly have been able to discern that the search in Ayeni and the seizure in this case infringe what are merely different aspects of the same previously defined constitutional right.").

Tenebaum v. Williams, 193 F.3d 581, 596, 597 (2d Cir. 1999) ("[N]ot until today have we specifically held that where there is reasonable time consistent with the safety of the child to obtain a judicial order, the 'emergency' removal of a child is unwarranted. We cannot say that this principle was clearly enough articulated in or implied by our case law as of 1990 to require the defendants to answer in damages for their failure to abide by it at that time. . . . Because we now hold that it is unconstitutional for state officials to effect a child's removal on an 'emergency' basis where there is reasonable time safely to obtain judicial authorization consistent with the child's safety, caseworkers can no longer claim, as did the defendants here, that they are immune from liability for such actions because the law is not 'clearly established.' But there remains substantial protection for caseworkers under the second prong of the qualified immunity test, so long as it is 'objectively reasonable [for them] to believe that [their] acts [do] not violate these clearly established rights.'. . . We are confident that the doctrine of qualified immunity applied in light of these principles will continue to provide ample protection for caseworkers, enabling them to fulfill their crucial duties safely and effectively.").

Powell v. Schriver, 175 F.3d 107, 115 (2d Cir. 1999) ("In our view, it was as obvious in 1991 as it is now that under certain circumstances the disclosure of an inmate's HIV-positive status and– perhaps more so–her transsexualism could place that inmate in harm's way. Accordingly, we hold that 'under preexisting law,' a reasonable prison official in December of 1991 would have known that such disclosure, under certain circumstances and absent legitimate penological purposes, could constitute deliberate indifference to a substantial risk that such inmate would suffer serious harm at the hands of other inmates.").

Lewis v. Cowen, 165 F.3d 154, 166, 167 (2d Cir. 1999) ("In determining that Hickey had violated a clearly established right of which a reasonable person should have known, both the district judge and the magistrate judge identified the right at issue as the 'freedom of speech.' . . . The district and magistrate judges defined the right in question far too broadly. The relevant inquiry is not whether the defendants should have known that there was a federal right, in the abstract, to "freedom of speech," but whether the defendants should have known that the specific actions complained of violated the plaintiff's freedom of speech. Such an inquiry requires that a court define the constitutional right with some specificity. . . .The present case illustrates the problem of defining the right too broadly. Under the district court's formulation, no defendant in any First Amendment action could ever successfully assert the qualified immunity defense. We think the proper qualified immunity question in this case is whether the defendants should have known that terminating a policymaking public employee for refusing to promote agency policy as directed by his employer would violate the First Amendment. As this opinion indicates, the magistrate judge should have answered this question in the negative. A highranking policy-making employee does not have, and never has had, a First Amendment right to refuse his employer's directive to promote agency policy.").

Bruneau v. South Kortright Central School District, 163 F.3d 749, 755, 756 (2d Cir. 1998) ("The law does not clearly impose a duty on school officials under Title IX or the Fourteenth Amendment to stop peer sexual harassment. Indeed, there are no court of appeals cases before 1998 holding school officials potentially liable for peer sexual harassment in the school environment. Even now, there is disagreement among the circuits as to whether a school district and school officials may be held liable for sexual harassment where the officials are not directly involved in the harassment. . . . We hold that it was not clearly established law in the fall of 1993 that a § 1983 claim could be stated against individual officials for failure to prevent peer sexual harassment among students.").

Smith v. Garretto, 147 F.3d 91, 95 (2d Cir. 1998) ("Though we must be careful not to define the right in terms of the precise circumstances of a case, an approach so narrow that the defined right would rarely if ever be said to have been previously established, see LaBounty v. Coughlin, 137 F.3d 68, 73 (2d Cir.1998), we think the right at issue here must be defined as a right to be free of a retaliatory entrapment, rather than the more general right to be free of any retaliatory action. . . . No case has previously been decided in which an entrapment was ruled to be a retaliatory violation of First Amendment rights. It is therefore not clear whether the First Amendment claimant must show that the criminal case against him was frivolous, or merely lacking in probable cause, or whether he can prevail, as Bodak appears to contend, simply by alleging that although he committed a crime without any apparent inducement, he acted with a benign motive and the prosecutor's motive was retaliatory. However the law might develop with respect to the retaliatory initiation of a plan to see if a target is willing, for whatever reason, to accept the invitation to commit a crime, it was not clearly established at the time of Bodak's acceptance of the offered bribe that Garretto's alleged action violated any constitutionally protected right. For that reason, Bodak's allegations encounter an insuperable defense of qualified immunity.").

LaBounty v. Coughlin, 137 F.3d 68, 73, 74 (2d Cir. 1998) ("The chronic difficulty with this [qualified immunity] analysis for courts is in accurately defining the right at issue. An overly narrow definition of the right can effectively insulate the government's actions by making it easy to assert that the narrowly defined right was not clearly established. On the other hand, as the Supreme Court noted in Anderson, if the right is defined too broadly, '[p]laintiffs would be able to convert the rule of qualified immunity that our cases plainly establish into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.' Anderson, 483 U.S. at 639. With these warnings in mind, we find that the district court erred in describing the right at issue as 'the right to be free from crumbling asbestos.'. . . Instead, we find that the right to be free from deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, established in Estelle v. Gamble . . . best encompasses the alleged conduct. . . . Given the known dangers of friable asbestos in 1991-92 [footnote omitted], we hold that a reasonable person would have understood that exposing an inmate to friable asbestos could violate the Eighth Amendment.").

Danahy v. Buscaglia, 134 F.3d 1185, 1193 (2d Cir. 1998) ("The foregoing observations are expressed not to support a finding that plaintiffs were Policymaker/Confidential employees as a matter of law, but rather to show that officers of reasonable competence, based on the information before the defendants concerning the positions of plaintiffs, measured against the decided federal cases (i.e., those in existence at the time the defendants acted) applying the Elrod/Branti exception, could reasonably have perceived that they were, and therefore that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . For purposes of qualified immunity, enough facts were known to defendants so that an officer of reasonable competence could believe that all of the plaintiffs held confidential positions in a highly specialized prosecutor's office.").

McEvoy v. Spencer, 124 F.3d 92, 97-98 (2d Cir. 1997) ("The claim as to the first demotion . . . requires consideration of the distinction between the Pickering and the Elrod lines of decisions and poses the specific issue of whether an employer motivated to act against an employee for exercising both his speech and associational rights is insulated from liability by Elrod. The claim as to the second demotion . . . appears to present only issues implicating the Pickering line of cases, but since the complaint alleges circumstances warranting a conclusion that McEvoy was a policymaker even after his first demotion, the second demotion poses the specific issue of the significance that should be attached to an employee's policymaker role in applying Pickering. As our discussion . . . reveals, both issues were unsettled at the time of the demotions. As a result, the contours of the rights alleged to have been violated by [defendants] were not 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he was doing violates [those] right[s],'. . .and these defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Moreover, our resolution of the first issue entitles [defendants] not only to qualified immunity but also to have the claim against them regarding the first demotion dismissed entirely.").

McEvoy v. Spencer, 124 F.3d 92, 104-05 (2d Cir. 1997) ("[A]s we have previously discussed, the law was unsettled regarding whether an employee's policymaking status automatically immunized an employer's adverse action even in a pure Pickering case. Although we decide in this opinion that no dispositive policymaker exception exists in the Pickering balancing test, [defendants] did not violate a clearly established right of McEvoy's when, reasonably believing that he was a policymaker, they demoted him from Deputy Chief to Captain because of speech activities. They are therefore entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.").

Brown v. City of Oneonta, 106 F.3d 1125, 1131 (2d Cir. 1997) ("Because we agree with appellants' contention that it was unclear whether FERPA's [Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act] emergency exception allowed release of the list, we find that they are entitled to qualified immunity on that ground. . . . The statute, as it read in 1992, made no specific direction whether an educational institution might release information from students' education records to police to aid them in their search for a violent criminal who might be on campus.").

Williams v. Greifinger, 97 F.3d 699, 706 (2d Cir. 1996) (concluding that at time of plaintiff's confinement in medical keeplock, right to exercise was clearly established).

Schecter v. Comptroller of City of New York, 79 F.3d 265, 271 (2d Cir. 1996) ("Although the district court correctly reasoned that a constitutional right to access to the courts has long been established, this general right does not meet the specificity requirements of Anderson. All of the cases cited . . . for the existence of a constitutional right of access to the courts involve impediments to such access by incarcerated prisoners. . . . These cases do not establish with 'reasonable specificity,' that the provision of misleading legal advice to an unincarcerated adversary constitutes a constitutional violation." [cites omitted]).

Genas v. State of New York Dep't of Correctional Servs., 75 F.3d 825, 830-31 (2d Cir. 1996) ("[T]he district court analyzed plaintiff's religious discrimination claim, and concluded that 'the contours of the right to be free from religious discrimination and an employer's duty to make reasonable accommodation for religious observance are clearly defined.' We hold that the district court erred by defining the right at too abstract a level of generality. . . Though the duty to reasonably accommodate the religious preferences of employees has been clearly established, it has not been established that an employer acting under the terms of a collective bargaining agreement must do more to accommodate religious preferences than is required by the agreement.").

Rodriguez v. Phillips, 66 F.3d 470, 476-77 (2d Cir. 1995) ("[W]e must determine whether in January 1991 the right to be free from the use of excessive force was so clearly defined in this non-seizure, non-prisoner context that defendant Epstein knew his actions were unlawful. Earlier in our jurisprudential history, the contours of this right were clearly defined. All excessive force claims were analyzed under a single substantive due process standard . . . . Our silence and that of the Supreme Court on the continued viability of Fourteenth Amendment excessive force actions after Graham, together with the recited decisions of our sister circuits, demonstrate that any federal right of a non-arrestee/non-prisoner to be free from excessive force was not clearly established at the time of Epstein's alleged actions. While we now read the 1989 Graham decision not to preclude a claim such as Ms. Rodriguez', we agree with the Eleventh Circuit's comment that Graham 'forecloses any contention that the law was clearly established in 1990 and 1991 that use of excessive force violated the Due Process Clause.' [Swint] Since, in January 1991, Sara Rodriguez did not have a clearly established substantive due process right to be free from use of excessive force, Officer Epstein is entitled to qualified immunity on this cause of action and the denial of summary judgment in his favor was error.").

Brown v. D'Amico, 35 F.3d 97, 99-100 (2d Cir. 1994) ("In essence, [Plaintiff] is asserting the right to be free from an arrest under circumstances where (a) probable cause is furnished, (b) probable cause would arguably have been negated if information in the applicant's possession had been disclosed to the issuing magistrate, and (c) the undisclosed information had previously been disclosed to an investigatory grand jury that had made a finding of probable cause. We hold that [Defendant] is entitled to qualified immunity because this right was not clearly established in December 1986 when he applied for an arrest warrant . . . . Plaintiff might object that we have defined the right asserted at an undue level of particularity. We do not believe that we have. We do not grant immunity because no previous case has presented the exact set of facts now before us. [citing Anderson] Rather, we uphold the claim of immunity because no case has considered the responsibilities of a state law enforcement officer in the special state procedural context presented here. A police officer violates no settled interpretation of the Fourth Amendment when the officer omits from a warrant application information that has previously been included in the aggregate of evidence that led a neutral investigatory grand jury to make a finding of probable cause. We observe that a more abstract level of generality might be appropriate in other cases involving charges of false arrest and malicious prosecution.").

Soares v. State of Connecticut, 8 F.3d 917, 922 (2d Cir. 1993) ("Given the absence of any preexisting caselaw recognizing plaintiff's alleged right not to be handcuffed and in light of the presently existing conflict of views, it is plain that [defendants] did not violate plaintiff's 'clearly established' rights. . . . ").

McDonald v. City of Troy, No. 1:18-CV-1327, 2021 WL 2232565, at *5–6 (N.D.N.Y. June 3, 2021) ("Contrary to Iler's hopes, his defense of qualified immunity does not require summary judgment in his favor. After all, the Second Circuit has unambiguously held that the 'clearly established' label applies to the use of deadly force to stop a fleeing motorist in the absence of a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others. . . Defendants may nevertheless argue that this language conflicts with the Supreme Court's demand for specificity in defining what rights are clearly established, but any such conflict is irrelevant in this case. . . The facts of this case simply line up too squarely with the facts in Cowan. Both involve an officer firing on an approaching vehicle within a short window of time. . . Both cases involve an officer trying to verbally stop a would-be escapee from fleeing before opening fire. . . Both cases involve a dispute as to whether the officer was actually in danger when he opened fire. . .In short, the factual underpinnings of this case and Cowan are strong enough that, at the very least for the purposes of summary judgment, the Court is satisfied that Iler is not entitled to qualified immunity on his excessive force claims. . . Iler's motion for summary judgment against plaintiff's § 1983 excessive force claim on the basis of qualified immunity must therefore also be denied.")

Ismael v. Charles, No. 1:18-CV-3597-GHW, 2020 WL 4003291, at *13 (S.D.N.Y. July 15, 2020) ("[T]o succeed on a failure to intervene claim, a plaintiff must show '(1) the officer had a realistic opportunity to intervene and prevent the harm; (2) a reasonable person in the officer's position would [have] know[n] that the victim's constitutional rights were being violated; and (3) the officer d[id] not take reasonable steps to intervene.'. . Qualified immunity also applies to failure to intervene claims. 'To overcome the defense of qualified immunity for failure to intercede whe[n] others have engaged in excessive force, a plaintiff must show that the failure to intercede permitted fellow officers to violate an individual's clearly established rights of which a reasonable officer would have known[.]'. . The 'failure to intercede must' also 'be under circumstances making it objectively unreasonable for him to believe that his fellow officers' conduct did not violate those rights.'. . .But on summary judgment, a defendant must 'show that no reasonable trier of fact could find that the defendants' actions were objectively unreasonable.'. . Camacho is not entitled to qualified immunity on Ismael's failure to intercede claim. There is a question of fact about whether the officers acted in an objectively unreasonable manner when they subdued Camacho in the main intake. For one, Ismael testified that the officers punched him after he was handcuffed and shackled. . . According to Ismael, Camacho permitted this assault to continue until she exclaimed 'that's enough.' If a jury credited that testimony, it could conclude that Camacho's failure to intervene was objectively unreasonable. And as discussed, it was clearly established that a use of force against a restrained inmate is unreasonable. There is also a factual dispute about whether Camacho had a reasonable opportunity to intervene. That is unsurprising because '[w]hether the officer had a "realistic opportunity" to intervene is normally a question for the jury[.]'. . So there are factual disputes that preclude the Court from granting summary judgment on Ismael's failure to intervene claim against Camacho.")

Mozzochi v. Borden, 959 F.2d 1174, 1178-79 (2d Cir. 1992) ("The district court framed the qualified immunity question ...as whether 'a citizen possessed a clearly established constitutional right not to have his speech regulated because the state actor disagreed with its content'....Framed at the proper level of generality and incorporating the facts ... the qualified immunity question is whether, at the time the alleged acts took place, it was clearly established that an individual's constitutional rights were violated when a criminal prosecution, supported by probable cause, was initiated in an attempt to deter or silence the exercise by the criminal defendant of his right to free speech, but without the effect of actually deterring or silencing the individual.").

Zarkower v. City of New York, No. 19CV3843ARRRLM, 2020 WL 2572196, at *7, *9 (E.D.N.Y. May 21, 2020) ("I agree with defendants that at the time of Zarkower's detention, there was no controlling case law addressing the specific circumstance of an arrestee being issued a DAT, then detained for an additional five hours for the sole purpose of being debriefed about unrelated crimes. . . Plaintiff has cited no such case law because it does not exist. . . But that does not mean that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for conduct that so flagrantly violates the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable custodial detention. . . This is an obvious case 'where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . By focusing on Riverside's rule that 48 hours of detention is presumptively reasonable, the defendants lose the forest for the trees. That particular sentence in Riverside exists within a world of Fourth Amendment law where all custodial arrests must be justified by probable cause. Riverside, building on Gerstein, acknowledges that the probable cause determination cannot always happen before an arrest, and in many cases, for logistical reasons, it cannot happen immediately after the arrest either. . . The point of Riverside is that there can be some delay between the arrest and the probable cause determination, as long as that delay is not unreasonable. . . The case before me now does not actually involve a delayed judicial probable cause determination. It involves a circumstance where police formally issued a DAT explicitly stating that there would not be a prompt judicial probable cause hearing, and that instead, the arrestee would be released to return for arraignment at a later date. Riverside authorizes post-arrest detention for the purposes of processing an arrest and arranging a judicial probable cause determination, while taking into account logistical realities that prevent the hearing from happening immediately upon arrest. Riverside does not provide any authority for detaining a person after their arrest has been fully processed and there is a formal decision made to release the person without holding a prompt probable cause hearing. Defendants seem to take the position that because issuing a DAT is discretionary, the fact that Zarkower was issued a DAT five hours before his release is somehow irrelevant. . . But defendants simultaneously acknowledge that '[i]n certain circumstances police officers may, but are not required, to issue a DAT to an arrestee rather than hold him in custody until a judge is available.'. . In the hours following a warrantless arrest, police officers are faced with a binary choice of either detaining an arrestee until a judge is available for a probable cause hearing or releasing the arrestee pursuant to a DAT. That decision is to be made within the officer's discretion. But once the second option is chosen, the detention is no longer justified by Riverside. This case does not involve a question of whether issuing a DAT is discretionary. Zarkower asserts that he was issued a DAT. Once he received the DAT, it was clear that he was not going to be promptly arraigned, and the constitutional reason for the detention evaporated. . . . Some actions are so outrageous and so obviously unconstitutional that reasonable officers are on notice without a case addressing similar facts. . . The fact that there is no Second Circuit precedent addressing detention for purposes of 'debriefing' does not absolve police officers from understanding that Riverside authorizes a brief detention for purposes of processing the arrest and arranging a probable cause hearing and nothing more. Nothing in Riverside could be interpreted to authorize detaining someone for the sole purpose of asking questions about crime in the community. . . . This is an obvious case of an unreasonable, unconstitutional seizure.")

Case v. City of New York, No. 14 CIV. 9148 (AT), 2019 WL 4747957, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 30, 2019) ("To begin, there are no material disputes as to the facts underlying the question of qualified immunity. The parties agree that the congregation of protestors on the morning of November 17, 2011 was sizable, and that the crowd was, at times, at a standstill in the middle of sidewalks and roadways. . . In addition to the large crowds, video footage shows pedestrians and vehicles attempting, unsuccessfully, to access the sidewalks and roadways at certain moments, individuals standing or sitting in the roadway for stretches of minutes, and a sometimes-chaotic atmosphere. . . . Given the totality of the circumstances, the Court cannot say that the Individual Defendants' 'judgment was so flawed that no reasonable officer would have made a similar choice' when deciding whether and how to regulate the public's movements at the protest. . .The Court, therefore, holds that, 'for qualified immunity purposes, the officers' did not 'invad[e] Plaintiffs' clearly established rights of association, assembly, and free exercise, as they were executing . . . order[s] to disperse—a permissible time, place, and manner restriction on speech in a public area.'. . The substantial crowd presence at Plaintiffs' arrest locations justified Defendants' asserted need to regulate the demonstrators' movement (or, at times, their refusal to leave). Accordingly, Defendants' motion for summary judgment on the First Amendment time, place, and manner claim against the Individual Defendants is GRANTED.")

McKenzie v. City of New York, No. 17 CIV. 4899 (PAE), 2019 WL 3288267, at *7–8 (S.D.N.Y. July 22, 2019) ("The Court assumes arguendo that there is a First Amendment right to record police activity: although neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has had occasion to squarely so hold, every circuit to consider the question has 'concluded that the First Amendment protects the right to record police officers performing their duties in a public space, subject to reasonable time, place and manner restrictions.' . . But these circuits have also recognized that such a right may not apply in certain circumstances, for example, 'in particularly dangerous situations, if the recording interferes with the police activity, if it is surreptitious, if it is done by the subject of the police activity, or if the police activity is part of an undercover investigation.'. . This qualification is important here, because the circumstances presented are not ones in which McKenzie's right to film his ongoing encounter with the police was clearly established. McKenzie was not a bystander witness; he was the subject of the police activity. Furthermore, at the time he asserts a First Amendment right to film, he was in the process of being arrested. As McKenzie concedes, he attempted to grab his phone, which was lying on the center console next to him, only after Twum had ordered McKenzie to exit the vehicle and told him that he was under arrest, . . . and, as noted earlier, McKenzie admits refusing to comply with Twum's order to turn off the motor and exit the car[.] . .In these circumstances, whether or not McKenzie had a legally protected First Amendment interest in filming before Twum had told him he was under arrest, it was not clearly established, as a matter of law, that he had a constitutional right to commence filming while he was in the course of being arrested (let alone in the course, possibly, of resisting arrest). Qualified immunity 'depends upon whether the right plaintiff asserts is so clearly established that defendants should have known it.'. . On the undisputed facts, that was not so here.")

Horn v. City of New Haven, No. 3:18-CV-1502 (JAM), 2019 WL 3006540, at *6-7 (D. Conn. July 9, 2019) ("Although the facts of Walker did not happen to involve a ballistics expert or forensic firearms examiner, the Walker decision clearly foreshadowed that Brady applies to any law enforcement member of the prosecution team. Indeed, Stephenson himself was no mere lay witness but was an employee of the Connecticut State Police who was enlisted to generate evidence for use in the prosecution of a robbery and murder. Why should ballistics experts and forensic firearms examiners be free to hide exculpatory evidence from prosecutors while other police officials may not? Stephenson has no answer to this question that makes any sense. The fact that no particular case happens to involve a police firearms examiner is no more significant than the fact that no particular case may involve the violation of someone's constitutional rights on a Tuesday in a Leap Year or by a police officer born in North Dakota. In light of the Second Circuit's decision in Walker, no objectively reasonable police officer in 1999 and 2000 would have concluded that police ballistics experts and forensic firearms examiners are exempt from the Brady disclosure rule. . . . All in all, I cannot agree with Stephenson's argument that he is entitled to qualified immunity for lack of clearly established law that Brady applies to law enforcement officers who are employed as ballistic experts or forensic firearms experts. Accordingly, I will deny Stephenson's claim to qualified immunity at this time.")

Ramos v. Town of East Hartford, No. 3:16-CV-166 (VLB), 2019 WL 2785594, at *9-13, *18 (D. Conn. July 2, 2019) ("Courts in the Second Circuit have found that tasers constitute a 'significant degree of force' and a 'serious intrusion' on the individual's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .Although the Court has established that the initial use of the taser was reasonable under the circumstances, it must consider the duration of the taser use. The undisputed evidence shows that Defendant Kaplan deployed the taser for twenty seconds. . . The parties dispute whether Maldonado was resisting or posing a threat to the Defendants, and the Court finds that the video is inconclusive on this issue. . . .Therefore, the reasonableness of force used by Defendant Kaplan depends on when Maldonado was subdued and no longer a threat to Defendants or to Ramos. Considering the video evidence and the testimony of the parties, the Court cannot pinpoint as a matter of law when Maldonado was no longer resisting the Defendants or posing a threat to their safety, in addition to Ramos's safety. Therefore, Defendant Kaplan's Motion for Summary Judgment on the Estate's excessive force claim for use of a taser is DENIED. . . . It is undisputed that Maldonado was tased in a single interval for a continuous period of twenty seconds. Defendant Kaplan was aware that a taser can be lethal. . . Defendant Kaplan also knew that the regular taser cycle was five seconds. . . He was instructed to fire at five-second bursts then assess impact, and he knew it was better to not exceed the five-second interval. . . Kaplan used the taser for a prolonged period, approximately four times that recommended because he suspected it was not working; however, he did not know for certain whether the taser was working and whether Maldonado received excessive electrical charge. . . Defendant Kaplan was also instructed to try not to target a person's chest, among other areas, because it could interfere with the heart. . . When Defendant Kaplan initially began tasing, he was responding to Maldonado's unexpected and rapidly evolving aggression and was in very close quarters. A reasonable officer under those conditions is unlikely to have the time and space to target the taser. However, for at least a portion of the time he used the taser Officer Kaplan did have the opportunity and space to target another part of Maldonado's body. . . . As of the date of this incident, it was clearly established within the Second Circuit that tasing and physically assaulting an individual who was not actively resisting arrest or posing an immediate threat to officers constituted excessive force. . . Here, there is a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Maldonado was resisting during the entire time the taser was deployed and when Defendant Lis punched him and shoved him towards the holding cell wall. This fact dispute precludes the Court from granting summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds.")

Black Lives Matter v. Town of Clarkstown, No. 17-CV-6592 (NSR), 2018 WL 5997908, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 14, 2018) ("First, as discussed above, Plaintiffs plausibly claim that Defendants violated their First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory surveillance and intimidation at the July rally for their participation in Black Lives Matter. Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint plausibly alleges that Defendants intentionally subjected them to surveillance based on their participation in Black Lives Matter in violation of their First Amendment rights. Second, it was clearly established at the time of Defendants' actions in 2015 to 2016 that the government cannot retaliate against individuals for exercising First Amendment free speech and association rights. . . No reasonable official would have thought engaging in surveillance and intimidation solely based on Plaintiffs' membership in Black Lives Matter was lawful. The Omnibus Crime Act expressly prohibits the electronic surveillance of individuals or groups without reasonable suspicion that those individuals are involved in criminal conduct, 28 C.F.R. § 23.20, and the substantial weight of case law indicates that the government cannot deprive individuals of their freedoms of association or speech. . . There are no also no facts supporting qualified immunity on the face of the Amended Complaint. Accordingly, Defendants Sullivan's and Cole-Hatchard's requests for qualified immunity is denied.")

Gibbs v. City of Bridgeport, No. 3:16-CV-635 (JAM), 2018 WL 4119588, at *8-11 (D. Conn. Aug. 29, 2018) ("The qualified immunity doctrine is doubtlessly most easily applied when one side or the other can cite a prior case with virtually identical facts. But that's a lot to ask in terms of coincidence. And it's a shaky proposition as well to presume that police officers devote themselves like fastidious law students to monitoring appellate court opinions for the latest nuances in fact-laden developments of Fourth Amendment law. That is why for qualified immunity purposes there need not necessarily be a case right on point, because 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates clearly established law even in novel factual circumstances, and there can be the rare obvious case, where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . As discussed above, since the Supreme Court's decision in Tennessee v. Garner, it has been clear that a police officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing suspect unless the officer 'has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'. . Moreover, in the qualified immunity context, if the substantive Fourth Amendment standard requires a determination of probable cause, a police officer is entitled to qualified immunity so long as there is even arguable probable cause. . . Although the Garner rule is itself a constitutional sub-rule of the more general rule that a police officer may not use objectively unreasonable force, the Supreme Court has cautioned that—absent a so-called 'obvious case'—the Garner rule may be too general a guide for whether an officer's use of force violated clearly established law. . . Fair enough. I will consider in light of the facts of Garner and other cases whether an objectively reasonable police officer would have known as of April 2013 that the Constitution does not permit him to kill a fleeing suspect after the officer sees the suspect lose or abandon his weapon. . . . At the least, the facts and holding of Garner 'clearly foreshadow' the application of the Fourth Amendment to this case. . . . This is the . . . kind of obvious case (if I credit plaintiff's version of the facts). Even though Stukes had previously been armed, Detective Borona knew him no longer to be armed when he advanced up the sidewalk and then shot him for the second time. On plaintiff's version of the facts, no reasonable officer would have believed the use of deadly force to be necessary. . . . I am not persuaded to the contrary by any of the cases that Detective Borona cites. For one thing, most of the cases he cites issued after the shooting occurred in this case in April 2013. The doctrine of qualified immunity requires a court to evaluate what law was clearly established at the time of the incident in question, not several years later. Detective Borona cites Scott v. Harris, supra, and Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S. Ct. 2012 (2014), both cases involving police use of force against suspects who led them on Hollywoodstyle high speed car chases that posed a continuing danger to bystanders. Here, by contrast, there was no car chase or anything about Stukes' unarmed flight on foot that posed a continuing danger to the public. Equally distinguishable is the Supreme Court's very recent decision in Kisela, 138 S. Ct. at 1152–1154, in which the Supreme Court concluded that an officer who shot and killed a woman with a large knife was entitled to qualified immunity. The Supreme Court's decision turned on evidence that the woman refused to drop the knife despite repeated commands to do so, such that the officer who shot her reasonably believed she would use the knife on another person standing six feet away. . . The evident difference between this case and Kisela is that the suspect in Kisela continued to be armed when the police decided to shoot her. . . .In short, when viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiff, I conclude that they do not allow for the grant of qualified immunity at this time. If Detective Borona knew that Stukes was unarmed and did not have other arguable probable cause to believe that Stukes posed an imminent danger to others, then the use of deadly force on Stukes violated clearly established law, and no objectively reasonable police officer would have resorted to the use of deadly force to kill Stukes as he was running away.")

Price v. City of New York, No. 15 CIV. 5871 (KPF), 2018 WL 3117507, at *17–18 (S.D.N.Y. June 25, 2018) ("The Supreme Court has never overruled Hope, but its retreat from that decision is palpable. . . Two years after Hope was decided, the Supreme Court characterized that case as standing for the narrow proposition that the absence of federal appellate authority supporting a claim is not fatal in cases where the constitutional violation is 'obvious.'. . And despite the wave of Supreme Court cases addressing (and granting) qualified immunity in recent years, no Supreme Court majority has cited Hope in the qualified immunity context for approximately four years, see Tolan v. Cotton, 134 S. Ct. 1861, 1866 (2014), and none has cited its 'novel circumstances' holding in almost nine years, see Safford Unified Sch. Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 557

U.S. 364, 377-78 (2009). In this action, Plaintiff argues that Brooks and Obe are not entitled to qualified immunity because, generally speaking, government officials should know that viewpoint discrimination is unlawful in any forum. . . But the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed lower courts 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . The Second Circuit has followed suit. . . Here, neither the parties nor the Court has 'identified any binding authority in existence at the relevant time that ... "directly address[ed]" the reasonableness of the challenged conduct,'. . particularly in the context of First Amendment claims concerning the government's use of social media. Nor have decisions from other circuits 'clearly foreshadow[ed] a particular ruling on the issue.'. . After careful consideration, the Court concludes that it must grant qualified immunity to Brooks and Obe on the individual-capacity claims against them.")

Thompson v. Clark, No. 14-CV-7349, 2018 WL 3128975, at *2, *6-8, *11-13 (E.D.N.Y. June 26, 2018) (as amended) ("Qualified immunity is denied. Its grant, in the instant case, would be inconsistent with the purpose of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . .The courts, police, and public, will benefit from a clarifying jury decision in this often replicated situation. . . . Qualified immunity has recently come under attack as over-protective of police and at odds with the original purpose of section 1983: 'to deter state actors from using the badge of their authority to deprive individuals of their federally guaranteed rights and to provide relief to victims if such deterrence fails.'. . The Court's expansion of immunity, specifically in excessive force cases, is particularly troubling. . . .The legal precedent and policy justifications of qualified immunity, it has been charged, fail to validate its expansive scope. The law, it is suggested, must return to a state where some effective remedy is available for serious infringement of constitutional rights. . . .The failure to address whether or not an act was constitutional prevents the creation of 'clearly established' law needed to guide law enforcement and courts on narrow issues not yet decided by the Supreme Court. . . . Although the Court is no longer constrained by a common law good faith defense, it continues to rely on the common law as precedent for granting immunity. . . . The Supreme Court's recent emphasis on shielding public officials and federal and local law enforcement means many individuals who suffer a constitutional deprivation will have no redress; state governments are protected by sovereign immunity and municipalities are not liable under Monell unless individual liability can be first proven. . . . Courts should, when reasonable, follow Saucier's guidance to first analyze whether a constitutional violation occurred, instead of skipping to whether the right at issue was 'clearly established.'. . . Turning to the application of qualified immunity, courts should, it has been suggested, return to the standard expressed in Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), and define 'clearly established law' at a 'high level of generality.' The key inquiry being whether officers are on 'notice their conduct is lawful.'. . This allows courts to recognize 'obvious' constitutional violations, even if not yet specifically outlawed in a prior Supreme Court ruling. Such a standard is vital in a rapidly changing society, where any willing judge or jurist may distinguish precedent as not 'clearly established' because of slightly differing facts. . . . If courts, as instructed in Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009), decline to address constitutional issues by looking first to qualified immunity, and are instructed to rely on 'existing precedent ... [established] beyond debate,' government officials and officers may continue to operate in clear violation of constitutional standards without advise of what is constitutional and without fear of redress, because the law will continue to protect 'all but the plainly incompetent.'. . .The court declines to apply qualified immunity. Case precedent and policy rationale fail to justify an expansive regime of immunity that would prevent plaintiff from proving a serious constitutional violation.")

Case v. Anderson, No. 16 CIV. 983 (NSR), 2017 WL 3701863, at *18 n. 18 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 25, 2017) ("[C]ourts considering [the] right post-Barkes continue to conclude the right is clearly established. See Estate of Clark v. Walker, No. 16-3560, 2017 WL 3165632, at *6 (7th Cir. July 26, 2017) (in the Seventh Circuit, the right to treatment of a serious medical need, including risk of suicide, is clearly established); Campos v. Cty. of Kern, No. 14 Civ. 1099 (DAD) (JLT), 2017 WL 915294, at *10 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 7, 2017) ("the law regarding the Fourteenth Amendment right to adequate medical care," including right "to be protected from the known risks of suicide in jail," was "clearly established" in the Ninth Circuit by "the time of decedent's suicide, August 2013").")

McEvoy v. Matthews, No. 3:16-CV-922 (JAM), 2017 WL 3597473, at *4-5 (D. Conn. Aug. 21, 2017) ("It does not look like the Second Circuit has addressed the application of the community-caretaking or emergency-aid exceptions on facts similar to this case. The First Circuit, however, has applied qualified immunity on highly similar facts, concluding that the community-caretaking exception arguably allowed the police to enter a person's home on the report of a neighbor who called the police to say that the door to the home was standing wide open. See MacDonald v. Town of Eastham, 745 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2014). The First Circuit surveyed conflicting precedent about the application of the community-caretaking exception in this context, and concluded that '[t]he short of it is that neither the general dimensions of the community caretaking exception nor the case law addressing the application of that exception provides the sort of red flag that would have semaphored to reasonable police officers that their entry into the plaintiff's home was illegal.'. . That is equally true here. Plaintiff argues that the community caretaking exception applies only to the police's search and seizure of automobiles and does not apply to searches by the police inside the home. Maybe plaintiff is right, but the federal courts of appeals are deeply divided on the question. See Sutterfield, 751 F.3d at 556 (collecting cases). And the Second Circuit has yet to take sides. . . Accordingly, the law was not clearly established as of the time of the officers' actions in this case that the community caretaking function could not apply to an entry into plaintiff's home. Just 'the fact that the courts are divided ... demonstrates that the law on the point is not well established.' Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1868 (2017). So even if plaintiff is right on the merits about the limits of the community caretaking exception, this would not overcome the officers' qualified immunity in the absence of clearly established law in plaintiff's favor. . . . In the event of appellate review of this ruling, it will of course be for the Second Circuit to decide if it wishes in its discretion to offer guidance for the police and citizens alike in this important area of the law.")

Gerskovich v. Iocco, No. 15 CIV. 7280 (RMB), 2017 WL 3236445, at *8–9 (S.D.N.Y. July 17, 2017) ("Assuming it were appropriate for the Court to decide the qualified immunity issue at this point (which it is not), the Court would likely conclude, first, that 'under the First Amendment's right of access to information the public has the commensurate right to record—photograph, film, or audio record—police officers conducting official police activity in public areas' and, second, that Captain Iocco and Chief Anger did not have immunity to arrest Plaintiff for exercising that right because the right was 'clearly established.' Fields, 2017 WL 2884391, at *5. The First, Third, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits have found that the First Amendment protects the right to record police activity. [collecting cases] In analyzing the issue of qualified immunity, the Court would point out that not all of the Circuits have found that the constitutional right to photograph police activity was 'clearly established' at the time of their decisions. Compare Glik, 655 F.3d at 85 ("[T]he right violated by [police officers] was clearly established in this circuit at the time of [the plaintiff's] arrest [on October 1, 2007]."), with Fields, 2017 WL 2884391, at *6 ("[O]ur case law does not clearly establish a right to videotape police officers performing their duties [in 2012 and 2013]."), and Turner, 848 F.3d at 687 ("Although the right was not clearly established at the time [i.e. September 2015]," "the right is clearly established henceforth."). . . Qualified immunity, as noted, depends upon 'whether the right plaintiff asserts is so clearly established [or foreshadowed] that defendants should have known it.'. . And, while the Second Circuit Court of Appeals has not spoken definitively on this subject, the '[d]ecisions of other circuits also may indicate whether the law was clearly established' by 'clearly foreshadow[ing] a particular ruling on the issue.'. . If this Court were resolving the issue of qualified immunity, the Court would likely conclude that decisions from other Circuits clearly foreshadowed a finding here that 'the First Amendment right to film was ... clearly established at the time of the arrest.'. . Plaintiff's alleged conduct in this case was very similar to that of the plaintiffs in Glik, Smith, and Fordyce, and those decisions, in this Court's view, clearly foreshadow a ruling here that citizens have a right to film police activity and that police officers are not entitled to qualified immunity if they retaliate against a citizen who exercises that right. . . Tellingly, perhaps, the NYPD has trained its officers since the 1970s to understand that citizens may record (photograph) police activity.")

Soto v. City of N.Y., No. 13 CV 8474-LTS-JLC, 2017 WL 892338, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 6, 2017) ("The scope of the First Amendment right to record police activity is the subject of considerable debate. See Rivera v. Foley, 2015 WL 1296258, at *9 (D. Conn. Mar. 23, 2015) (surveying cases and the active split among the Courts of Appeals over this question). To find that officers are entitled to qualified immunity, however, the Court need not resolve that debate: its existence is enough to demonstrate that there was not clearly established law establishing a right to photograph police activity at the time of Plaintiff's arrest. . . The lack of clearly established law entitles Defendants to summary judgment on Plaintiff's retaliation claim on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Charles v. City of New York, No. 12CV6180SLTSMG, 2017 WL 530460, at *21-25 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 8, 2017) ("Even though neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has explicitly held that there is a right to videotape or film police activity, the Court may nonetheless find that the right is clearly established 'if decisions from this or other circuits "clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue."'. . Several other circuit courts have either held or implied that a right to film police activity exists, at least under some circumstances. [discussing cases from 1st, 7th, 9th, and 11th Circuits] At least two other circuit court cases have held that the right to record police activity in public places is not clearly established. [discussing cases from 3d and 4th Circuits] At least three district courts in this Circuit have held that the right to record police activity is not clearly established. [discussing Mesa, Rivera, Basinski] At least one district court in this Circuit, however, has found that the First Amendment right to record police officers performing their duties in a public space is clearly established. [discussing Higginbotham] In light of the foregoing cases, the Court concludes that issues of material fact prevent the Court from determining whether Plaintiff had a right to record the police stop under the circumstances of this case. First, the Court agrees with Higginbotham that an argument could be made that a right to videotape police activity in public places was clearly established as of June 5, 2012. As Higginbotham correctly notes, Szymecki and Kelly do not hold that such a right does not exist, but only that the right was not clearly established in the Fourth Circuit as of sometime prior to 2009 and in the Third Circuit as of late May 2007. In contrast, Fordyce, Smith, Glik, and Alvarez all either imply or hold that such a right exists, and Glik and Alvarez were both decided less than a year before the incident at issue. Accordingly, even though neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit had explicitly held that there is a right to videotape or film police activity, one could argue that the 'decisions from ... other circuits "clearly foreshadow [ed]"' a ruling that such a right existed under certain circumstances. . .None of those decisions, however, suggest that the right to film police activity is without limitation. To the contrary, three of the four circuit opinions discussed above and cited in Higginbotham expressly note that the right to film police activity is not absolute, but subject to reasonable time, place and manner limitations. . . . In this case, there is a substantial factual issue regarding whether Plaintiff's filming was interfering with police activity. . . . Since there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Plaintiff was interfering in police activity, the Court cannot determine at this juncture whether Plaintiff had a clearly established right to film. However, even if this Court were to find that Plaintiff's videotaping interfered with police activity, that finding would not result in dismissal of Plaintiff's First Amendment retaliation claim on qualified immunity grounds. Plaintiff's First Amendment claim is not based solely on the theory that Defendants retaliated against Plaintiff for exercising her right to videotape police activity. Plaintiff also claims that the arrest was retaliation for Plaintiff's 'request to file a complaint against Office Benites' and 'her speech about the stop-and-frisk she witnessed and the NYPD's stop-and-frisk practices generally.'")

Adkins v. City of New York, 143 F.Supp.3d 134, 140-41 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("[T]he Court concludes that transgender people are a quasi-suspect class. Accordingly, the Court must apply intermediate scrutiny to defendants' treatment of plaintiff. To state a claim on this basis, plaintiff's complaint must adequately allege that his removal from the general cell and handcuffing were not 'substantially related to an important government interest.'. . On its face, the complaint does so. . . . Although plaintiff's complaint therefore states a claim that his Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated, the claim must still be dismissed if defendants can successfully plead the affirmative defense of qualified immunity. . . . Plaintiff's rights under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment were not clearly established at the time of his arrest on October 1, 2011. Windsor v. United States, 699 F.3d 169 (2d Cir.2012), was not decided until October 18, 2012, and the Second Circuit had not previously ruled on what protections are accorded lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender people under the Fifth or Fourteenth Amendments. Accordingly, defendants could not be expected to know that their actions would be subject to any standard more stringent than rational basis review. . . . While the Court does not reach the question of whether defendants' actions would survive rational basis review on the merits, it does hold that it would have been objectively reasonable for defendants to conclude as much and that qualified immunity therefore attaches. . . . Particularly because many transgender detainees have alleged that they have been held with individuals who posed a risk to their safety, . . . it was reasonable for defendants to conclude that it would not be arbitrary or irrational to hold plaintiff separately. . . Accordingly, the individual defendants are entitled to immunity, and all claims against them must be dismissed.")

Gonzalez v. City of New York, No. 14 CIV. 7721 LGS, 2015 WL 6873451, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 9, 2015) ("In July 2012, when Plaintiff was arrested, neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit had directly addressed the constitutionality of recording officers engaged in official conduct. . . As of July 2012, the First, Seventh, Ninth and Eleventh Circuits had concluded that the right exists, but the Third and Fourth Circuits had determined that the right was not clearly established. . . In particular, the Third Circuit stated that the First Amendment right to record matters of public concern is far from absolute and does not clearly establish the right to videotape police officers during a traffic stop. Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248, 262–63 (3d Cir.2010). . . .For these reasons, in July 2012, there was no clearly established right in this Circuit to videotape police officers. See Ortiz v. City of New York, No. 11 Civ. 7919, 2013 WL 5339156, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 24, 2013) (finding defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established right to record police officers performing their official duties); Mesa, 2013 WL 31002 at *24–25 (same). But see Higginbotham v. City of New York, —— F.Supp.3d ——, 2015 WL 2212242, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. May 12, 2015) (concluding that "the right to record police activity in public, at least in the case of a journalist who is otherwise unconnected to the events recorded, was in fact 'clearly established' "). Accordingly, Officer Medina is entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment claim against him.")

Higginbotham v. City of New York, 105 F.Supp.3d 369, 378-81 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("Pluma [see infra in outline] may be distinguishable on the basis that the plaintiff in that case, although he called himself a 'citizen journalist,' did not allege that he ever intended to disseminate his videos: the complaint merely alleged that he went to Zuccotti Park 'with hopeful reflection upon the efforts of Occupy Wall Street.'. . To the extent Pluma is not distinguishable, however, the Court declines to follow it. While videotaping an event is not itself expressive activity, it is an essential step towards an expressive activity, at least when performed by a professional journalist who intends, at the time of recording, to disseminate the product of his work. . . .The defendants also raise the issue whether, more narrowly, a right to record police activity exists, a question that neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has decided. All of the circuit courts that have, however, have concluded that the First Amendment protects the right to record police officers performing their duties in a public space, subject to reasonable time, place and manner restrictions. [collecting cases] The Court agrees with those cases. If one accepts that photographing and filming receive

First Amendment protection as a general matter (at least when they are 'expressive'), it is difficult to see why that protection should disappear simply because their subject is public police activity. . . . On the other side of the ledger lies the government interest in preventing interference with legitimate police activity. But that interest does not override all others. . . . In any event, the right recognized here and by other courts does not apply when the recording would impede police officers in the performance of their duties. The defendants further assert that they are entitled to qualified immunity because the right to record the police is 'insufficiently defined.'. . .The Court concludes, however, that the right to record police activity in public, at least in the case of a journalist who is otherwise unconnected to the events recorded, was in fact 'clearly established' at the time of the events alleged in the complaint. When neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has decided an issue, a court 'may nonetheless treat the law as clearly established if decisions from ... other circuits "clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue."' Terebesi v. Torreso, 764 F.3d 217, 231 (2d Cir.2014) (quoting Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 105 (2d Cir.2010)); see also Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2084 (2011) (requiring, in the absence of controlling authority, 'a robust "consensus of cases of persuasive authority"' (quoting Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 617 (1999))). By November 2011, the First, Ninth and Eleventh Circuits had all concluded that the right exists. So had a number of district courts. [collecting cases] The Court is unaware of any decision holding that the recording of police activity by a journalist otherwise unconnected to the events recorded is categorically not protected (rather than holding merely that the right to record was not 'clearly established'). At the time of Higginbotham's arrest, there was thus a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority' in favor of the right that 'clearly foreshadowed' an analogous ruling by the Second Circuit or the Supreme Court. . .In so concluding, the Court parts ways with Mesa v. City of New York, No. 09 Civ. 10464(JPO), 2013 WL 31002 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 3, 2013). That case cited Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248 (3d Cir.2010), and Szymecki v. Houck, 353 F. App'x 852 (4th Cir.2009), as evidence of a circuit split on the existence of the right to record, and accordingly concluded that the right was not 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes. . . In this Court's reading, however, Kelly and Szymecki did not decide whether the right existed: they merely held that, even if it did exist, it was not clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity in those cases' factual contexts. . . They are thus not relevant to the question whether there is a consensus on the existence of a journalist's right to record events in which he is otherwise a nonparticipant. In both cases, the plaintiff was affiliated with and in close proximity to the person being stopped or arrested by the police: in Kelly, the plaintiff was the passenger of the person stopped, and in Szymecki, the plaintiff was the wife of the arrestee. . . By contrast, Higginbotham had no relation to the arrestees he was filming, and was at a remove from the arrest. In addition, both cases involved particularly dangerous situations: in Kelly, a traffic stop, which the Kelly court itself recognized as an 'inherently dangerous situation,'. . . and in Szymecki, an armed arrestee who defied a police order. Finally, in Kelly, the plaintiff was videotaping the police surreptitiously, whereas Higginbotham's filming was overt. Certainly, the right to record police activity in a public space is not without limits, and some uncertainty may exist on its outer bounds. For instance, it may not apply in particularly dangerous situations, if the recording interferes with the police activity, if it is surreptitious, if it is done by the subject of the police activity, or if the police activity is part of an undercover investigation. As alleged, however, Higginbotham's conduct falls comfortably within the zone protected by the First Amendment. The complaint alleges that he was a professional journalist present to record a public demonstration for broadcast and not a participant in the events leading up to the arrest he was filming. There is nothing in the complaint suggesting that his filming interfered with the arrest. Accordingly, and in light of the case law consensus described above, a reasonable police officer would have been on notice that retaliating against a non-participant, professional journalist for filming an arrest under the circumstances alleged would violate the First Amendment.")

Schoolcraft v. City of New York, 103 F.Supp.3d 465, 511, 514 (S.D.N.Y. 2015), reconsidered in part in Schoolcraft v. City of New York, 133 F.Supp.3d 563 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("The QAD and IAB speech, in light of Matthews, is not part-and-parcel of Schoolcraft's role and is therefore protected. Schoolcraft complained of 'corruption involving the integrity control program' in the 81st Precinct, mainly attributable to DI Mauriello, resulting 'in violation of people's civil rights.'. . This is virtually identical to Matthews's speech about his own precinct, when Matthews stated that his own supervisors' policies were resulting in 'unjustified stops, arrests, and summonses because police officers felt forced to abandon their discretion in order to meet their numbers and [were] having an adverse effect on the precinct's relationship with the community.'. . Moreover, Schoolcraft reported this activity outside the chain of command, and separate from his appeal process. These circumstances distinguish Schoolcraft's speech from that in Weintraub and warrant the conclusion that his IAB and QAD reports constituted protectable speech outside of official duties under Matthews IV. . . .As discussed above, and particularly in light of this Court's contrary September 2012 Opinion, Schoolcraft's protected First Amendment right to report to IAB and QAD was not clearly established at the time it was made. Consequently, the First Amendment Claim cannot be pleaded against any officers in their individual capacities.")

Greenaway v. Cty. of Nassau, 97 F. Supp. 3d 225, 240-41 (E.D.N.Y. 2015) ("Here, the Nassau Police Officers' conduct constituted false imprisonment and excessive force, and thus violated a federal right, if Greenaway posed no immediate threat to himself, the officers, or any bystander. As discussed in Sections II and IV above, there are significant factual disputes about whether Greenaway was a threat to anyone. In Garcia, 43 F.Supp.3d at 289–95, the Southern District of New York found no qualified immunity on the first prong of the inquiry where the defendant officer tased someone engaged in non-criminal conduct and where a reasonable fact-finder could have found that the tased person was not a danger to others or actively resisting arrest. If the fact-finder had so found, then the tasing would be a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Similarly, the Court here finds that, since a reasonable factfinder could decide that the Nassau police officers' conduct amounted to a violation of the Fourth Amendment, there is no qualified immunity on the first prong. With respect to the second prong, the Court finds that tasing a non-violent mentally ill person engaged in non-criminal conduct violated a federal right that was clearly established on April 25, 2010. . . Since a reasonable fact-finder could find that Greenaway was not actively resisting arrest, the record here precludes qualified immunity for the Nassau police officers.")

Rivera v. Foley, No. 3:14-CV-00196 VLB, 2015 WL 1296258, at *9-10 (D. Conn. Mar. 23, 2015) ("'We look to Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent existing at the time of the alleged violation to determine whether the conduct violated a clearly established right.'. . At the time of the acts alleged in the Complaint, the right to photograph and record police officers who are engaged in an ongoing investigation was not clearly established as a matter of constitutional law in this Circuit. . . Other circuits are split on this issue. The First Circuit, Seventh Circuit, Eleventh Circuit, and Ninth Circuit all recognize that the First Amendment protects the photography and recording of police officers engaged in their official duties. . .The Third Circuit and the Fourth Circuit take the contrary approach. . . However, '[w]hen neither the Supreme Court nor this [C]ourt has recognized a right, the law of our sister circuits and the holdings of district courts cannot act to render that right clearly established within the Second Circuit.'. . Moreover, the Court notes that in cases where the right to record police activity has been recognized by our sister circuits, it appears that the protected conduct has typically involved using a handheld device to photograph or videotape at a certain distance from, and without interfering with, the police activity at issue. . . By contrast, here Plaintiff directed a flying object into a police-restricted area, where it proceeded to hover over the site of a major motor vehicle accident and the responding officers within it, effectively trespassing onto an active crime scene. . . Even if recording police activity were a clearly established right in the Second Circuit, Plaintiff's conduct is beyond the scope of that right as it has been articulated by other circuits. In sum, the Individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Plaintiff's First Amendment claim concerning the right to photograph police activity.")

[See also Pluma v. City of New York, No. 13 CIV. 2017 LAP, 2015 WL 1623828, at *6-8 & n.4 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2015) ("Although some Courts of Appeals have held that the First Amendment protects the right to film the police, neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has addressed 'the right to photograph and record the police.' Mesa v. City of New York, 09 Civ. 10464, 2013 WL 31002, at *25 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 3, 2013). . . It consequently remains unclear whether Plaintiff's filming was protected by the First Amendment. . . . [T]he present motion does not raise a qualified immunity defense, and as such the lack of clearly established law on this point does not conclude the Court's analysis. . . . Even granting that Plaintiff engaged in protected activity, however, the Complaint does not allege a causal connection between that activity and the deployment of pepper spray. On its face, the Complaint fails to allege any motivation related to specific protected speech behind the officers' decision to push the barricade and deploy pepper spray. Rather, Plaintiff's briefing relied on the Complaint's subsequent allegations that the NYPD has a practice of applying excessive force against Occupy Wall Street demonstrators as implicitly supplying the alleged motivation. Assuming these allegations raise an inference that the officers were retaliating against Occupy Wall Street speech, Plaintiff still does not allege that he engaged in that particular expressive conduct. The Complaint makes clear that the commotion began near Plaintiff when he was doing nothing other than 'peacefully remain[ing] in the park,' at which point he began to film the police, who shortly thereafter pepper sprayed him and others near him. . . Yet the only allegations about the officers' motivation for pushing the barricade and deploying pepper spray relates to Occupy Wall Street protest activity, not attempts to film the police. . . Although the Complaint alleges that '[t]he police deployed the pepper spray in such a way as to strike those present holding cameras, including the Plaintiff,' that statement does not suggest that the officers' were substantially motivated by a desire to retaliate against Plaintiff's journalistic activities. . . Rather, the only specific allegation of motive is 'the intention of creating the maximum possible confusion and suffering among the protesters,' which again focuses only on protest activity in which Plaintiff has not alleged he participated. . . Given that Plaintiff was admittedly 'a bystander and citizen journalist witnessing the event,' rather than a protester participating in Occupy Wall Street expressive conduct, the Complaint on its face fails to allege that the police were motivated by Plaintiff's own protected activity when they caused his injury. . . Accordingly, the Complaint fails to raise a plausible claim for First Amendment retaliation, and that cause of action is dismissed. To the extent Plaintiff moves to amend this claim, his proposed amended complaint does nothing to compensate for the defects in this cause of action; indeed, it does not appear to revise any allegations relating to the officers' motivation or Plaintiff's expressive activity. As such, any amendment of this claim would be futile, and Plaintiff is denied leave to amend his First Amendment retaliation cause of action.")]

Poventud v. City of New York, No. 07 CIV. 3998 DAB, 2015 WL 1062186, at *9-10 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 9, 2015) ("Defendants attempt to avoid a finding that the law was clearly established by defining Plaintiff's constitutional right to having Defendant Umlauft 'prepare a DD5 or otherwise document the photo identification procedure involving Francisco Poventud,' (Defs.' Mot. Summ. J. 19). Their limited definition of the right is too narrow, and totally unsupported by any case law. Plaintiff's right to Brady evidence is not tied to how an officer documents eyewitness evidence; it is based on the officer's obligation to present that evidence and the Government's disclosure of it to the defense where necessary. That Defendant Umlauft had to disclose exculpatory and impeachment evidence to the prosecutor, and that disclosure by the prosecutor to the defense was required in time for it to be effectively used at trial was clearly established. . . . In addition to Second Circuit case law, the NYPD and district attorney's policies and practices demonstrate that Brady obligations related to photo identification procedures and disclosure of exculpatory evidence were clearly established and that reasonable police officers would have known about them.")

Turczyn ex rel. McGregor v. City of Utica, No. 6:13-CV-1357 GLS/ATB, 2014 WL 6685476, at *4-5 (N.D.N.Y. Nov. 26, 2014) ("Unlike Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales . . . or Neal v. Lee County . . . cases in which police had limited interaction with either the victim or killer prior to the victim's demise, and upon which defendants rely for dismissal of the claim against Shanley, . . . the allegations here go substantially farther. Turczyn alleges several occasions . . . when Shanley knew of Anderson's threatening acts and did nothing, which arguably communicated to him prior assurances that there would be no penalty to pay for his conduct. . . . Okin has specifically recognized the liability that may arise under these circumstances. . . .The amended complaint also pleads facts that demonstrate, at this juncture, egregious behavior that shocks the contemporary conscience. As in Okin, the allegations here tend to show that Shanley, who was tasked with accomplishing certain goals related to curbing domestic violence, was deliberately indifferent as to whether or not Anderson would make good on his multiple threats against Turczyn's life over a twelve-month-period. . . These allegations sufficiently support that Shanley's affirmative conduct was the product of deliberate indifference that shocks the conscience, and would provide a reasonable jury with a valid basis to so find. . . Finally, Shanley is not entitled to qualified immunity at this juncture. Her argument on this issue is two-fold. First, Shanley asserts that no constitutional violation occurred, and, second, she claims that, even if a constitutional violation occurred, the right was not clearly established. . . The first prong of the argument is easily swept aside by reference to the preceding paragraphs that explain that the amended complaint alleges a cognizable substantive due process violation. As for whether or not the right was clearly established, which is a prerequisite to qualified immunity, . . this question has been resolved by the Second Circuit. On the issue, the court has explained that it is 'clearly established,' under the state-created danger theory, 'that police officers are prohibited from affirmatively contributing to the vulnerability of a known victim by engaging in conduct, whether explicit or implicit, that encourages intentional violence against the victim, and as that is the substantive due process violation alleged here, qualified immunity does not apply.' Okin, 577 F.3d at 434. Accordingly, Shanley is not entitled to qualified immunity at this time.")

Garcia v. Dutchess Cnty., 43 F.Supp.3d 281, 296-98 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) ("Tracy involved pepper spray; it did not involve a taser. But just as in Tracy, a jury here could reasonably determine on this record that Healy no longer posed a threat to the arresting officers at the time he was repeatedly tased. And as in Tracy, the use of force here was 'significant,' 'somewhere in the middle of the nonlethal-force spectrum' and 'on par with pepper spray.'. . It was therefore clearly established law in the Second Circuit as of April 2000 that it was a Fourth Amendment violation to use 'significant' force against arrestees who no longer actively resisted arrest or posed a threat to officer safety, regardless of whether that significant force emanated from a pepper spray canister or the trigger of a taser. . . Decisions involving tasers from at least four other federal courts of appeals make pellucid that the contours of the constitutional right at issue here were indeed clearly established by March 2010. [collecting cases] The fact that many of these decisions involve the use of tasers in dart rather than stun mode is not a dispositive difference, given that both methods of deploying a taser constitute 'significant' force in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. . . The courts of appeals are in broad agreement that for qualified immunity purposes, 'it does not matter [if] no case [in a particular] court directly addresses the use of a particular weapon; ... an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury.'. . [collecting cases] Defendant Sistarenik seeks refuge in the Second Circuit's Summary Order in Crowell v. Kirkpatrick, 400 Fed.Appx. 592 (2d Cir.2010), which affirmed a district court's grant of qualified immunity to officers who used a taser in stun mode against individuals who 'actively resisted' arrest for trespass by 'chain[ing] themselves' to a barrel drum and repeatedly refusing to unchain themselves despite warnings that they would be tased if they did not leave the property. Crowell provides no safe harbor for Sistarenik. First and foremost, as a Summary Order, Crowell simply has 'no[ ] ... precedential effect.'. . Second, because Crowell's publication post-dated the March 2010 incident at issue here, Sistarenik could not have relied on that decision as a guide to conduct himself. Third, Crowell 'd[id] not suggest that the use of a taser to effect an arrest is always, or even often, objectively reasonable.'. . Instead, Crowell determined that the totality of the circumstances presented in that case did not amount to a clearly established constitutional violation. Fourth, factual distinctions between Crowell and this case abound. Unlike the Crowell plaintiffs, who continued to resist arrest before being tased, Healy was largely subdued on the floor (or so a jury could reasonably find). And unlike the officers in Crowell who had 'attempted several alternate means' of forcing the plaintiffs to unchain themselves before deploying the taser 'as a last resort,' Sistarenik used the taser even though the officers had already successfully restrained Healy, again, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff. . . For these reasons, the Court concludes that with regard to the particular circumstances of this case, Crowell has neither persuasive nor precedential value. Construed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, the record in this case precludes a grant of qualified immunity in Sistarenik's favor.")

Marchand v. Simonson, 16 F.Supp.3d 97, 117-18 (D. Conn. 2014) ("The Supreme Court has recently stated that 'federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit. . . of that suspect.'. . In Stanton, the Supreme Court held that because the law in this area is unsettled, reasonable officers could disagree as to whether they could enter a home while in continuous pursuit of a misdemeanor suspect, and therefore an officer was entitled to qualified immunity from a Fourth Amendment illegal entry claim arising out of such an incident. . . Here, as set out above, although the undisputed facts did not provide actual probable cause for Simonson to arrest plaintiff, they did provide 'arguable probable cause.'. .As in Stanton, the crimes for which Simonson possessed arguable probable cause, and the crime for which Marchand was arrested, were misdemeanors. As the Court has found that reasonable officers could disagree as to whether Simonson was legally permitted to enter the home or curtilage. . .without a warrant to arrest Marchand for a misdemeanor, Simonson is entitled to qualified immunity and the Court will therefore grant defendants' Motion on plaintiff's Fourth Amendment illegal entry claim.")

Dinler v. City of New York, No. 04 Civ. 7921(RJS)(JCF), 2012 WL 4513352, *11 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 30, 2012) ("As stated above with respect to the Fulton Street arrests, the law of individualized probable cause was clearly established well before August 31, 2004. Accordingly, the arresting officers would be entitled to qualified immunity only if they reasonably could have believed that each of the individuals arrested on East 16th Street was involved in unlawful conduct. As noted above, this inquiry turns on the officers' efforts to release innocent bystanders and to make sure that they arrested only those who participated in the unlawful march. Because there are questions of fact concerning whether the police made sufficient efforts to clear innocent bystanders from East 16th Street before arresting those who remained, the Court must deny Defendants' motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . .Based on the undisputed facts, and particularly the video of the Fulton Street march and arrests, the Court finds that there was not even arguable probable cause to make those arrests. At most, reasonable officers could disagree as to whether some of the marchers were obstructing traffic; however, no reasonably competent officer could have believed that all of the marchers on Fulton Street had violated the law and were properly subject to arrest. As noted above, it was clearly established by 2004 that an officer must have individualized probable cause to arrest an individual and that mere proximity to illegal conduct does not establish probable cause with respect to an individual.")

Warney v. City of Rochester, 536 F.Supp. 285, 295, 296 (W.D.N.Y. 2008) ("Having determined that Warney did have a right to disclosure of the exculpatory material, the analysis turns upon whether that right is one that was 'clearly established' in 2005 or early 2006. In this respect, I believe that Gauger and Harper, which found that the prosecutors were ultimately entitled to qualified immunity based solely on the lack of voluminous case law to 'clearly establish' the convicted plaintiff's due process rights to disclosure, missed the mark by neglecting to examine whether the due process right to prompt post-conviction disclosure of exculpatory evidence is one of which a reasonable prosecutor would have known. . . Based upon the facts alleged in the complaint, I find that plaintiff's allegations suggest that this is one of the 'rare cases, where the constitutional violation is patently obvious' and where 'widespread compliance with [the] clearly apparent law may have prevented the issue from previously being litigated' to an appreciable extent. . . Implicit in the prosecutor's duty to accomplish the 'dual aim of our criminal justice system[:] 'that guilt shall not escape or innocence suffer,' U.S. v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 230 (1975), quoting Berger, 295 U.S. at 88, is an ongoing obligation to disclose to the imprisoned, within a reasonable time, evidence which falls into the prosecutor's hands which compellingly and forcefully exonerates the prisoner. In short, whether or not he was conversant with the holdings in Harper and Gauger, no reasonable prosecutor in 2005 or early 2006 could have believed that it was constitutionally permissible to withhold or conceal evidence from a convicted citizen, which had substantial power to exonerate him. . . . . Again, the prosecutors here do not dispute that at some point after their receipt of the exculpatory evidence, they were constitutionally required to disclose it to Warney. The crux of the parties' debate is simply whether, under the facts pleaded in the complaint, the 'clearly established' duty was one that arose at the time the prosecutors learned of the exculpatory evidence, or at some later time. . . . Thus, the question becomes whether the prosecutors' disclosure of the exculpatory evidence after the period alleged in the complaint, 72 days at the minimum and potentially several months, comprised reasonably timely disclosure as a matter of law, such that the prosecutors are entitled to qualified immunity . Upon examination of the circumstances as alleged in the complaint, I find that it was not.")

Saleh v. City of New York, 2007 WL 4437167, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 17, 2007) ("Defendants urge that a reasonable NYPD officer would have no reason to believe that alerting ICE to the presence of illegal aliens constitutes a constitutional violation. By so framing the issue, however, defendants miss the point. This case is not about whether NYPD officers can alert ICE when they encounter illegal aliens, but whether they can retaliate against individuals who file police-misconduct grievances by making referrals to ICE. With respect to such retaliation, the law is clear: '[t]he rights to complain to public officials and to seek administrative and judicial relief are protected by the First Amendment.' . . When officials take adverse action against those who exercise this right, they can be held liable for a constitutional violation. . . A defendant's ability to justify the purported adverse action on non-retaliatory grounds is irrelevant because ' A[a]n act in retaliation for the exercise of a constitutional right is actionable under section 1983 even if the act, when taken for different reasons, would have been proper."'. . Accordingly, it may be sound practice for NYPD officers to alert ICE when they encounter unlawful aliens under normal circumstances, but when they do so for retaliatory purposes, they run afoul of the Constitution. . . In light of this firmly established law, it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that reporting Saleh to ICE in retaliation for filing a CCRB complaint violated the First Amendment to the Constitution. Accordingly, the individual defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Garcia v. Brown, 442 F.Supp.2d 132, 144, 145 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) ("After Dwares, the law in this Circuit clearly provides that police officers who give express permission to a private citizen to injure another are violating the injured person's Due Process rights. But not until Pena-which came down a year after the events that are the subject of this lawsuit–was it clearly settled that giving implicit permission for a private civil rights violation qualified as unconstitutional. Indeed, the Second Circuit dismissed the case against the defendants in Pena on qualified immunity grounds. The question, then, is whether the facts of this case are closer to those of Dwares than of Pena. If the former, the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged wrongdoing; if the latter, it was not. I conclude that the facts of this case are far closer to those of Dwares than of Pena. . . . Because the facts of this case are far closer to those of Dwares than of Pena, I conclude that Officer Brown does not qualify for qualified immunity under the second prong of Harlow."), aff'd, 2008 WL 681340 (2d Cir. Mar. 11, 2008).

Shapiro v. City of Glen Cove, No. CV 03-0280(WDW), 2005 WL 1076292, at *26 (E.D.N.Y. May 5, 2005) (not reported) ("The 'appropriate inquiry is, therefore, how closely analogous' the defendants' allowing media to enter and remain in the building is to actions by police that had been held unconstitutional at the time the events took place, that is, in January 2000. . . Here, the unconstitutionality of the defendants' alleged acts was not apparent, because the relevant cases– Wilson and Ayeni–did not set forth with the requisite specificity the right to be free from media presence during a search of a building at which the claimant had only a diminished expectation of privacy and where the claimant was not present during the media intrusion. Both Wilson and Ayeni emphasized the violation of the plaintiffs in their homes, and, while Lauro held that the holdings of the earlier cases were not limited to the home, Lauro was decided after January 18, 2000 and cannot be considered in the inquiry into whether the law that they enunciate was 'well-established.' Thus, reasonable police officers could have construed Wilson and Ayeni as being applicable only to media presence in a home. Moreover, Wilson, Hanlon and Ayeni involved situations in which the government actors had expressly invited or arranged for the media to be present, which is not the case here. Further, in those cases the plaintiffs were themselves present at the site and personally subjected to the media intrusion, with the plaintiffs in Wilson and Ayeni . . . appearing in the photographs or video footage that the media took. The relevant cases are, in short, insufficiently analogous to the facts of this case to allow the court to find that 'a reasonable police officer should clearly have been able to discern' that allowing the media to enter 19 Eastway Drive and record the events 'infringed merely different aspects of the same previously defined constitutional right' enunciated in the earlier cases. . . Finally, even if the right that Shapiro alleges was violated was well-established in January 2000, we cannot say that the defendants were unreasonable for failing to reach that conclusion at the time, and they are entitled to qualified immunity on the media ride-along claim.").

Young v. Goord, No. 01 CV 0626(JG), 2005 WL 562756, at *8 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 10, 2005)(not reported) ("Assuming arguendo a clearly established right not only to have prison officials react promptly to new legislation in new cases, but also to apply that legislation to pending proceedings that are based on pre-legislation events, the question then would be how fast must the reaction be? As Young's counsel put it at oral argument: 'The question is how quickly after the statute did they have to react to it.'. . Given the undisputed facts alleged by Young–the statute became effective on September 22, 2000; 25 days later, Annucci instructed all superintendents about the law and directed them to comply; and by the following day all of the sanctions against Young were lifted–there are no set of facts on which Young could be entitled to relief. DOCS's response to RLUIPA was admirably swift. No one could reasonably suggest that the defendants' belief that they acted quickly enough to satisfy the Constitution was either incorrect or objectively unreasonable.").

Garcia v. Scoppetta, 289 F.Supp.2d 343, 353 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) ("The individual defendants in this case are entitled to qualified immunity. Even accepting the allegations of plaintiff's complaint as true, she fails to state a claim of violation of clearly established law. The law of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit does not conclusively support the existence of the right in question. Its decision in Nicholson v. Scoppetta certifying key issues to the New York Court of Appeals indicates that critical areas of the law in this field are not yet established. Although the Nicholson opinion focuses on the uncertainty surrounding the law on removals, it is also relevant to prosecutions for neglect. One of the questions the Court certified to the New York Court of Appeals concerns the definition of a 'neglected child' under the New York Family Court Act and whether it includes instances in which the sole allegation of neglect is allowing the child to witness domestic violence. Such a determination is relevant to whether defendants may prosecute mothers for neglect on this basis alone. In the absence of clearly established law on what constitutes a neglected child, defendants can not reasonably have been expected to know whether or not the initiation of neglect proceedings against plaintiff violated her rights. They are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Brooks v. Berg, 270 F. Supp.2d 302, 311, 312 (N.D.N.Y. 2003) ("[T]he Second Circuit has held that defendants who act pursuant to a facially invalid policy are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As noted above, Section 1.31 of the DOCS Health Services Policy Manual provides for the continued treatment of inmates who were diagnosed with GID prior to incarceration. The policy's silence regarding the treatment of transsexual inmates who were not diagnosed with GID prior to incarceration is apparently read by prison officials to indicate that DOCS will not provide any treatment to these inmates. While Defendants rely heavily on this policy as justification for their actions, they do not explain the puzzling distinction that the policy makes between those inmates who were diagnosed before incarceration and those who were diagnosed after being incarcerated. Surely inmates with diabetes, schizophrenia, or any other serious medical need are not denied treatment simply because their conditions were not diagnosed prior to incarceration. . . . This blanket denial of medical treatment is contrary to a decided body of case law. Prisons must provide inmates with serious medical needs some treatment based on sound medical judgment. There is no exception to this rule for serious medical needs that are first diagnosed in prison. Prison officials are thus obliged to determine whether Plaintiff has a serious medical need and, if so, to provide him with at least some treatment. Prison officials cannot deny transsexual inmates all medical treatment simply by referring to a prison policy which makes a seemingly arbitrary distinction between inmates who were and were not diagnosed with GID prior to incarceration. In light of the numerous cases which hold that prison officials may not deny transsexual inmates all medical attention, especially when this denial is not based on sound medical judgment, the Court finds that Defendants have failed to establish as a matter of law that their actions were objectively reasonable."), vacated in part by Brooks v. Small v. City of New York, 274 F. Supp.2d 271, 281 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) ("The City and the individual officer defendants argue that qualified immunity protects them from plaintiffs' substantive due process claim of the right to be free of state created danger because the contours of the state created danger doctrine are not clearly established in this Circuit. That argument is without merit. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit decided Dwares in 1993. Thus, for at least a decade, officials in this Circuit have been on notice that police action which emboldens private citizens to injure others may give rise to a substantive due process violation.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

Jefferson v. Lias, 21 F.4th 74, 81-83, 85-86 (3d Cir. 2021) ("Jefferson would have us define the constitutional right as one that 'bars an officer from opening gunfire into the driver's side window of a fleeing vehicle passing in front of him if the driver is not believed to be armed, did not previously act in a menacing manner, and if there is no immediate danger to the officer or bystanders.'. . Lias, for his part, would define the right at a much higher level of generality, contending that it is not a violation of a clearly-established constitutional right to 'shoot[ ] at a fleeing driver to protect those who his or her flight might endanger.' . . We would not define the right as narrowly as Jefferson would, but neither would we adopt so broad a formulation as Lias. Instead, we will define the right as follows: a suspect fleeing in a vehicle, who has not otherwise displayed threatening behavior, has the constitutional right to be free from the use of deadly force when it is no longer reasonable for an officer to believe his or others' lives are in immediate peril from the suspect's flight. With respect to determining whether this right was 'clearly established' at the time of the shooting, we first turn 'to factually analogous Supreme Court precedent, as well as binding opinions from our own Court.'. . Following that, we determine whether there exists a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals.'. . 'We may also take into account district court cases, from within the Third Circuit or elsewhere.'. . Conducting that review, in our view, this right was 'clearly established' at the time of the shooting in this case by Abraham, where we held in a factually analogous context that '[a] passing risk to a police officer is not an ongoing license to kill an otherwise unthreatening suspect.'. . Other Courts of Appeals to have considered actions where officers have used deadly force against non-dangerous suspects attempting to evade arrest while driving have ruled in parallel. [collecting cases] Accordingly, binding precedent in our Circuit, along with persuasive authority from other Courts of Appeals, have 'clearly established' the right at issue here, as defined above. The force of these holdings is not blunted by the Supreme Court's decisions cited by the District Court in its analysis. Each cited case involves circumstances where either the fleeing driver in question had displayed threatening or aggressive behavior toward others prior to or during the car chase, or where the Court, based on the record, was willing to determine that the driver's conduct while fleeing was so egregious that it posed an immediate risk to the officers and the public. [court discusses Brosseau, Scott, Plumhoff, and Mullenix] . . . . None of the Supreme Court cases cited by the District Court, then, disturb the 'robust consensus' of cases decided by our sister circuits, let alone our own precedent, in clearly establishing that an otherwise non-threatening individual engaged in vehicular flight is entitled to be free from being subjected to deadly force if it is unreasonable for an officer to believe his or others' lives are in immediate jeopardy from their actions. As such a right is clearly established, and because a jury may conclude that Officer Lias's decision to shoot Jefferson was not objectively reasonable, Officer Lias is not entitled to qualified immunity.") Dennis v. City of Philadelphia, 19 F.4th 279, 289-92 (3d Cir. 2021) ("The detectives argue that Halsey cannot govern here because it is not particularized to the facts of this case. They claim that Halsey dealt with police officers coercing a false statement via a forceful and relentless interrogation of the suspect for more than eight hours, during which the investigators inserted non-public information into the confession. But a case that is directly on point is not required so long as the precedent placed the constitutional question beyond debate. Halsey did so, recognizing prior precedent that held the fabrication of evidence by law enforcement officers violates the Fourteenth Amendment and that such a right had been established since at least 1985. . . No more need be said as to the stand-alone fabrication of evidence claim than: Halsey established that sufficiently particularized precedent placed these detectives on notice that fabricating evidence to convict a criminal defendant is unconstitutional, regardless of whether that evidence is inserted into a confession to 'bring about' his prosecution or to help secure his conviction. . .Second, turning to Dennis's deliberate deception claim, the detectives contend that this claim is based on the right not to be framed by law enforcement agents, which is too broadly worded and was not established until 1995, when the Supreme Court decided Kyles v. Whitley. . . The right not to be convicted on perjured testimony used by prosecutors at trial has been clearly established by the Supreme Court since at least 1935 in Mooney v. Holohan. . . Seven years later, in Pyle v. Kansas, . . . the Court extended this right by recognizing as a due process violation the conviction of a defendant through perjured testimony and the deliberate suppression of evidence favorable to the accused. Moreover, 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and in other instances a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful.'. .We conclude that the constitutional rule that framing criminal defendants through use of fabricated evidence, including false or perjured testimony, violates their constitutional rights applies with such obvious clarity that it is unreasonable for us to conclude anything other than that the detectives were on sufficient notice that their fabrication of evidence violated clearly established law. Thus, the District Court did not err in denying the motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds as to the due process claim in Count I(A) for the detective's fabricated evidence—here their false statements and testimony as to Dennis's clothing, Thompson's false testimony procured by threats and coercion, and their concealment of evidence that they knew revealed a witness's trial testimony as false. As to the detectives' citation to Gibson v. Superintendent, . . . that case provides some guidance on the claim in Count I(B) for deliberate deception, but it does not support reversing the District Court's denial of the motion to dismiss this claim on qualified immunity grounds. Gibson stated that the Supreme Court did not settle the principle that evidence in the hands of police could be imputed to the prosecutor until 1995, when it decided Kyles v. Whitley. . .This principle, however, is separate from the right not to be framed by the use of perjured witness testimony at trial that was recognized by the Supreme Court in Mooney. . . or by the detectives' own perjured testimony at trial recognized by our Court in Curran v. Delaware. . . . Dennis did not limit his deliberate deception claim to a mere failure to disclose exculpatory and impeachment evidence; rather, he claims the detectives violated his due process rights to a fair trial by 'concealing and/or suppressing relevant and material evidence'. . . as part of a larger scheme to deliberately deceive the court and frame him for Williams's murder. As the District Court noted, Dennis does not seek relief from the detectives for Brady violations. To recharacterize Dennis's claims simply as Brady claims would run afoul of the longstanding principle that the plaintiff, as the master of the complaint, is free to choose between legal theories, . . . and a defendant cannot create a cause of action from the fact pattern on behalf of the plaintiff. . . . Here, Dennis's separate claim under Count I(B) for deliberate deception as a violation of his due process rights relies in part on the detective's failure to disclose certain exculpatory and impeachment evidence, which appears problematic in the face of a qualified immunity defense. Specifically, the detectives argue that a plaintiff can only bring a Brady claim against police officers by alleging that they affirmatively concealed evidence, i.e., by alleging that police officers deliberately suppressed the evidence. Thus, to allege a deliberate deception claim against police officers, the detectives conclude that a plaintiff must allege a Brady claim. We disagree and will not restrict Dennis to a simple Brady claim. . . But the label Dennis chooses also does not answer whether the detectives are entitled to qualified immunity on the claim Dennis brought. A Brady claim, in essence, is a claim by a defendant that his due process rights were violated by the failure to disclose exculpatory or impeachment evidence to the defense, while a claim for deliberate deception in violation of due process must go beyond the failure to disclose evidence and arises when imprisonment results from the knowing use of false testimony or other fabricated evidence or from concealing evidence to create false testimony to secure a conviction. . . To be clear, a deliberate deception claim against police officers and a Brady claim are not necessarily coterminous. In other words, a plaintiff alleging a claim against police officers for violation of due process rights by deliberate deception to the court need not bring a Brady claim. Yet, to survive the qualified immunity defense, the claim brought must involve a right with sufficiently clear contours that every reasonable officer would have understood that what he is doing violates that right—and a generalized notion that deliberate deception violates due process will not do. . . The case at bar is a paradigm example: Dennis's deliberate deception claim not only alleges that the Detectives withheld exculpatory and impeachment evidence that would have supported his alibi and defense, but that they also failed to correct testimony they knew was false and concealed from the defense the evidence that revealed that trial testimony as false. These allegations go beyond asserting a mere Brady violation and allege that, in an effort to secure Dennis's conviction, the detectives knowingly deceived the court and the jury through false testimony in violation of Dennis's due process rights. . . Because Dennis's claim for violation of his due process rights by deliberate deception under Count 1(B) encompasses allegations that the detectives concealed or suppressed the time-stamped receipt to produce false trial testimony, Gibson does not control. Instead, Mooney, Halsey, Pyle, and Curran do. For those reasons, we will affirm the District Court's denial of the motion to dismiss Dennis's deliberate deception claim on qualified immunity grounds.")

Jacobs v. Cumberland County, 8 F.4th 187, 195-97 (3d Cir. 2021) ("A reasonable factfinder could . . . conclude that Jacobs posed no threat throughout the encounter. The security video shows that Jacobs was standing with his hands behind his back and submitting to Armstrong's compliance hold when Williams approached the bunk. As the District Court observed, a reasonable jury viewing the security footage could find that Williams struck Jacobs while Jacobs was defenseless and obeying orders. In sum, this version of events does not present a question about the appropriate degree of force. Under this set of facts, a jury could find that there was no penological need for any additional force—making each of Williams's strikes wholly gratuitous and objectively unreasonable. . . As for the second prong of qualified immunity, a government official is protected from suit unless he 'violated a statutory or constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.'. . . [T]he central question is whether the existing law gave the officer 'fair warning' that his particular conduct was unlawful. . . Sometimes an officer can receive fair warning if 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law ... appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though "the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful."'. . But in excessive-force cases, it can be difficult for officers to know how previous judicial opinions apply to new, tense situations. . . The reasonability of force often hinges on the details of an individual case, making the specificity of caselaw 'especially important.'. . In such cases, 'officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.'. . The caselaw does not have to be 'directly on point,' but existing precedent must have placed the question of unlawfulness 'beyond debate.'. . Cases with closely analogous facts can thus help 'move a case beyond the otherwise "hazy border between excessive and acceptable force" and thereby provide an officer notice that a specific use of force is unlawful.'. . Here, Williams's conduct is nowhere near the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.'. . When the evidence is construed in the light most favorable to Jacobs, we have no difficulty concluding that the unlawfulness of the conduct was 'beyond debate[.]'. . Any reasonable officer would have known that Williams's strikes were unlawful under this set of facts. First, the Supreme Court has made clear that officers may not expose inmates to gratuitous force divorced from any legitimate penological purpose. . . That alone would provide officers with at least 'some notice' that the treatment of Jacobs was unlawful. . . Additionally, the specific conduct here—striking a physically restrained and nonthreatening inmate—was clearly unlawful under the precedent of this Court and our sister circuits. [collecting cases] At the time of the relevant conduct, it was clearly established that officers could not gratuitously beat an inmate. Construing the evidence in the light most favorable to Jacobs, any reasonable officer would have known that the conduct here was unlawful.") Peroza-Benitez v. Smith, 994 F.3d 157, 165-72 & n.3 (3d Cir. 2021) ("The District Court chose to begin with the 'clearly established' prong. We will do the same. . . .We answer this question by first looking to factually analogous Supreme Court precedent, as well as binding opinions from our own Court. . . Next, we consider whether there is a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals.'. . We may also take into account district court cases, from within the Third Circuit or elsewhere. . . As we examine the case law, we must keep in mind that this Court takes a 'broad view of what constitutes an established right of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . And a right may be 'clearly established' even without a ' "precise factual correspondence" between the case at issue and a previous case.'. . A public official does not get the benefit of 'one liability-free violation' simply because the circumstance of his case is not identical to that of a prior case. . . .We note that 'appellate review of qualified immunity dispositions is to be conducted in light of all relevant precedents, not simply those cited to, or discovered by, the district court.'. . . The District Court found that C.I. Haser was entitled to qualified immunity as '[his] actions did not violate a clearly established constitutional right, because "a reasonable officer in [his] shoes at the time in question would not have perceived federal law to preclude" his conduct.'. . We disagree. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Peroza-Benitez as the non-moving party – as we are required to do at summary judgment – a reasonable jury could find that C.I. Haser's actions violated a 'clearly established' right. We first define the right that C.I. Haser allegedly violated. The District Court defined Peroza-Benitez's right as 'the Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force in the form of multiple punches to the head while hanging out of a window through which he had attempted to flee and while known to be unarmed.'. . Here, Peroza-Benitez was unarmed, injured, covered in his own blood, and hanging from a second-story window by his hands, feet dangling, when C.I. Haser – knowing Peroza-Benitez to be unarmed – punched him 'repeatedly' in the head with a closed fist. . . C.I. Haser's punches 'stunned and disoriented' Peroza-Benitez, causing him to fall over ten feet into a below-ground concrete stairwell. . . Accordingly, we rely on a modification of the District Court's definition: The Fourth Amendment right of an injured, visibly unarmed suspect to be free from temporarily paralyzing force while positioned at a height that carries with it a risk of serious injury or death. Next, we ask whether Peroza-Benitez's defined right was 'clearly established' at the time of C.I. Haser's alleged violation. We do not find any factually analogous precedent from either the Supreme Court or our own Court, thus we turn to persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals and district courts. It is within this inquiry that we find the necessary 'robust consensus of cases' supporting our holding that a reasonable jury could find that C.I. Haser, by punching Peroza-Benitez 'repeatedly' in the head as he hung out of a second-story window, violated a 'clearly established' right. [collecting cases] While each of these cases, including Martin, concerns a police officer tasing, as opposed to punching, an individual vulnerable to falling from a precarious height, tasing is sufficiently analogous to punching in this context such that a reasonable jury could find that C.I. Haser's actions violated a 'clearly established' right. The risk in using a taser on an individual positioned on an elevated surface is that the individual could fall off said surface once incapacitated by the taser and suffer serious injury or death. Officer Smith – who was with C.I. Haser at the window – testified that it is 'against protocol' to 'tase someone on the roof' because if 'they fall off, that's not going to be good. We're not gonna tase someone that's on a roof.'. . The same exact logic applies to deliberately punching someone 'to stun' them. . . when that person is hanging out of a window. . . . Tasing an individual vulnerable to falling from a precarious height is sufficiently analogous to repeatedly punching an unarmed individual in the head to stun him while he is dangling from a windowsill at a precarious height. Requiring this case to be a factual clone of a previous case would afford C.I. Haser 'one liability-free violation,' a premise that this Court has repeatedly cautioned against. . . . In short, there was a 'clearly established' right at the time for an injured, visibly unarmed suspect to be free from temporarily paralyzing force while positioned as Peroza-Benitez was. A reasonable jury, on this record, could conclude that C.I. Haser 'repeatedly' punched Peroza-Benitez in the head and caused him to fall from a second-story window, in violation of that right. Or a jury could conclude that the facts do not support Peroza-Benitez's account of the incident. But if a jury credited Peroza-Benitez's version, then Peroza-Benitez's 'clearly established' right was violated. Thus there is a genuine dispute of material fact regarding C.I. Haser's conduct, which must be resolved by a jury. So we will vacate the District Court's finding that C.I. Haser was entitled to qualified immunity and remand for further proceedings. . .As to Officer White, the District Court held that he was entitled to qualified immunity because his 'use of non-lethal force in the form of a single tase to [Peroza-Benitez], regard-less of whether or not [Peroza-Benitez] was armed and whether or not he was unconscious in the moments after falling and being tased, cannot be considered a violation of any clearly established precedent.'. . We disagree. The District Court defined Peroza-Benitez's right as 'the Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive use of force in the form of the use of a taser while not visibly armed (but after the acting officer was informed moments earlier by a fellow officer that [Peroza-Benitez] was armed and in active flight), while laying [sic] on the ground after having fallen from a window through which he had attempted to flee and been rendered temporarily unconscious, and after having made no further attempt to flee after hitting the ground.'. . While the District Court 'assume[d] [Peroza-Benitez] made no further movements [upon landing] and was knocked temporarily unconscious,' it notably concluded in its analysis that Peroza-Benitez's 'degree of consciousness after hitting the ground is irrelevant' because Officer White 'made a quick decision, deploying his taser immediately, essentially simultaneously with [Peroza-Benitez] hitting the ground.'. . But the consciousness of Peroza-Benitez is not irrelevant to the analysis; it is critical. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Peroza-Benitez – again, as we must do at summary judgment – Peroza-Benitez was tased by Officer White while lying unconscious after having fallen over 10 feet into a below-ground, concrete stairwell. The duration of time that elapsed between Peroza-Benitez hitting the ground and getting tased does not change the fact that, in the light most favorable to Peroza-Benitez, he was tased while visibly unconscious and after multiple seconds had elapsed. . . such that a reasonable jury could find that Officer White should have known that he was tasing an unconscious individual. . . Thus, Peroza-Benitez's right at issue boils down to the following: The Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force in the form of being tased while visibly unconscious. There is a 'robust consensus of cases' that support the proposition that tasing a visibly unconscious person – who just fell over ten feet onto concrete – is a violation of that person's Fourth Amendment rights. [collecting cases] [W]e hold that the right not to be tased while visibly unconscious was 'clearly established' at the time and that a reasonable jury could find that Officer White violated this right. To be sure, a jury could find that the facts do not support Peroza-Benitez's account – for example, by finding that Peroza-Benitez was not unconscious and was still trying to flee, that Officer White reasonably believed Peroza-Benitez was armed, or that there was not enough time for Officer White to recognize that Peroza-Benitez was unconscious. But if a jury credited Peroza-Benitez's version of events, then Peroza-Benitez's 'clearly established' right was violated. Thus, here too we have a genuine dispute of material fact for the jury to resolve, and we will vacate the District Court's finding that Officer White was entitled to qualified immunity and remand for further proceedings.")

HIRA Educational Services North America v. Augustine, 991 F.3d 180, 191 & n.7 (3d Cir. 2021) ("Like the plaintiffs in X-Men, HIRA alleges the Legislators urged the agency (DGS) to terminate its contract with HIRA, sought an investigation into the sale, disparaged HIRA, and favored a different recipient of the government contract. HIRA's only attempt to distinguish this case from X-Men is to assert that it 'has clearly articulated both the constitutional and statutory rights that have been violated by the Legislative Defendants and the actions that constituted those violations.'. . Even assuming that HIRA has alleged violations of constitutional and statutory rights that are not foreclosed by the Legislators' First Amendment rights, that would show only that HIRA has stated a claim; it does nothing to show the Legislators violated clearly established law. Although HIRA rightly notes that the Second Circuit's decision is not binding on this Court, the absence of precedent in its favor from the Supreme Court or this Court dooms its case. . . That, combined with an adverse precedent from our sister court, puts HIRA well short of showing that the rights it seeks to vindicate here were clearly established. So Vogel and Sainato are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The recent Supreme Court decision in Taylor v. Riojas, —— U.S. —— , 141 S. Ct. 52, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020), does not change our analysis in this case. The Legislators' actions were not so outrageous that 'no reasonable ... officer could have concluded' they were permissible under the Constitution, Taylor, 141 S. Ct. at 53, especially in light of X-Men and Firetree.")

Kamienski v. Ford, 844 F. App'x 520, ___ (3d Cir. 2021) ("Whatever we might make of the allegations' merits, under the qualified immunity framework [,] . . . withholding evidence did not violate a clearly established right at the time of the criminal trial in this case. In Gibson, the plaintiff alleged that police officers affirmatively concealed material evidence from the prosecutor. . . But it was not clearly established at the time of the 1994 trial that officers had a duty under Brady to disclose exculpatory information to prosecutors, so they were entitled to qualified immunity. . . . And so too here. Mahony and Churchill are entitled to qualified immunity for their conduct at the time of the 1988 trial. . . Kamienski asks us to disregard Gibson because Mahony and Churchill were personally responsible for the disclosure to Kamienski—unlike the officers in Gibson, who were only under a duty to disclose the evidence to the prosecutor. But this request is self-defeating:

if Mahony and Churchill had duties arising from the litigation, they would be intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process and therefore entitled to absolute immunity. . . In sum, Kamienski cannot have it both ways. Either the detectives were responsible for complying with Brady by disclosing evidence to his defense team—in which case they were acting in a quasi-judicial role and entitled to absolute immunity—or they were investigators entitled to qualified immunity because their duty to disclose Brady material to the prosecutor was not clearly established at the time of the 1988 trial.")

El v. City of Pittsburgh, 975 F.3d 327, 337-43 & n.7 (3d Cir. 2020) ("Although we would not be required to defer to the District Court if the video showed its conclusion was 'blatantly and demonstrably false,'. . . the District Court's finding that Will was non-threatening is not blatantly contradicted by the video[.] . . The video clearly shows what happened between the police and the Els, and we have studied it extensively. Indeed, viewing the facts in 'the light depicted by the video[ ],'. . . confirms that the District Court did not make any demonstrably false findings about how the events unfolded. . . .The District Court correctly concluded that, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Will, a jury could conclude there was a violation of his right to be free from the unreasonable use of force. The factors laid out in Graham v. Connor . . . and Sharrar . . . show why. Under the Graham factors, the potential crime at issue (underage purchase of tobacco) was not severe; the Els did not pose an immediate safety threat; and they were neither resisting arrest nor trying to flee. . . Under the Sharrar factors, the Els were not violent or dangerous; they were unarmed; they were outnumbered six to two; and the situation unfolded over a few minutes, not a few tense and dangerous seconds. . . The final Sharrar factor, physical injury to the plaintiff, weighs in Will's favor, because he sustained a hip contusion—although the injury is relatively minor. . . The dissent disagrees with the definition of the right at issue, maintaining that the definition is not specific enough and should encompass facts not found by the District Court. We agree that the right must be defined with specificity. . . Here, however, the District Court followed that directive and did not speak at 'a high level of generality.'. . Moreover, the presence of the video in the record does not permit us to embark upon our own factfinding exercise. Rather, as noted, 'we must accept [the] set of facts' the District Court found . . . unless the video 'quite clearly contradicts' them,[.] . . Scott's rule, permitting us to disregard factual findings that no reasonable jury could believe, is 'a narrow exception to the limits ... on our jurisdiction' on review of a denial of qualified immunity. . . We should apply Scott's narrow exception carefully and strictly, rather than viewing it as an invitation to find our own facts. Therefore, the dissent's preferred articulation of the right at issue is not available to us within the limits of our jurisdiction. . . . In the absence of controlling authority from the Supreme Court or this Court, the District Court correctly looked to excessive force cases from our sister Circuits that involve police use of non-deadly force on unarmed, uncooperative citizens who were not suspected of serious crimes. . . These cases establish a consensus that such an individual has the right not to be taken to the ground during an investigatory stop when he stands up and takes one or two small steps towards a police officer who is standing a few feet away. . . . These cases from our sister Circuits establish a 'consensus ... of persuasive authority,'. . . that an unarmed individual who is not suspected of a serious crime—including one who is verbally uncooperative or passively resists the police—has the right not to be subjected to physical force such as being grabbed, dragged, or taken down.[7] [fn. 7: The dissent states that our holding places 'unrealistic expectations' on Officer Welling because he "was supposed to realize – in an instant, from four factually dissimilar out-of-circuit decisions – that a grab-and-shove-to-secure under these circumstances was clearly established as unconstitutional.'. . We disagree that the out-of-circuit cases are factually dissimilar, as they involve unarmed individuals who were not suspected of a serious crime and were uncooperative or passively resistant. More fundamentally, the dissent's criticism takes issue not with our opinion, but with the qualified immunity analysis itself. It is black-letter law that an officer is not protected from suit when he or she acts in a way that runs against 'a robust consensus ... of persuasive authority,'. . . regarding what conduct violates the Constitution. If it were too much to ask an officer to know constitutional principles established by a consensus of cases from outside his or her Circuit, the Supreme Court would need to solve that problem.] Officer Welling argues that even if Will had a Fourth Amendment right to be free of the kind of force he used, that right was not clearly established in July 2013, when the incident took place. To support this argument, he launches various attacks on the cases the District Court relied on—but none of these attacks succeed in dismantling the consensus of persuasive authority. . . . For his part, Will argues that we should affirm on an alternative ground—that his right to be free of the kind of force Officer Welling used is clearly established by the excessive force factors provided in Graham . . . and our opinion in Sharrar[.] . . The factor-based tests of Graham and Sharrar, however, are 'cast at a high level of generality' and 'can clearly establish the answer, even without a body of relevant case law,' only 'in an obvious case.'. . . We have concluded that cases are obvious, and that general standards clearly establish a right, in extreme situations such as when lethal force is used . . . or when a high school teacher sexually harassed and assaulted students[.] . . This case does not present that kind of situation, but the Graham and Sharrar factors nevertheless buttress the robust consensus of persuasive authority from our sister Circuits. As discussed above, the factors all tend to show that Officer Welling's force was excessive: there was no serious crime, no immediate safety threat, and no resistance or flight by the Els; they were not armed and were significantly outnumbered. . . While we would not hold that these factors, by themselves, clearly established Will's right to be free of the kind of force Officer Welling used, they support the consensus of cases that show clear establishment of the right. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Will, as we must, the danger to the police and the community was virtually nil. Officers approached two young men who were not engaged in any facially suspicious behavior; they were leaving a corner store. It became clear almost immediately that the men were not armed and that if any offense was being committed, it was, at most, an underage tobacco purchase. The men were upset to be stopped and said so. They did not flee. They were outnumbered six to two. One of them created a hazardous or offensive condition by standing up and taking a few small steps. Under these circumstances, a jury could conclude that taking Will down was an unreasonable use of force. And a consensus of cases from our sister Circuits establishes that in a situation like this, a plaintiff has the right not to be taken to the ground. In reaching this conclusion, we are mindful that reasonableness 'must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . There must be 'allowance for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.'. . Officer Welling may have been called upon to make a split-second decision when Will stood up and took a few steps, but his decision was made with the knowledge that Will was unarmed and outnumbered. For these reasons, Officer Welling is not entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

El v. City of Pittsburgh, 975 F.3d 327, 343-47 (3d Cir. 2020) (Phipps, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("[I]n two respects I part ways with the Majority's affirmance of the order denying qualified immunity to Officer Frank Welling at summary judgment. First, I do not believe that the Majority Opinion articulated the putative constitutional right at issue with the high level of specificity required for the qualified immunity analysis. Second, in my view, it is far from clearly established that Officer Welling's use of force against Will El – a grab-and-shove-to-secure, which resulted in a bruise on the hip – was unconstitutionally excessive. Thus, I respectfully dissent in part and would reverse the order denying qualified immunity to Officer Welling. . . . I do not believe that the Majority Opinion articulates the putative constitutional right with the requisite level of precision. The Majority describes the Fourth Amendment right in this way: The right of an unarmed individual not to be taken to the ground during an investigatory stop when he stands up and takes one or two small steps towards a police officer who is standing a few feet away. . . . But that articulation ignores important facts. It does not mention that Will El arose and extended an arm to point at an officer at close range. It also neglects that Officer Welling gestured for Will to sit down and that Will refused to. And Officer Welling did not initially take Will to the ground. Before the situation escalated, Welling grabbed and pushed Will back into a boarded-up window with Will maintaining his footing. . . . The inquiry into the putative right should be expressed this way: Whether an unarmed individual who arises to his feet in close range to a police officer, points at an officer, and ignores a gesture to sit back down has a Fourth Amendment right not to be grabbed and shoved backward into a vertical structure while not losing his footing. Such an articulation includes the three omitted events that would matter to every reasonable officer: that Will stood up and extended an arm to point at an officer at close range; that Will ignored Officer Welling's gesture to sit down; and that, as far as the complained of use of force, Welling did not tackle Will or take him to the ground. By excluding these important details, which are plainly evident from the video recording, the Majority Opinion does not identify the right with the 'high "degree of specificity"' required. . . . Under either formulation (the Majority's or mine), the constitutional right at issue was not clearly established. For a constitutional right to be "clearly established," the legal principle 'must have a sufficiently clear foundation in then-existing precedent.'. . Such a foundation in precedent may rest on either 'controlling authority' or 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'. . The Majority Opinion does not identify any 'factually analogous precedents of the Supreme Court [or] the Third Circuit.'. . Without controlling authority to meet the "clearly established" threshold, the Majority relies instead on four decisions from other federal appellate courts as persuasive authority. While the "clearly established" standard does 'not require a case directly on point,' those four cases fall well short of 'a robust consensus of persuasive authority.'. . None of them involves a sufficiently analogous situation to this one to be 'clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret

[them] to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply.'. . . In reaching this outcome, the Majority Opinion places unrealistic expectations on law enforcement officers. According to the Majority, Officer Welling was supposed to realize – in an instant, from four factually dissimilar out-of-circuit decisions – that a grab-and-shove-to-secure under these circumstances was clearly established as unconstitutional. Apparently, in that split-second, Officer Welling should have had recall of an Eighth Circuit case from 2012, a Fifth Circuit case from 2009, a Sixth Circuit case from 2006, and an Eleventh Circuit case from 1998 – all of which occurred in different contexts and involved much greater force than the grab-and-shove-to-secure at issue here. . . Not only that, but Officer Welling – in the same moment – needed to determine whether those factually dissimilar, non-controlling cases represented a robust consensus of persuasive authority. Even if that were possible, that small handful of cases does not place Officer Welling's use of force 'beyond debate,' such that it was a clearly established Fourth Amendment violation. . . Make no mistake, the Majority imposes a heightened standard for qualified immunity so that it no longer protects ' "all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law."'. . Officers without the acumen to conduct a synapse-quick legal analysis of factually dissimilar, out-of-circuit precedent will be denied immunity and subject to suit for their actions. The Majority responds that it is not applying a heightened standard but rather the black-letter law of qualified immunity. . . But in articulating the doctrine, the Supreme Court has not imposed such a high standard on officers. . . To the contrary, the Supreme Court has recognized that 'it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.'. . Rather than acknowledge that difficulty, or even that the appropriateness of Officer Welling's use of force is not 'beyond debate,'. . . the Majority faults Officer Welling for failing to instantaneously distill a loose collage of out-of-circuit caselaw into a robust consensus of persuasive authority that would apply to the particular circumstances of his use of force – which was less than the amount of force used in any of those other cases. . . . Under the Graham / Sharrar factors, this is not an 'obvious case' of excessive force. . . Instead, these factors generate uncertainty, and that further undermines the Majority's conclusion that Officer Welling violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . .In sum, I concur in part and respectfully dissent in part. As I understand the law, qualified immunity shields Officer Welling from suit because at the time of the incident, it was not clearly established that a grab-and-shove-to-secure, which resulted in a bruise on the hip, constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Given the caselaw at the time, these events occurred in the 'hazy border between excessive and acceptable force' in which law enforcement officers are entitled to qualified immunity.") Harvard v. Cesnalis, 973 F.3d 190, 207 & n.9 (3d Cir., 2020) ("We have never recognized an independent due process right to be free from a reckless investigation. . . We have also held that, even if such a claim were cognizable, it 'could only arise under the Fourth Amendment.'. . We will therefore affirm the District Court's grant of summary judgment for the defendants as to the reckless investigation claim. . . . Even if Harvard had brought the reckless investigation claim under the Fourth Amendment, the officers would nevertheless be entitled

Weimer v. County of Fayette, Pennsylvania, 972 F.3d 177, 190-92 (3d Cir. 2020) ("Weimer alleges that Vernon participated in the reckless and deliberately indifferent police investigation and 'had reasonable and realistic opportunities to intervene to prevent the violations of ... Weimer's constitutional rights.'. . Vernon responds that she is entitled to qualified immunity because, 'at the time of the allegations, no clearly established [law] existed to put [her] on notice' that, as a prosecutor, her failure to intervene in the police investigation would violate Weimer's rights. . . We agree. It is well established in our Circuit that both police and corrections officers must 'take reasonable steps to protect a victim from another officer's use of excessive force.'. . But we have not extended this duty to prosecutors who fail to intervene to prevent police from conducting unconstitutional investigations. Accordingly, we cannot say that 'any reasonable [prosecutor]' investigating Haith's murder would have understood that she was violating Weimer's constitutional rights in failing to intervene to prevent improper investigatory conduct by police. . . Put differently, the facts here are simply too dissimilar from those in the excessive force cases for us to hold that those cases would have put Vernon on notice that her actions were unlawful. Although the District Court acknowledged that there was no 'case law in the Third Circuit holding a prosecutor liable for a failure to intervene in the conduct of police officers,' it identified '[a] subsequent decision from the [Western District of Pennsylvania that] ha[d] extended liability for a failure to intervene claim to prosecutors who [were] engaging in investigative conduct.'. . Thus, the District Court permitted Weimer's claim to proceed '[g]iven the recent developments in this area of the law and the early stage of this case.'. . However, a district court opinion from 2018 cannot serve as a basis for holding that a prosecutor's duty to intervene to prevent an unconstitutional police investigation was clearly established between 2001 and 2006. For a legal principle to be clearly established, it must be based on precedent existing at the time of the official's act, and the holding of one district judge, which 'is not controlling authority in any jurisdiction, much less in the entire United States,' is insufficient to clearly establish a violation of a constitutional right. . . . Our opinion on appeal in Fogle merely affirmed the trial court's denial of the prosecutors' motion to dismiss Fogle's claims based on absolute immunity. . . Here, in contrast, Vernon has not only requested absolute immunity on the failure to intervene claim, but she also claims that if absolute immunity does not shield her from suit on this claim, qualified immunity applies. . . . District courts appear to disagree as to whether prosecutors have a duty to intervene in police investigations. . . Disagreement among district judges may, in and of itself, be a reason to recognize a qualified immunity defense. . . . Whatever might be said of the investigation, the question here is whether Weimer had a clearly established right to have Vernon take reasonable steps to protect her from an unconstitutional police investigation. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Weimer's reframing of the constitutional violation at issue does not change the fact that there was no clearly established law at the time of Vernon's allegedly violative conduct that would have placed the constitutional question she confronted—to intervene in the police investigation or not to intervene—'beyond debate.'")

Starnes v. Butler County Court of Common Pleas, 50th Judicial Dist., 971 F.3d 416, 428 (3d Cir. 2020) ("Doerr argues Starnes did not allege a clearly established right because we have not previously held that a hostile work environment is cognizable under § 1983. But we have been clear that § 1983 shares the same elements for discrimination purposes as a Title VII action. . . And a robust consensus of persuasive authority exists to clearly establish that creating a hostile work environment constitutes a § 1983 violation.")

Starnes v. Butler County Court of Common Pleas, 50th Judicial Dist., 971 F.3d 416, 431 (3d Cir. 2020) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has held that unmarried, romantic partners have a fundamental right to intimate association. Nor is there a robust consensus of persuasive authority recognizing such a right.")

Wagner v. Northern Berks Regional Police Department, 816 F. App'x 679, ___ (3d Cir. 2020) ("Horner is entitled to qualified immunity because the law is not clearly established that an officer lacks probable cause where the affirmative defenses of compulsory joinder or Double Jeopardy bars a prosecution. . . . In fact, the law of this Circuit provides that similarly complicated affirmative defenses, such as necessity . . . and statutes of limitations. . . are not subjects an officer must consider when evaluating whether there is probable cause. By its own terms, the dissent's analysis shows that the purported unlawfulness of Horner's actions was not clearly established. The dissent fails to 'identif[y] a single precedent—much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases—finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances' where the compulsory joinder rule or Double Jeopardy strips an arresting officer of probable cause to make an arrest. . . Thus, at a minimum, qualified immunity would shield Horner from liability.")

Wagner v. Northern Berks Regional Police Department, 816 F. App'x 679, ___ (3d Cir. 2020) (Fuentes, J., dissenting) ("I must . . . disagree with the Majority's holding that, even if Officer Horner lacked probable cause, his conduct is protected by the doctrine of qualified immunity. Public officials are entitled to qualified immunity unless the plaintiff alleges a violation of a constitutional right that was 'clearly established' at the time of the official's conduct. . . When we define the right allegedly violated, we must frame it 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. .Ultimately, the dispositive inquiry is whether 'it would be clear to a reasonable officer that the conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . As we have previously stated, qualified immunity 'protects "all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law."'. . Although we must consider the facts in each qualified immunity case 'in light of [its] specific context,'. . it is not necessary for a plaintiff to point to 'earlier cases involving fundamentally similar facts.'. . In our prior cases involving evidence intentionally or recklessly omitted from an affidavit supporting probable cause, we have defined the right in question as the right to be free from prosecutions on criminal charges that lack probable cause.'. . As explained above, I do not think those cases, which clearly hold that officers cannot omit exculpatory evidence from probable cause affidavits, are meaningfully different from this one, in which Officer Horner is alleged to have clearly disregarded evidence known to him when filing the 2014 affidavit. . . Given our substantial case law explaining an officer's duty to disclose information that could affect probable cause, I would find that Officer Horner has not established his entitlement to qualified immunity at this stage. Unfortunately, today's Majority Opinion licenses any officer to deliberately withhold information in an affidavit for an arrest warrant, even if they know that information would relieve a defendant of criminal liability for his actions. Qualified immunity and related principles of law are intended to shield officers who act reasonably in discharging their duties in good faith. The law is intended as a shield for such officers, not as a sword for officers who, as is alleged here, attempt to wield their authority to maliciously prosecute defendants. For these reasons, I respectfully disagree with my colleagues and would find that Officer Horner has not shown that he is entitled to qualified immunity and Wagner's allegations—that Officer Horner deliberately omitted material information from the affidavit in order to harass him—should have survived a motion to dismiss.

Knight v. Bobanic, 807 F. App'x 161, ___ (3d Cir. 2020) ("Appellees moved for summary judgment. Applying the second 'clearly established right' prong of the qualified immunity doctrine, the District Court granted their motion. After extensively summarizing the underlying (undisputed and disputed) facts, the District Court offered the following formulation of the right at issue in this case:

Heeding the Supreme Court's recent admonitions to the trial court, considering the above material facts (both undisputed and those that are disputed as viewed in favor of Plaintiff) the Court formulates the right at issue as follows: the right of an individual to be free from the infliction of deadly force by a police officer, where such deadly force was employed without warning or hesitation from the officer, and where the individual himself is in his home, lawfully armed, suspected of domestic violence, has raised at least slightly (but not aimed) one of his weapons, as he was quickly approaching the officers from the interior of his home.

Knight v. Bobanic, No. 2:15-cv-00820, 2019 WL 2151293, at *9 (W.D. Pa. May 17, 2019) (footnote omitted). The District Court then thoroughly examined Supreme Court and Third Circuit 'excessive force' precedent as well as excessive force decisions from other circuit and district courts. In the end, it concluded that neither controlling legal authority nor a robust consensus of persuasive legal authority clearly established, as of the date of the shooting, that all reasonable police officers would have known that Appellees' conduct in this case was unconstitutional. . . . Appellant asserts that the District Court engaged in improper fact-finding in favor of Appellees with respect to whether Shawn Knight had one of the guns raised because he pushed open the screen door. However, it is undisputed that Shawn Knight was holding a revolver in each hand and then opened the screen door that led to the front porch. 'For him to push that screen door open, he would have needed to raise one of his hands, which was holding a revolver, at least slightly.'. . In any event, the record supports the District Court's conclusion that Shawn Knight, at most, raised one of the weapons slightly for just a moment of time. According to Appellant, our 2002 ruling in Curley v. Klem, 298 F.3d 271 (3d Cir. 2002), 'squarely governs' the facts in this case. The defendant state trooper in Curley shot and seriously injured the plaintiff, a police officer whom he mistook for an armed criminal suspect (who had already killed himself). . . Admittedly, we found that there was a factual dispute as to whether the plaintiff had pointed his gun at the defendant

(while the District Court here assumed that Shawn Knight did not aim his weapons at Appellees). . . Furthermore, there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the plaintiff had looked inside the vehicle stolen by the suspect, where he would have seen the suspect's body. . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Appellant, Trooper Bobanic initially forced his way into the home (even though the alleged domestic violence victim and her mother indicated that the situation had deescalated and that no further police involvement was needed), and Appellees did not identify themselves as police officers or provide any sort of warning (which could have led Shawn Knight, who was sleeping at the time, to believe that the state trooper was a home invader). However, Curley was still a case of mistaken identity, and the plaintiff 'claims that his gun was never aimed in Klem's direction, that he had turned to retreat in a direction away from Klem at the time he was fired upon, and that there was ample evidence indicating that he was not the suspect, including the fact that he was wearing a standard Port Authority police uniform.'. .'By contrast, in this case, Shawn Knight was exactly the individual that the Troopers believed that he was, namely, a now-armed private citizen suspected of engaging in domestic violence, rushing out of his home in their direction with a gun in each hand.'. . Accordingly, we agree with the District Court that 'the facts of Curley are "distinguishable in a fair way from the facts presented in the case at hand," so Curley does not "clearly establish" the right at issue here."'. . For the foregoing reasons, we will affirm the order of the District Court.")
